EDITOR'S FOREWORD

THE aim of this book is to present an overview of literature in English from 1900 to the present day in a single volume. Representing as it does all geographical areas of the Anglophone world and a wide range of writing, The Oxford Companion to Twentieth-Century Literature in English is intended to be read for pleasure as well as being a useful source of information to students and teachers of literature. Its scope extends from the United Kingdom, Ireland, and America, to Australia, Canada, New Zealand, Asia, Africa, and the Caribbean.

Writers form the main component of this book; novelists, dramatists, and poets are the key figures. But in presenting literature in its broadest sense, and recognizing its flexible boundaries, we have also included, on a more selective basis, biographers, travel writers, critics, scholars, historians, and journalists. In adopting this inclusive approach we have extended the coverage to some major philosophers, economists, and sociologists in acknowledgement of their significant contributions to twentieth-century thought and ideology. The other component consists of about 650 essays on related subjects, from important individual works to genres, critical concepts, periodicals, literary groups, and movements. A network of cross-references allows the reader to range over vast territories of the century's literature in English, to observe the interactions between writers and subjects, and be guided to much supplementary information.

In producing a reference book of such diversity the most daunting task for an editor, and ultimately the most contentious, is deciding who and what to include. My starting point was a list of major writers whose reputations have secured them a place in any reference book of twentieth-century writing in English, a fairly effortless task performed in buoyant anticipation. The fun began when this master list generated a series of sub-lists which themselves produced further offshoots. Faced with such flourishing literary activity, and the limitations of space, I established some ground rules. In attempting to present a balanced and comprehensive account of a broad range of literary forms and a multi-national group of authors, literary merit was not the only consideration; national or ethnic identity and a fair representation of the various periods of the twentieth century also played an important part. To qualify for inclusion each author must have lived beyond 1900, published at least three books, and achieved a significant degree of international or national recognition. There are exceptions: in some instances a writer included may have produced one or two widely acclaimed books or may significantly represent a literary culture in its formative phases. We have taken risks with some younger writers who have shown exceptional promise at the beginning of their literary careers. In the case of authors who were born in the nineteenth century but lived beyond 1900, only those who published significant works in the twentieth century have been included. Henry James, Bernard Shaw, and H. G. Wells fall into this category, as does Thomas Hardy who was a nineteenth-century novelist and a twentieth-century poet, but Algernon Swinburne, Rider Haggard, and Mark Twain do not. Samuel Butler (d. 1902) is in, and so is his Erewhon Revisited (1901), but like other nineteenth-century novels—including all of Thomas Hardy's—Erewhon (1872) is out. There is no children's literature nor is there literature in translation except where the author has been the translator of his or her own works.

Over the century, and even during the five years of compiling this book, fashions have shifted, new writers have emerged, others have published ever more important works or changed direction, some have faded into obscurity or died. These and many other factors have meant that entries were continually being updated and reassessed. In trying to keep up to date we have kept a watchful eye on recent publications but many more will have appeared by the time this Companion is in the bookshops.

The author entries are composed of brief biographical details, descriptions of selected works, typical characteristics, literary achievements, and general critical comments; adverse criticism has been eschewed in favour of a broad consensus of literary taste. We have also tried to place writers in the context of time and place. Further reading is suggested in the case of more important authors. The length of the entries varies and ought not to be seen as a measure of a writer's importance. There are many factors which determine the length of an entry: prolific writers do not lend themselves easily to brief summary, regardless of their celebrity or lack of it; some writers have more noteworthy biographies or literary connections while others need more space because their literary achievements are particularly diverse or complex; neglected or emerging writers require fuller description because their lives and works may hitherto be unrecorded.

In taking stock of some of the dilemmas faced by an editor whose brief is 'twentieth-century literature in English', and in outlining the principles involved, I also acknowledge the impossibility of producing a reference book to suit everyone's taste. Some will be disappointed by omissions or irritated by errors, but I hope that most readers will find enjoyment in the Companion's rich diversity and geographical scope. I have sought much assistance from advisers and contributors. During the preparation of this book, their enduring enthusiasm for the project has been the source of sustenance for my sometimes flagging devotion. The Companion is essentially a collaborative work, a series of mini-biographies and essays combining the imaginative insights and scholarship of a dedicated group of co-authors. Other than giving brief guidelines, I have not attempted to adopt a rigid format for the entries gathered here. The different perceptions and modes of writing, from the sternly scholarly to the lightly whimsical, reflect the multifarious nature of the ground that has been covered.

My thanks therefore go first to all the contributors and advisers for their Herculean efforts and for guiding me through many a labyrinthine path. My special thanks to John Sutherland who has been a leading light and has written a magnificent Introduction. I am particularly grateful to Lynn Knight, Aamer Hussein, Douglas Houston, and Henry Claridge who so willingly helped me with some frantic updating through a long hot summer. I have had much support from the OUP. My thanks go especially to Kim Scott Walwyn who encouraged me to take on the project and gave me much guidance in the early phases, and to Frances Whistler who kept the show on the road with firmness and good humour. I have shared a joke or two with Margaret Aherne, the copy-editor, whose meticulous eye for detail has saved me from much embarrassment. I also thank Judith Landry who has helped in ways too numerous to mention. I am eternally grateful to my sons and daughter, Antony, Benedict, Nicholas, and Polly, who have saved me from many a scrape and applied themselves to anything from counting words to computer failure. I am greatly indebted to Margaret Drabble. It was during my five-year apprenticeship on The Oxford Companion to English Literature that the idea of a twentieth-century volume was first conceived. She has made herself available for consultation throughout the course of editing this work and was its main source of inspiration.

INTRODUCTION

BY JOHN SUTHERLAND

THERE used to be in post-war British music hall a performer called Lesley Welch. 'The Memory Man', as Welch was professionally known, would call for questions from the theatre or radio audience on any aspect of sport—such things as what horse came third in the Derby in 1938, or how many runs Denis Compton scored for Middlesex in June 1948. Welch (an honest performer, to all appearances, unlike the corrupted contestants on the contemporary American quiz show, 'Twenty-one') would invariably answer correctly. The reaction of the audience was that of Goldsmith's gazing rustics:

> And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew
> That one small head could carry all he knew

The basic assumption in Welch's routine was that in the 1950s one person, one brain, albeit an unusually capacious organ, could even at this late date contain every memorable fact about British sport. Much the same confidence underlay the launch of the Oxford University Press 'Companions' to literature in the early 1930s. In essence the series was a cool Oxonian response to the alarming massification of the literary object over the previous hundred years. All through the nineteenth century the store of literature had increased inexorably. In the 1760s, there were a hundred new novels annually; by 1900 it was two thousand. So too with poetry, plays, and all the peripherals of the writing and publishing professions. Unlike cabbages, books do not disappear with consumption but accrete as part of the literary record (as backlist, library holdings, or reprints). There were any number of historical factors making for what an appalled Henry James called, in 1900, 'monstrous multiplications'. To enumerate just a few: the lifting of the 'taxes on knowledge' in the first half of the nineteenth century; the innovation of steam presses which turned out books and newspapers on an industrial scale and steamships which joined the two vast Anglophone markets; stereotyping, which permitted mass reprintings of popular books; the 1870s British universal education acts which propelled the lower classes into literacy; the invention of the book club in early twentieth-century America. Every book trade advance meant more books. More books meant more 'Literature' (using the definitions of the Dewey Decimal System, 'Literature' generally comprises between ten and twenty per cent of total book production).

A number of systems were developed to control the exploding mass of literature during the second half of the nineteenth century and the early part of the twentieth century. Typically these systems served to reduce the unmanageable bulk of literature to a commodity that could be handled by a single, moderately industrious, 'well-read', person. Sir John Lubbock's '100 Best Books' in 1891, for instance (initially issued as a supplement to the Contemporary Review), triggered off a mania for such handy listings. In a few years this selective mania had evolved into popular 'libraries' such as OUP's 'World's Classics', and Dent's 'Everyman'. Dent's series carried on its flyleaf a talismanic motto, indicating its mission to help the reader through the jungle of modern literature 'Everyman, I will go with thee, and be thy guide'. In poetry, The Oxford Book of English Verse (1900) imposed a similar order on poetry and performed a similar blind-man's dog service for the lay-reader.

These 'select' libraries and authoritative anthologies reduced the exploding mass of English literature to 'classic' dimensions—that is, the fixed quantum of texts that make up Greek and Latin literature. (The Packard Research Center's databased archive of all classical literature comes in at around fifty megabytes of computer storage space: it will still be fifty megabytes in a thousand years' time, presumably.) It was from the same desire to impose humane intellectual order on the chaotic literary abundance of modern times that the first Oxford Companion to English Literature, by Sir Paul Harvey, emerged in 1932. Like Arthur Quiller-Couch (the compiler of the first Oxford Book of English Verse) Harvey was in the tradition of Oxford amateurs—unlike the scientific I. A. Richards and rigorous F. R. Leavis, literary critics who were, in the 1930s, coming into their own at Cambridge University. 'This volume,' Harvey began his Introduction by asserting, 'will serve its purpose if it proves a useful companion to ordinary, everyday readers of English literature'. In that modest goal, Harvey probably had himself in mind. Born in 1869, the young Harvey had progressed from Rugby to New College Oxford, where he graduated first class, Lit. Hum. A product of the new School of English at the University, he went into the Civil Service. He was knighted for his professional achievements in 1911. At the time of his retirement Sir Paul had risen to the rank of Financial Advisor to the colonies. In his sixties, he published The Oxford Companion to English Literature (1932) and The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature (1937). He died in 1948, still at work on The Oxford Companion to French Literature (eventually finished by another hand, in 1959). OCEL, for which he remains best known to posterity, was the work of his leisure hours.

What Harvey's Companion presents is the anatomy of a well-stored, first-class mind with an essentially amateur literary expertise. The Companion offers a miscellaneous web of information, all of which coexisted, one assumes, in Sir Paul's own brain. The contents make up a pot pourri of author biographies (including many foreign authors—Harvey was not severe about definitions), plot summaries (including operas), historical highlights (Waterloo, Bannockburn), profiles of kings, queens, great world-historical figures, and famous criminals, glosses on classical names, allusions, and tags, explanations of such obscure terms as 'carpet-bagger', 'Carfax', 'Capitol', and 'Caput Mortuum'. The Companion must, one imagines, have been invaluable to Times crossword compilers. Harvey included a sizeable slab of American works and authors, on the chauvinistic grounds that American literature was substantially English literature written in America. The whole structure rested on two mighty foundations—Shakespeare and Walter Scott. As in the OED (in which Scott and Shakespeare were the two most cited sources) these two great national laureates were the copestones and their works the touchstones of the national literature.

OCEL represented an urbane, one-volume Virgilian companion to the cultural ensemble denoted by the term 'English Literature'. If one wanted a single adjective to describe the principles on which it was constructed, it would be 'amateur' or (to use cricket's term) 'gentlemanly'. Cambridge took, as usual, a more scientific line, with its massive, committee-written Cambridge History of English Literature (1917, repr. 1933). This 15-volume production made up an encyclopaedia on the subject. It was prepared by a team of professional academics. The resulting compilation was bland, uniform, apparatus-laden, exact, and—by comparison with Harvey's Companion—not exactly companionable.

OCEL was an immediate success, going through two impressions in 1932. The twenty-first impression (called, with various updating revisions, the 'Fourth Edition') was published in 1967. It was substantially what had been in print for the last 35 years. In the 1970s, OUP decided that a major overhaul was in order. But exactly what form the necessary reorganization should take posed dilemmas. Who should be chosen as possessing the representatively 'well-stored' mind of the late twentieth century? Or should the original, single-mind, 'Companionate', concept be dropped altogether in favour of a committee, or a task-force of anonymous professional compilers and contributors? How had the elements of indispensable literary knowledge changed over the previous half-century with the growth and spread of higher education, and how should these changes be accommodated? Was what Harvey had called 'completeness within a modest compass' still a feasible goal?

In the event, the Delegates of the Press chose shrewdly. They selected Margaret Drabble as editor in chief. One of the country's admired novelists, Drabble had a first-class degree in literature from Cambridge, but had never been a professional academic. If Harvey was the archetypal 'ordinary, everyday reader' with a first-class mind, Drabble was the intellectual of the 1970s. She was formidably well-read, a role-model for younger women writers, and politically engagée.

Drabble was assisted in her task (which was to take her five years) by Jenny Stringer, a free-lance writer. Astutely, the editor retained a large core of Harvey's more substantial entries. New entries were commissioned from a corps of 76 sub-contracted contributors (most of them academics). Entries were brought up to date, but not up to the minute (the initial cut-off date for author-entries of 1939—Drabble's own year of birth was relaxed in the 1995 edition which had 59 new entries on contemporary authors). Drabble deferred to 'increasing specialization and professionalism of English studies' by making the revised Companion friendlier to the bright 'A' level student and undergraduate user in the country's sixty or so English departments. The selection was 'in some respects narrower', as Drabble noted in her Introduction. The quirkier elements of Harvey's Companion were dropped: 'dollars and pieces of eight have gone, the Cinque Ports have gone, and so has the Doge of Venice', Drabble recorded—rather ruefully. The white, middle-class, Oxonian masculinist tone of the original enterprise was diluted, but not entirely removed. The Walter Scott entries were left intact as an affectionate monument to Harvey's founding vision. The double-column, unillustrated, reassuringly antique format was retained. On the shelf, stripped of its dustjacket, the 'Fifth Edition' looked very much like its venerable predecessor—only newer and less faded.

The Drabble Fifth Edition of OCEL (which was priced enticingly low for the 1984 buyer at £15.00) went on to sell phenomenally well, penetrating well beyond the traditional reference-library market. It was, manifestly, a popular gift at Christmas time. In terms of sales, the Fifth Edition was probably the most successful venture of its kind in academic publishing in the 1980s. It certainly outsold glitzier, heavily illustrated, more consciously modish rivals. And it is worth pondering why OCEL5 was so much to the taste of the general reading public in the 1980s and 1990s. Obviously a portmanteau container with everything worth knowing about English literature (carrying Oxford University's seal of approval) had a perennial appeal for any self-improving person. But what principally attracted customers, and satisfied users, was the core of humane knowledge which the editor retained while at the same time broadening and 'academicizing' the perspective of the project. OCEL5 not only reduced English literature to manageable proportions—so that one could 'see it whole'—the new Companion communicated a confident sense of the enduring value of English literature at the end of the century. In this respect, it was as much a book to browse in as a source to refer to for ready information.

The Oxford Companion to Twentieth-Century Literature in English descends lineally from OCEL5, both in conception and in the person of its editor, Jenny Stringer. The task proposed by this latest venture is formidable. 'Twentieth-Century Literature in English' is a fast-moving target. The coverage comes up to the moment, giving a snapshot of contemporary literature as it is currently evolving, yet at the same time going back to the modernist, turn-of-the-twentieth-century roots in which the various national traditions are grounded. At the forward edge—where it is still 'living'—literature is accumulating, and its definition changing, day by day. The nearer one is in time to the literary object, the harder it is to be sure of status. Most of us rely on history to make our most important literary critical judgements. Who to put in? who not to put in? becomes a fiendishly tricky question with currently-active authors. The name recognition factor is palpably lower, imposing a harder burden on the compiler to justify inclusion. Living authors means authors in flux, a factor which has necessitated the renovation of entries almost as soon as they are written. Most drastically authors (such as Angela Carter or Graham Greene) have died in the interval between writing them up and publishing. A writer such as Wole Soyinka goes into exile, and the whole judgement on his literary achievement needs to be revised in the light of that event.

Most of all it is the sheer quantity of 'Twentieth-Century Literature in English' that is daunting to any would-be selector and compiler. In bulk it surpasses any other standard category one can think of, comprising as it does all genres, and some two dozen national literatures—including the world's largest. Year for year, the twentieth century has seen more literary production than in any previous period. It would not be perverse to propose a companion to any one decade. Raymond Williams once pointed out that a lifetime would be insufficient to cover the literary production of a single year in modern times. Accompanying these deterring enlargements is the new definition 'Literature in English'—a much more complex formulation, it turns out, than 'English Literature'. English is one of the major world languages (the others being Russian, Chinese, Spanish, and French) and, in terms of the literature that passes through it, English is probably the most heterogeneous and dialect-rich. Within the general category 'Literature in English', space has been allocated equitably to three main territories. Some thirty per cent of the author entries cover American writing, thirty per cent cover British writing, the remaining percentage goes to writing from other areas of the Anglophone world. As will be clear, this Companion—like the recently published Oxford Companion to Literature in French (ed. Peter France, 1995)—disavows the idea of literature as an intrinsically national possession ('English Literature', 'American Literature', 'French Literature'). A logical, although logistically inconvenient, next step would have been to include the huge corpus of literary work translated into English from other languages. It would not be far-fetched, for example, to argue that the most historically potent writer of fiction in English in the 1970s was Alexander Solzhenitsyn, who never penned an English word in his life. A similar argument could be made for Jean Genet and Frantz Fanon in the 1960s. This is, however, the province of a volume already in preparation at OUP. Embedded in the (already overpacked) title, 'The Oxford Companion to Twentieth-Century Literature in English', is the qualification, 'Literature Originally in English'.

Internationalization and a more scrupulous attention to region enlarges the scale of the project, as does the recruitment of women in large numbers into literary activity, particularly following liberationist initiatives in the 1960s. The sex ratio in the twentieth-century Companion is three to one. A spot check of the two previous Companions suggests a ratio of between five and seven to one. The simplest, if most arduous, solution to the size problems confronting Stringer when she began work on the Companion would have been to embark on a total listing such as is given by the all-inclusive Contemporary Authors (1962), a serial compilation which by 1995 had attained 200 volumes and 100,000 authorial profiles. Contemporary Authors is invaluable to the researcher in the modern field, but it gives little more 'guidance' than a telephone directory. Authors of all kinds of book are eligible, whether of auto-repair manuals or L-A-N-G-U-A-G-E poetry. Stringer, by contrast, has retained the hereditary Companion category, 'Literature', and the discriminatory duties the term imposes. The Oxford Companion to Twentieth-Century Literature in English is not an open-ended directory, nor a database, but a guide. As such, what it keeps out of the picture is as formative as what it includes. While aiming for maximal comprehensiveness and meaningful levels of literary significance, Stringer and her contributors have kept the compilation within the dimensions of manageability represented by the single volume—a volume no larger in physical size and wordage than its sibling Companions. A cost is paid in the Companion's internal architecture. Stringer, unlike the compilers of OCEL and OCEL5, cannot afford the luxury of wordy digression or flights of personality. The bulk of entries in the twentieth-century Companion—some 2,400 out of about 3,000—are authorial (this proportion, incidentally, represents a shift from earlier Companions). The remaining entries cover genres ('Beat Poetry', 'Detective Fiction'), groups and movements, critical concepts, periodicals, and supremely important single works; in addition there are some 400 cross-references. The apportionment of space within entries descends from a pantheon of writers (D. H. Lawrence, Henry James, Thomas Hardy, T. S. Eliot, Virginia Woolf, Bernard Shaw) who rate over 1,000 words. This nucleus of twentieth-century immortals selects itself. Ranked beneath them are a first and second division whose inclusions may be more contentious. The average length of the entries is around 270 words. The ratio between longest and shortest contrasts with the occasional extreme brevity and lavish length of different entries in earlier Companions.

In its author entries The Oxford Companion to Twentieth-Century Literature in English offers bio-bibliographical information to a high degree of specification, and throughout the book the network of cross-references maps out a range of linked areas within the Companion's total coverage. As well as immediately providing information for the general reader, the book will connect with a body of increasingly computerized assemblies of literary knowledge. For many readers it will serve as the starting-point for further extended searches in the electronic environment. In this respect, the Companion is a resource which will, as they become familiar with it, generate its own corps of advanced users. Those browsing through it for the first time will find its subject matter ('Literature') presented not as an inert canonical set of books, classical authors, and facts 'which every civilized person should know' (as in E. D. Hirsch's Cultural Literacy) but as an activity with which readers, on their part, can interact.

What salient facts does this Companion, considered in its totality, convey about literature in English in the twentieth century? Principally, one perceives that creative writing has moved out in all directions at once, confounding easy generalizations. It would be safe to assert, for instance, that viewed from one angle, literature in English is—in its various manifestations—more nationalistic (more American, more Scottish, more Australian) than ever before. No minority but now has its literary voice and literary platform. But, equally, one may assert that literature in English is more supranational (or indifferent to nationality) in its pretensions than it has ever been. Feminist writing, to take an obvious example, is typically writing without frontiers, in which women talk to women irrespective of place, class, historical period, or national origin. If one compares a novelist like Toni Morrison (winner of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1993) with Rudyard Kipling (winner in 1907) it is clear that the African-American novelist (who refers to herself as 'a Third-world woman in America') is an artist who spans the first and third worlds in ways in which Kipling (whose east could never meet his west) does not. Beloved—a novel which is almost as popular in Britain as it is in America—is dedicated not to Morrison's millions of readers across the English-speaking world, but to the 'sixty million and more' of expatriated Africans whose native language, with everything else, was taken away from them. It is evident that contemporary writers with a specifically gay affiliation (such as Adam Mars Jones, Paul Monette, Larry Kramer) similarly speak across national frontiers (sometimes more readily, one suspects, than they speak across gender boundaries). A genre such as science fiction is as international as its annual World Conventions, and it is often difficult for readers to identify a practitioner's national origin without guidance. One of the most interesting categories of writer represented in this Companion are those who have written in the fractional spaces between nationalities and ethnicities: Amy Tan and Hanif Kureishi come to mind as novelists whose fiction fruitfully locates itself in the second-generation immigrant's dual consciousness of where the parents came from and where the children are. Is Kureishi to be considered a British or a Pakistani literary possession?—both. Is The Joy Luck Club a novel of Chinese or American experience?—both. One of the literary-sociological deductions one draws from the Companion is that in this century there has been significantly more trans-national movement and transplantation of writing across traditional boundaries. Sylvia Plath, to take a high-profile example, began her published writing career as a minor American novelist; she died as Britain's most admired woman poet. It requires delicate dissective powers to determine where the 'New Zealander' in Katherine Mansfield ends, and the 'Londoner' begins.

At a lower level of literary aspiration, bestsellers have become notably supranational during the course of the century. Frederick Forsyth, English by origin, lives in Ireland for tax reasons and sells most of his books in America. Arthur Hailey was born in England, took Canadian citizenship, lived for the later part of his career in the Bahamas, and directed the blockbusters of his writing maturity primarily at American readers. If one looks at the New York Times or London Sunday Times bestseller lists in any week, one sees an extraordinary degree of national interpenetration—mainly between Britain and America, but often taking in writers of other origins as well (Boris Pasternak and Vladimir Nabokov competed between them for top place in the bestseller lists in 1958). John Grisham fills the shopwindow of Hatchard's in Piccadilly and Frederick Forsyth proudly dominates the dumpbins in Barnes and Noble's establishments in New York. In this respect, popular fiction like popular music has accommodated to the vastness of the world market. This tendency towards the globalization of culture is accepted as something natural by younger readers of literature. (Some of them may resent the absence from the Companion of such contemporary troubadours as Ice Cube, Patti Smith, and Michael Stipe—'poets' whose constituency is as world-wide as MTV.) Inevitably the internationalization of literature will be accelerated by the Internet—a system based, momentously, on English as its lingua franca. It is only a matter of time before 'Literature in English' adapts to the net as a delivery system (before this can be fully achieved, however, intractable copyright problems must be solved by a legal code which finds it harder to adapt to the global electronic environment than does creative writing).

The global, supranational, market for literature often moves in mysterious ways. W. H. Auden became a super-selling and more world-famous writer than he had ever been in his lifetime, in 1994. The reason was the unexpected box-office success in America of Four Weddings and a Funeral, a low-budget British film. It features (in its 'funeral' segment) a public reading of one of Auden's poems, 'Stop all the clocks, cut off the telephone' (1936). This sparked off a voracious demand for reprints of Auden's poetry—featuring the 'hit' poem—among an audience which is traditionally impervious to the mandarin charms of modern verse. One can see such phenomena as reassuring, or obscurely terrifying.

One of the more illuminating paradoxes in twentieth-century literature is that some of its most important practitioners have exploited the nationalist and the supranational dimensions of their work simultaneously. Thomas Keneally, for instance, is in one of his many parts the most chauvinistically Australian of writers. In the 1990s, much of Keneally's extra-literary energy has been devoted to ridding his country of the last vestiges of colonial rule (in the form of Commonwealth membership and loyalty to the British monarch). Some of Keneally's work—such as the study of aboriginal mentalité, The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith (1972), or his bicentennial historical novel The Playmaker (1987)—might be thought parochial in terms of a global market which has not traditionally shown much fascination with things Australian. Yet with his novel Schindler's Ark (which won the Booker Prize in 1982), adapted by Steven Spielberg in the film Schindler's List, Keneally enjoyed a lease of vast international popularity. Paradoxically, this laureate of the outback became the author most effectively to contradict Theodor Adorno's grim axiom that writing literature after Auschwitz is an impossibility.

One of the major trends which has conditioned the evolution of twentieth-century literature is decensorship. Many of the writers profiled in this Companion have been, in their time, prohibited: James Joyce, Henry Miller, D. H. Lawrence are famous (once notorious) instances. For 'Literature in English', the modern period is one of ever-expanding freedom of expression. Some of the thresholds are dramatic. The post-1959 novels of Norman Mailer would have been unpublishable before that date (when the Lady Chatterley's Lover trial was successfully concluded in America). A British bookseller before 1960 would have been looking at a long jail-sentence for selling the novels Martin Amis has been producing for the last twenty years. There are, however, exceptions which test this rule. While censorship generally has receded, intransigent pockets have remained in places like South Africa before the 1990s. Paradoxically, these nests of cultural oppression have generated (as in censored Russian literature of the nineteenth century) harvests of rich literary creativity. Writers of indubitable world-class status, such as Nadine Gordimer, Athol Fugard, J. M. Coetzee, did not merely survive, but flourished under Apartheid regimes rabidly inimical to their literary activity.

Having made these points about the general internationalization and liberation of literature (both of which are heartening from a liberal point of view) one must enter a caveat. The more cost-expensive forms of literature (notably the novel) have inexorably gravitated to the most developed publishing industries in the western world—those of America and of Britain. Thus, for instance, two of the most eminent of sub-continental Indian writers of fiction—Salman Rushdie and Vikram Seth—frequently launch their work in London and in New York, with 'conglomerated' and multi-national publishing houses (although Seth insisted that A Suitable Boy be simultaneously launched in India). Unusually, Peter Carey, the Booker-prize winning Australian novelist (with Oscar and Lucinda, 1988) has maintained a relationship, after his overseas triumphs, with the University of Queensland Press which published his early short stories. But such fidelity is rare. Most successful writers, and most would-be successful writers of fiction, have to follow the money. The money is US dollars and pounds sterling. This sense that one's 'market' is so far from one's literary roots can throw up artistic dilemmas. The West Indian novel is one of the glories of post-war writing in English; yet there is no domestic book trade, nor a regional reading public sufficient to support the extraordinarily gifted writers in English that the Caribbean has produced. They must publish (and be largely read) in the UK, and to a lesser extent on the eastern seaboard of the US. The need to reside where their income is primarily earned has clearly had a formative effect on the careers of writers such as V. S. Naipaul and Wilson Harris.

While readers pay great attention to the author's name on a book's title-page, they typically fail to register the imprint that accompanies it. The oversight is significant. If, for instance, one contemplates Booker Prize shortlisted candidates and winners over the years (see Appendix for Booker Prize winners) they would seem, to judge by origins, to be admirably diverse—to the point of postcolonial correctness. Novelists of Australian, New Zealand, Canadian, Indian, Nigerian, and Japanese extraction can be found. So multi-cultural have the winners been that home-grown writers have grumbled about level playing-fields. But it is a main desideratum of the awarders of the Prize that the work shall first have been published in the United Kingdom—that it shall be, in other words, the assigned property of the British publishing industry. However diverse the natal origins and cultural affiliations of Booker novelists, their publishers (co-owners of the work) are invariably London-based. So too with prestigious annual prizes awarded by, for instance, the Los Angeles Times in five main categories of literary activity. The judges have been assiduous in noticing Chicano and Asian-American writers who cater to large constituencies in southern California. But such writers will typically have been brought to their readers by an American book trade which is, at its executive level, as white-Anglo-male as any other corridor of high power in the United States.

The Royal Commission which in 1975 looked into the Canadian publishing industry noted the extraordinary paucity of indigenous novels published in the country, in either of the two principal languages. 'Canadian' novelists like Mordecai Richler were based in London, other prominent Canadian novelists like Leonard Cohen (the balladeer, but also author of Beautiful Losers) marketed their fiction principally in the United States, and catered mainly for a US readership. Despite subsequent attempts to redress this situation by aggressive programmes of subsidy and protective legislation, Canada has not succeeded in repatriating its literature.

In creative writing, as in other spheres of late-twentieth-century life, the multinational, New York- and London-based company is old empire writ new. Post-colonial much recent writing may be: post-colonial the publishing industry is not. In 1947, in an agreement on 'world rights' which was as momentous for literature in English as was the Yalta meeting for post-war international relations, the British and American publishing industries agreed to carve the English speaking world into two huge sectors. America would have its own territory (i.e. only American publishers could supply it), the UK would have its 'traditional market' (i.e. the former empire and Commonwealth), Canada would be an open territory. This 'paper curtain' (unlike its iron equivalent) is still effectively in place. For many writers it means that—unless 'overseas rights' can be sold—they may be kept out of large sectors of the English-speaking world. One can argue, of course, that this rational arrangement is for everyone's good. But it does not conduce to the freedom of writers.

So too with decensorhip and the unfettered 'liberation' which it seems to denote. In one sense writers are freer to express themselves as the twentieth century comes to an end than they have ever been. The obscenity, blasphemy, and libel laws which traditionally have been used to oppress literature are much relaxed and in some cases they have become dead letters. But if expression is freer, literature as a 'commodity' is more jealously owned and monopolistically protected than it has ever been. As laws affecting censorship have been rolled back over the last hundred years, those affecting copyright have been progressively tightened, refined, and expanded. It is safe to predict that one main group of users of this Companion will be publishers and their legal advisers, checking—by reference to crucial dates—when authors and their works come into public domain. That threshold in Britain has, from 1995, been extended from fifty to seventy years after death. It is very likely that the rest of the English-speaking world will follow suit. The postponement of public domain inhibits the free circulation of literature in its cheapest reprint forms—something on which the general health of culture depends.

Poetry, which can be produced and distributed with little capital expenditure, and which is of negligible significance commercially, has managed better than fiction to retain its local, regional, and coterie flavours. The Liverpool poets, the Brixton Afro-Caribbean poets, and the still active Beats round Lawrence Ferlinghetti's City Lights Bookshop in San Francisco all testify to the vigour of poetry at the grassroots, and its ability to thrive at that level. If one is curious about the regional and local recesses of twentieth-century literature, poetry is the place to look. This Companion is particularly attentive to the many groups, collectives, and workshops which have generated poetry and kept its flame alight in the last one hundred years.

One surprising feature in the survey of material contained in the twentieth-century Companion is that, although there is a long list of new names, there seem to be relatively few new forms of literature. Novelists, poets, dramatists, journalists, essayists (including literary critics and reviewers), and biographers predominate. There are innovative entries in the fields of television drama (David Mercer, Dennis Potter). But even these can be seen as sub-divisions of traditionally-staged drama. There are new narrative genres ('campus novels', 'cyberpunk', 'the New Journalism'), but nothing as dramatic as the rise of the novel as a major literary form in the eighteenth century. It is hard to find a central field of literary activity not represented in Harvey's Companion. It would seem to be as difficult to invent a new literary genre as it is to invent a new vice.

In his 1899 survey of English letters, The Pen and the Book, Walter Besant estimated that at the end of the nineteenth century there were some 1,200 professional writers in England, of whom around 200 were wholly self-supporting by their pens. One to six would seem to be a fair estimate of the ratio in the twentieth-century Companion. It is still the case that 'Literature' (as opposed to 'Popular Literature') is a penurious calling. One of the startling revelations in Margaret Drabble's 1995 life of Angus Wilson is that in his most remunerative year, this pre-eminent novelist earned less than £12,000. In his best year, Stephen King earned $5 million in publishers' advances. Not all literary genres yield even a subsistence wage. Probably no more than a score of the poets profiled in this Companion have managed to wrest a decent living from poetry alone. It is only at its less creative margins (in journalism, for example) that secure salaries, paid holidays, and pensions are to be had. The huge proliferation of names in this Companion should not mislead anyone into thinking that for the average practitioner the literary vocation is much better rewarded than it was in Dr Johnson's time. There are merely more Richard Savages.

One of the ways in which American writers (particularly poets) have sought to keep body and soul together in the later twentieth century is by attaching themselves to colleges as 'writers in residence'. This relates to an overwhelming feature of modern 'Literature in English'—the ubiquitous influence of the academy. Institutions of higher learning have had a formative effect on twentieth-century creative writing in three direct ways. As with writers in residence, they have been patrons, absorbing many of the functions of the church in earlier centuries. A more subtle form of patronage—or institutional favour—is represented by a university's taking over the care of a living writer's literary remains. A writer's stock is similarly raised when his or her work is approved for doctoral work. The two most popular subjects for Ph.D. dissertations in the early 1990s were, one is told, the poet John Ashbery and Samuel Beckett. The sales represented by academic attention of this kind are probably nugatory. But to be set for advanced study guarantees what matters more to ambitious writers—critical reputation and a place in literary posterity.

More pervasively, academic criticism (through scholarly publication, or the taking over of reviews in opinion-forming organs) has made the practising writer acutely aware of 'tradition', fostering a symptomatic self-reflexivity and an epidemic 'anxiety of influence' (as Harold Bloom has called it). In the twentieth century, writers are more conscious of other writers. Colleges and universities, as they have expanded (particularly after the 1950s in America, and the 1960s in Britain), have brought into existence a large, sophisticated readership—an audience, that is, grounded in literary history and trained in literary criticism. This has fed back into a palpable enrichment of what was disdained, half a century earlier, as the 'middlebrow' public. This Companion recognizes the cultural power of the academy in the twentieth century by the inclusion of influential literary critics (Edward Said, for instance) and entries on such institutions as the MLA.

How then should The Oxford Companion to Twentieth-Century Literature in English be used? Self-evidently the volume will be invaluable for the practical educational tasks of curriculum formation and anthology-making. Students will find it a ready source of literary reference. It will be an attractive repository of fact for those who wish to discover new things and for those who wish to check what they already know—or think they know. Not least, the Companion may be browsed in for that peculiar pleasure which is to be had from the contemplation of order imposed on an unimaginably complex and diverse field of human activity.

Aaron's Rod, a novel by D. H. *Lawrence, published in 1922. Aaron Sisson, a checkweighman in a Nottinghamshire colliery, and amateur piccolo player, suddenly leaves his wife and children on Christmas Eve immediately after the First World War. He goes to London, where he joins the Covent Garden orchestra and becomes involved with a smart set of bohemian people, led by Jim Bricknell, a man obsessed with the importance of filling himself with food and love. Aaron encounters the writer Rawdon Lilly and his Norwegian wife, Tanny. When Aaron becomes ill in body and soul, Lilly nurses him and the two become intimate friends. Though they quarrel, particularly over the war, Lilly exercises a powerful influence over Aaron; after an emotional visit to his abandoned wife in the Midlands, Aaron follows Lilly to Italy. There, an unfulfilling affair with an American-born marchesa, and the shattering of his flute in an anarchist bomb attack, lead Aaron to despair. Lilly urges him to yield to the 'deep power-soul' and unfold his own destiny. Loosely episodic in form, the novel contains some of Lawrence's most passionate writing about the First World War and reveals the sense of release that Italy provided him. The title of the book refers to the biblical Aaron, the brother of Moses and founder of the priesthood, whose blossoming Rod is a symbol of miraculous authority.

ABBENSETTS, Michael (1938–), Guyanese playwright, born in British Guyana, educated there and in Quebec and Montreal. His plays offer a view of black immigrant life in Britain and present difficult situations within a broad tradition of comedy. The humour arises primarily from incongruity, though there are fine instances of verbal felicity and wit. He established his reputation with his play Sweet Talk in 1973, and in 1974 became dramatist-in-residence at the Royal Court Theatre, London. His other stage plays include Alterations (1978), Samba (1980), In the Mood (1981), Outlaw (1983), and El Dorado (1984). Among his many radio plays are Home Again (1975), The Sunny Side of the Street (1977), Brothers of the Sword (1978), The Fast Lane (1980), and The Dark Horse (1981), but he has reached his widest audience with his television plays, such as The Museum Attendant (1973), Inner City Blues (1975), Crime and Passion (1976), Black Christmas (1977), Roadrunner (1977), Empire Road (1977; a series), and Easy Money (1982).

Abbey Theatre, The, the home of the Irish National Theatre Society, named after Abbey Street in Dublin, where its permanent theatre was established in 1904. Following discussions between W. B. *Yeats, Lady Augusta *Gregory, and Edward *Martyn, the Irish Literary Theatre was founded and staged its first productions of Yeats's The Countess Cathleen and Martyn's The Heather Field in 1899. In 1901 Yeats's disagreements with Martyn led him to join with the actors Frank and William Fay to form the Irish National Dramatic Society, which produced his Cathleen Ni Houlihan* and The Pot of Broth in 1902. The Irish Literary Theatre and the Irish National Dramatic Society subsequently amalgamated to become the Irish National Theatre Society, which staged J. M. Synge's Riders to the Sea* in 1904. In that year Miss Annie F. Horniman provided the company with funding to purchase and equip the theatre in Abbey Street. On its opening night in 1904, the Abbey Theatre presented Yeats's On Baile's Strand, Cathleen Ni Houlihan, and Lady Gregory's Spreading the News. Tensions between those who supported the theatre as a platform for political nationalism and those for whom it was primarily an artistic forum were brought to a head when Synge's *The Playboy of the Western World was produced in 1907. Miss Horniman withdrew her patronage in 1910 when Yeats defied her request to close the theatre for the funeral of Edward VII. George Bernard *Shaw and Padraic *Colum were among the dramatists who consolidated the reputation of the Abbey company, which won acclaim on its early tours of England for the restrained naturalism of its acting style. Sean O'Casey's *The Shadow of a Gunman, Juno and the Paycock, and *The Plough and the Stars were the most successful productions of the 1920s. In 1925 the Irish Government began its subsidy of the Abbey, making it the first theatre in the English-speaking world to receive state support. In 1951 the buildings were destroyed by fire and the company was based in Dublin's Queen's Theatre until 1966, when a new Abbey Theatre was opened on the original site.

ABERCROMBIE, Lascelles (1881–1938), British poet, dramatist, and critic, born in Ashton-under-Mersey, Cheshire, educated at Victoria University, Manchester. Having distinguished himself as a literary journalist, he lectured at the universities of Liverpool and Leeds before becoming Goldsmiths' Reader in English at New College, Oxford. With Wilfrid *Gibson and Walter *de la Mare, he was a recipient of the posthumous royalties produced by Rupert *Brooke's works. Interludes and Poems (1908) was his first collection of verse; numerous succeeding volumes include Emblems of Love (1912) and the posthumous Lyrics and Unfinished Poems (1940). A collected edition of his poetry appeared in 1930. Although capable of a straightforwardly individual tone and of imaginatively powerful metaphorical effects, he remained stylistically constrained by the conventions of Victorian verse. A leading contributor to Edward Marsh's Georgian Poetry* anthologies, his criticism tended to espouse the qualities associated with Georgian poetry. Much of his most original poetry is contained in his verse-dramas, for which he was held in high regard; his works in the genre include The End of the World (1915) and The Sale of St Thomas (1931). Among his critical works are Thomas Hardy (1912), The Idea of Great Poetry (1925), and Principles of Literary Criticism (1932).

ABISH, Walter (1931–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Vienna; he grew up in China and Israel before settling in the USA. He has worked as a lecturer and teacher in a variety of American colleges and universities since 1975. His work is characterized by an experimentalism and a sense of philosophical enquiry which have led to some claims that he can in some way be separated from the sources and strengths of American writing. His early collection of poems, Duel Site (1970), was followed by several works of fiction including the novels The Alphabetical Africa (1974), In the Future Perfect (1975), How German Is It? (1979), Ninety-Nine: The New Meaning (1990), and Eclipse Fever (1993). In each work different techniques are employed to investigate the connections and spaces between reality and language, and to develop insights into both American and non-American cultures from his double position of insider and outsider. His works have also been published widely in anthologies, and in magazines such as the Partisan Review*, Transatlantic Review*, New York Arts Journal, and Paris Review*. A collection of fiction entitled Destiny: Tomorrow's Truth appeared in 1992.

ABRAHAMS, Peter (1919–), South African novelist and journalist, born in Vredetorp, Johannesburg, and largely self-taught. His first work, a collection of short stories, Dark Testament (1942), appeared after he settled in London in 1941. Several novels about life in South Africa's ghettoes followed, including Song of the City (1945), Mine Boy (1946), and The Path of Thunder (1948). Though mainly in a naturalistic style, narrative techniques derived from African oral traditions also inform these novels. The pieces collected in Return to Goli (1953) describe his visit to South Africa; they originally appeared in the Observer to which Abrahams contributed regularly. Tell Freedom, his autobiography, appeared in 1954. In 1957 he moved to Jamaica, where he became editor of the West Indian Economist. Later novels go beyond the purely South African context, and are noted for their acute political perceptiveness. These include Wild Conquest (1950), a historical novel about tensions among the Barolong, Boers, and Matabele; A Wreath for Udomo (1956), which prophetically highlighted some of the problems facing post-independence African states, and focuses on the tragic dilemmas of a charismatic ruler, said to be modelled on Nkrumah of Ghana; This Island Now (1966), set in the Caribbean, and further exploring the hard choices of a post-independence leader; and The View from Coyaba (1985), a historical novel about the struggles for liberation among African slaves and their descendants. See Kolawole Ongungbesan, The Writing of Peter Abrahams (1979).

Absalom, Absalom!, a novel by William *Faulkner, published in 1936. The story, which centres on the rise and fall of Thomas Sutpen, begins in 1833 when Sutpen arrives in Jefferson, Mississippi, having left his home state of West Virginia and settled in Haiti where he married a planter's daughter, Eulalia Bon. By Eulalia he had a son, Charles Bon, but on his discovering Eulalia's black ancestry both she and the son were abandoned. Sutpen begins to establish himself in Jefferson, acquires an estate, builds a mansion (designed by a French architect), marries the daughter of a respectable Southern family, by whom he has two children, Judith and Henry, and is made a Colonel in Jefferson's regiment during the Civil War. He returns from the war to find his plantation in ruins and to discover that Charles Bon has been murdered by his half-brother, Henry, who has sought to prevent the miscegenation that would ensue were Charles to marry Judith, as had been his intention. Henry disappears and Sutpen, who still seeks an heir, seduces Milly Jones, the granddaughter of Wash Jones, a squatter on his land. Milly bears him a daughter, but not a son, and when Sutpen disowns both Milly and his illegitimate daughter Wash Jones murders him. Sutpen's estate is left to Clytie (Clytemnestra), his daughter by a mulatto slave, and it is she who, at the end of the novel, sets fire to Sutpen's house, killing both herself and Sutpen's son Henry and thus bringing the tragedy to its end; all that remains of the Sutpen dynasty is Jim Bond, an idiot, Sutpen's only living descendant, howling in the ashes of the burned house.

The story is possibly the most melodramatic in all of Faulkner's fiction but the interest of the novel lies very much in the intricate manner in which it is told. It is constructed through the accounts of three narrators: Miss Rosa Coldfield, Sutpen's sister-in-law, tells the story to Quentin Compson, a character from an earlier Faulkner novel, *The Sound and the Fury (1929), before his departure for Harvard University; Rosa's story is supplemented by information provided by Quentin's father, Jason Compson III; and Quentin, in turn, tells the story to Shrevelin McCannon, his Canadian room-mate at Harvard. There is no reliable narrator and the reader has to piece the narrative together from incomplete and subjective accounts of Sutpen's rise and fall. The novel has been considered the most 'Conradian' of Faulkner's major works, the resemblances in fictional technique to Conrad's novel Chance (1914) being particularly striking. See Faulkner's 'Absalom, Absalom!': A Critical Casebook (1984), edited by Elizabeth Muhlenfeld.

ABSE, Dannie (1923–), British poet, born of a Welsh-Jewish family in Cardiff, where he attended the Welsh National School of Medicine before studying in London at King's College and Westminster Hospital. He qualified as a doctor in 1950. After Every Green Thing (1948) was the first of his principal collections of poetry, which also include Tenants of the House (1957), Funland and Other Poems (1973), Ask the Bloody Horse (1986), Remembrance of Crimes Past (1990), and On the Evening Road (1994). His poetry's accessibly discursive tone accommodates a wide range of emotional and imaginative intensities; compassion and a wryly anecdotal humour combine to unusual and sometimes highly disquieting effect in the best of his work. White Coat, Purple Coat: Collected Poems 1948–1988 appeared in 1989, His novels include Ash on a Young Man's Sleeve (1954) and O. Jones, O. Jones (1970), both of which draw on his experiences as a student. He has also published several autobiographical works including A Poet in the Family (1974), A Strong Dose of Myself (1983), There was a Young Man from Cardiff (1991), and Intermittent Journals (1994). The best-known of his numerous plays are collected in The View from Row C (1990). Among his other writings is Medicine on Trial (1968), an evaluation of modern medical practices.

Absurd, Theatre of the, was a term pioneered by the British critic Martin Esslin and used to characterize the work of certain key playwrights in the 1950s and 1960s. Though its roots may be traced back as far as Jarry's Ubu Roi in 1896, and perhaps to Strindberg's expressionist work, its more immediate inspiration was Camus's essay The Myth of Sisyphus, published during the Second World War, in 1942. This disseminated the idea, soon given greater credibility by Hiroshima and the discovery of the scope of the Holocaust, that man was a stranger in an irrational universe, deprived of 'illusions and light', bereft of purpose, and hence subject to a metaphysical and moral anguish, or 'feeling of Absurdity'. The key attempt to give dramatic definition to this state of mind was Beckett's Waiting for Godot*, in which two exemplary derelicts wait helplessly for a salvation that seems highly unlikely ever to materialize; but important contributions, usually emphasizing the irrationality of the world and the illogic of human behaviour, and often harshly comic in tone, also came from Ionesco, Adamov, Vian, Arrabal, and other dramatists, as well as Beckett himself in subsequent years. Attempts were made to claim the lightweight N. F. *Simpson and the weightier Harold *Pinter of The Birthday Party and The Dumb Waiter for the Theatre of the Absurd; but it was always more a European than a British phenomenon.

Absurd Person Singular, a play by Alan *Ayckbourn, first performed in 1972; it well exemplifies its author's technical adventurousness and the moral seriousness he brings to comedy. Each of the three acts is set in a different kitchen on a consecutive Christmas Eve, and each charts the changing circumstances of three couples: the lower middle-class Sidney Hopcroft, who moves from insecurity to assurance with his growing business success, and his wife Jane; the adulterous architect Geoffrey, whose reputation collapses along with one of his buildings, and Eva, who is transformed by his failure from an anguished neurotic to the dominant figure in their marriage; and Ronald, the manager of the local bank, and Marion, whose upper middle-class arrogance is subverted by worsening alcoholism. The play ends with a graphic reminder of the social mobility that has been its main theme, a frantic party in which the educated professionals literally dance to the nouveau riche Sidney's tune; but the most critically admired act is the second, which somehow succeeds in finding a not unsympathetic humour in Eva's attempts to poison, hang, gas, knife, and defenestrate herself.

ACHEBE, (Albert) Chinua(lumogu) (1930–), Nigerian novelist, poet, and critic, born in Ogidi, Eastern Nigeria, educated at the University College of Ibadan. Before the Nigerian Civil War (1967–70), Achebe worked as a broadcaster. Among other academic appointments, he was Professor of English at the University of Massachusetts, and Emeritus Professor of Literature at the University of Nigeria (Nsukka). His first novel, Things Fall Apart (1958), is one of the most famous African novels in English, and has been translated into many languages. It imaginatively recreates traditional life in Igbo villages before the onset of modernity, and focuses on the headstrong Okonkwo who opposes, with tragic consequences, both converted Christians and British colonial interference. As in much of Achebe's work, the novel subtly interweaves traditional story-telling and modern narrative. Moving from tragedy to satiric irony, No Longer at Ease (1960) follows the fate of Okonkwo's grandson, Obi, who obtains a loan from his village to be educated in England. The novel examines the pressures leading to white-collar corruption in Nigeria. Arrow of God (1964), set in the 1920s, focuses on Ezeulu, the chief priest of an Igbo village, and his conflict with his Western-educated son, who has become a Christian convert. These three novels were published as The African Trilogy in 1988. A Man of the People (1966), a bitter satire about a demagogic politician, was so prophetic about the imminence of domestic military intervention in an independent Nigeria that only two days after its first publication the country suffered its first military coup. As a literary and cultural critic, Achebe has consistently argued that the African novel must deal with social realities, and avoid a spurious universality, as advocated by 'colonialist critics'. In 1969 Achebe undertook an American speaking tour, together with Gabriel *Okara and Cyprian *Ekwensi, on behalf of the Biafran cause. Beware Soul Brother (1971, revised 1972; US title Christmas in Biafra and Other Poems, 1973), a collection of poems, and Girls at War and Other Stories (1972) reflect his reactions to the Nigerian Civil War. His essays are collected in Morning Yet on Creation Day (1975) and Hopes and Impediments (1988). Two of his most controversial essays are 'The Novelist as Teacher' and 'An Image of Africa: Racism in Conrad's Heart of Darkness'. Achebe has also written collections of short stories including The Sacrificial Egg (1962), as well as children's books. His novel Anthills of the Savannah (1987) is a coruscating portrayal of power corrupting a ruling clique, most of whose members had been at school together. Internal rivalries, a collective inability to control, and the paranoid tendencies of a Sandhurst-trained military ruler lead to soul-searching on the part, particularly, of Ikem Osidi, poet and newspaper editor, and Chris Oriko, Commissioner for Education, both helped by the emancipated Beatrice Okoh. Achebe is the editor of The Heinemann Book of Contemporary African Short Stories (1992). See C. L. Innes, Chinua Achebe (1990).

ACKER, Kathy (1947–), American dramatist, novelist, and poet, born in New York, educated at the Universities of Brandeis and California. In her narratives, documentary accounts of historical events are juxtaposed with grim imaginings on the modern world. Classic texts are often used to pass comment on literary tradition, and to provide a disquieting context for her bleak visions of late twentieth-century Western society. Blood and Guts in High School (1978), an account of young Janey Smith's trials and tribulations, incorporates dream maps, Persian poems, gritty realism, and fantastical encounters with Jean Genet and President Carter. In Don Quixote (1986) she uses Cervantes together with pastiches of Wedekind and de Sade amongst others, to provide a picaresque structure for a female Quixote's wanderings around the impoverished social and political landscape of post-war America. From her early writings under the pseudonym of 'The Black Tarantula' onwards, graphic descriptions of the sex act have been prominent in her work, reflecting Acker's former employment as a stripper and in porn films. Early short stories are collected in The Adult Life of Toulouse Lautrec (1975) and Kathy Goes to Haiti (1978). Later works include Empire of the Senseless (1988), a female version of Genet's novel Journal du Voleur, and In Memoriam to Identity (1990), a fictional account of the relationship between Rimbaud and Verlaine. Acker has also written poetry, plays, art criticism, screenplays including Variety (1985), and an opera libretto, The Birth of the Poet (1985). Variously described as 'post-punk porn', 'post-modernist', and 'feminist counter-culture', her work has been compared with that of writers such as W. S. *Burroughs and Jean Genet.

ACKERLEY, J(oseph) R(andolph) (1896–1967), British novelist, memoirist, and belletrist, born in London, educated at Cambridge University. As literary editor of *The Listener (1935–59), he commissioned work from writers such as E. M. *Forster and Christopher *Isherwood. Hindoo Holiday (1932) describes his experiences as private secretary to an Indian Maharajah. Ackerley shows a determination to accept vagaries of human behaviour, a refusal to judge by conventional standards. His apparently light style conceals sharpness of insight. My Dog Tulip (1956) and the successful novel We Think the World of You (1960) are born of his intense love for his Alsatian bitch, Queenie; the novel also conveys delicately but surely homosexual entanglement, even if the terms in which it does so belong to an era of proscription. The memoir My Father and Myself (1968) tells of Ackerley's discovery of his father's extraordinary double life (he had another family which he concealed from Ackerley's mother). It also delineates in a remarkably candid manner Ackerley's own homosexual life.

ACKLAND, Rodney (1908–90), British dramatist, born in Westcliffe-on-Sea, educated at Balham Grammar School and the Central School of Speech Training and Dramatic Art. He worked as an actor while developing his craft as a playwright. His work includes adaptations, notably of Hugh Walpole's The Old Ladies (1935) and Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment (1947), as well as Strange Orchestra (1931), Birthday (1934), Before the Party (1949), A Dead Secret (1957), and other original pieces. His best-known and most frequently revived play, remains The Dark River (1938), which primarily involves the contrasting reactions of a cross-section of people—some frivolous and nostalgically concerned with the past, others rather more responsibly concerned with the present and the future—to the Spanish Civil War and the dangers posed by fascism. Because of its careful portraiture of individuals cut off in the English countryside, along with its sense that traditional ways of life are threatened and perhaps doomed, it has been compared, albeit generously, with the work of Chekhov. Ackland also wrote numerous film scripts, collaborating with Terence *Rattigan on Uncensored and Bond Street, and published an autobiography, The Celluloid Mistress (1954).

ACKROYD, Peter (1949–), British novelist, poet, biographer, and literary critic, born in London, educated at Clare College, Cambridge, and Yale. London is a touchstone as much as a setting for many of his works. With Notes for a New Culture: An Essay on Modernism (1976), Ackroyd announced his impatience with contemporary English culture and the tradition of realistic fiction. He launched into literary fiction with The Great Fire of London (1982), in which a film director attempts to recreate Little Dorrit in the abandoned wing of a modern prison. The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde (1983; Somerset Maugham Award), a fictional memoir told in Wilde's own extravagant voice, is a brilliant parody. Hawksmoor* (1985; Whitbread Prize) is an astonishing feat of erudite invention. Chatterton (1987) features a young would-be poet and an eccentric older novelist persuaded that Thomas Chatterton may have faked his own suicide in 1770 to live on as a great plagiarist. Contributions in Chatterton's 'own' voice offer an alternative theory, while further chapters depict Henry Wallis, halfway between Chatterton's time and our own, painting his famous 'Death of Chatterton' with George Meredith as his model. First Light (1989) again displayed Ackroyd's gift for evoking the magic of other arts, in this case both archaeology and astronomy. English Music (1992), narrated by Timothy Harcombe, the son of a spiritualist healer practising in London during the 1920s, moves back and forth in time, portraying significant moments in English history through a series of visionary sequences. The past is similarly invoked in The House of Doctor Dee (1993) when its narrator, Matthew Palmer, inherits a house in Clerkenwell, formerly inhabited by the Elizabethan magus, John Dee, and is drawn into bizarre negotiations with his dead father. Dan Leno and the Limehouse Golem (1994), set in Victorian London, is inscribed with the author's characteristic blend of Dickensian pastiche and contemporary knowingness, and concerns a series of gruesome East End murders, thought to have been committed by a monster from Jewish folklore—the 'Golem' of the title. Amongst those also suspected of the murders, which foreshadow those of Jack the Ripper, are figures as diverse as Karl Marx, George Gissing, and the music hall comedian, Dan Leno. In this, as in his earlier work, Ackroyd mixes fact and fiction, past and present, with apparent indifference to verisimilitude; the result, as ever, is surprisingly plausible. His works of non-fiction include collections of poetry, notably The Diversions of Purley (1987), and Dressing Up (1979), a study of transvestism and drag. Ackroyd has received wide critical acclaim for his biographies of Ezra *Pound (1981), Charles Dickens (1990) and Blake (1995). His T. S. Eliot (1984; Whitbread Prize) greatly contributed to the understanding and desanctification of that monumental figure.

ACOSTA, Oscar (Zeta) (1935–74?), Chicano writer, born in El Paso, Texas. Acosta was a controversial figure whose narratives focused on ethnicity and the cultural history of the Chicano people. Also a lawyer, he was lead attorney for the defence of some of the Chicano movement members whose exploits are detailed in his work. He was a friend of Hunter S. *Thompson and provided the basis for the presentation of his 'sidekick' Dr Gonzo, the attorney, in Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas (1972). The Autobiography of a Brown Buffalo (1972), his best-known work, is a fictional autobiography describing his transformation from an alienated Chicano poverty lawyer into a major figure in the Chicano movement in Los Angeles; The Revolt of the Cockroach People (1973) follows his exploits as he activates the Chicano, and continues to develop his cultural identity. Acosta disappeared in May 1974, when writing a journalistic piece on cocaine smuggling from Mexico into the USA. He was last heard from when he placed a telephone call from Mazatlan, Sinaloa, to his son, Marco. See LATINO/LATINA LITERATURE IN ENGLISH.

ACTON, Sir Harold (Mario Mitchell) (1904–94), British art historian, poet, and aesthete, born in Florence, educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. His early volume of poems Aquarium (1923), which appeared while he was at Oxford, was followed by further volumes including This Chaos (1930). Acton travelled widely from 1932, in America, Europe, and China. His fascination with China led to the publication of several books on its theatre, culture, and poetry and his novel Peonies and Ponies (1941), set in China. Other works include Prince Isidore (1950), a fantasy; Tit for Tat and other Tales (1972); The Last Medici (1932) and The Bourbons of Naples (1956), both historical studies. Shortly after service in the RAF during the Second World War Acton began writing the work for which he is best known, Memoirs of an Aesthete (1948), his first volume of autobiography which vividly records the first 35 years of his life; More Memoirs appeared in 1970. Acton spent most of his life in his family home, 'La Pietra', in the hilly outskirts of Florence. Evelyn Waugh's character Anthony Blanche (in Brideshead Revisited) is thought to be based on Acton.

Ada or Ardor: A Family Chronicle, a novel by Vladimir *Nabokov, published in 1969. Nabokov's longest and perhaps most ambitious novel, Ada is, in part, his homage to the nineteenth-century Russian novel, notably Tolstoy's Anna Karenina which it most obviously, and parodically, echoes. Though it has an ostensibly historical setting, the novel marks the beginning of Nabokov's 'flirtation' with the resources of *science fiction: the Antiterra of Ada is an 'alternative world' that re-imagines pre-revolutionary Russia without invoking precise historical analogies. Ada has been seen as Nabokov's Finnegans Wake* for its multicultural, multilingual allusiveness. Brian Boyd has written a full-length study, Nabokov's 'Ada': The Place of Consciousness (1985).

Adam International Review, a literary quarterly published in London since 1941. (Adam is an acronym for 'Arts, Drama, Architecture, Music'.) The editor, Miron Grindea (1909–), originally from Romania, settled in England in September 1939. Grindea conceived of his journal as a showcase for the best British and European writing, with occasional forays into the literature of other continents. Its contributors, writing both in English and in French, included Anthony *Powell, Max *Beerbohm, W. H. *Auden, H. G. *Wells, Thomas Mann, André Gide, and François Mauriac, sometimes featuring drawings by artists like Picasso and Chagall. Early numbers featured T. S. *Eliot's 'Reflections on the Unity of European Culture' (1946) and 'The Aims of Poetic Drama' (1949), as well as Winston *Churchill on Bernard *Shaw. Others included issues on Proust (with valuable contributions by his biographer, George *Painter), Balzac, Tolstoy, Strindberg, Dylan *Thomas, Evelyn *Waugh, Graham *Greene, and Joyce *Cary. The 300th issue (1965), published in book form as Adam 300 (1966), contained two hitherto unknown short stories by Chekhov, forty-six letters by Katherine *Mansfield, an unpublished essay by James *Joyce on Defoe, and sketches by Modigliani. The London Library (1978) was another issue published in book form. Adam is also distinguished by Grindea's lengthy and often provocative editorials. With Stephen *Spender, Benjamin Britten, and Henry Moore he founded, in 1943, the International Arts Guild.

ADAMS, Andy (1859–1935), American novelist, born in Whitley County, Indiana. Adams gained his knowledge of the world 'from the hurricane deck of a Texas horse'; his deep familiarity with the world of the cowboy and cattleman made him one of the few writers of cowboy fiction to have achieved real literary merit. He became a cowboy in Texas, then settled in Colorado from where he wrote The Log of a Cowboy (1903), an account of the cowboy's life structured around a cattle drive from the Rio Grande to Montana; it is narrated by the cowhand Tom Quirk, who reappears in The Matchmaker (1904) and in The Outlet (1905), a more complex work giving detailed depictions of the socio-political dimensions of the cattle drive. Cattle Brands (1906) is a collection of stories about frontier life in the late nineteenth century; Reed Anthony, Cowman: An Autobiography (1907) is the story of a Confederate army veteran who becomes an influential Texas cattle rancher.

ADAMS, Douglas (Noel) (1952–), British novelist and scriptwriter, born in Cambridge, educated at St John's College, Cambridge. He is best known for The Hitch-Hiker's Guide to the Galaxy (1979) and its sequels, The Restaurant at the End of the Universe (1980), Life, the Universe, and Everything (1982), So Long, and Thanks for All the Fish (1984), and Mostly Harmless (1992), all of which originated in a 1978 BBC radio series later transferred to television. In these novels, two characters (the human Arthur Dent, and the humanoid alien Ford Prefect, author of the actual Guide) travel through space after Earth has been demolished to make way for an interstellar bypass. Their adventures hitch-hiking across the galaxy are picaresque, involving a series of bizarre encounters with alien life-forms, including a super-intelligent species of white mice intent on discovering, with the aid of the vast, organic computer which is the Earth, the meaning of 'life, the universe and everything'. Written in a comic idiom, their adventures parody *science fiction conventions, while subtly extolling the allures of *space opera. A later series of metaphysical detective novels includes Dirk Gently's Holistic Detective Agency (1987) and The Long Dark Tea-Time of the Soul (1988).

ADAMS, Henry (Brooks) (1838–1918), American historian and man of letters, born in Boston, educated at Harvard. Adams was the grandson of President John Quincy Adams and the great-grandson of President John Adams, and the son of Charles Francis Adams, an ambassador to Britain. He served as his father's secretary in London during the American Civil War. His first published work, on Captain John Smith, appeared in 1867, after which he abandoned any aspirations to political office, and became a writer and teacher of history at Harvard University. Until 1877, he also edited *The North American Review and during this period married Marian Hooper, whose later suicide was to throw him into a profound depression. His first major work was the Life of Albert Gallatin (1879), a biography in which judicious quotation is interspersed with interpretative commentary. A short stay in Washington produced the novels Democracy (1880), a satirical study of Washington politics and which later served as the model for Joan *Didion's novel of the same title, and Esther (1884), an astringent portrait of New York society life whose theme is the conflict of science and religion. Other historical works include John Randolph (1882) and the monumental History of the United States During the Administrations of Thomas Jefferson and James Madison (1889–1891; 9 volumes), which explored the dilemmas of attempting to maintain egalitarian government in a political world whose motivation was to consolidate power. After two visits to Europe, he returned again to Washington where the effects of the contrasting images of the huge dynamo at the 1900 Paris Exposition and the medieval iconography of the Virgin Mary came together to give shape to his historical thought thereafter. In Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres (1904) and *The Education of Henry Adams (1907), this was expressed as a contrast between the unity of thirteenth-century ideas as opposed to the dynamism of modern thinking. His application of theories culled from thermodynamics and the dissipation of energy to the study of human history produced some remarkable insights into the nature of historical progress, not least of which is the belief in entropic tendencies in physics and human matters, which undermines the idea of inevitable progress. This notion is continued in A Letter to American Teachers of History (1910), where Adams makes an ambitious attempt to generalize history in terms of the laws of contemporary science in a series of speculative essays (e.g. 'The Rule of Phase Applied to History').

ADAMS, Richard (1920–), British novelist, born in Berkshire, educated at Oxford University. His hugely popular first novel, Watership Down (1972), a fantasy about a community of rabbits, was enjoyed by both adults and children, and established his curious gift of understanding animals, which are at the centre also of his well-known novels Shardik (1974) and Plague Dogs (1977). Adams employed a variety of human protagonists in The Girl in a Swing (1980), a supernatural thriller, and in Maia (1984), an epic fantasy of love and war. Traveller (1988) is an unusual account of the American Civil War seen through the eyes of Traveller, General E. Lee's horse, and told by Traveller to Tom, a domestic cat in his stables. Adams has confessed to being more interested in telling a good story than in writing 'great literature', and he has found the literary establishment reciprocating with consistent critical disdain. The Day Gone By (1990) is an autobiography.

ADAMSON, Robert (1944–), Australian poet, born in Sydney. As a youth he spent some time in reform schools and in prison. Subsequently he became involved in the development of the 'New Australian Poetry' movement of the 1960s and 1970s becoming editor, in 1970, of the magazine New Poetry which was a platform for the movement's predominantly modernist and experimental outlook. His first collection, Canticles on the Skin (1970), is largely based on his adolescent experiences. The Rumour (1971), whose long title poem is an exploration of the poetic imagination, is experimental in form and was a significant contribution to the new romanticism evolving at that time. The poems in Swamp Riddles (1974) display a powerful response to the natural world and the scenery of the Hawkesbury River area where he lives. In Cross the Border (1977) the influence of Mallarmé and Arthurian legend is evident. Where I Come From (1979) contains poems based on recollections of his early life. Later collections include The Law at Heart's Desire (1983), The Clean Dark (1989), Selected Poems 1970–1989 (1990), and Waving to Hart Crane (1994). His experimental novel Zimmer's Essay (1974; with Bruce Handford) is based on his prison experiences; Words of the State (1992), an autobiographical novella, consists of prose passages, poems, and photographs that evoke his childhood and early life.

Adaptation. There is a sense in which every literary work involves some degree of adaptation. From the classical Greek tragedies, which adapted myths, to their Renaissance equivalents, through to the modernist experimentations of the twentieth century, adaptation seems to be a structural literary device. The Roman writers Terence, Plautus, and Seneca adapted the works of the classical Greek playwrights (mainly Euripides). In turn, they provided much of the source material for the plays of Ben Jonson and William Shakespeare. Each case of adaptation involves a complex set of relationships with the original text, ranging from interpretation and modernization to appropriation and critique. The latter is more dominant in the twentieth century, particularly with the rise of *Modernism during its first few decades. Classical texts were adapted as part of Modernism's critique of the European cultural tradition, notably James *Joyce's Ulysses, or in an attempt to make a statement about contemporary reality, such as Jean Anouilh's Antigone. The relationship between the source text and the adaptation is more complex when it involves a change of genre: this could be from book to opera or, more recently, from book to film. Nineteenth-century novels, in particular, seem to provide good source material for adaptations. Indeed, some scholars believe that the twentieth-century film presents the legacy of the nineteenth-century novel. The rise of cinematic adaptations has given rise to considerable theory in the area.

Adaptation seems to share some of the qualities of the term 'intertextuality' as it was coined by the theorists Mikhail Bakhtin and Julia Kristeva. According to them, intertextuality refers to the way in which a text establishes relationships with other texts, literary or not, diachronic or contemporary, in such a way that it positions itself historically and culturally. In this sense, adaptation can comprise one aspect of the intertextual relationships that a text establishes. In the context of post-modernity where originality and the 'new' are no longer desirable attributes, adaptation acquires new qualities. A play like Heiner Müller's Quartet (1982) no longer presents itself as an adaptation although it is based on the eighteenth-century French novel Dangerous Liaisons by Le Clos. The same source is adapted by Christopher *Hampton into a play of the same title and then transfers to the cinema. Müller's text does not reveal its sources and, in doing so, claims originality for what is essentially an adaptation. In a characteristically post-modern fashion the reworking of a text becomes such an integral part of its composition that it no longer needs to acknowledge its source. In a way this is formally accepting that any mode of writing involves a degree of adaptation, so much so that this need no longer be stated. See also POST-MODERNISM.

ADCOCK, (Kareen) Fleur (1934–), New Zealand poet, born in Papakura, New Zealand; much of her childhood was spent in Britain. Having returned to New Zealand in 1947, she was educated at the Victoria University of Wellington, where she obtained an MA in Classics. After a period lecturing at the University of Otago, Dunedin, she worked as a librarian at the Turnbull Library in Wellington and then at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in London after emigrating to Britain in 1963. In 1979 she became a freelance writer. The Eye of the Hurricane (1964), her first volume of poetry, was published in New Zealand. Her numerous subsequent collections include High Tide in the Garden (1971), The Inner Harbour (1979), The Incident Book (1986), and Time-Zones (1991). A Selected Poems was published in 1983. Her earlier verse centred on themes arising from personal relationships and domestic perceptions, which were often treated with unsettling candour. Since the mid-1970s she has displayed an increasing interest in the possibilities of transposing her experience into fictive narratives; 'The Ex-Queen among the Astronomers' is a memorable example of her success in this mode, its opulent imagery woven into stanzas indicating her considerable skills in versification. A similar level of accomplishment is evident in The Virgin and the Nightingale (1983), her elegant and often wittily erotic versions of medieval Latin poetry. Her other publications include Orient Express (1989), which contains her translations from the work of the Romanian poet Grete Tartler. Adcock has edited various works, which include The Faber Book of Twentieth Century Women's Poetry (1987) and the Oxford Book of Contemporary New Zealand Poetry (1983).

ADE, George (1866–1944), American humourist, journalist, librettist, and dramatist, born in Kentland, Indiana. Ade was a master of the contemporary vernacular language, especially the slang of the youth of his time; his Fables in Slang (1899) were seen as informed examples of the language of the common American. His first play, The Night of the Fourth (1901), was a failure but he achieved success with the libretto for The Sultan of Sulu (1902), and his libretto for Peggy from Paris (1903) confirmed his acceptance in the popular theatre. Success continued with the comedies The County Chairman (1903) and The College Widow (1904), which was made into the highly successful musical comedy Leave It to Jane (1917), with music by Jerome Kern and lyrics by P. G. *Wodehouse. Ade had further success with genial satires on student life, notably Just Out of College (1905) and Father and the Boys (1908), and with his librettos for the Fair Co-ed (1909) and The Old Town (1910).

Adelphi, The, a literary periodical founded in 1923 by John Middleton *Murry, who edited it until 1930 and remained influential in determining its character until 1948. Murry's intentions centred on providing a platform for the ideas of D. H. *Lawrence, who contributed nineteen pieces, and himself; he also saw the magazine as a medium for the posthumous publication of the work of Katherine *Mansfield, his wife, who died in the year of its formation. By 1925 financial difficulties became apparent and after a successful appeal for readers' support it was reconstituted as The New Adelphi in 1927. Contributors under Murry's editorship included Robert *Graves, Edmund *Blunden, Edwin *Muir, and W. B. *Yeats. Lawrence, who had belittled Murry's efforts, was not featured in The New Adelphi, although the last issue Murry edited was devoted to commemorating Lawrence's achievement following his death in 1930. In that year the magazine was taken over by Max Plowman and Richard Rees and reverted to the title The Adelphi. Dorothy *Richardson, Herbert *Read, George *Saintsbury, and William *Plomer were among its essayists and reviewers, and poetry by W. H. *Auden, A. S. J. *Tessimond, C. *Day Lewis, and Michael *Roberts was published. During the 1930s contributions from Edmund *Wilson, Theodore *Roethke, James *Thurber, and others added an American dimension. It continued to publish work by emerging authors until it ceased appearing in 1955; Vernon *Scannell, Donald *Davie, Denton *Welch, James *Kirkup, and Charles *Causley are among the writers whose reputations The Adelphi helped to establish in its later years.

Admirable Crichton, The, a play by James *Barrie, first performed in 1902. A prominent peer, Lord Loam, his daughters, and others are shipwrecked on a desert island, where English social divisions quickly prove themselves irrelevant. The butler, Crichton, takes command, Loam becomes a 'jolly-looking labouring man', and others find the level their abilities decree. But just as Loam's eldest daughter, Lady Mary, has gratefully accepted Crichton's proposal of marriage, rescuers appear to take the group back home, where the traditional relationships reassert themselves. 'You are the best man among us', Lady Mary tells Crichton. 'On an island, my lady perhaps; but in England, no', he replies, provoking the riposte, 'then there is something wrong with England'. Barrie's view, too, would seem to be that status and talent are often at odds in class-bound Britain; and, though the tone of the play is gentle and humorous, it may be seen as an example of the socially aware drama which, thanks to the efforts of *Shaw, *Granville-Barker, *Galsworthy, and others, was to become increasingly evident in the Edwardian period.

ADNAN, Etel (1925–), poet and writer, born in Beirut to a Muslim Arab father and a Greek mother, educated at the Sorbonne in Paris, and at Berkeley and Harvard in the USA. Though much of her early work was in French, Adnan has, since the early 1980s, written exclusively in English in a variety of genres. Her poetry, collected in volumes such as The Indian Never Had a Horse (1982), The Arab Apocalypse (1989), and The Spring Flowers Own and the Manifestation of the Voyage (1990), covers a range of themes from the natural world to current affairs, but is always marked by autobiographical motifs: expatriation, the Lebanese civil war, the love of women, loss of language, and the confusion of today's world with its shifting boundaries. Two works of prose, the narrative Paris, When It's Naked (1993) and Of Cities and Women (Letters to Fawwaz) (1993), complement each other and the author's poetry, looking at the century's end with unjaundiced but optimistic eyes. Adnan's acclaimed novel of one woman's fatal struggles with the Lebanese war, Sitt Marie Rose (1978), was translated into English in 1982, and is widely considered a feminist classic.

Adventures of Augie March, The, a novel by Saul *Bellow, published in 1953. A retrospectively narrated autobiography, this picaresque novel charts the life of Augie March, a Chicago Jew, through early childhood to his post-war maturity as a black marketeer in Europe. The opening line, 'I am an American, Chicago born—Chicago, that somber city—and go at things as I have taught myself, free-style, and will make the record in my own way . . .', establishes the novel as a quest for identity. Along the way, Augie March experiences grief, loss, and betrayal, as he outgrows his family (although he remains strongly attached to his mother, Grandma Lausch, and his retarded brother George), the Depression, and Chicago. He goes through a variety of jobs and adventures, from being a 'man at arms' for the crooked businessman William Einhorn then the salesman protégé of Mrs Renling, before meeting the 'upper-class' Thea Fenchel. Escaping this net of wealth for a time, he gets involved in crime with Joe Gorman, and then steals books in order to attend the University of Chicago. After a series of affairs, Augie meets Thea again and they pass through exploits in Mexico, before Augie finally ends up in Europe married to an actress. Moving through different milieux, the novel has a broad linguistic scope, ranging from the language of the Jewish immigrants to the intercourse of University of Chicago intellectuals. Augie's search for his personal integrity is constantly tested through various symbolic encounters, and the novel's conclusion appears to be merely a temporary resolution of stability.

AGARD, John (1949–), Guyanese poet, born in British Guiana; he came to England in 1977, where he has worked as a Touring Lecturer for the Commonwealth Institute in London. His poems, often expressed in vernacular and dialect, are written primarily for performance. He is at his best when amusingly satirical. Poems like 'Listen Mr Oxford Don' and 'English Girl Eats Her First Mango', for instance, challenge preconceptions about Caribbean culture. Mangoes & Bullets (1985) includes new poems as well as those from such earlier collections as Shoot Me with Flowers (1973), Man to Pan (1982), Limbo Dancer in Dark Glasses (1983), and Palm Tree King (1983). Later books include Lovelines for a Goat-Born Lady (1990) and numerous books for children, including Laughter Is an Egg (1990) and Grandfather's Old Bruk-a-Down Car (1994). He is also the editor of Life Doesn't Frighten Me at All (1989). See also DUB POETRY.

AGATE, James (1877–1947), British dramatic critic, born in Pendleton, Lancashire, the son of a cotton manufacturer's agent, and educated at Manchester Grammar School. He went into his father's business, and was still working there when, in 1907, he joined the Manchester Guardian's team of reviewers. His first book of essays on the theatre, Buzz, Buzz!, was published in 1918, while he was serving as a captain in the Army Service Corps. After the war, he became theatre critic of the Saturday Review, moving to The Sunday Times in the same capacity in 1923, and remaining there until his death. He was dramatic critic for the BBC from 1925 to 1932; he also wrote novels, and from 1935 onward published his diaries annually under the title of Ego. Like Hazlitt, his model, he was most acute when it came to writing about the performers of his day and comparing them to the great actors and actresses of the past; but he also responded enthusiastically to *O'Casey and to Chekhov, whose still unfamiliar Cherry Orchard he described in 1925 as 'one of the great plays of the world'.

Age of Anxiety, The, a long poem by W. H. *Auden, published in 1947. Almost entirely in alliterative verse, its six parts are set in wartime New York. Malin, Quant, Emble, and Rosetta, the protagonists, respectively represent thought, intuition, sensation, and feeling, the Jungian psychic faculties, which Auden designates explicitly in For the Time Being (1944). As an allegory of the reintegration of the fragmented self, the narrative brings the four, each of whom is drinking alone at the start, into close community. After their philosophical discourse on the human condition in the 'The Seven Ages', the second section, they undertake the revelatory dream-journey of 'The Seven Stages'; this substantial passage forms Auden's most concentrated use of topographical imagery in its elaborately structured landscapes, which sustain symbolic correspondences with the human body. Sections four and five, 'The Dirge' and 'The Masque', unite the four in Rosetta's flat, where the euphoric mood established yields to disillusioned confrontations with reality after they have disbanded. The unconditional acceptance of the Christian existential imperatives in Malin's final speech in 'The Epilogue' provisionally concludes the religious, ethical, and epistemological questings that dominate Auden's poetry of the early 1940s. The theologian Paul Tillich valued the poem highly as a reflection of the spiritual and psychological conditions of its time; Marianne *Moore noted its 'mechanics of consummate virtuosity', indicating the fluency and ingenuity with which its complex patterns of significance imaginatively cohere.

Age of Innocence, The, a novel by Edith *Wharton, published in 1920. It won the first Pulitzer Prize to be awarded to a woman and was dramatized in 1928 by Margaret Ayer Barnes. The young lawyer Newland Archer is about to announce his engagement to May Welland, a beautiful girl from a high society New York family of the 1870s. Although he loves her, he perceives her innocence as artificial. Before their marriage, Countess Ellen Olenska, May's cousin, arrives from Europe after a failed marriage to a debauched Polish count. Owing to social taboo, Ellen has not divorced him, and is shunned by her friends. However, May encourages Newland's support of Ellen, and through his friendship with her he discovers that she possesses the qualities that he sought but did not find in May. Despite his love for Ellen, Newland is forced into a convention-bound marriage to May. Upon learning of May's pregnancy, Ellen returns to Europe. After May's death, Newland visits Paris with his son, Dallas, but whilst now free to marry Ellen, prefers to retain her 'as the composite vision of all that he had missed'.

AGEE, James (1909–55), American novelist, poet, film critic, and screenwriter, born in Knoxville, Tennessee, educated at Harvard. His early collection Permit Me Voyage (1934) was the only volume of poems to be published in his lifetime. In conjunction with the photographer Walker Evans, he produced Let Us Now Praise Famous Men (1941), a moving account of the plight of Southern sharecroppers during the Depression, which departed from the usual objective reporting for a more subjective, impressionistic style. His best-known fictional works are The Morning Watch (1951), dealing with religious piety in a boys' school in Tennessee; and the semi-autobiographical *A Death in the Family (1957; Pulitzer Prize). He was a journalist for Fortune and Time, 1932–48, and a film reviewer and critic for Nation and other journals; collections of his writings on film were later published as Agee on Film (1958) and Agee on Film II (1960). After 1948 he worked mostly as a screenwriter and produced the screenplays for The Quiet One (1949), John Huston's The African Queen (1951), The Bride Comes to Yellow Sky (1953), and Charles Laughton's The Night of the Hunter (1955), amongst others. His early friendship with an Episcopalian minister, Father Flye, is recorded in Letters from James Agee to Father Flye (1962). The Collected Poems of James Agee, edited by Robert Fitzgerald, appeared in 1968.

Agenda, a quarterly journal devoted to poetry and criticism, founded in 1959 by William Cookson. Ezra *Pound, with whom Cookson had corresponded since 1955, was the éminence grise behind the magazine and its stated policy of 'communication between isolated outposts' of poetic activity; its interest in foreign poetry was also made clear and early editions featured translations of work by poets from various parts of Europe and elsewhere. Cookson's belief that 'our poetry is to be revitalized . . . by a study of modern American poetry' was reflected in the attention given to American verse; Pound, W. C. *Williams, Louis *Zukofsky, Robert *Lowell, and Theodore *Roethke are among the American poets whose work has been featured and to whom the magazine has devoted special issues. British authors in whom particular interest has been taken include Basil *Bunting, David *Jones, Hugh *MacDiarmid, and Geoffrey *Hill. Special issues have also been produced on particular aspects of poetic technique, notably the 'Rhythm Issue' for Autumn/Winter 1972/3; this took the form of a symposium with W. H. *Auden, Donald *Davie, Thom *Gunn, George *MacBeth, and Charles *Tomlinson among the participants. In 1971 Peter *Dale became Cookson's associate editor; their occasional divergences of opinion have added vigour and balance to the journal, which remains one of the foremost in its field.

Agrarians, The, a name given to specific Southern US poets and writers who espoused an ideology that championed regionalism and an agrarian economy for the South in the late 1920s and early 1930s. This group published The Fugitive (1922–5), a bi-monthly magazine based in Nashville, Tennessee, which combined poetry and criticism attacking the 'high-caste Brahmins of the Old South', in the phrase of the editorial. Perceiving themselves to have been invaded by Northern capitalist monopolies, their critique was aimed at what they took to be the cultural provincialism and fast-growing materialism of the region. Most of the contributors were associated with Vanderbilt University, among them Donald *Davidson, Cleanth *Brooks, Andrew *Lytle, Merrill *Moore, John Crowe *Ransom, Laura *Riding, Allen *Tate, and Robert Penn *Warren, and what came to be known as the 'Southern Literary Renaissance' sprang from the work centred on this group. The magazine was also a mouthpiece for the ideology, theory, and techniques of *New Criticism, a form of critical analysis which focused on the elements of the isolated literary work as they illuminate the whole. It characterized itself as upholding, in the poetic and aesthetic realm, the sensuous integrity of human experience which was being demolished by the activities of scientific rationalism.

AI, pseudonym of Florence ANTHONY (1947–), American poet, born in Tucson, Arizona, of mixed Japanese, Choctaw, African-American, and Irish ancestry, raised in Las Vegas and San Francisco, and educated at the University of Arizona where she immersed herself in Buddhism. Her eclectic and peaceable upbringing makes a striking contrast to the world of her first collection of poems, Cruelty (1973), soliloquies which speak from, and to, sexual violence, abortion, hanging, the conflicting energies of lust, suicide, and child-beating. AI's style of poetic utterance has rarely been other than tough-edged. In Killing Floor (1979), the poem 'The Kid' assumes the voice of a boy-murderer who methodically and pathologically destroys his entire family only to emerge sweet-faced and apparently undisturbed. Sin (1986) attempts a yet more complex series of personae—ruminations, for the most part, of men of power, from the Kennedy brothers to Joe McCarthy to Robert Oppenheimer, although in 'The Good Shepherd: Atlanta 1981' the speaker, chillingly, is the anonymous mass-murderer of Atlanta's black youth. Fate: New Poems (1991) offers a gallery of characters, notably General George Custer, Mary Jo Kopechne, Elvis Presley, Lenny Bruce, and Lyndon Johnson.

AICKMAN, Robert (1914–81), British writer, born and educated in London. He played an important part in the founding of the Inland Waterways Association after the Second World War. From the publication of We Are for the Dark (1951; with Elizabeth Jane *Howard), he became increasingly recognized as a fine exponent of the ghost story. On his title pages, Aickman described his work as 'strange stories'. His collections include Dark Entries (1964), Powers of Darkness (1966), Sub Rosa (1968), Cold Hand in Mine (1976), Tales of Love and Death (1977), Intrusions (1980), Night Voices (1985), and The Wine-Dark Sea (1988). In his subtle autobiography, The Attempted Rescue (1966), Aickman alluded to the coercions of class and family and how they had affected his life. These themes appear frequently in his fiction; from 'The Trains' (1951) and 'Ringing the Changes' (1955) to 'Pages from a Young Girl's Journal' (1973) and 'The Stains' (1980), Aickman consistently represented an invasive 'strangeness' of the world as an analogue of the psychic distress of modern man.

AIDOO, Ama Ata (formerly Christina Ama Aidee) (1942–), Ghanaian playwright, novelist, poet, and short-story writer, born in Ghana, educated at the University of Ghana in Legon, and Stanford University. She has taught at various African universities. Her plays are much concerned with the position of women in African society, and with constructively firm criticism of Ghanaian society. Formally, her work is greatly inspired by oral sources and story-telling traditions. Published plays include The Dilemma of a Ghost (1965), about the problems faced by a black American girl who marries into a Ghanaian family, and Anowa (1969), a play which reworks an old Ghanaian legend. Other works include No Sweetness Here (1971), a collection of short stories; Out Sister Killjoy (1977), a novel about a Ghanaian student's critical reactions to European society, and her subsequent reassessment of African society when she returns from her studies in West Germany and London; and Changes (1991), a love story. She has also published two collections of poems, Someone Talking to Sometime (1985) and An Angry Letter in January (1992), which explore her cultural and political concerns for the present state of Africa.

AIKEN, Conrad (Potter) (1889–1973), American poet and critic, born at Savannah, Georgia, educated at Harvard, where he began a long friendship with T. S. Eliot. During the 1920s he supplied 'Letters from America' for the London Mercury and the Athenaeum*. The narrative poems of Earth Triumphant (1914), which reflect the influence of John *Masefield, began his prolific career as a poet; succeeding collections include The Jig Forslin: A Symphony (1916), initiating his interest in psychological parable; The Charnel Rose, Senlin (1918), a fictionalized verse-autobiography; and The House of Dust (1920), a symbolic treatment of the individual's quest for identity in the city, a theme to which he returned in Brownstone Eclogues (1944). John Deth (1930) revealed the explicitly metaphysical dimensions of his imagination which were most fully realized in the powerful symbolic landscapes of Preludes for Memnon (1931) and the dramatic spiritual allegory of The Coming Forth by Day of Osiris Jones (1931). Among his later collections of poetry, which expressed his idiosyncratic existential philosophy, were Skylight One (1949) and Letter from Li Po (1955). Although Aiken was closely associated with the development of poetic *Modernism, his experimental tendencies co-existed with a firm allegiance to the rhetorical effects of Romanticism. His Collected Poems of 1953 was revised in 1973. His work as a novelist shares his poetry's preoccupations with psychological and spiritual dimensions of experience. He described Blue Voyage (1927) and The Great Circle (1933) as 'profoundly autobiographical' in their respective accounts of a writer taking stock of his achievement in mid-career. The leitmotif of journeying as an allegory of psychic development is strongly present in A Heart for the Gods of Mexico (1939) and Conversation, or Pilgrim's Progress (1940). Scepticisms (1919), a collection of his early literary journalism, displays the confidence of judgement and directness of tone that remained characteristic of his criticism. His influential commentaries on the work of a wide range of poets were collected as A Reviewer's ABC (1966). The autobiographical Ushant (1952, revised edition 1972) is often regarded as the finest of his prose works. A biography by Edward Butscher was published in 1988.

AIKEN, Joan (Delano) (1924–), British writer, the daughter of Conrad *Aiken, born in Rye, Sussex. She is best known for her highly imaginative stories for young children in All You've Ever Wanted (1953) and many subsequent volumes. Her sharp sense of fantasy made her tales remarkably unpredictable. Among her novels for older children were The Wolves of Willoughby Chase (1962) and its sequels, set in an alternative eighteenth-century England; notable among these was the novel Is (1992), which advanced the series to a darkly imagined nineteenth century. Works such as her novels Midnight is a Place (1974) and The Shadow Guests (1980), and the stories collected in A Small Pinch of Weather (1969) and A Bundle of Nerves (1976) are also darker in tone. These bear a close resemblance to the occasionally savage adult tales in The Windscreen Weepers (1969). Aiken published a series of detective novels in the 1960s, including Trouble with Product X (1966) and Hate Begins at Home (1967). Historical novels such as The Lightning Tree (1980) and Mansfield Revisited (1984), which is a continuation of the Jane Austen novel, tended towards black comedy. The Haunting of Lamb House (1991), set in Rye, is a ghost story.

ALBEE, Edward (Franklin) (1928–), American playwright, born in Washington, DC, and adopted by a millionaire theatre owner. He had an unhappy childhood, attending expensive private schools and later working at unskilled jobs before becoming established as a writer in his early thirties. Thornton *Wilder encouraged him to write seriously, and he became one of the dominant group in the American theatre in the early 1960s, with Richardson, *Gelber, and *Kopit. All were influenced by European drama in general and by the Theatre of the *Absurd in particular, and The Zoo Story (1959) and The Death of Bessie Smith (1960) were first performed in Berlin. These plays, and The Sandbox (1960), Fam and Yam (1960), and The American Dream (1961), represent a concerted onslaught on the corrosive effects of American materialism. His first full-length play, Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?* (1962), made his reputation as a major playwright and continued the attack on middle-class values. Tiny Alice (1964) explores both the human and divine realms, being simultaneously a metaphysical and a conventional murder mystery. A Delicate Balance (1966; Pulitzer Prize), is an interaction between two couples who end up in despair, incapable of distinguishing between society and self. Box and Quotations from Chairman Mao Tse Tung: Two Inter-Related Plays (1968) adopts a more experimental form, in which Albee explores the relationship between art and suffering. In All Over (1971), the dying of an upper middle-class man off-stage brings together his family, friends, and mistress in a discussion of his life; by the end, they have all retreated to their own discontented states of self-absorption. In Seascape (1975; Pulitzer Prize), a married couple encounter a humanoid from a past evolutionary era. Plays such as Listening (1976), Counting the Ways (1977), The Lady from Dubuque (1978), and The Man Who Had Three Arms (1983), were less successful. With Three Tall Women (1991; Pulitzer Prize), Albee displayed his former energy in a powerful examination of old age and change. He has also adapted for the stage other writers' works, including Herman Melville's 'Bartleby' as an opera (1961), Carson *McCullers' The Ballad of the Sad Café (1963), and Truman *Capote's Breakfast at Tiffany's (1966). His intention as a dramatist has always been 'to offend—as well as to entertain and amuse'.

ALDINGTON, Richard (Edward Godfree) (1892–1962), British poet, novelist, and biographer, born in Hampshire, educated at University College, London. An early exponent of *Imagism, he met Hilda *Doolittle, whom he married in 1913, through his friendship with Ezra *Pound. He became assistant editor of *The Egoist in 1914. His experiences on the Western Front in the First World War engendered the deep embitterment which informs much of his later work. Images 1910–1915 (1915), his first collection of poetry, was followed by numerous volumes which include Images of War (1919), A Fool i' the Forest (1925), and The Crystal World (1937); a Complete Poems was published in 1948. He became widely known as a novelist with the quasi-autobiographical Death of a Hero (1929, abridged; Paris, 1930, unexpurgated), which follows the fortunes of its principal protagonist from his youth and unorthodox marriage to death in action in 1918. Among his other novels is Stepping Heavenward (1931), substantially a caricature of T. S. *Eliot, who found it deeply offensive. During the Second World War, Aldington settled in the USA and began producing a series of biographies which include Wellington (1946); Portrait of a Genius, But... (1950), his disparaging treatment of D. H. *Lawrence; and Lawrence of Arabia: A Biographical Enquiry (1955), which attacked its subject as an 'impudent mythomaniac'. Life for Life's Sake (1941) is his autobiography. Richard Aldington: A Biography by Charles Doyle was published in 1989.

ALDISS, Brian (Wilson) (1925–), British writer, born in East Dereham, Norfolk, educated at Framlingham College and East Buckland College. He served in the Royal Signals during 1943–7, an experience which generated more than one book. He is best known for his *science fiction works and his involvement in science fiction as a literary genre. His early publications include the fine stories collected in Space, Time, and Nathaniel: Presciences (1957); the novel Non-Stop (1958), set in the closed world of a slower-than-light starship; and Hothouse (1962), a set of linked tales set in the tropical fecundity of a dying Earth—fecundity and death recur in much of his work. Aldiss published essays and reviews from the 1950s and became an unofficial spokesman in the world of letters for the science fiction genre. He eloquently demonstrated its potential and its accomplishments in many anthologies, in collections of essays, such as This World and Nearer Ones (1979) and The Pale Shadow of Science (1985), and in Billion Year Spree (1973), much expanded (with David Wingrove) as Trillion Year Spree (1986), a perceptive history of the genre. In this book, and in the novel Frankenstein Unbound (1973), he argued that science fiction properly began with Mary Shelley's Frankenstein (1819), at the point where Romance met the scientific/industrial revolution. Intense, bleak novels of the early 1960s, such as The Dark Light Years (1964), Greybeard (1964), and Earthworks (1965), were succeeded by a trio of formal and linguistic experiments in An Age (1967), Report on Probability A (1968), and Barefoot in the Head (1969), which consciously applied Joycean experimentation in its depiction of a drug-fuelled war. The Malacia Tapestry (1976) parodies the aristocratic, entropy-choked cityscapes of the far future; Moreau's Other Island (1980) develops the theme of H. G. *Wells's The Island of Doctor Moreau (1896); and in the Helliconia trilogy (Helliconia Spring, 1982; Helliconia Summer, 1983; Helliconia Winter, 1985) he constructed a world on an enormous scale transforming it into a forum for the dramatic representation of humans rooted in time, circumstance, entropy, and death. Among his many collections of stories are The Canopy of Time (1959), The Airs of Earth (1963), The Saliva Tree (1966), The Moment of Eclipse (1970), Last Orders (1977), Seasons in Flight (1984), and A Tupolev Too Far (1993); and the two omnibus collections Man in His Time (1988) and A Romance of the Equator (1989). Non-generic novels include The Hand-Reared Boy (1970), Life in the West (1980), and Somewhere East of Life (1994). Bury My Heart at W H Smith's (1990) is a literary memoir.

ALEXENDER, Meena (1951–), Indian poet and writer, born in Allahabad to a Christian family from Kerala, educated at Khartoum University and the University of Nottingham; she subsequently became resident in the USA. After she published several volumes of poetry in India, including The Bird's Bright Wing (1976), I Root My Name (1977), and Stone Roots (1980), she produced The House of a Thousand Doors (1989), a volume composed of poems and prose examining the recesses of the author's personal and historical memory, as well as her experiences of travel and migration. The volume of memoirs Fault Lines (1992) tells, in lyrical prose that combines the meditative with the analytical, the stories that underlie the poems. Nampalli Road (1991) is a novel of social and feminist concerns, including police brutality and rape, set in the Indian city of Hyderabad. River and Bridge (1993) is a collection of recent poems, some of an overtly political nature.

ALGREN, Nelson (1909–81), American novelist, journalist, and short-story writer, born Nelson Ahlgren Abraham in Detroit, Michigan, of a Swedish immigrant family; educated at the University of Illinois, Urbana. Though not a native of Chicago, Algren's writings are associated with that city in a way which invites comparison with the work of Theodore *Dreiser and Saul *Bellow. Algren followed various occupations before assuming editorship of the Illinois Writers' Project for the Works Progress Administration between 1936 and 1940. His first novel, Somebody in Boots (1935), placed him firmly in the short-lived American tradition of 'proletarian realism' in its fictionalized account of Algren's own experiences of life as a hobo and itinerant worker; the novel was sympathetically received by left-wing critics eager to praise the tough naturalism of young 'Depression era' writers. Never Come Morning (1942) is a violent tale of rape and murder with a doomed Polish boxer as its hero. In its depiction of gang life among the poorer white immigrants of Chicago the novel caused much offence, notably to the Polish Roman Catholic Union which successfully campaigned for the novel to be banned from the Chicago Public Library. It was followed by an important collection of short stories, The Neon Wilderness (1946), and the impressive The Man with the Golden Arm (1949), which earned Algren the distinction of being the first American writer to receive the National Book Award. The novel had sociological as well as literary importance in its sympathetic and powerfully persuasive depiction of the life of a drug addict; it brought Algren international fame, in part through its screen adaptation (with Frank Sinatra in the lead role). Algren's last novel, A Walk on the Wild Side (1956), is an unsuccessful attempt to rework materials and themes from Somebody in Boots, but it was his own favourite work and he spoke of it as 'an American fantasy—a poem written to an American beat as truly as Huckleberry Finn . . .', and some critics claim that its influence is felt in 1960s films such as Easy Rider and Midnight Cowboy. A critical biography, Nelson Algren, by Martha Heasley Cox and Wayne Chatterton, appeared in 1975.

ALI, Ahmed (1910–94), Pakistani novelist, critic, and poet, born in Delhi, educated at the Universities of Aligarh and Lucknow. Ali was for some years, after his move to Pakistan upon the Partition of India, a diplomat; he served, among other postings, in China. He began his literary career as a short-story writer in his native Urdu in the 1930s; he was associated with the Progressive Writers Association, which brought Marxist and Freudian ideology and a *modernist aesthetic to Indian fiction. Some of his fiction is collected and translated (by himself and his son) in The Prison-House (1985), which displays his ability to move from social realism to Kafkaesque political parable. Ali is best known outside Pakistan as the author of the influential novel Twilight in Delhi (1940), which deals with the decline of Northern India's Muslim élite at the turn of the century through the eyes of one family and its intimates. His second novel, Ocean of Night (1964), the poetic romance of a courtesan with an aristocrat, evokes the Persian and Urdu mystic poetry Ali loved. He also published a volume of poems, Purple Gold Mountain (1960), and has edited or translated several anthologies of Urdu literature including The Golden Tradition (1973), Selected Pakistani Stories (1988), and a translation of the Koran from Arabic (1984).

ALI, Tariq (1943–), Pakistani writer, born in Lahore, educated in Pakistan and at Oxford University. He first gained a reputation as a Marxist journalist and political activist (he was involved with the Vietnam Solidarity campaign), and later worked as a documentary film-maker and television producer. His Marxist orientation is reflected in his first published works, including Pakistan: People's Power or Military Rule (1970) and Can Pakistan Survive? (1983). Ali turned to creative writing late in his career, with Partition (1987), a screenplay adapted from an Urdu short story, which was followed by Iranian Nights (1989), a play written with Howard *Brenton, based on the *Rushdie affair. His first novel, Redemption (1990), is a satirical comment on the vagaries of the far left in Britain and the consequences upon intellectuals of the fall of Eastern European communism. His next, The Shadow of the Pomegranate (1992), set in 1500 in Southern Spain and written to coincide with the commemoration of 1492, is an entertaining account of the fortunes of one Muslim family in the aftermath of the fall of Granada and the rise of Christian fundamentalism in Spain.

ALLEN, (William) Hervey (1889–1949), American historical novelist, poet, and biographer, born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, educated at the University of Pittsburgh, the United States Naval Academy, and Harvard. His experiences on active service during the First World War inform a number of the poems in Wampum and Old Gold (1921), his first book, and are recorded in detail in the autobiographical Towards the Flame (1926). With Israfel: The Life and Times of Edgar Allan Poe (1926) he established his reputation. His poetry, essentially of an ornately late Romantic character, appeared in numerous further collections including Earth Moods (1925) and New Legends (1929). Anthony Adverse (1933), a novel of some 1,200 pages recording the adventures of its eponymous protagonist during the Napoleonic era, proved enormously successful throughout the 1930s. Action at Aquila (1938) took the American Civil War for its setting and anticipated the major engagement with American history he proposed in a five-part treatment of prerevolutionary Pennsylvania and New York entitled 'The Disinherited'; Allen died before completing the work, three sections of which, The Forest and The Fort (1943), Bedford Village (1944), and Toward the Morning (1948), were posthumously collected as The City in the Dawn in 1950.

ALLEN, Paula Gunn (1939–), American writer of mixed Laguna/Sioux and Lebanese descent, born in New Mexico, educated at the Universities of Oregon and New Mexico. She is the cousin of Leslie Marmon *Silko. Allen held a number of academic posts before joining the Native American Studies programme at the University of California at Berkeley. Her writing is inseparable from her political activism as a feminist, pacifist, and environmentalist. As editor of Studies in American Indian Literature: Critical Essays and Course Designs (1983) she has done much to popularize the teaching of Native American literature. Allen sees feminism as synonymous with tribal heritage, an identification explored in her study The Sacred Hoop: Recovering the Feminine in American Indian Traditions (1986) and given imaginative treatment in her novel The Woman Who Owned the Shadows (1983) in which traditional legends, images, and motifs are used to describe the struggle for survival of a woman of mixed blood; Grandmothers of the Light (1992) presents Indian tribal myths. In her writing Allen explores the values of a woman-centred culture which were lost to Native American women with the white invasion of North America. In volumes of poetry such as Shadow Country (1982) and Skins and Bones: Poems 1979–87 (1988), she draws upon female traditions which celebrate continuance in contrast with male traditions of war and death. See also NATIVE AMERICAN LITERATURE.

ALLEN, Walter (Ernest) (1911–95), English novelist and critic, born in Birmingham, educated at Birmingham University. Among his many academic appointments he was Professor and Chairman of English Studies, New University of Ulster, Coleraine (1967–73). In the 1930s he wrote three realistic novels about English working-class life, Innocence is Drowned (1938), Blind Man's Ditch (1939), and Living Space (1940), all set in Birmingham, and reflecting the political and social tensions of the time. His finest novel is generally considered to be All in a Lifetime (1959; US title Threescore and Ten); through its narrator, an old man in his middle seventies, social change and the rise of the Labour Party are vividly described. Widely known as a critic and literary historian of the novel, his critical works include The English Novel (1954) and The Short Story in English (1981); and studies of Arnold Bennett (1948), Joyce Cary (1953), and George Eliot (1964), among others. As I Walked Down New Grub Street: Memories of a Writing Life (1981) is an autobiography.

ALLINGHAM, Margery (1904–66), British detective story writer, born in London, educated at the Perse School for Girls, Cambridge. With The Crime at Black Dudley (1929) she began a series of nearly twenty novels and a number of short stories in which the detective is the languid, blond, and aristocratic Albert Campion, reputedly related to the royal family, a character very similar to Dorothy *Sayers's Lord Peter Wimsey. Allingham writes with great verve and energy; she delights in creating odd, outré settings and peopling them with eccentric, but never unbelievable, characters, though she occasionally lapses into melodrama. Outstanding are Dancers in Mourning (1937) and The Fashion in Shrouds (1938), though the more serious Tiger in the Smoke (1952), the story of a hunt for a vicious yet not wholly unsympathetic murderer, is probably her masterpiece. After her death her husband, Philip Youngman Carter, completed an unfinished Campion novel and later added two more to the series.

All My Sons, a play by Arthur *Miller, published in 1947. An Ibsen-like drama of moral evasion and confrontation, it concerns the Keller family, the head of which, Joe Keller, a self-made businessman, has been acquitted of the charge of connivance in the sale of defective cylinder heads to the US Air Force during the Second World War, a crime for which his neighbour and employee, Steve Deever, has been imprisoned. One of Joe's two sons, Larry, has been reported missing and, despite the fact that three years have gone by and the war is over, his mother refuses to believe that he is dead and tries to block the engagement of his brother, the easy-going Chris, to Larry's girlfriend, Annie. It emerges during the course of the play that Joe knew that the cylinder heads were cracked and that he was in fact as culpable—and as responsible for the ensuing deaths of US airmen—as Deever; it is eventually revealed that Larry knew this too, and, far from being killed in action, had committed suicide out of shame. Despite its occasional moments of near melodrama, the play is a powerful work and offers a convincing portrayal of the contradictions of American middle-class life.

ALLOTT, Kenneth (1912–73), British poet, born in Glamorganshire; he grew up in Cumberland and was educated at the University of Durham and St Edmund Hall, Oxford. He became a leading contributor of poetry to New Verse,* of which he was assistant editor from 1936 to 1939. In 1946 he began lecturing at the University of Liverpool, where he was A. C. *Bradley Professor of Modern English Literature (1964–73). His reputation as a poet rests on Poems (1938) and The Ventriloquist's Doll (1943), after which he published no further collections. His highly accomplished verse is often intensely atmospheric in its elegiac concern with impending historical catastrophe. Elsewhere the clarity and precision of his imagery, which sometimes suggests a muted surrealism, are used to bitterly satirical effect. Collected Poems (1975) contains his two collections together with a number of poems written between 1943 and 1957. His other works include The Rhubarb Tree (1938), an ingenious comic novel written with Stephen Tait, with whom he also wrote a dramatic adaptation of E. M. *Forster's A Room with a View (1951), and the critical and biographical study Jules Verne (1940). He edited, amongst other works, The Poems of Matthew Arnold (1965), the standard edition of Arnold's verse, and The Penguin Book of Contemporary Verse (1950).

ALTHER, Lisa (1944–), American novelist, born in Tennessee, educated at Wellesley College. Alther achieved popular success with her first novel, Kinflicks (1976); based on the events of her life after leaving her native Tennessee to move north, the novel explores the nature of the relationship between mother and daughter. Called back home by the imminent death of her mother, the heroine considers all those influences which have shaped and determined her family relationships. Similar concerns are reflected in Original Sin (1981), in which a group of characters who have left Tennessee for the North are recalled for a funeral; through the collective recollections of their experiences, Alther presents a satirical view of authoritative social institutions. Other Women (1984) explores further the possibilities represented by lesbian relationships, a theme introduced in Kinflicks and further examined in Five Minutes in Heaven (1995) which also deals with mourning and loss. Alther's vision of personal and political relations is generally pessimistic though she combines this dark view with a powerful strain of black humour, particularly in her use of the grotesque.

ALUKO, T(imothy) M(ofolorunse) (1918–), Nigerian novelist, born in Ilesha, Western Nigeria, educated at Government College (Ibadan), Lagos University, and the University of London. He was director of public works for Nigeria's Western Region, and in 1966 became senior lecturer in engineering at Lagos University. His most accomplished novel, One Man, One Matchet (1964), set in pre-independence Nigeria, depicts with comic verve political conflicts between traditionalists and modernizers in a coca-growing village. His first novel, One Man, One Wife (1959), was equally shrewd in its depiction of village politics, pitting Christians against the authority of traditional chiefs. Other novels include Kinsman and Foreman (1966), about a civil servant's struggles to resist the demands of his relations; Chief the Honourable Minister (1970), which deals with the problems of government at the top; His Worshipped Majesty (1972), which focuses on the loss of political power by traditional chiefs; and Wrong Ones in the Dock (1982), which denounces certain aspects of the Nigerian legal system. Despite his exposure of political chicanery, Aluko, unlike many other prominent African novelists, such as Chinua *Achebe and *Ngugi wa Thiong'o, appears to be a champion of the post-independence élites in government and civil service.

ALVAREZ, Al(fred) (1929–), British critic, poet, and novelist, born in London, educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In addition to his work as a freelance writer, he has held numerous visiting posts at American universities. The Shaping Spirit (1958), a discussion of modern English and American poetry, was the first of his critical works. Subsequent studies include The School of Donne (1961) and The Savage God (1971), which contained his controversial treatment of the suicide of Sylvia *Plath; Beyond All This Fiddle (1968) is a collection of his essays. He edited the widely read anthology *The New Poetry (1962) and The Faber Book of Modern European Poetry (1992). His poetry collections include The End of It (1958), Apparition (1971), and Autumn to Autumn and Selected Poems 1953–1976 (1978). His concentrated verse forms are vehicles for poetry of unusual emotional intensity. Hunt (1978), notable for the rapidity of its witty dialogue, and Day of Atonement (1991), an urgent evocation of London's underworld, are among his novels. Alvarez's other works include The Biggest Game in Town (1983), which draws on his enthusiasm for poker; Feeding the Rat (1988), a biography of the British mountaineer Mo Anthoine; and Night (1995), an exploration of night life, night language, sleep, and dreams.

ALVAREZ, Julia (1950–), American Latina novelist; born in New York, she spent her early years in the Dominican Republic. Alvarez later became a professor of English at Middlebury College, Vermont. Her first novel, How the Garcia Girls Lost Their Accent (1991), written in reverse chronological order, recounts the events surrounding the immigration of the fictional Garcia family to the US. Much like Alvarez and her own sisters, the Garcia girls, Yolanda (who acts as Alvarez's alter ego), Carla, Sandi, and Sofia struggle to adapt to their new life and begin the often emotional and challenging process of assimilation into American culture. Her second novel, In the Time of Butterflies (1994), is based on the actual lives and tragic deaths of three beautiful convent-educated sisters in the Dominican Republic who are known as Las Mariposas ('The Butterflies'); Alvarez characterizes the voices of the sisters as they describe the everyday horrors of life following their decision to oppose the dictatorship of General Trujillo. Alvarez has been praised for her construction of character and for her use of English to convey the sounds of Spanish. She is also the author of several collections of poetry, most notably Homecoming (1984). See LATINO/LATINA LITERATURE IN ENGLISH.

AMADI, Elechi (1934–), Nigerian novelist and teacher, born in Aluu, near Port Harcourt in Eastern Nigeria, educated at University College, Ibadan. After being employed as a surveyor for several years during 1953–60, he became a teacher, and has since held several Government and academic posts in Nigeria. Amadi served in the Nigerian Federal Army (1963–6 and 1968–9). During the Nigerian Civil War (1967–70) he was imprisoned twice by the Biafran government, but on his second release he rejoined the Federal forces. His experiences of the war are detailed in Sunset in Biafra (1973), one of the most powerful memoirs to emerge from that conflict. His first novel, The Concubine (1966), set in a riverine Delta community, concerns a young woman who brings misfortune to her male admirers; it gives an authentic depiction of traditional village life and also encompasses the supernatural within a convincingly realistic framework. The Great Ponds (1969) has similar qualities, focusing on a feud between two groups of pre-colonial villagers over control of a pond which is of immense importance to their livelihood and way of life. The Slave (1978) deals with an attempt by a social outcast, and 'osu', or slave of the god Amadioha, to return to his ancestral village; Estrangement (1986), set in the aftermath of the Nigerian Civil War, describes the psychological effects of the conflict on some of its survivors. Amadi's dramatic works include the two plays published in Peppersoup and The Road to Ibadan (1977) and Dancer of Johannesburg (1979).

Ambassadors, The, a novel by Henry *James, published in 1903. When Chad Newsome does not return from Paris to take up his family responsibilities, his mother sends as an 'ambassador' the intelligent and conscientious American editor Lambert Strether. In Paris, he gradually learns the reasons for Chad's desire to remain in the Old World culture, with its fascinations and satisfactions in the shape of the Mme de Vionet. Succumbing to the lifestyle, Strether abandons his mission, and another group of 'ambassadors' are sent to Europe after him and Chad, namely Mrs Newsome's sister, Mrs Pocock, her husband Jim, and Jim's inexperienced sister Mamie. The situation gradually becomes humorous as these people fail to understand how Strether and Chad have been changed. Chad determines to remain in Paris, whilst Strether is persuaded to return to the USA, even though this means the cessation of his attachment to Maria Gostrey, an expatriate who has accompanied his cultural education. The novel deals with James's abiding interest in the cultural differences between Europe and America, and the circles within circles of social and cultural groupings.

Ambit, a magazine founded in 1959 by Martin Bax in an attempt to invigorate British poetry, which he saw as having taken on an apathetic character; since then it has appeared as a quarterly, publishing stories, graphics, critical articles, and reviews. The lively tone of Bax's initial editorials anticipated the flamboyantly irreverent and anarchically experimental character Ambit rapidly assumed; the erotic and sometimes scatological tendency of some of the writing and illustrations it carried in the early 1970s caused Roy *Fuller to protest that its Arts Council subsidy should be withdrawn on the grounds that it was 'often pornographic, occasionally obscene'. Alan *Brownjohn, Peter *Porter, Edwin *Brock, Tony *Connor, and Peter *Redgrove contributed poetry in its early years and remained associated with the magazine through the following decades. Ambit's innovative ethos became pronounced in the 1960s when emphatically unconventional work by George *MacBeth, Ivor *Cutler, Eduardo Paolozzi, and others appeared frequently; *concrete poetry and collages combining graphic and textual elements were also regularly featured. The authors whose prose fiction has been published in the journal include Christopher *Middleton, J. G. *Ballard, and William *Burroughs. Gavin *Ewart, Herbert *Lomas, and Vernon *Scannell are among the critics who have maintained Ambit's high standards of reviewing. The magazine is among the most valuable and stimulating to have appeared in Britain since the 1930s.

AMBLER, Eric (1909–), British thriller writer, born in London; he studied engineering at London University, and later worked in advertising. Ambler served in the Royal Artillery during the Second World War, rising to the rank of lieutenant-colonel and becoming assistant director of Army Kinematography; later he produced films for the J. Arthur Rank Organisation and wrote numerous screenplays, his adaptation of Nicholas *Monsarrat's The Cruel Sea (1953) being nominated for an Academy Award. Ambler's early thrillers—The Dark Frontier (1936) is the first—are usually set in Central Europe or the Levant, and are written, as a conscious reaction against *Buchan and *Sapper, from a left-wing political point of view, illustrated, for example, by the sympathetic portrait of Zaleshoff, a Soviet agent, who appears in Uncommon Danger (1937; US title Background to Danger) and Cause for Alarm (1938). The best of the pre-war novels are Epitaph for a Spy (1938) and The Mask of Dimitrios (1939; US title A Coffin for Dimitrios). Ambler's post-war work is less homogeneous: he has experimented in a number of directions, mingling comedy with suspense, for example, in The Light of Day (1962; also published in the USA as Topkapi) and Dirty Story (1967). The best of the later novels is perhaps Doctor Frigo (1974), set in the French Antilles, but The Night-Comers (1956; US title State of Siege), The Intercom Conspiracy (1969), Send No More Roses (1977; US title The Siege of the Villa Lipp), and The Care of Time (1981) are also worthy of mention. An autobiography, Here Lies Eric Ambler, appeared in 1985.

American Dream, An, see MAILER, NORMAN.

American Mercury, The, a monthly magazine founded in 1924 with H. L. *Mencken and George Jean *Nathan as editors. Urbanely scathing commentary on the social and cultural follies of contemporary America was Mencken's speciality, the prohibition of alcohol being a recurrent object of his scorn. Nathan directed the magazine's interest towards drama; the entire text of Eugene *O'Neill's All God's Chillun Got Wings appeared in the second issue. Although Nathan resigned as co-editor in 1925, he continued to contribute drama criticism until 1930. Literature in general was well represented, Sinclair *Lewis, Theodore *Dreiser, Vachel *Lindsay, Edgar Lee *Masters, Carl *Sandburg, and Sherwood *Anderson being among the writers featured. Hostility was displayed towards authors and movements viewed as pretentious. The first issue contained Ernest Boyd's satirical article 'Aesthete, Model 1924'; Allen *Tate, Malcolm *Cowley, William Carlos *Williams, Hart *Crane, and others responded by publishing a single edition of Aesthete, 1925, in which much wit was exercised at the expense of Mencken and his colleagues. American history, literary biography, and aspects of American linguistic usage were subjects of regular articles. Mencken's editorship ended in 1933, when the magazine came under the control of L. E. Spivak. Domestic and international politics became the predominant concerns during its eventual decline to an unimportant right-wing journal. It ceased publication in 1975.

American Tragedy, An, a novel by Theodore *Dreiser, published in 1925. The plot draws on the 1906 New York murder trial of Chester Gillette. Clyde Griffiths, son of poor street missionaries in Kansas City, yearns for wealth and social status and finds work as a bellhop in a luxury hotel, where he shares the fast life of his fellow workers. But, after a joyriding accident in which a little girl is killed, Clyde flees to Chicago where he meets Samuel Griffiths, his uncle, who employs him in his collar factory in Lycurgus, New York State. Clyde's job is menial and he becomes acutely aware of the wealth his cousins enjoy. He meets and seduces Roberta Alden, a working-class girl, but simultaneously falls in love with Sondra Finchley, a wealthy socialite; by the time Sondra becomes interested in Clyde, he has discovered that Roberta is pregnant. He decides to lure Roberta to an out-of-season lake resort and murder her by faking a boating accident. Clyde loses his nerve at the crucial moment, but Roberta does drown accidentally and Clyde swims to safety. However, he bungles his attempts to cover his tracks and is arrested. Orville W. Mason, a talented district attorney, becomes obsessed with convicting Clyde, and builds up an unanswerable case. Mason's honest thoroughness, coupled with the inept lies of the defence lawyers, prevent the truth from being revealed, and Clyde is convicted, condemned, and executed. AMIS, Sir Kingsley (1922–95), British novelist and poet, born in South London, educated at the City of London School and St John's College, Oxford. He was the father of Martin Amis. Between 1949 and 1963 he taught at the University College of Swansea, Princeton University, and Peterhouse, Cambridge. Amis won immediate fame with his first novel, Lucky Jim (1954); in its portrayal of the *'Angry Young Man', Jim Dixon, a lecturer in a provincial university, the novel displayed an irreverence towards the establishment and a satirical humour which were to characterize his work as a whole. That Uncertain Feeling (1955), also with a university setting, confirmed Amis as an iconoclast whose dislike of all forms of dogma allied him as much with satirists on the Left as on the Right. Other novels of the period include I Like It Here (1958), set in Portugal; Take a Girl Like You (1960), which dealt with the relationship between Jenny Bunn, one of his more sympathetic female characters, and her philandering suitor Patrick Standish, to which he wrote a sequel (Difficulties with Girls, 1988); One Fat Englishman (1963), about an English academic on sabbatical in America; and I Want It Now (1968), which satirizes the heartless amorality of the 1960s, a theme also explored in Girl, 20 (1971) which deals with a middle-aged man's infatuation with a much younger woman.

Throughout his career, Amis interspersed his comic novels of manners with exercises in a wide variety of fictional genres. The Anti-Death League (1966) incorporated metaphysical speculation about the existence of God into a conventional spy story; The Green Man (1969) is a ghost story; The Riverside Villas Murder (1973) a murder mystery; Russian Hide and Seek (1980) an offbeat thriller about the Cold War. Perhaps his most ambitious experiment is The Alteration (1976), a dystopian fantasy describing Europe as it might have been if the Reformation had not taken place. Other works of fiction include the blackly comic Ending Up (1974), which casts a cold eye on the indignities of ageing and death; Jake's Thing (1978), which treats the central character's impotence as a subject for farce; and Stanley and the Women (1984), which displays a certain ambivalence towards its hero's misogynistic attitudes. Altogether darker in mood than his earlier work is The Old Devils (1986; Booker Prize); set in an imaginary town in South Wales, the novel concerns the relationships between a group of friends who have known each other since their college days in the 1950s, and casts a sardonic eye on a whole range of topics: the problems of ageing, the Welsh character, artistic integrity, alcoholism, and death. The Folks That Live on the Hill (1990), set in London, exhibits the hostility towards aspects of life—in particular, changes in sexual mores—and the preoccupation with the decline of Britain which is characteristic of his later novels. The pessimistic and reactionary tone of the work is alleviated, as in most of his novels, by the brilliance of his comic invective. In The Russian Girl (1992) Amis returns to the theme of artistic integrity which is contrasted with personal sincerity in its portrayal of the relationship between Richard Vaisey, a married lecturer, and Anna Danilova, the beautiful Russian girl with whom he falls in love. Other less attractive motifs, such as the author's tendency to portray women as selfish and manipulative, also recur. You Can't Do Both (1994) attempts to show, in its account of its central character's progression from childhood to disillusioned adulthood, the way that people are shaped by their upbringing. The Biographer's Moustache (1995) is a comic work about a snobbish mediocre novelist, and his pretentious chums, who becomes the subject of a biography by a second-rate journalist with a moustache.

Although renowned for his fiction, which also includes several volumes of short stories (including Mrs Barrett's Secret, 1993, and Collected Short Stories, 1980), Amis was also a poet of considerable repute. His early collections, Bright November (1947) and A Frame of Mind (1953), indicated his skill in the manipulation of traditional forms and established the dry individuality of tone characteristic of A Case of Samples (1956). The latter collection appeared in the same year as Robert Conquest's New Lines* anthology, in which Amis was represented; the combination of colloquial directness and a scrupulously sceptical intelligence in much of his work of the time identified him firmly as a poet of the *Movement. Later volumes include A Look Around the Estate (1967) and Collected Poems: 1944–1979 (1980); he also edited The New Oxford Book of Light Verse (1978) and The Amis Anthology: A Personal Choice of English Verse (1988). Amongst other non-fiction works are a study of Rudyard *Kipling (1975), New Maps of Hell: A Survey of Science Fiction (1960); The James Bond Dossier (1965); and The Golden Age of Science Fiction (1981). His Memoirs (1991), a collection of autobiographical essays, are notable for their frankness concerning the author's friends and enemies. Amis was formerly married to Elizabeth Jane *Howard. He was awarded the CBE in 1981 and was knighted in 1990.

AMIS, Martin (1949–), English novelist, born in Oxford, the son of Kingsley *Amis, educated at Exeter College, Oxford. Amis began his literary career with The Rachel Papers (1973; Somerset Maugham Award, 1974), a scabrously funny account of a young man's sentimental education, narrated in the first person by its precociously articulate 19-year-old hero, Charles Highway. Dead Babies (1975) is a surreal black comedy set in a country rectory inhabited by louche, aristocratic Quentin Villiers, his wife Celia, and an assortment of freaks, sybarites, and psychopaths. Amis explored ideas about the nature of identity in his equally disturbing Success (1978) and in his later fiction which abounds with doubles, schizophrenics, and mirror images. Other People (1981), narrated in the third person, concerns Mary Lamb, an amnesiac wandering the streets of London in search of her lover who may be her killer. The novel contains many passages of fine descriptive writing whose imagery is reminiscent of the *Martian poets. Money (1984), set in 1981, concerns the materialistic greed of the period and the disintegration of post-war egalitarianism. Its obese and lascivious hero, John Self, is a film producer entailed in tying up the financial backing for his first major film. Moving between London and New York, the novel chronicles the stages of Self's quest for wealth and sexual gratification and describes his encounters with a variety of grotesques. Despite its overt preoccupation with various forms of exchange, the novel's central theme is the nature of identity. A looming but unspecified catastrophe underlies London Fields (1989); set in 1999, it concerns a beautiful femme fatale, Nicola Six, whose quest for annihilation unfolds in a background of seedy urban wasteland. Despite its overt concern for the destruction of the planet, the novel is as blackly comic and as stylistically exuberant as much of his work. The more experimental Time's Arrow (1991) represents a departure from Amis's previous work; borrowing a narrative conceit from an episode in K. Vonnegut's Slaughterhouse-Five,* Amis envisages a world where time runs backwards and in which everything, morality included, is turned on its head. This and the fact that the novel's protagonist, first encountered in old age and later seen in earlier incarnations, is a former Nazi officer overseeing the medical experiments on concentration camp prisoners at Auschwitz, provoked controversy when the novel first appeared. The Information (1995) was similarly controversial, not so much for its subject, but for the substantial advance (of about £500,000) negotiated by the author's American agent. The novel deals with familiar themes of literary jealousy, the conflict between creative integrity and worldly success, and the breakdown of urban society; with Money and London Fields, The Information completes Amis's 'London' trilogy. Stylistically, Amis remains one of the most inventive of his contemporaries; at its best, his writing displays a sharpness of focus and a linguistic concentration which, while undoubtedly highly mannered, offers diverse pleasures to the reader. This, combined with the appealing cynicism of his observations, has made him one of the most widely admired and imitated writers of his generation. A collection of essays on American themes, The Moronic Inferno (1986), includes interviews with writers he admires, such as S. *Bellow and J. *Updike. Other writers for whom he has expressed admiration and whose influence can be discerned in his work include V. *Nabokov, J. G. *Ballard, and J. Borges. He has also published a collection of short stories, Einstein's Monsters (1987), which deal with the nuclear threat, and a collection of journalistic pieces and literary criticism, Visiting Mrs Nabokov (1993).

AMMONS, A(rchie) R(andolph) (1926–), American poet, born in Whiteville, North Carolina, educated at the University of California at Berkeley. After twelve years as an executive with a glass manufacturing company, in 1964 he began his academic career at Cornell University, where he became Goldwin Smith Professor of English in 1973. The examples of Ezra *Pound and William Carlos *Williams informed the ambitiously inclusive thematic and descriptive scope of his first book of verse, Ommateum, with Doxology (1955). Expressions at Sea Level (1964) and Corson's Inlet (1965) gained him wide recognition and established the disciplined informality of tone and finely cadenced exploratory verse forms characteristic of his work. The title poem of the latter volume is among his best-known works, richly demonstrating the meditative interactions between natural phenomena and the individual consciousness which are central to much of his poetry. The highly discursive verse-journal Tape for the Turn of the Year (1965) emphasized his interest in experimentation, its sinuously extended form determined by the decision to compose the poem on a narrow roll of adding-machine paper. Ammons has continued to divide his achievement between long, thematically mobile sequences and shorter lyric treatments in his numerous subsequent books, which include Sphere: The Form of Motion (1974), Six-Piece Suite (1979), Selected Longer Poems (1980), Lake Effect Country (1983), Sumerian Vistas (1987), Really Short Poems (1991), and Garbage (1994); Selected Poems (1986) is a representative edition of his verse.

ANAND, Mulk Raj (1905–), Indian novelist, born in Peshawar, educated at the Universities of Lahore, London, and Cambridge. Deeply influenced by his years in England, where he was exposed to the aesthetic of the *Bloomsbury set and E. M. *Forster and to the evolving theories of the left, Anand published his first and best-known novel, Untouchable, in 1935. The novel, which was dramatized in 1989, centres on the tribulations and aspirations of a young street-cleaner, whose political consciousness is awakened by Gandhi's call for social equality in an independent India. Anand's novels and short stories, including Coolie (1936), Two Leaves and a Bud (1937), Across the Black Water (1940), and The Sword and the Sickle (1942) attempt to cross the formal boundaries of the traditional European novel in search of a hybrid genre that combines the intonations of Indian languages and the vitality of indigenous folk-narratives with the techniques of contemporary literary practice. Among subsequent works are The Big Heart (1945), The Private Life of an Indian Prince (1953), and The Old Woman and the Cow (1960; reprinted as Gauri, 1976); and four volumes of a projected autobiographical roman-fleuve: Seven Summers (1951); Morning Face (1968); Confessions of a Lover (1976); and The Bubble (1984), in which Anand breaks away from the restrained narrative methods of his earlier works, combining letters, diary entries, and excerpts from the hero's novel-in-process to polyphonic effect. Anand remains an ardent spokesman for human rights, and is venerated as India's leading man of English letters.

ANAYA, Rudolfo A(lfonso) (1937–), Chicano novelist, poet, dramatist, and writer, born in New Mexico, educated at the University of New Mexico of which he became Professor of English in 1988. He is best known for the trilogy Bless Me, Ultima (1972), Heart of Aztlán (1976), and Tortuga (1979). Anaya's narrative technique weaves together the historical with the mythical, the imaginative or fantastic, and the ritual aspects of Chicano life to explore the conflict between ethnic and Anglo-American cultures. Whether dealing with life in rural New Mexico or in the urban ghettos of modern America, Anaya's enduring concern is with the richness of Chicano culture and the possibilities that are available for Chicano cultural identity. This concern with racial identity and the conflicts involved in the cross-cultural environment of modern America pervades Anaya's work, including the poetry collection The Adventures of Juan Chicaspatas (1985), The Silence of the Llano: Short Stories (1982), the novel Lord of the Dawn: The Legend of Quetzalcoatl (1987), the travel narrative A Chicano in China (1986), and the play The Season of la Llorona (1979). Anaya has edited the anthologies Cuentos/Tales of the Hispanic Southwest (1980) and Cuentos Chicanos: A Short Story Anthology (1984), Voces/An Anthology of Nuevo Mexicano Writers (1987), and, with Francisco Lomeli, Aztlan: Essays on the Chicano Homeland (1989). See LATINO/LATINA LITERATURE IN ENGLISH.

ANDERSON, Barbara (1926–), New Zealand novelist, educated at the Universities of Dunedin and Wellington. She came late to a writing career, beginning with radio plays. Her first book was a collection of short stories, I Think We Should Go to the Jungle (1989), praised for its perception of love and grief in everyday life, which earned Anderson comparisons with Raymond *Carver and Flaubert. Her first novel, Girls High (1990), set in a school, was less successful, but Portrait of the Artist's Wife (1992) confirmed her abilities as a novelist. All the Nice Girls (1993), widely considered her finest novel, is a tale of adulterous passion, set in New Zealand in 1962, and containing the characteristic Anderson combination of wit, buoyant prose, and emotional insight.

ANDERSON, Jessica (1925–), Australian novelist and short-story writer, born in Brisbane. She spent several years in England but has lived mainly in Sydney where her first novel, An Ordinary Lunacy (1963), is set. The Last Man's Head (1970) is an unusual crime novel delivered in her characteristically laconic and ironic style. Her novels display her gift for psychological observation and social commentary. The Commandant (1975), a historical novel, concerns the life of Captain Patrick Logan, the commandant of the Moreton Bay penal settlement, but is written from a feminist angle. Tirra Lirra by the River (1978) focuses on an elderly woman who returns to her childhood home in Queensland after a long absence spent in Sydney and London. The Impersonators (1980; US title The Only Daughter) deals with the experiences of an Australian family. Taking Shelter (1990) is more experimental in its presentation of the central character's dreams and reflections. One of the Wattle Birds (1994) examines deception and the power of the past, through a woman who is haunted by questions about her mother. Stories from the Warm Zone and Sydney Stories appeared in 1987.

ANDERSON, Maxwell (1888–1959), American playwright, born in Atlantic, Pennsylvania, brought up in North Dakota, educated at Stanford University. In 1918 he moved to New York where he worked on various journals and helped found Measure, a magazine of verse. His own collection of poems, You Who Have Dreams, appeared in 1925. His first play, the verse tragedy White Desert (1923), was drawn from childhood memories and told the story of damaged lives in North Dakota. Thereafter, he frequently co-operated with either Laurence Stallings, the drama critic of the World, or Harold Hickerson, to produce a series of dramas based on social issues in the USA. These included the immensely successful war play What Price Glory? (1924); a prose comedy about marriage, Saturday's Children (1927); Gods of the Lightning (1928), and Winterset (1935), both based on the Sacco and Vanzetti case. As well as serious works he demonstrated his skills for comedy in such works as Both Your Houses (1933; Pulitzer Prize), a witty satire about political corruption; High Tor (1936) and The Star Wagon (1937), both comic satires about materialism; and the musical comedy Knickerbocker Holiday (1938), a collaboration with Kurt Weill. Anderson specialized in verse-drama, using history to illuminate contemporary issues in Elizabeth the Queen (1930), about a love affair between Elizabeth I and Lord Essex; and in Night Over Taos (1932), Mary of Scotland (1933), Valley Forge (1934), and The Masque of Kings (1937). He was instrumental in establishing the Playwright's Company in 1938. During the Second World War he wrote both anti-fascist plays and accounts of the lives of ordinary soldiers, with Key Largo (1939), about an American fighting in the Spanish Civil War, Candle in the Wind (1941), The Eve of St Mark (1942), and Storm Operation (1944). He continued to work in a variety of forms and subjects, producing such works as Joan of Lorraine (1946), about Joan of Arc; Anne of a Thousand Days (1948), a stylized treatment of Anne Boleyn; and the dramatization of Alan Paton's Cry, the Beloved Country*, entitled Lost in the Stars (1948). Other works include Off Broadway (1947), a collection of essays on playwriting; Barefoot in Athens (1951), about Socrates; and The Bad Seed (1954), an adaptation of a novel by William March about an evil child.

ANDERSON, Poul (William) (1926–), American writer of *science fiction and fantasy, born in Bristol, Pennsylvania, educated at the University of Minnesota. A Nordic melancholy runs through much of his fantasy including his best-known works, Brain Wave (1954) and Tau Zero (1970), but The High Crusade (1960) is one of the few humorous science fiction novels of quality. Though the physical range of his science fiction is wide, including several long series set in complex universes, its protagonists share a wry pessimism about any ultimate victory; and his most famous character, Dominic Flandry, serves in defence of a doomed Terran empire. The sequence beginning with Harvest of Stars (1993) models a myth of the near future. His shorter work, much of it eloquently based on technological speculations, has been collected in many volumes, notably The Earth Book of Stormgate (1978), The Night Face (1979), and The Long Night (1983).

ANDERSON, Robert W(oodruff) (1917–), American playwright, born in New York City, educated at Harvard. His first play, Come Marching Home (1945), is a study in the political idealism of an ex-serviceman whose aspirations conflict with the complacency of the community in which he seeks political election. He is best known for Tea and Sympathy (1953; directed by Elia Kazan), which had a broadway run of 712 performances. Set in a New England boys' school, the play deals with a teenager whose shyness and sensitivity set him apart from his peers; suspected of homosexuality, his masculinity is persistently challenged by the headmaster and his own father. The play is notable for its final act in which the headmaster's wife, played by Deborah Kerr, offers herself to the boy to reassure him. Anderson subsequently enjoyed success on Broadway with You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running (1967). His other plays include Love Revisited (1951), All Summer Long (1953), Silent Night, Lonely Night (1959), The Days Between (1965), I Never Sang for My Father (1968), and Free and Clear (1983). Anderson has enjoyed respect for his technical skill and his treatment of sex and marriage, but his plays lack the psychological subtlety of contemporaries such as Arthur *Miller, Tennessee *Williams or Edward *Albee.

ANDERSON, Sherwood (1876–1941), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Camden, Ohio, into an itinerant poor white family. He served in the Spanish-American War and held a succession of jobs before abandoning his wife and family to move to Chicago in 1912 to become a full-time writer with the encouragement of Carl *Sandburg, Theodore *Dreiser, and Floyd *Dell he published his first novels, Windy McPherson's Son (1916) and Marching Men (1917), both concerned with the claustrophobia of small town life. It was the appearance of Winesburg, Ohio* (1919) which first brought him widespread attention, establishing him as a leading figure in the Chicago literary renaissance. The evocation of small town life and distrust of mechanization were to set the tone for much of what followed. Among the later fictional works were Poor White* (1920), a novel concerning the effects of the invasion of rural life by modern machinery; Dark Laughter (1925), whose style is markedly influenced by Gertrude *Stein in its placing value on the 'primitive' over the 'civilized'; and Beyond Desire (1932), a novel dealing with the Southern textile mill labour struggles. He also wrote poetry and volumes of social philosophy, of which Perhaps Women (1931) is of particular contemporary interest. His short stories, collected in volumes such as The Triumph of the Egg (1921), Horses and Men (1923), and Death in the Woods (1933) were popular at the time. His autobiographical writings include Tar: A Midwest Childhood (1925) and The Story Teller's Story (1924), the Memoirs (1942), and Letters (1953). He exerted considerable influence over such writers as *Hemingway and *Faulkner, both of whom owe their first publications to his efforts. His reputation waned in the 1930s and he died in virtual obscurity while travelling in Central America, but his reputation revived in later years.

ANDREWS, Bruce (1948–), American poet, born in Chicago, educated at Harvard. He settled in New York in 1975, where he became a professor of politics at Fordham. He was editor of L-A-N-G-U-A-G-E with Charles *Bernstein (1979–81). He is a performance artist and poet whose texts are some of the most radical of the Language school (see LANGUAGE POETRY); his poetry tries 'to cast doubt on each and every "natural" construction of language'. Small linguistic units, idioms, phrases, and single words, taken from different, sometimes mutually exclusive registers, especially discourses which are socially sensitive and resonant to contemporary ears, enable the poetry to 'suggest a social undecidability'. I Don't Have Any Paper So Shut Up (or, Social Romanticism) (1990) comes as close as any American poet to fulfilling Whitman's aim of allowing the 'forbidden voices, voices of sexes and lusts' to speak, a vast cacophony of urban self-presentational idioms, even when these are in violent opposition to one another. Other works include Getting Ready to Have Been Frightened (1978/1988), Love Songs (1982), Give Em Enough Rope (1987), Tizzy Boost (1993), and Moebius (1993). His influential essays have appeared in The L-A-N-G-U-A-G-E Book (1984) and The Politics of Poetic Form (1990).

ANGELOU, Maya (Marguerite Annie Johnson) (1928–), African-American autobiographical writer and poet, born in St Louis, Missouri, educated at Mission High School, San Francisco. She was largely brought up in Stamps, Arkansas by her paternal grandmother and in 1940 she rejoined her mother in San Francisco. In the 1950s she moved to New York, where she joined the Harlem Writers' Guild, performed in off-Broadway productions, and sang in night-clubs. Later she became an administrator at the University of Ghana, and editor of African Review. More recently she has been Reynolds Professor of American Studies at Wake Forest University in North Carolina. Best known for her five autobiographical books, the first and best-known volume, I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings* (1970), powerfully describes her childhood in the American South of the 1930s. Gather Together in My Name (1974) continues her story as an unmarried mother in post-war America. Singin' and Swingin' and Gettin' Merry Like Christmas (1976) highlights her activities in music, theatre, and dance. The Heart of a Woman (1981) focuses on her political activities, particularly with Martin Luther King and Malcolm X, and her short-lived marriage to Vusumzi Make, an exiled South African political activist. The final volume, All God's Children Need Travelling Shoes (1986), describes her sojourn in Africa. Angelou is also well known as a reciter of her own verse. Her collections include Just Give Me a Cool Drink of Water 'Fore I Diiie (1971), Oh Pray My Wings Are Gonna Fit Me Well (1975), and Now Sheba Sings the Song (1987). She also wrote plays, including The Last of These (1966) and Ajax (1974), adapted from Sophocles, as well as the screenplays of Georgia, Georgia (1972) and All Day Long (1974). The Inheritors (1976) is one of her many documentaries about African-Americans written for television. Her press and television interviews have been collected in Conversations with Maya Angelou (1989), edited by Jeffrey M. Elliot. See Dolly A. McPherson, Order out of Chaos: The Autobiographical Works of Maya Angelou (1991).

Anglo-Saxon Attitudes, a novel by Angus *Wilson, published in 1956. The novel concerns the excavation of a tomb in Suffolk, of the seventh-century Bishop Eorpwald, which has had a profound effect on Anglo-Saxon scholarship. Its central figure is Gerald Middleton, Professor Emeritus of Early Medieval History, who considers the discoveries to be fake, but for his own reasons has concealed this belief from the public. In late middle age he decides that this evasiveness must cease and embarks on a search for the truth, knowing that this will entail a scandal. The story is clearly based on the Piltdown affair and symbolizes the falsehood inherent in the British people's concept of themselves. Situations and people—including Middleton's wife, the idealistic and perverse Ingeborg, and her much-loved son Johnnie—are presented with brilliance and irony, which does not preclude the pathetic or the serious. With its large cast of characters and its complex plot, which serves both to introduce a wide variety of social milieux and to act as a metaphor for the book's concerns, the novel invites comparison with its Victorian counterparts, above all Dickens.

Anglo-Welsh Poetry; although Welsh poets have written work of note in English since the seventeenth century, the term 'Anglo-Welsh poetry' was not in general use until the late 1930s, when it was given currency by Keidrych Rhys's Wales, established in 1937, and The Welsh Review, edited by Gwyn Jones from its inception in 1939. Among the poets whose work they published were Idris *Davies, Hugh Menai, Glyn Jones, Alun *Lewis, Dylan *Thomas, and Vernon *Watkins. R. S. *Thomas, Raymond *Garlick, and Anthony *Conran were the principal Welsh poets writing in English throughout the 1950s, for whom The Anglo-Welsh Review, begun as Dock Leaves in 1949, provided a forum. The resurgence of Welsh nationalism during the 1960s gave rise to a period of heightened poetic activity marked by the founding in 1965 of Poetry Wales by Meic Stephens; Gillian *Clarke, Tony *Curtis, Robert *Minhinnick, Leslie *Norris, John *Ormond, and John *Tripp are among the poets who have been associated with the journal, which continues to appear. In 1980 Poetry Wales Press was formed and has produced many editions of poetry by Anglo-Welsh authors, latterly under the Seren Books imprint. The Cost of Strangeness (1982) by Anthony Conran is a critical survey of Anglo-Welsh poetry, anthologies of which include The Oxford Book of Welsh Verse in English (edited by Gwyn Jones, 1977) and The Bright Field (edited by Meic Stephens, 1991).

Angry Penguins, an Australian quarterly (1940–6), first edited by Max Harris (later joined by John Reed). It contained poetry and reviews of literature, jazz, film, and sociology as well as art reproduction, from painters such as Sydney Nolan and Arthur Boyd. Where poetry was concerned, the editorial rejection of existing national socialist canons, in favour of the influence of European modernism, was too brash for some tastes, and laid the journal open to the Ern Malley hoax, which effectively killed it. Two poets, James *McAuley and Harold Stewart, who professed themselves anxious about the gradual decay of meaning and skill in contemporary verse, concocted sixteen poems from a mass of printed material, drawn from a swamp drainage report, a dictionary, Shakespeare, and other miscellaneous reading matter, and submitted it to Angry Penguins as the work of a recently dead, unknown insurance salesman. Believing it to be a work of originality, the autumn 1944 number became a special issue 'To commemorate the Australian Poet, Ern Malley'. The hoax constituted a triumph for the anti-modernists which resounded internationally, and set back the influence of modernism in Australia for some time.

Angry Young Men, a term that, starting in the mid-1950s, was loosely applied to some of the younger, more alienated and abrasive British dramatists and novelists of the period, among them Alan *Sillitoe, John *Braine, John *Wain, and especially John

*Osborne. Though the expression is sometimes said to derive from the title of a work by the Irish writer Leslie Paul, Angry Young Man (1951), its probable inception was an offhand remark by George Fearon, the press officer at the Royal Court when Look Back in Anger* was first staged there in 1956. According to its author, Osborne himself, in his memoirs Almost a Gentleman, Fearon 'looked at me cheerfully as if he were Albert Pierrepoint [the state executioner] guessing my weight: "I suppose you're really an Angry Young Man".' The same catch-phrase, repeated to journalists, became 'a boon to headline-writers ever after'.

Animal Farm, a novel by George *Orwell, published in 1945. Orwell's most famous and widely read work, Animal Farm is a political fable that partly recounts, in an allegorical mode, the aftermath of the Russian revolution, and partly illustrates a belief in the universal tendency of power to corrupt. The major characters are all animals, who have overthrown their human masters to establish a collective farm run on egalitarian lines. Before long, a hierarchical power structure re-emerges, with the pigs forming a ruling élite. Their progressive detachment from the rest of the animals has the same alienating effect as the Bolshevik Party's leading role in post-revolutionary Russia. The pigs themselves divide into two factions, led by a Stalin-like Napoleon on one side, and a Trotsky-like Snowball on the other. The heroic sufferings of the Soviet peoples are reflected in the dedication of Boxer the carthorse, who is killed by his Stakhanovite workload, while the idiocies of political orthodoxy are satirized in the behaviour of the sheep with their repeatedly bleated slogan 'Four legs good, two legs bad'. By the end of the story, the pigs' regime has become more savage than the one it replaced, and the final betrayal of the revolution is expressed in the bewilderment of the starved and exhausted 'lower' animals: 'The creatures outside looked from pig to man, and from man to pig, and from pig to man again: but already it was impossible to say which was which.' The most effective writing in the book deals with the attempts of those in power constantly to rewrite history, to redefine what is true and what is false, and to revise the first principles of their political programme. The most memorable example of this tendency in Animal Farm is the pigs' reformulation of their original 'commandment', 'ALL ANIMALS ARE EQUAL', to read 'ALL ANIMALS ARE EQUAL/BUT SOME ANIMALS ARE MORE EQUAL THAN OTHERS'. The most controversial aspect of the writing is its tendency to simplify complex historical situations. Partly for this reason, it has been thought a text suitable for children, although Orwell was surprised to discover this, and when it was published went out to remove copies from the children's section in bookshops and place them on more appropriate shelves.

Anna of the Five Towns, a novel by Arnold *Bennett, published in 1902; in it he names and recreates the region portrayed in his best work. It is, in his own words, 'a study in parental tyranny' in its description of the struggles of young Anna Tellwright to resist her rich, miserly father, Ephraim. She boldly burns a bill of exchange to prevent the prosecution of defaulting tenant Willy Price, son of embezzler and suicide Titus Price, but the force of place and custom is too strong for her, and in the end she marries the respectable Henry Mynors. The novel's strength lies not in plot but in the detailed description of Sunday school meetings, financial obsessions, rent collecting, and provincial houses and furniture; and in its one passage of escape, when Anna takes a holiday on the Isle of Man.

Ann Veronica, a novel by H. G.*Wells, published in 1909. In this novel of suburban rebellion Ann Veronica Stanley, a 21-year-old science student, refuses to accept her father's authority, leaves home, and looks unsuccessfully for work in London. She becomes indebted to Ramage, a businessman who tries to take advantage of her innocence, and falls in love with Capes, a married biology instructor. Meanwhile, her female mentor Miss Miniver introduces her to the suffragette movement. She takes part in an attempt to storm the House of Commons, and is arrested and imprisoned. Once released, she declares her love for Capes and frees herself from her other financial and emotional entanglements. Wells claimed to have been the first popular novelist to portray a sexually aggressive heroine who 'fell in love, and showed it', instead of waiting for the man to make the first moves. Certainly the book caused intense controversy, partly fuelled by the air of scandal surrounding its author at the time of publication. The Spectator denounced it as a 'poisonous book' undermining the institution of the family. Ann Veronica played a part in the history of women's liberation, despite Wells's hostile caricatures of the suffragette leaders, whose aims he regarded as too narrow. Later feminists have looked somewhat quizzically at what the American critic Freda Kirchwey called Wells's 'Patented Feminism—Very Perishable'; but Ann Veronica's unaffected bluntness and her defiant rejection of the conventional forms of male domination and male posturing make this one of the most vibrant of propaganda novels.

Another Country, a novel by James *Baldwin, published in 1962. Considered by many critics to be Baldwin's finest mature work of fiction, the novel examines, from a variety of perspectives, the lives, destinies, and sensibilities of a group of characters linked by their love for the singer, Rufus. The tragic Rufus dominates the first few chapters, allowing Baldwin to comment on the effect of heritage and history—in Rufus's case, African-American—on the individual psyche. Rufus's unhappy love affair with a white Southern woman mirrors the racial tensions in society at large. His suicide forms the turning point of the novel, since it forces the other characters, women and men, hetero- and homosexual, black and white, to confront their conflicts and desires in search of release from the adversity of their mental and social circumstances. Among these characters are Rufus's sister Ida, her (white) lover Vivaldo, the writer Richard and his wife Cass, and the actor Eric. Baldwin's comprehension of emotions and their social production, the evocative power of his prose, and, above all, his portrayal of Eric—who unintentionally dominates the novel and, in his honest and positive acceptance of his homosexuality, serves as a catalyst for the conflicts of its other characters—combine to make it one of his most important and accessible works, with a relevance beyond the span of its time.

Another Time, a collection of poetry by W. H. Auden, published in 1940, his first after his move to New York in January 1939. In addition to work produced in England subsequent to Look, Stranger! (1936), the volume contained numerous well-known poems written after his arrival in the USA, among them 'In Memory of W. B. Yeats', 'In Memory of Sigmund Freud', 'The Prophets', and 'The Unknown Citizen'. The tonal, emotional, and imaginative range of the collection is considerable, reflecting the extensive revisions in Auden's thinking that took place in the late 1930s: the chilling ballads of 1937 ('As I Walked out One Morning', 'Miss Gee', among others), products of the failure of his political optimism, contrast radically with the warmly affirmative tone of the philosophical love poems, including 'Warm and Still Are the Lucky Miles', 'Heavy Date', and 'Law Like Love', written in 1939; the Christian existentialist position he had adopted after arriving in the USA is apparent in the clarity and confidence of statement exemplified by 'The Hidden Law' and 'Another Time'. The technical compass of the book is also remarkable; the new degree of freedom and flexibility evident in the poised conversational manner typified by 'Like a Vocation' (May 1939) co-exists with the virtuosity in the use of strict rhyming forms that is most apparent in 'The Riddle' (June 1939). The presence of 'Spain, 1937' and 'September 1, 1939', two celebrated poems Auden later discarded, adds to the extraordinary scope and richness of the book, which constitutes the most significantly transitional volume of Auden's career.

ANSTEY, F., pseudonym of Thomas Anstey GUTHRIE (1856–1934), British writer, born in London, educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and trained for the Bar. A prolific author of novels of humour and fantasy, he is best known for his first book, Vice Versa (1882), which was filmed by Peter Ustinov and televised; subtitled 'A Lesson to Fathers', the novel concerns a father, Mr Bultitude, who adopts the age and persona of his son (and vice versa) and suffers comically the tortures of a child at boarding school. From 1887 Anstey was associated with Punch, in which most of his comic sketches first appeared; these were subsequently collected in volumes such as Voces Populi (1890) and Mr Punch's Pocket Ibsen (1893). His stories and novels of *fantasy and *science fiction, including The Tinted Venus (1885), A Fallen Idol (1886), Tourmanlin's Time Cheques (1891), The Brass Bottle (1900), and In Brief Authority (1915), in which Anstey amusingly undercut the assumptions of his world, still give pleasure. The stories in The Black Poodle (1884) and The Talking Horse (1892) are similarly humorous. His autobiography, A Long Retrospect, appeared in 1936.

Antaeus, a literary periodical begun in Tangier in 1969 by Paul *Bowles in association with the publisher Drue Heinz and Daniel Halpern, who has remained its principal editor. The first issue, published in 1970, was followed by a further sixty prior to the appearance of the substantial and attractively produced Antaeus: Jubilee Edition in 1990. Among the authors of prose fiction whose work has been featured are Edna *O'Brien, Italo Calvino, Raymond *Carver, John *Fowles, V. S. *Naipaul, and William *Trevor; the poets contributing to the magazine have included W. H. *Auden, Joseph *Brodsky, Czeslaw Milosz, John *Ashbery, Seamus *Heaney, Yanis Ritsos, James *Merrill, and Derek *Walcott. Numerous special issues have concentrated on such topics as autobiography, letters, diaries, and nature writing. During its first two decades Antaeus established itself alongside the Paris Review* as a leading forum for international writing in English and the publication of important work in translation.

Anthologies; many anthologies of poetry defining the aesthetic or ideological standpoints of successive schools or movements have appeared in the twentieth century. Georgian Poetry* (1912–22) disseminated new work by young poets with the intention of revitalizing verse at a time when late Victorian reputations remained predominant. The Georgians, however, were identified with a moribund literary tradition by the Imagists (see IMAGISM), whose first anthology in 1914 formally inaugurated poetic *Modernism. Antagonism towards the Georgians was also expressed by the *Sitwells in annual editions of Wheels (1916–21), while Sir J. C. *Squire's Selections from Modern Poets (1921–34) defended the conservative position. Subsequent anthologies with an emphasis on innovation include Louis *Zukofsky's An 'Objectivists' Anthology (1932; see OBJECTIVIST POETRY) and Ezra *Pound's Active Anthology (1933). Michael *Roberts's New Signatures (1932) and New Country (1933) announced the political orientation of poetry in the 1930s and featured work by most of the decade's best-known British poets. Roberts also edited *The Faber Book of Modern Verse (1936), which introduced many of the century's most notable poets to a general readership. J. F. *Hendry's The New Apocalypse (1939) named a movement which repudiated the rationalism they saw as dominating the poetry of the day; two further anthologies maintained their ascendancy throughout the 1940s. Reaction against the extravagant romanticism of the *New Apocalypse was signalled by Robert Conquest's *_New Lines_ (1956), arguably the last of the pervasively influential anthologies, from which the *Movement emerged as a new poetic orthodoxy. Al Alvarez's _The *New Poetry_ (1962, revised 1966), which contested the claims of _New Lines_, and _A Group Anthology_ (1963), edited by Philip *Hobsbaum and Edward *Lucie-Smith, both featured numerous noteworthy members of the *Group. The pluralism which increasingly characterized poetry in English from the 1960s diminished the anthology's former importance as a means of asserting the centrality of particular movements. Blake *Morrison and Andrew *Motion, editors of _The Penguin Book of Contemporary British Poetry_ (1982), discreetly promoted *Martian poetry; _A Various Art_ (1987), edited by Andrew Crozier and Tim Longville, strongly espoused the work of seventeen poets chiefly associated with the British *small presses. There have also been many collections representing the poetry of regions and countries whose literatures are substantially in English, the following being notable among them: _Modern Scottish Poetry_ (1986), edited by Maurice Lindsay; _The Bright Field: An Anthology of Contemporary Poetry from Wales_ (1991), edited by Meic Stephens; _The Faber Book of Contemporary Irish Poetry_ (1986), edited by Paul *Muldoon; _The Heinemann Book of African Poetry in English_ (1990), edited by Adewale *Maja-Pearce; _The Faber Book of Contemporary American Poetry_ (1985), edited by Helen Vendler; _The Penguin Book of Caribbean Verse in English_ (1986), edited by Paula Burnett; and _The Golden Apples of the Sun: Twentieth Century Australian Poetry_ (1980), edited by Chris *Wallace-Crabbe. The impact of feminism and revised attitudes to homosexuality during the 1980s were reflected in numerous anthologies, including _The Bloodaxe Book of Contemporary Women Poets_ (1985), edited by Jeni *Couzyn, and _Naming the Waves: Contemporary Lesbian Poetry_ (1988), edited by Christian McEwen. Anthologies have been devoted to an extraordinary range of subjects and themes, love and war having been given recurrent attention; _The Penguin Book of Love Poetry_ (1974) and _The Oxford Book of War Poetry_ (1984), both edited by Jon *Stallworthy, are well-known examples.

ANTHONY, Evelyn (1928–), British novelist, born in London; she became a full-time writer in 1949. Among her early historical novels are _Imperial Highness_ (1953), on the life of Catherine the Great; the treatments of British monarchs in _Victoria_ (1959) and _Elizabeth_ (1960); and _Clandara_ (1963), which marked her work's departure from its firm grounding in historical fact. _Assassin_ (1970), the first of her numerous thrillers in modern settings, was followed by _The Poellenberg Inheritance_ (1972), _The Occupying Power_ (1973), and _The Grave of Truth_ (1979), each drawing on events in the Second World War. Her other publications include _The Tamarind Seed_ (1971), which was made into a successful film, and _No Enemy but Time_ (1987), centring on political tensions in Northern Ireland.

ANTHONY, Michael (1932–), Trinidadian novelist, short-story writer, and journalist, born in Mayaro, Trinidad. In 1954 he migrated to England where he later worked as a journalist for Reuters in London. During 1967–70 he and his family lived in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, where he worked as a diplomat, returning to Trinidad in 1970. His novels are very much about the day-to-day concerns of ordinary people, being particularly notable for their focus on childhood, and the child's viewpoint. Two of the best are semi-autobiographical: _The Year in San Fernando_ (1965), which plunges into the emotionally insecure world of a 12-year-old boy who works as a servant in the home of an occasionally cruel and thoughtless wealthy family; and _Green Days by the River_ (1967), about a boy who misses his father whom, like Anthony himself, he lost at an early age. Other novels include _The Games Were Coming_ (1963), _Streets of Conflict_ (1976), and _All That Glitters_ (1981). His collections of short stories include _Cricket on the Road_ (1973) and _The Chieftain's Carnival and Other Stories_ (1993). _King of the Masquerade_ (1979) is a children's novel. Journalistic works include _Profile of Trinidad_ (1975) and _Bright Road to El Dorado_ (1982). _The Golden Quest: The Four Voyages of Christopher Columbus_ (1992) is a historical study.

Antic Hay, a novel by A. *Huxley, published in 1923. Regarded at the time as an 'immoral' book as much for its intellectual irreverence as for its open depiction of sexual affairs, drug-taking, jazz clubs, and birth control, the novel made Huxley a hero to the younger generation of 1920s readers. The febrile atmosphere of the novel, set amongst post-war London's fashionable artistic bohemia, is indebted to _The *Waste Land_'s diagnosis of spiritual emptiness, in an era of dislocated social values and modernism in the arts. But there are also several comic, even farcical, episodes involving the main protagonist, Theodore Gumbril Jr; especially the Patent Small-Clothes (inflatable underwear) with which he hopes to make a fortune, and his adventures disguised as 'Toto', the Rabelaisian Complete Man. Huxley's satirical wit fixes upon outmoded Edwardian ideals, but also on the excesses of modern artists and scientists. The novel ends appropriately in futility: Gumbril and the Vamp Myra Viveash (resembling Nancy Cunard) taxi back and forth across London in a vain search for drinking companions, disillusioned by sensation-seeking and each other.

ANTIN, David (1932–), American performance poet, born in Brooklyn, New York, educated at New York University. Antin was already the author of several books of poetry, including one of the finest contemporary elegies, 'Definitions for Mendy', when he began experimenting with talks as the basis for making poems. Since 'Talking at Pomona' (_Talking_, 1972), he has not published conventional poems; instead he gives improvised talks for public audiences, and then uses tapes to create a revised version for publication. These performances enable him to make relations between speech and writing, writer and audience, composition and text, highly visible: 'I've never liked the idea of going into a closet to address myself over a typewriter what kind of talking is that?' Talk interests him because 'a new thing manifests itself in talking before it manifests itself anywhere else', and even 'the self itself is emergent in discourse' (his texts have no punctuation, and phrases are grouped together to indicate pauses for thought and breath). Like many of his contemporary New American Poets, he uses autobiography, without confessionalism, as the material for investigating the nature of the self. Antin became Professor of Art at the University of California, San Diego, and questions of aesthetics drawn from his wide knowledge of art history, linguistics, ethnography, and literature are prominent in the talks. His main collections include talking at the boundaries (1976), tuning (1984), and Selected Poems 1963–1973 (1991).

ANZALDÚA, Gloria (1942–), Chicana writer and poet, born in Hargill, Texas, educated at Pan American University, the University of Texas at Austin, and the University of California at Santa Cruz. Her approach to Chicana lesbian feminist studies was met with resistance at the academic institutions she attended in the 1980s. She and Cherrie *Moraga co-edited a breakthrough anthology of writings by feminists of colour entitled This Bridge Called My Back: Radical Writings by Women of Color (1981) which generated a great deal of interest in Third World feminism. In her major work, Borderlands/La Frontera (1987), a highly autobiographical text, Anzaldúa mixes literary genres and freely uses both Spanish and English to convey a sense of her Chicana identity and the Chicano people's cultural mestizaje, or blending. The book was highly acclaimed and within two years became widely taught at academic institutions across the USA. Making Face, Making Soul/Haciendo Caras: Creative and Critical Perspectives by Women of Color (1990) displays her continuing interest in a wide variety of feminist issues and her commitment to furthering the publication of works by women of colour. See LATINO/LATINA LITERATURE IN ENGLISH.

Apes of God, The, a novel by Wyndham *Lewis, published in 1930. The novel, a satirical roman-à-clef, established Lewis's reputation as the scourge of literary London and 'Enemy' of such circles as the *Bloomsbury Group and the *Sitwell coterie, whom he regarded as dilettantes and poseurs. Descriptions of Osbert and Edith Sitwell (Lord Osmund and Lady Harriet Finnian Shaw), Stephen *Spender (Dan Boleyn), and such literary luminaries as V. *Woolf, T. S. *Eliot, James *Joyce, Vanessa and Clive *Bell, Lytton *Strachey, Roy *Campbell, and Edwin *Muir, are portrayed with the savage humour and the eye for graphic detail with which Lewis has become identified. The work, which demonstrates Lewis's theory of the 'external' nature of satire at its most extreme, consists of a series of loosely connected set pieces; the plot, such as it is, follows the meanderings of the imbecilic and beautiful young poet, Dan Boleyn, from one encounter with fashionable literary London to the next, culminating in the satirical Walpurgisnacht of the final chapter, 'Lord Osmund's Lenten Party'. Dan's mentor, the sinister Horace Zagreus (whose liking for practical jokes owes something to Virginia Woolf's eccentric friend, Horace de Vere Cole), guides him from Bloomsbury tea-party to lesbian artist's studio to literary luncheon. Lewis himself appears only in absentia, as the much reviled writer, Pierpoint—named after the celebrated executioner—whose Nietzschean ideas on the role of the artist in society echo those expounded in Lewis's polemical work, The Art of Being Ruled. Despite the work's virtuosity and inventiveness, many readers have found the static, discursive nature of the narrative unrewarding.

Apocalyptic Literature, a term derived from a Greek verb meaning 'to uncover' or 'to disclose' a revelation, hence the title of the last book of the New Testament. The term refers to the end of the present world and the coming of the messiah's kingdom. There is a long tradition of Jewish and Christian apocalyptic writing, but the modern use of the term tends to focus on esoteric or secular endings, particularly those which come about by violence. Thus, *Yeats's poem 'The Second Coming' alludes to the turbulence associated with the end of a 2,000-year cycle, and much of the fiction of J. G. *Ballard can be described as apocalyptic, since it evokes a world threatened or already overwhelmed by nuclear devastation. There has been a strongly apocalyptic vein in *science fiction since the 1960s. F. *Kermode's The Sense of an Ending (1967), a chapter of which is called 'The Modern Apocalypse', discusses the implications for fictional narrative of linear views of history and of the images a culture finds for its always approaching end.

Apostles, The, a society founded for discussion and debate at Cambridge University in 1820 under the title 'the Cambridge Conversazione Society'. Because they were twelve in number and tended towards evangelical Christianity, the founding members became known as 'the Apostles'. In the course of the nineteenth century, the society developed into a forum for radical nonconformity and intellectual speculation. Under the presiding influence of G. E. *Moore, the society entered its most celebrated era in the early years of the twentieth century, when its membership included Rupert *Brooke, E. M. *Forster, Roger *Fry, J. M. *Keynes, Bertrand *Russell, Lytton *Strachey, and Leonard *Woolf. Ludwig *Wittgenstein was briefly an active member in 1912. The society was associated with the recruitment of Soviet agents during the 1930s, when Anthony Blunt and Guy Burgess were influential members. Lord Annan, Eric *Hobsbawm, Jonathan Miller, Karl *Miller, and Lord Rothschild are among the more recent distinguished Apostles. Membership of the society is by invitation and its procedures are traditionally cloaked in secrecy. Since the early 1970s women have been admitted. The Cambridge Apostles by Richard Deacon appeared in 1985.

Apple Cart, The, a play by G. B. *Shaw, first performed in Polish in Warsaw in June 1929 and in English at the Malvern Festival two months later. Set in the future, it mainly involves conflict between the astute and effective King Magnus and an inept and quarrelsome Cabinet ('like an overcrowded third-class railway carriage') in a Britain where the most powerful institution is a capitalist conglomerate, Breakages Limited, which suppresses every invention that would challenge its programme of planned obsolescence. Magnus argues that he stands above 'the tyranny of popular ignorance' and for 'the great abstractions, for conscience and virtue; for the eternal against the expedient; for the evolutionary appetite against the day's gluttony; for intellectual integrity, for humanity, for the rescue of industry from commercialism and of science from professionalism'. Nevertheless, the Prime Minister, Proteus, presses his ultimatum: if the king will not stop interfering in public affairs, the government will resign. After an interlude with his mistress Orinthia, who unsuccessfully urges him to renounce politics for a 'noble and beautiful life' with her, Magnus tells the Cabinet he will abdicate and run for Parliament, a prospect that frightens Proteus into withdrawing his ultimatum. The country may stutter on; but, in Shaw's anti-democratic view, only an individual with the capacity and courage of Magnus can stand up either to Breakages Limited or to an expansionist USA, which is threatening to annex Britain under the guise of rejoining the Empire.

Arcadia, a play by Tom *Stoppard, first performed and published in 1993. The action of this intricately plotted piece occurs in a mansion called Sidley Park in both the early nineteenth and late twentieth centuries, which allows the same room, often identically furnished, to be used for both periods. Half of the action concerns the Coverly family, in particular the adolescent Thomasina, an embryonic mathematical genius who stumbles on a Second Law of Thermodynamics, among other things. The other half is mainly concerned with the efforts of an academic, Bernard Nightingale, to prove that Byron not only visited the estate but was forced to flee Britain after killing a minor poet in a duel there. His thesis proves to be false, but its unravelling gives the piece much of its tension and, emphasizing as it does the unreliability of probability and the elusiveness of truth, some of its meaning. The overall theme, as befits a play occurring both during the Romantic period and at a time still assessing the implications of Chaos Theory, may be summed up as the breakdown of order: in physics and mathematics, in writing, in sexual mores, and, since Sidley Park is being replanned according to neo-Gothic principles, even in landscape gardening. The premature death of Thomasina, and the shattering effect she and her thinking have on her tutor Septimus, add a strongly emotional dimension to what is always a witty and intelligent comedy of ideas.

ARCHER, William (1856–1924), British translator and dramatic critic, born in Scotland, educated in Edinburgh; he served as a critic for The World, Tribune, and the Manchester Guardian, among other publications. However, his most important contribution to literature and the theatre was to introduce Ibsen to Britain and crusade for the acceptance of his drama. This task began in 1880, when his abridged version of The Pillars of Society was produced in London under the title of Quicksands, and culminated in the publication of his translation of Ibsen's works in twelve volumes, starting in 1906. Archer also wrote and edited numerous books on drama and the theatre, and had one play performed, a melodrama entitled The Green Goddess (1920).

Archetype, a term used to describe an original model, symbol, or theme, which recurs in literature, myths, ritual, fairy-tales, etc. Jung introduced the term into psychology to mean 'a pervasive idea, image or symbol that forms part of the collective unconscious' (OED, 1972 Supplement). It also finds its way into literature via the anthropological work of J. G. *Frazer (The Golden Bough, 12 volumes, 1890–1915) and Jessie Weston (From Ritual to Romance, 1920), who greatly influenced a number of *Modernist writers. Literary criticism with a Jungian slant has devoted itself to detecting archetypal figures such as those of the Divine Child, the Earth Mother, and the Enchanted Prince. Anthropological criticism interests itself in recurring cross-cultural patterns and stories, like rituals of fertility and tales of dying and reborn gods. Critical works reflecting these approaches are Maud Bodkin's Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934) and Northrop *Frye's Anatomy of Criticism (1957).

ARDEN, John (1930–), British playwright, born in Barnsley, Yorkshire, educated at Cambridge University and the Edinburgh College of Art; he briefly practised as an architect. His principal plays are Live Like Pigs (1958), about conflict between the 'deserving' and 'undeserving' classes on a housing estate; Serjeant Musgrave's Dance* (1959); The Happy Haven (1960), in which a group of old people rebel against their patronizing doctor; The Workhouse Donkey (1963), about a puritan police chief attempting to bring order to a corrupt Yorkshire town; Armstrong's Last Goodnight* (1964), which some critics view as Arden's best play; Left-Handed Liberty (1965), his portrait of King John and what he regards as the failure of Magna Carta; and the sprawling Arthurian epic Island of the Mighty (1972), written in conjunction with his wife, Margaretta D'Arcy. The Hero Rises Up (1968), about Nelson and Lady Hamilton, The Ballygombeen Bequest (1972), about Irish absentee landlordism, and other works are the fruit of the same collaboration. The theme of Arden's earlier work is the difficulty of coercing, constraining, or otherwise controlling the unruly human animal; at best it combines exuberance and colour with intellectual complexity and a refusal to countenance rigid moral absolutes. In the 1970s, however, Arden revised his dramatic beliefs, a process discernible in two radio plays, the autobiographical The Bagman (1970) and Pearl (1978), about a dramatist trying to forge links between anti-royalist factions in the seventeenth century. What he regarded as widespread social injustice decided him to write committed, polemic plays rather than the intellectually balanced ones for which he had become highly regarded. His first novel, Silence Among the Weapons (1982), was followed by several others, including Jack Juggler and the Emperor's Whore (1995).

Ariel, Sylvia *Plath's best-known collection of poetry, published posthumously in 1965. Although her preceding volume, The Colossus (1960), was accorded a favourable reception, the magnitude of her poetic talent was not apparent until Ariel appeared. Its forty poems, mostly in precisely cadenced stanzaic free verse, display remarkable technical assurance; an abundance of acutely vivid visual and tactile imagery gives substance to the directness of statement which forms the basis of much of the poetry. 'Lady Lazarus', strongly informed by her history of attempted suicide, and 'Daddy', a poem alluding to her father's death and her troubled marriage, are notable among the highly dramatic treatments of personal experience which led critics to classify Ariel as *confessional poetry. Psychological alienation is powerfully expressed by the estranging accumulations of imagery in 'Tulips' and 'Berck-Plage', two of the collection's most deeply disquieting poems. The feminist critique of social conformity implied at many points is clearest in the blackly humorous commentary on marriage in 'The Applicant'. Elsewhere, Plath writes with brilliant unconventionality of her responses to landscape, as in 'The Moon and the Yew Tree' and 'Letter in November', the latter approaching the purity of lyrical affirmation evident in 'Morning Song' and 'Balloons', poems deriving from her experience of motherhood. Unremitting imaginative energy confers a compelling unity on the collection's varied contents, making it one of the most memorable volumes of poetry to appear in the post-war era.

ARLEN, Michael, originally Dikran Kouyoumdjian (1895–1956), British novelist, the son of an Armenian merchant; he was born in Roustchouk, Bulgaria, but grew up in Britain from 1901 onward, and was educated at Malvern College and Edinburgh University. Having begun publishing his fiction as 'Michael Arlen' he assumed that name when he took British nationality in 1922. Edmund *Goose recommended the publication of The London Venture (1920), his first novel. His reputation as a leading novelist of the day was firmly established with The Green Hat (1924), one of the best-selling books of the 1920s; vividly descriptive and wittily mannered, its narrative of affluent hedonism, sexual liberation, and bitter disillusionment appealed strongly to the post-war Zeitgeist. The book's Mayfair setting and sophisticated social milieu were staple ingredients of his most characteristic work, which also includes the short stories of These Charming People (1923) and May Fair (1925) and the novels Lily Christine (1929), Men Dislike Women (1931), Hell! Said The Duchess (1934), and Flying Dutchman (1939). In the course of the 1930s his popularity declined. He lived on the Cote d'Azur from 1928 to 1939. Following his service with the Civil Defence during the Second World War he moved to the USA in 1945 where he worked as a writer of screenplays.

ARMAH, Ayi Kwei (1938–), Ghanaian novelist and journalist, born in Takoradi, educated at the University of Ghana at Legon, and at Harvard. He worked as a scriptwriter and teacher in Ghana, and was editor and translator for Jeune Afrique in Paris. His first novel, The Beautyful Ones Are not yet Born (1968), was a bleak, vitriolic attack on widespread corruption in Ghanaian life as he saw it, its title borrowed from a slogan on a 'mammy' wagon, or lorry like the type often used for electioneering purposes. Its fiercely scatological imagery appears to reflect the author's own Swiftian disgust at the broken promises of post-independence politicians. Fragments (1970) and Why Are We so Blest? (1972) are equally disillusioned, but less vitriolic. Two Thousand Seasons (1973) and The Healers (1978) display a more expansive historical vision, though still uncompromising in moral stance; the former deals with the depredations of Islam and Christianity against traditional African culture, with griot storytellers at the forefront of resistance, and the latter examines the consequences of the British invasion of Asante. See Robert Fraser, The Novels of Ayi Kwei Armah (1980).

Armies of the Night: History as a Novel, the Novel as History, The, a novel by Norman *Mailer, published in 1968. The novel is Mailer's on-the-spot report of the huge 1967 march on the Pentagon proclaiming against the Vietnam War, which plays off political protest against private satire and comedy. In exploring the relation of fiction to history, he employs a mode of fictionalized journalism known as the *'new journalism'. The novel has a strictly defined sense of place and time, and the effects which register on the participant-protagonist occur within the given historical facts. The occasional use of other names for the narrator suggests a variety of behaviour—the Ruminant, the Beast, the Existentialist, the Historian, the Novelist, the General, the Protagonist. This improvisation of identities is partly a stylistic device for variety, and partly Mailer's accommodation to the pluralism of American society. The power of the book lies in his analytical writing—his observations of the behaviour of the soldiers, the demonstrators, and his own. The book won a Pulitzer Prize in 1969.

ARMITAGE, Simon (1963–), British poet, born in Huddersfield, West Yorkshire, educated at Portsmouth Polytechnic and the University of Manchester. In 1981 he commenced work as a probation officer in Oldham. Following the appearance of several pamphlet editions of his verse, Zoom!, his first substantial collection of poetry, appeared to widespread acclaim in 1989. Kid (1992) and Book of Matches (1993), his principal subsequent volumes, established him as one of the most highly regarded poets of the day. The graphically documented engagement with a wide range of social and cultural issues that pervades Armitage's writing repeatedly reflects his experiences as a probation officer. His highly inventive verse is noted for combining remarkably deft technical accomplishment with a wittily robust conversational manner. His other publications include Xanadu (1992), which formed the basis for a broadcast in the BBC's 'Words on Film' television series.

Armstrong's Last Goodnight, a play by John *Arden, first performed in 1964. Set in the Scotland of the early sixteenth century and subtitled 'an exercise in diplomacy', it mainly concerns the conflict between Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, James V's tutor and chief herald, and Johnny Armstrong of Gilnockie. The former, 'ane very subtle practiser', undertakes to tame the latter, a wild freebooter whose cross-border raids are imperilling a precarious peace between the English and the Scots. Lindsay persuades the king to make Armstrong his warden and lieutenant, and copes as resourcefully as he can with the enmity his policies cause at court and elsewhere; but he reckons without the waywardness and destructiveness of Armstrong himself. As his secretary tells him, after being fatally stabbed by the fanatical evangelist whom Armstrong has installed in his castle, he 'can never accept the gravity of ane other man's violence'. The play ends with Lindsay not merely renouncing his determination to bring Armstrong 'intil the king's peace and order', but luring him to his death with a false promise of safe conduct. As often in Arden's work, reason proves insufficient when confronted with human complexity and human perversity.

ARNOW, Harriette (1908–86), American novelist, born in Wayne County, Kentucky, educated at the University of Louisville. Her writing career began with the publication of The Mountain Path (1936), followed by The Hunter's Horn (1949), the second volume of what was to be known as the Kentucky Trilogy. The Dollmaker (1954), the trilogy's final volume, remains her most celebrated work, and is widely considered a minor American classic; it tells the story of Gertie Nevels, who, when displaced from her rural home by her husband's migration to work in an urban factory, discovers a talent for whittling figures from wood. Compelled to create a masterwork—which may be an image either of Jesus or of Judas—Gertie nevertheless subjugates her natural gift in the cause of financial survival, producing, instead, cheap dolls for the mass market. Filmed for television in 1982 with Jane Fonda in the title role, the novel raises questions of feminism, creativity, and survival never quite equalled in Arnow's other works, which include the novels The Weedkiller's Daughter (1970) and The Kentucky Trace: A Novel of the American Revolution (1974).

Ascent of F6, The, the second and most successful of the dramatic works by W. H. *Auden and Christopher *Isherwood, published in 1936, the others being The Dog Beneath the Skin (1935) and On the Frontier (1938); all combine verse and prose. It was first produced in 1937 by the *Group Theatre, with music by Benjamin Britten. The narrative is based on Britain's imperialist interest in the conquest of F6, a mountain on the border between British Sudoland and Ostnian Sudoland; the natives of both parts of Sudoland hold F6 in superstitious awe, and will give their allegiance to the first colonial power to mount a successful expedition to the summit. Michael Ransom, the play's hero and a climber of great repute, is asked to undertake the ascent, but refuses until his mother prevails upon him. In the course of the climb all his party are killed; Ransom completes the climb to be confronted by a veiled figure on the summit, who is revealed to be his mother at the moment of his death. The work's satire on political and economic power centres on a group of stock figures who include Lord Stagmantle, a press peer, and General Dellaby-Couch, former military governor of Sudoland; Mr and Mrs A feature throughout as representatives of the general population in touch with events through the medium of the radio. Ransom's psychology is, however, a source of deeper interest in terms of the play's study of the oedipal dynamics of his heroism; it is the last of Auden's works to be dominated by the figure of the leader and, in Edward *Mendelson's interpretation, forms a renunciation of the culturally redemptive terms in which he had formerly conceived of his role as a poet.

ASH, John (1948–), British poet, born in Manchester, educated at the University of Birmingham. He was a teacher and research assistant from 1969 to 1975, and subsequently a lecturer and freelance writer, becoming domiciled in New York in 1985. Initially, his poetry took as its principal models the work of the French Symbolistes, with his responses to the American examples of Wallace *Stevens, John *Ashbery, and others proving formative in his writing's later development. His collections of poetry include Casino (1978), The Bed and Other Poems (1981), The Goodbyes (1982), The Branching Stairs (1984), Disbelief (1987), and The Burnt Pages (1991). An exuberance of aesthetic gesture in a context of wittily rendered urban realism is characteristic of the innovative and attractive quality of much of his poetry. He has also published, with Louis Turner, a work on tourism entitled The Golden Hordes (1976).

ASHBERY, John (Lawrence) (1927–), American poet, born in Rochester, New York, educated at Harvard and Columbia Universities. After working as a publisher's copywriter in New York, from 1960 to 1965 he lived in Paris. He wrote art criticism for various periodicals, including Art News, of which he became editor upon returning to New York. From 1974 to 1990 he was Professor of English at Brooklyn College, New York. His early collections of verse include Turandot and Other Poems (1953), Some Trees (1956), for which W. H. *Auden supplied a foreword, The Tennis Court Oath (1962), and The Double Dream of Spring (1970). With Kenneth *Koch, Frank *O'Hara, and James *Schuyler, Ashbery was a leading member of the New York School of Poets in the late 1950s; his poetry of the period exemplifies the movement's characteristic use of compelling visual imagery as the active principle in their work. Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror (1975) made him widely accepted as a poet of importance and initiated the preoccupation with long, thematically mobile poems which continued with Houseboat Days (1977), As We Know (1981), and A Wave (1984). Although Ashbery's work has been adversely criticized for its apparent evasions of paraphrasable meaning, its meditative qualities, sharply defined images, and communication of mood relate it to the lyrical and elegiac traditions of poetry. The flux of images and sensations suggested by many of his poems has been identified as an influence in the emergence of *Language Poetry. Selected Poems (1985, revised edition 1987) was followed by April Galleons (1987), The Ice Storm (1987), Flow Chart (1991), Hotel Lautreamont (1992), and And the Stars were Shining (1994). Ashbery's art criticism is chiefly collected in Reported Sightings: Art Chronicles 1957–1987 (edited by David Bergmann, 1989). His works for the stage, The Heroes, The Compromise, and The Philosopher, were published as Three Plays in 1978. A Nest of Ninnies (1969), a satirical novel parodying American suburban values, was written in collaboration with James Schuyler.

ASHBY, Cliff (1919–), British poet and novelist, born in Norfolk; he left school at the age of 14 to work as a window-dresser in Leeds. He was subsequently employed in a variety of agricultural and clerical capacities in Yorkshire and London. In the Vulgar Tongue (1968), his first collection of poetry, was followed by The Dogs of Dewsbury (1976) and Lies and Dreams (1980). Much of Ashby's poetry presents versions of his autobiographical and observational experience of the Leeds area with a compelling unsentimentality and documentary vividness. A dourly humorous disenchantment contributes to the remarkable levelness of tone common to harrowingly personal poems and scathing reflections on the spiritual bankruptcy of modern existence. Plain Song: Collected Poems appeared in 1985. His uncompromising concern with the quality of life is also evident in his two novels, The Old Old Story and How and Why, both of which appeared in 1969.

ASHDOWN, Clifford, see FREEMAN, R. AUSTIN.

ASHFORD, Daisy (1881–1972), British child author, born in Petersham, Surrey. She is primarily known for The Young Visiters, the short society novel which she wrote at the age of nine. The notebook containing the novel was rediscovered by her in adult life and sent by a friend to Frank *Swinnerton. Published in 1919 by Chatto and Windus, with its original misspellings and an arch introduction by J. M. *Barrie, it was an immediate bestseller. Its child's view of high society (dukes and earls having 'levies' in 'Crystall Pallace') and its heavily romantic plot make it an engaging and enduring popular work. It appeared in an illustrated edition with pictures by Ralph Steadman in the 1960s and was turned into a play in 1920, and into a musical in 1968. In 1965 Love and Marriage, which contained two stories by her and one by her sister Angela, also had some success.

ASHTON-WARNER, Sylvia (1908–84), New Zealand novelist and educationalist, born in Stratford, a small town in the farming area of Taranki, educated at Teachers' College in Auckland. An educational innovator who taught predominantly Maori children in small rural communities, such as Hawkes and Bay of Plenty, Ashton-Warner utilized her personal theory of a 'key vocabulary' as a means of releasing the creative energies of her students. Her attempt was to prize creative individuality amongst the most underprivileged, whom other teachers and educational administrators often neglected. She told the story of these endeavours in her first novel, Spinster (1958), and went on to produce a number of novels including Incense to Idols (1960), Bell Call (1964), Greenstone (1966), and Three (1971), all of which reflect the author's response to education, communication, and the restraints imposed by modern society. Her teaching experiences are recalled in Teacher (1963), Myself (1967), and Spearpoint: 'Teacher' in America (1972). An autobiography, I Passed this Way, was published in 1979. The story of her struggle to be taken seriously as both novelist and educator are documented in Lynley Hood's biography Sylvia! (1988).

Asian-American Literature is usually centred on the identities of Americans of Asian descent in the context of their immigration histories beginning in 1850 with immigrants from China. Japanese immigrants began to arrive in 1885, followed in the early 1900s by immigrants from South Korea, South Asia, and the Philippines. These periods of immigration occurred in response to shortages of labour in the USA and ended with legislative exclusion. In essays and in the stories collected in Mrs Spring Fragrance (1912), Sui Sin Far (Edith Maud Eaton, 1865–1914), the daughter of a British father and a Chinese mother, vividly describes the struggles of immigrant Chinese at a time when US exclusion, alien land, and miscegenation laws made them unwelcome. Carlos Bulosan's America Is in the Heart (1946) is another such classical representation, following Carlos, a Filipino immigrant, as he and other migrant workers struggle for social justice and acceptance during a time of nativist American hostility to Asian immigration.

Different immigration histories of national-origin communities give rise to writings reflective of cross-generational concerns and styles. Chinese-language poems written by immigrant Chinese on the walls of the Angel Island detention barracks (Island: Poetry and History of Chinese Immigrants on Angel Island 1910–1940, ed. Him Mark Lai and others, 1980), as well as Issei (first-generation Japanese-American) tankas, have been translated, and added to the archival 'canon' of Asian-American literature. Such heterogeneous representations help to overturn stereotypes of 'inscrutable' Asian-Americans. Three early Asian-American anthologies, Asian-American Authors (ed. Kai-yu Hsu and others, 1972), Asian-American Heritage (ed. David Hsin-Fu Wang, 1974), and Aiiieeeee! (1975), suggested that the 'melting pot' paradigm was inadequate to an understanding of Asian-American cultural identity. Influenced by the 1960s black civil rights movement, the editors of Aiiieeeee!, who later published plays (Frank *Chin, The Chickencoop Chinaman, 1981), novels (Shawn Wong, Homebase, 1979), short stories (Jeffery Paul Chan), and poetry (Lawson Inada, Legends from Camp, 1993), went further in adopting a cultural nationalist stance.

Drawn from different national-origin communities, memoirs were the favoured genre with immigrant and first-generation writers. Younghill Kang's The Grass Roof (1931), Pardee Lowe's Father and Glorious Descendant (1949), and Jade Snow Wong's Fifth Chinese Daughter (1950) satisfied an American audience's curiosity about the strangers in their midst. Japanese-American internment history has been a major source for memoirs, poetry, and other literary works (Monica Sone's Nisei Daughter, 1956; Jeanne Wakatsuki Houston and James D. Houston's Farewell to Manzanar, 1973; and Mitsuye Yamada's poems in Desert Run, 1988). Chinese- and Japanese-Americans began publishing imaginative literature in the 1950s (Diana Chang's The Frontiers of Love received critical notice in 1956), but South Asian, Vietnamese, Hmong, and other newer Asian-American groups have also begun actively publishing in multiple genres. Wendy Law-Yone's The Coffin Tree (1983) narrates a Burmese-American initiation into the USA; Li-Young Lee, an Indonesian Chinese-American, has published poetry (Rose, 1986) and a memoir (The Winged Seed, 1994), as has Malaysian-American Shirley Geok-lin *Lim (Among the White Moon Faces, 1996).

After the awards garnered by Maxine Hong *Kingston's memoirs, The Woman Warrior (1976), much Asian-American writing has received critical acclaim; among these are the plays of David Henry *Hwang (FOB and Other Plays, 1990) and Cathy *Song (Picture Bride, 1983); the poetry of Garrett Hongo (The River of Heaven, 1988), Amy *Tan (The Joy Luck Club, 1989), Bharati *Mukherjee (Jasmine, 1989), and Gish Jen (Typical American, 1991); the novels of Faye Ng (Bone, 1993), Hisaye Yamamoto (Seventeen Syllables, 1988), and David Wong Louie (Pangs of Love, 1992); and Wakako Yamauchi's stories (Songs My Mother Taught Me, 1994).

In works that treat Asian-American women's struggles against Asian and American patriarchal attitudes, race analysis operates simultaneously with gender analysis. Maxine Hong Kingston's The Woman Warrior is a complex series of narratives growing up in an asymmetrically gendered community. The anthologies The Forbidden Stitch (ed. Shirley Geok-lin Lim and others, 1989), Making Waves (ed. Asian Women United of California, 1989), Home to Stay (ed. Sylvia Watanabe and others, 1990), Our Feet Walk the Sky (ed. The Women of South Asian Descent Collective, 1993), and others contain writing protesting female subordination and male privilege.

Many Asian-American works still centre on heterosexual characters and focus on identity questions and ethnic community conflicts, among them widely taught works like Toshio Mori's Yokohama, California (1949), John Okada's No-No Boy (1957), Louis Chu's Eat a Bowl of Tea (1961), Bienvenido Santos's Scent of Apples (1979), Kingston's China Men (1980), and Kim Ronyoung's Clay Walls (1987). Many of these fictions are also regionally identified: for example, Okada's, Mori's, Kingston's, and Kim's narratives are set in ethnic-specific enclaves on the US West Coast, and Chu's novel in New York's Chinatown. Works written out of Hawaii, such as Milton Murayama's novel All I Asking for Is My Body (1975) and Lois-Ann Yamanaka's poems in Saturday Night at the Pahala Theatre (1993), expressing a strong island identity, exploit English registers and dialect resources.

Younger contemporary writers, like novelist Cynthia Kadohata (In the Valley of the Heart, 1993) and playwright Philip K. Gotanda (Yankee Dawg You Die, 1991), following on Kingston's tour-de-force novel Tripmaster Monkey (1989), experiment with postmodernist techniques of parody, irony, pastiche, and bricolage, challenge the interlocking categories of 'race', class, and gender, and include sexual identity as central to the themes of identity. Using similar techniques, Jessica Hagedorn's Dogeaters (1990), set in the Philippines, is a critique of US colonialism and the Marcos military regime, while celebrating Filipino cultural hybridity. Chang-Rae Lee's Native Speaker (1995) uses the devices of a thriller to depict the lives of Koreans in New York; the leading themes of the novel are language and identity. Many anthologies offer a range of poetry (Breaking Silence, ed. Joseph Bruchac, 1983; The Open Boat, ed. Garrett Hongo, 1993), fiction (Charlie Chan Is Dead, ed. Jessica Hagedorn, 1993), and drama (Between Worlds, ed. Misha Berson, 1990; The Politics of Life, ed. Velina Hasu Houston, 1993; Unbroken Thread, ed. Roberta Uno, 1993), and testify to the diversity of styles, genres, and voices underlining the vitality of Asian-American writing.

As I Lay Dying, a novel by William *Faulkner, published in 1930. Faulkner's fifth novel, and one of his greatest, it tells the story of Addie Bundren and the ordeals of her husband and children, after her death, as they transport her body in its coffin to the family plot in Jefferson, Mississippi for burial. In the course of their almost epic journey her husband, Anse, her children, Cash, Darl, Dewey Dell, Jewel, and Vardaman, and several neighbours and family friends all reveal their relationship with Addie. We learn that Jewel is her illegitimate son by the Reverend Whitfield, that her daughter Dewey Dell is pregnant and is seeking an abortion, and that Anse is looking for a new wife. Their journey is beset with various mishaps: in trying to cross a flooded river Cash's leg is broken (it is 'repaired' by being set in concrete) and the coffin breaks free and is rescued by Jewel; at another point they stop at a farm barn where Darl, struck by the absurdity of their ordeal, sets fire to the barn in the hope that this will cremate his mother's body, and, again, it is Jewel who saves it from the conflagration. Faulkner, who had a particular affection for As I Lay Dying, said that his intention was to subject his fictional family 'to the two greatest catastrophes which man can suffer—flood and fire', though critics have sometimes been more preoccupied by the narrative method he employs: the novel is told in a series of fifty-nine short interior monologues, most of them written in the present tense, which are shared among fifteen different narrators (there is no authorial point of view), including Addie herself, who speaks to us as if from 'beyond'. As a consequence, the reader is prevented from identifying with any one narrator, though Darl with nineteen sections is the most frequently used voice. The novel is notable for its fluctuations in mood and tone from the comic to the tragic. Of all Faulkner's early novels, As I Lay Dying most strikingly reveals his prodigious gift for a kind of grotesque comedy. See Faulkner's 'As I Lay Dying' (1973) by André Bleikasten.

ASIMOV, Isaac (1920–92), American author, born in Petrovichi, Russia; he grew up in New York, where he was educated at Columbia University. In 1949 he began his academic career at Boston University Medical School, where he later became Professor of Biochemistry. Throughout the 1940s his *science fiction stories appeared in American magazines. The 'Three Laws of Robotics', forbidding robots to harm human beings, which had wide influence over the fictional presentation of robots, were proposed in his celebrated story 'Nightfall', published in 1941. Much of his writing of the period was assembled into Foundation (1951), Foundation and Empire (1952), and Second Foundation (1953), a narrative of the decline and renewal of a civilization in the distant future. Also among the most notable of his earlier science fiction publications are the short stories of I, Robot (1950) and The Rest of the Robots (1964) and the novels The Caves of Steel (1954) and The Naked Sun (1957). Basing his lucidly written fiction in highly informed scientific speculation, Asimov was strongly instrumental in establishing the concept of variable futures as an essential of much science fiction writing. After producing comparatively little science fiction from about 1960 onward, he extended the imaginative ambit of his earlier work in numerous novels, among them Foundation's Edge (1982), The Robots of Dawn (1983), Prelude to Foundation (1988), and Forward the Foundation (1993). The Complete Stories appeared in two volumes in 1990 and 1992. The extraordinarily prolific Asimov published almost 500 works including science fiction, scientific works, histories, and writing in other genres. Magic (1996; stories and essays) appeared posthumously. In Memory Yet Green (1979) and In Joy Still Felt (1980) are autobiographies. See UTOPIA AND ANTI-UTOPIA.

Assistant, The, a novel by Bernard *Malamud, published in 1957. A naturalistic novel, it focuses upon a Jewish grocer, Morris Bober, whose attempts to eke out a decent living in a small shop in New York are constantly running into failure. The Gentile Italian small-time thief Frankie Alpine holds up the shop and then, stricken with guilt, returns to act as Bober's assistant. After a period of despising Bober's patient suffering, Frankie slowly adopts the grocer's role when Bober dies of pneumonia. Frankie falls in love with Bober's daughter, Helen, who is initially repulsed by him, and after a brief relationship, they part. Frankie appears to become a substitute for Bober's role as he undergoes a purification through pain and suffering. The novel describes a man who searches for expiation for his crimes, but actually only compounds his guilt. This sharpens Malamud's general focus on the definition of the Jew as a suffering human with a good heart. The novel also explores the collision between emotional bonds and cultural barriers in its representation of the tensions and ambiguous connections between the Jews and Gentiles in New York.

ASTLEY, Thea (1925–), Australian novelist and short-story writer, born in Brisbane, educated at the University of Queensland. She worked as a schoolteacher in Queensland and in New South Wales, then taught at Sydney's Macquarie University (1968–80). Her fiction shrewdly examines the vanities of social existence through a complex tension between perceptive and insensitive characters, and always with a wry humour and alertness to detail. Portraits of bigotry and destructive ill-will in small-town northern Queensland life are sobering in, for example, the novels A Descant for Gossips (1960) and A Kindness Cup (1974). In The Well-Dressed Explorer (1962) and The Acolyte (1972) she drew more generally on the all-consuming selfishness of the central characters. An Item from the Late News (1982), set in a dilapidated mining town, employed reference to myths ancient and modern in demonstrating Astley's talent for exploring situations in which individuals seek to preserve their identity in the face of collapsing social and religious values; Beachmasters (1985) charted the legacy of American presence in the Pacific during the Second World War. Hunting the Wild Pineapple (1979) is a collection of short stories; It's Raining in Mango: Pictures from a Family Album (1987) is a series of interlinked stories placing one family's development in the context of North Queensland's own. Reaching Tin River (1989), a new departure in her work, concentrating on the heroine's personal search for a mother, a father, and for herself, was followed by The Slow Natives (1990). The two novellas that form Vanishing Points (1992) are also linked by characters and theme; Coda (1994), a satirical view of old age, is a recent novel. The recipient of numerous awards, Astley was made a creative fellow of the Australia Council in 1993.

Athenaeum, The, a periodical devoted to literature, art, and science founded in 1828 by J. S. Buckingham, who was succeeded as editor in 1830 by Charles Dilke, under whose direction it became the best-selling weekly magazine of its kind. Charles Lamb, W. S. Landor, Thomas Carlyle, Robert Browning, and Walter Pater were among the contributors who established its reputation for the quality of its critical commentaries on literature, drama, painting, and music. The Athenaeum's most memorable period in the twentieth century was under John Middleton *Murry's editorship between 1919 and 1921, when T. S. *Eliot contributed some thirty-five items; work by Edith *Sitwell, Robert *Graves, Wilfred *Owen, Edmund *Blunden, and Aldous *Huxley was also published. In 1921 it merged with the Nation and continued for ten years as the Nation and Athenaeum; from 1923 it became a mouthpiece for liberal political opinion under the control of a group led by J. M. *Keynes. Leonard *Woolf was editor of its literary pages, which published writing by Virginia *Woolf, Lytton Strachey, Gilbert Murray, and Maxim Gorky. In 1931 a further merger with the New Statesman effectively marked the end of the Athenaeum. L. A. Marchand's study The Athenaeum appeared in 1941.

ATHERTON, Gertrude (Franklin, née Horn) (1857–1948), American novelist, born in San Francisco, educated in private schools in California and Kentucky. Atherton's reputation has grown increasingly, due to the critical preoccupation with American women's writing, and a renewed interest in the literature of the Far West. Her first work of fiction, What Dreams May Come, appeared in 1888 but her best work dates from the turn of the century. The Californians (1898) deals intelligently with the conflict of Anglo-Saxon and Hispanic culture; she also wrote what have been called 'society novels', among which are Julia France and Her Times (1912) and Black Oxen (1923). She was both prolific and successful, and in addition to works of fiction wrote California: An Intimate History (1914, 1927), three volumes of essays, and a volume of autobiography, Adventures of a Novelist (1932). She was elected a Chevalier of the Legion d'Honneur in 1925 and was president of the American National Academy of Literature in 1934. Atherton (1979) by Charlotte S. McClure is a critical study.

At Swim-Two-Birds, Flann *O'Brien's first novel, published in 1939. Graham *Greene, then a publisher's reader, recommended its acceptance, noting O'Brien's attempt 'to present, simultaneously, as it were, all the literary traditions of Ireland'. The book is strongly informed by the author's familiarity with Gaelic literature; The Madness of Sweeney, a long Middle Irish poem whose hero is cursed with peripatetic derangement, forms a basis for one of the principal dimensions of fantasy. Pastiches of numerous modern and traditional genres are central to O'Brien's methods. The experimental character of At Swim-Two-Birds shows the influence of James *Joyce, who eventually acclaimed the novel, while its fantastic aspects recall James *Stephens's writing. It is considered a work of *post-modernism avant la lettre for the textual reflexiveness and explication of the processes of fiction inherent in its stratified narrative: the first-person narrator is a Dublin student writing a novel in which an author named Trellis is working on a book using his technique of 'aestho-autogamy'; by this means Trellis's characters come to life and one begins his own novel in which Trellis is entrapped as a fictional creation. This ingeniously complex plot is handled with great dexterity and provides the means by which At Swim-Two-Birds achieves its enormous diversity and great range of tones. Dylan *Thomas stated in a review that the book 'establishes Mr O'Brien in the forefront of contemporary writing'; it did not, however, command a wide readership until its re-appearance in 1960.

ATWOOD, Margaret (1939–), Canadian novelist, poet, and critic, born in Ottawa, educated at the University of Toronto, and at Radcliffe College. After an early collection of poems, Double Persephone (1961), the highly acclaimed collection The Circle Game (1966) established Atwood as one of her generation's foremost Canadian poets, matched by a reputation as an outspoken feminist critic. Her first novel, The Edible Woman (1969), adopts the mode of social satire, refracted through the lens of feminism, in a tale of suppressed creativity, marital ennui, and eating disorders. Several volumes of poetry and prose followed throughout the 1970s, notably The Journals of Susanna Moody (1970), which foreshadowed the sombre, reflective mood and the obsession with Canada's landscape and heritage that fuels her controversial and seminal study of similar themes in Canadian literature, Survival (1972). Her second novel, Surfacing* (1972), locates this distinctive Canadian preoccupation in a unique and distinguished feminist fable. Lady Oracle (1976) is a diverting comic look at the self-fictions of romantic writers. Her fourth novel, Life Before Man (1979), established her as a major novelist with a wide canvas and an ability to organize plot and structure within the conventions of a domestic and social realism rewritten to accommodate her feminist critique. Though political, philosophical, and aesthetic ideas are relegated to the subterrain of the novel's predominantly social and psychological discourse, Atwood's subtle introduction of the impingement of remote Third World realities on the cushioned liberal Canadian consciousness reflects a crucial development in her œuvre. 'This above all: to refuse to be a victim', Atwood had written in Surfacing; this early credo effectively surfaces in the collection of poetry True Stories (1981), bearing witness to unspeakable acts of torture, brutality, racism, and despair, and in the bold, incisive novel Bodily Harm (1982), set in the Caribbean, which conflates feminist metaphors of body, gender, and sexuality with a powerful portrayal of the domination and manipulation of the Third World by the First. The powerful *The Handmaid's Tale (1986), and the quieter and more intimate Cat's Eye (1989), place Atwood among the finest contemporary writers in the English language. Among her other works are two collections of short stories, Dancing Girls (1977) and Bluebeard's Egg (1983); and a genre-defying collection of short poetic prose texts, Murder in the Dark (1984). A selection of occasional critical prose, Second Words (1982), provides a useful commentary on the author's aesthetic, her influences and working method, and her evolving political perspectives. Poems 1976–1986 appeared in 1992, as did Good Bones, a collection of prose fragments dealing with myth, memory, and imagination. The massive, multivocal, and controversial The Robber Bridegroom (1993) continued Atwood's wry and painful examination, commenced with Cat's Eye, of post-feminist gender politics; here, the life, disappearances and death of the seemingly malignant, destructive, and evil Zenia serve as the catalyst for three women's ultimate recognition of themselves.

AUDEN, W(ystan) H(ugh) (1907–73), British poet, born in York, educated at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1928 an edition of twenty of his poems was handprinted by Stephen *Spender, who, with Louis *MacNeice and C. *Day Lewis, was among his acquaintances as a student. The great stylistic originality of the collection owed much to his success in assimilating aspects of poetic *Modernism while retaining affinities with more traditional modes. He also completed the experimental verse-drama 'Paid on Both Sides: A Charade' in 1928; T. S. *Eliot accepted it for the *Criterion and, as a director of *Faber and Faber, undertook publication of Poems (1930, revised edition 1932). The volume included '1929', 'Consider', and other poems indicative of the political and psychological radicalism which Auden absorbed while living in Berlin in 1928 and 1929. *The Orators (1932) sustained the Modernist experimentation of 'Paid on Both Sides'; the work's theme of political extremism links it to numerous approximately contemporaneous poems included in Look, Stranger! (1936). The urgency with which he addressed the contemporary sense of imminent cultural crisis rapidly identified him as the leader of a group of poets noted for their work's commitment to socialism and the use of urban and industrial imagery (see PYLON SCHOOL). His political stance is also apparent from the Brechtian verse-dramas (see EXPRESSIONISM) he wrote for the *Group Theatre: following The Dance of Death (1933), a burlesque phantasmagoria denouncing bourgeois values, The Dog Beneath the Skin (1935), *The Ascent of F6 (1936), and On the Frontier (1938) were written in collaboration with Christopher *Isherwood. Having worked as a schoolteacher in Helensburgh and Colwall from 1929, in 1935 Auden moved to London and worked briefly with the GPO Film Unit. A trip to Iceland with MacNeice in 1936 produced Letters from Iceland (1937), a miscellany of verse and prose by both authors; while often highly entertaining, the book conveys a profound spiritual disquiet which becomes more distinct in Auden's work over the next two years. He went to Spain in 1937 to broadcast propaganda for the Republican cause; 'Spain 1937' was written upon his return. In 1938 he sailed for China with Isherwood to gather materials for a book on the Sino-Japanese war. Journey to a War (1939) resulted, Auden's most significant contribution being the sequence later collected as 'Sonnets from China'; the twenty-one poems indicate the increasingly philosophical and metaphysical tendency of his thought, which culminated in his return to the Church in 1939. In that year he emigrated to the USA and met Chester Kallman, who became his lover and remained his companion for the rest of his life. The poetry of Another Time (1940) demonstrated the increased imaginative scope to which he gained access in America. He became a US citizen in 1946.

The investigation of the historical and philosophical contexts of the Second World War in The Double Man (1941), published in Britain as New Year Letter (1941), marked the start of a series of long poems forming an ambitious exposition of his ethical, artistic, and religious beliefs. The title poem of For the Time Being (1944) combines a treatment of the Nativity with a stringent critique of modern cultural materialism; the volume also contained 'The Sea and the Mirror', his 'Commentary on Shakespeare's The Tempest', which includes some of his most opulently lyrical verse. *The Age of Anxiety (1948), the last of the long poems, forms a dramatic summation of the series. Having produced a libretto in 1941 for Benjamin Britten's Paul Bunyan (1976), in 1947 Auden began the first of numerous collaborations with Kallman when commissioned by Igor Stravinsky to write a libretto for The Rake's Progress (1951); their other operatic works include a translation of The Magic Flute (1956) and the libretto for Hans Werner Henze's Elegy for Young Lovers (1961). Nones (1951) contained 'In Praise of Limestone' and other poems drawing local imagery from the Italian island of Ischia, where Auden spent his summers between 1948 and 1957. The volume established the extraordinary technical, tonal, and thematic range of his later poetry. Subsequent volumes include *The Shield of Achilles (1955), Homage to Clio (1960), City without Walls (1969), and Epistle to a Godson (1972). Central to much of the work they contain is a concern to define the terms of a just and humane civilization; among the topics recurrently raised are the interrelations of man and nature, modern history, linguistics, religion, and various branches of science. In 1956 Auden became Oxford Professor of Poetry and in the following year bought the house in Kirschstetten, Austria, which is celebrated in About the House of 1965. He continued to spend part of each year in New York until 1972, when a cottage in the grounds of Christ Church, Oxford, became his alternative residence. His principal writings as a critic are The Enchafed Flood (1950), essays on the psychology and symbolism of Romantic literature; The Dyer's Hand (1962), a substantial collection of essays stating his conceptions of poetry and art in general; and Secondary Worlds (1968), a consideration of relations between artistic creation and the primary world of common experience. Edward *Mendelson is the editor of Collected Poems (1976) and The English Auden (1977), a comprehensive collection of his work up to 1939. Humphrey *Carpenter's W. H. Auden appeared in 1981. See also The Hidden Law: The Poetry of W. H. Auden (1993) by Anthony *Hecht, and Libretti and Other Dramatic Writings by W. H. Auden, 1939–1973 (1993).

AUSTER, Paul (1947–), American novelist, born in Newark, New Jersey, educated at Columbia University. His The New York Trilogy (1987) was widely praised for its *post-modernist deconstruction of fictional modes—in particular, that of the detective story—and for its lyrical and allusive style. The first novel in the series, City of Glass (1985), uses the detective story form to explore themes of identity and the relationship between words and meaning. The protagonist is a writer, Daniel Quinn, who, through a case of mistaken identity, becomes involved in a search for a missing person, who may or may not be about to commit a murder. Ghosts (1986) is a Borgesian fable involving two private eyes, each hired, unknown to himself, to watch the other. The final part of the trilogy, The Locked Room (1987), involves another writer-as-private-eye engaged by the wife of his best friend to track down her missing husband. New York, or a version of it, is also the background for the apocalyptic fantasy In the Country of Last Things (1987), in which the narrator, Anna Blume, searches for her lost brother in an urban landscape which disintegrates around her. Moon Palace (1989) is another fusion of modernist experimentalism with American myth, in which the narrator, Marco Stanley Fogg, searches for the truth about his own past. The Music of Chance (1990) broke free of the urban setting with a peripatetic novel in which the protagonist, a professional card-player, spends his life travelling across America. Leviathan (1992), another experimental work, was followed by Mr Vertigo (1994), which is set in the 1920s and concerns the significantly named Walter Rawley, a boy from a small Midwestern town, who joins a travelling fair and learns to fly. In this, as in his previous fictions, Auster blends *magic realism with actuality, never allowing the reader to forget that his main subject is the process of writing itself. Among his other works, which include translations from the French and several volumes of poems, are The Invention of Solitude (1982), a meditation on death focusing around the writer's memories of his late father and his relationship with his young son, and Ground Work (1990), a collection of poems and essays, which deals with many of the themes considered in his fiction.

