bandage from Raoul's eyes, and his graceful compliments to the beautiful but unknown lady he sees before him (duet: 'Beauté divine, enchanteresse'). Raoul has pledged his word, and when it is proposed that he marry the daughter of St Bris he immediately consents, only, on recognising the woman he thinks is having an affair with de Nevers, to reject her with indignation. The Catholics sense an insult and bloodshed is narrowly averted by the intervention of Marguerite.

Act III. Paris. The Huguenots sing a 'Rataplan' chorus, to the indignation of Catholics assembling for the marriage of de Nevers and Valentine, whose engagement has been renewed. Marcel brings a challenge from Raoul to St Bris; Catholic nobles conspire to lead Raoul into an ambush and thus avenge the insult to St Bris's daughter. But Valentine still loves Raoul and makes haste in an impressive duet to alert Marcel to his master's danger.

Before the duel occurs a stirring septet ('En mon bon droit j'ai confiance'), one of the score's finest numbers, and when the ambush is uncovered and Marcel summons the Huguenots to Raoul's aid, there is an effective climax in a double chorus. Excitement subsides with the arrival of Marguerite, who tells Raoul of his fatal misapprehension, but the finale employs ballet as well as chorus and military band as de Nevers conducts Valentine to their wedding.

Act IV. In her home, where she is now the wife of de Nevers, Raoul seeks out Valentine to hear her confirm what Marguerite has told him. He hides when St Bris, de Nevers and other noblemen enter and discuss a plan to be carried out that very night – the Eve of St Bartholomew – to massacre the Huguenots. They join their voices in an ensemble of dedication, the so-called Bénédiction des Poignards, the blessing of the swords, and only de Nevers opts out of a project which seems to him treacherous and dishonourable.

Valentine's decision to warn Raoul leads to the climax of the opera, the great duet for soprano and tenor in which she entreats him not to go to what she sees as certain death. They proclaim their love in one of Meyerbeer's greatest melodies: 'Tu l'as dit, oui, tu m'aimes'. The voices rise slowly in succession to a high C flat, and Raoul's cadenza involves a D flat taken softly.

Act V. Coligny, the Huguenot leader, has already been killed, Huguenots are being massacred, and Raoul, wounded, rushes into the Hôtel de Nesle where the marriage of Marguerite de Valois and Henri IV is to be celebrated.

In a Huguenot churchyard, Marcel blesses Valentine and Raoul, whose marriage has become a possibility with the death of de Nevers. St Bris and his followers approach, there is a volley of musketry and only too late does he discover that his zealotry has killed his own daughter. (The opera is long and few performances include the whole of Act V.) H.

LE PROPHÈTE

The Prophet

Opera in five acts, words by Scribe. Première, Grand Opéra, Paris, 16 April 1849, with Pauline Viardot and Roger. First performed London, Covent Garden, 24 July 1849, with Mario, Viardot-Garcia, Miss Hayes, and Tagliafico; New Orleans, 2 April 1850; New York, Niblo's Garden, 25 November 1853. Revived in German, Metropolitan Opera House, by Dr Leopold Damrosch, 7 December 1884, with Anton Schon as John of Leyden, Marianne Brandt as Fides and Schroeder-Hanfstaengl as Bertha. It was given ten times during the season, in which it was equalled only by Tannhäuser and Lohengrin. Revived Covent Garden, 1890 (in French), with Richard, Jean de Reszke, Edouard de Reszke; last performed there 1895, with Ravogli, Tamagno. Also, Metropolitan Opera House, 1898-99, with Jean de Reszke, Bréma (Fides), Lehmann (Bertha); 1900, with Alvarèz, Schumann-Heink, Suzanne Adams, Plançon and Edouard de Reszke; 1918, with Caruso, Matzenauer, Muzio, Didur, and Mardones; and 1927, with Corona, Matzenauer, Martinelli. Modern revivals have included those in Zurich, 1962, with McCracken; Turin Radio, 1963, with Rinaldi, Horne, Gedda; Berlin, German Opera, 1966, with Annabelle Bernard, Warfield, McCracken, conductor Hollreiser. Schumann-Heink was a celebrated Fides.

Jean de Leyde (John of Leyden).....Tenor

Fides, *his mother*Mezzo-Soprano

Berthe, his bride.....Soprano

Anabaptists

Jonas.....Tenor

Matthisen.....Bass

Zacharie.....Bass

Count Oberthal.....Baritone

Nobles, Citizens, Anabaptists, Peasants, Soldiers, Prisoners, Children

Place: Dordrecht, Holland, and Münster

Time: 1534-35

Running Time: 4 hours 10 minutes

Act I. At the foot of Count Oberthal's castle, near Dordrecht, peasants and mill hands are assembled. Berthe and Fides draw near. The latter is bringing Berthe a betrothal ring from her son Jean, who is to marry Berthe next day. Permission must first be obtained from Count Oberthal as lord of the domain.

There arrive three sombre-looking men, who attempt to rouse the people to revolt against tyranny. They are the Anabaptists, Jonas, Matthisen, and Zacharie. The Count, however, who comes at that moment out of the castle with his followers, recognises in Jonas a steward who was discharged from his employment. He orders his soldiers to beat the three men with the flat of their swords. Jean's mother and Berthe make their plea to Oberthal. Jean and Berthe have been in love ever since he rescued her from drowning in the Meuse. Oberthal refuses to give permission for her to marry Jean, but, instead, orders her seized and borne to the castle for his own diversion. The people are greatly agitated and, when the three Anabaptists reappear, throw themselves at their feet with threats against the castle.

Act II. In Jean's inn at Leyden are the three Anabaptists and a throng of merrymaking peasants. Jean dreams of Berthe. The Anabaptists discover that he bears a remarkable resemblance to the picture of King David in the Cathedral of Münster. They believe this resemblance can serve their plans. Jean tells them of a strange dream he has had in which he found himself standing under the dome of a temple with people prostrate before him. They interpret it as evidence that he will mount a throne, and urge him to follow them. At that moment, however, Berthe rushes in and begs him to hide her. She has escaped from Oberthal, who is in pursuit. Oberthal and his soldiers enter. The Count threatens that if Jean does not give Berthe up to him, his mother, whom the soldiers have captured on the way to the inn, will die. A soldier with an axe stands over Fides. After a brief struggle of conscience, Jean's love for his mother wins. He hands over Berthe and Fides is released.

The three Anabaptists return. Jean is ready to join them if only for vengeance on Oberthal. They insist that he come at once, without even saying farewell to his mother.

Act III. The winter camp of the Anabaptists in a forest of Westphalia before Münster. On a frozen lake there is skating. The people have risen against their oppressors, Jean has been proclaimed a prophet of God and is besieging Münster.

The act develops in three scenes. The first reveals the psychological medley of fanaticism and sensuality of the Anabaptists and their followers. In the second Jean enters. Oberthal is delivered into his hands. From him Jean learns that Berthe has escaped from the castle and is in Münster. The three Anabaptist leaders wish to put the Count to death but Jean, saying that Berthe shall be his judge, puts off the execution, much to the disgust of the three fanatics, who find Jean assuming more authority than is agreeable to them. The third scene is again in the camp of the Anabaptists. The leaders, nervous of Jean's usurpation of power, have themselves led an attack by their followers on Münster and met with defeat. The rabble is ready to turn against Jean but he by sheer force of personality rallies the crowd to his standard and leads it to victory.

Act IV. A public place in Münster. The city is held by Anabaptists. Jean, swept along on the high tide of success, decides to have himself proclaimed Emperor. Meanwhile Fides has been reduced to beggary. The Anabaptists, in order to make her believe that Jean is dead and so reduce the chance of her suspecting that the new Prophet and her son are one and the same, have left in the inn a bundle of Jean's bloodstained clothes together with a script stating that he had been murdered by the Prophet and his followers.

The poor woman has come to Münster to beg. There she meets Berthe, who, when Fides tells her that Jean has been murdered, vows vengeance upon the Prophet.

Fides follows the crowd into the cathedral. During the coronation scene, Jean announces that he is the elect of God. The poor beggar woman cries out 'My son!' Jean's life is at stake. He has claimed divine origin. If the woman is his mother, the people will denounce and kill him. He meets the emergency and bids his followers draw their swords and thrust them into his breast, if the beggar woman again affirms that he is her son. Seeing the swords held ready, Fides, in order to save him, declares that her eyes, dimmed by age, have deceived her.

Act V. The three Anabaptists, Jonas, Matthisen, and Zacharie, had intended to use Jean only as an instrument to attain power for themselves. The German Emperor, who is moving on Münster with a large force, has promised them pardon if they will betray the usurper into his hands. They have agreed, and are ready on his coronation day to betray Jean.

At Jean's secret command Fides has been brought to the palace. Here she meets her son. He vainly implores her pardon until she, under the illusion that his bloody deeds are occasioned only by his thirst to avenge Berthe's wrongs, forgives him on condition that he returns to Leyden. This he promises to do.

They are joined by Berthe. She blames the Prophet for the supposed murder of her lover and has sworn to kill him, for which purpose she has set a slow fire to the palace. It will blow up the powder magazine, when the Prophet and his henchmen are at a banquet in the great hall.

She recognises her lover. Her joy, however, is short-lived, for at that moment a captain tells Jean that he has been betrayed and that the Emperor's forces are at the palace gates. Berthe understands that her lover and the bloodstained Prophet are one and plunges a dagger into her heart.

Jean determines to die and joins the banqueters at their orgy. Smoke rises from the floor. Fides, in the general uproar and confusion, joins her son and dies with him as the powder magazine blows up.

John of Leyden's name was Jan Beuckelszoon. He was born in 1509. In business he was successively a tailor, a small merchant, and an innkeeper. After he had had himself crowned in Münster, that city became a scene of orgy and cruelty. It was captured by the imperial forces on 24 June 1535. The following January the 'prophet' was put to death by torture. The same fate was meted out to Knipperdölling, his henchman, who had conveniently rid him of one of his wives by cutting off her head.¹

The music of the first act of Le Prophète contains a cheerful chorus for peasants, a cavatina for Berthe, 'Mon coeur s'élance', in which she voices her joy over her expected union with Jean; the Latin chant of the three Anabaptists, gloomy yet stirring; the music of the brief revolt of the peasantry against Oberthal, the plea of Fides and Berthe to Oberthal for his sanction of Berthe's marriage to Jean, 'Un jour, dans les flots de la Meuse'; Oberthal's abduction of

¹ The story, with its mixture of libertarian idealism (the religious community whose inmates are pledged to work for the common good) and human fallibility (the reformers end up in betrayal, torture and destruction) attracted in the late twentieth century a very different composer from Meyerbeer, the Englishman Alexander Goehr, whose Behold the Sun had its première in Düsseldorf in 1985.

Berthe; the reappearance of the three Anabaptists and the renewal of their efforts to impress the people with a sense of the tyranny by which they are oppressed.

Opening the second act, in Jean's tavern, are the chorus and dance of Jean's friends, rejoicing at his prospective wedding. When the three Anabaptists have recognised his resemblance to the picture of David in the cathedral at Münster, Jean, observing their sombre yet impressive bearing, tells them of his dream, and asks them to interpret it: 'Sous les vastes arceaux d'un temple magnifique'. They promise him a throne. But he looks forward to his coming union with Berthe: 'Pour Berthe, moi, je soupire'. Jean's sacrifice of her in order to save his mother from death leads to Fides's solo, 'Ah, mon fils', one of the great airs for mezzo-soprano.

Most attractive in the next act is the ballet of the skaters on the frozen lake near the camp of the Anabaptists.¹

There is a stirring battle song for Zacharie, in which he sings of the enemy 'as numerous as the stars', yet defeated. Another striking number is the trio for Jonas, Zacharie, and Oberthal, especially the descriptive passage in which, in rhythm with the music, Jonas strikes flint and steel, ignites a lantern and by its light recognises Oberthal. When Jean rallies the Anabaptists and promises to lead them to victory, the act reaches a superb climax in a 'Hymne Triomphal' for Jean and chorus: 'Roi du Ciel et des Anges'.

The great procession in the cathedral with its march and chorus has been, since the first production of Le Prophète in 1849, a model of construction for spectacular scenes in opera. The march is famous. Highly dramatic is the scene in which Fides first proclaims and then denies that Jean is her son. The fifth act contains a striking solo for Fides ('O Prêtres de Baal') and a duet for her and Jean. The climax, however, comes with the drinking song, 'Versez, que tout respire l'ivresse et le délire', in the midst of which the building is blown up, and Jean perishes with those who would betray him. K.

DINORAH ou LE PARDON DE PLOËRMEL

Dinorah or The Pilgrimage of Ploërmel

Opera in three acts, words by Barbier and Carré. Première Opéra-Comique, Paris, 4 April 1859, with Cabel, St Foy, Faure. First performed Covent Garden, 1859 (in Italian), with Miolan-Carvalho; New Orleans, 1861; New York, 1862; Metropolitan, 1892, with van Zandt, Giannini, Lassalle. Revived Paris, 1912; Metropolitan, 1925, with Galli-Curci, Tokatyan, de Luca; Brussels, 1939. Apart from Galli-Curci, famous in the title role were Ilma di Murska, Patti, Tetrassini.

Dinorah, a peasant girl.....Soprano
Hoël, a goat-herd.....Baritone
Corentino, a bagpiper.....Tenor
Huntsman.....Bass
Harvester.....Tenor
Goat-Herds.....Soprano and Contralto

Place: A Village in Brittany

Time: Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Dinorah is betrothed to Hoël. Her cottage has been destroyed in a storm. Hoël, in order to rebuild it, goes into a region haunted by evil spirits, in search of hidden treasure. Dinorah, believing herself deserted, loses her reason and, with her goat, whose tinkling bell is heard, wanders through the mountains in search of Hoël.

Act I is preceded by an overture during which there is sung by the villagers behind the curtain the hymn to Our Lady of the Pardon. The scene is a rough mountain passage near Corentino's hut. Dinorah finds her goat asleep and sings to it a graceful lullaby, 'Dors, petite, dors tranquille'. Corentino, in his cottage, sings of his fear in this lonely region. He plays on his cornemuse. Dinorah makes him dance with her, while she sings.

When she hears someone approaching she jumps out of the window. It is Hoël. Both he and Corentino think she is a sprite. Hoël sings of the gold he expects to find, and offers Corentino a share in the treasure if he will help him. According to the legend, the first one to touch the treasure must die, and Hoël's seeming generosity is a ruse to make Corentino the victim. The tinkle of the goat's bell can be heard. Hoël advises that they follow the sound as it may lead to the treasure. The act closes with a trio, 'Ce tintement que l'on entend'. Dinorah stands among the high rocks, while Hoël and Corentino, the latter reluctantly, make ready to follow the sound of the bell.

¹ A century later heard as the music for Les Patineurs, Frederick Ashton's ballet for Sadler's Wells.

Act II. A birch wood by moonlight. It is here Dinorah sings of 'Le vieux sorcier de la montagne', following it with the 'Shadow Song', 'Ombre légère qui suit mes pas' – 'Ombra leggiera' is the more familiar Italian version.

The scene changes to a wild landscape. A ravine bridged by an uprooted tree. A storm is rising. Hoël and Corentino enter; later Dinorah. Through the night, she sings the legend of the treasure, 'Sombre destinée, âme condamnée'. Her words make Corentino see through Hoël's ruse. Dinorah sings, in cheerful contrast to the gathering storm. Lightning flashes show her goat crossing the ravine by the fallen tree. She runs after it, the sluice bursts and she is carried away by the flood. Hoël plunges into the wild water to save her.

Act III. Not enough of the actual story remains to make a third act. But as there has to be one, the opening is filled with a song for a Hunter, another for a Reaper, and a duet for Goat-Herds. Hoël enters carrying Dinorah. Hoël here has his principal air, 'Ah! mon remords te venge' (My remorse avenges you). The fainting Dinorah's reason is restored when she finds herself in her lover's arms. The villagers chant the 'Hymn of the Pardon'. A procession forms for the wedding.

K.

L'AFRICAINNE

The African Maid

Opera in five acts, words by Scribe. Première, Opéra, Paris, 28 April 1865, with Marie Sasse, Battu, Naudin, Faure.

Sélika, a slaveSoprano
 Inès, daughter of Don DiegoSoprano
 Vasco da Gama, officer in the Portuguese NavyTenor
 Nélusko, a slaveBaritone
 Don Pedro, President of the Royal CouncilBass
 Don Diego, member of the CouncilBass
 Don Alvar, member of the Council.....Tenor
 Grand InquisitorBass
 High Priest of Brahma.....Baritone

Priests, Councillors, Sailors, Indians, Attendants,
 Ladies, Soldiers

Place: Lisbon; at Sea; Madagascar

Time: Early Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 4 hours 10 minutes

Meyerbeer worked on L'Africaine for more than twenty years but died before the première.

Act I. The Council Chamber, in Lisbon. For two years, nothing has been heard of the ship of Bartholomew Diaz, the explorer, among whose officers was Vasco da Gama, fiancé of Inès, Don Diego's daughter.

The overture foreshadows Inès's attractive aria in the first scene. She is well aware of the rumour of Vasco's death but is determined to ignore it and recalls his song of farewell: 'Adieu, mon doux rivage'. She rejects Don Diego's proposal of a future husband – Don Pedro. The Council meets and interviews a young survivor of Diaz's expedition, none other than Vasco da Gama. He plans to discover the land beyond Africa, and in proof shows them two captives, Sélika and Nélusko, who come from it.

Don Pedro pilfers a crucial chart from Vasco's papers, then persuades the Council that Vasco's plans are futile. Vasco's reaction is to charge the Council with ignorance and bias; he is thrown into prison. The fully choral finale is large in scale and typically Meyerbeerian in spirit.

Act II. In a cell, Sélika watches the sleeping Vasco. At home, she is a queen, a fact known to Nélusko who loves her but not to Vasco with whom she is in love. She sings an aria of considerable originality ('Sur mes genoux, fils du soleil'); her love for Vasco overcomes her jealousy of Inès, whom he still loves, and impels her to protect him from the murderous Nélusko. Nélusko sings impressively: 'Fille des rois, à toi l'hommage'. On a map Sélika shows Vasco the route to the Indies, and their duet ('Combien tu m'es chère') suggests that he returns her love; Inès's arrival in the prison shatters her hopes. In return for Vasco's freedom, Inès will marry Don Pedro, and she bids him farewell. As a gesture and secure in his knowledge of the secret route, he offers her Sélika. Don Pedro announces that he, not Vasco, will lead the new expedition, with Nélusko as his pilot. There is an effective finale, shorter than Act I's but this time without chorus and with solo female voices added.

L'Africaine (Covent Garden, 1978, director Franco Enriquez, designer Fiorella Mariani). Act III, Don Pedro's ship.

Act III. Don Pedro's ship, at sea: two levels, Nélusko and the sailors on one, Inès and her ladies on the other, divided from Don Pedro and his entourage. The ladies sing first, then the sailors, who pray for protection. Don Alvaro, who spoke up for Vasco in the Council, warns Don Pedro of treachery from Nélusko, and Nélusko, after an impressive recitative ('Holà! matelots'), savagely invokes sea and storm to destroy his enemies: 'Adamastor, roi des vagues profondes'.

Vasco's boat approaches; Don Pedro treats his warning that they are off course as a mere excuse to see Inès, and he is seized. There is a septet before a violent storm breaks over the ship, which runs upon a reef. Nélusko's tribesmen kill or capture everyone on board.

Act IV. Before a temple, to the sound of a grand march and with elaborate dancing Sélika is welcomed by her subjects. Vasco was saved from the shipwreck, and in a magnificent aria ('O paradis') he celebrates the beauties of the new country he and his compatriots have braved so much to discover. To save him from death, Sélika asserts he is her husband, and Nélusko is forced to bear witness to her claim. In a beautiful aria, 'L'avoir tant adorée', he sings of his love, then swears to the truth of what Sélika says. The High Priest celebrates the marriage, Vasco tells Sélika he loves her after all, and their duet seems to seal the compact, until that is to say Vasco hears the voice of Inès, who has also been rescued, and old passion revives.

Act V. The garden of Sélika's palace. Sélika threatens Inès with death but contrives to forgive her and Vasco, and even persuades Nélusko to provide them with a ship for escape.

On a promontory overlooking the sea stands a mançanilla tree, whose perfume is lethal (a notion long thought far-fetched, but in the Caribbean, the manchineel tree is famed for its noxious properties; drips from its leaves cause severe burns and eating its fruit could kill). Sélika lies beneath its shade and watches the ship carrying away the man she loves: 'D'ici je vois la mer immense et sans limite'. It is her farewell at the same time to Vasco and to life, and Nélusko arrives to find her dead.

Meyerbeer is said to have considered L'Africaine his masterpiece, and it is true that it has fine set pieces, typical lyrical invention, rare opportunities for stage spectacle. But Scribe's plot is limp in comparison with the historically-based Les Huguenots, and if Nélusko as a character possesses a certain rude grandeur and the exotic Sélika an element of sympathy as the faithful, short-changed lover, Vasco himself is an unsatisfactory hero, ambitious and self-seeking and endowed with none of the romantic virtues which place steadfastness and honour above egotism. H.

DARIUS MILHAUD

(born 4 September 1892, died 22 June 1975)

Milhaud had already collaborated with Paul Claudel on the trilogy L'Orestie before accompanying the writer when he was appointed ambassador in Brazil. The five short operas he wrote between 1924 and 1927 were in sharp contrast to the huge Christophe Colomb (to a text by Claudel) which followed and was staged in 1930, and the large-scale Maximilien of 1932. Operas came regularly from his pen; the last, Saint Louis, roi de France (to a text by Claudel), was first performed only two years before his death.

LE PAUVRE MATELOT

The Poor Sailor

Opera in three acts, text by Jean Cocteau. Première Opéra-Comique, Paris, 16 December 1927, with Madeleine Sibille, Legrand, Vieuille, Musy, conductor Lauweryns. First performed Berlin, 1929, with Novotna, conductor Zemlinsky. Revived with new orchestration, Geneva, 1934; Philadelphia, 1937; Vienna, 1937; Opéra-Comique, 1938; Berlin, 1947; London Opera Club, 1950, with Vyvyan, Servant, Loring, Wallace, conductor Renton; la Scala, Milan, 1950, with Favero, Malipiero, Inghilleri, Beuf, conductor Sanzogno.

The WifeSoprano
The SailorTenor
His Father-in-LawBass
His FriendBaritone

Place: A Seaport

Time: 'The Present'
Running Time: 35 minutes

The opera, which is dedicated to Henri Sauguet, is divided into three acts, but is played without intervals and is very short. The action takes place in and near a bar kept by the Wife. Also visible are the street and a wine shop kept by the Friend.

Act I. The Wife and the Friend are dancing. She has waited fifteen years for the return of her husband from abroad, and has steadfastly refused to give up hope of his return. The Friend is disposed to encourage her to hope, and he expresses admiration for the way she has remained faithful. She might have deceived her husband if he had been there, but with his photograph still hanging over the bed, how could she do such a thing?

Her Father takes a very different view; why can't she find herself a man, who could take over the bar and run it properly? The Friend says that he himself has proposed to her, but she makes the obvious retort; supposing one day the bell rang and in walked her husband – his friend? Optimistically she imagines him coming back as rich as Croesus. If he is poor, there is no crime she would not commit to set him up again properly.

The Friend goes back to his shop. The Father repeats his suggestion that they would make a fine pair, but the Wife gives lyrical expression to her resolve to remain true to her husband. Her Father reminds her that she was twenty-five when he left, and is now forty. While they are arguing, the Sailor himself appears unobserved in the street, hesitates in front of their door, and then decides not to open it. What if his own wife does not recognise him? Would it not be best to see first what effect his appearance has on his Friend? He is at first rejected as a drunkard, until he mentions that he has a wife opposite. Then his Friend recognises him. The Sailor congratulates himself that he did not risk going home unannounced. He asks after his wife, and is reassured that she is waiting for him. He has money enough to end all their troubles.

The Sailor suggests he sleep in his Friend's house. He would like to meet his wife as a stranger.

Act II. Next day, the Sailor goes to see what his reception will be like at the bar. He tells his Wife that her husband has returned, but dare not come to her until nightfall, as he is pursued by creditors. His Father-in-Law sneers at the Wife, but she leads a short ensemble of strong rhythmical impulse: 'Cher époux!' She is quite undismayed to learn that had he accepted the love of a cannibal queen her husband might have come home with the treasures which in point of fact devolved upon his shipmate.

The Sailor asks if he may stay the night with them, and is told that no one who brings such good news could be refused so small a request. The Friend is full of curiosity and thinks of the excuse of returning the heavy hammer he borrowed the previous day from the Wife. As she locks up, she is struck with the resemblance which the weary Sailor, stretched out on a bench, bears to her husband.

Act III. The Sailor lies asleep. The Wife comes in with the hammer in her hand, looks at him for a moment, raises the hammer and strikes him on the head with it. When he moves convulsively, she strikes him again, then drops the hammer, and rifles his pockets quickly. The noise arouses her father, whom she instructs to help her carry the body. They will dump it in the rain-water tank, and tell the neighbour that their visitor had to leave early in the morning. There is a knock at the door, but they stay quiet and their neighbour leaves them undisturbed. They prepare to carry the body away, as the Wife sings lyrically of her husband's impending return.

H.

OPÉRAS-MINUTES

Instant Operas

Three one-act operas, lasting about seven or eight minutes each, text by Henri Hoppenot. L'enlèvement d'Europe was first given at Baden-Baden, 17 July 1927, in conjunction with Toch's Die Prinzessin auf der Erbse, Hindemith's Hin und Zurück, and Weill's Mahagonny. The same work was performed for the first time with the other two Opéras-Minutes at Wiesbaden, 20 April 1928. First performed Budapest, 1932, in Hungarian; Minneapolis, 1967; Florence, 1970.

These miniature but highly entertaining operas are nothing if not satirical in intent. Mythology in general, and more particularly the classical French interpretation of it, are spoofed to the limit, alike by librettist (who, like Claudel, once represented his country as ambassador) and composer. Milhaud's Phèdre bears the same relationship to Racine's as Offenbach's Orphée does to Gluck's. The music itself, spiced with South American rhythms, is very attractive, and Milhaud's quick-fire inventiveness seems peculiarly well suited to the original form he has invented.

L'ENLÈVEMENT D'EUROPE

The Rape of Europa

| | |
|--|----------|
| Agénor | Bass |
| Pergamon, Europa's suitor | Baritone |
| Jupiter, in the guise of a bull | Tenor |
| Europa, Agénor's daughter | Soprano |

| | | |
|----------------------------------|---|---------------|
| Chorus of 'Maîtresses-Servantes' | { | One Soprano |
| | | One Mezzo |
| | | One Contralto |
| Chorus of Soldier-Labourers | { | One Tenor |
| | | One Baritone |
| | | One Bass |

The set represents the front of the palace of King Agénor of Thebes. The chorus of women is hanging about near a well, and that of the men near a field. The Chorus reiterates the name of 'Europa', in alternate rising 7ths and 9ths. Pergamon emerges from the palace, and gives vent to his wrath at the discovery that Europa prefers the society of bulls and cows to that of a hero like himself. Agénor agrees that his daughter has never shown much taste for the company of men of warlike accomplishments. She appears with the bull to which she has taken so evident a fancy, and the chorus makes scornful references to her passion for its bellowings.

Jupiter explains his love for Europa, and pleads passionately for satisfaction of 'cette double ardeur du taureau dans mes reins et du Dieu dans mon cœur'. The chorus mocks the beast, and Pergamon, beside himself, draws his bow and looses an arrow at his rival, much to the consternation of the bystanders. The arrow strikes home, but the bull shakes itself free and the missile speeds back to him who dispatched it, and transfixes him. After Pergamon's death, the chorus sings a valediction, in which the 7ths and 9ths of the beginning are prominent. Europa rides away into the distance with the bull.

H.

L'ABANDON D'ARIANE

Ariadne Deserted

| | |
|---|---|
| Ariane..... | Soprano |
| Phèdre, her sister | Soprano |
| Thésée | Tenor |
| Dionysos, the god, in disguise | Baritone |
| Chorus of Shipwrecked Mariners |  {  One Tenor One Bass One Baritone   |
| Chorus of Gypsy Bacchants |  {  One Soprano One Mezzo One Contralto   |

The scene represents part of the island of Naxos; rocks visible in the background. During the piece, darkness falls, and it is almost night at the end. As the curtain rises, the stranded mariners are grouped left, playing dice, the Bacchants are sitting around a cooking pot, looking like gipsies; Dionysos is amongst the Bacchants, dressed as a beggar. Like a 'Greek chorus', the two groups join to convey the information that it is Ariane's custom to come to that part of the island every night in order to escape the attentions of Thésée, whom she cannot abide. Phèdre meanwhile longs unavailingly for his caresses.

Before long, the two sisters, dressed exactly alike, come into view, and each gives vivid utterance to the sentiment ascribed to her by the chorus, which for its part prays to Dionysos to help each in her different affliction. Dionysos, in his capacity as a beggar, laments his blindness and begs for charity. Each sister gives him money. When the sailors announce that Thésée can be seen coming that way, Ariane says she will hurry away, while Phèdre rejoices at the prospect of seeing her beloved.

Thésée cries aloud the name of Ariane, and tenderly asks if anyone can give him information as to her whereabouts. Dionysos offers him a cup of precious wine for which he returns thanks in an exultant musical sentence ending resoundingly on a high B flat. The wine has the effect of making him see double, and when Phèdre comes from her place of concealment he thinks she is the two sisters and goes out with her. The chorus comments in Tango rhythm, and Dionysos informs Ariane that Thésée will in future regard Phèdre as his consort. She thanks him for his kindness towards her, and a moment later Dionysos and the Bacchants shed their beggar's clothes and are revealed in dazzling white. Ariane and her sister gave alms to a god and his reward is to grant their joint wishes. She has one more request; may she finish her days with Diana in the firmament on high? It becomes darker and Dionysos leads her up the rocks; behind her appears the constellation of Ariadne. The chorus rejoices; the opening chorus is repeated in a different rhythm (alternating 6/8 and 5/8 in a bar), and sung over an instrumental accompaniment that has the flavour of a toccata from one of Monteverdi's operas.

H.

LA DÉLIVRANCE DE THÉSÉE

Theseus Redeemed

| | |
|--|---------------------|
| Aricie | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Phèdre, her sister | Soprano |
| Hippolyte, son of Phèdre | Baritone |
| Théramène, Hippolyte's friend | Baritone |
| Thésée, husband of Phèdre | Tenor |
| Chorus of Distant Voices | Mixed Vocal Quartet |

A great hall in the palace of Thésée; a throne in the middle. Hippolyte complains to his friend Théramène of the unwelcome attentions of his mother, Phèdre; he is in love with Aricie, to whom he presently pours out his heart, only to be told that Aricie cannot make a decision either way without the consent of Thésée, Hippolyte's father. Enter Phèdre, whose presence causes Aricie and Théràmène to withdraw respectfully. She is overjoyed to find Hippolyte alone, but he repulses her, and the trumpets announce the return of Thésée from yet another successful and hazardous exploit. When Thésée appears, Phèdre turns the tables and asks for his protection against her incestuous son. Thésée promptly banishes him and orders him to go out to do battle with the monster which even now threatens the walls of the city.

The chorus takes up the very attractive rhythm of the Beguine, which started as Hippolyte left the stage with Théràmène; the words are 'Oui, c'est lui! C'est bien lui!' With the chorus as background, Thésée gives an account of his adventure:

J'arrivai: Ils tremblèrent;
J'avancai: Ils reculèrent;
Je dégainai: Ils décampèrent;
Je les tuai: Ils expirèrent!

Thésée being a tenor, they 'decamp' on a top C, but, by the time his miniature aria has come to an end, the chorus is exclaiming at some new misfortune: 'O douleur! O tristesse!' In spite of the pleas of Phèdre and Aricie, they make no attempt to explain what causes their distress and alarm, but in no time Théràmène, who has witnessed all, returns. He takes up his position for 'Le Récit' (a reference to Racine's Phèdre) and begins: 'A peine nous sortions', only to be interrupted by the omniscient Thésée: 'Je connais ... finis vite.' There is nothing left for Théràmène to do (he makes this quite clear) but to revenge the death of Hippolyte. He takes out his sword and stabs Phèdre to the heart, whereupon Thésée orders the guards to hang him from the nearest tree.

Aricie, aided by the wordless chorus, laments the series of disasters which have befallen them in a single day, but consolation for the two survivors is close at hand. Thésée puts his arm round Aricie, and in phrases of exaggeratedly lyrical character invites her to console herself with him. Poor Aricie, who has earlier been referred to as 'craintive' and 'pudique', seems to be the only one of the characters to benefit from the catastrophes, and by the end we find Thésée addressing her more optimistically as 'la timide Aricie'.

H.

CHRISTOPHE COLOMB

Christopher Columbus

Opera in two parts and twenty-seven scenes, text by Paul Claudel. Première, Berlin, 5 May 1930, with Reinhardt, Scheidl, conductor Erich Kleiber. Given in concert form in Paris, 1936, London, 1937, Antwerp, 1940, New York, 1952, with Dow, David Lloyd, Harrell, Brownlee, Norman Scott, conductor Mitropoulos. In 1968, a one-act opera The Discovery of America, drawn by Gunther Schuller from Christophe Colomb, was performed in San Francisco.

Isabella, *Queen of Spain*Soprano
Christopher Columbus IBaritone
Christopher Columbus IIBaritone
NarratorSpeaker
Counsel for the ProsecutionSpeaker
The Representative of the SailorsSpeaker
Major-DomoTenor
Master of CeremoniesTenor
The CookTenor
The King of SpainBass
The CommandantBass
MessengerBaritone
Sultan MiramolinTenor

Chorus, Officers, Counsel, Creditors

Place: Genoa; Spain; on the Atlantic Ocean; America
Time: Before and After 1492

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Christophe Colomb is in the tradition of French operas built on the largest possible scale. Milhaud and Claudel have concentrated on the symbolical aspects of the story of Columbus, and the resulting opera is thus not only highly exacting to stage – it involves a vast apparatus – but anything but easy for the audience to understand. It belongs in fact, as Edward Dent has said in his Pelican Opera, to the category of works which one expects to see only once in a lifetime.

Act I. The Narrator and Chorus come on; the Narrator announces: 'The Book of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus, who discovered America.' He prays for light and strength in his endeavour to explain the book. On a cinematic screen at the back of the stage, a globe can be seen spinning; above it is a dove, glowing with light.

A humble inn at Valladolid. Columbus is seen as an old, broken man, his only possession a mule. Narrator and Chorus call on him to join with posterity in looking at his life and the results of his actions.

Prosecution and Defence argue over the behaviour of the King of Spain towards Columbus. He is accused of lying and exaggeration, but defends himself.

The Court of Isabella the Catholic. The Queen is shown as a child. She receives Sultan Miramolin, who gives her a dove in a cage. She accepts the gift, puts a ring on its foot, and releases it. As a boy Columbus read the story of Marco Polo. There is conflict between the views of the Man at the Window, who urges him to seek adventure, and the Chorus, which tries to prevent him leaving his family. His second self bids him follow the call of adventure. As the scene ends, a dove flies in through the window, with a ring on its foot.

Columbus sets out over the seas. He glories in the sea he has conquered, but the cries of his creditors will not be silenced; they agree that a last voyage, however desperate an undertaking, represents their only chance of payment. Columbus goes to the court of the King of Spain, where he is mocked for his pretensions.

Queen Isabella is seen at prayer. On the screen appear representations of events which have led to the unification of Spain. She has played her part by bringing Aragon to Castile; may she not now lay down her life, her duty accomplished? She sees a mystical vision and hears the voice of St James. Had she not another ring besides that she gave her husband? Yes, she put it on a dove's foot and she saw it again on Christopher Columbus's hand.

Cadiz. Recruiting is going on for Columbus's expedition. The Master of Ceremonies calls the roll of the demon gods of America. They refer to the plagues they will inflict on Columbus and his crew. The men wish to return and give up the expedition which they think is condemned by God from above. His senior officers and men all advise Columbus that the expedition is doomed unless he turns back at once. He refuses, and the situation becomes ugly. Columbus is so convinced that he is right in his calculations that he bids the sailors drink the water they have with them and eat the food; sufficient will still remain for their needs. A bird appears, and the scene ends with a cry of 'Land!' from the look-out.

In America, the ships can be seen approaching, and from them is heard the sound of a 'Te Deum'. The first part ends with a large-scale setting of the 'Sanctus'.

Part II. An interlude shows the effect Columbus's discovery has on the whole world. The Narrator tells of the difficulties which follow it; the cruel treatment of the natives leads to revolt and further repression; the New World does not bring profit, and Columbus's enemies are busy in Spain. The King summons three wise men to give him counsel. They warn him against Columbus: 'You must honour him – you must watch him – you must bury him.'

On his fourth voyage, Columbus was put in chains; he is exhorted by his successor to put forth his influence in saving the ship, which has run into dangerous waters. Columbus prays and three times the ship weathers the crises.

Columbus looks back at his past actions and their consequences. He sees the inhabitants of America, on whom his discovery of the new continent has brought ruin and destruction; the slaves he sold to pay his debts; the wife and mother he abandoned; himself as he was at Genoa, and at Lisbon; and his own ghost. The Cook tells him that the New World will not be named after him but after an obscure member of his own crew, Amerigo Vespucci, whom he can scarcely remember.

A Messenger comes from the dying Queen Isabella. She thought of Columbus and his expedition, and now sends words of comfort to him. Her funeral procession can be seen. The servant at the inn comes in to demand payment of Columbus's bill. Will the innkeeper not wait? He once asked his sailors to wait three days before killing him, and in those days he discovered a New World. Will the innkeeper not do the same? That worthy answers that he will take the mule unless he is paid by tomorrow.

The Paradise of the Idea. The scene resembles the court of Isabella in Mallorca. But everything has become the colour of silver. It is paradise. Isabella greets her friends, and is welcomed by the ladies of her court – as children. Sultan Miramolin brings her gifts, and she remembers when he gave her a dove long ago, and she put her ring on its foot. How can she enter into the kingdom of heaven without her friend Christopher Columbus? she asks. No one has been able to find him, she is told; but Isabella can see him in the inn at Valladolid, and she is told that he is dying on a bed of straw. He does not wish to come at her command, but intends to fulfil his destiny, with her ring on his finger.

The image of St James appears on the screen; he it was who guided the Queen safely to heaven. Isabella leads a prayer for Columbus. At the final Alleluiah, a dove flies from the globe.

CARL MILLÖCKER

(born 29 April 1842, died 31 December 1899)

DER BETTELSTUDENT

The Beggar Student

Comic opera in three acts, text by Zell and Genée. First performed at the Theater an der Wien, Vienna, 6 December 1882; New York, 1883; London, Alhambra Theatre, 1884 (in English); Royalty Theatre, 1895 (in German). Revived at Vienna, Staatsoper, 1936, with Margit Bokor, Richard Sallaba, Alfred Jerger, conductor Josef Krips; Volksoper, 1949, with Maria Cebotari, Lorna Sidney, Fred Liewehr, Kurt Preger, Walter Höfermayer, conductor Anton Paulik.

Palmatica, Countess Nowalska Mezzo-Soprano
 Countess Laura, her daughter Soprano
 Countess Bronislawa, Laura's sister Soprano
 Simon, the beggar student Tenor
 Jan Janitzky, Simon's friend Tenor
 Colonel Ollendorf Bass
 Enterich, prison governor Baritone

Saxon officers
 Richthofen
 Wangenheim
 Henrici

Place: Cracow

Time: 1704

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Like Suppé, under whose baton he played flute at the Theater in der Josefstadt in Vienna, Millöcker was a successful conductor of operetta before he hit the target with Gräfin Dubarry (1879) and, even more firmly in 1882, with Der Bettelstudent. This operetta's romantic story, together with its richly comic overtones and tunes of melting tenderness, has kept it in the Viennese and German repertories to this day.

Colonel Ollendorf, Cracow's irascible governor, has been badly hurt: he was just starting to make advances to Countess Laura, a proud Polish beauty, when she struck him in the face with her fan – in public, and at an official ball! Honour must be satisfied and he will have his revenge.

Act I. We are in the prison; the prisoners' wives try to persuade Enterich, the prison governor, to let them see their husbands. He is disposed to grant their request, but he confiscates the various delicacies which are intended to cheer the prisoners' lot. To the prison comes Ollendorf, complaining loudly at the treatment meted out to him the night before. His entrance song, with its waltz refrain 'Ach, ich hab' sie ja nur auf die Schulter geküsst', gives an excellent opportunity to a comic bass. The object of Ollendorf's visit is to find two young prisoners and persuade them to aid him in his scheme of revenge: they are to pay court to Countess Laura and her sister, and he will then be able to expose the joke and so avenge the insult to his honour. The two Poles he chooses – political prisoners, both of them – seem light-hearted enough to judge by their duet; they agree to fall in with the scheme, and to say nothing about its origin. Ollendorf will fit them out as Prince Wibicky and his secretary – and they will have their freedom.

The scene changes to a fair in the Rathausplatz in Cracow, which is ushered in with a brisk 6/8 chorus and a march. Palmatica and her daughters are there, too poor to buy anything, but doing their best in their 3/8 trio to disguise this painful fact by sneering at what is exposed for sale. Ollendorf introduces Prince Wibicky and his companion to the Countess and her daughters, and Simon proceeds to tell them of his wanderings over the earth; the flirtations he has indulged in wherever he has been have only proved to him how far superior Polish girls are to those in the rest of the world. His romance, 'Ich knüpfte manche zarte Bände', is an excellent example of the unpretentiousness and graceful charm which is to be found in Millöcker's score. Simon proposes to Laura, and all celebrate the betrothal. Laura sings a Polish song – joy and grief, she says, are closely allied; its solemn andante opening soon gives way to a sparkling allegretto. The town band puts in an appearance with a march which takes its cue from Schubert rather than Sousa, and the act comes to an end with general rejoicing.

Act II. Laura is at home trying on her wedding dress, assisted by her mother and her sister. She repeats the advice her mother has given her, that husbands can and should be dominated by their wives – not by direct precept but by persuasion, by tears not threats. The Prince's secretary is announced, and Jan makes up to Bronislawa in a charming duet.

Jan reminds Simon that plans are afoot to restore Cracow to the Poles, that the King's nephew, Duke Adam, is preparing a coup, and that only money is wanting. It looks as though their schemes are coming to fruition. Simon is alone with Laura; would she still love him, he asks, if he were poor, untitled, even an impostor? She tells him her love is proof against any such change in his status, and asks him whether he would love her if someone prettier came along, rich and well-born. In a charming duet ('Ich setz' den Fall') Simon reassures her in his turn. Taking courage from what Laura has told him, Simon writes her a note telling her the truth about his deception; he is astonished when he sees later that its reception seems to have made no difference in her attitude towards him, but he does not know that Ollendorf has had it intercepted. The marriage is performed, and Ollendorf waits to savour his triumph, which will not be long delayed. The happy couple are congratulated, their healths drunk in the bride's shoe, the mazurka is danced, when suddenly rowdy singing is heard outside: Simon's fellow-prisoners have come to join in the fun. The truth must come out. Ollendorf explains that the joke was his revenge: after all, he only kissed her on the shoulder, but she slapped his face in public. She may repent now at her leisure.

Act III. The aftermath of Ollendorf's disclosure is still to be reckoned with. People comment on Simon's dastardly behaviour and on the punishment which they cannot help thinking Laura has earned by her behaviour. Bronislawa confesses that she is still secure in her love, and that the day's tragedy has not had the effect of removing her appetite, which she had hoped would be assuaged at the wedding feast.

Simon is disconsolate, but Jan explains to him that all will yet be well. He seems disgraced but he still has a part to play in the freeing of Cracow. Ollendorf has approached Jan and bribed him – with the 200,000 crowns they need to finance Duke Adam's insurrection – if he will give the patriot away. He for his part has promised to do so after the wedding feast, and Simon must pretend, for the sake of Poland, to be the Duke; only by this means can enough time be gained to enable the Duke himself to get inside the gates with his troops. Simon confesses that the game is up for him in his best known aria, 'Ich hab' kein Geld, bin vogelfrei', with its refrain challenging Dame Fortune to another game of chance.

Palmatica takes to abusing poor Simon, in spite of the comment of Ollendorf and Jan, and much to the Beggar Student's rage. Eventually, Ollendorf reveals what he describes as the fact of the matter: he has discovered that Simon is none other than Duke Adam, and he must take him off to prison and there chop off his head. Consternation is general, not least as far as Simon is concerned; Palmatica says she suspected he was noble all along and is delighted to have him as son-in-law, Laura frantically announces she will die with him, and Jan trembles in case Simon should not play his part adequately. All is well, however; a cannon shot is heard, and the news arrives that Duke Adam has won control of the city. Ollendorf admits he must give himself up – whereupon Bronislawa says she has already surrendered herself, to the Secretary. Laura says she has done no less, to the Beggar Student, but Jan hastens to correct her: in future he will be known as Count Simon Rymanowitsch. The opera ends in rejoicing. H.

STANISŁAW MONIUSZKO

(born 5 May 1819, died 4 June 1872)

HALKA

Opera in four acts, libretto by W. Wolski (founded on a story by K.W. Wojcicki). In its original two-act version, produced privately at Wilna on 20 December 1847, but enlarged to the four-act version with première at Warsaw, 1 January 1858. It is the most popular Polish opera ever written; its 500th performance was in Warsaw in 1900 and its 1000th in 1935. First performed in Prague, 1868, Moscow, 1869, Vienna, 1892, and at Volksooper, 1926; New York, 1903 (in Russian) and 1940 (in Polish); Milan, 1905; Hamburg, 1935; Berlin, 1936, with Tiana Lemnitz, Marcel Wittrisch.

| | |
|-------------------------------------|---------------|
| Halka, a peasant girl | Soprano |
| Jontek, a peasant lad | Tenor |
| Stolnik, a landowner | Bass |
| Zofia, his daughter | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Janusz, a young nobleman | Baritone |
| Dziemba, Stolnik's major-domo | Bass |
| A Bagpiper | Baritone |
| Highlanders, Guests, Noblemen | |

Place: Podhale, in South Poland

Time: End of the Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Moniuszko studied in Berlin and wrote his first Opera, Halka, while still in his middle twenties. It is the story of the passionate love of a young girl for the Lord of the Manor, who leaves her in order to marry a girl of his own station. The music speaks with an individual voice, using the arias and ensembles of the period and adding a strong Polish characteristic, most apparent in the dances and choruses. Halka was much admired by Hans von Bülow, who wrote about it in Schumann's Neue Zeitschrift für Musik in 1858 with enthusiasm. Moniuszko served as Director of the Warsaw Opera before dying at the early age of fifty-three.

Act I. The impressive overture uses material from the opera. At the house of the landowner Stolnik, where a party is taking place to celebrate the engagement of his daughter Zofia to Janusz, a young nobleman, the guests dance a Polonaise of great verve and splendour. Janusz asks Stolnik for a blessing on his bride and himself, which the old man gives in a lyrical trio. Halka's voice, recognised only by Janusz, her lover, can be heard singing outside. Janusz denies any knowledge of the singer, but, when Zofia and Stolnik leave, he is torn between love for his fiancée and guilty passion for Halka and in an aria expresses remorse for his betrayal of the orphan girl, who expects his child.

Halka enters the house and repeats the haunting folk-like melody heard earlier, at first without noticing Janusz, for whom, when she sees him, her greeting is ecstatic. Their duet discloses his continued and genuine remorse, her single-minded devotion, and before it ends, Janusz makes an assignation with her on the outskirts of the town. When Halka has gone, the celebrations start again, Janusz feigns happiness, Stolnik returns thanks to the guests and celebrates his pleasure in a lively song. The act finishes with a brilliant Mazurka.

Act II. After a storm introduction, Halka sings a melancholy song of her betrayed love as she watches outside the house which she knows shelters her beloved Janusz. The aria reaches an impassioned climax before Jontek, her village sweetheart, arrives to take her back to their mountain village. He tries to convince her that Janusz has no more interest in her, but she, he insists in a fine and vigorous aria, still foolishly believes in his love. She is wrong; he has given his heart to another. Halka hears the sound of singing indoors, and Jontek cannot stop her clamouring to be let in. When Janusz appears demanding to know who was making the noise, Halka utterly loses control of her feelings. The confrontation between Janusz and Jontek begins with dignity on both sides, but Jontek does not try to conceal his indignation at the way Halka has been treated. In a short finale Halka and Jontek are thrown out.

Act III. Sunday in a mountain village, the property of Janusz's family. A month later. Villagers are outside the church after Vespers, and their gossip is of the young squire's imminent entry into the state of matrimony, something they say which will not obviate the need for the young girls of the village to be on their guard against him.

There is a brisk mountain dance (Gorale) and Halka and Jontek return to the village. In a scene of some expansiveness, they describe their inhumane treatment at the manor and receive a full measure of sympathy from the villagers. A black raven flies over as the wedding procession of Janusz and Zofia is seen in the distance.

Act IV. Near the village cemetery, Jontek laments the misfortunes of Halka, who would die, he says, if she saw Janusz with his bride. The village bagpiper playing in the distance strikes Jontek as a harbinger of misfortune, and he sings the best-known single number of the score, a beautiful aria ('The trees are rustling in the breeze') once a favourite of recording tenors.

Dziemba is delighted that the villagers are gathered to greet bride and bridegroom, who presently in their turn appear, Janusz to his consternation seeing Halka among the bystanders. Village rejoicing continues but Zofia notices Halka's grief, and she and her father seem to recognise her voice. The scene builds to a beautiful ensemble as all implore God's mercy on the unhappy woman. The wedding party goes into church and Dziemba bids the villagers be merry, an instruction they seem disposed to follow. Halka repeats the words with some bitterness, then sees Janusz in church and again starts to lose control. Even the faithful Jontek cannot comfort her, and the sound of a prayer from inside loosens Halka's hold on reason. In a cavatina, she laments that Janusz has a heart of stone, no pity for her, no pity for his child. She thinks of setting the church on fire, then the sight of the innocents who would lose their lives turns her from her purpose and she throws the firebrand into the river. Janusz she still loves and she can no longer contemplate revenge. Instead she will drown herself and this she does suddenly and dramatically, leaving Jontek calling to her, but Dziemba again rousing the villagers to sing the wedding hymn. H.

ITALO MONTEMEZZI

(born 4 August 1875, died 15 May 1952)

Although the Metropolitan in New York revived Giovanni Gallurese for five performances in 1925 in an attempt to capitalise on the success of L'Amore dei tre Re, Montemezzi remains a one-opera composer. His style has been described as unassuming and unadventurous, and he was undoubtedly helped by the excellent subject of Sem Benelli's play, with its heavily symbolical overtones. Nonetheless, the music itself is outstanding for its period in Italy.

L'AMORE DEI TRE RE

The Love of Three Kings

Opera in three acts, text by Sem Benelli, from his play of the same name. Première, la Scala, Milan, 10 April 1913, with Villani, Ferrari-Fontana, Galeffi, de Angelis, conductor Serafin. First performed Metropolitan, New York, 1914, with Bori, Ferrari-Fontana, Amato, Didur, conductor Toscanini; Covent Garden, 1914, with Edvina, Crimi, Cigada, Didur, conductor Moranzoni. Revivals include Metropolitan, 1926, with Ponselle, Gigli, Danise, Didur, conductor Serafin; 1939, with Jepson, Tokatyan, Bonelli, Pinza, conductor Papi; la Scala, 1926, with Cobelli, Lo Giudice, Morelli, de Angelis, conductor Toscanini; 1932, with dalla Rizza, conductor de Sabata; 1953, with Araujo, Prandelli, Valdengo, Rossi-Lemeni, conductor de Sabata; Covent Garden, 1930, with Ponselle, Merli, Inghilleri, Autori (later Pinza), conductor Bellezza; San Francisco, 1941, with Moore, Kullman, Weede, Pinza, conductor Montemezzi.

Archibaldo, King of Altura.....Bass
Manfredo, son of Archibaldo.....Baritone
Avito, a former prince of Altura.....Tenor

Flaminio, a castle guard.....Tenor
Fiora, wife of Manfredo.....Soprano

A Youth, a Handmaiden, a Young Girl, an Old Woman

Place: A Remote Castle of Italy

Time: The Tenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

This opera is one of the most successful products of twentieth-century Italian music, more popular, it must be admitted, in America, where it has been frequently performed, than in its native Italy. Based upon a powerful tragedy by Sem Benelli, one of the foremost of Italian playwrights, it is a combination of terse, swiftly moving drama with a score which vividly depicts events progressing fatefully toward an inevitable human cataclysm. While there are few set-pieces in Montemezzi's score, nevertheless it is melodious, a glowing medieval tapestry.

Act I. The scene is a spacious hall open to a terrace. A lantern employed as a signal sheds its reddish light dimly through the gloom before dawn.

From the left enters Archibaldo. He is old with flowing white hair and beard, and he is blind. He is led in by his guide Flaminio. As if he saw, the old blind King points to the door of a chamber across the hall and bids Flaminio look and tell if it is quite shut. It is slightly open. Archibaldo in a low voice orders him to shut it, but make no noise, then, hastily changing his mind, to leave it as it is.

In the actions of the old King, who cannot see but whose sense of hearing is weirdly acute, and in the subtle suggestion of suspicion that all is not well, the very opening of this opera casts a spell of the uncanny over the hearer. This is enhanced by the groping character of the theme which accompanies the entrance of Archibaldo with his guide.

There is mention of Fiora, the wife of Archibaldo's son, Manfredo, who is in the north, laying siege to an enemy stronghold. There is mention too of Avito, a prince of Altura, to whom Fiora was betrothed before Archibaldo conquered Italy, but whose marriage to Manfredo, notwithstanding her previous betrothal, was one of the conditions of peace. Presumably – as is to be gathered from the brief colloquy – Archibaldo has come into the hall to watch with Flaminio for the possible return of Manfredo, but the restlessness of the old King, his commands regarding the door opposite, and even certain inferences to be drawn from what he says, lead to the conclusion that he suspects his son's wife and Avito. It is also clear – subtly conveyed, without being stated in so many words – that Flaminio, though in the service of Archibaldo, is faithful to Avito, like himself a native of the country which Archibaldo has humbled.

When Flaminio reminds Archibaldo that Avito was to have wedded Fiora, the blind King bids his guide look out into the valley for any sign of Manfredo's approach. 'Nessuno, mio signore! Tutto è pace!' is Flaminio's reply. (No one, my lord! All is quiet!)

Archibaldo, recalling his younger years, tells eloquently of his conquest of Italy, apostrophising the ravishing beauty of the country when it first met his gaze, before he descended the mountains from which he beheld it. He bids Flaminio put out the lantern, since Manfredo does not come. Flaminio obeys; then, as there is heard in the distance the sound of a rustic flute, he urges upon Archibaldo that they go. It is nearly dawn, the flute appears to have been a signal which Flaminio understands. He is obviously uneasy, as he leads Archibaldo out of the hall.

Avito and Fiora come out of her room. Her hair hangs in disorder around her face, her slender figure is draped in a fine ivory-white garment. The quiet that prevails fills Avito with apprehension. Fiora, confident through love, seeks to reassure him.

There is a brief but passionate love scene. Then Avito perceives that the lantern has been extinguished. He is sure someone has been there, that they are spied upon. Once more Fiora tries to give him confidence. Then she herself hears someone approaching. Avito escapes from the terrace into the dim light. The door on the left opens and Archibaldo appears alone. He calls 'Fiora! Fiora! Fiora!'

Concealing every movement from the old man's ears, she tries to glide back to her chamber. But he hears her. 'I hear you breathing! You are breathless and excited! O Fiora, say, with whom have you been speaking?'

Deliberately she deceives him. His keen sense tells him that she lies. For when she sought to escape from him, he heard her 'gliding thro' the shadows like a snowy wing'.

Flaminio comes hurrying in. The gleam of armoured men has been seen in the distance. Manfredo is returning. His trumpet is sounded. Even now he is upon the battlement and embraced by his father. Longing for his wife, Fiora, has led him for a time to forsake the siege. Fiora greets him, but with no more than a semblance of kindness. With cunning, she taunts Archibaldo by telling Manfredo that she had come out upon the terrace at dawn to watch for him, the truth of which assertion Archibaldo can affirm, for he found her there. As they go to their chamber, the old man, suspecting, fearing, thanks God that he is blind.

Act II. The scene is a circular terrace on the high castle walls. A single staircase leads up to the battlements. It is afternoon. The sky is covered with changing, fleeting clouds. Trumpet blasts are heard from the valley. From the left comes Manfredo with his arms around Fiora. He pleads for her love. As a last boon before he departs he asks her to mount the stairway and, as he departs, wave to him with her scarf. Sincerely moved by his plea, a request so simple and yet seemingly meaning so much to him, she promises that she will do it. He kisses her, and runs off to lead his men back to the siege.

Fiora tries to shake off the sensation of her husband's embrace. She ascends to the battlemented wall. A handmaid brings her an inlaid casket, from which she draws a long white scarf. The orchestra graphically depicts the departure of Manfredo at the head of his cavalcade.

Fiora sees the horsemen disappear in the valley. As she waves the veil her hand drops wearily each time. Avito comes. He tells her it is to say farewell. At first, still touched by the pity which she has felt for her husband, Fiora restrains her passionate longing for her lover, once or twice waves the scarf, tries to do so again, lets her arms drop, her head droop, falls into his arms, and they kiss each other as if dying of love. 'Come tremi, diletto' (How you tremble, beloved!) whispers Fiora. 'Guarda in su! Siamo in cielo!' (Look up! We are in heaven!) responds Avito.

But the avenger is near. He is old, he is blind, but he knows. Avito is about to throw himself upon him with his drawn dagger, but is stopped by a gesture from Flaminio, who has followed the King. Avito goes. But Archibaldo has heard his footsteps. The King orders Flaminio to leave him with Fiora. Flaminio bids him listen to the sound of horses' hooves in the valley. Manfredo is returning. Fiora senses that her husband has missed the waving of the scarf. Archibaldo orders Flaminio to go to meet the Prince.

The old King bluntly accuses Fiora of having been with her lover. Cowering on a stone bench that runs around the wall, she denies it. Archibaldo seizes her. Rearing like a serpent, Fiora, losing all fear, in the virtual certainty of death at the hands of the powerful old man, boldly vaunts her lover. Archibaldo demands his name. She refuses to give it. He seizes her by the throat, again demands the name, and when she still refuses, throttles her. Manfredo arrives. Briefly the old man tells him of Fiora's guilt. Yet Manfredo cannot hate her. He is moved to pity by the great love of which her heart was capable, even though it was not for him. He goes out slowly, while Archibaldo lifts the slender body of the dead woman across his chest, and follows him.

Act III. The crypt of the castle. Fiora lies upon her bier. Around her mourn people of her country.

Out of the darkness comes Avito. The others depart in order that he may be alone with his beloved, for he too is of their country, and they understand. 'Fiora! Fiora! – È silenzio!' are his first words, as he gazes upon her. Desperately, he throws himself beside her and presses his lips on hers. A sudden chill, as of approaching death, passes through him. He rises, takes a few tottering steps towards the door.

Like a shadow, Manfredo approaches. He has come to seize his wife's lover, whose name his father could not wring from her, but whom at last they have caught. He recognises Avito.

Upon Fiora's lips Archibaldo has spread a virulent poison, knowing that her lover would come into the crypt to kiss her. With his last breath, Avito says that she loved him as the life that they took from her, aye, even more. Despite the avowal, Manfredo is disposed to wonder at the vast love Fiora was capable of bestowing, yet not upon himself.

Avito is dead. Manfredo, too, throws himself upon Fiora's corpse, and from her lips draws in what remains of the poison, quivers, while death slowly creeps through his veins, then enters eternal darkness, as Archibaldo gropes his way into the crypt. The blind King approaches the bier, feels a body lying by it, believes he has caught Fiora's lover, only to find that the corpse is that of his son.

Such is the love of three Kings; of Archibaldo for his son, of Avito for the woman who loved him, of Manfredo for the woman who loved him not. Or, if deeper meaning is looked for in Sem Benelli's powerful tragedy, the three kings are in love with Italy, represented by Fiora, who hates and scorns the conqueror of her country.

K.

CLAUDIO MONTEVERDI

(born 15 May 1567, died 29 November 1643)

Man's instinct for drama expressed through (as opposed to accompanied by) music has taken very many forms through the ages – the tragedies and comedies of the Greeks, the Buffalo dances of American Indian Blackfoots, the Ramayana of India, Miracle plays, Mysteries and Masques, the Christian Mass itself – and opera is a culmination of a particular form of Western expression, itself to this day in a constant state of evolution.

Modern opera may conveniently be said to have begun in 1600, the date of Peri's Euridice, the first surviving example of the form (his Dafne, 1597, has been lost).

At the end of the sixteenth century a small group of aristocratic intelligentsia, known collectively to musical history as the 'Camerata', was meeting in Florence. Under the auspices of Count Giovanni Bardi di Vernio, and later of Jacopo Corsi, it included composers such as Vincenzo Galilei (father of the astronomer), Emilio de' Cavalieri, Jacopo Peri and Giulio Caccini, and the avowed intention was to reproduce as far as possible the combination of words and music which together made up Greek theatre. With this restorative aim in view, the members laid down that the text must at all times be understood, that the words must be sung with a scrupulously correct and natural declamation, and that above all the music must interpret the spirit of the whole, not concentrate on details of incidents and words or even individual syllables. In a word, taking the Greeks as their authorities, the composers and poets concerned were anxious to end the distortion of the words which was inevitable in polyphonic music; in its place they were responsible for putting monody (or solo song), to form something like the opera we know today.

Claudio Monteverdi, already highly successful in polyphonic style, was the composer who was able to build on the foundations which had been laid by the Florentine 'Camerata' and his first opera, Orfeo, has been described by Professor Jack Westrup as a landmark 'not because it broke new ground but because in it imagination took control of theory'. It was opera's good fortune that there should appear so soon a composer whose outlook was essentially dramatic, and Monteverdi's Orfeo makes the Euridice of Peri and Caccini (both set Rinuccini's libretto in the same year, 1600) appear pale and monotonous by comparison.

Monteverdi's career is conveniently divided into two sections: during the first, 1590–1612, he was in the service of the Mantuan court and during the second, 1613–43, he worked in Venice, as Maestro di Cappella of San Marco and as a composer for the theatre. During the first period he wrote three of the twenty-one dramatic (or semi-dramatic) pieces to his credit (Orfeo and Il Ballo delle Ingrate survive complete, but only a few fragments of Arianna exist today); of the remaining eighteen, all but four have disappeared (Tirsi e Clori, a ballet-opera; Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda, a dramatic cantata; and the operas Il Ritorno d'Ulisse in Patria and L'Incoronazione di Poppea survive).

Monteverdi represents not so much revolution as the culmination of a period of change, and he was a composer who was thoroughly at home in both the polyphonic and the monodic styles. H.

LA FAVOLA D'ORFEO

The Legend of Orpheus

Opera in a prologue and five acts, text by Alessandro Striggio. First produced privately at the Accademia degli Invaghiti, Mantua, February 1607, with Francesco Rasi as Orfeo, and on 24 February of the same year at the Court Theatre, Mantua. In August 1607 the opera was given in Monteverdi's native town of Cremona, and it is likely that there were stage productions in Turin, Florence and Milan.

Orfeo was revived in 1904 in a concert version in Paris (arranged Vincent d'Indy); in 1909 in Milan and other Italian cities (arranged Giacomo Orefice); in 1910 in Brussels. The first modern staging was at the Théâtre Réjane, Paris, in 1911, in d'Indy's version.

The opera was first heard in America in concert form at the Metropolitan, New York, in 1912 (arranged Orefice), when Hermann Weil was Orfeo. In 1913 Chicago heard a concert version, conducted by Campanini and with Sammarco in the title role. There was a stage performance in Breslau in 1913 arranged by Erdmann-Guckel, and a new realisation by Carl Orff was heard at Mannheim in 1925. Malipiero's arrangement was first performed in Leningrad in 1929. The first American stage performance took place in 1929 at Northampton, Massachusetts, under the auspices of Smith College (in Malipiero's version) with Charles Kullman as Orfeo.

In England, the first performance (in concert form, arranged d'Indy) took place under the auspices of the Institut Français in 1924, and a stage version (arranged J.A. Westrup and W.H. Harris) was seen in Oxford in 1925 and in London in 1929. Italian revivals have been at the Rome Opera, 1934 (arranged Benvenuti), with Franci (Orfeo), conductor Serafin; at la Scala, Milan, 1935 (arranged Respighi), under Marinuzzi and with Carlo Galeffi (Orfeo). Orfeo was produced in Budapest in 1936 (in Respighi's version) and remained in the regular repertory for a number of years. Revived New York City Center, 1960, with Souzay, conductor Stokowski; Sadler's Wells Opera (realised by Raymond Leppard), 1965, with John Wakefield; Kent Opera (in Roger Norrington's edition), 1976; Edinburgh Festival, 1978, by Zürich Opera in Harnoncourt's realisation; English National Opera, 1981, produced by David Freeman with Anthony Rolfe Johnson (John Eliot Gardiner conducted his own realisation).

| | |
|--|--------------------|
| La Musica (Prologue) | Soprano |
| Orfeo, a poet | Tenor |
| Euridice, his wife | Soprano |
| A Nymph | Soprano |
| Four Shepherds..... | Three Tenors, Bass |
| Messenger | Soprano |
| Speranza (Hope) | Soprano |
| Charonte (Charon) | Bass |
| Proserpina, Queen of the Underworld | Soprano |
| Plutone (Pluto), King of the Underworld | Bass |
| Apollo | Tenor or Baritone |
| Nymphs, Shepherds, Spirits of the Underworld | |

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Orfeo was written for performance at court where instrumental resources were lavish. When Monteverdi later wrote for the public theatres of Venice, where profit was a prime motive, the instruments at his disposal were necessarily more limited. It is perhaps worth while to give a list¹ of the instruments called for at the beginning of the score, and of the additional ones mentioned in the inner pages:

Fundamental instruments (i.e. chord-playing)

- 2 clavicembalos
- 1 double harp (one more needed in performance?)
- 2 chitarrones (one more called for in score)
- 2 bass cithers (not listed but mentioned in score)
- 3 bass gambas
- 2 organs with wood (flute) pipes (Organi di Legno)
- 1 organ with reed pipes (Regale)

Stringed instruments

- 2 small violins (alla francese)
- 10 viole de braccio (i.e. a string ensemble, possibly 4 violins, 4 violas, 2 violoncellos)
- 2 contrabass viols

Wind instruments

- 4 trombones (one more called for in score)
- 2 cornetts
- 1 flautino alla Vigesima Seconda (i.e. a high recorder; one more (?) called for in score)
- 1 high trumpet (clarino; possibly referring to use of high range of ordinary trumpet)
- 3 soft trumpets (trombe sordine)

It seems likely that many of the players doubled, and of course not all the instruments were used at once, apart that is to say from the opening toccata, some of the sinfonie, and the accompaniments of a few of the choruses. Monteverdi indicated what combination of instruments he required, and he used the contrast of orchestral colour for dramatic purposes.

It is a piece of the greatest good fortune that so early in the history of Opera (as opposed to the much longer history of Music Drama), there should in Monteverdi have appeared a master and that his first opera should be a masterpiece. But it is no accident that this first opera should open with a clarion call still unrivalled in its way among operatic introductions. This thrice played toccata in C major was perhaps the accompaniment to an entry by Monteverdi's patrons, the Gonzagas, and their guests, but such a circumstance detracts not at all from its effect, which Hans Redlich has rightly called 'shattering'. The Prologue consists of a recitation by La Musica of her powers; there are five verses, composed on a bass, each introduced by a ritornello which is played for the sixth time after the last verse. The same ritornello recurs for the seventh and eighth times at the end of Act II and at the beginning of Act V. These ritornelli are employed throughout the opera to create appropriate atmosphere.

Act I. Shepherds and Nymphs rejoice over the wedding of Orfeo and Euridice. Orfeo himself sings the first of his big solos, 'Rosa del ciel'. This is followed by a stanza for Euridice, and the act ends with a beautiful chorus praying that their happy state may bring no misfortune on the lovers.

Act II is dominated by the great scene for the Messenger, and by Orfeo's lament, but it begins with a long, beautiful pastoral episode. The scene is rounded off by a short chorus in which the Shepherds beg Orfeo to sing. Orfeo sings a strophic song, 'Vi ricordo o boschi ombrosi', each of the four verses being preceded by a ritornello. It is a simple, carefree aria, and perfectly establishes the mood of contentment and happiness which is so suddenly broken by the advent of the Messenger with the news of Euridice's death. The unclouded happiness and serenity which have seemed to be Orfeo's have aroused the envy of the gods; the chorus is immediately apprehensive of the nature of the Messenger's errand; Orfeo alone is unaware of the approach of tragedy. 'Ahi, caso acerbo' sings the Messenger to a phrase which is later repeated by the Shepherds, and the chorus. The solo is one of great emotional and dramatic import, and the few phrases of dialogue with Orfeo at the beginning, ending with his stunned 'Ohimè', produce an extraordinary intensity by the simplest means. The Messenger's narration over, the first reaction of horror comes (to the words 'Ahi, caso acerbo') from the Shepherds. A moment later Orfeo (as if repeating the last words he heard, suggests Leo Schrade¹) begins his lament, 'Tu se' morta, se' morta mia vita'. It is short, the feeling is restrained, even classical, but the evocative power of the music is unsurpassed, and the simplicity and passion of the ending 'A dio terra, a dio cielo, e Sole, a Dio', is most moving. The chorus and the Shepherds sing an elaborate threnody to the words 'Ahi, caso acerbo', and mourn the tragedies of Euridice bitten by the Serpent, and of Orfeo transfixed by grief.

¹ The list is quoted in Donald Grout's A Short History of Opera (O.U.P.).

*Orfeo (Netherlands Opera, 1996, director Pierre Audi, sets Michael Simon, costumes Jorge Jara).
John Mark Ainsley as Orfeo, Russell Smythe as Apollo.*

Act III. In impressively solemn declamation, Orfeo is confronted by Speranza. He resolves to seek Euridice in Hades. The use of trombones is a feature of the orchestration. Charonte's sombre utterance is followed by Orfeo's attempt by means of his powers as a singer to gain admission to Hades. The song with its elaborate ornamentation is a great test of virtuosity, and, as if to emphasise this characteristic, each verse and ritornello has a different combination of instruments. It is perhaps surprising that Monteverdi should print an alternative and wholly simple version for the use, one supposes, of singers who were not able to do justice to the more elaborate writing. Charonte admits that he has listened to the song with intense pleasure, but it is only after Orfeo has renewed his pleading in the simplest recitative that he yields; who could resist the rising semitones of the impassioned 'Rendetemi il mio ben, Tartarei Numi' with which he ends his plea? Preceded and followed by a solemn sinfonia, the act ends with a most lovely, madrigalesque chorus of Spirits.

Act IV. Proserpina and Plutone discuss Orfeo's plight, and, prompted by his wife and urged by the captive spirits singly and in chorus, the King of the Underworld agrees to release Euridice to her husband. Orfeo is triumphant but his song of rejoicing is interrupted as he looks back to see if Euridice is following. The spirits lament that her short-lived freedom should be snatched from her by her husband's transgression of Plutone's stipulation.

Act V. Orfeo, wandering on the plains of Thrace, laments his broken heart, and summons nature itself, which has so often benefited from his singing, to join him in his mourning. The ritornello which begins the act is the same as that used in the Prologue; during the course of the scene, Monteverdi makes use of an echo device. Apollo, Orfeo's father, descends from Heaven and tells his son that he will be translated to divine immortality, and among the stars will be able to see his Euridice again. Father and son ascend to Heaven singing together music full of coloratura ornament. The chorus sings its valediction in a lively 'Moresca'. (It should be noted that Striggio's original libretto brought the legend to an end in accordance with tradition, Orfeo being torn to pieces at a Bacchanalian orgy by the Thracian women, maddened by his unceasing laments for a woman he would not see again.)

'Orfeo', says Professor Westrup,² 'is curiously representative of its time. We find in it the new recitative already practised by Peri and Caccini, the rhythmical subtlety of the French chanson, the traditional polyphony of motet and madrigal, the conventional practice of embellishing a vocal line with fioriture, the chromatic devices of the madrigal transferred to monody ... Orfeo is hardly an experimental work; it is rather a successful attempt to combine into a single whole the varied methods of musical expression current at the time.'

H.

ARIANNA

Opera in a prologue and eight scenes, text by Rinuccini. First performed at the Teatro della Corte, Mantua, 28 May 1608, as part of the festivities connected with the wedding of Francesco Gonzaga and Margherita di Savoia. Virginia Andreini was the original Arianna. The score is now lost, apart from the famous lament and a few other fragments, but stage revivals were presented at Karlsruhe in 1926, and in Paris, 1931.

Arianna seems to have been enormously successful when first performed, and the great lament of Arianna, 'Lasciatemi morire', became immediately the most popular piece of music of the day. It began a long line of lamenti, and Monteverdi himself transformed it into a five-part madrigal (in 1610) and into a sacred 'Pianto della Madonna' (published 1640).

¹ Leo Schrade: Monteverdi (Gollancz).

² In his essay on the composer in The Heritage of Music, vol. III (O.U.P.).

A peculiarity of operatic history is that Alexander Goehr, a leading British composer with several operatic essays to his credit, should have chosen to set Rinuccini's original text to music, which, with its recitative and ritornelli, its declamatory solos and frequent vocal 'madrigals', closely follows Monteverdi's patterns if not his style. Goehr's opera, performed in 1995 at Covent Garden, incorporated a version of the Lament.

H.

IL COMBATTIMENTO DI TANCREDI E CLORINDA

The Fight between Tancredi and Clorinda

Dramatic cantata, text by Tasso: verses 52–68 of Canto XII of Gerusalemme liberata.

TancrediSoprano
ClorindaSoprano
Testo (Narrator)..... Soprano

Running Time: 30 minutes

I^l Combattimento was published in 1638, fourteen years after it was written for performance in the Palazzo of Girolamo Mocenigo. In his introduction to the score, Monteverdi describes the first performance. After some madrigals had been sung as an introduction, Clorinda appeared, armed and on foot, followed by Tancredi, also armed but on a Cavallo Mariano.¹ The Narrator began his song, and Clorinda and Tancredi acted, or danced, the story in a way suggested by the words. The Narrator is instructed to sing clearly and firmly and to articulate well; only in the stanza to Night may he employ decoration; for the rest, he must narrate a similitudine delle passioni dell'oratione. At the end, says Monteverdi, the audience was moved to tears.

Before the action begins, Tancredi, a Christian knight, has fallen in love with Clorinda, a Saracen maiden. She is a brave and skilful warrior and, dressed in man's armour, has assaulted and burnt, with one companion, a Christian fortification. As she is returning from this victory, she is seen and pursued by Tancredi. He thinks her a man and challenges her to mortal combat.

The Narrator, who remains outside the action but comments throughout, begins by announcing the theme of the story, and straightaway we have, in 6/8 time, a representation of the horseback pursuit. Clorinda and Tancredi defy one another, and Tancredi dismounts for the combat. The Narrator begins his description of the phases of the fight, and before the sinfonia which introduces the Invocation of Night, we hear for the first time the string tremolo, or stile concitato, about which more later. The stanza in praise of Night is a beautiful inspiration; it gives way to a graphic account of the battle, whose musical phases change as often as the various stages of the duel. Not only does Monteverdi use the new device of rapidly repeated notes in the orchestra but he makes the Narrator imitate the device by setting some lines at breakneck speed.

In the middle of the battle, the combatants rest, and their exhaustion is faithfully reflected in the music. Tancredi says that whatever the issue he would like to know the name of his opponent, but Clorinda answers proudly that the warrior who opposes him is one of the two responsible for burning

¹ Raymond Leppard has suggested an interesting explanation of the significance of this mysterious term. 'By the time Combattimento was published in Book VIII, the circumstances of performance were being described and not prescribed. The Mocenigo Palace is not large and the courtyard has no place for anyone to sit so it must have been performed on the piano nobile, which is also not large. No question then of a real horse. A hobby-horse would seem the most likely and since almost life-size puppets had long been (and still are) a feature of Italian popular theatre, there is the possibility that it was performed by puppets and sung by singers at the side. "Mariano" doesn't exist except in religious or seasonal usage but it is very close to the stem "marionette" (which I believe has a religious origin itself) and I believe that this is the true origin.'

the Christian tower. The music is headed 'Guerra' as they return to fight with renewed zeal. Soon Clorinda is beaten and, transfixed by the sword of her opponent, falls dying at his feet. She forgives him and asks him to mark his forgiveness of her by bestowing Christian baptism on her. He fetches water from a stream which runs nearby, raises her visor and in a moment of horror recognises that his opponent was the Saracen maid he loved so well. He baptises her, and as he does so, she sings a last, rising phrase in which one can feel her soul leaving her earthly body for the heaven which she can see open to receive it: 'S'apre il ciel; io vado in pace.'

In his preface Monteverdi recognises three principal human passions: wrath (Ira), temperance (Temperanza), and humility or prayer (Umiltà or Supplicazione). Music, he says, has represented the soft, molle, and the temperate, but not the concitato, the excited. By means of his invention of the string tremolo and by applying it to an appropriate text, he hopes to remedy this defect; with the new device is associated for the first time the string pizzicato, like the tremolo a commonplace today.

The opera is scored for a quartet of strings (written out in full) supported by contrabass and harpsichord, and it is in Monteverdi's invention of this combination of sound to fit action that the unique quality of this fascinating work lies. H.

IL RITORNO D'ULISSE IN PATRIA

Ulysses' Return Home

Opera in a prologue and five acts, text by Giacomo Badoaro. First performed in Venice, February 1641, at the Teatro San Cassiano. Doubt was once cast upon the authenticity of the ascription to Monteverdi but it is by now generally agreed that the music is in fact his, and Luigi Dallapiccola, the Italian composer who was responsible for an authoritative arrangement of the opera (1942), did not hesitate to describe the work as a masterpiece. The opera was revived in concert form in Brussels, 1925 (fragments only); in Paris (arranged by d'Indy) in 1925 and 1927; and broadcast from London in 1928 (in d'Indy's version, English translation by D. Millar Craig). The opera was staged in Dallapiccola's arrangement, Florence Festival, 1942, and at la Scala, Milan, 1943; in Paul Daniel's at English National Opera in 1989, and at the Buxton Festival in 1995.

The Prologue

Human Frailty Contralto
Time Bass

Fortune Mezzo-Soprano
Love Soprano

The Gods

Nettuno (Neptune) Bass
Giove (Jove) Tenor
Minerva Soprano
Giunone (Juno) Mezzo-Soprano

The Mortals

Penelope, Ulysses' wife Mezzo-Soprano
Ericlea, Penelope's nurse Contralto
Melanto, Penelope's maid Mezzo-Soprano
Eurimaco, Melanto's lover Tenor
Ulisse (Ulysses) Tenor
Eumete, faithful servant to Ulysses Tenor
Iro, a glutton Tenor
Telemaco, Ulisse's son Tenor
Antinoo, one of Penelope's suitors Bass
Anfinomo, one of Penelope's suitors Counter-Tenor
Pisandro, one of Penelope's suitors Tenor
Chorus of Phaeacians, Chorus from Heaven, Chorus from the Sea

Place: Ithaca; the Aegean Sea

Time: c. 1270 B.C.

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

In d'Indy's version, Ulisse, Eurimaco and Anfinomo were baritones, and Penelope herself a soprano. Dallapiccola's arrangement adds Mercury to the list of characters and makes Telemaco into a mezzo-soprano. In both versions, Monteverdi's five acts are reduced to three (as they are in the Vienna MS of the score), and this general arrangement is often followed.

When Paris, Prince of Troy, eloped with Helen, wife of Menelaus, King of Sparta, the Greeks, led by Menelaus's brother Agamemnon, sailed to Troy under the protection of Hera/Juno in order to recapture her. Odysseus/Ulysses sailed with the expedition, leaving his wife Penelope behind. After the death of many heroes on both sides, Troy had still not fallen, but Ulysses (as Italian usage has the name) hit on the ruse of leaving a great wooden horse on the seashore while the Greek fleet made believe to sail away. The Trojans, taking the horse for a peace offering, dragged it into the city but that night a party of Greek soldiers hidden inside it broke out and set the city on fire, thus presaging its fall. The Greek fleet sailed for home but Ulysses incurred the special enmity of Poseidon/ Neptune, God of the Sea, for injuring his son, Polyphemus, one of the Cyclops, whom he blinded in order to make his escape from the island where he was imprisoned. Neptune has been allowed by Zeus/Jove to wreak vengeance on Ulysses, whose ship he has vowed to destroy. Ulysses meanwhile is under the protection of Minerva, who has stood by him through his adventures.

Prologue. Human Frailty is forced to acknowledge the authority of Time, Fortune and Love.

In a room in the Royal Palace in Ithaca, Penelope is attended by Ercilea as she bemoans her state of loneliness with her husband still not returned from the war. It is a magnificent lament, proof in its own right, say its admirers, that Ulisse is by the composer of the Arianna lament; 'Torna, torna, deh torna Ulisse' is its poignant refrain. A duet follows between the amorous Melanto and her lover Eurimaco.

Giove and Nettuno discuss the gods' punishment of the sins of men during which Nettuno wins Giove's assent to his continued attempt to destroy Ulisse. The scene changes and we are with Ulisse on board a Phaeacian ship off the coast of Ithaca. The Phaeacians lay the sleeping Ulisse on the shore. He wakes and thinks he has been deposited in an unknown land. Ulisse's lament is not so highly organised as Penelope's in the earlier scene, but it is one of the most effective moments in the opera. There follows a long scene between Ulisse and Minerva, who appears disguised as a shepherd to comfort him and spur him on to return home. Ulisse eventually recognises Minerva, who tells him that she will disguise him and he will return home to rout the suitors who have taken possession of his palace. Ulisse rejoices at the turn in his fortunes.

The flighty Melanto suggests Penelope take another husband but the idea falls on stony ground. Eumete, Ulisse's old herdsman, is discovered alone. He sings of the contrast between his own contented lot and that of princes. The ridiculous Iro breaks in on his reverie, and smacks his lips over the pampered life he leads. Eumete sends him about his business: 'Corri, corri a mangiar, a crepar'. Ulisse, disguised as a beggar, comes in and hears Eumete lament his master's absence; he tells him that Ulisse will not fail his country, and the two go off contentedly together.

The scene changes to the ship in which Telemaco, protected by Minerva, is on his way home. He rejoices at the voyage and, joined by Minerva, at the favourable wind. Another change of scene takes us to the grove in which we originally found Eumete. Minerva cautions Telemaco against disregarding her advice. Eumete recognises and greets him, saying that the old man with him (in reality Telemaco's father but not known to either of them) has encouraged him to think Ulisse himself may be on his way to Ithaca. There is a short duet for Ulisse and Eumete on the subject of hope, and Telemaco bids Eumete go to the Queen and warn her that her son has come home and that she should not give up hope of seeing Ulisse himself. Ulisse reveals himself to his son. There is a rapturous duet for father and son and the scene ends with Ulisse telling his son to prepare Penelope for her husband's imminent return.

Penelope is surrounded by her suitors, who beg her, singly and together, to return their love. She will have none of them. Into the palace rushes Eumete, bringing the news that Ulisse may be among them before long. With new danger approaching, the suitors agree that they must dispose of Telemaco and press their claims on the Queen before it is too late.

Minerva intervenes once again, this time to urge Ulisse to go to Penelope, who at Minerva's instigation will offer herself as prize in a contest as to who can string and draw the great bow of Ulisse. Telemaco pours out his heart to his mother Penelope, but it is not long before Antinoo is mocking the poor beggar (in reality Ulisse), who should, he says, be with Eumete and the hogs, not in the palace watching them sup. Iro joins in, stuttering as usual (he is Vašek's fore-runner), but is challenged to a wrestling match by Ulisse and soundly beaten. Penelope compliments the old man on his victory. In a moment the other suitors return, and she consents to set them a test: whoever can draw Ulisse's bow shall become her husband. Each in turn fails, but Ulisse asks to be allowed to try his strength. He strings and draws the bow, then, to the accompaniment of war-like music, transfixes each of the suitors in turn. His triumph is complete.

Iro is found alone. His aria, marked parte ridicola, is a masterpiece of parody, with the elevated style Monteverdi had done so much to establish as its object. Even the ciaccona bass of his own madrigal 'Zefiro torna' is pressed into service to do justice to the spectacle of Iro lamenting the horror which has come upon him: now that all his patrons are dead, he has an empty belly. He can think of no solution to the difficulty of filling it, and resolves on suicide.

Penelope is confronted by Telemaco and Eumete, who try to convince her that the old man who successfully drew the bow was Ulisse himself. Once again the gods have to step in, Minerva asking Giunone to speak on Ulisse's behalf to Giove, in order that he may persuade Nettuno to drop his vengeance. Even the appearance of her husband in his proper form fails to convince Penelope that she is not still the victim of a cruel deception and it is not until Ericlea affirms that she has recognised him by the scar on his leg that Penelope allows caution to be replaced by love. She rejoices in an aria before she and Ulisse join in a final duet to celebrate their reunion.

H.

L'INCORONAZIONE DI POPPEA

The Coronation of Poppaea

Opera in a prologue and three acts, text by G.F. Busenello. Première at Teatro di Giovanni e Paolo in Venice, 1642. Performed in Naples, 1651. Revived in concert form in Vincent d'Indy's arrangement by the Schola Cantorum in Paris in 1905; in 1913 given a stage production there at the Théâtre des Arts with Claire Croiza, conductor d'Indy. Produced in 1926 at Smith College, Northampton, Mass., and the following year at Oxford by the University Opera Club in an English translation by R.L. Stuart. Performed at the Florence Festival of 1937 in the Boboli Gardens in a version by G. Benvenuti, with Gina Cigna, Giuseppina Cobelli, Giovanni Voyer and Tancredi Pasero, conductor Gino Marinuzzi; and in the same year at both the Vienna Volksoper in a German version by Křenek, and at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, in Malipiero's version. Malipiero's realisation was revived at the Teatro Olimpico, Vicenza, and in Venice in 1949, with Hilde Gueden, Elsa Cavelti, Giovanni Voyer and Boris Christoff, conductor Erede. Raymond Leppard's realisation was first performed at Glyndebourne in 1962, and at the Coliseum, London, in 1971, with Janet Baker. Roger Norrington in 1974 prepared and conducted for Kent Opera a version generally believed nearer to the original than perhaps any other since Monteverdi's time, with Sandra Browne as Poppaea and Anne Pashley (soprano) as Nero.

Goddess of FortuneSoprano
 Goddess of VirtueSoprano
 Goddess of LoveSoprano
 Ottone, Poppea's former loverSoprano¹
 Two Soldiers of the Emperor's BodyguardTenor
 Poppea (Poppaea)Soprano

Nerone (Nero), Emperor of Rome Soprano²
 Arnalta, Poppea's old nurse Contralto³
 Ottavia (Octavia), Empress of Rome ... Mezzo-Soprano
 Ottavia's Nurse Mezzo-Soprano
 Drusilla, Ottavia's lady-in-waiting Soprano
 Seneca, philosopher, Nero's former tutor Bass
 A Young Attendant on Ottavia (Valletto) Tenor⁴
 Damigella (Maid) in Ottavia's service Soprano
 Liberto, Captain of the Guard Baritone
 Pallade (Pallas), Goddess of Wisdom Soprano
 Lucano, Nerone's friend Tenor
 Lictor Bass
 Mercurio (Mercury) Bass⁵
 Venere (Venus) Soprano

Soldiers, Disciples of Seneca, Servants, Consuls, Tribunes, Senators, etc.

Place: Rome

Time: About 55 A.D.

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

L'Incoronazione di Poppea is Monteverdi's last opera, written when he was seventy-five and, according to most observers, his finest achievement. Its circumstances are very different from those of Orfeo, the composer's first opera reflecting the splendours of the Mantuan court where he was working, while his last, written for the much simpler circumstances of a Venetian public theatre, concentrated directly on character rather than on grandiose surroundings. Monteverdi's pupil, Cavalli (who may have contributed some of Poppea's music), had brought about a meeting with the poet Francesco Busenello, a Venetian lawyer and one-time ambassador to the court of Mantua – Busenello, every commentator agrees, was the first great librettist. Throughout, the focus is on dramatic truth and real-life emotions and their expression; illicit (but passionate) love triumphs over 'right', and in the course of the action injustice is more or less manifestly done to Ottavia, Seneca and Ottone.

As far as musical material is concerned, 'all we have is a manuscript written in several hands, a sort of rehearsal or continuo copy ... consisting of a single bass-line, very occasional sketches in parts for ritornelli, and a vocal line. Fortunately it has the stamp of

¹ Originally male soprano; often a baritone in modern versions.

² Originally male soprano; often a tenor in modern realisations.

³ May have been a tenor originally.

⁴ Originally a male soprano.

⁵ Originally probably a high tenor.

authenticity about it since remarks, directions and cuts appear throughout in the composer's hand. This manuscript is preserved in Venice, and except for a later copy to be found in Naples, it is the only music we have of the opera, the rest has to be reconstructed.' So writes Raymond Leppard, whose edition of the opera scored a big success at Glyndebourne in 1962. All modern performances have been based on two ingredients: this manuscript, together with the editor's point of view over matters such as orchestration and cuts (the original has some three-and-a-half hours of music).

In Monteverdi's time, music in the theatre was accompanied by strings and continuo, and wind instruments were more or less restricted to church music, being imported into the opera house almost exclusively for representational purposes – horns for hunting scenes; trumpets and drums for a battle, and so on.

After the overture, in a Prologue the goddesses of Fortune and Virtue flaunt their own successes and mock the shortcomings of the other, until the goddess of Love in her turn vaunts her pre-eminence; against her, the others are as nothing, a point of view neither seems able or indeed anxious to refute.

Act I. It is just before dawn and, outside Poppea's house, two of Nerone's guards lie asleep. Ottone, her lover, returning from serving abroad, sings lovingly of the house and of Poppea, until he notices the soldiers and realises that he has been supplanted by no less a person than the Emperor. His world is in ruins around him. The soldiers wake up, gossip about the love of Poppea and Nerone, and grumble tunelessly about their lot and the miseries of soldiering in Rome. Suddenly they realise that Nerone is approaching and are heard no more.

We meet Poppea and Nerone in one of the great love scenes of opera, the first of several in the score. After a night in her arms, Nerone must leave, but cannot drag himself away. She, spurred on by ambition as well as her evident love for him, employs every delaying tactic known to woman, and by the time he has gone has obtained a half promise that he will put aside the Empress Ottavia to marry her. Her reiterated 'Tornerai?' has more tenderness than urgency, and it is this ability to portray the contradictory elements of real-life emotions which distinguishes composer and librettist from most others who have tackled similar scenes in the history of opera; here, without hiding underlying motives, they catch the freshness and beauty of passion, which has no regard for conventional ideas of right or wrong.

With Nerone gone but his promise very much in her mind, Poppea seems triumphant and expresses her feelings in an aria, 'Speranza, tu mi vai il core accarezzando'. Her old nurse, Arnalta, tries to warn her against the snare which ambition may set for her – the Empress could seek revenge and Nerone's love cool – but Poppea believes that Love is on her side.

In her palace, Ottavia laments her humiliation and misery, denouncing in a noble utterance the infidelity of Nerone and calling on Jove to punish her erring spouse: 'Disprezzata regina'. Her old nurse tries vainly to comfort her, until Seneca is ushered in by the Empress's page. Gently but firmly he urges that tears and lamentation are unfit for an Empress, who must find refuge in stoicism. Ottavia objects that to promise greater glory from the torments she undergoes is specious and empty comfort, and her page impetuously tries to defend his Empress by attacking the old philosopher for his platitudes.

Alone, Seneca has a vision of Pallade, goddess of Wisdom, who warns him that to interfere in the imperial quarrel will result in his own death. Seneca welcomes the idea of death and claims to have conquered human fear and, as if to reinforce his presentiment, he receives a visit from Nerone, who tells him that he plans to set aside Ottavia and marry Poppea. Seneca warns him that the heart is often a bad counsellor, and begs his erstwhile pupil to avoid arousing the resentment of the people and the Senate, and, if nothing else, to have regard for his own good name. Passions mount, Nerone announces his decision to marry Poppea and leaves Seneca in a fury.

Nerone returns to Poppea and their extended love duet ends with her denunciation of Seneca who, she says, has maintained publicly that Nerone's ability to rule depends on Seneca's counsel. Nerone, to whom providence denied the quality of dispassionate wisdom, in a single sentence orders one of the guards to carry a message immediately to Seneca to the effect that he must that very day die. Then, in lyrical phrases, he reassures Poppea that she will see what true love can do, a power in which recent events must have reinforced her belief.

Ottone makes a last attempt at reconciliation with Poppea but she spurns him and exults in now belonging to Nerone. Ottone is overwhelmed by the disaster which has overtaken him; though his heart contains nothing but love for Poppea, his pride prompts him to plot her murder. In his misery, he turns to Drusilla, who is in love with him. Ottone tries to assure her that he now loves her, but his protestations ring just short of true and when, in answer to her repeated 'You love me? You love me?', he answers 'Ti bramo' (I want you) we are once again confronted by the dispassionate desire for realism which characterises Busenello's writing.

Act II begins with one of the great scenes of the score, the death of Seneca. First, heralded by Mercurio and welcomed by the old philosopher, Nerone's sentence of death is communicated by Liberto, Captain of the Praetorian Guard, and Seneca announces to his pupils that the time has come to prove in deed the stoic virtues he has so long preached in theory. In passionate chorus – a three-part madrigal of high and moving quality – they urge him to live, but he bids them prepare the bath in which his guiltless blood will flow away. The next scene, in which figured Virtue, Seneca and 'Un Choro di Virtù', has been lost, but Busenello and Monteverdi follow it with two in the strongest possible contrast with those leading up to and portraying the death of Seneca. In the first, we have an almost literal precursor of the intermezzos with which composers were in the habit a century later of adorning the intervals of their serious operas. Ottavia's page ('Sento un certo non so che') tells a pretty maid that he has a pain in his heart that he's never known before. Will she help him cure it? As the music flows its spirited way, it is perfectly obvious that she will.

There follows a scene in equally strong contrast, as Nerone, elated at the news of Seneca's death, carouses with his friend Lucano: 'Hor che Seneca è morto, cantiam'. The macabre situation is stressed rather than played down when Nerone, left alone, sings with the utmost conviction of his love for Poppea.

A scene between Nerone and Poppea has been lost and we next see Ottone making up his mind in a soliloquy that his former hatred for Poppea has gone and he must now languish in a state of unrequited love. He cannot kill her, he decides, but it is not long before Ottavia at her most domineering arrives and persuades him, not without threats to slander him to Nerone, that it is his duty to kill Poppea. His hesitation and evasions are beautifully characterised in the libretto.

Drusilla rejoices in her love for Ottone, and the page asks Ottavia's old nurse what she would give for a day of happy youth such as is Drusilla's. 'Everything' is the answer. The arrival of Ottone brings about a change of mood, but Drusilla rises to the occasion, and, when he confides to her that he has in mind to commit a terrible crime for which he must disguise himself in her clothes, she is happy to offer garments and indeed her life's blood for him.

The scene changes to Poppea's garden, where Poppea opens her dialogue with Arnalta with the same words to which Nerone rejoiced at the news of the death of Seneca: 'Hor che Seneca è morto'. She demands that Love shall guide her ship safe to harbour. Arnalta sings what has perhaps always been the only number known separately from the score, a lullaby of great beauty: 'Oblivion soave'. It has the desired effect and the goddess of Love herself descends while Poppea sleeps and in an aria promises to watch over her as she lies defenceless. Ottone enters in disguise and with murder in his heart, but the goddess intervenes, Poppea wakes up and she and Arnalta think they recognise Drusilla, who runs away. The goddess of Love is triumphant: having defended Poppea, that very day she will see that she becomes Empress!

Act III. Drusilla is at first found singing happily to herself of her love for Ottone, but it is not long before she is identified by Arnalta and arrested for the attempt on Poppea's life. She protests her innocence, and not all the threats of Nerone, who is quickly on the scene, can make her change her story. As she is about to be taken off to torture and death, Ottone himself appears to claim, in spite of Drusilla's protestations, that it was he who was responsible for the attempted crime. A short duet between them leaves Nerone in no doubt of Ottone's guilt and he pronounces sentence of banishment on him. Drusilla says she will share in his exile, and Ottone recognises the good fortune which has suddenly overtaken him in what might have proved his most evil hour. Nerone finishes the scene by announcing his resolve to divorce Ottavia and send her in her turn into exile.

The action has reached a stage where one of the five principal characters is dead and another has been disposed of, together with his appropriate coupling. It only remains for the lonely Ottavia on the one hand and the far from lonely Poppea and Nerone on the other to meet their destinies. Poppea, announcing her re-birth, learns that it was Ottone and not Drusilla who attempted to murder her, and Nerone reveals that he thinks Ottavia was behind the plot. She shall be exiled and Poppea that very day will become Empress! In grave, confident music, which only later develops into coloratura flourishes, the couple privately hymn their love.

Arnalta celebrates her own involvement in Poppea's triumph by recalling in an aria past indignities as a servant and exulting over the prospect of future grandeur.

Ottavia, alone as befits her isolated but still imperial state, bids an unhappy but dignified farewell to Rome, her native land, her friends. She claims, quite falsely, that she is innocent, but her lament is in the great tradition started in Arianna by Monteverdi himself.

Poppea is triumphant, and is greeted first by Nerone, who bids her ascend to the apex of sovereignty, then by the consuls and tribunes of Rome itself who hymn her coronation. There is a short intervention by the goddess of Love and Venus (marked in the manuscript as a candidate for a cut, a hint usually taken by subsequent editors), and the opera ends with the idyllic celebration by the two protagonists of their love and their triumph: 'Pur ti miro', whose music, modern scholarship believes, is not by Monteverdi.

H.

WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART

(born 27 January 1756, died 5 December 1791)

Mozart's contribution to operatic literature is prodigious, but strictly in accord with the predilections of his time. He was only fourteen when he made his first attempt at opera seria, with its grand, archaic themes which accommodated not only musical essays on the characters' emotions and tribulations – their loves, furies, thirst for vengeance, need of consolation, regrets and so on – but the aspirations of leading singers as well. As a boy, he was commissioned to write in this vein for Italian theatres, as a young man in Idomeneo he composed the finest example of the form since the days of Handel, and as a leading Viennese composer, already mortally sick, he made a final contribution to the genre the year he died.

With La finta giardiniera when only eighteen he took the first steps towards the form he later adorned with incomparable art – called at one time dramma giocoso, at another opera buffa: a comedy of manners, with its opportunities for probing the human heart as well as embroiling the leading figures in crises which emerge as ensemble. A dozen years later he strode to operatic immortality when he produced Le nozze di Figaro, the supreme masterpiece in the form. He followed it up with Don Giovanni, a work of altogether different character, and capped the line with Così fan tutte, where the ostensibly frivolous comedy half-conceals a vein of deep unease.

Mozart was versatile and his sympathies were not confined to the comedies of high life enjoyed by court and aristocracy. Die Entführung aus dem Serail is a deliberate attempt to raise the Singspiel, and with it German opera in the vernacular, to a higher level, and his final masterpiece, Die Zauberflöte, for all its probing of masonic mysteries, is a celebration of demotic art.

What of tragedy? Mozart at first took Italianate composers (Pergolesi, Traetta, J.C. Bach) as his masters, and followed the inclinations of the time in writing none. All the same, suggestions abound of what might have been, whether in the incidental music to Gebler's play Thamos, König in Egypten, in Idomeneo, where tragedy seems constantly imminent, in sections of Die Zauberflöte, or in Don Giovanni and Così, whose characters and situations veer between high comedy and near-tragedy.

Mozart died at thirty-five but six operas stand at the core of current repertory. That two of them, Idomeneo and Così fan tutte, only in mid-twentieth century achieved that status seems now incomprehensible, and makes a much more potent comment on taste than it does on the operas themselves which remain in the list of the supremely great works.

MITRIDATE, RE DI PONTO

Mithridates, King of Pontus

Opera in three acts, libretto by Vittorio Amedeo Cigna-Santi, after Racine's tragedy (libretto originally set by Quirino Gasparini). Première Milan, 26 December 1770, but never again performed in Mozart's lifetime. Revived Salzburg, 1971, with Auger, Lorengar, Edda Moser, Watts, Schreier, conductor Leopold Hager; Wexford, 1989; Covent Garden, London, 1991, with Kenny, Lillian Watson, Ann Murray, Kowalski, Bruce Ford, conductor Hartmut Haenchen (1994, Paul Daniel).

Mitridate (Mithridates), father of two sons; betrothed to Aspasia Tenor
 Aspasia Soprano
 Sifare (Xipharex), son to Mitridate Soprano
 Farnace (Pharnaces), son to Mitridate Contralto
 Marzio, a Roman general Tenor
 Ismene, a Parthian princess Soprano
 Arbate, Governor of Nymphaeum Soprano
 Roman Soldiers, Citizens

Place: Nymphaeum

Time: 63 B.C.

Running Time: 3 hours 40 minutes

Mozart's first commissioned opera, even though it lasted some six hours at the première (including an interpolated ballet), won considerable success. By some, the opera was condemned unheard because of Mozart's extreme youth – he was only fourteen – but its twenty-two performances spoke for its popularity. It is an astonishing feat for so young a composer, though it is not hard, in his first essay in the opera seria form, to find Mozart wanting as far as emotional and psychological content is concerned. Nonetheless, the arias he wrote for it – more than twenty, with only a single duet for contrast – are mostly magnificent in scale and achievement.

Mithridates was king of Pontus on the Black Sea for fifty years during which time he fought off the might of Rome until finally defeated in 63 B.C. Only he and his son Pharnaces have a basis in history, but Racine's play, one of his great successes, is fiction.

Act I. Mitridate is rumoured dead in battle against the Romans. His two sons, Farnace and Sifare, the former cruel by nature, the latter noble and honest, become rivals for the affections of Aspasia, who is engaged to their father. Farnace has additionally plotted with the Romans against Mitridate. Arbate assures the two princes that their father is alive and he appears bringing with him Ismene, who was formerly betrothed to Farnace. Mitridate admits to Arbate that he spread the rumour of his own death in order to test his sons.

Act II. Farnace rejects Ismene, and Mitridate doubts the loyalty of Aspasia, whom he nonetheless proposes to marry before leaving for battle. Sifare and Aspasia discover their love is mutual but swear to separate in order to spare Mitridate pain. Mitridate discovers Farnace's treachery on the one hand and Sifare's love for Aspasia on the other and imprisons both sons.

Act III. Aspasia and Ismene plead the cause of Sifare, but Mitridate leaves to command his army in a last attempt to stem the Roman advance. Sifare prevents Aspasia swallowing poison. Farnace is freed from prison by his Roman ally Marzio, but the two sons resolve to support their father and succeed in defeating the Romans, though not before Mitridate himself is mortally wounded. The opera ends with Sifare united with Aspasia, Farnace with Ismene.

As you would expect of opera seria, arias of every sort abound, from the ferocity of Mitridate's final aria of Act I (which is itself equalled by his aria condemning Sifare and Aspasia late in Act II) to the expressive lyricism of Sifare's farewell in Act II, 'Lungi da te, mio bene'. This, with its horn obbligato, looks forward you could think to Ilia in Idomeneo, and since it is followed immediately by Aspasia's beautiful lament for her own situation and capped by the opera's only duet, one may be tempted to agree with the observation that the quality of the music increases as the opera proceeds. You leave it dazed with the notion that a youth of fourteen could have written it. H.

LUCIO SILLA

Lucius Sulla

Opera in three acts, text by Giovanni de Gamerra. Première Milan, 26 December 1772, with the castrato Venanzio Rauzzini as Cecilio and Anna de Amicis Buonsolazzi as Giunia, Bassano Morgnoni as Silla. The opera was performed twenty-six times in a month and apparently on the first night with its ballet interludes lasted (like Mitridate) some six hours.

Gamerra's libretto was later set among others by J.C. Bach but Mozart's opera disappeared, surfacing in London in 1967 and in Baltimore in 1968.

Lucio Silla, *dictator of Rome*Tenor
 Giunia, engaged to Cecilio.....Soprano
 Cecilio, a senator, once outlawed.....Soprano (Castrato)
 Celia, Lucio Silla's sister.....Soprano
 Lucio Cinna, a patrician, Cecilio's friend.....Soprano

Place: Rome

Time: c. 100 B.C.

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

After the success of Mitridate in Milan in 1770, it was no novice who at fifteen was commissioned for the Ducal Theatre there to compose an opera for Carnival 1772–73, nor was it astonishing that Mozart's opera did not survive its initial showing. Few did – but this was Mozart's last opera written for Italy. The illness of the tenor originally cast in the title role probably affected the final shape of the opera and Mozart certainly had little time in which to work. Commissioned on 4 March 1771, he was to deliver the recitatives by early October 1772, and the arias were to be tailored for the singers during November and December.

Act I. Cecilio, a senator banished from Rome by the dictator Lucio Silla, has secretly returned and is advised by his friend Cinna that his beloved Giunia mourns him believing him to be dead. Silla wants Giunia for himself and Celia, his sister, advises a cautious approach, but even this fails to diminish Giunia's hatred for Silla as her father's murderer. As Cinna predicted, Giunia goes every day to her father's burial place to mourn him, and there Cecilio surprises her to her evident joy.

Act II. Silla has a crisis of conscience but tells Celia she will that day be betrothed to Cinna. Cinna persuades Cecilio to drop his immediate intention of murdering Silla, but then suggests to Giunia that she should appear to agree to marry the dictator in order to kill him on their wedding night. She rejects the plan but Cinna, who in reality hates Silla, decides to undertake the task himself. Silla's renewed protestations do not move Giunia, but his threats make her fear for the life of Cecilio. Even Celia's pleas to Giunia do not move her and she resolves to throw herself on the mercy of the Senate. When Silla asks the Senate to approve his marriage to Giunia, Cecilio draws his sword and is arrested. He and Giunia resolve to die together, their devotion making a deep impression on Silla.

Act III. Cinna enjoins Celia to urge Silla to a more magnanimous course, and comforts Cecilio in prison. Giunia tells her lover that if he is executed she will follow him to death. On the Capitol, Silla executes a volte-face, pardoning Cecilio and uniting him and Giunia in marriage. Cinna admits he too, though once his friend, had come to hate the dictator, but Silla gives him Celia as his wife and caps the whole extraordinary episode by resigning his position and vowing in future to live as a Roman among equals. Rejoicing could hardly be more general and an opera seria ends, as so often, with a tyrant relinquishing power.

Even more than in Mitridate, the arias to which an opera seria naturally gives rise are not short of splendour – an achievement for a composer of any age – whether the great utterances of the principal figures, or those of hardly less coloratura magnificence for secondary characters. But the greatest advance on Mitridate comes in the composer's writing for the orchestra, not least perhaps in recitativo stromentato. The grandeur of set pieces is often suggested so immediately that you feel instinctively that what you are about to hear is from the greatest of Mozart's essays in the genre, Idomeneo, than which no praise can be higher.

H.

LA FINTA GIARDINIERA

(Die Gärtnerin aus Liebe)

The Supposed Garden-Girl or Sandrina's Secret

Opera in three acts, text by an unknown author (set only a year earlier by Pasquale Anfossi). Première in Munich, 13 January 1775, just before Mozart's nineteenth birthday, with Rosa Manservigi as Sandrina, the tenor Rossi as Belfiore, and a castrato, Tommaso Consoli, as Ramiro. The opera was performed in German in 1779–80 and toured through south-west Germany. After 1797, it disappeared until revived in 1891 in Vienna, but several revivals have taken place in the fourth quarter of the twentieth century, in Munich, Salzburg, and in England.

Don Anchise, Mayor of Lagonero.....Tenor
 Sandrina, working for the Mayor;
 in reality Countess Violante OnestiSoprano
 Count Belfiore, *engaged to Arminda*Tenor Arminda, the Mayor's niece, once in love with Ramiro, now engaged to Belfiore ...Soprano

Ramiro, *in love with Arminda*Mezzo-Soprano Serpetta, the Mayor's housekeeper;
in love with himSoprano Nardo, gardener to the Mayor (in reality, Roberto, Countess Onesti's servant)Baritone
 Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

In 1774–75, in his late teens, Mozart 'came of age' as a composer, with the A major Symphony, his Violin Concerto in the same key, and La finta Giardiniera, the least-known among his mature, or nearly mature, operas and his first grown-up opera buffa, a description he later applied to Le Nozze di Figaro and Così fan tutte. Soon after its Munich première, it was turned into German and became a Singspiel, with spoken dialogue instead of recitative.

The story is much concerned with madness which is treated as comedy, but, before it starts, we should know that Countess Violante, believed dead of a wound sustained in a lovers' quarrel with Count Belfiore, is still in love with him and has pursued him to Lagonero, where she is working as Sandrina in the Mayor's garden. Her servant is working there too, under the name of Nardo.

Act I. Arminda, the mayor's niece, is due to marry Count Belfiore, but the situation has complications. The Mayor himself has fallen for Sandrina, to the fury of Serpetta, who wants him for herself. Nardo for his part is in love with Serpetta. To confuse matters further, Don Ramiro is in love with Arminda. During the first act, Belfiore pays court to Arminda but an encounter with Sandrina leads to mutual recognition. He loves her, she still loves him but is determined to punish him for what she sees as his infidelity. This is the situation at the start of the first finale. Sandrina denies she is Violante, Arminda is furious with Belfiore, the Mayor with Sandrina, Serpetta is jealous and only Ramiro is not wholly displeased by the way things are turning out – a typical mixture for an 'ensemble of perplexity'.

Act II. Misunderstanding and evasion remain the order of the day until the Mayor receives an order to arrest Belfiore on a charge of murdering Countess Violante. Sandrina saves the situation by declaring she is Violante and alive, but, the moment she is alone with Belfiore, denies it roundly; she only said so to rescue him. At this turn of events, Belfiore, not without cause, goes clean out of his mind. Arminda contrives to have Sandrina transported to a forest full of wild animals, where she laments her predicament. The second finale takes place in semi-darkness. Serpetta lets slip to Nardo some indication of what is going on, and Nardo brings Belfiore to the scene; Arminda and the Mayor follow. Ramiro brings torches to illuminate the scene, but the pressures of the situation are too much for the mental stability of Sandrina, who joins Belfiore in a state of amiable lunacy.

Act III. Nardo does what he can for the two lunatics he feels responsible for, and is lucky that their madness leads them only into pastoral fantasy. They fall asleep and wake, miraculously in their right minds. Sandrina in duet shows initial signs of reluctance, but mass-reconciliation is at hand. Three weddings (but as yet no funeral) are quickly fixed up – Sandrina's to Belfiore, Ramiro's to Arminda, Nardo's to Serpetta; only the Mayor remains a disappointed bachelor.

Mozart's ability to create songs and arias of variety as well as distinction is very much to the fore in this precursor of his finest operatic achievements, and at one moment we seem to be hearing Belmonte, Pedrillo, even Figaro, at another Susanna, the Countess or Donna Elvira; Ramiro's aria in the middle of the second act is, with Belfiore's of a moment later, perhaps the most purely serious of all, forerunner maybe of Idamante. But it is the finales in which the composer shows his burgeoning mastery. Here, as later most notably in the second- and fourth-act finales to Figaro, we find the ability to manipulate a kaleidoscopic series of emotions and feelings, full of twists and turns, misunderstandings, disagreements, into a coherent musical movement, an ability unprecedented in a composer no more than eighteen years old. H.

IL RE PASTORE

The Shepherd King

Opera in two acts, text by Pietro Metastasio. Première in Salzburg, 23 April 1775, at the Archbishop's Palace, in the manner of a serenade; with the castrato Tommaso Consoli as Aminta.

Alessandro (Alexander the Great),
King of MacedoniaTenor
 Aminta, *a shepherd*Soprano (Castrato)
 Elisa, *a nymph*Soprano

Tamiri, daughter of the deposed

King Strato.....Soprano

Agenore, a Sidonian nobleman.....Tenor

Place: Sidon

Time: 330 B.C.

Running Time: 2 hours

Il Re Pastore was performed (together with a short Opera by Fischietti) in honour of a visit to Salzburg by the Archduke Maximilian; a version of Metastasio's libretto was presumably chosen for Mozart rather than by him and was anyhow a reduction of the original made first in 1774. Metastasio's libretto precludes an opera as ambitious as Idomeneo, Mozart's next opera seria (1781), and indeed, in spite of a plethora of shapely and purposeful arias and much characteristic music, Il Re Pastore breaks less new ground than had La finta Giardiniera written a year before.

Act I. Alexander the Great, though not the protagonist, features in the opera as a magnanimous monarch. Aminta is its hero, and after the overture we meet him musing on the future. Elisa tells him Alexander, who has overthrown the tyrant Strato, does not want the throne for himself but aims to find the rightful king. She reassures Aminta of her love. Alexander and his confidant Agenore watch Aminta, and Alexander, impressed by what he observes, decides this must be the rightful claimant to the throne.

Agenore recognises his beloved Tamiri, daughter of the dethroned Strato, in a shepherdess who is sheltering with Elisa from the presumed wrath of the King. All Agenore's blandishments fail to persuade her of Alexander's clemency, but she remains confident of Agenore's love. Elisa tells Aminta she has her parents' agreement to their marriage, but Agenore puts a spanner in the works when he greets Aminta as the King of Sidon. Aminta wants to turn down the throne, but Elisa persuades him otherwise, and the act ends with a pledge of mutual love and dedication.

Act II. Elisa, looking for Aminta who is in conference with Alexander in his tent, is turned away by Agenore who contends that the duty of a king takes precedence over love. Elisa protests and invokes Agenore's love for Tamiri, calling him a heartless barbarian. Aminta adds his voice to Elisa's, for good measure telling Alexander that he does not feel cut out to be a king, but Alexander insists that heaven brings illumination to whomever it ordains to reign.

Not all Alexander's plans take account of people's feelings, and Agenore reacts with less than total enthusiasm when the great monarch proposes that Tamiri should be married to Aminta and so with the new King ascend her father's throne. In the greatest aria of the opera, 'L'amerò, sarò costante', Aminta declares his faithful love for Elisa, a violin obbligato adding elegance to his exquisitely expressed sentiments.

The remainder of the opera is concerned with extricating the lovers from the tangle Alexander's ill-thought-out decisions have got them into. Elisa, when Agenore assures her Aminta and Tamiri will obey Alexander and marry, is ready to die; Tamiri, made perhaps of sterner stuff, berates Agenore for not delivering the news himself, and presses home her advantage by insisting he attend her wedding. Agenore is in an agony of indecision, but finally the ladies, with much invocation of his hard-heartedness, take it into their own hands to throw themselves on the monarch's mercy. He comes to understand the injustice he was in danger of committing and is, with some sycophancy, praised for his decision. H.

IDOMENEIO

Opera in three acts, text by the Abbé Varesco, after a French opera by Campra and Danchet. First performed at Munich, 29 January 1781, with Anton Raaff as Idomeneo, del Prato as Idamante, Dorothea Wendling as Ilia, Elisabeth Wendling as Electra, Panzacchi as Arbace. Revived Vienna, 1786¹; Karlsruhe, 1917; Dresden, 1925; Vienna, 1931 (revised by Strauss, new text by Lothar Wallerstein), and with Maria Nemeth, Elisabeth Schumann, Joseph Kalenberg, Eva Hadrabova, Richard Mayr; Munich, 1931 (revised by Wolf-Ferrari). First British performance at Glasgow in 1934; first English professional performance at Glyndebourne in 1951, when Fritz Busch conducted a cast including Sena Jurinac (Ilia), Birgit Nilsson (Electra), Richard Lewis (Idomeneo), and Leopold Simoneau (Idamante). First New York performance at Town Hall, 1951. Recent revivals include Salzburg, 1956; Sadler's Wells, 1962, conductor Colin Davis; la Scala, Milan, 1968, conductor Sawallisch; Metropolitan, New York, 1982, with Ileana Cotrubas, Hildegard Behrens, Frederica von Stade, Luciano Pavarotti, conductor Levine; Glyndebourne, 1983, conductor Haitink.

¹ When Idamante's role was re-written for tenor.

Idomeneo, *King of Crete*Tenor
 Idamante, *his son*Soprano or Tenor
 Ilia, *a Trojan princess*Soprano
 Elettra (Electra), *a Greek princess*Soprano
 Arbace, *confidant of Idomeneo*Tenor
 High Priest of NeptuneTenor
 Voice of NeptuneBass

People of Crete, Trojan Prisoners, Sailors, Soldiers, Priests of Neptune, Dancers

Place: The Island of Crete

Time: After the Trojan War

Running Time: 3 hours 30 minutes

Mozart's third and greatest essay in the form of opera seria (his first two, Mitridate and Lucio Silla, were written respectively ten and nine years earlier) was first performed in 1781 at Munich, for which Opera it was commissioned. Revived only once in the composer's lifetime (for a private performance in Vienna in 1786), it was fairly frequently heard in Germany and Austria after his death but not performed in Britain until 1934, and never on the English professional stage until its production at Glyndebourne in 1951. It was not heard in America until 1947 when performed at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood.

Alfred Einstein describes Idomeneo as 'one of those works that even a genius of the highest rank, like Mozart, could write only once in his life'. He was at the height of his powers when it was composed, and the arias are superbly expressive, though on a more rarefied plane than the later comedies have accustomed us to. If drama consists of the interplay of motives and emotions, and tragedy of the ordering of men's destinies by a fate their own actions have provoked, Idomeneo is both tragic (in spite of its happy ending) and dramatic. The four main characters, whose conflict reaches its climax with the great quartet in the last act, are sharply defined, and what might well have turned out no more than four stock figures emerge in the course of the musical action as personages no less real, if on an idealised plane, than for instance Susanna or Pamina. In fact we may take Ilia, with the gradual development of her personality through the trials she has to undergo, as a sketch, musically speaking at any rate, for Pamina, Mozart's maturest essay in what one must think of as his conception of the 'perfect' feminine type. It is hardly more fanciful to see in Idamante, her lover, the forerunner of Tamino, even more forceful and generous and dignified for all that he was originally sung by a castrato.

Act I. Idomeneo, King of Crete, has taken part in the Trojan War, and it is many years since he left home. Among the prisoners he has sent home is Ilia, daughter of King Priam, who has fallen in love with Idamante, the son of Idomeneo. The overture immediately establishes the character of an opera whose music, without exception, never relaxes its intense seriousness. Calmly the drama unfolds. In an aria, 'Padre, germani, addio', Ilia reveals that her hatred for the conquerors of her country is as nothing to her love for Idamante. He enters at its conclusion and in veiled terms states his love for Ilia, at the same time announcing that, in honour of his father's imminent return to Crete, the Trojan prisoners are to be set free. A chorus of rejoicing at this news precedes the entrance of Arbace to say that Idomeneo's ship has been sunk; the general consternation is given particular expression by Elettra, who fears that his death will remove all obstacles to the marriage of Ilia and Idamante, with whom she is herself in love. After a chorus of intercession, Idomeneo enters with his followers, whom he dismisses before explaining in an aria the nature of the vow which secured Neptune's intervention in quieting the storm: that he will sacrifice the first living creature he meets in return for deliverance from death. It is, of course, Idamante whom he sees, and their dialogue is made the more poignant because it is some time before Idomeneo recognises his son, whom he has not seen since infancy. In horror, the father orders the son from his presence, and Idamante laments his father's apparent displeasure in an aria 'Il padre adorato ritrovo e lo perdo'. The act ends with a brilliant march and choral ciaccona in honour of Neptune.

Act II. The King tells his secret to his counsellor Arbace, who advises that Idamante be sent to a distant country. The scene is usually omitted in modern performance, the act thus beginning with the scene between Idomeneo and Ilia whose aria 'Se il padre perdei' is touchingly beautiful. Idomeneo understands that his vow now involves not only disaster for himself and Idamante but for Ilia as well, but he faces the tragedy with courage and dignity in his great aria 'Fuor del mar ho un mar in seno'. This was written as a showpiece for Raaff, the sixty-six-year-old tenor who created the title role in Munich; whatever may be thought about his musical taste (he wanted an aria for himself substituted for the Act III quartet), his technique must have been very considerable indeed.¹ As Edward Dent said: 'Coloratura for men has gone out of fashion, thanks to Wagner, and, thanks to the late Madame Patti, coloratura for women has been associated with the frail type of heroine rather than the heroic. In the eighteenth century and especially in the early half of it, the grand period of opera seria, a coloratura was almost invariably heroic in character ... Donizetti's Lucia is paired off with a flute, Handel's heroes compete with a trumpet.'

A beautiful, lyrical aria for Elettra, whom the prospect of requited love has turned into a happy woman, leads into a march, and thence to the famous barcarolle chorus of embarkation, 'Placido è il mar, andiamo'. Idamante and Elettra take leave of Idomeneo in a superb trio 'Pria di partir', but the music quickens and a storm breaks over the harbour, heralding Neptune's vengeance at this attempt to evade the consequences of the vow made to him. Idomeneo admits his guilt but accuses the god of injustice, and the act ends as the crowd disperses in terror.

Act III. Ilia can think only of her love for Idamante, and her expression of it in her soliloquy 'Zeffiretti lusinghieri' is one of the most perfect moments of the opera. To her comes Idamante; he will fight the monster Neptune has sent to plague the island, and he may not return. Involuntarily, she confesses her love, which leads to a duet. Idomeneo and Elettra interrupt the lovers. Idomeneo still cannot bring himself to explain the exact cause of the disaster which is overtaking them, and Idamante sadly takes his farewell in the noble quartet 'Andrò ramingo e solo'. Einstein calls it 'the first really great ensemble in the history of the opera seria' and Edward Dent does not try to disguise his enthusiasm for it when he describes it as 'perhaps the most beautiful ensemble ever composed for the stage'. It shows Mozart at his noblest and most expressive. The scene customarily and appropriately ends with the quartet, Arbace's elaborate aria being cut.

The High Priest exhorts the King to confess his sin to Neptune, and the people are duly horrified to hear that the sacrifice of Idamante is the price they and he will have to pay for deliverance from the god's displeasure. The people are gathered in the temple of Neptune to witness the sacrifice, the priests enter to a march and Idomeneo begins the ceremony with a solemn prayer which is answered by the priests. A shout of triumph is heard outside and Arbace announces that Idamante has killed the monster. However, a moment later Idamante, who by now knows the story of his father's vow, enters and offers himself for sacrifice, and Idomeneo cannot but accept him. The ceremony is about to reach its climax when Ilia interrupts and demands to be sacrificed in Idamante's place. The whole situation is resolved by an oracular pronouncement from Neptune to the effect that the crime can be expiated, the vow fulfilled, if Idomeneo will renounce the throne in favour of his son. In the general rejoicing, only Elettra is left with her worst fears realised; in the most furious of her violent utterances, she gives vent to her despair and rushes from the stage or, as some versions have it, falls dead or commits suicide.

The atmosphere changes to one of peace and fulfilment as Idomeneo in a last recitative and aria, 'Torna la pace al core', presents Idamante to the people as their new ruler, and takes his farewell. At the first performance, this aria had to be cut, much apparently to Mozart's regret. The opera ends with the people celebrating the accession of Idamante in dance and chorus.

When Idomeneo was performed privately in Vienna by amateur singers, Mozart added two numbers, transposed the role of Idamante for a tenor, removed most of Arbace's music, and made certain modifications in the rest of the opera. That he gave the role of Idamante to a tenor has been taken by some modern editors to indicate a change of mind as far as the vocal colour of this role was concerned, but this is surely to attach too little importance to the practical conditions of a performance which was after all mostly in the hands of amateur singers; rather few of these would have been likely to be castrati. In any case, however far the colour of the castrato voice must have been from that of a modern soprano, it is hard to believe that it was nearer to a tenor's.

H.

¹ A simplified version from Mozart's pen also exists, twenty-two bars shorter and shorn of much embellishment. It has often been assumed that the bowdlerised version dates from Mozart's preparation of the score in 1786 for Vienna, but Daniel Heartz and Stanley Sadie have suggested that it is likelier to represent an acknowledgement of the elderly Raaff's diminished capacity and that it was probably sung at the première. It is sometimes in modern performance, sadly but maybe prudently, preferred by singers of the title role.

Idomeneo (Glyndebourne, 1951, director Carl Ebert, designer Oliver Messel). Act III, with Sena Jurinac (Ilia), Richard Lewis (Idomeneo), Leopold Simoneau (Idamante), Alexander Young (Priest), Birgit Nilsson (Elettra).

DIE ENTFÜHRUNG AUS DEM SERAIL

The Escape from the Seraglio

Opera in three acts, text by Gottlieb Stephanie from a play by Bretzner. First performed at the Burgtheater, Vienna, 16 July 1782, with Caterina Cavalieri, Therese Teyber, Valentin Adamberger, Ludwig Fischer. During the first six years of its existence, there were thirty-four performances in Vienna. First performed in London, Covent Garden, 1827, in English, with additional airs by J.B. Cramer, and sung by Madame Vestris, Miss Hughes, Mr Sapio, Mr Benson, Mr Wrenn. The first performance in New York was in 1860. Other performances in London include Drury Lane, 1841 (in German), Her Majesty's, 1866 (in Italian, with recitatives by Arditi). Revived Covent Garden, 1927, with Ivogün, Schumann, Erb, Bender, conducted by Bruno Walter; 1938, with Berger, Beilke, Tauber, Weber, conducted by Beecham. Produced for the first time at Glyndebourne in 1935, with Noel Eadie, Eisinger, Ludwig, Andresen, Heddle Nash (Pedrillo), conducted by Fritz Busch. The first performance in Italy did not take place until 1935, at the Florence Festival, when Bruno Walter conducted a cast including Perras, Schöne, Kullman, and Sterneck. First heard at the Metropolitan, New York, in 1946, in English, with Steber, Alarie, Kullman, Carter, Ernster, conductor Cooper.

Constanze, a Spanish lady.....Soprano
 Blonde, her English maid.....Soprano
 Belmonte, a Spanish nobleman.....Tenor
 Pedrillo, his servant.....Tenor
 Pasha Selim.....Speaking Part
 Osmin, overseer of his harem.....Bass
 Turkish Soldiers, Guards, Turkish Women

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

A curious 'springboard' (as Einstein calls it in his Mozart; his Character, his Work) exists for Die Entführung. In 1779 Mozart began the music for a Singspiel, perhaps in desperation at the small prospects for operatic composition and performance which Salzburg offered. It was abandoned, probably owing to the arrival of the commission for Idomeneo, was only published in 1838 under the title of Zaïde, and did not reach the stage until 1866. The reasons are not far to seek: it was conceived on a modest scale – too modest for Mozart's real requirements – and its subject and style were 'Turkish' and very close to those of the opera he undertook a little later, Die Entführung, whose story reads like an amplification of Zaïde. Zaïde contains some attractive music, and the aria 'Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben' is of the greatest simplicity and beauty.

Die Entführung (1782) itself is important among Mozart's works not least because of the ambitious and extended view he takes in it of the hitherto modest German Singspiel. The drama is carried on almost exclusively in speech and it is only in moments of high emotion that the characters have recourse to song – but on what a sublimated level is that song when it comes! To expect in a Singspiel the extended finales that are a characteristic of opera buffa is to wish for something which would have been out of character with the convention and which Mozart was not trying to provide. Nevertheless, the music is highly expressive. Constanze and Belmonte, the latter at any rate, are perhaps loftier in their musical aspirations than they are in the field of human behaviour, where they lay themselves open to charges of ingratitude and deception. Blonde and Pedrillo, though entertaining, are stock comedy figures. Osmin, however, is one of the composer's great dramatic creations, genuinely and consistently comic in music as in action, yet no mere figure of fun, and as potentially dangerous as he is laughable.

Act I. The overture is mainly concerned with establishing the 'Turkish' atmosphere of the piece; Mozart also introduces a reference in the minor to Belmonte's aria, 'Hier soll' ich dich denn sehen, Constanze', which is heard in C major when the curtain goes up. Belmonte is outside the Pasha Selim's house, where he believes his beloved Constanze, who has been carried off by pirates, is a captive. Osmin, in charge of the Pasha's harem and also, it seems, of his garden, appears singing a doleful sort of love song, 'Wer ein Liebchen hat gefunden', one of the delights of the score. He is questioned by Belmonte: is this not the Pasha Selim's house? It is, and he works for the Pasha, but an enquiry for Pedrillo produces an even surlier answer, as this is his bête noire, his rival in love for Blonde; Pedrillo should, he says, without delay be hanged, drawn and quartered. He chases Belmonte away, but is immediately confronted with Pedrillo in person, saucier and more impudent than ever. The situation calls for music and he relieves his pent-up feelings with an aria that is a virtuoso expression of rage: 'Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen'.

Belmonte returns to find his former servant; each is delighted at the other's news, Belmonte to hear that Constanze has remained true to him in spite of the Pasha's persuasive powers, Pedrillo that there is a boat waiting to take them all to safety if they can only spirit the women out of the harem. Belmonte sings of love for his absent Constanze: 'O wie ängstlich, o wie feurig'. Its romantic feeling derives in part, we may suppose, from Mozart's love for his own Constanze, whom he married a few weeks after the production of the opera. The orchestral accompaniment, Mozart tells his father in a letter, represents the throbbing of the lover's heart, the heaving of his breast, his sighs and whispers.

Belmonte goes out as Constanze and the Pasha land from a boat. The Pasha once again assures Constanze of his love and of his determination to win hers in return. She sings of the love that she knew before her captivity and protests that she will be true to this memory: 'Ach, ich liebte, war so glücklich'. She leaves, and Pedrillo takes this opportunity to introduce Belmonte to the Pasha as an architect of high standing. The Pasha intimates that he will not withhold his favour from him, but after he has gone Osmin remains unimpressed and tries to bar their way. It is only after a lively trio, 'Marsch, marsch, marsch', that they contrive to outmanoeuvre him and enter the palace.

Act II. Osmin is no match for Blonde in a battle of wits, as she demonstrates in her aria, 'Durch Zärtlichkeit und Schmeicheln', and the duet which follows. He knows she will come off best and can do no more than complain at the folly of the English in allowing their women so much liberty. Constanze unburdens herself to Blonde: 'Traurigkeit ward mir zum Lose'.

It is perhaps the most deeply felt number of the score, and one of Mozart's most sublime expressions of grief (like Pamina's 'Ach, ich fühl's', in the key of G minor). Blonde retires as the Pasha comes once more to urge his suit. Constanze is adamant and launches into one of the most considerable arias Mozart ever wrote for soprano voice: 'Märtern aller Arten'. Laid out on concerto lines with four solo instruments and a lengthy orchestral introduction, it is the one moment in the opera where Mozart definitely sacrifices the stage situation – the Pasha and Constanze can do little more than glare at each other during the introduction – to the possibilities inherent in his singers, of whom Caterina Cavalieri, the Constanze, was perhaps the most eminent. But the aria that results is musically so considerable that few people will grumble at the large scale of the composer's inspiration.

Blonde is wondering if the entreaties of the Pasha have at last been successful when Pedrillo rushes in to tell her that Belmonte is here and a plan afoot for their escape. Osmin is to be drugged to make way for the double elopement. Blonde's joyful song, 'Welche Wonne, welche Lust', contrasts with Pedrillo's definitely nervous reaction to the prospect of dealing with Osmin single-handed ('Frisch zum Kampfe'). However, he tackles as to the manner born the business of persuading Osmin that the Muslim doctrine of teetotalism is better honoured in the breach than the observance, and he soon has him tippling with the best and praising wine in one of Mozart's most exquisite inspirations, the duet 'Vivat Bacchus'. Osmin sinks into a stupor and Pedrillo is able to drag him out of the way and leave the coast clear for a reunion between Belmonte and Constanze. Belmonte in his aria, 'Wenn der Freude Thränen fliessen', is less passionate than Constanze as she begins the quartet which is to end the act. It is a noble piece in spite of the crisis which is contrived to keep drama alive – the men ask to be assured again that their lovers were true during captivity – and the musical integrity is unaffected by the dramatic artifice.

Act III. With much comic pantomime, Pedrillo organises the disposal of the ladders with the help of the captain of the ship which is to take them to freedom. Belmonte enters and is instructed to sing so that no one will notice that he, Pedrillo, is not serenading his Blonde as usual ('Ich baue ganz auf deine Stärke'). A moment later, Pedrillo is back, and ready to give the signal for escape with his enchanting serenade 'Im Mohrenland gefangen war'. Belmonte and Constanze disappear into the darkness, and Pedrillo rushes up the ladder to fetch his Blonde, unaware that his singing has woken up a guard, a mute, who suspects the worst and dashes off to summon Osmin. The latter arrives as the second pair of lovers is on the point of leaving the house, and his suspicions that a double elopement has been planned are confirmed when Constanze and Belmonte are brought back by the guard who has surprised their escape. 'Ha! wie will ich triumphieren' he sings in his joy that at last he is to have the chance of settling a hundred and one old scores with Pedrillo, and several new ones as well with Belmonte. Osmin parades his vengeful notions in an orgy of triumph, touching a top E and sustaining a bottom D in his efforts to give them adequate musical expression.

The Pasha is informed of the intended escape and arrives to question the prisoners. Constanze pleads her love for Belmonte as justification for the attempted escape, and her lover assures the Pasha that his father, a rich Spaniard by the name of Lostados, will pay a high ransom for his freedom. Lostados! exclaims the Pasha: you are the son of my greatest enemy, the man who stole from me my love, my career, and my right to live in my native country. Belmonte and Constanze are face to face with death and perhaps torture, and their extensive duet, 'Welch' ein Geschick', reveals a serious approach to their imminent tragedy. The Pasha comes back, and announces that he scorns to return evil for evil, that they are free to go back to their native Spain whenever they like. The happy couples offer thanks in the form of a vaudeville, which Belmonte begins, the others singing a verse each and all joining in the refrain: 'Wer so viel Huld vergessen kann, den seh man mit Verachtung an' (Whoever forgets such kindness should be looked upon with scorn).

Blonde cannot resist a final dig at the discomfited Osmin, whose rage overcomes him so that he disrupts the harmony of the ensemble with another furious outburst before rushing defeated from the scene, leaving the others to finish on a note of suitable gratitude. They take their leave while the chorus sings the praises of the Pasha and his clemency. H.

DER SCHAUSPIELDIREKTOR

The Impresario

Comedy with music in one act, text by Gottlieb Stephanie the Younger. Première at Schönbrunn Palace, Vienna, 7 February 1786, with Caterina Cavalieri as Mlle Silberklang and Aloysia Lange as Mme Herz, Adamberger (the first Belmonte) as Monsieur Vogelsang, Stephanie as Frank. Cavalieri was the mistress of the composer Salieri, whose Prima la Musica poi le Parole was given at the same court festivity; Aloysia Lange was Mozart's sister-in-law and first serious love.

Buff, a buffo singer Baritone
Monsieur Vogelsang Tenor
Mme Herz Soprano
Mlle Silberklang Soprano
Frank, an impresario Spoken Role

There is an allegro overture. Frank, with Buff's assistance, is lining up a theatrical company for Salzburg. He has no problem over engaging a couple of actresses but the singers who audition for him are quite another story. The first, Mme Herz, lives up to her name and chooses a pathetic aria, economically going no higher than top D. The second, Silberklang, sings a rousing rondo, contenting herself with a somewhat lower tessitura but hardly less brilliance. Each selection needless to say aims to emphasise each singer's strongest points.

There ensues a hilarious trio in which, after protestations of 'Ich bin die erste Sängerin!', one rival soprano advocates 'Adagio!' followed by a high E and F, the other insists on 'allegro, allegro' and follows with Cs and then a D, the tenor trying to persuade each of the ladies to accept an accommodation. Eventually, after threats and then promises of large salaries, it all ends with a quartet, and, on the part of the listener, a strong conviction that either Mozart's two prima donnas had a stronger sense of humour in real life than tradition allows, or else he was a remarkable diplomat. H.

LE NOZZE DI FIGARO

The Marriage of Figaro

Opera buffa in four acts, text by Lorenzo da Ponte after Beaumarchais. First performed at the Burgtheater, Vienna, 1 May 1786, with Laschi (Countess), Storace (Susanna), Bussani (Cherubino), Gottlieb (Barbarina), Mandini (Marcellina), Mandini (Count Almaviva), Benucci (Figaro), Kelly (Basilio and Curzio), Bussani (Bartolo and Antonio), and directed by Mozart. First performed in England (in Italian) at Haymarket Theatre, London, 1812, and (in English) Covent Garden, 1819. First performance in New York, 1824. Revived at Old Vic Theatre, London (Edward Dent's translation), 1920; first performed at Glyndebourne Festival in 1934, conducted by Fritz Busch, produced by Carl Ebert, and with Aulikki Rautawaara, Audrey Mildmay, Luise Helletsgruber, Willi Domgraf-Fassbänder, Roy Henderson, Norman Allin.

| | |
|---|----------|
| Count Almaviva..... | Baritone |
| Figaro, his valet | Baritone |
| Doctor Bartolo | Bass |
| Don Basilio, a music-master | Tenor |
| Cherubino, a page | Soprano |
| Antonio, a gardener | Bass |
| Don Curzio, counsellor at law | Tenor |
| Countess Almaviva | Soprano |
| Susanna, her maid, engaged to Figaro | Soprano |
| Marcellina, a duenna | Soprano |
| Barbarina, Antonio's niece | Soprano |

Place: The Count's Château of Aguas Frescas, near Seville

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 20 minutes

Figaro was Mozart's first venture with his most famous librettist, Lorenzo da Ponte (who incidentally provided the libretti for no fewer than four operas which had their first performance during 1786, the year of Figaro's début). Although he had had no Italian comic opera produced since La Finta Giardiniera in 1775, Mozart had in the meanwhile worked on L'Oca del Cairo and Lo Sposo Deluso, each of which he abandoned. He had also composed the music for Der Schauspieldirektor, a slight piece but sufficient evidence of the continuing development of his theatrical and musical craftsmanship. It is surprising in retrospect to note that, in spite of the brilliant libretto and even more brilliant music, Figaro made only a moderate success when it was produced in Vienna, where it had to wait until the triumph in Prague before being received into popular affection. It was incidentally the success of Figaro in Prague which led to the commission to compose Don Giovanni for that city.

Act I. Nothing could make a better prelude to this marriage day of feverish activity than the short presto overture. When the curtain rises, Susanna is discovered before the looking-glass. Figaro is measuring out a space on the floor ('Cinque, dieci'). The room, Figaro explains, is to be theirs – 'the most convenient room in the castle, just between milord and milady'.¹ (Not all stage designers have been prepared to admit that, in eighteenth-century castle geography, this is likely to have been a box room or a curtained-off portion of a passage, not a grand room with a veranda and a view of the park.) Susanna astounds him by peremptorily refusing to accept it, but, when he remonstrates ('Se a caso Madama'), explains that while the position may make it easy for her to go to the Countess, it also makes it easy for the Count to get to her. The Countess rings, and Figaro is left alone to contemplate a situation that is by no means to his liking. In the two movements of his duet with Susanna, the mood has been one of light-heartedness, which is hardly interrupted by the hint of intrigue, as Susanna is obviously unperturbed by a situation she feels herself quite capable of dealing with. But 'Se vuol ballare' shows Figaro in a state of mind in which determination to make the Count dance to his tune cannot altogether eliminate apprehension.

No sooner has he left the room than we are shown another aspect of the worry which is to plague him on his wedding-day. Marcellina comes in with Don Bartolo, the pair of them hatching a plot which will compel Figaro to marry Marcellina as he has defaulted on a debt he owes her. He, Doctor Bartolo, with his legal knowledge will ensure that there is no escape for the rascal ('La vendetta') – a splendid example of what such an aria for basso buffo can become in the hands of a composer of genius. As he goes out of one door, Susanna enters by another and she and Marcellina meet as they attempt to follow Bartolo; their duet as each offers the other precedence ends in Marcellina's complete discomfiture. Susanna stays behind and is immediately confronted with a disconsolate Cherubino, who wants to enlist her help in getting the Count to reinstate him as the Countess's page. No one takes him seriously except himself. He is at the wrong age: young enough to be allowed liberties, old enough to take advantage of them (as has happened over his latest exploit with Barbarina, for which he has been dismissed) in a way that cannot be tolerated. He is in love with every woman he comes across, and pours out his adolescent aspirations to Susanna in an aria, 'Non sò più cosa son, cosa faccio'.

No sooner has he finished than voices are heard outside and he has only just time to conceal himself before the Count comes into Susanna's room and starts to protest his affections. It is not her lucky day, as the Count is followed a moment or two later by Basilio; in the scramble for concealment, Cherubino nips into the chair behind which the Count takes refuge. Basilio teases Susanna with gossip about Cherubino and when she will not listen, presses her about the page and the Countess – an intrigue which he says everyone is talking about. The Count can tolerate the situation no longer and emerges from his hiding-place to demand that the gossip-mongers shall be found and punished. In the ensuing trio – since 'Non sò più cosa son' the action has been carried on in recitative – Susanna faints, but revives in time to plead the cause of the unhappy Cherubino, a mere boy she says. Not so young as you think, says the Count, and describes how he caught him the previous day hiding in Barbarina's room. Suiting the action to the word, he draws the cover from the chair – and there is Cherubino again. Only Cherubino's admission that he had heard what passed between the Count and Susanna ('I did all I could not to hear, my lord') stays the penalty that he would otherwise incur.

¹ Edward Dent's translation.

Le nozze di Figaro (The Marriage of Figaro/ Figaro's Wedding; English National Opera, 1991, director Graham Vick, designer Richard Hudson). Bryn Terfel as Figaro.

Led by Figaro, a band of locals comes in to sing the Count's praises, and, at its end, the Count yields to the general entreaties, but only to the extent of giving Cherubino a commission in his Regiment, for which he must leave immediately. Figaro speeds him on his way with a spirited description of what his future life has in store for him. Michael Kelly, the Irish tenor who was the Basilio and Curzio in the original production, tells in his memoirs of the splendid sonority with which Benucci, the Figaro, sang the martial air 'Non più andrai' at the first orchestral rehearsal. Mozart, who was on the stage in a crimson pelisse and cocked hat trimmed with gold lace, kept repeating 'Bravo, bravo, Benucci!' It makes a stirring finale to an act.

Act II. We are introduced to the Countess in a soliloquy, 'Porgi amor', in which we are made aware of her intense longing for her husband's love, and also of the reticence which her breeding makes natural to her. Susanna expounds her own view of the situation and opens the door to Figaro. His plan is that the Count shall be given an assignation with Susanna, whose place shall be taken by Cherubino, and that at the same time he shall be told in an anonymous letter that the Countess in her turn has made a rendezvous with an unknown man. Cherubino comes in to see if he can be dressed for the part, but first sings the song he has just composed, 'Voi che sapete'. Not only has Mozart got round the difficulty of introducing a song ('words and music by Cherubino') into a milieu where singing is the natural means of expression, but he has done so in such a way that this piece has become one of the world's most popular tunes. Cherubino tries on the dress to the accompaniment of a song with action, Susanna's 'Venite inginocchiatevi'. No sooner is it ended and Cherubino safely buttoned up than a knock is heard at the door. It is the Count.

Consternation! Cherubino dashes into the Countess's dressing-room and Susanna hides behind a curtain. The Count is suspicious of his wife's all too obvious nervousness, and suspicion that something is being hidden from him becomes certainty when he hears a noise and finds the dressing-room door locked ('Susanna, or via sortite'). He takes his wife with him as he goes off to get tools to break it down with. While he is away Cherubino slips out of hiding and jumps from the window, leaving Susanna to take his place. The little allegro assai duet for Susanna and Cherubino is a comedy interlude of the greatest dexterity amidst the ranting and raging of the Count, which redoubles in fury when the Countess tries to explain that Cherubino is in her room without much on because he was being fitted for a charade.

The great finale is begun by the Count to all intents and purposes in a towering passion: 'Esci omai, garzon malnato'. The Countess's pleading seems to be in vain, but both are struck dumb when, at the height of the storm, Susanna emerges coolly from the inner room. The Count rushes in to see if Cherubino is not still there, but, finding he is not, can do nothing but plead for pardon. With Susanna's aid, this is obtained, but with it the Count's suspicions begin to take hold again. The anonymous letter? Written by Figaro, delivered by Basilio. He thinks he has found someone he can safely be angry with, but is told he must forgive everyone if he himself is to be forgiven for his jealousy. There is a moment of peace and relaxation which ends as Figaro bounds in to summon his master and mistress to the wedding dance which is about to begin. But the Count sees a chance of getting his own back and questions Figaro about the anonymous letter. In spite of hints from the Countess and Susanna, Figaro denies all knowledge of it, and has almost turned the Count's suspicions when Antonio, the gardener, bumbles in, protesting that his life is a perpetual trial but that today they have thrown a man out of the window on to his flowerbeds, and that is the last straw. Figaro says that it was he who jumped out, but Antonio thinks it looked more like the page. Figaro sticks to his story until the Count catechises him about a paper Antonio says was dropped near the flowerbed. Figaro searches his pockets and racks his brains, but in the nick of time the Countess recognises it and whispers that it is the page's commission. Why was it left? Again, it is only just in time that the Countess remembers that it had not been sealed. Figaro's triumph is short-lived, as Marcellina comes in, supported by Bartolo and Basilio, to lodge formal complaint before the Count against Figaro for breach of promise. The act comes to an end in pandemonium.

The finale is one of the greatest single movements in all Mozart's operas. For variety of motive, tempo, and texture it is unrivalled; the characterisation is consistent and credible and at no time subordinated to more general musical needs; the level of invention is extremely high; and the whole thing is carried out with resources that make use of the nine principals but involve no chorus or scenic display. It is a marvel of ingenuity, and at the same time a model of simplicity.

Act III. The Count has not yet given up hope of Susanna, and when she comes to borrow smelling salts for her mistress he seems within reach of his prize. She agrees to meet him that night in the garden. Their duet, 'Crudel, perchè finora', reveals the Count as an ardent lover, Susanna as an inattentive beloved, but the result is a masterpiece. As Susanna leaves the room, she meets Figaro and assures him, just a little too loudly, that he is sure now of winning his case against Marcellina. Sure of winning his case? repeats the Count, and launches into a superb recitative and aria, 'Vedrò mentr'io sospiro, felice un servo mio?' (Must I forgo my pleasure, whilst serf of mine rejoices?). Edward Dent has observed that the Count, a man of intense energy, is shown first of all in ensemble, only later in aria, because, one might almost say, he has no time to sing an aria until the moment when he has to take stock of his position. It is an extraordinary piece of self-revelation when it does come, and takes the Count right out of the category of the unsuccessful lover and erring husband into something much more potent. But the balance is redressed when it is discovered, after he has given judgement for Marcellina, that that lady is in fact none other than Figaro's mother. In the great ensemble which follows, the Count is reduced to expressions of impotent fury: what can he do when confronted with this wholly unexpected development? The sextet is one of the most satisfactory instances in all opera of pure comedy purveyed in terms of straight-faced music.

The scene is empty for a moment, and the Countess comes in to sing the most extended and most moving of her utterances in the opera. 'Dove sono' consists of a lengthy recitative followed by a highly expressive aria in two sections, andantino and allegro. It is her moment of highest self-revelation, just as his aria was the Count's; if his thoughts were of revenge that his desires are not to be satisfied, hers are of the love he once bore her but which she seems to have lost. His aria grew out of the situation created by his duet with Susanna, the Countess's gives audible expression to a situation which can only be resolved with Susanna's aid and therefore leads to a duet between the two. They arrange where Susanna is to meet the Count that evening. The letter duet, 'Che soave zeffiretto', is one of the famous numbers of the score; the mistress dictates a letter to the Count, the maid takes it down, and the voices of both blend as they read it back together.

But the wedding festivities are about to begin and a crowd of village girls presents flowers to the Countess, who is astonished a moment later, when the Count comes in with Antonio, to see one of them unmasked as Cherubino. A tense situation is saved by Barbarina: 'My lord, when you kiss me and tell me you love me, you often say you will give me whatever I want. Give me Cherubino for a husband!' Figaro announces the beginning of the wedding march, the so-called Fandango, the one Spanish element in the score. Like the march in Idomeneo and the minuet in Don Giovanni it begins as it were in the middle, and returns to what should properly be the opening section later on. There is a chorus in praise of the generosity and right-mindedness of the Count in having abolished the droit de seigneur, and the happy couples – Bartolo and Marcellina as well as Figaro and Susanna – receive their wedding wreaths from the Count and Countess, Susanna taking the opportunity to give the Count the letter she and her mistress have concocted for him. He opens it, pricking his finger on the pin – a comedy which is watched all unknowingly by Figaro and commented on with some relish. The Count announces general festivity – song, dance, feasting, and fireworks – and the act ends with a repetition of the chorus in his honour.

Act IV. The last act is devoted to clearing up the various situations which have arisen in the course of Figaro's wedding day, but there is one more complication to be added before the process begins. The atmosphere is more highly charged perhaps than can be put down to the fact that it is night by the time the act begins. The action takes place in a part of the garden which contains arbours and sheltered walks. Barbarina begins it with a little half-finished cavatina; she has been given the pin which sealed the letter to return to Susanna, but has lost it. She tells the story to Figaro, who comes in with Marcellina and is overcome with distress at this apparent indication of his wife's unfaithfulness.

Arias for Marcellina and Basilio occur at this point, but both are often omitted. Before Basilio's, Figaro watches Barbarina hide in one of the arbours (where she is to meet Cherubino), and tells Bartolo and Basilio that they should stay near at hand to witness the seduction of his wife by the Count. Now occurs Figaro's recitative and aria, 'Tutto è disposto' and 'Aprite un po' quegli occhi', at the same time his most serious moment (the recitative is tragic in the extreme) and his most comic (the horns at the end are surely intended to be illustrative as well as musical). Susanna asks the Countess (they have by now changed clothes) to be allowed to walk a little apart from her, and sings an aria of exquisite sensibility, ostensibly to the lover she is waiting for, but in reality knowing full well that Figaro is listening to her, 'Deh vieni non tardar'.

The comedy of mistaken identity begins. Cherubino attempts to flirt with what he thinks is Susanna, in reality of course the Countess. Susanna, the Count, and Figaro observe, and the Count interrupts and starts to make love on his own account to his wife in disguise. Figaro does not know about the change of clothes and it is his turn to interrupt; with the stage empty he invokes the gods to avenge his honour. Susanna (still disguised as the Countess) calls to him and he starts to tell her of the Count's escapade when he recognises that it is in fact Susanna he is talking to. The dramatic tension which may lead to tragedy is shattered, and we are once more safely in comedy. Figaro makes love to her as if she were the Countess, and then laughs at her attempt to disguise herself from him as much as at her indignation. All is forgiven – Susanna does not mind the joke against herself – and the two combine to make the Count think their extravagant love-making is in reality that of mistress and valet. The ruse succeeds, the Count summons anyone within hearing to bear witness to the unfaithfulness of his wife, and in succession hauls Cherubino, Barbarina, Marcellina, and the supposed culprit from the arbour in which they have taken refuge. All pleading is in vain, until the voice of the Countess herself is heard behind them all: 'Almeno io per loro perdono otterrò?' (May I then for pardon at last intercede?). The dramatic suddenness of her entry combines with the Count's noble phrase of contrition to make this a moment that can be set beside that of the emergence of Susanna from the Countess's room in Act II. The Count begs forgiveness in a swelling phrase, receives it, and the opera ends in general rejoicing, voiced though by the principals alone and unsupported by the chorus.

Le Nozze di Figaro is an incomparable masterpiece, one moreover that has been praised throughout its history for a variety of reasons. If it was once the brilliant tunes of the solo songs which attracted audience and performers alike, it would probably nowadays be claimed that the ensembles are the main glories of the work. Nothing, one is inclined to think, could be more perfect than the finale to the second act. Maybe it cannot, but in the last act Mozart has achieved something almost more remarkable in the feeling of anxiety which pervades music and situation alike. It is as though the tapestry of the comedy has been reversed and, instead of dazzling with its brilliance, it is shot through with flashes of light in the darkness; it is not so much that the garden has a thundercloud hanging over it, but that there is lightning in the air. I know I always have something akin to a feeling of relief when Figaro's little B flat tune arrives to prove that once again we have come through the web of intrigue to the safety and resolution beyond it. At no time does the opera break the bounds of comedy, even in this last act, except in so far as Mozart here, as in Don Giovanni, appears to acknowledge no bounds where comedy is concerned.

H.

DON GIOVANNI

Opera in two acts, text by Lorenzo da Ponte. First performed at the National Theatre, Prague, 29 October 1787, with Teresa Saporiti, Micelli, Bondini, Luigi Bassi as Don Giovanni, Ponziani, Baglioni, Lolli. In Vienna, 1788, with Aloysia Lange as Donna Anna, Cavalieri, Mombelli, Francesco Albertarelli as Don Giovanni, Morella and Benucci. English première in London, Her Majesty's Theatre, 12 April 1817. Given at Covent Garden (in English) on 30 May 1817, and for the first time in America (as The Libertine) in Philadelphia in 1818. Presented at the Park Theatre, New York, in 1826 with da Ponte present, Manuel Garcia senior as Don Giovanni, Manuel Garcia junior as Leporello, Mme Garcia as Donna Elvira, and Signorina Maria Garcia (afterwards the famous Malibran) as Zerlina. Later revivals: Covent Garden, 1926, conducted by Bruno Walter, and with Frida Leider, Lotte Lehmann, Elisabeth Schumann, Mariano Stabile, Fritz Krauss, and Aquistapace in the cast; 1939 in the same theatre with Elisabeth Rethberg, Hilde Konetzni, Mafalda Favero, Ezio Pinza, Richard Tauber, Virgilio Lazzari and conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham. First performance at Glyndebourne, 1936, when Ina Souez, Luise Helletsgruber, Audrey Mildmay, John Brownlee, Koloman von Pataky, Salvatore Baccaloni were conducted by Fritz Busch.

Faure and Maurel were great Don Giovannis, Jean de Reszke sang the role while he was still a baritone, and Scotti made his debut at the Metropolitan in it. Lablache was accounted the greatest of Leporellos, but earlier in his career he had sung Don Giovanni. The role of Don Ottavio has been sung by Rubini, Mario, John McCormack, Schipa and Simoneau; Lilli Lehmann and Welitsch have been renowned in the role of Donna Anna; and Zerlina has been sung by aspiring prime donne from Adelina Patti and Geraldine Farrar to Irmgard Seefried and Mirella Freni.

The CommendatoreBass
 Donna Anna, *his daughter*Soprano
 Don Ottavio, her betrothed.....Tenor Don Giovanni, a young and licentious nobleman.....Baritone
 Leporello, his servant.....Bass
 Donna Elvira, a lady of Burgos.....Soprano
 Zerlina, a country girl.....Soprano
 Masetto, *betrothed to Zerlina*Baritone

Place: Seville

Time: Seventeenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 55 minutes

It has been asserted that Don Juan Tenorio was a historical personage, but there is little evidence to support this view. His first recorded appearance in literature is in the play El Burlador de Sevilla written by Tirso de Molina (1571–1641). Molière's Le Festin de Pierre (1665) has little to do with the Spanish play, but introduces an important character, Donna Elvira; Shadwell's The Libertine appeared in England in 1676, by which time the story is described as 'famous all over Spain, Italy and France'; Goldoni in 1736 wrote a verse-play, Don Giovanni Tenorio o sia il Dissoluto; but it was in 1787 that there appeared the most important of the various sources from which da Ponte's libretto derives. This was Bertati's libretto with music by Giuseppe Gazzaniga. Da Ponte, Edward Dent suggests, may even have proposed the subject to Mozart knowing that he had a convenient source to hand, and certainly he drew copiously on Bertati's book for his own libretto, which remains one of his best.

It was the huge success of Figaro in Prague which brought Mozart a commission to write an opera for the second city of the Austrian Empire.

Don Giovanni no doubt owed some of its initial success to the charismatic and courageous nature of its central figure, part libertine, part blasphemer; some to the speed of its dramatic and musical action, some also to its blend of the comic and the serious. Later twentieth-century opinion, in contrast to the view in the nineteenth century when its popularity was at a peak, has taken a more critical view of the work. Once upon a time, conductors omitted the envoi at the opera's end, relying on Mozart's example in Vienna in 1788, and thus reduced emphasis on the comedy on which Mozart and da Ponte had floated their serious commentary on aspects of the human condition – but one could argue that they were forgetting that dramma giocoso was after all the description of the work at the head of the score. A true and complete realisation of the opera's possibilities is almost out of reach, has run the modern argument; any performance which satisfies its audience has achieved something against the odds, and to cast it well, conduct it with style, and direct the action with logic is probably not sufficient to guarantee success. The work remains nonetheless a peak of operatic creative achievement and to bring it off satisfactorily an ambition of every conductor and every opera company.

The overture consists of an andante introduction which reproduces the scene of the banquet at which the statue appears, followed by an allegro which characterises the impetuous, pleasure-seeking Don. Without pause, Mozart links up the overture with the song of Leporello; wrapped in his cloak and seated in the garden of a house in Seville, which Don Giovanni on amorous adventure bent has entered secretly during the night, he is complaining of the fate which makes him a servant to such a restless and dangerous master. 'Notte e giorno faticar' runs his song; the music, like all that Leporello subsequently sings, is in the Italian buffo tradition, differing in degree of expressiveness but not in kind of expression from that of other contemporary buffo creations. Don Giovanni hurriedly issues from the house, pursued by Donna Anna. There follows a trio in which the wrath of the insulted woman, the annoyance of the libertine, and the comments of the watching Leporello are expressed simultaneously. The Commendatore hears the noise, finds his daughter struggling with an unknown man, and draws his sword. In spite of the protests of Don Giovanni, who is reluctant to fight so old an opponent, a duel ensues and in it the Commendatore receives a mortal wound. The trio which follows between Don Giovanni, the dying Commendatore, and Leporello is a unique passage in the history of musical art. The genius of Mozart, tender, profound, pathetic, is revealed in its entirety. Written in a solemn rhythm and in the key of F minor, this trio, which fills only eighteen measures, contains in a restricted outline but in master strokes the seeds of the serious side of the drama, just as the recitative which follows – Don Giovanni makes light of the whole affair – re-establishes the opera on a basis of comedy, only to return to seriousness with Anna's grief over the body of her father. In a duet Don Ottavio, her fiancé, tries to comfort her and swears to avenge the dead man.

The scene changes and Don Giovanni and Leporello are on the prowl again; they perceive a woman – or rather, Don Giovanni does – who appears to be inveighing against a lost lover. It is Donna Elvira, whom they do not recognise as yet, but who has been another of the Don's victims. There are in the tears of this woman not only the grief of one who has been loved and now implores heaven for comfort, but also the indignation of one who has been deserted and betrayed. When she cries with emotion 'Ah, chi mi dice mai quel barbaro dov'è?' one feels that in spite of her anger, she is ready to forgive, if only a regretful smile shall recall her to the man who was able to charm her. The character of her music is seen straight away in this aria. It is more pliable than Donna Anna's, but perhaps it is the persistent nature it seems to reveal that makes Don Giovanni run quite so fast from her.

As she finishes her outburst, she turns to find that the stranger who is attempting to console her is none other than Don Giovanni himself. Leaving Leporello to explain the reasons why he deserted her, Don Giovanni makes his escape, and Elvira is obliged to listen while the servant runs through a catalogue – grossly exaggerated we may be sure – of his master's conquests. 'Madamina' is a perfect passage of its kind and one of the most famous arias in the repertory of the basso buffo. It is an exquisite mixture of grace and finish, of irony and sentiment, of comic declamation and melody, the whole enhanced by the poetry and skill of the accessories. Every word is illustrated by the composer's imagination without his many brilliant sallies injuring the general effect. According to Leporello's catalogue, his master's adventures in love have numbered 2,065: 640 in Italy, 231 in Germany, 100 in France, 91 in Turkey, and in Spain no less than 1,003. All sorts and conditions of women have contributed to this formidable total, and it is small wonder that Elvira leaves the stage vowing vengeance upon her betrayer.

The scene changes to the countryside near Don Giovanni's palace not far from Seville. A troop of happy peasants is seen approaching. The young and pretty Zerlina with Masetto, her fiancé, and their friends are singing and dancing in honour of their approaching marriage. Don Giovanni and Leporello join this gathering of light-hearted and simple young people. Having cast covetous eyes upon Zerlina and having aroused her vanity and her spirit of coquetry by polished words of gallantry, the Don orders Leporello to get rid of the jealous Masetto by taking the entire gathering – except, of course, Zerlina – to his palace. Leporello complies, but Masetto, while submitting to be removed, makes it clear to Don Giovanni – and to Zerlina as well – that he is not the fool he may look. This aria, 'Ho capito, Signor, sì', shows Masetto as an embryo Figaro, duller of wit and in miniature, but a budding revolutionary nonetheless. Don Giovanni, left alone with Zerlina, sings a duet with her which is one of the gems not alone of this opera but of opera in general. 'Là ci darem la mano' (You'll give me your hand) provides ample musical evidence, which is later supported by the Serenade, that though the Don may be unsuccessful in each of the love affairs on which he embarks during the course of the opera, his reputation is still well deserved.

As they are going off arm in arm, Donna Elvira reappears and by her denunciation of Don Giovanni's treachery – 'Ah, fuggi il traditor!' – makes clear to Zerlina that there can be two opinions concerning the character of her fascinating admirer. She takes Zerlina with her as Donna Anna and Don Ottavio come on to the stage, but no sooner is Don Giovanni in conversation with the two than Elvira is back again on the scene – a true comedy stroke. In a quartet, she again denounces Don Giovanni as a heartless deceiver, while he for his part says that she is mad; Anna and Ottavio are at a loss to know which to believe. Elvira goes out, followed a moment later by Don Giovanni, but in the few sentences he speaks Donna Anna recognises the voice of her father's assassin and her own betrayer. Her narrative of the events of that night is a declamatory recitative 'in style as bold and as tragic as the finest recitatives of Gluck'. The aria which follows, 'Or sai chi l'onore' (Now you know who tried to take my honour), is no less grandiose, and its implacable vengefulness (and implacable tessitura) presents a problem for the singer entrusted with the role of Donna Anna. Never elsewhere perhaps did Mozart write music for the soprano voice which is so extremely heavy and taxing.

It is usually after this aria – where it can hardly fail to come as an anti-climax – that Ottavio's interpolated aria 'Dalla sua pace' is sung.¹ This is followed by the Don's exuberant 'Fin ch' han dal vino' which demands a baritone with an immaculate technique and sufficient musical sense to sing it as part of the opera and not just as a sample of his vocal dexterity.

Outside Don Giovanni's palace, Masetto reproaches Zerlina for her flirtation, but she begs his forgiveness in an ingratiating air, 'Batti, batti, o bel Masetto'. This has always been one of the most popular moments in the opera, and it is true that in the quicker 6/8 section you can almost hear Zerlina twiddling her unfortunate admirer round her little finger. But, the aria ended, Masetto's suspicions return when she seems distinctly nervous at the sound of the Don's voice in the distance.

Now begins the finale, one of the great masterpieces of dramatic music. From a hiding place Masetto hears Don Giovanni order his retainers to spare no pains to make the evening a success, and he is able to confront Zerlina and Don Giovanni as the latter attempts to lead her off into an alcove. The situation is well within the Don's compass; he chides Masetto for leaving his bride-to-be alone, and takes them both into the house where the dancing is about to begin. Elvira, Anna, and Ottavio appear, all of them masked. Leporello opens a window to let the fresh evening air into the palace and the violins of a small orchestra within can be heard in the middle of a graceful minuet. He sees the three maskers, and in accordance with tradition, they are bidden to enter. After a moment of hesitation, they decide to accept the invitation, and to carry out their undertaking at all cost and to whatever end. Before entering, they pause on the threshold and, their souls moved by a holy fear, they address heaven in one of the most remarkable prayers written by the hand of man:

¹ Written for the Vienna première of the opera, when the tenor preferred not to sing 'Il mio tesoro', in place of which Mozart introduced the duet for Zerlina and Leporello referred to on page 514 in which she threatens to castrate him with a razor.

Adagio

D. ANNA

Pro - teg - ga il gi - u - sto cie - lo

D. ELVIRA

Ven dichì

D. OTTAV

Pro - teg - ga il gi - u - sto cie - lo

Inside the ballroom, the festivities are in full swing. Don Giovanni and Leporello manoeuvre to keep Masetto from Zerlina, but there is a diversion at the entry of the unknown maskers, who are welcomed by Don Giovanni. The dancing begins with the minuet we have already heard. Its graceful rhythm is prolonged indefinitely as a fundamental idea, while in succession two small orchestras on the stage take up, one a rustic quadrille, the other a waltz. Only the ladies and gentlemen engage in the minuet, the peasants in the quadrille; and before Don Giovanni leads off Zerlina into an adjoining room he should have taken part with her in this dance, while Leporello seeks to divert the jealous Masetto's attention by seizing him in an apparent exuberance of spirits and insisting on dancing the waltz with him.

Masetto's suspicions, however, are not without justification. He breaks away from Leporello, who hurries to warn his master. But just as he has passed through the door, Zerlina's piercing shriek for help is heard from within. Don Giovanni rushes out, sword in hand, dragging with him none other than the luckless Leporello, whom he has opportunely seized in the entrance, and whom, under the pretext that he is the guilty party, he threatens to kill. But this ruse fails to deceive anyone. Anna, Elvira, and Ottavio unmask and accuse Don Giovanni of the murder of the Commendatore: 'Tutto, tutto già si sa'. Taken aback at first, Don Giovanni soon recovers himself. Turning at bay, he defies the threatening crowd. A storm sweeps over the orchestra. Thunder growls in the basses, lightning plays on the fiddles. Don Giovanni, cool and intrepid, dashes through the crowd, which falls back in front of him, and makes his escape.

Act II. A street, with Donna Elvira's house in the background. The beginning of Act II furnishes proof – and proof is needed – that Don Giovanni is the dramma giocoso of its title. The duet with which it opens, 'Eh via, buffone', is in purest buffo style, and it is followed by a trio for Elvira, Don Giovanni, and Leporello which points the moral even more sharply. Donna Elvira, leaning sadly on her balcony, gives voice to her melancholy regrets in a tune of exquisite beauty. In spite of the scene which she has recently witnessed, in spite of the wrongs she herself has endured, she cannot hate Don Giovanni or efface his image from her heart. Her reward is that her recreant lover changes clothes with his servant in the darkness below, and, while Leporello disguised as the Don attracts Donna Elvira into the garden, the Don himself mocks her with exaggerated protestations of love, which she takes at their face value. If the scene is to be taken seriously – and the music of 'Ah, taci, ingiusto core' is of a quality to support such an attitude – the way in which sport is made of her pathetic faithfulness would indicate a revolting callousness on the part not only of the man who has loved and left her, but of the composer as well; but if it can be approached by the audience in a spirit of frivolity, of opera buffa, this callousness is less in evidence.

Elvira descends, and Don Giovanni sings, to his own mandolin accompaniment (too often played pizzicato on a violin), a serenade to Elvira's maid, to whom he has taken a fancy. 'Deh, vieni alla finestra' is one of the most famous numbers of the opera, partly perhaps because of the stress laid on its performance by eminent singers of the title role. Don Giovanni thinks he sees the object of his affections, but, before he can follow up his advantage, round the corner comes Masetto with a band of peasants bent on finding and murdering no less a person than Don Giovanni. They think they are addressing Leporello, and the disguised Don divides them up into parties and sends them off to the four points of the compass in an effective aria, 'Metà di voi qua vadano'. Masetto the ringleader he keeps with him and, having ascertained exactly what weapons he has brought, proceeds to give him a good drubbing and leaves him groaning on the ground. Zerlina, while by no means indifferent to the attentions of the dashing Don, is at heart faithful to Masetto and she comes tripping round the corner when she hears his cries and consoles the poor fellow with the graceful measures of 'Vedrai, carino, se sei buonino'.

The scene changes to the courtyard of a palace in which Elvira and Leporello take refuge. It turns out to be Donna Anna's, and she is on the point of returning home, escorted by the inevitable Don Ottavio and a band of servants bearing torches. Elvira and Leporello make for the doorway, but are intercepted by Masetto and Zerlina, who are lurking in it. Everyone takes Leporello for his master and demands his death, demands they seem rather reluctant to withdraw when they find out that it is the servant they have caught after all.

The sextet is a fine ensemble, with its variety of action and of musical sections. It is plainly intended, says Edward Dent, as the finale of an act, not as a movement in the middle of one.¹ 'It was you then who beat Masetto?' asks Zerlina; 'You who so deceived me?' continues Elvira. 'Spare me, spare my life, I pray',² counters Leporello in an aria which dies away while he holds their attention as he creeps to the door and disappears.

Now comes Don Ottavio's famous aria, the solo number which makes the role coveted by tenors the world over, 'Il mio tesoro intanto'. Upon this air praise has been exhausted. It has been called the 'pietra di paragone' of tenors – the touchstone, the supreme test of classical song. In spite of its rather obscure dramatic value, its musical beauty is as undeniable as its difficulty of execution. At this point, it is customary to insert the superb recitative and aria for Elvira, which Mozart composed for Caterina Cavalieri, who sang the role at the Viennese première. She had complained to Mozart that the Viennese public did not appreciate her as did audiences of other cities and begged him for something which would give her voice full scope. The result was 'Mi tradì quell'alma ingrata'. Again its dramatic justification is slight, but in it Elvira rises to her full height.

After the escapade of the serenade and the beating of Masetto, the Don makes off and chances to meet in the churchyard – which he reaches after some other adventure, we may be sure – with none other than Leporello, who for his part is thankful to have got rid of Elvira; Leporello finds it little to his taste that his master's newest conquest has been someone on whom he – Leporello – has made an impression. Don Giovanni is prepared to laugh the whole thing off when he hears a solemn voice, telling him he will cease laughing by morning, which he is not long in tracing to the statue of the Commendatore, whose death is laid at his own door:

Adagio

Leporello is ordered to invite the statue – 'O vecchio buffonissimo' is Don Giovanni's greeting for him – to supper. This he does in a duet, 'O statua gentilissima', his courage, which fails him at every sentence, being kept at the sticking point by the vigorous encouragement of his master. The statue's utterances in the recitative part of the scene are accompanied by trombones, connected in the opera exclusively with the appearance of the statue and not used, even in the overture, when it is not visible on the stage.

The scene changes once again, this time to a room in Donna Anna's house. Ottavio enters, and she reproaches him when he hints at their forthcoming marriage; at such a time, how could she think of anything but her murdered father? The scene exists solely to give Anna another aria to sing, and 'Non mi dir', beautiful and famous though it is, contributes little to the dramatic development of the opera. The coloratura section, which is included in the allegretto with which the aria ends, was once adversely criticised – amongst other critics, by Berlioz – as having no place in music written for Donna Anna, but we may agree with Edward Dent who says severely that 'Mozart without coloratura is only a very mutilated Mozart'.

¹ This is on the hypothesis that the opera was intended to be in four acts, but was changed to two in the course of rehearsal.

² English translations by Edward Dent (O.U.P.).

The scene changes to Don Giovanni's palace. During the brilliant introduction, he seats himself at table and sings of the pleasures of life. An orchestra (on the stage in many modern performances, but probably not at the première) plays airs from Vicente Martin's *Una Cosa Rara*¹ and Sarti's I due Litiganti, and 'Non più andrai' from Mozart's own Figaro – the last-named selection greeted by Leporello with the observation that it is a bit old hat. The music is a wonderful picture of the exuberant and devil-may-care nature of Don Giovanni, and is in the brilliant, debonair style which has all along been characteristic of his music, not least the recitative. At this point Elvira enters and begs the man who has betrayed her to mend his ways. Her plea falls on deaf ears. She goes to the door, but her shriek is heard from the corridor and she re-enters to flee the palace by another door. Don Giovanni sends Leporello to find out what has frightened her, but he echoes her scream and babbles that the statue is outside. Seizing a candle and drawing his sword, Don Giovanni boldly goes into the corridor. A moment later, he backs into the room, receding before the statue of the Commendatore. The lights go out. All is dark save for the flame of the candle in Don Giovanni's hand. Slowly, with heavy footsteps that re-echo in the orchestra, the statue enters. It speaks.

'Don Giovanni, you did invite me here to supper, so bid me welcome.' Don Giovanni nonchalantly orders Leporello to serve supper. 'Nay, do not go,' commands the statue. 'They who taste of the food of the angels eat no more the corrupt food of mortals ... Will you come with me to supper?' Don Giovanni accepts and gives his hand to the statue in pledge; it is seized in a grip that is icy cold. 'Think on your sins, repent them' – 'No.' A fiery pit opens. Demons seize him, unrepentant to the end, and drag him down.

The music of the scene is gripping, yet accomplished without other addition than the trombones to the ordinary orchestra of Mozart's day, without straining after effect, without any means save those commonly to his hand.

There is an epilogue in which the characters moralise upon Don Giovanni's end – an important feature of all the plays dealing with the legend. For the Vienna performance of 1788 Mozart cut it out and this was held by the nineteenth century to justify a tragic or at all events a romantic interpretation of the opera; such a view depends on conveniently forgetting the ludicrously comic duet for Leporello and Zerlina which Mozart wrote specially for this same performance and which is still printed at the end of the vocal score though never performed. The comedy device of the moralising finale has been used as recently as Stravinsky's The Rake's Progress (page 797), and Alexander Goehr's Arden Must Die.

Quite apart from the brilliant speed at which the music of Don Giovanni proceeds, quite apart from the juxtaposition of stark tragedy and high comedy in the one work, the opera is distinguished by the fascination attached to its central character. He is a brilliant, irresponsible figure, with a dash of philosophy – sometime, somewhere, in the course of his amours, he will discover the perfect woman, from whose lips he will be able to draw the sweetness of all women. He is a villain with a keen sense of humour; inexcusable in real life, possible only in comedy and represented at the first performance, one should not forget, by a youth no more than twenty-two years old! Leporello is a typical basso buffo, except that the quality of the music he has to sing is far higher than customary in this type of role. This is not to say that he is not well characterised, only that there is little new in the conception. At the Viennese première, the singer was Benucci, who had created the role of Figaro there. Ottavio very nearly re-creates the function of the confidant of opera seria, so little part does he play in the stage proceedings. The musical side of the role of course is a very different matter; in spite of its difficulty, the part is very much sought after, and not uncommonly a tenor with style and a stage personality astonishes the audience with the positive impression he makes in this basically negative role.

¹ Revived at Ledlanet in Scotland in 1967.

More interesting than the lesser figures among the men are the three female members of the cast. Zerlina is often played as if butter would not melt in her mouth, but for the Vienna performance Mozart added the duet for her and Leporello in which she attacks him with a razor but finally, in spite of her threats, contents herself with tying him up. Elvira, though frequently touching in her faithfulness to the memory of the man who has betrayed her (not least in her resolve in the finale that she will finish her days in a convent), is not without a touch of the scold in her make-up. It is perhaps Anna who is the most diversely interpreted of the three female roles. At one extreme, she has been represented as cold and incapable of love, at the other – notably by the German romantic poet E.T.A. Hoffmann – as consumed with passion for Don Giovanni. Einstein finds another solution to the problem: at the rise of the curtain Don Giovanni has in fact succeeded in seducing her, disguised as Don Ottavio. To support this view, he instances the recitative before 'Or sai chi l'onore', Don Giovanni's indifference to Anna (for the same reason as he is indifferent to Elvira), her insistence that Ottavio should revenge her father's murder himself without recourse to the law, and finally her refusal to marry Ottavio until some length of time has elapsed.

K., H.

COSÌ FAN TUTTE

Thus Do All Women

Opera buffa in two acts, text by Lorenzo da Ponte. First performed at the Burgtheater, Vienna, 26 January 1790, with Ferrarese del Bene, Villeneuve (they were also sisters in real life), Dorotea Bussani, Calvesi, Benucci, Signor Bussani. First performed in London, Haymarket Theatre, 1811. Revived by Sir Thomas Beecham at His Majesty's Theatre, London, 1911, with Ruth Vincent, Lena Maitland, Beatrice La Palme, Walter Hyde, Frederic Austin and Lewys James; Metropolitan, New York, 1922, with Florence Easton, Frances Peralta, Lucrezia Bori, George Meader, Giuseppe de Luca, Adamo Didur, conductor Artur Bodanzky; Glyndebourne, 1934, with Ina Souez, Luise Helletsgruber, Irene Eisinger, Heddle Nash, Willi Domgraf-Fassbänder, Vincenzo Bettoni, conductor Fritz Busch. Other revivals include Sadler's Wells, 1944, with Joan Cross, Margaret Ritchie, Rose Hill, Peter Pears, John Hargreaves, and Owen Brannigan, conductor Lawrance Collingwood; Glyndebourne Opera at the Edinburgh Festival, 1948, with Suzanne Danco, Eugenia Zareska, Hilde Güden, Petre Munteanu, Erich Kunz, Mariano Stabile, conductor Vittorio Gui; at Glyndebourne, 1950, with Sena Jurinac, Blanche Thebom, Alda Noni, Richard Lewis, Erich Kunz, Mario Borriello, conductor Fritz Busch; at Salzburg, 1960, with Schwarzkopf, Ludwig, Sciutti, Kmentt, Prey, Dönch, conductor Böhm. First performance at Covent Garden, 1947, by Vienna State Opera, with Seefried, Höngen, Loose, Dermota, Kunz, Schoeffler, conductor Krips.

FiordiligiSoprano
Dorabella, *her sister*Soprano
Ferrando, *Dorabella's fiancé*Tenor
Guglielmo, *engaged to Fiordiligi*Bass
Don AlfonsoBaritone
Despina, *maid to Fiordiligi and Dorabella*Soprano

Time: Eighteenth Century

Place: Naples

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

Così fan tutte, ossia La Scuola degli Amanti was written by Mozart to a commission from the Emperor Joseph II; the story is said to have been based on a real-life incident which was the talk of Vienna at the time of its occurrence. Two young officers, confident of the constancy of the sisters to whom they are engaged, enter on a bet with an old bachelor friend of theirs, who maintains that a woman's memory is shorter than they think. At his direction, they put on disguises, and start to pay court to each other's fiancée, having already taken the precaution of securing the aid of Despina, maid to the two sisters. The sisters succumb to their wooing, but at the wedding party the two young men disappear to emerge a moment later in their uniforms and confront the inconstant sisters with their original lovers.

Mozart was at the very summit of his creative powers, and anyone who knows the opera cannot help being surprised at the nineteenth-century suggestion that he in any way disliked the plot he was to use. The truth is inescapable: in Così fan tutte Mozart surpassed even himself in the richness and variety of his invention, in the impeccable skill with which the slender drama is adorned with music, in the creation of beauty. The idea is as light as a feather, and yet the music which clothes it suggests not only the comedy which is on the surface and which remains the most important part of the opera, but also the heartbreak which is behind the joke that goes too far and constantly takes a serious turn. All the odder then that various attempts were made in the nineteenth century and later to provide the music with a new libretto, all of them short-lived – and small wonder in view of the quality of the original, which, as Edward

Dent has emphasised, cannot be judged from a summary but must be seen in all its details.

The short overture has eight bars of slow introduction before the theme of the title is enunciated (see page 519). Most of the rest of it is quick, until just before the end when the motto theme recurs.

Act I. The curtain rises on a café where are seated the three men, in the middle apparently of a heated argument, or so one assumes from the vigorous defence of Dorabella, his fiancée, that Ferrando is making as the music begins. There are three trios, the first with the two lovers answering the sceptical Alfonso, the second in the form of an accompanied solo for Alfonso, the third consisting of jubilation on the part of the lovers at the prospect of winning the bet which they enter upon with Alfonso. It is a scene of the purest comedy and the music matches the artificiality of the mood, culminating in a tune of bubbling, infectious gaiety such as even Mozart himself could not surpass:

The scene changes, the clarinets play in thirds over the strings,¹ and we can be sure we are with Fiordiligi and Dorabella, the paragons of faithfulness on whose constancy so much has just been wagered. They are discussing the respective merits of their young men as evinced in their portraits, and their sentimental rapture at what they see is conveyed in music of exquisitely exaggerated cast, which dissolves in the middle into a cadenza in thirds on the word 'Amore'. This day-dreaming is interrupted by the precipitate arrival of Don Alfonso, who makes obvious his distress at the news he is only too anxious to break to the two young ladies: their lovers are ordered to the wars and are to leave immediately. It is Alfonso's nearest approach to an aria in the whole opera – is in fact described as one in the score; its allegro agitato perfectly reflects the breathless agitation he counterfeits so well. The situation is admirably summed up in two quintets, which are separated by a short duet for the two officers and a military chorus. In 'Sento, oh Dio' the ladies are inconsolable, Don Alfonso builds up the situation, while Guglielmo is inclined to leave specific consolation to Ferrando and himself joins with Alfonso in a more general comment. Twice the two men cannot help nudging the sceptic ('There, you see now'),² but he remains quite unconvinced. Ferrando and Guglielmo say goodbye, soldiers march across the stage singing of the joys of a military existence, but the farewells are not complete until all four have sung a protracted and beautiful farewell, to pungent comment from Alfonso ('Di scrivermi ogni giorno').

Their lovers departed, Fiordiligi and Dorabella show real feeling so that even Alfonso joins them in a wonderfully evocative trio, 'Soave sia il vento', as they pray for calm sea and gentle breezes for the travellers. The idyllic mood does not for one bar survive their joint exit. Alfonso muses in secco recitative on his plans, but as he grows animated at the thought of woman's changeability he launches into an accompanied tirade against the whole sex, the one inescapably bitter moment of the score.

The scene changes, and we meet the chattering Despina, maid to the two sisters, who soon show that their loss has left them in no mood for chocolate or any other such consolation. Dorabella is the first to give vent to her feelings, in an aria of exaggeratedly tragic order, 'Smanie implacabili', a parody one may think of the self-consciously tragic Donna Elvira. Despina advises a more moderate line; she is the female counterpart of Don Alfonso, and in her philosophy a lover's absence affords an opportunity for sport, not for lamentation: 'In uomini, in soldati'. The ladies go out in disgust, and Alfonso seizes the opportunity to enlist Despina as an ally in his attempt to win the wager. Enter the two supposedly departed officers, disguised as Albanians; they are introduced to

¹ The richness of the wind writing is unusual, even for Mozart, and there is more than a hint here and elsewhere of the great B flat major Serenade

(K. 361) for thirteen instruments.

² Translations throughout by the Rev. Marmaduke Browne.

Despina, who laughs at them but does not recognise them, and is quite prepared to help them in their attempt to win the affections of her mistresses. In a moment, the ladies are back on the stage, indignant at finding two strange men in their house and demanding their withdrawal. Alfonso stays in hiding but comments on the situation, and emerges to embrace the Albanians as old friends of his; will the ladies not be kind to them – for his sake? Fiordiligi makes it quite clear that their protestations of love are entirely unavailing: she and her sister are each of them ‘firm as a rock’ (‘Come scoglio’). The aria is parodistic in tone, and, with its wide intervals and absurd jumps from the top to the bottom of the soprano range, seems likely to have been at any rate partly intended to poke fun at the phenomenal range and technique of Ferrarese del Bene, the original singer of Fiordiligi, who was da Ponte’s mistress at the time of the première but seems to have been no favourite of Mozart’s either artistically or personally. Guglielmo answers for Ferrando as well as himself and is given music of such delicacy and charm – *‘Non siate ritrosi’¹ – that one cannot but be surprised that the objects of the two young men’s affections turn on their respective heels and leave the room before he has had time to finish the aria, which dissolves in laughter. The rapid laughing trio is charming, but Don Alfonso has his work cut out to persuade his young friends that he has by no means lost his bet at this early juncture. Let them be ready to meet him in the garden in a few minutes’ time. Ferrando is left alone to sing of his love in a beautiful aria, in type romantic or even sentimental but hardly comic (‘Un’aura amorosa’*). Alfonso and Despina reassure themselves that this is only a pair of women, and that there is as yet no danger of losing the bet.

For the finale we are back in the garden, under the blue Neapolitan sky and with the bay of Naples as background. Small wonder that Fiordiligi and Dorabella reflect jointly on the mutability of pleasure in music of exquisite tenderness, whose end is hardly reached before Ferrando and Guglielmo rush on to the stage brandishing bottles of poison which Alfonso is unable to prevent them drinking. The situation is sufficiently complicated to provide Mozart with exactly what he wanted for an extended finale.

As the Albanians sink into a coma, pandemonium breaks loose, and when Alfonso and Despina rush for the doctor, there is even an opportunity for Ferrando and Guglielmo to join in the ensemble. Alfonso returns with a doctor (Despina in disguise) who proceeds to give the corpses the benefit of the most recent scientific discovery, Mesmerism – as much the latest thing in 1790 one may imagine as Virtual Reality in the 1990s and as likely to raise a laugh, particularly when compressed, as here, into the outward form of an oversize, all-healing magnet. The corpses revive, think at first they are in the Elysian Fields, and demand a kiss from the goddesses to set the seal on their cure. In spite of the promptings of Alfonso and Despina this is denied them, and the curtain falls with the sisters defending what they appear to regard as nothing less than honour itself, to a background of derisive exclamations from Despina and Alfonso, and approving comments of ‘Great would be my indignation were they not to answer No’ from the Albanians themselves.

The music of the finale ranges from the purest beauty – the opening, for instance – to sheer farce – Despina in disguise and her trilling, omnipotent magnet. If there is in this finale less incident than in, for instance, that of Act II of Le Nozze di Figaro, there is nonetheless a musical variety and invention which places it in the very highest company.

Act II. Despina loses her patience with her virtuous employers. Make hay while the sun shines, she says, and behave like normal women when men are around; she rounds off her point in an aria, ‘Una donna a quindici anni’ (A woman has fifteen years). The process of persuasion so well begun is completed by the ladies themselves, who agree that there can be no harm in something so innocent as talk with the strangers. Their minds made up, each selects the appropriate partner – ‘Prenderò quel brunettino’ – in typically melodious fashion, to find at the end of the duet that they are invited to the garden where an entertainment is planned for their delectation. In truth, Alfonso has not exaggerated: nature has never so well imitated art – not even in the case of Cosima Wagner and the ‘Siegfried Idyll’ – as to serenade a loved one with music as entrancing as the duet and chorus 'Secondate aurette amiche' which Ferrando and Guglielmo now combine to sing to them. If this is Mozart's most hedonistically inclined opera, no other number so perfectly illustrates its prevailing characteristic.

¹ A magnificent buffo aria, ‘Rivolgete a lui lo sguardo’ (K.584), was originally planned here, but the slighter piece was substituted, one may imagine, as being more in keeping with this situation. Glyndebourne nonetheless substituted it for the more usual ‘Non siate ritrosi’ in their revival of 1978.

But, the serenade over, neither Albanian seems able to pursue the advantage gained, and, in disgust, Alfonso and Despina enact the scene for them. Neither seems a very apt pupil, but the teachers steal away at the end of their duet (the few phrases from Ferrando and Guglielmo make it technically into a quartet), leaving two rather embarrassed couples behind them talking animatedly about the weather. Ferrando is led off by Fiordiligi, and, after some tentative compliments, Guglielmo succeeds in giving Dorabella a heart-shaped locket, in return for which he removes the medallion (with its portrait of Ferrando) from her neck. Their duet, 'Il core vi dono', is charmingly light in texture and sentiment, and particularly delightful are the references to the pit-a-pat of their hearts.

The outer defences of Dorabella's constancy have been rather easily breached; Fiordiligi's are to prove much harder to carry. She turns a deaf ear to Ferrando's advances, and he is given a magnificent aria, 'Ah, lo veggio, quell'anima bella', in which he alternately expresses doubts and confidence as to the eventual outcome of his suit. Although it is one of the highest pieces Mozart wrote for tenor voice, perhaps it owes its frequent omission from contemporary performances not only to the high tessitura and its extended form, but also to the fact that it is immediately followed by an even longer aria for Fiordiligi which is much too well known to be omitted under any circumstances. Still, Ferrando's aria is far too good to be neglected. Fiordiligi's great rondo, 'Per pietà, ben mio, perdona', is the principal showpiece of the opera; the extensive range, sudden and precipitous leaps from high soprano to contralto and back again, the passages of exacting coloratura, the taxing length – all combine to show off the singer's technique, which is mocked at the same time as it is used to express the turmoil of conflicting emotions in Fiordiligi's mind. A horn obbligato adds to the effect.

Ferrando and Guglielmo meet to compare notes on their progress to date. Guglielmo is suitably smug about the apparent constancy of Fiordiligi, but Ferrando is furiously indignant when he hears of Dorabella's conduct and sees proof in the shape of the locket he himself had given her. He will have revenge; but, he asks Guglielmo, in what form? Don't take it so much to heart, replies his friend: 'Ladies have such variations, permutations, combinations' ('Donne mie, la fate a tanti'). It is a wonderful example of an opera buffa aria, and one of the most delightful moments in the score, as light of touch and delicate in style as the best of Mozart's own chamber music. Symmetry being the thing it is, there follows an aria for Ferrando, less formidable and shorter than 'Ah, lo veggio', although by no means easy to sing; it is sometimes omitted, as the aria for Dorabella, 'È amore un ladroncello', in the next scene used occasionally to be.

Fiordiligi resolves to make a last effort to extricate herself and maybe Dorabella as well from the intolerable situation in which they find themselves. She sends for a couple of old suits of uniform belonging to Ferrando and Guglielmo which happen to be conveniently in the house, and announces her intention of going off to the wars taking her equally disguised sister. She launches into the opening measures of a big aria, but she has hardly started to express her determination to reach her lover's side when she is interrupted by Ferrando, still in his Albanian disguise and protesting that before she leave him she should run her sword through his heart and end his agony for ever. Once more he protests his love, and, in response to a meltingly beautiful tune, resistance crumbles and she falls into his arms: they sing of their future happiness.

Is it Mozart or the romantic Ferrando who has overreached himself in this love duet? There is a school of thought which denies to genius the subtleties which are incidental to the main issue – there is no indication that he ever actually thought of that, they say, choosing to ignore the part played by the instinctive and the subconscious in the creative process. If Ferrando is in love with love as well as with Dorabella, he will be no less shattered with his new and involuntary success with her sister than he was by news of her own infidelity. The joke in fact has gone too far, and has involved too many emotional ties, old and new, for detachment to be any more a possibility – which is exactly what is conveyed by the uneasiness of the music. Granted that the lovers who began as puppets have suddenly become warm and real; perhaps it is one of music's (and therefore opera's) fascinations that such a transformation is possible, and, when achieved, so moving.

The whole scene is watched by Guglielmo from the side, and Alfonso has his work cut out to keep him quiet until it is over. 'What about your fond Fiordiligi now?' asks Ferrando; 'Fior di Diavolo!' answers the discomfited Guglielmo. They are no worse than all the other women, affirms Alfonso: 'Tutti accusan le donne', and at the end of his short solo, he makes the crestfallen lovers repeat the motto with him: 'Così fan tutte'.

Despina brings the news that her mistresses have made up their minds to make their Albanian suitors happy and marry them on the spot.

The finale carries the plot one stage further and provides the expected dénouement. Servants make ready for the wedding under the direction of Despina, and hail the bridal couples when they appear. The lovers' toast is introduced by one of those unforgettable tunes such as Mozart has a habit of producing at just the moment when abundance has seemed to be sated, and the toast itself is an enchanting canon, led by Fiordiligi, which goes harmoniously on its way until it is the turn of Guglielmo to take up the tune. He contents himself with an angry aside to the effect that nothing would please him more than that the wine should turn to poison on their lips. It has been suggested that the device, which helps to lend variety to the quartet, was dictated to Mozart for the obvious reason that the tune which goes up to A flat was too high for the bass Guglielmo to sing. Alfonso brings in a notary (Despina in yet another costume) who is to take care of the legal side of the weddings, and with much vocal disguise and a spate of pseudo-legal patter (including a punning reference to these 'dame Ferraresi'), the contract is prepared and signed.

This is the signal for a burst of military music from outside, which is immediately recognised by the female signatories as the march to which Ferrando and Guglielmo went off to the wars. Their suspicion turns to consternation when Alfonso confirms that Ferrando and Guglielmo are on their way up to the house at that very moment. The Albanians are bundled out, the sisters try to compose themselves, and their military lovers make an entrance to music which refers back unmistakably to the early part of Act I. Despina is discovered in an ante-room, Alfonso conveniently lets the marriage contracts fall where the young men cannot fail to see them, and they are told that proof of the inconstancy can be found in the next-door room. In a moment they re-appear, bringing with them bits of the Albanian costumes, and moreover singing snatches of the music that helped to bring the wooing to its successful conclusion. Here is a curious anomaly, which I have never yet seen explained. Guglielmo quotes from 'Il core vi dono' and he and Ferrando sing the music associated with Despina's mesmerism in the finale to Act I; but before either of these, Ferrando has quoted something which he in fact never sings at any moment during the opera. Was one of Ferrando's arias changed at rehearsal and did the second thoughts never get as far as this finale, or is there some deeper explanation?

Everything is forgiven, the four lovers are reunited – whether in the original or Albanian combination we are not told – and the six characters sing a valedictory in praise of him who is able to take the rough with the smooth and who can fall back on reason however the world treats him.

Così fan tutte is a comedy but, like every comedy of genius, it comments profoundly and movingly and above all naturally on human life and manners during the course of its action.

H.

LA CLEMENZA DI TITO

The Clemency of Titus

Opera in two acts, text by Mazzolà, adapted from Metastasio. First performed at the National Theatre, Prague, 6 September 1791. First performed in London, King's Theatre, 1806; revived by the City Opera Club, London, 1949; at the Salzburg Festival, 1949, under Josef Krips, with Hilde Zadek, Wilma Lipp, Marta Rohs, Julius Patzak, Richard Holm (in an arrangement by Bernhard Paumgartner, which included much music from other sources, notably Idomeneo). First performances in English, Falmouth, 1930, London, 1931. U.S. première, N.B.C. radio, 1940; first stage performance, Tanglewood, 1952. La Scala, Milan, 1966; Covent Garden, 1974, with Janet Baker as Vitellia, Yvonne Minton as Sextus, Eric Tappy as Titus, conductor Colin Davis.

Tito (Titus), Roman Emperor Tenor
 Vitellia, daughter of the Emperor Vitellius Soprano
 Sesto (Sextus), young Roman patrician Contralto
 Annio (Annius), young Roman patrician Mezzo-Soprano¹
 Servilia, sister of Sextus Soprano
 Publio (Publius), Captain of the Praetorian Guard Bass

Place: Rome

Time: 79–81 A.D.

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

All his life, Mozart had a hankering for opera seria; his attempts began with Mitridate (1770), reached their height in Idomeneo (1781) and culminated in La Clemenza di Tito (1791). Even though opera seria was already in 1781 an out-of-date form, it was Mozart, not Gluck, who was in Idomeneo to say the final word on the subject. La Clemenza di Tito is a rather different matter. Mazzolà's revised version of Metastasio's libretto, though dramatically an update on its model, may not, with its conventional glorification of benevolent despotism, have been particularly congenial material for Mozart. The opera was commissioned to celebrate the coronation in Prague in 1791 of the Emperor Leopold II as King of Bohemia. Mozart had not even finished The Magic Flute and was engaged on the Requiem, yet Tito was written and performed within eighteen days of receipt of the commission, during part of which period the composer was travelling from Vienna to Prague. Small wonder that Mozart entrusted the composition of the secco recitatives to his pupil Süssmayer! Three weeks after the première, The Magic Flute was brought out in Vienna; nine weeks later still, Mozart was dead. It only remains to add that the work seems to have failed at its first performance, but within a month had turned into a considerable success. It was performed in most German-speaking theatres (in German of course) before the end of the first decade of the nineteenth century, and was actually the first of Mozart's operas to be heard in London, in 1806, when it was given in Italian for Mrs Billington's benefit.

The story is dominated by two considerations: the determination of Vitellia, the daughter of the deposed Emperor, herself in love with Tito, to have revenge on him when he seems disposed to marry another; and the inclination of Tito to show clemency no matter what the provocation.

Act I. Vitellia knows of Tito's plan to marry Berenice, daughter of Agrippa I of Judaea, and she urges Sesto, who is madly in love with her, to fall in with her plans and lead a conspiracy against Tito. No sooner has he agreed than she hears that Berenice has been sent home and that Tito now plans to marry a Roman. Annio asks his friend Sesto to intercede with the Emperor in the matter of his (Annio's) marriage to Servilia, Sesto's sister, but Sesto is forestalled in his plan when Tito tells him that he has chosen none other than Servilia to be Empress. Servilia herself tells the Emperor that she is in love with Annio, and he renounces her, deciding instead to take Vitellia to wife. Vitellia has no knowledge of this change of plans, and sends Sesto off to set fire to the Capitol and murder Tito, only to hear, the moment he is gone, that she is now his destined bride. Sesto succeeds in the first part of his plan, but the conspiracy against Tito's life fails when someone else, wearing his mantle, is killed in his stead. The act ends in general confusion.

Act II. It is known that Tito has escaped death, and moreover that the details of the plot have been revealed to him. Annio advises Sesto to throw himself on the mercy of the Emperor and to show renewed zeal in his cause. Vitellia in contrast is anxious to avoid any risk that her connection with the plot may be discovered, and she urges Sesto to fly the country. Publio, however, settles the matter by arriving to arrest Sesto, who is tried by the Senate and condemned to death. Tito confronts him with proof of his guilt, but when Sesto has left him, tears up the death sentence he has just signed. As Sesto and the other conspirators are about to be thrown to the wild beasts in the arena, Vitellia can bear the load of guilt no longer and confesses her share in the plot, only in her turn to be forgiven by the clement Emperor.

For years, critical opinion was agreed that the music of La Clemenza di Tito was written in a hurry at a time when Mozart was exhausted by illness and overwork, and is therefore of little value. Anyone hearing it again (or maybe for the first time) will find it hard to agree that it is uninspired, although certainly written against time and in an outmoded form. There is almost no dramatic impetus behind the plot of the opera, and few of the arias have powerful situations behind them. But plot was never the strong point of opera seria, which aimed rather at providing a dignified and apt frame for the noble music and virtuoso singing which the aristocracy wanted to hear. Mozart and Mazzolà have between them upset some of the static nature of Metastasio's original libretto but even so they have not succeeded in altering the essentially conventional nature of the entertainment; on the other hand, Mozart has provided a very superior example of the sort of music which went with these eighteenth-century occasions – that he did not write another Don Giovanni is logical. He was being asked to write something entirely different.

¹ In some modern versions has been sung by a tenor.

Of the twenty-six numbers in the score, only eleven are in fact arias – which shows how much alteration was made in Metastasio's original, where there was provision for no ensembles of any sort or kind. They range from a simple arietta such as that for Servilia ('S'altro che lagrime') to the great show-pieces for Sesto ('Parto, parto') and Vitellia ('Non più di fiori'). These latter have elaborate instrumental obbligati, for respectively clarinet and basset horn, and Stadler¹ went specially to Prague to play them. The vocal writing is no less elaborate, and, in this combination of virtuoso styles for voice and instrument, the arias look back to 'Martern aller Arten' (or even 'Possente spirto' from Monteverdi's Orfeo), and forward to such different pieces as Schubert's song 'Der Hirt auf dem Felsen' and the Mad Scene in Lucia. The duets for Sesto and Annio and for Servilia and Annio are particularly attractive, and there is a fine trio for Vitellia, Sesto, and Publio in the second act just before the arrest of Sesto. But the most notable section of the score is the finale to Act I, after the Capitol has been set on fire by Sesto. An agitated crowd off-stage adds to the terror of the characters on-stage, and Mozart builds up the whole ensemble antiphonally to imposing dimensions. It is genuine dramatic music, and is the only time the composer makes simultaneous use of soloists and chorus together in an extended finale.

H.

DIE ZAUBERFLÖTE

The Magic Flute

Opera in two acts, text by Emanuel Schikaneder. First performed at the Theater auf der Wieden, Vienna, 30 September 1791, with Nanetta Gottlieb (Pamina), Josefa Hofer (Queen of Night), Schack (Tamino), Gerl (Sarastro), Schikaneder (Papageno). First performances in England at the Haymarket Theatre, London, 1811, and at Covent Garden, 1833 (in German). The opera was revived in 1911 by the Cambridge University Music Society in Edward Dent's translation, with Victoria Hopper, Stuart Wilson, Clive Carey; in 1914 at Drury Lane under Sir Thomas Beecham, with Claire Dux, Margarete Siems, Kirchner, Knüpfer, Hans Bechstein; in 1938 at Covent Garden under Beecham, with Lemnitz, Berger, Tauber, Strienz, and Hüscher. It was regularly in the Old Vic and Sadler's Wells repertory from 1921. First performed at Glyndebourne in 1935, with Rautawaara, Walther Ludwig, Andresen, Domgraf-Fassbänder, conducted by Fritz Busch. Revived at Salzburg under Toscanini, 1937, with Novotna, Osvath, Roswaenge, Kipnis, Domgraf-Fassbänder; and under Furtwängler in 1949, with Seefried, Lipp, Ludwig, Greindl, and Schmitt-Walter; Covent Garden, 1962, with Carlyle, Sutherland, Richard Lewis, Kelly, Geraint Evans, conductor Klemperer.

Tamino, an Egyptian prince Tenor
 Three Ladies, in attendance on the Queen of Night Sopranos, Mezzo-Soprano
 Papageno, a bird-catcher Baritone
 The Queen of Night Soprano
 Monostatos, a Moor in the service of Sarastro Tenor Pamina, daughter of the Queen of Night Soprano
 Three Genii Sopranos, Mezzo-Soprano
 The Speaker Bass
 Sarastro, High Priest of Isis and Osiris Bass
 Two Priests Tenor, Bass
 Papagena Soprano
 Two Men in Armour Tenor, Bass
 Slaves, Priests, People, etc.

Place: Egypt

Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

Emanuel Johann Schikaneder, who wrote the libretto with the aid of a chorister named Gieseke, was a friend of Mozart and a member of the same Masonic Lodge. He was also the manager of a theatrical company and a successful actor,² and had persuaded Mozart to compose the music to a puppet show for him. He had selected the story of 'Lulu' by ¹ Anton Stadler, virtuoso clarinet player, for whom Mozart's Quintet was also written.

² According to Einstein, in his youth one of the first German Hamlets.

Liebeskind, which had appeared in a volume of Oriental tales brought out by Wieland under the title of Dschinnistan. In the original tale a wicked sorcerer has stolen the daughter of the Queen of Night, who is restored by a Prince by means of magic. While Schikaneder was busy on his libretto, a fairy story by Perinet, music by Wenzel Müller, and treating of the same subject, was given at another Viennese theatre. Its great success interfered with Schikaneder's original plan.

At that time freemasonry was a much discussed subject. It had been interdicted by Maria Theresa and armed forces were employed to break up the lodges. As a practical man Schikaneder saw his chance to exploit the forbidden rites on the stage. Out of the wicked sorcerer he made Sarastro, the sage priest of Isis. The ordeals of Tamino and Pamina became copies of the ceremonials of freemasonry. He also laid the scene of the opera in Egypt, where freemasonry believes its rites to have originated. In addition to all this Mozart's beautiful music ennobled the libretto and lent to the whole the force of the mysterious and sacred.

Because of the opera's relationship to freemasonry, commentators¹ have identified Tamino with the Emperor Joseph II, Pamina with the Austrian people, Sarastro with Ignaz von Born, a freemason and a scientist of great eminence; the vengeful Queen of Night was the Empress Maria Theresa, and Monostatos the clergy,² especially the Jesuits and the religious orders.

Mozart was engaged on The Magic Flute from March until July 1791, and again in September of that year. On 30 September, two months before his death, the first performance was given.

In the overture, the heavy reiterated chords represent, it has been suggested, the knocking at the door of the lodge room, especially as they are heard again in the temple scene, when the novitiate of Tamino is about to begin. The brilliance of the fugal allegro has been commented upon as well as the resemblance of its theme to that of Clementi's sonata in B flat.

Act I. The story opens with Tamino endeavouring to escape from a huge snake. He falls unconscious. Hearing his cries, three black-garbed Ladies-in-Waiting of the Queen of Night appear and kill the serpent with their spears. The opening allegro leads to an extended trio for the Ladies, in which they rejoice that they have been able to foil the serpent, and comment on the good looks of the young man they have rescued. Quite unwillingly they leave the handsome youth, who, on recovering consciousness, sees dancing towards him an odd-looking man entirely covered with feathers. It is Papageno, the Queen's bird-catcher. His song, 'Der Vogelfänger bin ich ja', is punctuated with runs on his pipe and shows us at once that he is a jovial, not to say a popular, type of comedian. He tells the astonished Tamino that this is the realm of the Queen of Night. Nor, seeing that the snake is dead, does he hesitate to boast that it was he who killed it. For this lie he is immediately punished by the three Ladies, who reappear and place a padlock on his mouth. They show Tamino the miniature of a maiden, whose beauty at once fills his heart with an ardent love, which he expresses in one of the most beautiful of Mozart's tenor arias, 'Dies Bildnis ist bezaubernd schön'. The Ladies tell him that she is a prisoner in Sarastro's hands, and he has no sooner sworn to deliver her than the Queen herself materialises from the clouds to reinforce his determination with a description of her desolation now that she has lost her daughter, and a promise that Pamina shall be his once she is free. 'O zittre nicht, mein lieber Sohn', she sings, telling him not to be afraid, and her scena develops into a display of coloratura fireworks designed primarily, we may be sure, to display the agile technique of the original Queen, Josefa Hofer, the composer's sister-in-law, but expressive also of her headstrong, passionate nature.

The Ladies return, take the padlock from Papageno's mouth and give him a set of chimes and Tamino a golden flute; by means of these magical instruments they will be able to escape the perils of their journey, on which they will be accompanied by three youths or Genii. The quintet, 'Hm, hm, hm! Der Arme kann von Strafe sagen', apart from being enchanting in itself, serves also to introduce the music associated later with the Genii, which has a curious quality of its own, which one can only ascribe to the lesser supernatural and call 'magical' (in just the sense

¹ Beginning with Moritz Zille, 1866.

² And he was portrayed accordingly in Michael Geliot's ingenious production for the Welsh National Opera in 1971.

Die Zauberflöte (The Magic Flute). Wash-coloured engraving by Karl Friedrich Schinkel for the 1816 Berlin production.

Tippett used the term in The Midsummer Marriage).

