if: the ordinary equivalent is si, which, if it introduces a clause, has an indicative verb in that clause so long as the condition is 'open' (i.e. when nothing is implied about the fulfilment or non-fulfilment of the condition). Si is followed by the subjunctive when the condition is unlikely to be fulfilled or already unfulfilled; the present subj. being used of what may happen, the imperf. of what might be so but is not, the pluperf. of what might have been so but was not (the imperf. sometimes of what might have been so often or for a long time). And —, quodsi; but —, sin; — indeed, si quidem, siquidem; — only, si modo (or dum modo with subj.); — perhaps, si forte; even —, etsi, etiamsi; as —, quasi, tamquam (see also AS); — . . . , or —, si . . . , sive; — not (= always unless), nisi; — not (= only — not, or even — not), si non, si minus; — not (elliptically = otherwise), sin minus; — anyone, si quis; — someone, si aliquis; — ever, si quando.

Conditions can also be represented by a participle (e.g. I should never have thought of it, — you had not reminded me, non mihi, nisi admonito, in mentem venisset); or by a jussive clause (e.g. even if you drive out nature with a pitchfork, she will still keep coming back, naturam expellas furca, tamen usque recurret).