AUSTIN, J(ohn) L(angshaw) (1911–60), British philosopher, born in Lancaster, educated at Balliol College, Oxford; he was White's Professor of Moral Philosophy at Oxford from 1952 until his death. A writer and lecturer of uncommon wit and style, Austin's characteristic approach involved applying the rigour of classical textual scholarship to 'ordinary language'. During his lifetime, his work was mostly disseminated through a few learned papers (notably 'Other Minds' and 'A Plea for Excuses') and through his teaching. In Sense and Sensibilia (1962), Austin argued with great cogency against the fashionable 'sense-data' theory associated with A. J. *Ayer and the logical positivists. In examining how we talk about the world rather than whether or not we perceive it, Austin moved philosophy much closer to linguistics, and in his most widely read book, How To Do Things with Words (1962), he offered a series of important distinctions to be found within conventional usage. For Austin, as for John *Searle, language could be functional or performative as well as descriptive (or 'constative'). The performative utterance is an 'illocutionary' act, whereas the constative utterance is a 'locutionary' act. In developing these fine distinctions, Austin displayed the sensitivity of a subtle literary critic, and undermined the assumptions of much contemporary British philosophy. His stimulating essays appeared in Collected Papers (1961).

AUSTIN, Mary (Hunter) (1868–1934), American novelist, born in Carlinville, Illinois, educated at Blackborn College. In 1888 she moved to California to live on the fringes of the Mojave Desert, where she remained for over twenty years. The Land of Little Rain (1903) and The Flock (1906) vividly celebrate the region's landscape and indigenous culture, which pervade the historical novel Isidro (1905) and the short stories of The Basket Woman (1904) and Lost Borders (1909). From 1910 to 1923 she moved between Carmel, California, and New York; her political involvements of the period are reflected in the novel No. 26 Jayne Street (1920). She subsequently lived in Santa Fe, New Mexico, producing studies of Native American culture in the Southwestern deserts which include The American Rhythm (1923), a treatise on Native American poetry, and Children Sing in the Far West (1928), an anthology of songs and children's rhymes; The Arrow Maker (1911), her principal play, concerns a female Native American shaman. Her other novels include Santa Lucia (1908), A Woman of Genius (1912), and The Ford (1917). The mystical sensibility that becomes predominant in later works unites memorably with her love of the desert landscape in Starry Adventure (1931), her last novel. Among her numerous other publications are The Green Bough (1914) and Small Town Man (1925), novels propounding radical views of Christ, and her highly regarded autobiography Earth Horizon (1932). I-Mary (1983) is a biography by Augusta Fink.

Australian Literary Studies, a biennial journal originally conceived in 1963 by James *McAuley (then Reader in Poetry at the University of Tasmania) as a forum for specifically scholarly writing on Australian literature. The founding editor was L. T. Hergenhan with whom ALS moved from the University of Tasmania to the University of Queensland in 1975. Widely acknowledged work on the history of Australian literature has been accompanied by careful attention to current writing with essays on living authors in each issue. 'Notes and Documents', recording small, preliminary items of research, and a number of reviews, are regular features. The journal makes a major contribution to sustaining scholarship with an annual bibliography of Australian literary studies, primarily based upon the records of the Fryer Memorial Library, in the University of Queensland.

Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, The, an autobiography by Gertrude *Stein, published in 1933. The autobiography, written as though the author were her private secretary, Alice B. Toklas (also her lifelong companion and lover), is important not so much for what it tells us about Gertrude Stein's life as for its evocation of American expatriate life in Paris and its occasionally philosophical commentary on twentieth-century culture. Unlike some of Stein's experimental prose writings, such as Tender Buttons (1914) and The Making of Americans (1925), The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas is written in a relatively simple and direct manner and was very popular during her lifetime, although its treatment of certain figures provoked an attack from other Parisian writers and artists in Testimony Against Gertrude Stein (1935). A 'sequel', Everybody's Autobiography, was published in 1937. Ernest *Hemingway, who knew Stein in Paris and helped her type the manuscript of The Making of Americans, writes somewhat dismissively of her in A Moveable Feast (1964).

AVISON, Margaret (Kirkland) (1918–), Canadian poet, born in Galt, Ontario, educated at the University of Toronto, where she began working in administrative capacities in 1945. In 1968 she joined the staff of an evangelical mission in Toronto. Winter Sun (1960), her first volume of poetry, was widely acclaimed for the assured suppleness with which she sustained imaginative interactions of factual detail and abstract meditation. The bleakness of post-war modernity was conveyed by the tone and imagery of numerous lyrical explorations of psychological and existential uncertainties. A less complex, though sometimes intimidatingly minimal idiom was apparent in The Dumbfounding (1966), the title poem of which affirmed her exalted acceptance of the Christian faith. Sunblue (1978) consolidated the devotional tendency of her verse. Much of her work is characterized by the vivid economy and clarity of its imagery, a resource she has termed the 'optic heart' of her poetry. Selected Poems appeared in 1991. Her other works include the prose study History of Toronto (1951) and the translations of modern Hungarian poetry in The Plough and the Pen (with Ilona Duczynska and Karl Polanyi, 1963).

AWOONOR, Kofi, formerly known as George Awoonor WILLIAMS (1935–), Ghanaian poet and novelist, born at Wheta in the Volta Region, educated at the University of Ghana. Before moving to London in 1967, he was Director of the Ghana Film Corporation. He taught both at the University of London, and at the Stony Brook campus of New York State University, where he became Chairman of Comparative Literature. On release from prison for an alleged connection with an attempted coup, he became Professor of English at Cape Coast in 1976. His literary reputation rests chiefly on the poems in Rediscovery (1964) and Night of My Blood (1971), both of which adapt techniques from poetry by Ewe dirge singers to explore the modern African psyche. His translations of Ewe poetry, much of it sombre and tragic in tone, appear in Guardians of the Sacred Word (1974). Richly imagistic in texture, and politically allegorical, his novel This Earth, My Brother: An Allegorical Tale of Africa (1970) focuses on the search for meaning by a lawyer on the brink of a nervous breakdown. Other poetry collections include Ride Me, Memory (1973) and The House by the Sea (1978). The Breast of the Earth (1975), a major work of criticism, surveys the history, culture, and literature of Africa south of the Sahara.

AYCKBOURN, Alan (1939–), British playwright, born in London, the son of a musician and (his mother having remarried) stepson of a bank manager. He spent his formative years 'plumb centre of where I write about now', in company flats in small towns in south-east England. After working as an actor, he had four plays produced at the Theatre-in-the-Round in Scarborough, where he became artistic director in 1971 and where he presents the premières of almost all his new work. His first substantial success, the farce Relatively Speaking (1967), has been followed by transfers to London almost every year. Among the plays which have made him the most commercially successful contemporary British dramatist, as well as one of the most critically respected, are: Time and Time Again (1971), about a young man misused by women and by his insensitive brother-in-law; Absurd Person Singular* (1972), which involves social mobility and personal change, and is set in three kitchens on three consecutive Christmas Eves; The Norman Conquests (1973), three self-sufficient plays showing the events of a fraught family weekend from the stance of different rooms in the same house; Absent Friends (1974), a comedy about the impact of a recently bereaved young man on unhappily married friends; Bedroom Farce (1975), another play about marital pains and confusions; Just Between Ourselves (1976), about a woman reduced to catatonic insensibility by her husband and envious mother-in-law; Joking Apart (1978), about the ability of the happy and successful to damage those around them; Sisterly Feelings (1979), a comedy about sibling rivalry, and also a play of chance and permutations, since the cast is required to play alternate scenes, depending on the fall of a coin tossed at the beginning; Way Upstream (1981), about events on a cabin cruiser hijacked by a modern pirate in the Norfolk Broads; A Chorus of Disapproval (1984), about the destruction unwittingly wreaked by a newcomer to an amateur operatic society; Woman in Mind (1985), another tale of a woman who retreats into hallucination and fantasy rather than face her unpleasant family; A Small Family Business (1987), about a respectable company which turns for profit to the drug trade; Man of the Moment (1988), a critique of media people who have made a bank robber a celebrity while relegating to obscurity the hero who disarmed him; The Revengers Comedies (1989), a picture of emotional destruction, distantly indebted to the Jacobeans, large enough to need two linked plays; Wildest Dreams (1991), about a group of suburbanites who escape from their drab existences by playing the fantasy-game Dungeons and Dragons; Time of My Life (1991), involving the disillusioning events that follow, and the ironically hopeful ones that precede, a cataclysmic family celebration; Communicating Doors (1994), a comedy-thriller which starts in the war-torn London of 2014 and concerns a prostitute who travels back through time in hopes of preventing a series of murders, including her own; and A Word from Our Sponsor (1995), another futuristic piece, this time centring on the havoc wreaked by a devil who agrees to finance and direct a nativity play.

As this description should show, Ayckbourn's work is notable for an adventurousness unusual in a popular playwright, and extending to both form and content. He enjoys setting himself tricky stylistic tasks, as in How the Other Half Loves (1969), where two living rooms co-exist on a single set, so that characters have only to swivel their chairs to participate in consecutive dinner parties. More importantly, his artistic aspiration is to 'write a completely serious play that makes people laugh all the time'. Accordingly, his comedies tend to be pessimistic in tone, and to treat harsh and even sombre subjects, among them domestic strife, conscious and unconscious cruelty, madness, and death, usually in a suburban middle-class setting. A good example of his methods would be the second act of Absurd Person Singular, in which a distraught wife, sick of her husband's adulteries, attempts to poison, gas, knife, electrocute, drown, and defenestrate herself, only to have each action amiably misinterpreted by helpful friends. Though Ayckbourn's later work has taken on a greater social and political edge, it is personal trouble and disaster which have characterized his most effective writing.

AYER, A(lfred) J(ules) (1910–89), English philosopher, born in London, educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford; he also spent some time at the University of Vienna. He lectured at Oxford from 1933, became Grote Professor of the Philosophy of Mind and Logic at University College, London, in 1946, and Wykeham Professor of Logic at Oxford in 1959. His highly influential first book, Language, Truth and Logic (1936), offered a synthesis of the logical positivist ideas of the Vienna Circle and more traditional British linguistic analysis. Combining the sceptical intelligence of his tutor Gilbert *Ryle with the logical austerity of Rudolf *Carnap, Ayer zestfully demolished the notion that philosophy was engaged in identifying and disseminating arcane metaphysical truths about some transcendent reality, and so helped to set the terms of reference for the academic study of philosophy in Britain for the next fifty years. In debate with critics such as J. L. *Austin, much of Ayer's subsequent work sought to reconstruct the possibilities of rigorously empirical knowledge. Ayer maintained his forceful presence in British academic life in works such as The Foundations of Empirical Knowledge (1940), Thinking and Meaning (1947), The Problem of Knowledge (1956), and The Concept of a Person (1964). In later years Ayer turned to belles-lettres with two frank volumes of autobiography and brief studies of Voltaire, Thomas Paine, Hume, and *Wittgenstein.

AYRES, Pam (1947–), British poet, born in Stanford-in-the-Vale, Oxfordshire; upon leaving school at 15, she entered the Civil Service and afterwards served in the Women's Royal Air Force for four years, where she discovered her talent to amuse. After readings of her light verse on Radio Oxford and an appearance on the television programme Opportunity Knocks in 1975, she rapidly became highly popular for her wryly self-effacing style. Some of Me Poetry appeared in 1976, followed by Some More of Me Poetry (1976) and Thoughts of a Late-Night Knitter (1978), which together made up All Pam's Poems (1978), illustrated by Roy Garnham Elmore. Further volumes include The Ballad of Bill Spinks' Bedstead (1981) and The Works (1992; selected poems). Among her numerous children's books are Bertha and the Racing Pigeon (1979) and The Crater (1992). The remarkable popularity of her broadcast poetry and the considerable degree of celebrity thus generated resulted in sales of over two million copies of her books by 1981. Ballad idioms and other comic or burlesque forms are used with facility for her often humorously narrative poetry, which sometimes accommodates a compassionate perception of social events or the circumstances of birds and animals.

B

Babbitt, a novel by Sinclair *Lewis, published in 1922. The novel created a major controversy with its uncompromising assault on American virtue. The stereotypical, moral, small-town American businessman George Babbitt epitomizes the ethos of the Midwestern city Zenith. The first seven chapters retain Lewis's original idea to follow Babbitt through the events of one day. Subsequent chapters present set pieces which provide a sociology of middle-class American life, dealing with such topics as politics, leisure, club life, trade association conventions, conventional religion, labour relations, marriage and the family, the barbershop, and the speakeasy. There is little plot to unite these fragmentary interests, apart from Babbitt who moves through these chapters in the course of his rising discontent with the mores of his world. Various separate narratives include Babbitt's friendship with Paul Riesling, the one-time artist who is imprisoned after he shoots his wife; Babbitt's attempt to find sympathy in a liaison with Tanis Judique and 'the Bunch'; and Babbitt's final involvement with liberalism, and the Good Citizen League. The novel depicts an individual trapped in a stifling environment, who struggles for something better, but ultimately fails, and sinks back into compromising conformity. The final suggestion is that the humanist values of love and friendship are the only answers to Babbitt's problems.

BABBITT, Irving (1865–1933), American critic, born in Dayton, Ohio, educated at Harvard, where he held a professorship from 1912 until his death. The vigorous defence of the humanities in Literature and the American College (1908), his first major work, proved controversial for its harsh critique of the ethos of scientific progress which prevailed in American universities. The breadth of his cultural interests was passed on to his students through his courses in comparative literature, which ranged through classical, European, and Oriental materials. His emphasis on the ethical dimensions of literary studies was central to the emergence of the *New Humanism. Babbitt's philosophy was largely based on his view of Romanticism as a cultural aberration, responsible for the 'moral impressionism' of modern materialism with its worship of 'the quantitive life'; The New Laokoon (1910) argued that the arts had been reduced to a condition of moral anarchy by Romanticism, upon which a scathingly lucid attack was mounted in Rousseau and Romanticism (1919). T. S. *Eliot, who undertook postgraduate study with Babbitt in 1909, was deeply impressed by his ideas; the two exchanged letters until Babbitt's death. His other works include Masters of Modern French Criticism (1912), in which his conception of the cultural interactions of the past and the present foreshadow Eliot's 'Tradition and the Individual Talent'; and Democracy and Leadership (1924), an expression of his belief in a firmly regulated socio-cultural order. Spanish Character (1940) is a selection of his essays edited by F. Manchester and O. Shepard, the editors of Irving Babbitt: Man and Teacher (1941), a collection of memoirs and tributes.

Back to Methuselah, a play by G. B. *Shaw, first performed in 1922; it is its author's most complete dramatization of his theory of 'creative evolution'. Subtitled 'a metabiological pentateuch', it opens in the Garden of Eden, where Eve is confronted with a serpent who teaches her the facts of life and death and shares its evolutionary hopes: 'You imagine what you desire, you will what you imagine, and at last you create what you will.' After an episode involving Cain, pioneer of destruction and fake heroism, the action shifts to 1920. Lubin and Burge, parodies of Asquith and Lloyd George, come to discover whether there is party advantage in the new 'gospel' of Franklyn and Conrad Barnabas, brothers who believe that 'life is too short for man to take it seriously', that disasters such as the First World War will be avoided only if man learns wisdom by going 'back to Methuselah', and that creative evolution will be 'the religion of the 20th century', leading eventually to 'omnipotence and omniscience'. Then it is AD 2170, and 'the thing happens': the Barnabases' local vicar reappears as an archbishop who, like their parlourmaid, has lived nearly 300 years. The next section of the play occurs in AD 3000 and is set in an Ireland which, like the rest of Britain, is occupied by 'long-livers' who are currently considering whether to exterminate more ordinary beings. In their enlightenment, they treat with derision those representatives of the British Commonwealth, among them the Prime Minister and his conventionally minded father-in-law, who come from its headquarters in Baghdad to seek advice on the petty electoral matters that still absorb them. The play then leaps forward 'as far as thought can reach', to the year 31,920, when humans emerge as fully grown adolescents from eggs, absorb themselves for four years with love, the arts, and other supposed frivolities, and then develop into 'ancients', sexless, ascetic creatures who spend the rest of their very long lives in contemplation and wish only to escape from their bodies. Finally, the creator, Lilith, prophesies another stage in evolution, with life becoming pure intelligence and energy, 'a vortex freed from matter'. The play, though obviously difficult to take seriously on a literal level, contains plenty of lively observation, and remains of interest for the light it sheds both on Shaw's growing disenchantment with democratic politics and on his Manichaean mistrust of sense, feeling, and human relationships.

BAGNOLD, Enid (Algerine) (1889–1981), British novelist and playwright, born in Rochester; she spent her childhood in Jamaica, and was educated at Prior Field, Godalming, a progressive English boarding school. She became a student of Walter Sickert and later worked as a journalist for Frank *Harris with whom she had an affair. A Diary Without Dates (1917), recording her experiences as an ambulance driver during the First World War, formed the background of her first novel, The Happy Foreigner (1920). In 1920 she married Sir Roderick Jones, Chairman of Reuters, and established an artistic salon which included Gaudier Brzeska, H. G. *Wells, Vita *Sackville-West, and Rudyard *Kipling. Her children's book National Velvet (1935) became a classic after it was filmed in 1944 with Elizabeth Taylor playing the role of the girl who wins the Grand National on a horse that she won in a raffle. Other novels include The Squire (1928), about a stoic mother awaiting the birth of her fifth child while her husband is abroad; Serena Blandish (1924), which was adapted for the stage by S. N. *Behrman; and The Loved and Envied (1951), whose central character is based on Lady Diana Cooper. Her dramatic works include Lottie Dundass (1943), Poor Judas (1951), and The Chinese Prime Minister (1964); but none scored the success of The Chalk Garden (1955), about a mysterious governess with a criminal past who rescues a troubled girl from a sterile life with her eccentric grandmother. This was described by Kenneth *Tynan as perhaps 'the finest artificial comedy to have flowed from an English . . . pen since the death of Congreve'. Her autobiography appeared in 1964 and in 1976.

BAIL, Murray (1941–), Australian novelist, born in Adelaide. He lived in Britain, Europe, and India for several years and was a contributor to the Times Literary Supplement* amongst other literary journals. The stories collected in Contemporary Portraits and Other Stories (1975), republished as The Drover's Wife and Other Stories (1986), were experimental in style and satirical in theme; the title story of the latter volume is a parody of Henry *Lawson's nationalist realist story 'The Drover's Wife'. Bail's first novel, Homesickness (1980), is a surreal and blackly comic examination of a group of Australians on a package tour to Europe. Holden's Performance (1987), again an idiosyncratic combination of slapstick and social commentary, charts the hero's rise in Australian society, through a mixture of luck and bizarre coincidence, to the eminent position of bodyguard to the Prime Minister. He has published a writer's notebook, Longhand (1989), and edited The Faber Book of Contemporary Australian Short Stories (1988).

BAILEY, H(enry) C(hristopher) (1878–1961), British writer of *detective fiction, born in London, educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He was drama critic, war correspondent, and leader writer for the London Daily Telegraph from 1901 to 1946. Between the two world wars he published a large number of detective short stories and novels, which enjoyed great popularity in their day, but which have since been largely forgotten. His best-known detective is the indolent gourmet Dr Reggie Fortune, who appears chiefly in short stories—Call Mr Fortune (1920) is the first collection—of which the earlier are to be preferred, but is also the central character in several novels: The Bishop's Crime (1940) is perhaps the best. Bailey's novels about Joshua Clunk, a crooked solicitor, are less successful (Garstons, 1930).

BAILEY, Hilary (1936–), British novelist, short-story writer, and critic, born in Kent, educated at Newnham College, Cambridge. Her short stories have been published in magazines ranging from Science Fantasy to Bananas*, and she edited New Worlds* from 1973 to 1975. Her first novel, Polly Put the Kettle On (1975), was a lively portrait of the 1960s; a sequel, As Time Goes By (1988), brings its characters into the 1980s. Amongst other novels are Mrs Mulvaney (1975), set in the 1970s; All the Days of My Life (1984), a family saga focusing on Molly Flanders; and Hennie Richards (1985), whose protagonist is an international female smuggler. Her formidable storytelling ability is combined with a technique in which contemporary historical events, such as the downfall of the Kray brothers and the bombing campaigns of the Angry Brigade, are incorporated into the narrative. The Cry from Street to Street (1992), a fictionalized documentary account by an ex-prostitute, is set in the London of Jack the Ripper; Cassandra: Princess of Troy (1993) retells the myth of the Trojan War, while in The Strange Adventures of Charlotte Holmes (1994) Bailey returns to Victorian crime in a novel that challenges the status of her heroine's brother, the famous detective Sherlock Holmes. Subsequent novels include Frankenstein's Bride (1995). Her non-fiction work includes her biography of Vera *Brittain of 1987.

BAILEY, Paul (born Peter Harry) (1937–), British novelist and critic, born in London, and trained as an actor. He earned critical recognition for his first novel, At the Jerusalem (1967), a poignant and lively study of old people in a private institution. Trespasses (1970) followed, in which Bailey explores the disintegration of the persona under the pressures exerted by social conventions. Formally, Trespasses is mimetic of the fractured condition that is its theme, consisting of fragments which eventually coalesce. A Distant Likeness (1973) continues this fictive method in its presentation of a criminal sleuth haunted by the horrors and pathos of the cases he deals with. In Peter Smart's Con- fessions (1977) there is a greater autobiographical element with the protagonist sharing his experience of the theatre; it is both bold and sensitive about homosexuality. Old Soldiers (1980) gives the subject of the split personality a more fully realized social context. Gabriel's Lament (1986) is a large-scale novel, narrated in both the first and the third person, and presents the central character's coming to terms with tragic truth. Sugar Cane (1993) is narrated by a female doctor in a genito-urinary clinic who develops a special interest in a young black patient; the narrative uncovers a background of young rent-boys and the shocking realities of AIDS. Bailey's work is often described as Dickensian, but this is to miss the essentially *post-modernist nature of his art, his literary absorption in twentieth-century writers such as I. B. *Singer, Flannery *O'Connor, and the Italian Giorgio Bassani, all of whom he admired for their ability to set characters in cultures under threat. A lively humour pervades his autobiography, An Immaculate Mistake (1990), not least where his own honestly presented sexuality is concerned. Bailey is also the editor of The Oxford Book of London (1991).

BAINBRIDGE, Beryl (1934–), British novelist, born in Liverpool and educated at the Merchant Taylor's School. She began her career as an actress in a Liverpool repertory company. Her first novel, A Weekend With Claude (1967), written in her distinctive laconic style, is a blackly comic account of a weekend in the country which ends with the accidental shooting of one of the protagonists. Her other novels include Another Part of the Wood (1968); Harriet Said (1972), in which the sexual experiment conducted by two schoolgirls goes disastrously wrong; The Dressmaker (1973), a novel set in wartime Liverpool concerning the relationships between a dejected 17-year-old girl and her two aunts; The Bottle Factory Outing (1974), which describes the macabre and comic events surrounding a small firm's annual outing; Sweet William (1975), about a compulsive philanderer; Young Adolf (1978), a comic exploration of a visit to Liverpool made by the 16-year-old Hitler during the 1900s; and Winter Garden (1980). A recurring theme in her work is the bizarre or unpredictable nature of real life; the most banal events are given a surreal edge and there is a pervasive sense, in her comic descriptions, of the absurdity underlying human behaviour. This is most clearly seen in her use of dialogue, which appears at first to mimic the vocabulary and cadences of real speech, but which in fact is as far from naturalism as her plots, many of which hinge on fantastic or macabre circumstances. Murder and accidental death often feature as the catalyst in an otherwise innocuous series of events. Injury Time (1977; Whitbread Award, 1978), for example, begins with a dinner party and ends with kidnapping and violence; Watson's Apology (1984) investigates the circumstances surrounding a Victorian schoolmaster's murder of his wife; and An Awfully Big Adventure (1989) deals with adultery, homosexuality, incest, and suicide, as perceived by its 16-year-old narrator, Stella, an ASM in a Liverpool repertory company. Infatuated with Meredith, the theatre manager, who is having an affair with another man, Stella allows herself to be drawn into a relationship with an ageing actor, O'Hara, for whom the affair has terrible consequences. In this, as in much of Bainbridge's fiction, events are seen from the point of view of a naïve, but not necessarily innocent, protagonist, a technique which gives the narrative an ironic dimension characteristic of her work as a whole.

BAKER, George Pierce (1866–1935), American drama teacher, born in Providence, Rhode Island, educated at Harvard. Baker later became one of Harvard's most inspirational drama teachers. His play-writing course, 'English 47', and the '47 Workshop' which sprang from it, had an incalculable effect upon the development of the American commercial theatre in the 1920s and 1930s; his pupils included Philip *Barry, S. N. *Behrman, Eugene *O'Neill, Edward Sheldon, John *Dos Passos, and Thomas *Wolfe. Baker's skill lay in his capacity to nurture all the arts of the theatre through creating the conditions in which apprentice writers could make their individual experiments under his wisely practical tutelage. He moved to Yale in 1925 where he directed the University Theatre at Yale. Baker's publications include The Development of Shakespeare as a Dramatist (1907), Some Unpublished Correspondence of David Garrick (1907), Dramatic Technique (1919), and Modern American Plays (1920).

BAKER, Houston A(lfred, Jr) (1943–), African-American critic, born in Louisville, Kentucky, educated at Howard University and UCLA; amongst other academic posts, he was appointed Professor of English at the University of Virginia. His considerable scholarly output has long established him as a major African-American literary authority and critic. The best known of his studies include Long Black Song: Essays in Black American Literature and Culture (1972), an analysis of black vernacularism and folklore from Frederick Douglass to Richard *Wright; Singers of Daybreak: Studies in Black American Literature (1974), linked essays on the imaginative achievement of Paul *Dunbar, Jean *Toomer, Ralph *Ellison, and George Cain; The Journey Back: Issues in Black Literature and Criticism (1980), a consideration of African-American 'textuality'; Blues, Ideology, and Afro-American Literature (1984), an overview of the poetics of America's black writing—blues, but also language, voice, and phrasing; Modernism and The Harlem Renaissance (1987), a reassessment of the creative variety and achievements of the 1920s black efflorescence signalled in Alain *Locke's manifesto-anthology, *The New Negro; and Workings of the Spirit (1991), a chronicle, in Alice *Walker's term, of the 'womanist' expressivity of black women from Harriet Jacobs/Linda Brent through Zora Neale *Hurston to Toni *Morrison. Baker is also a published poet, notably in No Matter Where You Travel, You Still Be Black (1979) and Blues Journey, Home (1985), as well as a frequent editor and anthologist, and a contributor to eminent academic journals.

BAKER, Nicholson (1957–), American novelist, born in New York, educated at Haverford College, Pennsylvania. His first novel, The Mezzanine (1989), is a comic odyssey compressing a wide variety of reflections on life, death, consumer society, and literature into the space of a single lunch-hour as described by Howie, its eccentric hero. In Room Temperature (1990) the narrator, Mike, muses about his marriage and other related topics, while giving a bottle to his baby daughter. These two short works display a playful erudition and love of digression which is reminiscent of Flann *O'Brien and James *Joyce. U and I (1991), an idiosyncratic essay on the author's obsession with the life and works of J. *Updike, was widely regarded as a comic tour de force. Vox (1992) simply consists of a conversation between a man and a woman, strangers to one another, who have called a telephone sex line in search of salacious conversation, and end up with more than either has bargained for. The Fermata (1994) extended this preoccupation with bizarre sexual encounters in its depiction of Arno Strine, a middle-aged man with the power to arrest time, who uses this unusual skill to further his own onanistic desires. These latter two novels show sex as essentially comic, and contain passages which parody the excesses of pornographic writing without conveying the slightest eroticism. The Size of Thoughts (1996) is a collection of essays.

BALCHIN, Nigel (1908–70), British novelist and scientist, born in Wiltshire, educated at Cambridge University. Under the pseudonym Mark Spade he contributed humorous articles to Punch which were collected in How To Run a Bassoon Factory (1934). Balchin began to establish himself as a writer of sharp realistic novels with Lightbody on Liberty (1936). During the Second World War he served as Deputy Scientific Advisor to the Army Council; the war provided the setting of much of his finest work including the highly successful novel The Small Back Room (1943). Professional and moral questions faced by scientists are expressed in works such as Darkness Falls from the Air (1940) and Mine Own Executioner (1945). Lord, I Was Afraid (1947) was ambitious and experimental and perhaps the best of his later novels.

BALDWIN, James (Arthur) (1924–87), American novelist, dramatist, and social critic, born in New York City, where he was educated. He was on the National Advisory Board of CORE (Congress on Racial Equality). From 1948 onwards he divided his time between New York and France. His first novel, Go Tell It on the Mountain* (1953), inspired by his own childhood, is a modern classic of Black American literature. His second, the skilfully structured and economically narrated Giovanni's Room* (1956), is the confessional monologue of a white American and probably the first novel to deal so openly with tragic homosexual love. It is, almost exclusively in Baldwin's work, unconnected with issues of race or interracial sexual and social relationships, unlike his most impressive novel, Another Country* (1962), which conflates and adds to the psychological and political concerns of his earlier works. His poignant short stories are collected in Going to Meet the Man (1965).

Baldwin's early fictions represent his finest imaginative work and alone would ensure him a place in American literary history. However, later novels only repeat in flashes the evident creative genius of his youth; although they are lyrical and compelling, they are held by some critics to be flawed, because of their strongly polemical content and somewhat repetitive nature. These include Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone (1968) and If Beale Street Could Talk (1974), the tragic love story of a black prisoner. Just Above My Head (1979), about the blighted destiny of a gospel singer, has much of the strength of Baldwin's earlier fictions, but by then he had been displaced by a younger generation of writers black and white, and was largely identified with his frequently fiercely polemical writings on race, politics, and sexuality. These provocative and highly influential essays earned him a lasting reputation as one of America's greatest essayists of the twentieth century; they are collected in several volumes including Notes of a Native Son (1955), which contains a seminal essay on Richard *Wright; Nobody Knows My Name (1961); The Fire Next Time (1963); and No Name in the Street (1972). The Devil Finds Work (1976) is an incisive essay on American movies. The Evidence of Things Not Seen (1985) is a grim meditation on the racially motivated series of child murders in Atlanta, Georgia, in 1979. These works are collected, with additional material, in The Price of a Ticket: Collected Non-Fiction 1948–1985 (1985). A Rap on Race (1971) and A Dialogue (1973) contain, respectively, conversations with anthropologist Margaret Mead and writer Nikki *Giovanni. At his imaginative peak, Baldwin also wrote two successful plays: Amen Corner (1958, performed 1965), praised by Caryl *Phillips as his finest; in both secular and religious terms; and Blues for Mr. Charlie (1964), distantly based upon the case of Emmett Till who, after he was acquitted of it, confessed to a racist murder. Baldwin was also the author of One Day When I Was Lost (1972), a play about Malcolm X, and of Jimmy's Blues: Selected Poems (1983). Biographies are Talking at the Gates: A Life of James Baldwin, by James Campbell (1991), and James Baldwin: A Biography, by David Leeming (1994). See also ETHNICITY.

Balkan Trilogy, The, a trilogy of novels by O. *Manning, consisting of The Great Fortune (1960), The Spoilt City (1962), and Friends and Heroes (1965), published in one volume in 1987 (see also LEVANT TRILOGY, THE).

The Great Fortune opens with the arrival in Bucharest of Guy Pringle, a young British Council lecturer, and his wife, Harriet, whom he has just married. Set in 1939, with Europe on the point of war, the Bucharest expatriate society is split into rival factions. Some, like the incorrigible reprobate Prince Yakimov, a Russian émigré down on his luck, pledge allegiance to neither faction. Guy, whose Marxist idealism co-exists with a certain naïvety about the political in-fighting at the British Council, allows his position to be undermined by unscrupulous colleagues. He displays a similar lack of insight in his relations with Sophie Oresanu, a seductive Romanian girl whose spiteful behaviour towards Harriet contributes towards the latter's misgivings about her marriage. The book ends with the news that France has fallen to the Nazis.

The Spoilt City opens with Bucharest in turmoil; the British contingent, anticipating the Nazi invasion, are making plans to escape. Guy and Harriet offer shelter to Sasha Drucker, a Jewish boy from a wealthy family, whose father has been imprisoned, but their plans to save him are sabotaged by Yakimov, who betrays him to the Germans in order to gain personal advantage. The situation becomes increasingly dangerous and Guy persuades Harriet to leave for Athens, where he promises to follow her in due course.

Friends and Heroes is set in Athens and concerns the Pringles' attempts to establish some kind of security in the midst of the deteriorating international situation. Guy's plans to find work are repeatedly thwarted by his colleagues, including the rascally Dubedat and Lush and the overbearing Lord Pinkrose, and he is reduced to organizing an RAF concert party, which he does with enthusiasm, much to Harriet's chagrin. Harriet becomes involved with Charles Warden, a young British officer stationed in the city, but stops short of having an affair with him when it becomes clear that he is in love with her. As the novel closes, the political situation is once more dangerously unstable: the Germans have entered Greece; Yakimov, who has followed the British contingent to Athens, is killed by a sniper's bullet; and the Pringles, together with most of their British Council associates, secure a passage to Alexandria.

BALLARD, J(ames) G(raham) (1930–), British writer, born in Shanghai, educated at King's College, Cambridge. During the Second World War he was interned by the Japanese and this traumatic experience of his early years has influenced much of his fiction; he made direct use of the material only in his autobiographical novel, Empire of the Sun (1984; later filmed by S. Spielberg), the success of which widened the high reputation he had gained as an author of apocalyptic science fiction (see also APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE). He returned to Britain in 1946 and trained as a doctor at Cambridge (without taking a degree). By 1956 he had begun a long association with New Worlds magazine and was publishing his experimental short stories; the best of these appeared in The Voices of Time (1962), Billenium (1962), The Four-Dimensional Nightmare (1963), The Terminal Beach (1964), and Vermilion Sands (1971). The abandoned concrete landscapes, the transfixed passivity of their protagonists, the sense of impending doom, the stark and vivid prose, all made Ballard's work unmistakable. He was widely imitated by writers impressed by the hypnotic veracity of his despair. In his early novels, The Drowned World (1962), The Drought (1965), and The Crystal World (1966), a different apocalypse ravages and transfigures the world. Only in The Wind from Nowhere (1962) does a protagonist engage in a fight against disaster in traditional science-fiction manner. Later volumes see the protagonist (usually male) approaching the apocalypse as a mystical consummation. After The Atrocity Exhibition (1970), an experimental work, there appeared Crash (1973), Concrete Island (1974), and High Rise (1975), which contain his finest and most violent explorations of what J. B. *Priestley described as 'inner space', a term now indelibly associated with Ballard's work in which he has expressed the conviction that the most fearful science-fictional landscapes lie within the human heart. Later works include Hello America (1981); The Day of Creation (1987); Running Wild (1988), which anatomized the Britain of today; Rushing to Paradise (1994); the stories collected in War Fever (1990), which focused on public issues of the 1990s; and a collection of reviews and essays, A User's Guide to the Millenium (1995).

BAMBARA, Toni Cade (1931–), African-American short-story writer, novelist, and scriptwriter, born in New York, where she was educated at City University. During the early 1960s, when she emerged as a noted civil rights activist, she worked in a New York community centre. After teaching at City University, she became an assistant professor at Rutgers University in 1969. Her writing is closely aligned with her political convictions, which she has summarized as 'Pan-Africanist-socialist-feminist'. Gorilla, My Love (1972) and The Sea Birds Are Still Alive (1977) are collections of her short stories, which are distinguished by the acuteness of their socio-cultural observations and their energetically colloquial idioms. The Salt Eaters, her novel of 1980, reflects the profound changes of mood in the USA after the Vietnam War. Her work as a scriptwriter includes the screenplay for the film of Toni *Morrison's novel Tar Baby (1981). She is the editor of the widely read anthologies The Black Woman (1970) and Tales and Stories for Black Folks (1971).

Banana Bottom, a novel by C. *McKay, published in 1933. Set in Jamaica, its theme is cultural dualism, the clash between European and indigenous black values. The central character is Bita Plant, from the village of Banana Bottom, who is raped at the age of 12 by an idiot youth. The Craigs, a white missionary couple, adopt Bita as their protégée and send her to be educated in England. After years abroad, Bita returns to the island as a piano-playing paragon to assist her benefactors. However, she becomes restless at the Mission. Falling under the spell of an unlearned dandy named Hopping Dick, she rebels against the Calvinist domination of her guardians. An attempt to arrange a respectable marriage between Bita and a young divinity student is brought to an abrupt halt when the prospective bridegroom is caught in an act of bestiality. Rediscovering Banana Bottom, Bita is at home among its unaffected pleasures and personalities, which her sophisticated education should have taught her to dismiss as vulgar amusements and bad company. One link with the cultivated life is in her friendship with Squire Gensir, an elderly Englishman who lives simply among the villagers, collecting and celebrating their folk culture. Eventually marrying Jubban, a stalwart peasant, she finds no contradiction in linking her destiny with his: 'Her music, her reading, her thinking were the flowers of her intelligence and he the root in the earth upon which she was grafted, both nourished by the same soil.'

Bananas, a literary journal founded in 1975 by Emma *Tennant, who intended it as a means of publishing a broad range of imaginative writing. It was originally subtitled 'the literary newspaper', appearing in folio with a striking red and black cover design and featuring short stories, poems, articles, reviews, and illustrations. Contributors to early issues included Angela *Carter, Tom *Disch, J. G. *Ballard, William *Burroughs, Lorna Sage, and Ruth *Fainlight. In 1978 the ownership and editorship of Bananas passed to Abigail Mozley, under whose direction it assumed magazine format and promoted regional (see REGIONAL POETRY) writing through the appointment of editorial correspondents in various parts of Britain. Andrew *Motion, Peter *Didsbury, Helen *Dunmore, and William *Scammell were among the poets whose work appeared in the journal in the early stages of their careers. Special issues were produced on Russian, French, German, Spanish, and South American writing. Bananas ceased publication after its twenty-fourth issue in January 1981.

BANKS, Iain M(enzies) (1954–), Scottish writer, born in Fife, educated at Stirling University. He lived in London and Kent from 1979 to 1988, then moved to Edinburgh. He is best known for his first novel, The Wasp Factory (1984), in which the mental games of an isolated adolescent become part of reality, and for The Bridge (1986), in which a comatose patient is compelled to discover the significance of the great bridge which controls his dreams, and which seems to embody the structure of his entire life. Other novels of similar imaginative impact are Walking on Glass (1985), Espedair Street (1987), Canal Dreams (1989), and The Crow Road (1992). More humorous in vein is Whit (1995), about a teenager's involvement with a religious cult. His *science fiction novels Consider Phlebas (1987), The Player of Games (1988), The State of the Art (1989), and The Use of Weapons (1990) form 'The Culture', a series of expansive adventures within a galaxy-spanning Culture founded on a vision of post-capitalist plenitude, while Against a Dark Background (1993) explores his heroine's conflict with a sinister cult seeking to control the universe. Feersum Endjinn (1994) depicts the savage war between a royal line and a technocratic faction on a poisoned planet. An imaginative large-scale narrative, it demonstrates Banks's powerful use of technological fantasy.

BANKS, Russell (1940–), American novelist, born in Newton, Massachusetts, educated at Colgate University, Hamilton, New York, and the University of Carolina, Chapel Hill. His first novel, Family Life (1974), is a satirical fable set in an imaginary kingdom. Other novels, though they may be set in the past, follow a post-modernist trajectory. These include Hamilton Stark (1978); The Book of Jamaica (1980), in which an academic researches the history of the Maroons of that country, and is ambivalently accepted by them; and The Relation of My Imprisonment (1983), a story of religious heresy and puritan dissent. His most celebrated novel, Continental Drift (1985), tells of the linked destinies of the blue-collar family man Bob, and Vanise, a destitute Haitian refugee and mother. Banks's rich prose and strong narrative drive are evident in the novels Affliction (1989) and The Sweet Hereafter (1991), in which he continues what has been described as his 'shattering dissection of contemporary American life'. Rule of the Bone (1995) concerns Bone, a homeless boy who has drifted into petty crime, whose life is changed by his encounter with the Rastafarian I-Man, with whom he embarks on an adventurous journey which culminates in Jamaica. His short-story collections include Searching for Survivors (1975) and Success Stories (1986).

BANVILLE, John (1945–), Irish novelist, born in Wexford, Ireland, educated at the Christian Brothers School and St Peter's College, Wexford. In 1970 he published Long Lankin, a collection of short stories which, like Joyce's Dubliners*, examined Irish life from the perspective of several characters, dealing with different stages in their lives from childhood to adulthood; a novella, 'The Possessed', was also included. Nightspawn (1971) was a sequel to the novella, exploring the relationship between truth and fiction through the consciousness of its writer-hero, Ben White. Birchwood (1973) developed some of the earlier work's themes; its narrator, Gabriel Godwin, is an Irish writer engaged on a Proustian quest for 'time misplaced'. The relationship between creation and reality is explored in many of Banville's novels. Using historical figures, in Doctor Copernicus (1976; James Tait Black Memorial Prize), Kepler (1981), and The Newton Letter (1982), Banville explored the idea of science as an art form and of scientists as 'the makers . . . of supreme fictions'. More sombre and set in the present is Mefisto (1986), which, as the title implies, is Banville's reworking of the classic Dr Faustus theme; the novel focuses on the mathematically gifted Gabriel Swan, who seeks a numerical solution to his quest for order and meaning in life. The Book of Evidence (1989) is a haunting anatomy of a murder, seen from the point of view of the murderer, Montgomery, who abducts and kills a young woman during an incompetently executed art theft and is then tormented by the horror of his act. In the sequel, Ghosts (1993), which contains parallels with The Tempest, Banville's murderer, who has retreated to an Arcadian island to study a painter resembling Watteau, is disturbed and returned to the 'human world' of despair by castaways, one of whom recalls the past he is striving to exorcise. Athena (1995) sees the murderer (renamed Morrow) hired to authenticate a group of paintings, and seduced by 'A' (Athena) into an atavistic relationship which beckons his descent into a further personal hell and Banville's continuing excavation of truth and fraud, art and the imagination. The novel completes a trilogy of loss, guilt, and hauntings, praised for the wit and originality of its diction. John Banville became literary editor of the Irish Times in 1989.

BARAKA, (Imamu) Amiri (originally LeRoi Jones) (1934–), African-American playwright and social activist, born in Newark, New Jersey, educated at Howard and Columbia Universities. Baraka exerted a profound influence on the development and direction of black writing and culture. His first published work was the long sardonic poem Preface to a Twenty Volume Suicide Note (1961) with its vivid imagery and infusion of black culture and reference. This was followed by The Dead Lecturer (1964) with its call for black political commitment. Associated with the *Beat poets like Allen *Ginsberg and with the poets of the *New York School such as Frank *O'Hara, he explored new metrics and ways of notation on the page. He turned for models to the '*Projective Verse' of Charles *Olson and to the other rhythms he knew from black music like the blues. In 1958 he established the *little magazines Yugen and Floating Bear, and Totem Press, printing work by such writers as Allen Ginsberg, Charles Olson, Gary Snyder, and Frank O'Hara. His predominant focus was on the divided self, whose pain emerges from being a black intellectual in a white world. Feeling the pressures of racism, he became increasingly outspoken and separate from the white literary circles in which he had been a significant participant. After the acclaimed play Dutchman (1964), a stylized treatment of inter-racial hostility, there followed a series of influential plays in the 1960s, The Slave (1964), The Baptism and The Toilet (both 1967), and Four Black Revolutionary Plays (1969), where he turned to explore the violent basis of relationships between whites and blacks, with the employment of extremely harsh images and stage techniques. He was a founder of the Black Arts Repertory Theatre in Harlem in 1965, which became the model for further black theatres throughout the country. During the 1960s he moved towards the black nationalism of the Nation of Islam, converting to Islam in 1968, changing his name to Imamu (later Amiri) Baraka. His poetry in Black Art (1966) and Black Magic: Poems 1961–1967 (1969) continued to demand a black art and culture; whilst in his prose, the autobiographical novel The System of Dante's Hell (1965), Home: Social Essays (1966), the collection of short stories Tales (1967), and Raise, Race, Rays, Raze (1972), he analysed and commented upon the issues of race in American culture. In the 1970s he moved closer to the politics of Marxist-Leninism, producing Marxist poetry collections such as Hard Facts (1975) and the Marxist essays Daggers and Javelins (1984). He has continued to write poetry, publishing In the Tradition: For Black Arthur Blythe (1980) and Reggae or Not! Poems (1982), and embarked on an epic poem entitled Why's/Wise. Collections of his poetry and prose appeared in 1979, and The Autobiography of LeRoi Jones/Amiri Baraka was published in 1984. In addition, Baraka has written two influential accounts of black music, analysing its development from slave songs to the avant-garde jazz of Ornette Coleman and John Coltrane in Blues People: Negro Music in White America (1963) and Black Music (1968). Recent work includes Shy's Wise, Y's: The Griot's Tale (1994).

BARBELLION, W(ilhelm) N(ero) P(ilate), pseudonym of Bruce Frederick CUMMINGS (1889–1919), British diarist, born in Barnstaple, Devon. As a boy he conceived a keen interest in natural phenomena and achieved a high degree of self-education in biology. In 1912 he became an official of the Natural History Museum in London. He published work in the Proceedings of the Zoological Society and the Journal of Botany, and supplied other periodicals with more general articles. He resigned from his post in 1917 due to the onset of disseminated sclerosis. The voluminous diaries he had kept since 1903 provided material for the writing to which he subsequently devoted himself; The Journal of a Disappointed Man (1919), for which H. G. *Wells wrote an introduction, appeared under the 'Barbellion' pseudonym shortly before his death, rapidly gaining him a reputation as a major diarist. The work's intensely personal introspection combined to highly original effect with a nervously energetic style and an attitude of scientific detachment towards the self. A. J. and H. R. Cummings edited the Journal's sequels, Enjoying Life and Other Literary Remains (1919) and A Last Diary (1920). R. H. Hellyar's W. N. P. Barbellion was published in 1926.

BARDWELL, Leland (1928–), Irish novelist and poet, born in India, where her father was working on the Madras Southern and Midland Railways; she grew up in Leixlip, Co. Kildare and was educated in Co. Kildare. She taught in Scotland, then lived in Paris and London before settling in Co. Monaghan. Among Bardwell's collections of poems are The Mad Cyclist (1970), The Fly and the Bed Bug (1984), and Dostoevsky's Grave: Selected Poems (1991). Her novels include Girl on a Bicycle (1977), described by Anthony *Burgess as 'a period gem', and There We Have Been (1989). The Attic Press in Dublin, which is strongly associated with women's writing, published a collection of her short stories, Different Kinds of Love (1987). She has also written for the theatre, television, and radio, for which she scripted a play based on the life of Edith Piaf. Bardwell's work has tended to concentrate upon the socio-political differences between Catholics and Protestants in Southern Ireland.

BARFOOT, Joan (1946–), Canadian novelist, born in Owen Sound, Ontario, educated at the University of Western Ontario. After graduating she began working as a journalist and joined the London, Ontario, Free Press in 1976. Abra (1978, UK title Gaining Ground, 1980), the first of Barfoot's radical feminist novels, deals with a young woman who leaves her husband and child to live in the Canadian wilderness. In Dancing in the Dark (1982; filmed in 1986) a criminally insane woman recounts her reasons for killing her unfaithful husband and searches for psychological freedom within the confines of her prison. Duet for Three (1985) and Family News (1989) analyse relations between mothers and daughters in terms of the quest for self-knowledge as the basis for authentic identity. Tensions between fantasy and reality reach a compelling intensity in Plain Jane (1992), in which a withdrawn female librarian begins corresponding with a convicted male criminal. Charlotte and Claudia Keeping in Touch (1992) is lighter in tone and deals affirmatively with a long-standing friendship between two women.

BARING, Maurice (1874–1945), British writer, born in London, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. After the crash of his family's bank (Baring's Bank) in 1890 he worked as a diplomat in Europe, forming a close association with Russia, where he went to live in 1904, reporting on the Russo-Japanese war. He is credited with having discovered Chekhov's work in Moscow and introducing it to the West. His non-fiction works include Landscapes in Russian Literature (1910), An Outline of Russian Literature (1914), and The Oxford Book of Russian Verse (1924). Among his many novels are C (1924), Cat's Cradle (1925), Daphne Adeane (1926), and The Coat without Seam (1929). His conversion to Roman Catholicism was a turning point in his life, and with Hilaire *Belloc and G. K. *Chesterton he was regarded as a 'Catholic' writer; his two historical novels, Robert Peckham (1930) and In My End Is My Beginning (1931, on Mary, Queen of Scots), are on Catholic subjects. His wit is apparent in his autobiography The Puppet Show of Memory (1922), and in Dead Letters (1910) and Lost Diaries (1913) which gather imaginary communications from historical and literary characters. Have You Anything To Declare? (1937) was a personal anthology.

BARKER, A(udrey), L(illian) (1918–), British short-story writer and novelist, born in Kent. Her first highly praised collection of stories, The Innocents (1948), was followed by a novel, Apology for a Hero (1950). Further collections of stories confirmed her reputation as a leading practitioner of her craft; she also continued to experiment with form. The Middling (1967) and A Heavy Feather (1978) are fragmented narratives loosely linked by theme and perspective; A Source of Embarrassment (1974) is a tightly woven domestic satire; John Brown's Body (1969) is a taut tour de force of psychological unease. Praised by contemporaries such as Francis *King and Rebecca *West, Barker's novels and stories of the 1970s and 1980s present her distinctive tragi-comic vision with an increasing craftsmanship and economy of style, culminating in one of her finest novels, The Gooseboy (1987). The bitter levity of her vision is again displayed in The Woman Who Talked to Herself (1989); the book's subtitle, 'An Articulated Novel', fittingly sums up Barker's eclectic attitude to fictional form. Zeph (1992), an unconventional rites-of-passage novel, is the comic monologue of a young woman who, without any natural talent, determines to be a writer. Any Excuse for a Party (1991) is a retrospective collection of Barker's best short fiction, and Elements of Doubt (1992) collects her ghost stories.

BARKER, George (Granville) (1913–91), British poet, born in Loughton, Essex, educated at the Regent Street Polytechnic. From 1930 onward he lived mainly as a freelance writer and held visiting professorships at universities in America, Japan, and elsewhere. Following the appearance of Thirty Preliminary Poems in 1933, he gained considerable critical attention in 1935 with Poems and Janus, the latter consisting of two prose pieces entitled 'The Documents of Death' and 'The Bacchants'. T. S. *Eliot, Barker's publisher at *Faber and Faber, arranged a modest income for him, and W. B. *Yeats conferred on him the distinction of being the youngest contributor to his Oxford Book of Modern Verse (1936). Throughout the 1930s his poetry maintained a high level of rhetorical and emotional energy, partaking of surrealism's imaginative licence while remaining fundamentally conventional in form. Calamiterror (1937) typifies his fondness for long sequences amalgamating numerous themes in its cumulative responses to the Spanish Civil War, visionary experiences, and socio-cultural conditions in general. With Dylan *Thomas, he was the chief progenitor of the extravagant manner identified with the poets of the *New Apocalypse. The essentially metaphysical character of his poetry became more consistently apparent during the 1940s in a succession of volumes which include Lament and Triumph (1940) and Sacred and Secular Elegies (1943). Faith and doubt remain dominant elements beneath the irreverent surfaces of The True Confession of George Barker (1950; revised and enlarged 1965), which reviews the habitual preoccupations of his writing, among them guilt, sexuality, and death. His later collections of verse, which include The Golden Chains (1968), Poems of Places and People (1971), and Anno Domino (1983), exhibit a mood of elegiac contemplation and are more conversationally relaxed in tone than hitherto. A Collected Poems, edited by Robert Fraser, was produced in 1987. Among his other writings is the complexly symbolic novel The Dead Seagull (1950).

BARKER, Howard (1946–), British dramatist, born in London, educated at Sussex University. His first substantial works were Claw (1975), about a petty criminal exploited and finally eliminated by a corrupt establishment, and Stripwell (1975), in which it is the representative of authority, a self-doubting judge, who ends up killed, this time by a vengeful sociopath. These plays, which can be compared with those of Howard *Brenton and David *Hare, have been followed by others equally combative in their social criticism but more darkly comic in tone and increasingly exotic in their language and form. Some, notably That Good between Us (1977) and The Hang of the Gaol (1978), offer somewhat nightmarish visions of political oppression in a Britain of the near future. Other plays include Fair Slaughter (1977); The Loud Boy's Life (1980); No End of Blame (1981), about the growing despair of a radical cartoonist; Victory (1983), about corruption and persecution after the restoration of Charles II; The Power of the Dog (1984); The Castle (1985); Seven Lears (1989); The Europeans (1993); and Hated Nightfall (1994). Barker's Scenes from an Execution, which involves the repression of a heterodox woman painter in imperial Venice, and raises questions about censorship and artistic freedom, was broadcast on radio in 1984 and staged in 1990. He has also written for television, and made a modern stage adaptation of Middleton's Women Beware Women (1986).

BARKER, Pat (1943–), British novelist, born in Thornaby-on-Tees, educated at the London School of Economics. Barker's early novels focused on the grim lives of working-class people in the north of England. Her first novel, Union Street (1982), was more a collection of linked stories about the lives of seven women on a working-class street in a northern English city. Though often shocking in its depiction of violence, poverty, and hopelessness, it also celebrates the courage and wit of women who hold their families and communities together. Century's Daughter (1986) chronicles the life of an elderly woman, born into a large impoverished family, who now lives in a decaying house due for demolition by the Council. Like most of Barker's work, it has a strong historical perspective; she links not only the woman's past and present, but the poverty of the early part of the century with the recession and unemployment in Britain in the 1980s. Her other novels of this period include Blow Your House Down (1984) and The Man Who Wasn't There (1989). Barker changed direction radically with an acclaimed trilogy of novels that deal with the effects of the First World War: Regeneration (1991), in which the torments of war are articulated in a therapeutic talking relationship between doctor and patient, The Eye in the Door (1993), in which the homosexuality of acclaimed public figures becomes the occasion for a witch-hunt, and The Ghost Road (1995; Booker Prize), a powerful treatment of the relativity of cultural and sexual values. All three novels are densely laden with the issues of the time: psychiatry and psychoanalysis, shell-shock, creative responses to war, and political intrigues in a rapidly changing age.

BARLEY, Nigel (1947–), British writer on anthropology and travel; after gaining a doctorate in anthropology at Oxford, Barley taught at London University until 1978, when he left for two years in Cameroon. His researches provided a basis for The Innocent Anthropologist (1983), which was acclaimed for the accessibility and humour of its evocation of life among the Dowayo people. The book's witty critique of conventional anthropology is sustained in A Plague of Caterpillars (1986) and Not a Hazardous Sport (1988), which reflect Barley's experiences as a fieldworker and traveller in Indonesia. His other publications include Native Land (1990), on the rituals of English life; The Coast (1990), a humorous novel set in Nigeria; The Duke of Puddle Dock (1991), a work of travel and biography tracing the career of Sir Stamford Raffles; and Smashing Pots (1994), about African earthenware.

BARNES, Djuna (1892–1982), American novelist, poet, short-story writer, and playwright, born in Cornwall-on-Hudson, New York, educated at the Pratt Institute, Brooklyn and the Arts Student League, New York. She worked as a journalist and also published some stories in *The Dial and Vanity Fair. Her first collection of poems and stories appeared in The Book of Repulsive Women (1915), which satirized the stereotypes of female sexuality. Her first play, Three from the Earth (1919), was followed by Kurzy of the Sea (1919), An Irish Triangle (1919), To the Dogs (1923), The Dove (1923), and She Tells Her Daughters (1923). In 1920 she left for Paris where she lived for twelve years, during which time she enjoyed a high reputation as a writer and moved in the artistic circles of Mina *Loy and Gertrude *Stein. Her work of this period includes A Book (1923), later reissued in an extended version entitled A Night among the Horses (1929); Ryder (1928), a bestseller which exposed the sufferings of women under patriarchy in a brilliant stylistic parody; and Ladies' Almanack (1928), which celebrated female sexuality and mocked eighteenth-century language. She achieved fame with the publication of Nightwood (1936), edited and introduced by T. S. *Eliot. A novel about complex and difficult relationships set in homosexual Paris in the 1920s, she again explores women's position within patriarchy. After settling in Greenwich Village in 1937, a long period of virtual silence followed, broken in 1958 by the publication of the blank-verse play The Antiphon, in which a mother and daughter act out their tense relationship in the family. Spillway (1962), a collection of stories, was followed by two essays based on Paris in the 1920s in Vagaries Malicieux (1975). Early and previously uncollected work appeared in Smoke and Other Early Stories (1982), and later, in Alyce Barry's edition I Could never Be Lonely without a Husband: Interviews by Djuna Barnes (1985).

BARNES, Julian (Patrick) (1946–), British novelist, born in Leicester, educated at Oxford University. In his first novel, Metroland (1980; Somerset Maugham Award, 1981), his precocious hero, Christopher Lloyd, recounts the events of his suburban childhood, his student days in Paris in 1968, and his eventual return, with wife and baby, to the peaceful suburban landscapes of 'Metroland'. Before She Met Me (1982), a study of murderous obsession and marital claustrophobia, was followed by the novel with which Barnes consolidated his reputation as one of the more innovative and witty of the younger generation of writers.

Flaubert's Parrot (1984), which was awarded the Prix Medicis in France, is narrated by Geoffrey Braithwaite, a retired doctor and widowed cuckold, who attempts to come to terms with the bitterness of his memories by pursuing his obsession for the writings of Flaubert, whilst on a touring holiday in France. Amalgamating scholarly allusion, tourist guide, exam questions on Madame Bovary, and eccentric biographical facts about the life of the great French novelist, the book displays Barnes's prevailing interest in the relationship between life and art. Staring at the Sun (1986), a more conventional narrative, follows its female protagonist from her girlhood in wartime Britain, through her unsuccessful marriage to great old age, in a future society of 2020. A History of the World in 10½ Chapters (1989) shows the writer at his most playful and experimental in his treatment of a number of related themes: the nature of art, religion, love, and death. The work takes the form of a series of ingeniously linked stories, whose central image is that of the Ark. The first of these, for example, is narrated by a woodworm 'stowaway' on Noah's Ark during the Great Flood; another memorably describes the painting of Géricault's masterpiece 'The Raft of the Medusa'; a third is about an American astronaut who becomes involved in a search for the 'true' Ark. Talking It Over (1991), although perhaps less unconventional in form, picks up where the earlier work left off, with a meditation on the vicissitudes of love. The Porcupine (1992) is set in an unnamed Eastern European country and concerns the trial of its former dictator following the overthrow of the communist regime over which he presided for many years. As crisply written and ironic as his previous work, it displays yet another side to Barnes's apparently effortless versatility. Cross Channel (1996) is a collection of short stories set in France. Unlike many of his contemporaries, the author has shown himself to be at ease in a number of different literary forms, ranging from the essay to the comedy of manners, from Letters from London (1995), his contributions on topical themes to the New Yorker, to the detective novels written under the pseudonym 'Dan Kavanagh'. Barnes has also worked as literary editor and television critic for the New Statesman, The Sunday Times and the Observer.

BARNES, Peter (1931–), British dramatist, born in London, educated at Stroud Grammar School. He was a film critic, a film story editor, and a screenwriter before he turned his attention to the theatre. His first successful work was The Ruling Class (1968), a 'baroque comedy' satirizing a supposedly decadent and moribund British aristocracy in scathing terms. It was followed by other plays ambitious in terms of both style and content, several of them dealing sceptically and sardonically with political and religious subjects, many of them consciously indebted to the Jacobeans, particularly Ben Jonson, and most of them set in relatively remote periods and distant places. These include a double bill (1969) comprising Leonardo's Last Supper, a gothic comedy about the Renaissance painter, and Noonday Demons, about two wrangling fourth-century holy men; The Bewitched (1974), about the last of the Spanish Habsburgs and the era of the auto-da-fé; Laughter (1978), two linked plays, one about Ivan the Terrible, the other about Auschwitz, each attempting to explore the nature and limits of humour; Red Noses (1985), about a troupe of clowns wandering through mainland Europe during the Black Death; and Sunsets and Glories (1990), about the thirteenth-century hermit who became Pope Celestine V. Among his many adaptations are Wedekind's Lulu plays, and Jonson's The Devil Is an Ass and Bartholomew Fair. He has also written for television, in 1992 celebrating the 500th anniversary of the discovery of America with a characteristically harsh and cynical play, Goodbye Columbus.

BARNETT, Correlli (Douglas) (1927–), British military historian, born at Norbury in Surrey, educated at Exeter College, Oxford. In 1977 he became Keeper of the Churchill Archives Centre at Cambridge University. The Desert Generals (1960), a controversial study of the North African Campaign, established Barnett's reputation as a military historian; his subsequent works, which are noted for their concentration and lucidity, include The Swordbearers (1963), on the commanders of the First World War; Britain and Her Army (1970), a review of interactions between the army and society in Britain from the Tudor era onward; The Great War (1979); and Engage the Enemy more Closely (1991), a survey of the Royal Navy in the Second World War. Barnett's 'Pride and the Fall' series, an analysis of Britain's industrial and political decline since the late nineteenth century, includes The Collapse of British Power (1972), The Audit of War (1986), and The Lost Victory: British Dreams, British Realities, 1945–50 (1995).

Barren Ground, a novel by Ellen *Glasgow, published in 1925. Its central figure, Dorinda Oakley, is the daughter of a poor farmer in Virginia of Scottish-Irish stock. She goes to work in Nathan Pedlar's store and falls in love with Jason Greylock, the feckless son of the village doctor; the day before their wedding Jason is obliged to marry an earlier fiancée. Distressed, Dorinda leaves for New York where she is employed as a children's nurse by Dr Faraday, who had come to her aid after a road accident. At her father's death Dorinda returns home to find the family farm run down and overgrown with broomsedge. Both her mother, now an invalid, and her idle brother Rufus are unable to manage the farm and Dorinda sets about restoring it. Later she marries Nathan Pedlar, as much out of compassion as of love, and after Nathan's death, looks after her first love, Jason, now an alcoholic, until his death. In order for the 'barren ground' to yield the desired crops the land has to be worked with taxing energy, the non-productive indigenous growths of the area being broomsedge, pine, and life-everlasting. Each of these plants gives its name to a section of the novel: broomsedge stands for the sexual impulse; pine for the brooding presence of sickness and death; and life-everlasting for that nameless force which enables people like Dorinda to persevere through all adversities until death.

BARRIE, Sir J(ames) M(atthew) (1860–1937), British writer, born in Kirriemuir, Scotland, the son of a weaver, educated at Edinburgh University. He turned first to journalism with the Nottinghamshire Journal, a period reflected in When a Man's Single (1888). After producing several sentimental *Kailyard sketches and stories about Thrums (a fictional version of Kirriemuir), such as Auld Licht Idylls (1888), A Window in Thrums (1889), and The Little Minister (1891), Barrie made the stage his career. His principal plays were *The Admirable Crichton (1902); the perennial children's favourite, Peter Pan (1904); Alice Sit-By-the-Fire (1905), an amusing parody of the society plays made fashionable by Pinero and others; What Every Woman Knows (1908); the interesting Dear Brutus (1917), in which a magician gives his guests a glimpse of the alternative lives they might have led, showing that their disappointments come more from inner inadequacy than external chance; Mary Rose (1920), about a young wife and mother stolen by fairies; and the Biblical drama The Boy David (1936). From the first Barrie faced accusations of sentimentality, partly because of his whimsical imagination, his fondness for magic islands and enchanted forests, and partly because of the number of amiable and charming characters he introduced into his work. In particular, he tended to idealize childhood and maternal devotion. But, as Max *Beerbohm wrote, his 'excesses in the sweetly sad' must be measured against 'his humour, his curious inventiveness, his sure sense for dramatic effect'. As a Scot, he took a special delight in gently mocking what he saw as the frivolity of the English, especially the upper-class English: The Admirable Crichton and Little Mary (1903) both have such satiric edge. And if he refused seriously to confront pain or evil, his work is often marked by a distinctive melancholy, usually associated with an unwilling or unacknowledged awareness that innocence cannot indefinitely survive contact with reality.

BARRY, Philip (Jerome Quinn) (1896–1949), American dramatist, born in Rochester, New York, educated at Yale. Barry was a frail child whose early years of invalidism turned him into an avid reader, who developed a reputation for precocious wit. At Yale he won the Yale dramatic society prize for his first play, Autonomy. He enrolled in George Pierce *Baker's famous '47 Workshop' at Harvard, a workshop drama school for aspiring playwrights later attended by Eugene *O'Neill. His next play, The Jilts, later renamed You and I (1923), was the first of his many Broadway successes in which the eternal conflict between the claims of art and mammon is enlivened by Barry's witty epigrammatic style. Thereafter Barry's career as a dramatist was marked by the high success of his comedies of marital and sexual difficulties, and the relative failure of his work when it reflected a dimension of experiential despair which often drew him to fantasy. His other plays include Paris Bound (1927), Holiday (1928), Hotel Universe (1930), Tomorrow and Tomorrow (1931), and The Animal Kingdom (1932). Perhaps his greatest success was The Philadelphia Story (1939), which was later made into a film starring Katherine Hepburn, Cary Grant, and James Stewart.

BARRY, Sebastian (1955–), Irish poet, novelist, and dramatist, born in Dublin, educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He lived in Europe, America, and England before returning to Ireland. Barry's poetry collections include The Water-Colourist (1983), and in 1986 he edited The Inherited Boundaries, an anthology of 'younger' poets from the Republic. His plays include Boss Grady's Boys, which was produced at the *Abbey Theatre in 1988 and published in Prayers of Sherkin; Boss Grady's Boys: Two Plays (1991). His novel The Engine of Owl-Light (1987) is a poetically intense and experimental work set in America. Barry's fiction is similar to that of some contemporary Irish writers, such as Neil *Jordan and Aidan *Mathews, in looking away from traditionally insular concerns towards more personal, 'foreign' influences.

BARSTOW, Stan(ley) (1928–), English novelist, born in Horbury, Yorkshire into a mining family, and educated at Ossett Grammar School. From 1944 to 1962 he worked as a draughtsman and sales executive in the engineering industry; he graduated with an MA from the Open University in 1982. Barstow's emergence as a writer in 1960 coincided with that of John *Braine, Alan *Sillitoe, and other *'angry young men'. His first novel, *A Kind of Loving (1960), a candid and moving story of contemporary pressures on love and marriage, was an immediate success and was followed by a celebrated film version in 1962. Having helped to put the north of England and the working-class hero on the literary map, Barstow continued to search for the universal within a canvas of northern provincial life. Set in the same fictitious town of Cressley were two sequels to his first novel, The Watchers on the Shore (1966) and The Right True End (1976), which follow its hero, Vic Brown, through the break-up of his unfortunate marriage and into a more fulfilling and loving relationship; the trilogy was published as A Kind of Loving: The Vic Brown Trilogy in 1981 and adapted for television in the same year. After Ask Me Tomorrow (1962), an introspective work about a writer, appeared Joby (1964), written from the point of view of an 11-year-old boy whose own problems are matched by the impending crisis of the Second World War. Realistic settings and a continuing concern with marriage and loneliness characterize A Raging Calm (1968; adapted for television, 1974), and A Brother's Tale (1980). The Yorkshire town of 'Daker' during the Second World War is the setting for Barstow's trilogy comprising Just You Wait and See (1986), Give Us This Day (1989), and Next of Kin (1991); focusing on the Palmer family it vividly evokes the atmosphere of a small town plunged into war. In his short stories, volumes of which include The Desperadoes and Other Stories (1961), A Season with Eros (1971), and The Glad Eye and Other Stories (1984), Barstow shows a realistic appreciation of contemporary concerns.

BARTH, John (1930–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Cambridge, Maryland, educated at Julliard School of Music, New York City, where he studied orchestration, but he turned towards an academic career in literature after completing a Master's degree at Johns Hopkins University. From 1953 until 1965 he taught in the Department of English at Pennsylvania State University and he was a Professor of English at the State University of New York at Buffalo between 1965 and 1973; in 1973 he became Centennial Professor of English and Creative Writing at Johns Hopkins. His first two novels, The Floating Opera (1956; revised edition 1967) and The End of the Road (1958; revised edition 1967) are realistic in their fictional techniques but also show the preoccupation with abstract, metaphysical problems and his gift for comedy that characterize the later fiction on which his reputation largely rests. His third novel, *The Sot-Weed Factor (1960), perhaps his greatest, is an exuberant, immensely inventive, pastiche of late seventeenth-century English prose that centres around the progress of the poet Ebenezer Cooke in the New World. This was followed by Giles Goat-Boy; or, The Revised New Syllabus* (1966), an equally ambitious novel in which the world is fictionally re-imagined as a giant university divided into 'East' and 'West' campuses, each controlled by giant computers. His later writings include two volumes of short stories, Lost in the Funhouse (1968) (see METAFICTION) and Chimera (1972), and the novels, Letters (1979), an epistolary novel notable for its *post-modernist use of the author as one of the characters; Sabbatical: A Romance (1982); The Tidewater Tales: A Novel (1987); and Last Voyage of Somebody the Sailor (1991). In addition, he has published two volumes of non-fictional prose, The Literature of Exhaustion, and the Literature of Replenishment (1982) and The Friday Book: Essays and Other Non-Fiction (1984). He has been the recipient of grants from the Rockefeller Foundation and the American Academy, and he won the National Book Award in 1973. See Passionate Virtuosity: The Fiction of Barth (1983), by Charles B. Harris.

BARTHELME, Donald (1931–89), American short-story writer and novelist, born in Philadelphia; he was brought up in Texas, and later moved to New York. Variously described as an 'anti-novelist' and a 'poet of order gone', Barthelme will be remembered for pushing the short story to its furthest experimental limits, and for the poetic and unvarnished beauty of his prose style. He was a member of a generation of writers such as *Coover, *John Hawkes, *Gaddis, *Gass, *Pynchon, *Barth, and *Vonnegut, all of them loosely united in their foregrounding of language and form, the vague irrealism of their work, and their preference of pattern over plot and voice over character. Barthelme resisted identification with the minimalist trend but acknowledged the similarity of his work, in its formal aspects, to a distinctive school of twentieth-century writing remarkable above all for its range and diversity. His first experiment in non-linear narrative was the volume of short texts Come Back, Dr Caligari (1964), followed by Unspeakable Practices, Unnatural Acts (1968). His reputation was securely established with the short novel Snow White (1967), a contemporary parodic reworking of the Disney film. Other volumes include City Life (1970), Sadness (1972), and Guilty Pleasures (1974). Barthelme's thematic concern was with twentieth-century dislocation in all its aspects; he used a wide variety of textual strategies ranging from satire and parody to collage and an approximation of prose poetry. Critics saw in his later volumes of fiction an increasing mastery of language and a fascination with its limits: these include the novel The Dead Father (1975); Amateurs (1976), a collection of fables; and Great Days (1979), composed almost entirely of dialogue. His stories are collected in Forty Stories (1988) and Sixty Stories (1989). A posthumous novel, The King (1990), a reworking of Arthurian legends, was hailed by Salman *Rushdie for its visionary qualities and its relevance in the time of the Gulf War.

BATES, H(erbert) E(rnest) (1905–74), British novelist and short-story writer, born in Northamptonshire. His first novel, The Two Sisters (1926), was followed by a stream of novels and short stories as well as plays, essays, gardening books, children's books, and several volumes of autobiography. He was at his best with the short story and acknowledged Guy de Maupassant as his major influence. Early novels such as The Fallow Land (1932) and The Poacher (1935) were mainly on rural themes, and his vivid descriptions of country landscapes, seasons, and country folk characterizes much of his work. During the Second World War he served as a Squadron Leader in the RAF, and published several volumes of war tales under the pseudonym 'Flying Officer X' as well as the highly popular novels Fair Stood the Wind for France (1944) and The Cruise of 'The Breadwinner' (1946); this period and his later wartime experiences in Burma and India, described in novels such as The Purple Plain (1947) and The Jacaranda Tree (1949), saw a broadening of background, a deepening of psychological insights, and a developing sombre and compassionate tone. Other novels include Love for Lydia (1952), The Darling Buds of May (1958), and The Triple Echo (1970). His many volumes of stories include The Woman Who Had Imagination (1934), The Flying Goat (1939), The Daffodil Sky (1955), and the posthumously published The Yellow Meads of Asphodel (1976).

BATESON, F(rederick) (Noel) W(ilse) (1901–78), British critic and editor, the son of a cotton broker, born at Styal in Cheshire, educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and Harvard. His early publications include English Comic Drama, 1700–1750 (1929). As an editor with Cambridge University Press from 1929 to 1940, he was responsible for preparing the Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature (1940). After a period as an agricultural administrator during the Second World War, he lectured at Oxford University from 1946 to 1969. In 1951 he founded Essays in Criticism*, which succeeded Scrutiny* as the pre-eminent scholarly journal in its field after the latter's demise in 1953; he continued to edit the periodical until 1974. Among his principal critical works, which emphasize the need to evaluate literature with reference to its historical contexts, are English Poetry and the English Language (1934), Wordsworth: A Re-interpretation (1954), and The Language of Literature (1971). Other publications under his editorship include The Works of Congreve (1930) and Matthew Arnold's Essays on English Literature (1965).

BAUGHAN, Blanche (1870–1958), New Zealand poet, born in England; despite parental opposition she attended London University. She then became involved with women's suffrage and worked amongst the poor in London's East End before settling in New Zealand in 1900. Her first works, Verses (1898) and Reuben and Other Poems (1903), were published in England but subsequent works in New Zealand, the first of which, Shingle-Short and Other Verses (1908), is a long verse monologue written in New Zealand idiom. She is particularly noted for her concern for ordinary lives amidst the exotic landscape, and her much anthologized 'Bush Section' is valued for the energy and verve of its long Whitmanesque lines which vividly describe the deforested landscape. Brown Bread from a Colonial Oven (1912) is a series of vivid prose portraits of colonial life, while Poems from the Port Hills, Christchurch (1923) captures life as it was in the early days of settlement. Baughan subsequently concentrated on travel writing and her work as a prison reformer.

BAWDEN, Nina (Mary) (née Mabey) (1925–), British novelist, born in London, educated at Somerville College, Oxford. Bawden has published many books for both adults and children. The cross-fertilization between her adult and her children's works is unusually marked. She reworked her adult novel Evil by the Sea (1957), publishing a version for children in 1976, and many of her concerns—difficult children, neglected childhoods, the gap between generations—are common to both kinds of writing. She excels at portraits of modern middle-class family life in contemporary London, but frequently returns to the past as a repository of secrets and hidden influences. Two of her most powerful children's books, Carrie's War (1973) and The Peppermint Pig (1975), are set in the recent past and deal with children in exile from their homes; the former evokes her experiences as an evacuee during the Second World War, a formative period on which she drew in her adult novel Circles of Deceit (1987) and in a short book for children, Keeping Henry (1988). Many of her adult novels, notably Anna Apparent (1972), Afternoon of a Good Woman (1976), Walking Naked (1981), and The Ice House (1983) deal with the exposure of a suffering self beneath the prosperous surface. The painful feelings of women in her adult novels have a parallel in the anxieties children suffer at the hands of untrustworthy adults in her children's books. Family Money (1991), an ironic tale of families, ageing, and inheritance, harnesses the tempo of a thriller to an examination of the manners and morals of an acquisitive society. In My Own Time: Almost an Autobiography (1994) recalls the 'myths, half-truths, fancies and deceits that make up family history' and gives a moving portrait of her oldest son, who was a schizophrenic. Bawden received the CBE in 1995.

BAXTER, James K(eir) (1926–72), New Zealand poet, born in Dunedin, educated at Quaker schools in England and New Zealand. A major spiritual and literary figure, he blended a passionate concern for everyday New Zealand life with a dedication to basic Christian principles and myths. With the collections Beyond the Palisade (1944) and Blow, Wind of Fruitfulness (1948), Baxter became the leading poet of his generation in New Zealand. In 1957 Baxter's often stormy life underwent a major change when he became both teetotal and a Catholic; In Fires of No Return (1958) reflects this period. Pig Island Letters (1966) demonstrated new assurance and a range of poetic voice which encompassed the extremes of his own experience, from drink and sleeping rough to religious meditation and the torments of the flesh. Aspects of Poetry in New Zealand (1967) gave insights into his critical outlook. He reaffirmed his stature with The Rock Woman (1969), a selection of poems. Baxter was increasingly devoted to an idiosyncratic kind of community work, often amongst young Maori people, and from 1970 he established a commune for 'hippy drop-outs' alongside a Maori Catholic community on the Wanganui River; Jerusalem Sonnets (1970) and Jerusalem Daybook (1971) reflect this period. Two volumes of plays were published in 1971, and Baxter was correcting proofs of Autumn Testament (1972) when he died. The posthumous Unpublished Poems 1945–1972 (1976) further enhanced Baxter's standing. James K. Baxter as Critic (1978), edited by Frank McKay, revealed influences as diverse as *Hardy, *Yeats, *MacNeice, *Durrell, and *Lowell. Collected Poems (1980; corrected 1981) was edited by J. E. Weir, and Collected Plays (1982) was edited by Howard McNaughton. Studies are James K. Baxter by Mike *Doyle (1976) and The Life of James K. Baxter by Frank McKay (1990).

BAYNTON, Barbara (1857–1929), Australian author, born in New South Wales. Her early life was turbulent; having been deserted by her first husband in 1887, she moved to Sydney and in 1890 married Thomas Baynton, a retired surgeon with literary interests. In 1896 she began publishing stories, first in the Bulletin*. After her first visit to London in 1902, and Baynton's death in 1904, she spent more frequent periods in England and for a short time, from 1921, she was married to Lord Headley. Her first collection, Bush Studies (1902), depicts the grim exigencies of bush life in the early years of the century, in a starkly realist tone. Many of the protagonists are women, frequently harshly treated by their menfolk, who become the victims of cruel circumstance. In one story, 'The Chosen Vessel', a women left alone in a remote bush hut is raped and murdered by a passing swagman; in 'Billy Skywonkie', a young woman of mixed race journeys to a bush station in search of work, only to be rejected on the grounds of her colour. A new edition of the book, Cobbers (1917), contained additional stories. Human Toll (1907) is a novel. Her work has been brought back into focus by *feminist criticism.

Beacon, The, a literary magazine edited by Albert Gomes in Trinidad between 1931 and 1933. It totalled twenty-eight issues, and was revived for one further issue in November 1939. Rather more politically focused than its immediate predecessor, Trinidad, the magazine served, as its editor put it, to debunk 'bourgeois morality, obscurantist religion and primitive capitalism'. The Beacon therefore aroused bitter opposition, particularly from the colonial authorities and the Catholic Church. Its contributors included such politically radical West Indian writers as the novelists Alfred *Mendes and Ralph *De Bossière, and the historian C. L. R. *James. The Beacon's greatest achievement was to encourage West Indian writers to examine their own societies, and to discard Eurocentric preconceptions and literary conventions. See Reinhard W. Sander and Peter K. Ayers (eds.), From Trinidad: An Anthology of Early West Indian Writing (1978).

BEAR, Greg(ory) (Dale) (1951–), American *science fiction writer, born in San Diego, California, educated at San Diego State University. His first works were *space operas such as Hegira (1979) and Strength of Stones (1981). His more substantial later works include Blood Music (1985), which deals with the consequences of biological experiment; Eon (1985) and its sequels Eternity (1988) and Legacy (1995), which describe the aftermath of nuclear war; The Forge of God (1987), which again deals with catastrophe; and Queen of Angels (1990), which predicts a high-tech, ecologically sound twenty-first century, and was followed by a sequel, Moving Mars (1993).

Beat Generation, The, a term applied to a group of writers who established a rebellion against society and came to prominence about 1956, centred in San Francisco and New York City. Whilst their activities overlapped with the development of the *San Francisco Renaissance, and with the influences and developments of figures like Charles *Olson and Robert *Creeley of the *Black Mountain School, their inception came about in New York City in the late 1940s, when Allen *Ginsberg, William *Burroughs, Jack *Kerouac, and others met in bars and cafeterias around Columbia University. Writing in the 1958 Esquire magazine, Jack Kerouac summarized the philosophy of the Beats: '. . . a generation of crazy illuminated hipsters suddenly rising and roaming America, serious, curious, bumming and hitchhiking everywhere, ragged beatific, beautiful in an ugly graceful new way—a vision gleaned from the way we had heard the word beat, meaning down and out but full of intense conviction.' Manifesting a weariness of corruption and a thoroughgoing critique of the crass commercialism of modern society, such writers as Kerouac, Ginsberg, Burroughs, Gregory *Corso, Lawrence *Ferlinghetti, and John Clellon *Holmes expressed themselves in a 'hip' vocabulary, combined with phrases and experiences from their dealings with Buddhism and Oriental philosophies, and their significant association with the jazz music and rhythms of people like Charlie Parker, Dizzy Gillespie, Miles Davis, and Thelonious Monk. The 'anti-establishment Beat bum' included other such figures as Carl Solomon, Michael *McClure, Philip *Whalen, Gary Snyder, and Philip Lamantia. Like many movements, they were largely the projection of the media, albeit aided and abetted by its participants. One of the pervasive fictions surrounding the Beat writers was their cult of energy, their tendency to exalt the present over the past, action over reflection, movement over stasis. Yet many of the Beat works also show an anxiety about attaining such a position, revealing a solitude and vulnerability despite the competing and contradictory demands of participation and communalism. These positions are evident in various works which have come to be regarded as seminal within the Beat movement, such as Jack Kerouac's On The Road (1957), a narrative about the experiences encountered on a road journey across the USA; Allen Ginsberg's Howl* (1956), an angry and vituperative critique of contemporary social values and mores; and Michael McClure's Ghost Tantras (1964), a formulation of poetry as beast language. There are various books about the Beats, but significant among them are Michael McClure's Scratching the Beat Surface (1982), and Arthur Knight and Kit Knight (eds.), The Beat Vision (1987).

Beatles, The, a popular music group from Liverpool consisting of George Harrison (1943–), John Lennon (1940–80), Paul McCartney (1942–), and Ringo Starr (1940–), which enjoyed enormous international acclaim from 1963 until it disbanded in 1970. Lennon and McCartney composed most of the group's repertoire, showing increasingly innovative melodic and lyrical abilities as their careers progressed. In 1965 each of the members was awarded the MBE. Their work took on a markedly experimental character in the Revolver album of 1966. Sergeant Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band (1967) set new artistic standards for popular music, drawing favourable responses from serious cultural commentators for the poetic and compositional achievements it represented. Lennon, whose idiosyncratic literary talent is evident in his books In His Own Write (1964) and A Spaniard in the Works (1965), was murdered in New York in 1980. Harrison, McCartney, and Starr have remained individually successful as entertainers since The Beatles broke up. Shout! (1981) by Philip Norman is the best of numerous histories of the group.

BEATTIE, Ann (1947–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Washington, DC, educated at the American University and the University of Connecticut; she has taught at Harvard and the University of Virginia. Beattie is known for her precise observations of suburban, middle-class life. Her early work in the collection of stories Distortions (1976) and the novel Chilly Scenes of Winter (1976) documents the fate of the idealism of the 1960s as 'the Woodstock generation' settles into comfortable middle-class middle age. Her novel Falling in Place (1980) is similarly concerned with the emotional disjunctures involved in being a contemporary urban American citizen and chronicles, largely through the eyes of the children, the breakdown of a conventional American marriage. Love Always (1985) combines a realistic attention to descriptive and thematic details with a satirical strain of black humour in its account of the world of contemporary media. Beattie's stories, which appear frequently in the New Yorker, have been collected in Secrets and Surprises (1979), The Burning House (1982), and Where You'll Find Me (1986); Picturing Will (1990) is a later novel.

BEAUMAN, Sally, see ROMANTIC FICTION.

BEAVER, Bruce (1928–), Australian poet, born in Manly, New South Wales. He led a peripatetic early life, including four years spent in New Zealand. As a young man he had suffered from manic depression and his early collections of poetry, Under the Bridge (1961), Seawall and Shoreline (1964), and Open at Random (1967), reflect his inner turmoil. Letters to Live Poets (1969), his major work, was written at great speed at a time when he thought he would lose his mind completely; the 'Letters' are confessional in tone and his reflections upon childhood and manhood, fears and obsessions, are effectively set against striking images of landscapes. Lauds and Plaints (1974), a sequence of poems celebrating the human spirit, combines a new optimism with effective experiments in form. Odes and Days (1975) includes poems addressed to Beethoven, Mahler, Holderlin, and Rilke. Other volumes include Death's Directives (1978), As It Was (1979), a prose poem, Charmed Lives (1988), and Anima and Other Poems (1994). He has also published several novels. New and Selected Poetry 1960–1990 appeared in 1991. As an editor of Poetry Australia he contributed to the development of the 'New Australian Poetry' in the 1960s and 1970s.

BEAVERBROOK, William Maxwell ('Max') Aitken, 1st Baron (1879–1964), newspaper proprietor. Having made a fortune in his native Canada, he came to England in 1910 and began a career in politics, rising to the position of Lord Privy Seal in Churchill's wartime Cabinet in 1943. Raised to the peerage in 1916 Beaverbrook became the most powerful figure in popular journalism, acquiring the Daily Express, the Evening Standard, and the Sunday Express during the course of his energetic career. A champion of the British Empire, he used his papers to crusade for his own, often controversial, political causes. He wrote several books on politics and the First World War, including The Decline and Fall of Lloyd George (1963). Lord Ottercove, in the novels of *Gerhardie, is modelled on Beaverbrook.

BECKETT, Samuel (Barclay) (1906–89), Irish playwright, born at Foxrock, near Dublin, the son of a quantity surveyor, and brought up as a Protestant. He was educated at Portora Royal School, Co. Fermanagh, and at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took a degree in modern languages. After nine months spent teaching French in Belfast, he became lecteur d'anglais at the Ecole Normale Superieure in Paris, where he formed a strong friendship with James *Joyce and where, after several unsettled years, he was to settle. His first published work, an essay on Joyce, and his first story, 'Assumption', both appeared in 1929. He went on to write literary journalism, translate, bring out a study of Proust in 1931, and produce his own poetry and fiction, publishing a collection of stories, More Pricks Than Kicks, in 1934. A volume of verse, Echoes Bones and Other Precipitates (1935), was followed in 1938 by Murphy, which made no public impact but launched him as a novelist. Waft was his next work in this genre, written in 1943 while he was a member of the French resistance and in hiding from the Nazis, but not published until 1953. By that time the trilogy of novels Molloy (1951), Malone Dies (1951), and The Unnameable (1953) had appeared in Paris, all originally written in French, all soliloquies paying a kind of anti-tribute to a grim, confusing, bleakly funny world. In terms of both style and feeling—most neatly summed up in the epigrammatic 'You must go on, I can't go on, I'll go on'—they have much in common with the plays that, with occasional exceptions, preoccupied Beckett for the rest of his writing life. Waiting for Godot*, originally performed in French as En Attendant Godot in Paris in 1953, established him as a dramatist of originality and importance. There followed many other contributions to what came to be known as the Theatre of the Absurd. The earlier of these include Endgame (1957); Krapp's Last Tape* (1958), in which a cynical and decrepit old man listens to the recorded voice of his younger, more hopeful self; Happy Days* (1961), in which a very ordinary middle-aged woman chatters cheerfully, seemingly oblivious of the fact that she is buried in a pile of sand, first up to her waist, then to her neck; and Play (1964), a triangle-drama in which husband, wife, and lover, trapped in funeral urns, endlessly re-enact their drab and sordid encounters. The plays of this period imply that man has been abandoned, for reasons unknown, in a world apparently designed to frustrate, disappoint, and hurt him; they show people pluckily enduring while suggesting that wisdom would be to submit resignedly to 'the void'; they find strikingly fresh theatrical forms for their author's bleak ruminations on the vanity of human wishes.

Beckett's attitudes changed little in his later plays, but their expression became more concise and concentrated. In Not I (1972) the audience sees only a spotlit mouth, which incoherently babbles out its owner's sorry life-story; in That Time (1976) an aged tramp's face listens to his own voice, free-associating his particular history; in Footfalls (1976) a ghostly woman trudges obsessively to and fro, 'revolving it all'; in Rockaby (1981) a much older woman sits in a rocking-chair, fatalistically preparing herself for oblivion; in Catastrophe (1982), dedicated to the dissident playwright Vaclav Havel and one of the few Beckett works with any political edge, a shivering prisoner is readied for public humiliation by an arrogant apparatchik. The plays of this period can be difficult, but their verbal beauty and visual daring are remarkable. Beckett also wrote for television (Eh Joe, Ghost Trio, . . . but the clouds . . ., Quad) and for radio (All That Fall, Embers, Rough for Radio I, Rough for Radio II, Words and Music, Cascando), and a silent movie which featured Buster Keaton, Film. He was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1969. Deirdre Bair's Samuel Beckett: An Autobiography, written without the author's permission, was published in 1978. Among the many critical studies of his work are Enoch Brater's Beyond Minimalism (1987) and Why Beckett (1989), and Beryl and John Fletcher's A Student's Guide to the Plays of Samuel Beckett (1985).

BEDFORD, Sybille (1911–), British novelist and essayist, born in Charlottenburg, Germany; she has used her cosmopolitan background to explore the complexities of European heritage and experience. Her first novel, A Legacy (1956), depicts a German aristocratic family whose way of life is undermined by the Prussian hegemony, which values efficiency and military might over gentler, more civilized values. In A Favourite of the Gods (1963) and A Compass Error (1968) she deals with a mother and daughter, Constanza and Flavia, and their life in Italy, France, and England between the wars. Constanza, the daughter of a rich American woman and an Italian prince, marries an English politician but later goes to live with a lover in the South of France, at a time when the region was beginning to attract the fashionable and the artistic. Flavia, whose story dominates the second novel, is sexually attracted to women not men; her predicament is drawn with great richness of detail. Bedford's lucid style, as much French as it is English, has contributed to the success of her other books, which include a two-volume life of Aldous *Huxley (1973 and 1974); an idiosyncratic and vivid travelogue of Mexico, The Sudden View (1953; reissued as A Visit to Don Otavio, 1960); The Best We Can Do: The Trial of Dr John Bodkin Adams (1958); The Faces of Justice (1961); and a collection of essays, As It Was (1990), which contains a remarkable account of the trial in Frankfurt of twenty-two former staff of Auschwitz concentration camp. Jigsaw (1989) is a memoir written as fiction, about Bedford's eccentric and artistic family.

BEER, Patricia (1924–), British poet, born in Exmouth, Devon, educated at the University of Exeter and St Hilda's College, Oxford; her father was a railway clerk and her mother a member of the Plymouth Brethren. Mrs Beer's House (1968) is a memorably vivid account of her early years and family background. She taught at various universities in Italy and at Goldsmiths' College, London. Her first collection of poetry was Loss of the Magyar (1959); further volumes include Just Like the Resurrection (1967), The Estuary (1971), The Lie of the Land (1983), Collected Poems (1988), and Friend of Heraclitus (1993). Her poetry ranges widely through personal, anecdotal, and historical subject matter, and frequently centres on the theme of mortality. The West Country is a distinct presence in her collections, contributing local detail and elements of legend and folklore to numerous poems. In her best work, a wry wit and a sometimes disturbing imagination combine with a highly developed descriptive talent to produce poems at once entertaining and latently serious. Her historical novel Moon's Ottery (1978) is set in Elizabethan Devon. Her critical works include An Introduction to the Metaphysical Poets (1972) and Reader, I Married Him (1974), which anticipated the burgeoning of *feminist criticism. Among her dramatic writings is Pride, Prejudice, and the Woman Question (1975), a play for radio.

BEERBOHM, (Sir Henry) Max(imilian) (1872–1956), British essayist and critic, born in London, educated at Merton College, Oxford. From 1892 he was publishing caricatures (signed 'Max') in the Strand and other periodicals, satirizing literary and political figures in his characteristic urbane and ironic tone; in 1894 the first of his essays, 'A Defence of Cosmetics', appeared in The Yellow Book. As half-brother to the actor-manager Herbert Beerbohm Tree he had already moved in theatrical circles when he succeeded G. B. *Shaw in 1898 as dramatic critic of the Saturday Review; his drama criticism was later collected in Around Theatres (1953) and More Theatres (1968). He also published The Happy Hypocrite: A Fairy Tale for Tired Men (1897) and collections of essays in The Works of Max Beerbohm (1896), More (1899), Yet Again (1909), And Even Now (1920), and A Variety of Things (1928). His cartoons, published as Caricatures of Twenty-Five Gentlemen (1896), The Poets' Corner (1904), A Book of Caricatures (1907), Fifty Caricatures (1913), and Rosetti and His Circle (1922), have a wicked eye for the absurdities of writers such as *Yeats, Wilde, or *Wells, without mocking their talents; like A Christmas Garland (1912), a brilliant collection of parodies of Wells, Henry *James, *Conrad, and others, they can be seen as an astute and unconventional form of literary criticism. Zuleika Dobson (1911), his best-known work, is a fantasy set at Oxford University which captured the atmosphere of the 1890s. Seven Men (1919) is a collection of short stories. The First World War drew a biting satire from Beerbohm (A Survey, 1921), and in the Second World War he began the radio broadcasts collected in Mainly on the Air (1957). A collection of his work was published in 1970 by The Bodley Head. He was knighted in 1939. Lord David *Cecil's Max: A Biography (1964) is an affectionate portrait.

BEHAN, Brendan (1923–64), Irish playwright, born in Dublin, son of a housepainter with strong republican sympathies. Behan, too, joined the IRA and was arrested and incarcerated after an unsuccessful bombing mission to Liverpool, a period he described in his entertaining memoir Borstal Boy (1958). His best-known plays are The Hostage (1958) and *The Quare Fellow (1959); both combine ebullient, anarchic humour with an undeniable seriousness of purpose. The Hostage concerns an English soldier held in a Dublin brothel; it shows Behan's own political disillusion, mocking and deglamorizing patriotic pretence in the tradition of Synge's Playboy of the Western World* and O'Casey's *The Plough and the Stars. The Quare Fellow, set in a prison in the hours before a hanging, mounts a robust case against capital punishment, and left the critic Kenneth *Tynan feeling 'overwhelmed, and thanking the powers that be' for Sydney Silverman, the leading abolitionist of the day.

BEHRMAN, S(amuel) N(athaniel) (1893–1973), American dramatist, born in Worcester, Massachusetts, educated at Clark, Harvard, and Columbia Universities. He enrolled in George Pierce *Baker's '47 Workshop' at Harvard, and went on to graduate work at Columbia University under Brander Matthews and St John Ervine. Of Behrman's twenty-six plays, several were co-authored, and some were adaptations, such as his version of Jean Giradoux's Amphitryon 38 (1937) and of Marcel Achard's Auprès de Ma Blonde as I Know My Love (1949), both written for America's foremost acting duo, the Lunts. His first success was with The Second Man (1927), a comedy about a novelist torn between two women; this motif of a central protagonist faced by mutually exclusive choices—in social and sexual relations, and in vocation—is common in his work. His best plays are Biography (1932), about the emotional conflicts which polarize the life of a successful woman portrait painter, and the semi-autobiographical No Time for Comedy (1939), in which a writer of popular comedies yearns to write serious plays. Behrman's resolute yet stylish dialogue was perfectly suited to the sophisticated social world represented in his plays.

BELASCO, David (1859–1931), American dramatist, born in San Francisco. Belasco wrote his first play at the age of 12 and worked in the theatre from the age of 14. Though he spent his apprentice years in San Francisco as an actor, producer, stage manager, and eventually theatre manager, his name is indelibly linked with the history of the theatre in New York from the mid-1880s to the early 1920s. He also had a talent for discovering gifted actors and actresses. In costumes, sets, and props, Belasco was obsessed with the demands of visual realism which led him to extraordinary feats of setting, and he pioneered the use of special lighting effects to strengthen the emotional appeal of a scene. He established his reputation as a playwright with an American Civil War drama, The Heart of Maryland (1895). His stage adaptation of John Luther Long's short story Madame Butterfly (1900), and his play about the 1849 California Gold Rush The Girl of the Golden West (1905), were made into operas by Puccini, which have become part of the standard repertoire.

BELBEN, Rosalind (1941–), British novelist, born in Dorset, the daughter of a naval officer. She is one of a handful of women novelists engaged in experimenting with fictional form in the European tradition. The author of several novels including The Limit (1974), Belben received the recognition she deserves only with the publication of Is Beauty Good (1989) and the reappearance of an earlier work, Dreaming of Dead People (1979). The former, which defies categorization, is a series of texts, prose poems, or meditations on the loss of the natural world. No one narrative voice unifies the work; rather, Belben uses polyphony to fine effect in her depiction of a decaying but recognizable world. Comparisons with Beckett are both appropriate and marginal; though the wit, irony, and bitter poetry of Belben's authorial voice does bear some resemblance to his, her vision is ultimately life-affirming. Dreaming of Dead People is a self-mocking confessional novel somewhat in the mode of Eva *Figes; alternately wry and poetic, structured around a core of fable (Robin Hood), the novel has a ribald, earthy attitude to sex and loneliness sometimes lacking in the works of Belben's fellow experimentalists, and is not dissimilar to the work of the mature Edna *O'Brien. Choosing Spectacles (1995) is more conventional in both style and structure than Belben's recent fictions, and yet characteristic of its author. Its central figure, a disaffected Eastern European, learns from his encounter with Europe, the Middle East, and Israel that politics and life yield no simple solutions.

BELL, (Arthur) Clive (Howard) (1881–1964), British art and literary critic, born at East Shefford, Bedfordshire, educated at Cambridge University. A central figure of the *Bloomsbury Group, he married Vanessa Stephen, elder sister to V. *Woolf, in 1907. At Cambridge, Bell became influenced by the moral philosophy of G. E. *Moore with its emphasis on the importance of the enjoyment of conversation and beautiful objects, which Moore considered to be 'the rational ultimate end of social progress'. Bell's concept of 'Significant Form'—in which the form, rather than the subject, of a work of art was the origin of a specific aesthetic emotion—was explored in Art (1914); this theory was influenced by Roger *Fry who, with Bell, stimulated public interest in the Post-Impressionists. Bell's other works include Poems (1921), Since Cezanne (1922), Civilization (1928), and Proust (1929). His memoirs, Old Friends: Personal Recollections (1956), contain interesting portraits of members of the Bloomsbury Group.

BELL, Gertrude (Margaret Lowthian) (1868–1926), British writer on travel and archaeology, born in Washington, County Durham, educated at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford; she subsequently acquired Persian and Arabic in the course of her extensive travels. In 1905 she began some ten years' work as an archaeologist. The Desert and the Sown (1907) formed an account of her first major expedition, which took her from Jerusalem to Konya in Turkey. She sustained a long friendship with T. E. *Lawrence after meeting him at the Carchemish excavations in 1911. The Thousand and One Churches (1909) and The Palace and Mosque at Ukhaidir (1914) are her most notable archaeological works. Recruited as an intelligence officer in 1915, she conducted liaison work throughout the Middle East and was posted in 1917 to Baghdad, where she founded Iraq's National Museum in 1923 and was chiefly resident until her death. Her other works include the translations of Poems from the Divan of Hafiz (1897) and the travel writings of Safar Nameh: Persian Pictures (1894) and Amurath to Amurath (1911). Her Letters (1927) were edited by Florence Bell. Susan Goodman's biography of Bell appeared in 1985.

BELL, Madison Smartt (1957–), American novelist and short-story writer, born on a farm in Nashville, Tennessee, educated at Princeton and Hollins College. He became a director of 185 Corporation, an artists' co-operative, and a teacher of creative writing. A European existentialism pervades his work, though it focuses largely on quintessentially American locales and often employs popular genres such as the thriller. His style is disaffected and laconic, reflective of a generation which has lost contact with old beliefs and which sustains itself through a kind of desperate mobility. His books include The Washington Square Ensemble (1983), Straight Cut (1986), Zero db (1987), Barking Man (1990), Save Me, Joe Louis (1993), and the ambitious All Souls' Rising (1996) about the 1802 uprising in Haiti.

BELL, Martin (1918–78), British poet, born in Southampton, where he was educated at the University. By profession he was a schoolteacher, and, latterly, an opera critic and lecturer. In 1964 he received the first of the Arts Council's Poetry Bursaries, and was Gregory Fellow of Poetry at Leeds University from 1967 to 1969. Bell's publishing history is unusual in that his Collected Poems: 1937–66 (1967) was the only independent collection he published in his lifetime; his experiences on active service during the Second World War had a disruptive effect on his development as a poet, with the result that he did not resume the serious practice of poetry until the mid-1950s. In 1962 his work appeared with poetry by George *Barker and Charles *Causley in Penguin Modern Poets: 3. Thematically and stylistically wide-ranging, Bell's writing recurrently draws upon his experiences as a soldier and a schoolteacher, which provide material for the wittily irreverent satires of patriotism and social convention in numerous poems. His ironically modulated tone often recalls the dandyism of Laforgue and other nineteenth-century French poets whose works he translated extensively. A senior member of the *Group, his energetic and imaginative style was a major influence on the work of several other members; he is referred to in Peter *Porter's introduction to Martin Bell: Complete Poems (1988) as 'father and tone-setter of Group discussions'.

Bell, The, a literary and socio-cultural periodical founded in 1940 by Sean *O'Faolain. Elizabeth *Bowen, Flann *O'Brien, Patrick *Kavanagh, Frank *O'Connor, and Jack B. *Yeats were among the contributors to the first issue. In the course of its fourteen-year career, the Bell was variously subtitled 'A Survey of Irish Life', 'A Magazine of Creative Fiction', and 'A Magazine of Ireland Today'; its concern with social and political matters gave rise to incisive commentaries on such topics as state censorship in Ireland, on which G. B. *Shaw wrote in an issue of 1945, the restrictive influence of the Church, and reactionary tendencies in Irish literature. In 1946 Peadar *O'Donnell succeeded O'Faolain as editor, although the latter remained closely involved with the journal; under O'Donnell's direction the Bell's socialist character became more pronounced and its critiques of Irish affairs more aggressive. W. R. *Rodgers and Louis *MacNeice were among the authors whose work sustained the magazine's connection with cultural activities in Ulster, in addition to which it repeatedly featured writing from various parts of Europe. The young Irish authors of the 1940s and 1950s whose reputations the Bell was important in fostering include Anthony *Cronin, John *Montague, Thomas *Kinsella, Brendan *Behan, and Conor Cruise *O'Brien. Having undergone financial difficulties which resulted in its temporary closure between 1948 and 1950, it finally ceased appearing in 1954. With the Dublin Magazine, the Bell is accounted the most important literary and intellectual journal of Ireland in the twentieth century.

Bell Jar, The, a novel by Sylvia *Plath, published under the pseudonym 'Victoria Lucas' in 1963. Its vivid, sometimes disturbingly evocative, imagery links it with her poetry. The title is supplied by the recurrent metaphor of 'the bell jar' as an enclosing barrier between the central protagonist, Esther Greenwood, and the possibility of valid relations with others. The narrative corresponds to the author's experiences in 1953, when she was a student guest editor of the magazine Mademoiselle; Esther undergoes growing emotional and intellectual conflicts following her move from university into the sophisticated environment of the New York fashion journal to which she has been appointed temporarily. Her ultimate rejection of the values represented by the magazine is enacted when she throws her expensive clothes out across the city from the top of a building; the incident also marks the advent of an acute phase of psychological instability, which culminates in attempted suicide. The concluding chapters chart a process of gradual recovery during Esther's hospitalization. Principal factors in her social alienation are her renunciation of the conventional attitudes to femininity chiefly articulated through Mrs Willard, the mother of her former boyfriend, and her sense that the artistic freedom she desires is repeatedly threatened with betrayal. Plath's story of late adolescent breakdown was compared by numerous critics to Salinger's *The Catcher in the Rye, a book with which The Bell Jar has in common its humorously cynical tone.

BELLOC, (Joseph) Hilaire (Pierre) (1870–1953), British writer, born in France to a French father and an English mother; he was educated at Balliol College, Oxford. Belloc took up journalism, contributing articles to The Speaker, a political and literary journal, sometimes in collaboration with *Chesterton, and soon earned a reputation as a writer of great versatility in both prose and poetry. His verses for children, which included The Bad Child's Book of Beasts (1896), More Beasts for Worse Children (1896), and Cautionary Tales for Children (1907), became justly famous. More serious lyrics were contained in Verses and Sonnets (1896, later withdrawn), Sonnets and Verses (1923), and Complete Verse (edited by W. N. Roughead, 1954). From 1906 to 1909 he was literary editor of the Morning Post during which period he was also Liberal MP for Salford; he disliked party politics, however, and attacked the values of contemporary society, often with his friend Chesterton, in Pongo and the Bull (1910), The Servile State (1912), and his paper The Eye-Witness (1911). Like Chesterton he was a staunch Catholic, arguing that cause in Europe and Faith (1920). As a historian, he wrote The French Revolution (1911), a succession of biographies of its principal historical figures, as well as lives of Charles I (1933) and Cromwell (1934); all are better known for their vitality than their impartiality. His travel books include The Cruise of the Nona (1925); The Path to Rome (1902), an account of a pilgrimage on foot from the Moselle Valley to the Vatican, for which Belloc provided his own illustrations; Paris (1900), Sussex (1906), and The Pyrenees (1909). His novels, some of which were illustrated by Chesterton, included Mr Clutterbuck's Election (1908), The Girondin (1911), The Green Overcoat (1912), and Belinda (1928), an original and touching love story. A biography by A. N. Wilson was published in 1984.

BELLOC-LOWNDES, Marie (1867–1947), British novelist and autobiographer, born in London, brought up mainly in France. The older sister of H. *Belloc, she wrote several volumes of memoirs, including I, too, Have Lived in Arcadia (1941), Where Love and Friendship Dwelt (1943), and The Merry Wives of Westminster (1946). She worked as a journalist for W. T. Stead and for Oscar Wilde; and of her many novels The Lodger (1913), based on the case of Jack the Ripper, is considered a minor classic. The Diaries and Letters of Marie Belloc-Lowndes 1911–1947, edited by her daughter Susan (1971), gives a picture of her life as a member of literary and fashionable society in the early years of the century.

BELLOW, Saul (1915–), American novelist, born in Lachine, Quebec, to Russian emigrant parents; he grew up in a Jewish ghetto in Montreal before moving to Chicago when he was nine. He was educated at the universities of Chicago, Northwestern, and Wisconsin. He has since taught English at a number of colleges, and served in the Merchant Marines during the Second World War. Since 1944 he has been a leading exponent of realism and an articulate voice of humanism in the USA, with his comic and tragic explorations of the modern predicament. His first novel, Dangling Man (1944), prepared many of the recurrent themes of his work, with its detailed study of a man suspended between civilian and military life. This study of isolation and philosophical investigation recurs in later novels, including The Victim (1947), in which Asa Leventhal finds himself locked in a system of anti-Semitic victimization and torment with Kirby Allbee. *The Adventures of Augie March (1953) brought him his first major success, with a tale of a Chicago boy battling through a life of difficulty and antagonism. After Seize the Day (1956), which clearly sets out Bellow's humanist aim to reinstitute the self against its annihilation, came Henderson the Rain King (1959). This novel provides one of the characteristic sentences from Bellow's work, that 'there are displaced persons everywhere', a notion upon which his writing works a series of variations. Set in a Jewish milieu, Herzog (1964) presents the dilemmas and crises which assail a middle-aged intellectual as he adjusts to cultural assimilation into Western Christian life. A series of plays, The Last Analysis (1965) and Out from Under, A Wen, and Orange Soufflé, collected in Under the Weather (1966), was followed by Mosby's Memoirs and Other Stories (1968). Mr Sammler's Planet (1970) criticizes the weaknesses of modern society through the eyes of a concentration camp survivor as he undergoes the trials of living in contemporary New York. Humboldt's Gift (1975; Pulitzer Prize) was followed by To Jerusalem and Back: A Personal Account (1976), a travelogue. The Dean's December (1982) offers a sour vision of the contemporary USA and Eastern Europe, as both encroach upon the central character of the novel. In this novel there is a strongly apocalyptic note, as Bellow became more convinced that the USA was being overhauled by forces which threatened the sanctity of the individual. In more recent years, this pessimism has led him to espouse increasingly conservative views. At the same time the tension between religious and secular concerns which has echoed through the novels seems now to fall on the side of examining human reason as though it were strictly limited in its efficacy. His prose style has moved towards a richness which belies his early comment that he wished his work to be viewed simply as entertainment. Him with His Foot in His Mouth and Other Stories (1984) was followed by More Die of Heart Break (1987), about a marriage between two apparently incompatible people, and The Bellarosa Connection (1989), a novel about a Jewish immigrant into the USA, while Something To Remember Me By (1991) collects three stories. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1976.

Beloved, a novel by Toni *Morrison, published in 1987 and winner of the Pulitzer Prize. The novel is loosely based on a true story and begins in 1873 Ohio where Sethe, an escaped slave, is living an isolated existence at 124 Bluestone Road with her daughter Denver and a poltergeist; her two sons, Howard and Buglar, had fled when they were only thirteen years old, and their grandmother Baby Suggs had died soon afterwards. The narrative moves from present to past with the painful 'rememories' of the characters: their horrific experiences as slaves at Sweet Home where Sethe had 'married' Halle Suggs; Halle's inexplicable disappearance; Sethe's dramatic escape during which she gave birth to her fourth child; her reunion with Baby Suggs at Bluestone Road; and Sethe's attempt to murder her children when threatened with recapture after only twenty-eight days of freedom. Three children were saved but 'crawling baby' ('Beloved') died after Sethe had cut her throat. This act brought an end to the 'twenty-eight days of having women friends, a mother-in-law, and all her children together'. For years they have tolerated the poltergeist in a state of numbed despair but '124 was spiteful. Full of a baby's venom'. With the arrival of Paul D, one of the former Sweet Home slaves, their loneliness is interrupted. He becomes Sethe's lover and banishes the poltergeist, but after a day at the carnival they return to find a young girl waiting by the gate; she is none other than the physical manifestation of Beloved. Denver at first enjoys her companionship but Beloved's increasing demands for her mother's affection create tensions, especially between Sethe and Paul D who has also succumbed to Beloved's sexual desires. He leaves and the situation deteriorates. The neighbourhood is alerted by rumours of impending danger at 124 and a group of black women gather round the house in a ritual that exorcises the ghost. In prose of great lyricism Morrison skilfully uses supernatural elements to explore the lost history of African-American slaves and the impact on them of the barbaric practices of the institutionalized slave system. Morrison gives her protagonists a fairly happy ending, celebrating resilience and survival; but the effects of systematic cruelty and destruction upon an entire community are left unresolved.

BENCHLEY, Robert (Charles) (1889–1945), American essayist, playwright, and reviewer, born in Worcester, Massachusetts, educated at Harvard. Benchley rose to a prominent position in the New York literary world by the end of the First World War; he was drama critic then managing editor of Vanity Fair, and a regular contributor to many New York journals including the New Yorker*, of which he was a founder member and drama critic. With Dorothy *Parker, Robert E. Sheridan, and others he established the influential Algonquin Hotel Round Table in 1920, which acted as a focal point for that group of brilliant young humorists which was to dominate the pages of the New Yorker for the next two decades. His essays and sketches first appeared in Of All Things! (1921), which was followed by another twelve collections in addition to several selections of his best writings, notably Inside Benchley (1942). He was also a minor actor and appeared in many films between 1928 and 1945. As an urbane and sophisticated humorist his influence has been acknowledged by E. B. *White and James *Thurber. Benchley: A Biography, by his brother, Nathaniel Benchley, appeared in 1955.

Bend in the River, A, a novel by V. S. *Naipaul, published in 1979. It is narrated by Salim, an East African of Indian provenance, who, in the aftermath of the disruptions and racial conflicts that result from the politics of African independence, migrates inland to rebuild his career in an unnamed country that resembles Zaire. Here, embodied in a vividly portrayed group of characters both African and Asian, he encounters the new attitudes engendered by colonialism; among these characters are his childhood servant Metty, the sorceress Zabeth and her son Ferdinand (Salim's would-be protégé), the Indian couple Mahesh and Shoba, and the cynical merchant Nazruddin. Salim's transient stability is shaken by the changes in a society caught between the old and the new. He is eventually engulfed in the vortex of prevalent rage and despair, with unfortunate consequences. The perspective of a narrator of Indian origin—simultaneously insider and outsider—serves to illustrate Naipaul's views of post-colonial Africa, allowing him to express contentious opinions in the voice of an onlooker distanced by status and culture from the society he describes. The strength of the novel's fictional elements—description, dialogue, and characterization—ultimately prevail over its powerfully documentary and topical content.

BENÉT, Stephen Vincent (1898–1943), American poet, born at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, educated at Yale. As an undergraduate he published two collections of verse, Five Men and Pompey (1915) and Young Adventure (1918). His first novel, The Beginning of Wisdom (1921), draws heavily on his experiences of university. Subsequent novels include Jean Huguenot (1923) and Spanish Bayonet (1926). As a writer of prose his accomplishment was more evident in his short stories; among his collections are Tales Before Midnight (1939) and Thirteen O'Clock (1937), the latter containing the well-known 'The Devil and Daniel Webster'. John Brown's Body (1928; Pulitzer Prize) gained him a considerable reputation as a poet. Its compelling use of traditional modes and its imaginative engagement with American history set the pattern for much of his later work, notably Ballads and Poems (1931) and Western Star (1943; Pulitzer Prize), the first part of an unfinished epic poem on the Western migrations of the nineteenth century. The rhetorical free verse of The Burning City (1937) included 'Litany for Dictatorships', his powerful denunciation of European fascism; his impassioned espousal of the democratic spirit continued in Nightmare at Noon (1940), the title poem warning America against indifference in the face of events in Europe. Selected Works appeared in two volumes in 1942. His Selected Letters (1960) was edited by C. A. Fenton, whose biography of Benét was published in 1958.

BENÉT, William Rose (1886–1950), American poet and literary journalist, born in Fort Hamilton, New York, educated at Yale. The elder brother of the poet Stephen Vincent *Benét and the third husband of the novelist and poet Elinor *Wylie, Benét was associate editor of the Literary Review of the New York Evening Post and in 1924 he co-founded, with Christopher Morley, the influential Saturday Review of Literature. He compiled over fifteen anthologies of prose and poetry including the The Reader's Encyclopaedia (1948). His early verse, such as that collected in Merchants from Cathay (1913), or The Falconer of God and Other Poems (1914), is marked by strong rhythms and somewhat naïve democratic sentiment, while his later poems show the influence of free verse and modernist experimentation with monologue and dialogue in a manner that invites comparison with Robert *Frost. Among other works are The Dust which Is God (1941; Pulitzer Prize), an autobiographical verse narrative; The First Person Singular (1922), a novel; and Day's End (1939), a play. His public appointments included the secretaryship of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Stanley Olson's Elinor Wylie, A Life Apart: A Biography (1979) contains some discussion of Benét's life and works.

BENNETT, Alan (1934–), British dramatist, born in Yorkshire, educated at Exeter College, Oxford. He first came to prominence as one of the authors and performers of the anti-establishment revue Beyond the Fringe (1960). There is also a satiric thrust to some of his own plays, notably Forty Years On (1968), set in the assembly hall of Albion House, a public school, in which scenes involving the headmaster and his colleagues are intercut with extracts from the school play, itself a series of witty skits on the cultural and political history of establishment England in the twentieth century. This treats subjects ranging from Virginia *Woolf, T. E. *Lawrence, and James *Baldwin to the British nanny with a gentle mockery and a rueful nostalgia, a mix characteristic of his work in general. His subsequent plays, though always marked by wry, sophisticated humour, have been more serious in intent and often more melancholy in tone. They include Getting On (1971), about a disillusioned Member of Parliament; Habeas Corpus (1973), about contemporary sexual mores; The Old Country (1977), about a British traitor living in Soviet Russia; Enjoy (1980), about the decline of both northern England and the family; and Kafka's Dick (1986), in which the Czech writer visits contemporary Britain. A play of broader scope is The Madness of George III (1991), about the personal and political ramifications of 'Farmer George's' affliction with porphyria. Bennett has also written screenplays for the films A Private Function and Prick Up Your Ears, and many dramatic pieces for television: among them An Englishman Abroad, a portrait of the spy Guy Burgess in Moscow, and Talking Heads (1989), a series of monologues which demonstrates another of his qualities, a humane yet humorous understanding of lonely, sad lives. His adaptation of Kenneth Grahame's A Wind in the Willows scored a major success at the National Theatre in 1990. Writing Home, a collection of his essays, personal observations and recollections, and introductions to his plays, appeared in 1995.

BENNETT, (Enoch) Arnold (1867–1931), British novelist, born in Hanley, Staffordshire, the eldest son of a self-educated and self-made solicitor who had struggled up to professional status from a family of potters and shopkeepers. Bennett was also destined for the law but he continued (uncharacteristically) to fail his legal examinations, rebelled against his dominating father, and escaped to London, where, after working briefly as a solicitor's clerk, he began to earn his living as a journalist and writer. In 1893 he became assistant editor and then editor of the periodical Woman, to which he contributed under various pseudonyms. His first serious short story, 'A Letter Home', was published in 1895 in The Yellow Book, and in 1898 appeared his first, somewhat gloomy, realistic novel, A Man from the North, about aspiring writer Richard Larch. He also began to write sensational fiction; The Grand Babylon Hotel (1902) was the first of many works to bear witness to Bennett's love of the fantasy world of luxury hotels (particularly the Savoy) and his penchant for writing about millionaires, chefs, and smart modern women. After his father's death in 1902 he published Anna of the Five Towns* and moved to Paris, where in 1907 he married Marguerite Soulie. He taught himself French, greatly admired the French realists, and became a lifelong Francophile: many of his works show an interesting cross-fertilization of French and home-grown realism. The Grim Smile of the Five Towns (short stories, 1907) was followed by one of the best of his lighter works, Buried Alive (1908), about a famous painter who chooses to change places with his dead valet and 'disappear'; his masterpieces *The Old Wives' Tale (1908) and *The Clayhanger Trilogy (Clayhanger, 1910; Hilda Lessways, 1911; These Twain, 1916; and a sequel, The Roll Call, 1918), both based largely in the 'Five Towns' or Potteries; and The Card (1911), the highly successful account of the warm-hearted opportunist adventurer, Denry Machin. In 1912 Bennett moved back to England, where he settled permanently and continued to produce much fiction of varying quality, including the short stories in The Matador of the Five Towns (1912), and the novels The Regent (1913), which features the Card as a theatrical impresario; The Pretty Lady (1918), about a gold-hearted courtesan; Mr Prohack (1922), a fantasy of sudden riches; Riceyman Steps* (1923), written after his separation from his wife and meeting with actress Dorothy Cheston, thenceforward his lifelong companion; Lord Raingo (1926), set in political circles, with which he had become familiar through his wartime friendship with *Beaverbrook; and Imperial Palace (1930), his last long novel of hotel life. Throughout his career Bennett was passionately interested in the theatre, where he had several successes, notably Milestones (1912), a family drama written in collaboration with E. Knoblock, and The Great Adventure (1913), a dramatization of Buried Alive. He also wrote a great deal of popular journalism, showing a populist gift for conveying information and enthusiasm in such volumes as Literary Taste: How To Form It (1909) and How To Live on 24 Hours a Day (1912). At different periods he wrote regularly on varying topics for the New Age, the Daily News, and the New Statesman, and from 1926 until his death contributed a weekly article on books to the Evening Standard. From 1896 he kept a Journal, consciously modelled on that of the Goncourt brothers, which was published in 1932–3, edited by Newman Flower; it gives a vivid portrait of his life and times and his rise through discipline and obsessional hard work to the position of one of the most influential and best-paid authors of the age. He died at his flat at Chiltern Court, Baker Street, after contracting typhoid in Paris. His letters, edited by James Hepburn, were published in three volumes (1966–70), and there is a biography by Margaret Drabble (1974). Bennett's reputation suffered in his later years from attacks by a younger generation of writers, notably Virginia *Woolf who used him as an example of the realist-materialist pre-modernist school in, for example, her essay 'Mr Bennett and Mrs Brown' (1923). His work never recovered the wide popularity it enjoyed during his lifetime, and although many of his works are still much enjoyed and admired, he has, like his friends and contemporaries H. G. *Wells and John *Galsworthy, received little academic attention.

BENNETT, Louise (1919–), Jamaican poet, born in Kingston, Jamaica, educated in Jamaica and at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art in London. She worked briefly for the BBC. When she first composed verses in 'patois' or Jamaican dialect in the 1930s and 1940s, Bennett used the language of the common people which was regarded as uneducated. But her early books such as (Jamaica) Dialect Verses (1942), Jamaican Humour in Dialect (1943), and Anancy Poems in Dialect (1944) indicate a passionate interest in using local speech to dramatize or comment on scenes, personalities, or issues drawn from ordinary life in Jamaica. Later, she gave readings and performances of her work which helped to establish her as both a poet and an authority on Jamaican folklore. Bennett's contribution to Caribbean literature is seminal in that her work introduced 'Creole' or 'Nation Language' to a wider public. Her later books, Jamaican Labrish (1966) and Selected Poems (1982), confirm her primary achievement: the transformation into literature of subjects and techniques normally considered appropriate only in oral art or folklore. She has received many awards including the Order of Jamaica (1974).

BENSLEY, Connie (1929–), British poet, born in south-west London. She has worked as a secretary, a medical copywriter, and in a bookshop. Having married and raised a family she began writing poems for publication in 1976; within twelve months her work had begun appearing in leading literary journals. Her first collection, Progress Report (1981), was followed by further volumes, including Moving In (1984), Central Reservations: New and Selected Poems (1990), and Choosing to Be a Swan (1994). Bensley's writing is characterized by an incisive clarity and appealing wit. She frequently bases poems on her views of social and personal behaviour, producing work that combines a telling economy of observation with a compassionately understated sense of the satirical. She has also written a number of plays for television and radio.

BENSON, A(rthur) C(hristopher) (1862–1925), British writer, brother of E. F. and R. H. *Benson, born at Wellington College, Berkshire, of which his father, E. W. Benson (1829–96), who later became Archbishop of Canterbury, was the first headmaster; he was educated at King's College, Cambridge. In 1904 he was elected a fellow of Magdalene College, of which he became Master in 1915. Among his early works in a prolific career are his Life of his father (1899); Fasti Etonenses (1899), a history of Eton; and the stories collected in The Hill of Trouble (1903) and The Isles of Sunset (1905). He produced numerous critical biographies, including those of Rosetti (1904), Fitzgerald (1905), and Ruskin (1911), and a succession of collections of essays, among which are From a College Window (1906) and Escape (1915). With the Second Viscount Esher, he edited three volumes of Selections from the Correspondence of Queen Victoria (1907), with whom he had been acquainted. He also enjoyed a considerable reputation as a poet and remains best known for 'Land of Hope and Glory', originally published with Elgar's music in 1902 as Coronation Ode for the coronation of King Edward VII; The Poems of A. C. Benson appeared in 1909. Between 1897 and 1925 he compiled a diary covering some 180 manuscript volumes, selections from which were published under Percy *Lubbock's editorship in 1926. Due to the acutely personal nature of the material, the diaries were not available for inspection until 1975, when David Newsome gained access to them for his biographical study entitled On the Edge of Paradise (1980); Newsome also edited Edwardian Excursions (1981), which contains further selections from the diaries.

BENSON, E(dward) F(rederic) (1867–1940), British novelist, brother of A. C. and R. H. *Benson, born at Wellington College, Berkshire, educated at King's College, Cambridge and the British School of Archaeology in Athens. His successful first novel, Dodo (1893), was followed by a stream of novels, biographies, and reminiscences. He is most famous for the series of comic novels he published during the 1920s and 1930s, the 'Mapp and Lucia' books, which satirize provincial life in the small coastal town of Tilling (Rye) and which contain, in the characters of Lucia, grande dame of Tilling, and her rival, Miss Mapp, two of the most endearing comic types in British fiction.

The novels include Queen Lucia (1920), Miss Mapp (1922), Lucia in London (1927), Mapp and Lucia (1931), Lucia's Progress (1935), and Trouble for Lucia (1937). In 1918 Benson moved to Rye, living at Lamb House, formerly the home of H. *James, and was elected mayor of the town in 1934 (an experience amusingly reflected in his Mapp and Lucia stories). His other fiction includes several volumes of ghost stories, such as The Room in the Tower (1912) and Visible and Invisible (1923), as well as novels such as the tragi-comic Mrs Ames (1912) and Paying Guests (1929). As We Were (1930) and Final Edition (1940) are autobiographies. He was awarded the OBE and made an Honorary Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. A biography by Brian *Masters appeared in 1991.

BENSON, Peter (1956–), British novelist, born in Broadstairs, Kent. He was living in Dorset, where he worked as a basketmaker, when his first novel, The Levels (1987), was published. The novel is a subtle adolescent romance set in the Dorset countryside, with rich resonances of folklore and myth. His interest in archetypal structure and his keen novelistic intelligence are displayed in A Lesser Dependency (1988), a more controversial work. In its challenging theme and its fragmented structure, this novel represents a radical departure from the formal simplicity of his first novel. The Other Occupant (1989) is the terse account of a young man's deep emotional involvement with an elderly woman dying of cancer, which returns to the more conventional first-person narration and the rural setting of The Levels with the larger themes of death, rural bigotry, and violence. Odo's Hanging (1993), in characteristically simple, image-laden language, tells of the making of the Bayeux tapestry in the voice of a deaf-mute. Riptide (1994) interweaves images of surfing and turbulent sexuality in a story of a boy's encounter with, and ultimate loss of, his lost mother.

BENSON, R(obert) H(ugh), The Very Reverend (1871–1914), British writer, younger brother of A. C. and E. F. *Benson, son of E. W. Benson, Archbishop of Canterbury. Ordained in the Anglican Church, he became a Roman Catholic in 1903 and rose to high office in the priesthood. Like his brothers he was a prolific writer, producing many novels, some of which were apocalyptic (The Lord of the World, 1907), some historical (Come Rack! Come Rope!, 1912), and some concerned with contemporary moral dilemmas, featuring virtuous Roman Catholics, as in The Sentimentalists (1906), about saving a nearly lost soul, and The Average Man (1913). He also wrote books on religion, and was briefly a friend and collaborator of F. W. *Rolfe.

BENTLEY, Edmund Clerihew (1875–1956), British journalist and writer of *detective fiction and light verse, born in London, educated at Merton College, Oxford. He was called to the Bar in 1902 but subsequently became a journalist on the Daily News and on the Daily Telegraph, where he was leader writer from 1912 to 1934. In Biography for Beginners (1905), illustrated by his lifelong friend G. K. *Chesterton, he invented the epigrammatic verse form called 'clerihew' after his second name. His detective story Trent's Last Case (1913, US title The Woman in Black) has been immensely popular since its publication and has been made into three films, in the last of which (1953) Orson Welles played the financier Sigsbee Manderson, the murder victim. Intended, in the author's words, as 'an exposure of detective stories', it in fact proved influential in the later development of the genre; its hero, Philip Trent, a witty, occasionally facetious young artist, whose speech is full of literary quotations, is the first in a long line of similar fictional detectives, including, for example, Dorothy *Sayers's Lord Peter Wimsey. Trent's Own Case (1936, written in collaboration with H. Warner Allen) and Trent Intervenes (1938), a collection of short stories, are less successful. Other works include a thriller, Elephant's Work: An Enigma (1950; US title The Chill) and an autobiography, Those Days (1940).

BENTLEY, Phyllis (1894–1977), British novelist, born in Halifax, West Yorkshire, educated at Cheltenham Ladies' College and the University of London. She wrote nearly thirty books, including nineteen novels, many of them set in the West Riding of Yorkshire, including Environment (1922), her first novel, and Carr (1929). Success first came with Inheritance (1932), which began a saga about the Oldroyd family of mill owners covering several decades beginning with the Industrial Revolution; the last in the series was A Man of His Time (1966). A Modern Tragedy (1934) reflects the Depression of the 1930s; and Manhold (1941) moves back to the eighteenth century. Later works include the novel Sheep May Safely Graze (1972), and a collection of Tales of West Riding (1974). She also wrote extensively about the Brontë family, in such works as The Brontës (1947), The Young Brontës (1960), and The Brontës and Their World (1969), and edited the Heather edition of their works. Her autobiography, O Dreams, O Destinations, appeared in 1962.

BERENSON, Bernard (1865–1959), American art historian, born near Vilnius in Lithuania; from 1875 onward he grew up in Boston, Massachusetts, and was educated at Harvard. As a student he was influenced in the eventual formulation of his theories concerning the tactile and spatial values of art by William *James's emphasis on the primarily subjective nature of aesthetic experience. In 1887 he left America, travelling widely in Europe before settling near Florence in 1900 at I Tatti, the villa he later bequeathed to Harvard. Throughout the 1890s he acquired an unrivalled knowledge of Italian painting; his four monographs on Renaissance art, The Venetian Painters (1894), The Florentine Painters (1896), The Central Italian Painters (1897), and The North Italian Painters (1907), collected as Italian Painters of the Renaissance (1930), were held in such regard that they were referred to as 'the Four Gospels'. He became very wealthy by availing art dealers of his skill in the attribution of paintings, and from 1906 to 1939 was in close association with Lord Duveen, the leading international dealer of the day. His other studies of Italian painting include Venetian Paintings in America (1916) and Sienese Paintings (1918); Italian Pictures of the Renaissance (1932) lists the locations of paintings by the principal artists. Latterly, he wrote numerous works of a more general nature, among which are Aesthetics and History in the Visual Arts (1948), the clearest statement of his belief in the 'life enhancement' afforded by art, and Seeing and Knowing (1954). His tastes in painting did not extend to twentieth-century art, much of which he despised, although he greatly admired Cezanne. Sketch for a Self-Portrait (1949), Rumor and Reflection (1952), his wartime journal, and Passionate Sightseer (1960) are autobiographical works rich in critical and philosophical commentary; Sunset and Twilight (edited by N. Mariano, 1963) contains selections from his diaries from 1947 to 1958. Meryle Secrest's Being Bernard Berenson (1979) is the fullest of several biographies.

BERESFORD, J(ohn) D(avys) (1873–1947), British novelist, born in Castor, Northamptonshire, educated at Oundle School. After many years working as a draughtsman in an architect's office he turned to fiction. He received high praise from the critics with his first novel, Jacob Stahl (1911), the first volume of a trilogy which also included A Candidate for Truth (1912) and The Invisible Event (1915). He continued to produce many more realistic and traditional novels including several *science fiction works, such as The Hampdenshire Wonder (1911), Goslings (1913), and The Camberwell Miracle (1933), which presented a dark view of the consequences of change in the manner of H. G. *Wells.

BERGER, John (Peter) (1926–), British novelist, artist, and art critic, born in Stoke Newington, London, educated at London's Central School of Art and Chelsea School of Art. Among his influential works as an art critic are Permanent Red: Essays in Seeing (1960), The Success and Failure of Picasso (1965), Art and Revolution: Ernst Neizvestny and the Role of the Artist in the U.S.S.R (1969), The Moment of Cubism and Other Essays (1969), and Ways of Seeing (1972), based on a BBC television series and celebrated for its iconoclasm about traditional notions of art. Open-ended rather than dogmatic, his art criticism is very much concerned with the pressures of social context and class relations on artistic form. Notably European in outlook, his novels include A Painter of Our Time (1958), about an artist affected by the Hungarian Revolution of 1956; The Foot of Clive (1962); Corker's Freedom (1964); and G (1972; Booker Prize), a highly experimental novel about a Don Juan in pre-First World War Trieste. His collaborations with photographer Jean Mohr include A Fortunate Man: The Story of a Country Doctor (1967), A Seventh Man: Migrant Workers in Europe (1975), and Another Way of Telling (1982), on the aesthetics of photography. His screenplays in collaboration with Swiss film director Alain Tanner consist of La Salamandre (1971), Le Milieu du Monde (1974), and Jonas (1976). Berger's years living and working in a small peasant community in the French Alps resulted in his fictional trilogy Into Their Labours (1992) which consists of Pig Earth (1979), Once in Europa (1987), which he described as 'a collection of love stories set against the disappearance of "modernisation" of such village life', and Lilac and Flag (1990). In his novel To The Wedding (1995) a family travels from different parts of Europe to converge at a wedding. Essays on art, aesthetics, and politics are collected in Keeping a Rendezvous (1992).

BERGER, Thomas (1924–), American novelist, born in Cincinnati, Ohio, educated at the University of Cincinnati and Columbia University. His first novel, Crazy in Berlin (1958), introduced the figure of Carlos Reinhart, who reappears in Reinhart in Love (1961), Vital Parts (1970), and Reinhart's Women (1982). Reinhart moves through the world encapsulated in the bubble of the American dream, an innocent and honest man continually assaulted by a selfish society. Berger's ironies form an extended critique not only of the contemporary world but also of its historical antecedents; as Little Big Man (1964) makes clear, the sustaining myth of the American West is actually founded on a series of lies and half-truths. Berger presents Custer as a vain psychotic, and the settling of the frontier is seen as an act of genocide which exterminated virtually every trace of a noble, democratic race. Berger's Indians practise a kind of sexual and religious tolerance which is entirely at variance with the hypocritical puritanism of their white conquerors. The book's central figure is an utterly marginalized man, unable to integrate himself fully into the Indian way of life and unwilling to associate himself with its destroyers. He nevertheless remains the voice of conscience; his distance from America reflects Berger's own detachment from his native land. Yet, despite his reputation as a black humorist, Berger remains committed to American ideals.

BERGONZI, Bernard (1929–), British critic, born in London; he left school at 15 to work as a clerk. He was subsequently educated at Newbattle Abbey College, Dalkeith, and Wadham College, Oxford. In 1971 he became Professor of English at the University of Warwick. The Early H. G. Wells (1961) was the first of his numerous works of criticism, which also include Heroes' Twilight (1965), a study of the literature of the First World War; T. S. Eliot (1972); Reading the Thirties: Texts and Contexts (1978); The Myth of Modernism and Twentieth Century Literature (1986); Exploding English (1990), his sometimes provocative analysis of the present state of English studies; and Wartime and Aftermath: English Literature and Its Background, 1939–1960 (1993). He has published two collections of poetry, Descartes and the Animals (1954) and Years (1979), which display an attractive combination of concentration and accessibility and frequently make use of a shrewdly understated wit. His novel The Roman Persuasion (1981) draws on his extensive knowledge of the 1930s to evoke the ambivalent reactions of an English Catholic family to the Spanish Civil War.

BERKELEY, Anthony, pseudonym of Anthony Berkeley COX (1893–1971), British crime writer, born in Watford, educated at University College, London. He contributed to Punch, and under his own name published several comic novels (e.g. Brenda Entertains, 1925); as Francis Iles he reviewed crime and other fiction for the Daily Telegraph and later the Sunday Times and Manchester Guardian. The Layton Court Mystery (1925) was the first of a series of bright and amusing detective stories written under the name of Berkeley, most of which have the amateur detective Roger Sheringham as their central figure. Others include The Wychford Poisoning Case (1926), The Silk Stocking Murders (1928), The Piccadilly Murder (1929), Jumping Jenny (1933; US title Dead Mrs Stratton), and The Poisoned Chocolates Case (1929), originally a short story, which is undoubtedly the best. Very different from these are the three powerful and realistic psychological studies of crime and murder published under the name of Francis Iles—Malice Aforethought (1931), Before the Fact (1932), and As for the Woman (1939), which have little or no detective element. He was the founder, in 1928, of the Detection Club and became its first honorary secretary.

BERKOFF, Steven (1937–), British dramatist, born in London, educated at Hackney Downs Grammar School; he studied mime at the École Jacques Le Coq, Paris, finished his training for the stage at the Webber-Douglas Academy in London, and has since frequently appeared in adaptations and original plays written by himself. His work has always been notable for the opportunities it offers actors for bravura physical invention. It has also been marked by verbal daring, often comprising parodic poetic effects, and by a fierce anti-establishment thrust. His dramatic versions of other people's writings include Kafka's The Penal Colony (1968), Metamorphosis (1969), and The Trial (1971); Aeschylus's Agamemnon (1973); Poe's Fall of the House of Usher (1974); and Wilde's Salome (1989). His own plays include exotic portraits of contemporary London, East (1975) and West (1983); Greek (1979), a raucous satire of the Oedipus story; Decadence (1981), a bitter and scathing portrait of English social divisions as represented by an arrogant, gourmandizing upper-class lout and the working-class man he effortlessly intimidates; and Kvetch (1986), which switches from dialogue to aside in what becomes a feverish exposure of the fears, frustrations, and tensions beneath the surface of conventional lower middle-class life; One Man (1993), a trio of solo plays including one which memorably permitted Berkoff to embody both a yobbish East Ender and his dog; and Brighton Beach Scumbags (1994), about the doleful joys of a group of friends at a seaside resort.

BERLIN, Sir Isaiah (1909–), British moral and political philosopher and historian of ideas, born at Riga in Latvia, the son of a timber merchant, educated at St Paul's School and Corpus Christi College, Oxford, gaining his MA in 1935. Throughout his career he has lectured at Oxford, and was President of Wolfson College from 1966 to 1975. He has also held numerous visiting professorships in the USA and was President of the British Academy between 1974 and 1978. The critique of determinist philosophies of history in Historical Inevitability (1954) has remained central to his work; Berlin emphasizes the ultimate incompatibility of historical determinism with the free will of the individual. The essentially plural nature of morality was the principal theme of his seminal Two Concepts of Liberty (1959), which was collected with Historical Inevitability and two other works under the title Four Essays on Liberty (1969); the book confirmed his reputation as one of the leading liberal intellectuals of the twentieth century. His other publications include Essays on J. L. Austin (1973), Vico and Herder: Two Studies in the History of Ideas (1976), and The Magus of the North: J. G. Hamana and the Origins of Modern Irrationalism (1993). Russian Thinkers (1978), Concepts and Categories (1978), Against the Current (1979), Personal Impressions (1980), and The Crooked Timber of Humanity (1990) are collections of his essays edited by Henry Hardy. Berlin has also produced translations from the Russian, among which are versions of Turgenev's First Love (1950) and A Month in the Country (1981). Isaiah Berlin: A Celebration, edited by Edna and Avishai Margalit, appeared in 1991.

BERNSTEIN, Charles (1950–), American poet, born in New York, educated at Harvard; he became David Gray Professor of Poetry at the State University of New York at Buffalo, successor to Robert *Creeley. Editor of L-A-N-G-U-A-G-E with Bruce *Andrews, editor of The Politics of Poetic Form (1990), author of two collections of essays Content's Dream (1986) and A Poetics (1992), he has done as much as anyone to publicize and theorize *Language Poetry in which 'the text calls upon the reader to be actively involved in the process of constituting its meaning'. Hence his joke about romanticism in poetry: 'Poetry is like a swoon, with this difference: | it brings you to your senses' ('The Klupzy Girl'). This conviction of the power of radical formal experimentation to challenge the 'incredible amount of illusory materiality' in contemporary culture results in a witty, sometimes comic or satiric collaging of different discourses ranging from personal statements, official jargon, science, and traditional poetic language. He writes mostly shorter poems, collected in books such as Controlling Interests (1980), Resistance (1983), The Sophist (1987), The Absent Father in Dumbo (1990), and Dark City (1994); an edited collection, Live at the Ear, appeared in 1994. His poems are capable of a bravura lyricism, elegant musical phrasing, and complex puns in an impressive range of styles.

BERRIGAN, Ted (1934–83), American poet, born Providence, Rhode Island; he spent three years in the United States army before studying at the University of Tulsa, and from there he moved to New York City in 1960. It was through his residence in the city and his founding, and editing, of 'C' Magazine that he became associated with the *New York School of Poets; like many of the poets, notably John *Ashbery and Frank *O'Hara, Berrigan's work evinces a preoccupation with effects drawn from the influences of surrealism, abstract expressionist painting, and serial music. His first volume of verse was Sonnets (1964) and subsequent volumes include Bean Spasms (1967; co-authored with Ron Padgett), Many Happy Returns to Dick Gallup (1967), In the Early Morning Rain (1970), and So Going Around Cities: New and Selected Poems, 1958-1979 (1980). Berrigan held teaching positions at the University of Iowa and the University of Essex.

BERRY, James (1924–), British poet, born in Boston, Jamaica; he arrived in London in 1948. After years of working as a telegraphist (1951–77), he became a full-time writer. He conducts writing workshops at comprehensive schools and has taken an active interest in multicultural education. Rooted in Jamaican proverbs and folklore, and imbued with avuncular wisdom, many of his poems are in Creole dialect, or Nation Language, as he calls it, following Edward Kamau *Brathwaite. His collections include Fractured Circles (1979), Lucy's Letter and Loving (1982), Chain of Days (1985), and Hot Earth, Cold Earth (1995). 'Fantasy of an African Boy' won the British National Poetry Competition in 1981. He has published several books for children, including Anancy-Spiderman (1989) and The Future-Telling Lady (1991), collections of short stories. He has also edited pioneering anthologies of poems by black British writers including Bluefoot Traveller (1976), Dance to a Different Drum (1983, a Brixton Festival anthology), and News for Babylon (1984). He was awarded an OBE in 1990. See also JAZZ POETRY and DUB POETRY.

BERRY, Wendell (Erdman) (1934–), American poet, novelist, and essayist, born in Henry County, Kentucky, educated at the University of Kentucky, where he became Distinguished Professor of English in 1971. The intensity of his writing's involvement with the human and natural characters of his native locality has gained him recognition as one of the leading regional writers of the twentieth century. Nathan Coulter (1960), A Place on Earth (1967), The Memory of Old Jack (1974), and Remembering (1988) form a series of novels chronicling social and economic change in a Kentucky tobacco-farming community from the late 1930s onward. A Continuous Harmony (1972), The Gift of Good Land (1981), What Are People for? (1990), and Sex, Economy, Freedom and Community (1993) are among the numerous collections of essays in which his experiences as a farmer and his wide erudition combine in discussing the cultural and economic bases of viable forms of community; he is widely regarded as a leading authority on ecologically sustainable agriculture. The critique of modern materialism that is a recurrent theme in his prose also informs his poetry, collections of which include The Broken Ground (1966), The Country of Marriage (1974), The Wheel (1982), and Sabbaths (1987). His verse displays a high degree of accomplishment in both traditional forms and eloquently direct free verse. Collected Poems 1957–1982 appeared in 1985. Among his other publications is The Wild Birds (1986), a collection of short stories.

BERRYMAN, John (1914–72), American poet, born John Smith in McAlester, Oklahoma; his father committed suicide in 1926 and he subsequently adopted his stepfather's name. He was educated at Columbia University, New York, and at Clare College, Cambridge. From 1939 onwards he was a lecturer and latterly a professor at various American universities, notably the University of Minnesota. His poems began appearing in periodicals in 1935 and attracted favourable critical responses when a selection was featured in Five Young American Poets (1940). Poems (1942) and The Dispossessed (1948) established him as one of the leading American poets of the generation that included Robert *Lowell, Delmore *Schwartz, and Randall *Jarrell. Berryman described his earlier verse as Anglo-American 'period style', considering it to rely broadly upon the examples of *Yeats and *Auden; his great accomplishment and individuality of voice were, however, clear in poems like 'The Moon and the Night and the Men' and 'Canto Amore'. Homage to Mistress Bradstreet (1956) gained him wider recognition, drawing comparisons with *The Waste Land from Frank *Kermode and Edmund *Wilson for the force and originality of the complex interactions between its personal, historical, and cultural dimensions. Berryman's Sonnets (1967) confirmed his ability to combine a highly developed command of traditional forms with the emotional and intellectual urgency conveyed by the range and individuality of his tones. The breadth of reference, technical adaptability, and psychological intensities of his poetry culminated in 77 Dream Songs (1964) and His Toy, His Dream, His Rest: 308 Dream Songs (1968), which appeared in a collected edition as *The Dream Songs in 1969. In Love and Fame (1971) the religious elements intermittently present in earlier work achieve consolidated expression in the conversationally discursive 'Eleven Addresses to the Lord'. A Collected Poems, edited by Charles Thornbury, was produced in 1990. For many years Berryman's compulsive and erratic behaviour resulted in recurrent admissions to psychiatric hospitals; he killed himself by jumping from a bridge in Minneapolis in 1972. The energetic development of his poetry provides a notable instance of success in following *Empson's injunction to 'learn a style from despair'. Among his other works are the biography Stephen Crane (1951), a collection of essays entitled The Freedom of the Poet (1976), and the autobiographical novel Recovery (1973). The Life of John Berryman by John Haffenden was published in 1982. See also CONFESSIONAL POETRY.

BESTER, Alfred (1913–87), American writer of *science fiction, born in New York, educated at the University of Pennsylvania. He is best known for his short stories of the 1950s and for his novels The Demolished Man (1953), which combined science fiction and the thriller in its depiction of a murderer who attempts to outwit the police in a society of the future, and Tiger! Tiger! (1956), which transposed the plot of A. Dumas's The Count of Monte Cristo (1844) into a 25th-century world of predatory corporations, space travel, and exorbitant passions. Bester's work influenced the new writers in the genre of the 1960s including S. R. *Delany, T. M. *Disch, and R. *Zelazny. His later novels include The Computer Connection (1975).

Bestsellers (and 'Bestsellerism') are particularly associated with the twentieth-century American book trade. The practice of systematically identifying certain books as noteworthy for the speed and volume of their sales began with the American monthly magazine The Bookman, and its editor, Harry Thurston Peck, in 1895. The magazine was the first to list a selection of new titles, 'in order of demand'. In the 1890s, the fiction bestseller lists of The Bookman were dominated by British titles. The earliest recorded use of the noun 'bestseller' is 1902. In 1912 the American trade magazine Publisher's Weekly began issuing a bestseller list, which has been authoritative in America ever since. A year later the magazine began dividing bestsellers into fiction and non-fiction (although the term 'bestseller' automatically evokes a certain kind of novel), and since 1913 further subdivisions have emerged.

Examining Publisher's Weekly records in 1945, Alice Payne Hackett determined that the all-time bestseller was Charles Monroe Sheldon's crude Christian epic In His Steps (1895) with cumulative sales over sixty years of over eight million. Gone with the Wind (1936) had clocked up three and a half million in nine years (these figures disregarded Book Club sales). Undertaking a similar exercise in 1965, Hackett calculated that Grace Metalious's steamy saga of sex in a New England suburb, Peyton Place (1956), had sold almost ten million in less than ten years. Lawrence's newly publishable (since 1959) Lady Chatterley's Lover* had achieved sales of 6.3 million, and Harold Robbins's fictionalized, and sensationalized, account of the life and loves of Howard Hughes, The Carpetbaggers (1960), came in at 5.5 million. In 1975 Hackett discovered that with the paperback 'revolution' of the late 1960s, a further exponential growth had occurred. There were now novels like Mario Puzo's The Godfather (1969), Peter Blatty's The Exorcist (1971), and Erich Segal's Love Story (1970) which sold ten million or more in five years. In the 1980s and 1990s, despite competition from other media, sales of bestselling novels continued to rocket—in both hardback and paperback. In the 1980s, Stephen *King's novels were routinely brought out in first print runs of a million in the expensive form, and many millions in cheap form.

Over the decades, bestseller lists have also begun to emerge in regional newspapers and in Sunday supplements (for example, the Los Angeles Times, the Washington Post, and the Chicago Tribune). But nationally, the Publisher's Weekly and New York Times lists dominate. In Britain (and Europe generally) there was considerable resistance to bestseller lists which, it was felt, distorted customers' buying habits, creating a 'stampede' mentality and inhibiting the range of bookshops' stock. The first reliable lists were introduced in England by The Bookseller and The Sunday Times in the mid-1970s. They are now an established feature of the British book trade, which has in other ways accommodated to American high-pressure salesmanship (notably in the practice of discounting the sales price of books which figure on the lists).

'Literature' has an uneasy relationship with bestsellerism. In Britain, particularly, the machinery involved has been seen as culturally pernicious (this view was put forward very influentially by Q. D. Leavis in Fiction and the Reading Public, 1932). None the less, a number of British writers (notably Graham *Greene, with his 'entertainments') achieved bestseller status. In America the literary quality of supersellers tended to be low, and their content bland, during the inter-war years. An exception was John Steinbeck's angry muck-racking *The Grapes of Wrath, which was the top novel in America in 1939. A significant breakthrough occurred in 1958, when Boris Pasternak's Dr Zhivago made number 1, and Vladimir Nabokov's Lolita* number 2 on the American list. Thereafter it was unusual for 'quality' bestsellers to be absent. Some, like Philip Roth's Portnoy's Complaint* (number 2 in 1963), or any of Norman *Mailer's early novels, were sexually 'frank', exploiting the freedom achieved by the acquittal of Lady Chatterley in 1959 (1960 in the UK). But also the elevated level of bestsellers would seem to reflect the huge investments in education undertaken by the USA and Britain after the Second World War. At times, the lists seem to reflect two publics: in 1973, for instance, the top-selling novel was Jacqueline Susann's Once Is not Enough, and the third title, Kurt *Vonnegut's Breakfast of Champions. In Britain in the 1990s, although sales are proportionately much lower than in America, novelists like Martin *Amis, Julian *Barnes, Vikram *Seth, Salman *Rushdie, and A. S. *Byatt have topped the bestseller lists.

Various definitions of what a 'bestseller' is have been attempted. Frank Luther Mott's calculus ('a total sale equal to one per cent of the current population of the continental United States in the decade in which it was published') is statistically neat, but comes up with some odd results, since it minimizes rate of sale. Bestsellers are books of the year (sometimes of the month, or week), not the decade. The best working definition of a bestseller is a work which appears in the bestseller lists. Historical surveys of twentieth-century bestsellers can be found in F. L. Mott's Golden Multitudes: The Story of Best Sellers in the United States (1947); Alice Payne Hackett's regular updates to her initial Fifty Years of Best Sellers, 1895–1945 (1945); and Bowker's Annual of Library and Book Trade Information which summarizes the year's bestsellers in America. There is nothing equivalent in the UK, although Alex Hamilton in the Guardian newspaper and the London Evening Standard Diary column attempt an annual round-up of the year's bestsellers.

BETHELL, (Mary) Ursula (pseudonym, Evelyn Hayes) (1874–1945), New Zealand poet, born in Rangiora near Christchurch, educated at schools in Oxford and Geneva. From 1890 until 1908 Bethell worked with the poor and underprivileged as a member of an Anglican community in London and returned to New Zealand after the First World War. At the age of about 50 she began writing. Her poetry is characterized by a plainness and spareness (as well as freshness of image) which distinguishes it from the more ornamented verse the country had previously produced. From a Garden in the Antipodes (1929) was originally composed as letters to a friend, and, as in Bethell's other collections, Time and Place (1936) and Day and Night: Poems 1924–1935 (1939), the domestic focus is combined with religious belief and a broad range of general and classical reference. Her work has also been seen as part of the construction of a national identity. In her lifetime all collections were published under a pseudonym, but Bethell herself was a considerable literary figure in the Christchurch of the day and mentor to the younger Caxton group, notably Denis *Glover and Allen *Curnow. Her posthumously published Collected Poems (1950) was republished in 1985 with an introduction by Vincent *O'Sullivan.

BETJEMAN, Sir John (1906–84), British poet, born in Highgate, London; his childhood and youth are described in detail in his blank-verse autobiography Summoned by Bells* (1960). He was educated at Highgate Junior School, where T. S. *Eliot was among his teachers, at Marlborough College, and at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he became well acquainted with W. H. *Auden and Maurice *Bowra; he impressed the latter with his 'extraordinary originality' as a wittily accomplished poet and independently minded aesthete and bon viveur. Having left Oxford without a degree, he was briefly engaged as a schoolmaster, before he began writing for the Architectural Review in 1931. Mount Zion, his first collection of poetry, appeared in 1932, and was followed by numerous volumes, among which are Continual Dew (1937), New Bats in Old Belfries (1945), A Few Late Chrysanthemums (1954), and A Nip in the Air (1974). Betjeman was a widely popular poet by the time his Collected Poems appeared in 1958; the book was remarkably successful, running to ten impressions by 1960, before the appearance of an enlarged second edition in 1962. Although largely discounted by successive generations of academic critics, his poetry displays a technical virtuosity and an emotional, intellectual, and imaginative cohesion which argue for his stature as a major talent. Philip *Larkin was among the most fervent of his admirers, noting the generous range of his work and the attractive eccentricity of his 'heterogeneous world of farce and fury, where sports girls and old nuns jostle with town clerks and impoverished Irish Peers'. From the early 1930s onward he produced books on architecture and topography, which include Ghastly Good Taste (1933), Vintage London (1942), and Cornwall (1965). In 1972 he succeeded C. *Day Lewis as Poet Laureate. Young Betjeman (1988) is the first part of Bevis Hillier's authorized biography. See also TOPOGRAPHICAL POETRY.

Between the Acts, V. Woolf's last novel, published posthumously in 1941. Unrevised, it is constructed in short scenes of dialogue, dramatic speech, and fragmentary descriptions with recurring motifs. It expresses Woolf's interest at this time in an English history made up of a community of obscure, ordinary lives, in the possibility of anonymity of the author, in the relation between groups and individuals (she was reading Freud), and in the decay of traditional language into 'orts, scraps and fragments'. The setting is an English manor house, Pointz Hall, on a single summer day in war-time. The Oliver family, who have lived in the house for 120 years, consists of the older generation, Bartholomew Oliver and his sister Lucy Swithin (whose arguments over rational fact versus mystical faith rather resemble those of the Ramsays in To the Lighthouse), Isa and Giles Oliver, and their small son. Theirs is a difficult marriage: Isa writes poetry secretly and fantasizes about a neighbouring farmer; Giles is hostile and aggressive. Two uninvited lunch guests, the crude Mrs Manresa and the awkward homosexual William Dodge, increase the tension. In the afternoon the village pageant is put on by Miss La Trobe, the novel's artist figure, lonely, eccentric, lesbian, who uses every means she has—pastiche, tableaux, music, repetition, a megaphone, silence, nature itself—to attempt to make an unresponsive audience understand English history and see themselves in the broken mirrors she holds up to them. She feels she has failed, though Mrs Swithin seems to understand her. The day ends as Giles and Isa resume, as in a play, the marital pattern of fighting and love.

Beyond the Horizon, a three-act tragedy by Eugene *O'Neill, first produced in 1920 when it won a Pulitzer Prize. Often regarded as the play which marks the onset of serious modern American drama, Beyond the Horizon is an exploration of the bondage of family life which constrains the ambitions of its central characters. In addition, it offers an early version of a characteristic figure of O'Neill's theatre, the would-be poet whose circumstances confine him to a place and mode of life which frustrates his idealism. The brothers Robert and Andrew Mayo, studies in contrasting types who are bonded by a deep sibling love, grow up on their parents' New England farm: Robert, the dreamer, signs on his uncle's ship seeking to fulfil his dreams of romantic otherness through exploration of the world beyond his immediate horizons, intending Andrew to take over the farm. However, they are both in love with the same woman, Ruth Atkins; just before Robert is to leave, Ruth persuades him to marry her and stay behind, and Andrew sails in his place. The impractical Robert brings the farm to ruin, and his marriage becomes a lifeless ritual, briefly propped up by the birth of a daughter, Mary, who dies in early childhood. Andrew, whose experiences at sea have made him tough and unemotional, finally returns when Robert is dying of consumption. Urged by Robert to marry Ruth and save the farm, Andrew turns on Ruth in a frenzy of bitter repudiation for her failure with Robert. The immediate source of Beyond the Horizon was a play by the Irish writer T. C. *Murray, Birthright; in the depiction of Robert and Ruth's marital disharmony, O'Neill also drew on his knowledge of Strindberg's plays. This play provides an early example of the dramatic arena of familial conflict that he would eventually make his own in the history of modern American theatre.

BHATTACHARYA, Bhabani (1910–88), Indian novelist, born in Bhagalpur, educated in Patna and in London. He is strongly influenced by Rabindranath *Tagore and Mahatma Gandhi. Social realism, with a social purpose, marks Bhattacharya's work, showing its affinity with the work of Mulk Raj *Anand. So Many Hungers (1947) deals with exploitation and greed set against the background of the Independence movement and the Bengal famine of the early 1940s. The 'hungers' of the title are seen through the eyes of Kajoli, a destitute village girl. In He Who Rides a Tiger (1952), a poor blacksmith, Kalo, is jailed for stealing a bunch of bananas and vows revenge on society. Posing as a holy brahmin who has had a miraculous vision, Kalo thrives on the fraud until he discovers that he cannot dismount the 'tiger', which he has created, without ruining himself. Other works of fiction include the novels Music for Mohini (1952), A Goddess Named Gold (1960), and A Dream in Hawaii (1978), and the short stories in Steel Hawk (1968).

BIDART, Frank (1939–), American poet, born in Bakersfield, California, educated at the University of California at Riverside and at Harvard University. Bidart studied under Robert *Lowell at Harvard and is generally discussed as one of that younger generation of 'post-confessional' poets which acknowledges Lowell as a major influence whilst at the same time seeking to extend and develop the confessional lyric medium he bequeathed. Bidart's verse is notable for its attempt to dramatize ordinary speech, and individual poems often take the form of dramatic monologues in a manner that resembles the similar use of this medium in the poetry of Robert Browning and Robert Frost. His volumes of verse include Golden State (1973), The Book of the Body (1977), The Sacrifice (1983), and In the Western Night: Collected Poems, 1965–1990 (1990). Bidart became a Professor of English at Wellesley College and has also taught at Brandeis University and the University of California at Berkeley.

BIDGOOD, Ruth (1922–), Anglo-Welsh poet, born in Seven Sisters, near Neath, Glamorgan; after reading English at Oxford, she served in the Women's Royal Naval Service and subsequently worked for Chambers Encyclopaedia in London. The Given Time (1962), her first collection of poetry, was followed by Not Without Homage (1975), The Print of Miracle (1978), Kindred (1986), Lighting Candles (1982), and Selected Poems (1992). Her poetry displays a recurrent concern with her surroundings in Abergwesyn, Breconshire, where she has lived since 1960. In much of her work, imaginative and emotional content is deftly interfused into treatments of topographical, social, or historical aspects of the locality.

BIERCE, Ambrose (Gwinett) (1842–1914?), American journalist, born in Horse Cave Creek, Ohio. He fought in the Civil War, and after extensive travels in America, moved to San Francisco and became a columnist for numerous magazines and newspapers. He travelled to England in 1872, where he wrote under the pseudonym 'Dod Grile', and published three compilations of his witty sketches: Nuggets and Dust Panned out in California (1873), The Fiend's Delight (1873), and Cobwebs from an Empty Skull (1874). On his return to San Francisco in 1877 he wrote for Hearst's Examiner, becoming the most provocative writing force on the West Coast, his frequent vitriol earning him the nickname 'Bitter Bierce'. His Tales of Soldiers and Civilians (1891; retitled In the Midst of Life, 1892), widely acclaimed for such short stories of the American Civil War as 'Chickamauga' and 'An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge', and his further collection Can Such Things Be? (1893), established him as a writer of sardonic humour, aptly contrasting images of horror and beauty, and a master of the unexpected ending. His subsequent works included the The Monk and the Hangman's Daughter (1892), a medieval romance; Fantastic Fables (1899); Shapes of Clay (1903), satiric verse; and Collected Works (12 volumes; 1909–12). The Cynic's Word Book (1906), later retitled The Devil's Dictionary (1911), is a compendium of cynical and witty definitions attacking politicians, materialistic values, and bourgeois life. The Enlarged Devil's Dictionary, edited by E. J. Hopkin, appeared in 1967. In 1913 Bierce travelled into revolutionary Mexico, where he mysteriously vanished.

Big Sleep, The, a novel by Raymond *Chandler, published in 1939. The Big Sleep is the first of Chandler's series of detective novels which feature Philip Marlowe as their hero and, many would argue, the greatest. The complex plot, however, has perplexed many readers and after the novel was adapted for the cinema in 1946 the director, Howard Hawks, is reputed to have said that 'neither the author, the writer, nor myself knew who had killed whom'. (The screenplay was written by William *Faulkner.) Chandler's prose, which owes much to the influence of Ernest *Hemingway, is strikingly effective here in giving a surreal sense to the city of Los Angeles where the action takes place.

BILLINGTON, Rachel (1942–), British novelist, born in Oxford, educated at London University. She is the daughter of Francis Pakenham, the 7th Earl of Longford, and Elizabeth, Countess of *Longford, and the sister of Antonia *Fraser. Her protagonists are almost invariably drawn from the gentry. Her first two novels, All Things Nice (1969) and The Big Dipper (1970), are comedies of manners, but beneath the caustic wit, there is a more sombre, even violent, tendency which is apparent in Lilacs Out of the Dead Land (1971) and developed in successive works. Obsessive passion is the predominant theme in Cock Robin (1972), Beautiful (1974), and A Painted Devil (1975), all of which demonstrate her elegant prose style and her skilful use of dialogue. A Woman's Age (1979), more epic in scale, centres on the life of its female protagonist from a difficult past to a promising political career. Occasion of Sin (1982) is Billington's reworking of Tolstoy's Anna Karenina. In Loving Attitudes (1988), she explored the relationship between a middle-aged woman and the daughter she had given up for adoption over twenty years before. Bodily Harm (1992), a psychologically acute, discomforting love story, is alternately narrated by an aggressor and his victim, each damaged by childhood events. As well as novels, which also include The Garish Day (1985), Theo and Matilda (1990), The Family Year (1992), and Magic and Fate (1996), Billington has also written children's books, plays for television, and The Great Umbilical (1994), concerning the relationship between mothers and daughters.

Bim, a Caribbean literary magazine which first appeared in December 1942, published by the Young Men's Progressive Club, under the founding editorship of the late Barbadian writer Frank Collymore; among subsequent editors have been A. N. Forde, Edward Kamau *Brathwaite, John Wickham, and E. L. Cozier. Together with the Guyanese journal Kyk-Over-Al (1945–61) it exerted a great influence over the development of Caribbean literature. Produced twice yearly in Barbados, Bim was the most important literary outlet in the Caribbean during the formative years of West Indian literature. George *Lamming wrote in an introduction to the June 1955 issue: 'There are not many West Indian writers today who did not use Bim as a kind of platform, the surest, if not the only avenue, by which they might reach a literate and sensitive reading public, and almost all of the West Indians who are now writers in a more professional sense and whose work has compelled the attention of readers and writers in other countries, were introduced, so to speak, by Bim.' The younger Caribbean journal Savacou* produced a special issue (7/8, 1973) as a 70th-birthday tribute to Collymore, including reprints from back issues of Bim as well as new writing by its contributors.

BINCHY, Maeve (1940–), Irish romantic novelist and short-story writer, born in Dublin, educated at University College, Dublin; she became a columnist for the Irish Times in 1968. She published three collections of short stories before her first and best-known novel, Light a Penny Candle, appeared in 1982. The story of Elizabeth, a girl evacuated from London to a small Irish village in the Second World War, and her lifelong friend, Aisling, it has an emotional power that owes much to contrasts between village and city. Similar contrasts are evident in Binchy's subsequent novels, including Echoes (1985), Firefly Summer (1987), Silver Wedding (1988), and Circle of Friends (1990). The Copper Beech (1992) interweaves the lives of individuals with the life of a community, while in The Glass Lake (1994) a woman leaves her husband and children and disappears to England, in order to escape the religious and cultural oppression of 1950s' Ireland.

BINYON, (Robert) Laurence (1869–1943), British poet and art historian, born in Lancaster, educated at Trinity College, Oxford. He worked throughout his career at the British Museum, where he became Keeper of the Department of Oriental Prints and Books. The best-known of his numerous works as an art historian is Painting in the Far East (1908). As a poet, he is inevitably remembered for his 'For the Fallen' ('They shall not grow old, as we that are left grow old . . .'), which was collected in The Winnowing Fan: Poems on the Great War (1914). He went to the Western Front in 1916 as a Red Cross orderly and produced a further collection of poems directly concerned with the war, The Cause (1918). The authoritative public tone he achieved in response to the Great War was sustained in later collections, among them the long ode The Idols (1928), The North Star (1941), and The Burning of the Leaves (1944), his widely acclaimed meditation on the Second World War. A Collected Poems in two volumes appeared in 1931. He wrote a number of verse-dramas, which include Attila (1907) and Arthur (1923), the latter with music by Elgar. The refinement and lucidity of his style are well displayed in his terza rima translation of Dante's Divina Commedia (1933, 1938, 1943). His other works include the critical studies English Poetry and Its Relation to Painting and the Other Arts (1919) and Landscape in English Art and Poetry (1931).

Biography; modern biography begins with James Boswell's comprehensive attention to his subject's character and habits in The Life of Samuel Johnson (1791), which bears out his preface's claim that 'I profess to write not his panegyrick, . . . but his life'. Throughout the Victorian era, however, biography was largely given over to memorializing the great and good as examples of the link between virtue and achievement, an ethos culminating in the foundation of the Dictionary of National Biography in 1882. Reaction against the conventions of nineteenth-century biography came in the form of Lytton *Strachey's iconoclastic accounts of Matthew Arnold, Florence Nightingale, Cardinal Manning, and General Gordon in Eminent Victorians (1918). He also produced a wittily irreverent life of Queen Victoria (1921) and the melodramatic Elizabeth and Essex (1928), the latter initiating the Freudian mode of biography in its attention to psychological dimensions of experience. Strachey's selective procedures, his energetic, if occasionally erratic, spirit of free enquiry, and his careful narrative constructions provided a working example for many succeeding writers. Among the books which sustained the development of biography from the late 1920s are The Stricken Deer (1929), David *Cecil's imaginative life of William Cowper, and Peter *Quennell's Four Portraits (1945), dealing with Boswell, Edward Gibbon, Laurence Sterne, and John Wilkes. The succession of popular biographical studies published by Hesketh *Pearson from 1930 onward indicates the increasing interest of a general readership in biography. Richard Aldington's Portrait of a Genius, But . . . (1950), his treatment of D. H. *Lawrence, and the especially vitriolic Lawrence of Arabia: A Biographical Enquiry (1955) both exemplify the frequent tendency of post-war biographies to shock venerators of their subjects. The Untried Years, the first part of Leon *Edel's five-volume Henry James (1953–72), and Erik *Erikson's Young Man Luther (1958) established the value of a directly psychoanalytical approach; the markedly clinical nature of Erikson's work is reflected in his designation of it as 'psychobiography'. Freudian theory was evident in the procedures of many biographers throughout the 1950s and 1960s, the Oedipus complex often constituting a central device; latterly, the approach has been discredited for its reductive questing after conclusive explanations for the courses of lives and works.

The ascendancy of biography as a literary form in more recent decades may be dated from Richard *Ellmann's James Joyce (1959) and George *Painter's Marcel Proust (two volumes, 1959, 1965). These extended studies combined strong narrative development and penetrating critical intelligence with assiduous detailing of their subjects' lives and socio-cultural situations; they set the pattern for numerous distinguished works, among which are the following: Michael *Holroyd's life of Lytton Strachey (two volumes, 1967–8); Robert *Gittings's John Keats (1968); Jon *Stallworthy's Wilfred Owen (1974); Anne *Thwaite's Edmund Gosse (1984); Maynard Mack's Alexander Pope (1985); Humphrey *Carpenter's A Serious Character (1988), the fullest available life of Ezra *Pound. The steady chronological progression, naturalistic procedures, and crowded casts of protagonists of such books suggest that biography's present marked popularity may result from its surrogacy for the traditional long novel at a time when prose fiction frequently aspires to innovation.

Experimental strategies have been repeatedly employed in the writing of lives. The compendious Dickens (1990) by Peter *Ackroyd succeeds in fusing scholarship of the order that won acclaim for his T. S. Eliot (1984) with audacious imaginative departures. Written in the authorial first person, A. J. A. *Symons's The Quest for Corvo: An Experiment in Biography (1934) is dramatically effective in emphasizing the investigative nature of biographical research. In a similar vein, Richard *Holmes's Footsteps (1985) alternates between biography and autobiography in its account of the travels through Europe which preceded his writing of Shelley: The Pursuit (1974). Ian *Hamilton's In Search of J. D. Salinger (1988) also draws on its author's subjective experiences in its description of the protracted legal conflicts with his reclusive subject; the book finally appeared after litigation led to the withdrawal of two previous versions.

Numerous critics view biography as the primary mechanism of the cult of literary personality, fostering interest in authors' lives at the expense of attention to their works. Apologists for the genre maintain that it represents the tradition of descriptive criticism in an age dominated by modes of literary theory which are often considered aridly abstract; through the identification of connections between the life and the works, texts are firmly related to the social and cultural conditions prevailing at the time of composition and their implications for the present may be more clearly discerned. In an age of ethical and aesthetic pluralism, the remarkably wide readership for scholarly biographies is a welcome index of the continuity of a common literary culture. Informative discussions of the subject are contained in Robert Gittings's The Nature of Biography (1978); The Biographer's Art, edited by Jeffrey Meyers (1989); and The Troubled Face of Biography, edited by Eric Homberger and John Charmley (1988).

BIRMINGHAM, George A., pseudonym of James Owen HANNAY (1865–1950), Anglo-Irish novelist and Church of Ireland clergyman, born in Belfast, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and ordained in 1889. He was rector of Westport, County Mayo, from 1892 to 1913. In such early novels as The Seething Pot (1905), Hyacinth (1906), and The Bad Times (1908), he explored Irish political issues from a moderate nationalist standpoint. He is best known for his light-hearted popular novels, many of which focus on the red-haired curate, the reverend J. J. Meldon, and are comic portraits of Irish life and manners. They include Spanish Gold (1908), The Lighter Side of Irish Life (1911), and Send for Dr. O'Grady (1923). The Red Hand of Ulster (1912) satirized Unionist militancy, and proved to be all too prophetic. His comedy General John Regan (1913), a gentle dig at nationalism, sparked a riot, and a subsequent boycott of his writings. His other works include A Padre in France (1918), recording his experiences as an army chaplain during the First World War; An Irishman Looks at His World (1919); A Public Scandal and Other Stories (1922); A Wayfarer in Hungary (1925); and Pleasant Places (1934), his autobiography. He particularly valued his works of ecclesiastical history, The Spirit and Origin of Christian Monasticism (1903) and The Wisdom of the Desert (1904).

BIRNEY, (Alfred) Earle (1904–95), Canadian poet and novelist, born in Calgary and brought up on farms in Alberta and British Columbia; he was educated at the universities of British Columbia, Toronto, and California (Berkeley). Birney was a prominent Trotskyite in the 1930s, an experience about which he wrote in his novel Down the Long Table (1955). From 1946 until his retirement in 1965 he was Professor of Medieval Literature at the University of British Columbia. One of Canada's most important poets, Birney has written in a wide variety of styles and about a vast range of subjects, Canadian and international. His early verse was influenced by *Auden and demonstrates a belief in the power of art as an agent for social change. This phase of his writing made extensive use of myth and was strongly influenced by his scholarly interests in early English culture. Subsequently he moved on to write free verse, *concrete poetry, and work in which North American oral idioms are more prominent. His volumes of poetry include David (1942), Strait of Anian (1948), Ice Cod Bell and Stone (1962), and Near False Creek Mouth (1964). Birney continued to write poetry after his retirement, and his Collected Poems appeared in 1975. His most important work in other genres includes the comic picaresque novel Turvey (1949) and the verse-drama The Damnation of Vancouver (original title: Trial of a City, 1952), which considers whether modern civilization should be destroyed.

Birthday Party, The, a play by Harold *Pinter, performed in 1958 and published in 1959. Pinter's first full-length play, a critical and box office failure when first produced, it involves the mental destruction of a young pianist living obscurely in a seaside town. It is never clear what Stanley Webber has done to attract the malignant attentions of Goldberg and McCann; but these two sinister intruders come to stay in the boarding house where he rooms, throw a bewildering number of improbable accusations at him, and then break his spirit at a birthday party they organize for him. The next day they take him, transformed into a zombie in a business suit, to some unspecified destination. The play, though more surreal and less naturalistic than the plays Pinter was to write in the 1960s, is still characteristic in its combination of ordinary, idiomatic language and an atmosphere of mystery and menace. It has been subjected to various interpretations, for instance as a metaphorical portrayal of the trauma of growing up and joining the adult world, but it is probably best regarded as an evocation of insecurity and dread, the more unsettling for being unspecific.

BISHOP, Elizabeth (1911–79), American poet, born in Worcester, Massachusetts, educated at Vassar College, New York; she was brought up from early infancy by her grandparents after her father died and her mother became chronically ill. She spent her first six years in Great Village, Nova Scotia, which is vividly recalled in her short story 'Primer Class', then returned to Worcester. The poetry she wrote as a student includes 'The Flood' and 'Some Dreams They Forgot', works in which her characteristic combination of an almost casual tone and idiosyncratic meticulousness of form is already apparent. In 1934 she began her lasting friendship with Marianne *Moore, with whose poetry her own has in common its purposive and precise richness of concrete imagery and its qualities of deft moral implication; 'Efforts of Affection', a memoir of Moore, is included in her Collected Prose of 1984. North & South (1946), her first collection of verse, was widely acclaimed. The poems were reprinted with eighteen additional pieces, including 'At the Fishhouses', one of her best-known works, as Poems: North & South/A Cold Spring in 1955. She held the post of Poetry Consultant at the Library of Congress in 1949–50 and was resident in Brazil between 1951 and 1966. Questions of Travel (1965) contains poetry vividly informed by her experiences of South America. Brazilian folklore and the exotic fecundity of her natural surroundings are adapted to disquietingly intense effect in 'The Riverman'. Her ability to embody a sense of mystery in sharply delineated imagery is equally evident in 'The Man-Moth', 'A Letter To N. Y.', and other poems. 'Visits to St Elizabeth's', a memorable account of her meetings with Ezra *Pound during his post-war confinement, also appears in the volume of 1965. Geography III (1976), her last collection of poetry, featured work of new emotional directness and meditative eloquence. Complete Poems, 1927–1979 was published in 1984.

BISHOP, John Peale (1892–1944), American poet, born in West Virginia, educated at Princeton. As a student he began lasting friendships with Edmund *Wilson, his collaborator on The Undertaker's Garland (1922), a humorous miscellany of verse and prose about death, and F. Scott *Fitzgerald, who is said to have taken Bishop as the model for Tim D'Invilliers in This Side of Paradise (1920). Although many of his contemporaries admired the lyrical concentration and classical precision of his verse, he published only three principal collections, Green Fruit (1917), Now with His Love (1933), and Minute Particulars (1936). The last contains much of his best work, written after he took up residence at Cape Cod, Massachusetts, in 1934 upon returning from France where he had lived since the early 1920s; 'A Subject of Sea-Change' is perhaps his finest poem, its compelling philosophical eloquence sustained with maritime imagery of rich particularity. His Virginia background is reflected in much of his writing, which is deeply informed by his elegiac sense of the passing of the patrician culture of the pre-Civil War era; the short stories of Many Thousands Gone (1931) are predominantly given Virginian settings. He also produced the highly regarded novel Act of Darkness (1935) and made valuable contributions to the Kenyon Review* and other leading critical journals. Edmund Wilson edited his Collected Essays (1948); Collected Poems (1948) was edited by Allen *Tate, whose correspondence with Bishop was published under the title The Republic of Letters (1981, edited by T. D. Young). Elizabeth Spindler's John Peale Bishop: A Biography appeared in 1980.

BISSETT, Bill (1939–), Canadian poet, born in Halifax, Nova Scotia, educated at Dalhousie University and the University of British Columbia. In addition to his activities as a writer and publisher, chiefly with the Blewointmentpress, Vancouver, from 1963 to 1983, Bissett has worked in a wide variety of occupations. His idiosyncratically experimental poetry, which has appeared in some sixty books since Th jinx ship nd othr trips (1966), is characterized by phonetic spellings, lower case typography, and a tenacious philosophical and political radicalism. His better-known publications include nobody owns the earth (1971), MEDICINE my mouths on fire (1974), Plutonium Missing (1978), canada gees mate for life (1985), and hard 2 beleev (1990). His deliberately restricted vocabulary confers an emphatic primitivism on the monosyllabic nouns and verbs that dominate his work. Selected Poems: Beyond Even Faithful Legends appeared in 1980.

BISSOONDATH, Neil (1955–), Trinidadian novelist and short-story writer, born in Arima, Trinidad, the nephew of V. S. *Naipaul; in 1973 he emigrated to Canada, and was educated at York University, Toronto. The bleakly compassionate treatments of the lives of immigrants to Canada in Digging Up the Mountains (1985), his first collection of stories, initiated the concern with exile and cultural displacement which pervades his work. A Casual Brutality (1988), his first novel, deals with the tragic consequences of a doctor's return to his native Caribbean, where violent political upheaval dispossesses him of any sense of belonging. A further collection of stories, On the Eve of Uncertain Tomorrows (1990), recurrently portrays the vulnerability to exploitation and injustice which immigrants from different cultural backgrounds have in common in Canadian cities. The Innocence of Age (1992), Bissoondath's second novel, has a white Canadian as its chief protagonist, whose alienation from an increasingly materialistic and violent Toronto forms the basis of his identification with members of the immigrant population.

BLACKBURN, Paul (1926–71), American poet, born in St Albans, Vermont, educated at New York University and the University of Wisconsin. He was poetry editor of the Nation in 1962 and subsequently held various appointments as a writer-in-residence before becoming a lecturer at the City College of New York in 1968. His earlier collections of verse include The Dissolving Fabric (1955), Brooklyn-Manhattan Transit (1960), and The Nets (1961). Blackburn's open poetic forms and experimentally dispersed typographical effects indicated his affinities with the group of poets associated with *Black Mountain College, in whose Black Mountain Review his work appeared. The Cities (1967) gained him a wider readership through its skilfully precise evocations of the numinous aspects of everyday phenomena. His ability to imbue a sometimes disturbing directness of manner with unobtrusive suggestions of traditional lyric modes is among the most impressive qualities of his poetry. Among his numerous further publications are In, On, or About the Premises (1968), Halfway Down the Coast (1975), and The Journals (1975), a record in poetry and prose of his last years. Collected Poems (1985) is edited by E. Jarolim. His works as a translator include Proensa (1953), his highly regarded versions of Provençal lyrics, and Hunk of Skin (1968), his translations of poems by Pablo Picasso.

BLACKBURN, Thomas (Eliel Fenwick) (1916–77), British poet, born in Hensingham, Cumberland, educated at Cambridge and Durham Universities. He was a lecturer at the University of Leeds from 1964 to 1966. His first collection of poetry, The Outer Darkness (1951), was followed by numerous others, including The Next Word (1958), A Smell of Burning (1961), The Fourth Man (1971), Bread for the Winter Birds (1980), and The Adjacent Kingdom: Collected Last Poems (1988; edited by Jean MacVean). His early poetry, while richly musical and thematically original, is sometimes conspicuously influenced by *Yeats. A plainer and more flexible voice emerged during the 1960s when he began producing poetry of urgency and poise in response to his religious and psychological preoccupations. His work received generous attention in Rule and Energy (1963), John Press's important survey of post-war British poetry. Among his prose works are A Clip of Steel (1969), an autobiography recounting his devastatingly traumatic childhood experiences; The Feast of the Wolf (1971), a novel; and The Price of an Eye (1974), his critical work on modern poetry.

BLACK ELK (1863–1950), Native American, a Lakota of the Oglala band of Sioux Indians. Cousin to Crazy Horse, he was a wichasha wakon—a holy man or priest—visited by a series of visions which gave him confirmation of his adopted role. In August 1930 the American poet John G. *Neihardt, known also as Flaming Rainbow, visited Black Elk and, using Black Elk's son Ben as an interpreter, conducted a series of talks with him. The results were published as Black Elk Speaks (1932), which has since become the most famous of all Native American narratives. Black Elk lived through Custer's defeat at the battle of the Little Big Horn, witnessed the Ghost Dance religion, and survived the massacre of his people at Wounded Knee. He toured Italy, France, and England with Buffalo Bill, even dancing in front of Queen Victoria. More than an autobiography or a history of the Sioux, Black Elk Speaks is also a book of instruction: Black Elk's primary aim was to 'save his Great Vision for men'. Neihardt conveys Black Elk's sense of the Great Being who is 'older than all need, older than all pain and prayer'. In 1947 Joseph Epes Brown also visited Black Elk; the result was The Sacred Pipe (1953), in which Black Elk concentrated on 'the Seven Rites of the Oglala Sioux'. The book contains a detailed and moving account of the religious practices of the Sioux Indians. In 1973 Neihardt released a three-record set of readings and reminiscences of Black Elk and other Indians, his voice registering beautifully the passion and humanity of their understanding of the world. Black Mask, American *pulp magazine, specializing in *hardboiled detective fiction. Originally founded (and later repudiated) by H. L. *Mencken in 1920, Black Mask was at its peak under the editorship of Captain Joseph T. Shaw from 1920 to 1936. Between eye-catchingly lurid covers, the magazine offered unadorned, briskly told violent stories, introducing the highly influential character of the world-weary private eye, the 'hardboiled dick'. The first of these was 'Race Williams', invented by the prolific Carroll John Daly (1889–1958), but more importantly, Shaw encouraged a team of writers, including more prominent figures like Erle Stanley *Gardner, the creator of the 'Perry Mason' courtroom books, and so helped establish a tough and frank indigenous American style of crime writing, in opposition to the cosier British traditions. Although there were a number of magazines of this kind, like Dime Mystery and Spicy Detective, now long forgotten, Black Mask is best remembered as the journal which published the first story by Raymond *Chandler—'Blackmailers Don't Shoot' (1933)—and which introduced the remarkable talent of Dashiell *Hammett, whose 'Continental Op' stories appeared regularly in the early 1930s. Although Shaw had no pretensions to literary esteem, his firm editorship helped disseminate a lean, fast-moving prose style and set influential terms of reference for more serious later writers.

Black Mountain Writers, a group of American poets and writers, who were associated with Black Mountain College in Asheville, North Carolina. Black Mountain College was established in 1933, largely funded by John Andrew Rice, as an experiment in communitarian, liberal arts education, but its fame as a centre of vibrant experimentation in the arts was largely made in the early 1950s. The philosopher John *Dewey became a member of the college's advisory board, in its early years, but under the directorship of the painter Josef Albers in the 1940s the role of the college in the artistic life of America became more influential. As a consequence of Albers's leadership the college attracted the painters Willem de Koonig, Robert Motherwell, and Robert Rauschenberg; the musicians John Cage, Lou Harrison, and Heinrich Jalowetz; the choreographer Merce Cunningham; and the poets Robert *Creeley, Robert *Duncan, Charles *Olson, and John Weiners. Olson was closely allied to the College from 1948 until as Rector he closed it down in 1956. During Olson's rectorship, Robert Duncan and Robert Creeley taught at the College, whilst such writers as Ed *Dorn, Robert *Kelly, Joel Oppenheimer, and Gilbert *Sorrentino were among the students. Their poetry was published in The Black Mountain Review (1954–7), edited by Creeley, which became a focus for avant-garde writing; it also featured such writers as Tom Field, Michael Rumaker, Fielding *Dawson, Jack *Kerouac, Kenneth *Rexroth, William Carlos *Williams, Denise *Levertov, Paul *Blackburn, and Larry Eigner, some of them also associated with the *Beats and the *San Francisco Renaissance. They were generally indebted to the 'open' forms begun by Ezra *Pound and continued by William Carlos Williams and *Zukovfsky. The Black Mountain group proposed a physiology of consciousness as the basis for a formal revolution, as outlined in Olson's influential essay *'Projective Verse' (1950). Olsen proclaimed the necessity of avoiding 'the lyrical interference of the individual as ego' and, in seeking to redefine the structures of literacy itself, he advocated the necessity of manipulating syntax, typography, and logical structures. In his essay 'Human Universe' (1965), Olson described poetic activity not as referential or mimetic, but reality itself. The 'open' poetics urged a repositioning of the self, as a participating rather than dominating figure in larger, unknown forces. Much of this thought was developed in Olson's correspondence with Cid *Corman, the editor of the magazine Origin, and can be seen in Olson's Letters for Origin (1969). With the publication of Donald Allen's influential anthology The New American Poetry (1960), the Black Mountain writers became recognized as a force in contemporary poetry which proposed an alternative *Modernism to that constructed by T. S. *Eliot and the *New Criticism.

BLACKMUR, R(ichard) P(almer) (1904–65), American critic and poet, born in Springfield, Massachusetts. Self-taught, at first a freelance essayist and man of letters, he later became a much-admired professor at Princeton University. He is often associated with the *New Criticism, but too eccentric to be easily assimilated to any movement. He published three volumes of verse—From Jordan's Delight (1937), The Second World (1942), and The Good European (1947)—initially much influenced by *Yeats but later developing a more personal, less secondary voice. The poetry is tense, carefully wrought, allusive, intelligent but sometimes rather cramped. Blackmur's prose is fluid, complex, and occasionally arcane, a perfect vehicle for the difficult, oblique insights he specialized in. Thought by T. S. *Eliot and others to be the best close reader modern poetry had found, he demanded form in art, was fiercely opposed to what he saw as the fallacy of immediate expression, but understood that form itself needed to be various and could look formless to conventional eyes. He concentrated on contemporary poetry in his early critical works—Wallace *Stevens, Marianne *Moore, Eliot, Ezra *Pound—but later became interested in the European novel and in large questions of culture. The modern world, he thought, had developed 'techniques of trouble' in art and science, but had not learned how to deal with the trouble it found; so that the anni mirabiles of *Modernism (Anni Mirabiles was the title of a series of lectures Blackmur gave at the Library of Congress in 1956) were not only triumphant and dramatic years but prophetic ones, announcing a difficult, possibly unmanageable period we have scarcely begun to know. Blackmur was a great believer in the dignity and authority of failure—earned failure, that is, the sort that comes harder than success. Throughout his career he was much interested in Henry *James and Henry *Adams, whom he regarded as opposite and complementary poles of the American imagination. His chief critical works are The Double Agent (1935), The Expense of Greatness (1940), Language as Gesture (1951), The Lion and the Honeycomb (1955), and Eleven Essays in the European Novel (1964). See also POST-MODERNISM.

BLACKWOOD, Algernon (Henry) (1869–1951), British writer of ghost stories and novels, born in Kent, educated at Edinburgh University. He travelled widely and worked as a journalist in New York—a period reflected in Episodes before Thirty (1923). He gained considerable success with his first collections, The Empty House (1906) and The Listener (1907), and was encouraged by H. *Belloc. His interest in the occult and his expressive pantheism generated a series of highly original nature tales, whose ghostly protagonists were manifestations of natural forces. He wrote more than thirty books which include Pan's Garden (1910), The Lost Valley (1910), Incredible Adventures (1914), Day and Night Stories (1917), Strange Stories (1929), and Tales of the Uncanny and Supernatural (1949).

BLACKWOOD, Caroline, born Caroline Hamilton-Temple-Blackwood (1931–96), British novelist and essayist, daughter of the Marquess of Dufferin and Ava, born in Ireland where she grew up on her family's estates in Clandeboye, Co. Down; she was educated mainly in England. She married the painter Lucien Freud; after her divorce, she married the musician Israel Citkovitz, and later, the poet Robert *Lowell who wrote about their relationship in The Dolphin (1973). Her first novel, The Stepdaughter (1976), set in Manhattan, reworks the epistolary form to present the monologue of an abandoned, embittered woman trapped in her own guilt and yet unable to escape its prison. The novel displayed Blackwood's emphasis on inevitability and determinism, and her ability to weave the strands of religious and philosophical discourse. Great-Granny Blackwood (1977), which reconstructs the lives and fortunes of an aristocratic family through the lives of its women, is rich with surrealistic set-pieces and is blackly humorous. The Fate of Mary Rose (1981) demonstrated an increasing maturity of craftsmanship; narrated by a cold historian, the novel's central metaphor of the rape and murder of a little girl illustrates in chilling detail the selfishness of emotional relationships as the narrator's family, and his extramarital attachment, dissolve under the pressures of fear and uncertainty. Corrigan (1984) concerns a widow's involvement with the ambivalent figure of Corrigan—saviour or conman—and reflected Blackwood's fascination with the relativity of truth. Her non-fiction works include On the Perimeter (1984), an account of the women at the Greenham Common peace camp, and In the Pink (1987), a long essay on hunting.

BLAIR, Eric Arthur, see ORWELL, GEORGE.

BLAISE, Clark (1940–), Canadian novelist and short-story writer, born in Fargo, North Dakota, educated at Denison University and the University of Iowa. Since 1964, when he began lecturing at the University of Wisconsin, Blaise has held a succession of posts at universities throughout North America. He became a Canadian citizen in 1973. The autobiographical dimension in much of his highly regarded fiction is integral to his treatments of the impermanence and relativity of personal identity. His novels, Lunar Attractions (1979) and Lusts (1983), respectively form a moving account of confused adolescence and an obsessive rehearsal of the significances of a wife's suicide. His short-stories in A North American Education (1973), Tribal Justice (1974), and Resident Alien (1986) are widely considered to represent his central achievement. I Had A Father: A Post-Modern Autobiography appeared in 1993. With his wife Bharati *Mukerjee, Blaise is the co-author of Days and Nights in Calcutta (1977), a journal of their year in India, and The Sorrow and the Terror: the Haunting Legacy of the Air India Tragedy (1987).

BLAKE, Nicholas, see DAY LEWIS, C.

Blast, a magazine, subtitled 'the Review of the Great English Vortex', founded in London in 1914 by Wyndham *Lewis. The first issue generated much publicity and controversy; only one further edition was published, the 'War Number' of July 1915, which, with the exception of T. S. *Eliot's 'Preludes' and 'Rhapsody on a Windy Night', contains less work of interest than its predecessor. Ezra *Pound, the magazine's co-editor, the sculptor Henri Gaudier-Brzeska, and the painter Edward Wadsworth were Lewis's chief collaborators. Together they formed the core of the *Vorticist movement in art and literature, which violently rejected the aesthetic values of the nineteenth century; Pound described 'the Vortex' as a 'radiant node or cluster . . . from which, and through which, and into which, ideas are constantly rushing', drawing on astronomical theories of the spiral as the fundamental form of cosmic energy to express the Vorticists' search for a new dynamism in their art. Jacob Epstein, William Roberts, and Christopher Nevison were also closely associated with Vorticism in sculpture and painting. The movement's most characteristic literary manifestation is Lewis's futuristic play 'Enemy of the Stars', which appeared in the first issue of Blast; it also contained a number of poems and a 'Vortex' by Pound, Ford Madox *Ford's 'The Saddest Story', which eventually formed part of his The Good Soldier (1915), Rebecca *West's story 'Indissoluble Matrimony', and a series of photographic illustrations of works by Vorticist artists. The magazine's most remarkable feature was its lengthy introductory section of provocative manifestos and typographically experimental lists under the reiterated headings 'BLAST', 'CURSE', and 'BLESS'; the many targets of its excecrations included 'The BRITANNIC AESTHETE / cream of the snobbish earth' and 'the years 1837 to 1900'; among the blessed were 'the vast planetary abstraction of the OCEAN' and 'the HAIRDRESSER for correcting the grotesque anachronisms of our physique'. Further radical attacks on the cultural status quo were made in Lewis's extensive 'Vorteces and Notes'. Blast and Vorticism, which, although defunct as a movement by 1916, have seminal importance in British *Modernism, are considered at length in Timothy Materer's Vortex: Pound, Eliot, and Lewis (1979). See also FUTURISM.

BLEASDALE, Alan (1946–), British playwright, born in Liverpool, educated at Padgate Teacher Training College and Liverpool Polytechnic. He worked as a teacher before writing a series of plays, many of them combining humour with dramatic punch, for theatres in his native city, Liverpool. Two of these, Having a Ball (1981), a farcical comedy involving a series of confusions in a vasectomy clinic, and Are You Lonesome Tonight? (1985), a musical about Elvis Presley, transferred to London. Other stage plays include Fat Harold and the Last Twenty Six (1975), about corruption in the Liverpool docks; The Party's Over (1975), about a probation hostel for young women; No More Sitting on the Old School Bench (1977), about staff conflict in a multi-racial comprehensive school; and the socially conscious farce On the Ledge (1993), in which petty thieves, a villainous property developer, and other exemplary characters pursue each other round the top of a Liverpool tower block while rioters create havoc below. Bleasdale is, however, best known for his television work, notably two powerful and topical series, The Boys from the Blackstuff (1982), about unemployed men in Liverpool, and GBH (1991), about left-wing politics and corruption in an unnamed northern city.

BLISH, James (1921–75), American *science fiction writer and critic, born in East Orange, New Jersey, educated at Rutgers and Columbia Universities; he lived in England in later years. Among his best-known works are A Case of Conscience (1958), a dramatized debate about the theological status of an alien race; Cities in Flight (1970), a collection of four earlier works in which Earth cities like New York literally take off and orbit the planet; The Seedling Stars (1957), a collection of short stories; Doctor Mirabilis (1964), a fictional study of Roger Bacon; and Black Easter; Or, Faust Aleph-Null (1968), a discussion on the death of God. Blish's criticism was collected in The Issue at Hand (1964), More Issues at Hand (1970), and The Tale that Wags the Dog (1988). See also SPACE OPERA.

BLIXEN, Karen (Christentze), née Dinesen (1885–1962), Danish writer, born in Rungsted, Denmark; she studied at the Royal Academy of Fine Arts in Copenhagen. Her works in English were written mainly under the name Isak Dinesen. In 1914 she married her cousin, Baron Blor-Blixen Finecke, and together they set up a coffee plantation in Kenya. The marriage was dissolved in 1921, but she stayed on in Kenya until 1931, and then returned to live in her Danish family estate, Rungstedlung. It was in Kenya that she wrote her most famous work, Seven Gothic Tales (1934); the great artistry of these stories belies her claim that 'I began to write there to amuse myself in the rainy season'. Focusing on extreme mental states and often grotesque characters, the tales quarry a mine of supernatural lore. Other collections of stories, which appear also in Danish versions, include Winter's Tales (1942), Last Tales (1957), Anecdotes of Destiny (1958), and Ehrengard (1963). Her great love of East African wildlife and landscape, together with nostalgia for colonial life, are reflected in her highly popular memoir, Out of Africa (1937), later made into an award-winning film. She returned to similar themes in Shadows on the Grass (1961). The posthumous Letters from Africa: 1914–1931 (1981; edited by Frans Lasson; translated from the Danish by Ann Born) paints a less idealized picture of life on the coffee farm. Her critical writings are collected in Essays (1965) and Daguerreotypes and Other Essays (1979). See Judith Thurman, Isak Dinesen: The Life of Karen Blixen (1982).

Bloody Chamber, The, a collection of stories by Angela *Carter, published in 1979. The stories are united by their common origin in the world of European folklore and fable, refracted through the lens of contemporary critical and psychoanalytical theories; the influence of Freud, Propp, and *Barthes may be discerned. Carter's lavish prose style also displays her affection for the gothic, and the influence of such masters of the modern tale as Borges, Isak Dinesen (Karen *Blixen), and Christina *Stead, first revealed in her experimental collection Fireworks (1974). The stories here are mostly interpretations of the fairytales of Charles Perrault and the Brothers Grimm. Traditional children's stories such as Beauty and the Beast, Bluebeard, and Little Red Riding Hood are reworked to explore their repressed content: the violence and fear connected with the erotic, sexuality, and the unconscious, represented by metamorphoses and the figures of werewolves, weretigers, and other fantastic creatures. The legend of the vampire also appears, in female form. Carter's poetic prose, and her obvious joy in story-telling, make of the stories adult renderings of familiar fables, somewhat lighter than the radical critiques (virtually *metafiction) contained in her later, related collection Black Venus (1985). Its influence can be discerned in the writings of Marina *Warner, Jeanette *Winterson, and Sara *Maitland. A film, The Company of Wolves, was inspired by some of its tales.

BLOOM, Harold (1930–), American critic, born in New York, educated at Cornell and Yale universities. Among other academic posts he was Professor of English at Yale (1965–74). He is known for his early work on the English Romantic poets (Shelley's Mythmaking, 1959; The Visionary Company, 1962) and for his theory of 'strong' reading, expressed in a series of books beginning with The Anxiety of Influence (1973). In Bloom's view the history of poetry is the history of a sequence of Oedipal struggles, sons against fathers. The son chooses his poetic progenitor, as Wordsworth chose Milton, for example, but must then submit to, work through, and throw off the father's influence. The battle is stylistic rather than psychological, however, a matter of voice and language rather than personal aggression or uncertainty. Bloom offers a detailed graph of possible relations between poets, complete with technical terms and copious quotation, brilliantly interpreted, illustrating the stages of the struggle. A 'strong' reading may be academically reckless, but it will be a reading the poet needs, and even deviant, will still be responsive to real powers in the original, fathering work. At times too eager for clues—Wordsworth's 'blind man' in 'Tintern Abbey' can only be Milton—Bloom's writing is mostly agile and subtle, seeking multiple connections rather than reductions. It displays a passion for poetry and considerable wit, as when an earlier poet is said to be 'influenced' by a later one, because the sound of the later voice has become unmistakable: thus we might hear Eliot in Tennyson rather than the other way round. Bloom is also interested in Gnosticism and the cabbala, and has written a haunting fantasy novel, The Flight to Lucifer (1979), set on another world, where mystical questions are forms of high adventure. In Ruin the Sacred Truths (1989) and The Western Canon (1994), themes of cultural history and textual criticism are further explored.

BLOOMFIELD, Leonard (1887–1949), American linguist, born in Chicago, educated at Harvard, the University of Wisconsin, and the University of Chicago, where he became Professor of Germanic Philology in 1927. From 1940 until his death he was Professor of Linguistics at Yale. An Introduction to Linguistics (1914) based its theory of language on the mentalist psychology of Wilhelm Wundt (1832–1920), presenting an orthodox survey of speech and syntax viewed as functions of subjective psychological processes. While at Ohio State University, where he held a professorship from 1921 to 1927, Bloomfield was influenced by the behaviourist psychology of Albert Paul Weiss (1879–1931), which provided a model for the empirical approach of Language (1933). The work effectively established linguistics as an autonomous science: although indebted to Weiss's methods, Bloomfield's emphasis on Language's freedom from any programmatic dependence on psychological theory had axiomatic significance for his later work and that of his followers. His attention to the internal structures of individual languages as the basis for his analytical procedures was central to developments in structural linguistics; in Outline Guide for the Study of Foreign Languages (1942) and other works he successfully extended his principles to the field of applied linguistics. In the course of the 1950s his work was supplanted by that of Noam *Chomsky, who retained Bloomfield's analytical systems while rejecting his behaviourist assumptions. Charles Hockett's edition of A Leonard Bloomfield Anthology (1970) indicates the scope of Bloomfield's interests in Indo-European, Malayo-Polynesian, and Native American languages.

Bloomsbury Group: a loosely knit group of friends, who began to meet in or around 1905, initially at 46 Gordon Square in Bloomsbury, the home of the children of Leslie Stephen (Virginia *Woolf, Vanessa Bell, and Adrian and Thoby Stephen). In 1899 Thoby Stephen, Clive *Bell, Lytton *Strachey, Saxon Sydney Turner, and Leonard *Woolf had all entered Trinity College, Cambridge. As members of the *Apostles (except for Stephen and Bell), they were dedicated to 'love, the creation and enjoyment of aesthetic experience and the pursuit of knowledge' (G. E. *Moore). In 1905 Thoby Stephen began to institute 'Thursday Evenings', when the friends (joined by Desmond *MacCarthy and, in 1910, Roger *Fry) would meet with Vanessa and Virginia, the Stephen sisters.

The mood was one of conscious revolt against the aesthetic, social, and sexual restrictions of Victorian England, and is probably best characterized by Strachey's iconoclastic Eminent Victorians (1918). They attacked the lack of imagination and the hypocrisy of the English monied classes and took great pleasure in offending the British philistine. They were writers, publishers, artists, economists: the genteel wing of the avant-garde of the time, who not only staged subversive events—ranging in seriousness from the Dreadnought Hoax to the First Post-Impressionist Exhibition (both 1910)—but who also actively encouraged new talent through, for example, the *Hogarth Press.

Their mood of exclusivism and class consciousness, however, was deeply alienating to some. D. H. *Lawrence had no time for them, Wyndham *Lewis hated the effeminacy of the culture, F. R. *Leavis thought them pretentious and shallow. The extent to which they shared an aesthetic creed is debatable: the group expanded during and after the First World War as younger members such as David *Garnett, Francis Birrell, and Dora Carrington became involved. A vast number of biographies, autobiographies, memoirs, and letters have been produced. Quentin Bell's book Bloomsbury (1968) offers an insider's account of the group. Michael *Holroyd's two-volume biography of Lytton Strachey (1968) sought to reassess the influence of Bloomsbury, after the reputation of the group had declined in the 1940s and 1950s.

Bluest Eye, The, a novel by Toni *Morrison, published in 1970. The voices of Claudia, a young black girl, and an omniscient narrator describe a year in the grim life of Pecola Breedlove, a black girl from Ohio. Pecola is maddened by the disparity between her life and the images of beauty and sophistication disseminated by the hegemonic white culture. In her search for a more acceptable face, she finds this in the blue eyes of Claudia's doll. Rejected by her mother and abused by her father, Pecola meets Soaphead Church, a local seer, and begs him for blue eyes which he grants after a staged miracle. Finally blue-eyed, we are left with a fragmented Pecola living in a world of fantasy. On a larger scale the novel depicts the destruction of a black family by the forces of white, racist society. Many scenes in the novel are powerful and disturbing (Pecola's incestuous relationship with her father, for example) but Morrison's prose is never melodramatic or sentimental, and like many of her early novels the strength of The Bluest Eye lies in its treatment of family secrets.

BLUNDEN, Edmund (Charles) (1896–1974), British poet, born in London; he grew up in Yalding, Kent, and was educated at Queen's College, Oxford. Of the many poems he wrote during active service on the Western Front from 1915 to 1919, a number are among the best examples of the poetry of the First World War (see WAR POETRY). His experiences as a soldier strongly informed his later writing, achieving their fullest expression in the autobiographical prose of Undertones of War (1928), which also contains thirty-two of his most memorable war poems; as a record of the radical shifts in personal and cultural orientation effected by the conflict, the work is equalled only by Graves's Goodbye to All That* (1929). In 1920 Blunden became Middleton *Murry's assistant editor on *The Athenaeum. Throughout the 1930s he taught at Merton College, Oxford, and subsequently joined the staff of the Times Literary Supplement*. He was Professor of English at the University of Hong Kong from 1953 to 1964 and was elected Professor of Poetry at Oxford in 1966, retiring after eighteen months through ill health. Following early collections of his poetry in 1914 and 1916, Blunden's reputation was established with The Waggoner (1920); The Shepherd (1922) and English Poems (1925) are among the best-known of many succeeding volumes. Collected Poems (1930) and Poems: 1930–1940 (1940) remain the principal editions of his work. The most substantial representation of his later writing is A Hong Kong House: Poems 1951–1961 (1962). Critical disparagement of the *Georgian poets, among whom Blunden was numbered, has tended to diminish his standing; but while a great deal of his verse is devoted to nature and landscape, often in the Kent countryside, its intricate musicality, precise imagery, and imaginative power distinguish it entirely from mediocre Georgian poetry. As a scholar and editor, his editions of the poetry of John Clare (1920) and Ivor *Gurney (1954) rescued their work from obscurity. He also produced numerous books of criticism and literary biography, among which are the collection of essays entitled Votive Tablets (1931), Leigh Hunt (1930), and Charles Lamb (1954). See Edmund Blunden (1990) by Barry Webb.

BLUNT, Wilfred Scawen (1840–1922), British poet and campaigner against imperialism; born into a family of wealthy Sussex landowners, he entered the diplomatic service at the age of 18. He was posted to various European capitals, including Paris, where he sustained an affair with 'Skittles', a well-known demi-mondaine, from which much of his subsequent love poetry derived. In 1869 he married Annabella King-Noel, the granddaughter of Byron, and resigned from his career as a diplomat. His first collection of verse was Sonnets and Songs, published under the pseudonym 'Proteus' in 1875, which later appeared in several revised editions. Numerous volumes followed, including Esther (1892) and Griselda, his verse-novel of 1893. Love lyrics, often of a candour unusual in the late Victorian era, remained a dominant aspect of his poetry, which also dwelt on the Sussex countryside and incorporated translations from the work of Arabian poets. His collected Love Poems appeared in 1902; two volumes of The Poetical Works of Wilfred Scawen Blunt were published in 1914. In 1875 he began his extensive travels in the Middle East, conceiving the strong antipathy to British imperialism which led him to work for political independence for Egypt, Arabia, India, and Ireland. His political publications include In Vinculis (1889), a poem written after he was imprisoned for a speech espousing Irish nationalism, and the prose treatises Secret History of the English Occupation of Egypt (1907) and The Land War in Ireland (1912). He numbered many leading figures in literature and politics among his admirers in his later years, including George Bernard *Shaw, who expressed his approval of Blunt's opinions in the preface to John Bull's Other Island (1904). His Diaries were published in two volumes in 1919 and 1920. Elizabeth Longford's biography A Pilgrimage of Passion appeared in 1979.