The scene changes, and a richly furnished apartment in Sarastro's palace is disclosed. A brutal Moor, Monostatos, is pursuing Pamina with unwelcome attentions. Even in this duet, whose basis is surely in comedy, something of the depth which is to be Pamina's can be discerned; compare her feminine warmth with the lack of that quality in the Queen and the three Ladies. The appearance of Papageno puts Monostatos to flight. The Bird-Catcher recognises Pamina as the daughter of the Queen of Night and assures her that she will soon be rescued, and, what is more, by someone who has fallen in love with her without even seeing her – not the sort of thing, he laments, that ever seems to happen to him. Pamina consoles him in an exquisitely simple E flat tune and assures him that love will yet be his: 'Bei Männern, welche Liebe fühlen, fehlt auch ein gutes Herze nicht'.

The finale takes place in a grove on three sides of which stand three Temples, dedicated to Wisdom, Reason, and Nature. Thither the three Genii lead Tamino, and leave him with the advice that he 'be silent, patient, persevering'. In a recitative which admirably expresses the dawning of understanding in his mind, Tamino decides to enter the Temples, but at the first two he is refused admittance, and from the third emerges a priest who informs him that Sarastro is no tyrant, no wicked sorcerer as the Queen had warned him, but a man of wisdom and of noble character. The solemn atmosphere of their dialogue – an extraordinary example of a musical argument reinforcing words with logic – serves to awaken still further Tamino's desire for knowledge and his recitative 'O ew'ge Nacht' takes the form of question and answer, the answer being supplied by a hidden and encouraging chorus. He takes his flute and sings to its accompaniment: 'Wie stark is nicht dein Zauberton'. Animals come out from their lairs and lie at his feet, but before the end of the aria he hears Papageno's pan-pipe and at its end he rushes off to find him. Papageno comes on from the opposite side of the stage leading Pamina whom he intends to unite with Tamino. Their duet 'Schnelle Füße, rascher Mut' is punctuated with calls on the pipes and answers from the flute but becomes a trio when they are overtaken by Monostatos, who sends for chains with which to complete their capture.

Disaster seems near, but Papageno remembers that he has a last remedy and sets the Moor and his slaves dancing by playing on his magic chimes. He and Pamina rejoice at their escape, but are interrupted by a flourish of trumpets and the sound of a chorus of praise to Sarastro. Papageno wonders what they are going to say to him. 'Die Wahrheit!' (The truth), proudly answers Pamina, and the phrase serves to end the comedy of the escape and to initiate the solemnity of Sarastro's procession. She kneels at Sarastro's feet and explains that she was trying to escape the unwelcome attentions of the Moor. Sarastro comforts her and assures her that he understands her predicament and that the gods aim to provide a remedy. Monostatos drags Tamino in, and in phrases whose origin is surely in Mozart's 'Turkish' style (see Entführung), denounces him to Sarastro, but, instead of the reward he expects, he is sentenced to a sound flogging. Woven into the structure of this section of the finale is the rapturous moment of the first meeting of Pamina and Tamino. By command of Sarastro, the two of them are brought into the Temple of Ordeal, where they must prove that they are worthy of the higher happiness.

Act II. A grove of palms outside the Temple. A solemn andante sets the scene. Sarastro informs the Priests of the plans which he has laid. The gods have decided that Pamina shall become the wife of the noble youth Tamino. Tamino, however, must prove that he is worthy of admission to the Temple. Therefore, Sarastro has taken under his protection Pamina, daughter of the Queen of Night. The couple must go through severe ordeals in order to be worthy of entering the Temple of Light. In between his pronouncements the Priests blow their trumpets, repeating the chords which were heard in the overture. Sarastro prays to Isis and Osiris that strength may be granted to the two aspirants after the goal of wisdom: 'O Isis und Osiris'. This solemn prayer is of so noble a nature that it was once described as the only music which could without fear of blasphemy be put into the mouth of God.

The Porch of the Temple. The ordeals of Tamino and Papageno are about to begin. They are warned by the Priests that they may perish in their search for the Truth, and then enjoined to silence as the first step in their probation. Two Priests warn them in a duet of what will happen if they fail to keep their vow of silence in the face of women's wiles ('Bewahret euch vor Weibertücken'), but no sooner are they left alone and in darkness than they are confronted by the three Ladies of the Queen of Night. In the quintet which follows, the Ladies try to persuade them to abandon their quest, but Tamino, and even, with some prompting, Papageno, maintain a rigid silence in the face of the questioning women. The Priests reappear and congratulate them on having passed their first test.

The scene changes to a garden. Pamina is discovered lying asleep. Towards her steals the Moor, and indulges in what Einstein describes as a 'grotesque, phallic dance' and an aria which is not far behind in those qualities: 'Alles fühlt der Liebe Freuden'. The accompaniment to the aria is 'to be sung and played very softly, as if the music was a very long way off' – so runs Mozart's own direction. Monostatos comes up to Pamina but a cry of 'Zurück' (back) causes him to start back: it is the Queen of Night. She flings her daughter a dagger with the command that she take it and kill Sarastro. In 'Der Hölle Rache kocht in meinem Herzen' one can feel the fires of vengeful fury boiling in the music, with its passionate staccato coloratura, its four top Fs, and its headlong impetus. Monostatos returns and, threatening that he will reveal the plot (to which Pamina has never agreed to be a party), demands her love as the price of his silence. Sarastro enters just in time to hurl Monostatos from the defenceless Pamina, but the Moor departs to try his luck with the mother. Pamina pleads for her mother, but Sarastro assures her that vengeance is not in his thoughts: 'In diesen heil'gen Hallen kennt man die Rache nicht'. Again, the nobility of the musical expression equals, perhaps even surpasses, that of 'O Isis und Osiris'.

Enjoined once more to keep silent, Tamino and Papageno are again left by the attendant Priests. Papageno still chatters to himself, and soon enters into a long conversation with an old crone who introduces herself to him as his yet unknown sweetheart, Papagena. A clap of thunder and she departs, to be replaced by the three Genii who appear bringing with them the flute and magic bells, carrying a table spread with food and drink, and singing in strains similar to those we heard at their first entrance. To the two aspirants comes Pamina, unaware of their vow of silence, but overjoyed to have found Tamino at last. But her delight is short-lived and she suspends belief in human constancy when she can get no answer from her beloved. 'Ach, ich fühl's, es ist verschwunden' run the words of her G minor aria; here that mixture of maturity and innocence which she has consistently shown reaches its highest level of expression. Nowhere else in the repertory of the lyric soprano is the grief which passes all bounds given musical expression of such poignant simplicity.

The scene changes to a vault. The Priests sing a solemn adagio chorus of praise to Isis and Osiris, after which Sarastro confronts Pamina with Tamino and tells them to take their last farewell of each other: 'Soll ich dich, Teurer, nicht mehr seh'n?' We return to Papageno, who is told he can have one wish but is left vaguely dissatisfied when he has drunk the wine he asks for. What is missing? A girl-friend or a wife: 'Ein Mädchen oder Weibchen wünscht Papageno sich'. At the end of the song, the old woman comes back to him and threatens him with dire penalties if he does not swear to be true to her; when he reluctantly does so, she reveals herself as a young and attractively feathered mate – but poor Papageno is warned off her by a Priest who pronounces him not yet worthy of her.

The three Genii are discovered in a garden singing of the symbolical joys of the rising sun, whose rays drive away the fears of night and herald the reign of light and love: 'Bald prangt, den Morgen zu verkünden'. Nothing more suitable for the beginning of the finale of the opera could be found than these sentiments and the disembodied agents through whom they are expressed. None of the music in the opera stands further away from the conventions of opera buffa or Singspiel or even opera seria – the forms known in Mozart's day – than the conception of this trio of voices, and the hushed beauty of their music seems to convey that sense of being 'different', dedicated even, which characterises the serious side of the music of The Magic Flute, and sets it apart from other operas.

Not knowing she is observed, Pamina contemplates suicide ('Du also bist mein Bräutigam? Durch dich vollend' ich meinen Gram'), but is restrained and comforted by the Genii in music of extraordinary tenderness.

Two Men in Armour are seen standing at each side of a doorway, and Tamino is brought in by the Priests for the last stage of his initiation. The test of fire and water is heralded by the Men in Armour, whose scene is constructed in the form of a chorale prelude, the orchestra weaving a fugato round the chorale 'Ach Gott vom Himmel sieh' darein'. Tamino proclaims his resolution, but is joined by Pamina for these final ordeals. His joy at being not only reunited with her but even allowed to speak to her freely is expressed in an ardent phrase which prepares us for the moving simplicity of their meeting and the duet which follows and becomes a quartet with the musical entrance of the two guardians of the gates.

Andante

PAMINA Wird wan - dein durch des

TAMINO Wir wan - - dein

TWO MEN IN ARMOUR Ihr wan - delt

To - - - nes, Macht froh

durch des To - nes Macht froh

durch des To - nes dü - st're Nacht

durch des To nes dü st're Nacht

froh durch des To - nes dü - st're Nacht

Pamina is Tamino's guide as, to the accompaniment of an adagio for the solo flute, they undergo successively the ordeals by fire and by water. At the end they are welcomed into the Temple by Sarastro and the Priests.

At this point occurs Papageno's great scene of mock suicide, a parallel trial in comic terms to the serious trials Tamino and Pamina are expected to surmount. 'Papagena! Papagena!' is a song of a more serious cut than the other two Schikaneder had to himself, but, after an appeal to someone in the audience to volunteer to save him and the subsequent intervention of the Genii, the scena ends happily with a jingle of bells, and is followed by an irresistible patter duet for Papageno and Papagena.

Before the Temple, Monostatos leads on the Queen and her Ladies, who are making a last bid for revenge on Sarastro. But their appearance coincides with the stage being flooded with light, and the forces of night disappear before the short chorus extolling the new initiates and the magic flute which was their faithful companion brings the opera to an end.

Nothing is so simple as to be absolutely clear-cut, and in life the serious and the comic are intermingled in a way that is frequently disconcerting but is nonetheless inevitable. Though both Figaro and Così fan tutte partake of this mixture, they are nevertheless comedies pure though by no means simple: the one a comedy of action, the other of conversation; but the remaining two out of Mozart's four greatest operas present a more complicated problem. In each of them, the close relationship of the comic and the serious is treated as a natural and inevitable thing. Don Giovanni, comic in theme and often comic in treatment, yet consistently takes a turn towards the serious considerations which arise out of the comedy; The Magic Flute, serious in its presentation of the urge towards an understanding of truth, nonetheless mingles the digressions of Papageno with the aspirations of Tamino and Pamina. A refusal to take the story of The Magic Flute seriously is to turn a blind eye to the impeccable skill of the librettist (or librettists) and also to deny to the genius of Mozart the power of discrimination and choice. To what extent the fortuitous circumstances surrounding the commission of The Magic Flute – the fact that Schikaneder was an accomplished and popular comedian and that freemasonry was a controversial topic of the day – may have influenced Mozart in an unexpected direction, is likely to be a matter for speculation as long as opera is played, but it is in the end almost irrelevant.

K., H.

MODEST PETROVICH MUSSORGSKY

(born 21 March 1839, died 28 March 1881)

BORIS GODUNOV

Opera in a prologue and four acts; text from Pushkin's play of the same name and Karamzin's History of the Russian State. There have been no fewer than four main versions of Boris, two by Mussorgsky and two by Rimsky-Korsakov, quite apart from various more recent attempts to prepare performing versions. (A), composed and orchestrated between October 1868 and December 1869, consisted of seven scenes: Courtyard of Novodevichy Monastery; Coronation; Pimen's cell; the inn; the Tsar's apartments; before the Cathedral of St Basil in Moscow (including the Simpleton); death of Boris. This version was submitted to the committee of the Imperial theatres and rejected by them. (B) Mussorgsky immediately started on a second version, accepting the advice of his friends during composition, and finished by June 1872. In February 1872 the Coronation scene was performed by Napravnik at a concert, and in April Balakirev conducted the Polonaise. This version was also rejected by the committee, but the inn scene and the two scenes of the Polish act were performed publicly in February 1873 at the Mariinsky Theatre with Petrov, the most famous Russian bass of his day, as Varlaam, Komissarzhevsky as Dimitri, Platonova as Marina; the rest of the programme consisted of Act I of Freischütz and Act II of Lohengrin. As a result of the success of this performance, the entire opera (though with a number of important cuts) was performed on 27 January/8 February 1874, with Melnikov as Boris, and Petrov, Komissarzhevsky, and Platonova in the parts they had played in 1873; Napravnik conducted, and the opera was a great success with the public, although damned by the critics. By 1882 it had dropped from the repertory. (C) In 1896 Rimsky-Korsakov revised and re-scored the work, making a large number of cuts and composing some new passages to bridge the gaps caused by the cuts. This was performed in 1896; in 1899 by the Mamontov Company, with Chaliapin in the title role; and in 1904 at the Imperial Theatres, again with Chaliapin in the title role. In 1906–8, Rimsky-Korsakov worked on another edition of the opera (D) in which he restored the cuts he had previously made, and retained his own additions to the score. It was in something like version (D) that the opera was once most often performed.

(D) First produced Paris Opéra, 1908, and la Scala, Milan, 1909, with Chaliapin; Metropolitan, New York, 1913, with Didur, conductor Toscanini; London, Drury Lane, 1913, with Chaliapin; Aldwych, London (in English), 1916. Revived, Metropolitan, 1921, with Chaliapin; 1939, with Pinza; 1943, with Kipnis; la Scala, 1922, with Vanni Marcoux, conductor Toscanini; 1930, with Chaliapin; 1941, with Pasero; 1949, with Christoff, conductor Dobrowen; Covent Garden, 1928, with Chaliapin. In 1935 Mussorgsky's (A) was performed at Sadler's Wells, London (in English), with Ronald Stear as Boris; in 1992 by Opera North with John Tomlinson; in 1948, Mussorgsky's (B) was produced at Covent Garden (in English), with Silveri in the title role; in 1949 Christoff sang the title role, in 1950 (by which time a retrograde step to Rimsky-Korsakov's (D) had been made) Weber was Boris, and in 1952

Rossi-Lemeni sang the title role; in 1958, a reversion to substantially (B) was made under Kubelik and with Christoff, but this included the St Basil scene as well as the Forest of Kromy, the Simpleton's utterances being cut from the latter. New production of (B) under Abbado in 1983, and substantially uncut, with Robert Lloyd, Randova, Michel Svetlev, Gwynne Howell, Aage Haugland. In Karajan's spectacular production at Salzburg in 1965, Ghiaurov sang the title role with Jurinac, Uzunov, Stolze, Gyuselev, Diakov.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Boris Godunov | Bass |
| Fyodor, his son | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Xenia, his daughter | Soprano |
| The Old Nurse | Contralto |
| Prince Shuisky | Tenor |
| Andrey Chelkalov, clerk of the Duma | Baritone |
| Pimen, monk and chronicler | Bass |
| The Pretender Dimitri, called Grigory | Tenor |
| Marina Mnishek, a Polish Princess | Soprano |
| Rangoni, a Jesuit | Bass |
| Varlaam } vagabonds | Bass |
| Missail } | Tenor |
| The Hostess of the Inn | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Nikitich (Michael), constable | Bass |
| The Simpleton | Tenor |
| Two Jesuits | Bass |

Place: Russia and Poland

Time: 1598–1605

Running Time: 3 hours 30 minutes

The subject brings to the stage one of the most curious episodes of the history of Russia in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Boris Godunov, the brother-in-law and chief minister of Tsar Fyodor, son of Ivan, has caused to be assassinated the young Dimitri, half-brother of the Tsar and his heir. On the death of Fyodor, Boris, who has committed his crime with the sole object of seizing power, has himself acclaimed by the people and ascends the throne. But about the same time, a young monk named Grigory escapes from his monastery, discards his habit, and goes to Poland where he passes as the dead Tsarevich Dimitri. The Polish government receives him all the more cordially as it understands the advantage such an event might afford it. Soon the pretended Dimitri, who has married the daughter of the Voyevode of Sandomir, puts himself at the head of the Polish army and marches with it against Russia. Just at this moment they hear of the death of Boris, and the false Dimitri, taking advantage of the circumstances, in turn usurps power.

As a matter of historical fact, Boris's son Fyodor was murdered and his daughter Xenia taken by Dimitri as his mistress (Dvořák's opera Dimitrij deals with these events). Dimitri's tenure of power was not long, as he was deposed and killed by Shuisky, who reigned in his stead. History has acquitted Boris of the crime of murdering Dimitri (although for the purposes of the opera it must of course be accepted as true), but Shuisky goes down as an ambitious and cruel Tsar. Marina seems to have been all that is implied in the opera; after the death of Dimitri, she became the wife of yet another pretender to the throne, whom she claimed to recognise as her lost husband. K. W.

Prologue. After a short prelude the curtain goes up to show the courtyard of the Monastery of Novodevichy, near Moscow. It is crowded with people, who are ordered by a police officer to keep up a prayer for guidance. The moment his back is turned they show clearly by their talk among themselves that they are in entire ignorance of why they are there at all. The prayer rises to a frenzy, but is interrupted by the appearance of Chelkalov, the secretary of the Duma, who informs them that Boris has not yet yielded to the petitions of the government and people, who urge him to accept the crown.

The sound of pilgrims nearing the monastery can be heard, and they distribute alms and relics.

Scene ii. The courtyard of the Kremlin in Moscow. Facing the spectators in the background is the Red Staircase leading to the Tsar's apartments; on the right and near the front, the people on their knees occupy the space between the two Cathedrals of the Assumption and the Archangel.

Bells are pealing and a procession of boyars and guards crosses the stage. Prince Shuisky cries 'Long life to thee, Tsar Boris Fyodorovich', and the people break into song in praise of the new Tsar. Boris himself appears, and, in a mood that is introspective rather than triumphant, prays for the guidance of Tsar Fyodor in his great task; may he justify the people's confidence during the reign that is just beginning. He bids the boyars come with him to pray before the tombs of Russia's departed rulers; after prayer, the people from beggar to prince shall feast as his guests. The people break out again into acclamation, and the curtain falls.

Act I. It is five years since Boris's coronation. The background is one of famine, and the people have deserted the ways of law and order. For Russia's misfortunes, for the death of his sister, Tsar Fyodor's widow, for the death of his prospective son-in-law, Boris is blamed – and this in spite of his efforts to rule wisely and well.

The scene is a cell in the monastery of Chudov, where the old monk, Pimen, is engaged on his chronicle of the history of Russia. It is late at night, but Pimen is satisfied that he has reached the end of his labours. He will be able to leave his history to be continued in the future by some monk, as anonymous and little anxious for personal glory as himself. The sound of chanting can be heard from another part of the monastery, and suddenly Grigory, Pimen's young companion in his cell, wakes up. For the third time he has dreamed that he stood on the top of a high tower from which he could see all Moscow lying at his feet. The crowd below mocked him with their laughter, and he, overcome with shame and terror, fell from the tower and awoke from his dream (the reference is to a version of Dimitri's murder in which he was thrown from a high tower).

Pimen tries to comfort him, and persuade him to resign himself to a life of contemplation. He himself, before he became a monk and was still young, had fought in the armies of Tsar Ivan the Terrible and lived a sinful life of fighting and feasting. Grigory continues to lament that his whole life has been spent inside the walls of the monastery, that he has never known action and the world. Pimen reminds him that many of Russia's most famous warriors turned to a solitary existence to end their days in peace, not least of them war-like Ivan himself, who died in this very cell. The last Tsar, Fyodor, was a man of peace, but now God has sent to Russia the fierce Tsar Boris, a regicide. At this, Grigory asks Pimen how old would have been Dimitri, brother of Fyodor, had he lived. Pimen tells him that he would have been about his own age, nearly twenty (in version (A) Mussorgsky included a passage in which Pimen described the scene after the murder of the young Tsarevich at Uglich, but this was omitted from

Varlaam continues to sing and he is obviously on the verge of falling asleep when the room is suddenly full of the guards of whom the hostess has just been complaining that they never catch their man and serve only to annoy peaceful citizens like herself. They question Grigory, who strikes them as harmless enough, then turn their attention to the vagabond monks, who seem well enough to fit the description of the man they are after. Varlaam and Missail are perfectly accustomed to such cross-questioning, and their answers have the whine of long experience

In his son's presence Boris pours out his agony of mind, the doubts and torments which his rule over Russia has brought him, the enemies who conspire against him, the remorse which fills his soul when he recalls the murdered Dimitri. This great monologue ('I have attained the highest power') rises to a climax of intensity, then falls away as Boris himself sinks under the weight of conscience. Two themes should be quoted; the first is heard again during the scene of Boris's death:

Adagio

A musical staff in bass clef with a key signature of three flats (B-flat, E-flat, A-flat) and a common time signature (C). The tempo marking "Adagio" is written above the staff. The melody consists of several measures, starting with a half note G2, followed by quarter notes A2, B-flat2, C3, D3, E-flat3, F3, and G3. There are slurs over some groups of notes, indicating phrasing.

A noise is heard outside, and the Tsar sends Fyodor to find out its cause. The boyar-in-waiting comes to ask for an audience on behalf of Prince Shuisky. Boris says he will see him. The boyar goes on to warn his master of the rumours that the disaffected nobles have been in touch with the Poles at Cracow, and that Shuisky himself is in league with them. A messenger has even arrived from Cracow ... let him be arrested, says Boris. As the boyar leaves, Fyodor returns, and explains to his father in a charming song that the fuss was about a parrot which escaped and flew at the maids in its panic. Boris is pleased with the way his son tells the story.

Shuisky comes in and is greeted with a storm of abuse from Boris, who accuses him of double-dealing, hypocrisy and treason. Shuisky brushes the accusations aside, but tacitly admits his correspondence with rebels. He has come, he says, to bring Boris grave news; a pretender has arisen in Poland, and has been publicly acknowledged by the King of Poland, and privately by the Pope. After assuring the Tsar that his throne is inviolate and protected by the love his people bear him, he adds that he is in duty bound to warn him that it is possible that the Russian people themselves might be attracted to the pretender's cause if he were to cross the border claiming to be the lost Tsarevich.

At mention of Dimitri's name the Tsar dismisses his son (illogically, Ernest Newman once rightly claimed, since he has already in his presence mentioned the death of his rival for the throne), and is alone with Shuisky. He orders him to confirm or deny that Dimitri's was the body which was buried at Uglich; does he now know the story that the dead can walk again? Shuisky makes as if to soothe his fears. The boy was in truth Dimitri, and he himself watched for five days while the bodies of the prince and the men killed by the crowd as his murderers lay on the cathedral steps. The others began to putrefy, but Dimitri's body alone was as fresh as when it was killed, in spite of the blood-red circle round his neck. On Dimitri's face, an angelic smile was seen.

Boris can bear the story no more, and signs to Shuisky to leave him. Shuisky looks back as he goes out and sees Boris sink exhausted into a chair. He feels that he is suffocating, as much with terror and remorse as from lack of air. A chiming clock (it is known that they were introduced into Russia in Boris's time) begins to strike. The figures begin to move, and Boris takes them for an apparition of the murdered child. His hysteria verges on madness, and he sinks sobbing to the floor as he prays to God for forgiveness. The sinister power of the music is extraordinary, and Ernest Newman has called it 'one of the most tremendous scenes in all opera'.

Act III. The Polish act. Scene i: the apartments of Marina Mnishek, daughter of the Voyevode of Sandomir. The girls amuse her with their songs, and she in turn sings of her ambition; she is not interested in love songs but in tales of heroic deeds. She dismisses her attendants and sings an air alla mazurka, in which she gives further vent to her ambitious plans particularly as they concern the pretender Dimitri, through whom she hopes to ascend the throne of Russia.

Her reveries are interrupted by the sudden appearance of Rangoni, a Jesuit, introduced into the story by Mussorgsky. He exhorts her to remember her duty to her faith when she becomes paramount ruler in Moscow; her aim must be to convert the heretic Russians to the true religion. Marina's angry objections are silenced when he protests that he is heaven's messenger and so the keeper of her soul.

The second scene is laid by a fountain in the garden of Mnishek at Sandomir; it takes place by moonlight. Dimitri has been given a rendezvous by Marina and as he waits for her, he sings ardently of his love. What has been described as an 'oily, snake-like motif' in the shape of a chromatic scale announces that Rangoni has sidled into view. He tells Dimitri (as Grigory is now known by all) that Marina loves him passionately, in spite of the insults she has had to bear on his account. He will lead Dimitri to his beloved, and in return asks for nothing more than that he shall be allowed to follow the Tsarevich and to watch over his spiritual welfare wherever he goes. Rangoni bids him hide as Mnishek's guests are coming out of the house.

A polonaise is danced, during which the nobles pay court to Marina and plan their march on Moscow. Dimitri watches the scene with jealous eyes, and it stings him to a resolution he has not known before (this to a more heroic version of the Dimitri theme). When Marina comes out into the garden, she finds him full of tender phrases and protestations, and it takes all her haughtiness and pride to sting him once again into a determined frame of mind, so that he reacts to her insults with a declaration of his intention immediately to lead an army on Moscow. Marina has got from him what she wanted, and she can afford in the famous love duet to fawn on him. Poor Dimitri was not hard to catch, and he takes Marina in his arms as he protests his love for her. At the moment of their embrace, Rangoni can be seen looking from his hiding-place, while the orchestra runs down his chromatic scale to show the triumph is neither Marina's nor Dimitri's, but his and his Church's. (Apart from the Polonaise and the duet, much of this act is often omitted in performance.)

Act IV. Mussorgsky, advised it is said by his friends, in version (B) placed the scene of Boris's death before the so-called revolutionary scene, thus implicitly making the Russian people the real protagonists of his drama. But it is more accurate to refer to (B) as Mussorgsky's latest work on the score, and to think of it as final and testamentary is perhaps an exaggeration. In (C) and (D), Rimsky-Korsakov reversed this order of things, and when his versions have been performed, the death of Boris finishes the opera and is preceded by the revolutionary scene.

In Mussorgsky's latest version then, the first scene of Act IV is set in the Granovitaya Palace in the Kremlin, where a session of the Duma has been summoned to discuss the measures necessary to repel the invasion which is threatened. Their deliberations are interrupted by the arrival of Prince Shuisky, just as they were beginning to complain that his absence deprives them of invaluable counsel. Straight away he begins to tell them of the curious sight he saw the previous day, when leaving the Tsar's apartments. Boris was muttering to himself, and seemed to be trying to ward off some spectre, crying, as he did so, 'Away, away'.

No sooner has he uttered the word than Boris's own voice is heard outside, and the same word is on his lips. He staggers into the chamber and seems to see none of the boyars who watch him in frightened silence. Shuisky brings him to his senses, and he takes his seat on the throne, and prepares to listen to the counsel of his boyars. But Shuisky begs to be allowed to speak, and says that a holy man of great age is waiting outside and desires to speak to the Tsar. Boris thinks this may calm his overheated brain and orders that he be admitted.

It is Pimen, and he tells a strange story. A shepherd, blind since birth, was told in a dream to go to the tomb of the Tsarevich Dimitri at Uglich and there to pray beside his tomb. He did so, and immediately his sight was restored. Boris is overcome with horror at this mention of Dimitri, and, calling for light, falls into the arms of the boyars. He understands that he is dying, and sends for his son and for the skhima (it was customary for the Tsar to be received into the Church as a monk before he died).

When Fyodor arrives, Boris orders that they be left alone. He bids farewell to his son, and tells him that he is lawful heir to the throne of Russia. Let him beware of the nobles and their plots, and let him care with his life for the Russian people and for his sister Xenia, who will be under his protection. He feels the hand of death upon him, and prays to God that his children may be blessed. The sound of the passing bell can be heard, and then, softly from behind the scenes, the chant of monks praying for the repose of the Tsar's soul. The boyars return to the chamber, and, with a last cry of 'While I have breath I still am Tsar', Boris falls dying in their midst.

Perhaps the opera owed its original popularity in the early years of the twentieth century as much to Chaliapin's performance of the title role as to anything else, and in particular to his singing and acting of this death scene. But its power is such and its effect so moving that it would be wrong to think that only a Chaliapin can do it justice.

Scene ii.¹ A clearing in the forest of Kromy. Dimitri has marched into Russia at the head of his troops, and the country is in a chaotic state of famine and pillage. It is hard to imagine better expression of the disorder and horror, which are the natural consequences of war, than in Mussorgsky's music for this scene. During its course, the mob baits a landlord who has been a supporter of Boris and whom they have captured. Children mock a Simpleton, who sings a pathetic song. They steal the few pence he has managed to collect. Varlaam and Missail chant the praises of Dimitri, and, when two Jesuits appear on the scene, denounce them to the crowd, which promptly prepares to string them up on an improvised gallows.

¹ The scene in the forest of Kromy replaces one, which would come at the beginning of Act IV, set in Moscow, outside the Cathedral of St Basil. After two years of famine, the people are starving. The crowd does not believe that Dimitri is dead and wonders whether the Tsar's anxiety over Grigory and his claim to be the Tsarevich suggests he is of the same mind. Some ragamuffins steal a kopek from the Simpleton (a half-crazy man, mocked and yet traditionally sustained by Russians), who turns to Boris as he leaves the cathedral and begs the Tsar in retribution to kill them as he killed Dimitri. The Tsar is unnerved by the encounter but stops Shuisky from punishing him and asks the Simpleton instead to pray for him. Even that provides him with no comfort: 'No one can pray for Tsar Herod'. The scene is so effective that many modern productions have included it as well as the scene at Kromy which was intended to replace it, but this not only lengthens the evening but provides an element of solecism by having the Simpleton appear twice, chronologically near but geographically distant.

A procession passes across the scene, heralding the approach of Dimitri himself, followed by his troops. He releases the boyar and the Jesuits, and bids the people follow him to Moscow. Then, at the head of his troops and supporters, he leaves the stage. It is empty except for the Simpleton who has taken no part in welcoming the new Tsar. Seated on his stone, he bewails the fate of Russia: 'Woe and sorrow always, lament, Russian folk, poor hungry folk'.

Controversy over whether to use Rimsky-Korsakov's edition (D) or to return to Mussorgsky's version (B) – the concise, powerful but necessarily limited version (A) was heard in England at Sadler's Wells before the war and by Opera North in the 1990s – was for years unresolved. Though most authorities were agreed that the strength of the original's stark scoring is considerably dissipated by Rimsky-Korsakov's bowdlerisation, managements and even conductors were disposed not to drop (D), partly because singers already knew it and were disinclined to re-learn their parts, but partly because (B) is awkwardly scored and presents difficulties of balance soluble only with almost Festival conditions of rehearsal. Gradually, with repeated performance – as with the Bruckner symphonies – (B), even (A), have become generally accepted, and there may come a time when the colour and variety of Rimsky-Korsakov's more conventional scoring and lay-out will in its turn suggest revival!

What has been accepted, wherever the work has been performed in virtually whatever version, is the extraordinary power of characterisation which Mussorgsky's music possesses. Boris himself is a towering creation of demonic power, and to sing the role is the summit of ambition of every bass or bass-baritone with Slav tendencies in his make-up. No less remarkable is the way in which the crowd stands out as one of the main influences in the opera. I have never been convinced that it is projected with even greater force than the figure of Boris himself (as some maintain), but the understanding quality of the music Mussorgsky has written for it is extraordinary.

H.

KHOVANSCHINA

The Khovansky Rising

Opera in five acts, text by the composer and V.V. Stasov. Première 21 February 1886, at St Petersburg. Completed and orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakov. Official première St Petersburg, 7 November 1911, with Zbrueva, Lobinsky, Sharonoff, Chaliapin, conductor Coates; Paris, 1913, and London, Drury Lane, 1913, with Petrenko, Damaev, Zaporozhetz, Chaliapin, conductor Cooper; Drury Lane, 1917 (in English); Covent Garden, 1919, with Thornton, Millar, Richardson, Allin, conductor Pitt; la Scala, Milan, 1926, with Bertana, Dolci, Sdanowsky, Journet; Colón, Buenos Aires, 1933, with Stignani, Ziliani, Morelli, Vaghi; Florence Festival, 1948, with Pini, Parmeggiani, Inghilleri, Christoff, conductor Gui; la Scala, Milan, 1949, with Barbieri, Francesco Albanese, Inghilleri, Christoff, Rossi-Lemeni, conductor Dobrowen; Metropolitan, New York, 1950, with Stevens, Sullivan, Tibbett, Hines, conductor Cooper; Edinburgh Festival, 1962, by Belgrade Company with Bugarinović, Čangalović; Covent Garden, London, 1963, in Shostakovich's version, with Monica Sinclair, Craig, David Ward, Rouleau, conductor Silvestri; and 1972 in Russian in perhaps the first uncut performance anywhere, with Yvonne Minton, Robert Tear, Donald McIntyre, David Ward, Martti Talvela, conductor Edward Downes. English National Opera, 1994, with Anne-Marie Owens, Willard White, Gwynne Howell, conductor Sian Edwards, producer Francesca Zambello.

Prince Ivan Khovansky, leader of the Streltsy

Musketeers Bass

Prince Andrei Khovansky, his son Tenor

Prince Vassily Golitsin Tenor

The Boyar Shaklovity Baritone

Dosifey, leader of the Old Believers Bass

Marfa, an Old Believer Mezzo-Soprano

A Scrivener Tenor

Emma, a girl from the German quarter Soprano

Varsonofiev, attendant upon Golitsin Baritone

Susanna, an Old Believer Soprano

A Lutheran Pastor Baritone

First and Second } Bases

Kuzka } musketeers (Streltsy) Tenor

Streshniev } Tenor

Musketeers, Old Believers, Maids-in-Waiting and Persian Slaves in the Suite of Prince Ivan Khovansky, Bodyguards of Peter the Great (Petrovtsy-Poteshny), Populace

Place: In and Near Moscow; Khovansky's Estate

Time: 1682–9

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Mussorgsky's aim was to picture the struggle between the old and the new in Russian life at the time of the assumption of power by Peter the Great. On the one hand are the reactionary Princes Khovansky, who, with their Streltsy followers, aim to maintain the feudal status quo; on the other, the Westernised Prince Golitsin, established as the favourite and counsellor of the Regent, Tsarevna Sofia, and pledged to reform. On the outer edge of the political spectrum are the Old Believers under Dosifey, who refused to accept reforms imposed as far back as 1654 and who hanker after a return to an old-style Russia founded on religious belief. In Mussorgsky's time, no Romanov was by law allowed to be portrayed on stage but the figure of the young Tsar, known to posterity as Peter the Great, looms over the action and in the course of the opera smashes the opposition. Khovanshchina, in contrast to Boris, suffers from the lack of a dominating central figure and the legal veto robs the opera of a potential protagonist, or at least a deus ex machina.

Mussorgsky, although he began the opera as early as 1872, did not live to finish it himself, the necessary work of scoring and piecing together being done by Rimsky-Korsakov, who also effected a number of changes in his 1883 edition. A more faithful edition by Shostakovich appeared in 1959.

Act I. There is a beautiful prelude beginning andante tranquillo. The Red Square in Moscow at sunrise. Kuzka, a musketeer,¹ lies half asleep on guard. A passing patrol sees him and from their conversation it appears that the Streltsy were busy during the night 'making short work' of their opponents in the city. The Scrivener (public letter writer) comes to his place in the square and is soon engaged by the Boyar Shaklovity who dictates a letter to the Tsar and his council warning them of the plots of Prince Khovansky and his son, who, aided by the Old Believers, would become Tsar. The letter must be anonymous and the Scrivener must forget that he wrote it. A mob arrives and forces the Scrivener to read them the proclamation the Streltsy have stuck on the pillar in the middle of the square. The chorus splendidly announces the arrival of Prince Khovansky and causes the Scrivener to quit his place in haste. The Prince arrives and addresses the people, telling them that treason is rife in Russia and that he is determined to crush the enemies of the Tsars. The people end with an invocation of the 'White Swan'.

As soon as the procession has departed with the crowd, Emma enters pursued by the Prince's son, Andrei Khovansky, who attempts to kiss her in spite of her resistance. Emma's alarm is allayed by the arrival of Marfa, whom Andrei Khovansky has loved and deserted. Marfa upbraids Andrei and bids him repent. The angry youth answers by attacking her with a dagger, but Marfa successfully parries the blow. The arrival of Andrei's father and his Streltsy puts an end to the quarrel. The old Prince likes Emma's looks and orders his guards to take charge of her. His son would rather kill the girl than see her in the hands of the Streltsy, and would do so but for Dosifey, who arrives in time to arrest Andrei's blow. The chief of the Old Believers restores peace. Marfa takes Emma into her care and departs with her. Prince Khovansky and his Streltsy return to the Kremlin, while Dosifey and the Old Believers fall to prayer.

Act II. An apartment in the house of Prince Golitsin, councillor and one-time lover of the Tsarevna. The Prince is discovered reading a love-letter from the Tsarevna. His uneasy conscience tells him, however, not to trust to the favour of the ruler. Varsonofiev announces a Lutheran Pastor who complains of the ill-treatment of Emma by the Khovanskys, a private quarrel in which Golitsin says he cannot intervene. He has invited Marfa to his house to cast his horoscope. A bowl of water is brought, and gazing into it, Marfa in her so-called 'Divination', a celebrated and impressive passage, tells of the disgrace and poverty that will be Prince Golitsin's portion in the time that is coming. He dismisses her angrily and gives orders that she must be seized and secretly drowned. Alone he broods on his past services to Russia. His musing is interrupted by the arrival of Old Prince Khovansky, who has come to complain of Golitsin's interference in his capacity as adviser to the Tsarevna, and of a slight put upon himself. Angry words pass between them until Dosifey appears and advises that differences be reconciled and a return made to government based on the ancient books and customs (Dosifey, he tells Golitsin and Khovansky, was born a noble but in youth joined the Old Believers and renounced his title). The song of the Old Believers heard in the distance angers Golitsin, while Khovansky sees in them the saviours of Russia. Marfa rushes in suddenly to ask Golitsin's protection against his servant who attempted to drown her. He was on the point of doing so but the attempt was foiled by the arrival of the Petrovtsy, the bodyguard of Peter the Great. The presence of the Tsar's troops in Moscow, unsuspected hitherto, alarms the Princes. The Boyar Shaklovity comes to tell them that the Khovanskys have been denounced to Tsar Peter as traitors.

¹ Or Streltsy, a band of ill-disciplined troops, who had originally put the Empress Sofia on the throne, later led by Prince Ivan Khovansky. Many of them were 'Old Believers'.

Khovanshchina (English National Opera, 1994, director Francesca Zambello, designer Alison Chitty).
The final scene.

Act III. The Streltsy quarter. Marfa sits on a mound near the home of Prince Andrei Khovansky and, to a beautiful tune, sings of her past love. She is overheard by Susanna who accuses her of irredeemable sin. Dosifey appears and comforts Marfa. As they retire, Shaklovity comes in and in an aria, whose mood is one of prophetic dedication, expresses the hope that Russia may be freed from a government which oppresses her. The chorus of the Streltsy approaches and Shaklovity conceals himself. They arrive singing a drinking song and urging one another to repay theft or gossip of neighbours by ravage and destruction. Their womenfolk now enter and revile them. The uproar is stilled by the arrival of the Scrivener. He has seen foreign mercenaries attack women and children on the outskirts of the Streltsy's own quarters. The Streltsy call in alarm to Prince Khovansky. But the Prince advises submission to the will of Tsar Peter.

Act IV, part i. The residence of Prince Ivan Khovansky, where takes place one of the tautest, most gripping episodes of the entire epic. As the Prince is listening to the singing of his serving girls, Varsonofiev comes from Prince Golitsin to warn him of the dangers which threaten him. Khovansky ignores the warning and orders his Persian slaves to be brought to him to dance. As the dancing ends the Boyar Shaklovity enters to invite Khovansky to the Tsarevna's council. Khovansky at first refuses to go but later appears ready to accompany him. As he leaves the room he is stabbed in the back by Shaklovity.

Part ii. The square in front of the Church of St Basil in Moscow. To the sound of impressively solemn music (in concerts, often known as 'Entr'acte, Act IV'), the people watch the departure of Prince Golitsin in a carriage guarded by troopers. He has been condemned to exile. Dosifey enters lamenting the fall of the two great nobles, Khovansky and Golitsin. After a short dialogue with Marfa he leaves her alone to face Prince Andrei Khovansky, who angrily demands news of Emma. Emma, answers Marfa, is now safe and perhaps wedded to the man she loved, from whom she had been separated by Andrei. He threatens Marfa with the death of a sorceress at the hands of the Streltsy. Marfa defies him and Andrei calls the Streltsy. They come, but not in answer to his call – a mournful procession, carrying blocks on which their heads soon must fall. Andrei is taken to a secret refuge by Marfa. The crowd asks for the death of the Streltsy, but the herald of the Tsar's guards comes to announce that they have been pardoned. (As a matter of historical fact, the Streltsy were not pardoned but tortured and put to death. Peter the Great was ruthless and once in power neutralised Sofia, his half-sister, and confined her to a convent.)

Act V. A pine wood near Moscow. The Old Believers have come to their hermitage for the last time. Their cause is lost, their sect persecuted throughout Russia. The quarrels of princes have brought about their ruin. Rather than yield to the soldiers who surround their retreat they will perish together. Dosifey sings a beautiful prayer in which he says that the world shall see how men can die for its salvation. The Old Believers, amongst whom are Marfa and Andrei, build a funeral pyre which they ascend carrying a lighted taper. As the flames rise and overpower them the troops sent to arrest them arrive and fall back horror-stricken at the sight of the smoking pyre.

F.B., H.

THE FAIR AT SOROCHINTSY

Sorochinskaya yarmarka

Opera in three acts, text by the composer, founded on an episode from Gogol's Evenings in the Village of Dikanka. Left unfinished at the time of the composer's death, without the greater part of the last act, and unorchestrated. Given at a concert at St Petersburg, 1911, semi-publicly at the Comedia Theatre, 1911. Another version at the Free Theatre, Moscow, 3 November 1913. In 1917 the opera was produced in a version by César Cui at the Musical Drama Theatre. This version replaced by yet another for which Cherepnin was responsible, Monte Carlo, 1923, with Luart, John McCormack; Buenos Aires, 1929, with Maria Kouznetzova, Davidoff, Sdanovsky, conductor Fitelberg; Metropolitan, New York, 1930, with Müller, Bourskaya, Jagel, Pinza, conductor Serafin; Fortune Theatre, London, 1934; Covent Garden, 1936, with Danieli, de Villiers, Russell, Kassen, conductor Coates; Savoy Theatre, London, 1942, with Daria Bayan, Slobodskaya, Boleslawski, Parry Jones, Arsene Kirilloff, conductor Fistoulari. There is another edition prepared from the original manuscripts by Paul Lamm, with additions by Shebalin, and orchestrated by him; first given in 1931, revised the following year. This is the performing version most widely used now; it has also been recorded.

Cherevik, an old countryman.....Bass
 Parassia, his daughter.....Soprano
 Khivria, his wife.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Gritzko, a young countryman.....Tenor
 The Priest's Son.....Tenor
 Cherevik's Crony.....Bass
 The Gipsy.....Bass

Young Men and Women, Gipsies, Merchants,
 Cossacks, Jews, etc.

Place: Sorochintsy, in Little Russia

Running Time: 2 hours

Sorochintsy Fair was written at about the same time as Khovanshchina. The story is one of Gogol's, the scene Gogol's own birthplace, in the Ukraine. Mussorgsky wrote the libretto himself, though handicapped in doing so by his scanty knowledge of Ukrainian dialect. Much of the opera was unfinished at his death, but it has had more than a little success outside Russia.

Act I. The introduction is labelled 'A Hot Day in Little Russia', and is an attempt to emulate Gogol's description of the atmosphere in which the story is to take place. The curtain rises to reveal a market scene: 'Mussorgsky constructs' (says Calvocoressi in his 'Master Musicians' volume on the composer) 'a sort of kaleidoscopic musical mosaic which conveys, as realistically as an opera chorus can hope to convey, the confused impression of a country fair'. Cherevik has brought his daughter, Parassia, to a fair for the first time, and she is excited at the bustle, and the variety of things which are for sale. An old gipsy raises his voice above the hubbub to wish everyone well, but also to warn them that the ground on which they stand is cursed by the periodic visitation of a devil, taking the form of a pig and looking, according to legend, for the sleeve (or 'red svitka') of a garment he has pawned years ago, but of which he has never been able to recover this one portion.

Parassia has found her young suitor, Gritzko, with whom she sits while the gipsy is telling his story. Cherevik suddenly notices that she is not with him, but Gritzko introduces himself, and asks for Parassia's hand in marriage. The old man can see no harm in such an idea, particularly since Gritzko is the son of an old friend of his, and he gives the couple his blessing. Cherevik disappears, but presently he and his crony reappear from the inn, happily drunk. They are not left long in peace, Khivria, Cherevik's wife, putting in an appearance, and showing little disposition to acquiesce in the notion of acquiring a son-in-law whom she has not yet even seen, much less approved of.

They leave the stage, and Gritzko laments the turn his affairs have taken. Cherepnin's and Lamm's versions have at this point a beautiful aria, but it was intended by the composer for Act III, not Act I at all, the scene in which Gritzko gives way to his sadness having been indicated in the scenario but not (as far as is known) composed. To Gritzko comes the old gipsy, offering, in return for a reduction in the price of the oxen Gritzko wishes to sell him, to convert Cherevik (and, through him, Khivria) to the idea of Gritzko's marriage with Parassia. Gritzko gladly accepts the offer and the bargain which goes with it.

The act should end with the Hopak (the best-known bit of the score), but in the Cherepnin and Lamm versions this is transferred to the end of the opera, where it makes an excellent finale. In its place the Cherepnin version has a duet for Parassia and Gritzko, which brings the act to an end.

Act II. Cherevik's house. Khivria is busy in the kitchen. Cherevik is asleep. He wakes up, and there is a short quarrel between husband and wife, during whose course Khivria enquires about the sale of the farm produce. Cherevik leaves the house, and Khivria waits anxiously for her lover, the priest's son, for whom she has prepared the delicacies he cannot resist. He eventually comes into sight, and makes a splendidly comic figure, his pious utterances contrasting nicely with his evidently un-pious intentions. These he is busy making manifest, when suddenly there is a noise outside. Khivria has only just time to hide her lover before Cherevik and his cronies return home, making a deal of noise, and scared at the idea of being where the 'red sleeve' is liable to be found.

They all drink, and, to keep their spirits up, Cherevik sings riotously for their entertainment. The unfortunate priest's son knocks over a tin can but this is accepted as the work of the 'red sleeve', and no one takes it for what it is. In the end the crony recites the story for the company. When he reaches the climax, the window blows open, and the head of a pig is seen – it is in this form that the devil is said to roam the world looking for his lost garment. General consternation. In the exclamation of horror which follows the revelation, the priest's son loses his balance, and falls into the midst of the assembly, covered by Khivria's nightdress. He is revealed, and Cherevik's friends laugh at the resolute, stiff-necked Khivria, who has given herself away so badly.

Act III. The village square: Cherevik's house visible in the background. Mussorgsky made a special and elaborated version of his Night on the Bare Mountain (1867) to act as a ballet-intermezzo between Acts II and III of Sorochintsy Fair. The dramatic situation is that Gritzko, the parobok (young peasant), is asleep in the open; to him in his dream appears the whole rigmarole of the kingdom of darkness and black magic, and dances round him. In the Lamm version, Gritzko has first extracted Cherevik's consent to marriage with his daughter.

Parassia, alone, sings sadly of her lover, but, looking into a mirror, regains her spirits and sings a charming Hopak (marked allegretto grazioso). She dances as she sings. Cherevik emerges from the house at the same moment as Gritzko appears. Cherevik loses no time in giving his consent to the marriage – the gipsy's scheme has worked perfectly – and the two young lovers celebrate their future happiness in a lively duet. The rejoicing becomes more general as the other villagers join in, and even the advent of Khivria, emitting story-book step-mother's disapproval from every pore, cannot put a damper on the jollity; Cherevik has acquired new authority from the episode of the priest's son, and will brook no contradiction. The opera ends with the exciting Hopak designed by Mussorgsky to come at the end of Act I but transferred by Cherepnin.

The Cherepnin and Lamm versions do not by any means follow Mussorgsky's sketch-plan in every particular. However, as the third act, and even the end of the second, exist in no more than fragmentary form, and as these are the versions most often heard, it seemed more practical to concentrate on them, rather than elaborate on the work in its unfinished state.

N

OTTO NICOLAI

(born 9 June 1810, died 11 May 1849)

DIE LUSTIGEN WEIBER VON WINDSOR

The Merry Wives of Windsor

Opera in three acts, text by Hermann von Mosenthal, after Shakespeare's play. First produced at the Berlin Hofoper, 9 March 1849 (shortly before the composer's death), with Zschiesche as Falstaff and the composer conducting. First produced Philadelphia, 1863; London, Her Majesty's, 1864 (in Italian), with Tietjens, Vitali, Jura, Santley; Adelphi Theatre, London, 1878 (in English); Metropolitan, New York, 1900 (in German), with Sembrich, Dippel, conducted by Emil Paur; Covent Garden, 1907 (in German), with Jenny Fischer, Minnie Nast, Max Lohfing, Franz Naval. Revived by the Carl Rosa Company, 1943, with Norman Allin.

Sir John Falstaff.....Bass
Herr Fluth (Mr Ford)Baritone
Herr Reich (Mr Page)Bass
FentonTenor
Junker Spärlich (Slender)Tenor
Dr CaiusBass
Frau Fluth (Mistress Ford)Soprano
Frau Reich (Mistress Page).....Mezzo-Soprano
Jungfer Anna Reich (Anne Page).....Soprano
First Citizen.....Tenor

Place: Windsor

Time: Reign of Henry IV

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Nicolai, who died before he was thirty-nine, had a busy life of professional music-making, and his career embraced such diverse activities as organist at the Prussian Embassy in Rome, Kapellmeister in Vienna, composer in Italy, founder and conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic, and head of the opera in that city. He composed a number of operas, of which Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor is by far the most successful, as is hardly surprising in view of the wit, neatness of construction, and light-hearted gaiety for which it is distinguished.

Act I. After an overture which is popular in the concert hall, we find ourselves in the garden between the houses of Messrs Fluth and Reich (Ford and Page, to give them their Shakespearean names), where their respective spouses are comparing notes on the love-letters they have each received that day from no less a person than Sir John Falstaff. They leave the stage to the men. Reich has promised the hand of his daughter in marriage to Spärlich, whom he prefers to her other suitors, Caius and Fenton, in spite of the impassioned pleading of the last-named; Fenton is told Anna is not for a have-not like himself.

Inside Fluth's house, his wife waits for the promised visit from Falstaff. She is furious with all men, and rehearses what she shall say to this particular specimen. She will make as if to give in to him – woman's heart is weak, she observes; he will be taken in and believe her. This is a fine coloratura aria, 'Nun eilt herbei', written on a big scale, with an elaborate recitative and much exacting passage work for the singer.

Falstaff duly arrives, his love scene is interrupted by loud knocking, he hides in the linen basket, and Fluth storms in, announcing he has caught his wife at last and bringing a crowd of witnesses to watch the proceedings. The search begins and the women laugh at the way their well-planned joke is taking shape – Falstaff is to be dumped into the river. The light touch of the duet contrasts well with Frau Fluth's scolding of Fluth for his unworthy suspicion of her. The act ends with a general ensemble.

Act II. We meet Falstaff on home ground for a change, and he leads a drinking song at the 'Gasthaus zum Hosenbande' – The Garter Inn. 'Als Büblein klein' has always been popular and for long a war-horse in the repertory of the German operatic bass. Fluth, calling himself Bach (German for 'Brook'), comes to pump Falstaff on the subject of his relations with Frau Fluth. Their comic duet is admirable, Falstaff's patter being interspersed with horrified interjections from Fluth. 'Wie freu' ich mich' each sings in turn, the one rejoicing at the prospect of his rendezvous, the other at the possibility of catching Falstaff in the act. The audience too should have the chance of rejoicing at the opportunity for the competition the music gives to the two singers, an opportunity not missed in Vienna in the early years of this century when the richly endowed Leopold Demuth and Wilhelm Hesch poured their great voices into the roles of Fluth and Falstaff; a splendid gramophone recording exists to prove the point.

The scene changes to Reich's garden, where no less than three suitors are preparing to serenade Anna. Two of them, Spärlich and Caius, make a decidedly comic effect, the other, Fenton, is distinctly romantic; in fact his 'Horch, die Lerche singt im Hain' is a deliciously pretty tune. There follows a pleasant little love duet for Anna and Fenton and a most ingenious 'quartettino' (as Nicolai calls it) for Anna and the three lovers, the comic pair overhearing what the other two are saying to each other, and handing the tune, which was first sung by Anna, backwards and forwards from one to another until all four are engaged on it. The whole of this garden scene is controlled by the lightest of hands and its delicacy is quite unusual among German comic operas of the period.

We are back in Fluth's house, as in Act I. Fluth tells his wife she will be found out this time; nothing will prevent him catching her lover. He is furious – he even examines the laundry basket which the servants happen to bring through the room at this moment – and his wife laughs at him. Caius, Spärlich, Reich knock at the door saying they are there, as Fluth instructed them. Falstaff is smuggled through dressed as an old woman and guided by Frau Reich. He pretends not to be able to hear Fluth's questions and is got rid of to general acclamation. There is another unsuccessful search, and the act ends with an ensemble.

Act III. The first scene is laid in Frau Reich's house, and there she sings her ballad of Herne the Hunter, an agreeable 6/8 tune. Later Anna delivers herself of the aria which alone makes the role worth a prima donna's while: 'Wohl denn! Gefasst ist der Entschluss'.

The last scene is laid in Windsor Forest, near what the score describes as 'die Eiche des Jägers Herne', or Herne the Hunter's Oak – an English description of Freischütz probably sounds just as odd to a German. Here the music we know so well from the overture comes into its own, and is deployed in a succession of choruses and dance movements associated with the preparation and tormenting of Falstaff by the disguised company. Falstaff himself has a trio with the wives of Fluth and Reich – he makes advances to them both; Anna and Fenton, disguised as Titania and Oberon, have a short duet between ballet movements, and finally the big tune of the overture makes its presence felt. All is resolved and the opera ends with a short trio with chorus.

H.

CARL AUGUST NIELSEN

(born 9 June 1865, died 3 October 1931)

SAUL AND DAVID

Saul og David

Opera in four acts, text by E. Christiansen. First produced at the Royal Theatre, Copenhagen, 29 November 1902, with Niels Juel Simonsen (Saul), Peter Cornelius (Jonathan), Helge Nissen (Samuel), Vilhelm Herold (David), Emilie Ulrich (Michal), conductor Nielsen. Revived Copenhagen, 1912, 1929; new production, 1934, with Holger Byrding, Tyge Tygesen, Einar Nørby, Marius Jacobsen, Else Schøtt, Ingeborg Steffensen, conductor Johan Hye-Knudsen; 1962, with Frans Andersson. Also produced Göteborg, 1928, with Flagstad as Michal; Stockholm, 1930, with Einar Larson, Jussi Björling, Brita Hertzberg, conductor Armas Järnefelt; European Broadcasting Union, 1972 (in English), with Boris Christoff, Willy Hartmann, Michael Langdon, Alexander Young, Elisabeth Söderström, conductor Horenstein.

Saul, *King of Israel*Baritone

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Jonathan, his son | Tenor |
| Michal, his daughter | Soprano |
| David, a shepherd boy | Tenor |
| Samuel, a prophet | Bass |
| Abner, Captain of the King's Guard | Bass |
| The Witch of Endor | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Abisay, a follower of David's | Tenor |
| Maidens, Priests, Warriors, People | |

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

From 1889 to the middle of June 1905, Carl Nielsen played second violin in the orchestra of the Royal Theatre in Copenhagen and both his operas, with the exception of the third act of Maskarade, were composed during this period. In 1890, on a scholarship to Germany, he went straight to Dresden where he steeped himself in the music of Wagner. He says that the subject of Saul and David 'stirred and haunted me, so that for long periods I could not free myself of it no matter where I was – even when I was sitting in the orchestra with my second violin, busy with ballets and vaudevilles.'

The composer and his librettist make Saul into a figure of tragic stature, a man with the intelligence and courage to question the accepted beliefs and superstitions of a primitive society and in contrast to the more naturally representative figure of David, who accepts the existing order and believes in it.

Act I. A short, brilliant martial prelude takes us straight into the action. In front of Saul's dwelling in Gilgal, priests and Israelites together with the King and his son Jonathan wait anxiously for the coming of Samuel, who alone may make sacrifice to the Lord, in order that their stand against the hosts of the Philistines may take place with the blessing of the Almighty. Unable to bear the strain of waiting, Saul turns impatiently on the priests, orders preparations to be completed, and himself performs the priestly office. The scene is one of great urgency, the voices of the soloists, now almost incoherent with fear, now supplicatory to the King, contrast with the choral background of prayer and preparation from priests and people.

The voice of Samuel interrupts the sacrifice to upbraid the King for his presumption, to pronounce him, in spite of his protests of repentance, an outcast in God's sight and unworthy of his kingdom. Saul's rule is over, an evil spirit will possess him, but the kingdom of Israel will flourish after he is gone. Jonathan alone tries to comfort him, but Saul's spirit is cast down and in solitude he communes with the Lord of Hosts, whom he treats now as his enemy to be defied and overcome. His fine, Iago-like monologue ends in a mood of submissiveness as Jonathan returns, bringing with him his friend, the shepherd boy David. David's singing charms the King and he bids David stay with him as his guest.

Left alone, David tells Saul's daughter Michal that he has loved her since he saw her bathing in the brook with her attendants, and the curtain falls slowly on an idyllic scene of young love.

Act II starts with a martial prelude, more formal in character than that to the first act. While David sings to King Saul, Abner forces his way past the guards to insist that the nearness of the Philistine host requires action, in spite of Jonathan's recent victory over an enemy detachment. The Philistine champion Goliath, a giant of ferocious aspect, has challenged the Israelites to nominate a man to meet him in single combat, the loser's people to become subject to the winner's. David undertakes to defeat him, refusing the King's sword and armour and relying instead on his sling and five smooth stones.

The progress of the fight is followed through the imaginations of Michal and her women, first their apprehension of bloody defeat, then the possibility of victory, until they see the reality of a messenger riding furiously across the valley – Jonathan, with the news of David's triumph over Goliath. A chorus of thanksgiving heralds the return of the Israelite warriors, David and Saul at their head, and the King joyfully gives David the hand of Michal in marriage. Rejoicing is general but when he hears the cry of 'Saul has slain his thousands and David his tens of thousands', Saul's happiness turns to bitterness, so that the act ends with the silencing of the crowd, David's effort to still the King's melancholy with his singing, Saul's hurling of the javelin at his prospective son-in-law and the latter's banishment, and David's defiance of the King.

Act III. A mournful nocturne in 12/8 introduces Saul's sleeping camp at night. Jonathan and Michal, in one of the score's most appealing lyrical passages, mourn the absence of David before they too fall asleep. Suddenly, David and his follower Abisay appear high up among the rocks above the camp. David comes down to stand over the defenceless Saul and then, as a sign that he has been there, takes the spear and the cruse of water which stand by Saul's pillow. David shouts to waken Abner and the King's Guard. Saul cannot remain hostile, faced with David's unrestrained loyalty, and takes him back to his arms. In an impressive and extended polyphonic choral ensemble, the people witness their renewed vows, but the arrival of Samuel fills Saul with new apprehension. Samuel relates his vision of God, telling him to proclaim David King of the Israelites, and solemnly anoints him before falling dead. Saul tries to reassert his sovereignty, bids his soldiers seize David and, when she defies him, Michal his daughter, only to have his authority flouted by his subjects and to be obliged to watch David and Michal walk away unharmed.

Act IV follows a rapid prelude, and two viola solos introduce the scene where Saul and Abner come to consult the Witch of Endor. She insists that if Samuel's spirit is to be conjured from the dead, they must cover their faces and not see him. When he comes it is with accompaniment of trombones and to foretell the death of Saul and his sons at the hands of the Philistines. At the end of an impressive scene, soldiers come looking for Saul to lead them against the advancing enemy.

A vigorous battle interlude leads to the last scene, which takes place on Mount Gilboa. Jonathan enters wounded and dying and supported by Abner. They see on the mountainside the wounded Saul, and Jonathan recognises David behind him and proclaims him 'blest of the Lord' before he himself dies. Saul in a splendid arioso demands that Abner kill him so that he may not fall wounded into the hands of the enemy, then cursing God he turns his sword on himself. David arrives with Michal and some Israelite survivors, and together, in music of almost Handelian cast, they mourn Saul and Jonathan and proclaim David their King, chosen of God. H.

MASKARADE

Masquerade

Opera in three acts, libretto by Vilhelm Andersen, after Ludvig Holberg's play. Première, Copenhagen, 11 November 1906, with Emilie Ulrich/Ingeborg Nørregaard-Hansen as Leonora, Ida Møller/Margrethe Lindrop as Pernille, Karl Mantzius as Jeronimus, Joanna Neiiendam as Magdelone, Hans Kierulf as Leander, Peter Jerndoff as Leonard, Helge Nissen as Henrik, Lars Knudsen as Arv, conductor Nielsen. Revived fairly frequently in Copenhagen, notably in 1918 when it was restudied, in 1936 when Edith Oldrup sang Leonora, in 1937 when Egisto Tango conducted, in 1943 when Tyge Tygesen sang Leander. Its hundredth performance took place in 1946, and in 1965 there was a new production with Ellen Winther, Else Margrete Gardelli, Willy Hartmann, Ib Hansen, Frans Andersson, conductor John Frandsen. American première, St Paul, 1972. The British première was in Leeds in 1990 by Opera North, conductor Elgar Howarth.

Jeronimus, a citizen of Copenhagen Bass
 Magdelone, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
 Leander, their son Tenor
 Henrik, Leander's servant Bass-Baritone
 Arv, Jeronimus's servant Tenor
 Mr Leonard, a citizen of Copenhagen ... Tenor-Baritone
 Leonora, his daughter Soprano
 Pernille, Leonora's maid Soprano
 A Nightwatchman Bass
 A Constable Baritone
 A Mask-Seller Baritone
 A Professor Bass
 A Flower-Seller Soprano
 Master of Ceremonies Bass-Baritone
 A Dancing Master, his Fiancée Dancers

Students, Officers, Young Girls, Maskers of both Sexes

Place: Copenhagen

Time: Spring 1723

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

In 1905 Nielsen set to work on Maskarade, an adaptation of Holberg's comedy of 1724. The influence of opéra-comique and a generally French style is apparent, says Jürgen Balzer in an essay published in connection with Nielsen's centenary in 1965, but it is hard when listening to the music not to believe that the composer must have heard – and loved – Verdi's Falstaff before setting to work on his own comedy. As it is, he is evidently more interested in the musical possibilities of situation than of character, but the result nonetheless is a work of charm and brilliance. To call it a Danish Bartered Bride would be too easy, not only because the subject is less than nationalistic but also because Nielsen is a leading composer in his own right. It is a comedy, thoroughly Danish, and very many works are on the fringe of the international repertory with far lesser claims.

Act I. After a sparkling overture, whose opening arabesque becomes the Masquerade motif, the curtain rises to show us a room in Jeronimus's house. Leander, Jeronimus's son, has been to a Masquerade¹ with his valet, Henrik, and neither finds it easy to wake up next day. Henrik is still dreaming of dancing and even motions to the orchestra to play a cotillion, but Leander in music of fine lyrical flow greets the light and recalls last night's adventure. He is in love, and they must go again to the Masquerade to meet this unknown girl! Unfortunately, there is a snag: his father long ago promised Leander's hand in marriage to Mr Leonard's daughter, whom he has never seen, and in a spirited song Henrik points out that the law deals severely with breach of promise.

Their scene, high-spirited enough to contradict the hangovers they might be expected to be fighting, is interrupted by the entrance of Magdelone, Jeronimus's wife and Leander's mother, who is obviously more than a little envious of Leander's expedition to the Masquerade. She knows of its possibilities only at second hand but plainly would like to sample them, if we are to judge from the dancing in which she now indulges. The gavotte with which she starts is pleasant enough, but there is a change from duple to triple time with a Folie d'Espagne, and the combination makes for a charming scene.

The exhibition of Magdelone's prowess is abruptly interrupted by the entrance of Jeronimus himself. He suspects there is a plan to visit the Masquerade, and packs his wife off to her room. Henrik spills the beans about Leander having fallen in love, and Jeronimus, alone, in a monologue which is for the most part reminiscent rather than impassioned, yearns for the old God-fearing days when discipline was discipline and everyone in bed by nine o'clock. Mr Leonard is announced and we find out almost immediately that his daughter is as unwilling to fall in with plans made for her as is Jeronimus's son. Together they plot to prevent a scandal. Jeronimus instructs Arv, a particularly half-witted servant, to keep watch outside the house that night and prevent anyone leaving, then sends for Leander.

When ordered to give an explanation of the previous night's disgraceful behaviour, Henrik distinguishes himself by launching, in the jauntiest of songs, not only into a defence of their position but into a piece of special pleading for the few pleasures open to a servant that is so rebellious in its character and content as to be saved only by cheerfulness from being positively revolutionary. Mr Leonard has some sympathy with the young, but Jeronimus demands that Leander make a full apology to Mr Leonard and proceeds to dictate it to him. When it comes to promising to marry Mr Leonard's daughter, Leander jibs, and the finale, a very lively male quintet, is concerned with Leander's reiterated refusal to toe the line.

Act II. The street between the brightly illuminated Playhouse and Mr Jeronimus's home. Though this act is basically concerned with getting everyone to the Masquerade and identifying their costumes, the composer injects considerable lyrical force, beginning in the nocturne prelude with a most poetic evocation of eighteenth-century Copenhagen. There are songs for the nightwatchman and for Arv, the latter of whom is unexpectedly confronted, as it would appear, with a ghost, who bids him confess his sins. Arv clears his conscience, from thefts of flour and wine to that of the cook's virginity, and it is only when the ghost starts to giggle that Arv understands it is Henrik in disguise. If all is not to be revealed, Arv must turn a blind eye when Henrik goes that night with his master to the Masquerade!

In effect, this seems to be the current destination of half the populace, among whom Arv recognises Mr Leonard as he leaves Jeronimus's house. After him come Henrik and Leander, the latter ecstatic at the prospect before him, which indeed promptly materialises in the person of Leonora (of whose true identity he is of course still in ignorance). Nielsen worked many years in the opera house and his admiration for Wagner knew no bounds, but this ecstatic meeting of lovers, even if the composer had his tongue half in cheek, suggests that he was far from despising Puccini. The bustling of Henrik and Pernille round the two lovers and their attempts to parody what is going on by no means invalidate the ecstatic lyricism of the lovers as they sing in sixths.

Interruption comes in the shape of sounds from Mr Jeronimus's house, as it becomes clear he has discovered the disappearance of Leander and Henrik. He is sure he knows where to find them, but for the Masquerade he must have a disguise and he goes with Arv to buy it. Enter Mrs Magdelone on pleasure bent, and Mr Leonard equally in search of adventure. Disguised as they are, they meet and agree to go on to the Masquerade together. It remains only for Jeronimus and Arv, got up as Bacchus and Cupid respectively, to make their own way across the street before the nightwatchman, as in Wagner, pre-empt the last word.

¹ A carnival ball open to all classes, to which all must go masked.

Act III. The great hall of the Playhouse. We are plunged into the middle of the festivities with hardly a moment of prelude, and the brilliance and fun of the Masquerade are before us musically as well as visually right from the start. Here is an end of immediate cares and responsibility, here is release. Students seize girls and dance, lovers flirt, there is a charming female trio, and Leander sings happily with his Leonora, even to the extent of exchanging names. The duet¹ of Henrik and Pernille is a deliberate send-up of what their master and mistress have been singing, but warmth is by no means excluded. Soon it is the turn of Mrs Magdelone and Mr Leonard, the former of whom proclaims her unmarried state, though she refuses to unmask. Mr Jeronimus, searching for Leander, interrupts their graceful flirtation, without of course knowing who either is.

There is some danger of a quarrel between students and soldiers, but the master of ceremonies announces the start of the evening's entertainment, and the first item is the very lively Hanedansen (Cock's dance), the best-known single number in the score. During its course, Henrik discovers that Jeronimus is here wearing a Bacchus mask, but he somehow persuades a professor who has come with a party of students to side with him and Leander, and together they make Jeronimus drunk.

The next item on the evening's bill has the dancing master and his fiancée act the story of Mars and Venus to graceful waltz music. Jeronimus is inveigled into a round dance and the students sing a song, which does not conceal the intoxicated attempts of the old man to flirt with the dancing girl.

The hour of general unmasking approaches and Nielsen perfectly captures in music the element of sadness implicit in this 'moment of truth'. The master of ceremonies (now dressed as Corporal Mors) calls on everyone present to throw their masks into a big urn placed in the middle of the floor. Mrs Magdelone and Mr Leonard recognise each other and Leonora and Leander, the chance lovers, are revealed as also the objects of the arranged marriage. Only Mr Jeronimus does not at first comprehend that a happy ending seems to be in sight for everyone concerned, but explanations are swallowed up in a final gallop, during which Henrik, Puck-like, solicits the audience's applause.

H.

¹ Labelled in the score Canzone Parodica.

O

JACQUES OFFENBACH

(born 20 June 1819, died 5 October 1880)

The son of a German cantor who had adopted the name of the town near Frankfurt where he was born, Jacques Offenbach spent most of his working life in Paris. His first comic operas, on a very small scale, were successful at the Bouffes-Parisiens in 1855, and by 1858 larger forces were licensed for the Bouffes, where Orphée aux Enfers was an immense and lasting success. Offenbach continued to write one-act operettas for Paris, interrupting his French career to write for Vienna, but in 1864 he inaugurated with La belle Hélène a collaboration with the great singer Hortense Schneider which took Paris by storm and lasted until the Franco-Prussian war of 1870 drove Offenbach temporarily from Paris. Other composers – Lecocq, Planquette, Audran – provided competition and his return to France did not bring quite the réclame of earlier years. His attempt to invade the precincts of opera with Les Contes d'Hoffmann ended with his death and the score still unfinished, but Hoffmann became his most performed work.

ORPHÉE AUX ENFERS

Orpheus in the Underworld

Operetta in four acts (originally two), text by Hector Crémieux and Halévy. Première at the Bouffes-Parisiens, 21 October 1858, with Tautin, Léonce, Tayau, Désiré. First performed New York, 1861 (in German); London, Haymarket Theatre, 1865; St James's Theatre, London, 1869, with Hortense Schneider. Revised and enlarged to four-act version, Paris, 1874. Revived Sadler's Wells, 1960, with June Bronhill; Kansas City, 1968, with Sciutti, Monica Sinclair, Driscoll, Cuénod, conductor Rescigno; English National Opera, 1985, produced by David Pountney, designed by Gerald Scarfe, the political cartoonist.

Pluton (Pluto), god of the underworld Tenor
Jupin (Jupiter), king of the gods Baritone
Orphée (Orpheus), a violinist Tenor
John Styx Baritone or Tenor
Mercure (Mercury) Tenor
Mars Bass
Morphée (Morpheus) Tenor
Eurydice, Orphée's wife Soprano
Diane (Diana) Soprano
Public Opinion¹ Mezzo-Soprano
Vénus (Venus) Soprano
Cupidon (Cupid) Soprano
Junon (Juno) Mezzo-Soprano
Minerve (Minerva) Soprano

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Offenbach's parody of the story of Orpheus originally obtained something of a succès de scandale; he was accused of blaspheming antiquity, of poking fun at the music of Gluck, and of satirising the government and prevailing social conditions. Since he was at the time in rather trying financial straits as manager of the Bouffes-Parisiens, success in whatever form it came was by no means unwelcome. History suggests that the role of John Styx was an afterthought and designed especially for the actor Bache, an excellent musician who had just left the Comédie-Française. Within eighteen months of the first night, the Emperor Napoleon III ordered a Command Performance of Orphée and congratulated Offenbach afterwards. The original Opéra-Bouffe was in two acts and designed by Offenbach's friend, the painter Gustave Doré, but in 1874, when his fortunes were again at a low ebb, he greatly expanded Orphée, adding ballets and transformation scenes and making the whole thing into a four-act operetta on a grand scale. This is what is mostly played today.

¹ In the 1960 Sadler's Wells production, Calliope, Orphée's mother.

The overture as we know it from concert performances is not by a long chalk what Offenbach designed to precede his opera, but was compiled by a certain Carl Binder for the first performance in Vienna; he made use of the overture which Offenbach wrote (an introduction, minuet, and embryonic canon) and added to it the famous violin solo and the Can-Can.

Act I. First tableau. Shepherds and shepherdesses rusticise, Public Opinion introduces the plot, Councillors process with a pomposity worthy of the Mastersingers, and Eurydice sings lightly and prettily of the extramarital love she feels in her heart, while the flutes bill and coo around the vocal line: 'La femme dont le cœur rêve, n'a pas de sommeil'. Orpheus sees her with flowers in her hand; who are they for? It appears that each has lost his or her heart to someone else, and neither intends to renounce the new-found love in favour of connubial bliss. They quarrel and it transpires that Eurydice has a morbid dislike of Orpheus as an artist, hating his fiddle-playing above everything. This is the crowning insult. Orpheus announces he will play for her his latest violin concerto (lasting one and a quarter hours, he says), and the famous violin tune starts. The duet which it initiates is charming, and it is not long before the fiddle tune influences the vocal parts.

Eurydice's lover is Pluto, who appears on earth in the guise of a shepherd and bee-keeper under the name of Aristaeus. He charms Eurydice with a Chanson Pastorale, but admits to her that love for him involves transporting her to the underworld. She says goodbye to life most attractively, and leaves a note behind for Orpheus, telling him that she is dead. This he finds, but his discreet rejoicings are broken in upon by Public Opinion, who threatens him with scandal if he does not follow his wife to Hades; the fact that he does not want to get her back means that his reclamatory action will be even more virtuous than if he did! They start off on their journey, Orpheus complaining, Public Opinion urging him on in a delightful marziale duettino.

Act II. The scene changes to Mount Olympus, where the gods are sleeping peacefully. They introduce themselves one by one, until Jupiter is woken by Diana's horn. Diana is unhappy because she could not that morning any longer find Actaeon on earth in his accustomed place. Jupiter reveals that he took it upon himself to change Actaeon into a stag, as he was worried that Diana seemed to be compromising herself rather badly with him. All the gods complain about Jupiter's high-handed, tyrannical ways, but they are stopped in their tracks when Mercury brings news that Eurydice is in hell and that Pluto is on his way to see them. Pluto makes his entrance and is rebuked by Jupiter for having carried off the delightful Eurydice. He defends himself, and soon the gods join in chorus to announce that they are rebelling against the intolerable domination of Jupiter – to say nothing of the monotony of their eternal diet of nectar and ambrosia. In turn, Minerva, Cupid, Venus and Diana remind Jupiter of the disguises he has in the past assumed for his earthly amours, and, in charming and witty 'Couplets', they mock him for his obvious interest in the case of Eurydice. Pluto adds insult to injury by saying that in his view the disguises were necessary because Jupiter was so villainously ugly that he would have got nowhere with the girls without them.

At this juncture, Orpheus and Public Opinion are announced, and Jupiter exhorts the gods to be on their best behaviour when he gives audience to the strangers. Pluto leads off the finale and continues to deny that he has had anything to do with hiding Eurydice. Orpheus starts to ask for Eurydice back, but he has only got as far as the first phrase of 'J'ai perdu mon Eurydice' when the gods and goddesses take up the tune and sing it for him; his demands are obviously granted in advance, since the notoriety of his song has penetrated even to Mount Olympus. Much to Orpheus' dismay, Jupiter orders Pluto to return Eurydice to her husband, and says that he will himself come down to Hades to look for her. Won't he take them too, please, ask the other gods and goddesses, and, when he grants their request, they all join in a hymn of praise which soon becomes a sprightly gallop.

Act III. A sparkling allegretto entr'acte introduces the scene in the underworld. Eurydice is being looked after by John Styx, a complete fool on earth and now charged with prison duties in Hades. In a song, with an enchantingly silly melody, he explains that he was once king of Boeotia: 'Quand j'étais roi de Béotie'. Once he is out of the way, Jupiter comes looking for Eurydice, in whom he is considerably interested. A Tribunal sits to discover the truth, but it is Cupid who comes to Jupiter's aid, preceded by a group of some twenty tiny policemen, singing a very agreeable tune in chorus. This is followed by a wide-ranging slow waltz sung by Cupid himself, who advises Jupiter to disguise himself as a fly. This he does, and imitates its buzzing. Eurydice quickly takes a liking to the fly ('Bel insecte à l'aile dorée'), and they sing and buzz a duet together. At the end, Jupiter in his own voice rejoices at the capture that he seems to have made, and he eventually admits his identity. The scene ends as John Styx repeats his song and is mocked and imitated by Pluto.

Act IV. A splendid Chœur infernal opens the scene. Eurydice has by now been turned by Jupiter into a Bacchante, and she is persuaded by Cupid to sing a Bacchic Hymn for their delight. Jupiter proposes a minuet, and all comment on his admirable dancing of it. Then begins the famous Can-Can tune, the best-known piece in the opera. Jupiter is about to go off with Eurydice when Pluto stops him, just at the moment when they can hear the sound of Orpheus' fiddle playing 'J'ai perdu mon Eurydice' for all it is worth. He is warned that he must walk in front of his wife, and that even to glance back at her will lead to the revoking of his permission to take her back with him to earth. Public Opinion urges him to obey the god's injunction, but Jupiter has an unexpected card up his sleeve; he hurls a thunderbolt and the startled Orpheus looks round and forfeits his right to his bride. Everyone is delighted, Eurydice stays on as a Bacchante, and all join in a final version of the Can-Can to express their pleasure at the turn events have taken.

Offenbach wrote startlingly good comic music, full of excellent tunes and humorous invention, and it seems likely to please almost anyone who is at all interested in the best sort of 'light' music (what else can one call it?). Orphée itself is a most accomplished and stylish bit of fooling, at its broadest in the spoofing of Gluck's 'J'ai perdu mon Eurydice', its most lyrical in John Styx's song and Eurydice's farewell to life, its most satirical in Diana's entrance song and the couplets on Mount Olympus, its most hilarious and catching in the famous Can-Can. H.

LA BELLE HÉLÈNE

The Fair Helen

Operetta in three acts, libretto by Meilhac and Halévy. Première at Théâtre des Variétés, Paris, 17 December 1864, with Hortense Schneider as Hélène, Mlle Sully as Oreste, Dupuis as Paris. First performed London, 1866, with Hortense Schneider; New York, 1867 (in German). Revived Paris, 1890, with Jeanne Granier, 1899, with Simon-Girard; 1919, with Marguerite Carré; 1960, with Géori Boué; Berlin, Theater am Kurfürstendam, 1931, with Jarmila Novotna, Gerd Niemar, conductor Korngold, producer Max Reinhardt; London, Adelphi Theatre, 1932, in a new version by A.P. Herbert with Evelyn Laye; Sadler's Wells, 1963, with Joyce Blackham; English National Opera, 1975, with Anne Howells, conductor Mackerras; 1995, with Lesley Garrett.

Paris, son of King Priam.....Tenor
Ménélas (Menelaus), King of Sparta.....Tenor
Agamemnon, King of Argos.....Baritone
Calchas, High Priest of Jupiter.....Bass
Achille (Achilles), King of Phthiotis.....Tenor
Oreste (Orestes), son of Agamemnon.....Soprano
Ajax I, King of Salamis.....Tenor
Ajax II, King of Locris.....Baritone
Hélène (Helen), Queen of Sparta.....Mezzo-Soprano
Bacchis, Hélène's attendant.....Mezzo-Soprano
Leona, a courtesan.....Soprano
Parthénis, a courtesan.....Soprano
Guards, Slaves, People, Princes, Princesses, Hélène's Entourage

Place: Greece

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

La belle Hélène was Offenbach's first collaboration on a grand scale with Hortense Schneider, who at only thirty-one was on the point of retirement but went on to become the toast of the town. The composer and his librettists returned to mockery of classical antiquity and their efforts reveal a new sophistication both dramatically and from the point of view of Offenbach's music.

Act I. The introduction consists of the March of the Kings, and Paris' song played on the oboe. In front of the temple, a chorus pays mock homage to Jupiter during a festivity in honour of Venus. Helen leads the women in their devotions. She sings a melodious air in 6/8 ('Amours divins'), then reveals in a conversation with Calchas that she is obsessed with the promise Venus has made to Paris, that he will win the most beautiful woman in the world. This is clearly a delicate situation for her, as who else can lay claim to such a title? To a comic march there enters Orestes, precocious son of Agamemnon, with Leona and Parthénis, the courtesans. He has a skitish song, in whose refrain Calchas joins. Calchas is embarrassed at Orestes' insistence on bringing the two ladies into the temple.

Enter a shepherd asking peremptorily whether a message has yet come from Venus. Even as he speaks the messenger-dove arrives, a little out of breath, and Calchas reads Venus' command – that the shepherd will win the most beautiful woman in the world, clearly Helen. Calchas realises it is Paris, agrees obsequiously to help, and asks rather knowingly for a first-hand impression of Venus. This Paris gives him in his famous song ('Au mont Ida'), perhaps the best known, certainly one of the most attractive of Offenbach's lyrical tunes.

To the accompaniment of a very graceful piece of music, Helen and the women process from the temple, and Helen interrogates Calchas about the handsome young shepherd. Calchas leaves them together, but they have time for only a few words before the Kings of Greece enter in procession. The two Ajaxes, followed by Achilles, announce themselves and their attributes in comic fashion. Next it is the turn of Menelaus, hymning his expectation of imminent cuckoldry, and finally of Agamemnon, King of Kings. The whole episode is Offenbach at his most memorable – and devastatingly comic. It is said that the composer once intended at this point to have a parody of the tournament of song in Tannhäuser, but he gave up the idea and we have instead a game of charades,¹ whose winner is to receive his prize from Helen herself. The Kings are bad at the competition, which is won by Paris, still disguised as a shepherd. He announces his identity and, amidst general acclamation ('C'est l'homme à la pomme'), Helen crowns him victor, and invites him to supper. On the side Calchas agrees to try to arrange for Menelaus to be absent. There is a clap of thunder, and Calchas takes the opportunity of announcing a decree from Jupiter: Menelaus must go to Crete ('What the devil to do?' is his aside). The finale gets under way as they all, led by Helen, rapidly admonish Menelaus 'Pars pour la Crète'.

Act II. An entr'acte based on the ripe waltz tune of the act's finale takes us to Helen's apartments, where her women urge her to make a specially fine toilet on this day of all days. Helen for once seems virtuously inclined and chooses a sober dress; let fate not have it all its own way. A message comes from Paris, asking Helen to receive him. She tries to refuse, but sighs: 'Pourquoi, ô déesse, as-tu toujours choisi notre famille pour faire tes expériences?' In a song that is a gem of wit and beauty, Helen laments (if that is the right word) her fatal gift:

When one hears it, it is hard to imagine that even Offenbach ever wrote anything more mouth-wateringly appetising. It sums up a whole generation which lived hedonistically but retained the ability to mock itself while doing so.

Paris comes in unannounced, finds her determinedly resistant to love and to threats, and bids her beware of trickery. The music announces the gambling-game of Goose (Snakes and Ladders) – more party games! The Kings bet, Calchas is caught cheating and treated in an ensemble as if he were a welshing bookmaker.²

Helen sends for Calchas and asks him if he will through prayer cause her to dream a rendezvous with Paris. She sleeps, Paris enters disguised as a slave, sends Calchas packing, and is alone with Helen. Orestes and the girls can be heard singing outside and soon Helen wakes up. She takes the reality of Paris for the dream she so much wanted, and their extended love duet rivals Gounod in its melodic innocence ('Oui, c'est un rêve'). Their bliss is interrupted by the wholly unexpected arrival of Menelaus, who raises the alarm and summons the Kings who are having supper next door. Orestes with his perpetual song arrives first, but the others are not far behind. Menelaus asks what sort of a show they have made of looking after his honour in his absence. Paris vocalises (like Jupiter as the fly in Orphée – did this have an amorous connotation for the composer?), but Menelaus is more taken aback by the suggestion, quickly seized on by Helen, that he is really the most to blame; it is customary for husbands to send warning of their return, is the burden of Helen's delightful song! Agamemnon tries to send Paris away – but, Paris rejoins, in that case he will have to return. To the tune of the waltz of the entr'acte, now with a mocking onomatopoeic verbal accompaniment, they urge him on his way.

¹ Napoleon III and Empress Eugénie are known to have been obsessed with party games, which they and their guests played on every possible occasion.

² The rather protracted Game of Goose which contains little Offenbach, more Meilhac and Halévy, was omitted in the Paris revival of 1983, to the operetta's distinct advantage.

Act III. The seaside resort of Nauplia. The entr'acte makes use of Orestes' tune and the curtain goes up to show the Spartans in holiday mood, singing the praises of Venus. Orestes is inclined to think that Menelaus' insistence on the departure of Paris has offended Venus, who seems to have taken revenge on the women of Greece by making them more susceptible than usual to the dictates of the heart. The Kings complain about the crowd now to be found at the seaside – there is no room for decent bathing any more.

Enter Helen and Menelaus quarrelling. Why had Helen said, 'Oh, then it wasn't a dream'? Helen explains that Venus had a hand in it, and Paris is very attractive. Agamemnon is dissatisfied – Greece is in a sorry moral state due to Venus' displeasure at Paris' departure. It's all Menelaus' fault; if his behaviour could pass as exemplary for a man, it is nothing short of idiotic for a King. In a famous trio, satirising at the same time patriotic moments in Guillaume Tell and La Muette de Portici, Agamemnon and Calchas try to persuade Menelaus to give up Helen to Paris – in order that Greece may be saved from moral chaos!

Menelaus has had what he thinks is a better idea. He has invited the High Priest of Venus from Cythera to exorcise their troubles, and at that moment he appears in a great ship accompanied by his retinue. The Greeks welcome him and pray for help in their predicament. Of course, it is Paris all the time and he chides them for their melancholy reception – Venus' cult is a bright and breezy affair – and breaks into a Tyrolienne, complete with yodelling effects. The High Priest promises them pardon in Venus' name, provided Menelaus allows Helen to embark forthwith for Cythera to make sacrifice to Venus. Helen appears, agrees after some persuasion to go, and embarks, whereupon Paris reveals himself: Menelaus will not see Helen again – but the implied threat is lost in the final chorus of good wishes for the voyage to Cythera. H.

BARBE-BLEUE

Bluebeard

Opéra-bouffe in three acts, text by Henri Meilhac and Ludovic Halévy. Première, Théâtre des Variétés, Paris, 5 February 1866, with Hortense Schneider as Boulotte, José Dupuis as Bluebeard and Kopp as Bobèche. Revived in Paris, 1904, with Tariol-Baugé. Schneider played it in London in 1869 and 1870. It was revived at Sadler's Wells in 1966 with Joyce Blackham. The operetta was one of the most successful and long-lived productions of the great Walter Felsenstein at the Komische Oper in East Berlin, with Hans Nocker and Anny Schlemm.

Duke Barbe-Bleue (Bluebeard)Tenor
 King BobècheTenor
 Count Oscar, chief courtier to King Bobèche ...Baritone
 Popolani, *court alchemist*Baritone
 Prince SaphirTenor
 Boulotte, *a peasant girl*Soprano
 Queen Clémentine, *wife of King Bobèche*Mezzo-Soprano
 Princess Hermia, *under the name of Fleurette, Bobèche's daughter*Soprano
 Barbe-Bleue's five former wivesSopranos, Mezzo-Sopranos Héloïse
 Rosalinde
 Isaure
 Blanche
 Eléanore
 Alvarez, *a courtier*Tenor
Running Time: 2 hours

For Barbe-Bleue, Offenbach deployed the team which had done such sterling work in La belle Hélène, with results which were hardly less satisfactory.

Act I. We meet first the shepherd Saphir (a prince in disguise) paying court to the pretty village florist, Fleurette (a princess in similar case), who is getting fed up with Saphir's excuses every time the subject of marriage comes up. The exuberant Boulotte interrupts proceedings, intent on adding Saphir's to the tally of scalps she carries on her belt. Popolani, Barbe-Bleue's alchemist, is in search of a May Queen for this year's festivity and meets Count Oscar, a dignitary at King Bobèche's court, searching for the King's long-lost daughter, abandoned when Queen Clémentine produced a son. Since the son has turned out an idiot, the King is looking for Princess Hermia; her basket, placed on the river, ought to have come ashore hereabouts, calculates Count Oscar.

Barbe-Bleue (Covent Garden, 1989, original production 1963, Komische Oper, Berlin, director Walter Felsenstein, designer Wilfried Werz). Werner Enders as King Bobèche, a role he has sung since 1963.

Oscar suggests a lottery to find the May Queen. Boulotte wins. Amazement succeeds consternation when the receptacle for the lottery tickets turns out to be the very basket the Princess was placed in eighteen years before, moreover now belonging to Fleurette, who is revealed as the missing Princess. She insists on taking Saphir back with her to court.

Barbe-Bleue is one of King Bobèche's vassals and the demise of successive wives, conveniently before the celebration of new nuptials, has given him an unsavoury reputation. It is time for his entrance, which he makes in time to catch a glimpse of the Princess as she departs. He is looking for a new wife, five having already been disposed of by the handy alchemist, and his choice falls on Boulotte, dressed up for her May Day coronation and quite unconcerned by her prospective bridegroom's reputation.

Act II. At the palace, courtiers are practising genuflection, but the finger is pointed at Alvarez who is suspected of being the Queen's lover. Count Oscar is to carry out the execution. King Bobèche not only suspects everyone of being the Queen's lover, but he also suspects the behaviour of Barbe-Bleue in the matter of a rapid turnover of wives. There is a snag: Barbe-Bleue's army is much better equipped than Bobèche's, so he turns to the question of switching Princess Hermia's attention from Saphir to the son of a neighbouring king. A happy ending seems in sight when it is discovered that Saphir is the son of the king in question.

Barbe-Bleue brings his new wife to court, but first sight of Fleurette/Hermia convinces him he has made a bad bargain. Boulotte kisses all the gentlemen, and the outraged Barbe-Bleue resolves to make Hermia wife number seven.

Barbe-Bleue takes Boulotte down to Popolani's cellar, where is the tomb of the first five wives. Boulotte is horrified at the unexpected situation, and makes her plea in an extended duet, but to no avail. Popolani however is a merciful man and offers his prospective victims a choice. One of the phials contains poison, the other nothing more than water – and the hints he drops are broad. Boulotte unerringly chooses wrongly, becomes drowsy and collapses on the sofa.

Barbe-Bleue sees the body of his satisfactorily defunct wife, but no sooner is he gone than an electrical gadget brings her back to life, a situation she finds she shares with each of her predecessors, all of whom have been drugged and then comfortably installed in Popolani's stronghold. Popolani summons the five previous wives for the finale.

Act III. Barbe-Bleue decides to interrupt the wedding of Hermia and Saphir, claiming the Princess as his seventh wife. He threatens the King with his superior artillery, with a blow catches Saphir off guard, and carries the Princess off as his seventh consort. Popolani now puts in an appearance with the earlier wives, all disguised as gipsies. To Oscar he confesses the trick he has played, only to discover that Oscar in his turn has similarly hidden the five men he should have executed as the Queen's lovers. Saphir revives and joins in plotting the future, which discloses Barbe-Bleue furious at his new wife's unwifely attitude towards him, and the Queen, to Bobèche's discomfiture, joining her daughter in what is obviously an early feminist plot. Gipsies are admitted, and Boulotte who is one of them reads the palms of all at court, disclosing the evil-doing of both Barbe-Bleue and Bobèche. The matching sets of putative victims team up together, and Barbe-Bleue patches it up with Boulotte for what may well turn out to be a foretaste of hell.

H.

ROBINSON CRUSOË

Operetta in three acts, text by Eugène Cormon and Hector-Jonathan Crémieux. Première Opéra-Comique, Paris, 23 November 1867, with Galli-Marié, the first Carmen eight years later, as Vendredi. The operetta, Offenbach's second for the Opéra-Comique (Barkouf in 1860 was the first), was no great success but twentieth-century audiences have taken to it more enthusiastically.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Sir William Crusoë | Bass |
| Lady Crusoë, his wife | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Edwige, their niece | Soprano |
| Suzanne, her maid | Soprano |
| Robinson Crusoë, the Crusoës' son | Tenor |
| Toby, the Crusoës' general factotum | Tenor |
| Vendredi (Man Friday), a native of the island | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Jim Cocks, the cannibal chef, originally from Bristol | Baritone |
| Will Atkins, a pirate chief | Bass |
| Cannibals and Pirates | |

Place: Bristol; a Desert Island at the Mouth of the Orinoco

Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

The operetta is in many ways a departure from Offenbach's earlier procedure. He writes arias rather than songs, there is less dialogue than in the lighter works, lyricism rather than parody is the order of the day.

Act I follows a jaunty overture. Bristol. Robinson is, as usual, late for Sunday tea with the family. He tells Toby he has booked passage for them both for South America that very night. Suzanne overhears and spills the beans to Edwige, who is in love with Robinson and tries to get him to agree to stay. Toby does.

Act II. A desert island at the mouth of the Orinoco, six years later. Robinson's ship was wrecked and he has saved Man Friday as he was about to be sacrificed. Edwige, who followed him and has arrived on the same island, is there with Suzanne and Toby, now married. Jim Cocks, from Bristol but turned cannibal, tells Suzanne and Toby they are that night to be part of a cannibals' dinner. Edwige is also a prisoner and the cannibals believe that with her blonde hair she will if properly sacrificed become the bride of their god. Man Friday, who fell for Edwige as soon as he set eyes on her, observes the preparations for the funeral pyre, fires Robinson's pistol and rescues the three prospective victims and Jim Cocks.

Act III. Robinson returns to his hut and is reunited with Edwige and the others. He tells them the pirates have sent a boat on shore for supplies and that this is their chance to escape. Robinson sends the pirates off after hidden treasure in the jungle, where they are captured by the cannibals. Robinson now holds the pirates' muskets, with which he rescues them, stipulating that, as they sail for Bristol, Captain Atkins will perform a marriage ceremony for Edwige and him.

Act I is a by no means short, relatively sober-sided affair. With its tale of the Prodigal Son setting the initial tone, its shapely solos and ensembles do not add up to much more than a well-organised opéra-comique act, moreover with a protracted farewell. Sparks begin to fly in the second act, where Offenbach writes for mezzo-soprano (Galli-Marié) as opposed to the slipping sopranos he was used to at the Bouffes or the Variétés. Man Friday provides a foretaste of Hoffmann! The climax comes with Edwige's waltz song, one of the grandest numbers in any of the composer's operettas. H.

LA PÉRICHOLE¹

Operetta in three acts, libretto by Meilhac and Halévy, based on Mérimée's play Le Carrosse du Saint Sacrement. Première (in two acts) at the Variétés, Paris, 6 October 1868, with Hortense Schneider. A third act was added for the revival at the same theatre in 1874. First performed New York, 1869; London, 1870. Most recent revivals include those at the Metropolitan, New York, 1957 (in English), with Patrice Munsel, Theodor Uppman, conductor Jean Morel; London, John Lewis Partnership, 1961; Geneva, 1982, with Maria Ewing.

La Périchole, a street singerSoprano
Piquillo, another street singer, in love with her.....Tenor
Don Andres de Ribeira, Viceroy of PeruBaritone
Don Pedro de Hinoyosa, Governor of Lima.....Baritone
Count Miguel de Panatellas, lord-in-waiting to the ViceroyTenor
The Marquis de Sartarem.....Baritone
The Marquis de TarapoteBass
Two NotariesTenor, Baritone
The Old PrisonerSpoken

Joint proprietresses of the 'Three Cousins' tavern

GuadalenaSoprano
 Berginella Soprano
 Mastrilla.....Mezzo-Soprano

Ladies of the Court

ManuelitaSoprano
 NinettaSoprano
 BrambillaMezzo-Soprano
 FrasquinellaContralto

Courtiers, Citizens, Pages, Guards, etc.

Place: Lima, Capital of Peru

Time: Late Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

The story of La Périchole is taken supposedly from Prosper Mérimée's play Le Carrosse du Saint Sacrement,² but the adaptation is a very long way indeed after the original. Offenbach's librettists have abandoned even the bones of the original plot and instead have developed the idea of the situation to make a satire on the Second Empire.

Act I. There is a lively prelude – a march and two airs from the first act – and the curtain goes up on the public square in Lima in front of the café of the 'Three Cousins'. It is the Viceroy's birthday, and he has the habit of roaming round the streets, as he thinks incognito, to find out exactly what is being said and thought about him. Wine is free, and the people of Lima, prompted by the Governor, are perfectly prepared to humour the Viceroy in his masquerade. The proprietresses of the 'Three Cousins' make themselves known in an attractive trio, and then the crowd hears the signal warning them of the Viceroy's approach. His entrance song proclaims his confidence in the impenetrable nature of his disguise, and it is accompanied by the chorus agreeing to respect the incognito of which he is so proud. Across the square come two street singers, la Périchole and Piquillo, her lover. They announce the title of their ballad as 'The Soldier and the Indian Maid' and a very catchy duet it is that they sing. The song finished, they take a collection, not very successfully because Piquillo looks so fierce that he frightens off all the men who want to give la Périchole money, and they are obliged to try another number, a 'séguédille pour soirée'. This time the collection is spoiled by a circus procession, and la Périchole and

¹ Pronounced 'Perikole'.

² Mérimée's drama was played in London in 1957 with Edwige Feuillère, and it was from it, too, that derived Jean Renoir's beautiful film The Golden Coach, starring Anna Magnani.

Piquillo are left hungry, tired and almost penniless.

Piquillo leaves the stage, and Don Andres can resist the attraction of la Périchole no longer. He asks her if she wouldn't like to be one of the Viceroy's Ladies-in-Waiting – his wife is dead, but he thinks it nice to carry on old customs. She is hungry and she accepts, but first she must write a letter to tell Piquillo what has happened and say goodbye to him. Her attractive song of farewell ('O mon cher amant'), a genuinely touching piece, is in unusually serious vein for Offenbach and his public. She arranges for her letter to be given to Piquillo, but in the meanwhile Don Andres has discovered a snag: nobody but a married woman can become Lady-in-Waiting to the Viceroy, and la Périchole is single. There is a simple solution: he orders Panatellas, his Lord-in-Waiting, to find the lady a husband, and Don Pedro, as Governor of Lima, to collect a notary to perform the marriage ceremony.

In the meanwhile Piquillo receives the letter and in despair is about to hang himself when a diversion occurs. He is selected by Panatellas as the prospective husband of the Viceroy's new lady friend, and in return for money he agrees to go to the Palace.

The finale takes place in an atmosphere of considerable well-being. Both prospective parties to the marriage and the two notaries who are to perform it have had their consciences eased with alcohol. La Périchole in fact sings a charmingly tipsy waltz song ('Ah, quel dîner') as she waits to sign the wedding agreement. She is delighted to recognise Piquillo as the bridegroom, but he is too drunk to have any idea who she is and takes care to explain that he is in love with someone else. The marriage duly takes place and the Chorus works up so much enthusiasm that it seems likely at any moment to break into a can-can. La Périchole and Piquillo, more from force of habit than anything else, sing a snatch of the ballad we heard earlier, and the act comes to an end.

Act II. An elaborate entr'acte takes us to a grand room in the Palace. The situation is complex. The newly created Countess of Tabago must be presented officially by her husband to the Viceroy, but it proves by no means easy to persuade Piquillo to fall in with this scheme, particularly as he now has only one thought in the world and that is to return to la Périchole, wherever she may be. The ladies of the Court are not only jealous of the new arrival but also contemptuous of her lowly birth. When la Périchole appears, Piquillo of course recognises her and loses his temper to such a degree that none of her efforts (even the famous air 'Mon Dieu, que les hommes sont bêtes') serves to calm him. He proceeds to denounce her, for all the world like Alfredo in La Traviata, as a heartless and wicked jade, so that the Viceroy has little option but to order him off to prison. There he is to be confined with all other husbands who have proved recalcitrant – to a most seductive waltz tune, great play is made with the individual syllables of the word 'recalcitrant', which comes as the climax to one of Offenbach's most splendid finales.

Act III, scene i. A dungeon in the prison. The court officials conduct Piquillo to his jail, congratulate him on his honourable conduct, and leave him, not however before singing a brilliant trio with him in the form of a bolero. While Piquillo, in a charming song, wonders if his 'wife' is going to do anything about his predicament, la Périchole for her part has procured the Viceroy's permission to visit her husband in prison and, after some mutual recriminations, his heart is melted – as whose wouldn't be? – by her slow waltz song 'Tu n'es pas beau', and its refrain 'je t'adore, brigand'. All is made up between them, and they resolve to bribe the gaoler and procure Piquillo's escape – unfortunately the gaoler turns out to be Don Andres in another of his disguises, this time a successful one. He gets his own back by ordering la Périchole to be chained to the wall opposite Piquillo, but in a delightful trio whispers to her as he leaves the dungeon that she will be released the moment she gives the sign that she loves him.

The lovers are not long together before an old prisoner burrows his way like a mole through the wall. He has been in prison for years, nobody quite knows why, but at last he seems within reach of escape. He helps to free them from their shackles, and they agree that la Périchole shall make the signal to the Viceroy. When he comes in full of ardour, they capture him, tie him up and make their way safely out of the jail.

The second scene is again set in the public square. The soldiers are out and searching the town for the runaways, who for their part have taken refuge in the café of the 'Three Cousins'. There is a very agreeable trio for the cousins and, once the soldiers have left the square, the three escaped prisoners make their appearance. They decide to give themselves up, and la Périchole urges a final appeal to the Viceroy's good nature in the form of a ballad 'La Clémence d'Auguste'. It is completely successful, he grants them their freedom, and the operetta ends with a repetition of the ballad heard in the first act. H.

LES CONTES D'HOFFMANN

The Tales of Hoffmann

Opera in three acts, text by Barbier and Carré. Première Opéra-Comique, Paris, 10 February 1881, with Adèle Isaac (Stella, Olympia, Antonia),¹ Ugalde, Talazac, Taskin. First performed New York, 1882; London, Adelphi Theatre, 1907; His Majesty's, 1910; Covent Garden, 1910, with Teyte, Nevada, de Lussan, Hyde, conductor Beecham; Metropolitan, New York, 1913, with Hempel, Fremstad, Bori, Macnez, Gilly, conductor Polacco. Revived Metropolitan, 1924, with Morgana, Bori, Fleta, de Luca; Covent Garden, 1936, with Andrevia, Delprat, Dino Borgioli, Pinza, conductor Beecham; Metropolitan, 1943, with Munsel, Djanel, Novotna, Jobin, Pinza, Singher, conductor Beecham; Vienna State Opera, 1947, with Lipp, Welitsch, Jurinac, Patzak, Schöffler; Berlin, Komische Oper, 1958, in production and arrangement by Felsenstein; Sadler's Wells, 1970, with Anne Evans, William McAlpine, Geoffrey Chard; Covent Garden, 1980, with Serra, Cotrubas, Baltsa, Domingo, Geraint Evans, Nimsgern, Ghiuselev, Robert Lloyd.

| | |
|--|-----------------------|
| Lindorf, a councillor of Nuremberg..... | Bass ² |
| Andrès, Stella's servant..... | Tenor ³ |
| Hermann, a student..... | Baritone |
| Nathanael, a student..... | Tenor |
| Luther, innkeeper..... | Bass |
| Hoffmann, a poet..... | Tenor |
| Nicklausse, his companion..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Spalanzani, an inventor..... | Tenor |
| Cochenille, his servant..... | Tenor ³ |
| Coppelius, a scientist and Spalanzani's rival... | Baritone ² |
| Olympia, a mechanical doll..... | Soprano |
| Antonia, a singer..... | Soprano |
| Crespel, her father, a councillor of Munich..... | Baritone |
| Frantz, his servant..... | Tenor ³ |
| Dr Miracle, a doctor..... | Baritone ² |
| The Voice of Antonia's Mother..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Giulietta, a courtesan..... | Soprano |
| Schlemil, her lover..... | Bass |
| Dapertutto, a sorcerer..... | Baritone ² |

Pittichinaccio, an admirer of Giulietta's.....Tenor³
 Stella, an opera singer.....Soprano
 The Muse of Poetry.....Actress

Place: Nuremberg; Munich; Venice

Time: Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

Offenbach died during rehearsals of Hoffmann, and Ernest Guiraud orchestrated the piece for its Opéra-Comique première, 'tidying' it up and dropping the Giulietta act in the process (in order to retain the barcarolle, he set the Antonia act in Venice!). A dozen years after the first performance Giulietta was brought back, but out of sequence, before Antonia rather than after as Offenbach and his librettists had intended. The episodes of Hoffmann's three loves have little intrinsically in common, and the invention of an evil genius appearing in different disguises to remove the ladies from Hoffmann's grasp (or save his poetic genius from them?) provides continuity rather than a powerful dramatic clash. Editors therefore have seized on the fact that there is no genuinely final version and have cut, added and generally re-worked the opera for almost every revival. Mahler for Vienna scrapped Prologue and Epilogue, but Hans Gregor in Berlin in 1905 restored arias for Coppélius and Dapertutto, taking care however to put Coppélius's tune under Dapertutto's words (the music of the so-called Mirror or Jewel aria was originally written for Le Voyage dans la Lune and there is no convincing evidence that Offenbach had finally decided to use it in Hoffmann). Felsenstein in Berlin in 1958 and Edmund Tracey and Colin Graham for Sadler's Wells in 1970 are examples of recent attempts to restore Offenbach's intentions as far as they are known or can be deduced. In either case, as in any remotely 'authentic' performance, the order is as given hereafter and the opera is in opéra-comique form, with a considerable quantity of spoken dialogue.

The Tales of Hoffmann is recognisably Offenbach in his most lyrical vein and there is little doubt he hoped in it to produce his masterpiece. This he may well have succeeded in doing, and if so it is partly because of the striking level of melodic invention which he sustains throughout, but partly also because he discovered a

¹ The Giulietta act was not included in the première.

² It is customary for the incarnations of Hoffmann's evil genius (Lindorf, Coppélius, Dapertutto and Dr Miracle) to be undertaken by the same singer, as are, exceptionally, the three main soprano roles.

³ Usually taken by the same character tenor.

vein of sardonic musical humour which, particularly in the scenes concerned with Doctor Miracle, gives his music a new sense of the macabre. In whatever version the opera is presented, even the most perverse and furthest removed from what we now believe were Offenbach's latest thoughts, The Tales of Hoffmann keeps its central place in the repertory.

Prologue. Luther's Tavern in Nuremberg, situated next door to the opera house, where a performance of Don Giovanni is in progress. A drinking chorus can be heard off-stage. Lindorf comes in with Andrès, the servant of the prima donna Stella, who is singing in Don Giovanni. Lindorf obtains from him a letter his mistress has written to Hoffmann, making an assignation for that evening and enclosing the key of her room. Lindorf, who assumes during the course of the opera and in various forms the role of Hoffmann's evil genius, in an aria exults over his prospective victim. A crowd of students enter the tavern and immediately start to celebrate the prospect of the beer which Luther brings them.

Enter Hoffmann, with Nicklausse. They sit down with the students, and Nicklausse, with obvious ironical intent, starts to hum 'Notte e giorno faticar' from the first act of Don Giovanni which they have just been listening to. Hoffmann seems out of humour, and haunted by the sight of Stella. He is prevailed upon to sing a song to the assembled company, and strikes up the Legend of Kleinzach ('Il était une fois à la cour d'Eisenach'). With the chorus echoing his phrases, he goes briskly through the description of the little dwarf whose knees clicked together as he walked, but when he comes to describe his face, gradually falls into a reverie and instead starts to rhapsodise on the features of his lady-love. He is interrupted, recovers himself, and finishes the song he began.

Hoffmann and the students complain about the quality of Luther's beer, and a punch bowl is brought and duly greeted in song. Hoffmann is by no means pleased to see Lindorf, whom he refers to as haunting his steps and bringing him bad luck. He offers to tell the story of the three great loves of his life, and, in spite of Luther's warning that the curtain is going up on the second act of Don Giovanni, all announce their intention of staying behind to listen. The first, says Hoffmann, was called Olympia.

Act I (Olympia) is introduced by a mocking minuet. When the curtain goes up, we are in Spalanzani's room. He is waiting for the arrival of guests who have been invited to witness the astonishing feats of his performing doll, Olympia. Spalanzani mutters that he hopes to make a fortune from his invention, which will recoup him for the loss he suffered when Elias the banker went broke. If only his rival Coppélius does not try to claim a share of the proceeds!

Hoffmann appears, and is immediately impressed by Olympia, whom he takes for Spalanzani's daughter. He sings ardently to her of love. His aria, 'Ah, vivre deux', is one of the loveliest expressions of his romantic spirit to be found in the entire opera. Nicklausse is not at all surprised to find his master in his usual love-lorn condition, but comments tartly on the improbable nature of the new object of his affections – a mechanical doll indeed!

Coppélius comes in to observe Hoffmann gazing fatuously at the doll. He tries to interest him in his own invention; eyes and spectacles to suit every requirement. 'J'ai des yeux' he sings as he shows off his wares. We may guess that the pair he sells to Hoffmann are rose-tinted; at any rate, they seem to increase his delight in beholding Olympia. Spalanzani sees Coppélius, and is forced to acknowledge the latter's share in Olympia; he supplied her eyes, in consideration of which Spalanzani makes him out a bond for five hundred crowns – drawn on Elias's bank.

The guests start to arrive. To the familiar tune of the minuet, they thank Spalanzani for his hospitality. He produces Olympia, whom he describes as his daughter, for their admiration, and accompanies her on the harp while she sings her famous Doll's Song to the assembled company: 'Les oiseaux dans la charmille'. The music perfectly but charmingly imitates the automaton-like delivery that one might expect from a mechanical toy, and in between whiles Spalanzani winds up the spring which brings his 'daughter' to life. She extends her hand to the guests who crowd around to congratulate her, and is left alone with Hoffmann while the others go in to supper. He sings to her, but, when he touches her shoulder, she suddenly rises from the sofa and goes quickly across the room, brushing through the curtains which divide her room from the main part of the house. Hoffmann follows her, in spite of Nicklausse's warning that Olympia is a lifeless doll.

Coppélius returns having found out that he has been cheated by his rival. The dance begins again, and Hoffmann waltzes with Olympia, who, once she is wound up, goes faster and faster so that the other guests wonder if they can save Hoffmann from breaking his neck. When Spalanzani finally manages to catch up with the doll and stop her, she breaks out into coloratura gyrations over the top of the chorus. Olympia is put away in her room, and all bend over to see what damage has been done to the exhausted Hoffmann. Suddenly, the noise of smashing machinery is heard. Coppélius emerges from Olympia's room, laughing with triumph, and Hoffmann is left disillusioned at the discovery that his beloved was only a doll.

Act II (Antonia). Munich; a room in Crespel's house. Antonia, his daughter, sits singing ('Elle a fui, la tourterelle'). Crespel comes into the room, and is distressed to find his daughter in a fainting condition. She has broken her promise not to sing, but she says it was the sight of her mother's portrait that prompted her. Crespel has already seen signs of the consumption which carried away her mother, and he blames her overwrought condition on Hoffmann, to escape whose attentions he has brought her to Munich. Crespel shouts for his deaf old servant Frantz, to whom he gives orders that no one is to be admitted to the house on any pretext whatsoever. When he is alone, Frantz protests that his crotchety master would make his life a misery were it not for the consolation he gets from his singing and dancing, both of which he maintains he does well. After demonstrating the questionable truth of both these assertions, he falls exhausted into a chair, from which Hoffmann, who comes through the door with Nicklausse, at last manages to rouse him.

Hoffmann looks at the song which is lying open on the harpsichord, and has just begun to sing it when Antonia appears. After an impassioned duet, Antonia hears her father coming, and Hoffmann hides as she leaves the room. Crespel comes in, wishes Hoffmann to the devil, but transfers his spleen to Dr Miracle, when Frantz tells him the doctor is at the door. He tries to have him kept outside but is too late, and with a burst of laughter, Miracle enters. Hoffmann from hiding sees Miracle's preparations to treat Antonia, and recognises that he is evil; Crespel is in despair at not being able to get rid of the man who, he is certain, killed his wife and will yet kill his daughter as well. Although she has not yet appeared, Miracle pretends to feel Antonia's pulse and announces his worry at its irregularity. In response to his command, she sings a brilliant flourish from her room, but still does not appear. Crespel begs Miracle to leave her alone, but he insists that he can cure Antonia, if only he is allowed to. A fine trio for male voices develops in the course of the action.

Hoffmann is alone, but is soon joined by Antonia. He tries to persuade her to renounce her singing for the sake of her health and her love. She agrees, but no sooner is Hoffmann safely out of the way than Dr Miracle is back, pouring temptation into her ear. Can she bear to waste such talent by silencing her voice for ever? Before long, Antonia hears the voice of her mother calling upon her to sing; the portrait glows with life, and Miracle says that he is only there to cause her to give effect to her mother's dearest wish. There is a highly impressive trio, during whose course Miracle seizes a violin from the wall and plays wildly on it. Antonia's voice rises higher and higher until she falls dying to the ground. Miracle disappears, and Crespel rushes in to hear his daughter's last words. When Hoffmann comes in, Crespel blames him for Antonia's death. Hoffmann wants to call a doctor, but, in answer to his summons, it is Miracle who comes.

Act III (Giulietta). Venice. The decorated gallery of a palace overlooking the Grand Canal. The guests of Giulietta are grouped around, and some of them lie on the sofas. Nicklausse and Giulietta in a gondola sing the famous barcarolle, 'Belle nuit, ô nuit d'amour', one of the world's most popular tunes.

Hoffmann objects to its melancholy strains, and responds with a lively song, whose refrain is taken up by the chorus. Giulietta introduces her guests and invites them to a game of cards, Nicklausse seizing the opportunity of telling Hoffmann that he means to take him away the moment he shows the least sign of falling in love with Giulietta. Hoffmann swears that he will not succumb to her charms – may his soul be forfeit to the devil if he does!

Dapertutto is watching him and, when Hoffmann has gone out, produces a huge diamond, with which, he says, he will persuade Giulietta to capture Hoffmann's soul for him as she has done with that of Schlemil. They have only to look into his magic mirror, and their souls stay with their reflections. He is given a powerful aria, 'Scintille diamant',¹ which admirably displays a strong bass voice.

¹ From Le Voyage dans la Lune and not in the original score.

Giulietta agrees to do Dapertutto's command, and upbraids Hoffmann for wishing to leave just because he has lost his money gambling. Hoffmann is quite unable to resist her, and he sings lovingly of the passion which overwhelms him in her presence ('O Dieu de quelle ivresse'). Like his song to Olympia, this is lyrical expression of a high order.

There is an ecstatic duet for them, 'Si ta présence m'est ravie', during whose course she obtains the reflection which Dapertutto covets. Then Schlemil rushes in and furiously denounces Giulietta's unfaithfulness. Hoffmann discovers he has no reflection when he looks into a mirror, but still he will not leave Giulietta. A septet¹ begins, in which Hoffmann declares his love, Dapertutto and Pittichinaccio their contempt for the poet; Giulietta admits that she found the diamond irresistible, Schlemil furiously anticipates revenge, and Nicklausse and the chorus look with pity at Hoffmann's predicament.

Giulietta saves the situation by suggesting an excursion on the canal, but Hoffmann and Schlemil fight, the former, using Dapertutto's sword, succeeding in killing his rival and removing from a chain round his neck the key of Giulietta's room. The sound of the barcarolle can be heard, but, when Hoffmann rushes away to find his Giulietta, it is to see her float away in the gondola in the arms of Pittichinaccio.

Epilogue. After an intermezzo based on the barcarolle, we are back in Luther's tavern. Hoffmann's story is finished; so too is the performance of Don Giovanni in which Stella has been taking part. She is doubtless, as Nicklausse observes, the personification of the three types of womanhood that Hoffmann has idealised in his stories. But Hoffmann is too drunk to care – Lindorf is perfectly confident on that score – and, as the students eddy round him singing the drinking song from the prologue, the Muse of Poetry appears by his side claiming him for her own. Hoffmann seems to be in a stupor. As Lindorf leads Stella from the room, she turns and throws a flower from her bouquet to him. He looks blankly in her direction. There is no doubt that he is dead drunk.

H.

¹ Often placed here but by Sadler's Wells restored to its allegedly correct position in the Epilogue.

CARL ORFF

(born 10 July 1895, died 29 March 1982)

Carl Orff was involved in opera from his earliest days and, whatever one may think now of his realisation and version of Monteverdi's Orfeo in 1926, it represents an attempt to perform a great masterpiece long before such attempts were in vogue. His operatic ventures have been in a number of apparently unrelated forms, ranging from the 'dramatic cantatas' Carmina Burana and Catulli Carmina, with their slightly risqué Latin texts and emphasis on the chorus, through the grandiosely tragic Antigone (Hölderlin's translation of Sophocles) to Die Bernauerin, a work with a specifically Bavarian flavour which is probably impossible to transplant from its native habitat. Common to all are racy rhythms, spicy orchestration, the composer's great sense of theatre and determination to capture his audience's attention. His success, at least in Germany, has been unquestionable.

DIE KLUGE

The Clever Girl

Opera in one act, text by the composer after a story by the Brothers Grimm. Première, Frankfurt, 20 February 1943, with Cöb Wackers, Günther Ambrosius, Rudolf Gonszar, conductor Otto Winkler, producer Günther Rennert. First performed Dresden, 1947, with Christel Goltz, Manfred Hübner, Gottlob Frick, conductor Joseph Keilberth; Berlin, Komische Oper, 1948, with Elisabeth Grümmer, Josef Herrmann; Rome, Teatro Valle, 1951, with Ornella Rovero, Sesto Bruscantini; San Francisco, 1958, with Leontyne Price, Lawrence Winters, conductor Leopold Ludwig; London, Sadler's Wells by New Opera Company, 1959, with Heather Harper.

| | |
|--------------------|----------|
| The King..... | Baritone |
| The Peasant | Bass |
| His Daughter | Soprano |
| The Jailer..... | Bass |

The Man with the Donkey.....Tenor
 The Man with the Mule.....Baritone
 Three Vagabonds.....Tenor, Baritone, Bass
Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

The Peasant is in prison and bemoans his lot ('O hätt' ich meiner Tochter nur geglaubt!') – if only he had listened to his daughter when she warned him! While ploughing, he found a golden mortar and took it to the King, which immediately put him under suspicion – as his daughter suspected it would – of having stolen the pestle! The King has heard his caterwauling and the Peasant tells him that his daughter gave him wise advice, which causes the King to want to meet her.

The King tells her that he will let her father off all further punishment if she can solve three riddles. She does so without difficulty and the King makes her his wife.

Enter three vagabonds, followed by two men, one with a donkey and the other with a mule, who demand that the King judge their case. Donkey and mule were together in the stable at the inn and the donkey had a foal. The man with the mule insists that as the foal was nearer the mule when they found it, the foal belongs to him, although this goes against every known rule of nature. Curiously enough, the King finds for the man with the mule, and he goes happily off with the vagabonds, leaving the Queen to console the disconsolate donkey man. If he follows her advice for the future, everything will go right. Not only does the donkey man complain in some of the first gentle music heard in the opera but he is put on the right new track in similar vein.

The vagabonds here embark on one of the score's best numbers, a moralistic trio, 'Als die Treue war geboren' (At the time that Truth was born), with a middle section about the eclipse of faith, justice, piety, humility, truth and the rest – William Mann suggested that the only reason these qualities were permitted to be cried out loud and clear in Nazi Germany was because their names were decently veiled in Latin!

The donkey man can now be seen dragging a large fishing-net backwards and forwards over the ground, and the King asks why he does it. If a mule can bear a foal, the man explains, he may perfectly well end up catching fish on dry land! The King is furious and sees the hand of his wife behind such impertinence. The donkey man in his fear confirms that this is true.

In a paroxysm of rage (and in music of similar cast to the peasant's at the start of the opera) the King banishes his wife, telling her she may fill a chest with whichever of his possessions she chooses. She sings lyrically as she gives the King a drink; is it a lullaby, is it a valediction? The donkey man is freed from prison and next morning, the King wakes up in the chest, to discover that his wife gave him a sleeping draught and put him there. She tells him that of all his possessions he himself was the one she most wanted to take with her! The King overflows with admiration and tells her she is the cleverest of women, but she denies this and says it was nothing but pretence because nobody can be really clever and at the same time in love.

The last word is the Peasant's: 'In the end, she found the pestle!'

Die Kluge has been popular from the start, with its easy, catchy music, and skilful dramatic shaping. Orff himself calls the opera 'a little world theatre' and there is no doubt that he saw the King as representing the totalitarian bully, at any stage of history, with the mule-driver a typical 'villain within the law' such as flourishes in a regime of this kind. All the same, to have put such symbolical figures on to the stage under the Nazis is an action not without its own brand of courage.

H.

P

KRZYSZTOF PENDERECKI

(born 23 November 1933)

THE DEVILS OF LOUDUN

Die Teufel von Loudun

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer, based on John Whiting's dramatisation of Aldous Huxley's The Devils of Loudun (German translation by Erich Fried). Première, Hamburg, 20 June 1969, with Tatiana Troyanos, Andre Hiölski, Helmut Melchert, Bernard Ladysz, conductor Henrik Czyz. Stuttgart, 1969, with Colette Lorand, Carlos Alexander, conductor Janos Kulka, producer Günther Rennert; Santa Fe, 1969, with Joy Davidson, John Reardon, conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski. British première, Sadler's Wells Opera, 1973, with Josephine Barstow, Geoffrey Chard, Harold Blackburn, producer John Dexter, conductor Nicholas Braithwaite.

Jeanne, the Prioress of St Ursula's
Convent.....Dramatic Soprano

Ursuline Sisters
ClaireMezzo-Soprano
GabrielleSoprano
LouiseContralto

Philippe, a young girlHigh Lyric Soprano

Ninon, a young widowContralto

Father Grandier, the Vicar of St Peter's ChurchBaritone

Father Barré, the Vicar of Chinon.....Bass

De Laubardemont, the King's Special CommissionerTenor

Father RangierBasso Profondo

Father Mignon, the Ursulines' father confessor ...Tenor

Adam, a chemist.....Tenor

Mannoury, a surgeon.....Baritone

D'Armagnac, the Mayor of Loudun.....Speaking Part

De Cérisey, Town Governor.....Speaking Part

Prince Henri de Condé, the King's Special Ambassador.....Baritone

Father Ambrose, an old priest.....Bass

Bontemps, a jailer.....Bass-Baritone
Clerk of the CourtSpeaking Part
Ursuline Nuns, Carmelites, People, Children, Guards, Soldiers

Place: Loudun

Time: 1634

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

At the première of Penderecki's The Devils of Loudun in Hamburg in June 1969, I was vastly impressed by the way the composer had wrung the last drop out of the tensions of the original play, its inexorability and its horrors, and expressed it all through music. Seldom is a texture or a musical movement sustained for long at a stretch, much less developed, and the solo voice – though every word is, exceptionally, audible – is used either in declamation or in isolated expressive phrases. And yet the effectiveness of what Penderecki has done is not in doubt. With the precision of an acupuncturist and by musical (i.e. not solely stage) means, he touches nerves unerringly to produce a reaction, thus advancing the drama and manipulating the emotions of his audience at one and the same time.

'Huxley was examining the phenomenon of the Ursuline nuns who claimed to be possessed by devils as one manifestation of mankind's innate urge for self-transcendence, others including drink, drugs, and sexual adventure – though he also compared the witch-hunting of Urbain Grandier with similar persecutions in modern times. For Penderecki, whose earlier works have proclaimed him a devout Christian, Grandier is a Christ-like martyr, proudly set on the road to martyrdom quite early on, and this is the Parson's passion that we are witnessing in his opera.'

¹ William Mann, The Times, 23 June 1969.

The personal tragedies of Grandier and Mère Jeanne are set against a background of political manoeuvrings in which Grandier, the vicar of St Peter's church in Loudun, comes to champion the independent spirit of the town in opposition to Cardinal Richelieu and his adherents. Grandier is falsely accused of being in league with the devil, the most convincing of his traducers being Mère Jeanne, whose invitation as Prioress to become confessor to her order he had refused. Her dreams and sexual frustrations start to centre on him and the suggestion is that her fixation becomes indistinguishable from love, that she is used by Grandier's enemies, political and social as well as spiritual (he is a womaniser in a provincial society), to secure his downfall.

Act I, scene i. Jeanne is lying on her bed in her cell at night praying. In her vision, she sees Grandier¹ seated on a chair which has been lashed to a litter and is carried by four soldiers. He wears a heretic's shirt impregnated with sulphur, and there is a rope round his neck. His broken legs dangle, he is a ridiculous, hairless, shattered doll. The Clerk of the Court gives Grandier a two-pound taper to hold. During her trance, Jeanne, who is a hunchback, prays to be made straight. The vision fades and Jeanne is brought a letter; it is from Grandier, regretting that he cannot accept her invitation to become director of the Ursuline community. She falls to her knees in convulsions. Bells.

Scene ii. A corpse hangs from the municipal gallows of Loudun as people leave St Peter's church, among them Adam, the chemist, and Mannoury, a surgeon. They comment on the self-importance of the vicar, Grandier, on the contented look of the young widow Ninon, which they say derives from Grandier's visits to her, and then on the new occupant of the gibbet.

Scene iii. Grandier with Ninon in a tub.

Scene iv. Adam and Mannoury have brought the human head from the gallows and they meet and greet Grandier, showing less than total enthusiasm.

Scene v. Grandier kneels at the altar and prays.

Scene vi. Jeanne and the Ursuline nuns enter the church. When Grandier re-enters in full canonicals, Jeanne screams and runs from the church.

Scene vii. Adam and Mannoury plot to indict Grandier.

Scene viii. Grandier in a confessional, with Philippe outside. She confesses to unclean thoughts ... about him, and he draws her into the confessional and pulls the curtain.

Scene ix. D'Armagnac, the town's Governor, confronts de Laubardemont and refuses to obey the latter's order to pull down the town's fortifications. Grandier supports d'Armagnac.

Scene x. Adam and Mannoury prepare their indictment, referring to a small book containing a register of Grandier's movements.

Scene xi. Jeanne is walking with Father Mignon, a foolish old man who has accepted to become the Order's director. She tells him that she has lately suffered from terrible visions straight from the Devil and has recognised Grandier.

Scene xii. Father Mignon, Adam and Mannoury are discussing the Prioress's visions, and Father Mignon says he has sent a message to Father Barré, an expert in exorcism. There is a knock at the door and de Laubardemont enters, asking about Grandier. He seems to have come to the right place.

Scene xiii. The first confrontation of Mère Jeanne with Barré and those who seek to support him in the exorcism. Jeanne is in private prayer and asks God to give her love; immediately she sees Grandier and Philippe walking by the town wall. De Laubardemont, Barré, Mignon, Mannoury, Adam and Father Rangier rush into the room and peals of masculine laughter pour from Jeanne's distorted mouth. Her inarticulate cries form into a single word, 'Grandier!'

Act II, scene i. The church. Jeanne kneels and facing her are Barré, Rangier, Mignon and the Ursuline nuns. The scene of exorcism proceeds but inarticulate whispers and laughter interrupt and Asmodeus speaks in a deep voice through Jeanne. Jeanne demands that they should speak about the sexual activities of priests. Barré diagnoses that the Devil is lodged deep in the lower bowel. Barré and Rangier grab Jeanne and carry her behind a curtain where apothecary and surgeon administer an enema to laughter and screams of protest.

Scene ii. D'Armagnac and de Cérisey, Mayor and Governor of Loudun, warn Grandier that the continual mention of his name by the possessed Jeanne puts him in a dangerous position.

¹ Throughout, I have quoted the vocal score's stage directions.

Scene iii. Jeanne lies in her cell, while Barré and his cronies continue to examine her, this time in the presence of de Cérisey. Jeanne screams the name of Grandier, whispering occasionally into Barré's ear, until Barré takes de Cérisey by the arm and draws him aside. While Mignon and the nuns pray (for the first time in the opera, 'normal' choral singing, but soon succeeded by an amazing glissando effect), de Cérisey objects that the whole thing is a product of Jeanne's imagination. Three of the sisters have testified that they have engaged in copulation with demons and been deflowered, and Mannoury on examination has found none of them intact. De Cérisey objects that everyone knows about the sentimental attachments between the young women of a convent, and orders the exorcism to cease pending a thorough investigation of the case.

Scene iv. Grandier is grateful to de Cérisey for his intervention, but d'Armagnac says that he has heard from Paris that Grandier, because he has supported d'Armagnac against de Laubardemont, now has a dedicated enemy in Richelieu.

Scene v. Philippe comes to Grandier in the church and tells him she is pregnant. Grandier, not without sympathy, says goodbye; how could he possibly own to being the child's father?

Scene vi. In the pharmacy, Adam, Mannoury and Father Mignon are joined by Fathers Barré and Rangier. The Archbishop has issued an ordinance forbidding further exorcism and their 'mission' seems to be at an end. Their lament for a moment turns into a beautiful quintet, the most 'vocal' number in the score, and at its end Barré says that he must go back to his parish.

Scene vii. The sisters ask Mère Jeanne why the Archbishop has forbidden Father Barré to see them any more. Jeanne laughs at them: 'Why don't you ask the devils to lend a hand?' But the sisters have the last word: 'We have mocked God!'

Scene viii. On the fortifications at night, during a storm Grandier hears from d'Armagnac and de Cérisey that the King has gone back on his word, to Richelieu's evident joy, and the town's fortifications are to be razed to the ground. Grandier paradoxically rejoices: 'Heavenly Father, You have restored strength to my enemies and hope to Your sinful child ... You have made the way possible.'

Scenes ix and x. In the church, Mignon incites the sisters to go back on what they had told the Archbishop's doctor – that they were only playing parts and not truly possessed by the Devil – and reveal the truth: that the Devil had them in his power. De Laubardemont is galvanised into action, says he must depart for Paris but will leave Barré to prosecute the cause in Loudun.

The doors are opened and people of every kind and description rush in. The sisters perform their antics to the delight of the townspeople. The noise is only stilled by the arrival of the King's representative, Prince Henri de Condé. Pandemonium breaks loose, with lewd dancing, screaming and shouting. De Condé asks Beherit, concealed in the person of Mère Jeanne, what his opinion is of the King and his adviser the Cardinal. When Jeanne prevaricates, he congratulates Beherit. To have praised would have implied that the King's policy was hellish, to have disparaged could have resulted in a charge of treason! De Condé takes a small box from one of his pages, containing, he says, some true blood of the Saviour; let Barré exorcise the devils with it. Barré does his stuff and is triumphant, but de Condé reveals that the box was empty and, when Barré declares that it was a cruel trick to play, de Condé suggests that he is not the only one to have been playing tricks.

Suddenly, Mignon and Rangier start to run in circles imitating the voices of Leviathan and Beherit, women in the crowd take up the cries, and Barré is once more in his element, plunging into the crowd and wielding his crucifix like a club. De Condé looks at Jeanne and tells her this act will cost her her immortal soul. Now the nuns gossip among themselves, the one delighted that her lovely legs have been so greatly admired, the other that her picture is on sale in the town. Grandier attempts to enter the church but finds his way barred by soldiers and by de Laubardemont, who arrests him.

Act III, scene i. It is night and the stage is divided into three, on one side Grandier in jail, in a second section Jeanne and Father Mignon, and in a third, Mannoury. A crowd has gathered – Bontemps, the jailer, tells Grandier that there are more than 30,000 people come to town to see the execution, and Grandier has to remind him that his trial has not even begun. Grandier prays that he will be able to bear the pain, and Father Ambrose attempts to comfort him. Grandier confesses that he has sinned, with women, in aiming for power, in his worldly attitude.

Scene ii. De Laubardemont joins Mannoury and Adam and announces that Grandier is condemned and will shortly be there. He made something of an impression in court, but Father Barré explained it was the Devil's doing. Grandier enters in full canonicals. Biretta and cape are removed and it is clear he is to be shaved, a process accomplished to a frenzied polyphonic pizzicato. De Laubardemont reminds them not to forget the eyebrows, and then instructs Mannoury to tear out his fingernails. The surgeon jibs and de Laubardemont orders Bontemps to complete the process, which he does to a chatter and then a howl of orchestral pain.

Scene iii. A public place. A large number of people watch the Clerk of the Court read out the sentence. With a rope round his neck and a two-pound taper in his hand, Grandier is to ask pardon of God, the King and Justice. Next, he shall be tied to a stake and burnt alive. Before sentence is carried out, he will be subjected to the Question, both Ordinary and Extraordinary. Grandier himself is visible, his hands tied behind his back. De Laubardemont snatches the hat and cap from Grandier's head and the priest is revealed, shaven even to the eyebrows, a bald fool. He calls on God to witness that he has never been a sorcerer and to allow his suffering to atone for his vain and disordered life. Sympathy seems to be turning towards him and de Laubardemont orders the Captain of the Guard to clear the place. He urges Grandier to confess his guilt and sign a confession. Grandier refuses – how can he sign a lie? De Laubardemont threatens him, and says that under torture he will think, first, how can man do this to man; then, how can God allow it; and then, there can be no God. Grandier still refuses to sign.

Scene iv. Jeanne comes in, dressed in a simple white undergarment and with a rope round her neck. Others persuade her that it is too hot for her out of doors and take the rope gently away from her.

Scene v. Barré tries to extract a confession, but Grandier asks him whether he thinks that a man, to save himself pain, should confess to a crime he has not committed. De Laubardemont joins in the attempt to get a confession, Grandier between screams prays to God. At the same time, Mère Jeanne, whose praying voice has been heard throughout, and the nuns sing a litany. Grandier faints. Barré says that the fact that there is no confession means that the Devil has made him quite insensible to pain, but Mannoury asks what the shouts and screams can have been about.

Scene vi. The procession. As in Jeanne's vision at the start, Grandier is seated on a chair which has been lashed to a litter and is carried by four soldiers.

Scene vii. Outside St Peter's church, the procession stops and Ambrose attempts to console Grandier, who kisses his hand. The procession goes on to St Ursula's convent, where a soldier lifts him from the litter so that he collapses. When the Prioress and some other nuns emerge, de Laubardemont demands that Grandier shall ask their pardon but he says he can only ask that God shall forgive them their sins. The Prioress says that she has heard so often of Grandier's beauty which she can now behold with her own eyes, but Grandier answers: 'Look at this thing which I am, and learn what love means.' The procession reaches the site of the execution and Grandier is bound to the stake. De Laubardemont and Barré still try vainly to get him to confess, and when Barré gives him the kiss of peace, there is a shout of 'Judas!' from the crowd. In his fury, Barré snatches up a torch and ignites the pile before the soldiers have had a chance of strangling the victim, a form of relative mercy customary at the time. As the opera ends, Jeanne can be seen in silent prayer.

H.

PEPUSCH, JOHANN (JOHN) CHRISTOPH

see under Gay

GIOVANNI PERGOLESI

(born 4 January 1710, died 16 March 1736)

LA SERVA PADRONA

The Maidservant turned Mistress

Intermezzo in two parts, text by G.A. Federico. First performed at the Teatro di S. Bartolomeo in Naples, 28 August 1733, with Laura Monti and Gioacchino Corrado. The intermezzo was played in between the three acts of Pergolesi's serious opera Il Prigioniero Superbo. First performed in London, 1750; in Baltimore, 1790. Revivals: Lyric, Hammersmith, 1919; Mercury Theatre, London, 1939; Metropolitan, New York, 1935, with Editha Fleischer and Louis d'Angelo, and 1942, with Bidu Sayao and Salvatore Baccaloni; Paris, 1957, with Elena Rizzieri, Paolo Pedani; Royal Festival Hall, London, 1959, with Rizzieri and Bruscantini; Piccola Scala, Milan, 1961, with Mariella Adani and Montarsolo.

UbertoBass
Serpina, *his servant*Soprano
Vespone, *another servant*Mute

Running Time: 50 minutes

Pergolesi was born near Ancona and died, very young, near Naples. He was a prolific composer of chamber music, sacred music (including the well-known Stabat Mater), and operas both serious and comic. La Serva Padrona has been his most frequently performed stage work, and the freshness of the music takes on added interest when it is remembered that the opera was at the very centre of the famous 'Querelle des Bouffons' in Paris. The production of La Serva Padrona by an Italian company in 1752 confirmed the division of French musicians and intellectuals into two camps, the one favouring Italian opera, the other French. The Nationalists were known as the 'King's Corner' party, their opponents, who included Rousseau and the Encyclopedists, as the 'Queen's Corner' party. The Nationalists admired Lully (a French composer born Italian!) and the ageing Rameau, the Bouffonists hated what they thought of as the outmoded complexity of French composers. La Serva Padrona had one hundred performances at the Opéra before, in 1753, it was transferred to the Comédie-Française, where it had ninety-six more.

La Serva Padrona is on a small scale, the orchestra consisting only of a quartet of strings. The work comprises an overture, and two separate intermezzi, each of which includes an aria for both characters and a duet. The overture is a lively piece, and the curtain rises to find Uberto dressing to go out and lamenting that he has had to wait three hours for his chocolate, which has still not arrived. His energetic complaints at the time he is kept waiting are expressed in an aria of a less formal type than the others in the score, each of which is in da capo form. His reproaches are directed more specifically at Serpina his maid in the ensuing recitative. However, when it comes to complaints he is no match for her, and after she has finished with her master, she turns on Vespone and sends him briskly about his business. Uberto's aria, 'Sempre in contrasti', is a skittish tune, typical of the score, and demanding more than a little agility from the singer. Serpina tells Uberto that it is much too late for him to go out, and lectures him again in her allegretto aria, 'Stizzoso, mio stizzoso'. Uberto can bear the tyranny no longer, and asks Vespone to go and find him a wife. An excellent idea, says Serpina: take me! In a duet, she protests her eligibility and he his intention of, if possible, ridding himself of her altogether (but he confesses to himself that the situation looks like becoming too much for him).

The second Intermezzo opens with recitative in which Serpina plans a trick to frighten or cajole Uberto into marrying her. Vespone shall help, and she tells Uberto that she has found a husband for herself, a soldier, by name Captain Tempest. She describes his bad temper and his unreasonable nature, and then in a pathetic aria, 'A Serpina penserete', expresses her hope that she will not be entirely forgotten when she has gone. She seems a different woman, but the moment she sees a change come over her employer's face, the tempo of the music changes too, and we see that it is with the same old Serpina that we have to deal. By the end of the aria, Uberto has taken her by the hand, and she feels her plan is working well. Uberto is in a thorough muddle, and does not know what to think. His E flat aria, 'Son imbrogliato io già', makes clear that he cannot make up his mind whether he is sorry for Serpina or now finds himself in love with her. It is a mixture of buffo and mock serious, and its slow refrain,

'Uberto, pensa a te', indicates a very different mood from what we saw at the beginning of the opera.

Serpina returns, bringing with her Vespone dressed up as the gallant captain, and looking as though he would blow up at the least provocation but still, as hitherto, without a word to say to anyone. Uberto is horrified by his disagreeable exterior and by his no less alarming behaviour. Is this a suitable husband for Serpina? She says that the Captain demands a substantial dowry; if it is not forthcoming he will under no circumstances marry her, but he will insist that Uberto himself takes his place. No sooner is the betrothal between master and maid concluded, than Vespone whips off his moustaches and military disguise. Uberto's protests are in vain, and in the concluding duet, he admits that he is in love, and all seems set for the future, with Serpina happily installed as prospective mistress of the house. H.

HANS PFITZNER

(born 5 May 1869, died 22 May 1949)

Pfitzner was a brilliant if reactionary musician, capable on the one hand as a young répétiteur of going on stage suddenly and without error as Beckmesser to save a performance of Meistersinger (without rehearsal – and without need of make-up, his enemies urged), and on the other of an attempt to discredit Berg and his musical intellectualism by an angry and public claim that an inspiration such as 'Träumerei' was a miracle and incapable of analysis (Berg's answer was a cool and scholarly study of Schumann's music). He wrote three operas before Palestrina, considered to be his masterpiece, and one of the ironies of operatic history is Pfitzner's far-sighted if embittered prediction in mid-war of the wranglings and miseries of the eventual peace negotiations which must inevitably follow its end.

PALESTRINA

Opera in three acts, text by the composer. Première Munich, 12 June 1917, with Karl Erb, Feinhals, Brodersen, Bender, Gustav Schützendorf, Ivogün, conductor Bruno Walter. First professional British production 1997 at Covent Garden, with Thomas Moser, conductor Christian Thielemann. Famous followers of Erb in the title role have been Julius Patzak, Josef Witt, Fritz Wunderlich and Peter Schreier.

I. Singers

Pope Pius IV Bass
Giovanni Morone, Papal legate Baritone
Bernardo Novagerio, Papal legate Tenor
Cardinal Christoph Madruscht Bass

Carlo Borromeo, Cardinal from Rome Baritone
Cardinal of Lorraine Bass
Abdisu, Patriarch of Assyria Tenor
Anton Brus von Müglitz, Archbishop of Prague Bass
Count Luna, envoy from the King of Spain Baritone
Bishop of Budoja, Italian Bishop Tenor
Theophilus of Imola, Italian Bishop Tenor
Avosmediano, Bishop of Cadiz Bass-Baritone
Giovanni Pierluigi Palestrina Tenor
Ighino, his son, aged fifteen Soprano
Silla, his pupil, aged seventeen Mezzo-Soprano
Bishop Ercole Severolus, master-of-ceremonies at Council of Trent Bass-Baritone
Five Singers from Chapel of Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome Two Tenors, Three Bases
Chorus Singers from Papal Chapel, Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Ambassadors, Envoys, Theologians, Servants, Soldiers, People

II. Silent Characters

Two Papal Nuncios, Jesuits, Massarelli, Bishop of Thelesia, Secretary of Council, Giuseppe, Old Servant of Palestrina

III. Singing Apparitions

Apparition of Lucretia, Palestrina's dead wife Contralto
Apparitions of Nine Dead Composers Tenors, Baritones, Bases
Three Angelic Voices Soprano
Angels Chorus

Place: Rome; Trent at the End of the Council of Trent
Time: November–December 1563
Running Time: 3 hours 30 minutes

Act I. A solemn prelude leads straight into the action which is laid in a room in Palestrina's house. Silla, Palestrina's pupil, is trying over one of his own compositions on the viol (in the last bars of the prelude, this is suggested in the orchestra by two solo violas). Ighino comes in, looking sad. He is worried by the look of unhappiness on his father's face; has Silla not noticed it? Palestrina's pupil admits he can see little wrong with his master, nor can he imagine why he should be unhappy. But Ighino pours out his feelings: fame has brought his father little; he has been desperately lonely ever since the loss of his wife, and has written nothing. His life in fact seemed to come to an end with her death.

Palestrina comes into the room with Cardinal Borromeo, and the two boys leave. The Cardinal is astonished at the music he heard when they came in (Silla was practising his song again), and he asks Palestrina whether he likes that kind of thing. It is perhaps the new music, the music of the future, replies the master. Borromeo admits that Palestrina's attitude of world-weariness, of submission to the new tendencies, makes him impatient. Without him, what is church music to become? He goes into further detail: his object in coming secretly to Palestrina's house is practical. The Council of Trent, which has been sitting these eighteen years, is now coming to an end. Pope Pius was originally not content with reforming the abuses of church music, but wished to return to Gregorian chant and consign to the flames all other sacred music. Only he – Borromeo – resisted this reactionary view, but he had an ally in the Emperor, who opposed so drastic a change. The case is now won, but has yet to be proved: this can only be done if a Mass is written by a contemporary composer of such calibre as to convince the Pope and his Council. Such a work would be a model for future composers, and would secure the future of church music. It is Palestrina's duty to write it!

But Palestrina regretfully says that he is not the right man for the task. Neither the Cardinal's scorn nor his raging nor his pleas are sufficient; Palestrina still insists that even an artist's powers can grow old. Borromeo's anger overflows, and in the end he accuses the composer of blasphemy. He leaves the room in ungovernable fury. Palestrina is moved by what he has seen and heard: there goes my last friend, is his comment. As he muses on the uncertainty of men's conditions and the mysteries of life, looking sadly at the portrait of his dead wife, he is surrounded by a vision of the composers of the past. He recognises them as his predecessors, and they remind him of his youth, when he first came to know them. They encourage him, and tell him that his ultimate duty is not yet accomplished.

As Palestrina's aversion to composition seems to weaken, the ghosts of the composers watch with an interest that is almost knowing; these are the growing pains once familiar to them all! With Palestrina's resistance overcome, they gradually disappear, but immediately he starts to hear the voices of angels, which dictate his Mass to him. At the height of his inspiration, Palestrina sees the ghost of his wife, Lucretia, who appears to him as she had in life, bringing a message of peace, the peace for which he has longed ever since her death. This scene of the dictation of the Mass is the crux of the opera. It is perhaps sufficient praise to say that it succeeds in giving an impression of an artist's exaltation at the moment of creation.

It is dawn, the angel voices die away, the bells of Rome can be heard in the distance, and Palestrina sinks down exhausted. The floor of the room is covered with music-paper, and, when Silla and Ighino come for their morning lesson, they are overjoyed to see that the master has spent the night working. They gather up the sheets of music, and gradually realise that an entire Mass has been written in a single night. As the curtain falls, Silla wonders whether anything written so quickly can possibly add to the master's fame.

Act II. The agitated prelude is in strong contrast to what preceded the first act. The scene is in the great hall in the palace of Cardinal Madruscht at Trent, where preparations are almost complete for renewal of the conference. Cardinal Novagerio makes fun of the farce which always attends the Spanish delegate's efforts to obtain his rightful precedence, and a little later takes the opportunity of warning the servants, who are all of different nationalities, that they will be severely punished if they again start to quarrel in the streets.

Borromeo arrives, and there is a fairly lengthy political discussion between him and Novagerio. Novagerio congratulates Borromeo on the way he has managed the question of church music, but Borromeo reveals that he has been unsuccessful in getting Palestrina to write the Mass he needs. He has had him thrown into prison, but doubts whether the work can be ready in time, even if jail were to break Palestrina's self-imposed silence. Novagerio suggests that there are ways to force men to bend to the will of their masters, but Borromeo starts back in horror at the implication of his remarks.

The other delegates begin to arrive, the Italians suspicious of the Germans, the Spaniards commenting on the Italians who, they say, swarm over the place like ants. Some talk in an indignant way of heretics, others are more concerned over whether or not their expenses to and from the conference will be paid by their diocese. The master-of-ceremonies, Bishop Ercole Severolus, announces that the conference is about to begin and invites the delegates to take their places in proper order of precedence. This done, they are addressed by Morone, the papal legate, who prays that wisdom may attend their deliberations and inform their decisions. He calls down a malediction on all heretics, in which the entire conference joins, apart, that is to say, from the liberal-minded but boorish Bishop of Budoja, who makes the mistake of praying that they may be enlightened rather than destroyed, and gets a number of dirty looks from his fellow-delegates.

Discussion begins on the subject of the musical side of the church service. The Pope's approval is dependent on a work being written which satisfies ritual considerations. Borromeo announces that such a Mass is being written, and that Palestrina is the composer. The business of the conference proceeds, but points of order seem to be preferred for discussion to points of doctrine. The Spanish envoy objects to the speed at which business is being transacted, and his quarrelsome attitude provokes opposition from a number of delegates based on precedence and the exalted position he has claimed as his by right. Some sense of responsibility returns when the Bishop of Budoja shouts at the top of his voice that peace is the last thing likely to be obtained by such a conference divided against itself, but the meeting again degenerates into nationalist quarrelling and, after quelling the shouts, Morone decides to end the session. He calls the delegates for the afternoon, but warns them that the co-operation of them all, and not least of the Spanish envoy, will be needed if this last session of the conference is to accomplish the task set before it.

As soon as the delegates have gone, not without some more sharp remarks, the Spanish servants gather together and mutter that their delegate has been insulted, and it is not long before a free fight develops between the servants. Madruscht appears with soldiers at his back; seeing the disorder, he commands them to open fire and bids them to take any survivors they can catch to the torture chambers. No one shall thus defile the Church's Council with unseemly conduct.

Act III. Palestrina's room as in Act I. The composer is sitting in his chair, barely visible to the audience. Five singers from the chapel stand round him, and Ighino is kneeling by his side. The singers express concern for Palestrina's condition, and when he wakes from his trance, he does not seem to recognise them, though they are from his own choir. He asks Ighino why they are waiting and gazing at him. His son tells him that at that very moment his Mass is being sung at the Pope's Palace. He seems not to grasp the significance of this, but refers to being asked some question about it in prison. The others remind him that they gathered together the pages of the Mass he wrote and that they were subsequently taken away from them.

Suddenly there is a noise from the street, and the people can be heard crying: 'Long life to Palestrina, saviour of music!' People crowd into the room, asking for the master, Palestrina, and saying that the Pope has given it as his opinion that the new Mass is Palestrina's best work. The Pope himself is coming to congratulate him! The Holy Father makes his entrance, followed by his Cardinals, among them Borromeo, and tells Palestrina of the enormous impression his Mass has made on them all. He must remain in his service until the end of his life.

The Pope leaves, blessing Palestrina and his singers. The Cardinals follow the Pope, all, that is, except Borromeo, who makes a sign to the singers to leave him alone with Palestrina. They look at each other for a moment, then with a cry Borromeo falls on his knees in front of the composer, who puts his hands gently on the Cardinal's head. Palestrina raises the Cardinal to his feet and they stay for a moment in an embrace, before the Cardinal goes quickly from the room.

Ighino, who has watched the scene from concealment, rushes out to ask his father if he is not the happiest man in the world. Maybe, says his father, but he is old and shows his happiness less demonstratively than Ighino. Where is Silla, he asks. He guesses he has gone to Florence, and Ighino confirms his impression. There is more acclamation for Palestrina from outside, and he bids his son laugh and dance and sing if he wants to. He himself remains alone in his room.

He goes quietly towards the portrait of his wife, Lucretia, then walks to his organ and plays softly. The crowd is still below, shouting praises to his name, and with these sounds in his ears, the curtain falls. H.

NICCOLÒ PICCINNI

(born 16 January 1728, died 7 May 1800)

Piccinni was a prolific and successful composer, initially of comic operas, later of more serious works, but his career suffered more than one undeserved setback. In Rome, he lost favour when a lesser composer, Pasquale Anfossi, was precipitated to fame at his expense; in Paris his engagement as a counter-attraction to Gluck produced intense rivalries, more between the 'Gluckistes' and the 'Piccinnistes' than between the composers themselves but heated nonetheless. Both Salieri and Sacchini after Gluck's death threatened Piccinni's standing in Paris, but Piccinni was sufficiently generous apparently to speak at Sacchini's funeral and to propose a concert in Gluck's memory.

'Author of the first real "opera buffa", Cecchina', wrote Verdi to his librettist Arrigo Boito in 1887 when recommending Piccinni as a composer to be studied by the students of the newly established school of choral singing. Verdi presumably set aside in his mind not only a whole host of Neapolitan intermezzi as not sufficiently structured either musically or in plot to qualify, as well as more developed works like Pergolesi's grander operas such as Lo Frate 'nnamorato. Certainly, La buona Figliuola is an opera of rare quality, a happy discovery for those who do not know it and hear it for the first time.

LA BUONA FIGLIUOLA

(Cecchina)

The Good Maid

Opera in three acts, libretto by Polisseno Fegejo, after Carlo Goldoni, whose text was founded on Richardson's Pamela or Virtue Rewarded. Première, Rome, 6 February 1760, and thereafter all over Italy. It reached Vienna in 1764, London in 1766, Berlin in 1768, Paris in 1771. Revived Rome, 1942; la Scala, 1951, with Carteri, Noni, Aimaro, Prandelli, Taddei, Bruscantini; Buxton Festival, 1985; Martina Franca, 1990, with Maria Angeles Peters, Alessandra Ruffini, Giuseppe Morino, Bruno Praticò.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Marchesa Lucinda | Soprano |
| Cavaliere Armidoro | Soprano |
| Cecchina, the gardener | Soprano |
| Sandrina, a peasant | Soprano |
| Paoluccia, a maid | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Marchese della Conchiglia | Tenor |
| Tagliaferro, a German soldier | Baritone |
| Mengotto, a peasant | Bass |

Place: The Marchese's Palace

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Act I. Cecchina is happy working in the Marchesa's garden, but can't help wondering about her origins, which are shrouded in mystery. Mengotto is in love with her, but she fancies the Marchese for whom she works but whose mildest advances inspire in her nothing but fear. He tries to get Sandrina to put in a word for him, but Sandrina once thought the Marchese was interested in her, is now after Mengotto herself and so only too keen where Cecchina is concerned to put the boot in. Much to that young gentleman's disgust, she tells Cavaliere Armidoro, engaged to the Marchese's sister Lucinda, that the Marchese's eye has lit on Cecchina, a nobody and a foreigner to boot. Once Lucinda learns of the situation, she loses no time in telling Cecchina, to the girl's distress, that she has found her a good situation elsewhere.

The Marchese has in fact already told his sister that he loves Cecchina, but the poor girl is stopped as she is about to leave by none other than Mengotto, who offers his love. The Marchese finds them together, suspects the worst and rejects Cecchina. Mengotto, jealous in his turn, does the same.

Act II. The Marchese would call the unfortunate Cecchina back, but, on the instructions of Cavaliere Armidoro, she is being escorted out of the town. Mengotto and his friends free her, but the Marchese intervenes. Mengotto laments but is restrained by Tagliaferro, a German soldier sent, he says, to search for a particular girl. Tagliaferro offers to enroll Mengotto. Lucinda hears Cecchina is still in the city, and Paoluccia and Sandrina assure her she is with the Marchese himself. Cecchina once again rejects the Marchese.

Tagliaferro tells the Marchese that twenty years before, when the Germans were retreating from Italy, his Colonel lost his daughter, by name Mariandel. She has a blue mark on her breast and he is convinced, without much evidence it must be admitted, that Cecchina is in fact Mariandel. They find her asleep, the Marchese withdraws and Tagliaferro stands guard. Cecchina dreams of her father, but Paoluccia and Sandrina put the worst interpretation on the scene and report it immediately to the Marchese, only in their turn to be seen off with contumely.

Act III. Paoluccia is not finished and makes her report to Marchesa Lucinda and Cavaliere Armidoro. The Marchese announces his betrothal to a noble German lady, much to the satisfaction of Tagliaferro. The Marchese teases Cecchina with his planned engagement to the foreigner, then admits that the fiancée he has in mind is none other than her! Mengotto has to make do with Sandrina, and all are offered proof that Cecchina is none other than the long-lost Mariandel.

Piccinni displays fertile invention in shapely arias of all types (more than twenty of them) and witty ensembles. His music, whether romantic or vigorous, is consistently lively and inventive, always elegantly turned, whether to express the ardour of the Marchese, the more high-flown, generalised emotions of the Cavaliere, or the larger-scale coloratura resolve of Marchesa Lucinda. In contrast, we have the gentle, highly expressive lyricism of Cecchina, the hand-wringing of Mengotto, a kind of up-beat Masetto, and the mock heroics of Tagliaferro, a true Sergeant Belcore before his time – all put forward in music of ingratiating quality. H.

AMILCARE PONCHIELLI

(born 31 August 1834, died 17 January 1886)

LA GIOCONDA

The Ballad Singer

Opera in four acts, text by Arrigo Boito (under the pseudonym of Tobia Gorrio). Première at la Scala, Milan, 8 April 1876, with Mariani, Biancolini-Rodriguez, Barlani-Dini, Gayarre, Aldighieri, Maini.

La Gioconda, *a ballad singer*Soprano

La Cieca, *her blind mother*Contralto

Enzo Grimaldo, *a Genoese nobleman*Tenor

Alvise Badoero, one of the heads of the State Inquisition Bass

Laura, *his wife*Mezzo-Soprano

Barnaba, *a spy for the Inquisition*Baritone

Zuane, *a boatman*Bass

Isèpo, *a public letter-writer*Tenor

A PilotBass

Monks, Senators, Sailors, Ladies, Gentlemen,
Masquers etc.

Place: Venice

Time: Seventeenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Ponchielli, some twenty years younger than Verdi, struggled initially to establish a toe-hold in the world of Italian opera. His breakthrough was with a revised version of his first work, I promessi sposi, but his one claim to worldwide success came at the age of rather over forty with La Gioconda. He became Professor in Milan, where Puccini was his pupil and, briefly, Mascagni.

Act I. The courtyard of the Doge's Palace decorated for a popular festivity. The prelude puts forward la Cieca's aria from Act I, later used to express the indebtedness she and la Gioconda feel towards Laura. The populace sings in festive mood before leaving to watch the regatta, leaving Barnaba to observe Gioconda lead on her blind mother (trio). Barnaba lusts after Gioconda, who has more than once rejected his advances. She for her part loves Enzo, a nobleman proscribed by the Venetian authorities and now clandestinely in the city in the guise of a sea captain. (To complete the amorous tangle, it should be noted that Enzo is still in love with Laura, to whom he was betrothed until she was obliged to marry the much older Alvise.)

Barnaba again makes advances to Gioconda who runs off, leaving her mother a prey to Barnaba's machinations. Opportunity arises when the crowd returns from the regatta with the winner and the loser, Zuane, to whom Barnaba suggests that his defeat was caused by the witchcraft of the old blind woman sitting silently by the steps. His friends help him drag her from the church steps and only the intervention of Enzo ('Assassini!') saves her from the mob. Alvise comes down the great stairs of the palace with Laura, who is masked and who demands justice for the old blind woman. Alvise orders her release and in her gratitude she gives Laura her most cherished possession, a rosary ('A te questo rosario').

Barnaba meanwhile has observed Laura and Enzo exchange meaningful glances. Once the crowd has left, with an eye to the main chance he taxes Enzo with his true identity ('Enzo Grimaldo, Principe di Santaflor') and, in a justly renowned tenor-baritone duet, explains that he will bring Laura to Enzo's ship so that they may elope together, thus incidentally advancing his own cause with Gioconda. Enzo departs and Barnaba summons one of his tools, Isèpo, the public scribe, and dictates a letter anonymously informing Alvise of the situation. Gioconda overhears but does not know who the letter is addressed to, and Barnaba drops it into the Lion's Mouth, the infamous method of anonymous denunciation to the state spying system. 'O monumento' is his soliloquy, a dry run one might think for Iago's Credo eleven years later, also with words by Boito. The act ends with the crowd dancing, and a prayer from the church, during which Gioconda laments Enzo's unfaithfulness.

Act II. The deck of Enzo's ship. Sailors sing and Barnaba, with his net laid out for Enzo and Laura, has a fisherman's ballad, 'Ah, pescator affonda l'esca'. Enzo comes on deck to sing one of the two most famous numbers of the opera, 'Cielo e mar', which testifies to his love for Laura, who, ferried by Barnaba, is quickly on the scene. Their love is expressed at first almost formally, as Enzo urges her to put fear behind her ('Deh! non turbare'). She tells him she recognised him instantly in front of the palace, and he again enjoins confidence ('Deh! non tremar'), until their voices combine in a passionate duet, 'Laggiù, nelle nebbie remote'.

Enzo leaves to prepare their elopement, and Gioconda steals on board to confront her rival, who sings what is the most dramatic number of the score: 'L'amo come il fulgor del creato', a high point of the Italian mezzo-soprano's repertory. Gioconda points to Alvise's armed followers approaching in a boat and is about to stab Laura when she sees la Cieca's rosary round her neck. Instantly, she changes plan and bundles Laura into a boat to safety, thwarting Barnaba of his prey and confronting Enzo when he returns. Seeing Alvise's men approaching, he impulsively sets fire to his ship.

Act III. A room in Alvise's palace. Alvise plans vengeance ('Sì! morir ella de!'), and instructs Laura in a powerful scene to take poison before the serenade heard outside has finished. He has reckoned without Gioconda, who, to save her mother's saviour, has hidden in the palace and now exchanges a powerful sleeping draught for the poison. Laura takes it, Alvise finds the empty phial and believes his orders carried out.

A great hall in the palace. Alvise receives guests for whose benefit is performed the greatly popular Dance of the Hours. Barnaba drags in la Cieca, whom he has found hiding in the house and who says she comes to pray for the recently dead. Barnaba whispers to Enzo that her prayers are for Laura, and when the passing bell is heard, Enzo leads a great ensemble, 'Già ti veggo immota e smorta' at whose end Laura is revealed lying in state and apparently dead.

Act IV. A room in a ruined palace on the Giudecca island. Two men carry the body of Laura into Gioconda's dwelling. She has bargained with Barnaba to give herself to him in return for Enzo's release from prison, and for a moment in a dramatic soliloquy – a 'terrible song' it has been called – she contemplates suicide: 'Suicidio!' Enzo enters and Gioconda excites his rage by telling him she has had Laura's body removed from the burial vault, where he will no longer find it. He threatens her with a knife when the voice of Laura, waking from her narcotic, is heard. Both Laura and Enzo pour out words of gratitude before they leave and Gioconda is once more alone. The thought of her bargain with Barnaba spurs her to escape, but the spy himself appears in her doorway. He starts to work up a passion ('Ebbrezza! delirio!') as she adorns herself with stage jewellery, but she seizes an opportunity and stabs herself fatally with a dagger. 'You wanted my body, you demon. My body you shall have!' she screams at him, and is dead before he can shout into her deaf ears: 'Last night your mother offended me. I strangled her!'

La Gioconda is Ponchielli's only significant operatic success. Given the relative operatic famine in Italy after Verdi's Aida (1871) – his next opera would be Otello (1887), with Puccini's Manon Lescaut not until 1893 – its initial popularity is perhaps not surprising. One may still find the over-ripe romanticism, not to say obscurity, of the book to a considerable extent compensated by the luscious tunes and skilful pacing of Ponchielli's score.

H.

FRANCIS POULENC

(born 7 January 1899, died 30 January 1963)

LES MAMELLES DE TIRÉSIAS

The Breasts of Tiresias

Opéra-bouffe in a prologue and two acts, text by Guillaume Apollinaire. Première Opéra-Comique, Paris, 3 June 1947, with Denise Duval, Paul Payen, conductor Albert Wolff. First performed in U.S.A. at Brandeis University, Mass., 1953; New York, 1957, with Duval, Singher; in England, at Aldeburgh Festival, 1958, with Jennifer Vyvyan, Peter Pears; Leeds, 1978, with Joy Roberts, Stuart Harling; English National Opera, 1979, with Norma Burrowes, Emile Belcourt.

| | |
|-----------------------------------|--------------------|
| The Director of the Theatre | Baritone |
| Thérèse | Soprano |
| Her Husband | Tenor ¹ |
| Monsieur Lacouf..... | Tenor |
| Monsieur Presto | Baritone |
| The Gendarme..... | Baritone |
| The Newspaper Vendor | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Reporter from Paris | Tenor |
| The Son | Baritone |

Members of the audience

| | |
|---------------------------|---------------|
| An Elegant Lady | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Woman | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Bearded Gentleman | Bass |

People of Zanzibar

Place: Zanzibar, an Imaginary Town on the French Riviera, between Nice and Monte Carlo

Time: 1910

Running Time: 55 minutes

'Chabrier', said Francis Poulenc, '... is my true grandfather', and Chabrier, for all his devotion to Wagner, derives some of the flavour of his unique talent from a deliberate cultivation of a robust vulgarity, as evidenced in for instance the overblown music-hall tunes of España, a masterpiece and musically a product of some sort of nostalgie de la boue. With this musical adherence and his admiration for Guillaume Apollinaire, many of whose poems he had already set, it is not surprising that Poulenc's first opera is a tearaway farce. Les Mamelles de Tirésias, says Edward Lockspeiser, 'unites the worlds of surrealism and the music-hall. In his introduction to this fantasy on the change of sexes which, incidentally, he wrote for an intensely serious purpose – Apollinaire believed that the French were neglecting the act of love – he has this to say on the origin of the ¹ In the printed score and in the Paris performances of 1947 (and some subsequently abroad), the Husband was sung by a baritone; the composer later revised the role for a tenor.

Surrealist movement: "When man wanted to imitate walking, he invented the wheel, which has no connection whatever with a leg. This was an unconscious surrealist example."

Other early influences on the composer were the eccentric and talented Erik Satie, and the other composers irrationally joined together with him by contemporary criticism as Les Six: Auric, Milhaud, Durey, Tailleferre and Honegger.

Apollinaire's drama was written in 1903 but produced only in 1917. Poulenc finished his first opera in 1945 and it was given at the Opéra-Comique in June 1947, after a preparatory period, the composer used to say, which proved the effectiveness of its motto, 'Français, faites des enfants', since the first two sopranos entrusted with the leading role had to relinquish it on account of pregnancy.

Prologue. There is a quiet orchestral introduction and the curtain rises to reveal the theatre director, who appeals directly to the audience in calm, measured, serious tones: 'Public,¹ attendez sans impatience, je vous apporte une pièce dont le but est de réformer les mœurs. Il s'agit des enfants dans la famille ...' (My friends, your indulgence! We will present you an opera which will try to reform your way of life).² His description of what the audience is going to see touches frenzy before returning to the serious tones of the start and the work's motto: 'Et faites des enfants, vous qui n'en faisiez guère' (You must make babies now as you never have before). It is the opera's most extended musical structure and the music is without a hint of irony.

Act I. The curtain rises to reveal the main square of Zanzibar, complete with houses, café, a view of the port – Zanzibar appears to lie somewhere between Nice and Monte Carlo. With the entrance of the charming and energetic Thérèse, the musical mood changes completely to one of bustle and farce. She announces herself feminist, refuses to submit to her husband's desires, wants to be a soldier. His cries from the house – 'Donnez-moi du lard' (Let me have my meat) – only inspire her to a denunciation of love and further proclamations of ambition. At this moment her breasts seem anxious to escape from their owner, she opens her blouse (on a top C) and they escape, two children's balloons attached to her now only by the strings. After celebrating their beauty in a slow waltz, she reflects that they are a cause of sin and she will get rid of them – 'Débarrassons-nous de nos mamelles'. She feels her beard sprouting, and congratulates herself on the discovery in a brisk paso doble.

The husband emerges, a bouquet of flowers in his hands, assumes that what appears to be a stranger in Thérèse's clothing has murdered his wife, but is disillusioned by Thérèse's announcement that she will in future be known as Tirésias. Thérèse-Tirésias disappears into the house and drum rolls accompany the descent from the window of intimate household objects.

A polka starts up and a couple of drunks, Presto the fat one and Lacouf the thin one, come out of the café. In the friendliest possible way they quarrel, arrange a duel and happily shoot each other. It is left to Thérèse, now dressed in the height of masculine fashion, and her husband, disguised as a rather untidy housewife, to mourn the loss of these two worthy citizens, an activity in which the inhabitants of Zanzibar solemnly join.

Quick music and a drum roll precede the appearance of the husband and the gendarme, the latter of whom theoretically pursues crime but seems to prefer to pay court to the husband, whom he takes for a female, to the latter's undisguised mockery.

In an arietta, the husband explains to the gendarme, whom he addresses as 'Fameux représentant de tout autorité', that he feels it essential that Zanzibar should have children and, if women refuse to provide them, he will.

The first half ends with a scene of considerable vivacity, a newspaper-seller denouncing a hoax, the husband assuring the gendarme that if he comes back that night he will show him that he has managed, single-handed as it were, to produce children; even Lacouf and Presto reappear apparently full of life. For the rapid stretta à la Rossini, the stage direction has the curtain descend until only the singers' legs are visible.

The Ravel-like entr'acte has a solemn opening before six mixed couples from the chorus dance a kind of farcical gavotte in front of the curtain.

Act II. The scene is filled with cradles. The husband is delighted with his success – forty thousand new children in a single day! – and the voices of the children echo their father's self-satisfaction. In comes a journalist, demanding to know the husband's secret and presuming that he must be very rich to afford so large a family. Not at all, returns the husband, but they should be able to support him once they are grown up. Impressed by the evidence of the husband's income, he tries to touch him for a small loan and is immediately – and literally – kicked out.

¹ Apollinaire's spelling.

² English translations by Robert Goss.

The husband seems to read (unaccompanied) a moral from the whole affair: the more children you have, the richer you'll be. He is contemplating further creative activities when he bumps into the gendarme, who remonstrates about the addition of over 40,000 inhabitants to the population of Zanzibar. How are they to be fed? With ration cards, suggests the husband; these can be obtained at the Cartomancienne's (fortune-teller's).

No sooner mentioned than this lady appears, her grandiose cadenzas accompanied on the lyre which she carries. The fortune-teller offers to tell everyone's future and counsels fecundity, revealing herself, when the husband tries to restrain her, as none other than Thérèse. The husband is delighted and even the gendarme revives. The only trouble is that her figure seems, much to her husband's dismay, no more ample than it had in her recent masculine manifestation. She makes light of the problem in a charming arietta and the husband joins her in a lazy, amorous waltz. The inhabitants provide them with vocal accompaniment, and the action ends with a stretta and then the moral: 'Ecoutez, O Français, les leçons de la guerre, et faites des enfants, vous qui n'en faisiez guère.'

H.

DIALOGUES DES CARMÉLITES

Dialogues of the Carmelites

Opera in three acts, libretto by Emmet Lavery from the drama by Georges Bernanos, itself inspired by a novel of Gertrude von Le Fort and a scenario of Rev. Fr. Bruckberger and Philippe Agostini. Première la Scala, Milan, 26 January 1957, with Virginia Zeani, Leyla Gencer, Gigliola Frazzoni, Eugenia Ratti, Gianna Pederzini, conductor Nino Sanzogno. First performed at Paris Opéra, 1957, with Denise Duval, Régine Crespin, Rita Gorr, Liliane Berton, Denise Scharley, conductor André Cluytens; Cologne, 1957; San Francisco, 1957, with Dorothy Kirsten, Leontyne Price, Blanche Thebom, Sylvia Stahlman, Claramae Turner, conductor Leinsdorf; London, Covent Garden, 1958, in English with Elsie Morison, Joan Sutherland, Sylvia Fisher, Jeanette Sinclair, Jean Watson, conductor Kubelik; Vienna, 1959, with Seefried, Zadek, Goltz, Rothenberger, Höngen, conductor Hollreiser; Metropolitan, 1977, in English with Maria Ewing, Shirley Verrett, Mignon Dunn, Betsy Norden, Régine Crespin, producer John Dexter.

Marquis de la Force Baritone
Chevalier de la Force, his son Tenor
Blanche de la Force, his daughter
(Sister Blanche of the Agony of Christ) Soprano
Thierry, a footman Baritone
Madame de Croissy, the Prioress
(Mother Henriette of Jesus) Contralto
Sister Constance of St Denis, a young novice Soprano
Mother Marie of the Incarnation, assistant prioress Mezzo-Soprano
M. Javelinot, a doctor Baritone
Madame Lidoine, the new Prioress
(Mother Marie of St Augustine) Soprano
Mother Jeanne of the Child Jesus Contralto
Sister Mathilde Mezzo-Soprano
Father Confessor of the Convent Tenor
First Commissary Tenor
Second Commissary Baritone
Officer Baritone
Jailer Baritone
Eleven Carmelites Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano,
Contralto

Officials of the Municipality, Officers, Policemen, Prisoners, Guards, Townspeople

Place: The Carmelite Convent at Compiègne; Paris

Time: Between April 1789 and Summer 1792

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

La Scala asked Poulenc for a new ballet score but were told the composer was thinking of writing an opera, whose première they immediately secured.

Even though the genesis of Bernanos's Dialogues des Carmélites is a story by a German writer and an idea for a film scenario by two Frenchmen (it was only the dialogue for this film that Bernanos was asked to supply), 'the psychology of fear which is the main theme of the Dialogues is treated in a way entirely characteristic of Bernanos; and the same is true of the interpretation offered in this play of the Communion of the Saints: "One does not die alone;

one dies for others and even in the place of others".¹

It is the great merit of Poulenc's setting of Bernanos's Dialogues that he preserves all the essential character of the original, that all the words are clearly audible, and that the result is compelling drama.

Act I, scene i. The library in the Paris house of the Marquis de la Force, April 1789. The Marquis is resting, but the Chevalier bursts in; rumour has it there is a mob about and his sister Blanche is out late in the carriage. The Marquis loses his calm as he remembers a ghastly incident of nearly twenty years before when his pregnant wife was jolted in her carriage by a mob and died in giving birth to Blanche. The Chevalier is particularly worried because of Blanche's impressionable, not to say morbid, nature, but when she comes in it is to say that the long and exhausting service that morning has tired her and she will go to bed. A moment later her scream is heard from the passage – she has unexpectedly caught sight of a lamp carried by a servant. It is more than a momentary fear that the shock releases in Blanche, and she formally and with no sign of panic asks her father's permission to join a Carmelite convent; how else is someone as nervous as she to find salvation?

Scene ii. The parlour of the Carmelite convent at Compiègne. The aged Prioress on one side of a screen interviews Blanche who sits on the other. When Blanche professes to be attracted even by the privations of the Order, the Prioress emphasises that prayer is the sole reason for the Carmelites' existence. Under her questioning Blanche breaks down in tears, but the Prioress softens towards her and asks her whether she has already chosen her religious name in case she is admitted to the Order; Blanche answers 'Sœur Blanche de l'Agonie du Christ'.

Scene iii. Blanche and Constance are busy with household work. Constance prattles away about her country upbringing, until Blanche snubs her levity with the reminder that the Prioress is lying near them gravely ill. Constance tries to get Blanche to join her in offering their lives to God in place of that of the old Prioress, but Blanche rejects the idea in an agony of fear. Constance tells her of a dream she has had that she and Blanche will die together.

Scene iv. The cell of the Prioress. The Prioress on her deathbed is obsessed with fear of death, and the Assistant Prioress, Mother Marie of the Incarnation, tries to give her strength. The Prioress entrusts to Mother Marie the care of Blanche, who comes in to say goodbye and is admonished to preserve her innocence of character through trust in God. Mother Marie begs her to concern herself only with God, but the Mother Superior reacts violently: 'Who am I, wretched as I am at this moment, to concern myself with Him? Let Him first concern Himself with me!' Nothing Mother Marie can do will restrain the flood of words that pours from her, and she sends a message that the Sisters cannot be allowed to see the Prioress. Blanche returns, the Prioress tries to speak to her, but falls dead.

Act II, scene i. The chapel of the convent. The body of the old Prioress lies in state. Blanche by herself makes a half-hearted attempt to pray and then rushes towards the door, where she is met by Mother Marie who leads her towards her cell; let her not talk about her failure – tomorrow it will fill her with sorrow, at present it can only cause her shame.

Blanche and Constance are taking flowers to the grave of the old Prioress. Constance wonders at the difficulty the old nun had found in dying; one would have said she had been given the wrong death by mistake, as if it had been someone else's coat in a cloakroom. Perhaps someone when it comes to their turn to die will find a better death than they deserve.

Scene ii. The hall of the chapter house. It is not Mother Marie who is chosen Prioress but a certain Madame Lidoine, from outside.² She speaks to the nuns in an aria, praising the old Prioress and bidding them at all times to remember their duty, which is to pray. Anything that may lure them from their duty, even the joy of martyrdom, is to be shunned. She leaves Mother Marie to finish the address, after which in a beautiful ensemble the nuns offer up an 'Ave Maria'.

The bell at the side door rings. It is the Chevalier de la Force asking to see his sister before he goes abroad.

Scene iii. The parlour of the convent. With a screen between them and with Mother Marie in the background, the Chevalier accuses Blanche of staying in the convent because of her fear of fear; Blanche forbids him to leave on a note of anger and

¹ Francis Poulenc by Henri Hell (1959).

² We are told that, as a matter of history, the inhibited and intense Mother Marie was an illegitimate daughter of the King, and that the choice of misunderstanding. It is an impressively tense scene and reveals in music much of the change that has come over Blanche since she joined the Order.

Madame Lidoine, daughter of a local tradesman, may have been considered advisable as a sop to the spirit of the time.

Scene iv. The sacristy of the convent. The Father Confessor has just finished saying what he tells the nuns is his last Mass. The priesthood has been proscribed and he must go into hiding. When Constance asks rhetorically if there are no men left in France, the Prioress says, 'When there are not priests enough, there will be plenty of martyrs.' Mother Marie seizes on her words: it is the duty of the daughters of Carmel to give their lives so that France may once again have priests. The Mother Superior firmly corrects her: it is not for them to decide if their names shall one day be inscribed among the martyrs.

The bell rings again violently, and a mob pours in. Two commissars announce the expulsion of the nuns from the convent. Mother Marie, now in charge, gets into an argument with the first Commissar, who takes her aside and reveals he was once a sacristan and is at heart a true servant of the Church. He leads the mob out.

Act III, scene i. The ruined chapel of the convent. As the Prioress is away, Mother Marie addresses the assembled nuns. She proposes that together they take a vow of martyrdom to save the order from harm. But, she says firmly, if the vote is not unanimous, the proposal shall be abandoned. Mother Marie announces that there is one voice against. Immediately Constance, to save Blanche from embarrassment, says that that vote was hers: she will retract, and thus they will be unanimous. Blanche and Constance as the youngest go first to take the vow. No sooner has Blanche passed the Father Confessor than she takes advantage of the general confusion to escape.

Outside the convent, an Officer congratulates the nuns, who leave in civilian costume, on their discipline and public spirit, but advises them that they will be watched. The Prioress wants to warn the Father Confessor against coming to celebrate Mass. Mother Marie reacts with smouldering violence: how can they reconcile this caution with their vow? The Prioress says that each is responsible before God as an individual, but she herself must answer for them all and she is old enough to know how to keep her accounts.

Scene ii. The ruined library in the Paris house of the Marquis de la Force. Blanche in peasant costume is cooking when Mother Marie arrives to tell her that she has come to fetch her. Blanche prevaricates and tells Mother Marie that her father was guillotined and she is now alone. Mother Marie gives her an address, where she will be safe and where she (Mother Marie) will wait for her until the following night. Blanche says that she cannot go, but Mother Marie is quietly confident.

In a street near the Bastille, Blanche hears that they have arrested all the members of the convent.

Scene iii. The prison of the Conciergerie. The Prioress tries to comfort the nuns at the end of their first night in prison; from now on, she will consider herself bound by their vow of martyrdom, though it was made in her absence. Constance is convinced that Blanche will return, because of a dream she has had. The Jailer announces the findings of the tribunal: it is death for each one of them.

Mother Marie hears of the death sentence from the Father Confessor. She must die with them, she says, but the Father Confessor suggests that this may not be the will of God.

Scene iv. The scaffold is prepared and the crowd watches as the Prioress leads in her little band of fourteen Carmelite followers. Singing the 'Salve Regina', one after another they mount the scaffold, and each time the guillotine drops there is one voice the fewer to sustain the singing. When Sister Constance is alone, she sees Blanche in the crowd, stops for an instant, then goes with renewed confidence to her death. Blanche takes up the chant, and with a new serenity follows her sisters to accomplish the vow they swore together. H.

LA VOIX HUMAINE

The Human Voice

Lyrical tragedy in one act, text by Jean Cocteau. Première, Opéra-Comique, Paris, 6 February 1959, with Denise Duval, conductor Georges Prêtre. First produced at la Scala, 1959; at New York's Carnegie Hall, 1959; by Glyndebourne Opera in Edinburgh, 1960, always with Denise Duval.

The Woman.....Soprano

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 40 minutes

The score of La Voix Humaine, Poulenc's third and last opera, is preceded by two pages of instructions. Jean Cocteau gives general directions about the setting and the action. The composer demands that the only role be taken by a young, elegant woman, since the story is far from being about an ageing woman deserted by her lover. After a rather precise word about the degree of freedom needed in the interpretation of the score, Poulenc emphasises that the whole work needs to be 'bathed in the greatest orchestral sensuality'. And it is, in anything like a good performance, since the transparency of instrumentation is something to marvel at, and it is the orchestra which must establish continuity which is by definition absent from a telephone conversation of which we hear only one side.

The subject is a woman abandoned by her lover. She has tried to commit suicide after he told her that he planned to get married next day, and we may suppose that this is the last time she will talk to him on the telephone. Hysteria is apparent in the orchestra from the start. Throughout, the woman veers between the certainties natural between people who have known each other a long time and the awed tones of familiarity ruined by too many and too explosive past confrontations, to say nothing of the fear that the other and now distant partner may hang up. She is by turns the betrayed lover and the restorer of trust. She is incoherent; she insists that the past was beautiful, at least in memory; she tells lies; she won't see, still less accept reality; she snatches at optimism when any half sentence half justifies it, she plays outrageously for sympathy. She is wounded, she suffers, she goes off the deep end, she calms herself. Finally it is over, the connection is broken and the receiver drops lifelessly – as she had once planned for herself – to the ground. The essential truths have never been spoken, only the social realities, the conventions, the banalities of such a situation; but with what accuracy they have been pinned to page and score!

The blend of snatches of lyricism with subtly inflected, always expressive, arioso is a most effective one. Poulenc's is an exquisitely sensitive setting of French words, as one would expect, and the short opera, in a sensitive performance, redeems an intrinsic sentimentality of situation. Nonetheless, Cocteau's monologue is very far from being a rhapsody and emerges as a strict piece of formal construction.

Perhaps the last word should be Cocteau's. 'Mon cher Francis, tu as fixé, une fois pour toutes, la façon de dire mon texte.'

H.

SERGEI SERGEYEVICH PROKOFIEV

(born 23 April 1891, died 5 March 1953)

THE GAMBLER

Igrok

Opera in four acts (six scenes), text (after Dostoevsky's novel, Igrok, 'The Gambler') by the composer. Première, Brussels, 29 April 1929, in a French translation by Paul Spaak, conducted by Corneil de Thoran. First performed in Italy, Naples, 1953, with Barbato, Gardino, Pirazzini, Annaloro, Sinimberghi, Tajo, conductor Scherchen; in Germany, Darmstadt, 1956; Belgrade, 1961, with Heybalova, Starč, Zarko Cvejč, conductor Danon; Edinburgh Festival, 1962, with Belgrade Company; Amsterdam, 1975 (in Dutch), with Jan Blinkhof; English National Opera, 1983 (in English), with Sally Burgess, Graham Clark, John Tomlinson, conductor Christian Badea (Amsterdam and English National Opera produced by David Pountney).

The General, a retired army officer (55)Bass
Pauline, his step-daughter.....Soprano

Alexey, tutor to the General's children (25)Tenor
'Babulenka', the General's rich aunt (75).....Mezzo-Soprano
The MarquisTenor
Mr Astley, a rich Englishman.....Baritone
Blanche, a demi-mondaine (25).....Contralto
Prince NilskyTenor
Baron Würmerhelm (45)Bass
Baroness WürmerhelmMute
Potapich, Babulenka's stewardBaritone

In the gambling scene

The DirectorBass
The First CroupierTenor
The Second CroupierTenor

| | |
|---|---------------|
| The Fat Englishman..... | Bass |
| The Tall Englishman..... | Bass |
| The Florid Lady..... | Soprano |
| The Pale Lady..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Respectable Old Lady..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Suspicious Old Lady..... | Contralto |
| A Heated Gambler..... | Tenor |
| A Gambler in Ill-Health..... | Tenor |
| A Hunch-Backed Gambler..... | Tenor |
| An Unlucky Gambler..... | Baritone |
| An Old Gambler..... | Bass |
| Six Gamblers (Two Tenors, Two Baritones, Two Bases) | |

The Head-Waiter, the Page-Boy; Babulenska's Three Servants; Gamblers, People staying in the Hotel, Servants, Porters

Place: The Imaginary Town of Roulettenburg

Time: 1865

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Prokofiev was fascinated by the theatre from the time his parents took him to Moscow when he was eight, and he wrote some half a dozen operas before the end of his student days, one of which (Maddalena; 1911, revised 1913) nearly reached the stage.¹ Albert Coates in the early days of the war was in the process of replacing Nápravník as head of the Mariinsky Theatre in St Petersburg, and plans to stage The Gambler in 1917 – the first opera on a subject by Dostoevsky – were only prevented by the Revolution. In 1927–28 Prokofiev revised the orchestration and rewrote certain passages which he had come to regard as ‘mere padding disguised by monstrous chords’, for another projected production (also for Leningrad), but again it came to nothing and the work received its première in Brussels a year later, and then languished a further twenty-four before again coming to the notice of the European opera houses.

The background of the opera is an imaginary German spa by the name of Roulettenburg, based on Wiesbaden. A retired Russian General waits for news that a rich relation (always referred to as Babulenska – Grandmama – but in reality his aunt) has died leaving him her fortune. With him are his young children, his step-daughter Pauline, and the children's tutor, Alexey. The General has borrowed large sums of money from the rich French Marquis and has fallen in love with Blanche. Alexey for his part loves Pauline, who has in the past had an affair with the Marquis.

Act I. The garden of the Grand Hotel. In a few short, halting sentences which seem to epitomise the ambivalent relationship between them, Pauline elicits from Alexey that he has staked and lost the money she gave him to gamble with. Blanche, the Marquis and Mr Astley appear and watch the General open a telegram which to their chagrin still speaks of Babulenska's health, not yet of her death. They advise Alexey to give up gambling, but he reacts vigorously: his Tartar nature forbids something so tame as earning merely in order to save. To Astley, Alexey spits out his dislike of the other's hypocrisy, then, in a scene with Pauline, explains that to win he must gamble with his own money – when that happens he will pay her debts, he will declare the passion he feels for her.

Re-enter the General, thanking the Marquis for yet another loan and signing an IOU. Alone with Alexey again, Pauline asks if he would live up to his promise to die for her – would he kill if she named the man? Alexey refuses to take her seriously, but when she orders him almost in a frenzy to insult the fat Baroness Würmerhelm, he reluctantly goes towards his unsuspecting victim, crudely declares himself her slave, and the curtain falls on a scene of general consternation.

Act II. In the hall of the hotel casino, the General tells Alexey off for his conduct, but is unprepared for Alexey's vigorous reaction: what right had someone who is neither his father nor his guardian to apologise on his behalf?

Alexey returns to find only Mr Astley, with whom he discusses at first his own predicament, then the General's affair with Blanche, who was originally in Roulettenburg with an Italian Prince. Now, she has caught the General and, once he inherits, she will become his wife – and Pauline will be snapped up by the money-lending Marquis! At that moment the Marquis himself puts in an appearance and attempts rather clumsily to dissuade Alexey from aggravating the affair with the Germans, supporting his case with a note from Pauline.

As Blanche and the General discuss the immi-

¹ In 1981 it did, in Graz under Edward Downes, who had completed the orchestration. St Louis followed in 1982.

nence of the General's inheritance, Babulenska herself appears in a wheelchair and attended by her servants – come, she announces, to try her hand at this gambling they all appear to enjoy so much. All salute her in turn, Alexey and Pauline with affection and respect, the General with considerable embarrassment, Blanche and the Marquis somewhat distantly. The old lady tells them that she cured herself by sending the doctors away, that she knows moreover that they have all been waiting for her to die. Blanche departs on the arm of Prince Nilsky.

Act III. Outside the gaming rooms. Inside, the old lady is gambling away her fortune; outside, the General bemoans the turn of events and fails to enlist either the sympathy of Blanche or the help of Alexey, who alone has any influence on Babulenska. Prince Nilsky's announcement of further losses galvanises the General to a last effort, and he rushes into the Casino, leaving Blanche to take the Prince's arm and Alexey to reflect that were it not for Pauline he would be laughing at their imminent downfall. Mention of Pauline's name brings her rapidly to the scene, for him to repeat his declaration that he is always at her service.

The old lady reappears; she has lost all the money she brought with her and is leaving immediately. In music of genuine warmth she asks Pauline to accompany her. Pauline hesitates; at least, warns the old woman, let her beware of the Marquis, from whom can come no good. The General wants to get into the old lady's room, but Potapich bars the way, and the General in his distraught condition falls to lamenting Blanche's unkindness towards him.

Act IV. Alexey's room, where he finds Pauline waiting for him. The Marquis has written to say that, bearing in mind that Alexey has gambled away her share of the family fortunes, he has ordered his agents to preserve for her twenty thousand francs from the sale of the General's property. Alexey is indignant at such insulting behaviour, but his suggestion that she borrow from Astley stings Pauline into asking if she should give herself to the Englishman rather than to him. Alexey's astonishment is complete, but with it comes an idea and he runs off.

A frenzied orchestral introduction takes us to the brilliantly lit gambling rooms. For a moment Alexey watches the play, then it is his turn. He stakes successfully on red, stakes and wins again and eventually in an extraordinary run of luck breaks the bank at the first table. He rushes to the second table, followed by several other gamblers, and repeats his incredible luck; then to a third, always with a winning streak. This is one of Prokofiev's most brilliant scenes, a Cours à l'abîme in scherzo form, and the voices of the players cross and intermingle without merging into a chorus. The music captures the over-heated atmosphere, the rapt concentration of the players, and the almost ritualistic movements of the croupiers with their incantations of 'Les jeux sont faits ... Rien ne va plus'.

An entr'acte¹ preserves, even enhances, the tension of the previous scene, with the cries of the gamblers coming from behind the lowered curtain, and the last scene returns to Alexey's room. He relives his success, then suddenly remembers Pauline who is watching him, and offers her the money to throw in the Marquis's teeth. She reacts with peals of laughter, and it is in a context of hysteria that they declare they will never part, will together take refuge with Babulenska. Now, Pauline insists, where are the fifty thousand francs? He hands the money over, and with all her strength she hurls it back at him. 'Pauline', he cries after her; then his thoughts go back to the casino and the unrepeatable run of luck, and as the curtain falls, he is staring fixedly at an imaginary roulette wheel. H.

THE LOVE FOR THREE ORANGES

Lyubov k trem Apelsinam

Opera in a prologue and four acts, text by the composer after the comedy of Carlo Gozzi. Première, Chicago, 30 December 1921 (in French), with Koshetz, Pavlovskaya, Falco, Dusseau, Mojica, Dua, Defrère, Cotreuil, Dufranne, conductor Prokofiev. First performed New York (Manhattan Opera House), 1922, with Chicago cast; Cologne, 1925, conductor Szenkar; Berlin, 1926; Leningrad, 1927; la Scala, Milan, 1947; Edinburgh Festival, 1962, Belgrade Opera, conductor Danon; Sadler's Wells, 1963. Revived with great success, New York City Center, 1949, conductor Halasz; Glyndebourne, 1982 (in French), conductor Bernard Haitink.

The King of Clubs, ruler of an imaginary kingdom, whose inhabitants are clothed as playing cards.....Bass
The Prince, his son.....Tenor

¹ In the Belgrade production, which was seen in Edinburgh, used as a prologue to the opera (with the curtain up) as well as appearing in its proper place.

| | |
|--|-------------------------|
| Princess Clarissa, niece of the King | Contralto |
| Leandro, his prime minister, dressed as the King of Spades | Baritone |
| Truffaldino, jester | Tenor |
| Pantaloon, friend and adviser of the King | Baritone |
| The Magician Tchelio, protector of the King | Bass |
| Fata Morgana, a witch, protectress of Leandro | Soprano |
| Three princesses | |
| Linetta | Contralto |
| Nicoletta | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Ninetta | Soprano |
| The Cook | Bass |
| Farfarello, a devil | Bass |
| Smeraldina, Fata Morgana's black servant | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Master of Ceremonies | Tenor |
| The Herald | Bass |
| The Trumpeter | Bass Trombone |
| Ten Reasonable Spectators ... | Five Tenors, Five Bases |
| Monsters, Drunkards, Gluttons, Guards, Servants, Soldiers, Jokers, Highbrows, Wits, Romantics, Lowbrows, Little Devils, Doctors, Courtiers | |

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

It was in 1918 that the director of the Chicago Opera, the conductor Cleofonte Campanini, commissioned Prokofiev to write an opera, but it had to wait until 1921 for production (largely because of the composer's impossible demands), at a time when the famous singer Mary Garden, still active, had succeeded Campanini. The Russian stage director, Vsevolod Meyerhold, had, immediately prior to the composer's departure from Russia, presented him with a Russian adaptation of the play by Meyerhold himself, and it was this that Prokofiev turned into a libretto. The opera is a farcical but entertaining re-working of the commedia dell'arte atmosphere (itself partly parody) of Gozzi's play.

Prologue. A dispute is going on between the protagonists of the various forms of theatrical entertainment, who are put to confusion when ten masked announcers appear to inform them that, whatever they say, they are going to see something quite different from what they are used to, 'The Love for Three Oranges'! The curtain parts to allow a 'trumpeter' (playing a bass trombone) to announce the appearance of a herald, who announces the burden of the story, the apparently incurable hypochondria of the son of the King of Clubs.

Act I, scene i. The King's palace. Doctors inform the King that his son cannot be cured, and the King immediately goes into paroxysms of grief; who will succeed him if his son is removed? His odious niece, Clarissa, presumably. The boy must be made to laugh, as the physicians predicted there was a chance of curing him if that could be achieved. Pantaloon suggests that the most likely way of doing it would be through theatrical performances. He shouts for Truffaldino, who undertakes to arrange everything.

The King orders that plans be put in train. Leandro, who is not at all anxious for the Prince's recovery, tries to raise objections, and the scene ends with Leandro and Pantaloon shouting abuse at each other.

A curtain covered with cabalistic signs descends, and Tchelio and Fata Morgana, surrounded by a chorus of little devils, proceed to play against each other with gigantic cards. Behind their chairs, the representations of the King of Clubs and the King of Spades respectively show that the game is in effect that of the King's protector against Leandro's. Tchelio loses. The music occurs in the orchestral suite¹ as 'Scène infernale'.

The King's palace, where Leandro and the wicked Clarissa have reached an understanding, whereby the Princess undertakes to marry Leandro, who must encompass the Prince's death and so clear the way for her accession. Leandro is confident that his method – to fill the Prince full of tragic prose and boring verse – will yet prove lethal. There is an interruption as the spectators in the boxes get out of hand and invade the stage. When Clarissa demands action, Leandro discovers the black servant Smeraldina is eavesdropping. They threaten to kill her, but she reveals that Tchelio protects the Prince and may yet succeed in his stratagems to make him laugh. Only through the intervention of Fata Morgana, her mistress, can this be avoided. The three voices are raised, calling for Fata Morgana.

Act II. The Prince's room. He is surrounded with medicines – ill and bored, and none of Truffaldino's antics make him laugh. Truffaldino persuades him to dress and watch the diversions which have been planned for his benefit. The well-known march begins in the orchestra, and continues as an interlude to the second scene, which takes place in the great hall of the palace. The King is there with Clarissa, and also in evidence are Leandro and Pantaloon. The Prince is covered in furs to avoid catching cold.

¹ The suite consists of Les Ridicules, Scène infernale, Marche, Scherzo, Le Prince et la Princesse, La Fuite.

The Love for Three Oranges (English National Opera, 1990, director Richard Jones, sets The Brothers Quay, costumes Sue Blane). Donald Maxwell (Leander), Fiona Kimm (Smeraldina), Anne Collins (Princess Clarissa) invoke Fata Morgana.

Truffaldino stages a comic battle between 'Monsters', and later turns loose a crowd of drunkards and gluttons to fight for food and drink; all to no avail. In despair, he looks round and catches sight of the witch Fata Morgana. He is horrified that such an old hag should intrude and tries to eject her. In their struggle, she loses her balance, does an involuntary somersault, and achieves the apparently impossible; the Prince starts to laugh. The whole court, and even the spectators, join in, and in their delight, everyone starts to dance – everyone, that is to say, apart from Leandro and Clarissa who are anything but pleased at the turn of events.

Fata Morgana is not long in recovering from her discomfiture. She curses the Prince and, surrounded by her troop of little devils, pronounces his fate; he will fall in love with three oranges, and will pursue them to the ends of the earth. Immediately, the Prince starts to cry out that he will depart forthwith on his journey, accompanied by Truffaldino. Amidst general lamentation, the little devil Farfarello appears and with a pair of bellows wafts the wanderers on their way.

Act III. The desert. Tchelio makes a vain attempt to restrain Farfarello from wafting the Prince and his companion to perdition, but Farfarello tells him that his loss at cards has rendered his magic powers inoperative – and he proves as much by disobeying him. The Prince and Truffaldino appear, and the Magician, having discovered they are seeking the three oranges, advises them, if they ever find them, to cut them open only near water. He also warns them that they are in the keeping of the terrible Creonte, who takes the form of a gigantic cook. In case it may help, he gives Truffaldino a magic ribbon, hoping it may distract the cook's attention while they filch the oranges.

Farfarello appears with his bellows and like lighting the Prince and Truffaldino are transported towards their destination. This is the scherzo of the suite, which, with the March, has become the most popular section of the work.

The two adventurers stand in front of the castle, and are about to go into the kitchen when from it emerges the colossal cook. Both hide, but Truffaldino is quickly discovered and saved from the cook's wrath only because the latter sees and falls hopelessly for the ribbon round his neck. Meanwhile the Prince creeps silently into the kitchen and emerges a moment later with the three oranges, which are of a calibre that befits their vast guardian. The cook asks for the ribbon, is given it as a present, and capers with delight, while, to the music of the scherzo, the Prince and Truffaldino make their escape.

We meet them again in the desert, where the oranges they have been carrying have grown to really huge dimensions, big enough one might think to contain a human being. The Prince falls asleep, but Truffaldino is so thirsty he cannot resist cutting open one of the oranges, which, in spite of Tchelio's warning, he hopes may assuage his thirst. Out steps Princess Linetta. She says that she will die of thirst if she is not immediately given some water, and, when none is forthcoming, demonstrates that she can be as good as her word. The same happens when Princess Nicoletta comes from the second orange. Truffaldino, at his wits' end and unable to wake the Prince, rushes despairingly off into the desert.

The Prince awakes, appears in no way disconcerted by the sight of the two dead girls, but orders four soldiers who conveniently appear to bury them. Then he addresses himself to the third orange, which he is sure contains all that he has ever dreamed of. He cuts it open, and a third girl appears, more beautiful than the others; he immediately recognises her as the one being he has waited for since birth. She expresses sentiments that are in no way dissimilar, then sinks into the Prince's arms. It looks as though she will follow the other ladies to the grave, but a bucket of water is produced from one of the boxes, and the Princess's life is saved. The Prince and his prospective bride enthuse over each other but, when the Prince says they must return to his father's palace, she demurs: he must fetch her a suitable dress before she can think of meeting his father.

Princess Ninetta is alone. Towards her glides the figure of Smeraldina, behind whom looms the shadow of Fata Morgana. The occupants of the boxes are in a fever-heat of anxiety, which turns out to be fully justified when Smeraldina sticks a long magical pin into Ninetta's head. She groans long and sadly, and is seen to have been turned into a rat. Fata Morgana tells Smeraldina that she must take Ninetta's place when she meets the King.

The sound of the March is heard, and a procession appears, with the King and the Prince at its head. They come up to Smeraldina, who proclaims herself the Princess. The Prince refuses to marry her, but his father objects, and he is forced to give her his arm and lead her back to the palace.

Act IV, scene i. The cabalistic curtain of Act I, scene ii, is seen once more. Fata Morgana and Tchelio are at it again, abusing one another like pickpockets. Fata Morgana seems to be having the better of the argument, but the spectators leave their boxes, surround her, and shove her into a section of the structure from which they have come, shutting the door firmly behind her. For the moment Tchelio is triumphant.

Scene ii. The royal throne-room. When the curtains round the throne are drawn aside, in the Princess's place is a large rat – Princess Ninetta in her metamorphosed state. All are aghast, the King sends for his guards, but Tchelio does his best to transform the rat into the princess he knows it to be. All of a sudden his efforts work, and Princess Ninetta stands before them. The Prince is beside himself with joy, and Smeraldina's discomfiture is complete. She is recognised as an accomplice of Leandro, and is accused with him and Clarissa of treason. For a moment the court watches the King go through the agonising process of making up his mind; then he turns to them full of resolve: all the culprits shall be hanged.

As the guards move towards them, the guilty crew takes flight, and soon the scene is covered with parties chasing each other, all of a dither in case the traitors get away, but none knowing which way they have gone. Suddenly, Fata Morgana appears in the middle of the stage, a trap-door opens, and her followers disappear down it to safety. The courtiers arrive too late, and there is nothing to do but cry 'God save the King' which the King immediately amends to 'God save the Prince and Princess'. H.

THE FIERY ANGEL

L'Ange de Feu; Ognenniy Angel

Opera in five acts and seven tableaux, libretto by the composer from a novel by Valery Briusoff (published in Russia in 1907). First complete performance (in concert) at the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, Paris, 25 November 1954, with Lucienne Marée, Xavier Depraz, conducted by Charles Bruck (French translation by André Michel). Stage première, Venice, 14 September 1955, with Dow, Panerai, conductor Sanzogno. First performed la Scala, 1957, with Goltz, Panerai, conductor Sanzogno; Spoleto, 1959, with Gencer, Panerai, conductor Kertész; Opéra-Comique, Paris, 1964, with Cavalli, Julien Haas, conductor Sebastien; Sadler's Wells, 1965, by New Opera Company with Collier, John Shaw; Frankfurt, 1969 (and Edinburgh Festival, 1970), with Anja Silja, Rudolf Konstantin, conductor Christoph von Dohnanyi (omitting the end of Act II and the whole of Act IV!). Adelaide Festival, 1988, with Josephine Barstow, Rodney Macann, conductor Stuart Challender, producer David Pountney; Covent Garden, 1992 (co-production with Kirov, St Petersburg), with Galina Gorchakova, Sergei Leiferkus, conductor Edward Downes, producer David Freeman.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Ruprecht, a knight | Baritone |
| The Hostess of the Inn | Contralto |
| Renata | Soprano |
| The Servant at the Inn | Baritone |
| The Sorceress..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Jakob Glock | Tenor |
| Agrippa von Netelsheim, a philosopher..... | Tenor |
| Count Heinrich | Mute |
| Mathias | Baritone |
| The Doctor..... | Tenor |
| Mephistopheles..... | Tenor |
| Faust | Baritone |
| The Innkeeper at Cologne | Baritone |
| The Mother Superior | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Inquisitor | Bass |
| Two Young Nuns..... | Sopranos |

Place: Germany, mainly Cologne

Time: Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 5 minutes

Prokofiev worked on The Fiery Angel between 1920 and 1926, beginning it, that is to say, in America after the failure of The Love for Three Oranges.¹ The strongly romantic subject is in great contrast to the ironic rationalism more usually associated with him, but he seems to have been overwhelmed by the possibilities of the story,² so that, without immediate prospects of production, he shut himself up from March 1922 for eighteen months at Ettal near Oberammergau, where, as he says, the action might have 'taken place in the back yard'. In the event, the opera seems to have been accepted by Bruno Walter for Berlin in 1926, revised then but never performed. Koussevitzky played an Interlude and the Agrippa scene at a concert in Paris three years later, and the composer planned but did not carry out an extensive revision in the early 1930s, including a re-write of the libretto. The work was then mislaid and its existence even partially forgotten until it turned up in Paris after the composer's death. Prokofiev himself had in the meanwhile used some music from it for his third symphony.³

The Fiery Angel belongs to the epoch of Wozzeck, but even that masterpiece among products of the post-Freudian era hardly surpasses it in its capacity to evoke and portray neurasthenia. But here a distinction must be made. Wozzeck belongs to a different world from the one inhabited by the émigré Prokofiev. His adopted Paris was dominated by Stravinsky's Neoclassicism, the ironies of Cocteau and Satie, the new exploits of Les Six; and the Germany where he retired to write The Fiery Angel by the opulence of Richard Strauss, with apparently at the time no more than minority dissension on the part of Schoenberg and his adherents on the one hand and Hindemith on the other.

The work is allegorical on two simultaneous levels. On one plane, Renata symbolises the struggle between good and evil, and the capacity to believe that evil is good and to act on this belief. She is haunted by visions of an Angel, and her passion for him amounts to obsession; to her he is Good, and no one else she meets is of any significance, except as help in her search for the Angel, or his physical embodiment, Heinrich. On another level, this is the account of an all-absorbing (for Briusoff, autobiographical¹), but ultimately unsuccessful love affair, seen through the suffering eyes of the male, but more damaging in the final analysis it would appear for the female protagonist than for him.

¹ After the Chicago première of this opera, Prokofiev may have hoped that Mary Garden, in her double capacity as Director of the Chicago Opera and leading prima donna, would mount The Fiery Angel and herself sing the title role. But unfortunately, he writes, she resigned the directorship.

² It is hardly a coincidence that an earlier opera, Maddalena – his first – was also concerned with obsession.

³ First performed in Paris, spring 1929, under Pierre Monteux.

Musically, the work is dominated by two themes associated with Renata, which with their derivatives occur throughout (Ex. 1 and 2).

(Ex. 1)

RENATA

Act I. A room in a shabby inn. The hostess conducts Ruprecht to his room for the night. He hears hysterical and terrified imprecations coming from behind an apparently disused door, forces it, and Renata, distraught and dishevelled, throws herself into his arms for protection, continuing to defend herself against her unseen attacker even after Ruprecht has drawn his sword and made the sign of the cross. The music vividly portrays her exhaustion as Ruprecht prays and her terror abates.

She tells her story in an extended narration of considerable musical splendour. It was when she was eight that an Angel first appeared to her, dressed in white with blue eyes and golden hair and surrounded by flames. His name was Madiel and he appeared to her day and night, eventually announcing to her that her destiny was to be a saint. When she was seventeen, her urgent desire for carnal love drove him away, to her utter despair, but eventually he told her in a dream that he would return. As soon as she saw Count Heinrich she knew, in spite of his denial, that he was Madiel in human form. There ensued with Heinrich a year of happiness such as had never been since Eve was expelled from Paradise. In the end he abandoned her, and now Ruprecht has saved her from the fiend who has pursued her with visions and nightmares ever since.

(Ex. 2)

The noise attracts the attention of the hostess and her servant. Renata is a loose woman, the hostess explains to Ruprecht; she bewitched the Count and tormented the villagers, and now she must leave the inn. Ruprecht shrugs his shoulders and decides that, once the hostess goes, this attractive girl, witch or no witch, shall be his. As she looks out of the window yearning for Heinrich, Ruprecht unsuccessfully tries to seduce her. He quickly abandons the attempt, but from that moment Ruprecht becomes as involved in the search for Heinrich as Renata herself.

¹ Around 1904 (Richard Taruskin tells us in an article published in connection with the Deutsche Grammophon recording of the opera), Bariusoff entered into a liaison with Nina Petrovskaya, a minor writer who had been (and indeed remained) involved with another Russian writer, Andrey Bely. The affair seems to have lasted until 1911, after which Petrovskaya's life disintegrated until her suicide in Paris in 1928; ironically enough, though she was a neighbour of Prokofiev's during the period he was revising The Fiery Angel, each lived in ignorance of the existence of the other.