BLY, Robert (Elwood) (1926–), American poet, born in Madison, Minnesota, educated at Harvard and the University of Iowa. In 1958 he founded The Fifties, a important literary magazine of the period, in conjunction with the Fifties Press. He is also well known as a prolific translator of poetry. His first collection of poetry, Silence in the Snowy Fields (1962), derived much of its imagery from his native surroundings in rural Minnesota. During the late 1960s he organized and participated in many poetry readings mounted as a form of protest against the Vietnam War (see VIETNAM WRITING); The Light around the Body (1967) and The Teeth Mother Naked at Last (1970) project harsh critiques of modern American culture in poems notable for their disquieting successions of imagery and compelling free-verse rhythms. Point Reyes Poems (1974), The Man in the Black Coat Turns (1981), and Loving a Woman in Two Worlds (1985) are among the numerous subsequent collections of his verse, in which a development towards a poised contemplative mode is apparent. His prose poems appeared in This Body Is Made of Camphor and Gopherwood (1977) and in a collected edition, What Have I Ever Lost by Dying (1992). A Love of Minute Particulars (1985) is a British selected edition of his work since 1968. Notable among his other publications is Iron John (1990), an imaginative treatment of the psychology of the male in modern culture, which attracted widespread attention in the USA and elsewhere.

BLYTHE, Ronald (George) (1922–), British author, born in Suffolk; he began by writing fiction and short stories, many of them based on gossip and ghost stories from his native county. The Stories of Ronald Blythe (1985) includes work published from 1957. With The Age of Illusion (1963), a study of England between the wars, he moved to highly literate sociological reflection. He is perhaps best known for his eloquent attention to the particular in two collections of tape-recorded interviews from a typical Suffolk village. Akenfield: Portrait of an English Village (1969) opens with an evocative description of the place and the changes it has seen, then lets the people speak, from the ageing farm-worker to the gravedigger. The View in Winter: Reflections on Old Age (1979) uses the same method to provide a picture of old age and the taboos with which it is surrounded. Divine Landscape (1986, with photographer Edwin Smith) is an illustrated treatment of landscapes with literary associations. Blythe has also published essays and criticism, and has edited a number of anthologies, including Each Returning Day (1989), extracts from diaries, and Private Words: Letters and Diaries from the Second World War (1991).

BOGAN, Louise (1897–1970), American poet, born at Livermore Falls, Maine, educated at Boston University. From 1931 to 1968 she was poetry critic for the New Yorker*, exercising considerable influence through her concisely articulate reviews. She became Poetry Consultant to the Library of Congress in 1945. Body of This Death, her first volume of poetry, appeared in 1923. Her other principal collections are Dark Summer (1929), The Sleeping Fury (1937), in which the erotic impulse behind much of her poetry is most clearly sensed, Poems and New Poems (1941), and The Blue Estuaries (1968). Like Allen *Tate, Yvor *Winters, and others of her generation, she established a productive interaction between her highly accomplished use of traditional forms and poetic *Modernism's emphasis on the essential functions of imagery. Her best work is characterized by the poise and economy with which its refined lyrical intensities are sustained. Collected Poems, 1923–1953 was published in 1954. Her criticism, chiefly drawn from her writing for the New Yorker, is represented by Achievement in American Poetry, 1900–1950 (1951), Selected Criticism (1955), and A Poet's Alphabet (1970). Bogan's autobiography Journey around My Room (1981) was edited by Ruth Limmer, who was also the editor of What the Woman Lived (1973), a collection of her letters. Louise Bogan: A Portrait by Elizabeth Frank appeared in 1985.

BOLAND, Eavan (Aisling) (1944–), Irish poet, born in Dublin, educated at Trinity College, Dublin. One of the foremost women poets in Ireland, her collections of poems include New Territory (1967), The War Horse (1975), In Her Own Image (1980), Night Feed (1982), The Journey (1987), Outside History (1990), and In a Time of Violence (1994). Her Selected Poems (1989) demonstrated the range of interests and tonalities in her work, which accommodates traditional Irish themes, incisive commentaries on contemporary subjects, and intimately personal poems of relationships and womanhood. Boland's prose works include the critical study A Kind of Scar: The Woman Poet in the National Tradition (1989), and the autobiographical Object Lessons (1995).

BOLD, Alan (Norman) (1943–), Scottish poet and critic, born in Edinburgh, where he was educated at the University. After working on the editorial staff of the Times Educational Supplement, he became a freelance writer in 1967. Society Inebrious (1965), his first collection of poetry, was followed by numerous further volumes, which include To Find the New (1967), A Perpetual Motion Machine (1969), This Fine Day (1979), In This Corner (1983), and Homage to MacDiarmid (1985). The politically declamatory qualities of Bold's early verse modulate as his work progresses into the clarity and directness with which he addresses a wide range of social, cultural, and personal themes. He has also produced collections in Scots dialect, among which is the buoyantly humorous Summoned by Knox (1984). Bold's numerous critical studies include George Mackay Brown (1978), and his highly acclaimed biography, MacDiarmid: The Terrible Crystal; An Open Book (1990) is a volume of critical essays. Among the many anthologies he has edited are Making Love: The Picador Book of Erotic Verse (1978) and The Penguin Book of Socialist Verse (1970). A novel, East Is West, appeared in 1991.

BOLGER, Dermot (1959–), Irish novelist, playwright, poet, and publisher, born in Finglas, north Dublin, educated at Beneavin College, Finglas. As editor of The Raven Arts Press in Dublin, Bolger was responsible for the production of an important anthology of contemporary poetry written in the Irish language, The Bright Wave/An Tonn Gheal (1986). He is committed to the publication of work which reinterprets the history of modern Ireland by unveiling the failure of its political ideals and the lies of its 'economic miracle', a commitment reflected in his own writing. His metaphors are frequently derived from the details of local history and the origin of logainmeacha (place-names), such as the hidden 'crystal stream' of Finglas in his novel The Woman's Daughter (1987; revised 1991). Bolger's poetry, collections of which include Never A Dull Moment (1978), The Habit of Flesh (1980), Finglas Lillies (1981), No Waiting America (1982) and Internal Exiles (1985), is thematically significant in revealing the genesis of his concern, in his fiction and drama, with deprived urban Dublin, emigration, and the tragedy of Ireland's 'internal exiles'. His novels Night Shift (1985) and The Woman's Daughter invert the traditional view of the Irish as exiles by portraying the plight of people living in Ireland, who have been politically and economically excluded from their own country. The Journey Home (1990), a thriller, also incorporates an attack on political corruption, a prediction of the implications of Ireland's membership of the European Community, and a portrayal of exile as a smokescreen which has served successive Irish Governments in distracting attention from the problems at 'Home'. Emily's Shoes (1992) is an intensely introspective narrative of a young Irish shoe-fetishist searching for identity in a sordid Dublin environment; the novel was praised for the spare clarity of its prose and brilliant eye for detail. In Second Life (1994), a conflation of ghost story and detective fiction, the protagonist, adopted as a child, loses his identity after a car crash and goes in search of himself and his background through layers of personal and ancestral memory. Bolger's first play, The Lament for Arthur Cleary (1989), transposes an old story of injustice and murder from its original setting of Ireland during the Penal Laws, to contemporary Dublin. The play is characteristic of Bolger's use of the past and the present to create palimpsests of meaning and was included, together with The Tramway End (1990), The Holy Ground (1991) and One Last White Horse (1991) in A Dublin Quartet (1992). Bolger edited The Picador Book of Irish Contemporary Fiction (1993).

BOLT, Robert (Oxton) (1924–95), British dramatist, born and educated in Manchester, the son of a shopkeeper. He was working as a schoolmaster when his Flowering Cherry was performed in London in 1957. That play, about a salesman who impotently dreams of escape to the country, was followed by The Tiger and the Horse (1960), which reflected Bolt's own involvement in anti-nuclear politics. Vivat, Vivat Regina (1970) and State of Revolution (1977), respectively involving Elizabeth's destruction of Mary, Queen of Scots and the compromises forced on the Bolsheviks after their seizure of power, both achieved modest success; but Bolt's most enduring play has proved to be his study of Thomas More, A Man for All Seasons (1960). This shows More's at first affectionate relationship with Henry VIII, his resignation as Chancellor and 'eloquent silence' after the King's divorce, remarriage, and rejection of the 'Bishop of Rome', his refusal to deny the spiritual authority of the pope, his imprisonment, trial, conviction, and execution. Telling all this in a somewhat Brechtian style, with a character called the 'Common Man' as occasional narrator and commentator, Bolt substantially fulfils his declared aim as a dramatist, which is to combine thoughtfulness with theatricality, a degree of moral subtlety with an audience's 'straightforward, child-like, primitive desire to know'. He has also written several important screenplays, notably for Lawrence of Arabia and Dr Zhivago, as well as for the film of his own A Man for All Seasons.

BOND, (Thomas) Edward (1934–), British dramatist, born in north London, the son of a labourer, and educated at a secondary modern school. After National Service in the army and a series of dead-end jobs, he wrote The Pope's Wedding, a portrait of a frustrated, inarticulate, and finally murderous country labourer; it was given a Sunday-night performance at the Royal Court Theatre in 1962. His next play, Saved, another tale of alienation and violence, this time among the urban young, caused great controversy on its first production in 1966. It was banned by the censor, presented under club conditions by the Royal Court, and attacked by many critics, mainly because of a scene in which hooligans stoned to death a baby in its pram. Other provocative plays followed, prime among them Narrow Road to the Deep North (1968), about local tyranny and British imperialism in nineteenth-century Japan; Early Morning (1968), a surreal comedy set in Victorian high places, and including a love affair between the Queen and Florence Nightingale; Lear (1971) a rewriting of Shakespeare's tragedy from a modern socialist stance; The Sea (1973), a black comedy set in a coastal community ruled by an imperious lady-of-the-manor; Bingo (1973), a contentiously conceived play about the last days of Shakespeare; The Fool (1975), which follows the poet John Clare into the madhouse and which, in Bond's view, illustrates the fate of the principled artist in an unjust society; The Woman (1978), about the aftermath of the Trojan War; The Bundle (1978), a tale of oppression and resistance, again set in nineteenth-century Japan; The Worlds (1979), an apologia for working-class terrorism, this time set in contemporary Britain; Restoration (1981), a dark comedy about corruption in the seventeenth century; The War Plays (1986), about power politics, militarism, and the likely effect of the H-bomb; and Jackets (1990), another highly sceptical look at the army and its pretensions. Bond's work, at first obliquely, then more directly, and recently bluntly and crudely, has continued to offer fierce indictments of a capitalist system and a ruling class he believes to be unalterably corrupt and corrupting. Indeed, he has come to believe that almost any means of overturning what he sees as institutionalized injustice must itself be just. Accordingly, he has described himself as a revolutionary socialist and his drama as 'rational theatre', dividing it into 'question plays' and 'answer plays'. His earlier, more questioning efforts were notable for the violent effects with which he illustrated his anti-establishment thinking; his later ones have tended to be less horrific, but also less vital and more doctrinaire. In each case, he has often set the action in relatively remote times and places, thus creating vivid and unusual effects, but not always making his work more credible as a comment on the contemporary world. At his best, however, he combines incisiveness of characterization, lucidity of dialogue, a powerful immediacy of event, and imaginative size and scope. Bond is also a notable essayist, and has written prefaces to several of his plays which explore the implications of his socialist views with an articulacy and passion which can become dogmatic.

BONTEMPS, Arna (1902–73), American poet, short-story writer, and novelist, born in Alexandria, Louisiana, educated at Pacific Union College, California and at the University of Chicago. He moved to the Harlem district of New York at the beginning of the *Harlem Renaissance, where he became well known as a poet. Most of his poems were published in the 1920s for periodicals such as The Crisis and were collected in Personals (1963). Though terse in a modernist manner, his poems also echo cadences from traditional African-American Christianity. In the early 1930s, during the Depression, he lived in Alabama, which inspired his grim short stories, The Old South: A Summer Tragedy and Other Stories of the Thirties (1973). He later became university librarian at Fisk University (1943–66), subsequently joining the faculty of the University of Illinois, Chicago Circle. His best-known novel, Black Thunder (1935), deals vividly with Virginia slave revolts in 1800. Other works of fiction include God Sends Sunday (1931) and Drums at Dusk (1939). With Langston *Hughes, he edited The Poetry of the Negro 1764–1949 (1949) and The Book of Negro Folklore (1959). He also edited Great Slave Narratives (1969) and The Harlem Renaissance Remembered (1972). (See also NEW NEGRO.)

BOSMAN, Herman Charles (1905–51), South African short-story writer and journalist, born at Kuils River, Cape Province. Though of Afrikaner background, he acquired an English education in Johannesburg. Cold Stone Jug (1949) is a sardonic account, bristling with humour and irony, of his four and a half years in prison for fatally shooting his stepbrother during a quarrel. His short stories, which were much admired by Roy *Campbell, describe the rigours of rural Afrikaner life, often with broad humour resembling that of American frontier writers such as Mark Twain. Collections of his short stories, which have increasingly enhanced his reputation, include Mafeking Road (1947), Unto Dust (1963), Jurie Steyn's Post Office (1971), and A Bekkersdal Marathon (1971). His two novels are Jacaranda in the Night (1947) and Willemsdorp (1977). Other publications include A Cask of Jerepigo (1957), which contains essays and sketches, and his Collected Works (1981), in two volumes.

Botteghe Oscure, an international literary review, the title of which means 'dark shops', founded in Rome in 1949 by Princess Marguerite Caetani (1880–1963), who edited it until its closure in 1960. Caetani had been editor of Commerce between 1924 and 1932 in Paris, publishing work by many of the leading writers of the day, including James *Joyce, Federico Garcia Lorca, Franz Kafka, Virginia *Woolf, and Rainer Maria Rilke. Botteghe Oscure, which ran for twenty-five issues of up to 500 pages, featured writing in English, French, German, Italian, and Spanish and was distributed in Britain, the USA, Holland, Germany, Australia, and Japan; the contributions in English, which made up over half the total volume of work, tended to be predominantly by poets, who included W. H. *Auden, Wallace *Stevens, Dylan *Thomas, Hugh *MacDiarmid, Thom *Gunn, Louis *MacNeice, Robert *Lowell, and Marianne *Moore. Among the eminent Europeans whose writing appeared were Octavio Paz, Günter Grass, Carlos Fuentes, Italo Calvino, Albert Camus, Alberto Moravia, and Andre Malraux. The periodical published work by many authors at early stages of their careers and constituted a uniquely catholic international forum for creative writing during the post-war years; it was dedicated, as Archibald *MacLeish wrote in his introduction to the index published in 1964, 'to the proposition that literature exists in a wider and more integral world than politics'.

BOTTOMLEY, Gordon (1874–1948), British poet and verse-dramatist, born in Keighley, Yorkshire, educated at Keighley Grammar School. In 1892 he was forced by illness to abandon his intended career in banking and concentrated instead on writing. The Mickle Drede (1896), the first of his collections of verse, displays the interest in Celtic and supernatural themes that is an abiding feature of his work. He produced four further volumes of poetry, Poems at White-Nights (1899), The Gate of Smaragdus (1904), and two series of Chambers of Imagery (1907, 1912), earning high regard for his technical skill and his powerfully imaginative creation of mood. He subsequently concentrated on verse-drama and wrote a long succession of thematically ambitious plays; The Riding to Lithend (1909), based on Norse legend, was followed by King Lear's Wife (1915), the first of his 'prologues to Shakespeare', which was acclaimed as a masterpiece when performed in London in 1916. Gruach (1921), a treatment of the early life of Lady Macbeth, was produced by the Scottish National Theatre in 1923. He referred to his later verse-dramas as plays 'for a theatre unborn' and worked in a minimalist vein deriving from Noh theatre and W. B. *Yeats's more experimental dramatic writings. Lyric Plays and Choric Plays appeared in 1932 and 1939 respectively. A Stage for Poetry (1948) outlines his conceptions of verse-drama. C. C. Abbott's edition of Poems and Plays was published in 1953.

BOURJAILY, Vance (1922–), American novelist, born in Cleveland, Ohio, educated at Bowdoin College, Maine. His first novel, The End of My Life (1947), the story of four young American volunteers in the British Army ambulance corps during the Second World War, established him as a distinctive voice amongst a younger generation of American novelists who began their literary careers in the late 1940s. Of his later novels, The Violated (1958) is perhaps his most ambitious and sustained his early promise. His other novels include The Hound of Earth (1954), which concerns a scientist who deserts his job and family after the dropping of the atomic bomb on Hiroshima; Confessions of a Spent Youth (1960), a salacious semi-autobiographical work; Brill Among the Ruins (1970); Now Playing at Canterbury (1976), a Chaucerian pastiche set in the America of the 1960s and early 1970s; A Game Men Play (1980); The Great Fake Book (1986); and Old Soldier (1990). The Unnatural Enemy (1963), Country Matters (1973), and Fishing by Mail (1993) are non-fictional works about country life, the first notable for its treatment of the ethics of hunting. Bourjaily served with the American Field Service during the Second World War and from 1958 until 1980 was a professor in the *Iowa Writers' Workshop.

BOURNE, Randolph (1886–1918), American literary and social critic, born in Bloomfield, New Jersey, educated at Princeton and Columbia Universities. Born with a severe facial disfigurement, as a child he suffered tuberculosis of the spine which retarded his growth. A leading radical intellectual of his generation, at Columbia Bourne was influenced by the historian Charles Beard, the anthropologist Franz Boas, and John *Dewey. His essays appeared in Atlantic Monthly and the Columbia Monthly and were collected in Youth and Life (1913). In 1913 he travelled and studied in Europe. As a contributing editor to the New Republic* he observed the progressive school system in Gary, Indiana and published his observations in his first substantial work of educational theory, The Gary Schools (1916). Bourne's opposition to American involvement in the First World War prompted some of his most trenchant political and social criticism, notably his series of essays published in *The Seven Arts in 1917; his position caused a rift with his intellectual mentors, especially John Dewey whose philosophy he had called 'our American religion', and drew criticism from Van Wyck *Brooks and Walter *Lippmann. Later essays in The Menorah Journal, the New Republic, and The Yale Review explored the idea of a heterogeneous culture in the USA and questioned the desirability of the 'melting pot'. Bourne left unfinished an important essay in political theory, 'The State'. The Radical Will (1977) is an anthology of his writings; Forgotten Prophet: The Life of Randolph Bourne (1984) by Bruce Clayton is a biography.

BOWEN, Elizabeth (Dorothea Cole) (1899–1973), Anglo-Irish novelist, short-story writer, and essayist, born in Dublin. An only child, she grew up in Protestant, Georgian Dublin and at the family home in County Cork, which she described in Bowen's Court (1942). At 13, after her father's breakdown and her mother's death, she was taken to Kent, but divided her adult life between Ireland and England. Her first collection of stories, Encounters, appeared in 1923; in the same year she married the educationalist and BBC administrator Alan Cameron. They lived in Northampton, Oxford, and, from 1935, Clarence Terrace, Regents Park, which was bombed in 1944. Her novels are The Hotel (1927); The Last September (1929), her own favourite, set in Ireland in the Troubles; Friends and Relations (1931); To the North (1932), a story of sexual betrayal set in London; The House in Paris (1935), of a memorable day spent by two children, Henrietta and Leopold, in Mme Fisher's Gothic house, intercut with the passionate story of Leopold's parents; *The Death of the Heart (1938); *The Heat of the Day (1949); A World of Love (1955), a romantic Irish ghost story; The Little Girls (1964); and Eva Trout (1969). Of her many short stories, the best deal with the supernatural ('Foothold', 'The Cat Jumps'), English betrayal and deracination ('The Disinherited', 'Ivy Gripped the Steps'), Anglo-Irish relations ('Her Table Spread', 'Sunday Afternoon'), children ('The Tommy Crans', 'Tears, Idle Tears'), and above all the atmosphere of wartime London ('Mysterious Kor', 'The Demon Lover', 'The Happy Autumn Fields'). Angus *Wilson, in his Introduction to her Collected Stories (1980), called her one of the great writers of the Blitz. After Cameron's death in 1959 and the sale of Bowen's Court, she lived mainly in Oxford, America, where she taught, and Hythe. Bowen's subjects are the loss of innocence and the conflict between what she calls the 'lunatic giant' in all of us—our childish, unsocialized, extremist egos—and the knowing, compromised grown-up world. From her Anglo-Irish background she derives a mixture of edgy alienation and a respect for classical impersonality and good form. Her characters are reckless, romantic sensationalists—orphans, spies, criminals, adulterers—and there is violence and danger in her books. Her style is mannered, elegant, and witty. Henry *James, Proust, and Flaubert are strong influences, as is the gothic atmosphere of Sheridan Le Fanu. Above all, she evokes a spiritual condition through a landscape—the 'Bowen terrain'—whether it is the 'Big House' in Ireland, out-of-season resorts, London flats and houses, or claustrophobic suburban villas. Bowen has been more read in America and Ireland than in Britain, but she can be compared to other writers published between the 1920s and 1960s, some of them her friends (Henry *Green, Ivy *Compton-Burnett, L. P. *Hartley, Rosamond *Lehmann) whose value is now being reassessed. See V. Glendinning, Elizabeth Bowen: Portrait of a Writer (1977); H. Lee, Elizabeth Bowen: An Estimation (1981), and (ed.) The Mulberry Tree: Writings of Elizabeth Bowen (1986); P. Craig, Elizabeth Bowen (1986).

BOWEN, Marjorie, pseudonym of Gabrielle Margaret Vere CAMPBELL (1886–1952), British writer of historical novels which were also published under the names George R. Preed, Margaret Campbell, and Joseph Shearing. She was born on Hayling Island, Hampshire, and became a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature and of the Royal Historical Society. Her first novel, The Viper of Milan (1906), about the Visconti family, was acknowledged as an influence by G. *Greene (who referred to the book in Travels with My Aunt and who also spoke warmly of Bowen's work in his 1951 essay 'The Lost Childhood'). This was followed by over seventy novels on historical themes, including The Carnival of Florence (1915), as well as biographical studies of Mary Wollstonecraft (1937), Maurice de Saxe (1938), and John Knox (1941).

BOWERING, George (1935–), Canadian poet, fiction writer, and critic, born in the Okanagan Valley region of British Columbia, where he grew up; he was educated at the University of British Columbia. Bowering's early poetry, which includes the volumes Points on the Grid (1964), The Man in Yellow Boots (1965), Rocky Mountain Foot (1968), and The Gangs of Kosmos (1969), was strongly influenced by the *Black Mountain Poets—Robert *Creeley was his thesis adviser in Vancouver. He was a founding editor of the avant-garde Vancouver poetry magazine TISH. Subsequently Bowering has worked in several Canadian universities. Around 1970 he began to produce book-length 'long poems'; his work in this vein includes George Vancouver (1970) and Autobiology (1972). A prolific writer, he has published more than forty books. His fictional work includes Mirror on the Floor (1967); A Short Sad Book (1977); Burning Water (1980), a deconstructed novelistic account of George Vancouver's quest for the Northwest Passage; A Place to Die (1983); and Taking the Field: The Best of Baseball Fiction (1990) which Bowering edited. Among his other volumes of verse are In the Flesh (1974), Another Mount (1979), West Window: Selected Poetry (1982), and Urban Snow (1992). Later work includes a meditation on Rilke's Duino Elegies, entitled Kerrisdale Elegies (1984), Caprice (1987), Harry's Fragments (1990), and Rain Barrel (1994). His critical writing includes Al Purdy (1970), A Way with Words (1982), and Imaginary Hand (1988).

BOWLES, Jane (1917–73), American writer, born in New York of a German Jewish father and a Hungarian mother. Educated privately, she travelled in Europe and moved in artistic and literary circles, meeting Celine, E. E. *Cummings, Klaus Mann, and Paul *Bowles whom she married in 1938. After extensive travels the couple became the centre of an expatriate literary group including Allen *Ginsberg, William *Burroughs, Alan *Sillitoe, and Ruth *Fainlight.

Bowles has been highly praised by contemporaries—such as Tennessee *Williams, Truman *Capote (who referred to her as a 'modern legend'), and John *Ashbery—for the irony and surrealism with which she describes the bisexual, nihilistic ambience of her fictions. Although it is held that her career was curtailed by the cerebral haemorrhage she suffered in 1957, she had never been prolific. Her reputation rested on her single novel Two Serious Ladies (1943); with echoes of Kafka and *Compton-Burnett, it tells the story of Miss Goering, whose ideal of sainthood dissolves into sexual servitude to dubious characters, and Mrs Copperfield, who abandons a respectable marriage in pursuit of a native Panamian prostitute. It contributed to the revival of a modern gothic sensibility. A play, The Summer House, appeared in 1954. Bowles's early physical decline, the interest in forgotten women writers, and the bizarre stories circulated about her life, have perhaps contributed to her cult literary status. Her stories were collected in Plain Pleasures (1966), which includes such notable fictions as 'Camp Cataract' (1949) and 'A Stick of Green Candy' (1957). The title story is indicative of Bowles's technique and vision: a lonely widow meets an equally lonely man, but their mutual gestures of communication end in drunken misunderstanding, sexual confusion and the threat of cruel estrangement.

The Collected Works (1966) combines the stories with the play; unpublished and early works such as the puppet play A Quarrelling Pair continue to surface in extended posthumous volumes of her œuvre such as Feminine Wiles (1976) and Everything is Nice (1989). There is a biography by Millicent Dillon, A Little Original Sin (1981).

BOWLES, Paul (1910–86), American novelist, 'translator', poet, and short-story writer, born in New York, educated at the University of Virginia. A composer long before he became a writer, Bowles studied under Aaron Copland and produced three operas, four ballets, and numerous other musical compositions. He turned to literature in mid-life, publishing his first novel, The Sheltering Sky, in 1949. As a writer who has stressed the spiritual impoverishment of the West and the sustenance to be gained from encounters with the primitive, both social and psychological, and whose work deals with various forms of deviant sexuality, he has something of a cult reputation. His earlier novels are fairly conventional and demonstrate his passionate love of Arab culture—from 1952 onwards he lived in Tangier. Most of his later works are termed 'translations' and present themselves as transcriptions, supposedly edited from tape recordings, of the words of a young Moroccan servant, Mohammed Mrabet, with whom Bowles had a close relationship. These include Love with a Few Hairs (1967), M'Hashish (1969), The Boy Who Set the Fire (1974), and The Beach Café and The Voice (1976). Among his other writings are the novels Let It Come Down (1952), The Spider's House (1955), and Up Above the World (1966); the short stories Pages from Cold Point (1968); a collection of poems, Scenes (1968); and an autobiography, Without Stopping (1972). A biography, An Invisible Spectator, by Christopher Sawyer Laucanno, appeared in 1989.

BOWRA, Sir (Cecil) Maurice (1898–1971), British scholar and critic, born in Kiukiang, China, the son of a British customs commissioner, educated at New College, Oxford. In 1922 he became a fellow of Wadham College, where he remained in residence until his death. As warden of the college from 1938 to 1970, he was celebrated for his hospitality and unconventional good humour; John Betjeman recalls him with affection in Summoned by Bells (1960). His earlier works, which include Tradition and Design in The Iliad (1930) and Early Greek Elegists (1938), established his considerable reputation as an expositor of classical literature. The Heritage of Symbolism (1943) was the first of his numerous books on nineteenth- and twentieth-century European and English poetry; among his subsequent studies, notable for their breadth of reference and interpretative skill, are The Creative Experiment (1949), on European poetry since 1912, Poetry and Politics, 1900–1960 (1966), and the collected essays of In General and Particular (1964). His later works as a Hellenist include Problems in Greek Poetry (1953) and a translation of The Odes of Pindar (1969). He was Oxford Professor of Poetry from 1946 to 1951. Memories, 1898–1939 (1966) is his autobiography.

BOYD, John (1912–), Northern Irish playwright, born in working-class East Belfast, educated at Queen's University, Belfast and Trinity College, Dublin. Boyd refers to himself as 'an Irish playwright with a Protestant background'. The first volume of his autobiography, Out of My Class (1985), recalls a childhood filled with the mythology of sectarian rivalry and hatred. He has said that 'the sectarian divide that poisons the air of the community I write about is a smokescreen, a camouflage to obscure the social problems'. Boyd taught at schools in Newry, Lisburn, and Belfast before working as a producer for BBC Northern Ireland, a career which he recounts in The Middle of My Journey (1990). He was the editor of the literary journal Lagan in 1942–6; he became literary adviser to the Lyric Theatre, Belfast (see ULSTER LITERARY THEATRE), and edited its publication, Threshold, from 1971. Boyd's first play, The Blood of Colonel Lamb, written in 1967, was considered too controversial for the North in its attack on Protestant extremism; it was revised as The Assassin (1969) and successfully staged at the Dublin Theatre Festival. His next play, The Flats (1971), with a set that expresses the claustrophobic bleakness of Belfast, presents the tragedy of a Catholic family's struggle to survive a single day of 'the Troubles'. Boyd represents an entire community under siege while establishing a difference between the universal needs of an individual and the blind particularity of collective violence. The Farm (1972), Guests (1974), The Street (1977), and Facing North (1981) further examine these themes. Boyd has been noted for his ability to reproduce the speech of working-class Belfast which, as a common language, is used tragically to express factional hatred. He is widely regarded as Northern Ireland's most important playwright.

BOYD, Martin (1893–1972), Australian novelist, born in Lucerne, Switzerland, educated in Melbourne. He came from a distinguished Victorian family of artists and architects. He enlisted in England with the Royal Flying Corps for service during the First World War. Spiritual restlessness and cultural enquiry inform his writings and his life; both reflect allegiance to, and interest in, traditions drawn as much from Europe as from Australia, and especially a complex individual response to a shared past. The Montforts (1928) was of great historical sweep, tracing the story of his mother's family in Victoria from 1850 to 1914. In Lucinda Brayford (1946) Boyd pursued his enduring concern with the differing standards of personal fulfilment and material well-being. The 'Langton tetralogy' (The Cardboard Crown, 1952; A Difficult Young Man, 1955; Outbreak of Love, 1957; and When Blackbirds Sing, 1962) explores the history of the Langton family through almost a century, largely through the eyes of family elder Guy Langton, and offers a unique portrait of Australian and British life of the period. A Single Flame (1939) and Day of My Delight (1965) were autobiographical, illuminating the concern for purpose and structure which informs all Boyd's fiction.

BOYD, William (1952–), British novelist, born in Accra, Ghana, educated at the universities of Nice and Glasgow, and at Jesus College, Oxford. He was a lecturer in English at St Hilda's College, Oxford (1975–80) and a television critic for the New Statesman (1981–3). On the Yankee Station (1981; revised edition 1988), a collection of stories, was followed by A Good Man in Africa (1981; Whitbread Prize), a comic novel set in an imaginary African country, and An Ice-Cream War (1982) which describes the fiasco on the Eastern African Front during the First World War. In 1983 Boyd was among the writers elected by the Book Marketing Council as a Best Young British Novelist. His next book, Stars and Bars (1984), a wryly humorous look at America from an English perspective, consolidated his reputation as a comic writer. Boyd expanded his range considerably with The New Confessions (1987), an ambitious novel dealing with themes of Art and Illusion and spanning the first seventy years of the twentieth century: from Edinburgh in the 1900s to the Western Front in 1918; from Berlin during the Weimar Republic to Hollywood in the McCarthyite era. Its central character, John James Todd, is a filmmaker obsessed with the creation of a single masterwork based on Rousseau's Confessions. The protagonist of Brazzaville Beach (1990) is a young scientist, Hope Clearwater, who is studying behaviour patterns in primates in Central Africa. The first-person narrative moves between the present—Hope's struggle to achieve recognition for her scientific discoveries in the face of opposition from senior colleagues—and passages set in the recent past, which deal with her disastrous marriage to a brilliant but unstable mathematician. The Blue Afternoon (1993), set in Los Angeles during the 1930s, concerned a young woman's relationship with an enigmatic stranger claiming to be her father, with whom she undertakes a journey into the past. The novel was acclaimed for its atmospheric recreation of time and place, as well as for its insights into the mind of its female protagonist—the second time Boyd had attempted to write from a woman's point of view. It was followed by a collection of short stories, The Destiny of Natalie 'X' and Other Stories (1995) which, like several of his novels, deals with unsatisfactory love affairs played out against a variety of different European backgrounds. After the farcical comedy of his early novels, which were strongly reminiscent of the satirical writings of E. *Waugh, Boyd has established himself as a writer of lyrical, elegiac fictions, often set in the past, which deal with aspects of memory through a series of linked and overlapping narratives.

BOYLAN, Clare (1948–), Irish novelist, short-story writer, and journalist, born in Dublin. Her first novel, Holy Pictures (1983), is a powerfully evocative, tragicomic child's-eye view of Dublin life in the 1920s. This was followed by Last Resorts (1984), a novel describing the erotic adventures of Harriet, mother of three teenage children, on a Greek holiday island; and Black Baby (1988), a comic novel about a child sold to a woman by nuns. Home Rule (1992), a prequel to Holy Pictures, observes the Devlin family's turn-of-the-century battles against poverty, its humour leavened by a wry lament for the plight of Irish wives. Boylan's prose is fresh, poetic, and colourful, rich in apt and startling similes; she has a particular gift for recalling the vivid impressions, physical sensations, and misunderstandings of childhood, coupled with a reckless panache when describing adult affairs and amorous misadventures. Her volumes of short stories include A Nail on the Head (1983), Concerning Virgins (1989), and That Bad Woman (1995). She contributed an autobiographical sketch of her middle-class Dublin childhood to A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Girl (1986, ed. John Quinn). Boylan is the editor of The Agony and the Ego:

The Art and Strategy of Fiction Writing (1993), and of The Literary Companion to Cats (1995).

BOYLE, Kay (1902–), American writer, born in Minnesota, educated at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music and the Ohio Mechanics Institute. She moved with her first husband to France, and lived in Europe for twenty years. Much of her fiction draws on autobiographical sources; a memoir, Being Geniuses Together (1938), co-authored with Robert *McAlmon, movingly chronicles her experiences in Paris and elsewhere.

Boyle's deserved reputation as an innovative *Modernist novelist rests on the relatively recent recognition of at least three of her works as feminist classics. She has herself criticized these works for being overly sympathetic to their autobiographical American heroine's perspective; but her intense and controlled use of lyrical imagery, combined with its personal tone, contributes greatly to the charm of Plagued by the Nightingale (1930), her first novel. The American Bridget, living in the conservative bosom of her French husband's wealthy family, is forced to choose between her sensual desires and her loyalty to her husband. In Year Before Last (1932), Boyle tells the story of the relationship of her American fictional alter ego, renamed Hannah, with the idealistic editor and writer Martin, who is dying of tuberculosis. It is probably the finest of her novels, deriving its conviction from personal grief. My Next Bride (1934), darker and more bitter, draws on another true encounter, and reveals Boyle's increasing ability to transform her autobiographical heroine into a convincing fictional character. Later novels, generated by the Second World War, including Avalanche (1944), Primer for Combat (1942), and A Frenchman Must Die (1946), were less successful. However, in the autumnal Underground Woman (1975), the story of a woman jailed for her involvement in anti-war protests during the Vietnam War and confronted with her daughter's vagrant lifestyle, Boyle again displays her considerable strengths as a novelist. These are underwritten by her exemplary and vocal concern for political and social justice and Civil Rights which is also evident in a collection of essays, Words That Must Somehow Be Said (1985).

Boyle began her literary career as a short-story writer with the collection Wedding Day (1929); she has since displayed consistent proficiency in the form. The best stories from her collections, which include The White Horses of Vienna (1936), the war-inspired The Smoking Mountain (1951), and Nothing Ever Breaks Except the Heart (1966), are arranged thematically and chronologically in Fifty Stories (1980). She is also the author of several volumes of poetry, including A Statement (1932), Collected Poems (1962), and This Is Not a Letter (1985).

BOYLE, Patrick (1905–82), Northern Irish short-story writer and novelist, born in Co. Antrim, educated at Coleraine Academical Institution. He worked with Ulster Bank for 45 years and retired as manager of their Wexford branch. Boyle began writing late in life and achieved recognition by winning The Irish Times Short Story Competition in 1965. He confirmed his reputation with a collection of stories, At Night All Cats Are Grey (1966), and a novel, Like Any Other Man (1966), which satirizes the stagnant life of a country town through its portrayal of a drunken, philandering, and ultimately doomed, bank manager. Boyle's short stories are more sympathetic and it is in this genre that his talent is most evident. His three collections, At Night All Cats Are Grey, All Looks Yellow to the Jaundiced Eye (1969), and A View from Calvary (1976), contain stories which rank with those of Frank *O'Connor and Sean *O'Faolain.

BOYLE, T(homas) Coraghessan (1948–), American novelist, born in Peekshill, New York, the grandson of Irish immigrants. He was educated at the State University of New York and the University of Iowa, where his teachers at the *Iowa Writers' Workshop included J. *Cheever and J. *Irving. A collection of short stories, Descent of Man (1979), was followed by a novel, Water Music (1981), which is set in 1795 and interweaves scenes of London low-life with an account of the adventures of the explorer Mungo Park in the Sahara. Other works include Budding Prospects (1984), about a professional marijuana grower; Greasy Lake and Other Stories (1985), based on the author's troubled childhood; East is East (1990), about a Japanese man's encounter with American culture; The Road to Wellville (1993), set in turn-of-the-century Michigan, and focusing on the inventor of the cornflake, John Harvey Kellogg; Without a Hero (1995), a collection of short stories dealing with millennial anxieties; and The Tortilla Curtain (1995), a seriocomic view of middle-class values in contemporary California. His style blends surrealism with anarchic humour and displays a relish for the more bizarre episodes of history; he has acknowledged the influence of D. *Barthelme, J. *Barth, and T. *Pynchon.

Boy's Own Story, A, a novel by Edmund *White, published in 1982. This deceptively simple story, with marked autobiographical overtones, of a young boy's journey to sexual and intellectual self-awareness, reworks the conventional American bildungsroman (and its European prototype) to include an exclusively homosexual perspective and sensibility that entirely avoids shame, guilt, and self-hatred. Elegantly—and at times extravagantly—written and meticulously crafted, it is distinguished by its fine powers of observation, its evocation of life in small town America, and its careful balance of anecdote and introspection. Its apparent disregard for conventions of plot and narrative drive may be interpreted as an artful device that convinces the reader of the reality of the experience the writer depicts, encouraging identification and thus rendering universal a theme that had been previously treated (as in James Baldwin's Giovanni's Room*) as an occasion for self-torment. Thus it can be said that White, in this novel and its sequel The Beautiful Room is Empty, has retrieved 'gay fiction' from the margins to which it was hitherto relegated and located it as a thriving trend in contemporary American literature; not without irony, since the joy with which he wrote has been replaced by a deep awareness of the impact of Aids on all depictions of contemporary sexuality.

BRACKENBURY, Alison (1953–), British poet, born in Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, educated at St Hugh's College, Oxford. Dreams of Power (1981), her first substantial collection of verse, contained an impressive sequence in the voice of a woman at the court of Elizabeth I. Breaking Ground (1984), its long title poem structured around events in the life of John Clare, was followed by Christmas Roses (1988), which contained numerous lyric poems of remarkable refinement and concentration, and Selected Poems (1991). The emotional and imaginative sensitivity apparent in many of her poems is given substance and clarity by precisely observed natural and domestic imagery. In the title poem of 1829 (1995), Mozart's widow reflects upon her past.

BRADBROOK, Muriel (Clara) (1909–93), British scholar and critic, born in Wallasey, Cheshire, educated at Girton College, Cambridge, where she taught throughout her career; in 1968 she became Mistress of the college, of which she produced a history entitled That Infidel Place (1969) to mark its centenary in 1969. She was best known for her contributions to Elizabethan and Shakespearian studies, which are highly regarded for her detailed knowledge of the social and cultural contexts of the period. Themes and Conventions of Elizabethan Tragedy (1934), Shakespeare and Elizabethan Poetry (1951), The Growth and Structure of Elizabethan Comedy (1955), The Rise of the Common Player (1962), Shakespeare the Craftsman (1969), and The Living Monument (1976) are the six volumes of her History of Elizabethan Drama, which were published together in 1979. Among her other publications are The School of Night (1936), a study of Elizabethan intellectual heterodoxy; Ibsen the Norwegian (1946); and Malcolm Lowry: His Art and Early Life (1974). The Collected Papers of Muriel Bradbrook, covering a wide variety of topics, appeared in four volumes between 1982 and 1989.

BRADBURY, Malcolm (Stanley) (1932–), British novelist and critic, born in Sheffield, educated at the universities of Leicester, London, Indiana, and Manchester. From 1970 until 1995 he was Professor of American Studies at the University of East Anglia. His first novel, Eating People Is Wrong (1959), with its university setting and cast of eccentric characters, usually academics, established the pattern which his later books were to follow, such as Stepping Westward (1965; stories), set on an American campus, and the novel Who Do You Think You Are? (1976; see CAMPUS NOVEL). Bradbury won wide recognition with The History Man (1975; adapted by Bradbury for television), a hilarious satire, set in 1972, of the fashionable left-wing pretensions of a group of academics at a new 'plate-glass' university; among its characters is the memorably repellent figure of Dr Howard Kirk, Marxist historian and champion of the Permissive Society. Rates of Exchange (1983) explores forms of cultural, linguistic, and sexual exchange through the medium of its central character, Dr Angus Petworth, a Professor of Linguistics on a British Council exchange in the imaginary East European city of Slaka. Cuts (1987) deals with the decline of the Welfare State and the cuts in higher education which were felt throughout the 1980s, and beyond, in British universities. Despite its sombre subject, the tone of the work is essentially comic, and incorporates images of cutting and splicing associated with the cinematic industry into which the hero, a failed academic, has been conscripted as a writer of screenplays. Doctor Criminale (1992) deals with themes with which the author has become increasingly concerned in recent years—the nature of modern history, and what it is to be a member of the ever-changing European community. Bradbury's narrator, Francis Jay, is a journalist in pursuit of the eponymous and elusive Criminale—an eminent philosopher with a dubious past—who tracks his quarry across eight different countries and through a number of international conferences, before eventually running him to ground. Like many of his earlier works, the novel is principally a vehicle for ideas, whose humour is derived from its parodies of academic jargon—particularly that of semiotics—rather than from the more conventional novelistic attributes such as plot and character writing. Other works of fiction include Unsent Letters (1988), a collection of humorous letters to imaginary correspondents, and The After Dinner Game (1982), a collection of plays for television.

As a critic, Bradbury's specialization is British and American fiction of the twentieth century, with particular reference to the social and philosophical implications of *Modernism. Among his critical works are What Is a Novel? (1969), The Social Contexts of Modern English Literature (1971), Saul Bellow (1982), The Modern World (1989), and The Modern British Novel (1993). Possibilities (1972), No, Not Bloomsbury (1988), and Dangerous Pilgrimages (1994) are collections of essays. In considering the functions and values of literature in an era in which the assumptions of liberal humanism are challenged, he has mediated between the traditions of critical discourse and recent innovations in literary theory; his misgivings regarding the extremes of *post-structuralist practices give rise to his humorous account of a self-deconstructing critic in the fictional My Strange Quest for Mensonge (1988). He has also edited Class Work (1995), an anthology of short fiction produced on the creative writing course he ran at East Anglia.

BRADBURY, Ray (Douglas) (1920–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Waukegan, Illinois, educated at Los Angeles High School. Among his best-known collections of interlinked stories are The Martian Chronicles (1950; UK title The Silver Locusts, 1951) containing 'The Fire Balloons', set on Mars, concerning missionary priests and ethereal aliens; and The Illustrated Man (1951), in which a mythical circus man's tattoos come eerily to life as fantastic tales. The Golden Apples of the Sun (1953), the title of which alludes to *Yeats's 'The Song of Wandering Aengus', contains stories mainly set in the future, several of them dealing with wanderers, such as the title story about the captain of a spaceship whose task is to skim the surface of the sun. His many other collections include Dark Carnival (1947), The October Country (1955), A Medicine for Melancholy (1959; UK title The Day It Rained Forever), The Machineries of Joy (1966), I Sing the Body Electric! (1969), The Last Circus and the Electrocution (1980), A Memory of Murder (1984), The Townbee Convector (1988), and The Smile (1991). His most renowned novel, Fahrenheit 451 (1953), filmed by François Truffaut in 1966, is a moral fable set in a nightmarish near future dystopia; the title refers to the temperature 'at which book-paper catches fire and burns', and the main task of the firemen is to seek out books and burn them. The fireman hero, Montag, gradually discovers the evil inherent in this dream-like totalitarian system, and after betrayal by his wife and colleagues, joins a group of people dedicated to the task of memorizing all the great books for future posterity. Other novels include the horror-fantasy Something Wicked This Way Comes (1963; filmed in 1983); Death Is a Lonely Business (1985), a *hardboiled murder mystery; and A Graveyard for Lunatics (1990), set in the Hollywood of the 1950s. Bradbury has also written plays, published in The Wonderful Ice Cream Suit (1972), and film scripts, including It Came from Outer Space (1952), Moby Dick (1954), and The Picasso Summer (1968); On Stage: A Chrestomathy of His Plays (1991) is a selection of his work. Dandelion Crater, on the surface of the moon, was so named by Apollo astronauts in honour of Dandelion Wine (1957), in which interlinked stories spring from the imagination of a young boy during the summer of 1928. Bradbury was commended by Brian* Aldiss as 'the Hans Christian Andersen of the jet age'; his combination of humour and visionary intensity often reflects a nostalgia for childhood, and American small-town life. He has also published Green Shadows, White Whale (1992), an account of his experiences in the early 1950s when he worked in Ireland as scriptwriter on John Huston's film Moby Dick; and the essays Yestermorrow: Obvious Answers to Impossible Futures (1991) and Journey to far Metaphor (1994).

BRADLEY, A(ndrew) C(ecil) (1851–1935), British critic, born in Cheltenham, the brother of F. H. *Bradley; he was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, where he lectured from 1876 to 1882, when he accepted a professorship at Liverpool University. In 1901 he became Oxford Professor of Poetry, producing his most notable work during the five years of the appointment. The essays of Shakespearean Tragedy (1904) established him as the leading Shakespearian critic of his day and offer what L. C. Knights termed 'the most illustrious example' of the 'discussion of Shakespeare's tragedies in terms of the characters of which they are composed'; Knights and others associated with Scrutiny dismissed his methods as sentimentally speculative. His Oxford Lectures on Poetry (1909) were dominated by further examples of his work on Shakespeare, which remains notable for his magisterial style and the acuteness of many of his insights. Other publications by Bradley include Miscellany (1929), a collection of essays; and Ideals of Religion (1940), which originated in his work as Gifford Lecturer at the University of Glasgow in 1907 and 1908.

BRADLEY, F(rancis) H(erbert) (1846–1924), British philosopher, born at Clapham, the brother of A. C. *Bradley; he was educated at University College, Oxford. In 1870 he was elected a fellow of Merton College, Oxford, where he remained in somewhat reclusive residence until his death. With T. H. Green (1836–82), he was Oxford's leading proponent of Hegelian thought, which forms the basis for his Ethical Studies (1876) and The Principles of Logic (1883); the works were in part repudiations of the utilitarianism of J. S. Mill (1806–73) and demonstrated Bradley's 'polemical irony and his obvious zest in using it', to quote from T. S. *Eliot's 1927 review of a reissue of Ethical Studies. Eliot, who produced a doctoral thesis on Bradley's philosophy in 1916, was deeply impressed by his ability to combine a high degree of metaphysical scepticism with a belief in the ultimate unity of all phenomena. His work on metaphysics is principally contained in Appearance and Reality (1893) and Essays on Truth and Reality (1914). R. Wollheim's F. H. Bradley was published in 1959.

BRADLEY, Henry (1845–1923), British lexicographer, born in Manchester; following an elementary education he became a clerk in a Sheffield cutlery business, where he remained for twenty years, achieving a remarkable knowledge of numerous European and classical languages in his spare time. In 1884 he moved to London. His abilities as a philologist came to notice through his extended review in the Academy of the first part of the New English Dictionary (1884), later known as the Oxford English Dictionary. He began contributing articles to the Dictionary and in 1888 was appointed assistant editor; he succeeded James *Murray as senior editor in 1915. From 1896 onward he lived in Oxford, becoming a fellow of Exeter College in 1896. The best-known of his works of independent authorship is the widely read The Making of English (1904); his many articles, which include 'English Place Names', a seminal study in toponymy, were published as The Collected Papers of Henry Bradley in 1928. Among his other works is his edition of Caxton's Dialogues in French and English (1900).

BRAGG, Melvyn (1939–), British novelist, journalist, and playwright, born in Cumbria, educated at Wadham College, Oxford. A sense of place is crucial to his fiction which is for the most part set in Cumbria and celebrates its dialect and landscape. Many of his novels describe the interaction between social expectation and the psychological and emotional development of individual men and women. They include For Want of a Nail (1965), and his 'Cumbrian Trilogy', The Hired Man (1969), A Place in England (1971), and Kingdom Come (1980), which emphasizes the physical hardships endured by agricultural labourers in the early years of the century and suggests that later generations of the Tallentire family (the main protagonists) find it difficult to engage with the contemporary world with the same vigour as their forebears. As well as his work as a screenwriter for film and television, which includes the successful 1984 adaptation of his novel The Hired Man for the stage, Bragg has a considerable reputation as a producer and presenter of arts programmes on television; he draws on this milieu in Love and Glory (1983), depicting the struggle between two ambitious men, an actor and a television producer. The Maid of Buttermere (1987) returns to a pastoral setting and fictionalizes the story of a nineteenth-century con man who bigamously marries an innkeeper's daughter. Later works include A Time To Dance (1990), Crystal Rooms (1992), and Credo (1996). The Seventh Seal (1993) is a critical appreciation of Bergman's film, and includes an account of Bragg's meeting with Bergman.

BRAINE, John (Gerard) (1922–86), British novelist, born in Bradford, Yorkshire, educated at St Bede's Grammar School, Bradford; he was prominent among the 'Angry Young Men' of northern English fiction. Braine had worked as a librarian in the north of England. He began writing Room at the Top (1957) while recovering from TB in a sanatorium. Its realistic portrayal of life in a dour provincial town, and its story of the cynical Joe Lampton making his way to the top, set the agenda for a whole genre of contemporary writing; the novel was made into a film in 1959. His second novel, The Vodi (1959), was a supernatural tale concerning a TB patient plagued by judgemental aliens. He returned to the characters and setting of his first book in Life at the Top (1962); Joe Lampton has married the boss's daughter but becomes disenchanted with the bourgeois world he had pursued with such unscrupulousness. Braine subsequently moved to the south of England and abandoned his angry left-wing political position. His finest novel of this period is The Jealous God (1964), a hard-edged story of a Catholic schoolmaster caught between the repellent forces of marriage and the priesthood in a community which recognizes no other vocations. Braine's later works include The Crying Game (1968); Stay with Me till Morning (1970), which was televised; The Pious Agent (1975), a thriller; One and Last Love (1981); and the autobiographical novel These Golden Days (1985). Man at the Top was a television series based on his early novels. A prolific literary journalist, Braine published a study of J. B. Priestley in 1979.

BRAITHWAITE, E(dward) R(icardo) (1912–), Guyanese autobiographical writer, diplomat, and teacher, born in Georgetown, British Guiana, educated at City College, New York and the Universities of Cambridge and London. His varied career included service with the RAF in the Second World War, and as Permanent Representative of Guyana at the United Nations. To Sir, With Love (1959), about his experiences as a teacher in London, was an international bestseller. Other novels include Paid Servant (1962), about his experiences as a social worker; Choice of Straws (1965), which tackles racism among the white working class; and Reluctant Neighbours (1972). His visit to Africa is recorded in the trenchant A Kind of Homecoming (1962), and to South Africa in Honorary White (1975), perhaps his best book. It chronicles his almost farcical encounters with the white authorities, who suspended the rigours of apartheid in recognition of his 'celebrity' status.

BRAITHWAITE, William Stanley (Beaumont) (1878–1962), American poet and editor, born in Boston of West Indian parents; he attended Boston Latin School. He began his long career as literary editor with the Boston Evening Transcript in 1905. Lyrics of Life and Love (1904), his first collection of poetry, was followed by The House of Falling Leaves (1908) and Selected Poems (1948). His verse is characterized by the meditative romanticism of its themes and its accomplished use of the sonnet and other traditional forms. As an editor he was hospitable to more innovative work and contributed valuably to the development of American poetry in the earlier decades of the century. The most notable of the many anthologies of verse he produced are the seventeen annual issues of the Anthology of Magazine Verse and Yearbook of American Poetry (1913–29), in which he promoted the work of Countee *Cullen and others associated with the *Harlem Renaissance. His other publications include the novel Going over Tindal (1924), the short stories of Frost on the Green Tree (1928), and The Bewitched Parsonage (1950), a study of the Brontës. He became Professor of Creative Literature at the University of Atlanta in 1935. The House under Arcturus (1941) is his autobiography.

BRAMAH, Ernest, pseudonym of Ernest Bramah SMITH (1868–1942), British writer, born near Manchester; he was a farmer for some years, the experience providing material for his first book, English Farming and why I Turned It Up (1894). He was also a provincial journalist, and secretary to Jerome K. *Jerome before becoming a writer. His best-known works, praised by *Belloc and *Chesterton, are the short stories relating the activities of Kai Lung, an itinerant Chinese story-teller, written in a superbly polished, ludicrously exaggerated imitation of conventional Chinese modes of address and narration (The Wallet of Kai Lung, 1900, and other collections). His detective short stories are not only excellent as detection, but also interesting in that their hero, Max Carrados, is one of the few blind detectives in fiction. There are several collections, of which Max Carrados (1914) is the first. In the introduction to The Eyes of Max Carrados (1923), Bramah defends himself against the accusation that he has exaggerated his detective's abilities, citing instances of the power of the blind to develop their other senses.

BRAND, Dionne (1953–), Trinidadian poet and short-story writer, born in Guayaguayare, Trinidad, where she was educated at Naporima Girls' School. In 1970 she moved to Canada and graduated from the University of Toronto in 1975. With the exception of a period as a communications co-ordinator in Grenada which ended with the USA's invasion of the island in 1983, she has continued to live in Toronto, where she is widely active in community work. Her collections of poetry include 'Fore Day Morning (1978), Primitive Offensive (1982), Chronicles of the Hostile Sun (1984), and No Language Is Neutral (1990). Her verse, characterized by thematic interactions between history and the present and by precisely observed imagery, uses her personal experience to chart the emotional and cultural tensions generated by immigration. Sans Souci and Other Tales (1988) is a collection of her short stories, which are set in both Canada and the Caribbean. No Burden To Carry (1992) is a non-fiction work documenting the lives of black women in Canada.

BRASCH, Charles (1909–73), New Zealand poet, born in Dunedin, educated at Oxford University. He travelled widely in Europe, Africa, and America before finally settling in New Zealand after the Second World War. Together with fellow poet Denis Glover, Brasch was the founding editor of the major New Zealand literary journal Landfall in 1947; he continued his editorship until his retirement in 1966. Landfall Country (1962), edited by Brasch, is a selection from the journal's distinguished contributors. Brasch's early collections of poems, The Land and Its People (1939) and Home Ground (1943), were mythopoeic in tone while in later works, such as The Estate (1957) and Ambulando (1964), a more elegiac tendency exists. These collections were respected at the time for their sincerity, their poised concern for landscape, and their personal/national attitudes (notably in the moving and restrained poem 'The Islands (ii)'). Collected Poems (1984) allowed a proper appreciation of his achievement. Both Vincent *O'Sullivan and Ian *Wedde have made significant assessments of Brasch's work. His autobiography, Indirections, appeared in 1980.

BRATHWAITE, Edward Kamau (1930–), Barbadian poet, born in Bridgetown, Barbados, educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, and the University of Sussex. After working as an Education Officer in Ghana, in 1962 he began teaching at the University of the West Indies, where he became Professor of Social and Cultural History in 1982. His poetry and his writings as a historian display a common concern with the cultural heritage of the Caribbean and American descendants of Africans dispersed into slavery from the seventeenth century onward. The Arrivants: A New World Trilogy (1973), consisting of Rights of Passage (1967), Masks (1968), and Islands (1969), uses an autobiographical framework to trace global patterns in the historical and contemporary conditions of the African peoples. A further trilogy comprising Mother Poem (1977), Sun Poem (1982), and X-Self (1987) sustains his investigation of personal and cultural identity, encompassing interpretations of economic, political, and religious developments since the Roman Empire in its increasingly expansive movement towards an affirmative vision of growth and change. Vivid imagery, an energetic variety of tonal and rhythmical effects, and inventively experimental forms are among the characteristics of his verse, which addresses its complex spectrum of themes with compelling directness. His other volumes of poems include Other Exiles (1975), Third World Poems (1983), and Middle Passages (1992). Notable among his works as a cultural historian are Folk Culture of the Slaves in Jamaica (1970), Caribbean Man in Time and Space (1974), and History of the Voice: The Development of Nation Language in Anglophone Caribbean Poetry (1984).

BRAUTIGAN, Richard (1935–84), American novelist, short-story writer, and poet, born in Tacoma, Washington. Brautigan came to prominence in the 1960s as a leading exponent of a new society. He lived in San Francisco for many years before moving to Montana at the end of the 1970s. Influenced by the *San Francisco Renaissance and the *Beat writers, he is often remembered as one of the voices of hippy life. He wrote a wide range of early poetry including The Return of the Rivers (*c.*1957), The Galilee Hitch-Hiker (1958), Lay the Marble Tea (1959), and The Octopus Frontier (1960). His first novel, A Confederate General from Big Sur (1964), was followed by the huge success of Trout Fishing in America (1967), which describes a nostalgic search for the perfect fishing spot, taking one on a quest through a variety of landscapes including San Francisco city parks, Oregon forests, Idaho campingsites, and a Filipino laundry; the failure to reach the goal indicates the degenerate cultural environment of the USA. Watermelon Sugar (1968) portrays life in a commune that has defined its way of life in contradistinction to the social structures of the outside world. His other novels include The Abortion: An Historical Romance (1971), The Hawkline Monster: A Gothic Western (1974), Willard and His Bowling Trophies: A Perverse Mystery (1974), Sombrero Fallout: A Japanese Novel (1976), Dreaming of Babylon: A Private Eye Novel, 1942 (1977), and The Tokyo–Montana Express (1980). Revenge of the Lawn: Stories 1962–1970 appeared in 1971. Frequently anarchically whimsical in their structures and statements, the novels are marked with understatement and a 'throwaway' tone, as they explode the pretensions of middle America. He continued writing poetry about unrestrained sexuality and personal encounters; collections include All Watched over by Machines of Loving Grace (1967), The Pill versus the Springhill Mine Disaster (1968), Please Plant This Book (1968, a combination of poems and seed packets), Rommel Drives on deep into Egypt (1970), Loading Mercury with a Pitchfork (1976), and June 30th, June 30th (1978). The early formal playfulness and humour began to give way to an increasingly dark view of American culture as the 1970s progressed, with his final book, So the Wind Won't Blow It Away (1982), appearing shortly before his suicide.

Brave New World, a novel by A. *Huxley, published in 1932. An anti-utopian satire, originally conceived as a parody of H. G. *Wells's Men like Gods (1927), it describes a scientifically determined future where history and the family have been abolished, and Henry Ford is the deity. Reproduction takes place in bottles by 'Bokanovsky's Process'; humans are graded from Alphas to Epsilons, subjected to neo-Pavlovian conditioning, and take their places in a utilitarian World State manipulated by Controllers. The plot hinges on a discontented Alpha Plus, 'Bernard Marx', who journeys to a New Mexican reservation and brings back a Natural Man reared on 'forbidden' books. The Shakespeare-spouting 'John Savage' is at first intrigued, then increasingly disgusted by the New World's sterile hedonism—sex without consequences, the ubiquitous use of 'soma', an all-purpose pleasure drug—and lack of individual freedom; his debate with 'Mustapha Mond' is used to dramatize Huxley's own ethical scepticism about purely technological progress. Located in the 'seventh century of Our Ford', Brave New World deals with contemporary political and scientific ideas (reflected in characters' names like 'Lenina', 'Benito Hoover') and the then-competing world systems, communism and capitalism. The novel remains popular, partly due to its prophetic elements. Some aspects, such as state slogans 'COMMUNITY, IDENTITY, STABILITY' and mental conditioning, anticipated Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four*, but Huxley's focus was on 'the advancement of science as it affects human individuals', not the nature of totalitarianism. BREEZE, Jean 'Binta' (1956–), Jamaican poet, born in Pattyhill, a village in north-east Jamaica. After working as a teacher, in 1978 she entered the Jamaican School of Drama, where she adopted the African name 'Binta', meaning 'close to the heart'. She subsequently emerged as Jamaica's first female exponent of *'dub' poetry, a mode of reading of verse to the rhythms of reggae music. Answers (1983), Riddym Ravings and Other Poems (1988), and Spring Cleaning (1992) are her principal collections of verse. She is noted for her energetic performances of poems, making imaginative use of Jamaican dialect in dramatic monologue forms. The most readily available recordings of her readings are featured on the widely distributed Word Soun' 'Ave Power, Reggae Power (1985). Her work is also rich in the distinctively understated lyricism and compassion of many poems deriving from her observations of everyday experience. Among her works as a dramatist is the screenplay for the film Hallelujah Anyhow (1990).

BRENAN, Gerald (Edward Fitzgerald) (1894–1987), British writer on Spain and Spanish culture, born in Malta, educated at Radley College. Following distinguished service in the First World War, he travelled to Spain in 1919 with the intention of becoming a writer; South from Granada (1957) is his retrospective account of this period. With the exception of an interlude in London during which he wrote and published fiction under the pseudonym 'George Beaton', he spent most of his life from the early 1930s onward in Malaga. The Spanish Labyrinth (1943) formed a penetrating survey of the cultural and historical contexts of the Spanish Civil War. The Face of Spain (1950), a richly digressive and humanely perceptive view of conditions under General Franco, confirmed his reputation as the most authoritative British writer on modern Spain. His other works include The Literature of the Spanish People (1953), a critical history, and the autobiographies A Life of One's Own (1962) and Personal Record (1974). There is a biography, Gerald Brenan: The Interior Castle (1992), by Jonathan Gathorne-Hardy.

BRENNAN, C(hristopher) J(ohn) (1870–1932), Australian poet and critic, born in Sydney, educated at the Universities of Sydney and Berlin. The strong influence in his work of the French Symbolist poets and European literature of the nineteenth century was seen as a departure from the nationalist-radical verse prevalent in Australia at that time and may have resulted in the mixed reception of his two early collections of 1897. His major work, Poems (1913) (1914), incorporated material from his earlier work, much of it influenced by Mallarmé and by his experiences in Berlin; it draws on myths of fall and redemption, and explores the nature of love and fulfilment and man's essential dualism. In 1920 Brennan was appointed Associate Professor of German and Comparative Literature at the University of Sydney but his somewhat controversial character, and scandal surrounding his private life, increased his isolation in later years. A Chant of Doom and Other Verses (1918) denounced Germany's role in the First World War. The Burden of Tyre: Fifteen Poems by C. J. Brennan (1953; edited by Harry F. Chaplin), early poems attacking Britain's involvement in the Boer War, and The Prose of Christopher Brennan (1962; edited by A. R. Chisholm and J. J. Quinn), a critical work, appeared posthumously.

BRENTON, Howard (1942–), British dramatist, born in Portsmouth, the son of a policeman, educated at Cambridge University. After working as a stage manager at various repertory companies, he joined Portable Theatre, one of whose founders was David *Hare, with whom he was eventually to write a play about municipal corruption, Brassneck (1973), and Pravda (1986), a Jonsonian comedy about British journalism and a predatory press baron. The plays which first brought him to notice in his own right, however, were two surreal one-act works, Christie Dances (1969) and Hitler Dances (1972). Then came numerous plays more openly and naturalistically dealing with Britain and British politics from a radical stance: Magnificence (1973), about a squatter who becomes a terrorist after a bailiff's violence causes his wife to miscarry; The Churchill Play (1973), set in the near future, inside a prison camp for British dissidents; Weapons of Happiness (1976), about the unsuccessful occupation of a factory; a lively picture of Derby Day, Epsom Downs (1977); and The Romans in Britain, which caused great controversy when the National Theatre staged it in 1980, though less because of the parallels it drew between Caesar's invasion of Britain and the British army's presence in Ulster than because of one particular scene, involving the homosexual rape of a druid. Moscow Gold (1990), a theatrical tribute to President Gorbachev written in collaboration with Tariq *Ali, was followed by another play derived from the recent upheavals in the former Soviet bloc, this time written by Brenton alone: Berlin Bertie (1992), in which an East German secret policeman and a woman whose husband has been exposed as a Stasi agent meet again in a run-down section of London. As with Hare, Brenton's plays tend towards the epic, and often move between locations in sudden, cinematic jumps. He published Hot Irons, a collection of essays and extracts from his diaries, in 1995.

BREYTENBACH, Breyten (1939–), South African poet, novelist, and painter, born in Bonnievale, Cape Province. In 1961 he settled in Paris, where he married Yolande Ngo Thi Hoong Lien, whose father was finance minister in the government of Ngo Dinh Diem of South Vietnam. Breytenbach's work as a visual artist and his writing, which began with books of poems in Afrikaans, are much informed by the pain of exile, and acute awareness of world-wide political turbulence. In the early 1970s he visited South Africa on several occasions where his opposition to the apartheid regime was made blatantly clear; his first such visit is described in the ironically titled A Season in Paradise (1973). In 1975 he was arrested and sentenced to nine years in prison under the Terrorism Act. He was finally released in 1981 following representations from the French president François Mitterrand. His prison poems, sombre with apocalyptic dread, are generally considered his finest; a selection, together with prose pieces, has been translated and published as In Africa even the Flies Are Happy (1978). Other works include Sinking Ship Blues (1977), translated from Afrikaans, And Death White as Words (1978), Mouroir: Mirrornotes of a Novel (1984), All One Horse: Fictions and Images (1990, short stories), and Painting in the Eye (1993). His chief works in English are The True Confessions of an Albino Terrorist (1984), an agonized memoir of his incarceration; and a novel, Memory of Snow and Dust (1989), allusive and complex in its imagery, which examines the conflicts within Breytenbach's own psyche between spiritual yearning and the need to be politically effective. Return to Paradise (1993) records his disillusioned journey through post-apartheid South Africa in 1991.

Brideshead Revisited, a novel by Evelyn *Waugh, published in 1945. The novel, which takes the form of an extended flashback, is narrated by Charles Ryder, an army officer billeted at the eponymous country house, owned by an aristocratic Roman Catholic family headed by Lord and Lady Marchmain. Charles had visited Brideshead with Sebastian Flyte, the Marchmains' younger son, when both were Oxford undergraduates. In the course of the narrative Ryder conveys his fascination with the family, all of whom are eccentric or unhappy in some way: the gifted but unstable Sebastian has alcoholic tendencies; Lady Marchmain is unhappily married but refuses to divorce her husband, who lives in Venice with his mistress; the heir, Lord Brideshead, is as fanatically devout as his mother, and even the sisters, Julia and Cordelia, seem ill at ease with their role. Interspersed with passages describing the somewhat fraught family gatherings at Brideshead are those evoking the hedonism of Oxford between the wars; amongst the minor characters is the decadent aesthete Anthony Blanch (based on Brian Howard, one of Waugh's Oxford contemporaries). Events such as the General Strike of 1926 are described in passing, but do not really impinge on the plot, which remains principally concerned with the vicissitudes of the Flyte siblings: Sebastian, now a confirmed alcoholic, goes to live in North Africa, where his condition deteriorates rapidly; Julia, unhappily married, admits her love for Charles, also married, and the two plan to divorce their respective spouses, but are prevented from doing so by Julia's religious convictions. The final scenes are dominated by Julia's struggle with her conscience and her eventual decision to relinquish Charles, most of which takes place as her father, Lord Marchmain, is dying. The closing pages, which form an Epilogue, return to the opening wartime setting; the work ends, despite the narrator's nostalgic sadness for all that he has lost, on a note of cautious optimism. The novel was adapted for television in 1980.

Bridge, The, Hart *Crane's long poem setting out his 'Myth of America', published in 1930. The lyrical realism of the poem, 'To Brooklyn Bridge', identifies the bridge as symbol of the sequence's imaginative development. The eight succeeding sections form an impressionistic survey of the human and natural characters of America. Columbus's dramatic monologue in 'Ave Maria', the first part, recognizes the divine purpose for the country as 'one shore beyond desire'. The second part, 'Powhatan's Daughter', vividly evokes human activity and potential in the passage entitled 'The River', which opens with an experimental collage of advertising slogans. Pocahontas emerges through an abundance of sensually precise natural imagery as a feminine embodiment of the land itself and its indigenous culture. 'Cape Hatteras', the fourth section, uses its address to Walt Whitman as a basis for a lyrically compelling celebration of the spirit of progress. The sixth section, 'Quaker Hill', forms a critique of the materialist constraints on America's utopian potential, which has its antithesis in the view of urban degradation in 'The Tunnel', the penultimate section. 'Atlantis', the conclusion, returns to the opening's view of the bridge, its 'one arc synoptic of all tides' the symbol and reality around which the final exalted affirmation accumulates. Crane intended the poem, his 'symbol of our constructive future', as a corrective to the pessimism of T. S. Eliot's *The Waste Land; its expansive vision is sustained by a vibrant technical versatility and the remarkable geographical and thematic mobility with which it charts the actuality and ideal of America.

Bridge of San Luis Rey, The, a novel by Thornton *Wilder, published in 1927 (Pulitzer Prize). A historical romance, set in eighteenth-century Spanish colonial Peru, it examines the lives and deaths of the five travellers who are killed when the eponymous bridge collapses. Father Juniper, a Franciscan priest, believes that the deaths are part of God's grand design, and he sets out to prove this by scientific demonstration. The results of his investigations over six years are collected in a book which is deemed heretical. Brother Juniper is burned at the stake with his book, but a copy survives. The characters in the novel are the eccentric Marquesa de Montemayor; her unhappy companion, the Indian girl Pepita; Uncle Pio, the former teacher of the famous actress, La Perichole; his ward, Jaime, La Perichole's illegitimate son; and Esteban, who is deeply devoted to his dead twin brother, Manuel, La Perichole's lover. Apart from detailing the lives of these five characters, the novel is partly a theological-philosophical reflection on fate and providence, and this sense of chance brings all the characters to the bridge at the same time, representing life as unified, albeit mysteriously.

BRIDGES, Robert (Seymour) (1844–1930), British poet, critic, and editor, born in Walmer, Kent, educated at Eton and Corpus Christi College, Oxford. After studying at St Bartholomew's Hospital, he became a consulting physician at Great Ormond Street Children's Hospital. In 1881 he ceased medical practice in order to concentrate on his literary activities. His first collection of verse, Poems (1873), was followed by many volumes, including the sonnet sequence The Growth of Love (1876), the long poems Prometheus the Firegiver (1883) and Eros and Psyche (1885), and The Humours of the Court (1890). His Poetical Works appeared in six volumes between 1898 and 1905, with the publication in 1912 of a very popular single-volume edition. He was among the founders of the Society for Pure English in 1913, the year in which he succeeded Alfred Austin as Poet Laureate. Among his later volumes of poetry are October and Other Poems (1920), which contained a number of poems on the Great War, and New Verse (1925). Testament of Beauty was published to widespread acclaim in 1929; its four books form a lyrical and meditative exposition of his theistic rationalism, which derived from the philosophy of *Santayana. Bridges regarded the work as the summation of his career as a poet. Its long verse lines are the result of his interest in combining the properties of quantitive classical metres and the stress patterns of English prosody. He edited numerous anthologies of prose and poetry, and produced the first edition of Gerard Manley Hopkins's Poems in 1918; Hopkins's friendship and correspondence with Bridges since their meeting at Oxford are dealt with in Jean-Georges Ritz's Robert Bridges and Gerard Manley Hopkins, 1863–1889: A Literary Friendship (1960). The best-known of Bridges's many works as a critic are his monographs Milton's Prosody (1893) and John Keats (1895). He was keenly interested in the musical settings of words, collaborating on four occasions with the musician Hubert Parry and editing several editions of the Yattendon Hymnal. There is a biography by Edward *Thompson (1944); Selected Letters of Robert Bridges, edited by Donald E. Sandford, was published in two volumes in 1984.

BRIDIE, James, pseudonym of Osborne Henry MAVOR (1888–1951), Scottish playwright, born in Glasgow, the son of an engineer, educated at Glasgow University. Bridie became a prominent physician and did not begin seriously to write for the theatre until he was 40, when The Sunlight Sonata was performed in his home city of Glasgow. Thereafter he became enormously prolific; by his death he had completed forty-two plays, and was regarded as Scotland's leading dramatist. He saw the purpose of his quirky, genial drama as primarily to entertain, but secondarily and importantly to leave his audience, not with any firm conclusions, but 'whirling with speculations', often about metaphysical matters. Accordingly, he turned to biblical themes in several colloquial plays: most successfully in Tobias and the Angel (1930), in which the protagonist, accompanied by Raphael, is transformed by his adventures from an unassuming 'little worm' into a young man of genuine courage and spirit; but also in the lively Jonah and the Whale (1932) and Susannah and the Elders (1937). Other work with religious implications includes A Sleeping Clergyman (1933), in which a cleric symbolizing God snoozes while an exemplary family works out its and the world's destiny; Mr Bolfry (1943), in which a Calvinist minister is visited by an intellectually plausible devil; and the dramatic biography John Knox (1947). Other plays, notably The Anatomist (1930), about anti-scientific prejudice at the time of Burke and Hare; the thriller Dr Angelus (1947); Daphne Laureola (1949), a portrait of loneliness; and the unwontedly dark morality The Baikie Charivari (1950), serve to emphasize Bridie's abiding intellectual curiosity and diversity of interest. Among his other public activities, he helped establish the Glasgow Citizen's Theatre in 1943 and founded the first College of Drama in Scotland in 1950.

BRIERLEY, Walter (1900–72), English novelist, born in Waingroves, Derbyshire, of a mining family. Brierley became a miner himself and after attending Workers' Educational Association classes he won a miners' union scholarship to Nottingham University; however, unable to adjust to academic life, he returned to the pit. He sent an early manuscript to John *Hampson, who passed it to Walter *Allen; it aroused both writers' attention for its portrayal of a coal miner humiliated by the means test, and Brierley was encouraged to write what was to be his best-known novel, Means Test Man (1935). The novel remains a study of the effects of unemployment on a sensitive mind, and a cry of pain and outrage at the indignity of no longer having status or function in the community. Far from being a proletariate, the novel today appears more middle-class in tone. Brierley subsequently wrote the less distinguished Sandwich Man (1937), Dalby Green (1938), and Danny (1940), and became an education welfare officer in Derby until his retirement in 1965.

Briggflatts, a poem by Basil *Bunting, published in 1966, and widely regarded as the last major work of poetic *Modernism. Prior to its composition in 1965, Bunting had written little since returning to Britain from Persia in 1952; the growth of interest in his poetry initiated by Tom *Pickard stimulated Bunting to produce Briggflatts. Having accumulated over 10,000 lines, he concentrated his material into the 700 lines of text constituting the published work; into its five sections the poem compresses fifty years of autobiographical experience vividly inlaid with observational detail, mostly drawn from Bunting's natural surroundings in Northumbria. The elegiac retrospection, both personal and historical, and stoical anticipation of death that are thematically central often fuse inextricably with the lyric and celebratory modes affirming the poem's sustaining sense of locality. The emphatically Northumbrian character of Briggflatts makes it a manifestation par excellence of *regional poetry. The poem's strongly alliterative language and purposive allusions to Norse and Celtic cultures unequivocally align it with northern poetic traditions. Bunting claimed its structure was determined upon the model of Scarlatti's compositional procedures before any of the text was written; he insisted that the verbal music of Briggflatts took primacy over any considerations of meaning, thus drawing attention to the rich orchestration of consonantal and assonantal correspondences maintained with great skill throughout the poem.

BRIGGS, Asa (1921–), English historian, born in Keighley, Yorkshire, educated at Keighley Grammar School, Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and the University of London. Amongst other academic posts he was Provost of Worcester College, Oxford during 1976–91, and Chancellor of the Open University 1978–1994. A pioneer in the historical study of Victorian cities, Briggs stresses the important role of literature in illuminating the Victorian world. Among his major works are History of Birmingham: 1865–1938 (1952), Victorian People (1954), The Age of Improvement: 1783–1867 (1959), Victorian Cities (1963), William Cobbett (1967), Marx in London (1982), A Social History of England (1983), Victorian Things (1988), and Channel Islands: Occupation and Liberation (1995). He also wrote a five-volume History of Broadcasting in the United Kingdom (1961–95) and edited, with John Saville, Essays in Labour History (3 volumes; 1960–77). His Collected Essays (1985–91) were published in three volumes. He was created a life peer in 1976.

BRIGHOUSE, Harold (1882–1958), British playwright; he was the son of a Manchester businessman, and became the best-known exponent of the realistic drama associated with the repertory seasons at the city's Gaiety Theatre. He wrote The Northerners (1914), Zack (1920), and nearly twenty other plays, the best of them notable for the entertaining characterization of often oppressive and domineering Lancashire people; but, as he himself admitted in his autobiography, his reputation came overwhelmingly to depend on one only, Hobson's Choice* (1915).

Brighter Sun, A, S. *Selvon's first novel, published in 1952, in which the author deals with race relations in Trinidad, particularly the integration of the descendants of East Indian indentured workers with the island's people of African descent. Tiger, the reflective Indian peasant hero, is the son of an agricultural labourer who, fresh from an arranged Hindu marriage, leaves his family in the sugar-cane belt to settle in a suburban village closer to the city. The novel traces his development into manhood, fatherhood, and expanded consciousness after he moves with his young wife Urmilla from a closed community to a multi-racial one, where their neighbours are the black couple Joe and Rita. The interaction between the couples, in the course of which, alongside domestic responsibilities, Tiger acquires a view of responsible citizenship, seems to presage a bright future for a new society freed from the racially isolated past. Selvon's flexible use of dialect reflects the inner experience of his central character, and it is in this novel that dialect first becomes the language of consciousness in West Indian fiction. A sequel, Turn Again Tiger, was published in 1958.

Brighton Rock, a novel by Graham *Greene, published in 1938. Set among Brighton racecourse razor gangs, it is in part a detective story, showing the murder of Hale by the 17-year-old Pinkie and his gang; Pinkie's courtship of Rose, whom he marries to prevent her giving evidence against him; and his pursuit by Ida Arnold, strangely determined, after a brief meeting with Hale, to give up her life of pleasure until she convicts his killers. Brighton Rock shares in this way the seedy urban background of Greene's 1930s 'entertainments', and their interest in shady or actually criminal activities, but it is also the first of his novels to reveal the Catholic faith to which he was converted in 1926. As Greene remarks, this new direction first appears in the course of the novel itself: after the first fifty pages, the detective story partly gives way to explicit investigation of religion and morality—to contrasts of Ida's complacent conviction of the nature of right and wrong with Rose and Pinkie's more profound awareness of good and evil. They are shown, as Catholics, to inhabit a moral universe larger and more mysterious than anything available to Ida's kind; one in which even Pinkie's dedication to evil, even his eventual suicide, may not place him beyond 'the appalling strangeness of the mercy of God'. Religious questions of this kind are more fully integrated into Greene's later writing, shaping the successful phase which follows from Brighton Rock and includes *The Power and the Glory (1940), *The Heart of the Matter (1948), and *The End of the Affair (1951).

BRINK, André (Philippus) (1935–), South African novelist and playwright, born in Vrede, educated at the University of Potchefstroom and at the Sorbonne. The extension of his cultural and political horizons as a student in Paris led Brink to declare: 'I was born on a bench in the Luxembourg Gardens in Paris, in the early spring of 1960.' While his many plays are in Afrikaans, his novels are generally written and published in both Afrikaans and English, with the English versions translated by himself. They have encountered trouble with the censor in South Africa for their open attacks on apartheid. His seventh novel, Looking on Darkness (1974; in Afrikaans, Kennis van die aand, 1973) was also the first book in Afrikaans to be banned. His translation of his fourth Afrikaans novel, File on a Diplomat (1967), was later published as The Ambassador (1985). Criticism of sensationalism should be qualified by the fact that Brink himself views Afrikaner society as being in a state of apocalyptic danger, a fear which he courageously confronts in his own novels. Two of his most effective novels are the powerful A Chain of Voices (1982), its multiple narratives dealing with a historical slave rebellion on an Afrikaner farm in the Cape in 1825, and States of Emergency (1988), its background being the 'deranged year' of 1985, when rebellion flared throughout South Africa, and a state of emergency was declared. Other novels which explore the Afrikaner psyche include Rumours of Rain (1978); A Dry White Season (1979); The Wall of the Plague (1984); An Act of Terror (1991), a thriller exploring an attempted assassination of the South African president; The First Life of Adamastor (1993), which makes use of Camões' myth of demonic love and suffering and Khoi myths of creation to allegorize the roots of racial schism in South Africa; On the Contrary (1993), in which Brink makes use of Quixotic legends and eighteenth-century South African conflict in his examination of Afrikaner consciousness; Imaginings of Sand (1996) looks at South Africa's past and anticipates its future following the 1994 elections. With J. M. *Coetzee he edited an anthology of contemporary South African writing, A Land Apart (1986). Essays are collected in Mapmakers: Writing in a State of Siege (1983).

BRITTAIN, Vera (Mary) (1893–1970), British author, pacifist, and feminist, born in Newcastle-under-Lyme, Staffordshire. Her education at Somerville College, Oxford, was interrupted from 1915 to 1918 by service in London, France, and Malta as a nurse with the Volunteer Aid Detachment; her Verses of a V.A.D. (1918) reflect the vigorous pacifism with which she responded to her experiences of warfare. The Dark Tide (1923), the first of her five novels, all of which contain a strong autobiographical element, provoked controversy through its depiction of conditions in Oxford's women's colleges. She remains best known for Testament of Youth (1933), her account of her life up to 1925; Brittain intended the work, which is memorable for its movingly idealistic portrayals of 'the stark agonies of my generation' during the First World War, as a counterpart from a woman's viewpoint to the numerous memoirs of the war by male authors. The book gained her an international reputation as a spokeswoman for pacifism, and over the next three decades she lectured widely in Europe, Asia, and America; her other works as a pacifist include Seeds of Chaos (1944), which drew sharp criticism for its condemnation of the British and American bombing campaigns during the Second World War, and the historical study The Rebel Passion (1964). Among her numerous significant contributions to modern feminist literature are Lady into Woman: A History of Women from Victoria to Elizabeth II (1953), and Testament of Friendship (1940), a remarkable commemoration of her relationship with Winifred *Holtby. Testament of Experience (1957) continues her autobiography up to the year 1950 and forms a richly detailed record of social and historical developments of the period. A. G. Bishop edited three volumes of Brittain's diaries (1981, 1986, 1989); Testament of a Peace Lover (edited by A. Eden-Green) is a collection of her letters.

BROAD, C(harlie) D(unbar) (1887–1971), British philosopher, born at Harlesden, Middlesex, the son of a wine merchant, educated at Dulwich College and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He began his academic career as a lecturer at the University of St Andrews. After holding a professorship in philosophy at Bristol from 1920 to 1922, he became a fellow and lecturer of Trinity College. He remained at Cambridge, where he was Knightsbridge Professor of Moral Philosophy between 1933 and 1953, until his death. He knew Bertrand *Russell as a student and shared his belief in the primacy of scientific reasoning over common sense, a conviction reflected in Perception, Physics, and Reality (1914), Broad's first major work. His reputation rests on his lucid investigations of a remarkable range of philosophical problems and his analytical expositions of the insights of other thinkers; his writing more than justifies his modest claim in Scientific Thought (1923) to possessing 'the . . . power of stating things clearly and not superficially'. His controversial interest in psychic phenomena emerged in the course of his examination of the relations between mind and matter in The Mind and Its Place in Nature (1925); his writings on parapsychology are chiefly collected in Religion, Philosophy, and Psychical Research (1953) and Lectures on Psychical Research (1962). The fullest statement of Broad's philosophical position is given in his Examination of McTaggart's Philosophy (two volumes, 1933–8), which is considered his most important work. The Philosophy of C. D. Broad (edited by P. A. Schilpp, 1959) contains Broad's idiosyncratically revealing 'Autobiography' and 'Reply to Critics' in addition to essays by twenty-one contributors. His Critical Essays in Moral Philosophy (1971) is edited by D. R. Cheney.

BROCK, Edwin (1927–), British poet, born in London; following a grammar school education he worked as a police constable and an advertising copywriter until 1972, when he became a freelance writer. He became poetry editor of Ambit* in 1960. His earlier collections of poetry include An Attempt at Exorcism (1959), A Family Affair (1960), and With Love from Judas (1963), which contain numerous disquietingly intense treatments of domestic experience. A Cold Day at the Zoo (1970), The Blocked Heart (1975), and The River and the Train (1979) are among his subsequent volumes; Song of the Battery Hen (1977) and Five Ways To Kill a Man (1990) are selected editions, the latter containing much previously uncollected verse. His later work typically unites a disciplined freedom of form with an incisive straightforwardness to explore a wide range of social and personal concerns. His other works include the autobiographical verse and prose of Here Now, Always (1977) and the novel The Little White God (1962). He has also written plays for radio and television.

BRODBER, Erna (1940–), Jamaican novelist and sociologist, born in the village of Woodside, Jamaica; she was educated at the University of the West Indies, where she joined the staff of the Institute of Social and Economic Research in 1975. Her early works as a sociologist include Abandonment of Children in Jamaica (1974) and A Study of Yards in the City of Kingston (1975). Her first novel, Jane and Louisa Will Come Home Soon (1980), which originated in her work on abnormal psychology, is strongly informed by the themes of displacement and alienation; stylistically, it combines strong elements of Jamaica's oral tradition with fluent use of *stream of consciousness techniques. Myal (1988), more conventional in form, is a highly imaginative exploration of the tensions between the rationalism of modern culture and the persistence of a powerful cultural heritage. Another novel, Louisiana, appeared in 1994. Her other works include Perceptions of Caribbean Women: Towards a Documentation of Stereotypes (1982).

BRODKEY, Harold (1930–96), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Alton, Illinois, educated at Harvard. He was Associate Professor of English at Cornell University and also taught at the City University of New York. Until the publication of his novel The Runaway Soul (1991), Brodkey's reputation was based mainly on a handful of short stories, most of them published in The New Yorker and Esquire. His first collection, First Love and Other Sorrows (1957), was greeted with almost universal acclaim. His reputation was then sustained by the promise of a novel, initially entitled A Party of Animals; for years, despite constant announcements of its imminent publication, the novel failed to appear and Brodkey became the subject of intense speculation. The Runaway Soul (1991) is a remarkable novel, whose evocation of the world of childhood and adolescence belongs to a mainstream American tradition. The exhaustive detail and exuberant linguistic playfulness is reminiscent of both Walt Whitman and Jack *Kerouac; like them, he tried to find a new language to convey the intelligence of the body and of the world of dreaming which accompanies it. Profane Friendship (1994), a study of sexual obsession and inversion, was written in a plainer style, though not as plain as his dignified and harrowing memoir 'My Life, My Wife and Aids' (1994); Broadkey died of an AIDS-related illness. His other publications include two volumes of short stories, Women and Angels (1985) and Stories in an Almost Classical Mode (1988; UK title, The Abundant Dreamer, 1989); and A Poem about Testimony and Argument (1986).

BRODSKY, Joseph (Alexandrovich) (1940–96), Russian poet, born in Leningrad; he left school at the age of 15. Some of his poetry appeared in samizdat magazines before his arrest in 1964 for 'social parasitism'. Sentenced to five years' servitude in the Arkhangelsk region of northern Russia, he was released after eighteen months following appeals on his behalf by Dmitri Shostakovich, Anna Akhmatova, and others who affirmed the value of his verse. The Russian texts of his Stikhotvoreniia i poemy ('longer and shorter poems') were published in America in 1965. Under the dispensation permitting the emigration of Soviet Jews to Israel, he left the USSR in 1972 and was later refused permission to return. He settled in America, holding various posts as poet-in-residence before becoming Professor of Literature at Mount Holyoke College, Massachusetts, in 1981. The first significant appearance of his work in translation was Elegy for John Donne and Other Poems (1967); subsequent publications include Selected Poems (1973), A Part of Speech (1980), To Urania: Selected Poems 1965–1985 (1988), and So Forth (1995). The expansive lyrical and elegiac qualities of his verse survive impressively in translation; Anthony *Hecht, Derek *Walcott, and Richard *Wilbur are among the translators with whom he worked. Much of his poetry is on an ambitious scale, pursuing his preoccupations with human suffering and redemptive possibilities; his informally factual mode takes on a power of mythical suggestion through his remarkably imaginative use of precisely observed local detail. In 1987 he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature. Among his other works are the play Marbles (1989), an allegorical treatment of the limits of politically determined existence; Less than One (1986), a collection of his essays; and Watermark (1992), a travel book about Venice.

BROMFIELD, Louis (1896–1956), American novelist, born in Mansfield, Ohio; he studied at Columbia University before serving in the First World War. His sequence of four novels, The Green Bay Tree (1924), Possession (1925), Early Autumn (1926; Pulitzer Prize), and A Good Woman (1927), which centred on a New England farming family, effectively illustrated Bromfield's egalitarian philosophy with its emphasis on the virtues of agrarian democracy and individual initiative. With The Strange Case of Annie Spragg (1928) and Twenty-Four Hours (1930), Bromfield displayed a technical proficiency in the construction of linked narratives converging on a single event. However, critics frequently dismissed his intelligent, perceptive fictions as outmoded. Bromfield's visit to India in 1932 resulted in The Rains Came (1937), a powerful novel which displayed his narrative drive, evocative descriptive prose, an unashamed romantic idealism, and a concern with social progress. Bromfield's Indian fictions, which included Night in Bombay (1940), present a fascinating portrayal of a time and a nation prepared for radical change. His other novels include Mrs Parkington (1943), a portrait of a typical Bromfield heroine, a powerful and innovative woman; Colorado (1947), a spoof of the *Western genre; and The Wild Country (1948), a haunting study of adolescent sexuality set in Ohio farming country. Pleasant Valley (1945) and Malabar Farm (1948) are non-fiction works based on his experiences as a farmer in Ohio from 1939.

BROOKE, Jocelyn (1908–66), British novelist, born at Sandgate, Kent, educated at Worcester College, Oxford. He worked in the book and the wine trades, and served in the Royal Army Medical Corps during the Second World War. Brooke's novels explore the public school world, with its post-educational bastions, the army, the Foreign Office, the artistic professions, and homosexuality. The Military Orchid (1948), a fictionalized memoir, confirmed him as an accute observer of the natural world; it became the first part of 'The Orchid' trilogy with A Mine of Serpents (1949) and The Goose Cathedral (1950). Private View (1955), a semi-memoir, is composed of four portraits including the memorable 'Gerald Brockhurst', public school athlete. More orthodox fiction includes The Scapegoat (1948), which focuses on sado-masochism; The Image of a Drawn Sword (1950), a Kafkaesque quasi-fantasy of the army; The Passing of a Hero (1953); and Conventional Weapons (1961). Brooke also wrote a study of the British orchid, critical appreciations of Elizabeth *Bowen and John *Betjeman, and edited the works of Denton *Welch. His reputation sank after his death but revived during the early 1980s under the championship of Anthony *Powell.

BROOKE, Rupert (Chawner) (1887–1915), British poet, born in Rugby, educated at King's College, Cambridge, where he was president of the *Fabian Society and became a fellow in 1913. In 1911 and 1912 he lived in Germany, where he wrote a melodrama entitled Lithuania (1915) and numerous poems, of which 'The Old Vicarage, Grantchester' is the best-known. His first collection, Poems, appeared in 1911. He subsequently assisted Edward Marsh in planning the Georgian Poetry series (1912–22), the first of which did much to advance his reputation. Brooke's circle of acquaintances widened to include most of the influential writers of the day; referred to by W. B. *Yeats as 'the most beautiful man in England', his eminence among the pre-war jeunesse dorée contributed to his enormous posthumous fame. In 1913 he visited the USA, Canada, and the Pacific Islands while convalescing from a nervous disorder and produced a series of articles for the Westminster Gazette; some were later published, with a preface by Henry *James, as Letters from America (1916). The trip also resulted in some of his best poems, collected in 1914 and Other Poems (1915) under the section heading 'The South Seas'. After his return in 1914 he volunteered for active service and received a commission with the Royal Naval Division. On a brief expedition to Antwerp he witnessed scenes of misery which strengthened his zeal for the British cause, and shortly afterwards produced the five sonnets forming the title sequence of 1914. These were published in New Numbers early in 1915. The following Easter Sunday 'The Soldier' ('If I should die, think only this of me . . .') was read from the pulpit by the Dean of St Paul's; a report including the sonnet's text in The Times elevated Brooke to the embodiment of self-sacrificing idealism. By the time news of this reached him he had fallen ill on his way to the Dardanelles; he died on 23 April of septicaemia aboard a French hospital ship. The Poetical Works (1946) was edited by Sir Geoffrey *Keynes. His monumental reputation declined with the waning popularity of Georgian Poetry in the 1920s. Among poets engaged in the war, the reaction against his work came swiftly; Charles Hamilton *Sorley was among the first dissenters, remarking in 1915 on the falseness of Brooke's 'sentimental attitude'. Biographies include those by Christopher *Hassall (1964) and John *Lehmann (1980).

BROOKE-ROSE, Christine (1926–), British novelist and critic, born in Brussels; she grew up in Switzerland and later attended Somerville College, Oxford. In 1975 she became a professor of American literature at the University of Paris VII. Though her fiction began to appear in the late 1950s, Brooke-Rose's early novels were much influenced by *Murdoch. An illness in the 1960s and her readings in the nouveau roman radically changed her style. Out (1964), Such (1966), Between (1968), and Thru (1975), published in one volume as The Christine Brooke-Rose Omnibus (1986), display a gamut of *post-modernist influences, ranging from the detached objectivity of Robbe-Grillet in the early work to the linguistic play associated with *post-structuralism in the later novels. In her more recent novels Amalgammemnon (1984), Xorandor (1986), and Verbivore (1989), Brooke-Rose puts into fictional practice the theories of deconstruction associated with Derrida, while revealing an obsessive concern with modern technology. Textermination (1991), a characteristically playful construction of puns and literary references, was followed by the autobiographical Remake (1996), which uses material from the seventy years of its author's life to compose an experimental third-person novel. She has also published the essays Stories, Theories and Things (1991), which examine the nature and determination of the canon.

BROOKNER, Anita (1928–), English novelist and art historian, born in London, educated at King's College, University of London, and the Courtauld Institute. Brookner has held several distinguished academic posts (Slade Professor, University of Cambridge, 1967–8; Reader at the Courtauld Institute, 1977–8; Fellow of New Hall, Cambridge) and has published books on eighteenth-century painting (Watteau, 1968; The Genius of the Future: Studies in French Art Criticism, 1971; Greuze, 1972; Jacques-Louis David, 1981). Beginning with A Start in Life (1981), she has produced a novel almost every year, including Providence (1982), Look at Me (1983), Hotel du Lac (1984; Booker Prize), Family and Friends (1985), A Misalliance (1986), A Friend from England (1987), Latecomers (1988), Lewis Percy (1989), Brief Lives (1990), A Closed Eye (1991), Fraud (1992), A Private View (1994), Incidents in the Rue Laugier (1995), and Altered States (1996). The Brookner heroine has become a recognized type. She is solitary, and feels 'a stranger to the rest of the world'. (This alienation may take clinical form, such as fear of water or agoraphobia.) She is in love with a romantic (and somewhat unfocused) male character who rejects, ignores, or betrays her; in Hotel du Lac, Edith Hope, a writer of escapist romances, has been in love with a married art auctioneer and, like many of Brookner's heroines, has cultivated a 'meek and complaisant' personality. When she rejects the chance of marrying a dull companionable man, she is banished by her friends to a Swiss hotel, where she broods on her past, and finally comes to believe in her own romances. A Brookner heroine may also be recently orphaned (Frances in Look At Me) or have sacrificed her life to the demands of self-centred European parents (Ruth in A Start in Life, Mimi in Family and Friends). She is often drawn to a 'misalliance' with couples or families living cosy, greedy lives of domestic bliss or sensual excess. In Brookner's fiction, the tortoise loses and the hare wins. To combat the pain of defeat the heroine cultivates a meticulous, even dandyish, self-presentation (Blanche in A Misalliance, Rachel in A Friend from England), which matches the author's dry, witty narrative. The Brookner heroine is usually highly cultured and the novels are often dominated by a cultural reference, such as the Giorgione painting in A Friend from England. Some heroines are more likeable than others (Rachel in A Friend from England is a horrifying character; Frances in Look at Me is painfully sympathetic). In Lewis Percy, the Brookner heroine is a man, a timid Francophile offered one chance of happiness. Though her cool narrative manner is French in style, the emotions are in a tradition of English women writers from Charlotte Brontë to Elizabeth *Bowen and Rosamond *Lehmann, and she is also a great admirer of Edith *Wharton. This, and her reasoned wariness of feminism, gives her writing an old-fashioned air, and has led to accusations of conservatism, sentimentality, and élitism. She is also criticized for lack of dialogue, though this is countered by her close attention to details, her clear eye for human behaviour, and her strong evocation of emotional mood. Within its limited parameters her fiction is powerfully obsessional, disturbing, and severe.

BROOKS, Cleanth (1906–90), American literary critic, born in Murray, Kentucky, educated at Vanderbilt, Tulane, and Oxford Universities. A key figure in the development of the *New Criticism, he was taught by John Crowe *Ransom at Vanderbilt University where he was befriended by Allen *Tate and Robert Penn *Warren, and loosely associated with the Fugitive (*Agrarian) group. He became professor at Louisiana State University and, with Robert Penn Warren, established The Southern Review which championed the New Criticism and fought, successfully, against what was left of the old, belles-lettristic, historical criticism. His Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939) was influential both in its application of New Critical methods of close reading and in its argument that modern poetry (notably that of *Eliot, *Yeats, and *Auden) is anchored in the tradition of seventeenth-century metaphysical poetry. Among his other publications are Understanding Poetry: An Anthology for College Students (1938; with Robert Penn Warren; revised edition 1950); The Well-Wrought Urn: Studies in the Structure of Poetry (1947), which included two important statements of the philosophy of the New Criticism, 'The Language of Paradox' and 'The Heresy of Paraphrase'; Literary Criticism: A Short History (1957; with William K. Wimsatt); The Hidden God: Studies in Hemingway, Faulkner, Yeats, Eliot, and Warren (1963); and William Faulkner: The Yoknapatawpha Country (1963). Brooks was Gray Professor of Rhetoric at Yale (1947–90) and Cultural Attaché at the American Embassy in London (1964–6). See The Possibilities of Order: Cleanth Brooks and His Work (1976; edited by Lewis P. Simpson).

BROOKS, Gwendolyn (1917–), American poet, born in Topeka, Kansas. She grew up in Chicago, where she was educated at Wilson Junior College; the city, where she has spent most of her life, and its black community are central to most of her work. She has held visiting posts at various American universities and was Consultant in Poetry at the Library of Congress in 1985 and 1986. A Street in Bronzeville (1945) was her first collection of verse; other early publications include Annie Allen (1949), for which she became the first black American to receive a Pulitzer Prize for poetry, and The Bean Eaters (1960). Such work brings a lucidly objective social-realism and poised technical accomplishment to its fundamentally humane treatments of a wide spectrum of urban experiences. Following her participation at a black writers' conference in 1967, her poetry took on a new freedom of form and assumed a tone of unequivocal political engagement on behalf of African-Americans; among her later collections are In the Mecca (1968), Aurora (1972), The Near-Johannesburg Boy (1986), and Gottschalk and the Grande Tarantelle (1988). Brooks is also the author of the novel Maud Martha (1953), which deals with a young black woman's struggle against racial discrimination, and the impressionistic autobiography of Report from Part One (1972). Representative editions of her work are Selected Poems (1963) and the miscellany entitled The World of Gwendolyn Brooks (1971). G. E. Kent's A Life of Gwendolyn Brooks appeared in 1990.

BROOKS, Van Wyck (1886–1963), American critic, born in Plainfield, New Jersey, educated at Harvard. From 1907 to 1909 he lived in London, where he wrote The Wine of the Puritans (1908); its thesis that the Puritan ethos led to the aesthetic impoverishment of American literary culture was sustained in The Malady of the Ideal (1913). America's Coming of Age (1915) outlined his conception of an American literature liberated from dependence on European models. In 1916 he became associate editor of *The Seven Arts, energetically promoting the cultural regeneration of America. The Ordeal of Mark Twain (1920) and The Pilgrimage of Henry James (1925) are among the earliest works to apply psychoanalytical principles to literary criticism; in the case of Twain, Brooks concluded that his native genius had been diminished by the pressures of the American socio-cultural context, which had forced James to opt for exile and a deforming over-refinement. Following a severe breakdown in 1925, his writing ceased to be adversely critical of the nineteenth-century traditions of American literature. His major work from the early 1930s onward was the descriptive survey of American writing in the numerous volumes of his Makers and Finders series; these include The Flowering of New England, 1815–1865 (1936; Pulitzer Prize), New England: Indian Summer, 1865–1915 (1940), The Times of Melville and Whitman (1947), and The Confident Years, 1885–1915 (1952). His antagonism to *Modernism, and to T. S. *Eliot in particular, is evident in On Literature Today (1941) and The Writer in America (1953). Among his many other publications are The Dreaming of Arcadia: American Writers and Artists in Italy, 1760–1915 (1958) and Fenollosa and His Circle (1962). His autobiographical writings were posthumously collected as An Autobiography (1965). James Hoopes's Van Wyck Brooks: In Search of American Culture appeared in 1977.

BROPHY, Brigid (Antonia Susan) (1929–95), British novelist, biographer, and critic, born in London, educated at St Hugh's College, Oxford. A classicist, atheist, and humanist, she campaigned tirelessly for animals' and authors' rights. In 1972 (with Maureen *Duffy, Lettice *Cooper, and Francis *King) she was a founder member of the Writers' Action Group which secured Public Lending Rights (1979); she also held offices at the Writers' Guild, the Society of Authors, and the Authors' Lending and Copyright Society, and was a president of the National Anti-Vivisection Society. Her first novel, Hackenfeller's Ape (1953), explores the relationship between an ape in London Zoo and a professor who observes its mating habits. Other novels include The King of a Rainy Country (1956); Flesh (1962); The Finishing Touch (1963), which features a headmistress based on Anthony Blunt; The Snow Ball (1964), a notable baroque comedy of manners that draws upon Mozart's opera Don Giovanni; and In Transit (1969), an experimental examination of gender and personality. Palace without Chairs (1978), a mature Shavian allegory about democracy, appeared a year before she was struck down by multiple sclerosis. Brophy's other works include The Crown Princess and Other Stories (1953); a play, The Burglar (perf. 1967); Mozart the Dramatist: A New View of Mozart, His Opera and His Age (1964); and Prancing Novelist: A Defence of Fiction in the Form of a Critical Biography in Praise of Ronald Firbank (1973), a lengthy defence of the author with whom her own work was also compared. Fifty Works of English Literature We Could Do Without (1967), co-authored by her husband Sir Michael Levey and Charles Osborne, proved controversial on its publication; Baroque 'n' Roll (1987), which features a courageous account of the disease that foreshortened her career, and Reads (1989) are among her collections of essays. Brophy was a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature; her writing was characterized by erudition, wit, and incisiveness.

BROSTER, D(orothy) K(athleen) (1878–1950), British novelist, born near Liverpool, educated at St Hilda's College, Oxford. During the First World War she was a volunteer at a hospital in France and subsequently became the secretary to a professor at Oxford. Her first novel, Chantemerle, appeared in 1911. She is best known for her compelling chronicle of the Jacobite Rebellion of 1745 in The Flight of the Heron (1925), The Gleam in the North (1927), and The Dark Mile (1929), which were collected as The Jacobite Trilogy in 1984; the books are highly regarded for the historical accuracy with which they present the Highland communities of the eighteenth century. Her other novels include Almond, Wild Almond (1933) and The Captain's Lady (1947).

Brother Man, the second of R. *Mais's three novels, published in 1954; it features the Kingston shanty town that was also the setting for Mais's earlier The Hills Were Joyful Together. The book's eponymous protagonist is a shoemaker and an adherent of the Rastafarian religious movement that began in Jamaica in the early 1930s, a response by a minority of the underprivileged black community to the hopelessness of their situation but for its first three decades seen as a threat by the majority. Brother Man—whose actual name is John Power—and his Christ-like progress is the focus of the story; with his growing reputation as healer and holy man he seems to embody the roles of both John the Baptist and Jesus for the urban proletariat among whom he lives. But the people of Orange Lane as a group express clearly the author's socio-political commitment. There are three central pairs of characters: Brother Man and Minette, a young woman who is physically attracted to him but whom he apparently thinks of only as a daughter; Girlie and Papacita, who passes counterfeit coins and whose moral degeneracy contrasts with Brother Man's spiritual purity; and the sisters Jesmina and the disturbed Cordelia, who represents a force for evil. Papacita desires Minette and vows to find a way to separate her from Brother Man. The discrediting of Brother Man begins when counterfeit coins are found planted in his house; eventually, general feelings of betrayal make people turn against him. Attacked by a mob, he is stoned unconscious. Three days later, in a symbolic resurrection, he regains consciousness, to learn that neighbours have been enquiring after him, and his faith in brotherhood appears to be confirmed. The structure of the novel is complex and original, likened by E. K. *Brathwaite to that of jazz, broken into five episodic chapters each introduced by a 'Chorus of People in the Lane' interpreting the action, establishing the mood, and preparing the reader for what is to happen. The language effectively alternates between Standard English and Jamaican patois, with biblical echoes in Brother Man's simple and direct expression.

BROUMAS, Olga (1949–), American poet, born in Syros, Greece, educated at the Universities of Pennsylvania and Oregon. Her collection Beginning with O (1977) won the Yale University Younger Poets Award and received praise from Stanley *Kunitz for its 'explicit sexuality and Sapphic orientation'. The poems in Sole Sauvage (1979) and Pastoral Jazz (1983) focus on images and language reflecting experience from a woman's viewpoint. Two translations of poetry by the Greek Nobel Laureate, Odysseas Elytis, What I Love (1986) and The Little Mariner (1988), illustrate the influence and recurring use of ancient Greek poetic forms in her poetry. In Perpetua (1989) the poems have a narrative structure, contemplating the poet's relationships with family, friends, and lovers. Broumas collaborated with Jane Miller in Black Holes, Black Stockings (1985), and with T. Begley in Sappho's Gymnasium (1994) which shows the influence of Sappho and Elytis. Broumas is intent on delineating a specifically lesbian language which encompasses the physical and emotional intensities of love and desire between women.

BROWN, Christy (1932–81), Irish novelist and poet, born in Dublin, the son of a bricklayer and one of twenty-three children. A victim of cerebral palsy, he was able to write only with the aid of his left foot, which he used to operate a specially adapted typewriter. My Left Foot (1954), an autobiography describing his fight to overcome his disability, was later made into an award-winning film; it was followed by an autobiographical novel, Down All the Days (1970), which is set, like much of his work, in Dublin. His second novel, A Shadow on Summer (1974), follows its protagonist, a crippled writer, Riley McCombe, to America, where he becomes involved with a beautiful photographer. Wild Grow the Lilies (1976) described the peregrinations around Dublin of an Irish journalist in search of a story. A Promising Career, a novel set in London and concerning a young couple caught up in the corrupt world of the recording industry, and Collected Poems, were published posthumously in 1982.

BROWN, E(dward) K(illoran) (1905–51), Canadian critic, born in Toronto, educated at the universities of Toronto and Paris; he subsequently taught in Toronto and at Cornell and Chicago Universities. Brown wrote on a wide range of subjects and authors, including Matthew Arnold and Willa *Cather, but his most important critical and editorial work was concerned with Canadian literature at a time when the subject was still in its infancy. His best-known book, On Canadian Poetry (1943), which incorporates some of his earlier influential essays, attempted to chart the struggle of the Canadian poet against what Brown saw as an essentially philistine society, and to identify the distinctive qualities of the Canadian literary tradition. He also wrote studies of the work of two of the 'Confederation Poets', Archibald Lampman and Duncan Campbell *Scott, whom he regarded as particularly important in the evolution of Canadian poetry.

BROWN, George Douglas (1869–1902), Scottish novelist, born in Ayrshire, the illegitimate son of a farmer, and brought up in difficult circumstances. He was educated at Glasgow University and Balliol College, Oxford. Moving to London to pursue a writing career, he began writing fiction for magazines and published pseudonymously a historical romance, Love and a Sword (1899). His single masterpiece, The House with the Green Shutters (1901), is set in the Lowlands town of Barbie, depicted as a nest of spite and petty intrigue. The central character is Gourlay, a trade magnate who has succeeded through canniness and 'brute force of character' in the carrying business. He is tyrannical in his dealings with his feckless wife, on whose dowry he built his business, and with his weak son and his self-effacing daughter; all are crushed by the monstrous strength of his domination. The 'passion of his life' is his house which he sees as a symbol of triumph over the village. Uncompromising in his rendering of cruelty and misery, Brown describes the rise and the fall of the House of Gourlay, its destruction from within and without, and the disgrace brought about by his son who, unable to meet his father's expectations, surrenders to drink. The novel was praised for its departure from the *'Kailyard' school of sentimental novels portraying Scottish provincial life. Among others, it was admired by F. R. *Leavis and J. B. *Priestley, and has influenced writers such as Lewis Grassic *Gibbon. Brown died of pneumonia leaving behind the drafts for two novels, The Novelist and The Incompatibles.

BROWN, George Mackay (1921–96), British poet and novelist, born in Stromness, Orkney, educated at Stromness Academy and Newbattle Abbey College, Dalkeith, where Edwin *Muir, warden of the college, encouraged him as a poet. He later gained an MA at the University of Edinburgh. Loaves and Fishes (1959), his first substantial collection of verse, was followed by numerous volumes, including The Year of the Whale (1965), Winterfold (1976), and The Wreck of the Archangel (1989). The landscapes, history, and communities of Orkney are imaginatively transposed in his verse and prose into the archives of 'Hamnavoe', as his native islands are known in his work. Fishermen with Ploughs (1971), a poetic sequence surveying developments from the time of the Vikings to the modern age, is his most concentrated historical treatment of the locality. At the centre of his work is a visionary sense of the sacrosanctity of ancient patterns of life and their interaction with unspoilt natural surroundings. Stylistically, his poetry is notable for the extreme refinement and clarity of its diction and rhythms, a characteristic apparent in forms ranging from highly disciplined free verse to robust ballad stanzas. Selected Poems 1954–1983 appeared in 1991. A Calendar of Love (1967) was the first of his several collections of short stories, which also include the highly acclaimed A Time To Keep (1969), The Sun's Net (1976), and Winter Tales (1996). His work in prose forms an extension of the narrative impulse which is often apparent in his poetry; many of his stories evoke an ideal of community in a richly fluent style of great strength and simplicity. Greenvoe (1972) is the best known of his novels, others being Magnus (1973), centring on the martyrdom of St Magnus, Vinland (1992), which richly evokes the Viking era, and Beside the Ocean of Time (1994). Among Brown's several collections of essays are Letters from Hamnavoe (1975) and Under Brinkie's Brae (1979), which contains selections from his journalism. His published work as a dramatist includes Three Plays (1984), which collects The Loom of Light, The Voyage of St Brandon, and The Well.

BROWN, Rita Mae (1944–), American novelist and poet born in Hanover, Pennsylvania, educated at the University of Florida, New York University, and the New York School of Visual Arts. Brown's works are deeply influenced by her commitment to the feminist and Gay Liberation movements. She is best known as the author of Rubyfruit Jungle, a sparklingly funny account of one woman's intellectual and sexual odyssey which, because of its erotic lesbian content, was rejected by several publishers before finally appearing in 1973. A Plain Brown Rapper (1976) sets out Brown's view of the women's movement in its first decade and reveals her abiding sympathy with women on the edge of society, including women of colour, lesbians, and working-class women. These sympathies inform her poetry, published in such politically charged volumes as The Hand that Cradles the Rock (1971), Songs to a Handsome Woman (1973), and Poems (1987). Novels like Six of One (1978) characteristically chronicle relationships between women. Southern Discomfort (1982), set in the context of a racially segregated community, tells of a love affair between a black adolescent and an older white woman. Sudden Death (1983) draws on Brown's own relationship with tennis champion Martina Navratilova to reveal the corrupt world of international tennis. Later novels include High Hearts (1986) a historical work, centred on the fortunes of a Southern woman fighting incognito with the Confederate army, and Bingo (1988).

BROWN, Sterling A(llen) (1901–89), African-American poet and critic, born in Washington, DC, educated at Williams College, Massachusetts and at Harvard. In 1929 he became Professor of English at Howard University. Regarded as one of the fathers of modern African-American literature, his contribution as writer, teacher, editor, and reviewer spanned half a century from the *Harlem Renaissance to the era of Black Power. His first book, Southern Road (1932), is a rich collection of folk 'portraitures'. Like Langston *Hughes, Brown drew on the traditional idioms of work song, ballad, spiritual, and blues, believing that to reinterpret and affirm black folk experience was 'one of the most important tasks for Negro poetry'. His commitment to this task informed a wide range of other literary and critical activities, including editorial work for the *Federal Writers' Project (1936–9), influential cultural surveys (The Negro in American Fiction and Negro Poetry and Drama, both 1937), and a landmark anthology, The Negro Caravan (1941). A further volume of his own poetry is The Last Ride of Wild Bill (1975); the early No Hiding Place, rejected by publishers in the 1930s on political grounds, finally appeared in Collected Poems (1980).

BROWN, Stewart (1951–), British poet and editor, born in Southampton, educated at Sussex University and University College, Aberystwyth. After teaching at schools and colleges in Britain, Jamaica, and Nigeria, he became a lecturer at the Centre for West African Studies in the University of Birmingham in 1988. Brown published numerous pamphlets before the appearance of Zinder (1986), his first substantial collection of poetry; the title poem, an incisive critique of post-colonial French North Africa, displays his characteristic ability to write from the intersection of personal experience and broad socio-cultural concerns. Lugard's Bridge (1989) frequently employs a fiercely sardonic wit in communicating his highly informed view of the shabby legacy of imperialism in Nigeria. The collection, which was widely acclaimed, also features disarmingly direct poems of familial affection and some radically experimental writing. Brown's extensive work as an editor includes the anthologies Caribbean Poetry Now (1984) and Writers from Africa (1989); The Art of Derek Walcott (1991), a collection of essays; and The Art of E. K. Brathwaite (1994).

Brown Girl, Brownstones, a novel by Paule *Marshall, published in 1959. This compassionate and richly layered novel relates the story of Selina Boyce, the daughter of Barbadian immigrants, and through her perspective, the story of her parents, Silla and Deighton. A gallery of minor portraits provides a panoramic view of black life in Brooklyn. Brought up by her hard-working, austere, and resilient mother, Selina yearns for freedom, always aware of its negative aspects as embodied by her feckless, doomed father. Her love for her mother is underwritten by the double legacy of guilt and sacrifice she must bear, and the Caribbean roots she longs to recover. The novel works on several levels: as a feminist bildungsroman; as a study of the Caribbean immigrant experience in the context of the wider black American community; and as a loving tribute to the strength, resilience, and humour of Caribbean women.

Browning Version, The, a one-act play by Terence *Rattigan, first performed in 1948. It involves Arthur Crocker-Harris, once a brilliant classical scholar, now 'the Himmler of the Lower Fifth', a schoolmaster said to be 'shrivelled up inside like a nut'. He is forced to leave the school where he has long taught, denied a pension, and even asked to cede pride of place at Prize Day to a younger, more popular man. When a pupil gives him Robert Browning's version of Aeschylus's Agamemnon, he uncharacteristically breaks down, only to be told by his bitter and vindictive wife that the boy's present is self-serving. Her lover, another master, is horrified by the cruelty and injustice of this, and confesses the affair to Crocker-Harris, who replies that he has known about it all along. At the end he finds the strength to confront his humiliation and pain, and announces that he will exercise the privilege his seniority gives him at Prize Day. The play is generally felt to be one of Rattigan's most successful studies of loneliness and emotional failure.

BROWNJOHN, Alan (Charles) (1931–), British poet, born in Catford, South London, educated at Merton College, Oxford. After working as a schoolteacher from 1957 to 1965, he was a senior lecturer at Battersea College of Education until 1979, when he became a freelance writer. He was chairman of the Poetry Society from 1982 to 1988. He is one of the foremost poets to have been associated with the *Group. His first substantial publication as a poet was The Railings (1961); succeeding volumes have included Sandgrains on a Tray (1969), A Song of Good Life (1975), A Night in the Gazebo (1980), Collected Poems 1952–1986 (1988), The Observation Car (1990), and In the Cruel Arcade (1994). On the cover-notes to The Railings, Brownjohn identified the principal concerns of his poetry as 'love, politics, culture, time', themes which have remained central throughout his work. The socialist beliefs informing much of his verse are inseparable from the individuality and humanity with which he conducts his investigations of the quality of life. Contemplative, documentary, and satirical modes are characteristic of his writing, which is noted for its technical scrupulousness, intelligence, and understated wit. The best-known of his numerous books for children is Brownjohn's Beasts (1970). His first novel, The Way You Tell Them, subtitled 'a yarn of the nineties', appeared in 1990. Among his other publications is a version of Goethe's Torquato Tasso (1985) and the critical study Philip Larkin (1975).

BRUNNER, John (Kilian) (1934–), British *science fiction writer, born in Oxfordshire. From Galactic Storm (1952) onward he was a prolific producer of *space operas, among the best of which are The Atlantic Abomination (1960), The Day of the Star Cities (1965), and The Long Result (1965). At the same time, novels such as The Brink (1959), The Whole Man (1964), and Squares of the City (1965) were more ambitious. Four subsequent novels remain his main accomplishment: Stand on Zanzibar (1968) dealt with overpopulation in the near future; The Jagged Orbit (1969) encompassed racial politics; The Sheep Look Up (1972) focused on pollution; and The Shockwave Rider (1975) addressed the information revolution. Varyingly experimental in form, argumentative, and urgent, these four dystopias utilized science fiction conventions to address current dilemmas. Later work includes The Great Steamboat Race (1983), which affectionately recreated life on the Mississippi.

BRUTUS, Dennis (1924–), South African poet, teacher, and political activist, born in Salisbury, Rhodesia, educated at Fort Hare University College, and the University of Witwatersrand, where his studies were cut short by arrest in 1963 for activities against racialism in South African sport. He was frequently in prison or under house arrest for the next few years and finally left South Africa in 1966. He has served as Director of the World Campaign for the Release of South African prisoners, and President of the South African Non-Racial Open Competition for Olympic Sports, in which capacity he was largely responsible for the exclusion of South Africa from the Olympic Games. His first collection, Sirens, Knuckles, Boots (1963), published in Nigeria, when Brutus was in prison, is charged with erotic tension and political protest. Brutus characterizes himself as a quixotic troubadour in perhaps his best-known poem, an untitled Petrarcan sonnet, the emphasis being on his sense of danger, both personal and political. Letters to Martha (1968) is addressed to his sister-in-law, and so titled because as a banned writer in South Africa his poems could only be published as 'letters' from prison. Brutus's visits to Algeria and China resulted in Poems from Algiers and China Poems, both published in 1970. A Simple Lust (1973) collects poems from previous volumes, and others previously unpublished. Later collections include Strains (1975) and Stubborn Hope (1978).

BRYDEN, Bill (William Campbell Rough) (1942–), British playwright and director, born in Greenock, Renfrewshire, where he was educated at the High School; he worked with Scottish Television before becoming assistant director at the Belgrade Theatre, Coventry, in 1965. After periods at the Royal Court Theatre, London, and the Lyceum Theatre, Edinburgh, he joined the Royal National Theatre as associate director in 1975. From 1984 to 1993 he was Head of Drama for BBC Scotland. Bryden's best-known plays are Willie Rough (1972), a dramatization of the political fervour on Clydeside during the First World War, and Benny Lynch: Scenes from a Short Life (1974), which deals with the career of the Scottish World Flyweight Boxing Champion. His other plays include Old Movies (1976), and Civilians (1980). His screenplay for The Long Riders (1980) was acclaimed for bringing new vitality to the *Western idiom. Ill Fares the Land (1982) and The Holy City (1985) are among the films he has written and directed.

BRYHER, pseudonym of Annie Winifred ELLERMAN (1894–1983), British novelist and philanthropist; born in Kent, she grew up in London. She was patron of many *Modernist writers, including Dorothy *Richardson, Djuna *Barnes, Edith *Sitwell, and Hilda *Doolittle (H.D) with whom she had a close relationship from 1918. In 1921, Bryher, a lesbian, entered a marriage of convenience with Robert *McAlmon and funded his Contact Editions. Two autobiographical novels, Development (1920) and Two Selves (1923), explore her artistic development and sexual identity. In 1927 she divorced McAlmon and married Kenneth Macpherson, with whom she founded Close Up (1927–33), the 'first journal of film criticism as art'; contributors included H.D., Gertrude *Stein, and Dorothy Richardson. She is best known for her historical novels, which include The Fourteenth of October (1952), The Players' Boy (1953), and The Coin of Carthage (1963). Other books include Amy Lowell: A Critical Appreciation (1918), Film Problems of Soviet Russia (1929), and Beowulf (1956), as well as memoirs, two volumes of poetry, and travel writings.

BUCHAN, John, 1st Baron Tweedsmuir (1875–1940), Scottish writer, diplomat, and politician, born in Perth, the eldest son of a minister in the Free Church of Scotland; he was educated at Glasgow University and Brasenose College, Oxford, where he was President of the Union, took a first in Greats, won the Stanhope history and the Newdigate poetry prizes, published a novel (Sir Quixote of the Moors, 1895) and a volume of essays (Scholar Gypsy, 1896), and contributed to The Yellow Book. Later he read for the Bar, and from 1901 to 1903 was in South Africa on the staff of Lord Milner, the High Commissioner. On his return he began a long association with Nelson's, the Scottish publishers, was a lieutenant-colonel in the Intelligence Corps during the First World War, and then Director of Intelligence in Beaverbrook's new Ministry of Information. He sat in the House of Commons as Member for the Scottish Universities during the 1920s, and was Governor-General of Canada (1935–40). His works are voluminous: the non-fiction includes lives of Montrose (1913, revised 1928), Scott (1932), Cromwell (1934), and Augustus (1937), and a four-volume history of the First World War. He is best remembered, however, for his adventure stories, which he termed 'shockers', most of which feature a recurring group of interconnected heroes (Richard Hannay, Sandy Arbuthnot, Peter Pienaar, Edward Leithen, etc.); the first, which introduces Hannay, is The Thirty-Nine Steps (1915; filmed by Alfred Hitchcock, 1935), written while convalescing at Broadstairs. Others include Prester John (1910; US title The Great Diamond Pipe), Greenmantle (1916), The Three Hostages (1924), John Macnab (1925), and Sick Heart River (1941; US title Mountain Meadow). Buchan himself, however, preferred his historical novels: they include The Path of the King (1921), Midwinter (1923), and The Blanket of the Dark (1931); Witch Wood (1927), set in his native Tweeddale in the seventeenth century, is probably the best. There is an autobiography, Memory Hold-the-Door (1940; US title Pilgrim's War: An Essay in Recollection) and a life by Janet Adam Smith (1965). See D. Daniell, The Interpreter's House: A Critical Assessment of John Buchan (1975).

BUCK, Pearl S(ydenstricker) (1892–1973), American novelist, born in West Virginia. She lived in China until her early middle age which gave her a unique, double perspective which was reflected in her most famous works of fiction. Her first novel, East Wind: West Wind (1930), was followed by The Good Earth (1931; Pulitzer Prize), the first volume of the saga of a Chinese family, written in the poetic rhythms and lyrical prose of the Bible; Sons (1932) and A House Divided (1935) completed the trilogy. The Mother (1934) and Dragon Seed (1942) are considered to be the works for which she will be remembered. Buck was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1938. Much of her most passionate work, including Imperial Woman (1954; a study in fiction of the Empress Tzu Hsi), Letter from Peking (1957), and The Three Daughters of Madame Lian (1969), continued to be set in China but for the vast majority of her readers her message was universal. Buck successfully employed an American setting in such popular classics as Portrait of a Marriage (1945), Voices in the House (1953), The Time is Noon (1967; a deeply autobiographical work), and The Goddess Abides (1972). Buck was famous for her humanitarian commitment to improved East–West relations and the cause of children of mixed race and war orphans.

BUCKLER, Ernest (1908–84), Canadian novelist, born in Dalhousie West, Nova Scotia, educated at Dalhousie University and the University of Toronto. His most famous work is his best-selling first novel, The Mountain and the Valley (1952), a seminal contribution to the literature of Maritime Canada. Told mainly in flashback, it is a Kunstlerroman which focuses on the figure of an unfulfilled artist and his romantic desire for a life beyond the farming community in which he grows up. Ox Bells and Fireflies (1968) is an imaginative memoir of Buckler's childhood, which celebrates a bygone rural era in a finely wrought style that links physical experiences and subjective speculation very effectively. Buckler also published a second novel, The Cruelest Month (1963); The Rebellion of Young David (1975), a collection of short stories; and Whirligig (1977), a book of humorous essays and poems.

BUCKLEY, Vincent (1925–89), Australian poet and critic, born in Romsey, Victoria, educated at Melbourne and Cambridge Universities. He is a poet and critic of considerable influence in Australia, not least in his strong sense of Irish ancestry and his involvement with the Catholic Church in Australia. Buckley's poetry engages an impressive range of concerns, from love to politics, horse-racing to history. Both of his first volumes, The World's Flesh (1954) and Masters in Israel (1961), explored the varying manifestations of love, human and divine, and the human embodiment of their relations; other collections are Arcady and Other Places (1966), The Golden Builders and Other Poems (1976), Late Winter Child (1979), and Selected Poems (1981). As a critic Buckley was instrumental in broadening the canon to include less 'traditional' Australian concerns: important collections are Essays in Poetry: Mainly Australian (1957), Poetry and Morality (1959), and Poetry and the Sacred (1968). The autobiography Cutting Green Hay: Friendships, Movements and Cultural Conflicts in Australia's Great Decades (1983) traced cultural post-war movements in Australia and Buckley's friendship with writers such as A. C. *Hope and James *McAuley. Memory Ireland: Insights into the Contemporary Irish Condition (1985) bore powerful witness to Buckley's increasing identification with the past and present of the country where he spent much time in later years, both in person and in the imagination. Posthumously published were Last Poems (1991) and The Faber Book of Modern Australian Verse (1991), with a thirty-page preface surveying Australian poetry from 1920 to 1980.

BUKOWSKI, (Henry) Charles (1920–94), American poet, novelist, and short-story writer, born in Andernach, Germany, to a German mother and an American soldier; he was brought to Los Angeles as a small child. After attending Los Angeles City College he worked intermittently at a variety of unskilled jobs, most durably as a postman. He published stories in the mid-1940s, but his authentic writing career stemmed from a decade later when his poems, vigorously anti-academic and carrying an air of exclusion and embattlement, began appearing in *little magazines throughout the USA. Though clearly sharing certain concerns with the contemporaneous *Beat movement, his individualist ethos precluded formative contacts even with such loose literary groupings. Jon Edgar Webb's eclectic magazine The Outsider championed Bukowski's writing. His early chapbooks were followed by the full-length collections It Catches My Heart in Its Hands (1963) and Crucifix in a Deathhand (1965). Since becoming a full-time author in 1970, Bukowski's prolific output achieved an international readership. Among the most admired of his numerous volumes are The Days Run Away like Wild Horses over the Hills (1969); Notes of a Dirty Old Man (1973), a selection of his often scabrously funny underground newspaper columns; and Burning in Water, Drowning in Flame (1974), selected poems. Notable among his novels are Post Office (1971) and Ham on Rye (1982), the latter depicting his unruly adolescence during the Depression and thus a late addition to the Beat canon of revolt against Middle American values. Echoing Whitman, Bukowski's persona was disorderly, fleshy, and sensual, the predominant use of a first-person narrator seeking to create an impression of autobiographical immediacy and conversational spontaneity. His declared aim was to 'humanize' poetry, lowering the rhetorical tone by structurally simple language flavoured with slang and swear words, asides to the reader, and other humorous interjections. In his later years Bukowski's verse increasingly favoured the narrative mode, usually employing short lines replete with hardbitten or wisecracking dialogue. Stories and poems in Septuagenarian Stew (1990) reflect his characteristic subject matters: painful relations with women and a brutal father; survival as a bum and self-taught writer in low-rent Los Angeles; gambling, sex, and drink; contemplation of death and ageing; defiant insistence on freedom and continued creation. At the time of his death Bukowski was the most widely read contemporary American author in translation. His final books were The Last Night of the Earth Poems (1992), Run with the Hunted: A Charles Bukowski Reader (1993), and Screams from the Balcony: Selected Letters (1993). Pulp, a spoof detective novel, appeared posthumously in 1994. Hank: The Life of Charles Bukowski, by Neeli Cherkovski, appeared in 1991; Against the American Dream: Essays on Charles Bukowski, by Russell Harrison, was published in 1994.

Bulletin, an Australian journal, founded in 1880 by J. F. Archibald and John Haynes. In 1961 it was sold to Consolidated Press and became more of a newspaper, although literature was reintroduced in a quarterly supplement in 1980, edited by Geoffrey Dutton. In its early stages the Bulletin contained a mixture of humour, illustrations, cartoons, political comment, and sports news. The new element in Bulletin was the invitation for the readership to contribute. As a result material from a bush readership began to appear; underlying the humour, which was a dominant note in the early years, was a sense of the grimness of bush life, accompanied by a radical hostility to harshness and repression in the social system. Paradoxically, a separate Red Page was created as a forum for writers, and over a period of seventy years the journal published works from the most famous in Australian letters. The editorial requirement of 'brevity, originality, realism and dramatic force' elicited the greatest of Australian short stories, and it was in the pages of the Bulletin that Australian literature's first major argument, between the realism of Henry *Lawson and the romanticism of Banjo *Paterson, was rehearsed in detail.

BULLINS, Ed (1935–), American playwright, born in Philadelphia, educated at Los Angeles City College and San Francisco State College. He was associate director of New Lafayette Theatre, New York (1967–73), editor of Black Theatre magazine (1969–74), and became producing director of Surviving Theatre, New York, from 1974. His plays are explorations of the constraints of ghetto life, and strategies of liberation, among African-Americans. One of his best plays, The Duplex: A Love Fable in Four Movements (prod. New York, 1970, pub. 1971), focuses on a young man, Steven Benson, who struggles to forge his own identity and liberate his energies, though threatened by the temptations of sexual and alcoholic oblivion. The Wine Time (prod. New York, 1968, pub. 1969) is the first of a projected twenty-play cycle about African-Americans entitled 20th. Century Cycle. Omnibus editions of his many plays include Five Plays (1969), Four Dynamite Plays (1971), and The Theme is Blackness (1973). The latter contains the title play (prod. San Francisco, 1966); Dialect Determinism (prod. San Francisco, 1965), which argues against dogmatic militancy; and a few others, including very short but highly ingenious 'black revolutionary' commercials. Other books include The Hungered One (1971; short stories), To Raise the Dead and Foretell the Future (1971; verse), and The Reluctant Rapist (1973; a novel). Bullins was awarded the New York Drama Critics Circle award in 1975 and 1977.

BULLOCK, Alan (Louis Charles) (1914–), British historian, born in Bradford, educated at Wadham College, Oxford. He began his academic career at Oxford as a fellow of New College in 1945. He was instrumental in the formation of St Catherine's College, of which he became Founding Master in 1960. From 1967 to 1973 he was Vice-Chancellor of Oxford University. Hitler: A Study in Tyranny (1952) gained him an international reputation and has remained highly valued as an account of Hitler's career. The first two volumes of his The Life and Times of Ernest Bevin appeared in 1960 and 1967 respectively; to complete the third, Ernest Bevin, Foreign Secretary (1983), Bullock was obliged to wait until restrictions on the availability of many critical documents were removed. The work is regarded as a major contribution to twentieth-century British and international political history. Notable among his other publications are The Humanist Tradition in the West (1985) and Hitler and Stalin: Parallel Lives (1991). He was created Baron Bullock in 1976.

BULLOCK, Shan (1865–1935), Northern Irish novelist, born in Crom, Co. Fermanagh, educated at Farra School, Co. Westmeath; he was the son of a prosperous Protestant farmer and a bailiff to a large Fermanagh estate. He grew up with first-hand experience of the effects of economic and sectarian division in rural Ulster, an experience he reflected in most of his novels, including By Thrasna River: The Story of a Townland (1895), The Squireen (1903), and The Loughsiders (1924). After leaving school, Bullock went to London and spent the rest of his life working for the civil service. He recorded aspects of what he saw as a numbing and emasculating existence in his novel Robert Thorne: The Story of a London Clerk (1907). Bullock's novels are conspicuously autobiographical, and just as Robert Thorne longs to return to Ulster, his creator consistently wrote about the land and the farmers of his native Fermanagh. An exception is Thomas Andrews, Shipbuilder (1912), his novel concerning the building of the Titanic in the Belfast shipyards. Benedict *Kiely has noted that Bullock was the last Irish writer to witness a rural community whose life revolved around 'the Big House', a privilege which Bullock exploits valuably in his autobiography, After Sixty Years (1931).

BUNTING, Basil (1900–85), British poet, born at Scotswood, Northumberland, educated at Quaker schools in Yorkshire and Berkshire and at the London School of Economics. He became Ford Madox Ford's assistant on the Transatlantic Review in Paris in 1923 and was subsequently a journalist in London. In 1929 he joined Ezra *Pound, whom he had known in Paris, at Rapollo in Italy, remaining there until 1933. Bunting's first volume of poetry, Redimiculum Matte-larum, was published in Milan in 1930. W. B. *Yeats referred to him as one of Pound's 'more savage disciples'; the compression of language, sense of the autonomy of poetic form, and the allusive habits of his verse indicate the debt to Pound he acknowledges in his introduction to his Collected Poems (1968; revised 1978 and 1990). After interludes in the Canary Islands and Britain, during the Second World War he was an interpreter with the RAF in Persia, where he remained as vice-consul at Isfahan until 1952. The Spoils (1965) reflects his wartime experiences. His interest in Persian literature led him to incorporate elements from the Persian epic Shah-nama (lit. 'Book of Kings') into the central section of Briggflatts* (1966), the poem which made him well-known in Britain. Poems (1950) had been well received in the USA; on his return to Britain in 1952 he was, however, effectively unheard of and worked until 1966 on Newcastle's Evening Chronicle. Tom *Pickard stimulated British interest in Bunting's work, arranging for publication of The Spoils in 1965; Loquitur (1965), a collection of early poems, and First Book of Odes (1966) followed, preparing for the rapid establishment of his considerable reputation with Briggflatts and Collected Poems. Donald *Davie's Under Briggflatts (1989) argues for Bunting's central importance to British poetry of the previous thirty years as a master of the modernist idiom who remained rooted in the cultural and syntactical traditions of English verse. His other works include Version of Horace (1972) and Uncollected Poems (edited by Richard Caddell, 1991). See OBJECTIVIST POETRY.

BURCHFIELD, Robert (William) (1923–), New Zealand lexicographer, born in Wanganui, near Wellington, New Zealand, educated at Victoria University College, Wellington, and at Magdalen College, Oxford. After lecturing at Magdalen and Christ Church Colleges, he was appointed to the editorship of the new Supplement to the Oxford English Dictionary in 1957. From 1971 to 1984 he was the Chief Editor of Oxford English Dictionaries. The four volumes of the Supplement appeared in 1972, 1976, 1982, and 1986. He subsequently devoted himself to his work as senior research fellow at St Peter's College. His other works as a lexicographer, grammarian, and philologist include The Spoken Language as an Art Form (1981), The English Language (1985), and Studies in Lexicography (1987). Although he considers English to be 'at an uneasy stage of its development', he retains a fundamentally optimistic view of the language's capacity to retain its richness and flexibility throughout increasingly rapid processes of expansion and change. Unlocking the English Language (1989) contains his T. S. Eliot Memorial Lectures delivered in 1988, together with eight additional essays. Points of View: Aspects of Present Day English (1992) discusses varieties of contemporary spoken English.

BURGESS, Anthony, pseudonym of John Anthony Burgess WILSON (1917–93), British novelist, composer, and critic, born in Manchester into a Catholic family, educated at the University of Manchester. An accomplished musician, Burgess maintained his interest in music throughout his varied career, composing orchestral works as well as those in more popular forms, including a musical version of Joyce's Ulysses* (Blooms of Dublin, performed in 1982). After serving with the Royal Army Medical Corps in the Second World War, he was a teacher for some years. During 1954–60 he served in the Colonial Service as an education officer in Malaya and Borneo, an experience in the Far East which formed the background for his first three published novels, Time for a Tiger (1956), The Enemy in the Blanket (1958), and Beds in the East (1959), published together as The Malayan Trilogy (1964). After a mistaken medical diagnosis, giving him only one year to live, he wrote five novels in quick succession, including The Right to an Answer (1960), The Doctor is Sick (1960), The Worm and the Ring (1961), and Devil of a State (1961), in order to provide an estate for his wife. His best-known novel, *A Clockwork Orange (1962; filmed by Stanley Kubrick, 1971), demonstrated his linguistic virtuosity in its dystopian vision of an authoritarian near-future Britain. It was followed by many others, displaying a variety of different fictional modes, including The Wanting Seed (1962), a work of *science fiction; Honey for the Bears (1963), a satire about the Cold War; Nothing like the Sun (1964), a speculation on the identity of Shakespeare's Dark Lady; Tremor of Intent (1966), an elaborate thriller; MF (1971), about a young man's pilgrimage to the shrine of a celebrated poet; The Napoleon Symphony (1974), about Beethoven; and ABBA ABBA (1977), about the last days of John Keats. Later novels include Earthly Powers* (1980), The Kingdom of the Wicked (1985), dealing with the early years of Christianity, and Any Old Iron (1989), about a twentieth-century quest for King Arthur's sword Excalibur. Burgess's last novel, A Dead Man in Deptford (1993), a rich evocation of Elizabethan London centring on the life and times of Christopher Marlowe, was considered by some critics to be his best. Among his most popular works are his comic novels tracing the adventures of the irascible middle-aged poet Mr Enderby, including Inside Mr Enderby (1963), Enderby Outside (1968), The Clockwork Testament (1974), and Enderby's Dark Lady (1984), which show the influence of James *Joyce and are considered by his peer, Gore *Vidal, to be even finer than the comedies of *Waugh. His critical works include studies of Shakespeare (1970), Joyce (Here Comes Everybody, 1965; Joysprick, 1973), D. H. *Lawrence (1985), and Mozart and the Wolf Gang (1991), an irreverent portrait of Mozart. He also published collections of essays, including Urgent Copy (1968), which contains writings on Waugh, *Shaw, Joyce, *Beckett, and *Greene; Homage to QWERTYUIOP (1986), a collection of his reviews; Ninety-Nine Novels (1984), a study of post-war fiction in Britain; an autobiography published in two parts as Little Wilson and Big God (1987) and You've Had Your Time (1990); an authoritative, idiosyncratic treatment of the nature of language, A Mouthful of Air (1992); and the posthumously published novel in verse, Byrne (1995). A prodigious intellect and polymath, with a cosmopolitan grasp of culture, Burgess contributed much to the world of letters.

BURKE, Kenneth (Duva) (1897–93), American critic, born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, educated at Ohio State and Columbia Universities. Having established a reputation with his exotic short stories in The White Oxen (1924), during the late 1920s he gained wide notice for the critical articles containing his innovative theories of literary form which appeared in the Dial* and elsewhere. He subsequently held numerous posts as a lecturer, notably at Bennington College, where he taught literary theory from 1943 to 1961. Counter-Statement (1931) and Permanence and Change: An Anatomy of Purpose (1935) won acclaim for the remarkable scope of his philosophical explications of the socio-cultural significance of artistic creation. Attitudes towards History (two volumes, 1937), an ambitious psychological and ethical evaluation of historical developments, was followed by The Philosophy of Literary Form (1941), A Grammar of Motives (1945), and A Rhetoric of Motives (1950); in these works Burke's proposition that 'man is a symbol-using animal' forms a basis for linguistic, philosophical, and psychological analyses of the interactions between literature, language, belief, and action. His later publications include The Rhetoric of Religion (1961), the collected essays of Language as Symbolic Form (1966), Dramatism and Development (1972), and On Symbols and Society (edited by J. R. Gusfield, 1989), a selection from Burke's more sociologically oriented writings. Collected Poems (1968) includes many of Burke's 'flowerishes', provocatively aphoristic pieces presented in extravagantly inventive calligraphic forms. In his poetry the energetic idiosyncrasy characterizing his other works is unbridled. Among his other books are Towards a Better Life (1932), a 'series of declamations or epistles' in fictional forms, and the collected short stories of The Complete White Oxen (1968).

BURNS, Alan (1929–), British novelist, born in London. He trained as a barrister before turning to writing, and later taught creative writing at the University of Minnesota. His works are experimental in form and bleak in outlook, depicting a sterile society on the brink of chaos. His first novel, Europe after the Rain (1965), whose title is taken from Max Ernst, exhibits a dual fascination with European *Modernism and American culture. It was followed by Celebrations (1965); Babel (1970), whose aphoristic nature reflects the fragmentation of the world which is being described; Dreamerika! (1972); The Day Daddy Died (1981); and Revolutions of the Night (1986), whose title is also taken from Ernst. Burns was a friend of the writers B. S. *Johnson and Ann *Quin and, although all three would have disclaimed being part of a literary movement, there are similarities of theme and preoccupation in their work.

BURNS, John Horne (1916–53), American novelist, born in Andover, Massachusetts, educated at Harvard. Burns's reputation has grown considerably since his death at the age of 36 and his first novel, The Gallery (1947), is now recognized as one of the great American novels of the Second World War. After service in military intelligence in the US Army in North Africa and Italy, Burns returned to the USA but subsequently took up residence in Italy. The Gallery reconstructs life around the Galleria Umberto in Allied occupied Naples at the end of the war through a series of what Burns calls 'portraits'. The novel is episodic and fragmentary in a manner that echoes that of John *Dos Passos, but the confrontation between American and Italian experience, both cultural and moral, evinces striking affinities with the treatment of the 'international theme' in the fiction of Henry *James. His later novels are Lucifer with a Book (1949), a largely satirical account of an American private school, and A Cry of Children (1952), a love story.

BURROUGHS, Edgar Rice (1875–1950), American writer of romantic *science fiction and *fantasy adventure novels, born in Chicago, educated at Phillips Academy, Andover and Michigan Military Academy. He is best known for his tales of Tarzan, who appeared in twenty-one novels from Tarzan of the Apes (1914) to Tarzan and the Madman (1964). The figure of Tarzan became familiar through film, radio, comic-book, and television incarnations. Several of Burroughs's science fiction novels are set on Mars and Venus, and include A Princess of Mars (1917) and its sequels. His rich imagination influenced later writers such as R. *Bradbury and M. *Moorcock.

BURROUGHS, William S(eward) (1914–), American novelist, born in St Louis, educated at Harvard. Burroughs served as the basis for the character of Old Bull in Kerouac's On The Road.* Despite having close relations with the Columbia circle who formed the early core of the *Beat Generation, he later disclaimed any real affinity with this aesthetic movement, seeing his work as standing in a more 'European' line of experimentalism. He presents a life of aimless drifting, working as a journalist, private detective, and bartender from 1936 to 1944, when he became addicted to morphine. He moved to Mexico City in 1949, and in 1951 tragically shot his wife in a shooting accident, a matter dealt with indirectly in Queer (1986), a homosexual romance written just after the events in Mexico City. Several years of travel in South America and Morocco followed, where his first novel, Junkie (1953), was completed under the pseudonym of William Lee. In a painfully realistic portrayal of the life of an addict, Junkie tells the story of drug addicts' involvement with the underworld. It was in this work that Burroughs made the notorious statement that addiction was 'a biological need like water' and then proceeded to analyse the whole of human society from the perspective of this insight. The themes of addiction and totalitarianism continued to dominate his work even after his own withdrawal from heroin addiction in the late 1950s. From the masses of notes written whilst living in Tangier in 1953–8 came the notorious *The Naked Lunch (1959). Several other novels derive from the Tangier notes, all of which explore the techniques of The Naked Lunch, by introducing the 'cut-up' and 'fold-in' methods of collage writing. The Naked Lunch, The Soft Machine (1961), whose writing refers to the human brain, The Ticket that Exploded (1962), and Nova Express (1964) form a tetralogy which explores the activities of the Nova Mob in a science fiction world in which the addictions are found to be the work of the Mob. Other works produced at this time include The Exterminator (1960); Minutes To Go: Poems (1960, written with Sinclair Beiles and Gregory *Corso); Dead Fingers Talk (1963), a compilation of previous novels; and The Yage Letters (1963), with Allen *Ginsberg. The 1970s saw the publication of Speed (1970); The Wild Boys: A Book of the Dead (1971), about a group of homosexual hashish smokers who travel through time and space beyond social control; and Port of Saints (1973). There was a later resurgence in his writing, with the trilogy Cities of the Red Night (1981), in which characters from The Wild Boys return; The Place of Dead Roads (1983), set in the 1890s and featuring Will Seward Hall, an author of Westerns; and The Western Lands (1985). In 1990 he recorded his first record and published Ghost of a Chance, a novella in the territory of Cities of the Red Night. My Education: A Book of Dreams (1995) pays homage to Burroughs' Mentor Brion Gysin and others. The Letters of William S. Burroughs 1945–1959, edited by Oliver Harris, appeared in 1993. A biography, Literary Outlaw: The Life and Times of William S. Burroughs (1988), was written by Ted Morgan. The best critical introduction to his work remains William Burroughs: The Algebra of Need (1970) by Eric Mottram. Maintaining a huge cult following, Burroughs has exercised a considerable influence as an avant-garde theorist and forerunner of counter-cultures in rock music, film, and writing.

BURTON, Miles, see RHODE, JOHN.

BUTLER, (Frederick) Guy (1918–), South African poet and playwright, born in Cradock, Cape Province, educated at Rhodes University and Brasenose College, Oxford. He was Professor of English at Rhodes University, Grahamstown (1950–78). Versatile in technique, and just as open to African as to European influences, Butler is equally proficient in lyric, meditative, and narrative modes of poetry. His powerfully moving elegy 'In Memoriam, J. A. R., Drowned, East London' has much in common with traditional African dirges. Volumes of poetry include Stranger to Europe (1952; enlarged edition 1960), South of the Zambezi (1966), On First Seeing Florence (1968), Selected Poems (1972), and Songs and Ballads (1978). Plays include Take Root and Die (1970), which was produced in Grahamstown in 1966, and Cape Charade (1968). Butler has also written two volumes of autobiography, Karoo Morning (1978) and Bursting World (1983). Together with Christopher Mann, he also edited A New Book of South African Verse in English (1979).

BUTLER, Marilyn (Speers) (1937–), British scholar and critic, born in Kingston-upon-Thames, London, educated at St Hilda's College, Oxford. In 1986 she became King Edward VII Professor of English Literature at Cambridge University. Her reputation as a specialist in the literature of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries was established with Maria Edgeworth (1972), the fullest available biography of that author; Jane Austen and the War of Ideas (1975), Peacock Displayed (1979), and Romantics, Rebels, and Reactionaries (1981) are notable for their detailed examination of the social, cultural, and political climates of the period. Throughout much of the 1980s she was occupied with Janet Todd in editing the seven volumes of The Works of Mary Wollstonecraft (1989); Butler's other works of editorship include Burke, Paine, Godwin, and the Revolution Controversy (1984), an anthology of political writings, and a new edition of Mary Shelley's Frankenstein (1994), based on the original 1818 text.

BUTLER, Octavia (1947–), American *science fiction writer, born in Los Angeles, educated at Pasadena City College and California State University at Los Angeles. She received Hugo Awards for her short story 'Speech Sounds' and her novelette 'Bloodchild' in 1984 and 1985. Butler's novels incorporate African mythology, urban realism, and spiritual exegeses into tales of aliens, genetic mutation, and telepathy. Her heroes are strong and intelligent African and African-American females and her characters frequently strive to break away from the hierarchical restrictions of their lives towards a better world of intelligence and tolerance. Among her novels are the 'Patternist' series, including Patternmaster (1976), Mind of My Mind (1977), and Wild Seed (1980), which concern a community of telepaths and the roles played by genetics, gender, and race in the sustainment of this system; the 'Xenogenesis' series, including Dawn (1987), Adulthood Rites (1988), and Imago (1989), which details the consequences of cross-breeding between an alien race and the few human beings left alive following a nuclear holocaust; and Parable of the Sower (1993), which presents a twenty-first century world in the midst of disintegration, and a young African-American woman's search for a place where she and a community of believers might create a new society. See UTOPIA AND ANTI-UTOPIA.

BUTLER, Robert Olen (1945–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Granite City, Illinois, educated at Northwestern University and the University of Iowa. Butler spent 1971 in Vietnam as a Vietnamese linguist while working for the US army military intelligence. His first novel, The Alleys of Eden (1981), introduced his three main themes of sexual obsession, cultural displacement, and the problematic legacy of Vietnam, the latter being a touchstone for many of his subsequent books. A Good Scent from a Strange Mountain (1992; Pulitzer Prize, 1993) is an interconnected series of stories concentrating on the attempt by Southern Vietnamese expatriates to integrate themselves into American culture; exquisitely written and moving, the book adds a vital and usually ignored dimension to American Vietnam fiction. Although the relative paucity of references to North Vietnam is noticeable, it is evident that Butler was uniquely qualified to look beyond the boundaries of his own culture. In its concentration on the details of sexual obsession, They Whisper (1994) expands on the ground covered by his first novel and offers a prose style even more intimate with the fevered imaginings implicit in its choice of subject matter. Butler became a professor at McNeese State University in Louisiana.

BUTLER, Samuel (1835–1902), British novelist, satirist, and speculative writer, born at Langar, Nottinghamshire, educated at St John's College, Cambridge. Renouncing the ecclesiastical traditions of his family, he went to New Zealand in 1859. His letters to his parents, which provide a vivid record of life on a sheep-station, were published by his father in 1863 as A First Year in Canterbury Settlement. His articles for the New Zealand press included 'Darwin among the Machines', out of which Erewhon (1872) later developed. Having returned to Britain in 1864, he settled in London and devoted himself to painting; however, discouraged by lack of success, he renewed his activity as a writer. The Fair Haven (1873), a drily ironic review of rationalist objections to the miraculous elements in Christianity, was announced as the work of 'the late John Pickard Owen'. Life and Habit (1878), Luck or Cunning? (1886), and other works sustain his critique of Darwin's theory of natural selection, which, he argued, failed to account for the functions of memory and volition in the processes of evolution. Among his other publications are The Authoress of The Odyssey (1897), purporting to prove that a young woman wrote the work, and Shakespeare's Sonnets Reconsidered (1899), which claims that the poems relate to a liaison with a young man of low character. Frequent travels in northern Italy gave rise to his writings on topography and art in Alps and Sanctuaries of Piedmont and the Canton Ticino (1881) and Ex Voto (1888). Erewhon Revisited* was published in 1901 with the assistance of George Bernard *Shaw, on whom Butler's ideas made a deep impression. His hostility towards Victorian religious, social, and familial conventions found its strongest expression in *The Way of All Flesh (1903). His close friend Henry Festing Jones arranged the publication of Seven Sonnets and a Psalm of Montreal (1904) and, with A. T. Bartholomew, edited the twenty volumes of Butler's Works (1923–6). Butler may be accounted the principal progenitor of the widespread reaction against Victorian values among British authors in the first decades of the twentieth century. The first volume of Hans Peter Breur's complete edition of the Note-Books, which reveal the extraordinary scope of his interests, appeared in 1984. Peter Raby's Samuel Butler appeared in 1991.

BUZO, Alexander (John) (1944–), Australian dramatist, born in Sydney, educated at the University of New South Wales. Three Plays (1973) contains Norm and Ahmed (1969), Rooted (1969), and the Roy Murphy Show (1971), the best-known of his earlier Absurdist treatments of alienating conflicts between the individual and society. The Brechtian historical play Macquarie (1971) marks the closer approach to naturalistic realism which is sustained without the sacrifice of experimentation in Tom (1972), Coralie Landsdowne Says No (1974), and Martello Towers (1976); these, with Buzo's other plays of the 1970s, dramatize critical examinations of social and cultural values in contemporary Australia. Big River (1980) and The Marginal Farm (1981), published together in 1985, centre on the quest for personal viability in a period of accelerating change in Australia. His other plays include Batman's Beach-head (1973) and Shellcove Road (1989). Among Buzo's other publications are the humorous novels The Search for Harry Allway (1985) and Prue Flies North (1991), and Tautology (1981), a study of Australian English.

BYATT, A(ntonia) S(usan) (1936–), British novelist and critic, born in Sheffield, educated at The Mount School, York and Newnham College, Cambridge. Among several academic posts she has been a lecturer at University College, London; she has also travelled widely as a lecturer for the British Council. Her first novel, Shadow of a Sun (1964), describing young Anna Severell's division in loyalties between her novelist father and one of his admiring critics, already showed an intense understanding of the creative processes. The Game (1967) is a powerful study of the relationship of two sisters who in childhood shared an imaginative game, based on Arthurian legend, which has conditioned their subsequent lives. Byatt's ambitious novel sequence about a family in the north of England concerns the Potters, whose emotional and mental lives not only reflect important cultural tensions in English society but can be regarded as metaphors for abiding human conflicts. The first volume, The Virgin in the Garden (1978), set in North Yorkshire, mainly takes place in the symbolically significant year of 1953 (the year of the Coronation of Elizabeth II) and focuses on the three children of the English master, Bill Potter. Still Life (1986) continues the development of the Potters and their associates; this time a drama about Van Gogh is in progress. Sugar and Other Stories (1987) contains 'The July Ghost', a moving account of a woman's difficulty in coming to terms with her loved son's early death; 'On the Day that E. M. Forster Died', with its meditation on the nature of fiction in society; and 'Sugar', in which the author reflects on her childhood and her father's death. Possession (1990; Booker Prize) is a large-scale but intricately worked 'romance' in which contemporary researchers uncover a hitherto unknown emotional relationship between two Victorian poets, Randolph Henry Ash (based on Browning) and Christabel LaMotte (based on Christina Rossetti); the author is as concerned with the lives of her twentieth-century characters as with the great Victorians themselves, whose poetry she gives us in passages of sustained intensity too considerable to be called 'pastiche'. She is also the author of Degrees of Freedom (1965), a study of the fiction of Iris *Murdoch, a major influence on Byatt, and of Wordsworth and Coleridge in Their Time (1970). In Passions of the Mind: Selected Writings (1991), Byatt pursues some of the ideas underpinning her own fiction, the work of the great Victorians and of several twentieth-century women writers. The pair of novellas Angels and Insects (1993) reflect her continuing interest in nineteenth-century themes. In The Matisse Stories (1993), Byatt evokes the colour and light for which the painter is famed. The Djinn in the Nightingale's Eye (1994) is a collection of fairy tales that play on the conventions of the genre. With Alan *Hollinghurst, Byatt co-edited New Writing 4 (1995), an anthology of prose and verse presenting 'a multi-faceted picture of modern Britain', and with Ignes Sodre she is the co-author of Imagining Characters: Conversations on Women Writers (1995). Byatt was awarded the CBE in 1990. She is the sister of the novelist Margaret *Drabble.

By Grand Central Station I Sat down and Wept, a novel by Elizabeth *Smart, first published in 1945, but hardly noticed until it was reissued in 1966 (in paperback) when it was hailed by the critic Brigid *Brophy as one of the half dozen masterpieces of poetic prose in the world. It is the story of a coup de foudre between the narrator and a married man (based on the poet George *Barker). With its flashing metaphors, hypnotic cadences, and liturgical rhythm the form and theme unite in emotional intensity. More an extended prose poem than a novel, it has been criticized for its lyrical excess. In one of the most striking sections Smart contrasts the 'Song of Songs' from the Old Testament with day-to-day frustrations as the lovers attempt to cross state borders in the 1930s to find a place where adultery is not an illegal act. This hymn to sexual love is Elizabeth Smart's most memorable work.

BYRON, Robert (1905–41), British travel writer, born in Wembley, London, educated at Merton College, Oxford, where he cultivated the independent aesthetic values central to his writings. In his final undergraduate year he made the journey to Greece recorded in Europe in the Looking-Glass (1926), its buoyant tone anticipating the energetic style of later works. The Station (1928), dealing with the monasteries of Mount Athos, and The Byzantine Achievement (1929) advance his belief that classical Greek culture found its most mature realization in Byzantine art and architecture. During the early 1930s he travelled widely in India, Persia, Tibet, Russia, and elsewhere. He was drowned while making his way to Meshed as a newspaper correspondent after the ship on which he was travelling was torpedoed. The Road to Oxiana (1937), his most celebrated work, investigates the origins of Islamic architecture in the course of a journey from Italy to India; the book, which retains the vivid immediacy of the journals from which it was prepared, combines erudition and entertainment in a manner that influenced numerous succeeding travel writers. Byron's other publications include An Essay on India (1931) and First Russia, then Tibet (1933). His sister Lucy Butler edited his Letters Home (1991).

CABELL, James Branch (1879–1958), American novelist, born in Richmond, Virginia, educated at the College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Virginia. Cabell enjoyed considerable critical and commercial success in the 1920s, largely as a result of the suppression by the Comstock Society of his seventh novel, Jurgen: A Comedy of Justice* (1919). Between 1898 and 1902 he worked for various newspapers before beginning ten years of genealogical research in America and Europe. During these years he published his first novel, The Eagle's Shadow (1904), three volumes of short stories, and, in 1909, a second novel, The Cords of Vanity. With The Cream of the Jest: A Comedy of Evasions (1917, revised edition 1923) Cabell came to the attention of the influential critic Burton Rascoe and within a few years he numbered Joseph *Hergesheimer, Sinclair *Lewis, H. L. *Mencken, and Carl *Van Vechten among his many admirers. Both Jurgen and The Cream of the Jest belong to the 'Poictesme cycle', a series of eighteen linked works dealing with the idealized, mythical country of Poictesme, and centred on Dom Manuel, the founder of Poictesme, whose offspring people Cabell's novels. These works are notable for the fertility of Cabell's imagination and the floridity of his prose. Cabell set his face against both the realist and modernist tendencies in post-First World War American fiction, and consequently became an increasingly marginal figure, critics seeing little beyond whimsy and escapism in his fiction. His other works include the play The Jewel Merchants (1921), three volumes of verse, various volumes of short stories, essays, and recollections, and Joseph Hergesheimer (1920), a study of a close friend. Studies of his works include Edmund Wilson's 'The James Branch Cabell Case Reopened' (The New Yorker, 21 April 1956), and James Branch Cabell (1962) by Joe Lee Davis.

CABRERA INFANTE, G(uillermo) (1929–), Cuban novelist, born in Gibara, Oriente Province, educated at the School of Journalism in Cuba, the son of the founders of the Cuban Communist Party. Among other posts, he was director of the Cuban Film Institute and cultural attaché at the Cuban Embassy in Brussels, before leaving Cuba in 1965 and becoming a British subject. Holy Smoke (1985), a wittily surreal account of cigars, combines the historical, social, and economic paradoxes of the New World with excursions into Hollywood films; the book is characteristically mined with puns. His novels translated from Spanish include Three Trapped Tigers (1971) and Infante's Inferno (1984). Works translated by the author, with others, include View of Dawn in the Tropics (1988; translated with S. J. Levine), an impressionistic modern history of Cuba; A Twentieth-Century Job (1991; translated with Kenneth Hall), a collection of his early film criticism; Writes of Passage (1993; translated with J. Brookesmith and P. Boyars), containing short stories; and Mea Cuba (1994; translated with Kenneth Hall), a collection of strongly anti-Castro writings-in-exile from 1968 to 1993, and other pieces. Among his screenplays, written in English, are the Hollywood films Vanishing Points (1969) and The Lost City (1990).

CAGE, John (1912–92), American composer, author, and printmaker, born in Los Angeles; he studied music and composition under Arnold Schoenberg, and at the New School for Social Research, with Adolph Weiss. Cage also travelled and studied a variety of disciplines, including architecture, Dadaism, oriental philosophy, and noise music with Edgard Varèse. In 1944–6, he was the musical director for the Merce Cunningham Dance School in New York. He later collaborated with Merce Cunningham and the painter Robert Rauschenberg on the first famous 'happening' entitled 'Theater Piece', organized at the *Black Mountain College in 1952. Cage has always been a controversial avant-garde composer and a major figure in American music. Central to his musical aesthetics is the exploration of the relations between chance operations and abstract structural principles, but perhaps his most significant impact on writing experiments was his sense that language is, in itself, sound. His first significant book was Silence: Lectures and Writing (1961), which demonstrated a variety of experimental ideas and lectures on writing, music, ballet, Varèse, Satie, and Rauschenberg. After A Year From Monday: New Lectures and Writings (1967), he published M: Writings '67–'72 (1973), which embraced essays and verbal games organized by a variety of abstract principles on such subjects as Dadaism and fungi. There followed Empty Words (1973), described as 'text-sound poetry', which worked in four movements of the gradual decomposition of words and sounds, slowly inviting the audience to recompose their own sounds. Sound for Cage always remained primarily social, and his experiments with language and sound have been hugely influential on writers of the Black Mountain School and *'Language Poets'. Other books and collected essays include X: Writings '79–'82 (1983), I–IV (1990), First: Sixth (1990), and Aerial Six-Seven: Art Is Either a Complaint or Do Something Else (1991). He also published several collaborative works which include the Poet's Encyclopaedia (1980) with Charles *Bukowski, John *Ashbery, and Robert *Creeley, The Guests Go in to Supper (1986) with Robert Ashley and Yoko Ono, and Mud Book: How To Make Pies and Cakes (1986) with Lois Long.

CAHAN, Abraham (1860–1951), American novelist and journalist, born in Podberezy, Lithuania, educated at Vilna Teachers Institute and law school in New York City. Cahan emigrated to the USA in 1882 and became an important figure in the Yiddish-speaking community of the Lower East Side of New York. He co-edited Neie Zeit, a Yiddish socialist newspaper, and from 1891 to 1894 was editor of the Arbiter Zeitung, a radical weekly which offered imaginative literature about immigrant life and promoted the socialist cause in the USA. Cahan's first novel, Yekl: A Tale of the New York Ghetto (1896) concerned the Americanization of the Jewish immigrant, a theme he continued in The Imported Bridegroom and Other Stories of the New York Ghetto (1898). Encouraged by the novelist William Dean *Howells, Cahan's most important work of fiction, The Rise of David Levinsky (1917), is influenced by Howells's The Rise of Silas Lapham (1885); the novel charts the rise of its eponymous hero from his squalid origins to a position of great economic and social power in the New York clothing industry. In 1897 Cahan helped to establish the Jewish Daily Forward and used it, during the 1920s, to promote his socialist views, notably his support of the Bolshevik regime in the Soviet Union, but his views changed by the 1930s when the newspaper became an organ of New Deal liberalism. Bleter fun Mein Leben (1926–31; five volumes) is an autobiography in Yiddish; The Education of Abraham Cahan (1969) is an English translation of the first two volumes. From the Ghetto (1977) by Jules Chametzky is an authoritative study of the fiction.

CAIN, James M(allahan) (1892–1977), American novelist aligned to the *'hardboiled' school of crime writers, born in Annapolis, Maryland, and educated at Washington College, Maryland. His first novel, The Postman Always Rings Twice (1934), helped establish the darker and more explicit style of crime writing; written as an unmediated first-person confession, it dramatizes the obsessions that sexual attraction and money create in weak characters. In both The Postman Always Rings Twice and Double Indemnity (1936), each successfully filmed, duplicitous women destroy the lives of flawed males who are driven to acts of extreme violence and passion. In these books, and in the social realism of Mildred Pierce (1941), Cain persistently returns to the gap between the lives people yearn for and the more straitened circumstances in which they live in the context of the Depression. Cain was a prolific writer, but most of his novels rework the basic theme and plot of his first novel with the result that his later fiction, including The Butterfly (1947), Galatea (1953), The Magician's Wife (1965), and Rainbow's End (1975), is now little read.

Cakes and Ale, a novel by W. Somerset *Maugham, published in 1930. Subtitled The Skeleton in the Cupboard, Maugham's novel raised contemporary ire for its satirical portraits. Hugh Walpole detected a cruel caricature of himself in the character of the meretricious author, Alroy Kear, and the superficially respectable Grand Old Man of English Letters, Edward Driffield, was commonly assumed to represent Thomas Hardy. The novel is written from the point of view of a middle-aged playwright, Willie Ashenden, who has been asked by Driffield's widow to supply his early memories of the author for inclusion in a sanitized biography. The narrative switches between the older Ashenden's cynical and witty musings on the London literary scene, and memories of his early life in Blackstable, a Kentish town where he originally encountered Driffield and his first wife Rosie Gann. The novel centres on the attractive, paradoxical character of Rosie, an earthy enchantress whose devil-may-care approach to life and love earn her the adoration of many and the censure of the class-ridden, misanthropic society of Blackstable. Maugham's satire on the widespread hypocrisy, which spreads from kitchen maids to celebrated hostesses, is combined with the restrained lyricism of Ashenden's romantic encounters with Rosie.

CALDWELL, Erskine (Preston) (1903–87), American novelist, born in White Oak, Georgia, the son of a Presbyterian minister, educated at the University of Virginia. His first major success was Tobacco Road (1932), dramatized by Jack Kirkland, about the Lesters, poor white farmers struggling to eke out an existence in the Deep South. This was followed by God's Little Acre (1933), a tale of sexual jealousy and intrigue in the Walden family in Georgia. Both novels are characterized by a heady mixture of social outrage and bawdy humour combined with an incisive sense of the qualities of folk culture. Regional life, and racial and social relations in the Deep South, characterize much of his fiction, such as Journeyman (1935), a sensational novel attempting to uncover certain religious exoticisms in the South; Trouble in July (1940); Tragic Ground (1944); House in the Uplands (1946); The Sure Hand of God (1947); This Very Earth (1948); A Place Called Estherville (1949); A Lamp for Nightfall (1952), set in Maine and dealing with old customs threatened by outlanders; Gretta (1955), the depiction of a nymphomaniac; Jenny By Nature (1961); Summertime Island (1968), a didactic romance narrated by a 16-year-old boy who comes of age on a fishing holiday; The Weather Shelter (1969); and Annette (1973). He has also written several collections of short stories, considered by many critics to include his finest writing: We Are the Living (1933); Kneel to the Rising Sun (1935); Southways (1938); Jackpot (1940); American Earth (1941); Georgia Boy (1943); The Courting of Susie Brown (1952); Gulf Coast Stories (1956); and When You Think of Me (1959). Despite his enormous productivity and popularity, his work has been less well received by critics after their initial enthusiasm in the 1930s. As well as fiction, he produced a number of short documentary and non-fictional works such as Some American People (1935), portraits of American life; All Out on the Road to Smolensk (1942), reminiscences about his war experiences; an autobiography in Call It Experience (1951); Around About America (1964), about travels around the USA; and Afternoons in Mid-America (1976). He collaborated with the photographer Margaret Bourke-White on You Have Seen Their Faces (1937), a photo-documentary on Southern sharecroppers during the Depression, North of the Danube (1939) about Czechoslovakia, and Say! Is This the USA? (1941).

Calendar of Modern Letters, The, a journal of criticism, poetry, and fiction founded in 1925 by Edgell Rickword, Douglas Garman, and Bertram Higgins as a forum for critical discourse of a standard they felt the Criterion had initiated but failed to maintain. Poetry by Roy *Campbell, Siegfried *Sassoon, Robert *Graves, and Laura *Riding was published and Llewellyn *Powys and William *Plomer were among the contributors of short stories. The Calendar was noted for its consistent attention to European literature, articles on Rimbaud, Baudelaire, and Chekhov serving to increase British awareness of their work; its international contributors included Hart *Crane, Robert *Frost, and Luigi Pirandello. A Coleridgean insistence on the combination of emotion and intellect in good writing characterized the journal's consensus of critical opinion. E. M. *Forster, D. H. *Lawrence, Desmond *MacCarthy, J. C. *Ransom, and Aldous *Huxley were among the critics and essayists whose work sustained the clear, objective, and intellectually rigorous tone of the Calendar's essays and reviews. The magazine ceased appearing in 1927, its circulation having fallen from a level of above 7,000 copies in its first year to around 1,000 by the tenth of its twelve issues. It was reissued in 1966 with an introduction by Malcolm *Bradbury, who spoke of its 'higher skill in exegesis than had been commonly found . . . in any critical paper'. Two volumes of essays from its 'Scrutinies' section were published under Rickword's editorship in 1928 and 1931; F. R. *Leavis, for whom the Calendar was an example in the establishment of Scrutiny*, edited a further selection under the title Towards Standards of Criticism in 1933.

CALISHER, Hortense (1911–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in New York, educated at Hunter College. Calisher is widely held to be a more skilful writer of short fiction than of novels, but she has continued to experiment with both genres. Her short stories, collected in In the Absence of Angels (1953), Collected Stories (1975), Saratoga, Hot (1985), and other volumes, show a talent for the humorously absurd and present a gallery of stock characters which increase their appeal. Her first novel, False Entry (1962), the chronicle of a man's life from childhood to maturity, which ranges from England to the American South and New York City, was praised for its robust narrative and its elegantly lyrical prose; the sequel, The New Yorkers (1969), which rivals the earlier volume in style and length, is perhaps her best-known novel. Though Calisher's scenes of provincial life, drawing on her family background, and her New York portraits have earned her the highest praise, she has resolutely refused to be categorized and continues to seek for new, and often surrealistic, subject matter. Journal from Ellipsia (1965) and Mysteries of Motion (1983) are set in outer space; Queenie (1971) is a satire of contemporary sexual mores; Standard Dreaming (1972) figures a surgeon speculating on the uncertain future of mankind; and The Bobby Soxer (1986) is a tale of provincial life in the 1950s. Herself (1972) and Kissing Cousins (1988) are autobiographical works.

CALLAGHAN, Morley (1903–90), Canadian novelist, born in Toronto, educated at Toronto University and Osgoode Law School. In 1923, Callaghan met Ernest *Hemingway to whom he showed his Three Stories and Ten Poems (1923); Hemingway encouraged Callaghan to write, and took some of his work back to Paris with him. The day after his marriage in April 1929 Callaghan left for Paris. That Summer in Paris (1963) is an introduction to this period of his life and work; he met James *Joyce, Ford Madox *Ford, Sinclair *Lewis, and others, and had the rare experience of knocking down Ernest Hemingway in a boxing bout refereed by Scott *Fitzgerald. After his return from Paris Callaghan spent time in New York, where he knew writers such as Sherwood *Anderson, William *Saroyan, and William Carlos *Williams. Early fiction works were Strange Fugitive (1928), whose setting during Toronto's Prohibition period sharpened the focus on an individual unable to adjust to society; It's Never Over (1930); A Broken Journey (1932); Such Is My Beloved (1934); and More Joy in Heaven (1937). The poet F. R. *Scott said at the presentation to Callaghan of the Lorne Pierce Medal for Canadian Literature in 1960 that 'with the appearance of Strange Fugitive in 1928, Canadian fiction could no longer be regarded as a pale extension of the English tradition'. After 1933, Callaghan abandoned stress upon physical action, espousing an overtly Christian humanism which was to inform his subsequent writings. These include The Loved and the Lost (1951), The Many Colored Coat (1960), and A Fine and Private Place (1975). Later publications are the novel Our Lady of the Snows (1985) and The Lost and Found Stories of Morley Callaghan (1985); A Time for Judas (1983) was an extraordinary reworking of the Passion and Resurrection of Christ. In 1982 Callaghan was made a Companion of the Order of Canada.

Call of the Wild, The, a novel by Jack *London, published in 1903. The novel deals with the values of reciprocal love and fair play, and the qualities of hardiness and courage in adversity. Buck, the offspring of a St Bernard and a Scotch shepherd dog, lives on a comfortable home on a California estate. He is stolen and shipped to the Yukon, where he is trained as a sledge-dog and put into brutal service before winning the leadership of the dog-team. He learns the law of the fang and how to survive in the Arctic wilds, rejecting the old Californian morality of respect for others. An atavistic streak of savagery stirs in Buck, as he responds to the conditions in which he lives and works. Buck is rescued from near death and cared for by John Thornton, and a strong bond builds up between them. Buck gives his entire allegiance to Thornton, saving his life on a number of occasions. When Thornton is murdered by Indians, Buck goes on the rampage in the camp, killing several of them in revenge. He then flees into the wild, where he abandons human civilization and becomes the leader of a wolf pack. The novel finishes on a note of triumph and a celebration of the American values of freedom and innocence, where Buck 'sings a song of a younger world'.

CAMERON, (Mark) James (Walter) (1911–85), British journalist and travel writer, born in London; after attending various schools in France and England, he began his career as a journalist in 1930. From 1945 onward he worked as a foreign correspondent, becoming well known for the compassionately outspoken liberalism of his work, which included reports from the Korean War, conflicts in Africa, and Maoist China. He was the first Western journalist to enter Hanoi during the Vietnam War; his widely circulated film entitled Western Eyewitness (1965) and the book Witness (1966) were both controversially supportive of the North Vietnamese. His publications also include Touch of the Sun (1950), on his travels between 1946 and 1950; 1914 (1959), his study of British life at the outbreak of the First World War; and Indian Summer (1974), an expansive treatment of modern and historical aspects of India, which he visited frequently. What a Way To Run the Tribe (1968) and Cameron in the Guardian (1985) are collections of his newspaper articles.

CAMERON, (John) Norman (1905–53), British poet and translator, born in India, the son of a Scottish clergyman, educated at Oriel College, Oxford. After a posting in Nigeria with the Colonial Service, he spent some time in Majorca with Robert *Graves, whom he had met at Oxford, before working as an advertising copywriter in London from 1933 to 1939. Throughout the war he produced propaganda from British Forces' bases in North Africa, Italy, and Austria. From 1947 onwards he worked as a translator. The Winter House (1935), his first collection of poetry, was followed only by Forgive Me, Sire (1950) during his lifetime, although he was well known in literary circles through his frequent publications in New Verse*, Horizon*, and elsewhere. His carefully crafted poems often take the form of concentrated and fluently developed extended metaphors: his close friend Dylan *Thomas remarked 'A poem by Cameron needs no more than one image; it moves around one idea, from one logical point to another, making a full circle . . .' His translations include Selected Verse Poems of Arthur Rimbaud (1942) and his versions of Villon in Poems (1952). Among the numerous prose works he translated are Adolf Hitler's Table Talk: 1941–1944 (with R. H. Stevens, 1953) and Balzac's Cousin Pons (1950). The fullest edition of his poetry is Collected Poems and Selected Translations (1990), edited by Warren Hope and Jonathan Barker.

CAMPBELL, Alistair Te Ariki (1925–), New Zealand poet, born in the Cook Islands in the Pacific, the son of a New Zealand trader and a Cook Island Maori, educated at Otago and Victoria Universities. At the age of seven, after the death of his parents, he was sent to Dunedin, in Otago, New Zealand, where he was raised in a less privileged environment, spending some years in an orphanage. His early poems, on themes of grieving and loss and marked by their intense use of natural imagery, were published in Mine Eyes Dazzle (1950), Sanctuary of Spirits (1964), Wild Honey (1964), and Blue Rain (1967). Campbell was married in the 1950s to the poet Fleur *Adcock and latterly to the poet Meg Campbell. Since the late 1970s, his poetry has been increasingly influenced by his reuniting with his Cook Island relatives. The landscape of The Dark Lord of Savaiki (1980) is of Tongareva—the landcrabs, mangoes, sandsharks, and coral of a Pacific island, and these poems are also marked by an increasing use of Polynesian references and language. Collected Poems (1981) was followed by Soul Traps (1985) and Stone Rain: The Polynesian Strain (1992). Campbell has also written radio plays and published an autobiography, Island to Island (1984). His novels include The Frigate Bird (1989) and Sidewinder (1991), which draw on his sense of mixed cultural loyalties and roots as Polynesian and New Zealander; and Tia (1993).

CAMPBELL, David (1915–79), Australian poet, born in New South Wales, educated at Cambridge University. Campbell's first volume of poems, Speak With the Sun (1949), with its ballads portraying the characters and landscape of the Australian outback, and his highly acclaimed war poem 'Men in Green', established his early reputation as a distinctly Australian poet. The Miracle of Mullion Hill (1956) develops these themes but includes several meditative lyrics. Poems (1962) reflects more universal interests and includes a sequence of pastoral lyrics. In The Branch of Dodona and Other Poems, 1969–1970 (1970) he reworks the Jason and Medea legend in an acerbic commentary on contemporary life; Devil's Rock and Other Poems, 1970–1972 (1974) captures aspects of Aboriginal culture and includes memories of Kenneth *Slessor and Douglas *Stewart. Deaths and Pretty Cousins (1975) was followed by Words with a Black Orpington (1978) in which his technique becomes more experimental. Posthumous collections include The Man in the Honeysuckle (1979) and Collected Poems (1988). He was poetry editor of the Australian; edited a number of anthologies including Modern Australian Poetry (1970); and translated, with Rosemary *Dobson, several volumes of Russian verse. His short stories, many of which drew on his childhood experiences of life on a sheep station, appeared in Evening Under Lamplight (1959) and Flame and Shadow (1976).

CAMPBELL, Joseph (1879–1944), Irish poet, born in Belfast; he became a participant in the *Irish Revival after Padraic *Colum introduced him to Dublin literary circles in 1902. In 1906 he became a teacher in London, where he was secretary of the Irish Literary Society. Interned as a Republican during the upheavals leading to Ireland's independence, he went to New York upon his release, where he formed the School of Irish Studies in 1925 and began The Irish Review in 1934. He returned to Ireland in 1939. A great deal of Campbell's poetry has its origins in Gaelic culture. His first major achievement was to supply lyrics for Herbert Hughes's settings of Songs of Uladh in 1904, some of which have since passed into the Irish folk tradition. The Garden of Bees (1905), his first collection of poetry, was followed by The Rushlight (1906), The Gilly of Christ (1907), and The Mountain Singer (1909), each of which displays his elegant simplicity of style. A number of his finest poems appear in Earth of Cualann (1917), which Austin *Clarke, editor of Campbell's Collected Poems (1963), believed to contain the first use of free verse by an Irish writer. Campbell also wrote several plays, including Judgement, which was produced at the *Abbey Theatre in 1912. A critical biography, Joseph Campbell: Poet and Nationalist, by A. A. Kelly and Norah Saunders, appeared in 1988.

CAMPBELL, (Ignatius) Roy(ston Dunnachie) (1901–57), South African poet, born in Durban, South Africa; he fought in the First World War, having succeeded in joining the South African infantry at the age of 15, and arrived in England in 1918. In 1924 his reputation as a poet was established by The Flaming Terrapin; the work, in 1,400 rhymed lines, allegorically celebrates the principle of vitality, emblematized by the terrapin, and is characterized by the abundant energy of its natural imagery. In 1926 Campbell returned to South Africa, and founded the satirical magazine Voorslag (lit. 'Whiplash') with William *Plomer. The Wayzgoose, his poem attacking the South African intelligentsia, appeared in 1928. During the early 1930s he lived in Provence and engaged in bullfighting. Adamastor (1930), containing some of his best South African poems, was followed by The Georgiad (1931), a humorously offensive diatribe in verse against the *Bloomsbury Group. The poetry of Flowering Reeds (1933) was marked by a more contemplative tenor. Having become a Roman Catholic in 1935, his enthusiasm for religious ritual was indicated in the verse of Mithraic Emblems (1936). He fought for General Franco in the Spanish Civil War and espoused fascist values in the long poem Flowering Rifle (1939). He was, however, fully prepared to serve against Hitler with the King's African Rifles until invalided out in 1944. A Collected Poems was published in three volumes in 1949, 1957, and 1960, the third of which is devoted to his distinguished translations, principally of French and Spanish poetry. He died in a motor accident in Portugal. He published two volumes of autobiography, Broken Record (1934) and Light on a Dark Horse (1951), which tend to project a romanticized view of himself as a man of action. Peter Alexander's biography of Campbell appeared in 1952.

Campus Novel, a term describing a particular genre of novels, usually comic or satirical, which have a university setting and academics as principal characters. An early example was Kingsley Amis's Lucky Jim* (1954), which is set at a Midlands red-brick university and features the comic escapades of a junior lecturer; other notable examples include Malcolm *Bradbury's Eating People Is Wrong (1959), about life at a provincial university, and The History Man (1975), a satirical novel set at a new 'plate-glass' university, which concerns the rise of an unscrupulous Professor of History. Bradbury's subsequent works, such as Rates of Exchange (1983), also feature academics as heroes but depart from the narrow university setting. David *Lodge—also, like Bradbury, a Professor of English—has written several novels which fall into the category: Changing Places (1975), subtitled 'A Tale of Two Campuses', wittily contrasts the straitened circumstances of British academics at a provincial university with the more glamorous and affluent lifestyle of their American counterparts. A sequel, Small World (1984), considers the peripatetic existence of academics on the literary conference circuit. Other recent additions to the genre include Howard *Jacobson's Coming from Behind (1983), a scabrously funny account of the tribulations of a young Jewish academic at a Northern polytechnic, which pays ironic homage to both Bradbury and Lodge. American campus novels include Mary *McCarthy's The Groves of Academe (1952); John Barth's Giles Goat-Boy* (1966), a surreal work (subtitled 'The Revised New Syllabus') in which one of the main characters is a super-intelligent computer; and Alison *Lurie's The War Between the Tates (1974), which concerns the adulterous liaisons and political intrigues of a group of academics on a New England campus. A Canadian variation on the genre is offered by Robertson *Davies's The Rebel Angels (1982).

Canadian Forum, a monthly journal of political commentary and literature begun in 1920 by students and staff at the University of Toronto; it is the longest established periodical of its kind in Canada. It began as the successor to The Rebel, a *little magazine based at the University of Toronto, with which Barker Fairley, Canadian Forum's first literary editor, and other founding members of the editorial board had been involved. Although enthusiastically concerned with conceptions of an independent national culture, the magazine remained in critical detachment from the indiscriminate endorsement of identifiably Canadian writing which its editors associated particularly with the Canadian Bookman. Poetry by Dorothy *Livesay, E. J. *Pratt, A. J. M. *Smith, and many others was regularly featured. Writers of note who were supported early in their careers by Canadian Forum include Earle *Birney, Margaret *Avison, Raymond *Souster, A. M. *Klein, and Margaret *Atwood. The magazine's continuing belief in the social functions of literature has been central to the integration of its literary and political dimensions. J. Francis White became the first full-time editor in 1927, since when Northrop *Frye, Milton Wilson, Abraham Rotstein, and John Hutcheson have been among his successors. J. L. Granatstein and Peter Stevens edited the anthology Forum: Canadian Life and Letters, 1920–1970 (1972).

Canadian Literature, the first periodical to be devoted exclusively to critical consideration of writing produced in Canada. It has appeared quarterly since its establishment in 1959 by George Woodcock at the University of British Columbia, Vancouver. Woodcock was succeeded in 1977 by W. H. New. The journal's inception marked the growing confidence in the value of indigenous writing which was intrinsic to the strengthening belief in an independent cultural identity felt in Canada from the late 1950s onward. Woodcock's desire to avoid the subordination of critical objectivity to nationalist evaluations of literature has been fulfilled in the magazine's rigorous and eclectic ethos, which is equally free of doctrinaire adherence to any body of literary theory. Although criticism of literature in English has always been its first concern, Canadian Literature also publishes poetry and occasional samples of contemporary fiction, and regularly features commentary in French. Numerous anthologies of articles and essays from its pages have appeared, including Woodcock's editions of The Sixties: Canadian Writers and Writing of the Decade (1969) and Poets and Critics: Essays from 'Canadian Literature', 1966–1974 (1974).

CANFIELD FISHER, Dorothy (1878–1958), American novelist born in Lawrence, Kansas, educated at the University of Nebraska (where she formed an enduring friendship with Willa *Cather), Ohio State University, and Columbia University. From 1907 onward she lived in Arlington, Vermont, drawing on its middle-class social milieu in most of her fiction. Her earlier novels, published under her maiden name of Dorothy Canfield, include Gunhild (1907), contrasting Norwegian and American values; The Squirrel-Cage (1912), the first of her treatments of marriage; and The Bent Twig (1915), dealing with tensions between a student and her idealistic parents. While the morality of her fiction is predictably conventional, her work is capable of considerable candour and intensity. Notable among her other novels are The Brimming Cup (1921), in which a woman is torn between her family and love for another man; Her Son's Wife (1926), centring on antipathies between a mother and daughter-in-law; and The Deepening Stream (1930), a partly autobiographical narrative of the growth of a woman's character. Hillsboro People (1915), The Real Motive (1916), and Raw Material (1923) are collections of short stories. Vermont Tradition (1953), a celebration of the history and culture of the region, is the best known of her non-fiction works, which also deal with educational methods and motherhood. There is a biography (1982) by Ida H. Washington.

CANIN, Ethan (1961–), American novelist, born in Ann Arbor, Michigan, educated at Harvard, where he studied medicine. His first collection of short stories, Emperor of the Air (1988), was followed by Blue River (1991), a novel about the lifelong rivalry between two brothers—one a successful ophthalmic surgeon, the other a hopeless drifter, and by The Palace Thief (1994), a collection of four thematically linked novellas, each focusing on a moment of 'uproar and disorder' in the life of its protagonist. His style, which is spare and lucid, with occasional flashes of lyricism, has been compared to *Updike's; he is similarly concerned with the epiphanies which occur in ordinary lives, specifically those of suburban America.

CANTOR, Jay (1948–), American novelist and essayist, born in New York City, educated at Harvard University and the University of California, Santa Cruz. He became a professor of literature at Tufts University. In his meticulously researched The Death of Che Guevara (1983), Cantor blends history and fiction to explore the intricacies of the man behind the legendary guerrilla fighter. Krazy Kat (1987), his second novel, is built on the character from George Herriman's comic strip of that name; the cartoon characters are subjected to various realities of modern life such as atomic weaponry and psychoanalysis in Cantor's version. A book of essays, The Space Between: Literature and Politics (1981), uses fictional and historical figures as well as personal reminiscences to analyse the present time. A later collection of essays is Giving Birth to One's Own Mother (1991).

Cantos, The, Ezra *Pound's compendious magnum opus, published in numerous sections between A Draft of XVI Cantos (1925) and Drafts and Fragments of Cantos CX to CXVII (1970); the fullest available text is The Cantos (1987). Having become dissatisfied with the essentially miniaturist idiom of *Imagism after about 1915, Pound sought to discover a form capable of accommodating the wide range of tones, thematic interests, and styles of verse which he had developed since around 1908. Three provisional sections appeared in Poetry, Chicago, in 1917, although it was not until his move to Paris in 1920 that he began his fifty years of sustained effort on The Cantos. The aesthetics of the *Vorticists, stressing the need for spatial integrity in artistic creation, and the impression made upon him by the architectonics of T. S. Eliot's *The Waste Land were of importance in determining the diversity and interrelatedness of the poems' constituent elements. Greek, Chinese, American, English, Italian, and African texts are among the materials invoked in Pound's projection of his, and Western civilization's, cultural frame of reference. Stylistically the work's range is enormous, extending from lyric modes of great refinement and delicacy to passages in the roughest American vernacular. The recurrence of literary, historical, legal, and mythological themes interwoven with autobiographical reflections unifies the shifting textures of the many sections, which can nevertheless succeed in being simultaneously baffling and compelling to the reader. W. Cookson's A Guide to the Cantos of Ezra Pound (1985) is among the most straightforward of the many commentaries on the work, which continues to generate controversy over its meanings and value.

CANTWELL, Robert (1908–78), American novelist, biographer, and editor, born in Little Falls (Vader), Washington, educated at the University of Washington. Cantwell is chiefly associated with the group of proletarian realists (see PROLETARIAN LITERATURE IN THE USA) who emerged in the USA in the early 1930s. Cantwell worked at an assortment of jobs, including coastguard and factory operator in a lumber mill, before moving to New York to begin a career in journalism. His first novel, Laugh and Lie Down (1931), draws on his experiences of mill work, and marked the beginnings of his literary conversion to the left. A more considerable work, The Land of Plenty (1935), again draws on Cantwell's industrial experience, here in the context of a labour–management dispute which turns into a strike. Cantwell also contributed regularly to the New Republic* and The Nation and in 1935 became an associate editor at Time magazine, a position he held until 1945 when he took over as literary editor at Newsweek. Other works include the biographies Nathaniel Hawthorne: The American Years (1948) and Alexander Wilson (1961); and The Hidden Northwest (1972), a historical study.

CAPOTE, Truman (1924–84), American writer, born in New Orleans, Louisiana. He left school at 15, by which time he had already been writing short stories for over a year. His earlier works defied many of the social conventions of the deeply conservative post-war years by their sympathetic portrayal of characters normally deemed immoral or amoral. Among his works of fiction are Other Voices, Other Rooms (1948), which discussed homosexuality; A Tree of Night and Other Stories (1949); The Glass Harp (1951; dramatized 1952), about people freeing themselves from social demands by living in a tree house; and Breakfast at Tiffany's (1958), a novella centred on the free-spirited Holly Golightly. His plays include House of Flowers (1954), a musical set in a Caribbean brothel; The Thanksgiving Visitor (1968); and Trilogy; An Experiment in Multimedia (1969). His travel writing appears in Local Color (1950) and The Muses Are Heard (1956), his account of a tour through Russia with the cast of Porgy and Bess. In 1966 he produced a collection of short stories, A Christmas Memory, and also achieved widespread notoriety with the publication of In Cold Blood, an early example of 'faction' (see NEW JOURNALISM) concerned with an infamous multiple murderer. He also enhanced his reputation with a procession of acerbic journalism and shorter prose pieces, some of which appeared in the collections Then It All Came Down (1976) and Music for Chameleons (1980). A large project provisionally called Unanswered Prayers was left unfinished at his unexpected death.

CARD, Orson Scott (1951–), American writer of *science fiction novels and stories, born in Richland, Washington, educated at Brigham Young University and the University of Utah. As a Mormon, his work could be interpreted as a form of advocacy; but the harsh dispassion of his best novels avert any sense of doctrine. Only in A Woman of Destiny (1984; later much expanded as Saints) and The Folk of the Fringe (1988) does he deal directly with the oddly compelling contours of his faith as a religion conditioned by American history. His science fiction, most notably Ender's Game (1985), Speaker for the Dead (1986), and Xenocide (1991), consists of grandiose tales of the rite of passage from childhood to ruler of the race. Beginning with Seventh Son (1987), Card has also written a series of fantasies about an alternative America.

Caretaker, The, a play by Harold *Pinter, performed and published in 1960. The drama that first brought Pinter substantial recognition and success involves the subtly shifting relationships of three characters. A former mental patient, Aston, rescues the tramp Davies from a brawl and brings him back to the junk-filled London attic which he inhabits, but which is actually owned by his brother Mick, a jobbing builder. As the play proceeds, the paranoid, shiftless Davies switches his allegiance from his benefactor, Aston, to the stronger Mick, who purports to be offering him a job as a caretaker and work as a painter and decorator. The latter's motives, as often in Pinter, are somewhat inscrutable; but it would seem that he outwits the tramp by luring him into making both false claims for himself and insulting remarks about Aston. By the end, both brothers have rejected Davies, and he is left with nothing but the forlorn hope of one day getting to Sidcup, a place where he improbably expects to find the solution to all his problems. The play's complexities are not easily summarized, but it has been well described by John *Arden as concerning 'the unexpected strength of family ties against an intruder'. It is notable for its charged atmosphere, for clipped, plain dialogue that says little but implies much, as well as for its richly humorous yet sympathetic characterization of the tramp Davies.

CAREW, Jan (Rynveld) (1925–), Guyanese novelist and poet, born in Agricola, British Guiana (now Guyana), educated at universities in America, Czechoslovakia, and France. He has lived and taught in Ghana, Jamaica, Canada, and more recently in Chicago, and was made Professor of African-American Studies at Northwestern University. His early novels, Black Midas (1958; US title A Touch of Midas, 1958) and The Wild Coast (1958), are notable for their vivid, resonant descriptions of the Guyanese landscape. Other novels include The Last Barbarian (1960), set in Harlem, and Moscow Is Not My Mecca (1964; published as A Green Winter, 1965), set in Soviet Russia. Poetry collections include Streets of Eternity (1952) and Sea Drums in My Blood (1980). Sons of the Flying Wing (1970), Children of the Sun (1976), and Computer Killer (1985) are among his many children's books. He has also published a collection of essays, Fulcrums of Change (1987); the historical studies Grenada: The Hour Will Strike Again (1985) and Rape of Paradise: Columbus and the Origins of Western Racism (1994); and a biographical study of Malcolm X, Ghosts in Our Blood: With Malcolm X in Africa, England and the Caribbean (1994).

CAREY, Peter (1943–), Australian novelist and short-story writer, born in Victoria, educated at Monash University, where he studied science. After working for advertising agencies in Melbourne and London he later established his own advertising agency in Sydney. His first two publications were short stories collected in The Fat Man in History (1974) and War Crimes (1979); grotesquely funny, set in frightening, futuristic worlds, they provide a scathing critique of contemporary values, and yet register compassion for the ungainly beings they feature. His first novel, Bliss (1981), displays a similar predilection for the bizarre in its account of the life of Harry Joy, an advertising man who dies three times and passes through hell, purgatory, and heaven; in this, as in his short fiction, Carey's writing provides a wryly inventive perspective on a modern world obsessed with materialism and with competitive values, offering surreal alternatives in which the reader is disturbingly deprived of traditional referents. His *magic realist novel Illywhacker (1985), narrated by a 139-year-old man, also showed his interest in 'extending reality'. Oscar and Lucinda (1988; Booker Prize) combined skilful pastiche of nineteenth-century novels such as Edmund Gosse's Father and Son with magic realist quest; Oscar Hopkins, a young Anglican clergyman, becomes obsessed with the idea of building a glass church in the Australian outback and enlists the aid of Lucinda Leplastrier, an eccentric heiress he meets on a ship bound for New South Wales. The Tax Inspector (1991) is a surreal black comedy about three generations of an Australian family: the central character, Benny Catchprice, loses his job in the family motor business on the day that the Tax Inspector, Maria Takis, who is eight months pregnant, arrives to begin her audit of the firm; other characters in the cast include an ageing matriarch, Granny Catchprice, and a child who wants to become an angel. In The Unusual Life of Tristan Smith (1994), Carey creates imaginary countries, folklore, and languages in a dazzling adventure that parodies colonial politics and is inhabited by the world of the theatre. His Collected Short Stories were published in 1995.

CARNAP, Rudolf (1891–1970), philosopher, born at Ronsdorf in Germany, educated at the universities of Freiburg and Jena. After military service in the First World War he was active within the Vienna Circle and lectured at the University of Vienna from 1926 to 1930, gaining recognition as a leading exponent of logical positivism. His first major work, Der Logische Aufbau der Welt ('The Logical Structure of the World'), appeared in 1928; the book's insistence on the need to establish direct relations between theoretical statements and areas of immediate experience formed the basis of his doctrine of 'physicalism'. In 1930 he founded the journal Erkenntnis with Hans Reichenbach, which developed into the principal platform for logical positivism. His profound investigations of abstract logic were extended into linguistic and mathematical territories in Logische Syntax der Sprache ('The Logical Syntax of Language') (1934). He held a professorship at the German University of Prague, where he was sought out by W. V. O. *Quine, until 1935, when he went to the USA to escape the intellectual constraints of Nazism. In 1941 he became a naturalized US citizen. He was Professor of Philosophy at Chicago from 1935 to 1952 and at the University of California, Los Angeles, from 1954 to 1961. From around 1940 onwards he was preoccupied with questions of probability and induction, producing Logical Foundations of Probability, widely regarded as a work of great importance, in 1950. Carnap's flexibility in modifying his somewhat rigid earlier views accorded with the fundamentally humane orientation of his thought, which was characteristically expressed with exemplary clarity and precision. His other works include Formalization of Logic (1943) and Scheinprobleme in der Philosophy ('Pseudo-Problems in Philosophy') (1960).

CARPENTER, Edward (1844–1929), British writer on social reform, born in Brighton, educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. In 1869 he was ordained in the Church of England but relinquished holy orders in 1872 and moved to Leeds to lecture with the University Extension movement. He met Walt Whitman, whom he revered, on trips to America in 1877 and 1884, recording his experiences in Days with Walt Whitman (1906). Carpenter employed Whitman's expansive idiom in Towards Democracy, a long poem on his vision of social and spiritual progress, which was repeatedly enlarged after its original publication in 1883. His writings on sexuality, religion, aesthetics, and a range of political topics won him international renown as a progressive thinker. Among the more notable of his many publications are England's Ideal (1885), an exposition of his socialist principles; Civilization, its Cause and its Cure (1889); The Drama of Love and Death (1912), an exposition of his beliefs in evolutionary meliorism; and the autobiographical My Days and Dreams (1916). Homogenic Love and its Place in a Free Society (1894), The Intermediate Sex (1908), and other works bear directly and unapologetically upon his homosexuality. Chushici Tsuzuki's Edward Carpenter: Prophet of Human Fellowship appeared in 1980.

CARPENTER, Humphrey (William Bouverie) (1946–), British biographer, born in Oxford, educated at Keble College, Oxford. He was a radio producer from 1968 to 1974, when he became a freelance writer and broadcaster. J. R. R. Tolkien (1977) was the first of his numerous biographies of literary figures; with Christopher Tolkien, he edited the Letters of J. R. R. Tolkien (1981). The Inklings (1977) deals with *Tolkien, Charles *Williams, C. S. *Lewis, and their circle at Oxford. His reputation as a biographer was fully established with W. H. Auden (1981), which displays the narrative fluency and thoroughness characteristic of his work. His subsequent publications include Geniuses Together (1987), a treatment of 'the *Lost Generation' of American writers in Paris during the 1920s; A Serious Character (1988), a biography of Ezra *Pound; The Brideshead Generation (1989), his lucidly organized study of Evelyn *Waugh and his contemporaries; and Benjamin Britten (1992). With his wife, Mari Prichard, Carpenter edited The Oxford Companion to Children's Literature (1984); notable among his numerous works for children is the series of 'Mr Majeika' books.

CARR, E(dward) H(allett) (1892–1982), British historian, born at Highgate, London, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. From 1916 to 1936 he worked at the Foreign Office, where he rose to the rank of First Secretary. His wide diplomatic experience subsequently gained him a succession of academic posts. Throughout much of the Second World War he was assistant editor of The Times. During his years with the British Legation at Riga in the 1920s, Carr developed a deep interest in Russian culture and subsequently produced a series of biographical studies which include Dostoevsky (1931), Karl Marx (1934), and Michael Bakunin (1937). Among his earlier works as an authority on international affairs are The Twenty Years' Crisis: 1919–1939 (1939), Conditions of Peace (1942), and The Soviet Impact on the Western World (1946), which demonstrate his belief in the need for co-operation with the USSR. A History of Soviet Russia, Carr's magnum opus on the emergence of the Soviet state from 1917 and 1929, appeared in fourteen volumes between 1950 and 1978. A controversial view of history as a dynamic progression based on shifting structures of power informs all his works, which also include The New Society (1951), Twilight of the Comintern, 1930–1935 (1983), and the lectures and essays of What Is History? (1961) and From Napoleon to Stalin (1980).

CARR, Emily (1871–1945), Canadian painter and prose writer, born in Victoria, British Columbia. Canada's best-known woman artist, Carr studied painting in San Francisco, England, and Paris, but achieved widespread recognition only in her fifties. Her art is characterized by a passionate commitment to Native Canadian themes. She turned to writing when failing health forced her to curtail her work as a painter and potter. Her first book, Klee Wyck (1942), takes its title from the name (meaning 'Laughing One') given to her by her Nootka Indian friends; it is a collection of short stories which, like much of her art, celebrates the culture of the Native people of Canada's West Coast. Her other literary work offers vivid insights into later Victorian and early twentieth-century life on Vancouver Island; for example, The Book of Small (1942), and The House of All Sorts (1944), which describes Carr's experiences running a boarding house in Victoria, one of many ways in which she financed her career as a painter. Growing Pains (1946) is the first of a number of posthumously published and autobiographical works.

CARR, J(ames Joseph) L(loyd) (1912–), English novelist, born in Carlton Miniott, Yorkshire, educated at Castleford Secondary School, Yorkshire. Carr was a schoolteacher for many years, and served as an Intelligence Officer in the Royal Air Force during the Second World War. His first published novel, A Day in Summer (1963), a characteristic pot-pourri of convention and fancy, was followed by A Season in Sinji (1968), The Harpole Report (1972), and How Steeple Sinderby Wanderers Won the F.A. Cup (1975). Carr's best-known novel, A Month in the Country (1980), is the story of Birkin, a shell-shocked survivor of the First World War, who arrives at a north-country village with the task of uncovering a medieval wall-painting in the village church. As the work progresses and summer succumbs to autumn, Birkin becomes absorbed in the rhythms of village life and the lives of its characters. Among the several plot layers, involving the past and present, is the unravelling of a local family legend involving the unburying, by a young archaeologist, of a fourteenth-century ancestor buried in the church grounds which is the climax of the book. In The Ballad of Pollock's Crossing (1985) Carr gives full expression to his gift of comic fantasy, removing in 1929 a young Bradford schoolteacher to the American Midwest where he rearranges the syllabus, offering his class the Indian view of the Sioux's defeat at Wounded Knee instead of the obligatory Hiawatha exposition. Latterly, Carr founded his own press, publishing from a back bedroom curious dictionaries and maps.

CARR, John Dickson (1906–77), American *detective novelist who lived from 1932 to 1948 in England, where the majority of his books are set. His novels, which appeared under his own name and under that of Carter Dickson, are complicated puzzles, often highly ingenious variants of the locked-room mystery: a lecture on this subject is included in The Hollow Man (1935). In their method they can be compared with the stories of S. S. *Van Dine and Ellery *Queen, but have far more life and energy, while the detection is often leavened by a romantic sub-plot. The detective in Carr's own early stories is the French juge d'instruction Henri Bencolin (It Walks by Night, 1930), but he is soon replaced (Hag's Nook, 1933) by the stout and eccentric lexicographer Dr Gideon Fell, who appears in most of the author's novels and is obviously modelled on G. K. *Chesterton. The detective in the novels by Carter Dickson—the first is The Plague Court Murders (1934)—is the equally eccentric Sir Henry Merrivale, who later acquires Churchillian characteristics. Carr also wrote a number of historical romances with a detective element, such as The Devil in Velvet (1951), his most popular book, which is set in the London of Charles II, and the official biography of Sir Arthur Conan *Doyle.

CARRINGTON, Leonora (1917–), British novelist, short-story writer, and artist, born in Lancashire, educated in various Catholic convents. As a debutante in 1934, she was presented at court to George V (the inspiration of her 1936 story, The Debutante). While at art school at the Amedee Ozenfant Academy in London, she discovered Surrealism through the work of Herbert *Read; shortly afterwards she met Max Ernst, with whom she went to live in France, where she wrote many of the short fictions later collected in The House of Fear and The Seventh Horse (both 1988), macabre and comic tales showing the influence of the English nursery rhyme school. In 1940, during the fall of France, Carrington suffered a breakdown, which she later recounted in Down Below (1972), a frighteningly detailed memoir of a season in hell which has become a classic of surrealist literature. She later moved to Mexico City where her painting took precedence over her writing. She also wrote two novels: the alchemical fantasy The Stone Door (1966), and The Hearing Trumpet (1976), an off-beat comedy about old age and religious questing, both of which were first published in French translation.

CARROLL, Paul Vincent (1900–68), Irish dramatist, born in Blackrock, Co. Louth, educated at St Patrick's College, Dublin. He emigrated to Scotland in 1921 and taught in Glasgow until his first theatrical success in 1937. Carroll was one of a number of playwrights, including Lennox *Robinson, who contributed significantly to the prevalence of Realism at the *Abbey Theatre in the 1930s and 1940s. Things that Are Caesar's (1932), produced at the Abbey, is an early example of the profound influence of Ibsen on Carroll's dramas, an influence which later became a handicap; the play succeeds in universalizing an Irish tale of arranged marriage, entrapment, and the conflict between worldliness and spiritual aspiration. Carroll's first outstanding play, Shadow and Substance (1937), continues his didactic use of local settings and characters. The play achieves a balance between its portrayal of insular rural life and the grand theme of intellectual pride, as well as establishing Carroll's unique ability to characterize the Irish priest. His other plays include The White Steed and The Coggerers, both staged in 1939, and The Devil Came from Dublin (1952).

CARSON, Ciaran (1948–), Northern Irish poet, born in Belfast, where he was educated at Queen's University. After working as a schoolteacher and subsequently as a civil servant, he became Traditional Arts Officer of the Arts Council of Northern Ireland in 1975. The New Estate (1976), his first collection of verse, contained a wide range of poems on historical, social, and personal themes which frequently anticipated the urgent engagement with contemporary conditions in Ulster characteristic of his later writing. An expanded edition of the book which appeared in 1987 indicated the emergence of a strong narrative element in his work, a factor of considerable importance to the powerful originality of The Irish For No (1988). The book's impact is partly produced by the thoroughness of its evocation of Belfast, which provides the contexts for what Fintan O'Toole described as Carson's 'rare and terrifying ability to encapsulate history in an anecdote'. Belfast Confetti (1990) and First Language (1993) expand the imaginative compass of his work and display the increasing flexibility of his idiosyncratic verse forms. His other writings include The Pocket Guide to Irish Traditional Music (1986).

CARTER, Angela (1940–92), British novelist and short-story writer, born in Eastbourne, Sussex, educated at Bristol University. Although *magical realism may have been the inspiration for some of Carter's early novels, which include Shadow Dance (1966), The Magic Toyshop (1967), and Love (1971), from the beginning she showed a much wider cultural and historical awareness of the polyglot aesthetic tradition within which she was working. She drew upon sources such as Kleist, the French conte cruel, Dinesen (Karen *Blixen), *Stead, and Japanese tales, as is evident in Fireworks (1974), her first and pioneering collection of short fiction. The short story was successful as a vehicle for Carter's unusual talent, which combined erudition and transformative imagination. The brothers Grimm are the inspiration for *The Bloody Chamber (1979), probably her finest work, which recasts their traditional tales of metamorphosis in moulds that draw undogmatically on feminism and Freud; she adapted some of these stories for Neil *Jordan's film version entitled The Company of Wolves (1984). Carter's project of deconstructive interpretation and retelling continues in Black Venus (1985), drawing this time on histories, legends and literary fictions. Some of her earlier novels, such as Heroes and Villains (1969), The Infernal Desire Machines of Doctor Hoffman (1972), and The Passion of New Eve (1977), take place in *science fiction landscapes; but Carter successfully made the transition from fantastic to more accessible and pleasurable novels with her works set in worlds where reality and artifice intermingle. Nights at the Circus (1984), a love story set in the theatrical world of fin-de-siècle London, presents the quintessential Carter heroine, the trapeze artiste Fevvers who was born with wings. The comic Wise Children (1991), another theatrical novel, is Carter's tribute to Shakespearian comedies and displays a mellowing vision, more rooted in mundanity. Carter was a fine and varied critic, as her long feminist essay The Sadeian Woman: An Exercise in Cultural History (1979), and the reviews and occasional writings collected in Nothing Sacred (1982) and Expletives Deleted (1992), reveal.

Carter's early death left critics divided as to whether she was a major or a very original minor writer: nevertheless, her influence is evident in the work of celebrated contemporaries such as Michèle *Roberts, Marina *Warner, and Jeanette *Winterson among others. Along with *Rushdie, she is also to be credited with forcing British fiction away from its increasingly parochial concern with domestic or social realism by her insistence on textual diversity and the joy of passionate and eclectic reading. Her fascination with the macabre and erotic aspects of folklore and myth is evident in The Virago Book of Fairy Tales (1991) which she edited. Stories uncollected at Carter's death appear in the American Ghosts and Old World Wonders (1993); Burning Your Boats: Collected Short Stories appeared in 1995 with an introduction by Salman Rushdie. See Flesh and the Mirror: Essays on the Art of Angela Carter (1994), edited by Lorna Sage.

CARTER, Martin (Wylde) (1927–), Guyanese poet and politician, born in Georgetown, British Guiana (now Guyana), educated at Queen's College in Georgetown. He wrote and published poems privately in the 1950s, including To a Dead Slave (1951) and The Kind Eagle (1952), but it was a spell of three months in detention for his anti-colonial political activities which led to Poems of Resistance (1954), the collection which established his reputation as a major political poet. After independence, Carter became Minister of Public Information and Broadcasting, and represented Guyana at the United Nations. Stark, militant rhetoric dominates many of his poems, but others are characterized by compassion, and startling imagery. Many of his best, such as 'I Come from the Nigger Yard', fuse the political and the confessional. In 'For Milton Williams', a poem in Poems of Succession (1977), which also contains work from earlier collections, Carter, however, rejects any cosy nostalgia about his youthful political activism. His other volumes include Poems of Shape and Motion (1955), Conversations (1955), Jail Me Quickly (1963), and Poems of Affinity: 1978–80 (1980).

CARTLAND, Barbara, see ROMANTIC FICTION.

CARTWRIGHT, Justin (1933–), British novelist, born in South Africa, educated at Trinity College, Oxford; he worked as a maker of documentary films and commercials before becoming a full-time writer. Cartwright's early novels The Revenge (1978) and The Horse of Darius (1980) are skilfully plotted thrillers about assassination attempts against powerful political figures. He first received considered acclaim for Interior (1989), a compelling serio-comic narrative set in South and West Africa which centres on the main protagonist's hazardous search for his missing father. Also set chiefly in Africa, Masai Dreaming (1993) sustains thematic tension between the rumoured barbarism of that continent and the stark barbarism of Nazi Germany. The vividly documentary satire of London as a zone of polarized social conditions in Look At It This Way (1990) anticipates the centrality of the city to In Every Face I Meet (1995), Cartwright's most highly regarded novel; the events of the novel take place mainly on one day in 1990, when Nelson Mandela's imminent freedom begins to re-vitalize the impotent idealism of an investment banker before events embroil him in murder charges.

CARVER, Raymond (1938–88), American short-story writer and poet, born in Oregon, educated at Chico State College and Humboldt State College; he also attended the *Iowa Writers' Workshop. His first volume of stories, Put Yourself in My Shoes (1974), was followed by Will You Please Be Quiet, Please? (1976), Furious Seasons (1977), and What We Talk about when We Talk about Love (1981). Carver wrote mostly about the domestic lives of the working class, drawing on his own background and experiences. His characters are travelling salesmen, waitresses, and office workers; his preferred themes are failed or broken marriages, chronic drunkenness (Carver was himself an alcoholic), repressed violence, and the failure of attempts to communicate. His stories, often presented as monologues, are remarkable for their stylistic economy; detail, though photographic, is spare and description reduced to essentials. Carver's work reflects the influence of *Hemingway in its simplicity and compression. He has been compared to Chekhov, described as a minimalist, and placed by perceptive critics in the wider category of American Realism with its undertow of sensationalism and violence. The stories of Cathedral (1983) display a new mellowness; the controlled use of the epiphanies absent from his earlier fictions emphasizes his belief in the ultimate triumph of good over evil. Fires (1983) is a miscellany of prose and verse. Where I'm Calling from (1988) gathers thirty stories from Carver's previous collections, and seven hitherto unpublished stories; the latter stories were also published as a separate volume, Elephant (1988). The impact of Carver's short career on the American literary scene can be gauged from the evident influence of his style on a new generation of American writers, including his own wife, Tess Gallagher, to whom some of his works are dedicated.

CARY, (Arthur) Joyce (Lunel) (1888–1957), British novelist, born in Londonderry, educated at Clifton College and Trinity College, Oxford. Much of his childhood was spent in Ireland, in Donegal, which provides the setting of The House of Children (1941). Cary studied art in Edinburgh, served in the Balkan War of 1912–13, and in 1913 joined the Nigerian political service, where he remained, except for an interval with the Nigerian regiment during the Cameroons campaign of 1915–16, until 1920, when he resigned through ill health. His first novel, Aissa Saved (1932), set in Nigeria, is an objective picture of conditions there, ironically doubting the white man's success in improving the morals of the indigenous population. An American Visitor (1933), likewise located in Nigeria, combines political parable with an inter-racial love affair; it was followed by The African Witch (1936) and Castle Corner (1938). His best-known novel, Mister Johnson (1939), is a classic of colonial literature, and reflects Cary's own experiences in the Nigerian Administration. Focusing on the eponymous hero, a Nigerian clerk, the novel portrays a bygone colonial life and a remarkable insight into the mind of the African. His next two novels, Charley Is My Darling (1940) and A House of Children (1941), are centred on children. Cary's reputation rests on his blackly comic trilogy, Herself Surprised (1941), To Be a Pilgrim (1942), and The Horse's Mouth (1944; filmed 1959), described by Cary as a 'Triptych' and published together as First Trilogy (1958). Narrated in the first person, the trilogy is unified by the interrelated stories of the three main characters, all representing different backgrounds and offering different perspectives on art, morality, religion, and on each other's character: Sara Monday, 'a simple country girl in service', representing sensual domesticity but whose religious beliefs, having been inspired by the works of Charlotte M. Yonge, have given her 'strength in adversity'; Tom Wilcher, a lawyer with a strong sense of duty who tries to preserve his family fortune; and Gulley Jimson, the scurrilous and egocentric artist influenced by Blake and Stanley Spencer, whose perception of creativity and the artist's role is the main focus of the trilogy. The chief work of Cary's later years was a political trilogy, Prisoner of Grace (1952), Except the Lord (1953), and Not Honour More (1955). Using the same device he employed in the earlier trilogy, he casts an identical set of characters into differently angled first-person narratives. Other works include Power in Man (1939) and The Process of Real Freedom (1943), philosophical apologias of his liberal beliefs; The Case for African Freedom (1941); and The Drunken Sailor (1947), an allegorical poem.

CASEY, John (1939–), American novelist, short-story writer, and critic, born in Worcester, Massachusetts, educated at Harvard University and the University of Iowa. Casey moved to Charlottesville, Virginia in 1972 and became a teacher at the University of Virginia. His first novel, An American Romance (1977), was a critical success, but it was his second novel, Spartina (1989), the story of Dick Pierce, an embittered Rhode Island fisherman, that established his literary reputation. In Spartina, as in his earlier fiction, Casey's depiction of his hero is both realistic and human. He uses Dick's internal voice to convey the inner struggles that accompany his exterior predicaments: his struggle to attain the money to finish his boat, his involvement with a drug-runner, and his extra-marital affair, among others.

CASSIDY, John (1928–), British poet, born in Lancashire; he served with the East African Army before studying at the University of Manchester. From 1954 to 1976 he taught English at Leigh Grammar School, Leigh, Lancashire, and became a lecturer in literature and creative arts at Leigh College in 1976. After his work's inclusion in Faber's Poetry Introduction: 3 (1975), he published several collections including An Attitude of Mind (1978), Night Cries (1982), and Walking on Frogs (1989). In numerous poems, Cassidy's treatments of wild creatures become vehicles for his recurrent sense of the tensions between urban and rural modes of existence. More frequently, however, his work is concerned with the social and personal implications of experience; he has produced many compassionate but penetratingly observed studies of individuals in whose circumstances or actions he imaginatively locates broader human significances.

Catcher in the Rye, The, a novel by J. D. *Salinger, published in 1951. The novel is narrated in lively vernacular by the 16-year-old Holden Caulfield, agile-minded, maverick, imaginative, and a boarder at an expensive prep school, Pencey. We see him leaving the school he disliked and going to New York City, where, dreading a confrontation with his parents (very distant figures throughout the novel) he checks into a cheap hotel. Here he accepts the elevator operator's offer of a whore for the night. Holden is, as he tells us, a virgin; indeed, it later transpires that for him virginity is a 'good', a revulsion against sex being an important constituent of his vision of life. He cannot perform with the whore, and her pimp demands more money and assaults Holden. The next day he makes unsatisfactory encounters with an old girlfriend and with his adored younger sister Phoebe, and spends the night at the home of one of the few adults for whom he has any regard; the man makes furtive homosexual advances to him. Holden decides to run away West, but realization of his love for Phoebe stays him, and he suffers a kind of breakdown of which writing this novel is a therapy. The character of Holden fills and animates the entire novel, to such a degree that it is not surprising he became widely adopted as a role-model for so many readers. While it is possible to find inconsistencies in Holden's viewpoint, it is impossible to deny both the reality and the power of Holden himself and the literary virtuosity and integrity with which he is presented. This unusually affecting novel has become a testament and an inspiration for generations of readers all over the world. Certain of its phrases and epiphanies have passed already into Western folklore.

Catch-22, a novel by Joseph *Heller, published in 1961. Heller's first and finest novel, it is generally regarded as one of the greatest comic works of post-war American fiction. It is equally often seen as a powerful expression of anti-war sentiment, but its concerns, as many critics have noted, are as much with the relationship of the individual to society as they are with the nature of war and patriotism. Much of the novel is set in an American airforce base on an imaginary Mediterranean island and is structured around a bomber squadron's missions during the Italian campaign of 1943–4; this, however, is essentially a background against which Heller creates a remarkable gallery of comic characters, most of them satirizing some salient aspect of American life: business enterprise, capitalism, the civil and military bureaucracy, the patriotic spirit among them. The famous philosophical 'catch' of the title, a paradox, is explained by one of the novel's characters, Doc Daneeka: 'Anyone who wants to get out of combat duty isn't really crazy'; and the novel's hero, Yossarian, spends much of his time trying to escape the remorseless grip in which 'catch-22' holds him.

CATHER, Willa (1876–1947), American novelist, born in Virginia where she lived until she was nine; her family then moved to Nebraska, to the prairie country pioneered by Central European and Scandinavian emigrants, individuals at once dour and passionately nostalgic, who were to inspire her most famous novels. She was educated at the University of Nebraska, where she studied classical literature (also an influence on her work, with its emphasis on the pastoral). After a period of teaching and journalism, during which she published her first volume of poems, April Twilights (1903), and a book of short stories, The Troll Garden (1905), she worked in New York on the staff of the famous 'muck-raking' periodical, McClure's Magazine, from 1906 to 1912, eventually becoming editor. Her first novel, Alexander's Bridge (1912), was followed by her first characteristic work, O Pioneers!* (1913), whose title was taken from Walt Whitman and which concerns a Swedish immigrant family struggling to establish itself on the Nebraskan prairies; The Song of the Lark (1915), a study of the professional dedication of an opera singer, Thea Kronberg, who clearly stands for all artists; and My Antonia* (1918), a pastoral of life on the prairies and perhaps her most consistently popular work. Then came One of Ours (1922), which won her many readers, but also made her enemies. Its hero is a young man who escapes from a stultifying existence on a Nebraska farm into the war in France. His eventual redemption through suffering and death was—understandably—attacked by *Hemingway, *Fitzgerald, and others, who felt that Cather was not writing from experience and was preaching a dubious moral. A Lost Lady (1923) is a delicately wrought study of elegant, warm-hearted Marion Forrester, who emerges as less innocent than she at first seems; it was followed by My Mortal Enemy (1926), which deals with the runaway marriage of a selfish and wilful woman, Myra Henshawe, and by The Professor's House (1925), perhaps her finest novel, which depicts the falling out of love with life of Professor St Peters, a distinguished academic and authority on Spanish New Mexico. Death Comes for the Archbishop* (1927), a historical novel set in New Mexico, concerns the life and work of two French Catholic priests and expresses the author's admiration for the Catholic Church. Cather herself never converted to Catholicism, although she was attracted by the moral values embodied in it, which she saw as providing an alternative to the corruption of American society. Other novels include Shadows on the Rock (1931), set in seventeenth-century Quebec, which continued the Catholic theme; Lucy Gayheart (1935), about a Midwestern girl torn between the values of her home town and those of the artistic world; and Sapphira and the Slave Girl (1940), a study of jealousy and possessiveness, set in her native Virginia. As Hermione Lee's critical biography, Willa Cather: A Life Saved Up (1989) makes clear, Cather's most significant achievement is to have annexed for women and for America the pastoral form, previously the preserve of European, male writers, and in doing so, to have created works of rich and universal resonance.

Cathleen Ni Houlihan, a play by W. B. *Yeats, published in 1902, the year of its production at St Theresa's Hall by the Irish Literary Theatre in which Maud Gonne played the title role. It was enormously successful and must be considered Yeats's only truly popular work for the theatre. By comparison with his other dramas Cathleen Ni Houlihan, which is written mainly in prose, has a highly effective straightforwardness as a patriotic allegory. The aged and distressed figure of Cathleen Ni Houlihan symbolizes Ireland in the tradition of the country's personification in folklore as the Shan Van Vocht, or 'Poor Old Woman'; Cathleen's four fields, representing the four provinces of Ireland, have been seized by strangers and she appears at the house of Michael Gillane to seek assistance. Gillane is preparing for his marriage; Cathleen, who is presented as a powerfully mysterious figure, prevails upon him; he chooses self-sacrifice in Cathleen's cause rather than personal good fortune, moved by the assurance that those who help her 'shall be remembered forever'. Gonne's passionate performance, concluding with the old woman's transformation into a regal young beauty, emphasized the nationalist import of the play, which intensified the commitment to Irish independence of some of its audience. In the late poem 'The Man and the Echo' Yeats asks uneasily, with reference to the events of 1916, 'Did that play of mine send out | Certain men the English shot?'

Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, a play by Tennessee *Williams, published in 1955 and revised in 1974, when it was awarded the Pulitzer Prize. The play became notorious for its treatment of homosexuality, which is never directly presented, but is depicted in a way that took contemporary audiences by surprise. Set in the Deep South, in the Mississippi Delta, the drama has as its pivot the sixty-fifth birthday celebrations of the patriarch Big Daddy, who, unknown to himself, is dying of cancer. His elder son and daughter-in-law, parents of a large and growing family, display an avaricious desire to get their hands on the estate. His other daughter-in-law, Maggie, is determined this should not happen; her husband, Brick, a handsome ex-athlete who has taken to drink, is Big Daddy's favourite, even though the relationship is under strain. The reasons for this emerge as the drama progresses, and the father confronts the son with allegations about the nature of his relationship with Skipper, a former friend and fellow sportsman whose death appears to have been brought about by his unrequited love for Brick. Apparently appalled by this aspersion, Brick protests his innocence, claiming that the suggestion that the relationship was of a homosexual nature had been put about by Maggie, and that Skipper's death had been caused by his feelings of humiliation at the cruel rumour. He then turns the tables on his father, who has demanded to know the truth at all costs, by revealing to him the truth about his imminent death. Williams's exploration of the underlying theme of homosexuality, restrained as it is, prevented the play from being performed in Britain and elsewhere for many years. When it was eventually revived, Williams worked with the director Elia Kazan, who had also directed the original Broadway performance with Burl Ives as Big Daddy. Kazan suggested making some changes to the last act in order to show the essentially sympathetic character of Maggie and it is this version which is usually played, although some critics prefer the original, starker version.

Cat's Eye, a novel by Margaret *Atwood, published in 1989. Told from the perspective of a painter, Elaine Risley, this reflective yet profoundly critical novel works on several levels: as a sensitive exploration of women's relationships with other women, with their families, and with men; as an examination of the changing mores of feminism, and of the post-feminist ideology of the 1980s; as an account of the development of a woman artist, and the transformation of lived experience into art; and as a portrait of the changing panorama of four decades of Canadian life, both social and artistic. A retrospective exhibition of her work provides Elaine with the opportunity to examine the events that inspired her creations. The poetic introspection of her early memories, with its haunting description of her relationship with her brother, is marred by her recollection of her bond with Cordelia, alternately friend and adversary, which serves as a metaphor for the illusions and betrayals she encounters in her life. The sections set in the present allow Atwood's satirical vision full scope, as she portrays the attitude of the present generation of feminist critics to their erstwhile icons. Looking back at her past from the perspective of a relatively complacent middle age, Elaine revises her own attitudes and those of successive feminist generations to allow a wide margin for the privileges of domesticity, introspection, and contented relationships.

CAUDWELL, Christopher, pseudonym of Christopher St John SPRIGG (1907–37), British critic, born in Putney; at the age of 15 he became a reporter on the Yorkshire Observer. Having become interested in aviation, he moved to London as a writer on aeronautics, producing numerous books, which include The Airship (1931) and Let's Learn To Fly (1937). These and his detective stories, among which are Fatality in Fleet Street (1933) and The Perfect Alibi (1934), were published under his original name. In 1935 he joined the Communist Party, adopting his pseudonym and moving to London's East End to renounce his bourgeois identity. He contributed criticism and polemical pieces to Left Review*, urging writers to political activity. In 1936 he joined the International Brigade, and was killed in Spain in the following year. The first British Marxist critic (see MARXIST LITERARY CRITICISM) of note, he outlined his theory of poetry as a product of man's struggle with his environment in Illusion and Reality (1937), which quickly established his posthumous reputation. His other works of criticism include Studies in a Dying Culture (1938), in which G. B. *Shaw, T. E. *Lawrence, and Sigmund Freud are among his subjects, and Further Studies in a Dying Culture (1949; edited by Edgell Rickword). His poetry was featured in New Verse. Collected Poems, edited by Alan Young, was published in 1986. While pieces like 'Heil Baldwin' are bluntly effective as political satire, elsewhere his verse emanates a powerful imaginative disquiet exemplified by the frequently anthologized 'The Progress of Poetry'.

CAUSLEY, Charles (1917–), British poet, born at Launceston, Cornwall, educated at Launceston College and Peterborough Training College. Between 1940 and 1946 he served in the Royal Navy, an experience informing many of his earlier poems, and was a teacher in Cornwall until he became a freelance writer in 1976. Among his numerous collections of poetry are Farewell Aggie Weston (1951), Union Street (1958), Johnny Alleluia (1961), Secret Destinations* (1984), A Field of Vision (1988), and Collected Poems (1992). Much of Causley's work is notable for its fluent adaptations of ballad forms and other traditional modes of verse. He creates an accessible poetry of common experience in which there frequently exists a latent irony between the archaism of form and the unsettling modernity of content. 'At the British War Cemetery, Bayeux' and 'Song of the Dying Gunner' are two well-known examples of his ability to combine conventional rhythms with sharp authenticity of detail and stringency of tone and feeling. His later verse has been acclaimed for its development of verse forms of greater substance and complexity than he had generally employed hitherto. Causley is among the most highly regarded of contemporary authors of verse for children, volumes of which include Figgie Hobbin (1970), The Young Man of Cury (1991), and All Day Saturday (1994). His plays include How Pleasant To Know Mr Lear (1948), and a collection of short stories entitled Hands To Dance (1951). See also TOPOGRAPHICAL POETRY.

CAUTE, (John) David (1936–), British novelist and historian, born in Alexandria, Egypt, educated at Wadham College, Oxford. A fellow of All Souls until 1965, he has subsequently held numerous visiting professorships in Britain and the USA. A radical Marxist view of Western civilization and its relations with the Third World informs a number of novels, including At Fever Pitch (1959), set during Ghana's emergence into nationhood, The K-Factor (1983), and News from Nowhere (1986), both of which reflect the turmoil preceding the establishment of Zimbabwe. Recognized as an intellectually stimulating writer, Caute has been censured for the dominance of political analysis in his fiction. Among his other novels are The Occupation (1971), concerning an academic's quest for self-knowledge; The Women's Hour (1991), a comedy of gender politics in a university context; and Dr Orwell and Mr Blair (1994). His other publications include the historical works Communism and the French Intellectuals, 1914–1960 (1964) and The Fellow Travellers (1973), on the visits to Russia made by numerous leading twentieth-century European writers; and the biography Joseph Losey: A Revenge on Life (1994).

CECIL, Lord (Edward Christian) David (Gascoyne) (1902–86), British biographer and critic, the youngest son of James Gascoyne-Cecil, the fourth Marquess of Salisbury; he was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1924 he became a fellow of Wadham College, Oxford, and was Goldsmith's Professor of English Literature at Oxford from 1948 to 1970. His study of Cowper, The Stricken Deer (1929), gained him wide notice as a scholarly biographer. His subsequent biographical studies include The Young Melbourne (1939), Lord M.; Or the Later Life of Lord Melbourne (1954), Max: Sir Max Beerbohm (1964), and Visionary and Dreamer (1969), his treatment of Samuel Palmer and Edward Burne-Jones. Among the numerous works in which Cecil combined biographical elements with critical analysis are Early Victorian Novelists (1934), Two Quiet Lives (1948), which deals with Thomas Gray and Dorothy Osborne, and A Portrait of Jane Austen (1978). The eloquent descriptive impressionism of much of his writing is firmly in the tradition of nineteenth-century belles-lettres, a tendency which resulted in the disparagement of his work by F. R. Leavis and others associated with Scrutiny. A Portrait by His Friends (edited by Hannah Cranborne, 1990) is a collection of memoirs of Cecil.

Celtic Twilight, The. (i) A term which is applied, sometimes mildly disparagingly, to the literary and cultural resurgence otherwise referred to as the *Irish Revival. Its suggestions of romantically mystical fusions of myth, legend, and superstition indicate that it is restricted in its appropriateness to the period 1889–1900; during these years, the literature of the Irish Revival was to a large extent dominated by such preoccupations in its elegiac and nostalgic involvement with the lost indigenous culture and history of Ireland. From around 1900 onward the Revival was characterized by increasingly provocative and naturalistic writing, notably in the developments of Irish drama at the *Abbey Theatre. (ii) The phrase originated with W. B. *Yeats's collection of folk-tales and personal reminiscences entitled The Celtic Twilight and is evocative of the melancholy Gaelic Pre-Raphaelitism of much of his earlier verse. First published in 1893, the book contained material derived from Yeats's recollections of his early years in Sligo, when he had listened to the stories told by some of the area's inhabitants; a second edition appeared in 1902, featuring additional tales and legends from the Galway region. Yeats had previously produced two collections in a similar vein, Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry (1888) and Irish Fairy Tales (1892); these were substantially drawn from existing literary sources and The Celtic Twilight is of greater interest than either for its autobiographical element.

CHAMBERS, Sir E(dmund) K(erchever) (1866–1954), British historian of the English stage, born at West Ilsley, Berkshire, educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he produced an edition of Shakespeare's Richard II (1891). From 1892 until his retirement he held a succession of posts in the Civil Service, rising to become a Second Secretary. His reputation as a scholar was established with The Mediaeval Stage (2 volumes, 1903), a study of the dramatic tradition out of which the work of Shakespeare and his contemporaries arose. The Elizabethan Stage (4 volumes, 1923) displays his characteristic concern to present the history of English drama with detailed reference to its social and economic contexts. Among his numerous other publications are William Shakespeare: A Study of the Facts and Problems (2 volumes, 1930); Arthur and Britain (1927), a survey of the variant Arthurian legends; and the critical biographies Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1938) and Matthew Arnold (1947). His edition of the Oxford Book of Sixteenth Century Verse appeared in 1932. He was the first president of the Malone Society from 1906 to 1936.

CHAMBERS, R(aymond) W(ilson) (1874–1942), British philologist and literary historian, born at Staxton in East Yorkshire, educated at University College London (UCL). In 1900 he became a fellow of UCL, where he succeeded W. P. *Ker as Quain Professor in 1922. Widsith: A Study in Old English Heroic Legend (1912), an edition of Beowulf (1914), and Beowulf: An Introduction (1921) were among the works that established him as one of the twentieth century's foremost scholars of Old English literature. After the appearance of England Before the Norman Conquest (1926) the range of his activities broadened to extend from early Germanic literature to Shakespeare and Milton; the scope of his interests is reflected in Man's Unconquerable Mind (1939), a collection of essays on authors from Bede to A. E. *Housman, whom he had known well at UCL. His best-known work outside the specialized fields of his contributions to philology is Thomas More (1935), a study of More's literary and historical importance, which drew commendation from the Vatican.

Chance, a novel by Joseph *Conrad, published in 1913, serialized in the New York Herald, 1912. It was Conrad's first novel to achieve popular success and marked the return of Marlow as narrator. It is divided into two parts, 'The Damsel' and 'The Knight'. Part I recounts the early life of Flora de Barral, the traumatic incident in which Flora's sense of her own worth is destroyed by her governess, and shows how Flora's insecurity is reinforced by subsequent events. Marlow investigates the disappearance of Mrs Fyne's brother, Captain Anthony, which is solved by Flora's account of her relations with him. Part II recounts the complex relations of Captain Anthony, Flora, and her father on board the 'Ferndale', the 'psychological cabin mystery of discomfort'. Flora is one of the 'damaged women' who are of central importance in Conrad's late fiction. The study of her character and career is framed, on the one hand, by the feminism of Mrs Fyne and, on the other, by the frequently misogynistic commentary of Marlow. It is complemented by the exploration, in Part II, of Captain Anthony's conception of masculinity and its relation to the code of chivalry he has inherited from his father.

CHANDLER, Raymond (1888–1959), American crime writer, born in Chicago, but brought up from the age of seven in England, where he was educated at Dulwich College. He returned to America in 1912 and, after serving in the Canadian Army and the Royal Air Force during the First World War, settled in California and became an executive for an oil company. Sacked for drunkenness in 1932, he wrote detective stories for pulp magazines, including Black Mask, gradually developing the figure of the detective narrator who emerged as Philip Marlowe in his first novel, The Big Sleep (1939; filmed by Howard Hawks with Humphrey Bogart as Marlowe, 1946). This was followed by his highly acclaimed Farewell, My Lovely (1940), The High Window (1942), The Lady in the Lake (1943), The Little Sister (1949; republished in the USA as Marlowe), The Long Goodbye (1953), and Playback (1958). He was also employed as a screenwriter in Hollywood, working on the screenplays for Billy Wilder's Double Indemnity (1944; from the novel by James M. *Cain) and Alfred Hitchcock's Strangers on a Train (1951; from the novel by Patricia *Highsmith). Greatly influenced by Dashiell *Hammett, whom he much admired, he strove to take the detective novel further than had his predecessor, to give it an extra dimension and turn it into literature; in the process he romanticized Hammett's hero, who became a kind of modern knight errant: 'Down these mean streets a man must go who is not himself mean, who is neither tarnished nor afraid', he wrote in the essay 'The Simple Art of Murder' (1944). His influence on later writers of private eye novels has been immense, though his works have been perhaps critically more valued in Britain than in America: in an appreciation (Harper's, 1948) *Auden spoke for many when he wrote that Chandler's novels were 'serious studies of a criminal milieu, the Great Wrong Place, and his powerful but extremely depressing books should be read and judged, not as escape literature, but as works of art'. There is a life by Frank MacShane (1976); see also Miriam Gross (ed.), The World of Raymond Chandler (1977) and Jerry Speir, Raymond Chandler (1981). (See DETECTIVE FICTION.)

CHAPLIN, Sid (1916–86), British novelist and short-story writer, born in Shildon, County Durham. After leaving school at the age of 14, he worked as a miner. Later, he won a scholarship to Fircroft College for Working Men, where he started writing, and became a specialist writer for the National Coal Board. An influence on writers like Alan *Sillitoe and Stan *Barstow, his novels offer a realistic evocation of life among Tyneside mining families, and reflect a vanishing British working-class culture. Among his best novels are The Day of the Sardine (1961), in which the protagonist, the moody Arthur Haggerston, anticipates a typical John *Braine hero but with more cynicism about his own aspirations to an affluent way of life; and The Watchers and the Watched (1962). His other novels include My Fate Cries Out (1949), The Thin Seam (1950), The Big Room (1960), Sam in the Morning (1965), and The Mines of Alabaster (1971). Among his collections of short stories are The Leaping Lad (1946) and In Blackberry Time (1987).

CHARLES, Faustin (1944–), Trinidadian poet and novelist, born in Trinidad, educated at the Universities of Kent and London. His poems are distinctively Caribbean in tone, and his 'animal' poems are reminiscent of Ted *Hughes in their forcefulness. Poetry collections include The Expatriate (1969), Crab Track (1973), and Days and Nights in the Magic Forest (1986). The game of cricket features prominently in some of his poems, and also in his children's book, Anancy's Day of Cricket (1986). Wilson *Harris appears to have inspired his novels which, like his poems, are dense with archetypal imagery; these include Signposts of the Jumbie (1981) and The Black Magic Man of Brixton (1985). Tales from the West Indies (1985) is a collection of short stories.

CHARTERIS, Leslie (1907–93), American writer, born as Leslie Charles Bowyer Lin in Singapore and educated in England; he lived in the USA from 1935, working as a scriptwriter in Hollywood and becoming a US citizen in 1946. He was the author of a long series of novels and short stories, beginning with Meet the Tiger (1928), in which the hero is the immaculately dressed English young man about town Simon Templar, known as the Saint, a modern-day Robin Hood who rights injustice and succours the oppressed while evading the police. Later novels are often set in the USA, including The Saint in Miami (1940). A number of films, in most of which George Sanders took the leading role, several television and a radio series have depicted Templar's adventures.

CHARYN, Jerome (1937–), American novelist, born and educated in New York, where he has set at least fifteen of his mythic, nightmarish novels, from Once Upon a Drosky (1964) to War Cries Over Avenue C (1985). In Panna Maria (1982) Manhattan is reminiscent of the archaic Poland of Isaac Bashevis *Singer. Pinocchio's Nose (1983) deals with the same material in science fiction form. A sequence of linked detective novels, also set in New York, has been collected as The Isaac Quartet (1984), and Metropolis (1986) is a non-fiction analysis of the city. Other novels include American Scrapbook (1969), about the incarceration of Japanese-Americans in the Second World War; The Tar Baby (1973), a surreal parody of the groves-of-academe novel; The Franklin Scare (1977), an evocation of F. D. Roosevelt; and Darlin' Bill (1980), a fantasia on the imaginary West of Wild Bill Hickok.

CHATWIN, Bruce (1940–89), British novelist and travel writer, born in Sheffield, educated at Marlborough and at Edinburgh University, where he gained a degree in anthropology, a lifelong interest. His first book, In Patagonia (1978), a collection of travel writing, was followed by The Viceroy of Ouidah (1980), a fictional account of the life of a Brazilian adventurer, Francisco Manoel da Silva, set in Africa in the early 1800s. On the Black Hill (1982) described the relationship between Lewis and Benjamin Jones, twin brothers, living on a remote Welsh hill farm at the turn of the century. The novel was admired for the poetic intensity with which the author conveyed the details of his characters' isolated existence, and the strength of feeling between them. The widely praised The Songlines (1987), an idiosyncratic mixture of fiction, anthropological study, and travelogue, chronicled the writer's travels in the Australian desert following the 'songlines' or ancestral paths of the Aboriginal people. These paths form a network across the landscape, acting both as invisible frontiers and as the repositories of ancient Aboriginal myths of creation. Utz (1989) displayed another aspect of the writer's remarkable versatility. Set in post-war Prague, the novel meticulously describes the fanatical love of a collector of Meissen porcelain for the delicate pieces he has amassed over the years, and for which he has sacrificed everything, even his own freedom. The posthumously published Photographs and Notebooks (ed. David King and Francis Wyndham, 1993) were compiled from photographs and notes from Chatwin's travels in Mauritania, Niger, Mali, Dahomey, and Afghanistan.

CHAUDHURI, Amit (1962–), Indian writer, born in Bombay and brought up in Calcutta; he studied at University College, London, and Balliol College, Oxford, and was made Creative Arts Fellow at Wolfenden College, Oxford. His first work of fiction, A Strange and Sublime Address (1991), consists of a novella and some stories; the former describes, in elegant, evocative prose, the holidays of a young boy from Bombay with his family in Calcutta. Stronger on atmosphere than on narrative, the novel won the Betty Trask award that year, and the Commonwealth Writers Prize for best first book the following year. His second novel, Afternoon Raag (1993), which blurs the boundaries between essay, memoir, and fiction, is similarly brief, lyrical, and evocative; the central metaphor of Indian music runs through a young Indian student's account of life in England and his musings on the nature of foreignness and belonging.

CHAUDHURI, Nirad C(handra) (1897–), Indian historian, born in Kishorganj, Bengal, educated at the University of Calcutta; he worked as a clerk and as a secretary to the Nationalist leader Subhas Chandra Bose before becoming a freelance writer in 1952. In 1970 he settled in Oxford. In addition to offering an account of his early life, his The Autobiography of an Unknown Indian (1951) constituted an idiosyncratic and penetrating survey of India's political development in the years up to 1921. Equally a combination of autobiography and modern history, Thy Hand, Great Anarch! (1987) covers the years 1921 to 1952. The Continent of Circe (1965) analyses India's social and cultural situation. His biographies Clive of India (1974) and Scholar Extraordinary (1974), a study of Friedrich Max Müller (1823–1900), sustain the theme of relations between Britain and India which runs through much of his writing. His other works include A Passage to England (1959), on his first visit to Britain under the sponsorship of the BBC in 1955.

CHAVEZ, Denise (1948–), Hispanic dramatist, born in Las Cruces, New Mexico, educated at New Mexico State University, Trinity University in San Antonio, and the University of New Mexico. Her allegiance to the Southwest and the Latina experience has shaped her fiction and drama. While she grew up valuing education, Chavez was also critical, from an early age, of the institutions which can marginalize women and minorities. Chavez is a self-avowed 'performance writer'; her first play, Noviates, was produced in 1971, and she has received critical acclaim. Her collection of plays Shattering the Myth: Plays by Hispanic Women (1992) attempts to bring critical attention to the often ignored contemporary Latina drama. She is celebrated for her lyrical blending of poetry and prose as well as her exploration of feminine consciousness. Her aesthetic is shaped by a contemporary concern for language games, politics, and the human psyche. Much of her work reads as extended monologue. Her numerous works include the collections Life Is a Two-Way Street (1980), The Last of the Menu Girls (1986), and Face of an Angel (1990).

CHEEVER, John (1912–82), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Quincy, Massachusetts, educated at Thayer Academy, his expulsion from which became the subject of his earliest works. As well as producing a rich stream of books, he also taught creative writing at several colleges including Boston University. Cheever's short stories satirized New England suburban life with a sharply observant eye. These appeared in several volumes, including The Way Some People Live: A Book of Stories (1943), The Enormous Radio and Other Stories (1943), The Housebreaker of Shady Hill and Other Stories (1958), Some People, Places and Things That Will Not Appear in My Next Novel (1961), The Brigadier and the Golf Widow (1964), and The World of Apples (1973). This manner also shaped the two-novel sequence The Wapshot Chronicle (1957) and The Wapshot Scandal (1964), which tells of the decline of a once wealthy family in a small New England town. Through the narration of the adventures of two itinerant sons as they seek employment, the novels explore the conspicuous wealth and brashness of American life. In a similar social context, Bullet Park (1969) tells of the struggle between two men, Hammer and Nailes, in an environment of wealth and envy. The uncharacteristic Falconer (1977) is the taut tale of the ex-academic Farragut's prison life as he attempts to assemble some meaning in his existence. Cheever's other fiction works include Oh, What a Paradise It Seems (1982), a novel; and The Stories of John Cheever (1978), which was acclaimed by both critics and public, winning a Pulitzer Prize and several other awards. Although a minor scandal accompanied the posthumous publication of his letters and journals, his reputation as an important figure should remain unscathed.

CHESNUTT, Charles W(addell) (1858–1932), African-American short-story writer and novelist, born in Cleveland, Ohio. He passed the Ohio Bar examination in 1887, but subsequently worked mainly as a legal stenographer. Highly praised by William Dean Howells, Chesnutt's stories combine literary sophistication with a deep immersion in the culture and folklore of blacks in the American South. They appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, and were collected in The Conjure Woman (1899) and The Wife of His Youth and Other Stories of the Color Line (1899). His novels, though less widely read now, but equally successful as the stories in his own day, include The House Behind the Cedars (1900), The Marrow of Tradition (1901), and The Colonel's Dream (1905).

CHESTERTON, G(ilbert) K(eith) (1874–1936), English novelist, essayist, poet, and journalist, born on Campden Hill, London, educated at St Paul's School, London, and the Slade School of Art. An outspoken and controversial journalist, Chesterton wrote for the Daily News, The Bookman, and the Illustrated London News, contributed to Eye Witness, and was editor of New Witness (1916–23) and G. K.'s Weekly (1925–36). His friend, Hilaire *Belloc, several of whose books Chesterton illustrated, greatly influenced his political and religious thinking; jointly nicknamed 'the Chesterbelloc' by *Shaw, both writers expressed their pro-Boer anti-Imperialist stance in The Speaker. Chesterton was fervently anti-capitalist, opposed to technological advance, and became president of the Distribution League advocating a fair distribution of the nation's land. His first novel, The Napoleon of Notting Hill (1904), is a romance set in a future where London boroughs become warring city-states. The Man Who Was Thursday (1908), aptly subtitled 'A Nightmare', deals with a conspiracy by anarchists, each named after one day of the week. Other novels, all with elements of fantasy, include The Ball and the Cross (1910), Manalive (1912), The Flying Inn (1914), and The Return of Don Quixote (1927). Chesterton wrote many volumes of short stories, the most popular of which are the Father Brown stories, featuring the humble East Anglian Roman Catholic priest as master detective. The first collection, The Innocence of Father Brown (1911), was followed by The Wisdom of Father Brown (1914), The Incredulity of Father Brown (1926), The Secret of Father Brown (1927), and The Scandal of Father Brown (1935). The best stories, such as 'The Absence of Mr Glass', 'The Chief Mourner of Marne', 'The Insoluble Problem', 'The Mirror of the Magistrate', 'The Queer Feet', 'The Sins of Prince Saradine', and 'The Worst Crime in the World', are brilliantly and poetically written, with the plot often turning on an ingenious, original paradox. Read closely, the stories reveal themselves not so much as detective stories but as parables, in which moral theology is presented as detection. Chesterton became the first President of the Detection Club on its foundation by Anthony *Berkeley in 1928. As a critic, his literary judgements were invariably interwoven with his moral views. His critical works include The Victorian Age in Literature (1913); literary studies of Robert Browning (1903), Heretics (1905), Charles Dickens (1906), Orthodoxy (1909), George Bernard Shaw (1910), William Blake (1910), Robert Louis Stevenson (1927), and Chaucer (1932); and biographies of St. Francis of Assisi (1923), William Cobbett (1925), and St. Thomas Aquinas (1933). Chesterton became a Roman Catholic in 1922; he set out his religious views in The Everlasting Man (1925). He wrote collections of essays, plays, A Short History of England (1917), several volumes of verse, often celebrating the Englishness of England, including Greybeards at Play (1900), The Wild Knight (1900), The Ballad of the White Horse (1911), and Collected Poems (1927; revised 1933), and an Autobiography (1936). See The Bodley Head G. K. Chesterton (1984), edited by P. J. *Kavanagh; Gilbert Keith Chesterton (1944), by Maisie Ward; and G. K. Chesterton: A Half Century of Views (1987), edited by D. J. Conlon.

Chicago Critics, a group of critics and scholars at the University of Chicago who pursued what they thought of as an authentic *Formalism, a return to Aristotle and the formal principles of art. Their leading spokesman was R. S. Crane (1886–1967), who saw criticism not as a discipline but as an assembly of 'frameworks' or 'languages' for approaching literature. The urgent questions to be asked concerned what one 'thinks with' rather than 'thinks about'. There are resemblances between the Chicago critics and the Russian Formalists, but the Chicago School was more purist, and would have thought Shklovsky's conception of an art that helps us recover the 'sensation of life' was sentimental, mere moralizing criticism in a new disguise. The work of this school is perhaps best exemplified in Critics and Criticism (1952), a collection of essays edited by Crane.

Childermass, The, a novel by W. *Lewis, published in 1928. The novel, the first part of Lewis's unfinished tetralogy The Human Age, is his most idiosyncratic—even eccentric—work. Part surrealist fantasy, part polemic, it opens with a magnificent topographical description of the plains of Dis, or Hell, where Lewis's protagonists, Pullman and Sattersthwaite, find themselves at the beginning of their comic odyssey into the Afterlife. In the course of their journey towards the Magnetic City (Purgatory), they pass through a number of different 'time-zones', in which their surroundings are alternately static or fluid, and undergo various changes of age, sex, and persona. The work satirizes, amongst other things, Einstein's Theory of Relativity and Bergson's theories of time, as well as the 'stream of consciousness' method of Gertrude *Stein and James *Joyce. It also offers an indictment of the mass political movements of communism and fascism, which Lewis regarded as equally pernicious.

CHILDERS, (Robert) Erskine (1870–1922), British novelist, born in London, educated at Haileybury, and at Trinity College, Oxford. He fought in the Boer War and served in the Royal Naval Air Service during the First World War. In peacetime he was a clerk in the House of Commons (1895–1910). From 1910 he agitated for Home Rule in Ireland and used his own yacht, the Asgard, to supply German arms to the Irish volunteers in 1914. Elected to the Dáil Éireann in 1921, he was Principal Secretary to the delegation for the Irish–UK treaty. After the establishment of the Irish Free State, Childers joined the IRA, becoming Director of Publicity. He was court-martialled and executed in 1922. In The Riddle of the Sands (1903), his only work of fiction, two amateurs attempt to foil a German plan to mass a fleet of boats and barges in the Baltic for an invasion attempt on Britain. The novel is narrated by the socially adept Carruthers of the Foreign Office who joins Davies aboard the Dulcibella, a converted lifeboat cruising among the Frisian Islands. Together they ply the shallow channels between the sands off the coasts of Germany and Holland in pursuit of Dollmann, a former officer in the Royal Navy, now employed by the Germans. The chase builds up as the two amateurs gradually expose the Germans' plans. Though the book was a sensational bestseller, Childers's aim, and achievement, was to draw attention to the menace of an enemy yet to be acknowledged.

CHILDRESS, Alice (1920–), African-American playwright and novelist; born in Charleston, South Carolina, she grew up in Harlem, New York. She became an actress in the late 1930s and was director of the American Negro Theater School from 1941 to 1952. Among the best-known of her many plays are Trouble in Mind (1955), an inventive exploration of the theme of racial stereotyping, and Wedding Band (1961), centring on an inter-racial erotic relationship in the Southern states. In both her dramatic writings and her prose fiction she is noted for the uncompromising candour with which she treats controversial issues. Her novels include A Hero ain't Nothing but a Sandwich (1973), a harshly objective narrative of juvenile drug addiction, and A Short Walk (1979), which chronicles the life of a black woman in the early decades of the twentieth century. Among her other works is Like One of the Family: Conversations from a Domestic's Life (1956), a collection of wryly satirical monologues in the voice of 'Mildred', a black housemaid.

CHILDRESS, Mark (1957–), American novelist, born in Monroeville, Alabama, educated at the University of Alabama. His first novel, A World Made of Fire (1985), gained considerable attention for its sensitive evocation of rural Alabama in the first two decades of the twentieth century, and focuses on Stella, a young woman coming to terms with the death of her 'poor white' mother in a fire. V for Victor (1989) tells of an adolescent who unwittingly becomes involved with German spies during the Second World War. His third novel, Tender (1990), is epic in scope and concerns the origins and early career of a rock and roll star who bears more than a passing resemblance to Elvis Presley. The Civil Rights Movement and other liberating developments of the 1960s form the basis of Crazy in Alabama (1993). He has also published childrens' fiction.

CHIN, Frank (1940–), Asian-American novelist and playwright, born in Berkeley, California, educated at the University of California, Berkeley, the State University of Iowa, and the University of California, Santa Barbara. Chin, who was the first Chinese-American brakeman on the Southern Pacific Railroad, later became the first contemporary Chinese-American playwright to have his work staged in New York at the American Place Theatre: The Chickencoop Chinaman was performed in 1972, as was The Year of the Dragon (televised on PBS in 1975). He was a founding member of the East West Players, the longest-running Asian-American theatre company in the nation. For his work as co-editor of Aiiieeeee! An Anthology of Asian American Writers, a seminal anthology published in 1975 by Howard University Press, and for his recovery of 'lost' Asian-American authors such as Toshio Mori and John Okada, he is often considered the grandfather of *Asian-American literature. His own more recent work includes a collection of short fiction, The Chinaman Pacific and Frisco RR Co (1988), which includes excerpts from his unpublished novel, 'A Chinese Lady Dies'; the Big Aiiieeeee! An Anthology of Chinese and Japanese American Literature (1991); and the novels Donald Duk (1991), a Bildungsroman set in San Francisco's Chinatown, and Gunga Din Highway (1994).

CHINODYA, Shimmer (1957–), Zimbabwean novelist, born in Gweru, educated at the University of Zimbabwe and at the University of Iowa. He became editor-in-chief of the Curriculum Development Unit at the Zimbabwean Ministry of Education. Under the name 'B. S. Chiraska' he is the author of a number of educational textbooks and stories for children. Dew in the Morning (1982), his first novel, projects an affirmative view of post-Independence Zimbabwe through the understated lyricism with which it treats the human and natural aspects of its rural setting. The psychologically acute Farai's Girls (1984) investigates the nature of human relations through the chief protagonist's liaisons with a succession of girlfriends. In Harvest of Thorns (1989), the passage from adolescence to adulthood is dramatically projected in the narrative of growth to maturity against the background of the Zimbabwean War of Liberation. Chinodya is represented as a poet in T. O. McLoughlin's edition of New Writing in Rhodesia (1976).

CHINWEIZU (1943–), Nigerian poet and critic, born in Eluama Isuikwuato, in Imo State, Eastern Nigeria, educated at Government College, Afikpo, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and the State University of New York at Buffalo. In the late 1970s, he taught Afro-American Studies at San Jose University, California. Chinweizu's statement that the 'great unfinished business of African decolonization and development is my theme' is central to his poetry and criticism. Energy Crisis and Other Poems (1978) and Invocations and Admonitions (1986) are among his collections of poems, which engage a range of moral and political themes with reference to the whole of Africa. His verse reflects the rich oral traditions of African writing espoused in Toward the Decolonization of African Literature (with O. Jemie and I. Madubuike; two volumes, 1980, 1981), his best-known critical work. Chinweizu's other publications include The West and the Rest of Us (1975), a passionately polemical critique of economic and cultural exploitation in the Third World, and the satirical writings collected in The Footrace (1981).

CHIPASULA, Frank M(kalawile) (1949–), Malawian poet, born in Luanshya, Zambia; he was educated at the Universities of Zambia and Malawi and became a citizen of Malawi. After working as a freelance broadcaster with the Malawi Broadcasting Corporation and as an editor with the National Education Company of Zambia, he came under threat from the Malawian authorities as a political dissenter and entered voluntary exile in America in 1978. He gained higher degrees at Brown University and Yale and became an Associate Professor of Black Literature at the University of Nebraska. His earlier work is contained in Visions and Reflections (1972) and O Earth Wait for Me (1980), both published in Zambia. The long poem Nightwatcher, Nightsong (1986), the first of his books to be published in America, was followed in 1991 by the substantial collection Whispers in the Wings. Chipasula's poetry is characterized by the passionate conviction and power of its testimony to conditions of tyranny and injustice in Malawi. His verse draws equally on the folk idioms of Malawi and Zambia and the ironic sophistication of modern Western traditions. He is the editor of the anthologies A Decade of Poetry (1980) and When My Brothers Come Home: Poems from Central and Southern Africa (1985).

CHOMSKY, Noam (1928–), American critic and linguist, born in Philadelphia, educated at the University of Pennsylvania. He has held many academic posts in America and Britain, and in 1976 he became Professor of Linguistics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. For Chomsky the approaches to language of both traditionalists and structuralists were flawed or short-sighted. He saw the learning mind as neither a genetic reservoir nor a tabula rasa but the locus of a set of innate possibilities or capacities; above all, the ability to build entirely new sentences rather than (however elaborately) copy old ones. Chomsky spoke of the 'deep structures' of language, and of the relevance of a 'generative grammar', that is, of a set of rules which would permit the generation of coherent and intelligible sentences in a given language. 'Obviously', he wrote in Aspects of the Theory of Syntax (1965), 'every speaker of a language has mastered and internalized a generative grammar that expresses his knowledge of the language. This is not to say he is aware of the rules . . . or that his statements about his intuitive knowledge of the language are necessarily accurate . . . Thus a generative grammar attempts to specify what the speaker actually knows, not what he may report about his knowledge.' Chomsky's other major works are Syntactic Structures (1957) and Cartesian Linguistics (1966). His concept of 'linguistic competence'—what a native speaker of a language may reasonably be expected to be able to say and understand—has been adapted by *Reader-response theory, where the idea of an analogous 'literary competence' is often invoked. Chomsky is a radical critic of his country's foreign policies and was an important opponent of the US involvement in Vietnam. Among his best polemical works are American Power and the New Mandarins (1969), Deterring Democracy (1991), Year 501: The Conquest Continues (1993), Rethinking Camelot: JFK, the Vietnam War and U.S. Political Culture (1993), and World Orders, Old and New (1994). He has continued eloquently and indefatigably to campaign for the rights of repressed minorities in the Middle East and elsewhere.

CHRISTIE, Dame Agatha (Mary Clarissa), née Miller (1890–1976), British *detective fiction writer, born in Torquay, Devon; she studied singing and piano in Paris, and in 1914 married Archibald Christie, an officer in the Royal Flying Corps. As a hospital dispenser during the First World War she acquired a knowledge of poisons which she later put to good use in her detective stories. In 1926 an attack of amnesia, brought on by the death of her mother and the impending break-up of her marriage, led to a much-publicized disappearance, which ended when she was discovered in a hotel in Harrogate. She was divorced in 1928 and in 1930 married the archaeologist Max Mallowan, whom she accompanied on excavations in Syria and Iraq. In The Mysterious Affair at Styles (1920), the first of her detective novels, she introduced Hercule Poirot, the Belgian detective who reappeared in many of her sixty-six novels. Of the Poirot stories, the best are perhaps The Murder of Roger Ackroyd (1926), Lord Edgware Dies (1933; US title Thirteen at Dinner), Murder on the Orient Express (1934; US title Murder in the Calais Coach), The A.B.C. Murders (1936; US title The Alphabet Murders), Cards on the Table (1936), One, Two, Buckle My Shoe (1940; US title The Patriotic Murders, also published in the USA as An Overdose of Death), Evil under the Sun (1941), and The Hollow (1946; US title Murder after Hours). In The Murder at the Vicarage (1930), however, she introduced another detective, Miss Marple, an elderly spinster; the novels in which she appears are in some ways to be preferred to the Poirot stories. The best include The Body in the Library (1942), The Moving Finger (1942), A Murder Is Announced (1950), They Do It with Mirrors (1952; US title Murder with Mirrors), 4.50 from Paddington (1957; US title What Mrs McGillicuddy Saw!; also published in the USA as Murder She Said). Other novels, featuring neither Poirot nor Miss Marple, are Ten Little Niggers (1939; US title And Then There Were None; also published in the USA as Ten Little Indians), The Pale Horse (1961), and Endless Night (1967). She also published a large number of detective short stories, two volumes of verse, six romantic novels under the pseudonym Mary Westmacott, two self-portraits (Come Tell Me How You Live, 1946; An Autobiography, 1977), and some fifteen plays, adapted from her novels and short stories, including The Mousetrap (from the novelette Three Blind Mice, 1948), which has run continuously in London since 1952. Her enormous international success is perhaps due to her ingenuity in contriving plots and misdirecting the reader. Her style is undistinguished, though brisk, and her characterization is adequate for the demands of the genre. There is a biography by Janet Morgan (1984); see also R. Barnard, A Talent to Deceive (1980), P. D. Maida and N. B. Spornick, Murder She Wrote (1982), and C. Osborne, The Life and Crimes of Agatha Christie (1982).

CHRISTOPHER, John, pseudonym of Christopher Samuel YOUD (1922–), British writer, born in Lancashire, who also published novels under his own name, and as Peter Graaf and Hilary Ford. As Christopher, he became familiar to a large readership as the successor to J. *Wyndham in the field of *science fiction, and in novels such as The Death of Grass (1956) and The World in Winter (1962) he streamlined the 'cozy catastrophe' tale created by his mentor. This form of disaster narrative depicts an England threatened by catastrophe, and a family escaping into the countryside in search of new rural roots. Subsequently, he specialized in science fiction for adolescents, notably the tales collected in The Tripods Trilogy (1980), The Sword of the Spirits Trilogy (1980), and A Dusk of Demons (1993).

CHURCH, Richard Thomas (1893–1972), British poet and novelist, born in London, educated at Dulwich Hamlet School. He was a civil servant from 1909 to 1933, when he became a publisher's reader. The Flood of Life, his first collection of verse, appeared in 1917; some seventeen further volumes included The Dream (1922), News From the Mountain (1932), and The Burning Bush (1967). Church's poetry reflects his belief in the poet's duty to frame accessible affirmations of permanent human values. Meditation, emotion, and observation combine to Wordsworthian effect in his best work. With the exception of the free verse of Mood Without Measure (1928), he almost invariably used traditional verse forms. His career as a novelist began with Oliver's Daughter in 1930; notable among his numerous other novels are The Porch (1937) and The Dangerous Years (1956). The lyrically descriptive qualities of his verse are present in his fiction, which he regarded as continuous with his activities as a poet. Among his other works are three volumes of autobiography, Over the Bridge (1955), The Golden Sovereign (1957), and The Voyage Home (1964); the biography Mary Shelley (1928); and the critical study The Growth of the English Novel (1966).

CHURCHILL, Caryl (1938–), British playwright, born in London, educated in Canada and at Oxford University. She first attracted critical notice with Owners (1972), a sardonic comedy about the effects of property and profiteering on personal relationships. This was followed by Objections to Sex and Violence (1975), an exploration of the subjects of the title; Light Shining in Buckinghamshire (1975), about radical politics in the Cromwellian era; Vinegar Tom (1976), about the witchhunts and misogyny of the same era; and Cloud Nine (1979), a serio-comedy which moves from the colonies in Victorian times to contemporary London, and requires some of its actors to embody more than one gender as well as more than one character, by way of debating the uncertainties and confusions of sexuality. The impressive Top Girls (1982) opens with a surreal dinner party, hosted by the high-achieving managing director of a secretarial agency, Marlene, whose guests include exemplary women from history and legend, but in the realistic second half some harsh suggestions are made about the nature of women's 'liberation', Thatcherism, and the 'enterprise culture' of the 1980s. There followed Fen (1983), a portrait of a troubled rural community in East Anglia, and researched by the author in conjunction with the Joint Stock Company, which presented it; Serious Money (1987), a Jonsonian comedy of humours about financial practice and malpractice in the City of London; Mad Forest (1990), the result of field trips to Romania with drama students, and about that country before, during, and after the uprising against Ceausescu; and The Skriker (1994), a highly visual piece in which creatures from fairytales and folklore invade the lives of two working-class girls. Caryl Churchill is a socialist and a feminist, but her best plays are notable for their intelligent and open-minded exploration of social, political, and moral issues, as well as for their stylistic inventiveness.

CHURCHILL, Winston (1871–1947), American novelist, born in St Louis, Missouri, educated at the US Naval Academy, Annapolis, Maryland. Churchill's first novel, The Celebrity: An Episode (1898), was a satire on New York politics and journalism. Richard Carvel (1899), set during the American Revolution, brought Churchill fame and established his métier for romantic fiction with a historical setting in the American past. The Crisis (1901) concerns St Louis at the time of the Civil War, while The Crossing (1904) has affinities with the 'Leatherstocking' novels of James Fenimore Cooper with its background of the American frontier towards the close of the eighteenth century. Coniston (1906), Mr. Crewe's Career (1908), and A Far Country (1915) are explorations of the political and economic climate of pre-war America. Churchill, a friend of President Theodore Roosevelt, was the Progressive Party candidate for the governorship of New Hampshire in 1912. His late works, notably The Uncharted Way (1940), are mainly essays in Christian doctrine.

Novelist to a Generation: The Life and Thought of Winston Churchill (1976) is a study by Robert W. Schneider.

CHURCHILL, Sir Winston (Leonard) Spencer (1874–1965), British statesman and historian, born in Blenheim Palace, educated at Harrow and Sandhurst. While on military service in Cuba, India, and Africa from 1895 to 1899, he acted as war correspondent for various periodicals. Among his early publications are the campaign histories The Story of the Malakand Field Force (1898) and The River War (1899). His only novel, Savrola, a politically acute tale of revolution, appeared in 1900, the year he entered parliament as MP for Oldham. In 1955 he retired from an illustrious and often controversial political career after a second term as Prime Minister. His inspiring leadership, which drew on his remarkable powers of oratory, throughout the Second World War established him in the general regard as the greatest statesman of his age; War Speeches 1940–1945 was published in 1946. The magisterial The Second World War (6 volumes, 1948–54) is the most valued of his histories, which also include The World Crisis (4 volumes, 1923–9), a study of the First World War, and A History of the English-Speaking Peoples (4 volumes, 1956–8), a survey of Britain and its influence from pre-history to the modern era. In 1953 he was awarded a Nobel Prize. Among Churchill's other works are the autobiographical My Early Life (1930), the biography of his celebrated forebear Marlborough (4 volumes, 1933–8), and Great Contemporaries (1937), which contains perceptive portraits of T. E. *Lawrence and others Churchill admired. Thirty-four volumes of his Collected Works appeared between 1973 and 1976. His son Randolph Churchill (1911–68) wrote the first two volumes (1966, 1967) of an official biography; a further six volumes (1971–88) were produced by Martin *Gilbert.

CISNEROS, Sandra (1945–), American poet and novelist of Mexican-American extraction, born in Chicago, educated at the *Iowa Writers' Workshop. Her novel The House on Mango Street (1983) draws heavily upon childhood memories and an unadorned childlike idiom in its depiction of life in the Chicano community. Issues of racial and sexual oppression, poverty, and violence are explored in a number of interconnected vignettes which together form a modified autobiographical structure. Woman Hollering Creek and Other Stories (1991) continues the exploration of ethnic identity within the patriarchal context of Chicano culture. Bad Boys (1980) and My Wicked Wicked Ways (1987) are volumes of poems. See LATINO/LATINA LITERATURE IN ENGLISH.

CLAMPITT, Amy (1920–94), American poet, born into a Quaker family at New Providence, Iowa; she was educated at Grinnell College, and spent much of her working life in New York publishing. Her writing has been a case of spectacular late development: Multitudes, Multitudes appeared in 1974, and she was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1982. Clampitt's breakthrough came with The Kingfisher (1983), which won extravagant praise for its striking descriptions of natural phenomena ('Sea Mouse', 'Lindenbloom', 'The Sun Underfoot Amongst the Sundews'), its sumptuously literary language bringing comparisons with Hopkins, Dylan *Thomas, and Marianne *Moore. Her poems often involve journeys, classical myth, images of femaleness (as in 'A Procession at Candlemas'), and a sense of the natural world as numinous. What the Light Was Like (1985) exemplifies Clampitt's attachment to English and American landscape, and Romantic poets such as Keats. Archaic Figure (1987) favours a generally simpler, less cluttered diction to portray travels in Greece and Venice, and the lives of women writers. Westward (1991) concerns migrations: of peoples and lifestyles, plants and birds, across America.

CLARK, Brian (1932–), British playwright, born in Bournemouth, educated at the Central School of Speech and Drama and at Nottingham University; he became a teacher and, from 1968 to 1972, a staff tutor in drama at the University of Hull. His stage plays have attempted to give a human dimension to large social and political issues. They include Can You Hear Me at the Back? (1979), in which a middle-aged architect reassesses a life that has become both personally and professionally unfulfilling—he is in a sterile marriage, and has been responsible for the development of a drab and ugly 'new town'; and The Petition (1986), about the wife of a reactionary old general who, after fifty years of marriage, becomes involved in the campaign against nuclear weapons. But Clark remains best known for Whose Life Is It, Anyway? (1978), which involves a paralysed car crash victim's attempts to defy those officiously keeping him alive and becomes a powerful, yet often humorous, argument for euthanasia. That piece was adapted for the theatre from television, a medium for which Clark has written many 'one-off' plays and the serial Telford's Change.

CLARK, Kenneth (Mackenzie), Lord (1903–83), British art historian and critic, educated at Winchester and at Trinity College, Oxford. The influence of both Ruskin and *Berenson is evident in his first work, The Gothic Revival (1928). Of his many public appointments he was director of the National Gallery (1934–45), Slade Professor of Fine Art at Oxford (1946–50), and Chairman of the Arts Council (1953–60). In 1953 he published his greatest work The Nude: A Study of Ideal Art. His television series Civilization, published as a book in 1969, gained him a wide audience and a peerage; it argued that truly civilized art both expresses its times and transcends them. Other works include Leonardo da Vinci (1939), Florentine Painting (1945), Landscape into Art (1949), and two volumes of autobiography, Another Part of the Wood (1974) and The Other Half (1977).

CLARK BEKEDEREMO, J(ohn) P(epper) (1935–), Nigerian dramatist, poet, and critic, born in Kiagbodo, Ijaw country, Niger Delta, educated at the University of Ibadan. Clark travelled to the USA as Parvin Fellow at Princeton in 1962; his view of America, in his hard-hitting, splenetic America, Their America (1964), caused considerable controversy. The poetry contained in Poems (1962) and A Reed in the Tide (1965) combines African and European techniques to unusual effect. Casualties: Poems 1966–68 (1970) contains mainly poems which mourn the human losses suffered as a result of the Nigerian Civil War (1967–70). Poems from all three collections have been published in A Decade of Tongues: Selected Poems 1958–68 (1981). Further collections include State of the Union (1985) and Mandela and Other Poems (1988). Drawing from Ijaw mythology and ritual, Clark's plays are more directly committed to African cultural values than his poetry. Those values imply a cosmos similar to Greek tragedy in his best-known play, Song of a Goat (1961, perf. 1962), written in a jagged blank verse. Song of a Goat, The Masquerade, and The Raft, all set in the Niger Delta, were collected in Three Plays (1964). Clark's research into Ijaw traditional myths and legends at Ibadan's Institute of African Studies has resulted in his scholarly edition and translation of The Ozidi Saga (1978) which has inspired both a play, Ozidi (1966), and a film, The Ozidi of Atazi (1969). The play, like the saga, focuses on Ozidi, a posthumous son born and raised to avenge his father's murder, and tragically killed in war by his own comrades. The film, directed by Frank Speed in close collaboration with Clark, records highlights of a seven-day festival in which villagers from the Niger Delta re-enact Ozidi's fate. The Boat, The Return Home, and Full Circle, each performed in 1981, are published in The Bikoroa Plays (1985). His Collected Plays appeared in 1992. Clark's series of essays on African poetry have been collected in The Example of Shakespeare (1970).

CLARKE, Arthur C(harles) (1917–), British writer, born in Somerset, educated at King's College, London. He is the only contemporary British author to dominate the entire field of *science fiction. He was noted for the originality and clarity of his non-fiction, much of it promulgating the lure and necessity of space travel, and as early as 1945 originated in an article the concept of the geosynchronous communication satellite. In his visions of the future he embodied a sense of the wisdom of technological progress. From 1946, with the publication of 'Rescue Party' in the American Astounding, Clarke's reputation became established, but it was with his fifth novel, Childhood's End (1953), that his true voice became heard; in this meditation on man's evolutionary destiny, a remoteness is combined with the urgent narrative techniques of the American *pulp tradition. Its hypnotic effect can also be seen in other novels, such as The City and the Stars (1956), The Deep Range (1957), Rendezvous with Rama (1973), and The Fountains of Paradise (1979). His shorter fiction appeared in several collections including Expedition to Earth (1953), Reach for Tomorrow (1956), Tales from the White Hart (1957), The Other Side of the Sky (1958), and The Nine Billion Names of God (1967). Clarke achieved wide recognition when his early short story was adapted by Stanley Kubrick into the film 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968). See also UTOPIA AND ANTI-UTOPIA.

CLARKE, Austin (1896–1974), Irish poet and dramatist, born in Dublin, educated at University College, Dublin, where he became an English Assistant in 1917. His first volume of verse, a reworking of the legend of Diarmid and Grainne entitled The Vengeance of Fionn, appeared in 1917. Succeeding volumes included The Sword of the West (1921) and Pilgrimage (1929); these works made use of Irish myth and history from the medieval era, a period largely overlooked by *Yeats and his followers. He lived in England as a literary journalist from 1921 to 1937, when he returned to Dublin, devoting himself until the early 1950s to his interest in verse-drama. The Plot Succeeds (1950), which characteristically incorporates comic elements, is recognized as the best of his many plays. Collected Plays appeared in 1963. The historical dimension dominant in his earlier poetry was supplanted by more immediate personal and cultural concerns in Night and Morning of 1938. Absorbed in theatrical activities, he produced no further collections until Ancient Lights of 1955, which initiated his work's satirical engagement with aspects of modern Irish life. Thereafter he wrote and published poetry prolifically until his death. Flight to Africa (1963) contains a number of his finest poems; The Horse Eaters (1960) and A Sermon on Swift (1968) are among his other distinguished late collections. His poetry is noted for its metrical and musical intricacies, which draw on the traditions of Gaelic verse, and the sensual precision of its imagery. He also wrote three novels, The Bright Temptation (1932), The Singing Men at Cashel (1936), and The Sun Dances at Easter (1952), each of which was banned by the Irish authorities, and two volumes of autobiography, Twice Round the Black Church (1962) and A Penny in the Clouds (1968). His Collected Poems appeared in 1974. Susan Halpern's Austin Clarke: His Life and Works was published in 1974.

CLARKE, Austin C(hesterfield) (1934–), Barbados-born novelist, journalist, and broadcaster; he went to Canada in 1955 and studied at the University of Toronto. He has worked for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, served as cultural attaché at the Barbados Embassy in Washington, and taught at several universities including Yale. His first two novels, Survivors of the Crossing (1964) and Amongst Thistles and Thorns (1965), depict the impoverished conditions and deprivation of most people in Barbados. There followed three novels, The Meeting Point (1967), Storm of Fortune (1973), and The Bigger Light (1975), which provide the most complete fictional portrait that exists of black Caribbean immigrants in Canada. Collections of stories such as When He Was Free and Young and Used To Wear Silks (1971), When Women Rule (1985), and Nine Men Who Laughed (1985), extended this portrait and helped to establish Clarke's reputation as Canada's best-known black author. Later stories include In This City (1992). While his fiction exposes the discrimination and hardships faced by West Indian immigrants in Canada, it also reveals much good-humoured resilience. At the same time, Clarke shows little sympathy for the mechanistic habits of the dominant, urban culture in Canada. His novel The Prime Minister (1977) achieved some notoriety for its portrait of political corruption in Barbados, where it was banned. Proud Empires (1986), a comic novel about politics in 1950s Barbados, vividly evokes the sociocultural aspirations of the people. Thus his fiction combines both serious analysis and rollicking humour which is evident particularly in the pungent wit and vigorous speech of his characters. Clarke has received many awards, including the Casa de Las Americas prize (1980).

CLARKE, Gillian (1937–), British poet, born in Cardiff, educated at University College, Cardiff. She became a news researcher with the BBC in 1958, lectured at Gwent College of Art and Design (1975–84), and has worked extensively as a teacher of creative writing. From 1976 to 1984 she edited the Anglo-Welsh Review. Although her first two collections of poetry, Snow on the Mountain (1972) and The Sundial (1978), were favourably received, it was not until the appearance of Letter from a Far Country in 1982 that her work was widely acclaimed. Selected Poems (1985) and Letting in the Rumour (1989) confirmed her standing as one of the most important of contemporary British women poets. Many early poems displayed her ability to imbue firmly particularized incidents with lyrical and visionary significances. Among her most impressive work are the long sequences 'Letter from a Far Country' and 'Cofiant', exploratory meditations in which local and personal experience fuses with historical and cultural themes drawn from her family's past. The disciplined flexibility of structure in her verse continues to display a high level of accomplishment in The King of Britain's Daughter (1993).

CLAVELL, James (1924–94), British writer, film director, and producer, born in Australia, educated at the University of Birmingham. Captured by the Japanese during the Second World War, he spent three years in Changi, the infamous Japanese prisoner-of-war camp in Singapore; this formed the background to his first best-selling novel King Rat (1962), which was also filmed. Despite his experience, he has remained fascinated by the East, and his gift for an exciting story, impressively researched, has produced Tai Pan (1966); Shogun (1976, which was both filmed and made the subject of a TV series), an enormous novel on the impact of the West on seventeenth-century Japan; Noble House (1981); Whirlwind (1986); and Gai-jin (1993).

Clayhanger Trilogy, a series of three novels by Arnold *Bennett. Clayhanger (1910), set in the Five Towns (the 'Potteries' in Staffordshire), tells the story of the boyhood and young manhood of Edwin Clayhanger, son of the autocratic and strong-willed printer Darius Clayhanger who is determined that Edwin shall follow him into the printing works rather than pursue his own bent as an architect. The novel opens as Edwin leaves school at the age of 16, and describes his abortive rebellions and eventual acceptance of his fate, as he takes over the business on his father's death. The provincial Methodist background, Darius's penniless childhood and his rescue from the workhouse, and the growing prosperity and cultural aspirations of the family are described in sharply observed cumulative detail. The novel provides a wealth of accurate documentation about the manners and industry of the region; its characters include the handsome and domineering Auntie Hamps, Big James the printer, and various members of the socially superior Orgreaves family. Hilda Lessways (1911) describes the efforts of independent fatherless Hilda to make a career for herself as a journalist; her impulsive (and, as it turns out, bigamous) marriage to the romantically shady lawyer George Cannon; their life together as proprietors of 'Cannon's Boarding House' in Brighton; his exposure and flight; and her renewed interest in her former admirer Edwin Clayhanger. These Twain (1916) covers the ups and downs of the lively and often tempestuous marriage of Edwin and Hilda (who now has a son from her first liaison); her semi-accidental sighting of Cannon in Dartmoor prison; and the death of Auntie Hamps. The Roll Call (1918), a less successful sequel, follows the career of Hilda's son George as a London architect, and ends as he enlists in the army.

CLEMO, Jack (Reginald John) (1916–94), British poet, born near St Austell; he received elementary education at Trethosa village school. During childhood he suffered attacks of blindness, and became deaf prior to the complete loss of his sight in 1955. He began writing in his teens out of what he described as the 'instinctive effort to come to terms with abnormal circumstances'. His novel Wilding Graft was published to critical acclaim in 1948. The Clay Verge (1951), his first collection of poetry, was followed by numerous further volumes, which include The Map of Clay (1961), Cactus on Carmel (1967), The Echoing Tip (1971), and A Different Drummer (1986), Selected Poems (1988), Approach to Murano (1993), and The Cured Arno (1995). Much of his strongly crafted and austere poetry is of an idiosyncratically religious character, affirming the visionary qualities he located in the bare landscapes around the Cornish clay workings. He also repeatedly dealt with the theme of the compatibility of Christianity and eroticism. The Invading Gospel (1958) revealed his theological conceptions. He published two autobiographical works, Confession of a Rebel (1949) and The Marriage of a Rebel (1980). A further novel, The Shadowed Bed, originally drafted in 1938, appeared in 1986.

Clergyman's Daughter, A, a novel by George *Orwell, published in 1935. Orwell's first novel has an erratic story-line that is not entirely justified by the wanderings of its heroine Dorothy Hare, the clergyman's daughter of the title; after an attack of amnesia, she is plunged into the miseries of unemployment and vagrancy. The contrast between the setting of her restricted, church-going life and the harshness of the pauper's environment is thoroughly Orwellian; the self-conscious modishness of the more experimental passages of writing is much less so. Orwell is really engaged in two projects, seizing the opportunity for social critique in the course of analysing the nature of his spinster heroine's sexual repressions. In the end, the 'condition of England' elements seem irrelevant to the personal development of a character whose facile rehabilitation does not resolve the psychological tensions built up around powerful feelings of disgust and repugnance at the idea of physical contact. Orwell is not fully in control of his design, despite the evocativeness of his descriptions of life among hop-pickers in Kent, the desolation in his portrait of down-and-outs in Trafalgar Square, and the trenchancy of his account of the Dickensian private school, all reflecting aspects of his own experience.

CLIFF, Michelle (1946–), Jamaican novelist, poet, short-story writer, and editor, born in Kingston, Jamaica, educated at Wagner College and at the Warburg Institute, London University. She began writing after becoming involved in the women's movement in the 1970s and has become internationally known through essays, articles, lectures, and workshops on racism and feminism. Race, gender, and power are recurring themes in Cliff's writing. The main protagonist of her novels, Abeng (1984) and No Telephone to Heaven (1987), is Clare Savage, a light-skinned Jamaican who first comes to realize the relationship between colour and status, and then becomes a revolutionary. Cliff has also written autobiographical works, poetry, and prose poems, including Claiming an Identity They Taught Me To Despise (1980) and The Land of Look Behind: Prose and Poetry (1985). More recent fiction includes a collection of short stories, Bodies of Water (1990), and Free Enterprise (1993), a novel.

Clockwork Orange, A, a novel by Anthony *Burgess, published in 1962. The narrative is by 15-year-old hooligan Alex, using a teenage slang, 'Nadsat', invented by Burgess; it is set in an anarchic urban culture of the near future. Alex has a passion for music and hi-fi, and is a drug user. He and his friends embark on orgies of violence and destruction, in one of which a woman dies. In prison Alex is selected as guinea-pig for a form of aversion therapy devised by a social reformer. Considered a successful subject, he is released early. At home he discovers that his music and drugs have been confiscated by the authorities and a stranger is boarding in his room. Listening to Mozart in a record shop he finds that the therapy has destroyed his love of music. He is recognized and attacked by his former victims, who include a writer whom his gang crippled and whose wife they raped. In hospital Alex realizes he is now the centre of a political scandal over the therapy he has been given. The novel ends with Alex the helpless tool of government propaganda, but, enjoying Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and accompanying images of violence, ambiguously declaring himself 'cured'. The title is taken from a manuscript by the writer Alex's gang assaulted, which rejects the option of treating people like machines. The novel is about moral choice, most explicitly proposed by the repeated 'What's it going to be then?' at the head of each of its three sections.

CLOETE, Stuart (1897–1976), South African novelist and short-story writer, born in Paris, and educated in England. He served in the First World War, and remained in the British Army until 1925, subsequently taking up farming in South Africa. A prolific writer, he is best known for his trilogy of realistic historical novels about the Afrikaners: Turning Wheels (1937), which was banned in South Africa; Watch for the Dawn (1939), about the Great Trek; and Rags of Glory (1963), about their defeat in the Anglo-Boer War (1899–1902). Many of his novels, such as The Soldier's Peach (1959) and The Looking Glass (1963), are adventure stories set in bush or veld, and have been compared with the works of Rider *Haggard. Mamba (1955) and Gazella (1958) are set in the Congo and Mozambique respectively. In The Thousand and One Nights of Jean Macaque (1965) the eponymous hero is an old man nostalgically looking back on his past as a young rake in fin de siècle Paris. Other novels include The Curve and the Tusk (1953), on elephants and their poachers, and The Abductors (1970), which deals with the white slave traffic. The Silver Trumpet and Other African Stories (1961) contains some of his finest short stories. A Victorian Son (1971) and The Gambler (1973) are autobiographies.

COBBING, Bob (1920–), British poet, born in Enfield, Middlesex, educated at Enfield Grammar School and Bognor Training College. After working as a teacher and bookshop manager, he became a freelance writer and performer of his work in 1967. He has also edited several magazines, notably Kroklok, and publishes editions of experimental poetry under the Writers' Forum imprint. Although some of his early poems followed conventional procedures, Cobbing is best known for his dedicated pursuit of the possibilities of *concrete poetry and sound poetry. Sound Poems: An ABC in Sound (1965), his first substantial publication, was followed by some ninety titles; among the volumes of his collected works which have appeared since 1977 are A Peal in Air (1978), Vowels and Consequences (1985), and Improvisation Is a Dirty Word: Collected Poems 12 (1990). The distinctions between textual and graphic art are obviated in Cobbing's writing, words and letters forming the material for highly ingenious visual arrangements. He regards his poems in their printed forms as scores for performance and has participated in most of the International Sound Poetry Festivals in Europe and America in recent decades. Cocktail Party, The, a verse-play by T. S. *Eliot, first produced in 1949 and published in 1950. Beginning and ending at a London cocktail party, the play traces the spiritual fortunes of Edward and Lavinia Chamberlayne and the former's mistress, Celia Coplestone. Central to the thematic development is the presence of the uninvited guest who is later revealed to be the eminent psychiatrist Sir Henry Harcourt-Reilly; the figure and his role in regenerating the Chamberlaynes' moribund marriage are obliquely modelled on Heracles in the Alcestis of Euripides. Sir Henry is the foremost of 'the Guardians', whose vaguely defined but benevolent functions are integral to the implicit theology of redemption around which the play is structured; through the agency of the Guardians, who provide the machinery of the plot, the principal characters are all led to greater self-knowledge and an increased awareness of the interdependence of individuals. The play ends with the Chamberlaynes awaiting their guests for another cocktail party, which promises to be a happier occasion. The Cocktail Party is notable for its apparently secular character, beneath the surface of which its moral and religious dimensions are unobtrusively adumbrated. While its verse is highly effective in suggesting the patterns and rhythms of speech, the play has less of the metaphoric life to be found in *The Family Reunion, his earlier play, which led to Eliot's admission that it was 'perhaps an open question whether there is any poetry in the play at all'.

COETZEE, J(ohn) M(ichael) (1940–), South African novelist, born in Cape Town, and educated at the Universities of Cape Town and Texas. Dusklands (1974) consists of two novellas ('The Vietnam Project' and 'The Narrative of Jacobus Coetzee'); madness and hunger for power on the part of both protagonists, one a technocrat obsessed by the Vietnam war, and the other a Boer patriarch on the verge of paranoia, are at the heart of both. His next three novels may be described as Kafkaesque parables of a South African society in danger of disintegration. Unlike his compatriot André *Brink, Coetzee's austere novels explore the Afrikaner psyche in a more oblique, stylistically more innovative, though equally apocalyptic manner. In the Heart of the Country (1977) depicts a young woman in an isolated farmstead who slides into anarchic violence and madness; it was made into a distinguished film, Dust (1985), with Jane Birkin, directed by Marion Hansel. Waiting for the Barbarians (1980; James Tait Black Memorial Prize), set in a desolate, mythical country, is narrated by a magistrate who faces crucial decisions when the inquisitorial Colonel Joll warns him against a 'barbarian' invasion. The implacably bleak allegory Life and Times of Michael K (1983; Booker Prize) has as its protagonist an ugly and slow-witted gardener in a Cape Town park; caught up in civil war, he desperately tries to find safety for himself and his mother. Foe (1986) is a retelling of Defoe's Robinson Crusoe in a contemporary context. Set in Cape Town, Age of Iron (1990) focuses on a mother, a retired classics teacher, writing to her daughter, who is dying of cancer. Her observations are those of an anxious white liberal. The Master of Petersburg (1994) is a novel based on the later life of Dostoevsky. Coetzee's non-fiction works include White Writing (1988), a selection of the novelist's essays on 'the Culture of Letters in South Africa', and Doubling the Point: Essays and Interviews (1992).

COGSWELL, Fred (1917–), Canadian poet, born in East Centreville, New Brunswick, and educated at the Universities of New Brunswick and Edinburgh. He subsequently followed an academic career at the University of New Brunswick, where he edited the influential magazine Fiddlehead and founded Fiddlehead Books, both of which made enormous contributions to the development of Canadian Maritime writing. His first collection of poetry, The Stunted Strong, appeared in 1954. It was followed by Descent from Eden (1959), Star-People (1968), House without a Door (1973), and A Long Apprenticeship: Collected Poetry (1980). More recent works include Meditations: Fifty Sestinas (1987), An Edge to Life (1987), The Black and White Tapestry (1989), Watching an Eagle (1991), and In Praise of Old Music (1992). His best work is concerned with chronicling the lives of ordinary Maritime Province people in a pithy, ironic style and, like the work of Alden *Nowlan, a writer whom he helped by introducing him to other poetry and poets, his verse has been compared with that of Edward Arlington Robinson. His accounts of ordinary lives are distinctly unpastoral lyrical ballads. While much of his poetry is written in traditional metrical forms, he also essayed a variety of modernist techniques. All his work, as creative writer and editor, is informed by a humane and eclectic stance. As a translator, he played an important part in helping to introduce Quebec poets to English-Canadian audiences.

COHEN, Leonard (1934–), Canadian poet, novelist, and composer-singer, born in Montreal, educated at McGill University under Louis *Dudek, who published his first volume of verse, Let Us Compare Mythologies (1956). Cohen achieved international fame in the 1960s and early 1970s with his bitter-sweet ironic songs and subsequently put his career as an entertainer before his writing. The evocative imagery and concern with contemporary mythologies in his songs and verse have led to his sometimes being viewed as a Canadian Bob *Dylan. His volumes of verse include The Spice-Box of Earth (1961), Flowers for Hitler (1964), The Energy of Slaves (1972), Death of a Lady's Man (1978), Book of Mercy (1984), and Stranger Music: Selected Poems and Songs (1993). His most important work as a writer is Beautiful Losers (1966), a fragmentary, early *post-modernist novel which Margaret *Atwood has seen as a quintessential expression of the Canadian victim mentality. Cohen's earlier novel, The Favourite Game (1963), based on his own experience, is a more conventional work about the son of wealthy Jewish parents who leaves for New York. His record albums include Songs of Leonard Cohen (1967), Songs of Love and Hate (1971), Death of a Lady's Man (1977), Various Positions (1984), I'm Your Man (1988), and The Future (1992).

COHEN, Matt (1942–), Canadian novelist and short-story writer, born in Kingston, Ontario, educated at the University of Toronto and McMaster University. The fragmented, dreamlike narratives of his early novels, Korsoniloff (1969) and Johnny Crackle Sings (1971), initiated his abiding concern with the nature of personal identity in their depictions of crisis and breakdown. A more conventional manner is apparent in The Disinherited (1974), the first of a cycle of four novels set in Salem, Ontario, through which Cohen conducts an epic revaluation of rural Ontario's idyllic significance; 'The Salem Novels', which employ a remarkable range of narrative modes, continue with The Colours of War (1978), The Sweet Second Summer of Kitty Malone (1979), and Flowers of Darkness (1981). His other novels include Wooden Hunters (1975), The Spanish Doctor (1984), and Emotional Arithmetic (1990). Cohen's collections of short stories include The Expatriate (1982), Café Le Dog (1983) and Freud: the Paris Notebooks (1991). His poetry is collected in Peach Melba (1974) and In Search of Leonardo (1986).

Cold Comfort Farm, a novel by S. *Gibbons, published in 1932, a humorous parody of contemporary dialect novels of rural life, such as the lurid Precious Bane (1924) by Mary *Webb, as well as of Lawrence's philosophies and of Hardyesque pessimism. The cheerful heroine, 'Flora Poste', visits her Starkadder cousins (Judith, Amos, Seth, Ezra, Urk, and Caraway) in a dismal Sussex farmhouse under the tyranny of Aunt Ada Doom, 'the Dominant Grandmother theme'. Guided by The Higher Common Sense, Flora determines to disperse the atmosphere of fatalism and earthy sexuality: 'Nature is all very well in her place, but she must not be allowed to make things untidy.' The amorous inclinations of 'Mr Mybug', a bookish type seeking to prove that Branwell Brontë wrote Wuthering Heights, are dealt with by marriage to the local spinster Rennett. Though the comic contrast between the rural idiocy of the Starkadders and the swish county set that Flora moves amongst now seems rather dated, Cold Comfort Farm has become a minor classic of English literary humour. The 'finer passages' are indicated by asterisks for 'those who are not always sure whether a sentence is literature or whether it is sheer flapdoodle'.

COLE, G(eorge) D(ouglas) H(oward) (1889–1959), British socialist and dissenting economist, born in Cambridge, educated at St Paul's School and at Balliol College, Oxford; he became Reader in Economics in that university after the First World War and Professor of Social and Political Theory after the Second. Cole's contribution to the socialist movement in the first half of the twentieth century is rivalled only by that of the *Webbs (his adversaries within the *Fabian Society). He reaffirmed the guild socialist platform in The World of Labour (1913) and Self Government in Industry (1917). In the inter-war years he was influential in promoting Keynesian ideas in British labour circles. Already an opponent of unregulated capitalism, Cole regarded J. M. *Keynes's General Theory (1936) not only as a theoretical tour de force, but also as a legitimation of some of his own economic opinions. Surpassing Keynesianism, however, Cole advocated economic planning in a non-bureaucratic socialist democracy. He published more than 100 books, wrote numerous articles, biographical sketches, comments, and reviews. Other notable works are his Life of Robert Owen (1925), A History of Socialist Thought (1953–8), and The Common People (1938, with Raymond Postgate). He also wrote detective fiction in collaboration with his wife, Margaret (sister of Raymond Postgate), who wrote a biography of Cole.

COLEGATE, Isabel (1931–), British novelist, born in London; she left school at the age of 16. Her first novel, The Blackmailer (1958), dealt with the decline of the English aristocracy and the disintegration of class structures in the aftermath of the First World War, a theme to which she was to return in subsequent works, including A Man of Power (1960) and The Great Occasion (1962). Similarly, her trilogy of novels, Orlando King (1968), Orlando at the Brazen Threshold (1971), and Agatha (1973), are concerned with the nature of social change. Statues in a Garden (1964), a characteristically short and elegantly written work, portrays a group of aristocrats on the eve of the Great War, describing their effete and somewhat decadent lives with ironic humour. The Shooting Party (1981), which was also filmed, is set in 1913 and focuses on the aristocratic guests at a weekend shooting party in a large country house; its mood is underlined by one character's remark that 'an age, perhaps a civilization, is coming to an end'. Deceits of Time (1988) has a contemporary setting but deals as much with the past as Colegate's earlier work; its central character, Catherine Hillery, a biographer, is commissioned to write the biography of a well-known politician and former First World War hero, and discovers that the truth about his past is more complex than she had imagined. Colegate's later novels include The Summer of the Royal Visit (1991), narrated by a retired schoolmaster and amateur historian, who describes the events surrounding a proposed visit to his city by Queen Victoria, and Winter Journey (1995).

COLLIER, John (1901–80), British short-story writer and novelist, born in London, educated privately. After a period as poetry editor for Time and Tide, from the mid-1930s he spent much time in America and wrote several Hollywood screenplays. The bizarrely imaginative nature of his best-known work is exemplified by his first novel His Monkey Wife (1930), which deals with the marriage between an expatriate schoolteacher and a chimpanzee. His sardonic and often disquietingly macabre short stories were collected in Presenting Moonshine (1941), The Touch of Nutmeg (1943), Fancies and Goodnights (1951), Pictures in the Fire (1958), and The John Collier Reader (1972), with an introduction by A. *Burgess. Tom's A-Cold (1933) concerns a young leader of a rural settlement in an England many years after a holocaust has destroyed civilization. His later publications include Milton's Paradise Lost; Screenplay for a Cinema of the Mind (1973).

COLLINGWOOD, R(obin) G(eorge) (1889–1943), British philosopher, the son of John Ruskin's secretary; he was born in Lancashire, and educated at University College, Oxford, becoming a fellow of Pembroke College in 1912. After serving in the Intelligence Department of the Admiralty during the First World War, he lectured in philosophy at Oxford, where he became Wayneflete Professor of Metaphysical Philosophy in 1935. His earlier writings, notably Religion and Philosophy (1916) and Speculum Mentis (1924), constituted extensions of the tradition of philosophical idealism, which he defended formidably in An Essay on Philosophical Method (1933), often regarded as his most important work. The book's integrated view of philosophy and history was sustained in his Essay on Metaphysics (1940), in which he argued that the study of history subsumed that of philosophy; this was consistent with his increasing historical relativism, which led him to maintain that the task of metaphysics was to define the 'absolute presuppositions' governing culture and religion at particular historical periods. His other works include The Principles of Art (1938) and The Idea of History (1946). Collingwood was also an eminent authority on the archaeology of Britain under the Roman occupation; his Roman Britain (1937) formed the third volume of An Economic Survey of Ancient Rome (edited by Tenney Frank, 5 volumes, 1933–40); he was co-author with J. N. L. Myres of Roman Britain and the English Settlements (1936), the first volume of The Oxford History of England (edited by G. N. Clark, 15 volumes, 1934–65). His An Autobiography (1939) is remarkable for its almost complete avoidance of circumstantial matter, bearing out his claim that 'The autobiography of a man whose business is thinking should be the story of his thought.'

COLLINS, Barry (1941–), British dramatist, born in Halifax, educated at Queen's College, Oxford; he has worked as a teacher and journalist. His first play, And Was Jerusalem Builded Here, which involved militant Luddites protesting against the mechanization of the weaving industry in the Yorkshire of 1812, was performed in 1972; subsequent work includes a children's play, Beauty and the Beast (1973); The Strongest Man in the World (1978), about a Soviet miner crippled and turned rebellious by the drugs that have made him an Olympic weightlifting champion; Toads (1979); and several television plays. His best-known, most challenging, and most moving drama, however, remains Judgement (1974), about cannibalism in the Second World War. It is a two-and-a-half-hour monologue narrated by a Russian officer who, trapped for sixty days without food or water in a cellar, agreed with his comrades to draw lots by way of deciding who should devour whom, and somehow managed to survive his ordeal with a decency, a dignity, and a sense of camaraderie that the Soviet authorities found impossible to accept.

COLLINS, Jackie, see ROMANTIC FICTION.

COLLINS, Merle (*c.*1955–), Grenadian poet and novelist, born in Aruba. She was a teacher and Research Officer in Latin American Affairs (1979–83). After the US invasion of Grenada she moved to Britain, where she became a member of a performance group, 'African Dawn', and a notable performance poet, much committed to revolution, and to women's liberation, in Grenada and elsewhere. Many of the poems in Because the Dawn Breaks (1985) employ Creole dialect to great effect; a second volume of poems, Rotten Pomerack, appeared in 1992. Her novel Angel (1987), with much of its dialogue in Creole, chronicles three generations of Grenadian women in their struggles against colonialism and post-colonial dictatorship. The eponymous heroine is a headstrong, university-educated, and disillusioned young woman determined to bring about changes in Grenada which, she learns, can be obtained only by solidarity. Angel's relationship with her more conservative and conformist mother, Doodsie, gives the novel a welcome dimension of personal and family conflict beyond the merely political. Rain Darling (1990), a collection of short stories, continues her themes on Grenadians. In her novel The Colour of Forgetting (1995), her most imaginative, lyrical, and impassioned work, Collins pays tribute to the Caribbean; set in two imaginary islands, the novel recounts the story of several generations of an ordinary family. Collins has also edited Watchers and Seekers: Creative Writing by Black Women in Britain (1987).

COLLIS, John Stewart (1900–84), Irish biographer and writer on natural history, born in Dublin, educated at Balliol College, Oxford. His early published works, which brought him little success, include the novel The Sounding Cataract (1936). During the Second World War he worked as a farm labourer in the south of England, subsequently establishing his reputation as a writer with While Following the Plough (1946) and Down to Earth (1947); richly combining philosophical reflection with a minutely detailed account of traditional agricultural work, they were issued together under the title The Worm Forgives the Plough in 1973. The books' visionary expressions of the interdependence of the human and natural orders, which also characterize The Triumph of the Tree (1950), The Moving Waters (1955), and the autobiographical Bound upon a Course (1971), gained Collis eventual acclaim as a precursor of the ecological movement. Among his numerous biographies are An Artist of Life (1959), his study of Havelock *Ellis; The Carlyles (1973); and Christopher Columbus (1976).

COLUM, Padraic (1881–1972), Irish dramatist and poet, born in Longford, Ireland; he was educated at Glasthule National School, Dublin, and began his working life as a clerk. He achieved prominence through the success of his plays The Land (1905) and The Fiddler's House (1907) at the *Abbey Theatre. Thomas Muskerry (1910) proved controversial for its sombrely realistic treatment of conditions in rural Ireland. In 1914 he emigrated to New York, lecturing at Columbia University in comparative literature and publishing many adaptations of Irish, Welsh, and Scandinavian legends for children. During the early 1930s he lived in Paris, becoming well acquainted with James *Joyce; with his wife, Mary Colum, he wrote the memoir Our Friend James Joyce (1958). Wild Earth (1907), his first collection of poetry, was followed by many volumes including Creatures (1927), Flower Pieces (1938), and Images of Departure (1968). Poems, a collected edition, appeared in 1953. His poetry is memorable for the refined lyricism and simplicity with which it celebrates and records aspects of rural Ireland. A prolific author, he also wrote novels, notably The Flying Swans (1957), and a biography of Arthur Griffith entitled Ourselves Alone (1959). A critical biography by Z. R. Bowen was published in 1970.

Comedians, a play by Trevor *Griffiths, performed in 1975 and published in 1976. It involves six working-class men, studying to become professional comedians with Eddie Waters, who believes that a good joke, far from exploiting prejudice or perpetuating racial or sexual stereotypes, truthfully illuminates the things that worry or frighten people. However, they are asked to audition for a London agent, Bert Challenor, who is 'not looking for philosophers but for someone who sees what the people want and gives it to them'. Some of the apprentice comedians try to remain true to their teacher's principles and are rejected; some renounce those principles and are accepted; and one, Gethin Price, ignores both Waters's ideas and Challenor's wishes. Dressed as a blend of the Soviet clown Grock and a football hooligan, and facing two dummies in evening dress, he uses his act for a ferocious display of class aggression. The play is an attempt partly to define the nature of humour, but mainly to use humour as a metaphor for people's behaviour in capitalist society, dividing its characters into opportunists, liberal humanists, and one lonely revolutionary.

Comics. The term refers to at least three different kinds of graphic and other work: drawings of jokes and serial adventures in certain newspapers (largely, initially American ones); certain (now mostly defunct) British magazines for children, offering stories, jokes, puzzles, and competitions; and (again largely American) colourful magazines depicting the exploits of superheroes and other creatures of fantasy. The first kind of comic—the comic strip—ranges from simple gags to mild pornography, and from Charles Schultz's 'Peanuts' to Peter O'Donell's 'Modesty Blaise', and includes satirical work like Garry Trudeau's 'Doonesbury', Steve Bell's running commentary on the ineptitudes of British political life, and Posy Simmonds' amusing but remorseless exposure of many layers of English pretension. The second kind of comic, represented by the continuing publication of The Beano and The Dandy, is fast becoming a historical footnote, but remains a part of the literary formation of many people, the place they first read printed fiction and gained their early experience of getting or not getting a graphic joke. The third kind of comic not only continues to sell ever more widely, but has begotten interesting progeny: the *graphic novel, often brilliantly drawn, where Batman, for instance, acquires a dark and near psychotic history, and where large contemporary issues of politics and philosophy are addressed through the sheer extravagance and anarchy of myth; and the comic-based film, like Superman or Dick Tracy or Batman, where the very colours of the comics, and their highly stylized worlds, lead us into zones of fantasy which more conventionally photographed films cannot reach. Not all of the heroes of contemporary comics are as amiable or typically virtuous as Captain Marvel and Captain America; but then the violent Judge Dredd and other avengers look like parodies of their forebears, the vigilante-fascists we hope we really do not need—or need only in the lurid dreams displayed and (we hope) exorcised by our comics.

Coming Up for Air, a novel by George *Orwell, published in 1939. Coming Up for Air is Orwell's most convincing novel of contemporary British life, although like several books written by members of Orwell's generation on the brink of the Second World War, it is also charged with memories of an Edwardian childhood. The poignancy of its flights of nostalgia, which circle round the rural landscapes of the Thames valley, is sharpened by premonitions of the coming war, and in particular of aerial bombardment. The reveries of its protagonist, George Bowling, are constantly interrupted by authorial regrets for a vanishing community: 'Is it gone for ever? I'm not certain. But I tell you it was a good world to live in. I belong to it. So do you.' Bowling is an overweight insurance salesman trapped in a life of suburban uniformity, and married to a wife whose only motivations are negative and financial: 'We can't afford it'; 'I don't know where the money's to come from'. The book was published by Gollancz, despite Orwell's inclusion of a chapter satirizing Gollancz's *Left Book Club. Orwell's criticisms of political faddism, of urbanization, and of technological progress are Blimpish on occasion, but the novel successfully catches a mood of reassessment, during a phase when the British were asking themselves what it was they thought they would be fighting for.

Common Reader, The (1925) and The Common Reader: Second Series (1932) were V. *Woolf's two collections of essays published in her lifetime, which she selected, revised, added to, and ordered from her enormous output of reviewing (mostly, anonymously, for the Times Literary Supplement). The title phrase is taken from Dr Johnson. The essays are written from the point of view of a highly cultured, widely read, largely self-educated 'outsider' to the educational establishment, asking, with energy, curiosity, intuition, and wit, of a great range of literature from Greeks and Elizabethans to contemporary fiction, 'how should one read a book?' The Common Reader has twenty-five essays, including 'On Not Knowing Greek', 'Defoe', 'Jane Austen', 'Modern Fiction', 'George Eliot', 'The Russian Point of View', 'Jane Eyre and Wuthering Heights', and 'How It Strikes a Contemporary'. The Common Reader: Second Series has twenty-six essays, including 'Robinson Crusoe', 'Mary Wollstonecraft', 'De Quincey's Autobiography', 'Dorothy Wordsworth', and 'How Should One Read a Book?'

COMPTON-BURNETT, Dame Ivy (1884–1969), British novelist, born in Pinner, Middlesex, one of the twelve children of a leading homoeopathic physician, James Compton-Burnett, and his second wife. She spent her childhood in Hove and continued to live there until she was 27, except for a period as a student of Classics at Royal Holloway College. Her early life was overshadowed by tragedy: her brother Guy died of pneumonia; another favourite brother, Noel, was killed during the First World War, and her two youngest sisters committed suicide. Her first novel, Dolores (1911), which was influenced by her admiration for George Eliot, but which she later repudiated, is untypical; only with the publication of Pastors and Masters (1925) did she begin to establish her distinctive style. The novel and its successors, which include Brothers and Sisters (1929), Men and Wives (1931), More Women Than Men (1933), A House and Its Head (1935), Daughters and Sons (1937), A Family and a Fortune (1939), Parents and Children (1941), Elders and Betters (1944) and many others, are variations on themes to do with power and the abuse of power, of which she herself wrote that 'nothing is so corrupting'. Each of the nineteen works she produced between 1925 and 1957 is set during the last twenty years of the nineteenth century; each has a domestic setting–frequently a Victorian country rectory inhabited by a large and inevitably unhappy family tyrannized by a cruel patriarch (or, on occasion, a matriarch); each displays the writer's mordantly ironic view of human relationships, in particular those between siblings and between parent and child. There is little physical description in her novels, in which most of the action and interplay of relationships is conveyed in the form of dialogue; tragic and often violent events are presented in a highly stylized and elliptical form and there is a vein of black comedy running throughout, which alleviates the cruelty of her scenarios. In this respect, and in its satirical mockery of late Victorian pieties, her work has much in common with that of Samuel *Butler, whose work was an influence, and with that of Evelyn *Waugh. She was hailed, by Raymond Mortimer and others, as a literary post-impressionist, whose work, eschewing conventional realism in favour of a concentrated, artificial, and idiosyncratic style, appeared startlingly modern in its preoccupations. Her later work became increasingly spare and condensed, although it is instantly recognizable for its ironic, almost aphoristic style and its extensive use of dialogue. Post-war works include: Manservant and Maidservant (1947), Two Worlds and Their Ways (1949), Mother and Son (1955), and A Heritage and Its History (1961). There is a definitive biography by Hilary *Spurling: Ivy When Young: The Early Life of I. Compton-Burnett 1884–1919 (1974) and Secrets of a Woman's Heart: The Later Life of I Compton-Burnett 1920–1969 (1984), which considers, amongst other aspects of her personal life, the importance of her friendship with Margaret Jourdain, with whom she lived for many years until the latter's death in 1951. She was made a Dame in 1967 and a Companion of Honour in 1968.

COMYNS, Barbara (1909–92), British novelist, born in Bidford-on-Avon, Warwickshire, educated at art schools in Stratford-on-Avon and London. Her unusual childhood, peopled by numerous sisters and governesses, a deaf mother, and an authoritarian father, was the subject of her first novel, Sisters by a River (1947), and is also the framework of two subsequent novels, Who Was Changed and Who Was Dead (1954) and The Skin Chairs (1962). Her later experiences of bohemian art-school life and her first marriage to an artist became the subject of her two most engaging novels, Our Spoons Came from Woolworths (1950) and A Touch of Mistletoe (1967). Her second marriage and life in Spain are depicted in Out of the Red into the Blue (1960). Her reputation largely rested on The Vet's Daughter (1959), which was acclaimed by Graham *Greene and turned into a musical, The Clapham Wonder, until her work was reprinted in the 1980s. Since then, she published The Juniper Tree (1985); an earlier unpublished work, Mr Fox (1987); and The House of Dolls (1989) which, in Comyns's characteristically faux-naif style, both wickedly amusing and plaintive, tells of four middle-aged ladies who become amateur prostitutes. Despite the childlike voices of her narrators, her piercing original view of family life and peculiar, often surreal, humour allied her work with that of Ivy *Compton-Burnett.

Concrete Poetry, the term describing poems in which the semantic values of the words composing them are complemented, and sometimes subsumed, by the graphic designs in which they are arranged on the page. Antecedents for writing of this kind include the 'pattern poems' of George Herbert, 'Easter Wings' being the best known, and aspects of Apollinaire's Calligrammes (1918), notably 'Il pleut', in which the words form vertical lines in mimesis of rain falling; practitioners of concrete poetry also acknowledge the influence of the collage techniques of Cubism and the linguistic experiments of Kurt Schwitters and others. Concrete poetry is, however, distinctly a phenomenon of the late 1950s and the 1960s. The international concrete poetry movement which flourished in Britain, Europe, and North and South America was inaugurated at the National Exhibition of Concrete

Art at São Paulo, Brazil, in 1956. The Brazilian poets' 'Pilot-Plan For Concrete Poetry' (1958) emphasizes the spatial nature of the genre in stating that 'concrete poetry begins by being aware of graphic space as a structural agent'; the reader's apprehension of a concrete poem is immediate in terms of its visual design, while the meanings of the words thus arranged are assimilated in the usual sequential manner. The leading practitioners of concrete poetry include Ian Hamilton *Finlay, Eugen Gomringer, Bob *Cobbing, Edwin *Morgan, and Sylvester Houedard. The last named is among those who have produced extreme manifestations of the mode; the extraordinary intricacy and elaborateness of the shapes into which letters and words are formed in his 'typestracts' provides the most interesting example of concrete poetry in which the graphic aspects are ascendant over semantic functions. Cobbing and Finlay are respectively noted as exponents of the allied forms of sound poetry and kinetic poetry. An Anthology of Concrete Poetry (1967) was edited by Emmett Williams.

CONDON, Richard (Thomas) (1915–96), American writer of *science fiction, born in New York City. He worked as a publicist in the film industry from 1936 to 1957. His extravagant fantasies on the American Dream varied in form from the spy thriller to political satire and science fiction. His vision was both comic and dark. In his best-known novel, The Manchurian Candidate (1959), a demagogic American senator, resembling Joseph McCarthy, is revealed as the agent of a Russian conspiracy against the government. Condon's satirical analysis of power and politics continued with Mile High (1969), in which Prohibition is created by the Mafia to protect their business interests; The Vertical Smile (1971); Winter Kills (1974), in which the ultimate killer of a Kennedy-like president is his own father; and Death of a Politician (1978), a savage destruction of a corrupt politician very similar to Richard Nixon. An Infinity of Mirrors (1964) explored the nightmare of Nazi Germany; Any God Will Do (1966) was a virtuoso depiction of insanity; The Ecstacy Business (1967) demolished Hollywood; and the Prizzi trilogy—Prizzi's Honor (1982), Prizzi's Family (1986), and Prizzi's Glory (1988)—mocked the American obsession with organized crime. Emperor of America (1990) and The Final Addiction (1991) are among his later novels.

Cone-Gatherers, The, the best-known of Robin *Jenkins's early novels, published in 1955. The narrative is set in Scotland during the Second World War and draws on Jenkins's experience of forestry work at this time, when he was a conscientious objector to military service. The 'cone-gatherers' of the title are the brothers Calum and Neil, who are collecting pinecones on the estate of Lady Runcie-Campbell to provide seeds for a new forest. Calum, a simple hunchback with a visionary love of nature, possesses an innocence and gentleness which make him the object of the irrational hatred of Duror, the estate's gamekeeper and the novel's central figure, who resents the brothers' intrusion into his domain; Duror's progressive psychological deterioration culminates in his gratuitous murder of Calum, following which he kills himself. In emblematizing the tensions between good and evil in the human psyche, the novel forms the earliest mature demonstration of this central thematic preoccupation in much of Jenkins's work. His concern with the extent to which social conditioning affects personality and behaviour is also evident in the characterizations; a spectrum of attitudes and assumptions is established, which range from Lady Runcie-Campbell's ineffectually religious notions of patrician responsibility to the degraded narrow-mindedness displayed by some of the minor working-class figures.

Confessional Poetry, written principally by Americans during the 1960s, is characterized by great candour in the treatment of intimately autobiographical experiences and attitudes. The term was adopted by critics rather than by the poets to whose work it applied. The traditions of confessional literature extend back to St Augustine, and Donne, Hopkins, and others produced poetry notable for its revealingly personal content; confessional poetry is most specifically of the twentieth century in its affinities with psychoanalysis as a means of confronting painful or otherwise difficult emotional and mental states. The designation was first applied to Robert *Lowell's Life Studies (1959) because of the directness with which he wrote of his marital troubles, psychiatric difficulties, and often deeply ambivalent feelings towards his family. Lowell, however, stated his indebtedness in adopting such a forthright idiom to W. D. *Snodgrass, who had once been his student; Snodgrass's Heart's Needle (1960) used conventionally accomplished verse to present anguished accounts of his divorce and separation from his daughter. Anne *Sexton's To Bedlam and Part of the Way Back (1960) consolidated the impression of a confessional movement through the harrowing immediacy with which she described her depressive illness. John *Berryman's 77 Dream Songs (1964) and Sylvia *Plath's Ariel (1965) also contain notable examples of the mode in numerous poems exposing their authors in states of affective disorder. Adrienne *Rich and Anthony *Hecht are among the other writers to have been labelled 'confessional' during the 1960s. Most of the poetry thus described exhibits a high degree of formal control. Although adversely criticized for its emphasis on pathological conditions and a narcissistic preoccupation with selfhood, confessional poetry led to an increased frankness in the more personal work of many American and British poets.

Confessions of Nat Turner, The, a novel by William *Styron, published in 1967. Set like much of his writing in the American South—in Southside Virginia, near Styron's own birthplace—the novel draws its inspiration from a historical incident, the slave insurrection that took place in 1831. The author attempts to examine the racism of his society by adopting the perspective of the black slave leader Nat Turner. Rather than the language of a plantation slave, Styron attributes to his protagonist the vocabulary of an intellectual capable of analysing and assessing his own situation and that of his people. Though the novel was praised for its historical accuracy and for raising the complex questions of racism, slavery, and the use of justified violence, it fell foul of the black separatist movement gaining strength at the time of its reception, and Styron has been criticized for his appropriation of a black sensibility and his superimposition of white cultural norms on black consciousness.

CONNELL, Evan (Shelby Jr) (1924–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Kansas City, educated at Dartmouth College, University of Kansas, Stanford University, and Columbia University. Connell's early writings were in the short story form; his first collection, The Anatomy Lesson and Other Stories (1957), with its ironic satires of the provinciality and cultural aridity of Midwestern life, and At the Crossroads (1965), demonstrate his mastery of the contemporary short story. St Augustine's Pigeon: The Selected Stories (1980) includes sixteen stories dating from the 1950s. Connell's novels include Mrs Bridge (1959) and its 'companion piece', Mr Bridge (1969), both trenchant and ironic explorations of suburban life in the USA; The Patriot (1960) recounts the experiences of an American Air Force officer in the Second World War (Connell served as a naval aviator during 1943–5); and Diary of a Rapist (1966), which narrates an almost existential retreat into the self and is frequently disturbing for its insights into sexual violence. Connell's first published verse was the long single poem, Notes From a Bottle Found on the Beach at Carmel (1963), though his second collection, Points for a Compass Rose (1973), is more representative of his strengths as a poet. Other notable works are The Connoisseur (1974), Double Honeymoon (1976), and The Alchymist's Journal (1991); A Long Desire (1979) and The White Lantern (1980) are collections of essays.

CONNELLY, Marc(us Cook) (1890–1981), American dramatist, born in McKeesport, Pennsylvania. Connelly worked as a journalist before turning to the theatre. In collaboration with George S. *Kaufman in the early 1920s, he produced a series of comedies with a mocking satirical edge such as Dulcy (1921), and Merton of the Movies (1922), a satire on Hollywood in which a simple-minded grocery clerk becomes a star. Connelly's major work is The Green Pastures (1930; Pulitzer Prize), a version of Roark Bradford's stories of the Afro-American conception of Old Testament history, which dramatizes episodes from the Creation to the Crucifixion enacted in a series of tableaux in a small Southern black church.

CONNINGTON, J. J., pseudonym of Alfred Walter STEWART (1880–1947), Scottish academic and *detective fiction writer, born in Glasgow, educated at the universities of Glasgow, Marburg, and London. He was Professor of Chemistry from 1919 to 1944 at Queen's University, Belfast, and author of a number of respected treatises on chemistry. As Connington, he wrote over twenty solid and entertaining detective stories, beginning with Death at Swaythling Court (1926), in which the investigation is usually carried out either by Superintendent Ross (The Eye in the Museum, 1929; The Two Tickets Puzzle, 1930) or, more often, by Chief Constable Sir Clinton Driffield (Murder in the Maze, 1927; The Sweepstake Murders, 1931). As Connington he also published an unusual science fiction novel, Nordenholt's Millions (1923).

CONNOLLY, Cyril (Vernon) (1903–74), British essayist, editor, and critic, born in Coventry, educated at Balliol College, Oxford. After a period as secretary to Logan Pearsall Smith, he began his career as a literary journalist and editor. He remains best known for his editorship of Horizon. The Rock Pool (1936), his first substantial publication, is an entertainingly insubstantial novel about a young Englishman in an artists' colony in the South of France; his unfinished novel entitled Shade Those Laurels (1990) was completed by Peter *Levi. Enemies of Promise (1938) contained a series of essays on the hazards placed in the way of literary talent, and the highly regarded autobiographical fragment 'A Georgian Boyhood'. His numerous further collections of essays and articles include The Condemned Playground (1945), Ideas and Places (1953), and The Evening Colonnade (1973). Among his other publications is The Unquiet Grave: A Word Cycle, an idiosyncratic assemblage of aphorisms published in 1944 under the pseudonym 'Palinurus'. David Pryce-Jones edited his journal and published it with a biographical study in Connolly: Journal and Memoir (1983).

CONNOR, Tony (John Anthony) (1930–), British poet, born in Manchester; after leaving school at 14, he worked as a textile designer between 1944 and 1960. In 1971 he became Professor of English at Wesleyan University, Connecticut. His first collection of poetry, With Love Somehow (1962), was followed by numerous others, including Lodgers (1965), In the Happy Valley (1971), The Memoirs of Uncle Harry (1974), and New and Selected Poems (1982), establishing him as one of the foremost poets in the domestic and regional modes ascendant in British writing during the 1960s and 1970s. His work is noted for the structural integrity and unsentimental realism with which he presents personal, anecdotal, and observational subjects. A further collection, Spirits of Place (1986), greatly extends the geographical ambit of his poetry, drawing heavily on Connor's experiences of India in addition to the English and American locales reflected in his previous work; Metamorphic Adventures (1995) is among his most recent volumes of verse. He has also produced translations and written numerous television plays.

CONQUEST, (George) Robert (Acworth) (1917–), British poet and historian, born in Great Malvern, Worcester, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. After active service in the Second World War, he held a series of diplomatic postings until 1956, when he began lecturing at the London School of Economics. Since 1959 he has lived mainly in America as a senior research fellow at various universities and institutions. He is recognized as one of the world's leading specialists in Soviet affairs and modern Russian history. His Poems appeared in 1955; Between Mars and Venus (1962), Arias from a Love Opera (1969), and Forays (1979) are among his subsequent collections. New and Collected Poems was published in 1988. He edited the two volumes of New Lines anthologies (1956, 1963), the first of which was the principal platform of The *Movement; Conquest's definition of their aims as 'a negative determination to avoid bad principles' applies to the precision of form and argument with which his own poems develop their fusions of thought and feeling. Numerous poems display the interest in science fiction evident in his novel A World of Difference (1955). With Kingsley *Amis, Conquest was co-editor of the science fiction anthology Spectrum (1961–5) and co-author of the humorous novel The Egyptologists (1965). His many publications on the USSR include The Great Terror (1973) and The Harvest of Sorrow (1986), which examine the effects of Stalin's policies in the 1930s. His translation of Alexander Solzhenitsyn's Prussian Nights appeared in 1973.

CONRAD, Joseph (Józef Teodor Konrad Nalecz Korzeniowski) (1857–1924), novelist and short-story writer, born at Berdyczów, in the Russian-annexed Polish Ukraine, into a family of land-owning Polish szlachta gentry. His father, Apollo Korzeniowski, a poet and translator of Shakespeare, Dickens, and Hugo, was a national political figure, active in the nationalist insurrectionary movements which had flowered since the 1795 partition and colonizing of Poland by Russia, Prussia, and Austria. Conrad's early upbringing was thus within a fervently patriotic household where an ethos of cosmopolitan cultural enlightenment, aristocratic duty and honour, and political revolution were in heady and paradoxical mix. In 1862, as punishment for Apollo's insurrectionary activism, the family was sent into exile in Vologda, in northern Russia. The later great themes of Conrad's writing—loyalty and betrayal, isolation and exile, duty and freedom—thus find their sources early in his life experience. His mother, Ewa, died in exile when Conrad was seven, followed in 1869 by Apollo soon after their return to Poland. The orphaned Conrad was brought up by his uncle, Tadeusz Bobrowski, who remained an abiding influence for another twenty-five years. The cautious Bobrowski did not manage to dissuade Conrad from his romantic ambition to go to sea, however, and in 1874 Conrad left for Marseilles and the start of some twenty years as a professional sailor.

Four years in Marseilles introduced him to a rich variety of cosmopolitan social and professional contacts, cultural and amorous excitements, gambling, gun-running, and a failed suicide attempt (1878). These Mediterranean experiences, together with ocean voyages in 1875 and 1876 on sailing-ships, first as passenger, then as crew, to the West Indies and possibly South America (Venezuela), provided Conrad with early material he was to exploit if not mythologize in his late novels The Arrow of Gold (1919) and The Rover (1923), as well as in his autobiographical essays The Mirror of the Sea (1906) and A Personal Record (1912). In 1878 he joined the British Merchant Navy, learning English in order to take successive mariner examinations—first mate in 1884, master in 1886, the same year he became a naturalized British subject. Conrad's British 'sea years', first plying the east coast of England, with later repeated ocean runs to India, the Far East, and Australia (when he met lifelong friend John Galsworthy), provided him with the adventures, locations, characters, and above all the profound human experiences of endurance and fear, isolation and solidarity, idealism and disillusion, civility and barbarism, which his later literary works treat. Heart of Darkness (1902), based on his traumatic Congo journey in 1890 (and recorded in his 'Congo Diary', posthumously pub. 1978), is the most obvious and eloquent example of this treatment. Although Conrad started writing Almayer's Folly, his first novel, in 1889, it was not until 1894 that his career at sea in effect came to an end.

Not for another twenty years, however, with the publication of Chance*, did Conrad earn a stable income from his writing, his financial stress relieved only by constant fiscal and moral support especially from his literary agent J. B. Pinker and from Edward *Garnett (who accepted Almayer's Folly, 1895, for publication with T. Fisher Unwin). In 1896 he married Jessie George, by whom he was to have two sons, Boris and John. Living mainly in Kent, he maintained strong and abiding friendships with some of the most influential literary figures of the age: Galsworthy, Garnett, aristocrat and socialist R. *Cunninghame Graham, and Kent neighbours Ford Madox Hueffer (*Ford), H. G. *Wells, Henry *James, and Stephen Crane, as well as Arthur *Symons and (later) Bertrand *Russell and André Gide. Both Almayer's Folly and An Outcast of the Islands (1896) received largely positive critical response, which complimented the unknown Conrad through flattering comparison with *Kipling and Stevenson. Both works share the exotic setting of the Malay Archipelago, and despite some heavy literary obviousness, they embody thematic and narrative concerns which anticipate his major works: elliptical narratives; subtle interweaving of the political, anthropological, and the personal; gender and racial stereotypes offered but also challenged. Some of these elements are also found in his first (uneven) volume of short stories, Tales of Unrest (1898), containing 'Karain', 'The Idiots', 'An Outpost of Progress' (a prototype for Heart of Darkness), 'The Return', and 'The Lagoon'.

Nigger of the 'Narcissus' (1897) marks the beginning of Conrad's 'major phase'. Its symbolic resonance beneath a realistic narrative, its story of nature's violence and human anxiety and of a ship as community threatened by mutiny, all contribute to its quintessential Conradian power. Its famous 'Preface', with Conrad's emphasis on the craft of Art and his almost programmatic 'impressionist' claim that 'my task is, by the power of the written word, to make you see', has itself become a central document of Modernist aesthetics. Lord Jim (1900), Heart of Darkness, and *'Youth' (which appeared together with 'The *End of the Tether', 1902) develop a Conradian character-narrator, Marlow, who performs a crucial function in Conrad's work and who reappears much later in Chance (1913). A sea captain, intelligent, humane, and sceptical, Marlow represents a Victorian liberal outlook and source of moral perspective, who nevertheless should not be identified or confused with Conrad's own position. With Conrad's increasingly sophisticated narrative complexity and modernist ambivalences, Marlow as hero/problem typifies Conrad's inventiveness. While still drawing on his maritime experiences for some of his stories, his major novels are marked by experiments with narrative technique and disrupted chronological sequence, complex modes of ironic narrative distance, an increasing mastery over literary English (his third language), and an engagement with elemental thematic preoccupations—the temptations of illusion, the contradictions of freedom, and the vulnerability of all-too-human virtues like trust, love, and idealism. Briefly collaborating with Ford on The Inheritors (1901), a mix of science fiction and topical political allegory, and Romance (1903), a historical adventure narrative, Conrad continued independently with the writing of Typhoon and Other Stories* ('Typhoon', 'Amy Foster', 'Falk', 'Tomorrow'; 1903), which was followed by arguably his most challenging, most complex historical political narrative, Nostromo* (1904), set in an unstable South American state in the ambiguous throes of revolution. *The Secret Agent (1907) takes as its starting point the anarchist activities of 1890s' London, including the 1894 bomb attack on the Greenwich Observatory. Some of its preoccupations are mirrored in Under Western Eyes* (1911). Conrad's completion of Under Western Eyes left him in a state of nervous breakdown, according to Jessie 'holding converse with his characters'. Extreme stress accompanied most of his writing for, as Cunninghame Graham said, Conrad 'almost needed a Caesarian operation of the soul before he was delivered of his masterpieces'. Whilst the years of his greatest novels also saw the publication of collections of short stories, A Set of Six (1908), 'Twixt Land and Sea (which included 'The *Secret Sharer', 1912), and Within the Tides (1915), it was Chance (1913) which brought Conrad popular recognition and a bestseller for the first time in his career, thanks particularly to his American readership. Victory* (1915), growing popularity, and plans for a collected edition end his major phase.

*The Shadow-Line (1917) alone is critically regarded as a major work of his final years. Despite public adulation in Britain and America, the offer (declined) of a knighthood, and the lucrative sale of film rights, his last years saw him perhaps in relative creative decline. Two attempts at playwriting, Laughing Anne (1920) and a dramatized The Secret Agent (1922), and late novels The Arrow of Gold (1919), The Rescue (1920, started in 1900), The Rover (1923), and the unfinished, posthumously published Suspense (1925) and Tales of Hearsay (1925) failed to command serious critical endorsement. Notes on Life and Letters (1921) and Last Essays (1926) contain late autobiographical and occasional pieces.

At his death Conrad was established as one of the leading early generation of Modernists, along with Henry James and Ford. Partly overshadowed in the 1930s by the younger generation of *Lawrence, *Joyce, *Woolf, and the 'Auden generation', Conrad's critical reputation was reasserted with F. R. Leavis's essay in Scrutiny (1941), reprinted in the widely influential The Great Tradition (1948), which commended his 'moral Realism' and pronounced Conrad 'among the very greatest novelists in the language'. More recent criticism has moved away from mythic, psychological, and moral readings to stress narratological/linguistic, post-colonial, and gender approaches to his work. See J. Baines, Joseph Conrad: A Critical Biography (1960), F. R. Karl, Joseph Conrad: The Three Lives (1979), and Z. Najder, Joseph Conrad: A Chronicle (1983). Four (of eight) volumes of his Collected Letters, edited by F. Karl and L. Davies, have been published.

CONRAN, Anthony (1931–), British poet and translator, born in Kharghpur, India, educated at the University College of North Wales, Bangor, where he became Research Fellow and Tutor in English in 1957. His work as a poet and translator has involved him closely with the poetic literature of the Welsh language and of the Welsh metrical and assonantal traditions. His first collection of poetry, Formal Poems (1961), was followed by numerous others, among them Spirit Level (1974), Life Fund (1979), Blodeuwedd and Other Poems (1988), Poems 1951–1967 (1974), and Castles (1993). Much of his verse reflects the communal functions of Welsh poetry in its celebratory or elegiac treatments of events within a localized culture. His best-known collection of translations is The Penguin Book of Welsh Verse (1967), which was highly acclaimed for its combination of accuracy and musicality. His other translations include Eighteen Poems of Dante Alighieri (1975). The Cost of Strangeness (1982) is a critical study of *Anglo-Welsh poetry.

CONRAN, Shirley, see ROMANTIC FICTION.

CONROY, Frank (1936–), American novelist and writer, educated at Haverford College. He has contributed to periodicals and magazines such as the New Yorker*, the Chicago Tribune, and Harper's. His principal acclaim came for his autobiographical novel Stop-Time (1967), a memoir of boyhood and adolescence. Written in unpretentious prose, the novel begins with a lesson in brutality at a progressive boarding school, moves to a self-help settlement in Florida, then to a Connecticut mental home, and finally to New York City, where Conroy takes on a variety of jobs. Then, after his parents fall apart, he runs away to begin a new set of adventures. With a mixture of humour and irony, the book is a reflection on history and national geography. He has more recently edited The Iowa Award: The Best Stories from 20 Years (1992) and published the novel Body and Soul (1993).

CONROY, Jack (John) (Wesley) (1899–1980), American novelist and editor, born in Moberly, Missouri. Conroy lost his father and brother in a mining disaster and spent some years as a migratory worker. These circumstances inform his best-known novel, The Disinherited (1933), written with the encouragement of H. L. *Mencken. The book fictionalizes Conroy's own boyhood in a company-owned town, his itinerant labouring life, and experience of strikes and corruption, and ends with the protagonist's resolve to become active in the class struggle. Hailed at the time as a genuinely *proletarian novel, it now seems less ideological, with the vicissitudes of working-class characters balanced by its pastoral portrait of young love and small-town life. The novel remains an important example of the social literature produced by the Great Depression. Conroy's activities as an editor of *little magazines began with The Rebel Poet, but his major project was the Midwest-based The Anvil, which ran between 1933 and 1937 and became an exemplary model of literary and political commitment, printing work by Maxim Gorky, Nelson *Algren, and Langston *Hughes, among others. Conroy went on to be literary editor of two Chicago newspapers and the author of books for children. His last significant publication involved his editing Writers In Revolt: The Anvil Anthology (1973; with Curt Johnson).

Conservationist, The, see GORDIMER, NADINE.

CONSTANTINE, David (1944–), British poet, born in Salford, educated at Manchester Grammar School and at Wadham College, Oxford. He lectured at Durham University until 1981, when he became a fellow of Queen's College, Oxford. He became literary editor of Argo magazine. A Brightness to Cast Shadows (1981), his first collection of poetry, was followed by Watching for Dolphins (1983) and Madder (1987); Selected Poems appeared in 1991. Much of Constantine's work draws its strengths from his imaginative engagement with the mythical and religious dimensions of personal experience. Such characteristics co-exist with a strongly observed element of social realism and imagery of marked sensory vividness. His technical accomplishment covers a wide range of forms, extending from fluent use of traditional modes to the rhythmically cadenced lines in which he achieves his most individual effects. His other works include the novel Davies (1985), the critical study Early Greek Travellers and the Hellenic Ideal (1984), the biography Hölderlin (1988), and a long poem about the nineteenth-century German, Caspar Hauser (1994). He is also highly regarded as a translator for his Selected Poems of Hölderlin (1990).

Contemporary Review, The, a periodical founded in 1866 as the organ of the Metaphysical Society. Matthew Arnold, Walter Pater, William Ruskin, and Thomas Huxley were among the contributors who established its high reputation for the quality of its articles on literary, socio-cultural, and scientific topics. Sir Percy Bunting was its editor from 1882 to 1910. Around the turn of the century work by Rudyard *Kipling, W. B. *Yeats, and H. G. *Wells was featured and a continuing interest in European literature was initiated with essays on Ibsen and Tolstoy. In 1911 Bunting was succeeded as editor by George Peabody Gooch, who pursued his intention of making the Review the leading monthly on foreign affairs; Leonard *Woolf headed the foreign affairs section in 1922 and 1923, after which it was run by George Glasgow until 1954. The journal's authoritative commentaries on political and social matters were conducted from a position described by Gooch as 'just a little to the left of the centre'. During the 1930s the Review was also noted for its distinguished treatments of literature, science, and history by contributors who included Frederick Boas, Gilbert Murray, Julian *Huxley, and Arnold *Toynbee. In 1955 it absorbed the Fortnightly Review. Prior to his retirement in 1960, Gooch began including poetry as a regular aspect of the magazine; under Rosalind Wade's editorship, which commenced in 1970, short stories as well as poetry became a staple feature of the Review, in addition to which it has devoted considerable attention to the theatre.

COOK, David (1940–), British actor, novelist, and television playwright, born in Preston, Lancashire, educated at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art. His first novel, Albert's Memorial (1972), introduces us to the widowed Mary and the homosexual Paul, both bereaved and marginal tragi-comic figures, the first of his gallery of portraits of eccentric and often vagrant characters, all of whom are seen with insight, wit, and sympathy. This was followed by Happy Endings (1974), the story of a disturbed 12-year-old boy accused of 'interfering' with a 5-year-old girl; Walter (1978), his best-known work, which describes the boyhood and youth of a mentally handicapped man, and its sequel, Walter's Doves (1979), in which Walter takes to the road with his friend June; Sunrising (1984), a historical novel set against the violent background of agricultural riots in the 1830s; Missing Persons (1986); Crying Out Loud (1988); and Second Best (1991), about a single male's attempt to adopt a 10-year-old boy, which was filmed with Anthony Hopkins in 1992. Cook's works show a particular feeling for the disadvantaged, both young and elderly, and a professional knowledge of the world of welfare and social service. He has also written educational programmes for slow learners.

COOKSON, Catherine (Anne) (1906–), British regional novelist, born in Tyne Dock, Jarrow. She is a popular and prolific writer, most of whose works are set in her native Tyneside. She was the illegitimate daughter of Kate McMullen, a domestic servant whom she believed was her sister, and whose story she tells in her interesting autobiography Our Kate (1969); Cookson herself went into service after leaving school at the age of 14. Catherine Cookson Country (1986) is another autobiographical work. Her writing career began after she moved south and joined the Hastings Writers' Circle in the 1940s. Many of her works feature a realistic working-class background with lively, unsentimental, earthy characters, and her heroines are strong, hardworking, and resourceful. She created the character of 'Mary Ann', who was to feature in a long series, beginning with The Lord and Mary Ann (1956). With The Round Tower (1968) Cookson received the Winifred Hotby Award for the best regional novel. Subsequent series were centred on the Mallen family (The Mallen Streak, 1973; The Mallen Girl, 1974; The Mallen Letter, 1974), and on Tilly Trotter (including Tilly Trotter, 1980; Tilly Trotter Wed, 1981; Tilly Trotter Widowed, 1982). More recent publications include The Obsession (1995), a more unusual novel dealing with a woman's need to protect her inheritance, and Plainer Still (1995), a memoir. See also ROMANTIC FICTION.

COOLIDGE, Clark (1939–), American poet, born in Providence, Rhode Island. Though associated with the *Language Poets, his work predates the movement and despite close contact with many of them he remains distinct from any movement, literary or political. His primary literary influences are Rilke, *Beckett, and *Kerouac, but jazz, geology, and painting (he wrote a collaborative work with the painter Philip Guston: Baffling Means, 1991) also play a large part. This poetic purist shares with many avant-garde artists of the 1950s and 1960s the belief that art is discovery, and so creates an exploratory 'improvisational momentum' in its composition which aims to 'tell the story that has never been thought before' in a writing which is itself the primary focus, rather than its subject matter. He is a consummate verbal musician, whose enormously inventive combinations of words, images, and objects not only explore the workings of language but suggest new forms of experience. At Egypt (1988) is a dense, vital work which observes both tourist and country with great wit and variety, constantly questioning itself as it takes on surprisingly Romantic themes such as the relations between mortality and representation. Other works include Space (1970), Polaroid (1975), Quartz Hearts (1978), Mine: The One that Enters the Stories (1982), The Crystal Text (1986), and Odes of Roba (1991).

COOPER, Giles (Stannus) (1918–66), British playwright, born in Carrickmines, County Dublin, educated at Lancing College. He was an actor and television script-editor until 1955, when he became a full-time playwright for stage, television, and radio. His works for the stage include Everything in the Garden (1962) and The Spies Are Singing (1966). The Other Man (1964), his best-known work for television, offered a disquieting alternative version of relations between Britain and Germany during the Nazi era; it was also adapted as a novel (1964). The finest of his many plays are his works for radio, which freed him from the constraints of naturalistic realism and permitted an imaginative engagement with Britain's post-war malaise which formed the thematic centre of much of his work. Mathry Beacon (1956) and Unman, Wittering, and Zigo (1958) are generally considered his masterpieces for radio. He was killed in a fall from a train in Surrey in 1966. The Giles Cooper Award instituted in 1978 is Britain's most coveted prize for radio drama.

COOPER, Lettice (Ulpha) (1897–1994), British novelist, born in Eccles, Lancashire, educated at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. Her first novel, The Lighted Room (1925), was one of ten written while she was in Yorkshire. The last of these, National Provincial (1938), led to an invitation to work in London, on the staff of Time and Tide*, as editorial assistant and drama critic. During the Second World War, she was public relations officer for the Ministry of Food in London. The 1947 publication of Black Bethlehem and her biography of Robert Louis Stevenson marked Cooper's return to writing. From the outset, Cooper's project was to explore the 'truth of the human situation'. Her deliberate use of traditional form, domestic situations, and uneventful lives in her fiction places her in the mainstream of English writing by women from George Eliot onwards. Much of her fiction is set in her native Yorkshire, but her frequent visits to Italy, for which she had a deep and evident affection, are reflected by her use of its landscapes and interiors in many of her works, notably the ambitious and successful Fenny (1953). A lifelong socialist, Cooper studied the world she knew intimately with compassion and insight; she had a particular understanding of the workings of institutions, which is revealed in such works as Three Lives (1957), set in an adult education college, and the earlier We Have Come to a Country (1935), the action of which unfolds in an occupational centre for unemployed men. The last of her twenty novels, Unusual Behaviour, appeared in 1986, and the revival in 1987 of three earlier novels (The New House, 1936; National Provincial, and Fenny) brought Cooper's fiction to a new audience in her ninetieth year. She also wrote numerous children's books. She was Vice-Chairman (1975–8), then President of the English Pen Club (1979–81). Cooper was awarded an OBE in 1978.

COOPER, William, pseudonym of Harry Summerfield HOFF (1910–), English novelist, born in Crewe, Cheshire, educated at Christ's College, Cambridge. He was a physics teacher, served in the Royal Air Force during the Second World War, and worked for the Civil Service Commission and the Atomic Energy Authority. As H. S. Hoff he had written four novels before he became recognized with his fifth, Scenes from Provincial Life (1950), by 'William Cooper', which considerably influenced younger novelists of the 1950s, including Kingsley *Amis, John *Braine, and Stan *Barstow. Sardonically comic and artfully realistic, it is narrated by a young lower-middle-class schoolteacher, Joe Lunn; much of the comedy revolves around the anti-hero's attempts to keep his girlfriend, Myrtle, happy while also avoiding marriage. Scenes from Metropolitan Life (1982), about Joe Lunn's Civil Service days, was written in 1951 but suppressed for many years under threat of libel; Scenes from Married Life (1961), which completes the trilogy, was followed by Scenes from Later Life (1983). Other novels include Young People (1958), about students at a provincial university in the 1930s; Memoirs of a New Man (1966), about a scientist; and Immortality at Any Price (1991), about an Oxford academic and biographer. Cooper's novels are important not just for their literary merit but also for their contribution to the 'new realism' school of British fiction. He also wrote C. P. Snow (1959; revised edition 1971) and From Early Life (1990), an autobiographical memoir.

COOVER, Robert (1932–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Charles City, Iowa, educated at the universities of Southern Illinois, Indiana, and Chicago. Coover's novels turn away from traditional 'realist' forms, demonstrating a post-modern sense of 'reality' and history as 'made up', fabricated, or fictions (see NEW JOURNALISM). His first novel, The Origin of the Brunists (1966), was a study of the influence of charismatic religion on small-town America, and concerns the establishment of a religious cult by the survivor of a mining disaster. The Universal Baseball Association, Inc., J. Henry Waugh, Prop. (1968) is an allegorical novel which uses baseball as its principal metaphor to satirize American religious beliefs, and Pricksongs and Descants (1969) shows a developing interest in the overlapping boundaries between art and reality. This later developed into a technique which produced the startling The Public Burning (1976), in which the trial and judicial murder of the Rosenbergs overlaps with fantasy to produce a vigorous indictment of the McCarthy years. His other, later works Whatever Happened to Gloomy Gus of the Chicago Bears? (1977), in which he returned to his attack on Richard Nixon, Spanking the Maid (1981), a story about a sado-masochistic, obsessive relationship between a man and his maid, Gerald's Party (1986), A Night at the Movies (1987), and Pinnochio in Venice (1991) continued his characteristic self-reflexive preoccupation with the materiality of writing. His short story collections include Hair o' the Chine (1979), After Lazarus: A Filmscript (1980), Charlie in the House of Rue (1980), and The Convention (1982). He has also written several plays collected in A Theological Position (1972), and In Bed One Night and Other Brief Encounters (1983), which are nine satirical exercises in modernist writing.

COPE, Wendy (1945–), British poet, born in Erith, Kent, educated at St Hilda's College, Oxford. She became a schoolteacher in London. Her early publications include Across the City (1980) and Hope and the 42 . . . (1984). Her Making Cocoa for Kingsley Amis (1986) enjoyed considerable success; the book is most notable for its many parodies of the works of well-known poets, including T. S. *Eliot, Ted *Hughes, Craig *Raine, and Seamus *Heaney. In these, the highly developed technical facility and wit Cope possesses are masterfully combined with her sensitivity to the styles of her subjects, producing results that have earned her comparisons with Max *Beerbohm. Her subsequent publications include Men and Their Boring Arguments (1988) and Serious Concerns (1992), which features more reflective poetry on a wide range of topics. Cope also edited Is That the New Moon? (1989, illustrated by Christine Roche), an anthology of works by modern women poets. Twiddling Your Thumbs (1988) is a work for children illustrated by Christine Roche.

COPPARD, A(lfred) E(dgar) (1878–1957), British short-story writer and poet, born in Folkestone; ill-health curtailed his education at Lewes Road School, Brighton, when he was nine. After working in a variety of commercial capacities, he became a full-time writer in 1919, publishing his first book of stories, Adam and Eve and Pinch Me, in 1921. His many collections include Fishmonger's Fiddle (1925), Silver Circus (1928), Crotty Shinkwin (1932), You Never Know, Do You? (1939), and Fearful Pleasures (1946). Coppard viewed his work as extending the traditions of the ballad and folk-tale; masterful handling of rural dialogue characterizes much of his writing. His stories, which often display a compassionate concern with the lot of the misfit, combine transparent stylistic simplicity with profound imaginative analyses of human behaviour. Hips and Haws (1922), Yokohama Garland (1926), and Cherry Ripe (1935) are among the numerous volumes of his poetry, which is notable for the fluency and imagistic vividness of its free-verse forms and recurrently evokes the Elizabethan and Caroline periods. His other works include It's Me, O Lord (1957), the first volume of an unfinished autobiography.

CORBETT, Jim (James Edward) (1875–1955), British author and conservationist, born in Naini Tal, Kumaon, India, where he was educated at St Joseph's College. Apart from a period as a railway inspector and service in France during the First World War, Corbett spent most of his life as a farmer in Kumaon. He retained a deep commitment to the welfare of the local people, on whose behalf he stalked and killed a succession of man-eating tigers and leopards. He recorded these episodes along with wide-ranging accounts of his experiences of the wilds in The Man-Eaters of Kumaon (1946), The Man-Eating Leopard of Rudraprayag (1948), and The Temple Tiger and More Man-Eaters of Kumaon (1954). In 1935 he established the first game sanctuary in India at Garhwal, which became Corbett National Park in 1957. His other works include the substantially autobiographical My India (1952) and Jungle Lore (1953). Carpet Sahib (1986) is Martin Booth's biography of Corbett.

CORKERY, Daniel (1878–1964), Irish critic, dramatist, and short-story writer, born in Cork, educated at St Patrick's College, Dublin. In 1908 he founded, together with other nationalists, the Cork Dramatic Society, which produced plays in both Irish and English. Corkery's published plays include The Labour Leader (1920), The Yellow Bittern and Other Plays (1920), and Resurrection (1924). His collections of short stories, generally considered his best work, include A Munster Twilight (1916), The Hounds of Banba (1920), The Stormy Hills (1929), and Earth out of Earth (1939). As a short-story writer, he had a considerable influence on his younger contemporaries, Frank *O'Connor and Sean *O'Faolain. However, critical works like The Hidden Ireland (1925), on the Gaelic work of the Munster poets in the eighteenth-century, when ancient Irish culture was in the process of being ruthlessly suppressed, and Synge and Anglo-Irish Literature (1931), made the greatest impact in his own lifetime and opened up new areas of Irish literary history. He also wrote The Threshold of Quiet (1917), a novel, and The Fortunes of the Irish Language (1954). Corkery was appointed Senator by De Valera in 1951.

CORMAN, Cid (Sidney) (1924–), American editor and poet, born in Boston, Massachusetts, educated at Tufts College, the University of Michigan, the University of North Carolina, and, as a Fulbright Fellow, the Sorbonne. From 1949 to 1951 he presented a series of broadcasts entitled 'This is Poetry' for a Boston radio station, which featured readings by leading younger American poets and initiated contact with a number of the contributors to Origin, the seminal magazine of poetry Corman founded in 1951; Robert *Creeley, Charles *Olson, Paul *Blackburn, and other poets subsequently central to the poetic activities associated with *Black Mountain College were among those whose work appeared regularly. The Gist of 'Origin' (1975), edited by Corman, contains a wide selection of material from the periodical. In 1956 he established the Origin publishing imprint, one of the most enduring and valuable of the *small presses; from 1958 to 1979 the press was principally based in Kyoto, Japan, where he worked as a lecturer. The growing concentration and selective particularity of his own poetry during these years derived in part from his intimacy with Japanese literature, of which he has produced numerous translations, including Cool Melon (1959), versions of Basho, and Peerless Mirror: Twenty Tanka from the Manyoshu (1981). Corman's verse is firmly located in the modern American tradition stemming from the achievements of William Carlos *Williams and Ezra *Pound. The more discursively conversational lyricism of his earlier work was superseded by the fluently direct and atmospherically evocative brevity of the poems in Sun Rock Man (1962). His many subsequent collections, some of which exemplify the possibilities of an extreme poetic minimalism, include Aegis: Selected Poems 1970–1980 (1984), and In Particular: Poems New and Selected (1986). Where Were We Now? (1991) is a collection of Corman's essays.

CORNFORD, Frances (1886–1960), British poet, the granddaughter of Charles Darwin; she was born in Cambridge, where her parents were both lecturers. In 1909 she married F. M. Cornford, one of Cambridge's leading classicists and later the University's Professor of Ancient Philosophy. John *Cornford was their son. She was encouraged in her early writing by Rupert *Brooke during his time studying at Cambridge and published Poems, her first volume, in 1910. Subsequent collections of her verse include Spring Morning (1915), Autumn Midnight (1923), Mountains and Molehills (1935), and On a Calm Shore (1960). Her Collected Poems appeared in 1954, and in 1959 she received the Queen's Gold Medal for Poetry. While some of her work displays the insipidity of the lesser poetry of the *Georgians, with whom she was associated, she frequently combines a disarming simplicity with incisive and unsettling commentaries on experience. A number of her poems achieve the hauntingly memorable quality that has resulted in the inclusion of 'To a Fat Lady Seen from a Train' and 'All Souls' Night' in numerous anthologies. She also translated French and Russian poetry, collaborating with Stephen *Spender to produce an English version of Paul Éluard's Le Dur Désir de Durer (1950).

CORNFORD, (Rupert) John (1915–36), British poet, born in Cambridgeshire, the son of Frances *Cornford and the eminent Cambridge classicist Professor F. M. Cornford; he was educated at the London School of Economics and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took a first in History. An active member of the Communist Party, he contributed the essay 'What Communism Stands For' to Christianity and the Social Revolution (1935, edited by John Lewis and others). In 1936 he travelled to Spain to join the International Brigade and was made leader of its English contingent. He was killed outside Lopera on the day after his twenty-first birthday. He began writing poetry at an early age in emulation of his mother, whose traditional style he dismissed when he encountered the work of T. S. *Eliot and W. H. Auden. His poems attracted favourable notice when they appeared in New Writing. His finest work is contained in 'Poems from Spain, 1936', which frequently display a poised acuteness of concentration in the face of battle similar to that found in the writing of Keith *Douglas. John Cornford: A Memoir (1938), edited by Pat Sloan, collects many of his poems and some political essays, which show a concern with defining the nature of ideological commitment. Understand the Weapon, Understand the Wound (edited by J. Galassi, 1986) is an edition of his poetry, essays, and letters. Journey to the Frontier: Julian Bell and John Cornford (1986) is a 'dual biography' by William Abrahams and Peter Stansky.

Cornhill Magazine, The, founded in 1860 by George Murray Smith; it quickly achieved huge sales through its policy of offering the serialization of two novels in each issue. William Makepeace Thackeray, who edited it from 1860 to 1862, Anthony Trollope, George Eliot, and Wilkie Collins were eminent among the contributors in its early years. Henry *James and Thomas *Hardy supplied novels serialized during the 1870s, when the magazine was edited by Leslie Stephen. Literary standards declined when his editorship ended in 1882, but rose again under Reginald John Smith, the editor between 1898 and 1916; during this period poems and prose pieces by Hardy were published and Sir Arthur *Quiller-Couch, Virginia *Woolf, Julian *Huxley, and Edmund *Gosse were among the contributors of essays and criticism. Work by Ford Madox Hueffer (later *Ford), Katherine *Tynan, and Robert *Bridges also appeared. After the First World War the Cornhill had a high reputation for its essays on literary history, biography, and criticism, though it became somewhat inert under the editorship of Lord Gorell in the 1930s and closed in 1939. In 1944 it re-emerged as a quarterly, edited by Peter *Quennell, who published verse and prose by a wide range of authors including John *Betjeman, Max *Beerbohm, Truman *Capote, Andre Gide, Evelyn *Waugh, and Somerset *Maugham. During the magazine's last decades it carried important work by Philip *Larkin, Robert *Graves, Frank *O'Connor, John *Fowles, Laurie *Lee, Joyce *Cary, and others; from 1955 onward, however, the continuing fall in its circulation proved irreversible and it ceased publication in 1975.

CORNWELL, Bernard, pseudonym of Bernard WIGGINS (1944–), British writer of historical novels, born in London. After studying at London University, he worked as a television producer for a number of years. His novels include Sharpe's Eagle (1981), which narrated the exploits of Richard Sharpe in Wellington's Army, as he fights his way up through the ranks; he continued his adventures in many subsequent novels, including Sharpe's Waterloo (1990) and Sharpe's Battle (1995), about the Peninsular War. The novels are carefully researched, the author having explored all the battlefields he writes about, but they should be taken as exciting narratives rather than military history. Other novels include Redcoat (1987), about Philadelphia in 1777; Stormchild (1991), an eco-political thriller; and a sequence of novels, Rebel (1993), Copperhead (1994), and Battle Flag (1995), about Nathaniel Starbuck, a heroic Yankee fighting on the wrong side in the American Civil War.

CORSO, Gregory (Nunzio) (1930–), American poet, born in New York; he was irregularly educated and sentenced to three years' imprisonment for attempted robbery at the age of 17. He subsequently worked as a labourer, a reporter, and a merchant seaman while pursuing his self-education. The Vestal Lady on Brattle (1955), his first collection of verse, was published in Cambridge, Massachusetts, where In This Hung-Up Age, the first of his several short plays, was produced in 1955. His meeting with Allen *Ginsberg and Jack *Kerouac in 1956 led to the establishment of his reputation as a poet of the *San Francisco Renaissance; his collections of the period include Gasoline (1958), Bomb (1958), and The Happy Birthday of Death (1960), which display the humour, politically directed moral outrage, and mystical rapture that are essential features of his writing. Since the early 1960s he has lived alternately in America and Europe and has held a number of posts at American universities. Among his many later publications, which sustain his characteristic richness of invention and vatic manner, are Long Live Man (1962), Elegiac Feelings American (1970), Earth Egg (1974), and Wings, Wands, Windows (1982); Mindfield: New and Selected Poems appeared in 1989. His other works include the novel The American Express (1961), a high-spirited adaptation of autobiographical material.

CORTEZ, Jayne (1936–), African-American jazz poet, born in Arizona. She has performed her poetry throughout the USA, Africa, Europe, and Latin America, and has made videos and recordings of her work, such as Celebrations and Solitudes (1975), Unsubmissive Blues (1980), There It Is (1982), Maintain Control (1987), and Everywhere Drums (1990). Characteristically political and topical, her poems are most effective when heard but also have impressive visual movement and musicality on the page and have been widely anthologized and translated. Her books include Festivals and Funerals (1971), Scarifications (1973), Coagulations: New and Selected Poems (1984), and Poetic Magnetic (1991).

CORVO, Baron, see ROLFE, F. W.

COTTON, John (1925–), British poet, born in London, educated at the University of London. He began his career as a schoolteacher in 1947 and was headmaster of Highfield Comprehensive School, Hemel Hempstead, from 1963 to 1985. With Ted *Walker, he founded the magazine Priapus in 1962, and was editor of the journal of the Private Libraries Association from 1969 to 1979. Old Movies and Other Poems (1971) was his first substantial collection of verse. His numerous subsequent volumes include Kilroy Was Here: Poems 1970–74 (1975), Day Book (1983), and Oh Those Happy Feet! (1986); Here's Looking at You Kid: New and Selected Poems appeared in 1990. Travel and natural observation are among the themes of his poetry, which also deals recurrently with various aspects of the cinema, a subject he engages with an attractive combination of wit and nostalgia. His other publications include the critical survey British Poetry since 1965 (1973).

COUZYN, Jeni (1942–), Canadian poet, born in South Africa, educated at the University of Natal. In 1966 she emigrated to Britain and established herself as a freelance writer. She became a Canadian citizen in 1975 and was appointed writer-in-residence at the University of Victoria, British Columbia, in 1976.

Flying, her first collection of poetry, was published in 1970; subsequent volumes include Christmas in Africa (1975), A Time to be Born (1981), Life by Drowning: Selected Poems (1985), and That's It (1993). Couzyn's poetry repeatedly engages the social, political, and imaginative implications of womanhood. Her desire for a poetry of broad social accessibility and her conception of the art as pre-eminently oral are reflected in the clarity and immediacy of much of her writing. Many of her most richly textured poems deal with her childhood in Africa. As an editor, she has produced two widely read anthologies of writing by women poets, The Bloodaxe Book of Contemporary Women Poets (1985) and Singing Down the Bones (1989).

COWARD, Sir Noël (Pierce) (1899–1973), British actor, dramatist, and composer, born in Teddington, Middlesex, the son of a piano salesman, and brought up in genteel poverty in the London suburbs. He went on the stage as a boy, and began to write prolifically as a young man, achieving fame and notoriety with *The Vortex (1924), in which he himself appeared as a drug addict tormented by his mother's adulteries. His long career as a dramatist produced other seriously intended plays, including the sentimental This Happy Breed (1942), about a lower-middle-class family between the wars; Peace in Our Time (1948), a speculative picture of Britain under Nazi occupation; and Song at Twilight (1966), a portrait and to some extent a self-portrait of a homosexual writer in old age. He also wrote musicals, notably Bitter Sweet (1929) and the patriotic pageant Cavalcade (1931). But he is best remembered for a series of comedies which fell into critical disrepute in the late 1950s, with the coming of a more socially conscious drama, but have since become widely lauded for their lively and idiosyncratic humour. Chief among these are the precocious The Young Idea (1921), about two adolescents who reconcile their divorced parents by separating the father from his disagreeable second wife and from 'county' society; Fallen Angels (1925), about two women waiting for the same glamorous Frenchman; Hay Fever* (1925); Private Lives* (1930); Design for Living (1933), about the creation of a successful ménage à trois, and a key play for those wishing to explore the subject of Coward's morality; Blithe Spirit (1941), about a mischievous ghost's attempts to steal her former husband from his second wife; and Present Laughter (1942), a portrait of a temperamental comedian. All these plays implicitly promote a hedonistic philosophy, in which sympathy goes to the sophisticated, carefree, witty, stylish, and defiantly and sometimes wickedly unconventional, while antipathy is reserved for the dull, staid, orthodox, and moralizing. The wit and panache with which Coward conveys such views primarily explains his improved standing in the stock-market of taste and the frequency with which his work is revived, not just in the West End of London, but by the National and other repertory theatres.

COWLEY, Malcolm (1898–1989), American historian, translator, critic, writer, and editor, born in Belsano, Pennsylvania, educated at Harvard. After some time in Europe, where he became associated with *Hemingway, *Scott Fitzgerald, and Dos Passos (see LOST GENERATION), Cowley became an editor with the New Republic. Associated with the literary and political left in the 1930s, he helped organize the first League of American Writers Congress in 1935, and was a central figure in the heated debate over the relationship of politics and aesthetics. In 1934 he published Exile's Return, an autobiographical literary history of the 1920s. He then became an editor and literary adviser, and a prominent champion of such writers as *Faulkner, *Cheever, and *Kerouac. As a critic he was hailed for his treatment of Faulkner's writing. His later writings concentrated on literary history in The Literary Situation (1954) and Think Back on Us: A Contemporary Chronicle of the 1930s (1969); Black Cargoes (1954) is a history of the black slave trade. His poetry appeared in Blue Juanita (1929) and The Dry Season (1941). Cowley also translated such writers as Valéry and Gide and produced two volumes of memoirs, entitled And I Worked at the Writer's Trade (1978) and The Dream of the Golden Mountains (1980). See also PROLETARIAN LITERATURE IN THE USA.

COWPER, Richard, pseudonym of Colin Middleton MURRY (1926–), British writer, born in Bridport, Dorset, the son of J. M. *Murry, educated at Brasenose College, Oxford. As Colin Middleton Murry he wrote One Hand Clapping (1975) and Shadows on the Grass (1977), which were vivid memoirs of his famous family. As Colin Murry, he published several novels, including The Golden Valley (1958) and A Path to the Sea (1961). Cowper became known for his elegiac *science fiction portraits of a fragile England threatened by transcendental change; among these are Breakthrough (1967), Time out of Mind (1973), and The Twilight of Briareus (1974), which is perhaps his best novel. The Road to Corlay (1978) and its sequels, set in a similar landscape, concern a new Church which soon becomes doctrinaire. Cowper's elegant stories have been collected in The Custodians (1976), The Web of the Magi (1980), and The Tithonian Factor (1984).

COX, Anthony Berkeley, see BERKELEY, ANTHONY.

COZZENS, James Gould (1903–78), American novelist, born in Chicago, educated at Harvard University where he completed Confusion (1924), his first novel. Other early novels include The Son of Perdition (1929) and S.S. San Pedro: A Tale of the Sea (1931), set in Cuba and the US merchant navy, respectively. Cozzens's fiction is more generally concerned with the precise delineation of social manners and mores and the place of institutions in the affairs of mankind. Men and Brethren (1936) concerns the dilemma that confronts an Episcopalian minister who tries to assist another minister expelled from the church for homosexuality. The Just and the Unjust (1942) is a murder story, which centres on the role of the legal system in the defence of an ordered society against the forces of anarchy, while Guard of Honour (1948; Pulitzer Prize), set in the Second World War at an airforce base in Florida, explores the related themes of command, duty, and responsibility within a military hierarchy. Cozzens won critical acclaim with By Love Possessed (1957); reviewers such as J. B. *Priestley and Angus *Wilson considered it one of the finest post-war American novels. Its theme is the operation of love, in all its various guises, over forty-eight hours of the life of a small American town. As so often in Cozzens's work, the conflict is between a puritanically stern moral education and the forces of change and modernity. His last novel is Morning Noon and Night (1968). Children and Others (1964) and A Flower in Her Hair (1974) are collections of short stories. In an age of experimentation, Cozzens's preoccupation with custom, law, and tradition earned him the opprobrium of many critics who associated his position with the conservatism and complacency of the Eisenhower era. It is only in more recent years that serious scrutiny of his work has emerged. Just Representations: A Cozzens Reader (1978; edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli) is an anthology of his writings, while the strongest case for his importance as a novelist is put by D. E. S. Maxwell in Cozzens (1964).

CRACE, Jim (James) (1946–), British novelist and short-story writer, born in Hertfordshire, educated at Birmingham College of Commerce and at London University. He worked for some time in educational television in the Sudan, and settled in Birmingham. His first full-length work was Continent (1986; Whitbread Prize), a collection of seven loosely connected but thematically interlinked stories from fictitious regions of an imaginary Third World, which blend folklore, anthropology, fable, and parable in a contemporary meditation on the people and cultures of developing countries and their relation to the developed world. The Gift of Stones (1988), set in the Stone Age at the dawn of the Bronze Age, and seen through the eyes of the one-armed 'story-teller' narrator and his adopted daughter, shows the plight of the simple tribe of 'stoneys' whose skill and expertise in fashioning flint is threatened by new technology. The prose is spare and lyrical, and the element of parable is subtly absorbed into the human narrative. Arcadia (1992) is a futuristic fable about the condition of cities in the late twentieth century, while Signals of Distress (1994) is a naturalistic exploration of the events that occur in a West Country town in the 1830s, when a ship runs aground.

CRAIGIE, Sir William Alexander (1867–1957), British lexicographer, born in Dundee, educated at the University of St Andrews. In 1897 he was invited to join the staff of the New English Dictionary (1928), as the Oxford English Dictionary was originally known. He remained engaged on the dictionary, of which he became a co-editor with James A. H. *Murray and Henry *Bradley in 1901, until 1933, when the first Supplement was published. He was responsible for 'N', 'Q', 'R', 'U', 'V', 'Si–Sq', and 'Wo–Wy', a contribution amounting to around one-fifth of the main work and one-third of the Supplement. Upon the dictionary's completion in 1928 he was knighted. He was Professor of English at the University of Chicago from 1925 to 1936 and co-edited the Dictionary of American English (1919–55). His other publications include Specimens of Icelandic Rimur (3 volumes, 1952), a comprehensive survey of the literature of Iceland, where he was held in high regard. His Dictionary of the Older Scottish Tongue remained unfinished at his death.

CRANE, (Harold) Hart (1899–1932), American poet, born in Garrettsville, Ohio, he grew up and was educated in Cleveland. In 1916 he established contacts with the literary circles associated with the Little Review and *The Seven Arts; the international *Modernism of the former and the latter's more conservative and nationalist aesthetics both affected his development as a poet—in much of his best work an experimental ethos and an emphatic urban realism combine with magisterial effects achieved through his virtuosity in the use of traditional forms. Throughout the early 1920s he lived in New York, working in various capacities while gaining increasing notice as a poet through his contributions to leading literary journals. White Buildings, his first collection of poetry, appeared to critical acclaim in 1926. Among the well-known works it contains are 'For the Marriage of Faustus and Helen', in which Crane's transcendentally lyrical view of his New York surroundings first achieves full expression, and the six poems of 'Voyages', an erotic and mystical meditation sustained by imagery of the sea. Encouraged by the success of White Buildings, Crane devoted himself to the completion of *The Bridge (1930), which is widely regarded as one of the major long poems of the twentieth century. The book was, however, disappointingly received by reviewers who failed to discern its underlying unity in terms of what Crane termed 'the rationale of metaphor'. In 1931 he travelled to Mexico to produce an epic poem based on the history of Montezuma; lack of progress on the work, together with accumulating personal difficulties, among them his increasingly heavy drinking and confusion regarding his sexuality, gave rise to the acute depression in which he jumped to his death from the boat on which he was returning to New York in April 1932. Complete Poems (1966) was edited by Brom Weber, who also edited Crane's Letters (1952). Voyager, John Unterecker's biography of Crane, appeared in 1969.

CREASEY, John (1908–73), British crime writer, undoubtedly the most prolific of all, who, from 1932 until his death, wrote over 560 novels under more than twenty pseudonyms. Best known are the Roger West and Richard Rollison ('the Toff') stories, written under his own name (Inspector West Takes Charge, 1942; Introducing the Toff, 1938) and the J. J. Marric police procedural novels in which the chief character is Commander George Gideon of Scotland Yard. The latter—Gideon's Day (1955) is the first—are to be preferred to the rest of his work. Under other pseudonyms he wrote romantic novels, Westerns, and juvenile fiction.

CREELEY, Robert (White) (1926–), American poet, born in Arlington, Massachusetts, educated at Harvard University, *Black Mountain College, and the University of New Mexico. He edited the Black Mountain Review from 1954 to 1957 and assisted Charles *Olson in developing his theories of *Projective Verse; Charles Olson and Robert Creeley: The Complete Correspondence (eight volumes, 1980–7) was edited by George F. Butterick. From the early 1960s he held a succession of posts at the University of New Mexico and the State University of New York, where he became Professor of Poetry and Humanities in 1989. Poems from numerous early collections, including Le Fou (1952) and The Whip (1957), were published to widespread critical acclaim as For Love: Poems 1950–1960 (1962); much of the verse forms terse and fluently exploratory treatments of emotional and perceptual experience. Notable among his many succeeding volumes of the 1960s are Words (1967), Numbers (1968), and Pieces (1968), which display an intensifying concern with linguistic fidelity to the processes of consciousness. In the course of the 1970s his verse became increasingly concerned with memory and its interactions with immediate experience; the understated elegiac quality sensed in Hello: A Journal (1978) is more fully present in Later (1980), in which perspectives on the past intensify an awareness of transience and ageing. Mirrors (1984), Memory Gardens (1987), Windows (1990), and Echoes (1995), his principal subsequent collections, contain work of remarkable scope: a moving emotional directness coexists with the refined minimalism of his earlier manner, while many poems exhibit a rich particularity and the laconic good humour that has always been present in his work. Collected Poems appeared in 1982 and Selected Poems, 1945–1990 in 1991. Among his other publications are The Island (1963), an autobiographical novel; the short stories of The Gold Diggers (1954, enlarged 1965) and Mister Blue (1964); and Autobiography (1990). Collected Essays (1989) forms a valuable chronicle of poetic developments in the post-war years.

CREWS, Harry (Eugene) (1935–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Bacon County, Georgia; he served in the US Marine Corps (1953–6) then graduated from the University of Florida in 1960 where he taught and became professor of English in 1974. His early life was marked by poverty, extreme violence, the separation of his parents, and the premature death of his father. The horror of his background, as well as its particular wonders, is described in A Childhood: The Biography of a Place (1978) which records the extraordinary delineaments of a usually unremarked existence. His novels include The Gospel Singer (1968), Naked in Garden Hills (1969), Car (1972), The Gypsy's Curse (1974), A Feast of Snakes (1976), All We Need of Hell (1987), The Knockout Artist (1988), and Scar Lover (1992); Classic Crews (1993), which includes A Childhood, is an ideal introduction to his work. He is a satirist of biting wit, whose novels feature grotesques and misfits, frequently in bizarre situations and settings, who search for meaning and belief in a materialistic world of violence and sex. The relationship between disfigurement and identity is a central preoccupation of his writing which offers a stark contrast to the idea of perfectability which pervades much of American culture. Though his work tends to drift towards symbolism as it moves further away from his past, it nevertheless retains a unique vision and a distinctive style.

CRICK, Bernard (Rowland) (1929–), British political theorist and biographer, born in London, educated at the University of London, where, after holding a succession of academic posts in Britain and America, he became Professor of Politics at Birkbeck College in 1971. His numerous influential works include In Defence of Politics (1962); Political Theory and Practice (1969); Crime, Rape, and Gin (1974), a study of contemporary attitudes to violence, pornography, and addiction; the essays of Political Thoughts and Polemics (1990); and 20/20 Visions: The Future of Christianity in Britain (1992). He remains best known for George Orwell: A Life (1980), the first authoritative biographical treatment of its subject, which was widely acclaimed for its sustained levelness of tone and unusually thorough research.

CRISPIN, Edmund, pseudonym of Robert Bruce MONTGOMERY (1921–78), British composer of choral and orchestral works, songs, and film music, who under this name wrote nine *detective novels and a number of short stories, beginning with The Case of the Gilded Fly (1944), written when he was an undergraduate at St John's College, Oxford. In all of the novels and most of the stories the detective is Gervase Fen, Professor of English at Oxford, a character reputedly modelled on a tutor at Crispin's own college. Crispin is one of the most amusing and witty English detective novelists, and at his best—in The Moving Toyshop (1946), which makes admirable use of an Oxford setting, Love Lies Bleeding (1948), or The Long Divorce (1951; alternative US title A Noose for Her)—combines these qualities with a solid plot and genuine detection. His last novel, Glimpses of the Moon (1977), is, however, a disappointment.

Criterion, The, a periodical founded with the financial support of Lady Rothermere in 1922 by T. S. *Eliot, who remained its editor until the final issue in 1939. Eliot's first wife Vivien supplied the title. *The Waste Land was published in the first issue. The magazine was taken over by the publishers Faber and Gwyer (later *Faber and Faber) after Eliot joined the firm in 1925. It rapidly gained an unrivalled reputation for literary quality, featuring work by most of the leading writers of the 1920s and encouraging the broad acceptance of *Modernism; Ezra *Pound, Virginia *Woolf, F. S. *Flint, W. B. *Yeats, Herbert *Read, E. M. *Forster, and I. A. *Richards were among its early contributors. It also regularly featured writing by a range of eminent European authors. In 1924 Eliot began his editorial commentaries, which tended to reflect his increasingly extreme conservative position on socio-cultural matters and his sense of communism's threat to the European tradition. Nevertheless, the Criterion remained open to conflicting shades of opinion and printed work by W. H. *Auden, Stephen *Spender, Louis *MacNeice, Hugh *MacDiarmid, and others known for their socialist sympathies during the early 1930s. A collected edition of its seventy-one issues appeared in 1967, with a preface by Eliot expressing his satisfaction with its overall achievement.

Critical Quarterly, The, a literary periodical founded in 1959 by C. B. Cox and A. E. Dyson to provide a widely accessible forum for contemporary poetry and criticism. The poetic and critical tenets of the *Movement were reflected in its editorial policy, and Donald *Davie and Philip *Larkin were eminent among early contributors of poems and reviews. Other poets whose work appeared in its pages in the 1960s included Ted *Hughes, Seamus *Heaney, Charles *Tomlinson, R. S. *Thomas, and Sylvia *Plath; Raymond *Williams, Bernard *Bergonzi, John *Wain, and Malcolm *Bradbury supplied critical commentaries. The magazine was among the primary channels for the establishment of poetic reputations in its earlier years. The twice-yearly publication of a supplementary Critical Survey between 1960 and 1973 had considerable influence in addressing matters relating to secondary education. After a period of editorial hostility towards the innovative ethos prevalent in much of the poetry of the late 1960s, the magazine revived its interest in a broad variety of contemporary writing; a flexible policy has prevailed since the formation of an editorial board in 1978. Prose fiction has latterly become a regular feature; Tony *Harrison, Tom *Raworth, U. A. *Fanthorpe, and James *Fenton are among the poets who have contributed work to more recent issues.

Crock of Gold, The, see STEPHENS, JAMES.

CROFTS, Freeman Wills (1879–1957), British *detective novelist, born in Dublin; he worked for a Northern Irish railway company as an engineer until 1929. His first book, The Cask (1920), is perhaps his masterpiece, but his best-known character is Inspector Joseph French, who appears in all his novels from Inspector French's Greatest Case (1925) onwards. Middle-aged and avuncular, French achieves his results through dogged persistence, rather than brilliant feats of deduction, and became the model for a number of similar fictional policemen. Though the writing is pedestrian, Crofts's plots are complex and solid—Raymond *Chandler called him 'the soundest builder of them all'—and often turn on the cunning manipulation of a railway timetable, as in Sir John Magill's Last Journey (1930). Also to be recommended are The Sea Mystery (1928), Death on the Way (1932; US title Double Death), and The Loss of the 'Jane Vosper' (1936).

Crome Yellow, a novel by A. *Huxley, published in 1921. First establishing Huxley's reputation for witty dialogue and cynically funny observation, it has usually been read as a roman-à-clef, satirizing Ottoline *Morrell's circle at Garsington. Lady Ottoline is caricatured as 'Priscilla Wimbush', devotee of astrology and Inspirational writings such as her guest Mr Barbecue-Smith's Pipe-Lines to the Infinite. 'Scogan', a voluble and libidinous rationalist, is based on Bertrand *Russell and H. G. *Wells, and the temperamental painter 'Gombauld' on Mark Gertler; 'Mary' is perhaps Dora Carrington, while the deaf, continually sketching 'Jenny' suggests Dorothy Brett. Huxley himself appears as the poet 'Denis Stone', split between thought and action, ineffectual in his amorous designs upon 'Anne Wimbush'. Though light-hearted, Crome Yellow does contain certain embryonic Huxleyan concerns: human isolation and egotism, the search for love, and a balanced philosophy of life. In particular, Scogan's urging of 'scientific openness' and the Rational State looks forward to Brave New World.*

CRONIN, Anthony (1926–), Irish poet, novelist, and critic, born in Enniscorthy, County Wexford, educated at University College, Dublin. In 1951 he became associate editor of *The Bell. His reminiscences of the city during the early 1950s are contained in Dead as Doornails (1976), which provides detailed portraits of Flann *O'Brien, Patrick *Kavanagh, and Brendan *Behan. His numerous collections of poetry include Poems (1957), Collected Poems: 1950–1973 (1973), R.M.S. Titanic (1981), The End of the Modern World (1989), and Relationships (1994). Cronin's poetry is remarkable for the tone of relaxed urbanity with which it ranges widely through his philosophical and political preoccupations. Many of his poems form strenuously anti-romantic treatments of social and ideological aspects of modern Irish life. His novels, The Life of Riley (1964) and Identity Papers (1979), are often highly amusing in the unfoldings of their intricate narratives. His critical writings include A Question of Modernity (1966) and Heritage Now (1982), a survey of Irish literature in the English language. Among his other works is the biography of Flann O'Brien, No Laughing Matter (1989). In 1980 he was appointed Cultural and Artistic Adviser to the Irish Prime Minister.

CRONIN, A(rchibald) J(oseph) (1896–1981), Scottish novelist, born into an Irish-Scottish Catholic family in Cardross, Dumbartonshire, and educated at the University of Glasgow, where he studied medicine. He served in the First World War as a surgeon sub-lieutenant with the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve; he then practised as a GP in Glasgow and London, and as a medical inspector of mines in South Wales. His first novel, Hatter's Castle (1931), set in a small Scottish town, combines a doomed love story with an account of the rise and fall of James Brodie, a hatter of overweening social ambition. The novel was hugely successful and established Cronin as a popular realist writer. Having given up medicine, Cronin produced a stream of bestsellers displaying the same narrative skill and humane spirit. The best known of these is

The Citadel (1937), a moral tale of a young physician's struggles to retain his integrity against the attraction of world success. Other notable works are The Stars Look Down (1941) and The Keys of the Kingdom (1942). His later work tended to the sentimental, perhaps because his tax-exile in Switzerland distanced him from the Scottish people and landscape which were his best inspiration. Many of his novels were successfully filmed, and the long-running television series Dr Finlay's Casebook was based on his characters.

CROSS, Amanda, pseudonym of Carolyn G(old) HEILBRUN (1926–), American academic and *detective story writer, educated at Wellesley College and Columbia University, and from 1972 Professor of English at Columbia; she is the author of critical studies on English literature and a number of detective stories, usually set in academic surroundings and written from a feminist point of view, in which Kate Fansler, Professor of English at an unnamed university in New York, brings the methods of literary criticism to bear on the crimes. In the Last Analysis (1964) is the first and perhaps the best; other titles include The James Joyce Murder (1967), The Theban Mysteries (1971), Death in a Tenured Position (1981; UK title A Death in the Faculty), and A Trap for Fools (1989).

CROSSLEY-HOLLAND, Kevin (John William) (1941–), British poet and translator, born in Mursley, Buckinghamshire, educated at St Edmund Hall, Oxford. He became Editorial Director at Victor Gollancz in 1972 and has held various academic posts. His first full collection, The Rain Giver (1972), was followed by several other volumes including The Dream-House (1976), Waterslain (1986), The Painting Room (1988), and New and Selected Poems, 1965–1990 (1991). As a poet, Crossley-Holland is recurrently concerned with locating his personal experience within the historical and topographical landscapes of his work. The principal locus of his later poetry is East Anglia, which is most memorably evoked in Waterslain. In many of his finest poems idiosyncratic rhythms interact with rich patterns of assonance and alliteration to unusually musical effect. Among his highly regarded translations of Old English poetry are Beowulf (1968) and The Exeter Riddle Book (1979). Havelok the Dane (1965) and The Labours of Herakles (1993) are among his many works for children and juveniles. His other writings include The Norse Myths: A Retelling (1980). He has also edited numerous anthologies of stories and poetry.

CROTHERS, Rachel (1878–1958), American dramatist, born in Bloomington, Illinois, educated at the Stanhope-Wheatcroft School of Acting. Crothers's early career in the theatre was as an actress; she directed all her own works and abandoned acting when Nora (1903), her first play, was produced. She wrote eighteen plays including The Three of Us (1906), her first major success, A Little Journey (1918), He and She (1920), Nice People (1921), Let Us Be Gay (1929), As Husbands Go (1931), When Ladies Meet (1932), and Susan and God (1937). Crothers's subject was women and the constraints of their social condition, particularly in relation to marriage and the prevailing sexual mores in the early twentieth century. She explored these subjects with a steadfast humour and a consummate stagecraft, especially in her shift from melodramatic comedies to the 'discussion' plays such as A Man's World (1910) and He and She.

Crow, a sequence of some sixty poems by Ted *Hughes, published in 1970, which features the figure of Crow as the central protagonist. The actuality of the bird as a feeder on carrion and its sinister associations in legend inform Hughes's characterization of Crow as a mythical embodiment of the instinct of survival; the book's gnostic vision of 'the horror of Creation' postulates a metaphysical context in which God despairs, man suffers, and Crow alone enjoys the minimal triumph of 'Flying the black flag of himself'; the bird is both the victim and witness of numerous episodes of extreme violence on cosmic and historical levels from which he emerges unscathed and indomitable. The violence of incident in many of the narratives and parables which make up the collection is matched by the reductively and forcefully functional syntax and diction Hughes adopts; the impact of the recurrent black humour and scatological references is increased by the harshly colloquial usages frequently employed. These qualities reflect Hughes's conscious effort in Crow to achieve a mode free of what he described as 'the terrible, suffocating, maternal octopus of ancient English poetic tradition'; the result is a work of great imaginative scope constituting an original myth of 'the war between vitality and death', as Hughes termed the central concern of his poetry in 1971. Hughes subsequently extended the Crow sequence in the limited editions A Few Crows (1970), Crow Wakes (1971), and Eat Crow (1971); a revised edition of Crow with illustrations by Leonard Baskin, the American artist who partly inspired Hughes to produce the sequence, appeared in 1973.

CROW DOG, see NATIVE AMERICAN LITERATURE.

CROWLEY, John (1942–), American novelist, born in Presque Isle, Maine, educated at Indiana University. His work has developed from its roots in *science fiction through *fantasy to *magic realism. His first novel, The Deep (1975), replays the Wars of the Roses on an artificial planet in the depths of space; Engine Summer (1979) depicts a disintegrated rural America. Crowley's most accomplished work, Little, Big (1981), a fantasy set in America, is the chronicle of a family's involvement with the supernatural. Aegypt (1987) is an erudite fantasy on an alternative history of the world; set in rural America, it follows its protagonist, Pierce Moffat, on a quest for hermetic knowledge. Love and Sleep (1994) is the second volume in the projected sequence. Crowley's short stories are collected in Novelty (1989).

Crucible, The, a play by Arthur *Miller, first directed by Jed Harris at the Martin Beck Theatre on 22 January 1953, when it ran for 197 performances. John and Elizabeth Proctor employ Abigail Williams, the promiscuous niece of the Reverend Samuel Parris. Elizabeth dismisses the girl. In revenge, Abigail accuses Elizabeth of witchcraft, a volatile charge in the political/religious atmosphere of late seventeenth-century New England. John Proctor defends his wife at her trial, but admits to adultery with Abigail. Compelled by a brief ambition to save his own neck, he signs a confession of Elizabeth's guilt, but then recants, and is sentenced to death. Miller's skill in this play was to use the notorious seventeenth-century Salem witch trials as a historical parallel to the contemporary witch hunts of the McCarthy era, in which the House Un-American Activities Committee pursued all those in public and artistic life tainted with known or implied political unorthodoxy. The difficulty faced by Miller was in the invention of vocabulary and speech rhythms which were at once authentically seventeenth-century, and yet accessible to modern audiences. Miller disliked the French film adaptation, Les Sorcières de Salem (1955), with a screenplay by Jean-Paul Sartre, starring Yves Montand and Simone Signoret, because it 'imposed a simplistic class analysis on the play', making it 'Marxist in the worst sense'. Two notable productions in London were those by George Devine at the Royal Court Theatre in 1956, and by Laurence Olivier at the Old Vic in 1965.

Cry, the Beloved Country, A. *Paton's best-known and most successful novel—subtitled 'A story of comfort in desolation'—published in 1948. Its first two parts each begins with the identical lyrical sentences that are characteristic of Paton's emotional prose: 'There is a lovely road that runs from Ixopo into the hills . . .' In the first section, a humble old African priest, Stephen Kumalo, sets out from his home in Natal for Johannesburg—'All roads lead to Johannesburg'—to search for his sister Gertrude and his son Absalom, from whom he has not heard for some time. He discovers that his sister has turned to prostitution and his son, having fallen into bad company, faces the death sentence for murder. Absalom's victim, ironically, is a 'good' white man, Arthur Jarvis, who was dedicated to helping the African people and working to change the apartheid system. The second part of the novel focus on Jarvis's father, a landowner in the priest's own village, who reads through his son's papers in an attempt to understand his liberal ideas. Absalom at his trial admits that he killed out of fear, and is condemned to hang. Kumalo returns to Natal with Gertrude's son and Absalom's pregnant wife. In the last section of the novel, each father separately coming to terms with his personal loss, there is a reconciliation between Jarvis senior and Kumalo, and in Jarvis's determination to help the poor black community Paton advances the optimistic view that 'fear could not be cast out, but by love', seeing tolerance and Christian charity as the solution to South Africa's racial situation.

Crying of Lot 49, The, a novel by Thomas *Pynchon, published in 1966. The plot is essentially a fictional tool of convenience whereby Pynchon can explore what he takes to be the problematic, if not frequently conspiratorial, nature of reality. Oedipa Maas discovers she has been made the executrix of the estate of Pierce Inverarity, a former lover. This sets her off on an increasingly bizarre and sinister trail of detection during which she discovers what she believes to be a secret communication system dating from the sixteenth century, whose symbol is the Tristero (a muted posthorn). She believes that the bidder for Inverarity's stamp collection at an auction will solve the enigma of the Tristero, but the novel ends as she awaits the crying out of the relevant lot 49. Like many of the major works of American *post-modernism, the novel is a work of *metafiction, interrogating the nature of its own fictional universe as much as that of the ostensibly 'real' world through which Oedipa passes. His second, and shortest novel, The Crying of Lot 49 contains much of his most inventive writing, notably in its hilarious parody of a Jacobean tragedy, but Pynchon himself is known to have a low opinion of it.

CULLEN, Countee (1903–46), American poet, born in Louisville, Kentucky; he grew up in Harlem, New York and was educated at New York University and Harvard, where his poetry was praised by Irving *Babbitt. Color (1925) gained him widespread acclaim. His subsequent volumes include Copper Sun (1927) and The Black Christ (1929). His poetry made fluent use of the traditional modes of English verse to articulate his impassioned concern with the experience of black Americans. A leading figure in the *Harlem Renaissance, he edited Caroling Dusk (1927), an anthology of poems by writers associated with the movement. During the 1930s he concentrated on his work as a playwright, which culminated in the successful Broadway production of the musical St Louis Woman (with Arna *Bontemps, 1946). On These I Stand (1947) contained previously uncollected poetry with a selection from his earlier volumes. His other works include a translation of Euripides' Medea (1935) and the novel One Way to Heaven (1932), which deals with moral and social divisions within the Harlem community. My Soul's High Song (edited by G. L. Early, 1991) collects his verse along with a variety of essays, travel writings, and autobiographical fragments. Alan R. Suchard's Countee Cullen appeared in 1984. See also ETHNICITY.

Cultural Materialism is a term which has, from the 1980s, become something of a catch-all, implying an interdisciplinary theoretical orientation which approaches 'cultural texts' (by no means exclusively literary ones) as materially produced by political and social forces, institutions of patronage, and ideological 'discourses' (educational, legal, religious, etc.) specific to their historical moment. Ostensibly coining it (despite earlier claims within the field of anthropology by Harris, The Rise of Anthropological Theory, 1965), Dollimore and Sinfield (Political Shakespeare, 1985) define the term as combining insights offered through Marxist, feminist, and *post-structural critiques of traditional assumptions about cultural texts. Its self-declared task is to analyse them as embodying the complex cultural contradictions of the moment of their production, but unlike its American cousin, *New Historicism, cultural materialism lays claim to a theoretical method which escapes the limitations of *Formalism and holds a radical political commitment to expose traditional categories of critical thinking and hierarchy. The sophisticated Marxist theories of Walter Benjamin and Raymond *Williams are crucial influences. See also MARXIST LITERARY CRITICISM.

CUMMINGS, E(dward) E(stlin) (1894–1962), American poet and graphic artist, born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, educated at Harvard. In 1917 he volunteered for service in France with the Norton-Harjes Ambulance Corps. A censor's confusion over remarks in his letters led to his imprisonment for three months on suspicion of treasonable activity. The interlude formed the basis of his widely acclaimed first book, The Enormous Room (1922), which set the tone for most of his work in its iconoclastic testimony to radical individualism. Tulips and Chimneys (1923) was the first of his collections of verse. The Dial* awarded him its annual poetry prize in 1925, the year in which the publication of XLI Poems and *& enhanced his already considerable reputation. His idiosyncratic poetic forms advanced the *free-verse modes given currency by *Imagism to new levels of typographical ingenuity. Sophisticated punning, evocative verbal coinages, and the audacious use of vernacular idioms are also characteristic of his poetry. His ethos of individuality formed the basis for many satires against the collective mentality of political authorities; notable examples include 'Thanksgiving' and 'Kumrads die because they're told', respectively directed at the governments of the USA and USSR. The erotic candour in many of his poems made him a figure of controversy, although his deftness obviated any recourse to the vocabulary traditionally identifying literature as pornographic. His subsequent collections include VV (ViVa) (1931), No Thanks (1935), 1 × 1 (1944), and 95 Poems (1958). He exhibited widely as a graphic artist and published CIOPW in 1931, the letters of the title respectively representing his chosen media of charcoal, ink, oils, pencil, and watercolour. HIM (1927) and Santa Claus (1946), which anticipate the drama of the absurd in their estranging comic and symbolic strategies, are his principal works for theatre. Complete Poems: 1910–1962 was published in 1980. Dreams in the Mirror (1980) is a biography of Cummings by R. S. Kennedy.

CUNNINGHAM, J(ames) V(incent) (1911–95), American poet, born in Cumberland, Maryland, educated at Stanford University. His books include The Helmsman (1942), The Judge Is Fury (1947), Doctor Drink (1950), Trivial, Vulgar & Exalted: Epigrams (1957), The Exclusions of a Rhyme: Poems and Epigrams (1960), To What Strangers, What Welcome: A Sequence of Short Poems (1964), and Some Salt: Poems and Epigrams (1967). The Collected Poems and Epigrams appeared in 1971 and Collected Essays in 1976. Cunningham is an austere poet with a passion for exact statement in tightly controlled forms, whose ideal poetic models were those of Roman satire and the conceits of the most formal sixteenth- and seventeenth-century poetry. He stood against the self-expressive rhetoric and emotionalism of much of the most fashionable poetry of his times, including Romanticism, its post-Romantic modernist orthodoxy, as in the work of T. S. *Eliot and Wallace *Stevens, the open forms of those who wrote in the Poundian tradition, and the confessionalism much in vogue in the 1950s and 1960s. His chosen form is the classical epigram, his elected idiom the satiric and self-parodic, which allows for the play of wit and irony in his commentary on the absurdity of human life. He is the subject of a critical study by his mentor Yvor *Winters.

CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM, R(obert) B(ontine) (1852–1936), Scottish author, born in London, educated at Harrow. Much of his writing is deeply informed by his experiences of the various South American countries in which he lived from 1870 to 1881. His numerous biographies of South American figures include Hernando de Soto (1903) and Pedro de Valdivia (1926). In 1886 he became Member of Parliament for North-West Lanark, which he represented until 1892. He was active in the emergence of British socialism and was the first president of the Scottish National Party upon its foundation in 1928. His literary reputation was established with Mogreb-el-Acksa (1898), an account of a journey to the Moroccan city of Tarudant, which impressed his friends Joseph *Conrad and G. B. *Shaw. Among his other works as a travel writer are A Vanished Arcadia (1901), a description of the decayed Jesuit settlement in Paraguay, and Cartagena and the Banks of the Sinú (1920), on his explorations in Colombia. His volumes of short stories and essays include The Ipané (1899), Success (1902), Brought Forward (1916), and Mirages (1936). Biographical studies include A. F. Tschifelly's Don Roberto (1937).

CURNOW, Allen (1911–), New Zealand poet and critic, born in Timaru, educated at the universities of Canterbury and Auckland. He worked in journalism in New Zealand, London, and the USA before taking up academic posts at Auckland University. Not in Narrow Seas (1939) was a poem sequence with prose 'commentary' treading a mythopoeic line on New Zealand history and poetry; Island & Time (1941) included the fine long poem 'The Unhistoric Story' which was to prove a lasting landmark in poetic debate. Curnow's editing of the influential, and controversial, Book of New Zealand Verse 1923–1945 (1945), which contained a powerfully argued 35-page Introduction, further developed his ideas of poetry, place, and history at a crucial moment in his nation's consciousness. Committed to the belief that poetry must reflect the specific issues of a time and place for New Zealand, he also held that 'Local reference ought never to decide our estimate of a poem's worth'. Also controversial was his edition of The Penguin Book of New Zealand Verse (1960); his introductions to these anthologies are central documents for discussion of New Zealand poetry. Other collections include At Dead Low Water (1949), Poems 1949–1957 (1957), A Small Room with Large Windows (1962), Trees, Effigies and Moving Objects (1972), An Abominable Temper (1973), and Collected Poems 1922–1973 (1974). An Incorrigible Music (1979) is a sequence of poems exploring the extremes of human violence, while You Will Know When You Get There: Poems 1979–81 (1982) explored themes relating mostly to old age and mortality. Selected Poems (1982) confirmed the strong sense of sequential development in Curnow's poetic concerns; his strength as a poet is in his enduring engagement with the issues of time, history, and mutability. Later collections include Continuum, New and Later Poems 1972–1988 (1988), and Selected Poems 1940–1989 (1990). Look Back Harder: Critical Writings 1935–1984 (1987) testifies to Curnow's formidable range of interests and to his unflagging energies.

CURTIS, Tony (1946–), British poet, born in Carmarthen, Dyfed, educated at University College, Swansea. After a period as a schoolteacher, he lectured at Glamorgan College of Education, Barry, and became a senior lecturer in English at the Polytechnic of Wales, Pontypridd, in 1979. His collections of verse include Album (1974), Preparations (1980), Letting Go (1983), Selected Poems, 1970–1985 (1986), The Last Candles (1989), Taken for Pearls (1993), and War Voices (1995). The domestic and local modes which prevailed in his earlier poetry have been increasingly supplemented by poems responding to broader social concerns. His later writing is also marked by ambitious use of dramatic monologues to enact events geographically and historically remote from the contemporary Welsh context which forms a basis for much of his best work. His other publications include the critical monograph Dannie Abse (1985). Among his works as an editor is the anthology The Poetry of Snowdonia (1989).

Custom of the Country, The, a novel by Edith *Wharton, published in 1913. Set in the early twentieth century, the narrative recounts the successive marriages of the beautiful and ruthlessly avaricious Undine Spragg: to Ralph Marvell, the gentle yet vulnerable representative of the older New York; to the Marquis Raymond de Chelles of the old French aristocracy, with houses in Burgundy and the Faubourg St Germain; and to the immensely wealthy Elmer Moffatt, formerly of Apex City, Kansas, a robust member of the new American social breed who had been Undine's first husband in a short-lived secret marriage before becoming her fourth and last husband. Wharton constructs a subtle narrative of contrasts and similarities between a variety of customs and countries, of social structures and social types. Ralph Marvell's old-fashioned New York is contrasted with that of the invader and conqueror Peter van Degen, a gross millionaire playboy, who takes Undine as his mistress for two months. These in turn are contrasted with the fashionable Paris milieu, and the life of the French aristocracy. The novel is a fierce indictment of the mindless materialism Wharton sees infecting American life at the turn of the twentieth century.

CUTLER, Ivor (1923–), British humourist and poet; Cutler grew up in Glasgow, where he was educated at Shawlands Academy. He has been a freelance writer and performer of his work since the late 1950s. Gruts (1962) contained short stories and songs which had provoked controversy when they were previously broadcast on BBC radio; the stories, which established Cutler as an eccentric literary talent, are characteristically brief and constitute mutedly surreal and obliquely disturbing commentaries on human behaviour. Cock-a-Doodle Don't (1966) and Life in a Scottish Sitting Room, Vol. 2 (1984) are further collections of his stories. Among his numerous collections of poetry are Many Flies Have Feathers (1973) and the prose poems of A Nice Wee Present from Scotland (1988). His poems, laconic but gently insistent, display his bizarre conceptions with a disquieting air of ordinariness. He is also well-known as an author of books for children. Recent humorous prose works include Glasgow Dreamer (1990), Befriend and Bacterium (1992), and A Stuggy Pren (1994).

Cyberpunk: a *science fiction term, used to define a loose movement of 1980s writers whose works anticipated the effects of the high-tech computerized world to come. The term was taken by editor Gardner Dozois from the title of a short story by Bruce Bethke and applied by him primarily to novels by William *Gibson and Bruce *Sterling to designate work which embraced the new cybernetic world-environment, while simultaneously debunking the long-held cultural assumption in American popular literature that heroic inventiveness would win the day. The central text espousing this vision is Gibson's Neuromancer (1984), a novel whose hero is a 'cyberspace cowboy' (an information thief) who electronically penetrates a world-encompassing computer net in search of data he can steal. His experiences inside the 'virtual reality' of the network and his punkish indifference to politics, power, or ethical issues signals an equally relevant message offered by cyberpunk writers: that the heroic autonomy of 'Western Man' counts for little now that he has become symbiotic with a world-system driven by data. Cyberpunk writers tend to use imagery and plot-lines abstracted from the doom-laden films noirs of the 1940s. Gibson and other cyberpunk writers such as K. W. Jeter, Rudy Rucker, Lewis Shiner, John Shirley, and Walter Jon Williams have set out to demonstrate the possibilities of a new high-tech world rather than scientific extrapolation for its own sake. The movement became a marketing term by about 1987, and derivative texts continue to be published, especially in the USA, but none of its originators any longer admit to the label.

D

DABYDEEN, Cyril (1945–), Canadian poet, born in Berbice, Guyana; he emigrated to Canada in 1970 and studied at Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario. Formerly a schoolteacher in Guyana, he taught at Algonquin College, Ottawa, from 1975 to 1981. In 1986 he became a teacher of creative writing at the University of Ottawa, taking up Canadian citizenship in 1976; he was appointed Poet Laureate of Ottawa in 1985. His poetry and fiction display a recurrent concern with the tensions of displacement and adjustment in relation to the experience of immigration. Collections of his verse include Poems in Recession (1972), Heart's Frame (1979), Islands Lovelier than a Vision (1986), and Coastlands: New and Selected Poems (1989). His vivid and inventive poetry draws equally upon his experiences of Canada and Guyana. His prose works include the short stories of Still Close to the Island (1980) and Jogging in Havana (1992), and the satirical novel The Wizard Swami (1989).

DABYDEEN, David (1956–), Guyanese poet, novelist, and art historian, born in Guyana, educated at Cambridge and London Universities. He has held a number of academic appointments in America. His first book, Slave Song (1984; Commonwealth Prize for Poetry), contains harshly 'anti-pastoral' monologues in Creole dialect recreating the brutally restricted and anguished lives of sugar plantation workers. The poetry in Coolie Odyssey (1988) is more reflective and directly personal though still firmly based on the East Indian experience, and the destructive legacy of colonialism, both in Britain and in Guyana. Turner: New and Selected Poems appeared in 1994. His first novel, The Intended (1990), is partly a critique of Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness*; Disappearance (1993) explores the disillusionment of a Guyanese man whose notions of 'civilization' and 'antiquity' are contradicted by his encounter with a decaying, post-imperial Britain. Other works include Hogarth's Blacks: Images of Blacks in Eighteenth-Century English Art (1985), and Hogarth, Walpole and Commercial Britain (1987). With Nana Wilson-Tagoe he co-authored A Reader's Guide to West Indian and Black British Literature (1988).

Dada, an anarchic internationalist movement in art and literature which originated in Zurich in 1916, where the Cabaret Voltaire, a café opened by Hugo Ball, a German theatrical producer, provided a focus for exhibitions, readings, and other more experimental forms of creative activity. Dada, a French word for 'hobby-horse' chosen on impulse from a dictionary by Ball, formed a conscious reaction by various expatriate artists to the apparent futility of the First World War and the cultural failure it implied. The Zurich group included the Romanian poets Marcel Janco and Tristan Tzara, the movement's eventual leader, and the painters Hans Richter, Max Ernst, and Jean Arp. Initially sympathetic to Futurism and Cubism, as their belief in nihilism and disorder evolved, the Dadaists repudiated these movements as excessively programmatic; Tzara spoke of Dada's 'great task of destruction and negation' and Richter defined its sole principle as 'to outrage public opinion'. Although not named as such, characteristically Dadaist work was also produced in New York around 1916 by the photographer Man Ray, the sculptor Marcel Duchamp, and the painter Francis Picabia; with Dadaists from Berlin, Hanover, Barcelona, and other parts of Europe to which the movement had spread, they arrived in Paris in 1919–20. German Dada's early expiry resulted from the increasingly political motivation of its exponents, among whom were the writer Richard Huelsenbeck, the painter George Grosz, and the celebrated photo-montagist John Heartfield. Tzara quickly assumed a dominant position in the Paris group, who also included the French writers André Breton, Louis Aragon, and Paul Eluard. The movement climaxed in a series of energetically chaotic 'manifestations' in Paris in 1920 and 1921, after which rivalry developed between Breton, who advocated political purpose, and the resolutely nihilistic Tzara. From 1922 onward, Breton and his associates gradually transmuted Dada into *Surrealism.

D'AGUIAR, Fred(erick) (1960–), British poet and novelist, born in London of Guyanese parents. He spent his early years in Guyana, and returned to London in 1972 where he trained as a psychiatric nurse; he also read English and Caribbean Studies at the University of Kent. D'Aguiar's poems are notable for their humane yet unsentimental humour, and mastery of the Creole dialect. Mama Dot (1985) and Airy Hall (1989) contain poems ranging widely in subject, including those which vividly recall his childhood, and family relations. Based on his own grandmother, 'Mama Dot' is an archetypal figure of ageless, matriarchal wisdom. A more recent collection is British Subjects (1993). His play A Jamaican Airman Foresees His Death was staged at the Royal Court Theatre, London, in 1991; inspired by *Yeats, it celebrates the West Indian contribution to the British Second World War effort. The Longest Memory (1994), his first novel, uses a series of dramatic monologues to create a compound picture of the culture of slavery on a Virginia plantation circa 1800. Dear Future (1996) confirmed D'Aguiar as a novelist of strength and originality.

DAHLBERG, Edward (1900–77), American novelist and essayist, born in Boston, Massachusetts; he left a Jewish orphanage to drift around the USA and Europe. He graduated from Columbia University in 1925. Bottom Dogs (1929), a novel dealing with his orphan years in Kansas City and Cleveland, was written as an expatriate and first appeared in London, with an introduction by D. H. *Lawrence. Dahlberg was on the literary left in the 1930s, writing for magazines such as New Masses, and producing Those Who Perish (1934), a specifically anti-Nazi novel. His early works were in a vernacular, social realist vein, but he developed a richly allusive prose full of classical and biblical references, seasoned with a recondite vocabulary. Do These Bones Live (1941) is his major work of polemical literary criticism and marks the change in style. A mentor to Charles *Olson, with whom he eventually quarrelled, Dahlberg seized upon America as a mythic subject. The essays in The Flea of Sodom (1950) and The Sorrows of Priapus (1957) are often bitterly critical of modern culture and remarkable for their moral astringency and preoccupation with myth. He returned to more conventional narrative in the 1960s, and his critical reputation began to be rewarded. Among other works, Dahlberg has written a literary autobiography, Because I Was Flesh (1964); An Edward Dahlberg Reader (1967); and Epitaphs For Our Times (1967), a volume of selected letters. In 1968 he was elected to the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Disputatious and rootless, Dahlberg's 'true parable lay in his own personal confessions of a Jew in America' (Paul Christensen).

DAICHES, David (1912–), British critic, born in Sunderland; he grew up in Edinburgh, where he was educated at the University. After gaining his D.Phil. at Oxford in 1939, he held professorships at the University of Chicago and Cornell University. Having returned to Britain in 1951, he lectured at Cambridge before becoming Professor of English at the University of Sussex in 1961. A critic of unusual range, his works, which evaluate literature with reference to its broader social and cultural contexts, include Literature and Society (1938), Virginia Woolf (1942), Robert Burns (1950, revised edition 1966), Willa Cather (1951), and George Eliot: Middlemarch (1962). Notable among his historical and biographical studies is The Last Stuart: The Life and Times of Bonnie Prince Charlie (1973). He has also produced a highly regarded body of autobiographical writing in Two Worlds: An Edinburgh Jewish Childhood (1957), A Third World (1971), and Was (1975). Since the late 1960s he has published books on a wide variety of topics, which include Scotch Whisky: Its Past and Present (1969), Scotland and the Union (1977), and God and the Poets (1984).

DALE, Peter (1938–), British poet, born in Addlestone, Surrey, educated at St Peter's College, Oxford. A schoolteacher by profession, he was appointed Head of English at Hinchley Wood School, Surrey, in 1972. In 1971 he became co-editor of Agenda* magazine. His reputation was firmly established with The Storms (1968), his first substantial collection of verse, which earned him an Arts Council bursary in 1969. Mortal Fire (1970) contains his best-known work. Further collections of his verse include the sonnet sequence entitled One Another (1978), Too Much of Water (1983), and Earth Light (1991). Dale's work is strongest when the emotional immediacy of his subject matter compels him to an impressive plainness of form and diction. His technical range is broad, encompassing concise imagistic treatments, accomplished use of traditional forms, and discursive vers libre. Since the appearance of The Legacy and Other Poems (1971), translations in strict ballade stanzas of works by Villon, Dale has been increasingly highly valued as a translator. Among his numerous other volumes of translations are Narrow Straits: Poems from the French (1985).

D'ALPUGET, Blanche (1944–), Australian writer, born in Sydney, the daughter of Lou d'Alpuget, a well-known Sydney journalist; she herself worked as a journalist, and lived in Malaysia and Indonesia for a number of years. Her first novel, Monkeys in the Dark (1980), about a young Australian journalist's involvement with an Indonesian activist in the aftermath of the 1965 coup in Jakarta, has affiliations with Christopher *Koch's The Year of Living Dangerously (1978) in its exploration of Australia's relationship with the Far East. It was followed by the highly successful and award-winning Turtle Beach (1981), whose central character is also a journalist, which continued this broad focus in its examination of the traumatic connections between Vietnamese refugees in Malaysia and the Australian officials involved in their resettlement. Winter in Jerusalem (1986) describes a young woman's search for a deeper understanding of the city of her birth and her attempts to write a successful screenplay. White Eye (1994) is a murder mystery. Non-fiction works include a biography of Sir Richard Kirby (1977) and an acclaimed study of Australia's then Prime Minister, Robert J. Hawke (1982).

Dance to the Music of Time, A, a novel in twelve volumes by Anthony *Powell, published in 1951–75. Beginning with A Question of Upbringing (1951), ending with Hearing Secret Harmonies (1975), and borrowing its title and pervasive metaphor from Nicolas Poussin's painting in the Wallace Collection, London, the sequence is widely regarded as one of the main achievements in twentieth-century English fiction and Powell's finest work. Written in a typically rococo style, and calling frequently on chance and coincidence to effect connections, it is in essence the story of the first three-quarters of the century seen mainly from the vantage point of the upper classes and the bohemian demi-monde. Its narrator is the self-effacing Nicholas Jenkins, whose story begins at an English public school. Here we meet many characters who either reappear as time and novels pass, or who fade out altogether. Jenkins's generation grows up in the aftermath of the First World War and matures as Nazism rises and the Second World War begins to rage. Powell is rightly renowned for his ability to draw memorable comic characters and depict absurd situations, but this does not diminish the overlying seriousness of the work. His method is exemplified particularly by Widmerpool, the butt of school pranks who, though often seen as ridiculous by his peers, is a dogged achiever and a dark and damaged man. Among many unforgettable characters, some are relatives of Jenkins, like his Uncle Giles, the eccentric black sheep of the family; others, including X. Trapnel, a writer, Mr Deacon the artist, and the literary hustlers Quiggin and Members, are drawn from the creative fraternity to which the author belonged in youth and middle age. Powell's dance, though apparently improvised and haphazard, is strictly formal and rigidly structured. The novels are grouped in threes and symbolize the four seasons. A Question of Upbringing (1951), A Buyer's Market (1952), and The Acceptance World (1955) represent spring and, consequently, school, university, and the narrator's first adventures and misadventures in sex. The second trilogy, comprising At Lady Molly's (1957), Casanova's Chinese Restaurant (1960), and The Kindly Ones (1962), is symbolically summer, in which work and marriage dominate. The war years mark autumn and figure largely in The Valley of Bones (1964), The Soldier's Art (1966), and The Military Philosophers (1968). The final trilogy—Books Do Furnish a Room (1971), Temporary Kings (1973), and Hearing Secret Harmonies (1975)—moves to the dismal aftermath of war, in which Jenkins, now a writer in his sixties, recalls acquaintances either dead or lost with the passage of years. Winter closes as it opened the sequence with Jenkins reflecting that 'Even the formal measure of the Seasons seemed suspended in the wintry silence.'

Dancing at Lughnasa, a play by Brian *Friel, performed and published in 1990. This semi-autobiographical piece, set in 1936 in a decaying country house outside the fictional Irish village of Ballybeg, is narrated from some unspecified time in the future by Michael, the illegitimate son of Chris Mundy; and it involves her, her priest brother Jack, and her four sisters, Kate, Maggie, Rose, and Agnes. The principal events are visits by Michael's feckless Welsh father, the brief disappearance and probable seduction of the mentally backward Rose, and the gradual revelation that Jack, who has recently returned from a mission in Africa, has abandoned Catholicism for shamanism. One subject is the disintegration of home and family, soon to culminate in Rose's and Agnes's disastrous escape to England. Another is the paganism lurking below the shabby-genteel Christian surface and represented by the dancing that recurs during the play.