When the hostess brings in a fortune-teller, the contrast with Renata is intentional; the one is up to all the tricks of the trade, the other attracted to sorcery only as a means to an end. The act ends with an impressive musical scene, in which the old fortune-teller makes obscure references to Renata's guilt.

Act II. Cologne. The Introduction features the theme of Ruprecht's disappointment. Renata is alone reading a book of magic when Ruprecht comes in, complaining that the week they have been in the city has been spent only in feverish search for Heinrich; they have looked in every church, in each narrow street, they have tried magic, but all to no avail. Without Heinrich she cannot live, is her answer. Jakob Glock has been commissioned to bring more books of magic, and Renata fastens on them, telling Ruprecht that, despite his uncomplaining love, beside Heinrich he is nothing; were she to be walking with Heinrich and to find Ruprecht's body self-slain in the gutter, she would take no more notice than to ask for its removal.

Renata burns magic herbs, and soon a knock is heard on the wall – it is a spirit, she says, announcing the arrival of Heinrich. With some remarkable divisi writing for the strings, Prokofiev expresses Renata's obsession in a scene that is musically of very striking quality with, in its total effect, something of the drama and irresistibility of Berlioz's Cours à l'abîme.

The door opens, but the music subsides to impotence and Ruprecht finds nothing. Renata collapses weeping, while Ruprecht swears he will compel the spirits to aid her in her search. Glock reappears; he will take Ruprecht to speak with the philosopher-magician, Agrippa von Nettselheim.

A fine symphonic interlude takes us to Agrippa's studio, where he sits surrounded by books, bottles of medicine, human skeletons, and three black dogs. In a scene whose impressive music caps even the feverish excitement of its predecessor, Agrippa reveals himself as a master of the diabolical arts, 'cold and steely, immensely powerful and terribly convincing. Here is damnation'.¹ As a philosopher, however, he refuses to help Ruprecht. The first scene of Act II provided most of the music for the third movement of Prokofiev's third symphony (a scherzo 'dénoué de gaieté' the composer called it), and the interlude and second scene for the last movement.

Act III. Renata is in despair outside the door of a house. It is Heinrich's; she has seen him and been rejected. Ruprecht returns from his encounter with Agrippa and hears the story of Renata's volte face – she no longer loves Heinrich, who, she is convinced, was an impostor, not the embodiment of her Madiel. If Ruprecht will kill her seducer, she will be his, and follow him wherever he goes. Ruprecht demands entrance to Heinrich's house, while Renata offers up a prayer to Madiel for forgiveness that she mistook Heinrich for him and for strength for the future. It has the force of a great aria of dedication.

Ruprecht can be seen at a window as he challenges Heinrich, who in appearance is the very incarnation of all that Renata has ever ascribed to Madiel, a true angel of fire. Renata is overwhelmed at the sight of him, and when Ruprecht reappears, in another complete change of heart, she forbids him to shed a drop of Heinrich's blood, rather to let himself be killed.

An interlude depicts the duel (part of it can be heard in the first movement of the third symphony). At its end, Ruprecht is discovered lying seriously wounded on the banks of the Rhine, where Renata tends him, and in a lyrical aria sings of her love, swearing that if he dies she will enter a convent. After Renata's berceuse, delirium (Ruprecht's from his wound? Renata's from her obsession? – it is the only moment of the story when Renata and Ruprecht are musically at one) suddenly seizes both in music of uncanny intensity, a chorus of women behind the stage commenting ironically the while on the instability of love. A doctor who has been fetched by Mathias pronounces that Ruprecht will live.

Act IV. In a public garden, Renata tells Ruprecht, who has hardly recovered from his wound, that she must leave him; to accomplish the salvation of her soul, she must take the veil. When Ruprecht protests his love for her, she tries to commit suicide, turning the attack on him as he tries to prevent her. Mephistopheles and Faust have come into the garden and watch the scene. When the pot-boy, in response to their order, only brings wine, Mephistopheles threatens to swallow the child, and later at a gulp makes good his boast, subsequently restoring him to life at the request of the innkeeper.

Act V. The act starts with some beautiful slow

¹ Hans Swarsenski, in an excellent article on the opera in Tempo, 1956.

music (in Symphony No. 3, the subject of the second movement), chanted by the nuns of the convent of which Renata has become a member. The music is the more welcome by its contrast with the frenzy which has preceded it. The same abstraction from the world is apparent when the Mother Superior asks Renata about her visions: has she seen evil spirits? No, says Renata, she always turned her back on them. The fact remains, the Mother Superior points out, that since she entered the convent, the place has been in an uproar, full of strange noises and the sisters attacked by devils.

The nuns in the meanwhile have filled one side of the crypt, and now the Inquisitor and his followers enter to examine Renata. He asks her to furnish him with proof that her visions have never been inspired by Hell. The spirit who visits her, she tells him, has always spoken of virtue, of the importance of the life to come – are these the words of the devil? Immediately two young sisters cry out in terror, knocks are heard on the wall, and the scene becomes one of pandemonium as one group after another is caught up in the general turmoil, a few supporting Renata but most crying out against her. The exorcism proceeds, but finally, as Mephistopheles and Ruprecht appear, the nuns rush frenziedly at the Inquisitor and his supporters, and the opera ends as he pronounces Renata a heretic and sentences her to death. The final scene, with its intricate part-writing for the women against the cantus firmus of the Inquisitor, is masterly in its effect and brings the opera to an overwhelming conclusion. H.

BETROTHAL IN A MONASTERY

Obruchenije v monastire

Opera in four acts, text by Mira Mendelson from Sheridan's The Duenna. Première planned for 1941 but postponed because of the German invasion of Russia; plans for a 1943 production at the Bolshoi, Moscow, also abandoned. Première, Kirov Theatre, Leningrad, 30 November 1946. First performed New York, Greenwich Mews Playhouse, 1948 (as The Duenna), with two-piano accompaniment; Leipzig, 1957; East Berlin, 1958, conductor Lovro von Matacic; Naples, 1959, with Rosetta Noli, Belen Amparan, Agostino Lazzari, Francesco Albanese, Fernando Corena, Guido Mazzini, conductor Fabien Sevitzyk; Zagreb Opera, 1960 (and in Paris, 1961); Strasbourg, 1973.

Don Jerome, a rich man of Seville Tenor
 Ferdinand, his son Baritone
 Louisa, his daughter Soprano
 The Duenna (Margaret) Contralto
 Antonio, in love with Louisa Tenor
 Clara d'Almanza, friend of Louisa Mezzo-Soprano
 Mendoza, a rich fish merchant Bass
 Don Carlos, an impoverished nobleman, friend of Mendoza Baritone

Monks

Father Augustine, Father Superior of the monastery Baritone
 Brother Elixir Tenor
 Brother Chartreuse Baritone
 Brother Benedictine Bass
 Two Monks Tenors

Lauretta, Louisa's maidservant Soprano
 Rosina, Clara's maidservant Contralto
 Lopez, Ferdinand's servant Tenor
 Friend of Don Jerome Non-Singing
 Servant of Don Jerome Non-Singing

Servants, Maidservants, Monks, Guests, Maskers, Tradespeople

Place: Seville

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

Prokofiev's seventh opera is taken from an English literary subject, The Duenna by Sheridan.¹

Act I. An introduction, moderato ma con brio, brings us to the house of Don Jerome, a fussy, rich old man of Seville, who has a son and a daughter, Ferdinand and Louisa, for the latter of whom he has engaged a duenna. In front of Don Jerome's house, he and the fish merchant Mendoza are discussing a partnership which they plan to form and they seal the bargain with an agreement for Mendoza to marry Louisa.

Ferdinand comes in with his servant Lopez to lament with considerable romantic ardour the apparent capriciousness of his lady-love Clara. It has grown dark and Antonio enters equipped with a guitar obviously about to serenade Louisa, something which Ferdinand accepts as it would at least keep him from laying siege to the affections of Clara, with whom he was once in love. Antonio sings, and has the gratification of seeing Louisa come out on her balcony, obviously delighted at his appearance and prepared to join him in song.

¹ The subject also of Roberto Gerhard's only opera (see page 241).

Don Jerome has been woken up by it all, but Louisa hides in time, and he is bamboozled by maskers, who dance round him to such purpose that he is driven to reflect that Louisa had better marry soon or she will be the prey of some serenading fool. The act ends with extensive and lively dancing.

Act II. The first scene is set in Louisa's apartment, where she is discussing with her duenna the possibility of marrying the man she has fallen in love with. The duenna has ideas of herself marrying Mendoza and his money, thus leaving Louisa free for Antonio. They plot just as Don Jerome himself appears. He means to impose his will on Louisa in the matter of the marriage with Mendoza, but both his children argue hotly against the plan. Don Jerome loses his patience and swears he will lock Louisa up until she changes her mind.

Ferdinand advises his father to let his sister marry someone she really loves and is disconcerted at Don Jerome's blank refusal, not least as he remembers Antonio's one-time love for Clara. His meditations are interrupted by the sound of the lamentations of the duenna and the insistence of Don Jerome, who has found the incriminating love letter that she and Louisa have planned would fall into his hands. She leaves to go to Louisa's room. Enter Louisa, disguised in the duenna's clothes – cape, hood, veil and all – and pretending to weep. Don Jerome shows her the door, covertly watched by the duenna, and shouts angrily after what is, though he does not know it, his daughter Louisa.

On the waterfront, fishwives are selling their wares, shortly to be observed by Don Mendoza and his impoverished friend Don Carlos. When they leave, Doña Clara and Rosina, her maidservant, come into view, the former delighted at the idea that she has left home at last but furious that it is through the intervention of her lover, who stole at night into her room and has thus by his presumption mortally affronted her.

No sooner have they left than Louisa comes in, lamenting her inability to locate Antonio. Should she look for help from her friend Clara – but then Clara is such a plaster saint! At that moment, Clara catches sight of her but fails to evade her, and they quickly discover that the one is eloping and the other hiding. In a lyrical aria, Clara tells Louisa the story: lying awake at night, she heard her lover steal into her room but felt she must reject him for his over-ardent behaviour. Louisa attempts to console her but is plainly disconcerted to hear Clara seem to opt for a convent. Suddenly, Louisa catches sight of Mendoza, and immediately decides to ask Clara to allow her to masquerade for a bit as Doña Clara d'Almanza, which Clara agrees to on condition that Louisa, if she sees her brother Ferdinand, will swear not to have seen Clara anywhere, least of all tell him where she has gone – the convent of St Catherine, whose geography Clara proceeds to describe in some detail in the ostensible hope that Louisa will mention not so much as the position of the back door to Ferdinand.

Mendoza and Don Carlos come in and Louisa, pretending to be Clara, makes up to Mendoza and asks him to carry a message to her lover Antonio, thus provoking Mendoza's indignation since, for a moment, he half thought she was attracted to him. All the same, he knows Antonio was Louisa's suitor, and he feels this latest development may suit his purposes. Bidding Don Carlos escort Louisa (whom of course he thinks to be Clara) to Mendoza's house, Mendoza plans himself to visit the house of Don Jerome to see his betrothed.

Back in Don Jerome's house, where he is hearing from Mendoza how Doña Clara has run away from home, Don Jerome cannot refrain from singing his daughter's praises. It soon becomes apparent however that Louisa refuses to put in an appearance if her father is present at her meeting with Mendoza. Eventually he takes his leave, and the duenna enters dressed as Louisa. Mendoza is at first lyrically polite but much taken aback when he contrives to peep at her face. The duenna wins him round with flattery so that he becomes convinced he was mistaken to have found her hideous, and succumbs when she sings him a song. In the end, they are plotting to elope together. Don Jerome and Mendoza finish the act with a drinking song.

Act III. Don Carlos has conducted Louisa to Mendoza's lodgings, whither Mendoza loses no time in bringing Antonio. Antonio smells a rat and cannot believe that it is his old flame Clara who has summoned him, but Mendoza and Don Carlos push him into the room where they say Clara is waiting and then, as the music depicts a tender scene inside, proceed themselves to peer through the keyhole into the room. When Antonio and Louisa re-enter arm-in-arm, Don Carlos is scandalised that Antonio should so lightly steal his friend's beloved, but Mendoza welcomes young love and says that he himself will that very night go to Don Jerome's house in order to abduct Don Jerome's daughter. The scene ends with a quartet, Louisa and Antonio hymning the setting sun while Mendoza and Don Carlos wonder about the compensation available to those of maturer years.

There is jaunty music-making in Don Jerome's house, with the host playing the clarinet, a friend the cornet, and a servant the big drum. Don Jerome cannot understand how it is that his daughter, who yesterday so vehemently refused the bridegroom chosen for her, has now decided to elope with him. Lopez ushers in Don Carlos who has brought Mendoza's letter asking the bride's father for forgiveness. Don Jerome readily grants it. The music-making continues, but now a messenger brings a letter from Louisa herself, again asking Don Jerome to bless the marriage. Again he agrees, interrupting the music to instruct Lopez to organise a wedding banquet, and the scene ends with the music reaching a climax.

Clara, dressed as a nun, is lamenting her fate in the convent garden. To her comes Louisa to plead for Ferdinand, and it is apparent that Clara would give in were he there. Antonio joins them and together he and Louisa read her father's answer to her plea for recognition of her marriage. Antonio cannot understand it, but they leave arm-in-arm and full of delight, only for poor Clara to lament the misery of her predicament. It is not long however before Ferdinand is inside the convent wall, but confusion reigns supreme, and he believes he can see Doña Clara d'Almanza disappearing with his faithless friend Antonio. Clara is overjoyed at his jealousy, and she swears that Louisa will not be the only bride that day.

Act IV. In the monastery, monks are drinking wine. Their mood is one of hilarity, and they toast the sisters of the Order of St Catherine, not forgetting the little dark-eyed novice. The music bubbles on as the wine starts to take control, and it is only gradually that those to whom wine speaks most deeply come to understand that rich clients have been announced and they must rapidly change their tune, which they proceed – literally – to do. Antonio and Mendoza have come to ask the brethren's help in the project closest to their hearts, which is that they both want to get married. After the mysterious appearance of a purse, the monks agree to do their bit. A complication ensues when Louisa rushes in followed by Ferdinand, who believes that his beloved Clara is to be married to Antonio. Antonio and Ferdinand are about to fight, when Clara enters, minus her veil but still dressed as a nun, and she and Louisa stop the fight. Clara was the black-eyed novice, and the monks are riveted by her appearance. Before long, the lovers' misunderstandings are resolved and the appropriate marriages blessed.

In the ballroom of Don Jerome's house, preparations are in hand for the celebration of Louisa's wedding. But the principal guests seem to be absent. Finally, Mendoza comes in calling for his wife, and the duenna makes her first appearance as a married woman. Don Jerome is taken aback to recognise his old employee, the more so when a moment later he finds Antonio and Louisa kneeling in front of him and asking for his blessing. Guests arrive as efforts are made to clear up the various misconceptions, and soon it is the turn of Ferdinand and Doña Clara to kneel beside Louisa and Antonio. Don Jerome starts to work out that his daughter has married a pauper who has at least the grace to be handsome, and his son has married a lady with a princess's dowry. Things haven't turned out quite so badly as he might have expected and rejoicings proceed more or less unclouded while Don Jerome shows his prowess on the musical glasses.

H.

WAR AND PEACE

Voina y Mir

Opera in thirteen scenes, libretto by the composer and Mira Mendelson, after Tolstoy. The original version (heavily cut) given in concert in Moscow, 7 June 1945,¹ with Nadion (Natasha), Ivanov (Andrei), Pirogov (Kutuzov), conductor Samosud. Première (first eight scenes only) at Maly Theatre, Leningrad, 12 June 1946, with Lavrova, Chishko (Pierre), Shaposhnikov (Andrei), Andrukovich (Anatol), Juravlenko (Old Prince Bolkonsky), conductor Samosud. Part II was heard at a closed première in 1947. Première of so-called 'final' version (eleven scenes only, omitting scenes 7 and 11), Maly

¹ The same day as the première of Peter Grimes in London.

Theatre, Leningrad, 1 April 1955, with Lavrova, Sokolova, Baskova (Hélène), Glibov (Pierre), Andrukovich, Shaposhnikov, Modestov (Napoleon), Butiagin (Kutuzov), conductor Grikurov. First non-Russian performance (heavily cut), Florence, 1953, with Rosanna Carteri, Franco Corelli, Ettore Bastianini, Italo Tajo, Fernando Corena, Mirto Picchi, Renato Capecchi, Anselmo Colzani, conductor Artur Rodzinski. First performed Moscow, Nemirovich-Danchenko Theatre, 1957, conductor Shaverdov (thirteen scenes, with internal cuts); N.B.C. TV, New York, 1957, with Helena Scott, Davis Cunningham, Morley Meredith, Kenneth Smith, conductor Peter Herman Alder; Bolshoi Theatre, Moscow, 1959, with Vishnevskaya, Archipova, Grigoriev, Kipkalo, Maslennikov, Vedernikov, Lisitsian, conductor Melik-Pashayev; Leipzig, 1961; Zagreb, 1961. First British performance, Leeds Festival, 1967 (in concert), with Elizabeth Vaughan, Gregory Dempsey, Hans Wilbrink, Ivo Zidek, Donald McIntyre, conductor Edward Downes; Sadler's Wells at the Coliseum, 1972, with Josephine Barstow, Kenneth Woollam, Tom McDonnell, John Brecknock, Norman Bailey, Raymond Myers, conductor David Lloyd-Jones, producer Colin Graham; Australia, for opening of Sydney Opera House, 1973, with Eilene Hannan, Ronald Dowd, McDonnell, Robert Gard, Neil Warren-Smith, Myers, conductor Edward Downes.

Prince Andrei BolkonskyBaritone
 Natalya Rostova (Natasha)Soprano
 Sonya, *Natasha's cousin*Mezzo-Soprano
 Maria Dmitrievna AkhrosimovaContralto
 Count Ilya Rostov, *Natasha's father*Bass
 Count Pyotr Bezukhov (Pierre)Tenor
 Hélène Bezukhova, *his wife*Mezzo-Soprano
 Prince Anatol Kuryagin, *her brother*Tenor
 Dolokhov, *an officer*Baritone
 Colonel Vasska DenisovBaritone
 Field-Marshal Prince Mikhail KutuzovBass
 Napoleon BonaparteBaritone
 Platon Karataev, *an old soldier*Tenor
 The HostTenor
 His Major-DomoTenor
 Madame PeronskayaSoprano
 The TsarSilent
 Prince Nikolai Bolkonsky,
Andrei's fatherBass-Baritone
 His Major-DomoBaritone
 An Old ValetBaritone
 A HousemaidSoprano
 Princess Marya Bolkonskaya,
Andrei's sisterMezzo-Soprano
 Balaga, *a troika driver*Bass
 Matriosha, *a gipsy*Mezzo-Soprano
 Dunyasha, *Natasha's maid*Soprano

Gavrila, *Akhrosimova's butler*Bass
 Métivier, *a French doctor*Baritone
 A French AbbéTenor
 Tikhon Sherbatsky, *a partisan*Baritone
 VasilisaMezzo-Soprano
 Fyodor, *a partisan*Tenor
 Matveyev, *a Muscovite*Baritone
 Two Prussian GeneralsSpeaking Roles
 Prince Andrei's OrderlyTenor
 Two Russian GeneralsSpeaking Roles
 Kaizarov, *aide-de-Camp to Kutuzov*Tenor
 Adjutant to General CompansTenor
 Adjutant to Marshal MuratTreble
 Marshal BerthierBaritone
 Marquis de CaulaincourtSilent Role
 General BelliardBaritone
 Adjutant to Prince EugèneTenor
 Aide-de-Camp to NapoleonBass
 Off-Stage OrderlyTenor
 Monsieur de BeaussetTenor
 General BennigsenBass
 Prince Mikhail Barclay de TollyTenor
 General YermolovBaritone
 General KonovnitsinTenor
 General RayevskyBaritone
 Captain RamballeBass
 Lieutenant BonnetTenor
 Ivanov, *a Muscovite*Tenor
 Captain JacqueauBass
 Marshal Berthier's AdjutantTenor Mavra Kusminichna, the Rostovs' housekeeperContralto
 Marshal DavoutBass
 A French OfficerBaritone
 Three MadmenTenor, Baritone, Actor
 Two French ActressesSopranos

Place: Russia – Otradnoye, St Petersburg, Moscow, Borodino, Fili, near Smolensk

Time: 1806–12

Running Time: 4 hours 20 minutes

According to Mira Mendelson, for whom Prokofiev had left his Spanish-born wife,¹ the composer was thinking of writing an opera on Tolstoy's Resurrection when she started to read War and Peace aloud to him. He was immediately struck by its operatic possibilities, the scene of the meeting between Natasha and the wounded Prince Andrei particularly appealing to him. In April 1941,¹ they started to prepare a scheme for the libretto, by July the German invasion of Russia had provided him with the spur to tackle it and eleven scenes had been decided upon; on 15 August, already evacuated to the Caucasus, he started work on the composition. As a matter of history, he worked at it on and off during the last eleven years of his life and the opera has gone through a number of different versions.

¹ Prokofiev and Mira Mendelson met in spring 1940, when the composer was 51 and she was 25.

By midsummer 1942,² eleven scenes were completed in piano score (two changes from the original eleven), and at this point it was suggested to the composer that there was a lack of heroic quality in the war scenes – not surprising since the original idea had been for something relatively small-scale, with the emphasis on Pierre and the inner struggle of the individual rather than on Kutuzov and the outward struggle of the nation. He had already orchestrated Peace, but he set to work to comply with officialdom's request so that all eleven scenes were finished by April 1943, to form the definitive First Version. Plans for a performance at the Bolshoi Theatre in 1943, Samosud conducting and Eisenstein producing, were shelved,³ but an idea for an enlarged version in two parts emerged, and in June 1946, the forces of the Maly Theatre, Leningrad, under Samosud gave Part I, consisting of Scenes 1–7 (Scene 2 had been added at Samosud's suggestion to the original scheme) and Scene 8 (the battle of Borodino). Performance of Part II was planned, and during 1946–47 Prokofiev wrote Scene 10 (the Council of War at Fili), only for events to overtake the planners in the shape of the infamous Zhdanov decree of 10 February 1948.

A word of explanation seems necessary. After the première of Muradely's opera The Great Friendship, Andrei Zhdanov, acting it is believed after he and Stalin had both intensely disliked the new work, met the Moscow composers in January 1948, to initiate a new 'hard line'. Khrennikov became the new General Secretary of the composers, the over-riding importance of melody in Soviet music was re-emphasised, and war was declared against formalism, naturalism, modernism, and Westernism.

In December 1948, after Part II had been dropped in Leningrad at dress rehearsal stage, Prokofiev, who according to his colleague Kabelevsky 'considered the opera the best thing he had written',⁴ started to plan a version suitable for a single evening and suggestions to this end are contained in the preface to the published vocal score. In spite of internal rearrangements made during the period 1948–52, the thirteen-scene scheme remains, and it is this, together with overture and choral Epigraph, which is now treated as the final version – long (more than four hours of music) and therefore often cut in performance, sometimes only sectionally, occasionally by as much as two complete scenes (usually vii and xi; at the Florence première, ii and ix).

Part I. The granite-hard choral movement called Epigraph in the score, often appropriately substituted at the start of the opera⁵ for the much less interesting overture, is a massive piece of block harmony and, with its emphasis on the primordial strength of Russia in the face of her enemies, makes a most effective opening. (The overture itself is concerned with War rather more than Peace, and is usually omitted.) The Epigraph contains a sung reference to Ex. 8 as well as an enunciation of the theme in scene viii symbolising the surge of optimism which is itself the result of fervent patriotism.

Scene i is set in the garden of Count Rostov's estate at Otradnoye. It is a moonlit night in May 1806. The widower Prince Andrei Bolkonsky, who is visiting the estate on business, cannot sleep. His romantic idealism, Ex. 1, gradually becomes associated with Natasha and passes to thoughts of spring, Ex. 2.

It then gives way to a mood of disillusion. From an upstairs room, Natasha, who is preceded by Ex. 2 and sings to a version of Ex. 1, can be heard complaining to her cousin Sonya that she too cannot ¹ I am indebted to Rita McAllister, lecturer in music at Edinburgh University, for much valuable information on chronology.

² In November 1941, he moved from Nalchik to Tbilisi in Georgia, and in May 1942, to Alma-Ata in Kazakhstan, where he collaborated with Eisenstein on the film Ivan the Terrible.

³ A private performance of this version with piano accompaniment was given in Moscow in October 1944, and a public concert in June 1945.

⁴ Boris Schwarz: Music and Musical Life in Soviet Russia 1917–1970 (Barrie & Jenkins).

⁵ As in the productions at the Bolshoi Theatre in 1959 and by Sadler's Wells at the London Coliseum in 1972.

(Ex. 1)

Andante assai

(Ex. 2)

sleep. Natasha thinks she has never seen anything so beautiful as their garden bathed in moonlight, and Prince Andrei is moved by the romantic situation and the innocence and charm of the young girl. How could he ever have believed that his life was at an end (Ex. 2)? The mood of the scene is lyrical and expressive – in fact one may doubt if Prokofiev ever elsewhere penned music of such tenderness.

Scene ii takes place on New Year's Eve, 1810, at a ball in a palace in Petersburg. Guests dance a brilliant polonaise, and are invited to listen to a new cantata. Count Rostov enters with Natasha and Sonya, and they are closely followed by Count and Countess Bezukhov – Madame Akhrosimova makes a complimentary remark to Natasha but she and Madame Peronskaya comment with a certain asperity on the beauty of the celebrated Hélène Bezukhova. The Tsar makes his entry, polonaise is succeeded by mazurka, Natasha wonders if no one will ask her to dance (Ex. 1), and then Pierre, rich and unconventional, approaches his friend Prince Andrei and suggests he should ask the young Natasha Rostova to dance. The nostalgic music of the waltz at this point reflects the effect the dance is having on the mind of the impressionable Natasha, whose first ball it is, Ex. 3:

Tempo di Valse

The scene ends on a note of something like rapture, with Andrei murmuring to himself after the dance: 'If she first approaches her cousin and then another lady, she will become my wife'.¹ But he is not the only man to have been impressed by Natasha, the glittering and dissolute Prince Anatol Kuryagin having earlier asked his sister Hélène Bezukhova to arrange an introduction to the new young beauty. The scene ends with an écossaise.

Scene iii. Prince Andrei has proposed to Natasha (February 1812) and Count Rostov brings his daughter (Ex. 1) to see old Prince Bolkonsky, Andrei's father, who has insisted meanwhile that Andrei should spend a year abroad. Count Rostov asks if the Prince and the Princess his daughter are at home. He does not relish the prospect of the interview, but Natasha is a good deal more confident. When she sings it, Ex. 1, originally sung by Andrei, seems to stand for the idealism in her character as well as for their mutual love and Ex. 2 for the trust she now feels in Andrei. They are told that the old man cannot see them, but his daughter Princess Marya comes in and Count Rostov quickly makes his excuses to her and departs. No sooner has he gone, than the old Prince puts in an appearance, dressed in night-cap and dressing gown. With boorish insincerity, he apologises for his attire to Natasha, mutters threateningly and leaves. Marya starts to excuse his behaviour – he is perpetually in pain – but Natasha understands all too well that he is the obstacle to her marriage. Count Rostov returns and goes to speak with Princess Marya, leaving Natasha alone. She is outraged at the behaviour of the Bolkonskys but this makes her think, and thought conjures up the image of Andrei, who she realises means everything to her, Ex. 4:

¹ Translation by Edward Downes.

When Princess Marya makes a conscious attempt at conversation, Natasha puts her off with some dignity.

Scene iv takes place in the living room of Pierre Bezukhov's house in May 1812 – the whole scene amounts to a dance on a less grandiose scale than in Scene ii, built up on yet another waltz, with interpolations in 4/4. Hélène compliments Natasha on not staying at home just because she is engaged, then lets slip the information that the previous night her brother Prince Anatol had admitted to them that he was pining for love of none other than Natasha. Hélène laughs at Natasha's embarrassment and, when a moment later Count Rostov wants to take his family home, insists they stay. In touchingly diffident music, Natasha reflects that neither Hélène nor Pierre seems at all shocked at Prince Anatol having fallen in love with her; she will not be shocked either. The dancing resumes and Anatol proceeds to woo Natasha passionately (this version of the waltz¹ symbolises the fascination Anatol holds for Natasha), Ex. 5.

He succeeds in kissing her and gives her a letter of assignation. Natasha is obviously affected by its fervour – but she loves Andrei (Ex. 2). If only he were here now (Ex. 4)! Count Rostov returns to take Natasha and Sonya home.

Scene v. 12 June 1812. Dolokhov's apartments. Anatol's elopement with Natasha is arranged. He sings with the conviction of infatuation, however cynical, and when Dolokhov, who has made all the detailed arrangements, tries to argue his friend out of going through with the mad project, shrugs off his arguments. He likes women young, and anyhow he is in love (echo of the previous scene's waltz: Ex. 5). Here almost incongruously occurs Ex. 1, presumably as ironic counterpoint to Anatol's thoughts. Enter Balaga, with whom Dolokhov has arranged for a carriage and the fastest horses he can procure. He seems to have been implicated in Anatol's escapades before now, and the three of them drink to the adventure as Anatol says a musically nostalgic goodbye to Moscow and to his gipsy mistress Matriosha.

¹ From Prokofiev's incidental music to Yevgeny Onyegin.

Scene vi. The same night: a room in the house of Maria Dmitrievna Akhrosimova, where Natasha is staying while her father is away. Natasha waits alone for Anatol, until her maid Dunyasha rushes in to say that Sonya has given away the elopement plans. Anatol appears at the door, but the butler, Gavrila, bars the way to him, and Anatol escapes with Dolokhov, Natasha falling in despair on the sofa. Akhrosimova comes in and starts to rate Natasha for her behaviour, but Natasha defies her and begs to be left alone. Suddenly, Akhrosimova softens, the music now in great contrast to her formal denunciation. Can Natasha not think of her father and of Prince Andrei? Natasha runs off sobbing just as Gavrila announces Count Pierre Bezukhov – his theme precedes him, Ex. 6:

[200] Adagio $\text{♩} = \text{♩}$

Pierre is told of the situation and when Natasha comes back (Ex. 1 swamping Ex. 5), he starts to console her. In answer to Natasha's repeated questions he assures her that Anatol is already married, then succumbs to pity for her – will she not treat him as a friend? Her reaction is to beg him to explain to Andrei and ask him, though all is over between them, to forgive her for the pain she will have caused him (Ex. 4). Pierre promises, and then in an outburst of frankness, tells her that if he were himself free, he would now be on his knees asking for her hand in marriage. He runs out of the room, and Natasha follows him as Akhrosimova and Sonya come in, Sonya beside herself with worry that Natasha now looks upon her as an enemy.

Scene vii.¹ The same night, Hélène is entertaining guests, among them Anatol. Pierre proceeds to attack his brother-in-law for his infamous conduct, insisting that he leave Moscow immediately. Anatol is taken aback by his vehemence and agrees, leaving Pierre alone to reflect on the pointlessness of his existence, with its unproductive wealth and the worthless friends by whom he is surrounded (the music springs from material already exposed in the previous scene, particularly Ex. 6 and its derivations).

Denisov brings the news that Napoleon is about to cross the Russian frontier. It means war.

Part II. All six scenes of the second part of the opera are concerned with the defence of Russia against the invasion of the French, and the Russian people led by Marshal Kutuzov take the central position. The musical tone fluctuates between a representation on the one hand of patriotic fervour and of devastation on the other, and is very different from that of the preceding scenes – only when Andrei and Pierre appear together on the battlefield of Borodino and in the scene of the death of Andrei do we return to the musical style of Part I – and it is this contrast which has caused some commentators to talk about War and Peace as two separate operas on a single evening.

Scene viii. The music starts with Ex. 7, associated with the horrors of war:

Moderato drammatico

[262]

25 August 1812. Near Borodino, men are at work digging defences, filling the scene with their fervent working and marching songs. Prince Andrei has raised and trained his own regiment. Lieutenant-Colonel Denisov asks him for the whereabouts of Field-Marshal

¹ Prokofiev suggested that this scene might be cut if the opera is found too long in performance, but its excision has the unfortunate effect of greatly reducing the musical portrayal of Pierre.

Kutuzov and, on their way to the Commander-in-Chief, Denisov talks to Andrei of his idea to make use of partisans against the French – a mere five hundred men skilfully deployed could harass Napoleon's lines of communication and ensure his defeat.

Andrei returns. By sheer coincidence he has just met Denisov, who was once engaged to the Natasha in whom he himself thought to realise all his hopes for the future (Exx. 2 and 3). His thoughts are bitter (Ex. 1) when suddenly he recognises the highly unmilitary figure of Pierre Bezukhov. He does not want to be further reminded of Natasha, and his welcome is a little cool. Pierre explains that he has come to Borodino as a mere onlooker. As they talk, two German generals pass by, agreeing that since the object is to rout the enemy one cannot be too concerned with civilian casualties. Andrei is furious: Russia is being devastated, his father has been killed (Ex. 7), and these Prussians, who have unsuccessfully fought Napoleon all over Europe, talk of textbook battles! His orderly tells Andrei that the regiment is drawn up and waiting, and Andrei turns to Pierre, in spite of his presentiments, still patriotically convinced of ultimate victory.

A cry goes up as the Marshal leaves his tent, and Andrei embraces Pierre, both men convinced they have met for the last time. Kutuzov's first appearance is to a wisp of flute tone (Ex. 8a) which brings Ex. 8 softly in the orchestra:

and his first words as he watches the guerrillas at work are sung to this music. He throws each group a well-timed word of commendation, then catches sight of Prince Andrei and sends for him. His intention is to appoint him to his staff, but Andrei declines the position. The soldiers proclaim their patriotic fervour in a chorus based on Ex. 8, until the sound of a shot heralds the start of the battle (Ex. 7).

Scene ix. In the Shevardino redoubt the same day, Napoleon directs the battle surrounded by his staff. The music is a sinister sort of scherzo in Prokofiev's most sardonic vein, with references to Ex. 8 when allusion is made to Russian heroism. The French commander-in-chief broods on the possible outcome of the battle. Moscow is at his mercy; he will earn history's gratitude by showing clemency. He refuses at first to commit his reserves, but eventually gives in. De Beausset tries unsuccessfully to get the Emperor to eat luncheon, and the scene ends with a cannon shot landing almost at their feet. By not succumbing in mid-war to the full temptation of equating Napoleon with Hitler, Prokofiev has achieved the impossible by placing, in the course of a ten-minute scene, one of history's greatest figures convincingly on the musical stage.

Scene x. In a peasant's hut in the village of Fili, Marshal Kutuzov is two days later holding a Council of War, surrounded by his generals (Ex. 7). Two courses are open to them, each potentially disastrous: to defend Moscow puts the army at risk; to retreat would leave the capital at the enemy's mercy. After listening to his generals, it is for Kutuzov to make the momentous decision. He orders a retreat, confident that only through the sacrifice of Moscow is there a hope of final victory. The generals leave and Kutuzov's faith is expressed in soliloquy to a broad tune. Its immediate appeal and memorability have caused some commentators to mutter patronisingly of music aimed at the masses, but others will remember that it is now not so common for an operatic tune to induce a feeling of genuine patriotic fervour, something which must have been just as firmly in Prokofiev's mind in the period 1941–45 as it was in Verdi's at the time of the Risorgimento.

Scene xi. Moscow's inhabitants have set fire to the great city rather than surrender it to the invader (Ex. 7 frequently throughout the scene). Nothing is as the French expect and the soldiers start to loot. Pierre, who feels he could put an end to the horrors by killing Napoleon, learns that the Rostovs have left Moscow taking with them the wounded from their house, Natasha still unaware that Andrei is among them. When soldiers drag in a group of Muscovites accused of having started the fires, Pierre is shoved in with them.

Marshal Davout confirms his order that incendiaries be shot. The veteran Karataev touchingly reassures Pierre of the values to be found in suffering, but most of the incendiaries are reprieved and marched off as prisoners (Ex. 7). French actresses rush into the streets, screaming that the theatre is on fire, and lunatics save themselves as the hospital burns. Introduced by Ex. 7 in the orchestra and surrounded by his staff, Napoleon makes his way through the thick smoke of burning Moscow, defeated by the city's resistance and mightily impressed by the courage of its inhabitants.

Scene xii shows Prokofiev at his most intense and his most dramatic, in this mood one of the great twentieth-century masters of opera. At the back of a peasant's hut at Mitishi, Prince Andrei is lying wounded. He is delirious and the chorus can be heard singing 'Piti-piti-piti' as the blood pounds in his ears. The music returns to the lyricism of the opera's first part. Andrei longs to see Natasha again (Ex. 1) and she has in fact found her way to his death-bed, is recognised (Ex. 4), wonders if he has changed towards her, and then starts to beg for forgiveness. Andrei tells her that he loves her more than he ever has before and their voices join to celebrate what he thinks of as new happiness. He asks her if he will live (Ex. 1) and she tries to reassure him. He falls asleep dreaming of their first dance together (Ex. 3). As his last spasm comes, the sound of 'Piti-piti-piti' becomes ever more insistent until suddenly it stops.

Scene xiii. On the road to Smolensk, November 1812. A storm is raging. French troops are in retreat (a hint of the scherzo trumpets of Scene ix), escorting a group of Russian prisoners of war, among them Pierre and Karataev. Karataev can go no further and is shot as a straggler. Guerrillas attack the French and free the prisoners, and Pierre is recognised by Denisov, who assures him of victory and tells him also that Andrei is dead but Natasha safe in Moscow (Ex. 1). In a moment the Russian advance guard appears preceding the Marshal himself (Ex. 8). He is tired, but he knows that the French are beaten and his work done. All join in a great peroration to the eternal Russian spirit.

Prokofiev may on the one hand be thought to have attempted the impossible in turning Tolstoy's novel into a one-evening opera, but there is reason on the other for thinking that his epic will convey some of the novel's essence to the listener who already knows the book, which is to say three out of every four members of any Russian audience.

It is not hard to accept the echoes of Tchaikovsky in the first part and, in the second, the thrusting choruses and insistently appealing aria of Kutuzov as equally evocative of the moods Prokofiev wanted to create. The score contains a host of moments which illuminate character and situation and over everything is Prokofiev's rare ability to combine narrative with pathos. In 1972, a quarter of a century distant from the war and in a musical climate when new and (dare I say it?) romantic music had the therapeutic value of water in a desert, to hear as I did rehearsal after rehearsal and half a dozen performances in the space of five weeks was to be convinced all over again – this time from practical experience whereas originally from score, disc and a single Bolshoi performance – that Prokofiev's War and Peace is a masterpiece. And that opinion strengthened with each revival over the next dozen years. H.

GIACOMO PUCCINI

(born 22 December 1858, died 29 November 1924)

Giacomo Puccini came of a line of musicians active in Lucca for five generations. He was the first directly associated with theatre as opposed to church, and his success in the hundred and more years since his breakthrough with Manon Lescaut has been little short of phenomenal, certainly unparalleled in Italy since the early years of Verdi's ascendancy. The success contains a paradoxical element in that for much of that century, while audiences basked in the composer's prolific melody and accessible style, fellow composers and even critics had little but contempt for their colleague and his music, muttering about his ability to tailor the length of arias to fit the four-minute format of a gramophone record and holding it against him.

In a career of some forty years cut short by cancer, Puccini wrote only ten mature operas, three of which form part of a triple bill – effectively, seven evenings of opera. There has been much talk of the typical Puccini heroine, put-upon and forlorn, and it is true that Mimi, Butterfly, Suor Angelica and perhaps Manon fulfil the claim; to set against them, Tosca, Minnie, Giorgetta and Turandot come nowhere near the stereotype. On the other hand Liu, a purely secondary figure dramatically, can seem far more interesting than the less sympathetic Turandot.

Rational opinion nearly seventy-five years after his death is likely to take a different tack, admiring his choice of subjects and the care which went into their selection, appreciating the tinta (to borrow Verdi's expression) of each new subject and the immediacy with which he establishes local colour, relishing the variety, timing and dramatic skill of his scores. Manon Lescaut might be said to look back to tradition, but the skill and pace of La Bohème puts it into a new category altogether, and Butterfly and Fanciulla, for all the latter's relative poverty of invention, represent quite fresh departures. The three components of the Trittico contrast effectively, and Turandot again breaks new ground. If Puccini wrote tear-jerkers, he did so with a taste so immaculate that few have avoided the need to wipe their eyes when Musetta at the end of the waltz song flies into Marcello's arms, when Butterfly's surmise at sight of the ship turns into certainty, when Rodolfo is the last of the Bohemians to know Mimi dead.

Opera-goers of discernment have appreciated for much of the twentieth century that Puccini is a rare master, capable of delighting the mob with his melody and all but the snob with his masterly workmanship. Neither his publisher nor his bank manager can ever have had doubts on either score. H.

LE VILLI

The Fairies

Opera in two acts (originally one), text by Ferdinando Fontana after Alphonse Karr's story Les Willis. Première Milan, Teatro dal Verme, 31 May 1884; revised version, Turin, 26 December 1884.

Guglielmo, the head foresterBaritone
Anna, his daughterSoprano
Roberto, a young man.....Tenor

Place: The Black Forest

Running Time: 1 hour 5 minutes

Puccini, nearing thirty, entered his first opera in a competition organised by the publisher Sonzogno in 1883. It had no success (the score was said to be illegible) but its librettist was a member of a group of avant-garde writers known as the 'Scapigliati' (Bohemians), and the composer Boito, another member, helped to arrange a performance in Milan. There the opera was noticed by Giulio Ricordi, who took the composer on contract, advised a revision into two acts, and asked him to write a new opera for la Scala. Neither Le Villi nor Edgar, the new opera, a more conventional affair, had much success, but with Manon Lescaut a few years later Italy discovered it had another candidate for the mantle of Verdi.

Act I. Mountaineers celebrate the engagement of Roberto and Anna and the news that Roberto is about to leave for Mainz where he has been left a fortune. Anna goes to deposit her bouquet in Roberto's luggage as a keepsake (aria, 'Se come voi piccina'), and a love duet develops before Roberto leaves with the good wishes of all. An Intermezzo of two orchestral movements contains spoken descriptions of Roberto's seduction in Mainz by a witch, of Anna's death and funeral, and of the fate which can befall a faithless lover, danced to death by the Wilis – probably, suggests Julian Budden, intended to be read rather than declaimed from the stage.

Act II. Guglielmo, in one of Puccini's grandest arias for baritone, laments the death of his daughter and hopes for the vengeance of the Wilis on Roberto ('Anima santa'). An extensive solo ('Torna ai felici di'), written for an 1885 revival at la Scala, depicts the remorse of Roberto and the shock he feels when he realises Anna is dead. She reappears as the Wilis take over to wreak vengeance.

The opera is far from negligible, in spite of its curious, untraditional shape, and contains much attractive music, some of it, not unexpectedly, looking towards the past – 'Anima santa', impressive as it is, might be from an opera by Puccini's teacher, Ponchielli. Anna's romance on the other hand is a seductive tune, the tenor solo the longest the composer ever wrote, and the second intermezzo is rare in the composer's output as an orchestral work able to stand alone.

H.

MANON LESCAUT

Opera in four acts, text by Domenico Oliva and Luigi Illica, after the Abbé Prévost's novel. Première in Turin, 1 February 1893, with Cesira Ferrani, Giuseppe Cremonini, conductor Pomé.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Manon Lescaut | Soprano |
| Lescaut, her brother, a sergeant | Baritone |
| Chevalier des Grieux | Tenor |
| Geronte di Ravoit, Treasurer-General | Bass |
| Edmondo, a student | Tenor |
| An Innkeeper | Bass |
| Dancing Master | Tenor |
| A Singer | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Sergeant | Bass |
| A Lamp-Lighter | Tenor |
| A Naval Captain | Bass |
| Citizens, Students, Musicians, Prostitutes, Soldiers, Sailors | |

Place: Amiens, Paris, le Havre, Louisiana

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours

Puccini was thirty-four when his third opera, Manon Lescaut, was first heard in Turin, a week before the première of Falstaff in Milan. Seven different men, including the composer Leoncavallo, had worked on the libretto, but the result notwithstanding was a resounding success, the first of Puccini's career, and, though Verdi commented that Puccini seemed more a symphonist than an opera composer, the opera maintains a permanent place in the repertory.

Act I. In front of an inn at Amiens. A brilliant orchestral opening introduces Edmondo and fellow students who cavort in front of the townsfolk of Amiens. Des Grieux is persuaded to sing a mocking serenade: 'Tra voi, belle, brune e bionde'. The coach from Arras arrives to disgorge Lescaut, Geronte and Manon, the latter causing all hearts to flutter including that of des Grieux. He addresses her as 'Cortese damigella' to begin a duet which is starting to show the hall-marks of a full-blooded Puccinian love duet when Lescaut calls Manon inside.

Des Grieux muses rapturously in one of Puccini's most immediately attractive arias: 'Donna non vidi mai'. Geronte has his eye on Manon and he and Lescaut seem about to reach an understanding. Geronte arranges for a carriage for two, but Edmondo overhears and warns des Grieux; his duet with Manon ('Vedete? Io son fedele') suggests love returned. He quickly overcomes Manon's reservations, explains Geronte's plot, and together, applauded by the students, they elope in Geronte's carriage, leaving Lescaut and Geronte to plot the future, and Edmondo and the students to mock.

Act II. An elegant room in Geronte's Paris house. Manon at her dressing table is joined by Lescaut. He congratulates her on her present surroundings, splendid in comparison with the humble dwelling she once shared with des Grieux. It is obvious she still carries a torch for des Grieux, as she makes clear in an aria of genuine pathos: 'In quelle trine morbide'. Lescaut, always the instinctive pimp, offers to bring des Grieux to her, and teach him moreover how to win at the tables so that she may continue to enjoy her accustomed comfort. Their voices join in anticipation of the future – Lescaut's finest musical moment. Musicians come to sing a madrigal, but Manon is as bored by them as by the dancing master who follows. A lesson in the minuet starts, watched by Geronte and his friends. Manon sings a brilliant aria, 'L'ora o Tirsi, è vaga e bella', and says she will join Geronte and the others later on the promenade.

She has not long to wait before des Grieux precipitates himself into her room: 'Tu, tu, amore! Tu!' What starts with reproach rapidly becomes an impassioned love duet but it ends when Geronte returns to surprise the lovers. Manon brazens it out: let Geronte look in the mirror if he wants to understand. He promises he will return, and des Grieux urges instant flight, then in an agony of conviction berates her for the dance she leads him and for her incorrigible love of luxury: 'Ah, Manon, mi tradisce'. Lescaut rushes in to tell them Geronte has mobilised guards to arrest them, Manon lingers to collect her jewellery and the delay is fatal. They are arrested as thieves.

An intermezzo represents not only the journey to le Havre but des Grieux's despairing determination to follow Manon to the ends of the earth.

Act III. The harbour at le Havre. The plan des Grieux and Lescaut have hatched to rescue Manon from imprisonment is a failure and the roll is called of the women who are to be transported. When it is Manon's turn, des Grieux stays at her side, defies anyone to take her away from him and in a fine statement sings: 'Guardate! pazzo son!' (Look out! I'm mad!) The ship's captain makes a gesture and offers des Grieux passage to America.

Act IV. A deserted plain. Manon and des Grieux, victims of intrigue and jealousy, have left New Orleans. Manon is exhausted with the journey. The music is a melancholy duet, and when des Grieux goes off to get help, Manon's despair is expressed in a grandiose aria, 'Sola, perduta, abbandonata'. Puccini at one point removed it from the score but later restored it, slightly re-worked. When des Grieux returns, Manon is dying. He collapses by her side.

In spite of some far from negligible music in his first two operas, Le Villi and Edgar, Puccini found favour only with his third, Manon Lescaut, in which critics for the first time discerned an individual voice. That Massenet had written an opera on the same subject caused the composer some concern but it is fair to say that the Italian master-to-be, famous later for his portrayal of frail female heroines, in Manon Lescaut placed more emphasis on his hero, des Grieux, than on Manon, and in so doing created one of his most enduring tenor figures. H.

LA BOHÈME

A Bohemian Life

Opera in four acts, text by Giacosa and Illica. Première at the Teatro Regio, Turin, 1 February 1896, with Cesira Ferrani, Pasini, Gorga, Wilmant, Mazzara, Pini-Corsi, conductor Toscanini.

| | |
|---|----------|
| Rodolfo, a poet..... | Tenor |
| Marcello, a painter | Baritone |
| Colline, a philosopher | Bass |
| Schaunard, a musician..... | Baritone |
| Benoit, their landlord | Bass |
| Alcindoro, a state councillor and Musetta's admirer..... | Bass |
| Parpignol, an itinerant toy vendor..... | Tenor |
| Customs-House Sergeant..... | Bass |
| Musetta, a grisette | Soprano |
| Mimi, a seamstress..... | Soprano |

Students, Work Girls, Shopkeepers, Soldiers, Waiters,
Boys and Girls

Place: The Latin Quarter, Paris

Time: About 1830

Running Time: 2 hours

In La Bohème, Puccini's melodic invention and its turn to expressive use is at fullest flood, and he combines it with an epigrammatic, conversational conciseness that is unique in his output, technically adroit though that always is. In the way it puts across conversation economically and with heightened expression, it is without question his highest achievement – something of an Italianate parallel to Der Rosenkavalier – but so attractive is the melodic flow, so memorable the lyrical invention that few of its vast army of fans bother to notice that points are made, contrary to the work's reputation for wearing its heart on its sleeve, almost too fast for any but connoisseurs to take in!

Act I. A garret where live four students, Christmas Eve. Rodolfo is writing, Marcello at work on a painting, The Passage of the Red Sea. It is freezing cold and Rodolfo sacrifices his manuscript to keep the stove going. Colline returns from unsuccessfully trying to pawn some books but relief comes with the entry of Schaunard who has been engaged, and well paid, for music lessons by an eccentric Englishman. Nobody listens to his story though they are quite ready to hear his invitation to supper at Café Momus. A knock at the door brings Benoit in search of the rent. They flatter him at first but pretend to be indignant when he boasts of an amorous conquest and chuck him out. The others go off to the café while Rodolfo stays to finish an article.

Again comes a knock at the door; this time a woman's voice. Mimì asks Rodolfo to light her candle, which has gone out as she climbed the stairs. She collapses in a fit of coughing, but quickly revives and makes to leave. This time, she finds she has dropped her key and soon each is searching the by now darkened room for it. Rodolfo's hand meets hers and the flood of melody which has been threatening ever since Mimì's appearance bursts its banks: 'Che gelida manina' (Your tiny hand is frozen). There is perhaps no better known aria for tenor in all Italian opera. Mimì's own description of her work as an embroiderer is no less persuasive: 'Si, mi chiamano Mimì'. The voices of Rodolfo's friends call from below, Rodolfo is overcome by the sight of Mimì standing in the moonlight, and the act ends with an impassioned avowal of love on both sides: 'O soave fanciulla'.

Act II. A square, with the Café Momus. In a mere eighteen minutes the act introduces Mimì to the other students, and a vital new character, Musetta, Marcello's love, to the narrative. From the bustle of street-vendors and citizens in the last throes of Christmas shopping, tendrils of melody ascend to describe Colline's reaction to a second-hand coat, Schaunard's to a battered horn, Parpignol's to the crying of his wares, and Mimì's to a pink bonnet she wants Rodolfo to buy her. In the end, Rodolfo in a few impassioned phrases introduces Mimì to his friends and all start to order dinner when a commotion precedes the entry of Musetta, attended by the ludicrous Alcindoro, whose efforts to meet her whims provoke her to one excess after another. Marcello tries to hide his interest, but Musetta starts a slow waltz, famous as 'Musetta's waltz song', which she aims provocatively at Marcello. She gets rid of Alcindoro on the pretext that her shoe pinches, and she and Marcello fall into each other's arms to watch a military procession which crosses the square. The sight of the bill causes general alarm, calmed by Musetta's insistence that it be lumped with hers and presented to Alcindoro when he returns.

Puccini's achievement in his second act is no less than in the first, the embroidery of small personal details on the larger Christmas canvas not regularly noticed but nonetheless remarkable for that.

Act III. A toll-gate on the Orléans road into Paris. Open fifths in the orchestra suggest winter's cold, as customs-house men search scavengers and women on their way into town. Mimì comes looking for Rodolfo and Marcello comes out of the inn. He tells her he is painting signboards and Musetta giving music lessons. Won't Mimì join them? In a passage of real feeling, she tells him Rodolfo is so insanely jealous she fears they must part, and her story is fully borne out when Rodolfo emerges to give his side of the picture. 'Mimì è una civetta' (Mimì is a heartless creature), he claims with more than a little passion, but goes on to admit that her coughing worries him to death. A paroxysm gives away her presence, and they agree the time has come to part, less in anger than in sorrow. Tenderness runs through Mimì's farewell: 'Donde lieta usci', with its closing line: 'Addio, senza rancor'. Marcello inside the pub has caught Musetta flirting and a row flares up to combine in a quartet with the much gentler farewell of Mimì and Rodolfo, whose duetting might be mistaken for an avowal of love.

Act IV. The attic familiar from Act I. Rodolfo longs for Mimì, from whom he hasn't heard, Marcello for Musetta, who is thought to be off with yet another of her rich lovers. Their duet, 'Ah, Mimì, tu più non torni', suggests the withdrawal pangs are anything but over. Schaunard returns and thrusts a bottle of water into Colline's hat as if it were a champagne cooler, the prelude to a riotous student frolic, which culminates in organised dancing and a mock duel between Colline and Schaunard. This is interrupted by the arrival of Musetta, frantic with worry about Mimì, whom she has found half dead of tuberculosis at the foot of the stairs. Rodolfo carries her in and lays her on the bed the others have prepared. Rodolfo's presence restores her strength a little and for a moment she seems happy although it is plain that she is very weak. Her hands are cold, and Musetta gives Marcello her earrings to sell for medicine. Colline is not to be outdone and sings a sad little farewell to his coat ('Vecchia zimarra, senti') before taking it off to the pawnbroker.

When they are alone, Mimì and Rodolfo invoke past happiness and the music of earlier acts reflects their thoughts. Musetta and the others return, but Mimì is beyond help and she dies so quietly that Rodolfo does not at first notice what has happened, then explodes in grief.

Singers from Melba and Caruso, Pavarotti and Freni, to Gheorghiu and Alagna, have always loved La Bohème, and for a century its melodic profusion has flattered them as well as audiences. From the opening vocal phrases, there is an individual lilt to the score, its character coming from a combination of rhythmical brilliance, as shown in the extrovert aspects of the action (the Bohemians cavorting at home, the hubbub of Christmas Eve in Act II), with the lyricism of the lovers and the famous arias this generates. H.

TOSCA

Opera in three acts, text by Giacosa and Illica after the play by Victorien Sardou. Première at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome, 14 January 1900, with Hariclea Darclée, de Marchi, Giraltoni, conductor Mugnone.

| | |
|---|-----------|
| Floria Tosca, a celebrated singer | Soprano |
| Mario Cavaradossi, a painter | Tenor |
| Baron Scarpia, Chief of Police | Baritone |
| Cesare Angelotti, a political prisoner | Bass |
| A Sacristan | Baritone |
| Spoletta, a police agent | Tenor |
| Sciarrone, a gendarme | Bass |
| A Jailer | Bass |
| A Shepherd Boy | Contralto |

Roberti, an Executioner; a Cardinal, Judge, Scribe,
Soldiers, Ladies, Nobles, Citizens, Artisans etc.

Place: Rome

Time: 1800

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

The opera is set in the year Napoleon invaded Italy. During the action, the Austrian General Melas is reported to have defeated Napoleon and the consequent celebrations are likely to be attended by Queen Marie Caroline, wife of the Neapolitan King Ferdinand IV, daughter of Empress Maria Theresa of Austria and sister to Queen Marie Antoinette of France. Baron Scarpia, the much-feared Chief of Police, is based on a real-life Sicilian figure, who incidentally affected old-fashioned dress, hence the white wig he wears, more appropriate to an earlier period. Cavaradossi and Angelotti are supporters of the liberal group hoping for Napoleon's victory.

Act I. The Church of Sant'Andrea della Valle. Three chords, played fff tutta forza and attached to the sinister Baron Scarpia, introduce the opera before we meet Angelotti, just escaped from prison and in a frenzy to locate the Attavanti chapel in which his sister has hidden a key and clothes. He disappears into the chapel as the Sacristan comes looking for the painter Cavaradossi, not at his easel, the picnic in his basket as yet untouched. The Sacristan kneels for the Angelus, and when Cavaradossi comes in and uncovers the picture he has been painting, recognises in the blonde Mary Magdalene a woman he has seen several times lately at prayer in the church. Yes, he painted her, says Cavaradossi, then abandons his work as he dreams of his love, Floria Tosca: 'Recondita armonia di bellezze diverse'. It is one of the most convincing of all Puccini's tenor arias. The Sacristan grumbles as he cleans the brushes while Cavaradossi sings, then to his delight hears that the painter plans to leave his picnic untouched.

Angelotti comes out of hiding and recognises in Cavaradossi a political sympathiser. Cavaradossi wants to help but, hearing Tosca's voice outside, urges Angelotti to hide in the chapel.

Tosca's jealousy prompts her to think someone is with Cavaradossi but he reassures her and it is not long before she is making an assignation for later that night. Cavaradossi seems less than enthusiastic and it takes all Tosca's blandishments ('Non la sospiri la nostra casetta?') to bring his thoughts round to hers. She recognises the Magdalene as a portrait of Marchesa Attavanti and suspicion flares up again. There is nothing to it, he says; he saw her yesterday, and painted her at prayer, demanding rhetorically what eyes could compare with Tosca's ('Qual'occhio al mondo'). From Tosca's entrance, the entire duet, with its contrasting episodes, constitutes one of Puccini's finest and most detailed scenes, comparable to that in the first act of Madama Butterfly.

Tosca leaves, Angelotti comes out of the chapel and he and Cavaradossi refer with hatred to what they describe as the bigoted satyr Scarpia who has consigned Angelotti to prison (the chords of the opera's introduction). In case of necessity, Angelotti should hide in the well in Cavaradossi's garden ('al pozzo del giardino'). A cannon shot is heard and they make a hurried escape as the Sacristan returns. He summons the choristers who dance madly round him only for the chords to announce the arrival of Scarpia in person. His orders are quickly given, and a fan is equally quickly found in the chapel: Marchesa Attavanti's! An agent brings in the basket, now empty of the picnic the Sacristan tells him Cavaradossi wasn't going to eat. Scarpia decides Cavaradossi must have been Angelotti's accomplice. When Tosca returns, Scarpia affects to contrast her seemly behaviour in church with that of others who come perhaps to meet their lovers, and points to the fan which was (he pretends) on the easel. Jealousy comes easily to Tosca, and when she leaves, Scarpia orders one of his men to follow her, then himself joins in the Te deum, genuflecting to the Cardinal in procession but singing lustily of the satisfaction he will have in revenging himself on Cavaradossi and bending Tosca to his pleasure.

Act II. Scarpia's apartment in the Palazzo Farnese, where he is at supper. His passions rise as he reflects that he infinitely prefers a forced conquest to a passive surrender ('Ha più forte sapore'), then Spoletta brings the bad news that Angelotti was nowhere to be found when he tracked Tosca to Cavaradossi's villa, followed by the good – he has arrested Cavaradossi. The cantata begins and Tosca's voice can be heard through the open window as Cavaradossi is brought in. Scarpia starts to interrogate his prisoner who denies all knowledge of Angelotti, and continues his questioning as Tosca enters the room. Tosca has no idea that next door is a torture chamber, and she and Scarpia at first converse as if there were no external pressures; but not for long. Her heated denial of any knowledge of Angelotti's whereabouts prompts Scarpia to describe the torments Cavaradossi is undergoing. She is horrified and gasps out that she will tell him the truth. A scream of anguish from the inner room brings an admission: 'Nel pozzo nel giardino'.

Cavaradossi, dragged into Scarpia's room, haltingly asks Tosca if he gave anything away. She reassures him just as Scarpia instructs Spoletta 'In the well in the garden!', but the tables are turned when Sciarrone hurries in with the news that Melas was after all defeated, Napoleon victorious. Cavaradossi finds the strength with a great cry of 'Vittoria!' to hurl defiance at Scarpia.

Scarpia nonetheless holds the cards. Perhaps, he suggests, he and Tosca may together concoct a plan to save Cavaradossi. 'Your price?' demands Tosca. Scarpia laughs at her naïveté. 'Già mi dicon venal' (Venal my enemies call me) he sings in a passage of great power: she is the price that must be paid for Cavaradossi's life. Distant drums suggest an escort about to conduct a prisoner to the scaffold. In the opera's most famous aria (one Puccini is said to have grudged its place as interrupting the flow of the action), Tosca prays movingly for strength ('Vissi d'arte, vissi d'amore'). Spoletta announces Angelotti took poison as he was arrested, then waits for instructions about the other prisoner. Tosca reluctantly nods to Scarpia, who tells Spoletta there has been a change of plan. For Cavaradossi there will be a mock execution, simulated only – 'just as we did in the case of Palmieri. You understand: just like Palmieri'. Spoletta seems to grasp the emphasis. Tosca demands safe conduct and, as Scarpia writes at his desk, sees a knife on the supper table, picks it up and stabs him to the heart. He falls dying and she searches for the paper, then, placing a candle on either side of the dead man's head, slowly leaves the room.

Act III. A platform high on Castel Sant' Angelo; St Peter's can be seen in the distance. A shepherd sings below, and as dawn approaches Cavaradossi is brought in. He bribes the jailer to deliver a letter to Tosca, before losing himself in memories of her. 'E lucevan le stelle' is in great contrast to 'Recondita armonia', with which he began the opera, a moving farewell to life as opposed to a panegyric to a loved one. Tosca joins Cavaradossi, who listens to the story of Scarpia's killing, then lovingly takes her hands in his: 'O dolci mani mansuete e pure'. They plot their departure and their voices join in a duet ('Amaro sol per te m'era il morire'), which ends on a note less of love than of defiance. When the firing squad, duty done, leaves to a sinister funeral march, Scarpia is found to have kept one last card, a joker, up his sleeve. The mock execution was real after all, and with a last cry, Tosca eludes Spoletta and plunges over the parapet.

In spite of 'Vissi d'arte', Cavaradossi's three splendid arias and Scarpia's two monologues, Tosca is not an opera of solos. Puccini has constructed a score which flows, often without recourse to the singers, like the incidental music to a film – introducing and reinforcing dramatic events, regularly raising the temperature, nudging the audience, responding to the ebb and flow of the drama. H.

MADAMA BUTTERFLY

Opera in three acts, text by Giacosa and Illica. Première at la Scala, Milan, on 17 February 1904, with Rosina Storchio, Giovanni Zenatello, Giuseppe de Luca, conductor Campanini. Revised for Brescia, May 1904, with Salomea Krusceniski and Zenatello.

Cio-Cio-San (Madam Butterfly), *a geisha*Soprano
Suzuki, *her servant*Mezzo-Soprano
Kate Pinkerton, *Pinkerton's American wife*Mezzo-Soprano
Lieutenant B.F. Pinkerton, *U.S. Navy*Tenor
Sharpless, *American Consul at Nagasaki*Baritone
Goro, *a marriage broker*Tenor
Prince Yamadori, *a rich Japanese*Baritone
The Bonze, *a Priest; Butterfly's uncle*Bass
The Imperial CommissionerBass
The Official RegistrarBaritone
Dolore (Trouble), *Cio-Cio-San's son*Silent
Cio-Cio-San's Relations and Friends; Servants

Place: Nagasaki, Japan

Time: Early Twentieth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 5 minutes

Madama Butterfly's first performance in Milan was a fiasco. The public audibly objected to a resemblance it found between the theme of Butterfly's entry (heard again, notably in the love duet) and Mimì's first-act aria in La Bohème, and to the fatiguing length of the second act, given without interval. It was heard only once in that form but a revised version (with a much more dramatic soprano than in Milan) triumphed in Brescia. Substantial revision brought a new theme for Butterfly's entrance and the love duet, the second act divided into two, and in the third an aria for Pinkerton.

But that wasn't the end of it. There were further revisions for Covent Garden in 1905, for America in 1906 and, at the behest of the experienced Albert Carré, for the Opéra-Comique at the end of the same year. That 1906 version was the composer's last word. 'Genre' scenes featuring Butterfly's relations were cut from the first act, and revision of the second went far beyond the cosmetic, mainly because the composer had effective second thoughts but also, modern speculation has it, because some of the first thoughts were too 'modern' for an audience in the early 1900s. That Puccini had seventeen years in which to revise the 1906 score but never did has not prevented attempts since the early 1980s to come up with a 'version' for almost any new production.

Puccini was at pains not only to introduce genuine elements of Japanese music into his score but also to imitate Japanese musical style. The result is highly effective, and the exotic, dominating in the scene after Butterfly's entrance and in much of Act II, in no way contradicts Puccini's own brand of lyricism as evidenced in Butterfly's entrance, the love duet, 'Un bel dì', the letter scene with Sharpless, Pinkerton's aria and Butterfly's death.

Act I. A house overlooking Nagasaki harbour. Goro is showing Lieutenant Pinkerton over the house he has leased for the Japanese bride he is to marry ('Tied for 999 years but with the option at every month to cancel the contract'). Goro introduces the servants and is describing the bridal party when the Consul makes his entrance. Pinkerton delights in the elasticity of local law and, in spite of Sharpless's obvious disapproval of the step he is taking, a rampant sexuality pervades the music of his toast to the future ('Amore o grillo').

The bride's arrival is imminent and her voice soars over those of her relations as she makes her entrance. She discloses her age – fifteen; her mother's poverty; that her father committed hari kiri; that her few possessions mean little to her if her new husband does not like them; and that she has abandoned her own religion to take up Pinkerton's. The Commissioner performs the ceremony, the Consul and other officials leave, and Pinkerton is proposing a toast which he hopes will get rid of the relations when there is an interruption. Butterfly's uncle the Bonze has got wind of her conversion and loudly denounces her. The relations follow him out and Pinkerton is left to comfort his bride.

It is the moment for the most extended love duet Puccini ever wrote. It builds slowly while Butterfly rids her mind of the cries of the Bonze, turns to her confused thoughts when it was suggested she should marry an American, passes through an exquisite passage pleading for reassurance ('Vogliatemi bene') until it reaches a climax with a return of the music of Butterfly's entrance.

Act II. Inside Butterfly's house. Three years have passed since Pinkerton left, promising, according to Butterfly, to return 'when the robins nest in spring'. Perhaps they nest less often over there? To comfort herself as much as Suzuki, she sings 'Un bel dì vedremo' (One fine day), a description of his future home-coming which had become possibly the most popular aria of the twentieth century until 'Nessun dorma' swept the board. Sharpless now comes on a mission which is little to his taste – to tell Butterfly he has heard from Pinkerton that he is returning, but does not intend to see her. He is constantly interrupted: by indignation at Goro's suggestion she should take a Japanese husband, by the appearance of her suitor Yamadori, and finally, while reading the letter, by Butterfly's over-enthusiasm. He takes the bull by the horns: what would be her reaction if he were never to come back? She reacts as if struck in the face, then fetches her little boy, born since Pinkerton's departure, and releases her pent-up emotion in an aria ('Che tua madre'). The child's name is 'Dolore', she says, and Sharpless goes resignedly away, his message only partly delivered.

Goro is dragged in and castigated for spreading a false rumour about the baby's parentage, then a cannon shot diverts all attention to the harbour. Through the telescope, Butterfly makes out that it is the Abraham Lincoln, Pinkerton's ship, and apprehension turns to jubilation: flowers must be scattered to celebrate Pinkerton's return. She puts on her wedding garment; she, Suzuki and Dolore will together watch until Pinkerton arrives, while a wordless chorus suggests the warm night outside.

Act III. The curtain rises on the same scene, with dawn breaking, Butterfly still on watch. She sings a sad little lullaby as she carries the baby to bed. Suzuki has not long to wait. Pinkerton and Sharpless appear and a moment later Suzuki learns that the woman outside is Pinkerton's wife. The strands of grief and consternation are gathered in a trio, after which Pinkerton, unable to face the situation, sings a tearful farewell to the house he once knew so well (the interpolated, often maligned but effective 'Addio, fiorito asil'), and leaves.

Butterfly is convinced Pinkerton is there and only gradually comes to terms with the reality. She sees Mrs Pinkerton, comforts the weeping Suzuki, then contrives to wish her rival happiness for the future. To Pinkerton she sends a message that, if he will come for his son in half an hour, he may have him. In this last scene, Butterfly acquires tragic dignity, and it is on this level that she reads the words engraved on her father's sword 'To die with honour when one can no longer live with honour', before embracing the child whom Suzuki, in one last effort to avert disaster, has brought in. She sings heartbreakingly to the boy, then blindfolds him, retreats behind a screen and commits harikiri. Pinkerton returns to find Butterfly dead on the floor and his son waving an American flag. H.

LA FANCIULLA DEL WEST

The Girl of the Golden West

Opera in three acts, text by G. Civinini and C. Zangarini, from the play by David Belasco. Première at Metropolitan, New York, 10 December 1910, with Destinn, Caruso, Amato, conductor Toscanini. First performed Covent Garden, 1911, with Destinn, Bassi, Dinh Gilly, conductor Campanini; la Scala, Milan, 1912, with Poli-Randaccio, Martinelli, Galeffi. Revived Metropolitan, 1929, with Jeritza, Martinelli, Tibbett; la Scala, 1930, with dalla Rizza, Thill, Viglione-Borghese, conductor de Sabata; 1937, with Cobelli, Merli, Armando Borgioli; San Francisco, 1943, with Kirk, Jagel, Weede; la Scala, 1956, with Corelli; 1957, with del Monaco; Metropolitan, New York, 1961, with Price, Tucker, Colzani; Sadler's Wells, 1963, with Fretwell, Donald Smith, Herincx; Covent Garden, 1977, with Carol Neblett, Domingo, Silvano Carroli, conductor Mehta.

Minnie, owner of 'The Polka'Soprano
Jack Rance, the SheriffBaritone
Dick Johnson, a banditTenor
Nick, bar-tender at 'The Polka'Tenor

Miners

SonoraBaritone
TrimTenor
SidBaritone
HandsomeBaritone
HarryTenor
JoeTenor
HappyBaritone
LarkensBass

Ashby, agent of the Wells Fargo Transport CoBass
Billy Jackrabbit, an American IndianBass
Wowkle, Billy's squawMezzo-Soprano
Jake Wallace, a travelling minstrelBaritone
José Castro, a 'greaser' from Ramerrez's bandBass
A CourierTenor

Place: A Mining Camp

Time: 1849–50

Running Time: 2 hours

Puccini saw David Belasco's play as early as 1907 and the opera seems always to have been intended for the Metropolitan in New York, where with Caruso, Emmy Destinn and Amato in the cast and Toscanini conducting, it was in 1910 a resounding success.

Act I. A large room, forming the inside of 'The Polka', the inn where the miners come to drink and gamble. It is presided over by Minnie, whom they respect, love and protect, and who in return has even ventured to set up a sort of elementary school for the roughest of the inhabitants. She is looked after by two American Indian servants, Billy and Wowkle. There is a bar, a notice offering a reward for the arrest of Ramerrez, and a sheet-iron screen to protect a person from pistol shots.

Miners greet each other, and a game of faro starts up. Larkens is observed to be melancholy – he has gold fever, says Nick. Jake comes through singing a melancholy song, in whose refrain all join. Larkens breaks down, and Sonora takes up a collection for him. Sid is caught cheating and the miners are for meting out justice to him themselves, but Rance, the Sheriff, who has been in and out of the bar since the beginning, dominates the scene, and tells them rather to pin a card on Sid's chest as a token that he must not play; pass the word round the camp, and string him up if he takes off the mark of shame. Ashby comes in, asks after Minnie, and tells Rance that he is close on the heels of the notorious Ramerrez. Minnie sends in hot whisky and lemon, and they all drink to her, Rance taking the opportunity of mentioning that she is likely soon to become Mrs Rance. Sonora mocks him, and they fight, but are separated after a moment by a woman's strong arm. It is Minnie. She tells them all off, and they bring one or two small gifts for her. Rance and Ashby talk apart, as Minnie takes down the Bible and starts to teach from it.

The post arrives, and Ashby has a letter from Nina Micheltorena, a cast-off girlfriend of Ramerrez's, indicating where he is to be found that night. He rejoices at the prospect of catching him at last. Everyone reads letters and newspapers.

A stranger is outside, Nick says, asking for whisky with water. They all laugh at the notion. Rance comes up to Minnie and starts to tell her how much he loves her, but she interrupts and will have none of it. He goes sulkily away, and bursts out into an avowal of his passion: 'Minnie della mia casa son partito'. He left everything without regret when his gambler's heart impelled him to come out West, but now he would give a fortune for a kiss from her. Minnie says that she has happy memories of her parents and her home-life, and would not take a husband unless she loved him as they loved each other: 'Laggiù nel Soledad'.

Nick brings in the stranger, Dick Johnson. Rance is rude to him, but Minnie recognises him and talks about the time they first met. Rance comes over and knocks his glass off the counter, saying that he is Sheriff and demanding to know what is the stranger's business. The miners are about to take Rance's part when Minnie says she will vouch for him. Johnson takes Minnie off to dance. While they are away, Castro is brought in; he is a member of Ramerrez's band and has been captured. He will lead them to the bandit's camp if they will spare him, then, seeing Johnson's saddle lying on the ground, thinks they have already captured him. When his chief comes from the other room, he tells Johnson that he has given nothing away, and that the gang is all round, waiting to fall on the defenceless camp and pillage it.

Johnson remains behind with Minnie when the others ride off. He comments on her defenceless state and on the strange fact that she is guarding the miners' gold. She tells him that she loves the life she lives and would have no other. Nick says that a bandit has been seen skulking round the camp but Johnson comforts her, and agrees to come up later that evening to her cabin to continue the conversation and have a meal. As he goes out, she bursts into tears, but he tells her: 'You've the face of an angel.'

Act II. Minnie's hut – a single room, above which is a loft. Wowkle is singing a lullaby to her papoose. She and Billy talk for a moment – shall they get married? – before Minnie comes in, sends Billy about his business and tells Wowkle that there will be two for supper. She starts to dress up, obviously hoping to make a real impression on Johnson when he comes. He knocks at the door and they sit down to supper, Johnson commenting that the life up here must be lonely. 'Oh, you've no notion how exciting my life is,' says Minnie: 'O, se sapeste.'

They sing of their happiness, and Minnie makes up a bed for herself in front of the fire. She has persuaded Johnson to spend the night there, as he would inevitably get lost in the heavy snow. Voices demand admittance. Minnie hides Johnson behind the curtains of the bed, and lets in Rance, Nick, Ashby, and Sonora. They were worried for her safety – Dick Johnson, they have discovered, is none other than the notorious Ramerrez. They were led by Castro to his hiding-place.

She says goodnight to them, then rounds furiously on Johnson. He admits he came to rob, but at sight of her, changed his purpose. In an aria he explains his upbringing: his father was a bandit, and when he died six months ago ('Or son sei mesi') left nothing for him, his mother and his brothers, but the gang of thieves he led. He was fated to take to the road, but from the moment he met Minnie he longed to lead an honest life. He does not expect forgiveness, only understanding.

Johnson rushes out, and a moment later there is the sound of a shot. A body falls against the door; Minnie opens it, and he staggers in, telling her not to shut the door as he will leave again. She cries that she loves him and will help him, and drags him to concealment in the loft. No sooner is he in hiding than Rance is again at the door. He searches everywhere for his quarry, then, asking Minnie to swear that he is not hidden there, tries to embrace her. She backs away from him; he accuses her of loving the bandit. With a gesture of defiance, Rance swears to Minnie that she shall never be Johnson's. A drop of blood falls on his outstretched hand, then another. Rance calls to Johnson to come out of hiding; he descends the ladder, helped by Minnie, and collapses at the bottom. Minnie tries a last desperate expedient. She will play poker with Rance: if she wins, Johnson's life is hers, if she loses, Rance wins her love. He cannot resist the gamble. They play two hands, each winning one, but before the last Minnie shows signs of distress and asks Rance to get her a drink from the bottle in the corner. She secretes some cards in her stocking, and substitutes them for the hand she has been dealt. Rance returns, and against his three kings, Minnie is able to show three aces and a pair. He leaves the house, and Minnie is left alone with the lover whose life she has saved.

Act III. A clearing in the forest. Nick, Rance, and Ashby are sitting round a fire. They are members of a party hunting for Ramerrez. They reflect bitterly on the change that Johnson's arrival has brought into their lives. Ashby shouts that his men seem to have caught up with their quarry, but it is a false alarm. Rance raises his arms towards Minnie's cabin, and shouts triumphantly that she will not see her lover again, except at the end of a rope. There is another false alarm, and then Sonora gallops in shouting that they have caught him at last. Ashby hands over Johnson to the Sheriff, who suggests that they string him up forthwith. All unite in calling down curses on his head, but he protests that he stopped short of murder, and asks for one thing only, that he be allowed to speak before he dies. He makes an impassioned plea that Minnie shall think he has gone free, and never know the ignominious fate which overtook him: 'Ch'ella mi creda libero e lontano' (Let her believe that I am free and far away). It is one of Puccini's most famous arias, and one that is familiar to every Italian that has ever been to the opera. In the 1914–18 war it was even a favourite song with troops on the march.

Almost before Johnson has finished speaking, Rance rushes up to him and hits him in the face, to sounds of disapproval from the bystanders. They are about to hang their prisoner when Minnie's voice is heard. In a moment she is among them, threatening the first man that takes a step towards Johnson, and defying them to do their worst. For years she shared their troubles and their dangers – will they deny her the first thing she has ever asked of them? She and Johnson were planning to start a new life together, the bandit having died in her cabin a week before, when the honest man was born. Sonora goes to her side and takes her part; they agree that they owe her too much to deny her this. She and Johnson go off arm-in-arm, to seek a new existence together. H.

LA RONDINE

The Swallow

Lyric comedy in three acts, text by G. Adami, from the German libretto by A.M. Willner and H. Reichert. Première at Monte Carlo, 27 March 1917, with dalla Rizza, Ferraris, Schipa, Francesco Dominici, Huberdeau, conductor Marinuzzi. First performed Bologna, 1917; Rome, 1918; Metropolitan, New York, 1928, with Bori, Fleischer, Gigli, Tokatyan, Ludikar, conductor Bellezza. Revived Metropolitan, 1936, with Bori, Martini, conductor Panizza; la Scala, Milan, 1940, with Favero, Malipiero, conductor Marinuzzi; Rome, 1940, with Favero, Gigli, Gobbi, Taddei. First performance in England, 1966, by Opera Viva; English Opera Group, 1974, with June Bronhill.

Magda, Rambaldo's mistress.....Soprano

Lisette, *her maid*Soprano

Ruggero, a young man.....Tenor

Prunier, *a poet*Tenor¹

Rambaldo, a wealthy Parisian.....Baritone

PérichaudBass-Baritone

His friends

GobinTenor

CrébillonBass-Baritone

Ladies of pleasure and friends of Magda

Yvette.....Soprano

Bianca.....Soprano

SuzyMezzo-Soprano

A StewardBass

Ladies and Gentlemen of the World, Citizens,
Students, Artists, Demi-Mondaines, Dancers, etc.

Place: Paris

Time: The Second Empire

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

It was while he was in Vienna in 1912 that Puccini was asked by an Austrian publisher to write a light opera in something approaching the Viennese manner. The war prevented fulfilment of the suggested contract, but Puccini decided to set the libretto which had been prepared for him, albeit in a somewhat different form from that originally envisaged. The music is light in character and frequently employs waltz rhythms, but the composer has abandoned any attempt to write an operetta.

¹ Originally baritone, later tenor.

Act I. A luxuriously furnished room in Magda's house in Paris. Magda and Rambaldo are entertaining their friends, among whom is Prunier, a poet. He sings his latest song sitting at the piano. It tells the story of one Doretta, who dreams that the king looked upon her one day. When Prunier says that the end evades him, Magda takes up the tale ('Chi il bel sogno di Doretta'). Rambaldo produces a necklace he has been meaning all evening to give Magda. Lisette the maid, about whose cheeky habits Prunier is not slow to complain but whom Magda praises as a ray of sunshine in her life, asks Rambaldo whether he will at last see the young man who has been waiting for nearly two hours to see him. He is the son of an old friend of Rambaldo's.

Magda talks to her friends of the old days when she was still an innocent girl and went to Bullier's café in search of adventure and, maybe, love. The dancing was something that she can never forget, nor the memory of the man she met there, into whose eyes she gazed, but whose name she never knew. 'Ore dolci e divine', she sings, and the music traces every stage of that never-to-be-forgotten experience of her carefree youth.

Ruggero is brought in just as Prunier starts to tell everyone's future from their hands; Magda's is that, like a swallow, she will migrate far away from Paris, perhaps to find love. The conversation turns to where Ruggero shall spend his first evening in Paris; Bullier's is chosen, and Lisette agrees that the choice is an excellent one.

All leave, except Prunier who stays on the verandah. It is Lisette's day off, she reminds Magda, who goes off to her room. Lisette reappears, dressed in an assortment of her mistress's finery. She runs into Prunier, who takes her in his arms with obvious affection – objecting, though, a moment later, that her clothes do not match. She rushes out and reappears more suitably dressed and they go off together. Magda herself comes in, hardly recognisable in that her hair has been redone and she is dressed simply and as a grisette.

Act II. Chez Bullier. The room is crowded with artists, grisettes, demi-mondaines and men about town. Ruggero is sitting alone at one of the tables, apparently oblivious of the confusion and noise around him, and quite unresponsive to the various girls. Magda comes in and has some difficulty in fending off any number of would-be escorts, which she does by saying she is meeting the young man sitting in the corner.

Ruggero is delighted when she sits by him. They dance, and Magda is irresistibly reminded of her adventure long ago; they even write their names in pencil on the marble-topped table at which they are sitting. Prunier and Lisette come in, and Lisette thinks she recognises her mistress, but is persuaded by her escort that she is mistaken. They are introduced to each other, and sing a quartet expressing their different views and requirements of love.

Magda sees Rambaldo come in, and Prunier hastens to get Ruggero and Lisette out of the way. Rambaldo comes over to Magda, brushes Prunier aside, and asks her if she is coming home with him. She tells him she has found love and is not leaving with him, now or at any time. In spite of the blow he preserves his dignity, and leaves her sitting where he has found her. Ruggero returns and together they leave the restaurant.

Act III. A little cottage, near Nice, in which live Magda and Ruggero, secure in their love. The two lovers are blissfully happy, and Ruggero, who says he has written to ask his father's consent to their marriage, tells her of his confidence that his family will receive her as one of themselves. Magda wonders how best to let him know the details of her past.

Lisette and Prunier can be heard in the distance, and they appear just after Ruggero and Magda have left. It appears that Prunier tried to turn Lisette into a successful actress, only to have to listen to the hisses of the audience at her solitary appearance. Lisette now wants her old job back with Magda. Magda agrees, and Lisette immediately seems more natural in her accustomed surroundings – so too would Magda, hints Prunier, if she were to return to Paris and gaiety. Magda understands that Rambaldo has sent her a message through Prunier and that she can return to him whenever she wishes.

Prunier prepares to go, saying he has finished with Lisette for ever – but he does not omit to find out when she is going out that night. Ruggero comes in with a letter he has had from his mother, and makes Magda read it. She tells him she cannot deceive him any longer; he must know that she has been ready to sell her favours for money, that she has lived in guilty splendour. She can love him, but she cannot marry him and come to meet his mother as if she were a virgin bride. They must part, she insists, and, supported by Lisette and with breaking heart, she goes out, back to her own existence, leaving behind her the one love of her life. (In a revised version of the opera's end, Puccini has Ruggero discover Magda's past and, as a result, throw her out.) H.

IL TABARRO

The Cloak

Opera in one act, text by G. Adami, after the play by Didier Gold, La Houppelande. Première at Metropolitan, New York, on 14 December 1918, with Muzio, Crimi, Montesanto, Didur, conductor Moranzoni. First performed in Rome, 1919, with Maria Labia, di Giovanni (Edward Johnson), Galeffi, conductor Marinuzzi; Covent Garden, 1920, with Quaiatti, Tom Burke, Gilly; la Scala, Milan, 1922, with Concato, Piccaluga, Noto, conductor Panizza; Sadler's Wells, 1935 (in English), with Winifred Kennard, Wendon, Matters. Revived Metropolitan, 1946, with Albanese, Jagel, Tibbett; Covent Garden, 1965, with Collier, Craig, Gobbi, conductor Pritchard.

Michele, owner of a barge, aged fiftyBaritone
 Luigi, a stevedore, aged twentyTenor
 'Tinca', a stevedore, aged thirty-five.....Tenor
 'Talpa', a stevedore, aged fifty-five.....Bass
 Giorgetta, Michele's wife, aged twenty-fiveSoprano
 Frugola, Talpa's wife, aged fiftyMezzo-Soprano

Place: The Seine, in Paris
 Time: Early Twentieth Century
 Running Time: 1 hour

Puccini, against his publisher's inclinations, had long wanted to work on a triptych of contrasting subjects and Il Tabarro came first to his notice. Forzano suggested the other two subjects, which he seems to have composed without difficulty, and the Trittico was first performed, in the composer's absence, at the Metropolitan in New York.

Attempts to pair Tabarro with Gianni Schicchi, thus shortening the evening and omitting the least satisfactory element of the Trittico, seem doomed to failure. Puccini, the mature theatrical craftsman, may have slightly misjudged the length of his triple bill but unquestionably not its shape, and to alter it in this way is like leaving out the slow movement of a symphony: self-defeating.

The action of Il Tabarro takes place on board a barge, whose master is Michele. It is moored in the Seine and the imposing shape of Notre-Dame can be seen in the distance. The barge takes up most of the stage, but beyond it can be seen the shore, to which it is connected by a gangway.

The curtain rises before the music begins. A swaying orchestral figure denotes the gentle movement of a boat tied up to the shore. It is the end of the day, and workmen are finishing their job of loading the barge. Michele and Giorgetta take little notice of them as they work, but Giorgetta suggests that they should be offered a drink before they go. Michele goes up to embrace her, but she only offers him her cheek, and he goes discontentedly on shore. The workmen crowd round Giorgetta, and drink to her in a well-defined triple time. An organ-grinder goes by on the shore and Luigi calls to him to play for them. Giorgetta says she only understands music which sets her feet dancing. The phrase is later considerably developed in her love scene with Luigi.

Tinca is immediately at her side offering himself as a partner. His clumsiness becomes too much for her, and Luigi pushes him aside and takes his place, holding Giorgetta closer than is perhaps necessary. Talpa sees Michele coming and the dancing stops hurriedly as Giorgetta asks Michele about arrangements for the morrow, when they are due to leave for Rouen; he will take the three – Tinca, Talpa, and Luigi – who have been helping him in Paris.

Frugola, Talpa's wife, appears and talks of her occupation as a rag-picker. Her one love, it appears, is her cat, for whom she buys the best meat available. Talpa, Tinca and Luigi with other stevedores come up from the hold, and Tinca claims that he drinks to forget his sorrows. Luigi takes up the cue: he is right, their fate is a miserable one ('Hai ben ragione'). The solution, says Tinca, is to follow his example: booze!

Talpa and Frugola prepare to go home, dreaming of the cottage in the country they will never be able to afford. Giorgetta admits that her dream is for something quite different; she was born in the suburbs of Paris, and wishes that Michele might one day give up their nomadic existence and settle down: 'E ben altro il mio sogno'. This is one of the opera's purple passages, and Luigi joins his voice to hers as they agree that this former life was the happiest they have known: 'Ma chi lascia il sobborgo'.

Giorgetta and Luigi are alone. They listen to voices singing off-stage; then Luigi moves towards Giorgetta, who stops him with a gesture. They are lovers and Luigi complains of the barrier which prevents them being happy together. There is a short interruption as Michele comes up from down below. Luigi asks him to put him ashore next day at Rouen; he means to try his luck there as a labourer. Michele advises strongly against such a course of action, and Luigi agrees to go on working for him. Michele says goodnight. Luigi's enthusiasm carries Giorgetta away, and the duet rises to a climax as Luigi agrees to come for her in an hour's time; they will use the same signal as last night, a lighted match will mean that all is safe.

Luigi departs and Giorgetta reflects sadly on the difficulties in the way of being happy in this life as Michele comes back and asks her why she has not yet gone to bed. They talk for a moment of their crew, and then Michele comes close to her with an affectionate gesture. Why can they not renew their old love, which seems to have cooled since the death of their child: 'Perchè, perchè non m'ami più?' Why does she no longer come for warmth beneath his cloak? Giorgetta reacts prosaically – they are both getting older.

She goes off to bed, but the moment she has gone, Michele exclaims in fury: 'You whore!' He listens for a moment, then peers in at the window to see Giorgetta still dressed and apparently waiting: for what? Who is her lover? He goes through the men with whom he knows her to be in contact, but dismisses each one in turn. Who can it be? Would he could catch him and crush his life out between his hands. His monologue is a powerful passage, and as his anger rises, so the orchestra boils with emotion.

He raises his pipe and lights it with a match, unwittingly giving as he does so the signal agreed upon by Luigi and Giorgetta. Michele sees a movement, and quickly hides himself before pouncing on the figure which creeps towards the boat. It is Luigi. Michele's hands are round his throat as he demands an admission of guilt. He chokes Luigi, then, as Giorgetta, roused by the noise, appears, hides the body under his cloak and stands as if nothing has happened. Giorgetta comes up to him, and asks him to warm her under his cloak. With a terrible cry, he opens his cloak and reveals what it conceals. H.

SUOR ANGELICA

Sister Angelica

Opera in one act, text by G. Forzano. Première at Metropolitan, New York, on 14 December 1918, with Farrar, Perini, conductor Moranzoni (in conjunction with premières of Gianni Schicchi and Il Tabarro). First performed Rome, 1919, with dalla Rizza, conductor Marinuzzi; Covent Garden, 1920, with dalla Rizza; la Scala, Milan, 1922, with Carena, Casazza, conductor Panizza. Revived Covent Garden, 1965, with Carlyle, Fisher, conductor Pritchard.

| | |
|-------------------------------------|---------------|
| Suor Angelica | Soprano |
| The Princess, her aunt | Contralto |
| The Abbess | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Alms Collector | Soprano |
| Mistress of the Novices | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Suor Genovieffa | Soprano |
| Suor Osmina | Soprano |
| Suor Dolcina | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Aspirant Sisters | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Nursing Sister | Soprano |
| Novices, Sisters | |

Place: The Cloisters of a Nunnery

Time: Seventeenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour

Suor Angelica, the daughter of a noble Florentine family, has taken the veil to expiate the scandal which has overshadowed her life; she is an unmarried mother. Seven years she has spent in the peace and seclusion of a convent, in a state of mind that has alternated between repentance and longing for the child she has never really known. The Abbess tells her that she has a visitor, her aunt, the Princess, towards whom her attitude must be one of reverence and humility.

The Princess has come to obtain from Angelica her signature to a legal document in connection with her sister's forthcoming marriage. She impresses upon her that her life must be given up now and for ever to atoning for the sin she once committed. When Angelica asks for news of the little child which has had to live its life in the great outside world without its mother, she is told coldly that it died two years ago.

In a frenzy of despair, Angelica resolves on suicide. She gathers herbs and flowers and brews a poisonous draught, which she drinks. She prays to the Virgin that she may not die in mortal sin, and, as if in answer to her prayer, sees a vision of the Blessed Virgin leading a little child towards her. An invisible chorus sings of salvation as she dies.

Though hard to separate from its companion pieces in the Trittico, the opera has never been popular, and only Angelica's lament, 'Senza mamma', has attained the fame which has attended some of Puccini's other arias.

H.

GIANNI SCHICCHI

Opera in one act, text by G. Forzano. Première at Metropolitan, New York, on 14 December 1918, with Easton, Crimi, de Luca, conductor Moranzoni. First performed at Rome, 1919, with dalla Rizza, di Giovanni (Edward Johnson), Galeffi, conductor Marinuzzi; Covent Garden, 1920, with dalla Rizza, Tom Burke, Badini; la Scala, Milan, 1922, with di Voltri, Marion, Badini, conductor Panizza. Revived la Scala, 1928, with Galeffi; 1944, with Menotti, Malipiero, Stabile, conductor Marinuzzi; 1947, with Stabile; Covent Garden, 1962, with Joan Carlyle, André Turp, Geraint Evans, conductor Solti.

Gianni Schicchi, aged fifty.....Baritone
 Lauretta, his daughter, aged twenty-one.....Soprano
 Zita, called La Vecchia, cousin of Buoso, aged sixty.....Contralto
 Rinuccio, nephew of Zita, aged twenty-four.....Tenor
 Gherardo, nephew of Buoso, aged forty.....Tenor
 Nella, his wife, aged thirty-four.....Soprano
 Gherardino, their son, aged seven.....Alto
 Betto di Signa, brother-in-law of Buoso, poor and badly dressed, of indefinite age.....Bass
 Simone, Buoso's cousin, aged seventy.....Bass
 Marco, his son, aged forty-five.....Baritone
 La Ciesca, Marco's wife, aged thirty-eight.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Maestro Spinelloccio, doctor.....Bass
 Ser Amantio di Nicolao, lawyer.....Baritone
 Pinellino, cobbler.....Bass
 Guccio, painter.....Bass

Place: Florence

Time: 1299

Running Time: 1 hour

Gianni Schicchi, an historical character, has the honour of being mentioned by Dante in the Thirtieth Canto of The Inferno, where he appears in company with the incestuous Myrrha of Cyprus as a 'pallid, naked shape' (the connection between the two is that both counterfeited the shape of another for their own ends).

Before the curtain rises, there are a few bars of rapid music, whose impetus is however tempered to become a lament (in the minor) by the time the action begins. A chuckling figure, Ernest Newman once suggested, is used to indicate that the shadow of Gianni Schicchi is already over them.

The opera takes place in a bedroom in the house of Buoso Donati, who has recently died. The dead man is in bed, and his relations are kneeling round him, behaving with proper solemnity, that is all except Gherardino, who is heartily bored by the whole proceedings. A whisper goes round; 'it is rumoured in Signa' that Buoso's wealth has been left to the monks, and the agitation of the mourners resolves itself in a request for the advice of Simone, he having once been mayor of Fucecchio and therefore of them all the wisest as well as the oldest. Simone tells them that if the will is already in the hands of lawyers, there is no hope for them, but if it is still in the room, something may yet be done.

A search for the will begins; first one, then another thinks he or she has discovered it, only to find that it is a false alarm. At last Rinuccio holds it triumphantly aloft, but before giving it up asks for a reward for having found it, in the shape of permission to marry Lauretta, Gianni Schicchi's daughter. Zita is far too much concerned with the will to worry about a little thing like that, and eventually it is opened (in the meanwhile, Rinuccio sends Gherardino off to fetch Gianni Schicchi and his daughter). The will is addressed to Zita and Simone: expectation runs high, and speculation as to what is the portion of each even higher. They read the will in silence and, as they begin to understand its import, mounting horror; the rumour from Signa was by no means an exaggeration. Simone speaks for them all, and gradually they collect their wits sufficiently to be able to utter a rapid curse on the monks who will grow fat on their portions. Who would ever have thought, reflects Zita broken-heartedly, that they would shed so many genuine tears when Buoso was taken from them?

A thought seems to strike them all at the same time; if only it were possible ... They appeal to Simone but he can offer them no comfort. Rinuccio suggests that only one man can help them: Gianni Schicchi. Zita furiously says they have heard enough of him and his brood for one day, but Rinuccio is not to be put off, least of all when Gherardino bursts into the room and says the man they are discussing is on his way. He praises Schicchi's resourcefulness and cunning, and urges them to stop their spiteful gossip about his origins and lack of family tree. Has not majestic Florence herself got her roots in the countryside? Rinuccio's aria, 'Firenze è come un albero fiorito', has an antique flavour about it, as if it were a traditional song. It contains in the middle a broad phrase which is later to blossom out into Lauretta's well-known song.

Gianni Schicchi arrives with his daughter, and wonders if the long faces he can see are to be taken as meaning that Donati is better. He is told the sad facts of the will, and comments that this means they are disinherited. Zita repeats the word, and snaps out that he can take himself and his daughter back to where they came from; her nephew shall never marry a nobody. Schicchi bursts out into a vivid denunciation of the snobbish money-grabbing old hag, who would sacrifice young people's happiness to her own greed. An ensemble develops, through which runs the lovers' sad plaint that they had hoped (vainly it seems) to be married before mid-summer. Rinuccio prevents Schicchi leaving uncereemoniously, and begs him at least to look at the will. Lauretta adds her plea to Rinuccio's and he gives way. 'O mio babbino caro' (O my beloved daddy), built up on the phrase from Rinuccio's aria, has become enormously popular over the years, and is now as well known as 'Un bel dì' or 'Mi chiamano Mimi'. Its lyrical charm must be taken in this context as a masterly piece of tongue-in-cheek writing.

Schicchi walks up and down considering the will; 'it can't be done', he concludes, and immediately there is an outburst of sorrow from the lovers. Finally a ray of hope presents itself to Schicchi's agile mind. Lauretta is sent out on the balcony to feed the bird, and he asks if anyone apart from themselves yet knows of Buoso's death. No one, comes the answer: then there is hope, he concludes, and immediately gives orders that the funeral ornaments, etc., be removed from the room (to the sound of a muffled funeral march rhythm). A knock is heard, and in comes the doctor, not however before Schicchi has had time to jump behind the curtains of the bed. Schicchi answers the doctor's queries in what he hopes is Donati's voice, and tells him he is feeling better; they all bid the doctor goodnight and breathe a sigh of relief at his departure. Schicchi outlines his plan: let them send for a lawyer, giving out that Buoso has had a relapse and wishes to make his will. Schicchi's monologue is slyness and good humour personified, and at its end the relatives shriek with delight and the ensemble takes on breakneck speed as all congratulate Schicchi (and themselves) on the possibilities of the scheme.

Collectively they tell him to divide the possessions equally among them, but each one then asks for the plums for himself. Schicchi laughs at them all, just as the passing bell is heard – for the mayor's servant, they are told, and heave a sigh of relief. As Schicchi is helped into Buoso's night-clothes, each one in turn offers him some reward if he will leave the particularly coveted things to him. He agrees to each.

When all is ready, he says that before going to bed he must warn them of the danger they are collectively running. The law provides penalties for falsifying a will – exile, and the loss of the right hand for the malefactor and his accomplices – and they are each one of them liable to these penalties. With mock solemnity he bids a sad farewell to the Florence they all love, and the relations, seeing the force of his argument, sadly repeat the phrases after him: 'Farewell, dear Florence ... I wave goodbye with this poor handleless arm.'

Then, a knock is heard at the door, and the lawyer and the two witnesses who are to assist him are admitted. Schicchi answers their questions in a thin, assumed voice, and they go through the terms of the new will. Something is left in turn to each, until the moment arrives when there remain only the prizes ... the villa in Florence, the saw-mills at Signa, and the mule. Amid protests from the relations he leaves each in turn to 'his devoted friend, Gianni Schicchi', commenting, when they interrupt, that he knows best what is good for Schicchi. When the interruptions look like becoming too violent, he sings a line or two of the farewell to Florence. They are caught in their own trap, and as if to add insult to injury, he directs Zita to give twenty florins to each of the witnesses and a hundred to the lawyer.

As soon as the lawyer has gone, they all rush at Schicchi and tear the night-shirt off his back. He picks up Donati's stick and deals some shrewd blows with it as he chases them out of the house, which is now his, and which they attempt to pillage before leaving. Lauretta and Rinuccio sing of the happiness they will know together, and Schicchi returns, bringing with him some of the things the relations had filched. He turns to the audience: 'Could you imagine a better use for Buoso's money? ... if you have enjoyed yourselves this evening, I trust you will applaud a verdict of "Extenuating Circumstances".'

Puccini owes an obvious debt to the Verdi of Falstaff, but it would be churlish to deny his achievement in writing music of such dexterity and brilliance. Gianni Schicchi makes use of a side of the composer's make-up hitherto only revealed in such passages as the interplay of the Bohemians in Bohème, the entrance of the Sacristan in Tosca: in Schicchi, however, the wit is sharper and the tempo of movement faster than anywhere else in his output. H.

TURANDOT

Opera in three acts, libretto by Giuseppe Adami and Renato Simoni. Last duet and final scene completed by Franco Alfano. Première, la Scala, Milan, 2 April 1926, with Raisa, Zamboni, Fleta, Rimini, Nessi, Palai, Carlo Walter, conductor Toscanini. First performed in Rome, 1926, with Scacciati, Torri, Merli, conductor Vitale; Buenos Aires, 1926, with Muzio, Pampanini, Lauri-Volpi, conductor Marinuzzi; Metropolitan, 1926, with Jeritza, Attwood, Lauri-Volpi, conductor Serafin; Covent Garden, 1927, with Scacciati (later Easton), Schoene, Merli, conductor Bellezza. Revived Covent Garden, 1929, with Eva Turner; 1931, with Nemeth, Norena, Cortis, conductor Barbirolli; 1937, with Turner, Favero, Martinelli; 1946, with Turner, Midgley, conductor Lambert; 1963, with Shuard, Kabaivanska, Prevedi, conductor Downes; 1967, with Nilsson, McCracken, conductor Mackerras; Metropolitan, New York, 1961, with Nilsson, Moffo, Corelli, conductor Stokowski. Other famous exponents of the title role have included Mafalda Salvatini, Cigna, Grob-Prandl, Eva Marton, Gwyneth Jones. First (concert) performance of Alfano's complete ending, Barbican, London, 1982, with Sylvia Sass and Franco Bonisolli, conducted by Owain Arwel Hughes; first staged production of this version, Flanders Opera, Antwerp, 1993.

Princess TurandotDramatic Soprano
The Emperor Altoum, *her father*Tenor
Timur, *the exiled King of Tartary*Bass
The Unknown Prince, Calaf, *his son*Tenor
Liù, *a slave girl*Lyric Soprano
Ping, *Grand Chancellor of China*Baritone
Pang, *supreme lord of provisions*Tenor
Pong, *supreme lord of the Imperial Kitchen*Tenor
A MandarinBaritone

Guards, Executioner's Men, Priests, Dignitaries, Handmaidens, Soldiers, Ghosts of Suitors

Place: Peking

Time: Legendary

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Turandot was Puccini's last opera, and took some four years to compose; it was left unfinished at his death in 1924. The treatment of Gozzi's 'dramatic fable' was first mooted over lunch in Rome with two younger writers, Adami and Simoni. In the event, it was the 1863 Italian translation by Verdi's old friend Andrea Maffei of Schiller's German version (1790) of Gozzi which Simoni handed through the window as Puccini's train was leaving. Puccini immediately responded to the project, although he kept in contact with other authors over versions of Oliver Twist and Sly (an episode at the start of The Taming of the Shrew). Gozzi wrote in 1762: 'I shall stage a fairy tale, one of those stories with which grandfathers and wet-nurses entertain the children on a winter's evening by the fireside, and the Venetians will applaud me more than Goldoni.' His Turandotte sets her riddles in the spirit of Enlightenment feminism, challenging her Venetian audiences with wit and intellect to consider the way they treat women; his comic characters are drawn directly from the commedia dell'arte. Gozzi was wrong about his Italian popularity but his fables delighted the young generation of German Romantics. Puccini wrote in March 1920 of his fascination with 'the amorous passion of Turandot that has for so long smouldered beneath the ashes of her great pride... it must be a Turandot by way of the modern mind'. The extraordinary richness of melody as well as the excitingly new orchestral sounds is evidence of a sound world developed with Elektra, L'amore dei tre re and Francesca da Rimini in his ears.

Eager as ever to create an authentic ambience for the opera, he researched Chinese music, and there are five authentic themes in the opera.

By the time of his death in 1924 the libretto had been completed, even if Puccini never ceased to complain about it, and the score itself was fully orchestrated up to the moment in Act III when Liù's funeral procession leaves the stage. Puccini left some twenty-three pages of sketches (some on both sides, amounting to thirty-six in total), and intended to finish the opera when recovering from his operation in the Brussels cancer clinic where he died. Toscanini suggested that his younger contemporary Franco Alfano should complete the score and Ricordi commissioned him to do this, using as much as he could of the sketches. Alfano, himself the composer of an oriental opera, La leggenda di Sakùntala (1921), accepted the thankless and controversial task in July 1925, and began work with Giuseppe Adami, one of the librettists. Apparently he did not have access to the full score. When he presented his version, which inevitably contained substantial sections of music which was purely his own, and a different orchestration from Puccini's, it was not well received by Ricordi.

Toscanini, who was to conduct the scheduled production of the opera in April/May 1926, now claimed that Puccini had played him the complete ending on the piano in October 1924, and that Alfano had not been faithful to what Toscanini remembered of the maestro's performance. His objections led to 109 bars being cut from Alfano's score (and consequently the libretto), and much rewriting of other passages. Alfano's second attempts at interpreting Puccini's sketches are sometimes preferable to the first but the cuts in his own music make little musical sense. Toscanini appears to have been adamant in reducing the amount of Alfano in the score. It is this shortened version which has become familiar. Curiously, however, piano-vocal scores had gone into preparation immediately Alfano's version was received, and these – giving the details of the first performers and performance (precisely, where it was not performed) – were published. At a London concert performance in 1982 the Alfano ending was restored in full and was heard, as far as was known, for the first time for well over half a century. There is an argument for a new completion to be made now, with all the material available at Ricordi, and a full understanding of Puccini's innovative and unique orchestration.

Act I. 'The walls of the Imperial City. The massive ramparts enclose almost the whole stage in a semi-circle.' The crowd listens to a decree that the Princess Turandot will marry only the prince who solves her three riddles. Anyone who stands trial and fails will be executed. The people call for the death of Turandot's latest victim, the Prince of Persia, at moonrise. Timur, the dispossessed and exiled King of Tartary, is among the crowd. His son Calaf, who has also been forced into exile, recognises him after years of separation, and learns that Timur owes his life to a slave-girl, Liù, who accompanies him. They are all unknown in Peking.

The choruses 'Gira la cote' and 'Perchè tarda la luna?' depict the psychotic state of China, of Turandot herself, in music of extraordinary eeriness. As perfect contrast to this, the sound of the boys' chorus (the Chinese melody, Moo-Lee-Whah) accompanies the entrance of the executioner.

The crowd now calls upon Turandot to appear and grant mercy, and she makes her first appearance in silence. She gives the sign for death. Calaf is overwhelmed by what he has seen. Nothing his father or Liù can say will dissuade him from deciding to declare his challenge.

The Imperial functionaries, Ping, Pang and Pong, now break the tension of morbid poetics with a comically grotesque interruption. Their music is one of the authentic Chinese tunes which Puccini carefully researched in J.A. van Aalst's handbook (Shanghai, 1884).

Turandot's handmaidens call for silence (in an ambivalently erotic passage), but the phantoms of her previous suitors urge on the Prince. Nothing, neither the sight of the executioner returning with the head of the Prince of Persia, nor the entreaties of Liù, can dissuade him. Her aria, 'Signore ascolta', is exquisite, and the Prince's response taps a similar vein of tenderness; yet he does not return Liù's love, he simply bids her take his father away ('Non piangere Liù'). With three great beats of the stage gong he signals his challenge, and the start of another ritual trial. The purely musical construction of this act is astonishing, made up as it is of different inspirations and yet welded to one of Puccini's most shattering climaxes.

Act II, scene i. In 'a pavilion, like a vast tent', Ping, Pang and Pong discuss the preparations for what will either be a wedding or a funeral. They compare their recollections of all the princes who have died for Turandot, and grow nostalgic for the country retreats where they could retire if the decree did not hold them to their lugubrious duties. Some of the opera's most beautiful music is contained in their dreams, as the off-stage chorus repeats its bloodthirsty clamour.

Trumpets announce Calaf's trial, and a transformation to scene ii, 'the vast square of the royal palace'. The anthem which now sounds is one of three in a music box belonging to Baron Fassini, formerly in the Italian legation in Peking, where the authors met to discuss the very first draft scenario in 1920. 'Hardly had the manuscript been deposited on a little lacquered table when... the silence was broken by the clear sound of a music box playing the ancient Imperial Hymn... In his hands the notes of that Hymn became the massive chorus.' Altoum in vain entreats the Unknown Prince to stand down; his music is almost exactly notated from an Imperial theme played at the opening and closing of ceremonies attended by the Manchu Emperors.

Turandot. Eva Turner in the title role (Chicago, 1938).

Turandot now sings for the first time, the famous aria 'In questa Reggia'. She recounts how her ancestor, the Princess Lo-u-Ling, was raped and murdered by a Tartar prince, and how she is intent upon avenging this memory. As she sings, she seems to weave a spell into which the chorus are hypnotically drawn, and she herself relives the humiliation of her forebear. It is a totally exposed passage demanding a voice of the utmost security. She warns Calaf that, although there are three riddles, death is one. Calaf responds that life is one. Their voices soar to high C, as though the singers dare each other to compete ('Gli enigmi sono tre, una la vita').

Turandot poses the first enigma: what rises at night, invoked by all the world, only to die at dawn reborn in the heart? Calaf rightly answers: hope. The second riddle is: what darts like a flame but is not a flame, that grows cold with death yet blazes with dreams of conquest? Turandot is furious when Calaf solves it with the answer: blood. Thirdly she demands what inflames you, white yet dark, that enslaves if it wants you free, but in taking you captive makes you king? Calaf, after hesitation, answers: Turandot.

The Emperor holds his daughter to her vow to accept the prince who solved her enigmas. Triumphant Calaf now challenges her: if she can discover his identity before daybreak, he is prepared to die. The Emperor prays for his success, and the court rises to the sound of the Imperial anthem.

Act III. A pavilion in the palace gardens, at night. The Unknown Prince, a captive in the palace, hears the Imperial heralds searching the city for someone who can reveal his name: 'Nessun dorma questa notte in Pekino' (None shall sleep tonight in Peking). This mysterious sound world inspires him to one of Puccini's greatest arias, a reverie on love and death: 'Nessun dorma'. As he dreams of winning his love, the women's voices of the chorus sing 'And we shall have to die...'

Brusquely interrupting, Ping, Pang and Pong offer him women, wealth or glory if he will leave the Princess alone. Their increasing frenzy comes to a head when he steadfastly refuses; they are threatening him with torture at the moment when guards bring in Timur and Liù. They summon Turandot, who watches as the slave-girl offers herself to protect the old man, and yet refuses to yield under torture. Asked what gives her such strength, Liù replies that it is love. Turandot is moved for a moment and then orders her ministers to take the secret from her, to tear out her tongue. Liù appeals to the Princess to listen to her in the beautiful aria 'Tu che di gel sei cinta' (You, girded in ice... will love him!). She seizes a dagger and commits suicide. Timur curses the people who have brought about her death, and swears that she will be avenged.

This is the moment where Puccini's full score finishes, and it is here that Toscanini laid down his baton on the first night and said, 'The opera is ending here because at this point the Maestro died'.

Calaf now confronts Turandot, tears off her veil and kisses her. She is mortified, believing that she has lost ('Del primo pianto'); Calaf proclaims that this is only the beginning of their love. Turandot begs him to leave with his secret and Calaf replies that there is no mystery any more – he is Calaf, the son of Timur. Turandot is thrilled that he is now in her power.

The exterior of the imperial palace. Before the whole court Turandot declares that she knows the stranger's name, and that it is Love. Calaf impetuously climbs the stairs, and the two lovers are clasped in an embrace.

Turandot stands at the end of the great Italian lyric tradition and shows Puccini succeeding with a new type of opera, in which the sophisticated orchestration and complex psychology of the libretto were organically conceived. It is, unlike the operas of his contemporaries, full of melody. Yet the callous self-absorption of the protagonists, combined with the enigma of the incomplete score, must leave us wondering how a wholly positive apotheosis could have been achieved, and whether it could ever be satisfactory. N.J.

HENRY PURCELL

(born 1658, died 21 November 1695)

DIDO AND AENEAS

Opera in a prologue and three acts, text by Nahum Tate. Première at Mr Josias Priest's Boarding School for Girls, Chelsea, London, 1689. Revived by the Royal College of Music under

Stanford at the Lyceum Theatre, London, 1895, for the bicentenary of Purcell's death; in New York, Hotel Plaza, 1923, and Town Hall (in a version by Bodanzky), 1924; Scala Theatre, London, 1929; Sadler's Wells, 1931, with Joan Cross; Florence Festival, 1940, with Gianna Pederzini, conducted by Vittorio

Gui; Rome, 1949, with Simionato. The 1951 Festival of Britain brought three productions to London: by the English Opera Group in Benjamin Britten's new realisation, with Nancy Evans/Joan Cross, Bruce Boyce/Peter Pears; at the Mermaid Theatre with Flagstad; and at Sadler's Wells. It has been widely performed in Europe, including productions with Irmgard Seefried at Schwetzingen, 1966, and with Teresa Berganza at Aix-en-Provence, 1960, and the Piccola Scala, Milan, 1963.

Dido, or Elissa, *Queen of Carthage*Soprano
 Belinda, *a lady-in-waiting*Soprano
 Second WomanMezzo-Soprano
 Sorceress.....Mezzo-Soprano
 First Witch.....Soprano
 Second WitchSoprano
 Spirit.....Soprano (or Tenor)
 Aeneas, *a Trojan prince*Tenor (or High Baritone)
 A Sailor.....Soprano (or Tenor)

Chorus of Courtiers, People, Witches, Sailors

Place: Carthage

Time: Following the Trojan War

Running Time: 1 hour

The prologue, which is included in the libretto, appears never to have been set by Purcell, or, at all events, to have been lost.

The overture has the traditional slow and quick sections, and is unmistakably tragic in feeling.

Act I. Dido is discovered surrounded by her court and attended by her lady-in-waiting, Belinda. Belinda's exhortation, 'Shake the cloud from off your brow', is echoed by the chorus, and is in sharp contrast to the grief-laden aria for Dido which follows, 'Ah, Belinda, I am prest with torment'. This magnificent expression of sorrow is worthy of the tragedy it foreshadows and at no point belies the conflict implied in its final words: 'Peace and I are strangers grown'. Belinda does not hesitate to diagnose that it is the presence of the 'Trojan guest' which is at the root of the Queen's unhappiness, and the chorus supports her implied suggestion, that a marriage between the two would solve Carthage's troubles. In the dialogue between Dido and Belinda which ensues, we have a taste of Purcell's extraordinary gift for compressing the most complex emotions into a few bars, and then relieving the tension and crystallising the situation in a set piece for chorus (in this case a chaconne), here introduced by a duet for Belinda and an Attendant. Again, her court attempts to encourage her – 'the hero loves as well as you' – and, after Aeneas' entrance and Dido's cold reply to his opening sentence, all support his suit in music of surpassing freshness. The scene ends with a Triumphant Dance, and Dido's acceptance of Aeneas is celebrated by the whole court to bright, simple music.

This opening scene is short, but Purcell does not rely on understatement and implication so much as on an extraordinary clarity and economy of expression. He says more in a couple of long meaningful phrases than many a lesser composer in a whole aria, and his compression never gives the listener the feeling either that the music is overcharged or that the issues have been only partly stated.

The scene changes to a cave, where lives the Sorceress. She invokes her evil companions to join her in plotting the destruction of Dido and of Carthage. The whole scene, with its laughing choruses, its reference (in the strings) to the horn calls of the hunt now in progress, its echo chorus and its echo dance (phrase and echo are differently harmonised), amounts to an illustration of the insidious beauty which can attend the course of evil just as surely as that of good.

Act II. The Grove. Dido and Aeneas pause in the grove in the middle of the hunt. Belinda and later the Second Woman sing of the peculiar delights of the spot they have reached, of its attractions for the goddess Diana and of how it was the scene of Actaeon's death, torn to pieces by his own hounds. Meanwhile, the scene is one of activity, in the midst of all, Dido and her husband-to-be, Aeneas. The idyll comes to an end as Dido hears distant thunder, and Belinda, always ready to take a hint from her mistress, warns the company to repair as soon as it can to shelter: 'Haste, haste to town', she sings. All leave the stage, but Aeneas is stopped by the appearance of Mercury – in reality, the Sorceress's 'trusty elf' in disguise. He tells Aeneas that he brings Jove's command that the hero shall put off no longer the task which has been allotted him of founding the new Troy on Latin soil. Aeneas replies in a magnificent recitative – one of the highlights of the score. The decision is easily arrived at – it is the gods' command – but to reconcile himself to leaving Dido is something than which, he says, he 'with more ease could die'.

The published versions of the score make Act II end with this recitative, although the oldest version of the libretto has six further lines after the recitative (for the Sorceress and her Attendants) as well as a dance with which to end the act. When his realisation of the opera was produced during the Festival of Britain, 1951, Benjamin Britten wrote as follows: 'Anyone who has taken part in, or indeed heard a concert or stage performance, must have been struck by the very peculiar and most unsatisfactory end of this Act II as it stands; Aeneas sings his very beautiful recitative in A minor and disappears without any curtain music or chorus (such as occurs in all the other acts). The drama cries out for some strong dramatic music, and the whole key system of the opera (very carefully adhered to in each of the other scenes) demands a return to the key of the beginning of the act or its relative major (D minor or F major). What is more, the contemporary printed libretto (a copy of which is preserved in the library of the Royal College of Music) has perfectly clear indications for a scene with the Sorceress and her Enchantresses, consisting of six lines of verse, and a dance to end the act. It is my considered opinion that music was certainly composed to this scene and has been lost ... and so I have supplied other music of Purcell's to fit the six lines of the libretto, and a dance to end in the appropriate key.'

Act III. The scene is set in the harbour of Carthage, with the ships as background. All is in preparation for the Trojan fleet's departure, and the orchestra introduces the sailor's song: 'Come away, fellow sailors, come away'. The tune is briskly compelling, the words cynical, as the singer urges his companions to 'take a boozy short leave of your nymphs on the shore'. Suddenly, the Sorceress is there with her supernatural band, and the first and second Witches sing a lively duet, whose burden is 'Our plot has took, the Queen's forsook' and which ends with peals of highly organised demonic laughter. The Sorceress has a short solo in which she plans the destruction of Aeneas as well. There is a dance for the Witches and Sailors, and the stage clears as Dido and Belinda come down to the harbour to look for Aeneas.

Dido is full of foreboding before Aeneas even appears, and his first words confirm her worst fears. With 'Thus on the fatal banks of Nile weeps the deceitful crocodile' she taunts his attempt at explanation, and, when he announces his determination to defy the gods and stay, she will have none of a lover who once had a thought of leaving her. It is not until his departure that she admits 'Death must come when he is gone'. The chorus sums up the gravity of the situation and prepares the way for Dido's great farewell to life. The recitative is movingly simple, and the aria, 'When I am laid in earth', one of the greatest moments in all opera. Built up on a ground bass,¹ which is first heard as the introduction to the aria after the end of the recitative, this is a piece of controlled vocal writing that is unsurpassed. 'Remember me,' sings the Queen, 'but ah! forget my fate'; and the sense of deep tragedy is increased by the succeeding chorus, 'With drooping wings, ye cupids come, and scatter roses on her tomb'. It is the longest sustained number in the score, and in it Purcell shifts the emphasis of the tragedy from the particular to the universal at the same time as he provides a uniquely beautiful ending to his opera.

Purcell wrote much other music for the stage, but Dido and Aeneas must be accounted his only opera proper. King Arthur and The Fairy Queen, the former with words by Dryden, the latter founded on A Midsummer Night's Dream, are included by Dr Alfred Loewenberg in his monumental Annals of Opera; but though they contain magnificent music, this is more in the nature of incidental music to a play than of opera, although the masques in these and other works (such as The Tempest) offered Purcell a chance of writing in more extended forms. As a writer for the voice, Purcell was supreme, and his output includes a vast quantity of songs, many of them connected with the stage, and all of the greatest beauty. His great mastery is universally admitted, and many of the most gifted of twentieth-century English composers were glad to acknowledge their indebtedness to him not only for his inspiration and example but also for the practical lessons they learned from his music. It is opera's eternal loss that Dido should be the only true opera he left behind him; the feeling for dramatic expression, which it shows to have been his, only emphasises what was removed by his death at under forty years of age.

H.

¹ In each act there is an aria constructed on this principle: Dido's 'Ah, Belinda' in Act I, the Second Woman's 'Oft she visits' in Act II, and Dido's lament in Act III.

R

SERGEI VASILYEVICH RACHMANINOV

(born 20 March/1 April 1873, died 28 March 1943)

ALEKO

Opera in one act, libretto by Vladimir Ivanovich Nemirovich-Danchenko, based on Pushkin's poem The Gypsies (1824). Première, Bolshoi Theatre, Moscow, 27 April/9 May 1893. Chaliapin scored a great success in the title role at the St Petersburg première in 1897. First performed in the U.K. at the London Opera House on 15 July 1915.

Aleko.....Baritone or Bass
ZemfiraSoprano
Young GipsyTenor
Old Gipsy Man, *Zemfira's father*Bass
Old Gipsy WomanMezzo-Soprano

Rachmaninov wrote Aleko, his first opera, in seventeen days for a competition organised by the Moscow Conservatory, as part of the exam for the diploma. He won a gold medal, the opera was published in a vocal score and his professional career was launched.

A gipsy encampment, evening. Gypsies sing of their free and happy life. The Old Gipsy remembers his youth; his wife Marioula left when another tribe of gypsies camped near them, abandoning their little daughter, Zemfira. Ever since then, he has hated all women, and yet never stopped loving them. Zemfira's husband Aleko, who has joined the gypsies in search of a simpler life, reacts violently to this story, amazed that the old man did not avenge himself. If it happened to him, he himself would not hesitate to kill both the wife and her lover. Zemfira and a Young Gipsy insist that love cannot be bridled. Zemfira tells her father that Aleko frightens her, but her heart longs for freedom. The Young Gipsy knows Aleko is jealous, but that does not frighten him. The Gypsies dance, first the women, then the men, before everyone falls asleep. Zemfira and the Young Gipsy have fallen in love. They agree to meet when the moon has risen. Zemfira sings a cruel but fearless song about a young wife who dares her old husband to murder her, and makes it clear that her song is addressed to Aleko. When he is alone, Aleko reflects that he left civilisation behind to be free like the gypsies. He remembers how passionately his wife once loved him (cavatina, 'The camp sleeps').

After an intermezzo, the Young Gipsy sings a lovesong. Aleko reminds Zemfira that he gave up his old life to be with her. The young lovers laugh at him. Aleko kills his rival and then Zemfira. The Old Gipsy and the others remind Aleko that, though their people acknowledge no laws or constraints, vengeance and cruelty are alien to them: they do not want to live with a murderer and tell him to leave them. Aleko realises he is condemned to solitude and despair.

Nemirovich-Danchenko's libretto reduces Pushkin's work to a series of nearly incoherent fragments and so obscures its central theme: the sophisticated man of society acts in a more primitive fashion than the supposedly 'savage' gypsies that he has joined. Inevitably in a student work, Aleko is full of ghosts: Bizet's influence can be felt in the portrayal of Zemfira; Cavalleria rusticana inspired the central Intermezzo, while Rachmaninov's respect for Tchaikovsky colours the duets for the lovers and Aleko's final despair (too reminiscent of the last line of Eugene Onegin). The strict fugal form of the gypsies' final chorus demonstrates the composer's technical competence, rather at the expense of the drama. Yet, as Tchaikovsky's approval attests, Rachmaninov's own creativity surges through the opera: it is particularly marked in the distinguished scoring and in the work's melodies, which bring the hackneyed images of gipsy culture to life. Aleko's cavatina has been taken into the bass-baritone concert repertory, thanks partly to Chaliapin's early advocacy. P.

FRANCESCA DA RIMINI

Opera in two scenes with Prologue and Epilogue, libretto by Modest Tchaikovsky, based on Dante's Inferno, canto v (1321). First performance at the Bolshoi Theatre, Moscow, 24 January 1906, conducted by the composer. First U.K. performance at the Chester Festival, 1973.

The Ghost of VirgilBaritone
DanteTenor
Lanceotto Malatesta.....Baritone
FrancescaSoprano
PaoloTenor
Cardinal.....Mute

Ghosts, Followers of the Cardinal and of Malatesta

Running Time: 1 hour 15 minutes

In 1893 Rachmaninov had tried unsuccessfully to collaborate with Modest Tchaikovsky on an opera based on the Undine legend. In 1898 he asked him for a libretto based on Shakespeare. Tchaikovsky responded by suggesting canto v of Dante's Inferno. Rachmaninov was slow to make anything of the idea, but he was stimulated to return to opera when, in July 1900, he and Chaliapin studied Rimsky-Korsakov's version of Boris Godunov together. He composed most of the love duet then, and took up the project again in spring 1904, completing it during the summer. He recognised that there were still structural problems with the libretto: normally he never allowed himself to repeat words (an interesting ambition for a composer), but in the love duet he felt he had no alternative.

Prologue. The First Circle of Hell. The orchestra portrays the groaning of the damned. The ghost of the poet Virgil hesitates, out of pity, he explains to Dante, rather than from fear. Virgil leads Dante to the edge of the abyss in the Second Circle, where those who yielded to lust are tormented by a howling whirlwind. The souls of the damned pass by. Dante questions two of them, as the wind dies down. Paolo and Francesca reply with the first of two quotations from Dante, 'Nothing is sadder than to remember happy times in the midst of grief'.

Scene i. Rimini, the palace of Lanceotto Malatesta. Lanceotto prepares to fight the Ghibellines, on the Pope's orders. Consumed with jealousy, he reflects on his unhappy marriage. He blames Francesca's father, who never told her that Paolo, Lanceotto's brother, was standing proxy for him at the church service. In ignorance of this fact, Francesca fell in love with the man she thought she was marrying. Lanceotto is, as he says, lame, ugly, sullen, while his brother Paolo is graceful, tall and handsome. Lanceotto determines to put his wife and his brother to the test. If she is faithful, he will banish Paolo. When she hears that her husband is going away, Francesca resolves to stay in a convent till he returns. There is no need, Lanceotto tells her, since he has appointed Paolo as her protector. He asks for a single word of affection: as his wife, she knows her duty is to submit, but he longs for her love. She remains silent, refusing to lie to him.

Scene ii. Paolo reads Francesca the story of Lancelot, the knight who fell in love with King Arthur's wife Guinevere. She stops Paolo from mentioning his own love for her, but he throws the book away and falls sobbing at her feet. She reminds him that they must never succumb to passion, that their love will be allowed in paradise. Paolo would forfeit all hope of heaven for a kiss. Eventually, she admits that they belong to one another; they swear fidelity and embrace. Lanceotto appears behind them with his dagger upraised. The lovers' heartrending sobs blend with the cries of the damned.

Epilogue. The Second Circle of Hell. The ghosts of Paolo and Francesca reappear, remembering how, in the text's second quotation from Dante, 'that day we read no more...'. They vanish and their grief is echoed by the chorus of souls of the damned, 'Nothing is sadder than to remember happy times in the midst of grief'.

There are obvious weaknesses in Francesca da Rimini but its best features warrant its occasional revival: the role of Malatesta is particularly strong, reflecting the fact that it was written for Chaliapin, the love duet is suffused with passion and Rachmaninov's writing for orchestra generates an aptly lurid power. P.

JEAN-PHILIPPE RAMEAU

(born before 25 September 1683, died 12 September 1764)

Has any composer ever received such a consistently bad press as Rameau? He was fifty before his first opera Hippolyte et Aricie was performed, claiming that modesty inhibited him. He was until then known, if at all, for books on musical theory and collections of harpsichord music, a few cantatas and motets. While his operatic form owed much to precedent, Rameau was an innovator in terms of orchestration, the first in France to use horns and clarinets in opera, as well as to introduce textural devices such as pizzicato and glissando. His music left a masterful impression – little of such intensity had been heard in French opera. Ironically, he was soon seen as a conservative and suffered later in his career from opposition based on ignorance. Inevitably, some people heard Hippolyte et Aricie as a work more indebted to theory than practice. Voltaire called him ‘in musical matters ... a pedant ... meticulous and tedious’. Others, however, recognised that a major new talent had appeared fully fledged. The composer Campra remarked that ‘There is enough music in this opera to make ten of them; this man will eclipse us all.’¹

In the twentieth century, some people, such as Debussy, have recognised Rameau’s genius, others have repeated earlier canards. New factors exacerbating his neglect surely include the deleterious effects of ‘authentic’ staging. This approving review for a director (Jean-Louis Martinoty) should be read as condemnation: ‘He has always been a dab hand with Baroque opera, creating sumptuous tableaux animated by fancy courtiers.’ No wonder the critic concludes, ‘But in the end it’s all artifice, artifice that cannot surmount the dullness of Rameau’s music – page after page of theory-ridden, strait-jacketed stuff.’² In such circumstances scenery tends to be sub-Watteau and Tiepolo, while acting is compromised by mannered choreography: Arthur Jacobs once pointed out, ‘Those sideways-and-downwards gestures of the hands were assuredly modelled on some historical precedent; but between one such gesture and the next, today’s singers are still liable to lapse into their customary all-purpose Manrico-meets-Carmen type of acting.’³ Another fatally inhibiting factor is that French Baroque opera apparently ‘lends itself to student performance; there are plenty of solo parts, fine choruses, modest orchestral demands’.⁴ No wonder that Stanley Sadie could object (in 1965) that ‘Rameau’s language is too piecemeal ... [the] deeper emotional responses are never tapped’.⁵ Rameau’s music cries out for the best choreography, not some lifeless, well researched, historically apt but mortifying twiddling. P.

HIPPOLYTE ET ARICIE

Tragédie en musique in a prologue and five acts, libretto by Abbé Simon Joseph Pellegrin, based on Euripides’ Hippolytos, Seneca’s Phaedra and Racine’s Phèdre (1677). First performance, Académie Royale de la Musique, 1 October 1733, with Mlle Pellissier as Aricie, Tribou as Hippolyte, Marie Antier as Phèdre, Pierre de Jélyotte as Love and Chassé de Chinée as Thésée. After some forty performances it was dropped, revived in 1742, 1743, 1757 and 1767. Not given again until Geneva, 1903, Paris, 1908, and, in German, Basle, 1931. Birmingham University, in English, 1965, with Robert Tear, Angela Hinckley, Janet Baker and John Shirley-Quirk, conducted by Anthony Lewis. Revived Paris, 1996, conductor William Christie.

Aricie (Aricia), *Athenian princess*Soprano
 Diane (Diana), *goddess of chastity and hunting*Soprano
 Phèdre (Phaedra), Thésée’s wife, Hippolyte’s stepmother Soprano
 Oenone, *Phèdre’s confidante*Soprano
 God of LoveSoprano
 High Priestess of DianaSoprano
 Hippolyte (Hippolytus), Thésée’s son, in love with Aricie High Tenor (Haute-Contre)
 Thésée (Theseus), *King of Athens*Bass
 Tisiphone, *a Fury*Tenor (Taille)
 Pluton (Pluto), *ruler of Hades*Bass
 Jupiter, *ruler of the gods*Bass

¹ Quoted in Cuthbert Girdlestone, Jean-Philippe Rameau, his Life and Work, rev.ed. New York, 1969.

² Charles Pitt, Opera, November 1982.

³ Opera, December 1981.

⁴ Raymond Monelle, Opera, April 1994.

⁵ Opera, August 1965.

The FatesHigh Tenor (Haute-Contre),
Tenor (Taille), Bass

Nymphs, Forest-Dwellers, Priestesses of Diana, Infernal Deities, Shepherds and Shepherdesses, etc.

Place: The Forest of Erymanthus, Troezen, Hell,
Aricie's Forest

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Prologue. Nymphs pay homage to Diana, goddess of chastity, in the first of the opera's many pageant-like sequences of songs and dances that celebrate divine or mortal power. Diana promises those who worship her that they will enjoy peace. When Love's music is heard she encourages them to run away. Love insists that he wields power everywhere, while Diana insists that her kingdom should remain inviolate and appeals to Jupiter (Invocation, 'Arbitre souverain').

Jupiter descends to give his judgement. He supports Diana's argument, but Destiny has ruled that Love should exercise supreme power. On one day each year, his power even reaches into the depths of Diana's forests, as long as it is blessed by marriage. Diana leaves to help Hippolyte and Aricie and to avoid Love's celebrations of his triumph. There follows a sequence of dances, gavottes, minuets and a march, while the act ends with a reprise of the overture's glorious, fanfare-like opening.

Act I. The temple of Diana. Aricie prepares to dedicate herself to serving the goddess. She is the last of the children of Pallas to survive: Thésée killed her fifty brothers when he usurped her father's kingdom of Athens. She has fallen in love with Hippolyte, Thésée's son, but since Thésée condemned her to remain a virgin, she has decided to join the priesthood of Diana, the goddess whom Hippolyte serves. When Aricie meets Hippolyte, he admits he loves her. Together they appeal to the goddess for help.

The Priestesses of Diana celebrate the fact that those within the sanctuary remain impervious to Love. Thésée's wife Phèdre urges Aricie to enter the sanctuary, but Aricie admits that her heart is divided; she cannot go through with the ceremony. Phèdre appeals to Hippolyte to execute his father Thésée's wishes. When he refuses to force Aricie, Phèdre threatens to destroy the temple and trumpets speak for her vindictive power. In response, the priestesses call on the gods to punish their enemies; with much emphasis on 'Lancez', they appeal to the gods to hurl lightning.

Jupiter's thunder is heard. Diana rebukes Phèdre, promises to look after Aricie and points out that she can be worshipped in forests, as well as in temples. Hippolyte leads Aricie into the temple. Phèdre gives way to fury, partly because Aricie is her rival for the love of Hippolyte, her stepson.

Arcas, Thésée's confidant, reports that Thésée was last seen going to the underworld to save his close friend Pirithous. He is unlikely to return. Oenone encourages Phèdre: Hippolyte is no longer an enemy to love, while Phèdre has more to offer him than Aricie does, namely the crown of Athens. Phèdre swears that if Hippolyte will not yield, she will die.

Act II. The entrance to the underworld. Thésée has come to save Pirithous, who was killed by Cerberus when he attempted to abduct Pluto's wife, Proserpine. He offers to die in his friend's place but Tisiphone, one of the fates, implacably insists on more victims (duet, 'Contente-toi d'une victime').

Pluto's court. Pluto warns Thésée that all he can expect in Hell as reward for his glory on earth is eternal torment. Thésée argues that he himself is innocent: Pirithous may deserve to be punished, but surely Thésée's loyal friendship is a virtue? Pluto leaves the decision to his judges and meanwhile readies all Hell's forces to execute his punishment ('Qu'à servir mon courroux'). The three Fates tell Thésée that Destiny has not yet decreed his death ('Du destin le vouloir suprême'). Thésée turns to the god Neptune, who promised to come to his aid three times. The first occasion was when Thésée was allowed to cross the Styx into Hell. Thésée now begs to be allowed to go back. Neptune sends Mercury to plead with Pluto. The ruler of Hell yields, but asks the Fates to tell Thésée his fate. They warn him that he leaves the infernal empire only to find Hell at home ('Quelle soudaine horreur').

Act III. Thésée's palace on the sea. Phèdre begs the goddess Venus, her ancestress, for mercy. When Hippolyte comes in answer to her summons, she offers him the throne, her son by Thésée and herself. He swears fidelity to her as Queen but renounces his rights of succession, since all that matters to him is his love for Aricie. Phèdre threatens Aricie and Hippolyte asks her why she hates her so much (duet, 'Ma fureur va tout entreprendre'). Phèdre reveals that she considers Aricie her rival. Hippolyte is horrified. In despair, Phèdre seizes his sword and asks him to kill her. He refuses. At that moment Thésée returns, haunted by the Fates' prediction. Appalled by what he sees, he demands an explanation from Phèdre's confidante, Oenone. She hints that Hippolyte tried to rape Phèdre. The people of Troezen celebrate the return of Thésée who is forced to conceal his anguish. There follow a Marche, a chorus, songs for sailors and a series of rigaudons. Alone, for the third and last time, Thésée calls on Neptune to avenge him and punish his son ('Puissant maître des flots'). The sea's sudden disturbance assures him his plea has been heard.

Act IV. A wood sacred to Diana. Hippolyte has been banished; he prepares to go into exile ('Ah! faut-il, en un jour'). Aricie begs him to stay, defend and comfort her ('Dieux! pourquoi séparer deux cœurs'). Although he cannot name her, Hippolyte hints at Phèdre's guilty secret and begs Aricie to accompany him as his wife. The young lovers swear to be true to one another and invoke the aid of Diana (duet, 'Nous allons nous jurer une immortelle foi'). A group of hunters sing in praise of their sport, and a huntswoman invites Hippolyte and Aricie to join them in hunting. Her companions reinforce her argument with appropriate songs and festive minuets. Neptune sends a monster. Only Hippolyte dares to confront it: flames and clouds surround him and he disappears. Aricie faints. When Phèdre comes she is stricken with remorse and confesses her guilt. She promises the gods that she will reveal her crime and Hippolyte's innocence to Thésée.

Act V. Diana's sacred wood. Thésée has heard the truth from Phèdre, who has committed suicide. Now he too wants to die. Neptune stops him: the world needs his courage. Furthermore, Destiny has decided that Hippolyte should live, though in exile. Thésée's punishment will be that he can never see his son again.

Aricie's forest. Aricie recovers from her faint to the sound of soft music. Diana reveals that she has chosen a mortal hero to rule over her kingdom and orders zephyrs to restore Hippolyte to Aricie. The lovers rejoice (duet, 'Que mon sort est digne d'envie'). Diana presents Hippolyte to the shepherds and shepherdesses, and the opera ends with a series of gavottes.

It may only be retrospective knowledge that conditions our hearing, but the overture to Hippolyte et Aricie does sound splendidly appropriate: from the beginning, Rameau's first opera sets out to impress. Those increasingly bold intervals and that majestic pace are endowed with dazzling confidence and seem to announce something new, authoritative, masterful. The opera itself provides for much in the way of spectacular transformations and machinery – the merveilleux – with descents by Diana, Love, Jupiter, Mercury; a vision of Hell, a monster, as well as a religious ceremony, a civic festivity and an extended pastorale, complete with a flight of zephyrs who bear in a (tenor) hero. These vividly realised pantomimes are far from extraneous, however: from the beginning, this is a story of conflicting authorities, each of whom is entitled to his or her rites of honour, divertissements reinforcing their status.

All the characters' private identities and conflicts are seen in relief against these sharply etched public festivities. The first music we hear is a chorus of homage to Diana; her authority is subsequently disputed by Love – the central conflict of the opera – but he is overruled on appeal by Jupiter, who is then forced to yield to Destiny's supreme power. All this in the prologue, which sets the theme for the work as a whole. Where Lully (1632–87) celebrated the status quo in his operas, all of which were preceded by a prologue in praise of Louis XIV, Rameau has no certain answers but proceeds to establish who rules the world. Act I sees Diana's powers disputed by Phèdre, who is rebuked by Jupiter. Act II in Hades celebrates Pluto's power, but this has to negotiate with Destiny, with Neptune, Mercury and Jupiter. In Act III, Thésée has to curb his own impulses, while Act IV reinforces the debate between Neptune and Diana and Act V brings in Destiny as well as those two deities. P.

LES INDES GALANTES

The Amorous Indies

Opéra-ballet in a prologue and two entrées, 'Le turc généreux' and 'Les incas du Pérou'; libretto for 'Le turc généreux' by Louis Fezelier, based on a true incident reported in the Mercur de France, January 1734. First performance, Académie Royale de la Musique, 23 August 1735. 'Les Fleurs, Fête Persane' added at third performance (revised at eighth). 'Les Sauvages' added 10 March 1736. 'Les Fleurs' revived Opéra Comique, 1925; entire work staged at Paris Opéra, 1952, Edinburgh, 1977.

Prologue

Hébé, *goddess of youth and pleasure*Soprano
 Bellone, *god of war*Baritone
 God of LoveSoprano

First Entrée: 'Le Turc généreux'

Osman Pacha, *in love with Emilie*Bass
 Emilie, *in love with Valère*Soprano
 Valère, *in love with Emilie*Tenor

Second Entrée: 'Les Incas du Pérou'

Huascar, *high priest*Bass
 Phani, *Inca princess*Soprano
 Don Carlos, *conquistador*Tenor

Third Entrée: 'Les Fleurs, Fête Persane'

Tacmas, *a Persian prince*Tenor
 Ali, *his favourite courtier*Baritone
 Zaire, *one of Ali's slaves*Soprano
 Fatime, *one of Tacmas's slaves*Soprano

Fourth Entrée: 'Les Sauvages'

Adario, *commander of the savages*Baritone
 Damon, *French officer*Tenor
 Don Alvar, *Spanish officer*Bass
 Zima, *the savage chieftain's daughter*Soprano

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Rameau was as concerned with ballet as with opera, though posterity has tended to disregard the former even more than the latter. Les indes galantes is nevertheless an extraordinary achievement, whose dimensions now seem astonishingly varied and generous: ballet, opera, flower-fête, lesson in politics, and so on.

Prologue. Hébé's palace. Hébé commands her followers to sing, dance and enjoy love. Entrée des Quatre Nations: French, Spanish, Italian and Polish youths enter and dance 'gracefully'. Hébé urges them to enjoy themselves and sing without revealing love's mysteries. She calls for musettes, the bagpipes considered indispensable for pastoral scenes. Suddenly Bellone's drums summon them to war and glory, splendidly accompanied by trumpets ('La Gloire vous appelle'). This occasions more dances and a chorus for the women who stay and the men who leave. Outraged that her votaries abandon her, Hébé summons Love who rallies his troops with a rousing showpiece for soprano and two violins. The prologue ends with a duet for Love and Hébé and a chorus, with the inevitable, apt melismas on 'Volez' to suggest love's flight.

First Entrée: 'Le Turc généreux'. The gardens of Osman Pacha with a view of the sea. Emilie is courted by Osman but tries to discourage him by revealing that she was abducted by a pirate on the eve of her marriage to a devoted lover. She calls her enforced residency with Osman 'a second slavery'. He retires, warning her that she will never see her lover again. The sky darkens and the sea rises. When the sky clears, prisoners lament that they have been saved only to become slaves. Emilie recognises one of them as the lover she lost, Valère. Rameau makes surprisingly little of this encounter. Osman overhears them and warns that he will exact punishment.

Suddenly, he gives them both their freedom, explaining that he himself was once Valère's slave and was freed by him. Valère's ships are filled with presents from the Pacha, loaded by his African slaves. The rest of the entrée celebrates the lovers' departure. They appeal to the breezes to lead their ships home again in a beautiful duet, taken up by the chorus ('Volez, Zéphyrs, tendres amants de Flore'). Dances follow for the African slaves, as well as rigaudons, tambourins, solos and choruses appealing for storm winds to disappear. The finale moves with an increasingly exhilarating pace, as Rameau responds emphatically to the text's series of injunctions, 'Volez, Hatez, Régnez, Fuyez, Partez, Embarquez, Voguez, Bravez'.

Second Entrée: 'Les Incas du Pérou'. A desert with a volcano. The Inca princess Phani has fallen in love with her people's enemy, the Spanish officer Carlos. He begins to doubt the sincerity of her conversion to Christianity. She warns him to beware of the violence of the Incas, who are about to celebrate the Festival of the Sun. Alone, she longs to be united with her conqueror ('Viens, hymen'). The Inca high priest Huascar (one of Rameau's most interesting characters) suspects that he has a rival in his love for Phani. He tells her that the sun has chosen a husband for her. When she shivers, he reminds her that heaven's dictates must be obeyed, in a characteristic, forceful air ('Obéissons sans balancer'). He accuses her of loving one of the Incas' enemies.

The festival begins. Huascar's solemn invocation is followed by the Incas' act of adoration and ceremonial dances, evoked in music of considerable gravity: there is nothing frivolous or merely exotic about it. Gavottes follow until an earthquake occurs and the volcano erupts. Huascar exploits the occasion to announce that heaven wants Phani to submit to marriage. She appeals to heaven for help. Carlos intervenes to reveal that the earthquake does not signal the sun's displeasure: his men have arrested Huascar's accomplices, who threw a rock into the volcano to stimulate an eruption. Huascar wanted to terrify Phani so she would yield to him. The lovers are united in the face of Huascar's fury, in a tremendous ensemble, still occasionally shaken by the after-effects of the shock ('Pour jamais, l'amour nous engage'). Huascar sees the volcano erupt again, and incites it to destroy him for his treachery to his religion ('Abîmes embrasés'). Flaming rocks crush him to death.

Third Entrée: 'Les Fleurs, Fête persane'. Gardens of Ali's palace. Prince Tacmas has disguised himself as a woman of the seraglio in order to test Zaire's sincerity – she is a slave in the household of his favourite courtier Ali. Ali is relieved to hear that Tacmas cares nothing for Fatime, since Ali himself has fallen in love with her. Zaire appears, lamenting her sad treatment at the hands of Love ('Amour, Amour, quand du destin'). Tacmas tries to find out the name of his rival. He shows Zaire his own portrait but misinterprets her shocked reaction as distaste. When Fatime appears, disguised as a male, Polish slave, Tacmas assumes this is his rival. Fatime explains that she is also in love and in need of help. Fooled by her disguise, Tacmas assumes this 'man's' problem is that Zaire loves Ali. Tacmas is about to stab his rival, when Fatime reveals her real identity. Zaire explains that Tacmas misunderstood her reaction to his portrait. He proposes marriage to Zaire and unites Ali with Fatime. They all swear that their love will bind them together forever, in a suddenly transcendental quartet whose music imitates the 'chains' that link them ('Tendre amour, que pour nous ta chaîne dure à jamais'). The Festival of Flowers follows, an elaborate, extended divertissement, complete with dances and songs. 'Action' is limited to floral display (dangerous temptation to a designer), such as 'Delightful odalisques of various nations of Asia wear the most lovely flowers in their headdresses and on their clothes.' In terms of its music, however, it represents the meat in the entrée. There is an appealing, aptly crepuscular chorus inviting night to fall; a splendid air for Tacmas, accompanied only by continuo ('L'éclat des roses'), as well as more for both Zaire and Fatime, whose inventive air asking a butterfly to stay in one place is the last vocal number in the entrée ('Papillon inconstant'). It ends with the Ballet des Fleurs, whose richly varied and expressive dances purport to represent the fate of flowers in a garden. A rose is exposed to the fierce North Wind, Borée, but rescued by a loving breeze, Zéphyr.

Fourth Entrée: 'Les Sauvages'. 'A grove in a forest of America, bordering the French and Spanish colonies, where the ceremony of the Great Pipe of Peace is to be celebrated.' Adario is about to sign a peace treaty between his nation, the French and the Spanish, but worries that the leaders of both colonies may have designs on his beloved, Zima. Damon, the French officer, lives up to his nation's reputation and justifies inconstancy in love to Don Alvar, the Spanish officer. Rameau lavishes the most enchanting music of the whole opera on Zima herself. The orchestra weaves elaborate garlands to support her exquisitely simple vocal line ('Nous suivons sur nos bords l'innocente nature'). Each of the men assumes she means to bless his suit and, further, that nature backs him up on the subject of inconstancy. Zima explains that their custom is to allow emotions to wander freely until marriage ('Le cœur change à son gré'). Alvar attacks the habits of the French, who are never less faithful than when married. In exchange, Damon singles out those suspicious husbands who live along the Tagus and keep their wives in chains. Zima tells the Spaniard he loves too much, and the Frenchman, not enough.

Adario comes to receive Zima's tribute. She celebrates their ideal moderation ('Sur nos bords l'amour vole'). This is the air that inspired Cuthbert Girdlestone to unwonted enthusiasm: 'For sheer beauty and power to move, the palm must go to Zima's second air ... Here ... is distilled the essential Rameau: his grace, his limitless poignancy, his nostalgia, his power to bring the infinite within a simple eight-bar phrase ...'¹ The two savages swear fidelity to each other in a touching, intimate duet. A ballet follows, celebrating the new reign of peace and love. The most remarkable sequence is the Danse du Grand Calumet de la Paix, in which Rameau reworks one of his harpsichord pieces, the deceptively simple 'Les Sauvages', from the Nouvelles pièces of 1730, as an orchestral passage, a duet and a chorus in praise of pastoral bliss. This was inspired by seeing some Native Americans dancing in Paris in 1725. It has a rhythmic pattern as hypnotically addictive as Ravel's Boléro and just as suited to inventive choreography; the whole sequence lasts only four and a half minutes. There is a splendid, festive, trumpet-graced air for Zima ('Régnez, plaisirs et jeux') and a chaconne of unexpectedly grand dimensions to crown this spectacular opéra-ballet. P.

¹ Jean-Philippe Rameau, 1969.

CASTOR ET POLLUX

Tragédie in a prologue and five acts, libretto by Pierre-Joseph Bernard. First performance, Académie Royale de la Musique, Paris, 24 October 1737, with Tribou as Castor, Chassé de Chinois as Pollux, Mlle Pellissier as Télaira. Revised 1750. Revived Montpellier, 1908; Frankfurt, 1980, with Elizabeth Gale and Philip Langridge, conductor Harnoncourt. 1750 revision, English Bach Festival, Covent Garden, 1981, with Peter Jeffes, Ian Caddy and Jennifer Smith, conductor Farncombe.

Vénus (Venus), goddess of love.....Soprano
 Mars, god of war.....Baritone
 Minerve (Minerva), divinity of arts and pleasures.....Soprano
 God of Love.....Soprano (or Tenor)
 Castor, son of Tyndarus and Leda, Pollux's twin.....Tenor (Haute-Contre)
 Pollux, son of Jupiter and Leda.....Bass
 Télaira, daughter of the Sun.....Soprano
 Phébé, Princess of Sparta.....Soprano
 Jupiter.....Bass
 The High Priest of Jupiter.....Tenor
 A Happy Spirit.....Soprano
 A Planet.....Soprano
 A Follower of Hébé.....Soprano
 A Pleasure.....Soprano
 Two Athletes.....Tenor, Baritone
 Arts and Pleasures, Spartans, Athletes, Priests, Shades, Hébé's Followers, etc.

Place: Sparta; Hades; The Elysian Fields
Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

Rameau's third opera had to wait eighteen years after its première to be properly appreciated. One of its most successful features, its integration of dance-spectacle and drama, probably impedes its wider acceptance even today, since it calls for resources that are rarely available and, even more, presupposes the will to link the arts together. The divertissements play a very interesting role, since they punctuate the action with extended moments of contemplation, reflection on what matters in life. It might be possible even to integrate the prologue into this sequence, though it was conceived as a pièce d'occasion to celebrate the Peace of Vienna in 1736 concluding the War of the Polish Succession.

Prologue. The stage represents the destruction wrought by war on the Arts and Pleasures. In chorus, supported by their tutelary deity Minerva and by Love, they implore Venus to subdue Mars, the god of war. When he appears, bound, at Venus's feet, his surrender is celebrated with gavottes, minuets and tambourins.

Act I. A monument erected for the funeral of Castor, King of the Spartans. Castor was murdered by Lincée, leaving his beloved Télaira, Princess of Sparta, inconsolable. Princess Phébé promises her that Castor's brother, Pollux, who is immortal because he is Jupiter's son, will avenge Castor's murder. Télaira herself renounces the light, and repudiates her father the sun in a magnificent air accompanied by bassoons, that Berlioz called 'one of the sublimest conceptions of dramatic music'¹ ('Tristes apprêts'). A Symphonie Guerrière follows, as Pollux brings the corpse of Lincée. When Pollux reveals that he adores Télaira, she asks him to persuade Jupiter to restore Castor to life.

Act II. The temple of Jupiter. Pollux is torn between nature and love, between his fraternal feelings and his love for Télaira ('Nature, Amour, qui partagez mon cœur'). 'Debussy found this air so personal and so modern that he felt one should be able to go up to Rameau after the performance and congratulate him on it.'² Pollux decides to help Télaira recover Castor. The High Priest, in a splendid, awesome air, warns that Jupiter will descend and appear in terrifying glory ('Le souverain des Dieux'). Moved by Pollux's pleas, the god decrees that Castor can return to life, but only if Pollux takes his place in Hades. Jupiter then presents a series of divertissements to remind Pollux of the delights that he will forgo in Hades. Hébé enters with her attendants and they celebrate pleasure and love in an unexpectedly touching chorus and two airs, all of which breathe a seriousness associated with religion. Pollux remains adamant.

¹ Revue et Gazette musicale, 1842.

² Gil Blas, 2 February 1903, quoted in Girdlestone, op. cit.

Act III. Outside the entrance to Hades. Phébé, who loves Pollux, appeals to the monsters, ghosts and demons that guard the entrance to keep him away, but fails to dissuade him from entering. Télaire responds to her plea by recounting her dream in which new gods appeared, a thunderbolt struck the earth and blood was shed – a remarkably accurate prophecy. Phébé realizes that Pollux loves Télaire. In an intensely vivid, concerted passage the three lovers contemplate their unhappiness or joy. Pollux fights the monsters and demons barring his way (to some impressively busy music) and, with help from Mercury, enters Hades. Phébé, in despair, contemplates joining him there.

Act IV. In the Elysian Fields. Castor is unable to enjoy the peace of eternity, since he cannot forget the love he has lost ('Séjour de l'éternelle paix'). He refuses to be comforted by the Happy Shades, who also stage dances to entertain him. One of the shades celebrates the eternal dawn of the Elysian Fields, where love brings only happiness. Pollux comes to take Castor's place, but when he learns what his brother has sacrificed for him, Castor resolves to return to earth for one day only, in order to bid farewell to Télaire. He will then come back to Hades, so as to allow Pollux to enjoy life and love on earth. Mercury transports Castor, while the Happy Shades appeal to both brothers to live with them.

Act V. Outside Sparta. When Phébé learns that Castor is alive again, she at first determines to avenge what she presumes is an insult to Pollux, but then resolves to commit suicide, so as to join her beloved in Hades. Télaire is devastated that as soon as Castor has come back to her, he must leave again forever. Télaire accuses Castor of having never loved her, and the gods of cruelty and indifference to love. Peals of thunder are heard. Télaire faints; Jupiter descends, releases Castor from his vow and promises him immortality. Pollux joins them, bringing news that Phébé has committed suicide. Jupiter orders that his celestial empire become visible and then stages a final divertissement, 'la fête de l'univers'. The genies, stars and planets watch as Télaire becomes a goddess and the twins join the Zodiac. A Planet welcomes these new stars, the Dioscurides or Gemini, who will also guide mortals at sea ('Brillez, brillez Astres nouveaux'). The work ends with a chaconne and chorus celebrating the fête ordained by the master of the universe.

Apart from a brief over-indulgence in nobility, as the brothers compete to behave well, Castor et Pollux keeps up a pace and intensity that never falter. As in Hippolyte et Aricie, the scorned woman tends to steal the show, but Castor et Pollux keeps Phébé firmly in her place. There is real strength to the relation between the brothers: the prevailing stoicism probably reflects the opera's setting in Sparta. Rameau's score is particularly rich in incidental music for dances and for minor characters: one of the most brilliant numbers occurs right at the end, as a Planet welcomes the new stars into the skies with appropriately festive, glittering figuration. P.

DARDANUS

Tragédie lyrique in a prologue and five acts, libretto by Charles-Antoine Le Clerc de La Bruère. First performed Académie Royale de la Musique, Paris, 19 November 1739, with Jélyotte as Dardanus, Mlle Pellissier as Iphise, Le Page as Teucer and Isménor and Mlle Fel as the Phrygian Woman. Altered ten days later, revised drastically in 1744 with help from Pellegrin. Revived 1908 by Vincent d'Indy in Paris and in Dijon, Rameau's home town. The Paris Opéra combined elements from both versions in 1983.

Vénus (Venus), goddess of love.....Soprano
 God of LoveSoprano
 Iphise, Teucer's daughter.....Soprano
 Dardanus, *Jupiter's son*Tenor
 Anténor, *Teucer's ally*Baritone
 Teucer, King of Phrygia.....Baritone
 Isménor, *magician*Bass
 A Phrygian WomanSoprano
 Dreams.....Soprano, Tenor (Haute-Contre), Bass Followers of Vénus and Love, Sports and Pleasures, etc.

Place: Phrygia

Running Time: 2 hours

Objections to the central role played by the supernatural in Rameau's fifth opera convinced the composer to revise it for the revival in 1744. In so doing, however, while he strengthened the plot, he also cut out such major parts as the dream sequences, the scenes involving the monster and Iphise's second monologue.

Prologue. Love's palace on Venus's island of Cythaera. Venus asks the Pleasures to reign, and to keep Jealousy under strict control. But the Pleasures' dance around Love's throne slows down and soon (in 24 bars) they fall asleep. Irritated, Venus commands Jealousy to wake them. Human beings 'of all conditions and ages' pay homage to Love in a merry 'Marche pour les différentes Nations'.

Act I. A place filled with funerary monuments. Iphise, Princess of Phrygia, has fallen in love with her father's enemy, Dardanus, son of Jupiter. She appeals to Love to relinquish his hold on her heart, and to those whom Dardanus has killed to make her hear the voice of reason ('Cesse, cruel amour, de régner sur mon ame'). Her father tells her that he has promised to give her in marriage to Anténor, who will lead his army against Dardanus. Teucer and Anténor swear on the tombs to destroy Phrygia's enemies, while a celebratory chorus, an Entrée Majestueuse pour les Guerriers, a further ensemble appealing to the gods of war and several rigaudons enhance the solemnity of the occasion. The act ends, as it began, with Iphise contemplating her secret distress. She resolves to consult the magician Isménor.

Act II. A wilderness. Isménor boasts that his arts make him the equal of the gods. Dardanus comes to consult him and to see Iphise, whom he loves secretly. Isménor's chorus of infernal spirits perform their magical rites and Isménor commands the sun to disappear in an impressive passage ('Suspend ta brillante carrière'). A solemn 'Air Grave' is followed by an exhilarating 'Air Vif'. Isménor confirms that as long as Dardanus holds on to a talisman he can appear as Isménor himself. The spirits warn him to obey. First Anténor comes to consult the magician: Iphise seems indifferent to him; does he have a rival? He does not receive an answer. Then Iphise herself appears, and confesses to 'Isménor' that she loves Dardanus ('Par l'effort de votre art terrible'). Dardanus-as-Isménor assures her that her love is returned and then reveals his own identity. She is appalled and runs away, leaving him heartened but vulnerable: he is taken prisoner.

Act III. A gallery inside Teucer's palace. Iphise is torn between guilt at loving Dardanus and fear that he will die at the Phrygians' hands. She delays her marriage to Anténor, on the grounds that the times are too disturbed. Anténor accuses her of loving the enemy and insists that he will marry her immediately, if only to enjoy her unhappiness. His is a memorably dark, intense air ('Le désespoir et la rage cruelle'). All celebrate their triumph with a divertissement, rigaudons, minuets and tambourins, till King Teucer reveals that Neptune has sent a dragon to lay waste the kingdom because the Phrygians dared put Jupiter's son Dardanus in chains. Anténor resolves to fight the monster. A warlike Sinfonia follows.

Act IV. A prison, where Dardanus despairs in a tremendous, bleak air, whose extended introduction with prominent horns and bassoons foretells Fidelio ('Lieux funestes'). Isménor appears and suggests that since the god of love is really to blame, Dardanus should ask him to appease the Furies. Dardanus' appeal ('Amour, Amour, quand tu veux nous surprendre') is answered when Venus descends in her chariot, and commands Dreams to soothe him as he sleeps – in a delectable lullaby, a trio and chorus promising him a future rich in glory and love. The idyll is briefly interrupted – in other words, the divertissement is enriched by contrasting spectacle and incidents – when Dardanus dreams that a monster emerges from the sea, to some moderately disturbed music. Dardanus awakes. Anténor arrives, longing for death to end his sufferings. After a storm, Anténor is attacked by the monster. Dardanus intervenes to save his rival's life, but refuses to say who he is. Anténor hands his saviour his sword as a pledge, promising that he can ask anything of him. Dardanus immediately asks Anténor to allow Iphise 'the freedom to refuse your hand'. Anténor refuses, he would rather lose his life. Dardanus reminds him that his oath has more power than love itself. (In the 1744 version Iphise enters Dardanus's cell and they sing a moving duet, 'Frappez! frappez!' Anténor dies after confessing his treachery. Dardanus escapes and takes Teucer prisoner, after which the King eventually allows Dardanus and Iphise to marry. Venus descends for the wedding.)

Act V. King Teucer's palace. Phrygians welcome Anténor back, assuming that he has saved them from the dragon. Furthermore, Neptune relents, as long as Iphise marries the man who subdued the monster. Dardanus appears, to general astonishment, and asks Anténor to kill him: if he cannot live with Iphise, he will die before her. He hands Anténor back his own sword. This forces Anténor to acknowledge Dardanus as Phrygia's saviour. He also accepts that this is the man the gods have destined for Iphise. Iphise and Dardanus describe Pleasure's impact on the world (duet, 'Un jour plus dur embellit l'univers'), and Venus herself descends, accompanied by Hymen and Love. She calls on the Pleasures to celebrate Love's triumph, and the opera ends as everyone joins in praising Venus.

Dardanus is a great opera, certainly one of Rameau's best; it would hold its own in a conventional opera company's repertory. It is not just the richness of characters, or the variety of the action, the amazing orchestral invention of the centrally placed introduction to Act III, or the great choral and solo numbers (Teucer and Anténor's oath; the magic ceremonies) that deserve to be highlighted. It is the way the varying course of the drama dictates the musical form: repeatedly, free-flowing recitative flares up into 'aria', into a more elaborate musical expression, as the temperature momentarily rises. This occurs when, for example, Iphise faces up to the irrational strength of her feelings and longs to be ruled by reason again, 'Arrachez de mon cœur'; or, in Act IV, when Anténor claims that destiny has no impact on a heart given up to love and flutes briefly lend their support to the still declamatory vocal line. Such variations in the pace and texture of the vocal line look forward to Janáček. They are not so good in excerpt: what is needed is the long stretch, the paragraph or page, rather than the sentence. P.

PLATÉE

Plataea

Ballet Bouffon in a prologue and three acts, libretto by Andrien-Joseph Le Valois d'Orville, based on Jacques Autreau's ballet Platée ou Junon Jalouse. First performed Versailles, 31 March 1745, with Pierre Jelyotte as Platée, Marie Fel as Folie, Le Page as Cithéron, De Chassé as Jupiter, Berard as Mercure. Commissioned to celebrate the Dauphin's wedding, it was given only one performance; revived 1749 and 1759, Paris Opéra. Revived in German, Munich, 1901; Monte Carlo, 1917; in concert (in a new edition by Graham Sadler) by the English Bach Festival, 1983.

Prologue

Thespis, inventor of comedy Tenor
 A Satyr Baritone
 Two Grape-Pickers Sopranos
 Thalie (Thalia), muse of history Soprano
 Momus, god of mockery Bass
 Love Soprano
 Satyrs, Maenads, Grape-Pickers
 Platée, nymph in the marsh below
 Mount Cithaeron Tenor
 Cithéron, King of Greece Bass
 Jupiter, King of the gods Bass
 Junon (Juno), his wife Soprano
 Mercure (Mercury),
 messenger of the gods Tenor (Haute-Contre)
 Iris, goddess of the rainbow Soprano
 Momus, god of mockery Tenor
 God of Folly Soprano
 Clarine, follower of Platée Soprano
 A Naiad, follower of Platée Soprano
 Naiads, Aquilons, Sad and Serious Followers of Folly, Momus's Followers etc.

Place: A Vineyard in Greece; a Marsh at the Foot of Mount Cithaeron

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

The overture announces the theme of the opera, incongruity, as a grandly consequential opening is followed by an inconsequential, strange figure harping repeatedly on one note, like bitter laughter. The plot hinges on the fact that Platée is so ugly that Jupiter's wife Juno is cured of jealousy when she finds that her husband is supposedly erring with her. Before we can work out how offensive that is to single, physically challenged marsh nymphs, we should remember that the role is meant to be sung by a man. This highlights the role's ludicrous side without damaging its sympathetic aspects: how could he imagine he would attract the ruler of the gods? Platée emerges as an endearingly, rather than merely repellently, vain creature, but Rameau ends the work on a decidedly acrid note, stressing the humiliation of Platée.

Prologue. 'The Birth of Comedy'. A vineyard in Greece. As Thespis lies in a drunken stupor, a Satyr pays tribute to Bacchus, the god of wine. Thespis wakes to sing in praise of Bacchus, and emphasises how wine licenses mockery: he questions the Maenads' faithfulness, suggests that the Satyrs are cuckolded and that everyone knows the Maenads' secrets ('Charmant Bacchus'). Naturally, everyone invites him to go back to sleep. Thalia has come with Momus to present a spectacle that will correct the faults of mortal men and, as Momus adds, of the gods. After all, Jupiter himself once used a comic trick to cure his wife of jealousy and pride. Thespis invites the spectators to become actors and they agree in a surprisingly serious ensemble which serves to warn us there is nothing trivial in this enterprise. The prologue ends with lively songs and dances in honour of Bacchus, Momus and Love.

Act I. A country scene with a stormy sky, evoked by some splendidly blustery music. Cithéron begs the gods to end the elements' war on earth; Mercury descends and explains that the bad weather has been caused by Juno, who is tormented by jealousy. Mercury has come to find some amusement to distract Jupiter. He likes Cithéron's suggestion that Jupiter pretend to want to marry someone else, particularly since the 'beloved' is so ugly there is no danger. He explains that Platée is a nymph with no idea how hideous she is. Mercury goes to tell Jupiter of the scheme, as Platée herself emerges, determined to 'lose her liberty', i.e. find a husband ('Que ce séjour est agréable!'). She assumes Cithéron must be attracted to her, since he avoids her, as a shy lover would. Seeing him coming, she appeals to the marsh's inhabitants to celebrate the moment: frogs and cuckoos join in with their vocal contribution. She encourages the hesitant Cithéron, but gradually realises that he does not love her. She weeps, asking him why ('Pourquoi?'), echoed by the animal chorus in a frog-like croak ('Quoi? Quoi?').

Mercury descends and presents Jupiter's suit. She can hardly believe her luck. Lightning proclaims Juno's fury with her husband, but, undaunted, Platée again calls on the marsh nymphs to celebrate the occasion. Clarine, Platée's confidante, and a Nymph tell the sun that the 'damp Naiads' reject him, in a duet more memorable for its music than its words ('Soleil, tu luis en vain'). The act ends with a spectacular display of orchestral fury, as a band of Aquilons (north winds) make a 'very lively entrée' and force the nymphs to retire.

Act II. Mercury has pacified Juno, who is now planning to catch Jupiter with his new love. Jupiter appears, rebukes the Aquilons and looks forward to seeing the beautiful nymph he has been promised. He first appears to Platée as a donkey. Assuming this is a test, she advances on it unabashed, indeed amorously. Jupiter brays in response and then turns into an owl. Platée praises its plumage, but the other birds turn on it and it flies away. Jupiter then appears in his own shape and calls on Momus to celebrate his new conquest. She is alternately annoyed and delighted as Momus's followers salute her funny looks and her beauty.

An 'extraordinary symphony' is heard, heralding the arrival of Folly with Apollo's lyre, on which she accompanies dances for her own and Momus's followers. She celebrates the power of love to transform, as it did Daphne for Apollo, in a brilliant, comic air ('Aux langueurs d'Apollon Daphné se refusa'). She asks Hymen to prepare a new marriage for Jupiter and crown his 'new Juno'. Platée is delighted at these words and, as everyone joins in the dancing, they take up her ecstatic, ludicrous cries of 'Hé, bon, bon, bon'.

Act III. Juno gives in to her jealous fury at her husband. Mercury persuades her to hide and see for herself how Jupiter really loves her. A troupe of Dryads, Satyrs, and Nymphs, followers of Platée, arrive to celebrate love's triumph. Platée herself enters in a chariot drawn by frogs, ready to receive either Love or Hymen, the god of marriage. When Jupiter asks where these gods are, Mercury explains that they rarely appear together. Instead, Momus, the god of mockery, appears, bearing a 'ridiculously big' bow and arrow. Momus has come in place of Love (busy elsewhere), but all he can offer is tears, pains, cries and flattering hope (all of which are represented in the music). Three of Momus's followers appear as the Graces and dance comically, accompanied by Folly strumming her lyre. Cithéron appears with some country people to suitably rustic music to celebrate Platée's conquest. At Folly's behest everyone sings in praise of Platée. Jupiter takes her by the hand and pretends to initiate the marriage ceremony. He reassures her that Juno's anger is impotent but, just as he is about to swear the oath, his wife intervenes. When she tears off Platée's veil and sees how ugly she is, the goddess is confused but instantly reassured that Jupiter still loves only her. Together, the gods reaffirm their marital bond. They rise up to heaven while Platée is mocked by the country people, who repeat the chorus sung previously in her honour. Shaking with rage, she threatens to make her waters overflow and blames Cithéron before jumping back into her marsh. Everyone else celebrates Jupiter's reconciliation with Juno.

Platée functions as a satire on contemporary conventions for operatic and ballet performance. The very notion of the divertissement, the celebration of someone's authority in a sequence of songs and dances, is repeatedly turned on its head. Many of these incidental subtleties are lost to us, as the original conventions are not familiar. Rameau also wrongfoots us with games on stresses (huge intervals on the last, neutral syllable of a word such as 'timide'), unsuitable melodic lines and ridiculous melismas, more common in Italian opera (on the vowel 'ou', for example, in Folly's Act II air). P.

ZOROASTRE

Zarathustra

Tragédie lyrique in five acts, libretto by Louis de Cahusac. First performance Académie Royale de Musique, Paris, 5 December 1749, with Jélyotte as Zoroastre and Mlle Fel as Amélite; revised version (three acts largely rewritten) 20 January 1756, revived by Schola Cantorum, Paris, 1908, and Opéra-Comique, Paris, 1964. First U.K. performance (1756 version), Queen Elizabeth Hall, London, 1979. First U.S. performance (1756 version), Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, 1983.

Zoroastre, *founder of the Magi*Haute-Contre
 Abramane, *high priest of Arimane*Bass
 Amélite, *heiress to the throne of Bactria*Soprano
 Erinice, *a Bactrian princess*Soprano
 Zélize¹, *a Bactrian woman at Amélite's court*Soprano
 Zopire, Narbanor², *priests of Arimane*Basses
 Oromasès², *King of the Genies*Bass
 Céphie, *a Bactrian woman at Amélite's court*Soprano
 Abénis¹, *an Indian savage*Haute-Contre
 Cénide¹, *an Indian savage*Soprano
 Orosmade, *a voice from a cloud of fire*Haute-Contre
 A Salamander¹Baritone
 A Sylphide¹Soprano
 VengeanceBass
 Arimane, *a subterranean voice*Bass
 Three Furies¹Soprano, Hautes-Contres
 Five Furies²Sopranos, Hautes-Contres

Bactrian People, Indians, Magi, Elemental Beings, Priests of the False God, Demons, etc.

Place: Bactria

Time: Sixth Century B.C.

Running Time: 3 hours 5 minutes

The extraordinarily graphic overture lays out the stark polarity in the opera between evil and good: the cruelty of Abramane and the suffering of the Bactrian people, Zoroastre's beneficence and the happiness of those he has freed from oppression.

Act I. Abramane swears to have revenge on Amélite, who spurned him and loves Zoroastre. A bassoon adds a suitably dark colour to a sung couplet that recurs during his recitative – Rameau's characteristically lively way of breaking down the barriers between sung and declaimed passages. The King who favoured Zoroastre has died; Zoroastre has been outlawed. Abramane now longs for the throne itself and is prepared to ally himself with Erinice to thwart Amélite, the legitimate heiress. Erinice knows he is motivated by ambition, but since Zoroastre rejected her, she is determined to see Amélite suffer. They agree to join forces, in three lines of cold formality, 'Unissons nous'. Abramane breaks his magic ring and gives her half, to signify that he shares his power with her.

A chorus of young Bactrians try to comfort Amélite. Longing for Zoroastre to return, she collapses, overwhelmed by grief. The mood of soft melancholy is enriched by a 'Gavotte Tendre', until a sudden 'Subterranean Noise' causes panic. Amélite sees Erinice and runs to comfort her, only to learn that Erinice is bent on tormenting her. A Chorus of Cruel Spirits drag Amélite away. The first part of the overture returns aptly to remind us that this scene of oppression is part of a larger picture.

Act II. The palace of Oromasès, King of the Genies. Zoroastre remains sunk in grief since he is separated from his beloved Amélite. The high register of his part speaks eloquently for his heroism, though it is vital to remember that this Zoroastre has nothing to do with any other Zarathustra. Oromasès urges Zoroastre to free the universe and summons the Spirits of the Elements to enlighten him. Rameau's music moves to the slow, dignified pace of a ritual ceremony, but the solemnity never entirely masks a gentle playfulness, as it describes Zoroastre's initiation.

¹ Original version only.

² 1756 version only.

Amélite is held captive inside the castle of the Kings of Bactria. Demons torment her in a vicious little chorus and Erinice offers her a bleak choice, 'Renounce the throne, or die!' Amélite remains defiant but before Erinice can stab her rival, an iron door bursts open to reveal Zoroastre, who causes the dagger to drop from her hand and the demons to vanish. The lovers are reunited in bliss. Zoroastre frees the innocent who are imprisoned and makes the prison walls disappear, revealing a public square. He presents Amélite to the people as their next sovereign. They celebrate her return with a lively chorus, a procession whose springy pace always seems about to become a dance, the 'Entrée des Peuples, Air Majestueux', irresistibly lighthearted minuets and rigaudons. Céphie's slow, sensual air ('Ah! Que l'absence est un cruel tourment') is balanced by Amélite's lively, melismatic air reflecting that happiness is sometimes born from disaster ('Non, ce n'est pas toujours pour ravager la terre'). The act ends with rejoicing.

Act III. Outside Bactria, before dawn. Abramane has set a trap for Zoroastre but he worries that Erinice's resolve will falter. He envelops her in a cloud and reflects that 'great crimes' will lead him to glory. He hides as the people led by Zoroastre assemble to salute the rising sun and love itself. An 'Entrée de Peuple Différents' brings on young maidens who will marry at dawn, and Zoroastre sings a 'Hymn to the Sun'. Their grooms join them and after a gigue, Amélite asks Love to discharge his quiver at their hearts. An exhilarating Tambourin en Rondeau is followed by the solemn marriage ceremony. As Zoroastre and Amélite are about to swear an oath, thunder erupts, darkness descends and Abramane calls on his gods and the North Winds (the Aquilons) to destroy them. Zoroastre summons Beneficent Spirits who carry Amélite to safety, while he prepares to do battle. Columns of fire rain down on Bactria.

Act IV. Inside Arimane's secret temple. In a magnificently dark air, Abramane prays not to be afflicted with remorse ('Cruels tyrans'). His confederates Zopire and Narbanor report that Zoroastre turned the troops' weapons back on them, while a clear sky disperses Abramane's dark enchantments. Abramane strengthens Erinice's faltering resolve. He conjures the evil deity he worships and sacrifices animals to nourish its wrath. Hatred, the Furies and Despair appear with a crowd of evil spirits and, in their midst, Vengeance, armed with an iron-studded club. In another ballet sequence a statue of Zoroastre on the altar is consumed by flames. Joyful dances are interrupted by 'a frightening symphony': hell itself urges them 'to make virtue tremble and courage pale'. A great ensemble takes up the theme, anticipating victory, death and carnage ('Cours aux armes').

Act V. Zoroastre's ancient domain. The mood changes dramatically, and even before Erinice sings of being torn apart by love and hate (in a superbly vivid, sympathetic air), we know which emotion has won. She now wants to save Zoroastre's life and urges him to flee hell's onslaught. Zoroastre assumes that 'a loud symphony' means the people applaud Amélite. Suddenly, Erinice feels less remorseful.

Bactrians run on in despair: as Amélite was being carried to her coronation, a whirlwind carried her away. In her place, Erinice comes to be crowned, attended by the Priests of Arimane. Abramane stops Zoroastre interfering by revealing that Amélite lies at his feet in chains. But lightning strikes Abramane, Erinice and the Priests and the earth opens to swallow them up. The scene changes to reveal a building filled with the Spirits of the Elements.¹ Amélite is seen in the clouds freed from her chains. Oromasès explains that Heaven wanted to test Zoroastre's virtue once more and invites him to reign over the people he loves. The opera ends in a pastoral vision of bliss: Amélite and Zoroastre are crowned with garlands of flowers while Shepherds and Herdsmen join the festivities in an Andante that might have been written for Mark Morris's idealised form of walking. In Amélite's splendid air, 'Love flies here at the sound of the oboes', oboes imitate musettes. Shepherds assure them that she and Zoroastre will be as happy as they are.

Zoroastre gains from the comparative informality of Rameau's writing: thoughts and feelings prompt the vocal line to soar into lyrical flights of singing, even if only for a line or so. At the same time, music rescues the polarised characterisation from crude stereotypes: Abramane's ambitious, evil nature emerges with a unique stamp in syncopated rhythms and a vaulting vocal line, while the forces of good are portrayed in serenely balanced music. The fourth act is particularly strong, the equivalent of the Underworld act in Hippolyte et Aricie some sixteen years earlier: it builds through a sequence of increasingly fast tempi (grave, vif, très vif) to an almost hysterical climax. P.

¹ 'It is the first temple dedicated to light, of the composite order, its vaulting is open to the sky, showing various symbols in the air, the goods, the arts and virtues that Zoroastre is going to distribute on earth.'

LES BORÉADES

*The Boreads*¹

Tragédie in five acts, libretto by an unknown author, possibly Louis de Cahusac. Completed in 1764; in rehearsal when Rameau died. Not performed until O.R.T.F. broadcast, 1963. Concert performance, Queen Elizabeth Hall, London, 1975; first staging, Aix-en-Provence Festival, 1982, with Jennifer Smith, Philip Langridge, John Aler, Gilles Cachemaille, Jean-Philippe Lafont, conducted by John Eliot Gardiner.

Alphise, Queen of Bactria.....Soprano
 Semire, her confidante.....Soprano
 Polyhymnie, muse of song and mime.....Soprano
 A Nymph.....Soprano
 Abaris, Alphise's lover.....Tenor
 Calisis, Alphise's suitor.....Tenor
 Borée (Boreas), god of the North Wind.....Bass
 Borilée, Alphise's suitor.....Baritone
 Adamas, high priest of Apollo.....Baritone
 Apollon (Apollo), god of light.....Bass
 God of Love.....Soprano

Pleasures and Graces, Priests of Apollo, Seasons,
 Muses, Zephyrs, Hours, Arts etc.

Place: Bactria

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

Act I. Queen Alphise confides in Sémire: by tradition she is expected to marry a Boread, a descendant of Borée, the North Wind, but she is actually in love with a foreigner, Abaris. Two Boreads, Borilée and Calisis, press their suits on Alphise, who refers the decision to Apollo. Calisis presents an entertainment performed by Pleasures and Graces. The act ends with a contredanse.

Act II. The temple of Apollo. Abaris complains that the god ignores his pleas for help, even though he has been brought up in the temple by the priests. Alone, Adamas the high priest remembers how Apollo entrusted him with the infant and commanded that his divine birth be concealed from him until he proved himself worthy of it. When Abaris confesses his love for Alphise, Adamas commands the priests to obey him as they would the King. The Queen arrives and begs the priests to intercede with Apollo for her. She recounts a dream in which Borée threatened to destroy her palace and country. Abaris declares his love for her; she responds delightedly and, when the priests and courtiers arrive, she pretends that her exclamations of joy are a hymn to Apollo. It is Borilée's turn to present a dance-spectacle: dancers mime the legend of Borée and Orithée: the North Wind abducts a princess. Calisis draws the moral, that we cannot avoid the dictates of Love. A Nymph celebrates love's freedom from passion and its waywardness ('C'est la liberté ... Comme un zéphir'). Dances follow. The people anticipate the arrival of a god, but it turns out to be Love, rather than Apollo. He approves of Alphise's choice of lover and hands her a magic arrow. The act ends with songs in honour of Love and of Apollo. The divertissement is varied in pace and mood, richly scored, graceful and makes a sensuous ending.

Act III. Alphise remembers her terrible dream ('Songe affreux, image cruelle'). Abaris worries that he will lose her to the Boreads, but she reassures him. People sing in praise of Hymen, god of marriage, and a further divertissement is staged. The moral is drawn by Calisis in a charming, bassoon-inflected air and chorus with an elaborate, high-lying vocal line: why fight against love – surrender and save time. Bassoons feature in two delicious gavottes, paired with oboes and strings, then Borilée begs Alphise to choose a husband. When Adamas presses her, however, Alphise abdicates, asks the people to choose their king and hands Abaris Love's arrow. Calisis and Borilée both claim the throne. Abaris is outraged by their behaviour but calmed by Alphise, who declares her love for him. The people beg Alphise to continue as Queen, while they hope she will marry Abaris. This inspires Calisis and Borilée to appeal to their ancestor Borée. A storm erupts and Alphise is carried away in a whirlwind.

¹ Descendants of Boreas.

The act ends with a brief and solemn lament sung by Abaris and the people.

Act IV. The storm continues while the people try to calm Borée. Borilée gloats at their distress and swears to destroy Alphise. As the storm ends, Abaris returns in despair at having lost Alphise ('Lieux désolés'). Adamas begs him to save the country and renounce his love. Abaris responds by trying to kill himself. Adamas prevents him: the arrow may help him defeat his rivals. Abaris appeals to Apollo for help. The muse Polyhymnie descends and offers to transport him on the zephyrs' wings. This calls for a series of dances, a gavotte for the Hours and Zephyrs in which 'the string instruments imitate a clock' striking, and two rigaudons. Abaris sets off on his aerial journey, calling on the winds to retire into their caves.

Act V. In Borée's cavern of the Winds. Borée asks the Winds to punish earth ('Obeissez, quittez vos cavernes obscurs'). But Alphise remains constant to her love for Abaris, even when she is forced by the North Wind and the suitors to choose between marriage to one of them and a life in chains. Her undaunted reply ('Qu'on me donne des fers') so irritates Borée that he orders new tortures. Abaris appears and uses the arrow to calm the suitors' fury. Apollo descends in majesty and reveals that Abaris is his son, by a charming young nymph descended from Borée himself. Reunited with Alphise, Abaris frees the rival suitors from their enchantment. Before he leaves, Apollo establishes eternal day in Borée's dark world. Dances for Sports, Love and Pleasure celebrate the occasion. Abaris and Alphise enjoy the triumph of love (duet, 'Que ces moments sont doux') and Abaris compares love to a stream that becomes a torrent when its path is blocked, in a charming air whose violin figuration imitates the stream ('Que l'amour embellit la vie'). The opera ends with several jolly contredanses.

In the introduction to the facsimile edition of the score (1982), Antoine Geoffroy-Dechaume remarks that 'It is finally in the amplitude of the truth of the dramatic emotion or of its tenderness that he achieves in Les Boréades the perfection of his musical ideal.' P.

MAURICE RAVEL

(born 7 March 1875, died 28 December 1937)

L'HEURE ESPAGNOLE

The Spanish Hour

Opera in one act, text by Franc-Nohain. Première, Opéra-Comique, Paris, 19 May 1911, with Vix, Périer. First performed at Covent Garden, 1919, with Donalds, André Gilly, Dua, Maguénat, Cotreuil, conductor Percy Pitt; Chicago and New York, 1920, with Gall, Maguénat, Defrère, Warnéry, Cotreuil, conductor Hasselmans; Metropolitan, 1925, with Bori, Errolle, Bada, Tibbett, Didur, conductor Hasselmans; la Scala, Milan, 1929, with Supervia, Menescaldi, Damiani, Baccaloni, conductor Santini.

Concepcion, wife of Torquemada Soprano
Gonzalve, a poet Tenor
Torquemada, a clock-maker Tenor
Ramiro, a muleteer Bariton-Martin
Don Inigo Gomez, a banker Bass

Place: Toledo

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 50 minutes

Several false operatic starts preceded L'Heure Espagnole, a product of one of the composer's most prolific periods, which included the Rapsodie Espagnole as well as sketches for Daphnis et Chloé, much piano music, songs and chamber music.

The action takes place in the shop of Torquemada, an absent-minded clock-maker of Toledo. It is his day for attending the public clocks in various parts of the town. It is also the one day that his wife Concepcion can enjoy her love affairs with complete freedom. As the clock-maker leaves his house, Ramiro, a muleteer, arrives to have his watch fixed. It is a family heirloom and most important to him. Much to Concepcion's annoyance, Torquemada invites the customer to await his return. In despair Concepcion wonders what to do with the unwelcome visitor. Equally embarrassed, he offers to carry to her room one of the large clocks which her husband has declared too heavy for him to lift.

As he takes the clock to the other room Concepcion's lover Gonzalve appears. While the muleteer is out of the room he is hidden in a grandfather clock. There follows an interchange of clocks, and the unsuspecting muleteer carries Gonzalve inside a clock to Concepcion's room. Inigo, a banker, who is another admirer of Concepcion's, enters. He in his turn is hidden in a clock. Another switching of timepieces effects a change in lovers. But neither turns out to be satisfactory, the one perpetually indulging in flights of poetic fancy, the other proving simply ridiculous, and it is the muleteer who by his prowess and strength wins Concepcion's admiration; she transfers her temporary affections to him and takes him up to her room. While they are away, Torquemada returns. He finds two dejected philanderers hidden in his clocks and takes the opportunity of selling one to each of them. Concepcion and Ramiro re-enter. The husband, however, probably believes that there is safety in numbers and the opera ends with a sparkling quintet, whose moral, say the characters, comes from Boccaccio:

Entre tous les amants, seul amant efficace,
Il arrive un moment, dans les déduits d'amour,
Où le muletier a son tour!

From the delightful clock noises of the opening to the Habanera quintet of the end, L'heure espagnole is full of charming music. It is however designed to point up the witty stage action, and there are in the accepted sense hardly any 'numbers' (Concepcion's exasperated 'Ah, la pitoyable aventure' – Oh, what a miserable affair – is the nearest) as one might expect from Ravel's injunction to his singers: 'dire plutôt que chanter' (say it rather than sing it). Gonzalve is the only exception to this rule, and he waxes positively lyrical at times (e.g. his characteristically Spanish opening song). It is all very light, and we may for once legitimately call it very French as well. K.W., H.

L'ENFANT ET LES SORTILÈGES

The Child and the Magic

Opera in two parts, text by Colette. Première Monte Carlo, 21 March 1925, with Gauley, Warnéry, Lafont, conductor de Sabata. First performed Opéra-Comique, Paris, 1926, with Gauley, Féraldy, Calvet, Sibille, Bourdin, Hérent, Guénot, conductor Wolff; San Francisco, 1930, with Queena Mario, conductor Merola; Florence Festival, 1939, by company from Opéra, Paris (where the work was revived that year), with Micheau, Branèze, Cernay, conductor Previtali; la Scala, Milan, 1948, with Branèze, Danco, Schenneberg, Gianotti, conductor de Sabata. Revived London, Sadler's Wells, 1965, conductor Matheson; in John Dexter's production with designs by David Hockney at Metropolitan, 1981, Covent Garden, 1983.

L'Enfant (The Child)Mezzo-Soprano
Sa Mère (His Mother).....Contralto
La Bergère (The Louis XV Chair)Soprano
La Tasse chinoise (The Chinese Cup).....Mezzo-Contralto
Le Feu¹ (The Fire).....Soprano Léger
La Princesse¹ (The Princess)Soprano Léger
La Chatte (The Cat)Mezzo-Soprano
La Libellule (The Dragonfly)Mezzo-Soprano
Le Rossignol¹ (The Nightingale)Soprano Léger
La Chauve-Souris (The Bat)Soprano
La Chouette (The Little Owl).....Soprano
L'Ecureuil (The Squirrel)Mezzo-Soprano
Une Pastourelle (A Shepherd Girl)Soprano
Un Pâtre (A Shepherd).....Contralto
Le Fauteuil (The Armchair)Basse Chantante
L'Horloge Comtoise (The Grandfather Clock).....Baritone
La Théière (The Tea Pot)Tenor
Arithmetic² (The Little Old Man).....Tenor
Le Chat (The Tom Cat)Baritone
Un Arbre (A Tree)Bass
La Rainette² (The Frog)Tenor
Le Banc (Settle), Le Canapé (Sofa), Le Pouf (Ottoman), Fauteuil en Vannerie (Wicker Chair).....Children's Chorus
Les Chiffres (Numbers)Children's Chorus
Shepherds, Frogs, Animals, Trees

Running Time: 45 minutes

Colette's libretto originally began as a scenario for a ballet, which she sent to the director of the Opéra in Paris, who in turn sent it on to Ravel, who was then serving with the French Army at the front. It was not until the summer of 1920 that the composer started work in earnest, by which time the ballet scenario had become an operatic libretto.

^{1, 2} These roles must (according to the score) be sung by the same singer.

Ravel interrupted his work more than once, but it was finished towards the end of 1924.

A room in an old Norman country house, giving on to a garden. Big armchairs, a grandfather clock, wallpaper with shepherds and shepherdesses on it. A round cage with a squirrel in it hangs near the window. Remains of a fire in the grate, kettle singing. The cat also singing. It is afternoon. The Child, aged six or seven, is sitting at his lessons, at the height of a fit of laziness. He bites his penholder, scratches his head and mutters under his breath. Work exasperates him and he only wants to do the things he is not allowed to do.

His mother comes in with his tea, and is vexed to see that he has done nothing but make a blot on the tablecloth. When she asks him to promise to work, the Child puts out his tongue at her. She leaves him saying he will be left alone until supper-time as a punishment. The Child suddenly loses control, and dashes about the room indulging in an orgy of destruction. He smashes the cup and teapot, pricks the pet squirrel with his pen, pulls the cat's tail, flourishes the poker, stirs up the fire, and upsets the kettle into it to produce clouds of steam and ashes. Then, brandishing the poker like a sword, he swoops on the wallpaper and pulls great strips of it off the wall. He opens the grandfather clock, swings on the pendulum, and finally makes a dash at his books and tears them up with a scream of delight. All this takes place in a few seconds and to the accompaniment of suitably vivacious music.

From now until the end of the opera, the Child is going to experience the consequences of his destructive actions in a way that is likely to astonish him more than any other – from the objects of his temper themselves. He sinks into a chair, but, to his infinite surprise, it moves slowly away from him, to the creaking sound of a contra-bassoon, and, bowing gravely to a Louis XV chair, leads her in a stately but grotesque dance. Their conversation, to which the Child listens in amazed silence, is to the effect that they will never again have to put up with the weight and the pranks of the naughty child they have had to stand for so long. They are joined in vigorous expression of this sentiment by Settle, Sofa, Ottoman, and Wicker Chair.

Next comes the mutilated clock, striking uncontrollably and complaining bitterly of the treatment which has deprived him, literally, of his balance. From the floor come the voices of the Chinese cup and teapot ('Wedgwood noir' says the score): 'How's your mug? Rotten ... better had ... come on! ... I punch, Sir, I punch your nose ... I boxe you, I marm'lad you.' The words are nonsense, compounded from English and the more nebulous orientalisms such as 'Mah-jong', 'kong-kong', 'Harakiri' and even 'Caskara'; the music is a brilliant parody of the foxtrot of American jazz (1920s style), and the nostalgic tune is sustained now by the voices, now by the first trombone. The foxtrot is justly one of the most famous moments of the score, but it evoked more hostility at the first performances than almost any other passage.

The Child suddenly feels very much alone and goes towards the fire, which however spits in his face and announces to coloratura music that warmth is only for those who are good; bad children will be burnt. The fire pursues the Child round the room until it succumbs quietly to the ashes, which dance with it for a moment and then extinguish it altogether. There is a procession, half comic, half pathetic, of the shepherds and shepherdesses from the torn wallpaper, after which the Fairy Princess rises out of the torn picture book, on which the Child has rested his head. He was half-way through her story, but now that the book is torn he will never know how it will turn out. The Child tries to hold her back as she sinks through the floor, and his lyrical phrases after she has gone are really moving in their mixture of simplicity and intensity.

There is just a chance that the end of the story may be among the pages which lie round his feet, and he looks for it. All he can find are the torn sheets of an arithmetic book, from which emerges an old man covered with arithmetical symbols and crowned with a Pi. Without even pausing to look round him, the little old man starts to reel off problems of the sort which begin 'If two taps fill a bath in ...' He and the Child catch sight of one another at the same moment, and immediately he and his platoon of figures start to torment the Child with quick-fire arithmetical nonsense. The Child is whirled into the dance, and sinks down exhausted.

He does not notice the black cat come out from under the armchair, yawn, and start to wash itself. It is playing with a ball when the Child notices it and says wearily that he supposes it too has acquired the habit of speech. The cat signs that it has not, and spits at him, before going off to the window, where a white cat has appeared. Now comes the famous Cats' love duet, which caused such a storm at the first performance. No word is spoken, but the 'Mi-inhou' and 'Mornaou', which Colette has chosen to represent cat's speech, are set to exact notes and marked 'nasal'. The result is brilliantly real, and the animals work themselves up to a frenzy of excitement before bounding out of the window into the garden.

L'enfant et les sortilèges (Covent Garden, 1983, director John Dexter, designer David Hockney).
Ann Murray as the Child.

The Child follows them hesitatingly, and at this point the stage directions require that the room walls fall away, the ceiling disappear, and the Child with the two cats be transported into the garden, which is lit by the last rays of the setting sun. The short and very beautiful orchestral interlude is for strings; piccolo and Swanee whistle imitate bird noises and the whole atmosphere is one of pure magic. A chorus of frogs can be heard from behind the scenes, and the Child is delighted to be out in the garden he loves so well.

But even here he is not to escape the accusing voices which have haunted him indoors. The tree complains about the cuts made in his flanks; a dragonfly flashes across the scene calling for the mate she has lost, and who is now pinned to the wall in the Child's room; a nightingale is heard against the background of the frogs' chorus, and a bat complains that his mate was killed by the Child. Frogs come out of the water and sit round the edge until the pool is completely ringed with them. They dance. One lays its head on the Child's knee, and is immediately admonished by a squirrel for taking such a risk with so dangerous a creature. She herself was able to escape, but another squirrel was caught and now languishes in a cage in the Child's room. The Child tries to explain that it was so as to be able to gaze for ever into the squirrel's beautiful eyes that he took her captive, but this answer proves anything but satisfactory to the squirrel, who makes a moving plea for the freedom she and her kind love above everything else.

The Child realises that the animals are happy all round him, and begins to feel lonely with no one paying any attention to him. Suddenly he cries out 'Maman'. Immediately the atmosphere of peace is broken. Animals form a menacing chorus, with the Child as the object of their dislike. Each one has a grudge to pay off, and together they rush at the Child, catch hold of him, buffet him, turn him round, shove him, and then forget all about him as, in their anxiety to be the first to down him, they become excited at the battle and turn on each other.

The Child is pushed over into a corner of the stage, when all of a sudden a little squirrel who has been wounded limps over towards him. The Child takes a ribbon and binds up the squirrel's paw, watched by the other animals. Their animosity turns to something quite different as they exclaim in amazement at the Child's kindly action. 'He has stilled the bleeding, he has bound up the wound.' What can they do to help him, now that he looks so helpless and lonely all by himself in the garden? Just now he cried out; what was the word? They try to call 'Maman', thinking that will help the Child, whom they now believe to be good and kind. The animals help him up and start to lead him towards the house whose windows have just been lit up. The opera ends as the Child calls simply and confidently 'Maman'.

Ravel was at the very height of his powers at the time of L'enfant, and working well within them to produce a work whose inventiveness appears to be equal to every facet of the situations he undertook. Above all, the subject is one that exactly suits his peculiar type of genius; the work brilliantly switches from parody to the most moving lyricism, to onomatopoeic representation of the story. H.

ARIBERT REIMANN

(born 4 March 1936)

LEAR

Opera in two parts, text by Claus H. Henneberg after William Shakespeare. Première, Munich, 9 July 1978, with Fischer-Dieskau, Julia Varady, Colette Lorand, Helga Dernesch, David Knutson (Edgar), Werner Götz (Edmund), Rolf Boysen (Fool), Hans Günter Nöcker (Gloucester), conductor Gerd Albrecht. First performed Düsseldorf, 1978, with Günter Reich. San Francisco (in English), 1981, with Thomas Stewart, conductor Albrecht; Komische Oper, Berlin, 1983; English National Opera, 1989 (in English), with Monte Jaffe, conductor Paul Daniel.

| | |
|---|--------------------|
| King Lear..... | Baritone |
| The King of France..... | Bass-Baritone |
| Duke of Albany | Baritone |
| Duke of Cornwall..... | Tenor |
| Kent..... | Tenor |
| Gloucester..... | Bass-Baritone |
| Edgar, Gloucester's son | Tenor/Countertenor |
| Edmund, Gloucester's bastard | Tenor |
| King Lear's daughters | |
| Goneril | Dramatic Soprano |
| Cordelia | Soprano |
| Regan..... | Soprano |
| The Fool..... | Speaking Role |
| A Servant | Tenor |
| A Knight..... | Speaking Role |

Servants, Soldiers, Followers of the King, Followers of Gloucester

Place: England

Time: Medieval

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Lear, Reimann's third opera (Melusine won considerable success in Berlin in 1969), was commissioned in summer 1975 by the newly-appointed Intendant of the Bavarian State Opera, August Everding, with Reimann's partner in many Lieder recitals, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, very much in mind for the title role. The première, during the Munich Festival 1978, was a public and critical success rare among modern operas, moreover with a score which, though highly effective by any standards, is firmly in line from Schoenberg and Berg and by no means makes concessions to public taste.

Part I. Lear divides his kingdom among his three daughters. Goneril and Regan respond in florid though hardly graceful manner, but Cordelia cannot articulate her feelings for her father and is banished. Kent speaks up for Cordelia and himself loses place with the King. Cordelia and the King of France make a stammering effort at farewell, then join in an ensemble with her sisters, Lear, Gloucester and his two sons, Edgar and Edmund. It is interrupted only for a rueful comment from the Fool. Goneril and Regan divide Cordelia's portion between them.

The Fool introduces the Gloucester sub-plot, the mirror image of Lear's, as he says, and in a few sentences Edmund has manoeuvred Edgar into flight from his father and, by means of a forged letter, successfully poisoned Gloucester's mind against his son.

A short frenzied interlude takes us to the palace, where Lear's servants carouse and Kent, anonymously and in disguise, after some badinage with the Fool, enters the King's service. Goneril and Regan use the unruly behaviour of their father's servants as pretext to expel them from the court, instructing that the protesting Kent be set in the stocks. Lear's outrage avails him nothing. The sisters combine to banish Lear, and Kent and the Fool lead him away.

The storm, which has already started to blow up, increases in the interlude to become a howling tempest, and 'Blow winds and crack your cheeks' ('Blast, Winde, sprengt die Backen!'), much of it on a baritone's high D, E and F, has epic power, the singer's declamation interspersed with the storm's raging brass and wind (the voice intermittently falling and rising in 7ths). As the fury dies down, the Fool and Kent plan a mission to Cordelia, but Lear is soon back to battle with the elements as his wits start to give way.

The interlude, starting gently and lyrically on solo bass flute, changes the atmosphere if not to one of calm at least to introspection as the scene changes to the hut where Edgar has taken refuge. Bass, alto and normal flute alternate and Edgar's voice, in counter-tenor range, mysteriously (like Quint's, from a distance) is heard singing off-stage, all possibility of calm vanishing as he assumes more and more the personality of poor Tom, and with it an extreme tessitura. Kent and the Fool lead in Lear. The Fool announces that the hut contains a ghost as Lear in his madness edges nearer and nearer in vocal line to Wozzeck. Edgar soars to countertenor's top E, Lear continues to rave about his daughters, Kent joins his voice to theirs, Gloucester and his followers are heard in the distance, then enter to escort the King towards Dover.

Part II. Gloucester's castle. Cornwall, Edmund and Regan discuss Gloucester's 'treachery' in helping the King, accuse him to his face, and then proceed to blind him. A servant in revulsion wounds

Cornwall and is himself killed. Gloucester calls for Edmund's help but Regan's mocking laughter confirms that his son is in league with them against him. They turn Gloucester out.

The interlude, with slow muted violins, brings us to a passage in which Reimann takes a leaf out of Bernd Alois Zimmermann's pluralistic book (see page 990) and alternates episodes taking place simultaneously in Albany's palace and in the French camp at Dover. In the one, Goneril plots evil with Edmund, in the other Cordelia plans her father's deliverance. The effect is maintained as we continue to see and hear Goneril, but Cordelia is succeeded by Edgar and Gloucester, the former watching over his unknowing father whose aim is somehow to reach Dover. Edgar's compassion reaches its climax in another vocal flourish connected with his 'poor Tom' assumption. Albany, who both knows of Cornwall's crime against Gloucester and has had news of his death, begs Goneril to be moderate, but she remains unswerving in purpose.

The interlude returns us to Edgar and Gloucester who arrive, as Gloucester thinks, at the cliffs of Dover. In his blindness, he attempts suicide, comes to believe he is to die, but nonetheless proves quicker to recognise Lear, when he appears, simply by his voice, than Lear, with his sight but without his wits, is to make him out. Lear babbles, but with his recognition of the blinded Gloucester starts to regain his senses only, as the French soldiers appear, to seem to lose them again.

Another short interlude takes us to the French camp, where Cordelia, in music of touching simplicity, succours Lear and promises to restore his rights and his powers, to his infinite comfort.

Edmund rejoices in the way fortune has gone his way, with Lear and Cordelia now in his power, Goneril and Regan competing for his favours, and England's throne tottering. He orders Lear and his daughter to prison and enjoins the Captain who has charge of them to fulfil his instructions. Albany inclines towards clemency for Lear and Cordelia, but Edmund challenges his authority. Regan is poisoned by Goneril and dies, leaving Edgar to avenge his father and in single combat kill Edmund, while Goneril stabs herself and dies.

Lear carries in the murdered Cordelia, lays her body on the ground, then sings her dirge – and his – before he in his turn dies and the orchestra sinks murmuringly away.

ERNEST REYER

(born 1 December 1823, died 15 January 1909)

SIGURD

Opera in four acts, text by Camille du Locle and Alfred Blau. Première Brussels, 7 January 1884, with Jourdain, Rose Caron, Bosman, Deschamps-Jéhin, Renaud, Devries, Gresse, conductor Dupont. First performed Opéra, Paris, 1885, with Sellier, Caron, Lassalle, Gresse; London, 1884 (in Italian), with Jourdain, Albani, Fursch-Madi, Edouard de Reszke, Soulacroix. At the Opéra in Paris it was until 1935 played 252 times with singers such as Litvinne, Bréval, Marjorie Lawrence, Escalais, Plançon and Journet, and has since been revived intermittently elsewhere.

Sigurd, a French hero Tenor
 Gunther, King of Burgundy Baritone
 Hagen, Gunther's companion Bass
 The High Priest of Odin Baritone

Attila's ambassadors

Rudiger Baritone
 Irnfrid Tenor
 Hawart Tenor
 Ramunc Bass

A Bard Bass

Brunehild, a Valkyrie Soprano

Hilda, Gunther's sister Soprano

Uta, Hilda's nurse Mezzo-Soprano

Soldiers, People of Burgundy and Islande, Priests etc.

Time: The Dark Ages

A friend of Berlioz's during the senior composer's later life, and of Gautier's, Reyer collaborated with the poet in early symphonic as well as operatic essays, but devoted the middle part of his life to journalism, working as critic on the Journal des Débats, where Berlioz had worked before him. After the success of Sigurd in 1884 and Salammbô in 1890, Reyer was looked on as one of the leaders of French operatic life. He admired Wagner as well as Berlioz, but his music looks more obviously to Weber, Meyerbeer and his French antecedents than to the German, of whose work on the Ring he is believed to have been in ignorance at the time of Sigurd's gestation in the 1860s.

Act I. An extended overture introduces women at work in the castle, peacefully preparing for their men to go into battle. Uta supports Hilda, who has rejected

Attila the Hun's offer of marriage and now to Uta discloses dreams she has had of Sigurd, who once rescued her when she had been carried off prisoner. Uta assures Hilda that by her magic arts Sigurd will be brought to Gunther's castle and when he drinks a potion his love will be hers. Gunther greets Attila's envoys and a Bard tells the story of Brunehild, punished for her disobedience by the god Odin and held captive in a fire-girt fortress until released by an indomitable warrior. Gunther proclaims that he will win her, then returns Hilda's negative answer to Attila's proposal of marriage. A hero is announced and Sigurd comes to challenge Gunther (Aria: 'Prince du Rhin') with his own determination to win Brunehild. Gunther greets him as the hero who saved his sister and together (as in Götterdämmerung) they swear blood brotherhood. They will join in delivering Brunehild, who will become Gunther's bride. Sigurd drinks the magic potion and falls in love with Hilda.

Act II. A forest in Islande. The High Priest celebrates public sacrifice to Freia, consort of Odin (Aria: 'Et toi, Freia'). Sigurd, Gunther and Hagen proclaim their intention to free Brunehild but the High Priest warns them against the attempt. Sigurd puts himself forward (Aria: 'J'ai gardé mon âme ingénue'); he will deliver Brunehild a virgin to Gunther. The High Priest gives him the sacred horn and he prepares for his ordeal (Arioso: 'Le bruit des chants s'éteint'; aria: 'Esprits gardiens'). With lowered visor and through distracting visions, he advances towards the sleeping Brunehild, who in a fine aria worthy of Gounod at his grandest greets the day ('Salut! splendeur du jour!') and announces herself the hero's bride. Sigurd, his unsheathed sword between himself and Brunehild, prepares to conduct her to Gunther.

Act III. The garden of Gunther's palace. Hilda and Uta in some trepidation await the return of the warriors. To Gunther, Sigurd announces his success (Aria: 'Oui, Sigurd est vainqueur'), and Brunehild is greeted by Gunther as the warrior who braved death to free her. They exchange vows. Hilda in spite of Uta's forebodings delights in the prospect of Sigurd's love.

Hagen announces Gunther's wedding. The King and his future queen are acclaimed, as is Sigurd when he arrives to claim Hilda as his bride. Brunehild falters as she attempts to join her voice with theirs. Notwithstanding Uta's presentiments, the procession continues on its way.