DANE, Clemence, pseudonym of Winifred ASHTON (1888–1965), British playwright and novelist, born in Blackheath, London. She studied art at the Slade School of Art and in Dresden, later becoming an actress. She achieved recognition with her first novels, Regiment of Women (1917) and Legend (1919), before turning to drama. Her later novels include Broome Stages (1931), a romantic presentation of theatrical life which establishes analogues between a family of actors and the Plantagenets. The first and most enduring of her many plays, A Bill of Divorcement (1921), concerns a woman who divorces on the grounds of her husband's insanity so that she can remarry. Other plays include Will Shakespeare (1921), Granite (1926), Wild Decembers (1933), about the Brontës, and a dramatized version of Max *Beerbohm's The Happy Hypocrite. In many of her works she was preoccupied by a romantic sense of England. Her pseudonym is derived from the church of St Clements Dane, London.

DARK, Eleanor (1901–85), Australian novelist, born in Sydney. She began contributing stories to the Bulletin* and other journals from 1921. Her first novel, Slow Dawning (1932), like many of her works, was set in a small country town. Prelude to Christopher (1933), a more ambitious novel, displays a prevailing concern with the nature of time. Return to Coolami (1935) explores the inner worlds of four people during a long car journey through New South Wales. In Sun Across the Sky (1937) and Waterway (1938) the action takes place in a single day and centres on the interrelationship of the characters, some of whom appear in both novels. The Little Company (1945) centres on Gilbert Massey, a radical Sydney-based writer-publisher. Themes of pacifism, feminism, politics, and religion, and an intense psychological focus, characterize her works. The historical trilogy, The Timeless Land (1941), Storm of Time (1948), and No Barrier (1953), traces the development of European settlement in Australia from 1788 to 1813. Published in one volume as The Timeless Land in 1963, the trilogy is widely regarded as a landmark in Australian national literature for its realistic yet imaginative portrayal of an emergent society.

Dark as the Grave Wherein My Friend Is Laid, a novel by Malcolm Lowry, published posthumously in 1968. Its title is taken from Abraham Cowley's elegy 'On the Death of Mr William Harvey'. The novel, which is largely autobiographical, and almost confessional in tone, concerns Sigbjorn Wilderness, a middle-aged writer with a serious drink problem who, accompanied by his wife, Primrose, journeys from his home in Canada to Mexico, on a kind of pilgrimage of self-discovery that is also a descent into hell. In theme and content, the book has many similarities with Lowry's greatest work, Under the Volcano (1947), although, unlike the earlier novel, it ends on a note of reconciliation and relative optimism, as Sigbjorn conquers the devils of his past and looks forward to a new life.

Darkness at Noon, a novel by Arthur *Koestler, published in 1940, translated from German, which George *Orwell regarded as a valuable 'interpretation of the Moscow "confessions" by someone with an inner knowledge of totalitarian methods'. The novel concerns Stalin's regime and his purge of the Soviet Communist Party during the late 1930s. Koestler, however, wrote it as a parable set in an anonymous state ruled by 'No. 1', believing that its central theme of the conflict between political expediency and individual morality was applicable to any revolutionary dictatorship, including Franco's Spain and Hitler's Germany. The novel begins with the arrest and imprisonment of the main character, Rubashov, who appears initially to be an innocent man accused of fabricated crimes. However, he undergoes successive interrogations by his former 'Party' subordinates Ivanov and Gletkin, which become dialogues in which Rubashov discovers that he is guilty of the sins of his persecutors. His confession and eventual execution are the logical consequences of his having believed in the revolution and its power to determine history: an objective process in which he, as an individual, is but 'a multitude of one million divided by one million'.

DARYUSH, Elizabeth (1887–1977), British poet, the daughter of Robert *Bridges; she was born in London and educated privately. After her marriage in 1923 she travelled with her husband to Persia, his native country, and returned to England in 1927. Her first collection of poetry, Charitessi (1911), was followed by two other early volumes, Verses (1916) and Sonnets from Hafez (1921). She subsequently disclaimed these, however, considering her achievement as a poet to consist of a series of volumes from Verses (1930) to Verses: Sixth Book (1938). A Selected Poems with an introduction by Yvor *Winters was published in America in 1948, with a revised and enlarged British selected edition appearing in 1972. Daryush's interest in metrical experiment, also a feature of her father's poetry, resulted in her frequent use of syllabic metres, which she developed, generally in combination with rhyme, to a high degree of lyrical refinement. Her poetry is notable for the austerity and decorousness of its recurrent philosophical reflections on transience and for its idiosyncratic use of archaic diction. Donald *Davie edited her Collected Poems (1976), arguing in his introductory essay for wider recognition of her achievement as a contemplative and innovative poet.

DAS, Kamala (1934–), Indian writer, born in Malabar, India. Her autobiographical My Story (India, 1976; UK, 1978) is a highly introspective and subjective account of the creation and development of a woman poet. It is interspersed with some of Das's best verse. Famous, even notorious, for her poetic articulation of female sexuality and illicit passions, Das is actually a skilled chronicler of everyday experience, both emotive and perceptive. Her word-paintings of urban life are illuminated with images of the flux and change she perceives in India's streets. Das's collections of poetry include Summer in Calcutta (1965), The Descendents (1967), The Old Playhouse (1973), and Tonight, This Savage Rite (with Pritish Nandy, 1979). She has also experimented—albeit less successfully—with fiction in English (she is well known as a prose writer in her native Malayalam); a novel, Alphabet of Lust (1977), and a collection of short stories, A Doll for the Child Prostitute (1977), explore the hidden world of Indian sexuality.

DAVENPORT, Guy (Mattison) (1927–), American short-story writer, critic, poet, and translator, born in Anderson, South Carolina, educated at Duke University, Merton College, Oxford, and Harvard. He became Professor of English at the University of Kentucky in 1963. Among his earlier publications is Motive and Method in the Cantos of Ezra Pound (1954), the first of a series of works on that author. The scope of his criticism is demonstrated in the essays collected in Geography of the Imagination (1981) and Every Force Evolves a Form (1987), which range between remote classical antiquity and the culture of the present day. Davenport's eclectically authoritative erudition is also reflected in his short stories, which are noted for their mannered originality of style and audaciously inventive narratives: collections include Tatlin! (1974), Da Vinci's Bicycle (1979), The Jules Verne Steam Balloon (1987), and The Drummer of the Eleventh North Devonshire Fusiliers (1990). Thasos and Ohio: Poems and Translations, 1950–1980 (1986) includes his versions of poetry by ancient Greek and modern European authors, among them Sappho, Anakreon, Rilke, and Cocteau, together with his own lucidly particular and metrically accomplished verse. Davenport is also an accomplished graphic artist and has worked as an illustrator of numerous books, including Hugh *Kenner's The Stoic Comedians (1964) and Ronald Johnson's The Spirit Walks, the Rocks Will Talk (1969).

DAVIDSON, Donald (Herbert) (1917–), American philosopher, born in Springfield, Massachusetts, educated at Harvard University. He has held professorships at Princeton, Rockefeller University, New York, the University of Chicago, and the University of California, Berkeley. He has also been a visiting professor at various universities throughout the world. Since the late 1960s he has exerted wide influence in analytical philosophy, particularly in respect of his concept of 'anomalous monism'; its application permits recognition of the indissoluble relation between mental events and physical reality while acknowledging that the former are not unconditionally governed by the laws of nature. His interrelated work on philosophies of language and mind issued in a theory of meaning which enabled him to suggest the common limitations of diverse conceptual systems. His reputation rests on a comparatively slender body of published work, principally Words and Objections (1969); his essays on the work of W. V. O. *Quine, Essays on Action and Events (1980); and Inquiries into Truth and Interpretation (1984), his principal contribution to the philosophy of language. Plato's Philebus (1990) offers concepts on the philosophy of pleasure. Among the numerous works he has edited is The Logic of Grammar (1975). Essays on Davidson, edited by B. Vermazen and M. B. Hintikka, was published in 1985.

DAVIE, Donald (Alfred) (1922–95), British poet and critic, born in Barnsley, educated at St Catherine's College, Cambridge, where he absorbed the influence of F. R. *Leavis, upon whom he reflected in his volume of memoirs These the Companions (1982). After holding a succession of academic posts in Britain and Ireland, he was appointed to a professorship at Stanford University, California, in 1968 and became Professor of Humanities at Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee, in 1978. Davie's first work of note was the influential Purity of Diction in English Verse (1952); his arguments for a poetry of rigour and precision accorded with the practices of the *Movement, in which he achieved prominence with Brides of Reason (1955) and A Winter Talent (1957). The volumes are characterized by the accomplished use of rhyming forms in conventional metres to present neutrally toned statements on social, cultural, and personal themes. Subsequent collections include his version of Adam Mickiewicz's Pan Tadeusz in The Forests of Lithuania (1959); Essex Poems (1969); In the Stopping Train (1980); To Scorch or Freeze (1989); and Collected Poems (1990). From the early 1970s onward his verse became increasingly flexible; The Shires (1974), a series of descriptive meditations on English landscapes and regions, uses a remarkable range of forms, some conspicuously informal and relaxed. He was among the most highly regarded literary critics of the post-war era, much of his work being notable for its stimulating and provocative mediations between the claims of *Modernism and traditional poetic values. His numerous critical publications include Ezra Pound: Poet as Sculptor (1964), Thomas Hardy and British Poetry (1973), Studies in Ezra Pound (1991), and The Eighteenth Century Hymn in England (1993). The Poet in the Imaginary Museum (1977), Under Briggflatts (1989), and Old Masters: Essays and Reflections on English and American Literature (1992) are collections of essays.

DAVIES, Idris (1905–53), British poet, born in Rhymney, Monmouthshire. At the age of 14 he became a coal miner. When the mine in which he worked was closed after the General Strike of 1926, he studied at Loughborough College and the University of Nottingham, and subsequently worked as a teacher in London and Rhymney. Gwalia Deserta (1938), his first volume of poetry, contained thirty-six poems thematically unified by their often deeply elegiac concern with South Wales in the 1920s and 1930s. The Angry Summer (1943), his best-known work, consists of fifty poems in rhythmically supple free verse and ballad stanzas; the work presents a richly detailed account of the General Strike and its effects on Davies's native mining valleys, disarming humour and bitter irony tempering its often impassioned social concern. T. S. *Eliot wrote of these books that 'they are the best poetic document I know about a particular epoch in a particular place'. Tonypandy and Other Poems (1945) is a collection of more occasional verse. Collected Poems (1972) is edited by Islwyn Jenkins, whose Idris Davies appeared in 1972.

DAVIES, Robertson (1913–95), Canadian novelist and dramatist, born in Thamesville, Ontario, educated at Queen's University and at Balliol College, Oxford. Davies worked as an actor in England before returning to Canada, where he became a distinguished academic and editor of The Peterborough Examiner to which he contributed a weekly column under the pseudonym 'Samuel Marchbanks'. This writing is collected in The Diary of Samuel Marchbanks (1947), The Table Talk of Samuel Marchbanks (1949), and Marchbanks' Almanack (1967). His plays include A Jig for the Gypsy (1954) and Hunting Stuart and Other Plays (1972). It was, however, as a novelist that Davies was best known. Beginning with 'The Salterton Trilogy'—Tempest-Tost (1951), Leaven of Malice (1954), and A Mixture of Frailties (1958)—he published three novel sequences. The finest of these is 'The Deptford Trilogy' (Fifth Business, 1970; The Manticore, 1972; and World of Wonders, 1975), each part of which is written in a confessional first-person mode, which in some way reflects the characters' common origins in the small Ontario town after which the trilogy is named; the trilogy is also a cosmopolitan work with a broad mythic framework and incorporates much specialist knowledge on such subjects as hagiography, Jungian psychology, and carnival shows. The Rebel Angels (1981), What's Bred in the Bone (1985), and The Lyre of Orpheus (1988) form 'The Cornish Trilogy'. Murther and Walking Spirits (1991) explores ancestry and the derivation of individual identity via an inventive plot narrated by the deceased entertainments officer of a local newspaper who has been murdered by a film critic. Widely acclaimed for its scope, style, and narrative organization, The Cunning Man (1995) presents an overview of contemporary culture through three characters who thematically represent science, art/literature, and religion. He also published The Stage Is All the World: The Theatrical Designs of Tanya Moiseiwitsch (1994).

DAVIES, W(illiam) H(enry) (1871–1940), British poet, born in Newport, Monmouthshire. He was apprenticed to a picture-framer after elementary education, but became a vagrant and subsequently took part in the Klondike gold-rush, losing a leg while attempting to steal a ride on a train. He settled in London, living with great frugality on a small allowance from his grandmother. In 1905 he produced, at his own expense, a volume of poems entitled The Soul's Destroyer, and solicited sales by sending copies to eminent writers whose addresses he culled from Who's Who. George Bernard *Shaw responded generously, arranging reviews of the book in the literary press. Edward *Thomas offered him accommodation in his cottage near Sevenoaks and assisted with final revisions to the text of his The Autobiography of a Super-Tramp, which appeared with a preface by Shaw to widespread success in 1908. Nature Poems and Others, also published in 1908, was followed by numerous further collections of verse, which include Farewell to Poesy (1909) and Songs of Joy (1911). He was a contributor to each of the five *Georgian Poetry (1912–22) anthologies. Much of his work takes the form of sensitive responses to natural phenomena in verse of moving simplicity and fluent technical assurance. Numerous poems display an acutely observed social concern, which can achieve macabre effectiveness as in 'The Rat' and 'The Inquest'. Beggars (1909), The True Traveller (1912), and A Poet's Pilgrimage (1918), further prose accounts of his experiences, are superior in style and structure to the novels A Weak Woman (1911) and The Dancing Heart (1927). His final work of autobiography was the posthumously published Young Emma (1980), which recounts his unorthodox courtship of the young woman he married in 1923. Complete Poems appeared in 1963, with an introduction by Osbert *Sitwell.

DAVIN, Dan(iel) (1913–90), New Zealand novelist and short-story writer, born in Invercargill, New Zealand, educated at Otago University and at Balliol College, Oxford. After war service he joined the Oxford University Press and produced the Introduction to English Literature (1947) with John *Mulgan. His novel Cliffs of Fall (1945) evoked memories of youth in New Zealand with a sense of isolation and conflict that is often present in Davin's work; For the Rest of Our lives (1947) directed wartime experiences in Africa to wider issues of meditative disenchantment which characterize much of Davin's work; Roads from Home (1949) was a fine working of personal experience. Davin edited New Zealand Short Stories and Katherine Mansfield's Short Stories in 1953, and his own interests and work in some ways echo those of *Mansfield. In his stories, a finely wrought realism is undercut by a profound scepticism towards earthly pleasures, a scepticism which itself derives from a sharp awareness of mortality. Davin's lasting interest in the handling of war in fiction reflects this balance of interests. His story collections include Breathing Spaces (1975) and The Salamander and the Fire: Collected War Stories (1986). He edited Short Stories from the Second World War in 1982.

DAVIOT, Gordon, TEY, JOSEPHINE.

DAVIS, Angela (Yvonne) (1944–), African-American essayist and political activist, born in Birmingham, Alabama, educated at Brandeis University, Goethe University, Frankfurt, and the University of California, San Diego. In 1969 she was appointed an assistant professor of philosophy at the University of California, Los Angeles. A leading figure in the Black Power movement of the late 1960s, she lost her academic post because of her alleged involvement in an attempt to free three prisoners from San Quentin prison. During her sixteen months in jail, she produced the essays and letters collected in If They Come for Me in the Morning (with Ruchel Magee and others, 1971). Her trial, which became a cause célèbre, resulted in her acquittal, following which she published Lectures on Liberation (1972). Her other writings, which reflect her Marxist and feminist beliefs, include Women, Race and Class (1981) and Women, Culture and Politics (1984). Angela Davis: An Autobiography appeared in 1974.

DAVIS, Dick (1945–), British poet, born in Portsmouth, educated at King's College, Cambridge, and the University of Manchester. He held a succession of teaching posts in Greece, Italy, Iran, and elsewhere from 1967 to 1988, when he became Assistant Professor of Persian at Ohio State University. His poetry was first collected with work by Clive *Wilmer and Robert *Wells in Shade Mariners (1970). In the Distance (1975) was his first independent collection; subsequent volumes include Seeing the World (1980) and The Covenant (1984). Davis has been highly acclaimed for the fluency with which he expresses his personal and cultural preoccupations in strict traditional forms. Much of his work displays an epigrammatic brevity and wit and is rich in precisely observed detail. Devices and Desires: New and Selected Poems 1967–1987 appeared in 1989. His other publications include Wisdom and Wilderness (1983), a critical study of the work of Yvor *Winters. He is also highly regarded for his translations, which include a version of Farrad Attar's twelfth-century Persian religious allegory The Conference of the Birds (with Afkham Darbandi, 1984).

DAVIS, Jack (Leonard) (1917–), Australian poet and dramatist; the son of part-Aboriginal parents, he belongs to the Aboriginal Bibbulmun tribe of Western Australia. He worked for many years on cattle stations in the north of the state, a bitter experience which led him to return to Perth as a champion of the Aboriginal cause. He later became manager of the Perth Aboriginal Centre in 1967, director of the Aboriginal Advancement Council in the state in 1969, and joint editor of the Aboriginal magazine Identity from 1973 to 1979; in the latter capacity he encouraged the writing of Archie *Weller. The First-Born and Other Poems (1970) established Davis's poetic talent and commitment to the cause of Aboriginal rights, and a second volume, Jagardoo: Poems from Aboriginal Australia, appeared in 1978; both volumes reflect Davis's alertness both to Aboriginal heritage and to the issues of contemporary society. Further collections are John Pat and Other Poems (1988) and A Black Life (1992). A vivid and moving realism accounts for his success in the theatre: the problems Aboriginal people confront in Australian cities today were addressed in The Dreamers (1973), a one-act play which was revised and developed in 1982. Kullark (1979) was his sobering contribution to Western Australia's 150th anniversary; it presented case histories of the treatment of Aboriginal people and argued powerfully for a change in basic attitudes. The plays No Sugar (1985) and Barungin: Smell the Wind (1989) continued Davis's determination to keep Aboriginal history at the centre of contemporary Australian debate, as did In Our Town (1992), which deals with the racist response to a romance between an Aboriginal hero of the Second World War and a white woman. A Boy's Life, an autobiography of his childhood in the 1920s and 1930s, was published in 1991. He is the editor of Paperback (1990), an anthology of Black Australian writing.

DAWE, (Donald) Bruce (1930–), Australian poet, born in Geelong, Victoria; he left school at 16 and worked at many jobs prior to attending the universities of Melbourne and Queensland. Dawe's talent in articulating large issues through everyday concerns is clear from his first poetry volumes No Fixed Address (1962) and A Need of Similar Name (1965). A Roman Catholic poet, his concerns are non-sectarian; Dawe has written of his desire to speak for 'the lost people in our midst for whom no one speaks, and who cannot speak for themselves'. In volumes such as Beyond the Subdivisions (1969) and Condolences of the Season (1971) Dawe employs a vernacular voice at once laconic and expressive, the human (or perhaps Australian) instinct for wry understatement being used to capture the tenuousness of human achievement against the inexpressible finality of mortality. Sometimes Gladness: Collected Poems 1954–1978 (1978; new edition 1983, with poems to 1982; new edition 1993, with poems to 1992) demonstrated the breadth of his achievements, not least the pervasive humour of what might seem pessimistic themes. Dawe finely exploits nuances of Australian language and speech to express perceptions of the transubstantiality of the ordinary in terms familiar yet complex. Other publications include Towards Sunrise: Poems 1979–1985 (1986) and This Side of Silence: Poems 1987–1990 (1990); and a collection of short stories, Over Here, Harv! (1983). See Ken Goodwin's Adjacent Worlds: A Literary Life of Bruce Dawe (1988) and Bruce Dawe: Essays and Opinions (1990).

DAWSON, Fielding (1930–), American novelist, short-story writer, and painter, born in New York City; he grew up in Kirkwood, Missouri and was educated at *Black Mountain College from 1949 to 1953. The Black Mountain Book (1970; revised and expanded, 1991) remains the most valuable memoir of the college during its *Olson era and the experience clearly set the agenda for Dawson's future development as a writer. A master of the kind of kinetic writing promulgated by and the *Beats, Dawson is also a Jungian who pays great attention to the material presented in his dreams. This gives his work a steady but flexible centre and helps to explain much of the intellectual and emotional engagement in his writing. He is a prolific writer whose novels include Open Road (1970), The Mandalay Dream (1971), A Great Day For a Ballgame (1973), and the Penny Lane series (1977–81). His collections of stories include Krazy Kat/The Unveiling (1969), The Dream/Thunder Road (1972), The Sun Rises Into the Sky (1973), and The Man Who Changed Overnight (1976). The Orange in the Orange (1994) comprises a novella and two stories which, like many of his other books, are closely interrelated. Like *Kerouac, he is deeply sensitive to the world of the child and, again like Kerouac, recognizes the degree to which that world persists into the world of the adult.

DAWSON, Jennifer (1929–), British novelist, born in South London. Her experiences as a social worker in a mental hospital in the late 1950s provided the background to much of her fiction, most notably in her first extraordinary Kafkaesque novel, The Ha-Ha (1961). Like Sylvia Plath's *The Bell Jar, it chronicles with harrowing precision a young woman's struggle with mental illness. Many of her novels explore the extremes, and the mundanities, of madness while offering passionate, often savage, indictments of a callous society. Dawson's further novels include Fowler's Snare (1963), The Cold Country (1965), Strawberry Boy (1976), A Field of Scarlet Poppies (1979), and a volume of short stories, Hospital Wedding (1978). A ten-year silence was broken with the publication of The Upstairs People (1988), an accomplished atmospheric exploration of family life in the 1930s, interwoven with her customary themes of madness. This was followed in 1989 by a sharp, satirical look at Oxford life, Judasland.

DAY, Clarence (Shepard) (1874–1935), American essayist and humorist, born in New York City, educated at Yale University. Day served in the US navy during the Spanish-American War (1898). He settled in New York and sought to establish himself as a writer and illustrator. This Simian World (1920), his satirical reflections on man's origins coupled with his fantastic speculations about man's alternative origins, and illustrated with his own drawings, brought him to the attention of the fledgling *New Yorker magazine, to which he subsequently became a regular contributor. He remains best known for his autobiographical writings: God and My Father (1932) is a portrait of his Victorian New York childhood, and the second volume, Life with Father (1935), was successfully adapted for the stage in 1940; Life with Mother (1937) and Father and I (1940) appeared posthumously. Other works include The Crow's Nest (1921; enlarged and retitled After All, 1936), Thoughts Without Words (1928), In the Green Mountain Country (1934), and Scenes from the Mesozoic and Other Drawings (1935). His prose is notable for its precise, terse, yet eloquent satire.

DAY LEWIS, C. (Cecil Day-Lewis) (1904–72), British poet and, as 'Nicholas Blake', writer of detective fiction, born in Ballintogher, near Sligo, educated at Sherborne School and Wadham College, Oxford. The son of a clergyman, Day Lewis lived in England from 1905; in 1908 his mother died and he was looked after by the aunt to whom he paid moving tribute in the late poem 'My Mother's Sister'. At Oxford his literary associates included Stephen *Spender and W. H. *Auden, with whom he produced the 1927 edition of Oxford Poetry. Following two early volumes, Transitional Poem (1929) and From Feathers to Iron (1931), he published The Magnetic Mountain (1933), which frequently echoes Auden's style and diction and casts him in a heroic light in 'Look west, Wystan, lone flyers . . .' The volume established him as the most outspoken example of the poet as an instrument of revolutionary socialism; he outlined his views in Revolution in Writing (1935). He was a member of the Communist Party from 1935 to 1938 and with Auden, Spender, and *MacNeice, contributed to various left-wing journals. He also edited The Mind in Chains (1937), a collection of ideological essays, and The Echoing Green (1937), the first of his several anthologies of poetry. After the mid-1930s the socialist emphasis in his poetry gradually diminished; in 1937 Geoffrey *Grigson disparaged his incipient conservatism in becoming a member of the Book Society Committee, and by 1946, when he was appointed Clark Lecturer at Cambridge, he was firmly identified with the literary establishment. From 1951 to 1956 he was Oxford Professor of Poetry, and he succeeded *Masefield as Poet Laureate in 1968.

Although political elements are present in Overtures to Death (1938), the poetry has lost the hectoring urgency that was evident in earlier work. The astringent lyricism apparent in Poems in Wartime (1940) owes something to *Hardy's example; numerous subsequent collections include An Italian Visit (1953), Pegasus and Other Poems (1957), and The Whispering Roots (1970). A Collected Poems (1954) was supplemented by Ian Parsons's edition of Poems of C. Day Lewis, 1925–1972 (1977); Collected Poems of C. Day Lewis, ed. Jill Balcon, was published in 1982 and The Complete Poems in 1992. His later poetry ranges through a variety of modes and levels of emotional and imaginative intensity: while some have praised his classical and allegorical manner, of which 'Pegasus' is a notable example, others have found it dryly formal; similarly, the refined rural lyricism of many poems is both admired and disregarded as inconsequentially *Georgian. Among the finest of his poems are those which form moving affirmations of deep personal affection. The Friendly Tree (1936) was the first of several autobiographical novels, and The Buried Day (1960) is a volume of autobiography. As 'Nicholas Blake' he published twenty well-constructed and entertaining detective stories between 1935 and 1968, in the majority of which the amateur detective is the Audenesque Nigel Strangeways, who takes his name from the Manchester prison and in his conception owes something to E. C. *Bentley's Philip Trent. In the first, A Question of Proof (1935), set in a preparatory school, the author draws on his experiences as a schoolmaster at Summer Fields School, Oxford, and Cheltenham Junior School. Among the best are Thou Shell of Death (1936; US title Shell of Death), The Beast Must Die (1938), The Smiler with the Knife (1938), The Case of the Abominable Snowman (1941; US title The Corpse in the Snowman), Minute for Murder (1947), Head of a Traveller (1949), End of Chapter (1957), and The Worm of Death (1961). As a translator he is noted for his versions of Virgil's Georgics (1940), The Aeneid (1952), and The Eclogues (1963) and for his highly acclaimed rendering of Valéry's Le Cimetière Marin (1946). C. Day-Lewis: An English Literary Life (1980) by his son Sean Day-Lewis reveals the uncertainties and complexities of attitude informing much of his writing.

DEANE, Seamus (1940–), Irish poet and cultural historian, born in Derry City, educated at Queen's University, Belfast, and at Cambridge University. In 1968 he began lecturing at University College, Dublin, where he became Professor of English and American Literature in 1980. His poetry, in which social and political themes combine tellingly with personal experience, is collected in Gradual Wars (1972), Rumours (1975), and History Lessons (1985); Selected Poems appeared in 1988. A founding member of the *Field Day Theatre Company, he edited the three-volume Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing (1991), the most comprehensive work of its kind to date. His principal scholarly works include Celtic Revivals: Essays in Modern Irish Literature (1985), A Short History of Irish Literature, 1580–1980 (1986), and The French Enlightenment and Revolution in England, 1789–1832 (1988).

Death Comes for the Archbishop, a novel by Willa *Cather, published in 1927. The novel is Cather's fictional tribute to the beauties and strengths of European Catholicism. (She never actually became a Catholic, as was popularly believed, but found in the Church an acceptable imaginative alternative to what she saw as the greedy, crass society of post-First World War America.) The novel takes two distinguished French servants of the Church, Bishop Jean Latour and his vicar Father Joseph Vaillant, who together carry out missionary work in New Mexico and organize the diocese there. Comrades in youth, they maintain their friendship throughout their life in America, complementing one another in their work and in their characters. Latour is intellectual, sensitive, and fundamentally solitary; Vaillant practical and warm-hearted. The novel ends with Latour's death, which takes place shortly after Vaillant's; his body lies in state in the cathedral at Santa Fe, his one great creation. The book reflects the author's feeling for New Mexico—cf. *The Professor's House (1925)—and the influence of certain painters, such as Puvis de Chavannes, on her style.

Death in the Family, A, a partially autobiographical novel by James *Agee, published in 1957. It tells the story of the shattering of a secure and happy family when the father is killed in a car crash. Agee's writings are marked by an exploration of his own past; this novel focuses on a young boy named Rufus, Agee's middle name. The book opens with 'Knoxville: Summer of 1915', a passage of descriptive prose by a mature man trying to reconstruct a child's perspective of a summer evening with his family. By juxtaposing passages in italics with ordinary print, the book details two times of the growth of Rufus, with the italicized sub-narrative weaving in and out of the main narrative providing a kind of psychological basis. The narrative then proceeds to Rufus's trip to a cinema with his father Jay, the stops they make on their way home at the bar and on a hillside, Rufus's confused understanding of the differences between his parents, and other thoughts. After hearing about his father's imminent death, Jay drives to his father's home and, upon returning, is killed in a car crash after driving recklessly along the mountain roads. The later part of the book is taken up with the preparations that Mary, Rufus's mother, makes for the funeral. The book was later dramatized under the title All The Way Home (1960; Pulitzer Prize) by Tad Mosel.

Death of a Naturalist, Seamus *Heaney's first collection of poems, published in 1966. The freshness and authenticity with which many of the poems made use of themes and imagery drawn from Heaney's rural upbringing were among the principal reasons for the book's enthusiastic critical reception. Poems like the title piece, 'The Barn', and 'Churning Day' display a Wordsworthian intensity of recollection in their sensuously detailed recreations of incidents in childhood. Elsewhere, the volume initiated Heaney's engagement with the larger communal past: the nineteenth-century Irish potato famine is harrowingly evoked in 'For the Commander of the "Eliza" ' and 'At a Potato Digging'; Ulster's troubled history is alluded to in 'Docker', a vignette of sectarian antagonism whose 'Oh yes, that kind of thing could start again' was to prove unhappily prophetic by the end of 1969. The volume also featured a distinctive group of love poems and firmly anticipated developments in Heaney's verse in 'Digging' and 'Personal Helicon'; the former establishes physical penetration of the earth as an extensible metaphor for poetry, heralding the imaginative excavations of myth and history in his treatments of the peat bogs (see NORTH); 'Personal Helicon' concludes the book by renouncing its preoccupation with childhood, the last lines indicating his subsequent concern with investigating personal identity in the statement 'I rhyme | To see myself, to set the darkness echoing'.

Death of a Salesman, a play by Arthur *Miller, published and performed in 1949. Described by Miller himself as 'Certain Private Conversations in Two Acts and a Requiem', it makes use of *Expressionist devices to present the life of Willy Loman and his relationship with his family up to the point at which he commits suicide. The action of the play proceeds both forwards and backwards and is remarkable both for its realistic portrayal of an American family and for its dramatic presentation of memory, fantasy, and trauma. It is also amongst the most powerful assaults on American materialism ever made and attacks the institutionalized expectations and behaviour patterns which sustain it: the cult of sport, the ambivalent relationship to honesty, the predatory attitude of men to women, and the corrosive consumerism of American society. Loman's enthusiastic acceptance of all this has tragic repercussions for his two sons, who stand very much at the centre of the drama. It is Biff, the sportsman turned kleptomaniac, who speaks the most appropriate epitaph for his father: 'He had the wrong dreams.' In the play, Miller counterpoints the materialistic fantasies of modern America with the pioneering ones of an older generation, to the detriment of the former.

Death of the Heart, The, a novel by E. *Bowen, published in 1938. Portia Quayne has had a vagrant, intimate childhood with her mother, who has died. The 16-year-old orphan has come to live with her half-brother Thomas and his cynical, egotistical, attractive wife Anna. Thomas's father made one late attempt to break free from the domineering Mrs Quayne (a powerful offstage figure) and fathered Portia, an intense, nervous, observant waif, whose arrival disrupts the exclusive, civilized life of Windsor Terrace. As her name suggests, she judges the Quaynes as much as they judge her, and the novel is in part a satire on the English middle classes of the 1930s, full of 'competitiveness and funk'. Portia falls naïvely, demandingly in love with Anna's unreliable protégé Eddie, comes to feel betrayed by him and the Quaynes, and runs away. Her drama (that of a heroine in a Gothic novel, but in a secular, sceptical setting) is overseen by two guardians, the sibylline housemaid, Matchett, and the loyal, shabby-genteel Major Brutt. It moves between the elegant Regency terrace and the robust vulgar seaside home of the Heccomb family, 'Waikiki'. As the disillusioned novelist St Quentin observes, the extreme demands of innocence will have to adapt to the compromised and treacherous grown-up world: 'We must live how we can.'

DE BERNIÈRES, Louis (1954–), British novelist, born in London, educated at the University of Manchester and the University of London. He taught in Columbia for two years and chose South America as the setting for some of his novels. The first of these, The War of Don Emmanuel's Nether Parts (1990), is set in an imaginary South American country run by gangsters and corrupt politicians and combines *magic realism with political satire. Also set in South America are Señor Vivo and the Coca Lord (1991), an indictment of the cocaine trade, and The Troublesome Offspring of Cardinal Guzman (1992), which deals with the persecution of certain members of a small town by a latter-day Inquisition. Captain Corelli's Mandolin (1994) focuses on the inhabitants of the Greek island of Cephalonia following the Italian invasion during the Second World War.

DE BOISSIÈRE, Ralph (Anthony Charles) (1907–), Australian novelist, born in Port of Spain, Trinidad, where he was educated at Queen's Royal College. In the 1920s de Boissière, who is of French Creole ancestry, was associated with a circle of politically radical young Trinidadian writers, such as Alfred H. *Mendes and C. L. R. *James, who contributed to the short-lived but highly influential monthly, *The Beacon. He emigrated to Australia in 1947, where he wrote all his novels, and became an Australian citizen in 1970. Among other jobs, he has worked as an auto assembler in Australia, and a bakery supplier in Trinidad. Drawing on his experience of life as a skilled worker, de Boissière's novels are panoramic epics on the struggles of unionized workers for a better life. The first two, Crown Jewel (1952) and Rum and Coca Cola (1956), investigate Trinidadian industrial relations during the turbulent 1930s and 1940s, a period punctuated by a series of bitter strikes and demonstrations, at first against the British and later against the Americans. Salman *Rushdie has said of Crown Jewel that 'the enormous appeal of this book lies not so much in its committed socialism as in its ability to integrate politics with the lives of its characters'. In No Saddles for Kangaroos (1964), de Boissière integrated Cold War politics and the Korean conflict with the private lives of Australian automobile workers in the early 1950s.

Decline and Fall, a novel by Evelyn *Waugh, published in 1928. Waugh's first novel, which was an immediate success, describes the misfortunes of Paul Pennyfeather, an innocent abroad in the decadent world of fashionable 1920s society. Sent down from Scone College, Oxford, after being wrongly accused of indecent behaviour, he is forced to give up his theological studies in order to become a schoolmaster (an episode which owes something to Waugh's own disastrous experiences as a preparatory school teacher) and arrives at Llanabba Castle, a minor public school. Here, his pupils include the son of Margot Beste-Chetwynde, a society beauty by whom Pennyfeather becomes infatuated, and who amuses herself by agreeing to marry him. On the eve of the wedding, however, Paul is arrested, though innocent, for having unknowingly become involved in Margot's activities in the white slave trade; he goes to prison, which he finds quite congenial, because 'anyone who has been to an English public school will always feel comparatively at home in prison'. His escape is eventually arranged by Margot, who has married Lord Metroland in the meantime. After faking his own death certificate, Paul returns under the same name but another identity—that of a 'distant cousin'—to Scone College, to resume his interrupted studies.

Deconstruction was not so much a movement as a practice of reading, a learned habit of scepticism. It was chiefly associated with the work of the French philosopher Jacques Derrida (notably Writing and Difference, 1967; Of Grammatology, 1967; Margins, 1972; Dissemination, 1972), which in turn was a critical revision of many of the propositions of *Structuralism. The architectural metaphors are not accidental. Structuralism sought to reveal the invisible articulation of literary and other buildings; Deconstruction questioned the building process. It was at first often spelled de-construction, which underlined the neologism (not demolition or destruction), and signalled its most active meaning: 'the unmaking of a construct' (Derrida). 'However negative it may sound,' Paul *de Man commented, 'deconstruction implies the possibility of rebuilding.' In theory Deconstruction might be applied to any kind of cultural object, but Derrida was most interested in the major movements of Western philosophy, which he saw as regularly blind to their own metaphors and strategies. They converted a need for origins, for example, into what they saw as the indispensable presence of those origins; they dreamed of immediacies of experience and meaning which no culture has ever known. Derrida sought to understand rather than simply to deny such needs and dreams, but thought it important to see how strongly and ubiquitously they are at work, even in unsuspected areas. Exported to America and elsewhere, Deconstruction became more literary, a matter of unravelling old conspiracies of agreed interpretation, an assault on supposed academic common sense. It came to seem unhistorical because it insisted on the textuality of all history; its defenders would say it was revising the idea of history rather than abandoning history itself. See also NEW CRITICISM.

DEEPING, (George) Warwick (1877–1950), English popular novelist, born in Southend, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he read science and medicine. He achieved early success with popular historical romances such as Uther and Igraine (1903), Bertrand of Brittany (1908), and The Red Saint (1909). His most famous novel, and greatest critical success, was Sorrell and Son (1925), a tender account of the relationship between Captain Sorrell and his young son, Kit, whom he tries to protect from adversity. Deeping was often criticized for his sentimentality, but his novels (over seventy in all) remained popular and reflected Edwardian values. Later novels included The Malice of Men (1938), The Dark House (1941), and Old Mischief (1950).

DEIGHTON, Len (Leonard Cyril) (1929–), British thriller writer, called by Julian *Symons 'a kind of poet of the spy novel'; born in London, educated at the Royal College of Art. He served in the RAF and worked in a variety of professions before turning to authorship. His first book, The Ipcress File (1962), with its unnamed, working-class hero, elliptic narration, and emphasis on departmental rivalry in British intelligence, gave a new turn to the Cold War spy story. Seven more novels with the same hero followed—the best are perhaps Horse Under Water (1963), Billion-Dollar Brain (1966), An Expensive Place to Die (1967), and Twinkle, Twinkle Little Spy (1976; US title Catch a Falling Spy), but his later work, from XPD (1981) onwards, seems more conventional, possibly because his methods had now been imitated by others. Among his other thrillers is SS-GB (1978), which has *science fiction elements: the German invasion of 1941 has been successful, and Britain is an occupied country. Deighton has also written novels: Bomber (1970); short stories: Declarations of War (1971); historical studies of the Second World War: Fighter: The True Story of the Battle of Britain (1977), Blitzkrieg: From the Rise of Hitler to the Fall of Dunkirk (1979); and cookery books: Où est le garlic? (1965). Most recently he has returned to the subjects of espionage and departmental intrigue with a series of works about a British intelligence agent, Bernard Samson: Spy Hook (1988), Spy Line (1989), Spy Sinker (1990), Faith (1994), and Hope (1995).

Deirdre of the Sorrows, a play by J. M. *Synge; it was left unrevised at the dramatist's death and published posthumously, in 1910. The eponymous heroine, a foundling brought up to be his wife by Conchubor, High King of Ulster, rejects this unwanted marriage. Instead, she chooses Naisi for her husband, notwithstanding a prophecy that she will ruin him, and escapes with him and his brothers from Emain Macha to safety abroad in Alban. After seven years of intense happiness there, Conchubor sends an offer of peace and safe return home; and Deirdre accepts this, even though she does not trust it, because she is fearful of growing old, fearful that Naisi will tire of her, and fearful that their dream-like life will end. Back in Emain, the king does indeed renege on his promise. Naisi's brothers are attacked and, though Deirdre tries to stop him helping them, he goes out to his death. She then defies Conchubor, who still craves her, as 'an old man and a fool only', and stabs herself to death in what she, and Synge, suggest is the final triumph of love and beauty over reality.

DELAFIELD, E. M., pseudonym of Edmée Elizabeth Monica DASHWOOD (1890–1943), British novelist, born in Monmouthshire, the daughter of Count Henry de la Pasture and Mrs Henry de la Pasture, a popular novelist. She adopted the pseudonym 'E. M. Delafield', a loose translation of her French ancestral name, to avoid confusion between her own writing and her mother's. Her first novel, Zella Sees Herself (1917), was followed by over thirty others, including The War Workers (1918), Humbug (1922), The Way Things Are (1927), What Is Love (1928), Woman Are Like That (1929), Thank Heaven Fasting (1932), Nothing Is Safe (1937), and Now No-one Will Know (1941). She is best known for the series of novels, written in journal form, describing the day-to-day existence of a middle-class married woman living in a small country town during the 1930s and 1940s, beginning with The Diary of a Provincial Lady (1930) and including The Provincial Lady Goes Further (1932), The Provincial Lady in America (1934), and The Provincial Lady in Wartime (1940). Delafield's novels are characterized by an elegant and occasionally sardonic wit and by a refusal to sentimentalize the lives and conditions of her characters, most of them women whose circumstances, although relatively affluent, allow little room for intellectual or emotional development. Delafield also wrote three plays, To See Ourselves (1930), The Glass Wall (1933), and The Mulberry Bush (1935).

DE LA MARE, Walter (John) (1873–1956), British poet, born at Charlton in South East London, educated at St Paul's Cathedral Choir School; he subsequently worked as a clerk with the Anglo-American Oil Company in London. Songs of Childhood, his first volume of poetry, was published under the pseudonym 'Walter Ramal' in 1902. Henry Brocken (1904) was the first of his novels, its narrative of encounters with famous literary characters establishing the fantastic mode of much of his fiction. Poems (1906) consolidated his reputation and in 1908 he left his commercial employment to devote himself to writing. The Listeners (1912), his first widely successful volume, whose title-piece is perhaps his best-known poem, Peacock Pie (1913), Motley (1918), and The Veil (1921) are among the collections of verse that gained him a large popular readership. With Lascelles *Abercrombie and Wilfrid *Gibson he was a beneficiary of Rupert *Brooke's will, entitling him to considerable sums in royalties after 1915. Although his poetry has a certain narrowness of range in common with the work of many of the Georgian poets (see GEORGIAN POETRY) with whom he was associated, its compellingly imaginative character and flexible mastery of traditional forms won him the enduring respect of many discerning critics. Mortality and vague but incontrovertible apprehensions of the afterlife are central themes in many of his poems. The novels which gained him a high standing include the chilling parable of damnation in The Return (1910); and Memoirs of a Midget (1921), which recounts the frequently bizarre events in the life of its diminutive heroine, Miss M. The Fleeting (1933), in which the meditative and imaginative qualities of his verse are intensified, Memory (1938), and The Burning Glass (1945) are among his numerous further collections of poetry; the long discursive poems The Traveller (1946) and Winged Chariot (1951) form expositions of the philosophy of the interpenetration of the natural and the supernatural worlds that informs most of his work. Collected Rhymes and Verses (1944; reissued 1947, 1970, 1989) and Collected Poems (1942; reissued 1979) were compiled in accordance with de la Mare's division of his work into lighter and more serious modes; Complete Poems (1969) included a number of previously unpublished poems. Collected Stories for Children was published in 1947. His work as an anthologist is chiefly represented by Come Hither (1923), a collection for children which has remained popular, and Behold This Dreamer (1939), a compendious gathering of poetry and prose relating to sleep, dreams, and paranormal experience. In 1953 he was awarded the Order of Merit.

DELANEY, Shelagh (1939–), British dramatist, born in Salford; she left school at 16. Though she subsequently wrote The Lion in Love (1960) for the stage, and several screenplays, including Dance with a Stranger (1985), she is remembered primarily for her first play, A Taste of Honey (1958). This shows a working-class northern girl—pregnant by a black sailor, temporarily deserted by her nagging mother, and befriended by a homosexual art student—in the process of discovering her identity and accepting the impending birth of her baby. On its production in 1958, its unpretentious and often humorous realism was acclaimed as a vital contribution to the socially conscious or *'kitchen sink' school of playwriting then establishing itself in reaction to the drawing-room drama fashionable in the West End of London.

DELANY, Samuel R(ay) (1942–), American novelist and critic, born in New York City where he was educated at City College. His career began in the early 1960s with a number of *science fiction novels in which *space opera conventions were transformed by a baroque style. Most notable of these were The Jewels of Aptor (1962); the three novels assembled as The Fall of the Towers (1970); Babel-17 (1966), whose linguistic speculations foreshadowed much of Delany's later criticism; and The Einstein Intersection (1967). From Nova (1968), one of his most sustained space operas, Delany's output became more ambitious. Dhalgren (1975), an experimental novel set in a ruined city, was followed by Triton (1976) and Stars in My Pocket like Grains of Sand (1984). His criticism, collected in The Jewel-Hinged Jaw (1977), The American Shore (1978), Starboard Wine (1984), and The Straits of Messina (1989), applies the methods of contemporary European theorists to the mapping of science fiction as a conceptually distinct genre.

DE LA ROCHE, Mazo (1885–1961), Canadian novelist, born in Newmarket, Ontario, brought up on a fruit and stock farm in Ontario, a background which was to appear in her fiction; she was educated at Toronto University and Toronto School of Art. Her novel Jalna (1927), the first novel in the 'Whiteoak Chronicles', distinguished her as the first Canadian to become an international bestseller. By 1949, it was estimated that 2,000,000 copies of her novels, translated into fifteen languages, had been sold. A subsequent twenty novels in the Whiteoak Chronicles narrated the deeds of the Whiteoak family, from the matriarch Ardeline to the handsome virile Renny.

DELDERFIELD, R(onald) F(rederick) (1912–72), English popular novelist and playwright, born in Greenwich, London. Many of his best-selling novels are family sagas with romantic overtones, often spanning the period between the First and Second World Wars and beyond. He often focused on middle-aged love between men and women, one of whom, at least, had already been married, or between a more experienced partner and a virtual novice. God Is an Englishman (1970) is perhaps his best novel, and its title was apparently not meant to be ironic. It chronicles the twists and turns of a marriage between an older man, Adam Swan, and his young, vulnerable wife, who strongly values her independence. Other novels include Cheap Day Return (1967; US title Return Journey, 1974), The Green Gauntlet (1968), and Long Summer Days (1974). His plays, which were more ephemeral than his novels, include Peace Comes to Peckham (1948), The Old Lady of Cheadle (1952), The Mayerling Affair (1958), and Wild Mink (1962). Napoleon in Love (1959), his best-known work of popular history, is one of several books he wrote about the French emperor. For My Own Amusement (1968) and Overture for Beginners (1970) are autobiographical works. See Sanford Sternlicht, R. F. Delderfield (1988).

DELILLO, Don (1936–), American novelist, born in New York, educated at Fordham University. Since he began publishing fiction in the early 1970s, he has established a reputation as a social satirist and critic of the 'American Dream', whose novels frequently incorporate disturbing and occasionally surreal metaphors of contemporary life. These include his first novel, Americana (1971), whose protagonist, David Bell, is a young and successful television executive who abandons his job and his New York life to make an experimental movie in a small Kansas town, becoming, in the process, increasingly divorced from reality; End Zone (1972), which constructs an elaborate parallel between the game of American football and nuclear warfare in order to investigate the underlying violence of American culture; Ratner's Star (1976); Players (1977); The Names (1982), which is set in Greece, the Middle East, and India and concerns a series of cult murders; and White Noise (1985), whose hero, a middle-class academic, becomes drawn into the violent sub-culture of the town in which he lives. Libra (1988) was an exploration of the Kennedy assassination which investigated the internal lives of the central figures in this crucial moment in recent history. In this, as in his other studies of the iconography of American life, historical fact is interwoven with fictional detail in a narrative whose chilling plausibility serves to reinforce its power. Mao II (1991) deals with the corrupting power of fame in its exploration of the life of a blocked writer, which, according to the author, was inspired by his reflections upon a photograph of the reclusive novelist J. D. *Salinger.

DE LISSER, Herbert George (1878–1944), Jamaican novelist and journalist, born in Falmouth, Jamaica. In 1904 he was appointed editor-in-chief of the Daily Gleaner, a position which gave him extensive knowledge of Jamaican society and an influential role in colonial politics. His allegiance was to a Fabian socialist, gradualist view of political development, similar to that of his lifelong friend, Sydney Oliver, one of the most liberal governors of Jamaica. His best-known novel, Jane's Career (1914), follows the fortunes of a country girl, and emphasizes her exploitation when she finds domestic work in urban Kingston, though she gradually learns how to climb up the social ladder. Most of de Lisser's other novels were initially published serially in Planters' Punch, edited by de Lisser, the unofficial mouthpiece of the Jamaica Imperial Association. Other novels of note include Susan Proudleigh (1915), and Triumphant Squalitone (1917), a political satire. Later novels tended to be either historical romances, such as The White Witch of Rosehall (1929), or satires of Jamaican society, like Under the Sun (1937).

DELL, Ethel M., see ROMANTIC FICTION.

DELL, Floyd (1887–1969), American novelist and radical journalist, born in Illinois. Dell established himself as a journalist in Chicago and became a leading light of the Chicago literary renaissance, where he furthered the careers of Sherwood *Anderson and Theodore *Dreiser. He moved to New York in 1914, and became involved with the bohemian radical intelligentsia of Greenwich Village. Here, he worked as a journalist and editor on *The Masses and The Liberator while also writing several one-act plays. He made his name with his first novel, Moon-Calf (1920), one of the first novels to explore the changing sexual and social mores of the disillusioned post-First World War American bohemian generation; he continued his portrait of the times in the sequel The Briary-Bush (1921). Further novels Janet March (1923), Runaway (1925), and Love in Greenwich Village (1926) continued to explore life amongst the unconventional in bohemian New York. During this time, he also wrote a study in child psychology, Were You Ever a Child? (1919); one of the earliest critical studies of the writings of Upton *Sinclair, Upton Sinclair: A Study in Social Protest (1927); the comic novel An Unmarried Father (1927); and a description of his views on sex in Love in the Machine Age (1930); he also edited an edition of Richard Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy in 1931 and wrote his autobiography Homecoming (1933), bringing him up to his thirty-fifth year, before moving to Washington, DC to work for the *Federal Writers' Project until his retirement in 1947.

DELORIA, Vine, Jr (1933–), Native American writer, born in South Dakota, educated at Iowa State University, the Lutheran School of Theology, and the University of Colorado. Deloria, a Sioux, is well known for his historical and ethnographical writings which present the Indian perspective upon modern history. His work gains great satirical power from the inversion of the official historical picture which Deloria uses with considerable wit. Deloria has been executive director of the National Congress of American Indians, Chair of the Institute for the Development of Indian Law, and professor of Native American studies and political science at the University of Arizona. Among his works are Custer Died for Your Sins: An Indian Manifesto (1969), a collection of essays which deals with, among other issues, Indian stereotypes and Indian humour, and We Talk, You Listen: New Tribes, New Turf (1970). Deloria has published a number of studies of Native American religions, most notably God Is Red (1973) and The Metaphysics of Modern Existence (1979), where he contrasts the Indian with the Judaeo-Christian worldview and argues that the new metaphysics can be modelled upon tribal cosmology. His works on the political and legal aspects of Indian–white relations include Behind the Trail of Broken Treaties (1974) and American Indian Policy in the Twentieth Century (1985). See also NATIVE AMERICAN LITERATURE.

DE MAN, Paul (1919–83), Belgian scholar and critic, born in Antwerp, educated at the University of Brussels and at Yale; he became Professor of Humanistic Studies at Johns Hopkins University and Professor of Humanities at Yale. His work on German, French, and English literature had a special emphasis on irony and rhetoric. He came to prominence with his book Blindness and Insight (1971), which offered English-speaking readers their first developed introduction to *Deconstruction and the work of Jacques Derrida; it argued that critical insights are characteristically accompanied by a matching blindness, and that all literary texts anticipate their own misreading. A literary text is one 'that implicitly or explicitly signifies its own rhetorical mode', and rhetoric is what makes interpretation indispensable and uncertain. Rhetoric is therefore language made visible, a revelation not only of strategy but of our deep entanglement in a medium we may think is at our service. De Man's later book, Allegories of Reading (1979), extended this idea through close commentary on works by Rousseau, Nietzsche, Rilke, and Proust; and de Man himself, in his later years, became America's chief apologist for Deconstruction, although fully aware of the ironies involved when a work of dismantling becomes a monument, when scepticism becomes a certainty. He was surprised by Deconstruction's academic success, and sought to correct the growing impression that the movement, or the practice, was unhistorical, or against history. De Man's posthumous Resistance to Theory (1986) sought to understand what had happened to literary study in the wake of modern critical and philosophical developments. He himself, or rather his memory, became the subject of a considerable controversy when it was discovered after his death that he had contributed many articles, some of them anti-Semitic, to a collaborationist journal in Belgium during the Second World War. Did this discovery discredit his later work, as his traditionalist opponents wished to think? Most readers thought not, but many deconstructive defences looked distinctly shaky.

DE MORGAN, William (Frend) (1839–1917), British writer and master potter, born in London, educated at University College, London, and the Royal Academy Schools. As a ceramicist, he came into close contact with William Morris (for whom he designed stained glass and decorative tiles) and other members of the Pre-Raphaelites. After illness and the failure of his firm de Morgan retired in 1905. In his late sixties he began producing expansive novels, the first and most successful being Joseph Vance (1906), a tragi-comic tale in autobiographical form told by a drunken builder whose Oxford-educated son becomes an inventor. He wrote eight more novels including Alice-for-Short: A Dichronism (1907), a ghost story, and A Likely Story (1911), a tale of magic; two posthumous novels, The Old Madhouse (1919) and Old Man's Youth (1921), were completed by his wife, Evelyn de Morgan, also an artist. The charm of his work lay in its originality and Dickensian style.

DENNIS, C. J. (Clarence Michael James) (1876–1936), Australian journalist, born in South Australia. He became editor of the Adelaide weekly The Critic, and eventually joined the Melbourne Herald. Having had little success with Backblock Ballads and Other Verses (1913), Dennis extracted four verse narratives from the collection and republished them as Songs of a Sentimental Bloke (1915), which achieved immediate popularity. The Moods of Ginger Mick (1916) recorded the antics of Bloke's friend during the war. This, with the earlier marching song 'The Australiaise' (1908), captured the prevailing mood of Australian nationalism. Both the Bloke and Ginger Mick were presented as caricatures of the irreverent, down to earth, good-humoured Australian. There is a shrewd sensitivity to human failings in Dennis's verse narratives which accounts for the folk stature they have acquired.

DENNIS, Nigel (Forbes) (1912–89), British novelist and dramatist, born in Bletchingley, Surrey, educated in Rhodesia, Austria, and Germany. He was an outstanding journalist and became co-editor of Encounter*. Much of his first novel, Boys and Girls Come out To Play (1949), is set in America where he had worked as a journalist from 1931 to 1949. Cards of Identity (1955), which Dennis adapted for the stage in 1956, is widely regarded as his finest work; an extravagantly inventive satire on the shallowness of human identity in modern civilization, the novel culminates, in 'The Prince of Antioch', a sustained parody of Shakespeare. A House in Order (1960), set chiefly in a greenhouse from which the narrator observes a third world war, forms a tautly concentrated fable on the nature of human purpose. His other works as a dramatist include The Making of Moo (1957) and August for the People (1961). His love of the Mediterranean is expressed in An Essay on Malta (1972) and in Exotics (1970), a volume of poems set mainly in that region.

DESAI, Anita (1937–), Indian novelist and short-story writer, born in Mussoorie, educated in Delhi. Her novels of the 1960s signalled the emergence of a distinctive and original talent, but are now dismissed by the author as overwritten and melancholy. Her first work, Cry, the Peacock (1963), is compelling in its lyrical account of a frustrated young woman's madness and murder of her husband. Other novels, such as Voices in the City (1965) and the brief, pessimistic Where Shall We Go This Summer? (1975), explore the lives and sensibilities of the urban bourgeoisie from differing perspectives, usually those of young married women, while Bye Bye Blackbird (1969) is an attempt to cope with the realities of immigrants' lives in Britain. Fire on the Mountain (1977) brought Desai critical and popular acclaim; the novel reworks the tropes of innocence and experience in its depiction of the tense and ultimately violent relationship between an ageing Indian matron and her disturbed great-granddaughter. Clear Light of Day (1980) locates the experience of Partition and communal disharmony in the memories of an independent single woman attempting to come to terms with her life and relationships. The black comedy In Custody (1984) deftly intertwines linguistic and power politics, aesthetics, Hindu philosophy, and documentary realism in a tale of an idealistic Hindu teacher's obsession with the œuvre of a decadent but brilliant Muslim poet. Baumgartner's Bombay (1987) chronicles the life and murder of a Jewish refugee from Nazi Germany adrift in a changing India that simultaneously accepts and ignores him; contrasted with his are the experiences of an adventurous and exploitative German itinerant drug addict. In Journey to Ithaca (1995) Desai explores once again the encounter between East and West: a young European couple discover that an Indian saint and mystic was brought up in Egypt. Like Desai's other later novels, the book offers a subjective interpretation of much of this century's history. Other works include a novel for children, Village by the Sea (1982), and a collection of short stories, Games at Twilight (1978).

DESANI, G(ovindas) V(ishnoodas) (1909–), Indian novelist and dramatist, born in Nairobi, Kenya, educated privately; he came to England in 1926 and worked as a journalist. Throughout the Second World War he lectured on Indian Affairs for the Ministry of Information. From 1952 to the mid-1960s, he lived in monasteries in India and became a professor of Philosophy at the University of Texas, Austin, in 1968. Desani's most celebrated work is All About H. Hatterr (1951; revised 1970, 1972, 1986), originally published in 1948 under the title All About Mr Hatterr, a Gesture. Widely regarded as a comic masterpiece of the Absurd, the book recounts the fortunes of the worldly but philosophically disposed H. Hatterr with extraordinary stylistic and idiomatic mobility. The novel shares an underlying concern with illusion and reality displayed in Desani's Hali (1951), a poetic drama whose mystically exalted manner is in the traditions of classical Indian literature; it is collected with his shorter fictions in Hali and Collected Stories (1990). Desani became an American citizen in 1979.

DESHPANDE, Shashi (1938–), Indian novelist, born in Dharwar, North Karnataka, India, educated at Bangalore University. Both her first collection of short stories, The Legacy (1978), and her highly praised novel, The Dark Holds no Terrors (1980), signalled the arrival of an important new feminist voice in Indian fiction; through a network of familial relationships, and above all men and women, Deshpande explores contemporary India and illustrates the complex adjustments and social changes of the 1980s. Her honest treatment of sexuality, gender, and generational conflicts is evident in Roots and Shadows (1983); its intelligent, mature narrator, the journalist Indu, is a more independent, less tortured example of the modern urbanized Indian woman than some of Deshpande's other protagonists. In Deshpande's vision, liberation for the Indian woman is circumscribed by boundaries of class, social position, and marital status. Arguably her most accomplished novel, That Long Silence (1988) combines acerbic realism with subjective exploration, political awareness with Hindu philosophy. Deshpande has also written fiction for children, and two detective novels, If I Die Today (1982) and Come Up and Be Dead (1983).

Detective Fiction. Among the most enduring and widely read styles of popular writing in the twentieth century, the detective novel is a formulaic and conventionalized strand of crime fiction, emphasizing the 'puzzle' element. Within a restricted setting (often a country house or isolated rural community), a terrible crime is committed. There are several suspects, all variously plausible as the culprit. After a number of carefully stage-managed 'red herrings' and surprises, the mystery is eventually unravelled. The perpetrator is identified through a combination of deduction and intuition, in the person of the detective, who may be an amateur, and order is once again restored. The interest of such stories lies partly in the characterization and setting, partly in the reassuring sense that crime is soluble and manageable, but perhaps most importantly in the elaborate game of teasing and misleading the reader, who is encouraged to enter into a contest of wits with the detective, only to be thwarted by his or her superior ingenuity.

Precedents for the figure of the detective had been established in the nineteenth century, in Dickens's Bleak House (1852–3) and in Wilkie Collins's The Moonstone (1868), but the real progenitor of the detective story is commonly agreed to have been Edgar Allan Poe's 'Chevalier Dupin' stories ("The Murders in the Rue Morgue', 1841, and others). While The Moonstone has been claimed to be the first full-length detective novel in England, this title should in truth be given to A. C. *Doyle's A Study in Scarlet (1888). Drawing on Poe and Emile Gaboriau's Monsieur Lecoq (1869), Doyle created the brilliant but unstable Sherlock Holmes and his unimaginative but loyal assistant Dr Watson, constructing a paradigm for the genre much imitated by later writers. He also established the short story as the dominant form: in the hands of writers such as *Chesterton, *Freeman, and *Bramah, it maintained its ascendancy until E. C. *Bentley published Trent's Last Case (1913), which introduced in a full-length novel more characterization and the gentlemanly amateur detective with powers of ratiocination markedly inferior to those of Holmes and his successors, thus setting a pattern for the Golden Age of detective fiction in the 1920s and 1930s.

By the 1920s, rules of fair play between author and reader were formulated. In Monsignor Ronald Knox's 'Decalogue' (1928), the ten commandments for the detective writer, these conventions were listed and codified. Leading authors of the Golden Age were Agatha *Christie, whose Hercule Poirot, though obviously a metamorphosis of Holmes, also owes something to A. E. W. *Mason's Inspector Hanaud; *Rhode, H. C. *Bailey, *Berkeley, Michael Innes (pseudonym of J. I. M. *Stewart), Nicholas Blake (pseudonym of C. *Day Lewis); Dorothy *Sayers and Margery *Allingham, both of whom turned the gentlemanly detective into an aristocrat; Ngaio *Marsh, who made him a policeman as well; *Crofts, who kept closer to reality by creating the prototype of the solid police inspector who achieves results through attention to detail rather than deduction; and the Americans J. D. *Carr, S. S. *Van Dine, and Ellery *Queen, whose ever more ingenious and abstruse puzzles abandoned any pretence of characterization or realism.

Meanwhile in America the private eye novel, which differs from the classic detective story in that it is more violent, dynamic rather than static, and often does not follow the classic rule that the criminal must be introduced at the beginning of the story, had emerged in the 1920s and 1930s from the pulp magazine Black Mask* (1920–36) and in the novels of Dashiell *Hammett, James M. *Cain, and Raymond *Chandler, who have been followed by a host of successors, most notably by R. *Macdonald. This *'Hard-boiled' fiction has been the dominant form in the USA since the 1930s, and after the Second World War began to establish itself in Britain, though attempts to transplant the genre generally failed. At the same time some British writers turned away from the snobbishness and nostalgia of the Golden Age and began writing increasingly realistic crime and spy novels which presented a less one-sided view of the conflict between justice and criminal and more interest in criminal psychology and social concerns. Writers who have remained more or less faithful to the classic detective novel, such as Edmund *Crispin, Michael Gilbert, Elizabeth Ferrars, H. *Keating, Ellis *Peters, and P. D. *James, have mostly abandoned the traditional amateur sleuth who is frequently replaced by a more plausibly drawn police officer, and exotic settings and realistic characterization have become more prevalent. In America, though Rex *Stout remained true to the Holmesian model, the scene has been dominated by the private eye novel, together with a variant on this type which might be called the tough police novel, exemplified by the work of authors such as Elmore *Leonard and Charles *Willeford. During the 1950s a new sub-genre, that of the 'police procedural', appeared in America under the influence of radio and television police series such as Dragnet. These novels portray a complete police unit investigating concurrently a series of separate crimes: chief exponents of the type are, in America, Ed *McBain, Hillary Waugh, and Elizabeth Linington; in Britain it has largely remained the preserve of television, though John *Creasey's J. J. Marric stories imitate the method. See Howard Haycraft, Murder for Pleasure: The Life and Times of the Detective Story (1942); Jacques Barzun and Wendell Hertig Taylor, A Catalogue of Crime (1971, revised 1989); Julian *Symons, Bloody Murder: From the Detective Story to the Crime Novel, A History (1972, revised 1985); Chris Steinbrunner and Otto Penzler, Encyclopaedia of Mystery and Detection (1976); John M. Reilly (ed.), Twentieth Century Crime and Mystery Writers (1980, 2nd edition 1985); and T. J. Binyon, 'Murder Will Out': The Detective in Fiction (1989).

DEUTSCH, Babette (1895–1982), American poet, born in New York, where she was educated at Barnard College, after which she was secretary to the radical economist Thorstein *Veblen. From 1944 to 1971 she taught at Columbia University. Banners (1919), her first collection of verse, was followed by Honey Out of the Rock (1925), Fire for the Night (1930), and Epistle to Prometheus (1931), a long poem celebrating the Promethean spirit throughout human history. The emotional and intellectual energies which sustain her best work are held in balance by a discriminating free-verse technique and highly developed command of visual imagery. The social concerns in her verse are frequently allied to evocations of everyday life in New York. Later collections include One Part Love (1939), Take Them Stranger (1944), Coming of Age (1959), and Collected Poems (1969). Among Deutsch's novels are A Brittle Heaven (1926), a substantially autobiographical treatment of a woman who is a writer, wife, and mother; In Such a Night (1927), an experimental narrative about a woman giving birth at a dinner party; and Mask of Silenus (1933), based on the life of Socrates. Her critical writings on modern poetry include Potable Gold (1929) and Poetry in Our Time (1952). With her husband, Avraham Yarmolinsky, she translated much German and Russian verse, including works by Rilke, Pushkin, and Pasternak.

DEVANNY, Jean (1894–1962), New Zealand and Australian novelist, born Jane Crook in Ferntown, Nelson, the daughter of a miner; she left school at the age of 13. At 17 she married the militant miner and unionist Hal Devanny. Her first novel, The Butcher's Shop (1926), which dramatizes in romantic mode the argument for women's right to sexual autonomy, was banned in Australia and New Zealand for its sexual politics and its explicit descriptions of animal husbandry on a New Zealand farm. Devanny's subsequent fiction, with New Zealand settings, includes Lenore Divine (1926), Old Savage and Other Stories (1927), Riven (1929), and Bushman Burke (1930); after her move to Sydney in 1929 she produced several realist, Australian novels. Experience of the Depression in Australia stimulated Devanny's political activities and she became a member of the Australian Communist Party, although she often clashed with it on questions concerning women and cultural policy. Such themes are treated in her novels Sugar Heaven (1936) and Cindie (1949), which examined the plight of sugar-cane workers in Queensland, and in her posthumously published autobiography Point of Departure (1986).

Devil's Disciple, The, the best-known of G. B. *Shaw's 'Three Plays for Puritans', first performed in Albany, New York in 1897 and published in 1901. It is set during the American War of Independence and primarily concerns Dick Dudgeon, regarded as demonic by his loveless mother and most of the other members of their conventional and pious New Hampshire community. When the British come to arrest the local minister, Anthony Anderson, Dick allows himself to be taken in his place. He is sentenced to be hanged by a military court—the proceedings watched over by the urbane General Burgoyne, who foresees the impending defeat of the British—and saved from the gallows only by the last-minute arrival of Anderson himself, now launched on a full-time career as an officer of the American militia. If the play were simply the melodrama it sometimes seems, there would doubtless be substance in the explanation of Dick's altruism offered by Anderson's wife Judith, that he has fallen in love with her. But that idea leaves him 'revolted'. He sacrificed himself because any other action would have affronted his sense of right and wrong: 'When it came to the point whether I would take my neck out of the noose and put another man's into it, I could not do it . . . I have been brought up standing by the law of my own nature; and I may not go against it.' The self-professed diabolist is thus one of Shaw's secular saints, a puritan in a profounder sense than the woebegone churchgoers of New England.

DE VRIES, Peter (1910–93), American novelist, born in Chicago, educated at Northwestern University. He was an editor of Poetry and in 1944 joined *The New Yorker. Connecticut and New York State form the background for many of the comic novels for which he became known, beginning with But Who Wakes the Bugler? (1940). The tales in No, but I Saw the Movie (1952) established him as a writer of verbal dexterity and exuberant imagination. His protagonists were God-fearing and vigorous but an underlying serious concern for religious and moral matters is evident in much of his work. Many of his novels evolved from stories previously published in The New Yorker. He parodied the style of writers such as *Faulkner, *Fitzgerald, and *Hemingway with great success in The Tents of Wickedness (1959). Other works include Tunnel of Love (1954), Comfort Me with Apples (1956), The Mackerel Plaza (1958), Through the Fields of Clover (1961), Reuben, Reuben (1964), The Vale of Laughter (1967), The Prick of Noon (1985), Without a Stitch in Time (1972; short stories), Consenting Adults (1980), and Slouching towards Kalamazoo (1983).

DEWEY, John (1859–1952), American philosopher and educationist, born in Burlington, Vermont, educated at the University of Vermont and Johns Hopkins University. After lecturing at the universities of Minnesota, Michigan, and Chicago, in 1905 he became a professor at Columbia University. The political and social stimuli to which he was exposed during his ten years in Chicago brought about the convergence of his socio-cultural and philosophical preoccupations. As Director of Chicago's School of Education he established the Laboratory School, in which he experimentally applied his principles of active and creative learning. Among his early works on education was The Child and the Curriculum (1902); the many publications which followed include Moral Principles in Education (1909), Democracy and Education (1916), and Experience and Education (1938). The extent of his influence on the theory and practice of education in America and beyond gives him pre-eminence among the educational reformers of the twentieth century. The emphasis on practicality in his educational writings reflects his philosophical pragmatism, which formed an extension of the work of William *James and was informed by his readings of Darwin. His doctrine of 'instrumentalism' viewed intellectual activity as a function of the instinct to adjust for survival in the human species. Among the expositions of his ideas which gained him a wide reputation as a philosopher were Outlines of a Critical Theory of Ethics (1891), The Influence of Darwin on Philosophy (1910), and Reconstruction in Philosophy (1920). Experience and Nature (1929) and The Quest for Certainty (1929) argued for a provisional and socially oriented conception of philosophy, challenging the traditional assumptions of academic philosophers concerning the abstract nature of knowledge. The concern with the spiritual dimensions of experience in his later work is most evident in A Common Faith (1934), in which he maintained a firm distinction between religious ideals and religious dogma. His many other publications include Logic, the Theory of Enquiry (1938), Public Schools and Spiritual Values (1944), and the collections of essays Characters and Events (1929) and Problems of Men (1946). George Dykhuizen's The Life and Mind of John Dewey appeared in 1973. See also BLACK MOUNTAIN WRITERS.

DHONDY, Farrukh (1944–), Indian playwright and novelist, born in Poona, India, educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, and the University of Leicester. After working as a schoolteacher in London he was a freelance writer until 1985 when he became a commissioning editor for multicultural television programmes. His highly regarded works as a television dramatist include No Problem, which was written with Mustapha *Matura for broadcast in 1983, and King of the Ghetto (broadcast 1986). Among his other plays are Mama Dragon (produced 1980) and Kipling Sahib (produced 1982). His acclaimed first novel Bombay Duck (1990) forms a provocative treatment of conventional assumptions concerning black, white, and Asian cultural identities; its complex plot provides a context in which bizarre satirical elements can co-exist with a fundamental seriousness of purpose. Among his books for young people are Come to Mecca (1978) and Black Swan (1992). He is the editor of Ranters, Ravers, and Rhymers (1990), an eclectic anthology of verse by Caribbean, African, and Indian poets. Dhondy is also the author of C. L. R. James (1994), a biography.

Dial, The, a literary periodical founded in Chicago in 1880 by F. F. Browne. It was purchased by Scofield Thayer and J. S. Watson in 1919, following its move to New York in the previous year. Under Thayer's editorship it became the finest American magazine of literature and the arts of its day, publishing innovative work of the highest standard by leading American, British, and European writers. D. H. *Lawrence regularly contributed short stories, which were also supplied by Katherine *Mansfield, Sherwood *Anderson, and James *Stephens; among the notable poets whose work appeared were T. S. *Eliot, whose *The Waste Land had its first American publication in the journal, W. B. *Yeats, William Carlos *Williams, E. E. *Cummings, and Marianne *Moore, who became the editor in 1925. The Dial was of particular importance in fostering advances in criticism; essays and reviews by Kenneth *Burke, George *Saintsbury, Yvor *Winters, and other distinguished critics established new standards in textual analysis, anticipating the emergence of the *New Criticism. Notable European contributors included Thomas Mann, Maxim Gorky, Gerhardt Hauptmann, Anatole France, and Paul Valéry. Henry McBride was the principal art critic, and reproductions of work by leading European painters and sculptors were frequently featured. The Dial ceased publication in 1929, Marianne Moore later recording that a general falling off in enthusiasm had reduced the tasks of editorship to 'mere faithfulness to responsibility'.

DIBDIN, Michael (1947–), British novelist, born in Northern Ireland, educated at Sussex University and the University of Alberta, Canada. After completing his first novel, The Last Sherlock Holmes Story (1980), he spent four years teaching English at the University of Perugia; many of his novels have an Italian setting. A Rich Full Death (1986) was a murder story set in Florence, involving Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning and the poetry of Dante Alighieri. Ratking (1988), the first of his Aurelio Zen detective stories, won the Crime Writers Association Golden Dagger Award that year and was also set in Italy. It was followed by The Tryst (1989), Vendetta (1990), Dirty Tricks (1991), Cabal (1992), The Dying of the Light (1993), Dead Lagoon (1994), and Dark Spectre (1995).

DICK, Philip K(indred) (1928–82), American *science fiction novelist, born in Chicago, educated at the University of California. Of his more than thirty novels, the best-known include Time out of Joint (1959); The Man in the High Castle (1962), an alternative history; The Three Stigmata of Palmer Eldritch (1964), which depicts a society controlled by drug-induced fantasy and television; Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep? (1968), later filmed as Blade Runner, set in a twenty-first century dominated by information technology; Flow My Tears, The Policeman Said (1976), which depicts a police state of the near future; and A Scanner Darkly (1977), a dystopian fantasy, set in California in the 1990s. These works express a blackly comic vision of late twentieth-century America, seen through the distorting glass of the future, depicting a technologically sophisticated, totalitarian society controlled by multinational corporations. Several early novels of a more conventional nature, written during the 1950s and published posthumously, express a similarly acerbic view of the modern world. They include Puttering About in a Small World (1985); Humpty Dumpty in Oakland (1986); Mary and the Giant (1987); and The Broken Bubble (1988).

DICKENS, Monica (1915–92), British novelist, born in London, educated at St Paul's Girls' School. During the 1930s she detached herself from her middle-class background and worked as a maid and a cook, an interlude providing the material for her first book, the lightly satirical autobiography One Pair of Hands (1939). Her earlier works include two further autobiographies, One Pair of Feet (1942), concerning her training as a nurse at the start of the Second World War, and My Turn to Make the Tea (1951), which draws on her experiences in journalism. Much of her fiction has a documentary aspect. The Fancy (1943) is directly informed by her wartime work in an aircraft factory, while No More Meadows (1953) and Man Overboard (1958) have a basis in her husband's career as an officer in the United States Navy. From the early 1960s onward, her novels assume a more serious sociological character. The Heart of London (1961) is a treatment of alcoholic destitution. She liaised closely with the NSPCC in researching child-abuse as the subject of Kate and Emma (1964). The Listeners (1970) reflects her work with the Samaritans, whose American branches she founded in 1974. Her numerous other novels include Cobbler's Dream (1963), Enchantment (1989), and Scarred (1991). An Open Book (1978) is a third volume of autobiography.

DICKEY, James (Lafayette) (1923–), American poet and novelist, born in Atlanta, Georgia, educated at Vanderbilt University. Having held posts at numerous American colleges and universities, he became Professor of English at the University of South Carolina in 1969. Into the Stone (1960) and Helmets (1964) are among his earlier collections of verse, which gained him wide notice as a powerfully direct poet of considerable conventional accomplishment. Buckdancer's Choice (1965) initiated the audacious formal experimentation which has remained a characteristic of his verse, much of which explores fundamental relations between man and his natural contexts. The value of the violent and bizarre aspects of his poetry has been the subject of critical controversy. His subsequent collections include The Eye-Beaters, Blood, Victory, Madness, Buckhead and Mercy (1970), The Zodiac (1976), Puella (1982), The Eagle's Mile (1990), in which a new purity of lyrical energy becomes evident; The Early Motion (1981), The Central Motion (1983), and The Whole Motion (1992) are collected editions. Deliverance (1970), the best-known of his novels, is the compelling story of four businessmen whose holiday journey to the wilds of Georgia develops into a struggle for survival. Alnilam (1987) describes a blind father's quest for knowledge of his son, whose death in a flying accident is linked with a secret society. To the White Sea (1993) concerns American airmen escaping through wartime Japan. Among Dickey's numerous other publications are the critical works The Suspect in Poetry (1964) and Sorties (1971), and the topographical writings of The Starry Place between the Antlers (1981) and Wayfarer (with photographs by W. A. Bake, 1988).

DICKINSON, Goldsworthy Lowes (1862–1932), British philosophical writer, born in London, educated at King's College, Cambridge, of which he was a fellow from 1887 onward. Among his early works is The Greek View of Life (1896), an introduction to classical Greek culture. There followed a series of ethical treatises using the form of the Socratic dialogues; these include The Meaning of Good (1901) and Justice and Liberty (1908). He was instrumental in formulating the League of Nations; the most notable of his several studies of the causes of the First World War is The International Anarchy, 1904–1914 (1926). His numerous other publications include After Two Thousand Years: A Dialogue between Plato and a Modern Young Man (1930). Dennis Proctor edited The Autobiography of G. Lowes Dickinson (1973), written in 1927 but withheld from publication because of its disclosures concerning his homosexuality. E. M. *Forster's biography of Dickinson appeared in 1934.

DICKINSON, Patric Thomas (1914–94), British poet, born in Nasirabad, India, educated at St Catharine's College, Cambridge. After working as a schoolteacher he became a producer with the BBC and then a freelance writer and broadcaster. His first collection of poetry, The Seven Days of Jericho, appeared in 1948. Numerous succeeding volumes include The Sailing Race (1952), The World I See (1960), A Wintering Tree (1973), and A Rift in Time (1982). His poetry was characterized by its concise, conservatively innovative verse forms and by its unusual balance between a recurring note of tender intimacy and a sometimes sardonic, distancing wit. Although Dickinson's work frequently drew on classical sources, it remained firmly grounded in details of local and domestic experience. Notable among his translations are The Complete Plays of Aristophanes (2 volumes, 1971) and a version of The Aeneid (1961). He also worked extensively as a playwright for radio and stage; his published plays include Theseus and the Minotaur (1945) and A Durable Fire (1962). His autobiography entitled The Good Minute appeared in 1965.

DICKINSON, Peter (Malcolm de Brissac) (1927–), British writer, born in Zambia, educated at King's College, Cambridge. He is the author of a number of successful and original children's books, of which the best-known are perhaps the trilogy The Weathermonger (1968), Heartsease (1969), and The Devil's Children (1970). He has also written detective stories which are distinguished, above all, by a series of striking and memorable settings: the first, Skin Deep (1968; US title The Glass-Sided Ant's Nest), concerns the murder of the head of a New Guinea tribe installed in a Victorian house in London by a rich anthropologist. Equally unusual are The Green Gene (1973) and The Poison Oracle (1974), while King and Joker (1976) has as its characters an imaginary English royal family. His later novels, though often involving a crime, have moved away from the detective story genre (The Last House Party, 1982; Skeleton-in-Waiting, 1989).

DICKSON, Carter, see CARR, JOHN DICKSON.

DICKSON, Gordon R(upert) (1923–), American science fiction writer, born in Edmonton, Alberta, Canada, educated at the University of Minnesota. For many years he concentrated on *space opera tales but from the publication of The Genetic General (1960; enlarged as Dorsai!, 1976), the first of the Childe Cycle of novels, he embarked upon a more ambitious project. The theme of the Cycle, whose further volumes include Necromancer (1962), The Final Encyclopedia (1984), and Other (1994), is that the evolution of humanity is dependent on an upward physical and spiritual expansion to the stars towards a kind of Godhead. Novels written outside the series include Time Storm (1977), The Far Call (1978), The Earth Lords (1989) and, notably, Wolf and Iron (1990), an epic set in post-collapse America.

DIDION, Joan (1934–), American novelist and essayist, born in Sacramento, California, educated at the University of California at Berkeley. Didion was a features editor for Vogue magazine, a contributing editor for The National Review, and a columnist for the Saturday Evening Post before establishing herself as a freelance writer. Her novels include Run River (1963), Play It as It Lays (1970), A Book of Common Prayer (1977), and Democracy (1984), but she is better known for her journalism and her essays, notably the volumes Slouching Towards Bethlehem (1968) and The White Album (1979), which contain some of her most trenchant observations on contemporary America, particularly California in the 1960s and 1970s. Her other important works of non-fiction include Salvador (1983), based on her experiences in 1982 when she travelled through El Salvador, and Miami (1987). Later works include Sentimental Journeys (1993), a collection of essays, After Henry (1994), and Joan Didion: Essays and Conversations (1994). Her work in the essay form has been seen as an example of the *'new journalism' and compared with that of other 'journalists' such as Gay Talese and Tom *Wolfe, while her fiction has been described as *'post-modernist', though neither attribution does full justice to her literary talents. Mark Royden's Joan Didion (1989) is a useful introduction to her life and writings.

DIDSBURY, Peter (1946–), British poet, born in Fleetwood, Lancashire, educated at Balliol College, Oxford. Until 1981 he was a schoolteacher in Hull, since when he has been an archaeologist by profession. His poetry first attracted wide critical notice when it appeared in Douglas *Dunn's edition of A Rumoured City: New Poets from Hull (1982), which was published in the same year as his first collection, The Butchers of Hull. The imaginative and chronological juxtapositions in Didsbury's writing, coupled with shifts of discourse which have drawn comparisons with John *Ashbery, are among the qualities productive of appreciative but slightly bewildered critical responses typified by Ian Crichton Smith's reference to his 'extraordinarily bizarre, eloquent poems'. Personal experience is combined with literary and historical material in much of his best writing; the accessibility and intermittent humorousness of his poetry holds its complexity and seriousness, frequently of a theological order, in check. The Classical Farm (1987) and That Old-Time Religion (1994) extended the range and fluency of his work.

DILLARD, Annie (1945–), American writer, born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, educated at Hollins College. Her first published work was a volume of poems, Tickets for a Prayerwheel (1974), but it was Pilgrim at Tinker's Creek (1974), her first work of prose—an extended meditation on nature—that established her reputation as a fine and original stylist, and gained her a Pulitzer Prize. Since then, Dillard has written a variety of prose works, including Teaching a Stone to Talk (1982), essays on nature and religion; Living by Fiction (1982), studies of such seminal writers as *Nabokov, Calvino, and Borges; an An American Childhood (1987), a partial autobiography, one of her most successful attempts to carve a new narrative form for herself which she has described as creative non-fiction. Her efforts to grapple with the meaning of creativity are detailed in the linked essays of The Writing Life (1989). Dillard turned to fiction with The Living (1992), a novel set in the late nineteenth century, about the experiences of frontier settlers in the American North West.

DI PRIMA, Diane (1934–), American novelist, playwright, and poet, born in New York City, educated at Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania. Di Prima's writings, particularly her verse, are frequently associated with both *Beat and confessional modes in modern American poetry and her poetic forms echo those of Beat contemporaries such as Allen *Ginsberg and Lawrence *Ferlinghetti. She was a contributing editor to Kulchur magazine in the early 1960s, a co-editor with LeRoi Jones (Amiri *Baraka) of the magazine Floating Bear, and from 1961 until 1965 was Director of the New York Poet's Theatre. Among her many volumes of verse are This Kind of Bird Flies Backward (1958), Dinners and Nightmares (1961), Revolutionary Letters (1969), Selected Poems, 1956–1975 (1975), Loba, Parts 1–8 (1978), Pieces of a Song: Selected Poems (1990), and Seminary Poems (1991). Zip Code (1993) is a volume of her collected plays, while Memoirs of a Beatnik (1969) is her most well-known novel. In a 1978 interview she spoke of the poet as 'the first person to begin the shaping and visioning of the new forms and the new consciousness when no one else has begun to sense it . . .' Di Prima has lived for many years in San Francisco and is one of the central figures in the city's vibrant poetic life. Her poem 'Brass Furnace Going Out', which describes her experience of undergoing an abortion, achieved some notoriety through its use by American anti-abortion groups, much to Di Prima's dismay.

Dirty Realist Fiction. A term used in Britain to describe the urbane minimalist fiction of a small group of American writers, notably Raymond *Carver, Richard *Ford, and Tobias Wolff. Highly articulate and sophisticated in style, 'dirty realist' fiction eschewed slick metropolitanism in favour of the grimmer realities of small-town American life. It featured elliptical dialogue, seedy settings, with uncompromising descriptions of violence, sordid sex, and the dreary hopelessness of its downbeat characters. The expression became fashionable in Britain during the late 1980s following its inception in 1987 when Bill Buford, editor of Granta, first used the term in an edition devoted to contemporary American fiction.

DISCH, Thomas M. (1940–), American novelist, poet, and short-story writer, born in Des Moines, Iowa, educated at New York University. He has been a visiting lecturer at the universities of Minnesota, Michigan State, and Wesleyan. He is part of the 'New Wave' of writers which swept through *science fiction in the 1960s. The Genocides (1965) was quickly followed by Mankind under the Leash (1966), 102 H-Bombs (1966), Echo round His Bones (1967), and Black Alice (1968). Disch made his reputation with his fourth novel, Camp Concentration (1968), which is, at one level, an allegory of the war in Vietnam. Camp Concentration imagines a world dominated by perpetual warfare between America and a host of Third World guerrillas. Its central character is Louis Sacchetti, an imprisoned poet and conscientious objector, who becomes the subject of a bizarre experiment to raise IQ, one of whose side-effects involves rapid physical deterioration. The book is a sustained meditation on the relationship between mortality and the Faustian will-to-power; alluding to Shakespeare, Rilke, *Joyce, and a host of other writers, its concerns are essentially metaphysical, though it never loses sight of the contemporary political situation. In similar fashion, On Wings of Song (1979) deals with the tension between Christian fundamentalism and artificially induced out-of-the-body experiences; its ending is a sombre and harrowing evocation of the gap between quotidian life and spiritual yearning. Disch concentrates not on heroes but on the forgotten victims of social control. The Priest: A Gothic Romance (1995), a long and sustained critique of the Catholic Church, continues the effort to expand his thematic range. Formally innovative and often densely written, his books challenge our preconceptions about the limitations of the science fiction genre.

Discourse is a word with three very different meanings in current critical and theoretical usage. First, it is a name for the flow of language, particularly dialogue and spoken language, in specific, practical situations. Discourse analysis attends to the structures and strategies by which we organize even our apparently unorganized verbal exchanges—interviews, for example, or gossip, or the succeeding speeches at a political rally. The second meaning of discourse arises chiefly from the work of the French theorist and intellectual historian Michel Foucault (1926–84), whose major works are Madness and Civilization (1961), The Order of Things (1966), The Archaeology of Knowledge (1969), Discipline and Punish (1975), and The History of Sexuality (1976, 1984). Foucault uses the term 'discourse' to indicate large-scale signifying practices, sometimes called discursive formations, that is, any historically identifiable pattern of verbal and non-verbal behaviour which transmits sets of propositions and implications. The discourse of medicine, for example, includes doctors' handwriting and nurses' uniforms, as well as the language of diagnosis and care. The discourse of the classroom includes the tone and manner of the teacher as well as what he or she says. Such discourses for Foucault are characteristically political: concerned with relations of power. Thus prison architecture and clinical definitions of madness are reflections of a culture's habits of social control, mirrors and instruments of its assumptions about normality and deviance. Finally, discourse is used to translate the Russian sjuzet (and the French récit), meaning the narrative arrangement of events in a story, as distinct from the events themselves prior to or outside the arrangement. (See PLOT.)

DISKI, Jenny (1947–), British novelist of Jewish descent, born in London. After being in institutional care when she was 14, she lived for four years with the novelist Doris *Lessing. In her early years she spent periods in psychiatric hospitals but subsequently trained as a teacher, and taught for five years before studying anthropology as a mature student. Her first novel, Nothing Natural (1986), a disturbing study of a sado-masochistic relationship, was followed by Rainforest (1987), in which a woman anthropologist journeys to the Malayan jungle in order to discover that civilization is only skin deep. The novel displayed her interest in the darker areas of the human psyche, which is also evident in her next novel, Like Mother (1989), a dialogue between a woman and her anencephalic baby. Then Again (1990) explores the Jewish past through the consciousness of Esther, an artist specializing in ceramics, and her disturbed teenage daughter. Happily Ever After (1991) concerns the love affair between Liam, a married, middle-aged alcoholic, and Daphne, an elderly woman who lives in the same building. As with all Diski's work, the novel explores the borderline between sanity and madness as well as the extremes of cruelty of which people are capable.

Dissociation of Sensibility, a term originated by T. S. *Eliot in his essay 'The Metaphysical Poets', which first appeared in 1921 as a review of H. J. C. *Grierson's edition of Metaphysical Lyrics and Poems of the Seventeenth Century (1921). Eliot's approval of the poetry of Donne and others, which was of considerable influence in establishing the high regard in which their work has since been held, emphasized their possession of 'a mechanism of sensibility which could devour any kind of experience'; the 'direct sensuous apprehension of thought' and the 're-creation of thought into feeling' characterizing the work of the Metaphysical Poets were lost in the course of the seventeenth century, when 'a dissociation of sensibility set in, from which we have never recovered'. As an example of the consequences, Eliot notes that 'Tennyson and Browning are poets, and they think; but they do not feel their thought as immediately as the odour of a rose'. The theory of dissociation of sensibility provoked much discussion and has been challenged as a misleadingly simple analysis of historical developments in English poetry; the phrase is, however, strongly indicative of the desire shared by Eliot, Ezra *Pound, and others to move beyond the debilitated conventions of the nineteenth century and establish a poetry capable of unifying a range of aesthetic, intellectual, and philosophical elements. Within the immediate context of the essay of 1921, Eliot's observations on the dissociation of sensibility and the limitations it imposes relate to his defence of a measure of obscurity in poetry: modern civilization's 'great variety and complexity . . . playing upon a refined sensibility, must produce various and complex results'; his own work of the period achieved such results in presenting unsettling and disjunctive emotional and mental states with the conviction of 'direct sensuous apprehension' he commended in the poets of the early seventeenth century.

DOBB, Maurice Herbert (1900–76), British economist and eminent Marxist scholar, educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, and the London School of Economics, subsequently Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Among his many books and articles, two stand out. The first is Political Economy and Capitalism (1937) which the obituary writer for the British Academy claimed marked 'the emergence of Marxist economics as a really serious economic discipline'. The second, Studies in the Development of Capitalism (1947), is an account of the transition from feudalism to capitalism in Western Europe. Dobb was a strong supporter of labour education, writing many pamphlets for the Workers' Education Association, and was active in British Communist Party circles between the wars. Towards the end of his life, he published a short and accessible book on the history of economic thought: Theories of Value and Distribution since Adam Smith (1973). In 1978 the Cambridge Journal of Economics published a memorial issue devoted to Dobb's life and work.

DOBSON, Rosemary (1920–), Australian poet, born in Sydney; she studied art at the University of Sydney. She spent some time in England and Europe where she became deeply interested in Greek antiquities and Italian paintings. Many of her poems first appeared in Bulletin*, including the title poem of The Ship of Ice (1948) in which she reflects upon the timeless quality of art and its ability to capture moments suspended in time. These themes recur in much of her work, notably in 'Still Life', 'Young Girl in a Window', and in the title poem of In a Convex Mirror (1944). In Child with a Cockatoo (1955) and Cock Crow (1965) she introduces more personal themes. Her finely crafted poems display a cool lyricism and are frequently concerned with the processes and effects of art and the role of the artist. Greek Coins (1977) was inspired by the culture of ancient Greece, and Over the Frontier (1978) includes a series of poems celebrating the Greek traveller Pausanias. Her other collections include Selected Poems (1973; revised 1980), The Three Fates (1984), Collected Poems (1991), and Untold Lives (1992). She has also translated collections of Russian poetry, including Seven Russian Poets (1978; with David *Campbell), and has edited several anthologies including Australian Voices (1975) and Sisters Poets (1979).

DOCTOROW, E(dgar) L(awrence) (1931–), American novelist, born in New York, educated at Kenyon College and Columbia University. After working as a screenplay reader for Columbia Pictures, he wrote Welcome to Hard Times (1960; UK title Bad Man From Bodie, 1961) which examines the illusory foundations of the American myth of progress through the conventions of the Western. There followed the appearance of Big as Life (1966), a science fiction satire set in New York, and The Book of Daniel (1971), a fictional investigation of the impact of the Rosenberg trial on the children of the couple and employing that historical moment to study the traditions of the political left in America through the McCarthyite period to the 1960s. His major success came with Ragtime (1975), the story of Coalhouse Walker and his ever-escalating struggle against racism and injustice. Based on Kleist's Kolhaus legend, the novel examines the relationship of past and present by blending historical figures like Emma Goldman, Freud, Jung, and Ford, and fictional invention into a fast-moving and incisive narrative which moves to an explosive conclusion (see NEW JOURNALISM). He has continued to use this formula to considerable effect in later works, which include Loon Lake (1980), a novel about economic and political injustice in a searing portrait of the USA in the Depression, World's Fair (1985), Billy Bathgate (1988), and The Waterworks (1994). His other work includes the play Drinks Before Dinner (1979); the screenplay Daniel (1983); Lives of the Poet, Six Stories and a Novella (1984), which reflects upon the dual position of the writer as observer and participant in society; and Poets and Presidents: Selected Essays 1977–1992 (1994).

Dodsworth, a novel by Sinclair *Lewis, published in 1929, dramatized by the author and Sidney Howard in 1934. A successful car manufacturer from the Midwestern city of Zenith, Samuel Dodsworth is unhappily married to Fran, a frivolous and pretentious snob. The pair visit Europe where Fran indulges in several flirtations, with an Englishman, Major Clyde Lockert, and in Paris with Arnold Israel. Fed up with this life of indulgence, Sam returns alone to America, but fearful of Fran's safety, rejoins her in Europe. Fran then falls in love with a German aristocrat, Kurt von Obersdorf. With an impending divorce, Sam wanders aimlessly in Europe and meets Edith Cortright, a mature American widow who provides Sam with the companionship and intellectual stimulation he is seeking. Their marriage plans are interrupted when Fran's relationship is thwarted by Kurt's mother, and Sam is persuaded to return to America with his wife. However, recognizing that life with Fran will be intolerable, Sam notifies Edith that he will return to her on the next ship. The novel presents the familiar pattern of Lewis's fiction, wherein somebody glimpses a dream beyond the trivial actualities and stifling customs of daily life, and tries to make it real, with varying degrees of success.

DOERR, Harriet (1910–), American novelist, born in Pasadena, California. She resumed a discontinued education late in life, receiving a BA in history from Stanford University in 1977. Her first novel was the highly acclaimed and prize-winning Stones for Ibarra (1984); set in Mexico, which Doerr knows well, the novel tells the story of a couple's encounter with Latin American culture. The novel, which has been compared with the fiction of Marquez and K. A. *Porter, is actually composed of linked stories, several of which adopt Mexican perspectives. Consider This, Señora (1994) similarly treats expatriates in Mexico; delicately lyrical, the novel is, however, more sustained and compelling than Doerr's first, guaranteeing her a place in America's expatriate tradition.

DOMINIC, R. B., see LATHEN, EMMA.

DONLEAVY, J(ames) P(atrick) (1926–), Irish novelist and playwright, born in America. His literary reputation rests to a large extent on his first novel, The Ginger Man (1955), which was first published in Paris by the Olympia Press, well known as publishers of erotica. An expurgated version was published in New York in 1958 and a 'complete and unexpurgated' edition in 1965, also in New York. The novel describes the adventures of Sebastian Dangerfield, an American, ostensibly studying law at Trinity College, Dublin. He is, as the narrative makes clear, a lazy, lying, sponging philanderer, with a genius for getting himself out of impossibly difficult situations; his behaviour to everyone—wife, friend, mistresses, landlords, and shopkeepers—is outrageous, and he is particularly adept at exploiting women, financially and sexually. The action is seen from Dangerfield's point of view. Donleavy's prose has reminded some of *Joyce, especially in its loving evocation of Dublin and in its sexually frank language. Donleavy's first play, Fairy Tales of New York, opened in London in 1960. It consists of four loosely connected episodes in which a young man, Cornelius Christian, is involved in a bizarre situation, and may be considered an example of Theatre of the *Absurd. After beginning with such distinction, Donleavy's subsequent work has been perhaps less successful. The comic magic of The Ginger Man has proved unrepeatable. His other novels include A Singular Man (1961); The Saddest Summer of Samuel S (1966); The Onion Eaters (1971); Shultz (1980); Leila (1983); Are You Listening, Rabbi Low? (1987); and That Darcy, That Dancer, That Gentleman (1991). He has also published a collection of short stories, Meet My Maker, the Mad Molecule (1964). He has adapted a number of his novels, including The Ginger Man, for the stage. A love of Ireland is apparent in his work and in 1967 he became an Irish citizen. The History of the Ginger Man (1994) is chiefly a memoir of post-war Dublin, about the people and circumstances surrounding the making of the Ginger Man.

DOOLITTLE, Hilda (1886–1961), American poet (who wrote as 'H.D.'), the daughter of a professor of mathematics, born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and educated at Bryn Mawr College. As a student she was closely associated with Marianne *Moore, W. C. *Williams, and Ezra *Pound, to whom she was briefly engaged and of whom she writes extensively in the autobiographical End to Torment (written in 1958, but not published until 1979). While holidaying in Europe in 1911 she met Pound in London, who styled her 'H.D.' when introducing her work to Poetry*, Chicago, in 1912. She joined with Pound, *Flint, and *Aldington, whom she married in 1913 and separated from in 1919, to form the core of the *Imagist group. Her first collection of poems, Sea Garden (1916), is notable for the precision and clarity of its imagery, often derived from maritime settings, and for the slender, finely cadenced verse forms which remain characteristic of her poetry. Hymen (1921) and Heliodora (1924) followed, containing poems still identifiable as Imagist while initiating the engagement with classical mythology and the hieratic tone which are conspicuous features of her later work. Subsequent volumes include Red Roses for Bronze (1929) and Helen in Egypt (1961), the latter a lengthy and ambitious narrative also employing prose. The Walls Do not Fall (1944), Tribute to the Angels (1945), and The Flowering of the Rod (1946) were collected as Trilogy in 1973; this constitutes her most remarkable work, combining her experiences of wartime London and her intense imaginative involvement with ancient Egyptian and Judaeo-Christian myth and mysticism. An edition of her Collected Poems appeared in 1984. Among her novels are Hedylus (1928) and Bid Me to Live (1960), a roman-à-clef concerning her involvement with the *Bloomsbury circle during the years of the First World War; Hermione (1981) collects three stories on lesbian themes which she chose not to publish in her lifetime. Barbara Guest's Herself Defined: The Poet H. D. and Her World was published in 1984.

DORN, Ed(ward) (1929–), American poet, born in Villa Grove, Illinois, educated at the University of Illinois. Dorn's childhood in the Great Depression was marked by the transient migrant life of his impoverished mother and stepfather. He became disaffected from the orthodoxies of the state educational system, and went to *Black Mountain College, North Carolina, where he came under the influence of Charles *Olson, whose A Bibliography on America for Ed Dorn (1964) was written in response to Dorn's request for guidance in studying the American West. A wanderer by temperament, Dorn has taught at several universities in the USA and abroad. His first poems were published in the Black Mountain Review; his volumes of poems include From Gloucester Out (1964), Geography (1965, revised 1968), The North Atlantic Turbine (1967), The Collected Poems 1956–1974 (1975; enlarged 1983), and Abhorrences (1990). He has published translations of Latin American poets, and Native American poets. His major prose works are What I See in The Maximus Poems (1960), a critical tribute to Charles Olson; The Rites of Passage (1965 and 1971; alternately issued as By the Sound), and The Shoshoneans: The People of the Basin-Plateau (1966). Dorn is a political poet, fiercely desiring the democracy that he finds lacking in the capitalist orthodoxy of American political and social institutions. He cherishes the Native Americans and their ancient culture, and mourns the loss of their ancestral lands. His Gunslinger (Parts 1 and 2, 1968–9; complete version, 1975) is an abrasive, witty grotesquery, mocking the myth of the West.

DORRIS, Michael A(nthony) (1945–), Native American novelist, critic, and anthropologist of the Modoc Tribe, born in Dayton, Washington, educated at Georgetown University and Yale; in 1983 he was appointed professor of Native American Studies at Dartmouth. In 1971 Dorris became the first unmarried man to adopt a child; the story of his son's life is juxtaposed with an account of the physical, mental, and social devastation caused by alcohol abuse in Native American communities in The Broken Cord: A Family's Ongoing Struggle with Fetal Alcohol Syndrome (1989). His first novel, A Yellow Raft in Blue Water (1987), deals with the lives of three generations of Native American women and explores the family tensions and social upheavals of the transition from reservation to urban living. Dorris has collaborated with his wife, Louise *Erdrich, and his first novel shares Erdrich's use of multiple narrators each of whom tells their story in their own idiomatic style. The Crown of Columbus (1991), the first novel to appear under both names, is a mystery thriller which follows the quest for Christopher Columbus's lost diary and his mythical crown. Among his other works are Native Americans: 500 Years After (1975), A Guide to Research in Native American Studies (1984), Paper Trail: Essays (1994), and the children's book Morning Girl (1992). See also NATIVE AMERICAN LITERATURE.

DOS PASSOS, John (Roderigo) (1896–1970), American novelist, poet, and playwright, born in Chicago, educated at Harvard. He contributed to various magazines whilst at Harvard, some of his college verse being published later in Eight Harvard Poets (1917). His father sought to prevent him from joining an American ambulance unit in 1916 by financing a year of architectural study in Spain, yet he enlisted in the famous Norton-Harjes ambulance unit and later served in Italy and France. These experiences became the basis of his first novel One Man's Initiation – 1917 (1920; reissued as First Encounter, 1945). The war also provided the starting point for his second work, Three Soldiers (1921), which concerned the bureaucratic effects of warfare on the lives of three very different young men. After the war he became a freelance journalist, travelling extensively in Europe, the Near East, and Russia in the 1920s, as well as writing poetry (A Pushcart at the Curb, 1922) and critical essays on Spanish culture (Rosinante to the Road Again, 1922). He then produced Streets of Night (1923) and the novel that marked the beginning of the period of his major achievements, Manhattan Transfer* (1925). During the next five years he became increasingly political, protesting at the Sacco and Vanzetti trial of 1927 in Facing the Chair (1927), and participating on the Dreiser committee which investigated the virtual state of civil war which surrounded the famous miners' strike in Harlan County, Tennessee, in 1931. He joined the executive board of the magazine the *New Masses in 1926, and was a writer for The New Playwrights' Theatre. He produced several plays, all demonstrating an acutely politicized consciousness, three of which were published as Three Plays (1934): The Garbage Man (1926), about a typical New York couple; Airways Inc. (1928), about corporate business and a building trades dispute; and Fortune Heights (1933), about the rise and fall of estate development. Further travel writings appeared, amongst them Orient Express (1927) and In All Countries (1934). Throughout his life he maintained a career as a novelist, playwright, and political reporter, though his major literary effort went into writing U.S.A.* (1938), a trilogy which comprised The 42nd Parallel (1930), 1919 (1932), and The Big Money (1936). The trilogy District of Columbia (1952) is an examination of the political motivations of the New Deal and the Second World War, made up of The Adventures of a Young Man (1939), about Glenn Spotswood, a naïve communist who falls foul of the Party; Number One (1943), about Glenn's brother, Tyler; and The Grand Design (1949), about the boys' father. The first of these was the first real sign of a complete break with the left in the USA. There followed further fictional works, including The Prospect Before Us (1950); Chosen Country (1951); Most Likely To Succeed (1954), a satire on bohemians and socialists in the 1920s and 1930s; The Great Days (1958); and Midcentury (1961), a novel which takes the devices of U.S.A. and puts them to work in a defence of a battery of conservative values. As well as this considerable production of large novels, he also wrote reportage and critical essays about politics and culture, amongst which are The Villages Are the Heart of Spain (1937), Journeys between Wars (1938), Tour of Duty (1946), and Brazil on the Move (1963). However, the works for which he became most famous in the 1950s and 1960s were his historical studies relating to the problems of US democracy, including a series of biographies in The Ground We Stand on (1941) and Prospects of a Golden Age (1959), essays on early American leaders in The Men Who Made the Nation (1957), with other books including Mr Wilson's War (1963), and The Shackles of Power (1966) about the Jeffersonian era. In 1973, a volume of selections from his letters and diaries appeared under the title of The Fourteenth Chronicle.

DOUGHTY, Charles Montagu (1843–1926), British travel writer and poet, born in Suffolk; he studied geology at Caius College, Cambridge. In 1870 he began travelling in Europe, North Africa, and the Middle East; after a year in Damascus learning Arabic, he joined a pilgrimage to Mecca in 1876, undergoing much hardship before his journey concluded at Jedda in 1878. His experiences were recorded in Travels in Arabia Deserta (1888); apart from its topographical and anthropological interest, the work is remarkable for Doughty's cultivation of a richly poetic idiom based on the language of Chaucer and Spenser with additional elements derived from Arabic usage. D. H. *Lawrence, who wrote the introduction to the 1921 edition, and D. G. *Hogarth were among those on whom it made a deep impression. The book, in which Doughty terms himself a 'wandering anchorite in the fable of human life', anticipates the metaphysical preoccupations of his idiosyncratically ambitious poetry. The Dawn in Britain (six volumes, 1906–7), his best-known poem, forms a mythical allegory of national destiny. His verse also includes Adam Cast Forth (1908), a recasting of Biblical material, and Mansoul (1920), a mystical envisioning of man's quest to unite Heaven and Earth. Hogarth's biography of Doughty appeared in 1928.

DOUGLAS, Lord Alfred (Bruce) (1870–1945), British poet, born near Worcester, educated at Winchester and at Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1891 he was introduced to Oscar Wilde by Lionel Johnson. Douglas's father, the Marquis of Queensbury, disapproved of the relationship which developed and precipitated the sequence of events leading to Wilde's imprisonment in 1895. Douglas's translation from the original French of Wilde's Salome appeared with illustrations by Aubrey Beardsley in 1894. Poems (1896), his first collection of verse, was published in Paris. Subsequent volumes include The City of the Soul (1899), In Excelsis (1924), and Sonnets and Lyrics (1935). His work as a poet is highly conventional and often undistinguished. In addition to the lyrical and elegiac modes which predominate, he produced a substantial body of light verse. The sonnets he wrote in 1897 at his villa near Naples, where Wilde joined him following his release from prison, are his finest work. He edited the Academy from 1907 to 1910 and was jailed for a libel against W. S. *Churchill in 1923. His uncharitable view of Wilde in Oscar Wilde and Myself (1914) was largely retracted in Oscar Wilde: A Summing Up (1940). His self-revealing Autobiography appeared in 1929. Bernard Shaw and Alfred Douglas: A Correspondence (ed. Mary Hyde, 1982) covers the period 1931 to 1945. Biographies include Lord Alfred Douglas (1984) by H. Montgomery Hyde.

DOUGLAS, Ellen, pseudonym of Josephine HAXTON (1921–), American novelist, born in Mississippi, where she has spent most of her life. Her constant themes are the position of women and the relationship between black and white, using her considerable powers of observation of life in Mississippi to come to more universal conclusions. Her first novel, A Family's Affairs (1962), drawing on her own family, was followed by a volume of related novellas and stories, Black Cloud, White Cloud (1963). Subsequent books include Apostles of Light (1973) and Where the Dreams Cross (1986). The Rock Cried Out (1979) presents the South in the context of the Civil Rights period and relates it to the wider USA in the throes of the Vietnam War. A Lifetime Burning (1982) is a novel in the form of a journal, which shows the break-up of the narrator's marriage. The culmination of Douglas's honest and scrutinizing fiction must be Can't Quit You, Baby (1988), a novel about two women, one white, prosperous, protected (and also self-protecting), the other her black servant, a far more turbulent and emotionally honest person. Douglas has a deep interest in fairy-tale, and has also retold classic tales to illustrations by the visionary Mississippi artist Walter Anderson in The Magic Carpet and Other Tales (1987).

DOUGLAS, Keith (Castellain) (1920–44), British poet, born at Tunbridge Wells, Kent; he began writing poems at the age of ten. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, where Edmund Blunden was his tutor. From 1937 onwards his work appeared in a variety of periodicals, including Geoffrey Grigson's New Verse. He was posted to the Middle East in 1941 and became a tank commander in the North African Campaign, during which much of his finest poetry was written. He was killed soon after taking part in the D-Day landings in Normandy. Alamein to Zem Zem, his vividly documentary prose account of warfare in the desert, was published in 1946. The only volume of his poetry to appear in his lifetime was Selected Poems of 1943. His experiences of active service and wartime Cairo are presented through imagery of incisive clarity and a concentrated plainness of diction. The sometimes ruthlessly unsentimental quality of his work is intrinsic to the candour and detachment that are characteristics of his achievement. Although a Collected Poems was published in 1951, edited by G. S. *Fraser and J. Waller, interest in Douglas's poetry was comparatively slight until Ted *Hughes's selected edition of his work in 1964. Desmond Graham, whose biography Keith Douglas: 1920–1944 appeared in 1973, produced a Complete Poems in 1979 and a miscellany of Douglas's prose in 1985. See also WAR POETRY.

DOUGLAS, (George) Norman (1868–1952), British travel writer and novelist, born at Thüringen in the Vorarlberg, Austria, a region he describes in the autobiographical Together (1923), educated at Uppingham School, which he found uncongenial, and Karlsruhe Gymnasium. Following a period in the British Foreign Service, from 1898 onward he lived chiefly in Capri and Florence. Between 1910 and 1916 he was in London and spent three years as an associate editor of the English Review, becoming closely acquainted with D. H. *Lawrence—who based James Argyle in Aaron's Rod (1922) on Douglas—and with Joseph *Conrad and other notable writers of the day. Siren Land (1911), a vivid, erudite, and informative evocation of Capri and Sorrento, rapidly gained him a reputation that was enhanced by Fountains in the Sand (1912), on his experiences of Tunisia, and Old Calabria (1915), the account of Southern Italy that is sometimes regarded as his masterpiece. Prompted by Conrad, he wrote South Wind (1917), his first novel; the more formally structured narratives of They Went (1920) and In the Beginning (1927) lacked the attractive vitality of South Wind and by 1930 he had ceased writing fiction. His later works, which sustain the elegance, wit, and urbanity characteristic of his writing, include Summer Islands (1931), on Ischia and Ponza, and the autobiographies Looking Back (two volumes, 1933) and Late Harvest (1946). Among his numerous jeux d'esprit are Some Limericks (1928), originally published privately, and Venus in the Kitchen (1952), a selection of aphrodisiac recipes. Mark Holloway's Douglas: A Biography appeared in 1976.

DOVE, Rita (1952–), American poet, born in Akron, Ohio, educated at Miami University in Oxford, Ohio, the University of Tübingen in Germany, and the University of Iowa where she studied at the *Iowa Writers' Workshop. A professor of English at Arizona State University, Rita Dove won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry in 1987 for her volume Thomas and Beulah: Poems (1986), an extended sequence of poems describing the lives of her grandparents. At 34 she was one of the youngest ever recipients of the prize and only the second African-American writer to win it. Her verse is characterized by both its lyric and narrative qualities, the latter being particularly evident in Thomas and Beulah which recounts the story of a black couple's life in the industrial Midwest in the first half of the twentieth century; the volume addresses one of Dove's persistent themes, that of displacement, or what Dove herself refers to as the sense of living in 'two different worlds, seeing things with double vision'. Her single most well-known poem, arguably, is 'Parsley' which is based on a massacre perpetrated by Rafael Trujillo in the Dominican Republic in 1957. Her other volumes of verse include Ten Poems (1977), The Yellow House on the Corner (1980), Museum (1983), Grace Notes (1991), and Selected Poems (1993). Fifth Sunday: Stories appeared in 1985 and was reprinted in 1990, while Through the Ivory Gate (1992) is a novel and The Darker Face of the Earth (1994) a play in verse. Rita Dove was named US poet laureate for the year 1993–4. Two valuable interviews with Dove in which she discusses her work are to be found in Black American Literature Forum (Fall 1986) and Gargoyle (1985).

Down and Out in Paris and London, an autobiographical work by George *Orwell, published in 1933. Down and Out was Orwell's first book, and its mixture of autobiographical insight, social criticism, and descriptive bravura make it an early index of the way his œuvre was to pull in a number of directions. The reflective asides on the social position of the Paris plongeur and of the British tramp are easily detached from a vigorous narrative of events, with occasional passages of dialogue that would not be out of place in a novel. At the centre of each of the two parts of the text is an appreciation of Orwell's companionship, first with Boris the Russian waiter, and then with Paddy the Irish tramp. In some ways the book is a study of the importance of friendship during Orwell's attempt to test his own endurance of harsh conditions. The characterization of Boris is particularly enthusiastic and Orwell's absorption in it is partly what turns the Parisian narrative into an account of an adventure rather than a pretext for social analysis. The London narrative has more campaigning purpose behind it and shows its author beginning to make inquiries about social structures and power relations in a manner that was to give his later projects their peculiar Orwellian stamp.

DOYLE, Sir Arthur Conan (1859–1930), British writer of *detective and historical fiction, of Irish descent, born in Edinburgh, educated at Stonyhurst and the University of Edinburgh, where he studied medicine. After a brief and unsatisfactory medical partnership with a friend in Plymouth—The Stark-Munro Letters (1895) gives a fictionalized account of the episode—he practised in Southsea from 1882 to 1890, and later served as an army physician during the Boer War, writing a history of the campaign (The Great Boer War, 1900) and an influential pamphlet 'The War in South Africa', which was much translated. He married Louise Hawkins (d. 1906) in 1885, and Jean Leckie, who survived him, in 1907. In the novel A Study in Scarlet (1888) he introduced the private detective Sherlock Holmes and his impercipient friend Dr Watson, the narrator in most of the stories, and with whom he resides at 221B Baker Street; the other Sherlock Holmes novels are The Sign of Four (1890), The Hound of the Baskervilles (1902), and The Valley of Fear (1914). Doyle's immense popularity, however, stemmed from the Sherlock Holmes short stories, published mainly in the Strand Magazine, where the first, 'A Scandal in Bohemia', appeared in 1891. Tiring of the character, he wrote of Holmes's death in 'The Final Problem' (1893), but vehement public protest forced a resurrection in 'The Empty House' (1903). The stories are collected in The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes (1892), The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes (1894), The Return of Sherlock Holmes (1905), His Last Bow: Some Reminiscences of Sherlock Holmes (1917), and The Case-Book of Sherlock Holmes (1927). Undoubtedly the best-known and perhaps, too, the best of all fictional detectives, whose influence on later writers is demonstrated by such figures as *Freeman's Dr Thorndyke, or *Christie's Poirot, Holmes owes something to his predecessors, Poe's Dupin and Emile Gaboriau's Lecoq, while his deductive method is partly borrowed from Doyle's teacher at Edinburgh, Dr Joseph Bell. There are over a hundred Sherlock Holmes films, the best-known being those of the 1940s with Basil Rathbone as the detective, a number of plays, two written by Doyle himself, and many radio and television adaptations. Doyle, however, set greater store by his historical fiction, which combines exciting adventure with carefully researched detail. The best works are The White Company (1891) and its successor, Sir Nigel (1906), set in the fourteenth century; Rodney Stone (1896), with a Regency prize-fighting background; and the light-hearted stories of a cavalry officer in Napoleon's army, The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard (1896). Also worthy of mention is The Lost World (1912), the first of a series of stories dominated by Professor Challenger. Doyle wrote many books on public themes, including a long history of the Flanders campaign in the First World War (6 volumes, 1916–19). His one-act play Waterloo provided Sir Henry Irving in 1894 with one of his most successful parts. In 1926 he published his History of Spiritualism, one of many books he wrote on the subject, in which he was greatly interested. His efforts to right miscarriages of justice resulted in the release of George Edalji in 1906 and of Oscar Slater in 1927, both wrongfully imprisoned. He published accounts of both cases. See lives by H. Pearson (1943), J. D. Carr (1949), and J. Symons (1979); and H. Keating, Sherlock Holmes: The Man and His World (1979).

DOYLE, Mike (1928–), poet, an Irishman born in Birmingham, and educated at Victoria University College, British Columbia, the University of New Zealand, and Auckland University; he served in the Royal Navy in 1945–54. For many years he was Associate Professor of English at the University of Victoria, British Columbia (and, prior to 1970, published under his original name, Charles Doyle). His first poetry collection, A Splinter of Glass: Poems 1951–55 (1956), was published in New Zealand, where Doyle also worked with leading poets. He edited Recent Poetry in New Zealand (1965), which he intended as a 'work in progress' from younger writers rather than as an authoritative canon; to some extent the volume offered a deliberate alternative to the 1960 anthology by Allen *Curnow. Doyle's own approach to poetry is deceptively open, with his technical skills often concealed by an engagingly laconic familiarity and irreverence: 'A poet, if he can, should avoid too much literature. Like the verse of habit, it impedes observation.' Stonedancer (1976) is an impressive collection which also includes poems from previous volumes. Later works include Steady Hand (1982), The Urge to Raise Hats (1989), Separate Fidelities (1991), and Intimate Absences: Selected Poems (1993). He has also written studies of New Zealand poets R. A. K. *Mason (1970) and James K. *Baxter (1976), of William Carlos *Williams (1982), and a biography of Richard *Aldington (1989).

DOYLE, Roddy (1958–), Irish novelist and playwright, born in Dublin, educated at University College, Dublin. He became a teacher at Greendale Community School, Dublin, in 1980. Like his contemporary, Dermot *Bolger, Doyle is concerned with the people who live on the housing estates of north Dublin. However, his work differs from that of the more surreal Bolger in approaching its subject with a vibrant humour and gentleness which belie the 'honest language' and anarchic impulses of Doyle's highly memorable characters. His plays, such as Brownbread (1987) and War (1989), and his 'Barrytown' novels, The Commitments (1987) and The Snapper (1989) are, in essence, series of loud and fast conversations. His highly acclaimed novel The Van (1991), which continues the saga of the Rabbitt family begun in his first two novels, portrays the soccer madness which hit Dublin during Italia '90. All three novels were published as The Barrytown Trilogy in 1992. There are film versions of The Commitments (by Alan Parker) and The Snapper (directed by Stephen Frears). Doyle received the Booker Prize for Paddy Clarke Ha Ha Ha (1993); set in Dublin in 1968, the novel conveys the exuberance and bewilderment of its 10-year-old narrator and his estimation of his parents' floundering marriage. Doyle recreates the rhythm and langauge of childhood, together with the strange logic produced by a child's avid quest for information but partial understanding of the world. The Woman Who Walked Into Doors appeared in 1996.

DRABBLE, Margaret (1939–), British novelist, born in Sheffield, educated at The Mount School, York and Newnham College, Cambridge. She has lectured at home and abroad for the Arts Council and the British Council. Drabble's novels are traditional in form, displaying the author's allegiance to the *Realist tradition of George Eliot and Arnold *Bennett (of whom she published a biography in 1974), although latterly a note of ironic distance between the author and characters has become apparent. The early books, in which the protagonist is usually an educated and articulate young woman, often deal with the conflict between career and family life. These include A Summer Birdcage (1963), describing the sexual and intellectual rivalry between the protagonist, an Oxford graduate, and her elder sister; The Garrick Year (1965), which deals with the sexual intrigues of a group of actors in a small provincial town; The Millstone (1966), about the traumas undergone by a young academic who becomes pregnant after a casual sexual encounter; Jerusalem the Golden (1968), an early treatment of the North and South theme; and The Waterfall (1969), which describes the affair between a poet and her best friend's husband. Similar themes are explored in The Needle's Eye (1972), The Realms of Gold (1975), The Ice Age (1977), and The Middle Ground (1980). The later works are wider in scope, reflecting the writer's interest in the social upheavals of the post-war era. A trilogy (The Radiant Way, 1987; A Natural Curiosity, 1989; The Gates of Ivory, 1991) opens on New Year's Eve 1979 and follows its three main characters, Liz Headleand, Alix Bowen, and Esther Breuer, through the following ten years, touching on questions of social responsibility, the polarization of rich and poor, and the role of the educated middle class in contemporary Britain, as well as on universal themes such as the nature of genocide. Drabble's other works include a study of William Wordsworth (1966), A Writer's Britain (1979) and a biography of Angus *Wilson (1995). She also edited the fifth edition of The Oxford Companion to English Literature (1985). She married the actor Clive Swift in 1960. Her second husband is the biographer Michael *Holroyd. Her sister is the novelist A. S. *Byatt. Margaret Drabble was awarded the CBE in 1980.

Dream Songs, The, a body of 385 poems by John *Berryman, initially published as 77 Dream Songs (1964) and His Toy, His Dream, His Rest: 308 Dream Songs (1968) and collected as The Dream Songs in 1969. Each poem consists of three six-line stanzas which make variable use of rhyme and employ a wide range of rhythmic effects. The sequence relies for its continuity on the presence of 'Henry', generally regarded as a quasi-autobiographical persona; pronominally referred to as 'I', 'you', or 'he', and frequently addressed by an anonymous interlocutor as 'Mr Bones', Henry provides The Dream Songs with their shifting centre, the basis for the poems' astonishingly fluid variations in tone and levels of discourse. Harshly demotic idioms are interchangeable, sometimes within the space of single poems, with baroquely erudite or urbanely conversational modes; the accumulating dramatic commentaries on himself and his times amount to Berryman's verbal mapping of the cultural, social, and existential contexts he inhabits. The tragic seriousness of which the work is capable is generally relieved by the play of his objectifying intelligence and remarkable wit, most pronounced in the blackly humorous 'Op. posth.' sections.

DREISER, Theodore (Herman Albert) (1871–1945), American novelist, born in Terre Haute, Indiana, into an impoverished Catholic family. Despite a largely negative and irregular pattern of formal education, he became a journalist for newspapers in St Louis, Chicago, Pittsburgh, and New York. He drew frequently on the social and economic vicissitudes of his own large family for the material of his early novels, and his powers of keen observation gave his fiction a vivid sense of accuracy and detail. Impressed by Herbert Spencer's writings on evolution, and inspired by the literary works of Balzac, Tolstoy, Zola, and Hardy, his fiction arose from specific domestic situations in the context of precisely visualized social and economic circumstances. His first novel, Sister Carrie (1900), portrays the transformation of a poor working girl into a successful New York actress. Doubleday were reluctant to promote the novel because of the amoral behaviour of the heroine, and initially only 900 copies were sold. Public denunciations of the novel pushed Dreiser towards a breakdown, and he worked as an editor for magazines before completing his second novel Jennie Gerhardt* (1991), which was given a similarly disapproving reception. Over the next fifteen years, however, he was to write the bulk of the work on which his considerable reputation rests. The Financier (1912) and The Titan (1914) were the first two volumes of a trilogy ultimately completed by the posthumous publication of The Stoic (1947). In these novels the unscrupulous tycoon Frank Cowperwood is subjected to a minute analysis deriving from Dreiser's fascination with extreme wealth and the vested interests which control it. *An American Tragedy (1925) shows the other pole within his work, namely his concern for the condition of the deprived. The Genius (1915) is the novel in which he works most closely with autobiographical material, and examines the problematic relationship between aesthetics and finance in modern society. The complex and sometimes contradictory philosophical thought in Dreiser's fiction has often been subsumed under the title of naturalism, but while he certainly believed in the power of society to shape individuals, he also believed in the capacities of individuals to shape the world in which they lived. The tension between abstract philosophizing and concrete, detailed description sometimes produces an ungainly prose style, as many critics have pointed out. Despite this, F. O. *Matthiessen's Theodore Dreiser (1951) makes a vigorous defence of his power as a writer, and Alfred *Kazin is also a strong advocate for his work. He also wrote many volumes of social criticism, including Dreiser Looks at Russia (1928) and Tragic America (1931); plays including Plays of the Natural and the Supernatural (1916) and the tragedy The Hand of the Potter (1918); poetry including Moods, Cadenced and Declaimed (1926); two volumes of memoirs, A Book about Myself (1922) and Dawn: A History of Myself (1931); volumes of essays, including Hey Rub-a-Dub-Dub (1920); and collections of short stories, including A Gallery of Women (1929). At the end of his life, the contradictions in Dreiser's thought were indicated by his joining of the Communist Party and the completion of his novel of religious faith lost and found, The Bulwark (published posthumously in 1946). A three-volume selection of The Letters of Theodore Dreiser was published in 1959.

DREWE, Robert (1943–), Australian writer, born in Melbourne. He travelled in China, India, the Philippines, the Pacific, and Japan as a journalist; he also worked as literary editor for the Australian and has written for the Age and the Bulletin*. His first novel, The Savage Crows (1976), tells the story of Stephen, a young journalist researching into the life of the nineteenth-century Protector of Aborigines in Tasmania, George Augustus Robinson. Stephen's contemporary decline is alternated with passages from Robinson's diary: the novel's juxtaposing of its two different stories, told in two different styles, contrasts white disintegration with Aboriginal strength. In A Cry in the Jungle Bar (1979) Drewe explores Australian–Asian relations, placing an Australian water buffalo expert, a man of huge physique, in the middle of Asia, where he finds himself at a loss with the complexities of the culture and the politics. The Bodysurfers (1983) is a series of interlinked stories about three generations of one family. In these stories, which offer a kind of celebration of Australian hedonism, Drewe was one of the first to identify the dominant Australian cultural experience, which is drawn not from the bush, but from the beach. Fortune (1986), set partly in America, draws on the author's experience as a private eye in San Francisco and includes passages of journalistic 'faction'. A second collection of stories, The Bay of Contented Men, appeared in 1989. The novel Our Sunshine (1991) is a fictional portrait of Ned Kelly. Drewe is the editor of an anthology of stories, The Picador Book of the Beach (1994).

DRINKWATER, John (1882–1937), British poet and playwright, born in Leytonstone, Essex; he grew up in north Oxfordshire, whence the predominantly rural imagery of much of his poetry derives, and was educated at Oxford High School. He began writing poetry while working as a clerk in insurance offices in Nottingham and Birmingham, and became manager of the Birmingham Repertory Company upon its formation in 1913. He directed and acted in many productions and wrote a number of short verse-plays, among which are Copethua (1911) and X = 0: A Night of the Trojan War (1917), an allegorically effective statement against the Great War. His principal achievements as a playwright were his historical prose dramas: Abraham Lincoln (1918), Oliver Cromwell (1921), Mary Stuart (1922), and Robert E. Lee (1923). Bird in the Hand (1927) was a successful comedy in which Laurence Olivier and Peggy Ashcroft were given their first major roles. His Collected Plays appeared in two volumes in 1925. Drinkwater published over twenty books of poetry including The Death of Leander and Other Poems (1906), Poems of Love and Earth (1912), Swords and Ploughshares (1915), From an Unknown Isle (1924), and Collected Poems (3 volumes, 1923). His repute as a poet has declined with that of the *Georgian movement, whose mediocre rural sentimentalism is perhaps typified by much of his verse. Certain of his poems are, however, highly memorable, like 'Birthright' ('Lord Rameses of Egypt sighed | Because a summer evening passed . . .') and 'Moonlit Apples', and have secured him a place in the modern literary tradition. He wrote numerous critical biographies, including William Morris (1912), The Pilgrim of Eternity: Byron (1925), and Pepys: His Life and Character (1930); and two volumes of autobiography, Inheritance (1931) and Discovery (1932).

Drum, a South African magazine which began publication as The African Drum primarily for a white readership. Jim Bailey took over the journal in 1951. Under the editorship of Anthony *Sampson, and subsequently of Sylvester Stein (1956–7) and Tom Hopkinson (1958–61), Drum became almost legendary for its portrayal, addressed mainly to a black readership, of township life in and around Johannesburg, particularly Sophiatown. The journalists, much influenced by African-American writers like Langston *Hughes and Richard *Wright, were all black South Africans; Lewis *Nkosi, Es'kia *Mphahlele, and Bloke Modisane began their writing careers as journalists for Drum. The journal exposed injustices related to apartheid, and published fiction by Peter *Abrahams, Richard *Rive, and others. The magazine's photojournalism became world famous. Interviews with many of the contributors have been published in A Good-looking Corpse (1991) by Mike Nicol. Banned from 1965 to 1968, Drum never recovered its vigour, and was taken over by an Afrikaner publisher. See Anthony Sampson, Drum: An African Adventure—and Afterwards (1983).

DUBERMAN, Martin (1930–), American playwright and historian, born in New York City, educated at Yale. He began his career as an actor and playwright; many of his plays were Off-Broadway productions, such as In White America (1963). His other dramatic works include Male Armor: Selected Plays 1968–1974 (1975), Visions of Kerouac (1977), and Mother Earth: An Epic Play on the Life of Emma Goldman (1991). Much of his early scholarly work, notably Charles Francis Adams, 1807–1886 (1960) and The Antislavery Vanguard: New Essays on the Abolitionists (1965), reconsiders the history of the abolitionist movement in America. Black Mountain: An Exploration in Community (1972) is a seminal work on the development of postmodern American culture. More recently he has become known for his work in gay historiography. About Time: Exploring the Gay Past (1986) and Hidden From History: Reclaiming the Gay and Lesbian Past (1989; co-edited with Martha Vicinius and George Chauncey, Jr) are collections of documents presenting the history of homosexuals and homosexuality in America; Cures: A Gay Man's Odyssey (1991) and Midlife Queer (1996) are autobiographical works; and Stonewall (1993) is an oral history of the liberation movement. Duberman has taught at Princeton, Yale, and the City University of New York, among other universities, and became Executive Director for the Center for Lesbian and Gay Studies.

Dublin Magazine, The, a literary periodical begun in 1923 by James Starkey, who was known as editor and contributor under his pseudonym 'Seamus O'Sullivan'. It was conceived of as providing a point of cultural detachment from the upheavals which accompanied the emergence of the Irish Free State, and Starkey maintained his policy of political non-alignment throughout his thirty-five years as editor. The first issue of the magazine established its international tone: work by Gérard de Nerval and John *Masefield appeared alongside contributions from Irish authors, who included Padraic *Colum and James *Stephens; it continued to take an active interest in literature from various European countries, notably Italy and Portugal. In addition to its literary content, which took the form of poetry, fiction, critical articles, and the occasional publication of entire verse-dramas, the Dublin Magazine gave attention to developments in science and the graphic and plastic arts: Jack B. *Yeats and Augustus John were among the artists who supplied illustrations. The poets closely associated with the journal included Austin *Clarke, Patrick *Kavanagh, F. R. *Higgins, and Padraic *Fallon; verse by R. S. *Thomas and other Welsh poets was featured regularly during the 1940s. Arguably the best and certainly the longest-running Irish periodical of the twentieth century, the Dublin Magazine was discontinued after its editor's death in 1958.

Dubliners, a volume of fifteen short stories by James *Joyce. Begun in 1904, it was repeatedly rejected for publication, successively destroyed and then burnt by censorious printers, added to by its author, championed by George *Russell (AE), *Yeats, and *Pound, and finally published with reluctance by Grant Richards in 1914. Naturalistic in style and easily accessible by Joyce's standards, Dubliners represents his earliest efforts 'to betray the soul of that hemiplegia or paralysis which many consider a city'. After a century without its own parliament, Dublin had become a provincial backwater of the Union and the Empire, peopled by frustrated adolescents ('Araby'), jaded adults ('Clay'), and hack politicians ('Ivy Day in the Committee Room'). Written with a 'scrupulous meanness', these sparse, often beautiful, and occasionally humorous portraits of everyday life are connected by themes of entrapment, escape, and compromise, themes which culminate in the final story, 'The Dead', widely regarded as a masterpiece of its genre.

DU BOIS, W(illiam) E(dward) B(urghardt) (1868–1963), African-American historian, born in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, educated at Fisk University and Harvard. He began his academic career at Wilberforce University in 1894 and was subsequently a professor at Atlanta University. The Suppression of the African Slave Trade (1896), Black Reconstruction (1935), on the achievements of African-Americans in the aftermath of the Civil War, and The World and Africa (1947), an indictment of colonial exploitation, are among the most notable of his many works as a historian, which partake of the reforming zeal he applied to his endeavours as an activist against racial inequality. The essays of The Souls of Black Folk (1903) were enormously influential in stating the case for the extension of higher educational opportunities to blacks. A founder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1909, he later disclaimed the organization as excessively conservative. From 1910 to 1936 he edited the magazine The Crisis, becoming a notable figure of the *Harlem Renaissance; from the 1930s onwards he adopted increasingly extreme positions. In 1960 he emigrated to Ghana, where he directed the planning of an Encyclopaedia Africana. His other works include the essays and reminiscences of Darkwater (1920) and the trilogy of novels collected as The Black Flame (1976), a dramatic treatment of conditions in the American South. The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois appeared in 1968. The fullest of numerous biographical studies is W. E. B. Du Bois: Radical Black Democrat (1986) by Manning Marable.

Dub Poetry, a phrase coined by Black British poet Linton Kwesi *Johnson to denote poems written to be performed with musical accompaniment. Dub Poetry is invariably more readily available on records than in books, a situation which evolved through the collaboration between poets and West Indian, or Black British, disc jockeys. Populist in appeal, Dub Poetry is often political, and performed in Creole, or what Edward Kamau *Brathwaite has called Nation Language, in his important work History of the Voice (1984). Brathwaite argues that Nation Language stems from the oral tradition (chiefly African) and, when employed for poetry, displays musical rhythms, such as calypso and reggae, unlike the dominant iambic rhythms in much English poetry. Poems by dub poets such as Linton Kwesi Johnson and Benjamin *Zephaniah reflect, as James *Berry has observed, 'a collective psyche laden with anguish and rage'. Michael *Smith, a Jamaican Rastafarian, was the foremost dub poet in the West Indies, and the radicalism of his poetry, in both its 'subversive' political message and Nation Language style, was all too tragically confirmed, perhaps, when he was stoned to death during the Jamaican general election campaign of 1983. DUCKWORTH, Marilyn (1935–), New Zealand novelist, sister of the poet Fleur *Adcock, born in Auckland, educated in England and Wellington, including part-time attendance at Wellington University. Her first novel, A Gap in the Spectrum (1959), a *science-fiction exploration of a woman's dependency, was published when she was 23 and established the fictional terrain of her early work: the constricting roles ascribed to women are seen to notable effect in Over the Fence Is Out (1969). Widowed once, and married four times, her career was punctuated by a long silence while she brought up her children. Her acclaimed novel Disorderly Conduct (1984), set during the 1981 Springbok tour protests, features a women with four children by three different fathers. Her other novels include The Matchbox House (1960), A Barbarous Tongue (1963), Married Alive (1985), Rest for the Wicked (1986), Pulling Faces (1987), A Message from Harpo (1989), and Unlawful Entry (1992). She has also published Other Lovers' Children: Poems 1958–74 (1975) and Explosions in the Sun (1989), a volume of short stories. She was awarded the OBE in 1987.

DUDEK, Louis (1918–), Canadian poet, born in Montreal, Quebec, educated at McGill and Columbia Universities. In 1951 he began teaching at McGill University, where he became Professor of English in 1969. Throughout his career at McGill he initiated various publishing ventures, which include the McGill Poetry series (1956–66) and the Delta Canada Press (1967–). East of the City (1946) was his first collection of verse. The influence of Ezra *Pound and *Imagism becomes clear in The Searching Image (1952), which establishes exploratory free-verse forms and concentrated visual imagery as essential characteristics of his work. Europe (1954) was the first of his long sequences based on ideas of journeying, which also include En Mexico (1958) and Atlantis (1967); these ambitious poems form richly varied expositions of historical, cultural, and philosophical themes. His later collections include Continuation 1 (1981) and Zembla's Rocks (1986); Cross-Section (1980) is a collected edition of his verse since 1940. Dudek's endeavours as a writer and publisher to establish an indigenous *modernist mode make him a figure of considerable importance in post-war Canadian literature. His critical writings include The First Person in Literature (1967) and Technology and Culture (1979). DK—Some Letters of Ezra Pound (1974) is an edition of the correspondence with Pound he began in the late 1940s.

DUFFY, Carol Ann (1955–), British poet, born in Glasgow; she grew up in Staffordshire, and studied philosophy at the University of Liverpool, a city reflected in a number of her poems. Two of her plays, Take My Husband and Cavern of Dreams, were produced at the Liverpool Playhouse in 1982 and 1984 respectively. She became poetry editor for Ambit magazine in 1983 and has worked as a writer-in-residence at various schools and colleges. Standing Female Nude (1985) was her first substantial collection of poetry. Thrown Voices followed in 1986, its title indicative of her ability in dramatic monologue forms; these are a principal feature of the collection Selling Manhattan, which won her considerable acclaim on its appearance in 1987, its numerous poems in the voices of dispossessed personae framing a penetrating critique of contemporary society. In both dramatic monologue modes and more directly personal idioms, Duffy's verse unites sensitive individuality of tone with starkly unsentimental objectivity. The Other Country (1990) and Mean Time (1993) display a broadening of technical and imaginative range; Selected Poems appeared in 1994.

DUFFY, Maureen (Patricia) (1933–), British novelist, poet, and playwright, born in Worthing, Sussex, educated at King's College, London. She worked as a schoolteacher and in adult education between 1951 and 1960, when she became a freelance writer. That's How It Was (1960), her substantially autobiographical first novel, was acclaimed for its portrayal of the relationship between an illegitimate child and her impoverished mother. Her reputation as an idiosyncratic prose stylist capable of bizarre amalgams of realism and fantasy is evident in the much-praised Gor Saga (1981), which is set in the future and deals with the consequences of an experiment in genetic engineering in which a scientist succeeds in producing a creature which is half-human, half-ape. Other novels include The Microcosm (1966) and The Paradox Players (1967), I Want to Go to Moscow (1973), Housespy (1978), Londoners (1983), and Illuminations (1991). A well-paced thriller, Occam's Razor (1993), the fourth of her novels to be set in London, was praised by Shena *Mackay, who confirmed Duffy as 'an imaginative poet of the city and someone who is committed to the cause of both human and animal rights'. Her poetry, written largely in carefully cadenced free verse with occasional ironic use of traditional rhyming forms, has in common with her prose its imaginative scope and disquieting emotional power; mythological, personal, and socio-political elements recur in her collections, among which are Lyrics for the Dog Hour (1968), Evesong (1975), Memorials for the Quick and the Dead (1979), and Collected Poems, 1949–1984 (1985). A trilogy of plays, Rites (1969), Solo (1970), and Old Tyme (1970), is based on classical mythology; her dramatic works also include A Nightingale in Bloomsbury (1974), in which Virginia *Woolf considers her achievement prior to her suicide. Duffy's other publications include The Erotic World Of Faery (1972), a study of the supernatural in folklore and literature; The Passionate Shepherdess (1977), a biography of Aphra Behn, whose Five Plays (1990) she edited; Men And Beasts: An Animal Rights Handbook (1984); and a biography of Henry Purcell (1994) together with a play about the composer (1995). Duffy has played an active role in professional bodies such as the Writers' Guild of Great Britain and the British Copyright Council; she was one of the founder members, with Brigid *Brophy, Lettice *Cooper, and Francis *King, of the Writers' Action Group, vigorously campaigning for Public Lending Rights from 1972 to 1982; she chaired the Author's Lending and Copyright Society; and was appointed Vice-President of the European Writers' Congress.

DUGGAN, Alfred (Leo) (1903–64), British historical novelist, born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, educated at Balliol College, Oxford. Duggan wrote his first novel, Knight With Armour (1950), at the age of 47. Later, his keen interest in Crusader castles led him to write historical novels. Evelyn *Waugh praised his understanding of the Roman Empire and feudal Europe, and greatly admired his novel Conscience of the King (1951), which illuminates the role of Christianity in the early medieval world. Among his other novels are The Lady for Ransom (1953), about Roger the Norman and his exploits in the service of the Byzantine Empire; Leopards and Lilies (1954), which is entertaining in its depiction of chivalry; The Cunning of the Dove (1960), about Edward the Confessor's shrewd political manœuvres; Family Favourites (1961), which focuses on the notorious emperor Elagabalus; and Count Bohemond (1964), Duggan's last word on the First Crusade.

DUGGAN, Eileen (1900–72), New Zealand poet, born near Invercargill, educated at Victoria University College. Her verse collections, Poems (1924), A Pioneer (1929), Poems (1937), New Zealand Poems (1940), and More Poems (1951) show her talent for combining the demotic (and local detail) with the charm and regularity of rhymed verse form. Her themes are particularly of the privations and tragedies of ordinary lives. Duggan received a fellowship of the Royal Society of Literature in 1943 and her writing was published and widely read in the USA. In the 1950s, however, her reputation in New Zealand was somewhat eclipsed by the more modernist tendencies of the Caxton School and she was marginalized for what Allen *Curnow described as her 'Georgian decorum'. Duggan's work appears in most of the major anthologies.

DUGGAN, Maurice (1922–74), New Zealand short-story writer, born in Auckland, and educated at Auckland University. His first collection, Immanuel's Land (1956), contained work mostly written in Europe during 1949–53 and included the extended piece 'The Voyage'. Summer in the Gravel Pit (1965) contained the fine story 'Along the Rideout Road that Summer'. At his best Duggan showed mastery of a complex format of interrelated stories reflecting the fragility of human relationships, his focus usually being on finely sketched scenes of family life or memories of school-days and youth. He further extended his fictional range in O'Leary's Orchard and Other Stories (1970), three longer stories all reworked from earlier works published in Landfall*. In 1966 Duggan described the challenge of writing as being the need to find a subject which was 'less a story than a prose celebration of a topography and a time that, in rediscovery and re-creation moved me strongly enough to force me away from what had become a habit of rhetoric'; he creates a flexible and sophisticated fictional form which conveys an unsettling vision of life at the same time as it precludes a straightforward narrative reading. C. K. *Stead edited his Collected Stories (1981), which included 'The Magsman Miscellany', and contributed a valuable Introduction.

DU MAURIER, Dame Daphne (Lady Browning) (1907–89), British novelist, born in London, educated in Paris, the granddaughter of George du Maurier, and daughter of Gerald du Maurier, the actor. Her first novel, The Loving Spirit (1931), began her successful career as a writer of popular novels and period romances. Many of them were set in Cornwall, including the best-selling Jamaica Inn (1936), a story of wreckers, and Rebecca (1938), her most popular novel. Other novels include Frenchman's Creek (1941), Hungry Hill (1943), The King's General (1946), and My Cousin Rachel (1951). She wrote several biographies including one of her father, Gerald: A Portrait (1934), as well as The du Mauriers (1937), Mary Anne (1954), The Infernal World of Branwell Brontë (1960), and Golden Lads: A Study of Anthony Bacon, Francis and their Friends (1975). Her writing often showed a strong sense of the macabre. Many of her novels were filmed, as were her two short stories, 'Don't Look Back' and 'The Birds'. See also ROMANTIC FICTION.

DUMMETT, Michael (Anthony Eardley) (1925–), British philosopher, born in London, educated at Winchester and at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1950 he was elected a fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, and was a senior research fellow from 1974 to 1979, when he was appointed Wykeham Professor of Logic at Oxford. He has also held numerous visiting posts in the USA and elsewhere. His early publications include Frege and the Philosophy of Language (1973), which established him as a leading interpreter of Frege's philosophy. Frege's methods form the basis for Dummett's analytical procedures in constructing a theory of linguistic meaning, which he believes must be a prerequisite for valid philosophical discourse. Among his further studies of Frege's work are The Interpretation of Frege's Philosophy (1981), Frege: Philosophy of Mathematics (1991), and the hitherto uncollected essays of Frege and Other Philosophers (1991). Dummett's writings on Frege are substantially vehicles for his own work in logic and the philosophy of mathematics, which has provoked controversy for its uncompromisingly technical character. He has stated that 'Philosophy must be either anecdotal or systematic; if one rejects the anecdotal as trivial, one will have to put up with the laboriousness of the systematic'. His other works include Truth and Other Enigmas (1978) and The Logical Basis of Metaphysics (1991); the historical treatise The Game of Tarot (1980) and the instructional Twelve Tarot Games (1980) regard the cards as exclusively recreational in function, dismissing the 'irrational' practices of occultists.

DUNBAR, Paul Laurence (1872–1906), African-American novelist, playwright, and poet, born in Dayton, Ohio, educated at Dayton High School. Dunbar was one of the most important black American writers of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, in part because of his singular contributions to dialect verse. He began writing poetry whilst working as a lift operator in an office building in Dayton and his first volume of verse, Oak and Ivy, was privately published in 1893. His poetry came to the attention of William Dean *Howells whose defence of dialect poetry in his review of Dunbar's second volume, Majors and Minors (1895), transformed him from an obscure poet into a nationally known figure. Howells spoke of a 'direct and fresh authority' in the verse and it was this, coupled with Dunbar's ear for the rhythms and inflections of black speech, that gave the poetry such realism and sympathy. Among other volumes of verse published in his lifetime are Lyrics of Lowly Life (1896), Lyrics of the Hearthside (1899), Poems of Cabin and Field (1899), Lyrics of Love and Laughter (1903), Li'l' Gal (1904), Lyrics of Sunshine and Shadow (1905), and Joggin' Erlong (1906); the Complete Poems were published in 1913. Dunbar was prolific though less celebrated for his novels and plays; his play Dream Lovers (1898) was set to music by Samuel Coleridge Taylor. His novels include The Uncalled (1898) and The Love of Landry (1900), while Folks from Dixie (1898), The Strength of Gideon and Other Stories (1900), In Old Plantation Days (1903), and The Heart of Happy Hollow (1904) are collections of short stories. The Dunbar Reader (1975) was edited by Jay Martin and Gossie H. Hudson. Dunbar was an immensely successful reader of his own work in the USA, and he visited England in 1897. He served as an assistant in the Library of Congress between 1897 and 1898. See A Singer in the Dawn: Reinterpretations of Dunbar (1975), edited by Jay Martin.

DUNBAR-NELSON, Alice (1875–1935), African-American writer, born in New Orleans, educated at Straight University (now Dillard University). Dunbar-Nelson pursued many different careers in addition to her writing. She served as the secretary of the National Association of Colored Women; as an English teacher and the head of the English Department at Howard High School; she co-founded the Delaware Industrial School for Colored Girls; and was elected to membership of the Delaware Republican State Committee in 1920. Her first published work, Violets and Other Tales (1895), a volume of short stories and poetry, was followed by The Goodness of St Rocque (1898), a collection of stories. Dunbar-Nelson's early works, which often focused on Creole characters, evoked the language and settings of life in New Orleans. Some of her later stories, including 'The Stones of Village', explore darker, more troubling issues such as race relations and oppression. Much of Dunbar-Nelson's later work remained unpublished until the appearance of The Works of Alice Dunbar-Nelson (3 volumes, 1988; edited by Gloria T. Hull). Dunbar-Nelson was briefly married to Paul Lawrence *Dunbar.

DUNCAN, Robert (Edward) (1919–88), American poet, born in Oakland, California, educated at the University of California, Berkeley. As an editor of the Experimental Review in 1940 and 1941 he published work by Henry *Miller, Anaïs *Nin, Lawrence *Durrell, Kenneth *Patchen, and others. Heavenly City, Earthly City (1947), his first collection of verse, reflected his admiration for the work of George *Barker, whose mystical and rhetorical qualities are consonant with the tenor of much of Duncan's poetry. Contact with the poets associated with *Black Mountain College, where Duncan taught in 1956, led to the intensification of his interest in innovative forms that becomes apparent in Caesar's Gate: Poems 1949–1955 (1956). Much of his later writing is remarkable for retaining a strong allegiance to European lyric and visionary traditions while adopting the *Projective Verse modes proposed by Charles *Olson, after whose death in 1970 Duncan became the leading practitioner of 'open field' composition. From the mid-1950s onward he was one of the principal figures in the *San Francisco Renaissance and was conspicuous among poets opposed to the Vietnam War during the 1960s (see VIETNAM WRITING); Bending the Bow (1968) contains 'Up Rising', one of the period's most notable poems of protest. The collection also begins the extended series of 'Passages', typographically dispersed poems offering highly flexible patterns of signification, which formed the main body of his subsequent work. Notable among his other volumes are The Opening of the Field (1960), Roots and Branches (1964), and the two volumes of Ground Work (1984, 1987). Fictive Certainties (1979) is a collection of essays having in common Duncan's idiosyncratically autobiographical approach to critical commentary.

DUNCAN, Ronald (1914–82), British poet and dramatist, born in Salisbury, Rhodesia, educated at Cambridge University. He gained wide recognition for the verse-drama This Way to the Tomb (1946), a 'masque and anti-masque' with music by Benjamin Britten, for whose opera The Rape of Lucretia (1946) he supplied a libretto; Collected Plays appeared in 1971. He was among the founders of the *English Stage Company in 1956. As a poet he displayed a high level of conventional accomplishment in modes ranging from humorous verse to philosophically ambitious meditations. Collections of his work include The Mongrel (1950) and For the Fear (1977); Collected Poems was published in 1981. He produced three volumes of provocative and entertaining autobiography, All Men Are Islands (1964), How To Make Enemies (1968), and Obsessed (1977).

DUNMORE, Helen (1952–), British poet and novelist, born in Beverley, Yorkshire, educated at York University. Her first volume of poems, The Apple Fall (1983), was praised for its rhythmical assurance which is a characteristic of her verse. The Sea Skater (1986) fuses personal and familial experience with more general socio-cultural themes, which are conveyed by precise and fluent successions of images. Further volumes include The Raw Garden (1988), Short Days, Long Nights: New and Selected Poems (1991), Recovering a Body (1994), and Secrets (1994). Dunmore also turned to writing fiction with Zennor in Darkness (1993), a novel in which the First World War is viewed through the eyes of two couples, one real (Frieda and D. H. *Lawrence), the other fictional. Her second novel, Burning Bright (1994), is an inventively constructed account of a young girl's gradual absorption into petty crime, and her relationship with her thuggish lover and the old lesbian neighbour who recounts her past in long monologues. A Spell in Winter (1995) is narrated in the first person by a girl drawn by loneliness into an incestuous love affair with her brother.

DUNN, Douglas (Eaglesham) (1942–), Scottish poet, born in Inchinnan, Renfrewshire, educated at the Scottish School of Librarianship in Glasgow and the University of Hull; he subsequently worked in the University's Brynmor Jones Library as an assistant librarian under Philip *Larkin, with whom he became well acquainted. He was a freelance writer from 1971 to 1991, when he was appointed to a professorship at the University of St Andrews. Terry Street (1969), his first collection of verse, contained acutely observed evocations of working-class life together with imaginative treatments of cultural and personal preoccupations which anticipated the thematic scope of The Happier Life (1972) and Love or Nothing (1974). The political concerns informing his earlier work become explicit in Barbarians (1979), which uses verse of great accomplishment to present parables of the deprivation inherent in the hierarchical structure of society. St Kilda's Parliament (1981) indicates a broadening of the imaginative compass of his writing in such pieces as the 'poem-films' 'Valerio' and 'La Route', and also contains notable examples of his highly developed abilities as a lyrical and discursive poet. He left Hull and returned to Scotland after the death in 1981 of his wife Lesley, whom he commemorates in Elegies (1985; Whitbread Book of the Year Award), which was acclaimed as the finest poetic embodiment of grief since Tennyson's In Memoriam. Selected Poems: 1964–1983 appeared in 1986. Northlight (1988) combines an unusual range in treatments of local, political, historical, and aesthetic concerns with a striking degree of technical virtuosity. Further collections include Dante's Drum-Kit (1993). Among his other works are Secret Villages (1985) and Boyfriends and Girlfriends (1994), collections of short stories; and his verse translation of Racine's Andromache (1990). He has also edited numerous books, including Two Decades of Irish Writing (1975), A Rumoured City: New Poets from Hull (1982), and The Faber Book of Twentieth-Century Scottish Poetry (1992).

DUNN, Nell (Mary) (1936–), British novelist and dramatist, born in London, and educated at a convent school. Her collection of realistic interlinked short stories, Up the Junction (1963), and her novel, Poor Cow (1967), were considered sensational at the time. Both are about the constrained lives of independent-minded working-class women in London. The novel focuses on Joy, and her relationship with her husband, a professional thief, her lover (both of whom successively end up in prison), and her little son. Dunn co-authored the film version with director Ken Loach. Her other novels explore further aspects of women's lives, and include The Incurable (1971), I Want (1972; with Adrian *Henri), Tear His Head off His Shoulders (1974), and The Only Child (1978). Her play Steaming (1981), set in a council bath threatened with closure, also caused a sensation; the protagonists were all women, both working-class and middle-class, frequently (but quite naturally) in various states of undress. The play was acclaimed as an authentic slice of life, and an effective political protest. Another play, The Little Heroine (1988), portrays a heroin addict who successfully kicks the habit. Grandmothers Talking to Nell Dunn (1991) is a collection of interviews.

DUNNE, J(ohn) W(illiam) (1875–1949), British inventor and philosopher, educated privately; he served in the Anglo-Boer War (1899–1902). Dunne designed and built the first British military aeroplane (1906–7), but is best known for An Experiment with Time (1927), a book of scientific speculation. It challenged both Einstein on the nature of time, and Freud on the nature of dreams. Offering much practical advice about recording dreams, he considered them as precognitive clues to future events, and also as crucial in understanding time. His theory of 'serial time' was dramatized by one of his most enthusiastic supporters, J. B. *Priestley, in Time and the Conways (1937), and other plays. Dunne further elaborated his theories in The Serial Universe (1934), The New Immortality (1938), and Nothing Dies (1940). In Man and Time (1964), Priestley devoted an entire chapter to Dunne's controversial theories.

DUNNETT, Dorothy (1923–), Scottish portrait painter turned historical novelist, born in Dunfermline. With Game of Kings (1961) she began a series of six novels which, as the 'Lymond Chronicles', described the adventures of Francis Crawford, a sixteenth-century Scottish adventurer. This series gave her ample opportunity to display her gift for subtle narrative backed by meticulous research. King Hereafter (1982) was an ambitious attempt to identify the historical Macbeth. Niccolo Rising (1986) began another series, 'The House of Niccolo', set in the banking world of the fifteenth century and reaching from Bruges to Cyprus and Trebizond; it was followed by The Spring of the Ram (1987) and Race of Scorpions (1989). As Dorothy Halliday, she has written a series of contemporary comedy thrillers, featuring Johnson and his yacht, 'The Dolly', beginning with Dolly and the Singing Bird (1968).

DUNSANY, Lord (Edward John Moreton Drax Plunkett, 18th Baron) (1878–1957), Irish dramatist and short-story writer, of Anglo-Irish parentage, born in London, educated at Eton and Sandhurst. He was a friend of *Yeats, *Gogarty, and Lady *Gregory and others associated with the *Irish Revival. His first play, The Glittering Gate (performed 1909), was published in Five Plays (1914) together with other fantasies showing the influence of Maurice Maeterlinck; other plays appeared in Plays of Gods and Men (1917), Plays of Near and Far (1922), and Seven Modern Comedies (1928). His most successful play was If (1921), a dramatized Oriental tale. Many of his collections of mythological tales were illustrated with strange fin de siècle drawings by S. H. Sime, including The Gods of Pegana (1905), Time and the Gods (1906), and Tales of Wonder (1916). Set in a universe with its own mythology, these stories influenced popular American writers of fantasy such as H. P. *Lovecraft and F. *Leiber. His more realistic stories featuring Mr Jorkens and his remarkable adventures began with The Travel Tales of Mr Joseph Jorkens (1931) and continued in other volumes. He also wrote essays, verse, autobiographical works, and several novels including The King of Elfland's Daughter (1922), The Blessing of Pan (1927), and The Last Revolution (1951), a *science fiction work.

DURCAN, Paul (1944–), Irish poet, born in Dublin, educated at University College, Cork. His numerous collections of poetry have included Teresa's Bar (1976), Jesus, Break His Fall (1982), Jumping the Train Tracks with Angela (1983), The Berlin Wall Café (1985), Going Home to Russia (1987), Jesus and Angela (1988), and Daddy, Daddy (1990). The lavishly produced In the Land of Punt (1988) is a collaboration between Durcan and the noted Irish artist Gene Lambers. Durcan's poetry is highly idiosyncratic in its combination of 'an open Romanticism rare in contemporary poetry' (Edna Longley, introduction to The Selected Paul Durcan, 1982) with trenchantly satirical social commentaries, often employing bizarrely surreal narrative strategies. The accessibility and humour of his work, together with his striking vocal delivery, have made his readings widely popular. Crazy About Women (1991) and Give Me Your Hand (1994) are collections displaying Durcan's poetic responses to paintings in National Galleries of Ireland and Britain; new and selected poems appeared in A Snail in My Prime (1993).

DURRELL, Gerald (Malcolm) (1925–95), English writer and zoologist, born in Jamshedpur, India, the brother of Lawrence *Durrell. In 1928 his family returned to England, and from 1933 they lived mainly in Europe. Durrell's experiences on Corfu formed the basis for his comic autobiography, My Family and Other Animals (1956). His many zoological expeditions took him to the Cameroons, British Guiana, Sierra Leone, Paraguay, and Argentina, all of which he described in his numerous books. These include The Drunken Forest (1956), The Overloaded Ark (1957), A Zoo in My Luggage (1960), Island Zoo (1961), Encounters with Animals (1963), Three Singles to Adventure (1964), Birds, Beasts and Relatives (1969), Catch Me A Colobus (1972), Beasts in the Belfry (1973), and others. In 1959 he founded the Jersey Zoological Park, about which he wrote in The Ark's Anniversary (1990). In The Aye-Aye and I (1992) he recounted his experiences in Madagascar to save a rare mammal.

DURRELL, Lawrence (George) (1912–90), British novelist, poet, and travel writer, born in Julundur, India, educated at St Edmund's School. From 1934 onward he spent most of his life in Mediterranean locations, working as a journalist, for the British Foreign Service, and for the British Council between 1940 and 1957, when he achieved financial independence as a writer. His early novels, which include Pied Piper of Lovers (1935) and Cefalû (1947), attracted little attention; T. S. *Eliot thought highly of his experimental 'agon' The Black Book (Paris, 1938; London, 1973), which displays the influence of Durrell's close friend Henry *Miller: The Durrell-Miller Letters 1935–1980, edited by I. S. MacNiven, appeared in 1988. His international reputation was established with Justine (1957), the first part of The Alexandria Quartet, which was completed with Balthazar (1958), Mountolive (1958), and Clea (1960). The first three books of the work, which Durrell termed 'a four-dimensional dance, a relativity poem', reflect his interpretations of the theories of Einstein and Freud in using radically different narrative perspectives on a single set of events and personalities; Clea adopts a conventional chronological progression beyond the complex interactions of erotic, artistic, and political motifs in the earlier parts. Published in a single edition in 1962, The Alexandria Quartet, which has been both praised and condemned for the poetic opulence of its prose, anticipates the metaphysical critique of modern civilization central to its successors: The Revolt of Aphrodite (1974), consisting of Tunc (1968) and Nunquam (1970), concerns the resistance of individuals to the power of a multinational corporation; Monsieur (1974), Livia (1978), Constance (1982), Sebastian (1984), and Quinx (1985) are the five parts of The Avignon Quintet, a work whose extraordinarily mobile narrative extends from the suppression of the Knights Templars in the fourteenth century to the Nazi occupation of France. Durrell gained notice as a poet with A Private Country (1943). The Tree of Idleness (1955) and The Ikons (1966) are among his many subsequent collections; vivid and wittily imaginative treatments of people and places predominate in his poetry, which is fluently accomplished and has been preferred to his prose by numerous commentators. Collected Poems 1931–1974 appeared in 1980. His travel books include Prospero's Cell (1945), on Corfu; Reflections of a Marine Venus (1953), dealing with Rhodes; Bitter Lemons (1957), a treatment of Cyprus during the conflicts of the 1950s; and Caesar's Vast Ghost (1990), a historically digressive work on Provence. A prolific and wide-ranging author, he also produced verse-dramas, literary criticism, and translations; Antrobus Complete (1985) collects the humorous stories he based on his experiences with the diplomatic corps.

Dutchman, a play by Amiri *Baraka (then known as LeRoi Jones), first performed in 1964 off-Broadway to immediate acclaim. Divided into two scenes, the play's setting is a New York subway carriage, 'In the flying underbelly of the city. Steaming hot, and summer on top, outside. Underground. The subway heaped in modern myth.' Clay, a respectable young black passenger, becomes a victim of a lynching. Lula, his white seductress, is a perverse allusion to Eve, as she gets on the train 'eating an apple, very daintily'. The action is based almost exclusively on the exchanges between these two, as Lula goads and baits Clay into his final outburst of anger in an affirmation of black history and culture, before the play moves towards its violent climax as Lula stabs him and dumps the body, aided by the carriage passengers. Resonating with a psychosexual tension behind the racial fear, the ideas, language, and actions examine interracial relationships in a drama which embraces fast-paced dialogue, vivid imagery, skilful dramatic timing, and a compelling interaction between its protagonists.

DUTTON, G(eoffrey) F(raser) (1924–), British poet, born on the Welsh borders, of Anglo-Scottish parentage. He has lived most of his life in Scotland and has published works on a variety of subjects, including enzymology and mountaineering. His first full-length collection, Camp One (1978), received a New Writing Award from the Scottish Arts Council. Squaring the Waves (1986), which attracted a wider critical response, was followed by The Concrete Garden (1991). The austere landscape around his home in a mountainous region of Perthshire and his active interest in the coastal and inland waters of Scotland are essential themes of his poetry. His style is extremely economical; a rigorous imagism is fashioned into slender, concentrated poems which often incorporate smooth mechanisms of rhyme and metre to highly unusual effect. He has also published a collection of short stories entitled The Ridiculous Mountains (1984).

DWORKIN, Andrea (1945–), American feminist writer, critical commentator, and political activist, born in Camden, New Jersey, educated at Bennington College. Active in women's campaigns throughout the USA, Dworkin has associated herself with the anti-pornography campaign. Her impassioned, and frequently controversial, writings attempt to lay bare the nature of patriarchal control; above all she sees such control expressed in acts of aggression against women. Her influential critical work Pornography: Men Possessing Women (1981) is a searing documentation of male violence against women, as is Our Blood: Prophecies and Discourses on Sexual Politics (1982). Dworkin has also written a fictional first-person account of a precarious female existence as a prostitute in New York's Lower East Side in her novel, Ice and Fire (1986), as well as a quasi-autobiographical novel about the female experience of rape, Mercy (1990). Equally controversial and even more polemical is Intercourse (1987). The control of women through domesticity and women's acceptance of male authority are discussed in Right-Wing Women: The Politics of Domesticated Females (1983). A decade of campaign speeches, interviews, and essays are collected in Letters from a War Zone (1988).

DYLAN, Bob (1941–), American songwriter and singer, born in Duluth, Minnesota, educated at the University of Minnesota. Originally named Robert Zimmerman, he became known as Bob Dylan in 1962. The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan (1963) and The Times They Are A'Changin' (1964) made him internationally famous as the leading 'protest singer' of the day. Much of his most impressive work was recorded on Highway 61 Revisited (1965) and Blonde on Blonde (1966), personal and socio-political themes combining in lyrics of considerable imaginative scope and incisiveness. Among his subsequent recordings are Planet Waves (1974), Desire (1975), Street Legal (1978), and Saved (1980), the last-named affirming the Christian beliefs he adopted in the late 1970s. Many of Dylan's songs exhibit great facility in rhyming and the ability to organize complex patterns of imagery into compelling lyrical structures. The poetic concentration of much of his writing has attracted the attention of several eminent literary critics, notably Christopher *Ricks. His disjunctively experimental novel Tarantula appeared in 1971; Lyrics, 1962–1985 (1985) contains the words of his songs along with his drawings and other writings.

Dynasts, The, subtitled 'an epic-drama of the war with Napoleon, in three parts, nineteen acts and one hundred and thirty scenes': a verse-drama by Thomas *Hardy, published in three parts: 1904; 1906; and 1908. It is an extraordinary mixture of prose and poetry, epic and drama, incorporating narrative, theatrical, and even cinematic techniques. The first part of the work centres on the figure of Napoleon and concerns the events of the war with England, including the French invasion plans of 1805 and the battles of Ulm, Austerlitz, and Trafalgar. The second part describes the Prussian defeat at Jena; the meeting of Napoleon and Alexander at Tilsit; the battle of Wagram and the war in Spain; and Napoleon's divorce from Josephine, followed by his marriage to Marie Louise. Part III deals with the Russian campaign of 1812, the battle of Leipzig, Napoleon's abdication, and his eventual defeat at Waterloo. In each instance, the main historical events, narrated in a series of long and detailed scenes, are interspersed with short episodes describing the effect of each major political upheaval on the lives of ordinary people. In addition to this terrestrial commentary, a cast of supernatural beings—the Ancient Spirit of the Years, the Spirit of the Pities, the Spirits Sinister and Ironic, the Spirit of Rumour, and the Shade of the Earth—provide a Chorus on the affairs of the historical personages, amongst whom, apart from Napoleon himself, are included King George III, William Pitt, Charles James Fox, Horatio Nelson, and Thomas Masterman Hardy, Captain of the Victory and a distant relative of the author. Presiding over the entire drama is the Immanent Will, epitomizing the spirit of blind chance in human affairs, as it appears in many of Hardy's novels.

E

EAGLETON, Terry (1943–), British critic, born in Salford, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge; he became Warton Professor of English Literature at Oxford. A lively and committed literary reviewer, Eagleton's abiding interest, as a Marxist from a working-class Catholic background, has been in what he calls the politics of power, and more precisely, in the influence of buried or denied historical conditions on works of art and views of literature. In Exiles and Emigrés (1970) he makes connections between biographical facts and fictional themes in modern writing. Later work, like Walter Benjamin (1981) and The Rape of Clarissa (1982), elegantly combines Marxist thought with developing Continental literary theory and philosophy. Eagleton's best-known book, much read by students both tempted and baffled by the new terms of literary debate, is his witty and polemical Literary Theory: An Introduction (1983), a survey which is also a statement of theory's current account. Perhaps less widely read, but more substantial, is The Ideology of the Aesthetic (1990), a sustained pursuit of a sequence of ideas, from Kant to Adorno, to their various philosophical and literary lairs. A controversial figure, Eagleton has seen his role as that of challenging orthodoxies, including the orthodoxy of relativism, or of simple, unreflecting opposition to all versions of truth or order. Recent works include Ideology: An Introduction (1991), Heathcliff and the Great Hunger (1995), and the script for Derek Jarman's film Wittgenstein (1993). See also MARXIST LITERARY CRITICISM.

EARLE, Jean, the pseudonym of Doris BURGE (1909–), British poet, born in Bristol; she grew up in the Rhondda Valley of South Wales, which provides material for a number of her poems. Since 1937 she has lived in various parts of Wales. A Trial of Strength (1980), her first collection of poems, appeared when she was 71, following her resumption of writing many years after the publication of some of her stories and poems in various magazines. The volume suggests access to deep resources of memory and imagination in the disquietingly understated intensities of mood and deftly assured free-verse cadences of many poems. Her subsequent collections include The Intent Look (1984), Visiting Light (1987), and Selected Poems (1990). Much of her work explores the possibilities of affirmative significance in human and natural contexts she habitually views with sceptical intelligence. She has also written radio documentaries and worked as a literary journalist.

Earthly Powers, a novel by Anthony *Burgess, published in 1980. Narrated by Kenneth Toomey, an ageing homosexual and celebrated novelist, the story covers six decades and a vast geographical area. It is driven by a strong moral anger belied by the wit and humour of much of the book and the acknowledged decadence of its narrator. The first part portrays a society flawed and fallen, made evident in the developing tragedies of early twentieth-century Europe. The Catholic Church, though frequently invoked at points of suffering or squalor, is not presented as arbiter or remedy. Among the gallery of fictional and historical characters few are admired by Toomey, although his sister Hortense and his brother-in-law, the priest Carlo, become important. The first climax comes when the young Toomey meets Philip Shawcross, a doctor in a hospital in Malaya, and develops a strong, non-sexual love for him. Cursed by a Malay whose son dies at the hospital, Shawcross becomes dangerously ill. Carlo conducts an exorcism but the curse is lifted too late for Shawcross, who dies. Nevertheless, for the first time Toomey has acknowledged an intense non-sexual love, and for the first time—in the person of Carlo—human evil has been countered by religious certainties. This invasion of light into the darkness of the novel's world is one of its major structural pivots.

Carlo, ministering to his dying brother in Chicago, blesses a dying child, who recovers miraculously. Yet Burgess presents Carlo ambiguously: his rapid rise in the church is shown to be due to ambition, and Carlo appears to have little theological or pastoral insight. In strong contrast to Carlo is Godfrey Manning, leader of an extreme religious sect which he leads into an act of mass suicide/massacre. Toomey visits the sect in search of his niece who is a convert. The final ironic twist of the novel is that the child miraculously healed by Carlo in the Chicago hospital was none other than Godfrey Manning. Burgess refuses to portray good and evil in human beings as absolute. As Toomey ages in his own story and his sexual powers wane, evil is seen to be less what people do than what people are. By the inclusion of real events (the wartime broadcasts of P. G. *Wodehouse, the Lady Chatterley trial, etc.) and real people (Norman *Douglas, Rudyard *Kipling, etc.), the theological subtext is made contemporary and given currency.

EASTLAKE, William (1917–), American novelist, born in New York. He spent four years in the army, attended the Alliance Française in Paris, and later settled on a 300-acre cattle ranch in Cuba, New Mexico. There are three strands to his writing, the least important being his political work in A Child's Garden of Verses for the Revolution (1970) and The Long Naked Descent into Boston (1977). The second strand is his remarkable writing on the American West contained in Go in Beauty (1956), The Bronc People (1958), Portrait of an Artist with Twenty-Six Horses (1963), and Dancers in the Scalp House (1975). These books move from a concentration on the white experience of the West through to an accumulating sympathy for the plight of the Native American, registered most effectively in Dancers, whose linguistic experiments contort the American language in order to convey more accurately the scope and humanity of Indian thought. Dancers also presents with great anger and urgency an ecological viewpoint which Eastlake associates most closely with the patternings of Indian life. The third strand of his fiction deals with the reality of war; Castle Keep (1965) is a dense, formally innovative study of the Second World War, and The Bamboo Bed (1969) carries the same set of procedures into the war in Vietnam (see VIETNAM WRITING). His understandings of the power complex and his subtle investigations of memory help to turn these quasi-philosophical novels into important studies of the phenomenon of modern warfare.

EASTMAN, Charles (Alexander) (Ohiyesa) (1858–1939), Native American writer, born in Minnesota of mixed Sioux Indian and white parentage, educated at Dartmouth and Boston University Medical School. Eastman was one of the first Native American writers to achieve a mass popular audience through his magazine accounts of Indian life and customs, and volumes such as Red Hunters and the Animal People (1904) and Old Indian Days (1907). He has also inspired other Sioux to write, such as Luther *Standing Bear. Wigwam Evenings (1909; reissued as Smoky Day's Wigwam Evenings, 1910) was written in collaboration with his wife Elaine Goodale Eastman, herself a noted writer, whom he met and married when he was a government physician at Pine Ridge agency in South Dakota; there he witnessed the aftermath of the Wounded Knee Massacre. Eastman's influence has been felt most acutely through his autobiographical writing. Indian Boyhood (1902) describes his life to the age of 15 when he was sent to mission school. From the Deep Woods to Civilization (1916) describes his experience of white America, stresses the contribution of Indians to American society, and articulates a powerful criticism of the US government for its indifference towards the suffering of the Sioux people. In The Soul of the Indian: An Interpretation (1911), Indian Child Life (1913), The Indian Today: The Past and Future of the American Indian (1915), and Indian Heroes and Great Chieftains (1918), Eastman offers an appreciation of Indian culture. EASTMAN, Max (Forrester) (1883–1969), American political writer and critic, born in Canandaigua, New York, educated at Williams College and Columbia University, where he taught philosophy between 1907 and 1911. In 1912 he became editor of the socialist periodical *The Masses and subsequently edited the pro-Soviet Liberator. His enthusiasm for the Soviet system was subdued by a visit to Russia during Stalin's ascendancy to power. Since Lenin Died (1925) was the first of a series of penetrating critiques of communism which also include Marx and Lenin, the Science of Revolution (1926) and The End of Socialism in Russia (1937). The Enjoyment of Poetry (1913), a valuable study of metaphor, is the best-known of his critical works; his antagonism to *Modernism becomes evident in The Literary Mind (1931), while The Enjoyment of Laughter (1936) opposes the claims of Freudian literary theory. The Colours of Life (1918) and succeeding volumes of his conventionally lyrical verse are collected in Poems of Five Decades (1954), which includes verse translations, chiefly from the Russian. From 1941 onward he travelled widely as a corresponding editor for Reader's Digest. Heroes I Have Known (1942) and Great Companions (1959) recount his associations with Mark Twain, Charlie Chaplin, John *Dewey, Ernest *Hemingway, and numerous others, including Lev Trotsky, whose History of the Russian Revolution (three volumes, 1932–3) he translated and of whom he produced a biography (1925). Love and Revolution (1965) is Eastman's autobiography.

EBERHART, Richard (1904–), American poet, born in Austin, Minnesota, educated at the universities of Minnesota, Dartmouth, Cambridge, and Harvard. Eberhart spent eight years as a school teacher in Southboro where one of his pupils was Robert *Lowell. At Cambridge in the late 1920s he became acquainted with the critical theories of William *Empson, and of I. A. *Richards who encouraged him as a poet. Eberhart's first book of poems, A Bravery of Earth (1930), was published in London. He has subsequently published nearly thirty volumes of poetry including Selected Poems 1930–65 (1965; Pulitzer Prize), Collected Poems 1930–76 (1976), and The Long Reach: New and Uncollected Poems 1948–84 (1984). His Collected Verse Plays appeared in 1962. A traditionalist by conviction and a formalist in technique, Eberhart blends his traditional values with his visionary belief in the power of the imagination to inscribe the transcendental in the ordinary. Thus his deceptively simple poetry is impacted with a questioning complexity, and works through the juxtaposition of the commonplace and the allusive, effecting a union between reason and imagination.

EDEL, (Joseph) Leon (1907–), American biographer, born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, educated at McGill University, Toronto, and the University of Paris. During the 1930s he worked as a journalist and subsequently taught at New York University, where he became a professor in 1955. The five volumes of Henry James (1953–72), for which he received a Pulitzer Prize in 1963, established his eminence as a biographer. While avoiding the technical vocabulary of psychoanalysis, Edel's practice of biography makes extensive use of Freudian interpretative methods. His other works include James Joyce: The Last Journey (1947), Bloomsbury: A House of Lions (1979), The Stuff of Sleep and Dreams (1982), essays on literary psychology, and Writing Lives (1984), a discussion of biography, which he defends as 'a noble and adventurous art'. He is also noted for his editions of the writings of Henry *James, which include The Complete Plays (1949) and the four volumes of Letters (1974–84).

EDGAR, David (1948–), British playwright, born in Birmingham, the son of a television producer, educated at Manchester University. His first plays, mostly pieces of radical agitprop, were produced in Bradford while he was working there as a journalist; he continued in broadly the same vein until the mid-1970s, producing such work as the anti-Common Market A Fart for Europe (1972) and a Shakespearian parody about Richard Nixon, Dick Deterred (1974), usually for small socialist touring companies. But then came Destiny (1976), a study of racism and neo-fascism in modern Britain which, though clearly written from a left-wing stance, displayed an unexpected sensitivity, openness of mind, and interest in understanding his political enemies rather than straightforwardly condemning them. The same qualities have often marked his subsequent work, notably The Jail Diary of Albie Sachs (1978), about an imprisoned South African dissident; Mary Barnes (1978), a study of schizophrenia; Maydays (1983), a piece of epic sweep about the rise of the right wing in Britain; Entertaining Strangers (1985); The Shape of the Table (1990), a speculative picture of the mostly secret meetings and negotiations that brought about the radical changes in Eastern Europe in the late 1980s; and the ambitious Pentecost (1994), set in a Balkan country coming to terms with its new freedoms and, with its discovery of what may be a historically important fresco, raising questions about art and culture as well as nationalism, language, and the refugee problem. Edgar has also written for radio and television and made several adaptations for the stage, notably an eight-hour version of Dickens's Nicholas Nickleby which enjoyed great success when it was performed by the Royal Shakespeare Company in 1980.

EDGELL, Zee (1940–), Belizean novelist, born in Belize City, educated at Regent Street Polytechnic and the University of the West Indies. After working as a schoolteacher and newspaper editor, she became the Director of the Belizean administration's Department of Women's Affairs and has been an educational consultant since 1990. Beka Lamb (1982), her first novel and the first Belizean work of fiction to attract international notice, parallels the growth to maturity and independence of its female protagonist with the emergence and consolidation of Belize's sense of national identity. Like its predecessor, Edgell's second novel, In Times Like These (1991), conflates personal and national themes in its account of a well-educated Belizean woman's political involvements upon returning to her native country on the eve of Independence.

Edinburgh Review, The, a quarterly literary magazine begun in 1969 as the New Edinburgh Review, the title alluding to the Edinburgh Review (1802–1929), to which many of the major writers of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries contributed. David Cubitt was the first editor of the New Edinburgh Review, which was published by students of Edinburgh University and contained poetry, short stories, and reviews of books and theatrical activities. By 1971 the journal had attracted work from numerous leading Scottish authors, including Hugh *MacDiarmid, George Mackay *Brown, and Norman *MacCaig. Under James Campbell's editorship from 1978 to 1982 the Review emerged as a literary periodical of repute, publishing work by a wide range of eminent writers who included Robert *Creeley, David *Daiches, Gavin *Ewart, Douglas *Dunn, William *Burroughs, and James *Baldwin. Allan *Massie, editor between 1982 and 1984, maintained the liveliness of tone and high standards Campbell had established, introducing James Naughtie as a political commentator and featuring stories by Muriel *Spark, William *Boyd, and Emma *Tennant. The present title was assumed in 1985. The magazine publishes prose fiction, poetry, reviews, and critical articles on literature, the graphic arts, and socio-cultural topics. Frank *Kuppner, James *Simmons, Tom *Leonard, Edwin *Morgan, and Alasdair *Gray are among the regular contributors.

EDMOND, Lauris (1924–), New Zealand poet, born in Hawkes Bay, educated there at Wellington Teachers' College and at Waikato University, Hamilton. Having married and produced five children Edmond was 51 when her first book appeared. Her collections include In Middle Air (1975), The Pear Tree: Poems (1977), Wellington Letter (1980), Seven Poems (1980), Salt from the North (1980), Catching It (1980), Selected Poems (1984), Seasons and Creatures (1986), and Summer Near the Arctic Circle (1988). A lyric poet with a bundle of obsessions that she has refined, developed, and duplicated in all her collections, her concerns are 'the interpenetrations of the domestic and the intellectual; observations of flora, fauna, families, lovers and loved ones; meditations on birth, love, separation, death . . .' (Michele Leggott, in *Landfall). One of New Zealand's most popular poets, Edmond is part of the literary scene in Wellington which includes Louis *Johnson and Vincent *O'Sullivan. She portrays herself as the poet and spokesperson of a generation of women effectively silenced by their responsibilities as wives and mothers; this is the tenor of her autobiographical works Hot October: An Autobiographical Story (1989) and Bonfires in the Rain (1991). A novel, High Country Weather, appeared in 1984.

EDMOND, Murray (1949–), New Zealand poet, playwright, and critic, born in Hamilton, educated at the University of Auckland. He has since worked in the theatre while continuing to write poetry. Edmond was published in Landfall* while still at school, and in the early 1970s he was the editor of several issues of the 'messianic' and important though short-lived magazine The Word is Freed, which was very much the vehicle of a generation of young poets in the late 1960s which included Bill *Manhire and Ian *Wedde. Wedde describes Edmond's poems as 'rhapsodic and linguistically dense' and as having 'dramatic and narrative qualities which owe much to his life in theatre'. Edmond's interest in personal and domestic themes is related to wider intellectual concerns, such as the 'presence' of local histories, and indigenous and other literatures. Stylistically, Edmond shows an increasing commitment to innovation and experiment. Collections of poems include Entering the Eye (1973), Patchwork (1978), End Wall (1981), Letters and Paragraphs (1987), and From the Word Go (1992). The Switch (1994) is an experimental long poem in forty-nine parts on love and transience. He has also written short plays for children, a full-length musical A New South Pacific, and critical work on New Zealand drama and poetry; with Mary Paul he edited an anthology, The New Poets: Initiatives in Recent New Zealand Poetry (1987).

EDRIC, Robert, pseudonym of Gary Edric ARMITAGE (1956–), British novelist, born in Sheffield, educated at Hull University; he became a full-time writer in 1982. His novels A Season of Peace (1985) and Across the Autumn Grass (1986) were published under his original name. Winter Garden (1985), the first of his novels as Edric, won the James Tait Black Award, and displayed his masterful handling of the complex and sinisterly comic narratives often characteristic of his work. In the Days of the American Museum (1990) forms an extravagantly imaginative treatment of P. T. Barnum's celebrated exhibition of curiosities. The Broken Lands (1992) is a harrowingly bleak account of Sir John Franklin's search for the North West Passage. A small town in southern Germany in 1945 is the setting for the narrative of guilt and concealment in Hallowed Ground (1993). The Earth Made Glass (1994) deals compellingly with the arrival of an inquisitor in a remote village in seventeenth-century England. Edric's other novels include A New Ice Age (1986), A Lunar Eclipse (1989) and Elysium (1995).

Education of Henry Adams, The, an autobiography by Henry (Brooks) Adams, privately printed in 1907 and posthumously published in 1918. Generally ranked as one of the most distinguished autobiographies, its subtitle, 'A Study of Twentieth-Century Multiplicity', describes Adams's purpose; he employs a series of selected moments from his life in order to illustrate his highly privileged existence and to set out his dynamic theories of history and philosophy. The book represents his long career as a failure, despite his successful achievements, because the USA was unable to equip him to meet the battles he had to face. His earlier work, Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres (1904), studies Europe from the perspective of the thirteenth century, 'the point of history when man held the highest idea of himself as a unit in a unified universe' and thus contrasts with his description in The Education of the modern world as a 'multiverse'. This conception is best expressed in the chapter 'The Dynamo and the Virgin', in which he sees the mechanical dynamo, the symbol of electrical energy, as corresponding to the central symbol of the medieval world-view, the Virgin. Generated as it was by the World's Columbian Exposition of 1893 in Chicago, this idea also marked the geographical shift of ideas from the Eastern seaboard, which had been populated by generations of the Adams family, to the industrial heartlands of the Midwest. As such, it indicates the intellectual shift from the nineteenth century to a distinctively twentieth-century frame of thought.

EGAN, Desmond (1936–), Irish poet, born in Athlone, County West Meath, educated at University College, Dublin, afterwards becoming a teacher. In 1972 he founded the Goldsmith Press, which has since produced many editions, principally of poetry by Irish authors, including Patrick Kavanagh: The Complete Poems (edited by Peter Kavanagh, 1984). Egan's first collection of poetry, Midland (1973), was followed by subsequent volumes including Song for My Father (1989), Seeing Double (1991), and In the Holocaust of Autumn (1994); Collected Poems appeared in 1984, and Selected Poems in 1992, with an introduction by Hugh *Kenner. A keen interest in the possibilities of experimental poetic forms is evident throughout his work, which ranges thematically between outspokenly political poems and precisely observed lyrical verse. His other works include The Death of Metaphor (1989), a collection of his literary essays.

EGBUNA, Obi B(enue) (1938–), Nigerian novelist and short-story writer, educated at the University of Iowa and Howard University, Washington, DC. He lived in England from 1961 to 1973, where he became involved in the Black Power movement. Radical and impassioned, Destroy This Temple: The Voice of Black Power in Britain (1971) describes his spell on remand in Brixton Prison and the general political turmoil during this time. The problems he encountered when he returned to Nigeria are described in The Diary of a Homeless Prodigal (1978). His first novel, Elina (1978; first published as Wind versus Polygamy, 1964), caused great controversy in its sympathetic portrayal of a polygamous chief. Other novels include The Minister's Daughter (1975), which sets a young student against a corrupt government minister; and The Madness of Didi (1980) in which the eponymous former priest and college professor, a thinly disguised self-portrait, is a hero to the young, but due to his radical past faces suspicion when he returns to his native village. All Egbuna's novels display a sardonic sense of humour, as did his play The Anthill (1965). His collections of short stories include Daughters of the Sun (1970), Emperor of the Sea (1974), and The Rape of Lysistrata and Black Candles for Christmas (1980).

Egoist, The, a literary periodical strongly associated with the development of *Modernism in England from 1914 to 1919. Dora Marsden had formed the Freewoman in 1911, a magazine devoted to issues facing the 'new woman' and to philosophical discussion; in 1913 it became the New Freewoman, subtitled An Individualist Review, and attracted the attention of Ezra *Pound, who persuaded Marsden that innovative literary material should be included. The first issue under the title The Egoist appeared early in 1914; later that year Harriet Shaw Weaver succeeded Marsden as editor, the latter continuing to supply each issue with her singular philosophical essays. Richard *Aldington was assistant editor from 1914 to 1916, when his wife Hilda *Doolittle took over the position, which was occupied by T. S. *Eliot from 1917 to 1919. Pound ensured that Imagism was strongly promoted in the magazine and contributed many critical articles cogently arguing in support of the writing he favoured; although he was responsible for the magazine's sometimes arrogant tone, he also arranged the publication of much of its best material: James Joyce's Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man was serialized in 1914 and 1915, and extracts from Ulysses* were later published. Poetry from America was supplied by Marianne *Moore, W. C. *Williams, and others. Eliot's critical essays, which began appearing regularly in 1917, contained some of his most provocative and iconoclastic criticism; his 'Tradition and the Individual Talent' was featured in the last issue of The Egoist, which was discontinued as a result of increasing financial difficulties in 1919.

EKWENSI, Cyprian (Odiatu Duaka) (1921–), Nigerian novelist and short-story writer, born in Minna, Northern Nigeria, educated at the Universities of Ibadan and Ghana, and at the Chelsea School of Pharmacy, University of London. He has also been a lecturer and broadcaster, and has served with the Federal Ministry of Information, Lagos, and the Bureau of External Publicity in Biafra during the Nigerian Civil War. Ekwensi is generally recognized as an entertaining chronicler of the big city life in West Africa, and his novels are characterized by a vigorous, realistic style. His most famous novel, Jagua Nana (1961), follows the 'ageing African beauty' of the title, which refers both to Zola's original 'demi-mondaine' and the pidgin word for 'Jaguar' cars, in her quest for love and money in 'high life' Lagos. People of the City (1954), Beautiful Feathers (1963), and Lokotown and Other Stories (1966) are also all set in Lagos, and peopled with vivid characters in their hectic struggle to survive, or to shine. Burning Grass (1962), written as a children's story, deals with the Fulani cattlemen of Northern Nigeria, and is generally considered to be one of Ekwensi's most successful, though least characteristic, novels.

ELDERSHAW, M. Barnard, pseudonym of Marjorie BARNARD (1897–1987) and Flora ELDERSHAW (1897–1956), two Australian writers who worked in collaboration. Of their five novels the most successful was A House Is Built (1929), which traces the fortunes of a nineteenth-century Sydney family; the most ambitious was Tomorrow and Tomorrow (1947; unexpurgated version 1983), a satirical fantasy, set in Australia 400 years into the future. Other collaborations include Phillip of Australia (1938), The Life and Times of Captain John Piper (1939), and My Australia (1939), all historical works; But Not for Love (1989), a posthumous collection of short stories; and Essays on Australian Fiction (1938). Both women edited and published independent works. Eldershaw edited The Peaceful Army (1938), a collection of essays and poems by Australian women writers; Barnard published several more historical studies, critical essays for Meanjin* and Southerly*, a biography of Miles *Franklin, and The Persimmon Tree (1943), a collection of short stories.

Elder Statesman, The, a play by T. S. *Eliot.

ELIOT, T(homas) S(tearns) (1888–1965), American poet, critic, and dramatist, the son of a successful businessman of New England descent, born in St Louis, Missouri, where he attended the Smith Academy, contributing poems and stories to the school's magazine. In 1906 he entered Harvard, studying literature, history, and philosophy as an undergraduate and taking a master's degree in English Literature; among his teachers was Irving *Babbitt, whose repudiation of Romanticism and stress on the ethical functions of literature formed an abiding influence on Eliot's thought. In October 1910 he travelled to Europe, staying chiefly in Paris, where he attended lectures at the Sorbonne; 'Portrait of a Lady' and 'The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock' were completed before his return to Harvard to begin work on a Ph.D. in philosophy in the autumn of 1911. Having obtained a travelling fellowship, he went to England in 1914 to study at Merton College, Oxford. Conrad *Aiken, whom Eliot knew from Harvard, supplied him with an introduction to Ezra *Pound, who responded to his poetry by noting in a letter that 'he has actually . . . modernized himself on his own'; in the course of 1915 Pound introduced Eliot's poems to several magazines, notably Poetry* and Blast*, and included five in his Catholic Anthology of that year. Eliot had produced all the poems collected in Prufrock and Other Observations* (1917), his first collection of verse, by the summer of 1915. His early work displayed striking originality and accomplishment, combining the suppleness of free verse with shrewd virtuosity in the use of rhythm and rhyme; imagery drawn from precise observation gained in poise and effectiveness from the detached irony of tone he had acquired at Harvard from his reading of Jules Laforgue (1860–87).

Marriage to Vivien Haigh-Wood in 1915, together with the stimulation and opportunities provided by his entry to the circle associated with the emergence of Anglo-American literary *Modernism, precluded his return to America to pursue the academic career he had formerly considered. His doctoral dissertation, published as Knowledge and Experience in the Philosophy of F. H. Bradley in 1964, was accepted by Harvard in 1916, but he did not complete the University's requirements for the degree. He worked as a schoolteacher, book reviewer, and tutor for the University of London Extension Board until he joined the Colonial and Foreign Department of Lloyd's Bank in 1917, when he also became assistant editor of the Egoist*; the articles he produced for the magazine include numerous examples of his most vigorous and incisive criticism. By 1919 he was also reviewing regularly for the Times Literary Supplement* and the Athenaeum*; The Sacred Wood (1920) collected the best of his literary journalism from these years, including 'Tradition and the Individual Talent', in which he argued that 'the progress of an artist is . . . a continual extinction of personality', and 'Hamlet', in the course of which he coined the term *'objective correlative'. Poems (1919), published by the *Hogarth Press, demonstrated energetic technical and thematic advances; 'Whispers of Immortality' and 'Sweeney among the Nightingales' used rhymed quatrains of remarkable facility and concentration to achieve astringently witty presentations of their morbid social anatomies. Ara Vos Prec and the American edition of Poems, both of 1920, contained previously collected poems along with fresh material, notably 'Gerontion', a dramatically disquieting expression of his intensifying pessimism which displays the deepening historical and imaginative resonances commanded by his fluently allusive manner.

In 1921 both Eliot and his wife succumbed to nervous and emotional disorders; given three months' leave by his employers, he rested in Margate before going to Lausanne for treatment, on the recommendation of Lady Ottoline *Morrell. During this period he completed *The Waste Land (1922). The poem appeared in the first edition of the Criterion*, of which Eliot remained editor, doing much to promote the acceptance of literary Modernism, until it ceased publication in 1939; the socio-cultural views in his editorials reflected the growing conservatism suggested by the assertion that he was 'classicist in literature, royalist in politics, and anglo-catholic in religion' in the preface to his essays in For Lancelot Andrewes (1928). He was received into the Church of England in 1927; in that year he also took British citizenship and composed *'Journey of the Magi', which established the importance of religious elements to most of his later work. The Waste Land having gained Eliot wide notice as a poet, his reputation was consolidated by Poems 1909–1925 (1925); the only previously uncollected poem in the volume was 'The Hollow Men', the incantatory austerity of which anticipated the ritualistic qualities of much of his subsequent poetry. The book was the first of Eliot's to be issued by Faber and Gwyer (later *Faber and Faber), whose board of directors he joined in 1925; Pound, W. H. *Auden, Louis *MacNeice, Wallace *Stevens, Marianne *Moore, David *Jones, and Ted *Hughes are among the poets he secured for Faber's list. His work as a poet continued with Ash Wednesday (1930), a devotional meditation in six parts on self-denial and the possibility of redemption; it draws chiefly upon Dante and the Bible for its emblematic imagery, in which power and strangeness combine with great lucidity chiefly as a result of a new openness in the poem's language. The spirited children's verse of Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats (1939) forms a refreshing hiatus in the meditative seriousness of his later poetry, which culminates with Four Quartets* (1943); with the exception of numerous minor poems, the sequence concluded his career as a poet.

The publications which gained him pre-eminence among the critics of his day include The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism (1933), After Strange Gods (1934), Essays Ancient and Modern (1936), The Idea of a Christian Society (1939), Notes towards the Definition of Culture (1948), and On Poetry and Poets (1957). His pervasive concern with the interdependence of literary tradition and modern cultural values decisively influenced the development of modern criticism through its appeal to F. R. Leavis and his associates at Scrutiny; social and ethical issues assume growing importance in his critical writings in the course of the 1930s. In 1932 and 1933 Eliot lectured at various American universities. Upon his return to Britain he effected a separation from his wife, whose growing mental imbalance had reduced their marriage's hitherto meagre potential for success; Vivien was eventually committed to a psychiatric hospital, where she died in 1947. Eliot was married in 1957 to Valerie Fletcher, his secretary at Faber and Faber; their happiness is clear from the late poem 'A Dedication to my Wife'.

The uncompleted Sweeney Agonistes (1932), begun in 1923 and performed by the *Group Theatre in 1934, marked the beginning of his preoccupation with poetic drama; The Rock (1934), an ecclesiastical and historical pageant reflecting the social and political concerns of the early 1930s, was followed by Murder in the Cathedral* in 1935. The Family Reunion (1939) was the first of his attempts to align his underlying spiritual concerns with the conventions of the popular theatre; although the play was not a commercial success, he sustained the endeavour, in the belief that his art should serve a broad social purpose, with The Cocktail Party (1950), The Confidential Clerk (1954), and The Elder Statesman (1959). Public enthusiasm for these plays was partly a result of Eliot's greatly increased prominence following the awards of the Nobel Prize and the Order of Merit in 1948. In his later years he enjoyed unrivalled celebrity and veneration as a literary and cultural figure; in terms of his combined importance to literature in English as a poet and critic, he remains the major figure of the twentieth century. His Complete Poems and Plays appeared in 1969 and Selected Prose, edited by Frank *Kermode, was published in 1975. The principal biographical studies are Peter *Ackroyd's T. S. Eliot (1984), and Lyndall Gordon's Eliot's Early Years (1977) and Eliot's New Life (1988); among the more interesting of many critical treatments are Hugh *Kenner's The Invisible Poet (1959), Bernard *Bergonzi's T. S. Eliot (1972), and Helen *Gardner's The Composition of 'Four Quartets' (1978). The first volume of Eliot's Letters, edited by his wife Valerie Eliot, was published in 1988.

ELKIN, Stanley (Lawrence) (1930–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Brooklyn, New York City, educated at the University of Illinois. Elkin has been described as a 'major Jewish-American postmodernist' although his reputation has been somewhat eclipsed by other Jewish writers such as Saul *Bellow, Bernard *Malamud, and Philip *Roth. His first novel, Boswell (1964), revealed his striking talent for absurdist black humour and comic monologue, talents further developed in his first collection of short stories, Criers and Kibitzers, Kibitzers and Criers (1966), and in his second novel, A Bad Man (1967), where the humour is given a metaphysical edge in Elkin's meditations on the paradox of good and evil. The Dick Gibson Show (1971) received critical acclaim, while Searches and Seizures (1973; UK title Eligible Men, 1974) brought Elkin a wider audience through the cinematic adaptation of the first novella in the collection ('The Bailbondsman'), filmed as Alex and the Gipsy. Further novels include The Franchiser (1976), George Mills (1982), The Magic Kingdom (1984), The Rabbi of Lud (1987), and the MacGuffin (1991). The Living End (1979) contains three long stories, satirizing religion, and is notable for both its blasphemy and its vulgarity. Elkin took up an academic post in 1960 at Washington University in St Louis, becoming King Professor of Modern Letters in 1983, and has gained many academic awards.

ELLIOT, Alistair (1932–), British poet, born in Liverpool; he spent his childhood in the north of England and the USA, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. Among other posts, he has been a librarian in Britain, Europe, and the Middle East. The first of his principal collections of poetry, Contentions (1978), was followed by subsequent volumes including Talking Back (1982); On the Appian Way (1984), a long sequence recounting his journey on foot from Rome to Brindisi; My Country (1989), a collected edition; and Turning the Stones (1993). Elliot's poetry is characterized by its urbane informality of tone and its fluent use of rhymed traditional forms. His work draws equally on personal experience and on his considerable erudition, which is put to entertaining use in the numerous imaginative dialogues with historical figures in Talking Back. His numerous translations include a version of Heinrich Heine's The Lazarus Poems (1979) and Euripides' Medea (1993). Among the works he has edited is Poems by James I and Others (1970).

ELLIOTT, Janice (1931–95), British novelist, born in Derby, educated at St Anne's College, Oxford. She worked as a journalist in London until she became a freelance writer in 1962. She achieved wide recognition with her 'England Trilogy', A State of Peace (1971), Private Life (1972), and Heaven on Earth (1975), which depicts the social and cultural character of England in the years immediately following the Second World War with remarkable detail and authenticity. While a number of her books display a preoccupation with the psychological tensions beneath the rational surfaces of contemporary British middle-class life, her imaginative range was wide; esoteric political and mystical elements were ascendant in her later work, which includes Dr Gruber's Daughter (1986), in which Hitler lives out old age in an Oxford attic, and The Sadness of the Witches (1987), a bizarre fable set in Cornwall. Summer People (1980), Secret Places (1981), Necessary Rites (1990), City of Gates (1992), and Figures in the Sand (1994) are also among her twenty-two novels. She has also published Noises from the Zoo (1991), a collection of short stories, and five children's books.

ELLIS, Alice Thomas, pseudonym of Anna Margaret HAYCRAFT (1932–), British novelist, born in Liverpool, educated at Bangor Grammar School and Liverpool School of Art. The landscapes of North Wales, where she grew up, form the background to many of her short, poignant, and witty novels, the first of which was The Sin Eater (1977). Roman Catholicism, to which she is a convert, is an important influence on her vision, as is a strong sense of tragedy, which invariably leavens the fierce comedy that characterizes her fiction. Other novels include The Birds of the Air (1980), The 27th Kingdom (1982), The Other Side of the Fire (1983), and Unexplained Laughter (1985). Among her more celebrated works is the trilogy composed of The Clothes in the Wardrobe (1987), The Skeleton in the Cupboard (1988), and The Fly in the Ointment (1989); the latter, with its exotic and eccentric characters, including an anti-heroine who comes from Egypt, and its antics of infidelity and domestic betrayal, was filmed as The Summerhouse for television. The Inn at the Edge of the World (1990), with its island locale and allusions to Celtic myth, veers into the territory of fable. In Pillars of Gold (1992) Ellis explores, with customary wit, the urban anonymity and the unwholesomeness of life in the Britain of the 1990s. The Evening of Adam (1994) is a collection of short stories. Her 'Home Life' columns appear regularly in the Spectator.

ELLIS, Bret Easton (1964–), American novelist, born in Los Angeles, educated at Bennington College, Vermont. His first novel, Less than Zero (1985), was published while the author was still a student and portrayed disaffected 1980s' youth, preoccupied with drugs, casual sex, and money, against a background of affluent Los Angeles society. The book was subsequently made into a film. Similar themes recur in Rules of Attraction (1987), which deals with the psychological traumas of a group of middle-class students at a New England college. American Psycho (1991) caused widespread controversy for its portrayal of a middle-class Wall Street banker who is also a brutal killer; the novel was rejected by the author's American publisher for its excessive violence before being accepted by Picador. The Informers (1994), a collection of linked short stories, covered much the same territory. With Jay *McInerney and Tama *Janowitz, Ellis has popularized a new style of American writing: laconic, cynical, and concerned with the decadent values of a materialistic generation.

ELLIS, (Henry) Havelock (1859–1939), British writer, born in Croydon, Surrey. His early travels to Australia were reflected in his novel Kanga Creek (1922). He later trained as a physician at St Thomas's Hospital, London. During this time he contributed to journals and edited the unexpurgated Mermaid Series of Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists as well as the Contemporary Science Series. He was an energetic campaigner for a more liberal and open view of sex, and against censorship. A close friend of Olive *Schreiner, he was also associated with other progressive thinkers in the field of sexuality, including Edward *Carpenter, Arthur *Symons, the 'decadent' poet, and Margaret Sanger, the advocate of birth control. Among his many works on human sexual behaviour were Sexual Inversion (1897; with J. A. Symonds), which concerns homosexuality, and was to have formed part of Studies in the Psychology of Sex (1897–1928; 7 volumes), which was published in America, and until 1935, due to censorship, available in Britain only to members of the medical profession. The work was surreptitiously imported in large numbers, and gained Ellis many followers. Other works include Affirmations (1898, literary essays) and an autobiography, My Life (1939). A modern biography by P. Grosskurth appeared in 1980.

ELLIS, Steve (1952–), British poet and critic, born in York, educated at University College, London, gaining his Ph.D. in 1981 for a thesis which provided the basis for his first critical work, Dante and English Poetry: Shelley to T. S. Eliot (1983). In 1984 he took up an academic post at the University of Birmingham. His poetry, collected in Home and Away (1987) and West Pathway (1993), is notable for its lyrically incisive views of the unsettling implications of everyday events; long socio-cultural perspectives are opened in the course of shrewd considerations of modestly anecdotal material. Samples of his work are included in the popular anthology Poetry with an Edge (1988, edited by Neil Astley). He completed a verse translation of Dante's Hell in 1991. The English Eliot: Design, Language, and Landscape in Four Quartets (1991) is a notable work of criticism.

ELLISON, Harlan (1934–), American short-story writer, born in Cleveland, Ohio, most of whose work is *science fiction or *fantasy. His short fiction has been published in many volumes including Paingod (1965), I Have no Mouth and I Must Scream (1967), Over the Edge (1970), Deathbird Stories (1975), Shatterday (1980), The Essential Ellison (1987), Angry Candy (1988), and Mind Fields (1994). The protagonists of his best stories find self-expression (often at fatal cost) in worlds more disturbing than most fantasy environments; for them the human and supernatural world becomes an arena in which survival of its punishing challenges is the only reward.

ELLISON, Ralph (Waldo) (1914–), African-American novelist and essayist, born in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. He studied music at Tuskegee Institute, Alabama, and worked for some time as a jazz musician before going to New York City in the late 1930s to pursue a career in sculpture; there he met Richard *Wright, who encouraged him to write. In 1939 Ellison began to write in earnest with the New York *Federal Writers' Project, and in 1942 he edited The Negro Quarterly. After several early short stories like 'Slick Gonna Learn' and 'Mister Toussan', he published his novel Invisible Man* (1952). Immediately fêted, Ellison soon became one of the most highly regarded black writers and was awarded several honorary degrees and guest professorships. He has lectured widely on black culture, folklore, and creative writing. His only other major publication is a volume of essays, Shadow and Act (1964), which range over literary issues, jazz and blues music, and African-American social and cultural conditions. Extracts from a projected second novel on religion and politics, appeared in several periodicals between 1960 and 1973, including the American Review, Iowa Review, and the Quarterly Review of Literature. In 1986, some of these writings appeared in Going to the Territory. See also ETHNICITY.

ELLMANN, Richard (David) (1918–87), American biographer and critic, born in Detroit, educated at Yale. In the course of a distinguished academic career he taught at Harvard and Northwestern University and was Goldsmith's Professor of English Literature at Oxford from 1970 to 1984. Yeats: The Man and the Masks (1948) established him as a critic of importance. His other works on W. B. *Yeats include Eminent Domain (1967), a study of the poet in relation to Oscar Wilde, James *Joyce, T. S. *Eliot, Ezra *Pound, and W. H. *Auden. He became widely known for James Joyce (1959, revised edition 1982), which is regarded by many as pre-eminent among modern literary biographies. The posthumous appearance of Oscar Wilde (1987) confirmed his reputation as a biographer. Among his other works are Golden Codgers (1973), biographical studies of leading exponents of literary *Modernism.

ELLROY, James (1948–),American crime novelist, born in Los Angeles. After serving in the US Army he drifted through a series of jobs, living for some time as a down-and-out before taking up writing. Perhaps the darkest of all *'hardboiled' writers, Ellroy's novels portray Los Angeles and its inhabitants since the 1940s. His vision of contemporary life, like that of James M. *Cain and Jim *Thompson, is one in which crime and madness are endemic, and in which sexual desire cannot be expressed satisfactorily. His early novels, Blood on the Moon (1984), Because the Night (1985), and Suicide Hill (1986), featured an ambivalent police detective, Lloyd Hopkins, whose investigations of homicides revealed monsters and psychopaths abounding. Ellroy's major work, a sequential history of Los Angeles articulated through a series of the most lurid crimes, begins with The Black Dahlia (1987) based on a famous murder case of 1947, and continues with The Big Nowhere (1988) about the McCarthyite 'Red scare' in Hollywood in the early 1950s, L. A. Confidential (1990) which deals with scandal in the movie industry and the sordid reality behind the 'dream factory', and White Jazz (1993). Ellroy embarked on a new series with American Tabloid (1995).

ELTON, G(eoffrey) R(udolph) (1921–94), British historian, born at Tübingen, Germany. After his family moved to Britain in the late 1930s he was educated at Rydal School, Colwyn Bay, and the University of London. Originally surnamed 'Ehrenberg', he adopted 'Elton' as his name in 1944 while serving with British military intelligence. From 1949 onward he taught at Cambridge University, where he became Regius Professor of Modern History in 1983. Among the works which established his reputation as a leading authority on the constitutional history of the English Reformation are The Tudor Revolution in Government (1953), England under the Tudors (1955), Policy and Police (1972), and Reform and Reformation: England 1509–1558 (1977). His conservative and humanist philosophy as a historian is stated in the debate with R. W. Fogel in Which Road to the Past? (1983) and the lectures of Return to Essentials (1991). His other publications of note include Reform and Renewal (1973) and the collected essays of Studies in Tudor and Stuart Politics and Government (three volumes, 1974–82).

EMECHETA, (Florence Onye) Buchi (1944–), Nigerian-born British novelist, born in Lagos, educated at the University of London; she took up residence in Britain in 1962. Her first two novels, In the Ditch (1972) and Second-Class Citizen (1974), are semi-autobiographical. The first novel chronicles the struggles of Adah, Nigerian mother of five, to raise her children in poverty in North London, while working on a degree in Sociology, and separated from her husband. The second delves into Adah's childhood, her move to London, and her entrapment in a difficult marriage. These two novels established Emecheta's reputation as a feminist. An early version of The Bride Price (1976), a tragic love story set in the Igbo town of Ibuza in the early 1950s, was burned by Emecheta's husband. The Slave Girl (1977) and the ironically titled The Joys of Motherhood (1979), continue her scrutiny of traditional society and the difficulties that face women struggling to gain independence from male-dominated authority. Patriarchal values are seen at their worst in Gwendolen (1989), which examines the problems facing Caribbean immigrants in London and focuses on a sexually exploited Jamaican girl. Other novels include Destination Biafra (1981), a grim tale of civil war; Double Yoke (1982), about young Nigerians trapped between tradition and modernity; The Rape of Shavi (1983), a futuristic anti-colonial satire, and Kehinde (1994), a portrait of conflicting loyalties, in which a woman assesses the freedoms she will lose if she returns to Nigeria with her husband. Head Above Waters (1986) is an autobiography. Emecheta also writes children's books.

Emperor Jones, The, a play by Eugene *O'Neill, published in 1920. His first great success in the theatre, it is an experiment in theatrical expressionism, about the rise and fall of Brutus Jones, a former Pullman porter and escaped prisoner who flees to a West Indian island where he establishes himself as emperor. His regime is brutal, corrupt, and dictatorial, and he is warned by a white Cockney trader, Smithers, of impending revolt signalled by a drum beat which sounds throughout the play. Jones, who believes that he can be killed only by a silver bullet, is forced to take refuge in the forest where he is finally destroyed by his adversary Lem, whose troops shoot him with a silver bullet that Lem had especially made from melted down coins. One of the first American plays with a major role for a black actor, the initial success of The Emperor Jones had much to do with the performance of Charles Gilpin as Brutus, though O'Neill gave the part to the young Paul Robeson for the London production. Brutus Jones enacts a version of the black man's return to his native origins, but whose fatal display of the trappings of European militarism in a culture he no longer understands entails his fall from the heroic status he desires to that of a sacrificial victim to the local deities. O'Neill's play derives from an interest in African primitivism instigated by a book of photographs of African sculpture by Charles Sheeler.

EMPSON, Sir William (1906–84), British poet and critic, born at Yokefleet Hall near Howden, Yorkshire, educated at Magadalene College, Cambridge, where he initially read mathematics and went on to study English. In lieu of essays, Empson was permitted by I. A. Richards, his supervisor, to submit a dissertation which formed the core of Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930), the range and fluency of which established his reputation as a critic. A number of his best-known poems, including 'To an Old Lady', 'Arachne', and 'Legal Fiction', appeared in Cambridge Poetry of 1929. Between 1931 and 1934 he was Professor of English at Tokyo University; following a period of writing and study in London, in 1937 he took up a professorship at Peking National University, to which he returned after working in the BBC's monitoring department during the Second World War. From 1953 to 1971 he held the Chair of English at the University of Sheffield. Although he produced only two principal volumes of poetry, Poems (1935) and The Gathering Storm (1940), his acutely individual verse, which combines unsettling emotional power and great intellectual vitality, remains highly valued. His virtuosity in adapting traditional forms gave him particular command of the iambic pentameter as a uniquely flexible vehicle for the detached but quirkily insistent conversational tone he characteristically used. Despite the intimidating complexity of occasional poems like 'High Dive', in which mathematical, literary, and philosophical aspects of his intelligence are imaginatively conflated, his work invariably retains an identifiable centre of humane sensitivity. Collected Poems (revised edition, 1955) contains nothing later than 'Chinese Ballad' of 1952. The dry and ironically recondite manner of his verse is clearly echoed in some of the poetry of the *Movement, notably that of John *Wain, who remarked on Empson's 'passion, logic, and formal beauty'. Empson's career as a critic continued with Some Versions of Pastoral (1935); 'The Child as Swain', its concluding discussion of the extent to which Victorian anxieties inform Lewis Carroll's Alice books, memorably illustrates Empson's practice of relating literary works to their socio-cultural contexts. His minutely precise and revealing style of exegesis was influential in the emergence of the *New Criticism during the 1930s and 1940s; he argued against that school's exclusion of biographical factors in Using Biography (1984), a collection of essays. His other works include The Structure of Complex Words (1951), a wide-ranging exploration of levels of meanings, and Milton's God (1961), in which his antagonism to Christianity is most apparent. Empson's criticism constitutes a major contribution to modern literary discourse, its breadth of reference and analytical clarity attractively complemented by his stimulatingly speculative manner and talent for axiomatic succinctness. Among his numerous posthumously published collections of critical essays are The Royal Beasts (1986) and Argufying (1987), both edited by John Haffenden. William Empson: The Man and His Work (1974) is a collection of essays and memoirs edited by Roma Gill.

Encore, the most notable of the periodicals devoted to the theatre during the post-war decades. It was first published in 1954 by students of the Central College of Speech and Drama; Robert Pinker, Clive Goodwin, and Vanessa Redgrave were founding members of its editorial board. The magazine quickly attracted wide notice after it published Sean O'Casey's controversial treatment of Beckett's Waiting for Godot and was acclaimed by Kenneth *Tynan in the Observer. In 1957 it became independent of the Central School under the management and patronage of Owen Hale. Encore energetically fostered the reputations of John *Osborne, Arnold *Wesker, Harold *Pinter, John *Arden, and other dramatists closely associated with the radical developments in British theatre during the late 1950s; in its commitment to the concept of socially concerned drama, it was equally vigorous in its denunciations of the commercial theatre of London's West End. First editions of numerous plays, including Pinter's *The Birthday Party (1958) and Anne *Jellicoe's The Knack (1962), were published by the magazine, which also ran a valuable series of interviews with many of the playwrights it supported. Charles Marowitz, Lindsay Anderson, Penelope *Gilliatt, and Tom Milne were among the principal contributors. Encore campaigned for the foundation of a National Theatre and was outspoken against the Lord Chamberlain's power of censorship. Having substantially succeeded in its objective of establishing a new British drama, the journal declined and was absorbed by Plays and Players in 1965.

Encounter, a magazine of political, cultural, and literary commentary begun in 1953 under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom (CCF), an organization opposed to communism, which intended Encounter as a forum for the expression of unified Anglo-American opinion. It was originally edited by Irving Kristol and Stephen *Spender, both of whom had renounced their former Marxism; Kristol was predominantly responsible for the magazine's concern with current affairs and politics while Spender determined its literary content. Albert Camus, Arthur *Koestler, Christopher *Isherwood, and C. P. *Snow, whose views on the *'Two Cultures' were expounded in the journal, were among the contributors of essays and articles during its earlier years; poets whose work was published included W. H. *Auden, Edith *Sitwell, Robert *Lowell, Ted *Hughes, and Christopher *Middleton. In 1958 Kristol was succeeded as co-editor by Melvin Lasky, who remained at Encounter until it ceased appearing in 1990 as a result of financial difficulties. Spender, who became American corresponding editor in 1966, resigned his post in 1967 after it was revealed that the magazine had received financial support from the CIA through channels supplied by the CCF. Frank *Kermode, Lasky's London co-editor, also resigned at this point. Subsequent co-editors included D. J. *Enright and Anthony *Thwaite. Encounter was noted for its authoritative discussions of all major international and domestic issues and for the high standard of critical and creative contributions from a wide range of leading writers from Britain, America, and Europe.

Endgame, a play by Samuel *Beckett, originally written in French and published and performed as Fin de Partie in 1957; it was translated into English by the author and published and performed under its present name in 1958. Its two main characters are the blind Hamm, who sits immobile in an armchair, and Clov, who may be his son and may simply be his servant. Its two subsidiary ones are Hamm's grotesque parents, Nagg and Nell, who live in dustbins and feed on dog biscuits. This hideous parody of a family, if family it is, appears to be on the point of disintegration and, in some cases, death. The tyrannical but impotent Hamm issues peremptory commands, demands, and threats, asking among other things for pain-killer, information about an apparently barren and desolate world outside, and 'my coffin'; he tells the story of how he rejected a man desperate for bread for his starving child ('use your head, can't you? You're on earth, there's no cure for that'); and finally he throws away his few props, including the whistle with which he has summoned Clov. Meanwhile, Clov resentfully plays the lackey, mourning his wasted life and confiding that he itches to kill a master whom, at the end, he seems about to desert. The play's meaning cannot be simply summed up; but it would seem that Hamm (perhaps the bloated, importunate body) and Clov (perhaps the tormented mind) are interdependent, and also that the first of them is painfully learning a necessary resignation. In one of his few comments on the play, Beckett said that Hamm is the 'king in a chess game lost from the start ... Now at the end he makes a few senseless moves as only a bad player would. A good one would have given up long ago. He is trying to delay the inevitable end.' The setting, a bare room with two small, high windows shedding 'grey light', has been compared with the inside of a dying man's skull.

End of the Affair, The, a novel by Graham *Greene, published in 1951. Like much fiction concerned with wartime experience, it juxtaposes present loss and remembered fulfilment. These contrasts are sharpened by complexities of structure and point of view unusual in Greene's writing and owed, he suggests, to the influence of *The Good Soldier by Ford Madox Ford. Chapters in the first section enact the wish of the narrator—the novelist Maurice Bendrix—to 'turn back time': each opens with an account of his London life after the Second World War, then resumes memories of his affair with Sarah Miles which began before it and ended during a V-1 raid in 1944. A later section presents another version of the affair in Sarah's diaries, passed on to Bendrix by the private detective, Parkis, whom he hires to find the cause of her apparent desertion. They are a record of love and growing religious faith, in sharp contrast to Bendrix's hatred and envy, and reveal Sarah's promise to renounce their adulterous affair if God returns Bendrix to life after his apparent death in the raid. Later, after Sarah's own death and the miraculous events which seem to surround it, Bendrix tries to resist yet another version of events—the possibility that they were 'plotted' by a God whom he begins to see as a rival not only for Sarah's love, but in his craft as a novelist. This possibility adds to frequent self-reflexive discussion of his writing and the relation of fiction to reality. Despite revisions which emphasize mundane explanations for the apparent miracles, the novel has often been criticized as too influenced by Greene's Catholicism. In one way, its disparate narratives provide the fullest dramatization of his conflicting allegiances, around the time of the war, to the spiritual as well as the secular; to transcendence through religion as well as romance. Yet in another way, Sarah's religion functions simply as further confirmation of the problem Bendrix encounters in discovering her diaries—that 'no human being can really understand another'; that another individual is ultimately inaccessible, even when loved most intimately.

'End of the Tether, The', a story by Joseph *Conrad, serialized in Blackwood's Magazine (1902), and collected in Youth, A Narrative; and Two Other Stories (1902). Conrad's longest short story, it tells of the progressive deterioration of the character of Captain Whalley under the pressure of the financial needs of his beloved daughter and in the face of his oncoming blindness. The story emphasizes Whalley's heroic and honourable past, and it traces his moral corruption through a series of encounters: his lack of frankness with Captain Elliott; his fraudulent agreement with Massy; and his confession to Van Wyck. Through the temporal span of Captain Whalley's long career, the story reflects on the changes that have taken place in the Malay Archipelago, while the remorseless development of the narrative casts doubt upon Whalley's asserted 'boundless trust' in divine justice.

ENGEL, Marian (1933–85), Canadian novelist and short-story writer, born in Toronto; Engel spent her early years in Ontario and attended the Universities of McMaster, where she studied modern languages, and McGill, before winning a scholarship to study French literature in Aix-en-Provence. She subsequently worked in London and Cyprus, a period of her life which provided the inspiration for her novel Monodromos (1973; reissued as One-Way Street, 1974), a study of a divorced Canadian woman's attempt to find a new identity on a Greek island. Engel was a student of Hugh *MacLennan at McGill and her fiction has superficial affinities with the realist mode of MacLennan's writing, but in her best-known work, Bear (1976), she subverts the conventions of realism. The novel is centred on a woman's erotic relationship with a pet bear in the remote setting of the Lake Superior shoreline and suggests the liberating possibilities that both fantasy and the wilderness, usually presented as threatening in early Canadian writing, offer women. Engel also published No Clouds of Glory (1968), The Honeymoon Festival (1970), Joanne (1975), The Glassy Sea (1978), and two short story collections, Inside the Easter Egg (1975) and The Tattooed Woman (1985). She was the first Chairperson of the Writers' Union of Canada, which was founded in 1973.

English Review, The, a literary journal begun in 1908 by Ford Madox *Ford (then Hueffer) in association with various writers including Joseph *Conrad and H. G. *Wells. Increasingly dissatisfied with existing periodicals, Ford was motivated in founding the magazine when Thomas *Hardy's poem 'A Sunday Morning Tragedy' was rejected by other editors. The poem appeared in the first issue, along with work by Henry *James, Wells, Conrad, John *Galsworthy, and others. Under Ford's distinguished editorship, the Review's contributors also included W. B. *Yeats, Violet *Hunt, Arnold *Bennett, and Hilaire *Belloc; among the emerging writers to whom he was hospitable were E. M. *Forster, Ezra *Pound, Wyndham *Lewis, D. H. *Lawrence, and F. S. *Flint. Ford's financial management of the magazine was not, however, satisfactory: his backer Arthur Marwood (a model for Christopher Tietjens in Ford's *Parade's End) withdrew support and Sir Alfred Mond, a wealthy politician, acquired the Review as a platform for liberal reformist opinions; Austin Harrison was installed as editor in January 1910, maintaining literary standards with work from Aldous *Huxley, Herman Hesse, Katherine *Mansfield, Caradoc *Evans, and Bertrand *Russell. In 1923 Harrison was succeeded by Ernest Remnant, whose promotion of a conservative national ideal rendered the Review aridly political. Douglas Jerrold was editor from 1931 to 1935; with T. S. *Eliot among his reviewers, the magazine was noted for the quality of its commentaries on *Modernist writing. The English Review subsequently entered a period of decline and merged with the National Review in 1937.

English Stage Company, The, an organization established in 1955 at the Royal Court Theatre by George Devine (1910–66) and others. Its original aim was to encourage novelists and poets to write drama, and its first production was Angus *Wilson's The Mulberry Bush, but its primary purpose soon became the discovery of socially critical work by young, and usually left-wing, playwrights. Indeed, its presentation of John Osborne's Look Back in Anger* in May 1956 is commonly regarded as the beginning of a British dramatic renaissance which the ESC continued to promote with productions of key work by *Wesker, *Arden, *Bond, *Jellicoe, *Hampton, *Hare, *Brenton, *Matura, *Churchill, and others. According to the then artistic director of the Royal Court, Max Stafford-Clark, the main function of the ESC in 1991 was still to present work 'urgently debating the nature of British society'.

ENRIGHT, D(ennis) J(oseph) (1920–), British poet, born in Leamington, Warwickshire, educated at Downing College, Cambridge. From 1947 onwards he taught at universities in Egypt, Japan, Germany, Thailand, Singapore, and Leeds. In 1971 he joined the publishers Chatto and Windus, becoming a director in 1974. His first collection, The Laughing Hyena (1953), was followed by a succession of volumes which include Addictions (1962), The Terrible Shears (1973), Sad Ires (1975), Paradise Illustrated (1978), A Faust Book (1979), Collected Poems (1981), Selected Poems (1990), The Way of the Cat (1992), and Old Men and Comets (1993); Under the Circumstances (1991) is a volume of 'poems and proses'. In A Faust Book, Enright exemplifies his characteristic ability to combine a theological seriousness with irreverent humour. His experiences of Egypt and the Far East provided material for many of his earlier poems, in which a sense of cultural detachment unites with an understated compassion in his quizzical and ironic reflections on human behaviour. Stylistically, Enright's poetry possesses an eloquent quality which is not diminished by an occasionally conversational tone. His prose autobiography, Memoirs of a Mendicant Professor (1969), is supplemented by Instant Chronicles: A Life (1985), a volume of autobiographical poetry of considerable candour and wit. Among his other prose works are The World of Dew: Aspects of Living Japan (1959), and the novels Academic Year (1955) and Insufficient Poppy (1960). As a critic and literary essayist Enright's publications include The Alluring Problem: An Essay on Irony (1986) and Fields of Vision: Essays on Literature, Language, and Television (1988). Among the works he has edited are Poets of the Fifties (1955), an early anthology of the *Movement; The Oxford Book of Contemporary Verse: 1945–1980 (1980), in which he hoped 'to shake the notion that British poetry of the period has been discreditably or pitiably provincial or parochial'; and The Oxford Book of the Supernatural (1994). Life by Other Means (1990, edited by Jaqueline Simms) is a festschrift of essays marking Enright's seventieth birthday and the breadth of his contribution to literature.

Entertainer, The, a play by John *Osborne, first performed in 1957. It involves Archie Rice, a seedy music-hall comic who regards himself as 'dead behind the eyes . . . I don't feel a thing'. His plan to leave his long-suffering wife, Phoebe, for a much younger woman is aborted after her parents are informed of the affair by his father Billy, a comedian whom Osborne sees as representing the lost decencies of an older generation. Archie's son Mick, a soldier serving in Cyprus, is captured and killed by terrorists. This news brings Archie briefly back to emotional life, and he sings the same heartfelt blues he once heard an old black woman sing in a Canadian bar; but for most of the play he expresses a weary cynicism, whether with his family or when performing to audiences he thinks as dead as himself. His mock-patriotic songs, his advice to the audience not to clap too loud ('it's a very old building'), and a nude Britannia that materializes during his act, indicate that the decline of the music hall is to be identified with a national decline.

ERDRICH, Louise (1954–), American novelist and poet, born in Little Falls, Arizona, to a father of German origin and a Native American mother. She was educated at the Bureau of Indian Affairs boarding school, and later graduated from Dartmouth College. Erdrich's first and highly praised novel, Love Medicine (1984), was the richly poetic story of the interlinked destinies of two Chippewa families. Ranging from 1934 to 1984, it displayed Erdrich's formidable knowledge of Native American history and folklore, and was lauded as a new departure in contemporary American fiction, which was at the time marked by the minimalist trend. Her first collection of poems, Jacklight, also appeared in 1984. Erdrich's next novel, The Beet Queen (1986), covered the same period as its predecessor but was more an American rural novel in the grand tradition of *Faulkner, whose influence Erdrich acknowledges. It was enthusiastically received in Britain by such writers as John *Berger, Angela *Carter, and Marina *Warner, and Erdrich was widely held to be one of the most important American voices of the decade. Tracks (1988), the third volume of what loosely constitutes a tetralogy, presents an explicitly Native American vision of history. The Crown of Columbus (1991), co-authored by her husband, fellow Native American writer and frequent collaborator Michael *Dorris, employs the genre of the research novel and attempts to combine questions of significance to the history of the Americas and their native peoples in a robust adventure story. The Bingo Palace (1994) is the fourth in Erdrich's series of novels chronicling the lives and interlinked fortunes of several Native American and other families. It returns to the characters and situations of much of her previous work; its tone and technique are reminiscent of Love Medicine and The Beet Queen, though its range of voices and narrative span are considerably smaller. See also NATIVE AMERICAN LITERATURE and ETHNICITY.

Erewhon Revisited, Samuel *Butler's sequel to Erewhon (1872), published in 1901. The earlier work describes the experiences of its chief protagonist, whom Erewhon Revisited identifies as Thomas Higgs, in the remote land of Erewhon, the name being an anagram of 'nowhere'. The utopian society in which Higgs finds himself forms the basis for a succession of satires on the religious, social, and moral conventions of Victorian society. Higgs finally returns to England by balloon with his beloved Arowhena Nosnibor, the daughter of an Erewhonian merchant. Erewhon Revisited is narrated by John, the son of Higgs and Arowhena, from his father's records of a return to Erewhon after twenty years. Its central theme reflects Butler's scepticism in The Fair Haven (1873) about the miraculous content of Christianity: Higgs's ascent in the balloon has been mythologized into the official Erewhonian religion of 'Sunchildism', which is threatened with collapse when he reveals his identity during the opening of a new temple. He is arrested, but escapes back over the mountain range isolating Erewhon from the known world. The novel is less wide-ranging than Erewhon, partly as a result of its greater concern with consistency of characterization. Butler felt that difficulties over its publication arose from its potential offensiveness to the Church. George Bernard *Shaw introduced Butler to his publisher, who issued Erewhon Revisited to favourable reviews in October 1901.

ERICKSON, Steve (1950–), American novelist, born in Santa Monica, California, educated at the University of California at Los Angeles. Erickson wrote the 'Guerilla Pop' column for the Los Angeles Reader for three years, also writing for Esquire and Rolling Stone, and has worked as a freelance editor and writer in Europe and Los Angeles. His first novel, Days between Stations (1985), is a tale about Lauren and Michel's search for the latter's identity in a bleak futuristic setting, and establishes Erickson's shifting, surrealistic, near-cinematic style. A similar path, through a blend of science fiction, political fable, and fantastic love story is followed in his next novel Rubicon Beach (1986), in which the slippage of names and identities reinforces the dream-like narrative structure. Tours of the Black Clock (1989) combines past and future, history and fantasy in a narrative where Banning Jainlight becomes Adolf Hitler's pornographer. Leap Year (1989) is his account of the 1988 American presidential election and a parallel narrative about an eighteenth-century woman who chose to remain a slave to Thomas Jefferson in Paris in 1789. Among his recent novels is Arc d'X (1993). Erickson's work has received wide acclaim as examples of *post-modern fiction, especially from such peers as Thomas *Pynchon.

ERIKSON, Erik (Homburger) (1902–), American psychoanalytical author, born of Danish parents in Frankfurt, Germany. His eclectic education included a period as an art student in Munich, followed by study under Anna Freud at the Vienna Psychoanalytical Institute. In 1933 he emigrated to the USA, becoming a naturalized citizen in 1939. Despite his lack of formal qualifications he was welcomed at Harvard, where he conducted research and worked as an analyst at the university's Psychoanalytical Clinic. From 1939 to 1950 he taught at the University of California; he resigned in protest when required to swear an oath of loyalty to the USA as part of the attempted extirpation of communism in the immediate post-war period. He then spent ten years at the Austen Riggs Center in Massachusetts and became Professor of Human Development at Harvard in 1960. His works include Observations on the Yurok: Childhood and World Image (1943), which draws upon his perceptions of Native American culture; Insight and Responsibility (1964), a collection of essays; Gandhi's Truth (1969), a study of non-violent political action; and Toys and Reasons (1977), an investigation of the ritualization of experience. His biography Young Man Luther (1968) presents a sustained analysis of its subject's motivations and character in terms of critical events in his early life. Erikson, whose work is noted for its humane and imaginative character, claimed that he 'came to psychology from art'. Largely for his insistence on the significance of social determinants in the growth of the individual psyche, Erikson is regarded as one of the chief exponents of psychoanalytic theory since Freud. His use of the terms 'identity crisis' and 'life-cycle' in exploring his central concern with the developmental stages of the ego gave them centrality to the modern vocabulary of psychoanalysis.

ERVINE, St John (Greer) (1883–1971), Northern Irish dramatist, born in Belfast of a long-established Ulster family. He made the province the setting of some of his earlier plays, among them Mixed Marriage (1911), about the love of an Orangeman for a Catholic girl, and John Ferguson (1915), about a fundamentalist Protestant farmer whose powerful faith is challenged by his daughter's seduction and the murder of the seducer by his son. Among Ervine's other works for the stage were Jane Clegg (1913), about a strong woman's marriage to a feckless philanderer; The First Mrs Fraser (1929), a drawing-room comedy which brought him his first substantial success in London's West End; and Robert's Wife (1937), about a woman doctor's battle to open a birth-control clinic. Ervine also practised as a drama critic in London and New York and published several novels and biographies, including Bernard Shaw: His Life, Work and Friends (1956).

Essays in Criticism, a quarterly journal founded by F. W. *Bateson in 1951, which continues to be published from Keble College, Oxford. Early issues contained articles by numerous noted critics of varying persuasions, including W. H. *Auden, T. S. *Eliot, Kingsley *Amis, Raymond *Williams, Donald *Davie, John Middleton *Murry, Frank *Kermode, and Hugh *Kenner. In his 'The Function of Criticism' (1953) Bateson reasoned in favour of a critical approach that combined the explicatory precision of the New Criticism with attention to socio-cultural context. The first of Bateson's 'Editorial Commentaries', which ran from 1953 to 1956, defended the journal against allegations that it lacked the binding purpose that had characterized Scrutiny in its earlier years; the limitations of F. R. *Leavis's critical practice were subsequently discussed by Fr Martin Jarrett-Kerr, prompting a reply from Leavis in 'The State of Criticism' in 1954. Robert *Graves, George *Steiner, Edwin *Morgan, William *Empson, C. S. *Lewis, and Geoffrey *Hill were among the contributors who sustained the journal's combination of work by established commentators and stimulating younger authors. From 1954 onward poetry was occasionally featured, work from members of the *Movement appearing repeatedly. In 1974, when Bateson retired to the position of advisory editor, joint editorship was undertaken by Stephen Wall and Christopher *Ricks.

ESSON, Louis (1879–1943), Australian playwright, born in Scotland and taken to Australia as a child. He worked as a journalist for the Bulletin*, the Socialist, and other journals, and also published several volumes of verse, including Bells and Bees (1910) and Red Gums (1912). Following the performance of The Woman Tamer (perf. 1910; pub. 1976), a drama with a Melbourne setting, and the publication of two collections of plays, Three Short Plays (1911) and The Time Is Not Yet Ripe (1912), he went abroad for several years; on visiting the *Abbey Theatre in Dublin, he was encouraged by W. B. *Yeats to set up a national theatre in Australia. As a result of this encounter he established the short-lived but influential Pioneer Players in Melbourne in 1921. Dead Timber and Other Plays (1920) includes his one-act drama 'The Drovers', widely considered a classic of Australian bush literature; The Southern Cross and Other Plays (1946) is a collection of some of his better-known works.

Ethan Frome, an ironic novelette of repressed love in New England, by Edith *Wharton, published in 1911. The novel explores the rural decay of New England, and the way in which the poverty of the surroundings, the harsh climate, and the economic depression affect the lives of its inhabitants. The narrative is recounted by a young engineer, Ethan Frome, a sallow, embittered man, trapped by a strike in a small western Massachusetts town. He has remained with the family's failing farm to care for his father, then his mother, and finally his weak and dependent wife Zenobia (Zeenie). When her young cousin Mattie Silver arrives to stay, Ethan falls in love with her as she revives his life. Contemplating eloping with Mattie, he is prevented by his conscience. As Zeenie jealously orders Mattie out of the house, Ethan and Mattie confess their love for each other en route to the railway station, but recognize its hopelessness. However, after a careless accident with a snow sled, Mattie and Ethan are crippled and she returns with him to convalesce at the farm, where the three of them live out a strained and unpleasant existence.

Ethnicity. The word 'ethnic' has a long history. In the Bible it is used of the 'Gentiles', that is, all those who are not Israelites. Later, it is used to define all those nations who are not Christians or Jews, who are therefore categorized as 'heathens' or 'pagans'. In contemporary Western culture, the term is now used to describe a racial and cultural group, especially one that has migrated into a pre-existent other community, where the issue of integration between the two remains problematic. In this respect the old semantic association between 'ethnic' and 'heathen' or 'pagan' remains volatile, particularly where these terms are used as a vocabulary of discrimination from within the dominant community. Conversely, and especially in twentieth-century America, certain forms of ethnic expression celebrate the longevity of cultural roots in religions and myths held to be pre-Christian, as in the case of much contemporary Native American writing. The relationship between the ethnic and the dominant white Anglo-Saxon Protestant community in America is further complicated by the fact that the dominant community was itself originally an immigrant community; and the later history of European migration to America, of Dutch and German Protestants, Scottish Nonconformists, Irish and Italian Catholics, and East European Jews has made the ingredients of the dominant American culture of the twentieth century diverse and multi-faceted. None the less, from the perspective of other ethnic groups, the dominant white culture of America is seen as exclusionist, another form of the imposition of power over the ethnic citizenry. However, since the 1970s, there have been strenuous institutional efforts to erase the conflicts of otherness inherent in this situation, to enfold the plethora of ethnic experience within the consciousness of mainstream American cultural life. A good example of this is in the endeavour to place 'slave narratives', such as Frederick Douglass's Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass (1845, revised 1892), firmly within the canon of nineteenth-century American literature, to rescue them from the margin to which they have been consigned by a combination of political embarrassment and cultural indifference.

In contemporary America 'ethnic literature' commonly refers to the work produced by four large ethnic groups: African-Americans, Native Americans, Latino-Americans, and Asian-Americans. African-American writing is by and about the community descended from the enslaved black peoples, now an extensive literature with a high cultural profile, particularly since the 1960s. If the history of African-Americans is first inscribed in slave narratives of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and in abolitionist texts such as Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, a remarkable manifestation of the vigour of African-American writing in the twentieth century came in the so-called *Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s, with the work of Countee *Cullen, Langston *Hughes, James Weldon *Johnson, Nella *Larsen, Claude *McKay, Jean *Toomer, and W. E. B. Dubois. This first great wave of African-American writing was followed by important work in all the literary genres in the 1940s and 1950s; many are now rightly regarded not only as addressing that ethnic audience, but as major cultural documents for the whole American community; for example, Zora Neale Hurston's Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937), Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man* (1952), and James Baldwin's Go Tell It on the Mountain* (1953). More recently, the work of African-American writers such as Gayl *Jones, Toni *Morrison, Ishmael *Reed, and Alice *Walker, to name but a few, has achieved popular acclaim and recognition within the mainstream of contemporary American writing. African-American writing is now institutionalized as a subject for study in the universities, and there is a substantial community of scholars, both African-American and white, whose scholarly and critical commentaries on this ethnic writing are now published by the prestigious university presses.

This is also true for the other principal ethnic groups, even if their writing has a briefer historical reach than that of the African-Americans, and as yet a more regionalized presence as an institutionalized subject. The term 'Native American' displaces the white name 'Indians' for the indigenous peoples of North America (equal to the African-American displacement of the word 'negro'). Native American writing became increasingly prominent from the late 1960s, along with the challenge of this ethnic community to the legal and bureaucratic authority of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and is evident in the Kiowan novelist N. Scott *Momaday's House Made of Dawn (1968), the Cheyenne Heyemeyohsts Storm's Winter in the Blood (1974), and the Laguna Leslie Marmon *Silko's Ceremony (1977), the novels of Louise *Erdrich, and the work of poets such as the Blackfoot James *Welch. Anthologies of these and other Native Americans, and scholarly and critical commentary on them, forms an increasingly substantial feature of the contemporary cultural scene in America, a situation also reflected in the new visibility of Latino-American and Asian-American writing. Werner Soller's Beyond Ethnicity: Consent and Descent in American Culture (1986) studies the whole corpus of issues raised by the concept of ethnicity, and the role of ethnic writing in the corporate culture of contemporary America. Eustace and Hilda, a trilogy of novels by L. P. *Hartley, published in 1944, 1946, and 1947, and as a single volume in 1958. Hilda is the dominant older sister of Eustace: the trilogy describes their relationship throughout their lives. The Shrimp and the Anemone (1944) takes its title from the striking opening image, an episode in a characteristically observed childhood seaside holiday. Eustace is a gentle, reflective child with a disastrous willingness to submit to the extrovert and ardent Hilda and an overwhelming need to gain her love and approval. The novel shows the influence of Henry *James and also of Freudian psychology. The second novel, The Sixth Heaven (1946), opens with Eustace at Oxford, but neither financial independence nor the congenial atmosphere of Oxford can release him from Hilda's spell. Desperate to gain her approval, he encourages a love affair between her and his aristocratic friend Stavely, hoping that marriage will both fulfil Hilda and free himself. The final novel, Eustace and Hilda (1947), describes Stavely's betrayal of Hilda: having seduced her he abandons her. Eustace and Hilda are drawn even closer together by catastrophe. The obsessive, destructive nature of their relationship culminates in Eustace's death, seen as a sacrificial offering on his part, the only way in which Hilda can be released. The novel ends with a reference to the shrimp–anemone image. The trilogy, like the later *The Go-Between, is remarkable for its evocation of childhood, based on narrative and incident rather than nostalgia, and its exploration of the influence of childhood experience on adult personality. But it is the spiritual dimension of Eustace's sacrificial pursuit of his sister's fulfilment at the expense of his own—and the complexity of his dependence upon her—that gives the trilogy its place at the head of Hartley's fiction.

EVANS, (David) Caradoc (1878–1945), Welsh short-story writer and novelist, born in Llanfihangel-ar-Arth, Carmarthenshire, though associated with Rhydlewis, the Cardiganshire village where his mother worked a nine-acre smallholding. At 14 he became a draper's assistant. Following evening classes at the Workingmen's College, he began a career as a journalist which culminated in T. P.'s Weekly, which he and Con O'Leary co-edited, with Austin Clarke as colleague. His stories in the English Review, collected in My People (1915), established him as a satirist of compelling originality. Fifteen pared-down stories exploded the myth of pastoral Wales, in a manner recalling fellow Celts, George Douglas *Brown and J. M. *Synge. In Wales his audacious treatment of local community influenced Dylan *Thomas and other writers, for whom My People became the founding text of modern *Anglo-Welsh literature. Capel Sion (1916) and My Neighbours (1920) continued the savage dissection. Controversy clung to Evans as theatre riots disrupted performances of his one play, Taffy (pub. 1924). His first novel, Nothing to Pay (1930), a Swiftian fable of money worship, charted the progress of its miserly anti-hero through the drapery underworld at the turn of the century. His later works include the novella Morgan Bible (1943), and the short story collections Pilgrims in a Foreign Land (1942) and The Earth Gives All and Takes All (1946). Reprints of My People (1987) and Nothing to Pay (1989) have been edited by John Harris, who has also compiled Fury Never Leaves Us: A Miscellany of Caradoc Evans (1985).

EVANS, Margiad, pseudonym of Peggy Eileen WHISTLER (1909–58), British novelist and poet, born in Uxbridge, London, to English parents of Welsh descent. Between 1920 and 1936 she lived at Bridstow, near Ross-on-Wye; following her marriage in 1940 she moved to Llangarron, near Ross, and later to Gloucestershire and Sussex. Her work is permeated with an awareness of her Welsh ancestry and a love of the Welsh Border country to which she felt she belonged. Her first novel, Country Dance (1932), was the story of a woman forced to choose between two lovers, one Welsh, the other English. Written in the form of a journal, it was followed by other idiosyncratic and poetic works, including The Wooden Doctor (1933), Turf or Stone (1934), and Creed (1936), each of which expresses, in one degree or another, the author's concern with human suffering and with man's relationship to God; each includes passages of lyrical and intense writing about love and sex as well as those depicting more violent passions. Her journals and essays were published in Autobiography (1943); short stories were collected in The Old and the Young (1948), and verse in Poems from Obscurity (1947) and A Candle Ahead (1956). In her second autobiographical work, A Ray of Darkness (1952), she wrote movingly and courageously about the onset of her epilepsy and her search for religious belief.

Everyman's Library, a series of 1,000 pocket-sized volumes established in 1906 by the publisher Joseph Malaby Dent, who envisaged it as 'the most complete library for the common man the world has ever seen'. Dent devised the project in consultation with the poet Ernest Rhys, who edited the series until his death in 1946. Fiction, poetry, drama, biography, philosophy, and history were among the thirteen original sections of the library, which was composed exclusively of reprints of masterpieces from the literatures of the world. Boswell's Life of Johnson was the first title to appear; other early volumes included works by Euripides, Plato, Francis Bacon, Coleridge, Jane Austen, and Tennyson. By 1939 more works by twentieth-century authors were included. In 1956 the fiftieth anniversary was marked by the publication of Aristotle's Metaphysics as the thousandth book in the series. Sales of the volumes making up the library since its inception were recorded as exceeding 60,000,000 in 1975. Everyman's Reference Library and Everyman's University Library were introduced in 1951 and 1971 respectively.

EWART, Gavin (Buchanan) (1916–95), British poet, born in London, educated at Christ's College, Cambridge. After active service in the Second World War, he worked in publishing and with the British Council before becoming an advertising copywriter in 1952. From the age of 17, when his poetry was first printed in Geoffrey Grigson's New Verse*, he acquired a reputation for wit and accomplishment through such works as 'Phallus in Wonderland' and his skilful pastiches of *Auden, his principal influence, *Eliot, and *Pound. His first collection, Poems and Songs, appeared in 1939. The war disrupted his development as a poet, however, and he published no further volumes until Londoners of 1964. From then he produced many collections, which included The Gavin Ewart Show (1971), No Fool like an Old Fool (1976), All My Little Ones (1978), The Ewart Quarto (1984), and Penultimate Poems (1989). The Collected Ewart: 1933–1980 (1980) was supplemented in 1991 by Collected Poems: 1980–1990. The intelligence and casually flamboyant virtuosity with which he framed his often humorous commentaries on human behaviour made his work invariably entertaining and interesting. The irreverent eroticism for which his poetry is noted resulted in W. H. Smith's banning of his The Pleasures of the Flesh (1966) from their shops. As an editor he produced numerous anthologies, including the Penguin Book of Light Verse (1980).

Exiles (1918), a play by James *Joyce.

Expressionism, a tendency in the arts during the first three decades of the twentieth century, initially defined in relation to painting and subsequently applied to theatrical, literary, and cinematic works; the term denotes one of the many sub-divisions of *Modernism. Expressionism emerged as a coherent movement in the graphic arts in 1905, when the group named Die Brücke (literally 'the bridge') was formed in Dresden; Emil Nolde (1867–1956), Ernst Ludwig Kirchner (1880–1938), and Max Pechstein (1881–1955) were among its members, while precursors of the style included Vincent van Gogh (1853–90), Edvard Munch (1863–1944), and James Ensor (1860–1949). The evocation of traumatic and oneiric subjective conditions through disquieting heightenings and distortions of actuality in the works of these painters have their equivalents in Expressionist literature. As part of the widespread reaction against naturalism, such writing gave primacy to the projection of internal emotional and psychological states, often of aberrant intensity, resulting in the grotesque, disjunctive, and sometimes hysterical language and imagery typifying literary Expressionism. Essentially a European phenomenon, its most characteristic manifestations were theatrical; works by August Strindberg (1849–1912), Frank Wedekind (1864–1918), and Ernst Toller (1893–1939) disregarded the conventions of dramatic continuity, firmly influencing Bertolt Brecht's early plays and suggesting some of the techniques of his 'epic theatre'. Elmer *Rice's The Adding Machine (1923) was the first Expressionist dramatic work of significance in English. The plays of W. H. *Auden and Christopher *Isherwood, most notably The Dog Beneath the Skin (1935), absorbed much of the spirit of Expressionism through their adaptations of Brechtian practices. Other instances of the movement's impact on drama in English are found in the treatment of the First World War in Sean O'Casey's *The Silver Tassie (1929) and in Eugene O'Neill's *The Emperor Jones (1920). The works of Arthur *Miller and Tennessee Williams retain elements of Expressionism. With reference to prose and poetry in English, the 'Circe' episode of James Joyce's Ulysses (1922) and passages in Wyndham *Lewis's novels employ the phantasmagoric and distorting effects associated with Expressionist literature; the poetries of Ezra *Pound and T. S. *Eliot occasionally suggest Expressionist qualities in exhibiting the deforming energies of emotional pressures, as, for example, in the more dissociative sections of *The Waste Land.

Eyeless in Gaza, a novel by A. *Huxley, published in 1936. Much criticized at the time for its pacifist ideology, it can now be read as an autobiographical, emotionally introspective work which marked Huxley's evolution from satirist to moralist. The carefully shuffled chronology of the novel is crucial in showing the development of Anthony Beavis, a detached observer of human behaviour insistent on his own freedom from commitment, to an awareness of his 'duties towards himself and others and the nature of things'. It opens on 30 August 1933, Beavis's forty-second birthday, then shifts back and forth between 1902 and 1935, covering the death of his mother and the suicide of his ascetic schoolfriend Brian Foxe; sexual affairs with Mary Amberley and subsequently her daughter Helen; the miraculous meeting with Dr Miller whilst in Mexico and consequent involvement in the peace movement. Miller, a vehicle for the ideas of Gerald Heard and F. M. Alexander, urges him to get beyond the ego and practise meditation, self-healing, and pacifism; such analytic musings are incorporated via Beavis's diary entries and reflect Huxley's almost contemporaneous adoption of the Reverend Dick Sheppard's Peace Pledge Union and the Alexander Technique of posture training. Eyeless in Gaza, which ends with a *stream-of-consciousness mystical perception of 'the unity of life', is indicative of the increasingly non-dramatic and prescriptive nature of Huxley's later works.

EZEKIEL, Nissim (1924–), Indian poet, born in Bombay to a Jewish family long resident in India, educated at the University of Bombay. He has held academic posts in Britain, Bombay, and America. Ezekiel's honest response to the challenge of expressing the cosmopolitan culture of which he is a product has made him the most respected of contemporary poets writing in English in India. He has an easy colloquial style, has experimented with Indian English, and varies his tone from a studied neutrality and ironic stance to themes that explore the mystical. Above all, Ezekiel is a poet of the city of Bombay, which is the landscape of all his work and a microcosm of contemporary urban experience. Among his volumes of poems are The Unfinished Man (1960), The Exact Man (1965), and Hymns in Darkness (1976). In Latter Day Psalms (1982), which also contains poems from earlier volumes, Ezekiel treats Old Testament psalms with irony, and explores his own Judaic background. His Collected Poems, 1952–88 appeared in 1989. He has also published Three Plays (1969) and Selected Prose (1992). See Chetan Karnani, Nissim Ezekiel: A Study (1974).

F

Faber and Faber, a leading British publishing house of the twentieth century, especially notable for its contributions to the fields of poetry and drama. With Sir Maurice Gwyer (1878–1952), Sir Geoffrey Faber (1889–1961) founded Faber and Gwyer Ltd in 1925, the two having been in partnership since 1923 as directors of the Scientific Press Ltd. T. S. *Eliot was appointed to the board of directors in 1925, with the result that Faber and Gwyer took over publication of the Criterion; Eliot's acumen was indispensable in the building of the poetry list, which, in addition to his own collections, included much of the work central to the canon of twentieth-century verse: Ezra *Pound, W. H. *Auden, Louis *MacNeice, Stephen *Spender, Wallace *Stevens, Robert *Lowell, Philip *Larkin, Ted *Hughes, and Seamus *Heaney are among the many distinguished poets the company publishes. Following Gwyer's withdrawal in 1929, the name Faber and Faber was adopted; trade had been discouraging in the first four years, but steadily improved between 1930, when sixty titles were published, and 1940, when Faber and Faber issued 177 books. Dramatists whose work appears under the Faber imprint include Samuel *Beckett, Christopher *Hampton, N. F. *Simpson, Ann *Jellicoe, John *Osborne, and Tom *Stoppard. Latterly, the company has been increasingly noted for its contemporary fiction; it also publishes books on archaeology, art, history, literary criticism, music, travel, and a range of other subjects.

Faber Book of Modern Verse, The, an anthology of twentieth-century poetry, edited by Michael *Roberts, published in 1936. The only nineteenth-century poet included was Gerard Manley Hopkins; his influence following the first collection of his work in 1918 was integral to the book's attempt to define the modern movement in terms of technique and sensibility. Roberts's introduction argued that social and moral factors were significant in determining matters of form and content; he suggested that the alleged difficulty of much modern poetry resulted from its authenticity of relation between language, style, and experience in an age of rapid cultural change and religious uncertainty. Passages from Clough are cited as an English precedent for the ironically poised tone in the writings of Ezra *Pound, T. S. *Eliot, and others, and the value of a European literary perspective is emphasized. The introduction is a restrained polemic for what Roberts wished to establish as 'post-*Georgian' poetry; the phrase is used in his correspondence regarding the anthology with Eliot, who, favourably impressed with Roberts's editorship of New Signatures (1932) and New Country (1933), had commissioned him on behalf of Faber to undertake the project. W. H. *Auden, George *Barker, William *Empson, David *Gascoyne, and Dylan *Thomas were among the younger of the thirty-six contributors to the book, which also introduced the work of numerous American poets to a British readership. The anthology was directly instrumental in forming the tastes of succeeding generations of readers. Three revised editions containing additional material appeared under the editorships of Anne *Ridler (1951), Donald *Hall (1965), and Peter *Porter (1982), the last being intended as final.

Fabian Society, a group of socialist intellectuals dedicated to the principle of gradualist reform, which originated as a splinter group from Thomas Davidson's Fellowship of the New Life, a movement devoted to philosophical speculation. Its name was derived from the Roman general Quintus Fabius Maximus, whose delaying tactics in battle earned him the nickname 'Cunctator' or 'the Delayer'. In 1884 the Society was first addressed by G. B. *Shaw, whose Manifesto (1884) was characterized by his distinctive mixture of provocative statement and wit; other tracts arguing for reformist ideas, as opposed to the revolutionary methods advocated by Marxist and Anarchist groups of the period, were also published by Sidney *Webb and his wife, Beatrice, who joined the Fabians at Shaw's instigation in 1885. Fabian Essays in Socialism (1889), edited by Shaw, with designs by Walter Crane and May Morris, did much to popularize socialist ideas. Other early Fabians were Annie Besant, G. D. H. *Cole, E. Nesbit, Edward *Carpenter, Rupert *Brooke, Keir Hardie, Ramsay Macdonald, and Emmeline Pankhurst. Fabians have continued to attract distinguished members drawn from the socialist intelligentsia up to the present day, although its influence has declined with the rise of the Labour Party. Studies include: The Story of Fabian Socialism (1961), by Margaret Cole; The First Fabians (1977), by N. and J. Mackenzie. See also Bernard Shaw, vol. i (1988) by Michael *Holroyd.

FAINLIGHT, Ruth (Esther) (1931–), American poet, born in New York; she attended schools in the USA and England, afterwards studying at Brighton and Birmingham Colleges of Art. Cages (1966), her first substantial collection of poetry, was followed by further volumes including The Region's Violence (1973), Fifteen to Infinity (1983), Selected Poems (1987), The Knot (1990), and This Time of Year (1993). Fainlight's essential qualities as a poet are indicated by her line 'fineness and toughness, my own special markings'; her work combines imagery of precision and delicacy with a resilient sensibility. Much of her poetry is concerned with the social and cultural constraints imposed on women. While her writing generally uses a contemporary realist mode, she has made recurrent use of mythology, most notably in Sibyls and Others (1980). Her translations include Marine Rose (1989), poems from the Portuguese of Sophia de Mello Breyner Andresen. Among her other publications are the volumes of short stories Daylife and Nightlife (1971) and Dr Clock's Last Case (1994). With her husband Alan *Sillitoe she wrote All Citizens Are Soldiers (1969), an adaptation of a play by Lope de Vega.

FAIR, A. A., see GARDNER, ERLE STANLEY.

FAIRBAIRNS, Zoe (1948–), British novelist, born in Tunbridge Wells, Kent, educated at St Andrews University, Scotland. Fairbairns read history at university, and a historian's sensibility may be detected in her preference for a large canvas which crosses time and place to intertwine the experiences of women from different generations and backgrounds. Fairbairns specializes in reworking popular genre from a feminist perspective. In her futuristic dystopia Benefits (1979), feminist revolution is suppressed by a government bent on returning women to their reproductive role. Stand We at Last (1983) adapts the family saga to encompass a century of women's struggles for emancipation. Here Today (1984) takes the crime thriller into the workaday world of the office 'temp'; Closing (1987) turns an ironic lens on the 'Superwomen' of blockbuster fiction; while Daddy's Girls (1991) examines three sisters' teenage years during three political periods. Her novels are notable for their capacity to make current feminist debates accessible to a wide audience. Her short stories have appeared in Tales I Tell My Mother (1978), by Fairbairns et al., and More Tales I Tell My Mother (1987).

FAIRBURN, A(rthur) R(ex) D(ugard) (1904–57), New Zealand poet, born in Auckland and educated at the grammar school there, where he became friendly with R. A. K. *Mason. He travelled widely, doing various jobs, though his period in England from 1930 to 1932 was a disillusioning experience. Upon his return he was an editor, scriptwriter, and university lecturer, and was instrumental in awakening New Zealand sensibility and nationalism; though his status underwent critical reassessment in later years his achievement in this respect is unquestionable. We New Zealanders (1944) was a frank but committed portrait of his country ('This is my country, and I am very glad to belong to it—in spite of everything') while the two poetry collections Strange Rendezvous and Three Poems, both published in 1952, reflect Fairburn's ongoing engagement with issues of politics, humanism, and national identity; typical is the extensive verse satire 'Dominion', first published in 1938. Much important writing from the 1930s was not reprinted until the appearance of his Collected Poems (1966). There is a study, Fairburn (1984), by Denys Trussell, and his Letters (1984) were edited by Lauris *Edmond.

FAIRLIE, Gerard, see SAPPER.

FALKNER, John Meade (1858–1932), British novelist and topographical writer, born in Wiltshire, educated at Oxford University. He worked as a tutor to the children of Sir Alfred Noble, a partner in Armstrong's, the Newcastle armaments company. He was later Noble's secretary and was chairman of Armstrong's from 1915 to 1921. In 1925 he became Honorary Librarian at Durham Cathedral and Honorary Reader in Palaeography at the city's university. The first of his books to appear was Handbook for Travellers in Oxfordshire (1894); Handbook for Berkshire (1902) and Bath in History and Social Tradition (1918) are among his other topographical works, which draw directly on the antiquarian interests reflected in his fiction. The Lost Stradivarius (1896), a complex narrative of the supernatural, features detailed depictions of Oxford and Naples. Moonfleet (1898), which centres on smuggling along the Dorset coast, remains popular as an adventure story for younger readers. His most highly regarded novel is The Nebuly Coat (1903), an imaginatively disquieting account of an architect who is drawn into a murder investigation while conducting church restoration work. Poems (1930), the only collection of his verse, is memorable for its wistfully elegiac adaptations of ballad forms.

FALLON, Padraic (1905–74), Irish poet and playwright, born in Athenry, County Galway. He was a customs official, principally in Wexford, for forty years. Although his poems in anthologies and his writing for radio gained him a reputation as one of the most noteworthy Irish poets in the years following the death of W. B. *Yeats, no independent collection of his verse appeared until Poems (1974). His only other publication was a gathering of his short stories, Lighting up Time (1938). Fallon insisted that his numerous dramatic works, chiefly written for Irish radio, were integral to his achievement as a poet: they include The Vision of MacConglinne, Steeple Jerkin, and The Hags of Clough. His plays, which remain unpublished, were highly acclaimed and later productions were broadcast by the BBC and German and Dutch radio. The history, landscapes, and folklore of Galway inform much of his writing, which has the innate rhythmical and tonal musicality of poetry deriving something of its identity from Gaelic traditions. Although his writing frequently displays metaphysical concerns, it generally maintains a tone of conversational straightforwardness and grounds its imagery firmly in perceived actuality. Collected Poems (1990) is edited by Brian Fallon, who also edited Poems and Versions (1983), which contains Fallon's verse translations of French poetry.

Family Reunion, The, a play by T. S. *Eliot, first performed in 1939, a modern variation on the Orestes story. Harry Lord Monchensey returns to his house, Wishwood, obsessed with the idea that he has killed the manic-depressive wife who was emotionally destroying him, and convinced that he is pursued by 'sleepless hunters that will not let me sleep'. In this loveless, ossified place, he eventually learns that it was his father, not he, who plotted to escape from an oppressive marriage through murder. He rejects the comfortable but stultifying roles offered him by his cold and powerful mother and the other members of his family, embraces the guilt he has inherited while renouncing the remorse he had felt, and leaves to become a missionary, encouraged by Furies he now realizes to be benign, not vindictive. Though the setting is the kind of upper-class drawing room all too familiar to London audiences of the first half of the twentieth century, the subject is a highly unusual one—spiritual self-discovery—and the form equally original. The dialogue consists almost entirely of poetry, itself notable for its bleak, chilly imagery; Harry's uncles and aunts are intermittently transformed into a chorus, commenting fearfully on the action in the Aeschylan mode; and the Furies themselves make a brief appearance. Though Eliot himself later wrote critically of these last two dramatic elements, and was never so adventurous in his subsequent drama, later performances of the play have shown that they may be readily accepted by a generation more accustomed to imaginative theatrical effects and incongruities of style.

Fantasy. A term used to describe the vast range of non-realistic works frequently known as the 'literature of the Fantastic', a phrase which incorporates myths and legends, folklore and fairy tales, allegory, dream stories, *science fiction, utopias, and fantasy itself. Within this framework a fantasy can be described as an internally coherent story dealing with events and worlds which are impossible. This distinguishes fantasy from science fiction which deals with possible (though often improbable) events and worlds. It also distinguishes pure or full fantasy from most supernatural fiction (which includes ghost stories, occult romances, and tales of vampires and werewolves), because supernatural fiction also tends to claim that its subject-matter is occasioned by, or instructs, the real world.

At the heart of fantasy is the kind of story J. R. R. *Tolkien, its greatest exponent, called the fairy tale. By 'fairy' he did not mean small winged creatures, but 'Faerie' itself, the secondary world where marvels occur, a world impossible according to the rules of the real world, but internally coherent. Precursor versions of fully fledged secondary worlds can be found in the works of nineteenth-century writers such as George MacDonald and William Morris, and hints of Faerie illuminate many tales set mostly in the real world including much of the work of Lord *Dunsany. During the twentieth century, full secondary world fantasies have flourished. These include E. R. Eddison's Mercury, C. S. *Lewis's Narnia, and Tolkien's own Middle-Earth. Early American examples of full fantasies include Fritz *Leiber's Lankhmar, and Clark Ashton Smith's Zothique, while noteworthy recent examples have been created by Peter S. Beagle, Terry Brooks, John *Crowley, L. Sprague de Camp, Samuel R. *Delany, Robert Jordan, Ursula *Le Guin, Michael Swanwick, and Roger *Zelazny.

FANTE, John (Thomas) (1909–83), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Colorado; he attended a Jesuit boarding school, then Long Beach City College. His stories appeared in H. L. *Mencken's American Mercury and in popular magazines throughout the 1930s. Wait Until Spring, Bandini (1938) and Ask the Dust (1939) are picaresque novels featuring 'Arturo Bandini', an aspiring writer, the latter set amidst cheap hotels and racially mixed streets in Los Angeles. The stories in Dago Red (1940), rambunctious but with a streak of sentimentality prevalent in his work, offer boyhood angles on Catholicism, baseball, and Italian-American working-class family life. Employment as a Hollywood screenwriter, and diabetes, restricted Fante's output, though Full of Life (1952) was a commercial success. Rediscovery of his early fiction in the late 1970s, led by Charles *Bukowski, encouraged the now blind author to complete The Brotherhood of the Grape (1977), Dreams of Bunker Hill (1982), The Road to Los Angeles (1985), and a volume of letters to Mencken.

FANTHORPE, U(rsula) A(skham) (1929–), British poet, born in Lee Green, London, educated at St Anne's College, Oxford. In 1954 she entered schoolteaching, becoming Head of English at Cheltenham Ladies' College in 1962. She resigned in 1970 in order to further her writing, becoming, in her own words, 'a middle-aged drop-out'; she took temporary jobs and later worked as a clerk in a Bristol hospital. She held an Arts Council Writer's Fellowship between 1983 and 1985 and became Northern Arts Fellow at the Universities of Durham and Newcastle in 1987. Her first full collection, Side Effects (1978), rapidly gained her a considerable reputation for the assurance, originality, and wryly incisive intelligence her work consistently displays. Further volumes include Standing To (1982), A Watching Brief (1987), and Neck-Verse (1992). Fanthorpe's poems often form compellingly developed and sensitively observed treatments of everyday events and situations. Her work as a hospital clerk is the source of numerous poems in which an ironically poised objectivity and a deep compassion combine to great effect. She has also written a number of unusual and sometimes humorously engaging poems reflecting on religious subjects. Selected Poems appeared in 1986.

FARAH, Nuruddin (1945–), Somali novelist, born in Baidoa, in what was then Italian Somaliland, educated at Institution di Magistrale di Mogadishu, and the Universities of London and Essex. He has travelled widely and held academic posts in Europe, the USA, and Africa. His novels, written in English, have been described as political thrillers, but he uses the form to examine not only Somali society and politics, but also family relationships, and the complexities of life in zones of contention among the superpowers. He also analyses the dilemmas of women in traditional society, notably in his first novel, From a Crooked Rib (1970). In A Naked Needle (1976) a poor Somali teacher, 'proud and fanatical' in his simple views, undergoes traumatic disruption in his life when his former girlfriend proposes to return from England. Sweet and Sour Milk (1979), Sardines (1981), and Close Sesame (1983) form a trilogy entitled Variations on the Theme of an African Dictatorship, that of Siad Barre of the Somali Republic. Maps (1984) goes furthest in experimental narrative, but in the process loses none of Farah's political astringency. Gifts (1993) uses love-offerings as a metaphor to explore the psychology and culture of donations and gifts, and the obligations thus created.

Farewell to Arms, A, a novel by Ernest *Hemingway, published in 1929, dramatized in 1930. Set in Italy during the First World War, the novel is concerned with the developing relationship of an English woman and an American. Frederic Henry is wounded whilst serving as a volunteer in the Italian ambulance corps and falls in love with his nurse, Catherine Barkley. During his recovery and after an idyllic summer, she announces that she is pregnant. Refusing to marry him because she fears being sent home, they separate and he returns to the battlefield where he discovers his former comrades suffering from war-sickness. This is followed by a remarkable passage describing the retreat from Caporetto, at the end of which Henry deserts to rejoin Catherine in Stresa. Together they escape to Switzerland, where both she and their baby die during labour, leaving Henry to contemplate his loneliness.

FARMER, Beverley (1941–), Australian short-story writer and novelist, born in Melbourne, educated at the University of Melbourne. Following her marriage to a Greek she lived in Greece for several years before returning to Australia. Her first novel, Alone (1980), deals with the romantic, poeticized lesbian relationship of Shirley, a young woman afraid of heterosexual experience. It was followed by two volumes of short stories, Milk (1983) and Hometime (1985), most of which are about an outsider in the womb-like family nexus of a Greek village, and deal with the problems of being a woman in a patriarchal society and the tensions of a cross-cultural marriage. Her best stories are permeated with sensual impressions of life in a rural Greek community. Place of Birth (1990) contains a selection of stories from these volumes. A Body of Water (1990) was described by its publishers as a novel but is more like a diary, covering the period from February 1987 to February 1988 and incorporating passages of prose, poetry, criticism, and short fiction. The novel The Seal Woman (1992) is based on a Scandinavian legend of undying love; The House in the Light (1995) explores the emotional tempests unleashed by a woman's return to her husband's family in Greece.

FARMER, Philip José (1918–), American novelist of *science fiction and *fantasy, born in Terre Haute, Indiana, educated at Bradley University. His short-story collections such as Strange Relations (1960) and The Alley God (1960), and novels such as Flesh (1960) or The Lovers (1961), were considered daring for their metamorphosizing excursions into the physical nature of sexuality. His later work was more varied, moving from pastiches of J. Verne and K. *Vonnegut, to the sustained Riverworld series of adventures which take place on a long river where historic characters such as Mark Twain, Goering, and Jesus Christ mingle with others brought back to life; among these are Riverworld (1979) and Gods of Riverworld (1983).

FARNOL, Jeffrey (1878–1952), British novelist, born in Warwickshire. He went to the USA in 1902 where he wrote his first novel, The Broad Highway (1910), a picaresque adventure set in Georgian England. He returned to England where The Amateur Gentleman (1913), set in the Regency period, established his career as a best-selling author of more than forty titles, including Beltane the Smith (1913), The Chronicles of the Imp (1915), Our Admirable Betty (1918), The Geste of Duke Jocelyn (1920), Black Bartelmy's Treasure (1920), The Quest of Youth (1927), Over the Hills (1930), and The Jade of Destiny (1948). He had a great gift for story-telling, particularly in describing scenes of low life, but for modern tastes his women characters tend to be rather stereotyped figures of sweetness and virtue.

FARRELL, J(ames) G(ordon) (1935–79), Anglo-Irish novelist, born in Liverpool, educated at Rossall School and Brasenose College, Oxford. As well as travels to the USA, Europe, and the East, he spent several years teaching in France, the setting of his first novel, A Man from Elsewhere (1963). His next novel, The Lung (1965), centres on a victim of poliomyelitis, an illness which Farrell had contracted while at Oxford. A Girl in the Head (1967) is set in an English seaside resort. Farrell's reputation rests on his three major novels exploring Britain's imperial past, sometimes known as the 'Empire Trilogy'. The first of these, Troubles (1970), portrays the world of the ramshackle Anglo-Irish gentry in 1919 at the time of the Irish uprisings. In this, Farrell uses the crumbling Majestic Hotel as a symbol for the dying British Empire and a vanished way of life. The Siege of Krishnapur (1973; Booker Prize), a fable about the façade of British civilization, describes the siege of a British garrison holding a small town during the Indian Mutiny of 1857; the disintegration and the pompous absurdities of imperial protocol are described with characteristic wit and irony. The Singapore Grip (1978), set in 1942, depicts the collapse of the British Empire as a result of the Japanese invasion. As in all his novels, Farrell shows compassion to the wide range of characters caught up in the collapse, particularly those representing the dying order, doggedly maintaining due standards of decorum in situations of death and destruction, such as the chivalrous Major Brendan Archer who plays a major part in Troubles. Meticulously researched and skilfully narrated, Farrell's three major novels combine comedy with suspense, acute observation, and vivid characterization. Farrell was working on his posthumously published novel, The Hill Station (1981), at the time of his death in a drowning accident.

FARRELL, James T(homas) (1904–79), American author, born on the South Side of Chicago, where he lived until he was 27. He was educated at Chicago University, where he wrote the first parts of his famous Studs Lonigan: A Trilogy (1935): comprising Young Lonigan (1932), a *stream-of-consciousness narrative which records the youth as a baseball enthusiast and pupil at a Catholic school living in Chicago's seedy South Side; The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan (1934), which follows the hero through his moral disintegration as the result of contact with the Chicago underworld; and Judgement Day (1935), which recounts his defeat and death. The chief influences on this work appear to be Proust, *Joyce, and *Dreiser, but it also shows interest in US social and economic inequalities. After moving to New York in 1931, Farrell remained constant to his theories of literary naturalism; these are discussed in his critical works A Note on Literary Criticism (1936), which defends his own brand of Marxism, The League of Frightened Philistines (1945), Literature and Morality (1947), and Reflections At Fifty (1954). This style is also evident in his later fictional five-volume series dealing with the life of Danny O'Neill, in A World I Never Made (1936), No Star Is Lost (1938), Father and Son (1940), My Days of Anger (1943), and The Face of Time (1953); and in a three-volume series, Bernard Clare (1946) and its sequels The Road Between (1949) and Yet Other Waters (1952), which deals with a gradually disillusioned New York writer and communist in the 1920s. Apart from these cycles, he wrote many other novels, including Gas-House McGinty (1933), Tommy Gallagher's Crusade (1939), Ellen Rogers (1941), This Man and This Woman (1951), and What Time Collects (1964), whilst The Silence of History (1963) began an uncompleted tetralogy featuring Eddie Ryan, a Chicago University student in 1926, who loses his faith in Catholicism. Farrell's novels often reflect the simple social and religious beliefs of hard-working Irish immigrants and how they are undermined in a later generation by the breakdown of the institutions designed to protect them, particularly the home and the Church. The books turn out as an angry but hopeless tirade against the material density and spiritual aridity of contemporary life. His volumes of short stories include Calico Shoes (1934), Guillotine Party (1935), Can All This Grandeur Perish? (1937), $1,000 a Week (1942), To Whom It May Concern (1944), An American Dream Girl (1950), French Girls Are Vicious (1956), and Dangerous Women (1957). His other writings include My Baseball Diary (1957), his perspective on the sport; a book about a visit to Israel, It Has Come To Pass (1958); and his Collected Poems (1965). FAST, Howard (1914–), American novelist, born in New York City; he spent two years at the National Academy of Design but, convinced that he would never be an artist, he embarked on a career as a writer. His first novel, Two Valleys (1933), established his forte for historical fiction used to promote radical, left-wing politics. Two Valleys is a tale of the American frontier during the Revolutionary War, a historical setting Fast revisited in Conceived in Liberty: A Novel of Valley Forge (1939), The Unvanquished (1942), Citizen Tom Paine (1943), and The Proud and the Free (1950). Like many American intellectuals of his generation Fast was a communist sympathizer during the 1930s, and joined the Party in 1943. His works were immensely popular in the Soviet Union (his novel The Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti, 1953, had an initial Soviet printing of 500,000 copies), but he resigned his membership of the Party in 1957, in part as a consequence of Premier Khrushchev's exposure of the barbarity of the Stalin years, and wrote a valuable account of his relationship to communism in The Naked God: The Writer and the Communist Party (1958); the story is enlarged in Being Red: A Memoir (1990). His other historical novels include The Last Frontier (1941), Freedom Road (1944), The American (1946), Clarkton (1947), and Silas Timberman (1954), all with American settings. Spartacus (1951), Moses, Prince of Egypt (1958), and Agrippa's Daughter (1964) were recreations of the ancient past, though some critics have argued that his attempts to find parallels between the distant past and the present are often anachronistic. Later novels include The Outsider (1984), Immigrant's Daughter (1985), The Dinner Party (1987), and The Pledge (1988). Fast also writes mystery fiction under the pseudonym E. V. Cunningham. FAULKNER, William (1897–1962), American novelist, poet, and short-story writer, born in New Albany, Mississippi, educated at the University of Mississippi; he served with the Royal Air Force in Canada in 1918. Faulkner's great-grandfather, Colonel William Clark Falkner (Faulkner added the 'u' to his surname in 1924), commanded a Southern regiment during the American Civil War and wrote one of the most popular Southern novels of the nineteenth century, The White Rose of Memphis (1881), which went through thirty-six editions; his father owned a livery store and, in later years, became business manager of the state university of Mississippi. The family moved to Oxford, Mississippi in 1902; when Faulkner was five, and it was here that he was educated and spent most of his life. In 1918, after being rejected by the US military, he travelled to New York and, passing himself off as an Englishman, enrolled in the Royal Air Force and was sent to Canada for training; the First World War ended before Faulkner saw active service and he was discharged in December 1918, returned to Oxford, became a student at the University of Mississippi and, whilst there, published poems and drawings in the student newspaper, the Mississippian. Faulkner exerted considerable effort to get his poetry published in book form and, after two years of employment as the fourth class postmaster of the University of Mississippi and several publishers' rejections, he finally succeeded in placing a volume of verse, The Marble Faun (1924), with the Four Seas Company in Boston. By that time he had begun writing prose, and a meeting with Sherwood Anderson, whose influence on young American writers was considerable, in New Orleans in November 1924 is thought by one biographer to be 'perhaps the single most important contact of his literary life' (Faulkner considered Anderson's 'I'm a Fool' second only, as a short story, to Conrad's Heart of Darkness). In January 1925 Faulkner began work on his first novel, Soldier's Pay, and in the summer of the same year he visited Europe, travelling through Italy, France, and, briefly, England before returning to Oxford at Christmas. With the publication of Soldier's Pay in 1926 Faulkner's career as a novelist and short-story writer had begun, and his brief and unsuccessful flirtation with verse, prompted in part by his reading of the French symboliste poets, was quickly forgotten.

Over the subsequent ten years Faulkner wrote a series of novels which have secured his critical reputation as the greatest American novelist of the twentieth century. The key works brought forward as evidence for this claim are *The Sound and the Fury (1929), As I Lay Dying* (1930), Sanctuary* (1931), Light in August* (1932), and Absalom, Absalom!* (1936), though there are many critics who would also admit later works such as Go Down, Moses (1942), Requiem for a Nun (1951), and the *Snopes Trilogy, The Hamlet (1940), The Town (1957), and The Mansion (1959), to the canon of his major achievements. In the 1930s, however, Faulkner did not enjoy great commercial success and in July 1933 he began working in Hollywood, a connection with the centre of the American film industry which was to continue, intermittently, until 1948; his most notable achievements are his screen adaptations of Ernest *Hemingway's To Have and Have Not and Raymond Chandler's *The Big Sleep, both for Howard Hawks. Faulkner was held in high esteem as a novelist in Europe, particularly in France where he was actively promoted by the novelist and philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre, but it was not until the publication in 1946 of The Portable Faulkner, edited by Malcolm *Cowley and containing an immensely influential introduction by Cowley, that his critical reputation in the USA began to grow. In recognition of his contribution to literature Faulkner was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1950. The last twelve years of his life were spent in the limelight that has sometimes attached to literary celebrity in the USA: he travelled on behalf of the State Department to Peru and Brazil in 1954 and to Japan, under the same auspices, in 1955; he was Writer-in-Residence at the University of Virginia and Charlottesville in 1957 and for part of each year from 1958 until his death in 1962. Faulkner was also the recipient of the French Legion of Honour, the O. Henry Award, the National Book Award, and the Pulitzer Prize.

As an imaginative artist Faulkner had an advantage enjoyed by few of his American contemporaries, that of having been born and raised in a complex society, the American South, at a critical period in its transition from a quasi-aristocratic agrarian community to a modern, industrial, and increasingly suburban society (see AGRARIANS). Those features of the 'Old South' which the modern South has slowly, and with varying degrees of success, sought to divest itself of—distinctions of class and race, a manorial social pattern, economic backwardness, one-party politics, a taste for the romantic and the sentimental coupled, contradictorily, with a predisposition to violence as a means of resolving disputes—were the features which provided such fertile soil for Faulkner's imagination. Like Thomas *Hardy, Faulkner began with a narrow corner of a previously uncharted world and peopled it with an immense gallery of characters, so much so that comparisons with the range of fictionally imagined lives in Balzac and Dickens seem entirely appropriate. His treatment of this world encompasses both the grandly tragic and the farcically comic (his prodigious gift for comedy is his most striking novelistic virtue). Much of the fiction of what might be called his 'middle years' is difficult and obscure, and his detractors have frequently criticized the exaggerated and inflated rhetoric of his prose in novels such as The Sound and the Fury and Absalom, Absalom!.

Faulkner's work has been the subject of more critical discussion than that of any other modern American writer, but many of the earlier studies remain the best introductions to his work, notably William Faulkner: A Critical Study (1952) by Irving *Howe, William Faulkner: The Yoknapatawpha Country (1963) by Cleanth *Brooks, and The Achievement of William Faulkner (1966) by Michael Millgate; Robert Penn *Warren's introduction to his edition of critical essays, Faulkner: A Collection of Critical Essays (1966), is one of the best short pieces. Faulkner: A Biography (2 volumes, 1974), by Joseph Blotner, is an immensely detailed account of the life, while William Faulkner: American Writer (1989), by Frederick R. Karl, is a biography containing much valuable critical commentary.

FAULKS, Sebastian (1953–), British novelist, born in Newbury, Berkshire, educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He worked as a journalist for ten years, and in 1986 became Literary Editor of The Independent. His first novel, A Trick of the Light (1984), was followed by The Girl at the Lion d'Or (1989), a love story set in France during the 1930s, and A Fool's Alphabet (1992), in which the Anglo-Italian narrator explores significant moments in his life, chronicling them in the form of an alphabet. Faulks's lucid, understated style and his eye for the details of time and place are shown to advantage in his most ambitious novel, Birdsong (1994), about the First World War, which was widely acclaimed for its sensitive treatment of the central relationship between a young Englishman and a married Frenchwoman, and for its evocation of the horrors of trench warfare.

FAUSET, Jessie R(edmon) (1882–1961), African-American novelist, born in New Jersey, educated at Cornell University, the University of Pennsylvania, and the Sorbonne. She was a high-school teacher and, during 1912–26, an editor of *Du Bois's The Crisis, a periodical associated with the *Harlem Renaissance. As a novelist, she was primarily concerned with the African-American middle class, and its struggle for betterment and for a fair deal from American society. Her novels include There Is Confusion (1924), a romance in which an African-American woman (who wants to be a concert singer) helps her boyfriend in his struggle against racist obstacles to becoming a doctor; Plum Bun (1929), which contrasts the lives of two sisters, one living proudly in Harlem, the other unhappily 'passing for white' in Greenwich Village; The Chinaberry Tree (1931); and Comedy: American Style (1934). She was a pioneer in exposing the experience of African-American women, thereby anticipating such prominent later writers as Alice *Walker and Maya *Angelou.

FEARING, Kenneth (Flexner) (1902–61), American poet and novelist, born in Oak Park, Illinois, educated at the University of Wisconsin. The radical antagonism towards middle-class values expressed in Angel Arms (1929) and Poems (1935), his first two collections of verse, gained him eminence among the American socialist poets of the 1930s; his expansive free verse employs vigorously colloquial diction to frame its blackly humorous and sometimes surreally imaginative views of the desperation underlying normative urban existence. Dead Reckoning (1938) and Afternoon of a Pawnbroker (1943) sustain his tone of relentless disillusion and dissent with increasing deftness in the use of a range of topical idioms, among them the styles of police reports, newspapers, and the dialogue of popular films. His later verse in Stranger at Coney Island (1948) and New and Selected Poems (1956) exhibits a measure of lyrical detachment but remains fundamentally political in its themes. Fearing's bleak socio-cultural vision informs the concern with hypocrisy and corruption central to his novels, the first of which, Hospital (1939), takes a highly sceptical view of medical ethics through its treatment of one hour in the life of a large hospital. Dagger of the Mind (1941) and Clark Gifford's Body (1942) are experimental murder mysteries, the latter's reworking of the story of John Brown forming an allegory of political revolution. The Big Clock (1946), his best-known novel, which hinges on a wealthy publisher's murder of his mistress, was adapted for the cinema in 1948 and has been frequently reprinted.

Federal Theatre Project (1935–9). Founded by the Works Progress Administration (WPA), one of the most productive of Roosevelt's New Deal agencies, it was established to provide work for thousands of theatre workers made idle by the Depression. According to WPA director Harry Hopkins, its secondary aim was to provide 'free, adult, uncensored theatre', but censorship in the form of the House Un-American Activities Committee caused its early demise. The national director of the FTP was Hallie Flanagan, formerly director of the Vassar Experimental Theatre, and her book Arena, the Story of the Federal Theatre (1940) is a lively insider's account of its aims and accomplishments. A national organization of theatre groups which provided a wide variety of inexpensive and good theatre across the nation, its major impact was in New York City, where it drew huge audiences to its productions. FTP companies staged the classical and modern repertoire of plays, and encouraged new writing. Under its broad ethnic approach, black, Catholic, and Jewish projects flourished in New York, but its most successful and controversial achievement was in the *Living Theatre project, which derived from the models of revolutionary workers' theatre in Europe. Much of this work was politically radical, as in Arthur Arent's critique of housing provision One Third of a Nation (1938), Marc Blitzein's left-wing musical The Cradle Will Rock (1938), and Sinclair *Lewis and John Moffit's play about the risks of American fascism, It Can't Happen Here (1936). The extremism of these and other productions led powerful conservative forces to oppose it and Congress abolished the FTP in 1939.

Federal Writers' Project. A branch of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's Works Progress Administration (WPA), the Federal Writers' Project was established in 1935 to sponsor national projects for the relief of unemployed writers. The project employed some 4,500 to 5,000 people and produced a steady stream of books, pamphlets and 'issuances', including the series of guides to American cities and states (celebrated in John *Steinbeck's Travels with Charley in Search of America, 1962). The initiative was praised by W. H. *Auden who said that 'to consider in a time of general distress, starving artists as artists and not simply as paupers is unique to the Roosevelt administration'. It was the organized activities of the project that gave work to writers such as Nelson *Algren, Saul *Bellow, Richard *Wright, and others. The project was under the directorship of Henry G. Alsberg who received the active support of the President's wife, Eleanor Roosevelt, but it was not without its critics, some of whom saw it as a refuge for left-wing intellectuals and artists, or as an unnecessary public expenditure. Like many other New Deal projects the Federal Writers' Project did not survive the Second World War, and funding ceased in 1943. The Dream and the Deal: The Federal Writers' Project, 1935–1943 (1972), by Jerry Mangione, is a history of the project.

FEDERMAN, Raymond (1928–), American novelist and critic, born in Paris, educated at Columbia University and the University of California at Los Angeles. Federman migrated to the USA in 1948 and took American citizenship in 1953. He is generally considered one of the central figures in the 'school' of *post-modernist, anti-realist fiction which began to dominate the American novel in the late 1960s and early 1970s, and his work is often discussed alongside that of contemporaries such as John *Barth, Robert *Coover, William *Gass, Thomas *Pynchon, and Ronald *Sukenick. In Double or Nothing (1971) the authorial role is distributed among a number of different voices, and Take It or Leave It (1976) makes much imaginative use of the typographical character of the printed page (notably in the novel's 'Pretext'); other novels include The Voice in the Closet (1979) and To Whom It May Concern (1990). The Twofold Vibration (1982), a work of political fiction, is generally considered his most innovative novel. His non-fiction prose is collected in Surfiction: Fiction Now and Tomorrow (1981) and Critifiction: Postmodern Essays (1993), while he has also written extensively on Samuel *Beckett, notably in Journeys to Chaos: Samuel Beckett's Early Fiction (1965) and Samuel Beckett (1976), and he has edited Samuel Beckett: The Critical Heritage (1979). He became a Professor of English at the State University of New York. See The Novel as Performance: The Fiction of Ronald Sukenick and Raymond Federman (1986) by Jerzy Kutnick.

FEINSTEIN, Elaine (1930–), British poet and novelist, born in Lancashire of Ukrainian Jewish descent, educated at Newnham College, Cambridge. After working as an editor and a university lecturer Feinstein made her reputation as a poet: her collections include In a Green Eye (1966), The Magic Apple Tree (1971), The Celebrants and Other Poems (1973), The Feast of Euridice (1980), and City Music (1990). Feinstein's early influences were Wallace *Stevens and William Carlos *Williams but her translations of Marina Tsvetayeva and other modern Russian poets became crucial in the development of her own lyrical and narrative voice; Feinstein's acclaimed biography of Tsvetayeva appeared in 1987. The themes of Feinstein's poetry—the individual's striving for identity, the conflicts between personal and public life—also recur in her novels. The first of these, The Circle (1970), is dominated by the consciousness of Lena, whose interior monologue explores the concept of freedom within the close interdependence of marriage. Exile and Jewish consciousness is central to Children of the Ring (1975) and the autobiographical The Survivors (1982). In The Border (1984), Feinstein examines the pressures in a marriage between a poet and a scientist; as Jews, they are in flight from the political oppressions of Austria in the 1930s. Feminism, always an important theme, is brought into sharp focus in Mother's Girl (1987). Lighter in style is All You Need (1989), a lively satire on Thatcher's London. Loving Brecht (1992) traces the fictitious history of one of Brecht's lovers. Other novels include Dreamers (1994), a love story, which portrays European Jewry in the mid-nineteenth century when enlightenment and industrial progress offered hope to the dispossessed, and Lady Chatterley's Confession (1995). A biography, Lawrence's Women, was published in 1993.

FELL, Alison (1944–), Scottish novelist and poet, born in Dumfries, Scotland; she trained as a sculptor in Edinburgh, and moved to London in 1970. Involved for several years with the women's movement, she was a member of the Spare Rib Collective. Her first published work was a novel for children, The Grey Dancer (1981). Her first adult novel, Every Move You Make (1984), was in the realist mode of confessional feminism. Her prize-winning collection of poems, Kisses for Mayakovsky, appeared in the same year. Fell's second novel, The Bad Box (1987), characteristically intertwines myth and realism; it deals with the coming-of-age sexual and creative fantasies of a Scottish teenager.

In the 1990s Fell emerged as one of the women, such as Michèle *Roberts and Marina *Warner, deliberately expanding the frontiers of the British novel. In Mer de Glace (1991) Fell is at her most compelling. Juxtaposing masculine and feminine perspectives, the novel explores an emotional triangle, in which the protagonists are an Irish writer, her American mountain-climbing lover, and the latter's wife. This complex, passionate account is framed in Alpine imagery and mythical allusions. The Pillow Boy of the Lady Onogoro (1994), though it presents Fell's familiar preoccupations with desire and dreams, is a stylistic departure: it is recounted in the manner of a medieval Japanese chronicle, and like the Arabian Nights tells many tales, delicate, cruel, and erotic, within the framework of its principal story. Here Fell indulges her gift for humour, pastiche, and fable, and lends her poet's skills to a celebration of Japanese (and Japanese-inspired) verse forms.

Feminist Criticism. There were, of course, feminists and feminist criticism long before the terms were used with any frequency, but a convenient modern landmark is Virginia Woolf's *A Room of One's Own (1929), perhaps best read in conjunction with her less conciliatory Three Guineas (1938). Woolf addressed the question of women both as writers and as characters in works written by men, concluding that there was a huge discrepancy between the power of fictional or legendary women, like Cleopatra and Clytemnestra, and the powerlessness and virtual invisibility of most of their historical counterparts. Woolf thereby set the agenda for much feminist criticism to follow, whether by exploring and recovering the work of neglected women writers or by examining the (often wildly biased or deeply buried) assumptions behind the portrayal of women in literature. Kate *Millett's Sexual Politics (1971) took the second path with its acrid and funny exhibition of male mythologies in D. H. *Lawrence, Norman *Mailer and others, while Ellen *Moers's Literary Women (1976) and Elaine *Showalter's A Literature of Their Own (1977) revealed and pursued a female tradition of writing, along the lines of Woolf's suggestion that a woman writer can learn from her male predecessors, but cannot get help from them. Meanwhile Simone de Beauvoir, in her enormously influential The Second Sex (1949), had argued that the very idea of woman, as we experience it, is a male creation: an argument giving rise to the polemical claim of later feminists that language itself is masculine. Should women then seek to subvert this language or find a place within it; or should they (can they) form a language of their own? The idea of a specific écriture féminine, associated with the work of Hélène Cixous and Luce Irigaray, is still much debated: celebrated, questioned, parodied. Feminism has become a great force in the later twentieth century, but it is not a single movement: there are many feminisms. It has become customary, though, at least in the West, to think of two main strands of feminist criticism: the Anglo-American, which is practical and sceptical, inclined to view literary theory as a placebo, or institutional delaying tactic; and the French, strongly influenced by *Structuralism and psychoanalysis, inclined to believe that unless our theories are drastically revised, we can only shufffle the cards of the old order. There is little likelihood of an accommodation between the parties, but there are signs that younger feminists are able to take what they need from both sides. It is telling that the utopian project of deconstructing the very opposition between male and female, proposed in different ways by both Cixous and Julia Kristeva, should strongly resemble, at least in a certain reading, Woolf's argument for an ideal androgyny of the writing mind.

FENOLLOSA, Ernest (Francisco) (1853–1908), American orientalist and aesthetician, born in Salem, Massachusetts, educated at Harvard; in 1877 he began teaching at Tokyo University, where he developed a deep interest in Japanese painting. He was appointed Imperial Commissioner of Fine Arts by the Japanese administration in 1886. He subsequently lectured widely in the USA on art education and Japanese art. His numerous works include Imagination in Art (1894), a statement of his aesthetic philosophy, and Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art (edited by M. Fenollosa, 1912). Ezra *Pound was given his papers in 1913, drawing upon them heavily for the translations of Chinese poetry in Cathay (1915) and in the writing of 'Noh' or Accomplishment: A Study of the Classical Stage of Japan (1916). His versions of Noh dramas were used by Pound to prepare Certain Noble Plays of Japan (1916), which carries an introduction by W. B. *Yeats, himself much influenced by Fenollosa's work. In 1936 Pound edited Fenollosa's The Chinese Written Character as a Medium for Poetry, its theories of poetic imagery having informed the poetics of *The Cantos (1987). Fenollosa: The Far East and American Culture by L. W. Chisholm appeared in 1963.

FENTON, James (Martin) (1949–), British poet, born in Lincoln, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. He worked at the New Statesman* from 1971 to 1973, when began two years as a freelance correspondent in Indo-China; All the Wrong Places (1988) is a collection of his despatches from Cambodia during a time of great political and military turbulence. After a period as chief literary critic for The Times he returned to the Far East in 1986 as a correspondent for the Independent. As a poet, Fenton has gained a high reputation for the quality and range of his comparatively slender output; two pamphlets, Our Western Furniture (1968) and Put Thou Thy Tears into My Bottle (1969), were followed in 1972 by Terminal Moraine, a collection widely acclaimed for its originality of tone and conception. Several subsequent pamphlets include A Vacant Possession (1978), which contains numerous intensely atmospheric poems exemplifying his use of fictive modes. Among his other publications are Dead Soldiers (1981) and A German Requiem (1982), to which themes and narratives from his work as a foreign correspondent are central. The Memory of War and Children in Exile: Poems 1968–1983 (1983) demonstrates the scope of his writing, which extends from the open compassion of the treatment of Cambodian refugees in 'Children in Exile' to the surreally disquieting humour of 'The Skip'. His talent for comic verse is displayed in Partingtime Hall (with John *Fuller, 1987), which is notable for its unusual blend of scurrility and erudition.

FERBER, Edna (1885–1968), American novelist, born in Kalamazoo, Michigan. She began her writing career as a cub reporter with a local paper but soon turned to fiction; her first novel, Dawn O'Hara, the Girl Who Laughed, was published in 1911. A prolific writer, she enjoyed popular success with such later novels as the family drama So Big (1924), set on a farm. The colourful Showboat (1926), with its tragic sub-plot of racism and miscegenation, has been filmed and continues to be revived on international musical stages, and is probably her main claim to lasting popularity. Often dismissed as sentimental and didactic—qualities that prevail in the works mentioned above—Ferber has nevertheless been praised for her socio-historical research and authentic portrayals of the American experience in romantic sagas such as Cimarron (1930) and Saratoga Trunk (1941). The immensely successful Giant (1952) is the epic story of a Texas family whose ranch serves as a metaphor for the oil-rich state; this, too, was successfully filmed, and probably influenced *popular culture in the shape of such long-running *soap operas as Dallas. Her last published work was an autobiography, A Kind of Magic (1963).

FERLINGHETTI, Lawrence (1920–), American poet, born in New York, educated at the University of North Carolina, Columbia University, and the Sorbonne. He was the fifth son of an Italian immigrant father and Portuguese mother; on his father's sudden death his mother went insane and was placed in an asylum. He was rescued from a New York orphanage by a relative, and taken to France for several years; after returning to America he was brought up by a family called Lawrence, from whom it appears he took his forename. A major figure in the *Beat movement, with Peter D. Maring he founded the City Lights bookstore in San Francisco in 1952, the first all-paperback bookstore in America, and began to publish City Lights Books and the Pocket Poets Series, and a mimeographed magazine called Beatitude, to denote the beatific dimensions of Beat poetry. He published the work of Allen *Ginsberg, Gregory *Corso, and other young poets, and through his public readings and publication of poems as broadsides did much to create a wider audience for poetry in the 1950s and 1960s. His own first book of poems was Pictures from the Gone World (1953), followed by A Coney Island of the Mind (1958), Starting from San Francisco (1961; revised 1967), The Secret Meaning of Things (1969), Open Eye, Open Heart (1973), Landscapes of Living and Dying (1979), and Endless Life: The Selected Poems (1981). His other works include a novel, He- (1960), translations, political satire, and experimental plays. Ferlinghetti composes in the open verse free forms characteristic of Beat poetry, and his subjects reflect his belief in states of ecstasy available through the spiritual teachings of Zen Buddhism, and the compulsions of love. An equally powerful strain in his work reflects his political disenchantment with American imperialism, and the squalor of its domestic politics. FERMOR, Patrick (Michael) Leigh (1915–), born in London, educated at King's School, Canterbury. From 1935 to 1939 he travelled from Rotterdam to Istanbul; the first two books of a trilogy describing the journey, A Time of Gifts (1977) and Between the Woods and the Water (1985), form a richly evocative record of European social and cultural patterns destroyed by the Second World War. He received the OBE and DSO for his active service in Albania and Greece from 1939 to 1945; he spent two years in occupied Crete organizing guerrilla activities and led the party which captured General Kreipe, the island's German commander. Following a period as director of the British Institute in Athens, he became a freelance writer and translator. He rapidly achieved recognition as a travel writer through the idiosyncratic elegance and vividness of The Traveller's Tree (1950), an account of his experiences in the Caribbean, where his novel The Violins of St Jacques (1953) is set. His translations include The Cretan Runner (1955) by George Psychoundakis. Mani (1958), recording his travels in the Southern Peloponnese, and Roumeli (1966), which deals with Northern Greece, gained him eminence among the travel writers of his generation; the books display his characteristic ability to range fluently between a precisely erudite vocabulary and an energetically lyrical expression of his delight in what he encounters and perceives. Fermor's other works include A Time To Keep Silence (1953), his 'meditations on monastic life', and Three Letters from the Andes (1991), both of which originate in letters to his wife.

FIEDLER, Leslie A(aron) (1917–), American critic, born in Newark, New Jersey, educated at the universities of New York and Madison, Wisconsin. After war service he was, from 1947 to 1963, Professor of English at Montana State University and since then has taught at the University of New York, Buffalo. An End to Innocence: Essays on Culture and Politics (1955) showed Fiedler's polemical flair, and also included 'Come Back to the Raft Ag'in, Huck Honey' (Partisan Review, 1948) whose discussion of 'the erotic archetype' in Melville, Fenimore Cooper, and Twain anticipated his later approach. Love and Death in the American Novel (1960) was a critical landmark, owing as much to Freud as to D. H. *Lawrence in arguing the mythic and gothic status of classic American literature ('books which turn from society to nature or nightmare'). Fiedler's emphasis on the contexts of writing—and his energetic style, full of provocative generalizations—represented a turning away from the *New Criticism. After Waiting for the End (1964), the frontier mythology was examined in The Return of the Vanishing American (1968), ingeniously linking the legends of Pocahontas and 'Rip Van Winkle' to the New Westerns of *Barth, Thomas *Berger, and *Kesey. Fiedler's arrest on a marijuana charge in 1967 occasioned a partial autobiography, Being Busted (1970); he became a popular speaker often regarded, simplistically, as a spokesman for the counter-culture. The Collected Essays (2 volumes) appeared in 1971, A Fiedler Reader in 1977. Amongst the later works are What Was Literature? (1982) and Fiedler on the Roof: Epistle to the Gentiles (1991). His achievement has been to 'define the myths which give a special character to life and art in America'. Mark Royden Winchell's Leslie A. Fiedler was published in 1985.

Field Day Theatre Company, founded in Derry city by Brian Friel and Stephen Rea in 1980. Since staging Friel's play Translations (1980), Field Day has reassessed the borders of its initial identity as a theatre company and has become a broader intellectual project seeking possible cultural and political solutions to the problems of Northern Ireland. With the addition of Seamus *Heaney, David Hammond, Tom *Paulin, and Seamus *Deane, the group inaugurated a series of pamphlets, including Heaney's An Open Letter (1983), Deane's Civilians and Barbarians (1983), and Terence Brown's The Whole Protestant Community (1985), which have sought to re-read Irish history in relation to the current crisis. Intellectuals at one or two removes from the immediate Irish scene, such as Fredric *Jameson, Terry *Eagleton, and Edward

*Said, have also contributed to this debate. More recently, The Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing (1991) has completed a long-term project intended to establish a distinct, heterogeneous, and alternative tradition to that of English Literature.

FIELDING, Gabriel, pseudonym of Alan BARNSLEY (1916–87), British novelist, born in Hexham, Northumbria, educated at Trinity College, Dublin; he practised as a doctor. A descendant of Henry Fielding, and a convert to Catholicism, much of Fielding's work is characterized by an intense feeling for a sinful man's desire for grace and for the battle between the flesh and the spirit. Brotherly Love (1954) introduces the Blaydons, a country clergyman's family; partly autobiographical, it centres on John, and his feelings for his elder brother, David, an Anglican priest who is also an incorrigible and destructive womanizer. The Blaydons reappear in other novels including In the Time of Greenbloom (1956) with its shocking story of the murder of John's young girlfriend. His most successful novel, The Birthday King (1962), set in Germany, reflected Fielding's study of the 'malignance of the Nordic mind' and depicted a riven family, much like the Krupps, who were servants of the Nazi state. Later works, such as Gentlemen in Their Season (1966), New Queens for Old (1972; novellas), Pretty Doll-Houses (1979), and Women of Guinea Lane (1986), were less successful.

FIERSTEIN, Harvey (1954–), American playwright, born in Brooklyn. He came to prominence with the 1981 Off-Broadway production of Torch Song Trilogy which won a Tony award for its 1982 Broadway production; the author starred in both the play and his screen adaptation of 1988. The trilogy consists of three previously produced one-act plays (The International Stud, 1978; Fugue in a Nursery, 1979; Women and Children First!, 1979) and depicts various aspects of gay life and culture. A prominent activist for both AIDS and gay rights, Fierstein also won the 1983 Tony award for his book of the musical version of La Cage aux Folles which, like Fierstein's other work for the stage and screen, explores the lives of the gay and lesbian community as a whole. Safe Sex was produced in New York in 1987. More recently, Fierstein has turned to acting, appearing in various guest roles on American TV, and in the Off-Broadway show The Haunted Host (1991). Among his works for television are Tidy Endings (1988) and Cheers (1992). His feature films include Mrs Doubtfire (1992), White Lies (1993), The Harvest (1992), and Garbo Talks (1984).

FIGES, Eva (1932–), British novelist and cultural critic, born in Berlin; her family moved to England in 1939. She was educated at Queen Mary College, University of London, and has worked as an editor for a number of publishers. Her novels focus on the subjective consciousness and show acute sensitivity to historical realities, and a debt to Kafka. In her rejection of external realism, Figes explains that 'The English social realist tradition cannot contain the realities of my lifetime, horrors which one might have called surreal if they had not actually happened.' The novels tend to be short, intensely poetic, and include Equinox (1966), her first novel; Winter Journey (1967); Light (1983), a portrait of a painter who searches for perfection in the midst of transience; The Seven Ages (1986), about women throughout history; Ghosts (1988), which treats time as a spectral phenomenon; The Tree of Knowledge (1990), a feminist version of the myth of Eden; The Tenancy (1993), a parable of urban disintegration set in a deteriorating house, where women struggle against various forms of intimidation; and The Knot (1996). As a feminist cultural critic, Figes's works include Patriarchal Attitudes: Women in Society (1970) and Sex and Subterfuge: Women Novelists to 1850 (1982). She has edited Women's Letters in Wartime: 1450–1945 (1993), a feminist anthology.

FIGUEROA, John (Joseph Maria) (1920–), Jamaican poet and educator, born in Kingston, and educated at St George's College, Kingston, Holy Cross College, Worcester, Massachusetts, and at London University. He has held academic posts in Britain, the Caribbean, and Nigeria. Religious imagery, occasional allusiveness, classical restraint, and a concern for the 'island folk' characterize much of his poetry, but it is also notable for its sensuousness and vivid painting of landscape. He often counterpoints Creole, Spanish, and Latin with English in poems asserting wide cultural dimensions. Spiritual introspection and sensitivity to the physical are inherent in his work, which has been published in Blue Mountain Peak (1943), Love Leaps Here (1962), and Ignoring Hurts (1976). The Chase: A Collection of Poems 1941–1989 was published in 1992. He edited the pioneering anthology Caribbean Voices (1966; 1976).

FINDLATER, Mary (1865–1963) and Jane (1866–1946), Scottish novelists; they wrote separately, but their three novels written in collaboration (Crossriggs, 1908; Penny Moneypenny, 1911; and Beneath the Visiting Moon, 1923) exceeded their individual productions in both subtlety and intensity. Jane, whose much praised novel The Green Graves of Balgowrie (1896) has a ballad-like quality, endowed the books with their sense of the numinous and the tragic, while Mary provided the social analysis and comedy. Crossriggs, the study of interrelated lives in a village near Edinburgh, is distinguished by a wry humour, the constant play of poetry, and the presence of forces that overtake the individual, above all the sexual. This last is in evidence in Penny Moneypenny, the male protagonist of which is plainly based on Robert Louis Stevenson. Admired by Henry *James and Virginia *Woolf, among others, the Findlater sisters are now seldom read.

FINDLEY, Timothy (1930–), Canadian novelist, born in Toronto. He was an actor and a Hollywood dialogue writer before becoming a full-time author in the early 1960s. He has continued to write for the media, producing radio and television plays and documentaries, usually in collaboration with William Whitehead. Findley's fiction explores boundaries in 'the countries of our invention' between fiction, history, and truth. His first novel, The Last of the Crazy People (1967), is a study of a decadent southern Ontario family, seen through the eyes of an 11-year-old protagonist, who can only find love from a servant and his pet cats. The Wars (1977) and Famous Last Words (1981), the latter taking the form of the personal testament of Ezra *Pound's character Hugh Selwyn Mauberley, are powerful studies of the horrors of twentieth-century history, centred on the two World Wars. Not Wanted on the Voyage (1984) is a vividly inventive reworking of the story of the Great Flood. As Findley puts it, 'Everyone knows it wasn't like that' and ancient myth-making is replaced by contemporary fabulation. He has also published The Butterfly Plague (1969), The Telling of Lies (1986), and Headhunter (1994); a volume of short stories, Dinner along the Amazon (1984); a collection of autobiographical writings, Inside Memory: Pages from a Writer's Workbook (1990); a play, Stillborn Lover (1993); and The Trials of Ezra Pound (1995).

FINLAY, Ian Hamilton (1925–), Scottish poet, graphic artist, and sculptor; born in Nassau in the Bahamas, he grew up in Scotland. During the early 1950s he worked on farms in the Orkneys and began publishing short stories in the Glasgow Herald; The Sea-Bed and Other Stories (1958) contained work notable for its simplicity and symbolic power. The Dancers Inherit the Party (1960), a selection of his 'sophisticated folk poems', impressed critics through its formal economy and openness. In 1961 Finlay founded the Wild Hawthorn Press and produced Glasgow Beasts, An a Burd, a series of sometimes bizarre and amusing poems in Glasgow dialect. He has since published a great many books and pamphlets, among them Stonechats (1967), Butterflies (1973), A Mast of Hankies (1975), and The Errata of Ovid (1983). Jonathan *Raban noted his work's characteristic 'circumspect, private wit that resists condensation into fulsome generalizations'. In 1962 he developed an interest in *concrete poetry, of which he became a leading exponent. After settling at Stonypath in Dunsyre, Lanarkshire, in 1966, he commenced the landscaping of his celebrated 'garden temple', in which poems inscribed on slabs exist in aesthetic interaction with a range of other emblematic art objects, plants, and water. Finlay's productions, which have been widely exhibited, obviate the distinction between poems and graphic or sculptural art works. Both A Wartime Garden (1990; poems and graphics) and The Garden, Little Sparta (1992; prose and poetry) relate to his garden, which has become a cause célèbre through his legal disputes with the local council. Ian Hamilton Finlay: A Visual Primer (1985) by Yves Abrioux lavishly displays the extraordinary range and diversity of his work.

Finnegans Wake, an experimental prose work by James *Joyce, published in 1939. Written in a dense, richly textured, and allusive style, whose punning, fragmentary quality mirrors the free-associating nature of the dreaming mind, the book is perhaps the definitive and most extreme work of literary *Modernism. At once simple and complex, its narrative, which takes place in a single night but also incorporates the whole of human history, describes the relationships between Humphrey Chimpden Earwicker, an Everyman (H.C.E. translates as 'Here Comes Everybody') who is also Adam, his wife, Anna Livia Plurabelle, who is Eve and also the River Liffey, their daughter Iseult/Isobel, and their twin sons, Shem and Shaun, who are also Cain and Abel. Set in Dublin, the entire work is permeated with Irish legend and history, which is seen as an endless cycle of birth, dissolution, and renewal—a view Joyce derived, in part, from his reading of Vico's Scienza Nuova and which is implicit in the book's title, with its play on the dual meanings of the word 'wake'. The work is divided into four sections, corresponding, amongst other things, to the four seasons of the year and the Four Ages of Man, and offers a kind of guided tour around the 'museyroom' of the past, as well as a condensed history of language itself. It has given rise to a vast corpus of critical works and linguistic exegesis, focusing on every aspect of the work: from its use of children's nursery rhymes to its reworking of Homeric legend; from its exploration of the topography of Dublin—'Howth Castle and Environs'—to its exposition of the universal myth of fall and redemption. It is, in Joyce's succinct coinage, a 'funferal', offering, in the words of the Irish-American ballad from which it takes its title, 'lots of fun at Finnegan's wake'.

FIRBANK, (Arthur Annesley) Ronald (1886–1926), British novelist, born in London. His grandfather was a Durham miner who made his fortune as a railway contractor, his father a Unionist MP who was knighted on the accession of Edward VII. His childhood was spent in Chislehurst, a town whose connections with the exiled Empress Eugenie may have fed his enduring fascination with both royalty and Catholicism. His first book, containing the two tales 'Odette d'Antrevernes' and 'A Study in Temperament', was published in 1905. At Cambridge (1906–9) he took no degree but was received into the Catholic Church and pursued an interest in Oscar Wilde that is evident throughout his work. The war years, spent in isolation in Oxford, saw the publication of Vainglory (1915), Inclinations (1916), and Caprice (1917); Valmouth followed in 1919 and his play The Princess Zoubaroff in 1920 (first performed in 1951). Dandyish, frail, heavy-drinking, and intensely shy, he found it hard to readjust to society, and in 1919 for the sake of his health he resumed his pre-war nomadism in southern Europe, North Africa, and the Caribbean. After Santal (1921) came the three major novels of his maturity–like all his work, they are meditations on baffled aspiration and desire: The Flower Beneath the Foot (1923), set in an imaginary Vienna, combines an account of the youthful disappointments of a saint with a tart picture of English literary society in the run-up to a royal wedding; in Prancing Nigger (UK title Sorrow in Sunlight, 1924), set on a Caribbean island, Firbank's negroism finds its most concentrated expression in the sorry adventures of the Mouth family when, driven by Mrs Mouth's social ambitions, they move from the village to the city; in Concerning the Eccentricities of Cardinal Pirelli (1926), the moral and theological unorthodoxy of a great Spanish churchman leads to his exile and death. On his own death in Rome, Firbank left fragments of a novel, The New Rythum (1962), set in New York. From the early The Artificial Princess (posthumously published in 1934) on, his highly idiosyncratic work represents a radical and lonely experiment in form and technique: his books tend to an extreme brevity, his approach to plot is oblique and subversive, his construction seemingly fragmentary, though subject to a firm if baroque discipline. His manner is at once satirical and lyric, absurd and cryptically concentrated. It went largely unappreciated in his lifetime (he paid for the publication of all his books until Prancing Nigger made his name in the USA), but was to be a decisive influence on writers of the generation of Evelyn *Waugh, Anthony *Powell, and W. H. *Auden.

FIRST, Ruth (1925–82), South African journalist, political activist, and theorist, born in Johannesburg, educated at the University of Witwatersrand. She began her writing career as an investigative journalist exposing the grim working conditions of non-white and migrant labourers. She was killed by a letter bomb sent to the Centre for African Studies in Maputo, Mozambique, where she had been research director since 1978. Although she and her husband, Joe Slovo, a leading member of the Revolutionary Council of the African National Congress, were acquitted in the mass treason trials of 1956, during 1963 she was held in solitary confinement; this experience resulted in a classic work of political prison literature, 117 Days: An Account of Confinement and Interrogation under the South African Ninety-Day Detention Law (1965). She later settled in London and was appointed Lecturer in Sociology at the University of Durham. The Barrel of a Gun: Political Power in Africa and the Coup d'Etat (1970), a work of acute political analysis, goes considerably beyond the narrow concerns of an academic specialist, and is one of the most revealing books about Africa in the twentieth century. With Ann Scott she wrote Olive Schreiner (1980), a biography. She is the mother of Gillian *Slovo.

First Men in the Moon, The, a novel by H. G. *Wells, published in 1901. In Wells's only interplanetary novel, two ill-assorted explorers, Mr Cavor and Mr Bedford—the pure scientist and the entrepreneur—travel to the moon in a sphere powered by the mysterious anti-gravity substance Cavorite. After experiencing weightlessness, the miraculous lunar sunrise, and the thinness of the moon's atmosphere, they are captured by the ant-like Selenites and taken below the surface. The moon, they discover, is hollowed out like a vast honeycomb. Bedford escapes and manages to return to earth, while his companion contrives to send back a series of radio messages describing the lunar civilization. The First Men in the Moon is a satiric comedy, much less apocalyptic in tone than Wells's earlier 'scientific romances', and showing his familiarity with the tradition of fantastic lunar voyages going back to Lucian. In its humour, idiosyncrasy, and apparent disregard of technological plausibility Wells's novel anticipates later British scientific fantasies, particularly C. S. *Lewis's Out of the Silent Planet (1938). However, his evocations of the lunar landscape and vegetation and of the sensations of space travel achieve a true sublimity. The final chapters containing Cavor's radio messages were not part of the author's original design. The Selenites' intricate and regimented society presided over by a vast disembodied brain, the Grand Lunar, is portrayed in terms of Swiftian satire, with the beleaguered and credulous Cavor taking the role of Gulliver. Nevertheless, the Grand Lunar's puzzlement on learning that the earth consists of warring nation-states without any co-ordinating world government echoes one of Wells's favourite themes.

First Statement, a Montreal magazine primarily devoted to poetry, founded in 1942 by John Sutherland in association with Robert Simpson, Keith MacLellan, and others. Sutherland is said to have been prompted to begin the journal in response to the rejection of his verse by Preview*; a measure of sometimes antagonistic rivalry existed between the two in the earlier years of their comparatively short publishing histories. In 1945 the magazines merged to form Northern Review, which continued to appear until 1956, although it did not succeed in maintaining the energy and individuality of its predecessors. Whereas Preview favoured the examples of the leading British poets of the 1930s as models for advancing indigenous Canadian poetry, First Statement's contributors were more characteristically influenced by the achievements of Ezra *Pound, William Carlos *Williams, and their followers. A. M. *Klein's work of the early 1940s is notable for satisfying the criteria of both magazines. Louis *Dudek, Irving *Layton, and Raymond *Souster were among the regular contributors of poetry, establishing it as the principal vehicle for the emergence of realist *Modernism in Canadian verse. After its fifth issue the magazine absorbed The Western Free-Lance, thereby significantly increasing its readership. Intended as a fortnightly, it was published irregularly in mimeographed form until Sutherland acquired a printing press in 1943; it subsequently increased in size to include regular book reviews and published short stories more frequently. First Statement Press continued after the journal merged with Preview, publishing numerous valuable editions of poetry, which include Souster's When We Are Young (1946) and Miriam *Waddington's Green World (1945).

FISH, Stanley (Eugene) (1938–), American critic, born in Providence, Rhode Island, educated at the University of Pennsylvania and at Yale. He subsequently held a succession of posts including Professor of English at the University of California and at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, and Arts and Sciences Distinguished Professor of English and Law at Duke University, Durham, North Carolina. John Skelton's Poetry (1965) was widely admired for its reading of Skelton's verse as a record of the poet's psychological and spiritual development. Surprised by Sin: The Reader in 'Paradise Lost' (1967) examined the centrality of individual responses in evaluating the poem; Fish's emphasis on the essentially subjective nature of literary interpretation was sustained in Self-Consuming Artefacts: The Experience of Seventeenth Century Literature (1972) and The Living Temple: George Herbert and Catechizing (1978). Is There a Text in This Class: The Authority of Interpretive Communities (1980) formed a wide-ranging critique of literary theory, which, Fish argued, offered an inflexible and reductive basis for critical discourse by discounting a reader's personal experience of a text; the book was equally provocative in challenging the traditional assumptions of liberal humanism, and gained Fish an international reputation. In Doing What Comes Naturally: Change, Rhetoric and the Practice of Theory in Literary and Legal Studies (1989) Fish's exposition centres on his belief that 'the troubles and benefits of interpretive theory ... disappear in an enriched notion of practice'; the book's twenty-two essays are unified by the view that judgements in literature, law, philosophy, and psychoanalysis remain objectively valid while being necessarily subject to determination by their contexts. There's No Such Thing as Free Speech: And It's a Good Thing Too appeared in 1993; and Professional Correctness: Literary Studies and Political Change in 1995. See also READER-RESPONSE THEORY.

FISHER, Roy (1930–), British poet, born in Handsworth, Birmingham, educated at the University of Birmingham. He has held several teaching posts, including lecturer in American Studies at the University of Keele. The imaginative involvement with Birmingham in much of his writing pervades the impressionistic survey of City (1961), his first collection of poetry. Numerous subsequent volumes have included The Memorial Fountain (1967), The Thing about Joe Sullivan (1978), Running Changes (1983), A Furnace (1986), Poems 1955–1987 (1988), and Birmingham River (1994). Each demonstrates Fisher's development of a highly individual modernist idiom: a commitment to the ethos of experimentation in modern American and European poetry is balanced by a fertile sensitivity to the moods and atmospheres of verse in the English tradition. The poetry which results is remarkable for combining intensely objective description with powerful indications of subjective emotion. A keen sense of the absurd is encountered in his occasional oblique satires. He is also noted for his prose poems, collections of which include Metamorphoses (1970) and The Cut Pages (1971). Anne Cluysenaar has remarked that 'Fisher inhabits a ground of perceptual precisions made taut by a heart-rending, though quiet, sense of inexplicable significance beyond'. He is increasingly recognized as one of the most valuably original British poets to emerge in the post-war era.

FITZGERALD, F(rancis) Scott (Key) (1896–1940), American novelist and short-story writer, born in St Paul, Minnesota. He entered Princeton University at the age of 17 where he took part in a variety of extra-curricular literary and dramatic activities and befriended campus intellectuals like Edmund Wilson. He then joined the army and was posted to Montgomery, Alabama, where he fell in love with Zelda Sayre, a local belle, who refused to marry him when it transpired that he was unable to maintain her in her accustomed lifestyle. Fitzgerald went to New York City in 1919 determined to win her. Revising and completing a novel written at college, he published This Side of Paradise (1920) which was an immediate bestseller, and he became a celebrity overnight. A novel about college life, it was regarded as the voice of the younger generation and the jazz age, in a society increasingly preoccupied with the ideal of youth. A week later he married Zelda. However, their life together was difficult and they proved incapable of handling the pressures of living beyond their means. Living extravagantly at St Paul, Long Island, and New York, Fitzgerald published two collections of short stories, Flappers and Philosophers (1921) and Tales of the Jazz Age (1922), and a second novel, The Beautiful and Damned (1922), concerned with the extravagant and dissolute life led by a wealthy, aristocratic young artist and his wife. In 1924 the Fitzgeralds moved to Europe, and met such figures as *Hemingway, *Stein, and *Pound (see LOST GENERATION, THE). During this time he published his most acclaimed book, The Great Gatsby (1925), and another book of short stories, All the Sad Young Men (1926). To support his failing standard of living he wrote hundreds of stories, many of them collected in Taps at Reveille (1935), Afternoon of an Author (1958), and The Pat Hobby Stories (1962). He became an alcoholic, while Zelda became mentally unstable until in 1930 she broke down, living most of the remainder of her life in mental institutions. In 1931 Fitzgerald returned permanently to the USA, living at first near Baltimore where Zelda was hospitalized. Tender is the Night* (1934), like The Great Gatsby, investigates the illusions engendered by the 'American Dream', the materialist ethic, and the romantic alternatives. By 1937 Fitzgerald's alcoholism had worsened and he turned to Hollywood screenwriting, but his health was ruined and he died of a heart attack at the age of 44. His unfinished novel about a film mogul, The Last Tycoon (1941), was posthumously published by Edmund Wilson, who also edited a miscellany of Fitzgerald's writings entitled The Crack-Up (1945). He also left behind a satirical play, The Vegetable; Or, From President to Postman (1923), and his Letters (1963).

FITZGERALD, Penelope (1916–), British novelist and biographer, born in Lincoln, educated at Somerville College, Oxford. Her father, Edward ('Evoe') Knox, edited Punch from 1932 to 1940; her uncles were Dillwyn Knox, the Greek scholar and cryptographer, and Wilfred and Ronald *Knox, the theologians. Fitzgerald worked at the BBC during the Second World War and began her writing career in her sixties. Her novels draw on her experiences of working as a journalist, in the Ministry of Food, in a Suffolk bookshop, at the Italia Conti Stage School, and at Westminster Tutors, and of living on a Thames barge. The Golden Child (1977) is an entertaining mystery story. The Bookshop (1978) is a wry, sad story of Florence Green's battle with a poltergeist, and with local enemies, when she opens the only bookshop in Hardborough, East Suffolk. Offshore (1979; Booker Prize) is a touching, funny account of the lives of the Chelsea houseboat people in the 1960s, especially the vulnerable Nenna James and her independent daughters Mattie and Tilda. Human Voices (1980) is a splendid comic satire on the BBC's baroque, high-minded wartime bureaucracy, centred engagingly on the new girl from Birmingham, Annie Asra, and her passion for the Recorded Programmes Director. At Freddie's (1982) is set in a 1960s London Stage School with a formidable proprietress. Two later novels move out from Fitzgerald's personal experience to 'a journey outside of myself': Innocence (1986) is set in a Florentine villa of the 1950s, whose family provides a vivid, tragi-comic version of post-war Italy; The Beginning of Spring (1988) is a poignant Anglo-Russian novel in which the sense of imminent momentous change presses in on the domestic concerns of its characters. Her next novel, The Gate of Angels (1990), was followed by The Blue Flower (1995) which deals with the idealized romantic relationship of the eighteenth-century German poet, Novalis, and his pubescent fiancée, Sophie. Fitzgerald has also written lives of Edward Burne Jones (1975), The Knox Brothers (1977), and of Charlotte Mew and Her Friends (1984). Fitzgerald writes short novels because she 'likes economy and compression'. Her style is subtle and subdued, and she writes about quiet characters, stoicism, failure, and misunderstandings. She is interested in peculiar, transitional communities, self-absorbed and on the point of vanishing, which she describes with great deftness, sympathy, and humour.

FITZGERALD, R(obert) D(avid) (1902–87), Australian poet, born in Sydney. A surveyor by profession, Fitzgerald was also involved in the production of the journal Vision* in which his early work appeared. He won wide recognition with his second volume of poems, To Meet the Sun (1929), which contained 'The Greater Apollo' (published separately in 1927), a series of poems meditating upon the opposing themes of transience and reality. Moonlight Acre (1938) contained 'The Hidden Bole', an elegy on the ballet dancer Pavlova, and 'Essay on Memory' which was inspired by the theories of A. N. *Whitehead. Heemskerck Shoals (1949), a dramatic monologue by the seventeenth-century Dutch explorer Abel Tasman, and Between Two Tides (1952), a long narrative poem about a ship's boy from Tonga, exemplified the 'voyager poem' tradition of Australian literature. This Night's Orbit (1953) included 'The Face of the Waters', a meditation on the Creation, and 'The Wind at Your Door' which concerns the flogging of Irish convicts in 1804. Other collections include Southmost Twelve (1962), Forty Years' Poems (1965), Product: Later Verses (1977), and the prose writings in Of Places and Poetry (1976). Kenneth *Slessor regarded Fitzgerald's work as highly influential in the development of modern Australian literature but the philosophical complexity and occasional obscurity of much of his work has prevented Fitzgerald from becoming a popular poet.

FITZMAURICE, George (1878–1963), Irish playwright, born near Listowel, Co. Kerry; his father was a Church of Ireland clergyman and his mother a Catholic. He went to work for the Civil Service in Dublin in 1901, and lived in the city for most of his life, working at the Department of Agriculture. Though less renowned, Fitzmaurice ranks with *Synge and *O'Casey as one of the *Abbey Theatre's most important early dramatists. He began his writing career with peasant comedies. His first play, The Country Dressmaker (1907), was one of the Abbey Theatre's early successes, despite *Yeats's warning that it would bring more trouble than Synge's *The Playboy of the Western World. With his one-act plays The Pie-Dish (1908) and The Magic Glasses (1913), Fitzmaurice started to move away from realistic drama and into a realm of fantasy and experiment, a development which culminated in later works such as The Dandy Dolls, The Enchanted Land, and The Ointment Blue, which were published posthumously in The Collected Plays of George Fitzmaurice (1970). His strange and brilliant imagination is comparable with that of James *Stephens and Flann *O'Brien, but has been unfortunately neglected. Yeats, who never really approved of Fitzmaurice's work, seems to have made life difficult, rejecting several of his plays, including The Moonlighters (1970). After the Abbey's production of Twixt the Giltinans and the Carmodys (1923), Fitzmaurice, sensitive to criticism and more enamoured with fairyland, opted out of the theatrical scene and lived as a recluse. Since his death, the Abbey has recognized his significance and has staged several of his plays, some for the first time.

Fixer, The, a novel by Bernard *Malamud, published in 1967 and winner of the Pulitzer Prize. Malamud based his fiction on the arrest of Mendel Beiliss in 1911, on a charge of murdering a Russian boy. The novel is set in Tsarist Russia, and focuses on the life of a simple non-religious Jew, Yakov Bok, a handyman (or 'fixer'). He attempts to escape the shtetl, his Jewishness, and an unfaithful wife, and leaves for Kiev. There he rescues a man called Lebedev from a physical seizure and is rewarded with employment as an accountant at Lebedev's brickworks. Yakov is discovered living in a Christian area, and accused of the ritual murder of a Gentile child. He has been used as a scapegoat by officials in want of an excuse to start a pogrom. The book charts Yakov's changing emotions and perceptions, and the development of his Jewish and humanitarian consciousness that has resulted from his unjust arrest, prosecution, and torture in a Russian prison, and we are left with Yakov on his way to trial.

FLANAGAN, Mary (1943–), novelist and short-story writer, born in Rochester, New Hampshire, educated at Brandeis University. She moved to Britain in 1969, and the expatriate perspective she employs in some of her work has earned her the inevitable comparisons with Henry *James and *Wharton. Flanagan is, however, a resolutely contemporary writer, as her debut collection of stories, Bad Girls (1984), proved. She has been praised for her skill with the shorter form, in which she displays subtlety, irony, neat plotting, and stylistic economy. Her novels Trust (1987), a study of the relationships of two women and two men, and the modern Bildungsroman Rose Reason (1990) are, by contrast, large in scope and sprawling in structure, ranging over two continents and long timespans. With the whimsical, sometimes surrealistic short fictions collected in The Blue Woman (1994), Flanagan successfully returned to the form in which she made her name.

FLANNERY, Peter (1951–), British dramatist, born in Jarrow, educated at Manchester University. His first successful play, Savage Amusement (1978), involves the search for survival in the slums of a disintegrating Manchester at some unspecified date in the future, and his subsequent work has also been critically concerned with social and political subjects. This includes the epic Our Friends in the North (1982), about corruption in high places, and Singer (1989). The latter, generally regarded as Flannery's most impressive play, principally concerns a character, loosely based on the notorious Peter Rachman, who is incarcerated in Auschwitz, comes as a post-war refugee to Britain, and finds fortune and then disgrace as a slum landlord. But beyond this it is an ambitious attempt, written sometimes in realistic prose, sometimes in Shakespearian pastiche, to combine reflections on the Holocaust and the subject of revenge with satire both of the British upper class and of those who accumulated wealth and power under the Conservative government of Margaret Thatcher. Flannery has also written drama for television, including the series Blind Justice.

Flaubert's Parrot, a novel by Julian *Barnes, published in 1984. With its eclectic mixture of first-person narrative and scholarly digression (also used to effect in Barnes's later The History of the World in 10½ Chapters), the work displays the author's playfully postmodern approach to his subject, which in this instance is the life of Gustave Flaubert. Narrated by a retired doctor, Geoffrey Braithwaite, who is on holiday in France, the novel often reads like an eccentric lexicon of received ideas about Flaubert (an allusion, of course, to the absurd dictionary compiled by the eponymous characters in Flaubert's Bouvard et Pécuchet). Its chapters, which have titles such as 'The Train-Spotter's Guide to Flaubert' and 'The Flaubert Apocrypha', mingle extracts from Flaubert's journals and letters with speculation about the exact colour of Madame Bovary's eyes, the nature of Flaubert's relationship with his mistress Louise Colet, and the identity of the parrot in his short story Un Coeur Simple. Underlying this entertaining mixture of fact and fiction is a more sombre story: Braithwaite's wife, it transpires, has committed suicide, and one of the reasons for his pilgrimage to France is in order to unravel—and perhaps come to terms with—the reasons for this apparently irrational act.

FLECKER, (Herman) James Elroy (1884–1915), British poet, born in Lewisham, London, educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and at Caius College, Cambridge. Having written poetry since the age of 12, his style matured at Oxford, where he absorbed the influences of the aesthetic movement of the 1890s. The Bridge of Fire (1907) was his first collection of verse. In 1910 he entered the Consular Service and was vice-consul in Beirut from 1911 to 1913, when tuberculosis forced him to retire. He died two years later in a clinic at Davos, Switzerland. Among his other volumes of poetry are The Last Generation (1908), Forty-Two Poems (1912), and The Golden Journey to Samarkand (1913), which was widely acclaimed; the middle eastern exoticism of the enduringly popular title poem, given authenticity by his experiences of the region, appealed to the English taste established by Fitzgerald's Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam (1859). While much of his work is characterized by a late romantic sensitivity to beauty and transience, a number of poems, notably 'Oxford Canal', are remarkable for the vividly documentary qualities of their imagery and diction. His verse was featured in the Georgian Poetry* series. Hassan (1922), the best known of his plays, combines poetry, prose, dance, and spectacle and was staged with music by Delius in 1923. Among his other works is The Grecians (1910), a dialogue on education, and The King of Alsander (1914), an unusual and innovative novel. John Sherwood's biography of Flecker, No Golden Journey, appeared in 1973.

FLEMING, Ian (Lancaster) (1908–64), British thriller writer and journalist, educated at Eton and Sandhurst. He worked as a journalist, serving in Moscow, and during the Second World War worked for British Naval Intelligence. These experiences provided the background for his hugely successful series of James Bond novels, beginning with Casino Royale (1953) and including Live and Let Die (1954), Diamonds Are Forever (1956), and On Her Majesty's Secret Service (1963). Fleming's popularity was in part due to the wealth of detail in his novels, in accounts both of the world of espionage and also of exotic lifestyles, locations, and characters, all evoked with wit and expertise. The novels have a degree of self-mockery, which was carried much further in a series of James Bond films, such as Dr No (1962), From Russia with Love (1963), and Goldfinger (1964); owing very little to the novels on which they are based, they also omit the occasional philosophical passages that showed Bond to have had a fatalistic philosophy, a crude but dedicated sense of duty and patriotism, and a view of women and sex that is both exploitative and chauvinistic. Fleming wrote several other books, including Chitty-Chitty-Bang-Bang (1964), for children, which was also filmed. In his introduction to the anthology The Seven Deadly Sins (1962), Fleming revealed some of his personal philosophy. After his death others imitated the Bond style and formula, including Kingsley *Amis in Colonel Sun (1968).

FLEMING, (Robert) Peter (1907–71), British travel writer and military historian, born in London, the brother of Ian Fleming, educated at Christ Church, Oxford. From 1931 onward he wrote for the Spectator; collections of his articles include My Aunt's Rhinoceros (1956) and Goodbye to the Bombay Bowler (1961). Brazilian Adventure (1933), his humorously understated account of an ill-managed expedition to find the lost explorer Colonel Fawcett, established his reputation as a travel writer. An assignment in China for The Times resulted in One's Company (1934), which contained a penetrating critique of communism. The best-selling News from Tartary (1936) is an urbane and self-deprecatingly witty record of his journey from Peking to Kashgar with the Swiss writer Ella Maillart; it exemplified the spirited amateurism which made Fleming an example to Eric *Newby and other succeeding travel writers. After wartime service in Norway, Greece, and India, Fleming turned to military history with Invasion 1940 (1957), a study of Hitler's plans to conquer Britain; his subsequent works included The Siege at Peking (1959), on the Boxer Rebellion, and The Fate of Admiral Kolchak (1963), a study of incidents during the Russian Civil War. Duff Hart-Davis's biography of Fleming appeared in 1987.

FLETCHER, John Gould (1886–1950), American poet, born in Little Rock, Arkansas, educated at Harvard. In 1908 he moved to London and privately published five volumes of his poetry. Following the development of his firm friendship with Amy *Lowell, he emerged as a leading exponent of *Imagism. Irradiations: Sand and Spray (1915) and Goblins and Pagodas (1916) contained musically experimental verse rich in imagery of vivid precision. Japanese Prints (1918), which contained further examples of his Imagist verse, indicated his attraction towards Oriental painting and poetry. The increasingly philosophical concerns of his later work were accompanied by a gradual adoption of more traditional verse forms in a succession of volumes which include Branches of Adam (1926), The Black Rock (1928), XXIV Elegies (1935), and Selected Poems (1938; Pulitzer Prize). In 1933 he returned to Arkansas and became a dominant voice in the *Agrarian movement. The verse collected in The Epic of Arkansas (1936), South Star (1941), and The Burning Mountain (1946) indicates his imaginative commitment to the Agrarian vision of a self-sufficient regional culture. Among his prose works are Paul Gauguin: His Life and Art (1921); The Two Frontiers (1930), a comparison of Russian and American national ideals; and Arkansas (1947), a historical study. Life Is My Song (1937) is an autobiography.

FLINT, F(rank) S(tuart) (1885–1960), British poet, born in Islington, London; he left school at 13 and worked in various capacities before beginning his long and distinguished career in the Civil Service in 1904. By 1910, his intensive private study had gained him recognition as one of Britain's most highly informed authorities on modern French poetry. His first collection of poems, In the Net of the Stars (1909), consisted mainly of conventional love lyrics. His subsequent association with Ezra *Pound and T. E. *Hulme, together with his deepening knowledge of innovative French poetic techniques, radically affected his poetry's development; he became a leading spokesman for *Imagism and exemplified its methods in the concentration and clarity displayed by much of the work in Cadences (1915). Otherworld, his third and last collection, was published in 1920, its lengthy title poem responding to the desolation of the First World War in its meditations on more viable modes of existence. For some years after he ceased publishing poetry, Flint continued to contribute influential articles to the Times Literary Supplement* and *The Criterion. He was also a prolific translator of prose works and poetry by French, German, and classical authors. With the exception of some short works arising from his activities as a civil servant, he ceased writing for publication entirely in the early 1930s.

FLYNN, Tony (1951–), British poet, born in Lancashire, educated at the Universities of Hull and Leicester, subsequently becoming a social worker in Walsall. His collections of poetry include A Strange Routine (1980) and Body Politic (1992); eighteen of his poems appeared in A Rumoured City: New Poets from Hull (1982, edited by Douglas *Dunn). Flynn's early work frequently employs minimalist strategies to produce poems of great concentration implying narratives derived from aspects of his working-class Catholic upbringing. The moral and emotional understatement in such writing is capable of moving effects. His later work exhibits an extended thematic range in its increased use of historical and European elements and its ready adoption of a variety of dramatic monologue modes.

Folding Star, The, see HOLLINGHURST, ALAN.

Fools of Fortune, a novel by William *Trevor, published in 1983. Divided into six sections of decreasing length, the novel is narrated alternately by William, a son of the Protestant Irish gentry, and by Marianne, his English cousin and lover. The third and sixth sections, told in the third person, focus on their daughter. The first section begins in 1918 with William relating the history of his family, the Quintons, who support Home Rule in spite of their Protestant heritage. Through the vicissitudes of local politics, William's father and two young sisters are murdered in an act of revenge, and his sensitive English mother succumbs to despair and alcoholism. The burden of tragedy, and the compulsion to avenge himself, form William's future. In the second section, Marianne tells the story of her adolescent love for William, which leads to pregnancy, separation from her family and roots, and the eventual recognition of the weight of retribution that lies at the core of her life, so closely intertwined through William with the destinies of the Quintons. Whereas in the first section Trevor uses William's voice to create a spare, evocative portrayal of the period described and its context, the second section, tinged with romantic lyricism, has the cadences and resonance of a traditional Celtic ballad. This skilled use of stylistic and narrative diversity is repeated in the third section in which the larger implications of the tragic past are revealed. The brutal reports of William's act of revenge, discovered by his daughter Imelda, who has never known her father, drive her to madness. This sacrifice to the past paves the way for the eventual reconciliation of William and Marianne, who are united in their old age. Their daughter, whose mental affliction is seen by the locals as a gift of healing, is the symbol both of their bond with the Ireland of their past, and their quiet integration into the Ireland of today.

FOOT, Michael (Mackintosh) (1913–), British politician, essayist, and biographer, born in Plymouth, educated at Wadham College, Oxford. He became editor of the Evening Standard before beginning his long and distinguished career as a Labour Member of Parliament in 1945. His historical and biographical studies include The Pen and the Sword (1957), on Jonathan Swift as a political pamphleteer; Aneurin Bevan (2 volumes, 1962, 1973); and The Politics of Paradise (1988), an investigation of Byron's libertarian philosophy. He is highly regarded for the unusual incisiveness and clarity of his essays, which are chiefly collected in Debts of Honour (1980), tributes to writers, politicians, and other figures who assisted or influenced him in various ways, and Loyalists and Loners (1986), biographical and critical appraisals of a wide range of statesmen, journalists, and literary figures. His biography of H. G. *Wells was published in 1995. Michael Foot: A Portrait by Simon Hoggart and David Leigh appeared in 1981. See also Michael Foot (1994) by Mervyn *Jones.

FORCHÉ, Carolyn (1950–), American poet, born in Detroit, educated at Michigan State and Bowling Green universities. Gathering the Tribes (1976), her first collection, was selected for the Yale Younger Poets series. The Country Between Us (1981) made a remarkable impact with its critique of regimes in Eastern Europe and El Salvador. The poems are frequently graphic in their details of imprisonment, torture, and mutilation: a sack full of human ears is spilled out onto a table ('The Colonel'); a boy-soldier peels the face from a corpse and hangs it from a tree ('Because One Is Always Forgotten'). A fine concluding poem, 'Ourselves or Nothing', characteristically balances political concerns with an undercurrent of sensuality. By Forché's own account, the free verse lyric-narratives of her earlier work have given way to a more discordant manner: 'broken, polyphonic, haunted'. This development is apparent in The Angel of History (1994), an intense meditation on the twentieth century's moral disasters, particularly the Holocaust and Hiroshima. Derek *Walcott has commended Forché for 'undertaking the responsibilities of conscience'. She has also edited an anthology by, for, and about the victims and survivors of political repression and violence, Against Forgetting: Twentieth Century Poetry of Witness (1993).

FORD, Ford Madox, formerly Ford Hermann HUEFFER (1873–1939), British novelist and editor, born in Surrey. The son of Dr Francis Hueffer, a music critic on The Times, and grandson of the Pre-Raphaelite painter Ford Madox Brown, Ford's earliest influences were the Pre-Raphaelite artists and writers of his parents' circle including Dante Gabriel Rossetti (about whom he wrote a study in 1902). Ford wrote of this period, '[I] came out of the hothouse atmosphere of Pre-Raphaelism where I was being trained for a genius' (in Memories and Impressions, 1911). His The Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood (1907) offered further insights into the movement. The Brown Owl (1892), a collection of fairy tales, marked the beginning of a highly productive literary career. His influence on the development of modern literature is incalculable, both as an exponent of *Modernist techniques in his own writing, and as an editor whose generous encouragement of other writers and his eye for innovation helped to set the agenda for twentieth-century literature. Ford collaborated with *Conrad in three novels (The Inheritors, 1901; Romance, 1903; and The Nature of a Crime, 1924); during his association with Conrad, which began in 1898, Ford developed a fictional method and theory derived to an extent from Impressionism, but also linked to his reading of Flaubert and Maupassant. Ford published over thirty novels of great diversity, including historical romances, farces, comedies of manners, and studies of contemporary and political life. These include the Fifth Queen Trilogy (The Fifth Queen, 1906; Privy Seal, 1907; The Fifth Queen Crowned, 1908) about the rise and fall of Catherine Howard, the fifth wife of Henry VIII. He has also published volumes of verse, autobiographical works (including Return to Yesterday, 1931; and It Was the Nightingale, 1933), and many works of criticism (notably The March of Literature, 1938). As editor of *The English Review (1908–10) he was the first to publish D. H. *Lawrence and gave support to emergent *Vorticist writers such as *Pound and W. *Lewis. Ford's stormy marriage to Elsie Martindale, with whom he had eloped in 1894, resulted in a scandalous divorce after Ford became romantically involved with the novelist Violet *Hunt in 1908; unhappy marriages and adulterous liaisons were to feature in his major work, *The Good Soldier (1915), which is perhaps the most perfect expression of Ford's Impressionistic technique in his exploration of the 'dark forest' of the human heart. Ford's experience of active service in the First World War, during which he was wounded and sent home in 1917, provided the inspiration for his collection of poems of 1918 and his other major work, Parade's End (published separately as Some Do Not, 1924; No More Parades, 1925; A Man Could Stand up, 1926; and The Last Post, 1928), also known as the 'Tietjens Tetralogy' after its hero, Christopher Tietjens; Ford later wrote that his intention was to show the collapse of the social order in the aftermath of the cataclysm of the Great War. Having moved to Paris in 1922, Ford founded the Transatlantic Review in 1924, which published work by a wide variety of experimental and *Modernist writers (see LOST GENERATION, THE). His final years were spent in Europe and America where he influenced several younger writers, including Katherine Anne *Porter, William Carlos *Williams, and Eudora *Welty. See Ford Madox Ford: A Dual Life (1996) by Max Saunders.

FORD, Richard (1944–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Jackson, Mississippi. Although Southern in origin he is more obviously associated with a group of writers emerging from the MidWest. His first novel, A Piece of My Heart (1976), concerns the quest of two men, one in search of a woman, the other trying to discover the truth about his own past. The Sportswriter (1986) is an evocative and moving study in the collapse and reconstruction of its central character. Independence Day (1995), its sequel, which finds the protagonist in his mid-forties, his so-called 'Existence Period', and now selling real estate, continues Ford's acute portrait of an ordinary man. His other work includes Wildlife (1990), set in Montana during the early 1960s, which deals with the underlying tensions of family life as perceived by 16-year-old Joe, whose parents are on the point of separating after his mother falls in love with another man; and stories, Rock Springs (1988). In Ford's work, dramatic and even violent incidents are conveyed with laconic understatement and a dryly ironic humour. This coolly detached style offsets the sordid or pathetic nature of the subjects described in a manner which recalls *Hemingway's short fiction. Ford has been associated with the '*dirty realist' group of writers of whom Raymond *Carver and Tobias *Wolff are the best-known exponents. Ford is the editor of The Granta Book of the American Short Story (1992).

Foregrounding is a term which was much used by the Russian Formalists (see FORMALISM), but also has a more general history. It refers to the emphasizing or making visible of particular features of a work, often its specifically literary or formal features. Rhyme foregrounds the possibilities of echoes in language, of clashes and consonances between sound and meaning; jokes foreground the role of play in interpretation; a plot full of coincidences reveals and foregrounds the controlling hand of the author. What is foregrounded—either by the writer or by the reader—is usually what was previously thought to be absent, or only a background element or a technical support system. A film, for example, might foreground the placing of the camera; a painting may foreground the painter's own presence in his or her work. We see the language and the labour, the medium, rather than simply use it or look through it.

FORESTER, C(ecil) S(cott) (Cecil Lewis Troughton SMITH) (1899–1966), British writer, born in Egypt; he studied medicine at Guy's Hospital, London. He is remembered as the creator of Horatio Hornblower, who appeared in The Happy Return (1937), the first of a long series of novels set in the Napoleonic Wars, outlining the career of an introspective naval officer, not always fortunate and seldom truly happy, who hates cruelty and loves the Navy, and who rises in rank to Admiral and eventually becomes Lord Hornblower. The Hornblower stories were collected in The Hornblower Companion (1964). Twenty other novels included Brown on Resolution (1929); The Gun (1933), set in the Peninsular War; The African Queen (1935); The General (1936); The Captain from Connecticut (1941); The Ship (1943), a story of the Second World War; and The Sky and the Forest (1948). Films were made of several of the Hornblower stories and of The African Queen, which became a classic film with Katherine Hepburn and Humphrey Bogart.

Formalism is a term generally applied to works of art or critical approaches which highlight formal properties—often, it is characteristically suggested, at the expense of the content of the object in question, so the term has acquired a faintly derogatory note. One solution to this problem has been to argue, as much modern criticism does, that form and content are inseparable, if not the same thing. This move seems to be an exaggerated and simplified version of the more subtle suggestion that form and content are intimately linked, that it is inadvisable to think for long about one without thinking of the other. Critics who cling to the idea of a thoroughly separable content are likely to see all such discussions as versions of the Trojan Horse, varieties of Formalism merely pretending to have an interest in subject matter. The Hungarian critic and philosopher Georg Lukács (1885–1971) suggested that while a little Formalism may lead us away from the content of a work, a more seriously pursued Formalism will bring us back; indeed he argued that form itself may be an aspect of content, that the narrative tactics of a novel, for example, are not merely a vehicle for meaning but are a part of the novel's meaning themselves. We read the form of the narration, whether it is first- or third-person, intimate or distanced, blinkered or omniscient, as a feature of what the narration says.

The most interesting critics and theorists who have been called Formalists—the Russian Formalists working in Moscow and St Petersburg/Leningrad both before and after the Revolution—provide strong support for this practice. They insist on language and form not to distract us from our daily reality but to return us to its particulars, to an awareness of all the details that have become blurred by our habits of perception. Victor Shklovsky (1893–), in a 1917 essay called 'Art as Technique', argued that it is the business of art to make objects unfamiliar, as if we were seeing them for the first time: 'art exists that one may recover the sensation of life'. By a curious paradox, an attention to what Shklovksy calls the 'artfulness' of the object allows us to see the object more rather than less clearly. Other Russian Formalists were Boris Eichenbaum, Boris Tomashevsky, and perhaps most notably Roman Jakobson (1896–1982). In a series of essays and lectures Jakobson developed a theory of the different functions of language, whereby a phrase may have referential, expressive, and poetic purposes, that is, it may refer to the world, express a speaker's feelings, or draw attention to language itself. The poetic function is a *foregrounding not of the message's meaning or mood but of the shape and nature of the message. All of these functions may be in play in the same utterance, although it is likely that one will be dominant at any given moment. The Russian Formalists were interested in what they called 'literariness', an earlier name for the poetic function, which they found in jokes and slogans as much as in high art. The literary/poetic occurs wherever there is visible linguistic play, an irony or pun or symmetry not required by the message. For this reason, as Jakobson insists in an influential paper called 'Linguistics and Poetics' (1958), critics of poetry must study more than poetry. And because poetry itself has other functions beside the poetic, they will need to look at mood and meaning in poetry too. Formalism is not, or does not need to be, an abstract or isolating practice. FORNES, Maria Irene (1930–), American dramatist, born in Havana, Cuba, where she was educated in public schools; she went to the US in 1945 and became an American citizen in 1951. Initially trained as a painter, throughout the 1960s she served a long apprenticeship as a writer and director of Off-Off-Broadway theatre working in an experimental and anti-realist style, developing her distinctive voice within the Actors' Studio in the Judson Poets' Theatre. Her off-beat musical Promenade (1965) was a commercial success. Fefu and Her Friends (1977), widely regarded as her most important play, was performed by the New York Theatre Strategy, an association of women writers to which Fornes was central in the 1970s. Set in the 1930s, the play combines elements of conventional realism with highly innovative techniques to explore the interactive dynamics between eight women who meet in a New England country house to plan a fund-raising event to promote 'art as a tool for learning'. Her prolific subsequent work includes Eyes on the Harem (1979), A Visit (1981), The Conduct of Life (1985), Lovers and Keepers (1986), and And What of the Night (1989).

FORSTER, E(dward) M(organ) (1879–1970), British novelist, critic, and essayist. He was the only child of Edward Forster, an architect, who died nine months after the birth of his son, and Alice 'Lily' Whichelo. Forster's happiest childhood years were spent in Rooksnest, a house near Stevenage, where he was cared for by servants and a loving mother until they moved to Tonbridge in 1893, in order that Forster might attend Tonbridge School as a day boy. His education and post-University travels were financed by his great-aunt, Marianne Thornton, the other major influence on his childhood, who died in 1887, leaving £8,000 in trust for him. Marianne Thornton's father had been a member of the Clapham Sect, an organization whose philanthropic convictions formed part of Forster's liberal heritage. Forster hated Tonbridge School (which reappears as Sawston in his first two novels, and whose cultivation of the 'undeveloped heart' he later satirized in Abinger Harvest). At King's College, Cambridge, where he studied classics then history, he formed some of the friendships that were to sustain him personally and intellectually for most of his life. In 1901 he was elected to the *Apostles, an élite group of young men dedicated to the primacy of art, the intellect, and friendship. They included Bertrand *Russell, Lytton *Strachey, A. N. *Whitehead, Leonard *Woolf, and Desmond *MacCarthy, all of whom were influential in the *Bloomsbury Group, and Hugh Meredith, with whom Forster made his second great discovery: that of homosexual love (the first had been emancipation from the Christianity that had dominated his childhood).

On going down from Cambridge, Forster accompanied his mother on a year-long tour of Italy, taught briefly at the Working Men's College, Bloomsbury, then went on a tour of Greece, all of which provided him with material for his early novels, which satirize the pusillanimity of the English tourist abroad. His literary career began in 1903 with contributions to the Independent Review, launched by Cambridge friends including G. M. *Trevelyan, and in which his first short story, 'The Story of a Panic', was published in 1904. In 1905 he tutored the children of the Countess von Arnim at Nassenheide before returning to England for the publication of his first novel, Where Angels Fear To Tread. In 1906 he and his mother established their home in Weybridge, where they spent the next twenty years. At this time he became tutor to Syed Ross Masood, a Muslim patriot with whom he developed an intense and passionate friendship. Forster's second novel, *The Longest Journey (1907), was followed by *A Room with a View (1908) and the novel that was to establish him as a leading literary figure, Howards End* (1910). Deploying the strengths of realist forms, these novels examine the collision between philistine complacency and unguarded honesty and speak to the desire to 'only connect' rather than to live among fragments. The publication of a collection of short stories, The Celestial Omnibus (1911), brought this period of intense literary activity to a close. Forster was not to publish another book for more than ten years. The intervention of the First World War, two separate visits to India, and an influential meeting with Edward *Carpenter produced a troubled period in Forster's career as a novelist. In 1912 he went to India with R. C. Trevelyan, Goldsworthy Lowes *Dickinson, and G. H. Luce, but once there he travelled north to Aligarh, where Masood became his companion. During this journey he became friendly with the Maharajah of Dewas Senior and began his fictional critique of British colonial behaviour. This was unfinished on his return to England in 1913, when a visit to Edward Carpenter inspired him to write *Maurice, his novel of homosexual love which, although circulated privately, was never published in his lifetime. In 1914, when war broke out, Forster spent some time as a fire-watcher and cataloguer in the National Gallery before removing himself from the mainstream of English culture by working for the International Red Cross in Alexandria. There he became close friends with the Greek homosexual poet Constantin Cavafy, whose work he introduced to the English-speaking world. Forster remained in Alexandria until 1919, when he returned to become literary editor of the left-wing paper the Daily Herald, and to contribute essays and reviews to various periodicals. In 1921 he returned to India as secretary and companion to the Maharajah of Dewas Senior. Alexandria: A History and Guide was published in 1922, although most of the stock was destroyed in a fire before circulation; the book was not republished (in revised form) until 1938.

In 1924 his last novel, *A Passage to India, was published and dedicated to Masood. 'What will he write next?' wrote Virginia *Woolf. That he published nothing more in novel form has been a persistent subject of enquiry. Of his friends who were also his literary contemporaries, Woolf thought he compromised himself as an artist: 'the poet is twitched away by the satirist; the comedian is tapped on the shoulder by the moralist.' D. H. *Lawrence, on the other hand, was teased by a sense of unrealized potential: 'There is so much more in him than ever comes out.' Katherine *Mansfield's verdict was less forgiving: '[he] never gets any further than warming the teapot.' Whether his reasons for abandoning the novel concerned form (realist or modernist: his main influences were Jane Austen, Samuel *Butler, and Marcel Proust) or sexuality (the difficulty in rendering the truths of the relationships most personally important to him in publishable fictional form), Forster thereafter turned to journalism and criticism. In 1927 the Clark Lectures, delivered at Cambridge, were published as Aspects of the Novel. In this highly equivocal commentary on realist techniques he issues the famous comment: 'Yes—oh dear, yes—the novel tells a story.' He outlines his description of 'flat' and 'round' characters, delineates features such as 'story' (dominated by the clock ticking in the background), 'plot' (in which the emphasis falls on causality rather than chronology), yet, on the other hand, identifies 'pattern' and 'rhythm', which draw attention to the underlying pulse of the novel rather than its narrative sequences. The Eternal Moment, a volume of short stories, was published in 1928, his biography of Goldsworthy Lowes Dickinson in 1934, and Abinger Harvest, a collection of essays, in 1936. Forster was offered an honorary Fellowship and a permanent home at King's in 1946, a year after his mother's death. In 1949 he worked with Eric Crozier on the libretto for Benjamin Britten's opera Billy Budd, and refused a knighthood. Two Cheers for Democracy ('there is no occasion to give three') was published in 1951 and The Hill of Devi, a portrait of India through letters and commentary, in 1953. His last book to be published in his lifetime was Marianne Thornton (1956), a biography of his great-aunt. Forster became a Companion of Honour in 1953; he received the Order of Merit in 1969. Maurice was finally published in 1971, a year after his death, and The Life to Come, a collection of short stories, also dealing with homosexuality, in 1972.

Forster has been championed as a kind of liberal saint. His treatment of East–West relationships helped to establish this, but it was confirmed by his activities for PEN, his firm stand against censorship, his campaign against the suppression of Radclyffe *Hall's The Well of Loneliness (1928), and his becoming the first president of the National Council for Civil Liberties in 1934. Late in his career, in 1960, he appeared as a defence witness in the trial against Lady Chatterley's Lover. Both F. R. *Leavis and Lionel *Trilling, although their terms are very different, admired him for his liberalism. Much of the earlier criticism of Forster is dominated by respect for his humanitarianism and his desire to transcend politics through love. Critics in the 1960s, such as Frank *Kermode, began to attend less to his humanism and more to the autonomy of his art, seeking out the formal unity in his texts, privileging their symbolism over their realism. The 1970s saw a new critical emphasis concerned more to unpick the apparent seamless unities, to *dis*connect. This was possibly informed by the appearance of P. N. Furbank's two-volume biography, E. M. Forster: A Life (1977–8), which openly explores his homosexuality. Later work has drawn considerably on the manuscripts held by the University of Texas and which arguably demonstrate the gaps and discontinuities that are part of the creative process. Later criticism has brought into play the perspectives of feminist and subaltern studies in an attempt to tease out the unacknowledged as well as the acknowledged sources of confusion in Forster's texts. Nicola Beauman's biography, Morgan (1993), draws on the textual work in the editions published by the Abinger Press, based on the Texas archive.

FORSTER, Margaret (1938–), British novelist and biographer, born in Carlisle, educated at Somerville College, Oxford. Ever since her early novels, Dame's Delight (1964), the story of a Northern scholarship girl's rebellion against male authority at Oxford, and Georgy Girl (1965), which examined seduction traps and sexual liberation, Forster has tended to use her own circumstances as a starting-point for her fiction, which explores local, domestic, and family conflicts, often using overlapping narratives and different points of view. Books such as The Seduction of Mrs Pendlebury (1974), which brings together the insecurities of the mother of a young child and the emotional isolation of an elderly widow in the neighbouring house, as well as Mother Can You Hear Me? (1979) and Private Papers (1986), both of which expose the hypocrisies which can be used to bolster family life, are characteristic of her work. Her examination of old age, Have the Men Had Enough? (1989), offers an unflinching account of how a family fails to cope with an 'elderly' woman, while a quest for custody raises further issues about the nature of the family in The Battle for Christabel (1991), and a violent assault provokes questions about the conflicting demands of mother-love in Mother's Boys (1994). Her interest in the domestic theatre and mother–daughter relationships lies behind Significant Sisters: The Grass Roots of Active Feminism, 1839–1939 (1984), a collection of short biographies of eight feminist 'heroines'. It may also have started her interest in Elizabeth Barrett Browning, whose biography she wrote and whose poems she edited in 1988, and whose faithful but exploited maid Elizabeth Wilson is the subject of her novel Lady's Maid (1990). Her interest in nineteenth-century literature can be seen in her 'gothic' novel The Bride of Lowther Fell (1980) and also in her tour de force 'autobiography' of William Makepeace Thackeray (1978). She has also published an acclaimed biography, Daphne du Maurier (1993), which draws attention to du Maurier's bisexuality, and Hidden Lives: A Memoir (1995), a portrait of her own, her mother's, and her grandmother's past. Forster's feel for day-to-day existence and her perception for the way in which legend misrepresents reality informs all her writing.

Forsyte Saga, The, a sequence of novels by J. *Galsworthy, published in 1922. Previously published separately as three novels (The Man of Property) 1906; In Chancery, 1920; and To Let, 1921), and two interludes ('Indian Summer of a Forsyte', 1918, and Awakening, 1920), the sequence chronicles the social, financial, and emotional vicissitudes of the Forsyte family whose paterfamilias, Soames Forsyte, epitomizes both the shrewd entrepreneurial virtues and the sexual hypocrisies of late Victorian bourgeois society. The Man of Property opens as Soames, a prosperous solicitor, decides to marry the beautiful but impoverished Irene. As a wedding gift to his bride he commissions a young architect, Bosinney, to build a country house at Robin Hill: Irene, however, falls in love with Bosinney and the two begin an affair. Discovering that his wife feels only revulsion for him, Soames asserts his marital rights over his 'property' by raping her. She attempts to leave him but when Bosinney is killed in a street accident she is forced to return to Soames. In Chancery concerns the developing love between Irene and Soames's cousin, 'young Jolyon' (so named to distinguish him from his father, 'old Jolyon'), and Irene's decision to divorce Soames and marry Jolyon. Further complexities are introduced into the saga when Irene gives birth to a son, Jon, and Soames, who has married Annette Lamotte, becomes the father of a daughter, Fleur. In the final part of To Let, which is set in the 1920s, Fleur and Jon, both ignorant of their parents' unhappy histories, meet and fall in love. Before they marry, Jon learns of his mother's past from Jolyon and breaks off his engagement to Fleur. Bitterly hurt, she marries Michael Mont, a young aristocrat whom she does not love; Jon goes to America where, after Jolyon's death, Irene joins him. Soames meanwhile discovers that his wife, Annette, has been unfaithful and that Irene, the woman he still loves, is lost to him. In the novel's ironic closing episode he discovers that the house, Robin Hill, which has been the scene of so much unhappiness, is not 'to let'. The Forsyte Saga was adapted for television in 1967. A further Forsyte sequence was published as A Modern Comedy (1929).

FORSYTH, Frederick (1938–), British thriller writer, born in Ashford, Kent; he served in the RAF and worked as a journalist and BBC radio and television reporter. His first novel, The Day of the Jackal (1971), the account of an attempt to assassinate de Gaulle, was a runaway bestseller. It was innovatory in its use of detailed, factual accounts—closer to journalism than to fiction—of technical procedures and of illegal activity: for example, how to obtain a false British passport. Forsyth employed the same technique in subsequent, less successful novels (The Odessa File, 1972; The Dogs of War, 1974; The Fourth Protocol, 1984), and it has since been much imitated. His novel The Fist of God (1994) has the Gulf War as its subject. He has also written short stories and a novel, The Shepherd (1975). Most of his thrillers have been made into films.

Fortunes of Richard Mahony, The, a trilogy of novels by Henry Handel *Richardson, consisting of Australia Felix (1917), The Way Home (1925), and Ultima Thule (1929), published in one volume in 1930. Based largely on the life of the author's father, the work describes the central character's life from the early 1850s onwards. Australia Felix opens in 1852, and gives an account of the life of Richard Mahony, a 28-year-old immigrant of Irish extraction, formerly a medical student at Edinburgh University, who now runs a general store in Ballarat. It describes his marriage to Polly Turnham, and develops a panoramic picture of colonial Australian society, focusing on the reversals of fortune to which its members are subject, and ends with the departure of Mahony and his wife for England. The Way Home begins with the couple's arrival in England where Mahony establishes himself as a doctor, before becoming disillusioned with the restrictive social hierarchies of England. He returns to Australia, to find that his investments there have made him rich; after failing to settle into the wealthy society of Melbourne, he takes his family on a Grand Tour of Europe, only to learn that he has incurred financial ruin. Ultima Thule begins with Mahony's arrival back in Australia. After trying to establish a medical practice in Melbourne, he and family move to a small town in northern Victoria; but the practice fails, one of his daughters dies, and Mahony shows signs of mental instability. Eventually his wife leaves, taking the surviving children with her; Mahony follows her, but he deteriorates into madness and, after a period of incarceration in a mental asylum, dies.

For Whom the Bell Tolls, a novel by Ernest *Hemingway, published in 1940. A novel of the Spanish Civil War, in which an American volunteer in the Loyalist forces, Robert Jordan, has been sent into the mountains near Segovia to execute the bombing of a bridge. As he waits with a guerrilla band he encounters Maria, a victim of Fascist attack and rape, and they fall passionately in love. A sense of foreboding develops as the war moves closer and the political differences within the Loyalist camp are seen to be impeding the war effort. Ordered to retreat, Jordan nevertheless blows up the bridge but is wounded in the retreat. As he lies dying on a hillside he awaits the arrival of the Fascists, determined that he will shoot their leader. His final thoughts are: 'I have fought for what I believed in for a year now. If we win here we will win everywhere.' The book is remarkable for its scope and descriptive powers, and for Hemingway's attempt to reproduce the speech of the guerrillas. Its title derives from John Donne's sermon which contains the lines: 'No man is an Iland, intire of it selfe; every man is a peace of the Continent . . . And therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; It tolls for thee.'

FOSTER, David (1944–), Australian writer, born in Sydney, educated at the University of Sydney and the Australian National University. His work eschews realism for satirical allegory, parable, and comic pastiche and has attracted critical attention for its exuberant inventiveness. His first novel, The Pure Land (1974), centres on three generations of an Australian family beginning with Albert Manwaring, a photographer who leaves Australia for America in search of fulfilment; this is followed by the experiences of his daughter in England, and finally those of his grandson who returns to Australia. Moonlite (1981) is a political satire set partly in nineteenth-century Scotland and partly in the Australian colonies; Plumbum (1985) is a satire about 'The Last Great Heavy Metal Rock Band of the Western World'. Dog Rock (1985) is narrated by the postman of a country town and features a series of murders; the story continues in The Pale Blue Crotchet Coathanger Cover (1988). His other works include The Adventures of Christian Rosy Cross (1986), Mates of Mars (1991), and A Slab of Fosters (1994); Testostero (1987), a pastiche of Goldoni's The Venetian Twins; Escape to Reality (1977), short stories; The Hitting Wall (1989), two novellas; and The Fleeing Atalanta (1975), a collection of poems.

Four Quartets, the last of T. S. *Eliot's major poetic works, first published in its entirety in New York in 1943. Each of its four sections, which sustain a meditation on the temporal and eternal orders of reality, reflects one of the four seasons and draws concrete and associational imagery from the location whose name supplies its title: 'Burnt Norton' is a Cotswold house the poet initially visited in 1934; 'East Coker' is a Somerset village with which Eliot had ancestral connections; 'The Dry Salvages' is a rock formation off Cape Ann, Massachusetts, which served him as a marker when sailing as a boy; and 'Little Gidding' is the Huntingdonshire Manor where Nicholas Ferrar established his community in 1625. With the exception of 'Burnt Norton', which concluded Eliot's Collected Poems, 1909–1935 (1936), the successive parts first appeared in the New English Weekly in 1940, 1941, and 1942 respectively. The poems' expression of the continuity of values amid the uncertainty of the Second World War gained them a wide readership and reinforced Eliot's reputation. The sequence originated in lines discarded from Murder in the Cathedral (1935), 'Time present and time past | Are both perhaps present in time future', which form the opening of 'Burnt Norton'; Eliot's theatrical work is also echoed in the restrained declamatory tone which gives the sequence the quality of a poised dramatic monologue enacting the shifting movement of thought. Each of the four parts has within it five divisions providing a structure for parallel developments from the opening statements of themes suggested by local context through to the hesitant resolutions of the conclusions; in the case of 'Little Gidding' the ending is more climactically affirmative, envisioning the moment out of time when 'the fire and the rose are one'. 'Little Gidding' is also notable for fusing evocations of wartime London with more purely imaginative elements, an achievement exemplified in its Dantean encounter with 'a familiar compound ghost' in deserted streets after an air-raid.

FOWLER, H(enry) W(atson) (1858–1933), English lexicographer and grammarian, born in Tonbridge, Kent, educated at Balliol College, Oxford. After retiring as a schoolmaster on an issue of principle, he wrote literary essays for periodicals, including those collected in Popular Fallacies (1904) and Between Boy and Man (1908). With his brother, Francis George Fowler (1870–1918), he wrote The King's English (1906), a popular work of grammar and lexicography, and compiled the Concise Oxford Dictionary of Current English (1911). The brothers joined the 'Sportsmen's battalion' in 1915, but Francis died of consumption before the war ended. Henry Fowler's best-known work, Fowler's Dictionary of Modern English Usage (1926), had been planned with his brother. The entries are short, occasionally idiosyncratic, essays illustrating the correct and incorrect usage of familiar words. He also compiled the Pocket Oxford Dictionary of Current English (1924). See Robert *Burchfield, The Fowlers: Their Achievements in Lexicography and Grammar (1979).

FOWLES, John (1926–), British novelist and essayist, born in Leighton-on-Sea, Essex, educated at New College, Oxford. Fowles was a teacher in France and Greece (which resurface as landscapes in his fiction), there increasing his knowledge of classical and contemporary philosophies, and assimilating the French literary influences absorbed during his university years. His first novel, The Collector (1963), was a best-seller, and was made into a film by William Wyler two years later. His second published work, The Aristos: A Self Portrait in Ideas (1964), was an extended essay elucidating Fowles's evolving personal credo in the context of explorations of other philosophies, notably existentialism, which seems to have had some influence on him, as have the ideas of Jung. In spite of Fowles's avowed left-wing sympathies, the self-confessed élitism of his non-fictional debut has inspired some controversy, engaging as it does with the foundation of right-wing thought. Fowles continued his preoccupations in The Magus (1966; revised 1977), set on a vividly evoked Greek island. In an atmosphere of mystery, fantasy, and obsession, the novel concerns an Englishman, Nicholas Urfe, who obtains a teaching post on the island, and his involvement with an enigmatic Greek millionaire and his entourage; with its mythological dimension the novel suggests *magic realism, and in the agnostic fatalism of its ending point, Greek tragedy. Fowles's move to Lyme Regis in Dorset initiated the compelling sequence of images immortalized in his best-known work, *The French Lieutenant's Woman; the novel was filmed by Karel Reisz in 1981. His other works of fiction include The Ebony Tower (1974), a collection of short fiction, significant for its skilled craftsmanship; Daniel Martin (1977), a portrait of a modern man, with marked autobiographical overtones; Mantissa (1982), an erotic satire on Fowles's own previous imaginings of the artist and his anima/muse; and A Maggot (1985), an ambitious historical novel with a powerful element of fantasy. While not enjoying the success of The French Lieutenant's Woman, these novels nevertheless continue to be the focus of much literary debate. Fowles is also the author of such short works on natural history as Islands (1978) and The Tree (1980), and A Short History of Lyme Regis (1982).

FRAME, Janet (1924–), New Zealand writer, born in Dunedin, educated at Otago University and Dunedin Teachers' Training College. Early stories were published in The Lagoon (1951, revised 1961). Faces in the Water (1961) drew creatively and with harrowing directness upon her many years of incarceration in institutions for the mentally ill. Frame left New Zealand in 1956, and lived for many years in England and the USA before returning to New Zealand. Her first novel, Owls Do Cry (1957), explored the borders of madness and 'reality' in a small-town New Zealand setting; The Edge of the Alphabet (1962) extended such concerns. Frame's writing has consistently pursued complex, indeed often by definition inexpressible, questions of human communication; later work includes Intensive Care (1970), Daughter Buffalo (1972), Living in the Maniototo (1979), and You Are now Entering the Human Heart (1983). Her three-volume autobiography, To the Is-Land (1983), Angel at My Table (1984), and The Envoy from Mirror City (1985), was widely acclaimed. In her largely New Zealand-set novel The Carpathians (1988), Frame again probes complex and profoundly disturbing issues of human identity, communication, and fulfilment in terms which also question the conventions and limits of the fictional form employed. Frame's poetry is collected in The Pocket Mirror (1967). Critical assessments are collected in Jeanne Delbaere's Bird, Hawk and Bogie: Essays on Janet Frame (1978), while two full-length studies of her work by Margaret Dalziel (1980) and Patrick Evans (1988) are complemented by a continuing international interest in her work, encouraged by the film An Angel at My Table (1990) which dramatizes her life.

FRAME, Ronald (1953–), Scottish novelist, short-story writer, and playwright, born in Glasgow, educated at Glasgow University and at Oxford. In his volumes of short stories Frame has displayed his gift for ironic counterpoint and the evocation of period. Among these are Watching Mrs Gordon (1985); A Long Weekend with Marcel Proust (1986), which contained short stories and a novella, 'Prelude and Fugue', about a young woman condemned to relive her experiences in the Blitz; and A Woman of Judah (1987), again containing short stories and a novella. His first novel, Winter Journey (1984), was followed by several others including Sandmouth People (1986), which dealt with one day in the life of a small seaside town during the 1950s, Penelope's Hat (1989), and Bluette (1990). His next novel, Underwood and After (1991), set in the 1950s, describes a young boy's infatuation with the sophisticated London 'set' presided over by the charming but sinister figure of Mr Chetwynd. Like several of his fictions, the novel focuses around a grand house (the eponymous 'Underwood'), whose symbolic meaning reflects the ambiguous nature of the society of which it is the centre. The Sun on the Wall (1994), a trio of novellas on related themes, contains similar ambiguities; its final story, also set in a large house in the Scottish Highlands, concerns the break-up of a family—undermined by its failure to confront the truth about the past.

FRANCIS, Dick (Richard Stanley) (1920–), British crime writer, born in Tenby, Pembrokeshire. He served in the RAF during the Second World War; from 1946 to 1957 he was a National Hunt jockey, becoming champion in 1953–4, and from 1957 to 1973 racing correspondent of the Sunday Express. His long series of novels, beginning with Dead Cert (1962), have enjoyed immense popularity and have been praised by, among others, Philip *Larkin. They are fast-moving thrillers, usually with a horse-racing background, though latterly the setting has become more varied. Among the best are Flying Finish (1966), Enquiry (1969), Rat Race (1970), High Stakes (1975), In the Frame (1976), and The Danger (1983). His autobiography, Sport of Queens, appeared in 1957 (revised editions 1968, 1974, 1982). He was awarded the OBE in 1984.

FRANK, Waldo (David) (1889–1967), American novelist, literary and social critic, born in Long Branch, New Jersey, educated at Yale University. A freelance writer for The New York Times and Evening Post, he was a co-founder and editor of *The Seven Arts, and also US correspondent for the Nouvelle Revue Française. Several early novels appeared, among them The Unwelcome Man (1917), The Dark Mother (1920), Rahab (1922), City Block (1922), Holiday (1923), and Chalk Face (1924), as well as a modernist play, New Year's Eve (1929). In addition, there were the critical essays and social studies in Salvos (1924), Virgin Spain (1926; revised 1942), and the travelogue Dawn in Russia (1932). He ranked as a literary radical and associated with Van Wyck *Brooks, H. L. *Mencken, and Lewis *Mumford. He was strongly influenced by Freud, and in the 1920s, along with other writers like Max *Eastman and John Reed, was drawn to the dialectical materialism of Marx, which strongly moulded future works. During the 1930s, an editor of New Republic and The Masses, and an active participant in the three Congresses of American Writers, Frank was at the centre of the debate over politics and culture. Novels such as The Death and Birth of David Markand (1934), The Bridegroom Cometh (1938), Summer Never Ends (1941), Island in the Atlantic (1946), and The Invaders (1948) addressed themselves directly to crucial social problems. All his fiction is characterized by an emotional style with a mixture of Marxism and a romantic conception of cosmic mysticism. Frank was well known for his work on Hispanic culture and contributed to inter-American understanding with such works as Our America (1919), The Re-Discovery of America (1928), America Hispaña (1931), In the American Jungle (1937), and South American Journey (1943). His other prose includes Chart for Rough Water (1940), The Jew in Our Day (1944), Birth of a World (1951), Bridgehead (1957), and The Prophetic Island: A Portrait of Cuba (1961). His Memoirs were published in 1973.

FRANKAU, Pamela (1908–67), British novelist, born in London. After refusing the offer of a place at Cambridge, she devoted herself to writing. Her first published novel, The Marriage of Harlequin (1927), appeared when she was 19 and was followed by over thirty others, including She and I (1930); Tassell-Gentle (1934), about a man losing his memory in an air crash; The Devil We Know (1939), which explores her feelings about her own Jewish ancestry in the character of Philip Meyer, an ambitious young screenwriter in the developing British film industry of the 1930s. This prolific period was interrupted by the war and by the death, in 1940, of her lover, Humbert Woolfe. Shaken in the Wind (1948) deals with her conversion to Catholicism. The Willow Cabin (1949), her most successful book, describes the relationship between Caroline Seward, a young actress, her lover, Michael Knowle, a man almost twice her age, and his wife, Mercedes, a Roman Catholic. The novel moves between London in the 1930s and during the Blitz to post-war America, incorporating the author's wartime experiences. Other novels include The Winged Horse (1953), a novel about a newspaper tycoon; A Wreath for the Enemy (1954), set in the South of France, which describes the relationship between the bohemian Wells family and the bourgeois Bradleys; and The Bridge (1957), which displays, in its treatment of the bisexuality of its central character, the author's uncompromising honesty. Her autobiography, I Find Four People, was published in 1935.

FRANKLIN, Miles (Stella Marie Sarah) (1879–1954), Australian novelist, born in New South Wales. Her early years were spent at Brindabella, her parents' remote farm in New South Wales, and later at Possum Gully which formed the background for her most famous work, My Brilliant Career (1901), a largely autobiographical novel about a young girl, Sybylla Melvyn, whose aspirations to become a writer are thwarted by the conventions and strictures of bush society. Franklin later moved to Sydney where she worked as a nurse and as a housemaid before becoming involved in a more literary milieu; she met Joseph *Furphy, Norman *Lindsay, and Henry *Lawson (who wrote the preface to My Brilliant Career) and became active in the Australian feminist movement. She then went to America and, after the outbreak of the First World War, to England, where she became involved in the war effort, returning to Australia in 1927. Other works include All That Swagger (1936), about an Australian pioneering clan based on her own family; My Career Goes Bung (1946), a sequel to her first novel, about her free-thinking life as a Sydney writer. She also published novels under the pseudonym 'Brent of Bin Bin' including Up the Country (1928), Ten Creeks Run (1930), Back to Bool Bool (1931), Prelude to Waking (1950), Cockatoos (1954), and Gentlemen at Gyang Gyang (1956), most of which project a romantic Australian nationalism and a celebration of pioneering life. She is as famous for her unconventional life and radical attitudes, held far in advance of her time, as she is for her fiction, despite attempts on the part of feminist critics to reassess her work.

FRASER, Lady Antonia, née Pakenham (1932–), British biographer and historian, the daughter of Elizabeth *Longford and, since 1980, the wife of Harold *Pinter; she was born in London and educated at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. The diligent scholarship and imaginative sympathy with its subject of Mary Queen of Scots (1969) established her reputation as a biographer; among Fraser's subsequent biographical works are Cromwell, Our Chief of Men (1973), King Charles II (1979), and The Six Wives of Henry VIII (1992). The Weaker Vessel (1984) reviews the social and cultural positions of women in the seventeenth century, and Boadicea's Chariot (1988) is a historical survey of women who have exercised power. She has also written a series of detective novels featuring the elegant heroine 'Jemima Shore'; these include Quiet as a Nun (1977), A Splash of Red (1981), and Political Death (1994). The popular anthologies Scottish Love Poems (1975) and Love Letters (1977) were edited by Fraser.

FRASER, George MacDonald (1925–), British novelist, born in Carlisle, educated at Carlisle Grammar School and Glasgow Academy. He began working as a newspaper reporter in 1949 and was deputy editor of the Glasgow Herald from 1964 to 1969. Flashman (1969) was the first of a long succession of entertainingly eventful novels recounting the military career of the eponymous bully from Tom Brown's Schooldays; subsequent titles include Flash for Freedom (1971). Flashman in the Great Game (1975), Flashman and the Mountain of Light (1990), and Flashman and the Angel of the Lord (1994). Among his other works of fiction are the short-stories in The General Danced at Dawn (1970) and the novel McAuslan in the Rough (1974), both of which form spirited evocations of life in a highland regiment. Fraser's other publications include a history of the Anglo-Scottish Border Reivers entitled The Steel Bonnets (1971), and Quartered Safe Out Here (1992), a memoir of his experiences in Burma during the Second World War.

FRASER, G(eorge) S(utherland) (1915–80), Scottish poet and critic, born in Glasgow, educated at St Andrew's University. He was a journalist in Aberdeen until 1939, when he joined the Black Watch regiment; some of his most memorable poems are derived from his extended periods on active service in the Middle East. After working in various capacities, principally as a literary journalist, he became a lecturer at the University of Leicester. At the time of the appearance of his first collection of poems, The Fatal Landscape (1941), Fraser was numbered among the writers of the *New Apocalypse and wrote an introduction for The White Horseman (1941), the group's second anthology, edited by J. F. *Hendry and Henry *Treece. His early verse had, however, a degree of clarity and poise that distinguished it from the more turbulently expressive writing commonly associated with the movement. Home Town Elegy (1944) and The Traveller Has Regrets (1948) contained the war poetry upon which his reputation was principally established; the repeatedly anthologized 'Egypt' is a good example of the sceptically elegiac tone, precise imagery, and formal control characterizing the best of his work. Two further volumes, Leaves without a Tree (1956) and Conditions (1969), were followed by Poems of G. S. Fraser, a posthumous collected edition, in 1981. Fraser was widely respected as a critic for the judiciousness and generosity of his writings, which include The Modern Writer and His World (1953), Vision and Rhetoric (1960), and Ezra Pound (1961), which increased interest in that poet at a time when his achievement was somewhat neglected. Fraser's other works include the travel book News from South America (1949) and the autobiographical A Stranger and Afraid, written in 1949 but not published until 1983. Among his translations is Jean Mesnard's Pascal: His Life and Works (1952). With J. Waller, he edited The Collected Poems of Keith Douglas (1951).

FRAYN, Michael (1933–), British novelist and playwright; he was born, brought up, and educated in the South London suburbs, took a degree in moral philosophy at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, became proficient as a Russian speaker during his National Service, and became a journalist, writing humorous columns first for the Manchester Guardian, then for the Observer. His novels include The Tin Man (1965); The Russian Interpreter (1966); Towards the Edge of the Morning (1968), a comic picture of Fleet Street life and middle-class mores; A Very Private Life (1968), a wryly philosophical investigation of a utopia which promises total comfort and content; and A Landing on the Sun (1991), which concerns the mystery surrounding the death of a civil servant, Stephen Summerchild, rumoured to be working on a top-secret defence project for Harold Wilson's government in the early 1970s. He has also published a book of philosophic mini-essays and apophthegms, Constructions (1974). But it is for his plays that he has become best known. These include Alphabetical Order (1975), set in a newspaper library that becomes less chaotic and more orderly as the evening proceeds; Donkeys' Years (1976), about an unruly Cambridge college reunion; Clouds (1976), in which a group of journalists take a guided tour round modern Cuba, their relationship subtly shifting as they go; Make and Break (1980), set in and around a trade fair in Germany; Noises Off (1982), a highly successful farce showing disasters on-stage and off-stage during the provincial tour of a less successful farce; Benefactors (1984), about the embattled private and public life of a municipal architect; Look Look (1990), an attempt to explore the individual and collective psychology of members of a theatre audience; Here (1993), about a young couple's attempt to bring order both to their lives and to the tiny flat in which they live; and Now You Know (1995), the dramatic version of a novel of the same title published in 1994, which involves campaigners against government secrecy and investigates questions of openness and privacy on both public and private levels. Frayn's forte is comedy, sometimes high comedy, but comedy that always has serious and sometimes sombre resonances. His most characteristic theme is the difficulty of finding shape in or imposing order on a world that is complex, changeable, and often extremely disorderly. He has also made numerous translations and adaptations from the Russian, among them Tolstoy's Fruits of Enlightenment, Trifinov's comic picture of housing problems in Moscow, Exchange, and the plays of the dramatist he has admitted to regarding as his favourite, Chekhov.

FRAZER, Sir James George (1854–1941), British anthropologist, historian of religion, and classical scholar, born in Glasgow, where he obtained his MA at the University in 1874. In 1879 he became a fellow of Trinity College, where he remained in residence for most of his life. He was introduced to anthropology by his close friend Robertson Smith (1846–94), co-editor of the ninth edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica (1875–89), for which Frazer wrote articles on 'Taboo' and 'Totemism' in 1885. Following the completion of Totemism (1887), his first independent publication of note, he began work on *The Golden Bough (1890–1915). His many other related works include Totemism and Exogamy (4 volumes, 1910), The Belief in Immortality and the Worship of the Dead (1913), Folklore in the Old Testament (1918), and The Fear of the Dead in Primitive Religion (3 volumes, 1933–6). Frazer proceeded very largely by collating materials from a wide range of secondary sources, his achievement consisting in the synthesis of his findings into impressively orchestrated wholes. His tactful but none the less persuasive demonstrations of the social and historical determination of all religious worship were widely influential in the growing secularization of culture from the 1890s onward. His highly regarded work as a classical scholar includes his editions, with translations and commentaries, of Pausanius's Description of Greece (6 volumes, 1898) and Ovid's Fasti (5 volumes, 1929). He also edited The Letters of William Cowper (1912), whom he admired above others as a poet. He was knighted in 1914. J. G. Frazer: His Life and Work by Robert Ackerman was published in 1987.

FREELING, Nicolas (1927–), British crime writer, born in London, educated at the University of Dublin. He worked as a cook in European hotels and restaurants from 1945 to 1960, and in 1962 published Love in Amsterdam (US title Murder in Amsterdam), the first of a series of crime novels—others include The King of the Rainy Country (1966) and Strike Out where Not Applicable (1967)—in which the detective is the Dutch policeman Van der Valk. Since Van der Valk's death in A Long Silence (1972; US title Auprès de ma Blonde) Freeling has moved the setting of his novels to provincial France, employing Henri Castang, also a policeman, as their hero (Wolfnight, 1982; You Who Know, 1994). Both characters obviously owe something in their conception to Georges Simenon's Maigret.

FREEMAN, Mary E(leanor) Wilkins (1852–1930), American writer, born in Randolph, Massachusetts. She is known primarily for her regional fiction set in her native Massachusetts and in Vermont where she lived. She wrote essays, plays, poetry, children's books, and novels, including Pembroke (1894) and The Shoulders of Atlas (1908), but she is best remembered for her short stories. Many of these appeared in magazines such as Harper's Bazaar and were first collected in A Humble Romance and Other Stories (1887). Her fiction characteristically concerns the lives of her contemporary New Englanders and evokes through careful description of scenery, dialect, and milieu a powerful sense of place and of regional character. Among the issues she explored are the pressure exerted upon the inherited social codes of small-town life by a changing urban world, the effect upon personal character of a decaying Puritan orthodoxy, the ambivalent position of unmarried women, and the potential power of the meek in society. In 1902 she married and moved to New Jersey; both the change of environment and life with an alcoholic husband affected the quality of her subsequent work. In 1926 she was awarded the William Dean Howells Gold Medal for Fiction, and in the same year became, with Edith *Wharton, the first woman honoured by the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

FREEMAN, R(ichard) Austin (1862–1943), British *detective story writer. The son of a Soho tailor, he studied medicine, entered the Colonial Service, and in 1887 was posted to the Gold Coast. Invalided home with blackwater fever in 1891, he turned to writing, producing Travels and Life in Ashanti and Jaman (1898), a classic in the travel genre. His first detective stories, The Adventures of Romney Pringle, written in conjunction with a friend, Dr J. J. Pitcairn, appeared under the pseudonym of Clifford Ashdown in 1902. These were followed by The Red Thumb Mark (1907), written under his own name, and in which his detective, Dr John Evelyn Thorndyke, first appears. Thorndyke, who is the central figure in twenty other novels—the last is The Jacob Street Mystery (1942)—and many short stories, probably commands more serious intellectual respect than any other fictional detective: his presence is imposing, his knowledge encyclopaedic, and his deductions have a logical rigour which is absent from those of his contemporary Sherlock Holmes. Freeman's first works passed unnoticed; he first made his name with the collection of short stories The Singing Bone (1912), in which he introduced the concept of the 'inverted tale', later much imitated. In the first half of these stories the reader is shown a crime being committed; in the second, how the detective arrives at its solution.

Free Verse, a poetic mode given wide currency from around 1910 onward by the emergence of *Imagism, whose practitioners sought, in F. S. *Flint's words, to 'compose in the sequence of the musical phrase, not in the sequence of a metronome'. The versions of the Psalms in the Authorized Version, Walt Whitman's incantationally flexible measures, and the vers libre of Jules Laforgue and others were among the precedents for the rejection of predetermined metres characterizing the advent of poetic *Modernism; in the attempt to make poetry more authentic in its relation to experience, the auditory rhetoric of strict forms was called into question along with the stock poetic diction and imagery of the nineteenth century. The achievement of T. S. *Eliot in the carefully modulated lines of 'The Love Song of J. Alfred *Prufrock' was among the finest early examples of the subtlety and effectiveness of free verse. While Robert *Frost stated that 'free verse is like playing tennis with the net down', Eliot insisted that the form did not involve an abandonment of discipline but rather increased the difficulty of satisfying the sensitive ear. Most verse describable as 'free' or 'cadenced' contains recurrent rhythmical effects which may be analysed in terms of traditional metrical feet and variations upon them. By 1936 Michael *Roberts noted in the introduction to *The Faber Book of Modern Verse that 'it is very hard to draw a sharp line . . . between "free" verse and varied regular verse', indicating the liberating effect of the development on poetic practice in general.

FRENCH, Marilyn (1929–), American novelist and literary critic, born in New York City, educated at Harvard. French established herself as a teacher and literary critic before embarking on a career as a novelist. Her The Book as World: James Joyce's 'Ulysses' (1976) is a study of *Joyce's great novel, while Shakespeare's Division of Experience (1984) explores what she sees as the division in Shakespeare's work between tragedy as the expression of the 'masculine principle' and comedy as the expression of the 'feminine principle'. However, it was her first novel, The Women's Room (1977), which brought her to the attention of a wider reading public and helped establish her as an important academic voice for the feminist movement. Her frequently trenchant essays on the place of women in society are collected in Beyond Morals: Women, Men, and Morals (1986) and The War against Women (1992). Her other novels include The Bleeding Heart (1980), Her Mother's Daughter (1987), and Our Father (1993).

French Lieutenant's Woman, The, a novel by John *Fowles, published in 1969. The narrative centres on a Victorian romance between Sarah Woodruff, a governess isolated by the local community for her reported former liaison with a French naval officer, and Charles Smithson, an aristocratic Victorian palaeontologist who is engaged to Ernestina Freeman, the daughter of a wealthy businessman. Sarah is dismissed from her post in Lyme Regis and moves to Exeter where the affair is eventually consummated. She becomes elusive; by the time Charles finds her, years later, she is a *New Woman and assistant to Dante Gabriel Rossetti. The novel, with its three alternative endings, heralded a new era of self-conscious writing in contemporary British fiction, hitherto held to be limited and parochial in scope. It is enriched by the formal innovations Fowles had borrowed, and reinvented, from the metafictional conventions of post-war European literature—the self-reflexive tones of the nouveau roman and its leading figure Robbe-Grillet—and the familiar outmoded traditions of Hardy and eighteenth-century English fiction. The lavish romanticism centred on the anima-like figure of Sarah, its misunderstood antiheroine, and her destructive passion for the conventional Charles, lend the novel lasting popular appeal, increased by Fowles's characteristic narrative energy and the period flavour captured in his skilful use of historical pastiche. Harold *Pinter wrote the screenplay for the 1981 film version by Karel Reisz.

FRIEDMAN, Bruce Jay (1930–), American novelist and dramatist, born in the Bronx, New York City, educated at the University of Missouri. He served in the US Army, and then worked in publishing. Friedman is best known as a novelist and short-story writer, whose one successful play is the comedy Scuba Duba, produced at the New Theatre in New York in 1967. Like his novels, Scuba Duba is a witty comedy of the tensions of Jewish family life in which Harold Wonder's urbane world is shattered when his wife leaves him for a coloured lover. Friedman then brings in some of the statutory ingredients of this ethnic humour, with confrontations between the intellectual, liberal-minded Harold, his and her lover, his mother, and his psychiatrist. Friedman's novels include Stern (1962), A Mother's Kisses (1964), The Dick (1970), About Harry Towns (1974), Tokyo Woes (1985), and The Current Climate (1989). His short stories appear in volumes such as Far from the City of Class (1963), Black Angels (1966), and Let's Hear It for a Beautiful Guy (1984). His comic work of self-improvement, The Lone Guy's Book of Life, appeared in 1978.

FRIEDMAN, Milton (1912–), American economist, born in New York City, educated at Rutgers, and the universities of Columbia and Chicago, where he became Professor of Economics in 1946. Recipient of the Nobel Prize for Economics in 1977, he is the best-known advocate of the universal advantages of free-market capitalism and of monetarist economic policies, and is the foremost member of the so-called Chicago School of Economics. If the decline of Keynesian ideas (see KEYNES, JOHN MAYNARD) in economics circles (beginning in the mid-1970s) is to be traced to any one person, it would be to Friedman. It is through his more popular writings that Friedman reaches a more general audience. In Essays in Positive Economics (1953) Friedman launched a highly influential methodological programme designed to enlighten those who were otherwise being led to believe that unrealistic assumptions in economics diminished the usefulness of the science. He held instead that it was the predictive ability of theories that was really important. In Capitalism and Freedom (1962) democracy was identified with the workings of the free market. Dollars and Deficits (1968) sets out in intelligible and persuasive language some of his views on inflation, government deficit spending, and the balance of payments. Free To Choose (1980, with Rose Friedman), is a popular summing-up of his whole economic and political philosophy.

FRIEL, Brian (1929–), Northern Irish dramatist, born in Omagh, Co. Tyrone, educated in Derry and Belfast; he later became a teacher. His first substantial success was Philadelphia, Here I Come (1964), in which two actors embody the private and public frustrations of a young Irishman about to emigrate to America. This has been followed by many plays, some of them directly concerned with the agonies of Northern Ireland, such as the Freedom of the City (1974), about the shooting by British troops of the decidedly unheroic civil rights marchers who have inadvertently occupied Derry Town Hall, and Volunteers (1975), about political internees working on an archaeological dig; but others are more indirectly and less obviously so. Translations (1980), widely regarded as his masterpiece, involves nineteenth-century linguistic imperialism, represented by a British army intent on replacing Gaelic place-names with English ones and goaded by the murder of a lovelorn young officer into retributory violence. Friel's more private plays include The Loves of Cass McGuire (1966) and Lovers (1968); Faith Healer (1976), four consecutive monologues describing the wanderings, apotheosis, and death of a modern medicine man clearly meant to represent the creative artist or writer; and Aristocrats (1979) and Dancing at Lughnasa (1990), two plays about family and social fragmentation, one occurring in the 1970s, and the other in the 1930s; Wonderful Tennessee (1993), about a group of dissatisfied Dubliners impotently trying to discover their pagan roots during an overnight trip out of town; and Molly Sweeney (1994), another series of monologues, this time involving a blind woman who feels more content in her darkness than in the sighted world to which she is briefly and disastrously returned. All four of these plays occur in or near Ballybeg, the exemplary Donegal village which Friel invented in the 1960s and where he continues to set much of his work. Overall, this is marked by a gentle scepticism about personal or political pretension, a wry, kindly humour, and a nostalgia for a world unscarred by the dislocation, loss, failure, and disillusion movingly shown in his plays. Friel has also made translations and adaptations, notably of Chekhov's The Three Sisters and Turgenev's Fathers and Sons. In 1980 he co-founded *Field Day, a touring theatre company centred on Derry.

FRIEL, George (1910–75), Scottish novelist, born and brought up in Glasgow, where he worked as a teacher. Of a poor background, Friel portrayed the lives of the underprivileged and uncharted, and his work is dense with the life of the poorer districts of Glasgow. He published The Bank of Time (1959), The Boy Who Wanted Peace (1964), Grace and Miss Partridge (1969), Mr. Alfred MA (1972), and An Empty House (1975). Of these, his reputation rests on Mr. Alfred MA whose central character is the unprepossessing schoolmaster, Mr Alfred, who is a failure. His ambitions of being a poet are wholly misplaced. He finds compensation in furtive association with tarts and in drinking, until he becomes obsessed by a girl pupil. The novel develops against an impressionistically rendered Glasgow, at a time of worsening poverty and the hideous escalation of gang life among the city youths. The novel enters the Scottish tradition of veiled use of the supernatural to resolve its complex themes: in his breakdown Mr Alfred encounters in an abandoned building the sinister Tod who, obviously, is one version of the Devil who has haunted Scottish fiction from James Hogg onwards.

FROST, Robert (Lee) (1874–1963), American poet, born in San Francisco; he grew up in Lawrence, Massachusetts, after the death of his father, a newspaper editor originally from New England, and was educated at Lawrence High school, where he was elected 'class poet' in his final year. He attended Dartmouth College in 1892 and, having worked as a cobbler, a farmer, and editor of a local newspaper, studied at Harvard from 1897 to 1899. Following the appearance of one of his poems in the New York Independent in 1894 he privately published Twilight (1894) and began to concern himself with making his reputation as a poet. Receiving no encouragement in America, he travelled to Britain in 1912 and became acquainted with a number of the poets associated with the *Georgian movement; he was closest to Edward *Thomas, encouraging him as a poet and later describing him as 'the only brother I ever had'. Two collections of his poetry, A Boy's Will (1913) and North of Boston (1914), which firmly determine the New England regionalism of his œuvre, appeared in England to favourable critical receptions; on his return to the USA in 1915 he was recognized as an established literary figure, a position he consolidated with the publication of Mountain Interval (1916). He took up residence on a farm in New Hampshire and between 1916 and 1950 recurrently held posts as a visiting professor of English and writer-in-residence at numerous American universities. His first three volumes contain a high proportion of his best-known work, including 'Mending Wall', 'Death of the Hired Man', 'Birches', and 'The Road Not Taken'; the conversational individuality of tone and diction in such poems remained his identifying characteristic. The tensions between the realism and directness of his verse and its loyalty to conventional forms make Frost's achievement one of unusually effective mediation between tradition and innovation. His many subsequent collections include New Hampshire (1923), in which political elements were added to his predominantly descriptive and contemplative idioms, The Lone Striker (1933), Steeple Bush (1947), Aforesaid (1954), and In the Clearing (1962). The Complete Poems was published in 1968. Frost enjoyed enormous popularity in America as a benevolent purveyor of versified common sense, rural lore, and evocations of natural order, impressions catered for by more anodyne poems like 'The Pasture'. Much of his work, however, reveals an imaginative attraction towards sinister depths of melancholy consistent with the fears of insanity and temptations to suicide apparent in his Selected Letters (1965, edited by Lawrance Thompson). Elsewhere, his sceptically fatalistic manner combines with a laconically unsentimental compassion to produce the many poems of which 'Out, Out —' is perhaps the typifying example. The verse-dramas A Masque of Reason (1942) and A Masque of Mercy (1951) are the principal manifestations of the theological and philosophical preoccupations evident in his work from the 1940s onward; he remained, however, capable of producing poems with the disturbing impact of 'The Draft Horse' to the end of his career. His standing in his later years is indicated by the fact that he won the Pulitzer Prize three times, received more than forty honorary degrees, and served as President Kennedy's cultural emissary. Lawrance Thompson's biography of Frost appeared in three volumes in 1967, 1971, and 1977.

Frost in May, a novel by A. *White, published in 1933. It was described by Elizabeth *Bowen as not only a classic girls' school story, but a work of art: 'intense, troubling, semi-miraculous'. In 1908, nine-year-old Nanda Grey, the daughter of a convert, arrives at the Convent of the Five Wounds, where the creation of 'soldiers of Christ, accustomed to hardship and ridicule and ingratitude' is a governing principle. From descriptions of small but stringent religious demands on daily life through to passionate friendships nurtured by the very rules established to prevent them, the novel vividly creates this enclosed world. Though Nanda wholeheartedly accepts the Catholic Church, uncertainties surface: her First Communion lacks the spiritual climax she had anticipated; a retreat is hampered by the sense that some elements of religious life are a 'meaningless complication'. As a proof of faith, she begins a novel in which worldly behaviour will be exonerated by its characters' dramatic conversion in the final chapter. The unfinished manuscript is discovered and Nanda is despatched from the convent on her fourteenth birthday, without the opportunity to explain. Her father denounces her impurity; the Mother of Discipline affirms that by breaking her will, Nanda can be at one with God.

FRY, Christopher (Harris) (1907–), British poet and playwright, born in Bristol, the son of a Church of England lay preacher, educated at Bedford Modern School. He later adopted the name of his mother's Quaker family and served in a non-combatant unit in the Second World War. He was a schoolmaster, an actor, and a producer before writing a dramatic tale about St Cuthman, The Boy with a Cart, in 1938. Much of his subsequent work—for instance, his play about Moses, The Firstborn (1948), and the pacifist A Sleep of Prisoners (1951)—has an overt religious bent, aiming to evoke, in his words, 'a world which has deeps and shadows of mystery, in which God is anything but a sleeping partner'. All his plays reflect his belief that people have 'domesticated the enormous miracle' and failed to notice that reality is 'wildly, perilously, incomprehensibly fantastic'; these include *The Lady's Not for Burning (1949) and four 'seasonal' comedies: A Phoenix Too Frequent (1946), about the spring-like love that develops between a young widow and a despairing soldier; the autumnal Venus Observed (1950); the wintry The Dark is Light Enough (1954); and, belatedly representing summer, a play about renewal and reconciliation in post-war Siena, A Yard of Sun (1970). Throughout his career Fry has expressed his essential optimism in elaborately and sometimes playfully metaphoric verse and, with the more restrained T. S. *Eliot, was hailed as a leader of a renaissance of poetic drama: a claim and a trend that did not, however, survive the arrival of *'kitchen sink drama' in 1956. He has also written screenplays, notably for Ben Hur, and translated drama by Rostand, Anouilh, and Giradoux.

FRY, Roger (Eliot) (1866–1934), British art critic and painter, born in London, educated at King's College, Cambridge. Having read natural sciences Fry turned to painting and became interested in Renaissance art after visits to Italy. He was art critic of the Athenaeum in 1901, co-founded the Burlington Magazine in 1903, and was director of the Metropolitan Museum of Modern Art, New York, from 1905 to 1910. In 1910 he founded the Omega Workshops to produce well-designed and simple objects for daily use. His 1905 edition of Sir Joshua Reynolds's Discourses was highly acclaimed. On discovering Cézanne in 1906 his attention turned towards modern painting; in 1910 and 1912 he organized two celebrated exhibitions of Cézanne's work, together with that of Van Gogh, Gauguin, and other 'Post-Impressionists' (a term coined by Fry). His criticism, collected in Vision and Design (1920) and Transformations (1926), together with his monograph on Cézanne (1927), succeeded in stimulating immense enthusiasm for modern French painting. His Last Lectures appeared posthumously in 1939. An associate of the *Bloomsbury Group, Fry's biography was written by V. *Woolf (1940).

FRYE, (Herman) Northrop (1912–91), Canadian critic, born in Sherbrooke, Quebec, educated at Victoria College, University of Toronto; he studied theology at Emmanuel College, Canada, and literature at Merton College, Oxford. From 1940 Frye was a member of the faculty of the University of Toronto, becoming Chancellor of Victoria College in 1979. His early work on Blake (Fearful Symmetry, 1947) gained him instant notice, and his continuing work on Shakespeare (A Natural Perspective, 1965; Fools of Time, 1967) and on criticism and learning (The Educated Imagination, 1963; The Stubborn Structure, 1970; The Critical Path, 1971) has remained influential. Frye was above all interested in romance as a recurring structure of the imagination, a vision of probability in which magic, for example, becomes a metaphor for human generosity and capacity for renewal rather than a mere refusal of the real. Frye's major work is his ground-breaking Anatomy of Criticism (1957), which raised, with impeccable lucidity and much wit, indispensable questions about the teaching, evaluating, and classifying of literature. 'There is as yet,' Frye wrote in his 'polemical introduction', 'no way of distinguishing what is genuine criticism . . . from what belongs to the history of taste.' Frye urges us to understand literature as 'an order of words' rather than a pile of works, and to see criticism as a progressive, collaborative enterprise rather than simply 'leisure-class gossip'. Anatomy of Criticism contributes to this venture by its exposition of the problem, and through four long essays on different forms of criticism which Frye calls historical, ethical, archetypal, and rhetorical. Of these four forms, the archetypal attracted the most attention, with its concentration on underlying patterns in literature, and its anthropological background. There was a brief but widespread fashion for so-called myth criticism in the 1960s, when archetypes of all kinds, but particularly Christian ones, were found almost everywhere. Traces of this trend survive in talk of Christ-figures, and in the assumption that all apples in literature have something to do with the Garden of Eden.

FUGARD, Athol (Harold Lannigan) (1932–), South African playwright, born in Middleburg, Cape Province; he grew up in Port Elizabeth and was educated at Cape Town University. His father, of English descent, was a shopkeeper, and his mother an Afrikaner. Fugard became actively involved in theatre when he married Sheila Meiring, an actress and novelist, and both moved to Johannesburg, where his work as Clerk to the Native Commissioner's Court gave him first-hand experience of apartheid laws. His novel Tsotsi (1980), its title a name for township gangsters, grimly depicts the Sophiatown ghetto. His two naturalistic plays No-Good Friday (1958) and Nongogo (1959), published in 'Dimetos' and Two Early Plays (1977), were also set in Sophiatown, a township which was later demolished, and its inhabitants expelled, under the Group Areas Act. Three Port Elizabeth Plays (1974) includes The Blood Knot (1961), about the difficulties faced by two coloured brothers; Hello and Goodbye (1965), which concerns a 'poor white' brother and sister; and Boesman and Lena (1968), about a frustrated married couple, whose relationship is strained by their struggle to survive as homeless coloured migrant workers, and the silent intrusion of a dying black. Much influenced by *Beckett and Camus, the 'Port Elizabeth' plays established Fugard as a dramatist of international stature. Statements (1974) includes the harrowing Statements after an Arrest under the Immorality Act (1974) and two plays written in collaboration with the actors John Kani and Winston Ntshona: Sizwe Bansi Is Dead* (1972) and The Island (1973), a version of Antigone as presented by two political prisoners on the notorious Robben Island. A Lesson from Aloes (1980) turned to middle-class characters in a story about a liberal Afrikaner and his relationship with his wife and a coloured political activist. 'Master Harold'... and the Boys (1982), based on Fugard's experiences as a teenager in Port Elizabeth, concerns a boy whose problematic relationship with his father leads him to ill-treat his two family servants. The Road to Mecca (1984), a powerful drama reminiscent of Ibsen in its exploration of the past of a woman artist and a Calvinist minister, is based on the tragic life of Afrikaner Helen Martins, a reclusive sculptor who lived in the arid Karroo region. In My Children! My Africa! (1989), portraying the dilemmas faced by a black schoolteacher, Fugard confronted the intransigence of politically militant Soweto schoolchildren. In Playland (1992), a black man and a white man have a revealing encounter in a travelling amusement park. Valley Song was performed in 1996. Township Plays (1993) collects several important plays including The Coat (1966). Fugard's film scripts include The Guest: An Episode in the Life of Eugene Marais (1977), Marigolds in August (1979), and the film version of Boesman and Lena (1972), with Fugard taking the part of Boesman. His private thoughts on the injustices of racialist politics, which his works vividly illuminate in public manner, are revealed in Notebooks: 1960–1977 (1983), edited by Mary Benson. Cousins: A Memoir appeared in 1995. See Dennis Walder, Athol Fugard (1984).

FULLER, Henry Blake (1857–1929), American novelist and playwright, born in Chicago, educated at Allison Classical Academy, Oconomowoc, Wisconsin. Fuller drew on his travels in Europe in 1879 and 1883 in his first book, The Chevalier of Pensieri-Vani (1890; revised 1892), a series of linked stories often with a Jamesian theme of the confrontation of American innocence and brashness with European sophistication, and pursued these interests in The Chatelaine of La Trinité (1892). In both works the analysis of American society, particularly the attack on its materialistic and industrial preoccupations, is a pervasive concern. These concerns were registered with intelligence and maturity in The Cliff-Dwellers (1893) and With the Procession (1895), both set in Chicago. Fuller turned to drama with 'O, That Way Madness Lies' (1895), a one-act fantasy, and published The Puppet-Booth: Twelve Plays (1896), influenced by the puppet theatre of Maurice Maeterlinck and the music of Richard Wagner. Subsequent novels include The Last Refuge: A Sicilian Romance (1900) and Bertram Cope's Year (1919). Despite his declared intention, in a letter to his friend Hamlin *Garland, to put up the 'shutters' on fiction, he wrote two more novels, Gardens of This World (1929) and Not on the Screen (1930). Although a relatively minor figure in American letters Fuller's place in the history of American literary realism is significant. See Fuller of Chicago: The Ordeal of a Genteel Realist in Ungenteel America (1974), by Bernard R. Bowron, Jr.

FULLER, John (Leopold) (1937–), British poet and novelist, born at Ashcroft in Kent, the son of Roy *Fuller, educated at New College, Oxford, where he won the Newdigate Prize for Poetry in 1960. In 1966 he became a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. His numerous volumes of poetry include Fairground Music (1961), Cannibals and Missionaries (1972), Lies and Secrets (1979), Selected Poems: 1954–1982 (1985), The Grey Among the Green (1988), and The Mechanical Body (1991). Thematically and stylistically his work is wide-ranging, encompassing formally traditional lyric verse, wittily rhymed satires of contemporary social behaviour, and philosophically investigative poems in conversationally cadenced stanzas. The interaction of serious and comic elements in much of his writing is most evident in The Illusionists (1980). Fuller's practice frequently suggests a conception of poetry as a matter of ingenious verbal artificing, which, with the intelligence that permeates his work, identifies him as a disciple of *Auden. He has also produced several works of fiction, notably the novels Flying to Nowhere (1983) and Look Twice (1991); and short stories collected in The Adventures of Speedfall (1985) and The Worm and the Star (1993). In collaboration with James *Fenton, he wrote Partingtime Hall (1987), a collection of verse combining spirited scurrility and erudite allusiveness. Among Fuller's scholarly works are A Reader's Guide to W. H. Auden (1970) and his edition of John Gay's Dramatic Works (two volumes, 1983).

FULLER, Peter (1947–90), English art critic and broadcaster, born in Damascus, educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge. He was founder, editor, and publisher of the quarterly journal Modern Painters, which first appeared in 1988. Fuller particularly favoured the visionary British artists, such as Stanley Spencer and Cecil Collins. His art criticism at first showed the Marxist influence of his mentor, John *Berger, but he gradually came to argue for a spiritually transcendent art. His criticism appeared in a wide variety of publications and has been collected in Art and Psychoanalysis (1980) and Aesthetics after Modernism (1982). He also wrote about the American abstract artist Robert Natikin (1981). His last book, Theoria: Art and Absence of Grace (1988), focuses on John Ruskin's aesthetics, and its application to contemporary art.

FULLER, Roy (Broadbent) (1912–91), British poet, born at Failsworth in Lancashire, educated at Blackpool High School. An articled clerk from the age of 16, in 1934 he qualified as a solicitor, practising with a building society throughout his career. He was Oxford Professor of Poetry from 1968 to 1973. In the later 1930s he was a contributor to New Verse*, producing poetry of social and political concern which indicated the influences of *Auden and *Spender. His early collections The Middle of a War (1942) and A Lost Season (1944) contain many poems memorable for their reflections of wartime atmospheres of loneliness, tedium, and fear. These volumes establish the contemplative detachment and urbanely ironic tone that predominate in much of Fuller's later writing. His numerous subsequent collections include Brutus's Orchard (1958), Tiny Tears (1973), and Available for Dreams (1989). Collected Poems: 1936–1961 was published in 1962. Fuller's technical accomplishment is evident throughout his poetry, which makes fluent use of a wide range of traditional forms and innovative variations upon them. He also published a number of novels, among which are the imaginatively disquieting Fantasy and Fugue (1954) and Image of a Society (1956), which portrays personal interactions within a northern building society. Fuller's three volumes of memoirs, Souvenirs (1980), Vamp Till Ready (1982), and Home and Dry (1984) appeared under the title of The Strange and the Good in 1989. A further work of autobiography, Spanner and Pen, was published in 1991.

FURPHY, Joseph (1843–1912), Australian writer, born in Victoria, the son of Irish emigrants. He left school early to work on his father's farm and subsequently worked as a gold-digger, labourer, and teamster, before hardship forced him to work in his brother's foundry. A self-made but widely read individualist, Furphy possessed an idiosyncratic familiarity with the literary classics (including the Bible) which he used to great effect together with his wide experience of life on the land. Such Is Life (1903) was largely ignored on publication, but has since attained recognition for its innovative and sophisticated employment of shifting narrative and language techniques. It is also a rich and encompassing vision of Australian rural life, in all its mirth and hardship, though idiosyncratic in its focus and style. The work was originally published by the Bulletin*, as were many of his earlier short stories (under the pseudonym 'Tom Collins'). Furphy produced two more books, Rigby's Romance (serialized 1905–6; published 1921; full version, 1946;) and The Buln-Buln and the Brolga (1948) from sections he had been asked to edit out from Such Is Life, but neither was published in his lifetime.

Futurism, a radically innovative movement in literature and the graphic arts begun in Italy by Filippo Tommaso Marinetti (1876–1944), whose Futurist Manifesto of 1909 called for the exalted participation of the arts in the dynamically mechanistic ethos of modernity. The Manifesto of Futurist Painting (1910) by Giacomo Balla, Gino Severini, and others emphasized flux and movement as essentials of representation. Marinetti's Technical Manifesto of Literature (1912) called for disruption of syntax and use of words for their sounds alone as methods of liberating language 'from the prison of the Latin sentence'. Russian Futurism was established in 1912 by Viktor Khlebnikov (1885–1922) and Vladimir Mayakovsky (1893–1930), whose manifesto entitled 'A Slap in the Face for Public Taste' rejected the validity of the nineteenth-century Russian literary tradition. Initially an active force in the cultural development of the revolution, the Russian Futurists were marginalized by official policy in the early 1920s. Futurism was a direct influence on *Dada and *Surrealism and the progenitor of numerous forms of poetic experimentation with sound and typography. Marinetti's controversial series of lectures in London in 1912 stimulated Wyndham *Lewis and Ezra *Pound to formulate Vorticism; the first issue of Blast expressed their agreement with Futurism's basic aesthetics, but maintained that the movement was flawed in its fundamentally romantic attitude to mechanical dynamism.

G

GADDIS, William (1922–), American novelist, born in New York City, educated at Harvard. After a period of travel in Europe he published The Recognitions (1955), a complex, experimental, satirical novel whose settings range from nineteenth-century New England to Central America and contemporary New York, and whose central figure is the artist turned faker Wyatt Gwyon, who prostitutes his talent in the service of the demonic art dealer, Recktall Brown. In a book crowded with outlandish and sinister characters, incorporating a wide range of cultural and philosophical references, literary allusions, parodies of other works, and references to popular culture, Gaddis offers a bizarre and frequently disturbing portrait of contemporary society, in particular that of the shallow and self-seeking New York intelligentsia. It was highly acclaimed for its erudition and its originality. JR (1975) is an epistolary novel exploring the corruption and hypocrisy of the business world and centring on the ambitious young hero's quest for success. Carpenter's Gothic (1985) presents a bleak vision of America as a country in which the liberal decencies of the past have been eroded by reactionary fundamentalism and materialistic greed. Gaddis continues his assessment of contemporary society with A Frolic of His Own (1994), a satirical novel assessing the American legal system and the fashion for litigation.