Act IV. Gunther's palace. Brunehild is a prey to sorrow and she laments her predicament (Aria: 'O palais radieux'): she is Gunther's wife but love for Sigurd courses like poison through her veins. Hilda attempts to comfort her but Brunehild recognises in Hilda's gift from Sigurd the girdle he took from her. Hilda is proud that it was her husband who defied the fiery ramparts to claim Brunehild for Gunther. Brunehild reminds her of the electricity which passed between her and Sigurd when she tried to join in their rejoicings, but each remains confident of Sigurd's love. Brunehild is convinced Hilda exercised magic powers to win Sigurd and Hilda shows signs of remorse. Brunehild accuses Gunther of falsely representing himself as a hero and Hilda admits she has told Brunehild the truth. Gunther is overcome with shame, but Hagen urges him to exact vengeance. Sigurd laments his deception of Brunehild (Aria: 'Un souvenir poignant'). She bids him repeat after her a magic formula which will release him from his situation (Duet: 'Avec ces fleurs'). Gunther rouses himself to hunt down Sigurd, and as Hilda and Brunehild skirmish as to the possibility of saving him, Sigurd is brought in dying. Brunehild will die with him on his funeral pyre; Hilda feels avenged at the prospect of Attila's hordes descending on Gunther, summoned by the talisman brought once by his ambassadors. H.

NIKOLAI ANDREYEVICH RIMSKY-KORSAKOV

(born 18 March 1844, died 21 June 1908)

In his late teens, Rimsky-Korsakov came under the influence of Mili Balakirev. Balakirev, Rimsky, Mussorgsky, Cui and Borodin together formed a group of five young, nationalistic composers who came to be dubbed the Mighty Handful. Like the last three of the group, Rimsky-Korsakov followed another profession for at least part of his adult life, honouring his family's tradition by joining the Russian Navy as a midshipman at the age of eighteen. His musical interests were never in danger of being stifled and, after a two-and-a-half-year round-the-world voyage during which he wrote his first symphony, he became so inextricably involved in music as in 1873 to resign his commission (he was appointed to the well-paid job of Inspector of Naval Bands). He was already a prolific though by his own admission semi-trained composer when in 1872 he became Professor of Free Composition at the St Petersburg Conservatory, where pride forced him to keep a lesson or two ahead of the pupils he was teaching; in later years they included Igor Stravinsky (a private pupil) and Prokofiev.

Rimsky-Korsakov wrote fifteen operas, unevenly spaced, with no more than three before 1890 (The Maid of Pskov, A May Night and The Snow Maiden), but a further twelve in the last eighteen years of his life during which opera had become a main preoccupation, stimulated in 1889 when for the first time he heard Wagner's Ring cycle. His works remain in Russia mainstays of the native repertory, and their wide range comprises essays in the historical (The Maid of Pskov), folk comedy (A May Night), straight fairy-tale (The Snow Maiden, Christmas Eve), opera-ballet (Mlada), fantastic epic (Sadko, Kashchey the Immortal), romantic-historical (The Tsar's Bride), mystical-psychological (Kitezh), and a glittering, satirical fairy-tale form all his own (Tsar Saltan and The Golden Cockerel), each of them steeped in – indeed, helping to create – Russian tradition. The composer himself viewed opera as an entirely musical affair, and thought of the dramatic side as secondary, a point of view which close acquaintance with his works does nothing to contradict.

It would be wrong in the context to forget his unselfish contribution to operas by his contemporaries: César Cui (one scene of whose William Ratcliff he orchestrated), Dargomizhsky (whose Stone Guest he orchestrated), Mussorgsky (whose unfinished Khovanshchina he completed as well as undertaking the entire orchestration, and of whose Boris Godunov his editions acted for many years as a passport to stage performance), and Borodin (whose Prince Igor was orchestrated and put into performing shape by Rimsky and Glazunov).

H.

A MAY NIGHT

Maiskaya Noch

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer founded on a story by Gogol. Première Moscow, 21 January 1880, conducted by Napravnik. First performed in London, Drury Lane, 1914, with Petrenko, Smirnoff, Belianin. Revived Oxford, in English, 1931; Cardiff, 1959, by Welsh National Opera Company, with Heather Harper, conductor Warwick Braithwaite (and at Sadler's Wells, 1961).

The MayorBass
 Levko, his son.....Tenor
 The Mayor's Sister-in-LawMezzo-Soprano
 HannaMezzo-Soprano
 The Mayor's Clerk.....Bass
 The DistillerTenor
 KalenikBaritone
 Pannochka, a water sprite.....Soprano
 Three Water Sprites.....Sopranos, Mezzo-Soprano

Place: A Small Village in Russia

Time: Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

The story is taken from Gogol, and, as well as a very strong nationalist quality, it introduces without any apparent strain a supernatural element which might come straight from Sadko. The overture was once well-known from concert performance and was for a long time a favourite of Sir Thomas Beecham's.

Act I. In a small village in the heart of Russia, the peasants are celebrating Whitsuntide with dances and games. A game of 'Millet' is going on, while Kalenik, the best dancer in the village, demonstrates his skill. The crowd moves on, and Levko appears to serenade his sweetheart, Hanna. He sings an attractive and lively romance to the accompaniment of his bandura (piano and harp in the orchestra), and it is not long before she comes out to him. Their extended duet suggests that they are very much in love, but Hanna is still worried that Levko's father, the Mayor, may consider it a bad match and forbid their marriage. Levko does his best to reassure her, and she asks him to tell her again the legend of the deserted castle across the lake.

His story is an odd one. Long ago, an old nobleman lived there with his beautiful daughter, Pannochka. When Pannochka discovered her stepmother was a witch, her father drove her out; she drowned herself, and became a Rusalka, or water spirit. One day she and her companions seized the witch and pulled her into the lake, but through her magic powers she turned herself into a Rusalka, indistinguishable from the others. Not until Pannochka discovers which of her companions is the witch can she free herself of the evil spell.

The lovers say goodnight as they hear the revellers returning. The women of the village sing a little chorus in honour of Pentecost, and Kalenik leads a Hopak, singing as vigorously as he dances. Levko stays behind when they go, and is startled to hear someone call up to Hanna's window. He is furious when he finds it is his own father, the Mayor, who pays court to her and abuses Levko as a fledgling while doing so! Levko attracts the attention of his friends, who drive the old man away with their mockery. He suggests to them that they disguise themselves that night, and teach the Mayor a lesson by singing a mocking song outside his house.

Act II. That night the Mayor, with the aid of his spinster sister-in-law, is entertaining a rich crony who hopes to open a distillery on the site of the old castle. But their jollity is due for interruption, first by Kalenik, who is drunk and difficult to get rid of, then by a stone flung through the window, and finally by the sound of Levko and his friends singing their 'Song of the Village Mayor' at the tops of their voices outside the window. The Mayor grabs Levko, but a gust of wind blows out the candles and in the general confusion Levko escapes and the Mayor instead bundles his protesting sister-in-law into a cell. The Mayor's Clerk, who has heard the ribald singing, enters to say that he has caught the principal culprit and has locked him up. Puzzled, they investigate, and out of the first cell bursts the infuriated sister-in-law to run screaming from the house.

Mayor, Clerk and Distiller now investigate the Clerk's prisoner. The Mayor peeps through the keyhole, and reacts to what he sees with impotent cries of 'Satanas', which the others take up when they have had a look in their turn. The solution is clearly to burn the devil – obviously it is he – and only the protestations of the sister-in-law (who has now twice been bundled into a cell, the second time by the crowd after they have liberated the Clerk's prisoner, Levko) save her from a witch's fate. Once free, she turns on the Mayor; it is all a plot on his part to prevent her seeing his philanderings, which have become a byword throughout the village. The Mayor tries to rescue what is left of his dignity by ordering the Watch to clear the streets of the band which so grievously insulted him.

The music of the whole act has a most agreeable buffo character, and the role of the Mayor, which was created by Stravinsky's father, is rich in comic possibilities. The second scene has something of the variety and even the flavour of a Rossini finale, on which it would appear to be modelled.

Act III. The deserted castle by the lake. Levko sings a hauntingly beautiful love song ('Sleep my beloved'). Suddenly a troop of water nymphs emerges from the lake. There is a delightful 6/8 chorus for them before Pannochka, their Queen, asks Levko if he will help her spot her wicked stepmother, who is concealed in their midst. Each in turn pretends to be a raven, until one does so with such spiteful conviction that Levko points to her and the others fall on her and drag her down into the lake. Pannochka in a little duet thanks Levko and gives him a paper, which she says will settle his father's opposition to his marriage with Hanna.

No sooner have the water nymphs gone than Levko is seized by the Watch as the author of the previous night's disturbances. The Clerk however looks at the paper Pannochka has given Levko, recognises the Governor's seal, and proceeds to read out an indictment of the Mayor's incompetence, and an order for the immediate celebration of the wedding of Levko and Hanna.

The villagers sing their Whitsuntide song, Hanna is reunited with Levko, while the Mayor is overjoyed at the official letter's news that the Governor is to dine with him – even the way his hand has been forced over the matter of Hanna and Levko, even the muttered threats of his sister-in-law, cannot spoil that. H.

THE SNOW MAIDEN

Snegurochka

Opera in a prologue and four acts, text by the composer from a play by N. Ostrovsky. Première St Petersburg, 10 February 1882. First performed Metropolitan, New York, 1922, with Bori, Telva, Harrold, Laurenti, conductor Bodanzky (in French); Buenos Aires, 1929, with Kouznetsova, conductor Fitelberg; Sadler's Wells, 1933, with Olive Dyer, Cross, Tudor Davies, Austin, conductor Collingwood.

| | |
|---------------------------|---------------|
| Snegurochka | Soprano |
| Shepherd Lehl | Alto |
| Coupava | Soprano |
| Fairy Spring | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Bobilicka | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Spirit of the Woods | Tenor |
| Page | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Tsar Berendey | Tenor |
| Misgir | Baritone |
| King Frost | Bass |
| Bobil | Tenor |
| Bermate | Bass |

Place: The Fabled Kingdom of Tsar Berendey

Running Time: 3 hours 30 minutes

Snegurochka was written in 1880, and in his autobiography Rimsky-Korsakov tells us how he became enamoured of the subject and how he came to write it in the 'genuine Russian village' of Stlelyovo in the brief period of three months. The orchestration took longer. The full score was begun on 7 September 1880, and completed on 26 May of the following year. The composer's friends Balakirev, Borodin and Stassov were pleased with it, but each in his own way. 'Stassov and Balakirev were gratified chiefly with the folk-like and fantastic portion of the opera. Borodin, on the other hand, seemed to appreciate it in its entirety.' Balakirev 'could not curb his passion for meddling', and suggested the transposition of the Introduction into B minor. Rimsky-Korsakov declined to do it, because it would have meant, among other things, the transposition of the theme representing Spring, which was indissolubly linked in his imagination with the key of A minor. He also tells us without any false modesty that in writing it he felt 'a matured musician and operatic composer who had finally come to stand on his own feet'. This opinion was confirmed by the public, who found the work more ingenious and distinguished than anything Rimsky-Korsakov had previously written.

Prologue. The Red Mountain near the capital. It is early spring, but although the snows are melting the wind is cold. Flocks of birds arrive from the south carrying with them the Fairy Spring. Many years ago she wooed icy Winter, who now treats her like a slave. Hence the cold which endures and makes the very birds shiver. Their love is dead, but Spring and Winter have a bond in the child of their love, the maid Snegurochka. They fear for her, for she is now sixteen years old and can no longer be kept hidden and protected; if the sun-god, Yarilo, should glimpse her she would die. They entrust her to the keeping of the Spirit of the Wood, who promises to guard her from mischance. Snegurochka, who has a beautiful aria here, is free to go into the world.

A carnival rout invades the stage as Spring and Winter depart. Snegurochka goes among the people and her beauty makes a deep impression on Bobil and Bobilicka, who adopt her.

Act I. The village of Berendey. Snegurochka begs Lehl, a young shepherd and singer, to perform for her. He sings two charming folk-like songs for her, but her artless advances are little to his liking, and he goes off eagerly enough at the invitation of the other girls. The little daughter of Spring and Winter knows now the pangs of unrequited love. The situation is complicated by the arrival of a wealthy youth, Misgir, who comes to wed Coupava, but seeing Snegurochka, falls in love with her and bluntly refuses to proceed with the marriage ceremony. Even though Snegurochka refuses to take any notice of Misgir's impassioned advances, Coupava is desolate, and only saved from suicide by the large-hearted Lehl.

Act II. In the palace of the Tsar, Coupava comes to claim redress for the affront Misgir has put upon her. The Tsar orders a court of justice to be held and commands the presence of Misgir and Snegurochka. The Tsar, impressed by Snegurochka's beauty, asks her who her lover is. When she replies that she has no lover, the Tsar protests that not to love is a sin against the sun-god, Yarilo, and ends the trial by promising a reward to anyone who succeeds in winning the love of Snegurochka.

The music of this act, with its serene aria for the Tsar, has a unity, and the action an economy and suspense that are not always apparent in this rather loosely knit opera.

Act III. There is feasting and jollity in the Sacred Forest. Even the great Tsar sings a cavatina. It is followed by the celebrated Dance of the Tumblers. Lehl is of the company, and, at the command of the Tsar, sings a delicious song. As a reward he is allowed to claim a kiss from any of the girls present. He passes by Snegurochka, who runs away in tears, and chooses Coupava. Snegurochka, broken-hearted, will not listen to Misgir. When the two are left alone and Misgir would urge his love, Snegurochka vanishes and the Spirit of the Wood, faithful to his trust, prevents Misgir from following.

Act IV. Snegurochka in despair appeals to her mother. She wants to love and be loved. Spring grants her wish, and when Misgir returns she hails him lovingly as her hero. The Tsar greets the couples waiting to be married, among them Misgir and Snegurochka. But all is not well. The sun-god has warmed Snegurochka's heart with a ray of sunshine and her destiny must be fulfilled; the little daughter of Spring and Winter must die. As the mist rises she melts away. Misgir throws himself into the lake, but the Tsar interprets his death and Snegurochka's as a removal of the obstacle to Yarilo's granting his blessings. From now on, says the Tsar, Yarilo may be expected to pour his bounty on them. A white-clad youth appears on the mountain top bearing a sheaf of corn in his hand, and the opera ends with an invocation to Yarilo. F.B., H.

CHRISTMAS EVE

Noch'pered rozhdestvom

'Bil'-kolyadka' (Carol-come-to-life) in four acts and nine scenes, libretto by the composer, based on the tale by Gogol, from his collection Evenings in the Village of Dikanka (1831-32). Première, Mariinsky Theatre, St Petersburg, 28 November (10 December) 1895, with Ivan Yersov as Vakula, Yevgenia Mravina as Oxana, M.D. Kayenkaya as Solokha, Koryakin as Panas, conducted by Eduard Nápravník. British première, English National Opera, Coliseum, London, 1988, with Anne-Marie Owens as Solokha and Tsarina, Nigel Douglas as the Devil, Cathryn Pope as Oxana, Edmund Barham as Vakula, conducted by Albert Rosen. U.S. première, Indiana University Opera Theatre, Bloomington, 1977.

Vakula, the blacksmith Tenor
Oxana, the beauty he loves Soprano

Chub Korniy, old Cossack, Oxana's father.....Bass
 Solokha, Vakula's mother, a witch.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Panas, Chub's friend.....Bass
 The Mayor.....Baritone
 The Devil.....Tenor
 The Sexton, Ossip Nikiforovich.....Tenor
 Patsyuk, old Cossack, doctor and wizard.....Bass
 The Tsarina, Catherine the Great.....Mezzo-Soprano
 First Woman, with a purple nose.....Contralto
 Second Woman, with a normal nose.....Soprano
 Young Girls and Boys, Witches and Wizards, Good and Bad Spirits, Ovsen and Koliada, Stars, Lords and Ladies, etc.

Place: Ukraine; the Palace in St Petersburg; Space
Time: The Reign of Catherine the Great (1762–96)
Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Rimsky-Korsakov felt drawn to Gogol's Ukrainian stories as early as 1868, when he started to compose Marriage, based on one of his short stories. In 1877 he wrote May Night, based on a story in Gogol's collection, Evenings in the Village of Dikanka, but he avoided 'Christmas Eve', because Tchaikovsky had written an opera on the same material for a competition, when Rimsky-Korsakov himself served on the jury. Tchaikovsky's death in 1893 freed Rimsky-Korsakov to return to the story. His major innovation was to expand the supernatural element, which had fascinated him when he worked on May Night, Snegurochka (The Snow Maiden) and Mlada. Rimsky-Korsakov focuses on the winter solstice, the year's shortest day, identified here with Christmas Eve, so that Christianity's moment of birth merely re-echoes the older rebirth of the world from winter. Rimsky-Korsakov called the work a kolyadka or Ukrainian carol, filled it with kolyadki and even brought on a personification. These carols were sung for money or gifts such as 'Sausages, lard and dumplings', between Christmas and Epiphany. The word derives from the Latin calendae (the first of a month). As David Pountney (who directed it for English National Opera) once pointed out, Christmas Eve itself marked the rebirth of the composer's creativity, frozen in a wintry grip while Tchaikovsky lived.¹

Act I, scene i. The village of Dikanka in the Ukraine. The witch Solokha flies out of a chimney on her broomstick, while the Devil appears on a neighbouring roof. They know that their evil power over human beings ends tonight. The Devil determines to have his revenge on Solokha's son Vakula the blacksmith, who painted a picture showing the Devil being hit with a stick. He decides to make the moon disappear from the sky: it will be so dark that Vakula will not be able to visit his beloved Oxana and will have to stay at home.

Meanwhile, the old Cossack Panas comes to visit Chub, Oxana's father. They mean to go together to dinner at the Sexton's house. But the moon and then the stars disappear as the snow falls. Chub decides to stay at home. When Vakula arrives, the two men quarrel. But when Chub realises that if the blacksmith is here, his mother must be on her own, he decides to end the evening with Solokha.

Scene ii. Oxana admires her reflection in the mirror. Vakula surprises her. She is unfriendly towards him and rejects his advances. Some of Oxana's young friends arrive, singing a kolyadka in praise of her. Seeing that one of her friends is wearing smart new slippers, Oxana teases Vakula, promising to marry him if he gives her the same slippers the Tsarina wears.

Act II, scene iii. In Solokha's house. The Devil has stayed with her to keep warm and together they sing a kolyadka. They are interrupted by a knocking at the door from the village Mayor. The Devil hides in an emptied coal sack. Like Chub, the Mayor had been invited to dine with the Sexton, but the snow storm persuaded him to take refuge with the hospitable Solokha. Someone else knocks at the door: the Sexton, who has come looking for company, as his guests have not arrived. The Mayor hides in another coal sack. The Sexton enters and begins singing in praise of Solokha to a plainchant. When a third suitor arrives – old Chub – the Sexton bolts into a sack. Chub drinks some vodka and sings a Ukrainian song. Suddenly, Vakula's voice can be heard outside, and Chub hides in the sack containing the Sexton. Vakula sings a song about how a girl's beauty has deprived him of strength. Then, since the sacks look so untidy, he takes them away with him.

Scene iv. A street in Dikanka. Vakula leaves the sacks outside his forge, except for the smallest, containing the Devil, which he carries on his shoulders.

¹ Opera, December 1988.

Boys and girls (including Oxana) sing kolyadki under the houses' windows. Old Panas arrives, drunk, starts singing and dancing and making a fool of himself. When the boys and girls begin teasing Vakula he leaves, furious and in despair, talking of committing suicide. This worries Oxana, briefly. The boys open the sacks, Solokha's unlucky suitors emerge, embarrassed and repentant. They all curse her: to have made such fools of them, she must be a witch.

Act III, scene v. In Patsyuk's home. He is said to be in league with devils. Vakula has come to him in desperation, wanting to make a pact with the Devil. Patsyuk is eating magic dumplings that leap into his mouth all by themselves, but gives Vakula a useful hint: 'The man who has the Devil at his back has no need to look far'. Vakula takes the sack off his shoulder and the Devil emerges, promising to do anything he likes as long as he will sell him his soul. The blacksmith seems about to accept the offer, but then threatens him with the sign of the cross and forces the terrified Devil to turn himself into a winged horse. Vakula leaps on to its back and orders him to the Tsarina's palace in St Petersburg.

Scene vi. In space. The stars gather in constellations, play games and dance Mazurkas and Czardas. Patsyuk, Solokha and a whole mass of devils try unsuccessfully to stop Vakula. The lights of St Petersburg are seen in the distance.

Scene vii. In the Tsarina's palace. Courtiers praise her in song. A group of Zaporozhye Cossacks beg her to look on them favourably. Vakula kneels and asks tactfully for a pair of her slippers. Touched by such simplicity, the Tsarina offers him one of her most beautiful pairs. Vakula leaves on his winged horse.

Scene viii. In space. As day breaks, Koliada arrives in the form of a young girl in a carriage, accompanied by Ovsen, a handsome youth, mounted on a boar with gold bristles. They end the winter squalls and mark the sun's rebirth. Dikanka's church bells and a Christmas carol can be heard.

Act IV, scene ix. A courtyard by Chub's house. Oxana hears one woman swear Vakula drowned himself; the other, that he hanged himself. She is consumed by remorse, knowing she will never find anyone as handsome and loving as Vakula. Suddenly he appears, with the pair of slippers he promised. He also has some clothes for Chub, and asks for permission to marry his daughter. Chub agrees and they all celebrate. When the villagers pester Vakula for information, he promises to tell the whole truth to Panko the Redhead, who will then write a wonderful story about Christmas Eve. The villagers will find a setting for it, assemble the musicians and sing a kolyadka about... Christmas Eve (finale, To the Memory of Gogol, 'Did I go to the Tsarina or not?').

Rimsky-Korsakov's words and music for Christmas Eve are lovingly embroidered with references to Ukrainian and Russian traditions, above all the kolyadki, but the score also refers to the Ukrainian cittern, the bandura or pandura; much local food and the fasting that should mark the day itself; a Cossack saddle; the Cossacks' worship of their little mother the Empress, while the anthem-like end (and the way the composer dedicates the finale to Gogol) suggests that the whole evening has been an exercise in community feeling. These factors account for its sad fate in Russian and Slavic opera houses, where it tends to be buried under perfunctory local colour and routine sentimentality. The experience of its revival at English National Opera and its evident musical strength suggest that it deserves a better fate: behind the legend of Koliada that Rimsky-Korsakov celebrates is the rather more widely available myth of the annual rebirth of the sun. P.

SADKO

Opera in seven scenes (three or five acts), text by the composer and V.I. Bielsky. Première, Moscow, 7 January 1898. Metropolitan, New York, 1930, with Fleischer, Johnson, Basiola, Ludikar, conductor Serafin (in French); London, Lyceum Theatre, 1931, conductor Goossens; Rome, 1931, conductor Marinuzzi; la Scala, Milan, 1938, with Carosio, Giani, Parmeggiani, de Franceschi, Sdanowski, conductor Marinuzzi; Staatsoper, Berlin, 1946, with Berger, Klose, Suthaus, Schock, Neumann, Prohaska, conductor Schüler. Currently in repertory of Russian companies.

The King of the Ocean.....Bass
 Volkhova, his daughter.....Soprano
 Sadko, a singer of Novgorod.....Tenor
 Lubava, his wife.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Nejata, a gousli player from Kiev.....Mezzo-Soprano
 A Viking Merchant.....Bass
 A Hindu Merchant.....Tenor
 A Venetian Merchant.....Baritone
 Four Buffoons.....Mezzo-Sopranos, Tenor and Bass

Two Elders, *merchants of Novgorod*Tenor and Bass

Place: Novgorod, and the Bottom of the Sea

Running Time: 3 hours 35 minutes

Tableau I. The merchants of Novgorod sit down to a feast, rejoicing in their prosperity. Nejata, singer and gousli player who comes from Kiev, sings a song about the heroic days of old. The merchants would like one of their own countrymen to perform the same service for Novgorod, and Sadko, who enters at that moment, is asked if he will oblige. But his song worries them; he suggests that Novgorod is on a lake, and that, if their ships could only reach the ocean, they could bring back fortunes from all over the world. They mock him and bid him goodbye. Feasting goes on to the accompaniment of song and dance.

Tableau II. On the shores of Lake Ilmen, Sadko sings of his distress and disillusionment: 'Oh, yon dark forest'. Fascinated by Sadko's singing, swans swim towards him, and as they reach him, become young women, Volkhova, the Sea Princess, among them. He sings again for them, they dance, and the Princess tells him that he has won her love. When dawn comes, she parts from Sadko, but tells him that he will catch three golden fish in the lake, that he will make a journey to a foreign land, and that she will wait faithfully for his return. She goes back to the deep, where her father, the King of the Ocean, holds sway. The sun rises.

Tableau III. Lubava at home laments the absence of her husband Sadko. Only yesterday he assured her of his love. She is overjoyed when he comes in, broken-hearted when he leaves her again.

Tableau IV. The quayside at Novgorod, on Lake Ilmen. Ships lie at anchor, and the people of the town crowd round the rich foreign merchants, who come from every land known to man. Soothsayers ply their trade, Nejata sings to the accompaniment of his gousli, buffoons sing and dance, the sound of a pilgrim's chant can be heard. Sadko appears and is greeted with laughter, which increases when he tells them he knows a secret: golden fish can be caught in the lake. He bets his head against the wealth of everyone assembled there that he can prove that he speaks the truth. A net is let down, the song of the Sea Princess is heard, and sure enough, when it is drawn up, there are three gold fishes in the net. Sadko invites all the adventurous men of the port to join him in his journey, and they go off to make their preparations.

Nejata sings of the nightingale that became a great merchant. When he returns, Sadko says he will restore the wealth of the merchants, but would take only their ships. He asks three of the merchants, the Viking, the Venetian and the Indian, to sing to him of their native lands, so that he may decide which to visit. The Viking sings first: his country's shores are rugged, the sea rough, and his countrymen fierce fighters. The slow, pesante aria is one of the best known in the Russian bass's repertory. Next comes the Indian merchant, with music and story of much more exotic cast. India is a land of gems and mystery, and his song, any hearer would admit, is the stuff of which dreams are made. It is one of the world's famous melodies, known from having been sung by half the sopranos and tenors who have ever appeared on the concert platform, and by its frequent appearance on violin recitalists' programmes. In its original setting it is a tenor melody. Third representative of the merchants of the world is the Venetian, a baritone, who sings a barcarolle. Sadko settles that Venice shall be his destination. He asks the Novgorod people to look after Lubava, and sets sail.

Tableau V. Sadko is on his way home laden with treasure. The ship is becalmed – due to their not having sacrificed to the King of the Ocean all the twelve years they have been away, says Sadko. They pour treasure over the side, but still the ships remain becalmed. Next at Sadko's command they throw wooden logs over the side: Sadko's sinks, and he descends by a ladder to the water's edge, stepping on to a plank which has been thrown overboard. Immediately a breeze gets up, the ship sails away leaving Sadko abandoned. A mist comes up.

Tableau VI. When the mist clears away we are at the bottom of the sea, at the court of the King of the Ocean. The King and Queen sit on thrones, their daughter, Volkhova, sits spinning seaweed. Sadko sings for the King and Queen, and is promised the hand of Volkhova in marriage. The wedding guests arrive – every denizen of the deep seems to have been invited – and the marriage is celebrated fittingly. Dances are performed for their entertainment, Sadko sings again and arouses such enthusiasm among his hearers that they join in the dance. So fast become the movements of the dancers that the waves are lashed into a fury and ships are sunk. Suddenly an apparition warns them that the reign of the King of the Ocean is at an end. Sadko and Volkhova seated in a shell are drawn away by seagulls.

Tableau VII. It is morning. Sadko sleeps by the side of Lake Ilmen, watched over by Princess Volkhova, who sings a lullaby as she watches. She bids a last farewell to the still-sleeping minstrel, then vanishes in mist, becoming the great river Volkhova and flowing thenceforth from Lake Ilmen to the sea.

Lubava is still distractedly looking for her husband, and she is filled with delight to see him lying by the lake asleep. He thinks he has been asleep ever since he last saw her, and that he has dreamed his voyage. But the sight of his fleet coming up the new river convinces him that it has all taken place, and that he really has become the richest man of Novgorod. All the citizens of that town welcome him, not least the three merchants who sang to him before he left home. H.

MOZART AND SALIERI

Mozart i Sal'yeri

'Dramatic scenes' in one act, text from Alexander Pushkin's Little Tragedy (1830). First performed at the Solodovnikov Theatre, Moscow, on 6 [18] November 1898 with Vasily Shkafer as Mozart and Fyodor Chaliapin as Salieri, conducted by Giuseppe Truffi; in London in 1927, Royal Albert Hall; in the U.S.A. in 1933 at the Unity House, Forest Park, Pennsylvania.

MozartTenor
SalieriBass

Place: A Room (Vienna)

Time: 1792

Running Time: 40 minutes

Once he had completed Sadko, Rimsky-Korsakov felt he was 'entering upon some new period' in his work. In the summer of 1897 he wrote some forty songs and set Pushkin's play of 1830 almost word for word in what he called 'recitative-arioso style',¹ where the melody was suggested by the text. In this he was inspired by Dargomizhsky, from whose Stone Guest he quoted in the last bars and to whose memory he dedicated Mozart and Salieri. It may have held some autobiographical meaning for him: just as Pushkin identified with Mozart, so the hard-working, painstaking and somewhat embittered Rimsky-Korsakov felt an affinity with Salieri.

Scene i. Salieri looks back on his life and career and concludes that there is no justice, in heaven as on earth. He was born with a love of music, slowly developed his craft and learned to analyse music with forensic skill. As a composer he gradually found fame. He never felt envy for others' success, until he learnt the final injustice: genius is not given to the hard-working, who deserve it, but to the foolish and idle, such as Mozart. Mozart himself appears. He tells Salieri that on his way he passed an inn, where he heard a fiddler playing an aria from Figaro, 'Voi che sapete'. It was funny and charming. He has brought the blind violinist, who plays an andantino grazioso based on a theme from Don Giovanni. Salieri is not amused, however. Mozart plays on the piano some music he composed one night when he couldn't sleep. He suggests it portrays himself, maybe a bit younger; in love, but only slightly, whose happiness is disrupted by a ghost or a sudden gloominess ('Allegretto Semplice').

Impressed, in spite of himself, Salieri calls Mozart a god. Mozart agrees to dine with him and goes to tell his wife that he won't be back for supper. Salieri accepts his fate: Mozart must be stopped, since his achievements show up the 'hollow glory' of Salieri's and others' compositions and leave them dissatisfied, frustrated. Salieri has some poison; he'll use it on his enemy, his friend.

Scene ii. In the inn, Mozart explains why he seems sad. A stranger came to see him, commissioned a Requiem and then disappeared. Since then the 'man in black' has haunted Mozart's dreams, like a shadow; he even feels his presence now. Salieri repeats the advice that Beaumarchais once gave him: 'If you're depressed, open a bottle of champagne or reread Figaro'. Mozart himself hums a tune Salieri once composed for a text by Beaumarchais (from the opera Tarare). Mozart wonders whether the story that Beaumarchais once poisoned someone can be true: surely genius and crime cannot co-exist? Salieri poisons Mozart's wine. Mozart drinks to the friendship that unites them as two sons of harmony, and then plays Salieri an extract from his Requiem (the opening, with optional, off-stage chorus). Salieri is moved. Mozart feels ill and goes to lie down. Salieri wonders, perhaps Mozart was right, perhaps genius and crime are incompatible? He thinks of

¹ Nikolai Andreyevich Rimsky-Korsakov, My Musical Life, ed. Carl Van Vechten, transl. Judah A. Joffe, London, 1974.

Michelangelo (who was said to have had someone crucified, so that he could paint Christ in agony): but perhaps that was just a story, and he wasn't a murderer ...?

Mozart and Salieri is a product of centennial reverence; like Andrea Chenier or Tosca, it looks back a hundred years and is imbued with a Tchaikovskian, fin-de-siècle nostalgia for the rococo. Rimsky-Korsakov writes an aptly tacky, tavern variation on 'Là ci darem' from Don Giovanni, but he also creates something entirely new and 'Mozartian', in the piano solo 'Allegretto Semplice'. He sets nearly every word of Pushkin's text, yet the opera represents a bold declaration of individuality. This strange and strangely demanding work calls for singers who can move an audience through declamation as much as singing, through implication as much as statement. The emotional impact of the ending depends on what is not said, as Salieri sentences himself to mediocrity. Chaliapin, who created the role of Salieri, called it 'a task more difficult than all previous ones' and endowed the role with great dignity, even with a heroic quality.¹

P.

THE TSAR'S BRIDE

Tsarskaya Nevesta

Opera in four acts, libretto by the composer and I. Tyumenev after the drama by Lev Mey (1849). First performed on 3 November 1899 by the Association of Russian Private Opera, Moscow, with Mootin as Sobakin, Zabelya as Marfa, Sheveliev as Griaznoy, Tarasov as Malyuta, Syekar-Rozhansky as Lykov, Rostovtseva as Lubasha, Shkaffee as Bomelius, conducted by M.M. Ippolitov-Ivanov. First performance in U.K. 1931, London, Lyceum Theatre. First U.S. performance by the Russian Grand Opera Company on 17 May 1922 at the New Amsterdam Theatre ('in a vile manner'²). It was revived by Stanislavsky on 28 November 1926 for the State Opera Studio's first performance at the Dmitrovsky Theatre, Moscow. Galina Vishnevskaya brought the opera back into the mainstream once she started to sing Marfa, in 1970.

Vassily Stepanovich Sobakin, a merchant from Novgorod.....Bass

Marfa, his daughter, fiancée to Ivan Lykov.....Soprano

Grigory Grigoryevich Griaznoy, an OprichnikBaritone

Grigory Lukanovich Malyuta Skuratov, head of the Oprichniki.....Bass
Ivan Sergeyevich Lykov, a Boyar,
Marfa's fiancé.....Tenor
Lubasha, *Griaznoy's mistress*Mezzo-Soprano
Elisey Bomelius, *the Tsar's physician*Tenor
Domna Ivanovna, *a merchant's wife*Soprano
Duniasha, her daughter, Marfa's friend.....Alto
Petrovna, *Sobakin's housekeeper*Mezzo-Soprano
The Tsar's ValetBass
A Maidservant.....Mezzo-Soprano
A Young BoyTenor
Tsar Ivan Vassilyevich the TerribleMute
Two Horsemen, the Oprichniki, Singers, Dancers,
Boyars, Maidservants, the People

Place: Alexandrovsky, a Suburb of Moscow

Time: Autumn 1572

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

When Rimsky-Korsakov started to compose The Tsar's Bride in February 1898 he determined that the 'style of this opera was to be cantilena par excellence [i.e. predominantly vocal]; the arias and soliloquies were planned for development within the limits of the dramatic situations; I had in mind vocal ensembles, genuine, finished, and not at all in the form of any casual and fleeting linking of voices with others, as dictated by the present-day requirements of quasi-dramatic truth, according to which two or more persons are not supposed to talk simultaneously.'² It is surely because the composer set out consciously to emphasise the vocal element in The Tsar's Bride that he made use of traditional, Italian numbers in its musical structure (given in brackets in the synopsis below). Some commentators have seen these as evidence of Italian style in the opera, but in fact it sounds, unmistakably, very Russian. The only folk melody Rimsky-Korsakov quotes is the traditional salute to the Tsar, 'Slava', but he invents convincing ones for the various 'folk' numbers. The shape of the melodies and their orchestral colouring remain very much a home product: the bells, most obviously, heard at the end of Act I, summoning Griaznoy to matins, and at the beginning of the next act, as vespers end, but also in the music for Lubasha, one of those richly characteristic Russian voice-types, the neglected mezzo, and for the chorus of Oprichniki. At one point they have a 'Fughetta a 3 voci', but there is nothing Italian about its boisterousness, which scarcely masks their Tsar-sanctioned brutality.

¹ In his biography, Chaliapin (London, 1988), Victor Borovsky assembles fascinating eyewitness accounts of his Salieri.

² Carl Van Vechten, n.11, Nikolai Andreyevich Rimsky-Korsakov, My Musical Life, ed. Carl Van Vechten, transl. Judah A. Joffe, London, 1974.

Marfa Sobakin is engaged to be married to Ivan Lykov, who has just returned from travel abroad.

Act I. The Banquet. Inside Griaznoy's house. The proud nobleman Griaznoy asked for the hand of the merchant's daughter Marfa and was rejected. He looks back regretfully to his carefree youth, when he raped whichever girls he fancied. Marfa's innocence disarmed him, but he still defies Lykov to marry her (aria). He has invited several guests tonight. First to arrive are the Oprichniki, the elite guardsmen who attend the Tsar; led by Malyuta, they drink his health. They are followed by Lykov and Bomelius. Lykov describes what he saw abroad and toasts the Tsar who let him travel (arioso).

Singers entertain the guests with a Song of Glory to the Tsar. Malyuta answers Lykov's remarks, that some say Ivan is 'terrible': the storm wind is welcome, because it breaks off dead branches and allows the forest to grow. Young girls perform the Song of the Hops, in which a girl longs for her lover. Malyuta asks for Lubasha, Griaznoy's longstanding mistress, and invites her to entertain them. They applaud her tragic song about a girl who dies when her mother forces her to marry an old miser. The Oprichniki go to attend the Tsar at matins. Griaznoy asks to be left alone with Bomelius. Lubasha hides and listens. Griaznoy asks, on behalf of an old friend, for a love potion. She realises Griaznoy wants it for himself, which means he no longer loves her. When they are alone, Griaznoy rejects her brutally and leaves for matins (duet). She determines to consult Bomelius.

Act II. The Love Potion. Outside Sobakin's house. Townsfolk are leaving the monastery after vespers. They comment on the mild autumn evening but fall silent in fear when the Oprichniki appear. Cowed, the crowd talk instead of whom the Tsar will choose to marry. Two young men emerge from Bomelius's house. When the crowd tell them they have renounced their faith by going to see the heathen sorcerer, one of them throws away the herbs he had been given. Marfa tells her friend Duniasha that she has loved Lykov since they were children, playing in his garden (aria). Tsar Ivan the Terrible briefly passes by. She does not recognise him, but his intense stare disquiets her. Her father Sobakin brings Lykov and all four look forward to the marriage (quartet).

Lubasha watches Marfa and the others through the window (intermezzo). She calls on Bomelius, refuses to enter his house and asks him for an imperceptible, slow-acting poison. He rejects her jewels in payment and demands she respond to his love. When Lykov leaves, Lubasha overhears him say that he will return tomorrow with Griaznoy. Bomelius brings Lubasha the poison. She agrees to Bomelius's price and goes inside with him. The act ends with the Oprichniki anticipating the effects of their vengeance as they execute the Tsar's supreme power.

Act III. The Betrothal. A banqueting room inside Sobakin's house. Sobakin tells Lykov that his marriage to Marfa cannot take place immediately. The Tsar is looking for a wife and has asked to see Sobakin's daughters. The news fills Lykov with dread. Griaznoy determines to use the love potion immediately and asks to be invited to the wedding (trio). He also tells Lykov to follow his example: if the wedding is called off, he should not grieve (arietta). Domna Ivanovna, a fellow merchant's wife, brings news that when the Tsar inspected the girls, he spoke to Duniasha and looked at Marfa for a long time. His decision has not yet been announced (arioso). For Lykov, the outlook looks black, but he remains optimistic (aria). Sobakin ushers in his daughters and Griaznoy uses the occasion of the toasts to doctor Marfa's drink (sextet with chorus). They all drink to the couple's happiness (quartet). The women sing an Engagement Song. Malyuta arrives, as envoy from the Tsar: Marfa has been chosen as his future bride, the Tsarevna – here Rimsky-Korsakov introduces the theme of Ivan the Terrible from The Maid of Pskov. Sobakin collapses.

Act IV. The Bride. Inside the Tsar's palace. Sobakin stands near the throne reserved for the Tsarevna. His happiness over the honour done to his daughter and to him (he is now a Boyar) is clouded by anxiety over his daughter's long illness (aria). Griaznoy greets Sobakin, who is now his equal, and tells him that the man who poisoned Marfa has confessed. Marfa rushes out of her apartments, haggard, with a golden crown falling off her head. She escapes from her attendants, sits on her throne and tells Griaznoy to speak. Malyuta arrives with several Boyars who watch from a doorway. Griaznoy tells her that Lykov confessed under torture that he poisoned Marfa. The Tsar condemned him to death and Griaznoy himself executed the sentence. Marfa faints and all comment on the news, most of them disbelieving Griaznoy (quintet with chorus). Marfa recovers consciousness, but she mistakes Griaznoy for Lykov. Griaznoy repents, confesses his crime and blames Bomelius for substituting a poison for the potion. In a delirium, Marfa invites Lykov to join her in the garden (aria). Lubasha then confesses that she switched the potions. She blames Griaznoy, because he never took pity on her, and invites him to kill her. He stabs her to death and is dragged away by the Boyars. Everyone asks God to have pity on them.

Marfa is 'The Tsar's Bride', but the issue of his marriage is not even discussed until Act II; it does not affect the characters' lives until Act III. This is because the marriage is itself part of something bigger, the tyranny of the Tsar, whose power is as all-pervasive as he is remote.

Stanislavsky understood that the central point of the opera is when the Tsar himself appears in Act II, even though it lasts only a moment (eight bars of music) and passes in silence. Typically, Stanislavsky prepared for his entry: as the bassoons renewed the theme of glory to the Tsar, two guardsmen emerged from the monastery and stood either side of the portal, then six nuns ran out and knelt in front. When the brass took over the theme the Tsar appeared from the monastery (not as in the score), wearing a rich fur coat over a monk's habit and a huge silver cross on his chest. 'He walks like a sinner laden with chains. Paying no attention to the nuns he moves towards the well and devoutly crosses himself. A sharp chord comes from the orchestra and he stops short, having glimpsed, beyond the ikon on the well, a young girl thoughtfully looking up to the sky. Under the insistent gaze of the monk she turns abruptly towards him and is transfixed. "Suddenly towering over you," said Stanislavsky to Marfa, "you see a horrible face, a mask, a fateful figure. You see your future as you look deep into his eyes. And you," this to the actor playing Ivan the Terrible, "first study the ikon and then are aware of Marfa ... The moment should be drawn in various shades: first your hand is frozen in mid-air as you cross yourself, then you are full of admiration, which passes on into the smile of a tiger as you let your arm down mechanically ... until, finally, you give a relieved sigh, as much as to say 'She belongs to me!'"¹

P.

TSAR SALTAN

Opera in a prologue and four acts, libretto by V.I. Bielsky, after Pushkin's poem, and planned as a centenary tribute to Pushkin. Première Moscow, Solodovnikov Theatre, 3 November 1900, with Ippolitov-Ivanov conducting. First performed Buenos Aires, 1927, with Eva Turner, Antonio Melandri, Ezio Pinza, conductor Panizza (revived in seven seasons of the next twenty-five, with such singers as Gina Cigna, Slobodskaya, Umberto di Lelio, Baccaloni); la Scala, 1929, with Bruna Rasa, Melandri, di Lelio, conductor Panizza; London, Sadler's Wells, 1933, with Joan Cross, Henry Wendon, conductor Lawrence Collingwood; Strasland, 1962, and Dresden, 1967, in new German version by Harry Kupfer.

Tsar Saltan Bass

Three sisters

Militrissa, the Youngest Soprano

The Middle (the Court Weaver) Mezzo-Soprano

The Eldest (the Royal Cook) Soprano

Barbarikha, their mother Contralto

Prince Guidon Tenor

The Swan-Princess High Soprano

An Old Man Tenor

A Messenger Baritone

A Court Jester Bass

Three Sailors Tenor, Baritone, Bass

Boyars, Courtiers, Nurses, Secretaries, Guards,
Warriors, Sailors, Servants, People; Thirty-Three Heroes and their Leader Cernomor

Place: The City of Tmutarakania; the Island of Buyan
Time: Legendary

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

During winter 1898–99, Rimsky-Korsakov and Byelsky worked on Pushkin's fairy-tale of Tsar Saltan, making as much use as possible of Pushkin's words, and Rimsky-Korsakov set it scene by scene, finishing half the orchestration by summer 1899 and the remainder the following year. He seems to have been particularly pleased with the symphonic construction of the score and, when he published it, even started his preface with a warning against the damaging effect of cuts on the musical shape. With twenty-five years of experience behind him, he was by now a most practised operatic composer and easily able to invest music and structure with a fairy-tale quality, now folk-like, now lyrical, now dramatic. The recitatives, he said, had a special character of fairy-tale naïveté, but in contrast he was pleased with the use he made of Leitmotifs.

¹ Pavel Rumyantsev's fascinating account of Stanislavsky's rehearsals for his 1926 production shed light on the opera as well as on Stanislavsky. Act I, for example, 'is in dark tones. This is a centre of vice, debauchery, evil passions. ... Griaznoy is a wild beast in a cage, he is prowling around like a tiger.' When the curtain goes up, Griaznoy has 'been drinking continuously for two weeks'; he is 'bloated from drunkenness, but [he] can get no rest.' During the party, 'Malyuta is treated like an archpriest. He must fill up as much room as possible, puff himself up, spread himself out!' On her first appearance, the Oprichniki 'look over Lubasha as experts in prize horseflesh.' Constantin Stanislavsky and Pavel Rumyantsev, Stanislavsky on Opera, New York, 1975.

A brass fanfare begins each scene or movement, and out of the preludes to Acts I, II and IV, the composer made a suite called Little Pictures for the Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan.

Prologue. On a winter's night, three sisters sit spinning, watched by their mother and a black cat. The youngest seems to be treated as a kind of Cinderella, so it is a folk-style duet that the two elder sing; it occasionally becomes a trio when their mother joins in. If I were Queen, says the eldest, I should cook the most sumptuous meals in the world. If I were Queen, says the second sister, I would weave the finest cloth ever known. If I were Queen, says the youngest sister, I should bear the Tsar a son who was strong and brave. A march announces the Tsar, who sounds like a more serious cousin of King Dodon, and he chooses the youngest because of what he has just heard her say. Jobs as the Royal Cook and the Court Weaver are found for the other sisters, but the idea of being subservient to the youngest is abhorrent to them and with their mother they plot that, after the wedding and with the new Tsarina pregnant, the Tsar must go off to war. Then they will spread a scandal: the Tsarina has given birth to a monster, not a son!

Act I. The entr'acte gets the Tsar safely off to war and the curtain rises on the court and the gentle sound of off-stage singing by the nursery maids. The Tsarina's son has been born, and she has sent a message to the Tsar, but why has no messenger as yet come back from him? The wicked Barbarikha has of course set the plot in motion. The Court Jester tries to entertain them while they wait for the messenger, the cook-sister plies her food, and an old man has a story to tell. He and the Jester bandy words and the resulting laughter wakes the baby. The nursery maids sing again, with Barbarikha again adding her macabre descant, and the baby falls asleep so that the old man finally gets his chance. The baby wakes up and the nursery maids sing a clapping song. The Tsarevich, by now grown to be big enough to run in on his own, holds the Tsarina's hand while the people sing his praises.

The chorus is interrupted by the arrival of the fatal messenger, who has returned from the Tsar. His pronouncement is portentous, to the effect that the Queen and her offspring are to be thrown into the sea. The Tsarina is in despair, but the Boyars, egged on by Barbarikha, dare not disobey.

Militrissa sings affectingly of her lost happiness, of the unfairness of the Tsar's condemnation without having even seen his son, but she accepts her bitter fate. Together Tsarina and Tsarevich contemplate the sea, then climb into a barrel and pray that they may find land and eventual freedom. The barrel is sealed and thrown into the sea and the people are left weeping behind.

Act II. The orchestral introduction has the stars gleaming in a deep blue sky and the barrel tossing on the ocean. The child grows hour by hour more worthy of his father – so Pushkin's verses appended as motto in the score assure us and so the orchestra seems to emphasise. It is a beautiful passage.

When they land, it is on the island of Buyan, which seems to be a desert on which grows a single small oak tree. The Tsarina and Prince Guidon, now grown to full tenorhood, rejoice at being on dry land after all that time in the barrel, he full of optimism, she still pessimistic and inclined to suspicion. He fashions a bow and arrow out of wood he finds on the shore then, hearing the lamentation of a swan, transfixes with his arrow the kite which has been attacking it so that it falls dead into the sea. The kite, represented by male voices off-stage, is a malevolent magician, the swan a princess, who now comes from the sea and sings sweetly, for all the world like a cousin of the Queen of Shemakha, to the man who has saved its life.

Militrissa sings to her son and he asks what they can have done to his father to deserve such a fate. She can tell him nothing and both fall asleep; a short orchestral interlude depicts the darkness of night.

When they wake up it is to see against the dawn sky that the swan has conjured up a great domed city, sparkling in the new light and fabulously beautiful as well as extravagantly rich. They advance towards the city, bells ring out, cannons are fired and the people flock to greet them. On the Tsarina's advice, Guidon accepts the throne when it is offered him and the act ends with general rejoicing.

Act III. From the now flourishing seashore of the island of Buyan, Prince Guidon watches a ship leave bearing a message from him to his father. His aria is full of longing for home – if only his father will listen to his message! He asks the swan for help and is advised to transform himself into an insect, overtake the ship and visit his father (the Russian translation for Pushkin's choice of his first alias is 'mosquito', but Rimsky-Korsakov jumped the gun and chose Pushkin's third).

The orchestral interlude is the now famous chromatic passage (sometimes played on solo string instrument) known as the Flight of the Bumble Bee and it transports us again to Tmutarakania. The trumpet introduces Tsar Saltan on his throne, with the Royal Cook, the Court Weaver and Barbarikha not far away. Three sailors come in attended by the bumble bee; Pushkin's literary device of three separate journeys revealing three marvels is replaced by the sailors each telling of a particular experience.

The second sailor speaks first and tells of an extraordinary phenomenon. An island which used to be deserted, with a single oak tree on the shore, is now a great city with gilded churches, mansions, gardens and a court. There lives Prince Guidon – and he sends his respects to the Tsar. The Tsar says he must visit him but the Royal Cook and Court Weaver aided by Barbarikha pour cold water on the whole idea. The bumble bee, who has been observing, cannot bear to remain a spectator and flies down and stings the Cook-Sister on the eye. The first sailor proceeds to relate his marvel. Underneath a fir tree, a squirrel sits singing and cracking nuts – each nutshell is made of gold and inside is an emerald. The Weaving-Sister is totally scornful and is also stung on the eye. Now it is the turn of the third sailor, who says that on the same island on which the new city stands, every day a great wave floods the shore leaving behind thirty-three knights in gleaming armour, led by an old man, Cernomor. The Tsar rather crossly makes up his mind to visit the island but Barbarikha puts her oar firmly in and is in her turn stung by the bumble bee, which has no trouble evading the Tsar's guards.

Act IV. Back on the island, Prince Guidon is lonely and becoming conscious that he has no wife. He asks the swan for advice and is told of a beautiful princess, just such a one as he is dreaming of, not living far away as he imagines but close at hand. As they sing together in duet, the swan first reads him a lesson on the responsibilities of taking a wife, then reveals herself as a princess. Guidon is beside himself with delight and their duet ends in total accord (with a top C from each on the way). Female voices rejoice in their happiness and herald the appearance of the Tsarina, from whom Guidon asks a blessing on their marriage. Signalled by the brass, the orchestra launches into a lengthy and episodic description of the three marvels.

Guidon and his mother watch Tsar Saltan's fleet sail towards the island, then with the whole populace welcome the Tsar. Prince Guidon asks him to tell his story, which he does in an aria, with melancholy references to his wife, whom he loved and can't forget, and to his warlike expedition, after which he lost her and his son to his infinite regret. Guidon comforts him but Barbarikha and the two wicked sisters try to distract his attention. In succession, he sees three marvels – the miraculous squirrel, the thirty-three guards led by Cernomor, and then the Swan Princess in her full glory and with her high-flying song as fluent as ever.

Tsar Saltan asks for a boon: may he see his Tsarina again? The Swan Princess gratifies his wish and he expresses his delight, rather belatedly one may think, in duet with Mitrissa, then greets his son whom he now recognises.

The wicked sisters and their mother beg for mercy. The Tsar at first threatens them, then, in his happiness and encouraged by Mitrissa and Guidon, relents. All rejoice in a scene of festivity, including the old man who promises to tell the story accurately – and to have a drink on it.

H.

THE LEGEND OF THE INVISIBLE CITY OF KITEZH AND THE MAIDEN FEVRONIYA

Opera in four acts, libretto by Vladimir Ivanovich Belsky after a Russian legend. Première St Petersburg, 20 February 1907.

FevroniyaSoprano
Prince Vsevolod YurievichTenor

| | |
|--|-----------------------------|
| Prince Yuri Vsevolodovich | Bass |
| Grishka Kuterma, a drunkard | Tenor |
| Fyodr Poyarok | Bass |
| Man with a Bear | Tenor |
| Gusliar, a minstrel | Baritone |
| Beggar Singer | Baritone |
| Young Boy | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Burundai, a Tartar warrior | Bass-Baritone |
| Biediai, a Tartar warrior | Baritone |
| Birds of Paradise' | Two Sopranos, Mezzo-Soprano |

Place: In and Near Kitezh

Time: Medieval

Running Time: 3 hours 20 minutes

Act I. A forest. The maiden Fevroniya lives with her young brother, revelling in the animals who abound there and singing of the joys and sorrows of nature. Suddenly, she sees a stranger who might have been part of a hunting party and lost his way. She offers him hospitality and assures him that she needs no church in which to worship as God is all around them. They fall in love and their duet grows in rapture. The stranger gives her a ring but hears hunting horns nearby and goes off to join his companions, who shortly appear and tell Fevroniya that the ring with which she has been betrothed belongs to Prince Vsevolod, son of the ruler of Kitezh.

Act II. The town of Little Kitezh, a short way from the citadel of Great Kitezh. The crowd buzzes with excitement as it waits for the procession of Fevroniya on her way to her wedding in the great city. An old bard prophesies doom, a trained bear dances, and a group of well-off citizens persuades the drunken Grishka to insult Fevroniya, whose lowly birth makes her in their view an unsuitable bride for the Prince. The crowd nonetheless acclaims Fevroniya until panic-stricken people pour into the marketplace and announce a Tartar attack. The invaders prove utterly ruthless but take two prisoners, Grishka, to guide them to the great city, and Fevroniya, because of her beauty. The citizens depart in panic but Fevroniya prays that by a miracle the great city become invisible to the enemy.

Act III. The cathedral square of Great Kitezh. It is night, the citizens have assembled outside the cathedral and Fyodr Poyarok, who has been blinded by the Tartars, tells them of the destruction wrought by the advancing enemy. Prince Yuri prays for the city and sends his page up a tower to stand guard and warn of the Tartars' approach. The young prince leads the army against the enemy, bells toll and a golden mist descends as by a miracle to hide the city.

An entr'acte portrays the battle of Kerzhenets, where the Russians are defeated and Prince Vsevolod killed.

Grishka has led the Tartars with Fevroniya as their prisoner to the banks of Lake Svetly Yar, from where they should be able to see the city. But it is invisible and all they can hear is the sound of bells. The Tartars accuse Grishka of deceit and threaten to torture him next day if he has misled them, offering to execute him quickly if Kitezh becomes visible, beheading being the least due to traitorous behaviour such as his. Biediai and Burundai quarrel, as if they were Fafner and Fasolt, as to which will have Fevroniya, and Burundai kills Biediai. Burundai goes to rape Fevroniya but she manages with a superhuman effort to subdue him with a look and mesmerise him to sleep. She cuts the ropes which tie her and releases Grishka, who is about to escape when he hears the bells of Kitezh tolling and resounding inside his skull. It is his punishment for cowardice and he rushes towards the Lake, only to stop short when he sees the great city's reflection in the waters. He and Fevroniya escape as the Tartars awake, in their turn see the reflection and decide a mystical power battles against them. They retreat in disarray.

Act IV. A forest, the next night. Fevroniya and Grishka are by now exhausted and he has gone raving mad. Nothing Fevroniya can do will comfort him and he runs off howling into the distance. She falls asleep and the scene around her changes from marsh to garden, where she is magically reunited with Prince Vsevolod. The voices of birds tell her she is to die but the Prince reveals that Kitezh and its inhabitants have survived.

Together they are taken to the great city and the wedding party, interrupted in the second act, resumes. The opera ends as Fevroniya pleads for the salvation of Grishka and she and Vsevolod look forward to everlasting happiness.

Its most ardent admirers have described Kitezh as a Russian Parsifal, citing the powerful Christianity embodied in the figure of Fevroniya and the Wagnerian overtones throughout the opera. It is one of Rimsky-Korsakov's most ambitious works and its combination of pantheistic folklore and Christian mystery has not interfered with his depiction of the remarkable figure of Grishka, a figure of almost Mussorgskian power and imagination. H.

LE COQ D'OR

Zolotoy Pyetushok/The Golden Cockerel

Opera in three acts, text by V. Bielsky after Pushkin. Première Moscow, 7 October 1909. First performed Paris Opéra, 1914; Drury Lane, London, 1914, with Dobrowolska, Petrenko, Petroff, Altchevsky, conductor Emil Cooper; Metropolitan, New York, 1918, with Barrientos, Didur, conductor Monteux (in French). Revived Covent Garden, 1919 (in English), with Nelis, Richardson, conductor Beecham; Buenos Aires, 1937, with Carosio, Melnik; Metropolitan, 1937, with Pons and Pinza, 1942, with Bok and Pinza, 1945, with Munsel and Cordon; Rome, 1940, with Carosio, Pasero, conductor Serafin; Covent Garden, 1954, with Dobbs, Cuénod, Glynne, conductor Markevitch (in English); New York, City Opera, 1967, with Sills, Treigle; Scottish Opera, 1975, with Catherine Gayer, John Angelo Messina, Don Garrard, conductor Gibson; Edinburgh Festival, 1979.

King Dodon Bass
 Prince Guidon Tenor
 Prince Afron Baritone
 General Polkan Bass
 Amelfa, the royal housekeeper Contralto
 The Astrologer Tenor
 The Queen of Shemakha Soprano
 The Golden Cockerel Soprano

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

Le Coq d'Or was Rimsky-Korsakov's last opera. The censor refused to sanction its performance – rather surprisingly, unless he found the references to military incompetence a little too apt – and it was not until after the composer's death that it was performed. When the work was given in Petersburg, it was thought to be over-taxing for the singers who are obliged to dance, or for the dancers who are obliged to sing. Fokine, the choreographer, ingeniously devised the plan of having all the singers seated at each side of the stage, while the dancers interpreted in pantomime what was sung. In spite of the protests made by the composer's family, this was done in Paris, London, and New York, but a return has been made to the directions laid down by Rimsky-Korsakov.

The story of Le Coq d'Or is taken from Pushkin. It is quite possible to fill it with symbolical meaning, although the librettist, Bielsky, preferred to think of it as dealing with human passions and weaknesses in their essence and quite apart from any particular context.

Prologue. A muted trumpet gives out the theme associated with the cockerel, and it is immediately followed by a descending chromatic melody on the clarinet, which is characteristic of the Queen of Shemakha, Ex. 1:

Much of the music of this short prelude is derived from the Queen's aria of Act II. The thin, staccato sound of the xylophone heralds the appearance of the Astrologer before the curtain. By his art, he says, he will conjure up for the audience a tale from long ago; though it is only a fairy story, its moral is excellent. The Astrologer's music is instrumental rather than vocal in character and its tessitura abnormally high.

Act I. The court of King Dodon. The council-room is magnificently decorated, and the King is seated in the middle of his ministers and advisers, his two sons, Guidon and Afron, on either side of him. He complains that his neighbours treat him unfairly; when he was young and vigorous, he used to go out to attack them at the head of his armies; now that he is old, they are inclined to invade him, in spite of the fact that he finds it more and more troublesome to engage in warfare. What advice can his councillors give him to meet the present invasion threat? Guidon, his elder son, is the first to speak. His recommendation is that the King withdraw his army inside the capital of his kingdom, and there, supplied with a vast stock of provisions and necessities, think out the whole problem at leisure. All applaud the suggestion, except old General Polkan, the King's chief minister, who finds the whole notion futile and impractical. Afron spurns his brother's plan, and advises that the army be disbanded and sent home; once the enemy is past them, they may re-unite and fall upon him from the rear and destroy him. Dodon is delighted, but Polkan demolishes Afron's proposal as quickly as he had Guidon's. There seems no reasonable and practical solution.

Le Coq d'Or (Covent Garden, 1945). Mattiwilda Dobbs as the Queen of Shemakha, Howell Glynne as King Dodon.

Suddenly, preceded by the same music as we had heard in the prologue, the Astrologer appears at the top of the stairs, dressed in a blue robe covered in golden stars, and with a long white astrakhan hat on his head. In music of characteristic cast, he offers the King a magic golden cockerel, which has only to be placed so that it has a view of the surrounding country, and it will crow to give warning of any danger. When it is quiet, the King may rest peacefully and take his ease with no fear of danger. Dodon rejoices, and offers the Astrologer any reward he likes to name, but the old man says he will not take money or honours, but would like to have the King's promise in writing so as to take advantage of his offer at some future date. This request is refused, the King saying in effect that his word is his bond.

The cock bids the King take his ease heedless of danger. Dodon rejoices at the prospect of never again having to be on his guard; he will indulge his pleasures and his desire for sleep from now on for ever. He begins to feel sleepy, and the royal nurse, Amelfa, has his bed brought in by servants. He lies down, eats sweetmeats out of a bowl, and plays with his parrot, which sings to him (in the orchestra). As he goes to sleep, watched by the faithful Amelfa, the orchestra begins the slumber scene (as it is known in the orchestral suite), in which the woodwind quietly repeat the cockerel's assurance that he can rest undisturbed while the cellos play a gentle lullaby. Even Amelfa falls asleep, and the sound of Ex. 1 shows that the King in his dream is anticipating his amorous encounter of the next act.

But the King has not slept for long before he is roused by the warning cry of the cockerel, which is echoed by the instruments of the orchestra. Polkan manages to wake his master, who gives orders for a general mobilisation of the army. It gets under way to the sound of a march. Soon all is quiet, and Dodon is allowed by his watchful bird to return to his slumbers. He cannot recapture his attractive dream – cannot even remember what it was about. Amelfa tries to help him and makes one or two suggestions, finally hitting upon the right one. All go to sleep once more, only to be awakened by an even more urgent summons from the cockerel than previously. This time Polkan warns the King that he is in danger himself, and that he must gird himself and lead his army to victory. With much grumbling, Dodon prepares to don his armour. It is found to be rusty, his sword is too heavy, his cuirass is too tight for him and will hardly meet round his middle. But in the end, he is sufficiently arrayed to go off to the wars, which he does to the acclamation of the crowd.

Act II. The war goes badly, and moonlight in a narrow pass reveals the bodies of the soldiers and the King's two sons, lying dead and unattended. The march of the preceding act is now oppressed with gloom, and Dodon bursts into lamentation when he finds the bodies of his slain sons.

The mists which have shrouded the pass lift, and reveal a tent. General consternation. Could it belong to the enemy general? Reluctantly the soldiers are persuaded to drag a piece of comic artillery which is trained on the tent, and eventually with much difficulty fired. But its only effect is that a beautiful young woman emerges from the tent; the soldiers, all but Dodon and Polkan, take to their heels and disappear. The young woman, with nothing but the clarinet phrase of Ex. 1 as prelude, sings the praises of the sun, which gives life and beauty to her native land. This is the famous 'Hymn to the Sun', whose sensuously beautiful melody has made it among Rimsky-Korsakov's vocal compositions second in popularity only to the Song of the Indian Guest from Sadko.

When she is questioned, the girl reveals that she is the Queen of Shemakha, come to subdue Dodon, not by force of arms but by her own physical beauty. Dodon is shyer than Polkan, but eventually Polkan's bluntness goes too far and she asks for him to be sent away. Dodon promptly complies, and Polkan watches proceedings from behind the Queen's tent (the bodies of the soldiers have by now been cleared away, and the scene is bathed in sunlight).

Beginning with a little 6/8 tune in which she describes her unclothed beauty, the Queen proceeds to vamp Dodon in seductive snatches of song. Even an orchestral reference to the cockerel's warning makes not the slightest difference to the King, who appears to enjoy the process of becoming ensnared. The Queen tells him he must sing for her, as he no doubt once did in his youth, and at her orders he starts an incredibly primitive-sounding melody, much to her glee. The Queen tries new tactics. At home everyone obeys her slightest whim, and her caprice rules her kingdom;

Oh, for contradiction, even domination! Timidly Dodon offers himself as dominator, and she asks him to dance for her – as he must once have danced when he was young. She rigs him up with a fan and scarf in place of his cumbersome armour, and has her slaves play a slow melody to accompany him. She joins him and mocks his efforts, which land him, as the music gets quicker, on some cushions in a state of collapse.

By now, the King is completely under the Queen's spell. He repeats his offer of his hand, his possessions, his throne, his kingdom. She accepts with the proviso that Polkan shall forthwith be whipped; Dodon offers to go further and behead him. Preparations are immediately put in hand for a return to Dodon's kingdom, and, while the Queen's slaves mock at her newest capture, Dodon's army lines up to escort their monarch and his bride to their capital.

Act III. We are back in Dodon's court. The crowd is wondering if and when he will return. Rumours are noised abroad: he has won a great victory, but lost his two sons, and is escorting home as his bride a young queen whom he rescued from a dragon. All must be well, argue the people, since the cockerel is quiet. Then the cry goes up that the procession is at hand. Eventually the King and his bride appear in their gilded chariot.

Suddenly, proceedings are interrupted by the appearance of the Astrologer, preceded by his characteristic music. He has come to claim his reward from the King; it shall be the Princess who rides by the King's side! The King angrily refuses, but the Astrologer persists, emphasising his determination to risk marriage even at his age with a sustained top E (Rimsky-Korsakov, in his preface to the score, underlines the fact that the role of the Astrologer requires a tenor with a highly developed falsetto voice). The King orders his guards to remove the old man, and when he seems still anxious to continue the dispute, Dodon strikes him on the head with his sceptre, and kills him. The sky darkens, thunder is heard, and Dodon has the grace to appear embarrassed at the turn events have taken; such a bad omen on one's wedding day! The Queen laughs at the whole episode, but, when Dodon tries to embrace her, repulses him in disgust. The cockerel suddenly comes to life, utters a piercing cry, flies over the crowd and pecks the King on the head. He falls dead, and the crowd loyally break into lamentation for him. The sky becomes completely dark, and when light returns, both Queen and cockerel have disappeared.

In the epilogue, the resuscitated Astrologer announces that the story is only a fairy-tale and that in Dodon's kingdom only the Queen and he himself were mortals.

Le Coq d'Or is more compactly shaped than Rimsky-Korsakov's other stage works, and the gorgeous orchestration has a new economy and is treated with a more directly pointed sense of style than elsewhere. The spectacular staging which the work requires, and the hardly less spectacular vocal writing for the coloratura-soprano Queen, are qualities which have contributed to the opera's popularity; they also constitute a direct link with Rimsky-Korsakov's most famous pupil, Stravinsky, whose first opera, Le Rossignol, begun a year after Le Coq d'Or, makes use of exactly the same characteristics.

H.

GIOACCHINO ANTONIO ROSSINI

(born 29 February 1792, died 13 November 1868)

Rossini is a bundle of paradox, or at least of superficial contradiction. He was a man of celebrated wit and apparent worldliness, yet consumed by nerves and cursed with the thinnest of skins; he has been famous for the two hundred years since his birth for his comedies, yet in his own time just as well known as a composer of opera seria; he wrote prolifically and fast (thirty-nine operas in nineteen years) yet during the last twenty-nine years of his life produced no operas and, some short vocal and piano pieces apart, only two full-length works, both to sacred texts. Even his birthdate, 29 February 1792 – Leap Year – marks him out as an exception.

The twentieth century's view of Rossini has tended therefore to be lopsided. To think of him as a jovial bon vivant, who wrote superb, if slightly farcical comic operas, who was as much interested in culinary as musical pursuits, who gave up composition for a life of luxury in Paris, is as far from the point as to rate Winston Churchill primarily a brilliant if sharply-angled historian. Rossini was almost as much a prodigy as Schubert, his near-contemporary, or Mendelssohn, his early music (such as the six Sonate a quattro for strings, written about 1804) suggesting a classical grounding as much as it foreshadows the buffo writing of his mature operas. La Cambiale di Matrimonio was performed when he was eighteen, he had written twelve successful operas by the time he was twenty-two, and he became proficient in all operatic forms, serious as well as comic, so as in Italy to dominate the first half of the nineteenth century as Verdi did the second.

He was pioneer as well as practitioner; he developed the Italian buffo tradition to its ultimate; he wrote in Guillaume Tell the finest specimen to date of the French Grand Opera; and at the Théâtre Italien in Paris, he was an influence for good on a number of composers and singers. That his operas, apart from The Barber, fell into disuse after his death is a comment more on fashion than on their quality, but interest in the comedies began to revive in the 1920s with the appearance of the great coloratura mezzo, Conchita Supervia, continued with the advocacy of the conductor Vittorio Gui, not least at Glyndebourne, and in the second half of the century, the opere serie were once again performed, now in reliable editions. As a result, a festival devoted to his operas has been started in Pesaro, recordings have been made of what would once have been considered his most obscure works, and a new view is rapidly developing of one of opera's greatest figures. H.

LA SCALA DI SETA

The Silken Ladder

Farsa comica in one act, libretto by Giuseppe Maria Foppa, based on François-Antoine-Eugène de Planard's libretto for the opéra comique L'Échelle de soie, set by Pierre Gaveaux (1808). First performance at the Teatro San Moisè, Venice, 9 May 1812, with Maria Cantarelli as Giulia, Carolina Nagher as Lucilla, Rafaele Monelli as Dorvil, Nicola Tacci as Blansac, Nicola de Grecis as Germano and Gaetano Del Monte as Dormont. First U.K. performance by the Piccolo Teatro dell'Opera Comica at Sadler's Wells Theatre, London, 1954. U.S. première at University of Cincinnati, 1989, conducted by H. Teri Murai. Revived at the Rossini Opera Festival, Pesaro, 1988, with Luciana Serra as Giulia, Cecilia Bartoli as Lucilla and William Matteuzzi as Dorvil, and has since entered the general repertory.

Giulia, secretly married to Dorvil.....Soprano
 Lucilla, *her cousin*Mezzo-Soprano
 Dorvil, Giulia's husband.....Tenor
 Germano, a servant.....Bass
 BlansacBass
 Dormont, *Giulia's tutor*Tenor

Place: The Countryside, outside Paris

Running Time: 1 hour

Rossini's first operatic effort was at the age of thirteen, in 1805, when he contributed several arias and ensembles to the opera seria Demetrio e Polibio, not staged until 1812. Rossini entered Bologna's Accademia Filarmonica in 1806 but left early, and was already composing an opera for the Teatro San Moisè, Venice, in 1810 (La cambiale di matrimonio). La scala di seta is the earliest of Rossini's operas to have made it into the general repertory.

Giulia has married Dorvil without permission from her tutor/guardian Dormont, who promised her to Dorvil's friend, Blansac. Husband and wife spent the night together in Giulia's apartment.

Giulia has to get rid of the servant, Germano ('Va, sciocco, non seccarmi') and then of her cousin, Lucilla (trio, 'Un altro malanno'), before Dorvil can leave secretly via the silken ladder that will be waiting for him again at midnight. Dormont warns her to be ready to welcome Blansac as her husband. Having noticed that Blansac appeals to Lucilla, Giulia has determined to marry them off. She appeals to Germano to spy on them (duet, 'Io so ch'ai buon core'). Blansac himself comes to call on Giulia, bringing his friend Dorvil with him. Dorvil warns Blansac that Giulia does not care for him. This merely piques Blansac, who is so confident he will inspire her with love that he invites Dorvil to hide and observe him in action. Dorvil agrees, so as to test his wife's fidelity ('Vedrò qual sommo incanto'). Germano also hides, so he can watch and learn how to woo a woman, but he notices that someone else is watching already. Giulia quizzes Blansac on his fidelity, for the sake of her cousin Lucilla. This misleads Blansac and the two men watching (quartet, 'Si che unito a cara sposa'). Dorvil leaves in fury. Blansac bumps into Lucilla, who strikes him as much more beautiful than Giulia. Lucilla is equally attracted to him ('Sento talor nell'anima').

Giulia longs for midnight, so she can clear up the misunderstanding with Dorvil ('Il mio ben sospiro e chiamo'). Germano overhears and assumes that her rendezvous involves Blansac. He determines to listen in on it, in case he can learn something ('Amore dolcemente'). Overcome with sleep and, perhaps, the effects of drink, he manages to let Blansac as well as Lucilla know about the rendezvous. Germano and Lucilla hide separately in Giulia's room and watch as Dorvil arrives via the silken ladder, shortly followed by Blansac (finale, 'Dorme ognuno in queste soglie'). The noise wakes Dormont, who arrives in his night-dress and discovers all the others in hiding. His anger is easily mollified, however: he allows them all to do as they wish, since there is no arguing with love.

Rossini cracks the whip four times at the start of his fizzing overture to La scala di seta, to summon orchestral players and audience to attention. The opera itself is ruled by an equally strict hand: vocal fireworks are matched by some brilliantly inventive woodwind writing, with piccolo often prominent. Charming arias for all the voices are supplemented by a series of remarkable ensembles, which give the work its intense, slightly sharp flavour. A flirtatious duo for mistress and servant anticipates some of Il barbiere's humour, but is charged with a cruder, more obviously erotic edge; the fugal quartet 'Si che unito a cara sposa', as rigorously worked out as Idomeneo's 'Andrò ramingo e solo', works to ruthlessly comic, rather than tragic effect: the characters are driven not by fate but by the composer. The arbitrarily resolved plot matters less than the musical forms Rossini imposes with such bravura. P.

LA PIETRA DEL PARAGONE

The Touchstone

Melodramma giocoso in two acts, libretto by Luigi Romanelli. First performance at la Scala, Milan, 26 September 1812, with Carolina Zerbini as Aspasia, Marietta Marcolini as Clarice, Claudio Bonoldi as Giocondo, Filippo Galli as Asdrubale, Pietro Vasoli as Pacuvio. First U.K. performance, St Pancras Town Hall, London, 1963, Glyndebourne, 1964, in Günther Rennert's radically intrusive German version, with Ugo Trama as Asdrubale, Josephine Veasey as Clarice and Anna Reynolds as Ortensia (i.e. Aspasia), conducted by John Pritchard. Wexford Festival, 1975. First U.S. performance, Hartford College of Music, 1955.

FulviaMezzo-Soprano
Baroness Aspasia.....Soprano Marchioness Clarice, in love with AsdrubaleContralto
The Cavalier Giocondo, *Asdrubale's friend*Tenor
Count Asdrubale.....Bass
Pacuvio, poet.....Bass
Count Macrobio, journalist.....Bass
FabrizioBass

Guests, Gardeners

Place: A Country Villa

Time: 'The Present' (1812)/Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

The libretto by la Scala's resident poet was tailor-made for Rossini, who was making his début in Italy's most important opera house, and for his cast: Luigi Romanelli manoeuvred brilliantly to suit the star contralto Marietta Marcolini, who wanted to appear in soldier's dress, and he provided Rossini with a witty comedy, distinguished by its topical references to journalistic conditions in Milan, and, more unexpectedly, by its reserves of human feeling. It inspired Rossini with a new quality of music, and was performed fifty-three times during the season.

Count Asdrubale has not decided which of three widows he wishes to marry, since he cannot be sure whether any of them is motivated by love or merely by a longing for his money.

Act I. A garden. Asdrubale's guests and his gardeners admire his wisdom, but observe that he seems in no hurry to choose a wife. They ignore the poet Pacuvio when he tries to read them his new poem, as do Fabrizio and the Baroness. Donna Fulvia is less rude: intending to marry the Count for his money, she promises to look after Pacuvio. The journalist Macrobio tries to offer his services to the Cavalier Giocondo but is firmly rejected. When Clarice thinks aloud about the way the Count claims he doesn't love her, her words are echoed by the Count himself (duet, 'Quel dirmi, oh dio! non t'amo'). For a moment, she believes that he does love her; the Count, however, dare not trust his own feelings ('Se di certo io non sapessi').

They fence with one another (duet, 'Conte mio').

Donna Fulvia has brought a rose to present to the Count. First, Pacuvio insists on reading her his poem ('Ombretta sdegnosa del Missipipi' [sic]). She presents her rose and Pacuvio recites some more verses to explain its overblown state. Asdrubale determines to test the women using a 'pietra del paragone'. The Count and Giocondo attack Macrobio, but Clarice intervenes to point out that none of the men acts reasonably (quartet, 'Voi volete, e non volete'). As pre-arranged, Fabrizio hands the Count a piece of paper and he pretends to make light of some bad news. Macrobio refuses to publish Pacuvio's new poem ('Chi è colei chi s'avvicina?'). When everyone learns that Count Asdrubale has lost his fortune, the Baroness and Fulvia congratulate themselves that they got away before marriage. Wearing a disguise, the Count pretends to be his own creditor, bent on sequestering his assets, which will all be sealed ('Sigillarà'). The Baroness, Fulvia, Pacuvio and Macrobio abandon the Count to Clarice, who accepts the responsibility happily. All react with amazement to the news that the Count does not owe any money after all (finale, 'Qual chi dorme e in sogno crede').

Act II. The Baroness and Fulvia determine to exact revenge for what happened; Macrobio and Pacuvio apologise to the Count. The Baroness forces Macrobio to challenge the Count to a duel. The Count invites everyone to come hunting. Pacuvio fails to shoot anything as a storm blows up. Giocondo is wracked by jealousy at the thought of Clarice in another's arms ('Quell'alme pupille'). Clarice explains that she loves the Count, but Giocondo is welcome to keep hoping that her affections will change ('Sperar se vuoi'). The Count overhears and misunderstands. Macrobio teases them by discussing the plot of his poem, which echoes their situation (trio, 'Su queste piante incisi').

Clarice also decides to play the 'touchstone' trick. She pretends her long-lost twin brother Captain Lucindo is coming to see her. Fulvia forces Pacuvio to fight a duel on her behalf. Giocondo also challenges Macrobio to a duel, but first he and the Count pretend they will fight for the right to kill Macrobio. The Count explains that the laws of hospitality oblige him to yield this right to his guest, Giocondo. Having forced Macrobio to admit he is an idiot, they spare him (trio, 'Prima fra voi coll'armi'). Clarice appears, disguised in military uniform as her brother, Lucindo, and is welcomed by the troops. She announces that she is returning to the Italy she left as a child, for the sake of the soldiers ('Se per voi le care io torno'). Fulvia and the Baroness are both attracted to this military figure. Lucindo announces that he has come to take the unhappy Clarice away. This at last forces the Count to disclose his feelings ('Ah! se destarti in seno'). Clarice reveals her identity, which astonishes everyone ('Voi Clarice?') and delights the Count, who swears to respect women from now on. During the course of the finale, Macrobio and Pacuvio refuse to rush into marriage with the other widows; Clarice and the Count forgive each other and celebrate their happiness.

La pietra del paragone is the best, the funniest and the most serious of Rossini's early comic operas. Its unusually literate text offers opportunities for apt characterisation, of the three different types of widow, of the sinisterly available, unscrupulous journalist Macrobio, of the appalling poet Pacuvio. At the opera's centre stands Asdrubale, the cynic who reforms, as though Così fan tutte's Don Alfonso learnt that some women are indeed phoenixes. This involves a touching journey from experience to innocence. It was probably only an accident that gave Rossini a bass as the hero, while the tenor was relegated to second place as his chum, the worthy but unsuccessful lover (whose presentation is not entirely free of irony). Rossini makes the most of this vocal donnée, just as he does of the fact that the heroine is a contralto. For once, this opera is about grown-ups, its closest parallel with Lehár's Merry Widow. The scenes for the central couple cover much emotional and stylistic ground, from sentimentality to barbed fencing via real intimacy. Rossini marks each stage with differentiated orchestration, melodies and rhythms: the pace of the music slows and cellos or horns suddenly suggest the darker implications of their dialogue.

Asdrubale himself begins as a partial echo, invisible, disembodied and genderless, in the delicious horn-accompanied duet with Clarice in Act I; he then battles with his own prejudices before resolving, in a rather savage cabaletta, to be pitiless. When ultimately he repents, in 'Ah! se destarti in seno', Rossini throws in a passage of Mozartian seriousness, reminding us not of Così so much as of that other trial opera, The Magic Flute, before the music erupts in suitably frivolous roudades.

L'OCCASIONE FA IL LADRO ossia IL CAMBIO DELLA VALIGIA

*The Occasion Makes the Thief or
The Exchange of a Suitcase*

Burletta per musica in one act, libretto by Luigi Prividali, probably based on M.A.E.'s (i.e. Augustin-Eugène Scribe)'s comédie Le prétendu par hasard, ou L'Occasion fait le larron (1810). All the recitatives are by someone else.¹ First performed Venice, 24 November 1812, with Giacinta Canonici as Berenice, Carolina Nagher as Ernestina, Gaetano Del Monte as Don Eusebio, Tommaso Berto as Conte Alberto, Luigi Pacini as Don Parmenione. Staged in Barcelona, 1822, Lisbon, 1826, St Petersburg, 1830, and Vienna, 1834. In Britain, it was first seen performed by Italian marionettes at the Little Theatre, London, on 4 January 1929, and staged live at the Opera House, Buxton, on 8 August 1987. Revived in 1987 as part of the Rossini Opera Festival, in Pesaro, with Luciana Serra as Berenice, Luciana D'Intino as Ernestina, Raul Gimenez as Conte Alberto, Claudio Desderi as Martino and J. Patrick Raftery as Don Parmenione, conducted by Salvatore Accardo.

Don Eusebio.....Tenor
Berenice, his niece, an heiress.....Soprano
Count Alberto.....Tenor
Don Parmenione.....Bass
Ernestina, Berenice's servant.....Soprano
Martino, Don Parmenione's servant.....Bass
Waiters in the Inn, Don Eusebio's Servants

Place: In and Near Naples

Running Time: 1 hour 15 minutes

The fourth of the farces Rossini was contracted to write for the Teatro San Moisè in Venice, L'occasione fa il ladro is the story of an inspired improvisation, an apt theme for an opera composed in only eleven days. Rossini reuses the storm music from La pietra del paragone in place of an overture, but such recycling in Rossini rarely signals parsimoniousness.

The hall of an inn, one dark and stormy night. Don Parmenione is pursuing the sister of a friend of his, who has eloped with a seducer. He takes refuge from the storm which leaves him indifferent but frightens his servant Martino (duet, 'Frema in ciel il nembo irato'). They are joined by a stranger, Count Alberto, who seems to arrive from a different operatic world. With his first words he heroically defies fate (i.e. the weather) to obstruct love's progress. Alberto explains that he is on his way to meet the woman he is engaged to marry, whom he has never seen. They toast the god of wine in a spirited Allegro vivace ('Viva Bacco il Dio del vino'). When Alberto and his servant leave, by mistake they take Parmenione's suitcase in place of Alberto's. Martino encourages his master to take Alberto's money and his passport. Parmenione is struck by the portrait inside the bag. Assuming that it shows Alberto's fiancée, he determines to have her for himself ('Che sorte, che accidente').

A hall in Berenice's house. She is about to marry Count Alberto, the man her father chose for her before he died. Her uncle Don Eusebio explains to Ernestina that they will need her help today. Ernestina is a woman of good birth who ran away with a man who abandoned her. She has since been acting as Berenice's confidante, rather than her maid. Berenice is determined to take control of her own destiny: to test her future husband's sincerity she will change places with Ernestina. Parmenione arrives, pretending to be Alberto. Although he begins his scene with Ernestina in an apparent parody of courtly lovemaking, he is genuinely attracted to her – though she looks nothing like the portrait – and she in turn likes his charm and his 'brio' ('Quel gentil, quel vago oggetto').

Meanwhile, over pizzicato strings and tripling woodwind, Alberto and Berenice no sooner meet than they fall in love ('Se non m'inganna il core'). Eusebio tries to sort out the confusion caused by two Count Albertos in an exquisite quintet, 'Che strana sorpresa'. When Ernestina tells Alberto she can never marry him, he assures her he would never force the issue, as long as her reluctance is not because she doesn't trust him ('D'ogni più sacro impegno'). Berenice's suspicions about Parmenione are reinforced when he flirts with her, presuming on her status as a servant. Eventually, she reveals that she is Count Alberto's future wife and tries to test him on his family knowledge (duet, 'Voi la sposa!').

When Ernestina and Don Eusebio interrogate Martino he adroitly gives nothing away ('Il mio padrone è un uomo'). Alberto and Parmenione find themselves in an impasse which is relieved when Alberto agrees to let Parmenione marry Ernestina, if she is indeed the one intended for him. Berenice reminds them that she has her own doubts and needs to be consulted (aria, 'Voi la sposa pretendete'). Parmenione boldly reveals his identity. It turns out that the woman he was pursuing, the fugitive sister of his friend, is Ernestina. He offers her his hand to restore her honour, and she accepts (finale, 'Quello, ch'io fui, ritorno'). Alberto ties up one loose end when he explains that the portrait in his suitcase was of his sister, and what Eusebio calls the burletta (farce) finishes with a double marriage.

¹ See the critical edition by Giovanni Carli Ballola, Patricia Brauner and Philip Gossett, Pesaro, 1994.

Once the storm in the overture has yoked together two disparate characters and fates, Rossini delights in the contrasts they evoke: on the one hand, the freewheeling, unscrupulous but endearingly improvisatory (even Rossinian) genius, the bass Don Parmenione, whose own servant says 'he looks like a gentleman and may also be one', and on the other, the quintessentially aristocratic, tenor lover Count Alberto. To enrich the mix, it is the bourgeois who tries to exploit his social superiority over the 'servant', while the aristocrat heroically defends liberty with spectacularly ingenious roudades over a martial rhythm ('D'ogni più sacro impegno'). In post-revolutionary Italy two régimes, two classes are now forced to shelter under the same roof.

The opera explores the collision between humorous, go-getting realism and serious, romantic idealism. The music inspired by each aspect is so disparate that their collocation makes for an uncomfortable, explosive combination. Rossini expands the conventional forms to encompass all this, so that the scene that begins as a duet ('Quel gentil, quel vago oggetto') is actually part of a quintet that goes on for 398 bars. This novelty may explain why L'occasione fa il ladro proved unpopular in Venice in 1812. Perhaps it is time to make a case for Berenice's proto-feminism: it takes her feisty coloratura to insist on what is right and so resolve the situation. Her determination to be 'Arbitra de se stessa' (arbiter of her own destiny) in the second, faster section of her first aria ultimately leads to the truth. On the way, Rossini paints a fascinatingly complete portrait, whose facets range from cunning interrogator, via vituperative insulter, to magisterial grande dame. Yet her vocal acrobatics are not inconsistent with heartfelt emotions, as exquisite horn and clarinet doubling suggest when she intervenes with 'Voi la sposa pretendete', raises the temperature of the debate and brings them all to their senses. P.

SIGNOR BRUSCHINO

Il Figlio per Azzardo

His Son by Chance

Farsa giocosa in one act, libretto by Giuseppe Maria Foppa, based on Alissan de Chazet and E.T.M. Ourry's play Le fils par hasard ou Ruse et Folie (1809). First performance Teatro S. Moisè, Venice, 27 January 1813, with Nicola De Grecis as Gaudenzio, Teodolinda Pontiggia as Sofia, Luigi Raffanelli as Bruschino the father and Tommaso Berti as Florville. First U.K. performance 1960 by the Kentish Opera Group at Orpington. First U.S. performance 1932 at the Met, in a double-bill with Elektra, with Giuseppe de Luca and Ezio Pinza, conducted by Tullio Serafin. Offenbach's adaptation of the score to fit a new libretto by Desforges was first performed in Paris on 29 December 1857; August 1988 at the Rossini Opera Festival, with Mariella Devia as Sofia, Enzo Dara as Gaudenzio, Dalmacio Gonzalez as Florville, Alberto Rinaldi as Bruschino, the father, conducted by Donato Renzetti. Opéra-Comique, Paris, co-production with Cologne Opera and Schwetzingen Festival, July 1992; Pimlico Opera in Oxford, June 1993, conductor Martin Merry; Vienna Chamber Opera, 1993, conductor Vronsky.

Gaudenzio Strappapuppole, *Sofia's tutor*Bass¹
 SofiaSoprano
 Bruschino, *the father*Bass
 Bruschino, *his son*Tenor
 Florville, *in love with Sofia*Tenor
 Police CommissionerTenor
 Filiberto, *innkeeper*Bass
 Marianna, *Sofia's maid*Mezzo-Soprano Servants

Place: Gaudenzio's Castle

Running Time: 1 hour 20 minutes

Rossini's great opera Tancredi had its première in Venice only ten days later, but it shows few affinities. Signor Bruschino was written, like L'inganno felice and La scala di seta, to a text by Foppa, who provided most of the libretti for farces at the Teatro S. Moisè. Il signor Bruschino's mechanical plot encourages Rossini to move in symmetrical patterns, occasionally at the expense of human feelings. Rossini makes two novel, musical jokes. In the overture the second violins are repeatedly instructed to strike the metal parts of their desk-lights with their bows: according to Stendhal, their parody of the overture's serious opening theme was perceived as an 'audacious insult' to the audience. When the real Signor

¹ Basso comico according to the score.

Bruschino (i.e. the son) enters, he does so to a disconcerting, mock funeral march.

A room on the ground floor, with a view of the garden and the park. Florville appeals to love to help him to marry Sofia ('Deh tu m'assisti amore'). He learns from her maid that Sofia has been promised to another. The lovers are delighted to see each other. Now that Florville's father, whom Gaudenzio hated, has died Florville assumes there will be no barrier to their marriage. Sofia explains that Gaudenzio has arranged for her to marry Signor Bruschino's son, though neither she nor her tutor has ever seen him. He is due to arrive today. Luckily, Gaudenzio has never seen Florville either. Filiberto comes to force Signor Bruschino to settle his son's debts. Pretending to be Gaudenzio's business agent and a cousin of the younger Bruschino, whose surname he also takes, Florville pays off some of the debt ('Io danari vi darò!'), on condition that Filiberto keeps the younger Bruschino locked up. Gaudenzio has observed that everyone is ambitious for what they haven't got; he determines to be satisfied with what he has (cavatina, 'Nel teatro del gran mondo').

Florville makes Gaudenzio believe that he is the younger Bruschino, now repentant. Gaudenzio tries to persuade the elder Bruschino to forgive his son (trio, 'Per un figlio già pentito'). The father refuses to recognise the impostor. For everyone else, this demonstrates his implacability. The father goes for the police. Sofia then begs him to give her his son ('Ah! donate il caro sposo'). After a test involving handwriting, Bruschino is further confounded and everyone else is struck by his obstinacy ('Ho la testa o è andata via?'). Filiberto confirms that Florville is indeed Bruschino (meaning the 'cousin', not the son). Gaudenzio examines his pupil Sofia on the subject of marriage and establishes that she is in love (duet, 'È un bel nodo che due cori'). Bruschino the father discovers that Florville is really the son of Gaudenzio's enemy, and therefore pretends that he now recognises his son (finale, 'Ebben, ragion, dovere'), to spite Gaudenzio. The man who really is Bruschino, the son, arrives, stammering his repentance. Gaudenzio is forced to accept Florville as a husband for his pupil and ward. Everyone salutes the power of love.

P.

TANCREDI

Melodramma eroico in two acts, libretto by Gaetano Rossi, based on Voltaire's play Tancrède (1760). First performed at the Teatro La Fenice, Venice, 6 February 1813, with Adelaide Malanotte-Montresor as Tancredi, Elisabetta Manfredini-Guarmani as Amenaide, Pietro Todràn as Argirio, Luciano Bianchi as Orbazzano. The first two performances were broken off because the Tancredi and the Amenaide were indisposed, so it was not given complete until 12 February. Later, the young Giuditta Pasta had an immense impact in the title role. First U.K. performance 1820, Covent Garden. First U.S. performance 1825, New York. It was revived for Giulietta Simionato in 1952 at the Maggio Musicale, Florence; for Marilyn Horne during the 1970s and 1980s. More recently, Vesselina Kasarova has recorded it, 1995.

Argirio, nobleman.....Tenor
 Amenaide, his daughter, in love with Tancredi.....Soprano
 Tancredi, of royal blood, in love with Amenaide.....Contralto
 Orbazzano, nobleman, in love with Amenaide.....Bass
 Isaura, Amenaide's friend.....Contralto
 Roggiero, Tancredi's friend.....Soprano or Tenor
 Noble Men and Women, Knights, Warriors and Guards

Place: Syracuse, Sicily

Time: 1005 A.D.

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

Rossini's first operatic effort was Demetrio e Polibio, an opera seria which he wrote for the tenor Domenico Mombelli's small touring company in 1805 at the age of thirteen, though it was not staged until 1812, at the Teatro Valle, Rome. He entered Bologna's Accademia Filarmonica the next year but left early, and was already composing an opera for the Teatro San Moisè, Venice, in 1810 (La cambiale di matrimonio, text by Gaetano Rossi). This farsa comica was followed by four more for the same theatre, L'Equivoco stravagante, L'inganno felice, La Scala di seta, L'Occasione fa il ladro, while he was commissioned to write his first serious opera (the dramma con cori, Ciro in Babilonia), for Ferrara's Teatro Comunale in 1812. His second, Tancredi, for Venice's rather more important la Fenice, became immensely popular and very influential. The first Tancredi, Malanotte-Montresor, rejected the spectacular but conventional aria (complete with solo violin part and echo effect) that Rossini had provided for her first entrance. Forced to improvise at the last minute, Rossini composed the touching aria whose cabaletta, 'Di tanti palpiti', became an early universally popular song. In 1824 Stendhal claimed it had 'enjoyed a wider and more universal popularity than perhaps any other aria in the world'.¹ Wagner famously parodied it in a chorus in Act III of Die Meistersinger – but could Tancredi's selfless, anonymous intervention to defend Amenaide have inspired Lohengrin? In its first form, Tancredi ended happily. For the revival in Ferrara in March 1813, Rossini made several changes and reworked the finale in collaboration with Luigi Lechi to restore Voltaire's original, tragic ending. This second Ferrara ending is now usually given.

Under attack from Byzantine and Saracen forces, Syracuse has also suffered from a civil war between two noble families, one led by Argirio, the other by Orbazzano. In Byzantium, Amenaide met Tancredi, who was born into the royal family of Syracuse but had been banished unfairly. They fell in love. Meanwhile in Syracuse, all Tancredi's property was confiscated and awarded to Orbazzano. When Amenaide returned to Syracuse, she sent anonymously and unaddressed a letter to Tancredi, imploring him to come.

Act I. A gallery in Argirio's palace. A chorus celebrates the end of the civil war. Argirio and Orbazzano lead them in an oath of loyalty to Syracuse, agreeing that anyone who communicates with the Saracen enemy should be sentenced to death. Amenaide is delighted that peace has returned to Syracuse ('Come dolce all'alma mia'), but she is appalled when Argirio announces that he will marry her to Orbazzano to seal the agreement between them.

The garden outside the palace. Roggiero lands with Tancredi, who resolves to be worthy of Amenaide, or to die ('Di tanti palpiti'). He commands his squires to set up his insignia (inscribed not with his name, but with 'Fede, Onore' (Faith, Honour) in the square and say that an unknown knight offers his services in the defence of Syracuse. He hides when he sees Argirio and Amenaide approaching. Argirio tells her that Solamir, the Saracen commander, has surrounded the city and demanded the hand of Amenaide. He knows that Tancredi has landed, and presumes he is bent on revenge. Argirio insists that Amenaide's duty to her father and to her country oblige her to marry Orbazzano ('Pensa che sei mia figlia'). When Tancredi reveals himself to Amenaide, she warns him to keep away, but cannot bring herself to reveal that she is due to marry Orbazzano ('L'aura che intorno spiri').

A public space near the city's walls. The nobles appeal to love to unite two hearts ('Amori, scendete'). Soldiers salute their hero Orbazzano. Roggiero begs Tancredi to keep his identity secret. Tancredi offers his services in Syracuse's cause, but, as Amenaide realises, he still thinks she was unfaithful to him. She refuses to marry Orbazzano. Enraged, Orbazzano reveals the letter she wrote to Tancredi, which everyone assumes was intended for the Saracen Solamir. They are horrified (sextet and finale 'Ciel, che lessi'). Amenaide is repudiated by her father and even by Tancredi.

Act II. A gallery in Argirio's castle. Orbazzano swears to persecute Amenaide as fervently as he once courted her. The senate has decreed her death, but the sentence lacks Argirio's signature. Torn between loyalty to the state and love for his daughter, he nevertheless signs the decree. Isaura has remained faithful to Amenaide and prays that she will receive divine comfort ('Tu che i miseri conforti').

Inside the prison. Amenaide is ready to die for love, hoping that one day Tancredi will learn that she is innocent ('No, che il morir non è'). Orbazzano comes to lead her to her death, but Tancredi intervenes: as her champion, he challenges Orbazzano to single combat. Argirio begs Tancredi to reveal his identity; he refuses. Neither can bring himself to hate Amenaide ('Ah, se de' mali miei'). The two men embrace before Tancredi goes off to prove her innocence, which he does not believe in. Amenaide prays for his success ('Giusto Dio che umile adoro').

The great square in Syracuse. The crowd salute Tancredi, who has killed Orbazzano. However, since he still assumes Amenaide's letter was addressed to the Saracen, he rejects and refuses to listen to her ('Lasciami: non t'ascolto'). Isaura assures Roggiero that Amenaide has remained true to Tancredi. Roggiero wishes that were true ('Torni alfin').

Ferrara Finale. In the mountains, with a view of Etna, sunset. The savage landscape reminds Tancredi of his dilemma: he still adores the woman who betrayed him ('Ah! che scordar non so').

¹ Life of Rossini, ed. and transl. Richard N. Coe, London, 1970. Stendhal's detailed analysis in the fascinating chapter he devoted to Tancredi is well worth reading.

Syracusan knights appeal to Tancredi to save them from the Saracens. He again refuses to listen to Amenaide; instead, he determines to die for her in the battle and let love itself avenge him ('Perché turbar la calma'). Amenaide and Isaura learn from Argirio that Tancredi saved the day, though it cost him his own life. When he is brought in, mortally wounded, Argirio reveals that Amenaide was faithful: she wrote the letter to him. Tancredi asks to be married to her and as he dies, he begs her to live, as his widow.

Venice Finale. In the mountains, with a view of Etna, sunset. The savage landscape reminds Tancredi of his dilemma: he still loves the woman who betrayed him. Saracens look forward to victory in the forthcoming battle. Realising that he is among the enemy, Tancredi resolves to sacrifice himself for Amenaide's sake. Argirio reveals that Amenaide was faithful – she wrote the letter to him. The Saracens bring in Solamir's last offer: if he is allowed to marry Amenaide, he will spare Syracuse. Tancredi rebukes Amenaide, but admits he still adores her ('È questa la fede'). He leads the Syracusans into battle. Argirio follows, while Amenaide awaits the outcome. Tancredi returns victorious, having heard from Solamir, before he died, that Amenaide is innocent. He asks to be forgiven and Argirio invites him to rule over Syracuse. Amenaide leads the rejoicing ('Fra questi soavi palpiti').

Tancredi does not convince completely. There is a perfunctory quality to the choruses, for example, while some of the extraordinary vocal feats Rossini calls for remain technical exercises, athletics rather than dancing: syllables routinely divided into quavers and semiquavers can sound like miraculously disciplined hiccupping. Nevertheless, at its best, there is a special quality to Tancredi's music, which Stendhal identified first as its youthfulness. As for the tragic ending Rossini provided for the revival in Ferrara, its power is built on stoic discretion. It is tempting to assume that this is obviously the one to perform now. There is an argument on the other side, however, as Andrew Porter points out: 'The artificially sustained tensions of this florid opera are perhaps more fittingly released by the brilliant, if rather trivial, trio of Rossini's original finale.'¹ P.

L'ITALIANA IN ALGERI

The Italian Girl in Algiers

Opera in two acts, text by A. Anelli (originally written for L. Mosca and performed at la Scala in 1808). Première at Teatro San Benedetto, Venice, 22 May 1813. First performed in London, Haymarket Theatre, 1819 (in Italian); Princess's Theatre, 1844 (in English); New York, 1832 (in Italian). Revived Metropolitan, New York, 1919, with Besanzoni, Hackett, Didur, de Luca, conductor Papi; Turin, 1925, with Supervia, conductor Gui; Rome, 1927, with Supervia; Paris, 1933; la Scala, Milan, 1933, with Castagna; Covent Garden, 1935, with Supervia, Ederle, Bettoni, Scattola, conductor Bellezza; Florence Festival, 1941, with Pederzini; la Scala, 1953, with Simionato; Glyndebourne, 1957, with Dominguez, Oncina, Montarsolo, Cortis, conductor Gui; Sadler's Wells at London Coliseum, 1968, with Patricia Kern, conductor Mario Bernardi; Metropolitan, New York, 1974, with Marilyn Horne.

Mustafa, Bey of Algiers Bass
 Elvira, his wife Soprano
 Zulma, her confidante Contralto
 Haly, in the service of the Bey Bass
 Lindoro, an Italian in love with Isabella Tenor Isabella Contralto
 Taddeo, an old Italian Baritone

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Rossini's L'Italiana in Algeri is commedia dell'arte set to music. The plot and the words are less those of a well-constructed play, rather the situations used by the actors of the commedia dell'arte for their free invention. The nearest parallel to it is the Edwardian music hall, where the comedian relied very largely on 'gags' to hold his audience's attention. Improvisation was out of the question the moment music entered into the partnership, but the plot provides plenty of evidence as to its origin.

On its first performance, the opera was immediately successful. 'When Rossini wrote L'Italiana', notes Stendhal, 'his youthful genius was bursting into flower.' And the brilliant character of the work shows clearly the spirit, optimism, and geniality of youth (Rossini was only twenty-one at the time). The whole work was written in twenty-seven days.

Act I. The overture, one of the composer's most famous, begins with a strong feeling of latent drama, but this soon gives way to an enchanting allegro. The interplay of the woodwind, and in fact the writing for this section of the orchestra throughout the opera, is particularly attractive.

¹ New Yorker, 6 June 1983, repr. Musical Events, New York, 1987.

The palace of the Bey of Algiers. A chorus of the eunuchs of the harem laments the sad lot of women, while Elvira, the Bey's wife, assisted by her confidante, Zulma, bemoans her own tragedy – her husband no longer loves her. Enter the Bey in person. With a multitude of roulades he inveighs against the arrogance of women, and, the moment Elvira speaks directly to him, protests that his eardrums are broken. A lively ensemble ensues (it is a quartet, Haly, the captain of the Bey's corsairs, having joined the family quarrel), and at its end Haly is told by the Bey that he must go off and find him an Italian wife – nothing else will satisfy him.

The Bey has in his service an Italian slave, by name Lindoro. In a slow cavatina, 'Languir per una bella', he laments the absence of his beloved. It is a particularly attractive example of Rossini's highly decorated lyric style, and is followed by a vigorous cabaletta, no less full of coloratura and with its high Cs, B naturals, and B flats calculated to try the technique of any but the most agile of tenors. The Bey asks Lindoro whether he would like to get married. Not unless he was in love, is Lindoro's reply. A charming duet ensues between the two. The subject is marriage, with particular reference to the qualifications necessary in the prospective partner.

Scene ii. Isabella, who has been roaming the seas in search of her lost lover Lindoro, is involved in a shipwreck, conveniently on the shore of Algeria. Haly's men exclaim on the beauty of the women, and on Mustafa's good fortune in securing so many additions to his harem. 'Cruda sorte!' (Cruel fate) sings Isabella; she is in this danger only because of her faithfulness to Lindoro – but the cabaletta leaves us in no doubt whatsoever as to her ability to look after herself. All are made prisoner, and Haly is overjoyed to find that Isabella and Taddeo, an ageing and comic admirer she has brought with her for company on the voyage, are indeed Italians; they shall go to the Bey. Left alone with Taddeo, Isabella seems less dismayed than he at the indication that she is destined for the Bey's Seraglio. They argue about the situation in their duet, 'Ai capricci della sorte', but all is made up in a charming allegro vivace, in which they agree that the status of uncle and niece (which they have decided shall be their official relationship) has its advantages.

At the palace, Elvira and Zulma reason with Lindoro because he seems disinclined to marry the former, even though the Bey has offered him freedom (and money) if he will take her off his hands. Haly brings the news of Isabella's capture, and the Bey rejoices at his good fortune in an aria whose coloratura difficulties rival those of a Handel bass: 'Già d'insolito ardore'. After he has gone, Elvira admits she still loves her inconstant husband, but Lindoro comforts her: if she comes to Italy with him, she will find husbands and lovers as she pleases.

The finale begins with the eunuchs singing the praises of 'Mustafa the scourge of women, who changes them from tigresses to lambs'. Isabella is led in and cannot contain her amusement at the sight of Mustafa; her tune is irresistibly comic, and the duet as she makes up to the bemused Mustafa very funny. Taddeo pushes himself forward: is he not her uncle? A quartet follows between Isabella, Taddeo, Haly, and Mustafa, and at its end, Elvira, Zulma, and Lindoro enter the hall. Isabella and Lindoro recognise each other, and the quartet becomes a septet, dominated by a florid figure for Lindoro and Mustafa. Isabella voices objections when she discovers that Elvira is the Bey's wife whom he is discarding, and the complications mount until the end of the act.

Act II. The eunuchs comment on Mustafa's lovelorn condition. Mustafa sends his wife and her slave to tell the Italian girl he wishes to drink coffee with her later. Isabella, alone with Lindoro, reproaches him because of his forthcoming marriage to Elvira, but eventually accepts his protestations of unchanging affection for herself, and together they plan an escape, the prospect of which spurs Lindoro to an even more exuberant expression of devotion than before. Mustafa tells Taddeo that he will make him, in honour of his niece, Grand Kaimakan of Algeria. The chorus sing his praises, and Taddeo follows with an amusing aria, 'Ho un gran peso sulla testa'.

Isabella is in front of her looking-glass, finishing dressing. Elvira and Zulma come to deliver the Bey's message, and Isabella orders coffee for three from her slave, Lindoro, saying she would not dream of excluding the Bey's wife from the party. She will in fact, as woman to woman, give her a much needed lesson in man-management. Sitting in front of her looking-glass and watched from behind by Lindoro, Haly and Mustafa, she sings 'Per lui, che adoro', which is in effect an aria with comments and later accompaniment from the three men. Mustafa cannot wait to be alone with Isabella. At the beginning of the quintet, he makes formal and florid presentation to Isabella of Taddeo, Grand Kaimakan; this over, he sets about getting rid of the men, but with little success. Coffee comes in, and, after a moment, so does Elvira, and what has begun as a quartet becomes a quintet. Mustafa loses his temper and the ensemble ends in a crescendo of pandemonium.

Haly is alone. In a pleasantly straightforward aria, 'Le femmine d'Italia', he praises the wiles of Italian women and the way in which they insinuate themselves into men's affections. No sooner has he left than Taddeo and Lindoro appear, the former telling the latter in confidence that he loves Isabella, who he once thought loved a certain Lindoro, but who he finds loves him (Taddeo) truly after all. Lindoro is suitably impressed by the announcement, but privately finds the time to express pleasure that his rival should be so obviously insignificant. As Mustafa comes in, Lindoro whispers to his compatriot to back him up in the plan he is about to put forward. Mustafa seems disposed to complain of the treatment he has received at Isabella's hands, but he is reassured, and told she waits only until he joins that ancient and noble Italian order of the 'Pappatacci' (literally 'eat and be silent', but implying the convenience of a complaisant husband). Mustafa, who is quite unaware of the double entendre, consents to be enrolled, and the trio which ensues, known as the trio of the 'Pappatacci', once sent the public raving with delight. Lindoro has a flowing, high tune and he is supported by the two lower voices to make a very comic effect. Haly meanwhile is suspicious: why, he asks Zulma, does Isabella give too much to drink to the eunuchs and the Moors? For fun, she tells him – and to make it into a true holiday.

In preparation for the ceremony to enrol Mustafa in the glorious ranks, Isabella gathers together all the Italians in the Bey's service and appeals to their patriotism to help her carry out her plans, which include escape for them all during the course of the initiation ceremony. They greet her in a chorus, and she sings her recitative ('Amici, in ogni evento') and rondo ('Pensa alla patria'), taking the chance of having a dig at Taddeo and a kind word for Lindoro. This is bravura writing on a big scale, and contains in its opening section one of Rossini's few overt references to patriotism (that is to say, before the time of Guillaume Tell).

Announced by Lindoro, the 'Pappatacci' chorus comes on with horns blowing. Mustafa, prompted by Isabella, swears to obey all the rules of the order, which he then repeats after Taddeo; what it amounts to is that the duty of the model husband is to eat and sleep soundly – nothing else. Isabella and Lindoro indulge in a display of affection as a 'test' for Mustafa – he fails, but is prompted by Taddeo, and swears he will not offend against the rules again. A chorus of European slaves can be heard from outside, where the boat Isabella has chartered to take them all home is waiting in full sight of the Bey's palace. Isabella and Lindoro prepare to go on board, and Mustafa treats it all as part of his initiation, although Taddeo is worried at the turn events are taking. In an allegro, Mustafa discovers his mistake through the intervention of Elvira, Zulma, and Haly, who convince him he has been hoodwinked. He turns to Elvira as his true love – Italians were only a passing fancy. Isabella and her party are still within sight of the palace, and the opera ends with mutual congratulations from both parties, escapers and erstwhile captors. H.

IL TURCO IN ITALIA

The Turk in Italy

Opera in two (now customarily three) acts, libretto by Felice Romani. Première, la Scala, Milan, 14 August 1814. First performed King's Theatre, London, 1821, with Giuseppina and Giuseppe Ronzi de Begnis (their London débuts); New York, 1826; Edinburgh, 1827. In Italy, not given between 1855 and its revival at the Teatro Eliseo, Rome, in 1950, with Callas, Valletti, Stabile, Bruscantini, conductor Gavazzeni; la Scala, 1955, with virtually the same cast; Edinburgh Festival, 1957, by Piccola Scala; Glyndebourne, 1970, with Sciutti, Benelli, Roux, Montarsolo, conductor Pritchard.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Selim, the Turk | Bass |
| Fiorilla, a young Neapolitan wife | Soprano |
| Geronio, her husband | Bass |
| Narciso, in love with Fiorilla | Tenor |
| Zaida, a Turk | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Albazar, a Turk | Tenor |
| Prosdócimo, a poet | Baritone |

Place: In and Around Naples

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

One of Rossini's most closely worked comedies, this was the victim of adverse circumstances from the time of its relative failure in Milan (because the public thought it was being fobbed off with a number of self-borrowings), through corrupt editions from as early as 1820, until it was triumphantly vindicated in 1950 when revived in Luchino Visconti's highly successful production headed by Maria Callas.

Act I. After a witty and typical overture, of which more than one version exists, the first scene shows a gipsy encampment on the outskirts of Naples. Members of the crowd are having their fortunes told, and among the most active fortune-tellers are two runaway Turks, Zaida and Albazar by name. Zaida is unhappy: a slave in Turkey, she loved her master and despairs of ever seeing him again.

To the camp in search of inspiration comes Prosdocimo, a poet, ordered by his patron to produce a stage comedy. He is unable to believe that yet another piece on the theme of flirtatious wife and ridiculous husband – as are in real life Donna Fiorilla and Don Geronio – would be found acceptable. Just then, none other than Don Geronio appears, looking for a gipsy to read his palm and advise him how to cope with his high-mettled wife. It appears that the stars are not propitious, and he is thoroughly disgruntled at the gipsy's predictions. The scene concludes (although this section is often omitted) with the questioning of Zaida by Prosdocimo. She reveals that she was driven away from her master, Selim Damelec of Erzerum, by the intrigues of her rivals, and Prosdocimo comforts her with the news that a Turkish Pasha is due to sail into Naples at any moment; perhaps he would intercede for her with her master.

The harbourside. Donna Fiorilla is introduced in a bravura aria ('Non si dà follia maggiore') on the agreeable complications of her love life; she turns her attention to a ship flying the Turkish flag which nears the quayside. Announced in the minor, as befits a late eighteenth- or early nineteenth-century musical Turk, Selim's cavatina ('Bella Italia') is in the florid style Rossini favoured for his comic basses. Fiorilla is obviously ripe for a flirtation, and Selim abruptly diverts his praises from the country to its inhabitants, particularly those of the female sex. Fiorilla joins in the concluding phrases of the aria, there is an exchange of compliments, and the scene ends with a quick duet for her and Selim.

As well as an ageing husband, Fiorilla is blessed with a young lover, Narciso, and he gives vent to his feelings in an aria ('Un vago semblante di gioia'). But the conclusion of the scene in the harbour is dominated by the Pirandellian Prosdocimo, who sees in the way events are shaping a perfect theme for his comedy. As he reflects on the subject – a stupid husband, a flighty wife, a lover supplanted by a handsome and amorous Turk; what more can one ask for? – he is overheard by the husband and the lover he refers to, and the soliloquy becomes a trio. To the ingredients he mentions, they wish to add another, a poet quickened by immediate physical chastisement, but Prosdocimo eludes them.

An apartment in Fiorilla's house. Fiorilla is entertaining Selim to coffee – a pastime, judging from this opera and L'Italiana, that librettists seem to have thought particularly suitable when Italian women flirt with Turks. When he protests his devotion, she makes some sly remarks about the hundred women of his harem, and the fine quartet (which in modern versions often ends Act I) begins with their amorous fencing. When Geronio enters, Selim flies at him in a passion, but Fiorilla turns the whole incident in her favour, has Geronio paying compliments to Selim, and only Narciso is put out by her handling of events. The quartet bubbles along, and before it is over Selim has managed to make an assignation with Fiorilla for that night at the harbour.

The penultimate scene of Act I (or, usually, the first of Act II) starts in Geronio's house. He is full of lamentation about his marriage to someone so much younger than himself, someone moreover he cannot control. Firmness and decision are necessary, suggests Prosdocimo, but, alone with Fiorilla, Geronio has no sort of success with the new formula. At the start of their duet ('Per piacere alla Signora, che ho da far') he is already apologetic, by the middle she is feigning love and (in a graphic musical phrase) imitating weeping, and telling him that it is he who has caused her such sorrow; by the end he is eating out of her hand.

The finale moves to the gipsy quarter, to which comes Selim to find out if the omens are good for his planned elopement with Fiorilla. Zaida recognises him and a reconciliation seems likely, much to the discomfiture of Prosdocimo, since this is the last turn he wants events to take if his story is to come up to scratch. The arrival of Narciso in obvious distress does little to rectify the situation, but the appearance of an apparently lovelorn Fiorilla is a distinct improvement – better still, she is pursued by her irate husband. As Fiorilla and Zaida confront one another, all is ready for an ensemble of misunderstanding. The fight of the two women finally convinces Prosdocimo that nature has imitated art to perfection: he could not wish for a better finale.

Il Turco in Italia (Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, 1995, directors and designers Karl-Ernst and Ursel Herrmann).
José Van Dam as Selim, Tiziana Fabbricini as Fiorilla.

Act II (Act III more often). Prosdocimo, intent on the development of his plot, urges Geronio to catch Fiorilla and Selim together that night and so put an end to the intrigue. No sooner has the poet left than Selim appears, proposing a solution that would resolve the present difficulties: why should Geronio not follow Turkish custom and sell him Fiorilla – after six years of marriage to one woman he must be a bit tired of her! Their duet, with its extended crescendo in the final section, is one of Rossini's masterpieces and the equal of that for Dandini and Don Magnifico in Cenerentola.

Fiorilla has an aria with chorus of a delicacy that can only be described as Mozartian ('Se il zefiro si posa'), after which she proclaims her intention of worsting anyone who dares set herself up as a rival. When she is joined by Zaida, Selim is bidden to choose between them, but before he can make up his mind, Zaida renounces a claim that she does not want to press in such circumstances. The field is apparently free for a clearing up of misunderstandings between Fiorilla and Selim, and their duet ('Credete alle femmine') with its florid writing is a moment of near-seriousness. It is left to Prosdocimo to re-introduce the note of comedy – at a masked ball planned for that evening Selim is to carry off Fiorilla, he tells Geronio and Narciso. Why should Zaida not dress up as Fiorilla, and Geronio disguise himself as Selim? The plot thickens when Narciso, beside himself with unhappiness, decides to take advantage of the scheme and appear as a third Selim.

At the ball, a festal chorus and a waltz set the scene for the comedy of errors which is worked out in a splendid quintet ('Oh guardate, che accidente, non conosco più mia moglie'). All the conspirators express consternation about their respective futures; the early part of the ensemble, partly unaccompanied, brings to mind nothing so much as Così fan tutte, but the allegro is full of high spirits that are pure Rossini – he even, at one point, adds a trumpet to the voices for good measure.

The upshot is that Fiorilla's escapade is unmasked, and in an aria she laments her disgrace and the loss at one and the same time of honour, husband and peace of mind. In the end, all is well; Selim bids farewell to Italy in order to return to Turkey with Zaida; Fiorilla remains 'faithful' to Geronio; Narciso decides to profit from the examples before him; and Prosdócimo has the ending for his play. All join in the moral: 'Restate contenti, felici vivete'. H.

ELISABETTA, REGINA D'INGHILTERRA

Elizabeth, Queen of England

Opera in two acts, libretto by Giovanni Schmidt. Première at San Carlo, Naples, 4 October 1815, with Isabella Colbran, Dardanelli, Nozzari, Garcia the elder. First performed Dresden, 1818; London, 1818; Paris, 1822. Revived by Radio Italiana for Coronation of Queen Elizabeth II, 1953, with Maria Vitale, Lina Pagliughi, Campora, Pirino. No stage performance can be traced from 1841 to 1968, when the opera was produced at the Camden Festival, London. Revived Palermo, 1971 (and Edinburgh Festival, 1972), with Leyla Gencer; 1975 at Aix Festival with Caballé, Masterson, Gösta Winbergh, Benelli.

Elisabetta (Elizabeth) I, *Queen of England*Soprano
The Earl of Leicester, *Commander of the army*Tenor
Matilda, his secret wife.....Soprano
The Duke of NorfolkTenor
Enrico (Henry), Matilda's brother.....Mezzo-Soprano
Guglielmo (Fitzwilliam),
 Captain of the Royal Guard..... Tenor

Courtiers, Soldiers and People

Place: London

Time: Late Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

After his successes in the North of Italy, Rossini was in 1815 engaged by the famous impresario

Domenico Barbaia to work for the San Carlo in Naples.¹ Barbaia, who had recently rebuilt the theatre after it had burnt down and was in high favour with King Ferdinand, is one of the most extraordinary figures in the history of opera. He started life as a waiter, was the first to think of mixing whipped cream with coffee or chocolate, speculated in army contracts during the Napoleonic Wars, and made a fortune at the gambling rooms in Milan. He is traditionally supposed to have been illiterate, but there is no doubt as to his brilliant success as an impresario – no contradiction involved, maybe, either.

The libretto of Rossini's first opera for Barbaia was adapted from a contemporary play, which had been taken from an English novel called The Recess written by a certain Sophia Lee in 1785. Rossini wrote it for Isabella Colbran, Barbaia's mistress and later to become the composer's wife. It has two noteworthy musico-historical features: for the first time Rossini gave his recitatives orchestral accompaniment throughout, and, also for the first time, he wrote out all the vocal ornaments in full – he had heard the castrato Velluti indulge in such prodigality of ornamentation in Aureliano in Palmira that he became alarmed at what a less musical singer might do. Rossini was writing for a new audience and he would leave nothing to chance in his efforts to conquer it.

Act I. For the overture Rossini borrowed from his own less successful opera Aureliano, a trick he was to repeat less than two years later when he used exactly the same piece of music for Il Barbiere di Siviglia, the one overture thus doing duty for three operas.

Leicester's military triumph in Scotland is being celebrated at the Palace of Whitehall in London, where Norfolk makes no attempt to hide his jealousy. The Courtiers salute the Queen, who greets them in dignified (and florid) music and gives vent to her feelings of joy in music hardly distinguishable from 'To sono docile' (Barbiere) – there are a few, but a very few, differences between the two arias, written only eighteen months apart. Leicester is announced, proclaims the defeat of the Scots and is welcomed by the Queen, to the chagrin of Norfolk. Leicester says he has brought the sons of the nobility as hostages from Scotland, but, in an aside, cannot hide his surprise at seeing among them, disguised as a boy, his secretly married wife, Matilda. The Queen takes them all into her service as pages. Alone, Leicester reproaches Matilda with her foolhardy behaviour – as a relation of Mary, Queen of Scots, she is in great danger – in a duet ('Incauta, che festi?'), an immediate success at the première according to Stendhal. Matilda, who has revealed her knowledge of Elizabeth's love for Leicester, is left with her brother Henry, one of the hostages, to bewail her ill fortune in a mellifluous aria ('Sento un intorna voce').

¹ Between 1815 and 1822, Rossini wrote nine serious operas and one comic for Barbaia. Andrew Porter, in an article for the Edinburgh Festival in 1972, has suggested that it was only later in Paris that the composer had his chance to realise to the full the ideals he had adumbrated in the Neapolitan operas of 1815–22.

The false Norfolk, under the pledge of friendship, learns from Leicester the secret of his marriage. Norfolk hastens to tell the news to the Queen, who herself has planned to marry Leicester and whose reaction to the news is expressed with a mixture of fury and dignity in the duet for her and Norfolk ('Perchè mai, destin crudele'). Its vigorous quick section foreshadows Guillaume Tell or even early Verdi.

In a few bars before the finale begins, Elizabeth orders Fitzwilliam, who already suspects Norfolk's perfidy, to have the guard stand by and sends for Leicester and the Scottish hostages. Matilda she quickly recognises from her obviously anxious manner, and she proceeds to confront Leicester as her principal adviser and the hero of the moment. When she offers to make him her Consort, he is thrown into complete confusion and tries to refuse. The Queen flies into a passion, denounces the unhappy pair and summons the guard to arrest them. The finale, described by Stendhal as magnificent, is an impressive piece, at one moment full of sound and fury, at the next reminiscent of Mozart.

Act II. Elizabeth sends for Matilda and demands, in what is perhaps the finest scene of the opera, that she sign a paper renouncing all claim to Leicester in return for the safety of her husband and her brother ('Pensa che sol per poco sospendo l'ira mia'). Stendhal describes at some length the great success in this scene of Colbran for whom (or for her Royalist connections) he usually reserves little but scorn. Bellini may well have taken the duet, particularly its slow second section, as a model for his famous 'Mira, o Norma'. Enter Leicester to read the document, to defy the Queen by tearing it up, and to turn the splendid duet into a no less notable trio. They are led off under arrest, but the Queen in a moment of revulsion and understanding orders the banishment of the false Norfolk, whose duplicity she has now seen through.

Outside the Tower of London, people lament the impending fate of Leicester, and there follows a scene in which Norfolk, now under sentence of exile, tries, in an aria with chorus, to act the part of rabble-raiser.

An evocative prelude leads us to a dungeon in the Tower, where Leicester laments his fate. Flute and cor anglais continue the tale of his uneasy, half-voiced dreams. The false Norfolk brings him promises of help; and their florid duet, 'Deh, scusa i trasporti', is something of a rarity, an extended movement for two tenors. To the prison comes the Queen, anxious to see her favourite before his execution. Norfolk has meanwhile concealed himself, and Matilda and Henry have managed to insinuate themselves into the dungeon. Leicester hears that it was Norfolk who accused him, the Queen comes to understand the extent of Norfolk's treachery, and Norfolk himself draws his dagger and is about to stab the Queen when Matilda throws herself in between them.

In the splendid and (Stendhal tells us) in its day much admired finale, the Queen denounces Norfolk and condemns him to death, then, in a slow and increasingly decorated section in triple time ('Bell'alme generose'),¹ turns to Matilda and Leicester and, in gratitude for their loyalty, grants them their freedom. The voices of the people pleading Leicester's cause can be heard from outside, Elizabeth shows them their liberated hero, and the opera comes to an end with roudades from the Queen, who is acclaimed by the crowd. H.

IL BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA

The Barber of Seville

Opera in two acts, text by Sterbini founded on Beaumarchais's play. Première at Teatro Argentina, Rome, 20 February 1816, with Giorgi-Righetti, Manuel Garcia, Zamboni, Vitaneli, Botticelli, conductor Rossini (as Almaviva, ossia L'Inutile Precauzione).

Count Almaviva Tenor
 Doctor Bartolo Baritone
 Don Basilio, a singing teacher Bass
 Figaro, a barber Baritone

¹ Familiar to English ballet audiences as Lisa's flute tune in La Fille Mal Gardée.

Fiorello, servant to the Count.....Bass
 Ambrogio, servant to the doctorBass
 Rosina, Dr Bartolo's wardMezzo-Soprano
 Berta, Rosina's governessSoprano
 Notary, Constable, Musicians, Soldiers

Place: Seville, Spain

Time: Seventeenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

The contract for Il barbiere was signed a mere two months before the first night, but there can be no doubt that Beaumarchais's play, already the subject of a highly successful opera by the composer Paisiello, had been in Rossini's mind for some time. He took pains to extol the virtues of Paisiello's score, but circumstances, including stage mishaps and disruptions by followers of Paisiello, conspired to make the new opera's première into a nightmare fiasco.

The subsequent history of what was to become one of opera's most enduring successes is full of changes and second thoughts. Rossini allowed the tenor's extended aria, which originally preceded the dénouement, first to be taken over by Rosina and finally to become the finale of La Cenerentola; the mezzo-soprano role of Rosina came often to be transposed for soprano, usually with high-flying decoration; baritones cast as Dr Bartolo at one time preferred to sing 'Manca un foglio', a straightforward aria by Pietro Romani, instead of the taxing but much superior 'A un dottor della mia sorte'; and an overture written for the earlier Aureliano in Palmira (and therefore thematically irrelevant to The Barber) was placed by the composer at the start of the score where it is paradoxically considered wholly apt to the comedy which follows.

Yet few Italian operatic comedies rival The Barber in popularity and it has been played in every operatic centre since its première, its tunes adapted for every conceivable musical combination, its wit, timing and invention admired by every composer from Beethoven to Richard Strauss and for that matter by every audience as well.

Act I. A square in which stands Dr Bartolo's house. Count Almaviva has fallen in love with Rosina, Dr Bartolo's ward, and his servant Fiorello leads a band of musicians as with grace but no apparent effect he serenades his beloved: 'Ecco ridente in cielo'. He pays off the musicians and tells them to leave quietly, but his generosity provokes a hubbub. From outside the square, the sound of Figaro's insistent self-advertisement starts to intrude and he dances in, singing the famous bravura air, 'Largo al factotum della città', a patter song without equal in the baritone repertory. Figaro turns out to be Dr Bartolo's barber and immediately starts plotting with the Count to bring about an introduction to Rosina.

Il barbiere di Siviglia (Lyric Opera of Chicago, 1963, director Riccardo Moresco). Alfredo Kraus as Count Almaviva, Mario Zanasi as Figaro.

Bartolo keeps a strict watch on his ward, whom he plans himself to marry, but Rosina has noticed her unidentified suitor, and now contrives to drop from her balcony a letter asking his name. In an aria of the utmost refinement ('Se il mio nome') he somewhat disingenuously tells her it is Lindoro. The Count and Figaro improvise the next move in a brilliantly elegant duet ('All'idea di quel metallo'): the Count will disguise himself as a soldier newly arrived and demanding to be billeted on Dr Bartolo, who will not be able to refuse him. The ruse cannot fail!

A room in Dr Bartolo's house. Rosina sings an aria – once recorded by any high soprano, now by every mezzo – suggesting that she is all sweetness and light until crossed, when she becomes the very devil: 'Una voce poco fa'. Meanwhile, Dr Bartolo makes known to Don Basilio his suspicions about Count Almaviva – Rosina's unknown lover, he calls him. In order to run him out of town Basilio advocates a campaign of rumour and intrigue which may start as a gentle breeze but will surely swell to roar like a cannon: 'La calunnia'. When they've gone, Figaro contrives to tell Rosina his cousin Lindoro is madly in love with her. She has a note already prepared: 'Dunque io son, tu non m'inganni?' Bartolo comes in to tax her, crossly but accurately, with having dropped a letter from the balcony, then, refusing to accept any excuse, reads her a lecture on the futility of trying to deceive him. 'A un dottor della mia sorte' is a buffo patter song on the grandest scale.

To gain admittance to Bartolo's house, the Count, who has followed Figaro's suggestion and disguised himself as a soldier, now tries to barge his way in, claiming the right to be billeted there. He reveals himself to Rosina, then refuses to recognise the waiver which Bartolo shows him. Berta and Don Basilio add their voices to the din, which attracts Figaro. Vigorous knocking at the outside door heralds the appearance of the police, to whom all at breakneck speed give what rapidly becomes a hilariously contradictory explanation of events. The officer in charge is about to arrest the Count when that worthy shows him a piece of paper. He springs to attention. Dr Bartolo observes events, thunderstruck and motionless, and all in an irresistibly comic sextet comment staccato on his plight before the act ends in rushing scales and general pandemonium.

Act II. A room in Dr Bartolo's house. Dr Bartolo has begun to suspect that the drunken soldier was an emissary of Count Almaviva's, but his rêverie is interrupted by the arrival of a music teacher, ostensibly sent by the sick Don Basilio to give Rosina her music lesson. Nothing seems to divert the newcomer from his obsequious and incessantly reiterated greeting of 'Pace e gioia sia con voi' until Dr Bartolo explodes with irritation and brings him to the point. 'Don Alonso' succeeds in winning his confidence by producing Rosina's letter to the Count and offering to persuade the girl that it was given him by a mistress of the Count's. The lesson – a grand scena in two parts: 'Contro un cor' and 'Cara immagine' – proceeds smoothly and at its end, Dr Bartolo demonstrates how much better music was in his day, only to be interrupted by the arrival of Figaro. He won't be shaved today, protests Bartolo, but Figaro declines to be put off and creates a diversion during whose course he obtains the key of the balcony and the disguised Count and Rosina contrive a word together.

At that moment, Basilio puts in an appearance, and it is all Figaro and the Count can do to persuade him (with the aid of a purse) to admit that he has a fever and should be home in bed. 'Buona sera, mio signore' begins the delightful ensemble as they – even including Dr Bartolo – join in removing the intruder, after which Figaro prepares to shave the doctor while the Count and Rosina plan their elopement. The planning turns out to be insufficiently surreptitious, Dr Bartolo gets wind of the whole affair, catches the plotters and sends them all packing.

Berta in an aria mocks the old for wanting to marry the young, the young for wanting to get married at all, herself for exhibiting the same symptoms as everybody else, after which Bartolo manages, with the aid of the letter Almaviva felt obliged as a pledge of good faith to give him, to excite Rosina's jealousy. In her pique, she discloses the plan for the elopement and agrees to marry her guardian.

A storm blows up – a Rossinian musical speciality – and as the last drops of rain fall Figaro and the Count make their appearance. The lovers are reconciled and Figaro joins as they celebrate in a delightful trio, 'Ah qual colpo', before Figaro discovers that the escape-ladder is gone and their plot rumbled. Still, all is far from lost. When the notary appears with Don Basilio, he is easily persuaded to perform – and Don Basilio to witness – the marriage of the young couple rather than Dr Bartolo's with his ward, and even Dr Bartolo is reconciled to the loss of Rosina and her dowry by a gift from the Count of an equal sum. The most famous of Italian comic operas comes to an end with an envoi, led by Figaro, taken up by Rosina and the Count, and celebrating the triumph of love over all obstacles.

OTELLO

Opera in three acts, text by Francesco Maria Berio. Première Naples, 4 December 1816.

| | |
|---|---------|
| Otello, a Moor in service with the Venetian Army | Tenor |
| Desdemona, daughter of Elmiro | Soprano |
| Iago, Otello's ensign | Tenor |
| The Doge of Venice | Tenor |
| Rodrigo, the Doge's son | Tenor |
| Emilia, Iago's wife, Desdemona's companion | Soprano |
| Elmiro, a Venetian Senator | Bass |
| Lucio, a Venetian | Tenor |
| A Gondolier | Tenor |
| Venetian Senators, Populace | |

Place: Venice

Time: End of the Fifteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Otello is Rossini's nineteenth opera, written when he was twenty-six, between The Barber of Seville and La Cenerentola, with neither of which comedies can this opera seria be seen superficially to have much in common. Otello was written for Naples, where Rossini arrived nearly two years before. One of the features of the company, apart from its magnificent orchestra, was the very high quality of the tenors at its disposal, particularly Andrea Nozzari, who was the original Otello, and Giovanni David, the Rodrigo. Each was proficient in florid music, David the higher of the two, and Barbaia, the impresario, had in addition an excellent local tenor for Iago. For all three, Rossini wrote music of the utmost virtuosity.

Act I. The overture is bright and breezy with little hint of tragedy. Doge, Senators and populace of Venice wait for the victorious Otello to return from successful battle with the Turks. He disembarks to the sound of a march, lays his trophies at the Doge's feet and is himself crowned with a laurel wreath. Iago and the Doge's son Rodrigo meanwhile plot in the background against Otello, who confesses in an aside that he will not be happy until love crowns his successes (aria: 'Ah! sì, per voi già sento'). Rodrigo can get from Elmiro no clue as to why Desdemona, whom he loves, is so patently unhappy, but, left alone, he and Iago agree concerted action against Otello (duet: 'No, non temer').

Desdemona at home takes no comfort from Emilia's attempts to reassure her as to Otello's love, which she has started to doubt. Her father hates him and she fears he may have been alienated by a piece of bad luck: a love letter she sent him together with a lock of hair was intercepted by her father, who took it to be for Rodrigo, an error she mistakenly encouraged for the sake of domestic peace. If Otello has got wind of it, it would explain his coolness (Duet: 'Vorrei, che il tuo pensiero').

Perceiving the approach of Iago, who once aspired to marry Desdemona and whom, as he knows, she despises, they leave, and Iago and Rodrigo are free to hear Elmiro agree to give Rodrigo the hand of Desdemona. Elmiro plans to bring down Otello and believes a family alliance with the Doge's son would facilitate his scheme. Desdemona, on the other hand, hearing her father has plans for her betrothal, hopes inwardly that Otello's exploits have softened his hostility and waits in some trepidation for the arrival of the man her father has chosen. The finale starts as Elmiro introduces Rodrigo as the prospective bridegroom, followed by Rodrigo's agitation and Desdemona's confusion, which together produce a trio of strong lyrical beauty. Matters come to a head with the arrival of a furious Otello, demanding from Elmiro Desdemona's hand and calling on her to reaffirm her love. All lament the latest turn of events, and Rodrigo and Elmiro challenge Otello for what they see as his insolence. A fine musical edifice ends as Elmiro drags Desdemona away and she looks back fondly at Otello.

Act II. To Desdemona alone in her garden comes Rodrigo to be told he is the cause of her unhappiness. He offers to do anything in his power to allay her sadness and is told 'Placate my father! Otello is my husband!' His despair is expressed in a graceful aria: 'Ah, come mai non senti'. Desdemona is still uncertain of Otello's love and as they leave Emilia fails to reassure her.

Otello enters in despair. His honour and his glory have been sacrificed and Desdemona is still not his. Iago sees his chance, hands him Desdemona's letter which, since Otello has no idea it was meant in the first place for him, produces an outburst of fury. Otello's vengeance duet is highly effective, even in its rhythmic thrust anticipating Verdi's 'Si, vendetta!' of thirty-three years later.

Though Rodrigo now enters in conciliatory mood it is not long before a quarrel between him and the intransigent Otello seems about to end in a duel, when the arrival of Desdemona turns impressive duet to mellifluous trio, and the departure of the duellists leaves her fainting on the ground. Emilia brings her round and she hears from a group of women that Otello has survived the duel. The Finale is mainly concerned with the fury of Elmiro at the course of events, and he rails against Desdemona's disloyalty; his love has turned to hatred and scorn.

Act III. Otello has been banished and Desdemona shares her misery with Emilia. As they sit, they hear a gondolier singing mournfully in the distance, and his song reminds Desdemona of a friend now dead. She sings sadly and beautifully a song of willow: 'Assisa a piè d'un salice'. Harp features prominently in prelude and accompaniment, and a short prayer rounds off the scene as Desdemona prepares for bed. Otello makes his entrance; their duet has no note of tenderness, only force and resignation, and he stabs her as a party arrives to press for reconciliation – the Doge will pardon Otello, Elmiro bless his marriage, and Rodrigo proffer friendship. But it is too late: Otello has been duped, and his only refuge is death and the hope of meeting his beloved in a better life.

Rossini's Otello is an opera seria of the early nineteenth century, not a work, like Verdi's, consciously bringing the essence of Shakespeare to the lyric stage. Approached in that spirit, it has great riches to offer, not only in the beauties of the last act, which is incidentally the shortest, but in the virtuoso possibilities of the tenor roles. Verdi's opera may have supplanted it to a great extent in public favour, but it does not deserve to be forgotten. H.

LA CENERENTOLA

Cinderella

Opera in two acts, text by Jacopo Ferretti (founded on Etienne's French libretto for Isouard's Cendrillon, 1810). Première at the Teatro Valle, Rome, 25 January 1817, with Giorgi-Righetti in the title role. First performed in London, Haymarket Theatre, 1820 (in Italian); New York, 1826 (in Italian); Covent Garden, 1830 (in English), with Paton. Revived Pesaro, 1920, with Fanny Anitua; Rome, 1920; Paris, 1929, with Supervia, Ederle, Bettoni; Vienna, 1930, with Kern, von Pataky; Berlin, 1931, with Schoene, Hüsche, Kandl; Florence Festival, 1933, with Supervia, conductor Serafin; Covent Garden, 1934, with Supervia, Dino Borgioli, Ghirardini, Pinza, conductor Marinuzzi; la Scala, 1937, with Pederzini, conductor Marinuzzi; la Scala, 1946, with Barbieri, conductor Serafin; Glyndebourne, 1952, with de Gabarain, Oncina, Bruscantini, Ian Wallace, conductor Gui; Sadler's Wells, London, 1959, with Kern, conductor Balkwill; Covent Garden, 1990, with Anne Sofie von Otter.

Don Ramiro, Prince of Salerno.....Tenor
Dandini, his valet.....Bass
Don Magnifico, Baron of Mountflagon.....Buffo Bass
Clorinda } *his daughters*Soprano
Thisbe }Mezzo-Soprano
Angelina, known as Cenerentola, his step-daughterContralto
Alidoro, *a philosopher*Bass

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

La Cenerentola, like many other of this and other composers' operas, was written in a hurry, the libretto agreed upon (it is said) just before Christmas, the first night less than five weeks later. Its popularity nonetheless rivals that of The Barber itself.

Act I. Cenerentola is, of course, Cinderella, and after the curtain rises she is seen making coffee for her half-sisters, singing a pathetic little song the while. The friend and counsellor of the Prince, Alidoro, enters disguised as a beggar. The two sisters curtly dismiss him; Cenerentola pities him and offers him refreshment, to the intense annoyance of her sisters. The quarrel is interrupted by the entrance of the Prince's followers. Clorinda and Thisbe feel convinced that he must fall an easy victim to their charms. They go to make ready for the Prince, who arrives disguised as his valet, Dandini, to find Cenerentola alone. Cenerentola and the Prince fall in love at first sight and express their feelings in a love duet which has all the wit and melodiousness characteristic of its composer. The sisters clamour for Cenerentola's services. The Prince, left alone, does not know what to think of his charmer. His musings are interrupted by the arrival of Dandini (masquerading as the Prince).

While Dandini misquotes Latin to give himself an air, the voice of Cenerentola is heard begging the Baron to allow her to go to the ball. Neither the Baron nor her sisters will listen to her; the third daughter is dead, they tell the Prince, and Cenerentola is only a servant. They leave, but Alidoro, touched by the sweetness of her nature, promises to help Cenerentola.

The Prince's palace. The ball is in progress. The Baron has been appointed chief butler to the Prince and is busy tasting the wines. The disguised Prince has seen enough of Clorinda and Thisbe by this time to know that neither could make him happy. The girls, for their part, set about capturing the 'Prince', Dandini, and are not best pleased when the arrival of a distinguished but unknown lady is announced. The unknown, however, looks too much like their step-sister to arouse their alarm.

Act II. Clorinda and Thisbe are no longer on friendly terms, as each believes she has made a conquest of the Prince, but Dandini himself has fallen for Cenerentola and asks her to marry him. She refuses, confessing her love for his 'valet'. The Prince, overhearing, himself proposes to her. Cenerentola admits that she loves him, but before she consents to be his bride he must find out who she is. She gives him a bracelet which matches another she is wearing and departs.

The Baron asks Dandini whether it would be possible to speed up the wedding. Dandini asks, if he were to marry one of the Baron's daughters, how should she be treated? The Baron tells him: thirty lackeys always at hand; sixteen horses; a dozen dukes, a coach with six footmen and 'dinners with ices' always ready. Dandini thereupon confesses that he is but a valet, to the Baron's rage.

The Baron's house. Clorinda and Thisbe scowl at Cenerentola, who resembles the hateful stranger of the ball. A storm rages outside – brought about by the incantations of the philosopher, Alidoro. The coach carrying the Prince and Dandini is damaged and they seek refuge; the Baron orders Cenerentola to bring the best chair forward for the Prince. Cenerentola, trying to hide herself, puts her hands up to cover her face, and the Prince notices the bracelet, the companion of which he holds. All the knots are gradually unravelled. The Baron, Clorinda, and Thisbe, unable to understand, rudely order Cenerentola away. The Prince grows angry and threatens them with his displeasure. At the palace, Cenerentola in her famous rondo 'Nacqui all'affano e al pianto' forgives the insults and harsh treatment she has suffered. She intercedes on behalf of the Baron and his daughters, and all ends merrily. F.B.

La Cenerentola, like other Rossini operas, went through a period of comparative unpopularity, not least because of the florid nature of the vocal writing. The title role, like that of L'Italiana, is written for coloratura contralto, and though attempts have been made to arrange the music for a soprano (as has been done with Rosina), the opera really requires a low voice with phenomenal agility. The unmatched ensembles show a modern audience the stuff a comic opera was made of in the days when every singer was a master of the bravura coloratura style, and most of them brilliant actors and actresses as well. Nobody has surpassed Rossini in the surface brilliance of his comic invention. In Cenerentola, it is not the motives of the characters which matter – apart from the charming duet early in Act I, the love of Prince Ramiro for the heroine plays little part in the music – nor even primarily their reactions to their own and other people's motives, but the situations these motives get them into. And situations with Rossini lead not so much to arias as to ensembles. Rossini's ability to catch hold of the verbal rhythm of a chance phrase and turn it into music (e.g. the ensemble after Alidoro's announcement of Cenerentola's arrival at the ball), his dexterity with patter, his astonishing manipulation of the simplest material until it becomes a towering invention of quicksilver sound – these qualities are heard at their best in the quintet which begins 'Signore, una parola'; in the finale of Act I, which ends with the crescendo first heard in the overture; in the brilliantly comic duet of Dandini and Magnifico in Act II. The climax of the opera comes, not with the rondo at the end, fine though it is, but with the great E flat ensemble of stupefaction after the Prince and Dandini have taken refuge from the storm in the astonished Don Magnifico's house. This sextet is built up on a slow, staccato tune (marked maestoso: majestically) from which each singer in turn breaks away with a florid phrase, the others meanwhile keeping up the steady rhythm with a constant repetition of the tune and a maximum use of the words and particularly of the opportunities given by the rolled Italian 'r'. This is an ensemble to set beside the Barber's matchless 'fredda ed immobile' as high-water marks of comedy in music. H.

LA GAZZA LADRA

The Thieving Magpie

Opera in three acts, libretto by Gherardini. Première, la Scala, Milan, 31 May 1817, with Teresa Belloc. First performed London, King's Theatre, 1821, with Violante Camporese and Vestris in the cast; Covent Garden, 1830 (in English, as Ninetta; or The Maid of Palaiseau; music adapted by Bishop), with Mary Anne Paton; Covent Garden, 1847, with Grisi, Alboni, Mario, Tamburini; 1863, with Patti, Didiée, Neri-Baraldi, Faure, Ronconi; and 1883, with Patti, Scalchi, Frappoli, Cotogni; New York, 1830 (in French), 1833 (in Italian). Revived Pesaro, 1941, in new edition arranged by Zandonai with Lina Aimaro, conducted by Zandonai. Subsequently heard in this version in Rome, 1942; Wexford, 1959, with Mariella Adani, Janet Baker, conductor Pritchard; and at Florence, 1965. Première at Sadler's Wells, London, 1966, the score reconstructed from the manuscript in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, and new English version by Tom Hammond, with Catherine Wilson, Patricia Kern, conductor Balkwill.

Fabrizio Vingradito, a rich farmer Bass
 Lucia, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
 Giannetto, his son, a soldier Tenor
 Ninetta, a servant in their house Soprano
 Fernando Villabella, Ninetta's father, a soldier Baritone
 Gottardo, the village mayor Bass
 Pippo, a young peasant in Fabrizio's service ... Contralto
 Isaac, a wandering pedlar Tenor
 Antonio, the jailer Tenor
 Giorgio, the mayor's servant Bass
 Ernesto, friend of Fernando, a soldier Bass
 A Magpie Dancer
 An Usher, Armed Men, Villagers, Fabrizio's
 Employees

Place: A Large Village not far from Paris
Running Time: 3 hours 20 minutes

Immediately after the success of La Cenerentola in Rome in January 1817, Rossini went via Bologna to Milan, where he had a contract to write an opera for la Scala. This commission he approached with some circumspection as the Milanese audience had not, according to Stendhal, taken kindly to his earlier operas and their suspicion of the composer would have been anything but assuaged by his recent successes in Rome and Naples. Since he was already in Milan at the beginning of March, ready to start work on whatever libretto the management might provide him with, and the première did not take place until the end of May, it was for Rossini an unusually long period for the writing and preparation of an opera.

In the event, the composer achieved one of the greatest triumphs of his career, and Stendhal describes the first night as the most successful he had ever attended. Perhaps because the score contained something for everyone – pathos, comedy, tragedy, gaiety – perhaps because, as Toye says, 'things of startling originality were presented in a manner that anybody could follow and understand', nothing in the opera failed to please. The overture, with its opening drum roll (two of the main characters are soldiers returning from the wars), is one of Rossini's most lively and splendid, one moreover whose music has considerably more connection with the rest of the opera than is customary with Rossini.

Act I. The curtain rises on the courtyard of the house of Fabrizio, a rich merchant. A magpie is sitting by an open cage. The people of the village, among them Pippo, who works for Fabrizio, are rejoicing at the prospect of the return of Giannetto, the son of the house, who is expected back from the wars. Everything is going with a swing when suddenly Pippo's name is called. The disembodied voice turns out to be the magpie's and the bird, in answer to Lucia's question as to whom Giannetto shall marry, answers pertly 'Ninetta!' Lucia clearly finds such a match unthinkable, and in fact she seems inclined to pick on Ninetta for anything, even blaming her because one of the silver forks is missing. Ninetta enters and sings of her happiness at the prospect of the return of Giannetto, with whom she is secretly in love ('Di piacer mi balza il cor'), an attractive aria whose layout and even the cast of whose music reminds the listener of 'Una voce poco fa'. Fabrizio, who hints that he would not oppose a match with Giannetto, and Lucia, who charges Ninetta to look after the silver canteen with special care, go off to wait for their son, and the old pedlar Isaac starts to hawk his wares in a cracked voice.

At last Giannetto arrives, and it is apparent that he has eyes only for Ninetta, to whom he sings an aria full of love. In a spirited brindisi led by Pippo all rejoice and then leave the courtyard empty.

As Ninetta says a temporary goodbye to her beloved, a man enters, whom she does not at first recognise as her father but whom she greets rapturously once he makes himself known. He has infringed military law and is in fact even now condemned to death. A long duet ensues between father and daughter but Ninetta's efforts at consolation turn to fear as she sees the mayor coming towards them.

The mayor makes his entry with a buffo aria 'Il mio piano è preparato', and he soon makes it plain that Ninetta is the objective his plan is designed to achieve.

The mayor starts to pay court to her when a message is brought to him. Ninetta tells her father to make his escape, but he says he has no money and asks her to sell on his behalf a silver spoon, which is all he has left, and bring him the money to a hiding place he designates. As he is about to go, the mayor stops him and insists that Ninetta read the message aloud as he cannot make it out without his spectacles. As soon as it becomes plain to her that the letter describes her father as a deserter and asks the mayor to help bring him to justice, she changes name and description and there occurs the famous trio 'Oh Nume benefico', Fernando hiding behind the doorway and joining his voice with Ninetta's in thanking heaven for its intervention, the mayor calling down a benediction on his amatory designs.

Once he thinks himself alone with Ninetta, the mayor makes a proposition to her, but she withstands him so firmly that even an old roué could be forgiven for thinking her a spitfire in ingénue's clothing. Fernando can bear the scene no longer and interrupts with a vigorous protest: 'Uom maturo e magistrato'. The scene ends with a lively stretta, as each of the three characters realises he or she has gone a good deal further than originally intended. As the mayor retreats and Ninetta's father also makes good his escape, the magpie snatches up one of Lucia's spoons and flies off with it.

The scene changes to a room in Fabrizio's house. Isaac's voice is heard outside and Ninetta sells him the silver spoon which her father has entrusted to her. As she is about to take him the money, Giannetto appears, closely followed by his father, who makes to join the hands of the two lovers. The mayor greets the returned Giannetto, while Lucia goes to count the silver. When she reports a spoon missing, the mayor, with maximum pomposity, sits down to make a legal report. 'Who can the thief be?' asks Giannetto. 'Ninetta,' answers the magpie.

A sextet develops as the mayor takes down the evidence and when he asks Ninetta her father's name and gets the answer 'Fernando Villabella' he suddenly realises that the deserter in the official dispatch was her father and that she was shielding him when she read it out. Things look black when Ninetta pulls out her handkerchief and some money tumbles to the ground. Lucia asks where it comes from, and all Ninetta's protestations are insufficient to divert suspicion, even Pippo's testimony that it came from Isaac only eliciting from the old pedlar himself the information that she sold him a spoon, moreover with the initials F.V. on it – since Isaac has now sold it, it cannot be compared with those in Fabrizio's canteen. Even Giannetto now starts to believe her guilty, and, at the lowest ebb of her fortunes, unable to give her father away, Ninetta movingly leads the ensemble: 'Mi sento opprimere'. The arrival of an armed escort triggers off a frenzied stretta to the finale, a typically brilliant, typically solid Rossinian edifice. Nothing will soften the mayor's wrath and apparent zeal for justice, and Ninetta is marched off as a criminal.

Act II. Outside the prison cells of the Town Hall. Antonio, the jailer, tries to comfort Ninetta, then brings in Giannetto, who is intent on persuading her to prove her innocence. She assures him in a beautiful duet that though her lips are now sealed, one day her innocence will be apparent to all. Giannetto leaves as the mayor approaches and that worthy suggests that if she will trust him, she may yet be saved. Unfortunately for the mayor, the judicial Tribunal arrives and his presence is necessary to greet it (the interruption is accompanied by the crescendo from the overture). Pippo is Ninetta's next visitor; she asks him to take the three crowns she got for the silver to her father's hiding place. Pippo himself is to keep her cross as a sign of the affection that was between them. To the allegro of the overture, Ninetta gives him her ring to deliver to Giannetto in memory of her.

The scene changes to Fabrizio's house where Lucia is a prey to doubts about Ninetta's guilt, doubts which are resolved in favour of the accused when Fernando enters and proclaims his passionate conviction of his daughter's innocence.

The great hall in the Town Hall. The Tribunal assembles and, in a scene which has been much admired, sings imposingly of its powers and the inexorable manner in which it exercises them. The judge reads out Ninetta's conviction, sentences her to death, and when not even the pleas of Giannetto and Fabrizio persuade her to bring evidence to prove her innocence, the sentence is confirmed. At this point Fernando rushes in and demands in a dramatic scena that his innocent daughter be freed. He is overpowered by the guards, but continues to hurl defiance at the Tribunal, which reiterates its decision. A solemn ensemble develops during whose course

Giannetto joins Ninetta in leading a chorus of protest, but all is in vain; Fernando is taken to the cells and Ninetta towards the place of execution.

The village square. Lucia laments the tragic turn events have taken. Pippo is counting his money, and when he puts it down for a moment to talk to the mayor's servant, Giorgio, the magpie flies down and steals a coin. They pursue it out of sight.

Ninetta, surrounded by armed men, is taken towards the scaffold amidst the lamentations of the bystanders. Her last thought is of her father ('Deh tu reggi in tal momento'). Suddenly Pippo and Antonio rush in shouting to Giorgio that they have discovered the real thief: the magpie. Everything has been found in a secret hiding place and Ninetta is innocent after all. To mounting orchestral excitement, Ninetta returns thanks in a tune of delightful innocence, but admits her joy is not complete until she knows what is to happen to her father. At this very moment he appears, released from prison by order of the King himself. It remains only for Lucia to join the hands of Ninetta and Giannetto in token of recognition of the happiness so long delayed, which Rossini loses no time in expressing in music.

H.

ARMIDA

Dramma per musica in three acts, libretto by Giovanni Federico Schmidt, based on Torquato Tasso's poem Gerusalemme liberata (1581). First performance at the Teatro San Carlo, Naples, 11 November 1817, with Isabella Colbran as Armida, Andrea Nozzari as Rinaldo, Giuseppe Ciccimarra as Goffredo and Carlo, Claudio Bonoldi as Gernando and Ubaldo, Michele Benedetti as Idraote and Gaetano Chizzola as Eustazio and Astarotte. Revived for Maria Callas at the Maggio Musicale, Florence, in 1952 (along with five other rare Rossini operas); for Christina Deutekom in Venice in 1970 and in Bregenz in 1973; for June Anderson in Aix-en-Provence in 1988; for Renée Fleming as part of the Rossini Opera Festival, Pesaro, 1993. Not yet performed in the U.K. First U.S. performance Tulsa, 29 February 1992.

Armida, *Idraote's daughter*Soprano
 Rinaldo, a Frankish knight.....Tenor
 Carlo, *a Frankish paladin*Tenor Goffredo (Geoffroi de Bouillon), leader of the crusaders Tenor
 Eustazio, *his brother*Tenor
 Gernando, a Frankish paladin.....Tenor
 Ubaldo, a Frankish paladin.....Tenor

Idraote, King of Damascus.....Bass
 Astarotte, *leader of the demons*Bass

Place: Outside Jerusalem

Time: c. 1100 A.D.

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Armida reflects the determination of Barbaia, the impresario of the Teatro San Carlo in Naples, and of Rossini to offer the public something new and thrilling. Barbaia was reopening the opera house, which had burnt down in February 1816. Rossini faced the challenge of success, in this his third serious opera for Naples (after Elisabetta Regina d'Inghilterra and Otello). Rossini was also consciously looking for a spectacular role for the great soprano Isabella Colbran, who was shortly to become his wife, which is perhaps why he spent three months working on it – for Rossini, an exceptionally long period of composition. The opera is notable for its structural integrity: the music follows the drama seamlessly, from the beginning, when a military march aptly replaces the usual overture. Apart from Gernando's 'Non soffrirò l'offesa', all the arias are incorporated into larger sequences and ensembles.

Jerusalem is being besieged by the Christians, led by Goffredo.

Act I. The battlefield, as day dawns. Trumpets summon the soldiers, before Goffredo explains that instead of fighting they will hold the funeral of Dudon who died a hero's death. Armida appears, dazzling everyone with her beauty ('Quell'astro mattutino'). She asks the Christians to let her have ten champions to back her in her fight for justice, pretending that her father is conspiring against her. Goffredo explains that she must wait until they have freed Jerusalem. Everyone is moved by her tears (quartet, 'Sventurata! or che mi resta?'). Eustazio's plea on her behalf eventually convinces Goffredo, who asks the soldiers to choose a new leader from their ranks who will then select ten champions. Eustazio proposes Rinaldo, whom Armida has loved ever since she saved his life some time ago. This arouses the jealous fury of Gernando, who swears to be avenged ('Non soffrirò l'offesa'). Idraote encourages his daughter to enslave the Christians, even Rinaldo, though she knows it will not be easy to tame his spirit. Rinaldo is delighted to find Armida in the camp. She rebukes him for deserting her for glory, appeals against his sense of duty and calls on his love for her (duet, 'Amor ... possente nome!'). He yields to her and they leave together. But when Rinaldo overhears Gernando accusing him of cowardice and insulting him, partly because he is Italian, he challenges him to a duel (finale, 'Se pari agli accenti'). Having killed him, to everyone's horror, Rinaldo leaves the camp, in thrall to love.

Act II. A forest. Astarotte and his troop of demons have been summoned by Armida to support her. Armida and Rinaldo approach in a chariot, which she changes into a throne of flowers. As long as he is with Armida, Rinaldo defies fate itself and will think only of their love (duet, 'Dove son io!'). Armida celebrates love's power over all creation (finale, 'No; d'Amor la reggia è questa').

Act III. An enchanted garden. Ubaldo and Carlo, sent to find Rinaldo, recognise that this garden is an infernal deception (duet, 'Come l'aurette placide'). Nymphs try to seduce them ('Qui tutto è calma'), but Ubaldo sends them packing. The Christians hide and watch as Rinaldo and Armida celebrate the 'soft chains' that bind them to each other (duet, 'Soavi catene'). When Armida is forced to leave Rinaldo briefly, Ubaldo uses an adamantine shield to show Rinaldo how cowardly he appears (trio, 'In quale aspetto imbelles'). Shamed into remembering who he is, Rinaldo appeals to heaven to inspire him to leave Armida. On returning, she finds that her infernal powers cannot bring him back and rushes away.

Outside Armida's palace. Rinaldo tries to conceal the pain he feels in leaving Armida, who begs to be allowed to follow him as his squire. He tells her to stay; she accuses him of ruthlessness, asks him to kill her and then faints (finale, 'Se al mio crudel tormento'). Ubaldo and Carlo remove Rinaldo by force. Armida summons the figure of Revenge and resolves to punish Rinaldo. At her command, demons destroy the palace and then carry her away as she rages with vindictive fury.

Armida stands alone, not merely the only woman, but also the major character. Rossini complicates our attitude to this unscrupulous enchantress when he makes the Christian Rinaldo less than her equal antagonist. For a start, because of Naples's casting strength, he is a tenor surrounded by several other tenors – one of the score's high points is the delectable trio for three tenors in the last act. When he is under her spell, Rinaldo rises to Armida's peak of voluptuousness. Stendhal was thinking of their Act I duet when he commented, 'Not infrequently it appears that the fundamental quality of some of Rossini's finest compositions is not true emotion, but physical excitement, developed to the most extraordinary degree ... One Sunday morning,' Stendhal went on, 'after a truly superlative performance at the Casino di Bologna, I observed that many of the ladies present were actually too embarrassed to praise it.'¹ Yet when Rinaldo does abandon Armida, his repentance lacks heroic focus: he has to be dragged away from her by force.

The role of Armida calls for supreme technical ability harnessed to dramatic, seductive ends. This was Maria Callas's particular achievement – as Giorgio Gualerzi put it, her Armida reminded us 'that expressivity is inseparable from technique'.² On the other hand, as Andrew Porter put it bluntly in 1952, Armida's 'dramatic action is feeble and the writing for soprano terrific. So that only when a Maria Callas is found to play the enchantress can the revival of Armida be an exciting and triumphant success.'³ P.

ERMIONE

Azione tragica in two acts, text by Andrea Leone Tottola, based on Racine's tragedy Andromaque (1667). First performed at the Teatro San Carlo, Naples, 27 March 1819, with Isabella Colbran, Rosmunda Pisaroni, Andrea Nozzari, Giovanni David, Giuseppe Ciccimarra, Gaetano Chizzola, Maria Manzi, De Bernardis minore. It was revived only in 1977, in concert, in Siena and restaged in 1987 at the Rossini Festival, Pesaro, for Caballé. First performance in London, in concert at the Queen Elizabeth Hall in 1992, with Anna Caterina Antonacci, conducted by Mark Elder and in the U.S.A. in June the same year, also in concert, San Francisco. First staged in the U.S.A. in 1992 in Omaha, and in Britain at the Glyndebourne Festival in 1995, with Antonacci, conducted by Andrew Davis.

Ermione (Hermione), Helen's daughter.....Soprano
Andromaca (Andromache),

Hector's widow.....Contralto
Astianatte (Astyanax), Andromaca's son.....Mute
Pirro (Pyrrhus), King of Epirus, Achilles' son.....Tenor
Oreste (Orestes), Agamemnon's son.....Tenor

¹ Stendhal, Life of Rossini, revised edition transl. and annotated by Richard N. Coe, London, 1970.

² 'Voci Rossiniane', Opera, March 1992.

³ Opera, July 1952.

Pilade (Pylades), Orestes' friend.....Tenor
 Fenicio (Phoenicius), Pirro's tutor.....Bass
 Cleone, Ermione's confidante.....Soprano
 Cefisa, Andromaca's confidante.....Soprano
 Attalo, Pirro's servant.....Tenor

Place: Epirus

Time: Around 430 B.C.

Running Time: 2 hours

After the fall of Troy, Princess Andromaca and other Trojans are held prisoner by Pirro, King of Epirus. As the widow of Hector, who was slain by Pirro's father Achilles, and as mother of the young Prince Astianatte, Andromaca embodies the future as well as the past of Troy. Even though she therefore represents a threat to political stability, Pirro has fallen in love with her, to the fury of Ermione, Princess of Sparta, who was going to marry him.

Act I. The remarkable, grief-laden overture incorporates the Trojan prisoners' choral lament for the fallen glory of Troy. Andromaca comes to the prison to see her son, whose features remind her of her husband. Attalo points out that to secure her son's freedom, all she has to do is marry Pirro. Fenicio rejects the idea brutally; Andromaca leaves, weeping.

Cleone and a group of young Spartan maidens invite Ermione to go hunting, to distract her from her unhappy love. She is wracked by jealousy, however, and longs for revenge. At first, Pirro tries to reassure her that he still loves her, but she scorns his pretences. When he warns her against pride, she threatens him, but he remains fearless. The news that Oreste has arrived as ambassador from the Greek kings disquiets Pirro and delights Ermione: Oreste loves her; he will defend her interests.

Oreste dreads seeing Ermione, whom he loves, but who rejoices in his suffering. His emotional state worries his friend, Pilade, who begs Oreste to remember his diplomatic mission and be guided by reason and duty. When Pirro sees Andromaca he invites her to sit near him, to the outrage of Ermione. Oreste announces his mission: Astianatte represents a threat to the security of Greece, and must be killed. Pirro reminds Oreste that as the victor of Troy he will do as he wishes with the spoils of war: Astianatte may even share the throne with him ('Balena in man del figlio'). He publicly offers Andromaca his heart and tells Ermione to go back to Sparta ('Deh serena i mesti rai'), which infuriates her. He departs. Andromaca prepares to leave and tells him she can never marry him.

Ermione tells herself that her love for Pirro has turned to revenge. Oreste is not quite convinced.

Pirro announces that pity has yielded to duty: he is prepared to hand over Astianatte to Oreste, which throws everyone into confusion ('Sperar...temer...poss'io?'). Andromaca begs for time to reconsider her refusal to marry Pirro. Privately, she resolves to die before she loses her son.

Act II. When Pirro learns that Andromaca is ready to marry him he orders Astianatte be set free. In fact, faithful to her dead husband, she intends to ensure that Pirro swear to guarantee her son's safety, then she will commit suicide ('Ombra del caro sposo!').

Andromaca refuses to answer Ermione's threats and insults; she forgives her. Ermione sends Fenicio to remind Pirro of her love and the oaths that he once swore her ('Di, che vedeste piangere'). She still loves and will always love Pirro ('Amata, l'amai'). Pirro is seen to lead Andromaca in a wedding procession across the stage. Ermione accepts that she has lost him, but she can't believe heaven will not punish such treachery. She determines on revenge, hands Oreste a dagger and tells him that if he loves her, he must kill Pirro. She hopes this crime will bring comfort to her ('Se a me nemiche stelle').

Fenicio confirms that Pirro is determined to marry Andromaca. Pilade is appalled: he foresees war, since Agamemnon will avenge this insult to Greece. They both deprecate the power of love ('Quanto sei sempre infausto').

Ermione now regrets her impulsive behaviour. Imagining that Pirro is already remorseful ('Parmi, che ad ogni istante'), she is ready to pardon him. Oreste returns, drenched in Pirro's blood: when the King promised to save Astianatte's life and give him the throne of Epirus, all the Greeks rose and killed him ('Gia di Andromaca sul crine'). Ermione tells Oreste that she loved Pirro and commands the furies to destroy his murderer. Pilade and other Greeks come to save Oreste from the people's fury. Ermione curses him and faints. Oreste is led away, frenzied and nearly unconscious.

Ermione's structure relies on the architecture of mutual loathing and love, complicated by political alliances and underpinned by conflicts rooted in the past, the Trojan war. Tottola and Rossini made two major changes to Racine's play: they shift attention away from Andromache (whose conflict between her duties as a widow and as a mother must end in suicide), to the more dynamic Hermione, the woman scorned, who employs the man who adores her to kill the man she adores. A remarkable sequence of arias and ensembles takes the audience inside her soul. Their other innovation was to flesh out the character of Orestes in an appropriately Romantic way: when he first appears, the orchestral introduction to his cavatina on its own makes it clear that he is already, as the stage direction insists, 'beside himself', in a sense, already pursued by the furies that assail him in the last scene. Rossini called Ermione his 'little, Italian Guillaume Tell'. It has only recently been recognised, in the words of Philip Gossett, who co-edited the critical edition, as 'one of the finest works in the history of nineteenth-century Italian opera'.

Ermione (Glyndebourne, 1995, director Graham Vick, designer Richard Hudson).
Anna Caterina Antonacci as Ermione, Jorge Lopez-Yanez as Pirro.

P.

LA DONNA DEL LAGO

The Lady of the Lake

Opera in two acts, text by A.L. Tottola, after Sir Walter Scott's narrative poem The Lady of the Lake. Première, San Carlo, Naples, 24 September 1819, with Isabella Colbran. First produced London, King's Theatre, Haymarket, 1823; New York, 1829 (in French). Performed regularly in London in the 1840s and 1850s with Grisi and Mario. Revived Florence Festival, 1958, with Rosanna Carteri, conductor Serafin; London, 1969, Camden Festival, with Kiri Te Kanawa; Italian Radio, 1970, with Caballé; Covent Garden, 1985, with von Stade, Marilyn Horne, Rendall, Chris Merritt.

Elena (Ellen).....Soprano
James V of Scotland (Hubert)Tenor
Roderigo (Roderick Dhu).....Tenor
Malcolm Groem.....Mezzo-Soprano
Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus.....Bass

Serano, Douglas's retainer.....Bass
 Albina, Ellen's confidante.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Clansmen, Huntsmen, Pages, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court

Place: Scotland

Time: First Half of the Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Between the beginning of December 1818 and the end of December the following year, Rossini had no fewer than four operas on the stage – two at the San Carlo in Naples, one in Venice and one at la Scala.¹ Of the four, the only one likely to be known even by name nowadays is La Donna del Lago. The opera swiftly went the international rounds, was heard thirty-two times in its first season at la Scala, remained popular in London until 1851 but seems not to have been revived between 1860 and 1958, when the Maggio Musicale Fiorentino mounted it. It is full of graceful, expressive music and amounts to one of Rossini's most attractively lyrical scores. That it suffered a century of neglect may perhaps be attributed to three factors: the role of Ellen was written for Colbran and is lyrical until the taxingly brilliant final aria² which puts it out of consideration for most sopranos or mezzos; the two principal tenor roles bristle with high notes, cascade with runs and roulades, and yet demand to be sung with a consistent smoothness out of reach of most singers for the past hundred years or so; and – most important – the story is concerned with characters of a much lower voltage than the Normas, Lucias, or early Verdi heroines who supplanted them in the imagination of a later generation.

Rossini's opera, like Scott's poem, relates a romantic story of the young King James V of Scotland (born 1512, died 1542). For two years from 1526, Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, kept the King imprisoned, until he escaped. Douglas fled to England, and the King took revenge on his relations. At the start of the opera, Douglas has returned to Scotland and is living under the protection of Roderick Dhu, who belongs to a faction opposing the young King. In gratitude for shelter, Douglas has promised the hand of his daughter Ellen in marriage to Roderick.

Act I, scene i. The shores of Loch Katrine, with the Ben Ledi mountains in the background. A hunting party greets the dawn and Ellen comes into view in a boat. In a flowing, 6/8 cavatina, 'O matutini albori', she expresses her hopes that her young lover Malcolm may be with the hunting party, but she is surprised by Hubert, who is impressed by her beauty and tells her that he has lost the other hunters. She offers him shelter, their voices join in the melody of Ellen's cavatina, and they leave together, just as Hubert's companions return.

Scene ii. Douglas's cottage. Ellen reveals to Hubert that she is the daughter of the famous Douglas who has been exiled from the court, a decision which Hubert in an aside says the King much regrets. It is obvious that Hubert is attracted towards Ellen, and when her friends refer to the love her father's friend, Roderick, feels for her and she openly admits in duet that she loves not Roderick but another, Hubert mistakenly dares to hope that it may be he.

All leave, and Malcolm, the object of Ellen's affections, enters and reveals his hopes and fears in a soliloquy. Serano, Douglas's servant, announces that Roderick and some soldiers are already in the valley. Ellen dares to oppose Douglas's wish that she may be united with Roderick, to Malcolm's joy and her father's displeasure. In an aria he commands her obedience, but when he leaves, Ellen and Malcolm sing of their love in a slow movement of great charm.

Scene iii. An open field surrounded by high mountains. Roderick is greeted by his clansmen and responds in a brilliantly florid aria. Tenderly, he declares his love for Ellen, who herself tries to hide her apprehension. Malcolm at the head of his followers has arrived to join Roderick, and Douglas begins to understand who it is that his daughter loves. Roderick refers to Ellen as his consort-to-be, and Malcolm is about to give himself away when Ellen restrains him, and the four protagonists of the drama, together with Albina and the chorus, comment on the situation. With the announcement by Serano that they are threatened by the enemy, patriotism replaces private emotions, and the act ends with a warlike ensemble of defiance and determination.

Act II, scene i. A cave by the lake. Hubert has returned to seek out the girl with whom he has fallen in love and he sings of his passion ('O fiamma soave'). Ellen appears and he bares his heart, but she says she loves another and offers him only her friendship. He gives her a ring, telling her that he had it from the King of Scotland, whose life he saved; if any member of her family is in danger, she should take it to the King, who will grant any wish she may ask. Their extended duet is overheard by Roderick, whose voice joins with theirs (the music demands high Cs from both tenors and a pair of Ds from Hubert) before he surprises them and challenges Hubert to reveal his identity. He says he does not fear the King's enemies but, at a cry from Roderick, the lakeside is covered with his followers, who have been hiding in the undergrowth. Ellen stops them falling on Hubert without more ado, and a scene of splendid effect ends as Hubert and Roderick prepare to fight, much to Ellen's dismay.

¹ Though he was under contract to Barbaia as musical director and principal composer, he had frequent leave of absence.

² In Florence in 1958 it was apparently omitted.

Scene ii. A great room in Stirling Castle. Ellen was born in the castle and she returns to it to ask the King to help her father, who is in prison. Her feelings as she beholds the place of her birth are by no means unmixed, as here she found nothing but misfortune, in contrast to the humble cottage where she has been happy. She enquires for the King and is amazed to find that he and Hubert are one and the same person. When she pleads for her father, he is restored to her and eventually a pardon granted to Malcolm. Roderick is by now dead. (The quartet, 'Cielo il mio labbro inspira', for Ellen, Malcolm, Hubert/James and Douglas, was taken, with Rossini's sanction, from his opera Bianca e Falliero and even printed in scores and libretti of the 1830s and 1840s.) The opera ends with a brilliant and very appealing finale, 'Tanti affetti in tal momento', dominated by Ellen, and, it appears, the one passage to find favour at the première. H.

MAOMETTO II

Mohammed II

Dramma in two acts, libretto by Cesare della Valle, duca di Ventignano, based on his play Anna Erizio (1820), which was inspired by Voltaire's play Mahomet, ou Le fanatisme (1742). First performance Teatro San Carlo, Naples, 3 December 1820, with Isabella Colbran, Adelaide Comelli, Andrea Nozzari, Filippo Galli. Rossini's own revision was first performed in 1822 at the Teatro la Fenice, Venice, revived in 1985 by the Rossini Opera Festival, Pesaro. First U.S. performance 1988 San Francisco Opera House. Not yet staged in the U.K.

Anna ErissoSoprano
Calbo, *Venetian warrior*Mezzo-Soprano
Paolo Erisso, Anna's father,
Governor of NegroponteTenor
Maometto II (Mohammed the Conqueror),
Turkish SultanBass
Condulmiero, *Venetian warrior*Tenor
Selimo, *Maometto's vizier*Tenor

Place: Negroponte

Time: 1470

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Maometto II represents a further stage in Rossini's development: with its still greater structural complexity and larger-scale musical forms, it shows him building on his Neapolitan experience. Although (or perhaps partly because) Maometto II was not a popular success in 1820, Rossini seems to have felt a particular affection for it, choosing to stage it in Venice (in a revised form, with a happy ending) in 1823 and, in a reworked French version, as Le siège de Corinthe for his début in Paris in 1826.

When Paolo Erisso was Governor of Corinth, his daughter met and fell in love with a man who told her his name was Uberto – he was, in fact, Maometto. Now Maometto leads the Turks in their siege of Negroponte, whose Governor, Erisso, intends his daughter Anna to marry Calbo, a Venetian soldier.

Act I. Condulmiero proposes that they surrender to the Turks. Calbo convinces everyone that they should still resist and they swear allegiance to Erisso.

Anna's room. Erisso's daughter is torn between concern for the danger her father faces and the love she has concealed ('Ah! che invan su questo ciglio'). He comes to tell her he has decided that she needs a husband to protect her, who will be Calbo. She reveals that she already loves another man whom she met in Corinth, Uberto of Mytiline. Erisso tells her that the real Uberto was with him at that time, on board ship: she realises she has been tricked (terzet-tone – Rossini's manuscript variant, i.e. big trio – 'Ohimè! qual fulmine'). A cannon shot outside summons the men to battle and Anna to pray in church.

Outside the church, Anna hears that a traitor opened the gates to the Turks. She leads the women in prayer ('Giusto cielo'). News comes that Maometto has taken the walls but will not venture further until daybreak. Erisso says goodbye to Anna, who offers to fight (trio, 'Figlia, mi lascia'). Instead, Erisso gives her a dagger with which to kill herself if taken by the Turks.

Turks threaten the inhabitants with fire and death ('Dal ferro, dal foco'). Maometto acknowledges his followers (cavatina, 'Sorgete, sorgete'). When his vizier Selimo is impressed by Maometto's knowledge of the city he reveals that he once travelled throughout Greece as a spy for his father. Turks bring news that the Venetian forces have been defeated and the leaders captured. Calbo and Erisso are brought in, in chains. When Erisso reveals his identity and, in answer to Maometto's questions, that he was once Governor of Corinth and that he is a father, Maometto offers to spare the Venetians' lives if Erisso will persuade the citadel to surrender. Erisso consults Calbo, who is equally adamant in refusing these terms. Enraged, Maometto orders them to be taken away and tortured (finale, 'Guardie, olà'). Anna rushes from the church, confronts her beloved Uberto/Maometto and threatens to kill herself unless he releases her father and Calbo, whom she calls her brother. Maometto frees them and when Erisso rejects his daughter, Maometto offers Anna a life at his side.

Act II. Inside Maometto's tent. Anna is surrounded by luxury, but remains overwhelmed by grief. Moslem girls urge her to enjoy her youth. When Maometto offers his love and his throne, she rejects both and weeps. Yet they both realise that she loves him (duet, 'Anna, tu piangi?'). He orders the tent to be opened at the back and rebukes the Turkish troops who are bent on pillage. Maometto prepares them for another assault on the citadel, which he will lead. When Anna asks for a token of her security in his absence Maometto entrusts her with his imperial seal of authority. He takes the standard to lead his troops into battle ('All'invito generoso'), while Anna feels inspired by a heavenly voice to undertake her 'task of honour'.

The burial vaults of the church. As Erisso kneels before his wife's tomb he accuses his daughter of treachery. Calbo assures him that Anna could never act dishonourably ('Non temer'). When she appears, Erisso continues to reject her until she swears on her mother's tomb that she was true to him. She hands him Maometto's seal and asks to be married to Calbo at the family tomb, as Erisso had once wanted. The two men then leave Anna, knowing she will almost certainly be killed (trio, 'In questi estremi').

Anna hears the women praying in the church. She learns that Erisso and Calbo's appearance at the citadel inspired the Venetians who routed the Turks. They are now looking for Anna, to punish her for her treachery (finale, 'Sventurata! fuggir sol ti resta'). Anna refuses to fly and prepares to meet her fate. When the Turks rush at her, her calmness so surprises them that they stop. Maometto asks for his seal. She reveals that she gave it to her father and to Calbo, whom she names as her husband. She then stabs herself and dies on her mother's tomb.

Maometto II boasts astonishingly elaborate vocalism, but the artifice is never for its own sake. The vocal lines are strongly incised with the characters' different qualities and with their relations with one another. The conflict between Islam and Christianity results in some fairly conventional 'exotic' orchestral colours, and unfrightening jaunty bloodlust from the Turkish soldiers. Maometto's 'military and Asiatic splendour', on the other hand, is a gift to a charismatic bass. More importantly, Anna's dedication to her task inspired Rossini to dramatise a martyrdom. From the prelude to the vault scene, tellingly inflected by the clarinet, she leaves the confusions of profane love for a serenity that finds an echo in the ritual sacrifice, as she herself realises. There is a special, numinous quality to the music that Rossini writes for the last scenes: in the solemn women's chorus with its harp accompaniment, in the dazed reaction of the Turks to Anna's heroism, in Anna's apotheosis, as she foresees the garland heaven will offer her martyrdom, and as she consecrates her last breath to the Virgin Mary. P.

LE SIÈGE DE CORINTHE

The Siege of Corinth

Tragédie lyrique in three acts, libretto by Luigi Balocchi and Alexandre Soumet, based on Rossini's opera Maometto II. First performed Opéra, Paris, 9 October 1826, with Laure Cinti-Damoreau, Adolphe Nourrit, Henri Étienne-Dérivis, Louis Nourrit. First performance in U.K. at Her Majesty's Theatre, London, 1834. First U.S. performance, New York, 1834. Revived in Florence (in Italian) in 1949 for Renata Tebaldi; staged in Genoa in 1992, with Luciana Serra, Maurizio Comencini, Marcello Lippi and Dano Raffanti, and given in concert at the Queen Elizabeth Hall, London, in the same year.

PamyreSoprano
NéoclèsTenor

| | |
|------------------|---------------|
| Mahomet II | Bass |
| Cléomène | Tenor |
| Hiéros | Bass |
| Omar | Bass |
| Ismène | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Adraste | Tenor |

Place: Corinth

Time: 1459

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Rossini's contract with the Théâtre Italien in Paris obliged him to supply opera in the French style. After the pièce d'occasion Viaggio à Rheims and the pastiche of his own works which Pacini compiled, loosely nailed to a framework even more loosely based on Scott, Ivanhoé, Rossini reworked two operas that he had written for Naples, Maometto II and Mosè in Egitto, before he attempted to write new, French operas from scratch. With a beady eye to the main chance, Rossini moved the action of Maometto II across the Mediterranean to Corinth, because Paris was aflame with enthusiasm for the cause of Greek independence. You could buy clocks with Lord Byron dying on their top. In April 1826 Rossini conducted a charity concert to raise money for the Greek cause and in October he produced Le siège de Corinthe to exploit this wave of Philhellenism.

Some time ago in Athens, Pamyre met and fell in love with a man who told her his name was Almanzor – he was, in fact, Mahomet. Now he leads the Turks in besieging Corinth, whose leader is Pamyre's father, Cléomène.

Act I. The vestibule of the Senate Palace. Cléomène has assembled the troops: should they continue to resist or yield to the Turks? Once the young warrior Néoclès rallies them, they all swear to fight and to die if necessary.

Néoclès reminds Cléomène that he promised to let him marry his daughter. Cléomène is horrified when Pamyre reveals that she has already committed herself to another man, Almanzor. News is brought that the Turks have mounted the city's ramparts. Before he leaves to join the struggle, Cléomène gives Pamyre a knife so she can defend or kill herself.

The square in Corinth. Turks boast of their triumph in the city. Mahomet looks forward to conquering the entire universe. Omar tells him that the Greeks are holding out inside the citadel but that one of their leaders has been captured. Instead of having him executed, Mahomet orders him to be brought for interrogation and explains to Omar that he is merciful now, in memory of a beautiful young woman whom he met once in Athens. The prisoner is Cléomène, who refuses to order the Greeks to surrender, even when Mahomet threatens to punish him for his audacity. When Pamyre runs in, Mahomet's fury yields to love: he offers to save Greece if she will marry him. Cléomène curses his daughter, who is torn between them.

Act II. Inside Mahomet's pavilion. Ismène has observed how Pamyre's remorse poisons her happiness. Pamyre admits that she looks forward only to death and prays that the spirit of her mother will watch over her destiny ('Du séjour de la lumière'). She has a presentiment that Greece will one day be free. Mahomet offers her the spoils of victory, but she grieves at being unfaithful to her God and cursed by her father. Mahomet threatens that if she will not yield to him, her father will suffer. He then stages a fête to celebrate the wedding (ballets). An altar is being erected for the ceremony when Omar leads in Néoclès, who has been captured, but remains defiant: he tells Mahomet that even the Greek women fight to defend Greek liberty from a tyrant. Mahomet's fury is disarmed when Pamyre says, to save Néoclès's life, that he is her brother. Mahomet invites him to witness his 'sister's' wedding and serenades her ('Idole de mon âme'). The tent's flap is lifted and they see that Greek women have joined the men in defending the citadel. At that moment, Pamyre's love dies: like the other Greeks, she now longs for the palm of martyrdom. When Mahomet reminds her that she holds the fate of Greece in her hand, she asks to die with them. Mahomet, enraged, declares that tomorrow the sun will look in vain for Corinth.

Act III. The tombs of Corinth. Néoclès managed to escape and make his way here, which he calls the Greeks' last refuge, the only exile for a people escaping from slavery. He tells Adraste that he is bringing back the remorseful Pamyre, whose voice is then heard in prayer, along with those of the Greek women. Néoclès asks God whether He will allow a people who adore Him to suffer, and thanks Him for saving Pamyre from her fate. Cléomène refuses to forgive his faithless daughter, even when he hears she now wishes to die for Greece. She wishes to marry Néoclès, at her mother's tomb. Cléomène blesses the couple and together they pray God to end the Greeks' suffering ('Céleste providence!'). Hiéros tells them that they have no hope now, the Turks are so near. At Cléomène's request, Hiéros blesses the Greek soldiers' flags and then, inspired, prophesies that after five centuries of slavery, Greece will be free again. Surrounded by the Greek women, Pamyre prays that heaven's mercy will soon end their grief ('Juste ciel. Ah? Ta clemence'). The Turks burst in, bent on slaughter. Pamyre stops Mahomet in his tracks when she threatens to kill herself. With a terrible noise, a wall gives way and Corinth can be seen, consumed by flames.

When Rossini changed Maometto II into Le siège de Corinthe he wrote one major new number, the patriotic set piece, Hiéros's blessing of the flags, but the revision had many smaller effects as well. The soprano's lover was no longer a mezzo-soprano, because Paris did not share Italy's adherence to the castrato tradition of bel canto. Instead, the role of Calbo becomes the tenor Néoclès. Rossini also diminishes the Neapolitan score's florid vocalism and shifts the balance away from individual enterprise to communal effort: the soprano now joins, rather than leads, the chorus's martyrdom. More subtly, Rossini modifies the character of the Turkish Sultan, who now stops the Turkish troops from pillaging Corinth. Suddenly concerned with posterity, he reminds them that 'without the arts, glory's brother, there is no such thing as immortality'. The rhetoric serves no dramaturgical purpose and has little to do with Islam, but in Paris, in 1826, it surely played opportunistically on nostalgia for Napoleon. P.

MATILDE DE SHABRAN, ossia BELLEZZA E CUOR DI FERRO

Matilde de Shabran, or Beauty and Ironheart

Melodramma giocoso in two acts, libretto by Jacopo Ferretti based on J.M. Boutet de Monvel's play Mathilde (1799). First performed at the Teatro Apollo, Rome, 24 February 1821, with Caterina Lipparini as Matilde, Annetta Parlamagni as Edoardo, Giuseppe Fusconi as Corradino, Giuseppe Fioravanti as Aliprando, Antonio Parlamagni as Isidoro, conducted by Paganini (Giovanni Pacini contributed the Introduzione to Act II and a late trio). Revived at the Teatro del Fondo, Naples, on 11 November 1821 as a dramma per musica and called Bellezza e cuor di ferro (Beauty and Ironheart). The Rome version was first performed in the U.K. at Her Majesty's Theatre, London, 1823, New York, 1834. Revived Florence, 1892, Genoa, 1974. The Naples version was presented at the Rossini Opera Festival, Pesaro, 1996, with Elizabeth Futral as Matilde.

Matilde di ShabranSoprano
EdoardoMezzo-Soprano
Raimondo Lopez, *his father*Bass
Corradino, *known as Ironheart*Tenor
Ginardo, *his gatekeeper*Bass
Aliprando, *his physician*Bass
Isidoro, *a poet*Bass
Contessa d'Arco, Corradino's fiancée ...Mezzo-Soprano
Egoldo, *leader of the peasants*Tenor
Rodrigo, leader of the Armigeri.....Tenor
Ubaldo, jailer.....Mute

Place: Spain, in and around Corradino's Castle

Time: The Middle Ages

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

At the last minute, Rossini asked Jacopo Ferretti to provide the libretto for Matilde, the opera he had contracted to deliver for the Roman Carnival of 1821. Ferretti handed over his Corradino, changing the heroine's name Isabella to Matilde. With no time to set it all, Rossini asked his friend Pacini to compose several parts of the second act. The delayed first night was so rushed that the sets were not all ready. That autumn, in Naples, Rossini rewrote the score, replaced Pacini's contributions and some borrowings from his own operas with new music, wrote the duet between Edoardo and Corradino ('Da cento smanie') to replace Corradino's aria, gave Raimondo's great aria in Act II to Edoardo (which makes greater dramatic sense) and rewrote Isidoro's part in the impenetrable Neapolitan dialect. In so doing he restored the integrity of a work that has only just been recognised as one of his great semi-seria operas.

Act I. The Gothic courtyard of an ancient castle. A group of peasants approach cautiously. Aliprando describes the cruelty and misogyny of his master, who is known as Ironheart ('Se all'intorno qui leggete'). Warned by a bell of his arrival, they run away. Isidoro, a Neapolitan poet wracked by hunger and in need of a patron, improvises a song to a guitar ('Intanto Armenia ... Nfra la famma'). Outraged that Isidoro dared cross his threshold, Corradino sends him to prison (quartet 'Alma rea'). Aliprando reminds Corradino that Matilde di Shabran is due to arrive today. Her father was a brave soldier who, before he died in battle, made Corradino promise to look after her. Corradino orders his prisoner Edoardo to be brought to him. Edoardo refused to acknowledge himself beaten in battle by Corradino and now still resolutely defies his captor: his tears are for his father, not for himself ('Piange il mio ciglio').

A gallery in the castle. Matilde expects Corradino to fall in love with her but Aliprando knows he will not yield easily (duet, 'Di capricci, di smorfiette'). The Contessa d'Arco, 'bilious by nature', according to Aliprando, is also staying at the castle and equally determined to marry Corradino, who has been engaged to her for some time. The two rivals for his hand quarrel. When Corradino arrives, Matilde answers his rudeness with equal abruptness, which shocks and even moves him (quintet, 'Questa è la Dea').

Corradino consults his physician Aliprando, who diagnoses love, an illness without remedy. Corradino suspects Isidoro has put a spell on him and sentences him to death. Matilde hints that she loves him and asks if she should leave, while Isidoro and Ginardo watch and laugh. At her command, he disarms, kneels and they declare their love (finale, 'Ah! capisco: non parlate'). Edoardo's father is sighted at the head of an army coming to rescue his son.

The courtyard of the castle. Rodrigo prepares to lead the castle's troops. Isidoro holds Corradino's banner, ready to commemorate the expedition in verse. Edoardo weeps at the thought of the danger threatening his father. Matilde's compassion for him arouses Corradino's jealousy, which convinces the Countess that he loves her rival. Matilde urges Corradino to act humanely. He leaves her in charge of the castle.

Act II. Outside the castle. Isidoro prepares to write his memoirs, in which he will feature heroically. Raimondo's troops have abandoned him; now he despairs of seeing his son Edoardo again. Meanwhile, Edoardo, who has been freed from prison, assumes his father has died. In an aria that includes a virtuoso part for solo horn (decorated, as so often in this opera, by the clarinet) Edoardo also longs to die, until he hears his father's voice ('Sazia tu fossi alfine ... Ah! perchè, perchè la morte'). Corradino is furious to discover Edoardo at liberty, particularly when he hears that Matilde herself freed him.

In the castle's gallery. It turns out that the Countess bribed the jailer to free Edoardo, to turn Corradino against Matilde. When Isidoro appears, the two women question him for news. He claims sole responsibility for the victory. A drum-roll announces Corradino's return. He accuses Matilde of having set Edoardo free and reads out a letter from Edoardo thanking her for letting him go. Convinced of her treachery, Corradino orders Isidoro to throw Matilde off a mountain (sextet, 'È palese il tradimento'), in spite of the pleas of peasant women. Isidoro reports, the Countess exults, but Edoardo reveals that it was the Countess who bribed Edoardo's jailer. Corradino is stricken by remorse, while Edoardo sympathises with Matilde (duet, 'Da cento smanie, e cento').

The rocky mountainside. Isidoro has fled from the castle. Corradino is bent on suicide – until Edoardo leads Matilde forward. Isidoro explains that he only killed her 'metaphorically'. Corradino begs Matilde to forgive him. She insists he open his heart to goodness and embrace his enemy Raimondo. She then commissions a sonnet from Isidoro, celebrates love's triumph and reminds women 'that we are born to conquer and reign'.

Until the 1996 revival at Pesaro, Stendhal's report ('Execrable libretto, but pretty music – such was the general verdict') carried disproportionate weight. In fact, Matilde di Shabran is a considerable work, deserving to be more widely seen. Its genre, the semi-seria, can cause difficulties. In order to give equal weight to both aspects, its first act lasts over two hours. At its best, Matilde di Shabran is a markedly truthful work: Rossini reworks the old forms so that they express an unusual complexity of feeling. Simple names for musical forms such as Act I's quartet and quintet and the sextet in Act II misrepresent them, since they contain any number of smaller groupings chained together to embody the drama's psychological implications. P.

ZELMIRA

Dramma in two acts, libretto by Andrea Leone Tottola, based on Dormont de Belloy's tragédie Zelmire (1762). First performed Naples, 16 February 1822, with Isabella Colbran as Zelmira, Anna Maria Cecconi as Emma, Antonio Ambrosi as Polidoro, Giovanni David as Ilo, Andrea Nozzari as Antenore, Michel Benedetti as Leucippo. For the revival at the Kärntnertortheater, Vienna, on 13 April 1822, Rossini added a chorus and an aria for Emma. London, 1824, Théâtre des Italiens, Paris, 1826. The U.S. première was in New Orleans around 1835. It was revived for Virginia Zeani at the Teatro San Carlo, Naples, in 1965 and, in concert, for Cecilia Gasdia at the Teatro la Fenice, Venice, in 1988.

Zelmira, Polidoro's daughterSoprano
 Emma, her friendContralto
 Ilo, Trojan prince, Zelmira's husbandTenor
 Antenore, an adventurer.....Tenor
 Polidoro, King of LesbosBass
 LeucippoBass
 EacideTenor
 High PriestBass
 Chorus of Ilo's Soldiers

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

When Rossini wrote Zelmira, his last opera for Naples, he knew it would be performed in Vienna and then in London: intended to please cosmopolitan ears, it is more richly scored than any of his previous works. The accompanied recitatives, in particular, suggest he was writing with the Viennese tradition of Gluck, Mozart and Beethoven in mind. Stendhal compared Zelmira to Mozart's Clemenza di Tito and predicted that Rossini 'by the end of his career [may well] have become more German than Beethoven himself'.¹

Polidoro, King of Lesbos, was deposed by Azor, once an unsuccessful suitor for Princess Zelmira's hand while her husband Ilo was absent. Zelmira hid Polidoro among the tombs of the kings of Lesbos and, to protect him further, she let it be known that she hated her father and that he took refuge in the temple of Ceres. Azor had it burnt down, so everyone now assumes that Polidoro is dead. Meanwhile, Azor has been killed by Antenore, with the help of his confederate, Leucippo.

Act I. Outside the city walls, near the tombs of the kings of Lesbos. The army mourns for the dead Azor. Leucippo swears he will be avenged; Antenore promises the assassin will soon die. Leucippo leads the army in proclaiming Antenore as the next king. While Ilo is absent, their only obstacle is likely to be Zelmira. Leucippo tells Antenore that he will accuse her of the murder he himself committed.

Like everyone else, Emma assumes Zelmira has betrayed her father. To prove her innocence, Zelmira leads her friend inside the tombs.

Inside the tombs. Polidoro longs for his beloved daughter to return to him (cavatina, 'Ah! già trascorse il dì'). They meet and comfort one another (trio, 'Soave conforto'). When they hear soldiers approaching they pray for heaven's help in a stupefyingly florid ensemble, before they part once more.

A square, with a temple to Jupiter. The people welcome Ilo back. Ilo longs to see his wife and son ('Qual contento in sen m'ispira'). Zelmira's hesitations trouble him (duet, 'A che quei tronchi accenti?'). Emma tells them that Antenore accused Zelmira of killing Azor. Antenore and Leucippo persuade Ilo that Zelmira betrayed him while he was away and killed Polidoro to keep it secret ('Mentre qual fiera ingorda'). Priests announce that a voice inside the temple said Antenore should be king. Nobody believes Zelmira's assertions of her innocence, not even Emma (duettino, 'Perchè mi guardi').

The throne-room of the royal palace. Antenore enters in triumph to a festive march. He promises to return Lesbos to its days of glory ('Si figli miei').

Ilo cannot find his son and imagines someone has killed him. When he faints, Leucippo moves to assassinate him. Zelmira prevents him, but Leucippo manages to convince Ilo that his wife was about to kill him. Antenore joins in the general amazement at her criminal behaviour (quintet, 'La sorpresa ... lo stupore'). She is taken away to prison.

Act II. The throne-room, as before. Leucippo intercepted a letter from Zelmira to Ilo, which suggests Polidoro is still alive. Antenore resolves to have her followed. Zelmira's son, her friends and Emma emerge cautiously. The women pray that heaven will look after the boy ('Ciel pietoso, ciel clemente').

Outside the city walls. Ilo grieves over his wife's apparent treachery, until Polidoro comes from the tombs and reveals that Zelmira is innocent and has saved his life. Ilo is ecstatic (duet, 'In estasi di gioja'). They separate, Ilo to fetch help, Polidoro to take refuge among the tombs. Zelmira has been freed on Antenore's orders. When he overhears her talk to Emma he realises that Polidoro is still alive. Antenore has Polidoro arrested and boasts of his success (quintet, 'Ne' lacci miei cadesti'). Warriors bring an urn containing Azor's ashes. Believing that Zelmira murdered him, they demand her death and lead her away with Polidoro. Emma meets Ilo at the head of his troops and explains what has happened.

¹ Life of Rossini, revised edition, transl. and ed. by Richard N. Coe, London, 1970.

A horrible underground cell. Antenore and Leucippo threaten Polidoro, but he refuses to let Zelmira offer his throne in exchange for his life. At that point, fighting is heard from outside. Zelmira bravely stops Antenore from killing Polidoro. A wall of the cell gives way, revealing part of the square. Ilo enters through the breach. He frees his wife and her father, while Antenore and Leucippo are arrested and led away. Zelmira exults that she saved her father's life and his throne ('Riedi al soglio: irata stella'). Her joy is echoed by everyone.

With no overture, Zelmira begins in the most dramatic way possible. It goes on to engineer several exceptional encounters, such as those between husband and wife, between father and daughter, and yet fails entirely to add up as a drama. Rossini seems to delight in scenes, rather than in the individuals involved. He may have been awed by the prospect of presenting the opera in Vienna: the dungeon scenes can be read (and heard) as homage to Fidelio. Tottola's libretto has been rightly criticised for incoherence. The characterisation certainly has its problems, alternately unfocused and clichéd: Rossini cannot help giving the tenor villain Antenore some spectacularly heroic music, while the relentlessly wronged wife Zelmira never quite engages our sympathies in the way that Cenerentola does. P.

SEMIRAMIDE

Semiramis

Opera in two acts, text by Gaetano Rossi, after Voltaire's tragedy Sémiramis. Première, Fenice Theatre, Venice, 3 February 1823. London, Haymarket, 1824; Covent Garden, 1842 (in English), with Adelaide Kemble; opened the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, 1847, with Grisi, Alboni, Tamburini, Lavia, Tagliafico, conductor Costa; New York, 1845; Metropolitan, New York, 1893, with Melba, Scalchi, E. de Reszke; Florence Festival, 1940, with Gatti, Stignani, Ferruccio Tagliavini, Pasero, conductor Serafin. Revived at la Scala, Milan, 1962, with Sutherland, Simionato, Raimondi, Gazarolli, conductor Santini.

Semiramide, *Queen of Babylon*Soprano
 Arsace, Commander of the Assyrian Army.....Contralto
 Ghost of NinoBass
 Oroë, High Priest of the Magi.....Bass
 Assur, a Prince.....Baritone

Azema, a Princess.....Soprano
 Idreno, an Indian Prince.....Tenor
 Mitrane, Captain of the Guard.....Tenor
 Magi, Guards, Satraps, Slaves

Place: Babylon

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 3 hours 35 minutes

Rossini married Isabella Colbran nearly a year before the first night of Semiramide, in which she created the title role, and it was the last opera he was to write in Italy. Via Milan, Naples and Vienna, it reached London in spring 1824, when Giuditta Pasta took the title role. Maria Malibran sang it in Paris in 1828 and Grisi was heard in it in London in 1847. Aspirant prima donnas sang it for many years and Melba starred in it at the Metropolitan in 1894. In 1962, after a long gap when it seemed to be in eclipse, Joan Sutherland sang it triumphantly at la Scala, Milan. There was a distinguished revival at the Metropolitan as late as 1990, when Marilyn Horne was Arsace, and June Anderson and Lella Cuberli alternated in the title role.

Semiramide is as much a villainess as Lucrezia Borgia and before the opera begins, she and Prince Assur have murdered her husband, King Nino. She even tried to do away with her son, Arsace, but he has survived and, unaware of his true identity, commands a detachment of the army.

Act I. The Temple of Baal. The overture, one of Rossini's most powerful, is unusual in that it is based on themes which occur in the opera itself. A sinister atmosphere pervades the temple as the crowd gathers to hear news of the chosen successor to King Nino. Prince Idreno is there to ask for blessings on his love for Princess Azema. So is Assur and they all acclaim the arrival of Semiramide. An explosion extinguishes the sacred flame on the altar, but, once calm is restored, Arsace can be seen to have returned to the city, an occasion he salutes in his cavatina, 'Ah, quel giorno ognor rammento'. Assur is suspicious of him, and Arsace for his part is resolved never to recognise, if it should come to that, Assur as king.

Semiramide, in a magnificent aria, 'Bel raggio lusinghier', rejoices that Arsace has returned (she does not realise who he is). In duet with him, she not only refers to what she sees as the treachery of Assur but even mistakes Arsace's love for Azema as passion for herself.

The finale takes place in the palace. It is one of Rossini's grandest structures, and during its course Semiramide announces that Arsace will not only be king but become her husband, to the discomfiture of Assur as well as of the young man himself. The ghost of King Nino interrupts what is planned as a celebration of the marriage of Azema to Idreno, and promulgates not only the accession of Arsace to the throne but also a requirement for crimes to be expiated, which will entail Arsace offering a sacrifice to the shade of Nino.

Act II. Semiramide and Assur engage in mutual recrimination over the crime they have committed; their duet is one of the significant passages of the score. Oroë, about to take Arsace to Nino's tomb, tells him that he is in point of fact the son of the late monarch, who was murdered by Semiramide and Assur. Arsace hopes that Nino's ghost will prove clement towards Semiramide. Arsace admits to Semiramide that he is privy to all her secrets and, when Semiramide puts her life in his hands, demonstrates not only his generosity but his genuine love for his mother.

By the tomb of King Nino, Assur reveals his intent to kill Arsace, then hears that Oroë has spoken of his crimes before the people. His frenzy develops into madness but before the end of the scene he has come close to repentance. Within the monument itself, Arsace is followed by Semiramide who is convinced her son is in danger. Her prayer, 'Al mio pregar t'arrendi', is succeeded by a trio, in which she is joined by Arsace and Assur. Attacked by Assur, Arsace succeeds only in striking Semiramide who dies as the people rejoice in their new King.

H.

IL VIAGGIO A REIMS

The Journey to Rheims, or The Hotel Golden Lily

Opera in three parts, text by Luigi Balocchi. Première at the Théâtre-Italien in Paris, 19 June 1825, to celebrate the coronation of Charles X and with a cast of incomparable grandeur including Giuditta Pasta (Corinna), Laure Cinti (Folleville), Domenico Donzelli (Belfiore) and Nicolas-Prosper Levasseur (Alvaro) – the original Norma, Mathilde, Pollione, Moïse, among other creations. Revived Pesaro, 1984, with Gasdia, Valentini Terrani, Cuberli, Ricciarelli, Edoardo Gimenez, Araiza, Ramey, Ruggero Raimondi, Dara, Nucci, conductor Abbado (this cast recorded the opera).

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Corinna, a celebrated Roman improvising poetess | Soprano |
| Marquise Melibea, the Polish widow of an Italian general | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Countess of Folleville, a young, fashion-conscious widow | Soprano |
| Madame Cortese, a lively Tyrolean lady, owner of the Spa hotel | Soprano |
| Chevalier Belfiore, a young French officer | Tenor |
| Count Libenskoof, a Russian general | Tenor |
| Lord Sidney, an English colonel | Bass |
| Don Profondo, an antique-collecting man of letters | Bass |
| Baron Trombonok, a German, music-loving major | Bass |
| Don Alvaro, a Grandee of Spain and an admiral | Baritone |
| Don Prudenizio, a doctor | Bass |
| Don Luigino, the Countess of Folleville's cousin | Tenor |
| Maddalena, housekeeper of the hotel | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Delia, a young Greek orphan | Soprano |
| Modestina, the Countess of Folleville's chambermaid | Soprano |
| Antonio, hotel manager | Baritone |
| Zefirino, a courier | Tenor |
| Gelsomino, a valet | Tenor |

Place: A Spa Town

Time: May 1825

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Ten leading singers were assembled for a festive performance in honour of the coronation of Charles X. Each singer was given a magnificent solo opportunity, well contrasted with its neighbour, replete with embellishments and designed to display his or her special capabilities. The ensembles break up a succession of solos or duets and include what Rossini calls a 'Gran Pezzo Concertato a 14 Voci', a truly splendid set-piece which was cannibalised, albeit with only seven voices, for the first finale of Le Comte Ory. Four performances followed before Rossini withdrew the score. Three years later, he used several of the numbers for his successful opera Le Comte Ory, after which the opera was forgotten until fragments started to reappear in the 1970s and the score was reconstructed, to be revived with outstanding success at Pesaro in 1984.

Travellers of various nationalities on their way to Rheims for the King's coronation are stuck in a spa town when they find there are no horses to take them further. The hotel wants to make them feel welcome, and the personnel supervised by Madame Cortese (aria) prepare for the party. The Countess of Folleville is impatiently waiting for her wardrobe to arrive, and is mightily cast down to hear from her cousin Don Luigino that the carriage which is bringing it has met with an accident (aria). But her maid Modestina arrives with a hat she has salvaged from the wreck (cabaletta). Baron Trombonok, the German music-lover, who was elected to take charge of the party's travel finances, is interrupted in his reflections on the world's follies (aria) by the Italian man-of-letters Don Profondo. Don Alvaro, the Spanish grandee, and the Polish Marquise Melibea, sadly widowed on the day of her wedding to an Italian general, join the travellers, to be followed by the insanely jealous Russian general, Count Libenskof, who is, like Don Alvaro, in love with her (sextet). Corinna, arrived from Rome, contrives by singing of brotherly love (with harp accompaniment) to prevent a duel (aria). All rejoice (ensemble).

Madame Cortese worries about the continued absence of horses for her guests' onward journey and is baffled by the strange behaviour of the English Lord Sidney, who has fallen in love with Corinna but is too shy to say so and compromises by leaving flowers outside her room (aria with flute obbligato). Don Profondo unavailingly plies Lord Sidney with questions about certain English antiques, and offers to find out for Corinna the latest news about the party's likely time of departure. The young Chevalier Belfiore tries his luck with Corinna, who he is convinced finds him irresistible in spite of her firm rejection of his protestations (duet).

Don Profondo at Baron Trombonok's request makes a list of the valuables held by the travellers, but in his turn starts to show anxiety about the time of departure. The Countess of Folleville asks him where to find Chevalier Belfiore, and is furiously jealous when she hears about his interest in Corinna. Baron Trombonok tells them all that Zefirino has arrived with bad news about their onward journey: there are no horses to be found anywhere. Madame Cortese consoles them by telling them Paris is about to celebrate the King's return to the city, where Countess Folleville invites them to be her guests (fourteen-voice ensemble). They can travel next day on the public coach, and the funds they had planned for their private travel will pay for a banquet that night in the hotel garden, before which Baron Trombonok contrives to patch up peace between Count Libenskof and Marquise Melibea (duet).

All is prepared for the banquet. The entertainment consists of a toast by each of the travellers in the traditional style of his native country, seven in all (German, Polish, Russian, Spanish, English, French, Swiss), and to crown it all Corinna is prevailed upon to improvise. All join her in praise of the French monarchy.

Such an array of music, owing virtually nothing to dramatic stimulus though much to situation, suggests that there was at least a grain of truth in Tullio Serafin's contention that in Italian opera you went to Verdi for drama but to Rossini for music. Here in his last Italian opera Rossini is at a peak, invention apparently without limit, and the result is one of his most delectable scores, built on a series of attitudes and encounters, and on a sovereign ability to make capital from them. H.