GAINES, Ernest J(ames) (1933–), African-American novelist, born in Oscar, Louisiana, educated at San Francisco State College and Stanford University, California. Among other academic posts he was Professor of English at the University of Southwestern Louisiana, Lafayette. Gaines has been compared to William *Faulkner in his focus on one small area of the American South, describing the people of southern Louisiana including those of African descent, Cajuns of French descent, and mixed-race Creoles. In his most celebrated novel, The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman (1971), later made into a film, the recollections of a 110-year-old woman provide a highly personalized chronicle of the struggle for civil rights from the days of slavery to the emergence of Martin Luther King. A Gathering of Old Men (1983) is a study of lynch-mob psychology which focuses on the murder of a white farmer, and the manner in which eighteen elderly black men confound the racist authorities by each insisting on his own guilt; a film version directed by Volker Schlondorff appeared in 1987. Other novels include Catherine Carmier (1964), Of Love and Dust (1967), and In My Father's House (1978). Bloodline (1968) is a collection of short stories.

GAITSKILL, Mary (1954–), American writer, born in Lexington, Kentucky; she grew up near Detroit, and was educated at the University of Michigan. She had a troubled adolescence, absconding from home to live as a stripper in Manhattan at 16, and then led a rootless and insecure life sleeping rough. She established her reputation with Bad Behaviour (1988), a closely observed collection of short stories about the seedy side of New York City, and some of its marginalized inhabitants. Frequently dealing with the characters' desire for intimacy, the stories focus on drug abuse, self-abuse, and the link between romance and pornography in contemporary urban society. Following the huge success of the stories she published a novel, Two Girls, Fat and Thin (1991), an intense, compelling portrait of disturbance, seen through the relationship of a newspaper writer, Justine Shade, and her editor, Dorothy (both women were sexually abused as children) who are working on mysterious cult figure Anna Granite (based on Ayn *Rand).

GALBRAITH, J(ohn) K(enneth) (1908–), American *Keynesian economist, born in Ontario, Canada, educated at the universities of Toronto, California, and Cambridge. His distinguished career has ranged from academic posts (he was Professor of Economics at Harvard) to journalism (he edited Fortune), government service (he directed the Strategic Bombing Survey after the Second World War), and diplomat (he was United States Ambassador to India during the Kennedy administration). In his public interventions, he remains the foremost voice of a distinctive American brand of liberalism. In economics, his work is in the great tradition of American Institutionalism. Among the most widely read of his early publications are The Great Crash (1961), and his trilogy—American Capitalism (1952), The Affluent Society (1955), and The New Industrial State (1967)—in which disparities of power, wealth, and opportunity are eruditely exposed amongst other unpalatable realities of modern industrial society. Subsequent works include Economics and the Public Purpose (1973), The Nature of Mass Poverty (1979), The Anatomy of Power (1983), The Culture of Contentment (1992), and A Journey through Economic Time (1994). The lucidity with which he presents his subjects, combined with his wit, have contributed to his reputation as one of the most accessible and respected economists of the twentieth century; his television series of the mid-1970s, 'The Age of Uncertainty', brought him a wider audience and increased popularity.

GALE, Patrick (1962–), British novelist, born on the Isle of Wight, educated at Winchester and at New College, Oxford. His first novel, The Aerodynamics of Pork (1986), was followed by Ease (1986), and Kansas in August (1987), a romantic comedy involving a young gay man, his sister, and the lover they both share. Other novels include Facing the Tank (1988) and Little Bits of Baby (1989). In The Cat's Sanctuary (1990), Gale explores the antagonistic relationship between two sisters, one a successful writer, living with her female lover in a farmhouse in Cornwall, the other the widow of a diplomat killed by a terrorist bomb. More ambitious than his previous work, The Facts of Life (1995) is a three-generation saga focusing on the life of Edward Pepper, a Jewish composer exiled from Germany in his youth at the time of the Second World War. In this exuberant exploration of family ties and the nature of survival, Gale combines rich evocations of historical and contemporary situations with a precocious narrative fluency.

GALE, Zona (1874–1938), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Portage, Wisconsin, educated at the University of Wisconsin. Her imaginary hamlet in rural Wisconsin was the setting for a series of short stories, beginning with Friendship Village (1908), which dramatized the shifting patterns of small-town America as it faced the encroachments of modernity. Novels like Birth (1918) and Miss Lulu Bett (1920; Pulitzer Prize) exhibit a more critical perspective on American life. Her later fiction was more preoccupied with spiritualism and the occult. Gale also wrote plays, verse, and more volumes of stories, such as Yellow Gentians and Blue (1927) and Bridal Pond (1930). Her support for Senator Robert LaFollette's Progressive party in Wisconsin drew Gale to such reformist causes as women's rights, pacificism, and prohibition.

GALLANT, Mavis (1922–), Canadian writer, born in Montreal, brought up in Quebec, Ontario and the USA, before returning to Canada in 1941. She then worked with the National Film Board and became a feature writer with the Montreal Standard. During the 1950s she moved to Paris, but Canada frequently features in her writings. She has published several collections of stories, many of which first appeared in The New Yorker and The New York Times Book Review, including The Other Paris (1956), My Heart Is Broken (1964), and From the Fifteenth District: A Novella and Eight Short Stories (1979). Home Truths (1981) includes a perceptive and revealing introduction by Gallant herself, and has three sections, on Canada, on Canadians abroad, and the six stories featuring the young woman Linnet Muir in the Montreal of the 1930s and 1940s. Two novels, Green Water, Green Sky (1959) and A Fairly Good Time (1970), and the stories in Overhead in a Balloon (1985) and In Transit (1988) attest to Gallant's skill at evoking a special combination of location and memory with a poise born not from any dislocation from Canadian life and culture, but from dedication to her art. Her recent collections include The Moslem Wife and Other Stories (1993) and Across the Bridge: Nine Short Stories (1993). Gallant was made an Officer of the Order of Canada in 1981.

GALLOWAY, Janice (1956–), Scottish writer, born in Ayrshire, educated at Glasgow University; she has worked mainly as a teacher. Her first novel, The Trick is to Keep Breathing (1989), focuses on Joy Stone, a young drama teacher rendered almost insane by her lover's accidental death; written in a distinctive fragmentary style with an unusual use of typography, it powerfully evokes the suffering of a woman traumatized by grief. Galloway's talent for experimentation is further displayed in the short stories collected in Blood (1991), and in her novel Foreign Parts (1994), which follows Cassie and Rona, two Scottish welfare workers, through Northern France on a motoring holiday; interwoven with photographs of Cassie's past loves and extracts from travel guides, the novel is both a compassionate exploration of a friendship tested to its limits and a witty account of travelling abroad. The stories collected in Where You Find It (1996) are unsentimental examinations of the diversity of love.

GALSWORTHY, John (1867–1933), British novelist and playwright, born in Coombe, Surrey, the son of a wealthy solicitor; he studied jurisprudence at New College, Oxford. From 1890 to 1895, when he became a full-time writer, he practised as a barrister and travelled extensively; in the course of a voyage in 1892, he began a lasting friendship with Joseph *Conrad. His early works, all published under the pseudonym 'John Sinjohn', include the short stories of From the Four Winds (1897) and Man of Devon (1901) and the novels Jocelyn (1898) and Villa Rubein (1900); the last-named clearly displays the influence of Turgenev's humane realism, establishing the essential mode of Galsworthy's later work. Although respected in literary circles for his virtuosity in matters of form and style, he did not command a wider audience until 1906; in that year he published The Man of Property, the first of his novels to trace the fortunes of the Forsyte family, and enjoyed his first stage success with The Silver Box, which introduced the contrast between poor and privileged families as a recurrent feature of his dramatic writings. The astutely objective but penetrating projection of the values and manners of his own social class begun in The Man of Property was sustained with the continuing treatment of the Forsytes in In Chancery (1920) and To Let (1921); the books were collected with two additional lyrical 'interludes' as *The Forsyte Saga in 1922. A television serialization of the work made in 1967 was broadcast in over forty countries. A Modern Comedy (1929), consisting of The White Monkey (1924), The Silver Spoon (1926), and Swan Song (1928), registers the impact of the First World War on the society of the Forsytes in following a younger generation of the family to maturity. Other works centring on the lives and times of the Forsytes include Soames and Flag (1930), and the stories On Forsyte Change (1930). Maid in Waiting (1931), Flowering Wilderness (1932), and Over the River (1933), which present the history of the Charwells, rural cousins of the Forsytes, were collected as End of the Chapter (1934). Notable among Galsworthy's numerous other novels are The Dark Flower (1913), the most passionately lyrical expression of his erotic and romantic intuitions, and Fraternity (1909), to which the theme of the hypocrisy inherent in social conventions is central. The reservation of explicit moral judgement which characterized his novels is also a feature of his work for the stage, in which, however, his humanitarian concern with social justice is more conspicuously apparent. Strife (1909) dealt with the sufferings of workers and their families during a strike. Galsworthy's participation in campaigns for penal reform was reflected in Justice* (1910), which was instrumental in swaying opinion against the widespread use of solitary confinement. The Skin Game (1920), exposing the aristocracy's jealous sensitivity to change, Loyalties (1922), attacking anti-Semitism, and Escape (1926), an experimentally episodic treatment of a prisoner's flight across Dartmoor, may also be mentioned out of the total of over thirty plays which gained him eminence among the dramatists of the day. In a career of prolific authorship, his other works include numerous volumes of essays, short stories, poetry, and some criticism, notably Two Essays on Conrad (1930). The Order of Merit was conferred on him in 1929, and he received the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1932. Although his novels have retained a substantial popular readership, adverse commentary by D. H. *Lawrence and Virginia *Woolf, who thought his work superficial, was a factor in the decline of his reputation among literary critics. His Collected Works appeared in twenty-six volumes between 1927 and 1934. Catherine Dupré's biography of Galsworthy was published in 1976.

GARDAM, Jane (Mary), née Pearson (1928–), British novelist, born in Coatham, Yorkshire, educated at Bedford College, London University. Her first published work, A Few Fair Days (1971), was a children's book based on her own childhood experiences on the north-east coast of England. She has written several other children's books; her novels A Long Way from Verona (1971), The Summer After the Funeral (1973), and Bilgewater (1977), all with teenage protagonists, are characterized by their combination of literary allusion and dramatic emotional scenes. Her adult novels, God on the Rocks (1978) and Crusoe's Daughter (1988), also depend on literary sources—Emily Brontë and Daniel Defoe—for their portrayal of the repressed romantic child at the mercy of her more worldly elders. This theme recurs in her short stories, The Sidmouth Letters (1980), The Pangs of Love (1983), and Showing the Flag (1989). The stories in Going into a Dark House (1994) are preoccupied with the familiar themes of death, the elderly, and ghosts through which Gardam observes commonplace suffering. Gardam uses her skills at economical scene-setting and local and period detail to dramatize contrasting milieux or class divisions. Recent novels include The Queen of the Tambourine (1991), an epistolary work transforming comedy into discomfort when a woman's obsessive concern for others heralds her undoing; and Faith Fox (1996).

GARDNER, Erle Stanley (1889–1970), American *detective story writer, born in Malden, Massachusetts, and after an adventurous youth admitted to the California Bar in 1911. From 1923 he combined law with writing, contributing hundreds of stories under many pseudonyms to pulp mystery and Western magazines. After the success of his first novel, The Case of the Velvet Claws (1933), which introduced his best-known detective, the Los Angeles lawyer Perry Mason, he devoted himself exclusively to writing, later settling on a ranch in Southern California, where he employed six full-time secretaries and produced over eighty Perry Mason stories, ending with The Case of the Postponed Murder (1977). Fast-moving, with crisp dialogue, and full of legal detail deployed with skill and ingenuity, these deservedly enjoyed immense popularity. His stories about a Californian district attorney, Doug Selby (The D.A. Calls It Murder, 1937) are less successful, but the twenty-nine novels about the private detective partners Donald Lam and Bertha Cool, originally published under the pseudonym of A. A. Fair (such as The Bigger They Come, published in Britain as Lam to the Slaughter, 1939) are fresh and amusing. In 1948 Gardner established the Court of Last Resort, a private organization which examined the cases of prisoners believed to have been unjustly convicted, and succeeded in obtaining a number of releases. Several films have been made of the Perry Mason stories, and a well-known television series in which he is portrayed by Raymond Burr.

GARDNER, Dame Helen (Louise) (1908–86), British scholar, critic, and editor, born in London, educated at St Hilda's College, Oxford, where she taught before becoming Oxford's Merton Professor of English Literature from 1966 until her retirement in 1975. Among her early works was The Art of T. S. Eliot (1949), a subject to which she returned in T. S. Eliot and the English Poetic Tradition (1965) and the highly regarded The Composition of Four Quartets (1978), the first such study to make use of the poet's working drafts. Her editions of Donne's Divine Poems (1952) and Elegies, and Songs and Sonnets (1965) superseded Sir Herbert *Grierson's editorial work on Donne's poetry and are unlikely to be surpassed for textual accuracy. Gardner's numerous other critical works include Edwin Muir (1961), King Lear (1967), and Religion and Literature (1971). The Business of Criticism (1959) and In Defence of the Imagination (1982) express her belief in maintaining the humanist traditions of criticism. She is most widely known as the editor of The New Oxford Book of English Verse (1972).

GARDNER, John (Champlin, Jr) (1933–82), American novelist, poet, short-story writer, editor, and critic, born in Batavia, New York, educated at De Pauw University, Washington University, and the University of Iowa. Gardner successfully combined the life of the teacher and scholar (particularly of medieval and classical literature) with those of novelist, editor, translator, and librettist. After finishing his doctorate at the University of Iowa (he submitted a novel, The Old Men, for his dissertation), Gardner took up his first teaching position at Oberlin College in Ohio in 1958 before moving to California State University at Chico where he taught from 1959 until 1962. His early writings are mainly editorial and critical: he co-edited The Forms of Fiction (1962), and his edition of The Complete Works of the Gawain-Poet in a Modern English Version (1965) was extremely well received. His first novel, The Resurrection (1966), was not successful, but his second, The Wreckage of Agathon (1970), which draws extensively on the literature of classical antiquity, brought him considerable critical attention. His most successful novel was Grendel (1971), in which Gardner reimagines the story of Beowulf from the point of view of the monster; the novel is simultaneously learned, comic, and, at times, deeply moving and offers powerful testimony to Gardner's critical view that literature should be 'wise, sane, and magical'. His later novels include The Sunlight Dialogues (1972), Jason and Medea (1973, a novel in verse), Nickel Mountain (1973), October Light (1976; National Book Critics Circle Award), Freddy's Book (1980), and Mickelsson's Ghosts (1982) thought by many critics to be his most demanding and ambitious novel. Gardner's fiction as a whole explores what he calls 'the nature and ramifications of man's two essential choices, affirmation and denial', and in an age when so much of the fiction of his contemporaries is characterized by submission to life's destructive forces his is notable for its affirmation of the transcendent power of art. His many other writings include one volume of poetry, Poems (1978); the critical studies On Moral Fiction (1978), which caused controversy for the charges of 'immorality' levelled at some of Gardner's contemporaries, and the posthumously published The Art of Fiction: Notes on Craft for Young Writers (1983), both valuable for their articulation of his theories of fiction; several volumes of writings for children, notably A Child's Bestiary (1977) and The King of the Hummingbirds and Other Tales for Children (1977); and three opera libretti, published as Three Libretti (1979). At the time of his death in a motorcycle accident Gardner was a Professor of English at the State University of New York at Binghamton. His fiction has received wide critical attention: among the better studies are David Cowart, Arches and Light: The Fiction of John Gardner (1983) and Dean McWilliams, John Gardner (1990).

GARFITT, Roger (1944–), British poet, born in Wiltshire, educated at Merton College, Oxford. He worked as a schoolteacher for several years before becoming a freelance writer. He was editor of Poetry Review* from 1978 to 1981, and has contributed reviews and articles to most of Britain's leading literary magazines and journals. He has also been a presenter of BBC Radio 3's 'Poetry Now' series. He was married to the poet Frances *Horovitz until her death in 1983. In addition to his inclusion in numerous anthologies he has produced such collections as Caught on Blue (1970), West of Elm (1975), and Given Ground (1989). Many of his poems are notable for their precision and immediacy in presenting incidents and images from the natural world. His work is characterized by a scrupulous quality in its rhythms and diction. His later writing displays a deepening concern with socio-cultural themes, which are treated with the accuracy and integrity for which his earlier work was acclaimed.

GARIOCH, Robert (1909–81), Scottish poet, originally named Robert Garioch Sutherland; he was born in Edinburgh, where he was educated at the university. After a long career as a schoolteacher in England and the east of Scotland, in 1965 he returned to the University of Edinburgh as a lexicographer and transcriber in the School of Scottish Studies. Garioch's poetry is largely written in Scots, out of his stated intention of affirming the separate identity of the Scottish nation. 17 Poems for 6d. in Gaelic, Lowland Scots and English (with Sorley *MacLean, 1940) was the first of numerous collections of his poetry, which include Chuckies on a Cairn (1949), a 'dramatic fantasy' entitled The Masque of Edinburgh (1954), The Big Music (1971), and Doktor Faust in Rose Street (1973). His considerable skills in versification combine with the high-spirited energies of his colloquial diction to remarkable effect in many of the comically satirical poems for which he is best known; recurrent targets were the municipal and cultural pretensions he identified in Edinburgh. He produced many translations into Scots from the works of Pindar, Belli, Apollinaire, and others. His four years as a prisoner of war in Italy and Germany are recorded in the prose memoir Two Men and a Blanket (1973). His Complete Poetical Works, edited by R. Fulton, was published in 1983.

GARLAND, (Hannibal) Hamlin (1860–1940), American novelist and short-story writer, born in West Salem, Wisconsin, educated at Cedar Valley Seminary, Osage, Iowa. Garland is an important figure in the history of American literary realism and one of the foremost exponents of 'local-colorism' or regionalism in American fiction at the turn of the century. In 1884 he moved to Boston where he began his literary and intellectual education, immersing himself in the poetry of Walt Whitman, the fiction of William Dean *Howells, the economics of Henry George, and the writings of evolutionary theorists such as Charles Darwin and Herbert Spencer. His first major publication, Main-Travelled Roads: Six Mississippi Valley Stories (1891), remains his most valuable contribution to American letters. The volume grew over subsequent editions; the final edition of 1922 (for which Garland wrote a preface) contains eleven stories which seek to challenge, and invert, the idyllic picture of life in the Midwest and the Great Plains that was inexorably becoming a powerful American myth. Four novels and a further collection of stories preceded Crumbling Idols: Twelve Essays on Art (1894) in which Garland sets out his theories of art and literature and describes his practice of 'veritism', a synthesis of the innovative ideas of literary impressionism, influenced by his reading of French critics, and the more established techniques of realism and naturalism. Garland attempted to sustain his theory in later works, notably Rose of Dutcher's Coolly (1895). The most important works of his later period are his four volumes of autobiography and family history; of these, A Son of the Middle Border (1917) and A Daughter of the Middle Border (1921) are an invaluable record of life on the frontier. His extensive literary friendships are recorded in Roadside Meetings (1930). See Joseph B. McCullough's Hamlin Garland (1978).

GARLICK, Raymond (1926–), British poet, born in London, educated at University College of North Wales. After working as a schoolteacher in Wales, he taught in the Netherlands from 1960 to 1967, when he became a senior lecturer at Trinity College, Carmarthen. In 1949 he founded the magazine Dock Leaves, later known as The Anglo-Welsh Review, which, until its disappearance in 1988, was one of the principal forums for *Anglo-Welsh poetry. His collections of poetry include A Sense of Europe (1968), A Sense of Time (1972), Incense (1976), Collected Poems 1946–1986 (1987), and Travel Notes (1992). Much of his verse espouses pan-European republicanism, the moral and ideological context in which he locates his intense personal and cultural perceptions of Wales. His best work, much of it reflecting his experiences of France and the Netherlands, combines an energetic mobility of tone and rhythm with the emotional and intellectual force of his political convictions. The best-known of his critical works is An Introduction to Anglo-Welsh Literature (1970). With R. Mathias, he edited Welsh Poetry: 1480–1990 (1993).

GARNER, Helen (1942–), Australian novelist and short-story writer, born in Victoria, educated at the University of Melbourne. Her dismissal from her teaching job in a Melbourne secondary school in 1972, for using explicit language when answering her pupils' questions about sex, became a cause célèbre. She later worked as a journalist, reviewer, and actress, and lived in Paris for a number of years. She achieved immediate success with her first novel, Monkey Grip (1977), which is set in Melbourne during the 1960s and focuses on the relationship between the narrator, Nora, and Javo, a heroin addict. The novel was later filmed. Her other works include two novellas, Honour, and Other People's Children (1980); a novel, The Children's Bach (1984), about the disintegration of a conventional, middle-class marriage; a collection of short stories, Postcards from Surfers (1985), widely acclaimed for its cool portrayal of diverse relationships; and Cosmo Cosmolina (1992), a novella and two linked stories, which make use of *magic realism.

GARNER, Hugh (1913–79), Canadian novelist and short-story writer, born in Batley, Yorkshire, and taken to Canada when he was six. Garner is regarded as one of the major exponents of realism in Canadian fiction. During the 1930s he travelled in the West, eking out a living from whatever temporary employment he could find, and fought for the Loyalists in the Spanish Civil War. His Second World War naval experiences provided the basis for his first novel, Storm Below (1949), which describes six days at sea in 1943. Garner's early life in Cabbagetown, a run-down inner city district of Toronto, underlay Cabbagetown (1950) which initially appeared in a heavily edited version; only when the full text was published in 1968 did it receive critical acclaim as one of Canada's finest social novels. It is written in the clear and direct prose style that characterizes all Garner's fiction and describes the hardship of Depression life in working-class Toronto and the lack of opportunity afforded to the district's youth. Garner's other novels include The Silence on the Shore (1962) and The Intruders (1975), which gives an account of the gentrification of Cabbagetown. His other works include volumes of short stories, three crime novels with Toronto settings (The Yellow Sweater, 1952; Men and Women, 1966; and The Legs of the Lame, 1967), and an autobiography, One Damn Thing after Another (1974). He is the subject of a critical biography by Paul Steuwe: The Storms Below: The Life and Turbulent Times of Hugh Garner (1988).

GARNETT, Constance (Clara) (1862–1946), British translator, born in Brighton, educated at Newnham College, Cambridge. A member of the *Fabian Society, she worked as librarian at the People's Palace in the East End of London. In 1889 she married Edward *Garnett, through whom she met Peter Kropotkin and other exiled Russian revolutionaries. From them she learned Russian in the months before the birth of her son, David *Garnett, in 1892. The following year she made her first journey to Russia, bearing money for the relief of famine in Nizhniy Novgorod and secret communications from her Russian friends in London; she met Tolstoy at Yasnaya Polyana. Upon returning to Britain, she began her monumental endeavour of translating some seventy volumes of Russian prose, including all the novels of Dostoevsky, Gogol, and Turgenev and most of the plays and stories of Chekhov. Her work did much to bring about the widespread influence of the Russian novel on English literature in the early decades of the twentieth century. Biographical material is contained in David Garnett's The Golden Echo (1953) and C. G. Heilbrun's The Garnett Family (1961).

GARNETT, David (1892–1981), British novelist and critic, born in Brighton, the son of E. and C. *Garnett, educated at the Royal College of Science. Prominent among the younger associates of the *Bloomsbury Group, he was involved in a famous ménage à trois with Duncan Grant and Vanessa Bell while working on the land as a conscientious objector during the First World War. He subsequently ran a bookshop in Soho. His greatest success was his first novel, Lady into Fox (1922), a fantasy of metamorphosis in which a woman, transformed into a vixen, gradually becomes unmanageably wild. He continued his success with A Man in the Zoo (1924), in which a man unhappy in love successfully offers himself to a zoo as a human exhibit; The Sailor's Return (1925), in which a seaman attempts to live in a Dorset village with his black wife; The Grasshoppers Come (1931); and the biographical Pocohontas: or the Nonpareil of Virginia (1933). After many years he produced Aspects of Love (1955; later made into a musical by Andrew Lloyd Webber); the fantasies Two by Two (1963) and The Master Cat (1974); and the historical novel The Sons of the Falcon (1972). Garnett published three volumes of autobiography, The Golden Echo (1953), The Flowers of the Forest (1955), and The Familiar Faces (1962); he edited the letters of T. E. *Lawrence (1938), the novels of T. L. Peacock, and Carrington: Letters and Extracts from her Diaries (1979).

GARNETT, Edward (1868–1936), British writer, born in London, the son of Richard Garnett, husband of C. *Garnett, and father of D. *Garnett. For some time he was employed in the British Museum Reading Room. In the early 1900s he became known for his criticism, some of it being later collected as Friday Nights (1922), and plays, notably The Breaking Point (1907), banned by the Examiner of Plays; the play's publication, complete with an impassioned assault upon the Examiner and his principles, marked the start of the long campaign in England to abolish stage censorship. Papa's War (1919) was a collection of satirical fantasies. For many years he was a publisher's reader of great influence, doing much to advance the careers of J. *Conrad, D. H. *Lawrence, E. M. *Forster, and others.

GARRIGUE, Jean (1914–72), American poet, born in Evansville, Indiana, educated at the University of Chicago and the University of Iowa; she held a succession of posts as an instructor in English and poet-in-residence at numerous American colleges and universities, chiefly in the New York area. Her first collection of poetry, The Ego and the Centaur (1947), was acclaimed for the rich precision of diction and imagery which characterizes all her writing. A more confident lyricism emerged in the formally complex poems of The Monument Rose (1953). Her subsequent collections, A Walk by Villa d'Este (1959) and Country Without Maps (1964), drew on her extensive travels in Europe and Asia in poems remarkable for the brilliant acuteness of her descriptive talent. New and Selected Poems (1967) was followed by Studies for an Actress (1973), a collection of elegiac poignancy in which an element of radical political disaffection becomes evident. Her other publications include the novella The Animal Hotel (1966), Essays and Prose Poems (1970), and the short critical study Marianne Moore (1965). Selected Poems appeared in 1992.

GASCOYNE, David (Emery) (1916–), British poet, born in Harrow, Middlesex, educated at Salisbury Cathedral Choir School and Regent Street Polytechnic. His first collection of poetry, Roman Balcony (1932), appeared when he was 16. Advance royalties on his novel Opening Day (1933) enabled him to travel to Paris in 1933, where the work of the surrealistes made a profound impression upon him. His A Short Survey of Surrealism (1935), with his translations of Dali's Conquest of the Irrational (1935) and Breton's What Is Surrealism? (1936), established him as the leading British spokesman for the movement. His disjunctive and often unsettlingly sinister surrealist prose poems were collected in Man's Life Is This Meat (1936). His subsequent volume, Poems 1937–1942 (1943), used richly musical adaptations of conventional verse forms to achieve its striking fusions of vividly observed imagery and visionary intuitions. The collection contains what is considered to be Gascoyne's finest work, much of it forming a powerfully imaginative response to the devastation of warfare. From 1947 until 1964 he lived mainly in France, a period during which his output as a poet underwent a drastic decline. His other works include Night Thoughts (1956), a 'radiophonic poem' commissioned by the BBC, and The Sun at Midnight: Poems and Aphorisms (1970). Collected Poems, with Gascoyne's autobiographical introduction, appeared in 1988. Paris Journal 1937–1939 (1978) and Journal 1936–1937 (1980), jointly published as The Collected Journals in 1990, form valuable accounts of his involvement in the political and artistic movements of the late 1930s. Collected Verse Translations, edited by R. Skelton and A. Clodd, appeared in 1970.

GASS, William H(oward) (1924–), American novelist, short-story writer, and literary critic, born in Fargo, North Dakota, educated at Kenyon College, Ohio Wesleyan University, and Cornell University. For three years he studied philosophy at Cornell where he attended seminars led by the philosopher Ludwig *Wittgenstein which he later referred to as 'the most important intellectual experience of my life'. In 1950 he took up a teaching post at the College of Wooster, Ohio, where he began writing short stories and his first novel, Omensetter's Luck (1966); when the novel was published Gass was fêted as one of the most gifted of the new generation of American writers. From Wooster he subsequently taught philosophy at Purdue University, Indiana. In the Heart of the Heart of the Country (1968; revised edition 1981) is a collection of five short fictional pieces which remains, arguably, Gass's most important work to date. In these stories Gass experiments with a variety of rhetorical styles, notably in the extravagant languages of their otherwise naïf narrators. Fiction and the Figures of Life (1970), a collection of Gass's critical and philosophical essays, contains his important meditation on the nature of fiction, 'The Concept of Character in Fiction'; included also are essays on Jorge Luis Borges, Gertrude *Stein, Robert *Coover, Vladimir *Nabokov, J. F. *Powers, and John *Updike. Willie Masters' Lonesome Wife (1971) is a work of 'mixed-media' fiction; World Within the Word (1978) and Habi- tations of the Word: Essays (1985) are further volumes of essays. The essay On Being Blue: A Philosophical Inquiry (1976) show his great indebtedness to Gertrude Stein's theories of language. Though Gass has been resistant to the categorization of his writings as *'post-modernist' he is generally discussed in a context that includes other American post-modernist writers. William Gass (1990) by Watson L. Holloway is a critical study.

GATES, Henry Louis, Jr (1950–), African-American critic, born in Keyser in West Virginia, educated at Yale and at Cambridge University where his tutor was Wole *Soyinka. He became Professor of English at Duke University. Gates has contributed significantly to the increased accessibility of African-American writings, especially of the pre-twentieth-century period. In Figures in Black: Words, Signs and the Racial Self (1987), Black Letters and the Enlightenment: On Race, Writing and Difference (1986), and The Signifying Monkey: Towards a Theory of Afro-American Literary Criticism (1988), he explores the distinctive nature of black writing by looking to the linguistic and musical feature of black culture, especially the ritual function of language in black tradition. Gates's interest in literary theory seeks to evaluate the most appropriate theoretical approach to black writing. He explores literary expression in Africa and the Caribbean as well as America in the monographs The History and Theory of Afro-American Literary Criticism, 1773–1881 (1978), Black Literature and Literary Theory (1984), The Essential Soyinka (1991), Loose Canons: Notes on the Culture Wars (1992), and Colored People (1993).

GÉBLER, Carlo (1954?–), Irish novelist, born in Dublin; he moved to London with his parents, the writers Ernest Gébler and Edna *O'Brien, at an early age. He graduated from the National Film School. His first novel, The Eleventh Summer (1985), like much of his work, is set in England and in Ireland; it evokes, in clear prose, the slowly changing countryside of Ireland through the childhood memories of Paul Weismann. His other novels include August in July (1986), Work and Play (1987), and Life of a Drum (1990). In Malachy and His Family (1991), he tells the story of a young boy who discovers his father's other family in America and a brother with the same name as himself. The novel is partly set in Ireland, as is a non-fictional volume about Enniskillen, The Glass Curtain: Inside an Ulster Community (1992). He is also the author of some children's fiction and a travelogue, Driving through Cuba: An East–West Journey (1988).

GEE, Maggie (Mary) (1948–), British novelist, born in Poole, Dorset, educated at Somerville College, Oxford. Her first novel, Dying in Other Words (1981), a blackly comic meditation on death focusing around a group of Oxford students, was followed by The Burning Book (1983), an apocalyptic vision of nuclear holocaust, which received widespread critical acclaim. In 1983 she was selected as one of the Book Marketing Council's Best Young British Novelists. Light Years (1985), which concerns a love affair between a rich London socialite and an impoverished writer, is given a certain resonance by its use of cosmic imagery, which links the lives of its protagonists to the movements of the planetary system. Grace (1988), a novel based on a real murder in Britain during the 1980s, of anti-nuclear campaigner Hilda Murrell, fuses political thriller, polemic, and lyrical description of childhood. The sombreness of this work was matched by Where Are the Snows? (1991), a love story which followed its two wilful and solipsistic protagonists, Alexandra and Christopher, across several continents and over several decades as they abandon the responsibilities of their life in London (including the care of Christopher's teenage children). Set against the background of ecological disaster and increasing international tension, the book offers a kind of parable about the selfishness of individual desires. Lost Children (1994) was a return to form with its account of the plight of homeless children in London, focused in its central drama about a mother in search of a lost daughter.

GEE, Maurice (1931–), New Zealand novelist, born in Whakatane in the North Island; educated at the University of Auckland. Gee's first story was published in Landfall* in 1955; his first book, The Big Season (1962), showed his interest in New Zealand small town life which he later developed to great effect. His early fiction includes A Special Flower (1965), My Father's Den (1972), and Games of Choice (1976). In his trilogy, Plumb (1978), Meg (1981), and Sole Survivor (1983), a family study from three perspectives, Gee was able to explore in relentless and absorbing detail the complex interplay of history, politics, and religion in shaping the fortunes of one family's very different members; the final volume takes Gee's saga to the fifth generation. The trilogy remains a major addition to post-war New Zealand fiction; not least of its triumphs is its ability to accommodate sharply individual, if not eccentric, and more broadly international themes and issues. It was followed by the novel Prowlers (1987), a book of similar focus, while Burning Boy (1990) confirms Gee's craftsmanship and natural understatement. In Going West (1992) the narrator's unvarnished account of the life of his dead friend, a noted poet and ne'er-do-well, contrasts with the literary pieties of his biographer's version; the chilling Crime Story (1994) is set at the interface of politics, high finance, and the criminal underworld. Stories in A Glorious Morning Comrade (1974) were republished as Collected Stories (1986). David Hill's critical study Introducing Maurice Gee appeared in 1981.

GELBER, Jack (1932–), American dramatist, born in Chicago, educated at the University of Illinois. Gelber is chiefly famous for his play about drug addiction, The Connection (1959), produced by the *Living Theatre in 1959 when it ran for over 700 performances. His other plays are The Apple (1961), Square in the Eye (1965), The Cuban Thing (1968), Sleep (1972), Barbary Shore (adapted from Norman *Mailer's novel) (1973), Farmyard (1975), Rehearsal (1976), and Starters (1980). Gelber is clearly influenced by Pirandello, Brecht, and Samuel *Beckett, most obviously in the way his plays experiment with the relationship between audience and performers within the context of the illusionist scenario of theatrical space. Thus in The Connection, the title refers not only to the user and pusher of the drug world, but also to the actors and audience in the theatre. The experimental, disruptive, sometimes baffling world of Gelber's plays makes no concession to the orthodoxies of the theatrical event, as in his use of Brechtian alienation techniques, and his persistent questioning of the distinction between fiction and reality.

GELLHORN, Martha (1908–), American novelist and journalist, born in St Louis, Missouri, educated at Bryn Mawr College, Philadelphia. Her career began as Paris correspondent for the New Republic*. Her fiction, which is noted for its clarity and directness, is invariably informed by her experiences as a journalist and traveller. The Trouble I've Seen (1936), a set of four novellas, originated in her investigations of urban poverty during the American Depression. In 1937 she became a war correspondent with Collier's magazine and met Ernest *Hemingway (to whom she was married from 1940 to 1945) while covering the Spanish Civil War; the short stories in The Heart of Another (1941) portray American reporters in Spain. Her subsequent novels include A Stricken Field (1940), set in Prague on the eve of the Second World War; His Own Man (1961), on expatriate life in Paris; and The Lowest Trees Have Tops (1969), which is set in Mexico. Among her further collections of short stories are The Honeyed Peace (1954), Two by Two (1958), and The Weather in Africa (1978); The Short Novels of Martha Gellhorn appeared in 1991. Her journalism is collected in The Face of War (1959), reports from a succession of major conflicts in Europe and Asia, and The View from the Ground (1988), articles on a wide range of social and political topics. Travels with Myself and Another (1979) is an autobiography.

GEMS, Pam (1925–), British dramatist, born in Hampshire, educated at Manchester University. She was in her forties, and had worked as a gardener and a research assistant at the BBC, when she began to write plays. Her best work has involved the place of women in society—and especially that of the woman of passion and energy in a society hostile to those things—and combines feminist conviction with openness of mind and a sense of moral complexity. It includes Dusa, Fish, Stas and Vi (1976), a serious and sometimes moving comedy about disparate young women sharing a flât in London; Queen Christina (1977), about the great Swedish monarch; Piaf (1978), a tough, unsentimental portrait of the French singer; and a new version of La Dame aux Camelias, Camille (1984). The last three plays were first performed by the Royal Shakespeare Company, as was Gems's study of the French Revolution, The Danton Affair (1986). Other plays include Aunt Mary (1982); Loving Women (1984), about two young women's involvement with the same man; and Deborah's Daughter (1994), about the widow of an oil magnate who, with her daughter, gets caught up in a coup in an unnamed North African country. She has also written for television, and adapted Chekhov's Uncle Vanya (1979) and The Cherry Orchard (1982), Ibsen's A Doll's House (1980), and Lorca's Yerma (1993) for the stage.

Georgian Poetry: originally the title of a series of five poetry anthologies produced between 1912 and 1922, the term is more generally applied to predominantly rural and stylistically conventional verse of the kind the books tended to contain. The series was conceived by Edward *Marsh, who proposed to invigorate English poetry at a time when it remained dominated by late Victorian reputations; the title Georgian Poetry reflected the enthusiastic sense of a new era that accompanied the accession of George V in 1910. Rupert *Brooke, strongly favoured by Marsh and regarded as a leading Georgian, publicized the venture and Harold *Monro acted as publisher. In commercial terms the series was highly successful. The following were eminent among the total of thirty-six poets who contributed to the anthologies: Lascelles *Abercrombie, Gordon *Bottomley, W. H. *Davies, Walter *de la Mare, Wilfrid *Gibson, Ralph *Hodgson, James *Stephens, and Andrew *Young. While these and others produced work of note, the pedestrian rhythms, rural sentimentality, and imaginative banality of much of the verse has given 'Georgian' a distinct pejorative sense in the modern critical vocabulary. The blank verse dramas contributed by Abercrombie, Bottomley, and Gibson were among the most interesting material published in the series. Although the anthologies contained work by Edmund *Blunden, Robert *Graves, and Siegfried *Sassoon, the most talented of the younger Georgian poets, Marsh did not publish any of the more disturbing examples of their *war poetry; objections to the constraints imposed by his taste were voiced by Graves and Sassoon, the latter choosing not to be represented in the final volume of the series. D. H. *Lawrence was another contributor who disagreed with Marsh's fundamentally conservative views on questions of form and content. After Marsh discontinued the series in 1922, coincidentally but aptly the year in which The Waste Land appeared, J. C. *Squire's London Mercury provided a platform for Georgian verse, and a target for its detractors, for whom it represented the antithesis to poetic *Modernism. F. Swinnerton's The Georgian Literary Scene, 1910–1935 (1950) surveys the social and cultural contexts of Georgian poetry.

GERHARDIE (originally GAERHARDI), William (Alexander) (1895–1977), British novelist, born in St Petersburg. He served in the British embassy at Petrograd, and the British military mission in Siberia during the First World War, after which he was educated at Worcester College, Oxford. There he wrote Anton Chehov (sic) (1923), the first book on Chekhov to be written in English, and his first novel, Futility: A Novel on Russian Themes (1922), which enjoyed a considerable succès d'estime, winning the praises of H. G. *Wells and Edith *Wharton among others. The novel captured the mood of the 1920s and is remarkable for the informal, conversational manner with which great recent events—the Russian Revolution and its aftermath—are presented. Gerhardie led a very social life, with many love affairs, and enjoyed the friendship of Wells and *Beaverbrook. His second novel, The Polyglots (1925), concerns George Hamlet Alexander Diabologh, a young officer who, on a military mission in the Far East, encounters a highly eccentric Belgian family. The novel has a Chekhovian mingling of comedy and tragedy, of the inconsequential and the grave. Pending Heaven (1930) is the story of Paradise deferred for two literary friends who are also rivals in love. Resurrection (1934) derives from an actual experience of Gerhardie's when he felt his spirit rise from his body, and argues passionately for life after death. Of Mortal Love (1936) draws on Gerhardie's considerable amatory experience. His lively autobiography Memoirs of a Polyglot (1931) was followed by The Romanovs (1940), a historical biography of the Russian dynasty. For the rest of his life he lived increasingly as a recluse. Michael *Holroyd and Robert Skidelsky edited God's Fifth Column (1981), a biography. His name appeared as Gerhardie for the first time on the revised collected edition of his works, published in ten volumes in the early 1970s. There is a biography by Dido Davies (1990).

Getting of Wisdom, The, a novel by Henry Handel *Richardson, published in 1910. The novel is based on the author's experiences as a boarder at the Presbyterian Ladies College, in Melbourne, during 1883 to 1887. It consists in a series of ironically depicted scenes whereby Laura Rambotham, ostracized by her teachers and peers because of her name, unusual clothes, and forthright opinions, painfully acquires wisdom about herself and the world. Torn between a defiant individuality and the desire to gain approval, she learns that the 'unpardonable sin is to vary from the common mould'. Though personally immune to male appeal, she seeks to distinguish herself by inventing an intrigue with the local curate; new depths of rejection and misery result upon her exposure. A period of obsequiousness and caution is followed by a genuine friendship and acceptance into the school's prestigious literary society. Her final piece of wisdom comes when an appeal to God is apparently answered by an opportunity to cheat in her examinations; Laura takes the opportunity, subsequently resenting God as a double-dealing and pitiless being. Regarded as a classic portrait of the artist as an awkward adolescent, the novel was successfully produced as a film in 1977.

GHOSE, Zulfikar (1935–), Pakistani-American novelist and poet, born in Sialkot (now Pakistan); he lived in England from 1952 to 1969, and later became a professor at the University of Texas. He is the author of several volumes of poetry, including The Loss of India (1964), The Violent West (1972), and A Memory of Asia (1984); his Selected Poems were published in Pakistan in 1991. His first novel, The Contradictions (1966), was followed by The Murder of Aziz Khan (1969). Both works are set in the Indian subcontinent, but several others, including The Beautiful Empire (1975), A Different World (1978), A New History of Torment (1982), and Figures of Enchantment (1986) have a Latin American background; they have been described as 'picaresque prose epics of Brazilian history' and 'tales of the South American unknown'. In his novel The Triple Mirror of the Self (1992) Ghose juxtaposes his imaginative recreations of 'primitive' Latin America with pictures of recent Peruvian history and accounts of a boyhood in colonial India and a student's life in 1950s Britain. Whereas the segments that are set in the rainforest are mainly concerned with erotic fantasies, the Peruvian section is a convincing analysis of nationalism and expatriation. The Triple Mirror is a conflation of all Ghose's previous preoccupations and concerns, an exile's lyrical reclamation of lost sources, and a manifesto of the artist as dreamer and philosopher.

GHOSH, Amitav (1956–), Indian novelist, travel writer, and anthropologist, born in Calcutta, educated at Delhi University and at Oxford. His writings in all genres display his experiences of a variety of cultures. His first novel, The Circle of Reason (1986), was praised by some critics for its spontaneity and vitality, but others found it derivative of Rushdie's Midnight's Children* and the school of *magic realism. His second, more original and accomplished novel, The Shadow Lines (1988), chronicles the intertwined destinies of an Indian and an English family over several decades and generations, and is particularly effective in its imagistic and documentary recreations of Ghosh's native Bengal. Though complex in structure and narrative technique, the novel indicates a return by younger Indian authors to a mode more sober than the flamboyant post-modernism of *Rushdie and his imitators. In an Antique Land (1992) conflates fictional techniques and historical research in an ambitious evocation of Egypt's richly eclectic past and its increasingly puritanical present. Ghosh's accounts of his travels have appeared in Granta* magazine.

GIBBON, Lewis Grassic, pseudonym of James Leslie MITCHELL (1901–35), Scottish writer, born in Aberdeenshire; he grew up in Kincardineshire, the setting of his great trilogy, A Scots Quair (1932–4). He worked on the Aberdeen Journal and Scottish Farmer before joining the Royal Army Service Corps and the RAF, travelling extensively throughout Persia, India, and Egypt. His experiences enliven his early fiction, Hanno (1928), Stained Radiance (1930), and The Calends of Cairo (1931), and a further group of novels—The Thirteenth Disciple (1931), Three Go Back (1932), and The Lost Trumpet (1932)—express his interest in the then fashionable theory of Diffusionism. The three volumes of A Scots Quair (Sunset Song, 1932; Cloud Howe, 1933; and Grey Granite, 1934) comprise an epic account of the tensions and contradictions within Scottish history, seen through the life of a young woman, Chris Guthrie, voiced in a vigorously colloquial Scots. Chris's life takes her from country to town and city, and the narrative both intensifies a personal history and invests it with mythic resonance. The author's political sympathies are also prominent in Spartacus (1933). Gibbon was involved in various projects associated with Hugh *MacDiarmid, and he is a pivotal figure in the *Scottish Renaissance.

GIBBONS, Stella (Dorothea) (1902–89), British novelist and short-story writer, born in London, educated at University College, London. She worked for the Evening Standard, and as book reviewer for The Lady. The latter occupation presumably suggested the elements of literary parody that made her first novel, Cold Comfort Farm* (1932), so successful. Its continuing popularity has obscured her other novels—she wrote over twenty, plus four collections of stories—though they tend to be sentimental comedies of manners involving a clash of social codes. In Ticky (1943), a dispute arises between the officers of a Victorian regiment and their hapless servants over possession of the Pleasure Grounds; as in Cold Comfort Farm, harmony is restored between the classes and celebrated by marriages. Westwood (1946) evokes wartime London, and Here Be Dragons (1956), life in Hampstead, both works in which a girl gains self-knowledge from contacts with another stratum of society. Gibbons, elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature in 1950, retired from writing novels with The Woods in Winter (1970).

GIBSON, Graeme (1934–), Canadian novelist, born in London, Ontario, educated at the University of Edinburgh and the University of Western Ontario. He taught at Ryerson Polytechnic Institute, Toronto, from 1961 to 1968. Since 1973, he has lived with the novelist Margaret *Atwood. Five Legs (1969), his first novel, and its sequel Communion (1971), present an analysis of the cultural ills of modern Canada in their narratives of man's defective relations with nature and the worsening breakdown of social cohesion. Set in nineteenth-century Ontario, Perpetual Motion (1982) is widely regarded as his finest work; the chief protagonist's fanatical project of harnessing natural energies to run a perpetual motion machine allegorizes the modern world's obsessive exploitation of the environment. Gentleman Death (1995) is a more recent novel. Gibson's other works include the interviews collected in Eleven Canadian Novelists (1973).

GIBSON, Wilfrid (Wilson) (1878–1962), British poet, born at Hexham, Northumberland, the upland landscapes and communities of which strongly inform much of his writing. He became a social worker in the East End of London in 1912, when he met Edward *Marsh and Rupert *Brooke; he developed a close friendship with the latter, who bequeathed him a share in his posthumous royalties. With Lascelles *Abercrombie and John *Drinkwater, in 1912 he founded New Numbers, in which Brooke's celebrated 1914 sonnet sequence first appeared. His early collections included Stonefolds (1907), a series of short verse dialogues set in the Northumbrian fells, which also provide the setting for Krindlesdyke (1922), the most ambitious of his numerous verse-dramas. He established a firm reputation through his work's appearances in Georgian Poetry*; his poetry is distinguished, however, from the sentimental pastoralism associated with the Georgians by the realism with which he presents the rigours of rural experience. Battle (1915) contains the majority of the poems relating to his period of active service on the Western Front, which remain his best-known work. The increasingly urban social consciousness that becomes evident in Fires (1912) is central to the long poems of Livelihood (1917), which base their narratives in documentary accounts of industrial conditions. Collected Poems, 1905–1925 was published in 1926. His later collections, which continue to display his concern with the experiences of factory workers, include Hazards (1930), The Alert (1940), and The Searchlights (1943).

GIBSON, William (Ford) (1948–), American novelist and screenwriter, born in Conway, British Columbia, educated at the University of British Columbia. He became renowned as the main inventor of *Cyberpunk on the publication of his first novel, Neuromancer (1984), which is recognized as the seminal text of that movement. With this novel and its sequels Count Zero (1986) and Mona Lisa Overdrive (1988), Gibson has created a sense of the near future where Japanese corporations dominate a cybernetic universe in which its protagonists scramble for survival in an information network called 'cyberspace'. Clearly not himself computer literate, Gibson has succeeded in creating an environment existentially shaped by the information revolution. Beneath a polished exterior these works are highly romantic and show the influence of R. *Chandler's Philip Marlowe. The Difference Engine (1990), written with Bruce *Sterling, is an 'Alternate World' analysis of a nineteenth-century Britain transformed by the success of Charles Babbage's computer; Virtual Light (1993) is set in Near Future San Francisco. Gibson's short fiction has been collected in Burning Chrome (1986).

Gift, The, a novel by Vladimir *Nabokov, published in 1938. Generally considered the greatest of Nabokov's Russian works, The Gift was published as Dar in Paris (1937–8) under Nabokov's pseudonym of V. Sirin, though this edition lacked the fourth chapter which was not restored until the New York publication (again in Russian) in 1952; the English translation appeared in 1963. The novel explores one of Nabokov's great thematic preoccupations, the life of the émigré intellectual and writer (one that he himself lived), through the story of the poet and critic Fyodor Godunov-Cherdyntsev over three years of his life in Berlin in the 1920s. Each of the five long chapters enlarges the narrator's story while at the same time exploring what are, for Nabokov, important aspects of the Russian cultural and literary tradition. The second chapter is famous for its interweaving of details of the life of Fyodor's father with a biographical and critical account of the works of Alexander Pushkin. The fourth chapter, deleted from the first French edition, concerns the nineteenth-century social critic Nikolai Chernyshevsky and is reputed to have caused much offence to those Russian émigré writers and intellectuals who had read it.

GILBERT, Kevin (1933–), Australian part-Aboriginal writer, born in Condoblin, New South Wales. Orphaned at seven, and brought up in welfare homes and by relations, he worked as a labourer, and married early. Found guilty in 1956 of murdering his wife, Gilbert was sentenced to life imprisonment, and in this environment developed interests in both art and literature. On his parole in 1971, The Cherry Pickers (perf. 1971; pub. 1988), written in prison, was the first play by an Aboriginal writer to be performed in Australia. A book of verse, End of Dreamtime (1971), was heavily edited and changed without Gilbert's permission; an authorized version of his poems is People ARE Legends (1978), while The Blackside (1990) collects the best of Gilbert's past work, together with later verse to give a formidable impression of his talent, and a searing reflection on modern Australia. The experience of 'white' interference with Aboriginal texts was discussed by some of his subjects in the series of interviews, Living Black: Blacks Talk to Kevin Gilbert (1977) where the 'white' machinery of the tape recorder was suspect even in black hands. He has continued his work of promoting direct representation of Aboriginal literature in Inside Black Australia: An Anthology of Aboriginal Poetry (1988) and has written of the environmental and historical factors in contemporary Aboriginal culture in Because a White Man'll Never Do It (1994). He has also published books for children.

GILBERT, Martin (John) (1936–), British biographer and historian, born in London, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1962 he became a fellow of Merton College, Oxford. From 1968 to 1988 Gilbert was engaged in completing the biography of Sir Winston *Churchill, having formerly been research assistant to Randolph Churchill, the author of the first two volumes (1966, 1967); the subsequent six volumes appeared in 1971, 1975, 1976, 1983, 1986, and 1988. The work, which includes seven 'companion volumes' reprinting documents of historical importance, is regarded as the largest biography in the history of publishing; In Search of Churchill (1994) is an account of his experiences. Gilbert's numerous publications as a modern historian include The European Powers, 1900–1945 (1965), Exile and Return: The Emergence of Jewish Statehood (1978), The Holocaust (1986), and The First World War (1993). Shcharansky: Hero of Our Time (1986) is among his other works as a biographer. The Churchill War Papers (vol. i) appeared in 1993.

GILCHRIST, Ellen (1935–), American short-story writer and novelist, born in Grace, Mississippi, educated at Millsaps College; she later worked in a variety of journalistic occupations. Though Gilchrist began her writing career as a poet, it was the publication of her first volume of stories, In the Land of Dreamy Dreams (1981), that placed her in the ranks of noted Southern women writers, inspired by Katherine Anne *Porter, Eudora *Welty, and Flannery *O'Connor, but more contemporary and less Gothic in tone. Her novel The Annunciation (1983) was followed by a second collection of short fiction, Victory over Japan (1984), which returned to the familiar Southern scenes of her first book; it was compared favourably with the work of Southern peers Anne *Tyler and Ellen *Douglas. Gilchrist excels in portrayals of Southern family life, through the perspectives of affluent middle-aged women, chronicling with zest and humour their affairs, preoccupations, and ambivalent relationships. Her third collection, Drunk with Love (1986), was praised for the limpid grace of its language, but her limitation of range and growing interest in 'New Age' terminology and thought, most particularly in the autobiographical Falling Through Space: The Author's Journals (1987) and the novel The Anna Papers (1988), the account of a cancer-ridden woman's celebratory suicide, has been less well received. I Cannot Get You Close Enough (1990) is a collection of linked novellas. Some of her best stories were collected in The Blue Eyed Buddhist in 1990.

Giles Goat-Boy; or, The Revised New Syllabus, a novel by John *Barth, published in 1966. Giles Goat-Boy, John Barth's fourth novel, depicts a world which has become a vast university divided into two 'campuses', East and West, each of which is controlled by huge, seemingly omnipotent computers. The novel is, in effect, an ambitious science-fictional spoof, and, despite its somewhat excessive length, is frequently immensely funny and merciless in its satire. The title refers to the novel's 'hero', Giles Goat-Boy, the world's first programmed man who, though the son of a computer, is reared by a herd of goats; the subtitle alludes to a kind of revised mythology, a new 'New Testament', which will replace the outmoded myths of the past. Giles Goat-Boy's adventures form the essentially picaresque framework which structures the novel.

GILL, (Arthur) Eric (Rowton) (1882–1940), British stone-carver, engraver, letter-cutter, and typographer, born in Brighton, educated at the Central School of Arts and Crafts, London. His home in Ditchling became the centre of a group of artists which included David *Jones. Having become a Roman Catholic in 1913, Gill carved the Stations of the Cross (1914–18) at Westminster Cathedral; this and Prospero and Ariel on Broadcasting House are among his most famous sculptures. Gill designed the printing types 'Perpetua' and 'Gill Sans-Serif' for the Monotype Corporation and typefaces for Robert Gibbings's Golden Cockerel Press, for which he also produced woodcarvings for many of its books including The Four Gospels (1941). In his books Gill frequently stressed the religious nature of artistic and physical beauty; they include Christianity and Art (1927), Art-Nonsense and Other Essays (1929), The Necessity of Belief (1936), and an Autobiography (1940). He also wrote a number of erotic works. A biography by Fiona MacCarthy of 1989 revealed some interesting and less pleasant aspects of his life including incestuous relationships with two sisters and two daughters.

GILLIATT, Penelope (1932–93), British novelist and short-story writer, born in London, educated at Queen's College. She worked at the Institute of Pacific Relations in New York before beginning her long career as a distinguished film critic with the Observer and the New Yorker*; her criticism is collected in Unholy Fools (1971) and Three Quarter Face (1980). Her first novel, One By One (1965), gained wide notice for its wittily pessimistic evocation of a plague in modern London. The seriocomic element is common to all her fiction, as is her economy of style and acute social observation, notably of middle-class mores. A State of Change (1967), which concerns a Polish girl's displacement in London after the Second World War, was followed by The Cutting Edge (1978), a remarkable treatment of the emotional bond between two brothers in very different circumstances, Mortal Matters (1983), an ironic comparison of the values of succeeding generations, and A Woman of Singular Occupation (1988), a disquieting love-story set in Istanbul on the eve of the First World War. Her numerous collections of short stories include What's It Like Out? (1968), Splendid Lives (1977), 22 Stories (1986), and Lingo (1990). Gilliatt also wrote several plays and the highly acclaimed screenplay for Sunday Bloody Sunday (1971). She was married to John *Osborne (1963–68).

GILMAN, Charlotte (Anna) Perkins (1860–1935), American novelist and social theorist, born in Hartford, Connecticut. After an insecure and unhappy childhood she studied art, and supported herself by teaching until her marriage to Charles Stetson in 1884. After recurrent periods of severe depression she left her husband, moved to California, and wrote 'The Yellow Wallpaper' (1892), a chilling fantasy of mental breakdown whose subtext is a powerful critique of women's enforced passivity under patriarchy. She became a dedicated champion of women's right to economic independence and 'world work'; several polemic studies, of which Women and Economics (1898) was the most famous, established her as a leading theorist of the early feminist movement. Happily married to her cousin George Gilman in 1900, she continued lecturing and writing on issues of gender and social organization, and popularized many of her ideas in fictional form: a stream of short stories and serialized novels, including What Diantha Did (1912) and Benigna Machiavelli (1914), appeared in her own monthly magazine The Forerunner. Though sometimes over-schematic, Gilman's fiction at its best, notably in the lively feminist utopia Herland (1915), conveys a challenging vision of alternative possibilities. Aged 75, she committed suicide rather than prolong a losing battle with cancer. See also UTOPIA AND ANTI-UTOPIA.

GILMORE, Dame Mary (1865–1962), Australian poet, born in New South Wales. After a childhood spent in the bush, she taught in mining towns and in Sydney, and became involved with contemporary radical movements. Her poetry first appeared in Bulletin* from 1903 onwards, and in 1912 she published her first collection, Marri'd and Other Verses. This was followed by numerous others, including The Passionate Heart (1918), an indictment of war; The Tilted Cart (1925); The Wild Swan (1930); and Under the Wilgas (1932), in all of which she combined short, lyrical poems with polemical outbursts against injustice and inhumanity. Battlefields (1939) contains her most strongly radical verse. Her last volume, Fourteen Men (1954), published when she was almost 90, offers her calm reflections on death. She also published two volumes of reminiscences and anecdotes, Old Days: Old Ways (1934) and More Recollections (1935), both of which express her love of the Australian landscape and her concern for the Aboriginal people. She was created a Dame for her services to literature and society in 1936.

GILROY, Beryl (*c.*1925–), Guyanese novelist and autobiographical writer, born in Berbice, British Guiana (now Guyana). She moved to Britain in 1951, where she worked for the BBC Caribbean service. She later became a schoolteacher in London and a counselling psychologist. Her autobiographical book, Black Teacher (1976), hard-hitting, but often cheerful and humorous in tone, examines primary education and racial discrimination in Britain. Set in Guyana, her first novel, Frangipani House (1986), deals with 'Mama King', an elderly grandmother fighting to liberate herself from the eponymous 'home' for people like her, and also from her past. Compassionate, wry, and psychologically acute, yet fundamentally optimistic, the novel questions many current assumptions about old age. Her second novel, Boy Sandwich (1989), exposes how the elderly are treated in London. Sunlight on Sweet Water (1994) is a collection of short stories with an autobiographical undertone, set in British Guiana in the 1930s and 1940s. Love in Bondage: Steadman and Joanna (1991), a historical romance based on the journals of John Steadman, tells of the marriage of an eighteenth-century Dutch soldier to a slave-woman.

GINSBERG, Allen (1926–), American poet, born in New Jersey, educated at Columbia University. After working in various capacities from 1948 to 1954, he settled in San Francisco where Howl and Other Poems* was published in 1956, establishing him as the most widely noted participant in the *San Francisco Renaissance. The influence of William Carlos *Williams, whom he had known since the late 1930s, was apparent in a number of the collection's precisely observed and rhythmically flexible shorter lyrics. Kaddish and Other Poems (1961) confirmed his reputation as a poet of idiosyncratic accomplishment and direct emotional appeal. Taking its title from the Jewish form of prayer for the dead, the title poem mourns and celebrates Ginsberg's mother; the political perspective established by treatment of her socialist convictions provides the basis for the poem's continuation of his uncompromising critique of American society, which subsequently extended into his public role as a protester against the Vietnam War (see VIETNAM WRITING). During the later 1960s he was internationally pre-eminent among the proselytizers of 'flower power', a term of his coinage, and its associated cults of hallucinogenic drugs and Eastern mysticism. Among numerous subsequent collections are Planet News (1968), The Fall of America (1972), Mind Breaths (1978), Plutonian Ode (1981), Collected Poems 1947–1980 (1985), White Shroud (1987), and Cosmopolitan Greeting (1994). Although Ginsberg occasionally uses rhymed forms, his most impressive work remains typified by rhythmically charged free verse, often conveying his visionary political philosophy or autobiographically discursive cultural commentary; in either mode he frequently demonstrates the disarming qualities, among them a highly developed sense of the absurd, which prompted Christopher *Ricks to classify him as 'a great comic poet'. His numerous other works include The Yage Letters, a correspondence with William *Burroughs (1963), and Journals: Early Fifties–Early Sixties (edited by Gordon Ball, 1977). Allen Ginsberg (1989) is a biography by Barry Miles. See also UNDERGROUND POETRY.

GIOVANNI, Nikki (Yolande Cornelia) (1943–), African-American poet, born in Knoxville, Tennessee, educated at Fisk University, Nashville, University of Pennsylvania School of Social Work, Philadelphia, and Columbia University, New York. She has held several academic appointments. Her poetry reflects the political turbulence, and African-American struggle for civil rights, of the late 1960s and early 1970s. Colloquial and expansive in style, the poems are notable for their revolutionary political rhetoric. The Women and the Men (1975) is generally considered to be her best volume. Other collections include Black Judgement (1968), My House (1972), and Those Who Ride the Night Winds (1983). Her other books include Gemini: An Extended Autobiographical Statement on My First Twenty-Five Years of Being a Black Poet (1971), A Dialogue: James Baldwin and Nikki Giovanni (1973), A Poetic Equation: Conversations Between Nikki Giovanni and Margaret Walker (1974), Sacred Cows (1988), a collection of essays, and Racism 101 (1994), on African-American social conditions. Grand Mothers (1994) and Knoxville, Tennessee (1994) are poems for children. She is also a compelling performer of her own work, which is recorded in Legacies (1976) and The Reason I Like Chocolate (1976).

Giovanni's Room, a novel by James *Baldwin, published in 1956. The candour of Baldwin's treatment of homosexuality gave the novel something of a succès de scandale. Told in the first person by a young white American, it is a story of sexual evasion, infatuation, and betrayal. David, whose true inclinations are homosexual, arrives in Paris, where he encounters Giovanni, a young Italian waiter, with whom he falls in love. The feeling is reciprocated and David goes to live with Giovanni in a seedy little room which takes on the quality of a retreat for both the lovers. However, on holiday in Spain, David becomes involved with an American girl and, unable to stand the strain of being sexually unconventional, asks her to marry him, eschewing Giovanni and his milieu entirely. Giovanni, deeply hurt and now out of work, is forced to return to his former lover, a gross man who disgusts him and whom he eventually murders. When David learns of this terrible event, and that Giovanni is to die by the guillotine, he is shocked into some kind of emotional honesty. Despite its taut construction and vividly evoked background, the novel occasionally betrays its author's ambivalence towards his characters, and indeed his central theme, and is therefore, perhaps, not wholly successful; however, it deserves its reputation and its place in literary history for the sensitivity and tenderness with which homosexual love is rendered.

GITTINGS, Robert (William Victor) (1911–92), British biographer and poet, born in Portsmouth, educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he was a supervisor in History from 1933 to 1940. He subsequently worked as a writer and producer with the BBC and became a freelance writer in 1963. His earlier collections of poetry include Wentworth Place (1952), the title sequence of which centres on incidents during the latter part of John Keats's life, and Famous Meetings (1953), which recreates encounters between historical personages; both make imaginative use of dramatic monologue forms. Among his further collections are This Tower My Prison (1961) and American Journey (1972), which contains 'In Memoriam of John Berryman', one of the finest tributes to that poet. A Collected Poems was produced in 1976. Although Gittings's poetry sustains a high level of technical competence and interest, his achievements as a biographer are more highly valued. John Keats (1968), Young Thomas Hardy (1975), and The Older Hardy (1979) have earned him wide recognition as one of the most eminent of modern literary biographers; Claire Clairmont and the Shelleys (1992) was written with his wife, Jo Manton. The Makers of Violence (1951) and Out of This Wood (1955) are amongst his plays.

GLASGOW, Ellen (1874–1945), American novelist, born in Richmond, Virginia, the first major novelist of the South. Her first novel, The Descendant (1897), was followed by The Voice of the People (1900), which began her long series of novels charting the social and political history of the South from the Antebellum through the Civil War to the ravages of the 'carpetbaggers' during the Reconstruction and the subsequent assimilation of the Southern states into the Union. Emulating Balzac, she divided her novels into different groups: 'Novels of the Commonwealth (dealing with the Virginian past)'; 'Novels of the Country'; and 'Novels of the City'. The earliest of these include The Battleground (1902), The Deliverance (1904), The Wheel of Life (1906), The Ancient Law (1908), The Romance of a Plain Man (1909), and The Miller of Old Church (1911). In Virginia (1913), a poignant study of a woman brought up to be nothing but a social ornament, and Life and Gabriella (1916), she focuses her powers of empathy and analysis on the condition of women. Three novels of political and social conflict followed: The Builders (1919), Old Man in His Time (1922), and Barren Ground* (1925); and three penetrating satirical novels of manners: The Romantic Comedians (1926), They Stooped to Folly (1929), and The Sheltered Life (1932). In Vein of Iron (1935), Glasgow returns to the theme of rural life, exploring the qualities of endurance necessary for survival in the harsh environment of which she writes. In This Our Life (1941; Pulitzer Prize) describes an aristocratic Virginian family fallen into decadence. Her posthumously published autobiography The Woman Within (1954) movingly describes her tormented emotional life and her aspirations for her fiction.

GLASPELL, Susan (1876–1948), American novelist and dramatist, born in Davenport, Iowa, educated at Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa. Glaspell wrote ten novels and many short stories but made her enduring reputation as a playwright. In 1913 she married George Cram Cook, writer, director, and moving spirit behind one of the most important theatre companies in modern American history, the Provincetown Players, who discovered Eugene *O'Neill. With Cook and O'Neill she wrote and acted for this company until Cook's death in 1924. Her best plays are Trifles (1920), The Outside (1920), Inheritors (1921), and The Verge (1924); her last play, Alison's House (1930), was a popular success. Of her novels, Fidelity (1915), Brook Evans (1928), The Morning Is Near Us (1939), and Judd Rankin's Daughter (1945) have survived best. Her autobiography The Road to the Temple appeared in 1927. As a dramatist her work is marked by a degree of formal experimentalism evident in the sparse settings and characterization of The Outside, and more obviously in her most extravagant work, The Verge. In this symbolist drama the heroine, Claire Archer (her name suggests both clarity and ambition), repudiates the roles of wife, mother, and finally, lover, in a desperate search for release into a new mode of being for which her amateur work as a scientific experimenter with hybrid plants acts as a metaphor. In her novels as in her plays, Glaspell's concern with the social role of women is repeatedly pictured through her representation of sexual deprivation and marital despair, often in a frontier landscape.

Glass Menagerie, The, a play by Tennessee *Williams, produced in 1944 and published in 1945. Partly expressionist in form, it is the play in which Williams came to terms with the emotional side of his own early life in St Louis, and in doing so, greatly extended the range of contemporary American theatre. Tom Wingfield, who stands for Williams himself and who also acts as narrator/chorus, lives with his mother, Amanda, and his crippled, withdrawn sister, Laura. Amanda, who has been deserted by her husband, dreams about her (largely fictitious) past as a Southern belle and projects her longing for fulfilment on to her children, demanding that Tom should get ahead in his job instead of brooding about becoming a writer, and that Laura should marry. She persuades Tom to bring home a friend, Jim O'Connor, in order to introduce him to Laura, and deludes herself into imagining a romantic connection between them. Jim wins Laura over by his warmth of manner and she, recognizing him as the boy she was attracted to in High School and incorporated into her innocent fantasies, shows him her collection of glass animals—the 'menagerie' of the title. Her favourite piece is a glass unicorn, and it is this which is damaged—its horn broken—when the two attempt to dance. Jim tells Laura that his private name for her during their schooldays was 'Blue Roses', after which he kisses her. However, the tenderness of the mood is broken when he reveals that he is already engaged to another girl. Amanda blames Tom for this disastrous outcome, and, furious at this injustice, he leaves home for good.

Glastonbury Romance, A, the most widely read of John Cowper *Powys's novels, first published in New York in 1932. Vividly pictorial and of a rich thematic and imaginative texture, the work runs to over 1,100 pages in standard editions. Some forty principal characters manifest the variousness of human life in its emotional, social, and, most importantly, spiritual aspects. As the book's central symbol, the Holy Grail denotes the essential substance of faith underlying all forms of religious belief. The narrative concerns events in Glastonbury following the founding by John Geard, a man with a 'superhuman mania for heightened life', of a spiritual cult fusing elements of paganism and Christianity. He is opposed by Philip Crow, whose pursuit of power is antithetical to all the Grail represents. The book ends with Crow's downfall and the death of Geard, who drowns in pursuit of higher levels of experience in the apocalyptic final chapter entitled 'The Flood'. A Glastonbury Romance is highly regarded for the powerful combination of drama and sensitivity characterizing its emotional and psychological realism. Its metaphysical content, centring on the need for a singleness of vision encompassing all physical and spiritual experience, tends to provoke the vague rhetoric of mystical assertion which has been a factor in the decline of Powys's reputation.

GLENDINNING, Victoria (1937–), British biographer and novelist, born in Sheffield, educated at Somerville College, Oxford, and the University of Southampton. She was a part-time schoolteacher from 1960 to 1969, when she became a psychiatric social worker; she was subsequently an editorial assistant at the Times Literary Supplement* until 1978. Eliza- beth Bowen: Portrait of a Writer (1977) argued persuasively for the importance of Bowen's contribution to modern fiction and established Glendinning's reputation as an authoritative and sensitive biographer. The book was the first of a series of treatments of literary women which continued with Edith Sitwell: A Unicorn among Lions (1981) and her acclaimed and popular work Vita: The Life of Vita Sackville-West (1983); Rebecca *West was deeply impressed by Vita and, shortly before her death, asked Glendinning to write her biography: Rebecca West: A Life appeared in 1987. Anthony Trollope (1992), her first extended study of a male author, was also published to wide acclaim. Her other works include The Grown Ups (1989), a humorous novel of sexual intrigue, and Electricity (1995), an account of a spirited young woman's adventures in the 1880s and the choices of her age: science versus religion, spiritualism or rationalism, gas or electricity. Glendinning married Terence de Vere *White in 1982.

GLOVER, Denis (1912–80), New Zealand poet, born in Dunedin, educated at Canterbury University College, where he later taught English. In 1936 he founded the Caxton Press, which was to have a distinguished role in New Zealand literature, especially poetry. Artistic respect for ordinary human endeavour informs Glover's work. He referred to his 'observational verse'; for one volume he described himself as 'enjoys talking, drinking and gesticulating. Dislikes writing and rhubarb.' In collections such as The Wind and the Sand (1945), Sings Harry and Other Poems (1951), and especially in the successful Arawata Bill (1952), Glover demonstrates his skill in the use of colloquial and ballad forms; the Arawata Bill persona (a lone gold prospector) proved an ideal device for the poet to reflect laconically upon ambiguous responses to New Zealand scenery and situations. Hot Water Sailor (1962) was an entertainingly informative autobiography. Selected poems were published as Enter without Knocking (1964; enlarged 1971), while Diary to a Woman (1971) comprised love poems. Later poems included Dancing to My Tune and Wellington Harbour, both published in 1974, Come High Water (1977), and Selected Poems (1981). There is a biographical and critical study, Denis Glover (1977), by John Thomson.

GLUCK, Louise (1943–), American poet, born in New York City, educated at Sarah Lawrence College and Columbia University. Like her contemporary Frank *Bidart, Louise Gluck is frequently described as a 'post-confessional' poet and in her early work the influence of Sylvia *Plath is strongly felt, notably in her first published volume, Firstborn (1969). Later volumes, among them The House of Marshland (1975) and Descending Figures (1983), reveal a sharpened, more intensified, if somewhat distanced, treatment of autobiographical experience. In The Triumph of Achilles (1985; National Book Critics Award), arguably her most distinguished collection, she writes with austere starkness about the death of her father, while Ararat (1990) shows a continuing preoccupation with the themes of family and family relationships; later volumes of verse include The Wild Iris (1992) and The First Four Books of Poems (1995). Her Proofs and Theories: Essays on Poetry (1992) draws together her critical writings on the art of poetry. Gluck taught at Goddard College in Vermont before taking up a teaching post at Warren Wilson College in North Carolina.

GLYN, Elinor (1864–1943), British novelist, born in Jersey; she was a prolific author of romantic and sensational books of which the first, The Visits of Elizabeth (1900), was a witty and sharply critical novel about the Edwardian upper classes. It was not until the publication of Three Weeks (1907) that she achieved notoriety through what was thought a shocking novel, describing the love affair of a Balkan queen who, desperate for an heir, takes as her lover a young English aristocrat; the novel shocked the Edwardians with its sensual imagery and its scenes on the famous tiger skin where the pair made love. In later life she lived in Hollywood and wrote screenplays. See also ROMANTIC FICTION.

Go-Between, The, a novel by L. P. *Hartley, published in 1953. Leo, now aged 60-plus, recalls the events of a childhood summer half a century earlier: invited to Brandham Hall in Norfolk, the country home of his schoolfriend Marcus Maudsley, he rapidly falls under the spell of Marcus's beautiful older sister Marian. He becomes the innocent courier of secret letters between Marian and local farmer Ted Burgess, only gradually realizing that he is the go-between in a clandestine love affair. Leo's developing respect for Marian's fiancé Lord Trimingham forces him to a moral crisis. He refuses to carry any more letters, but changes his mind when Marian accuses him of ingratitude. Later, on his thirteenth birthday, Marian's mother discovers Leo taking a letter. He refuses either to surrender it or to explain Marian's absence for the rest of the day, until Mrs Maudsley insists he accompany her on a search for her daughter: the conclusion of this is the discovery of Marian and Burgess making love in an outhouse. Later Ted Burgess commits suicide. The novel is a brilliant evocation of a social world and historical period. Richly complex, its theme is the individual's search for identity, and the relationship of childhood experience to adult problems. The narrative is framed by a prologue, in which the narrator confronts the challenge of the past's failed hopes and opportunities, and an epilogue in which he revisits Marian and agrees to go on one last errand—to her grandson, to give him his own version of the story—and thereby begins to resolve his personal emotional legacy of the past. Harold *Pinter wrote the screenplay for Joseph Losey's film of 1970.

GODBER, John (Harry) (1956–), British playwright, born in Upton, Yorkshire, educated at Bretton Hall College and the University of Leeds. After working as a schoolteacher, in 1984 he became artistic director of the Hull Truck Theatre Company, where he has directed the first productions of most of his plays. Predominantly in the mode of comic social commentary, Godber's plays often deal with events and activities within the common experience of the northern audiences that are his primary constituency. His remark that 'the dancer not the poet is the father of the theatre' reflects the emphasis on live performance that underlies his procedures as a writer-director who stimulates improvisation in bringing his works to production. Up 'n' Under (1984), Bouncers (1984), Teechers (1987), and On the Piste (1990) are among his best-known plays. He has also written extensively for several popular television shows and scripted the successful The Ritz (1987) series. His other plays include Blood, Sweat, and Tears (1986), Happy Families (1991), and The Office Party (1992).

GODDEN, (Margaret) Rumer (1907–), British novelist, born in Sussex; she spent her childhood in India and from the age of 12 was educated in various English schools. She returned to India to start a dancing school, married, and spent the war years alone in Kashmir with her small children. The predominant themes in her novels are the lives of foreigners in Eastern settings, the inner thoughts of children, and religious life. Her first novel, Black Narcissus (1939), focused on an Anglican Sisterhood in India, and was later filmed; a later work, In This House of Brede (1969), is set in an English Catholic nunnery written after she converted to Roman Catholicism. India formed the background of The River (1946), amongst others, and was filmed by Jean Renoir in 1950. Ballet featured in A Candle for St Jude (1948); her understanding of children was shown in The Greengage Summer (1958) and The Battle of the Villa Florita (1963), both filmed, and in her many books for children. In A Fugue in Time (1945) and China Court (1961) she skilfully draws in the past with the present. Among Godden's later fictions are the novels Coromandel Sea Change (1991), a fairy tale of romance and political connivery set in a lushly described, almost mythologized modern South India; and Pippa Passes (1994), the story of a young ballet dancer coming to terms with adulthood and her developing sexual desires. There are two volumes of autobiography, A Time to Dance, No Time to Weep (1987) and A House with Four Rooms (1989).

GODLEY, A(lfred) D(ennis) (1856–1925), British poet and classicist, born in Co. Leitrim, educated at Balliol College, Oxford; he became a fellow and tutor of Magdalen College. In 1910 he was appointed public orator of Oxford, an office he held until his death. His numerous volumes of translation include The Histories of Tacitus (1887, 1890) and The Odes and Epodes of Horace (1898). Among his other works are Socrates and Athenian Society in His Day (1896) and Oxford in the Eighteenth Century (1908). As a poet he is principally noted for his reflections in light verse on the life and institutions of Oxford University; in such examples as 'The Infant Scholar' and 'The Megalopsychiad' his great dexterity in versification combines to memorable effect with the engaging sense of the ridiculous that is frequently present in his humour. His five collections of poetry include Verses to Order (1892), Lyra Frivola (1899), and The Casual Ward (1912). In addition to his Oxford verses he wrote poetry out of his interests in mountaineering, archaeology, and Irish affairs, generally retaining his humorous emphasis. Fifty Poems (1927) is a selected edition prepared by C. L. Graves and C. R. L. Fletcher.

God that Failed, The: Six Studies in Communism, a book containing six autobiographical essays, edited and introduced by Richard Crossman, and published in 1950. The book, which grew out of a discussion between Crossman and Arthur *Koestler, made a great impact at the time and was considered one of the most effective intellectual weapons in the Western armoury of the Cold War. The six contributors were Koestler, Ignazio Silone, André Gide, Stephen *Spender, Richard *Wright, and Louis Fischer. Dr Enid Starkie, who suggested the title of the book, compiled and edited Gide's reminiscences from various sources, because he was too ill to provide an essay. All the contributors had been either communists or 'fellow-travellers' sympathetic to communism. Scrupulously honest about past motives, and from a disillusioned perspective, the essays all illuminate ideological commitment by intellectuals and artists in turbulent, crisis-ridden times when recollected in tranquillity. Crossman declared: 'We were not in the least interested in swelling the flood of anti-Communist propaganda or in providing an opportunity for personal apologetics.'

GOGARTY, Oliver (Joseph) St John (1878–1957), Irish poet and memoirist, born in Dublin, where he trained as a surgeon at Trinity College's medical school. In 1904 he and James *Joyce lived briefly in the Martello Tower at Sandymount that provides the setting for the start of Ulysses, in which Gogarty is cast as 'stately plump Buck Mulligan'. He was a senator of the Irish Free State for fourteen years and was well known in Irish public and literary life. His volumes of verse include Hyperthuleana (1916), An Offering of Swans (1923), and Wild Apples (1928). W. B. *Yeats thought highly of his poetry, featuring seventeen poems by Gogarty in his Oxford Book of Modern Verse (1936), a representation generally considered disproportionate to his importance as a poet. He possessed, however, a distinct lyrical talent and a sharply epigrammatic wit. Collected Poems appeared in 1951. The *Abbey Theatre produced several of his plays, among them Blight (1917) and The Enchanted Trousers (1919). In 1939 he moved to New York, occupying himself mainly with writing and lecturing. He is best known for the prose memoirs As I Was Going Down Sackville Street (1937) and It Isn't this Time of Year at all (1954); Tumbling in the Hay (1939) is a semi-autobiographical novel of considerable comic individuality. Oliver St John Gogarty: Man of Many Talents by J. B. Lyons was published in 1980.

GOLD, Herbert (1924–), American novelist, born in Cleveland, Ohio, educated at Columbia University and the Sorbonne. Gold's early novels, for example Birth of a Hero (1951) and The Prospect before Us (1954), are characteristic of much of the American realist writing of the 1950s, emphasizing the plight of the individual in a conformist society. His later novels, such as The Optimist (1959), are markedly less realist in their techniques and show a burgeoning preoccupation with parable and fable. Salt (1963) is a feverish portrait of the anonymity of New York City life executed through the points of view of the participants in a romantic triangle. Fathers: A Novel in the Form of a Memoir (1967) recounts Gold's family history over several generations and the process of 'Americanization' that the family underwent; Family: A Novel in the Form of a Memoir (1981) is a later reworking of the same technique, here again concerned with the history of a Jewish immigrant family. Other novels include He/She (1980), True Love (1982), and Mister White Eyes (1984). Gold is also an accomplished short-story writer and a witty, trenchant essayist; the early stories are collected in Fifteen by Three (1957) and Love and Like (1960), his essays in The Age of Happy Problems (1962) and First Person Singular: Essays for the Sixties (1963). His other works include Fiction of the Fifties: A Decade of American Writing (1959), Stories of Modern America (1961), The Magic Will: Stories and Essays of a Decade (1971), and an autobiography, My Last Two Thousand Years (1972).

GOLD, Michael, pseudonym of Itzok GRANICH (1893–1967), American novelist, playwright, and political journalist, born in New York City, educated at New York and Harvard Universities. Gold was one of the most important and influential members of the group of left-wing intellectuals associated with such publications as Masses*, The Liberator, and the New Masses between 1916 and 1930. He was born to a poor immigrant Russian-Jewish family, brought up on New York's Lower East Side, and active in union politics from an early age. Subsequently, he became associated with the Provincetown Players, for whom he wrote three one-act plays and through whom he met Eugene *O'Neill. He co-founded the New Masses and was its editor from 1928 until 1947; through this journal Gold promoted a proletarian, neo-Stalinist view of the place of literature in society. He was actively involved in the leftward turn of the American intelligentsia in the early years of the New Deal. His first volume of stories was The Damned Agitator and Other Stories (1926); his best-known work of fiction was Jews Without Money (1930), a semi-autobiographical picture of New York ghetto life. Two of his plays, Hoboken Blues (1928) and Fiesta (1929), reflect his commitment in the possibilities of political drama, and his anthology Proletarian Literature in the United States (1935) is an important source-book for radical writing in the USA in the inter-war years (see PROLETARIAN LITERATURE IN THE USA). John Pyros's Gold: Dean of American Proletarian Writers (1979) is a useful study.

Golden Age; the term conventionally refers to the popular escapist crime fiction of the 1920s and 1930s, which avoided any attempt at social realism and offered in its place a highly stylized, closed setting mystery. Typically, a murder was solved by the intuitive and deductive skills of a personalized detective, entertaining the reader by a teasing display of false trails ('red herrings') before the revelatory final scene. The best examples of these 'clue-puzzle' stories came from Agatha *Christie and Dorothy L. *Sayers in the UK and S. S. *Van Dine in the USA. See also DETECTIVE FICTION.

Golden Bough, The, Sir James *Frazer's magnum opus, subtitled 'a study in magic and religion', first published in two volumes in 1890 and completed in twelve volumes which appeared between 1907 and 1915. A one-volume abridgement appeared in 1922, and a supplement, Aftermath, in 1936. The Golden Bough presents an enormously detailed anthropological thesis in accordance with Darwinian evolutionism: all religions, Frazer maintained, follow similar patterns of development, emerging from primitive magical belief towards increasingly comprehensive theological schemata, and having as their essential dynamic the biological imperative for survival; the advent of scientific wisdom in the West marks the final stage of this process of mental and institutional organization. The book develops out of Frazer's interest in the ancient priesthood of Nemi, the rule of which was that succeeding priests attained office by slaying their predecessors, having plucked 'the Golden Bough', to which the Aeneid alludes, before so doing. The work develops around two central questions: 'Why had the priest . . . to slay his predecessor? And why . . . had he to pluck the Golden Bough?' The first is answered in terms of ensuring the continuing vitality of the priesthood, the second by establishing that the Golden Bough, identified as mistletoe, magically embodied the priest's power. While the scientifically agnostic tones of Frazer's conclusion speak of 'the long tragedy of human folly and suffering which has unrolled itself before the readers of these volumes', his sensitivity towards his material is such that the work possesses considerable imaginative grandeur and dramatic power; 'at times he seems consumed with devout astonishment at his own subject-matter', remarks Robert Fraser, author of The Making of The Golden Bough (1990) and editor of the essays in Sir James Frazer and the Literary Imagination (1990). The latter examines the pervasive effect of Frazer's study on twentieth-century literature, to which it has contributed more meaningfully than to anthropology; T. S. *Eliot refers to it in the notes to *The Waste Land (1922) as 'a work . . . which has influenced our generation profoundly', indicating The Golden Bough's significance for many writers, among whom are James *Joyce, W. B. *Yeats, John *Synge, Joseph *Conrad, D. H. *Lawrence, and Robert *Graves.

Golden Bowl, The, a novel by Henry *James, published in 1904. The Golden Bowl is the last of the three great final novels—the others are The Wings of a Dove (1902) and The Ambassadors (1903)—which many critics hold to be the pinnacle of his achievement in fiction. The plot, one of labyrinthine moral complexity, revolves, essentially, around Maggie Verver, the daughter of an American millionaire, who marries Prince Amerigo, an impoverished Italian aristocrat. One of Maggie's friends, another American, Charlotte Stant, with whom Amerigo has had an affair (they had not married because neither had enough cash), subsequently marries Maggie's father, Adam Verver (the chief motive being to free Maggie from any guilt that might attach to her having abandoned a father for a husband), but Charlotte continues her affair with Amerigo. The second half of the novel deals with Maggie's discovery of the liaison and her reactions to it, presented largely through the methods of 'interior narration' and point-of-view that characterize James's late works. The novel is, in part, a social comedy but its mood becomes increasingly dramatic as it progresses and many readers find its narrative strategies disconcertingly complex. James's 'Preface' to the first edition is an important account, both of its nature and of its composition. See Nicola Bradbury's James: The Later Novels (1979).

Golden Notebook, The, a novel by Doris *Lessing, published in 1962. Anna Wulf, a writer who has not published anything for some years, lives alone with her young daughter, surviving on the proceeds of her successful first novel, which she now condemns as a work of nostalgia. Five sections ironically entitled 'Free Women' present Anna and her close friend Molly in the third person, while the bulk of the book is taken from Anna's four notebooks, in which she writes about her self (as the younger woman in Africa, as the writer, the mother, the psychoanalyst's patient, the lover, the disenchanted communist) in various ways (memoir, political discussion, fiction, parody, daily record-keeping). She uses the notebooks to compartmentalize her experience, convinced for much of the book that it is impossible to write the whole truth and impossible to be whole. Finally, a period of breakdown, seen through the several mirrors of the notebooks and the 'Free Women' narrative, leads to a new creative purpose. In a new, golden notebook she writes the first sentence of her departing lover's novel, and he dictates the first sentence of hers, which is of course the first of this book. The conventional narrative ends as it began with Anna and Molly talking, amused and newly practical. Probably Lessing's best-known work, it is her most ambitious attempt to encompass the modern experience of fragmentation and impending destruction, and the three totems of communism, psychoanalysis, and feminism.

GOLDING, Sir William (Gerald) (1911–93), British novelist, born in Columb Minor, Cornwall, educated at Marlborough Grammar School and Brasenose College, Oxford. He worked as an actor and producer in small theatre companies before the Second World War when he joined the Royal Navy, becoming lieutenant in charge of a rocket ship; from 1945 to 1961 he was a schoolteacher. His early Poems were published in 1935. Golding won immediate critical acclaim with his first novel, Lord of the Flies* (1954), a powerful narrative about a group of English schoolboys, stranded on an island after a plane crash, who resort to savagery. The harsh brutality of man is the underlying theme of this novel, a theme which he addresses in a diversity of historical contexts and settings in subsequent works. The Inheritors (1955) describes an episode when Neanderthal man is displaced by Cro-Magnon man and focuses on the doomed relationship of Lok and Fa; through his characters, who struggle to articulate their imaginative lives, Golding challenges the concept that 'new men' are intellectually and morally superior to those they supplanted. Pincher Martin (1956), which presents the last moments of a drowning man and his purgatorial reflections on his past life, demonstrates Golding's concern with fundamental moral contraries in man and his frequent use of the trick ending or dislocating shift of perspective. Free Fall (1959) investigates loss of innocence and the individual's moral destiny. The later Darkness Visible (1979) attempts to propose a solution to the moral darkness that most of his fiction discusses. Golding can be described as a profoundly religious novelist, although religion is not expressed in traditional Christian terms, even when describing clergymen as in Rites of Passage (1980). Much of his writing addresses the theological problem of Original Sin, yet few of his characters who witness evil are portrayed as really understanding it. The Spire (1964) concerns a dean who is gripped by an obsession that he has been chosen by God to build a huge spire on his cathedral; whether the dean is driven by human ambition or by a visionary desire to glorify God remains ambiguous. His next novel, The Pyramid (1967), was followed by The Scorpion God (1971), a collection of novellas set in antiquity, which includes the theme of ancient Egypt. Rites of Passage* (1980; Booker Prize), with Close Quarters (1987) and Fire Down Below (1989), forms a trilogy entitled 'To the Ends of the Earth'; almost entirely set at sea, the trilogy chronicles a voyage from England to Australia during the nineteenth century. The Paper Men (1984) is an entertaining account of the pursuit of a famous English novelist by an industrious American academic researcher, which Golding has drawn from his own experiences as a literary celebrity. He has also published a play, The Brass Butterfly (1958), and two collections of essays, The Hot Gates (1965) and A Moving Target (1982). Later editions of A Moving Target include his speech on receiving the 1983 Nobel Prize for Literature. Golding was knighted in 1988.

GOLDMAN, Emma (1869–1940), American essayist, critic, and editor, born in Kovno, Lithuania, of Jewish parents, educated at the Realschule in Königsberg; she emigrated to the USA in 1885. She was 'radicalized' by the events surrounding the Haymarket Riot in Chicago in May 1886. Within a few years she had established herself as a leading advocate of anarchism in the USA, notably through her reading of Johann Most's anarchist newspaper Die Freiheit, with which she was later associated, and her familiarity with the writings of Bakunin and Kropotkin. She founded the anarchist monthly magazine Mother Earth in 1906 and became a well-known public speaker promoting such causes as anarchism, birth control, and feminism. Her Anarchism and Other Essays was published in 1910. During the First World War she was a prominent opponent of conscription and in June 1917 she was arrested and sentenced to two years in prison for conspiracy; Mother Earth was suppressed in the same year. In 1919 she was deported from the USA (her citizenship, obtained by marriage to Jacob Kershner in 1887, was rendered invalid by her divorce) and returned to Russia; here, her criticism of the centralization of the Soviet state took shape and gave issue to her important book, My Disillusionment in Russia (1922). She left Soviet Russia and lived for two years in England where she married James Colton, a Welsh miner. She subsequently took up residence in St Tropez in the south of France where she wrote her autobiography Living My Life (1931), and died. Her most important work of literary criticism is The Social Significance of the Modern Drama (1914). Red Emma Speaks (1972), edited by Alix Kates Shulman, is an anthology of her writings and speeches; Alice Wexler's Emma Goldman: An Intimate Life (1984) is a study of her anarchist years.

Gollancz (Victor Gollancz Ltd), the British publishing business founded in 1927 by Victor Gollancz (1893–1967) with the stated intention of steering between 'the Scylla of preciousness and dilettantism and the Charybdis of purely commercialised mass production'. The first list, announced in February 1928, was chiefly made up of histories, biographies, and fiction, with additional plays, volumes of poetry, and works on architecture; H. G. *Wells and Philip Guedalla were the best-known of Gollancz's authors at the time. The company quickly established itself on a sound commercial footing, its editions becoming well known for their uniformly distinctive bright yellow dust-jackets. R. C. Sherriff's play Journey's End (1929) was the first of their conspicuously successful titles. Novelists published by Gollancz in its first ten years included Daphne *du Maurier, A. J. *Cronin, Michael Innes, Dorothy L. *Sayers, and George *Orwell. Throughout the early 1930s the firm was developing the specialization in socialist and pacifist books which resulted in the formation in 1936 of the *Left Book Club. From 1945 onward, a large proportion of Gollancz's books were by American authors, among them John *Updike, Vladimir *Nabokov, James *Agee, and John *Cheever. Since the early 1960s the company has been noted for its *science fiction publishing, authors having included J. G. *Ballard, Robert *Heinlein, Ursula *Le Guin, and Philip K. *Dick. Sheila Hodges's history of Gollancz, The Story of a Publishing House, 1928–1978, appeared in 1978.

GOMBRICH, Sir E(rnst) H(ans) (Josef) (1909–), British art historian, born in Vienna, where he obtained his Ph.D. in 1933. He emigrated to Britain in 1936, becoming a research assistant at the University of London's Warburg Institute; he remained at the Warburg Institute throughout his career, becoming its Director in 1959 and publishing a biography of its founder, Aby Warburg, in 1970. Gombrich's earliest major publication, The Story of Art (1950, 15th revised edition, 1989), which surveys the development of painting and sculpture from prehistory to the modernist era, is still widely regarded as the best introductory work available. His many more specialized studies include Art and Illusion (1960) and The Sense of Order (1979), which contain his influential writings on the psychology of pictorial representation and aesthetic values. Of central importance to Gombrich's œuvre is Studies in the Art of the Renaissance, which consists of Norm and Form (1966), Symbolic Images (1972), The Heritage of Apelles (1976), and New Light on Old Masters (1986). Among his other works are Means and Ends (1976), on the history of fresco painting, and Oskar Kokoschska in His Time (1986).

GOMES, Albert (1911–78), West Indian poet, editor, and politician, of Portuguese descent, born in Trinidad, educated at Granger Institute in Port of Spain. In 1930 he launched *The Beacon, an influential literary magazine, radical both politically and in its literary experimentation; his contributions of poems such as 'Reverie' and 'The Flesh' were among the freest from outmoded Victorian conventions still prevalent at the time. In 1942 he became President of the Federated Workers Trade Union, and later held various Cabinet posts in the Trinidad government. His autobiography, Through a Maze of Colour (1974), is an important document about literary and political activity, the two intimately related in the West Indies in the 1930s and 1940s. Selected Speeches (1944) foregrounds his anti-colonial political sentiments, which were of great consequence in his promotion of emancipated West Indian writing.

Goodbye to All That, Robert *Graves's autobiography of his early life, written at the age of 33 and published in 1929, the year of his departure for Majorca with Laura *Riding. Although the period covered extends beyond Graves's meeting with Riding, whose influence over him at the time of its composition was considerable, there is no reference to her in the text; Graves did not wish to include her in a work that was a conscious act of dissociation from his former life and its English social, cultural, and religious contexts. The book is principally noted for its vividly authentic treatments of trench warfare, which are presented with a bitter levelness of tone. The urgently laconic style throughout reflects the emotional compulsion under which Graves wrote. Goodbye to All That is classed with Sassoon's Memoirs of an Infantry Officer* (1930) and *Blunden's Undertones of War (1928) as one of the three great memoirs of the First World War; by comparison with the air of casual immediacy Graves adopts, Sassoon's and Blunden's manners seem consciously literary. Graves's versions of many events were not accepted by Sassoon, who, having seen the book in a proof copy, drew up a list of over 200 inaccuracies and insisted on the deletion of passages referring to his mother. The first edition duly appeared with blank sections and sold exceptionally well. Numerous others were offended by the work, notably certain members of Graves's family, whom, it appears from Robert Graves: The Years with Laura (1990) by his son R. P. Graves, were treated unjustly and unreasonably.

Goodbye to Berlin, a collection of sketches and short stories by Christopher *Isherwood (1939). The work, taken as a whole, presents a unified picture of Berlin in the last years of Weimar. Isherwood, disguised in this book as Herr Issyvoo, lived in Berlin in 1929–33, supporting himself in the harsh economic climate by giving English lessons. The stories are technically brilliant but no less so in their insights into a society consciously disintegrating into dark chaos. 'Sally Bowles', the first novella, was published independently in 1937 and has remained perhaps the best-known story in the book, of a hopeless English demi-mondaine who comes to live with Herr Issyvoo's landlady (this inspired John Van Druten's play, I Am a Camera, 1951, and the immensely successful musical, Cabaret, 1968). Perhaps even more penetrating is the study of the Jewish family, 'The Landauers', magnates of a vast emporium. The pictures of Berliner working-class life are extremely lively and are all we have of Isherwood's once-intended vast novel about Germany, 'The Lost'. Nothing in the book has become more famous, as a declaration of authorial intent, than the words near the opening: 'I am a camera with its shutter open, quite passive, recording, not thinking. Recording the man shaving at the window opposite and the woman in the kimono washing her hair. Some day, all this will have to be developed, carefully printed, fixed.'

GOODIS, David (1917–67), American crime novelist mainly associated with the *Hardboiled school of the 1940s, born in Philadelphia, educated at Indiana University, Bloomington, and Temple University, Philadelphia. Goodis benefited from the 1980s revival of interest in the darker styles of crime writing although his reputation in France has been consistently high. Like Jim *Thompson, Goodis presents a sombre and disillusioned portrait of the world, in which his solitary male protagonists search fruitlessly for meaning and significance in their lives. This mood is ironically and tersely expressed in his first novel, Dark Passage (1947); the brooding atmosphere of doubt and suspicion was memorably captured in the Delmer Davies film, starring Humphrey Bogart and Lauren Bacall. Throughout the 1950s his novels were consigned to the '*pulp' market. None the less, his work from this period is strikingly individual, with The Burglar (1953) and The Moon in the Gutter (1953) offering characteristic highly charged variants on the theme of nemesis. Goodis's gift for fast-paced narrative is best seen in Down There (1956), filmed by François Truffaut in 1962 as Shoot the Piano Player.

GOODISON, Lorna (1947–), Jamaican poet, born in Kingston, Jamaica, educated at the Jamaica School of Art and the Art Student League of New York. Her paintings have been widely exhibited and she is highly regarded as a book illustrator. She has worked as an art teacher and as a writer-in-residence at the University of the West Indies and at Radcliffe College, Massachusetts. Her principal collections of poetry are Tamarind Season (1980), I Am Becoming My Mother (1986), Heartease (1988), To Us All Flowers Are Roses (1990), and Selected Poems (1992). Many of her poems achieve powerfully imaginative effects through her use of domestic and natural imagery to evoke the interaction of psychological and material factors in women's experience of Caribbean history. Her work is notable for its accomplished fusions of elements of conventional versification with qualities integral to the oral traditions of Jamaica. Her other publications include Baby Mother and the King of Swords (1990), a collection of short stories forming compassionate explorations of the aspirations and fears of ordinary Jamaican individuals.

GOODMAN, (Henry) Nelson (1906–), American philosopher, born in Massachusetts, educated at Harvard. Among several academic posts he has held professorships in philosophy at Tufts College and at Brandeis University; in 1968 he was appointed Professor of Philosophy at Harvard. The Structure of Appearance (1951) gained him notice for its penetrating analysis of phenomenalistic systems of philosophy. His reputation increased with the appearance of Fact, Fiction, and Forecast (1954), in which he introduced the celebrated 'Goodman's paradox' as a linguistic mode for assessing the validity of philosophical inferences. His contributions to epistemology and the philosophies of science and language have in common his rigorous inductive methods, out of which he develops his valuable theory of projection for differentiating between confirmable and non-confirmable hypotheses; he is regarded as an uncompromising nominalist for his rejection of philosophical categories and his refusal to proceed on the basis of cases other than the particular and individual. Much of his later work has displayed a preoccupation with theories of representation, which he considers with regard to a wide range of instances, including painting, map-making, and musical scores. Among his other publications are Languages of Art (1968), Ways of Worldmaking (1978), and Of Mind and Other Matters (1984).

GOODMAN, Paul (1911–72), American novelist, playwright, poet, and social and educational commentator, born in New York City, educated at City College,

New York, and the University of Chicago. Although Growing Up Absurd (1960) brought Goodman a wide readership, his earliest writings, chiefly drama and verse, were published in the 1930s (the first volume of verse, Ten Lyric Poems, appeared in 1934) and he continued to publish poetry and plays throughout his long career as a scholar and a writer. His fiction dates from the 1940s and is notable for its articulation of the political radicalism that informs so much of his social and educational writings, particularly in The Empire City (1959) which is concerned with the life of New York City from about 1930 to 1950. His interest in the problems of the city, and urban life in general, is reflected in one of his major works of social philosophy, Communitas: Means of Livelihood and Ways of Life (1947; revised edition 1960), co-written with his brother Percival Goodman. This preoccupation with the terms and conditions of modern life is at the centre of Growing Up Absurd, where the study of youth and the associated problems of juvenile delinquency takes the form of a plea for a kind of intellectual and utopian anarchism which echoes Thoreau's belief that life is more ennobling and enriching when freed from the encroachments of the state; this work found its natural audience in the disaffected student radicals of the 1960s. Later important works of social thought include Utopian Essays and Practical Proposals (1962), The Moral Ambiguity of America (1966), and New Reformation: Notes of a Neolithic Conservative (1970). It is a testimony to the range and intellectual rigour of his thinking that his works in adjacent fields, such as Gestalt Therapy (1951) and The Structure of Literature (1954), are still read and admired. His verse has been collected in Collected Poems (1974), edited by Taylor Stoehr, and his short stories in four volumes of Collected Stories (1978–80), also edited by Taylor Stoehr. He taught at various colleges and universities, including the University of Chicago, Black Mountain College, Sarah Lawrence College, and the University of Wisconsin, and was film editor for Partisan Review and television critic for New Republic. See Goodman (1980), by Kingsley Widmer.

Good Soldier, The, a novel by Ford Madox Ford, published in 1915, first serialized in Blast (1914) as The Saddest Sotry. The novel, in which the author perfected the allusive impressionistic style he had been moving towards in his earlier fiction, counterpoints themes of love and betrayal with masterly economy. Narrated in the first person by a wealthy expatriate American, John Dowell, it describes the relationships between Dowell, his wife Florence, and Edward and Leonora Ashburnham, an English couple whom they meet at a hotel in Nauheim in 1904. The ties which bind the foursome, ostensibly those of friendship and circumstance (both Florence and Edward suffer from heart trouble), gradually emerge as those of passion and intrigue. Edward and Florence become lovers and the latter is revealed as a liar, schemer, and blackmailer. In Nauheim, the spa which the foursome continue to visit, these events come to a head in 1913 with the arrival of Nancy Rufford, the Ashburnhams' young ward. Edward falls in love with Nancy and the distraught Florence kills herself. The Ashburnhams return to England with Nancy; Dowell, also in love with Nancy, returns to America to settle his affairs. Nancy is dispatched to her father in India and Edward, after receiving a heartless telegram from her, shoots himself in despair. The final scenes show Leonora remarried and Dowell acting as nurse to the now insane Nancy. Considered by Ford as his 'best book', the novel incorporates complex time shifts and subtle flashbacks and, in John Dowell, offers one of the best examples of the unreliable narrator in modern fiction.

GORDIMER, Nadine (1923–), South African novelist and short-story writer, born in Springs, Transvaal, educated at the University of Witwatersrand. Gordimer is known for her sensitivity to the repression of the black majority in South Africa. Her first novel, The Lying Days (1953), about a young woman growing up in a South African mining community, was followed by A World of Strangers (1958) and Occasion for Loving (1963), both portraying white protagonists open to relationships with blacks, but ostracized by their own people. Her distinctive realist style first emerged in The Late Bourgeois World (1966) with its depiction of a middle-class Johannesburg woman who looks back on past failures with her ex-husband, an ineffectual saboteur, and faces new challenges from a black friend involved in underground political struggle. A Guest of Honour (1971; James Tait Black Memorial Prize), set in an independent black African state, concerns a former English colonial official, who begins to question his most cherished liberal beliefs. The Conservationist (1974; joint winner of the Booker Prize) concerns the choices faced by a conscience-ridden South African industrialist. Gordimer's later novels reflect her perception of the narrowing of political options for the ruling white minority in South Africa. These include Burger's Daughter (1979), in which a young woman is haunted by the political legacy of her Afrikaner Marxist parents who died in prison; July's People* (1981); and A Sport of Nature (1987), a picaresque novel about an independent young South African woman who travels throughout Africa and becomes involved in the process of liberation. My Son's Story (1990) deals with 'coloured', or mixed-race, protagonists; the central narrator attempts to come to terms with his father, who is forced to lead a life of clandestine deception due to his affair with a white mistress and his illegal political activities. As the son considers himself an aspiring writer, the novel comes closest to defining Gordimer's own complex role as a writer in South Africa on the eve of profound political and social change. None to Accompany Me (1994) is Gordimer's first novel after the free elections in South Africa; its chief protagonist is a woman lawyer whose personal life is politically impeccable but personally troubled. Some critics have judged it as irrelevant to the new South Africa. Gordimer's cool intellect is also evident in her many collections of short stories; among the best are The Soft Voice of the Serpent (1953), Friday's Footprint (1960), Selected Stories (1975), A Soldier's Embrace (1980), and Jump (1991). She also wrote The Black Interpreters (1973), an introduction to various black South African writers, and The Essential Gesture: Writing, Politics and Places (1988), a collection of essays. She received the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1991. See Stephen Clingman, The Novels of Nadine Gordimer: History from the Inside (1986).

GORDON, Caroline (1895–1981), American novelist, short-story writer, and literary critic, born in Todd County, Kentucky, educated at Bethany College, West Virginia. She married the poet and critic Allen *Tate in 1924 and in 1928 went to Europe with Tate who was on a Guggenheim Fellowship; she herself was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship in creative writing in 1929. In New York and in Paris she acted as Ford Madox *Ford's secretary and with his encouragement, and that of her husband, her writing career began in earnest. Her first novel, Penhally (1931), immediately established her as one of the foremost writers of what latterly has come to be called 'the Southern Renascence'. Penhally is a historical and dynastic novel following the declining fortunes of the Llewellyn family, the owners of the eponymous Kentucky estate. In 1934 her short story 'Old Red' won the O. Henry short story award, and her second novel Aleck Maury, Sportsman, was published. None Shall Look Back (1937) and The Garden of Adonis (1937) are novels about the Allard family, the first recording events during the American Civil War, the second bringing the family's history forward into the Depression years. Green Centuries (1941) concerns life on the Kentucky frontier during the American Revolution and is thought by many critics to be her finest. In 1947 Gordon converted to Catholicism and many of her later works arise from her growing preoccupation with religious and spiritual questions, notably The Strange Children (1951) and The Malefactors (1956). The Collected Stories of Caroline Gordon (1981) contains the best of her accomplished short stories. With Allen Tate she edited the widely used anthology The House of Fiction: An Anthology of the Short Story (1950; second edition, 1960) and her own theories of the art of fiction are eloquently expressed in How To Read a Novel (1957). Her familiarity with the writings of Ford Madox Ford resulted in The Good Soldier: A Key to the Novels of Ford Madox Ford (1963).

GORDON, Mary (Catherine) (1949–), American novelist, born in Long Island, of Jewish and Roman Catholic heritage, educated at Barnard College and Syracuse University. Gordon is often classified as a writer who conflates the concerns of feminism and Catholicism, but since her first novel, Final Payments (1978), which deals with a young woman's mourning for her father, she has proved to be a writer in the modern mainstream of American fiction, who combines domestic realism, satire, parody, and lyrical observation in her well-planned novels. The Company of Women (1981), a story set in a fashionable commune, shows the possible influence of Mary *McCarthy. Other novels of family life and social mores are Men and Angels (1985) and The Other Side (1989); short stories are collected in Temporary Shelter (1987). Among her finest works are the three novellas contained in The Rest of Life (1993), about women dealing with the vagaries of love; the title story examines the sensibility of an Italian migrant who spends 'the rest of life' dealing with the death of her lover, who committed suicide when he was 16 and she 15; in 'Immaculate Man' a social worker becomes the lover of a priest, which explores the conflict between flesh and church, a theme which continues in 'Living at Home', the story of an obsessive Italian reporter and his psychiatrist lover. Good Boys and Dead Girls (1991) is a collection of essays.

GOSSE, Sir Edmund (William) (1849–1928), British critic, biographer, and essayist, born in London and privately educated. His childhood and difficult relations with his father, the eminent zoologist Philip Henry Gosse (1810–88), are recounted in his most highly regarded work, Father and Son, the autobiography which first appeared anonymously in 1907. Having become an assistant librarian in the British Museum in 1867, he developed a special interest in the literatures of the Scandinavian countries; his numerous publications in the field include Studies in the Literature of Northern Europe (1879). He did much to establish Ibsen's reputation in Britain, translating Hedda Gabler (1891) and The Master Builder (with William Archer, 1893); his biography of the playwright appeared in 1907. His works as a biographer also include Thomas Gray (1882), The Life and Letters of John Donne (two volumes, 1899), Sir Thomas Browne (1905), and Algernon Charles Swinburne (1917), the last-named having been his close friend. Firdausi in Exile (1885) is the most notable of his numerous collections of verse; Collected Poems appeared in 1911. Among his other works in a career of prolific authorship are the lectures of From Shakespeare to Pope (1885), which provoked John Churton Collins's attacks on his scholarship, and Books on the Table (1921), a collection of his literary journalism. Having emerged as a figure of considerable literary eminence in the course of the 1890s, in 1904 he became librarian to the House of Lords. Twelve volumes of his Collected Essays appeared in 1927. Edmund Gosse: A Literary Landscape (1984) is a biography by Ann *Thwaite.

Go Tell It on the Mountain, a novel by James *Baldwin, published in 1952. Baldwin was brought up by a stepfather who was a pastor and spent his formative years in an environment of Christian fanaticism. Baldwin draws heavily upon his own experiences which, along with its rapturous, lyrical prose heavily laden with biblical cadences, gives the book much of its authenticity and conviction. It tells the story of John Grimes, a Harlem boy, who at 14 is coerced by his father's religious zeal to embrace the Christianity his intimidating stepfather represents. Baldwin, who has written elsewhere of the roots of his own oppression within as well as outside the circle of the black family, here attempts to tap the sources of African-American religious practices by relating them to the collective racial tragedies from which they emerged. The novel has also been read as a symbolic portrayal of Baldwin's discovery of his own sexual preferences in which homoerotic desire is disguised as spiritual ecstasy.

GOUDGE, Elizabeth (1900–84), British novelist, born in Wells, Somerset; she studied art at Reading College. An only child, her father, Dr Henry Leighton Goudge, became Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford; her mother was a descendant of a Guernsey Norman-French family. Goudge's first novel, Island Magic (1934), set in Guernsey, was followed by many others, including A City of Bells (1936), about an imaginary cathedral city based on Wells; and Towers in the Mist (1938), set in Elizabethan Oxford. Generally regarded as her best-known novels are Green Dolphin Country (1944), set in Guernsey and nineteenth-century New Zealand, a bestseller which was filmed in 1947; Gentian Hill (1949), a love story set in nineteenth-century Devon; and The Child from the Sea (1970), about Lucy Waters, the secret wife of Charles II. The Bird in the Tree (1940), The Herb of Grace (1948), and The Heart of the Family (1953), a trilogy of novels set in Devon, chronicles the lives of the Eliots of Dameroshay. Goudge's works are distinctive in style, incorporating lyrical descriptions of landscape with detailed historical background, and reflect her deep Christian beliefs. These qualities are also evident in her children's books. She has also published short stories, books on religious themes, and The Joy of the Snow (1974), an autobiography.

GOWERS, Sir Ernest (Arthur) (1880–1966), British civil servant and grammarian, born in London, educated at Clare College, Cambridge. In 1902 he entered the Civil Service, where he rose to become Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue. Plain Words: A Guide to the Use of English (1948) was written at the suggestion of Sir Edward Bridges, the Head of the Civil Service, who admired the clarity of expression Gowers commanded. It was reprinted together with the subsequent ABC of Plain Words (1951) as The Complete Plain Words in 1954. The books remain invaluable for their emphasis on brevity and precision as cardinal virtues in the writing of factual matter in English. In 1965 Gowers produced a revised edition of H. W. *Fowler's Modern English Usage, applying his principles of clarification to some entries and adding articles on such topics as 'abstractitis', 'officialese', and 'sociologese'. His other publications include A Life for a Life? (1956), an influential work arising from his chairmanship of the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment, from which he emerged a convinced abolitionist.

GOYEN, William (1915–83), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Trinity, Texas, educated at Rice Institute. During the Second World War he served as an officer in the navy. Goyen's first novel, The House of Breath (1950), composed of the linked accounts of lives in a small town loosely connected by a first-person narrator, was distinguished by the voluptuous texture of its prose and its lush evocations of landscape. The elements of myth, fantasy, and lavish lyricism that characterize this novel are also evident in most of Goyen's short fiction, collected in Ghost and Flesh (1952), Faces of Blood Kindred (1960), Collected Stories (1975), and Had I a Hundred Mouths (1985), with a critical introduction by Joyce Carol *Oates, and in his novels In a Farther Country (1955), the picaresque tale of a Spanish-American woman's dream of a united Spain, and Savata, My Fair Sister (1963), in which the religious ardour of one sister is pitted against the vitality of another. The later novels were often dismissed as bizarre, plotless, and fantastic. The controversial Come, the Restorer (1974) conflates Christian symbolism with sexual imagery in a story of an entire town's projection of its quest for a saviour on the restorer of old photographs, Mr de Persia. A final novel, Arcadio (1983), the monologue of a hermaphrodite, raises contemporary issues of gender and sexuality in Goyen's customary frame of Latinized life in Texas and New Mexico.

GRACE, Patricia (1937–), New Zealand Maori writer, born in Wellington. Her collection of stories Waiariki (1975) was the first published by a Maori woman writer; later collections include The Dream Sleepers (1980), Electric City and Other Stories (1987), Selected Stories (1991), The Sky People (1994), whose stories are linked by the Maori myth of the title, and Collected Stories (1994). In addition to prize-winning children's books she has published the novels Mutuwhenua / The Moon Sleeps (1978), Potiki (1986), and Cousins (1992), which explore the special pressures to which contemporary Maori culture has to respond, especially in urban situations. The earlier novel reveals the conflicting attractions of home culture against the lure of the town through the relationship between Linda (who has dropped her Maori name) and Graeme. In Potiki similar tensions are sharpened through actual conflict between a Maori community and developers who employ every means (including violence) in an unsuccessful attempt to acquire ancestral land which they see simply as under-used real estate, while Cousins shows the resilience of three Maori women forced from the land into the city. Grace employs to great effect multiple perspectives on events, including untranslated passages in Maori, and her work furnishes a vivid and strongly Maori aspect on contemporary New Zealand culture.

GRAFTON, Sue (1940–), American crime writer, born in Louisville, Kentucky, educated at the University of Louisville; she is the daughter of C. W. Grafton, attorney and mystery writer. She published her first novel, Keziah, in 1967, the Lolly Madonna War (1969) was filmed in 1973, and from 1977 she wrote TV film scripts. By 1982, Grafton was a twice-divorced mother of three children who conceived 'A' Is for Alibi (1982) in preference to murdering her ex-husband. She has now reached 'L' Is for Lawless (1996) in her award-winning 'alphabet' series that has helped transform the predominantly male preserve of American crime writing. With Sara *Paretsky, Grafton has become one of the genre's most popular female writers. Her tightly paced mysteries are shaped by Kinsey Millhone, a feisty, self-sufficient private investigator who is appealingly candid, with a wry wit.

GRAHAM, Jorie (1951–), American poet, born in Italy, educated at the Sorbonne, New York University, and the University of Iowa. Graham's complex linguistic and cultural background (she was born of American parents, attended a French lycée in Rome, and is fluent in English, French, and Italian) provides much of the material for her intellectual, frequently erudite, verse. Graham's mother, the painter and sculptor Beverly Pepper, exposed her daughter at a young age to the cultural heritage of Italy, and many of Graham's poems, notably 'At Luca Signorelli's Resurrection of the Body' from her second volume of verse, Erosion (1983), reflect her preoccupations with the analogous expressive powers of poetic language and the visual arts. Graham herself speaks of the influence of the French symbolistes, particularly Baudelaire, Rimbaud, and Mallarmé, and of the American poet Elizabeth *Bishop, though her metrics recall those of William Carlos *Williams while her subject matter has much in common with that of Wallace *Stevens. Her other volumes of verse are Hybrids of Plants and of Ghosts (1980), The End of Beauty (1987), Region of Unlikeness (1991), and Materialism: Poems (1993); she has also published poetry in the New Yorker* magazine. Graham undertook cinema studies at New York University (where she worked with the film director Martin Scorsese). Her teaching career has included posts at California State University, Columbia University, and Iowa University.

GRAHAM, W(illiam) S(ydney) (1918–86), British poet, born in Greenock, Renfrewshire, educated at Greenock High School. He subsequently studied at the Workers' Educational Association College, Newbattle Abbey, Edinburgh. After a period as a journeyman engineer he settled in Cornwall, often referring in his poetry to the topography around Zennor and his acquaintances in its community of artists. His early poetry, principally represented by Cage without Grievance (1942) and 2nd Poems (1945), tended towards a cryptic compression indicative of Dylan *Thomas's influence. The work remained, however, perceptibly grounded in his experience of Clydeside's shipyards and countryside and possessed considerable verbal vitality. The assured individuality of tone and philosophical orientation characteristic of his later writing began to emerge in The White Threshold (1949). The long title-work of The Nightfishing (1955) forms the culmination of the use of maritime imagery in his verse, the literal and symbolic senses of the sea providing a focus for the poem's passionate fusion of elegy and contemplation. Although the book was favourably received, he published no further collections until Malcolm Mooney's Land in 1970, which was followed by Implements in Their Places (1977). Collected Poems: 1942–1977 was published in 1979. Graham's later work shows a recurrent concern with the nature and functions of language and communication, such essentially abstract themes becoming entertainingly accessible through the incorporation of local elements and the subdued wit of his manner. A further edition entitled Uncollected Poems appeared in 1990.

GRAHAM, Winston (Mawdsley) (1910–), British novelist and writer of film scripts, born in Manchester; he left school at 16. He made his name as a writer of thrillers with subtle character observation and psychological undertones. Marnie (1961) was filmed by Alfred Hitchcock; films have also been made of Take My Life (1947), Night without Stars (1950), Fortune Is a Woman (1953), The Sleeping Partner (1956), and The Walking Stick (1967). He is best known for his historical novels set in eighteenth-century Cornwall and concerning the Poldark and Warleggan families, beginning with Ross Poldark (1945), and including The Black Moon (1973). There were two BBC television series during the 1970s based on the first seven books. He has also written non-fiction, including The Spanish Armada (1972) and Poldark's Cornwall (1983).

Grain of Wheat, A, a novel by *Ngugi, published in 1967. Set on the eve of Kenyan independence in 1963, the novel returns to the emergency period of the 1950s. The action centres on Mugo, a farmer; Mumbi and her carpenter husband Gikonyo; John Thompson, a British district officer; and Karanja, who once sympathized with the freedom movement. During preparations for Uhuru Day, it becomes clear how far people's lives and achievements have diverged from the ideals that inspired the dream of self-government. Karanja, as administrative chief of his area, becomes the servant of the British against his own people, rounding up Mau Mau suspects. Gikonyo, placed in a detention camp for his freedom-fighting activities, is unable to bear separation from his wife Mumbi; he forsakes his oath in order to return to her but, discovering that she has had a child by Karanja, he bitterly repudiates her love. Mugo, regarded as the leader of his village, is asked to deliver the main speech at the independence celebrations, in memory of his friend Kihika, a freedom fighter who was hanged by the colonial administrators. Mugo's refusal to make the speech is interpreted as an act of modesty but, on the contrary, he reveals himself as a traitor—the man who betrayed Kihika to his death. The major irony is that independence has left problems unsolved, and has in fact been achieved at the expense of all potential heroes.

Granta, originally The Granta, a periodical founded as the latest in a succession of Cambridge undergraduate journals by Murray Guthrie in 1889. Although the matter of whether or not women should be permitted to take degrees was earnestly debated in the 1890s, the magazine's tone was generally humorous and satirical; several writers associated with The Granta, notably A. A. *Milne, later contributed to Punch. After the First World War a more serious tone developed, and socio-cultural matters were treated with considerable gravity during the 1930s. In the 1950s and 1960s it concentrated on poetry, fiction, and literary criticism, publishing work by various distinguished students, including poems by Ted *Hughes and Sylvia *Plath. Having become moribund in the mid-1970s, it re-emerged as Granta in 1979 under Bill Buford's editorship to specialize in the publication of prose fiction and cultural commentary. In 1983 Granta Publications Limited entered into its continuing association with Penguin Books; work by eminent contributors including Martin *Amis, Ian *McEwan, James *Fenton, A. N. *Wilson, John *Berger, Salman *Rushdie, and Emma *Tennant combined with high production standards to make Granta the leading journal of its kind in Britain. Among the American authors whose work has been featured are John *Updike, Angela *Carter, George *Steiner, and John Herr. Since 1979 issues became devoted to particular themes or modes of writing; numbers 8 and 19, respectively subtitled '*Dirty Realism' and 'More Dirt', were principally devoted to recent American fiction.

GRANVILLE-BARKER, Harley (1877–1946), British playwright, scholar, and critic, born in London, the son of a property speculator; he rose to eminence in the Edwardian theatre. He created the character of Tanner in Man and Superman*, played leading roles in other plays by *Shaw, and did much to prove the value of the repertory system during the period from 1905 to 1907, when he co-managed the Royal Court Theatre. In later years he turned to lecturing and writing, most importantly his Prefaces to Shakespeare (1927–47). On his death, Shaw described him as 'altogether the most distinguished and incomparably the most cultivated person whom circumstances had driven into the theatre at that time', meaning the first decade of the century, when all his major plays were written. These are The Marrying of Ann Leete (1901), about the daughter of an eighteenth-century politician who rejects a highly convenient aristocratic suitor for marriage to her father's gardener; The Voysey Inheritance (1905), in which a corrupt London solicitor dies, leaving his right-minded son to cope with the defalcations and debts he has inherited; Waste (1907), banned by the Lord Chamberlain for the candour with which it described the predicament of a leading politician whose mistress dies after an abortion; and The Madras House (1910), which uses the sale of a drapery store to air ideas about the place of women in Edwardian society. Granville-Barker's plays were criticized in their time for being too intellectual, subtle, and untheatrical. His later work, such as The Secret Life (1922) and His Majesty (1923), tends to substantiate that view. However, the four earlier plays have been successfully revived by the National Theatre and the Royal Shakespeare Company, winning general approval for the sweep and insight Granville-Barker brought to social and political themes seldom treated in the theatre of his day.

Grapes of Wrath, The, a novel by John *Steinbeck, published in 1939. Steinbeck's finest novel, The Grapes of Wrath is a fictional record of the migration of the 'Okies' (largely tenant farmers from Oklahoma and western Arkansas, though the term was used disparagingly of migrants from contiguous states such as Kansas, Missouri, and Texas) from the Southwestern states to California in the 1930s, a migration mainly brought on by the dust storms ('the dust bowl') of 1933 and 1935. Though the novel is almost Tolstoyan in scale—indeed, its use of intercalary, generalizing chapters is drawn from Tolstoy's War and Peace—it concentrates on the fortunes of the Joad family and through its protagonist, Tom Joad, it articulates a life-affirming 'mystical socialism' and speaks eloquently for the concerns of the deprived and the dispossessed. Peter Lisca's 1972 edition of the novel includes a number of critical documents which are indispensable to its study.

Graphic Novel is a term used to describe a long comic in book form containing a fictional or non-fictional narrative with a thematic unity. Since 1986 graphic novels have become increasingly popular. They are mainly about 50 pages in length, in full colour, and with card covers. Technically, for story-telling purposes, graphic novels depend on the characteristics of a traditional comic: they utilize a weave of text and image rather than a process of simply illustrating the text. However, the relationship of the graphic novel to the comic is that of the prose novel to the short story. Precedents can be traced to juvenile comics in the 1940s. Despite the fact that comics were stereotyped as a children's medium and were, therefore, produced in short and throwaway form, there were some extended narratives designed to be kept for longer. In Britain and America, the Classics Illustrated series, for example, which aimed to introduce classic works of literature to children in a palatable form, included several adaptations of more than 60 pages in length (including A Tale of Two Cities, 1942, and Les Miserables, 1943). Meanwhile, in Europe, longer comics with card covers had been produced from the late 1930s and were finding a mixed-age audience. The main continental hero was 'Tintin', an intrepid boy reporter, whose albums sold in their hundreds of thousands, and were first translated into English in 1958. But the roots of the graphic novel boom of the 1990s are in comics 'fandom', which developed in the 1970s and 1980s. This was, and remains, an organized network of fans and collectors of predominantly American comics, centring around 'fanzines' (a conflation meaning 'fan-magazines'), 'marts' (comic markets), and comics conventions. Out of this network emerged specialist shops, catering to collectors and selling solely comics. To service this market, publishers experimented with longer-lasting formats, including card covers. Moreover, because certain artists and writers were particularly popular, a system developed whereby lengthier collections of their work would be sold on the basis of their reputations. Thus, with some awareness of the large sale of album-comics currently being achieved in Europe, a culture based on comic albums and graphic novels began to develop.

Pioneering graphic novelists in this period included American Will Eisner, best known for his A Contract With God (1978), a series of semi-autobiographical vignettes about life in 1930s New York (the first book to be marketed as a 'graphic novel', thus establishing the term); Canadian Dave Sim, whose Cerebus the Aardvark, collected into albums from 1985, was both a parody of Conan the Barbarian and a complex satire; and British Bryan Talbot, whose The Adventures of Luther Arkwright, collected between 1982 and 1988, was a sophisticated science fiction odyssey. Although science fiction and fantasy were consistently the most popular themes, other subject matter was not uncommon.

In 1986–7, three outstanding titles were responsible for introducing the concept of the graphic novel to a much wider audience: Maus (1986), by Art Spiegelman, about the Nazi Holocaust, told in anthropomorphic terms—with Jews as mice, and Nazis as cats; The Dark Knight Returns (1986), by Frank Miller, a radical reworking of Batman mythology; and Watchmen (1987), by Alan Moore and Dave Gibbons, another adult revisionist superhero story. All three utilized the creative potential of the graphic novel to its optimum effect, and exhibited complex plotting and strong characterization. All had previously been serialized and became bestsellers in album form.

Mainstream book publishers soon began to publish graphic novels, particularly Penguin and Gollancz. Within a remarkably short time, they have become an established feature of the literary landscape, increasingly reviewed in the literary pages of the quality press, and even studied at some universities. Subject matter has expanded to include everything from Westerns (Lieutenant Blueberry, from 1989), horror (Hellblazer, from 1988), science fiction (The Incal, 1988), superheroes (Marshal Law, from 1988), autobiography (The Playboy, 1992), adaptations from classic literature (Twelfth Night, 1989), and political journalism (Brought to Light, 1989). In 1992 Maus II, Art Spiegelman's sequel to Maus, became the first graphic novel to be awarded a Pulitzer Prize for Literature. See Adult Comics: An Introduction (1993) by Roger Sabin. GRAU, Shirley Anne (1929–), American novelist, born in New Orleans, Louisiana, educated at Tulane University. Her first published work was a collection of stories, The Black Prince (1955); this, and the novels that followed—The Hard Blue Sky (1958) and The House in Coliseum Street (1961)—were well received by critics, who saw her as an exponent of the Southern school of writing. Keepers of the House (1964), a chronicle of three generations of the Howland family, was compared to the work of *Faulkner, and won the Pulitzer Prize. Other works include the novels The Condor Passes (1971) and Evidence of Love (1977), and two collections of stories, The Wind Shifting West (1973) and Nine Women (1985); in the latter, she extends her range to include, for example, the perspective of women of the new black middle class.

GRAVES, A(lfred) P(erceval) (1846–1931), Irish poet and editor, son of the Protestant Bishop of Limerick and the father of Robert *Graves; born in Dublin, where he was educated at Trinity College. Before taking his final examinations he left Dublin to become a clerk at the Home Office in London and in 1874 began his career with the Board of Education. In Dublin he had been encouraged as a poet by Sheridan Le Fanu, whose Poems he edited in 1896. Songs of Killarney (1872), his first collection of verse, set the consistently Irish tone of his work, the best-known being contained in Irish Songs and Ballads (1879) and Father O'Flynn and Other Poems (1889), the humorous title-piece of which was widely popular. The Irish Poems of Alfred Perceval Graves was published in two volumes with a preface by Douglas *Hyde in 1908. Graves was active in London's Irish Literary Society from its foundation in 1891, and was twice its president in later years. He produced numerous anthologies, including Songs of Irish Wit and Humour (1884) and The Book of Irish Poetry (1915). Welsh material was added to work of Irish provenance in later collections he edited, among them A Celtic Psaltery (1917). His autobiography To Return to All That (1930) appeared a year after the publication of Robert Graves's Goodbye to All That* (1929).

GRAVES, Robert (van Ranke) (1895–1985), British poet, novelist, critic, and historian of mythology, born in Wimbledon, London, the son of A. P. *Graves, and educated at Charterhouse School. At the outbreak of the First World War he volunteered for active service and remained on the Western Front until invalided out in 1917. Over the Brazier (1916), Goliath and David (1916), and Fairies and Fusiliers (1917), his first three volumes of poetry, were published with the support of Edward Marsh, in whose Georgian Poetry series his work repeatedly featured. He later suppressed most of the verse from these collections. The many war poems they contain appear in Poems about War (1988), edited by William Graves, his son; the volume is prefaced by Graves's essay 'Poetry of World War I', which is dismissive of 'war poetry' and accounts for his refusal to reprint a number of striking poems (see also WAR POETRY). His experiences of the conflict and the radical changes in his attitudes that it caused are described in his autobiography Goodbye to All That* (1929). In 1918 he settled near Oxford, where he ran a grocery business with his first wife and studied at St John's College, gaining his B.Litt. in 1925 with the dissertation Poetic Unreason and Other Studies.

He became Professor of English at the University of Cairo in 1926; Laura *Riding, whom he had met the previous year, accompanied him and his wife to Egypt. A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1928), a critical collaboration with Riding, is regarded as a seminal work on poetic ambiguity. He separated from his wife in 1929 and went with Riding to Majorca, where they remained, running the Seizin Press, until 1936. Following their separation in 1939, for the rest of his life he lived chiefly in Majorca. Riding is widely credited with assisting Graves in the fuller realization of his talent.

The poetry he produced from the early 1930s onward, principally published in a number of collected editions, is characterized by the accomplishment and individuality of its fluently conversational use of traditional forms. His many love poems display the sceptical intelligence which makes his frequent treatments of metaphysical and supernatural subjects disquietingly credible. His verse frequently makes plain his dissent from social, political, and religious orthodoxies, and numerous poems, among them 'Ogres and Pygmies' and 'The Undead', form compelling and witty allegorical critiques of modern cultural conditions. Collected Poems (1986, edited by M. Seymour-Smith) is a recent edition. He was Professor of Poetry at Oxford between 1961 and 1966, publishing selections from his lectures in Poetic Craft and Principle (1967) and The Crane Bag and Other Disputed Subjects (1969). Having begun as a novelist with My Head! My Head! in 1925, Graves enjoyed continuing popularity after the publication of I, Claudius* and Claudius The God in 1934. Among his numerous other novels are The Story of Mary Powell, Wife to Mr Milton (1943) and the widely read historical fictions Sergeant Lamb of the Ninth (1940) and Proceed, Sergeant Lamb (1941). His extensive writings on mythology and religion, which have in common a stimulatingly original approach to their materials, include The Greek Myths (1955) and Mammon and the Black Goddess (1965), the latter complementing *The White Goddess (1948).

Among his other works in some sixty years of prolific authorship were the biography Lawrence and the Arabs (1927) and many translations from various languages, including a controversial version of the Rubaiyyat of Omar Khayyam (1967). The Assault Heroic (1986) and The Years with Laura (1990) are the first two volumes of a biography by his son Richard Graves.

Gravity's Rainbow, a novel by Thomas *Pynchon, published in 1973. The novel is generally considered one of the most important works of post-war American fiction. Like Pynchon's other works its value as a work of art lies in its intellectual, linguistic, and philosophical complexity rather than its use of the conventional resources of realistic fiction. The principal metaphor is the German V-2 rocket, and its gravity-defined arc of aspiration and destruction. The novel is 'set' in London in the last days of the Second World War and its ostensible 'subject' is the German bombing of London by V-2 rockets, but it encompasses an immense intellectual landscape that incorporates much of twentieth-century scientific and technological history, its style ranging from philosophical discursiveness to linguistic and literary parody. As with Pynchon's other novels, Gravity's Rainbow is structured by assumptions about the ultimate impenetrability of what we take to be 'reality' and the conspiratorial nature of much social and scientific organization. Much has been made of Pynchon's use in the novel of cinematographic techniques but the novel is notable, chiefly, for its use of the full range of fictional devices; in this respect, it has been compared with both Melville's Moby-Dick and Joyce's Finnegans Wake*.

GRAY, Alisdair (James) (1934–), Scottish novelist, short-story writer, and playwright, born in Glasgow, educated at Glasgow Art School. Prior to the publication of his 1981 novel Lanark*, Gray lived mostly by teaching, painting, and writing and was best known for his lavish portraits and murals, and for more than a dozen television, radio, and stage plays. He has since become the outstanding figure in a Glasgow literary renaissance that also includes his friends James *Kelman, Liz *Lochhead, and Tom *Leonard. His second novel, 1982, Janine (1984), is a tour-de-force combination of fantasy and political polemic taking place inside the head of 'Jock McLeish', an alcoholic security consultant holed up in a hotel bedroom; memories of school punishments and first love interchange with episodes of bondage, and diatribes on 'the matter of Scotland', the reverie frequently being interrupted by 'God' and other voices represented by graphic use of typeface. Gray's shorter fiction, often funny and fantastical, is gathered in Unlikely Stories, Mostly (1983)—including 'Five letters from an Eastern Empire', a masterly allegory set in Imperial China—Lean Tales (1985), and Ten Tales Tall and True (1993). A verse collection, Old Negatives (1989), and two novellas, The Fall of Kelvin Walker (1985) and McGrotty and Ludmilla (1990)—both previously plays—emerged out of a period in which he largely adapted already written material. This was also the case with his least well-received book, Something Leather (1990), whose pornographic passages attracted adverse reaction. Poor Things (1992) is another unlikely story, written in the form of Victorian memoirs 'edited' by Gray, concerning the surgeon 'Godwin Baxter' and his creation 'Bella'. In keeping with Gray's total authorship of his books, it has illustrations, a section of notes commenting on the text and its purported social history, exuberant pastiches, and even mock blurbs and reviews on the cover. A collection of informative essays on The Arts of Alisdair Gray was published in 1991.

GRAY, John (Henry) (1866–1934), British poet, born in Bethnal Green, London; he began publishing poems while working as a librarian at the Foreign Office. In 1890 he met Oscar Wilde, with whose support Silverpoints, his first collection of verse, appeared in 1893; the opulent exoticism of its imagery was complemented by a lavish binding designed by Charles Ricketts. The volume also contained translations of poems by French Symboliste poets and was hailed as epitomizing the aesthetic movement. The devotional sensibility occasionally discernible was channelled into Spiritual Poems of 1896, which signalled the end of his career as a decadent. He studied for the Roman Catholic priesthood and, following his ordination in 1901, devoted himself to his ministry in Edinburgh. His infrequent later publications as a poet include The Long Road (1926), which contained the allegorical 'The Flying Fish', his best-known poem. In 1931 he produced Park: A Fantastic Story, a futuristic novel envisioning a Catholic theocracy. The Poems of John Gray, edited by Ian Fletcher, was published in 1988. In the Dorian Mode (1983) is a biography by Brocard Sewell.

GRAY, Simon (1936–), British dramatist, born in Hampshire, educated at Dalhousie University, Halifax, Nova Scotia, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was for many years a lecturer in English at Queen Mary College, London. After achieving a modest success with Wise Child (1967), a dark comedy about a transvestite criminal on the run, he established himself with Butley (1971), about a witty, sadistic academic, and Otherwise Engaged (1974), about a publisher's attempts to escape the emotional demands and threats of those who insist on invading his privacy. Many of Gray's often sardonic but always humane comedies concern people of similar social background and calling: schoolmasters in Spoiled (1971; also a television play), Dog Days (1977), and Quartermain's Terms (1981); Cambridge graduates, former students and admirers of F. R. *Leavis, battling to keep a literary magazine afloat in The Common Pursuit (1984); publishers in Melon (1987) and The Holy Terror (1992), which are two alternative versions of the same tale of obsessive sexual jealousy; a literary agent and his novelist wife in Hidden Laughter (1990). Molly (1977), The Rear Column (1978), and Cell Mates (1995) are different in that they deal with, respectively, the Alma Rattenbury murder case, the events in the nineteenth-century Congo that gave rise to Conrad's Heart of Darkness*, and the relationship of the spy George Blake with the petty criminal who organized his escape from prison, Sean Bourke; but they are similar in their concerns. At his best, Gray writes with wit, incisiveness, and an unsentimental sympathy about the darker, more secret aspects of human behaviour: sexual pain, compromise, betrayal, the sense of futility and failure, and the sheer struggle to survive the many personal and professional setbacks with which a difficult world presents people. He has also published four novels, written many plays for television, among them Death of a Teddy Bear (1967) and An Unnatural Pursuit (1985), and adapted Dostoevsky's The Idiot (1970) for the National Theatre.

GRAY, Stephen (Richard) (1941–), South African novelist, poet, and playwright, born in Cape Town, educated at the University of Cape Town, Queen's College, Cambridge, where he edited Granta*, and Iowa State University. Before becoming a full-time writer in 1991, Gray was a professor of English at the Rand Afrikaans University, Johannesburg. His principal academic work is South African Literature: an Introduction (1979). Gray's poems display great versatility across a wide range of traditional and innovative forms. Collections of his verse, which is thematically dominated by his engagements with historical and socio-cultural aspects of South Africa, include The Assassination of Shaka (1974), Hottentot Venus (1979), Apollo Café (1989), Season of Violence (1992), and Selected Poems, 1960–1992 (1994). Local Colour (1975), Time of Our Darkness (1987), Born of Man (1989), and War Child (1991) are among his numerous novels, which characteristically base their analyses of national identity in treatments of the everyday social realities of South Africa. Schreiner: a One-Woman Play (1983) is the most widely admired of his dramas. His works as an editor include The Penguin Book of South African Stories (1985). Accident of Birth (1993) is an autobiography.

Great Gatsby, The, a novel by F. Scott *Fitzgerald, published in 1925. The Great Gatsby is generally thought to be Fitzgerald's finest novel and one of the major achievements of twentieth-century American literature. The life of its eponymous hero, Jay Gatsby, is, in part, a merciless satire of the 'rags to riches' story, but Gatsby's accumulation of great wealth and a vast estate on Long Island is motivated not by greed but by the forlorn desire to reclaim a former lover, Daisy Fay, now married to Tom Buchanan, a wealthy Chicagoan also living on Long Island. It is through the novel's narrator, Nick Carraway, a cousin to Daisy, that Gatsby and Daisy are reunited, but the impossibility of their love is the novel's central thematic preoccupation. The novel is essentially tragic in mood and its climax is a series of scenes in which Myrtle Wilson, Tom's mistress, is accidentally killed when she is run down by Daisy who is driving Gatsby's car; Myrtle's husband, George, then kills Gatsby, mistakenly believing him to be the culprit, before taking his own life.

Nick Carraway, a 'middle-man' narrator, caught 'within and without, simultaneously enchanted and repelled by the inexhaustible variety of life', owes much to the influence of Joseph Conrad's Marlow of Heart of Darkness* and Chance*. Although the plot is not substantial, Fitzgerald's execution of it is a fine technical accomplishment. Above all, The Great Gatsby contains some of Fitzgerald's most beautiful and lyrical prose. See Twentieth-Century Interpretations of 'The Great Gatsby': A Collection of Critical Essays (1968), edited by Ernest Lockridge, and The Achieving of 'The Great Gatsby': F. Scott Fitzgerald, 1920–1925 (1979), by Robert Emmet Long.

Great Hunger, The, a long poem by Patrick *Kavanagh, published in 1942. In fourteen parts, the poem is noted for its radical innovations in the treatment of rural material. The work exhibits great flexibility of style and form in sustaining its critique of the social and religious orthodoxy within which its chief protagonist, the peasant farmer Patrick Maguire, is confined. The intellectual, spiritual, imaginative, and sexual dimensions of his experience are charted with a harshly unsentimental but ultimately compassionate realism rooted in Kavanagh's personal knowledge of the circumstances of the small farmer. The poem modulates between lyrical, documentary, satirical, and dramatic idioms in achieving its concentrated presentation of Maguire's essentially static existence over several decades. Much of it implicitly repudiates the distortions of actuality perpetrated by the literature of the *Irish Revival; as Augustine Martin has written with reference to The Great Hunger, 'Kavanagh's most striking achievement in Irish poetry was to break the grip . . . of myth'. The poem's breach with the anodyne conventions of the modern pastoral drew it to the attention of the censor for its accounts of Maguire's sexual privations. In establishing a range of new registers for articulating the realities of rural life the work exemplified the potential of such subject matter for many succeeding Irish and British poets. It is widely regarded as one of the most successful long poems in English of the twentieth century.

GREEN, Henry, pseudonym of Henry Vincent YORKE (1905–73), British novelist, born in Tewkesbury, Gloucestershire, educated at Eton and at Magdalen College, Oxford. The third son of a wealthy family descended from the Earls of Hardwicke, he was brought up in a manor house in Gloucestershire, and sent to boarding school at the age of six. He joined the family business, H. Pontifex & Sons, Birmingham, beginning work in the stores, then on the shop-floor as a foundryman, and eventually becoming managing director. He married the Hon. Adelaide Biddulph in 1929. During the Second World War he served in the Auxiliary Fire Service. Green's nine novels and his 'interim autobiography', Pack My Bag (1940), are explorations of the English working and propertied classes across three decades. He began writing at school, and published his first novel, Blindness (1926), while still an undergraduate. He left Oxford without a degree, but in possession of a half blue for billiards. While serving his apprenticeship at his father's heavy engineering factory, he wrote to Neville Coghill, 'Some of the men are magnificent. The words they use even more so.' He drew on this experience for his second book, Living (1929), which Christopher *Isherwood described as 'the best proletarian novel ever written'. His close friend Evelyn *Waugh likened its style to 'those aluminium ribbons one stamps out in railway stations'. Green's novels of the war decade are his central achievement, a sequence of fiction which obliquely and movingly captures varied aspects of ordinary existence: Party Going (1939), a fable of social dislocation on the edge of war; Caught (1943), about fire-fighters preparing to cope with the approaching Blitz; Loving (1945), about the tensions above- and below-stairs in an Irish castle during wartime; and Back (1946), describing the traumatic return of prisoners-of-war to an England they do not recognize. Concluding (1948), set at the end of the millenium, is Green's vision of an over-administered future. His two final novels, Nothing (1950) and Doting (1952), depend increasingly on dialogue in the manner of Ivy *Compton-Burnett. Surviving (1992) collects his short stories, articles, and interviews. Like *Joyce, Green was dismissive of 'literary influences', only admitting, provocatively, to an admiration for Céline, and for the prose style of C. M. Doughty's Arabia Deserta (1888). His dialogue is careful of speech effects as inflected by class, and his descriptions are often lyrical and estranging. The reader has to take the measure of each character and situation, as if without any help from an author. Although he appeared to be uninterested in poetry, his statements about writing are those of a poet: 'Prose is not to be read aloud but to oneself at night, and it is not quick as poetry, but rather a gathering web of insinuations which go further than names however shared can ever go.' Many of his effects are sharply visual; a note to an exhibition of Matthew Smith's paintings, written in 1953, reveals the novelist's avidly graphic intelligence. Green's rewardingly strange prose ensured that sales of his novels were never very large, except for Loving, which briefly became a bestseller. But as the most genuinely innovative novelist of his generation he was read attentively by contemporaries such as Elizabeth *Bowen, W. H. *Auden, Angus *Wilson, Anthony *Powell, and John *Betjeman.

GREEN, Paul E(liot) (1894–1981), American dramatist, born in Lillington, North Carolina, educated at the University of North Carolina and Cornell University. He was a member of the Carolina Playmakers (which included Thomas *Wolfe), a writing and producing group founded at the University of North Carolina in 1918 by Frederick Koch. They had their own theatre, but also toured extensively through the Southern states, providing an influential model for the little theatre movement in regional and folk drama. Green's exploration of character through regional setting made a significant contribution to American drama, as in his first full-length play, In Abraham's Bosom (1926; Pulitzer Prize), influenced by Eugene O'Neill's Emperor Jones*. His work is marked by a commitment to the underprivileged and dispossessed, both black and poor white, in a series of plays from the mid-1920s, culminating in his stage version of Richard Wright's novel Native Son* (1941). His full-length plays include Your Fiery Furnace (1923), The Field God (1927), Tread the Green Grass (1929), Roll, Sweet Chariot (1934), and The House of Connelly (1931). He collaborated with Kurt Weill on a musical, Johnny Johnson (1937), and wrote a series of historical pageants which are performed annually at the venues for which they were written.

GREENE, (Henry) Graham (1904–91), English novelist, born in Berkhamsted, near London, educated at Berkhamsted School and Balliol College, Oxford. His father was the headmaster of Berkhamsted School; Greene has encouraged critics to see the divided loyalties which resulted as an origin of his fiction's distinctive antinomies and conflicting faiths—what he calls, quoting Robert Browning, its general concern with 'the dangerous edge of things | The honest thief, the tender murderer | The superstitious atheist'. Schooldays drove him close to breakdown and suicide—he was one of the first schoolboys in England to be psychoanalysed, in 1920—and Norman Sherry's The Life of Graham Greene (1989) has traced the cruelties of his fellow pupils as a source of the repeated interest of his fiction in fugitives, betrayal, secrecy, and lost innocence.

Oxford saw the publication of his only book of poems, Babbling April (1925), brief membership of the Communist Party, and a romance with Vivien Dayrell-Browning which required his conversion to Catholicism in 1926, before they married in 1927. Greene was by this time working as a sub-editor, first in Nottingham, later for The Times, an experience which may have encouraged the directness and economy which—along with brisk scenic construction perhaps learned from work as a film critic—marks much of his fiction. His first novel, however, The Man Within (1929), is a romantic period piece: like the two (later suppressed) which followed, The Name of Action (1930) and Rumour at Nightfall (1931), it bears traces of childhood admiration for authors such as Marjorie *Bowen, Rider *Haggard, John *Buchan, and a distant relation, Robert Louis Stevenson. Stamboul Train (1932) initiated his habitual setting in a contemporary world both highly realistic yet sufficiently idiosyncratic to have coined the critical description 'Greeneland'—a seedy domain of mean actions, disappointed hope, and the conviction that 'human nature is not black and white but black and grey'.

Greene cites personal financial anxiety as a factor encouraging realism at this time: it also disposed him to share the left-wing political perspective of the 1930s. This appears in the portrayal of the odious Swedish industrialist, Krogh, in England Made Me (1935); sympathy for Republican Spain in The Confidential Agent (1939); and questioning of the economic systems that create the depressed industrial landscapes of It's a Battlefield (1934) and A Gun For Sale (1936). Greene has suggested that he is a political writer rather than a Catholic one, though he has more often been critically assessed as the latter. Like that of his friend, Evelyn Waugh, his Catholic faith was not apparent in his early writing: when it does appear, it is usually held in complex, often paradoxical tension with political or other secular values. These tensions began to figure centrally in Brighton Rock (1938), and continued through the other novels often held to be the core of Greene's achievement, *The Power and the Glory (1940), *The Heart of the Matter (1948)—drawing on wartime work for British Intelligence—and *The End of the Affair (1951).

With the exception of A Burnt-Out Case (1961), later fiction makes Catholicism a less central concern. Greene also renounced British settings until returning to Berkhamsted for the late spy story *The Human Factor (1978). Instead, in novels such as *The Quiet American (1955), Our Man in Havana* (1958), The Comedians (1966), set in Papa Doc's Haiti, and The Honorary Consul (1973), a story of kidnapping in Argentina, Greene reflects the distant places and political conflicts he was drawn to in later years by his work as a journalist, or by friendships with world leaders such as Fidel Castro, Ho Chi Minh, Salvador Allende, and General Torrijos of Panama—or sometimes just by an urge to escape the boredom he claimed as a lifelong affliction. Though this later fiction typically uses 'the dangerous edge' of its setting to reflect and amplify stresses within its characters, central figues now often survive and even achieve a precarious enlightenment. From a tragic phase around the time of the Second World War, Greene's later writing sometimes moves towards romance and even comedy—darkly in Doctor Fischer of Geneva (1980) and his last published novel, The Captain and the Enemy (1988); more freely in Monsignor Quixote (1982) and Travels with My Aunt (1969).

Also including essays, literary criticism, plays, short stories, travel writing (Journey Without Maps, 1936; The Lawless Roads, 1939), autobiography (A Sort of Life, 1971; Ways of Escape, 1980), and screenplays (most notably *The Third Man, 1950), Greene's literary career spanned seven decades of the twentieth century and made him one of its most popular as well as critically admired authors. Though he described some of his earlier writing in the thriller genre as 'entertainment' to distinguish it from serious fiction, a particular achievement was his drawing together of the popular and the intellectual novel, reciprocally adding moral and psychological depth to the thriller, and, like his mentors Stevenson and Joseph *Conrad, elements of adventure to literary fiction. His appeal to a generally disillusioned age is also guaranteed by a continuing streak of romanticism which shows a credible if compromised heroism surviving in graceless, fallen worlds.

Green Mansions, W. H. *Hudson's best-known work, first published in 1904. The novel takes its title from the words of its central protagonist, the political refugee Abel Guevez de Argensola, whose wanderings lead him to 'that wild forest, those green mansions where I . . . found so great a happiness'. Abel receives hospitality from an Indian tribe who live on the fringes of the tropical Venezuelan forest, but incurs disapproval by repeatedly visiting an area their superstitions forbid him to enter; there he is enchanted by 'a voice purified and brightened to something almost angelic', which belongs to Rima, a beautiful girl possessing magical affinities with the forest. An intense love develops between the two, but Rima is killed when she falls into a fire the Indians build around the base of a tall tree into which she has fled from them. Abel's grief and rage drive him to engineer the massacre of the tribe by their enemies; bearing Rima's ashes, he returns to civilization stricken with guilt over his murderous actions. The book's success as an allegory of man's destructive violations of the beauty and sanctity of nature is largely a product of Hudson's vividly imaginative presentation of the forest; luxuriant imagery of dense vegetation in the constant play of light and shade forms a background to recurrent minutely observed descriptions of birds, snakes, and other creatures he had studied as a naturalist. Jacob Epstein's sculptural depiction of Rima is sited at the bird sanctuary in Hyde Park commemorating Hudson, which was opened in 1925.

Greenvoe, a novel by George Mackay *Brown, published in 1972. The island of Hellya and the village of Greenvoe which form the book's setting are imaginative adaptations of the Orkney landscapes and communities reflected throughout Brown's work. The main body of the novel presents a period of five days in the lives of the inhabitants of Greenvoe; the farming and fishing which form their principal occupations are evoked with detailed authenticity, as are the patterns of social interrelations on the island. From this episodic treatment a comprehensive portrait of a declining culture emerges and the presence of a stranger is explained in terms of his secret business on behalf of the government; the penultimate section of novel depicts the clearance and destruction of Greenvoe to make way for Black Star, a defence project which is eventually abandoned, leaving Hellya utterly desolate. In a brief concluding passage possible regeneration is symbolized when, ten years after the evacuation of the island, a band of villagers return and conduct a ceremony bringing 'light and blessing to the kingdom of winter'. The book forms an extended parable warning of the need to tend the inheritance from nature and history vital to the welfare of a society. Brown's stylistic register is wide, ranging from occasional passages in a richly poetic mode to the effective colloquial tone employed elsewhere. The account of the preparations for Black Star is written with a remarkable narrative economy that creates an emphatic impression of the swiftness of the catastrophe.

GREENWOOD, Walter (1903–74), British novelist and playwright, born in Salford, Lancashire. He left school at the age of 13 and, between long periods of unemployment, worked as an office boy, stable boy for a cotton millionaire, signwriter, chauffeur, warehouseman, and salesman. His early experiences of deprivation provided the background for his first and most famous novel, Love on the Dole (1933), which made a great impact at the time, and contributed significantly to the popular pressures which eventually led to the founding of the welfare state, through its descriptions of hardship brought about by the Depression, the humiliations imposed by the means test, and the desperation caused by mass unemployment. With Roland Gow, Greenwood adapted the novel into a successful play; it was also filmed in 1941. Greenwood also wrote the screenplay No Limit (1935) for the comedian George Formby, and wrote many other novels, including His Worship the Mayor (1934), which exposed corruption in local government. His plays include My Son My Son (1935), The Cure for Love (1951), and Saturday Night at the Crown (1953). There Was a Time (1967) is his autobiography. Randall Stevenson discusses Greenwood in The British Novel Since the Thirties (1986). Greenwood foreshadowed later Northern working-class novelists such as John *Braine and David *Storey.

GREER, Germaine (1939–), Australian feminist writer, born in Melbourne, educated at the universities of Melbourne, Sydney, and Cambridge. In 1964 she settled in Europe, spending much of her time in Britain and Italy. Among other academic posts she has been a lecturer at the University of Warwick and Director of the Tulsa Center for the Study of Women's Literature. She achieved worldwide fame with The Female Eunuch (1970) after its publication in the USA in 1971; the book questioned stereotypical depictions of, and assumptions about, women and achieved something of a cult status during the 1970s. The Obstacle Race (1979), The Revolting Garden (1979; under the pseudonym 'Rose Blight'), and Sex and Destiny (1984) extended her feminist concerns. Her other works include The Mad Woman's Underclothes: Essays and Other Writings 1968–85 (1986), and Daddy We Hardly Knew You (1989), which explored her own family background. In The Change: Women, Ageing and the Menopause (1991) Greer argues passionately that the end of fertility can signal new freedoms for women. Greer studies the lives and work of poets including Sappho, Katherine Philips, and Aphra Behn in Slip-Shod Sybils (1995), arguing that because so few women wrote poetry in English before 1900, their work cannot be relied upon to be representative of women's sensibility and is often derivative and inauthentic. She has also edited The Collected Works of Katherine Philips, The Matchless Orinda (1993).

GREG, Sir W(alter) W(ilson) (1875–1959), British bibliographer, editor, and literary historian, born in Wimbledon, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1900 he completed his first work of bibliography, a finding list of plays written before 1643 and published before 1700. His unrivalled expertise in Elizabethan palaeography enabled him to produce his editions of Henslowe's Diary (1904) and Papers (1908). He also worked extensively with sixteenth- and seventeenth-century manuscripts as general editor for the Malone Society; English Literary Autographs: 1550–1650 (1925–32), an edition of facsimiles and transcripts of documents, remains a primary tool for identifying the hands of various playwrights and scriveners. He is best known for A Bibliography of the English Printed Drama to the Restoration (four volumes, 1939–59), a work of great significance in the development of modern bibliographical studies. His numerous other publications include The Editorial Problem in Shakespeare (1942) and his widely admired dual-text edition of Marlowe's 'Doctor Faustus', 1604–1616 (1950).

GREGORY, Horace (Victor) (1898–1982), American poet and critic, born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, educated at the University of Wisconsin at Madison. After graduation he moved to New York where he married the poet Marya *Zaturenska and published his first volume of poems, Chelsea Rooming House (1930); it was his evocation of the crowded slums of New York's lower west side that briefly associated him with Marxist and proletarian writers of the depression. His other volumes of verse include No Retreat (1933), Chorus for Survival (1935), Poems, 1930–1940 (1941), Selected Poems (1951), Medusa in Gramercy Park (1961), Collected Poems (1964), and Another Look (1976). Like other modernist contemporaries, Gregory's verse frequently employs loose poetic structures and elliptical syntax, but his vision was more markedly social. From 1934 to 1960 he taught at Sarah Lawrence College (after retiring in 1961 he remained a Professor Emeritus until his death). Among his works as a distinguished translator from Latin are The Poems of Catullus (1931), Ovid's The Metamorphoses (1958), and The Love Poems of Ovid (1964). Notable among his works of literary and art criticism are Pilgrim of the Apocalypse: A Critical Study of D. H. Lawrence (1933) and The World of James McNeill Whistler (1959). He edited several anthologies, and with Marya Zaturenska published A History of American Poetry, 1900–1940 (1946).

GREGORY, Lady (Isabella) Augusta (1852–1932), Irish playwright and folklorist, the youngest daughter of an Anglo-Irish landowner; she was born in Roxborough, Co. Galway. Following the death of her husband Sir W. H. Gregory in 1892, she took over the management of his estate at Coole Park, County Galway. A leading figure in the *Irish Revival, her close association from 1897 onward with W. B. *Yeats, who regularly stayed at Coole, resulted in the foundation of the *Abbey Theatre. Her account of the theatre's earlier history is contained in Our Irish Theatre (1913). Her skills in the written recreation of the dialects of western Ireland were used to assist Yeats in the writing of Cathleen Ni Houlihan*, The Pot of Broth, performed in 1902, and other plays. She wrote some forty independent works as a playwright, including a series of dialect adaptations of Molière's work collected as The Kiltartan Molière (1910). The majority of her own works are one-act comedies, the best being contained in Seven Short Plays (1909); among her numerous further collections of plays are New Comedies (1913) and Three Wonder Plays (1922). Her other works include the translations from the Irish of Gods and Fighting Men (1904) and the compilations from Irish folklore published as Poets and Dreamers (1903), A Book of Saints and Wonders (1906), and Visions and Beliefs in the West of Ireland (1920). The many volumes of the Coole Edition of her works began appearing under the general editorship of Colin Smythe in 1970. Elizabeth Coxhead's Lady Gregory: A Literary Portrait appeared in 1961.

GRENFELL, Julian (Henry Francis) (1888–1915), British poet, the eldest son of Lord Desborough; he was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, after which he took a commission with the Royal Dragoons in 1910. A keen sportsman and much admired officer, he won the Distinguished Service Order for a courageous act of reconnaissance. He died of a head wound on 26 May 1915, the day upon which his poem 'Into Battle', sent to his mother the previous month, appeared in The Times; the Morning Post acclaimed it as 'the one incorruptible and incomparable poem which the war has yet given us' and Grenfell's name joined *Brooke's as a paragon of nobility and self-sacrifice. While 'Into Battle' has, like Brooke's work, been disparaged for its enthusiastic view of death in action, it is remarkable for the compelling accumulation of natural imagery through which it invokes the heroic spirit. Robert *Graves considered the poem an authentic expression of the 'overwhelming sense of natural beauty which a soldier is entitled to recognize as a premonition of death'. Grenfell's work was represented in T. Sturge Moore's edition of Some Soldier Poets (1919); no collection of his poetry has yet been published, although selections from it appear in Julian Grenfell (1976) by Nicholas Mosley.

GRENVILLE, Kate (1950–), Australian writer, born in Sydney, educated at Sydney University and the University of Colorado. She travelled in Europe and the USA for several years and has worked as a teacher, journalist, and film editor. Her first collection of stories, Bearded Ladies (1984), displayed her command of a variety of styles from black comedy to symbolism. Lillian's Story (1985) is a novel whose central character was based on a well-known Sydney street personality; the protagonist, oppressed by her father, takes refuge in food, only to court social and sexual ostracism, but she manages to survive despite her traumatic experiences. Dreamhouse (1986) is a psychosexual thriller set in Tuscany, describing a woman trapped in an unsatisfactory marriage and her eventual escape. The author's feminist convictions are also apparent in Joan Makes History (1988), which in comic mode argues that history has ignored women; the story of a modern Joan is linked to a series of other ordinary women, all named Joan, from earlier periods of history. Writing Book appeared in 1990. Her novel Dark Places (1994) is narrated by a misogynist who rapes the daughter who first appeared in Lillian's Story.

GREY, Zane, born Pearl Zane GREY (1872–1939), American novelist, born in Zanesville, Ohio, educated at the University of Pennsylvania. A youthful enthusiasm for dime novels and stories of his great-great-grandfather's heroic actions against the Indians gave rise to Grey's lasting conviction that literature and life were inextricably linked. He moved to New York ostensibly to practise dentistry, but in reality to get closer to the heart of publishing. In 1905 he married Lisa Elise Roth, who provided Grey with support as he strove to establish himself as a writer. The Last of the Plainsmen was published in 1908, but it was not until the publication of Riders of the Purple Sage (1912) that he hit the bestseller lists. By pairing the civilizing heroine, Jane Withersteen, with Lassiter, the anarchic individualist, Grey ensured that the attraction they feel for each other is strong enough to indicate how each yearns for the other's strengths, thus initiating a dialogue of forces which is not resolved until the end of the book. This, combined with the book's narrative drive and intense, excitable language, indicates why Riders remains the most famous of all *Western novels. Grey wrote over sixty novels in all, but he never lost his love for the wilderness, returning frequently to the deserts which he felt constituted his real spiritual home.

GRIERSON, Sir Herbert (John Clifford) (1866–1960), British editor and critic, born in Quendale on the southern tip of Shetland, educated at King's College, the University of Aberdeen, and Christ Church, Oxford. In 1894 he became the first Professor of English Literature at Aberdeen and was subsequently Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature at the University of Edinburgh. Following his contribution of the chapter on John Donne to The Cambridge History of English Literature (edited by A. W. Ward and A. R. Waller, thirteen volumes, 1907–16), he produced his edition of The Poems of John Donne (two volumes, 1912). This work and his edition of Metaphysical Lyrics and Poems of the Seventeenth Century (1921), T. S. *Eliot's review of which gave rise to the celebrated phrase '*dissociation of sensibility', were strongly influential in the growth of critical interest in metaphysical poetry during the 1920s. His other publications include the critical study Cross Currents in the Literature of the XVII Century (1929) and the biography Walter Scott, Bart. (1938). He was knighted in 1936 for his services to literature.

GRIEVE, C. M., see MACDIARMID, HUGH.

GRIFFITHS, Trevor (1935–), British playwright, born in Manchester, the son of a labourer, educated at Manchester University. Occupations (1970), set during the 1920 Fiat strike in Turin, and focusing on arguments between a humane Gramsci and the ruthless Soviet apparatchik Kabak, was followed by two other plays written from a Marxist stance and asking how radical social change is best achieved: these were The Party (1973), in which a representative cross-section of leftists debate the student uprising in the Paris of 1968 while it unfolds on television, and Comedians* (1975). Other works for the stage include Sam, Sam (1972), a semi-autobiographical piece about a young man who, for better or worse, remains trapped by his working-class roots while his brother makes an emotionally damaging journey into the middle class; The Gulf Between Us (1992), about English builders isolated in Iraq during the hostilities that followed the invasion of Kuwait; and Thatcher's Children (1993), which follows the lives of a group of friends from primary school in 1973 to the cruder, harder, more violent England we can expect to see in 1999. Griffiths has also adapted other people's work, freely transforming Chekhov's Platonov into the overtly socialist Piano (1990), and written plays for television, among them Absolute Beginners (1974), a drama about Lenin; Through the Night (1975), about a mastectomy patient in a notably impersonal hospital; and a series about a left-wing Labour politician, Bill Brand (1976).

GRIGSON, Geoffrey (Edward Harvey) (1905–85), British poet, critic, editor, and topographical writer, born at Pelynt, Cornwall, educated at St Edmund Hall, Oxford. He began his career as a journalist at the London office of the Yorkshire Post in 1927. In 1933 he founded New Verse*, which provided the principal platform for his famously vehement style as a critic. During the war he worked at the BBC and subsequently became a freelance writer. His prolific output of literary journalism is represented by numerous collections of his critical writings which include The Contrary View (1974) and Blessings, Kicks, and Curses (1982). As an art critic, he was one of the first to recognize the achievements of Ben Nicholson and Henry Moore; Samuel Palmer, the Visionary Years (1947) prompted a revaluation of that artist's work. The Englishman's Flora (1955) and The Shell Country Book (1962) are among the best-known of his widely read works on the English countryside. His many collections of poetry include Several Observations (1939), The Isles of Scilly (1946), A Skull in Salop (1967), Sad Grave of an Imperial Mongoose (1973), and Montaigne's Tower (1984). Collected editions of his poems appeared in 1963 and 1982. The extent of Grigson's other activities have tended to obscure his stature as a poet. Much of his earlier verse, which displayed a laconically individual tone, was typical of the 1930s in its disquieted awareness of socio-cultural malaise. Throughout his career he avoided straightforwardly conventional forms, though his conversational manner frequently made rich use of subtle technical effects. His poems, which are invariably intelligent and fundamentally humane, range from lovingly particularized contemplations of the English countryside to scathingly funny satires of which 'White Tom's Position', on T. S. *Eliot, is the best known. His other notable publications include the autobiography The Crest on the Silver (1950) and Recollections, Mainly of Writers and Artists (1984).

GRISHAM, John (1955–), American novelist, born in Jonesboro, Arkansas, he studied law at Mississippi State University and the University of Mississippi and practised as a lawyer from 1981 to 1990. He also served in the Mississippi House of Representatives from 1984 to 1990. Grisham's fiction is informed by his knowledge of the American legal system. A Time to Kill (1989), his first novel, concerns the father of a rape victim who kills his daughter's attacker. The Firm (1991), which established him as a best-selling author, and its successors The Pelican Brief (1992) and The Client (1993), are treatments of individuals rendered vulnerable by their discoveries of corruption in legal and political circles. The Chamber (1994), which offers a deeply considered view of the death penalty, attracted more critical acclaim than its predecessors.

Sales of Grisham's books have reached levels at which his publishers style him 'the most popular author in the world'. The Rainmaker (1995) concerns a young lawyer who singlehandedly pursues an action against a major American insurance company.

GROSS, Philip (1952–), British poet, born in Cornwall, educated at the University of Sussex, subsequently training as a librarian. Gross's work first attracted wide notice when his poem 'The Ice Factory' won the Poetry Society's National Poetry Competition in 1982. His first collection, Familiars (1983), was followed by other volumes including The Ice Factory (1984), Cat's Whisker (1987), The Son of the Duke of Nowhere (1991), and I.D. (1994). Gross's poetry has an air of accessibility produced by its wealth of precise detail; the social and domestic incidents supporting many of his narratives provide events and images embodying the unsettling intuitions often developed in the course of his poems. His unobtrusive use of intricate schemes of rhyme and metre and a firm technical control is evident in all his writing. He collaborated with Sylvia *Kantaris to produce The Air Mines of Mistila (1988, illustrated by Kim Lewis), a poetic fantasy which may be read as a parable of Western civilization's destructive greed for valuable natural resources.

Group, The, a term denoting both a critical method forming a basis for the meetings of various writers, predominantly poets, and the name by which they came to be known as a loosely coherent movement. Philip *Hobsbaum initiated regular gatherings of poets in Cambridge in 1952 for discussions intended to bring F. R. *Leavis's principles of textual scrutiny to bear upon their work. In 1955 he convened a similar association of poets in London which became identified as the Group; Hobsbaum was its chairman until 1959, when he was succeeded by Edward *Lucie-Smith. Members, who joined at the chairman's invitation, submitted copies of their work for analysis and appraisal by their peers; disciplined experimentation, consciousness of poetry's social dimensions, directness of tone, and imaginative energy were among the qualities upon which a high value was placed, partly in reaction to what members perceived as the arid formalism of the *Movement. Notable among the writers concerned were Alan *Brownjohn, Martin *Bell, Peter *Porter, Peter *Redgrove, George *MacBeth, Fleur *Adcock, and B. S. *Johnson, whose wide range of styles and thematic preoccupations gave an eclectic character to A Group Anthology (1963), which Hobsbaum and Lucie-Smith edited. In 1965 the Group was more formally constituted as the Writer's Workshop, a development for which Martin Bell was significantly responsible, which met at the Poetry Society's premises in Earls Court. Hobsbaum introduced the Group's principles and practice to a series of meetings he held in Belfast during the early 1960s, which proved of great value to a number of the *Ulster poets. As the model for many subsequent forums for emerging writers and in terms of the achievement of some of its members, the Group occupies a position of considerable importance in post-war British poetry.

Group, The, see MCCARTHY, MARY.

Group Theatre (1931–41), American theatre company. Founded by Harold Clurman, Lee Strasberg, and Cheryl Crawford, and based in New York, it was an offshoot of the Theatre Guild, and planned as a permanent acting company committed to the highest ideals of professionalism in all aspects of theatre work. It encouraged new writers, and sought new plays which expressed some of the social and artistic ideals of its members. It took the Moscow Art Theatre as its model, and Lee Strasberg was particularly instrumental in introducing Konstantin Stanislavsky's theories of acting to the company, which he later expanded in the Actors' Studio where he taught the principles of 'Method' acting. Though the company failed to establish a permanent theatre, and was finally split apart by internal faction, it none the less had a powerful impact on the American theatre, and in its egalitarian organization, and its commitment to socialist politics, was a forerunner of the *Living Theatre and the *Open Theatre. The Group Theatre's most notable productions include Paul *Green's The House of Connelly (1931); John Howard Lawson's Success Story (1932); Sidney *Kingsley's Man in White (1933); three plays by Clifford *Odets, Waiting for Lefty (1935), Awake and Sing! (1935), and Paradise Lost (1935); and Paul Green and Kurt Weill's musical based on Erwin Piscator's The Good Soldier Schweik, under the title of Johnny Johnson (1937). It had an immense critical and popular success with Odets's Golden Boy (1937), and in its last three years produced new plays by Irwin *Shaw, The Gentle People (1938) and Retreat to Pleasure (1940–1), and William *Saroyan's My Heart's in the Highlands (1939). Harold Clurman's history of the Group Theatre, The Fervent Years, appeared in 1945.

Group Theatre, The, an experimental theatre company begun in 1932 by Rupert Doone to provide a focus for the activities of various actors, writers, and producers who were dissatisfied with the possibilities afforded by London's existing commercial facilities. The venture was also committed to working in broad alignment with the socialist doctrines pervasive in the arts during the 1930s. Doone, a ballet dancer and choreographer who had worked with Diaghilev and Cocteau in Paris, was assisted by the painter Robert Medley, the schoolfriend of W. H. *Auden's who had prompted him to become a poet in 1922, in organizing the basic membership. A commission to Auden eventually resulted in The Dance of Death (1933), which was given trial performances in 1934 and produced at the Westminster Theatre with T. S. *Eliot's Sweeney Agonistes in 1935. Eminent among the other poets involved were Stephen *Spender, whose Trial of a Judge (1938) the company produced, and Louis *MacNeice, who supplied his translation of Agamemnon (1936) and Out of the Picture (1937). W. B. *Yeats and Eliot, who had written The Rock (1934) in association with members of the Group, led attempts to secure the Mercury Theatre, Notting Hill Gate, for performances after 1935; *The Ascent of F6 (1936), one of the company's three plays by Auden and *Isherwood, was highly successful when staged there. The graphic artists associated with the theatre included Henry Moore and John Piper. Benjamin Britten composed incidental music for numerous productions. Having disbanded in 1939, the Group was revived from 1950 to 1954, their performances of Sartre's The Flies (1946) in 1951 being among the more memorable of later productions.

GROVE, Frederick Philip (1879–1948), Canadian novelist, born Felix Paul Greve in Radomno, Prussia (now Poland); he was brought up in Hamburg and subsequently attended university in Bonn and Munich. His picaresque early life involved associations with Stefan George and André Gide, a year in prison for fraudulently obtaining money from a friend, periods in Italy, Sicily, France, and Berlin, a host of translations, and the publication of a volume of poetry and a verse-drama. In 1909 he faked his death and fled to North America, where he invented a new identity for himself. Although he wrote an 'autobiography', In Search of Myself (1946), much of this work is fiction and it is hard to disentangle the facts of his 'real' life immediately after he settled in Canada. He probably worked as a farm labourer for a few years before later becoming a teacher in Manitoba. It was as Frederick Philip Grove, a writer of 'realistic' novels and a founding father of prairie fiction, that he became known. Perhaps his greatest fiction was himself. Grove's books include Over Prairie Trails (1922), a non-fiction account of travels in rural Manitoba, and the novels Settlers of the Marsh (1925), Our Daily Bread (1928), Fruits of the Earth (1933), and The Master of the Mill (1944). Despite his reputation as a realist, all his work contains passages in which romanticism intrudes.

GUARE, John (1938–), American playwright, born in Manhattan, educated at Georgetown University and at Yale. Much of Guare's work revolves around themes of family and success. His writing is recognized for its dark humour and his seemingly paradoxical romanticism. Among his best-known plays is The House of Blue Leaves (1971), the story of a would-be songwriter and his disastrous relationship with his family. Landscape of the Body (1978) relates events when Betty Yearn visits Greenwich Village to rescue her sister from life as a porn actress. In Lydle Breeze (1982) and Gardenia (1986), Guare uncharacteristically leaves the milieu of the present day for the post-American Civil War period. Six Degrees of Separation (1990; New York Drama Critics Award) is based on an incident in 1983 when a young con artist posed as Sidney Poitier and robbed various wealthy New Yorkers; Guare wrote the screenplay for the film of 1993. In addition to other screenplays such as Taking off (1971), in collaboration with Milos Forman and Jean-Claude Carrière, and Atlantic City (1981), Guare has also written musicals including Two Gentlemen of Verona (1971).

GUEDALLA, Philip (1889–1944), British historian and biographer, born in London, educated at Balliol College, Oxford. After he had repeatedly failed to become a Member of Parliament, Supers and Supermen (1920) established him as an author; its epigrammatically irreverent treatments of historical figures owed something to *Strachey's Eminent Victorians (1918). Similar in approach, A Gallery (1924) surveyed contemporary literary reputations. The Second Empire (1922), a study of France under Napoleon III, was his first historical work of note; engagingly biographical and impressively scholarly, it set the pattern for Palmerston (1926); The Duke (1931), a study of Wellington; and The Queen and Mr Gladstone (two volumes, 1933). His talent for vivid historical narrative was at its best in The Hundred Years (1936), which encompassed the century following Victoria's accession. His writings in support of the Allied cause during the Second World War include Middle East 1940–1942: A Study in Air Power (1944). Among Guedalla's other works are the accounts of his visits to North and South America respectively contained in Conquistador (1927) and Argentine Tango (1932).

Guerrillas, a novel by V. S. *Naipaul, published in 1976, based on a murder case involving Michael X which the author reported for the Sunday Times Magazine in May 1974 (his exploration of the true story is to be found in The Return of Eva Perón and the Killings in Trinidad, 1980). The novel is set in an unnamed recently independent Caribbean island that is being sustained by foreign interests, and the 'guerrillas' of the title are would-be revolutionary members of an agricultural commune led by the charismatic but dubious Jimmy Ahmed, whose racial and sexual ambiguities distort his political ideals. Another principal character is Peter Roche, an Englishman who acts as public relations officer for the local company that financially supports the commune in order to keep it under control. Roche's English girlfriend Jane accompanies him to the island, and her fascinated interaction with Ahmed builds towards a compelling picture of sexual and political violence and frustration in a disordered and despairing society. The Black Power revolution that Ahmed has been preparing for does not materialize, for when the opportunity comes no one rallies to his call. His grandiloquent fantasies culminate in his brutal sexual assault on Jane, after which he orders his homosexual partner to hack her to death. Roche finds himself in a position where he conspires to conceal her death (since she has managed to enter the country without a visa there is no official record of her presence there in the first place). Roche himself, as company scapegoat, must leave; and now that Ahmed's impotence is established, the government can dispense with him. There are no winners by the end of a novel that is a brilliant and brooding observation of psychological and political defeat.

GUNESEKERA, Romesh (1954–), Sri Lankan novelist and short-story writer, born in Sri Lanka; he lived in the Philippines and the USA before settling in England. Gunesekera's first collection of stories, Monkfish Moon (1992), was praised for its restrained, subtle prose. Set in Sri Lanka and in Britain, the stories explore, from a variety of perspectives, the violence, conflict, and strife prevalent in the author's native land, and the impact of ethnic and political mistrust on his characters' psyches. With his first novel, Reef (1994), Gunesekera established himself in the front rank of the singularly talented post-*Rushdie generation of expatriate South Asian writers (which includes the Indians Amitav *Ghosh, Sunetra *Gupta, and Amit *Chaudhuri, and the Pakistanis Aamer Hussein, Sara Suleri, and Nadeem Aslam). In Reef, which reads like a collection of stories linked by a single narrative perspective, Gunesekera employs the device of presenting complex political issues in a voice that grows from innocence to experience as the tale proceeds. Triton, a simple village boy, learns from his sympathetic master the ways of the world, witnesses the systematic dismemberment of his country, and finds himself and his destiny in exile in England. Though similar to his stories, the longer episodic form of Reef gives Gunesekera the opportunity to splice his account with metaphysical ruminations, and to display his gift for lyrical descriptions of landscape.

GUNN, Neil M(iller) (1891–1973), Scottish novelist and leading figure of the *Scottish Renaissance, born in Dalbeath, Caithness, the son of a fishing boat skipper and owner. All his work is set in the Scottish Highlands, particularly in Caithness and Sutherland. Gunn worked in the Customs and Excise from 1911 to 1937. His first stories and articles were published in 1923; the following year he met C. M. Grieve (Hugh *MacDiarmid) who influenced his work, although the two were later estranged. His first novel, The Grey Coast (1926), dealt with the fishing trade familiar from his childhood; it was followed by Morning Tide (1931), the story of a boy's growth from childhood to young manhood, set in the Highlands. The Lost Glen (1932) continued the exploration of Highland moors and the threat to them by 'foreign' usurpation of lands and rights; Sun Circle (1933) and Butcher's Broom (1934) were historical novels, the first an account of the Pictish communities, the second a recreation of the infamous Highland clearances. Highland River (1937), which follows its protagonist from boyhood to maturity, is informed by the numinous quality and by the sense of oneness with the natural world which is a feature of his work. The Silver Darlings (1941), Young Art and Old Hector (1942), The Serpent (1943), and The Green Isle of the Great Deep (1944) are works in which an anti-materialist philosophy and a sense of the mythic combine with an acute insight into the workings of a community. The Drinking Well (1947) is an ambitious work, incorporating a dialectic between urban and rural ways of life; it also shared an increasing didacticism with later novels such as The Other Landscape (1954). In his later years Gunn struggled with the complications of his own Nationalist position and moved eventually to an idiosyncratic Zen Buddhism. Other works include two collections of essays, The Other Landscape (1949) and the posthumous Landscape and Light (1987), edited by A. McCleery.

GUNN, Thom(son William) (1929–), Anglo-American poet, born in Gravesend, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. From the mid-1950s he has lived chiefly in California, where he began lecturing at the University of California, Berkeley, in 1958. Fighting Terms (1954), his first substantial collection of verse, displayed the energetic engagement of experience that has remained a central characteristic of his verse throughout continuous stylistic developments; he has described his poetry as 'a debate between the passion for definition and the passion for flow'. The rational tone and accomplished use of conventional forms in his earlier work led to his association with the *Movement, in whose anthologies he was represented. The Sense of Movement (1957) emphasized his individuality in poetry unusual for the formal virtuosity of its treatments of themes derived from popular culture. With My Sad Captains (1961) his work became more conversationally flexible through the adoption of syllabic verse-lines, which are used alongside more traditional metres throughout Touch (1967) and Moly (1971). The latter indicates his participation in the Californian 'alternative culture' of the late 1960s and repeatedly invokes the effects of hallucinatory drugs. Jack Straw's Castle (1975) increased the exploratory freedom of his verse forms. The candour with which he had always used autobiographical material culminated in the open treatments of his homosexuality in The Passages of Joy (1982) and The Man with Night Sweats (1992), works of remarkable technical and thematic range. Among the numerous publications by *small presses which sustained his ethos of experimentation throughout the 1980s are Undesirables (1988) and Death's Door (1989). Selected Poems: 1950–1975 appeared in 1979. The Occasions of Poetry (edited by Clive *Wilmer, 1982) is a collection of his critical and autobiographical essays; among his works as an editor are Selected Poems of Fulke Greville (1968).

GUPPY, Shusha (1939–), British memoirist and essayist of Persian origin, born and brought up in Tehran. She later studied Middle Eastern languages and philosophy at the Sorbonne, Paris, before moving to England where she established her career as a singer, songwriter, and recording artist, and as a critic, essayist, and travel writer. Her first book, The Blindfold Horse (1988), a memoir, tells the story of her scholarly Persian family against the deftly drawn backdrop of a dramatically changing mid-century Iran. Guppy's poetic, graceful writing style displays the influence of Karen *Blixen. Though her reminiscences adopt the mode of non-fiction, The Blindfold Horse has been compared with Isabel Allende's House of Spirits for its narrative energy and its evocation of a bygone age. A Girl in Paris (1991), its sequel, tells the story of Guppy's years in France, her encounters with such figures as Prévert and Camus, and her discovery of herself as woman and artist. Looking Back (1993) consists of Guppy's dialogues with, and studies of, several eminent twentieth-century women of letters.

GUPTA, Sunetra (1965–), Indian novelist, born in Calcutta, educated at Princeton University and Imperial College, London. She was brought up mainly in Africa, and has spent much of her adult life in Britain. Her first novel, Memories of Rain (1992), tells the story of the Indian Moni's growing estrangement from her adulterous English husband and his native country. It was highly praised for its elaborate prose style, and she was compared to *Woolf and *Smart. Her fiction is dense with quotations from *Tagore, references to European literary giants, and allusion to Greek myth. The Glassblower's Breath (1993), her controversial second novel, takes more risks with the form; some critics took exception to its melodramatic character. Set in the span of a day, it follows the footsteps of a young Indian woman pursued by her several lovers; it shifts between past and present, memory, fantasy, and stream-of-consciousness, negotiating the disparate cultures, landscapes, and literary traditions of England, America, and India. In Moonlight into Marzipan (1995) Gupta intertwines the myth of Prometheus with a contemporary fable of scientific discovery. The novel, which is characteristically set in Britain and in India, shows a new and wide-ranging social awareness, and a considerable gift for mock-decadent satire.

GURNEY, Ivor (Bertie) (1890–1937), British poet and composer, born in Gloucester, educated at the Royal College of Music. He was on active service in Flanders from 1915 to 1918, when he was discharged after being wounded and gassed. He returned to the Royal College of Music in 1919. Severn and Somme (1917), his first collection of verse, was favourably reviewed; War's Embers (1919) was well received, though reservations were expressed over its colloquially direct diction. A third collection, provisionally entitled Rewards of Wonder, was rejected by his publisher in 1919. The more orthodox modes of the previous work, which often forms rich evocations of rural Gloucestershire, was superseded by new approaches suggested by his readings of Hopkins and Whitman. His increasingly idiosyncratic manner was manifest in juxtapositions of a passionate lyricism with strikingly factual documentation of conditions on the Western Front. During the period 1918 to 1922 his career in poetry and music progressed encouragingly: his poems appeared in influential journals and his first published compositions, Five Elizabethan Songs (1920), were highly acclaimed. Ludlow and Teme (1923) and The Western Playland (1926), his settings of verse by A. E. *Housman, and Lights Out (1925), his treatments of six poems by Edward *Thomas, were mainly written at this time. Following a deterioration of his mental health, which had been uncertain for some time, in 1922 he was committed to the City of London Mental Hospital in Dartford, where he remained until his death. He continued to compose music and poetry, though his output diminished after 1926. Five volumes of his songs were published between 1938 and 1980. Collected Poems, edited by P. J. *Kavanagh, appeared in 1982. The Ordeal of Ivor Gurney, a biography by Michael Hurd, appeared in 1978.

GUSTAFSON, Ralph (1909–), Canadian poet, born in the Eastern Townships of Quebec, educated at Bishop's University and Oxford University. He worked as a journalist in England, where his earliest verse was published in the 1930s, and subsequently in New York, during which time his early romanticism gave way to a verse more concerned with exploring social issues and the decline in moral values. After returning to Canada in 1960 he was a music critic for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and a professor of English at Bishop's University. Gustafson's interest in music informs his poetry of different periods. His later poetry employs a more *confessional tone and includes Ixion's Wheel (1969), Fire on Stone (1974), Corners in the Glass (1977), Conflicts of Spring (1981), and The Moment Is All (1983), a selection of his best work from 1944 to 1983. His numerous other volumes of verse include The Golden Chalice (1935), Flight into Darkness (1944), Rivers among Rocks (1960), and Rocky Mountain Poems (1960). Gustafson has also edited several anthologies of Canadian writing, including Anthology of Canadian Poetry (English) (1942) and The Penguin Book of Canadian Verse (1958; revised 1967). His short stories are collected in The Brazen Tower (1974) and The Vivid Air (1980).

GUY, Rosa (Cuthbert) (1925–), African-American novelist, born in Trinidad; she grew up in Harlem, New York. After working in a clothing factory, she attended New York University and began writing through her involvement with the American Negro Theatre; her play Venetian Blind was produced in 1954. She was one of the founders of the Harlem Writers' Guild in 1950. Bird at My Window (1966), her first novel, forms an uncompromising treatment of the despair engendered by conditions in the Harlem ghetto in the 1950s. Her most highly regarded work is A Measure of Time (1983), which registers social developments from the 1920s onward in its story of a black woman who leaves the oppression of Alabama to seek new opportunities in New York. Also well known as a writer for children, Guy edited Children of Longing (1970), a collection of revealing interviews with African-American children during the civil rights crises of the 1960s. My Love, My Love: Or the Peasant Girl (1985) is a retelling of Hans Christian Andersen's tale 'The Little Mermaid' newly set in the Caribbean.

H

HACKER, Marilyn (1942–), American poet, born in New York City, educated at Washington Square College of New York University and the Art Students League. In her first volume of poetry, Presentation Piece (1974; National Book Award, 1975), and in Separations (1976), Hacker begins to articulate her dissatisfaction with woman's traditional roles. Taking Notice (1980) and Assumptions (1985) contain reflections on the women in her life, including her mother, friends, and lovers. Love, Death and the Changing of the Seasons (1986), a poetic novel of a lesbian love affair, is an evocative and sensual work containing graphic sexual descriptions. In Going Back to the River (1990) the poet comes to terms with loss after the dissolution of a love affair as she writes of loves and life in Paris and New York. In Winter Numbers (1994) Hacker evokes memories linking the historical and personal disasters of her generation: the Holocaust, AIDS, and Hacker's own fight with breast cancer. Selected Poems, 1965–1990 (1994), which contains work from five of her published books, reveals the many voices (lesbian, feminist, mother, Jew, intellectual) with which the poet speaks.

Hadrian the Seventh, a novel by Frederick *Rolfe, published in 1904. George Arthur Rose is, like Rolfe, a rejected candidate for the priesthood. The novel describes how he is called to be pope after a life of exemplary holiness and faithfulness to his vocation in obscurity and poverty. In a unique exercise in imaginative wish-fulfilment, Rolfe depicts Rose—now Pope Hadrian—embarking on a programme of papal reform: opening up centuries-old barriers between Church and world, renouncing any claim to temporal sovereignty, selling the Vatican treasures and giving the proceeds to the poor. He nevertheless denounces socialism and the doctrine of equality. The somewhat contrived ending of the book sees Hadrian assassinated by his enemies. The book is written in Rolfe's characteristic style, a mixture of rare exotic vocabulary and classically inspired coinings.

HAILEY, Arthur (1920–), British-Canadian novelist, born in Luton, Bedforshire, he left school at fourteen to work as a clerk and emigrated to Canada in 1947 after serving in the RAF throughout the Second World War. He worked in commercial capacities until 1956, when he became a full-time writer, initially of television plays. Flight into Danger (1956), his first novel, drew its factual authenticity from Hailey's experiences as a pilot. The detailed documentary character of his best-known works results from meticulous research into the social and professional spheres in which they are set. Hotel (1965) was followed by Airport (1968), which established him as a best-selling popular author. His subsequent books include Wheels (1971), a treatment of the automobile industry. The Moneychangers (1975), which deals with banking, Strong Medicine (1984), set in a major pharmaceuticals company, and The Evening News (1990), which concerns television journalism. Hailey's novels typically feature a proliferation of characters around whom a complex network of dramatic plots is woven. Among his other works are The Final Diagnosis (1959), In High Places (1962), and Overload (1979).

HALDANE, J(ohn) B(urdon) S(anderson) (1892–1964), British geneticist and writer, born in Oxford, educated at New College, Oxford; he was successively professor of genetics and of biometry at University College, London. His The Causes of Evolution (1932) was one of the most influential works on evolutionary theory of its day. During the 1930s he became a Communist and wrote brilliant articles for the Communist paper the Daily Worker, of which he was chairman of the editorial board (1940–9). The links between science and Marxism were persuasively explored in a series of lectures published as The Marxist Philosophy and the Sciences (1938). He resigned from the Communist Party c.1950 over Lysenko's theories and the course of Soviet genetics. Haldane was widely known as an imaginative popularizer of science, writing Possible Worlds (1927), which speculates on the future, and Animal Biology (1927; with Julian *Huxley); Aldous Huxley drew on Haldane's theories in Brave New World. Haldane wrote a witty collection of children's stories, My Friend Mr. Leakey (1937), about a philanthropic magician, and his poem 'Cancer's a Funny Thing' is included in *Larkin's Oxford Book of Twentieth Century Verse. In 1957 he emigrated to India and was naturalized three years later. Haldane's sister was Naomi *Mitchison.

HALDEMAN, Joe (1943–), American science fiction writer, born in Oklahoma, educated at the University of Maryland. He received much acclaim for his first novel, The Forever War (1974), which transposes Vietnam into the mid-future and presents the world of war from the soldier's point of view. Other works on different themes have followed but the short stories collected in Vietnam and Other Alien Worlds (1993) return to the subject of his earlier work.

HALEY, Alex (Palmer) (1921–92), African-American writer, born in Ithaca, New York. After two years at college he served with the Coast Guard, and on retirement in 1959 became a freelance magazine writer and interviewer. He co-authored The Autobiography of Malcolm X (1965), based on intensive interviews with the famous Black Muslim leader. His lengthy foreword to the book is a shrewd and moving portrait of Malcolm X. His next book, Roots (1977; Pulitzer Prize), had a great international success, as did its popular television adaptation; it chronicles the lives of Kunta Kinte (one of Haley's ancestors who was brought to Virginia as a slave) and the six generations, both slaves and freed men, that followed. Haley sought and found his roots in The Gambia, West Africa, and his epic work is based on factual research. His novella A Different Kind of Christmas (1988) is a stirring story of the Underground Railway by which slaves were smuggled out to free territory in America.

HALL, Donald (Andrew, Jr) (1928–), American poet, essayist, and editor, born in New Haven, Connecticut, educated at Harvard University, Oxford University, where he won the Newdigate Prize for his poem 'Exiles', and Stanford University. He later became a professor at Michigan University. He has published poetry prolifically, from the more traditional metres, rhythms, and formalism of his early collections To the Loud Wind, and Other Poems (1955) and Exiles and Marriages (1955), to the freer forms of The Dark Horses (1958), poems about suburban life. There followed A Roof of Tiger Lilies (1964), the 'deep-image' inspired poems in The Alligator Bride (1969), The Yellow Room (1971), about a romance, and A Blue Wing: Selected Poems, 1964–1965 (1975). These poems demonstrate a concise exactness in their style. He has stated that 'The listener doesn't have to understand this poem intellectually, but to enjoy it as a sensual object . . .' In addition to poetry, he has written an autobiography, String too Short To Be Saved (1961), plays, and essays on such topics as poetry, Henry Moore, Marianne *Moore, and how to write. He has also edited poetry anthologies, including the influential The Faber Book of Modern Verse (1965) and Contemporary American Poetry (1962; second edition 1972). He has acted as an editor on numerous journals and magazines, including the Paris Review* (1953–62). More recent volumes of poetry are Brief Lives (1983), The One Day: A Poem in Three Parts (1988), and Old and New Poems (1990).

HALL, (Marguerite) Radclyffe (1880–1943), British novelist and poet, born in Bournemouth; she was privately educated and spent one year at King's College, London. She established herself as a minor poet of note with numerous collections of accomplished lyric verse, among which are 'Twixt Earth and Stars (1906) and Songs of Three Counties (1913). Two of her early novels, The Forge (1924) and A Saturday Life (1925), are mild satires on married life. Adam's Breed (1926), her most widely acclaimed novel, has in common with much of her other work its thematic concern with the conflict between carnal love and an altruism rooted in her orthodox Christianity. She is best known for The Well of Loneliness (1928), which candidly reflects her homosexuality in its narrative of a lesbian novelist. Despite public statements of its merits from many eminent literary figures, it was banned after a prosecution for obscenity and was not republished until 1949; Vera Brittain's Hall: A Case of Obscenity? (1968) deals with the trial. Her other publications include The Unit Lamp (1924), centring on a daughter's subjection to her mother, and the stories of Miss Ogilvy Finds Herself (1934). The Life and Death of Hall (1961) is a biography by her partner Una Troubridge.

HALL, Rodney (1935–), Australian novelist and poet, born in England; he went to Australia after the Second World War and was educated at the University of Queensland. He was poetry editor of The Australian (1967–78), and has travelled widely in Europe, Asia, and the USA. His numerous volumes of poetry include Penniless till Doomsday (1962), Forty Beads on a Hangman's Rope (1963), Eyewitness (1967), The Law of Karma (1968), Romulus and Remus (1971), A Soapbox Omnibus (1973), Black Bagatelles (1978), and The Most Beautiful World (1981). His poetry, which is ironic, witty, and displays considerable technical virtuosity, is perhaps less well known than his fiction. Novels include The Ship on the Coin (1972), a satirical allegory attacking the apathy and cruelty of bourgeois society; A Place among People (1975); Just Relations (1982), set in a small Australian town with a gold-mining past, inhabited by a cast of ageing eccentrics; and Kisses of the Enemy (1987), a fable about the troubled relationship between Australia and the USA. Hall has been acclaimed for the scope and inventiveness of his 'Yandilli Trilogy' (published in one volume as A Dream More Luminous Than Love, 1994). The first volume, Captivity Captive (1988), about the solving of an 1888 murder, is based on an incident in Queensland; The Second Bridegroom (1991) deals with the early days of Australia's career as a penal colony; while The Grisly Wife (1993) is a gripping tale of cultism and murder.

HALL, Willis (1929–), British dramatist, born and educated in Leeds; he made his name with The Long and the Short and the Tall (1958), a realistic play about a group of soldiers in the Malayan jungle during the Second World War. That was followed by other works for the theatre, film, and television. Several of these have been written in collaboration with Keith *Waterhouse, among them the screenplays of Whistle down the Wind (1961) and A Kind of Loving (1961); stage and screen versions of Waterhouse's novel Billy Liar (1960), the story of a Yorkshire Walter Mitty unable to escape a dull family, job, and environment except through fantasy; The Card (1973), a musical version of Arnold *Bennett's novel of the same name; Lost Empires (1985; with Keith Waterhouse and music by Denis King), a play based on J. B. *Priestley's study of repertory theatres; and adaptations of plays by Eduardo de Filippo, Saturday, Sunday, Monday (1973) and Filumena (1977).

HALPER, Albert (1904–84), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Chicago. Halper was one of the proletarian realists and naturalists who emerged in the USA in the early 1930s. Union Square (1933) is a sociological cross-section of American society which shows some indebtedness to works such as John Dos Passos's U.S.A.* Many of his works are autobiographical in nature, notably On the Shore (1934), The Foundry (1934), Sons of the Fathers (1940), and The Golden Watch (1953). This is Chicago (1952) is an anthology of Chicago stories, while Atlantic Avenue (1956) moves from Halper's usual Chicago setting to the violent world of the Brooklyn and New York waterfronts. As with many of his left-wing contemporaries Halper's writings found a large audience abroad, particularly in the Soviet Union, and were translated into a number of languages. See also PROLETARIAN LITERATURE IN THE USA.

HAMBURGER, Michael (Peter Leopold) (1924–), British poet and translator, born in Berlin of a Jewish family who emigrated to England in 1933; he was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. In addition to his work as a writer and translator he has held numerous visiting professorships in the USA. His verse translations of Hölderlin in Poems of 1943 brought the work of that poet to a wider English-speaking readership and established Hamburger as a translator of note. Among his many other translations are Poems (1966) by Hans Magnus Enzensberger, Selected Poems (1982) by Marin Sorescu, and Poems of Paul Celan (1988). His collections of poetry include The Dual Site (1958), Travelling (1969), Real Estate (1977), and Roots in the Air (1991); Collected Poems appeared in 1984. In the course of the 1960s the strict versification predominant in his earlier work gave way to the disciplined freedom of form in which most of his poetry is written. His underlying ethical and psychological concerns often relate to his complex sense of personal identity as a Jew of German birth and English upbringing. Among his critical works are the essays on German literature in A Proliferation of Prophets (1983) and After the Second Flood (1986).

HAMILTON, Hugo (1953–), Irish novelist, born in Dublin. His father was Irish and his mother German, and he worked as a journalist in Germany and Austria during the late 1970s before returning to Dublin. Hamilton is one of a growing number of contemporary Irish writers who are orientated towards more international themes and settings. Three of his short stories were included in Faber's First Fictions (1989). His first novel, Surrogate City (1990), set in Berlin before the fall of the Wall, was followed by The Last Shot (1991), whose action occurs towards the end of the Second World War in what was to become Czechoslovakia. The Love Test (1995) focuses on the marriage breakdown of an affluent young German couple after the re-unification of Germany, in which personal and political factors become inextricably interwoven in the husband's affair with a young East German woman who has been a victim of the security police.

HAMILTON, (Robert) Ian (1938–), British poet, critic, biographer, and editor, born in King's Lynn, Norfolk, educated at Keble College, Oxford. In 1962 he founded *The Review, one of the foremost periodicals of its day in the sphere of poetry and criticism. He became assistant editor of the Times Literary Supplement* in 1965 and was poetry critic for The Observer from 1965 to 1970. In his editorial and critical capacities he exercised considerable influence over developments in British verse in the 1960s and 1970s. A Poetry Chronicle (1973) and Walking Possession (1994) are collections of essays and reviews. The Visit (1970), his first principal collection, appeared to widespread critical acclaim; the thirty short poems of this volume are characterized by their vivid economies of imagery and intense emotional candour, and were republished in Fifty Poems (1988) with twenty previously uncollected poems, which display an increased thematic range. As a biographer, he is highly regarded for his Robert Lowell (1982) and In Search of J. D. Salinger (1988). His other works include Writers in Hollywood 1915–1951 (1990) and Keepers of the Flame: Literary Estates and the Rise and Fall of Biography (1992). He has also edited numerous works, including Alun Lewis: Selected Poetry and Prose (1966); The Modern Poet (1968), a collection of essays from The Review; The Faber Book of Soccer (1992); and The Oxford Companion to Twentieth-Century Poetry in English (1994).

HAMILTON, Patrick (Anthony Walter) (1904–62), English novelist and dramatist, born in Hassocks, Sussex, educated at Westminster School. He was described by *Priestley as 'above all the novelist of the homeless'; most of his novels focus on the seedier side of urban life and the dispossessed, and the shabby boarding-house setting of his novel Craven House (1926) was a characteristic background. A trilogy (The Midnight Bell, 1929; The Siege of Pleasure, 1932; and The Plains of Cement, 1934), later published as Twenty Thousand Streets under the Sky (1935), was set mainly in a pub, 'The Midnight Bell', near Euston station. Impromptu in Moribundia (1939), a fierce satire on British society, reveals Hamilton's Marxist sympathies. Hangover Square (1941), a psychological drama set in London in 1939, concerns the hopeless infatuation of an alcoholic for the beautiful but unfaithful actress whom he eventually murders. Hamilton's later novels, mainly thrillers, include The Slaves of Solitude (1947) and The West Pier (1951). Among his plays are the thrillers Rope (1929), which was made into a film directed by Alfred Hitchcock in 1938, and Gas Light (1938; US title Angel Street, 1939) which was filmed in 1944. A Life by Nigel Jones appeared in 1991.

HAMILTON-PATERSON, James (1941–), British novelist, born in Kent, educated at Exeter College, Oxford. He worked for several years as a teacher and journalist for the New Statesman and The Sunday Times. He received critical acclaim for Gerontius (1989; Whitbread Prize), a novel about the composer Edward Elgar. His subsequent novels include The Bell Boy (1990), set in south-east Asia, concerning the relationship between a middle-aged Englishwoman and a young Asian boy; Seven-Tenths (1992), about the Pacific Ocean; Griefwork (1993), set in an unnamed northern European city in the aftermath of the Second World War, and centring on the strange half-vegetable, half-human existence of Leon, the keeper of the Palm House in the city's botanical gardens; and Ghosts of Manila (1994), dealing with political corruption in the Philippines. Hamilton-Paterson is an elusive figure, who prefers to divide his time between the Far East and Italy; his novels are controlled and elegant exercises in style, structured around metaphorical conceits, which offer appealingly odd perspectives on the human condition.

HAMMETT, (Samuel) Dashiell (1894–1961), American crime writer, born in Maryland; he left school at 13, and from 1915 worked for Pinkerton's Detective Agency, first in Baltimore, then in San Francisco. He served in the US Army in the First World War, and again in the Second, when he was stationed in the Aleutian Islands. From 1923 he contributed short stories, originally under the name of Peter Collinson, to pulp magazines, especially Black Mask*, where his first four novels were serialized. Later he worked in Hollywood as a screenwriter; there in 1930 he met the playwright Lillian *Hellman, his friend and companion until his death. After the 1930s he wrote little, devoting himself to political activities: as trustee of the Civil Rights Congress he spent five months in prison in 1951 for contempt of court, and two years later his Communist affiliations were investigated by the McCarthy sub-committee. The detective in most of his short stories and in the novels Red Harvest (1929), The Dain Curse (1929), and $106,000 Blood Money (1943; also published as Blood Money and as The Big Knock-Over) is the unnamed middle-aged, fat Continental Op, who works for an agency based on Pinkerton's. His best works are The Maltese Falcon (1930), filmed by John Huston in 1941 with Humphrey Bogart as the detective Sam Spade; The Glass Key (1931), probably his masterpiece, a story of political corruption in an American city; and The Thin Man (1934), a sparkling, semi-humorous crime novel, whose main characters, Nick and Nora Charles, were played by William Powell and Myrna Loy in a series of comedy thrillers of the 1930s and 1940s. Hammett writes in a bare, stripped-down style which in The Glass Key attains a complexity and subtlety that has led Julian *Symons to claim that it 'can stand comparison with any American novel of its decade'. The Maltese Falcon is one of the first, and best, of American private eye novels, rivalled only by *Chandler and Ross *Macdonald. There are biographies by Richard Layman (1981), William F. Nolan (1983), and Diane Johnson (1983). See P. Woolfe, Beams Falling: The Art of Dashiell Hammett (1980).

HAMMICK, Georgina (1939–), British short-story writer, born in Hampshire, educated in Kenya and England; she later attended the Academie Julian, Paris, and the Salisbury School of Art. Her first collection of stories, People for Lunch (1987), was acclaimed for its wit, irony, and compassion. The stories in Spoilt (1992), her second collection, return to the affectionately depicted parochial and suburban landscapes of the earlier work, and are characterized by Hammick's customary elegance of style; here, however, her skill with satirical dialogue and her narrative dexterity often conceal tragic depths, as in the superb 'The Dying Room'. Widely anthologized herself, Hammick has also edited an anthology, The Virago Book of Love and Loss (1992), which includes a number of influences and affinities—Elizabeth *Bowen, Sylvia Townsend *Warner, Elizabeth *Taylor, Alice *Munro.

HAMPSON, John, pseudonym of John SIMPSON (1901–55), British novelist, born in Birmingham into a theatrical family; he grew up in poverty and was educated at home. From 1914 to 1918 he worked as a billiard marker and a chef, amongst other jobs, and his knowledge of hotel life provided material for his fiction. His first novel, Saturday Night at the Greyhound (1931), set mainly in a Derbyshire pub, concerns the devotion of an introverted young man for his married sister. Other novels include O Providence (1932), about a large Midlands family, based on his own, and the relationship between an older and a younger boy; Strip Jack Naked (1934), which assembles its characters around the deathbed of a rich Birmingham widow; and Care of the Grand (1939). Hampson became one of the 'Birmingham Group' of novelists, which also included Walter *Brierley and Walter *Allen; most of his works provide insights into provincial life in the Midlands in a poetic, but realistic, manner. His last novel, Bag of Stones (1952), describing the murderous resentment of a mentally retarded boy towards his father, is based on Hampson's experience as tutor to a mentally handicapped boy. Hampson was a friend of E. M. *Forster, W. H. *Auden, Graham *Greene, and Louis *MacNeice.