MOSÈ IN EGITTO/MOÏSE ET PHARAON

Moses in Egypt

Opera in four acts (originally three) by Gioacchino Rossini, Italian libretto by A.L. Tottola. Première at San Carlo, Naples, 5 March 1818, with Benedetti as Mosè, Isabella Colbran and Nozzari. First performed in Vienna, 1821 (in German); London, 1822 (in Italian, as Pietro l'Eremita), and in 1833 at Covent Garden (in English under the title The Israelites in Egypt and with additions from Handel's oratorio); New York, 1832. Rossini very substantially revised the opera for Paris (as Moïse et Pharaon), where it was first given in the new version in 1827, with a new libretto by Jouy, with Levasseur as Moïse, Cinti as Anaï, and Nourrit the younger as Aménophis (its hundredth performance in Paris in this version was in 1838). First performed in second version in Perugia, 1829; Covent Garden, 1850 (as Zora), with Zelger as Moses, Castellan as Anaïs, Tamberlik and Tamburini; New York, 1860. Revived la Scala, 1918, with Nazzareno de Angelis, Giannina Russ, Dolci, Merli, conductor Serafin; 1937, with Tancredi Pasero, Cigna, Pagliughi, conductor Marinuzzi; 1950, with Pasero; 1959, with Christoff; 1965, with Ghiaurov; Rome, 1948, with Rossi-Lemeni; Falmouth, 1953 (first performance in England since 1850); Welsh National Opera (also in London), 1965, with Michael Langdon; Paris, 1983, with Samuel Ramey; English National Opera, 1986, with John Tomlinson.

Moses/Mosè/Moïse,¹ leader of the Israelites Bass
 Pharaoh/Faraone/Pharaon,
King of Egypt Baritone
 Anaïs/Elcia/Anaï, Moses' niece Soprano
 Amenophis/Osiride/Aménophis,
Pharaoh's son Tenor
 Sinaïs/Amaltea/Sinaïde, Pharaoh's wife Soprano
 Aaron/Elisero/Eliézer, Moses' brother Tenor Miriam/Amenofi/Marie,
Moses' sister Mezzo-Soprano
 Auphis/Mambre/Ophide, an Egyptian officer Tenor
 Osiris/Oziride, high priest of Isis Bass
 Hebrews, Egyptians, Priests, Guards, Soldiers,
 Dancers

Place: Ancient Egypt

Running Time: 1 hour 35 minutes (Mosè), 2 hours 30 minutes (Moïse)

Before 1820, Rossini was in the habit of finishing as many as four operas in a single year, and in 1818, when the first version of Mosè was written for Naples, saw three operas written though only two performed. Like others commissioned for the San Carlo by Barbaia at this time, it was written for Isabella Colbran, once Barbaia's mistress and soon to be Rossini's wife, and the librettist achieved something of a feat in making the female role of Moses' niece the pivot round which the antagonism of Moses and Pharaoh revolved.

The opera's initial success was surpassed at the revival a year later – a rare enough honour in itself at that date – when Rossini added the famous prayer in the last act, purely and simply to divert the audience's attention from the inadequacies of the San Carlo's staging of the Red Sea! Stendhal tells us that it took the composer only a few minutes to write the piece out, but the story is apocryphal and we know from Rossini's own correspondence that he wrote the tune first and had Tottola fit words to it after it was complete. It was this number which had the Italian ladies literally in paroxysms after its first performances – doctors were called in to deal with them – and it is the only one now known separately (not surprisingly since in the second version this is an opera of duets and ensembles and not at all of arias), but it is appropriate that it was this prayer which was sung on the steps of Santa Croce in Florence when in 1887 the body of Rossini was removed from Paris, where he had died almost twenty years before, and was re-buried in the great Florentine church. Appropriate, too, that on this occasion the vast crowd insisted on a repeat!

It was the work of two months, Francis Toye tells us in his biography of the composer, to turn Mosè into Moïse, on which later version modern revivals have been based, although often in Italian rather than the French which was heard in Paris in 1827. The second version involved extensive re-writing, with a new first act; for all that it embodies much of the Neapolitan version, there is much new music and much earlier music omitted. Its success was instantaneous, even Balzac praising the opera as 'an immense musical poem', and saying that in this opera he seemed to be watching the liberation of Italy.

Act I. The camp of the Israelites in Egypt is suggested atmospherically in the short andante Prelude, an allegro leading straight into the first scene. In a fine chorus, the Israelites pray for relief from their bondage and to be allowed to return to their fatherland. Moses appears and demands that his followers cease their lamentations; if they had faith in Him, God would reward them by leading them home. Moses' brother, Aaron, has gone to Pharaoh to plead the Israelite cause and he now returns, together with Moses' sister Miriam, and her daughter Anaïs, who was kept hostage by the Egyptians but whom Pharaoh, influenced by Queen Sinaïs, has now restored to the Israelites as an earnest of his good faith and decision to set the people free. Pharaoh's son Amenophis has, according to Miriam, fallen in love with Anaïs.

Moses feels that God is about to reward their faith, and a rainbow appears in the sky at the same time as a mysterious voice can be heard reminding Moses and the Israelites that God has kept His promises to them and ordering him to receive God's laws. All swear in an a cappella ensemble to observe these laws. Moses leads the people as they give thanks to God and urges them to hasten their preparations to leave Egypt and return home.

All depart except Anaïs, who loves the Egyptian prince Amenophis. He presently appears and begs her to stay with him, abandoning her mother and the ¹English, Italian, French versions of the names.

Israelite people. Amenophis is a passionate lover, but Anaïs seems proof against his pleas, even when he threatens to influence Pharaoh to revoke the order for the liberation of the Israelites, who must now by command of his father bow to Amenophis' edicts. Stendhal esteemed this duet beyond anything in the opera except perhaps the introduction (then to Act I and later to Act II) and the two prayers: 'This is not a piece of music of the moment; it must last as long as powerful feeling itself shall endure.' Amenophis leaves, and Aaron and Miriam lead the company in a thanksgiving hymn. Only Anaïs cannot associate herself with the rejoicing and in a duet of charmingly intimate character she admits her predicament to her mother.

Amenophis is as good as his threat and, as the finale starts, he tells Moses that Pharaoh has reversed his decree and that the Israelites are to return to captivity. Anaïs attempts unsuccessfully to intercede, and Moses threatens God's vengeance on Egypt if His people's departure is put off. For this threat, Amenophis orders his soldiers to slay Moses, but the crime is prevented by the appearance of Pharaoh and Sinais. A great ensemble develops, and Pharaoh announces that Amenophis has spoken the truth and that he has withdrawn his original promise to allow the Israelites to depart. A splendid finale reaches its climax as Moses raises his staff to heaven, the sun is eclipsed and the plague of darkness descends upon Egypt.

Act II. Pharaoh's palace.¹ Darkness lies over Egypt and Sinais, Pharaoh and Amenophis lament the apparently eternal night in a magnificent trio with chorus, whose quality explains Stendhal's comment that, at the première, in spite of his inherent suspicion of such Biblical scenes as a representation of the plagues of Egypt, he found himself surrendering completely and almost instantly to the music. (One must not forget that, in the original version, this was the opera's opening scene.) Pharaoh summons Moses, who arrives with his brother and is faced with Pharaoh's demand that the curse of darkness be lifted from his kingdom; with the return of light, the Israelites may depart. In a splendid prayer ('Eterno! immenso! incomprendibile Dio!'; 'Arbitre suprême du Ciel et de la Terre'),² Moses asks God to restore light to the land and, as he waves his staff, light returns.

Reaction to the new situation is in the form of a most expressive canon, enunciated by solo horn, led by Moses and taken up in succession by Aaron, Sinais, Amenophis and Pharaoh. Aaron is optimistic that this light will pierce to the heart of Pharaoh, who is now disposed to allow the Israelites out of captivity, in spite of the efforts of Amenophis to restrain him. Throughout the stretta, Amenophis opposes his will to that of the otherwise rejoicing Israelites.

The act sometimes ends with the scene between Pharaoh and Amenophis in which the King tells his son that he is to marry the daughter of the King of Assyria, much to the despair of Amenophis, who still loves Anaïs. There is, however, properly a scene for Amenophis and his mother Sinais in which the Queen, although she had earlier supported the Israelites' efforts to obtain liberation, laments in a fine aria the impending departure of Anaïs, Moses and the Hebrews, while Amenophis works himself into such a passion at the idea of losing Anaïs that he declares, to his mother's consternation, that he himself will kill Moses.

Act III. The Temple of Isis. Egyptians are worshipping the goddess, whose High Priest, Osiris, joins Pharaoh in making offerings to the deity. There follows a three-movement ballet, written of course for the Paris version and attractive in invention. Moses comes to claim the fulfilment of Pharaoh's promise, but the High Priest insists that the Hebrews should first render homage to Isis, to Moses' considerable indignation. Auphis, an Egyptian officer, reports a series of new plagues, the Nile's waters having turned red, earthquakes shaking the land, and the air being filled with insects. The High Priest tries to prevail on Pharaoh to punish Moses for these new disasters, while Sinais' voice urges her husband to keep his original promise. Again Moses lifts his staff, and this time the altar fire is extinguished. The fraught nature of the situation is celebrated in a fine ensemble, after which Moses and Osiris in turn demand justice from Pharaoh. The Egyptian King decrees that the Israelites shall be expelled from Memphis in chains and the finale ends as impressively as it began.

Act IV. The desert, in the distance the Red Sea. Amenophis renews his pleading with Anaïs, telling her ¹ Introduced in Moïse, as in Mosè, by three reiterated Cs, which originally made a unique and effective start to the evening.

² 'This entrance of Moses recalls everything that is sublime in Haydn ...' writes Stendhal.

he is prepared to renounce his claim to the throne of Egypt if she will marry him. He urges his devotion, but Anaïs is torn between her loyalty to the Israelites and her love for the prince who is their enemy; the situation is unresolved and they hide when a march announces the arrival of Moses and the Israelites, guarded and chained. This is the day on which they shall return to the Promised Land, Moses announces, but Miriam is sad that her daughter has stayed behind. Suddenly, Anaïs reappears to the joy of all, and announces that her freedom she owes to Amenophis who himself stands before them to demand her hand in marriage. When Moses bids her make her choice, Anaïs, torn as she is, decides in an aria to follow the Israelites in spite of her love for Amenophis. The Prince warns Moses that Pharaoh plans a treacherous assault on them as they march undefended, and admits that he himself must join this Egyptian army.

The scene changes to the shore of the Red Sea. Faced with an impossible crossing in front of him and an implacable army behind him, Moses prays to God in the most famous passage of the score, the prayer, added for the revival in Naples the season following the première, 'Dal tuo stellato soglio' ('Des cieux où tu résides, grand Dieu'), in which he is joined by the voices of Anaïs, Aaron and Miriam.

Anaïs sees the Egyptians about to attack, but Moses leads the Israelites into the sea, which miraculously parts leaving a passage for them to pass through. As the Egyptians follow, with Pharaoh and Amenophis in the vanguard, the waters close upon them, there is an orchestral depiction of the catastrophe which befalls the Egyptian army and the opera ends with a Cantique of thanksgiving for the Israelite leaders (cut in the Italian score of the French version). H.

LE COMTE ORY

Count Ory

Opera in two acts, libretto in French by Scribe and Delestre-Poirson. Première, Paris, 1825, with Cinti-Damoreau. Outstandingly successful in Paris, where 400 performances by 1884. First performed King's Theatre, London, 1829; Covent Garden, 1854, with Bosio, Marai, Lucchesi. Revived Florence Festival, 1952, with Barabas, Monti, conductor Gui; Glyndebourne at Edinburgh Festival, 1954, with Barabas, Oncina, Bruscantini, Wallace, conductor Gui; Berlin, Städtische Oper, 1957, with Barabas, Häfliger; Piccola Scala, Milan, 1958, with Sciutti, Berganza, Oncina; Sadler's Wells, 1963, with Elizabeth Harwood, Patricia Kern, Alexander Young; 1972, with Valerie Masterson and John Brecknock.

Raimbaud, friend to Comte Ory Baritone
 Alice, a peasant girl Soprano
 Comte Ory, a young and profligate nobleman Tenor
 Ragonde, companion to Comtesse Adèle Contralto
 The Tutor Bass
 Isolier, page to Comte Ory Mezzo-Soprano
 A Young Nobleman, friend to Comte Ory Tenor Comtesse Adèle Soprano

Place: Touraine

Time: The Crusades

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

Rossini's first work for Paris was Il Viaggio a Reims, performed in June 1825 with an astonishing cast of ten stars. Rossini used four numbers a couple of years later for his first opera in French, Le Comte Ory. Here they make a fine effect, but not so great, argue with some justification the admirers of Il Viaggio, as in the original.

Following the great success of Moïse in Paris, Rossini set to work on a light-hearted comedy in French style – this in spite of the fact that his mother, to whom he was devoted, had recently died. Scribe and Delestre-Poirson reworked a vaudeville they had written a dozen years before, doubling its length by adding another act (the first). The result has been very much admired, not least in France, where composers as different as Berlioz and Milhaud have praised it warmly, and revivals have been many and successful.

The story is of the dissolute young Comte Ory and his efforts (as unsuccessful as Don Giovanni's) to win the favours of a lady. The Comte de Formoutiers is away on the Crusades, leaving his sister, Adèle, and her companions without male protection in the castle. Determined to reach her, Comte Ory and a young scapegrace friend, Raimbaud, have dressed themselves up as hermits and are hanging about the gate of Adèle's castle, waiting for a chance to get in.

Act I. After a mainly martial introduction, Raimbaud summons the peasantry to the hermit's presence; let them put their offerings over on the bank – and no ribaldry. Ragonde comes to rebuke the crowd for its levity at a time when Countess Adèle is mourning her brother's absence; she and her mistress mean to consult the hermit with a view to alleviating their present distress.

Just then the Count appears; the tessitura of his cavatina ('Que les destins prospères') is high, like the rest of the role, and in it he offers his help to all and sundry, particularly those of the fair sex who lack husbands. In a typical crescendo ensemble, all ask for benefits which he confers. Ragonde, whom he has earlier addressed as 'dame trop respectable', tells him that the Countess and the other ladies of the castle have made vows Lysistrata-like to shun the society of men until the Comte de Formoutiers is back from the Crusades. Now she is lonely and depressed and, to the Count's delight, wants his advice.

In come the Count's tutor and his page, Isolier; the former looking for his elusive charge, the latter suggesting that he may find his lordship in this vicinity, for no better reason than that Isolier himself is in love with his cousin Adèle and sees a chance of being near her. In an aria the tutor complains of his unhappy lot, but he starts to smell a rat when he hears some girls singing the praises of a hermit who arrived eight days before – exactly the time the Count has been gone. Isolier in contrast suspects nothing: he sings a delightful, sprightly duet with his master, whom he does not recognise, and to whom (in search of spiritual advice) he unwittingly reveals his love for Adèle and his plan to gain admission to the castle disguised as a pilgrim. Ory resolves to adopt the plan himself.

Adèle now emerges to consult the hermit, and in an agitated aria ('En proie à la tristesse') admits that her self-denying vow has induced a fit of melancholy. The cure is simple, says the Count; she must fall in love – and forthwith he absolves her from her vow. In her cabaletta she accepts his advice and seems likely to fix her affections on her cousin Isolier until the hermit warns her against the machinations of the page of the notorious Comte Ory. At that moment the tutor arrives, recognises his charge and gives the show away. From different points of view all express horror at such a turn of events in a beautiful unaccompanied septet, at whose end the Countess receives news that her brother and his companions are likely to return home within a day. Reflecting on the short time he now has in which to accomplish his design, the Count leads off a brilliant allegro spiritoso ensemble, as delectable in invention as it is affirmative in effect.

Act II. Inside the castle, Adèle, Ragonde and their companions are waiting for the return of the crusaders. Surrounded by the women, they sing a duet, 'Dans ce séjour calme et tranquille', and congratulate themselves on their recent escape from the wiles of Comte Ory. Through the noise of a storm can be heard the sound of pilgrims intoning their chant. The Countess cannot refuse hospitality to the travellers and sends Ragonde, who comes back to say that they are nuns fleeing from the wicked Comte Ory. She brings with her the Mother Superior, who is of course the Count in disguise.

The Mother Superior protests the gratitude of all the nuns in a duet ('Ah, quel respect, madame') and slyly confides to the Countess that rumour has it that the Count loves her – which news causes that lady much indignation. Food is provided for the weary travellers and once they are alone their delight in their situation is expressed in a rollicking chorus. Only one thing is missing – and Raimbaud comes in to tell them in an aria that he has found it: wine! The drinking chorus is merry and infectious, but it changes quickly to the pilgrims' plaint when a footstep is heard approaching. It is the Countess to tell them that their accommodation for the night is prepared.

Isolier brings Adèle news of the imminent arrival of her brother, and when he hears of the nuns lodged within the walls he is filled with suspicion. He warns Adèle that she may be sheltering the Count himself, and, when they hear someone coming, volunteers to save her from the fate which seems to be in store for her. The Count attempts to make up to Adèle, but his advances are intercepted in the dark by Isolier, who loses no time in passing them on, one might say with interest, to his beautiful cousin. The trio ('A la faveur de cette nuit obscure') is the most celebrated number in the score; says Francis Toye: 'for loveliness of melody, originality of harmony, charm of part-writing, it is beyond praise, worthy of Mozart at his best. Berlioz, who cannot be suspected of undue tenderness towards Rossini, writes ... that this particular trio was, in his opinion, the composer's absolute masterpiece.'¹

Suddenly, trumpets are heard signalling the return of the crusaders. Ory is discovered, Isolier reveals himself, counters his master's fury with the threat to disclose all to his father, but relents to help him escape. The opera ends with the anticipated arrival of the returning warriors.

H.

¹ Rossini: a study in tragi-comedy by Francis Toye, Heinemann, 1934.

GUILLAUME TELL

William Tell

Opera in four acts, text by V.J. Etienne de Jouy and L.F. Bis, based on Friedrich Schiller's play. Première at the Opéra, Paris, 3 August 1829, with Cinti-Damoreau, Adolphe Nourrit, Henri-Bernard Dabadie, conductor Habeneck. The four acts were reduced to three in June 1831. First performed in London, Drury Lane, 1830 (in English); Her Majesty's, 1839 (in Italian); Covent Garden, 1845 (in French); New York, 1831 (in English), 1845 (in French), 1855 (in Italian). Revived, London Opera House, 1911, with Victoria Fer, Orville Harrold, conductor Ernaldy; at Metropolitan, New York, 1923, with Ponselle, Martinelli, and 1931, with Lauri-Volpi; Colón, Buenos Aires, 1923, with Spani, O'Sullivan, Galeffi; la Scala, Milan, 1930, with Bruna Rasa, Lauri-Volpi, Franci; Paris Opéra, 1932, with Norena, O'Sullivan, Huberty, Journet; Berlin, 1934, with Heidersbach, Roswaenge, Bockelmann, Bohnen, Kipnis, conductor Heger; Florence Festival, 1939, with Gatti, Mazaroff, Sved, Pasero, conductor Marinuzzi.

Guillaume (William) TellBaritone
 Hedwige, his wifeSoprano
 Jemmy, their sonSoprano
 Arnold, a Swiss patriotTenor
 Walter Fürst, a Swiss patriot.....Bass
 Melcthal, Arnold's father.....Bass
 Gessler, Austrian governor of SwitzerlandBass
 Mathilde, an Austrian princess.....Soprano
 Rudolph, commander of Gessler's archers.....Tenor
 Leuthold, a herdsman.....Baritone
 Ruodi, a fisherman.....Tenor
 Peasants, Knights, Ladies, Pages, Soldiers, Hunters,
 Three Bridal Couples

Place: Switzerland

Time: Thirteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 40 minutes

Rossini's last opera was written to fulfil the terms of an agreement with the French government. It is a noble work and must be considered, with Verdi's Don Carlos, the finest example of French Grand Opera; in it Rossini demonstrates a new interest in folk music, nature and the picturesque.

Switzerland is governed by a repressive Austrian regime, personified by its Governor, Gessler. Arnold, a young patriot, has saved the life of a Habsburg princess, and as a result they have, from the Swiss point of view unfortunately, and in spite of her nationality, fallen in love.

The overture has four distinct movements: five solo cellos evoke, according to Berlioz, 'the calm of profound solitude'; next, a storm; then a pastoral scene, with a Swiss herdsman's ranz des vaches; finally, a patriotic call to arms (allegro vivace).

Act I. On the shores of Lake Lucerne. At a village festivity, a triple wedding celebration presided over by Melcthal, a fisherman sings a charming song which turns into a quartet with Tell and his family; Melcthal would like to see his son as one of the bridegrooms. Arnold is reluctant to reveal his love for Mathilde, but in a fine duet ('Ah, Mathilde, idole de mon âme') Tell senses in him a certain ambivalence when open defiance of the occupying force is demanded. In the end, there is no doubt of his love for Mathilde but equally little about his patriotism. Nonetheless, he contrives to leave, and Tell, goaded by the sound of the distant hunt in which Gessler is doubtless active, goes to look for him.

The weddings proceed, a most attractive Pas de Six starts the dancing, but interruption comes with the precipitate arrival of Leuthold, who has killed an Austrian who attempted to rape his daughter. Tell volunteers to row him to safety. The Austrians headed by Rudolph arrive breathing fire and slaughter and, baulked of their prey, unavailingly question the villagers before carrying off Melcthal as hostage.

Act II. The mountains overlooking Lake Lucerne and neighbouring cantons. An Austrian hunting chorus is answered by a contrasting chorus of Swiss in devout mood. Mathilde, separated from the hunting party, in a beautiful aria celebrates her love for Arnold ('Sombre forêt'), who himself makes an appearance. Though the obstacles to their love are clear, they pledge faith in a duet and Arnold says that, in order to be worthy of Mathilde, he will win honour fighting in the Austrian army away from Switzerland. Tell and Walter Fürst work on his patriotic instincts (trio: 'Quand l'Helvétie est un champ de supplices') and clinch his support by revealing the murder of his father – one of the score's grandest movements, where moreover the high notes of the tenor cast as Arnold make most effect.

The second part of the act has the gathering of the Cantons, each differently and grandly characterised in music, and, at Tell's urging, the swearing of an oath to join in casting off the Austrian yoke (the music foreshadowing Meyerbeer's 'Bénédiction des Poignards', but celebrating a nobler cause).

Act III. A chapel in the grounds of the Governor's palace. Arnold tells Mathilde he must adhere strictly to the Swiss cause, partly out of patriotism, partly out of respect for his murdered father, and she reacts with sympathy. They suspect patriotism will keep them apart for ever (this scene is usually omitted in modern performance).

The Square at Altdorf. Celebration of one hundred years of Austrian occupation has been decreed, and orders are out for the Swiss populace to genuflect to Gessler's hat symbolically displayed. A series of vividly contrasted dances follows, some with chorus, and at their end Tell refuses to bow to the Austrian symbol and is recognised as having helped Leuthold escape. Gessler orders him to shoot an apple from his son Jemmy's head. Tell addresses his son in a fine aria: 'Sois immobile' (Hold yourself still). The shot succeeds but Tell has no compunction in admitting to Gessler that the second arrow he held was intended for him. When Gessler condemns both Tell and Jemmy to death, Mathilde makes a spirited intercession and demands in the King's name that Jemmy be handed over to her. Tell is taken off to prison.

Act IV. Melcthal's house. Arnold wants vengeance for his father's murder and at the same time recognises that with Tell in prison he is the natural leader of the revolt. He gazes sadly at his ruined home and pours forth his feelings in an aria ('Asile héréditaire'), famous in its own right and bristling with top Cs. In Rossini's day these were sung in a 'mixed voice' and only later (notably by the French tenor Gilbert Duprez) and to Rossini's distaste by the tenore di forza of modern times.

A rocky shore of Lake Lucerne. A storm is rising. To Hedwige Mathilde restores her son Jemmy (trio: Je rends à votre amour un fils digne de vous). Mathilde pledges herself as surety for Tell, Jemmy lights the beacon as a signal of revolt, all pray for Tell's safety, and Leuthold announces the appearance of Tell's storm-bound boat, which he is piloting but which also contains Gessler. He lands, pushes the boat away from the shore and fires an arrow straight to Gessler's heart. The Swiss are triumphant, Arnold laments that his father did not live to see the day, and a ranz des vaches banishes the storm and brings back the sun.

Guillaume Tell is a long opera and by 1831 Rossini had already prepared an abridged edition in three acts. This was subsequently revised but the four-act version did not return to the Paris stage until 1856; in 1868, the Paris Opéra celebrated 500 performances of Rossini's work, which remained in the repertory until 1932. Modern practice tends towards as nearly complete a version as the audience is thought able to stand, and there is little doubt that the opera's nobility and grandeur are most apparent when cuts are at a minimum. H.

ALBERT ROUSSEL

(born 5 April 1869, died 23 August 1937)

PADMÂVATÎ

Opera-ballet in two acts, libretto by Louis Laloy. Première at the Opéra, Paris, 1 June 1923, with Ketty Lapeyrette, Jane Laval, Paul Franz, Eduard Rouard, conductor Philippe Gaubert. Revived 1946, with Hélène Bouvier, Renée Mahé, Charles Fronval, Marcel Clavère. First produced Buenos Aires, 1949, with Bouvier; 1968, with Lyane Dourian, Jon Vickers, conductor Georges Prêtre; Naples, 1952, with Janine Micheau, Tygessen, Vieuille, conductor Cluytens; London, Coliseum (concert performance), 1969, with Rita Gorr, Jane Berbié, Albert Lance, Gérard Souzay, conductor Jean Martinon; Dortmund, 1997.

Ratan-Sen, King of Chitoor.....Tenor

Padmâvatî, his wife.....Contralto
Alauddin, the Mogul Sultan of Delhi.....Baritone
The Brahmin.....Tenor
Gora, steward of the Palace at Chitoor.....Baritone
Badal, Ratan-Sen's envoy.....Tenor
Nakanti, a young girl.....Mezzo-Soprano
The Sentry.....Tenor
A Priest.....Bass
Two Women of the Palace.....Soprano, Contralto
A Woman of the People.....Soprano
A Warrior.....Tenor

A MerchantTenor
 An ArtisanBaritone
 Warriors, Priests, Women of the Palace, Populace

Dancers: A Woman of the Palace, A Female Slave, A Warrior, Kali, Durga, Prithivi, Parvati, Uma,
 Gauri; Girls of the Palace, Female Slaves, Warriors

Place: Chitoor

Time: 1303

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Roussel was first in the East during his naval service and returned there in 1909 on a cruise, visiting among other places in India, Bombay, Ellora, Jaipur, Benares, as well as Ceylon, Singapore and Saigon. On his return, he wrote his orchestral triptych Evocations, in which his memories of Ellora, Jaipur and Benares live fully up to the title rather than indulging in any form of Oriental reminiscence. In 1914, Jacques Rouché became Director of the Opéra; he had been at the head of the Théâtre des Arts where in 1913 Roussel's ballet Le Festin de l'Araignée was given, and one of his first actions after his new appointment was to commission a lyric work from Roussel. The composer chose a subject which had attracted him during his Indian journey, and had finished the vocal score by the outbreak of war, orchestrating it in 1918, after ill health caused his retirement from the Navy, to which he had been recalled.

Roussel never attempted to superimpose Hindu melodic or rhythmic patterns on his music except where the works were of directly Oriental character, and his music remained entirely European. Certain sections of Padmâvatî, particularly those lyrical in character, make use of Hindu scale forms not usually found in Western music. The pantomime of the third scene of Act II starts with an imitation of the arpeggio-like sweep down the sympathetic strings with which sitar or sarode recitals customarily begin.

Chitoor has for ruler the noble and just Prince Ratan-Sen, married to the beautiful Padmâvatî, whose name denotes the sacred lotus or Padma. In the past, a Brahmin priest had fallen in love with Padmâvatî and was banished from Chitoor. He has now taken service with the Mogul ruler of Delhi, Alauddin, and to avenge himself on Ratan-Sen, he persuades Alauddin to attack Chitoor.

Act I. After a prelude, which starts slowly and atmospherically, the curtain rises to show the people of Chitoor in the public square in front of the palace. They await the arrival of Alauddin and his envoys, who are to discuss peace with Ratan-Sen, and girls garland the sacred images as a watchman announces the approach of the Mogul prince. Gora, steward of the palace, tries to reassure the crowd about their traditional enemies, but his own suspicions are roused when Badal tells him that behind the screen of the peaceful delegation the Mogul army is gathering in the plain.

The music, already full of anticipation of events to come, gathers momentum as Alauddin makes his appearance with the Brahmin priest in his entourage, and is hailed in a wordless chorus. Ratan-Sen proposes a pledge to their future alliance. Gora demands that the Brahmin leave them while they confer, but Alauddin insists on his favourite counselor remaining. At his guest's suggestion, Ratan-Sen orders a display of dancing, first to vigorous 5/4 and 3/4 rhythms by his soldiers, then by the female slaves to a less energetic but still lively 6/8 with a slow central section. Alauddin asks to see the Hindu palace dancers themselves, a right denied to unbelievers, saying that he has been converted to Hinduism by the Brahmin. After a languorous dance in triple time accompanied by wordless chorus, Alauddin makes his request to see Padmâvatî, the fame of whose beauty has travelled far, and the Brahmin in a beautiful aria passionately sings her praises. Ratan-Sen, in spite of misgivings, feels that he cannot refuse, and Padmâvatî appears veiled on a balcony among her women, among whom Nakamti in a song of considerable allure compares her beauty to the sun, which disperses night and awakens the flowers ('Elle monte au ciel où rêve le printemps'). The opening and often-repeated phrase of Nakamti's aria serves as motif for Padmâvatî and is unusually successful in that not only is it associated with her beauty, which Nakamti is specifically hymning, but it does not exclude the quality of modesty, by tradition all-important among Indian women.

When Ratan-Sen bids Padmâvatî lower her veil, Alauddin seems overcome by what he has seen and makes an excuse to leave. He puts off signing the treaty until the next day when he may bring appropriate gifts.

As the Brahmin is about to follow his master, he is recognised by one of the guards. He waits to hear the watchman report that Alauddin has left the city, then delivers his master's challenge: if Padmâvatî is not handed over to Alauddin (reference to Nakamti's song), the Mogul army already encamped in the plain will sack the city of Chitoor. Ratan-Sen's refusal is brusque and to the point, but the crowd lynches the Brahmin, who dies prophesying death for Ratan-Sen and Padmâvatî and destruction to the people of Chitoor.

In the final scene of this act, against a background of distant calls to arms, Padmâvatî laments that she should be the innocent occasion of disaster – a sacrilegious death has already occurred – and prays that she may meet death rather than be separated from Ratan-Sen.

Act II. A solemn prelude introduces the act, which takes place in the Temple of Siva,¹ containing a gigantic statue of the god, with a door in its base leading to the crypt. It is night. At dawn next day, if Padmâvatî has not been handed over to Alauddin, Chitoor will be sacked. Ratan-Sen is leading his warriors in a last desperate sally against the Moguls, and Padmâvatî has come to the temple to add her supplications to those which we hear rising solemnly from the crypt. The priests tell Padmâvatî that a supreme sacrifice at dawn is required, but when Padmâvatî offers herself to die, she is told that there must be more than one victim.

Ratan-Sen appears in the temple, wounded and with the news that his soldiers are defeated and a truce granted only until dawn. He tries to explain the full horror of the situation to Padmâvatî, but she cannot imagine him allowing more than her dead body to fall into the hands of the Mogul king. He describes the suffering the people of Chitoor will have to undergo if Alauddin is refused, and she at last understands what he means. To forestall the sacrilege which she sees he is planning to commit, she stabs him to the heart in full knowledge that custom demands that she commit suttee² on her husband's funeral pyre.

The third scene is a great ritual of death. First,

Padmâvatî is prepared for her immolation. As she sings a lament ('O mes sœurs fidèles') she is attired as a bride by the priestesses. Next comes an extended dance sequence. A fire is lit which provides the illumination for a mime-dance by four vampire-like figures. These are succeeded by the two figures presaging death, Kali and Durga³, who dance in narrowing circles round Padmâvatî, the chosen victim. The funeral ceremony reaches a climax when the priests garland first the body of Ratan-Sen, then that of the living Padmâvatî, at the same time as are heard the first lamentations of the crowd outside the palace.

At the first rays of sunlight, the procession starts to move. The body of Ratan-Sen is carried slowly to the crypt, Padmâvatî following half walking, half carried. As Ratan-Sen's funeral pyre begins to blaze and Padmâvatî with a supreme gesture of terror is gently carried into the crypt, the music reaches its final climax. There is a great shout as Alauddin bursts through the temple door, but all that he can see is the smoke slowly drifting up from the crypt, as the orchestra recalls Nakamti's celebration of Padmâvatî's beauty.

The opera is Roussel's most ambitious project. It could be argued that he is less than perfectly served by his poet, and certainly there is more urgency in music than libretto. The composer deals in sustained musical shapes, and drama for him lies in the musical expression of the powerful overall theme rather than in portrayal of immediate situation, of clash of motive or will, of violent incident. Characterisation is incidental, but what is notable is the composer's ability to organise, whether the long opening movement with its processions and its messengers, the extended and contrasted dance scenes in both acts, or the quasi-finale of the first act (taking the concluding scene of that act as reflective comment on its main action). The musical splendours of the choral funeral procession bring to a most impressive end an opera whose almost complete neglect ever since it was written seems unbelievable.

H.

¹ Siva: one of the major gods of the Hindus. 'In the worship of Siva', says Benjamin Walker's Hindu World, 'was centred that element of dread and uncertainty that is associated with the unknown and the unfathomable.' Siva is at the same time destroyer, creator and preserver.

² Suttee: the ancient Hindu custom where the widow commits suicide (preferably voluntarily) on the funeral pyre of her husband.

³ Kali and Durga: Kali, an aboriginal goddess, wife of Siva and black of visage, is associated with death, as is Durga, a renowned slayer of demons.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN

(born 28 November 1829, died 20 November 1894)

Anton Rubinstein was not only a magnificent pianist but a prolific composer in all forms, and a highly effective organiser. He was instrumental in founding the Russian Musical Society, which became the Leningrad and later the St Petersburg Philharmonic; also the State Conservatory, where he was the teacher of Tchaikovsky. Balakirev said of him 'He is not a Russian composer, but a Russian who composes.' He was highly successful out of Russia, and half his nineteen operas were written in German. Even his greatest admirers describe his work as uneven: Nero, for instance, commissioned by Paris, was rejected and, in spite of some early success – Caruso made a striking recording of one of the arias – has disappeared. Only The Demon remains even remotely a candidate for the repertory, although revivals suggest life left in it yet. H.

THE DEMON

Opera in a prologue, three acts and an epilogue, text by Pavel Viskovatov after the poem by Lermontov. Première Mariinsky Theatre, St Petersburg, 13/25 January 1875, with Ivan Melnikov as the Demon, Wilhelmina Raab as Tamara, conductor Eduard Nápravník (100 performances in St Petersburg by 1884). Performed at Covent Garden, 1881, with Lassalle, Albani (in Italian); Wexford, 1994, with Anatoly Lochak, Marina Mescheriakova, conductor Alexander Anissomov.

The Demon.....Baritone
 The Angel.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Tamara, *daughter of Gudal*Soprano
 Gudal, *a Georgian prince*Bass
 Prince Sinodal, *Tamara's fiancé*Tenor
 An Old ServantBass
 Tamara's NannyMezzo-Soprano
 A MessengerTenor
 Servants, Guards, Monks, Mourners

Running Time: 3 hours

Prologue. Near Prince Gudal's castle in the Caucasus. To the spirits of hell, earth and heaven, the Demon expresses his disillusionment (Monologue: 'Accursed world'). An Angel reminds him that love can restore him to heaven. He rejects the notion.

Act I. By the river Aragva, Tamara and her Nanny, dreaming happily of her forthcoming wedding, first hear and then see the Demon. In a wild place Prince Sinodal is menaced by the Demon, then set on by Tartars and killed.

Act II. Guests gather for the wedding and there is dancing. Suddenly, the mood changes, and the body of the dead Prince is brought in. Tamara weeps but the Demon's voice with great solemnity forbids her to mourn (Romance: 'Do not weep, child'), then equally majestically tells her he will come for her when night falls (Romance: 'On the ocean of the air'). She seems in a daze and her father reluctantly agrees when she begs to be allowed to retire to a convent.

Act III. The Convent. The Demon gazes at Tamara's window and declares Tamara is already his. An Angel bars the way.

Tamara's cell. Tamara's romance begins the second scene, which is cast in the form of an extensive seduction duet. She is troubled by dreams of the stranger. She and the Demon gaze at one another and he sings gravely 'I am he whom you heard'. She orders him to be silent but he pours out his woes and confesses she is all he sought before he was cast out of heaven. She feels compassion, and asks him to forswear evil, then at first light begs him to leave her. She struggles and eventually admits her love for the Demon and seals it with a kiss. She dies.

Epilogue. The Angel appears to save Tamara's soul, and the Demon curses heaven and earth. Apotheosis: voices of angels bearing Tamara to heaven can be heard, and the Demon is denied redemption through love of Tamara.

This is a fine, romantic score, replete with grand choral movements and a number of good solo parts. The Prince, though confined to a single act, is far from negligible, Tamara has attractive music to sing, but the finest role is that of the eponymous baritone. He is powerfully declamatory and grandly lyrical by turns, and the monologues with which he dominates the action, static though they mostly are, make a splendid effect in the right hands. The role is essentially baritone but Fyodor Chaliapin made good use of its opportunities, as his gramophone recordings bear witness. H.

S

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS

(born 9 October 1835, died 16 December 1921)

SAMSON ET DALILA

Samson and Delilah

Opera in three acts, text by Ferdinand Lemaire. Première at Weimar (at Liszt's instigation), 2 December 1877, with Müller, Ferenczy, Milde, conductor Lassen. First performed in France, Rouen, 1890, with Bossy; Paris, Opéra, 1892, with Deschamps-Jéhin, Vergnet, Lassalle, Fournets, conductor Colonne.

Dalila (Delilah), a Philistine.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Samson, a Hebrew.....Tenor
 High Priest of DagonBaritone
 Abimelech, Philistine satrap of Gaza.....Bass
 An Old HebrewBass
 A Philistine MessengerTenor

Hebrews, Philistines

Place: Gaza

Time: B.C.

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Saint-Saëns was composer, scholar and pianist of Serudition and sensibility, editor of Rameau, performer of Mozart, with a wealth of chamber and symphonic music to his credit. It is in some ways surprising that his most famous opera should be noted mainly for its sensuous melody, though Dalila's solos and the last-act Bacchanale are in their own way quite unsurpassed. Samson as a whole is a powerful work, full of contrast, and remains a sure-fire hit given a mezzo-soprano with a fine voice and physique to match, and a tenor as heroic an actor as he is in voice.

Samson et Dalila got off to a bad start. Saint-Saëns's friends did not like the music when he played it to them, Pauline Viardot's advocacy cut little ice, the biblical subject caused managerial heads to shake, Liszt's interest at one time seemed unlikely to survive the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, and the first French staging did not occur until thirteen years after the Weimar première. The opera's subsequent popularity suggests its early history is a more accurate comment on the period than on the work itself.

Act I. Gaza. The Hebrews are forced by the Philistines to work (fugue: 'Nous avons vu nos cités renversées'). Only Samson has faith in God's promise of liberty and addresses his compatriots in stirring terms: 'Arrêtez, o mes frères' and 'L'as-tu donc oublié?' His third outburst induces in the Hebrews a new spirit of defiance and attracts the attention of Abimelech, who comes in with guards and pours scorn on the God who so signally fails his people in their plight. Samson slays Abimelech and then, as Israel's champion, sets out to complete the work of liberation ('Israel! romps ta chaîne!').

Dagon's High Priest may rage ('Maudite à jamais soit la race') but he cannot rouse the Philistines to effective resistance, and the Hebrews are left masters of the centre of Gaza. They sing God's praises and a group of Philistine girls, Dalila at their head, appears to pay tribute to the victorious Samson: 'Je viens célébrer la victoire'. An old Hebrew solemnly warns Samson against the wiles of Dalila but he is besotted with his old love for her and his prayer for strength to resist is doomed to failure from the start. To a seductive tune, the girls dance, and Dalila, in spite of the reiterated warning of the old Hebrew, completes her ensnarement of Samson in the languorous aria 'Printemps qui commence'.

Act II. The Valley of Sorek. A rich orchestral introduction paints a dark picture as the seductress waits for her victim and in an aria invokes love to further her revenge: 'Amour, viens aider ma faiblesse'. Here we have a new mixture, steely determination added to the voluptuous quality already apparent in 'Printemps qui commence' – a potent combination indeed!

To her comes the High Priest. The Hebrews have overrun the town, he tells her, Philistine soldiers fleeing before Samson, who is rumoured to have renounced the love he once had for her. The Priest offers her money if she will deliver Samson to him, but she is confident he is still her slave and she will trap him for her own reasons of revenge. Their duet ends with a ferocious joint declaration of hate.

To an orchestral background which foreshadows the accompaniment to her forthcoming aria, Dalila wonders if Samson's love will bring him to her. When he arrives, it is plain that the struggle between infatuation and duty has ended in victory for the former; a love scene develops, culminating in Dalila's 'Mon coeur s'ouvre à ta voix' (Softly awakes my heart), than which opera contains few more seductive melodies. Samson joins in the second verse, then, after protesting his love, somehow summons up reserves of resistance and refuses to tell her the secret of his strength. She rushes into her house, and after a moment of indecision Samson goes after her. Dalila's cry followed by Samson's howl of anguish summons the Philistines, who burst into the house.

Act III. A prison in Gaza. If Act II is Dalila's, Act III is unquestionably Samson's. The orchestra suggests the grinding of the mill, which the blinded giant must push on its punishing round, and his voice mingles with the complaints of captive Hebrews who blame him for their plight as he gives magnificent expression to his despair and repentance ('Vois ma misère, hélas').

Philistines drag him to the celebration of their triumph in the Temple of Dagon (to which the scene changes); the singing is reminiscent of the first act's elegant greeting to spring. The Bacchanale which follows initially contains pastiche eastern music of a distinctly elegant cast, then a wonderfully sumptuous passage before it degenerates into orgy. Samson, led in by a child, is mocked for his love of Dalila by all and sundry, including the false temptress herself, who does not scruple to reveal that hatred, not love, prompted her to seduce him. Samson's rage strikes fear into nobody and as libations are poured the High Priest with Dalila leads a spirited chorus of praise for Dagon ('Gloire à Dagon'). Samson prays for strength, then quietly asks the child to lead him between the two pillars which support the Temple. While the intoxication of the feast seizes everybody, he clasps the pillars, then, with a terrible crash, pulls them down and buries the Philistines and himself in one last gesture of defiance.

H.

AULIS SALLINEN

(born 9 April 1935)

Aulis Sallinen studied in Helsinki under Aare Merikanto and Joonas Kokkonen. He has written music in all forms, including three operas and a ballet. To Western ears Sallinen's music is in line from Sibelius and, in his operas, from Mussorgsky, and is plainly influenced by Russian neighbours, Prokofiev and Shostakovich. Echoes of Janáček, Britten and Tippett may suggest themselves but the effect on his style of successful Finnish operatic composers such as Aare Merikanto with his Juha and Leevi Madetoja with Pohjalaisia may be less immediately apparent. The point is that a Finnish operatic style exists, however little it has travelled, and that Sallinen belongs to it and is not, with his teacher Kokkonen (whose opera The Last Temptations appeared about the same time as Ratsumies), its begetter.

H.

THE HORSEMAN

Ratsumies

Opera in three acts, libretto by Paavo Haavikko. Première at Olavlinna Castle, 17 July 1975, during Savonlinna Festival, with Matti Salminen as Antti, Taru Valjakka, Anita Vätkki, conductor Ulf Söderblom. First performed in Germany, Kiel, 1980.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Antti, the Horseman | Baritone |
| Anna, his wife | Soprano |
| A Merchant of Novgorod | Tenor |
| The Merchant's Wife | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Judge | Bass |
| The Woman | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Yeoman | Baritone |
| Matti Puikkanen, an outlaw | Bass |

Peasants, Guards, Soldiers

Place: Russia (Novgorod), Finland

Time: The Middle Ages

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

The Horseman is an original libretto by Finland's leading contemporary poet, who places the story in Russia and Finland at the time of the union with Sweden. Its theme is partly patriotic and historical – Finland is a small, lonely country, caught between the hammer of Russia and the anvil of Sweden; partly human, about two people caught inside a situation; partly allegorical, about an involuntary spreader of division and dissent, authority and the individual, choice and its effect. The libretto seems highly poetic, even in translation, but the effect of the opera and its music is direct and powerful.

Prologue (spoken). 'A man's life fits into the area of his skin ... written in a small hand, a man's skin suffices for the story of his life ... Well now, if you want to hear a tale that tells of a man and a woman, of war, horses, women, luck, death, then listen.'

Act I. An off-stage chorus has already started to sing before the prologue finishes, and it continues into the first act (Easter in Novgorod). The house of a Merchant, where Anna and her husband Antti, the horseman, are bonded servants. The Merchant cannot rest and decides he wants to sleep with Anna. Is it true, she asks him, that a bear comes to the house at Easter time? Yes, to find itself a maiden – but you are hardly a maiden, he answers. What will you give me, asks Anna. I am a Merchant, I have already bought you once and never pay twice for anything, he answers. But in a short, ejaculatory aria, he articulates his sad Merchant's creed. To a surge of emotion in the orchestra, the Merchant says he can hear his Wife stirring, and he is sure she has a man there.

The chorus still chants as the Merchant's Wife circles round the Horseman, who is intent only on finding Anna. He must dress up as the bear who visits each household, seeking a maiden for itself and foretelling the future. She cajoles him (adagio con ritmo), and he puts on the bear skin in time to confront Anna and the Merchant, the latter pretending not to know who is inside the bear skin. What is the sweetest thing in the world, the bear asks; for a man, it is a woman's lap. He prophesies: the Merchant will always sleep with his present wife, will never lose in a business deal.

Anna takes her husband to task: in Novgorod, bears that talk out of turn are hanged. The Merchant's Wife demands that her husband kill these knowing slaves, but he instead commands the bear to tie her hands. He wants to know from the way the Horseman looks at her whether he has slept with her or not. The Horseman ties her hands, demands that the Merchant test the bond to see if it is well tied, then traps him too. Only fire will part these bonds, says the Horseman, and the Merchant, resigned to death, foretells that Antti will become a great king, and at his coronation will be lit two hundred candles, and a forest will move and walk before him.

Anna and Antti make their escape from the burning house, the Horseman delirious at his deed, Anna trying to recall him to reality and convince him that the others have died. Do you want the bear, he asks. If I don't want it, I don't want you. And you I want.

Act II. The law court at Olavlinna is introduced in forthright, energetic music. A Woman is accused of having killed her bastard child. She denies the charge but the Judge says her appearance is against her and, when he asks whether he shall have women milk her breasts before the court, she admits that she is guilty but accuses a dark man who rode along the highway of being the father. Her description awakens memories in the Judge's mind – of a man from whom the thief (who will appear) says he bought a horse. Anna, Antti's wife, is in court and says quietly that, now she is a widow, she would wait for that dark unknown man.

It is the turn of the Yeoman, who insists that a horse he is accused of stealing, but on which he sent a man to the wars, is in fact rightly his. The Judge intervenes to say that he himself bought the horse, but the Yeoman says he would know it anywhere by the white blaze on its head. The Judge describes the man who sold him the horse, and names him as Antti.

Anna now steps forward and claims to be officially recognised as a widow, a demand the Judge refuses for lack of supporting evidence. Let her come back in a year and a night, and, if her husband has not returned – from Finland, from Russia, or wherever – he will make her a widow. A year is too long a time, she says, for one who sleeps alone; it is a cruel sentence. In an aria (misterioso) 'He comes in sleep', she graphically describes her loneliness, and the Judge appeals for evidence from the body of the court. The peasants speak up for her, saying among other things that she is in a cruel situation where anyone could claim to be her returning husband, whom she will know only if she sleeps with him. 'A night and a year' is the period which must elapse before he pronounces her a widow, says the Judge, threatening to add a further day every time from now on she protests the judgement.

Now the Horseman appears disguised as an old man and apparently to corroborate her evidence by saying he has on his travels met her husband and he knows he is now dead. But the peasants are saying he has a way with horses and even now tried to get away with one from the courtyard. First the Woman, in a beautiful solo utterance, then the Yeoman, then the Judge recognise the man's voice as respectively the seducer, the man to whom he lent his horse for the wars, and the man from whom he bought the horse he now claims is his. Anna knows him as her husband who disappeared after they had fled together after the crime in Novgorod. The Judge indicates that Anna, the Horseman, the Yeoman and the Woman be taken to the cells.

To the dungeon comes the Judge himself, his desire for the Woman awakened by seeing her in court, and she lures him into setting her free, whereupon the other prisoners tie him up and flee the prison.

Act III (the Attack). Anna, the Horseman, the Woman and the Yeoman are living a savage existence in the hut of an outlaw, Matti Puikkanen, which is to be found somewhere in Sääminki Forest in Finland. The Yeoman is happy that they are in a land where men can call themselves free, but he recognises that here there are three men and two women, a combination potentially dangerous except when one man is on guard and those who sleep even in number. The Woman complains of their life and Anna says she is waiting for her husband, Antti having become just another man. Matti has lost control of his wits, an example, the Yeoman says, of what happens if a man lives too long alone. Matti in a bold, bantering song says that before they came he and another man lived there with two sisters. He killed all three and they are still sitting there because he has never told them that they are not.

The Horseman comes in to raise the alarm but the Yeoman says it was he who roused the people round about to resist the claim that they fight for others in the war between Russia and Sweden.

There is a fine scene between Anna and the Horseman, as she tries to persuade him to leave with her. But he cannot bear the idea of being on the run again and feels himself part of the movement which is developing.

The Yeoman urges the peasants to accept his plan to capture the royal manor at Liistonsaari. The women will bake a great pie as a present for the sheriff, and they will take it to Liistonsaari with Matti inside. He will open the gates and they will capture the manor. The Horseman doubts the efficacy of the device, but the Yeoman plays on the greed of the peasants, telling them the manor is full of what they need to be rich, and popular feeling rises until Antti rather than the Yeoman is elected leader, and against his better judgement agrees to accept the challenge.

He reveals his plan. The men will be hidden under a net covered with branches, the women will approach the manor complaining of their treatment in the forest, a log will be thrust between the gates and the men will rush in. The new forest state they will found will stand between Russia and Sweden. They start to prepare their ruse, and the guards and the sheriff can be heard saying that it is only women approaching the gates, but are seen preparing in case an ambush is on hand. When the men rush forward, guns appear at the firing slits in the log defences and the attack is repulsed with great loss of life.

Antti is left alone dying, and sings of a great bird flapping towards its death. Anna and the women sing a lament (tranquillo) over his body and their dead hopes, and the sheriff is left with the last (spoken) lines: 'I have two hundred rat-chewed candles in the storehouse ...', whereupon the guards light the candles on the defensive walls and on the ground round Antti's body.

THE RED LINE

Punainen viiva

Opera in two acts, text by the composer, based on a novel of the same name by Ilmari Kianto. Première, Helsinki, 30 November 1978, with Taru Valjakka, Jorma Hynninen, conductor Okko Kamu. Toured extensively by Finnish National Opera with substantially this cast to London, 1979; Stockholm, 1980; Zürich, 1981; Moscow, Leningrad and Tallin, 1982; Metropolitan, New York, 1983. First performed in Germany, Osnabrück, 1985, Dortmund, 1985.

Topi, a crofter Baritone
 Riika, his wife Soprano
 Puntarpää, an agitator Baritone
 Simana Arhippainen, a pedlar Bass
 A Young Priest Baritone
 The Vicar Tenor

Neighbours

Kisa Soprano
 Jussi Tenor
 Tina Actor
 Raappana, a cobbler Actor
 Kunilla, his wife Actress
 Epra, an idler Actor
 Pirhonen, a policeman Baritone

Place: Finland

Time: 1907

Running Time: 1 hour 45 minutes

The opera, short but an epic nonetheless, is set in Finland in 1907, the year of the first election there under universal suffrage. The title refers both to a mark on the ballot paper and the line of blood which the bear leaves on Topi's throat at the end – the bear which throughout has symbolised not only the forces of nature against Topi and his like but inevitably Finland's great, sometimes sleeping, sometimes hostile, Eastern neighbour.

Act I, scene i. The house of Topi, a crofter. A bear has taken a sheep (we hear the reaction of the dogs to it on horn and off-stage chorus in a six-note motif) and Topi swears revenge, to the indignation of his wife Riika, who mocks him that he cannot even catch the smaller game they need to supplement what they grow. Their existence is miserable and Riika laments the present and thinks of the past, when she herself worked for farmers who not only had money but manners to go with it. Topi berates her for eternally harping on the same subject and for making her previous life out a paradise. When he was a kid, he worked in a lumber camp – hard, back-breaking work – and not until he was sixteen did he ever taste bread made from other than pine-bark. So much for the paradise of the past!

Touchingly, Topi tries to comfort her, but she tells him to fetch flour for their porridge and he comes back horrified that there is none left.

Scene ii. Topi collapses but gets little comfort when he dreams he asks the priest for poor-aid, but that worthy is unhelpful and scolds him for coming so seldom to church; through prayer comes help. The Church warms people's souls, says the Vicar, demanding to know what Topi has on his sledge. It is a coffin with the bodies of his three children inside, dead because the poor-aid did not arrive in time. He left it too late, says the Vicar, offering a cut-rate for the burial since there is but a single coffin.

Topi wakes up under the spell of his nightmare, then tells Riika he will go into the village and sell some birds he has caught, and buy grain. Riika watches him go, then in a monologue, gives way to sadness that she was cross with him. She knows he does his best to keep his family going, but worries about his babbling in his sleep, and particularly that he seems obsessed with the Vicar. Is he ill? What would happen to them if he died?

Scene iii. Simana Arhippainen, the pedlar, comes jauntily in with his followers, on his way to Karelia from a trading journey. In a folk-style melody he asks for shelter for the night; in return he will entertain the children. They ask him questions – do they smoke in Heaven, does God have a beard? Arhippainen can't tell them about God but the Emperor has got a beard. To stem the children's flow, Arhippainen starts in his turn to pose riddles, singing a strophic, folk-derived ballad which rattles along. 'What is swifter than a bird? What is blacker than a raven? What are whiter than swans? What cries louder than cranes? A thought is fleeter than a bird; a sin is blacker than a raven; angels are whiter than swans; thunder cries louder than cranes.'

Riika envies someone who can sing so cheerfully. She and her family have little to sing about – it will soon be Christmas, and they have nothing.

Topi returns home, bringing with him some coffee but somehow also changed in himself. He tells Riika he has been to a meeting where he has heard that there will be a new order. It wasn't a prayer meeting but there were speeches, and it all took place, not at the church, but at the nearby house of Kunilla, the cobbler's wife. She read a paper to them – 'the poor of the country have always been downtrodden, but there will soon be an end to this diabolical system' and so on. In March will be the election, and the poor of the country will draw a red line – a red line from the people's own blood, wonders Riika. Could that be sinful? But Topi is fired with the new message, particularly the bit which says every crofter and his wife will come to draw this red line which will set the upper classes by the ears.

Scene iv. We meet Puntarpää, the professional agitator, who has come with skilful insinuations to stir the poor and the downtrodden into action. His routine is well rehearsed. The people demand dignity; if it is not given them voluntarily, they will take it by force. The priests lie when they say the poor must be humble. A young priest interrupts to say that it is good someone is taking up the cause of the poor but wrong to let fanaticism destroy reason. If we are all spurred into anger and hatred, we shall be in worse case than before. The bystanders shout in protest but the priest demands to know which is better, hatred or love, revenge or forgiveness?

In a fury, the Agitator turns and denounces the young priest as a class enemy. There are three words to revolutionise the world: equality, liberty and fraternity. Equality means there will be no more rich and poor; liberty means you can speak as he is speaking now without fear of reprisal; fraternity that all will unite against such as priests and warmongers. It is a scene of real dramatic impact as he whips the crowd to a frenzy of agreement, then ends the meeting with a call to vote for the right candidates and so enable the Party to help them all.

Act II, scene v. Discussion is of the forthcoming election, and Riika, Topi and their neighbours read the tracts aloud. It is not nature which makes the poor miserable, reads Riika, but the heartless through their exploitation. Kisa in contrast predicts disaster, as she has seen terrifying omens – sun spots, and black-faced rats sweeping out of the forest like a fire, or like the new political poison, which seeks to destroy God's eternal order.

Argument is general but ill-informed, but their yearning after something they can't define is evident. How should a man draw this red line on the paper?

With your thumb, explains a neighbour – but you can't draw on paper with your thumb, retorts Topi. Press hard, until blood spurts, suggests the neighbour. Nonsense, says Riika; the Emperor will provide them with pencils. But how will we draw, asks Topi, with hands which have held axes and shovels, never pencils. As they speculate, the dogs start to howl (off-stage horn in the six-note theme), but they are too obsessed (in sextet) with the new problems to understand what the dogs can sense, that the big bear is turning in his winter sleep.

Scene vi. It is the time of the election, 15 March 1907, and there is a group of people round the young priest and another round the Agitator, arguing. Even the usually friendly village policeman puts on a show of formality as Riika and Topi come to the polling station to draw their red line on the paper.

Scene vii. The orchestra laments as Riika waits alone for Topi to return from the logging camp. In a monologue which expresses her despair, she prays that he will return soon, that someone, anyone, will come to relieve her misery. When someone appears, it is the low-spirited Kisa, the neighbour's wife, who has heard that the children are ill and wonders if they have been poisoned by the fearful red bird, the political plague, that has flown over the countryside. One has already died, and Riika and Kisa are singing a lament as Topi arrives. He is shattered to find his children are dead, and he goes off muttering to himself that if they are buried in one coffin, the Vicar may charge a reduced fee.

An orchestral threnody introduces the Epilogue. Kunilla is triumphant; the Party has won the election! All will henceforth be different, with land redistributed, the poor exempt from taxes, the rich and the clergy bereft of power. As the orchestra continues to lament, Kisa is unimpressed; can't Kunilla see that God has already punished this household for the wickedness of all? It's all the fault of the oppressors, snaps Kunilla; they have given no help.

Again the dogs, to the distinctive horn-choral theme, howl, and the family cow can be heard lowing in terror. Riika sees the bear, sees too Topi wrestling with it. 'Topi, are you alive? Topi!' But Topi, as the story ends, can no longer reply. He is lying quite still on a patch of snow, with blood seeping from his throat, across which runs a red line.

THE KING GOES FORTH TO FRANCE

Kuningas Lahtee Ranskaan

'A chronicle for music theatre about the coming ice age' in a prologue and three acts, libretto by Paavo Haavikko based on his radio play. First performed at the Savonlinna Festival, 1984; Kiel, 1986. U.S. première, Santa Fe, 1986, conducted by Richard Buckley. U.K. première (in English), Royal Opera, Covent Garden, 1987, with Ian McDiarmid as Froissart, Kim Begley as the Guide, Mikael Melbye as the Prince, Stafford Dean as the Prime Minister, Eileen Hannan and Sarah Walker as the Carolines, Valerie Masterson and Jane Turner as the Annes and Nuala Willis as the Queen, conducted by Okko Kamu.

Guide Tenor
 The Prince, later the King Baritone
 The Prime Minister, later his son,
 the Young Prime Minister Bass
 The Nice Caroline Soprano
 The Caroline with the Thick Mane Mezzo-Soprano
 The Anne who Steals Soprano
 The Anne who Strips Mezzo-Soprano
 The Queen Contralto
 The Blind King of Bohemia Silent
 English Archer Baritone
 Froissart Spoken
 French Prisoner Spoken
 Six Burghers of Calais, Subjects, Courtiers, Mercenaries

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Aulis Sallinen worked with his librettist Paavo Haavikko and the director Kalle Holmberg on a television series based on the Finnish epic, the Kalevala, called The Iron Age, out of which grew The King Goes Forth to France. Sallinen himself described it as 'a kind of fairy-tale for adults'.¹

Prologue. The English court; a garden in May. The Guide and Chorus describe England's plight as it enters a new Ice Age. The Prime Minister tells the Prince that it is time he married and introduces the four candidates he has chosen, two Carolines and two Annes.

Act I, scene i. The Nice Caroline, the Caroline with the Thick Mane, the Anne Who Steals and the Anne Who Strips encounter one another and work out which one of them will marry the Prince.

Scene ii. The Prince decides to take control. He means to leave England and cross the Channel, accompanied by his people and the army, as well as by all four candidates and Parliament (a large cannon). He decrees that from now on the Prime Minister's office will be hereditary.

Scene iii. The four ladies prepare to leave England. The Caroline with the Thick Mane imagines she is going to marry the Prince. The Nice Caroline persuades the others not to disabuse her.

Scene iv. The English coast. The Guide announces that there is a bridge on the ice across the Channel, so strong it could carry an army. The ladies take a sad leave of Britain as it is submerged in ice. As they cross the Channel, the Prince, now the King, makes friends with the Prime Minister.

Act II, scene v. The French coast. The Caroline of the Thick Mane waits for the King to declare himself, assuming that she will be his wife. The other ladies sing sarcastic songs to her but later, when they hear that the King has married a German princess, they comfort her.

Scene vi. As they march through northern France the Prime Minister becomes aware that the King and his army are recreating the route taken by King Edward when he invaded France and initiated the Hundred Years War. He also criticises the King for funding the campaign by pawning not only his crown but his Queen as well. Allies of the French King arrive, the blind King of Bohemia and a mercenary army of crossbowmen from Genoa on their way to Crécy.

Scene vii. The Battle of Crécy. The King watches its confused progress from a windmill, while his Prime Minister is on the ground, making notes. Suddenly the French King orders the destruction of his own Genoese crossbowmen, because they are in his way. The Prime Minister fires Parliament and so defeats the French.

Scene viii. The King of Bohemia and the crossbowmen have been killed in the battle and now long to return to Paris. An English archer brings in a French prisoner to show to the King, in the hope of getting a ransom. He tells the four ladies to look after him. The Prime Minister thinks the army should march on Paris but the King insists they next attack Calais.

Act III, scene ix. An encampment, autumn.

¹ Full Score, summer 1995.

During the siege of Calais an English Archer asks to be discharged so he can spend the winter in Paris. The King orders his back to be flayed, so that the discharge can be written on his skin. When the Archer begs to be allowed to retract his demand, the King orders his ears to be cut off and threatens that his tongue will be cut out if he presses his retraction.

Scene x. The Caroline with the Thick Mane looks after the maimed Archer, but is disgusted by his flirtation. She sinks deeper into her own fantasies.

Scene xi. Morning. The King has dreamed of the Nice Caroline. In the night, the Archer has been shackled to the Caroline with the Thick Mane by order of the King. The King is enraged when the Anne Who Steals and the Anne Who Strips quarrel. The ladies try to calm him down. The Nice Caroline reflects on women's role: they give birth and continue life.

Scene xii. The Prime Minister has died: his son takes over his role and introduces his secretary Froissart, who will chronicle history as it happens. The Guide asks the King to have mercy on the starving inhabitants of Calais. The King promises to let them live if the town's most important citizens plead for mercy.

Scene xiii. The Ladies prepare to welcome the Queen back: enough money has been collected to ransom her for one day, the King's birthday.

The Queen arrives and the Guide presents Six Burghers of Calais who beg for mercy. They accuse the peasants of treachery and cruelty, producing the maimed Archer's head as evidence. At first the King sentences the Burghers to death. Then he relents and appoints them to his War Tribunal, explaining that he is engaged in this war to conquer Paris, intending to capture and kill the King of France and finally to march south and meet the new wine. The King tells the Nice Caroline that he loves her and wants to go with her towards spring.

When someone asks why he wants to imprison the King of France, the King explains that he broke the rules of war by attacking in the rain. He orders the War Tribunal to decree that the French King's back be flayed.

The King orders the army to march on Paris. They hear cranes flying north, which signifies the advent of summer. A storm breaks. As they set off, the King orders Froissart to omit his part in history, for the King can take no responsibility for making himself; he is a product of time.

The King Goes Forth to France's combination of satire, history, fantasy and pageant proved a powerful experience in the theatre. Max Loppert described it as 'exciting, disturbing and continuously surprising'. The libretto seems by turns poetic and bizarrely portentous: its obliqueness failed to convince all listeners that it held enough meaning, whereas Sallinen's music had no problem in encompassing extremes of both humour and cruelty and in communicating vividly. P.

KULLERVO

Opera in two acts, libretto by the composer based on the epic poem Kalevala and Aleksis Kivi's play Kullervo (1864). Commissioned by Finnish National Opera to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of Finnish independence. Because the new opera house in Helsinki was not ready, it was first performed in Los Angeles, 25 February 1992, with Juha Kotilainen as Unto, Jorma Hynninen as Kullervo, Jorma Silvasti as Kimmo, Vesa-Matti Loiri as the Blind Singer and Martti Wallén as Kalervo, conducted by Ulf Söderblom. Finnish première, Helsinki, 30 November 1993, with the same cast and conductor (but Tapani Valtasaari as Unto). First French performance (of any Finnish opera), Nantes, in Finnish, 1995, conducted by Koen Kessels.

| | |
|---|---------------------------------|
| Kullervo, Kalervo's son | Baritone |
| Kullervo's Mother..... | Dramatic Soprano |
| Kalervo, also Kalervoinen | Bass-Baritone |
| Kimmo, Kullervo's childhood friend | Lyric Tenor |
| Ainikki, Kullervo's sister | High Soprano |
| The Smith's Young Wife..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Hunter..... | Tenor |
| Unto, also Untamo, Untamoinen, Kalervo's brother | Baritone |
| Unto's Wife..... | Contralto |
| Tiera..... | Bass |
| First Man..... | Tenor |
| Second Man..... | Baritone |
| Blind Singer ¹ | Middle-Range Voice ² |

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

¹ Sallinen has said that he was inspired to introduce this character as 'scenic relief', by a blind singer in the Provençal village where he spends half the year (Ars Lyrica, XII, I, 96).

² The composer's description from the score.

In turning to Finnish legend and the epic Kalevala for his fourth opera, Sallinen was at once returning to the roots of Finnish culture and making something of universal relevance: the grim brutality of inherited, internecine feuds based on the chain of revenge is familiar from Greek tragedy. That also provides a precedent for the equally grim humour that is so much a trademark of Sallinen's operas. There are suggestions that Kullervo's rearing is to blame for the boy turning out so badly, but such gestures in the direction of societal analysis carry nothing like the weight of the work's emotional impact.

Act I. In the Prologue the Chorus describe the feud between the brothers Kalervo and Unto. Gradually the dark palette of bass voices and timpani is lightened by sopranos and full orchestra. The story darkens, however, as the brothers meet in battle: Unto kills Kalervo's family and burns his house to ashes.

Scene i. Unto tells his wife that he dreamed of killing his brother and burning his house down. She blames him for not killing Kalervo's son Kullervo, who is now their slave. The chorus relates how Kullervo, now an orphan, was left to die on the ice.

Kullervo tells his childhood friend Kimmo that he longs for revenge. Kimmo saw how Unto's men trapped Kullervo's family in his house and set fire to it. In his anger and frustration, Kullervo tries to kill Kimmo and asks, how did he become so evil? Kimmo explains that while he was born a slave, Kullervo was forced into slavery. The Chorus ask God never to let a child suffer as he has.

Unto sells Kullervo to the Smith as a cattleherd. Kullervo refuses to say goodbye. The Chorus list the worthless goods the Smith gave in exchange.

Scene ii. The Smith's Young Wife is attracted to Kullervo. She gave him a loaf that she had baked in which she had put a stone to make him hard for her. Now it is evening and she waits for him to return from guarding the herd.

A Hunter passes by and reveals that Kullervo let wolves slaughter the cattle in revenge, because he broke his father's knife on the stone in the loaf. After a tense interlude punctuated by fortissimo timpani, Kullervo returns and quarrels with the Smith's Young Wife: she laughed at him for his inexperience when they went to bed together. She offers to ask the Smith to show mercy to him, but 'mercy' has poisoned his life. When she repeatedly calls him a slave (orja), he kills her with the knife. The Chorus call on Ukko, the ruler of the gods, to punish Kullervo with death.

A mysterious entr'acte interleaves three stories, each with its own sound world: while Kalervo describes how he survived the fire and his wife mourns for their daughter Ainikki, who disappeared, Kimmo makes a toy horse for Kullervo: now he knows that Kullervo's parents survived he plans to reunite the family.

Scene iii. Kullervo arrives at his parents' house. They guess who he is. Kullervo confesses that he murdered a woman but his mother will not let her husband banish their son. Kimmo blames himself for arriving late.

Act II, scene iv. Kullervo's Dream. According to the composer's own synopsis, 'Kullervo's rage, his humiliatingly unsuccessful affair with the Smith's Young Wife, and the fact that he does not get on with his father – all this erupts in a dream.' In it, the Blind Singer sings 'The Song of the Sister's Ravishing', an oblique account of how Kullervo made his sister Ainikki pregnant, before either realised who the other was. She committed suicide.

Scene v follows an Interlude. Kalervo refuses to acknowledge his son, but Kullervo has his revenge: he admits that he slept with his sister before he knew who she was. Kullervo is expelled from his home. He decides to burn down Unto's house. In what is probably the opera's greatest single number, his Mother tells him she will always weep for him.

Scene vi. Kullervo has joined up with self-interested accomplices, Tiera and two other men. For a fee the Hunter agrees to guide them to Unto's house. Kimmo tells Kullervo that his parents and his sister have all died. While the Chorus sings a lament, Kimmo describes how grief killed Kullervo's mother, Kalervo committed suicide and his sister disappeared into the forest. Kullervo swears revenge. Over a pounding timpani bass, the Chorus narrates Kullervo's slaughter of Unto and his family. Kullervo then goes to find Kimmo, 'in whom he sees a glimmer of hope and light' (composer's synopsis).

Epilogue. Kimmo has gone mad: he raves that he is on his way to the land of the fortunate with a vital message. He does not recognise Kullervo but identifies him as a Christ-like figure, bearing the world's sins on his shoulders. The opera ends as Kullervo says goodbye to his friend and throws himself into the fire, unafraid of death: 'It cannot be worse than life. That is how the world treated me.'

Sallinen has said he was attracted to the nineteenth-century treatment of the epic Kalevala by its modernism: the composer explained how exactly he understood this by his comment that Kullervo's own modernism was made concrete a few days after the première in Los Angeles, when the city's streets were filled with 'thousands of Kullervos in revolt'.¹ P.

THE PALACE

Palatsi

Opera in a prologue and three acts, English libretto by Irene Dische and Hans Magnus Enzensberger based on Ryszard Kapuscinski's The Emperor, in the composer's Finnish translation. First performance at the Savonlinna Festival, 26 July 1995, with Jaana Mäntynen as Constance, Ritva-Liisa Korhonen as Kitty, Sauli Tiilikainen as Valmonte, Jorma Silvasti as Petruccio and Tom Krause as Ossip, conducted by Okko Kamu.

| | |
|---|-----------------------------------|
| The King | Tenor |
| Constance, his wife | Soprano |
| Valmonte | Baritone |
| Petruccio | Tenor |
| Ossip | Bass-Baritone |
| Kitty, his wife, lady-in-waiting to the Queen | High Soprano |
| Physician | Tenor |
| Pillow Bearer | Tenor |
| Keeper of the Purse | Baritone |
| Executioner | Bass |
| Cuckoo | Male or Female Voice ² |
| First Petitioner | Bass |
| Second Petitioner | Contralto |
| Third Petitioner | Baritone |
| Fourth and Fifth Petitioners | Tenors |
| A Servant | Middle-Range Voice |
| Defence Counsel | Spoken |
| Courtiers | |

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

The unique flavour of The Palace owes much to the libretto. The central characters are borrowed from Mozart's Entführung, but the theme also reflects the debate that ensued after the Wende, the fall of the Berlin Wall and the reunification of Germany. Before it fell, Enzensberger once wrote a poem for Fidelio beginning, 'Nein, die Bastille ist noch nicht gefallen' (No, the Bastille has not yet fallen). The Palace is in a sense a sequel to that vision, in the form of a witty parable on power and its abuse. The libretto's poetry ensures, however, that this is not a simple, didactic tale: it has room for different qualities and moods and inspired Sallinen to write a breathtakingly varied opera, covering much musical and emotional ground within a brief span, without a wasted note. The overture's grand scale – it lasts almost seven minutes – alerts us to the more serious implications of the story.

Prologue. For three days Ossip and Petruccio, the King's closest courtiers, have been waiting for him to emerge from his bedroom. They dare not enter, in case he is offended by this break in protocol. Courtiers are aware that no one seems to be in charge; they try to sing the Morning Chorale, but without success. Valmonte stops Ossip from entering the bedchamber and sends in the Physician in Ordinary, whose diagnosis is always positive, since displeasing the King incurs hanging. Valmonte takes charge: he tells the Pillow Bearer and the Keeper of the Purse what to do. He tells everyone to reach into their pockets. They do so and discover giant chocolate coins covered in gold paper. Valmonte is joined by his henchmen dressed like the K.G.B.

Act I. The Palace Hall, three days earlier: the rest of the opera traces the way the 'fascist' coup at the end of the prologue was prepared. Petruccio is rehearsing the chorus when Valmonte introduces himself: recently returned from abroad, he now intends to 'get his foot in at the palace', through Petruccio, who has access to Constance, the King's spokesperson. The Cuckoo announces the time, the 'Hour of the Most Venerable Body', and the Physician gives a favourable report on the King's stool. The King emerges and tosses coins to the crowd, who present petitions. Until the last scene we do not hear the King speak: Constance relays his answers. When the Cuckoo announces the Hour of the Assignments, Valmonte offers his services as a spy. He is appointed Keeper of the Imperial Door and Secretary of Future Affairs. At the Hour of Justice, a man is condemned to death for sneezing. His Defence Counsel sneezes and is also condemned. Meanwhile Constance quizzes Valmonte on life outside.

¹ Ars Lyrica, XII, I, 96.

² The composer's own definition in the score.

Act II. Later the same afternoon a series of dialogues traces the course of corruption within the palace, though this takes very different forms. Ossip advises the King in his private gardens that Valmonte has got the palace wired, while Petruccio tells him that the Department of the Interior needs watching. In another part of the gardens Ossip's wife Kitty longs to sample such aspects of life outside as fashions and Harrods' catalogue. Sallinen's music alerts us to the more serious gulf between husband and wife. They are watched by the King and by Constance. She repeats the riddles he asks her in an inaudible whisper, and answers them. Ossip leads the King away, leaving the women together. Kitty no longer loves her husband; Constance feels the palace is a prison. They resolve to taste life outside.

Petruccio shows off the goods he has smuggled in from abroad: mobile telephone, fax machine, vodka, pornography etc. In a splendidly catchy, jazzy duet, he tempts Ossip who agrees to embrace 'Graft, corruption, filth and greed'. Valmonte gradually tempts Constance with visions of life outside, where there is no ritual, but she remains afraid of change. In the same scene, Kitty and Petruccio dream of the more trivial benefits of Western consumerism: 'silicone' rhymes with 'gramophone'. While Sallinen deploys jazz melodies and a saxophone for their duets, a richly eloquent, serious idiom is used for Valmonte's dialogues with Constance. The King overhears their conversation.

Act III. During a banquet in the Palace Hall (attended by beggars, who bash their plates to great aural effect), the King, who has disguised himself as one of the beggars, pleads with Constance to stay. Ossip does not recognise him and orders his arrest as a troublemaker. Constance knows she has failed her husband. Ossip declares a state of emergency. Constance and Kitty find themselves locked out of the Palace and 'on their way to escape'. The last scene shows the empty Palace Hall: the doors of the royal bedchamber open from within to reveal Valmonte, wearing the King's decorations and carrying his baton. The anarchy and despair of the banquet scene have died and yielded to electronic noise and then to a dry timpani march. When Valmonte raises his hand, the music stops 'in the middle of the bar'.

The Palace's sound worlds are so disparate that it almost seems to comprise several different operas: conversational jazz co-exists with comic patter, with the most serious, lyrical intensity (some wonderful writing for soprano voice) and, at the end, with electronic desolation. David Murray in the Financial Times commented that 'Nobody who appreciates Sondheim would find the least difficulty with Sallinen here.'

P.

ARNOLD SCHOENBERG

(born 13 September 1874, died 13 July 1951)

ERWARTUNG

Expectation

Monodrama in one act (four scenes), libretto by Marie Pappenheim (composed 1909, published 1916). Première, Prague, 6 June 1924 (during I.S.C.M. Festival), with Marie Gutheil-Schoder, conductor Alexander Zemlinsky. First performed Wiesbaden, 1928; Berlin, 1930, with Moje Forbach, conductor Klemperer; Hamburg, 1955, with Helga Pilarczyk; Holland Festival, 1958, with Pilarczyk, conductor Hans Rosbaud; Sadler's Wells, 1960, by New Opera Company, with Heather Harper; Covent Garden, 1961, with Amy Shuard, conductor Georg Solti.

The Woman.....Soprano

Running Time: 30 minutes

Schoenberg completed the enormously complex though short score in the unbelievably short space of seventeen days, in the period when to all intents and purposes he had abandoned tonality but had not yet evolved the twelve-note system.

Written for a single voice and full orchestra, the opera – called 'Monodrama' by its composer – is concerned with the half-demented ravings of a woman

Erwartung (Netherlands Opera, 1995, director Pierre Audi, sets Jannis Kounellis, costumes Jorge Jara).
Isolde Elchlepp as the Woman.

searching along a moonlit path through a forest for her lover (maybe in a nightmare). She sings in broken phrases of 'their' garden, of the night, the forest, the moon, is terrified by imagined pursuit and wild beasts and shadows, by a log she mistakes for a body. At the end of the third brief scene, she rushes out into the woods leaving the orchestra to give a vivid impression of a thudding, terror-ridden heart such as is found nowhere else in music.

In the fourth and last scene, which amounts to nearly half the work, the woman finds herself near a darkened house and is terrified by the deathly silence. She stumbles over her lover's body, shot dead by her rival, and the rest of the scene consists of hysterical mourning, references to the involvement of another woman, attempts to revive the dead man and cries for help. Eventually, she rises from the corpse and wanders off, muttering 'I was seeking ...' as the orchestral sound evaporates into the air with a cold shiver of ascending semi-quavers as if an icy finger were running down the spine. H.

DIE GLÜCKLICHE HAND

The Fateful Hand

Drama with music, text by the composer. Première Vienna, 14 October 1924, with Alfred Jerger, conductor Fritz Stiedry (production by Josef Turnau). First performed Royal Festival Hall, London (in concert), 1962.

A ManBaritone
A WomanSilent
A Gentleman.....Silent

Chorus: Three Each of Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass

Running Time: 20 minutes

The Expressionist opera was begun a year after Erwartung, but Schoenberg allowed other works, notably Pierrot Lunaire, to intervene and finished it only in 1912–13. The music – freely atonal – nonetheless remains closer to Erwartung than to Schoenberg's later work. The action is short, and involves only one singing character, although two others invade the stage from time to time. Schoenberg specifies highly detailed stage directions and, more particularly, constantly changing lighting effects, and it is not surprising that the period of composition coincided with one of the composer's intense periods of activity as a painter.

The action, dream-like, is of course symbolical, and differing scenarios have from time to time been imposed. The protagonist is lying on the ground with a monster – a hyena, with bat-like wings, says the libretto – on his back. Through the backcloth can be spied the faces of the chorus – the Man's inner voices – asking why the Man wastes his time looking for earthly rather than spiritual fulfilment (he is doomed somehow to fail, and this is his fate). When the Man stands, he is seen to be ragged and bleeding. He sings of his love for the Woman who enters, but her regard for him wanes as she offers him a goblet and she turns towards a well-dressed Gentleman, into whose arms she rushes. She asks the Man's forgiveness but then turns away once again.

Workmen are active in one of two grottoes, fruitlessly it would appear, until the Man constructs a jewel and throws it to them. A wind gets up amounting to a storm and the Man displays horror until the Woman emerges from the other grotto with a bit torn from her dress, which the Gentleman she had earlier preferred to the Man is seen holding. When the Man tries to keep her with him, she kicks a large rock on to him. The rock turns into the monster of the beginning, the chorus reappears and the work ends much as it had begun. H.

VON HEUTE AUF MORGEN

From One Day to the Next

Opera in one act, text by 'Max Blonda'.¹ Première, Frankfurt, 1 February 1930, with Else Gentner-Fischer, Benno Ziegler, Elisabeth Friedrich, Anton Maria Töplitz, conductor Wilhelm Steinberg. First performed Naples, 1953, conductor Hermann Scherchen; Holland Festival, 1958, with Erika Schmidt, Magda Laszlo, Derrik Olsen, Herbert Schachtschneider, conductor Hans Rosbaud; Vienna, Theater an der Wien, 1965.

The WifeSoprano
The HusbandBass-Baritone
The FriendSoprano
The TenorTenor
The ChildSpoken

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 55 minutes

¹ The composer's second wife, Gertrude Kolisch.

Von heute auf morgen (Netherlands Opera, 1995, director Pierre Audi, sets Jannis Kounellis, costumes Jorge Jara).
David Wilson-Johnson as the Man, Marilyn Schmiede as the Woman.

Written in 1928, twenty years after the completion of Erwartung, Von heute auf morgen is the only genuine comedy in the composer's output and his choice of subject was influenced, it is said, by his admiration for Hindemith's Neues vom Tage. The comedy has, however, serious overtones, portrayed along almost Aesopian lines, Schoenberg's moral being that 'the so-called modern, the merely modish, exists only "from one day to the next"'. The tale is set in the framework of a domestic scene which is quickly

The music, written in clear and easily perceptible forms, is at the same time elaborately textured and extremely expressive, although by the time it was written Schoenberg had evolved the twelve-note

¹ Based on an episode from the life of the composer Franz Schreker.

Schoenberg started work on the music of his only full-length opera, his last, in 1931 and the second act was finished in Barcelona in 1932, but he seems to have had the work in mind from the mid-1920s. The circumstances of the third act remain something of an enigma. The text exists: in 1949 he wrote that he had already to a great extent conceived the music and could write it in 'only a few months', in 1950 that he had found 'neither time nor mood for the composing of the third act ... that depends upon my nervous eye affliction'; later the same year, 'it is not entirely impossible that I should finish the third act within a year'. But in the year in which he died: 'Agreed that the third act may simply be spoken, in case I cannot complete the composition.' In the event, most people who have heard the two acts of the opera in performance are agreed that it is in no sense a fragment, but a complete and stageworthy work as it stands. Scherchen's experiment in Berlin, where he performed the third act with music taken from Act I, met with little approval.

The text is the composer's own and represents his religious and philosophical thoughts. The drama lies in the conflict between Moses the thinker and Aaron the man of action; Aaron's every attempt to give practical expression to Moses' thoughts results in compromise and a debasing of ideals. To realise his conception, Schoenberg makes very considerable demands on his vocal forces. There are only two long solo parts, Moses and Aaron, but the smaller roles and solo ensembles are complicated and vitally important. The emphasis laid on the chorus is quite out of the ordinary, and there are various semi-chorus groups to be contrasted with the main body. They are asked to speak as well as sing, and often the two methods of expression are combined to remarkable effect. 'The speaking is part of the music and, in the score, written out in musical notation. Within the ensemble of voices its effect is similar to that of the percussion in the orchestra, especially in respect of rhythmic precision; at the same time the notes also indicate the intonation of the spoken phrases, so that spoken melodies are heard; and spoken chords are produced by the different voices of the chorus (though the pitch remains indefinite).'¹

Act I. The Calling of Moses. There is no prelude, but soft, slow chords (including six solo voices in the orchestra pit) introduce Moses at prayer. The six solo voices in the orchestra and a spoken semi-chorus answer him from the Burning Bush. He is called to lead the Israelites out of Egyptian bondage, and to his protest that he is old and unable to convince the unbelieving people, the answer comes that Aaron his brother will be his mouthpiece. The singing and speaking choruses proclaim God's promise to the Israelites that they are His chosen people.

Moses meets Aaron in the Wasteland. Grazioso music of almost chamber music delicacy introduces the second scene (it is associated with the character of Aaron). Though Aaron immediately understands the part he must play in fulfilling the destiny of the Israelites, it is apparent that he and Moses approach their task from opposite points of view. 'To Moses, God is pure thought – unimaginable because any attempt at an image distorts the idea. "Thou shalt not make unto thyself any graven image ..." The disparity between an idea and its realisation, which Schoenberg symbolises in the figures of Moses and Aaron, penetrates into every field of human affairs. Things are never as they were expected. Any work of art is an inadequate image of the artist's original conception. Religious, political, social ideals become idols in reality. Aaron however is simpler-minded and his view of things dictated by emotions. He greets the mission of liberating his people with great enthusiasm, but does not understand what is implied in Moses' conception of God. He asks: "Invisible? unimaginable? ... can you love what you dare not imagine?" Moses sternly replies: "Dare not? Unimaginable? ... Purge your thinking, free it from the trivial, devote it to truth; no other reward will thank your sacrifice".'² The duet, with its unique combination of singing tenor and speaking bass, is most impressive.

Moses and Aaron bring God's message to the people. Three young Israelites have seen Aaron in a state of religious exaltation, but others, particularly the priests, are less inclined to believe that a new God will deliver them from Pharaoh. A great chorus, partly singing, partly speaking, develops as Moses and Aaron are seen approaching from the distance. Together they proclaim God and his purpose. When the people demand a God they can understand if they are to follow him, Moses feels that he has failed in the task for which he was chosen, but Aaron snatches his rod and rouses the people to a state of religious mania with his miracles – the turning of the rod into a serpent, the leprous hand, and the transforming of the Nile water into blood. The people express their fervour in a march, Aaron celebrates his moral victory in a big aria – the victory which has at the same time won over the people and betrayed Moses' ideals – and, to the tune of the march, the Israelites prepare to set out on their journey through the desert.

¹ Erwin Stein, writing in Opera, August 1957.

² ibid.

Act II. Between the acts, there is an interlude, sung and spoken in a whisper by the chorus in front of the curtain: 'Wo ist Moses?' – an extraordinary, hushed, mystical scherzo of a movement, of the greatest beauty.

Aaron and the Seventy Elders before the Mountain of Revelation. The Israelites are encamped below Mount Sinai and now even the Elders grumble at Moses' continued absence: 'Forty days now, yet we're still waiting.' Aaron tries to pacify them, but the sound of a mob can be heard approaching and in a moment the angry people burst on to the scene, shouting for Moses' blood. When they threaten to vent their rage on the priesthood as well as on Moses, Aaron regains command of the situation by promising to give the gods comprehensible form. He sends for gold and the people rejoice in chorus.

The Golden Calf and the Altar. The Dance before the Golden Calf is the climax of the opera, as vast a conception musically as it is complicated visually, with its rapid rises and falls in temperature and a gamut running from drunkenness and dancing through the fury of destruction and suicide to the erotic orgy with which it ends. As Aaron announces the casting of the image, processions of camels, asses, horses, porters and wagons come on to the scene and unload their riches, while animals of all sorts are brought in, decorated and finally sacrificed, all this to the accompaniment of the orchestra alone in music of the richest texture. The butchers dance to a vivid rhythm, but the music dies down in a lyrical episode as a sick woman is carried to the image and healed the moment she touches it. Beggars bring their last possessions, old men sacrifice themselves in front of the calf, and the tension mounts again as, to the sound of trombones, the tribal leaders gallop in to worship it. A youth tries to break up the idolatry and recall the people to their former state of grace, but he is slaughtered almost casually by an Ephraimite. The rejoicing soon turns to ecstasy, ecstasy to a savage frenzy as four naked virgins (in a contrasting and delicately beautiful vocal quartet) offer themselves for sacrifice upon the altar. Destruction and suicide are followed by an orgy of rape until gradually the people pass into exhaustion and sleep. The music dies down, the fires are extinguished and the stage is in almost complete darkness when a man turns on his side, seems to see something in the distance, and cries: 'Moses is descending from the mountain.'

Moses appears, the tablets of the Laws in his hands, and commands: 'Begone, thou image of impotence.' The people are terrified as the Golden Calf disintegrates, and they leave Moses alone with Aaron.

Moses and Aaron. In answer to Moses' angry question, Aaron does not so much defend himself as explain that his actions were the logical outcome of Moses' idea; as Moses' mouthpiece he must interpret his ideas in terms which the people can understand. Moses in his fury smashes the tablets of stone, which he sees in their turn as no more than images. The theological argument is dramatic in character, as Moses unswervingly reiterates his faith, and Aaron in music of florid cast defends the integrity of the people. In the background, led by a pillar of fire, the children of Israel can be heard and seen as they resume their march to the promised land (the march from the end of Act I is heard again). Moses is left alone and in despair. 'O Wort, du Wort, das mir fehlt' (O word, thou word that I lack) is his moving last utterance.

Act III, which remains uncomposed, consists for the most part of a dialogue between Moses and Aaron, the latter now a prisoner and in chains. In the presence of the Seventy Elders, Moses restates his conviction of the ideal nature of the Godhead, and of the misrepresentation of His word as Aaron voiced it. Aaron attempts unsuccessfully to defend his actions, and at the end, when he is given his freedom, he falls down dead.

H.

FRANZ SCHREKER

(born 23 March 1878, died 21 March 1934)

DER FERNE KLANG

The Phantom Sound

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer. Première Frankfurt, 18 August 1912, with Lisbeth Sellimn, Karl Gentner, conductor Ludwig Rottenberg. Much performed all over Germany, and revived as far apart as Venice (1984) and Leeds (1992).

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Greta | Soprano |
| Fritz, a playwright | Tenor |
| Old Man Graumann, Greta's father | Bass |
| Frau Graumann | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Innkeeper | Bass |
| An Old Woman | Mezzo-Soprano |
| An Actor | Baritone |
| Doctor Vigelius | Baritone |
| Milli | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Mizzi | Soprano |
| Mary | Soprano |
| A Spanish Girl | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Two Performers | Tenor, Bass |
| A No-Hoper | Tenor |
| The Count | Baritone |
| The Chevalier | Tenor |
| The Baron | Bass |
| A Policeman | Bass |
| Rudolf | Bass |

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Schreker was an Austrian, the son of a successful court photographer and himself born in Monte Carlo. His father died when he was ten, and his musical education was in Vienna. His first opera, a one-acter, was written in 1901 and shortly afterwards he started on a full-scale operatic work, Der ferne Klang. He wrote the libretto with its autobiographical overtones himself and had within a short space of time completed the first two acts, which aroused nothing less than consternation. As a result, he put the work aside and finished it only in 1910. The impact of Richard Strauss's opera Salome in 1905 and his own success with a ballet in 1908 probably provided him with the impetus to go forward. In the event, the huge success of Der ferne Klang in 1912 started Schreker on a quite unusual career which with hardly a setback brought him one operatic success after another. By the later 1920s, his success had run its course and by the time, with the advent of the Nazis, he was forced to resign as Director of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, his career was in decline.

From the start Schreker's orchestral palette was rich, multi-coloured, seductive, conceding nothing in its shot-silk tapestry to his contemporaries, Richard Strauss, Zemlinsky and Schoenberg. It is curious that he should have conducted the première of Schoenberg's Gurrelieder (1911), when the genesis of this work and Der ferne Klang had so much in common, each started early in the century, each interrupted for one reason or another, each orchestrated in 1910. The trouble with Schreker's initially successful operas is easier to recognise with hindsight than at the time. In his orchestral tapestry he had the new clothes but was ineffectively looking for an Emperor to hang them on.

Act I. Fritz tells Greta of his aspirations and of his search for the elusive sound of the opera's title. Her father, old Graumann, is gambling, and the game ends when he loses his daughter to the innkeeper, whom she forthrightly rejects. She opts to follow Fritz, but is overwhelmed by a wave of sensual longing and follows a mysterious old woman who promises to show her the way.

Act II. The scene is an establishment near Venice, of which Greta has become the star attraction. Her greatest admirer is the Count but she is thoroughly world-weary and promises herself as the prize in a song contest. The Count and the Chevalier compete, the latter apparently aiming in his description of a flower girl at Sorrento at a Lehár-style hit number. Greta has to choose between them until an unknown makes his appearance. It is Fritz, and his song of love lost and now rediscovered – the phantom sound – is chosen by Greta as the winner. But Fritz has been singing to the Greta he remembers and he denounces and rejects the woman he now sees is a whore.

Act III. In the café in front of a theatre, old acquaintances gossip of the prank played on old Graumann's daughter. Fritz's play is having its première that night, and at the end of two acts seems like a success. Greta is helped out of the theatre by a policeman. Doctor Vigelius recognises her and, when she understands not only that Fritz's last act has been a disaster but that he himself is mortally ill, the doctor takes her to him. Fritz is dying, his friend

Rudolf encourages him to rewrite the last act, but the opera ends as he dies in Greta's arms.

Schreker's most successful opera was Der Schatzgräber which had 350 reported performances between 1920 and 1925, 385 before being forbidden by the Nazis in 1932. It is saturated in orchestral magic and contains a colossal love duet, but this occurs at the centre of an overwrought medieval tale which it is hard now to take seriously. H.

FRANZ SCHUBERT

(born 31 January 1797, died 19 November 1828)

Received opinion on the subject of Schubert's operas is simple if, one might be tempted to think, not too well-informed: he wrote a vast number of songs of genius and almost as much instrumental and chamber music on just as high a level, but his dozen or so completed operas (several more unfinished) demonstrate little feeling for the stage. It could be spelled out a little differently. Though only one of the operas was performed in his lifetime, he seems to have developed something of a feeling for the genre during his study with Salieri – he heard works by Cherubini and Spontini for instance, studied the operas of Gluck, Mozart and Salieri himself, in 1814 saw Fidelio, and later Freischütz. From the time he was sixteen until just before he died he was either writing for the stage or contemplating doing so.

Internal evidence does not always support received opinion. In Des Teufels Lustschloss, for example, an ambitious piece written when he was sixteen, after an act of not much more than desultory dramatic interest (though full of musical invention), Schubert wrote two more in which he takes full advantage of the situations offered by the libretto of his Zauberoper. His hero and heroine endure trials of a paltry nature (which are later revealed as charades devised by her uncle to test if her husband is worthy of her), but the music they spark off is of sufficiently high voltage to suggest that, if their composer had early on had the luck to encounter a Schikaneder, operatic history might have been different.

As a matter of record, performances of his stage works during Schubert's lifetime consisted of a production of Die Zwillingsbrüder, a one-act farce in which his friend the singer Johann Michael Vogl played the twins (1820); eight performances in 1820 of Die Zauberharfe, a play with music; and a further two of the unsuccessful play Rosamunde, in which his incidental music was considered the redeeming feature. The Italian impresario Domenico Barbaia took over the management of Vienna's operatic theatres in 1821 and, though he was sufficiently intrigued to commission from Schubert what became Fierrabras, the failure of Weber's Euryanthe put paid to the chances of German romantic opera in Vienna for the time being. H.

ALFONSO UND ESTRELLA

Opera in three acts, text by Franz von Schober. Composed 1821–22; the première was not until 24 June 1854 in Weimar in an abridged version supervised by Liszt. The conductor Johann Nepomuk Fuchs rearranged the plot and edited the music for Karlsruhe in 1881, and there were further performances in Vienna and Germany. Modern revivals have been at Reading in 1977, Graz in 1991 and Vienna in 1997.

Mauregato, King of Leon Baritone
 Estrella, his daughter Soprano
 Adolfo, his general Bass
 Froila, deposed King of Leon Baritone

Alfonso, his son.....Tenor
 A Young GirlSoprano
 A Youth.....Tenor
 Chief of the Royal Bodyguard.....Tenor

Place: Leon, Spain

Time: Middle Ages

Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

Schubert in autumn 1821 took what must have been a conscious decision to write an opera in a style which suited him, and went with his friend Franz von Schober to Lower Austria to work on it. There was no commission, only the overture seems to have been performed publicly in his lifetime (before Rosamunde in 1823), and abortive attempts to mount the opera in Vienna, Dresden, Berlin and Graz came to nothing. Even Liszt's advocacy seems to have been half-hearted.

Act I. Mauregato has ousted Froila from the throne of Leon, but Froila, who now rules the neighbouring area, designates his son Alfonso as his prospective successor, presenting him with a chain as pledge for the future: Eurich's chain. Estrella, Mauregato's daughter, vigorously rejects Adolfo as aspirant to her hand in marriage and Mauregato proclaims that only the man who brings him Eurich's chain shall marry his daughter.

Act II. At Alfonso's request, Froila sings the ballad of a huntsman who falls to his death in pursuit of a beautiful girl. In the woods Alfonso encounters Estrella, is convinced the ballad has come true, declares his love and gives Estrella the chain his father gave him. Adolfo and his adherents plot to overthrow Mauregato. Mauregato laments the disappearance of Estrella until she reappears with a tale of the chain given her by a young man. Mauregato is warned of the plot against him and resolves to resist the rebels.

Act III. Adolfo wins, attempts to force himself on Estrella, then is himself taken prisoner by Alfonso. Froila arrives with his warriors, forgets old hatred when he realises Mauregato is Estrella's father and, with the triumph of 'good', even Adolfo is pardoned.

The opera lacks dramatic energy, still a year or so later shown less than consistently in Fierrabras, but comes to life vividly in the finales to Acts I and II; also in the highly effective battle scene of Act III, at first quite graphically described by anonymous observers, then building to a climax. This, unfortunately for the drama, is interrupted by set pieces. Earlier, the conspirators, conventionally conceived, generate an effective head of steam, and the spacious arias given to Froila in the first two acts, as well as the more energetic utterances of Adolfo and Mauregato, are successful enough, though not always dramatically helpful. The most attractive section of the opera is however the sequence of arias and duets in the second scene of Act II, when Alfonso and Estrella fall in love and Schubert deploys his lyrico-dramatic gift for all the world as if starting a song cycle of love requited and eventually triumphant. H.

DER HÄUSLICHE KRIEG, oder DIE VERSCHWORENEN

Domestic Warfare, or The Conspirators

Opera in one act, text by J.F. Castelli (after Aristophanes' Lysistrata). Première (in concert), Vienna, 1861, conductor J. Herbeck; on stage, Frankfurt, 29 August 1861. Given on many German-speaking stages and abroad and by far the most often produced of Schubert's operas.

Count Heribert von LüdensteinBass
 Ludmilla, *his wife*Soprano
 Astolf von Reisenberg, a knight.....Tenor
 Helene, *Astolf's wife*Soprano
 Luitgarte, *wife of Garold von Nummen*Contralto
 Camilla, wife of Friedrich von Trausdorf.....Contralto
 Isella, the Countess's maid.....Soprano
 Udolin, Count Heribert's page.....Tenor

Place: Vienna

Time: The Crusades

Running Time: 40 minutes

Schubert wrote Die Verschworenen, as the opera was called before the censors got their hands on it, in 1823, between his two grand romantic operas, Alfonso und Estrella and Fierrabras, but put it away as a hopeless case when he heard that Castelli's text had been successfully set in Berlin by a local composer. Alfred Einstein pours scorn on the bowdlerisation of Aristophanes' brilliant political comedy, but the fact is that the libretto is well made and produced from the composer a graceful if unexceptional score.

The Countess persuades the wives of the other knights to deny their beds to their husbands in protest against their long absence at the wars. Udolin, the Count's page, in disguise overhears the plot and betrays it to his master, with the result that the knights repay the coldness of their wives with indifference. Isella tells the Countess that her husband is planning to go off again to the wars, and their confrontation comes close to bringing capitulation on his side. Udolin comes up with a cock-and-bull story to the effect that in a hopeless situation the men swore that if they were rescued, they would re-enlist and would not allow any sign of affection for their wives. The Countess is unpersuaded and dresses herself in armour, but at sight of her husband is about to remove it when the other ladies appear and insist she maintain her position. The men confess they are defeated, and all ends happily. H.

FIERRABRAS

Opera in three acts, libretto by Josef Kupelwieser, after J.G.G. Büsching and F.H. von der Hagen's story in Buch der Liebe (1809) and F. de la Motte Fouqué's Eginhard und Emma (1811). Première in Karlsruhe, 9 February 1897 (music revised by Felix Mottl). First performed Philadelphia, 1980; Oxford, 1986; Vienna, 1988, with Karita Mattila, Studer, Protschka, Gambill, Hampson, conductor Abbado (recorded at the same time).

King Karl (Charlemagne).....Bass
Emma, his daughter.....Soprano
Eginhard, a young knight at Karl's court.....Tenor

Frankish knights

Roland.....Baritone
Ogier.....Tenor
Olivier.....Tenor
Gui von Burdgund.....Tenor
Richard von Normandie.....Bass
Gérard von Mondidur.....Bass

Moors

Boland, Prince of the Moors.....Baritone
Fierrabras, his son.....Tenor
Florinda, Boland's daughter.....Soprano
Maragond, her companion.....Mezzo-Soprano
Brutamonte, Moorish army commander....Baritone

Frankish and Moorish Knights, Soldiers, Young Women

Place: King Karl's Castle, Frankish–Moorish Border,
Boland's Castle

Time: Eighth/Ninth Centuries

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

Fierrabras was commissioned for the Kärnthnertor-theater in 1821, but the overwhelming success of Rossini's operas, the engagement of Italian singers and the departure of Germans and Austrians (including Schubert's friend, Vogl) combined with the failure of Euryanthe to remove Fierrabras from the theatre's schedule even though it had been advertised. Schubert was apparently paid no fee and the opera was unperformed until 1897, a sorry comment on operatic history and practice.

Fierrabras is German romantic opera written at a time when problems of censorship beset most serious work during Prince Metternich's reactionary administration. Kupelwieser, though (as the Kärnthnertor's so-called secretary) experienced in theatre, was a novice as librettist, and the resulting book with its themes of chivalry and magnanimity, its melodrama and its spoken dialogue, is hardly the work of a stage expert. On the other hand, in spite of moments of naïveté, it is Schubert's grandest opera, packed with beautiful music, and it is nothing short of scandalous that Abbado's famous revival of 1988 is effectively the work's only important staging in 175 years of existence.

Act I. Scene i follows a large-scale overture. Emma, at home among the women (Spinning chorus), hears from Eginhard that her father has returned from war. They sing of their love.

Scene ii. The Franks are victorious and Roland begs the King to release the Moorish prisoners, among whom is Fierrabras. Roland admires his foe, but Fierrabras recognises Emma as the girl he once fell in love with in Italy. The King will offer the Moors peace if they accept Christianity. Fierrabras admits to Roland his love for Emma, and hears that Roland himself in Rome fell for Fierrabras's sister, Florinda. The scene ends in a rousing friendship duet.

Scene iii. Eginhard charmingly serenades Emma, who is confident he will return a hero. Fierrabras cannot repress his passion for Emma (aria). Eginhard is observed leaving Emma's room, Fierrabras covers for him and the King has him arrested as her seducer. Eginhard departs conscience-stricken with the knights, leaving Emma, Fierrabras and the King in their various ways more than a little perturbed (quartet).

Act II, scene i. The Frankish peace mission advances. Roland yearns to meet Florinda, Eginhard longs for death – or at least to repair the injustice to Fierrabras. They agree on a horn signal in case of danger. Eginhard is captured, but, in spite of the horn signal, his comrades cannot help him.

Scene ii. Florinda admits to Maragond that she longs to see Roland. Eginhard, led in by Brutamonte, confesses to Boland the wrong he has done Fierrabras, and in a quintet all mull over the situation.

Scene iii. The Frankish knights bringing messages of peace are amazed when Boland denounces his son as a renegade, and imprisons them. Florinda, seeing Roland, vainly begs for mercy and, in an aria of great vehemence, threatens to spread terror and death.

Scene iv. The imprisoned knights fear death but Florinda intervenes (duet with Roland). Moorish warriors besiege the tower but Florinda knows a cache of arms and in a highly dramatic melodrama followed by a trio the knights prepare to defend themselves. Florinda watches from the tower as their escape is frustrated and they return to captivity.

Act III, scene i. Emma confesses to her father her love for Eginhard as well as the noble sacrifice of Fierrabras, who is immediately released. Eginhard despairs (quartet); Fierrabras revives his and Emma's hopes (trio).

Scene ii. In the Moorish castle, Florinda laments the prospect before them (aria). A funeral march is heard, a scaffold prepared for Roland, but Florinda surrenders with the knights.

Scene iii. In spite of Florinda's pleas, Boland orders the execution of his prisoners, but the Frankish army successfully overcomes Moorish resistance. Fierrabras, who has fought with the Franks, rescues his father but then witnesses the uniting of Eginhard and Emma, Roland and Florinda, even – in Christian brotherhood – Charlemagne and his father. He himself remains alone.

It would be peculiar if the influence of Fidelio were not felt in Fierrabras, and indeed it is, notably when the solo trumpet heralds the arrival of the King at the start of the finale. Nonetheless, the music throughout is Schubertian, the melodramas highly dramatic, and such numbers as Act II's duet for Florinda and Maragond and the ensuing quintet would be outstanding in any context. If only Schubert had heard his opera, what riches might have ensued! H.

ROBERT SCHUMANN

(born 8 June 1810, died 29 July 1856)

GENOVEVA

Time: Medieval

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Opera in four acts, libretto by Robert Reinick and the composer, after plays by C.F. Hebbel and L. Tierck. Première, Leipzig, 25 June 1850. First performed Weimar, 1855, conducted by Liszt; Karlsruhe, 1867, Vienna, 1874; London, 1893 (in English). Revived Florence, 1951, with Maud Cunitz, Martha Mödl, Lorenz Fehenberger, Kurt Gester, conductor Cluytens.

Hidulphus, *Bishop of Trier*Bass
 Siegfried, a knight.....Baritone
 Genoveva, *his wife*Soprano
 Golo, *his friend*Tenor
 Margaretha, *a sorceress*Mezzo-Soprano
 Drago, *Siegfried's steward*Bass
 Balthasar, *a servant*Bass
 CasparBass
 Servants, Soldiers
Place: Trier, Strasburg

Schumann, with a single opera to his credit and his dislike of Italian opera, to say nothing of his celebrated denunciation of Meyerbeer's Huguenots, might be thought of as remote from the stage and its blandishments, but the truth seems otherwise. In 1842 he had written of his interest in the establishment of true German opera, before Genoveva had considered a number of subjects (Faust led to the formidable concert piece, Szenen aus Goethes Faust), and he even wrote to Wagner for his advice on Genoveva's libretto which his operatically untutored eye found less than adequate. The opera was no success under his baton in Leipzig and Liszt's advocacy in Weimar, months only before the première of Lohengrin, brought no more than a succès d'estime. Modern productions have elicited rather kinder reaction, but Genoveva remains far from even the fringe of the repertory.

Act I. A grandiose overture, gloomy and stormy by turns, leads to an opening scene in church. Siegfried, Count Palatine, is to take command of Charles Martel's army against the Moors and Bishop Hidulphus and the congregation in sonorous accents wish him well. His friend Golo, a bastard, in an aria bemoans that he is to be left in charge of the castle where he will be responsible for Genoveva's safety. Siegfried and Genoveva, relatively newly married, bid each other a heartfelt farewell, little knowing that Golo has conceived a clandestine passion for Genoveva. When she briefly faints as her husband leaves, Golo steals a kiss, an action secretly observed by Golo's foster-mother, Margaretha, who has returned to the castle after years of absence. She hates Siegfried, who banished her on suspicion of witchcraft, and she now sees a chance of revenge in supporting Golo in his attempt on Genoveva's virtue. In spite of old animosities, the two form an alliance to break down Genoveva's resistance.

Act II. The loud roistering of Siegfried's retainers makes Genoveva nervous and when Golo comes late at night to bring her news of the Christian victory, she asks him to restore order. His reaction is to admit to the kiss he stole when she was unconscious and to proclaim his love. She furiously repulses him with a cry of 'erlöser Bastard!' (shameless bastard!), a taunt which brings an instant threat of revenge. He sets up Drago to hide in her room to observe her behaviour, so that, when Margaretha incites the servants to search the castle, Drago is found and, before he can explain his presence, killed. Genoveva is imprisoned on a charge of adultery.

Act III. In Strasburg, Siegfried is recovering from battle wounds, Margaretha in disguise by his side. Golo brings news of Genoveva's proven adultery, a message which throws Siegfried into despair and causes Golo deep misgivings as to the role he has played in bringing Siegfried to such a pitch of misery. Margaretha has offered help; let him look into a magic mirror she possesses and he will see the truth. The scene changes to Margaretha's room, where in the mirror by witchcraft she shows Genoveva with Drago. Siegfried cries out for her to be punished by death, and smashes the mirror. Drago's ghost emerges from it and orders Margaretha on pain of death to tell Siegfried the truth.

Act IV. Not far from Siegfried's castle, Genoveva, in spite of protestations of innocence, is about to be executed. Golo offers mercy if she will yield to his importunities but she remains firm and he cannot bring himself to strike. He disappears to wrestle with his conscience. Balthasar and Caspar, entrusted with Genoveva's execution, try to persuade her to confess her crime. The sword is poised to strike when Siegfried and his troops appear and the opera ends with a renewal of marriage vows and the blessing of the bishop.

H.

DMITRI DMITREVICH SHOSTAKOVICH

(born 25 September 1906, died 9 August 1975)

THE NOSE

Nos

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer based on a short story by Nikolai Gogol. Première at the Mikhailovsky Theatre, Leningrad, 18 June 1930, conductor Samosud. First performed Florence, 1964, and la Scala, 1972, with Renato Capecchi, conductor Bruno Bartoletti; Santa Fé, 1965, with John Reardon; London, 1973, by New Opera Company at Sadler's Wells with Alan Opie, conductor Leon Lovett, producer Anthony Besch; revived, English National Opera at the Coliseum, 1979, conductor Maxim Shostakovich. Revived with great success 1974 by Moscow Chamber Music Theatre, conductor Rozhdestvensky, and toured in Russia and abroad.

| | |
|--|-----------------|
| Platon Kuzmich Kovalyov | Baritone |
| Ivan Yakovlevich, a barber | Bass-Baritone |
| A Police Inspector | Very High Tenor |
| Ivan, Kovalyov's valet | Tenor |
| The Nose | Tenor |
| Pelagia Grigorievna Podtochina | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Her Daughter | Soprano |
| The Old Countess | Contralto |
| Praskovya Ossipovna, wife of Ivan Yakovlevich | Soprano |
| A Bread-Seller | Soprano |

A Clerk in a Newspaper Office.....Bass-Baritone
 Iarizhkin, a friend of Kovalyov's.....Tenor
 Eight Footmen, Ten Policemen, Nine Gentlemen,
 Four Eunuchs, Passers-By, People at Coach
 Station, etc.

Place: St Petersburg

Time: The 1830s

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Gogol's short story was written in 1835 when he was twenty-six. Its mixture of high spirits, social satire and theatricality appealed to the young Shostakovich, who when he wrote it in 1927–28 had, at the age of twenty-one, two symphonies and a quantity of chamber music behind him and who professed to have found it impossible to find either a Soviet subject for an opera or a Soviet writer with whom to collaborate. When the work was first performed, a few saw in it the dawn of a new era in Soviet music, but most (not least the original performers, apparently) found it complex and baffling and one critic headed his denunciation 'an anarchist's hand-grenade'. Sixteen performances were clocked up in Leningrad before the opera fell foul of the new Soviet sin of 'formalism' and was buried until its triumphant revival of 1974, a year before the composer's death.

It is important to recognise that it was conceived and indeed performed in a climate of opinion in which Hindemith, Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Berg, Křenek, Milhaud and Schreker were staged; Wozzeck had just been produced in Leningrad; and Lenin's original People's Commissar of Public Education, Anatol Lunacharsky, had been able to pronounce: 'Communism should lead to multiformity not conformity. Artists should not be cut according to any single pattern.'¹

The story concerns Platon Kuzmich Kovalyov, who is asleep as it begins. He has little seniority in the civil service as a mere college assessor with the courtesy title of Major, but his anxiety about his status amounts to obsession and he thinks and dreams of little else but his plans for advancement.

In his miniature overture, all brass fanfares and solo snatches of anything from xylophone to piccolo, Shostakovich seems to cock a snook at all academism. During it, we see Kovalyov being shaved and telling Ivan Yakovlevich that his hands stink.

Act I, scene i. The home of Ivan Yakovlevich, barber. Praskovya Ossipovna, the barber's wife, wakes him up with rolls and coffee for breakfast. Inside his roll he finds a nose, and his wife, with the assiduity of a shrew, drives him from the house with orders to get rid of it.

Scene ii. A quay. Ivan Yakovlevich does his best to obey his wife's instructions and dispose of the nose, but passers-by and acquaintances constantly frustrate his endeavour. In the end with much subterfuge he succeeds in dropping it into the river, but the police inspector catches him in the act, questions him (at the top of his voice – literally – with an E flat in the first phrase!), and detains him for interrogation.

A famous and highly effective interlude for percussion (ten players) leads to scene iii: Kovalyov's house. As a trombone breaks wind for him, the owner wakes up and comes to realise that his nose has disappeared. No amount of looking in the shaving mirror will bring it back and when his servant Ivan has fetched him his clothes he rushes off – the intermezzo is a Galop – to report the disaster to the police.

Scene iv. Kazan Cathedral. On his way, Kovalyov stops at the cathedral where a service is in progress, and to his astonishment perceives his nose there, apparently at its devotions and sporting the outward trappings of a State Councillor. Kovalyov begs his nose, with blandishments appropriate to its status, to come back to him, but his cajoling has no effect and it will have nothing to do with someone so totally inferior in rank. He catches sight of a pretty girl and his momentary move towards her is enough to allow the nose to make its escape.

Act II, scene i. A cab is taking Kovalyov to the office of the Police Inspector but he is told by the assistant Chief of Police that the Inspector is out.

Scene ii. A newspaper office. A newspaper advertisement enquiring about the current whereabouts of his nose seems to Kovalyov the only course, and he attempts to jump the queue at the newspaper office in order to ask the clerk in charge to insert such an advertisement as soon as possible. Queue-jumping is not popular, and Kovalyov's eloquence is of little avail, the clerk claiming that an advertisement of this nature could be deemed to hide a potentially dangerous message in code, moreover one that might be held damaging to the newspaper's public repute. Let Kovalyov consult a doctor or get the whole episode written up as a short story. The scene ends with the servants in eight-part fugato dictating eight different advertisements to the bewildered clerk.

¹ From Edward Downes's introduction to The Nose in the programme of its 1979 English revival, an article to which I am indebted for much other information.

Scene iii. Kovalyov's house. Ivan, Kovalyov's servant, is singing to himself when his master returns (the song is borrowed from Dostoevsky's The Brothers Karamazov), and a flexatone plays the postlude. Despair at the unlikelihood of recovering his nose overwhelms Kovalyov, and the future, whether professional or social, seems indeed bleak.

Act III, scene i. Outside a posting-inn. The Police Inspector is hot on the trail of the nose, which he thinks may be trying to escape from the city. His men, to their considerable chagrin, have orders to scrutinise the passengers due to leave in the stage coach, and they sing a kind of chorale to keep up their spirits. A pulchritudinous female bread-seller interests them far more than the elusive fugitive. Goodbyes are being said amid the general hubbub and the coach is about to leave when the nose rushes in and tries to stop it. The Inspector orders the nose's arrest and the prospect of a victim or scapegoat engages everyone's attention, not least that of an aristocratic old lady who is convinced that the nose has stolen her shawl. All seems won until at the last moment their victim eludes them in the sense that it returns to its initial and appropriate shape and size. The Police Inspector wraps it up and carries it off to Kovalyov's house.

Scene ii. Not without a sense of triumph, the Police Inspector comes to restore the nose to its proper owner. Kovalyov makes no bones about his pleasure and seems to think he must provide the rewards which are plainly demanded by the constantly outstretched hand of the Inspector. But when he is alone, Kovalyov's rejoicing turns to despair when he finds he can't stick his nose on again and he is driven to send Ivan to fetch the doctor who lives not far away. The doctor arrives full of solicitude but with no effective remedy, so that he is obliged to depart, remembering however to collect his fee and to suggest that the nose might become a pickled curiosity for medical posterity. Iarizhkin, one of Kovalyov's friends, arrives opportunely to offer comfort, but his apprenticeship seems to be to Job, and it dawns on Kovalyov that he is the victim of a quite novel situation. Madame Podtochina has for some time been keen for him to marry her daughter and is indeed furious that he has never proposed to her; it must be her witchcraft which has placed him in his present predicament! He writes a letter to demand that she remove the spell. Ivan takes it and Madame Podtochina and her daughter read it in a spirit of total amazement. They return the only possible answer – that they are in no way responsible for Kovalyov's disastrous predicament and he must forthwith exonerate them. Iarizhkin and Kovalyov come to understand that there is no escape down this avenue. The writing and reading of the letter, its answer and the reaction to the denial of witchcraft take place more or less simultaneously, which constitutes something of an anticipation of Zimmermann's theory of 'Kugelgestalt der Zeit' (see page 990).

In a scenic intermezzo, gossip about the whereabouts of the nose seems to pervade the city, and people collect together looking for it quite unaware that it has already been restored to Kovalyov. Information has got around that the nose is hiding in Junker's department store and a crowd gathers, with a speculator going so far as to sell seats to the public. For a moment they think they have found it, but a senior officer persuades them that what they have is only an old woollen sweater. The latest news is that the nose itself is taking a walk in the Summer Garden and the rush there threatens to become a riot.

Khosriv Mirza, a visiting foreign prince, is carried in attended by his eunuchs and in search of the rumoured nose. He admits that he can see nothing but his status demands that he make some pretence at identification. The crowd is overjoyed and its excitement reaches such a pitch that the police are obliged to break up a potentially subversive gathering.

Epilogue: scene iii. Kovalyov's house. Kovalyov wakes up in a frenzy to understand that his nose is back in its rightful place. Ivan Yakovlevich comes as usual to shave him and he submits to that worthy's ministrations, with his customary complaint that the barber's fingers smell.

Scene iv. The Nevsky Prospect. Kovalyov is now intent on rehabilitation and he must persuade the world and indeed himself that his nose is fully restored, and with it somehow his manhood. He is so delighted to see his acquaintances that he brings himself to be civil to Madame Podtochina and her daughter, even though he mutters to himself that he will have nothing further to do with them. The full extent of his recovery is signalled when he makes an assignation with a passing flower-girl who must come up to his apartment and so reassure him that he is now in full possession of his faculties. H.

KATERINA ISMAILOVA

Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk

Opera in four acts (nine scenes), libretto, after N. Leskov, by A. Preis and D. Shostakovich. Première Leningrad, 22 January 1934, conducted by Samosud. First performed Moscow, 1934, produced by Nemirovich-Danchenko; Cleveland (in Russian), 1935, conductor Rodzinski; London, Queen's Hall (in concert), 1936, with Slobodskaya, Hughes Macklin, Harold Williams, conductor Albert Coates. Revived in original version, Düsseldorf, 1959, with Erika Wien, Rudolf Francl, Randolph Symonette, conductor Erede. Revised by the composer and first performed in new version, Leningrad, January 1963; outside Russia, Covent Garden, 1963, with Marie Collier, Charles Craig, Otakar Kraus, conductor Edward Downes; San Francisco, 1964, with Marie Collier, Jon Vickers, Chester Ludgin, conductor Leopold Ludwig; English National Opera, 1987, with Barstow, conductor Elder, producer Pountney.

Boris Timofeyevich Ismailov, *a merchant*High Bass

Zinovy Borisovich Ismailov, his son,
a merchantTenor

Katerina Lvovna Ismailova, wife of Zinovy Borisovich Soprano

Sergei, employed by the Ismailovs.....Tenor

A Drunk.....Tenor

AksinyaSoprano

Mill-HandBaritone

Steward.....Bass

Two WorkmenTenors

CoachmanTenor

PorterBass

A NihilistTenor

Priest.....Bass

Police-SergeantBaritone

PolicemanBass

Drunken GuestTenor

Sergeant.....Bass

SentryBass

Sonyetka, a convict.....Contralto

Old ConvictBass

Female Convict.....Soprano

Workpeople, Foremen, Policemen, Guests, Convicts

Place: Kursk Gubernia, Russia

Time: Mid-Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Leskov's original story, a masterpiece in its way, is dated 1865. Shostakovich and his librettist decided to retain little of its ironical character, choosing instead, with an eye perhaps to political capital, to accentuate the dislikable qualities of the characters of the old regime to the point in some cases of caricature. The exception to this rule is Katerina, to whom the composer has given sympathetic characteristics and the lyrical music to go with them.

Act I, scene i. Katerina's room. She is lying on her bed, bored with the tedium of her life and the loveless marriage she contracted five years ago. Heralded by a bassoon tune, Boris Timofeyevich, her disagreeable old father-in-law, comes upstairs to rail at her and complain that she has not yet given his son an heir – no doubt she would like to take a lover, but his watchfulness will prevent any idea of that sort. As he goes out he tells Katerina to get ready the rat poison, and she mutters that nothing would please her better than to feed it to him. Boris is back in a moment with his son, Zinovy, and some servants. A dam has broken and must be mended and Zinovy himself prepares to set off to superintend the work. The servants set up a mock plea to persuade him not to leave them, but Zinovy pays little attention and introduces to his father Sergei, whom he has just engaged. Boris insists that Zinovy make his wife swear on oath to be faithful to him while he is away and, in spite of Zinovy's protests, crowns the performance by forcing her to kneel. They all go out and Aksinya comments on the saucy looks of Sergei who was dismissed from his last place for having an affair with the mistress.

Scene ii follows an orchestral interlude. The Ismailovs' yard. The servants, among them Sergei, have caught Aksinya and are pinching and prodding her as if she were a pig ready for market, and her complaints are loud and continuous. Katerina appears and rates them for their unkindness and for wasting time. Sergei insists on shaking her by the hand, and in a moment Katerina is wrestling with him. He throws her just as Boris Timofeyevich comes out of the house and sends them all about their business. He threatens to tell Zinovy about his wife's behaviour.

Scene iii. Another interlude takes us to Katerina's bedroom. As usual she is bored, but she is not alone for long before the voice of her father-in-law is heard outside scolding her for wasting the candle. When he has gone, she looks out of the window and sings a beautiful song contrasting her lonely state with the freedom of the birds she sees outside her window. On the pretext of wanting to borrow a book, Sergei appears at the door, reminds her how agreeable their wrestling was just now and, seizing her, offers to start it again. They embrace, make passionate love and are only momentarily disconcerted when the voice of Boris Timofeyevich can be heard outside the door asking if Katerina is safely in bed.

Katerina Ismailova (Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk; English National Opera, 1987, director David Pountney, designer Stefanos Lazaridis). Josephine Barstow in the title role, Jacque Trussel as Sergei.

Act II, scene iv. The yard. To the accompaniment of highly suggestive music, Boris Timofeyevich is prowling up and down like a tom cat underneath Katerina's window, remembering the sexual prowess of his youth and making comparisons between such joys of the past and his son's present avoidance of them. What wouldn't he do if he were ten years younger – he seems about to show us when Sergei can be seen at the window kissing Katerina goodbye. During the rapturous farewell, Boris recognises Sergei and when he climbs down the drainpipe catches him by the collar. Boris shouts for help, has Sergei stripped and tied to a post, and after summoning Katerina to the window to watch, proceeds to flog him. Katerina screams to be let out of her room, but no one moves, and in the end she slides down the drainpipe and throws herself at her father-in-law. The flogging over, Sergei is carried away and Boris Timofeyevich demands supper from his daughter-in-law.

With Sergei safely locked up in the store-room, Boris sends a message to his son to tell him there is trouble at home. But Katerina's revenge is not long delayed. She has poisoned the mushrooms and Boris begins to feel the pain gnawing at his vitals. He cries for a priest, but Katerina is implacable, takes the keys from his pockets and leaves him to die alone. Some workmen coming back from a drink cannot understand his babbling, but the priest arrives in time to hear him accuse his daughter-in-law of murder. She for her part mourns so eloquently that the priest is left to muse, in music of inanely popular style, on the mysteries of dying. As the curtain falls, an extra battery of brass, not so far heard, lets loose with shattering effect a series of discords which lead into the entr'acte, itself the opera's biggest single movement, a massive passacaglia which powerfully sums up the overheated drama.

Scene v. Katerina's bedroom. The lovers are together. Katerina's passion is reflected in her music, but Sergei is already more disposed for sleep – an erotic predicament fully reflected in the music. Sergei worries, he tells Katerina, at the thought of Zinovy's return, which will inevitably mean the end of their love. If only he were her husband and not her lover! The train of thought is not hard to follow, and Sergei eggs her on until, satisfied, he falls asleep. Her thoughts about the future are interrupted by the appearance of the ghost of Boris Timofeyevich (bass chorus off-stage), at first unable to frighten her, but in the end producing shrieks of terror which wake up Sergei. Sergei cannot see the ghost and they fall asleep again, until Katerina thinks she hears someone stealthily approaching her door. They realise it is Zinovy Borisovich, and Sergei hides.

Zinovy calls to Katerina who eventually lets him in. How has she spent her time? Father's death was very sudden. Why is the bed made up for two – and why is there a man's belt on it? He knows all about her scandalous behaviour, he says, and picking up the belt he starts to beat her with it, until Sergei rushes out from his hiding place. Zinovy scrambles to the window, but Katerina pulls him back and starts to throttle him. Sergei helps her and soon Zinovy is dead. To the tune of a grotesque march, they carry the body down to the cellar, Katerina lighting the way with a candle. What starts as a jaunty, light-hearted tune finishes in something sinister and woebegone as they bury the body.

Act III, scene vi. Katerina and Sergei on their wedding day brood about the crime which lies hidden behind the cellar door. As they leave to go to the party, a drunk enters on the prowl for more liquor. In a brilliantly funny scene, he runs through a whole catalogue of reasons why it is essential for him to get supplies from the cellar, breaks down the door but emerges almost immediately holding his nose and complaining about the appalling stink. Further investigation convinces him that he has found the decomposing corpse of Zinovy Borisovich.

Scene vii, preceded by an entr'acte drawn from the music of the previous scene, takes place in the local police station, where the Sergeant and his men are sitting, frantically doing nothing. In a parody of an operetta chorus, they hymn their unceasing importance but lament their present unemployment. Things look up when a nihilist teacher is brought in and questioned, but even this cannot compensate for what really riles them – that they have not been invited to the Ismailov wedding feast. When the drunk bursts in with news that he has found a corpse in the Ismailovs' cellar, the Sergeant and his men behave as if they have been expecting some such information and hurry off to make their arrests.

A short and brisk entr'acte takes us to scene viii, where, in the Ismailovs' garden, the wedding feast is in progress. Suddenly Katerina notices that the padlock of the cellar is broken. She tells Sergei the game is up and they must leave immediately. He is just coming back from the house with some money, when the Sergeant and his men enter the garden. His tone is bantering, but Katerina quickly realises there is no point in pretence and holds out her wrists for the handcuffs. Sergei tries to escape but they catch him, beat him and secure him too. Completely happy, the police march their prisoners off to jail.

Act IV, scene ix. It is evening and a large band of convicts, all of them shackled, has halted temporarily near a bridge. Men and women are in separate groups. In contrast to the grotesque and even farcical happenings of the previous act, this last scene is entirely tragic and mostly lyrical. An old convict, Dostoevskian in his resignation and in his musical utterance taking after Mussorgsky, sings movingly of the long unforgiving road they must travel to Siberia. A subdued Katerina bribes a guard to let her go through to the men and she makes her way to Sergei. His reception of her caresses is thoroughly disagreeable – has she forgotten that it's entirely her fault he is here at all? She goes sadly back to the other women, lamenting (in a beautiful arioso with cor anglais obbligato) that, hard as were the sentence and the flogging, harder still is it to know from Sergei's every gesture that he hates her.

Meanwhile Sergei goes up to Sonyetka and in music of deliberate banality starts to flirt with her. She is a mercenary little baggage and insists that her favours must be paid for. Her stockings are torn; she will be Sergei's if he can get her another pair – from Katerina for instance. On the pretext that his legs hurt him, Sergei wheedles her only spare pair out of Katerina. Immediately he gives them to Sonyetka and carries her off triumphantly, leaving Katerina in an agony of jealousy. The women mock her and their noise brings the sentry running up. Katerina laments slowly and agonisingly before the Sergeant in charge wakes everyone up and gets the column ready to move off. The old convict rouses the stupefied Katerina, and she gets slowly to her feet, goes up to Sonyetka who is standing on the bridge, seizes her and jumps with her into the river. The Sergeant looks after them, decides there is nothing to be done as the current is too strong, and orders everybody to move off. With the old convict trying to brace up their morale, they start on their way.

Katerina Ismailova is undeniably a mixture of styles, parody jostling lyricism, and farce elbowing tragedy. But, if it is the creation of a young opera composer, it is also a work of flair and brilliance and unfailing vitality. Its early success was very considerable, but in January 1936 (a few days after Stalin and Molotov had publicly approved Dzerzhinsky's opera And Quiet Flows the Don, based on Sholokhov's novel) an article appeared in Pravda entitled 'Muddle instead of Music'. It denounced Katerina Ismailova as modernist and confused, its music 'leftist' and discordant. From then on, Shostakovich enjoyed an up-and-down career in Soviet Russia, mostly applauded for his earnest endeavour to live up to the ideals of Socialist Realism, occasionally disapproved for palpably falling short of them. The once popular Lady

Macbeth of Mtsensk (abroad, the opera usually carried the name of Leskov's story) became something of a legend, never performed in its native land and very seldom outside owing to the tight control kept on orchestral material.

After the war, there were only two Western productions of the opera in its original form, in Venice in 1947, and in Düsseldorf in 1959 – and no sooner was permission given for the second of these than it was withdrawn, but only after a contract between the publisher and the Düsseldorf theatre had been signed. Those of us who saw this production could have been excused for wondering wryly if it would turn out to be the last performance in our time of a contemporary masterpiece, but the composer's revision, nearly thirty years after the opera was written, removed the work from the realms of conjecture and allowed a new generation to make up its own mind. When it was finally heard, the revision turned out to consist of no more than some smoothing out of the extremities of the vocal line, of some changes in the words and stage directions, and of the composition of new interludes between scenes i and ii and scenes vii and viii. Ten years later still, the original version again became available.

H.

BEDŘICH SMETANA

(born 2 March 1824, died 12 May 1884)

Smetana's life and reputation are replete with contradictions. He is thought of inside as well as outside Czechoslovakia as the most Czech of composers, but had in middle age to work at the Czech language in order to write his operas. He was regarded with suspicion in Prague as an admirer of Wagner's, yet his music has little Wagnerian about it, and his models were French and Italian, the latter by default since he overtly criticised the Italian repertory. He came to be regarded as the epitome of Czech music (in Japan he would have been considered, at least after his time, a national treasure), yet his contemporary compatriots regarded him with suspicion and schemed to remove him from the conductorship of the so-called Provisional Theatre (the first opera house devoted to Czech use), only for the onset of deafness in 1874 to accomplish their work for them. The rest of his life became an increasing martyrdom to disability, although his last three operas were written after its onset and show little diminution of powers.

Looking for Czech characteristics in Smetana's music has elicited the comment that it was his music which provided the recognised characteristics in the first place. In his operas, folk-song was occasionally imitated, never quoted, and their Czech quality derives particularly from dance rhythms – polka, waltz, furiant – which, like spices in Indian cooking, not only permeate dance scenes but also serve as a basis for highly sympathetic vocal writing. The operas are full of spacious arias taken at the highest level of inspiration; choruses, duets and ensembles contribute to the scheme of things. Look no further than the most popular, The Bartered Bride, for examples – Mařenka's last-act aria, her first-act duet with Jeník, the sextet. And so on, throughout.

With hindsight, you can see that Smetana provided exemplars for future Czech opera: historical and heroic works like Dalibor and Libuše, even The Brandenburgers in Bohemia; folk operas like The Bartered Bride, The Two Widows, The Kiss; operas of a peculiarly Smetanian character, somewhere between the two, The Devil's Wall and The Secret. It is a powerful list and its achievement amounts to something like a mission; taken with his extensive output of orchestral and chamber music, it adds up to a substantial oeuvre.

H.

THE BRANDENBURGERS IN BOHEMIA

Branibořiv Čechách

Opera in three acts, text by Karel Sabina. Première Provisional Theatre, Prague, 5 January 1866, with Ferenczy, Polák, and Josef Lev¹ (Tausendmark), Smetana conducting.

Volfram Olbramovič, Lord Mayor of Prague Bass

Oldřich Rokycansky, a knight Baritone

Young citizens of Prague

Junoš Tenor

Jan Tausendmark Baritone

Varneman, a Brandenburg captain Tenor

Jíra, a runaway serf Tenor

Daughters of Volfram

Ludiše Soprano

Vlčenska Soprano

Děčana Contralto

Old Villager Bass

Town Crier Baritone

Knights, Soldiers, Villagers, Brandenburg Soldiers,
Beggars, Judges

Place: In and Near Prague

Time: 1279

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Smetana's first opera was written for a competition, which, after the first night, he was judged to have won. After the death of the medieval Czech king, Přemysl Otakar II, his young son Václav was held prisoner by his guardian Otto of Brandenburg, in an attempt to gain control over Bohemia. The opera's subject is the Czech reaction to occupation.

Act I. The Mayor of Prague discusses with Bohemian knights the state of Bohemia, occupied – brutally, relates Oldřich – by Brandenburgers. Junoš brings news of fresh atrocities, including the kidnapping of young King Václav. Volfram agrees the knights must resist. Ludiše, the eldest of Volfram's daughters, loves Junoš and, not knowing of developments, resents his precipitate departure, but offers up a prayer for peace. She is interrupted by Tausendmark, whose proffered love she rejects, not least since he is an open supporter of the Brandenburgers. Tausendmark tells the Brandenburgers they may plunder Volfram's possessions as they choose, leaving only the three daughters for him.

Back in Prague, the citizens loot the cellars of the rich, breezily egged on by Jíra, a runaway serf, whom, after dancing, they elect leader. Jíra responds to Ludiše's appeal for help but Brandenburgers take them prisoner and in the confusion which follows, Tausendmark accuses Jíra of abducting the girls. Volfram orders his arrest.

Act II. Villagers, led by an old man, expansively pray for God's mercy but are set on by Brandenburgers, whose captain holds prisoner Volfram's daughters. A Herald proclaims an official end to occupation but Captain Varneman (curiously, the opera's only official Brandenburger) insists his authority still stands, and sends the old man to Prague to demand ransom for his daughters from Mayor Volfram.

In Prague, Jíra, in spite of a vigorous defence, is sentenced to death and Tausendmark entrusted with freeing the Mayor's daughters. Junoš's pleas for Jíra are disregarded, as is his denunciation of Tausendmark. Volfram's daughters lament their fate. Junoš contrives to find them, and in urgent duet confirms to Ludiše his love for her. Meanwhile, Captain Varneman, in default of the ransom, threatens to keep the daughters for himself. Only the courage of the dauntless Ludiše sustains her sisters' morale.

Act III. The third act's muddled and unsatisfactory

¹ Josef Lev was an excellent lyric baritone with limited dramatic talent. He became a favourite of Smetana, who wrote an over-sympathetic aria for Tausendmark in Act III out of regard for Lev's talent, and is said to have given up casting villains as baritones because Lev's legato was so much better than his acting!

action is said to have militated from the start against the opera's success. Varneman hears from Tausendmark that the Praguers know he holds the sisters, and at first accepts Tausendmark's financial offer for them but, when he insists on safety for himself outside Bohemia, Varneman reneges on the bargain. In pursuit of his intent, Tausendmark persuades the old man (who really means to free them) to help him. He gets two out, but Tausendmark catches Ludiše and forces her into hiding. Junoš and his men question Varneman, then search successfully for Ludiše and Tausendmark. Volfram exonerates Jíra and offers him a place to live, and the opera, which has somehow contrived to combine aspects of a French rescue opera (like Cherubini's Les Deux Journées) with those of Czech patriotism, ends with vociferous rejoicing.

H.

THE BARTERED BRIDE

Prodaná Nevěsta

Opera in three acts, text by Karel Sabina. Première, Prague National Theatre, 30 May 1866; some alterations were made to the work in 1869 and the final version produced 1870. First performed Chicago, 1893 (in Czech); Drury Lane, London, 1895 (in German); Covent Garden, 1907 (in German), with Bosetti, Nast, Naval, Marx, conductor Schalk; Metropolitan, New York, 1909 (in German), with Destinn, Jörn, Reiss, Didur, conductor Mahler; Sadler's Wells, 1935 (in English), with Cross, Tudor Davies, Powell Lloyd, Matters, conductor Collingwood. Revivals include Covent Garden, 1939 (in German), with Hilde Konetzni, Tauber, Tessmer, Krenn, conductor Beecham; 1955 (in English), with Morison, Lanigan, Pears, Dalberg, conductor Kubelík; Metropolitan, 1926, with Müller (later Rethberg), Laubenthal, Meader, Bohnen, conductor Bodanzky; 1941, with Novotna, Kullman, Laufkoetter, Pinza, conductor Walter; Sadler's Wells (at the New Theatre), 1943, with Hill (later Sladen), Servent, Pears, Donlevy, conductor Collingwood.

Krušina,¹ a peasant Baritone
 Ludmila, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
 Mařenka,² their daughter Soprano
 Micha, a landlord Bass
 Hata, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
 Vašek, their son Tenor
 Jenik, Micha's son by his first marriage Tenor
 Kecal,³ a marriage broker Bass
 Ringmaster of a troupe of circus artists Tenor

Esmeralda, a dancer Soprano
 An 'Indian' Bass

Place: Bohemia

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

The Bartered Bride is so much of a national institution in the Czech Republic, and has been so accepted by the outside world as typical of 'folk opera', that it is surprising to remember that Smetana was looked upon during his lifetime as insufficiently nationalist in feeling. The Bartered Bride won him immediate recognition as a musical patriot, but the public attitude to some of his other works so angered the composer that he claimed to have written this popular comedy without either conviction or much enthusiasm.

The overture, written before the rest of the opera so great was Smetana's enthusiasm for the subject he was to tackle, is immensely and justifiably popular as a concert piece. Its themes are later used in connection with Kecal and the marriage contract (in the finale to Act II, the Inn Scene), but whatever their associations, their dashing quavers, Mozartian in their gaiety and appropriately marked vivacissimo, give the opera an irresistible start.

Act I. Spring in a Bohemian village. The village inn is on one side of the stage. It is holiday time, and the villagers are rejoicing at the prospect of the dancing which will take place to celebrate it. Only Mařenka and Jenik seem left out of the general gaiety, gloomy because Mařenka has just learned that her parents plan a rich marriage for her, in spite of her heart having long since been given to the handsome but impecunious Jenik. Mařenka tells Jenik that her heart would break were he to desert her; her love is his, even though she knows so little of his antecedents and background. Their love duet leaves little doubt of their mutual affection; the lyrical main section is heard fairly frequently during the course of the opera as a love motif.

On come Mařenka's parents, who are being harangued by that typically Czech institution, the marriage broker. He has the gift of the gab, and when his listeners can get a word in, it is clear that they are prepared to accept his suggestion that Mařenka should marry the son of Tobias Micha, a

¹ š = approximately 'sh'.

² ř = approximately 'rj' (as in Dvořák).

³ c = approximately 'ts'.

The Bartered Bride (Welsh National Opera, 1982, director Rudolf Noelte, sets Jan Schlubach, costumes Elisabeth Urbancic). Helen Field as Marenka, Warren Ellsworth as Jenik.

rich neighbour. Krušina knows Micha, but he cannot remember the names of his two sons. Kecal protests that there is only one; the other, by Micha's first marriage, disappeared from home years ago and is now presumed dead. In spite of Kecal's enthusiastic description of the prospective bridegroom, who was only prevented by natural modesty from meeting them now, Ludmila thinks the final decision should be left in Mařenka's hands.

The trio becomes a quartet when Mařenka herself appears on the scene. She has one small objection to the scheme, she says: she has become engaged to Jenik. Kecal refuses to take such objections seriously, Krušina is furious that his permission has not been asked, and even Ludmila thinks Mařenka might have handled the whole affair more tactfully. Mařenka knocks the contract out of Kecal's hand, and leaves her parents wishing Kecal had brought the bridegroom along with him; a sight of him might have caused her to change her mind.

The act ends with a spirited polka, danced and sung by the assembled villagers.

Act II. Inside the inn, the men are busy drinking; in a chorus, they sing the praises of beer. Kecal is there looking for Jenik, who seems sunk in reflection. Both, however, join in the chorus, Kecal vaunting money as the most desirable of possessions, Jenik preferring love. The villagers dance a brilliant and energetic Furiant, known, like the overture, in the concert hall.

All leave the inn, and the coast is clear for a first sight of Vašek, who comes shyly in, stammering out that he has been sent off by his mother to woo his prospective bride. He is an enchantingly silly figure, with his stutter and his transparent guilelessness. Mařenka realises this is the bridegroom who has been picked out for her. She is horrified, and tells him that she, like all the other village girls, is really sorry that so handsome a lad is contracted to Mařenka, a flighty girl who will lead him an awful dance once they are married. Vašek is frightened at what his mother may say, but Mařenka paints a much brighter prospect for him with another girl, prettier than Mařenka and already very much attracted to him from a distance. He eventually agrees to give up Mařenka, and tries to kiss the pretty girl in front of him; she evades him, but he follows her out.

Kecal has the prospect of a sizeable commission if he brings off the matter of Mařenka's betrothal to the son of Tobias Micha, and he does not intend to lose it. He is prepared to invest a proportion of it in buying off the tiresome suitor whom Mařenka appears to favour. He takes Jenik to the inn for a drink, and talks the matter over. Things do not seem to be getting very far, but Kecal is at pains to point out that there are as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it. He seems to have made some headway as a result of his monologue, and he attempts to clinch the matter by offering Jenik a match in which there would be some money for him. However, even the brilliant and lively tune of their duet, which Jenik repeats after him, is not enough to persuade the young man to give up his sweetheart, and Kecal is eventually reduced to offering him money. Jenik takes some persuading, but finally agrees to do so – but only in favour of the eldest son of Tobias Micha, the money to be paid to him and to be reclaimable under no circumstances whatsoever.

Kecal goes off well satisfied with the bargain he has made, but he leaves behind him a Jenik who knows quite well that the eldest son of Micha, presumed dead, is none other than himself. He has acquired a marriage contract to his beloved and a dowry from his cheese-paring stepmother at the same time! The plan must succeed! We can have no doubts as to the sincerity of Jenik's love for Mařenka after the beautiful love song which he sings the moment Kecal's back is turned. He has not only outwitted the broker, but deserves his reward!

Kecal returns with Krušina and the villagers to celebrate his successful handling of what turned out to be by no means a simple affair. The finale uses the material already heard in the overture. Kecal wants everyone to witness the legality of the document he is about to have signed in their presence. It is to the effect that Jenik has agreed to renounce Mařenka. Krušina and Kecal are delighted, so apparently is Jenik, but the villagers cannot quite understand the position until Kecal adds that the whole thing is in consideration of the sum of three hundred gulden. Then popular fury knows no bounds; even Krušina is shocked that Jenik should abandon Mařenka for money, and Jenik signs amid a general demonstration of hostility.

Act III. Vašek is in stuttering despair that he cannot find the girl who gave him such good advice and whom he found so attractive. His genuinely comic aria is marked lamentoso. His thoughts are interrupted by the arrival of a circus troupe, headed by a redoubtable Ringmaster and heralded by the so-called March of the Comedians. The attractions include the great dancer, Esmeralda, and a real, live, American bear. Let all the bystanders stay and watch a sample of what the company can do! To the accompaniment of the delightfully varied and tuneful Dance of the Comedians, the clowns and dancers go through their paces, watched by an admiring throng.

Vašek is left behind admiring the beautiful Esmeralda. One of the clowns comes running in to tell the Ringmaster that the man who plays the bear is too drunk to go through with his role. He himself has looked for a suitable substitute, but he is at his wits' end. Esmeralda solves the problem by suggesting that the dimwit who has been gawping at her for some minutes would be just the right build. The Ringmaster asks Vašek if he would like to dance with the beautiful girl, Esmeralda assures him that she will teach him how, and the agreement is completed. He will make his début that night – all this to an enchanting dance tune sung by the two circus professionals, but made into some kind of trio by the prancing if silent Vašek.

Vašek is just practising some steps to himself, when he sees his parents. Hata wants him to come with them to meet his future bride, but he is unwilling, and downright determined when he hears that it is Krušina's Mařenka who is his destined spouse. He does not know who it is he wants to marry, or rather he does not know her name, but he is sure that it is not Mařenka. He escapes, and a moment later in comes Mařenka, furious and mortified at the news her father tells her, that Jenik has sold her love for money. The orchestra reminds her of Jenik's protestations of undying affection, and she is inconsolable.

Vašek reappears and is overjoyed to hear that the girl who stands before him, whom he found so attractive, is Mařenka after all. Poor Mařenka asks for time in which to make up her mind, and the parents of the prospective bride and bridegroom join with Kecal in exhorting her to give the matter serious thought. The sextet (Mařenka joins them just before it finishes) is a lovely, contemplative piece. The mood is continued when Mařenka is left alone to lament in an aria her unhappy position.

To her comes Jenik, apparently in the best of spirits. Mařenka is furious with him, and even more so when he seems to treat the whole affair as an excellent joke. Nothing he can do will reconcile her to hearing him out. The argument is by no means over when Kecal comes to tell Jenik he can have his money as soon as Mařenka has signed the contract. Jenik urges her to do so, which naturally only increases her fury against him, and gives Kecal an even worse opinion of the type of man with whom he is dealing – these sentiments find expression in a trio.

Everyone in the village comes together for the finale which is to see the betrothal of Mařenka and (as Jenik insists the description shall run) 'the son of Tobias Micha'. Everyone congratulates Mařenka on the match, nobody louder than Jenik, who has no sooner opened his mouth than he is recognised by Hata and Micha as the long-lost son of the latter. He asks Mařenka whether she will have him or Vašek, and her triumphant answer leaves Kecal babbling with fury at having been outwitted. He makes himself so conspicuous in fact that everyone laughs at his discomfiture.

All is now set for a happy ending, but there is an interruption as a couple of small boys rush in shouting that the bear is loose! He shambles in, but it is not long before Vašek can be heard inside the skin saying that nobody need be frightened, as the bear is only him. Hata takes him off, and all rejoice at the betrothal of the bartered bride and her faithful lover. H.

DALIBOR

Opera in three acts, German text by J. Wenzig, Czech translation by Špindler. Première at Prague, 16 May 1868, with Benevicová-Miková (Milada), Lukes (Dalibor). First performed in Vienna, 1892; revived 1938, with Hilde Konetzni, Réthy, Mazaroff, Destal, Kipnis, conductor Walter. First performed Chicago, 1924; Berlin, 1940, with Lemnitz, Scheppan, Völker, Bockelmann, von Manowarda; Edinburgh Festival, 1964 (first performance in Great Britain), by Prague Opera with Miková, Domaninská, Příbyl, Bednař, Haken, conductor Jaroslav Krombholc; English National Opera, 1976, with Anne Evans, John Mitchinson, conductor Charles Mackerras.

| | |
|--|----------|
| Vladislav, King of Bohemia | Baritone |
| Dalibor, a knight | Tenor |
| Budivoj, captain of the guard | Baritone |
| Beneš, the jailer | Bass |
| Vítek, Dalibor's squire | Tenor |
| Milada, sister of the dead Burgrave | Soprano |
| Jitka | Soprano |
| Zdeněk's Ghost..... | Silent |

Nobles, Soldiers, Men and Women

Place: Prague

Time: Fifteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

The story of Dalibor was a legend¹ which symbolised Czech aspirations long before Smetana took it as a subject for an opera. It is hard to believe that his librettist's treatment of the story owed nothing to Fidelio and that dramatic resemblances between the two are pure coincidence. After 1919, when Czech independence ceased to be a dream and became reality, the opera took on new significance for the Czech people, and it has since been looked on, with The Bartered Bride, as a national institution, a position which its theme and the splendid music in which it is clothed seem amply to justify.

Act I. There is no extensive overture, and the curtain rises after fifteen bars of music on the judgement hall of the King's palace in Prague. Dalibor has been engaged in strife with the Burgrave of Ploskovic; his friend Zdeněk was captured and put to death, and, in revenge, Dalibor has killed the Burgrave. For this he is coming up for judgement in front of the King. The people, among them Jitka, an orphan whom Dalibor has befriended, are waiting for the assembly of the court; they praise Dalibor as their friend and protector. The King enters with his judges, and rehearses the charges against Dalibor. He calls Milada, the sister of the dead Burgrave, to substantiate her accusations.

Amid expressions of sympathy for her bereavement, she tells the dramatic story of Dalibor's entry into the castle, and of how he killed her brother. The King assures her Dalibor will pay for his crime with his life, and he orders that the accused may be brought in. As he enters, murmurs of admiration are heard on all sides, and even Milada is compelled to comment on his fearless, noble appearance. Dalibor does not deny his action; only, it was not murder but vengeance for murder. In an aria he tells of his love for his friend and of his violin playing (the solo violin is throughout associated with Zdeněk). Zdeněk was captured in battle, and when Dalibor asked what ransom was required to redeem him, he was sent his head on the end of a lance. Milada begins to feel pity for her former foe. Dalibor defies the King; he has committed no crime, only revenged the murder of his friend. If now his life is spared, he will continue to exact vengeance; not the King himself shall stand in his way!

The verdict of the court is imprisonment for life; Dalibor invokes the free spirit of Zdeněk – did he hear the sentence? Milada pleads for him, but the judges say he has openly threatened the King; even when Milada protests that she herself, whom he has most wronged, is prepared to forgive him, they are unimpressed. Milada, thinking she is alone, admits to herself that she is in love with Dalibor. Jitka overhears her and begs her to exert herself to free him. In a vigorous concluding duet, they agree together to free him from prison.

Act II. A street below the castle in which Dalibor is imprisoned. From an inn comes the sound of lively singing. Jitka and Vítek, Dalibor's page, greet each other eagerly in a charming duet. They discuss Dalibor's plight and Jitka reveals that Milada is already inside the prison disguised as a boy. They are optimistic that their cause has not received so severe a setback in the imprisonment of Dalibor as might have been feared. The music has an exuberance that is positively Weberian in character.

The scene changes to the house of Beneš, the jailer, inside the castle. Sentries patrol up and down. Budivoj warns Beneš that there is danger of a rising in favour of Dalibor; he, as head jailer, is answerable with his life for the prisoner's safe-keeping. Budivoj looks at Milada who is standing nearby in disguise, and enquires who it is; Beneš tells him it is his new assistant. The parallel of the whole situation with that of Fidelio is too obvious to need pointing out. In music of sombre character, Beneš reflects on the gloomy nature of his calling.

Milada comes to tell Beneš that his meal is ready. The jailer refers most sympathetically to Dalibor, who, he says, has asked for a fiddle to play in his dungeon. He tells Milada to take the instrument down to the prisoner, and says he himself will go to fetch it. Milada rejoices at the prospect of seeing Dalibor for the first time face to face. Beneš returns and gives Milada instructions on how to find the appropriate dungeon.

The scene changes again, this time to Dalibor's cell.

¹ The original legend concerns, says Brian Large, 'the rebellious knight, Dalibor, imprisoned in the Daliborka Tower near Hradčany ... in 1498 for leading an uprising for the recognition of peasant brewing rights. During captivity, Dalibor learnt to play the violin so beautifully that people came from all over the city to hear him. Though tortured ... and later executed for his part in inciting serfs to rebel against their tyrannical masters, Dalibor became a symbol of just revolt against royal power.' (Smetana, 1970).

Dalibor has a vision of Zdeněk, who appears to him and plays his violin; when he has gone, Dalibor invokes his reappearance in a beautiful aria. Presently Milada brings him the instrument he has asked for. She admits that she was his accuser at his trial, and that she hated him. She tells of her useless pleas that he should be allowed to go free, and of the preparations which are in hand for his escape. Will he pardon her for what she has done to him; ever since the trial she has loved him from afar. The whole scene is one of extraordinary power, and the lyrical duet itself of haunting beauty.

Act III. The throne room of the King, brightly lit. He is surrounded by his councillors. Budivoj and Beneš appear in front of him, the former saying that he has news of a rising which is plotted in Dalibor's favour. Beneš tells his story; he had an apprentice, who suddenly disappeared, leaving behind him some money and a note of thanks. But at least Beneš was in time to prevent Dalibor's escape – the lad had certainly something to do with the preparations he discovered for freeing the prisoner. Beneš pleads for leniency for himself. The King, in spite of misgivings as to the justice of his action (voiced in a beautiful aria), finally accepts the judgement of his council that Dalibor be condemned to instant death.

Plans are afoot for Dalibor's escape, and he stands in his cell, free of fetters and rejoicing in a brilliant aria as he thinks of the freedom he can bring to his people. But Budivoj rushes in with his guards, secures his prisoner and informs him of the court's decision that he shall die. Dalibor muses on his coming death in music of poignant sadness.

During a march interlude, the scene changes to an open square in front of the castle. Milada, clad for battle, with Jitka, Vítek, and their armed supporters, waits for the signal. They hear the tolling of a bell and the sound of a chorus of monks, and Milada is afraid that Dalibor is being done to death inside the prison while they wait for his signal to attack it. They prepare to assault the castle.

Women comment on what they can see, and presently Dalibor comes out of the castle carrying Milada, who is wounded. She dies in his arms, and, when Budivoj appears with troops, Dalibor stabs himself and dies with his beloved. (There is an alternative ending to the opera, in which Dalibor is executed before Milada and the rescue party can reach him; Milada is killed in the attack.)

H.

LIBUŠE

Opera in three acts, text (originally in German) by Josef Wenzig, translated into Czech by Erwin Spindler. Première, Prague, for the opening of the Czech National Theatre (Národní Divadlo), 11 June 1881, with Marie Sittová, Irma Reichová, Betty Fibichová, Josef Lev, Karel Čech, Antonín Vavra, František Hynek, Leopold Stropnický. The theatre was burnt down two months later, and a new building inaugurated in 1883, again with Libuše. The thousandth performance of operas by Smetana in Prague was celebrated with this work on 27 August 1905. First performed Vienna, 1924, by Olomouc Opera Company; Zagreb, 1933. Frequently revived all over the Czech Republic and Slovakia. No record of either British or U.S. productions.

Libuše, a Bohemian princess.....Soprano
Přemysl of Stadice.....Baritone
Chrudoš from Ottava.....Bass
Št'áhlav from Radbuza, his brother.....Tenor
Lutobor, their uncle.....Bass
Radovan, head of the Council.....Baritone
Krasava, Lutobor's daughter.....Soprano
Radmila, sister of Chrudoš and Št'áhlav.....Contralto
Four Reapers.....Sopranos, Contralto, Tenor
Elders and Noblemen, Maidens at Libuše's Court, Přemysl's Retinue, People

Place: Vyšehrad and Stadice in the Bohemian Mountains

Time: Pagan Era

Running Time: 2 hours 55 minutes

Smetana had been appointed conductor at the Provisional Theatre rather over a year before he completed Dalibor. He tried to improve every aspect of the theatre but was particularly concerned with a representative repertory, if possible of Czech music. Between 1866 and 1872, eighty-two different operas were performed, thirty-three of which were new productions prepared and conducted by Smetana himself. In 1869, he wrote a concert piece called Libuše's Judgement, and this seems to have been the seed from which came what was, chronologically speaking, the fourth of his operas, though the penultimate to reach the stage. From the start, he said of Libuše, 'I desire it to be used only for festivals which affect the whole Czech nation. Libuše is not an opera of the old type, but a festive tableau – a form of musical and dramatic sustenance.'

In the event, he had his way, but at a cost. The composition lasted from 1869 to 1872, but it was another nine years before the opera reached the stage, for the simple reason that Smetana refused it performance at the other Prague theatres and insisted that it should inaugurate the National Theatre when it was eventually opened. The overture was played before, but by the time the work reached the stage, Smetana himself was deaf and could hear nothing at all. Dr Brian Large in his biography¹ of Smetana says: 'Whereas The Brandenburgers in Bohemia unfolds like a historical novel, The Bartered Bride reads like an idyll, and Dalibor develops with epic pathos, it is Libuše alone which has the grandeur of an ode. It is not opera in the traditional sense but a magnificent pageant, a hymn to the nation, cast in six tableaux.' He compares it with two other monuments of the nineteenth century, Wagner's Die Meistersinger and Berlioz's Les Troyens, and the last scene, with its prophetic note, certainly recalls Berlioz's Dido.

The noble overture opens with a splendid fanfare, and is built up on two further ideas, the first associated throughout the opera with Libuše and first heard on the oboe, another associated with Přemysl, first heard on horns.

Act I, scene i. Vyšehrad, overlooking the Vltava valley. Libuše, as her father's only child, is ruler of Bohemia. In measured tones, Radmila introduces the case which she has to try and which concerns Radmila's two brothers, who are in dispute over their dead father's estate. From her anguished comments, Krasava, who stands to one side, is plainly concerned with the way matters will turn out. A solemn orchestral introduction leads to Libuše's majestic prayer for enlightenment, 'Eternal Gods'. Libuše leaves for the council chamber, but Krasava and Radmila remain behind, Krasava admitting her guilty involvement but refusing to elaborate on it.

Scene ii. An open space at Vyšehrad. The two litigants, Chrudoš and Št'áhlav, wait for Libuše's arrival, and the music is urgent as befits the heat of the brothers' quarrel. Chrudoš interrupts the bystanders' conventional regrets at the fraternal strife, and Št'áhlav states his opposition though in more measured terms. Their uncle Lutobor thinks reconciliation most unlikely, and for his part wishes that the Princess might decide to take a husband to sustain her in her heavy task.

The sounds of a march introduce Libuše's procession, and in another big public statement she makes plain the purpose of the meeting and the purport of the brothers' quarrel. Chrudoš angrily proposes that they follow German custom, under which the elder brother inherits all. Št'áhlav adopts a more conciliatory tone and agrees to abide by whatever is decided. Libuše gives judgement that, according to ancient custom, the estate of a father shall be managed jointly by the brothers or, if they prefer, divided between them. Chrudoš dissents, and Libuše turns judgement over to the Council. Radovan affirms the Elders' agreement with Libuše, at which point Chrudoš furiously rejects her as a suitable judge on the grounds that she is a weak woman, and rushes from the spot. Libuše decides to abdicate her power, bidding the people choose her a husband to whom she may hand over rule. In an ensemble, the choice is referred back to her and, amid general rejoicing, she chooses Přemysl of Stadice, whom she has loved since childhood.

Act II, scene i. A burial mound in the country. Lutobor bemoans his fate in having fathered a daughter so different in temperament from him. But Krasava, who follows him, plainly wishes to confess her fault – that she loves Chrudoš, having rejected him at first in order to lead him on, and now knows she is the cause of near disaster – and she does so in music of vibrant passion. Št'áhlav and Radmila overhear her confession and join their voices to her plea to her father, who relents to demand that she achieve reconciliation with Chrudoš and herself persuade him to bow the knee to Libuše. Otherwise, he will see Krasava no more.

Chrudoš comes in, full of resentment – against the idea of accepting Libuše's rule, against his beloved Krasava, who he thinks loves his brother. When Krasava herself appears and admits her fault before pleading her genuine love for him, he at first resists, then, after she has invoked his father's memory, succumbs to the love that has been choking him – to the obvious approval of Radmila, Št'áhlav and Lutobor. The two brothers embrace.

Scene ii. The countryside in the neighbourhood of Stadice. In the background stands Přemysl's beautiful farmhouse, surrounded by lime trees. Voices of harvesters off-stage precede Přemysl's famous aria ('Již plane slunce'; The sun is blazing), a pinnacle of Czech operatic literature which runs the gamut of idealised masculine emotions: disciplined if perhaps hopeless love for a good woman, ardour for patriotic duty, the whole tempered by a belief in the solvent qualities of the natural order. The farm workers return home and are greeted by Přemysl, but he himself remains outside and alone, lost in thoughts of Libuše and the deep peace of the countryside – a beautiful lyrical passage.

¹ Smetana by Brian Large (Duckworth, London, 1970).

A crowd of people, led by Radovan and the Elders, come to bring the news that Přemysl has been chosen as Libuše's consort. Přemysl voices his gratitude towards the people and the circumstances of his life as a farmer, then goes with the Elders, the more willingly when he learns from them the possibility of danger from the dissident Chrudoš. There is a vigorous finale for Přemysl, Radovan and the crowd.

Act III, scene i. Libuše's court. Festively clad, she awaits the arrival of her chosen bridegroom, but first, with Radmila and Lutobor watching, she solemnises the reconciliation of Chrudoš and Št'áhlav, then the betrothal of Chrudoš and Krasava. She promises to intercede on Chrudoš's behalf with Přemysl, to whom in future her supreme power will belong.

Libuše is left alone, praying to the spirit of her dead father Krok for blessings on this solemn moment in her life. Her maidens reappear to escort her towards her waiting bridegroom and the scene ends with their bridal chorus.

Scene ii. The great meeting place in Vyšehrad. Chrudoš and Lutobor, together with Št'áhlav, Radmila and Krasava, await the appearance of Libuše and Přemysl. Chrudoš's rebellious spirit is again in the ascendant and it takes all the persuasion that Lutobor, Št'áhlav and Krasava can command before he vows to give soft answers rather than display the stiff-necked pride which is his natural instinct.

A ceremonial procession of noblemen and Elders, headed by Radovan, is followed by Libuše and Přemysl. Přemysl greets the people and promises to serve them to the best of his ability. He and Libuše ask for the blessing of the gods – the nearest Smetana could get, surmises Brian Large, to finding love music for two heroic leaders of the Bohemian people. The scene of general rejoicing turns to the specific as Přemysl applauds the reconciliation of Chrudoš and Št'áhlav, then demands that Chrudoš make amends for his insult to Libuše. As Chrudoš makes to bow the knee, Přemysl embraces him as a man of spirit and the onlookers rejoice in an act of generosity which augurs well for Přemysl's reign.

Libuše meanwhile has been gazing in front of her in a state of prophetic rapture. She starts to foretell the heroic destiny of the Czech people and in six 'pictures' (the word is Smetana's own) we see successively Prince Břetislav, who united Bohemia and Moravia and defeated a German invasion; Jaroslav of Sternberk, who defended the country against the Tartars; King Ottokar II, who increased the Slavonic empire, together with his granddaughter Elisabeth and her son Charles IV, who improved the status of Bohemia in Central Europe; then Žižka, Prokop the Great and the Hussites; the wise King George of Podiebrad, who consolidated the results of the Hussite revolution; and ultimately, as Libuše's vision dims into a general conviction of a great Czech destiny, the royal castle in Prague which dominates the whole scene. In spite of attempts to illustrate each tableau, and Smetana's use of the Hussite chorale 'Ye who are God's warriors' as the basis for the music, this has more solemnity and grandeur than true drama, but the final quarter of an hour nonetheless makes a fitting ending to a festive work, even though one may think that in general the score is notable more for lyrical expansiveness than for economy of means, for Smetana's peculiar – and moving – expressiveness rather than for urgency or concise dramaturgy. H.

THE TWO WIDOWS

Dvě Vdovy

Opera in two acts, libretto by Emmanuel Zünger founded on a comedy by P.J.F. Maleville. Première, 27 March 1874, in Prague with Marie Sittová, Ema Saková, Antonín Vávra, Karel Čech, conductor Smetana. New version, with recitatives instead of spoken dialogue, Prague, 1878. First performed in Germany, Hamburg, 1881; in Vienna by company from Olomouc, 1924; London, Guildhall School of Music, 1963; English National Opera, 1993 (in English). Very frequently heard in Czechoslovakia and fairly often in Germany in the years after 1945.

Karolina Záleská, *widow and heir of a rich Colonel*Soprano
 Anežka Miletinská, *a widow, her cousin*Soprano
 Mumlal, *gamekeeper in Karolina's service*Bass
 Ladislav Podhajsky, a neighbouring landowner ...Tenor
 Toník, *a peasant*Tenor
 Lidka, *a maid*Soprano
 Villagers, Servants

Place: Karolina's House

Time: Late Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

Smetana deliberately set out to write an opera in, as he himself said, 'a distinguished salon style'. In his output The Two Widows is, so to speak, the equivalent of Onegin or Traviata or Così fan tutte, and for us it is peculiar to read that it succeeded straight away in spite of accusations of being Wagnerian in style.

Act I. A bustling overture leads to a lively chorus as villagers come to invite Karolina, the lady of the manor, to the harvest festival. She gently mocks her cousin Anežka for continuing to wear nothing but black so long after her husband's death. In a charming aria Karolina explains her philosophy: she is independent and busy, she runs her estate well, and she finds it a highly satisfactory existence. Her advice to her cousin is to remarry – and she'd better begin her new regime by going to the harvest festival dance that very night.

Enter Mumlal, Karolina's gamekeeper and general factotum, and a born grumbler. A trio bubbles away and we might be in the agreeable world of Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor as Mumlal explains that the bane of his life at the moment is a poacher who, to add insult to injury, never even hits what he shoots at. A shot is heard, Mumlal is sure it is his tormentor, and Karolina sends him off to arrest the culprit.

The two ladies withdraw as Ladislav comes into view. In an excellent example of the tenor-bass duets which figure regularly in Smetana's operas, Ladislav makes it clear that his one object is to be taken to the manor, there to meet his beloved Anežka, and his only complaint is at Mumlal's slowness in effecting his capture. Karolina insists they put him on trial straight away, Ladislav is brought in, and all comment on his capture in a quartet, to which he and Anežka make contributions which are full of feeling. In a fervent solo and with a plea of unrequited love, Ladislav defends his action to an audience that is by no means unresponsive. A lively trio for the ladies and Ladislav leads to the reading out of the description of the prisoner which Mumlal has been laboriously concocting: 'Height – average; hair – average ... etc.', and then to his sentence to half a day's imprisonment in the house. The scene ends with an exhilarating reprise of the trio, this time with Mumlal adding his voice to make it a quartet.

Mumlal takes Ladislav off, and on his return is surrounded by the young people of the village, among them Toník and Lidka, all eager to know the story of the arrest he has made. Has it something to do with love, they ask? Mumlal abuses the tender passion, only to have Toník and Lidka mock him for his cynicism, and to find the gentry supporting the majority opinion as the curtain falls.

Act II. A large hall with a sun porch. A lively prelude leads to Ladislav's lyrical song in praise of Maytime and love, sung from his room (off-stage). Anežka listens but, in course of conversation with Karolina, agrees to renounce any pretensions to Ladislav's affections in favour of Karolina, who well knows that Anežka is in love with Ladislav and hopes to force her to admit it by making her jealous; the attractive duet is based on Karolina's opening aria.

Anežka alone reads a letter she has received from Ladislav; she goes to burn it, then snuffs the candle and hides the letter as Ladislav appears. In a long scene, Ladislav gently pleads his cause, and recites from memory the letter, which Anežka pretends not to have read. In the end she tells him she can never be more to him than a friend, and they say goodbye. Throughout the scene, Smetana has written music of the utmost tenderness for his lovers, and even when Anežka appears to reject Ladislav's pleading, her real feelings are never in doubt – the music is as touching and genuine as for instance that of Mařenka's aria in The Bartered Bride.

The plot thickens as Karolina, dressed for the dance, pretends to appropriate Ladislav herself. Anežka's big scena is an extended and shapely aria of considerable appeal – she laments her unhappy and lonely situation. When Mumlal comes in, it is to complain to Anežka at the way his mistress is carrying on, kissing as is the local custom the man with whom she dances. In a comic song, he expounds his philosophy – he thunders with anger on every possible occasion, it seems – but Anežka can stand him no longer and flounces out. Mumlal hides as Lidka, who has been dancing, runs in pursued by Toník demanding the kiss that is his due. She is coy, Mumlal fulminates from behind a pillar for all the world like a Czech Osmin and interposes himself when Lidka finally grants the kiss – 'it tasted like pepper and salt' is the young couple's comment. But they get their own back a minute later and box the old man's ears soundly. The trio is one of the most delightful numbers of the score.

In a scene with Ladislav, Karolina makes him admit that it is love that has brought him to her estate; they are observed together by Anežka, who jumps to obvious but mistaken conclusions. In a quartet (Mumlal comes in too) each admits his or her true reaction to the situation, and finally in a stretta three, with Mumlal vigorously dissenting, proclaim their faith in the power of love. Ladislav runs off, Anežka is constrained to admit to Karolina that she loves him after all, he hears the admission from his hiding place, and as the banquet is announced, only Mumlal is left grousing away. A chorus of rejoicing and a polka bring to an end an opera that is one of the most tuneful and delightful of any that has not yet been accepted into the world's repertory. H.

THE KISS

Hubička

Opera in two acts, text by E. Krásnohorská. Première, Prague, 7 November 1876. First performed in Chicago, 1921; in England, Carl Rosa, 1948, with Packer, Myrrdin, conducted by Tausky (there had been an amateur performance at Liverpool in 1938). Revived Cambridge University, 1969.

| | |
|--------------------------------------|---------------|
| Paloucky, a peasant | Bass-Baritone |
| Vendulka, his daughter | Soprano |
| Lukáš, a young widower | Tenor |
| Tomeš, brother-in-law of Lukáš | Baritone |
| Martinka, Vendulka's old aunt | Contralto |
| Matouš, an old smuggler | Bass |
| Barče, a servant girl | Soprano |
| A Frontier Guard | Tenor |

Place: In the Mountains on the Borders of Bohemia
Running Time: 1 hour 45 minutes

The librettos of Smetana's last three operas (four, if you count the fragmentary Viola, an attempt at Shakespeare's Twelfth Night) are by Eliška Krásnohorská, a librettist of skill and forceful personality. She determined subject and shape, specifying for instance duets and ensembles (of which in opera she was a determined supporter) and received a minimum of feedback from the composer. The three operas she wrote for Smetana are basically comedies, but comedies with a serious basis, always concerned with the mending of a relationship which, at some time in the past, has been broken or at least bruised. As the same goes to some extent at least for The Bartered Bride and

The Two Widows (not by Krásnohorská), Smetana's hand in the choice of subjects must not be discounted. But Krásnohorská's influence on the last phase of Smetana's operatic career – the period during which he was deaf – cannot be ignored either.

The Kiss is at least superficially an undemonstrative opera, with only a mild joke for subject – the superstitious reluctance of a bride-to-be to give her lover a kiss before their marriage, and their subsequent quarrel (Act I) and reconciliation (Act II, scene ii). The first scene of Act II is devoted to the frustration of the principal characters, with a band of smugglers (a virtually unexplained interruption) as background. But Vendulka is shown as sufficiently headstrong to risk her future for her 'superstitious reluctance' and the opera's serious undertone must not be totally passed over. Smetana has provided attractive, melodious and singable music, which may not have quite the point of his Bartered Bride score but is full of charm.

Act I. A room in Paloucky's cottage. Through the open window can be seen the village square. Lukáš, a young peasant, was always in love with Vendulka, but, at the wish of his parents, he married another woman. Now she is dead and he is free to marry Vendulka. Martinka is delighted at the way things have worked out, but Vendulka's father has some misgivings; both Vendulka and Lukáš are headstrong, determined people – she would do better to refuse him, he tells his daughter. Her unhappiness is so obvious at this piece of advice, that he relents; but he does not appear to alter his view that this marriage is a risky affair.

Barče rushes in to say that the wooing party is about to put in an appearance, and soon Lukáš and Tomeš appear at the window, followed by a crowd of curious villagers. Tomeš explains that Lukáš has come a-wooing; Paloucky gives his consent, but in such a way that Lukáš takes offence that it was not done more gladly. Paloucky explains that he thinks the prospective couple are too hot-tempered to keep peace for long, but he gives them his blessing and all is forgiven and forgotten in a moment. There is a duet for the two lovers, at the end of which Lukáš makes as if to kiss Vendulka; she refuses to allow him to do so. Lukáš insists, she continues to refuse, and the fat is in the fire as Paloucky predicted. But all is well again when Tomeš starts up a drinking song, in which everyone joins, before leaving the happy couple alone together.

They sing of their love, and presently Lukáš's child is brought in a cradle, much to Vendulka's joy. He tries to kiss her again – after all, they are alone now – but she will still not allow him to do so, not until after their wedding. The quarrel breaks out again, and eventually Vendulka threatens to throw Lukáš out of the house, to the surprise of everyone except her father, who had anticipated just such a situation arising. Lukáš makes a last demand for what he has come to think of as his right, and, when it is refused, leaves in high dudgeon.

Martinka advises Vendulka to make up the quarrel, and bids her good night. Vendulka sits herself by the cradle of the child and sings as she rocks it to sleep. She sings two separate songs, which together make a most appealing aria, at the end of which Vendulka herself falls asleep. She is woken up by the sound of a polka outside her window, and she sees Lukáš dancing merrily in front of the house, and kissing the girls with whom he dances. She is furious, but even Tomeš's endeavours are not sufficient to quieten Lukáš, whose blood is up, and who is determined to get his revenge publicly on Vendulka. As the curtain falls, Vendulka exclaims that she must go away from the place where she has been so publicly humiliated.

Act II. A thick wood near the frontier of Bohemia. Matouš appears at the head of a band of smugglers, all carrying heavy bundles. There is a smugglers' chorus, after which the stage is left empty until the arrival of Lukáš, who in an aria expresses his despair at the disappearance of Vendulka, whom he dearly loves in spite of his impetuous behaviour. Tomeš is looking for him, and presently appears along the same path, to be overjoyed at the sight of his brother-in-law, for whose safety he was becoming really worried. Lukáš is anxious to restore himself in Vendulka's favour, and Tomeš in a fine example of Smetana's tenor-baritone duets bids him only have the courage to admit he was in the wrong, and she will have him back at once.

Matouš, who has overheard the conversation between Lukáš and Tomeš, comes out into the open when they have left and has a good laugh at Lukáš's expense. He is waiting for Martinka, who lives nearby and is in league with the smugglers, but when she comes into sight, she has Vendulka with her. Vendulka is frightened by the loneliness of the forest, but Martinka comforts her before giving a signal, which brings Matouš out of hiding. Vendulka begins to lament her fate, but Matouš knows that the happy ending to her story is being prepared by Lukáš himself, who is only too anxious to make up their quarrel.

When Matouš goes his way, he gives some of his contraband to Martinka, who shares the burden with Vendulka. A frontier guard appears but leaves them unmolested. Martinka continues her efforts to persuade Vendulka to return home, where she is sure Lukáš will be waiting for her.

Next morning, outside Martinka's cottage. Barče is trying to find Martinka or Vendulka to tell them the news she has heard from Matouš. She thinks she can hear them coming – but it is the sound of a lark. She rejoices in the lark's singing in an attractive aria, but one so tricky as to be beyond the capacity of almost any soprano willing to take secondary roles.

Up the path to Martinka's cottage come Matouš, Paloucky, Lukáš and Tomeš, with a whole crowd of villagers. Barče wrings her hands in frustration that Martinka and Vendulka are not there to welcome them and so make the reconciliation possible. Lukáš apologises to Paloucky for his behaviour, and soon afterwards Vendulka appears. She and Lukáš are obviously overjoyed to see each other again, but when Vendulka comes towards him with open arms, Lukáš refuses to kiss her – until he has openly begged her pardon for his behaviour towards her. H.

THE SECRET

Tajemství

Opera in three acts, libretto by Eliška Krásnohorská. Première at the New Czech Theatre, Prague, 18 September 1878, with Sittová, Fibichová, Mareš, Lev. First performed Vienna (in German), 1895; Oxford (in English), 1957, with a cast including Janet Baker as Rose, conductor Jack Westrup.

| | |
|--|-----------|
| Councillor Malina | Bass |
| Councillor Kalina | Baritone |
| Miss Rose, Malina's sister | Contralto |
| Blaženka, Malina's daughter | Soprano |
| Vít, a forester, Kalina's son | Tenor |
| Boniface, an old soldier, Kalina's nephew | Baritone |
| Skřivánek, a ballad singer | Tenor |
| The Builder | Baritone |
| The Innkeeper | Soprano |
| Jirka, the bellringer | Tenor |

The Ghost of Friar BarnabášBaritone
Councillors, Neighbours, Boys and Girls, Harvesters, Bricklayers

Place: In and Near the Bezděz Mountain

Time: End of the Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

The Secret was written at a time when the last vestiges of Smetana's hearing were disappearing, and when he had lost his job as conductor at the Opera. It was immediately successful, but soon lost favour with a public which wanted more than anything else a follow-up to The Bartered Bride. Its present popularity in the Czech Republic dates from its re-studying by Karel Kovařovic in Prague twenty-five years after the première.

The overture, on an extended scale, is lively in spite of the almost foreboding nature of the C minor theme (the secret) with which it opens. From the rise of the curtain, any lover of The Bartered Bride will feel on safe ground, as chorus and solo, aria and duet alternate in an open-air setting of village activity. Rose, Malina's sister, and Kalina were years ago prevented from marrying by her family on the grounds that he was too poor for her. The families have remained rivals and lose no opportunity for insult and recrimination. Now, on one side of the street the harvest is being threshed in Malina's barn, on the other the bricklayers and their foreman are rejoicing at the completion of Kalina's new house. Before long the two factions are quarrelling, but the arrival of the musician, Skřivánek, provides a distraction, until each side bribes him to sing a derogatory song about the other. In a charming piece, he gently mocks each until for a moment it looks as though there will be a reconciliation. But the quarrel breaks out anew, and it is only prevented from becoming a brawl by the intervention of Blaženka and Vít. The rioters disperse, and in a charming arioso piece Vít makes an assignation with Blaženka for that evening.

Rose (who is described as 'a little over thirty') has earlier mentioned a secret, supposed to have been left after his death by Friar Barnabáš so that Kalina might find a treasure. Kalina denies any knowledge of it, but Boniface has found a piece of old mouldy paper in a bit of wood he picked up to use as a weapon. He gives it to Kalina, who recognises it as Friar Barnabáš's instruction, which must remain his secret. The jealous Boniface, himself a suitor for Rose's hand, tells the builder, who immediately communicates the news to whomever he meets, and the finale to Act I has the news being broadcast to all and sundry by the bell-ringer, while Blaženka and Vít murmur tenderly of love.

Act II. A ruin on Mount Bezděz. The 'secret' motif opens the prelude to an impressive scena for Kalina, who has come to look for the treasure, rails against his rejection on the score of poverty, and reveals that his present affluence is all bluff. In music of energetic cast, he wonders if it is money he craves – but why, he asks himself. Because of Rose? Kalina falls asleep, but as he dreams the ghost of Friar Barnabáš spurs him on to find the treasure, and he wakes to watch a procession of maidens and pilgrims on their way to the chapel. He determines to follow them, not sure whether his dream was inspired by heaven or hell.

Blaženka and Vít have arranged to meet here, and their scene is a big-scale love duet, dominated by a solo for Blaženka. When Blaženka makes it clear that she wishes their idyll to continue in a series of lovers' meetings, Vít protests that he wants her for his wife. They are about to say goodnight, when they are observed by Boniface, who fetches the parents. An ensemble of almost Rossinian brilliance develops as the elders watch the lovers parting. When they are discovered, they plead with their relations, until Rose denounces any Kalina as certain to be untrue. Vít cannot bear to hear his father slandered and says that he and Blaženka would refuse money but will elope together.

At the end of an impressive octet, Rose is left alone to muse longingly on the contrast between this love which knows no hindrance, and her own for Kalina which was so early blighted. Boniface enters stealthily, and in a martial air offers himself as her bridegroom, but before Rose can answer, they see Kalina advancing with his lantern and spade. They watch him start to dig, but suddenly he cries out Rose's name and disappears into the hole, leaving Rose and Boniface aghast behind him.

Act III. In Malina's house there is rejoicing at the end of the hop harvest, and Rose encourages Blaženka to ask her father directly if she may get married. She sings a touching aria in which she compares her love to a stream; let it not dash against the stones and be split up and wasted. A patter ensemble develops as they discuss Kalina's debts, and a loud banging is heard behind the wall, but no one takes much notice as at that moment Vít comes to say goodbye before leaving to seek his fortune. His account of his future moves even Malina to pity, but he says he will give Blaženka's hand in marriage only if Kalina himself comes to beg for it on his son's behalf. Just as Boniface puts himself forward as a suitor for Rose's hand, more knocks are heard, and the general reaction is one of fear of the supernatural. Skřivánek improvises a song in praise of Barnabáš's good nature, and the knocking is heard again. To repetitions of the 'secret' motif, Kalina bursts through the wall by the great stove. He has found Friar Barnabáš's treasure: it is Rose! There is a happy ending, with Kalina asking Malina to bestow the hand of his daughter on Vít and that of Rose on Kalina himself. H.

THE DEVIL'S WALL

Čertova Stěna

Opera in three acts, text by Eliška Krásnohorská. Première 29 October 1882, with Josef Lev as Vok. The performance was apparently ill-prepared and unsuccessful and the work has been revived only spasmodically.

Vok Vítkovic, a middle-aged, bachelor nobleman.....Baritone
 Závěš Vítkovic, Vok's nephew.....Contralto
 Jarek, a knight in Vok's service.....Tenor
 Hedvika, Countess of Šauenburk.....Soprano
 Míchálek, steward of Rožmberk Castle.....Tenor
 Katuška, his daughter.....Soprano
 Beneš, a hermit.....Bass
 Rarach, the devil.....Bass

The King's Messengers, Knights, Female Retainers,
 Peasants, Monsters

Place: Rožmberk; on the River Vltava near Vyšší Brod Monastery

Time: Mid-Thirteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Smetana's illness was sufficiently far advanced to impede the process of composition; the opera's failure hit him terribly hard, critics disliking the portrayal of the devil in a nineteenth-century opera almost as much as they hated the botched staging. Within months he was losing his mental balance, and, though he continued to compose sporadically, he died in a lunatic asylum eighteen months after the première.

The Devil's Wall has never been considered an entirely satisfactory work, partly because of the strain under which it was written, partly because composer and poet never reached accord as to the exact nature of the libretto Smetana required. It was to be a comedy – but Smetana wrote that he had run out of wit and gaiety, and he was most interested in the dark side of Krásnohorská's drama. There is little comedy except for the uninvolved figures of the cheating hermit and the under-achieving Rarach. Even so, the opera, with all its internal contradictions, has excited real admiration among specialists and is perhaps the work of this composer most likely to work its way into the fringes of the repertory.

The name of the opera derives from a group of rocks in the river Vltava at Vyšší Brod, by tradition the remains of a wall the Devil built in order to flood the neighbouring land. The opera concerns the lonely situation and state of mind of the nobleman Vok Vítkovic, who as a young man was disappointed in love and with whom Smetana during composition came more and more to identify.

Act I. Jarek tells Míchálek that his latest attempt to find a bride for Vok has ended once again in failure. The hermit Beneš would much prefer Vok to die single and leave his considerable wealth to a monastery. A comic devil, Rarach by name (characterised by a recurring pantomime-style laugh), tends to act in double harness (though by no means always in strict accord) with Beneš, which is perhaps fortunate since he is physically Beneš's double. Besides Jarek, Vok's entourage includes Katuška, Míchálek's daughter, who is in love with Jarek, and his nephew Závěš. Jarek in excess of loyalty vows not to marry before Vok, who, prompted by the devil, complicates matters by offering himself to marry Katuška, a notion Míchálek takes rather too seriously. When news comes that Vok's beloved from time long ago has in her will left her daughter to his care, he is stirred to remember the past in one of the composer's most successful arias. The act ends as Beneš summons up courage to defy Rarach with, it must be admitted, only partial success, as he is damned by his lies and self-serving behaviour as Rarach is by his out-and-out devilry.

Act II. Jarek's efforts to find Vok a wife continue to be frustrated by Rarach, and Míchálek continues to enjoy lording it as Vok's potential father-in-law. Meantime there arrives Hedvika, daughter of Vok's lost love, a patent threat to Beneš's plans. With the help of Rarach he persuades Vok, in spite of his obvious attraction to Hedvika, to tell the others he plans to finish his days in a monastery. This is generally seen as a disaster, and in a great ensemble they beg him to think again. He changes his mind and says he will marry if there is someone who that night, before his vows are complete, comes to him at the monastery.

Act III is not only packed with action but short of coherence because of cuts made by the composer in the libretto. Beneš confesses to Míchálek that he schemed regardless of consequences to get Vok's wealth for his monastery with himself as abbot, then repels the devil's attempt to cross the river; village girls, to the discomfiture of the village men, queue up at the monastery to offer themselves to Vok; and Rarach's devils feverishly dance a kind of Mephisto waltz before they dam the river. Hedvika sees that Vok and the monastery are in mortal danger but it is out of love that she makes her way across the river. Vok accepts her – and Jarek and Katuška are free to marry. Beneš makes the sign of the cross, for once successfully, over the wall and it breaks, to allow the river to return to its course. Messengers arrive from the King announcing the appointment of Vok to be Marshal of the Kingdom.

H.

ETHEL SMYTH

(born 22 April 1858, died 9 May 1944)

Ethel Smyth bravely insisted on studying abroad, at the Leipzig Conservatoire. Her first opera, Fantasio, was performed in Weimar in 1894 and her second, Der Wald, in Berlin in 1901. The Wreckers, her third and most successful opera, was inspired by a holiday in Cornwall and the Scilly Isles. She wrote three more operas, The Boatswain's Mate (1914), the opera-ballet Fête Galante (1923) and the ballad-opera Entente Cordiale (1925). Though supported by conductors from Nikisch to Beecham, her work was seldom taken as seriously as she hoped. Her eight volumes of memoirs attracted more attention in Britain, where her campaigns for serious opera and for the Suffragettes attracted notoriety but contributed to both causes. Bruno Walter believed that 'her work is destined permanently to succeed although its recognition, like the recognition of all true originality, only comes gradually and in the teeth of opposition.'¹

P.

THE WRECKERS

Lyrical Drama in three acts, English text translated by the composer and A. Strettel from Henry Brewster's 'Les Naufrageurs'. Première as Strandrecht in a German translation by John Bernhoff, Neues Theater, Leipzig, 11 November 1906. Two acts were performed in concert, conducted by Arthur Nikisch in London at the Queen's Hall in 1908, and it was staged on 22 June 1909 at His Majesty's Theatre, with John Coates as Mark and Mme de Vere Sapio as Thirza, conducted by Thomas Beecham. Revived at Covent Garden 1910, conducted by Bruno Walter, at Sadler's Wells in 1939, and in concert at the Proms, 1994, conducted by Odaline de la Martinez, with Justin Lavender and Anne-Marie Owens.

Pascoe, headman of the village and local preacher, aged 55.....Baritone
Lawrence, keeper of the lighthouse.....Baritone
Harvey, Lawrence's brother-in-law.....Bass
Talbot, landlord of the tavern.....Tenor
Jack, Talbot's son, aged 15.....Mezzo-Soprano
Mark, a young fisherman.....Tenor
Thirza, Pascoe's wife, aged 22.....Mezzo-Soprano
Avis, daughter of Lawrence, aged 17.....Soprano
A Man.....Bass

Place: Cornwall

Time: Second Half of the Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

¹ Bruno Walter, Memoirs.

The inhabitants of a Cornish village survive by robbing the ships they lure on to their rocky coast. Pascoe, their headman and preacher, supports the wreckers but has alienated his young wife, Thirza. She has fallen in love with Mark, formerly promised to Avis, the daughter of Lawrence, the lighthouse keeper.

Act I. A Cornish village, Sunday evening. The overture leads to the first chorus, 'God's Chosen People shall not pay the price of sin!', sung by the villagers on their way to chapel. They stop to drink and look forward to plunder. Pascoe rebukes them for drinking on the Sabbath: they have forgotten God, so He now guides ships away from their shores, and leaves them near to starvation. Lawrence has another explanation: someone has lit beacons to warn ships away from the coast. The villagers swear to hunt the traitor to death.

Thirza refuses to join the villagers at prayer. Mark sings a folksong and throws a flower in at her window. Avis forces him to admit he no longer loves her and erupts in fury against Thirza. When Thirza emerges, she wears Mark's flower and sings the song that he sang. She longs for love, even though it may cost her shame and death.

Avis hints to Pascoe that his young wife is betraying him. Thirza tells her husband that she longs to leave 'these cruel shores' and has nightmares about the wrecks. The congregation's hymns in the chapel provide an ironic counterpoint to their scene. Pascoe explains that God has provided them with a harvest and flocks on sea, since their land is so barren: 'In God's mighty name we shed blood!' Thirza runs out.

The villagers emerge from chapel, delighted with their hellfire sermon, since they know that they themselves are saved. Storm clouds gather. Avis accuses Pascoe of betraying them, and blames his infatuation with his young wife. The men plan to keep watch for beacons. They will signal their progress by sounding horns. A ship is sighted off shore. The villagers begin a wild dance as they anticipate plundering the wreck.

Act II. A prelude, 'On the cliffs of Cornwall', sets the scene on the seashore. Mark gathers driftwood for a warning beacon and sings the 'Ballad of the Bones'. Thirza warns him not to light the fire, since the villagers will see it: their horns can be heard coming close. Mark persuades her to leave Cornwall with him. They start the fire and then go. Pascoe faints when he recognises Thirza's shawl near the fire. The villagers assume he lit the beacon.

Act III. A cave giving on to the sea: dawn. The villagers have assembled in judgment. They do not want to believe that Pascoe betrayed them, but he refuses to defend himself. To save Pascoe, Mark and Thirza confess they lit the beacon. Avis lies that Mark spent the night with her, but no one believes her. Lawrence disowns his daughter.

The sea can be heard more and more clearly, as the tide rises. The villagers sentence the 'adulterers and traitors' to death. As the villagers leave, singing a psalm, Mark and Thirza greet the waves that flood the cave as their bridal song, 'Our last ecstasy thy embrace, O sea!'

Beecham blamed The Wreckers' infrequency of performance on 'the apparent impossibility of finding an Anglo-Saxon soprano who can interpret revealingly that splendid and original figure the tragic heroine Thirza. Neither in this part nor that of Mark, the tenor, have I seen more than a tithe of that intensity and spiritual exaltation without which the characters must fail to make their mark. But the ability to play tragedy with great and moving force has departed for a while from the English stage, and we must wait for a sign of its return there before there can be the slightest hope of The Wreckers coming into its own.'¹ Another problem is that the libretto is markedly less effective in the English translation than in the original French. In 1931 Virginia Woolf noted in her diary that the opera was 'vigorous & even beautiful; & active & absurd & extreme; & youthful: as if some song in her had tried to issue & been choked'.² Under cover of its historicalism, The Wreckers celebrates heterodoxy. The community's corrupt, self-righteous morality ensures that their attack on 'immorality' makes it seem the better option. 'Love in sin' probably has a wider meaning than merely adultery: Ethel Smyth made little secret of her homosexuality. In this respect, as well as in such features as the central role played by the sea and the off-stage service heard behind an on-stage duet, The Wreckers anticipates Peter Grimes. P.

¹ Thomas Beecham, A Mingled Chime, London, 1944.

² Entry for 15 October 1931, The Diary of Virginia Woolf, ed. Anne Olivier

Bell and Andrew McNellie, 1977-84, IV.

THE BOATSWAIN'S MATE

Comedy in one act (two parts), libretto by the composer based on W.W. Jacobs's short story of the same name (Captains All, 1905). Première, promoted by Thomas Beecham, at the Shaftesbury Theatre, London, 28 January 1916, conducted by the composer and afterwards by Eugene Goossens. Revived in 1919 by the British National Opera company at Covent Garden; in 1922 by Lillian Baylis at the Old Vic (rescored for small orchestra).

Harry Benn, ex-boatswain.....Tenor
Ned Travers, *ex-soldier*Baritone
Mrs Waters, *landlady of 'The Beehive'*Soprano
Mary Ann, servant girl.....Mezzo-Soprano
A PolicemanTenor

Chorus of Agricultural Labourers; Cats behind the scenes

Place: England

Time: Twentieth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

At the time she wrote The Boatswain's Mate Ethel Smyth was deeply involved with the Suffragette cause. The overture features a reworking of her 'March of the Women', which she wrote while serving a two-month sentence in Holloway Prison, for 'hurling a large-sized brick through the front window of the house of the Home Secretary'.¹ Nevertheless it is a comedy that touches unexpectedly lightly on the theme of women's greater competence. As something of an in-joke, she renamed George Benn, as he was in the original, Harry, in reference to her devoted friend Harry Brewster, the librettist of The Wreckers, whose persistent courtship was rewarded with her virginity in 1895, when he was 45 and she was 37.

Part I. Outside 'The Beehive'. Harry Benn, ex-boatswain, has long been in love with the tavern's landlady, Mrs Waters, a widow. Her servant girl Mary Ann tells him that her mistress will be on her own that night. As their first duet ('I know what I want when I see it') makes clear, Mrs Waters obstinately resists Benn's advances. Hope springs, however, as he says, eternal: 'Without a husband to love, obey and cherish, a woman's just like ivy without a tree! She'll run along the ground but she'll soon turn round and look for a tree, or maybe a post. And up it she will climb in a very short time, and cling on tight to the tree's delight'. Travers appears, an ex-soldier down on his luck. Benn explains that he is trying to persuade the landlady to marry him and offers Travers £3 to pretend to burgle 'The Beehive' that night, so that Benn can rescue Mrs Waters. He is sure she will then marry him, 'in her gratitude'. Benn writes out a confession, to prove this is no trick. Mrs Waters reflects on her independent but lonely state in an allegretto grazioso ('Suppose you mean to do a given thing'). When a group of labourers arrive and demand beer, she refuses to serve them and they go peacefully. An intermezzo follows.

Part II. The interior of the kitchen of 'The Beehive', 2.30 a.m. Moonlight and the sound of squalling cats. Travers enters through the window and Benn hands him the money. When Travers sees that Mrs Waters is armed with a gun, he hides in the cupboard. She has seen someone go in, however, and locks the door. Travers pushes Benn's confession underneath it and she lets him out. They are each struck by the other. To teach Benn a lesson, Mrs Waters pretends she has shot and killed Travers. In a waltz-time trio ('The first thing to do is get rid of the body') she orders Benn to dig a grave in the garden. He is horrified and leaves. Before she can explain, he returns, conscience-stricken, with a policeman, whose investigations are accompanied by the fate theme from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Mrs Waters produces Travers, and says he is working on her plumbing and gas fitting. Benn blames 'the drink or love', the theme of an animated quartet, before Mrs Waters pushes him out, along with the policeman. While she makes breakfast, Travers mends her stiff tap. He confesses that his one ambition is to be landlord of a country tavern. He leaves, promising to return in the evening. Alone, Mrs Waters looks in a mirror and spots a wrinkle. She sings a snatch of the song 'Springtime, the only pretty ring time' but adds, in a touching final aria, marked to be sung 'with passion', 'Summer, summer time for me!'

The text's whimsy has dated; its length has also not helped its cause. Beecham objected that while the first act 'with its mixture of lyrical numbers and dialogue is perfect in style and structure ... in the second this happy scheme is thrown overboard for an uninterrupted stream of music involving the setting of portions of the text that one feels would have been more effective and congruous had they been kept in speech'.¹ Ethel Smyth makes refreshing use of folksongs in her score, which also contains much real feeling. P.

¹ Sir Thomas Beecham, A Mingled Chime, London, 1944.

STEPHEN SONDHEIM

(born 22 March 1930)

Starting his career in the American musical as a lyricist for other composers (notably Bernstein in West Side Story and Jule Styne in Gypsy), Sondheim, who studied composition with Milton Babbitt, began his public career as a composer with A Funny Thing happened on the Way to the Forum, a farce, and continued with Company, Follies and A Little Night Music, three trail-blazing musicals with serious subjects. Both Pacific Overtures, with its strong Kabuki influence, and Sweeney Todd, the latter much better suited to a big theatre than the former, have been successfully produced by opera companies and are built to a scale that belongs as much to opera as to operetta or the musical. Sondheim's lyrics range from total simplicity to a dazzling complexity of metre and rhyme that are hard to rival in modern times. His collaboration with the well-known director Hal Prince has been notable and began with the staging of Company. H.

Musicians on Stage: Shamisen, Percussion

Place: Japan

Time: July 1853; from then on

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Pacific Overtures started as a play, was taken over by Hal Prince and rejigged to allow for songs by Sondheim, then re-thought. Sondheim explained: 'What we actually did was to create a mythical Japanese playwright who has come to New York, seen a couple of Broadway shows, and then goes back home and writes a musical about Commodore Perry's visit to Japan. It is this that gives the tone and style for the show.' The original cast was oriental and all-male, roles rarely last more than a scene and doubling is the rule rather than the exception.

The opera, presented in Kabuki style as a series of vignettes, is concerned with the opening up of Japan to Western influence. There are effectively twelve large-scale numbers, each amounting to a separate scene. There is no story, rather a progress from Japan as a world where nothing changes much to Japan taking its place in a modern world. A reciter puts his oar in from time to time, dispensing comments and information, as two friends, Manjiro (who has been to America) and Kayama (a traditionalist), come to terms with the new. Manjiro tries to return to old samurai values, Kayama adapts to new ways and becomes Governor.

The episodes build up a picture and the Reciter sets the isolationist scene with 'In the middle of the sea'. A Fisherman (Manjiro) warns of the arrival of the Americans. Lord Abe, the Shogun's chief councillor, appoints an unimportant Samurai, Kayama, as Chief of Police charged with fending the invaders off Japan's sacred soil. Kayama goes to tell his wife, Tamate, of his daunting task. In 'Tamate's Dance' ('There is no other way'), two observers comment. In 'Four Black Dragons', Fisherman, Thief and Reciter graphically describe the arrival of the American fleet, a Samurai pausing to lop off the thief's hand. Kayama fails to deter the Americans who demand an

PACIFIC OVERTURES¹

Musical in two acts, book by John Weidman; additional material by Hugh Wheeler; orchestration by Jonathan Tunick. Première Winter Garden Theater, New York, 11 January 1976. First performed in England, Wythenshawe, 1986; London, English National Opera, 1987, conductor James Holmes.

| | |
|---------------------------------------|-----------------------------------|
| Reciter | Lord Abe |
| Manjiro | Three Councillors |
| Kayama | Tamate, Kayama's wife |
| The Story Teller | A Fisherman |
| A Thief | Commodore Matthew Galbraith Perry |
| Shogun's Wife | Shogun's Companion |
| Four Geisha Girls | The Shogun |
| The Shogun's Mother | A Madam |
| An Old Man | A Boy |
| The American Admiral | The Dutch Admiral |
| The British Admiral | The Russian Admiral |
| The French Admiral | Three British Sailors |
| Samurais, Servants, Observers, Nobles | |

¹ The phrase is a political euphemism coined by Commodore Perry in 1853.

important personage to receive them. The Shogun's councillors dress up Manjiro, who has after all been to America, to look important. He brings back an ultimatum that in six days' time Commodore Perry will land. In 'Chrysanthemum Tea', his family remind the irresolute Shogun that the fleet is still at anchor in the bay, though, having given him poison, they agree he's not in much of a position to react.

Kayama and Manjiro suggest tatami mats be laid to avoid foreign feet treading on sacred soil. Kayama is made Governor of Uraga and in 'Poems', he and Manjiro indulge in the Japanese pastime of making up poems while walking home, where they find Tamate has committed suicide. In 'Welcome to Kanagawa', the madam of a brothel reminds the girls the Americans are expected. The Americans land and in 'Someone in a tree', an Old Man, his Younger Self, a Warrior and the Reciter, challenged to remember the scene, describe it in what Rodney Milnes after the Coliseum première called 'the most persistently haunting number in the score'. The Americans return to their ships, the mats are burned, and the act ends with a triumphant Kabuki Lion dance.

The second act addresses the new phenomenon of Japan under the influence of the West, from 1854 to the present. Manjiro is elevated to the rank of Samurai. Five Western Admirals in turn greet Lord Abe in pidgin English and present demands, displaying outrageous and completely non-p.c. national characteristics. Kayama and Manjiro sit before tea tables, Manjiro studying the ancient ceremony, Kayama singing 'A Bowler Hat' as over ten years he becomes progressively more westernised. In the penultimate scene and to a slow waltz, three sailors mistake girls in a garden for geishas, until their father draws his sword and kills one of them. On a journey, Lord Abe and his adherents are ambushed by dissidents from the south determined to restore the old order. Manjiro challenges and kills Kayama. In the thoroughly show-biz finale entitled 'Next', Japan takes its not wholly elegant place in the modern world.

Pacific Overtures is a masterpiece, not of pastiche because that is avoided, but of delicate miniatures, hints and understatement. Its adherents prize it above anything else Sondheim has written and, in spite of initial failure at Broadway's box office, revivals are hailed with an enthusiasm that is rare for something conceived as a Broadway show. H.

SWEENEY TODD

The Demon Barber of Fleet Street

Opera in two acts (orchestration by Jonathan Tunick), libretto by Hugh Wheeler; lyrics by the composer. Première, Uris Theater, New York, 1 March 1979, with Angela Lansbury, Len Cariou, conductor Paul Gemignani (and recorded the same year). First performed 1980, Drury Lane, London, with Denis Quilley, Sheila Hancock; Houston, 1984, with Timothy Noble, Joyce Castle, conductor John DeMain; New York City Opera, 1984, with Noble, Rosalind Elias, conductor Gemignani; Detroit, 1984; Royal Academy of Music, London, 1986; State Opera of South Australia, Adelaide, 1987, with Lyndon Terracini, Nancy Hayes, conductor Andrew Greene; Wormwood Scrubs, London, 1991, by Pimlico Opera; National Theatre, London, 1993; Tel Aviv, 1993, with Timothy Nolen, Robin Weisel-Capsouto, producer David Alden.

Sweeney Todd, a barber Baritone
 Anthony Hope, a young sailor Tenor
 A Beggar Woman Soprano
 Mrs Lovett, a seller of meat pies Mezzo-Soprano
 Johanna, ward of Judge Turpin Soprano
 Tobias Ragg, Pirelli's assistant Tenor
 Adolfo Pirelli, a mountebank barber Tenor
 Beadle Bamford Tenor
 Judge Turpin Bass-Baritone
 Workmen, Londoners, Inmates of an Asylum

Place: London

Time: Late 1840s

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Sondheim on a visit to England for the London production of Gypsy in 1973 saw Christopher Bond's play Sweeney Todd at the Theatre Royal, Stratford, in London's East End and decided straight away that its melodrama should be his next project. The result is probably the most ambitious of his many stage ventures, a riveting subject, in form a ballad opera not through-composed, with dialogue and recitative to link the numbers.

The subject itself may have come originally from a tale of a Scottish cannibal family of around 1600; or of a London murder around 1780; or from a French story of murders by a barber in the early nineteenth century. Its modern form dates from 1846 when an English 'penny dreadful' serialised it over eighteen issues; it was dramatised the following year by one George Dibdin Pitt, and this stage version was the first of many. Christopher Bond's play elaborates the social commentary and introduces an element of revenge into the original – Todd as a victim of society driven to crime.

Prologue. ‘Attend the tale of Sweeney Todd’ sings the company by way of overture; ‘He served a dark and vengeful god’.

Act I. From a small boat come Sweeney Todd and Anthony Hope, rejoicing at seeing London again. The latter is accosted by a Beggar Woman, who seems to hope for what she calls ‘a little jig jig’. She half-recognises Sweeney, who proceeds to excoriate London but falls to remembering a certain barber and his wife, the latter stolen away by a ‘pious vulture of the law’.

Anthony leaves and Mr Todd encounters Mrs Lovett. She serves him a specimen of what she describes as ‘probably the worst pies in London’, and Todd asks to rent the room over her shop – it’s haunted, she says; once lived in by a barber called Benjamin Barker. His wife was raped by a Judge and he was transported for life – ‘Poor thing!’ comes the refrain of her song. She’s dead now, their daughter a ward of the Judge. By the end of the song she has convinced herself Todd was once Barker. Mrs Lovett kept Barker’s razors and fetches them from a back room: he can be a barber again, now, she says! He recognises them – ‘My friends’ – and the company salutes him with a reprise of the opening ballad.

Johanna from Judge Turpin’s house wonders how a bird incarcerated in a cage can still sing so sweetly (‘Green finch and linnet bird’). Anthony appears, falls in love as soon as he sees her, and, after hearing from the Beggar Woman whose house it is, sings ‘I feel you, Johanna’.

Tobias sings to attract a crowd to Pirelli’s caravan, but Todd pronounces Pirelli’s Miracle Elixir for bald heads as no more than ‘piss with ink’, and enlists the Beadle to judge whether he or Pirelli can provide the faster, smoother shave, or better pull a tooth. The Beadle confirms his victory, then promises to visit Todd’s shop before the week is out.

Mrs Lovett calms the impatient Sweeney – ‘Wait’; planning is half the fun. Anthony tells them he has fallen in love with a beautiful girl kept locked up at Judge Turpin’s. She has given him the key and will elope with him – but where to? Bring her to Fleet Street, says Sweeney. Pirelli arrives with Tobias. He worked for Barker years ago and has recognised his razors. He tries blackmail on Todd, who bundles him into a trunk, and, when he’s got rid of Tobias, extracts Pirelli from the trunk and cuts his throat.

Another verse of the Ballad introduces Judge Turpin, who sings conscience-stricken of Johanna, whom he loved once as a daughter, now pants after as a dirty old man. He strikes himself with a whip – then tells Johanna to forget the young sailor. He has someone else in mind for her; himself! Johanna tells Anthony of her predicament and together they rather frantically plot their escape. The Judge tells the Beadle he plans to marry Johanna; he must smarten up first, says the Beadle – by means of a visit to Sweeney Todd’s barber shop. The young lovers continue their by no means placid duetting, while Judge and Beadle move towards the barber’s.

Mrs Lovett is at first horrified but later mollified when Sweeney tells her why he killed Pirelli, then announces that the Judge is waiting below. Todd gleefully plots revenge while the Judge complacently contemplates marriage (‘Pretty woman’). Todd raises his arm to slash the Judge’s throat but Anthony’s sudden arrival causes the intended victim to run outside. Mrs Lovett tries to console the frustrated executioner, and they come up with a plan which will dispose of Pirelli, keep Todd’s hand in for the Judge’s return, and ensure plentiful fresh meat for Mrs Lovett’s pies. In a swinging waltz rhythm, one of the score’s best and most exhilarating numbers, they rehearse: ‘Now let me see ... We’ve got tinker. No, no, something pinker. Tailor? Paler. Butler? Subtler. Potter? Hotter. Locksmith? Lovely bit of clerk. Maybe for a lark. Then again, there’s sweep if you want it cheap and you like it dark’.

Act II. Mrs Lovett is in the money, Tobias is working as a waiter and drumming up trade while Todd waits restlessly upstairs. A barber’s chair arrives and Todd and Mrs Lovett elaborately rehearse the procedure; once someone is in the chair he’ll pound three times then pull a lever and down the body’ll go to feed the customers. Anthony and Todd can be heard singing dreamily of Johanna but customers arrive to be shaved and it is to the accompaniment of ‘Johanna’ that they are prepared for the oven.

Smoke billows from Mrs Lovett’s chimney and the Beggar Woman sings ‘City on fire! Mischief!’ Todd continues to feed customers down the chute, while Anthony searches for Johanna, who has disappeared; he finds her in Fogg’s Asylum.

Mrs Lovett is in amorous mood but as she waxes lyrical about a wedding by the seaside Todd remains monosyllabic. Anthony's news that he has found Johanna in a madhouse suggests a plan. Wigmakers get hair from madhouses; ergo, Anthony will masquerade as a wigmaker come to buy hair of precisely Johanna's shade. Todd writes to tell Judge Turpin Johanna can be found at his house.

Tobias meanwhile affirms his loyalty to Mrs Lovett in a song ('Not while I'm around'), and during its course convinces her he has smelled more than a rat in Pirelli's disappearance. She runs to look for Todd, only to find the Beadle sitting at the harmonium while he enquires about the stink coming from their chimney. Mrs Lovett diverts him until Todd returns and gives the Beadle the treatment. His body comes down the chute just as Tobias finds evidence of human remains in the pies.

Anthony in the asylum cannot bring himself to shoot the owner but Johanna does it for him, before, to sounds of the lunatics singing 'City on fire!', they make their escape. Todd and Mrs Lovett look for Tobias, while the Beggar Woman nearly surprises Johanna in Todd's parlour had she not providentially hidden in a trunk. Todd senses the Judge's approach and gets rid of the Beggar by slitting her throat and pulling the lever before welcoming the Judge. He makes sure the Judge knows whose chair he's sitting in before cutting his throat too. In his madness, he is about to do the same for Johanna but she escapes. In the bakehouse, Mrs Lovett tries to bundle Judge and Beggar Woman into the oven, but Todd recognises his wife. Mrs Lovett pleads that she has looked after him better. But it's no good, and Todd flings her into the oven. Tobias blunders in, his hair white from shock, picks up the razor and with it slashes Todd's throat. Anthony, Johanna and two policemen watch Tobias start to turn the handle of the meat-grinder, before a repetition of the Ballad of Sweeney Todd brings down the curtain. H.

GASPARO SPONTINI

(born 14 November 1774, died 24 January 1851)

LA VESTALE

The Vestal Virgin

Opera in three acts, libretto (in French) by Etienne de Jouy, originally written for Boïeldieu, later refused by Méhul. Première, Paris Opéra, 15 December 1807. Given at the Opéra 213 times by 1857. First produced la Scala, 1824, with Ferron; King's Theatre, Haymarket, London, 1826, with Biagnoli; Philadelphia, 1828. Revived Covent Garden, in German, 1842; la Scala, 1908, with Mazzoleni, Emilio de Marchi, Stracciari, de Angelis, conductor Toscanini; Metropolitan, 1925, with Ponselle, Matzenauer, Edward Johnson, de Luca, Mardones, conductor Serafin; Florence Festival, 1933, with Ponselle, Stignani, Melandri, Pasero, conductor Gui; la Scala, 1955, with Callas, Stignani, Corelli, Rossi-Lemeni. As can easily be deduced, La Vestale has, like Norma, through the decades been considered an opera to be revived only when a star of the brightest magnitude has been available.

A ConsulBass

Vestals, Priests, People, Matrons, Young Women,
Senators, Consuls, Lictors, Warriors, Gladiators,
Dancers, Children, Prisoners

Place: Ancient Rome

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

Act I. After a spacious overture, the scene is the Forum in Rome, in front of the Temple of Vesta. Preparations for the triumph of the Roman leader Licinio are in progress. Licinio admits to his friend Cinna that he still loves one of the Vestal priestesses, Giulia by name, who was once affianced to him. He has returned from the wars to find her vowed to the service of Vesta. Licinio and Cinna join their voices in a duet.

The Chief Priestess and Giulia lead the Vestals in a processional hymn towards the temple, to prepare to crown the hero of the triumph. They withdraw, and Giulia and the Priestess are left alone, for the latter to attempt in a recitative and aria that is Gluck-like in its intensity to strengthen the resolve of the former to keep

Licinio, a Roman general.....Tenor
Giulia, a young Vestal virginSoprano
Cinna, a centurion.....Tenor/Baritone
The Pontifex Maximus.....Bass
The Chief Priestess.....Mezzo-Soprano

her vows of chastity. Giulia prays for help and begs that she may not be in the Temple to receive the victor of the wars, but the High Priestess insists that she fulfil her duties. Giulia, left alone, sings of her guilty love.

A vast procession comes towards the temple and the people hymn the victorious general. Licinio plots with Cinna the abduction of Giulia, but in a moment it is time for her to crown him with a golden laurel wreath. An ensemble develops during which Licinio tries to tell Giulia of his plans for them to elope that very night. Licinio is congratulated on his victory, and, in a tune which might have come from Tannhäuser or Rienzi, all praise his valour which has brought them peace. The act ends with extended triumphal dances.

Act II. Night. In the temple of Vesta, the virgin priestesses worship the goddess and the High Priestess consigns to Giulia the duty of tending the sacred flame, which must never be extinguished. Alone, Giulia, in the best-known scene of the opera, prays for the goddess's intervention to release her from the profane love which torments her. The sweeping phrases, the classical shape, the underlying drama of this scena convincingly argue Spontini's claim (made in conversation with Wagner) to be recognised as the natural successor of Gluck, rather than as we today might think of him the contemporary and rival of Cherubini. The intense lyricism of the prayer ('Tu che invoco con orrore') is succeeded by a dramatic section ('Su questo sacro altare') in which Giulia admits to herself that her love for Licinio is all-powerful, and the aria ends with an impassioned avowal of her betrayal of trust as a priestess ('Suspendete qual che istante'). It was Rosa Ponselle's magnificent recording of this music, with its classical inevitability and its climax adorned by the most beautiful soprano voice on record, which Maria Callas used to play as her own touchstone of quality, of what she aimed at in her own singing.

Licinio enters and declares the strength of his love. Soon their voices are joined in passionate duet, and too late they notice that the flame has died out. Cinna warns them to fly while there is still time, but voices can be heard approaching and Licinio rushes off to get help. The Pontifex Maximus denounces Giulia for the neglect of her sacred duties, and she begs for death as the just reward of her impiety. In a beautiful aria ('O nume tutelar'), Giulia prays to the gods, not for herself but that Licinio may not be involved in her fate. She refuses to reveal his name to the Pontifex Maximus, who curses her and orders that she be first divested of the veil and ornaments of her priestly office and then buried alive.

Act III. Giulia's tomb lies open and waiting for her. Licinio inveighs against the cruelty of her impending fate. His friend Cinna begs him not to resort to force but to try to persuade the Pontifex Maximus to clemency. Licinio's efforts to this end meet with a blank refusal, until in despair he declares himself Giulia's fellow transgressor and in a duet denounces the cruelty the Pontifex Maximus dispenses in the name of religion.

In spite of a warning from the Augurer, the Pontifex Maximus will not relent, and Giulia is led in conducted by lictors and surrounded by Vestals, wearing the black veil of her shame. She bids farewell to her companions and to the High Priestess. Her veil is placed on the altar; if the goddess pardons her, then she will cause the veil to burn with sacred fire as a sign of forgiveness. The Vestals pray, the Pontifex Maximus orders Giulia to descend to her tomb and she tenderly bids farewell to her unnamed lover ('Caro oggetto'). Even the precipitate arrival of Licinio cannot change the course of events; Giulia denies that she even knows him, and descends into the tomb. Suddenly the sky darkens, and a shaft of lightning ignites the veil on the altar. Vesta has forgiven, Giulia is released, and the opera ends with choral and balletic rejoicings, dedicated to the glory of Venus. H.

JOHANN STRAUSS

THE YOUNGER

(born 25 October 1825, died 3 June 1899)

DIE FLEDERMAUS

The Bat

Operetta in three acts, text by Haffner and Genée, from a French vaudeville 'Le Réveillon' by Meilhac and Halévy. First performed at the Theater an der Wien, Vienna, 5 April 1874, with Marie Geistinger, Mme Charles Hirsch, Mme Nittingwe, Szika, Rudinger, Lebrecht, Rott, conducted by the composer. First performed in London, Alhambra Theatre, 1876; New York, 1879; Vienna Opera, 1894; Metropolitan Opera, New York, 1905, with Sembrich, Alten, Edyth Walker, Dippel, Reiss. Revived in London at Covent Garden, 1930, with Lotte Lehmann, Schumann, Olszewska, Willi Wörle, Karl Jöken, Hüsch, Habich, conducted by Bruno Walter; Sadler's Wells, 1934, with Joan Cross, Ruth Naylor, Gladys Parr, Tudor Davies, Arthur Cox, Redvers Llewelyn, Percy Heming, conducted by Warwick Braithwaite. Revived at Metropolitan, New York, 1950, with Welitsch, Munsel, Stevens, Svanholm, Tucker, Brownlee, Hugh Thompson, conducted by Eugene Ormandy. A successful film in English, 'O Rosalinde!' (1955–56), starred Michael Redgrave as Eisenstein and Anneliese Rothenberger as Adele, each singing and acting; Ludmilla Tcherina acted Rosalinde while Sari Barabas sang, and Anton Walbrook was Falke.

Gabriel von Eisenstein Tenor
 Rosalinde, his wife Soprano
 Frank, the governor of the prison Baritone
 Prince Orlofsky, a rich Russian Mezzo-Soprano
 Alfred, a singer Tenor
 Dr Falke, a friend of Eisenstein Baritone
 Dr Blind, Eisenstein's attorney Tenor
 Adele, the Eisensteins' maid Soprano
 Frosch, the jailer Speaking Part

Place: A Spa, near a Large City (Vienna)

Time: Late Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Johann Strauss the younger was already famous as a composer of Viennese dance music before he turned his hand to operetta, his first being Indigo (1871), his second Der Karneval in Rom (1873), his third Die Fledermaus. The work as a whole – plot as well as score – is a masterpiece, the finest product of the Viennese operetta school, and a cornucopia of fresh, witty, pointed, memorable melody.

The overture, a potpourri, is one of the most popular ever written. The first three tunes are from the prison scene in the last act, the third being associated with the dénouement. Then comes the famous waltz with its lilting refrain, followed after a short interlude by a mournful tune on the oboe (also in 3/4), with a contrasting section (the tunes associated with Eisenstein's mock-serious farewell before going to prison). The material is repeated, the overture as a whole being dominated by its waltz.

Act I. Eisenstein's house. Outside can be heard the sound of Alfred's voice, as he serenades Rosalinde. He is, it appears, an old flame of hers, and he addresses her fittingly as his dove. Adele, the Eisensteins' maid, makes her entrance on a cadenza and proceeds to read a letter from her sister, Ida. The Ballet, of which Ida is a member, has been invited en bloc that night to a party¹ which is being given by Prince Orlofsky, a rich young Russian eccentric who is Vienna's latest host. If Adele can get hold of a dress, Ida can take her along – the orchestra fairly bubbles with Adele's excitement. But Rosalinde, who has heard Alfred's serenade and suspects who it is, is far too preoccupied to pay much attention to Adele's plea that she be allowed to go and look after her sick aunt. With Eisenstein due that night at the prison for the start of a five-day prison sentence, she cannot possibly think of sparing anybody; he must have a good supper before he leaves. Alfred waits until Adele has gone and then tells Rosalinde he has heard that Eisenstein will be away for a few days; he will call again that evening. Rosalinde is beside herself: as long as he doesn't sing she is all right – but he is a tenor and who could resist the sound of his top A?

Eisenstein storms in with his advocate, Dr Blind, who, says Eisenstein, is to blame for the whole affair of the prison sentence, most of all that he is now being sent down for eight days, not five. There is a lively trio for Rosalinde, Eisenstein, and Blind, in which Rosalinde protests her grief – perhaps a shade too much – Eisenstein rages at Blind, and the lawyer runs through a list of legal expedients he will call into play.

¹ The 1870s saw a period of considerable moral permissiveness, in Vienna as elsewhere, even though the rules of conduct were outwardly strict. 'Pleasure', as represented by escape from the 'rule' and the family, was mainly a masculine preserve, and the dancers at Prince Orlofsky's party show the demi-monde in contact with society, whose pleasure-ground it was and off whom it lived. Masks covered so wide a multitude of sins that some 'respectable' ladies with their help might hope for a little discreet adventure on their own account. It is sometimes forgotten that Fledermaus is Strauss's only opera set virtually in Vienna itself.

The lawyer leaves, Adele, still in tears about her mythical aunt, is sent off to order a delicious supper for the master, and Rosalinde goes to look out some old clothes for him to go to prison in. Enter Dr Falke, a friend of Eisenstein's, who has, we should know, been secretly nursing a grievance against him ever since Carnival. It seems that Falke, dressed as a bat (hence the title), was left asleep by Eisenstein to find his way home in broad daylight and in his unconventional costume. He has a plan, though Eisenstein has not the least suspicion of it, for revenge. Why, he says, should Eisenstein not accept the invitation from Prince Orlofsky which Falke brings him, and go in disguise to the ball, giving himself up to the prison authorities next morning? Rosalinde need never know – nor need Eisenstein guess that Rosalinde is also being asked to the party, at which she will wear a mask. The Bat's revenge is taking shape, and Eisenstein receives the invitation to the strains of the same polka which accompanied Adele's reading of the letter from her sister earlier on. He accepts it with a minimum of shilly-shallying.

Rosalinde is astonished to hear that her husband is going off to prison in style, in evening dress in fact, but she is so preoccupied with the prospect of Alfred's disturbing promise to come back at supper-time that she accepts a flimsy excuse. All is prepared; Rosalinde, Adele (who has, after all, been given the night off, in preparation for Alfred's expected visit), and Eisenstein sing a farewell trio, which is one of the most delicious moments of the score. Rosalinde still grieves in exaggerated fashion in the moderato espressivo, but none of the three can keep long faces for ever, and the refrain to each of Rosalinde's utterances glitters and sparkles as gaily as the parties they each of them enjoy in anticipation. Rosalinde ends with a ringing top C, and Eisenstein bustles off.

Alfred keeps his promise, and Eisenstein is hardly out of the house before his wife's admirer is eating the supper that was originally prepared for him. 'Trinke, Liebchen, trinke schnell', sings the tenor, and Rosalinde joins in the refrain, although she cannot help noticing that her companion is beginning to show the effects of the wine he so melodiously urges her to drink. The drinking song is interrupted by the sound of voices below and Frank, the new prison governor, appears, with the information that he has come to escort Herr von Eisenstein, who is to be his guest for the next eight days, to prison. Alfred ropes him in to sing the chorus of his song, but denies hotly that he is Eisenstein when Frank addresses him by name. The situation looks compromising, but Rosalinde carries it off with impressive bravado: does the governor think she would be at supper as late as this with someone who is not her husband? 'Mein Herr, was dächten Sie von mir?' (What inferences would you draw?) she sings, and reconciles Frank to the delay and Alfred to his probable fate in the enchanting slow waltz refrain to her song. Rosalinde fears the worst – Alfred and her husband will almost certainly meet in prison – but what can she do? A farewell kiss, and Frank, who is also going to Orlofsky's party, hurries Alfred off, a brisk trio bringing the act to its end.

Act II. The party at Prince Orlofsky's is in full swing, and the opening chorus leaves us in no doubt as to its successful nature. Although he is too blasé to enjoy them himself, Prince Orlofsky likes his parties to go well – but woe betide anyone who refuses to drink with him; he will get a bottle thrown at his head. His song, 'Ich lade gern mir Gäste ein', a mixture of languid nonchalance and adolescent gaucherie, is perfect characterisation. With its repeated A flats, it is not exactly the easiest music for a mezzo-soprano to sing, requiring as it does a rich lower register if the refrain (ending with a reiterated 'Chacun à son goût') is to make its full effect.

Eisenstein, who is introduced as Marquis Renard, feels sure that he can recognise in one of the guests his wife's maid, Adele, but Orlofsky and the rest laugh at him for his curious mistake and Adele herself sings a delightful soubrette song, 'Mein Herr Marquis', in whose laughing refrain she is able to make fun of her employer to her heart's content. Apart from the famous waltz, this is possibly the best-known number of the score.

Eisenstein has recognised his maid, although he is persuaded to the contrary, but he does not know his wife when she comes in masked and announced as a Hungarian Countess. She excites his curiosity straight away, and it is not long before he is showing her his chiming watch, a bait which has worked the trick on many an unsuspecting Miss. This time, though all seems to be beginning well and Eisenstein is soon timing his Countess's heart-beats, something goes wrong, and the lady ends up with the watch, which is not at all according to plan. It is a delicious moment, this seduction duet, as anyone who has heard Julius Patzak and Hilde Gueden sing it in the recording of the opera will know, just as those who know this recording and that by Richard Tauber and Vera Schwarz will have a shrewd idea of the contrasting styles of Vienna and Berlin in this kind of music. We hear the watch chime before the singers launch into a gallop, and Rosalinde ends with peals of mocking coloratura.

Rosalinde will not unmask and it is suggested by Adele that the reason for this is that she is not a Hungarian at all. 'I will prove it,' says Rosalinde; 'the music of my native country shall speak for me.' It is a flimsy pretext for the Czardas and Frischka which follows, but once it starts the music is exhilarating enough to make us forget why it began in the first place. If there were no other reason – and there are, in fact, plenty of reasons – this Czardas would make it certain that nobody but a really capable soprano could do justice to the role of Rosalinde. It is not only a display piece of a high order, but it demands something unusual in the way of a dramatic technique. Ernest Newman has written that the Czardas 'shows what depths of expression there were in Strauss had he chosen to explore them more consistently. No genuine Hungarian could sing more movingly of the pain of separation from the beloved homeland, or of the fire in the Hungarian breast that drives them to the dance ...'.

The finale begins. It opens with a short section in praise of champagne, allegro con brio. First Orlofsky, then Adele and finally Eisenstein lead the company, which joins in the chorus after three verses. Eisenstein and Frank (who has been introduced as the Chevalier Chagrin) toast each other, and Falke, looking round at the assembled couples, proposes in a beautiful slow waltz that they shall pledge each other in eternal brother- and sisterhood. Coherent expression seems out of place, and in their efforts to do justice to the toast, they resort to 'Duidu' and 'la, la, la', relapsing before long into silence for the ballet which, with its dancers, has been mentioned all along as one of the attractions of the party. At the end of the ballet, Orlofsky suggests that the professional dancers should have a rest, and that the guests should show that they are no less adept at the waltz themselves. It is the famous Fledermaus waltz, heard first in the overture but now unmistakably staking a claim as rival to 'The Blue Danube'. It takes the foreground for most of the time, but also serves as background for the continued flirtation of Eisenstein and Rosalinde and for much comic byplay between Eisenstein and Governor Frank. Finally, the clock strikes six, Eisenstein remembers it is high time for him to go to prison, and the curtain comes down as he and Frank help each other from the ballroom.

Act III. An entr'acte, part march, part waltz, introduces us to the prison, where Frosch the jailer (a speaking part) has been doing his best to emulate in his own quiet way the grander drinking exploits of Governor Frank; in a word, he is drunk, a situation of which full advantage is taken by the professional comic engaged to play the role. His inebriated gambollings are interrupted from time to time by snatches of song from cell No. 12, where Alfred is relieving the tedium of prison life with reminiscences of his serenade to Rosalinde, and with snatches of tunes from other operas as well, if the truth be known. Frosch staggers off to make another attempt to curb this nuisance, and no sooner has he gone than Frank comes in, only a little less the worse for wear than his underling. He makes his entrance to musical accompaniment, whistles the tune of the ballroom waltz, sings a bit of the champagne song, and soon falls asleep to reminiscences of the waltz.

But his is not to be the sleep of the just, for Frosch has pulled himself together sufficiently to be able to make his morning report in the usual way. Nothing untoward has happened, he says, except that Herr von Eisenstein has been restive and, having asked for a lawyer, is to see Dr Blind almost immediately. The door-bell rings, and Frosch announces the two young ladies who have so taken Frank's fancy at the ball, to wit Adele and her sister. Adele, it is explained, is not yet an artist in fact, only one by nature. Cannot Frank help her to start a stage career? She sings to him of her versatility ('Spiel' ich die Unschuld vom Lande') and says there is nothing she cannot play on the stage, from country wench to Queen – to say nothing of a flirtatious French Marquise. There is another ring at the door, and the Marquis Renard is admitted. When he hears that the Chevalier Chagrin (whom he at first assumes to have been arrested for insobriety) is none other than the prison governor, he laughs aloud at what he thinks is a particularly good jest. Frank for his part cannot take seriously the announcement that his friend from the ball is Herr von Eisenstein; did he not himself escort that gentleman from his home to the prison, and is he not at this moment incarcerated within twenty feet of where they sit?

Frosch announces that another lady is without (the first two have been shown into cell No. 13), and Frank goes to greet her, leaving Eisenstein to waylay Blind and borrow his wig, glasses and legal paraphernalia in the hope that he may discover who was arrested in his place the previous night.

Rosalinde (she it was at the door just now) has come to see what can be done about getting Alfred out of prison, with the help maybe of the lawyer who is waiting for them. Eisenstein comes in in place of Blind and proceeds to cross-question the two with a vigour more becoming to a prosecuting counsel than to someone engaged for the defence, and they begin to wonder why he is so very strict. He demands the unvarnished truth, which he gets from Alfred in an agreeable tune, punctuated by his own frequent bursts of indignation as the story unfolds. After one of them, Rosalinde defends herself as the victim of a husband who is himself a monster of deceitfulness. Eventually, unable to bear the insults any longer – Alfred asks how they can between them throw dust in the husband's eyes – Eisenstein rises in fury and denounces (to the tune which opens the overture) what he describes as their treachery, whereupon she produces the watch.

The explanation is not long in forthcoming. No sooner is the rather grandiose trio between Rosalinde, Eisenstein and Alfred over, than the rest of the company at last night's ball appears as if summoned by magic, all that is to say apart from Adele and her sister – and news of them is quickly forthcoming when Frosch complains to Frank that the two ladies in No. 13 are proving obstructive and have refused to let him give them their regulation bath! Falke explains that Eisenstein's predicament is of his engineering, is in fact his vengeance for the shabby trick played on him a year ago. Alfred and Rosalinde are quick to take advantage of the situation and add that their supper was also an invention designed as part of the joke. Eisenstein is delighted at the way things have turned out, and Rosalinde sings the only possible moral: let all join with her in praising the sovereign reconciling power of King Champagne! H.

EINE NACHT IN VENEDIG

A Night in Venice

Operetta in three acts, libretto by F. Zell and Richard Genée. Première, Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtische Theater, Berlin, 3 October 1883. First produced in Vienna at Theater an der Wien a week later; New York, 1884. Revived Berlin, 1925, with Richard Tauber, conductor Korngold; Vienna, 1948, with Esther Réthy, Helge Roswaenge, Kunz, Fritz Krenn, conductor Paulik; Komische Oper, Berlin, 1954, with new libretto by Walter Felsenstein, who produced; London, English National Opera, 1976 (arrangement by Murray Dickie and Anton Paulik), with Valerie Masterson.

The Duke of Urbino Tenor
Caramello, a barber Tenor (or Baritone)
Delacqua, a senator Baritone
Barbara, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
Barbaruccio, a senator Baritone
Pappacoda, a cook Tenor (or Baritone)
Annina, a young fish-seller Soprano
Ciboletta, Barbara's maid Soprano
Agricola Mezzo-Soprano
Enrico Piselli Speaking Part
Senators, Senators' Wives, Fishermen, Gondoliers

Place: Venice

Time: Late Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours

The first night in Berlin appears to have been a fiasco, mainly because of the libretto. Revision (as with so many operettas) was embarked on almost immediately, to considerable effect, and the operetta has proved – often in a 'new version' – one of the most successful from Strauss's pen.

The overture is a bright compilation of tunes from the opera, in which waltzes play their accustomed part – this is eighteenth-century Venice observed through the eyes and ears of late nineteenth-century Vienna. The famous 'Lagunenwalzer' is a particularly delectable component.

Act I. A crowd of Venetians are rejoicing in the splendour of their city, when Pappacoda congratulates them in a song on having acquired what they have hitherto lacked, a real maker of macaroni – from Naples of course. Young Enrico Piselli, nephew of Senator Delacqua and admirer of the Senator's young wife Barbara, finds in Pappacoda a convenient messenger for the note he means to send to Barbara telling her he will meet her that night.

Along comes Ciboletta, Pappacoda's own sweetheart and Barbara's maid, to engage Pappacoda in a duet that is bright enough in spite of Ciboletta's insistence that the duplicity of men will always defeat their urge towards straight dealing.

Enter Annina, crying her wares to a delicious slow waltz: 'Frutta di mare'. Annina has a suitor, Caramello, who works for the Duke of Urbino as barber and general factotum, and Pappacoda loses no time in teasing her about him. The beautiful Barbara Delacqua now appears, and Pappacoda delivers the message from Enrico.

It is the turn of the older generation, and on to the scene come Delacqua himself and another senator, Barbaruccio, discussing the carnival festivities and the invitation to a masked ball which the Duke has as usual extended to them and their wives. Delacqua is concerned to gain the vacant position of steward to the Duke. Unfortunately, the Duke is a well-known libertine, and Delacqua has thought it prudent to send Barbara by gondola on a visit to the island of Murano.

Now appears Caramello, who hears from Pappacoda of Delacqua's plot to have Barbara safely out of harm's way at carnival time. He immediately decides that he himself will take the gondolier's place and convey her to the palace of the Duke who, he knows, was captivated by her beauty during last year's carnival. Barbara for her part has been told that she is to spend a little time at Murano, but, anxious not to miss her rendezvous with Enrico, she hastily arranges for Annina to take her place in the gondola.

In a brilliant duet with Caramello, Annina keeps him at arm's length and compares him to the migratory swallow, which by its very nature denies constancy – 'Pellegrina rondinella'. Not everyone is so lighthearted; Ciboletta is in tears because Pappacoda has no money to take her dancing. The problem is solved by Caramello handing out invitations to his master's masked ball and all is happiness again – the four lovers rejoice in a quartet at the prospect of the dance, although Ciboletta feels the need to make it clear that dancing is what she is going for and nothing else.

At last it is the turn of the Duke to appear from his gondola and apostrophise his favourite city: 'Sei mir gegrüsst, du holdes Venezia'.¹ When he encounters the senators, they tell him that unfortunately their wives cannot accept his kind invitation to the dance. Caramello whispers to the Duke that it is all a plot to keep the fair Barbara from him but that he, Caramello, is taking care of the whole problem. Delacqua thinks that the coveted stewardship may be brought a little nearer if he can somehow dangle Barbara in front of the Duke's nose, and he therefore sets about procuring someone to take her place in his scheme. He bids a fond farewell to his wife and a typically operetta intrigue is under way. Caramello loses no time in confiding to the Duke that he has arranged to identify himself to Barbara by a particular song. From now on almost nobody will ever again appear as him- or herself.

The Duke's song breathes the very spirit of joyful anticipation, and it is wholly appropriate in the circumstances that, as he sings it, his voice should be joined by those of Annina, Ciboletta, Barbara, and Pappacoda. It is not long before the voice of Caramello (or it could be that of the Duke himself) can be heard singing the pre-arranged gondolier's song ('Komm' in die Gondel'), a richly swaying waltz. Annina waves to Delacqua, who smiles as he sees (as he thinks) his wife off to Murano. Delacqua's attention is attracted to a party of serenaders, who greet him in terms of exaggerated praise: 'O Delacqua, qua, qua, qua, qua'. It is typical of Strauss's prodigal tunefulness that it is not easy to decide whether the mock serenade to the old cuckold or the romantic serenade of the mock gondolier is the more attractive! The ruse is entirely successful and the 'Ho-a-ho' of the gondolier's song is heard from the distance as the act comes to an end.

Act II. The entr'acte is a reprise of the gondolier's song and the curtain rises on the ballroom of the Duke's palace. Agricola leads the ladies in greeting the Duke, who wants to pursue his latest adventure, with the beautiful Barbara. Annina seems delighted at the predicament her substitution has led her into ('Was mir der Zufall gab')² and nothing Caramello can say (duet, 'Hör mich, Annina') will divert her from her intention of extracting as much enjoyment as she can from the situation. The Duke pursues his advantage with reminders of what she said to him last year.

¹ Imported by Erich Wolfgang Korngold, for his successful 1923 edition of the operetta, from Johann Strauss's Simplizius (1887).

² With new words ('Treu sein das liegt mir nicht') transferred in Korngold's edition to the Duke and frequently recorded with the new text by German tenors.

The complications are by no means over. Pappacoda cannot find Ciboletta and is beside himself with worry. His friends from all over the town are on the other hand delighted with the party that the invitations passed out by Caramello have brought them to.¹ Now Delacqua introduces his 'wife', and the Duke, for all that Annina points out that it is Ciboletta in disguise, greets her with studied elegance. Here a snag ensues, because Delacqua's drilling of Ciboletta hopelessly misfires, and instead of asking the Duke for the position of steward for her husband, she begs him, with Pappacoda in mind, for that of chief cook! The Duke now takes Annina and Ciboletta to supper and pays compliments quite indiscriminately to each, much to the dismay of Caramello and Pappacoda, who are waiting at table. The announcement that, at midnight, by custom all must repair to the Piazza San Marco, precipitates a lively end to the act.

Act III. The Piazza San Marco. As the opening chorus proclaims, the carnival spirit is still very much in evidence and the pigeons are extolled as symbols of love. But while it is given to some to enjoy the fun, others are inevitably roused to jealousy, though few give vent to their feelings in music of such hypnotically melodious a cast as does Caramello when he sees Annina on the Duke's arm: 'Ach, wie so herrlich zu schau'n' he sings to the music of the Lagunenwalzer, and only the refrain (purely verbal!) of 'La donna è mobile' suggests the feeling he says he has.

It is time for the general disentanglement. From Ciboletta, Delacqua finds out that Barbara is by no means on Murano as he had thought. Pappacoda is easily consoled for anything he may have suffered when Ciboletta gives him the news of his appointment as the Duke's chef, and he celebrates in a brisk little song in which, rather generously, he lets Ciboletta join. Ciboletta tells the Duke that what he thought was Barbara was Annina all the time, but he takes the news with aristocratic equanimity. To Delacqua's extreme gratification, Barbara explains that she took the wrong gondola and Enrico was kind enough to look after her. To Caramello's delight, he is made the Duke's steward – and, no doubt to the Duke's, his intended wife Annina will never be far away. All ends with suitable carnival rejoicing. H.

DER ZIGEUNERBARON

The Gipsy Baron

Operetta in three acts, text by Ignatz Schnitzer, adapted from Jókai Mór's story Saffi. First performed at the Theater an der Wien, Vienna, 24 October 1885; at the Staatsoper, Vienna, 1910; New York, 1886; London, Rudolf Steiner Theatre, 1935 (amateur production). Revived, New York City Center, 1944; Volksoper, Vienna, 1948, with Esther Réthy, Laszlo Szemere, Walter Höfermayer, Alfred Jerger, conducted by Anton Paulik; Metropolitan, 1959, with Della Casa, Gedda, conductor Leinsdorf; Sadler's Wells, 1964, with June Bronhill, Nigel Douglas, conductor Vilem Tausky.

Graf Peter HomonayBaritone
 Conte CarneroBaritone
 Sandor BarinkayTenor
 Kalman Zsupan, a pig-farmer.....Baritone
 Arsena, his daughter.....Soprano
 Mirabella, *her governess*Contralto
 OttokarTenor
 Czipra, *a gipsy leader*Mezzo-Soprano
 Saffi, *her foster-daughter*Soprano
 Pali, a gipsy.....Bass

Place: Hungary

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

One of the most successful of Johann Strauss's works, Der Zigeunerbaron may be thought of as nearer in style to folk opera than operetta. Its place at the heart of the repertory of the Volksoper in Vienna has nonetheless never been in doubt.

Act I. The overture, as is Strauss's custom, is based on tunes from the opera. The scene is the edge of a village, where stands a deserted and partly ruined castle and a small peasant house. Nearby is a gipsy's hut. Rustic noises in the orchestra introduce a lazy, typically Straussian tune in 6/8 rhythm which is sung by the chorus. Ottokar, a young peasant, comes in vigorously cursing his continued lack of success in finding the treasure which is supposed to be hidden in the castle. Czipra, an old gipsy woman, mocks him for his love of Arsena, daughter of the rich pig-farmer, Zsupan, who lives nearby.

On to the scene comes a little group, headed by Sandor Barinkay, to whom by rightful inheritance belongs the castle; he is about to get it back with the help of Conte Carnero, Commissioner of Morals, who accompanies him. Barinkay gives a vivid account of his experiences in a song ('Als flotter Geist') which has a swinging waltz refrain in which the chorus joins and which is familiar to anyone who has ever seen a Strauss film. Carnero wants witnesses for the official reinstatement, but Czipra, pressed into service, says she cannot write and proceeds to read the hands of Barinkay and Carnero. Barinkay will find both happiness and fortune through a faithful wife, who will tell him through a dream how he can discover hidden treasure. Carnero too will find a treasure, now much increased in size, which he had thought lost years before. This mystifies the Commissioner, who cannot remember any such loss.

¹ Here for many years has been introduced a Schwipslied (or Topsy Song) for Annina. The conductor Anton Paulik chose the Annen-Polka for a revival for Esther Réthy, and woe betide the Annina who now omits it!

Zsupan is to be the other witness, and he appears, explaining in the thickest of country accents and the most comical of tunes ('Ja, das Schreiben und das Lesen') that reading and writing have never come his way; he is content with his pigs and their products. When he hears that Barinkay is to be his neighbour, he warns him to expect some litigation in the matter of property; Barinkay suggests that a match with Zsupan's daughter would prevent any such unpleasantness, and Zsupan calls his daughter from the house. It is not Arsena who answers his summons but Mirabella, her governess, who turns out to be no other than Carnero's long-lost wife (Schatz = darling, as well as treasure). She explains in a song that she had thought him lost these twenty-four years. Czipra's first prophecy is fulfilled.

Arsena eventually makes her appearance, veiled and by no means overjoyed at the prospect of another suitor, as she makes quite clear in a charming song. In spite of Barinkay's graceful proposal of marriage, in spite of the charm of her song, Arsena has fully made up her mind not to marry Barinkay, for the very good reason that she already has a lover; she says she requires a noble suitor and warns Barinkay not to sing his wings moth-like at the candle flame.

Barinkay is left alone, disconsolate at his failure. He overhears Saffi, Czipra's daughter, sing a gypsy song in praise of the loyalty the gypsy prides himself on showing to his friend ('So elend und so treu'); it ends with an impassioned allegretto. Barinkay is not slow to accept the invitation of the beautiful gypsy girl and her mother and joins them for supper.

It turns out to be Ottokar with whom Arsena is in love, and their after-dark flirtation is observed and overheard by Barinkay, Saffi, and Czipra, the former swearing to be revenged on Arsena for her cavalier treatment of him. The gipsies can be heard in the distance singing the song Saffi has already made known to us, and when they appear Czipra tells them that Barinkay is the true owner of the castle. They make him their chief, and he loses no time in knocking on Zsupan's door and telling him that he now has the title on which Arsena insisted: he is a Gypsy Baron. 'Er ist Baron' sings the ensemble, and Saffi welcomes him to the land of his childhood in a tune already familiar from the overture. Zsupan starts to tell Barinkay he is not the right sort of Baron, but Barinkay makes it quite clear that his ideas have changed; he does not want to marry Arsena, but Saffi! Zsupan is furious, but all join in the big tune of the overture which comes as it were as the coda of the finale.

Act II. The entr'acte, consisting of the tune of the opening chorus of Act I, introduces the dawn. Barinkay has spent the night in the ruins of the castle, with Czipra and Saffi, and the three greet the day in a trio ('Mein Aug' bewacht') which ends in something more like a love duet for the two young people. Czipra tells of a dream she has had in which she found the treasure which legend has always associated with the castle; Barinkay laughs at the idea, but agrees to look where she directs – what's the harm? Czipra and Saffi have a little tune in which they mock his scepticism, and all three join in the rapturous treasure waltz ('Ha, seht es winkt') when they uncover the treasure itself – one of Strauss's most charming inspirations.

The gipsies arrive to start work at their forge. They sing as they come, and the skit on the anvil chorus from Trovatore is unmistakable. Zsupan appears with the object of getting help for a wagon which has stuck in the mud, but he insults the gipsies who get their own back by stealing his money and his watch. His cries of fury bring Carnero, Mirabella, Ottokar, and Arsena on to the scene, and they are followed by Barinkay and Saffi. Barinkay is by now dressed as a Gypsy Baron and he greets them with the information that he and Saffi are man and wife. Carnero starts to ask certain questions about the legal side of the affair, and Saffi and Barinkay answer him in a duet which has become the most famous number of the opera: 'Wer uns getraut?' (Who married us?). The birds have performed the ceremony and acted as witness, says Barinkay, and he joins Saffi in the slow refrain.

This is too much for Carnero, who leads Mirabella and Zsupan in a comic ode to morality, the so-called 'Sittencommissions Couplets'.

There is a diversion when Ottokar finds a few pieces of gold and thinks he is on the track of the treasure at last, but Barinkay disillusiones him, and the next moment the stage is full of a recruiting party, headed by Barinkay's old friend, Graf Peter Homonay. Led by Homonay, they sing a recruiting song and follow it up with a stirring Czardas. Homonay refuses to be shocked at Barinkay and Saffi and in spite of the protestations of Carnero congratulates them on the match.

During the course of the finale, Czipra makes it known that Saffi is not really her daughter but a princess whom she has brought up, and who is descended from the last Pasha of Hungary – she even has documentary proof. 'Ein Fürstenkind', sings the whole company to the music of a gallop, and Saffi joins in with a couple of top Cs. Barinkay alone cannot play his part in the rejoicing: Saffi is now unapproachably above him, and he will join Ottokar and Zsupan, who have been impressed as soldiers, and go off to the wars. His regret is touchingly shown, but the act ends with the 'Werberlied' repeated by the whole company.

Act III. The entr'acte makes use of the treasure waltz, and the scene is laid in Vienna, where all are assembled to welcome the victorious army, among which are Barinkay, Ottokar, and Zsupan. Arsena sings a little song about the incompatibility of courtship and propriety, but the group is soon joined by the returning heroes. Zsupan sings to them of his exploits, which are hardly of the most military nature but which seem to have been entirely successful. Again, this is an opportunity for the comedian. In the finale, all difficulties are resolved, Arsena flies into Ottokar's arms, and Saffi appears from nowhere to greet Barinkay, who leads the full company in a final statement of the waltz refrain of his opening song.

H.

WIENER BLUT

The Viennese Spirit

Operetta in three acts, libretto by Victor Léon and Leo Stein. Première, Carl Theater, Vienna, 26 October 1899 (a failure); revived with great success at Theater an der Wien, Vienna, 1905.

Prince Ypsheim-Gindelbach,
Prime Minister of Reuss-Schleiz-Greiz..... Baritone Balduin, Graf Zedlau, Ambassador of Reuss-Schleiz-Greiz to Vienna..... Tenor
 Gabriele, Gräfin Zedlau, his wife..... Soprano
 Graf Bitowski Acted
 Demoiselle Franziska Cagliari, a Viennese dancer,
Zedlau's mistress..... Soprano
 Kagler, her father, a circus manager..... Buffo
Diplomats
 Marquis de la Fassade Acted
 Lord Percy Acted
 Príncipe de Lugando Acted
 Pepi Pleininger, a mannequin..... Soprano
 Josef, Graf Zedlau's valet..... Baritone
 Anna, Demoiselle Cagliari's maid..... Acted

Place: Vienna

Time: The Congress of Vienna, 1814–15

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

The project for a new operetta, with music from various earlier works of Strauss's, and to a libretto of the time of the Congress of Vienna by Léon and Stein (who six years later wrote The Merry Widow), was handed over by Strauss himself before his death to Adolf Müller, a leading Viennese theatrical conductor. The result is a compilation, not a newly minted work, but it has, unlike most of Strauss's operettas, a first-rate book, much enchanting music and it is no accident that it should have obtained a popularity after Strauss's death won by only a few of his own original stage works.

Act I. The scene is the villa of Count Zedlau, Ambassador to Vienna of Reuss-Schleiz-Greiz, a small (and mythical) state whose Prime Minister is also in Vienna for the Congress. At the villa, where Count Zedlau whiles away the time with the dancer Franziska Cagliari, the intrigue is introduced by Josef, the Count's valet, who has secret papers for his master's perusal but who can't find him anywhere. Josef's urgent calls for Anna, the maid, produce instead Franzi, who is also anxious to know where the Count is; after all he has been away for five whole days. Her father, Kagler, a richly comic figure of impeccably Viennese background, now calls at the villa to make sure that his daughter is to perform that night at the ball at Count Bitowski's house. He disappears when Count Zedlau is announced.

At first, Franzi is a little cool; hasn't the Count been with another woman? Only with his wife, for appearance's sake, he replies to a caressing waltz tune that would melt harder hearts than Franzi's. When Franzi has gone, the Count tells the faithful Josef that he and the Countess were seen together by the Prime Minister, who appears to have taken her for his mistress, not his wife. Anyhow, he (the Count) has discovered a most attractive mannequin, with whom he wants to arrange a rendezvous as soon as possible. Why not the fête at Hietzing that very evening, suggests Josef, and the Count insists, in a charming duet, that Josef should write her the letter making an assignation ('O komm, zum Stelldichein').

When the Count has gone, there enters Josef's girlfriend, Pepi, the model – it is she, of course, for whom the Count has fallen and to whom Josef has just unsuspectingly written the letter. She is going to Hietzing that night, but unfortunately Josef cannot take her as he will be on duty – their Polka duet ('Leichter Blut') is suitably fetching. Pepi has come about the dress Franzi is to wear at Count Bitowski's party, and she finishes her business just as the Prime Minister arrives to see his ambassador. Josef tries to gain time by saying that neither the Count nor the Countess is at home, but Kagler, who chooses this moment to reappear and thinks the reference is to his daughter, contradicts him roundly. When therefore Franzi comes in a moment later (finale), it is hardly surprising that the Prime Minister thinks she is Countess Zedlau, and starts to sympathise with her husband's wayward behaviour. Nothing Franzi can say makes him understand the true situation, but when she goes out in a huff, he laments the faux pas he seems obviously to have made.

It is the moment for a new complication, and the real Countess makes her entrance; to the charming tune of 'Morgenblätter' she greets the room she knows so well. When the Prime Minister returns, he takes the Countess for the Count's mistress and seizes the opportunity of upbraiding the Count for his lack of taste in bringing his mistress to the villa. Appropriately Franzi comes in, and the Count is faced with his wife and his mistress each asking 'Who is the lady?', and with his Prime Minister mistaking the one for the other and treating each – as he thinks – appropriately. The Count has a brainwave: to save the situation, will the Prime Minister help him by introducing 'the lady' as his wife? No sooner said than done; unfortunately the Prime Minister chooses the wrong lady, and it is the Countess whom he presents to Franzi as his wife. The ensemble ends with doubts distinctly unresolved.

Act II. Count Bitowski's ball starts with a Polonaise sung by the guests, but soon Count and Countess Zedlau are discussing their marriage, which went wrong, they agree, because of his lack in its early stages of the Viennese spirit – at the words 'Wiener Blut' there is the obvious musical reference. Now, he agrees in a song, he seems to have substituted the attitude of a Viennese Don Juan for the serious temperament natural to Reuss-Schleiz-Greiz. The Count is in danger of falling in love again with his own wife and is only mildly disconcerted when Franzi tells him she thinks the woman the Prime Minister introduced as his wife was in fact a mistress of the Count's. Suddenly, however, he sees Pepi in the crowd and takes the chance of slipping the note of assignation into her hand; to a reprise of the waltz tune, she reads it, recognises the writing as Josef's and takes it as having come from him. When Josef appears, seeming preoccupied with his duties, he consoles her in a languorous tune and explains that he cannot take her to Hietzing. She is at first vexed with him, but later realises that the note must have been from the Count. The invitation is one she feels she can under the circumstances accept.

The comedy of mistaken identity becomes rapidly more intricate. First, pointing to the Countess, the Prime Minister warns Kagler (the father, as he thinks, of the Countess) that his daughter has a rival. Next, the Countess, seeing her husband confirming the rendezvous with Pepi, assumes that Pepi is his mistress Franzi, of whom she has heard. When the Countess asks her husband to take her that night to Hietzing, he refuses on the grounds that he has business with the Prime Minister, repeating the excuse to Franzi when she makes a similar request. The Prime Minister tells Franzi that he will prevent the Count taking his mistress (in reality the Countess) to Hietzing, but, as the finale begins, is persuaded by the Countess (whom he still thinks is the mistress) to take her there himself.

A further twist: when Franzi and the Countess meet, the Prime Minister introduces them as each other. They burst out laughing and the Countess indicates Pepi, who she thinks is Franzi. Pepi will have none of it, and points to Franzi. When Josef is appealed to, he over-simplifies matters by denying that any of the three is the real Franzi. The Count laughs the whole matter off and leads the company in praise of the Viennese waltz. This finale contains sections from both 'Wine, Women and Song' and 'The Blue Danube', as well as 'Wiener Blut'.

Act III. The fête at Hietzing. Three couples have arranged rendezvous: the Countess and the Prime Minister, Franzi and Josef, the Count and Pepi, and their individual duos, interrupted by the popping of three champagne corks, become a sextet when the Count from his arbour leads a drinking song ('Wine, Women and Song'). One after the other emerges from seclusion – the Prime Minister unfortunately falls asleep – and discovers one or more of the complications around them. In the end everyone knows who everyone else is, the Count vouches for Pepi's innocence, and the motto is supplied when the Prime Minister gives it as his opinion that it is all due to – 'Wiener Blut!' H.

RICHARD STRAUSS

(born 11 June 1864, died 8 September 1949)

Strauss grew up immersed in music and opera, since his father, Franz, was principal horn in the Munich Court Orchestra. Richard Strauss made his name as a composer with a series of spectacular tone-poems, but in his first two operas he wrestled with the ghost of 'Richard I', Richard Wagner, his Munich predecessor in so many ways. Salome, his third opera, was his first completely successful work for the stage. Hugo von Hofmannsthal wrote the libretto for Elektra, and so began one of the most successful partnerships in operatic history. For all its apparent daring, Strauss's music owes its allegiance to the first Viennese school. With Hofmannsthal he found the ideal collaborator, one who looked back to the past and explored new ground as well. Der Rosenkavalier fulfilled his aim of writing 'a Mozart opera', a twentieth-century reinvention of Le nozze di Figaro. Later, they tackled Die Zauberflöte in Die Frau ohne Schatten and, in their last collaboration, they revisited Johann Strauss's territory in Arabella. They were also inspired by Molière (Ariadne auf Naxos) and continued to find their sources in classical myth (Aegyptische Helena). Strauss himself wrote the text for one of his most radical works, Intermezzo, based on his marriage to the soprano Pauline de Ahna. After Hofmannsthal died, Strauss worked with several different writers: he returned to the 'safe' territory of myth in Daphne and Die Liebe der Danae. Less successful were Stefan Zweig's libretto for Die schweigsame Frau, based on Ben Jonson, and Joseph Gregor's realisation of Zweig's synopsis for Friedenstag. Richard Strauss's last work, Capriccio, aptly celebrates opera itself, as it explores the triangular relationship formed by words, poetry and a soprano. P.

GUNTRAM

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer, inspired by Alexander Ritter. First performance at the Grossherzogliches Hoftheater, Weimar, 10 May 1894, with Heinrich Zeller as Guntram, Pauline de Ahna (then the composer's fiancée) as Freihild, Karl Bucha as the Old Duke, Franz Schwarz as Duke Robert, conducted by the composer. Presented in Munich, unsuccessfully, 1895. Staged 'with enormous cuts' in Frankfurt, 1900, Prague, 1910.¹ Berlin Radio broadcast 'a concert performance with extensive cuts' for Strauss's seventieth birthday in 1934, conducted by Hans Rosbaud. Strauss himself cut it by forty-five minutes for a revival at the Nationaltheater, Weimar, in 1940, conducted by Paul Sixt. This version of Guntram has since prevailed. Staged by the Berlin Staatsoper, 1942, conducted by Robert Heger. U.S. première, Carnegie Hall, New York, 19 January 1983, with ¹Richard Strauss, Erinnerungen an die ersten Aufführungen meiner Opern.

Reiner Goldberg as Guntram, conducted by Eve Queler. B.B.C. broadcast, 1981, with William Lewis as Guntram, Carole Farley as Freihild, Patrick Wheatley as the Old Duke, Terence Sharpe as Duke Robert, conducted by John Pritchard; Munich Festival, in concert, 1988.

| | |
|---|----------------|
| The Old Duke | Bass |
| Freihild, his daughter | Soprano |
| Duke Robert, her husband | Baritone |
| Singers, members of the league of 'Love's Champions' | |
| Guntram | Tenor |
| Friedhold | Bass |
| The Duke's Jester | Tenor |
| Poor people | |
| An Old Woman | Alto |
| An Old Man | Tenor |
| Two Younger Men | Basses |
| Three Vassals | Basses |
| A Messenger | Baritone |
| Four Minnesingers | Tenors, Basses |
| Vassals, Minnesingers, Monks, Servants, Vagrants | |

Place: Germany

Time: Mid-Thirteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes (revised version: 2 hours 30 minutes)

The story came from Alexander Ritter, the composer and violinist, who was married to Wagner's niece Franziska. He introduced Strauss to Wagner's music and philosophy and directed his attention to an article in the Viennese Neue Freie Presse which referred to 'secret, artistic-cum-religious orders, which were founded in Austria to combat the wordiness of Minnesang'.¹ This rang a bell for those who subscribed to Bayreuth's self-righteous cult. After working as assistant to Hermann Levi on Parsifal at Bayreuth in the summer of 1889 Strauss conducted Lohengrin in Weimar. The Lohengrin later created the title role in Guntram and the Telramund, Duke Robert. In terms of his name, Guntram = Gunther + Wolfram; in terms of the story, Guntram is at once Tannhäuser (as minstrel); Lohengrin, in that he saves Freihild/Elsa from suicide; and also Parsifal, as a 'compassionate fool' (the Old Duke's description, cut in 1940). Strauss's music also refers to many other operas by Wagner.

But Guntram is not merely, passively 'Wagnerian', like, say, Chabrier's Gwendoline. The opera comments on the phenomenon, as Parsifal rehearses and improves on Christianity and The Magic Flute rescinds Freemasonry.

Strauss's first draft of the libretto ended with Guntram repentant, about to seek atonement in a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. While on holiday in Athens, he rewrote it, probably under the joint influence of Nietzsche and Dostoevsky²: Guntram now leaves the league and resolves to live by his own judgement. This action represents the new Parsifal's heroic act of self-definition: as a senior member of the league, Friedhold stands for Gurnemanz and, behind him, Wagner and/or Bayreuth. The story ends with Strauss putting Wagnerism behind him, in theory at least. This is clearer in the opera's first version, when Parsifal told Freihild that it was 'Vain folly to preach redemption, if one is oneself unredeemed!' Ritter understood perfectly what this ending meant, told Strauss he had ruined his work, that its tendency was 'now eminently immoral', that he should burn it and for his 'inner purgation read a chapter from the Gospels or from Schopenhauer's Ethics or Wagner's Religion and Art'.³ Strauss dedicated Guntram to 'My beloved parents' but wrote at the end of the score, 'Thanks be to God and to St Wagner'.

[Note: the passages in square brackets cover important details omitted in 1940 from the 1894 edition.] Duke Robert, the tyrannical ruler of a German state, has recently put down a revolution by his starving people.

Act I follows a Prelude.⁴ A woodland glade by a lake, one morning in spring. Guntram gives his food to some refugees, who have fled from Duke Robert's tyranny; now, even the Duke's wife, Freihild, has been forbidden to help them. Friedhold reminds Guntram that he must do his duty as a member of the league of Love's Champions and then leaves him. Guntram wonders whether he has now reached his destination. An Old Woman curses the Duke, while the Old Man blesses Guntram, who accepts his divine mission: he resolves to intercede with Duke Robert, to use his art, his singing, to restore peace and love.

¹ Richard Strauss's words to Arthur Seidl, quoted in Willi Schuh, Richard Strauss: a chronicle of the early years 1864-1898, transl. Mary Whittall, Cambridge, 1982.

² Strauss first thought of calling his first opera Schuld und Sühne ('Crime and Atonement', Crime and Punishment in German).

³ Letter of 17 January 1893, quoted in Willi Schuh, op. cit.

⁴ The preludes to both Act I and Act II are on the scale of Strauss's tone-poems and may have been intended to have an independent life.

A woman rushes in, intending to drown herself in the lake. Guntram will not let her. [She assumes he is merely one of the Minnesingers, the minstrels, for whom she has little respect.] When her father the Old Duke is heard calling for her, Guntram learns that she is Freihild.

The Old Duke is delighted to find his daughter and asks Guntram to name his reward for rescuing her. Duke Robert appears, using his riding crop to drive the refugees in front of him. Guntram asks for mercy on their behalf. Unwillingly, Duke Robert grants his request, but his jealousy is aroused by Freihild's interest in this minstrel. Everyone sets off for the court, where a feast will mark Freihild's return.

Act II. In the court. Following the Prelude, 'Victory Celebrations at the Duke's Court', four Minnesingers praise Duke Robert obsequiously, ignoring the Fool's sarcastic comments. Inspired by Freihild, Guntram sings in praise of peace and freedom ('Friedens Erzählung'). Everyone except Duke Robert is moved. Guntram then sings of war and destruction. News arrives that the rebels have risen again. Some of the vassals murmur against Duke Robert. When Guntram denounces him explicitly as the enemy of peace, the Duke draws his sword, Guntram defends himself and kills Robert. Everyone is appalled. The Old Duke challenges the vassals to kill him as well. Guntram is so shocked that he can say and do nothing. He is arrested and imprisoned, before the Old Duke goes to lead a new campaign against the rebels. Freihild realises that she is free now and that she loves Guntram. [She persuades the Fool to help him escape. Even though he knows he will not see her again, he agrees to drug the jailers and take Freihild to Guntram's cell.]

Act III. In the dungeon, under the chapel. Monks can be heard chanting above, as they watch over the corpse of Duke Robert. Guntram, haunted by remorse, seems to see the Duke's ghost. When Freihild comes, she confesses the love that Guntram's song aroused in her and urges him to flee with her. He is so confused that he faints, but recovers, to hear her insist that he was motivated entirely by love for her. His ecstasy gives way to anguish and then to certainty: he must leave her. Friedhold appears and tells him he has sinned; Guntram must now answer to the league of Love's Champions for having broken their law of non-violence. But Guntram no longer feels subject to the league; he heeds only his own judgement. Insisting that his crime was not murdering the Duke, but the fact that he was motivated by love for Freihild, Guntram punishes himself by renouncing her forever. Meanwhile he urges her to undertake a new, benevolent role in leading society and asks her for her blessing. [The Fool enters with the news that the Old Duke has been killed: Freihild is the new ruler. Guntram bids her assume the office for the sake of the poor and suffering.] She kneels in silence and kisses his hand; he bids her farewell and leaves, alone.

'No doubt', Ernest Newman wrote in 1908, 'its Wagnerian tinge is one of the causes of the failure of Guntram to keep the stage; the world is growing a little weary of all these good but rather tiresome people who are continually renouncing, or being redeemed, or insisting on redeeming someone else; it finds it a little hard to bear even in Wagner, and will not stand much of it from any other musician.' He went on, however, 'Guntram is a remarkable piece of work... curiously enough, in spite of the occasional Wagnerism of the music, the style throughout gives one the impression of being personal to Strauss... Some depth of thought and very considerable depth of feeling have gone to the making of the work.'

Strauss certainly felt warmly towards it; he claimed it had been 'dogged by misfortune from the beginning' and erected a tombstone to its memory in the garden of his Garmisch villa. Its epitaph recorded that 'the honourable and virtuous youth Guntram... had been cruelly stricken down by the symphonic orchestra of his own father'. Such terms reinforce the work's association with a son who must leave his father's home (literally, Munich; metaphorically, Wagnerism) in order to establish his own identity. In 1945 Strauss told Joseph Gregor that 'the text is no masterpiece... but it provided the 'prentice Wagnerian, sloughing his skin in the process of gaining independence, with the opportunity to write a great deal of fresh, tuneful, sappy music'.

If Bayreuth were run on rational lines, Guntram would be staged there, where the covered pit would suit the work ideally, as Strauss knew, and the ambience would make its own point.

FEUERSNOT

The Need for Fire

Singgedicht ('poem for singing') in one act, libretto by Ernst von Wolzogen, based on J. Ketel's report 'Das erloschene Feuer zu Audenaerde' (Oudenaerde's extinguished fire) in the Oudenaarde Gazette, Leipzig, 1843. First performance 21 November 1901 at the Hofoper, Dresden, with Anny Krull as Diemut, Karl Scheidemantel as Kunrad, conducted by Ernst von Schuch. First U.K. performance, His Majesty's Theatre, London, 1910, conducted by Thomas Beecham, with Maude Fay and Mark Oster. First U.S. performance, Philadelphia, 1927. Strauss himself conducted a revival in 1902 in Berlin, starring Emmy Destinn, and another in 1905 in Munich. Revived at la Scala, Milan, 1912, conducted by Tullio Serafin, and by the Munich Festival in 1980 with Sabine Hass and Siegmund Nimsgern, conducted by Gustav Kuhn.

Schweiker von Gundelfingen,
the bailiff.....Low Tenor¹

Ortolf Sentlinger, the mayor.....Low Bass

Diemut, his daughter.....High Soprano

Her friends

ElsbethMezzo-Soprano

WigelisLow Contralto

MargretHigh Soprano

Kunrad, the alchemist²High Baritone

Jorg Poschel, the Leitgeb.....Low Bass

Hämerlein, the haberdasher.....Baritone

Kofel, the *blacksmith*Bass

Kunz Gilgenstock, the *baker and brewer*Bass

Ortlieb Tulbeck, the *cooper*High Tenor

Ursula, his wifeContralto

Ruger Asbeck, the *potter*Tenor

Walpurg, his wifeHigh Soprano

Citizens, Women, Children, Retainers

Place: Munich

Time: Legendary (Twelfth Century), Midsummer Eve

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

Discouraged by Guntram's failure, particularly in Munich, Strauss did not write for the theatre for six years. But the new direction forecast in Guntram's last scene is evident in the tone-poems Till Eulenspiegel and Tod und Verklärung. Feuersnot reflects Strauss's determination to 'wreak some vengeance on my dear native town where I ... like the great Richard the First thirty years before, had such unpleasant experiences'.

The Sentlingergasse in Munich, with a view of the Gate, shortly before sunset on Midsummer Eve. Children collect wood for the bonfire that evening. The Burgomaster sets a good example by letting down to them a basket full of wood. His daughter, the beautiful Diemut, offers them some sweets. One of her three girlfriends prophesies that Diemut will be married by evening. The innkeeper warns the children to beware of Kunrad, the strange, solitary man who lives next door. Kunz Gilgenstock defends Kunrad but the old cooper Tulbeck reveals that the original inhabitant of the gruesome house was an ogre. Kofel, another old man, corrects him: the owner was a great wizard, one who did the city a lot of good – a covert reference to Richard Wagner. The children hammer on the door and when Kunrad appears he invites them to strip the wood they need from his house. The girls tease Kunrad and Diemut, suggesting that she already has her eye on him. Kunrad determines that nature and life will lead him to the magic his old master tried to teach him ('Dass ich den Zauber lerne'). He asks Diemut to leap over the fire with him (a traditional custom for engaged couples) and then kisses her on the lips. Humiliated, she swears she will have her revenge, while her friends point out that she rather likes him.

The street clears as the bailiff, Schweiker von Gundelfingen, hears what happened. Diemut's father sides with Kunrad, while the bailiff rebukes him gently. Kunrad is absorbed by his new love for Diemut, as irresistible as fire itself – the bonfire burns in the distance ('Feuersnot! Minnegebot!').

Diemut comes out on to her balcony. The bonfire's glow reminds her of her shame ('Mitsommernacht – wehvolle Wacht!'). Kunrad begs to be allowed to atone for his behaviour. She pretends to be won over and the lovers sing of the flames of feeling that engulf them. When he asks to be allowed up to her room she indicates the basket on the ground, attached to a pulley. Diemut's girlfriends watch and laugh as the basket rises and then stops below the balcony ('Leise, leise! Lasst uns schauen'). Gradually, Kunrad realises this was a trick. Diemut exults as the townsfolk assemble to laugh at him. Only her father rebukes her. Kunrad asks his dead master to extinguish the fires of a people who despise the power of love. All the fires go out. Soon everyone's bewilderment turns to anger, though some young lovers delight in the darkness ('Hollenspuk! Satanstrug!'). In the darkness Kunrad has climbed on to the balcony. He reminds the people of Munich that, out of small-minded fear, they once expelled the great master, Reichhart, who wanted to help them. Kunrad refers to his wizard-master Reichhart/Richard Wagner as 'a ruler of spirits' (an apt reference to Valhalla in a theme from Das Rheingold) and as a daring innovator (another from Der fliegende Holländer). Kunrad himself refuses to give in: he is ready for a fight (the war theme from Guntram's narration). He explains that he extinguished the city's lights to teach them that he needs woman's love to create. Diemut takes Kunrad by the hand and leads him into her room. Suddenly convinced of Kunrad's nobility, the townsfolk urge Diemut to yield to him, to help them in their 'Feuersnot' (need for fire). The ensemble gathers into a sort of urgent hymn.

¹ These descriptions are Strauss's own, from the score.

² Strauss specifies 'Ebner' in the cast list, i.e. leveller or joiner, perhaps, but nothing in the opera bears this out.

A vivid orchestral interlude describes the scene inside her room. When it reaches a climax, all the city's lights and fires start up again. The lovers are heard hoping that the midsummer night will never end. Everyone rejoices.

Richard Strauss in 1942 reflected on Feuersnot's lack of success: he admitted that it was 'comparatively difficult, requiring a superior baritone who can easily reach the heights, a good many solo singers capable of good characterisation, and containing difficult children's choruses, which have always been a handicap in repertory performances. And then Kunrad's great address still fails to be appreciated by audiences used to Il trovatore and Martha. I wonder whether this will ever change.'¹

Feuersnot's strengths, however, such as the profusion of memorable melodies, many in seductive waltz time, its animated pace and light, transparent orchestration that betrays the influence of Falstaff, are offset by an insistent folksiness and bumpy tone. High-minded allegory yoked to low practical jokes makes for an uncomfortable ride and has limited its appeal, even in Bavaria.

P.

SALOME

Opera in one act, words after Oscar Wilde's stage poem, translated into German by Hedwig Lachmann. Première in Dresden, 9 December 1905, with Wittich, von Chavanne, Burian, Perron, conductor von Schuch. First performed Berlin, 1906, with Destinn, Goetze, Krauss, Baptist Hoffmann, conductor Strauss; la Scala, Milan, 1906, with Krusceniski, Bruno, Borgatti; Metropolitan, 1907, with Fremstad, Burian, van Rooy, conductor Hertz; 1909, Manhattan Opera (in French), with Mary Garden; 1910, Covent Garden, with Ackté, Ernst Krauss, Whitehill, conductor Beecham. Revivals at Covent Garden: 1924, with Ljüngberg; 1937, with Ranczak (later Schulz), conductor Knappertsbusch; 1947, by Vienna Opera with Welitsch (later Cebotari), Höngen, Patzak, Rothmüller, conductor Clemens Krauss; 1949 (in English), with Welitsch, conductor Rankl (décor by Salvador Dali, production by Peter Brook); 1970, with Bumbry, conductor Solti. Revived at Metropolitan, 1933, with Ljüngberg, Lorenz, Schorr, conductor Bodanzky; 1937, with Marjorie Lawrence, conductor Panizza; 1942, with Djanel, conductor Szell; 1949, with Welitsch, conductor Reiner; in Berlin, 1942, with Cebotari; Berlin, German Opera, 1963, in Wieland Wagner's production with Silja; English National Opera, 1975, with Josephine Barstow, Emile Belcourt, Howlett, conductor Mark Elder, producer Joachim Herz.

Herod Antipas, Tetrarch of Judea Tenor
 Herodias, wife of Herod Mezzo-Soprano
 Salome, daughter of Herodias Soprano
 Jokanaan (John the Baptist) Baritone
 Narraboth, Captain of the Guard Tenor
 Herodias's Page Alto
 Five Jews Four Tenors, One Bass
 Two Nazarenes Tenor, Baritone
 Two Soldiers Bass
 A Cappadocian Bass
 A Slave

Place: The Palace of Herod at Tiberias, Galilee

Time: c. 30 A.D.

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

After the relative failure of Guntram and the relative success of Feuersnot, Strauss turned for his third opera to an existing subject, Oscar Wilde's stage poem Salomé, which he himself shortened for operatic purposes. Salome was from the start a sensational success with the public, rather less so with the critics, but it was admired by Mahler, who failed to get it through the censors in Vienna and contemplated resignation. This was the opera by Strauss which most intrigued the avant garde of his day.

¹ Recollections and Reflections, London, 1953.

Nearly a century after it was written and performed, it remains hypnotic in its vitality and the characterisation of the leading figures. The most detailed character study is contained in the title role, with each and every turn of an emotionally unstable figure mirrored in the music; her final scene with the head of Jokanaan transcends the dramatic implications of the words and is written, through her eyes as it were, as a sort of psychopathic Liebestod – the first of Strauss's grandiose operatic statements for female voice. Ernest Newman deduced from internal evidence that this was the first part of the poem which Strauss set so that it became, like the Letter Scene in Eugene Onegin, the source of much of the opera's music.

For Jokanaan, Strauss finds music of a very different character, sometimes hectoring when he denounces Herodias or Salome, often granite-like and implacable as he states his mission. Some have found it demonstrates the composer's greater facility for writing music for evil rather than for good operatic characters, but opinion has recently become more sympathetic to Jokanaan's efforts to convert Salome than it used to be. Herod is in very strong contrast, a crazy figure, attempting all the time to hang on to sanity, driven to the edge of dementia by his passion for his stepdaughter, and conveying these states of mind in music no less flexible and demon-ridden than Strauss found for Salome herself. Sir Arnold Bax attended the première in Dresden and wrote about Karel Burian, the Czech Wagnerian tenor who sang Herod, that 'he created a quite horrifying Herod, slobbering with lust and apparently almost decomposing before our disgusted but fascinated eyes'.

The great terrace of Herod's palace, off the banquet hall. The Captain of his bodyguard, Narraboth, a Syrian, cannot keep his eyes off Salome as she sits inside at supper, and he takes no notice of the Page's warning that he is playing a dangerous game. Soldiers' talk is interrupted by the sound of a voice proclaiming that he is the forerunner of a greater Prophet. This is Jokanaan's, imprisoned by Herod because he is constant in his denunciation of Herodias, and speaking from a cistern in which he is held captive.

Salome in considerable excitement runs out. She cannot bear the way Herod, her stepfather, looks at her; he is after all her mother's husband. The Page predicts disaster, but Salome is riveted by the sound of Jokanaan's voice from the cistern and demands to know who it is. She knows that the Prophet has denounced her mother because she has married a man who was her husband's brother, and she knows too that her mother hates him and her stepfather is frightened of him. She refuses to go back to the feast but says she wants to speak with the Prophet. This is of course strictly forbidden but she gradually wheedles Narraboth to do what she wants and he gives the order for Jokanaan to be brought out of his prison.

To a mature statement of the figure associated with him (Ex. 1) he comes slowly into the light, where he loses no time in denouncing both Herod and Herodias in so forthright a manner that Salome is at first bewildered and then fascinated. Jokanaan is not slow in turning on her ('Wer ist dies Weib, das mich ansieht?') and he rages at her as the daughter of an iniquitous mother. Salome tells him in music of rising intensity of her desire for his body ('Jokanaan, ich bin verliebt in deinen Leib'), his hair ('In dein Haar bin ich verliebt'), and finally his mouth ('Deinen Mund begehre ich').

She does everything she can to tempt him but the sole result is that he bids her do penance, spurning what she offers. When Narraboth in despair kills himself with his own sword, she does not so much as notice it. The Prophet warns her to seek for the only one in whom she can find redemption, the Man of Galilee: 'Es lebt nur Einer, der dich retten kann'. But, realising that his words fall on deaf ears, he curses her and, to an orchestral passage of considerable power, retreats into his cistern.

The first part of the opera is over and the second is dominated by Herod. He comes with his wife and their suite on to the terrace, a strange, neurotic figure, veering between lucidity and a condition not far from madness – soon after leaving his banquet, he has an hallucination that the wind is blowing round his head. Herodias is as cold as a serpent but Herod's lust for Salome stirs him into activity. He asks her in a grand musical paragraph to drink wine from a goblet so that he may place his lips where she placed hers, and follows it by urging her to eat fruit so that he may finish what she has left. In spite of Salome's refusal to do what he asks and for all Herodias's objections, he follows this up by asking Salome to sit beside him on his throne in her mother's place. The whole scene stretches all but a Heldentenor and it is an amazing depiction of erotic neurasthenia.

Salome (Covent Garden/Salzburg Festival, 1995, director Luc Bondy, sets Erich Wonder, costumes Susanne Raschig). Bryn Terfel as Jokanaan and Catherine Malfitano in the title role.

Herod is in considerable awe of the Prophet and he refuses to give him up to the Jews, who have been at the feast and who now clamour to be allowed to judge him. Herod insists that the Prophet is a holy man who has even beheld God. This starts a theological argument among his Jewish guests, who dispute in a fugal quintet. No sooner is it finished than two Nazarenes proclaim their conviction that the Messiah is in their midst; he has even raised the dead from their graves. Herod is immediately filled with misgivings, which are not quieted by the Prophet's continued prediction of doom.

It is almost as much because of his dread of the future as his longing for her that Herod asks as a diversion for Salome to dance. She demurs until he swears to grant any request she may make of him. The Dance of the Seven Veils starts the third phase of the opera, which belongs mainly to Salome. It has a number of contrasting sections. At its end Herod is devastated when she demands the head of the Prophet. He offers her everything else he can name – precious stones, his unique white peacocks, the mantle of the High Priest, even the Veil of the Temple – but Salome refuses to release him from his oath. He senses quite early that he is fighting a losing battle and in the end agrees that she shall have what she demands. Herodias takes the Ring of Death from his finger and gives it to the first soldier, who summons the executioner to go down into the cistern. Salome listens and Jokanaan is beheaded (to the eerie sound of a pinched B flat on a solo double-bass) and his severed head presented to Salome on a silver charger. She is in ecstasy and circles round the head addressing it as though it were still alive. Living, he refused her his lips; now, in a frenzy of lust, she presses hers upon them. The scene is one of Strauss's most magnificent creations, but Herod turns from her in revulsion before she has finished, and orders his guards to kill her.

Strauss uses a large orchestra, 105 in all – but Elektra has 112. In the first years of its existence, Salome brought objections from almost everyone who thought they had a concern, whether the Church, the German court in Berlin, or the directors of the Metropolitan Opera in New York. But it has stood the test of time to a quite remarkable degree and the virtuosity with which Strauss manoeuvres his orchestra to convey the feelings of his characters and the violence of the drama never fails to fascinate. H.

ELEKTRA

Opera in one act, text by Hugo von Hofmannsthal, after Sophocles. Première Dresden, 25 January 1909, with Anny Krull, Siems, Schumann-Heink, Sembach, Perron, conductor von Schuch. First performed Berlin, 1909, with Plaichinger, conductor Blech; Vienna, 1909, with Marie Gutheil-Schoder, Mildenburg, Weidemann; la Scala, Milan, 1909 (in Italian), with Krusceniski; New York, Manhattan Opera, 1910 (in French), with Mazarin, Gerville-Réache; Covent Garden, 1910, with Edyth Walker, Mildenburg, d'Oisly, Weidemann, conductor Beecham; Hull, 1912 (in English), with Florence Easton. Revived Covent Garden, 1925, with Kappel, Olszewska, Schorr, conductor Walter; 1938, with Pauly, Hilde Konetzni, Thorborg, Janssen, conductor Beecham; 1953, with Schlüter, conductor Erich Kleiber; 1957 with Lammers, conductor Kempe; 1965, with Shuard, Resnik, conductor Kempe; 1969, with Nilsson, Resnik, conductor Solti. At Metropolitan, 1938, with Pauly, Thorborg, Schorr, conductor Bodanzky; la Scala, 1943, with Rünger; Metropolitan, 1952, with Varnay, Höngen, conductor Reiner. Gutheil-Schoder was one of the most famous of Elektras, Rose Pauly another.

| | |
|---|-----------------------------|
| Klytemnestra, widow of | |
| Agamemnon..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Elektra | } her daughters.....Soprano |
| Chrysothemis | |
| Aegistheus, Klytemnestra's paramour..... | Tenor |
| Orestes, son of Klytemnestra and Agamemnon..... | Baritone |

| | |
|--------------------------------------|---------------|
| Tutor of Orestes..... | Bass |
| The Confidante of Klytemnestra..... | Soprano |
| The Trainbearer of Klytemnestra..... | Soprano |
| A Young Servant..... | Tenor |
| An Old Servant..... | Bass |
| The Overseer..... | Soprano |
| First Maidservant..... | Contralto |
| Second and Third Maidservants..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Fourth and Fifth Maidservants..... | Soprano |

Place: Mycenae

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 1 hour 35 minutes

*E*lektra is now accepted as one of Strauss's most successful operas. But it was not always so. Mme Schumann-Heink, the Klytemnestra of the original production in Dresden, said: 'I will never sing the role again. It was frightful. We were a set of mad women. ... There is nothing beyond Elektra. We have lived and reached the furthest boundary in dramatic writing for the voice with Wagner. But Richard Strauss goes beyond him. His singing voices are lost. We have come to a full stop. I believe Strauss himself sees it' – and (comments Kobbé) in his next opera, Der Rosenkavalier, the composer shows far more consideration for the voice. Nonetheless, legend has it that at the Dresden dress rehearsal, he called down into the orchestra pit: 'Louder! I can still hear Frau Heink!'

Beyond the fact that Agamemnon was murdered by his wife, Clytemnestra, and her paramour Aegistheus, it is not essential to know the details of the Greek story, but it is nevertheless against this background that Hofmannsthal and Strauss, with all their changes of emphasis, have laid their opera. Agamemnon and Menelaus, the sons of King Atreus, married the sisters Clytemnestra and Helen. The latter was carried off by Paris, son of Priam, King of Troy, and it was to procure her return to her husband and to avenge the insult to Greece that the Trojan War began. On their way to Troy, the Greek fleet touched at Aulis and was caught there by adverse winds, the goddess Artemis being angry with Agamemnon, who had killed one of her sacred hinds. To appease the goddess and to ensure that the fleet reached Troy in safety, Agamemnon sent for his daughter Iphigenia and sacrificed her.¹ The war over, Menelaus and Helen were driven by storms to Egypt, where they stayed for some years (and formed the subjects of Strauss's *Die Aegyptische Helena*¹), and Agamemnon returned to Mycenae. Here he found that Clytemnestra had installed Aegistheus as her lover. With the excuse of the sacrifice of her daughter to salve her conscience Clytemnestra murdered Agamemnon in his bath. Three children survived their father: Elektra, who was reduced to menial status, Chrysothemis, and Orestes, who was sent away to safety, according to some versions by a faithful slave, to others by Elektra. Eventually, Orestes returns, gives out that he is dead, gains admittance to the palace, and slays the guilty Clytemnestra and her lover.

¹ See page 267.

The work is in one long act – Strauss was always strongly opposed to having another work given on the same evening – but that act has been divided by analysts into seven sections: (1) Elektra; (2) Chrysothemis; (3) Klytemnestra; (4) Elektra and Chrysothemis; (5) Orestes; (6) the Recognition; (7) the Vengeance.

The curtain rises straight away to show the inner court of the palace of Mycenae. At the back can be seen the palace itself; in the court is a well, from which servants are drawing water as the curtain goes up. They discuss the unpredictable Elektra, who howls like the dogs with whom her mother and step-father have condemned her to live and eat. Some hate her, others pity her, only the fifth maid reveres and loves her. For her defence of Elektra, she is set upon by the others, and when they have gone inside, the fifth maid can be heard crying out that she is being beaten.

The scene is empty before Elektra comes from the house alone. In a great monologue ('Allein! Weh, ganz allein!') she rehearses the story of her father's murder, calls on his name (Ex. 1), and looks forward to the time when his death will be avenged by herself and Orestes. When this is accomplished she will dance in triumph round the corpses of her enemies. The motif associated with the children of Agamemnon (Ex. 2) is important.

The second stage begins when Chrysothemis joins Elektra. Hofmannsthal designs her as a weaker, more human contrast to the implacable Elektra, and she is little inclined to join her sister in the schemes for revenge which are constantly being urged upon her. Instead, she issues a warning that further horrors are in store for Elektra. Poor Chrysothemis feels the fires of love frustrated within her ('Ich hab's wie Feuer in der Brust') and longs to escape from her hateful prison, to which she is doomed by the fear which her sister's hatred inspires in Klytemnestra. The ordeal to which both are subjected is leaving its mark on them, she says.

Noises are heard within of running footsteps, torches can be seen, and Chrysothemis says she will not stay to meet Klytemnestra who must surely be coming out. Elektra, however, is determined to speak with her mother.

Stage three begins as Klytemnestra is seen for the first time. She is bloated and decayed, and sleepless nights and debauched days have left her looking as though it were an effort to keep her eyes open. Her first words are to mourn the evil workings of fate which have given her such a daughter, but presently she comes down to the courtyard, and dismissing her attendants, is left alone with the daughter she hates and fears so much.

She is tormented by dreams; does her daughter know no remedy for them? Elektra is wise, and alone can help her. She describes her sleepless nights; is there not some sacrifice she can make to the gods to alleviate the torture she suffers? Elektra answers her insinuatingly, and in terms that admit of two meanings. Yes, there is a victim, who is unconsecrated and roams free; it is a woman, married, who can be killed at any time of day or night, with an axe, by a man, a stranger, but of their kin. Klytemnestra becomes impatient, and Elektra asks whether her mother means to call her brother back from exile. Klytemnestra is uneasy at mention of him, and Elektra accuses her of sending money to bribe those who are looking after him to kill him; the trembling of her body at his name proves as much. But Klytemnestra says she fears nobody. She will find means of dragging from Elektra the secret of whose blood must flow to cause her nightmares to abate. Elektra springs at her; it is her blood that is required. She is the victim the gods have marked down. Elektra describes the chase which will end with Klytemnestra's death. The librettist indicates:

¹ See page 777.

Elektra (Covent Garden, 1966, director Rudolf Hartmann). Martha Mödl as Klytemnestra.

'They stand eye to eye – Elektra in wild intoxication; Klytemnestra breathing in horrible spasms of fear.'

At this moment the Confidante runs out of the palace and whispers in Klytemnestra's ear. A look of triumph comes into the Queen's face, and she goes into the palace, leaving Elektra alone in the courtyard.

Stage four. Chrysothemis comes out crying that Orestes is dead. Elektra at first will not believe it, but Chrysothemis says that two strangers, one old, the other young, brought the news; Orestes was dragged to death by his own horses. A servant comes out of the palace, demanding a horse as quickly as possible so that he may carry the news to Aegistheus.

Elektra now demands that Chrysothemis shall help her in her task; alone she cannot slay Klytemnestra and Aegistheus but with her sister's help she would be able to accomplish the deed. She flatters Chrysothemis that she is strong, and promises that she will henceforth look after her as if she were her slave. She holds Chrysothemis fast, but when her sister eventually frees herself and rushes from the courtyard, she hurls a curse after her.

The fifth stage begins as Elektra, left alone, begins to dig like an animal at the side of the courtyard. She looks up twice, and then sees someone standing by the gate. Who is interrupting her? He asks her if she works in the palace. She answers bitterly that she does. He tells her that he has business with the Queen; he and another have brought the news of Orestes' death. Elektra's grief at the news is overwhelming; must she look upon him who lives, while someone a thousand times as good as he lies dead? Elektra's utterance takes on the character of a lament for Orestes, whom she will never see again. The stranger asks her if she is of the royal house that she takes Orestes' death as so personal a matter. She says her name, and the stranger exclaims in astonishment. He reveals that Orestes is not dead, and, a moment later, servants come in and kiss his hand. Who is he, demands Elektra? Everyone knows him, he answers, except his own sister.

The Recognition Scene (stage six) is the emotional climax of the opera. Elektra's ferocity drops from her to be replaced by tenderness, and the unremitting tension of the music gives way to lyricism: 'Orest! Orest! Orest!'

Elektra will not allow her brother to embrace her. She contrasts her former beauty with her present state; she has renounced everything in order to expiate the murder of her father. Together they exult in the prospect of the righteous revenge which they will exact from Agamemnon's murderers. They are recalled to the reality of the situation by Orestes' tutor.

The seventh and last stage of the drama begins when the Confidante appears and leads Orestes and the tutor inside. Elektra is alone, in horrible excitement, waiting for the sounds which will tell her that the first part of the revenge is over. A shriek tells her that Orestes has found Klytemnestra. By now the palace is aroused, but Elektra bars the entrance with her body.

Aegistheus saunters into the courtyard, and Elektra offers to light him into the palace. Aegistheus wonders at the change that has come over Elektra, who is circling round him in a strange sort of dance. Aegistheus enters the palace, but reappears a moment later at a window, yelling for help.

Women rush out of the palace, among them Chrysothemis, who has discovered that Orestes is back. Their rejoicings are very different in character, and Elektra breaks away from her sister, throwing back her head like a maenad, and dancing about like a demented creature. Her thirst for vengeance is satisfied, and her dance increases to frenzy. Suddenly she collapses dead upon the ground. With a last cry of 'Orest!' Chrysothemis rushes to the door of the palace, and bangs on it. The orchestra continues to give out the motif associated with Agamemnon.

H.

DER ROSENKAVALIER

The Knight of the Rose

Opera in three acts, text by Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Première in Dresden, 26 January 1911, with Margarethe Siems, Minnie Nast, Eva von der Osten (all of whom recorded excerpts) and Karl Perron (who did not); conductor Ernst von Schuch.

Princess von Werdenberg, the Feldmarschallin (aged 32) Soprano
Baron Ochs von Lerchenau Bass
Octavian, brother of Count Rofrano
(aged 17) Soprano or Mezzo-Soprano
Baron von Faninal, a wealthy parvenu Baritone
Sophie, his daughter Soprano
Marianne, her duenna Soprano
Valzacchi, an Italian intriguer Tenor
Annina, his partner Mezzo-Soprano
A Police Commissary Bass
A Notary Bass
An Italian Singer Tenor
An Innkeeper Tenor
Servants of the Marschallin and of Faninal, Waiters, Mahomet (a little black page), People attending the Levée

Place: Vienna

Time: Reign of Empress Maria Theresa

Running Time: 3 hours 30 minutes

It was Hofmannsthal, the modifier of Sophocles' text for Strauss's fourth opera, Elektra – his second success – who suggested the subject of Der Rosenkavalier, a comedy to be set in Vienna in Maria Theresa's time. The opera was a success from the start, and has been played more often than any other German opera written in the twentieth century.

It can be claimed as a masterpiece, or alternatively as an edifice of pastiche and paradox – an evocation of an unrealistic, fairy-story Vienna of long ago, where wit and elegance redeemed anything and all could be forgiven provided it were done with style. The result is often magical, but no more realistic than Die Fledermaus. The means Strauss and Hofmannsthal employed are undeniably attractive but either anachronistic, like the ubiquitous and seductive waltzes, which perfectly suggest a period atmosphere of which they were never part, or else invented, like the plausible, charming, but unhistorical presentation of a rose to mark an engagement.

The marvel is that one of the fine fruits of the collaboration of Strauss and Hofmannsthal is a fast-moving musical conversation, an outstanding example of speech heightened by music, and that on this basis grow moments of genuine pathos which give the opera memorability, like the Marschallin's reflections on the passing of youth, and set-pieces such as Ochs's waltz, the Presentation of the Rose, or, best of all, the great third-act trio, which provides a splendid and cathartic musical summary of the drama's emotional threads.

Act I. The Marschallin's bedroom. The prelude is explicitly intended to represent the love-making which takes place before the curtain rises. The first seven notes, rampant and assertive, are associated with Octavian, the Marschallin's music (after a climax) comes a little later and is both passionate

(Ex. 2)

(Ex. 3)

Tranquillo
Ob.

and contemplative. Octavian, a youth of seventeen and certainly not the first of the Marschallin's lovers, is as keen to prolong the moment as she is loath to let him go – it is a scene of great tenderness, with a little jealousy mixed in – but he hides when the breakfast chocolate is brought in and both take alarm when they think the Feldmarschall himself is on his way up. Octavian scampers out, but it is only one of her

(Ex. 1)

Con moto agitato

Der Rosenkavalier (English National Opera, 1994, director Jonathan Miller, sets Peter J. Davison, costumes Sue Blane). Sally Burgess as Octavian in Act I.

relatives, the country-bred Baron Ochs, insisting in spite of the servants' protestations on seeing her.

Octavian returns in a maid's uniform and the Baron is almost diverted from making appropriate obeisance to his cousin by the presence of the pretty 'Mariandel'. He tries to make an assignation for later and comes only reluctantly to the point: will the Princess do him the honour of naming a Knight of the Rose to go on his behalf to his fiancée, Sophie von Faninal? He also needs a notary. A chance remark sets him off on his favourite subject: love-making in all its forms, his monologue consisting partly of reminiscence, partly of pure fancy – if only like Jupiter he could take on disguises for his escapades!

The Princess's morning levée begins, and aspirants to her favour mingle with her notary, chef and hairdresser. An Italian tenor demonstrates his art in a pastiche aria of considerable charm, the Marschallin rejects the attempts of two Italian scandal-mongers, Valzacchi and Annina, to interest her in a gossip sheet, and finally Ochs erupts at the attorney's suggestion that a dowry is due from him to the bride, not the other way round. The Baron and his down-at-heel retinue depart, leaving the Marschallin prey to autumnal thoughts uttered in some of the score's most expressive music. Was she not herself just such a girl as this poor unsuspecting creature whom Ochs, with all his crudity, plans to marry? Even the return of Octavian, booted and spurred and full of chivalrous talk, only reminds her he will soon find a younger woman. Her reflections on the passage of time are full of melancholy, and Octavian takes an almost formal leave, without even a kiss. The Marschallin sends her little black page after him with the silver rose; Count Octavian, she tells him in an exquisitely poised phrase, will know what to do with it.

Act II. The grand salon in Herr von Faninal's house. Sophie and her duenna are to await her bridegroom, etiquette demanding that Faninal be absent when the bearer of the silver rose arrives. Octavian's entrance triggers what is perhaps Strauss's most magical set-piece, the Presentation of the Rose, with a glittering, ice-cold orchestral texture to support Sophie's soaring vocal rapture, itself a perfect example of the composer's idiomatic writing for soprano voice. The young people engage in polite conversation whose increasingly intimate tone is interrupted by the Baron's entrance. His total lack of manners repels Sophie, Octavian boils with rage and only Ochs's humming of his favourite waltz tune shows a less disagreeable side to his make-up.

Ochs goes into an adjoining room to sign the marriage contract, and the outraged Sophie sinks gratefully into Octavian's arms. Cries from Valzacchi and Annina, anxious to ingratiate themselves with Ochs, bring him in, but he refuses to take seriously Octavian's assertion of Sophie's antipathy. Eventually, Octavian's taunts force him to draw his sword. In the encounter, Octavian lightly pinks the Baron, whose outrage creates commotion, stilled only when recovery sets in after another draught of Faninal's good wine.

Octavian is determined to win Sophie and makes use of the two intriguers. To the Baron alone on the sofa and humming his favourite waltz tune comes Annina to hand him a note purporting to be from the Marschallin's chambermaid and promising him a rendezvous. Delighted with his new conquest, he allows the end of the act to be dominated by his famous waltz.

Act III. An inn near Vienna, where, after a brilliant orchestral fugato, Annina and Valzacchi, now in the service of both Octavian and Ochs but inclined to favour the former because he pays better, prepare a room full of surprises for the Baron's assignation. Between him and Octavian, dressed as Mariandel, develops a rude scene of courtship mostly to the accompaniment of a chain of waltzes, to one of which Octavian sings 'Nein, nein, I' trink kein Wein!' (No, no, I don't drink wine!), a tune which will later assume significance. Even the resemblance of Mariandel to Octavian doesn't put the Baron off, but he is soon to discover he is the victim of an elaborate practical joke. First, figures appear at the 'blind' windows, then a disguised Annina insists she is his deserted wife, children claim they are his, a policeman called to defend the Baron against his tormentors turns out to be strict about young women apparently brought to an inn for seduction. When Faninal puts in an appearance, Ochs, who has in desperation described Mariandel as his fiancée, is driven to say he has never seen him before, and the arrival of the Marschallin – summoned by one of Ochs's servants – puts the lid on an evening which for Ochs is fraught with disaster.

She quickly takes in the situation. The Police

Commissary was once her husband's orderly and it is easy to persuade him that the whole matter was just a joke. Sophie is heart-broken at the idea that the 'joke' may have included Octavian and herself, but the Marschallin takes things in hand, sends Ochs packing – by a successful appeal to his gentlemanly code; an important sidelight on his character – and pushes Octavian and Sophie together.

The last section of the opera removes something of the impression of musical bustle which has dominated the rest of the act, containing as it does the grandiose trio for the Marschallin, Sophie and Octavian (based paradoxically on the inconsequential little tune of 'Nein, nein, I' trink kein Wein'). Then, with Octavian forgiven, the lovers are left alone to sing an extended duet set to the simplest of tunes and punctuated by an orchestral snatch from the Presentation of the Rose. Sophie and Octavian go hand in hand to the waiting carriage. But it is not quite the end of the opera. Mahomet, the black page, comes to look for Sophie's handkerchief, finds it, and runs out as the curtain falls.

H.

ARIADNE AUF NAXOS

Ariadne on Naxos

In its original form, opera in one act, text by Hugo von Hofmannsthal. The work was designed to follow a condensed version of Molière's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (translated by Hofmannsthal), for which Strauss provided incidental music. This version was first heard at Stuttgart, 25 October 1912, with Jeritza, Siems, Jadowker, conductor Strauss. First performed Berlin, 1913, with Hafgren-Waag, Bosetti, Jadowker, conductor Blech; His Majesty's Theatre, London, 1913, with von der Osten, Bosetti, Marak, conductor Beecham (Tree was Monsieur Jourdain, and the translation was by Somerset Maugham). Revived Edinburgh Festival, 1950 (by Glyndebourne company), with Zadek, Hollweg, Anders, conductor Beecham (Miles Malleson, who translated the play, also played Jourdain). Subsequently, the opera was revised, the Molière play dropped, the new version, with a prologue and one act, having its première in Vienna, 4 October 1916, with Jeritza, Selma Kurz, Környey, Duhan and Lehmann, substituting as the Composer (according to her autobiography) for the indisposed Gutheil-Schoder, conductor Schalk. First performed Berlin, 1916, with Hafgren-Waag, Hansa, Lola Artôt de Padilla, Kirchner, conductor Blech; Covent Garden, 1924, with Lehmann, Ivogün, Schumann, Fischer-Niemann, conductor Alwin; Turin, 1925, with Arangi-Lombardi, Pasini, Tess, Dolci, conductor Gui; Philadelphia, 1928 (the cast included Helen Jepson as Echo and Nelson Eddy as Harlequin); New York, 1934. Revived Covent Garden, 1936, with Marta

Fuchs, Sack, Wieber, Ralf, conductor Strauss (ensemble of Dresden Opera); Glyndebourne, 1953, with Dow, Dobbs, Jurinac, Lewis, conductor Pritchard.

Characters in the prologue

| | |
|--|---------------|
| The Major-Domo | Speaking Role |
| Music Master | Baritone |
| The Composer | Soprano |
| The Tenor (later Bacchus) | Tenor |
| An Officer | Tenor |
| The Dancing Master | Tenor |
| The Wig-Maker | Bass |
| A Lackey | Bass |
| Zerbinetta | Soprano |
| Prima Donna (later Ariadne) | Soprano |
| Harlequin | Baritone |
| Scaramuccio | Tenor |
| Truffaldino | Bass |
| Brighella | Tenor |

Characters in the opera

| | |
|---------------------|-----------|
| Ariadne | Soprano |
| Bacchus | Tenor |
| Three nymphs | |
| Naiad | Soprano |
| Dryad | Contralto |
| Echo | Soprano |

Characters of intermezzo

| | |
|-------------------|----------|
| Zerbinetta | Soprano |
| Harlequin | Baritone |
| Scaramuccio | Tenor |
| Truffaldino | Bass |
| Brighella | Tenor |

(The characters in the opera are the same in both versions; those of the Prologue belong only to the second version, the original conception of the opera calling for the cast of Molière's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme for the first part of the evening.)

Running Time: 2 hours 5 minutes (second version)

One of the first things to strike anyone who reads the correspondence of Strauss and Hofmannsthal is the considerable difference there often is between their first thoughts on the subject of one of their operatic collaborations, and their last. Thus Rosenkavalier was thought of as a simple comedy with important roles for a baritone and a soprano in boy's clothes, and in the earlier stages of the correspondence there is no mention of the Marschallin, who was later to become the central figure in the comedy. Ariadne went through an even stranger evolution. Originally conceived as a little opera lasting half an hour, and designed as a thank-offering to Max Reinhardt, who produced Rosenkavalier in Dresden, it was intended to form the musical divertissement in Molière's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, taking the place of the Turkish ballet called for by Monsieur Jourdain. In the end the opera became a much more extensive affair than at first envisaged, and lasted about three times as long as projected. Unfortunately, the combination of a theatrical with an operatic company proved beyond the means of most theatres, and the work as it stood was declared impracticable. Strauss therefore revised it and substituted a musical prelude (lasting about thirty-five minutes) for the Molière play, making at the same time some alterations in the body of the opera itself (this, however, remains substantially the same as in the first version, although the role of Zerbinetta¹ has been slightly shortened).

Ariadne has usually been performed in its second version, but such an authority on Strauss's music as Sir Thomas Beecham wrote (in his autobiographical A Mingled Chime): 'In this, the earlier version of Ariadne, I have always considered that the musical accomplishment of Strauss attained its highest reach, yielding a greater spontaneity and variety of invention, together with a subtler and riper style, than anything that his pen had yet given to the stage ... the Bacchus section of the opera is one of the purple patches in the operatic literature of the twentieth century. ... The later version has not only failed to hold the stage,² but has dimmed the public recollection of the far superior and more attractive original.'

The original version of the opera calls for an abbreviated version of Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme to form the first part of the evening's entertainment. The theme of this is that Monsieur Jourdain, the bourgeois who is determined to become a gentleman by sheer concentrated hard work and who means to learn to dance, sing, fence, compose, philosophise, is at the same time laying siege to the affections of a certain Marquise Dorimène. She for her part is in love with the shady Count Dorante, who has undertaken to bring her to the lavish dinner party which is given in their honour by Jourdain. The play is garnished with some delightful incidental music by Strauss, and the three principal characters remain at the side of the stage while the opera is performed for their benefit.

¹ Margarethe Siems was not only the original Zerbinetta but had earlier created Chrysothemis and the Marschallin.

² History suggests this judgement was, to put it mildly, premature.

In the revised version, the Prologue takes place at the house of a Viennese nouveau riche (not in Paris, as in the Molière). We see musicians, singers, actors, carpenters, and stage hands preparing for the first performance of a serious opera which has been specially commissioned by the owner of the house to entertain his guests. There is consternation when the Major-Domo announces that after the opera there will be a Harlequinade entertainment; moreover, the two shows must not overrun their allotted span of time, as the fireworks will begin precisely at nine o'clock! Worse is to come, as a little later the Major-Domo comes in to inform the two troupes that his master has changed his mind, and now both entertainments will be played simultaneously, the serious opera being punctuated by intervals of dancing from the comedians.

The dominating figure of the prologue is the composer, a creation of the second version and a touching figure which has found admirable exponents almost every time the opera has been performed. He extemporises an aria which he intends for the tenor (this is derived from a little song heard during the course of the play in the first version), he languishes at the idea of his masterpiece being combined with a common dancing show, he tries to explain to Zerbinetta that Ariadne prefers death to the embraces of any man other than her beloved, and, proving unsuccessful in this, he indulges in a duet with Zerbinetta in which he comes perilously close to declaring that he loves her. There is some trouble with both tenor and prima donna, after which the composer brings the prologue to a suitable end by declaring his conviction in the power of music, the most sacred of the arts.

Opera. After an interval, the curtain rises on the opera itself, which is watched from boxes by the owner of the house and his guests. The setting, which we have hitherto seen only from its reverse side, is now seen from in front. At one side of the set is a cave, in whose entrance Ariadne can be seen asleep, watched by Naiad, Dryad and Echo. In a trio, these creatures express a certain sympathy with Ariadne's sorrow, to which however they have become accustomed with the passage of time.

A great scena begins for Ariadne. She is speaking as if in a dream, and takes no notice when the Harlequinade quartet and Zerbinetta comment on her distress and try to think of means of comforting her. Ariadne welcomes the idea of death, and not even a determined effort by Harlequin to cure her of her madness – for he thinks that's what must surely be wrong with her – can stop her for long. 'Es gibt ein Reich, wo alles rein ist; es hat auch einen Namen: Totenreich' (There is a land where all is purity: it also has a name – Death's domain)¹ she continues, and at mention of death's messenger, Hermes, her monologue becomes more urgent. The last section of the monologue, where Ariadne rejoices in the idea of the deliverance death will bring to her, is ecstatic in import, and (from the singer's point of view) Wagnerian in weight.

The four comedians make another attempt to cheer up the melancholy Ariadne, but their dancing and singing have not the slightest effect, even when they are joined by the sprightly Zerbinetta. Eventually, Zerbinetta bids them leave her to see what she can do on her own. Her scena is one of the most taxing ever written for coloratura soprano. After a recitative, 'Grossmächtige Prinzessin', she appeals to Ariadne as woman to woman. Ariadne is not the first to be abandoned by her lover, and will not be the last. Zerbinetta expounds her own fickle philosophy, and is quite unconcerned when Ariadne disappears inside her cave. She goes into details of her amorous career in an allegretto scherzando ('So war es mit Pagliazzo') at which point the vocal writing parts company with what is normally considered advisable to write for a singer and becomes a fantastic display of fireworks (even the transposition into D major from the E of the original leaves something which is technically beyond all but the most accomplished of coloratura sopranos).

The section of the opera which begins at her recitative is entirely Zerbinetta's. She is pursued by the four comedians, each of whom seems amorously inclined. Zerbinetta encourages and eludes them all, until Scaramuccio, Brighella, and Truffaldino are left on the stage. Much to their annoyance, Zerbinetta is immediately heard conversing tenderly with Harlequin, whom they had thought safely out of the way. They rush out to see what they can do about it.

¹ English translation by Tom Hammond.

No sooner are they gone than the three attendant nymphs return to the stage, full of the sight they have just seen. A youthful god is coming, Bacchus, fresh from the embraces of Circe, but eager for new adventure. They call to Ariadne, who emerges from the cave in time to hear Bacchus off-stage calling for Circe. The nymphs beg him to continue singing, and Ariadne hails him as the longed-for messenger of death. The opera ends with an extended love duet, Wagnerian in its length and weight if not in its character. In Bacchus' arms, Ariadne finds consolation, and Strauss even allows Zerbinetta to pop in for a moment to comment that all has turned out exactly as she would have expected. Bacchus and Ariadne go together into the cave. (In the first version, soon after Bacchus is first heard off-stage, there is a fairly lengthy interruption by Zerbinetta, during which Ariadne is arrayed in fine clothes; it is only after this that the god is seen on the stage.)

Ariadne is scored for a small orchestra of thirty-six players. H.

DIE FRAU OHNE SCHATTEN

The Woman without a Shadow

Opera in three acts, text by Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Première in Vienna, 10 October 1919, with Lehmann, Jeritza, Weidt, Oestvig, Manowarda, Mayr, conductor Schalk. First performed Dresden, 1919, with von der Osten, Rethberg, Metzger, Vogelstrom, Plaschke, conductor Reiner; Salzburg, 1932, with Lehmann, Ursuleac, Rünger, Völker, Manowarda, conductor Clemens Krauss; la Scala, 1940, with Pacetti, Roman, Voyer, Franci, conductor Marinuzzi. Munich's rebuilt opera reopened 1963, with Borkh, Bjoner, Mödl, Jess Thomas, Fischer-Dieskau, conductor Keilberth; 1966, London, by Hamburg company; 1966, Metropolitan, New York, with Christa Ludwig, Rysanek, Dalis, King, Berry, conductor Böhm; 1967, Covent Garden, with Borkh, Hillebrecht, King, McIntyre, conductor Solti.

The Emperor Tenor
The Empress, his wife Soprano
The Nurse (Die Amme) Mezzo-Soprano
A Spirit-Messenger Baritone
The Keeper of the Gates of the Temple Soprano or Tenor (falsetto)
Apparition of a Youth Tenor
The Voice of the Falcon Soprano
A Voice from Above Contralto

Barak, the dyer Bass-Baritone
His Wife Soprano

Brothers of Barak

The One-Eyed Bass
The One-Armed Bass
The Hunchback Tenor

Six Children's Voices Three Sopranos,
Three Contraltos

Voices of the Nightwatchmen Three Basses

Servants of the Emperor, Voices of unborn Children, Spirits

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

Written between 1914 and 1917, Die Frau ohne Schatten is in Strauss's oeuvre a counterpart to Die Zauberflöte in Mozart's, not quite a 'quest' opera, but hovering between a world of human beings and one of spirits. The 'shadow' is of course fertility, which the Empress lacks, but in the course of the opera she grows from a creature of fairy-tale remoteness to a human being prepared to sacrifice hers and her husband's future rather than force Barak and his wife apart. The opera's première took place, just after the end of the Great War, in Vienna, where Strauss had become joint Music Director with Franz Schalk, who conducted. The exacting demands of its staging were not, it would appear, wholly satisfactorily met, and difficulties of staging and casting have always militated against the work's place in the repertory, towards which it has moved slowly but surely in the second half of the twentieth century. Many admirers of the composer estimate it not only the most ambitious but also the greatest of his operas.

The Emperor of the South Eastern Islands is married to a supernatural being, the daughter of Keikobad, King of the Spirits. She emerged from a white gazelle which he shot while out hunting. Their love is mutual and ardent, but their marriage is childless; in token of her barren state, the Empress throws no shadow. To make love complete, the woman must bear children.

Act I. The opera, which is by no means short, each of the three acts lasting over an hour, starts when the Emperor and Empress have been married twelve moons. It is dark, and the Nurse is crouching on a flat roof above the Imperial gardens. To her appears a messenger. He tells her that he is from Keikobad and has come to inform her that unless the Empress within three days casts a shadow (that is to say, becomes pregnant), she must go back to Keikobad. The Emperor will be turned to stone.

The messenger disappears and the Emperor tells how he first saw and won his wife. He will now go hunting for three days, and he refers to his favourite falcon which he has not seen since the day he met his wife. The Emperor leaves, day dawns, and the Empress comes from her chamber. She too talks of her love, but then catches sight of the falcon, whose voice is heard to say: 'The woman throws no shadow, the Emperor must turn to stone.' The Empress understands that the only way to save him is to acquire a shadow, and she begs the Nurse to help her.

The orchestra represents their journey to earth, and the second scene is set in the hut of the dyer, Barak. When the curtain rises, the three deformed brothers of the dyer are quarrelling.

In the scene which ensues, the contrasting characters of Barak and his wife are made apparent. She nags and complains, he is patient and full of natural goodness. But he upbraids her for not having given him a child in the two and a half years of their marriage. He goes off to market.

No sooner has he gone than the Empress and her Nurse enter the hut, dressed simply as peasants. The Nurse is immediately aware that in the dyer's wife she has found a good subject for her black arts. She praises her for her beauty, and tells her she could sell her shadow and get for it all the luxuries and riches she has always wanted.

The dyer's wife agrees to exchange her own prospect of motherhood for the promise of riches. She will refuse her husband's advances. The Empress and the Nurse leave, saying that they will be back next day. When she is alone, the woman has another vision. This time she hears the voices of her unborn children coming from the flames of the fire.

Barak enters to find his bed separated from his wife's. He is optimistic that this is only a temporary state of affairs. As they lie down, the voices of night-watchmen can be heard coming from outside.

Act II. In his introduction to the published libretto, Hofmannsthal says: 'The trials continue; all four must be cleansed – the dyer and his wife, the Emperor and the daughter of the spirits. The one pair is too much of the earth earthy, the other too full of pride and remote from the earth.'

The scene is again Barak's hut. The struggle to obtain the shadow continues. The Nurse tempts the woman with the apparition of a handsome youth, who appears each time the dyer is out of the hut. The woman believes it would be simple to deceive her husband, and yet does not quite dare to do so. Barak feels the change in her. He invites some beggar children to share in their meal.

The Emperor's falcon house in the forest. The Emperor has found his falcon, and follows it to the falcon house. There he sees his wife. He senses immediately that she has been in contact with the things of the earth.

Barak's hut. It is the third day and the Nurse continues her efforts to gain the shadow of the dyer's wife for the Empress. The Nurse and the dyer's wife go out of the hut together, leaving the Empress and Barak. As the curtain falls, it is obvious that she feels sympathetically towards Barak, and regrets what she is causing to happen to him and his wife.

The Empress's bedroom in the falcon house. The Nurse lies at the foot of the bed. The Empress has a vision of her husband wandering through tomb-like caves and hears the voice of the falcon: 'The woman throws no shadow; the Emperor must turn to stone.' She is much moved by this, but also touched by Barak's distress, which she is fully aware is caused by her actions.

Back in Barak's hut, the Nurse makes her final attempt to win the wife's shadow. Although it is midday, it is growing dark, a storm is brewing, and the three crooked brothers of Barak are howling in terror. The Nurse senses that there are supernatural powers at work over which she has no control, but assures the Empress of their ultimate attainment of their object. The Empress is appalled by the sufferings of men, but grateful that fate has led her to meet Barak, whose integrity has convinced her of the dignity of humanity. The climax of the scene comes when his wife tells Barak that she has been unfaithful to him and sold her shadow and her unborn children with it. To prove the truth of her words, the brothers light a fire and it is seen that she throws no shadow. Barak threatens to kill her, and as if by magic a sword is there to his hand. The Empress refuses to take the shadow at such a price, but the woman, overcome by remorse when she sees the result of her admission, tells Barak that she has not done what she has confessed, but has only wished in her imagination to do it.

As the Nurse tears the Empress from the scene, the earth opens and swallows up Barak and his hut.

Act III. Subterranean vault, divided by a thick wall in the middle. On one side is Barak, on the other his wife, each however unconscious of the presence of the other. In a famous passage, she wrestles with her conscience ('Schweigt doch, ihr Stimmen': Be silent, you voices), he tries to find consolation and peace for the two of them ('Mir anvertraut, dass ich sie hege': Entrusted to me, I'll cherish you).

The vault disappears, and when the clouds have dispersed we see the Empress and her Nurse enter in a boat. Trombone calls summon the Empress to the judgement hall where her father Keikobad presides. The Nurse wants to prevent her from entering, fearing Keikobad's anger more than death; her purpose now is to persuade the Empress to return to earth to continue her search for the shadow. But the Empress is determined to enter where she knows her husband is being judged. She bids the Nurse farewell for ever; the Nurse does not understand men and their struggles and the price they pay for their guilt. She herself has learned to love and understand them. She enters the Temple. The voices of Barak and his wife are heard calling for each other.

The Empress demands to know her place in the scheme of the universe. A voice from above tells her to drink of the Water of Life and the shadow of the woman will be hers and she will be human. But the voices of Barak and his wife are again heard, and the Empress refuses to drink and destroy them. She demands to see her father, her judge. The alcove is illuminated, and the Emperor appears, turned to stone except for his eyes, which can be seen pleading with her for life. In her desperation, she wants to rush to her husband's side, and her anguish is increased when she hears a voice call: 'The woman throws no shadow, the Emperor must turn to stone.' She is again urged to drink of the Water of Life, to gain the shadow and save her husband. It is her moment of supreme trial, and she falls to the ground in the agony of her inner struggle. Finally, a cry breaks from her lips: 'I will not.'

As soon as this cry is heard, the water disappears, and the Temple is brightly lit from above. The Empress rises to her feet and it can be seen that she throws a shadow. The Emperor descends from his alcove, the voices of their unborn children are heard singing from above, and in their happiness the Emperor and Empress embrace and fall on their knees to give thanks for deliverance from their trial.

The scene changes to a beautiful landscape, with a waterfall in the middle. The Emperor and Empress stand beside it. Below it can be seen the figures of Barak and his wife, who have found each other. The voices of unborn children complete the happiness of each couple.

H.

INTERMEZZO

Opera in two acts, text by the composer. Première, Dresden, 4 November 1924, with Lotte Lehmann, Joseph Correck. First performed Berlin, 1925, with Hussa, Scheidl, conductor Szell; Vienna, 1927, with Lehmann, Jerger, conductor Strauss; Cuvilliétheater, Munich, 1960, with Steffek, Prey; New York, 1963, with Curtin, Donald Bell; Edinburgh Festival, 1965 (Munich company), with Steffek, Prey; Glyndebourne, 1974, with Söderström.

| | |
|---|----------|
| Christine | Soprano |
| Little Franz, her eight-year-old son | Silent |
| Hofkapellmeister Robert Storch, her husband | Baritone |
| Anna, the chambermaid | Soprano |
| Baron Lummer | Tenor |
| The Notary | Baritone |
| His Wife | Soprano |
| Storch's skat partners ¹ | |
| Kapellmeister Stroh ² | Tenor |
| Commercial Councillor | Baritone |
| Justizrat ³ | Baritone |
| Kammersänger ⁴ | Bass |

Place: Grudlsee and Vienna

Time: The Nineteen-Twenties

Running Time: 2 hours 5 minutes

When the opera was first produced, emphasis was laid in newspaper reports on the fact that

¹ Strauss played regularly; these particular parties were apparently in Berlin at the beginning of the century.

² Stroh was the conductor Joseph Stransky, who was later associated with the New York Philharmonic.

³ An honour bestowed on legal dignitaries by the Emperor and perhaps equivalent to the British Q.C., or Queen's Counsel.

⁴ The Kammersänger was the heroic Wagnerian tenor Ernst Kraus, a member of the Berlin State Opera from 1896 to 1924 who sang at Bayreuth and Covent Garden.

the basis of the work was taken from incidents in the composer's private life. The emphasis can hardly be thought to have been misplaced, since Strauss himself took care that the sets were made to correspond with his own home at Garmisch, and Joseph Correck, the creator of the role of Hofkapellmeister Storch, wore a specially constructed mask to make his resemblance to Strauss more marked.

Act I. The dressing-room of the house of Kapellmeister Storch. Seven o'clock in the morning. Open suitcases everywhere indicate that Storch and his wife are busy packing. She is thoroughly bad-tempered, abusing the servants, complaining incessantly at her husband, and, when he seems inclined to answer back, reminding him that she comes of a much better family than he does; who is he, anyway?

After successive exhibitions of her short temper with maid and cook, Christine admits to the former that not the least of her husband's shortcomings in her view is his unvarying kindness and gentleness; if only he would stand up to her like a man and not give way so much, she would have far more respect for him. The telephone rings, and Christine is asked by a neighbour to go skating. She accepts.

An interlude (there are twelve in the course of the opera, and they constitute the chief means of sustained lyrical expression) leads us to a new scene: the toboggan track. Tobogganists cross the stage, but when it is Christine's turn she runs into a young man on skis. She is furious and abuses him, complaining that the fall hurt her very much – there is no word of whether he is injured or not. But when she discovers that he is the well-connected Baron Lummer, she is all over him and only too anxious that he should know she is the wife of the famous composer Storch. She asks him to come and visit her.

An interlude composed of waltzes and other dances takes us to an inn at Grundlsee, where Christine and the Baron are dancing. They converse, and one gathers that he is there for his health. The whole short scene is brilliantly alive; it is the music of the third act of Rosenkavalier transferred, shortened, and without any element of farce.

Dining-room in the Storchs' house. Christine reads a letter which she is writing to her husband, and in which she talks about the excellent young escort she has acquired for herself. At that very moment, in comes the Baron. They sit opposite each other reading the newspaper, and she asks him when he is going to begin his studies. His family apparently want him to read law, but he is anxious to take up the study of natural history, for which, without them, he has not the means. She says that he has only to wait until her husband is back, and he will not lack support.

The wistful music from the moment of the Baron's exit is combined with the interlude which follows it to make a concert excerpt, usually known as 'the Interlude from Intermezzo'. When the curtain rises, we are in the Baron's room in the house of the notary. He exclaims with impatience at the demands made upon him by Frau Storch. Can she really expect him to sit about with her in the evenings reading the newspapers! And all that talk about his studies ... and his ill-health. He is interrupted by a girlfriend, obviously come to keep an appointment; he will join her in a minute. He sits down to write a letter to his patroness (as he refers to her); he must have money.

Another interlude brings us again to the Storchs' dining-room. Christine has had the letter – a thousand marks, he asks for! He must be mad! At this moment the Baron himself puts in an appearance, and is immediately sent outside to wipe his shoes. She tells him that what he asks for is impossible; let him not spoil their agreeable relationship by insisting.

At this juncture, the maid brings in a note and hands it to her. It is addressed to Kapellmeister Storch, but Christine opens it, and exclaims in horror. She reads aloud: 'My darling. Do send me two tickets for the opera again tomorrow. Afterwards in the bar as usual! Your Mieke Meier.' The Baron is solicitous, but she sends him away, and when he is gone, she writes out a telegram: 'Who is Mieke Meier? Your infidelity discovered. Am leaving you for good.' She hustles the maid to pack all the suitcases: they are leaving the house – for good.

Another interlude. The child's bedroom. Christine sits by the side of his bed, crying. She abuses her husband, but the child will not listen: his father is good and kind, and it is she who is horrid and makes scenes. She kneels melodramatically at the foot of the bed and prays.

Act II. The 'skat' game. The scene is a comfortable sitting-room in the house of the Commercial Councillor. Round the 'skat' table sit the Justizrat, the Commercial Councillor, the Kammersänger, and Kapellmeister Stroh. The conversation which accompanies the game centres round the agreeable character of Storch, which contrasts so markedly with his highly disagreeable wife. When he arrives, Storch apologises for being late and then joins the game. They ask after his wife, and he tells them of the letter he has had in which she talks of her new-found friend the Baron. They cannot keep a hint of criticism from their tone when they refer to Christine, but Storch explains that he finds her extremely stimulating – in any case, her bristling exterior conceals the proverbial heart of gold.

A telegram comes for Storch, whose jocularly falls from him as he reads it. He gives it to Stroh and asks him to read it aloud. Stroh's comment is: 'What, do you know her too?' but Storch hurries out of the room in obvious distress, leaving the others to comment ironically but without malice on the surprising news that such an obviously model husband should turn out to be no better than the rest of them.

The scene changes to the office of the notary. Frau Kapellmeister comes in and demands a divorce. The notary assumes that this is because of the Baron, and is distinctly surprised to hear that Christine is convinced she has evidence against her husband.

A stormy interlude leads to the third scene, in the Prater in Vienna. Storm. Storch is seen wandering about. He has had no answer to his telegrams to Christine, no explanation even of the identity of the mysterious Mieze Meier. He cannot leave Vienna and his work on account of so ridiculous a misunderstanding, but his worry is very real. Stroh finds him and explains that the letter must have been meant for him; the two names are not dissimilar, and probably the volatile Mieze looked up his address in the telephone book, assuming that he – Stroh – was no less a man than the famous Hofkapellmeister. Storch is furious; Stroh must put right the whole ghastly muddle.

Christine's dressing-room. Packing and disorder. Christine vents her wrath on everybody and everything in sight, but she wishes she had not sent the Baron to Vienna to check up on Mieze Meier. Storch's telegrams have caused her to wonder whether there is not some mistake. Another telegram arrives, this time containing the news that Stroh is coming with a full explanation of the whole situation. Stroh is announced and the curtain falls as she goes out to hear what he has to say.

The dining-room, decorated for Storch's return. Christine is wildly excited, she must go and greet him. But she stops herself, and when he rushes in and tries to embrace her, she coldly gives him her hand. She contrives to nag in spite of Storch's obvious delight at seeing her, and seems to think that he must make amends in some way for what has happened. When she tells him she is sick of him and all other men, and he can go and make arrangements for a divorce, he rounds on her and gives her a much needed piece of his mind, then he leaves. She is astonished at his change in attitude, but at this juncture in comes the Baron. It appears that he has bungled the meeting with Mieze.

Storch comes back and pretends to be jealous of the Baron. Christine says he was quite agreeable for a bit, but rather a bore, particularly when he asked her for a thousand marks. Storch is delighted at this, and thinks it a great joke. All is set for their reconciliation, and when the curtain falls, they have made up all their differences, Christine even going so far as to comment what a happy marriage theirs is. H.

DIE AEGYPTISCHE HELENA

The Egyptian Helen

Opera in two acts, text by Hofmannsthal. Première at Dresden, 6 June 1928, with Rethberg, Rajdl, Taucher, Plaschke, conductor Busch. First performed Vienna, 1928, with Jeritza, Graarud, conductor Strauss; Berlin, 1928, with Müller, Laubenthal, Schorr, conductor Blech; Metropolitan, 1928, with Jeritza, Laubenthal, Whitehill, conductor Bodanzky; Vienna, 1970, with Gwyneth Jones, Jess Thomas, Glossop, conductor Krips. First U.K. performance, Garsington, 1997.

Helena (Helen), wife of Menelaus.....Soprano
Menelaus.....Tenor
Hermione, their child.....Soprano
Aithra, the daughter of an Egyptian King;
a sorceress.....Soprano
Altair.....Baritone
Da-Ud, his son.....Tenor
Servants of Aithra.....Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano
Three Elves.....Two Sopranos, Contralto
The Omniscient Sea-Shell.....Contralto

Place: Egypt

Time: 1193–1184 B.C. (after the Trojan War)

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

The Trojan war is over. Menelaus has killed Paris, the seducer of his wife Helena, and is now returning home with her. He has made up his mind that his honour, as well as the blood of the countless Greeks who died fighting for his cause, demands that Helena should pay the supreme price for what has been caused through her beauty, and he is determined to sacrifice her himself, either at sea or when they reach their native soil. But in a storm his ship is wrecked.

Act I. A great room in Aithra's palace. The Sea-Shell assures Aithra of Poseidon's love, but conjures up for her a description of Menelaus' ship, bearing the fairest of women, who is about to be murdered by her husband. Aithra has caused the storm which wrecked the ship, and it is not long before Menelaus enters the room, leading a golden-haired woman behind him. He feels that he must fulfil his vow and slay Helena, but she tries to entice him to her arms once again. Aithra intervenes and causes Menelaus to think he sees Paris and the Trojans once more rising against him. He rushes from the room after them, and Helena is comforted by Aithra, who gives her a potion to drink, which brings forgetfulness.

Menelaus returns convinced that he has killed two of the beings he was pursuing – Paris and Helena. He can see their blood on his dagger – but what he brandishes is spotless and shining. Aithra convinces him that for the past ten years he and the Greeks have been victims of a fantastic delusion; it was not Helena at all who was in Troy – she has been here these ten years, lying in a deep sleep, safe from the touch of man.

Aithra makes a sign, and Helena is visible to Menelaus, waking in all her beauty from her sleep. He is overjoyed, and cannot resist the happiness which the vision affords him. At Helena's insistence, Aithra transports them by her magic arts to a land where the name of Helena means nothing to man or woman. They go together over the threshold of a sleeping chamber, and Aithra watches the triumph of her scheme while she prepares to effect a transformation of their state.

Act II. A tent opening wide on to a palm grove, behind which the Atlas Mountains are visible. Helena and Menelaus awaken after their magic flight. Helena expresses her ecstasy: 'Zweite Brautnacht! Zaubernacht, überlange!' (A second wedding night! Night of magic!). But Menelaus is only half restored to her; for him, she is still a phantom, conjured up by the magic arts of Aithra, and his conscience is occupied with the murder – he thinks of it as that – of Helena which he accomplished outside the palace of Aithra. It is as the widower of Helena that he thinks of himself.

To visit Helena comes a chieftain of the desert, Altair by name, with his followers. He salutes the Queen reverently, and then, as Menelaus takes his place behind her with drawn sword in his hand, commands his followers led by his son, Da-Ud, to do obeisance before her. Menelaus shows signs of being jealous of Da-Ud – is he not like Paris? – but Helena tries to comfort him. Altair invites Menelaus to join the hunt, and offers him Da-Ud as his guide. As he departs, Altair shows his contempt for Menelaus, but makes no secret of his admiration of Helena.

While Menelaus makes ready for the hunt, Da-Ud throws himself at Helena's feet and declares his devotion and adoration of her, but Helena takes no more notice of his protestations than she has of Altair's. Menelaus departs, but refuses to give up his sword, which Helena wants to take from him but which he insists on having with him for the hunt.

Aithra and attendants come to Helena. Aithra reveals that she has not only given Helena the draught which brings eternal forgetfulness of all that is unpleasant, but has also in error provided her with the antidote. She has come to remove this. But Helena proclaims that this alone can convince Menelaus that she is Helena and not a nymph conjured up by Aithra to take Helena's place in his bed. She bids the slaves mix the potion using the remembrance draught.

Altair appears at the entrance of the tent, and declares his passion for Helena. Slaves describe the progress of the hunt, but their voices change from excitement to horror as they perceive that Menelaus and Da-Ud are engaged in deadly combat. Soon it is evident that Menelaus has triumphed, and Da-Ud's dead body is borne in to the sound of solemn music.

Menelaus appears not to understand that he has slain the son of his host, but, while the slaves gather to bid him and Helena to Altair's feast, Helena and her attendants busy themselves over the mixing of the potion which will restore his memory to him. Helena bids him drink, and herself sets the example. Menelaus takes the cup, and, for a moment after he has drunk, it looks as though he will kill her. Then he drops his sword and gazes at his wife, recognising her and stretching out his arms as though to grasp a shadow.

Altair dashes in as though to take Helena by force and with the help of his slaves separate her from her husband. But at the same moment appears Aithra at the head of cohorts of her supernatural followers, and commands Altair not to presume to raise his hand against her or the woman she would protect. In the middle of Aithra's troops stands Hermione, the daughter of Helena and Menelaus. The opera comes to an end after she has asked her father: 'Where is my beautiful mother?' All is forgiven and forgotten, and Helena and Menelaus enter together upon a new life. H.

ARABELLA

Opera in three acts, text by Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Première Dresden, 1 July 1933, with Ursuleac, Bokor, Kremer, Jerger, Plaschke, conductor Clemens Krauss. First performed Vienna, 1933, with Lehmann, Jerger, conductor Krauss; Covent Garden, 1934, with artists of première; Genoa, 1936, with della Rizza, Jerger, conductor Strauss; Salzburg, 1947, with Reining, della Casa, Hotter, conductor Böhm; Covent Garden, 1953, with della Casa, Uhde, conductor Kempe; New York, Metropolitan, 1955, with Steber, Gueden, London, conductor Kempe; English National Opera, 1980, with Barstow, Burrowes, Glossop, conductor Mark Elder.

Graf WaldnerBass
 Adelaide, *his wife*Mezzo-Soprano
 Arabella, *their daughter*Soprano
 Zdenka, *Arabella's younger sister*Soprano
 Mandryka, *a Croatian landowner*Baritone
 Matteo, *an officer*Tenor
 Graf ElemerTenor
 Graf DominikBaritone
 Graf LamoralBass
 The 'Fiakermilli'Soprano
 A Fortune-TellerSoprano
 Welko, Djura, Jankel, Servants of Mandryka; Guests at the Ball

Place: Vienna

Time: 1860

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Strauss asked his librettist Hugo von Hofmannsthal for something in the vein of Der Rosenkavalier – a romantic comedy, with a Viennese background and opportunity for waltzes. The libretto was written in 1928 and revised in 1929, the last section reaching the composer only days before Hofmannsthal's sudden death in July 1929. The composer appears to have been inhibited from making changes in his distinguished collaborator's libretto.

Act I. There is no prelude and the curtain rises to show a salon in an hotel in Vienna. We soon learn that the fortunes of the Waldner family are very low indeed. Graf Waldner is a gambler and has been losing heavily, and the only hope for the future seems to lie in matching the beautiful Arabella with a rich suitor. Zdenka, the younger child, has been brought up as a boy, as her parents always wanted one and Adelaide insists that they cannot possibly afford to have two daughters coming out near the same time.

Adelaide is having her fortune told, and Zdenka, dressed in boy's clothes, is making excuses for her parents to the tradesmen who call to talk about their unpaid bills. Zdenka is left alone, and shortly afterwards a young officer, Matteo, who is desperately in love with Arabella, comes in. He asks for news of his beloved from Zdenka whom, like everyone else, he believes to be her brother (and therefore Zdenko). Arabella has not looked at him for days, and if it were not for the wonderful letter she wrote him a day or two ago, he would be in complete despair. He threatens to go away or kill himself if Arabella continues to ignore him. When he has gone, Zdenka reveals her perturbation; she is in love with Matteo herself and it is she who wrote him the letter.

There follows a scene between the two sisters. Arabella as usual has presents from her three noble suitors, and from Matteo as well, but she has no real interest in any of them, and Zdenka's pleading for Matteo affects her little. One day the right man will come along, and she will know him straight away ('Aber der Richtige, wenn's einen gibt für mich'):

The two voices join in a charming and typically Straussian duet, whose theme¹ is frequently heard in the course of the opera. Arabella is confident in the future, even though it is the end of Carnival and she should decide which suitor she will accept before the night is over.

Elemer, one of the three suitors, comes to take Arabella for a ride in a sleigh; she says she will be ready in half an hour. When Elemer has gone, Arabella asks Zdenka if she has noticed the stranger whom she has seen during the past day or two from her room, and who, she thinks, looks extremely attractive. No sooner has she spoken than he appears again in the street but he goes away without so much as looking up at the window.

The parents come back into the room and send their daughters out. The Count has been losing again, and is depressed that he finds only bills waiting for him, and no word from any of his regimental cronies, to all of whom he has written for help in his financial embarrassment. There was one in particular, rich and eccentric, Mandryka by name, whom he thought would never fail him. Adelaide tells him she has dreamed all will go well. A servant announces that there is a gentleman to see Graf Waldner. It turns out to be Mandryka, nephew and heir of the Count's old comrade. He has fallen in love with the photograph of Arabella which Waldner sent with his letter, and in a mixture of formality and open-heartedness asks for her hand in marriage. To pay for his journey to Vienna he says he sold some woods, and he offers Waldner a couple of thousand-gülden notes. The latter can hardly believe his senses, and when Mandryka has gone, he imitates his tone of voice: 'Teschek, bedien' dich' (Please, help yourself!).

The listener might be forgiven for believing this the greatest scene for a male singer in any Strauss opera – a totally credible representation in music of the coup de foudre, greater than anything he had written for Ochs von Lerchenau, its only musical rival to be found perhaps in the role of Barak in Die Frau ohne Schatten. The scene early in Act II when Mandryka finally face to face (as opposed to through the intermediary of her father) confronts Arabella with his declaration of love only acts as corroborative to the earlier scene; it does not supersede it but confirms the impression we have formed. The coup de foudre never risked turning into a fly-by-night.

There is a short scene between Zdenka and Matteo, in which the latter shows his desperate anxiety to know whether he can yet have the letter from Arabella which Zdenka promised him she was writing. He is told he may have it that night at the Fiakerball (a ball to which everyone goes in costume: a 'Fiaker' was a two-horse cab). He leaves, and Arabella comes in ready for her drive with Elemer. Zdenka refers to him as 'dein Elemer' (your Elemer), and the sound of the words has a romantic ring in Arabella's ears as she repeats them to start the act's finale. The idea of the romantic stranger is much more attractive to her, and even the horrid thought that he may be already married is not enough to dampen her enthusiasm.

Act II. A ballroom. Arabella, very much the queen of the ball, comes downstairs with her mother and several attendant cavaliers, to be introduced by her parents to Mandryka, who is waiting below, and in whom Arabella recognises the stranger she has seen from her window. She is left alone with him, and sits down, refusing a dance to each of her other suitors in turn. He is a widower, as he gently and touchingly explains. His impassioned language astonishes her, but she is completely fascinated and convinced that she has found the right man in him: 'Und du wirst mein Gebieter sein' (My lord and master you shall be). Their love duet is impassioned enough to suggest to us that she is right. During its course, Mandryka conveys the information that in his country a glass of water is given by a girl to her prospective fiancé in token of engagement.

She asks to be allowed an hour at the ball to say goodbye to the things which have made up her girlhood. At that moment, the rest of the guests crowd around her, and the Fiakermilli – a pretty girl dolled up to the nines – curtsies and brings her a bouquet. She sings a coloratura polka song for Arabella's entertainment, after which Arabella goes off to dance with Dominik.

Waldner's reaction to the news of Arabella's engagement is naturally one of delight. Matteo, however, is heart-broken, not at the news (which he has not heard), but because Arabella has not looked in his direction all evening. Zdenka, however, does her best to reassure him, and says that Arabella relies on his love, though she may not find ways of showing it. Mandryka orders champagne for everyone present at the ball; no one shall be left out when he is as happy as he now feels himself. Arabella says goodbye to her three suitors, whom she must relinquish now that she has found the right man.

¹ Slavonic in origin.

Zdenka reappears and gives Matteo a letter, which she says is from Arabella. It contains the key of Arabella's room, according to Zdenka, and she insists that if the unbelieving Matteo come to that room in quarter of an hour, he will receive everything that he most longs for. Mandryka overhears the conversation and cannot believe his ears. He decides there must be another Arabella perhaps in the same hotel, but, when he cannot find his fiancée, is forced to the conclusion that his worst suspicions are justified, and that it must be she who made the assignation. In desperation, Mandryka flirts with the Fiakermilli. A note from Arabella is handed to him: she has gone home but will be his tomorrow. Arabella's parents go off to the hotel with Mandryka to find her.

Act III. A lounge in the hotel, with staircase leading upstairs. Night. There is a short prelude,¹ and when the curtain goes up Matteo is seen about to come down the stairs. He hides when he hears a bell. Arabella comes in, smiling happily. Music from the ball plays around her as she sings of the happiness which she and Mandryka will enjoy amidst his fields and forests. Matteo reappears and is astonished to see Arabella in the hall. She can make no sense at all of his ardour and his insinuations, and he for his part cannot understand her coldness and apparent heartlessness.

In the middle of their misunderstanding, Arabella's parents arrive with Mandryka, who immediately recognises Matteo as the man he saw receive the key at the ball and is now convinced of the worst. He remains unpersuaded by Arabella's protestations of innocence, tempers rise, and a duel between Mandryka and Matteo is only prevented by the sudden appearance of Zdenka, in a negligée and with her hair down. She rushes down the stairs, and says that she only wants to say goodbye before throwing herself into the Danube. Arabella says she will stand by her whatever her trouble, and Zdenka eventually stammers out that it was she who sent the note to Matteo, and the key inside it was to her room, not Arabella's. The room was dark, and Matteo could not have known that it was not Arabella.

Mandryka tries to put his shame and sorrow into words, but Arabella turns to Zdenka without a glance in his direction and thanks her for teaching her to follow the dictates of her heart. Prompted by Arabella and Mandryka – Arabella bears no malice – Waldner agrees to give Zdenka's hand to Matteo, and the crowd, which has been attracted by the noise, begins to disperse. Arabella tells Mandryka that there must be no attempt at explanation between them until morning; she would however be grateful if one of his servants could fetch her a glass of clear, cold water. She would find it refreshing after the tumult of the evening's events. She goes slowly up the stairs without another word.

Mandryka is waiting dejectedly below when at the top of the stairs appears Arabella. Holding the glass of water in her hand she makes her way slowly down and offers it to him. The opera ends with their love duet: 'Das war sehr gut, Mandryka'. H.

DIE SCHWEIGSAME FRAU

The Silent Woman

Opera in three acts, text by Stefan Zweig, freely adapted from Ben Jonson's comedy Epicoene, or the Silent Woman. Première, Dresden, 24 June 1935, with Cebotari, Sack, Kremer, Ahlsmeyer, Plaschke, conductor Böhm. The opera was frowned on by the Nazis,² and after very few performances was removed from the Dresden repertory. First performed Zürich, 1936, with Moor, Emmerich, Oegg, conductor Denzler; la Scala, Milan, 1936, with Carosio, Sinnone, Stabile, Bettoni, conductor Marinuzzi; New York, City Opera, 1955, with Joan Carroll; Komische Oper, Berlin, 1956, in Felsenstein's production, with Arnold, Reinmar; Salzburg, 1959, with Gueden, Wunderlich, Prey, Hotter, conductor Böhm; Covent Garden, 1961 (in English), with Barbara Holt, MacDonald, David Ward, conductor Kempe.

Sir Morosus Bass
His Housekeeper Contralto
The Barber Baritone

¹ Used as a bridge passage when Acts II and III are played without interval, a Munich innovation.

² Strauss's letter to the Jewish Stefan Zweig (referring to the Nazis as a passing phase in German life) has been much quoted; then, against him, but more recently as expressing his true sentiments vis-à-vis Hitler. Zweig committed suicide in 1942.

| | |
|-------------------------------|--------------------|
| Henry Morosus..... | Tenor |
| Aminta, his wife | Coloratura Soprano |
| Isotta | Coloratura Soprano |
| Carlotta | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Morbio..... | Baritone |
| Vanuzzi | Bass |
| Farfallo..... | Bass |

Actors and Neighbours

Place: A Room in Sir Morosus's House in a London Suburb

Time: About 1780

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

Hofmannsthal died in 1929, leaving behind him the libretto of Arabella, but after his death Strauss had to look round for a new collaborator. His choice fell upon Stefan Zweig, and together they turned to Ben Jonson for inspiration, Zweig having already had considerable success with his German version of Volpone.

Act I. After an overture, described by the composer as a Potpourri, the scene is a room in Sir Morosus's house. It is untidy, and the bric-à-brac about the room indicates that it belongs to a former seaman. We are straight away introduced to the mainspring of the action, Schneidebart, the barber, who is approached by Sir Morosus's housekeeper with the suggestion that he should implant the idea in Sir Morosus's head that he wants to get married and that she is just the person. Life is impossible in the house, what with his exaggerated notions about eliminating any kind of noise, and anyhow he needs a wife. The barber is properly scornful of her suggestion, but at this moment Morosus himself comes in, fulminating about the noise.

While he is being shaved, he launches into a diatribe against the perpetrators of the pollution of noise, by which he is surrounded and from which he can find no means of escape. He sings sadly of his loneliness; could he only find someone to care for him, his life would acquire the purpose which it lacks. At the end of the opera the melody is developed into a grateful hymn of thanksgiving for peace. The barber suggests he should marry a young and silent wife, and, when told there is no such thing, offers to find one. Morosus, although objecting that he is too old, is obviously not averse to considering the suggestion.

The noise of someone trying to gain admittance to his room causes a further tantrum, but when the intruder turns out to be his nephew Henry, whom he had thought dead, his displeasure turns to extravagant rejoicing. He must be received with all honour. Henry starts to tell him he has his troupe with him. Morosus misunderstands him and thinks he has said 'troops', and the initial joy turns to fury when he discovers Henry is a member of a theatrical company. He refuses even to accept Aminta, Henry's wife, as his niece, insults them all, disinherits Henry, and orders the barber to find him a wife forthwith, and moreover to bring a priest with him when he brings her to the house.

Consternation follows Sir Morosus's withdrawal, but it soon gives place to a discussion of ways and means of taking revenge on the old curmudgeon. Henry says he is happy in his love and would not barter it for a house made entirely of gold. The barber reminds him that he is throwing away quite a large fortune, but he and Aminta sing a love duet amid expressions of admiration from the troupe. The barber sees a possible solution in the task which has been set him; it will not be easy to find a silent woman – why should Aminta, Isotta and Carlotta not be dressed up and produced as candidates next morning? Schneidebart says he will take all arrangements into his own hands, and everyone is delighted, except Aminta, who says she would prefer to move the old man to fall in with the situation rather than trick him into it. But she accepts the suggestion, and they make their plans.

Act II. The same room, the afternoon of the next day. Morosus is warned by his housekeeper that some sort of intrigue is brewing, but he will not listen to her, and continues to array himself in his smartest clothes. The barber comes in to say that he has brought three girls with him, and warns the old man that he should not be too ardent with them. Is he likely to eat them? demands Morosus angrily.

When they present themselves for his inspection, the three actresses impersonate three quite different types: Carlotta is a country girl, Isotta a young lady of fashion, and Aminta is dressed simply and unpretentiously. Their conversation matches their clothes: Carlotta is a hopeless bumpkin with a hideous accent, and Morosus soon dismisses her; Isotta's high-flown pretentious talk culminates in an effort to read his hand, and she also is sent packing; but Aminta behaves naturally and Morosus is obviously impressed by her demeanour. After listening to her for a bit, Morosus tells the barber that Aminta is the one for him (she calls herself Timida). When they are left alone it becomes apparent that he is genuinely touched by her youth and beauty, and he attempts to apologise for what must look to her a poor bargain, she is so young, and he so old. Aminta also seems to regret the part she has undertaken to play.

But the scheme is well under way, and Schneidebart returns with two members of the company dressed up as a priest and a notary. The mock marriage is concluded, but no sooner is it over than more members of the company come in, proclaiming that they are old shipmates of Sir Morosus and mean to celebrate with him. This they proceed to do and it is some time before his furious protests are successful in getting rid of them.

Morosus and Aminta are alone, and in an aside she reveals that she has no relish for the part she has to play. It is a question of Don Pasquale all over again. Aminta makes scene after scene; she is the mistress of the house, and his wishes have no significance at all. Morosus is dumbfounded, until rescued by Henry, who sends Aminta out and consoles his old uncle. The act ends after a short scene between Henry and Aminta, in which she tells him how she disliked ill-treating the old man; but she consoles herself with the thought that it was only done for her husband's sake.

Act III. The scene is the same. Before the curtain rises, the noise of vigorous hammering is heard, and the scene discloses a troop of workmen redecorating the room under Aminta's orders. Henry, in disguise and with another member of his company as accompanist, gives Aminta a singing lesson. This is the last straw, and Morosus is on the verge of despair when the barber comes in to announce that the Chief Justice of England is on his way to the house, and everything is prepared for a divorce. Aminta rejects the idea out of hand, but the legal party makes its appearance and proceeds to rehearse in dog Latin the grounds on which a divorce can be granted. Isotta and Carlotta witness that Sir Morosus is by no means the first man Timida has known, and Henry, disguised, admits that he has known her intimately. Timida swears she has known but one man – her husband. But the Chief Justice, although agreeing that there is evidence of promiscuity, rules that what took place before marriage is no grounds for divorce. Morosus nears the end of his tether and threatens to commit suicide if he cannot obtain his freedom.

In his misery he throws himself on his bed, and, at a signal from the barber, Henry and Aminta go up to him and explain the truth; it has all been a hoax. He is at first bewildered, then furious, and then bursts out laughing; he may have been close to suicide, but it cannot be denied they put on a wonderful show! He confesses himself willing to hear all their operas if they can make him laugh as much as he has laughed today, at himself. The rejoicing is general, and when he, Aminta, and Henry are alone, Morosus sings happily of the peace which he has at last found. He sinks back in his chair, and sighs with contentment. H.

FRIEDENSTAG

Peace Day

Opera in one act, text by Joseph Gregor. Première, Munich, 24 July 1938, with Ursuleac, Patzak, Ostertag, Hotter, Hann, Weber, Wieter, conductor Clemens Krauss (the opera is dedicated to Ursuleac and Krauss). First performed Berlin, 1939, with Ursuleac, Prohaska, Bockelmann, Sinimberghi, conductor Krauss; Zürich, 1939, with Annie Weber, Stig, Emmerich, conductor Denzler; Venice, 1940, with Grandi, Valentino, Rakowski, Cassinelli, conductor Gui. Revived Munich, 1961, with Hillebrecht, Metternich, conductor Keilberth; Los Angeles (University of Southern California), 1967; B.B.C. broadcast (in English), 1971, conductor Edward Downes.

Commandant of the Beleaguered Town.....Baritone
 Maria, his wife.....Soprano
 Sergeant.....Bass
 CorporalBaritone
 A Private SoldierTenor
 A Musketeer.....Bass
 A Bugler.....Bass
 An OfficerBaritone
 A Front-Line OfficerBaritone
 A PiedmonteseTenor
 The Holsteiner, commanding the besieging army....Bass
 Burgomaster.....Tenor
 BishopBaritone
 A Woman of the People.....Soprano
 Soldiers of the Garrison and of the Besieging Army, Elders of the Town and Women of the Deputation to the Commandant, Townspeople

Place: The Citadel of a Beleaguered Town during the Thirty Years War

Time: 24 October 1648

Running Time: 1 hour 10 minutes

The scene shows the great circular room in the citadel. A gallery with loopholes runs round at about a man's height. One staircase leads to the upper storey of the fortress, another descends.

The soldiers discuss the garrison's increasingly dire situation, a Piedmontese sings a mournful ditty, but from far off can be heard the sound of the townspeople, already afoot and crying that their hunger can no more be borne.

To the sound of a mournful march and with the cries of 'Hunger! Bread!' still sounding from outside, the town elders enter, led by the Burgomaster and the Bishop. Suddenly, the musket-butts strike the ground, and the Commandant appears on the upper stairway. He is a handsome man of about fifty. He warns the deputation that he will hear them but that his answer to anything they may say which involves a cowardly action on his part will be violent – he seizes a musket from a soldier and throws it down at their feet as he speaks. Burgomaster and Bishop plead with him to allow the surrender of the town, but he will not listen to their arguments.

An officer announces to the Commandant that all the ammunition is spent; will he give the order that more be fetched from the secret cellars, where they all know there is a plentiful supply? The Commandant refuses, but bids them trust him. He reads aloud the Emperor's message which reached him only the previous day; it bids them hold out at all costs. But the cries of the deputation redouble in urgency, the crowd shouts for peace, and eventually the Commandant says he is ready to agree to their demands; let them only wait until midday before the surrender takes effect. He himself will give the signal, a rousing, flashing sign which all will recognise.

The deputation departs well content with what it has achieved, but it is clear a moment later that the Commandant, rather than surrender, plans to set fire to his arsenal and so blow himself and his garrison sky-high.

The stage is empty for a moment, but from below comes Maria, the Commandant's wife. She is younger than he is, and she muses on the situation in which all find themselves. Her monologue ends with a paean of praise to hope, which has returned with the rising sun, which now shines brightly through the loophole.

Maria tries to persuade her husband, who enters at that moment, to confide in her why he looks so different from usual. He urges her to escape since the citadel and all within it are doomed to die. She thanks the sun for the light it has shed on her life; it has melted the heart she had thought frozen, it has removed the look that worried her so much. She will not be parted from the husband she loves so much, be it in life or in death, in peace or in war.

They embrace. The light has grown dimmer during their duet. The soldiers come one by one into the room, last of all the sergeant, with the fuse in his hand. The Commandant motions him towards the arsenal. Suddenly, the sound of a cannon shot is heard. It is the sign the Commandant has hoped for; it means the enemy is attacking. But no enemy can be seen advancing, and instead bells begin to ring out from the town, one after another, bells which have not been heard since the days of peace, almost longer ago than anyone can remember.

A moment later the Burgomaster is up the stairs and into the room, a changed man from the time when he led the deputation to pray for surrender. Peace has now come. The Commandant protests that he will not surrender, but to the sound of a march the Holsteiner's troops enter the citadel, their commander at their head. His voice can be heard from outside demanding to know where his noble, lion-hearted foe is to be found, that he may embrace him. But the Commandant returns harsh words for kind, and refuses to shake the hand which the Holsteiner proffers him. He draws his sword, and the Holsteiner puts his hand on his, but Maria throws herself between the two men. She begs her husband to acknowledge that at long last love and brotherhood have come into the lives of all of them instead of hatred and strife. He looks at her, and then throws away his sword and embraces the Holsteiner. The opera ends with an extended hymn to peace, in which all the soloists join. H.

DAPHNE

Opera in one act, text by Joseph Gregor. Première, Dresden, 15 October 1938, with Teschemacher, Jung, Ralf, Kremer, conductor Böhm (given in a double bill with Friedenstag). First performed Berlin, 1939, with Cebotari, Ralf, Anders, conductor Krauss; la Scala, Milan, 1942, with Cigna, Gallo, conductor Marinuzzi; Buenos Aires, 1948, with Bampton, Kindermann, Svanholm, Dermota, conductor Erich Kleiber. Revived Munich, 1950, with Kupper, Fischer, Fehenberger, Hopf, conductor Jochum; Vienna, 1950, with Kupper, conductor Moralt; New York, Town Hall, 1960, with Gloria Davy; Munich, 1964, with Bjoner, Madeira, Uhl, conductor Keilberth.

Peneios, a fisherman Bass
Gaea, his wife Contralto
Daphne, their daughter Soprano
Leukippos, a shepherd Tenor
Apollo Tenor
Four Shepherds Baritone, Tenor, Two Basses
Two Maids Sopranos

Place: Near Peneios' Hut

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

There is a short pastoral introduction, after which the curtain rises to show Peneios' hut and the landscape round it. Heralded by the sound of their flocks, the four shepherds appear in pairs and discuss the forthcoming feast-day in honour of Dionysus, which is traditionally the time for lovers' mating. The last rays of the sun light up the stage as Daphne comes in. In a long monologue she reveals her love of nature and identification of herself with the trees and flowers around her; the prospect of the festivity gives her no pleasure.

Leukippos, her childhood playmate, tells her how much he loves her. She refuses to accompany him to the festival, at the same time, however, telling him that her affection for him is by no means gone although she characterises it as sisterly. Gaea has heard the end of their conversation, and she comes to bid her daughter dress herself for the party. The time will come when she will open her heart to love. Daphne listens to her mother, but will not dress up in the clothes the maids bring for her. The maids hear the sound of Leukippos' lamentations. They determine to help him to win Daphne's love, and offer to dress him up in the clothes she has rejected.

As light dies away, the dignified figure of Peneios appears, accompanied by Gaea and the shepherds. He points to the light which still shines on Mount Olympus; the day will yet come when the gods will return among men. In spite of murmurs of protest from the shepherds, he affirms his belief that Apollo will come to them, and suggests they prepare a great feast to receive him worthily. Peneios laughs and is answered by a mysterious echo. A stranger appears –

Apollo dressed as a herdsman – and greets the company. He tells them his cattle had run wild, and he has only just succeeded in rounding them up. Gaea and the shepherds laugh at Peneios for this mundane realisation of his prophecy that Apollo would visit them. He answers by sending for Daphne and bidding her look after the stranger.

When Daphne appears, Apollo is amazed at her beauty, and calls her 'Sister'. She is taken aback by the compliments he pays her, but starts to do her parents' bidding, and puts a blue cloak round his shoulders. She feels an affinity with him, and asks him his true identity. In enigmatic language, he explains that he saw her from his chariot. She does not understand who he is, but starts to tell him how she hates to be parted from the sun, whereupon he repeats sentences to her from her opening monologue. She sinks on his breast, and rejoices in his promise that she will never again be parted from the sun. For a time she is hidden in the blue of his cloak, but suddenly tears herself free. Apollo declares that he loves her, and tells her to listen to the distant chanting; it is the voice of lovers. But Daphne is full of fear; Apollo told her he was her brother, and now he talks of love.

A procession, led by Peneios and Gaea, approaches, and Daphne joins the women, Apollo the men. They sing the praises of Dionysus, and the feast begins. Leukippos, who is dressed up among the women, invites Daphne to join their dancing. No sooner has she done so than Apollo bursts out in complaint that Peneios and his daughter are the victims of deception. With the sound of a thunderclap, he disrupts the feast, whereupon Leukippos reveals himself as a suitor for Daphne's hand. In a fiery passage he begs her to follow him. Daphne complains that she is being doubly deceived, both by the playmate of her youth, and by the stranger, who is not what he seems to be. Apollo reveals himself as the sun, and in the dispute which follows Daphne's refusal to bind herself to either of her suitors, Apollo wounds Leukippos with an arrow.

In a scene with the dying man, Daphne discovers that her lover was a god, and blames herself for Leukippos' death. Apollo watches her, spellbound by her beauty and full of regret for his action in killing Leukippos. He asks Dionysus to forgive him for having caused the death of one of his disciples, and, begging Zeus to pardon him that he strayed outside his sphere in interfering with mortals, he asks that he be given Daphne, not in mortal guise but transformed into imperishable form as one of the trees she loves so well. From her branches, men will in future cut the wreaths reserved for those who are best and bravest among them. Gradually Daphne changes into a laurel tree, and her voice is heard celebrating her altered state.

H.

DIE LIEBE DER DANAE

The Love of Danae

Opera in three acts, text by Joseph Gregor. The opera was in rehearsal during the late summer of 1944, but a Nazi edict closing the theatres following the plot against Hitler's life prevented a public performance. In the event, Die Liebe der Danae was heard at a well-attended dress rehearsal (16 August), conducted by Clemens Krauss and with a cast headed by Ursuleac, Taubmann, and Hotter. The official première was at the Salzburg Festival, 14 August 1952, with Kupper, Gostic, Szemere, Schöffler, conductor Krauss. First performed in Vienna, 1952, with Kupper, Gostic, Patzak, Poell, conductor Krauss; la Scala, Milan, 1952, with Dow, Gostic, Ego, conductor Krauss; Covent Garden, 1953, with Kupper (later Rysanek), Vandenburg, Frantz, conductor Kempe; Los Angeles, 1964 (in English).

| | |
|--|---------------------------|
| Jupiter | Baritone |
| Mercury | Tenor |
| Pollux, King of Eos | Tenor |
| Danae, his daughter | Soprano |
| Xanthe, her servant | Soprano |
| Midas, King of Lydia | Tenor |
| Four Kings, nephews to Pollux | Two Tenors, Two Basses |

Four Queens

| | |
|---------------|---------------|
| Semele | Soprano |
| Europa | Soprano |
| Alcmene | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Leda | Contralto |

Four Watchmen Basses

Chorus of Creditors, Servants and Followers of Pollux and Danae, People

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

As early as the spring of 1920, Hofmannsthal sent Strauss a scenario under the title Danae, or the prudent marriage. Strauss had not taken up the suggestion by the time Hofmannsthal died but he remembered it later, and he eventually persuaded Gregor to write a text after Hofmannsthal's theme.

The composition was finished in June 1940, so that though Die Liebe der Danae was the last of Strauss's operas to reach public performance, its composition in fact antedates that of Capriccio by some two years.

Act I. The throne-room of King Pollux. It is shabby and there is only part of the golden throne left. One can see the former splendour, but now creditors besiege the hall and demand payment. The King appears and tries to pacify them, telling them that his nieces, the four most beautiful women alive, and their husbands, kings of the islands, have set out to find a husband for Danae, and that Midas, the richest man in the world whose touch turns anything to gold, is on his way to marry her. The crowd is sceptical and falls on the throne and plunders what is left.

An interlude depicts the Golden Rain. Bedchamber of Danae. She wakes and tells Xanthe, her maid, of her dream, in which she was surrounded and covered in gold. It fell on her lips and on her breasts, and she can hardly believe it was only a dream, so real and wonderful was the sensation of the gold. A march is heard in the distance, and Xanthe announces a new suitor. But Danae says that she will only accept the man who can bring her the gold.

A pillared hall in the palace; in the distance the sea. A large gathering – the King, his councillors, and his creditors – awaits the return of the emissaries. They announce that Midas is the new suitor, whose touch has turned even the portrait of Danae to gold. He sends a golden garland to Danae. A cry is heard – ‘A ship! A ship! A ship of gold!’ – and everyone rushes towards the harbour to greet Midas. Only Danae stays behind. It is her dream come true, and she determines that the bringer of gold shall be her bridegroom.

Midas comes in, dressed in simple clothes and saying he is Chrysopher, friend of Midas, come to prepare her to meet the King. She is obviously impressed by him and cannot conceal her disappointment that he is only the forerunner of her suitor. He for his part is reluctant to fulfil his bargain, and hand her over to his master.

The scene changes to the harbour, where the crowd exuberantly welcomes the supposed Midas, in reality none other than Jupiter clothed in golden raiment. Danae recognises him as the master of her golden dreams; but is he the master of her love? She faints, and the curtain falls.

Act II. In a magnificent bed-chamber, the four Queens are decorating the bridal bed. Jupiter enters, clothed from head to foot in gold. The four Queens know him, for in various guises he has been the lover of each of them – as cloud, bull, Amphitryon, and swan. He warns them not to give his disguise away, but they cannot restrain their jealousy that for Danae he is not content to stay in the form of gold, but has taken the form of a real man – and why the double deception over Midas? He explains that his love for Danae is great, and she is made even more desirable in his eyes because of her coldness and disdain of men. He hopes to find true love at last. As for the impersonation of Midas, that is done to deceive Juno, whose jealousy is stronger than ever, and whose punishments for those he has loved grow ever more severe. As he has taken the outward form of Midas, the real Midas can always take his place should Juno approach in anger. The four Queens praise his cunning, and try to entice him back to them.

Midas enters and the women leave the bridal chamber. Jupiter is jealous in case Midas should capture Danae's love, and reminds him that, when he conferred the golden touch upon him, it was with the condition that he should obey his every command. He has been made the richest man on earth, but should he now prove false to his bargain, he will forthwith change back into the donkey-driver Jupiter first knew. Jupiter leaves, a soft march announces the arrival of Danae, and Midas dons the golden clothes which Jupiter has left behind him.

Danae enters accompanied by the four Queens, who tell her that the object of her affections has formerly been the lover of each one of them; when they recognise Midas, they take fright, and disappear. Midas explains as much as he dares; he is the master of the gold, and yet not the suitor on the ship. Danae does not understand the mystery, but it is clear that she wants only him, and, when he turns everything in the room to gold, she knows it must be Midas. They fall into each other's arms. A thunderclap, and Danae is seen turned to a golden statue.

Midas curses himself and his gift. Jupiter appears and claims Danae as his, but Midas objects that she must come to life only for the sake of him whom she truly loves. They both offer her what it is in their power to give: Jupiter – golden dreams, temples, and divine honours; Midas – only his human love and poverty. Her voice is heard as though from afar off, choosing Midas. Danae and Midas disappear, and Jupiter alone laments the loss of what might have been. Danae was offered the fate of the gods, and she has chosen the fate of mortals.

Act III. An open road in the East. Danae and Midas are seen to wake up. Danae slowly begins to understand what has happened. Midas, the favourite of the god, has renounced riches and power and has returned to be the humble donkey-driver on account of his love for her. She is content.

The scene changes to a sunny forest in the mountains. Mercury, half god, half jester, reports to Jupiter that the episode of Danae has caused mirth among the gods, but has thrown everyone on Pollux's island into confusion. Jupiter is confronted by the four Queens, who have found their way to him with Mercury's help. They flatter him, and affect to regard the episode as an amusing trick played on Danae and designed to draw Juno's attention to her while he diverts himself with them. But soon Jupiter tires of them, and bids a final farewell to them, to his last and dearest love, and to earth.

Unfortunately for his plans, Pollux and his nephews and creditors have found him, and demand satisfaction for the deception which has been practised on them. On Mercury's advice, Jupiter lets money fall from the skies, and they all rush after it. Mercury recommends that Jupiter should not abandon his pursuit of Danae; now that she is poor, how much more easily will she succumb to the lure of gold than when she dwelt in a palace!

Midas' hut, simply but tidily kept. Danae sings of her love. Jupiter enters, dressed in the manner Midas has described to Danae as affected by the man who first gave him the gift of the golden touch. He tries to discover if Danae is discontented with her lot; he reminds her of her golden dreams, but she is proof against his temptations, and finally convinces him that she loves Midas. Jupiter is moved by her obvious faithfulness, and tells her the story of Maia, who was loved by the god and brought forth Spring. The duet is one of Strauss's most inspired passages. At its end, Jupiter recognises Danae's greatness, and she too is full of gratitude for his understanding. He thanks her and leaves. Midas' music is heard in the orchestra and she goes out to meet him.

CAPRICCIO

Opera in one act, text by Clemens Krauss. Première, Munich, 28 October 1942, with Ursuleac, Ranczak, Taubmann, Hotter, Höfermayer, Hann, conductor Krauss. First performed Zürich, 1944, with Cebotari, Rohs, Dermota, Kunz, Schöffler, conductor Böhm; Salzburg, 1950, with della Casa, Höngen, Dermota, Braun, Schöffler, conductor Böhm; Covent Garden, 1953, with Cunitz, conductor Heger; New York, Juilliard School, 1954, with Gloria Davy, Thomas Stewart; Glyndebourne, 1963, with Söderström, conductor Pritchard.

The CountessSoprano
 Clairon, *an actress*Contralto
 Flamand, *a musician*Tenor
 Olivier, *a poet*Baritone
 The Count, *the Countess's brother*Baritone
 La Roche, *director of a theatre*Bass
 Monsieur TaupeTenor
 Italian SingersSoprano, Tenor
 A Young Dancer
 The Major-DomoBass
 Eight ServantsFour Tenors, Four Bases
 Three MusiciansViolin, 'Cello, Cembalo

Place: A Château near Paris

Time: About 1775

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

From the earliest times its practitioners have been concerned with the theory and re-shaping of opera. Every opera ever written constitutes an acceptance of an old form or an attempt to introduce a new, and each example is a particular commentary on operatic form in general. But the commentary is customarily implicit in the work and not explicit as in Strauss's last opera Capriccio, in which he and Clemens Krauss took opera itself as subject (Capriccio was finished in 1942, and, though performed before Danae, was in fact the last opera on which the composer worked).

The scene is laid in France, at the time of Gluck's reform. At the house of the charming Countess, a number of people are discussing the theme 'Prima le parole, dopo la musica' (First the words, then the music), led by Flamand, a musician, and Olivier, a poet, who are rivals for the affections of the Countess as well as in their art. Arguing from a different angle is the Countess's brother, whose interest in music or poetry is mild, but whose regard for the stage, and most of all for Clairon, a leading actress, is quite the reverse. More professional in his practical attitude than the artists, more knowledgeable in his cynicism than the Count, is La Roche, a theatrical manager, who incidentally emerges as the strongest personality in a cast of types. Each character finds his attitude to opera reflected symbolically in his relationship to the Countess and the other guests.

Originally the opera was intended to be a short, one-act affair, designed to go with Friedenstag and Daphne, but in its final form it lasts nearly two hours and a half – and there is no interval. The opera has powerful attractions in the skill with which the operatic discussion is argued and the way in which composer and librettist have contrived to diversify the subject – to say nothing of the power of invention Strauss still shows in it.

We are in the salon of a château near Paris where plans are afoot to celebrate the birthday of the young widowed Countess Madeleine. Flamand has written a string sextet for the occasion, and he and Olivier are listening to the music, on whose qualities the theatre director La Roche seems already to have passed judgement by falling asleep in an armchair. He wakes to join in the discussion and they point out that this is the man in whose hands lies the fate of composers. La Roche believes in entertainment – splendid decor, top notes, beautiful women. He is for Italian opera and he cannot resist mentioning that even highbrow creative artists have their foibles: Olivier did not seem to disdain the talent – or the beauty – of the famous Clairon, who by happy chance is not only the subject of the Count's admiration but will arrive soon at the château to play opposite the Count in Olivier's play.

The Count and Countess come in from next door and the others quickly disappear. The Count clearly favours the poetic muse, perhaps because of his interest in Clairon. His sister equally obviously inclines towards music – but by no means to the exclusion of words. The Count is in no doubt about his sister's interest in the two artists and wonders aloud which she will eventually choose.

Re-enter La Roche, Flamand and Olivier, the first-named to announce that all is ready for the rehearsal of the birthday entertainment, which will consist of the new music by Flamand, Olivier's drama and finally an azione teatrale by his entire company. All discussion stops with the entrance of Clairon, who dominates proceedings as she greets the Countess and then enquires from Olivier if he has yet finished the play.

He has, and Clairon and the Count read the scene, which culminates in the Count's declamation of a sonnet.¹ He is congratulated and La Roche takes them all off into the theatre, leaving Flamand and Olivier with the Countess.

Olivier criticises the way the Count reads the sonnet and recites it to the Countess as a personal utterance. Flamand goes to the harpsichord and begins to improvise and eventually leaves the room with Olivier's manuscript. It is Olivier's chance to declare his love, which he does delicately and gently. Flamand returns to sing the sonnet he has just set ('Kein Andres, das mir so im Herzen loht') and the Countess and Olivier join their voices to his to make a trio of extraordinary beauty. Flamand and Olivier seem likely to quarrel about the true authorship of the sonnet, but the Countess decides the issue quite neatly: it is now hers!

La Roche takes Olivier away to rehearsal and Flamand in his turn is able to declare his love. He presses Madeleine to decide between him and Olivier, and she promises that he shall hear her answer next morning at eleven o'clock.

The sounds of rehearsal can be heard from next door (where the Prompter, to general amusement, is found to have fallen asleep) and the Countess orders refreshment to be brought in. She and the Count exchange thoughts on the progress of their affairs of the heart. He must not be too easily carried away by his feelings for Clairon, she advises him, only to have to admit that for her own part she is still undecided between poet and composer, but has already started to wonder whether an opera might not be the collaborative outcome of their interest in her.²

Rehearsal is over, and refreshments served while La Roche introduces a dancer for their delectation (Passepied, Gigue, Gavotte). During the course of the Gigue, Olivier tries unsuccessfully to make up to Clairon, and after the dancing is over the Count comments to Flamand that the dance is an aspect of art where his own contribution is entirely secondary. On the contrary, says Flamand; without music, it would never occur to anyone even to lift a foot.

A fugue ensues, described as 'discussion on the theme "Words on Music"'. Music goes deeper than words; words express thought with greater clarity; music is the art of the sublime; in the theatre, words and music must work together. The Count, Clairon and Olivier are against opera, but the director has a passion for bel canto, and at this point introduces two Italian singers who entertain the company with a duet in the Italian style.

The Count offers to take Clairon back to Paris, but the director now takes the opportunity of announcing the form the entertainment will take for the Countess's birthday. The first part of the act of homage will consist of a sublime allegory: 'The Birth of Pallas Athene'. This revelation and the details of the action provoke a torrent of abuse and disbelief and the assembled company expresses its feelings in the first part of a great octet, subtitled 'Laughing Ensemble'.

The Countess tries to mend matters and asks La Roche for an exposition of the second part of the play. This, he says, shall be heroic and highly dramatic: 'The Fall of Carthage'. He has hardly started to describe the magnificent spectacle in prospect when Olivier and Flamand begin to attack him, and the second part of the octet ensues (titled 'Dispute'). But La Roche does not take all this lying down and launches into a most effective defence. Olivier's verse is all right – when Clairon speaks it; Flamand's music will fit the salon, but the theatre needs something of greater moment. For his own part, he serves the eternal art of Theatre itself and he wants drama to show human beings in all their aspects and deal with every problem and possibility of every age. His moving defence ends with his own idea of an epitaph in which he proclaims himself the friend of comedy, a guardian angel of artists, the patron of serious art.

La Roche's declaration has won the day and all congratulate him. The Countess demands a collaboration between Flamand and Olivier, to the dismay of her brother who realises that she has commissioned an opera. In spite of his reservations, they start to discuss a subject – Ariadne? Daphne? No, says the Count; choose a theme which describes everyday life; write about today's events as all have lived them!

¹ A translation of a sonnet by Ronsard.

² Strauss wrote the opera without interval but at this point a break has been made, notably (but not exclusively) at Glyndebourne.

The idea is taken up and in the end La Roche sweeps off poet and musician, actress and her admirer, and the Countess retires to her room, leaving the salon to the care of eight servants. No sooner have they left than a voice comes from the darkness. It is Monsieur Taupe, the prompter, who has been asleep and now wonders how on earth he is to get home. The major-domo is almost ready to take him at his own valuation – without him the theatre could not function at all – and offers help in his predicament.

The salon is now lit only by the light of the moon and into it comes the Countess, elegantly dressed. The major-domo follows her in, lights the candles and gives her two messages: that her brother will not be home for supper that evening, and that the poet Olivier will call on her to learn how the opera should end – tomorrow, at eleven. The stage is set for the great final scene, one of Strauss's most splendid perorations and a hymn in praise of the beauty of the high female voice which leaves one in no doubt as to which side engages the composer's sympathy in the argument between words and music. In the course of the scene, the Countess comes to understand that, since the sonnet, these two men are as inextricably bound up in the art that between them they can produce as they are as rivals for her hand. She sings two verses of the sonnet, looks at herself in the looking-glass and realises that she cannot make the choice which will give the opera an ending. Either alternative seems trivial.

The major-domo solves the problem by announcing that supper is served. H.

IGOR FYODOROVICH STRAVINSKY

(born 17 June 1882, died 6 April 1971)

Stravinsky is one of the undisputed giants among composers of the twentieth century, over more than sixty years of which he strides as a colossus. Above all perhaps is his contribution to musical theatre. In ballet, he is supreme, prolific, various and consistent; his contribution to opera, if you believe that opera is drama conveyed through music and heightened in the process, is less momentous but also very telling.

Two quotations: 'Perhaps The Nightingale only proves that I was right to compose ballets since I was not yet ready for opera ...';¹ 'If I live to write another opera, I suspect it will be for the electronic glass tube and the Idiot Box, rather than for the early baroque stages of the world's present-day opera houses.'² If the first denotes retrospective uncertainty as to his initial approach to opera, surprising perhaps since he had been an operatic enthusiast in youth and was the son of a celebrated singer, the second is consistent with the search for form which is the history of his operatic endeavour. In over forty years of fairly consistent approach, he produced eight operas³ in as many forms, only one of full length, another without singing, two more usually associated with the ballet than with opera companies, another for television.

Let us from the outset narrow the field. Stravinsky wrote à propos The Rake's Progress: 'I believe music drama and opera to be two very, very different things. My life work is a devotion to the latter.' All the same, though he proclaims himself 'in the line of the classical tradition', right from the start he shows an unwillingness to accept a nineteenth-century concept of opera, inherited, say, from his teacher, Rimsky-Korsakov, for all the latter's influence on The Nightingale (1908: 1913–14). His chosen fairy story is quite unheroic in character, and he investigates what one might describe as the more private problems to which it gives rise. In L'Histoire d'un Soldat, he has made a virtue out of self-imposed necessity, contriving somehow, while writing a piece whose dimensions by definition are suitable for a village hall, to create something with a far wider relevance, hitting nerve centres unerringly with what the composer himself has described as '... characteristic sounds ... the scrape of the violin and the punctuation of the drums. The violin is the soldier's soul, and the drums are the diablerie'. Though his aim was different, one should perhaps note that Stravinsky with this 'economical' piece no more succeeded in creating a cheaper alternative to the standard repertory than did Britten a generation later with his chamber operas. Each produced good art but neither significantly cut costs.

¹ Stravinsky and Craft: Expositions and Developments, Faber, 1962.

² Stravinsky: 'Working notes for The Flood' in Dialogue and a Diary, Faber, 1968.

³ Rossignol, L'Histoire d'un Soldat, Renard, Mavra, Oedipus Rex, Perséphone (rated such in Loewenberg's Annals of Opera), The Rake's Progress, The Flood.

The aftermath of the war coincided with Stravinsky's 'exile' from Russia, and he continued to tap the vein of Russian fairy tale, exotic and fascinating to non-Russian ears, later more fully exploited in Les Noces. Renard (1917) and Mavra (1921), however different from each other, stand in relation to the later masterpiece as a kind of Parergon. Mavra, with its self-conscious evocation of early, Italian-influenced Russian operas, is almost as dense in texture as Les Noces (with of course a quite different vocal idiom). The two works, together with the greater Les Noces, represent important aspects of Stravinsky's search for operatic form.

In Oedipus Rex (1926–27) stylisation is carried much further than before, a 'dead' language used, action all but eliminated and allowed only at crucial moments, and the story is mostly in the hands of a non-singing narrator. All the same, the music conveys the theme's agonising inevitability every bit as well as any play on the subject, and new aspects of Stravinsky come into play; the violence of the music's hammer blows at critical moments (Jocasta's entry, the mid-way chorus, the Messenger), as well as an ability to convey pathos which contradicts the composer's published tenets (the listener who hears 'Lux facta est' unmoved has a stony heart indeed).

Perséphone (1933–34), with its curiously conceived dialogue between singer and dancer-narrator, could be deemed his least successful stage work, and in fact he did not again attempt musical theatre with words for nearly fifteen years. When he did, the result contained elements of throwback, and was so far from being through-composed as to be nearer Rossini than Wagner or Berg. All the same, The Rake's Progress (1948–51) contains its full measure of surprises, whether the extraordinary harpsichorddominated cemetery scene and its incredibly intense postlude, the ten-bar woodwind-accompanied discovery that Nick's revenge is to leave Tom mad, or the wealth of lyrical melody throughout the score, expressive and moving in a different way from anything in Stravinsky's earlier output. Here Stravinsky comes nearer to comment on human truth on a domestic level than anywhere else, even L'Histoire du Soldat: that he did not forge his own new language is less surprising than that here his compassion emerges in such lyrical passages as the trio following Anne's discovery that Tom is married, Baba's Marschallin-like final exit or Anne's cradle song in Bedlam.

All Stravinsky's operas, except for the two greatest, Oedipus and The Rake's Progress, are direct products of some larger phase of his creative activity, and The Flood (1961–62) is representative of a period of serial activity which produced Movements; A Sermon, A Narrative, A Prayer; Abraham and Isaac. It is compact to the point of terseness and invariably powerful. Nothing overall could be less like The Rake of eleven years before, and, even though it begins and ends with a hark-back to the choral style of Noces and contains more than one echo of The Rake's vocal writing, there is something appropriate in the old innovator finishing, with the first TV opera commissioned from a great composer, an operatic career for whose output we must feel gratitude for what it includes, only strengthened by regret for what we never had – the orchestration and completion of Khovanshchina, above all the opera planned with Dylan Thomas but never written.

H.

LE ROSSIGNOL

The Nightingale

Opera in three acts, text by the composer and S. Mitousoff after Hans Andersen's fairy tale. Première Paris Opéra, 26 May 1914; first performed Drury Lane, London, 1914, with Dobrovolska, Petrenko, Brian, Andreev, Warfolomeiev, conductor Cooper; Covent Garden, 1919 (in English), with Nelis, conductor E. Goossens (snr.); New York, Metropolitan, 1926, with Talley, conductor Serafin; la Scala, Milan, 1926, with Pasini, conductor Stravinsky; Buenos Aires, 1927, with Dal Monte; Berlin (as ballet), 1929. Revived Holland, 1952, with Mattiwilda Dobbs, conductor Bruck; Sadler's Wells, 1960, by New Opera Company with Marion Studholme (in English); B.B.C. (in concert), 1972, with Elizabeth Harwood, conductor Pierre Boulez (in Russian); Metropolitan, 1981 (with Sacre and Oedipus), staged by John Dexter, designs by David Hockney and conducted by James Levine (this production was seen at Covent Garden in 1983).

The Fisherman Tenor
 The Nightingale Soprano
 The Cook Mezzo-Soprano
 The Chamberlain Bass
 The Bonze Bass
 Three Japanese Envoys Tenors, Baritone
 The Emperor of China Baritone
 Death Alto
 Chorus of Courtiers and Ghosts

Place: Ancient China

Running Time: 1 hour

Act I. A forest on the seashore at night. At the back of the stage a Fisherman in his boat. He is waiting to hear the Nightingale which delights him every night and causes him to forget his fishing. After a while the Nightingale begins to sing. Other interested spectators arrive – the Emperor's Chamberlain, a Bonze (priest) and the Emperor's Cook, the latter bringing her confederates and other courtiers to give the Nightingale a formal invitation to court to sing before the Emperor. The Nightingale remarks that her voice is far sweeter in the forest than in the palace. Since, however, the Emperor wills it otherwise, the Emperor shall be obeyed. The bird alights on the hand of the Cook, who takes it to the palace while the Fisherman continues to sing the bird's praises.

Act II. The act opens with an entr'acte (with chorus). The chorus inquires of the Cook (who has been appointed 'Grand Cordon Bleu') about the Nightingale. The Cook describes the little bird, whose songs fill the eye with tears. As the curtain rises the Chamberlain announces the Emperor, who arrives in great state with the Nightingale. At a sign from the Emperor the Nightingale begins to sing and the Emperor is so charmed that he offers the Nightingale the order of the Golden Slipper. But the bird requires no other honour than that of having charmed the great monarch. Three envoys from the Emperor of Japan offer the Emperor a mechanical bird which also sings. As soon as the mechanical nightingale's song begins the real one flies away. The Emperor, affronted, condemns it to perpetual banishment. The voice of the Fisherman is heard again.

Act III. The Emperor is ill and Death sits at the foot of his bed wearing the imperial crown and grasping his standard. The Emperor calls for his musicians. The Nightingale answers the call. It has come to banish ghosts and to sing of the dawn. Even Death is persuaded by the loveliness of the song to give back the crown and the standard. The Nightingale's charm has conquered disease, and as the courtiers arrive in solemn procession to salute their ruler whom they expect to find dead, the sun floods the room with light, Death disappears and the Emperor rises from his bed and wishes his courtiers a good morning. The Fisherman bids all acknowledge in the song of the Nightingale the voice of heaven.

F.B.

Le Rossignol was begun in 1908 just before the death of Stravinsky's teacher, Rimsky-Korsakov, but interrupted after the completion of the first act by the commissioning by Diaghilev of The Firebird. A request from the newly founded Free Theatre of Moscow to complete the opera led, in 1913, to a resumption of work, but now, of course, by a much maturer composer than the comparative beginner of 1908. The styles of Act I and Acts II and III are, however, not so sharply contrasted that unity is ruled out, particularly taking into account the fact that Act I is little more than a lyrical prologue to the action of the two succeeding Acts; but some critics have found a discrepancy.

The delightful melody of the Fisherman's song, which is used to frame each act, the pageantry of the Chinese March, the delicate, expressive filigree of the Nightingale's exacting coloratura music – these elements are by no means the whole story. The music has charm, the orchestration is masterly without using colour primarily for its own sake, but the truth is that here, as virtually throughout his output, the composer knows as few others how to exercise an iron control over his material; inspiration never leads to excess, a small gesture never produces an over-exuberant musical reaction. It is precisely because the work tells its tale without embellishment, because the nightingale limits her brilliance and does not try to emulate a nineteenth-century heroine – in a word because of Stravinsky's immaculate sense of scale and style – that Le Rossignol much more than half a century after it was written can prove so thoroughly rewarding an experience.

Stravinsky made a symphonic poem out of material from the opera (Le Chant du Rossignol), using for the first part the prelude and Chinese March from Act II; for the second, the song of the real Nightingale, music associated with the clockwork model from Japan, followed by the Fisherman's song; and for the third, a reworking of music from Act III entitled 'Illness and Recovery of the Emperor of China'. Leonid Massine choreographed it for Diaghilev and its first performance was in Paris in 1920. H.

L'HISTOIRE D'UN SOLDAT

A Soldier's Tale

A tale to be read, played and danced, libretto by C.F. Ramuz. Première, Lausanne, 28 September 1918. First performed London, in concert at Wigmore Hall, 1920, Arts Theatre Club (staged), 1927; Berlin Volksbühne, 1924; New York, 1926. Revived Edinburgh Festival, 1954, with Moira Shearer, Robert Helpmann, conductor Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt, producer Günter Rennert; Sadler's Wells, 1958, by New Opera Company (in double bill with Le Rossignol).

NarratorSpoken
The Devil.....Actor
The Soldier.....Actor
The PrincessDancer

Running Time: 50 minutes

An opera that has no singing, that was designed to be played in village halls, that has seven instrumentalists accompanying its one dancing and three audible characters? In 1918 Stravinsky was living in Switzerland, short of money and of a theme on which to compose. He and his friend, the Swiss writer Ramuz, decided on a collaboration in which the three elements of music, acting or dancing, and narration, should be almost equal partners. It would involve the smallest forces possible and should be performable in any hall or building or even in the open air. The result is a modern Morality, which makes its not inconsiderable impact as much by means of the pungent, suggestive music as through an ironical text. It is difficult to see exactly what category of musical theatre it fits, but somehow opera seems to be the nearest.

Part I. March of brilliant character (No. 1) sets the scene. A soldier is on his weary way home from the wars. He stops and looks through his pack – there's a picture of his girlfriend and, more important, his fiddle, which has been his companion for so long. The fiddle dominates the next section of music (No. 2: Little tunes beside a brook). The Devil, disguised as a little old man with a butterfly net, wants to barter the violin for a book he produces – worth any money, he says, as it foretells the future. The soldier accepts and when the Devil finds he cannot play the instrument, the soldier agrees to teach him.

Off they go together and the soldier lives for two days in great comfort. When he eventually gets home (reprise of the march) he finds that he has been away not three days but three years and that his friends and even his mother and his girlfriend take him for a ghost. Now he understands who was his host for those 'days' of luxury. His dejection and loneliness are shown in a desolate Pastoral (No. 3). He catches sight of his enemy and wants to attack him. But the Devil reminds him of the book he bartered for the fiddle. He starts to read it and its teaching brings him wealth beyond his wildest dreams; only happiness is still out of reach. He is rich, but he begins to suspect that he is dead. The Devil comes now in the guise of an old-clothes woman and begs him to buy something, finally producing an ancient violin, his old fiddle – again its sound mocks him (No. 2).

Part II. To the sound of the March (No. 1) the soldier crosses the border to the neighbouring country. In desperation, he has thrown away his possessions and is back as he was at the start, only without his pack. At a frontier inn he hears that the Princess is ill and that the King has promised her hand in marriage to whoever can cure her. Why should he not try his luck? He makes up his mind and to the sound of the royal march (No. 4: a stylised Spanish Pasodoble) he arrives at the palace gates and goes inside, only to find the Devil sitting there, disguised as a violin virtuoso. The King promises that he may see the Princess next day.

The narrator eggs the soldier on to play cards against the Devil – if he loses, he'll have no more of the Devil's money and they will be quits. The ruse works and the soldier finds to his joy that he can play the violin again (No. 5: Little concert). Eric White mentions an odd feature of the 'little concert': 'It is curious to find that ... one of the most memorable themes of The Soldier's Tale came to Stravinsky in a dream, during which, according to Schaeffner, he saw a gipsy woman seated on the steps at the back of a caravan, playing a violin with the full length of the bow at the same time as she suckled her child. This haunting minor motif is first heard from the cornet followed by the bassoon in the "little concert"¹ and, later, from the violin in the "tango".² Although no very extended use is made of it, its character is so strong that in retrospect it seems to flavour the whole work.³

The music rouses the Princess who is cured during the course of three dances (No. 6: tango, waltz and ragtime). Next it is the turn of the Devil, who is obliged to dance till he drops exhausted (No. 7: the Devil's dance). A 'little chorale' (No. 8) celebrates the victory of the lovers, but the Devil in a 'spoken song' (No. 9) swears revenge. There is a 'great chorale' (No. 10) during which the narrator points a moral.

There remains but to finish the 'opera'. The Princess suggests that they might visit the soldier's old home and on the way at the frontier the Devil, who has regained the violin, justifies the title of the last piece of music: 'The triumphal march of the Devil' (No. 11). H.

RENARD

A burlesque for the stage, to be sung and acted; based on popular Russian folk tales. Words by the composer, French translation by C.F. Ramuz. Première in double bill with Mavra at Paris Opéra, 2 June 1922. First produced New York (in concert), 1923; Berlin, 1925; London (B.B.C.), 1935. Revived Edinburgh Festival, 1961, conductor Alexander Gibson.

The Cock.....Tenor

The Fox.....Tenor

The GoatBass

The Cat.....Bass

Running Time: 15 minutes

R*enard* was commissioned by Princesse Edmond de Polignac who expressed the view that, after Wagner and Strauss, the time had come to return to works for small and unusual ensembles and suggested that Stravinsky compose a work of this type to be performed in her Paris house. Stravinsky proposed Renard, which had been germinating in his mind for some time – the duet for the cat and the goat was in fact written some years earlier, while he was working on Les Noces in Switzerland. He began work on Renard at once and in his enthusiasm he temporarily abandoned the half-finished Les Noces.

At this time Stravinsky's friendship with the Swiss writer Ramuz was already well established and, in the course of three years, the two co-operated on the texts of Les Noces and L'Histoire d'un Soldat, as well as the French translation of Renard, whose Russian words Stravinsky himself had already written. This translation took an infinity of time and trouble because of the great importance Stravinsky attached to the relationship of word-sounds and music.

Renard was produced in 1922 for Diaghilev's company by Bronislava Nijinska, the sister of Nijinsky, and the sets were by Larionov, the new work waiting for its première until the completion of Mavra (see page 795).

In a note to the score, Stravinsky says, 'The play is acted by clowns, dancers or acrobats, preferably on a trestle stage placed in front of the orchestra.¹ If performed in a theatre it should be played in front of the curtain. The actors remain on the stage all the time. They come on in view of the audience to the strains of the little march, which serves as an introduction, and make their exit in the same way. The actors do not speak. The singers (two tenors and two basses) are placed in the orchestra.' The orchestra is small, containing single woodwind, two horns, trumpet, percussion and single strings, as well as a cembalon, an instrument which had so enchanted Stravinsky when he first heard it in a café in Geneva that he at once bought himself one and learned to play it.

A pompous little da capo march introduces the work after which the four singers sing a lively allegro, in which they rail against their enemy, the fox. The cock is fidgeting on his perch and we are introduced to him by a broken upward sweep on the cembalon. In a mournful little song he describes his daily life, after which the fox to another cembalon arpeggio enters disguised as a nun. He begs the cock to come down and confess his sins, but the cock recognises him and refuses (to a phrase from the first allegro). The fox renews his efforts, and reminds the cock of his offensively polygamous domestic arrangements,

¹ Sections 13 to 15, 17 and 18.

² Sections 4 and 8.

³ In Stravinsky: a critical survey, 1947.

¹ cf. L'Histoire d'un Soldat.

to such effect that the silly bird hops down from his perch with a resounding crash on cymbal and drums. Renard, of course, grabs him at once and the cock screeches to the cat and the goat to come to his help. They do so and drive the fox away, after which cock, goat and cat dance triumphantly.

The second part begins with the cock climbing complacently on to his perch, to the same cembalon chord as before, and resuming his sad little song which is again interrupted by the fox, this time not in disguise. The fox once more tries to wheedle the cock down to the ground with flattering words and glittering promises, even at one moment – in an attempt at disguise? – using a bass voice. The idiotic cock resists for a time but in the end jumps down again to a resounding bang from the bass drum. The fox pounces and this time things look very black for the poor cock as his friends the cat and the goat take a good deal longer than before in coming to his aid. The fox begins to pull out all his feathers, and the cock, in desperation, sings a moderato aria to the fox, begging for mercy. In the end, realising it is all in vain, the cock prays for the welfare of all his surviving relatives and finally passes out.

The cat and the goat enter and sing a jolly scherzando, accompanying themselves on the guzla. In their song, they pretend to be well disposed towards the fox who becomes momentarily distracted when they suggest that Mrs Fox is betraying him; this is their chance and they strangle him. The four singers shout triumphantly seven times, after which the actors dance for joy and in conclusion ask for a token of gratitude from the audience if they have been pleased. The opening march is played once more and the performers leave the stage. H.

MAVRA

Opera buffa in one act, text by Boris Kochno after Pushkin. Première Paris, 2 June 1922, by Diaghilev company with Slobodskaya, Sadoven, Rozovska, Skoupevski, conductor Gregor Fitelberg. First performed Krolloper, Berlin, 1928, London (B.B.C.), 1934, Philadelphia Orchestra, 1934; Rome, 1942, with Iris Adami-Corradetti, Elvira Casazza, Augusto Ferrauto, conductor Previtali; la Scala, 1942; Edinburgh Festival, 1958, by Hamburg Opera with Melitta Muszely, Gisela Litz, Jürgen Förster, conductor Leopold Ludwig.

ParashaSoprano
The NeighbourMezzo-Soprano
The MotherContralto
The HussarTenor

Place: Russia

Time: The Reign of Charles X

Running Time: 30 minutes

Stravinsky has said that Mavra was conceived because the natural sympathy he had always felt for the melodic language, vocal style and conventions of the old Russo-Italian opera induced him to experiment with this style at a time when it was almost extinct. He wrote Mavra 'in the direct tradition of Glinka and Dargomizhsky'.¹

The work was composed while the composer was living at Biarritz but was interrupted by orchestration he had to do for Diaghilev for the London revival of The Sleeping Beauty. It was completed in March 1922, except for the overture which was added later in Paris.

The scene is a Russian village. The opera opens in the living-room of the house occupied by Parasha and her mother. Parasha, in love with the Hussar who lives nearby, sings of her impatience as she sits at her embroidery.² Her lover comes to the window and the two sing a duet. The Hussar goes away and the Mother appears, complaining at length of the difficulty of getting a servant now that her old and apparently perfect cook has died. She urges Parasha to find her a new maid. The Mother grumbles on and is joined by the Neighbour; the two women complain happily about the servant problem, the state of the weather and the price of clothes these days.

Parasha comes triumphantly back with a young woman who, she says, will be just right. Her name is Mavra and she used to be in service with old Anna next door. It is, of course, the Hussar in disguise, but the Mother and the Neighbour are both taken in and the four unite in a quartet, the women telling Mavra that the new girl has a lot to live up to, and the Hussar joining in sympathetically. The Neighbour goes home, the Mother upstairs and the scheming lovers sing ecstatically of the success of their plan and the happiness it will bring them.

The Mother reappears, gives Mavra a mass of work to do and takes Parasha off for a walk, saying in an aside that she is going to return early just to make sure the girl is a good worker. Left alone, the Hussar sings of his love for Parasha and the wonderful days which lie ahead, after which he decides to make the most of his solitude and shave himself. In the middle of this operation, complicated as it is by unfamiliar furniture and female attire, the Mother comes back and is so shocked at what she sees that she faints. The Neighbour rushes in, and the curtain falls as the Hussar jumps out of the window leaving Parasha calling plaintively after him. H.

¹ Stravinsky: Poetics of music: in the form of six lessons (O.U.P., 1947).

² This aria is sometimes heard in Stravinsky's own arrangement for solo violin.

OEDIPUS REX

Oedipus the King

Opera-oratorio in two acts, text by Jean Cocteau after Sophocles, translated into Latin by J. Daniélou. Première, Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt, Paris, 30 May 1927 (in concert), conducted by Stravinsky. First performed on the stage in Vienna, 1928; Berlin, 1928, conductor Klemperer; New York (concert), 1928; New York (stage), 1931, conductor Stokowski; London, Queen's Hall (concert), 1936, with Slobodskaya, Widdop, Harold Williams, Norman Walker, conductor Ansermet; la Scala, Milan, 1948, with Danco, Demetz, conductor Sanzogno; Cologne, 1951, with Mödl, Pears, Rehfuss, conductor Stravinsky (concert); Holland Festival, 1952, with Bouvier, Vroons, conductor Bruck; Sadler's Wells, 1960, with Monica Sinclair, Dowd, conductor Colin Davis; New York, City Opera, 1959, with Claramae Turner, Cassilly, conductor Stokowski; la Scala, Milan, 1969, with Horne, Lajos Kozma, conductor Abbado; Metropolitan, 1981 (with Sacre and Rossignol), staged by John Dexter, sets by David Hockney, conducted by James Levine.

Oedipus, King of Thebes Tenor
 Jocasta, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
 Creon,¹ Jocasta's brother Bass-Baritone
 Tiresias, a soothsayer Bass
 The Shepherd Tenor
 The Messenger¹ Bass-Baritone
 Narrator Spoken

Chorus (Tenors and Basses)

Place: Ancient Greece

Running Time: 1 hour

The action is continuous, although divided into two acts. It is put forward in the shape of six tableaux, with a minimum of action (the characters are directed to give the impression of living statues), and that explained beforehand in the language of the audience by a narrator. The text is in Latin.

Act I. 1st tableau. The Narrator sets the scene for the audience; of Oedipus he says: 'At the moment of his birth a snare was laid for him – and you will see the snare closing'. In the opening chorus, 'Kaedit nos pestis,'² the men of Thebes lament the plague which is destroying the inhabitants of the town. They beg their king, Oedipus, to help them in their affliction. This he promises to do: 'Liberi, vos liberabo.'

2nd tableau. Creon, who has been sent to Delphi to consult the oracle, returns. In an aria, 'Respondit deus', he reports that the god has revealed that Laius' murderer still lives on in Thebes, undetected and unpunished. He must be discovered. Oedipus answers that he himself, with his skill in solving riddles, will track down the murderer: 'Non reperiās vetus skelus.'

3rd tableau. The chorus prays to Minerva, Diana and Phoebus (or Athene, Artemis, and Apollo, as they would be in Greek), and welcomes Tiresias, whom Oedipus has decided to consult. Tiresias is blind, and referred to by the Narrator as 'the fountain of truth', but at first he refuses to answer the King's questions. Oedipus taunts him, and he makes it clear that he will hold nothing more back; the King's assassin is a king! ('Dikere non possum'). Oedipus is furious at the implication behind the words, and suggests that Creon and Tiresias are in league to oust him from the throne: 'Stipendarius es' he snarls at Tiresias. The aria ('Invidia fortunam odit') dies away in silence, and is succeeded by a magnificent chorus of greeting and praise to Queen Jocasta: 'Gloria!'

Act II begins with a reprise of the sonorous 'Gloria' chorus.

4th tableau. Jocasta is now seen on the stage. She has come, says the Narrator, attracted by the dispute of her husband and her brother. How can they raise their voices thus in anger in the stricken city ('Nonn' erubeskite, reges')? Oracles, she says, are accustomed to deceive those who consult them ('Mentita sunt oracula'); did they not predict that her former husband, Laius, would be killed by his own son, and was he not in fact murdered by robbers at the crossroads ('trivium') between Daulia and Delphi? The chorus takes up the word 'trivium', but its repetition has the effect of filling Oedipus with horror. In a duet with Jocasta ('Pavesco subito, Jocasta') he explains that on his way from Corinth to Thebes he himself killed a stranger at that very crossroads. Jocasta makes an attempt to reassure him ('Oracula mentiuntur'), but it is of little avail.

¹ These roles may be taken by the same singer.

² The spelling used is often onomatopoeic, to ensure uniform pronunciation.

5th tableau. The messenger steps forward to inform Oedipus that King Polybus is dead, and that Oedipus, so far from being his son, was only adopted by him. Oedipus as a baby was rescued by a shepherd after he had been abandoned on the mountain side and then handed over to King Polybus ('Reppereram in monte puerum Oedipoda'). The shepherd corroborates his evidence, and his words so overwhelm the Queen that she disappears from the scene, convinced and horror-stricken by what she has heard. Oedipus, however, thinks she is merely ashamed of his apparently lowly birth ('Nonne monstrum reskituri'), and it is only after the messenger and the shepherd unite to accuse him of parricide and incest that he is conscious of his crime and its enormity. The chorus repeats the words of the King's accusers, after which shepherd and messenger withdraw. With a quiet dignity that has not been in evidence in his previous utterances, Oedipus resigns himself to acknowledging the truth. On the words 'Lux facta est', he disappears.¹

6th tableau. The messenger reappears, and the Narrator explains that the audience is about to hear the monologue: 'The divine Jocasta is dead'; he describes how she has hanged herself and how Oedipus has pierced his eyeballs with the golden pin Jocasta wore. He bids farewell to Oedipus – Oedipus whom his people loved.

The great scene in which the messenger and the chorus bewail Jocasta's suicide ('Divum Jocastae caput mortuum!') brings the work to its emotional climax.

As the messenger disappears, and Oedipus is seen with his pierced eyes, the chorus comments gently on his broken condition and bids him a last farewell.

The work is short, and from the opening chorus the expression is direct and, whether Stravinsky liked it or not, emotional. Oedipus himself is a fascinating character study, passing as he does from the heights of power and self-confidence, through arrogance (in his attitude to Creon and Tiresias) and self-pity ('Amiki, amiki' in the aria 'Invidia fortunam odit'), until he reaches a condition of understanding and horror at his position. It is interesting to note that he uses a musical language that is, in its vocal line, curiously like that of Monteverdi's Orfeo, particularly in its expressive use of coloratura (e.g. Ex. 1). Oedipus is the central figure, but the climaxes are often associated with his surroundings. Successive heights of intensity are reached with the magnificent 'Gloria' chorus which closes the first act and begins the second, the aria for Jocasta and her duet with Oedipus, and the very powerful section in which the Messenger and the chorus lament the suicide of Jocasta. The form of the work might sound anti-operatic to those who have not heard it; but the music expresses drama and character in every bar, and even if stylisation had been avoided and movement included at every possible moment, nothing would have been added to the total effect, which remains shattering.

H.

THE RAKE'S PROGRESS

Opera in three acts and an epilogue, text by W.H. Auden and Chester Kallman. Première, Venice Festival, 11 September 1951, with Schwarzkopf, Tourel, Tangeman, Rounseville, Otakar Kraus, Cuénod, Arié, conductor Stravinsky. First performed Zürich, 1951, with Harvey, Malaniuk, Lichtegg, Wolff, conductor Reinshagen; Stuttgart, 1951, with Wissmann, Marta Fuchs, Holm, Neidlinger, conductor Leitner; la Scala, Milan, 1951, with Schwarzkopf, Elmo, Picchi, Kraus, Cuénod, conductor Leitner; London (B.B.C. broadcast), 1953, with Catley, Pollak, Alexander Young, Kraus, conductor Sacher; Metropolitan, New York, 1953, with Gueden, Thébom, Conley, Harrell, conductor Reiner; Sadler's Wells, 1962, with Morison, Young, Herinx, conductor Colin Davis.

Trulove Bass
Anne, his daughter Soprano

¹ By means of a trap-door, according to the original stage directions.

Tom Rakewell, her sweetheart.....Tenor
 Nick ShadowBaritone
 Mother Goose, a brothel-keeper.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Baba the Turk, *bearded lady*Mezzo-Soprano
 Sellem, *the auctioneer*Tenor
 Keeper of the Madhouse.....Bass
 Whores and Roaring Boys, Servants, Citizens,
 Madmen

Place: England

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

It was a post-war viewing of Hogarth's prints The Rake's Progress which suggested the subject to Stravinsky, who was quick to contact W.H. Auden who in his turn brought in Chester Kallman as co-librettist. Stravinsky's publishers, Boosey and Hawkes, planned the première for Covent Garden, but the composer himself sold the world première to Venice and the European to Milan, a hard-fought compromise bringing the company of la Scala to perform The Rake in Venice at the Festival. The opera, in spite of a less than auspicious start, began a journey which has taken it round the world as one of the operas of the second half of the century likely to last well into the next. It is, incidentally, the climax of the composer's Neoclassical phase.

Act I, scene i. After a very short prelude, the scene shows the garden of Trulove's house in the country. It is spring. In an arbour, Anne and Tom are seated. A trio develops, Anne and Tom rejoicing in the season which seems made for their love ('The woods are green'), and Trulove in the background expressing the hope that his fears about Tom's future may prove unfounded. Anne goes indoors and Trulove tells Tom that he has secured for him the offer of a city position. When Tom declines, he comments that his daughter may choose a poor husband, but he will see to it she does not marry a lazy one.

Tom is scornful of his prospective father-in-law's attitude; why should he waste his time in an office? He has other plans, and proposes to rely primarily on the goddess of fortune. 'Since it is not by merit we rise or we fall' is the burden of his aria, whose vigorous expression suggests that Tom underestimates his own energies. He breaks off: 'I wish I had money.' Immediately a figure appears at the garden gate, and asks for Tom Rakewell. It is Nick Shadow, the bearer, so he says, of good tidings for Tom and anyone else who wishes him well. Tom calls into the house for Anne and Trulove, and Nick tells all three that Tom has been left a fortune by an unknown uncle.

Tom rejoices in his good luck and thanks Nick for his tidings. Nick in his turn thanks him that he has found a new master, and Anne and Trulove thank God for the turn in Tom's fortunes. The words 'Be thanked' for each character are set to a dropping minor ninth. For a moment, Tom and Anne sing happily to one another ('O clement love'), but Nick interrupts to say that the inheritance of a fortune entails certain business transactions; they must go up to London immediately. Anne starts to say goodbye to Tom, Nick returns to say the carriage awaits, and Tom agrees to reckon up what his services have been worth a year and a day after his engagement. A further farewell, a further warning on the part of Trulove that fortune so easily come by may prove an inducement to idleness, and the stage is clear. Nick turns to the audience: 'The Progress of a Rake begins.'

Scene ii is set in Mother Goose's brothel. It opens with a brilliant introduction and chorus for Whores and Roaring Boys. Nick asks Tom to recite to Mother Goose what he has been taught, and only when Nick mentions the word 'love' does Tom falter in his lesson. According to custom, Tom is asked to sing. 'Love too frequently betrayed' is the theme of his beautiful cavatina, with its rippling clarinet accompaniment.

Mother Goose claims Tom as hers for the night, and the chorus sings away merrily (in a manner not far removed from 'Oranges and Lemons'), their refrain, 'Lanterloo', bringing the scene to an end.

Scene iii has the same setting as scene i. Anne is sad that no word has come from Tom since he left for London. 'Quietly, Night, O find him and caress' she sings in a full-scale aria. There is an interruption as Trulove calls from the house, and Anne makes up her mind that Tom needs her more than her father does. This gives the cue for the cabaletta (Stravinsky actually uses the word in the score – perhaps the only time a composer has ever done this); it is a lively tune punctuated by a brilliant little orchestral ritornello: 'I go to him. Love cannot falter.'

Act II, scene i. The morning room of Tom's house in London. Tom is at breakfast. He sings of the city's disillusion, which he contrasts with life as it would have been at the side of the one true person he knows and of whom now he dare not even think. The music is in the form of an extended, loosely knit scena: 'Vary the song, O London, change!'

At Tom's words 'I wish I were happy', Nick appears and shows his master an advertisement for a circus, in which is featured Baba the Turk, the bearded lady. Let him advise his master: marry Baba! The music of Nick's aria for the first time suggests the sinister purpose behind the façade of bonhomie. It is agreed that Tom shall marry Baba the Turk.

Scene ii. Outside Tom's house in London. Anne has arrived and is waiting apprehensively for him to return home. A procession of servants carries parcels into the house, and Anne wonders what their significance can be. A sedan chair is borne in. Tom gets out of it and comes quickly up to Anne. She must leave London, where 'Virtue is a day coquette', and forget him; he is not worthy of her. At that moment a head is poked out of the sedan chair; it is Baba, heavily veiled, demanding to know how much longer she is to be kept waiting. Tom admits she is his wife. There is a trio in which Anne and Tom sing of their might-have-beens, and Baba expresses her extreme dislike of being kept waiting. Anne leaves, Tom helps Baba from the chair, and, as a climax to the scene, she unveils and reveals her beard.

Scene iii. The same room as Act II, scene i, except that it is now cluttered with every conceivable kind of object: stuffed animals and birds, cases of minerals, china, glass, etc. Tom and Baba are at breakfast. Tom sulks, but Baba chatters on breathlessly. After a bit she becomes conscious that Tom has not spoken, and turns lovingly to him. He repulses her, and, losing her temper, she paces furiously about the room, smashing the more fragile but less valuable parts of her collection, and proclaiming angrily that Tom must be in love with the girl he met when they first came to the house. She embarks on a florid phrase, but Tom, throwing patience to the winds, seizes his wig and shoves it over her face back to front so that she is cut off in mid-note.

His misery is complete, and there is only one remedy: sleep. Nick comes in, wheeling an object covered with a dust sheet. He removes it and discloses a fantastic baroque machine, into which he puts first a loaf of bread, and then above it a piece of broken china. He turns the handle, out comes the loaf. Tom wakes up with the words 'I wish it were true', and explains to Nick that he has had a dream in which he invented a machine which turned stones to bread, and so relieved the sufferings of mankind. Nick asks him if it was anything like what he sees beside him, and Tom demonstrates it to his own complete satisfaction. Nick suggests he ought to tell his wife. 'My wife?' says Tom with a gesture in her direction, 'I have no wife. I've buried her.'

Act III. The first scene is laid in Tom's room, as for Act II, scene iii, except that now everything is covered in dust and cobwebs. Baba is still sitting motionless at the table, with the wig over her face. An auction is about to take place, and the citizens are examining the objects up for sale. Anne comes in but no one can give her any definite news of Tom.

The door is flung open and in comes Sellem, preceded by servants carrying an auctioneer's apparatus. He gets down to business straight away, and his patter is as resourceful (and as meaningless) as one would expect. It is all carried off with great style, and the waltz tune as Sellem puts up the various items is positively elegant in its inconsequentiality (as witness the incomparable performance of Hugues Cuénod at the première). Finally he comes to Baba, whom he introduces in an awe-struck whisper:

An unknown object draws us, draws us near.

A cake? An organ? Golden Apple Tree?

The bidding rises higher and higher, and Sellem, to calm the crowd, snatches off the wig. Baba finishes her phrase, and turns to strike consternation into the bystanders. Even the sound of the voices of Tom and Nick off-stage (singing a ballad tune which resembles 'Lilliburlero') in no way disconcerts her: 'The pigs of plunder' is her only comment. She comforts Anne: 'You love him, seek to set him right: He's but a shuttle-headed lad'; then, with the greatest dignity, announces her intention of returning to the stage and her interrupted career.

Again, the voices of Tom and Nick are heard below, and Anne leads the stretto-finale. Baba tells Sellem to fetch her carriage, and orders the crowd out of her way: 'The next time you see Baba, you shall pay.'

The scene changes to a churchyard. The smell of death is in the music, with the harpsichord somehow providing a colour which is deeply sinister, and

The Rake's Progress (Glyndebourne, 1975, director John Cox, designer David Hockney). The auction scene, Act III: 'Ruin, disaster, shame'.

Tom's utterances have a new sense of seriousness:

Nick reveals himself in his true colours (to the tune of the ballad):

A year and a day have passed away
Since first to you I came ...
'Tis not your money but your soul
Which I this night require.

The vocal writing for Tom, caught in the trap of his own devising, in some respects recalls that for Oedipus in a similar situation; it is Stravinsky at his most expressive and his most powerful, and the crucial scene of the opera. Nick relents to the extent of inviting Tom to play cards in a last effort to save himself from hell. Tom wins the game, but in his rage Nick condemns him to insanity.

Nick sinks into a nearby grave and the stage remains dark for a moment. When the lights come up again, Tom is sitting on a green mound, putting grass in his hair and singing in a child-like voice: 'With roses crowned, I sit on ground, Adonis is my name' (the ballad-tune again). The scene is very short, but the musical suggestion of madness is achieved with economy of means but extremely moving results.

The scene changes to Bedlam. Tom is surrounded by madmen. In his own mind he is still Adonis, and he exhorts the company to prepare for his wedding with Venus. The sound of a key turning in the lock is heard, and the chorus's reaction is swift. But it is the jailer bringing with him Anne, who has come to visit Tom. Anne addresses Tom as Adonis, and in a moment he is happy not only that she has come, but that he has disproved his fellow madmen, who predicted that no Venus would answer his call. There is a love duet, and at its end Anne helps the exhausted Tom on to the straw pallet which lies in the middle of the room. She rocks him to sleep with a Lullaby ('Gently, little boat'). The jailer brings in her father, who leads her gently away.

When she has gone, Tom wakes and raves of his Venus, who was with him and has disappeared. The others will not believe that she was ever there, and he sinks back dead on the mattress. The curtain descends and in front of it step the five principal characters, Anne, Baba, Tom, Nick, and Trulove, to sing an epilogue. The Moral:

For idle hands and hearts and minds
The Devil finds
A work to do.

H.

FRANZ von SUPPÉ

(born 18 April 1819, died 21 May 1895)

BOCCACCIO

Opera in three acts, libretto by F. Zell and R. Genée. Première at Carl Theatre, Vienna, 1 February 1879, with Fräulein Link as Boccaccio, and Fräulein Streitmann as Fiametta. First performed New York, Thalia Theater, 1880; London, Royal Comedy Theatre, 1882. Revived New York, Metropolitan (with recitatives by Bodanzky), 1931, with Jeritza as Boccaccio, conductor Bodanzky; Vienna, Volksoper, 1951, with Fred Liewehr as Boccaccio and Réthy, Lorna Sidney, Carl Dönch, Szemere, conductor Paulik.

Fiametta, *foster-daughter of Lambertuccio*Soprano
Boccaccio, *a writer*Tenor¹
Lambertuccio, *a grocer*Tenor
Beatrice, *wife of Scalza*Soprano
Peronella, *wife of Lambertuccio*Contralto
Pietro, *Prince of Palermo*Tenor
Scalza, *a barber*Baritone
Leonetto, *a student*Baritone
Isabella, *Lotteringhi's wife*Mezzo-Soprano
Lotteringhi, *a cooper of Florence*Tenor
Checco, *a beggar*Bass
A BooksellerBaritone
Major-DomoBaritone

Place: Florence
Time: 1331

Born in Dalmatia of Austrian parents of Belgian descent who were members of the civil service, Suppé took to the theatre at an early age, wrote theatre music of all kinds in Vienna, sang in smaller theatres, and conducted operas. He was the first composer to write, in imitation of the French, operettas in what became the Viennese style. His greatest successes came with Fatinitza and Boccaccio, the latter of which is his only operetta, apart from the short Die schöne Galathee, regularly performed today. Like Smetana in Czechoslovakia, he had to learn the language in which he wrote for the stage, and his German is said never to have been perfect.

The overture, compounded, apart from the romantic horn tune at the start, of lively tunes from the operetta, is one of the most satisfactory in the genre and well-known as a concert curtain-raiser on Viennese nights.

Act I. The square in front of the church of Santa Maria Novella, where a crowd of beggars, led by Checco, is preparing to use the opportunities offered by a public holiday. Leonetto slips unnoticed into the house of Scalza, whose wife Beatrice has thoughtfully provided him with a key. Students and townspeople celebrate the holiday with a tarantella. A bookseller comes by plying his trade, but the offer of some of Boccaccio's stories, which breathe the very scandal of Florence, incenses the worthy citizenry and the bookseller is driven off, in spite of protests from the students.