HAMPTON, Christopher (James) (1946–), British dramatist, born in the Azores; he lived as a child in Aden and Egypt, was educated at Oxford University, and was still an undergraduate when his first play, When Did You Last See My Mother? (1964), was performed at the Royal Court Theatre in London. His subsequent work has included Total Eclipse (1968), about the relationship between Rimbaud and Verlaine; The Philanthropist (1970), about a well-meaning, self-doubting lecturer, temperamentally opposite to Molière's 'misanthrope', who vestigially inhabits a university itself detached from a Britain in which the Cabinet is slaughtered and writers are being picked off by terrorists; Savages (1973), about European atrocities against native Indian tribes and, more specifically, a British diplomat held hostage by South American revolutionaries; Tales from Hollywood (1982), about Brecht, Thomas and Heinrich Mann, and other European exiles in wartime California, most of them working for a philistine film industry; and White Chameleon (1991), a semi-autobiographical piece about an English boy who grows up in the troubled Egypt of the 1950s, and finds himself alienated from his compatriots when he is sent to school back home; and Alice's Adventures Under Ground (1994), a portrait of the troubled Charles Dodgson and the fantasy life he revealed under the guise of Lewis Carroll. Hampton's plays have been highly praised for their technical competence and for their warmth, gentle humour, and quiet, unpretentious humanity. He also wrote the book for Andrew Lloyd Webber's musical, Sunset Boulevard (1993), and has made many translations and adaptations, notably versions of Horvath's Tales from the Vienna Woods (1977), George Steiner's The Portage to San Cristobal of A.H. (1982), Laclos's Les Liaisons Dangereuses (1985), and several plays by Ibsen.

Handful of Dust, A, a novel by Evelyn *Waugh, published in 1934. The novel, whose title is from *Eliot's The Waste Land and which is amongst Waugh's most savage portrayals of the idleness and decadence of the 'Bright Young Things', describes the deteriorating marriage of Lady Brenda Last, a beautiful but shallow young woman, and her husband Tony, who embodies the moral decency and respect for tradition the author clearly regarded as threatened by fashionable mores. Leaving Tony to pursue his duties as a local landowner, which includes the increasingly ruinous upkeep of Hetton Abbey, the Victorian Gothic mansion which is his chief preoccupation, Brenda begins an affair with a predatory younger man, John Beaver, who is attracted to her for her wealth and position. When her son, also called John, is killed in a hunting accident, Brenda at first imagines that it is her lover who is dead; her relief when it is revealed that this is not the case is one of the book's most chilling moments. The couple drift apart after the child's death and Brenda asks for a divorce in order to marry Beaver. Tony at first agrees to this, but when he realizes that the divorce settlement will mean selling his beloved Hetton he refuses to go through with it, and joins an expedition to the Amazon. Here he is saved from death and subsequently held captive by a madman, whom he is forced to entertain by reading aloud, each night, from the works of Dickens; after some time has elapsed, he is presumed dead and Brenda, abandoned by Beaver when it becomes clear that she will not inherit Tony's money, marries her former fiancé, Jock Grant-Menzies.

Handmaid's Tale, The, a novel by Margaret *Atwood, published in 1986. It is at once a feminist reworking of the traditional narrative mode of women's Gothic, and a cautionary tale in the manner of *Orwell, projecting its vision of a Christian fundamentalist dystopia on the America of the future. Offred, the narrator and heroine of the novel, is a woman whose ordinary life has been devastated by the radical overhaul of the political system. The present regime, relying on a reactionary reading of the Old Testament, has decreed that all women whose past morals fail to meet the standards required by the new fanaticism should become the concubines of leading officials with childless marriages. Atwood deftly interweaves images of woman-as-chattel (the concubines and surrogate mothers) and woman-as-collaborator (the powerful wives and teachers in charge of upholding prevalent patriarchal ideological institutions) in an ambitious philosophical meditation on the ruler and the ruled. Offred's narrative is interspersed with harrowing flashbacks of attempted escape and eventual capture, and images of incarceration and death by violence. Atwood succeeds in conveying a threatening premonition of a world at war with itself, destroyed by human—predominantly male—greed. This vision is all the more compelling for its reflection of contemporary political trends. The narrative nevertheless builds up to a conclusion that offers hope for the heroine and the future. HANKIN, St John (1869–1909), British dramatist, born in Southampton, the son of a schoolmaster, educated at Oxford University. He became a journalist and dramatic critic with the aim eventually of writing for the stage, an ambition first fulfilled when his The Two Mr Wetherbys was performed in London in 1903. There followed The Return of the Prodigal (1905), The Cassilis Engagement (1907), and The Last of the de Mullins (1908), three plays highly critical of the upper classes and influenced by the earlier, more realistic work of *Shaw. By the time Hankin committed suicide in a fit of depression, he had established himself with *Granville-Barker and *Galsworthy as one of the more interesting of the Edwardian era's socially concerned dramatists.

HANLEY, James (1901–85), British novelist, short-story writer, and playwright, born in Dublin; he grew up in working-class Liverpool, which he vividly depicted in his most popular novel sequence, The Furys (1935). His formative years at sea in the merchant navy inspired his best work, bringing him early recognition for Drift (1930), Hollow Sea (1938), The Ocean (1942), and Sailor's Song (1944). His second book, Boy (1931), was successfully prosecuted in 1935 because of its frank account of a young sailor's sexual degradation; it remained out of print until 1990 when a new edition was published with an introduction by Anthony *Burgess. Praised by such diverse admirers as *Faulkner and E. M. *Forster, Hanley was very much a writer's writer and never achieved the recognition he deserved during his lifetime. Wartime London gave a powerful impetus to his imagination; the experimental No Directions (1943) is a complex portrait of an artist living through the Blitz, resolutely continuing to paint. Levine (1956), the story of a Polish sailor drawn towards murder, set in London in the 1940s, is perhaps his finest achievement. Hanley also wrote many plays for radio and television.

HANNAH, Barry (1942–), American novelist and short-story writer, born and brought up in Clinton, Mississippi, educated at the University of Alabama. Hannah presents a world as dislocated and violent as William *Faulkner's, but without Faulkner's sustaining metaphysical beliefs. Lacking a sense of continuity, his characters live in an abrupt, staccato world over which they have little or no control. Hannah displays no reverence for the past, though his characters are often haunted by vivid fantasies of Civil War heroes whose exploits are completely at variance with their own horrified experiences of combat. Airships (1978), his most famous book, possesses a formidable range: alongside many grotesque vignettes of contemporary life, there are stories about the Civil War and about the future, all conveying the same blind atavistic impulses and desperate acts of honour which govern the behaviour of all his characters. This is the South as a kind of terminal fiction, doomed to repeat a series of disconnected routines entirely drained of meaning. Hannah's other books include Geronimo Rex (1972), Nightwatchmen (1973), Ray (1980), Power and Light (1983), Hey Jack! (1987), and Never Die (1991). He remains one of the most vibrant and compelling figures in contemporary fiction.

HANRAHAN, Barbara (1939–91), Australian writer and artist, born in Adelaide. She studied art in London and became an internationally known painter and print-maker. As a writer, she achieved recognition with her first book, The Scent of Eucalyptus (1973), an autobiographical work drawing on her memories of Adelaide from childhood to adolescence; it was followed by the sequel Kewpie Doll (1984). Her many novels include Sea Green (1974), The Albatross Muff (1977), Where the Queens All Strayed (1978), The Peach Groves (1979), The Frangipani Gardens (1980), Dove (1982), and Annie Magdalene (1986). Many of her novels, especially those dealing with different eras in the history of Adelaide, express her preoccupation with the contrast between prim respectability and sordid reality; she has described her native city as a 'terribly sinister place'. Among her later works are the novels A Chelsea Girl (1988), Flawless Jade (1989), Good Night, Mr Moon (1992), and Michael and Me and the Sun (1992), which is autobiographical. Her early short stories are collected in Dream People (1987); the stories in Iris in Her Garden (1992) also have an autobiographical basis.

HANSBERRY, Lorraine (1930–65), American playwright, born in Chicago, educated at the University of Wisconsin. She is best known for A Raisin in the Sun (1959), a play about an African-American family preparing to move from a Chicago ghetto to the suburbs. It focuses on the head of the family, Lena Younger, a widow determined to fulfil her dead husband's optimistic ambitions, which she shared, for the family against all the odds. It was made into a film in 1961, and a musical entitled Raisin in 1973. The Sign in Sidney Brustein's Window (1964) probes further into city life, with its large cast of Jewish-Americans, African-Americans, and others living in New York's Greenwich Village. To Be Young, Gifted and Black (1969) is a posthumous selection by her former husband, Robert Nemiroff, from her letters, diaries, and other unpublished material.

HANSEN, Joseph (1923–), American crime writer, born in Aberdeen, South Dakota, educated there and in Minneapolis. Like Barbara *Wilson, he belongs to that group of contemporary writers eager to exploit the form of the crime novel to investigate social issues, notably gender and sexuality. Southern California is the setting for these mysteries, and alongside Armistead *Maupin, Hansen is a witty chronicler of the fads and eccentricities of that life. His central figure is the private eye Dave Brandstetter, unapologetically homosexual, and from the first novel, Fadeout (1970) and onwards, the interaction between the investigator's private life and the mysteries he becomes embroiled in is compellingly handled; other novels in the Brandstetter series are Death Claims (1973) and Early Graves (1987). In narratives like Gravedigger (1982) and Nightwork (1984) his social commentary at times distracts from the momentum of the plot, but when engaged with the most challenging issues, he is a distinctive writer in the *Chandler tradition. Hansen also writes fiction outside the private eye genre, under his own name and as James Colton and Rose Brock.

HANSEN, Ron (1947–), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Omaha, Nebraska, educated at Creighton University, the University of Iowa, and Stanford University. Among other academic posts he was appointed Associate Professor at the University of California, Santa Cruz. Though he is not a prolific writer, Hansen's work depends upon a sustained immersion in the minute particularities of time and place; his books convey that history is not only strange but is also opaque, resistant to our attempts to understand it through generalization. Desperadoes (1979) enacts this theme by presenting the story of the Dalton gang as told in 1937 by Emmett Dalton who is both a real-estate broker and a scriptwriter for Western movies; his account is based on the immediacy of recollection and the distorting waves of his contemporary preoccupations. The Assassination of Jesse James by the Coward Robert Ford (1983) dispenses with the first-person voice and introduces the literally fantastic nature of the James family's life and belief structure; the book's rich and extravagant metaphors, which act to slow the pace, evoke a world coterminous with their life. His novel Marietta in Ecstasy (1991) deals with the enigmatic nature of spiritual revelation as experienced by a young postulant in 1906. Nebraska (1992) is his highly acclaimed collection of short stories.

HAN SUYIN (1917–), Chinese writer (naturalized British), born in Sinyang (Henan), China. Han has chronicled her experiences as a Eurasian in China, a medical practitioner in Asia, and a leading expert on contemporary Chinese politics, in a series of autobiographical works which conflate objective reportage and personal memoir. Her best-known works are probably The Crippled Tree (1965), A Mortal Flower (1967), and Birdless Summer (1968). In her novels, beginning with the popular classic A Many-Splendoured Thing (1952), Han has explored the space between documentary realism and subjective lyricism, articulating the concerns of a post-colonial Asian generation and depicting a cultural identity in a state of flux. Novels such as And the Rain My Drink (1956) and The Four Faces (1963), though firmly rooted in the political realities of their time, are highly imaginative experiments employing split perspectives, polyphonic narrative, word-games, and philosophical debates. The innovative The Mountain Is Young (1958) figures a woman in the act of writing her own sexuality; in its preoccupation with text and gender, it is a precursor of the feminist novels of the 1960s. Her collection of essays Tigers and Butterflies (1990) generated heated public debate for its reinterpretation of recent events in China.

Happy Days, a play by Samuel *Beckett, first performed in 1961; it involves Winnie, who spends the action with her shopping bag and parasol on a low mound in the hot and glaring sun, embedded in the first act up to her waist, and in the second to her neck. She is awoken by a piercing bell from off-stage, fiddles with a toothbrush, a handkerchief, her spectacles, and other domestic items, and even when she can no longer use her hands keeps up a brisk chatter, sometimes talking to herself, sometimes to her unresponsive husband, Willie, who has a 'tail', who 'crawls' and lives in a nearby 'hole', on 'straw'. Though she habitually affects a cheerful manner, and repeats the words 'great mercies, great mercies', her mood occasionally veers towards the angry, disgusted, or contemptuous: as well it might, given the wasted life and sorry marriage she inadvertently evokes. A revolver, which Winnie extracts from her bag and places 'conspicuously' beside her, indicates the only possibility of escape; and it may be towards this that Willie is reaching when, at the play's end, he appears in top hat and morning coat, only to slither to the bottom of the mound murmuring 'Win'. At this, Winnie herself declares 'oh this is a happy day' and launches smilingly into a song, 'it's true, it's true, you love me so'. The play would seem to be Beckett's sardonic but not unsympathetic comment on those who try to make the best of essentially frustrating lives.

HARBINSON, Robert, the pseudonym usually employed by Robert Harbinson BRYANS (1928–), Irish short-story writer and autobiographer, born in Belfast. He worked for a time on a dredger in Belfast Lough before deciding to become a medical missionary. He studied theology at the South Wales Bible College and subsequently taught in Canada and Venezuela. After giving up theology he took up diamond prospecting in Canada and South America. During the 1960s he wrote many travel books under his second pseudonym, Robin Bryans. Harbinson produced four volumes of autobiography, No Surrender: An Ulster Childhood (1960), Song of Erne (1960), Up Spake the Cabin Boy (1961), and The Protégé (1963), which recount his early life in working-class Belfast and portray Ulster as immutable and claustrophobic, permanently over-shadowed by the events of its distant past. Harbinson has also written two collections of short stories, Tattoo Lily and Other Ulster Stories (1961) and The Far World and Other Stories (1962), fictions based upon episodes from his life. In more recent years, he has worked as an opera librettist in London.

Hardboiled Fiction, a self-consciously tough and uncompromising school of crime writing originally associated with the American pulp magazine Black Mask* (1920–36) and the novels of Dashiell *Hammett, James M. *Cain, and Raymond *Chandler. Unlike 'classic' British detective fiction, hardboiled writing avoids the reassuring pattern of puzzle and solution, and the cosy country house setting. In a vividly realized urban environment, it offers a dark view of crime as endemic rather than deviant, usually through the world-weary character of the narrator. At its most stylized, as described in Chandler's essay 'The Simple Art of Murder', the private eye narrator represents a slightly compromised standard of chivalry and heroism in a squalid and sordid universe. As well as developing a potent and influential style of delivery, the hardboiled novel, especially in the hands of Hammett, often became the vehicle of social criticism, offering a portrait of a world in which the forces of law and order were unreliable and often corrupt. Much of the energy of hardboiled fiction is expressed in the 'pulp' novels of Horace McCoy, Cornell *Woolrich, Charles *Willeford, and Jim *Thompson. Hardboiled fiction is also the basis of the genre of film known as film noir. More recently, hardboiled fiction has been appropriated in different ways by writers such as Elmore *Leonard and George V. *Higgins, and by such feminist writers as Barbara *Wilson and Sara *Paretsky as a way of reinvigorating the female presence in crime fiction. See DETECTIVE FICTION.

HARDWICK, Elizabeth (Bruce) (1916–), American novelist and critic, born in Lexington, Kentucky, educated at the University of Kentucky, Lexington, and at Columbia University. She contributed reviews and stories from the early 1940s onwards to Partisan Review*, Harpers, and the New Yorker*. Her first novel, The Ghostly Lover (1945), was followed by The Simple Truth (1955), concerning the murder trial of a college student. Sleepless Nights (1979) has a much less conventional narrative structure, a minor masterpiece of fictionalized autobiography whose narrator ('Elizabeth') moves in memory between Kentucky, New York, and Europe. Reflections range around time, death, disease, ageing, and 'the torment of personal relations'; characters encountered include Hardwick's one-time husband Robert *Lowell and Billie Holiday. She has commanded widespread respect as a critic over several decades, being a founder of the New York Review of Books in February 1963, and influential in her appreciation of Mary *McCarthy and Susan *Sontag. Hardwick's stimulating essays are collected in A View of My Own (1962), dealing with literary and societal topics; Seduction and Betrayal (1974), which discusses women writers from the Brontës to Zelda Fitzgerald; and Bartleby in Manhattan and Other Essays (1983).

HARDY, Thomas (1840–1928), British novelist and poet, born at Higher Bockhampton, near Dorchester, Dorset, educated at the school in Dorchester run by the British and Foreign School Society. From 1856 to 1861 he was articled to a Dorchester ecclesiastical architect whose office was next door to the school run by William Barnes (1801–86), the Dorset dialect poet; with Barnes as his mentor, Hardy began writing verse at the age of 17. He worked for an architectural practice in London from 1862 to 1867, when he returned to his former position in Dorchester. Although he had formerly considered taking Holy Orders, at this time he became an agnostic. He completed The Poor Man and the Lady, his first novel, in 1868; the publishers Chapman and Hall showed interest, but their reader, George Meredith (1828–1909), advised against publication; the manuscript was eventually lost. Desperate Remedies (1871), his first novel to be published, was followed by Under the Greenwood Tree (1872) and A Pair of Blue Eyes (1873). Far from the Madding Crowd (1874), a work of great dramatic power and imaginative scope which deals with the destructive effects of sexual obsession, made clear his stature as a novelist. Its success enabled him to give up architecture for writing and to marry Emma Gifford, whom he had met on an architectural assignment at St Juliot, Cornwall, in 1874. Considerable strains eventually developed in the marriage; Emma's psychological instability, to which veiled allusions are thought to be made in the poem 'The Interloper', was among the causes. They took up residence in Max Gate, an imposing house near Dorchester built to Hardy's own design, in 1887. During its construction he worked on The Mayor of Casterbridge (1886), which marked an advance in his artistry in the authenticity of its social and economic dimensions and the deeply compelling characterization of its tragic hero Michael Henchard. The compassionate presentation of Tess as a victim of conventional Victorian morality in Tess of the D'Urbervilles (1891), often regarded as his finest novel, gave rise to the controversy with which the book was received; for some reviewers it established Hardy as the greatest novelist of the day, while others denigrated it as unhealthily pessimistic and immoral. Such hostility intensified with the publication of his uncompromising treatment of 'the modern vice of unrest' in Jude the Obscure (1895), in which the hero's unfulfilled desire for educational advancement is seen in the context of the decaying traditions of rural society. He later described the reception of Jude the Obscure as an 'experience completely curing me of further interest in novel-writing'; there are, however, grounds for concluding that he felt he had completed his work as a novelist and wished to devote himself to poetry, which he had continued to write throughout his career.

He defended the bleak vision of suffering and injustice in much of his writing with a line from the second poem of the 'In Tenebris' sequence, 'If way to the Better there be, it exacts a full look at the Worst', and based hope for gradual change on his belief in 'evolutionary meliorism'. Central to many of the novels, to the epic drama in verse and prose *The Dynasts (three volumes, 1904, 1906, 1908), and to much of his verse is the theme of man's subjection to the implacable and insentient 'Immanent Will that stirs and urges everything', as it is termed in the poem 'The Convergence of the Twain'. His first two collections of verse, Wessex Poems (1898) and Poems of the Past and Present (1902), contained a high proportion of early work, and each of his subsequent volumes included poems composed long before publication. After completion of The Dynasts, Time's Laughingstocks appeared in 1909.

In 1912 Emma died suddenly; Hardy revisited St Juliot and made a journey to her birthplace in Plymouth, brooding on their past in the landscapes of their courtship. 'Poems of 1912–13' resulted, the most concentratedly personal body of his poetry, which contains a number of his most memorable works, among them 'After a Journey', 'The Going', and 'The Voice'. In all, Hardy, for whom memory was an essential imaginative resource, produced over 100 poems concerning Emma and himself in the decades after her death. 'Poems of 1912–13' appeared in Satires of Circumstance in 1914, the year of Hardy's marriage to Florence Emily Dugdale, whose two-volume biography of Hardy (1928, 1930) was substantially of his own authorship. His subsequent collections were Moments of Vision (1917), Late Lyrics and Earlier (1922), and Human Shows (1925). Winter Words was published posthumously in 1928; The Queen of Cornwall, his only other verse-drama, appeared in 1923. The Complete Poetical Works of Thomas Hardy (three volumes, 1982, 1984, 1985) was edited by Samuel Hynes. The great individuality of his poetry is rooted in his native familiarity with the regional traditions of Dorset, which matured into a literary consciousness through his contact with William Barnes. Although Hardy did not continue to write dialect verse after his early experiments, the diction of his work remained fundamentally that of common spoken English. He thus anticipated *Modernism in breaking with the conventions of literary usage which increasingly constrained Victorian poetry. He was similarly independent in his attitudes to prosody, eschewing metres of mellifluous regularity in pursuit of his stated preference for 'poetic texture rather than poetic veneer'. His poetry's fidelity to ordinary patterns of speech is matched by the realism and accessibility with which he treats a remarkable range of subjects; he may be approached as a nature poet, a topographical poet (see TOPOGRAPHICAL POETRY), a poet of London, of rural custom, of love, and of grief. His achievement as a poet was not fully recognized until after his death.

Hardy may be said to occupy the unique position of being among the foremost novelists of the nineteenth century while occupying a position of the first importance as a poet of the twentieth century. In addition to his novels, poems, and dramas, he wrote many short stories which were collected in Wessex Tales (1888), A Group of Noble Dames (1891), Life's Little Ironies (1894), and A Changed Man (1913); although his short stories exhibit considerable stylistic and thematic variety, they have never been as highly regarded as his other works. He was awarded the Order of Merit in 1910.

Hardy devised the following classification for his novels and stories:

Novels of Character and Environment: Under the Greenwood Tree; Far from the Madding Crowd; The Return of the Native (1878); The Mayor of Casterbridge; The Woodlanders (1887); Wessex Tales; Tess of the D'Urbervilles; Life's Little Ironies; Jude the Obscure.

Romances and Fantasies: A Pair of Blue Eyes; The Trumpet Major (1880); Two on a Tower (1882); A Group of Noble Dames; The Well-Beloved (published serially 1892; revised edition 1897).

Novels of Ingenuity: Desperate Remedies; The Hand of Ethelberta (1876); A Laodicean (1881).

The Collected Letters of Thomas Hardy, edited by R. L. Purdy and M. Millgate, appeared in seven volumes between 1978 and 1988. Robert *Gittings's Young Thomas Hardy (1975) and The Older Hardy (1980) remain highly regarded among numerous biographical studies, including Millgate's Thomas Hardy: A Biography (1982) and Martin Seymour-Smith's Hardy (1994).

HARE, Cyril, pseudonym of Alfred Alexander Gordon CLARK (1900–58), British judge and *detective fiction writer, born in Mickleham, Surrey, educated at New College, Oxford; he was called to the Bar in 1924, where his practice was mainly in the criminal courts, joined the staff of the Director of Public Prosecutions in 1942, and in 1950 became a county court judge. A contributor to Punch, he wrote his first detective story, Tenant for Death, in 1937, and followed it with eight others and a number of short stories. His detectives, who usually appear together, are the policeman Inspector Mallett and the unsuccessful barrister Francis Petigrew. Well-written, civilized, and witty, Hare's books must be ranked high among classical detective stories. His masterpiece, and the author's favourite book, is Tragedy at Law (1942), one of the best of all detective stories with a legal background.

HARE, David (1947–), British playwright, born in Bexhill, Sussex, educated at Cambridge University. He began writing plays for Portable Theatre, a touring company he co-founded in 1968. His subsequent work has primarily concentrated on aspects of British politics and society since the Second World War, a period he regards as characterized by opportunism, avarice, corruption, and the betrayal of the hopes of those who defeated Hitler. Perhaps the most outstanding of these is Plenty (1978), about Susan Trahern who returns from working as a secret agent in occupied France believing in a glowing future; it presents a striking portrait of a woman destroyed by nostalgia, an uncompromising spirit, and other flaws and virtues. Other principal plays in this vein are Knuckle (1974), a parody of the Mickey Spillane thriller, with financiers and entrepreneurs as villains; Teeth 'n' Smiles (1975), about a rebellious rock singer and her disintegrating band at a Cambridge ball; Map of the World (1982), in which representatives of left and right come into conflict at an international conference; The Secret Rapture (1988), a more intimate piece, about an illustrator exploited by her associates, among them her Tory MP sister; Racing Demon (1990), a picture of a divided and confused Church of England; Murmuring Judges (1991), which looks at the workings of the law and order system in Britain, finding it anachronistic and inept where it is not actually corrupt; and Absence of War (1993), which involves the machinations within the Labour Party during a losing General Election campaign and contains a rich portrait of an Opposition leader in some respects indebted to the defeated Neil Kinnock. Under the title 'The Hare Trilogy', the last three of these plays have been presented in tandem by the National Theatre, the same theatre that presented the more intimate Skylight (1995), about a businessman's attempt to regenerate a love affair with a much younger schoolteacher. Hare has also written two plays in collaboration with Howard *Brenton: Brassneck (1973), about municipal corruption, and Pravda (1986), about the British press and the acquisition of newspapers by a right-wing entrepreneur. Like much of his and Brenton's solo work, these are stylistically innovative, combining epic sweep with cinematic jumps between often odd and unexpected locations. In addition to this, Hare has written some highly successful screenplays: on television, Licking Hitler (1978) and Dreams of Leaving (1980), the second of which he directed himself, as he did Saigon: Year of the Cat (1982), Wetherby (1985), and Strapless (1989) for the cinema.

HARE, R(ichard) M(ervyn) (1919–), British moral philosopher, born at Backwell near Bristol, educated at Balliol College, Oxford. He became an officer in the Royal Artillery in 1940 and was held prisoner-of-war by the Japanese from 1942 to 1945. In 1950 he began his academic career as a fellow and tutor of Balliol College; he was White's Professor of Moral Philosophy at Oxford between 1966 and 1983, when he was appointed Graduate Research Professor of Philosophy at the University of Florida. He is widely regarded as one of the most important British philosophers of the post-war decades. The Language of Morals (1952), Freedom and Reason (1963), and Moral Thinking (1981) contain the main expositions of his moral philosophy, which began as an extension of G. E. *Moore's critique of ethical naturalism and centres on the doctrine of 'universal prescriptivism'. Hare argues that moral evaluations are of an essentially imperative nature but are only valid as such if they are applicable in every case; he uses the expressions 'universalizability', and 'prescriptivity' to establish the basic conditions of moral judgement. Hare is a leading contemporary utilitarian in his belief that moral philosophy can be socially influential if it succeeds in its chief task of elucidating the meaning and implications of ethical terminologies. His deep concern with clarity of definition leads him to deprecate the citing of illustrative instances from literature in philosophical writing, a practice he views as tending towards obscurity. Among his other publications are Essays on the Moral Concepts (1971), Applications of Moral Philosophy (1972), Essays in Ethical Theory (1989), and Essays on Political Morality (1989).

HARIHARAN, Githa (1954–), Indian novelist, born in Coimbatore, educated at the Universities of Bombay and Fairfield, Connecticut. She came to writing after a career in editing, publishing, and reviewing. Her first novel, The Thousand Faces of Night (1992), won the Commonwealth Writers prize for the best first novel. Distinguished by its lyrical prose style, the novel charts the precarious course of three women's journeys through the routes of Indian social norms. The Art of Dying (1993), was described by *Coetzee as a collection of 'beautifully written stories about death and its place in life'. Hariharan changed direction in The Ghosts of Vasu Master (1994), an experimental work in which the story of a retired teacher's attempt to cure a strange child of his silence is used as a frame to tell inset stories which explore themes of teaching, healing, and the deceptive nature of reality.

HARJO, Joy (Foster) (1951–), Native American poet and script-writer of the Creek tribe, born in Oklahoma, educated at the University of New Mexico and the *Iowa Writers' Workshop. Harjo has been a consultant for Native American groups and a member of the Board of Directors of the National Association of Third World Writers, and has taught at the University of Arizona. Her interest in Native American women and their experience of change informs her poetry: The Last Song (1975), What Moon Drive Me to This? (1980), and She Had Some Horses (1983), which celebrates the survival of modern Indians but laments the difficulties and dangers of the urban Indian lifestyle. In Mad Love and War (1990) she moves away from the song structure to a freer prose form in which to explore racial injustice. Survival and regeneration are the twin concerns of Harjo's work. In 'Anchorage', dedicated to Audre *Lorde, she asks 'who would believe%thin;|%thin;the fantastic and terrible story of all our survival,%thin;|%thin;those who were never meant%thin;|%thin;to survive?' She has been involved with a number of films released by the Native American Broadcasting Consortium, most notably The Origin of Apache Crown Dance (1985), for which she wrote the script. Harlem Renaissance, the term normally used to describe the upsurge of black American writing in the 1920s and 1930s. Though sometimes seen as a movement, it is better regarded as the more or less contemporary emergence of a number of writers who together make up the first modern generation of black American writers, a generation whose work, while often protesting about dispossession, poverty, and racial prejudice, is most significant for its articulation of a positive sense of black identity and its attempts to promote black consciousness. Harlem, viewed as a cultural matrix for blacks, provided a central focus for the activities of several of the writers who contributed to the Renaissance, or Awakening as it is sometimes also called, but others lived all or most of their lives elsewhere. Although there had been numerous earlier works that gave voice to the predicament of Americans of African descent, among them Frederick Douglass's Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass (1845), which is the best-known 'literary' example of the genre of slave narrative, Charles W. Chesnutt's The Conjure Man (1899), and James Weldon Johnson's Autobiography of an Ex-Coloured Man (1912), a work which is sometimes seen as a forerunner of the Awakening, the Renaissance is generally viewed as a major step forward. Figures instrumental in its formation included the sociologist W. E. B. *Du Bois, best known for his The Souls of Black Folks (1903), who rejected the integrationist approach of his famous contemporary Booker T. Washington, and the Jamaican-born Marcus Garvey, whose United Negro Improvement Association promoted an awareness of African origins and the possibility of an actual repatriation to Africa in Harlem in the 1920s. Other historical factors which contributed to the growth of a sense of distinctive racial identity and the emergence of an autonomous black literature in the 1920s included the racism from which many black Americans suffered when they served alongside their white compatriots in the First World War, the northward migration of blacks from the rural South, and the difficulties such newcomers experienced in adjusting to urban situations. The emergence of Du Bois's magazine The Crisis provided a forum in which black Americans could express their ideas without having to accommodate them to a white readership. When mainstream publishing outlets began to publish black writers shortly afterwards, a readership that was sympathetic to black causes was securely established. Jessie Redmon *Fauset, also an editor of The Crisis, Zora Neale *Hurston, and Dorothy *West were notable women figures of the Renaissance. The movement can be seen as having been ushered in by poems such as Claude *McKay's 'If We Must Die' (1919), Countee *Cullen's 'I Have a Rendezvous with Life', and Langston *Hughes's 'The Negro Speaks of Rivers' (both 1921). Among its most important works are McKay's Harlem Shadows (1922), Banjo (1929), and Banana Bottom (1933); Jean *Toomer's Cane (1923); Langston Hughes's The Weary Blues (1926) and The Ways of White Folks (1934); Countee Cullen's Color (1925), Copper Sun (1927), and The Black Christ (1929); Rudolf Fisher's The Conjure Man Dies (1932); and Arna *Bontemps's Black Thunder (1935). Varied though these writings are, they illustrate the complexity and richness of black experience and in so doing demonstrate an emancipation from the cultural stereotyping from which blacks had continued to suffer in the Reconstruction period after the Civil War and subsequently. Harmonium, Wallace *Stevens's first collection of poetry, initially published in 1923; it contains seventy-four poems, including several lengthy sequences, written from approximately 1912 onward. A revised edition with fourteen further poems appeared in 1931. Its invigorating range extends from lengthy philosophical investigations like 'The Comedian as the Letter C' to the buoyant simplicity of 'Ploughing on Sunday' and numerous other poems related to the American folk tradition. Stevens's talent for presenting imagery of singular clarity, colour, and sharpness, an indication of his participation in *Imagism, is on display throughout the collection. Among its most vividly exotic poems are a number reflecting the landscapes and vegetation of Florida, which he recurrently visited. Harmonium is permeated by the preoccupation with the imagination as the only means of interpreting reality in a secular age that runs throughout Stevens's subsequent work (see THE MAN WITH THE BLUE GUITAR and NOTES TOWARD A SUPREME FICTION). 'The Emperor of Ice Cream', 'Sunday Morning', 'Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird', 'The Snow Man', 'Peter Quince at the Clavier', and 'Tea at the Palaz of Hoon' are among the well-known poems in the collection, which contains a remarkably high proportion of Stevens's most celebrated work.

HARPER, Michael S(teven) (1938–), African-American poet and critic, born in Brooklyn, educated at UCLA and the *Iowa Writers' Workshop at the University of Iowa. Among several important academic posts Harper was appointed Kapstein Professor at Brown University. His main interests are music, particularly jazz and blues, and history within both a national and a mythical framework; these themes he established in his first two volumes of poetry, Dear John, Dear Coltrane (1970) and History Is Your Own Heartbeat (1971). Other volumes include Photographs: Negatives: History as Apple Tree (1972), Song: I Want a Witness (1972), Debridement (1973), Nightmare Begins Responsibility (1974), Images of Kin: New and Selected Poems (1977), Rhode Island: Eight Poems (1981), and Healing Song for the Inner Ear (1985), and the recording Hear Where Coltrane Is (1971). The power of music to express the pain of racial history and to heal the psychological and spiritual wounds inflicted upon African-Americans provides Harper with a model for his art. His poetry seeks to witness and to remember the African-American experience in all its individual detail. Among the works he has edited are the anthology Heartblow: Black Veils (1975), The Collected Poems of Sterling A. Brown (1980), Chant of Saints: A Gathering of Afro-American Literature, Art and Scholarship (1979) with Robert Stepto, and Every Eye Ain't Asleep: An Anthology of Poetry by Afro-Americans Since 1945 (1994) with Anthony Walton.

HARRIS, Frank (James Thomas) (1856–1931), British writer and critic, born in Galway. After early travels in America and Europe, he rose to fame as a dynamic editor of the Evening News (1882–6) and the Fortnightly Review (1886–94), but exerted most influence as editor of the Saturday Review (1894–8), publishing works by *Hardy, *Wells, *Beerbohm, and Arthur *Symons, with *Shaw as drama critic from 1895. As well as novels, volumes of short stories, and plays he wrote biographies of his friend Oscar Wilde (1916) and of Shaw (1931), completed by Shaw himself to benefit Harris's estate, and The Man Shakespeare and His Tragic Life Story (1909). Harris's reputation became tarnished by his continual assaults on Victorian values, and by his unashamed arrogance. Various rumours and his vainglorious and sexually explicit memoirs, My Life and Loves (four volumes, 1922–7) caused further scandal. There are biographies by Hugh Kingsmill (1932) and by Philippa Pullar (1975).

HARRIS, Macdonald, pseudonym of Donald W. HEINEY (1921–93), American writer and academic, born in California, educated at the University of Southern California; he taught for many years at the University of California, Irvine, and published literary criticism under his own name. After several early novels, such as Private Demons (1961), depicting modern American life, his range widened with Bull Fire (1973), a retelling of the story of the Minotaur and his birth in terms of psychosexual farce, with elements of *science fiction. The Balloonists (1976) described a late nineteenth-century balloon excursion to the North Pole; Yukiko (1977) recalls Japan in August 1945; Pandora's Gallery (1979) was set in the Venice of 1797 while Herma (1981) was set in the Belle Epoque; and Screenplay (1982) was a time-travel fantasy about Hollywood. His later works include The Little People (1986), a tale of American self-delusion in Europe; Glowstone (1988), a magic realist fable about Madame Curie; and Hemingway's Suitcase (1990), a clever reconstruction of the author's early years. Stories were collected in The Cathay Stories and Other Fictions (1988).

HARRIS, Wilson (Theodore) (1921–), Guyanese novelist, poet, and critic, born in New Amsterdam, educated at Queen's College, Georgetown, British Guiana. He was a land surveyor before leaving Guyana for England in 1959 to become a full-time writer. His exploration of the almost impenetrable forests, rivers, and vast savannahs of the Guyanese hinterland features prominently in many of his novels. Harris's novels are densely complex, alluding to diverse mythologies from different cultures, and eschew conventional narration in favour of shifting interwoven voices. His writing stems from a belief that in the West Indies the clash of widely different cultures has, at least potentially, made it possible for an almost universal consciousness to evolve. The Guyana Quartet (1985), made up of Palace of the Peacock (1960), his best-known novel, The Far Journey of Oudin (1961), The Whole Armour (1962), and The Secret Ladder (1963), a symbolic autobiographical work, together with Heartland (1964), chart Harris's first phase of novelistic exploration. His next four novels, also set in Guyana, explore the psyche and the workings of memory: The Eye of the Scarecrow (1965), The Waiting Room (1967), Tumatumari (1968), and Ascent to Omai (1970). Other novels in similar vein, but set in such diverse places as London, Edinburgh, and Mexico, include Black Marsden (1972), Companions of the Day and Night (1975), Da Silva da Silva's Cultivated Wilderness (1977), Genesis of the Clowns (1977), The Tree of the Sun (1978), and The Angel at the Gate (1982). Carnival (1985) is a Dantesque allegory, in which Heaven, Hell, and Purgatory are treated as states of mind about modern civilization. It is the first volume of 'The Carnival Trilogy'; the second is The Infinite Rehearsal (1987), based on Goethe's Faust. The Four Banks of the River of Space (1990) fragments the epic figure of Ulysses into several personalities who conduct self-analyses to redefine the nature and function of myth. Resurrection at Sorrow Hill (1993), a novel, recounts a river voyage into the depths of the rainforest. Harris's poems are collected in Fetish (1951) and Eternity to Season (1978). Critical writings include Tradition, the Writer and Society (1967), Explorations (1981), and The Womb of Space (1983). The Radical Imagination (1992) is a collection of essays. See Hena Maes-Jelinek, Wilson Harris (1982).

HARRISON, G(eorge) B(agshawe) (1894–91), British scholar and critic, born in Hove, Sussex, educated at Queens' College, Cambridge. In 1924 he began lecturing at King's College, University of London, subsequently holding professorships at Queen's University, Ontario, and the University of Michigan. Among his many works on Shakespeare and his period were Shakespeare's Fellows (1923), Elizabethan Plays and Players (1940), and Shakespeare's Critics: From Jonson to Auden (1964); England in Shakespeare's Day (1928) and Shakespeare at Work (1933) are highly regarded as introductions to the social and cultural contexts of Shakespeare's work. He also produced numerous editions of Elizabethan and Jacobean documents, notably Thomas Nashe's Pierce Pennilesse, His Supplication to the Divell, 1592 (1924), An Elizabethan Journal (three volumes, 1928, 1931, 1933), A Jacobean Journal (two volumes, 1941, 1950), and The Letters of Queen Elizabeth I (1935). Harrison was general editor of the Penguin Shakespeare between 1937 and 1959. His other publications included The Day before Yesterday (1938), a journal for the year 1936; Julius Caesar in Shakespeare, Shaw, and the Ancients (1960); and Profession of English (1962), which reflects on the objectives and procedures of literary studies.

HARRISON, Jim (1937–), American novelist and poet, born in Grayling, Michigan, educated at Michigan State University. His early works are included in Selected and New Poems, 1961–81 (1982), but it is as a novelist that he is best known. His first novel, Wolf (1971), was personal, angry, and confessional in tone. His second novel, A Good Day to Die (1973), more traditional in technique, has been called the first Vietnam novel. Other novels followed, including Farmer (1976), Warlock (1981), and Sundog (1985). But it is, perhaps, for his collections of novellas Legends of the Fall (1978) that he is most renowned: in these works, the rural setting he favours acquires a mythopoeic quality enhanced by the bleakness of his poetic prose. In Dalva (1989) he extends his range; speaking largely in the voice of a woman of Native American extraction, he vents his wrath at the treatment of Native Americans by the white race in his longest and most mellow work to date. In The Woman Lit by Fireflies (1991) he returns to the three-novella format. Though he has been cast as a Faulknerian regionalist, Harrison's allusive style and eclectic influences make him equally remote from the naturalistic tradition as from the 'dirty realism' or the fashionable post-modernist minimalism of his contemporaries. A further volume of verse, The Theory and Practice of Rivers and New Poems, appeared in 1989.

HARRISON, M(ichael) John (1945–), British novelist and writer of *science fiction. He came to notice through his science fiction stories in magazines; his first novel, The Committed Men (1971), displays the influence of J. G. *Ballard. His originality is increasingly evident in The Pastel City (1971), A Storm of Wings (1980), and In Viriconium (1982), a trilogy sustained by the imaginative adaptation of contemporary urban landscapes into the books' powerfully conceived setting, which also features in the stories of Viriconium Nights (1985). The compelling stories of The Ice Monkey (1984) are in predominantly naturalistic idioms. His widely acclaimed novel Climbers (1989) forms an intensely detailed evocation of the sub-culture of British rock-climbing. The Course of the Heart (1992), his subsequent novel, employs elements of the supernatural in its treatment of the longing for transcendence in a spiritually impoverished world. His other works include The Centauri Device (1974) and the stories of The Machine in Shaft Ten (1975).

HARRISON, Tony (1937–), British poet, translator, and dramatist, born in Leeds, educated at the University of Leeds, where he studied classics and did postgraduate work in linguistics. From 1962 to 1966 he taught at Ahmadu Bello University, Zaria, Nigeria, where he collaborated with James *Simmons on a version of Aristophanes' Lysistrata entitled Aikin Mata (1966), the first of his many adaptations of classical works. He subsequently lectured at Charles University in Prague and became an associate editor of Stand* magazine in 1968. Among numerous visiting appointments he was resident dramatist at the National Theatre in 1977–8. His first substantial collection, The Loiners (1970), consistently displayed Harrison's virtuosity in adapting conventional forms to an energetically colloquial tone; treatments of his Leeds background and experiences of post-colonial Africa combined erotic candour, sardonic humour, and underlying political seriousness in a manner characteristic of much of his subsequent work. The distancing from his working-class origins brought about by education and the linguistic aspects of social conditioning receive concentrated attention in the Meredithian sonnets forming the title sequence of The School of Eloquence (1978); the work, whose main themes are central to Harrison's concerns as a poet, encompasses historical and socio-cultural material, autobiography, and movingly elegiac tributes to his parents and other relations. Continuous (1981) forms an extension of the sequence, to which additions are also made in the revised edition of his Selected Poems (1987). Harrison's other works as a poet include his versions of Palladus in Poems (1975); A Kumquat for John Keats (1981); *'v.' (1985), which provoked controversy when presented on television through its frequent use of language many considered obscene; A Cold Coming (1991), his poetic response to the Gulf War; The Gaze of the Gorgon (1992), poems reflecting modern European history; and The Shadow of Hiroshima (1995). As a writer for the theatre his works include an adaptation of Molière's The Misanthrope (1973); Phaedra Britannica (1975), a version of Racine's Phedre; his adaptation of The Oresteia (1981) of Aeschylus for the National Theatre; and The Common Chorus: A Version of Aristophanes' Lysistrata (1992). His verse-dramas achieve theatrical effectiveness through his liberating technical fluency across a wide range of idioms of speech and character; Dramatic Verse, 1973–1985 appeared in 1985, and The Trackers of Oxyrhyncus was performed and published in 1990.

HARROD, Sir Roy Forbes (1900–78), British economist, born in London, educated at New College, Oxford. From 1923 until his retirement in 1967 he taught at Christ Church, Oxford. Harrod was one of a select group of younger economists from whom *Keynes solicited comments on his early drafts of the General Theory (1926), and was among those responsible for the propagation of Keynesianism in mainstream economic and political circles in the post-war world. His main contributions were to the theories of economic growth and imperfect competition. While most of these were published in academic journals, two books contain their results: Towards a Dynamic Economics (1948) and Economic Essays (1952). From the early 1950s Harrod turned more to practical policy matters. Here his books Policy against Inflation (1958), Reforming the World's Money (1965), and Towards a New Economic Policy (1967) stand out for their clarity and practical good sense. Harrod remained an advocate of Keynesianism to the end, despite that doctrine's fall from favour in the early 1970s. However, this adherence to Keynesianism did not lead him to a fixed commitment to any one political party—he advised Labour, stood for Parliament (unsuccessfully) as a Liberal in 1945, and later (with Churchill's help) sought (again unsuccessfully) nomination as a Conservative candidate. He is the author of The Life of John Maynard Keynes (1951), in which his unique and intimate knowledge of Keynes's economics, and of the man himself, combined to produce an intellectual biography of singular economic and literary quality.

HARROWER, Elizabeth (1928–), Australian novelist, born in Newcastle, New South Wales. She travelled in Europe and lived in London for several years. Her novels include Down in the City (1957), which traces the disillusionment of a middle-class woman married to a working-class businessman, who emerges as a racketeer and a bully; The Long Prospect (1958), which describes the adult world from the perspective of a child; and The Catherine Wheel (1960), set in London, which deals with the unsatisfactory relationship between a young Australian girl and her selfish and demanding lover. The Watch Tower (1966), perhaps her most ambitious novel, explores the tensions between three people: Felix Shaw, a cruel and tyrannical businessman, his wife, Laura, and her sister, Clare. As with all her fictions, it deals with the evil underlying apparent normality, and with the corrupting influence of power.

HARSENT, David (1942–), British poet, born in Devonshire. He worked as a bookseller and was a literary critic with the Times Literary Supplement and the Spectator before becoming editor-in-chief and director at André Deutsch in 1979. A Violent Country (1969), his first collection of poetry, established his reputation as a poet of unusual candour and emotional power. Its unflinchingly direct treatments of personal crisis were sustained in After Dark (1973). The exploratory use of poetic sequences in Dreams of the Dead (1977) culminated in Mister Punch (1984), the protagonist of the title providing a quasi-mythological vehicle for successive wittily disquieting treatments of a wide range of philosophical and religious themes. Subsequent volumes include Selected Poems (1989), Storybook Hero (1992), and News from the Front (1993). His rhythmical economy and the assured precision of his imagery allow poems of striking psychological intensity to remain 'focussed to a hard edge and convincingly lucid in their enigmatic contexts', as Craig *Raine wrote of Dreams of the Dead. Among Harsent's other works is the novel From an Inland Sea (1985).

HART, Moss (1904–61), American playwright and director, born in New York, where he was educated in public schools; he began his theatrical career working for the celebrated agent Augustus Pitou. With George S. *Kaufman he collaborated in Once in a Lifetime (1930), and many other successful theatrical comedies including The Man Who Came to Dinner (1939) which was also filmed. Hart collaborated with many of the major popular American composers of his day: with Irving Berlin (Face the Music, 1932; As Thousands Cheer, 1933); with Cole Porter (Jubilee, 1935); with Richard Rodgers and Lorenz Hart (I'd Rather Be Right, 1937); with Ira Gershwin and Kurt Weill (Lady in the Dark, 1941). He also directed the Lerner and Loewe musicals My Fair Lady (1956) and Camelot (1960). His other works include the plays Winged Victory (1943) and Light Up The Sky (1947). Hart also served the interests of American theatre as president of the Dramatists' Guild (1947–55), and of the Authors' League (1955–61). Act One (1959) is his autobiography.

HARTLEY, L(eslie) P(oles) (1895–1972), British novelist, critic, and short-story writer, born at Whittlesey, Cambridgeshire, into a prosperous family and brought up at Fletton Towers, the family home near Peterborough; he was educated at Balliol College, Oxford. Throughout his literary career he was a fiction reviewer for the Spectator, the Observer, and many other journals. The first of his many volumes of short stories, a genre in which he excelled, was Night Fears (1924). Much of his adult life was spent in Venice, which formed the setting of his novella Simonetta Perkins (1925). His major work was his trilogy beginning with The Shrimp and the Anemone (1944), followed by The Sixth Heaven (1946) and Eustace and Hilda* (1947), the latter providing the title for the trilogy as a whole. While the trilogy secured his reputation as a major novelist, his most critically successful work was *The Go-Between (1953). All four books share a magical evocation of childhood and of the recent past, and draw on the Norfolk landscape and comfortable circumstances of his own childhood; all are influenced by Freud's teachings on childhood character-formation. His other novels include My Fellow Devils (1951), set in the world of film; A Perfect Woman (1955); The Hireling (1957), which describes the sexually charged relationship between an aristocratic widow and her cynical driver; Facial Justice (1960), a science fiction fable of the future; The Brickfield (1964), and a sequel, The Betrayal (1966); Poor Clare (1968), which is set in Bloomsbury and in Italy; and The Love Adept (1969). In his later novels Hartley turned away from the evocative Edwardian backdrops of his major works, but his principal themes remained the same: the search for identity, the desire properly to confront the past, the influence of early life on the development of the adult character, and the mutually threatening class structures of British society and the dangerous allure of the inter-class sexual attraction. Over all is a deep concern for human and moral values. A volume of his critical essays, The Novelist's Responsibility, was published in 1968.

HARTMANN, Geoffrey (1929–), German-born scholar and critic, educated at Queens College, New York, Dijon University, France, and Yale. Hartmann is well known for his work on Romanticism (The Unmediated Vision, 1954; Wordsworth's Poetry, 1964); he was a close associate at Yale of Harold *Bloom and Paul *de Man. He shares Bloom's interest in problems of interpretation and immediacy, and was an important figure in the diffusion of *Deconstruction in America and elsewhere. He has controversially argued for criticism as a creative art, not a merely subservient mode of attention to literary work. More broadly he has urged the virtues of theory against the retrenchments of tradition and supposed common sense, bringing to the debate formidable learning and a strong philosophical interest. His Criticism in the Wilderness (1980) and Saving the Text (1981) explore what he calls (in the title of another book, 1975) the fate of reading, conceived as a difficult, dangerous art. Minor Prophecies (1991) recommends the refusal of apocalyptic imaginings and the acceptance of patient, continuing interpretation as faithful both to ancient traditions and to modern practices in scholarship and criticism. The volume also has a remarkable essay on Paul de Man and pays tribute to the old 'common language' of criticism, the idiom of Dr Johnson and the Spectator, while pointing out the always possible complacency in such a language, and the vast areas of literary inquiry it cannot, by its own definitions, begin to encompass. He edited Holocaust Remembrance (1994), recollections of the Holocaust.

HARTNETT, Michael (1941–), Irish poet, born in Newcastle West, Co. Limerick, educated at University College and Trinity College in Dublin. After living in London and Madrid, he returned to Limerick to teach at the National College of Physical Education. Anatomy of a Cliché (1968), his first collection of poetry, was followed by numerous volumes in both Irish and English. His works in Irish include Adharca Broic (1978) and Do Nuala (1984); A Farewell to English (1975), Poems in English (1977), House of Moon (1989), The Killing of Dreams (1992), and Selected and New Poems (1994) are his principal publications in English. Cúlúide, The Retreat of Ida Cagney (1975) and A Necklace of Wrens (1987) contain verse in both languages. His poetry reflects his deep involvement with Irish culture in its treatments of folklore, mythology, and the Catholic devotional sensibility. As a love poet he is capable of a lyrical intensity reminiscent of Lorca, whose Romancero Gitano he translated as Gipsy Ballads (1973). His acclaimed translation of the Gaelic poem The Hag of Beare appeared in 1969. A Collected Poems appeared in two volumes in 1985 and 1987.

HARWOOD, Gwen(doline Nessie) (1920–95), Australian poet, born in Brisbane. She studied music, which she later taught; her works include a number of librettos for contemporary Australian composers. Her first collection, Poems (1963), deals with themes of physical and emotional anguish, and includes the series of poems featuring 'Professor Eisenbart', an ageing nuclear physicist who is, to some extent, perhaps, an ironic projection of herself; it was followed by Poems: Volume Two (1968) which contains the satirical figure of 'Professor Krote', a frustrated, and alcoholic, musician. The collection expresses her preoccupation with the difficulties of personal fulfilment, with mortality, loss, and the demands of domesticity. Although her poems frequently reflect intensely personal and moving experiences, they are generally optimistic. Harwood has acknowledged *Wittgenstein as an influence and has affirmed her belief in the 'power of poetry to infuse experience with value'. Other works include Selected Poems (1975; reissued as Collected Poems, 1992), The Lion's Bride (1981), and Bone Scan (1988). She has published work under a number of pseudonyms (including 'Walter Lehmann' and 'Francis Geyer') and has won numerous awards, including the Robert Frost Award (1977) and the Patrick White Award (1978). Blessed City: The Letters of Gwen Harwood (edited by Alison Hoddinot) appeared in 1990.

HARWOOD, Lee (Travers Rafe) (1939–), British poet, born in Leicester, educated at Queen Mary College, University of London. He has worked as a librarian, bookseller, and post office worker and has lectured periodically at New College, San Francisco, since 1985. The White Room (1968) was his first substantial collection of poetry. Subsequent volumes include H.M.S. Little Fox (1975), All the Wrong Notes (1981), Monster Masks (1985), Rope Boy to the Rescue (1988), Crossing the Frozen River (1988), and In the Mists: Mountain Poems (1993). The surrealist impenetrability evident in his earlier verse was superseded during the 1970s by a more fluently accessible manner. His sustained concern with recreating the immediacy of perception gives rise to the intense use of local imagery that characterizes much of his work; Brighton, Snowdonia, Italy, and New York are among the locations he has drawn on in poetry notable for the range and imaginative flexibility of its sense of place. He has also published several collections of short stories, which include Dream Quilt (1985).

HARWOOD, Ronald (1934–), South African playwright and novelist, born and educated in Cape Town; he trained for the stage at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, London. A prolific playwright, his first plays, Country Matters (1969, an adaptation of Evelyn *Waugh's The Ordeal of Gilbert Pinfold (1977)%thin;) and A Family (1978), were followed by his best-known play, The Dresser (1980), a picture of life behind the scenes with an actor based on Sir Donald Wolfit, with whom Harwood had worked in his youth. Among his later plays are Tramway Road (1984), set in the Cape Town of the 1950s, about an aspiring young actor whose hopes are shattered through his 'mixed-race' origins; Interpreters (1985), a romantic comedy with political overtones, about an English translator of Russian descent and a passionate Russian delegate; Another Time (1987), about a musician who grows up in South Africa and moves to London; Poison Pen (1994), involving the still-unexplained death of the critic Philip Heseltine, alias the composer Peter Warlock; and Taking Sides (1995), about the accusations of Nazism directed, in Harwood's view unjustly, at the conductor Wilhelm Furtwangler. At his best, as when he raises the relationship of art and politics in this last play, Harwood combines an interest in ideas with well-observed realism. Harwood has also written several novels, including César and Augusta (1978), about the French composer César Franck, and a biography of Sir Donald Wolfit, CBE (1971).

HASLUCK, Nicholas (1942–), Australian poet and novelist, born in Canberra, educated at the University of Western Australia. His first novel, Quarantine (1978), was followed by The Blue Guitar (1980), which deals with moral confusion in the world of commerce. The Hand that Feeds You (1982) is a political satire about a future corrupt republican Australia to which an innocent expatriate writer returns and gets elected to Parliament. The Bellarmine Jug (1984), perhaps his best novel, concerns the 1629 mutiny and massacre perpetrated in Australia by a party from a shipwrecked Dutch vessel. Truant State (1987) is set in Western Australia at the time of secession and involves the financial ruin of an English immigrant family. The Country Without Music (1990) is set in a group of islands, formerly a French penal settlement, and concerns the visit of a group of twentieth-century Australian businessmen, who plan to build a tourist centre there. The Blosseville File (1992) explores political corruption in a fictional ex-colony; A Grain of Truth (1994) is a crime story exposing influences on the law of political interests and the distortions of truth effected by skilful advocacy. Other works include The Hat on the Letter O and Other Stories (1978); Anchor and Other Poems (1976); On the Edge (1980; with William Grono); Chinese Journey (1985; with C. J. *Koch), a collection of prose writings; Collage: Recollections of the Universe of Western Australia (1987); and Offcuts from a Legal Literary Life (1993), autobiographical writings from his distinguished legal career.

HASS, Robert (1941–), American poet and editor, born in San Francisco, educated at St Mary's College, San Francisco and Stanford University. Hass is one of a group of younger American poets whose work came to critical attention in the early 1970s and who mark an important shift in poetic sensibility away from the *confessional and post-confessional lyric mode that dominated American poetry in the 1950s and 1960s, and from the intellectual nihilism of *Beat poetry. Hass's work owes much to the influence of Yvor *Winters, under whom he studied at Stanford: his early verse is intelligent, syntactically and grammatically uncluttered, but frequently elliptical and difficult. His feeling for the longer verse form, and a capacity to maintain it, is a characteristic of individual poems such as 'Maps' and 'Lament for the Poles of Buffalo', but he is equally at home in a more conventional lyric medium, as in 'Spring' or 'Child Naming Flowers'. Many of his poems make sympathetic use of Californian landscapes. He was a recipient of the Yale Younger Poets Award in 1972; his first volume of verse, Field Guide (1973), was followed by Praise (1978). Twentieth Century Pleasures: Prose on Poetry (1984) won the National Book Critics Circle Award. Later volumes include Human Wishes (1989) and The Essential Haiku (1994), the latter comprising 'versions', as he calls them, of Basho, Buson, and Issa. Five American Poets (1979), edited by Michael Schmidt, contains a selection of his early verse.

HASSALL, Christopher (Vernon) (1912–63), British poet, librettist, and biographer, born in London, educated at Wadham College, Oxford; he subsequently became an actor. He produced highly accomplished lyrics for Ivor Novello's compositions, and gained financial success with their first musical, Glamorous Night (1939). His reputation as a poet increased with three sonnet sequences (Crisis, 1939; S.O.S.—Ludlow, 1940; and The Slow Night, 1949) drawing on his experiences of active service during the Second World War. The poems of The Red Leaf (1957) encompass a wide range of discursive and dramatically effective modes. The forty sonnets which form the title sequence of Bell Harry (1963) combine topographical and contemplative elements in an extended elegy on the death of his friend Frances *Cornford. As a librettist, he produced texts for William Walton's Troilus and Cressida (1954) and Prokofiev's The Fiery Angel (1965). Among his verse-dramas are Christ's Comet (1937) and The Player King (1953). Hassall's works as a biographer include Edward Marsh (1959); he had been encouraged by *Marsh early in his career as a poet. His other biographies include Rupert Brooke (1964).

HASTINGS, Michael (Gerald) (1938–), British playwright and novelist, born in Lambeth, London, and brought up in Brixton; he was educated at Alleyn's School. He subsequently trained as an actor and writer at the Royal Court Theatre in London where many of his plays were produced. His interest in the dramatic presentation of biography is best displayed in Tom and Viv (1984), a haunting study of T. S. *Eliot's marriage to his first wife, Vivienne Haigh-Wood. Three Plays (1980) contains: Gloo Joo (1978), an acerbic comedy of Caribbean manners; For the West (Uganda) (1977), about Ugandan dictator Idi Amin; and Full Frontal (1979), a monologue by a West Indian. His other plays include Lee Harvey Oswald (1966), published in Three Political Plays (1990); and Carnival War/Midnite at the Starlite (1981), which contains a powerful examination of the annual Notting Hill Carnival, in London, and a sardonic account of competitive ballroom dancing. The Emperor (1987) was an adaptation by Hastings and Jonathan Miller of Ryszard Kapuscinski's book about the fall of Haile Selassie, Emperor of Ethiopia. Unfinished Business (1994) depicts support for Hitler among the British upper classes. Hastings has also written several novels, and biographies of Rupert *Brooke (1967) and Sir Richard Burton (1978).

HAU'OFA, Epeli (1939–), Papua New Guinean novelist and short-story writer, born in Salamo, Papua New Guinea, educated at the University of New South Wales, McGill University, Montreal, and the Australian National University, Canberra. Following a succession of university appointments and a period as the deputy private secretary to the King of Tonga, he became Professor of Sociology at the University of the South Pacific, Fiji, in 1983. The twelve robustly humorous stories in Tales of the Tikongs (1983) are set on the imaginary island of Tiko; the social and cultural chaos produced by the collision of Western values and the island's indigenous traditions mirrors the absurdities wrought by accelerated change in the South Pacific. His novel Kisses in the Nederends (1987), a picaresque narrative of the protagonist's search for relief from his perianal afflictions, similarly reflects the difficulties inflicted on the Pacific states by colonialism and its legacy of continuing exploitation. Hau'ofa's works as a sociologist and anthropologist include Our Crowded Islands (1977) and Mekeo: Inequality and Ambivalence in a Village Society (1981).

HAWKES, Jacquetta (1910–96), English archaeologist and novelist, born in Cambridge, educated at Newnham College, Cambridge. She worked for UNESCO during 1943–8 and 1964–79. She was particularly well known for her popular books on archaeological topics. Notable among these is A Land (1951, with colour plates by Henry Moore), which she described as 'the story of the creation of what is at present Britain'; other works in this vein include Archaeology of Jersey (1939), Early Britain (1945), Guide to the Prehistoric Monuments of England and Wales (1951), Man on Earth (1954), The Dawn of the Gods (1968), The First Great Civilizations (1973), and The Shell Guide to British Archaeology (1986). She was married to Christopher Hawkes with whom she wrote Prehistoric Britain (1952), and to J. B. *Priestley with whom she collaborated in the play Dragon's Mouth (1952). Her other works include Symbols and Speculations (1948; poems), Fables (1953; stories), King of the Two Lands (1966; novel), A Quest of Love (1980), a semi-autobiographical novel, and Mortimer Wheeler (1982), a biography.

HAWKES, John (Clendennin Burne, Jr) (1925–), American novelist, born in Connecticut, educated at Harvard; he spent his formative years in Alaska. His experience as an ambulance driver in Italy and Germany during the Second World War was to mark his early fiction, including the novel The Cannibal (1949), which was viewed by many critics as an allegory of German fascism. Hawkes is often compared to the masters of avant-garde and post-modernist fictional technique, and his lavish prose style, imagistic virtuosity, and skilled use of the first-person narrative voice echo *Nabokov and Djuna *Barnes. Hawkes's novels include The Beetle Leg (1951), set in the American West; The Lime Twig (1961), a parody of the detective novel, marked by Hawkes's characteristic emphasis on violent and occasionally misogynistic sexuality; The Blood Oranges (1971), which reworks Ford's *The Good Soldier; Death, Sleep and the Traveler (1974), a drama of sexual exchange and infidelity; and Travesty (1976), the monologue of an ageing writer driving the lover of his wife to death and himself to suicide. In later work Hawkes has experimented with female voices and semi-pornographic themes. The highly praised Virginie: Her Two Lives (1982), rich with allusions to the writings of de Sade, is narrated by a girl of 11, living parallel lives in two centuries, the eighteenth and the twentieth. Adventures in the Alaskan Skin Trade (1985) uses autobiographical material, though the narrator, Sunny, is a woman. Rich with detailed descriptions of Alaska, the novel is Hawkes's most uncharacteristic work, and has been seen by some critics as his mandatory attempt to write the 'Great American Novel'. Other works include the novels Second Skin (1964), The Passion Artist (1979), and Whistlejacket (1988). Hawkes's early short fiction, located in an Italy set between fact and fantasy, was collected in Lunar Landscapes: Stories and Short Novels '49–'63 (1969). Hawkes is much admired by academics for his experimentalism and unashamed literariness.

Hawksmoor, a novel by Peter *Ackroyd, published in 1985. The double narrative of this combination of suspense, horror, and social history unfolds in the early eighteenth century and in the present day. The chapters set in the skilfully evoked London of the past are narrated by an architect named Nicholas Dyer, whose mastery of his craft is accompanied by a fervent belief in the esoteric and the supernatural. His plan to build seven churches in the City of London is underwritten by arcane symbolism and the ritual murder of vagabonds, children, and, eventually, his adversaries. In the chapters set in the present, a similar series of ritualistic murders of children and tramps, on the sites of the churches built by Dyer, links the alternating narratives. The murders are brought to the attention of Nicholas Hawksmoor, a senior detective in the CID. This surly, reclusive man eventually traces a pattern connecting the murders to the past and to Nicholas Dyer; the scepticism of his colleagues parallels the dismissal of Dyer's esoteric speculations by his peers and fellow architects, including Sir Christopher Wren. Hawksmoor is taken off the unsolved case, just as Dyer, in the past, was superseded by his contemporaries. Hawksmoor's unsuccessful attempts to unravel the mystery of the ritual murders, with their strong implication of the unseen and supernatural, eventually lead him to a state of hallucinatory obsession and despair. His name refers to the real architect responsible for six of the churches in the novel, and upon whose career Dyer's is partly based.

HAYDEN, Robert (1913–80), African-American poet, born in Detroit, educated at Wayne State University and the University of Michigan; he taught English at Fisk University before returning to the University of Michigan in 1968. In 1976 Hayden became the first African-American to be appointed Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress. He worked as a researcher for the *Federal Writers Project of the Works Progress Administration (1936–8) and the facts of African-American history with which he dealt formed the substance of much of his later poetry. Prominent historical black figures like Harriet Tubman, Frederick Douglass, and Nat Turner combine with more recent figures like Malcolm X, Paul Robeson, and Bessie Smith and with personal recollections. 'Elegies for Paradise Valley' is a sequence of poems that recreate the Detroit neighbourhood in which Hayden grew up. The historical imagination is central to Hayden's work, especially in poems like 'Middle Passage', a collage which dramatizes through multiple voices a range of accounts of slavery focusing upon the conditions aboard the slave ship The Armistad and the slave-led rebellion that symbolizes the conflict between oppression and the indomitable desire for freedom. Hayden deliberately wrote of themes other than racial conflict and African-American history and culture: he adhered closely to the belief that poetry should speak universally and that the representation of a particular political moment should be such that it carries universal relevance. His collections include Heart-Shape in the Dust (1940), Figures of Time: Poems (1955), A Ballad of Remembrance (1962), Selected Poems (1966), Words in the Mourning Time (1970), Angle of Ascent: New and Selected Poems (1975), American Journal (1978), Collected Prose (1984), and Collected Poems (1985).

Hay Fever, a comedy by Noël Coward, performed in 1925. The main characters are Judith and David Bliss, respectively an actor and a writer, and their adult children, Simon and Sorel. Unknown to the others, each has asked a guest to the house for the weekend, but each proceeds to pay attention to someone other than the person he or she has invited. So unnerved are the visitors by the family's ceaseless histrionics that, the morning after a lively evening, they creep away unnoticed. The play is slight, but elegantly plotted and full of humorous characterization. The National Theatre's revival in 1964, with Edith Evans and Maggie Smith in leading roles, did much to re-establish Coward's reputation, which had been adversely affected by the arrival of the socially aware drama associated with Look Back in Anger.

HAZZARD, Shirley (1931–), Australian writer, born and educated in Sydney. Since leaving Australia at the age of 16 she has travelled to Hong Kong, New Zealand, Europe, and America. She married Francis Steegmuller, became an American citizen, and divides her time between the USA and Italy. In 1976 she wrote an influential account of Australia for the New Yorker, for which she had also written short stories, later collected in Cliffs of Fall and Other Stories (1963). Having worked with the United Nations (1952–62) she became a vocal opponent of that institution, about which she wrote in Defeat of an Ideal: A Study of the Self-Destruction of the United Nations (1973) and Countenance the Truth: The United Nations and the Waldheim Case (1990), and in People In Glass Houses (1967), a sharply satirical novel, analysing life within the UN walls. The Evening of the Holiday (1966), set in Florence, is about the love of a young Anglo-Italian woman for an older Italian architect. The Bay of Noon (1970) is narrated by a woman who fled to Naples to escape a triangular relationship, only there to be drawn into a similar situation. Her highly acclaimed The Transit of Venus (1980) is a romantic novel concerning a young Australian woman who travels to England with her sister, her entanglement with a feckless Englishman, and her rescue from despair by a middle-aged American. Hazzard's writings are mostly a sensitive exploration of the infinite aspirations, manifestations, and memories of human love. A finely wrought simplicity of style and structure lends her work unusual powers of evocation and analysis.

HEAD, Bessie (1937–86), South African novelist, born in Pietermaritzburg, and educated at a mission school. She worked as a teacher, and as a journalist for Drum magazine in South Africa, before she moved to Botswana due to political pressures associated with the trial of a friend. The pain of exile and alienation permeates her first three novels, all set in Botswana. They are also infused with the tensions between rural and urban values, and those caused by racism, traditionalism, male chauvinism, and tribal particularism. In When the Clouds Gather (1969) a black South African nationalist and an English agricultural expert encounter opposition from a local chief who is suspicious of the modern methods. Maru (1971) focuses on the new teacher, Margaret Cadmore, who is taken for a 'Coloured' by villagers, and treated respectfully until she reveals herself to be a member of a despised tribe. A Question of Power (1973) extends these themes and reaches for new values, opposed to both traditional and dominant modern ones. Serowe: Village of the Rain Wind (1981) and A Bewitched Crossroad (1984) explore the past, depicting aspects of Botswana history culled from the oral tradition. Her collection of stories The Collector of Treasures (1977) contains tales of village life, very much in the spirit of oral storytelling and didactic parable.

HEALY, Dermot (1947–), Irish novelist and writer of short stories, born in Co. Westmeath. He has worked as a labourer, insurance underwriter, actor, director, and editor of The Drumlin, a magazine of literature and local history based in Co. Cavan. Much of Healy's work has concerned the divided communities of Ireland's border counties, a setting which offers metaphors with which to cross the divide between past and present. His short story collection Banished Misfortune (1982), and his novels Fighting with Shadows; or Sciamachy (1984) and The Goats' Song (1990), incorporate diverse styles of expression while producing an ironic effect of realism.

HEANEY, Seamus (Justin) (1939–), Irish poet and critic, born in Castledawson, Co. Derry, educated at Queen's University, Belfast, where he began lecturing in 1966. During the early 1960s he was part of the Belfast writers' group run by Philip *Hobsbaum and was closely associated with the emergence of *Ulster poetry. He moved to Glanmore in County Wicklow in 1972 to devote himself to writing. Following a succession of visiting appointments at American universities, he became Boylston Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory at Harvard in 1986 and was elected Oxford Professor of Poetry in 1989. His first two collections of verse, Death of a Naturalist (1966) and Door into the Dark (1969), reflect his agricultural background with an immediacy and authenticity for which the poetry of Patrick *Kavanagh supplied a rural Irish precedent. Throughout his career he has continued to make remarkably full and varied use of themes and images drawn from his native locality. Ireland's troubled history and Heaney's uneasy identity as an Irish Catholic writer with firm allegiances to the English literary tradition assume increasing significance in his earlier volumes. The outbreak of sectarian violence in Ulster in 1969 was registered deeply in Wintering Out (1972). The collection initiated the imaginative engagement with the landscape of the peat bogs as a means of comprehending contemporary events which is sustained and intensified in North (1975). His sense of personal implication in Ulster's upheaval was explored at this time through the recollections of childhood in the prose poems of Stations (1975). A more private and lyrically meditative manner is resumed in Field Work (1979); the volume contains several memorable elegies for victims of sectarian killings, anticipating some of the Dantean dialogues with the dead in the title sequence of Station Island (1984). The collection contains a wide range of material amounting to a thorough survey of all his principal concerns; the twelve poems of 'Station Island' involve him in an ordeal of confronting his origins and obligations, repeatedly through dramatically imagined encounters with the dead, who include the ghosts of Kavanagh and James *Joyce. The book concludes with a new assertion of artistic freedom which is maintained in the liberating imaginative scope and heightened technical virtuosity of The Haw Lantern (1987) and Seeing Things (1991). His New Selected Poems, 1966–1987 appeared in 1990. Other works by Heaney include Sweeney Astray (1983), a version of the medieval Irish Buile Suibhne, of which a revised illustrated version appeared as Sweeney's Flight (1993). He has also gained a high reputation as a critic, showing a wide knowledge of European and American, as well as English and Irish, poetries in the collected essays of Preoccupations (1980) and The Government of the Tongue (1988). Heaney won the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1995.

HEARNE, John (1926–95), Jamaican novelist, born in Montreal, Canada, but brought up in Jamaica; educated at Jamaica College and the University of Edinburgh. He has been a teacher and journalist, and a researcher working for Prime Minister Michael Manley of Jamaica. Conservative in outlook, his novels are notable for their depiction of the Jamaican professional classes, and antagonisms based on racial and class difference. His first novel, Voices Under the Window (1955), is narrated entirely in flashback, and focuses on a young lawyer at the point of death reflecting on his ultimately lethal involvement in Jamaican politics and his racial origins. Stranger at the Gate (1956), The Faces of Love (1957), The Autumn Equinox (1959), and The Land of the Living (1961), set in an imaginary exotic 'Cayuna', concentrate on the personal dilemmas of romantic love and middle-class alienation, though underlying political factors persist. More symbolic and allegorical, The Sure Salvation (1981), set in a slave ship, is marked by pessimism about both politics and personal relationships.

Heartbreak House, a play by G. B. *Shaw, published in 1919 and performed in 1920, though it was probably written in 1916–17, largely in response to the Great War, an event addressed in an unwontedly sombre preface. The plot to this 'fantasia in the Russian manner on English themes' is given a semblance of unity through the character Ellie Dunn, daughter of the idealistic Mazzini Dunn. She is invited to the household of the aged Captain Shotover by his younger daughter, Hesione Hushabye, a woman of bohemian inclination, said to have been partly modelled on Virginia *Woolf. There, Ellie admits to being in love with Marcus Darnley, who turns out to be Hesione's husband Hector in one of his many romantic guises. Disillusioned and hardened, Ellie announces her intention of marrying Boss Mangan, a rich and influential financier. Later, she rejects the prospect of wealth and proclaims herself spiritually wed to Shotover, in what appears to be a union of vitality and wisdom. With Hesione's sister Ariadne Utterwood, the conventional wife of a colonial bureaucrat, and her brother-in-law, the feeble Randall, all these characters have contributions to make to what becomes a dramatized debate about an England Shaw regarded as hopelessly divided between the representatives of 'Heartbreak House' (meaning the cultured but self-absorbed and politically irresponsible) and those of what his preface calls 'Horseback Hall' (meaning Ariadne and the other aggressive philistines). Shotover, a self-mocking portrait of Shaw himself, delivers the key warning about the future of the ship of state: 'The captain is in his bunk, drinking bottled ditchwater; and the crew is gambling in the forecastle. She will strike and sink and split. Do you think the laws of God will be suspended in favour of England because you were born in it?' In an ambiguous ending, a bomber kills the capitalist Mangan and leaves Hesione, Hector, and Ellie radiant at the prospect of a second air-raid, even though it may destroy them.

Heart of Darkness, a novel by Joseph *Conrad, published in 1902 together with 'Youth' and 'The End of the Tether' (serialized in Blackwood's Magazine, 1899). The framing narrative is set on board the Nellie, on the lower reaches of the Thames, where Charlie Marlow is relating an episode from his earlier life to professional companions, a Director of Companies, an Accountant, a Lawyer, and the anonymous narrator who opens and concludes the narrative. Marlow recalls his experience captaining a tin-pot steamboat up an unnamed central African river in search and rescue of Mr Kurtz, a renowned ivory collector employed by the Belgian company for which Marlow is temporarily working. Marlow's journey down the African coast to the Company's Outer Station headquarters and trek inland to the Central Station to take charge of his boat has already exposed him to the brutal realities of colonial military and economic exploitation. Marlow becomes increasingly disillusioned by his complicity with the 'pilgrims of progress' who represent European civilization, while his simultaneous fascination with and dread of the 'monstrous and unearthy, inscrutable' jungle and its native inhabitants grow as he struggles upriver towards Kurtz. Kurtz himself has achieved almost god-like authority over the native tribesmen, who seek to fight off the approaching steamboat. The row of severed heads on stakes surrounding Kurtz's encampment intimate something of the 'unspeakable rites' which Kurtz has embraced with Nietzschean audacity. Back in Europe, Marlow's final lie to Kurtz's Intended—that on his deathbed Kurtz uttered her name and not his appalling ambiguous cry, 'The horror! The horror!'—consolidates one of Conrad's major thematic preoccupations: that consciousness of deeper truths is painful and that 'the surface truths' of things ('luckily! luckily!') hides their reality. Much of Conrad's powerful insight was gained on his own trip up the Congo river some ten years earlier (cf. Congo Diary) and through his friendship with R. B. *Cunninghame Graham. A vast body of critical commentary has mined the dense richness and consciously paradoxical quality of this seminal modernist work, with its modern version of a Dantean journey into the Inferno, its Faustian figure of Kurtz provoking ambivalently fascinated horror, and Marlow's characteristically modernist self-conscious story-telling. Remarkably varied analyses exploit mythical, Freudian, formalist-narratological, feminist, deconstructionist, and Marxist approaches; insights generated by notions of the cultural/racial Other (cf. Chinua *Achebe and Edward *Said) have provided eloquent critiques. The influence of Heart of Darkness can be traced in writers as diverse as T. S. *Eliot, André Gide, H. G. *Wells, Achebe, William *Golding, Graham *Greene, V. S. *Naipaul, and George *Steiner, while Francis Coppola's film Apocalypse Now taps some of its rich imaginative possibilities by transposing it to the Vietnam War.

Heart of the Matter, The, a novel by Graham Greene, published in 1948, set in West Africa, where Greene worked for British Intelligence during the Second World War. Greene's title echoes Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness, though his novel shows Africa not as a dark continent so much as one suffused with the greyness he sees as universally part of human nature. Its stale, sticky background of vultures, rats, and cockroaches reflects and extends loneliness and despair in a snobbish, bickering society of colonial administrators. Only the assistant police commissioner, 'Scobie the just', tries to live by black-and-white moral principles. He is destroyed by the attempt, driven to suicide by compromised religious beliefs and his 'terrible sense of responsibility'—for his lover Helen Rolt, a young widow from a torpedoed ship; and for his wife Louise, whose unhappiness drives him to borrow from the corrupt Syrian trader Yusef, who blackmails him. The Heart of the Matter is part of a phase of strong Catholic interest in Greene's writing, and there has been much debate about whether Scobie's mortal sins truly exclude him from God's mercy. Greene has disclaimed interest in the issue: like most of his fiction, the novel is concerned less with orthodox doctrines and ideals than with their tension with ordinary nature under the pressures of modern history. This is emphasized by a scene in which Scobie finds that the only reading material available to entertain another young victim of the torpedoing is the outdated, idealistic missionary tract A Bishop among the Bantus. He transforms it into a racy tale of betrayal and detection in which the secret agent A. Bishop pursues bloodthirsty 'Bantu' pirates. The episode is paradigmatic of Greene's fiction: like Scobie, he challenges and reshapes conventional concepts of virtue and heroism, also showing in this novel the pride—even foolishness—as well as courage of trying to adhere to them at all in an uncertain, unfaithful age.

Heat and Dust, a novel by Ruth Prawer *Jhabvala, published in 1975, and winner of the Booker Prize. It tells the interlocked stories of two Englishwomen, divided by time and era, but related by family ties and by their experience of India. An unnamed narrator—whose diary part of the novel purports to be —travels to India in search of the elusive Olivia, her grandfather's first wife (whose life is revealed in fragments and flashbacks to 1923); captivated by the vitality concealed within the post-colonial decay of India, she, like Olivia before her, decides to remain there. Olivia, however, as the wife of a colonial officer, had known a more exotic and opulent India; she was seduced by an Indian prince whose mistress she then became, causing a scandal in the bigoted Anglo-Indian society of the time. The narrator, however, in an age when history has overtaken the Raj and the imperial past is regarded as something of an irrelevance, becomes pregnant by the petty clerk in whose house she boards and is left to deal with her life as best she can on her own resources. Jhabvala deftly contrasts the imperial with the colonial, the East with the West; the similarity that recurs across gaps of time and culture is, however, in the harsh treatment of women, whether by exclusion and ostracism, marginalization, or mere indifference. As in much of her fiction, Jhabvala indicates an implicit parallel between cultural diversity and gender difference. Heat and Dust was successfully filmed by the Merchant-Ivory-Jhabvala team in 1983.

HEATH, Roy (1926–), Guyanese novelist, born in British Guiana where he attended Central High School, and worked as a civil servant, before emigrating to England in 1950. Although he was called to the English Bar in 1964 Heath never practised law, but worked as a schoolteacher in London. His first novel, A Man Came Home (1974), is concerned with the day-to-day activities of the urban, middle-class Guyanese who form the subject of most of Heath's fiction. In such novels as The Murderer (1978) and the Armstrong trilogy (From the Heat of the Day, 1979; One Generation, 1981; and Genetha, 1981) Heath explores the psychological, financial, and sexual implications of life in a Guyanese landscape where the extended family structure, unaffected social relations, explicit speech and gestures, and frank reliance on the supernatural lend an air of complete authenticity to his writing. In The Shadow Bride (1988) Heath focuses on the Indian community in Guyana. His work is marked by comprehensive social observation, penetrating psychological analysis, and vigorous, picaresque action. Shadows Round the Moon (1990) is a volume of autobiography.

HEATH-STUBBS, John (Francis Alexander) (1918–), British poet, born in London, educated at Worcester College for the Blind and at Queen's College, Oxford, where he formed a close friendship with Sidney *Keyes. He has held a succession of visiting posts at universities in Britain and overseas. Wounded Thammuz (1942), his first collection of verse, was followed by numerous volumes, which include The Charity of the Stars (1949), The Watchman's Flute (1978), Collected Poems 1943–1987 (1988), The Game of Love and Death (1990), and Selected Poems (1990). Much of his work is characterized by a wry individuality of tone and skilful manipulation of rhythmical effects. 'Send for Lord Timothy', a purposefully ludicrous satire of the cult of nostalgia in the English detective novel, is one of the best-known examples of the marked comic strain in his work. Many of his poems arise from his preoccupation with mythological and historical subject matter, of which Artorius (1972), a treatment in twelve parts of Arthurian legend, is the most sustained manifestation. Of his translations, Poems from Giacomo Leopardi (1946) is particularly highly valued. Among his other publications are the plays collected in Helen in Egypt (1958); the monograph Charles Williams (1955); The Darkling Plain (1950), his charting of the 'later fortunes of romanticism', and a prose autobiography, Hindsights (1993).

HEAT MOON, William Least (1939–), American author, born in Kansas City, Missouri, educated at the University of Missouri. Originally named William Trogdon, he adopted his Native American name, which translates as 'Least Heat Moon'. He taught in Columbia, Missouri, from 1965 to 1978, when, reacting against the uniform materialism of modern American life, he embarked on a three-month journey around the USA in a van; the widely popular Blue Highways: A Journey into America (1982) forms an abundantly detailed record of the landscapes and societies he passed through. In 1991 Heat Moon published PrairyErth, his attempt to construct a 'deep map' of Chase County, Kansas, through the collation of an extraordinary range of information on the human and natural characters of the area.

Heat of the Day, The, a novel by E. *Bowen, set in wartime London between 1942 and 1944, published in 1949. Stella Rodney, an attractive widow in her forties, is having a passionate wartime affair with Robert Kelway, who works at the War Office. Stella is approached by the sinister Harrison, a secret agent of sorts, who has come into his own in this 'crooks' war'. He tells her that Robert is a spy, selling secrets to the enemy, and that if Stella will allow Harrison into her life, he will leave Robert 'on the loose'. Stella gradually discovers that this is the truth about Robert; he explains his treachery by a loathing of English democracy derived from a stifling mother-dominated childhood (his gloomy suburban home, Holme Dene, is the scene of grotesque comedy) and from his experience at Dunkirk ('army of freedom queuing up to be taken off by pleasure boats'). Stella refuses his arguments, and Robert is killed escaping pursuit. Two minor characters, Louie Lewis, an 'ordinary' soldier's wife living in London with her friend Connie, and Stella's son Roderick, who has inherited an Anglo-Irish house, Mount Morris, contrast with Robert's disaffection. The plot is implausible, but Stella's predicament is painfully vivid, Harrison is impressive, and the novel's atmosphere is a remarkable achievement, the best evocation of the unreality and excitement of London in the Blitz.

HECHT, Anthony (Evan) (1923–), American poet, born in New York, educated at Bard College and Columbia University. Having held a succession of posts at various American universities, including Kenyon College, where he worked with John Crowe *Ransom, he became Professor of Poetry and Rhetoric at Rochester University in 1967. His early collections of poetry, which display his considerable accomplishment in traditional verse forms, include A Summoning of Stones (1954), The Seven Deadly Sins (1958), and A Bestiary (1962). The ornate intricacy of many of the poems in these books was superseded by the plainer and more immediate manner characteristic of much of the best work in The Hard Hours (1967; Pulitzer Prize), Millions of Strange Shadows (1977), and The Venetian Vespers (1979). The poems these volumes contain range from precisely observed anecdotal treatments to the philosophically encompassing title sequence of Venetian Vespers, which forms the culmination of the historical, cultural, and metaphysical preoccupations of his preceding work. Hecht published no further collections of poetry until The Transparent Man (1990), in which the long poem 'See Naples and Die' is a self-revealing companion piece to the stoically pessimistic vision of 'Venetian Vespers'. Collected Earlier Poems also appeared in 1990. His literary criticism is principally represented by the essays collected in Obbligati (1986), and The Hidden Law: The Poetry of W. H. Auden (1993). Among his numerous works as a translator are his version of Voltaire's Poem upon the Lisbon Disaster (1977) and the translations of poems by Joseph *Brodsky in The Venetian Vespers. See also CONFESSIONAL POETRY.

HECHT, Ben (1894–1964), American novelist and dramatist, born in New York and brought up in Wisconsin. Hecht eventually settled into a bohemian orthodoxy in the literary world of Chicago after the First World War where he edited the Chicago Literary Times (1923–4), a *little magazine that espoused a fin de siècle aestheticism in a spirit of modernist iconoclasm. He wrote numerous plays of which the best known are two gritty comedies written in collaboration with Charles *MacArthur, The Front Page (1928) and Twentieth Century (1932), which was adapted for cinema by Howard Hawks in 1934. The Front Page deals with Chicago newsmen and the duplicitous manœuvres of an editor who will go to any lengths to prevent a young reporter, who has just scooped a story, escaping to marriage and New York. Set in the newsroom of the paper, The Front Page is the precursor of contemporary newspaper television serials, and has been made into a film several times: by Lewis Milestone in 1931, by Howard Hawks under the title His Girl Friday in 1940, and by Billy Wilder in 1974. Hecht's autobiography A Child of the Century appeared in 1954.

HEINLEIN, Robert A(nson) (1907–88), American writer, born in Missouri, educated at the University of Missouri and at Annapolis. After naval service was brought to an end by illness, he began writing *science fiction; within a few years of publishing his first story in 1939 he became widely known, and for fifty years his work dominated American science fiction. His many novels and stories generally featured a series of 'Competent Men'; argumentative, tough, numerate, and bright, they explored and exploited the solar system, against the constraints of timid bureaucrats. The future history Heinlein created in the 1940s for these heroes are collected in The Past through Tomorrow (1967) which provided a model for this imaginative domestication of the future. His Stranger in a Strange Land (1961) was the first science fiction novel to become a bestseller. It has been suggested that the series of children's novels culminating in Starship Troopers (1959) represented Heinlein at his best, but his adult novels, such as Double Star (1956), The Door into Summer (1957), and The Moon is a Harsh Mistress (1966), are similarly accomplished. Among the many critical studies on the author is H. B. Franklin's (1982).

HEJINIAN, Lyn (1941–), American poet, born in San Francisco. She taught herself letterpress printing and edited the Tuumba series of chapbooks in which many of the *Language poets appeared. Since then she has been an editor of Poetics Journal with Barrett *Watten. She is best known for her longer book-length works, Writing Is an Aid to Memory (1978), My Life (1980/1987), Oxota: A Short Russian Novel (1991), and The Cell (1992). Like Ron *Silliman and Barrett Watten she works with generative frameworks (each section of the second edition of My Life has forty-nine sentences and the same number of sections, her age at the time of writing) and favours structures built from complete but varyingly disjunctive sentences: 'one must be careful not to read any sequence of sentences as a series of substitutes or cancellations.' The Cell is a self-exploratory phenomenology of consciousness that avoids confessionalism. My Life combines rigorous introspective attention to memory with a steady observation of a woman's experience of everyday life.

HELLER, Joseph (1923–), American novelist, born in Brooklyn, educated at New York, Columbia, and Oxford Universities. Heller published short stories, becoming a full-time writer in 1961 after having worked for Time and Look magazines. His experiences in the US Army Air Force during the Second World War led to his first novel and major success with Catch-22* (1961), which depicted the absurdity and chaos of warfare through a group of memorable characters, with a plot based on the military bureaucratic mind. The book's immense success during the years of the Vietnam War led to its title becoming a common phrase in modern usage to express an impossibly frustrating position. His next fiction was Something Happened (1974), which investigates the alienation suffered by a commercial functionary, Robert Slocum, by surrounding the central and eponymous event with a mass of detail to describe the tedium of his life as he becomes a victim of his own psychological paralysis. With Good as Gold (1979), Heller made an effective return to satire with this cruelly humorous portrait of Washington political life, with the focus on the Jewish professor Bruce Gold, who 'sells out' to material, sexual, and literary opportunism. Other works include God Knows (1984), about the Biblical hero David, albeit from the alternative confessional perspective of David the cocky Jewish child and one-time crony of God; No Laughing Matter (1986), with Speed Vogel, a narrative about suffering and recovering from an illness; and Picture This (1988), a novel that looks at the differing frames of reference of Renaissance Holland and Ancient Greece, as it examines Rembrandt's picture 'Aristotle Contemplating the Bust of Homer'. With the elaborately structured Closing Time (1994), Heller returns to the cast of Catch-22 who are now fighting the battle against old age. In addition, he has written several screenplays, among them Sex and the Single Girl (1964), Casino Royale (1967), and Dirty Dingus Magee (1970).

HELLMAN, Lillian (1905?–84), American playwright and memoirist, born in New Orleans, Louisiana, educated at the Universities of New York and Columbia. Her first play, The Children's House (1934), written under the tutelage of her companion Dashiell *Hammett, was the sensitive account of two teachers accused by a malicious student of concealing a lesbian relationship; the play had allusions to the misuse of power which acquired new resonances during the period of McCarthy's anti-communist witchhunts. Hellman's next play, Days To Come (1936), a drama of unionism, was followed by her highly successful The Little Foxes (1939), which established her as one of the leading playwrights of her generation. The central theme of the play—the rise to power of the petit bourgeois class, the rapacity of the newly rich—is subordinated to its melodramatic blend of blackmail, sibling rivalry, sexual manipulation, and murder, and to the powerful character of its evil protagonist, Regina Hubbard. Hellman was said to have drawn largely on memories of her mother's Southern family, which increased the appeal of the play; she returned to the Hubbard family in Another Part of the Forest (1946), which has been compared to the minor works of Shakespeare, and its emphasis on violence seen as an attempt to foreground the powerful themes of good and evil that continued to preoccupy her. During the Second World War her plays Watch on the Rhine (1941) and The Searching Wind (1944) were both highly topical, dealing with the fascist menace, and Hellman's reputation was assured for posterity. Later plays, The Autumn Garden (1951) and Toys in the Attic (1960), pay more attention to plot, technique, and psychology than to melodrama, and in this phase she has been compared to Chekhov. The settings of these plays were contemporary and drew again in part on Hellman's family. Hellman's reminiscences, An Unfinished Woman: A Memoir (1969) and Pentimento: A Book of Portraits (1973), earned the highest praise for their accounts of an unexpectedly heroic life. A third volume, Scoundrel Time (1976), raised a storm of controversy; Hellman's testimonial of her difficult position during the McCarthy trials was held to be inaccurate by such contemporaries as Mary *McCarthy and Diana Trilling. Her last book, Maybe: A Story (1980), published as fiction, attempts to illustrate her technique of interweaving fiction and documented fact, memory, and imagination, and of turning life into text as she had done in the memoirs and the plays.

HELPRIN, Mark (1947–), American novelist, born in Ossining, New York, educated at Harvard and at Oxford University; he was raised beside the Hudson River and grew up in the British West Indies. His experiences serving in the British Merchant Navy and in the Israeli Air Force find resonance in much of his fiction. Helprin has published work in the New Yorker* and the Atlantic Monthly. In his epochal A Soldier of the Great War (1991), the savagery of war is projected and interpreted prismatically through a range of characters who are affected by its physical and psychic tolls. In both his novels and his stories, Helprin confronts morally complex issues, of love, war, and death, with lyricism, charm, and fierce acuity. His other works of fiction include A Dove of the East and Other Stories (1975) and Ellis Island and Other Stories (1981); and the novels The Life and Adventures of Marshall Pearl, a Foundling (1977), Winter's Tale (1983), Swan Lake (1989), and A Memoir from the Antproff Case (1995).

HELWIG, David (1938–), Canadian writer, born in Toronto, educated at the Universities of Toronto and Liverpool. Helwig first attracted attention as a poet whose work moved between domestic themes and a concern with violent, anti-social behaviour. His long poem Atlantic Crossings (1974) offers an individual perspective on Canadian history through an examination of four archetypal journeys to the Americas. A Book of the Hours (1979) is centred on the figure of the scholar Thomas Bullfinch. His many other volumes of verse include The Sign of the Gunman (1969), The Best Name of Silence (1972), and The Hundred Old Names (1988). Helwig's best-known fictional work is a tetralogy of novels set in Kingston: The Glass Knight (1976), Jennifer (1979), It Is Always Summer (1982), and A Sound of Laughter (1983). These deal with the complexities of supposedly ordinary lives and, like his later novel The Only Son (1984), are notable for their perceptive rendition of gender relations. His other fiction includes The Streets of Summer (1969), The Day before Tomorrow (1971), The King's Evil (1981), The Bishop (1986), A Postcard from Rome (1988), Old Wars (1989), a spy story, and Of Desire (1990). Helwig has worked as literary manager of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television and has written several radio plays, including You Can't Hear What I'm Saying (1978), Moving In (1980), and Everybody Has Something To Hide (1983).

HEMINGWAY, Ernest (Miller) (1899–1961), American novelist and short-story writer, born in Oak Park, Illinois. Whilst refusing to become a doctor like his father, Hemingway nevertheless took to his father's love of outdoor pursuits. After an education in various public schools, he began work as a reporter on the Kansas City Star, where he received a valuable vocational training. He volunteered as an ambulance driver in the First World War, seeing action in Italy before being wounded in 1918 on the Austro-Italian front. After a brief return home, he became the Toronto Star's foreign correspondent in Paris. Here he moved with a large number of other expatriate writers and artists, including Gertrude *Stein, F. Scott *Fitzgerald, Ford Madox *Ford, and Ezra *Pound (see LOST GENERATION, THE). With their encouragement, he published Three Stories and Ten Poems (1923) in Paris; and then his first collection of stories in New York, In Our Time (1925), which attracted critical acclaim for the objective, understated style which was to become so famous. Returning to New York, with the help of Sherwood *Anderson he published a little-known satirical work, The Torrents of Spring (1926). From Gertrude Stein he also acquired the epigraph for his first novel, *The Sun Also Rises (1926; UK title, Fiesta, 1927) which narrates the journey of a group of aimless Paris-based American expatriates to Pamplona for the bullfights. The 'lost generation' of the epigraph are conjured up in almost biographical detail in this work, which balances preoccupations of sexuality and power with the developing sparse and yet resonant use of language which was to characterize the subsequent works. He returned to war in his second novel, *A Farewell to Arms (1929); Hemingway's commitment to his craft is indicated by the number of versions which exist of the closing paragraphs of this work as he strove for a precision in language. For the next fifteen years this technique steadily tightened, as displayed in short story collections Men Without Women (1927) and Winner Take Nothing (1933), an account of big-game hunting in Green Hills of Africa (1935), and the novel To Have and Have Not (1937), set in and near Key West during the Depression era. Throughout his life, Hemingway energetically pursued personal adventure and enjoyment; his increasing interest in bullfighting resulted in Death in the Afternoon (1932), where the fight is perceived more as a tragic ritual than a sport. Hemingway raised money for the Spanish Loyalists against Franco's uprising and wrote a play, The Fifth Column (1935), set in besieged Madrid; this was later published in The Fifth Column and the First Forty-Nine Stories (1938), which included the famous short stories 'The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber' and 'The Snows of Kilimanjaro'. His largest novel, For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940), was also based on an incident during the Spanish Civil War and is clearly sympathetic to the Loyalist cause. After being actively involved with counter-espionage exploits during the Second World War, his next novel, Across the River and Into the Trees (1950), about an army officer who dies whilst in Venice, was a disappointment. He restored his reputation with *The Old Man and the Sea (1952; Pulitzer Prize), and won the Nobel Prize in 1954. The last years of his life produced no new major work and the inexorable deterioration of his physical and mental health ended when he took his own life. Since his death several posthumous works have been published, including A Moveable Feast (1964), an often scurrilous collection of anecdotes about his apprentice years in Paris; the novels Islands in the Stream (1970), three related stories of his memories of life in the Caribbean and Cuba, and The Garden of Eden (1987); and another bullfighting work, The Dangerous Summer (1985). In addition he produced a considerable quantity of journalism and poetry, the latter posthumously edited as Eighty-Eight Poems (1979). An authoritative biography entitled Ernest Hemingway: A Life Story, by Carlos Baker, was published in 1969.

HENDERSON, Hamish (1919–), Scottish poet, born in Blairgowrie, Perthshire, educated at Downing College, Cambridge. After serving in North Africa in the Second World War, he became a lecturer at the University of Edinburgh in 1951. Elegies for the Dead in Cyrenaica (1948), his best-known work, is recognized as one of the major poetic testimonies to emerge from the Second World War; its eleven sections constitute a sustained meditation on the war's moral ambivalence and the distortions of human values that make such conflicts possible. All aspects of Henderson's experiences as a soldier, from the raging height of battle to the minutiae of commonplace tedium, are presented in verse forms indebted to the modernist examples of T. S. *Eliot and Hugh *MacDiarmid. Henderson is also highly regarded as a folklorist and songwriter; some of his songs may be found in his edition of Ballads of World War II Collected by Seumas Mor Maceanruig (1947). His Collected Essays appeared in 1990. See also WAR POETRY.

Henderson the Rain King, a novel by Saul *Bellow, published in 1959. The novel opens with Eugene Henderson, a New England millionaire playboy in a state of torment despite his prosperous background, explaining the abandonment of his fortune due to his embroilment in social, domestic, and personal problems. The novel depicts a desperate hero in a world where the dissolution of the family and other economic factors have enforced an increased isolation of the individual in an overwhelmed existence, but which causes agony and comedy simultaneously. Henderson journeys to Africa on an impulse, yearning for some new forms of satisfaction, and drifts off the beaten track. With Romilayu his guide, he causes a disastrous mishap in trying to help an African village cleanse its water supply, leaving in disgrace. He reaches another village where he befriends the local chief Dahfu, and is declared Sungo the official rainmaker after 'causing' a deluge by moving the goddess of the clouds. Henderson becomes involved in the tribal rites of the chief's succession, becoming the chief after Dahfu's death. Fearing for their safety, Henderson and Romilayu escape from the village, and Henderson returns home having successfully brought new horizons to his life.

HENDRIKS, A(rthur) L(emière) (1922–), Jamaican poet, born in Kingston, Jamaica, educated at Jamaica College and Ottershaw College, Surrey. After working as General Manager of the Jamaica Broadcasting Company he became a television director in London. He became a freelance writer in 1971. His early collections of verse, which include On This Mountain (1965) and These Green Islands (1971), made use of rigorously economical forms to frame their imaginative commentaries on a wide range of personal and social concerns. The long title sequence of The Islanders (1983), a vivid evocation of the human and natural aspects of the Caribbean, marked the emergence of more musically flexible modes of verse. His principal subsequent collections are The Naked Ghost (1984) and To Speak Simply (1988), a selected edition of his poetry containing much previously uncollected material. Much of his best work from the early 1980s onward achieves striking dramatic effectiveness through his accomplished use of Jamaican patois. Among his other publications is the historical survey Great Families of Jamaica (1984).

HENDRY, J(ames) F(indlay) (1912–86), British poet, born in Glasgow, educated at the Universities of Paris and Glasgow. After military service from 1939 to 1946, he worked as a translator and became Professor of Modern Languages at Laurentian University, Ontario, in 1965. He edited *The New Apocalypse (1939), an anthology of poetry, stories, and criticism announcing the identically named literary movement, which was sustained by two further anthologies, The White Horseman (1941) and The Crown and the Sickle (1944), jointly edited by Hendry and Henry *Treece. The Bombed Happiness (1942) was his first collection of verse, which contained numerous powerfully imaginative treatments of warfare. A further volume, The Orchestral Mountain (1943), was followed by a long hiatus in his career as a publishing poet, which resumed with Marimarusa (1978) and A World Alien (1980). These displayed his interest in the more purely musical aspects of poetic technique. His other works include the novel Fernie Brae (1949), which is explicitly modelled on Joyce's Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man*, a biography of Rilke entitled The Sacred Threshold (1983), and his edition of The Penguin Book of Scottish Short Stories (1970).

HENLEY, Beth (1952–), American dramatist, born in Mississippi, educated at Southern Methodist University and the University of Illinois. Henley achieved instant success with her first full-length play, Crimes of the Heart (1978; Pulitzer Prize), which was first performed by the Actors' Theatre of Louisville, Kentucky; a tale of three distressed sisters in a Mississippi family down on its luck, the play is clearly influenced by Chekhov though the oral tradition of Southern story-telling is equally resonant. Her other plays include The Miss Firecracker Contest (1981), The Wake of Jamey Foster (1982), The Lucky Spot (1986), The Debutante Ball (1987), Abundance (1989), and Control Freaks (1992). She wrote the book for a 1940s musical, Parade (1975), and the screenplay for Bruce Beresford's 1986 film version of Crimes of the Heart starring Diane Keaton, Jessica Lange, and Sissy Spacek. At her best, Henley manages an adroit fusion of comedy and pathos in her depiction of characters caught irresolutely in a world apparently determined to blight their lives.

HENRI, Adrian (Maurice) (1932–), British poet and painter, born in Birkenhead. He settled in Liverpool in 1957 where he, Roger *McGough, and Brian *Patten became prominent as The *Liverpool Poets in the 1960s and 1970s. His poetry was influenced at various times by popular and rock music (from 1967 to 1970 he was the leader of the poetry/rock group 'The Liverpool Scene'), American beat culture and jazz, and absurdist and other art and literature movements: in the 1960s he did much to familiarize British audiences with the works of French eccentric Alfred Jarry. His poetry is eclectic in style, influenced by the 'cut-ups' of William *Burroughs, but consistently returns to sequences of fragmentary observations often provocatively juxtaposed. The joys and tribulations of love are a recurring theme, but expressed more in the imagery of pop music than in either the lyricism of Patten or the irony of McGough. The Mersey Sound anthology (1967) established him as a poet. By 1983, and the sequel New Volume, McGough and Patten had left Liverpool. Henri's output since the 1960s is prolific. It includes fiction (I Want, with Nell *Dunn, 1972); verse and prose for children (Eric the Punk Cat, 1987; Rhinestone Rhino, 1989); Box and Other Poems (1990) for teenagers; and several plays for stage and television including The Wakefield Mysteries (1988). Henri's published work can be *confessional and personal in tone, as in the collection Autobiography (1971) and the elegiac Wish You Were Here (1990). Collected Poems appeared in 1986, and Not Fading Away: Poems 1989–1994 in 1994.

HENRY, O., pseudonym of William Sidney PORTER (1862–1910), American short-story writer, born in Greensboro, North Carolina. Following his mother's death in his early childhood, he was brought up by his grandmother and aunt, before going to Texas at the age of 19. After a series of jobs, he began a newspaper called The Rolling Stone in 1894, which embraced political satire, ethnic humour, and parody of small-town life. The paper collapsed after a year and he was tried for embezzlement; after having skipped jail and gone into exile in Honduras, he returned and was sentenced for five years in 1897. Whilst in Ohio Penitentiary, he began writing stories under a variety of pen-names before he settled on O. Henry. After prison he moved to New York City, where his stories appeared in various well-known magazines. In 1904 he published his first book of stories about Honduras, entitled Cabbages and Kings; this was followed by stories about New York, The Four Million (1906). With his reputation now established, there followed a stream of collections: Heart of the West (1907); The Gentle Grafter (1908); The Voice of the City (1908); Options (1909); Roads of Destiny (1909); Strictly Business (1910); Whirligig (1910); Sixes and Sevens (1911); Stones (1912); Waifs and Strays (1917); O. Henryana (1920). Despite his contrived endings, sentimentality, and repetition, his famous stories such as 'The Furnished Room', 'Mammon and the Archer', and 'The Gift of the Magi' demonstrate a keen eye for detail, and a sympathy for the underdog. Various other posthumous publications appeared including Postscripts (1923), O. Henry Encore: Stories and Illustrations (1939), The Complete Works of O. Henry (1953), and the Collected Stories of O. Henry (1979). His name has been appropriated for the American annual short story prize.

HERBERT, A(lan) P(atrick) (1890–1971), British writer, born in Surrey, educated at New College, Oxford. Herbert drew on his First World War experiences in The Secret Battle (1919), and satirized the legal system in Misleading Cases in the Common Law (1929), a collection of mock law reports. An urbane writer, a leading contributor to Punch, he also campaigned for several causes; one of these was reform of divorce law which resulted in a novel, Holy Deadlock (1934), and the Matrimonial Causes Bill, which became law in 1938. Independent Member (1950) reflects his experience as an Independent Member of Parliament for Oxford (1935–50). An affection for rivers and boats is evident in his libretto for Riverside Nights (1926) and in his best-known novel, The Water Gypsies (1930). Other works include A Book of Ballads; Being the Collected Light Verse of APH (1931; revised edition 1949) and APH: My Life and Times (1970), his memoirs. He was knighted in 1945.

HERBERT, Frank (Patrick) (1920–86), American *science fiction writer, born and educated in the Pacific Northwest. From the publication of Dune (1965; later filmed), public perception of his career was dominated by this vast novel and its sequels, Dune Messiah (1969), Children of Dune (1976), God-Emperor of Dune (1981), Heretics of Dune (1984), and Chapter House Dune (1985). Over the course of the sequence, the desert planet Dune with its stern society becomes a venue for complex speculations about ecology, kingship, biology, godhood, and the nature of human societies. Some of his later work, such as Hellstrom's Hive (1973) and The White Plague (1982), expansively expressed biological and ecological concerns. Throughout his career Herbert succeeded in combining modern intellectual disciplines with the fertile plot-patterns of science fiction. See also SPACE OPERA.

HERBERT, James (1943–), British writer of horror fiction, born in London, educated at Hornsey College of Art. He worked in advertising from 1963 to 1977, when he became a full-time writer. The Rats (1974), his highly successful first novel, is a dystopian fantasy rooted in his childhood familiarity with parts of London devastated by wartime bombings. The city also provides the background for The Fog (1975), The Dark (1980), and Domain (1984). Herbert's appeal as the best-selling contemporary British horror writer draws on his ability to base the grotesquely imaginative elements of his work in narratives reflecting aspects of common experience. Much of his writing features specifically English settings and idioms; James Herbert's Dark Places (1993) records the locations and legends informing his work. His other novels include Fluke (1977), The Jonah (1981), The Magic Cottage (1986), Portent (1992), and The Ghosts of Sleath (1994).

HERBERT, Xavier (1901–84), Australian novelist, born in Port Hedland, Western Australia. After working in a pharmacy and studying medicine in Melbourne he led a varied existence in Australia, the Pacific, and Britain. His novel Capricornia (1938) was a vivid portrait of the Northern Territory; completed in 1932, it was an indictment of white Australians' abuse of land and of the Aboriginal peoples from the 1880s to the 1930s, detailing in particular the difficulties experienced by half-castes. Seven Emus (1958), with its eccentric experiment in punctuation, explored similar themes. These Herbert expanded in the monumental Poor Fellow My Country (1975) with its epic treatment of the period 1936 to the late 1970s. Outstanding in both its scope and its passion, the book won considerable praise and brought Herbert national recognition. Herbert's writing early engaged issues now increasingly seen as central to contemporary Australian culture and identity, and his recognized mastery (despite spectacular lapses) of narrative and setting have assured him a place in the history of Australian writing. His other work includes Soldiers' Women (1960), about wartime Sydney; Larger than Life (1963), collected stories; and Disturbing Element (1963), an impressive autobiographical account to the year 1925. Herbert's short stories from 1925 to 1934 were edited by Russell McDougall in South of Capricornia (1991).

HERBST, Josephine (Frey) (1897–1969), American novelist, born in Sioux City, Iowa, educated at the University of California at Berkeley. Herbst worked in New York as an editorial reader for the influential literary magazines Smart Set and The American Mercury*, and lived for three years in Europe. In 1925 she married the left-wing writer John Herrmann (they were divorced in 1940) and in the early years of the Depression she became an increasingly visible figure on the American literary left. Her first two published novels, Nothing is Sacred (1928) and Money for Love (1929), were influenced by her years of European expatriation. Her best-known work, the trilogy comprising Pity Is Not Enough (1933), The Executioner Waits (1934), and Rope of Gold (1939), traces the story of the Trexler family through eight decades of American history, beginning in 1868 and ending with the sit-down strikes of 1937. Much of the trilogy is concerned with the growth of union organizations and the emerging class antagonisms of the Depression years. Herbst was also a notable journalist: she was a special correspondent for the New York Post in Germany in 1935, went to Cuba in the same year, and covered the Spanish Civil War in 1937. Her other novels of note are Satan's Sergeants (1941) and Somewhere the Tempest Fell (1947); her non-fiction writings include The Unknown Americas (1939), a socio-economic study of Latin America, and New Green World (1954), a biography of the naturalist John Bartram. Elinor Langer's Josephine Herbst: The Story She Could Never Tell (1985) is an invaluable biography. See also PROLETARIAN LITERATURE IN THE USA.

HERGESHEIMER, Joseph (1880–1954), American novelist, born in Philadelphia, educated at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts in Philadelphia. He studied art in Italy before writing his first novel, The Lay Anthony (1914), and between 1915 and 1938 he was a regular contributor to The Saturday Evening Post. His early novels were historical romances, often with an exotic setting as, for example, in Java Head (1919), but later works explore the manners and milieu of America in the 1920s in a way that bears comparison with the novels of F. Scott *Fitzgerald. Linda Condon (1919) and Cytherea (1922), the latter probably his best-known novel, survey the post-war world with a combination of ironic detachment and an extravagant, almost luxuriant, style. Alfred *Kazin labelled Hergesheimer an 'exquisite', while Clifton Fadiman spoke of him as 'the Sargent of the modern American novel', thus capturing perfectly the attention to detail and colour in his prose. He was elected to the American Academy in 1921 but by the early 1930s was something of a figure of fun for an increasingly earnest, left-wing intelligentsia. He wrote two volumes of autobiography, notably The Presbyterian Child (1923), several works of non-fiction, and a screenplay, Flower of Night (1925). An interesting study is Hergesheimer (1921) by James Branch *Cabell.

Hermeneutics is the study of the art of interpretation, evolved as a separate object of interest through German theology and philosophy towards the end of the nineteenth century. The leading figure in this movement was Wilhelm Dilthey (1833–1911); distinguished later theorists are Paul Ricoeur and Hans Georg Gadamer, and Frank *Kermode makes a subtle contribution to the debate in The Genesis of Secrecy (1979). Interpretation has many meanings and occasions, but it also has recurring features which can be described and explored; it seeks to adjust texts to the needs of their readers, to build bridges, for example, between the communities of the Gospels and later communities wishing to lead their lives in accordance with Gospel precepts. Hermeneutics characteristically addresses questions about where interpretation starts, what assumptions it makes, and which assumptions are indispensable. More recently, through the work of Roland Barthes and others—in S/Z (1970) Barthes identifies a 'hermeneutic code' in narrative, a strand which involves the ravelling and unravelling of an enigma—'hermeneutic' has come to designate the practice of deriving meaning from a text, as distinct from, say, studying its origins or its rhetoric. HERRICK, Robert (Welch) (1868–1938), American novelist and educator, born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, educated at Harvard. Among several academic posts he was Professor of English at the University of Chicago from 1905 to 1923. He published his first book, Literary Love Letters and Other Stories, in 1897, but it was his third work, The Gospel of Freedom (1898), which revealed Herrick's strengths as a progressive critic of commercial and materialistic society, notably of Chicago, and which established his intellectual kinship with other social realists such as Theodore *Dreiser and Frank *Norris. In The Web of Life (1900) the protagonist, a doctor, is tempted by the financial advantages offered to him as a society physician, but rejects them and refuses the hand of a capitalist's daughter until she renounces her inheritance. The Memoirs of an American Citizen (1905) follows the career of a Chicago meat-packer who rises to a position of great financial and political power. Of his later novels, Together (1908), One Woman's Life (1913), and The End of Desire (1932) are of interest for their treatment of modern marriage, sexual liberation, and feminism. His 1914 essay 'The Background of the American Novel' is an important document in the history of American literary realism. Blake Nevius's Robert Herrick: The Development of a Novelist (1962) is a critical study.

HERSEY, John (Richard) (1914–), American writer, born in China, educated at Yale. He rose to fame through his Second World War reportage, most notably with Hiroshima (1946), an intense humanitarian analysis of the dropping of the first nuclear bomb; its initial publication occupied a whole issue of *The New Yorker. Novels such as A Bell for Adano (1944; Pulitzer Prize) and The Wall (1950) are near-apocalyptic visions of the world during the 1940s. Some of his later work is *science fiction; The Child Buyer (1960) is a dystopian satire on government and commerce, while White Lotus (1965), set in an alternative reality, posits a world dominated by China. Both books show a disappointed response to modern America.

Herzog, a novel by Saul *Bellow, published in 1964. Moses Elkanah Herzog, a frustrated moderately successful university lecturer on the brink of divorce from Madeleine, his attractive yet destructive second wife, reaches a point of near insanity and neurosis. In an effort to explore his failure to be happy, he bombards his friends, his family, even famous people dead and alive like Napoleon, the American President, and Spinoza (with whom Herzog closely identifies), with a stream of letters on current public issues. Feeling that he is trapped as a 'prisoner of perception, a compulsory witness', he negotiates with a changing self-image which centres particularly on his Jewish heritage. Having been totally assimilated into Western Christian culture, the disintegration of his life causes Herzog to reconsider his present existence in relation to his past tradition. Labouring under the illusion that Madeleine and her lover are mistreating his daughter, Herzog rushes to Chicago determined to murder his ex-wife. Frustrated in his plans, he returns to New England and lapses into a pervading and satisfactory quietness based on silence towards the issues of the day, the novel closing with the words, 'At this time he had no messages for anyone. Nothing. Not a single word.'

HEWETT, Dorothy (1923–), Australian playwright and poet, born and brought up on an isolated farm in Western Australia, educated at the University of Western Australia. Her experience working in factories in Sydney provided material for her only novel Bobbin Up (1959). She had published some early poems in Meanjin* and subsequently produced several collections including Windmill Country (1968), Rapunzel in Suburbia (1975), Greenhouse (1979), Journeys (1982), and Alice in Wormland (1987). Frequently *confessional and romantic in tone, she also makes use of humour and a variety of verse forms to create poems which directly engage with themes of ideology, sexuality, ageing, and personal experience. Her first play, This Old Man Comes Rolling Home (perf. 1967; pub. 1976), is about working-class life in a poor suburb of Sydney. Other plays include The Chapel Perilous (perf. 1971; pub. 1972), Bon-Bons and Roses for Dolly (perf. 1972; pub. 1976), The Golden Oldies (1976), The Tatty Hollow Story (perf. 1974; pub. 1976), The Man from Mukinupin (1979), The Fields of Heaven (1983), and Golden Valley (1985). Wild Card: An Autobiography 1923–1958 (1990) displays much of the vigour of her drama and verse.

HEWITT, John (Harold) (1907–87), Northern Irish poet, born in Belfast, where he was educated at Queen's University. In 1930 he began working in Belfast Museum and Art Gallery and was for many years Art Director of the Herbert Art Gallery and Museum, Coventry. Conacre (1941) and No Rebel Word (1948) established the rationally discursive manner of his best-known verse, which makes accomplished use of rhymed traditional forms. His numerous further collections include Collected Poems (1966), Out of My Time (1974), The Rain Dance (1978), and a volume of autobiographical verse entitled Kites in Spring (1980). His poetry, in which Seamus *Heaney discerned an 'Augustan poise married to an inward elegiac note', recurrently displays his concern with the historical and cultural identity of Northern Ireland's Protestant communities. Among his prose writings, selections from which make up Ancestral Voices (edited by Tom Clyde, 1987), are numerous essays advancing regionalism as a viable solution to the divisions within Ulster. Hewitt's work provided an important precedent for the emergence of *Ulster poetry in the 1960s. The Collected Poems of John Hewitt (1991) were edited by Frank *Ormsby.

HEWLETT, Maurice (Henry) (1861–1923), English novelist, poet, and essayist, born in Kent. He was called to the Bar but never practised, and during 1897–1900 he was Keeper of Land Revenue Records. Instant success came with his first novel, The Forest Lovers (1898), a historical romance set in medieval England. He wrote numerous other historical novels and romances including Richard Yea-and-Nay (1900), about Richard the Lionheart; The Queen's Quair (1904), about Mary, Queen of Scots; Gudrid the Fair (1918), about the Viking discovery of North America; and Mainwaring (1921). His comic novels about modern life in which a wandering scholar, John Maxwell Senhouse, features prominently include Halfway House (1908), Open Country (1909), and Rest Harrow (1910). Hewlett is now particularly remembered for The Song of the Plow (1910), a long narrative poem about the plight of the agricultural labourer from the Norman Conquest onwards. Hugh *Walpole observed that 'it was as a poet that he made in his last years his passionate declarations of belief in the English peasantry as the only hope for England'. Wiltshire Essays (1921), Extempore Essays (1922), and the posthumous Last Essays (1924) display his often leisurely style to advantage. The Letters of Maurice Hewlett (1926) were edited by Laurence *Binyon.

HEYER, Georgette (1902–74), British writer of historical novels and detective stories, born in London. A best-selling author for more than fifty years, she was an expert on the Regency period, owning a reference library of more than 1,000 books on all aspects of its history. The most popular of her Regency romances include Devil's Cub (1934), Regency Buck (1935), Faro's Daughter (1941), Venetia (1958), and Lady of Quality (1972), which were written with considerable charm and humour. Interspersed were historical novels of other periods, such as The Conqueror (1925), Simon the Coldheart (1925), and Royal Escape (1938). Her fifty-seventh novel, My Lord John (1975) about John, Duke of Bedford, brother to Henry V, was unfinished and unrevised at her death. See Daphne du Maurier (1993) by Margaret *Forster. See also ROMANTIC FICTION.

HEYWARD, DuBose (1885–1940), American novelist, dramatist, and poet, born in Charleston, South Carolina. He was an insurance salesman before his great success with Porgy (1925); its fatalistic story of a beggar driven to murder is set among a community of African-Americans in a ghetto area of Charleston immortalized as Catfish Row. In 1927 Heyward and his wife, Dorothy, collaborated on a popular dramatic version which won the Pulitzer Prize, and was published in 1928; Porgy and Bess (1935), the famous musical version of the novel, was composed by George Gershwin. Mamba's Daughters (1929) deals with an African-American family, its members struggling for economic betterment over three generations; a dramatized version, again in collaboration with his wife, was produced in 1939. Other novels include Peter Ashley (1932), a Civil War saga; and Star Spangled Virgin (1939), set in the Virgin Islands and notable for its scepticism about New Deal attempts to better the lot of African-Americans. His poems, steeped in Southern folklore, and exploring similar terrain to the novels, have been collected in Carolina Chansons (1922), Skylines and Horizons (1924), and Jasbo Brown (1931). See Frank Durham, Heyward, the Man who Wrote Porgy (1965).

HIBBERD, Jack (1940–), Australian playwright and novelist, born in Victoria, educated at the University of Melbourne. He became a leading figure in the alternative theatre of the 1960s, writing and directing plays for the Australian Performing Group at La Mama. The new 'rough-theatre' made energetic use of vernacular idiom, social satire, audience participation, and declining censorship; his introduction to Three Popular Plays (1976) describes his approach to popular drama. Early plays, such as White with Wire Wheels (perf. 1967; pub. 1970), employ an abrasive direct style, frequently exploring the nature of cultural stereotypes, particularly those associated with the Australian male. Dimboola (perf. 1969; pub. 1974) satirizes the behaviour of Australians at a wedding. A Stretch of the Imagination (perf. 1971; pub. 1973) is about an old man facing death with irascible humour and courage. The Overcoat (1977) is an adaptation of Gogol's story of the same name. Other plays include The Les Darcy Show (perf. 1977), A Toast to Melba (perf. 1975), Mothballs (1980), Breakfast at the Windsor (1981), Glycerine Tears (1982), and Squibs (1984). His first novel, Memoirs of an Old Bastard (1989), is a picaresque Rabelaisian tale in which an eccentric millionaire travels to Melbourne in search of his lost daughter; The Life of Riley (1991) has a similarly picaresque, comic structure. Perdita (1992), the companion volume to his first novel, traces an abandoned girl's quest for her lost father.

HICHENS, Robert (Smythe) (1864–1950), British novelist, short-story writer, and music critic, born in Kent, educated at the Royal College of Music, London. He is best remembered for The Green Carnation (1894), a sub-Wildean novel of fashionable London society, and for the best-selling Garden of Allah (1904), a romance of the desert, set in North Africa and combining sex and religion in equal measure. It was followed by Call of the Blood (1906), a story of contemporary Edwardian life, set in Sicily and North Africa, and by another novel displaying a fascination with Arab life and with the mystery and romance of the desert, Bella Donna (1909), whose wicked heroine comes to a bad end in Egypt.

HICKS, Sir John (Richard) (1904–89), British economist, born in Warwick, educated at Balliol College, Oxford. He became Professor of Economics and a Fellow of All Souls, received the Nobel Prize for Economics (1972), and was knighted in 1964. Value and Capital (1939), his greatest theoretical work, presented the first sophisticated approach to the integration of micro-economics and macro-economics—though not fully taken up by the economics profession until after the war, its arguments now underpin much of modern macro-economic thinking. Hicks was also the inventor of the so-called IS-LM interpretation of the ideas of *Keynes; its simple diagrammatic apparatus has since been adopted as the standard textbook presentation of Keynesian economics. A Theory of Economic History (1969) is probably his most accessible work; in it, the development of markets, their increasing sophistication and pervasiveness, is taken to be effectively synonymous with progress and improvement. He published an essay diagnosing what he called The Crisis in Keynesian Economics (1974); and a short book on economic methodology under the title Causality in Economics (1979).

HIGGINS, Aidan (1927–), Irish novelist and short-story writer, born in Celbridge, Co. Kildare, educated at Clongowes Wood College. After various jobs, he toured Europe and then Southern Africa with a puppet theatre company. He has lived in Spain, Germany, England, and, more recently, Ireland. Higgins belongs to that significant minority of Irish writers, such as *Joyce and *Beckett, who have been prepared to experiment. His first collection of short stories, Felo de Se (1961; revised and retitled, Asylum and Other Stories, 1978), attempts to avoid the provincial realism of Sean *O'Faolain and Frank *O'Connor by moving in setting from Ireland to Europe and developing a more continental complexity. This contradiction between the insular and the worldly is central to much of Higgins's work and most evident in his first novel, Langrishe, Go Down (1966); an avant-garde exercise in nostalgia, the novel experiments with the 'Big House' of Anglo-Irish fiction while being reluctant to undermine its prevalence. His next novel, Balcony of Europe (1972), is a long, solipsistic first-person narrative which begins and ends in Ireland but is mainly set in Andalusia and focuses on an adulterous affair between Dan Ruttle, an Irish artist, and Charlotte Bayless, an American Jewess; in this experimental work Higgins uses quotations from *Yeats, Joycean symbolism, and a narrative technique of repetition and grammatical manipulation, reminiscent of Beckett. In Scenes from a Receding Past (1977), Dan Ruttle and characters from his earlier fiction reappear. Higgins combines a modern artistry with a talent for the more traditional techniques of character and recollection in Bornholm Night-Ferry (1983). By contrast, Lions of Grünewald (1993) is a picaresque novel about an Irish professor's lavishly funded sabbatical in Berlin in the late 1980s prior to the reunification of Germany. Higgins's other works include Helsingør Station and Other Departures (1989), a volume of short stories; Ronda Gorge and Other Precipices (1989), a travel work; and Donkey's Years: Memoirs of a Life as a Story Told (1995), an autobiographical work.

HIGGINS, Brian (1930–65), British poet, born in Batley, Yorkshire, educated at the University of Hull. During the 1950s and early 1960s he travelled extensively in Europe and worked in various capacities, including as an aero-elastician, railway clerk, and schoolteacher. Prior to his unexpected death in 1965, he was increasingly productive as a freelance literary journalist. His first collection of poetry, The Only Need (1960), was followed by two further volumes, Notes while Travelling (1964) and The Northern Fiddler (1966). Higgins's work characteristically displays a depth of innate technical ability which enabled him to combine fluent use of rhyme and metre with great colloquial vigour. While his weaker writing might be described as 'the higher doggerel', the majority of his poems are distinguished by anarchic imaginative energies and a penetratingly lucid intelligence. Thematically, his work drew repeatedly on his personal experiences, which he adapted to a range of treatments, including ironic social commentaries and idiosyncratic metaphysical or lyric modes. Though largely neglected latterly, his poems were widely admired and featured in numerous influential anthologies, including The Faber Book of Twentieth Century Verse (edited by David Wright and John *Heath-Stubbs, 1965).

HIGGINS, F(rederick) R(obert) (1896–1941), Irish poet, born at Foxford, County Mayo, he became a clerk for a builders' merchant at the age of 14 and was subsequently active as an official in the emergent Irish trades union movement. The fervent interest in the Irish folk tradition that runs throughout his work is evident in his early collection Island Blood (1925), though the conventional lyricism of the poems lacks the more imaginative qualities apparent in The Dark Breed (1927); with its emphatic sense of the relation between the localities of the far west of Ireland and the essentials of national identity, this volume secured Higgins's reputation among the generation succeeding the writers of the *Irish Revival. Arable Holdings (1933) displayed an accomplished use of the assonantal traditions of Gaelic poetry as Higgins's preoccupation with the purely musical aspects of his writing increased. In 1935 he met *Yeats, who sought his assistance in editing material for the Cuala Press, appointed him a director of the *Abbey Theatre, and generally extended the approval that made Higgins his chief protégé in Ireland during the two years between Yeats's death and his own. In The Gap of Brightness (1941), his last and most widely acclaimed collection, Higgins's style is at its most refined.

HIGGINS, George V(incent) (1939–), American lawyer and crime writer, born in Brocton, Massachusetts, educated at Stanford University and Boston Law School. A former newspaper reporter and Boston district attorney, Higgins has used his knowledge of criminal life, law, and local politics to good effect in a series of critically acclaimed and successful novels set in and around Boston whose characters, for the most part, come from the Boston Irish. The first of these, The Friends of Eddie Coyle (1972), is wholly original: the narration is carried forward almost completely through conversation and monologue, rich in colloquial and criminal expressions, and which imitate, almost exaggeratedly, the repetitions and hesitations of everyday speech. Higgins continued in the same vein with The Digger's Game (1973), Coogan's Trade (1974), and The Judgement of Deke Hunter (1976). In A Year or So with Edgar (1979), Kennedy for the Defense (1980), A Choice of Enemies (1984), and Penance for Jerry Kennedy (1985), Higgins explored individual lives in the police, the press, the law, and the judiciary. He returned to low-life in Impostors (1986), Outlaws (1987), and Wonderful Years, Wonderful Years (1988), where a whole complex of issues surrounding personal and political integrity are uncovered with precision and scepticism. More recently, with works such as Trust (1989), which explores the multiple mendacities and deceptions of an ex-jailbird turned used car salesman, Higgins appears to have moved away from the crime novel to depict a section of contemporary American life frequently seen in the novels of *dirty realist writers such as Richard *Ford or Raymond *Carver.

HIGHSMITH, (Mary) Patricia, née Plangman (1921–95), American writer of mixed German and English-Scots parentage, born in Fort Worth, Texas, educated at Barnard College, New York. Her first crime novel, Strangers on a Train (1950; filmed by Alfred Hitchcock, 1951) was an immediate success, and was followed by a number of novels and short stories which are hard to categorize, but which usually involve crime; often based on a sensational idea, they are subtle psychological studies of weak characters attracted by violence, or of couples linked together by the idea of crime. Her heroes are often criminals, whom she sees as free individuals, able to escape the constraints of society: 'Criminals are dramatically interesting, because for a time at least they are active, free in spirit, and they do not knuckle down to anyone', she wrote. Her best-known character of this type, portrayed with a distinctive black humour, is the seemingly charming but completely amoral young American Tom Ripley, like the author, resident in France, who appeared first in The Talented Mr Ripley (1955; filmed by René Clement as Plein Soleil with Alain Delon, 1959; UK titles Purple Noon and Lust for Evil) and later in Ripley Under Ground (1970), Ripley's Game (1974), and The Boy who Followed Ripley (1980). Among her other works, not all of which are crime novels, are The Blunderer (1954; also published in the USA as Lament for a Lover), Deep Water (1957), The Two Faces of January (1964), The Glass Cell (1964), The Story-Teller (1965; UK title A Suspension of Mercy), The Tremor of Forgery (1969), Edith's Diary (1977), and People Who Knock on the Door (1983). Her last novel, Small g: A Summer Idyll (1995), is, as the title suggests, optimistic in mood and very unlike her previous work. Collections of short stories include The Snail Watcher and Other Stories (1970; UK title Eleven), Slowly, Slowly in the Wind (1979), and The Black House (1981). Critically more esteemed in France and in Britain than in America, she was called by Julian *Symons 'the most important crime writer at present in practice'.

HIJUELOS, Oscar (1951–), American writer, born in New York City, the son of Cuban immigrant parents, educated at the City College of the City University of New York. He worked for several years in the advertising industry before turning to writing. In a remarkably short time, Hijuelos established an important critical reputation; some reviewers have compared him to Gabriel Garcia Marquez in his stylistic use of *magic realism as a way to merge history, myth, and the fantastic. His lyrical writings explore the immigrant experience, Cuban displacement, and the Latin American community. Hijuelos's highly acclaimed The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love (1989) won a Pulitzer Prize and was made into a successful film. His other novels include Our House in the Last World (1983), The Fourteen Sisters of Emilio Monez O'Brien (1993) and Mr Ives' Christmas (1995). See LATINO/LATINA LITERATURE IN ENGLISH.

HILL, (John Edward) Christopher (1912–), British historian, born in York, educated at Balliol College, Oxford; he became a fellow of the college in 1938 and its Master in 1965. Puritanism and Revolution (1958), Intellectual Origins of the English Revolution (1965), and The World Turned Upside Down (1972) are among the publications which established his reputation as the leading historian of the Civil War period. Hill's socialist convictions inform his writings, which encompass a broad spectrum of human experience through comprehensive attention to the political, economic, and religious dimensions of the era. Literary sources are widely used in his work; Milton and the English Revolution (1977) examines the poet's responses to the failure of the Commonwealth, while the writings of Marvell and others are surveyed in The Experience of Defeat (1984). His numerous other books include Antichrist in Seventeenth Century England (1971), A Nation of Change and Novelty (1990), the three volumes of his Collected Essays (1985–6), and The English Bible and the Seventeenth-Century Revolution (1993).

HILL, Errol (1921–), Trinidadian playwright, poet, actor, and theatre director, born in Trinidad, educated at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, London, and at the Yale School of Drama. His first version of his best-known play, Man Better Man, in vernacular prose, was first performed in Jamaica in 1957. The second version, written in calypso-inspired verse and music, was first performed in 1960. The play celebrates the legendary 'stickfighters' who fought fierce duels at carnival time, the rules of engagement for this sport, known as 'calinda', being as elaborate as those of medieval jousting. It was published in Plays for Today (1985), with a play by Derek *Walcott and another by Dennis *Scott. He has also edited the two volumes of critical essays entitled The Theatre of Black Americans (1980), an important source book of scholarship on African-American drama. His short plays, mainly comedies, include The Ping-Pong, Wey-Wey, Square Peg, Dilemma, and Oily Portraits, all published in 1966, and Dance Bongo (1972). Other books include The Trinidad Carnival: Mandate for a National Theatre (1972), and Shakespeare in Sable: A History of Black American Actors (1984).

HILL, Geoffrey (1932–), British poet, born in Bromsgrove, Worcestershire, educated at Keble College, Oxford. He taught at the University of Leeds from 1954 to 1980, when he became a university lecturer in English at Cambridge. For the Unfallen (1959), his first substantial collection of verse, displayed his virtuosity in the use of traditional forms. His preoccupations with religious and historical themes are expressed in verse of resonant grandeur in the 'Funeral Music' sequence in King Log (1968). The collection's concern with disjunctions between power and morality remains central to the prose poems of Mercian Hymns (1971); the volume's treatment of the life and times of King Offa is wittily enlivened by anachronistic intrusions of modernity into ancient Mercia. Tenebrae (1979) contains his most unequivocally religious writing in the disquietingly intense sonnets of the 'Lachrimae' sequence. The thirteen sonnets of 'An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture in England' are equally impressive for the lucidity and their complex discourse on history. The Mystery of the Charity of Charles Péguy (1983), Hill's meditation on the French author, reflects aspects of his own philosophy. His Collected Poems appeared in 1985 and 1994. His essays were collected in The Lords of Limit (1984); The Enemy's Country (1991) is a critical work on language and its contexts.

HILL, Reginald (1936–), British crime writer, born in Durham, educated at St Catherine's College, Oxford. His crime stories fall into two groups: the first, beginning with A Clubbable Woman (1970), are police novels, set against a well described Yorkshire background, in which the detectives are the ill-matched pair Superintendent Dalziel and Sergeant (later Inspector) Pascoe; the second, of which perhaps the best is The Spy's Wife (1980), are not connected with one another, and though crime stories, do not necessarily contain an element of detection. Hill has also written a series of thrillers under the pseudonym Patrick Ruell, and, in his early career, science fiction and comic historical novels.

HILL, Selima (1945–), British poet, born in London, educated at New Hall, Cambridge University. She was assistant manager of a London bookshop until 1985, when she became a freelance writer and teacher of writing in schools. Saying Hello at the Station (1984), her first collection of poems, gained wide notice for its unusually striking imagery and individual directness of tone. It was followed by My Darling Camel (1988), a collection rich in exotic elements derived from sources which include Eskimo culture and ancient Egyptian mythology. The imaginative and emotional intensity characterizing much of her work is most fully apparent in The Accumulation of Small Acts of Kindness (1989), a long sequence reflecting the experience of a young girl undergoing a period of acute psychological disturbance. The three parts of the poem make highly inventive use of altering poetic forms to reflect the fragmentation of the consciousness evoked. Subsequent collections include A Little Book of Meat (1993) and Trembling Hearts in the Bodies of Dogs: New and Selected Poems (1994).

HILL, Susan (1942–), British novelist, short-story writer, and playwright, born in Scarborough, educated at King's College, University of London. A regular reviewer and broadcaster, her reputation as a writer was established with a series of novels displaying a powerful and versatile imagination and a gift for exploring the bonds people form between themselves, particularly within families. Gentlemen and Ladies (1968) is one of the more humorous of these, in which middle-aged Hubert manages to free himself and his mother from their long dependence on one another. In A Change for the Better (1969), the newly widowed Flora Carpenter also attempts to attain independence, by contrast with the much younger Deirdre Fount, who feels stifled by her relationship with her late mother. I'm the King of the Castle (1970; Somerset Maugham Prize, 1971) is a novel told from a child's point of view about the difficult, and finally fatal, relationship of two young boys whose lives coincide when the father of one, a widower, employs as his housekeeper the widowed mother of the other. Written from a male point of view, Strange Meeting (1972) vividly recreates the atmosphere of the trenches during the First World War in a story focusing on the love between a young subaltern and a second lieutenant. The Bird of Night (1973) also depicts a friendship between men, which is marred by madness. In the Springtime of the Year (1974) deals with the nature of loss and grief, themes echoed in Hill's frighteningly effective ghost story, The Woman in Black (1983), later adapted for stage and television. After an eight-year pause appeared Air and Angels (1991), which tells the story of an eminent middle-aged cleric's obsessive love for the enigmatic and much younger Kitty. Lyrical and complex in pattern, the novel is set in both India and England. The Mist in the Mirror (1992) is another ghost story. Mrs de Winter (1993) is Hill's much-publicized sequel to *Du Maurier's Rebecca, recounting in the first person the experiences and travails of the earlier work's timid narrator. The short stories collected in The Albatross (1971), The Custodian (1972), and A Bit of Singing and Dancing (1973) reflect many of Hill's preoccupations in haunting miniature. Hill's non-fiction works include The Magic Apple Tree: A Country Year (1983) and Family (1989), both autobiographical, as well as collected essays and two illustrated books. She has also written plays for radio and television and has published several books for children.

HILLERMAN, Tony (1925–), American crime novelist, born in Sacred Heart, Oklahoma, educated among Pottawatomie and Seminole Indians and at Oklahoma State University. After distinguished war service with the US Army, he became a journalist and later taught journalism at the University of New Mexico. The main purpose of Hillerman's tales of mystery and suspense is to engage readers with the religions, cultures, and values of Navajo and Pueblo Indians. At the heart of each novel lies a conflict between the circumspect and oblique customs of Indian life and the harsh demands of modern existence. Since 1970, Hillerman has produced a series of deftly written police procedural novels set in the Navajo reservations in Arizona, featuring two members of the Navajo Tribal police. Lieutenant Joe Leaphorn stands between his original culture and its more 'sophisticated' rival, while Sergeant Jim Chee makes greater efforts to reintegrate himself into the more traditional Navajo way of life. He constantly returns to Indian beliefs and fears, with witchcraft dominating The Blessing Way (1970) and Skinwalkers (1988). The sense of loss and oppression is dramatized in A Thief of Time (1988) through the exploitation of Indian artefacts, and in Talking God (1990) Navajo life is seen as an increasingly sterile museum piece. In Dance Hall of the Dead (1973) and The Ghostway (1985) Indian dances and ceremonies are elaborately described and integrated within the plot. Sacred Clowns (1994) is a recent Leaphorn novel.

HILLYER, Robert (Silliman) (1895–1961), American poet, born in East Orange, New Jersey, educated at Harvard, where he taught from 1919 until his retirement as a professor in 1945. Sonnets and Other Lyrics (1917) and The Five Books of Youth (1920), his first two collections of verse, demonstrated the fluent accomplishment in traditional forms which characterizes his poetry. Arthur *Machen's introduction to The Halt in the Garden (1925) emphasized the neoplatonism central to Hillyer's aesthetic and philosophical preoccupation with beauty and transience. His numerous subsequent collections include In Time of Mistrust (1939), The Death of Captain Nemo (1949), a lengthy narrative poem, and The Relic (1957); Collected Verse (1933; Pulitzer Prize) was superseded by Collected Poems (1961). Hillyer's richly lyrical rural imagery and nostalgic sensibility give his verse affinities with typifying examples of *Georgian poetry. Among his other works are the novel My Heart for Hostage (1942), a semi-autobiographical evocation of Paris after the First World War, and the critical studies First Principles of Verse (1938) and In Pursuit of Poetry (1960).

HILTON, James (1900–54), British novelist, born at Leigh, Lancashire; he grew up in Walthamstow, London, and was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he produced his first novel, Catherine Herself (1920). During the 1920s he worked as a journalist in London and Dublin, writing eleven further novels, among them Storm Passage (1922) and The Dawn of Reckoning (1925), before Lost Horizon made him famous in 1933; this utopian romance of an earthly paradise in the Himalayas gave the term 'Shangri-La' to the language. Commissioned to write a story for the British Weekly, he quickly completed the work published independently as Good-Bye, Mr Chips (1934), a disarmingly sentimental account of the life and death of a schoolmaster, which was informed by Hilton's impressions of his father's career in teaching. In 1935 he was invited to Hollywood to participate in the filming of these enormously successful books and remained there for the rest of his life writing for the film industry; he received an Academy Award in 1942 for his work on the film Mrs Miniver. A number of his subsequent novels were adapted for the cinema; these include the story of an amnesiac officer returned from the First World War in Random Harvest (1941) and the narrative of a small Lancashire community in So Well Remembered (1947), which were released as films in 1942 and 1947 respectively. Other later works include Nothing So Strange (1948) and Time and Time Again (1953).

HIMES, Chester (1909–84), African-American crime writer, born in Jefferson City, Missouri, educated at Ohio State University. Convicted of armed robbery in 1926, he served seven years in Ohio State Penitentiary. In 1953 he moved to Europe and, on the suggestion of a French publisher, wrote a detective story set in Harlem. La Reine des pommes (1958; published in the USA as For Love of Imabelle, 1959; also as A Rage in Harlem) won the Grand Prix Policier in that year, and was followed by nine more 'Harlem domestic detective stories', as Himes termed them. All but one appeared originally in French, and all except two have as heroes the two black police detectives Coffin Ed Johnson and Gravedigger Jones. Written with great verve and panache, they are both exceedingly violent and exhilaratingly comic, full of grotesque characters and surreal incidents. As the series progresses, the novels, and the detectives themselves, become ever more bitter and cynical about the future of black urban life in America; in the last novel—which Himes did not write—the detectives were to have been killed trying to prevent a black revolution. Himes also wrote novels, including If He Hollers Let Him Go (1945), and two volumes of autobiography: The Quality of Hurt (1972) and My Life of Absurdity (1976).

HINDE, Thomas (1926–), pseudonym of Sir Thomas Willes CHITTY, British novelist, born in Felixstowe, Suffolk, educated at University College, Oxford. After working as a civil servant and subsequently as an executive of the Shell Company, he became a full-time author in 1960. His numerous novels include Mr Nicholas (1952), A Place Like Home (1962), Ninety Double Martinis (1963), Generally a Virgin (1972), and Daymare (1980). His fiction is noted for the originality and inventiveness of the social realist modes through which it addresses a range of urgently contemporary themes. Among his other publications are Stately Gardens of Britain (1983), the biography Capability Brown (1986), and Tales from the Pumproom (1988), a history of Bath. Sir Henry and Sons (1980) is autobiographical.

HINES, (Melvin) Barry (1939–), British novelist, born in Hyland Common, near Barnsley, the son of a miner, educated at Ecclesfield Grammar School. He played football for Barnsley, while working variously as an apprentice mining surveyor, a labourer, and a blacksmith's assistant, then attended Loughborough College of Education. Hines emerged as a writer in the wake of northern working-class novelists like *Sillitoe and *Braine, and his realism and political concerns are those of the '*angry young men'. His first novel, The Blinder (1966), considers professional football as a means of escape from working-class life. A Kestrel for a Knave (1968), better known as Kes, the title under which it was filmed and reprinted in 1974, is set in a working-class environment in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and shows a deprived young boy, Billy Casper, lavishing care on a hawk; Billy's life is developed in a series of flashbacks in which he comes constantly into conflict with authority but, in his struggle to remain himself, there is a dignity and a fragile optimism. The Gamekeeper (1975) follows the daily round of a gamekeeper, George Purse, on a ducal estate in the north of England; despite his escape from the degrading industrial world, Purse cannot escape from the web of social hierarchy and has, in his heartless pursuit of poachers and collusion with the Duke, turned against his own class. The Price of Coal (1979) is a satirical account of a Royal Visit to a colliery. Hines continues his themes of traditional working-class communities in the north of England coming to terms with change in Looks and Smiles (1981), which centres on the problems of three young people faced with poverty during the Thatcher years; Unfinished Business (1983); and The Head of It (1994).

HINOJOSA (-SMITH), Rolando (1929–), Chicano short-story writer, novelist, and poet, born in Mercedes, Texas, educated at the University of Texas, Highlands University, and the University of Illinois, Urbana. A master of humour, irony, and subtlety, Hinojosa weaves the tales of his characters with the history of his fictional Rio Grande Valley town, Klail City. The first of the Klail City death trip series, Estampas del valle y otras obras (1973), is composed of estampas/sketches and focuses on the shared traditions, language, and history of the Chicano community. The second novel in the series, Klail City y sus alrededores (1976), introduced new characters to the cultural geography of Klail City, which by now was being compared to William *Faulkner's fictional Yoknapatawpha County. Further novels in the series include The Useless Servants (1993), which uses Hinojosa's collage technique to depict Chicano life and the way it copes with the separate Anglo world. His first collection of poems, Korean Love Songs from Klail City Death Trip (1980), was based on earlier experiences while serving in Korea. Hinojosa continues to focus on the urban experience and socio-economic condition of Chicanos with Mi Querido Rafa (1981), Rites and Witnesses (1982), Partners in Crime: A Rafe Buenrostro Mystery (1985), Claros Varones de Belken (1986), and Becky and Her Friends (1988). Hinojosa was appointed Professor of English at the University of Texas, Austin. See LATINO/LATINA LITERATURE IN ENGLISH.

HIPPOLYTE, Kendel (1952–), Caribbean poet and dramatist, born in Castries, St Lucia, educated at the University of the West Indies; he teaches at St Mary's College, St Lucia, where he is closely involved as a playwright and director with the Lighthouse Theatre Company. Much of his drama is experimental and improvisational. Drum-maker, his best-known work for the stage, was published in Keith Noel's edition of Caribbean Plays for Playing (1981). The play's uncompromising use of idiomatic Caribbean language and its concern with the political context of indigenous Caribbean culture are equally characteristic of his poetry. Collections of his verse, which rejects the formal traditions of European lyric poetry in favour of the freer models provided by American *modernism, include Island in the Sun, Side Two . . . (1980), Bearings (1986), and The Labyrinth (1991). Hippolyte is the editor of the anthologies Confluence: Nine Saint Lucian Poets (1988) and So Much Poetry in We People (1990).

HIRSCH, Edward (1950–), American poet, born in Chicago, educated at Grinnell College and the University of Pennsylvania. He taught at Wayne State University from 1979 to 1982, when he became an associate professor at the University of Houston, then Professor of English there in 1988. For the Sleepwalkers (1981), his first collection of poetry, received considerable acclaim for the combination of emotional power and formal accomplishment which have remained characteristic of his verse. The collection's compassionate focus on aspects of human suffering in urban situations is sustained in Wild Gratitude (1986) and The Night Parade (1989); the latter volume makes use of more flexible verse forms for its narrative treatments of Hirsch's personal and familial background in its retrospective evocations of Chicago. Earthly Measures (1994) displays an elegiac concern with the moral and spiritual impoverishment of contemporary society's materialistic and secular culture.

HIRSCHMAN, Albert Otto (1915–), American economist, born in Berlin, educated at the Sorbonne, the London School of Economics, and the University of Trieste. An active anti-fascist in the 1930s, he fled Nazi-occupied France for the USA in 1941, subsequently holding academic posts at Yale, Columbia, Harvard, and Princeton. In The Strategy of Economic Development (1958) Hirschman first displayed that independent turn of mind which became the hallmark of his approach to economics; in discussing underdevelopment, he rejected both the solution of leaving the problem entirely to the market and also that of entrusting it to extensive state co-ordination and control of economic activity. In Exit, Voice and Loyalty (1970) the subject was individuals' responses to 'disorder' in their social lives. Starting from the simple observation that free people could either leave ('exit') or complain ('voice') in such situations, he indicated how certain conditions of the economic and political world acted either to constrain or foster these possibilities (which he thought of as basic rights). In The Passions and the Interests (1977) he turned to the history of social thought to see what he might learn about civilization and its discontents from previous arguments for and against 'capitalism'. In later years Hirschman has been preoccupied with exposing the pretensions of economists who think their science gives unambiguous answers to the questions it asks (Rival View of Market Society and Other Essays, 1986).

Historical Novel, a novel set in a specific historical period, in which some attempt at accurately describing the customs of the period has been made. Sir Walter Scott is generally recognized as the father of the modern historical novel; novels such as Rob Roy (1817), Ivanhoe (1819), Kenilworth (1821), Redgauntlet (1824) and others were widely admired and imitated by writers such as Thackeray, Dickens, George Eliot, and *Hardy, for their imaginative portrayal of actual events, using both fictional and historical characters in narratives of great power and excitement. In the 1920s and afterwards the historical romance, as exemplified by the novels of *Orczy, *Weyman, *Farnol, and *Heyer, achieved widespread popularity for their extravagant plots, dashing and colourful characters, and love of romantic incident. Other writers in this tradition included *Forester, whose Hornblower novels established a fashion for romances about warfare and male camaraderie. In the 1950s Mary *Renault set a new standard of historical accuracy with her novels of Ancient Greece and Rome, which have been widely influential. The novels of J. *Tey, R. Sutcliffe, H. *Treece, and others belong to this category of historical fiction, which is scholarly in tone and realistic, rather than romantic in style. In more recent times the appeal of the form as a mode for serious fiction has declined, but several attempts to revive it have been made by writers such as R. *Macaulay, William *Golding, Rose *Tremain, and Timothy *Mo. Its greatest following is now in the popular market.

History Man, The, see BRADBURY, MALCOLM.

History of Mr Polly, The, a novel by H. G. *Wells, published in 1910. The story of a small shopkeeper who rebels against his station in life, The History of Mr Polly is a unique mixture of social realism, romance, and vivacious and exuberant comedy. Alfred Polly is the archetypal Wellsian 'little man', an oppressed, frustrated, and highly imaginative individual who can find no outlet for his dreams and desires until he sets fire to his shop, fails to execute a carefully planned suicide attempt, and disappears to take up the life of a tramp. 'If the world does not please you, you can change it' is Wells's optimistic message. The experiences of lower-middle-class life that drive Polly to spiritual imprisonment and despair, and his adventures on the road once he has obtained his release, are portrayed with a combination of scathing social insight and Dickensian jauntiness. Polly's gift of romanticizing the drabbest and most mundane circumstances is displayed through his habit of creative malapropism and linguistic deformation, a technique in which Wells sometimes seems to anticipate *Joyce. Formally, however, this is one of the most traditional of Wells's novels, reflecting his impatience with the self-conscious craft of his more modernist contemporaries and his affection for the narrative freedoms of the eighteenth century. The book begins with Polly's chronic indigestion, with the rumblings in his stomach being viewed as a form of industrial unrest or internal civil war; leaving political symbolism behind, it ends with the hero's digestion restored after his victory in a mock-epic battle for the Potwell Inn, a homely, rural English version of the earthly paradise.

HOAGLAND, Edward (1932–), American writer, born in New York, educated at Harvard University. He has taught at several universities including Iowa and California, Davis. His first novel, Cat Man (1956), about life in the circus, was followed by others, often focusing on the struggles faced by society's outcasts. Characters whose occupations require physical strength recur in his fiction, including The Circle Home (1960), which concerns the world of boxing and a prize-fighter's failure to become a champion or to make a success of his marriage. Seven Rivers West (1986) is set in Canada during the late nineteenth century when white settlers were building the railroad in hitherto Indian territory; interwoven with descriptions of the feelings of the indigenous people and the struggles faced by the settlers are vivid evocations of the wild landscapes of the Canadian west. Hoagland is also a leading essay writer, his subjects ranging from city and country life to the natural world and ecology; his collections include The Courage of Turtles (1971), Heart's Desire: The Best of Edward Hoagland (1990), and Balancing Acts: Essays (1992). His travel books include the highly acclaimed African Calliope: A Journey to the Sudan (1979). Hoagland's compelling observations on life and his powerful narrative voice have won much critical praise.

HOAR, Stuart (1957–), New Zealand playwright, born in New Plymouth, Taranaki, educated largely in Auckland. His dramatic influences are Brecht and British dramatists such as Howard *Barker, Howard *Brenton, and Caryl *Churchill. His first full-length stage play, Squatter (1988), startled audiences and readers with its determinedly non-naturalistic exposition of a crucial moment in New Zealand history, the Liberal era of the 1890s when the Squattocracy that had commandeered enormous land holdings in Canterbury was dismantled by government reforms. Exile (1990) satirically represents the formative figures of New Zealand literature as an endlessly self-editorializing group of literati. Hoar has also written for radio, television, and film.

HOBAN, Russell (Conwell) (1925–), American novelist and children's writer, born in Pennsylvania; he settled in London in 1969. Trained as an illustrator, he worked in television and advertising before becoming a full-time writer of great originality. His first novel for adults, The Lion of Boaz-Jachin and Jachin-Boaz (1973), introduces the themes and symbols common to all his fiction, yet every one of his novels is unique in subject and approach. Jachin-Boaz and Boaz-Jachin are a father and son who rediscover one another with the aid of a comically incongruous mythic beast. Kleinzeit (1974), self-mockingly surreal, concerns an advertising copywriter sent to hospital with a slipped hypoteneuse and other mathematical complications; what really ails him (and all his companions in Ward A4) is the urge to write. Turtle Diary (1975) is, by contrast, a conventional novel with an eccentric plot about two sea turtles rescued from London Zoo. His fourth novel required a yet more radical shift. Set 2,000 years after a nuclear holocaust in what remains of Kent, Riddley Walker (1980) is narrated in truncated and wholly reinvented English by the young riddler, or priest-figure, of a primitive people puzzling over the relics of our civilization. Riddley Walker is so far the ultimate expression of Hoban's fascination with word-play and with language as both a limiting and a liberating factor in human thought. In Pilgermann (1983), which draws on the history of the Crusades for a story of Jews, Muslims, and Christians, he explores the human craving for pattern and religion. All these preoccupations are evident in his novel The Medusa Frequency (1987), the story of a writer searching for inspiration and plagued by visions of Orpheus, Eurydice, and the Medusa. Hoban has become a prolific writer of children's fiction. The Moment Under the Moment (1992) is a collection of stories, essays, and a libretto. Fremden (1996) is a *space opera.

HOBSBAUM, Philip (Dennis) (1932–), British poet and critic, born in London, educated at Downing College, Cambridge, where he studied under F. R. *Leavis, and Sheffield University, where William *Empson supervised his Ph.D. In 1962 he began his academic career at Queen's University, Belfast; in 1985 he commenced a professorship at Glasgow University. He was the founder of the *Group in 1955 and, with Edward *Lucie-Smith, edited A Group Anthology (1963). He convened a further writing group in Belfast during the 1960s, which stimulated the emergence of *Ulster poetry; Seamus *Heaney has recorded his gratitude for the 'energy, generosity, belief in the community' with which Hobsbaum encouraged him and others. His collections of poetry include The Place's Fault (1964), In Retreat (1966), Coming out Fighting (1969), and Women and Animals (1972). His work is notable for its accomplishment in combining traditional patterns of rhyme and metre with witty and conversationally candid accounts of personal experience. He also produced a number of verse satires of academic life, some of which display a Lawrentian invective against the repression of creative spontaneity he identifies in higher education. His works of criticism include the provocative Tradition and Experiment in English Poetry (1979) and A Reader's Guide to Robert Lowell (1988).

HOBSBAWM, Eric (John Ernest) (1917–), British historian, born in Alexandria, Egypt, educated at Cambridge University. Throughout his academic career he has taught at London University, where he became Professor of Economic and Social History in 1970. Primitive Rebels (1959), Labouring Men (1964), and Industry and Empire (1968) were among the publications that gained him recognition as a leading historian of the working classes. His subsequent works as a meticulous historian of British and European economic and social history include the trilogy The Age of Revolution, 1789–1848 (1962), The Age of Capital, 1848–1875 (1975), The Age of Empire, 1875–1914 (1987), and Echoes of the Marseillaise (1990), which examines how interpretations of the French Revolution have progressed over 200 years; The Age of Extremes (1994) is a work on twentieth-century history. While his writing consistently displays a socialist orientation, his willingness to challenge the traditional assumptions of the Left is clear from Politics for a Rational Left (1989), a collection of provocative essays on British society during the 1980s. His other works include The Jazz Scene (1959), published under the pseudonym 'Francis Newton'. Culture, Ideology and Politics (1983) is a festschrift for Hobsbawm edited by Raphael Smith and Gareth Stedman Jones.

Hobson's Choice, a comedy by Harold *Brighouse, performed in 1916. The best-known product of the so-called 'Manchester School' of realistic drama, this principally involves Henry Horatio Hobson, owner of a Salford shoe shop but a drinker and a drone, dependent on his three daughters for the running of his business. Maggie, the ablest and least sentimental of the three, decides to marry her father's bootmaker, Willie Mossop, and set up in business with him. Through talent and hard work, this enterprise thrives while Hobson's shop declines; and by the end Mossop and Maggie have taken benign control both of Hobson and of his business. Maggie also takes advantage of a drunken mishap involving her father to ensure that he gives her sisters permission to marry, and handsome dowries as well. Thanks mainly to Brighouse's lively characterization of the blustering, self-pitying Hobson, a role that has attracted actors of the calibre of Charles Laughton and Michael Redgrave, the play has been regularly revived throughout the twentieth century.

HODGE, Jane Aiken (1917–), British writer, born in Massachusetts, one of the daughters of Conrad *Aiken (her sister is the writer Joan *Aiken). She has written more than twenty historical novels, set mainly in the late eighteenth or early nineteenth century. Her novels often have unusual backgrounds: the American War of 1812 in Here Comes a Candle (1961); the Greek War of Independence, in which Byron died, in Greek Wedding (1970); and Georgia after the Napoleonic Wars in Savannah Purchase (1971). Shadow of a Lady (1974) touches on the life of Emma Hamilton, and Polonaise (1981) is set in Poland during Napoleon's occupation. She has also written two biographies, The Double Life of Jane Austen (1972) and The Private World of Georgette Heyer (1984).

HODGE, Merle (1944–), Caribbean novelist, born in Trinidad, educated at the University of London. She travelled widely in Europe before becoming a lecturer in French at the University of the West Indies in Jamaica. Her novel Crick Crack Monkey (1970) is set in rural Trinidad, and traces the growth of the narrator, Tee, through childhood to maturity. Close family relationships within a stable rural community exist uneasily beside a middle-class world in which feudalistic values of race, colour, and class provoke unsettling but familiar Caribbean preoccupations with issues of personal identity and cultural nationality. These preoccupations are blended with warmth and humour that suggest a vision of tempered compassion. Hodge worked for the ill-fated Bishop regime in Grenada, but returned to Trinidad after it was overthrown. Crick Crack Monkey remains a novel of vibrant social manners and gratifying optimism despite its lack of recognition outside the Caribbean.

HODGINS, Jack (1938–), Canadian novelist and short-story writer, born on Vancouver Island, educated at the University of British Columbia. Hodgin's fiction shows the influence of Latin American *magic realism, but expresses a strong sense of regional cultural identity. Like much contemporary Canadian fiction, his novel The Invention of the World (1977) dramatizes a quest for origins; employing a broad range of narrative modes, it examines the Irish roots of a Vancouver Island community, showing how its mythic inheritance has been based on the ambivalent legacy of a founder figure who has 'swindled' his people with promises of a New World Eden. However, as in his short stories, collected in Spit Delaney's Island (1976) and The Barclay Family Theatre (1981), any superficial pessimism is mitigated by a resilient vision of human potential. Other novels include The Resurrection of Joseph Bourne (1980), which explores a folk community's capacity for fabulation; The Honorary Patron (1987), in which a Vancouver Island art historian returns home from Switzerland, after an absence of forty years, as patron of an arts festival; and Innocent Cities (1990), in which an English widow visits her sister's family in Australia. Other work includes Over Forty in Broken Hill: Unusual Encounters Outback and Beyond (1992), travel writing and anecdotes of the Australian Outback, and A Passion for Narrative (1994), a discussion of fiction techniques.

HODGSON, Ralph (Edwin) (1871–1962), British poet, born in Darlington, County Durham. His life is not well documented due to the reclusiveness of his later years; he is known to have worked as a scene-painter in New York and as an illustrator in London prior to the appearance of The Last Blackbird (1907), his first collection of verse. Under the imprint of 'The Sign of the Flying Fame' he became a publisher in 1913, producing editions noted for their typographical individuality. He was acquainted with numerous leading literary figures of the period and contributed to the Georgian Poetry* series. Poems (1917) gained him a firm reputation for his ability to combine precise natural description with a visionary element reminiscent of Blake in its luminous simplicity. He became friendly with T. S. *Eliot, who addressed the fourth of his 'Five Finger Exercises' (1933) to him. In 1924 he began lecturing at Sendai University in Japan and settled on a farm near Minerva, Ohio, in 1938. No further substantial collection of his verse appeared until The Skylark and Other Poems (1958), which contained 'To Deck a Woman', the most powerful of his numerous statements against man's savage exploitation of animals. Collected Poems was published in 1961.

HODGSON, William Hope (1877–1918), British writer, born in Essex. His experience serving at sea during 1891–9 provided the material and imagery for most of his books, including the two novels The Boats of the 'Glen Carrig' (1907) and The Ghost Pirates (1909) and most of the stories collected in Men of the Deep Waters (1914) and The Luck of the Strong (1916). He is remembered for his two major supernatural novels: The House on the Borderland (1908), which conflates traditional horror story material with an apocalyptic vision of the future; and The Night Land (1912), a futuristic fantasy set in a dying Earth whose only human inhabitants huddle together in great steel 'redoubts', and who encounter fantastic creatures as they await humanity's demise. Hodgson served throughout the First World War and died at Ypres.

HOFF, Harry Summerfield, see COOPER, WILLIAM.

HOFMANN, Michael (1957–), poet, born in Freiburg, Germany, the son of Gert Hofmann, a distinguished German novelist; he grew up in England and was educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge, the University of Regensburg, and Trinity College, Cambridge. Since 1983 he has been a freelance writer, and taught creative writing at the University of Florida in 1990. Nights in the Iron Hotel (1983), his first collection of poetry, gained him notice for its tone of detached disenchantment and the restrained inventiveness of his forms and imagery. Acrimony (1986), K. S. in Lakeland: New and Selected Poems (1990), and Corona, Corona (1993) are among his subsequent collections. His understated elegance and studied flatness of manner are particularly appropriate to the treatments of disjunctive relationships in various poems. Numerous poems in Acrimony deal with his complex attitudes towards his father in a sometimes movingly direct manner. His other works include an adaptation of Brecht's The Good Person of Sichuan (1989), and translations of Kurt Tucholsky's Castle Gripsholm (1985) and Joseph Roth's The Legend of the Holy Drinker (1989).

HOGAN, Desmond (1950–), Irish writer, born in Co. Galway, educated at University College, Dublin. His first novel, The Ikon Maker (1976), was set in a remote part of Galway and depicted the obsessional relationship between a mother and son. The Leaves on Grey (1980) was a lyrical account of three friends growing up in 1950s' Dublin. This was followed by A Curious Street (1984), in which a young man remembers his father, who has died by his own hand; and A New Shirt (1986), in which the protagonist leaves his native Ireland for America and is overcome with longing for his homeland. In his poetically charged novel A Farewell to Prague (1995), Hogan uses montage, memory, and vignettes in a journey across the cities of Eastern Europe that also refers back to Ireland. Two collections of short stories, The Mourning Thief (1987) and Lebanon Lodge (1988), deal with similar themes of exile and loss, incorporating elements of Irish history and contemporary detail in a richly textured prose. The Edge of the City: A Scrapbook, 1976–1991 (1993) is a collection of travel writings.

HOGARTH, David George (1862–1927), British archaeologist and writer on the Middle East, born at Barton-on-Humber, educated at Winchester and at Magdalen College, Oxford. His early work in Asia Minor, Cyprus, Egypt, and elsewhere is described in the autobiographical Accidents of an Antiquary's Life (1910). The richly evocative descriptions of A Wandering Scholar in the Levant (1897) gained him the reputation as a travel writer which he maintained with The Nearer East (1902), The Penetration of Arabia (1904), Ionia and the East (1909), and other works. Following a period as director of the British School of Archaeology in Athens, in 1900 he returned to Oxford, where he was Keeper of the Ashmolean Museum from 1908 till his death; his acquisitions for the museum reflected his interest in the Hittite civilization, on which he produced numerous books including Hittite Seals (1920) and Kings of the Hittites (1926). In 1915 he was sent on government service to Cairo, where he assumed great influence in the determination of British policy as director of the Arab Bureau; he recruited T. E. *Lawrence, whom he had known and influenced at Oxford, into the Arabian Campaign. Among his other works are Excavations at Ephesus: The Archaic Artemisia (1908), The Ancient East (1914), and The Life of Charles M. Doughty (1928).

Hogarth Press, The, a publishing house begun in 1917 by Leonard and Virginia *Woolf with a hand-press at Hogarth House, their Richmond residence. An edition of 150 copies of their jointly written Two Stories (1917) was encouragingly received and in 1918 a list of subscribers was established. The success of Katherine *Mansfield's Prelude (1918) led to the adoption of commercial printing methods. T. S. *Eliot's Poems and Virginia Woolf's Kew Gardens followed in 1919. The subscription system having been replaced by arrangements with booksellers in 1923, the Woolfs and the press moved to Tavistock Square, London, in 1924. They became the publishers of Freud's works in English and subsequently published much important European writing in translation. Robert *Graves, C. *Day Lewis, Christopher *Isherwood, E. M. *Forster, J. M. *Keynes, Harold Laski, and H. G. *Wells were among the authors who gave the press its reputation for publishing books of the highest intellectual and literary value. John *Lehmann was part-owner from 1938 to 1946, when the press, having published 527 titles since its inception, was incorporated into Chatto and Windus. J. Howard Woolmer's A Checklist of the Hogarth Press appeared in 1986.

HOGGART, Richard (1918–), British scholar and critic, brought up in Leeds, educated at Leeds University. Among many important posts, he was Professor of English at Birmingham from 1962, deputy Director-General at UNESCO (1970–5), and warden of Goldsmiths' College, London (1976–84). His most influential work, The Uses of Literacy (1957), about his childhood and his experience of working-class culture between the wars, did much to widen interest in the study of literature, education, communications, and *popular culture. His autobiographical volumes include A Local Habitation (1988), A Sort of Clowning (1990), and An Imagined Life (1992). Other works on social questions and on literature include Auden (1951), Higher Education: Demand and Response (1969), Only Connect (1972; Reith Lectures), and English Cultural Studies (1987). His topographical work Townscape with Figures: Farnham, Portrait of an English Town appeared in 1994.

HOLBROOK, David (Kenneth) (1923–), British poet, critic, and novelist, born in Norwich, educated at Downing College, Cambridge, where he was appointed Director of English Studies in 1981. His collections of poetry include Imaginings (1961), Against the Cruel Frost (1963), Object Relations (1967), Chance of a Lifetime (1978), and Selected Poems 1961–1978 (1980). He has stated that in his poetry and prose fiction he is 'trying to find what meaning there might be in normal, everyday existence'. Many of his poems combine emotional candour and lyrical tenderness in their treatments of domestic incidents which form the basis for wider philosophical speculation. His novels include A Play of Passion (1978), Flesh Wounds (1987), A Little Athens (1990), Jennifer (1991), and Even if They Fall (1994). Dylan Thomas: The Code of Night (1972) and Sylvia Plath: Poetry and Existence (1976) reflect his urgent concern to identify viable cultural values. His opposition to what he has termed the 'new Barbarism' of contemporary society is clear in such books as Sex and Dehumanization (1972) and Education, Nihilism, and Survival (1977). Amongst recent critical works are The Skeleton in the Wardrobe (1990), an exploration of the fantasy world of C. S. *Lewis; Where D. H. Lawrence was Wrong about Women (1991); Edith Wharton and the Unsatisfactory Man (1991); Charles Dickens and the Image of Woman (1993); and Creativity and Pop Culture (1994).

HOLDEN, Molly (1927–81), British poet, born in Peckham, London; she grew up in Surrey and Wiltshire, and was educated at King's College, London. Having had poems published in leading periodicals as a student, she resumed writing during the early 1960s when she became increasingly disabled with multiple sclerosis. The privately published A Hill Like a Horse (1963) was her first collection of verse. Her reputation was established with To Make Me Grieve (1968). Two more volumes of her poetry were published, Air and Chill Earth (1971) and The Country Over (1975), before her illness prevented her from writing. The considerable personal candour of much of her finest verse is balanced by the rigorously objective treatments of natural phenomena; she attributed the penetrating clarity of such imagery to the opportunities for concentrated observation produced by her confinement to a wheelchair. Her accomplished style is typically based on conversational adaptations of conventional forms. She also wrote novels for children. A Selected Poems, with the addition of previously uncollected material, was published in 1987.

HOLDEN, Ursula (1921–), British novelist, born in Dorset; she has lived in Egypt, Dublin, and London. She published her first novel, Endless Race (1975), when she was 54. Her austere, almost staccato style and fast-moving narrative contrasts with the dreamy fairy-tale quality of many of her books. The unease and the black humour which she cultivates comes partly from this contrast and also from the sudden unveiling of the brutal realities behind family relationships and divisions in social class. In Eric's Choice (1984) the marriage between a middle-class schoolmaster and his spoiled working-class student proves disastrous because neither of them can tolerate any reality other than the one into which they have been born. Her trilogy of novels, Tin Toys (1986), Unicorn Sisters (1988), and A Bubble Garden (1989), about three sisters abandoned by their glamorous mother to a succession of nannies and relatives and a run-down boarding school, juxtaposes extremes of innocence and sexual knowingness. A more recent novel is Help Me Please (1991).

HOLLAND, Cecelia (Anastasia) (1943–), American novelist, born in Nevada, educated at Pennsylvania State University. Most of her novels are based on historical subjects including her first, The Firedrake (1966), which explores past history from the fall of Rome onwards. The Death of Attila (1973) and The Belt of Gold (1984) encompass the Dark Ages; Until the Sun Falls (1969) is set in Mongol Asia; The Earl (1971) and several companion volumes deal with medieval Europe; and Home Ground (1981) is set in the contemporary world, as is Pacific Street (1992). Even her first science fiction tale, Floating Worlds (1976), unfolds an environment which seems to reflect some actual domain.

HOLLANDER, John (1929–), American poet and critic, born in New York City, educated at Columbia University and Indiana University. Allen *Ginsberg was a fellow student and friend at Columbia, though their poetry is entirely antithetical. Hollander has taught at Harvard, Connecticut College, Hunter College, and at Yale. His first book, A Crackling of Thorns (1958), had an Introduction by W. H. *Auden, who praised the 'literariness' of Hollander's work. Later books include Movie-Going and Other Poems (1962), Visions from the Ramble (1965), Jiggery-Pokery: A Compendium of Double Dactyls (1967; with Anthony *Hecht and others), Philomel (1968), Types of Shape (1969), The Night Mirror (1971), Tales Told of the Fathers (1975), Reflections on Espionage (1976), Spectral Emanations: New and Selected Poems (1978), Blue Wine and Other Poems (1979), and Powers of Thirteen (1984). His literary criticism in The Untuning of the Sky: Ideas of Music in English Poetry 1500–1700 (1961) and Vision and Resonance: Two Senses of Poetic Form (1975) underscores his own commitment to a poetry based on formal verse. Hollander's own work has always sought the refuge of form, a quality of self-restraint unlike the open forms frequently found in twentieth-century American poetry.

HOLLERAN, Andrew (1948–), American novelist, educated at Harvard and at the University of Iowa. Little is known of his life or his real name, although Holleran has intimated that the white, affluent milieu of his novels reflects his own life. His first novel, Dancer from the Dance (1978), was a major breakthrough in mainstream gay fiction. Narrated by the campy Sutherland, it describes the rise and fall of Malone, a young gay man old before his time, prodded into the frantic underground of parties, drugs, and promiscuity in Manhattan and on Fire Island. Nights on Aruba (1983) chronicles the life of Paul from his birth in Aruba through middle age; written as extended flashback triggered by an impending visit to parents in Florida, he negotiates between his overtly homosexual New York life and the straight mask worn for his family. While neither novel explicitly touches on the impact of AIDS, they are permeated with a sense of metaphorical doom which lies at the core of gay existence. The essays in Ground Zero (1989) do reflect Holleran's responses to the disease and to the deaths of those around him. Holleran was a member of the 'Violet Quill', an important collective of gay male writers, including Felice Picano, Edmund *White, and Robert Ferro, whose correspondence with Holleran can be found in The Violet Quill Reader (1994).

HOLLINGHURST, Alan (1954–), British novelist, born in Stroud, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. He has taught at the universities of Oxford and London, and has worked on the staff of the Times Literary Supplement. His first published work was a collection of poems, Confidential Chats with Boys (1982). Hollinghurst's highly praised and controversial novels are, on one level, depictions of gay life in contemporary Europe, replete with graphic descriptions of casual sexual transactions; on another level, they grapple with the nature of sexual desire and artistic creation, and the complex relationship between the two. In The Swimming Pool Library (1988), which is set in a vividly evoked underground London of bars, pools, and discotheques, the handsome young narrator is a modern flâneur who finds, amidst his relentless cruising, the time to befriend a harried aristocrat who represents an older generation of more diffident and yet more daring homosexuals. The novel's casual juxtaposition of formal, allusive prose with its transgressive subject matter did much to rescue gay fiction from generic ghettos. The Folding Star (1994), ambitious in its range and autumnal in tone, is set in the gay milieu of a Belgian city; here, a somewhat less attractive narrator pursues a similar search for love—the object of his desire is a 17-year-old boy. In this novel, described as a triptych, Hollinghurst explores the fine line between lust and love, returns to his narrator's past to examine the sense of loss that haunts him, and introduces the parallel theme of a Belgian symbolist painter's infatuation with an actress. An element of mystery prevails during the proceedings. While the influence of *Firbank is evident in Hollinghurst's first novel, his second ironically evokes Mann.

HOLMAN, Robert (1952–), British dramatist, born in Guisborough, Cleveland, the son of a farmer, educated at the local grammar school. His most successful plays are marked by a strong sense of atmosphere, usually that of his native north Yorkshire, and the understated style in which he evokes ordinary people and their relationships. Among these are Mud (1974) and German Skerries (1977), set on a cliff overlooking the North Sea and involving the birdwatchers who gather there; Rooting (1979), set on a pig farm and touching on the subject of rural depopulation; The Estuary (1980), about a father and son's fishing expedition and, by extension, their family's troubles; and the more ambitious Other Worlds (1983), about the impact on a farming and fishing community of the threat of Napoleonic invasion. Since then his plays, though still quiet and unpretentious in tone, have grown in political and social resonance. They include Examples Are Today (1984), a look at the pre-Second World War period through the experience of men who went to fight in the Spanish Civil War; The Overgrown Path (1985), set on the Greek island of Tinos and mainly involving the expatriate professor who helped develop the H-bomb; the trilogy Making Noise Quietly (1986), several of whose characters have been touched by war and violence; and Across Oka (1989), about the edgy relationship of an English and a Russian boy entrusted with taking the fertilized egg of the near-extinct Siberian crane to its natural habitat. He has also written for television, notably Chance of a Lifetime and This Is History, Gran.

HOLME, Constance (1881–1955), English regional novelist, born in Milnthorpe, Westmorland, where most of her fiction is set. Her most famous novel, The Lonely Plough (1914), was described by her as 'the story of a landed estate, and of a big flood on a northern marsh bringing out the loyalty of the north-country character, not only to the living but to the dead'. Feudal relationships between landlord, agent, and tenant are also portrayed in her first novel, Crump Folk Going Home (1913), and in The Old Road from Spain (1916) in which the landscape, social life, and rural traditions of the region are vividly evoked. Many novels, such as Beautiful End (1918), The Splendid Fairing (1919), and The Things which Belong (1925), focus on the daily lives of working people of the area. Other novels include He-Who-Came (1930), and The Trumpet in the Dust (1921), the title of which was taken from a poem by Rabindranath *Tagore, with whom Holme felt some kinship.

HOLMES, John Clellon (1926–88), American novelist and journalist, born in Holyoke, Massachusetts, educated at Columbia University and the New School for Social Research. He was credited by some authorities with coining the phrase 'the *Beat Generation'. He contributed articles to such magazines as Harper's, Partisan Review*, Poetry*, and the New York Times Magazine, and later held posts at various American universities. Although his initial publications after university were poetry, his only collection was the later The Bowling Green (1977), and he rapidly turned to fiction. Go (1952; UK title The Beat Boys, 1959), about the intellectual drifters in the New York City of the Beat Generation, and The Horn (1958), about the declining days of a black saxophonist, are very much novels of the 'Beat' movement, soaked in jazz and the atmosphere of the 1950s. Later works, such as Get Home Free (1964), are less confident in their evocation of the period. Whilst he never achieved the status of *Ginsberg or *Kerouac, the essays collected in Nothing More To Declare (1967), regarded as a succinct and accurate representation of the Beat movement, and his memoir Visitor: Jack Kerouac in Old Saybrook (1980), are useful resources for the study of one of the important strands of post-war American literature.

HOLMES, Richard (1945–), British biographer, born in London, educated at Churchill College, Cambridge. Shelley: The Pursuit (1974) was written in the course of travels in England, Wales, Switzerland, France, and Italy, which he undertook to reconstruct Shelley's journeyings from 1811 onward. Coleridge (1982), a valuable critical introduction, was succeeded by Coleridge: Early Visions (1989), the first volume of an ambitious biography providing a comprehensive treatment of Coleridge's psychology and personal relationships. Footsteps: Adventures of a Romantic Biographer (1985) was Holmes's imaginative autobiographical account of the itineraries of his researches between 1964 and 1976; the book also conveys its author's interest in Gérard de Nerval, about whom he wrote a radio play entitled 'Inside the Tower', which was broadcast in 1977. His other works include My Fantoms (1976), his translations of stories by Théophile Gautier; an edition of A Short Residence in Sweden (1987) by Mary Wollstonecraft and William Godwin; and Dr Johnson and Mr Savage (1993), a biographical study.

HOLROYD, Michael (de Courcy Fraser) (1935–), British biographer, born in London; he was educated, as he states in Who's Who, at Eton and Maidenhead Public Library. In the latter he discovered the works of Hugh Kingsmill, the subject of his first biography (1964) and of his edition of The Best of Hugh Kingsmill (1971). The Unknown Years (1967) and The Years of Achievement (1968), his two-volume biography of Lytton *Strachey, won considerable acclaim for its remarkable attention to detail and was instrumental in reviving interest in the *Bloomsbury Group; a revised edition, Lytton Strachey: The New Biography appeared in 1994. The Years of Innocence (1974) and The Years of Experience (1975) are his two-volume biography of the painter Augustus John. The Search for Love (1988), The Pursuit of Power (1989), The Lure of Fantasy (1991), The Last Laugh (1992), and The Shaw Companion (1992; including a list of source references), his work on George Bernard *Shaw, confirmed his reputation as a major biographer. His other publications include the novel A Dog's Life (1969) and Unreceived Opinions (1973), a collection of essays; he has also written scripts for radio and television. In 1982 he married the novelist Margaret *Drabble.

HOLTBY, Winifred (1898–1935), British novelist and journalist, born in Yorkshire. Her studies at Somerville College, Oxford, were interrupted by the First World War, during which she served with the WAAC in France. At Oxford, her lifelong friendship with Vera *Brittain began. Between the wars, Holtby became an influential journalist in London, writing for the Manchester Guardian, the Yorkshire Post, the Daily Herald, and Time and Tide. Feminism and pacifism were amongst the issues she covered. She also produced poetry, short stories, and a study of Virginia Woolf (1932). It is as a novelist that she is best remembered. The first of six novels, Anderby Wold (1924), explores the clash between traditional values and social change, and prefigures her final work. The Crowded Street (1925) was one of her most successful books; with its heroine's search for independence counterpointed by a portrait of middle-class Edwardian society and the First World War that devastated it, the novel echoes Brittain's Testament of Youth. In style, Holtby followed the nineteenth-century realist school, focusing on domestic and social issues; the exception was Mandoa! Mandoa! (1933), a satire on Western industrialized society. Set in an imaginary African state, it enabled Holtby to pursue her concern for racial justice. The posthumously published South Riding (1936; James Tait Black Memorial Prize) was Holtby's finest work. A chronicle both of a Yorkshire community and of an idealistic young headmistress within it, it was described by Brittain as a 'testament of its author's undaunted philosophy'.

Homage to Catalonia, a mixture of personal memoir and political analysis of the Spanish Civil War, by George *Orwell, published in 1938. Homage to Catalonia includes some of Orwell's most moving and finely judged writing. It is restlessly balanced between an enduring commitment to the ideals of socialism and a growing dismay at the inefficiencies and factionalism of the Republican campaign against Franco. The book opens memorably with a vivid account of the squalor, confusion, and high hopes of revolutionary Barcelona in December 1936, and proceeds to an unflinching portrayal of conditions on the Aragon front during the ensuing winter and spring. Orwell reveals a completely unforced enthusiasm for the social equality that existed briefly in the city and more lingeringly among the left-wing militias: 'I had dropped more or less by chance into the only community of any size in Western Europe where political consciousness and disbelief in capitalism were more normal than their opposites.' At the same time, his impatience with the lack of weapons and training and the talent for incompetence he encountered among Republicans modulated into a form of despair on his return to Barcelona after a nearly fatal throat wound ended his active service career. The final episode in the book deals with the savage infighting among socialist and anarchist organizations and the subsequent outlawing of the Trotskyist party to whom Orwell was affiliated. The shock of the experience threw him into a passionate commitment to the good faith of individuals caught up in the partisan conflict, as well as a growing awareness of the corruptibility of all revolutionary movements.

HOME, William Douglas (1912–92), British dramatist, born in Edinburgh, son of the 13th Earl of Home, educated at New College, Oxford, and the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art. After working as an actor, and serving as a captain in the Royal Armoured Corps, he came to public notice in 1947 with Now Barabbas, set in a prison as a murderer waits to be executed. His subsequent work has included drawing-room comedies, notably The Chiltern Hundreds (1947), in which an earl's socialist son is beaten in an election by his father's butler; The Reluctant Debutante (1955), about the pressures of the London 'season'; and The Secretary Bird (1968); and 'straight' plays, including The Thistle and the Rose (1949), about the events preceding Flodden; The Queen's Highland Servant (1967), about Queen Victoria's relationship with John Brown; and The Dame of Sark (1974), about the German occupation of the smallest of the Channel Islands. Critically, Home became a prime victim of the reaction against 'mandarin' boulevard drama, but he continued to write prolifically, achieving modest public success with Lloyd George Knew My Father (1972), a serious comedy about a deadening marriage, and The Kingfisher (1977), about an old man's attempt to marry the woman who rejected him fifty years before. He published one autobiography, Half Term Report, in 1954 and another, Mr Home Pronounced Hume, in 1979.

Homecoming, The, a play by H. *Pinter, performed and published in 1965. One of its author's darkest dramas, the play involves the homecoming of Teddy, an academic living in America, with his English wife Ruth, once a photographic model, born in the same north London area where his family still lives. Their welcome is far from conventional. Teddy's widowed father, Max, is alternately insulting, bullying, and ingratiating, and his brothers, Joey and Lenny, make sexual advances to Ruth, who calmly accepts them. By the end of the play, Teddy departs for America and for his young children, leaving Ruth ostensibly the creature of father and brothers who have decided to make her a prostitute, but actually their surrogate mother, in full command of the household. As often in Pinter, seemingly banal or irrelevant speeches and exchanges carry great emotional weight, helping to explain behaviour that at first seems motiveless. The result is a picture, probably Pinter's most shocking, of family politics at their most intricate, disturbing, and overwhelming.

Honest Ulsterman, The, a quarterly journal of poetry and criticism begun in 1968 by James *Simmons, who promoted an ideal of cultural and personal individuality in his editorials. In its early years the magazine was an invaluably non-sectarian platform for the growing reputation of *Ulster poetry. Derek *Mahon, Seamus *Heaney, Michael *Longley, Ciaran *Carson, Tony *Harrison, and Iain Crichton *Smith have been among the regular contributors. Frank *Ormsby maintained the magazine's eclectically authoritative ethos as editor from 1969 to 1989, when he was succeeded by his assistant Robert Johnstone. A 'Business Section' under the authorship of 'Jude the Obscure' has appeared in each issue since 1970, often providing the vehicle for penetrating critical articles on a wide range of writers and literary topics. The Honest Ulsterman has produced pamphlets by numerous contributing poets, which include titles by Tom *Paulin, Peter *Porter, Paul *Muldoon, Gavin *Ewart, and Carol *Rumens.

HOOD, Hugh (1928–), Canadian novelist and short-story writer, born to English and French-Canadian parents in Toronto, educated at the University of Toronto. He became a professor of English in Connecticut and Montreal. His Catholicism informs his fiction, which habitually investigates issues of conscience and moral dualities. He first achieved recognition for a volume of Montreal sketches, Around the Mountain (1967). Subsequent short-story volumes include The Fruit Man, the Meat Man and the Manager (1971), Dark Glasses (1976), None Genuine without This Signature (1980), August Nights (1985), A Short Walk in the Rain (1989), The Isolation Booth (1991), and You'll Catch Your Death (1992). Hood's novels include White Figure, White Ground (1964); The Camera Always Lies (1967), set in the film world; A Game of Touch (1970); and You Can't Get There from Here (1972), a satirical novel set in a fictional African country whose two peoples evoke the cultural divisions between anglophone and francophone Canadians. His most ambitious work is his 'New Age' cycle, a projected series of twelve novels, which began with The Swing in the Garden (1975). By focusing on a particular protagonist and family, it aims to provide a viewpoint on moral and social issues from the 1880s to the year 2000, and continued with A New Athens (1977), Reservoir Ravine (1979), Black and White Keys (1982), The Scenic Art (1984), The Motor Boys in Ottawa (1986), Tony's Book (1988), and Property and Value (1990). He has also published a collection of literary and cultural essays, Unsupported Assertions (1991).

HOOKER, (Peter) Jeremy (1941–), British poet and critic, born in Warsash, Hampshire, educated at the University of Southampton. The prevailing concern in Hooker's verse with the interactions of man, place, and history was established in The Elements (1972) and Soliloquies of a Chalk Giant (1974), his first two collections of verse. Solent Shore (1978) explored the personal, familial, and communal significances of his native Hampshire landscape. In Englishman's Road (1980) his absorption in the implications of Welsh culture became apparent. Master of the Leaping Figures (1987) reflects the historical, religious, and mythical dimensions of his experience of Winchester, where he had taught. The fluid free verse Hooker generally employs is highly appropriate to the extended sequences which predominate in his work. A View from the Source: Selected Poems appeared in 1982. His critical works include John Cowper Powys (1973) and John Cowper Powys and David Jones: A Comparative Study (1979); the essays of Poetry of Place (1982) and The Presence of the Past (1987) are thematically centred on the treatments of local elements and ideas of nationality in the work of a range of British and American poets.

HOPE, A(lec) D(erwent) (1907–), Australian poet and critic, born in New South Wales, educated at Sydney and Oxford Universities. Indefatigable defender and articulator of the central role of poetry in life, Hope has also directed his erudite wit at individuals, institutions, and values which, he believed, threatened such vital elements. Hope's writing was first collected in The Wandering Islands (1955), by which time he already had a reputation as a poet. Subsequent verse includes Collected Poems: 1930–1965 (1966), Collected Poems: 1930–1970 (1972), Antechinus: Poems 1975–1980 (1981), The Tragical History of Dr Faustus (1982), and The Age of Reason (1985). The Drifting Continent, and Other Poems (1979) included several comic bush ballads. His works of literary criticism include The Cave and the Spring (1965), Native Companions (1974), which gathered articles over forty years, and The New Cratylus (1979). As a poet and critic Hope's position has always been enigmatic: learned and traditional in his references, techniques, and symbolism, he has also demonstrated an iconoclastic relish in social and moral matters. Much of his energy in all his writings has been devoted to reinvigorating Australian life through imaginative access to the enduring and life-enhancing patterns of myth and symbolism as well as the literature and forms of the past.

HOPE, Christopher (1941–), South African novelist and poet, born in Johannesburg, educated at the universities of Witwatersrand and Natal; he moved to London in 1976. Hope's first novel, A Separate Development (1981), which was banned in South Africa, fiercely ridiculed apartheid and satirized fears of miscegenation. It is narrated by the adolescent Harry Moto who, due to a sexual misdemeanour, is forced to disguise himself as a black person. Kruger's Alp (1984; Whitbread Prize) is an allegorical novel which targets the legacy of Paul Kruger, leader of the Afrikaners during the Anglo-Boer War (1899–1902). The Hottentot Room (1986), about political exiles in London, comically scrutinizes fashionable assumptions about race and power politics. His novella Black Swan (1987) is a bleak, hard-hitting parable which portrays a black township boy called 'Lucky' who becomes obsessed with classical ballet. My Chocolate Redeemer (1989), set in France, is narrated by Bella, an intellectually precocious nymphet. Much comic irony and satirical scorn are generated by her relationships with an exiled African dictator, and her atheistic uncle, who dabbles in racialist politics. The Love Songs of Nathan J. Swirsky (1993) is a comic novel set in South Africa. In Serenity House (1992) Hope moves the scene to London, to recount the blackly satirical mystery of the identity of Max Montfalcon, a denizen of an old people's home who may or may not be an erstwhile Nazi exterminator. Darkest England (1996), a Swiftean satire on England, follows David Mungo Booi from Africa to contemporary Britain. Hope's other works include the poems in Cape Drives (1974), In the Country of the Black Pig (1981), and Englishmen (1985); Private Parts and Other Tales (1981); White Boy Running (1988), a memoir; and Moscow! Moscow! (1990), a travel book about Gorbachev's Russia.

HOPKINS, John (Richard) (1931–), British dramatist, born in London, educated at Cambridge University. He first came to notice for his work for television, which included no fewer than fifty-three scripts for the police series Z Cars between 1962 and 1965, several 'one-off' plays, and the critically admired tetralogy Talking to a Stranger (1966), which looked at the events of one painful and finally disastrous day from the stance of each member of a family of four. He has continued to write for the medium, scripting an adaptation of John *le Carré's Smiley's People in 1982; but is also the author of plays for the stage, notably This Story of Yours (1968), about an emotionally troubled policeman who, disgusted yet fascinated by the horrors of his profession, beats to death a child rapist; Find Your Way Home (1970), an early example of the 'coming out of the closet play', in which a married man acknowledges his homosexuality and 'finds his way home' to what promises to be a long-term relationship with a younger man; Economic Necessity (1973), in which a man gives up a job he thinks pointless, only to discover, when his wife takes a lover and his family rejects him, that he was more financially than emotionally important to his nearest and dearest; and Next of Kin (1974), which presents three generations of a suburban family, all of them actuated by avarice and other vices. As this suggests, Hopkins's work has been marked by a sweeping and sometimes brutally intense scepticism about human relationships.

HOPKINS, Pauline (1859–1930), African-American novelist, short-story writer, and journalist, born in Portland, Maine, educated at the prestigious Girls' High School in Boston. In 1900 Hopkins co-founded the first US black press literary magazine, Colored American Magazine, which serialized three of her novels (Hagar's Daughter: A Story of Southern Caste Prejudice; Winona: A Tale of Negro Life in the South and Southwest; and Of One Blood: Or, the Hidden Self); her stories and articles also appeared in Colored American Magazine and in Voice of the Negro. Her first novel, Contending Forces: A Romance Illustrative of Negro Life North and South (1900), which chronicles the enslaved lives of several generations of an African-American family, links antebellum violence against slaves to post-Reconstruction practices of lynching, rape, and segregation. The Schomburg Library's 1988 republication of the novel and The Magazine Novels of Pauline Hopkins has ignited an often contradictory US critical response to Hopkins's work: some argue that Hopkins's impassioned fictional preoccupation with racial justice none the less betrays strongly assimilationist or élitist impulses, while recent historicist criticism details a more theoretically complex engagement between Hopkins's texts and both contemporaneous literary conventions and such pop-culture discourses as Jamesian psychology.

HOPLEY, George, see WOOLRICH, CORNELL.

Horizon, a literary periodical founded by Cyril *Connolly in association with Stephen Spender, who was assistant editor, and Peter Watson, who acted as art editor. Connolly intended it for readers formerly served by the Criterion, the London Mercury*, and New Verse*, all of which had ceased publication in 1939. In the first issue of January 1940 he stated that 'Our standards are aesthetic and our politics are in abeyance'; the magazine's opposition to Nazism was, however, invariably clear. The authors who gained Horizon its high reputation included Graham *Greene, Sean *O'Faolain, Evelyn *Waugh, Henry *Miller, W. H. *Auden, Louis *MacNeice, Dylan *Thomas, Patrick *Kavanagh, and Alun *Lewis. Work by numerous distinguished American and European writers was also regularly featured. In commercial terms the magazine was moderately successful, though its sales never exceeded 10,000 copies. In 1950 the final issue's editorial voiced Connolly's sense of cultural beleaguerment in his remark that 'it is closing time in the gardens of the West'.

HORNUNG E(rnest) W(illiam) (1866–1921), British novelist, born in Middlesborough. He is chiefly remembered as the creator of Raffles, the gentleman burglar. Educated at Uppingham, Hornung spent two years of his youth in Australia. His first novel, A Bride from the Bush (1890), was followed by Raffles (1899), his greatest success, in which the eponymous hero carries out a series of daring jewel robberies, admiringly described by his former school fellow, 'Bunny'. It was followed by Stingaree, a Thief in the Night (1905), an attempt to recreate a Raffles character in an Australian setting, and by a sequel to the earlier bestseller, Mr Justice Raffles (1909). His other novels include Notes of a Camp Follower (1919). See 'Raffles and Miss Blandish' by G. *Orwell.

HOROVITZ, Frances (1938–83), British poet, born in London, educated at the University of Bristol and the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art. In 1964 she married Michael *Horovitz. She became a noted reader of poetry on radio and worked widely as a teacher of creative writing. Poems (1967) and The High Tower (1970), pamphlet editions of her verse, were followed in 1980 by Water Over Stone, a substantial collection drawing much of its imagery from the remote part of the Cotswold Hills where she lived from 1971. Snow Light, Water Light (1983) reflects the topography and history of the Irthing Valley in Northumbria, where she went in 1980 to work on Wall (1981), a collaborative treatment of Hadrian's Wall by a group of writers and graphic artists. Anne *Stevenson's remark on Horovitz's 'effortless synthesis of self and nature' indicates the imaginative fusions of mood and closely observed particulars of landscape which characterize her best work. The rhythms and diction of her verse frequently produce effects of great delicacy. Collected Poems (1985) was edited by Roger *Garfitt, whom she married shortly before her death from cancer.

HOROVITZ, Michael (1935–), British poet, born in Frankfurt, Germany; he grew up in London, and was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford. In 1959 he founded New Departures*. His desire to reinstate poetry as a popular art form gave rise to Live New Departures, a touring company combining poetry with musical and theatrical activities. His early publications include Declaration (1963), Nude Lines for Barking (1965), and High Notes from when I Was Rolling in Moss (1966). His stated desire to unite 'pre-Renaissance inspirations with contemporary fact' is demonstrated in his work's fusions of a celebratory lyricism with socio-political critiques. During the 1960s he was central to the emergence of *underground poetry and edited the popular and controversial anthology Children of Albion: Poetry of the 'Underground' in Britain (1969). His most highly regarded works are The Wolverhampton Wanderer (1971) and Midsummer Morning Jog (1985, with illustrations by Peter Blake); the discursive style of these long poems modulates energetically between wide-ranging contemplation and incisively polemical elements. His most substantial collections include Growing Up: Selected Poems and Pictures 1951–1979 (1979) and Wordsounds and Sightlines: New and Selected Poems (1994). Among his other works are his experimental combinations of textual and graphic elements in Bop Paintings, Collages, Drawings & Picture-Poems (1989) and a further anthology entitled Grandchildren of Albion (1992), which contains a wide range of verse by younger British poets.

HOSAIN, Attia (1913–), Indian writer, born in Lucknow, India, educated at La Martinière School and Isabella Thoburn College, Lucknow. Along with her liberal English education, she absorbed the courtly values and traditions of her aristocratic Muslim family, and studied Persian and Arabic as well as her native Urdu. Hosain moved to Britain in 1947, and worked for many years for the BBC. She has had considerable influence on Indo-Anglian fiction, and her work is admired for its lyrical prose and its carefully delineated social, historical, and political perspectives. The stories collected in Phoenix Fled (1953) focus mainly on the dispossessed, the underclass, and the peasantry; her imagistic prose evokes the cadences of her native Urdu, and a strong current of anti-colonial nationalism links her work to that of her progressive contemporaries in indigenous languages. Her novel Sunlight on a Broken Column (1961) articulates the personal dilemmas of a woman, a daughter of the ruling classes, caught between the demands of tradition and change; the background of events leading to the independence of India and the creation of Pakistan add depth to the novel.

HOSPITAL, Janette Turner (1942–), Australian novelist and short-story writer, born in Melbourne, educated at the University of Queensland. She has travelled widely in America, Europe, and India; since 1971 she has lived mainly in Canada. Among other occupations she has worked as a librarian at Harvard, and as a lecturer in universities in Canada, America, and Australia. Her first novel, The Ivory Swing (1982), is a personal and psychological drama involving a young Canadian woman who finds herself in India accompanying her academic husband on sabbatical. The Tiger in the Tiger Pit (1984) concerns an elderly couple reaching their golden wedding, and focuses on the wife's attempts to draw together the disparate threads of her ever-increasing family. Borderline (1985) skilfully exploits conflicting levels of narration and plot, in reconstructing an international story of differing flights and concealments; Hospital deploys the interrelating tensions of alternative truths to construct a work which traces the borderlines between both political and existential worlds through blending the conventions of thriller and psychological drama. Charades (1988) is the story of an Australian girl, Charade Ryan, travelling the world in search of her lost father; the novel moves between Boston, Toronto, Melbourne, and Queensland, and shifts backwards and forwards in time (from Cook to Quantum Physics). The Lost Magician (1992) continues in the tradition of its predecessors: similarly dense, lyrical, and multi-layered, it investigates, through the intertwined destinies of its protagonists—a Chinese photographer, a self-destructive prostitute, and the idealistic son of a rich judge among others—political corruption in high places and the seething lowlife of contemporary Australia. The stories in Dislocations (1986), set in Queensland, America, and India, all explore disruption of ordinary life, or separation from a known environment. The stories in Isobars (1990), set in different places and times, are linked by isobars of the imagination.

HOUGHTON, Stanley (1881–1913), British playwright, born in Cheshire, educated at Manchester Grammar School. He went into his father's cotton business, hoping eventually to become a professional writer. Though he wrote a classic short play in The Dear Departed (1908), and though there is dramatic merit in the longer The Younger Generation (1909) and The Perfect Cure (1911), he did not achieve his ambition until the year before he died of meningitis. Hindle Wakes, which came with great success to London in 1912, remains one of the most striking achievements of the so-called 'Manchester School' of playwrights associated with that city's Gaiety Theatre. It is a lively comedy on Houghton's favourite theme, the right to personal freedom of the young, here represented by the weaver who appals the older generation by choosing independence rather than marriage to the mill owner's son who has made her pregnant. Houghton is clearly attacking 'double standards' of morality and showing the little town of Hindle, in the words of the ambiguous title, 'waking' to the twentieth century; he achieves this through humorous observation of character and of Lancashire.

House for Mr Biswas, A, a novel by V. S. *Naipaul, published in 1961. Set against the backdrop of multi-ethnic Trinidad, it tells, in mock-epic mode, the story of the struggles of Mohun Biswas, a journalist of Indian origin, from his birth to his death (from a heart attack). The character of Biswas affords Naipaul an opportunity to portray the conflicts between resilience and hope on the one hand, and disappointments, dread, and defeats on the other; the former ultimately triumph, if only in a moral sense. The house of the title comes to symbolize the freedoms that Biswas, besieged by adversity in his personal and his professional life, longs for: from the problems of love (and the lack of it), identity, class, and social prestige. The tale is recounted with ease and humour, allowing Naipaul to create a representative gallery of cleverly drawn types (including the Tulsis, Biswas's rapacious in-laws) that present a panoramic view of Caribbean attitudes. Naipaul's whimsical treatment of his theme betrays the influence of *Narayan.

HOUSEHOLD, Geoffrey (Edward West) (1900–88), British writer, born in Bristol, educated at Clifton College and at Magdalen College, Oxford. He achieved recognition as a writer of adventure stories with Rogue Male (1939), which establishes the characteristic Household protagonist (a solitary, self-reliant English gentleman) and sets him against an unnamed but recognizably Nazi European dictator and his regime. The pursuit continues in its sequel Rogue Justice (1982). These and other works such as Watcher in the Shadows (1960) and Dance of Dwarfs (1968) are similar in tradition to the work of J. *Buchan. The Third Hour (1937) was a utopian discourse set in South America. Several late novels, including The Sending (1980), Summon the Bright Water (1981), and Arrows of Desire (1985), attempted fantasy themes with some success.

House of Mirth, The, a novel by Edith *Wharton, published in 1905, a social satire depicting manners in New York society. Lily Bart, despite her beauty and high social connections, remains unmarried at 29. Among her suitors are the rich financier Simon Rosedale, and Lawrence Selden, a lawyer, who is her real love but is without the means to support her. She unwittingly falls into the power of Gus Trenor in a gambling game, who advances her money to cover her debts. He seeks repayment by demanding physical attention, but Lily escapes and promises to repay the money. Later, her reputation in fashionable society is ruined through being framed as George Dorset's mistress by his wife, who is seeking to cover her own love affair. As Lily goes down in the world, so Simon Rosedale rises to the top, winning social acceptance by a shrewd manipulation of his increasing wealth. Lily becomes a milliner, and after a final declaration of her love to Selden, she returns to her boarding-room and commits suicide. Upon Selden's arrival to request her hand in marriage, he discovers that Lily has put aside her aunt's entire bequest to pay her debt to Trenor. Lily is thus destroyed by the very society whose decorative but inhumane specifications her upbringing had designed her precisely to meet.

HOUSMAN, A(lfred) E(dward) (1859–1936), British poet, born near Bromsgrove, Worcestershire, educated at St John's College, Oxford, where, for reasons which remain unclear, he failed his final examinations. During the ten years of his subsequent employment in the Patents Office in London he published papers on Propertius, Juvenal, Ovid, and other classical authors, establishing the reputation that gained him the Chair of Greek and Latin at University College, London, in 1892. He became Kennedy Professor of Latin at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1911. The most substantial of his works of textual scholarship was his edition of Manilius, which appeared in five volumes between 1903 and 1930. Housman appears to have intensified his very private practice of poetry after the departure of his intimate friend Moses Jackson for India in 1887. *A Shropshire Lad, published at his own expense in 1896, gradually drew wide critical acclaim. Successive commercial editions were printed and by 1912 Housman was widely known. The *Georgian Poets venerated him as the progenitor of their predominantly rural mode. In 1922 he published Last Poems, a series of forty-one verses sustaining his pessimistic lyricism. Praefanda (1931), his miscellany of obscene passages from Latin sources with an ironically erudite introduction, was published in Germany. Apart from his more orthodox writings on classical authors, he published only one other work in his lifetime, the text of his Cambridge lecture The Name and Nature of Poetry (1933), which declared poetry to be 'physical rather than intellectual' in origin. The posthumous More Poems (1936) was supplemented by eighteen further poems in A. E. H. (1937) by his brother Laurence *Housman. Christopher *Ricks's edition of Housman's Collected Poems and Selected Prose was published in 1988. A. E. Housman: The Scholar Poet (1979) is a biographical study by R. P. Graves.

HOUSMAN, Laurence (1865–1959), British writer, born near Bromsgrove, Worcestershire, the brother of A. E. *Housman; he studied painting in London and became a highly regarded illustrator. His first successful publication was An Englishwoman's Love Letters (1900), an ingenious parody of romantic fiction. Trimblerigg: A Book of Revelation (1924), a comically effective political satire directed against Lloyd George, and The Duke of Flamborough (1924) are the best-known of his novels. The protagonists of his plays, collections of which include The Little Plays of St Francis (1922) and Victoria Regina (1934), were recurrently based on biblical personages and English royalty, with the result that his work repeatedly incurred the Lord Chamberlain's ban. Among his earlier collections of poetry are Green Arras (1896) and Spikenard (1898); a Collected Poems was published in 1937. As a poet, he tended towards conventional sentimentality, though he was capable of memorably epigrammatic effects. A prolific author, his other works include fairy tales with his own illustrations, art criticism, and treatises on prison reform and the emancipation of women. A. E. H.

(1937) contained his memoir of A. E. Housman, together with eighteen previously uncollected poems and a selection of letters. The Unexpected Years (1937) is an autobiography. Laurence Housman, an illustrated critical biography by Rodney Engen, was published in 1973.

HOUSTON, Douglas (Norman) (1947–), British poet, born in Cardiff, educated at the University of Hull. Sixteen of Houston's poems appeared with work by other *Hull poets in Douglas *Dunn's anthology A Rumoured City (1982). Peter *Porter described him as 'an *Auden-like artificer of great accomplishment'. With the Offal Eaters (1986) and The Hunter in the Snow (1994) are among his collections of poems. Houston's poetry is frequently characterized by the tensions established between succinctly defined social settings and the radically fictional nature of the situations and personae which emerge. Such strategies involve a range of effects extending from the grotesquely humorous to the sombrely elegiac. His work is featured in Poetry with an Edge (1988, edited by Neil Astley) and in Meic Stephen's edition of The Bright Field (1991), a selection of notable work produced since 1965 by *Anglo-Welsh authors.

HOUSTON, Libby (1941–), British poet, born in North London, educated at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. During the 1960s she became a popular performer of her work. A Stained Glass Raree Show (1967), her first collection of poetry, was followed by Plain Clothes (1971), At the Mercy (1981), and Necessity (1988). Many of her poems succeed in combining an intention to entertain with an understated moral or philosophical seriousness. The title poem of her widely acclaimed collection, At the Mercy, formed an extended meditation on the death in 1974 of her first husband, the artist Mal Dean. While she is frequently concerned with aspects of fable and legend, anecdotal treatments drawn from everyday experience are equally characteristic of her work. All Change (1993) is a substantial collection containing mainly children's verse. Since the early 1970s, she has contributed poetry programmes to BBC broadcasts for schools.