¹ Sometimes, as at the première, sung by a soprano.

When Scalza returns home, his wife is by no means alone – Boccaccio as well as his friend Leonetto look out in alarm at the appearance of her husband. Beatrice decides to save herself embarrassment by calling for help, Boccaccio and Leonetto emerge and stage a mock duel, which Scalza tries to stop and which is aggravated when the townspeople take sides and join in the fun. Scalza drags his wife indoors, leaving the others to discuss the ethics of love, a subject Boccaccio takes up in a lively song ('Ich sehe einen jungen Mann dort stehn') – it may become one of his tales, he explains.

Boccaccio hides to listen to Fiametta and Peronella talking of Fiametta's forthcoming marriage to a man of high position. Fiametta sings a romance ('Hab' ich nur deine Liebe'): love without faithfulness has made many a maiden happy, fidelity without love has brought joy to none. Boccaccio joins enthusiastically in the refrain.

Boccaccio devises a scheme to approach Fiametta again, and dresses himself up as a beggar. Meanwhile Pietro is mistaken by Lambertuccio and Lotteringhi for Boccaccio, whose writings they all fear, but he evades them and leaves the coast clear for the disguised Boccaccio to beg for alms from Fiametta. She recognises his voice, and it is clear from their charming duet that what starts as a flirtation is likely to become something more.

Lotteringhi and Lambertuccio lead the older citizens of Florence – particularly the married men – in the hunt for Boccaccio; they enlist the help of Scalza, and he saves Pietro, who has been captured in error but who is quickly recognised by Scalza as the Prince of Palermo. There is nothing left for it but to turn on the offending books themselves; they seize them from the bookseller, build a fire and burn them, while the students, led by Boccaccio, cry to be avenged on stupidity. Truth and honour will survive, they maintain, will rise in fact like a phoenix from the ashes. In spite of its dramatic action, the music of this finale remains merry and charming.

Act II. Boccaccio, Pietro and Leonetto join together in serenading their loved ones, Fiametta, Isabella and Peronella, and hide when Lotteringhi makes his appearance. His wife, Isabella, scolds him for the row he's making with his assistants, and in revenge he sings the Cooper's Song: his wife has got so used to nagging that it has become her favourite pastime and he can get his own back only by banging away at his barrels. Boccaccio meanwhile has taken advantage of the interruption to write love letters to each of the three recipients of the recent serenades, and their delighted reaction to the letters produces one of the most attractive numbers in the score, a trio ('Wie pocht mein Herz so ungestüm') with an enchanting waltz refrain – a tune good enough to make the fortune of any operetta. Peronella and Leonetto, Isabella and Pietro, declare their love for each other, but are interrupted by the return of Lotteringhi.

Boccaccio, again in disguise to be near Fiametta, tells Lambertuccio that there is a magic tree in his garden, whose property is to make anyone who sits in its branches believe that the couple beneath is making love – he proves his point with Fiametta. Meanwhile Isabella entices her husband Lotteringhi into an empty wine cask, while she and Pietro, Leonetto and Peronella add to the demonstration of the tree's unusual qualities, and musically the sextet of lovers is turned into an octet by the addition of one husband up a tree and another in a barrel.

The idyllic scene is interrupted by Scalza bringing news that Boccaccio has been seen entering the house. Positions are reversed, the lovers hide, the husbands emerge to join in the hunt, but the women are able to reveal that the supposed culprit is the man who brings the money to pay for Fiametta's board and lodging! He has now come to take her away, much to her consternation. Boccaccio and his two friends have therefore not only to make their own escape but also to contrive the release of Fiametta as well. Fiametta greets the news of his plan with a reprise of the waltz tune, and as she is borne off in her sedan chair, Boccaccio springs out, dressed as the devil, and scares the crowd away.

Act III. In the garden of the Duke's palace, Pietro admits to Boccaccio that he is the mysterious nobleman to whom Fiametta is due to be married; she is the Duke's natural daughter and has now been granted the title of Princess. Fiametta for her part discovers that her lover is none other than the famous writer Boccaccio and not at all the humble student she had taken him to be. Their misunderstandings are made up in a charming 6/8 duet ('Mia bella fiorentina').

Boccaccio next has to defend himself against the attacks on his writings by Lotteringhi, Lambertuccio and Scalza (who of course do not know him by sight). The women support his contention that it is a writer's job to fight with wit, humour and honesty against the folly of the world. He even counsels the men to do all in their power to prevent their wives becoming bored – therein will lie their undoing.

It remains only for Boccaccio to persuade Prince Pietro to give up Fiametta, and this he succeeds in doing during a theatrical entertainment given in the Duke's house. A reprise of his motto – wit, humour and honesty are sharp-edged weapons; victory is to him who uses them well – brings to an end a Viennese score which must be among the best specimens of the kind not written by Johann Strauss. H.

KAROL SZYMANOWSKI

(born 6 October 1882, died 29 March 1937)

Karol Szymanowski in his lifetime occupied a curious position as the first Polish composer since Chopin to make an impact on the greater musical world, indeed the first since Moniuszko to write his name in the history books at all. Born of a land-owning family, after the Russian Revolution he led a life of poverty, in spite of a considerable reputation as both composer and pianist, and was repeatedly forced back on the charity of his friends for sheer survival. As well as a substantial list of compositions he was a fairly extensive writer, and his novel Efebos has a homosexual theme, an apologia pro vita sua. King Roger is his second opera; the first, Hagith (1912–13; performed 1922), is a one-acter with a lurid plot, modelled according to his biographer B.M. Maciejewski on Salome. Before 1914, Szymanowski travelled rather extensively in Russia and Europe and even ventured as far as Algiers, developing a strong taste for the Orient, sufficiently deep for no less a judge than Kaikhosru Sorabji to praise him as 'no European in Eastern fancy-dress'.

KING ROGER

Król Roger

Opera in three acts, libretto by J. Iwaszkiewicz. Première, Warsaw, 19 June 1926, with Stanisława Korwin-Szymanowska (the composer's sister), Eugeniusz Mossakowski as King Roger, Adam Tobosz as the Shepherd, conducted by Emil Młynarski.

First performed in German, Duisburg, 1928; in Czech in Prague, 1932; in Italian, Palermo during I.S.C.M. Festival, 1949, with Clara Petrella, Annaloro, Inghilleri, conductor Mieczysław Mierzejewski; in English, 1955 (B.B.C. broadcast), with Joyce Gartside, Rowland Jones, Redvers Llewellyn, conductor Stanford Robinson; London, New Opera Company, 1975, with Janet Gail, David Hillman, Peter Knapp, conductor Charles Mackerras.

Roger II, King of Sicily Baritone
 Roxana, his wife Soprano
 Edrisi, an Arab scholar Tenor
 The Shepherd Tenor
 The Archbishop Bass
 An Abbess Contralto
 Priests, Monks, Nuns, the King's Guard, Norman Knights, etc.

Place: Sicily

Time: Twelfth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 45 minutes

The genesis of King Roger seems to have come in conversations between the composer and his cousin Iwaszkiewicz, in which Szymanowski made clear his enthusiasm for the beauties of Sicily and particularly for its unique mixture of Greek, Arabic, Byzantine and Latin elements able to coexist there just as had, until the end of the twelfth century, men of differing creeds. Intellectually, the opera represents conflict between Christian and pagan ideals, or between the pulls of the Dionysian and the Apollonian within each of us.¹ The music has something of the opulence and texture of Szymanowski's contemporaries Strauss and Scriabin, with occasionally the sharp insight of Debussy.

¹ See Henze's The Bassarids, pages 348–52.

Act I. The interior of a Byzantine cathedral, rich with characteristics of East and West. It is filled with worshippers and the Archbishop stands in front of the altar as the sound is heard of a great psalm of praise to God. The King and his court enter ceremoniously to a musical climax, and Archbishop and Abbess enjoin him to protect the Church from her enemies and in particular from a new voice who corrupts men and women alike. Edrisi explains that they are speaking of a young shepherd boy, and Roxana raises her voice to beg the King at least to hear the boy in his own defence. The King commands that he be brought before him as the throng calls for his destruction.

To the King's questions, the Shepherd answers elliptically in a long, ecstatic utterance of considerable lyrical impact – his god is young, beautiful and full of life. To the King's obvious discomfiture, Roxana's reaction to his words is favourable, and for a moment he is disposed to order the Shepherd's instant death but relents and agrees to let him go free. Finally, to the fury of the worshippers, he orders his appearance that very night at the palace gate. The Shepherd leaves on the same note of ecstasy as had characterised the explanation of his philosophy.

Act II. The inner courtyard of the King's palace, where that night the King awaits his visitor. The gorgeous texture of the music perfectly conveys the hot Mediterranean night, as well as the tension in the King's mind, much of it, as Edrisi finds when he tries unavailingly to comfort him, on account of the sympathy he senses between his beloved Roxana and the Shepherd. In the distance they hear the sound of tambourines and zithers and immediately, on high A flat, Roxana starts to sing, wordlessly at first, but with rapt concentration and in a highly evocative manner. This is the score's best-known moment, more, unfortunately, from Pawel Kochanski's transcription for violin and piano than from performances of the opera.

The King is enraptured by the song but knows it is sung in honour of the Shepherd. Watchmen announce the Shepherd's appearance and, with a group of four followers carrying musical instruments, he advances towards the King's throne. He greets the King in the name of eternal love and tells him he comes from Benares in India. He proclaims that it is God who has sent him, from God that he derives his powers, and in another extended lyrical passage sings the praises of his faith, until the King stops him, horror-stricken at what he brands as blasphemy. Immediately, Roxana's song starts again, arousing the Shepherd's evident delight and the King's no less evident jealousy.

Eventually, the Shepherd's followers start an Arabic dance, initially in 7/8, and gradually all join in, until Roxana herself becomes visible in the gallery above the courtyard and in her turn starts to sing with the Shepherd and the others. Beside himself with rage, King Roger orders the guards to bind the Shepherd with chains, so that he stands fettered by Roxana's side. Angrily, the Shepherd breaks the bonds and casts them at the King's feet, then calls to Roxana and the people and leads them slowly from the King's presence into what he describes as the Kingdom of Light. The King is left alone in his grief with Edrisi, then suddenly throws aside crown, mantle and sword, announcing that he too will follow the Shepherd, as a pilgrim, no longer as king.

Act III. Among the ruins of a Greek temple appear King Roger and the faithful Edrisi, the former still lamenting his powerless state in the face of his lost love, the latter begging him to call aloud to the echoes. At last he does so, and his cry of 'Roxana!' gets from the distance an immediate answer in the unmistakable voice of Roxana, only for his second attempt to receive a similar answer in the Shepherd's voice. The King's consternation is only partly assuaged by the Shepherd's admonition to leave his fear where he left his sword, and when a moment later Roxana reaches her hand towards him, he still cannot believe that the Shepherd is not playing a cruel joke. Roxana tries to persuade him that the Shepherd is in fact all round him, in every natural thing, and it is not long before Roxana and the King begin to throw great heaps of flowers on the fire which burns on the altar. The Shepherd has by now turned into the Greek god Dionysus and the members of his train into bacchants and maenads, and they whirl into a mad dance, in which Roxana joins, until gradually all disappear, leaving Roger alone with Edrisi. But through his trials the King has grown and it is with confidence, indeed rapture, that he greets the rising of the sun in a splendid paean of thanksgiving as the opera comes to an end. H.

T

PETER ILYICH TCHAIKOVSKY

(born 7 May 1840, died 6 November 1893)

Tchaikovsky wrote no fewer than ten operas, which together constitute a bulky argument to set against the idea that he was primarily an instrumental composer with a dramatic work or two to his credit. Their success has been decidedly varied, but eventually two of them have established themselves in the world's restricted operatic repertoire – Eugene Onegin and The Queen of Spades. Desmond Shawe-Taylor wrote in 1950:¹ 'It is insular ignorance to regard them as interesting failures, or even as obscure local successes. In Russia their great popularity not only survived the Revolution but positively increased: Tatiana is now the beloved heroine of the factory, as formerly of the drawing-room; though gambling and superstition are officially frowned upon, Herman and the ghost of the Countess have lost nothing of their glamour.'

EUGENE ONEGIN

Yevgeny Onyegin

Opera in three acts, text by the composer and K.S. Shilovsky, after Pushkin. Première 29 March 1879, Imperial College of Music, Little Theatre, Moscow; publicly, Moscow, 1881; 1892, Olympic Theatre, London (in English); la Scala, Milan, 1900; Covent Garden, 1906, with Destinn, Battistini, Journet, conductor Campanini; Metropolitan, New York, 1920, with Muzio, Martinelli, de Luca, Didur, conductor Bodanzky; revived 1957, with Amara, Tucker, London, conductor Mitropoulos. Sadler's Wells, 1934, with Cross, Wendon, Austin, conductor Collingwood; revived 1952, with Shuard. Vienna, 1937, with Lehmann, conductor Walter; Berlin, 1945, with Lemnitz, Domgraf-Fassbaender; Vienna, 1950, with Welitsch, Schock, London, Frick; Glyndebourne, 1968, with Söderström, Ochman, Selimsky, Kim Borg, conductor

Pritchard; Covent Garden, 1971, with Ileana Cotrubas, Robert Tear, Victor Braun, conductor Georg Solti, producer Peter Hall.

Madame Larina, who owns an estate ... Mezzo-Soprano
 Tatiana } her daughters Soprano
 Olga } Contralto
 Filipievna, Tatiana's nurse Mezzo-Soprano
 Lenski, Olga's fiancé Tenor
 Yevgeny Onyegin, his friend Baritone
 Prince Gremin, a retired general Bass
 A Captain Bass
 Zaretski Bass
 Monsieur Triquet, a Frenchman Tenor

Place: A Country Estate; St Petersburg

Time: Late Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

The idea of setting Pushkin's poem, Yevgeny Onyegin, as an opera was suggested to Tchaikovsky in 1877, by which date he had already written four operas. After a short hesitation, he accepted the subject, and with it the risk of being accused of misrepresenting a classic – for Pushkin's poem was already looked upon in Russia as being in that class. He set the Letter Scene straight away, and at the time he wrote that he loved Tatiana and was terribly indignant with Onyegin, who seemed to him a cold, heartless coxcomb. It was during the course of work on his opera that he himself received a passionate avowal of love from a girl who had apparently made his acquaintance while he was teaching at the Conservatory in Moscow; his determination not to emulate Onyegin was so strong that he took the fatal decision to embark on a loveless marriage. The results were disastrous, and the composer, a homosexual, seems to have been lucky to escape with nothing worse than a severe nervous breakdown before doctors insisted that the marriage come to an end.

¹ In Opera.

Much of Pushkin's social commentary finds no place in the libretto, but in general the latter follows fairly closely the lines of the poem, apart that is to say from the emphasis thrown on Tatiana as opposed to Onyegin, and the ending which has been amplified and slightly romanticised so that there is a duet between Tatiana and Onyegin before Tatiana leaves him to contemplate a future without her.

Act I. The short prelude is built up on the phrase (Ex. 1):

It is wonderfully apt to the purpose, and produces on the listener a curious effect of anticipation.

The curtain rises to reveal Madame Larina's garden. She is sitting with Filipevna making jam, and through the open window of the house can be heard the voices of Tatiana and Olga as they practise a duet. The two older women listen to the first stanza in silence but start to talk (like all country house audiences, big or small) during the second, and the duet of necessity becomes a quartet. Outside the garden can be heard the sound of a chorus of reapers coming nearer. They present Madame Larina with a decorated sheaf, singing the while an attractive tune of evident folk-song connections. The chorus is followed by a rapid choral dance.

Tatiana timidly says that these country songs transport her in imagination to far-off regions, but Olga takes a matter-of-fact line and says she has no time for such dreams; they do nothing but make her want to dance too. In a little song which is not without tenderness, she gives expression to her light-hearted philosophy. Madame Larina congratulates her daughter, and thanks the reapers for their song. She and Filipevna notice that Tatiana looks pale, but she says (and the clarinet plays a theme associated with her) she is only absorbed in her book, with its tale of lovers' troubles. A carriage is heard on the drive; Lenski must be here – and is it not Onyegin with him? Tatiana's imagination flies ahead of her and she tries to get away, but is restrained.

Madame Larina greets her guests, but leaves her daughters to entertain them. A quartet begins, the men and the women conversing separately. Finally, Lenski goes towards Olga, Onyegin to Tatiana, and the first pair talk of their mutual pleasure in meeting – they are engaged and have not seen each other since yesterday – and the second of the pleasures, or otherwise, of existence in the country. This conversational music sounds wonderfully natural. Lenski has an arioso passage of rapturous import, which is both sincere and immature, conventional and poetic – but then the characters in this opera have a tendency to be life-like persons, rather than romantic giants. Before the scene ends there is a short passage during which Onyegin and Tatiana return from their stroll down the garden, the former finishing a story; it gives Filipevna the chance of speculating aloud as to the possibility of Tatiana being interested in the young neighbour.

The scene changes to Tatiana's bedroom, where Filipevna is saying goodnight to her charge. There is delicate, suggestive orchestral writing in the short prelude. Tatiana and her nurse have been talking, but Tatiana cannot get to sleep and asks Filipevna to tell her a story – about her own early life, and her marriage. Tatiana listens for a bit but her thoughts soon wander and the gradually mounting tension in the orchestra shows the way her feelings are rising. Filipevna asks her if she is ill; no, she is not, but she is in love, Tatiana tells her – and Filipevna must keep it a secret.

The moment she is alone, the violence of her emotion finds full expression in an orchestral passage which precedes the ecstatic phrase with which she releases her pent-up feelings:

She starts to write and the orchestra with a wealth of detail supplies what she does not say aloud.

She makes a fresh start and, as Gerald Abraham¹ has admirably put it, 'the simple oboe line crossed by the dropping fourths and fifths of flute, clarinet and horn and the light splash of the harp magically not only conveys the naive character and romantic mood of the writer but suggests, almost pantomimically, the act of writing in a way comparable with, though not like, the "writing" passages in Boris Godunov and Khovanshchina (the scene in Pimen's cell and the scene of the public scribe)':

Snatches of recitative are interspersed with the letter writing, and the music is now lyrical and reflective, now impassioned and almost declamatory, the contrasting moods being bound together by the commentary of the orchestra. Could she love another, she asks herself? Never!

Everything she has ever done has been done for him, as if in his presence. The horn answers the voice in an expressive phrase: Gerald Abraham has called it a motto theme for the whole opera, though an unconscious one, which is particularly apt since the Letter Scene is known to have been composed before the rest of the music, Tchaikovsky having even thought at one time of setting it as a song quite apart from its context.

Each stage of the fateful letter which is to change Tatiana's life is expressed in the music until finally it is finished and nothing is left but to send it. Day is dawning, the sound of a shepherd's pipes can be heard, and Filipevna comes to waken Tatiana. She is sent to deliver the note to Onyegin, and the curtain falls as the orchestra recapitulates Tatiana's longing.

The third tableau of the first act takes place in a different part of the garden which we already saw in the first scene. Girls sing a graceful, folk-like chorus as they gather the crop of berries, and Tatiana comes on the scene in a state of considerable emotion; she has seen Onyegin making his way towards her, and in a minute she will know the answer to her letter – would she had never written it! Onyegin in his aria expresses himself calmly and collectedly. She has written frankly to him, he will answer her no less frankly, as is her due. He is not cruel, but discouraging within the code of manners. Love and marriage are not for him; he loves her like a brother, no more. The chorus is heard again as Onyegin gently leads the humiliated Tatiana from the scene.

Act II. A ball is in progress at Madame Larina's house in honour of Tatiana's birthday. The guests are engaged in an old-fashioned waltz, and they sing of their enjoyment as they dance. Onyegin is dancing with Tatiana, a combination which gives rise to some ill-natured gossip among the more senior element of the neighbours, who look upon Onyegin with anything but favour. He is bored with the whole business and chooses to direct his spite against Lenski, who insisted he should come, by stealing a dance from Olga that she had promised to her fiancé. Lenski's remonstrance is in vain, and Olga defends her behaviour when he reproaches her with it, giving the Cotillon as well to the persistent and – says Lenski – flirtatious Onyegin.

There is a diversion as Triquet, the old French tutor, consents to sing a song, which he dedicates to Tatiana. It is a charming piece of pastiche, as good in its way as its equivalent in The Queen of Spades – how perfectly Tchaikovsky did this kind of thing! The Cotillon begins with a Mazurka, and Onyegin and Olga dance, watched angrily by Lenski. Onyegin provokes him by asking why he does not join in, and a quarrel slowly works up until Lenski challenges his erstwhile friend to give him satisfaction. Madame Larina is in a great state that this sort of thing should happen in her house. In music of melting tenderness,² Lenski recalls the happiness he has known in just this house which he has now made the scene of a quarrel

¹ In the symposium on Tchaikovsky published by Lindsay Drummond.

² When I heard this opera in Moscow in 1961, Lenski was the great Sergei Lemeshev, advertised outside in letters as big as the opera's title and cheered to the echo by the younger element of the audience. His singing of the opening of this great ensemble was unforgettable, full of ritardando and the nearest thing I have met in real life to the poetic bel canto to be found in the records of, for instance, Fernando de Lucia.

and a scandal. In the ensemble which follows, Onyegin bitterly regrets his provocative and thoughtless behaviour, and everyone else, including by now Tatiana, is filled with consternation at the prospect of the duel. Onyegin makes up his mind that the affair has gone too far for reconciliation, and he and Lenski insult each other, rush together and are separated as the scene comes to an end.

Early next morning the duel is to take place. The melancholy prelude anticipates Lenski's great scene of farewell to life and all he has loved. He and his second, Zaretski, exchange a few words and he is then left alone. He sings of his past, his carefree youth, and contrasts it with his present state, when he cares little whether as a result of the duel he is left alive or dead; the loss of Olga will be his one regret. It is a fine lyrical outpouring, supreme among tenor scenes in Russian opera, and unbearably pathetic in its context.

Onyegin arrives, rather late – Pushkin describes how he overslept – and Zaretski immediately demands to know where his second is; duels cannot be fought except according to the rules, and he owns that he is a stickler for etiquette. Onyegin introduces his servant as his second, and hopes that Zaretski will have no objection; he is a man of the highest character. The two seconds go off to discuss the conditions of the duel, and Lenski and Onyegin stand apart without looking at one another and sing a canon whose form exactly expresses the relationship – the thoughts of the two men are similar but divided by form and come together only as they regret that etiquette precludes a reconciliation at this late hour. The bleak tune has just that dead-pan nervousness which the situation might be expected to produce, and the repetition of the word 'No' at the end has a chilling finality. The opponents measure up, and Lenski is killed. Students of irony will remember that Pushkin himself was killed in a duel only six years after writing Yevgeny Onyegin.

Act III. Some years have passed and the end of the story takes place in St Petersburg. A ball is in progress in a fashionable house – the contrast with the country dance at Madame Larina's cannot be over-emphasised. As the curtain rises, a Polonaise begins (the Polonaise often heard in concert performance, just as the Waltz in the previous act was the Waltz). Onyegin is there, just returned at the age of twenty-six to civilisation after the years he has spent in the wilderness to atone for the death of the friend he killed in a duel. An Ecossaise begins but the tempo changes to a slow waltz in D flat as Prince Gremin and his wife – Tatiana, no less – come into the ballroom. The guests, Onyegin among them, comment on her beauty. The Prince goes to talk to his kinsman, Onyegin, who questions him as to the identity of the lady with whom he has come to the ball, while Tatiana asks those nearest her who it is her husband is talking to. The beauty of the waltz theme and the skill with which Tchaikovsky uses it as a background for conversation are equally notable.

In an aria Gremin tells Onyegin of the love and beauty Tatiana has brought into his life since their marriage two years ago. The aria is a favourite of every Russian bass, and it has the important effect in the opera of maintaining Gremin as no lay figure but a thinking, feeling person, part of Tatiana's background it is true, but real enough to make her loyalty entirely plausible. The solitary aria in fact creates the impression of a truly noble presence.

Gremin introduces his cousin to his wife, and Tatiana asks to be taken home, leaving Onyegin to vent his feelings in an impassioned aria, whose final section is the same (a minor third lower) as the opening section to Tatiana's Letter Scene. The scene ends with a repeat of the Ecossaise.

The last scene plays in a reception room in Prince Gremin's house. Tatiana has had Onyegin's letter and there is no doubt that he is now hopelessly in love with her, to such an extent that words fail him at his entrance and he sinks on his knees at her feet. Tatiana recalls their former meetings – the letter, and his lecture to her on the subject of maidenly reticence – to a tune (derived from Gremin's aria) which is heard played by flute and clarinet in octaves in the orchestral prelude to the scene. She contrives to make some show of indignation at his return; is he only looking for the notoriety of having his name coupled with that of a woman prominent in society? But he is so obviously sincere and in earnest that she cannot restrain her tears for long. For a moment they recall the happiness that could have been theirs long ago, but which, through fate's decree, is now out of their reach. She is Gremin's wife, says Tatiana, and they must part. But Onyegin urges his love once more, and Tatiana sings grandly in D flat, a motif which is to dominate the rest of the scene. Characteristically, though it stands for her admission of her love, it is first heard as she admonishes Onyegin to remember the path of honour and leave her, and only later as an avowal of love. For a moment they sing this theme together, as Tatiana prays for courage, but suddenly she finds the strength to go out of the room, leaving Onyegin distraught behind her as the curtain falls.

Andante molto mosso

The music of Onegin can be seen to have grown outwards from the Letter Scene, so much of it is derived from that great central episode. This is not surprising, since for the most part the other characters are seen in relation to Tatiana, and therefore naturally take their cue from her great moment of self-revelation (the duel scene is the only one in which Tatiana does not appear at all; otherwise, only the Waltz and the Polonaise may be said to take place without paying much attention to her or her style of music). A successful performance reveals one of the great romantic masterpieces of the operatic form. H.

THE MAID OF ORLEANS

Orleanskaya Dyeva

Opera in four acts, text by the composer, founded on Zhukovsky's Russian version of Schiller's tragedy. Première, St Petersburg, 25 February 1881, with M.D. Kamenskaya, M.D. Vasiliev, F.I. Stravinsky (Igor Stravinsky's father) as Dunois. First performed Prague, 1882 – the first of Tchaikovsky's operas to be heard outside Russia. Revived Brno, 1940, conductor Rafael Kubelik; Perugia, 1956, with Marcella Pobbe, David Poleri, Enzo Mascherini, conductor Perlea; Saarbrücken, 1967; Leipzig, 1970; Royal Northern College of Music, Manchester, 1994.

Joan of Arc.....Mezzo-Soprano or Soprano¹
 Charles VII, King of France.....Tenor
 Agnès Sorel, his mistress.....Soprano
 Thibaut, Joan's father.....Bass
 Raymond, a young man in love with Joan.....Tenor
 Dunois, a French soldier.....Baritone
 Bertrand, an old peasant.....Bass
 Lionel, a Burgundian soldier.....Baritone

The ArchbishopBass
 A SoldierBass
 LoreBass
 An Angel Voice.....Soprano

Place: France

Time: 1430–31

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Act I. An extended prelude introduces immediately a yearning, compassionate theme, andante and very Slav in its expression. There follows a fiery allegro vivo (associated with the sound of the tocsin and the crowd's fear in face of English military successes) and an allegro giusto (associated with Joan's hearing of the angel voices at the end of Act I and her determination to pursue a course of resistance).

In the village of Domrémy, girls sing as they decorate an ancient oak. Thibaut, Joan's father, comes in with a young man, Raymond, whom he envisages as the husband Joan will need to defend her in the troubled times in which they are living. There is a trio started by Raymond during whose course Joan is introduced musically to the opera. The mood changes with the sound of a tocsin and the populace expresses dread of the successful English invasion (the allegro vivo of the overture). An old peasant, Bertrand, describes the incipient disaster, and Joan alone refuses to react in terms of despair. In a mood of inspiration, she prophesies the victory of the French troops and the death of the leader of the enemy forces, Salisbury. No one believes her, her father tending to think that she is influenced by the devil; but a soldier comes in to confirm the death of Salisbury and immediately hope is renewed. In ecstasy, Joan leads them in prayer, Raymond and Bertrand joining their voices to the general mood of confidence.

Left alone, Joan expresses her conviction that the time has come to act, to leave home and join the troops. Her aria of decision is a splendid and justly famous utterance, simple of melody, warm and emotional in its appeal.² Joan hears a chorus of angels saying that the day of decision has arrived, and the act ends as she prophesies victory to the tune of the overture's allegro giusto.

Act II. The royal castle at Chinon. A martial

¹ The original Joan was a mezzo-soprano and Tchaikovsky modified some sections of the score for her.

² Popularly known as 'Adieu forêts', and once a favourite recording piece for sopranos and mezzos alike.

entr'acte, based on Joan's rallying of the French in the previous scene, leads us to the King's presence. Minstrels and tumblers entertain the King and his mistress Agnès Sorel, first in a beguiling and gently lyrical tune whose melody is assigned by Tchaikovsky to the chorus but has sometimes been sung by tenor solo, and later in a succession of musically attractive dances. The soldierly Dunois in a duet tries to persuade Charles to place himself at the head of his army and lead the French against the English, but the King is irresolute, and cannot bring himself to leave Agnès. Suddenly, a wounded soldier brings news of further losses in battle and expires before he can even finish his message. The King loses what courage he had, and Dunois indignantly leaves him to the consolation of Agnès, which is gently and effectively accomplished, first in an arioso then in duet.

Fanfares are heard and Dunois re-enters to announce a near-miracle, victory snatched from the hands of the English, a fact immediately confirmed to the incredulous King by the Archbishop himself. This dignitary further relates that the instrument of the enemy's discomfiture was an unknown warrior maid. The people rejoice, bells are rung, and Joan enters. Dunois has previously on instruction taken the King's place on the throne, but Joan immediately picks out her sovereign from the surrounding courtiers. To his astonishment, she can tell him the purport of his secret prayers but her finest moment – writing no less expressive than Mussorgsky's for Marfa in Khovanshchina – comes in an inspired passage when she tells the story of her life. The Archbishop leads a massive general ensemble of approval which mounts to enthusiasm when the King places her at the head of the army.

Act III, scene i. Vigorous introductory music brings the rise of the curtain to show Joan in single combat with Lionel, a Burgundian fighting on the English side. She has him at her mercy but spares his life and, as she sees him face to face, they fall in love. After an extended duet, Lionel prefers to surrender to Dunois as prisoner rather than make his escape.

A march leads to scene ii, the Coronation of the King as Charles VII at Reims (it was this scene which at the time of the first performance brought critical complaints of the influence of Meyerbeer on the composer). After appropriate ceremonial business, Thibaut and Raymond reappear, the King proclaims Joan the saviour of France, Thibaut denounces her as diabolically inspired, and a splendid ensemble follows. Joan, urged by King and Archbishop to defend herself but believing her sparing of Lionel's life and her love for him to be a sign of inner guilt, remains silent. Dunois throws down a gauntlet, a challenge to someone to pick up as defender of Joan's innocence. Loud claps of thunder are taken as a sign from heaven that she is guilty and all leave except Lionel and Joan herself. When he offers to protect her, she recoils from him in horror as the enemy who has brought destruction upon her. At the end of the act she is left alone to contemplate the King's sentence of banishment upon her.

Act IV, scene i. A wood. Introduced by turbulent music, Joan sits alone, torn by thoughts of her love for Lionel, who presently appears by her side. Their impassioned duet is one of the crucial episodes of the score, its course interrupted by sounds of heavenly voices telling her that she will atone for her sins with suffering and death. Enemy soldiers appear and Lionel is killed, Joan taken prisoner.

Scene ii. A square in Rouen. Joan has been condemned to death at the stake and a funeral march ushers in the final scene. The crowd is moved by her imminent fate, Joan's courage momentarily fails but her angel voices bring consolation, and the music moves on inexorably as she is tied to the stake and the fire lit.

H.

MAZEPPA

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer and V.P. Burenin (founded on Pushkin's Poltava). Première Moscow, 15 February 1884, and in St Petersburg, 19 February 1884. First performed in England, Liverpool, 16 August 1888 (in Russian, by a touring company); in Germany, at Wiesbaden, 1931; in New York, 1933, by a Ukrainian company. Revived Florence, 1954, with Magda Olivero, Marianna Radev, David Poleri, Ettore Bastianini, Boris Christoff, conductor Jonel Perlea; English National Opera, 1984, with Janice Cairns, Felicity Palmer, Rowland Sidwell, Malcolm Donnelly, Richard Van Allan, conductor Mark Elder.

Mazeppa, *the Cossack Hetman*¹ Baritone
Kochubey, a wealthy Cossack Bass
Maria, his daughter Soprano

¹ Hetman is derived through Polish from the German 'Hauptmann', Captain.

Andrei, a young Cossack Tenor
 Orlik, Mazeppa's henchman Bass
 Iskra, Governor of Poltava, Kochubey's friend Tenor
 Liubov, Kochubey's wife Mezzo-Soprano
 A Drunken Cossack Tenor

Cossacks and their Women, Kochubey's Servants,
 Monks

Place: Little Russia

Time: Beginning of the Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Tchaikovsky first told his publisher about the project of an opera on the subject of Mazeppa in June 1881, less than four months after the production of The Maid of Orleans. He seems to have vacillated in his enthusiasm for the project, writing four numbers, breaking off to sketch out a duet made from the material of the symphonic Romeo and Juliet, and then embarking on another love duet, inspired by a play by Antropov. Before long this last had become the great duet of Mazeppa and Maria in Act II, and from then on, apart from some disappointment over the time he took over the orchestration, he seems to have been fairly satisfied with progress.

The story is based on fact. Mazeppa, a noted amorist, was over sixty when he married his god-daughter Maria. He was a learned man, educated partly in Warsaw, and his friendship with the young Tsar, Peter the Great, was based as much on the latter's insatiable curiosity and thirst for knowledge as on political expediency. In 1708 Mazeppa took an army of Cossacks to join Charles XII of Sweden in his campaign against Peter. Defeated at the Battle of Poltava, he fled to Turkey, where he died in 1709. In Russia he was regarded as a traitor of epic proportions, his name solemnly anathematised, it appears, once a year from every altar in Russia until 1918!

Act I. The overture is a brilliant piece, containing a foretaste of the Hopak, and a beautiful andantino con moto melody. The first scene takes place in the garden of the rich Cossack, Kochubey. Girls sing a flowing 5/4 chorus as they tell their fortunes by throwing garlands into the river, but Maria, Kochubey's daughter, will not join in their game. She loves the powerful Mazeppa, her father's contemporary and guest, and when the girls have gone, she makes it clear that his grey hair and a wide difference in age seem to her no obstacles to enduring love. Her soliloquy is interrupted by Andrei, a young Cossack madly, but as he knows hopelessly, in love with her. In their lyrical duet, Maria asks for his forgiveness for the pain she causes him.

Mazeppa comes out and renews his thanks to Kochubey for the extent of his hospitality. To all he wishes good fortune for the future, and Kochubey orders his retainers to provide entertainment for their honoured guest. This they do, in chorus and a rousing Hopak, the latter a particularly attractive piece.

Alone with Kochubey, Mazeppa loses no time in asking for the hand of Maria in marriage. At first his friend, with many protestations of affection, tries to put him off, urging that Mazeppa is the girl's godfather; how could he marry her? But Mazeppa insists, until Kochubey gives him a round refusal and demands that he leave the house. The quarrel attracts attention, and Liubov, Andrei and Iskra, followed by Kochubey's retainers and guests, come to see what is the matter. A great ensemble develops, with Maria torn between duty to her father and love for Mazeppa, who resolves the situation by summoning his followers to carry off Maria by force. Maria makes her choice to go with Mazeppa willingly and, with a last threat to his hosts, Mazeppa takes his bride away.

The second scene plays in a room in Kochubey's house. Women, led by Liubov, are lamenting the departure of Maria. Liubov, supported by Iskra and Kochubey's retainers, urges revenge on Mazeppa for the injury he has done them, and Kochubey resolves to unmask what he describes as Mazeppa's false patriotism and to reveal to the Tsar¹ that Mazeppa is secretly intriguing with the Swedes. Andrei's offer to carry the information to the Tsar is accepted by Kochubey in music of grave conviction, and the finale ends with general support for the expedition.

Act II, scene i. A dungeon in Mazeppa's castle. The Tsar, who trusts Mazeppa, has delivered his accusers into his hands. Kochubey is chained to a pillar. He bemoans his fate. Orlik comes specifically to discover where he has hidden his treasure. The old man will give nothing away, and Orlik summons the torturer to add force to his interrogation. The scene is one of Tchaikovsky's finest, packed with conflict, from the sombre and beautiful prelude, through ¹ The period is some twenty years later than that of Khovanshchina.

Kochubey's fine and gloomy monologue to the intensely dramatic interview between him and Orlik.

Scene ii. A room in the castle. Mazeppa is looking out of the window and Tchaikovsky shows him in a very different light from the tyrant postulated in the previous scene, as he poetises in a lovely passage over the beauty of the Ukrainian night. He stills his conscience with reminders of Kochubey's ambition; he must die, and when Orlik comes to tell him that torture has wrung nothing from the old man, he gives orders for his execution in the morning. Left alone, Mazeppa gives passionate expression in a big arioso in G flat to his love for Maria, who, he says, has brought spring into an old man's life (this arioso was interpolated after the opera's initial production).

With the entrance of Maria we reach the key scene of the opera, the equivalent of the Letter Scene in Onegin, whose achievement sets the rest of the opera in motion, giving body to the central dramatic figures, though not quite permeating the music as in the case of Onegin. Maria reproaches Mazeppa because he has lately seemed cold to her, and he replies with a warmth that is entirely consistent with that shown in the preceding arioso. He goes on to tell her of his plan to set up an independent state in the Ukraine with himself at its head.

Maria does not hide her enthusiasm or her confidence in him, even when he says that the adventure may lead him to a throne or the gallows. Mazeppa tests her: whom she would choose to see saved if it came to a question of death for him or for her father? She would sacrifice anyone rather than Mazeppa.

Left alone, Maria starts to think of her parents, but is suddenly joined by her mother who has stolen into the castle unobserved by the guards. Will her daughter use her influence to save her father from the sentence of death under which he lies? Maria does not understand what she is talking about, and Liubov explains that Kochubey's actions against Mazeppa have brought him to his present miserable situation. Maria is aghast at the news, and both rush out to do what they can to save Kochubey.

Scene iii. A field by the scaffold. People are waiting for the arrival of the executioner's victims. Tchaikovsky describes this as a 'folk scene', and it is punctuated by the song of a drunken Cossack, who sings a ribald song (musical ancestry held in common with the Inn Scene in Boris), much to the discomfiture of the crowd – an admirable piece of dramatic irony. The procession comes into sight with Mazeppa on horseback, Kochubey and Iskra heavily guarded. Kochubey prays movingly, and at the moment the axe falls, Maria and her mother rush in to try to save him, but too late.

Act III begins with a symphonic picture 'The Battle of Poltava', sometimes played in the concert hall. As musical symbols of the Russian victory, Tchaikovsky makes use of the famous 'Slava' (used also by Beethoven in his second Rasumovsky quartet, by Mussorgsky in the Coronation Scene in Boris, and by Rimsky-Korsakov in The Tsar's Bride), as well as of a liturgical chant, which he himself had employed earlier in the 1812 Overture, and, most extensively, of a military march of the period of Peter the Great.

When the curtain rises it is to show the same scene as the first scene of Act I, but now neglected and half ruined. Andrei in an aria vigorously voices his regret that he has not been able to revenge himself on Mazeppa in the battle. He has returned now to the spot which was once the centre of all his thoughts, the place where he was happy in the company of Maria. He hears the sound of horses' hooves and hides. Mazeppa comes in with Orlik, in flight from the Tsar's troops. Mazeppa turns and abuses Orlik who has addressed him by his title of Hetman – the title he has lost in his vain attempt to win supreme power.

Andrei recognises Mazeppa's voice, and challenges him to answer for his misdeeds in mortal combat. Andrei attacks Mazeppa but is fatally wounded, and lies dying when Maria emerges from the house. Mazeppa calls to her, but she has lost command of her senses, half recognises him only and babbles of her father's death, of which the direct cause has been her own elopement. Orlik drags Mazeppa away, urging him to forget a woman who is mad and who has brought him to his present pitch of disaster.

Maria is left alone in her misery. She takes Andrei's head in her hands and sings softly to him of their happy childhood. He dies in her arms and an opera in which blood, battle and ambition have figured large, ends with the gentlest of cradle songs.¹

H.

¹ The conventional grand finale heard at the first performance was subsequently cut by the composer, who quickly saw that the quiet ending not only kept Maria in the centre of the picture but was also more effective.

THE QUEEN OF SPADES

Pikovaya Dama/Pique Dame

Opera in three acts, text by Modest Tchaikovsky (the composer's brother), based on Pushkin. Première St Petersburg, 19 December 1890, with Nicola Figner and Medea Mei. First produced at la Scala, Milan, 1906, with Corsi, Zenatello, Stracciari, Didur; Metropolitan, New York, 1910, with Destinn, Meitschek, Slezak, Didur, Forsell, conductor Mahler; London Opera House, 1915, with Rosing; Vienna State Opera, 1946, with Hilde Konetzni and Welitsch, Hoengen, Lorenz, Schoeffler, conductor Krips; Covent Garden, 1950 (in English), with Zadek, Coates, Edgar Evans, Rothmüller, Walters, conductor Erich Kleiber. Revived Metropolitan, New York, 1965, with Stratas, Resnik, Vickers, conductor Schippers; Glyndebourne, 1971, with Kubiak, Maievsky, conductor John Pritchard; English National Opera, 1983, with Graham Clark, conductor Mark Elder, producer David Pountney.

Officers

| | |
|--------------------------------|---------------|
| Tchekalinsky | Tenor |
| Sourin..... | Bass |
| Herman..... | Tenor |
| Count Tomsy | Baritone |
| Prince Yeletsky..... | Baritone |
| The Countess | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Lisa, her grand-daughter..... | Soprano |
| Pauline, Lisa's companion..... | Contralto |
| Governess | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Masha, Lisa's maid..... | Soprano |
| Master of Ceremonies | Tenor |
| Tchaplitky..... | Tenor |
| Narumoff | Bass |

In the interlude

| | |
|------------------------|-----------|
| Chloë | Soprano |
| Daphnis (Pauline)..... | Contralto |
| Plutus (Tomsy)..... | Baritone |

Servants, Guests, Gamblers, Children

Place: St Petersburg

Time: End of the Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 55 minutes

Quite a number of changes of emphasis as well as of detail were made before Pushkin's poem could become an opera libretto – and these have often come in for hostile criticism. Pushkin's story is cynical in character, with a mixture of the grotesque, and his hero is a cold-blooded, unromantic officer, interested only in the secret of the cards and not in any way concerned with Lisa, except in so far as she brings him into contact with the old Countess.

Tchaikovsky and his brother have turned Herman into a romantic, almost Byronic character nearly as much in love with Lisa as with gambling, and they have elevated Lisa to become the Countess's grand-daughter, at the same time providing the story with a tragic ending. That they have made something that differs from Pushkin's original story is undeniable; but whether it is less good is a moot point.

Act I, scene i. A short prelude leads to the first scene, which is laid in an open space in the Summer Garden, St Petersburg. It is spring, and seated on the benches are nurses and governesses chatting together. Children are playing. After a chorus, Sourin and Tchekalinsky enter, discussing the gambling propensities of Herman; it seems that he was last night at his usual habit of watching the players, never risking a throw.

As they speak, Herman comes in with his friend Tomsy, who is questioning him about the sorrow which seems to hang over his life, and has quite changed him from the spirited boy he once knew. Herman explains the change by saying that he has fallen in love, but does not even know the name of the object of his affections. His arioso in praise of the unknown lady has a typical Tchaikovskian ardour. Tomsy suggests that the first thing to do is to learn the lady's name, but Herman is afraid she is above him in station and will prove beyond his reach. Tomsy is amazed at Herman's mixture of devotion and despair, and they go off together.

The promenade continues, Tomsy and Herman return, and the former greets Prince Yeletsky, who has that very morning become engaged. Yeletsky points out his Lisa to Tomsy, and Herman recognises her as his own beloved. Lisa and her grandmother, the Countess, exclaim as they catch sight of Herman; they have noticed his ardent looks, but are unaware of his identity. A short quintet ensues, after which Tomsy greets the Countess, who asks Herman's name, and Yeletsky goes towards Lisa.

Presently the Countess takes her grand-daughter away, and the others speculate as to the rumours which surround the Countess's past. She was a great gambler it seems. Is it possible to believe such stories? Tomsy is surprised that her history is not better known, and proceeds to tell it in a ballad. The Countess was a beauty when she was young, and one of her most ardent admirers was the Count

Saint-Germain; but, alas, she preferred gambling to love. One day at the tables she had lost everything; her depression was noticed by the Count, who followed her from the room, and offered to reveal to her the secret of 'three cards', would she but grant him one rendezvous. Her indignation at such a suggestion was quickly overcome, and next morning she was back at the tables, where nothing could stop her winning run. It was whispered that she subsequently passed the secret on to her husband, and years later to a young gallant who had taken her fancy; but in a dream she had been warned that she would die when next anyone tried to win her secret from her.

The recital is not lost on Herman, and Tchekalinsky and Sourin hasten to repeat the refrain mockingly in his ear. A storm is brewing, and all take shelter except Herman, who stays as if in a trance. He broods on the story – what use would the secret be to him with Lisa beyond his reach? – and then gives expression to his determination to win her.

Scene ii. Lisa's room. She sits at the harpsichord, surrounded by girls of her own age. She and Pauline together sing an old-fashioned duet, which, no less than for instance the opening duet of Eugene Onegin, shows how much life Tchaikovsky can breathe into what is no more and no less than pastiche. The listeners applaud, and demand more; Lisa asks Pauline to sing alone, and she follows her romance with a lively peasant song, too lively it appears for the peace of the house, for the governess comes in to ask for a little less noise.

Lisa sees her friends to the door, and tries to fob off Pauline's enquiries about her gloomy look. When she is alone, she gives vent to her feelings in a beautiful aria. Is this marriage to which she is contracted the fulfilment of her dreams? Nobody could have better qualifications than the Prince – he is kind, good-looking, clever, well-born, rich – and yet her heart is full of heavy foreboding.

Suddenly Herman appears at the window. Lisa makes as if to rush through the door, but Herman persuades her to stay and listen to him for a moment. In music of passionate tenderness, he declares his love, and it is immediately evident that Lisa is far from indifferent to what he says. Their conversation is interrupted by a loud knocking at the door; it is the Countess, come to see if Lisa is yet asleep. Herman hides, Lisa calms the Countess's fears, while Herman softly echoes the refrain of Tomsy's ballad; can it be true that she will die when a third man 'impelled by despair' demands to know the secret? When they are left alone, Lisa sinks into Herman's arms.

Act II, scene i. A large reception room. A masked ball is taking place at the house of a rich dignitary. The Master of Ceremonies invites the guests into the garden to see the firework display, and Tchekalinsky and Sourin plan to play a trick on Herman, who, they say, is obsessed by the idea of the Countess's 'three cards'. The Prince is there with Lisa, to whom he addresses an aria whose sentiments are both noble and touchingly chivalrous: 'I love you, dear, beyond all reckoning'. They go off together, and Herman appears reading a note which Lisa has sent him: 'After the performance wait for me in my room. I must speak with you.' Did he but know the secret of the 'three cards', he could be wealthy, and then aspire to Lisa's hand. As if to echo his thoughts, he hears Tchekalinsky and Sourin whisper: 'Are you then that third man? ... three cards?' Herman wonders whether he is hearing the voice of a ghost.

The Master of Ceremonies announces: 'Our host now prays you all to take your seats, to see a pretty pastoral called The Faithful Shepherdess.' It is the story of Daphnis, Chloë, and Plutus. A chorus and sara-band are followed by a Mozartian duet for Chloë and Daphnis (the latter is played by Pauline). There is an impressive entry for Plutus (Tomsy), riding in a golden chariot, but Chloë spurns his love, and she and Daphnis plight their troth to the tune of their earlier duet. The chorus rejoices in the happiness of the two lovers.

The interlude over, Herman waits for Lisa. She gives him a key and tells him to gain access to their house through her grandmother's room – the old woman will still be playing cards at midnight – and then with the key open the secret door, which is situated behind the portrait of the Countess, and which leads to her own apartments. Herman says he cannot wait until the following day, but will come that very night; Lisa is submissive to his desire. The act ends as the Master of Ceremonies announces the imminent arrival of the Empress herself, and the guests join in welcoming her.

Scene ii. The Countess's bedroom, which is empty. Herman enters, hesitates for a moment, and then hearing the sound of voices conceals himself. The Countess herself, preceded by maids and attendants, comes in. She takes off her evening dress and puts on a nightgown, then stops the sycophantic chorus which has been accompanying her preparations for bed and says she will sit in a chair for a few minutes. Some reflections on the decline of society are followed by reminiscences of 'the old days', when things were done as they should be, when people really could dance, when Madame de Pompadour was queen of Paris, when she herself – the Countess – sang before the King. She sings very softly to herself an air from Grétry's Richard Cœur de Lion; then, suddenly aware that the room is still full of servants, their eyes and ears bursting with curiosity, sends them all packing.

*The Queen of Spades (Glyndebourne, 1992, director Graham Vick, designer Richard Hudson).
Felicity Palmer as the old Countess, Yuri Marusin as Herman.*

She is alone, and again starts to hum the tune which is in her head. But the words die on her lips as she catches sight of Herman in front of her. She does not speak another word, but mouths incoherently as if she had lost the power of speech. Herman begs her not to be frightened; he wants nothing but that she should tell him her secret, the secret of the 'three cards'. In desperation Herman draws his pistol, and the Countess dies of shock at the sight. With a despairing cry that he can now never know the secret, he turns to find Lisa entering the room, alarmed by the noise. She is horrified by the sight which meets her eyes, and no less horrified to learn why it was that Herman was there. So it was for love of gambling, not for her sake, that he came here at midnight! She bids him leave.

Act III, scene i. Herman's quarters in the barracks. The sound of drums and trumpets, suggestive of a funeral march, can be heard; Herman sits reading a letter from Lisa, in which she apparently forgives him for the slight she had read into his action, understands that he did not intend to kill her grandmother, and makes an appointment for midnight by the canal. Herman is obsessed by memories of the Countess's funeral, which he attended. Suddenly, the door opens, and the ghost of his victim can be seen in the doorway. She tells Herman that he must marry Lisa, and that the secret of the three cards shall be his: 'Three! Seven! Ace!' He mutters the formula as the curtain falls.

Scene ii. By the canal. Lisa waits for Herman: 'It is near to midnight'. Can he deceive her, and will she wait in vain? Her nerves are worn with sorrow and waiting. Lisa's aria is particularly fine.

Her fears are quieted when Herman appears, and sings to her of their future together. All seems well, until Herman tells her they must leave for the gaming-house. Lisa thinks he is mad, but he blurts out his obsession, and, deaf to her pleading, goes his way. Lisa rushes to the parapet of the canal, and throws herself over the edge.

Scene iii. The gambling house. Supper is in progress, and a few are playing cards. Tomsy greets the Prince with some surprise, since he is no longer a habitual gambler. Yeletsky admits that it is to take his revenge he has come: unlucky in love, lucky at cards. Tomsy is persuaded to sing for their entertainment, which he does to a lively tune. Herman enters, and asks who will play with him. Tchekalinsky accepts, and Herman stakes hugely and wins twice, on the three and seven. He rejoices in his fortune: 'What is our life? A game!', then challenges anyone to stake once more. No one accepts, until the Prince steps forward and offers to play with him. Herman reluctantly agrees, and turns up a card, announcing an ace without even looking at it. But the Prince calmly rejoins: 'No, it's your Queen of Spades'. With a wild cry, Herman sees the ghost of the Countess. Everyone moves away from him, as he gibbers with fear and rage. He stabs himself, and with his dying breath asks for the Prince's pardon for what he has done to him. A prayer goes up for his soul, and he dies. H.

IOLANTA

Opera in one act, libretto by Modest Tchaikovsky, the composer's brother. Première St Petersburg, 6/18 December 1892, with Medea Mei-Figner, Nicola Figner. Revived Leipzig, 1955; Moscow, 1957; London, Camden Festival, 1968, with Josephine Barstow, Adrian de Peyer, Norman Welsby, conductor David Lloyd-Jones; Opera North, 1992, with Joan Rodgers.

René, King of Provence Bass
 Robert, Duke of Burgundy Bass-Baritone
 Count Vaudémont, a Burgundian knight Tenor
 Ebn-Hakia, a Moorish doctor Baritone
 Almeric, King René's armour-bearer Tenor
 Bertrand, the gate-keeper Baritone
 Iolanta, the King's daughter Soprano
 Martha, Iolanta's nurse and Bertrand's wife... Contralto
 Brigitte, Iolanta's friend Soprano
 Laura, Iolanta's friend Mezzo-Soprano
 Servants and Friends of Iolanta, Members of the King's Retinue, the Duke of Burgundy's Retainers

Place: Provence

Time: Fifteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

Iolanta was commissioned to be produced in double harness with the famous ballet Nutcracker. Tchaikovsky began work on it some six months before the première, but soon after he had finished it, he confessed that 'Medieval Dukes and Knights and Ladies captivate my imagination but not my heart'. As so often before, the composer approached the libretto through a crucial scene, here the duet between Iolanta and her lover Vaudémont, and this music permeates the whole score. The libretto has its origins in a story by Hans Andersen.

A sombre prelude perhaps suggests Iolanta's blindness. The curtain rises on a beautiful garden, outside the palace of René, King of Provence. To the accompaniment of graceful music, Princess Iolanta is picking fruit with her friends. Iolanta is blind but, at the King's express command, she has never been allowed to know that she is different from everyone around her. She finds the fruit by touch and puts it in the basket, but gradually she becomes listless: how do they know she is crying without having touched her eyes? In an arioso of some feeling, Iolanta contrasts her present mood of unrest with her former happiness. Martha tries to calm her fears; girls bring in the flowers they have picked, and sing an attractive chorus in 6/8 time, and Martha and Iolanta's friends lull her to sleep in a trio of considerable beauty.

Retainers appear to announce the King's arrival. King René tells the famous Moorish doctor, Ebn-Hakia, that in him rests Iolanta's last hope, and the doctor goes to look at his prospective patient as she lies asleep. When he is alone, the King prays in an aria ('When I, Lord, rouse thy wrath') for God's mercy on his innocent daughter. Ebn-Hakia says he can cure Iolanta's blindness on two conditions: that she be told she is blind, and that she acquire the will to be able to see. The King laments that such a price is more than he is prepared to pay, and even when Ebn-Hakia has (in an arioso full of oriental suggestions) emphasised how much the body is dependent on the spirit, he refuses to agree.

The King and the doctor leave and into the garden come Robert, Duke of Burgundy, and Count Vaudémont, who have lost their way. Vaudémont is immediately taken by the beauty of the garden, and Robert is glad of anything that delays his business with the King – he has never seen Iolanta, to whom he is engaged, but he loves another and wants the King to release him from the betrothal. When Vaudémont suggests that Iolanta may be very beautiful, Robert exclaims in a fine quick-moving outburst: 'Who can compare to Mathilde?' Suddenly they come upon the sleeping girl; Vaudémont is overcome by her beauty, but Robert fears the work of a sorcerer and wants to drag him away. When she wakes, Robert leaves to fetch their companions, and Iolanta brings wine to Vaudémont.

The duet which ensues is the central piece of the opera. Love dawns in a G major theme of great tenderness, and the music quickens as Vaudémont asks Iolanta for a red rose to add to the white one she has already picked for him. She brings him another white one and seems not to understand the difference, and suddenly Vaudémont realises that she is blind. He comforts her and sings of the beauties of the world around them. The climax comes at Vaudémont's impassioned description of light, to which Iolanta's response is no less rapturous.

The King, Ebn-Hakia and Iolanta's attendants enter, expecting to see her asleep, and are astonished instead to find her with a young man, who, she tells them, has given her an idea of the meaning of the word 'light'. The King is overcome with horror, but Ebn-Hakia feels there is now hope of curing Iolanta's blindness. Ebn-Hakia leads a powerful ensemble as everyone reacts to the situation. The King begins to understand and decrees that the stranger's life shall be forfeit if she does not acquire the power of sight. To the big G major theme (now a semitone higher) Iolanta proclaims her determination to save the life of the Knight with whose voice she has fallen in love. She leaves and the King explains to Vaudémont that his threat was intended solely to provide Iolanta with the incentive to see.

Burgundy returns and admits his secret, the King agrees that Vaudémont shall marry Iolanta, and when news is brought of the success of Ebn-Hakia's ministrations, happiness seems to be within the grasp of everyone. The women come out rejoicing, and Iolanta can hardly believe what meets her eyes. She thanks God for his mercy, for the wonders she can now comprehend, and not least for the love she feels in her heart for Vaudémont.

H.

AMBROISE THOMAS

(born 5 August 1811, died 12 February 1896)

MIGNON

Opera in three acts, words, based on Goethe's Wilhelm Meister, by Barbier and Carré. Produced Opéra-Comique, Paris, 17 November 1866, with Galli-Marié. London, Drury Lane, 5 July 1870, with Christine Nilsson, Volpini, Bettini, Faure. New York, Academy of Music, 22 November 1871; Metropolitan Opera House, 1883, with Nilsson, Capoul, Scalchi (Frédéric). Revived Metropolitan, 1926, with Bori, Gigli; Sadler's Wells, 1932, with Rose Morris, Tudor Davies; la Scala, Milan, 1933, with Besanzoni, Schipa; Metropolitan, 1938, with Risé Stevens; la Scala, 1945, with Pederzini, Schipa; 1947, with Simionato, di Stefano. Frédéric, since Trebelli appeared in the role in London, has become a contralto instead of a buffo tenor part. The 'Rondo Gavotte' in Act II, composed for Trebelli, has since then been a fixture in the score.

Mignon, stolen in childhood from an Italian castle.....Mezzo-Soprano
Philine, an actress.....Soprano
Frédéric, a young man.....Buffo Tenor or Contralto
Wilhelm Meister, a student on his travels.....Tenor Laerte, an actor.....Tenor
Lothario.....Bass
Jarno, a gipsy.....Bass
Antonio, a servant.....Bass

Townspeople, Gipsies, Actors and Actresses, etc.

Place: Germany; Italy

Time: Late Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Ambroise Thomas was for years a pillar of the French musical establishment. The revered teacher of Massenet, he became Director of the Conservatoire at the age of sixty, but even his best-known operas – Mignon and Hamlet – dwindled in repute soon after his death.

Notwithstanding the popularity of two airs in Mignon – 'Connais-tu le pays?' and the Polonaise – the opera has lost much of its hold on the repertory. It is a work of delicate texture, of charm rather than passion, with a story that is, perhaps, too ingenuous to appeal to the sophisticated audience of the modern opera house.

Act I. Courtyard of a German inn. Chorus of townspeople and travellers. Lothario, a wandering minstrel, sings, accompanying himself on his harp, 'Fugitif et tremblant'. Philine and Laerte, on the way with their troupe to give a theatrical performance in a neighbouring castle, appear on a balcony. Mignon is sleeping on straw in the back of a gipsy cart. Jarno, chief of the gipsy band, rouses her. She refuses to dance. He threatens her with a stick. Lothario and Wilhelm protect her. Mignon divides a bouquet of wild flowers between them.

Laerte, who has come down from the balcony, engages Wilhelm in conversation. Philine joins them. Wilhelm is greatly impressed with her blonde beauty. He does not protest when Laerte takes from him the wild flowers he has received from Mignon and hands them to Philine.

When Philine and Laerte have gone, there is a scene between Wilhelm and Mignon. The girl tells him of dim memories of her childhood – the land from which she was abducted. It is at this point she sings 'Connais-tu le pays?' (Do you know the land?). Wilhelm decides to purchase her freedom, and enters the inn with Jarno to conclude the negotiations. Lothario has been attracted to her, and, before leaving, bids her farewell. They have the charming duet 'Légères hirondelles'. There is a scene for Philine and Frédéric, a young man, who is in love with her. Philine is after bigger game, setting her cap at Wilhelm. Lothario wishes to take Mignon with him, but Wilhelm fears for her safety with the old man, whose mind sometimes appears to wander. Moreover Mignon ardently desires to remain in the service of Wilhelm who has freed her from bondage to the gipsies, and, when Wilhelm declines to let her go with Lothario, is enraptured, until she sees her wild flowers in Philine's hand. Already she is passionately in love with Wilhelm, and jealous when Philine invites him to attend the theatricals at the castle. Wilhelm waves adieu to Philine, as she drives away. Lothario, pensive, remains seated. Mignon's gaze is directed towards Wilhelm.

Act II. The entr'acte is the tune of the famous gavotte. Philine's boudoir at the castle. The actress sings of her pleasure in these elegant surroundings, and of Wilhelm. Laerte is heard off-stage, singing a madrigal to Philine ('Belle, ayez pitié de nous').

He ushers in Wilhelm and Mignon, then withdraws. Mignon, pretending to fall asleep, watches Wilhelm and Philine. While Wilhelm hands to the actress various toilet accessories, they sing a graceful duet, 'Je crois entendre les doux compliments'. Meanwhile Mignon's heart is tormented with jealousy. When Wilhelm and Philine leave the boudoir the girl dons one of Philine's costumes, seats herself at the mirror and puts on rouge and other cosmetics, as she has seen Philine do. In a spirit of abandon she sings a brilliant Styrienne, 'Je connais un pauvre enfant'. She then withdraws into an adjoining room. Frédéric enters the boudoir in search of Philine. He sings the gavotte, 'Me voici dans son boudoir'. Wilhelm comes in, in search of Mignon. The men meet. There is an exchange of jealous accusations. They are about to fight, when Mignon rushes between them. Frédéric recognises Philine's costume on her, and goes off laughing. Wilhelm, realising the awkward situation that may arise from the girl's following him about, tells her they must part. 'Adieu, Mignon, courage'. She bids him a sad farewell. Philine re-enters. Her sarcastic references to Mignon's attire wound the girl to the quick. When Wilhelm leads out the actress on his arm, Mignon exclaims: 'That woman! I loathe her!'

The second scene of this act is laid in the castle park. Mignon, driven to distraction, sings a scena of real dramatic power: 'Elle est là, près de lui?' She is about to throw herself in the lake, when she hears the strains of a harp. Lothario, who has wandered into the park, is playing. There is an exchange of affection, almost paternal on his part, almost filial on hers, in their duet, 'As-tu souffert? As-tu pleuré?' Mignon hears applause and acclaim from the conservatory for Philine's acting. In jealous rage she cries out that she wishes the building might be struck by lightning and destroyed by fire; then runs off and disappears among the trees. Lothario vaguely repeats her words. "Fire," she said! "Ah, fire! fire!" Through the trees he wanders off in the direction of the conservatory, just as its doors are thrown open and the guests and actors issue forth.

They have been playing A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Philine, flushed with success, sings the brilliant Polonaise, 'Je suis Titania'. Mignon appears. Wilhelm, who has sadly missed her, greets her with so much joy that Philine sends her into the conservatory in search of the wild flowers given to Wilhelm the day before. Soon after Mignon has entered the conservatory it is seen to be in flames. Lothario, obedient to her jealous wish, has set it on fire. At the risk of his life Wilhelm rushes into the burning building and reappears with Mignon's fainting form in his arms. He places her on a grassy bank. Her hands still hold a bunch of withered flowers.

Act III. A gallery in an Italian castle, to which Wilhelm has brought Mignon and Lothario. Mignon has been dangerously ill. A boating chorus is heard from the direction of a lake below. Lothario, standing by the door of Mignon's sick-room, sings a lullaby, 'De son cœur j'ai calmé la fièvre'. Wilhelm tells Lothario that they are in the Cipriani castle, which he intends to buy for Mignon. At the name of the castle Lothario is strangely agitated.

Wilhelm has heard Mignon utter his own name in her delirium during her illness. He sings, 'Elle ne croyait pas'. When she enters the gallery from her sick-room and looks out on the landscape, she is haunted by memories. There is a duet for Mignon and Wilhelm, 'Je suis heureuse, l'air m'enivre'. Philine's voice is heard outside. The girl is violently agitated. But Wilhelm reassures her.

In the scenes that follow, Lothario, his reason restored by being again in familiar surroundings, recognises in the place his own castle and in Mignon his daughter, whose loss had unsettled his mind and sent him, in minstrel's disguise, wandering in search of her. The opera closes with a trio for Mignon, Wilhelm, and Lothario. In it is heard the refrain of 'Connais-tu le pays?'
K.

HAMLET

Opera in five acts, text by Michel Carré and Jules Barbier. First performed Opéra, Paris, 9 March 1868, with Christine Nilsson and Jean-Baptiste Faure.

Hamlet, Prince of Denmark.....Baritone
Ophélie (Ophelia), daughter of Polonius.....Soprano
Claudius, King of Denmark.....Bass
Gertrude, Queen of Denmark,
 Hamlet's mother.....Mezzo-Soprano
Laerte (Laertes), son of Polonius.....Tenor

Marcellus, an officer Tenor
 Horatio, Hamlet's friend Baritone
 The Ghost of Hamlet's Father Bass
 Polonius, Lord Chamberlain Bass
 Grave-Diggers Tenor, Bass

Lords and Ladies, Soldiers, Actors, Servants, Peasants

Place: Denmark

Time: Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours

Ambroise Thomas was a pillar of the French musical establishment, the creator of a dozen works for the Opéra-Comique including the highly popular Mignon, but, a couple of early works apart, not associated with the Opéra until Hamlet. He seems to have taken with noticeable ease to the five-act form which the Opéra demanded, and the work is full of contrast, characterisation and energy, the baritone protagonist one of the plum roles of the romantic repertory, the soprano a favourite of prima donnas. The great French teacher of composition, Nadia Boulanger, asked for an example of well-written opera, is said to have recommended Hamlet and indeed it is as this that it will commend itself to anyone who looks less for insight into Shakespeare, more for a notable (and thoroughly enjoyable) example of French nineteenth-century opera.

The King of Denmark has died in mysterious circumstances, rumoured murdered by his brother, Claudius, who has assumed the crown and married Gertrude his brother's widow, herself conceivably implicated in the crime.

Act I. Celebrations of the marriage of Gertrude and Claudius are afoot, to the undisguised dismay of Prince Hamlet. In music of rather formal cut he protests his love for Ophélie ('Doute de la lumière'), listens to Laerte in a short song bid farewell before going abroad, and hears a report of the appearance on the battlements of the ghost of the recently deceased king, his father. On the stroke of midnight, he witnesses the wonders of the previous night and in suitably sepulchral accents calls on the Ghost to speak to him ('Spectre infernal'). Revenge for a murdered father is its simple but devastating demand, and it goes on to adjure Hamlet to spare his mother.

Act II. The moment he catches sight of Ophélie, Hamlet disappears and the Queen arrives to find her in tears and talking of forsaking the court. Gertrude in a grand arioso ('Dans son regard plus sombre') begs her not to leave as in his love for her lies Hamlet's only hope of recovering from what she sees as his madness. The King and Queen speculate as to whether Hamlet has stumbled on evidence of their crime, but Hamlet himself announces that a group of actors will that night entertain the court. The King is reassured.

The actors announce themselves in breezy chorus. Hamlet instructs them on the play they should perform, then calls for wine and sings an irresistibly brilliant drinking song, the best-known number of the score ('O vin dissipe la tristesse'). The court assembles to the sound of a so-called Danish March and the players act out in dumb show 'The murder of Gonzalez'. An old King enters on the arm of his Queen, falls asleep, and is poisoned by what Hamlet describes in his commentary as a demon tempter. The King in a frenzy orders the actors to leave and Hamlet in a fit of feigned madness, and to the court's consternation, denounces him as a murderer.

Act III. A sombre introduction leads to Hamlet's 'J'ai pu frapper le misérable' and 'Être ou ne pas être' (To be or not to be), a low-key but by no means unworthy setting of Shakespeare's most famous monologue. Kneeling in prayer, the King murmurs of his crime, and when Polonius warns him against betraying both of them Hamlet is convinced that Ophélie's father is Claudius's accomplice.

The Queen fails to persuade Hamlet to marry Ophélie that very evening – his revenge on his father's murderers will inevitably reveal Polonius's involvement – but the trio is fine, even though Ophélie's pleas fail to move Hamlet. In an impressive scene, Hamlet forces his mother to compare the portraits of his father and the man she is presently married to, only the appearance of the Ghost to remind him of his vow not to harm his mother calming him sufficiently to avoid the violence which seems inevitable. Since she can't see the Ghost, Gertrude is confirmed in her view that he is mad.

Act IV. A country site near a lake is the scene of the ballet which was obligatory at the Opéra – attractive music which needlessly interrupts the flow of the drama and is succeeded by Ophélie's mad scene and death. She appears to believe she is married to Hamlet, and at one moment sings a waltz, at another a Swedish folk song the original Ophélie asked the composer to include for her sake. Its several sections – unusually for a nineteenth-century mad scene, without reference to music previously heard – build up to a highly impressive whole and the scene has remained a favourite of prima donnas equipped to do it justice, from Melba and Tetrazzini early in the twentieth century to Callas and Joan Sutherland towards its end.

Hamlet. Jean-Baptiste Faure in the title role, portrait by Edouard Manet, 1877.

Act V. Grave-diggers are at work but can't tell Hamlet for whom the grave is intended. The Prince knows Ophélie has gone mad but not that she is dead and bitterly regrets his cruelty to her ('Comme une pâle fleur'). He misunderstands the hostility of the returning Laerte but accepts his challenge. A funeral procession interrupts their duel and for the first time Hamlet knows whose is the coffin at its head. The appearance of the Ghost galvanises him to denounce the King as a murderer and kill him. Gertrude must go to a convent and Hamlet is proclaimed King, a so-called 'happy ending' which the composer changed for the London première in deference to the supposed wishes of the English public.

H.

VIRGIL THOMSON

(born 25 November 1896, died 30 September 1989)

The 'creative friendship' between Virgil Thomson and Gertrude Stein, says Robert Marx in a perceptive sleeve note for a recording, 'lasted off and on for twenty years and resulted in numerous songs, a motion picture (never filmed, unfortunately), and two operas ... In the best sense the operas are works of poetic theater: the texts are musical in language and harmony, and each opera discards traditional conventions to generate its own panoramic world ...' He goes on to say 'although sumptuously melodic, they are not easy to sing, and mere vocal beauty in performance is not enough for success'.

moving mass audiences ... it has valued quietude, precision, acuteness of auditory observation.' The phrases could have been used to sum up his first opera.

H.

FOUR SAINTS IN THREE ACTS

Opera in four acts, text by Gertrude Stein (an opera to be sung). First given in concert form, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 20 May 1933; on the stage, at Hartford, Connecticut, 8 February 1934, by the Society of Friends and Enemies of Modern Music, conducted by Alexander Smallens, staged by Frederick Ashton. The opera was sung by a black cast, including Edward Matthews as Saint Ignatius, Beatrice Robinson Wayne and Bruce Howard as Saint Teresa I and II, Embry Bonner as Saint Chavez, Bertha Fitzhugh Baker as Saint Settlement, and Abner Dorsey and Altonell Hines as Compère and Commère. First performance in New York, 44th Street Theater, 20 February 1934. The work has since been heard in both concert and radio performances, and in May 1952 was presented by a black company in Paris during the Festival of Twentieth Century Art, with Inez Matthews, Edward Matthews, conductor Virgil Thomson; February 1973, Mini-Met Forum, New York; London, Trinity College, 1996; Houston and Edinburgh Festival, 1996, with Ashley Putnam, Gran Wilson, Sanford Sylvan.

| | |
|----------------------|---------------|
| Compère..... | Bass |
| Commère | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Saint Teresa I..... | Soprano |
| Saint Teresa II..... | Contralto |

'The music of religious faith, from Gregorian Chant to Sunday School ditties, was my background, my nostalgia' the composer has written, and that nostalgia and that background, together with the sense of style imparted by his French training (under Nadia Boulanger), permeates the operas. He met Gertrude Stein in 1925, and, although more than twenty years younger and in spite of tensions and wartime separation, remained on terms of friendship with her until her death in 1946, some ten months before the première of The Mother of Us All.

Apart from Stein, Thomson drew for stylistic inspiration on the French composer Erik Satie, of whose music he wrote: 'It has eschewed the impressive, the heroic, the oratorical, everything that is aimed at

Saint Ignatius LoyolaBaritone
 Saint Chavez.....Tenor
 Saint SettlementSoprano
 Double Chorus of Named and Unnamed Saints, Six Dancers

Place: Spain

Time: Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 35 minutes

From the start, Four Saints was a success, with a brilliantly stylised production by Frederick Ashton, evocative scenery and remarkably compelling singing and acting by performers many of whom had no stage experience whatsoever. There was a total of sixty performances in its first year.

The surrealist nature of the work is emphasised by the fact that the scenario used for the original production was written (by Maurice Grosser) after the words and music had been completed. The original act headings (which are the only indications of 'story' the libretto contains) are given in italics in the following synopsis.

Prelude. A narrative of Prepare for Saints. The choral overture in triple time on the following words:

To know to know to love her so.
 Four saints prepare for Saints,
 Four saints make it well fish.
 Four saints prepare for saints it makes it well fish
 it makes it well fish prepare for saints leads to some conversation between the chorus, Compère, Commère, and various saints, and ends with the Commère and Compère reading out a lengthy list of saints, many of whom are not mentioned at any other point in the opera.

Act I. Saint Teresa half indoors and half out of doors. The scene is the steps of the Cathedral at Ávila. Saint Teresa enacts for the instruction of saints and visitors seven scenes from her own life. The first has the Compère and Commère and two choruses singing antiphonally, then an aria for Saint Teresa. Saint Ignatius joins the guests just before the end of the first tableau, which gives way to the second, in which Saint Teresa, holding a dove in her hand, is photographed by Saint Settlement. In the third and fourth tableaux Saint Ignatius serenades Saint Teresa, and then offers her flowers. In tableau five Saint Ignatius and Saint Teresa II admire the model of a Heavenly Mansion. In tableaux six and seven, Saint Teresa II is shown in an attitude of ecstasy, and rocking an unseen child.

Act II. Might it be mountains if it were not Barcelona. The scene is a garden party near Barcelona. The Compère and Commère sit at the side in an opera box from which they can watch the proceedings and where they are presently joined by both Saint Teresas and Saint Ignatius. A Dance of Angels is performed for their pleasure and there is a party game, after which everyone goes out except the Compère and Commère. There is a love scene between them, and the two Saint Teresas return in time to see it. A telescope is brought in and as the two Saint Teresas look through it a vision of a Heavenly Mansion appears. 'How many doors how many floors and how many windows are there in it?' ask the saints.

Act III. Saint Ignatius and one of two literally. The scene is a garden of a monastery on the sea coast. The men saints are mending a fish net. The introductory allegro moderato for the orchestra alone leads to a conversation about monastic life between Saint Ignatius, the two Saint Teresas and Saint Settlement, but the men stop their work and listen as Saint Ignatius describes to them his vision of the Holy Ghost. This is his well-known aria, 'Pigeons on the grass alas'; the vocal line is occasionally taken over by the chorus or the Compère, and there is an off-stage heavenly chorus. Saint Chavez lectures to the men, there is a dance in the Spanish style, a storm is quieted by Saint Ignatius, who predicts the Last Judgement. It grows dark, there is a devotional procession, and the Intermezzo recalls the opening of the Prelude.

Act IV. The sisters and saints reassembled and re-enacting why they went away to stay. The Compère and Commère discuss whether there shall be a fourth act, and when they have made up their minds, the curtain rises to show all the saints in heaven. They join in a hymn of communion 'When this you see remember me', the Compère announces 'Last Act', and the chorus and principals reply fortissimo 'Which is a fact'.

H.

THE MOTHER OF US ALL

Opera in three acts, libretto by Gertrude Stein. Première, Brander Matthews Hall, Columbia University, 7 May 1947, with Dorothy Dow, Ruth Krug, Teresa Stich, William Horne, Bertram Rowe, conductor Otto Luening; London, Trinity College, 1996.

Susan B. Anthony, *a feminist of the 1870s*Soprano
 Anne, her confidante; 1870s.....Contralto
 Gertrude S., *a cheerful woman of middle age*Soprano
 Virgil T., a pleasant master of ceremonies.....Baritone

Political dignitaries of the 1850s (V.I.P.s)

Daniel WebsterBass
 Andrew Johnson.....Tenor
 Thaddeus Stevens.....Tenor

Recently discharged Civil War soldiers

Jo the LoitererTenor
 Chris the CitizenBaritone

Indiana Elliot, *pretty provincial; 1860s*Contralto

Angel More, *sweetheart of Daniel Webster, now dead; about 1845*Soprano

Henrietta M., *a feminist of the 1890s*Soprano

Henry B., a poetic gentleman of the 1870s.....Bass-Baritone

Anthony Comstock, a Victorian capitalist.....Bass

John Adams, *once President of the United States, 1825*Tenor

Constance Fletcher, *a beautiful lady, 1905–10*Mezzo-Soprano

Intellectuals about 1890–1900

Gloster Heming.....Baritone
 Isabel Wentworth.....Mezzo-Soprano

Anna Hope, feminist, about 1900.....Contralto

Lillian Russell, a theatre star, 1890–1910.....Soprano

Jenny Reefer, a comical feminist, 1870s.....Mezzo-Soprano

Ulysses S. Grant, *an opinionated politician*Baritone

Herman Atlan, *a French painter, 1860s*Baritone

Donald Gallup, *a college professor, 1920s*Baritone
 A.A. & T.T., page boys.....Silent

Negro Man and Woman, 1860–70.....Silent

Indiana Elliot's Brother, 1870s.....Baritone

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

In autumn 1945, Gertrude Stein and Virgil Thomson met again in Paris after five years of separation, the writer having already accepted the musician's proposal for a further operatic collaboration. She finished the libretto just before she died in the summer of 1946, and the music was written between October 1946 and January 1947. The première was at Columbia University in May 1947, and by the time the opera was recorded thirty years later, it had received more than 1,000 performances in nearly 200 productions.

Its central figure is the American feminist, Susan B. Anthony, who campaigned all her life for women's rights and particularly for the vote for women, and of whom there stands a statue in Washington. Composer and librettist said it was a musical and dramatic 'landscape' they worked to create, and other characters from American history appear in the opera, anachronistically and with the intention of weaving an American tapestry, into which are introduced figures from Gertrude Stein's own life, both Parisian and American. To identify Susan B. and her companion Anne with Stein and Alice B. Toklas does not require a feat of imagination, but Miss Toklas once specifically rejected the autobiographical analysis.

Just as he had for Four Saints, Maurice Grosser wrote a scenario, with the composer's collaboration and with the specific intention of reducing problems of staging.

As for the music, nostalgia remains one of the composer's sources of inspiration, and Robert Marx has suggested he means to 'stimulate memories of experiences we have never had, of small town American life in times long ago'. Virgil Thomson himself described the score as 'a memory-book of Victorian play-games and passions ... with its gospel hymns and cocky marches, its sentimental ballads, waltzes, darned-fool ditties and intoned sermons ... a souvenir of all those sounds and kinds of tunes that were once the music of rural America'.

Act I, scene i. A room in the house of Susan B. Anthony. She is shown in conversation with her constant companion, Anne; Gertrude S. and Virgil T., acting throughout (though intermittently) as narrators, stand down-stage, and the elegantly conversational music passes easily from one participant to another as they discover among other things the failings of men and the tendency of Susan B. to be right.

Scene ii. A political meeting in a tent. The meeting's subject is economic and political injustice.

Politicians parade across the stage, Daniel Webster chanting a dirge with which he once won a legal case, Andrew Johnson, John Adams, Ulysses S. Grant, Anthony Comstock and Thaddeus Stevens following him ('London Bridge is falling down' is the march's theme, the only non-original tune in the score). Susan B. Anthony introduces herself and, after the politicians have marched and counter-marched and various other characters have introduced themselves, including the lyrical (and ghostly) Angel More, Constance Fletcher, and Lillian Russell, a debate develops between Susan B. and Daniel Webster. This consists mostly of quotations from the political utterances of these two historical figures (who historically probably never met), and Maurice Grosser tells us it is out of parliamentary punctilio that Webster constantly refers to Miss Anthony as 'he'. Just before the end of the scene, which has been punctuated by lyrical utterances, short ariettas and duets, Jo and Angel More resume the banter on the subject of mice which they started during the parade.

Scene iii, a public square in front of Susan B. Anthony's house, is preceded by an icily impressionistic orchestral passage. We encounter Andrew Johnson and Thaddeus Stevens as political enemies, Jo and Chris as satirical philosophers, and Constance Fletcher and John Adams as protocol-ridden lovers, the latter more concerned with etiquette ('If I had not been an Adams I would have kneeled at your feet') than anything more passionate. There is an enjoyable waltz, part Parisian in its elegance, part American in its directness, and Jo rounds it all off with a whimper, not a bang, by asking, quietly but with doubtful relevance: 'I just want to know if everybody has forgotten Isabel Wentworth?'

Scene iv. The same place. A short, slow prelude introduces Susan B., day-dreaming about her mission and its problems. Though she has helped to enfranchise the blacks, those she conjures up in her dream will not, she realises, help her in her fight for female suffrage. Nor can Donald Gallup, a college professor, do anything for her, nor yet the V.I.P.s, whose bugle-like interest in their own privileges injects a note of comedy into the proceedings. Jo and Chris ask Susan B. the difference between rich and poor. If people are rich, she tells them, they do not listen; if they are poor they listen but all they perceive is that they are listening.

Scene v. The marriage of Jo the Loiterer and Indiana

Elliot. A beautiful interlude, marked sereno and delicately scored, introduces the wedding tune which pervades the scene and haunts the memory, like the melody of a hymn known in childhood and not heard since. Susan B. sings it in aria form as she muses on the subject of women. The wedding party enters, and there is a rather inconclusive discussion between Jo and Indiana about the ring. John Adams and Constance Fletcher continue their theory-ridden duetting of love and non-marriage – one of the most elevated flirtations in all opera, which is not surprising since Adams was the sixth President of the United States and Constance Fletcher a contemporary of Gertrude Stein's!

Daniel Webster and Angel More seem about to follow their lilting example, but Ulysses Grant calls attention to the ceremony, which is almost immediately interrupted by the brother of Indiana who forbids the marriage, whereupon Indiana renounces her brother. The music shifts between the lyrical, epitomised by the wedding hymn tune, and a kind of wry musical humour (including a reprise of the waltz). The various flirtations are pursued, and one has sympathy with the chorus which suddenly demands: 'Why don't you all get married?'

Act II, scene i. Susan B. Anthony's drawing-room. The music starts with the direction 'Smoothly, like a carpet sweeper', but the 'contained' effect it makes sounds much better than that. Still, Susan B. might be doing housework when Anne and Jenny Reefer come to tell her the politicians want her to speak at a meeting – she knows nonetheless that they will never give her what she wants most. Though they are married, Indiana wants to stay Elliot and won't take Jo's name. The politicians come to plead with Susan B., but hers is the response of a spitfire. After renewed pleas, she changes her tune and starts to sound like a statesman before finally agreeing. The carpet sweeper music resumes.

Scene ii is introduced by 'Last Intermezzo', very bright and full of movement. We are still in Susan B.'s drawing-room, whither Susan B. and Anne return from the meeting to discuss the former's philosophy of men. For the first time the word 'male' is written into the constitution and Susan B. decides men 'have kind hearts, but they are afraid'. A short but very impressive scene builds up on this theme, interrupted eventually by a march introducing the suffragettes (the tune is 'London Bridge is falling down').

Lillian Russell has been converted and will give all she earns to the cause. The lady herself thinks it is 'so beautiful to meet you all' (is she quite steady on her feet?), and John Adams and Constance Fletcher seize the opportunity to pay each other compliments. Daniel Webster is in pontifical mood, but there is a new turn of events in that Indiana has decided that Indiana Loiterer is a pretty name, and that her husband must now become Jo Elliot, even though, as he says, nobody will know it's him. The chorus defines Susan B.'s success as having worked for the franchise for women and for blacks, but having succeeded in getting the word 'male' written into the constitution.

Scene iii. Epilogue. A statue of Susan B. Anthony is being unveiled in the Halls of Congress. Anne comes in alone, rejoicing that women finally have the vote, and Angel More, by now unequivocally a ghost, haunts proceedings, as does John Adams, wondering why Constance Fletcher, who shortly enters almost blind, has not been included in the statue, if only because of her wonderful profile. Politicians remain politicians, romantics are still romantic, Indiana insists on some detailed talk about marriage, but Lillian Russell, who is due to make a speech, is plainly tight, in spite of which fact General Grant defends her by insulting those who comment on her state of less than grace. Lillian Russell clings to her conviction that it is 'so beautiful to meet you all here', and when the statue is unveiled, Susan B. herself is revealed, to finish the opera impressively with a monologue about her long life and a reminiscence of the wedding hymn.

One of the curiosities of The Mother of Us All is that the listener every now and then hears pre-echoes of Auden's turn of phrase in the as yet unwritten The Rake's Progress, and indeed of Stravinsky's turn of phrase in setting Auden's words. It remains a fascinatingly individual opera, not easy perhaps to export but deserving a very high place among operas written by Americans.

H.

LORD BYRON

Opera in three acts, text by Jack Larson. Première at Juilliard Theater, New York, 20 April 1972, with Grayson Hirst, Carolyn Val-Schmidt (Mrs Leigh), Lenus Carlson (Thomas Moore), conductor Gerhard Samuel.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Lord Byron | Tenor |
| Thomas Moore, the poet | Baritone |
| John Hobhouse, Byron's friend | Bass |
| John Murray, Byron's publisher | Tenor |
| Count Gamba, his companion in the Greek War | Baritone |
| John Ireland, Dean of Westminster | Bass |
| Two English Noblemen..... | Baritones |
| Abbey poets | |
| Gray and Thomson | Tenors |
| Spenser and Dryden | Baritones |
| Milton and Johnson | Basses |
| Mrs Leigh, lady-in-waiting to the Queen; Byron's sister | Soprano |
| Annabella Milbanke, later Lady Byron | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Contessa Guiccioli, Byron's last mistress | Soprano |
| Lady Melbourne, a former mistress | Soprano |
| Lady Charlotte, a former mistress | Soprano |
| Lady Caroline, a former mistress | Soprano |
| Lady Jane..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| People of London, Abbey Choir, Sailors | |

Place: London

Time: 1812–24

Running Time: 2 hours

Lord Byron had a peculiar genesis. After the death of Gertrude Stein, Virgil Thomson in 1962 found a librettist in Jack Larson, who shared with Thomson a fascination with Byron. Work proceeded and in late 1965 an article about the new opera caught the attention of the Metropolitan Opera who organised a commission for the new house, due to open in late 1966. To fit the big new theatre, some re-thinking seemed essential, and early public readings suggested success so that by 1969 the first draft was finished. But a new management at the Met lost interest and in 1972 the work was given at the Juilliard School. It remained a favourite with the composer, who tinkered with the score up to his death, altering and abbreviating it, often – according to informed criticism – to its disadvantage. At the first performance, a ballet was danced to Thomson's Third Symphony.

The libretto, in contrast to the composer's two earlier operas, is, for all its twists and turns of time and place, in fairly straightforward narrative form, the music more romantic than before and inclined to parody and quotation ('Auld Lang Syne', 'Ach, du lieber Augustin', 'Believe me, if all these endearing young charms' among others). There is an impressive choral start; grateful solo writing, with Byron himself a true leading role; ensembles of poets and friends, and, in the last scene of Act II, of women, then men, then, settling into a slow waltz, of both together.

Act I. Westminster Abbey, 1824. London mourns the death of Byron, whose body has recently arrived from Greece. In Poets' Corner, former colleagues join in lament. A committee led by Hobhouse petitions the Dean for burial in the Abbey and we learn that a statue of the poet by Thorwaldsen is on the way. Byron's last love, Contessa Guiccioli, together with her brother, Count Gamba, his companion in Greece, are received by Lady Byron, but there is consternation at the publisher Murray's news that a memoir exists whose revelations may put paid to their efforts to secure Abbey burial.

The statue arrives. Byron's shade sings a sardonic apostrophe to London, and the curtain falls on the admiring throng.

Act II. The Abbey. The friends dispute as to whether or not to destroy the possibly incriminating manuscript. Moore insists they read it.

Four memory scenes follow. In the first (1812), at Lady Melbourne's, Byron is protected by her niece, Miss Milbanke, from young women who want him to expose his club-foot by dancing, and there is a tender scene between them. In the second, at a Victory Ball in 1814, Byron delights in taking his sister, the pregnant Augusta Leigh, on his arm. There is gossip, he is accosted by a former lover, Lady Caroline (who is given an arietta), and to quieten gossip proposes to Miss Milbanke, who accepts. Augusta Leigh seems abandoned. The last scene (New Year's Eve, 1814) is split, with three women nervously contemplating the marriage of one of them to Lord Byron; and four men at a bachelor party in alcoholic enthusiasm mocking marriage and denouncing all women.

Act III. 1815. Lord and Lady Byron, the latter pregnant, visit Augusta Leigh, to whom Byron is still powerfully attracted and with whom he duets skittishly. Lady Byron catches them embracing, Byron protests Augusta is the only woman who ever loved him, but Lady Byron insists she swear not to see him again. Augusta refuses to elope with him to the continent, and at the end of a scene of considerable power, Byron furiously accepts that he must leave the country.

In the Abbey, as in Act I. Hobhouse burns the manuscript, with Mrs Leigh's consent but over Moore's protest and to the Contessa's horror. The Dean, with the facts suppressed and believing completely in Byron's impiety, refuses Abbey burial. The Contessa and her brother denounce British hypocrisy and leave, the statue is re-crated, the crowd laments, but the poets are joined by Byron, whom in a song of unashamed rejoicing they welcome to their company. H.

MICHAEL TIPPETT

(born 2 January 1905)

Like Stravinsky, Tippett is one of the great 'sports' of opera, scarcely belonging to a 'national' tradition, consistent within himself yet constantly shifting his stance, with his five full-scale works building a considerable oeuvre, acknowledging no obvious ancestor and resolutely declining to enter some hypothetical mainstream. Like Wagner, he wrote his own texts, and there is no doubt they aptly served his purpose, yet from the start public (and even performers) have pronounced themselves perplexed by their precise meaning even when they were convinced by the logic of the music they inspired. Much of his operatic life seems to contain paradox and yet, contrariwise, in many ways he is the least contradictory of composers.

In the course of nearly fifty years of operatic career, Tippett has encompassed a 'quest' opera which amounts to something like a modern Magic Flute; a tragedy founded on antiquity and dealing avowedly with the matter of choice; a critique of human behaviour positioned in something like a drawing-room comedy though very distant in subject matter; a penetrating discussion of the violent issues which human beings confront however honourable their intentions; and a postscript he never thought he would write, an opera finished when he was eighty-three and confronting, this time more obliquely, the kind of problem he tackled in Midsummer Marriage more than forty years before.

During that lengthy period he progressed from the great enigma of British music to its Grand Old Man, a much-loved sage with an impressive list of major concert works to his credit, whose gnomic pronouncements would be pondered and analysed by British composers of every generation to their eventual benefit. Any one of Tippett's operas, had it stood solitary, might have been seen as the culmination of a lifetime's work – a conscious magnum opus – and the delight is that four had a successor. If three of them are not constantly revived in the late twenty-first century, I should be astonished. They are prime candidates.

THE MIDSUMMER MARRIAGE

Opera in three acts, text by the composer. Première Covent Garden, 27 January 1955, with Joan Sutherland, Adèle Leigh, Oralia Dominguez, Richard Lewis, John Lanigan, Otakar Kraus, conductor John Pritchard. Revived Covent Garden, 1957, 1968, with Joan Carlyle, Elizabeth Harwood, Helen Watts, Alberto Remedios, Stuart Burrows, Raimund Herincx, conductor Colin Davis. B.B.C. studio performance, 1963, with Catherine Gayer, Jeannette Sinclair, Janet Baker, Richard Lewis, John Dobson, Howell Glynne, conductor Norman Del Mar; Karlsruhe, 1973; Welsh National Opera, 1976, with Gomez, Mary Davies, John Treleaven, Arthur Davies, Raimund Herincx, conductor Richard Armstrong; Adelaide Festival, 1978, with Marilyn Richardson, Gregory Dempsey, Raimund Herincx, conductor Myer Fredman; Stockholm, 1982; San Francisco, 1983; English National Opera, 1985, with Helen Field, Lesley Garrett, Treleaven, Anthony Raffell, conductor Mark Elder; Opera North, 1985, with Rita Cullis, conductor David Lloyd-Jones.

Mark, a young man of unknown parentage Tenor
 Jenifer, his betrothed Soprano
 King Fisher, Jenifer's father, a businessman Baritone
 Bella, King Fisher's secretary Soprano

Jack, Bella's boyfriend, a mechanic Tenor
 Sosostriis, a clairvoyante Contralto
 The Ancients, priest and priestess of the temple Bass, Mezzo-Soprano
 Strephon Dancer

Chorus of Mark's and Jenifer's Friends; Dancers
 Attendant on the Ancients

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Wilfrid Mellers wrote at the start of an article¹ some years ago, "Of its nature opera is to some degree mythical (in which sense it is "universal"), to some degree social (in which sense it is tied to an historical past and an immediate present)." Tippett's 'quest' opera, written consciously under the influence of T.S. Eliot's verse drama (he once corresponded with Eliot with a view to getting the poet to write the libretto or at least the lyrics) is of course a comedy, and it is concerned, as he says,² 'with the unexpected hindrances to an eventual marriage', the hindrances basically 'our ignorance or illusion about ourselves'. In it Tippett emphasises myth, investigating the problems of carnal and spiritual union and the nature of self-knowledge. Mark and Jenifer are the young lovers, and we see their misunderstandings, clashes, adjustments of personality, reaction to opposition – the predicament of most young couples in love, though here made explicit and symbolical where usually implicit and matter-of-fact. Like Pamina and Tamino, Mark and Jenifer have the need for a hard, conscious, uncompromising development of the inner being, and they explore the male and female elements of their own personalities, the understanding of which in self as in the other is a basis for a happy relationship between two people. The opera is essentially the story of their inner development. The 'social' element in The Midsummer Marriage is one of place rather than time – as one reviewer³ put it after the 1968 Covent Garden revival, 'the hilltop clearing in the wood, the burgeoning summer, the sense of the past, the presence of England (and in particular of the West country), with which libretto and music are saturated.'

¹ New Statesman, 31 March 1967.

² Michael Tippett: Moving into Aquarius, Routledge & Kegan Paul.

³ David Cairns in The Spectator, April 1968.

Act I. Morning. 'When fully lighted the stage ... presents a clearing in a wood, perhaps at the top of a hill ... At the back of the stage is an architectural group of buildings, a kind of sanctuary, whose centre appears to be an ancient Greek temple.' Steps to the right lead upwards and end abruptly in mid-air; to the left, steps lead down through gates into the hillside itself. It is the half-light before sunrise on a midsummer day, and the music is of the utmost vigour and brilliance. To keep an assignation with Mark and Jenifer, who plan to marry, come their friends. Caution and purpose are immediately apparent. They greet the rising sun on midsummer morning, then perceive the temple building and hear the music coming softly from it (Ex. 1.) Magic is in the air, the

Andante (♩ = 66)
8va (Celesta) pp dolcissimo lunga
(Flauto)

magic of the eternal ritual before which mundanity recedes, the magic which 'seems much nearer than expected'. The chorus hides as the dancers emerge, led by Strephon and followed by the Ancients (Ex. 2). The dance is formal and interrupted by the entrance of Mark calling for a new dance for his wedding day. He is told to watch, with the admonition 'change the unchanging ritual, there'll be no point of rest', but after a few bars of the dance, the He-Ancient to Mark's indignation trips Strephon with his stick, eventually ordering the party back into the temple with the warning: 'We do not seek ... to hold you longer from your dreams; you shall learn a new dance before you leave this place today'. They depart to Ex. 2.

[15] Alla marcia: Andante

(♩ = ca. 58)

In an extended, florid aria, ranging from B natural at the bottom to A natural nearly two octaves above, Mark exhorts them to celebrate his love with him: 'Ah, the summer morning dances in my heart', he sings, and Tippett's exuberant music catches the words; a splendid affirmation.

Jenifer appears, dressed much to Mark's surprise for a journey and not a wedding; their duet (with six-part chorus beneath it) is rapturous enough, but all Mark's pleading makes little difference: 'It isn't love I want, but truth,' says Jenifer (anticipating in her inherited determination the appearance of her headstrong father, King Fisher). Her feminine instinct for chastity and intellectual independence is affronted by Mark's masculine desire and assertion. They have to learn to accommodate each other's point of view – hence the events of the drama.

Jenifer starts to climb up¹ the broken stairs, disappearing suddenly on a diminuendo top B flat. Mark is half-laughingly consoled: 'She'll come back', but hearing the voice of Jenifer's businessman father, King Fisher, he decides complementarily to emulate Jenifer and go in search of that element in himself which corresponds with the feminine principles of instinct, fertility and love – the qualities for whose lack he appears temporarily to have lost Jenifer. He goes down through the gates and into the hillside.

¹ In mythology, the upper regions stand broadly speaking for the masculine principle, Mother Earth for the feminine.

Tippett himself in a broadcast has compared King Fisher to Boss Mangan in Shaw's play Heartbreak House, and King Fisher stands for all elements, parental and otherwise, which are hostile to Jenifer and Mark and obstructive to their development. Summoning his secretary Bella, he proceeds, with her as intermediary, to enlist the help of the Ancients (derivation of Ex. 2) in tracing his daughter who has, he assumes, eloped with Mark. When they refuse to open the gates, he sends Bella for her boyfriend Jack, a workman who will do the job for them, and himself turns on the men and women who crowd round: 'So you are Mark's fine brood of friends.' In a vigorous monologue, he suborns the men with money and drives them off, but has less luck with the women, who refuse to work for him.

Enter Jack, who with Bella represents the uncomplicated, Papageno-Papagena, pair of lovers, able to live their lives by means of intuition and needing no deeper knowledge of the currents which lie beneath the surface of human love. Jack agrees to do the job, spends a moment of wishful thinking in duet with Bella, but is confronted by a warning voice from behind the gates (derivation of Ex. 1). King Fisher wants action, but the voice of Sosostriis is even more vehement in urging caution. The men cry forward, the women are for restraint, but King Fisher gets his way until at the decisive moment Jenifer reappears at the top of the steps partially transformed.¹

She has hardly started to explain her experience when Mark too becomes visible, also transfigured, in his case towards Dionysus. In their dangerous exaltation – this is still an early stage of the road they have to travel – they postulate different points of view and the Ancients and the dancers come impressively from the temple and demand that each shall put a case.

First Jenifer in a splendid statement, full of musical embroidery and elaboration and with a magical slow section with soft trumpet obbligato, then Mark in a hardly less magnificent aria, 'As stallions stamping', refer in rather oblique terms to their experiences. The dancers and their friends meanwhile force King Fisher further and further away from the protagonists, until Jenifer moves across the stage to confront Mark and show him the animal she feels he has become. She starts to descend as he climbs the steps up which she had formerly sought enlightenment, each now attempting to recover the spiritual balance which is tottering with the symbolical reversal of roles. King Fisher fulminates and rushes out, while the friends of Mark and Jenifer understand, proclaiming themselves 'the laughing children' as the act comes to an end in something close to ecstasy.

Act II. Afternoon. The same physical scene is shown, from a rather different angle. The magical side of the atmosphere of Act I is immediately heard in enhanced (though musically different) form. Strephon starts to dance below the temple steps, then hides when the chorus is heard off-stage, celebrating the longest day. Jack and Bella come on and Bella brings up the subject of marriage. They look forward to future bliss in a scene which is full of tenderness, for all that it is the most nearly conventional of the opera.

They go into the wood, Strephon takes up a dancing position and there begins the central section of the act, an elaborate and closely worked out ballet sequence² in which the unconscious conflict between the sexes is shown at its most savage,³ albeit in music of unusual and persuasive richness even for Tippett. The sequence is as follows:

- I The Earth in Autumn: the Hound chases the Hare.
- II The Waters in Winter: the Otter chases the Fish.
- III The Air in Spring: the Hawk chases the Bird.

At the start (Ex. 1) some of the trees of the wood represented by dancers begin to move and take up position to form a kind of race-course. The course is set and announced for the first two dances by solemn, grand chords. Round it in succession (and in its differing

¹ The score tells us: 'The ancient Greek prototype towards which Jenifer's transfiguration is tending would be Athena ... no exact imitation of Athena is meant, for the natural Jenifer is still visible behind the supernatural transfiguration.'

² The Ritual Dances (three in Act II, the Fire Dance in Act III) were first publicly performed in February 1953, in Basle under Paul Sacher, who had offered Tippett a commission and received these dances in return.

³ '... the man dances all the evasive tricks and the woman pursues him with shrewish relentlessness... the reconciliation of these dancers in Act III shows us the true union of opposites after Mark and Jenifer have achieved their inner resolution'. Robert Donington in The Music Review, May 1957.

manifestations for each dance) the hare is pursued by a hound, the fish through the river by an otter, the broken-winged bird in a cornfield by a hawk. The first two with difficulty escape, the fish not before being pinned to the bank by the otter, but it is apparent that the hawk will catch the bird until Bella, who has been watching with Jack, screams and breaks the spell.

A prelude ushers in the splendid musical sequence, and each of the three sections of the ballet consists of transformation, preparation for the dance, and the dance itself. The movements of pursuer and quarry are graphically depicted, sometimes ritually, sometimes almost naturalistically, and there is strong differentiation between the backgrounds – forest for the hare, water for the fish, air and the cornfield below it for the bird.

Jack comforts Bella, who retrieves the situation with mirror and powder-puff, singing a charming arietta as she refurbishes her make-up ('They say a woman's glory is her hair')¹ before confiding to Jack that King Fisher has plans for both of them. The act ends with off-stage cries in praise of midsummer.

Act III. Evening and night. What we have had so far is a look in depth at the problems of one couple – the efforts of each to get inside the mind of the other, parental opposition, misunderstandings and so on; a glance at the way another couple, instinctively and not bothering about the motives behind their thoughts and actions, solve theirs. We have also sensed (and sometimes seen) the usually unseen forces behind our actions: ritual, tradition, the instinct for what we can only inexactly call 'magic' that resides in all of us. Now, Tippett takes us nearer the magical and ritual forces which influence our actions; we hear the one in the voice of Sosostri, see the other in terms of the ritual fire dance, and gain insight into the power of each as we watch the death of the defiant and obstinately mundane King Fisher, and the symbolical transfiguration of Mark and Jenifer. The opera will end with the triumph of young love in its new-found understanding and a sense that the eternal mysteries go on unchanged.

The scene is as at the opera's start; it is plain that some kind of picnic has taken place and on one side of the stage is dancing. The action is languid until the revitalising influence of King Fisher is felt, announcing that he has brought his own brand of magic to counteract that of the Ancients: Madame Sosostri, a clairvoyante. The crowd is to escort her to the spot where he will have a confrontation with the Ancients, whom Bella now calls (Ex. 2). In spite of the Ancients' attempts to dissuade him, King Fisher persists, and a procession comes up the hill bearing a litter, on which is a cloaked figure whom Bella wastes no time in recognising as Jack.

When the fun subsides and the crowd moves, a contraption is seen, of vaguely human form and covered in veils, to which King Fisher explains the situation briefly, calling upon Madame Sosostri to locate his absent daughter. In music of impressive cast, at first slow and measured, Sosostri begins her invocation, 'I am what has been, is and shall be', gradually mounting in tempo and intensity and rising in tessitura as she follows it with a divination of the union of Jenifer and Mark, both physical in that they are in love and symbolical in that Jenifer is now ready to accept the masculine in Mark which she has come to understand (and vice versa). It is the most extended vocal movement in a score full of notable vocal writing.

King Fisher interrupts the vision and dashes the bowl to the ground, in the next breath demanding that Jack undertake another role, this time as his agent to unmask Sosostri's imposture. At the end of an ensemble, in which Jack and Bella, the two Ancients, and King Fisher battle for supremacy, Jack throws down belt and holster, his symbols of office, and turns his back on King Fisher who reluctantly picks them up. He moves to unveil Sosostri, and his actions are the subject of comment by the Ancients and the bystanders, who watch the last veil fall of itself to disclose an incandescent bud, which falls open like huge lotus petals. Inside, transfigured, are Mark and Jenifer.² King Fisher threatens, but when Mark and Jenifer turn towards him, he falls dead to the ground. Chorus and She-Ancient antiphonally sing his threnody over a Purcellian bass. It is not only the funeral march of an archetypal villain but of a Priest-King, who must die that life can be re-born.

Introduced by the same music as the other ritual dances, Strephon and a female dancer, with wooden stick and block, begin to make ritual fire. The chorus joins in, and Mark and Jenifer celebrate their vision: 'Sirius rising as the sun's wheel rolls over at the utter zenith', and all including He- and She-Ancient proclaim their belief in carnal love and fertility. As the fire dance proceeds, Mark, Jenifer and Strephon seem to be drawn inside the lotus bud, whose petals close upon them so that finally nothing but the torch lighted at the start of the dance can be seen. Eventually even this is drawn into the veils, which break into flame, glow, die out and leave the stage dark.

¹ Like the 'Ritual Dances', this section of the score was also heard publicly before the first night when Adele Leigh, the original Bella, sang it for B.B.C. Television when I interviewed the composer a few days before the première.

² 'In Indian mythology, Mark and Jenifer would be transfigured as Siva-Sakti (Siva and Parvati). All the gestures and poses are hieratic', Robert Donington in Michael Tippett: A Symposium on his 60th Birthday (1965).

'Was it a vision? Was it a dream?' The light starts to return but the temple is shrouded in dawn mist as at the opening. As warmth pervades the music again, Mark and Jenifer can be heard, and soon they are visible too as their mortal selves, proclaiming that they have found truth, and that 'All things fall and are built again, and those that build them again are gay' (Ex. 2). The curtain falls on an empty stage.

From the time of the first performance, the opera has divided opinion, most at first fastening on obscurity in the action, clumsiness in the libretto, which they felt invalidated Tippett's musical vision. Others fell immediately under the composer's spell, myself among them – I was lucky to be working at Covent Garden at the time the opera was, not without controversy, put into rehearsal and first produced. As David Cairns said at the time of the 1968 revival: 'The score has the power to intoxicate the listener, to possess his imagination and to secure his devotion for life, to sweep aside reservations.' It is not hard to believe that it will be one of the works of the mid-twentieth century which will be revived long past its own generation, which has in fact the possibility of becoming a true classic, in the sense that it reveals to its own and succeeding generations a truth which we (and they) need to know – and reveals it in major musical terms.

H.

KING PRIAM

Opera in three acts, words by the composer. Première at Coventry, 29 May 1962 (and later at Covent Garden), with Forbes Robinson, Marie Collier, Josephine Veasey, Margreta Elkins, Richard Lewis, conductor John Pritchard. First performed in Germany, Karlsruhe, 1963, with Howard Vandenburg,¹ conductor Arthur Grüber. Revived Covent Garden, 1967, with Forbes Robinson, Anna Green, Patricia Johnson, Yvonne Minton, Richard Lewis, conductor Pritchard; 1972, conductor Colin Davis; Kent Opera, 1984, with Rodney Macann, Janet Price, Anne Mason, Sarah Walker, Howard Haskin, Omar Ibrahim, Neil Jenkins, conductor Roger Norrington, producer Nicholas Hytner.

Priam, King of Troy.....Bass-Baritone
 Hecuba, *his wife*Dramatic Soprano
 Hector, *their eldest son*Baritone
 Andromache, Hector's wife ...Lyric Dramatic Soprano Paris, Priam's second son (Boy Soprano in scene ii) Tenor
 Helen, wife to King Menelaus of Sparta, then Paris' lover Mezzo-Soprano
 Achilles, a Greek hero.....Heroic Tenor
 Patroclus, his friend.....Light Baritone

Characters and chorus in the scenes and interludes

NurseMezzo-Soprano
 Old ManBass
 Young Guard.....Lyric Tenor
 Hermes, messenger of the Gods.....High Light Tenor Chorus of Hunters, Wedding Guests, Serving Men,
 Warriors etc.

Place: Troy

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

In his second opera, Tippett breaks to some extent with the luxuriant writing of The Midsummer Marriage, something which initially disturbed the nostalgic admiration of many lovers of the earlier work. As The Midsummer Marriage refers in its musical proliferation to such works as the song cycle The Heart's Assurance (1951) and the Piano Concerto (1953–55), the isolated orchestral textures and starker lines of the music of King Priam relate to the Concerto for Orchestra (1962–63).

The composer has prefaced the score with the German words 'Es möge uns das Schicksal gönnen, dass wir das innere Ohr von dem Munde der Seele nicht abwenden' (May Fate grant that we never turn our inner ear away from our soul's lips), and explained at the time of the first performance that the work was concerned with Choice – Priam's after the prophecy over the fate of Paris, Paris' after the hunting episode to go to Troy, Priam's to accept him, Helen's to leave Sparta with Paris, Paris' between the three Graces, and so on throughout. But, essentially, it is Tippet's reaction to the events and circumstances of one of the world's greatest myths, with its tensions and heroic loves, its themes of courage and suffering, and public and private trial.

¹ Vandenburg started his career in America as a baritone, sang tenor roles in Germany and at Covent Garden (including Radames), and then reverted to baritone to include even this bass role. In 1972, he was enough of a tenor again to audition Siegfried for Sadler's Wells!

Act I. Heralds with trumpets in front of the curtain and a wordless chorus behind it (the latter much used throughout the opera to express stress and particularly battle, the former as 'links' between the episodes of the heroic drama) usher in the action, which starts with discussion of Hecuba's dream – that her newly-born son Paris will cause his father's death. Hecuba's reaction to the Old Man's reading of the dream comes in an aria, 'Then am I no longer mother to this child', which quickly reveals her forthright, passionate nature. Priam's reaction is less positive and exposed in a ruminative soliloquy, whose first words, 'A father and a King', are used later to pinpoint the moment when choice was available to him and he allowed heart (typified in this phrase) to rule head (which insisted on the child's death), and, more culpably, did not hide this reaction from the Young Guard, to whom he gave the job of killing the child and who knew that Priam's feelings contradicted his words.

A vocal Interlude, involving the Nurse, Old Man and Young Guard – the opera's 'Greek Chorus' – discusses choice in its relation to the particular situation.

Priam's son Hector, attempting to demonstrate his physical prowess by subduing and capturing a wild bull single-handed, is dismayed when a young lad jumps on its back and rides it away. Eventually, the boy comes in, reveals that he loves the bull as his best friend but would like to join the young heroes of Troy. Hector offers to teach him the arts of war, a proposition Priam accepts provided the boy's father agrees and he makes a free choice. This the boy does, saying that his name is Paris, a revelation which startles Priam into a soliloquy. He cannot conceal his joy that the gods have reversed his 'choice' of long ago, and his fear that Hecuba's dream may yet prove inspired; in effect, he accepts the new turn of fate.

Nurse, Old Man and Young Guard witness the decision and comment in a second Interlude on its importance.

Guests come rejoicing from the wedding feast of Hector and Andromache, at the same time admitting that the mutual hostility of Hector and Paris has caused Paris to set sail from Troy to the court of Menelaus at Sparta.

We see Helen and Paris, obviously already consumed with passion. Paris insists that Helen must choose between him and Menelaus and at the end of their duet exacts her promise to leave with him if he comes to fetch her. Even Paris in his soliloquy admits to dismay at the prospect their planned elopement opens before him, but turns to wonder whether there is in fact any element of choice in human affairs – do he and Helen 'choose' when, having been apart, their bodies rush together as one? Hermes, as if in answer to his question, comes to tell him he must choose between three Graces: Athene, Hera and Aphrodite (sung by Hecuba, Andromache, Helen). How in choosing one can he escape the wrath of the others? Hermes answers that he will not escape – but he must still choose. Athene offers him courage on the battlefield, Hera satisfaction in marriage, and each curses him when it is obvious he will choose Aphrodite, elope with Helen and plunge Greece and Troy into war.

Act II.¹ Troy is besieged and Hector taunts Paris with having run away in battle from Menelaus. Priam tries to patch up their quarrel, and Paris eventually follows Hector to battle.

The first Interlude has the Old Man asking Hermes to let him see Achilles sulking in his tent.

Except in one short crucial scene, it is the private Achilles whom we meet in the opera, and he is found in his tent with Patroclus, singing sadly to the sound of guitar, 'O rich soiled land', a song of longing for peace and beauty quite at variance with the actions for which Achilles, here as in any other version of the legend, is renowned. Patroclus weeps that Achilles should have so taken to heart the loss of a girl, given as booty after the sack of Thebes and then taken away again, as to refuse to join the battle. Together they cook up the idea that Patroclus shall wear Achilles' armour against the Trojans, and Achilles pours a libation to the gods in order that Patroclus may return safely.

¹ Scored for wind, guitar, percussion and piano, unlike the outer acts which include strings.

The act's second Interlude has the Old Man begging Hermes to warn the Trojans of their peril at Patroclus' hands.

Paris comes to tell Priam that Hector has killed Patroclus in single combat, and Hector to parade before his father in Achilles' armour. A fine trio celebrates the victory and the prospect the Trojans now have of destroying the Greek fleet, but it is interrupted at its climax by the sound of Achilles' war cry. This is the finest coup de théâtre the composer achieved (the only one, you might argue, he ever truly attempted), and the blood-curdling challenge has haunted whoever heard the opera since Richard Lewis first superbly delivered it at Coventry in May 1962, a reaction Tippett undoubtedly anticipated, to judge by the stage direction he allows himself at this point: 'Hector stands as though transfixed!'

Act III. Cellos alone introduce Andromache, waiting like a fighter pilot's mate for her warrior to return from single combat, knowing that each vigil so far has had a happy ending but aware that the credibility gap is narrowing. In her aria, she remembers her foreboding the day Achilles killed her father and brothers, but she refuses to yield to Hecuba's entreaty to go on to the walls of Troy in order to call Hector back from the field of battle; why does King Priam not end the war by sending Helen back to Sparta? Hecuba retorts that it is not for Helen that the Greeks have gone to war, but to win Troy itself. When Helen appears, Andromache can assuage her nerves with insults about Helen's low priority among war objectives, marriage 'vows' to Menelaus, and so on. Helen's answer takes the form of a great aria, its burden: 'women like you, wives and mothers, cannot know what men may feel with me'. The voices of the three women join in perhaps the most inspired section of the score, a fine trio in which each invokes the name and attributes of her mate and predicts death.

In the Interlude serving women pretend to go about their business in Hector's house, but they have already heard the rumour: '... we could tell the story too, the pathetic story of our masters, viewed from the corridor'.

Priam feels alone, isolated by his subjects from some disaster. Only Paris has the courage to tell him that Hector is dead; he cannot accept his father's reproaches and regrets at the result of the choice of twenty and more years ago and proclaims his intention of absenting himself until he has worked out his destiny by killing Achilles.

The last section of the opera begins as Paris leaves and Priam moans to himself: 'A father and a King'. Had the augurs predicted Hector's death and not his own, he would not only have ordered but also willed the killing of the infant Paris. His conscience speaks in the guise of the Young Guard, the Old Man and the Nurse who make him recite the dread chain of events, with vengeance inevitably following military murder, and he gradually accepts the inexorable laws by which men of all ages have lived.

The second Interlude, purely orchestral, ushers in the scene in Achilles' tent, climactic if undemonstrative, in which King Priam begs the body of Hector from the Greek who slew him. Achilles seems to start to urge the law of retribution, but his mention of the name of Patroclus shows the full extent of the wound his friend's death caused him. Priam kisses his hands, 'the hands of him who killed my son', and Achilles grants him the body of Hector. Just as he stood to pour a libation when Patroclus went off to fight, so he stands now to ask his friend's forgiveness for the act of non-hostility which might seem to negate the vengeance he has so bloodily exacted. Achilles and Priam discuss the destiny of each, Achilles' to die at the hands of Paris, Priam's to be killed by Achilles' son Neoptolemus.

The third Interlude has Hermes announcing the deaths of the protagonists and hymning music's all-healing supremacy.

Paris offers to fight to defend Priam, who has refused to leave Troy with him. Priam prays and fails to recognise Hecuba. Stress mounts in the chorus, Andromache spurns Paris and his defence of Priam, and Helen takes her place. 'They stand silent together, the beautiful ill-fated pair', and Priam sends Paris on his way to a hero's death, leaving Helen to make her peace with her lover's father. Priam comforts her – and himself – with the idea, which she enunciates, that neither he nor Hector ever reproached her for her part in events. Finally, Helen goes and as the off-stage sound of the chorus dies away, Priam sinks inaudibly down before the altar where, as Hermes appears before him and departs, Neoptolemus runs his sword through him to kill him instantly. 'Choice' is at an end. H.

THE KNOT GARDEN

Opera in three acts, words by the composer. First performed at Covent Garden, 2 December 1970, with Jill Gomez, Josephine Barstow, Yvonne Minton, Robert Tear, Thomas Hemsley, Raimund Herincx, Thomas Carey, producer Peter Hall, conductor Colin Davis; U.S.A., Northwestern University, Illinois, 1974; Opera Factory, London, 1984, with Janis Kelly, Marie Angel, Christine Botes, Nigel Robson, Philip Doghan, Tom McDonnell, Omar Ibrahim, London Sinfonietta conducted by Howard Williams.

Faber, a civil engineer, aged about 35 Robust Baritone¹
 Thea, his wife, a gardener Dramatic Mezzo
 Flora, their ward, an adolescent girl Light High Soprano
 Denise, Thea's sister, a freedom-fighter Dramatic Soprano
 Mel, a black writer in his late twenties Lyric Bass-Baritone
 Dov, his white friend, a musician Lyric Tenor
 Mangus, an analyst High Tenor-Baritone
 Place: A High-Walled House-Garden
 Time: 'The Present'
 Running Time: 1 hour 35 minutes

In a preface to the published score, the composer has written: 'The scene, whether labyrinth or rose garden, changes with the inner situations. If the garden were ever finally visible, it might be a high-walled house-garden shutting out an industrial city. The labyrinth on the other hand can never be actual. It appears, if at all, as a maze which continually shifts and possibly (in Act II) spins.

'Time is the present. Although the duration is obviously within one day, from getting up to bedtime, the dramatic action is discontinuous, more like the cutting of a film. The term used for these cuts is Dissolve,² implying some deliberate break-up and re-formation of the stage picture.'

He has further told us 'Parolles' defiant realism in All's Well that Ends Well, "simply the thing I am shall make me live", is the motto of the whole work.'

As an introduction in Act I, which has the sub-title Confrontation, Tippett wrote in the original Covent Garden programme: 'The Knot Garden is about the loves and hates of seven people in modern England. Mangus, a psychoanalyst, has been invited to stay in the house of Faber and his wife Thea. She hopes that Mangus can help with the problems of their young ward Flora, who is obsessed by the half-real, half-imagined sexual threat of Faber. Mangus discovers that it is not Flora that is sick but the marriage, and engineers a series of confrontations and "games" to resolve the difficulties. He sees himself as a modern Prospero, manipulating the characters. Dov, a musician, and his lover Mel, a young black writer, are also staying in the house, but as Thea's guests rather than Faber's. The arrival of Thea's sister Denise, a revolutionary, changes all the relationships.'

Act I. Uncompromising, strenuous, wide-striding music (the storm) introduces Mangus, who at his first appearance is described as 'a still point in a whirling storm'. Straight away, he alludes to Prospero and seems full of self-confidence. Here occurs the first Dissolve, ten bars of loud allegro molto followed by five of diminuendo timpani roll and a soft horn call (sometimes on cellos); it is the same each time it occurs in Acts I and II, but varies in Act III. Thea comes slowly from the inner garden stopping occasionally to tend the flowers. Mangus offers to help, but Thea's authority in the garden is absolute. Flora screams off-stage and rushes still screaming into Thea's arms. Faber follows her, but Thea sends Flora away with Mangus and turns harshly to Faber. Flora is their ward, and Thea continues her gardening analogy before saying that, if she may mother her, he – Faber – should father her, not play the lecher. Thea leaves, and Faber, who has been put in the wrong, wonders how this now happens so regularly. As to his relationship with Flora, he says, half to himself and half to Mangus, 'I do not flirt with Flora; Flora screams before I ... Impossible!', then goes off to work. Mangus is left to muse on the way each withdraws to the refuge of either factory or garden, and again refers to the possibility that, Prospero-like, he may put all to rights. Dissolve (music as before).

Thea recommends flower therapy to Flora – or, more prosaically, tells her to arrange some roses in a bowl – and Flora hums enigmatically to herself before telling Thea that her sister Denise has sent a message that she will be arriving later that day. Flora's desultory and now solitary humming turns more purposefully into 'eeny, meeny, miny, moe', but is interrupted by the rumbustious arrival of Dov and Mel in fancy dress, the one tricked out as Ariel, the other as Caliban (jazz drummer's kit in the orchestra). Dov tries to hook Mel, whose Caliban disguise is fish-like, they hold a tableau and Flora stares at them until they suggest that if she thinks they are waxworks, she should pay, and if alive, she should speak. They introduce themselves, Mel as a writer, Dov as a musician, then sing a nonsense rhyme together as Thea and Mangus come from the house.

¹ The composer's own descriptions of the voices required.

² There are two in Act I, one in Act II, five in Act III.

Mangus is of course delighted at the augmentation of The Tempest cast, which now has Ariel, Caliban, Ferdinand and Miranda as well as his Prospero. He takes Flora off to look for costumes and each of the two men who are left takes a glass from Thea's tray until Mel seems hypnotically drawn to Thea, leaving Dov alone to smash his glass to smithereens and start to howl like Ariel's dog. Faber is amazed at what he sees on his return, but Dov's reprise of the ditty he and Mel have already sung leads to an explanation of identities, and Dov moves towards Faber at exactly the moment when Thea and Mel reappear on the opposite side of the stage (the composer explains that the resultant tableau cannot become a vocal ensemble because the tensions are not yet ready for such expression).

Tension builds but is exploded by the sound of Flora's renewed screams as she starts half-hysterically to describe the disconcerting nature of Denise's arrival, explained the moment Denise comes into view and it can be seen that she is disfigured by the torture she has endured in her one-woman efforts to set the world to rights. She knows the effect she will have on them and starts in an extended and passionate aria to explain what she has been through (she is a musical cousin to Queen Hecuba in King Priam, although her defiance has occasionally a hint of Achilles' war-cry about it). She wants no pity and her rhetorical question 'How can I turn home again to you, the beautiful and damned?' receives no direct reply until Mel attempts to relieve the tension by starting a blues, itself developed into a considerable ensemble which eventually includes even Mangus and finally Denise herself, soaring to top C and D flat just before the act comes to an end with Mel's softly spoken 'Sure, baby'.

Act II. Labyrinth. The composer's programme note tells us all the action of the opera takes place in Thea's garden, and especially in the Knot Garden of the title. He specifies that 'it appears as if the centre of the stage had the power to "suck in" a character at the back of the stage, say, and "eject" him at the front. During their passage through the maze, characters meet and play out their scenes. But always one of the characters in these scenes is about to be ejected while a fresh character has been sucked in and is whirled to the meeting point.'

The music is violent from the outset and the first to be whirled in are Thea and Denise, aware of each other, not dissimilar in their sentiments but not properly conversing. Thea is whirled off and Faber makes some kind of contact with Denise, who riposts that she is just as tough as Thea before being herself whirled off and replaced by Flora (her ditty again), who backs away from Faber with renewed screams. No amount of reasoning from Faber can change her attitude towards him, she drops the flowers she has been carrying and is whirled off as Thea reappears to strike Faber with a horse-whip. When Thea disappears, Dov, dressed now as himself, takes her place, still howling like a dog, but prepared to sympathise with Faber's predicament – each of them, he feels, humiliated by a woman. Faber is obviously attracted in spite of himself, but his 'Come, I never kissed a man before' only just precedes his disappearance, as Mel is whirled on. Mel's very effective scene with Dov, directed to be played 'like a song and dance number' and with jazz-kit accompaniment, has as its burden the discovery that two souls, who thought they were twin, need to discover their true natures. Dov is whirled off as the music calms and Denise appears to play on Mel's feelings for oppressed men anywhere (the tune of 'We shall overcome'¹ appears in the orchestra and in Mel's vocal line). As Mel turns to Denise, Dov is thrown from the labyrinth, Thea returns and so does Faber until Flora and Dov, after the act's first Dissolve, are left together.

'As the sense of nightmare clears away, Dov comes to life first. He sees the plight of Flora and goes to comfort her,' say the stage directions – and he comforts her with music, in an infinitely touching scene, first getting her to sing the opening phrases of Schubert's Die liebe Farbe, orchestrated with magical touch (and ending with a direct quotation of the first chord of Beethoven's G major Piano Concerto, a key work in Tippet's musical evolution). Dov ripostes with his own song, much less simple in outline: 'I was born in a big town, in a home without a garden' (a most appreciable product of the lyrical side of Tippet's genius which gave us Boyhood's End and The Heart's Assurance). The magic of love is in the air but, the stage directions tell us, 'as the song ends a shadow enters the garden. It is Mel. He taps the lovers on the shoulder: "Come, I taught you that."' For all Dov's denial, the spell is broken and the music fades.

¹ The marching song of Martin Luther King's civil rights movement.

Act III. Charade. In his programme note, Tippet says, 'Mangus, continually dreaming of himself as Prospero, has from the start of the opera been cajoling the other characters to play a series of short charades with him on scenes from The Tempest.' There is magic in the air as Mangus attempts to set the scene and Denise is stung into stepping into Mangus's circle to proclaim 'Power is in the will'. But Thea, not to be outdone, steps into the circle herself and cries out, 'Forgiveness. Blood from my breast. Here on this island, I know no god but love.'

In the first Charade, Mangus-Prospero explains the island and its inhabitants to Flora-Miranda, conjuring Mel-Caliban to stand upright, to his daughter's delight, and Dov-Ariel to leave the tree where Sycorax has imprisoned him. But Dov-Ariel flings himself on Mel-Caliban and belabours him, far beyond the calls of the script. Dissolve (with the music this time varied).

There is an exchange between Thea and Denise. The first seems to understand that things go wrong, the second does not accept confusion. Both agree that Mel could be Denise's salvation. Dissolve.

Flora-Miranda is asleep; Dov-Ariel is on guard; Mangus-Prospero watches through a telescope. Mel-Caliban creeps up on the sleeping girl, leaps on her and tries to tear her clothes off. Denise protests and Mel says he is only playing the role he was given and no more. Let Denise lay her head against his pounding heart (where, says Dov, his head often lay), and she will understand, but she will not – yet. There is a short duet for Dov and Mel, 'Black earth for white roses?', at the end of which Thea asks Mangus whether he is man of power or voyeur. Mangus's answer is to disclose Faber-Ferdinand and Flora-Miranda playing chess – but not for long, as Flora-Miranda upsets the board. 'That scene went wrong!' says Faber; 'that scene went right!' says Mangus.

The board is set again, and Thea, left alone, expresses new-found confidence in an arioso full of melismas: 'I am no more afraid. So we swing full circle back towards the sanctity of marriage.' Dissolve.

A dénouement seems called for, according to Flora-Miranda, and Mangus-Prospero offers to provide it, at least for Dov and Mel. As judge, with Faber-Ferdinand as some sort of jailer, he tries first Dov-Ariel and frees him, then Mel-Caliban. The Charades are at an end, and it is a time for quotation, musical and Shakespearean. Voices off join in with incoherent cries, coalescing at last into the first word of Dov-Ariel's 'Come unto these yellow sands', which words dominate the ensemble. Mel leaves with Denise, Flora goes off alone in spite of Dov's anxiety to follow her, so that in the end he follows Mel and Denise. Mangus can see only Thea and Faber alone in the garden (Dissolve: modified version of original), and they begin to speak, though not to each other. 'I put away the seed packets. I put away the factory papers ... Our enmity's transcended in desire.'

That the problems of each couple, or of each individual, are resolved is evident; but their catalyst seems to have been musical rather than explicitly contained in the events of the drama. H.

THE ICE BREAK

Opera in three acts, words by the composer. Première Covent Garden, 7 July 1977, with Heather Harper, Josephine Barstow, Beverly Vaughn, Clyde Walker, Tom McDonnell, John Shirley-Quirk, conductor Colin Davis. First performed Kiel, 1978; Boston, 1979, with Arlene Saunders, Leigh Munro, Cynthia Clarey, Curtis Rayam, Jake Gardner, Richard Fredricks, conductor Sarah Caldwell.

Lev, 50-year-old teacher; released after 20 years of prison and exile Bass
 Nadia, his wife, who emigrated Lyric Soprano
 Yuri, their son, a student Baritone
 Gayle, Yuri's white girlfriend Dramatic Soprano
 Hannah, a black hospital nurse Mezzo-Soprano
 Olympion, a black champion, Hannah's boyfriend Tenor
 Luke, a young doctor Tenor
 Lieutenant of Police Baritone
 Astron, a psychedelic messenger Lyric Mezzo and Countertenor

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 1 hour 15 minutes

In his fourth opera, which long before it was completed he claimed was to be his last, Michael Tippett is concerned with whether the humanistic ideal to which he subscribed all his life can survive in a world which seems to be increasingly finding solutions in violence. 'I hold for myself that the composition of oratorio and opera is a collective as well as a personal experience', once wrote Tippett, and in The Ice Break he discusses the culture shock involved in the meeting of East and West; the generation gap; racial tensions and hatred. Resolution of the conflicts may not be achieved, but a moral is drawn to the effect that only in the individual and his rebellion against the mass can salvation be found.

The opera is very short, moves rapidly about in its non-realistic dramaturgy, and the words are used at least as often to inspire the composer as to convey information to the audience.

Act I. An airport. Nadia and Yuri, a cross-grained student, wait for the arrival of Lev, the forgotten father of one and much-loved husband of the other. Yuri doesn't go along with Nadia's high-flying romantic notions but it is no surprise when Lev's voice over loudspeakers joins hers in thought before their physical reunion.

Gayle, in a state of near hysteria as usual, and her black friend Hannah are also at the airport, but they have come as two of a crowd acclaiming the returning black champion Olympion. Gayle, exaggeratedly 'with it' and hotly cool, quickly quarrels with Yuri who takes up a racist position not least because of Gayle's enthusiasm for Olympion.

Yuri refuses to make any effort to comfort Nadia, who wonders if the cheering could be for Lev. Cheerleader and fans burst onto the scene, Olympion's grateful vocal flourishes stem from a mixture of Monteverdi's reiterations and the panache of Achilles' war cry and, when the airport is empty, the drab figure of Lev is seen.

There is a dissolve into Nadia's tiny flat, where her vision of a new life and Lev's belief in a poetic ideal are contrasted in a slow, sad duet, full of melismata, devoid of sustained lyricism.

At Olympion's party, there is less joy than in Midsummer Marriage though even more jollity.

Olympion continues his bragging and eventually provokes Yuri, who is infuriated when Gayle makes a play for Olympion – to make amends, as she says, for years of injustice. Yuri attacks the black champion, who strikes him to the ground.

Nadia tries to explain to Lev her love for Yuri, who bursts in, dragging Gayle with him and rounding angrily on Lev: 'What have you come here for?'

Act II. In Nadia's flat, four people express each his or her own private world: Nadia's conviction that light emerges from darkness; Lev's sense of the burden he bears; Gayle's instinct that life is there to be lived; Yuri's apprehension of the gap between him and his parents. Lev is convinced that his experiences give him the right to speak, but Yuri insists that in this new country it would be thought shameful to be locked up unresisting. Gayle sings of life's reality, Lev wants an end to brutality, and Nadia laments the ritual dance of death.

Gayle and Yuri are subsumed in a masked white chorus, and Olympion and Hannah are together in recognising the blacks' need of him as their champion. For all its bravado speech, theirs is a love duet.

Hannah's long solo, introduced by oboes, all wide leaps, repeated syllables, and emphasis on solitary words, is perhaps the heart of the opera. Can even she make sense of the violence?

A ritual confrontation and mutual defiance between whites and blacks follows. The composer calls it Tribal Dancing.

Lev and Nadia are in something like despair, and Lev wonders whether Gayle could be right in her insistence on reality.

Black clashes with white in a scene of mindless violence, screaming, shots, at the end of which a white person has been beaten up, a black shot, and a moment later another white shot. Sirens can be heard approaching and the Lieutenant of Police asks the doctor about casualties. Olympion and Gayle are dead, Yuri badly injured.

A solo violin over various instruments dominates the sad slow music with which the act ends as Lev seems inclined to follow the doctor's advice and turn to Hannah.

Act III. Lev reads to Nadia, who lies dying. She hears that Yuri will probably survive but has herself released her hold on life. Lev's monologue is full of bitterness, but it is the sound of the sleigh-bells of her youth which introduces Nadia's aria of death. It might almost be Jenifer in a visionary moment, at least as far as the accompaniment is concerned. She hears the sound of the ice breaking on the river, and dies.

'Seekers of all kinds, tough and tender, past, present and future' are preparing for a psychedelic trip. The stage is full of colours, and the voice of Astron (Mezzo-Soprano and Countertenor, mostly an octave apart) sounds from the distance, but he rejects the idea that he is a saviour.

Doctor Luke reminds Lev that Nadia is dead and that he, who was close to death in the camp, must now choose Yuri. Lev watches as Yuri is wheeled into the operating theatre, and waits outside. 'Seekers' after the psychedelic experience rush into the hospital, third cousins perhaps of the laughing children of twenty-two years before.

The operation has been successful and Yuri will walk again. Hannah quotes from her own aria from the centre of Act II ('Much deeper, O much deeper'), and it is plain that she, Lev and even Yuri have succeeded in separating themselves from the mass to become individuals. H.

NEW YEAR

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer, based partly on H.G. Wells's story Men Like Gods (1921). First performed (with reduced orchestration) Houston Grand Opera, 27 October 1989, with Helen Field as Jo Ann, Peter Kazaras as Pelegrin, Krister St Hill as Donny, Richetta Manager as Regan, John Schiappa as the Presenter, James Maddalena as Merlin and Jane Shaulis as Nan, conducted by John DeMain. First U.K. performance (première of the full orchestration), 1990, at Glyndebourne, with Helen Field and Philip Langridge, conducted by Andrew Davis.

From Somewhere and Today

Jo Ann, *a trainee children's doctor*Lyric Soprano
Donny, *her young brother*Light Baritone
Nan, *their foster-mother*Dramatic Mezzo-Soprano

From Nowhere and Tomorrow

Merlin, *the computer wizard*Dramatic Baritone
Pelegrin, *the space pilot*Lyric Tenor
Regan, *their boss*Dramatic Soprano

Outside the Action

Voice, *presenter*Microphoned Male Singer
Dancers, Singers

Place: Jo Ann's Room; Futuristic Interior; Urban Public Space; Visionary Landscape
Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Completed in 1988, when the composer was eighty-three, New Year crowns his career in opera as The Midsummer Marriage initiated it thirty-six years earlier. They have affinities, not just in terms of the central rituals (winter solstice/summer solstice), but in the rapturous mood and in the works' coherence. Dance plays an organic role: New Year, Tippett has said, 'comes close to being a musical, in that dance is an important and integral element'.¹

Act I. Prelude. The Presenter's first words, 'Our world is wicked', refer to 'the terror town' outside Jo Ann's flat. The opera traces her journey from traumatised retreat to the moment when she is ready to confront reality outside.

Scene i. Inside her flat, Jo Ann reassures herself that she is 'safe ... from the storm out there', though 'never safe from the wound within'. As yet she can only dream of helping the children of the town (Jo Ann's Dreamsong). Donny bursts in, to 'jazz style solo' for trumpet. In an exaggeratedly upbeat mood, he dances around before retreating to his room. The Voice repeats Jo Ann's Dreamsong. Nan arrives, to the sound of characteristic bells. She loves both her foster-children but worries that Jo Ann's 'cocoon of love' may destroy Donny. He returns, to perform his 'Skarade', expressing his dilemma as a foster-child in comic form. He briefly fantasises a 'real' home, first in the Caribbean, then 'back further' to Africa. Dancers and Singers introduce the idea of 'Nowhere', the alternative dream world to our reality. The chorus question sets the agenda for Nowhere's role in the rest of the opera: 'Is it Science or Love will show the way?'

Scene ii takes us inside Tomorrow's laboratory, where Merlin, who stands for science and is fond of phrases like 'Digit to digit particle instruction', shows off his new computer to Pelegrin. They drink a toast to 'the New Year, the voyage out' in 'florid song' (a wonderful, ecstatically melismatic duet). Merlin tries to show the future on his computer, but instead Jo Ann appears on the screen. Pelegrin is immediately fascinated. Regan appears but she is only interested in the future. In case we are not sure what she stands for, she helpfully begins the ensemble by asking, 'Manifest am I? Of that Eternal Feminine that draws us on?' Her dogmatism and the heroic, jagged intervals in her vocal line suggest a kinship with the Monstrous Feminine that haunted Britain in the eighties, Mrs Thatcher. Pelegrin wants to 'offer comfort and visionary courage' to the 'harrowed face': he determines to be Jo Ann's 'coal-haired stranger' (traditionally invited across the threshold at New Year to ensure good luck). He journeys to her in his spaceship (taped sound effects that recur whenever it moves).

¹ Introduction to the score.

Scene iii. Pelegrin's first brief encounter with Jo Ann is one of ideas hauntingly expressed in music, rather than as people.

Act II. Prelude. The Voice explains the ritual in which the scapegoat (the old year) must be driven out.

Scene i. Outdoors in a city at night: the crowd (which includes Jo Ann, Nan and Donny) prepares to find and expel the scapegoat. A Shaman whirls his body into a trance (the Shaman Dance, coloured by electric guitars and saxophone). In the second part of the ritual, the hunt for the scapegoat, Donny is chosen and 'ritually beaten', to fortissimo chords from trombone, tuba and guitars, vividly marked 'blurt'. The spaceship lands.

Scene ii. Thinking they have reached the future, Merlin introduces himself, Pelegrin and Regan – 'our mistress, our leader, our star'. Donny addresses her, 'speaking dub-style' (i.e. rapping), which she then imitates. When she realises Pelegrin has not brought them to the future she accuses him of betraying her for Jo Ann, 'this pathetic floozy from the past', and asks, 'What power has she that I have not?' To the sound of divided flutes, Pelegrin answers, 'Could it be the power of love?' With authoritative octave leaps up and down, backed by a 'lyric' clarinet, Nan rebukes Regan as 'that illusion men and women have to forge a realm of future good by power alone', as mistaken as Jo Ann's reliance on love alone. A tremendous ensemble builds up. Each character sings in turn, while the others accompany with col-oratura on open vowels. It is, perhaps, the highpoint of the opera ('No way'). A trio for women's voices becomes a quartet when Pelegrin explains to Jo Ann that their relationship must continue in dreams, rather than reality. Nan points out that dreams can be dangerous in crowds. 'As if to exemplify' her words, the crowd becomes restive, while Donny becomes manically exalted again. He confronts Regan and spits in her face. She leaves with Merlin and Pelegrin in the spaceship.

Scene iii. In a fury the crowd turn on Donny and beat him up. The act ends in a theatrical climax as Jo Ann manages to carry him away, the bell strikes midnight and everyone sings 'Auld lang syne'.

Act III. Prelude. In Jo Ann's room Dancers and Singers reflect that after New Year, 'Our world's still wicked'.

Scene i. Nan has come to take Donny back. Jo Ann acknowledges that she has failed, 'for all [her] love'. In Sprechgesang and over agonised guitar, brass and percussion Donny reflects that his problems stem from his broken childhood, in particular his lack of a father: 'No loving, curbing hand on me'. He hands Jo Ann a 'magic video', a cassette of his dreams. Alone, she plays it and enters 'Donny's Dream', whose brilliant string writing recalls Midsummer Marriage. His dreams of being carried on a condor, of a tiger, of the wondrous family of whales, mean nothing to her. In her own dream Pelegrin invites her aboard the spaceship. An Interlude covers its journey to 'the countries of the mind'.

Scene ii. A symbolic ritual presents Jo Ann's turning-point: racked with thirst, she follows Pelegrin's encouragement to sip, rather than drink, at the 'fountain of forgetting', but then drinks deep at the lake of remembering. Musically the scene boasts virtuoso use of wind instruments, rippling flute and piccolo, oboes paired with trombone. At its climax, she hears 'a deeper sound, a richer song' (bassoon with double-bass). Her lyrical duet with Pelegrin ('Moments out of time and space') is followed by a dance expressing her new sense of freedom. This sarabande for flutes is cousin to the flute-sarabande portraying Paradise in The Masque of Time (1984). Pelegrin picks a rose and an Interlude portrays their return journey.

Scene iii. Pelegrin presents Jo Ann with the rose, promising that when she is ready to go out, the rose will fly from her hand to him. Pelegrin leaves in the spaceship. As she dances towards the door of her flat, the rose disappears from her hand. A brief scene fills in what happened in the spaceship: Regan and Merlin curse Pelegrin. Suddenly the rose appears in his hand: he manipulates the computer so Nowhere disappears.

In her flat, Jo Ann at last opens the door to go out. Though she is momentarily daunted by a barrage of sound, the Voice reminds her of her dream, 'One humanity; One justice'.¹ 'The door is shut sharply behind her, cutting off all sound'. The opera, like The Mask of Time, ends without any 'empty bombast',¹ as the light fades.

All his life Tippett has offered an inspiring vision of otherness. Not least among his contributions is that fearlessly un-English, playful love of ideas. He dares to want us to think, as well as feel. 'Moral and metaphysical ideas and symbols are indispensable to Mr Tippett ... even when they are obscure, they convey to the straining, often puzzled, but always moved and at times wholly transported listener a vision of experience about whose authenticity there can be no doubt.'² How right that this tribute was paid by the seldom straining or puzzled Isaiah Berlin. Occasionally, Tippett's words grate because they do not reflect the unsentimentality of his vision.³ But such words are reborn, transfigured in the immaculately controlled sensuousness of his setting. New Year charts the course of psychic growth in a way that would be ludicrous if it were merely verbal. Music, in Tippett's hands, celebrates its transcendental power to change the way we think and feel: the opera finds a model for its action in the transforming visitations of the spaceship, guided by that break-away pilgrim Pelegrin. P.

¹ Spoken by Mark Knoepfler of the group Dire Straits at the 70th birthday concert for Nelson Mandela in 1988. 'For me,' Tippett has commented in his autobiography Those Twentieth Century Blues (1991), 'that said everything.'

² Isaiah Berlin, Michael Tippett: A Symposium on his 60th Birthday, ed. Ian Kemp, 1965.

³ 'O if we could see them in their saucer ... His rapt face tensed for navigation Her wondering hands strong upon his shoulder'.

MARK-ANTHONY TURNAGE

(born 10 June 1960)

GREEK

Opera in two acts, text by Steven Berkoff from his play of the same title. Première at the Munich Biennale, 17 June 1988, with Quentin Hayes as Eddy, conductor Sian Edwards, producer Jonathan Moore. First produced Edinburgh Festival, 1988; English National Opera, 1990; Montepulciano, 1991 (in Italian), Wuppertal, 1992 (in German). In both Italy and Germany the coarseness of the language was criticised, partly on the grounds that there was no easy Italian or German equivalent!

EddyBaritone
Dad/Café Manager/Chief of Police Baritone
Wife/Doreen/Waitress 1/
Sphinx 2Mezzo-Soprano
Mum/Waitress 2/Sphinx 1Soprano

Running Time: 1 hour 20 minutes

*G*reek was one of twentieth-century opera's instantaneous successes. The first-night audience in Munich (of which I was lucky enough to be part) gave it the kind of reception one associates with Peter Grimes and there is no doubt that the demotic immediacy of the libretto, combined with the composer's brilliantly individual mixture of jagged rhythms, demonic energy and often graceful lyricism, was entirely to the taste of a predominantly youthful audience.

Turnage studied with Oliver Knussen and John Lambert and then worked at Tanglewood with Hans Werner Henze, who invited him to write an opera for the first Munich Biennale, where Greek won B.M.W. prizes for music and text. 'I realise ... that it took a great deal of daring on Henze's part to commission an unknown, twenty-five-year-old English composer who had never written a piece longer than fifteen minutes', commented the composer, who acknowledges such disparate influences as Stravinsky and Miles Davis, Puccini, Britten, Janáček and rock. The 1988 première, with its seventeen-piece orchestra, sparked off a run of successful works in all forms, and for the last decade of the century Turnage has been composer-in-residence first with the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra and then with English National Opera, one striking composition after another resulting from the associations.

Greek is a re-working of the Oedipus myth by Steven Berkoff 'into the contemporary East End of London. Racism, violence and mass unemployment appear as metaphors for the plague that afflicts London ...'

Act I. Eddy is fed up with pub life in the East End and doesn't get on much better with the boredom of family life (Breakfast Quartet). Dad tells him a fortune-teller once said he would murder his Dad and marry his Mum, which strikes Eddy as a good enough reason to leave home (Eddy's Farewell). Mum, Dad and Doreen, Eddy's sister, ruminate on the plague, while Eddy gets involved with the police (Police Riot). After an interlude, he goes to a café, and gets into a fight with the Manager, whom he kicks to death (Fight). He discovers the Waitress is the Manager's widow, finds her attractive (Love Duet), and, even though she discerns a likeness to her long-lost son (The Story of Kid), prepares to marry her. Mum and Dad at home brood on the fortune-teller's prophecy.

After the rhythm-based, highly organised first act, the second is far more lyrical.

Act II. Ten years later, Eddy and his wife have done well (Duet; then Wife's Love Aria, a celebration of physical love and the longest set-piece of the opera). Eddy's parents come to pay them a visit and Eddy decides to take action to end the plague which still rots London. He will visit the Sphinx on the city's outskirts, guarded as it is by a pair of outrageous punk lesbians. It is an extended section and at its end Eddy solves the riddle, then kills the Sphinx.

His parents tell him he is not their son but a foundling they picked up carrying an oil-soaked teddy bear (Dad's Story of Kid). With a piercing scream, Eddy realises the truth (Soliloquy of Regret), is comforted by Mum, Wife and Dad, threatens to do the right thing, then thinks better of it: 'Oh Oedipus, how could you have done it? Never to see your wife's golden body again ...' There is a mock Funeral March, but Eddy seems not to be blind, and Eddy's final monologue is spoken, not sung: 'Bollocks to all that!'

H.

U

VIKTOR ULLMANN

(born 1 January 1898, died 17 October 1944)

DER KAISER VON ATLANTIS

The Emperor of Atlantis

Opera in four scenes, libretto (in German) by Peter Kien. Written in 1944 in the concentration camp of Terezín, in Czechoslovakia, the opera was not publicly performed, though rehearsed with Marion Podolier, Hilde Aronson-Lindt, David Grünfeld (Pierrot and Soldier), Walter Windholz (Emperor), Karel Berman (Death). Première (in German), Amsterdam, 16 December 1975, with Roberta Alexander, Inge Frölich, Adriaan van Limpt (Pierrot), Rudolf Ruivenkamp (Soldier), Meinard Kraak, Tom Haenen, conductor Kerry Woodward.

Emperor ÜberallBaritone
DeathBass
PierrotTenor¹
The LoudspeakerBass
The DrummerMezzo-Soprano
A SoldierTenor¹
A GirlSoprano

Two Female Dancers

Place: Here

Time: Now

Running Time: 50–60 minutes

Der Kaiser von Atlantis was written for performance in Teresienstadt (Terezín), the so-called ‘show place’ concentration camp in the north of Czechoslovakia, but at dress rehearsal stage in October 1944, its explicitly anti-war, anti-Hitler theme caused the camp authorities to prohibit performance. The Czech composer, Viktor Ullmann, was for a while a pupil of Schoenberg’s but the score shows more obviously the influence of Stravinsky and Weill, though the descent from Mahler is easy to find in the intermezzos, in Pierrot’s aria early in the opera, in the scene for him and the Drummer, and in Death’s aria in the last scene. Peter Kien, the librettist, much younger than Ullmann, was primarily a painter and architect; he, like the composer, was moved in 1944 from Teresienstadt to Auschwitz, where both were murdered.

Der Kaiser von Atlantis is laid out in four scenes, with a prelude and two intermezzos. It is scored for string quintet, flute, oboe, clarinet, alto sax, trumpet, percussion, tenor banjo and keyboard (harpsichord, piano, harmonium), and among the original singers was the Czech bass, Karel Berman, for more than thirty years after the war’s end well known in Czechoslovakia and East Germany for roles as far apart as Boris Godunov and Leporello.

The appalling circumstances of the opera’s gestation and abortive première, to say nothing of the sardonically appropriate choice of subject, make it hard to form a dispassionate estimate of its merits. The original libretto was neatly typed on the back of discarded concentration camp admission forms. But on any reckoning and whatever its origin, The Emperor of Atlantis, with its skilful mixture of styles and unerring sense of the dramatic, is a remarkable work and can make an extraordinary effect.

The first notes heard (G, D flat, E flat, A), played on solo trumpet, are from Josef Suk’s well-known symphony, Asrael. Suk wrote the symphony after the death of his father-in-law, Dvořák, and of his wife, Dvořák’s daughter; it was often played in connection with the deaths of famous Czechs. The four notes constitute a Death theme. The loudspeaker announces the opera’s title (‘Death Abdicates’), its characters, and theme: Death in disgust takes a holiday and won't let anyone die. Pierrot is disillusioned, can make no one laugh, and longs to die (aria, duet, aria). Death laments the good old days when war was a matter of spectacle and pageantry, a great contrast to the motorised legions of the present (aria). In the name of the Emperor of Atlantis, the Drummer proclaims total war – to the finish. His aria contains in its introduction a minor-key parody of 'Deutschland über alles'. The curtain falls as Death breaks his sabre.

¹ Originally intended for one performer.

A Dance Intermezzo, in the tempo of a Ländler and with strong overtones of Ullmann's Viennese past, takes us to a room in the Emperor's palace, with a desk, microphone and switchboard. There is a large frame, like a mirror, draped in black. The Emperor shouting his orders into the telephone is answered by the Loudspeaker as he checks on the royal guard, a besieged city, executions, an epidemic, only to get the same report from everywhere: no one seems able to die! Even taking official credit (in a short aria) for the novel situation strikes the Emperor as a hollow form of consolation.

A man and a girl from the two enemy camps meet and in the new situation are driven to make love, not war. The music turns lyrical, the girl seeming to find it all very surprising, the Drummer fruitlessly attempting to reassert the Emperor's authority (trio), until the Girl and the Soldier sing a love duet.

Another Dance Intermezzo, this time slow and funereal ('the living death'), returns us to the Emperor's study, where he is witnessing the collapse of society as he in his deliberate isolation has known it. Pierrot seems to sing a lullaby, but the Emperor is beside himself at the horrible turn of events and first the Drummer and then the Emperor himself join their voices to Pierrot's in a trio. The Emperor pulls the sheet off the mirror and finds Death standing behind it. Death in his andante aria sees himself as comforter rather than tormentor but, when the Emperor begs him to return among men, consents only on condition that the Emperor is the first victim of the new order. The Emperor at first demurs, saying that people don't deserve it, but eventually agrees and sings an impressive farewell – to the war, to life itself. Death leads him through the mirror, and in front of the curtain, a magnificent setting of the chorale 'Ein' feste Burg', sung by the Girl, the Drummer, Pierrot and the Loudspeaker (with the music of the Prelude acting as a kind of ritornello) brings the opera to a grand, cathartic end. H.

V

RALPH VAUGHAN WILLIAMS

(born 12 October 1872, died 26 August 1958)

HUGH THE DROVER

Opera in two acts, text by Harold Child. Première, Royal College of Music, London, 4 July 1924. First performed His Majesty's Theatre, 1924, with Mary Lewis, Tudor Davies, Collier, conductor Sargent; Washington, 1928; Toronto, 1932; Royal College of Music, London, 1933; Sadler's Wells, 1937, with Cross, Tudor Davies, Llewellyn, conductor Collingwood; New York, 1952. Revived Sadler's Wells, 1950, with Joyce Gartside, James Johnston, Roderick Jones, conductor Robertson; Royal College of Music, London, 1972, for Vaughan Williams's Centenary.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| A Showman..... | High Baritone |
| Mary, the constable's daughter | Soprano |
| Aunt Jane, the constable's sister | Contralto |
| The Turnkey | Tenor |
| The Constable | Bass |
| John the Butcher | Bass-Baritone |
| Hugh the Drover | Tenor |
| A Cheap-Jack..... | Baritone |
| A Shellfish-Seller..... | Bass |
| A Primrose-Seller..... | Contralto |
| A Ballad-Singer | Tenor |
| Susan..... | Soprano |
| Nancy..... | Alto |
| William..... | Tenor |
| Robert | Bass |
| A Fool..... | Bass |
| An Innkeeper | Bass |
| A Sergeant | Baritone |

Townspeople, Toy-Sellers, Boys, Soldiers, Stall-
Keeper, Juggler, Dancing-Girl, Trumpeter, etc.

Place: A Small Town in the Cotswolds

Time: About 1812

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

The composer of Hugh the Drover has made extensive use of English folk songs in his score, giving the music a peculiar flavour and affecting also the treatment of the story, which bears a distinctly original stamp. Although all the melodies seem to bear some resemblance to folk songs, five authentic traditional tunes ('Cockles', 'Toy Lambs', 'Primroses', 'Maria Martin', and 'Tuesday Morning') are used in the first act and one (the psalm-tune 'York') in the second.

Act I. The scene represents a May fair with booths and stalls among which the crowd of sightseers moves slowly, admiring, laughing, jesting with showmen, ballad-singers and Cheap-Jacks. The Showman has a dummy of Napoleon 'Boneyparty', which is to be set on fire to delight the patriots of Cotsall. The voice of Mary is heard singing 'I'm to be married on Tuesday morning'. Mary is to marry John the Butcher, but the thought of the wedding gives her no joy; she does not love John, the strongest and richest man in the town. Her Aunt Jane persuades her to accept her fate, when a stranger, Hugh the Drover, comes by; it is love at first sight for both Hugh and Mary. 'Sweet little linnet' he calls her, and instead of riches he offers her a roaming life of toil. Hugh's rousing song of the open road stirs Mary's fancy; she is not afraid; with him and with him alone can she find peace.

John enters with the crowd and eagerly embraces the proposal to fight Hugh for Mary. The crowd makes a ring for the two champions; they fight, and John does not fight fair, but Hugh, undismayed, in the end beats him. But John accuses Hugh of being a French spy. Mary is sure that Hugh cannot be a traitor; the crowd is not as faithful, and now acclaims the Constable (Mary's father), who will put Hugh in the stocks. Hugh is dragged off while the crowd jeers at the 'French spy'.

Act II, scene i. The market-place of the town.

Afternoon. (The composer directs that this scene¹ may be omitted if the opera is found to be too long.) Hugh, guarded by John and four other men, is brought in and about to be put in the stocks. The Constable asks John whether it might not be more prudent to let Hugh go; how can they prove he is a spy? John shows him money; that can prove anything.

Mary comes in, asks her father's pardon, and says she is now willing to marry John. The Constable is for taking her at her word, but John is still suspicious, the more so when she asks for Hugh to be freed since it is on her account that he is in the stocks. The Constable suggests they let him go – they have no evidence against him – but John sees through Mary's stratagem, and urges them to bind Hugh fast lest he should escape. Mary and Aunt Jane lament the failure of their scheme, and they leave Hugh alone in the stocks.

Scene ii. The church bells play the psalm-tune 'York'. Early morning the next day. Hugh is in the stocks.

John and his friends have made a night of it. In passing they come to taunt and hit Hugh who, of course, cannot retaliate. As soon as they go Mary comes to set Hugh free, having taken the key from her father. The lovers are on the point of running away when voices are heard – the alarm has been raised. Hugh goes back to the stocks and hides Mary under his cloak. The Turnkey and the Constable are pacified at the sight of him, but no sooner have they gone when other sounds of May festivities come to the lovers' ears. It is John, who comes to wake up Mary, bringing a spray of mayflowers. Mary cannot be found. The Constable, Aunt Jane, and the Turnkey, coming to inquire into the new mystery, discover Mary sitting in the stocks side by side with Hugh. They want to set Mary free; she refuses to go. The Constable disowns her; John declares that a trollop from the stocks is not a fit wife for him, but the crowd sympathises with the generous girl. There is every likelihood of a fight between the friends of John and those of Mary and Hugh, when the arrival of soldiers called to take away Hugh puts an end to the dispute.

John is anxious that Hugh should be instantly arrested and tried. As soon, however, as the sergeant looks at Hugh he discovers an old comrade; His Majesty has no better friend in England than Hugh the Drover. Annoyed at having come on a wild-goose chase, he refuses to go away empty-handed. He takes John and promises to make a soldier of him. The Constable apologises to Hugh; their friends beg them to stay. In a final homily Hugh tells them that he does not love the smooth, sleek life of the town, and prefers 'the windy wolds of life', where man has to do and dare or die. It is a call that he and Mary must obey. They go, followed by the farewells of their friends. F.B.

THE POISONED KISS

Opera in three acts, libretto by Evelyn Sharp, derived partly from a tale by Richard Garnett and partly from Nathaniel Hawthorne's story Rapaccini's Daughter. First presented at Cambridge on 12 May 1936, and later the same year at Sadler's Wells Theatre, London; Juilliard School, New York, 1937; London Opera Centre, 1975.

| | | |
|-----|---------------------------------|------------|
| Hob | } assistants to Dipsacus |Actor |
| Gob | |Actor |
| Lob | |Actor |

Dipsacus, *a professional magician*Bass

Tormentilla, *his daughter*Soprano

Angelica, *her maid*Soprano

Amaryllus, son of the Empress of Golden Town....Tenor

Gallanthus, *his jester*Baritone

Three Mediums, assistants to the

EmpressSoprano, Mezzo-Sopranos

The Empress Persicaria.....Contralto

Running Time: 2 hours

Described as a romantic extravaganza, the opera is really a fairytale set to characteristic and very charming music, and with spoken dialogue to help along the action. It was written in 1927–29, revised twice in the 1930s, and then again in 1956–57, when the composer's wife Ursula rewrote the dialogue. Vaughan Williams is said to have thought the work essentially unimportant though nonetheless something he was keen to write. But he was timid about showing it to his friend Gustav Holst!

The overture, compounded of tunes heard later, is directed to be played with the house lights up.

¹ Added for the 1933 revival at the Royal College of Music, London, when Beecham conducted, the scene never, it would appear, entirely convinced its composer, who, however, did not specifically discard it.

Act I. Near the house of Dipsacus on the edge of a forest, rival choirs, representing the powers of good and evil, sing of the beauty of day and night. But as soon as they have gone Angelica is left to lament the fate of an attractive young girl whose life passes in complete seclusion. All unknown to her, however, the prince and his jester have been roving in the forest and now the jester, Gallanthus, arrives. Angelica, who has never seen a young man before, falls in love with him and he with her. Their billing and cooing is interrupted by the coming of Dipsacus who means to expel the strangers by magic. The stage is emptied, but now Tormentilla arrives followed by Amaryllus. He met her in the forest nursing a cobra and, fearing for her life, has struck the snake a blow with his cane. Tormentilla does not fear snakes. She has been fed on poisons by Dipsacus, who has his own reasons for the strange diet. Amaryllus cannot understand why Tormentilla instead of thanking him weeps over her pet. An understanding is, however, soon reached when youth calls to youth; in their love duet, Amaryllus sings 'Blue larkspur in a garden, White clouds in summer skies', while Tormentilla, reared on poisons, uses the same tune for 'Black henbane in a thicket, Slime of the serpent's trail'. The two are about to go roving in the forest when Dipsacus intervenes. Tormentilla whispers the word Love, upon which Dipsacus tells her his plans. When he was young he was scorned by the Empress of Golden Town and has vowed to be revenged. He has fed Tormentilla on poisons solely in order that her kiss should be death to any lover. She will have to make the Empress's son kiss her and thus kill him. Tormentilla refuses to be a party to such a murderous plot and the angry magician banishes her. They, for their part, are not unwilling to go, especially as Angelica has abstracted a piece of the philosopher's stone which has the same virtue as Aladdin's lamp. They rub the stone and the stage is filled with a host of milliners and dressmakers with their latest creations.

Act II. Tormentilla's apartments in Golden Town. The room is filled with flowers sent by Tormentilla's admirers. Her beauty has excited such interest that when abroad she must wear a veil to avoid the unwelcome attentions of Golden Town gallants. She loves the prince whom she believes to be a shepherd boy. Part of the act is taken up with the plots of the three assistants of the Empress and counterplots of three assistants of the magician. The assistants of the Empress have been instructed to poison Tormentilla; the assistants of the magician plot to bring the young lovers together so that the prince should kiss Tormentilla and die. The assistants of the Empress fail. They present Tormentilla with a box of poisoned chocolates, which she eats with relish. The assistants of the magician are more successful. They bring the prince to Tormentilla's apartment, where the lovers kiss and the prince falls, apparently dead.

Act III. The palace of the Empress. The prince is not dead, having been fed on antidotes since childhood, but he is ailing. The doctor bluntly tells the Empress that the only way to cure him is to bring to his side the woman whose name is ever on his lips. The Empress is angry, but if neither her spells nor the art of the physician will serve, Tormentilla will have to come and stay till the prince is restored to health.

Meanwhile Dipsacus comes to gloat over the distracted woman who once jilted him. He boldly tells the Empress that he and his magic alone are responsible for the prince's illness. They quarrel at first, but the old love is not dead; they grow sentimental and fall into each other's arms. They are found in this position by the prince and Tormentilla. Marriages are arranged – not excluding the marriage of Gallanthus and Angelica. The act which began with a waltz and a tango (the composer's touch is ever light) ends in a glorious hornpipe dance. No magic has power against true love, and love has conquered once more. F.B.

RIDERS TO THE SEA

Opera in one act, text by J.M. Synge. Première, London, Royal College of Music, 1 December 1937. Produced Cambridge Arts Theatre, 1938, with Janet Smith-Miller, Margaret Field-Hyde, Olive Hall, Marcus Dods. Revived Wolverhampton, 1950; Sadler's Wells, 1953, with Marjorie Shires, Elizabeth Robinson, Olwen Price, John Faasen, conductor John Matheson; Naples, 1959, with Pina Malagrini, Elena Todeschi, Miriam Pirazzini, Guido Mazzini, conductor Francesco Molinari-Pradelli.

Maurya, an old woman Contralto
 Bartley, her son Baritone
 Cathleen, her daughter Soprano
 Nora, her younger daughter Soprano
 A Woman Mezzo-Soprano
 Chorus of Women

Place: An Island off the West Coast of Ireland

Time: Early Twentieth Century

Running Time: 40 minutes

This short music drama, based almost word for word on J.M. Synge's one-act play about a fishing community on the Isle of Aran, is probably the composer's most successful opera. Begun in 1925, it was finished in 1932 and first performed at the Royal College of Music in December 1937. Its relative neglect by opera companies is due to the difficulty of finding a suitable companion piece, which only makes it the more regrettable that the composer abandoned his original idea of setting Synge's The Tinker's Wedding which would have made the appropriate contrast.

The opera begins with a short prelude¹ in which we hear the sea swelling from ominous calm to the growing storm heard as the door opens on scene i to admit Nora to the cottage kitchen where her sister Cathleen sits spinning. Nora has brought with her some clothes taken from a drowned man to discover if they belong to Michael, their brother, who, like his father and four other brothers, has been lost at sea. Maurya, their mother, is trying to rest in the next room, and the two younger women, over menacing orchestral sounds of rising wind and sea, quietly talk of their mother's wretchedness and hide the clothes away from her in the loft.

Maurya cannot sleep. She no sooner expresses her anxiety that Bartley, her only remaining son, intends to take the horses in the boat to the Galway Fair than Bartley himself arrives to collect a rope for a halter. In spite of the entreaties of his mother and sisters, he calmly gives them instructions on how to manage during his absence and goes out saying that he will ride the red mare with the grey pony running behind. Cathleen and Nora reproach their mother for not giving Bartley her blessing, and make the excuse that they have forgotten to give him his bread for the journey in order to send her after him. She stands for a moment in the doorway and sings mournfully 'in this place it is the young men do be leaving things behind them for them that do be old', then sets out into the wind, strongly expressed in strings and woodwind.

In Maurya's absence her daughters, at times unaccompanied or over a wandering solo oboe, decide to open the bundle of clothes. They find to their horror that they were certainly Michael's. Their mourning is heartfelt but, on hearing their mother return, they hide the clothes and compose themselves.

Maurya comes in and sits keening to herself. Cathleen tries to discover what has so terribly distressed her and Maurya tells them that she has seen Bartley riding to the sea on the red mare with Michael dressed in fine clothes and new shoes riding behind him on the grey pony. But, Cathleen tells her, they now know Michael is dead. Maurya is adamant and says that this vision means she will lose Bartley as well. Over an off-stage chorus of wailing women she sings of the deaths of all her men one after the other. As she describes the bringing home of the body of Patch, the door opens and behind the old women who come in is carried the dripping corpse of Bartley. He has been knocked into the sea by the grey pony.

Against the keening of the women, Maurya in a majestic aria sings of her resignation, which amounts almost to relief, as the sea has now taken from her everything that it could and is powerless to hurt her further. No longer will she worry about the wind and the tide; at last she can rest. Over a sustained F minor background she blesses all her dead one by one. Then as the music slides into E major she calls on God to bless the soul of everyone left living in the world. The sound of orchestra and wailing women surges up as Maurya sings proudly that Michael has had a clean burial and Bartley will have a fine coffin and a deep grave, but calm returns as she says, 'No man at all can be living for ever and we must be satisfied.' She kneels submissively by the bier. A sudden gust blows open the cottage door through which we hear the ceaseless noise of the sea. A soprano voice grows fainter and fainter in the distance as the stage fades into darkness and we are left only with the sound of the wind.

H.

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS

A morality in a prologue, four acts and an epilogue, founded on Bunyan's Allegory of the same name. Première, Covent Garden, 26 April 1951, with Arnold Matters, Inia Te Wiata, ¹ Vaughan Williams uses a small orchestra: single woodwind apart from a second flute (the only clarinet is a bass clarinet); brass confined to two horns and one trumpet; and a limited string section.

Norman Walker, Edgar Evans, conductor Leonard Hancock; B.B.C. (in studio), 1960, with John Noble, Herincx, conductor Boulton; Royal Northern College, Manchester, 1992.

John Bunyan, the writer Bass-Baritone
 The Pilgrim Baritone
 Evangelist Bass

The four neighbours

Pliable Tenor
 Obstinate Bass
 Mistrust Baritone
 Timorous Tenor

In the House Beautiful

Three Shining Ones Soprano, Mezzo, Contralto
 The Interpreter Tenor

Watchful, the porter High Baritone
 A Herald High Baritone

In the Valley of Humiliation

Apollyon Bass
 Two Heavenly Beings Soprano, Contralto

In Vanity Fair

Lord Lechery Buffo Tenor
 A Jester Dancer
 Demas Baritone
 Judas Iscariot Baritone
 Simon Magus Bass
 Worldly Glory High Baritone
 Madam Wanton Soprano
 Madam Bubble Mezzo-Soprano
 Pontius Pilate Bass
 Usher Buffo Tenor
 Lord Hate-Good Bass
 Malice Soprano
 Pickthank Contralto
 Superstition Tenor
 Envy Bass

A Woodcutter's Boy Soprano or Treble
 Mister By-Ends Buffo Tenor
 Madam By-Ends Contralto
 Three Shepherds Tenor, Baritone, Bass
 The Voice of a Bird Soprano
 A Celestial Messenger Tenor

Chorus of the Men and Women of the House Beautiful, of 'Certain Persons clothed in Gold', of Doleful Creatures, of Traders in Vanity Fair, of Angels in the Celestial City

Running Time: 2 hours

Act I, prologue. 'Bunyan is sitting in Bedford Jail and is writing the last words of The Pilgrim's Progress, "So I awoke, and behold it was a dream." Then he stands and, turning to his hearers, reads from the beginning. As he reads there appears a vision of the pilgrim with a burden on his back, with his lamentable cry "What shall I do?" A curtain falls hiding Bunyan, and the Pilgrim is left alone reading his book and lamenting' – thus the synopsis printed as an introduction to the piano score.

The Evangelist appears and directs the Pilgrim to the Wicket Gate, encouraging him to bear his burden until he comes 'to the place of deliverance'. The Pilgrim is about to go when four neighbours, Pliable, Obstinate, Mistrust, and Timorous, attempt to dissuade him from his perilous undertaking. At the behest of the Evangelist, he starts again in quest of 'Life, eternal life!'

The Wicket Gate: behind it, the House Beautiful. The Pilgrim stumbles in and kneels in front of the Cross. He hears the voices of Three Shining Ones, who presently appear, take the burden off his back and lay it on the Sepulchre, then raise him to his feet and lead him to the gate. An Interpreter receives him, and a chorus of men and women welcome him to the house. The Pilgrim kneels while the Interpreter places the mark of the seal on his forehead. A procession appears, carrying a white robe, which the Three Shining Ones place on the Pilgrim's shoulders. The Interpreter slowly leads the Pilgrim into the house.

Act II. A Nocturne interlude leads straight to the act (and should only, says the composer, be included if it is wished to perform Acts I and II without a break). Watchful, the porter of the house, goes his rounds and prays for the blessing of sleep on all that rest within.

An open road stretches out straight from the back of the stage. A Herald steps forward: 'This is the King's highway ... It is straight as a rule can make it. Who will go on that way?' The Pilgrim asks for his name to be set down in the book, and while the scribe enters it and the Pilgrim is provided with armour, the chorus sings Bunyan's hymn, 'Who would true valour see, Let him come hither.'

The Valley of Humiliation, a narrow gorge, shut in at the back by a bare grey hill. A Chorus of Doleful Creatures is howling when the Pilgrim appears. He is hailed by Apollyon, who proclaims that he is King of the region wherein the Pilgrim was born and challenges him to fight for his soul. The Pilgrim is victorious in the combat, but sinks down weak with his wounds until revived by two Heavenly Beings, bearing a branch of the Tree of Life and a cup of the Water of Life. The Evangelist appears and announces new trials for the Pilgrim; he shall pass through Vanity Fair, where he will be ill-treated by the inhabitants: 'Be thou faithful unto death, and the King shall give thee the Crown of Life.' The Pilgrim is invested with the Staff of Salvation, the Roll of the Word and the Key of Promise.

Act III. Vanity Fair. Booths are up against the house walls on each side of the stage. A lane runs up-stage between the booths. The Chorus stands round the booth dressed in fantastic dresses of all periods. 'All that the world can provide is for sale. The Pilgrim enters and the crowd surrounds him. "What will ye buy?" But the Pilgrim prays to keep his eyes from vanity. A procession enters of various well-known characters who succumbed to the lure of gold or power, Demas, Judas Iscariot, Simon Magus, Worldly Glory, and Pontius Pilate. Then the mood changes, Madam Bubble, Madam Wanton, and Lord Lechery offer him the lust of the flesh and the pride of life, but the Pilgrim waves them away. "I buy the truth." He defies their Prince Beelzebub, the father of lies. At this moment appears Lord Hate-Good, who, after hearing the witnesses against the Pilgrim, condemns him to prison and death' (from the synopsis to the score).

The Pilgrim in prison laments his condition. Why has God forsaken him? Suddenly he remembers the Key of Promise which has been entrusted to him. He puts it into the lock and the gates fly open. The moon gradually illuminates the landscape and reveals the Pilgrim's Way, up which the Pilgrim strides.

Act IV. The edge of a wood. The Pilgrim's Way is seen stretching out into the distance with the Delectable Mountains far off. When the curtain rises, a Woodcutter's Boy is chopping firewood. He sings brightly as he works. The Pilgrim asks him how far he still has to go before he reaches the Celestial City. He is told that it is not far from the Delectable Mountains. Enter Mister and Madam By-Ends. They are full of talk, but admit that though some 'are for religion in rags and contempt', they themselves 'are for him when he walks in his golden slippers in the sunshine and with applause'. They refuse to accompany the Pilgrim on the terms he proposes, preferring their old principles, 'since they are harmless and profitable'.

The Delectable Mountains, near the Heavenly

City. This is the episode known as 'The Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains' and performed separately under that title as early as 1922¹ (though it lasts little more than quarter of an hour, it achieved considerable popularity in the twenty-nine years between its first performance and its incorporation in the longer work). Three shepherds are kneeling in prayer just before sunset. The Pilgrim enters and asks them if he is on the way to the Celestial City. They reassure him and ask him to stay with them for a while, to solace himself with the good of the Delectable Mountains. The voice of a bird is heard singing, and the shepherds join in the hymn. But a Celestial Messenger appears to summon the Pilgrim to the Celestial City, and, as a symbol of his mission, ceremonially pierces the Pilgrim's heart with an arrow. He leads the Pilgrim off, and points the way forward. As the Pilgrim is seen entering the River of Death, the shepherds raise their voices in song, joined by the sound of an invisible chorus.

The stage is quite dark. A distant trumpet sounds, and the voices from the Celestial City are heard a long way off but gradually getting nearer. Men and women on earth join in with them. Darkness gradually gives way to light, and the Pilgrim is seen climbing the stairs to the Gates of the City. They open and he is welcomed by angels. His Pilgrimage is over.

Epilogue. The vision fades. Bunyan addresses his hearers and shows them his book. 'O come hither, and lay my book, thy head and heart together.'

It has been rightly said that the key to the work lies in its title: it is a Morality, not an opera. The composer has been more interested in evoking a half-mystical, half-pastoral atmosphere than in creating dramatic tension through concentration on character and situation. The Pilgrim's Progress stands as a monument to the composer's life-long seriousness of purpose (he was seventy-eight when it was first given) and equally long preoccupation with the subject of Bunyan's allegory. In his score, he has not only incorporated the episode of 'The Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains' but has also drawn extensively upon material already familiar from his fifth symphony (when this was first performed, it was explicitly stated that the composer had used themes from his then unfinished opera).

H.

¹ Première, Royal College of Music, London, 1922. First performed Sadler's Wells, 1947; Cincinnati, 1949.

GIUSEPPE VERDI

(born 9 or 10 October 1813, died 27 January 1901)

For Italy, in the second half of the nineteenth century Verdi dominated opera even more than Rossini had in the first. His career and his aspirations were totally different from Wagner's and he was never the iconoclastic innovator his great German contemporary was perceived to be. Verdi's influence was great though not so great as Wagner's, and his reputation since his death, nearly a hundred years before I write this, has fluctuated in a way that is with hindsight astonishing though not too hard to elucidate.

Verdi's career divides, like those of most creative artists, into three: first, from Oberto to Luisa Miller and Stiffelio; then, when he had become a respected, much-in-demand composer, from Rigoletto to Don Carlos; and finally, as a venerated maestro from whom a new work was expected only once in a decade, from Aida to Falstaff, taking in the Requiem and the Quattro Pezzi Sacri on the way. Macbeth is an awkwardly placed forerunner of the future in the first phase, where it nonetheless has to remain, and some would include Don Carlos in the last phase, arguing its unsurpassed characterisation and the composer's masterly exploitation of colour. The final masterpieces have been highly esteemed from the start, though Don Carlos is a relatively late candidate for acceptance on this level. The middle group, apart from the universally accepted trio of Rigoletto, Trovatore and Traviata, has taken time to grow in public estimation since the German revival of the 1920s.

The amazing transformation in public perception has been with the operas of Verdi's first period, what he described as his anni di galera (years in the galley), when he was writing up to three operas a year – easy apparently for Rossini and Donizetti, hard for Verdi. Crudities of construction and of detail notwithstanding, the sheer vitality and intensity of the music speak immediately to late-twentieth-century audiences and will I suspect continue to speak to audiences of the next century.

Fifty years ago, the notion of Verdi scholarship, let alone Verdi Conferences and a Verdi Institute, would have seemed peculiar, unnecessary, beside the point.

Nowadays, versions, revisions, Paris options are discussed as ardently as Mozartian or Wagnerian variations, and the results have just as much practical effect on performance. Conceptual directors choose Nabucco as soon as Tannhäuser, conductors go for Rigoletto before Aida, audiences delight in Stiffelio as readily as in Turandot. The grand old man of Busseto needs at the approach of the millennium no special pleading. H.

OBERTO, CONTE DI SAN BONIFACIO

Oberto, Count of San Bonifacio

Opera in two acts, text officially by Temistocle Solera, although, says Julian Budden, most of it was probably by Antonio Piazza. Première at la Scala, Milan, 17 November 1839, with Rainieri-Marini, Mary Shaw (an English contralto, whose only claim to fame is this creation), Salvi, and the bass Ignazio Marini, the soprano's husband and a famous exponent of Rossini's Mosè. The opera was revived at la Scala for the fiftieth anniversary of Verdi's death, in 1951, with Caniglia, Stignani, Poggi and Pasero, conductor Capuana; and in Leeds by Opera North in 1994, with John Tomlinson in the title role.

Cuniza, sister of Ezzelino da Romano Contralto
Riccardo, Count of Salinguerra Tenor
Oberto, Count of San Bonifacio Bass
Leonora, his daughter Soprano
Imelda, Cuniza's confidante Mezzo-Soprano

Knights, Ladies, Vassals

Place: Bassano, Italy

Time: 1228

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

There is some doubt as to whether Verdi's first opera was a re-hash of an earlier work, but it was certainly written over some four years. Its success was sufficient for la Scala's impresario, Bartolomeo Merelli, to commission further operas and to maintain the connection with Verdi after the failure of Un Giorno di Regno. On the other hand, revivals of Oberto – even with a cast like la Scala's of 1951 – reveal no more than the burgeoning of talent and nothing approaching a neglected masterpiece.

Ezzelino da Romano has defeated in battle Oberto, who has taken refuge in Mantua. Oberto's daughter, Leonora, has been seduced by Riccardo, who is now due to marry Cuniza, Ezzelino's sister. Oberto and Leonora make their way to Bassano where the marriage will take place, and denounce Riccardo to Cuniza, who in her turn condemns him in front of the full chorus. When Riccardo in the second act asks to speak with her, Cuniza declines to see him, and Oberto shortly after waits to fight him. Riccardo on Cuniza's insistence agrees to marry Leonora, but is unlucky enough in his much delayed duel to kill Oberto. He leaves a letter saying he will go into voluntary exile, leaving his property to Leonora.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of a not very remarkable score is the first of a long sequence of father-daughter duets which occurs in the first act, when Oberto makes it plain to Leonora that he will only forgive her if she will interrupt the wedding feast and herself denounce her seducer. H.

UN GIORNO DI REGNO

King for a Day

Opera in two acts, text by Felice Romani (subtitle: Il finto Stanislao – first set in 1818 by Gyrowetz). Première, la Scala, Milan, 5 September 1840. Not revived after the 1840s until broadcast by Radio Italiana during the Verdi celebrations of 1951, with Pagliughi, Laura Cozzi, Oncina, Capecci, Bruscantini, Dalamangas, conductor Simonetto. Performed New York, Amato Opera Theatre, 1960; London, St Pancras, 1961; Como, 1973; Bregenz, 1974; Genoa, 1979, with Dessi, Corbelli, Alaimo, Mori; Wexford, 1981, with Aliberti, Feeney, Benelli, Bruscantini, conductor James Judd; San Diego, 1981, with Saunders, J. Patrick Raftery, conductor Calvin Simmons; Vienna Volksoper, 1995.

Cavalier di Belfiore, a French officer impersonating
Stanislao (Stanislas) of Poland.....Baritone

Baron di Kelbar.....Basso Buffo

The Marchesa del Poggio, a young widow, the Baron's niece, in love with Belfiore.....Soprano

Giulietta di Kelbar, the Baron's daughter.....Mezzo-Soprano

Edoardo di Sanval, a young official, la Rocca's nephew.....Tenor

La Rocca, Treasurer to the Estates of Brittany.....Basso Buffo

Count Ivrea, Commander of Brest, engaged to the Marchesa.....Tenor

Delmonte, esquire to the false Stanislao.....Bass

Place: Baron di Kelbar's Castle near Brest

Time: August 1733

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

After the favourable reception of Verdi's first opera Oberto at la Scala in 1839, the impresario Merelli commissioned the young composer to write him three operas in the next two years, to be produced either at la Scala or the Imperial Theatre in Vienna. The first of these was to be an opera buffa, and the circumstances of its composition and première have become famous – the illness of the composer, the death of his wife, an inadequate performance, a disastrous public reception and the withdrawal of the opera to Verdi's intense chagrin. The composer never forgave the Milanese public for what he thought an act of cruelty to a young composer badly in need of encouragement, and years later, when congratulated by a friend on a recent success, refused to show satisfaction at the public's favourable reaction, which he thought as capricious and lacking in seriousness as its former disapproval. Revivals of Un Giorno di Regno are rare, but in 1951 a carefully prepared Italian broadcast showed it, in spite of obvious indebtedness to Rossini and Donizetti, to be musically delightful.

The story is taken from an incident which took place during the wars of Polish succession in the eighteenth century, when Stanislas Leszczynski, whose right to the throne had been challenged and who had been hiding in France, made his way secretly back to Poland and reappeared with dramatic suddenness at a service in Warsaw Cathedral, to be recognised as the rightful claimant. There is, however, little historical basis for the incidents which form the subject of Romani's libretto.

Act I. After a brilliant overture referring to the opening and closing scenes of the opera, the first scene takes place in a hall in the castle where servants are excitedly making preparations for the double wedding of the Baron's daughter Giulietta to the rich old Treasurer, La Rocca, and of his niece, the Marchesa, to Count Ivrea. In point of fact, rejoicing is slightly out of place as Giulietta is in love with young Edoardo di Sanval and the Marchesa is marrying the Count in a fit of temper, having been, she thinks, jilted by Cavalier di Belfiore. The Baron and the Treasurer congratulate one another on the great honour which may be accorded them in having the King of Poland as witness to the double ceremony. Delmonte announces the arrival of his master and in comes the 'King', in reality the Cavalier di Belfiore, disguised (Il finto Stanislao – the false Stanislas) in order to distract attention from the real Stanislao's bid for power. In a lyrical aside he sings of his wish that his companions in Paris could see him, the wildest drinker of them all, playing so dignified a role, then in the cabaletta reiterates his desire that the company should treat him not as a king but as a friend.

The Baron invites him to the double wedding and Belfiore is most disturbed to hear that one of the brides is to be the Marchesa, with whom he is in love. He writes urgently to the Polish Court in hope that Stanislao has by now been enthroned and that he may therefore be released from his impersonation. In his turn Edoardo di Sanval, who is in despair at the prospect of Giulietta's marriage, begs, now that life for him is over, to be enlisted in the service of Poland ('Proverò che digno io sono'). Belfiore accepts him, determined, even if his spurious court goes up in smoke, to get the better of the Baron. To a martial air the two sing of glory and heroism, but as they go off together, the Marchesa enters unseen and recognises Belfiore. She wonders if he will reveal himself when he hears of her approaching marriage, and sings of the impossibility of hiding her love.

Scene ii. The garden of the castle. Peasant girls sing and Giulietta reflects that it is a young man she wants to marry, not an old one. Her father the Baron, in company with her elderly fiancé, comes in and reproaches her for hiding at a moment when she is about to meet a king and her future husband is nearby. The Treasurer comforts her. Belfiore enters and presents Edoardo as his new squire. In order to give the thwarted lovers an opportunity to talk, he says he requires the advice respectively of the Baron in military and the Treasurer in political matters. Edoardo is to entertain his future aunt, while the important discussion takes place. That Edoardo makes the most of his chance does not go unnoticed by his jealous uncle, who is so infuriated that he interrupts the strategical discussion and has to be admonished by the 'King'.

Belfiore finally calls a halt, much to the Treasurer's relief, but at this point the Marchesa arrives, whispering to Giulietta that she has come only because of her. When the Baron makes haste to rebuke her for her rudeness to the noble visitor, she apologises to Belfiore, and each wonders what the other is thinking. After an allegro sextet, Belfiore, the Baron and the Treasurer depart, but Edoardo and Giulietta are disappointed to find the Marchesa at first so disinclined to discuss their problems. She apologises and promises to help them. The scene ends with a spirited trio.

Scene iii: the same as scene i. Belfiore tells La Rocca that, if he were not about to be married, he would, because of his brilliant financial brain, give him a ministry in the government, and the hand of a rich Polish princess into the bargain. La Rocca finds this prospect irresistible, agrees to it and, when the Baron comes in to discuss the marriage contract, timidly suggests that he is unworthy of Giulietta. The Baron, incredulous and scandalised by turns, challenges the terrified Treasurer to draw his sword. Everyone runs in and the Baron tells them his daughter has been insulted; Giulietta of course is delighted and the Marchesa cunningly puts forward the idea to the Baron of avenging his honour and humiliating the Treasurer by marrying Giulietta to Edoardo. Belfiore's entrance causes general embarrassment and the Baron apologises for their behaviour. Each participant hopes to enlist the King's aid, and accordingly all together begin to explain the situation, until Belfiore demands they speak one at a time. But it is no use: they are too anxious and upset to obey and the act ends with all begging the King for pardon and agreeing to accept his decision.

Act II, scene i. The menservants of the Baron are undecided whether any wedding will ever take place, as these aristocrats seem to change their minds every five minutes. Their perplexity is not allayed by Edoardo, who in an ecstasy of happiness tells them that love has at last come to him and that he is to marry Giulietta. The servants leave and Belfiore, Giulietta and La Rocca enter, the 'King' questioning his squire and his newly-appointed 'minister' as to why the Baron is adamant in refusing to allow the marriage of Edoardo to Giulietta. When told it is because he is penniless, Belfiore promptly orders the luckless Treasurer to endow Edoardo with one of his several castles and an income for life. The poor Treasurer asks for time, but is interrupted by the still furious Baron, demanding an explanation. The two apoplectic old men rush off, hurling insults at one another.

Scene ii. A conservatory overlooking the garden. The Marchesa and Belfiore enter separately, the latter unseen by his beloved. The Marchesa is angry and puzzled at Belfiore's attitude and vows to force an explanation. Belfiore, still disguised as the King, discloses his presence and says it is easy to see she is thinking of the Cavalier. 'Yes,' says the Marchesa, 'I am trying to think how to punish him for his faithlessness and have decided not to marry him.' Belfiore does not believe her and each thinks the other's cunning quite transparent. The Baron rushes in to say that the Count will be arriving at any moment. Good, says the Marchesa, she is eager to marry him. 'What about the Cavalier?' asks Belfiore. 'Why is he not here?' she asks. In an andante cantabile aria, she sings sadly that all she wants is for him to appear to the one who adores him and ask her forgiveness. The servants announce the arrival of the Count, and the Marchesa goes to meet her bridegroom, vowing to forget her faithless lover.

Giulietta comes in, delighted that her father has consented to her marriage with Edoardo and overcome with gratitude to the King. When Edoardo enters and tells her that he must leave with Belfiore, Giulietta insists that as her future husband his place is with her. The two, in an allegro duet, are eventually reunited.

The Marchesa's fiancé, Count Ivrea, has now arrived, and the Baron assures the Count that his beloved has no longer any thought of the Cavalier. The Marchesa promises to marry the Count, provided the Cavalier does not appear within an hour. Belfiore enters with Giulietta and Edoardo, and announces that he must leave at once on urgent business. The Marchesa says she hopes he will stay for her wedding but is mortified when he tells her that the Count must accompany him. Belfiore is delighted to observe her dismay, but the rest of the company is taken aback by this sudden, apparently churlish, act.

Delmonte now brings a message from the Polish Court; Belfiore is excited but will only reveal the news after Giulietta has been safely betrothed to Edoardo with himself and La Rocca as witnesses. Once this is accomplished, Belfiore announces that Stanislaw has been accepted in Warsaw, that if he himself is no longer a King he has at least been made a Marshal and can now resume his identity as Belfiore. He embraces the delighted Marchesa, and Baron, Count and Treasurer give in to the inevitable, for the opera to end with rejoicing at the restoration of Stanislaw and at the happiness of the reunited lovers.

H.

NABUCCO

Opera in four acts, text by Temistocle Solera (refused by Nicolai). Première at la Scala, Milan, 9 March 1842, with Giuseppina Strepponi (who, years later, became Verdi's wife), Bellinzaghi, Miraglia, Ronconi, Derivis. First performed in London, Her Majesty's Theatre, 1846, as Nino (in Italian); Covent Garden, 1850, as Anato, with Castellan, Costi, Tamberlik, Ronconi, Tagliafico, conductor Costa; New York, 1848. Revived Florence Festival and la Scala, 1933, with Cigna, Stignani, Galeffi, Pasero, conducted by Gui and produced by Ebert; la Scala, 1946, for the reopening of the rebuilt theatre, with Pedrini, Barbieri, Binci, Bechi, Siepi, conductor Serafin; Rome, 1951, with Caniglia, Bechi, Rossi-Lemeni, conductor Gui; Welsh National Opera, 1952, with di Leo, Tom Williams; at Sadler's Wells, London, 1955, with Packer, Ronald Jackson, Hervey Alan, conductor Groves; New York, Metropolitan Opera, 1960, with Rysanek, MacNeil, Siepi, conductor Schippers; la Scala, Milan, 1986, with Bruson, Dimitrova, Burchaladze, conductor Muti; Paris, 1995, with Guleghina, Lafont, Ramey, conductor Pinchas Steinberg.

Abigail, a slave, believed to be the elder daughter of Nabucco..... Soprano
Fenena, daughter of NabuccoSoprano
Ismaele, nephew of the King of Jerusalem.....Tenor
Nabucco (Nabucodonosor),
King of Babylon.....Baritone
Zaccaria, High Priest of JerusalemBass
High Priest of BabylonBass
Abdallo, an old officer in Nabucco's serviceTenor
Anna, sister of Zaccaria.....Soprano

Place: Jerusalem; Babylon

Time: 586 B.C.

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

N*abucco* was Verdi's first great success, the opera that established him as one of the leading composers of Italy, the theme which identified him for the first time publicly with his country's political aspirations. Its success was huge, mainly because of its musical quality but also to some extent because of the vivid way in which the composer gave expression to his countrymen's aspirations towards the liberty and self-government which had never yet been theirs. No Italian who heard 'Va, pensiero' could fail to identify himself with the chorus of exiles who were singing it, and it soon became one of the most popular tunes of the day. Franz Werfel has described the scene of Verdi's second funeral in Milan a few months after his death (the first, as directed in his will, was very simple): '... then came one of the great and rare moments when people and music become one. Without any preconcerted plan, by some inexplicable inspiration, there suddenly rose out of the monstrous soul of the multitude the chorus from Nabucco with which Giuseppe Verdi had become the voice of consolation and hope for his people, sixty years before. "Va, pensiero sull'ali dorate!"

The rather conventional overture makes effective use of various tunes from the opera, notably the big choral themes.

Act I. In passionate choruses, the priests and people of Jerusalem lament their defeat at the hands of Nabucco, and beg Jehovah to prevent the capture of the Temple. In an impressive solo, 'Sperate, o figli', Zaccaria exhorts them to have faith in God, but the news that Nabucco is advancing on the Temple itself throws them once more into consternation.

Ismaele, who brought the news of the enemy's further advance, is left alone with Fenena, a hostage in the hands of the Jews, whom he loves. Their colloquy is interrupted by the appearance of Abigaille, Fenena's supposed sister. She threatens the two lovers with instant death, but admits to Ismaele that she loves him and says she has it in her power to save him. The trio which follows has the mixture of intensity and suave vocal writing which distinguishes similar moments in Norma (though the dramatic situation is by no means similar). Zaccaria rushes in saying he has seen the King riding towards the Temple itself; in a moment Babylonian troops fill the Temple, and Nabucco himself rides to the door. Zaccaria threatens to kill Fenena, Nabucco's daughter, if he desecrate the holy place, but Nabucco taunts the defeated Jews ('Tremin gl'insani'), and Zaccaria's attempt on Fenena's life is frustrated by Ismaele. Nabucco orders the sacking of the Temple.

Act II. The Jews have been carried captive into Babylon, and Nabucco has left Fenena as Regent. Abigaille, jealous of her sister's position and burning to know whether or not she is Nabucco's daughter or, as rumour has it, only a slave, finds a document which proves that the latter estimation of her birth is the true one. Her fury is unbridled, but she remembers her love for Ismaele, and the first part of her great aria is smooth and expressive. The High Priest of Bel informs her that Fenena is setting free the Jewish prisoners; he urges her to seize power, and says he has already spread the report that Nabucco has been killed in battle. Abigaille's reaction to this situation is expressed in a cabaletta suitably vigorous and determined.

In a noble example of Verdian prayer ('Tu sul labbro'), Zaccaria invokes the guidance of God. The people curse Ismaele, but Zaccaria reminds them that Fenena, for whose sake he committed the act of treachery, has become a convert to their faith.

Abdallo comes in to tell them that the popular cry goes up that the King is dead, and Abigaille plans Fenena's death. In a moment she comes to demand the crown from Fenena. It is, however, Nabucco who steps between them, seizes it, and places it on his own head, defying Abigaille to take it from him. Nabucco leads off an ensemble¹ which is extraordinarily effective and notable for its skilful contrasting of soloists and chorus. Nabucco proclaims himself God, there is a clap of thunder, and the crown is torn from his head by a supernatural force. When the crowd has recovered from its consternation, the King is seen to be mad, babbling of persecution and complaining that not even his daughter will help him. Zaccaria proclaims the punishment of heaven on the blasphemer, but Abigaille snatches up the crown crying that the glory of Babylon is not yet departed.

Act III. Abigaille has been installed as Regent. Nabucco is led into her presence and the rest of the first scene consists of an extended duet between the King and his supposed daughter. Abigaille taunts him into sealing the death sentence of the Jews, and, when she tells him he is a prisoner in her hands, his mood changes to one of supplication. Throughout his career, Verdi was to entrust crucial development in his operas to these lengthy, multi-sectioned duets. Here and in Oberto are the forerunners, in manner if not in matter, of that great line which was to include the scene for Macbeth and his wife after the murder, the first-act duet for Rigoletto and Gilda, the meeting between Violetta and Germont, the two great duets for Simon Boccanegra and Fiesco, the love duet from Ballo, Leonora's scene with Padre Guardiano in Forza, Philip's interviews with Posa and the Grand Inquisitor in Don Carlos, the two examples in the third act of Aida, the love duet in Otello and the second-act scene between Otello and Iago, and Falstaff's conversation with Ford.

The second scene of the act takes place on the banks of the Euphrates, where the enslaved Jews sing the psalms of their lost fatherland. 'Va, pensiero' is the first of Verdi's patriotic choruses, and its poignant melody is typical of the composer's writing in this vein. Zaccaria upbraids the Jews for their defeatist attitude and prophesies the imminent fall of Babylon.

¹ The section beginning 'le folgori intorno' must have been suggested by the sextet in Donizetti's Maria Stuarda.

Act IV. Nabucco in prison hears the crowd down below crying 'Death to Fenena'. He sees her being led to execution, and prays movingly to Jehovah to pardon him his sin of pride and spare her life: 'Dio di Giuda'. Abdallo frees his master, who rushes out to rescue his daughter.

The scene changes to the place of execution. A funeral march is heard and Fenena has a beautiful prayer as she and the Jews prepare for death. The arrival of Nabucco and his followers arrests the sacrifice, the false idol is thrown down as if by magic, and all join in a prayer of thanksgiving to Jehovah. The general rejoicing is interrupted by the arrival of Abigaille, who in her remorse has taken poison and dies. Zaccaria promises glory to his convert, Nabucco.

Nabucco represents something important in Verdi's output: it was his first success, and in it he can be seen making a serious attempt at the musical portrayal of character. H.

I LOMBARDI

The Lombards

Opera in four acts, text by T. Solera. Première, la Scala, Milan, 11 February 1843, with Erminia Frezzolini, Guasco, Derivis. First produced London, Her Majesty's Theatre, 1846, with Grisi, Mario; New York, 1847 (first Verdi opera to be performed there); Paris Opéra, 1847 (as Jérusalem, in an extensively revised version) with Frezzolini, Duprez, Alizard. Retranslated into Italian as Gerusalemme and produced la Scala, Milan, 1850. Paris heard Jérusalem again in 1984 with Cecilia Gasdia, Veriano Luchetti, Silvano Carroli, but I Lombardi has generally been preferred and was revived London, Her Majesty's, 1867, with Tietjens, Mongini, Santley; Turin, 1926; la Scala, Milan, 1931, with Scacciati, Merli, Vaghi, conductor Panizza; Florence Festival, 1948; Birmingham, 1935 (by the Midland Music Makers); Berne, 1954, in a new version by Stephen Beinl; London, Sadler's Wells, 1956, by the Welsh National Opera Company; Covent Garden, 1976 (from Budapest), with Sass, Carreras, Ghiuselev, conductor Gardelli; New York, 1993, Metropolitan Opera, with Millo, Pavarotti, Ramey, conductor Levine.

Arvino, son of Folco.....Tenor
Pagano, son of Folco.....Bass
Viclinda, wife of Arvino.....Soprano
Giselda, her daughter.....Soprano
Pirro, Pagano's henchman.....Bass

Prior of the City of MilanTenor
Acciano, tyrant of Antioch.....Bass
Oronte, son of Acciano.....Tenor
Sofia, wife of Acciano.....Soprano

Priests, People of Milan, Retainers of Folco, Muslim Envoys, Crusader Knights and Soldiers, Pilgrims,
Muslim Women, Lombard Ladies

Place: Milan, Antioch, the Country near Jerusalem

Time: 1099

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

The commission to write I Lombardi for la Scala was the direct result of the success of Nabucco a year earlier. As soon as the opera was announced, the Archbishop of Milan drew the attention of the police to religious references in the libretto – a baptism and the like – which could cause offence if represented on the stage. Artistic considerations finally prevailed over the scruples of the Chief of Police, and the opera was given with only one minor alteration, the words 'Ave Maria' changed to 'Salve Maria'. In the event the authorities are likely to have been more worried by the patriotic demonstrations which were, in the Italy of the time, the natural result of a subject like this.

Act I, scene i. A short prelude full of foreboding leads to the curtain rising on the Piazza di Sant'Ambrogio, Milan. Sounds of rejoicing come from within the Cathedral, and the crowd outside comments on the strange turn of events. Many years ago the brothers Arvino and Pagano loved Viclinda, who favoured Arvino. As the young couple went one day to church, Pagano struck and wounded his brother and was in consequence banished to the Holy Land, where it was hoped he might repent of his crime. Now, his offence expiated, he has been forgiven and has returned home; but, comments the crowd, there is still the glint of evil in his eye. As they emerge from the Cathedral, Pagano ostensibly prays for Heaven's forgiveness, and an ensemble develops ('T'assale un tremito!'). Giselda and Viclinda are apprehensive, Arvino is seized with sudden foreboding, Pagano and his henchman Pirro plot revenge, and the crowd worries whether to take outward signs of peace at their face value. The Prior proclaims the appointment of Arvino as Leader of a Crusade, and all call down anathema on anyone who shakes the solidarity of the holy enterprise.

All leave except Pagano and Pirro. Nuns pray within as Pagano broods outside, advancing disappointment in love as the reason for wandering from the paths of virtue ('Sciagurata! hai tu creduto'). Pirro says that Pagano's followers are assembled, and in his cabaletta Pagano rejoices at the prospect of revenge.

Scene ii. A room in the palace of Folco, the father of Pagano and Arvino. Viclinda, Giselda and Arvino believe that Pagano's repentance is feigned, and in a lovely passage, Giselda prays to Heaven ('Salve Maria – di grazie il petto'). The Gallery is empty as Pirro leads Pagano towards Arvino's room. A moment later the interior of the palace is lit up by flames. Pagano tries to carry off Viclinda, but, hearing the voice of Arvino, finds that he has killed his own father and not his brother. The scene fills, all curse Pagano for his crime and in his horror he joins in the general execration. His attempt at suicide is prevented; he must end his days in solitary exile.

Act II, scene i. Acciano's palace in Antioch. Acciano on his throne receives a group of Muslim ambassadors, who call down Allah's vengeance on the invading army of Crusaders. They depart at the entrance of Oronte and Sofia, Acciano's son and wife. Sofia, who is veiled, is secretly a Christian. Oronte reveals his love for Giselda, now a captive in Antioch, in an aria ('La mia letizia infondere') whose lyrical beauty rivals in Verdi's early output the equally inspired 'Quando le sere al placido' (Luisa Miller). As he shows in the cabaletta (two versions of which exist), Oronte is so persuaded of the perfection of his beloved that he is convinced that her God must be the true God.

Scene ii. A cave on a mountain overlooking Antioch. A Hermit, Pagano as will be revealed much later, prays in a fine aria ('Ma quando un suon terribile') that he may soon have a chance of aiding the crusading army to capture Antioch from the Saracens. To the Hermit comes Pirro, now a converted Muslim, to ask for spiritual guidance. Their colloquy is interrupted by the sound of the invading Crusaders; they disappear into the cave and the Hermit emerges in military array just as Arvino, the leader of the Crusaders, appears. Arvino approaches the Hermit, little knowing it is his own brother and most deadly enemy from whom he is asking prayers for the safety of his daughter, now a prisoner. The Hermit gives comfort and the scene ends with an allegro vivace hymn of hate against the Saracens.

Scene iii. The harem in Acciano's palace. Taunted by the other women, Giselda prays to Heaven ('Oh madre, dal cielo soccorri al mio pianto'). Suddenly women flee through the harem pursued by soldiers, and Queen Sofia reveals that her husband and her son have been killed by the attacking Crusaders – she points to Arvino as their ferocious leader. In music of considerable conviction ('No, Dio non vuole'), Giselda denounces her father for the blood he has shed.

Act III, scene i. The Valley of Jehoshaphat; the Mount of Olives and Jerusalem in the distance. A procession of pilgrims sings a devotional chorus of typically Risorgimento cut. They go on their way, and Giselda appears, desolate at the loss of her lover Oronte, whom she presumes dead in the slaughter which followed the capture of the city. But the man who now appears in Lombard clothing is none other than Oronte himself, lamenting that his love for Giselda has caused him to take on a coward's disguise in the hope of seeing her again. Their duet reveals their mutual determination to give up everything for their love, and Oronte even says he means to adopt Giselda's faith. Warlike shouts from the Crusaders' camp make Giselda afraid for Oronte's life and they flee together.

Scene ii. Arvino's tent. He inveighs against the treachery of his daughter's flight, but his thoughts are interrupted as his men tell him of a rumour that Pagano has been recognised in the camp. Arvino's anger turns against his wicked brother.

Scene iii. A cave on the banks of the River Jordan. The prelude is in the form of a violin solo with orchestral accompaniment, so elaborate in the writing that it might be the end of a movement of a concerto. Oronte has been mortally wounded in the attempt to escape, and Giselda, beside herself with grief at this new blow, cries out at the injustice of God's ways, only to be rebuked by the Hermit who appears in the entrance to the cave. The extended trio, 'Qual voluttà trascorrere', always with the violin obbligato in the background and with Oronte's interrupted cantilena as he gasps for breath, is one of the most famous of Verdian death-scenes. The Hermit baptises Oronte as he dies in Giselda's arms.

Act IV, scene i. A cave near Jerusalem. Giselda asleep sees a vision of Oronte among the blessed and even hears his voice. She expresses her perturbation in an agitated quick solo ('Qual prodigio').

Scene ii. The Crusader camp near the Tomb of Rachel. The scene opens with a great chorus of longing ('O Signore del tetto natio'), which, as a hymn of the Risorgimento, ranks as companion-piece to, and in its own day achieved comparable popularity with, 'Va pensiero' from Nabucco (this line of patriotic music culminates as late as 1865 in the chorus in the last act of Macbeth). The Crusaders are preparing an assault on Jerusalem, and Arvino and the Hermit lead them to battle.

Scene iii, set in another part of Arvino's camp, follows an orchestral interlude. Arvino and Giselda attend the Hermit who has been carried in wounded. At mention of Arvino's name, the Hermit comes out of his delirium to mutter of parricide. It is not long before he reveals his name and, in a moving death-scene, Giselda joins her voice to his in begging Arvino to forgive his past wrongs. The opera ends as Pagano begs for a last sight of the Holy City, over whose walls the banner of the Cross can be seen flying. H.

ERNANI

Opera in four acts, text by Francesco Maria Piave, after the drama by Victor Hugo. Première at the Fenice Theatre, Venice, 9 March 1844, with Löwe, Guasco, Superchi, Selva. First performed at Her Majesty's Theatre, London, 1845; New York, 1847; Metropolitan, 1903, with Sembrich, de Marchi, Scotti, Edouard de Reszke, conductor Mancinelli; 1921, with Ponselle, Martinelli, Danise, Mardones; 1928, with Ponselle, Martinelli, Ruffo, Pinza. Revived la Scala, 1935, with Cigna, Merli, Armando Borgioli, Pasero, conductor Marinuzzi; Berlin, 1935, with Lemnitz, Wittrisch, Janssen, Bohnen, conductor Blech; Rome, 1951, with Mancini, Penno, Silveri, Christoff; Metropolitan, 1956, with Milanov, del Monaco, Warren, Siepi; Florence Festival, 1957, with Cerquetti, del Monaco, Bastianini, Christoff, conductor Mitropoulos; London, Sadler's Wells, 1967, with Tinsley, Donald Smith, Bickerstaff, Clifford Grant; Welsh National Opera, 1979, with Murphy, Ken Collins, Ophhof, R. van Allan, conductor Richard Armstrong; la Scala, Milan, 1982, with Freni, Domingo, Bruson, Ghiaurov, conductor Muti; Metropolitan, New York, 1983, with Leona Mitchell, Pavarotti (singing the Act II finale for tenor and chorus which Verdi added after the première), Milnes, Raimondi, conductor Levine. Don Carlos was one of the favourite roles of the great baritone Mattia Battistini.

Don Carlos, *King of Castile*Baritone
 Don Ruy Gomez de Silva, *Grandee of Spain*Bass
 Ernani, or John of Aragon, *a bandit chief*Tenor
 Don Riccardo, *esquire to the King*Tenor
 Jago, *esquire to Silva*Bass

Elvira, *kinswoman to Silva*Soprano
 Giovanna, *in Elvira's service*Soprano
 Mountaineers and Bandits, Followers of Silva, Ladies of Elvira, Followers of Don Carlos, Electors and Pages

Place: Spain

Time: Early Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Ernani was Verdi's first opera for Venice, his first on a subject by Victor Hugo and his first with Francesco Maria Piave who became, until he had a stroke in 1867, his preferred (because most compliant) librettist. Its success in the middle of a Venetian season, which had seen I Lombardi, even under the composer's supervision, fail and two other operas booted off the stage, was instantaneous.

His father, the Duke of Segovia, having been slain by order of Don Carlos's father, John of Aragon has become an outlaw. Proscribed and pursued by the emissaries of the King, he has taken refuge in the fastnesses of the mountains of Aragon, where, under the name of Ernani, he is leader of a large band of rebel mountaineers. Ernani is in love with Donna Elvira, who, although she is about to be united to her relative, the aged Ruy Gomez de Silva, a grandee of Spain, is deeply enamoured of the handsome, chivalrous bandit chief.

Don Carlos, afterwards the Emperor Charles V, also has fallen in love with Elvira. By watching her windows he has discovered that at dead of night a young cavalier (Ernani) gains admission to her apartments. He imitates her lover's signal, gains admission to her chamber, and declares his passion. Being repulsed, he is about to drag her off by force, when a secret panel opens, and he finds himself confronted by Ernani. In the midst of a violent scene Silva enters. To allay his jealousy and anger at finding two men, apparently rival suitors, in the apartment of his affianced, the King, whom Silva does not recognise, reveals himself, and pretends to have come in disguise to consult him about his approaching election to the empire, and a conspiracy that is on foot against his life. Then the King, pointing to Ernani, says to Silva, 'It doth please us that this, our follower, depart,' thus insuring Ernani's temporary safety – for a Spaniard does not hand an enemy over to the vengeance of another.

Believing a rumour that Ernani has been hunted down and killed by the King's soldiers, Elvira at last consents to give her hand in marriage to Silva. On the eve of the wedding however Ernani, pursued by the King with a detachment of troops, seeks refuge in Silva's castle disguised as a pilgrim. He is under Spanish tradition his guest, and from that moment entitled to his protection.

Elvira enters in her bridal attire. Ernani is thus made aware that her nuptials with Don Silva are to be celebrated on the morrow. Tearing off his disguise, he reveals himself to Silva, and demands to be delivered up to the King, preferring death to life without Elvira. But true to his honour as a Spanish host, Silva refuses. Even his enemy, Ernani, is safe in his castle. Indeed he goes so far as to order his guards to man the towers and prepare to defend the castle, should the King seek forcible entry. He leaves the apartment to make sure his orders are being carried out. The lovers find themselves alone. When Silva returns they are in each other's arms. But as the King is at the castle gates, he has no time to give vent to his wrath. He gives orders to admit the King and his men, bids Elvira retire, and hides Ernani in a secret cabinet. The King demands that Silva give up the bandit. The grandee proudly refuses. The King's wrath then turns against Silva. He pardons him, but bears away Elvira as hostage for the loyalty of her kinsman.

The King has gone. From the wall Silva takes down two swords, releases his guest from his hiding-place, and bids him cross swords with him to the death. Ernani refuses. His host has just protected his life at the risk of his own. If Silva insists upon vengeance, let grandee and bandit first unite against the King, with whom the honour of Elvira is unsafe. Elvira rescued, Ernani will give himself up to Silva, to whom, handing him his hunting-horn, he avows himself ready to die, whenever a blast upon it shall be sounded from the lips of the implacable grandee.

Silva sets in motion a conspiracy against the King. A meeting of the conspirators is held in the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle. It is resolved to murder the King. A ballot decides who shall do the deed. Ernani's name is drawn.

The King, however, has received information of the time and place of this meeting, and has been an unobserved witness. Booming of cannon outside tells him of his choice as head of the Holy Roman Empire.

Emerging from the tomb, he shows himself to the awed conspirators. At the same moment the doors open. The electors of the Empire enter to pay homage to Charles V.

'The common herd to the dungeon, the nobles to the headsman,' he commands.

Ernani advances, discovers himself as John of Aragon, and claims the right to die with the nobles – 'to fall, covered, before the King'. But upon Elvira's fervent plea, the King, now also Emperor, commences his reign with an act of grace. He pardons the conspirators, restores to Ernani his titles and estates, and unites him with Elvira.

Silva, thwarted in his desire to marry Elvira, waits to sound the fateful horn until Ernani and Elvira, after their nuptials, are upon the terrace of Ernani's castle in Aragon. Ernani, too chivalrous to evade his promise, stabs himself in the presence of the grim avenger and of Elvira.

In the opera, this plot develops as follows.

Act I opens in the camp of the bandits in the mountains of Aragon. In the distance is seen the Moorish castle of Silva. The time is near sunset. Ernani's followers sing, 'Evviva! beviamo'. Ernani sings Elvira's praises in the air 'Come rugiada al cespite'. This expressive number is followed by one in faster time, 'O tu, che l'alma adora'. Enthusiastically volunteering to share any danger Ernani may incur in seeking to carry off Elvira, the bandits go off in the direction of Silva's castle.

The scene changes to Elvira's apartment in the castle. It is night. She is meditating upon Ernani. When she thinks of Silva, 'the frozen, withered spectre', and contrasts with him Ernani, who 'in her heart ever reigneth', she voices her thoughts in that famous air for soprano, one of Verdi's loveliest inspirations, 'Ernani! involami':

Andantino

Er - na - ni! Er - na - ni! in - vo - la-mi

All' ab - bor-ri - to am - ples - so

Young maidens sing a chorus of congratulation. To this Elvira responds with a graceful cabaletta, the sentiment of which however is expressed as an aside, since it refers to her longing for her young, handsome lover, 'Tutto sprezzo che d'Ernani':

The young women go. Enter Don Carlos, the King. There is a colloquy, in which Elvira protests against his presence; and then a duet, which the King begins, 'Da quel dì che t'ho veduta'.

A secret panel opens. The King is confronted by Ernani, and by Elvira. She interposes between the two men. Silva enters. What he beholds draws from him the melancholy reflection 'Infelice! e tuo credevi', an exceptionally fine bass solo. He follows it with the vindictive 'Infin, che un brando vindice', added after the première. Men and women of the castle and the King's suite come on. The monarch makes himself known to Silva, who does him obeisance and, at the King's command, is obliged to let Ernani depart. An ensemble brings the act to a close.

Act II. Grand hall in Silva's castle. Doors lead to various apartments. The persistent chorus of ladies, though doubtless aware that Elvira is not thrilled at the prospect of marriage with her 'frosty' kinsman and has consented to marry him only because she believed Ernani dead, enters and sings 'Esultiamol'

To Silva is brought in Ernani, disguised as a monk. He is welcomed as a guest; but, upon the appearance of Elvira in bridal array, throws off his disguise and offers his life, a sacrifice to Silva's vengeance, as the first gift for the wedding. Silva, however, learning that he is pursued by the King, offers him the protection due to a guest under the roof of a Spaniard.

Silva, even when he returns and discovers Elvira in Ernani's arms, will not break the law of Spanish hospitality, preferring to wreak vengeance in his own way. He therefore hides Ernani so securely that the King's followers, after searching the castle, are obliged to report their complete failure to discover a trace of him.

Then come the important episodes described – the King's demand for the surrender of Silva's sword and threat to execute him; Elvira's interposition; and the King's sinister action in carrying her off as a hostage, after he has sung the significant air 'Vieni meco, sol di rose'. Ernani's handing of his hunting horn to Silva and his arousal of the grandee to an understanding of the danger that threatens Elvira from the King are followed by the finale, a spirited call to arms by Silva and Ernani.

Act III. The scene is a sepulchral vault, enclosing the tomb of Charlemagne in the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle. It is to this sombre but grandiose place that the King has come in order to overhear, from within the tomb of his greatest ancestor, the plotting of the conspirators. His soliloquy, 'Oh, de' verd'anni miei', derives impressiveness both from the solemnity of the situation and the music's flowing measure. The principal episode in the meeting of the conspirators is their chorus, 'Si ridesti il Leon di Castiglia'. Dramatically effective too in the midst of the plotting is the sudden booming of distant cannon. The bronze door of the tomb swings open and the King presents himself at its entrance. Three times he strikes the door of bronze with the hilt of his dagger. The principal entrance to the vault opens. To the sound of trumpets electors enter. Elvira approaches. The banners of the Empire are displayed. The act closes with the pardon granted by the King, and the stirring finale, 'Oh, sommo Carlo!'

Act IV, on the terrace of Ernani's castle, is brief. Ernani asks Silva to spare him till his lips have tasted the chalice filled by love. He recounts his sad life: 'Solvingo, errante misero'. Silva's grim reply is to offer him his choice between a cup of poison and a dagger. In the end there is left only the implacable avenger, to gloat over Ernani, dead, and Elvira prostrate upon his form.

Early in its career the opera experienced various vicissitudes. The conspiracy scene had to be toned down for political reasons before the production of the work was permitted. Even then the chorus, 'Let the lion awake in Castilia', caused a political demonstration. In Paris, Victor Hugo, as author of the drama on which the libretto is based, raised objections to its representation, and it was produced in the French capital as Il Proscritto (The Proscribed) with the characters changed to Italians. Victor Hugo's Hernani was a famous play in Sarah Bernhardt's repertory during her early engagements in America, and her Doña Sol (Elvira in the opera) was one of her finest achievements.

K.

Ernani, old-fashioned as it is, remains a fine opera. Since 1844, the whirligig of fashion has made perhaps four revolutions, and now, more than a hundred and fifty years since the first performance and after a period when it was looked upon as crude and empty, the opera is once again, in adequate performances and with singers who can do justice to the music, accepted by audiences as a thrilling and rewarding experience. Its whipcrack melodies have the energy of youth, and, for all its occasional lack of subtlety, the genius of the composer is very much in evidence. H.

I DUE FOSCARI

The Two Foscari

Opera in three acts, libretto by Piave after the play by Byron. Première, Rome, 3 November 1844, with Barbieri-Nini, Roppa, de Bassini. First produced London, Her Majesty's, 1847, with Grisi, Mario, Ronconi; New York, 1847. Revived Halle, 1927; Stuttgart, 1956 (as Der Doge von Venedig), with Kinas, Traxel; Venice, 1957, with Gencer, Picchi, Giangiacomo Guelfi, conductor Serafin; Wexford Festival, 1958; English National Opera, 1978, with Lois McDonall, Neil Howlett, conductor Charles Groves; Covent Garden, 1995, with June Anderson, Dennis O'Neill, Vladimir Chernov.

Francesco Foscari, octogenarian

Doge of Venice Baritone

Jacopo Foscari, his son Tenor

Lucrezia Contarini, wife to Jacopo Soprano

Jacopo Loredano, member of the Council of Ten Bass

Barbarigo, Senator, member of the Council Tenor

Pisana, friend and confidante of Lucrezia Soprano

Attendant on the Council of Ten Tenor

Servant of the Doge Bass

Members of the Council of Ten and of the 'Giunta'; Lucrezia's Maids; Venetian Ladies; Maskers and Venetians of both Sexes; Jailers, Gondoliers,
Pages, Two Sons of Jacopo Foscari

Place: Venice

Time: 1457

Running Time: 1 hour 35 minutes

Byron's verse play, with its less than flattering portraits of Venetian worthies many of whose descendants might have been in boxes at la Fenice, was deemed unsuitable for Venice and became therefore, just under a year after the première of Ernani in Venice, the basis of Verdi's first opera for Rome. The original singers were undistinguished and the opera obtained no more than a moderate success. Hindsight suggests its taut if gloomy subject and the composer's increasingly precise characterisation of leading figures deserved better.

There is a short prelude, whose adagio theme is associated with the despair of the opera's hero, Jacopo Foscari. The curtain rises on a room in the Doge's Palace in Venice, where the Council of Ten sings in solemn chorus of the implacable nature of its deliberations, and then leaves for the Council Chamber. Jacopo Foscari is brought in and left to wait while the Council decides his fate. He is the son of the aged Doge and has been exiled after an accusation of murder. Now he has illegally returned in order to see his family and his beloved native city, and it is this transgression of the law that the Council is at present considering (Byron's play has him accused by his enemies of conspiring with the Milanese against the Venetians, but this complication is virtually absent from the opera). In a beautiful aria ('Brezza del suol natio') he sings of his love for Venice and, in the brisk cabaletta, of his determination to prove his innocence.

The scene changes to a room in the Palazzo Foscari. Jacopo's wife, Lucrezia, eludes her female attendants and rushes into the room to plead with the Doge for clemency for Jacopo. In a cavatina ('Tu al cui sguardo onnipossente') she prays for heaven's help in her misery. Lucrezia's companion Pisana tells her that the Council has decided again to condemn Jacopo to exile, and Lucrezia rails against the injustice of the sentence.

In his private apartments, the old Doge laments the fate which opposes in him the judge's duty to a father's love for his son. The dilemma is expressed in an aria of great dignity and pathos, 'O vecchio cor che batti', the only moment of the score known out of context (Pasquale Amato's pre-1914 gramophone record was for many years a bestseller). Lucrezia is announced and pleads vehemently that the Doge publicly recognise what the father instinctively knows, that Jacopo is guiltless. In tender music, the old man makes it clear that he is convinced his son is innocent, but equally clear that he feels himself powerless, caught between paternal feeling and the obligations of his position.

Act II. The State Prison. In the darkness of the dungeon, Jacopo laments his misfortunes in a state of mounting delirium. One moment he thinks he sees the ghost of another victim of the Council of Ten and a little later he fails at her entrance to recognise his wife. The scene between husband and wife maintains the intensity of Jacopo's monologue, and, when singing is heard outside, Jacopo bursts into furious condemnation of those who are tearing his loved ones from him. The Doge comes to bid farewell to his son. In a fine trio ('Nel tuo paterno amplesso') Jacopo takes comfort in his father's embrace and affirms his innocence, the Doge describes himself as a dying man, and Lucrezia asks for heaven's vengeance on the authors of their misfortunes. Loredano, a member of the Council of Ten who has sworn vengeance on the Foscari family for their responsibility, as he maintains, for the death of his father and uncle, comes into the prison to conduct Jacopo to hear the judgement of the Council of Ten, and the impressive scene ends with a presto quartet.

In the great hall, the Council waits for Jacopo and discusses the crime for which he was once sentenced to exile; its re-affirmation of the sentence now confirms the incorruptible nature of Venetian justice. When the Doge is seated, Loredano announces the 'clemency' of the Council, but Jacopo protests and asks them to believe in his original innocence. The Doge confirms the sentence as Lucrezia brings in her children to reinforce the plea. Jacopo now pleads for pardon, kneeling with his children at the Doge's feet, and the act ends in a grandiose finale, during whose course Lucrezia begs in vain to be allowed to accompany her husband into exile.

Act III. It is carnival, and the Square of St Mark's fills with masked revellers. Gondoliers sing a barcarole. Jacopo is escorted from the Doge's Palace to the state barge, which waits to take him into exile. His mournful song of farewell turns into a cry of despair when he recognises his enemy Loredano.

In his private rooms, the Doge sings movingly of the fate which has deprived him of three sons in infancy and now banishes a fourth, leaving him to die alone. Barbarigo brings news that another has confessed to the murder of which Jacopo was accused, but Lucrezia is not far behind him to assure them that this cannot avert the inevitable tragedy, as Jacopo breathed his last the moment the barge left the confines of the lagoon. The vigour of the Foscari family has passed to Lucrezia, who alone has the strength to proclaim retribution for their enemies.

The Doge receives the Council of Ten, which, through the mouth of Loredano, demands his abdication on grounds of age and the bereavement he has recently suffered. The Doge at first refuses – when he for his part asked to abdicate years ago, was he not constrained to swear to remain in office until death? – but they press their demands with threats. The Doge at first defies them ('Questa dunque è l'iniqua mercede'), and turns on them for removing his last hope of happiness ('Ah, rendete il figlio a me'). Eventually he takes the ring off his finger, the cap off his head, but summons up a last gesture of defiance to order Loredano away from the ducal emblems. Lucrezia arrives in time to hear the great bell toll for the election of a Malipiero as Doge. Old Foscari sinks down exhausted and broken, and sobs out his life, watched by the Council, among them the exultant Loredano. H.

GIOVANNA D'ARCO

Joan of Arc

Opera in a prologue and three acts, text by Temistocle Solera (after Schiller's Die Jungfrau von Orleans). Première at la Scala, Milan, 15 February 1845, with Erminia Frezzolini-Poggi, Antonio Poggi and Filippo Colini. First performed Rome, 1845, Vienna, 1857, Paris, 1868. Revived Naples, 1951, with Tebaldi, Penno, Savarese, who took the opera to Venice (with Bergonzi instead of Penno), Strasbourg and Paris; Teatro Nuovo, Milan, London (in concert), Toulouse, 1963; New York, 1966, with Stratas, conductor Cillario; Royal Academy of Music, London, 1966; Venice and Florence, 1972, with Katia Ricciarelli; Wexford, 1976; Covent Garden, 1996, with June Anderson, Dennis O'Neill, Chernov.

Charles VII, King of France Tenor
Giacomo, a shepherd in Dom Rémy Baritone
Giovanna d'Arco (Joan of Arc), his daughter.. Soprano
Delil, a French officer Tenor
Talbot, the English commander..... Bass

Officers of the King, Villagers, Townspeople, French and English Soldiers, Nobles

Place: France

Time: 1429

Running Time: 2 hours

That Giovanna d'Arco, Verdi's seventh opera, has not found more favour with public and commentators is particularly due to the uninspired nature of Solera's libretto, which makes little of Schiller's play (any connection with which Solera specifically denied). Nonetheless it provides Verdi with the epic he presumably wanted and of which he took advantage to write something grander, as Andrew Porter has described it, than either Nabucco or I Lombardi, its predecessors in the style. Sadly, the lowering of standards at la Scala under the impresario Bartolomeo Merelli (whose belief in the composer had begun with Oberto) led to a break with that theatre, which staged no more Verdian premières for 36 years.

The overture, one of Verdi's most successful, has a lovely andante pastorale episode in slow 3/8, mostly intertwined woodwind solos, flanked by two conventional, quick and mostly loud sections (concerned with storm and military marching).

Prologue. At Dom Rémy, villagers and a group of the King's officers wait to hear him reveal his plans for his troops to lay down their arms and surrender to the invading English army. In an aria ('Sotto una quercia') he describes a vision he has had in which he received the Virgin's command to lay his arms at the foot of a great oak tree. Such a tree grows nearby in the forest, say the villagers, and when the King insists that he will find peace there in abdication, they try to dissuade him by describing it as a place of horror and death.

The scene changes to the forest with a shrine in the background and an oak in the foreground. Giacomo, Giovanna's father, prays agitatedly that his daughter may not as he fears be in thrall to the devil. He sees her kneel before the shrine and muse sadly on the fate which seems to be France's, then in a gentle and melodious cavatina, with a couple of moments of contrasting fire, wonder whether it is to her that will fall the task of freeing her country. Giovanna sleeps and the King appears in order to fulfil what he sees as his mission and lay his weapons at the foot of the oak. Demons, in 3/8 time, tempt Giovanna in her sleep with sensual visions, and they are followed by more sedate angel voices inviting her to don sword and helmet and save France. The voices are of course audible only to Giovanna and she cries that she is ready, her cry being heard by the King, who takes courage from her evident preparedness to fight for her country. The scene ends in a stretta of some brilliance for King and Maid, joined by the sorrowing Giacomo, convinced that out of love for the King his daughter has given her soul to the devil.

Act I. Near Rheims. The English soldiers sense defeat and Talbot, their commander, tries to encourage them to believe that this is not due to forces of evil ranged on the French side. Both Francis Toye and Julian Budden find in the soldiers' music a half quotation of 'Hearts of Oak', a conscious reference (like Donizetti's of 'God Save the Queen' in the overture to Roberto Devereux), suggests the latter. Giacomo in an extensive aria offers to join them and deliver up the warrior girl whom they fear – even though she be his daughter! She is in thrall to the powers of evil.

At the Court of Rheims, preparations are in hand for the coronation of the King. Giovanna expresses her longing for the country life she once knew, in a simple and affecting aria of melting tenderness, 'O fatidica foresta', whose recitative has nonetheless been troubled by a reminiscence of the prologue's tempting voices in their insistent 3/8 rhythm. Resolved on a homeward journey she may be, but this is not at all to the liking of the King, who admits that he has loved her from the day he first saw her. She seems at first disposed to listen to his pleas, but the voices continue to speak to her and her alone, warning of the fatal dangers of worldly love and, in spite of his melting pleas and her own responsiveness, she draws away from the King. A similarity with the situation in the love duet in Un Ballo in Maschera – an ardent tenor, a soprano tormented by guilt but unable to resist – has been observed.

Delil comes to escort the King to the cathedral where he is to be crowned, and the latter sings beguilingly to Giovanna, who is nevertheless assaulted by her inner voices proclaiming victory for the forces of evil.

Act II. The cathedral square of St Denis in Rheims. The people proclaim the victory of the Maid and soldiers precede the King in procession into the cathedral. Giacomo alone speaks of stripping himself of the character of a father and becoming the voice of the Lord in denouncing Giovanna for her pact with the devil. Giacomo joins the crowd as Giovanna hurries from the cathedral, sustained by the King but soon to be denounced by her father for having sold her soul. The King will not listen but the credulous populace is immediately impressed and, when Giovanna makes little attempt to defend herself, convinced. The King tries to persuade her to speak out on her own behalf but in face of Giacomo's implacable insistence, she is as resigned as Violetta will be in the finale of Act II of La Traviata, and the impressive finale sees her condemned by popular acclamation.

Act III. Giovanna has been handed over to the English and awaits death at the stake. She seems to see the battlefield but her father, who observes her, can only believe that she is dreaming of the King. In a passage of gentle beauty, she implores God not to forsake her, and Giacomo wonders whether he could have been mistaken. He is soon convinced of her redemption and, in an impressive duet, loosens her bonds to allow her escape with his blessing.

To the sound of battle music, Giacomo watches from the tower as she turns French defeat into victory. The King rushes in to proclaim Giovanna his saviour and Giacomo begs first for punishment and then for forgiveness. The King pardons him and asks for news of the battle, only to hear that the enemy is routed but Giovanna dead. His lament is touchingly simple, but after a funeral march during which Giovanna's body is carried in procession, she revives sufficiently to be acclaimed by her father and by the King who loves her. The voices of angels proclaim salvation and those of demons admit defeat. Giovanna dies, her standard in her hands. H.

ALZIRA

Opera in a prologue and two acts, text by Salvatore Cammarano after Voltaire's play Alzire, ou Les Américains. Première Naples, 12 August 1845, with Eugenia Tadolini as Alzira (when she was later proposed for Lady Macbeth, Verdi objected that she 'had the voice of an angel'), his favoured tenor Gaetano Fraschini as Zamoro, and Filippo Coletti as Gusmano. Revived Rome, 1967, with Zeani, Cecchele, MacNeil, conductor Bartoletti; London (highly successful, in concert), 1996, with Veronica Villaroel, Keith Ikaia-Purdy, Alexandru Agache, conductor Mark Elder.

Alvaro, father of Gusmano.....Bass
Gusmano, Governor of PeruBaritone
Ovando, a Spanish DukeTenor
Zamoro, leader of a Peruvian tribeTenor
Ataliba, a Peruvian leader.....Bass
Alzira, Ataliba's daughter.....Soprano
Zuma, her maid.....Mezzo-Soprano
Otumbo, a Peruvian warrior.....Tenor
Spanish Officers and Soldiers, Peruvians

Place: Lima and Elsewhere in Peru

Time: Mid-Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

Alzira was written for the San Carlo in Naples, where Cammarano, the senior Italian librettist of the day, was resident poet. It had little success when first performed and until recently revivals have not tended vastly to improve its reputation.

Prologue. Alvaro has been taken prisoner by an Indian tribe, but Zamoro, their chief, returns in time to save him from a cruel death, then tells of his own capture by Gusmano, a Spanish leader. When he hears that his beloved Alzira is in Lima in the hands of the Spaniards, he vows to rescue her.

Act I. In the main square of Lima, Alvaro hands over power to his son Gusmano. Gusmano announces peace between Spaniards and Incas, the latter led by Ataliba, whose daughter Alzira will become Gusmano's bride by the terms of the treaty. Gusmano knows that she is still in love with an Indian and Ataliba urges him to be patient. He declares he cannot wait.

Alzira wakes to tell of a dream in which she successfully fled from Gusmano's power, her boat eluding the storm which breaks out. Zamoro helped rescue her, and she openly declares her love for him. Ataliba comes in to beg her to agree to marry Gusmano but she insists she would prefer death to that fate. Zamoro contrives to find her, but their vibrant declaration of love is surprised by Gusmano, who orders Zamoro's instant execution. Alvaro's pleas followed by a report that an army is demanding Zamoro's release together persuade Gusmano that, as long as his father returns safely, he should release Zamoro. As he does so, he warns Zamoro that they will surely meet on the battlefield.

Act II. Spaniards celebrate with a rollicking brin-di the defeat of the Incas, and Zamoro and his followers go apparently to death. Alzira pleads for mercy, and in the end a bargain is struck: Zamoro's life for Alzira's agreement to marry Gusmano.

Otumbo has bought Zamoro's release from the Spaniards, but Zamoro is broken and cannot face life without Alzira. Otumbo does not improve the situation by revealing that she is at that very moment about to marry Gusmano. Zamoro swears revenge.

The marriage will secure peace and there is general rejoicing in Lima, headed by Gusmano. At the moment when the ceremony begins, Zamoro bursts in and stabs Gusmano, waiting for the retribution which must surely follow. But closer acquaintance with Alzira has brought with it in Gusmano a change of heart, and he gravely blesses the lovers before slowly expiring.

Verdi in later life is said to have dismissed Alzira as 'proprio brutta', but it shows him often in exploratory mood and able, in ensemble still more than in the solo arias, to create the kind of music which gives even his minor works an element of after-life. Maybe, at the start, the Incas sing a little too blithely of the impending murder of Alvaro just as the Spaniards in Act II are too light-hearted in victory, but in the prologue and Act I the solos of Zamoro and Gusmano return us effectively to the near-gravitas of an opera of this kind. Energy overflows, the drama proceeds at Verdi's habitual breakneck speed, and the finales impress. Alzira's early cavatina, 'Da Gusman, su fragil barca', is an example of Verdi's sensitivity to the predicaments in which his heroines so often find themselves. Alzira hovers somewhere between the Leonora of Trovatore and Amelia Boccanegra, the formula already working and Verdi showing he can vary its application. In his duet with Alzira, Gusmano demonstrates he is a man of substance, and if his final aria of renunciation and benediction does not quite attain the heights of Simon Boccanegra of eleven years later, it plainly points the way.

H.

ATTILA

Opera in a prologue and three acts, libretto by Temistocle Solera. Première, Venice, 17 March 1846, with Sophie Loewe, Guasco, Constantini, Marini. First produced London, Her Majesty's, 1848, with Sophie Cruvelli, Italo Gardoni, Velletti, Cuzzoni; New York, 1850. Revived Venice Festival, 1951 (concert performance), with Mancini, Penno, Giangiacomo Guelfi, Italo Tajo, conductor Giulini; Sadler's Wells, London, 1963 (in English); Rome, 1964, with Roberti, Limarilli, Zanasi, Arie, conductor Previtali; Trieste, 1965, with Christoff; Berlin, 1971, with Janowitz, Franco Tagliavini, Wixell, van Dam, conductor Patanè; Edinburgh Festival, 1972, with Ruggero Raimondi; Florence, 1972, with Gencer, Luchetti, Mittelmann, Ghiaurov, conductor Muti; Covent Garden, 1990, with Barstow, O'Neill, Zancanaro, Raimondi, conductor Downes; Opera North, 1991, with John Tomlinson.

Attila, King of the Huns Bass
 Uldino, a Breton slave of Attila's Tenor
 Odabella, daughter of the Lord of Aquileia Soprano
 Ezio, a Roman general Baritone
 Foresto, a knight of Aquileia Tenor
 Pope Leone (Leo) I Bass

Place: Italy

Time: Fifth Century A.D.

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

Verdi switched librettists from Piave to Solera for his second Venetian opera and was himself unwell during much of the time spent on composition. With its adumbration of the founding of Venice, the overt patriotism of the great duet of the Prologue, to say nothing of the brilliant writing for the leading singers, it must have greatly appealed to early audiences.

Prologue. After a short prelude, the curtain rises to show a piazza in Aquileia. Attila's army has sacked the city and is celebrating victory, with invocations to Wodan and praise of their general, who presently appears amongst his troops and takes his seat on the throne. He is angry to see that, in spite of his strict orders, some of the enemy women have been saved. In an aria, Odabella, who leads them, proclaims the invincible spirit of the Italian women, who fought alongside their men, unlike the women who have accompanied his army. The spitfire coloratura of her music is as full of venom as that of Lady Macbeth, and Attila in admiration offers her any gift she wants – she settles for a sword, and he gives her his own. In a cabaletta, she swears to herself that with it she will exact vengeance for all that she has lost.

Ezio, the emissary of the Roman Emperor, is announced. In an extended duet, he offers Attila the hegemony of the world – the Emperor of the East is old, the ruler of the West a mere boy, he himself requires only that Italy be left to him. At the climax of the duet come the words 'Avrai tu l'universo, resti l'Italia a me', and one can guess at the effect these words and the proud and challenging musical phrase must have had in Risorgimento Italy.

Attila reacts against this apparent act of treachery; how can Italy, whose most valiant leader is a traitor, ever hope to defy him? Ezio reminds him of his defeat at Châlons and announces the defiance of Rome.

Scene ii. Foresto, once one of the leaders of Aquileia, has led a band of refugees out to the lagoons, where they have built a sad little group of huts, miserable now, but later to become the proud city of Venice. They salute the dawn, and Foresto comes to greet them, still in his aria mourning his beloved Odabella, but proclaiming to the undisguised satisfaction of his followers their determination to raise from the lonely lagoon a city no less splendid than the one they have left – a compliment to Venice by Verdi's librettist not likely to be missed by the Fenice audience in 1846.

Act I. A wood near Attila's camp. In heartfelt phrases over cor anglais and then full woodwind accompaniment, Odabella laments the death of her father. To her comes Foresto, in spite of her joy at seeing him, full of reproaches that she has betrayed him with the slayer of her family. She justifies herself and reminds him of Judith who saved Israel.

The second scene takes place in Attila's tent, where the conqueror lies asleep, covered by a tiger skin. He wakes, clearly under the influence of a dream, and tells his attendant, Uldino, that he has been visited in his sleep by a vision of an old man, who warned him solemnly against continuing his march on Rome. Shaking off his forebodings, Attila calls together the priests and the army and orders that the march be resumed. From a distance a group can be heard approaching, and, when it turns out to be children and virgins headed by the old man he saw in his dream, Attila's resolution is no longer proof against his superstitions, least of all when the old man (described in the score as Saint Leo) repeats the very words we have just heard Attila recount to Uldino. The act ends with a great ensemble, not unlike the finale to the banqueting scene in Macbeth, in which Attila decides to bow to what is evidently the will of heaven.

Act II. In his camp, Ezio reads a letter from the Emperor Valentinian, commanding him to return to Rome. Such a boy to command him! In a beautiful aria ('Dagli immortali vertici'), he gives expression to his love of his country, then, urged by Foresto to join the forces resisting Attila, resolves to die if need be in defence of his country.

Attila's camp as in Act I. The troops are feasting in honour of the truce, and Attila, in spite of the warnings of the priests, entertains Ezio. The sudden extinguishing of the torches by a squall of wind appals the guests, but Attila refuses to be diverted even by so ill an omen from his purpose. When Uldino gives Attila a cup in which to pledge the guests, Odabella, who knows it is poisoned, warns Attila against drinking it. Foresto proudly acknowledges that he was responsible for the attempt on Attila's life, but, when Odabella demands his safety as the price of her warning, Attila consents to spare him, announcing at the same time that Odabella shall be his bride. Foresto bitterly reproaches Odabella and leaves.

Act III. A wood dividing Attila's camp from Ezio's. Foresto and Ezio are still determined to carry out their plan, and Foresto in a fine aria laments the faithlessness of Odabella. Ezio joins him, and they proclaim their common resolve, but even the arrival of Odabella does not quieten Foresto's suspicions of her conduct, exacerbated as they have been by the sound of what he takes – rightly – for her wedding chorus. In a beautiful trio ('Te sol quest'anima') she tries to convince him that her heart has always been his and his alone.

Attila comes to claim his bride and is astonished to find her in the arms of Foresto. He bitterly reproaches all three – the slave he was to marry, the criminal whose life he spared, the Roman with whom he has a truce – but they defy him and his threats in a lively quartet. As the Roman soldiers who have been organised by Ezio and Foresto rush in to kill Attila, Odabella stabs him to the heart: 'E tu pure, Odabella?' H.

MACBETH

Opera in four acts, text by Francesco Maria Piave. Première in Florence, 14 March 1847, with Barbieri-Nini, Varesi. First performance in New York, 1850; Dublin, 1859, with Pauline Viardot-Garcia as Lady Macbeth and Arditi conducting. Revised for Paris and first performed there in French, 21 April 1865, with Rey, Balla, Ismael. Revived Dresden, 1928, with Eugenie Burckhardt, Robert Burg, Willy Bader; Berlin, 1931, with Bindernagel and Onegin (Lady Macbeth), Reinmar, Andresen; Rome, 1932, with Scacciati, Franci, conductor Guarnieri; Vienna, 1933, with Rose Pauly; Glyndebourne, 1938 (for the first time in England, though productions had been scheduled for seasons of 1861 and 1870 but abandoned), with Vera Schwarz (in 1939, Grandi), Valentino, conductor Busch, producer Ebert; la Scala, Milan, 1938, with Cigna, Sved, conductor Marinuzzi; Edinburgh Festival, 1947, with Grandi, Valentino (Glyndebourne production); la Scala, 1952, with Callas, Mascherini, conductor de Sabata; Metropolitan, 1958, with Rysanek, Warren; Covent Garden, 1960, with Amy Shuard, Gobbi; la Scala, Milan, 1975, with Verrett, Cappuccilli, conductor Abbado, producer Strehler; Chicago, 1982, with Barstow, Cappuccilli; Salzburg Festival, 1984, with Dimitrova, Cappuccilli; English National Opera, 1990, with Kristine Ciesinski, Summers, conductor Mark Elder.

Lady MacbethSoprano
Macbeth, *a general*Baritone
Banco (Banquo), *a general*Bass
Macduff, *a Scottish nobleman*Tenor
Duncano (Duncan), *King of Scotland*Mute

Lady-in-Waiting to Lady MacbethSoprano
 Malcolm, son of DuncanoTenor
 Fleanzio (Fleance), son of BancoMute
 DoctorBass
 Witches, Hecate

Place: Scotland

Time: 1040 and After

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

If it is legitimate to single out one of the operas of the first period of Verdi's creative life as the vessel of his most concentrated attention and fervour it would have to be Macbeth. It has been described as his most idealistic opera to date, and he – in any case, the most meticulous of composers in rehearsal – spent more time working with the singers and on details of staging than on anything hitherto.

After the première in Paris of the revised version (1865), Verdi was accused among other things of not knowing Shakespeare. The accusation moved him to fury, and he, the most modest of composers, wrote: 'I may not have rendered Macbeth well, but that I do not know, do not understand and feel Shakespeare, no, by heavens, no! He is one of my very special poets, and I have had him in my hands from my earliest youth, and I read and re-read him continually.'

Macbeth remained a favourite of Verdi's among his own works. He spent a considerable time revising it, and its comparative lack of success in his lifetime was a constant source of irritation to him. Piave the librettist was provided with a detailed scenario by the composer before he was allowed to put pen to paper, so that the dramatic construction is Verdi's. Faced with the difficulty of putting a long play on to the operatic stage, Verdi concentrated on three principals: Lady Macbeth, Macbeth, and the Witches – he was emphatic on this last point. Lady Macbeth is explicitly (as in Shakespeare implicitly) the dominating figure, although her husband remains at the centre of the tragedy; Macduff is reduced to little more than a member of the ensemble (even his solitary aria forms part of the moment of stillness before the turning point in the action); and Banquo, a considerable figure until his murder, disappears well before the halfway mark. Malcolm is almost entirely eliminated, and the Doctor and the Gentlewoman are retained mainly for the sleep-walking scene.

Act I. The prelude concentrates on material later used in the sleep-walking scene. The first scene takes place on the heath, where the Witches sing a fantastic chorus while waiting for Macbeth, and then in awesome tones prophesy his future. A messenger arrives to announce that Macbeth has been granted the title and estates of the rebel Cawdor, and Macbeth and Banquo meditate in a duet on the implications of the prophecy, half of which has already come true (the other half being that Macbeth will be King, and Banquo's heirs will succeed him). The scene concludes with a chorus and dance for the Witches.

Lady Macbeth reads the letter from her husband in which he tells her of the meeting with the weird band, and launches into a determined recitative. 'Vieni, t'affretta' has been described by some as an inadequate setting of the great soliloquy of Act I, but it is strikingly effective in its context, and anyone who heard Margherita Grandi sing it at Glyndebourne or Edinburgh knows that it can, with its cabaletta, 'Or tutti, sorgete, ministri infernali', produce an effect of tigerish ferocity.

Macbeth arrives and in a few pregnant sentences, with hardly a direct word spoken, the murder is decided upon, as the march which announces the King's arrival is heard off-stage. The march itself is commonplace enough, but by no means unsuitable to accompany the pantomime which goes with the King's procession – no word is spoken throughout his passage across the stage.

Macbeth, alone, sees a dagger in front of him, and with his soliloquy, in itself highly expressive, begins the great duet between the two principal characters. The murder done, Macbeth staggers down the stairs with the dagger still in his hands: 'Fatal mia donna! un murmure, com'io, non intendesti?' He describes the scene, the murmuring of the grooms in the ante-chamber, the way 'Amen' stuck in his throat, and in the end it is Lady Macbeth who has to take the dagger back into the King's chamber.

Characteristically, this duet is marked to be sung 'sotto voce, e cupa', that is to say in a half voice and with dark, stifled tone. Only a few phrases, such as Macbeth's outburst of agonised horror when he catches sight of his blood-stained hands, 'Oh, vista orribile', are to be sung out, and they are specifically marked 'a voce aperta'. The original Lady Macbeth records that there were 151 rehearsals of this duet before the composer was satisfied, and that the sleep-walking scene – Verdi always maintained that these were the opera's two crucial moments – cost her three months of ceaseless worry before her movements and singing were judged to be satisfactory.

Banquo and Macduff arrive to accompany the King on his way, and Banquo broods impressively in C minor on the horrid portents of the night, while his companion goes to rouse the King. The murder is discovered, and all gather together for the magnificently sonorous and excitingly written finale, one of the most splendid in any of Verdi's earlier operas.

Act II. Macbeth is discovered on stage (the orchestral prelude is a reminiscence of 'Fatal mia donna'), where he is quickly joined by Lady Macbeth, who accuses him of avoiding her. They decide that the death of Banquo is necessary to their schemes, and Lady Macbeth is left alone to sing an expressive aria, 'La luce langue', whose ferocious determination (it dates from 1865) puts it into quite another class from the much tamer piece it replaces, and whose layout reminds us that 'O don fatale' (Don Carlos) was written less than two years after the revision of Macbeth.

The scene changes to a park, where a band of assassins is waiting for Banquo. Their chorus is a particularly fortunate example of the conventional music given to bands of murderers in Italian opera of the period (or indeed to any felonious nocturnal gathering for that matter; cf. the chorus near the end of Act I of Rigoletto). Banquo's aria which follows is a beautiful example of Verdi's writing for bass voice; at its end, the murderers fall upon him, but his son Fleance escapes.

The opening music of the banquet scene has a feverish, spurious gaiety, which it may be going too far to ascribe solely to the composer's sense of dramatic character (as if it were the inn scene in Wozzeck) but which is uncannily apt in its context. The same quality is evident in the graceless, nerve-ridden Brindisi, which Lady Macbeth sings to the assembled guests; the close relationship of its tune to the flowing 6/8 Brindisi in Traviata and the strong contrast of mood between the two has been pointed out by Desmond Shawe-Taylor, writing in the New Statesman. In between verses, Macbeth has a conference with a representative of the band charged to murder Banquo and learns that Fleance has escaped. Returning to his guests, he complains that Banquo's absence detracts from the pleasure of the occasion and says he himself will sit for a moment in his place. As he goes to the chair, he sees the ghost of the murdered man, and bursts into an agonised denial of his guilt, to the astonishment of the company, which naturally sees nothing. Lady Macbeth's remonstrances finally nerve him to face his guests again, which he does with an attempt at making light of the lapse. Lady Macbeth sings another verse of the Brindisi, but Macbeth's frenzy breaks out again as the ghost makes another appearance. His nerve has gone, and the assembly draws away from him, sensing the guilt he makes little attempt any longer to conceal. His sombre tune, 'Sangue a me', begins the finale, which is musically and dramatically no less effective than that to Act I.

Act III. The Witches sit round their cauldron in a dark cave. Their chorus is in the same vein as that of the first act, and is succeeded by a ballet, written of course for Paris (1865) and interrupted in the middle by the appearance of Hecate to instruct her followers as to their conduct when they are visited, as they will shortly be, by Macbeth. The dance continues and at its end Macbeth appears and demands to know his future destiny. The music is extraordinarily suggestive and Verdi has perhaps nowhere else so successfully evoked the supernatural as in the scene of the apparitions, which is punctuated by the distraught comments of Macbeth himself. The King loses consciousness, and the Witches dance round him.

The mood changes, Lady Macbeth appears searching for her husband, and asks what he has learnt from the Witches. He tells her and finishes by revealing that he has seen foretold the line of kings which Banquo will sire. The energy of Lady Macbeth's denial that this shall come to pass communicates itself to her husband and arouses something of his old military spirit, so that their short but vigorous duet makes a very striking end to the act.

Act IV. We are at the turning-point in the drama, the zenith of the ambitious career of the Macbeths and the nadir of the fortunes of the people of Scotland. As we might expect from the Verdi of 1847, the force opposed to Macbeth's tyranny is not only retribution but the less tragic and more immediately topical one of patriotism, which is implied throughout and personified in Macduff, Banquo, the Chorus, and, of course, in the minor figure of Malcolm. 'Patria oppressa', the chorus of the Scottish exiles, is in direct line from 'Va, pensiero' in Nabucco, with its wailing minor second in the accompaniment, sometimes ascending, sometimes descending (it appears again in the sleep-walking scene) and its wonderfully evocative contours. The words of the chorus date from the opera's first version, the music from its second.

Macduff's beautiful aria completes the still moment at the centre of the dramatic action, and is succeeded by a quick movement as Malcolm's army crosses the stage; Malcolm and Macduff sing a duet with the chorus.

Nothing in the score of Macbeth is more worthy of admiration than the sleep-walking scene, which is cast in the form of the old soprano 'mad scene', but has a freedom of movement and an expressiveness that Verdi was not to excel in a similar set piece, one is tempted to say, until Aida's arias nearly twenty-five years later. Much of the preliminary orchestral music has been heard in the prelude, but the expressive quality of the vocal writing is quite extraordinary, and the scene itself very exacting for the singer,

Andante assai sostenuto sotto voce

The musical score is for Macbeth's aria 'Macchia è qui tutto ra!'. It is written for voice and piano. The tempo is 'Andante assai sostenuto' and the mood is 'sotto voce'. The key signature has three flats (B-flat, E-flat, A-flat) and the time signature is common time (C). The score consists of four systems. The first system shows the vocal line starting with a whole rest, followed by a half note 'U' and a quarter note 'na'. The second system shows the piano accompaniment with a series of chords and a melodic line. The third system shows the vocal line with the lyrics 'mac-chia è qui tut-to-ra!'. The fourth system shows the piano accompaniment with a series of chords and a melodic line.

U - na

mac-chia è qui tut-to-ra!

comprising as it does every shade of expression, and a very wide compass, from C flat at the bottom to top D flat in the last phrase of all (marked 'un fil di voce').

Macbeth is at bay, furious that Malcolm is marching on him with an army reinforced by English troops but confident in his knowledge that the Witches have prophesied for him immunity from death at the hands of anyone 'born of woman', unaware that Macduff was 'from his mother's womb untimely ripp'd'. He curses the low friendless state which his way of life has brought him, but when he hears that his wife is dead, leads his men defiantly to war. The battle is accompanied by a fugue, which persists through the short encounter of Macbeth and Macduff and eventually gives way to a general chorus of rejoicing at the defeat of the tyrant.

Apart from the ballet, which was written specially for Paris, four pieces were inserted in 1865 in place of material which now finds no place in the revised opera: in Act II, Lady Macbeth's aria, 'La luce langue'; in Act III the final duet; in Act IV the chorus of exiles (replacing one similar in feeling and with the same words), and the whole of the battle scene (i.e. after Macbeth's aria). Originally, the opera ended with a short scena for Macbeth and this has in fact been used in Glyndebourne's production of the opera, Busch and Ebert inserting it after the fugue and before the entrance of Macduff and Malcolm. Even with the inclusion of this material, which the composer himself had discarded, there is no doubt that the last section of the opera, with its brilliantly descriptive fugue and firm, 'national' final chorus, is a vast improvement on the rather ordinary ending of the original version. There are changes in the rest of the opera, notably in the presto section of the big duet of Act I, Macbeth's reaction to the first appearance of the ghost in the banquet scene, the E major section of the first chorus of Act III, and the apparitions scene.

All his life, Verdi strove towards an expression of character, and nowhere previously had he been so successful in its portrayal as in Macbeth. Macbeth himself is shown as dominated, even more than in the play, by the other two main characters, his wife and the Witches; that is to say, his own personality plays proportionately a lesser part in determining events, and he is shown often at his worst and most susceptible, hardly ever at his best as poet or soldier. All the same, the working of remorse on his conscience – Verdi, like Shakespeare, obviously thinks of him as a better man than his actions – is excellently shown, and the long duet after the murder subtly and admirably expresses his terror at his deed and its inevitable consequences, and constitutes, with the sleep-walking scene, the most complete musical expression of the element of tragedy and destiny in the composition of the two leading figures.

Macbeth's loss – if loss it can be called – is, of course, Lady Macbeth's gain, and she dominates music and action alike. Judged purely as a role for a singing actress, it is one of the finest Verdi ever wrote, but its significance goes further than that and it is perhaps the earliest Verdian role in which a complete musical development can be traced along with the dramatic and psychological growth in a character. The progress from the aria in the first act, 'Vieni, t'affretta', which is in form a conventional aria with cabaletta (although a most exciting and successful one), through the increasingly unnerving events of the intermediate scenes, to the final, long, wailing curve of the sleep-walking scene is a remarkable musical study of gradual disintegration under the influence of conscience.

Macbeth may be said to sum up, better perhaps than any other opera, this period of Verdi's career; for the first time he had achieved a combination of the three characteristics which dominate his music: the theatre, patriotism, and character. H.

I MASNADIERI

The Bandits

Opera in four parts, text by Andrea Maffei after Schiller's Die Räuber. Première Her Majesty's Theatre, London, 22 July 1847, with the immensely popular Jenny Lind, Italo Gardoni (Carlo), Filippo Coletti, and the veteran Luigi Lablache as Massimiliano, conductor Verdi (later, the composer Michael Balfe). The opera has been not infrequently revived but seldom with quite the success that could have been anticipated.

Massimiliano, Count Moor Bass
 Carlo, his elder son Tenor
 Francesco, Carlo's brother Baritone
 Amalia, the Count's niece, an orphan Soprano
 Arminio, the Count's treasurer Tenor
 Moser, a pastor Bass
 Rolla, Carlo Moor's fellow bandit Tenor

Youths (later Bandits), Women, Children, Servants

Place: Germany

Time: Early Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Verdi's new contract for London was a prestigious affair, with a fine cast and much publicity – Queen Victoria attended the gala première. Success was slightly muted, a circumstance put down variously to the librettist's distinction as poet rather than man of the theatre, and to Verdi's unfamiliarity with the expectations of the London public. The music for Amalia is full of the kind of ornamentation which best suited Jenny Lind, whom Verdi admired but thought a little old-fashioned for 1847, but the opera remains somehow marginalised to this day.

The prelude concerns itself almost entirely with a lengthy 'cello solo, written specially to show the talents of Alfredo Piatti, the leading player at Her Majesty's Theatre and an old friend of Verdi's from Milan days.

Act I. Carlo, estranged from his father as a result of some madcap behaviour, reflects on his homeland and on his love for Amalia, then hears in a letter from his scheming brother that, so far from being forgiven, he is in effect disinherited. He and his disreputable friends in a rollicking cabaletta decide to cut loose, turn their backs on society and live on their wits as bandits.

Francesco, the villain of the piece, having removed the threat of his brother, plans to speed up his father's demise and decides news of Carlo's death in battle (fictitious, but convincing) will do the trick.

Amalia sings as she watches the sleeping Massimiliano, who wakes to lament that he may die without again seeing his favourite son, Carlo. Arminio brings a false report of Carlo's death, together with his dying wish that Francesco may marry Amalia. The act ends with a quartet between the deeply contrite Massimiliano, Amalia and Arminio consolatory, and Francesco crowing in ferocious triumph. At its end, Massimiliano falls, apparently dead.

Act II. Francesco has succeeded his father, at whose tomb Amalia muses, rejecting the sounds of rejoicing within and turning lament to rejoicing when a penitent Arminio tells her that both Massimiliano and Carlo are still alive. Her confrontation with the importunate Francesco comes in the form of a gradually evolving duet of the kind Verdi particularly favoured and during whose course she resists his attempts to bend her to his will.

Bandits celebrate the freeing of Rolla, one of their number, who was condemned to be hanged. Carlo, alone, laments his life of crime, but the alarm is raised and the gang prepare to defend themselves.

Act III. Amalia escapes from Francesco, but she takes fright when she hears the bandits singing until totally by chance she meets Carlo, with whom she joins her voice in rapturous, even confident, duet.

In the forest, Carlo is full of regret that his present life will separate him forever from Amalia and he contemplates suicide. He and the bandits surprise Arminio taking food to someone imprisoned in a deserted tower. This turns out to be Massimiliano, who does not recognise his son but reveals he was imprisoned by Francesco when he recovered from his earlier collapse. Carlo calls on his gang to help him gain revenge.

Act IV. Francesco suffers a crisis of conscience, relates the terrifying dream he has had, and rushes out after Moser has assured him only God can grant forgiveness for his sins.

Carlo does not reveal his identity to Massimiliano but nevertheless requests from him a father's blessing. The robbers capture Amalia, Carlo's identity is revealed and the opera ends in an unusual manner, with Carlo undergoing a crisis related to the criminal nature of his life, Amalia offering to stay with him in his outlawed state, and Carlo suddenly stabbing her and going off to meet his fate on the gallows. But the trio inspired by the bizarre situation makes a not unworthy finale.

Julian Budden once called it 'a grandiose work in the composer's early manner', and 'not a masterpiece ... moments of genuine greatness – and never a dull one'.

H.

JÉRUSALEM

Opera in four acts, text by Alphonse Royer and Gustave Vaëz, after Verdi's earlier opera I Lombardi. Première at the Opéra, Paris, 22 November 1847, with Madame Julian van Gelder, Gilbert Duprez, Adolphe Alizard.

| | |
|---|----------|
| Gaston, Vicomte de Béarn | Tenor |
| The Count of Toulouse | Baritone |
| Roger, the Count's brother | Bass |
| Adémar de Montheil, Papal Legate | Bass |
| Raymond, Gaston's squire | Tenor |
| A Soldier | Bass |
| A Herald | Bass |
| The Emir of Ramla | Bass |
| An Officer of the Emir | Tenor |
| Hélène, daughter of the Count | Soprano |
| Isaure, her companion | Soprano |
| Knights, Ladies, Soldiers, Pilgrims, Arab Sheiks, | |
| Women of the Harem, People of Ramla | |

Place: Toulouse; Palestine

Time: 1095–99

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Invited to compose for Paris as early as 1845, Verdi finally agreed, partly because of the prestige involved but also for financial considerations. He followed the example of Rossini (whose Maometto II became for Paris Le Siège de Corinthe) in adapting I Lombardi as Jérusalem, and the result was a success though subsequent commentators, until the time of Julian Budden, have condemned the 'new' work as inferior to the original. Budden ascribes the hostile view partly to Italian chauvinism, partly to a tendency to insist that music written for one context cannot work in another, partly to a reluctance to examine the new score, whose revisions, insists Budden, are, apart from the ballet, improvements. The plot is more concentrated, the casting of one rather than two principal tenors is an advantage, and all new music an improvement over what it replaced. It was translated into Italian but found little favour there, and is performed far less often than its predecessor, the first English performance for instance waiting until 1990. (See page 856 for a synopsis of I Lombardi.)

Act I. A marriage between Gaston and Hélène will reconcile two warring families, Gaston's father having been killed by Hélène's. Roger, Hélène's uncle, has incestuous designs on his niece and, as the men are about to depart on a crusade, hires an assassin to murder Gaston. The attempt is bungled and it is the Count who is apparently killed, although the assassin has the presence of mind to lay the blame on Gaston on whom anathema is pronounced.

Act II. Roger, disguised and penitent, lives in Palestine and offers water to pilgrims dying of thirst. Once he is out of sight, one of them turns out to be Hélène, who believes in Gaston's innocence and has come to Palestine where he is rumoured to be living. She recognises in one of the pilgrims Gaston's squire and hears he is a prisoner nearby in Ramla. She rejoices in the quick solo from Lombardi's Act IV (known on old records – quaintly, as it is in common time – as the 'Polonaise from I Lombardi!'). Pilgrims appear to sing a French version of 'O signore del tetto natio', Count Raymond makes an appearance miraculously preserved from the assassin's knife, and his brother Roger asks for his blessing.

Gaston, a prisoner in the Emir's Palace, is given Oronte's solo from Act II scene i of Lombardi. Hélène too is a prisoner and she and Gaston sing the duet from the earlier opera's Act III, but fail to make their escape.

Act III. Hélène is mocked by fellow inmates of the harem; there ensues a fifteen-movement ballet. The Count succeeds in capturing Ramla, but denounces his daughter, whom he finds with the man he thinks attempted to kill him. Gaston is to be executed and the Papal Legate proclaims his name henceforth dishonoured – an impressive ensemble new to the score and a forerunner of similar events in later Verdi operas.

Act IV. The act starts with the famous Risorgimento-style chorus of Lombardi's Act IV scene ii, after which it is Roger's task to absolve Gaston before his execution. Hélène stays behind and joins Gaston and Roger for a version of the trio from the end of Act III scene iii in the earlier opera (now with flute rather than violin obbligato), but at its end Roger hears the sounds of battle and restores Gaston's arms to him. In the last scene, Gaston covers himself with glory in battle and is recognised by the Count, who also recognises and forgives his dying brother Roger. H.

IL CORSARO

The Corsair

Opera in three acts, text by Francesco Maria Piave after Byron's poem. Première in Trieste, 25 October 1848, with Gaetano Fraschini, Verdi's most favoured tenor, as Corrado, Barbieri-Nini (already the first Lady Macbeth) as Gulnara, and Achille de Bassini (who had sung the Doge in I due Foscari and would later be Miller in Luisa Miller) as Pasha Seid. The opera had little success at first and has been revived only spasmodically.

Corrado, captain of Corsairs.....Tenor
Giovanni, a Corsair.....Bass
Medora, Corrado's beloved.....Soprano
Gulnara, Seid's favourite slave.....Soprano
Seid, Pasha of Coron.....Baritone
Selimo, a Turkish dignitary.....Baritone
A Black Eunuch.....Tenor
A Slave.....Tenor

Corsairs, Guards, Turks, Slaves, Odalisques

Place: An Aegean Island, the City of Coron

Time: Early Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 35 minutes

Long ago Il Corsaro acquired a reputation, not quite fairly, as the least interesting of Verdi's operas, an estimate which grew from the indifference Verdi appears to have shown when he did not even bother to attend the first night, much less look after the opera's initial preparation as he had with all his previous premières. He chose the subject for Piave's attentions as early as 1844–45 and probably worked on it before Macbeth, which became something of a watershed in his output, but seems eventually to have set the libretto partly to fulfil an obligation to the publisher Francesco Lucca, Ricordi's competitor, with whom he had fallen out some years before.

Act I. On their island in the Aegean, pirates roister. Their leader, Corrado, laments a life of exile and crime, then sets off in search of plunder. The second scene brings Corrado to his beloved Medora, who sings a melancholy romance before joining him in a duet of partial reassurance before he leaves.

Act II. In Seid's harem, odalisques sing to pass the time and Gulnara bemoans her life as the favourite of Seid, whom she hates. At the harbour, Seid himself joins in a hymn to Allah before a Dervish appears asking for protection from the pirates. A short duet follows before the dervish unmask to reveal Corrado who, with his followers, leads an unsuccessful attempt to free the women of the harem; his efforts are derided by Seid but admired by the women. Seid threatens his prisoners with death by torture.

Act III. In a magniloquent utterance, Seid regrets the uncompromising hostility of his beloved Gulnara, before in an extended duet refusing her plea for the life of Corrado. In a prison scene Corrado curses his fate, then falls asleep to be wakened by Gulnara, who will help him escape. In spite of her pleading, he rejects her offer to kill Seid but tells her of his constant love for Medora. She returns to tell him Seid is dead and they escape together.

On the corsairs' island, we find that Medora, despairing of ever seeing Corrado again, has taken poison and is not far from death. To her amazement, a ship comes into sight bearing her beloved and Gulnara; Corrado and Medora fall into each other's arms. The situation is explained – that Gulnara, driven by her unrequited love for Corrado, has saved his life – but the finale finds Medora exhausted and she dies. Corrado throws himself over the cliff.

Modern opinion may tend to disagree with history's too hasty verdict. Interestingly, Julian Budden has made a rough equation of Medora with Verdi's memory of his first wife and her early death (in 1840); of Gulnara with Giuseppina Strepponi, with whom he was already associated at the time of Corsaro's première. What had seemed when he embarked on it almost a parable of his situation later became a matter of history rather than a burning issue, hence his distancing of himself from the subject.

The opera, if simplistic and not Verdi's most dramatically intense, is far from negligible. It is concise and full of the exciting kind of music which late twentieth-century experience of Verdi's early operas has convinced audiences they enjoy. Pirates and odaliskes chorus away to appropriately different effect; Medora and Gulnara are given an introductory romance and cavatina respectively which are graceful and rewarding; Corrado sings with extraordinary grace for a pirate; Seid is, musically speaking, a baritone of some nobility. Cabalettas and ensembles are impressive even if sometimes a bit short of individuality. However, the final trio (a rarity, with two leading sopranos) was something of which Verdi, with good reason, appears to have been proud. H.

LA BATTAGLIA DI LEGNANO

The Battle of Legnano

Opera in three acts, libretto by Salvatore Cammarano. Première, Teatro Argentina, Rome, 27 January 1849, with Teresa de Giuli-Borsi, Gaetano Fraschini, Filippo Colini. First performance in Great Britain, 1960, by Welsh National Opera (in a World War II setting, libretto by John and Mary Moody under the title of The Battle), with Heather Harper, Ronald Dowd, Ronald Lewis, Hervey Alan, conductor Charles Groves. Revived la Scala, Milan, 1916, with Rosa Raisa, Crimi, Danise, Cirino; Parma, 1951, with Guerrini, Penno, Savarese; Florence Festival, 1959, with Leyla Gencer, Gastone Limarilli, Giuseppe Taddei, conductor Gui; la Scala, Milan, 1961, with Antonietta Stella, Franco Corelli, Ettore Bastianini, conductor Gavazzeni; Carnegie Hall, New York, 1987, with Millo, Malagnini, Manuguerra (in concert).

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Federico (Frederick) Barbarossa | Bass |
| First Consul of Milan | Bass |
| Second Consul of Milan | Bass |
| The Mayor of Como | Bass |
| Rolando, Duke of Milan | Baritone |
| Lida, his wife | Soprano |
| Arrigo, a warrior from Verona | Tenor |
| Marcovaldo, a German prisoner | Baritone |
| Imelda, Lida's servant | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Herald | Tenor |

Time: Twelfth Century

Place: Como and Milan

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

The theme for La Battaglia di Legnano was suggested to Verdi by the poet Cammarano, at a time when the composer was uneasy at the way the liberal and nationalist revolution was going and anxious to express his patriotism. He was able to embark on the work at once through the lapse of a previous contract with the San Carlo in Naples and devoted himself to it throughout the summer of 1848, finishing it at the end of the year. The première was received with such delirious excitement – partly because the theme of the victory of the Lombard League over Frederick Barbarossa was so topical – that the entire fourth act was repeated. A little later the opera was suppressed by the Austrian censorship, but it was revived in 1861 in Milan, the title being changed to L'Assedio di Haarlem, the Emperor to a Spanish duke and the Italian patriots to Dutchmen; on this occasion however it was a failure.

Act I. An overture of distinctly military flavour introduces the first scene, set in Milan, where a League, composed of contingents from the various cities of Lombardy, is forming to repulse the imminent invasion by Barbarossa. Rolando, leader of the Milanese troops, discovers that the group from Verona is led by his beloved friend, Arrigo, whom he had long believed killed in battle. Arrigo explains that he was taken prisoner and the two comrades rejoice at their happy reunion. In a chorus of great fervour all the patriots vow to die for their cause.

Scene ii opens in a shady place where we find Lida and her ladies. After a gentle chorus, Lida's lyrical and highly ornamented aria is interrupted by Marcovaldo, who is a captive and has fallen in love with Lida. She repulses him angrily.

Arrigo and Rolando arrive, and the embittered Marcovaldo, noticing Lida's agitation at the sight of Arrigo, jumps at once to the conclusion that she is secretly in love with him. Lida and Arrigo are left alone, and in a highly emotional duet we learn that they had indeed been betrothed years before. Arrigo reproaches Lida for her marriage to Rolando; even her eminently valid excuse that she thought he was dead does not seem to satisfy him.

Act II. Arrigo and Rolando are in Como to persuade the local leaders to join forces with them against Barbarossa. The Mayor's refusal on the grounds that he has a treaty with Barbarossa infuriates Rolando and Arrigo, who argue that the whole future of Italy is at stake and beg him to reconsider. 'What answer are we to take back?' they ask. They are soon answered by the sudden and startling appearance of Barbarossa himself, who tells the two envoys to return with the news of imminent and inescapable disaster and shows them a great German camp outside the city. In spite of this show of Barbarossa's power, Arrigo and Rolando retain their confidence in eventual victory, and the act ends with a rousing chorus in which all the Lombards swear to fight to the death.

Act III. In the crypt of Milan Cathedral, Arrigo is initiated into the ranks of the Death Riders (Cavaliere della Morte), a band of warriors all of whom have taken a solemn and terrible oath to rid their country of the invaders or die in the attempt.

The second scene takes place in Lida's rooms. Convinced he is going to be killed in battle, she has written a letter to Arrigo which her maid is to deliver, and she sings of her grief in phrases which cast distinct foreshadows of Traviata.

Rolando has premonitions of death as he says goodbye to his wife and child, and when Arrigo enters, he draws him aside to tell him that he, Rolando, has been made leader of the Death Riders, an honour which will almost certainly result in his death. Arrigo promises that if Rolando is killed he will look after his family, and the men leave separately. At this point the treacherous Marcovaldo intercepts Rolando and gives him Lida's letter to Arrigo, which he has bought from her servant Imelda – the letter in which Lida implores Arrigo for the sake of what they once meant to each other, to see her before the battle. Rolando swears to be revenged on them both.

The third scene finds Arrigo in his room writing to his mother. Lida comes to him, saying that she still loves him but that they must never meet again. She is on the point of explaining that she has come to see him because he has ignored her letter when Rolando is heard at the door. Arrigo hastily conceals Lida on the balcony, but Rolando, pretending to see if it is time to set off for the battle, discovers her. He is about to kill Arrigo without more ado, but, on hearing the trumpets sounding the call to arms, he realises that a far greater punishment would be to bring dishonour on Arrigo by preventing him from joining the patriot army; he locks him in his room. The thought of the shame which he will suffer spurs Arrigo to leap from the balcony with a cry of 'Viva Italia!' Franz Werfel, in his edition of Verdi's letters,¹ illustrates the inflammatory effect that Verdi's music had on the patriotic Italians of his day. 'At this very point a sergeant of dragoons in the gallery of the Teatro Costanzi did the same thing that the tenor was doing on the stage. Deprived of his reason by the irresistibly tempestuous rhythm of the music, he tore off his tunic, and leapt from the parapet of the gallery into the orchestra, where, surprisingly enough, he neither broke his back nor seriously injured anyone else.'

Act IV. In the cathedral, the people of Milan, among them Lida, are waiting to hear news of the battle which will have been joined at Legnano. News comes of the complete rout of the German army. Arrigo himself has dragged the Emperor from his horse but has been mortally wounded and is being brought to die in the cathedral. He is carried in by the Death Riders and swears to Rolando that he and Lida are innocent. Rolando believes him, forgives him and embraces Lida. Arrigo kisses the flag and dies while the citizens of Milan rejoice at the victory. H.

LUISA MILLER

Opera in three acts, text by S. Cammarano from Schiller's play Kabale und Liebe. Première at the Teatro San Carlo, Naples, 8 December 1849, with Gazzaniga, Salandri, Malvezzi, Selva, de Bassini. First performed in Philadelphia, 1852; London, Her Majesty's Theatre, 1858, with Piccolomini, Giuglini, Vialelli, Beneventaro. Revived Berlin, 1927; Metropolitan, 1929, with Ponselle, Lauri-Volpi, de Luca, Pasero, Ludikar, conductor Serafin; Florence Festival, 1937, with Caniglia, Lauri-Volpi, Armando Borgioli, Pasero, conductor Gui; Metropolitan, New York, 1968, with Caballé, Tucker, Sherrill Milnes, Tozzi, conductor Schippers; la Scala, Milan, 1976, with Caballé; Covent Garden, 1978, with Ricciarelli, Pavarotti, Nucci, conductor Maazel; Paris, 1983, with Ricciarelli, Pavarotti, Cappuccilli.

Count Walter Bass
Rodolfo, his son Tenor
Miller, an old soldier Baritone
Luisa, his daughter Soprano
Federica, Duchess of Ostheim,
 Walter's niece Mezzo-Soprano
Laura, a peasant girl Contralto
Wurm Bass
Ladies attending the Duchess, Pages, Servants, and Villagers

¹ Verdi: The Man in His Letters (edited Franz Werfel and Paul Stefan; translated by Edward Downes. L. B. Fisher, New York, 1942).

Place: The Tyrol

Time: First Half of the Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Schiller's play Kabale und Liebe, its fierce social criticism much subdued by Cammarano in deference to Neapolitan censorship, provided the basis for Verdi's second opera for the San Carlo. After a somewhat fraught première in Naples which involved the composer threatening to ask for asylum on a French warship, the opera was well received.

The overture is a notable success and Julian Budden invokes Mozart, Weber and Schubert in his description.

Act I. Luisa's birthday is being celebrated in the village square. In spite of her father's rather nebulous misgivings, she loves a young local whom she knows as Carlo (aria: 'Lo vidi, e'l primo palpito'). Wurm, Count Walter's sinister retainer, himself in love with Luisa, urges her father to support his claims, but Miller in a spacious aria insists his daughter will make her own choice of husband. Wurm reveals that Carlo is in reality Rodolfo, Count Walter's son only recently returned from abroad; a man with such connections would never be allowed to marry a girl from the village. Miller is left to fulminate in cabaletta.

In the castle, Wurm tells his master that Rodolfo is in love with Luisa, news not at all to the liking of Count Walter (aria: 'Il mio sangue') who plans a more suitable alliance with the recently widowed Duchess Federica, with whom Rodolfo was brought up. He tells his son that the Duchess is due to arrive at any minute and instructs him to propose to her. Before Rodolfo can protest, the Duchess is announced and their duet ('Dall'aule raggianti di vano splendor') suggests one-time intimacy which is shattered by Rodolfo's resolve to tell her the truth: he cannot ask for her hand in marriage because he loves another woman. Federica has long been in love with him and is disconcerted by the news.

Miller tells Luisa that her lover is the Count's son, engaged moreover to the Duchess, but in a moment Rodolfo is in the house asking for Miller's blessing on his marriage to Luisa. With all the authority he can muster, the Count intervenes and describes Luisa as a seductress. This is more than Miller can stomach and he draws his sword at the same time as Rodolfo breathes threats against anyone frustrating his intentions. The Count orders Luisa and her father arrested, but releases them when it is clear Rodolfo will reveal the guilty secret of how he came by his title if he proceed with his plan. It is an impressive finale.

Act II. Luisa learns that her father has been arrested and Wurm insists she can only save him from death by writing a letter disclaiming her love for Rodolfo and promising herself to Wurm in marriage. She writes (aria: 'Tu puniscimi, o Signor'), but there is more; she must come to the castle and in front of the Duchess admit her love for Wurm.

Wurm tells Count Walter that his scheme is successful, but then as they discuss their crime learns that Rodolfo knows he and the Count murdered the previous holder of the title. Federica hears Luisa falsely confess her love for Wurm.

Rodolfo has seen Luisa's letter and expresses his misery in the score's most famous aria, 'Quando le sere al placido', one of Verdi's finest melodic inspirations. He challenges Wurm to a duel, then tells his father that Luisa has betrayed him and he now only wishes for death. The Count seizes the chance to urge him to marry the Duchess. He agrees.

Act III. Miller has heard the price his daughter paid for his release and makes an attempt to comfort her. She has written to Rodolfo admitting she was betrayed but has sworn to reveal no details. She suggests a suicide pact but her father's distress convinces her to tear the letter up.

Luisa is at prayer when Rodolfo enters the room, which gives him the chance to empty a phial of poison into a decanter he sees on the table. Confronted with her letter to Wurm, she admits writing it and Rodolfo asks for a drink. She pours, then drinks in her turn, and together in impressive duet ('Piangi, piangi') they lament their situation. With Rodolfo's avowal that the wine was poisoned, Luisa feels freed from her vow and admits the letter was a lie. They make ready for death, and Miller is in time to join a final trio. Count Walter arrives to see Rodolfo kill Wurm.

H.

STIFFELIO

Opera in three acts, libretto by Francesco Maria Piave, after the play Le Pasteur, ou L'Evangile et le Foyer by Eugène Bourgeois and Emile Souvestre. Première at Trieste, 20 November 1850, with Marietta Gazzaniga-Malaspina, Gaetano Fraschini and Filippo Colini. Produced in Barcelona, 1856. Revived Parma, 1968, with Gulin, Limarilli, Alberti; Covent Garden, 1993, with Malfitano, Carreras; Metropolitan, New York, 1994, with Sharon Sweet, Domingo, Vladimir Chernov.

Stiffelio, a Protestant preacher Tenor
 Lina, his wife Soprano
 Count Stankar, an old Colonel, Lina's father ... Baritone
 Jorg, another preacher Bass
 Raffaele von Leuthold, a nobleman Tenor
 Dorothea, Lina's cousin Mezzo-Soprano
 Federico von Frengel, Lina's cousin Tenor

Members of Stankar's Household; Friends and Followers of Stiffelio

Place: Count Stankar's Castle near Salzburg
 Time: Beginning of the Nineteenth Century
 Running Time: 1 hour 45 minutes

The première of Le Pasteur by Bourgeois and Souvestre took place in Paris in February 1849, but it had been published in Italian in 1848 and in this version presumably came to the notice of Piave, Verdi's librettist. Not only was this, together with Dumas's La Dame aux Camélias, the most 'modern' play Verdi turned into an opera (both in terms of subject matter and of proximity of stage and operatic premières), but the subject – the adultery of a Protestant clergyman's wife – was highly likely in censor-ridden Italy to cause official consternation. Stiffelio attracted the attention of the censor from the start, and the text was in effect butchered before the première in Trieste. Stiffelio and Jorg were turned from ministers into what the libretto was forced to call 'sectarians', and overtones of Church and quotations from the Gospel reduced to negligible proportions. The audience's reaction was unenthusiastic and Verdi set out to make his libretto proof against outside interference, rejecting a possible performance at la Scala and eventually seven years after the première re-writing the opera as Aroldo (see page 893), with Protestant clergymen turned into crusaders. 'It is difficult not to feel he took the dramatic heart from the opera,' wrote Julian Budden, 'often replacing the new and the arresting with stage cliché.' In its original form, Stiffelio was for years hardly known and often assumed to be inferior to the re-written Aroldo.

Stiffelio has been travelling and preaching; during his absence, his wife Lina has had a brief affair with a neighbour, Raffaele von Leuthold, which she is now anxious to end and to forget.

Act I. The overture (a potpourri of melodies from the opera) takes us to a hall in Count Stankar's castle. Jorg invokes heaven's blessing on Stiffelio's work as a preacher and allows himself the hope that Stiffelio's love for his wife may prove no impediment to his zeal – Jorg throughout the opera seems to stand as an embodiment of the spiritual side of Stiffelio's life. Stiffelio tells his assembled friends that he has heard that a man, apparently in the grip of terror, has been observed making his escape from the castle. The fugitive left some papers behind, and these Stiffelio, spurning to uncover what he supposes a guilty intrigue, throws into the fire. In an effective septet, the characters give vent to their feelings, Stiffelio of brotherly mercy towards brother, Jorg, Dorothea and Federico in tune with him, Lina and Raffaele of their joint guilt, and Stankar of his suspicions of his daughter's secret – feelings they continue to vent during the stretta which succeeds it.

When Lina is left alone with Stiffelio, she calls him by the name by which she first knew him, Rodolfo Müller, at the time when her father provided him with refuge from a hostile crowd. He tells her how deeply he missed her during his journeys, but speaks with some severity of the infidelities he all too frequently observed. He does not find it easy to forgive them. Stiffelio senses something is wrong, then finds that Lina's ring given her by his mother is missing. In a moment we feel welling up the fury he has so far successfully disguised and which given sufficient cause could at any moment erupt.

Stankar calls him away and Lina is left alone to pray in a beautiful aria to God for pardon ('A te ascenda, o Dio clemente'). She resolves on a letter of confession to Stiffelio, but her father reproaches her for lack of nerve which is in itself unworthy, and, if she confess her sin, will bring about her husband's death. She must dissemble so that not only is Stiffelio's honour saved but that of the Stankar family as well. This powerfully developed scene between father and daughter is worthy of one of the lines which run so productively through Verdi's operas.

Raffaele is bent on arranging an assignation and secretes a letter for Lina in a book, locking it with a key to which only she has a duplicate. Federico picks up the book and walks off with it.

In a reception hall of the castle, a party has gathered to celebrate Stiffelio's return. Jorg hints to Stiffelio that an intrigue is afoot and that the guilty man carrying a book is now with Lina. When Federico, who holds the book, starts to question Stiffelio about the theme of his sermon, the latter replies in peremptory tones: 'The base treachery of the wicked'. As his temper mounts, he snatches the book and demands that Lina open it, then himself breaks the lock so that a letter falls out. Stankar retrieves it and tears it up, whereupon Stiffelio turns his impotent rage on his father-in-law. This is one of those full-blooded finales which belong essentially to Verdi's middle period, with a slow meditative middle section before the eruption of Stiffelio's full fury. Stankar, who is in full knowledge of the intrigue, challenges Raffaele to a duel.

Stiffelio (Covent Garden, 1995, director Elijah Moshinsky, designer Michael Yeargan, costumes Peter J. Hall). Act I:
Stiffelio (Placido Domingo) notices the ring is missing from the hand of his wife Lina (Catherine Malfitano).

Act II. The prelude is full of atmosphere – Julian Budden finds in it a foreshadowing of the music leading to the gallows scene in Ballo. Lina comes to the graveyard to pray for her dead mother's help ('Ah! dagli scanni eterei').

Raffaele, still intent on resuming his affair, urges his love for Lina, who demands he prove it by returning her letters and her ring. In a spirited cabaletta she reiterates her demand that he leave her in peace. He refuses, but Stankar intervenes to dismiss his daughter and press Raffaele to meet his challenge. The latter refuses, but Stankar threatens to reveal him as an adventurer who is no count but a mere foundling. Raffaele seizes a sword but as they start to fight they are interrupted by Stiffelio, who demands they reconcile their differences.

Stankar lets slip that Raffaele was the guilty seducer of Lina and when she reappears but can find no word to deny her guilt, Stiffelio knows the truth and the finale is under way. A hymn can be heard coming from the church and Jorg joins his voice to the off-stage singers who beg Stiffelio for comfort and spiritual sustenance. The act ends with Stiffelio calling down malediction on the head of the faithless woman while the others pray for divine mercy.

Act III. We are again inside Stankar's castle and a fiery orchestral introduction precedes Stankar's denunciation of Raffaele who has fled the district and is trying to persuade Lina to follow him. Stankar contemplates suicide but seems to reject the idea of abandoning Stiffelio and his daughter for whom his love is unabated. The music's gentle cantilena suggests an unsuspectingly tender side to Stankar. Jorg enters and Stankar hides the pistol he was about to turn on himself. Jorg says he has overtaken Raffaele in his flight, and the prospect of revenge causes a sudden if totally unchristian revulsion in Stankar, whose feelings burst forth in a cabaletta (marked pianissimo by Verdi, who found suspect the dramatic stamina of his original baritone and preferred to rely on his soft singing, broken only by a sudden fortissimo towards the end).

Stiffelio, in quieter mood than when we last saw him, has sent for Raffaele and asks him what he would do if Lina were free to marry him. He conceals Raffaele nearby and tells Lina he will leave her to the man she loves. Since they were married under a false name, divorce can end their marriage with no complications. Lina protests her love but Stiffelio seems determined and Lina is prevailed upon to sign. She turns to Stiffelio, addressing him as 'Minister', not husband, and begging him to hear her confession ('Ministro, Ministro, confessatemi!'). This was one of the cuts insisted upon by the censor before the first performance. The transparent sincerity of her protestation that her love has been only for Stiffelio moves husband as well as priest, but they are interrupted by the appearance of Stankar, bloodied sword in hand, announcing Raffaele's death. Stiffelio finds the building accursed and urges them to the church.

Inside a Gothic building, organ music plays as the congregation assembles. All pray for God's grace, Lina disguised among them, and Stankar joins his voice with the others, comparing himself, with more than a hint of disingenuity, to the repentant David. Stiffelio does not at first recognise the veiled Lina, but when she lifts her disguise is inspired to read from the gospel the passage describing Jesus's mercy towards the woman taken in adultery: 'Whichever among you is without sin, let him cast the first stone'. His cries of 'perdonata' are taken up by the congregation and Lina raises herself from her knees. Her pleas have been heard. H.

RIGOLETTO

Opera in three acts, text by Francesco Maria Piave, after Victor Hugo's Le Roi s'amuse. Première at Teatro la Fenice, Venice, 11 March 1851, with Teresina Brambilla, Raffaele Mirate and Felice Varesi.

The Duke of Mantua.....Tenor
Rigoletto, *his jester, a hunchback*Baritone
Count Ceprano, a nobleman.....Bass

Count Monterone, a nobleman.....Baritone
 Sparafucile, a professional assassin.....Bass
 Matteo Borsa, a courtier.....Tenor
 Cavaliere Marullo, a courtier.....Baritone
 Countess Ceprano.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Gilda, Rigoletto's daughter.....Soprano
 Giovanna, her duenna.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Maddalena, Sparafucile's sister.....Contralto
 Courtiers, Noblemen, Pages, Servants

Place: Mantua

Time: Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Both Victor Hugo's play and the libretto of Verdi's Opera ran into trouble with the censors, not surprisingly since the only character with moral fibre in a licentious court is a court jester, who moreover plots the assassination of an absolute ruler, his master. Hugo's play was proscribed after the first night and the censor caused the venue of Verdi's opera to be removed from real-life France under François I to a fictitious court of Mantua under a Duke. The essence of a closed society, where one man's word was absolute, was of course preserved, as also the elegant and light-hearted figure of the ruler-as-seducer, the Duke's music running the gamut from the throwaway brilliance of the start through the romantic fervour of his wooing of Gilda, the tenderness of his aria of regret at losing his latest love up to the grandeur of the great quartet in the last scene. The dominating role nonetheless is that of Rigoletto, the climax one might say of Verdi's obsession with the baritone voice as protagonist. He wrote for a higher-based baritone than had Rossini, Bellini or Donizetti, and here the overall tessitura is perhaps higher than in any other of his scores.

By contrast, the other roles are less extensively developed, though so plentifully endowed with music that singers since early performances have queued to undertake them. Gilda is no more than an ingénue but few others have every turn of their feelings so acutely characterised; Maddalena emerges as a personality in a few bars of music; Sparafucile is more than just a 'bravo' and Monterone in a role lasting no more than two or three minutes stands as one of the most rewarding small parts in Italian opera.

The story is concerned with the conflict between Rigoletto's public position as licensed jester and his private life as devoted but clandestine father. To a superstitious man the collision between them seems inescapable when at court he mocks the heartbreak of Monterone only in his turn to feel the lash of a father's curse.

Act I. The music associated with the curse dominates the prelude, leading into a brilliant court scene, which serves as background to the amorous activities of the Duke, who enters with Rigoletto in attendance. A fresh young beauty has recently caught his eye but Countess Ceprano is his immediate quarry, variety being central to his escapades: 'Questa o quella' (This one or that one). He dances a minuet with the Countess and disappears with her, heedless of comment, least of all from her husband, who falls victim to Rigoletto's caustic tongue. Marullo tells anyone who will listen that he has discovered Rigoletto has a young innamorata, which suggests to Ceprano a possible line of revenge. Monterone bursts in and with dignity and grandeur denounces the Duke as the seducer of his daughter. Rigoletto volunteers to receive him and makes sport of a father's misery. In his turn Monterone calls down a curse on Rigoletto's head as retribution. Rigoletto's reaction is almost pathological – this is his Achilles heel – and the idea of the father's cursing haunts him throughout the opera.

Scene ii. A street outside Rigoletto's house, Ceprano's palace at one side of it. Memories of Monterone and his curse haunt Rigoletto, but he is confronted by the figure of Sparafucile, who announces himself, to a subtly contrived 'nocturne' accompaniment, as a 'sword' for hire. Rigoletto says he has no need of such services, but we are left in little doubt that he has stored up information about Sparafucile's whereabouts against possible future use. It is a scene of extraordinary subtlety, conducted mostly in a kind of musical whisper. Rigoletto's soliloquy, 'Pari siamo' (How like we are!), impressively contrasts his own and his master's situations, but it is the father's curse which has seized his imagination and it is still on his mind when he unlocks the door to his garden and Gilda runs out to meet him.

Their scene, full of musical invention, is one of great tenderness, as the music successively mirrors Rigoletto's injunction that she must never leave the garden except to go to church, his constant grief over the death of Gilda's mother, and Gilda's protestations of filial love and absolute fidelity to his wishes, the first a more accurate representation of her attitude than the second of her behaviour. As he consigns Gilda to the care of Giovanna ('Ah, veglia, o donna'), there are noises off and the Duke, with Giovanna's help, contrives to conceal himself inside the garden. Rigoletto leaves.

Gilda is a prey to worry that she has concealed from her father the attentions of a young man who followed her from church; when she turns she is confronted with none other than the young man himself, who tells her he is a student and that he loves her. 'E il sol dell'anima', he declares, and their duet celebrates young love until sounds of movement outside precipitate an impassioned farewell. Gilda's graceful aria, 'Caro nome', confirms her romantic involvement. She has no sooner gone up to her room than a group of courtiers appears in the street intent on abducting Rigoletto's mistress and so avenging Ceprano. When Rigoletto returns he is blindfolded, under guise of fitting a mask, and then roped in to help in what he is assured is the capture of Countess Ceprano (Chorus: 'Zitti, zitti, moviamo a vendetta'). The scheme works, the courtiers are triumphant and Rigoletto is left frenziedly lamenting Monterone's fateful curse.

Act II. The ducal palace. The Duke is disconsolate – the cut of the music of 'Parmi veder le lagrime' leaves no doubt that, however free with his affections, he is a man of feelings. He learns from the courtiers that they have abducted Rigoletto's innamorata, and once he has gone, they lie in wait to torment the jester. Rigoletto is obviously on edge, searching for any clue as to Gilda's whereabouts and only convinced she is already with the Duke when a page is turned away with obviously fabricated excuses. He rounds on the courtiers, who for the first time learn that it is his daughter and not his mistress they have turned over to the Duke's pleasure, and in a magnificent outburst denounces them for their cruelty: 'Cortigiani, vil razza dannata' (Oh you courtiers, vile rabble, accursed).

In a moment, Gilda is in the room, the courtiers have been thrown out, and she is telling her father of the young man who followed her from church ('Tutte le feste al tempio'). Rigoletto gently consoles her ('Piangi fanciulla'), then, after watching Monterone led towards his death, hurls himself into a violent pledge of vengeance, which may purge at the same time the crime against his daughter and the curse laid on him ('Si! vendetta! tremenda vendetta!').

Act III. Sparafucile's house – an inn – which must be split to show both outside and inside. With him lives his sister, who acts as decoy for his victims. From outside, Rigoletto and Gilda observe Sparafucile greet the Duke, who is in disguise and proceeds to sing what has become perhaps the most famous song in all opera: 'La donna è mobile'. Legend has it Verdi withheld it from rehearsal until the last possible moment for fear it would, even before the first night, become known all over Venice.

Sparafucile finalises his bargain with Rigoletto, who will pay half the agreed money in advance, the rest on delivery of the body of the Duke. Maddalena, Sparafucile's sister, makes her appearance, to the discomfiture of Gilda, who still assures her father that she loves the man she now watches making advances to another woman. A great quartet develops, led by the Duke who in a soaring melody seems to be serenading not so much the relatively inconsequential figure of Maddalena as womankind in general ('Bella figlia dell'amore'). Maddalena responds in a quick staccato melody, Gilda laments around the top of the stave while Rigoletto at the bottom mutters vengeance. There is no more famous (and no better) ensemble in nineteenth-century Italian opera.

Rigoletto sends his daughter away with instructions to disguise herself and ride to Verona, meanwhile reviewing his bargain with Sparafucile and reserving for himself the satisfaction of throwing the body in due course into the river. A storm blows up and during its course Maddalena, who finds the young man attractive, proposes her brother kill Rigoletto instead of the Duke and pocket the second half of his fee. But he will have none of what he sees as an immorality, and when Gilda surreptitiously returns, the original bargain is still in place. In the end, Sparafucile relents and agrees to kill whoever next arrives at the inn. Gilda overhears and, at the end of a dramatic trio, knocks on the door. The lights are extinguished, there is a half-stifled cry, more storm music and, when Rigoletto returns with the money and accepts the corpse-filled sack, he is taken aback to hear the Duke's 'La donna è mobile' coming from inside the inn. As the last top B natural dies away, he tears open the sack to find Gilda's body. She dies after a long, sad farewell to her father, who is left to lament the father's curse laid nearly three acts earlier ('Lassù in ciel').

With Rigoletto Verdi began what was to become a trio of operas of unparalleled popularity, completed by Trovatore and Traviata and all performed within the space of two years. There are substantial differences between them but the mastery is consistent, whether the inimitable concision of the first scene of Rigoletto and the tunefulness of the rest of the score, the demotic appeal of Manrico in Trovatore contrasting with the aristocratic manners of his opponent di Luna and his lover Leonora, or the novelty in La Traviata of the contemporary theme and its impact on the composer. H.

IL TROVATORE

The Troubadour

Opera in four acts, text by Salvatore Cammarano from the Spanish play of the same title by Antonio Garcia Gutiérrez. Première at the Teatro Apollo, Rome, 19 January 1853, with Penco, Goggi, Baucardé, Guicciardi, Balderi.

Count di Luna, *a young nobleman*Baritone
 Ferrando, *captain of his guard*Bass
 Manrico, *supposed son to Azucena and a rebel under Prince Urgel*Tenor Ruiz, *a soldier in Manrico's service*Tenor
 An Old GipsyBaritone
 Doña Leonora, *lady-in-waiting to the Princess of Aragon*Soprano
 Inez, *confidante of Leonora*Soprano
 Azucena, *a gipsy woman from Biscay*Mezzo-Soprano
 Followers of Count di Luna and of Manrico;
 Messenger, Gipsies, Soldiers, Nuns

Place: Aragon and Biscay

Time: Fifteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

In Verdi's output Il Trovatore is unsurpassed for prodigality of melody, energy and sheer popular appeal. It is also notorious for incomprehensibility of plot, a reputation which is not entirely fair. It is however a fact that crucial elements of the story occur before the stage action starts, so that the prospective listener must bone up on it beforehand; moreover the complications of the original story are retained and compressed, with results which are telegraphic in the terse way they re-tell a story which was never without convolutions.

Verdi encountered the subject in early 1850, but composition was not started until autumn 1851.

The legend that virtually the entire opera was composed between 1 and 29 November 1852 is probably false, but Verdi was a quick worker and nowhere in his output is there more evidence of the white heat of inspiration.

Spain is torn by civil war. Leonora is lady-in-waiting to the wife of the Prince of Aragon, in whose cause Count di Luna is fighting; Manrico, the so-called gipsy with whom she is in love, fights for the insurgents led by Prince Urgel. The mystery of Manrico's birth raises its head from time to time but is not finally resolved until the opera's last moments, when it transpires that Azucena, in her overwrought attempt to avenge the murder of her mother (on the orders of di Luna's father), had thrown her own son rather than the Count's into the flames. She knows the truth and it haunts her throughout the action.

Act I. The guardroom of the Palace of Aliaferia. Ferrando, captain of the guard, with a shout wakes his companions, warning them not to be sleeping when the Count returns from his nightly vigil beneath the windows of Leonora's apartments, a vigil necessitated by his fear that a rival is preferred by Leonora. Ferrando recounts, not for the first time we may imagine, the story of how a gipsy woman put a spell on one of the sons of the Count di Luna, was apprehended and burnt at the stake ('Abbieta zingara'). Her daughter contrived to make away with the boy and a little later the charred bones of a child were found not far away. The old Count looked in vain for his son and made the surviving brother, now their master, swear to continue the search.

The gardens of the palace. Leonora and Inez wait for Leonora's unknown but favoured suitor. 'Tacea la notte placida' is one of the grandest and most effective of the arias in which Verdi in his early operas liked to introduce a leading female character. Leonora's graceful cabaletta, 'Di tale amor', is no less appealing. The ladies re-enter the palace and Count di Luna comes into the garden, to be met almost immediately, and thoroughly disconcerted by, the sound of the troubadour preparing to serenade Leonora. 'Deserto sulla terra' he sings until Leonora, hearing his voice, comes out of the palace and, mistaking the Count for the serenader, hastens towards him. Manrico comes out of the shadows, and Leonora cannot prevent the two men drawing their swords and fighting (trio: 'Di geloso amor sprezzato').

Act II. The gipsy camp in Biscay. The gipsies sing the so-called Anvil Chorus, one of nineteenth-century opera's most famous numbers. Azucena, who is sitting with them, seems mesmerised by the fire (aria: 'Stride la vampa'), and recalls her mother's death at the stake and cry for revenge. Her son Manrico asks her to tell him the story once again and she goes through the narrative ('Condotta ell'era in ceppi'), amazing him by her incoherent references to the death of her own son in the flames rather than the Count's. She reassures him, but in her turn questions him as to why he spared the life of di Luna in battle when he had him at his mercy. In the splendidly martial 'Mal raggendo all'aspro assalto', Manrico explains that a hidden force caused him to stay his hand: he felt he could not kill his adversary. A messenger from the Prince brings an order for Manrico to go immediately to defend Castellor, adding that Leonora, believing him dead, plans to enter a nunnery. Manrico springs into action and Azucena's pleas ('Perigliarti ancor') fail to move him from his decision.

The cloister of a convent. Stealthily at night the Count and his followers group themselves in order when she appears to abduct Leonora. He sings of his love for her in one of the most beautiful solos of the baritone repertory: 'Il balen del suo sorriso'. It is followed by a determined cabaletta alla marcia, 'Per me ora fatale', which suggests di Luna is very much a man to be reckoned with. A chorus of nuns is heard from the convent and they are about to process to the cloister when the Count makes his move only for Manrico and his followers to forestall him, to Leonora's infinite relief. 'E deggio! e posso crederlo' she sings, leading an impassioned finale at whose end Manrico frees Leonora and departs.

Act III. Di Luna's camp. He is laying siege to Castellor, where Manrico has taken Leonora, and his army sings stirringly of the pleasures of gambling. The Count emerges from his tent to be confronted with a gipsy woman captured as she was prowling round the camp. She protests she is a poor traveller ('Giorni poveri vivea'), but Ferrando claims to recognise her as the gipsy who, to avenge her mother, kidnapped the old Count's son. When she calls on Manrico for help, di Luna in a paroxysm of rage condemns her to be burnt.

A hall in Castellor. Leonora is about to become Manrico's bride, and he sings of his love in expansive phrases culminating in a marvellous lyrical inspiration: 'Ah sì, ben mio coll'essere'. Happiness is to be short-lived as Ruiz rushes in with word that Azucena has been captured and will shortly be burnt alive. Manrico seizes his sword and launches into the vigorous cabaletta 'Di quella pira', a rousing solo crowned in many performances with the most famous unscripted top C in opera (or, transposed, with a B natural) – Verdi did not write the note but he must have heard it many times and it is far from contradicting the spirit of the music.

Act IV. Outside a tower in the palace of Aliaferia. Manrico's sortie to rescue his mother has failed and he is a prisoner in the tower. Leonora is led in by Ruiz, and in a magnificent aria she prays for him in his captivity, 'D'amor sull'ali rosee', with its long lines a test of any Verdian soprano's capacity. There follows the Miserere, when, to the sound of chanting within, Leonora sings brokenly of her foreboding and Manrico despairingly of his love for her. Few nineteenth-century Italian operatic tunes are more famous, few more effective in context. Leonora caps the scene with an impassioned stretta, 'Tu vedrai che amore in terra'.

The Count confronts Leonora. She promises to become his if he will free Manrico. Di Luna's passion urges him to agree. There is a solo for Leonora, 'Mira d'acerbe lagrime', followed by a duet between her and the Count, who little suspects that, Manrico once at liberty, she will take the poison hidden in her ring and escape his clutches.

The interior of the tower. Manrico and Azucena lie in prison. Azucena raves of the pyre on which her mother perished, and Manrico tries in long, expressive phrases to calm her spirit. In a mood between sleeping and waking, she intones a haunting melody 'Ai nostri monti', while Manrico continues his attempt to soothe her forebodings. Leonora comes to urge him to escape, but he immediately suspects the price she has paid, suspicions confirmed as the poison starts to take effect. Leonora dies in Manrico's arms; di Luna returns to find her dead and promptly orders Manrico's execution. He drags Azucena to the window to witness her son's death, and it is a Pyrrhic victory she wins as she calls out 'He was your brother!'

Il Trovatore was never easy to cast and has always required, as Caruso is supposed to have pointed out, no less than 'the four best singers in the world'. Di Luna and Leonora are representatives of an energetic aristocratic world whose aspirations are perfectly mirrored in their consistently grand utterances, but the powerfully characterised Azucena is another story, one of Verdi's most original creations and a challenge to any leading mezzo. Manrico has, wrongly and over the years, become associated with a muscular top C, whereas for most of the role the music requires a singer combining delicacy and refinement with the energy which is an equally essential part of Manrico's armoury. H.

LA TRAVIATA

The Fallen Woman

Opera in three acts, text by Francesco Maria Piave after Alexandre Dumas's play La Dame aux Camélias. Première at Teatro la Fenice, Venice, 6 March 1853, with Salvini-Donatelli, Graziani, Varesi.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Alfredo Germont..... | Tenor |
| Giorgio Germont, his father | Baritone |
| Gastone de Letorières | Tenor |
| Baron Douphol..... | Baritone |
| Marchese d'Obigny | Bass |
| Doctor Grenvil | Bass |
| Giuseppe, Violetta's servant | Tenor |
| Violetta Valéry, a courtesan | Soprano |
| Flora Bervoix, her friend | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Annina, Violetta's maid | Soprano |
| Ladies and Gentlemen, Servants and Masks, Dancers and Guests | |

Place: Paris and Vicinity

Time: 1850

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Alexandre Dumas falls at the age of twenty fell in love with the brilliant courtesan, Marie Duplessis, a girl from the country whose praises were sung even after her death by all who had met her. She died from tuberculosis in 1847, and Dumas published his novel, La Dame aux Camélias, in 1848, deriving a play from it the following year. That was not performed until 1852 but Verdi and Piave, searching for an operatic subject for the Carnival in Venice in 1853, decided on it in November 1852. Legend once had it that initial failure was because the audience could not accept a risqué story played in a contemporary setting, but the fact is that in Venice it was played in the costumes of 1700 (even though Verdi's contract stipulated modern dress) and that scores continued to specify that period until well after the composer's death.

The prelude's opening section is concerned with the music before Violetta's death, its second with her impassioned cry of 'Amami Alfredo' in Act II. Violetta is giving a party and Gastone informs her that Alfredo, who is there, has fallen seriously in love with her. Alfredo leads a spirited brindisi ('Libiamone' lieti calici'), and there is dancing in the next room which Violetta is about to join when she feels faint. Alfredo remains behind and gracefully admits his love: 'Un dì felice, eterea', Violetta echoing his mood while appearing to mock. The phrase 'Di quell'amor ch'è palpito' (All that has life has its breath from you) in the course of the opera takes on something of the character of a love motif, and before the end of the act Violetta repeats it in her aria.

Alfredo and the other guests retire and Violetta is lost in contemplation, her heart perhaps touched for the first time: 'Ah, fors'è lui'. At the end of the aria, her mood changes from introspection and she bursts into what is musically a celebration of dawning love at the same time as the words she sings deny any such possibility. A scene of marvellous power, as the music develops to echo Violetta's burgeoning love.

Act II. Violetta and Alfredo are living together in the country. He sings of his joy in his life with her ('De' miei bollenti spiriti'), but is disturbed when he learns from the maid Annina that Violetta has been selling her jewellery in order to pay the bills. He will go to Paris to raise money! Violetta opens a note from Flora inviting her to a party in Paris and smiles at the mere idea she might return there. When a visitor is announced she assumes it will be her lawyer but it turns out to be Alfredo's father, come to persuade her to give up his son in order that no breath of scandal may attach to the forthcoming wedding of his daughter. His harsh tone soon softens when it is apparent she is not the gold-digger he had assumed he would find. Their scene together, cast in the loosely-knit duet form Verdi mined so productively throughout his operas, is the centrepiece of the opera, and we pass through Germont's plea for his daughter's happiness ('Pura siccome un'angelo'), and Violetta's attempt to put the opposite case, to reach the moment when in a tune of infinite pathos ('Ah, dite alla giovine') she ceases to resist what she now accepts is inevitable. Germont does not find it hard to love her for what she has promised to do and he assures her – not too convincingly – that she will not regret it. He for his part will at some time in the future tell Alfredo that in spite of appearances to the contrary her love for him never faltered.

In its way, nineteenth-century opera contains no more involving, indeed moving, scene, and yet no twentieth-century listener fails to condemn the elder Germont for his heartless destruction of a vulnerable woman's life – a tribute to the internal dramatic logic of the situation, given acceptance of the principle on which it is based, or to the power and beauty of Verdi's music?

Violetta writes Alfredo a note telling him she is going back to her old life, to be kept by Baron Douphol, but when he appears, she hides what she has been writing. He says he has heard from his father that he is on his way in an attempt to separate them, and Violetta, as she says goodbye, pours out her heart in an almost wordless protest against the unfairness of her position ('Amami Alfredo'), for the soprano, one of the opera's emotional touchstones.

Alfredo is handed Violetta's letter, but he has hardly digested its contents before his father enters and, in one of the most famous of baritone arias, offers comfort ('Di Provenza, il mar, il suol'). Alfredo nonetheless dashes off to Paris.

The second scene is at Flora's party, where festivities are in full swing. Alfredo comes in on his own, closely followed by Violetta on the arm of the Baron. 'Unlucky in love, lucky at cards' is Alfredo's comment, and he and the Baron play before supper is announced. Violetta has asked Alfredo to meet her alone, but her words only fan the flames of his jealousy and he summons the other guests to insult her in front of them all. His father intervenes, the Baron issues a challenge, and Violetta recovers from a fainting fit to sing lyrically of the love for Alfredo she still holds within her heart ('Alfredo, Alfredo, di questo core').

Act III. Violetta lies mortally ill in bed. The slow, sad prelude echoes that of the first act, but with nothing this time to contrast with the tragedy. Violetta wakes to read, for the hundredth time, the letter she has had from Germont telling her that the Baron was wounded in the duel and that Alfredo now knows of her sacrifice and is on his way to see her. She senses the approach of death and her aria, 'Addio del passato', suggests a sigh from the depths of a purified soul. Revellers can be heard below and in a moment Alfredo is in the room and holding her in his arms. 'Parigi, o cara, noi lasceremo' (We shall fly from Paris, beloved) he sings, and Violetta seems at first to believe him. But she knows she is dying ('Gran Dio! Morir si giovane': O God, to die so young), and, watched by Annina, Germont and the doctor, at peace with the world, she breathes her last.

La Traviata is Verdi's second setting of a contemporary subject, Stiffelio his first, and this is only the second time he wholly abandoned the grand public events and gestures which had so far provided him with subjects and accepted something more intimate (Luisa Miller preceded Traviata). It represents a logical build on the intimate scenes of Rigoletto, and for its unheroic, bourgeois world the composer had to find what amounted to a new style, an achievement the more remarkable since for much of the time he was writing Traviata he was preoccupied with Trovatore, whose première took place less than two months before that of Traviata. Form is more flexible, vocal writing on the whole more delicate than in earlier operas, and one may wonder what nineteenth-century Italian opera rivals in subtlety this extraordinary work, which may owe much of its naturalness and the credibility of its dialogue to the original play but is transformed by Verdi's score from a comment on the life and times of its heroine into one on life itself. He wrote it at a time when he had for some time been living more or less openly with Giuseppina Strepponi, a retired opera singer and a remarkable woman, with several liaisons and more than one illegitimate child in her past. He was not to marry her until six years after the première of La Traviata. Verdi brooked no interference with his private life and criticism of his liaison with Giuseppina caused him to come close to severing connections with the small town of Busseto where he was born. Asked once which of his operas he considered his best the composer is said to have replied: 'Speaking as a professional, Rigoletto, as an amateur, Traviata'.

H.

LES VÊPRES SICILIENNES

I Vespri Siciliani – The Sicilian Vespers

Opera in five acts, text in French by Scribe and Charles Duveyrier. Première at the Opéra, Paris, with Cruvelli as Hélène, 13 June 1855. First performed in Italy, Parma, 1855; at la Scala, Milan, 1856 (as Giovanna de Guzman); at San Carlo, Naples, 1857 (as Batilde di Turenna); Drury Lane, London, 1859; New York, 1859. Revived Stuttgart, 1929; Berlin, 1932, with Anni Konetzni, Roswaenge, Schlusnus, List, conductor Erich Kleiber; Palermo, 1937, with Arangi-Lombardi, Franco lo Giudice, Guicciardi, Vaghi, conductor Capuana; Genoa, 1939, with Scacciati, Olivato, Armando Borgioli, Pasero, conductor Gui; Florence Festival, 1951, with Callas, Kokolios, Mascherini, Christoff, conductor Erich Kleiber; la Scala, Milan, 1951, with substantially the same cast, conductor de Sabata; Cardiff, 1954, by Welsh National Opera. Successful modern revivals in productions by John Dexter with sets by Josef Svoboda have been in Hamburg, 1969; Metropolitan, 1974, with Caballé, Gedda, Milnes, Diaz, conductor James Levine; Paris, 1974 (in Italian), with Arroyo, Domingo; Florence, 1978, with Scotto, Luchetti, Bruson, Raimondi, conductor Muti; English National Opera, 1984, with Plowright, Ken Collins, Howlett, R. van Allan, conductor Mark Elder. La Scala, Milan, 1989, with Studer, Merritt, Zancanaro, Furlanetto, conductor Muti.

Hélène (Elena), *sister of Frederick of Austria*Soprano
 Henri (Arrigo), *a young Sicilian*Tenor
 Guy de Montfort (Monforte),
Governor of SicilyBaritone
 Giovanni da Procida, *Sicilian doctor*Bass
 De Béthune, *a French officer*Bass
 Count Vaudemont, *a French officer*Bass
 Ninetta, *in attendance on Hélène*Soprano
 Danieli, *a young Sicilian*Tenor
 Thibault (Tebaldo), *a French soldier*Tenor
 Robert (Roberto), *a French soldier*Bass
 Manfredo, *a Sicilian*Tenor

Place: Palermo

Time: 1282

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Les Vêpres Siciliennes was commissioned for the Great Exhibition of 1855. Much as Verdi disliked the conditions of work in Paris, he could not but find it an honour to be asked to write music for so great an occasion in the artistic capital of the world. In the event, he hated the libretto, as offending the French because of the massacre at the end, and the Italians because of the treacherous behaviour of the Sicilian patriots, and his relations with Scribe were even the subject of comment in the newspapers. As if Verdi had not enough to bear, Cruvelli, the admirable soprano entrusted with the role of Hélène, elected to disappear without a word to anyone during rehearsals. 'She seems to have gone', says Francis Toye, 'on a kind of anticipatory honeymoon with one Baron Vigier, whom she married shortly afterwards.'

The opera is concerned with the occupation of Sicily by French troops during the thirteenth century, and the efforts of the Sicilians to dislodge them. The overture is one of Verdi's best, and is dominated by a long cello tune, taken from the duet in Act III between Henri and de Montfort.

Act I. A detachment of French troops is in the great square at Palermo, some of them drinking, others watching the crowd of Sicilians which eyes them sullenly from the other side of the square. The French sing of their enforced absence from their native land, the Sicilians of their hatred of their oppressors. An exchange between de Béthune, Robert, and Thibault indicates that there is nothing new about the proprietary attitude of occupying troops towards the women of the country.

At this moment the French notice Hélène crossing the square. She has been praying for her brother, who was executed by order of de Montfort for his patriotic activities. A drunken soldier is struck by her beauty and orders her to sing to entertain the French conquerors. Somewhat to his surprise she consents, but her song is not at all what it was expected to be. The loosely knit opening phrases and the long cantabile line lead to a sudden and inflammatory allegro giusto, which whips up the courage of the downcast Sicilians. It is a scene of considerable theatrical power and makes a great effect when sung by a soprano of the calibre of Maria Callas, who was in the revival at the Florence Festival in 1951. No one who heard her will forget her repeated 'Votre salut est dans vos mains' (Il vostro fato è in vostra man), nor the brilliant effect of her coloratura and top notes in the cabaletta itself.

The Sicilians rush at the French, but the abortive rising is quelled by the appearance of de Montfort, alone and unarmed, at the door of his palace. The square clears as if by magic, and Hélène, supported by her attendants Ninetta and Danieli, is left alone with de Montfort. Their quartet is mostly unaccompanied, and at its end Henri, who has been imprisoned, rushes up to Hélène with the news of his release. He does not notice de Montfort but, in spite of his openly expressed patriotic sentiments, is ordered by him to remain behind. The act ends with a duet between the two, in which de Montfort offers Henri fame in the service of the French. His offer is indignantly spurned, as is his command that Henri associate no more with the rebel H      , into whose palace without more ado Henri betakes himself.

Act II. Outside the city, in a valley. Procida, until his banishment leader of the Sicilian patriots, now returns secretly to stir up resistance. He salutes his beloved native land in a recitative and aria which has become perhaps the most famous number of the opera, 'O toi, Palermo'. In a cabaletta, he exhorts the small band of chosen patriots to prepare with him the deliverance of Sicily.

H       and Henri have been bidden to meet the exiled patriot, and he leaves them together while he goes off to set plans afoot, but not before he has enrolled Henri as one of the leaders of the projected revolt. Henri declares his love to H       and swears to avenge the death of her beloved brother. A messenger arrives from de Montfort bringing an invitation to Henri to attend a ball. He indignantly refuses it, and is surrounded by soldiers and led away.

Procida returns to learn of this new mishap, but he sees an opportunity of stirring up feeling against the French in the betrothal festivity which is about to take place, and for which a crowd can be seen approaching. He will suggest to the French that they carry off the young women, an outrage which may perhaps rouse the Sicilians from their apathy. Couples in festive attire dance a tarantella, but Procida's plan works all too well, and in a moment the French soldiers have fallen on the women, carried off some and put the rest to flight.

Only a few patriots are left behind with Procida and H       and together in half-strangled sentences they give vent to their feelings, which are further exacerbated by the sound of a complacent barcarolle being sung at sea by a boat-load of French pleasure-seekers. The two choruses combine effectively as the act comes to an end.

Act III. De Montfort is found alone in his palace. He reflects on the injustice he did years ago to the woman who became the mother of his son but escaped from him and brought up that son to hate his father as the oppressor of the Sicilians. Now, on her death-bed, she has written to him that the son he has not seen for eighteen years is no other than Henri, his sworn enemy. De Montfort's soliloquy 'Au sein de la puissance' (In braccio alle dovizie) gives effective expression to his indecision and agony of mind, and is in many ways more satisfactory than the big duet between de Montfort and his newly found son which immediately follows it. Here occurs the tune first heard on the cellos in the overture, which, memorable though it is, has more than a little complacency about it when heard in its proper context – and complacency is the last thing felt by either father or son in their peculiar predicament.

The scene ends with Henri calling on his mother's memory, but at the beginning of the ballroom scene he is apparently sufficiently reconciled, at any rate temporarily, to accompany his father to the great hall, where together they watch the lengthy ballet of the seasons, which de Montfort has planned for the entertainment of his guests. This is a French ballet on a grand scale and, whatever its importance to the devotees of Grand Opera in its heyday, it tends nowadays to impress listeners mostly with its length – it lasts for half an hour – and the way it holds up the dramatic action at a crucial point.

Amongst the invited guests are to be seen a number of masked figures with silk ribbons fastened to their cloaks. These are the Sicilian conspirators, led by Procida and H      . The tension of Henri's predicament – whether to allow his father to be murdered, or to betray his friends – is skilfully suggested by the snatched conversations he has with H       and Procida in the midst of the general festivity. Finally, he makes an attempt to warn de Montfort that his life is in danger, but the governor refuses to leave the ball. When Procida advances upon him, Henri steps in between, the conspirators are arrested, and the act ends with an impressive concerted piece, in which the Sicilians unite in cursing the treachery of Henri.

Act IV. The great courtyard of the fortress. Henri has come, armed with a pass from de Montfort, to see the prisoners. In a sombre E minor aria, 'O jour de peine' (Giorno di pianto), he reflects on the situation he is in, when his dearest friends are likely to look upon him as their worst enemy. The thought of H      's hate is too much for him, he thinks he hears her coming up from her cell, and in an ecstasy he prays for her forgiveness. When H       appears, she does in fact greet him as a traitor, and repeats his words, 'Malheureux et non coupable' (Non son reo) after him ironically, until he admits to her that their enemy is his own father. Her tone changes to one of pity, and later she admits in a ravishing Bellini-like cantilena that her greatest sorrow in prison was the necessity to think of the man she loves as a traitor. Their music takes on the character of a love duet, before Procida is led out of the prison by the guards. He sees Henri, but ascribes his apparent repentance to yet another treacherous trick.

Les vêpres siciliennes (English National Opera, 1984, director John Dexter, designer Josef Svoboda).
Rosalind Plowright as Héléne in the final scene.

De Montfort enters and orders that the preparations for the double execution shall go forward straight away, in spite of the pleading of Henri, who demands to die with them – such an honour, says Procida, is too great for so notorious a traitor. De Montfort bids Henri pay no attention to the insults of his erstwhile comrades; let him but remember that he is his son. Procida is stupefied at this totally unexpected revelation, and in a few moving phrases bids farewell to the country for whose ideals he has fought. His phrases lead to a quartet (with Héléne, Henri, de Montfort) of considerable beauty, which in its turn gives way to the execution music, heard already in the overture but now assuming considerable poignancy, with de Montfort urging that pardon will only be given if Henri will address him as Father. Henri is hesitant, Héléne and Procida emphatic that death is preferable to dishonour, and all the time the sound of the funeral hymn accompanies the victims as they draw nearer to the block and the headsman's axe.

At last Henri gives in to de Montfort's dearest wish, pardon is forthwith granted and with it a general amnesty. The troth of Héléne and Henri is announced, and the curtain falls on a general ensemble.

Act V. The gardens of de Montfort's palace. The wedding of Héléne and Henri is about to be celebrated. After a chorus, Héléne sings her well-known Bolero, 'Merci, jeunes amies' (Merce, dilette amiche), a lively and appropriate display piece. Henri joins her and sings a charming air, 'La brise souffle au loin plus légère et plus pure' (La brezza aleggia intorno a carrezarmi il viso), an entirely lyrical interlude in what is by no means otherwise a predominantly lyrical score.

Henri disappears and Héléne is joined by Procida, now more than ever the plotter with a dagger ever conveniently to hand, for whose over-simplified drawing Verdi so much reproached Scribe. He congratulates Héléne on having provided with her wedding the opportunity for the Sicilian patriots to fall on the unarmed French, and tells her that the ringing of the bells will be the signal for the massacre.

Nothing she can say will deflect the fanatic from his purpose and he defies her to denounce him to the French and so prevent the carrying out of his plan. Hélène's only reply is to refuse to go through with the wedding, much to Henri's consternation. There is an impressive and extended trio for Hélène, Henri, and Procida, which dominates the finale. De Montfort enters, sweeps aside Hélène's objections, the cause of which has not been revealed to him, and himself pronounces the betrothal, at the same time ordering the bells to ring out. The Sicilians rush from their hiding-places, and Procida's revenge is complete.

Les Vêpres Siciliennes has been much criticised and it is true that it does not reach the heights of Don Carlos or Simon Boccanegra. On the other hand, recent revivals have been attended by a good deal of success, and the unfamiliar music is in the habit of striking its listeners as vastly better than commentators have made out. In the first act, Hélène's aria and the unaccompanied quartet are brilliantly successful numbers, and in the second, 'O toi Palermo' is one of Verdi's most famous bass arias. De Montfort's monologue at the beginning of Act III is of an expressive quality worthy of Philip himself, and the choral finale after the attempted murder is most effective. The whole of the fourth act is on Verdi's highest level, the solo for Henri and that for Hélène in the middle of their scene together being outstandingly successful, and the moment of suspense before the execution most movingly done. The fifth act can seem rather long in performance, but Henri's lyrical tune and the large-scale trio are first-rate. H.

SIMON BOCCANEGRA

Opera in three acts and a prologue, text by Francesco Maria Piave, from a play by Gutiérrez. Première at the Teatro la Fenice, Venice, 12 March 1857, with Bendazzi, Negrini, Giraldoni, Echeverria, Vercellini. First performed in revised version (textual alterations by Boito), la Scala, Milan, 1881, with d'Angeri, Tamagno, Maurel, Edouard de Reszke, conductor Faccio. Revived Vienna (in Werfel's version), 1930, with Nemeth, von Pataky, Rode, Manowarda, conductor Krauss; Berlin, 1930, with Reinmar; Metropolitan, New York, 1932, with Müller, Martinelli, Tibbett, Pinza, conductor Serafin; la Scala, 1933, with Caniglia, Bagnariol, Galeffi, de Angelis, conductor Gui; Sadler's Wells, 1948, with Gartside, Johnston, Matters, Glynn, conductor Mudie; Metropolitan, New York, 1949, with Varnay, Tucker, Warren, Szekely, conductor Stiedry; Covent Garden, 1965, with Gobbi. Revived la Scala, Milan, 1972, with Freni, Raimondi, Schiavi, Ghiaurov, conductor Abbado, producer Strehler.

Amelia Boccanegra (sometimes called Maria, and under the name of Amelia Grimaldi during Act I).....Soprano
Gabriele Adorno, a patricianTenor
Simon Boccanegra, a plebeian, later Doge.....Baritone
Jacopo Fiesco, a patrician.....Bass
Paolo Albiani, a plebeian.....Baritone
Pietro, a plebeian.....Bass
A CaptainTenor

Place: In and Near Genoa

Time: Fourteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Simon Boccanegra was unsuccessful when first performed in Venice, and indeed Verdi himself referred to this first version as 'monotonous and cold', so that it is not surprising that he chose to revise the opera over twenty years after the first performance. At this time he had written Aida and the Requiem and plans for Otello already existed in his mind, and it was to Boito, as his prospective collaborator in the greater enterprise of Otello, that he entrusted the revision. In this version the opera has gradually and deservedly won its way into the international repertory.

Genoa in the fourteenth century was ruled by an elected Doge, who had hitherto always been chosen from the ranks of the patricians. Fiesco, who is in office when the story begins, has a daughter, Maria, who has fallen in love with a plebeian, Simon Boccanegra, and borne him a daughter. Simon's seafaring exploits, in the course of which he cleared the seas of the African pirates who so impeded the smooth course of Genoa's trade, have won him considerable fame but not the right to treat the Doge's daughter as his equal. Their child was looked after at Pisa by an old woman while he was at sea, until one day on his return home he found the old lady dead, and his daughter vanished. Since then, he has sought her in vain, and he does not know that she was found wandering on the sea shore by Count Grimaldi and brought up by him as his own child.

Prologue. Paolo, political leader of the plebeians, and Pietro, an influential member of the movement, are in conversation, the latter proposing that Lorenzino shall be the plebeian choice for Doge, the former suggesting that Boccanegra would be a better candidate. Pietro agrees to organise the people's vote for Boccanegra in return for honour and riches for himself. Boccanegra has been specially called to Genoa by Paolo, and agrees to accept the position, which should win him permission to marry his beloved Maria. The people are called together, and Paolo announces to them that Boccanegra is to be their candidate; they unite in cursing Fiesco, in whose palace they see mysterious lights.

The whole of this section is set to music that is extraordinarily suggestive of underground movement and conspiracy under the cover of darkness, from the mysterious prelude to Paolo's cursing of the haughty patricians and his sotto voce working up of the crowd in fear of the nameless doings in Fiesco's palace.

The square empties, and Fiesco leaves his home, lamenting the loss of his daughter, from whose death-bed he has just come. His noble, restrained cry of grief, 'Il lacerato spirito', with its moving orchestral postlude, establishes him straight away as a flesh-and-blood personality whose emotions may be subdued to his sense of position, but who is nonetheless anything but an insensitive, cardboard figure. He sees

cantabile

FIESCO

Il ser - to a lei de' mar - ti - ri

CHORUS

E mor - ta!

Boccanegra enter the square and confronts him again with an accusation of the wrong he has done Maria. It is the first of the two great duets between the adversaries, Fiesco's fury contrasting well with Boccanegra's pleading as he tells the story of the loss of the little daughter, which has robbed one of them of his only child, the other of the grand-daughter he has never seen (Ex. 2). Fiesco leaves Boccanegra, telling him that only the sight of his grand-daughter can bring peace between them. He watches from a distance as the distracted man knocks on the palace door, then, seeing it open, goes up, only to find that his Maria is dead. Boccanegra reappears to hear the plaudits of the mob, as they crowd into the square (to a most democratic-sounding march) and salute their new Doge.

FIESCO

(Ex. 2)

con forza

Qual cie-co fa - to a olt-raggiar-mi ti tra - e-a

SIMON

con espressione

Pa - dre mio, pie - tà, t'im-plo - ro

Act I. Twenty-five years have passed. Amelia, Boccanegra's daughter, is standing in the garden of the Grimaldi palace, near the sea. It is dawn, and she salutes the beauty of the scene and memories of her childhood in a gentle aria, 'Come in quest'ora bruna', whose shimmering accompaniment might have been sketched by a French Impressionist painter. She hears the voice of Gabriele, her lover, serenading her from a distance, and when he appears, tells him of her fears for his safety and that of Andrea (in reality, Fiesco in disguise), who she knows is plotting against the Doge. Her warning, and Gabriele's answer, turn to thoughts of their mutual love, which take on a greater urgency when Pietro comes to announce that the Doge asks to be received by Amelia on his way back from hunting, for no other purpose, as she well knows, than that of asking her hand in marriage for his henchman, Paolo. Gabriele resolves immediately to ask the blessing of Andrea, Amelia's guardian now that Count Grimaldi has been banished from Genoa for political intrigue, on their marriage. When he does so, Fiesco tells him the story of Amelia's adoption (he has, of course, no idea of her actual identity), Gabriele swears eternal love to her, and Fiesco blesses Gabriele in his affection for Amelia and his patriotic love of Genoa.

The Doge greets Amelia, shows her the pardon he is granting to Count Grimaldi, and asks her if she is content with her life of seclusion. She answers that she has a lover, and is pursued by one she hates – Paolo.

Simon Boccanegra (La Scala, Milan/Paris Opéra, 1976, director Giorgio Strehler, designer Ezio Frigerio).
Mirella Freni as Amelia, Piero Cappuccilli as Boccanegra.

In any case she confides to the Doge that she is not Grimaldi's daughter, but an orphan, whose only clue to her identity is a locket containing the portrait of her mother. With great emotion, Boccanegra comes to recognise it as that of Maria, and knows he has found his daughter at last. Their duet mounts in intensity, through Simon's lyrical reaction to the possibility of having found his daughter, until uncertainty gives way to proof, and he gratefully acknowledges her. The direct expression of the latter part of the duet gives way to unique tenderness as it comes to an end, and the orchestral postlude, with Boccanegra's final, ecstatic 'Figlia!' (Daughter) on a high F, makes a fitting end to a remarkable scene, one of the most rewarding in the long line of father-daughter duets in Verdi's operas – incidentally, one of the few pre-supposing a happy outcome. It remains only for Boccanegra to deny any hope of Amelia to the waiting Paolo and for Paolo to plot her abduction with his crony Pietro, before we return to the political struggle.

The finale of Act I, which plays in the Council Chamber of the Doge, dates entirely from Boito's revision, and amounts to fifty pages of vocal score, or almost one half of the entire act. It is one of the finest scenes in all Verdi, and an extraordinary and entirely worthy anticipation of the work of the composer and librettist in Otello; it has been not inaccurately said that if Otello had ever been depicted in council, this is how it might have sounded.

We find the Doge surrounded by the plebeian and patrician members of his Council (the former in the majority) and receiving emissaries from the King of Tartary, who pledges himself to keep his waters open to the ships of Genoa. He goes on to read and support a message from Petrarch, which urges that peace should immediately be made with Venice, which, like Genoa, acknowledges a common fatherland, Italy. Rioting is heard in the distance, and Paolo sees through the window that the crowd is dragging Adorno to the palace; the words 'Morte ai patrizi' (Death to the nobles) can now be distinguished. In a moment, the Council has divided itself into patricians and plebeians, each group with swords drawn. Simon hears the cry 'Morte al Doge', and sends his herald to open the doors of the palace and say to the crowd that he awaits them in his Council Chamber, if they wish to find him. The sound of the trumpet can be heard calling them to silence, but the herald's words cannot be distinguished, only the sound of 'Evviva il Doge' as he ends. It is a scene of breathless drama achieved by the simplest means, and the domination of Boccanegra is nowhere better shown than in his efforts to keep peace, not only in the city but within his own Council as well.

The mob rushes in, crying for vengeance on Gabriele Adorno and Andrea (or Fiesco), whom they drag into the Doge's presence. It seems from Adorno's own account that he has slain Lorenzino, who had abducted Amelia, and that before he died, the villain admitted he was the agent of a mightier man than he, 'a man of high position'. He is about to stab Boccanegra for the crime which he supposes to be his when Amelia, who has entered through the crowd, throws herself between the two men. Her story corroborates Gabriele's, but before she can name the offender, patrician and plebeian accuse and counter-accuse each other of the crime. Only Boccanegra's intervention prevents bloodshed. His great plea for peace and unity, 'Piango su voi, sul placido raggio del vostro clivo', leads to an extended ensemble, led by Amelia, who echoes the prayer that peace may return to all their hearts.

Adorno surrenders his sword to Boccanegra, who accepts it, before turning 'con forza terribile' to Paolo. He speaks with ever-increasing intensity of his determination to find the traitor who raised his hand against Amelia, and in a terrible voice calls on Paolo to join with him in cursing the villain. This Paolo cannot avoid doing, and his curse is taken up by the bystanders, in whom the scene seems to induce something approaching hysteria, to judge from their first forte cry of 'Sia maledetto!' (Let him be accursed), and the subsequent and ever softer repetitions. Boccanegra and his daughter are left alone at the end of a scene whose atmosphere has been at any rate partly induced by the uncanny nature of the principal motif, played by cello and double-bassoon.

Act II. Paolo is alone, a prey to acute fear of the consequences of his action and of the curse he was obliged by the implacable Boccanegra to deliver against himself. He sees himself as rejected by all, patricians and plebeians alike, but rears himself like a snake to threaten the absent Doge with the most terrible and the most secret vengeance at his command – poison. Fiesco and Adorno are brought in, and he offers the former his liberty if he will perform one vital action: kill the Doge. If he refuse, the details of the patrician plot will go forthwith to the Doge himself. Fiesco indignantly rejects the offer, but Paolo has one weapon left; as Adorno prepares to leave with Fiesco, he asks him if he knows that Amelia is here in the palace, as Boccanegra's mistress?

Adorno accepts Paolo's slander all too easily, and launches into a magnificent tirade in A minor against the Doge, who once ordered his father's execution and has now ravished the girl he loves. He prays, in the dominant major, that his fears may be groundless and that Amelia's love may still be his. Amelia comes in and he confronts her with the accusation, which she indignantly denies. She attempts to persuade him to leave, but the Doge can be heard approaching, and Adorno hides, still breathing threats of revenge.

Boccanegra notices that his daughter has tears in her eyes, and tells her that he knows the reason, which she has already revealed to him: she is in love. When he hears the name of Adorno, his worst fears are realised; Adorno is a traitor and a plotter against the state. She entreats him to pardon Gabriele, the Doge tells her to leave him, and wonders whether it is strength or weakness which prompts him to pardon an enemy. He pours water from the jug which Paolo has poisoned, drinks from it, and, in a sad phrase, reflects on the melancholy destiny of those who wear a crown. He feels himself falling asleep, and murmurs Amelia's name while the orchestra softly adumbrates the theme of their duet in Act I.

Adorno steps from concealment; the man who murdered his father and who is now his rival is at his mercy! But Amelia steps between the two men. Boccanegra wakes, takes in the situation and defies Adorno to kill a defenceless man. Gabriele says Boccanegra's life is forfeit in return for his father's. Boccanegra replies that his revenge is already complete since he has taken from him the thing in life that he values most, his daughter. Adorno is overcome at the news, and begs for forgiveness from Amelia, whom he says he has pursued with too jealous a love. He begs for death at the Doge's hands, in music whose virility and youthful, heroic quality is as good as anything of the kind Verdi ever wrote. Boccanegra's humanity does not desert him and he pardons his would-be murderer in a phrase whose nobility dominates the latter part of the splendid trio:

Warlike sounds are heard outside, and Boccanegra, remembering the conspiracy, orders Adorno to join his friends, whose rebellion has evidently started. But Adorno swears loyalty to the Doge and the act ends as he promises to do what he can to put an end to the fighting.

Act III. The scene changes from Simon's private apartments to a great hall, whose window reveals a view of Genoa harbour. The city is lit up with torches in honour of the crushing of the revolt. Fiesco's sword is returned to him and he is released. As he turns to go, he sees Paolo with an escort of guards, and learns that he took part in the rebellion and, when captured, was immediately condemned to death by Boccanegra – but Paolo can exult in the knowledge that the Doge will follow him quickly to the grave, slain by the slow poison he has prepared for him. The strains of the wedding hymn of Gabriele and Amelia can be heard, and Paolo is conducted to the scaffold with its sound ringing in his ears, leaving Fiesco full of regret that Boccanegra's end should be brought about in so treacherous and dishonourable a manner, but still determined to see him again.

A proclamation is read from the balcony, ordering that the lights be extinguished in honour of the valiant dead. The Doge himself enters the hall, already affected by the poison he has taken. The sight of the sea and the feel of the salt wind on his brow restore his confidence, and bring back to him memories of the life he once led as a free man on the sea he loved and understood so well. It is a moving, expansive moment, one of those pieces of unforced self-revelation in which this opera abounds, and whose beauty is so intense that one finds oneself waiting for them at every performance. Why, asks Boccanegra, did he not find death at this early, happy stage of his career? As if in answer to his question comes an echo from the concealed Fiesco. The Doge makes an effort to summon his guards, but Fiesco reveals himself as the ancient enemy long thought dead. It is the moment, not of Fiesco's revenge, but of Boccanegra's atonement, and he proudly announces that there can be peace between them now that in Amelia he has found the daughter he had lost. Fiesco's hate turns to pity for the man he knows has only a short time to live. As is appropriate the second of the two great duets is on an even more generous scale than that of the prologue, when Fiesco first imposed his conditions for reconciliation on the unfortunate Boccanegra. The passionate declamation of the bass is matched here by the mature, conciliatory tone of Boccanegra's music.

Boccanegra summons up strength to tell Amelia of her descent, and to appoint Adorno as his successor before he dies in the arms of his children and surrounded by his friends and counsellors. Fiesco goes to the balcony and announces to the assembled crowd that Gabriele Adorno is their new Doge; when they shout for Boccanegra, he reveals to them that he is dead.

Much has been made of the complication of the original libretto, and of the difficulty Boito apparently had in rationalising it, but the truth is that very little is needed to make the story entirely comprehensible, even easy to follow. Apart from a general tidying up of the dialogue, Boito was responsible for the finale of Act I, generally conceded to be the finest section of the opera. Verdi's revision was even more thorough. Details of the orchestration, of the vocal line, and of the harmony are altered all over the place, in much the same way as they had been in Macbeth but on a more extensive scale. Entirely new is the opening scene of the prologue up to Fiesco's aria (apart from Paolo's 'L'altra magion'); the introduction to Act I, the duet for Gabriele and Fiesco, the climax of the recognition duet, and of course the Council Chamber scene; Boccanegra's short solo in Act II and Paolo's Credo-like soliloquy which precedes it; the opening of Act III up to the entrance of Boccanegra and to a large extent the final quartet with chorus.

That Verdi entertained such high regard for the opera is perhaps to some extent due to his love for Genoa itself. Certainly his music communicates this love as well as the city's dependence on the sea. But the most remarkable thing about the opera is its central figure, a puissant character and among Verdi's greatest creations; all the way through, one cannot help but be impressed by the amazing consistency of the characterisation. Never before perhaps had a composer been wholly successful in putting the unspectacular quality of statesmanship on to the stage. Boccanegra is a mature creation, whose insight and integrity are expressed in music as well as in the drama. It is not only that Verdi has been provided with striking situations for his main character – the sudden recognition of a long-lost daughter, the cursing of the abductor, the falling asleep and waking to find his daughter's prospective bridegroom standing over him with a dagger, the confronting by his ancient enemy apparently risen from the dead – but that the music shows exactly the same consistent understanding that we are asked to believe was Boccanegra's. Not a bar of recitative, not a note in the great solos and ensembles in which he takes part but contributes to this picture of the central figure, which is in addition perhaps the most exacting baritone part Verdi ever wrote, certainly one of the most rewarding. H.

AROLDO

Opera in four acts, text by Francesco Maria Piave, based on his libretto for Stiffelio (1850), which was in three acts. Première Rimini, 16 August 1857, with Marcellina Lotti (later known as Lotti della Santa), Giovanni Pancani, Carlo Poggiali, Cornago, Gaetano Ferri. First produced New York, Academy of Music, 1863; London, St Pancras Town Hall, 1964. Revived Florence Festival, 1953, with Antonietta Stella, Gino Penno, Aldo Protti, conductor Tullio Serafin; Hamburg, 1954, with Anne Bollinger, Peter Anders, Josef Metternich; Wexford Festival, 1959, conductor Charles Mackerras; New York, 1961, Amato Opera Company, with George Shirley in the title role; Venice, 1985.

Aroldo, a Saxon knight (Stiffelio¹) Tenor
 Mina, his wife (Lina) Soprano
 Egberto, Mina's father (Stankar) Baritone
 Godvino, a knight (Raffaele) Tenor
 Briano, a holy man (Jorg) Bass
 Enrico, Mina's cousin (Federico) Tenor
 Elena, Mina's cousin (Dorothea) Mezzo-Soprano

Place: England and Scotland

Time: About 1200

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Verdi was already interested in the French and Spanish plays which were to become Rigoletto and Il Trovatore when he accepted Piave's suggestion of a French play less than two years old whose subject was the curious one, for a Catholic country, of a Protestant clergyman whose wife has committed adultery and whom he finds it in his heart, after her father has killed her lover, to forgive. This became Stiffelio, which Verdi in a letter of 1854 mentions as one of two operas which had not taken the public's fancy but which he would not like to see forgotten. The other is La Battaglia di Legnano. In 1856, he worked with Piave to revise the libretto, and in 1857 the revised work was produced as the inaugural production of a new opera house in Rimini. The outline of the story has stayed the same, except that time and place have been moved from early nineteenth-century Germany to England and Scotland around 1200, with the principal figures Crusaders rather than Protestant clergymen and their colleagues. Much of the music remains the same, although alterations are frequent, and one or two numbers have been re-written. The main difference comes in the final scenes of the two operas, Stiffelio's Act III scene ii being set in a church where the congregation first prays and Stiffelio later preaches on the gospel story of the woman taken in adultery before publicly forgiving his wife. Aroldo's Act IV, as will be seen later, provides quite a different ending for the opera.

Act I. After an effective overture whose slow opening section is dominated by a horn solo, the curtain rises to show a great hall in Egberto's castle. It is empty, but sounds of rejoicing come from within, the half-heard music making in the empty space a curious effect of foreboding, an impression not belied at the entrance of Mina, who in her soliloquy reveals the torment of a conscience labouring under a guilty secret: during her husband's absence, she has been unfaithful to him with Godvino, a guest in her father's castle. Her anguished recitative and heartfelt prayer could hardly be in stronger contrast with the bravura writing frequently heard in an introductory aria for a nineteenth-century opera's heroine.

Aroldo enters with Briano, who has campaigned with him on the crusade and is now acting as a kind of spiritual adviser. Aroldo immediately notices his wife's perturbed condition, but Briano leaves them alone together and there is tenderness in Aroldo's cavatina, in which he describes his longing for Mina while he was abroad. Mina punctuates his cavatina with exclamations of remorse, and Aroldo finally demands a smile of welcome instead of the tears with which she has greeted him. He notices that the ring his mother had given her has gone, and in a cabaletta denounces its loss.

Briano returns and takes Aroldo off to join in the celebrations for his return, while Mina, observed by her father who begins to suspect Godvino's role, resolves to confess all to Aroldo in a letter. Egberto interrupts, reads what she has written, and succeeds in persuading her not to confess her adultery to Aroldo in case the shock of learning of the family's shame should kill him.

The second scene takes place in the great hall of the castle. When it is left momentarily deserted by the knights and their ladies, Godvino, observed by Briano, comes with a letter he has written to Mina and leaves it in a huge locked book which lies on the table and of which he carries the key. Briano does not recognise Godvino except as a friend of Aroldo's, and, when Egberto and his daughter and then his son-in-law and the other guests re-appear, Briano describes what he has seen to Aroldo, but by mistake points out the man who hid the letter as Enrico, Mina's cousin. Aroldo is asked to describe the crusade to the guests, but instead he starts to talk about the book and the letter and then, in music which to some extent presages Otello, demands that Mina unlock the book that he may see what is inside. He breaks the lock and the letter falls out, but Egberto retrieves it and, denying it to Aroldo, himself destroys it. Aroldo's rage knows no bounds, but it is Egberto who orders Godvino to meet him later in the graveyard for a duel.

¹ The names of the corresponding characters in Stiffelio (page 875) are in brackets.

Act II. The ancient graveyard of the castle, with a church visible on one side and the castle on the other. The music is darkly suggestive, as Mina in a splendid aria prays at her mother's tomb, comparing the purity of her mother with her own guilt ('Ah! dagli scanni eterei'). Godvino comes to plead his love, but she orders him not to profane the place where her mother is buried, then demands that he give her back her ring. He refuses and insists that he will defend her in her predicament, but she makes it quite clear that she will have no more to do with him.

Egberto arrives to confront them and challenges Godvino to fight to the death. Godvino at first refuses to fight a man so much older than himself, but Egberto goads him, and they are separated only by the arrival of Aroldo. Aroldo greets Godvino warmly, but this is too much for Egberto who denounces Godvino as the man who has betrayed Aroldo's honour. Mina appears, cannot deny Aroldo's charge, and Aroldo's impassioned outburst of jealous fury is not unworthy of the Verdi of thirty years later. A most impressive quartet follows, at the end of which Aroldo challenges Godvino to fight him. Sounds of prayer come from the church, and Briano attempts to persuade Aroldo to temper his rage, as a Christian who has fought for his faith. Aroldo is still beside himself with fury, and the act ends as, in his emotion, he collapses unconscious.

Act III. An ante-chamber of the castle. Egberto, planning vengeance, finds that Godvino has escaped and in a fine aria bemoans the dishonour which has fallen on him and his family. He contemplates suicide, but Briano intervenes with the news that Godvino is back in the castle. One of them must die, says Egberto, and celebrates the prospect in a cabaletta of splendid impact, marked, most unusually, pianissimo, a direction Verdi underlines in a footnote in the vocal score enjoining the singer to sing it 'extremely quietly apart from the last phrase'.

Aroldo enters with Godvino and, demanding that he choose whether he values his own freedom more or the future of the woman he had betrayed, sends him to wait in a neighbouring room. Then he confronts Mina with the news that he himself will leave that very night and, so that she may be free to join the man she truly loves, he offers her a divorce. The duet is in Verdi's extended manner, and at its end

Mina signs the paper he offers her. Egberto rushes in with a blood-stained sword in his hand, having killed Godvino, and Mina stays behind to pray forgiveness while Aroldo goes into the church.

Act IV. The banks of Loch Lomond (sic), some time later. In the introduction, imitation bagpipes are followed by a huntsmen's chorus, and, as the sun sets, there is even a hint of 'The Campbells are Coming' – could Verdi have known it? In a rustic hut, Aroldo and Briano have retired from the world, and Aroldo admits to himself that he still loves Mina; as the sound of the angelus is heard, he and Briano join in the evening prayer.

A storm breaks out, stunningly portrayed in the music with pre-echoes of Otello, and from the boat which is driven up on the shore emerge Egberto and Mina. They go to the hut for shelter, and Aroldo immediately recognises Mina. He tries to repulse her, but Egberto urges that her trials in exile have brought her to a state of repentance, and Briano quotes the scriptures so that finally, after a short but impressive quartet, love triumphs – unexpectedly, in this quasi-tragedy.

Modern revivals suggest that Stiffelio is just as viable as Aroldo and that each has claims to figure among Verdi's unjustly neglected works. H.

UN BALLO IN MASCHERA

A Masked Ball

Opera in three acts, text by Somma based on Scribe's libretto for Auber's opera Gustave III, ou le Bal Masqué. Première at Apollo Theatre, Rome, 17 February 1859, with Julienne-Déjean, Scotti, Sbriscia, Fraschini, Giraltoni.

Gustavus III (Riccardo, Count of Warwick)¹ Tenor
 Amelia, Anckarstroem's wife Soprano
 Anckarstroem, the King's secretary
 (Renato) Baritone
Conspirators against the King
 Count Ribbing (Samuele) Bass
 Count Horn (Tommaso) Bass
 Cristian (Silvano), a sailor Baritone
 Oscar, the King's page Soprano
 Mlle Arvidson (Ulrica), a fortune-teller Contralto
 A Judge, Amelia's Servant, Populace, Courtiers

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

¹ Names for Swedish setting first, for Boston second.

The opera was written for Naples in 1858, and rehearsals were in progress when an Italian revolutionary, Felice Orsini, made an unsuccessful attempt on the life of Napoleon III, with the result that the performance of a work dealing with the assassination of a king was forbidden. In spite of protests and the popular slogan 'Viva Verdi!' (= Viva Vittorio Emmanuele Re D'Italia), the opera was withdrawn, but mounted a year later in Rome, when Verdi accepted the unlikely setting of Boston for the assassination of an English Governor in place of the historical Swedish monarch.

Ballo has been claimed as the best-shaped opera of Verdi's middle period, with a precise balance between the music's romantic and tragic elements on the one hand and its strongly ironic characteristics on the other, the latter evinced not only in what the conspirators (particularly at the end of Act II) and Oscar have to sing, but most of all in the well characterised musical picture of the tenor hero. The actual King Gustavus III of Sweden was a liberal in politics and a lover of the arts, married but homosexual, but Verdi's portrait is more conventional. Nothing could be more romantic than his opening aria, the love duet, or the aria in the last act, but this monarch rejects the portentous and in the opera constantly brings the music to the boil with his exuberance, never running the risk of taking himself too seriously, as seen particularly in his mocking reaction to Arvidson's prophecy of doom. For Oscar, his page, Verdi seems to have taken something from the lighter world of French opera and Oscar is evidently licensed to mock pretension of any kind. Amelia and Anckarstroem, given a wealth of splendid music, are figures less strikingly characterised, but the music associated with King and page brings a colour to this musical suggestion of a historical court which is unlike anything else in Verdi.

The short prelude is concerned with Court, conspirators, and the love of the King for Amelia.

Act I. A hall in the palace. Conspirators (Ribbing and Horn) mutter through the opening chorus but the King is overjoyed to notice on a list of invitations to a masked ball the name of his beloved Amelia, wife of his faithful secretary, Anckarstroem ('La rivedrà nell'estasi'). Anckarstroem warns the King that the court contains plotters as well as loyal subjects and a judge denounces a certain Mlle Arvidson for sorcery.

Un ballo in maschera. Jussi Björling as Riccardo/King Gustav III, New York, 1941.

Oscar takes her side ('Volta la terrea') and the King decides to go in disguise to investigate whether she is genuine or not.

Arvidson's abode. The sorceress conjures a spell for the crowd ('Re dall'abisso, affrettati!'), the King arrives, and Arvidson finishes her solo in a mood of exaltation. She predicts good fortune for a young sailor, and the King fulfils the prophecy by slipping a note into his pocket. Next, none other than Amelia is advised to cure a guilty love by gathering a herb at the foot of the public gallows (trio). The courtiers, in disguise like the King, arrive and he in a barcarolle ('Di tu se fedele') asks Arvidson to foretell his future. He will die by the hand of a friend, she predicts. The King pokes fun at the whole issue (Quintet: 'È scherzo, od è follia') and when it is further foretold that his murderer will be the first to shake his hand and this turns out to be Anckarstroem, he mocks the sorceress for failing to recognise him. The finale starts with a 'National Anthem' theme but ends in high spirits as the King and his page take over.

Act II. Midnight, beside the gallows. Amelia, heavily veiled, comes to pick the magic herb and in a magnificent aria betrays her nervousness and desperate need for reassurance ('Ma dall'arido stela divulsa'). The duet with the King which follows sees her initial reticence blossom into an admission of love, and is one of the most expansive Verdi ever wrote. At its end, Anckarstroem, who has heard that murderers are on the King's tracks, comes to rescue him and the apparently unknown woman. In a short, agitated trio they discuss escape, and the finale is concerned with the unsuccessful efforts of Anckarstroem to get his (still unrecognised) wife past the plotters, her unmasking and the consequent rage of the one and remorse of the other. With the mocking laughter of the conspirators, this is one of Verdi's most fascinating scenes. During its course Anckarstroem makes an assignation with the leaders of the conspiracy to meet at his house next day.

Act III. A room in Anckarstroem's house. Anckarstroem intends to kill Amelia but yields to her plea ('Morrò, ma prima in grazie') that she may first say goodbye to their son. The King is the more guilty of the two, he decides, and in a dramatic recitative and grandiose aria, 'Eri tu', inveighs against him. Anckarstroem receives the leaders of the conspiracy and agrees to make common cause with them, Amelia draws lots to decide who shall kill the King at tonight's masked ball – Anckarstroem's name emerges – and finally there is a brilliant solo for Oscar which becomes a quintet of reaction to the news of that night's party.

The last scene, at the masked ball, is preceded by an aria for Gustavus, introspective in the recitative and full of romantic stress in the aria ('Ma se m'è forza perderti'), in which he declares his intention to send Amelia and her husband on a foreign mission.

The masked ball works up the tension slowly but unerringly: a dramatic recitative from the King, chorus and dancing, then Oscar's brilliant solo in reply to Anckarstroem's question about Gustavus's disguise: 'Saper vorreste'. Much of the scene is carried on over dance music and the farewell duet between the King and Amelia is particularly moving, as is the King's death. A shot rings out, Gustavus falls into the arms of Oscar, Amelia rushes to him, the dance music stops, he forgives his enemies and dies.

H.

LA FORZA DEL DESTINO

The Force of Destiny

Opera in four acts, text by Francesco Maria Piave, founded on a Spanish drama by the Duke of Rivas, Don Alvaro o La Fuerza de Sino. Première, St Petersburg, 10 November 1862, with Barbot, Didiée, Tamberlik, Graziani, Angelini. First performed New York, 1865; London, Her Majesty's Theatre, 1867, with Tietjens, Trebelli, Mongini, Santley, Gassie, conductor Arditi. Revived Metropolitan, 1918, with Ponselle, Caruso, de Luca, Mardones, conductor Papi; 1942, with Milanov, Baum, Tibbett, Pinza, conductor Bruno Walter; Dresden, 1926, with Seinemeyer, Pattiera, Burg, Plaschke, conductor Fritz Busch; Vienna, 1926, with Angerer, Piccaver, Schipper, Mayr; la Scala, 1928, with Scacciati, Merli, Franci, Pasero, conductor Toscanini; Covent Garden, 1931, with Ponselle, Pertile, Franci, Pasero, conductor Serafin; la Scala, 1949, with Barbato, Filippeschi, Silveri, Christoff, conductor de Sabata; Metropolitan, New York, 1952, with Milanov, Tucker, Warren, Siepi; Covent Garden, 1962, with Cavalli, Bergonzi, John Shaw, Ghiaurov, conductor Solti.

Donna Leonora di Vargas.....Soprano
 Preziosilla, a gipsy.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Don Alvaro.....Tenor
 Don Carlo di Vargas, Leonora's brother.....Baritone
 Padre Guardiano, a Franciscan monk.....Bass
 Marchese di Calatrava, Leonora's father.....Bass
 Fra Melitone, a Franciscan monk.....Baritone
 Curra, Leonora's maid.....Mezzo-Soprano
 The Mayor of Hornachuelos.....Bass
 Trabuco, a muleteer.....Tenor
 A Surgeon.....Tenor

Place: Spain and Italy

Time: Middle of the Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 20 minutes

After Ballo, Verdi, newly married, preoccupied with his estate and his support for Garibaldi's increasingly successful campaign for Italian independence, seemed determined to retire from the operatic arena. When the great tenor Enrico Tamberlik, a regular singer in St Petersburg, wrote to ask him if he would write an opera for Russia, the omens seemed unpropitious, but Verdi was inclined to seek new pastures and even the censor's uncompromising refusal to allow Victor Hugo's Ruy Blas as subject was not enough to deter him. He settled on a Spanish drama by the Duke of Rivas, a writer from the same liberal and romantic school as Victor Hugo though with less than Hugo's talent. Julian Budden neatly describes one half of the antagonists: the Calatravas

'swing from one vehement extreme to another without any transition of mood. They are twice as large as life and half as life-like'.

Forza is customarily criticised for its rambling libretto, and because the destiny which is proclaimed in the title tends to be replaced in the story by the less compelling factor of coincidence. Francis Toye is at some pains to point out that Rivas's play, Don Alvaro, is dominated by the principle of the blood-feud, in which facts were more important than intentions, and that to understand the original significance of the play entails an imaginative reconstruction of this outmoded attitude. He also suggests that Rivas, a liberal, may have intended to show that life should be influenced by other considerations than that of the honour of noble Spanish families – in any case, his scenes of popular life were, like Verdi's, particularly successful.

In spite of a good if not outstanding success in St Petersburg, Verdi was not entirely happy with his new opera and contemplated modifications and a new ending. By 1868 when he was minded to effect these changes, his librettist Piave had suffered a stroke; Antonio Ghislanzoni undertook the alterations which were first heard at la Scala in February 1869 (an event which marked a rapprochement with that theatre), with Teresa Stolz and Mario Tiberini as Leonora and Don Alvaro, described by the composer in a letter as no less than superb.

The overture is a vividly exciting affair, probably Verdi's best, dominated by Leonora's aria from Act II, and the music concerned with 'fate' (Ex.1). Reference is also made to Alvaro's cantabile con espressione (in A minor) from the fourth-act duet, and to themes from the duet between Leonora and Padre Guardiano.

Act I. Leonora's room. She says goodnight to her father but is overcome with remorse at the idea of leaving him so precipitately – for she has arranged that very night to elope with her lover, Don Alvaro. In an aria, 'Me pellegrina ed orfana', she pictures her friendless lot in a foreign country, for which even the prospect of marriage with her lover cannot console her. It is late; he surely won't come now – but no sooner are the words out than the sound of his horses can be heard and he bounds in through the window, proclaiming his eternal love. His passionate description of the preparations for their elopement provokes, after a little hesitation, an equally demonstrative response from Leonora, but the delay is disastrous, and, before they can escape, the Marchese is in the room, denouncing his daughter's seducer. Alvaro protests his and her innocence, and throws down his pistol in token of surrender. It goes off and fatally wounds the old man, who curses Leonora as he dies.

Act II. Leonora has been separated from Alvaro in their flight. Each believes the other dead, but Don Carlo, Leonora's brother, is convinced that they are alive and scours the land to revenge himself on the sister who has brought dishonour to his family and on what he sees as the murderer of his father.

The first scene is laid in the inn at the village of Hornachuelos, where are gathered various village worthies, muleteers, servants and a mysterious student, who is no other than Don Carlo in disguise. The company revels until the meal is announced; Leonora appears for a moment at the door looking for shelter, just as the student says grace, but she recognises her brother and leaves. Preziosilla, a gipsy, comes in, telling the guests that war has broken out and that all should go off to Italy to fight the Germans. She sings flamboyantly in praise of war and its incidental delights, and proceeds to tell the fortunes of the assembled company, incidentally informing the student that his being in disguise does not fool her.

Pilgrims are heard outside, and all join in their prayer, not least Leonora, who observes from the door and prays to be saved from her brother's vengeance. It is a splendid piece of choral writing. Don Carlo plies the muleteer with questions about the traveller he brought to the inn, and is asked in his turn, since he is so curious about others, to tell the company his own story. This he does in a ballad: he is Pereda, a young student, who has followed his friend Vargas in his quest for the murderer of his father. The murderer, he says, has escaped to South America, and the sister of Vargas, whom the murderer seduced, is dead. The mayor says it is late, all bid each other good night, and the scene ends with a dance.

Leonora goes on her way and at the opening of the next scene we find her outside the monastery of the 'Madonna degli Angeli', near Hornachuelos, looking for sanctuary. In the most extended aria of the opera, she prays for forgiveness for her sin, and takes courage from the sound of the hymn which can be heard coming from the church. At the start can be heard the 'fate' motif familiar from the overture, then, after a dramatic recitative, the aria 'Madre, pietosa Vergine', whose climax comes with the great phrase (in the major) of which such use has already been made in the overture: 'Deh, non m'abbandonar' (Ex. 2). Leonora rings the bell, and Fra Melitone pokes his head through a window in the door. He is impressed to hear that Father Cleto sent her and will inform the Father Superior of her presence. He receives her kindly, and knows immediately who she is when she tells him who sent her. He warns her of the extreme loneliness of the solitary life she proposes to lead in the cave where once before a female penitent lived out her life, but she is determined to go through with her plan, and he agrees to allow her request. He himself will bring her food daily and she can ring a bell to summon help; otherwise, she will never again set eyes on a human being. He gathers the monks together and tells them that once again the cave will be occupied; no one is to approach it or make any attempt to discover the identity of the penitent.

Leonora's scene with Padre Guardiano is one of the finest in all Verdi, and belongs to the line of great duets. The expressive vocal line is enhanced by the contrasting nature of the various sections, whether it be the loose-limbed tune in which Leonora first tells of the gradual awakening of peace in her soul, or the closely knit E major duet in which Padre Guardiano immediately afterwards warns her of the danger she runs in living alone, the long sentences in which he urges her to draw closer to God, or the passionate phrases she employs to voice her thanks for the sanctuary she feels she has found. The finale (the short service in which the Father Superior blesses Leonora and warns the monks to keep away from her solitary cave) is the perfect pendant to a great scene. Padre Guardiano leads them in pronouncing a curse on anyone who violates the sanctity of the cell, and then the sound of Leonora's voice floats out over the male voices of the monks in the prayer to the Virgin, 'La Vergine degli angeli'.

Act III. The scene changes to Italy, near Velletri, where the fighting referred to at the beginning of the previous act is taking place. In the War of the Austrian Succession, Spain allied to the King of Naples drove the Austrians out of southern Italy. Don Alvaro and Don Carlo di Vargas, each under assumed names and unknown to the other, have enlisted in the Spanish contingent which is taking part in the battles. The sound of gambling is heard as Alvaro comes forward to sing his long recitative and aria, 'O tu che in seno agli angeli', one of Verdi's major inspirations. Alvaro's is a tortured and lonely soul, and the thinly accompanied opening phrases hovering between F minor and A flat major, together with the leaps of major and minor sixths and octaves, most acutely convey his neurosis – he has deserted the woman he loves after having inadvertently killed her father, and he alternately proclaims the shame of his mixed blood and prison birth, and the glory of his noble ancestry.

There is a cry for help, he rushes off-stage, and reappears with none other than his old enemy Don Carlo, whom he has saved from death at the hands of a gang of ruffians. Having exchanged false names, they swear friendship and go off together in answer to an urgent call to arms.

The scene changes, and we see a military surgeon surrounded by soldiers watching the battle from a distance. Victory is to the Italians and the Spaniards, but Don Carlo brings in Alvaro grievously wounded. When Carlo seeks to give his friend the military decoration of the order of Calatrava, he shudders at the name, but a moment later he entrusts Carlo with his last instructions. He has a small casket which contains a letter and which must be burnt unopened after his death; will his friend do this for him? Carlo swears to carry out the commission faithfully. The duet, 'Solenne in quest'ora', has become world-famous, partly perhaps initially because of the celebrity of the recording made of it by Caruso and Scotti, but also because of its graceful tune and remarkably apt relationship to the situation.

Alvaro is carried away by the surgeon, and Carlo reflects on the secret which lies hidden in the fateful box. His friend trembled at the name of Calatrava; could it be his enemy in disguise? He soliloquises on the temptation the casket presents even to a man of honour, 'Urna fatale del mio destino', but finds a portrait inside which no oath prevents him from inspecting. It is Leonora's! The secret is out, and his newly found friend is recognised as his old enemy! At this moment a messenger tells him that Alvaro's life is saved; he rejoices at the prospect of revenge.

The scene changes to a military camp near Velletri. A patrol passes, and as dawn approaches Don Alvaro can be seen crossing the camp. Carlo calls him, and asks him if he is strong enough to fight a duel. With whom? Has he had no message lately from Don Alvaro, the Indian? Alvaro's protests and offers of friendship are in vain; Carlo insults him until he has provoked the duel he is seeking, only to be interrupted by the patrol on its way home. Alvaro, left alone, resolves to seek sanctuary in a monastery. The scene is in the splendid tradition of Verdian duets for tenor and baritone and it is to be regretted that Italian custom was for so long to omit it altogether. In any case, the duet is in a false position, as Toye points out, and was originally designed to end the act.

It is dawn. Soldiers polish their equipment, pedlars offer their wares, food and drink is for sale, and Preziosilla offers to tell fortunes until the appearance of a band of recruits gives her an opportunity of leading a tarantella in an effort to dispel their gloom. Mixed up in the dance is Fra Melitone, who extricates himself and treats the company to a discourse on its several vices, the whole thing dressed up in a series of outrageous puns. The soldiers make an attempt to give him a drubbing, but Preziosilla interrupts to sing a spirited 'Rataplan', which ends the act.

Act IV. The scene shows the cloister of the Convent of the 'Madonna degli Angeli', where a crowd of beggars is assembling to collect the free soup which the monks regularly dole out. Fra Melitone is in charge, and his marked lack of patience and intense annoyance at being compared unfavourably by the crowd with Padre Raffaello (in reality Alvaro in disguise) make him more than usually short-tempered. Finally, he can't bear any more of their torments and importunities, and kicks over the cauldron with what remains of the soup inside. The Father Superior, who has been watching, reproaches him gently for lack of patience, and bids him not complain if Raffaello be preferred to him. Melitone says he likes Raffaello but cannot understand his odd, haunted look – caused, says the Father Superior, by his frequent fasts and his concentration on his duty.

The music of Melitone is always cited as among the most interesting in Forza, as giving a foretaste of the methods Verdi employed years later when writing Falstaff. The rhythms and orchestral accompaniment as well as the shape of the vocal line certainly suggest an entirely new type of character for Verdi.

The monastery door-bell rings violently, and Melitone admits Don Carlo himself, asking for Padre Raffaello. Melitone says there are two of that name in the monastery, but from the description he easily knows which is meant. He goes off to fetch him, while Don Carlo reflects on how his hatred for Alvaro was sufficient to penetrate the most unlikely of hiding-places. Alvaro comes in, Carlo discloses himself and immediately challenges him to a duel, producing two swords from under his cloak. Alvaro pleads with him to renounce thoughts of vengeance and believe what he now hears from the mouth of a priest, that his sister Leonora was never dishonoured, that he has nought to avenge but the misfortune which has dogged them both. Alvaro will even do what he says he has never before done, kneel at Don Carlo's feet. Carlo says this act proclaims the baseness of his birth and for a moment Alvaro's feelings threaten to get the better of him, but he chokes back his anger until Carlo strikes him across the face, branding him a coward. Alvaro's vows are forgotten; he is ready to fight! They rush off to expiate the blood-feud which has dogged their steps so long.

The duet is a splendid passage, perhaps the finest for tenor and baritone Verdi achieved before the days of Otello. It is immediately followed by a quick change of scene; the 'fate' motif sounds, and Leonora is seen outside her grotto. In great long phrases of supplication she prays for the peace which she has never known since the day she first secluded herself from the world: 'Pace, pace, mio Dio'. She sees the bread which has been left for her and which serves only to prolong, as she says, a wretched life. Suddenly, the sounds of fighting can be heard, and, calling down a curse on whoever dares to profane her solitude, she rushes back to her cell.

In a moment, the voice of Carlo can be heard begging for absolution; he is wounded, and Alvaro, distraught that he has once again Vargas blood on his hands, bangs on the door of Leonora's cell for help. Leonora rings the bell in her alarm but a moment later appears and is recognised by Alvaro, who tells her what has happened. She goes to the spot where her brother lies and a few seconds later her cry is heard as Carlo stabs her, revenge even at his last moment uppermost in his mind. Alvaro can restrain himself no longer when he sees Leonora supported by Padre Guardiano, and he curses the fate which has brought so much misery on them all. The old Father Superior in music of great nobility bids him not to curse but to prostrate himself before the might of Heaven, whither the angel, who now lies dying, is going. In the presence of her lover and of the old priest who brought her such salvation as earth can offer, Leonora dies, and so expiates the curse which fell on them all with the death of her father. H.

DON CARLOS

Opera in five acts, text by G. Méry and C. du Locle (in French), after Schiller. Première at Opéra, Paris, 11 March 1867, with Marie Sass, Gueymard, Morère, Jean-Baptiste Faure, Obin, David, conductor Emil Perrin. First performed at Covent Garden, 1867,¹ with Pauline Lucca, Fricci, Naudin, Grazziani; New York, 1877. Produced in Italian in four acts (but re-worked with du Locle and only turned into Italian after revision was finished), at la Scala, Milan, 1884, with Bruschi-Chiatti, Pasqua, Tamagno, Lhérie, Silvestri, Navarrini. Revived Metropolitan, 1920, with Ponselle, Matzenauer, Martinelli, de Luca, Didur (later Chaliapin), conductor Papi; la Scala, 1926, with Scacciati, Cobelli, Trantoul, Pasero, conductor Toscanini; Vienna, 1932 (in revised version by Werfel), with Ursuleac, Rünger, Völker, Schipper, Manowarda, conductor Krauss; Covent Garden, 1933, with Cigna, Giani, Lappas, Rimini, Autori, Tomei, conductor Beecham; Florence Festival, 1950, with Caniglia, Stignani, Picchi, Silveri, Christoff, Neri, conductor Serafin (five acts);² Metropolitan, 1950,³ with Delia Rigal, Barbieri, Björling, Merrill, Siepi, Hines, conductor Stiedry (four acts); Covent Garden, 1958, with Brouwenstijn, Barbieri, Vickers, Gobbi, Christoff, Langdon, conductor Giulini, producer Visconti (five acts); Salzburg Festival, 1958, with Jurinac, Christa Ludwig, Fernandi, Bastianini, Siepi, under Karajan (four acts); la Scala, Milan, 1978 (five acts, with additions), with Freni, Obraztsova, Carreras, Cappuccilli, Ghiaurov, Nesterenko, conductor Abbado; Covent Garden, 1996 (in French), with Karita Mattila, Roberto Alagna, José van Dam, Thomas Hampson.

Elisabeth (Elisabetta) de Valois, later Queen of Spain.....Soprano
 Princess Eboli, her lady-in-waiting.....Mezzo-Soprano Don Carlos (Carlo), heir to the Spanish throneTenor
 Rodrigue (Rodrigo), *Marquess of Posa*Baritone
 Philippe (Filippo; Philip) II, *King of Spain*Bass
 The Grand InquisitorBass
 A MonkBass
 Thibault (Tebaldo), *Elisabeth's page*Soprano
 Count LermaTenor
 The Royal HeraldTenor
 A Heavenly VoiceSoprano

Place: France and Spain

Time: Mid-Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 30 minutes

Don Carlos for many years suffered from an inherent disadvantage; it was written for Paris, in the five-act, display-conscious tradition which Meyerbeer did so much to establish at that house, and it was therefore too long for non-Gallic taste. In 1882–3 Verdi undertook, with Ghislanzoni, his librettist for Aida, to produce a shorter version, but this entailed, as well as the omission of the ballet music, the jettisoning of most of the important first act, which is hard to justify artistically. Since then, most satisfactory revivals of the opera have made an attempt at including the first act, whatever they may have cut later on,⁴ and the opera, with its magnetic subject, fecund musical invention, and splendid opportunities for leading singers, in the second half of the twentieth century has established itself close to the heart of the international repertory.

Spain is nearing the end of a war with France, and one of the conditions of peace is that the heir to the throne of Spain, Don Carlos (in reality, a near-psychopath, but represented in Verdi as well as in Schiller as a brilliant young man), would marry Elisabeth, the daughter of the King of France.

Act I. Don Carlos has come secretly to France to see

¹ Escudier for this production removed Act I and the ballet, reinstating Carlos's aria in the Garden scene of what then became Act II.

² First performance in this version at Modena in 1886. Andrew Porter describes it as 'a scissor-and-paste job, in which Act I as published in 1867 was joined to the four revised acts of 1883'. This was Florence's version of 1950, Covent Garden's of 1958, but there is no evidence that Verdi had anything to do with it, though he must have allowed it.

³ Opening performance of Rudolf Bing's first season as General Manager of the Metropolitan.

⁴ In 1866, writing to Tito Ricordi, Verdi had insisted that Don Carlos be given complete; in 1874 he was angry at cuts made for Reggio; in 1875 he said that cuts for the Vienna production would be difficult.

*Don Carlos (Covent Garden, 1958, director Luchino Visconti, designers Visconti and Maurizio Chiari).
Act II: Boris Christoff as Philip II, Tito Gobbi as Posa.*

the bride who has been chosen for him. A hunt is in progress near Fontainebleau (there is no prelude to the opera) and Elisabeth and her page Thibault are separated from the main body of riders. They disappear in search of their companions and Carlos, alone, sings of the love which the sight of his bride has awakened in his heart. His romance was salvaged in somewhat reduced version when Verdi discarded Act I in his attempt at revision. Elisabeth reappears and Don Carlos offers to escort her home, saying he is a member of the staff of the Spanish envoy. He lights a fire and is questioned by the Princess about the young Spanish Prince to whom she is betrothed but whom she has never met. She fears for her marriage if love does not enter into it. Carlos tells her she need have no fear; the Prince will love her – and he shows her a portrait, which she naturally recognises as his. He declares his love, which she tells him she returns. Their duet, which was omitted in the 1884 version, is a particularly lovely inspiration, and the delicate beauty of Elisabeth's phrase, 'De quels transports poignants et doux' (Di qual amor, di quant'ardor), as she recognises the love in her heart, is something that can ill be spared, not only for its own sake but because it is used later in the opera in something approaching the manner of a motif (Ex. 1).

Allegro giusto cantabile

Di qual a - mor di quan - t'ar -
- dor que - st'al - ma è pien - a

Thibault returns and warns Elisabeth that the Spanish envoy is approaching to make a formal request for her hand in marriage for his master, the King of Spain himself, not for Don Carlos as had originally been arranged. The two lovers are filled with consternation, but Elisabeth accedes to the prayers of the crowd who beg her to acquiesce and so put an end to the war. The acclamations of the crowd mingle with the agonised regrets of Elisabeth and Carlos as the curtain falls.

Act II. In an effort to forget the misery of the world, Carlos has taken refuge in the Convent of San Yuste, where his grandfather, Charles V, before him had gone to end his days. Monks are praying before the tomb of the great Emperor, and one of them proclaims the uselessness of expecting peace in this life. Don Carlos remembers the curious stories to the effect that Charles V is not really dead at all but still living peacefully as a monk, and fancies he sees and hears a resemblance to his grandfather. The bass solo with the chorus is gravely impressive, the more particularly since this is the first contact we have with the influence of the Church, which is to be one of the dominating features of the opera. In the four-act version, at this point occurs Don Carlos's romance.

Carlos is overjoyed to see Rodrigue, Marquess of Posa, his greatest friend, lately returned from Flanders. Carlos confides to him that he loves none other than his own stepmother – will his friend turn from him at the news? Rodrigue expresses his determination to help him, and begs him to devote himself to the cause of the oppressed people of Flanders, and forget his own troubles in his efforts to right their wrongs. They swear eternal friendship, 'Dieu, tu semas dans nos âmes un rayon' (Dio, che nell'alma infondere amor), to a theme which is heard frequently throughout the opera (Ex. 2). A procession passes in front of the tomb, and the King himself is seen leading his Queen by the hand. The sight is almost too much for Carlos, but he is sustained by Rodrigue and by the voice of the mysterious monk, who leads the chanting. The scene ends with a reiteration of the friendship theme.

(Ex. 2)

Dio, che nell'alma in-fon-de-re a -

-mor-vo-les-tie-spe-me,

The scene changes to a garden outside the monastery. The Queen's entourage wait for their mistress, and Princess Eboli, supported by the irrepressible Thibault, whiles away the time by singing the song of the veil, a Moorish love-romance. With its ambitious cadenzas and rapid coloratura, it is a fine display piece for the mezzo-soprano.¹

The Queen leaves the church and makes her way to where her ladies are waiting for her. Posa is announced, and gives her a letter he has brought from her mother in Paris, at the same time slipping a note from Carlos into her hand. She reads the message, while Rodrigue takes Eboli aside to tell her the latest news from Paris. The conversation between the two and the asides from Elisabeth are carried on to the accompaniment of a graceful dance rhythm, which most successfully suggests the elegant court atmosphere. Elisabeth thanks Rodrigue and bids him ask some favour. He will, but not for himself. In a short aria 'L'Infant Carlos, notre espérance' (Carlo ch'è sol il nostro amore) he asks for her help and influence with the King in acquiring for Carlos what he most desires, an interview with his father. Eboli, who is in love with Carlos, is struck with the thought that the agitation she has noticed in him when she has been in attendance on the Queen may be due to undeclared love for herself. Elisabeth signifies to Rodrigue that she will see her stepson, and he contrives to manoeuvre the ladies out of hearing so that the interview takes place in private.

Carlos enters and greets his stepmother formally, asking for her influence in persuading the King to send him to Flanders. But his outward calm is not proof against contact with the woman he loves, and he bitterly reproaches her for her seeming indifference, which, she tells him, is no more than the duty she owes his father. In music of melting tenderness, Carlos shows that he understands her meaning, but it is clear that love for her still dominates his thoughts.

¹ According to Andrew Porter (Proceedings of Royal Musical Association, 15.iv.72) originally written in G when Eboli was cast before the Paris première with a young French mezzo-soprano; the aria was transposed up a tone by the composer when Pauline Gueymard, a soprano hardly less celebrated than Marie Sass herself, was given the role. This accounts, says Andrew Porter, for the role of Eboli – begun for an Azucena and completed for a Leonora – still proving so difficult for a single mezzo (or a soprano) to compass.

Per-du to ben, mio sol te - dolce 3
 - sor, ah! tu splen - dor di mia vi - perdendosi 3 3 3 ta!

Suddenly, he passes into a mood of exaltation and falls senseless at Elisabeth's feet (the only reference in the opera to the fits which appear to have been so common with the real Don Carlos). Elisabeth for a moment fears he is dying, but in his delirium he once again proclaims his love for her. Coming to himself, he takes her in his arms, but she tears herself away, demanding whether he means to murder his father and then lead his mother to the altar. With a cry of grief, Carlos rushes from her presence, and she is left asking for Heaven's assistance in her predicament.

The King leaves the church to find that the Queen, contrary to his strict orders, has been left unattended. He dismisses the offending lady-in-waiting. Elisabeth ignores the affront to herself, and does her best to console the unhappy woman in a tender aria 'O ma chère compagne' (Non pianger, mia compagna).

Philippe watches until the Queen withdraws, followed by her ladies, but bids the Marquess of Posa remain behind. Why, he asks, has so tried and trusted a servant of Spain never asked him for a favour – preferment, or even an audience? Rodrigue answers that service is his reward; but there is a favour he would like to ask, not for himself, but for others. He pleads for a relaxation of the measures being taken against the people of Flanders, who are even now dying by the sword and starvation. Only severity, answers the King, can cure such infidels and rebels of their heresies; and he cites the contentment and peace of the people of Spain as an example of what he hopes to bring to the Flemish. It is the peace of desolation that he brings, replies Rodrigue. Let the King beware lest history say of him: 'This man was Nero!' Let him instead build an empire founded on freedom. The King tells him his dreams are those of youth; but let him have no fear of the throne, rather beware of the Grand Inquisitor, not only for his own sake but because the King wants him as counsellor. He confides his fear over Elisabeth and Carlos to Rodrigue, who takes this confidence in him as a sign that happier times may be at hand for all whom he loves. With a last warning to beware the Inquisition, the King dismisses Rodrigue.

The second act is dominated by the two duets. That for Elisabeth and Don Carlos is a most moving affair, with its characterisation of Carlos's hopeless love for Elisabeth and the suggestive description of his delirium. The interview between Philippe and Rodrigue shows Verdi's mastery in setting to music not only the clash involved between differing personalities but also the logical type of argument which takes place when the personalities involved are what we think of as reasoning, intelligent beings.

Act III. A masked ball is in progress at the palace in Madrid (it was here that the ballet music originally occurred), and Carlos waits in the Queen's gardens in response to an anonymous note which he has received making the assignation. He sees what he thinks is Elisabeth, and pours out his love to her, until she unmasks and reveals that it is Eboli. He cannot conceal his dismay, and just as the watchful Posa comes upon them she accuses him of loving the Queen. Carlos, he says, is not well and can be held responsible for neither his words nor his actions; but Eboli is not deceived, and in spite of Posa's threat against her life, she promises to exert her power in bringing about their downfall. Posa persuades Carlos to give him any incriminating papers he may possess in case Eboli carries out her threats, and the curtain falls on a fortissimo statement in the orchestra of the theme of the oath of friendship.

The second scene is placed in the square in Madrid, where preparations are afoot for an auto-da-fé, the ceremonial burning of heretics at the stake. The people rejoice in the might of Spain as a procession of monks precedes the mournful band of victims of the Inquisition. The members of the court, headed by the Queen, enter in procession, and to the acclamation of the crowd and announced by a herald, Philippe himself comes ceremonially through the doors of the cathedral, the crown of Spain on his head. He repeats the oath which he swore before his coronation, to wage war against the enemies of the Faith. There is an unexpected interruption as six deputies from Flanders, led by Carlos, fling themselves at his feet protesting their own loyalty and that of his Flemish subjects but begging for relief from their suffering. The King is adamant in his attitude towards them, and an ensemble develops in which some of the court and part of the crowd join in begging for mercy, others, led by the priests, demand death for the traitors and heretics.

Don Carlos stands before his father and asks that he may begin his training for the Crown which will one day adorn his brow by being appointed the King's deputy at the head of his Flemish subjects. The King refuses a request that would create a weapon which might one day be used against Spain itself. Carlos in desperation draws his sword and announces that he will save Flanders; consternation fills the bystanders that he should have dared to draw his sword in the presence of the King. Philippe orders that he be disarmed, but no one dare obey, until Rodrigue, who sees that he is otherwise lost, quietly asks for his sword and gives it to the King. The procession advances, the sound of the monks singing the death-knell of the heretics can be heard, and over all a voice from heaven promises peace in the next world to those who are suffering in this.

Act IV. The first scene takes place in Philippe's own room, high above the altar of the Escorial. Here, for the first time in the opera, we see him alone, as man rather than as monarch. In his monologue he betrays his anxiety, more, his acute misery over the failure of his marriage, his loneliness not only as a king, because his state demands it, but as a man, because his wife has no love for him in her heart.

The Grand Inquisitor is announced, an old man, ninety years of age, blind but walking erect with the aid of a stick. He has been sent for; may he know why? The King explains that his son has offended grievously and has publicly taken the part of the heretic Flemish; he intends either to exact no penalty from him at all, or else to punish him with nothing less than death. If he decides on the latter alternative, has he the support of Holy Church in so extreme a measure? The Inquisitor says that God was not afraid to give His only Son that the world might be saved. Has the King nothing more to ask of him? No. Then it is his duty, as Inquisitor, to speak to him as the King. The fault of the impetuous Carlos is as nothing to that committed by the man he wishes to denounce: the Marquess of Posa. The King will not agree to sacrifice his new confidant, and is castigated by the Inquisitor as a man whose heart is not wholly given to God. Refusing to make any concession whatsoever, the Inquisitor goes his way, leaving behind him a sadder man.

No sooner has the Inquisitor left than Elisabeth rushes into the King's presence, demanding his help in regaining her casket of jewels, which has disappeared from her room. He asks her coldly if what she seeks is the casket on his table; on his instruction she opens it to reveal a portrait of Carlos. Philippe denounces what he describes as her adultery in phrases of ever mounting tension, and Elisabeth faints. Eboli and Rodrigue answer the King's call for help, and Philippe himself expresses his bitter regret at his rash and cruel suspicion. Eboli is stricken with conscience at what her jealousy of Carlos and Elisabeth has brought about – it was she who suggested the King look in the jewel case – and Rodrigue sees in the crisis a situation from which he can only rescue Carlos by taking his place as an offering on the altar of liberty. The Queen revives and voices her loneliness and desolation. The two men leave the room and Eboli throws herself at the feet of the Queen to confess a double fault: that she has excited the King's suspicions because of her own jealousy, and that she herself has been guilty of the adultery of which she suspected Elisabeth – she has in fact been the King's mistress. Elisabeth's dignity remains unshaken, but she orders Eboli to leave her presence for ever and to expiate her crime by choosing between exile and life in a nunnery. Left alone, Eboli pours forth her grief and misery at what her fatal beauty has brought about; one thing only remains for her before she leaves the court for the last time – she must do whatever is in her power to save Carlos from the threat of death which hangs over him.

The first scene of Act IV is one of the finest in all

Verdi's operas. A mere catalogue of what it contains is perhaps enough to give some idea of its varied, many-sided nature, and yet to suggest the strong dramatic line which runs through it all. It begins with the greatest of Verdi's bass arias, the scena 'Elle ne m'aime pas' (Ella giammai m'amo), a remarkable portrayal of the King's anguish and loneliness.

There follows the duet between the two basses, a uniquely varied piece of writing, whose strength is unsurpassed, one makes bold to say, in any operatic music. The clash of personalities is extraordinary, the King, bigot though he is, still relying on logic and reason for his argument, the Inquisitor, impregnable in his privileged stronghold, defying logic and argument in his religious conviction. At the end, after the King has twice made unsuccessful attempts at reconciliation or at least at a kind of working peace, his reserve breaks down, and in a mighty two-octave phrase spanning the bass's top and bottom Fs he demands rhetorically whether the throne must always bow the knee to the altar. The short scene between Philippe and Elisabeth, particularly the King's measured cursing of his wife's infidelity, is excellent, as is the equally brief but no less expressive scene between Eboli and Elisabeth, and the quartet which divides the two is equally remarkable. It is dominated by Philippe's rising phrase, but the Queen's revival from her swoon is exquisitely done, and the whole quartet is a fine example of Verdi's ensemble writing. To crown an act of almost unmatched richness, we have 'O don fatal' (O don fatale), a superb, economical piece of construction, which brings the act to an appropriate close and crowns Eboli's appearances in a blaze of musical glory.

Scene ii is set in Carlos's prison. To him comes Rodrigue, knowing that the letters from Flanders which were originally addressed to Carlos have been found in his possession and that his days are therefore numbered. He bids farewell to his friend in an expressive aria, 'C'est mon jour, mon jour suprême' (Per me giunto è il dì supremo). A shot rings out and he falls mortally wounded by an assassin who has crept into the prison after him and discharged his arquebus into his back. He tells Carlos ('Carlos, écoute'; O Carlo ascolta) that the Queen will wait for him on the following day outside the Convent of San Yuste and will see him for the last time. He dies happy at the thought that in Carlos a champion of liberty survives him. The act sometimes ends here.

Philippe makes an attempt to give back his sword to his son, but Carlos spurns him as the murderer of his friend. A noise can be heard; it is a mob which has gained entrance to the prison building, crying for liberty and the release of Don Carlos. Eboli herself is with them, making a last effort to save Carlos from the results of his folly. The people demand that Carlos be given up to them, but at this moment the Inquisitor appears as if from nowhere and castigates the crowd which has dared to raise its hand against the Lord's anointed; let them go down on their knees before him. Once more, the Church has come to the rescue of the throne.

Act V. The scene is the cloister of San Yuste. Elisabeth kneels at the tomb of Charles V. She sings sadly of the joys she once knew, of her native France and her love for the youthful Don Carlos, and of the sorrow she now has in parting from him for ever: 'Toi qui sus le néant des grandeurs de ce monde' (Tu che le vanità conoscesti del mondo). The wide-ranging melody shows Elisabeth in full stature as a mature person, and does something to give the lie to those who look upon this as not one of Verdi's most interesting heroines. The exquisite phrase, originally heard in the duet in Act I and since then associated with her youth in France, recurs as she remembers her past happiness. The aria finishes with a renewal of her prayer for peace, ending exquisitely ppp.

Elisabeth and Carlos meet for a last farewell, and recall the happiness that might have been theirs, turning their attention however from the past and present towards the future, which holds for Carlos a career devoted to the liberal causes that Rodrigue loved so well. It is the last of their three extensive duets, and worthy of the richness of the two that went before. As they take their leave of one another, Philippe comes from his hiding-place, seizes Elisabeth, and demands that the Grand Inquisitor, who is with him, shall do his duty towards Carlos. The old priest orders his guards to seize the prince, but Carlos defends himself and backs towards the tomb of Charles V at the rear of the cloister. Suddenly, a voice can be heard coming from it, and the Emperor himself

(or a monk in his guise) appears and takes his grandson into the safety of the cloister. The ending has been much criticised as a weakened version of Schiller, where Philippe hands his son over to the mercy of the Inquisition, and in some productions an attempt has been made to return to Schiller's original.

Don Carlos is a magnificent opera, weakened only by its unusual length. It contains Verdi's greatest bass role and one of the greatest of his mezzo-soprano roles; two superb singing roles in Elisabeth and Carlos; and an opportunity for a notable baritone to re-create out of the slightly reduced figure of Posa the great liberal of Schiller's play. It also contains one of the most perfect climactic scenes in all Verdi, the first of the fourth act, in which the diverse threads of the drama, which have been developed in the five preceding scenes, are drawn together. The two scenes which follow resolve the conflicts which it has brought to a head – in Act IV, scene ii, Catholic Spain v. Protestant Flanders, liberal Rodrigue v. established authority (Crown and Church), Church v. State; in Act V, Elisabeth v. Eboli (over Carlos), and Philippe v. Carlos (over Elisabeth and Flanders). With these five major issues at stake, it is hardly surprising that the opera is a long one, any more than it is surprising that the subject elicited some of Verdi's most memorable music.

H.

AIDA

Opera in four acts, text by Antonio Ghislanzoni from the French prose of Camille du Locle, on an original scenario by Mariette Bey. Première at Cairo, 24 December 1871; at la Scala, Milan, 8 February 1872, with Stolz, Waldmann, Fancelli, Pandolfini, Maini, conductor Verdi.

The King of Egypt.....Bass
 Amneris, daughter of the King of Egypt.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Aida, her Ethiopian slave.....Soprano
 Radames, captain of the Egyptian GuardTenor
 Ramfis, High Priest of IsisBass
 Amonasro, King of Ethiopia and Aida's father.....Baritone
 A MessengerTenor
 Priests, Egyptian Soldiers, Ethiopians, Egyptians

Place: Memphis and Thebes

Time: Epoch of the Pharaohs

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Aida was commissioned by the Khedive of Egypt for the Italian Theatre in Cairo (not for the opening of the Suez Canal as is sometimes supposed), and written in Italian from a French prose text on an original scenario by a French Egyptologist. Taking a cue from the Triumph Scene of Act II, Aida has often been the subject of spectacular productions, and the scale of the voices needed to do justice to the score supports this view. But a case can also be made for a sparer view of Aida. The prelude and the first scene (all but the finale) are concerned with soliloquies and private meetings, as is, a dance of priestesses apart, the dedication of Radames to his role as army commander in the scene which follows, and indeed the long encounter between Amneris and Aida in Act II. Act III is entirely an affair of solo, duet and trio, and the last act has Amneris in confrontation with Radames, Radames silent in face of his judges, and finally Radames entombed with Aida. Only the return of the triumphant Egyptian army in Act II scene ii is on a truly big scale, and perhaps the end of the opening scene when the citizenry wishes its forces well. Otherwise it is individual emotions, conflicts and resolutions with which Verdi is concerned. A slimline Aida may be rare, but is not self-contradictory and can be a revelation.

Act I. The prelude puts forward Aida, gentle and feminine, contrasted with the implacable Egyptian priesthood of Isis. Ethiopia has recovered quickly from war with Egypt and news has been received to the effect that an Ethiopian army menaces Thebes. In his aria, 'Celeste Aida', Radames hopes he will be chosen to lead the Egyptian army, not least because this might facilitate his plan to marry Aida. But the King's daughter, Amneris, as is plain from her entrance, is herself in love with Radames, and, in spite of feigned friendship, already jealous of Aida whom she has taken as her slave (trio). On to the scene come King and court; first a messenger brings news that Amonasro, the Ethiopian king, is himself leading the enemy forces, then Radames is proclaimed Egyptian commander-in-chief. General rejoicing culminates in a cry of 'Ritorna vincitor!' (Return as victor), which, the crowd departed, is paradoxically taken up in a magnificent aria by Aida, more immediately anxious for Radames's success than concerned for Ethiopian aspirations. Her aria ends with a cantabile prayer ('Numi, pietà').

The second scene is in the Temple of Vulcan, where priests chant, dancers celebrate, and Radames with some solemnity is invested with consecrated weaponry.

Act II. In Amneris's apartments, the princess, plainly languishing with love for Radames, is being prepared for the festivity which will welcome the now victorious army. Amneris commiserates with Aida over the Ethiopian defeat, advancing the (fictitious) news of Radames's death as comfort. Aida's despairing reaction provides Amneris with ammunition to taunt her slave that the King's daughter is her rival. There is no greater scene for soprano and mezzo in Italian opera.

Scene ii. Before one of the gates of Thebes, King and court assemble to greet the triumphant Egyptian army. Trumpets start the processional March – one of the most famous in or out of opera – and soldiers with trophies file past. Finally it is Radames's turn; he asks for the prisoners to be brought before the King, and Aida recognises her father, whose identity as leader remains hidden. Radames requests they be set at liberty, priests and populace demand death, while Aida, Amneris, Radames and Amonasro express conflicting emotions in a magnificent scene. The King announces a compromise: the prisoners will be freed with Aida's father remaining as surety; Amneris rejoices, and the King announces that her hand in marriage shall be Radames's reward for victory.

Act III. From the Temple of Isis on the banks of the Nile, priests chant as Amneris goes to pray before her nuptials with Radames. In an aria of subtle beauty ('O patria mia, mai più ti rivedrò'), Aida wonders why Radames has asked her to meet him here and yearns for Ethiopia. Before she can find out, her father confronts her with a demand that, if she would outflank her rival, she must discover from Radames the Egyptian army's route for the forthcoming battle. She recoils at the suggestion, he savagely denounces her prevarication, and his insistence wears her down. The meeting with Radames is partly one of the great love scenes of opera, partly pure seduction, as Aida entices him to agree they must flee together and then asks how they will avoid the Egyptian army. No love music could be more fragrant than Aida's, no triumph more complete than Amonasro's when he learns the chosen route. Radames is horror-stricken; Amneris and Ramfis denounce him as a traitor and, as Amonasro and Aida flee, he surrenders.

Act IV. A hall in the King's palace. Amneris, now bitterly regretting the doom her jealous denunciation will bring upon Radames, sends for him and interrogates him. In a passage as taut as advocates making points in a courtroom, she alternately implores Radames to exculpate himself and rages at his refusal to do so. When he is three times silent in face of a priestly accusation of treason, Amneris's fury is turned on his accusers in a passage which for sheer mezzo-soprano power rivals Ortrud's in the third act of Lohengrin.

Scene ii. Above, the Temple of Vulcan; below, a dungeon. Radames is, as he thinks, doomed to perish alone, but a voice utters his name: Aida has hidden herself to die with him. Their farewell to life ('O terra addio') has a stillness and finality that finds echo in the almost monotone Amneris, a desolate mourner in the temple above.

Aida stands as one of the romantic nineteenth century's operas which have best stood the test of time. It can be saturated with spectacle but the musical characterisation is unsurpassed; the tunes are immediate but the writing as subtle as if it were a string quartet; Aida is part seductress, part faithful lover; Radames as robust as a games captain but as un-selfseeking as a biblical hero; Amneris outwardly a power-conscious virago but inside a love-lorn maiden. The music is consistently of the highest quality and there can have been few performances in the last hundred-odd years without the 'house full' signs outside.

H.

OTELLO

Opera in four acts, text by Arrigo Boito, after Shakespeare's play. Première at la Scala, Milan, 5 February 1887, with Pantaleoni, Tamagno, Maurel, conductor Faccio. First performed in New York, 1888, with Eva Tetrazzini, Marconi (later Campanini), Galassi; Lyceum Theatre, London, 1889, with Cataneo, Tamagno, Maurel, conductor Faccio; Covent Garden, 1891, with Albani, Jean de Reszke, Maurel; Metropolitan, New York, 1894, with Albani, Tamagno, Maurel. Revived Covent Garden, 1926, with Lehmann, Zenatello, Stabile; 1928, with Zanelli; 1937, with Ciani (later Norena), Martinelli, Formichi (later Tibbett), conductor Beecham; 1950, by Company of la Scala, Milan, with Tebaldi, Vinay, Bechi, conductor de Sabata; 1955, with Brouwenstijn, Vinay, Otakar Kraus, under Kubelík. Revived at Metropolitan, 1902, with Eames, Alvarez, Scotti; 1937, with Rethberg, Martinelli, Tibbett, conductor Panizza. Revived at la Scala, 1927, with Scacciati, Trantoul, Stabile, conductor Toscanini; 1938, with Caniglia, Merli, Biasini, conductor de Sabata; 1942, with Caniglia, Lauri-Volpi, Stabile, conductor Marinuzzi; 1947, with Caniglia, Vinay, Bechi, conductor de Sabata. After Tamagno's death, Zenatello and Slezak became the leading international exponents of the title role, to be followed by Zanelli and later Martinelli, and (after 1945) by Vinay, del Monaco and Plácido Domingo. Other famous singers of the title role have included Pertile, Vickers, McCracken and (in England) Frank Mullings and Charles Craig.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Otello, a Moor, general in the Venetian army | Tenor |
| Iago, his ensign | Baritone |
| Cassio, his lieutenant | Tenor |
| Roderigo, a Venetian gentleman | Tenor |
| Lodovico, ambassador of the Venetian republic | Bass |
| Montano, Otello's predecessor as Commander in Cyprus | Bass |
| A Herald | Baritone |
| Desdemona, wife to Otello | Soprano |
| Emilia, Iago's wife and Desdemona's lady | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Soldiers and Sailors of the Republic, Venetian Ladies and Gentlemen, Cypriot Men and Women | |

Place: A Seaport in Cyprus

Time: End of the Fifteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

In the 1860s Arrigo Boito, a young man in his early twenties and a champion of the new (not least Wagner), caused Verdi deep offence, yet it was he nearly twenty years later who was to write for Verdi the libretti of his two last operas, Otello and Falstaff. It took years of coaxing on the part of his astute publisher, Giulio Ricordi, years of patient and skilful bridge-building on the part of Boito, before Verdi in 1879 was induced to contemplate Otello as an idea and just as skilful discussion of the musico-theatrical possibilities before the composer would admit to a genuine interest. He was nervous of committing himself, of being unable to finish what he had started, and the secrecy surrounding the project was as deep as if it were a military operation.

Nearly sixteen years elapsed between the appearance of Aida and that of Otello, and between the two only the composition of the Manzoni Requiem (1884) told the public that the veteran composer had not actually abandoned composition. The enthusiasm engendered by the opera's first performances gave way as the years went by to something closer to respect, but in the second half of the twentieth century a performance of Otello which did not sell out was a rarity and the opera has become as much a part of the repertory – in spite of the difficulty of casting the title role – as Don Giovanni or Tristan.

In Otello as in Macbeth, his previous Shakespearean opera, Verdi had a hand in the construction of the libretto, although Boito must have the credit for the remarkable feat of compression which has gone towards it. In Shakespeare's play there are nearly 3,500 lines; in the opera under 800. The Venetian scenes have been removed and each of the four acts plays without a break with (in the modern, not the Shakespearean sense) no more than a single change of scene (in Act III).

Act I. In the background, a quay and the sea. After the fortissimo crash of the opening chord, Otello's ship can be seen making for port through a heavy storm. Among the crowd of watchers who exclaim upon the danger to the vessel are Iago and Roderigo. The storm prepares vividly for our first encounter with Otello, who is, as it is obvious he must be, the dominating figure of the opera. His opening shout of triumph, 'Esultate! l'orgoglio musulmano sepolto è in mar', makes a splendid entrance, and shows the warrior in all his glory, unhurried and unrivalled, in a way that without the help of music is perhaps out of reach of Shakespeare.

Otello is acclaimed by the crowd, and proceeds to the castle followed by Cassio, Montano, and soldiers. The people start a wood fire and gather about it dancing and singing: 'Fuoco di gioia'. It transpires in talk between Iago and Roderigo that Iago hates Otello, to whom he is outwardly so devoted, because he has advanced Cassio over him, and that Roderigo is in love with Desdemona.

The fire dies out, the storm has ceased. Now comes the scene in which Iago purposely makes Cassio drunk, in order to cause his undoing. He sings a drinking song, 'Inaffia l'ugola', which Cassio tries unsuccessfully to repeat after him; under the influence of the liquor Cassio resents the taunts of Roderigo, which Iago has instigated. Montano tries to quiet them, Cassio draws, and in the fight that follows Montano is wounded. The tumult brings Otello to the scene, and, with an imperious call, he brings the brawl to an end (Boito's use of 'Keep up your bright swords' – 'Abbasso le spade' – at this point is evidence of his care for detail). Cassio is dismissed from the Moor's service and Iago has scored his first triumph.

Otello. The great tenor Francesco Tamagno (1850–1905) in the title role, which he created in 1887 in Milan; portrait by F. Keller, 1889.

The people disperse, quiet settles upon the scene, and Otello and Desdemona are alone. So far, we have seen only the man of authority, but in the love duet

Otello the poet is put forward with a persuasiveness that is to keep this side of him fresh in the minds of the audience, however low he may later fall. For the duet Boito has used lines from the Senate scene of Shakespeare's Act I, and also from Othello's welcome to Desdemona in Cyprus. This is Verdi's only full-scale love duet in which there is no sense of urgency or restriction; all the previous examples, however beautiful, have been either illicit or liable to interruption at every moment. In his music, the composer encompasses the sensitivity of both lovers, the mature yet impetuous Otello, the serene but passionate Desdemona, frequently giving them the same phrases to sing, yet always differentiating the one from the other with the surest and most delicate touch imaginable. Just before the close of the act, Otello embraces Desdemona; the musical phrase is used again before the end of the opera:

Act II. A hall in the castle. Iago, plotting to make Otello jealous of Desdemona, advises Cassio to induce the Moor's wife to plead for his reinstatement. When he is alone, Iago sings his famous Credo: 'Credo in un Dio crudel che m'ha creato simile a sè' (I believe in a cruel God, who has fashioned me in his own image). The lines and the sentiments are original to Boito, and the soliloquy could be thought of as simplifying the essential complications of Shakespeare's Iago – a mighty declaration of belief, nonetheless. Declamatory trumpets are conspicuous in the accompaniment.

Iago, seeing Otello approach, looks fixedly in the direction of Desdemona and Cassio, exclaiming, 'Ha! I like not that.' As in the corresponding scene in the play, this leads up to the questioning of him by Otello and to Iago's crafty answers, which not only apply the match to, but later fan the flame of Otello's jealousy. The temptation of Otello by Iago is set to music that is suggestive and fluid to a marked degree and the rising temperature of the music throughout the act is exactly calculated to fit the growing and unrelenting intensity of the play at this point.

Now comes the interruption of the madrigal; by its end, Otello is once more under the spell of Desdemona's beauty and transparent innocence, and is prepared to put suspicion behind him. But in a moment she has asked him to pardon Cassio, has asked again when he gently refuses to consider the subject at such a juncture, and then accused him of ill-temper in his answer. During the ensuing quartet for Desdemona, Emilia, Otello and Iago, the poison works, and at its end Otello dismisses Desdemona, but not before Iago has had the opportunity to steal the handkerchief on which so much of the rest of the plot is to hang.

Otello and Iago are alone again, and Otello voices his grief at his loss of peace of mind: 'Ora e per sempre addio' (Now and for ever, farewell). It is the equivalent of the play's farewell to arms, and the type of musical expression used here is far more straightforward than in the earlier part of the act, as befits Otello decided as compared with Otello perplexed.

Iago makes pretence of calming him, but to such a fury is the Moor roused that he seizes Iago, hurls him to the ground, and threatens to kill him should his accusations against Desdemona prove false. Iago ventures on a bolder step, and describes a dream he says Cassio has had while sharing a room with him. He talked openly in his sleep of his love for Desdemona, and Iago describes what ensued in wonderfully suggestive music. He caps it all by telling Otello that he has even seen the handkerchief, which Otello gave his wife when they were married, in the hands of Cassio.

Otello's rage knows no limits, and in music of relentless fury, he pledges himself to prove Desdemona's guilt, and to avenge it; Iago joins him in his oath: 'Si, pel ciel marmoreo giuro'.

Act III. The great hall of the castle. After a brief scene in which the approach of the ambassadors is announced, Desdemona enters. Wholly unaware of the cause of Otello's strange actions towards her, she again begins to plead for Cassio's restoration to favour. Boito has used Otello's insistence on the handkerchief while Desdemona urges Cassio's reinstatement, and combined it with part of the so-called 'brothel' scene. Upon her knees, Desdemona vows her constancy: 'Esterrefatta fisso', but Otello's mixture of fury, irony and hysteria proves too much for her, and she rushes from his presence.

Left alone, Otello soliloquises in the introspective mood of the temptation scenes ('Dio mi potevi scagliar'), and there is nothing of the character of the outburst at the end of Act II about his monologue until its close, when Iago re-enters and tells him that Cassio is at hand, and the music rises suddenly to a strident climax.

Otello hides and Iago brings in Cassio, who is led into banter about Bianca, which Otello half hears and takes to refer to Desdemona. During the course of the trio, Iago contrives that Cassio shall reveal the handkerchief so that Otello may see it (Iago has conveyed it to Cassio's chambers, after stealing it from Emilia). Cassio disappears when the trumpets are heard announcing the arrival of the Venetian ambassadors, and, in a few bars of music and with the acclamation of the crowd as background, Otello plots with Iago that Desdemona shall die that very night in the bed she has fouled.

The Venetian ambassadors arrive. There follows the scene in which the recall of Otello to Venice and the appointment of Cassio as Governor of Cyprus in his stead are announced. In the presence of the ambassadors, the Moor strikes down Desdemona, and all join her in a plea for mercy, at the end of which ensemble Otello orders them to leave the hall. Overcome by his rage and emotion, Otello falls in a swoon, while the people, believing that their deliverer is to return to Venice to receive new honours at the hands of the Republic, shout his praises from outside. Iago reaches the heights of his power with his triumphant 'Ecco il Leon!' over the prostrate body of the general who trusts him and has just granted him promotion, but whom he hates so much.

Act IV. Desdemona's bedchamber. There is an orchestral introduction of great beauty; then, as in the play, comes the brief dialogue between Desdemona and Emilia. Desdemona sings the pathetic Willow Song: 'Piangea cantando'. Her singing is interrupted as she talks to Emilia, and at its end she says good-night, the song dying away into silence as Emilia goes out, only to be called back by Desdemona's heartrending cry of 'Ah! Emilia, Emilia, addio!' It is the most moving moment of a moving scene.

Emilia leaves, and Desdemona kneels and intones an exquisite 'Ave Maria', beginning and ending in pathetic monotone. The violins end Desdemona's prayer on a high A flat, and double basses herald Otello's entrance with a pianissimo bottom E, five octaves and a half below. He moves towards Desdemona's bed, hesitates, and then kisses her three times. He vainly tries to force her to admit the crime he thinks she has committed, and then smothers her in spite of her pleas for mercy. The sound of knocking is heard and Emilia runs into the room crying that Cassio has killed Roderigo. She hears a dying gasp from Desdemona, and rushes from the room screaming that her mistress has been murdered. Cassio, Iago, and Lodovico answer her summons, and Emilia reveals Iago's villainy, which is confirmed by Montano, who has heard the confession of the dying Roderigo.

Iago escapes, and Otello seizes his sword from the table, defying anyone present to require it of him. 'Niun mi tema' he sings before addressing himself to the dead Desdemona in music whose pathos is doubled by its contrast with what has gone before. He stabs himself, and the music associated in the Love Duet with his kiss is heard: 'Un bacio, un bacio ancora, un altro bacio', before he lies dead beside his wife. In his last utterance he has resumed the nobility of the earlier part of the opera, and his death scene musically has much of the quality of the great closing speech of the last act of Shakespeare's play. K., H.

FALSTAFF

Opera in three acts, text by Arrigo Boito. Première at la Scala, Milan, 9 February 1893, with Stehle, Zilli, Pasqua, Garbin, Maurel, Pini-Corsi, Paroli, Arimondi, conductor Mascheroni. First performed Opéra-Comique, Paris, 1894; Covent Garden, 1894, with Ravogli, de Lussan, Olgina, Pessina, Arimondi; Metropolitan, New York, 1895, with Eames, de Lussan, Schalchi, Russitano, Maurel, Campanari, conductor Mancinelli. Revived at la Scala, 1921, with Canetti, Marmora, Casazza, de Paolis, Stabile, Badini, conductor Toscanini; 1936, with Caniglia, Favero, Casazza, Landi, Stabile, Badini, Bettoni, conductor de Sabata; 1950, with Tebaldi, Noni, Barbieri, Francesco Albanese, Stabile, Silveri, Siepi, conductor de Sabata; Covent Garden, 1926, with Stabile; Sadler's Wells, 1938; Cambridge Theatre, 1948, with Stabile, conductor Erede; Covent Garden, 1950, by la Scala company; Metropolitan, 1925, with Bori, Alda, Telva, Gigli, Scotti, Tibbett, conductor Serafin; 1938, with Tibbett, conductor Panizza; Salzburg, 1935, with Caniglia, Mason, Cravcenko, Dino Borgioli, Stabile, Biasini, conductor Toscanini; Covent Garden, 1961, with Geraint Evans, conductor Giulini.

Sir John Falstaff.....Baritone
Fenton, a young gentleman.....Tenor
Ford, a wealthy citizen.....Baritone
Dr Caius.....Tenor
Bardolfo (Bardolph), a follower of Falstaff.....Tenor
Pistola (Pistol), a follower of Falstaff.....Bass

Alice Ford, Ford's wife.....Soprano
 Nannetta, her daughter.....Soprano
 Mistress Page, Alice's friend.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Dame Quickly.....Contralto
 Burghers and Street-Folk, Ford's Servants, etc.

Place: Windsor

Time: Reign of Henry IV

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

If Verdi surrounded the writing of Otello with mystery, this was as nothing compared with the secrecy which shrouded its successor, which Verdi insisted, almost until it was finished, was being written purely for his own pleasure and with no thought or intention of public performance. The aged composer seems to have laid down the score with a feeling of real regret and a conviction that his life's work was ended with its completion. As far as opera was concerned, this turned out to be true, but the anything but negligible Quattro Pezzi Sacri testify to his continued energy as a musical creator.

In both Otello and Macbeth, Verdi and his librettists had kept as close to Shakespeare as operatic form would allow them; but in Falstaff, they contrived to inject a considerable measure of the great Falstaff of Henry IV into the veins of the Falstaff of The Merry Wives of Windsor, and so the operatic adaptation is in certain ways an improvement on the original.

Act I. A room at the Garter Inn – the 'Giarrettiera', as the Italian has it. Dr Caius comes to complain that Falstaff has beaten his servants, and that Bardolfo and Pistola made him drunk and then robbed him. Falstaff laughs and talks him out of countenance, and he swears that he will never get drunk again, save in the society of honest, sober people, noted for their piety. As he leaves after this grandiloquent statement, Pistola and Bardolfo, beating time as they do so, sing an antiphonal 'Amen', until Falstaff stops them with his complaint that they sing out of time.

He looks at his bill, compares the total with what is left in his purse, and starts to complain that the prodigal living of his two cronies is reducing him to a state of beggary, and, what is worse, is bringing him perilously close to reducing his weight – and Falstaff, as he rightly says, without his corporation would be a shadow of his real self. The others applaud such self-revelation – 'Falstaff immenso! enorme Falstaff!' – and Falstaff proceeds to tell them that he is currently enamoured of no less than two ladies, the wives of Ford and Page. He has written two love letters, and Bardolfo and Pistola are to bear them to their destinations. But this the two worthies refuse to do; their honour will not allow them to take part in such a transaction. Cursing them, Falstaff sends the notes off by a page, and rounds on the pair of them. What right have they to talk of honour, ruffians that they are? Boito has transplanted the Honour monologue, and here Verdi sets it with incomparable aptness and relish: 'L'onore! Ladri!' At its end, Falstaff picks up a broom and chases Bardolfo and Pistola out of the room.

The scene changes to the garden of Ford's house, and the orchestra tells us clearly we are in the presence of the merry wives, Alice Ford, Meg Page, and Mistress Quickly. With them is Anne Ford¹ (Nannetta). In company with Quickly, Meg has come to pay a visit to Alice Ford to show her a letter which she has just received from Falstaff. Alice matches Meg's with one of her own, and the four read the two letters which, save for a different address, are exactly alike. The women are half amused, half annoyed at the presumption of the fat knight, and plan to avenge themselves upon him.

Meanwhile Ford goes walking before his house together with Caius, young Fenton (who is in love with Nannetta, but frowned on as a suitor by Ford), Bardolfo and Pistola. The last two have deserted their master, and from them Ford has learned that Falstaff is after his wife. He too meditates revenge, and the female quartet and the male quintet sometimes mingle, sometimes are heard separately. Fenton and Nannetta remain behind for a fleeting kiss, and sing a miniature love duet together, ending with a phrase of melting beauty:

FENTON

NANNETTA

Boc-ca ba - cia - ta non perde ven-tu - ra. An-zi rin-

- no - va co - me fa - la luna

¹ Anne Page in Shakespeare, with a new patronym.

The women return, but quickly disappear when they think they are being overheard, and once again the two young lovers are alone and can indulge in their battle of kisses. The men reappear, so do the women, and separately they put the finishing touches to their schemes of revenge. This is the famous ensemble in which Verdi combines what was previously sung separately by the men and women, the men singing alla breve, the women in 6/8 (Ex. 2).

Act II. The Garter Inn, where Falstaff is still at table. Beating their breasts in mock penitence, Bardolfo and Pistola beg to be forgiven for their previous infidelity, and tell Falstaff that an old woman is outside asking to be admitted to his presence. Dame Quickly comes in, and, with the orchestra, makes deep obeisance to the knight: 'Reverenza' is set characteristically to a musical representation of a curtsy. Falstaff is all condescension and affability – 'Buon giorno, buona donna': and Quickly delivers her messages, one from each of the ladies, to the effect that Alice will receive the knight, but that Meg's husband guards her too jealously ever to leave her alone. Alice can see him from two till three ('Dalle due alle tre') when her husband is always out. Falstaff repeats the words with evident delight, and assures Quickly that he will not default on the assignation.

Quickly starts to leave, and is tipped by Falstaff as he dismisses her, again with a magnificent sense of the appropriate gesture. He is left alone with thoughts of his impending success: 'Alice è mia' (Alice is mine) he sings (orchestrally this is the epitome of Falstaff's delight and anticipation), and has time for a little strutting march of anticipatory triumph ('Va, vecchio John') before his next visitor is announced.

It is Ford. He introduces himself to Falstaff under the name of Master Brook (Signor Fontana), presents the knight with a purse of silver as a bait, then tells him that he is in love with Mistress Ford, whose chastity he cannot breach, and begs Falstaff to lay siege to her and so make the way easier for him. Falstaff catches up the suggestion of music from him, and breaks mockingly into a little song of delicious triumph ('L'amor, l'amor che non ci dà mai tregue Finchè la vita strugge').

Falstaff gleefully tells him that he has a rendezvous with her that very afternoon, and that he (Signor Fontana) may be quite sure that he will be able eventually to attain what he so much desires. When Ford asks if Falstaff knows the husband of Alice, he hears himself described with contemptuous abuse. The comedy is rich and never underlined and this duet stands as the last of the long line of similarly conceived scenes.

Falstaff goes out for a moment to change his clothes, and Ford is left alone, a prey to jealousy in its most tormenting form. His soliloquy in celebration of that emotion might be expected to put Verdi in a dangerous position after his completely successful portrayal of tragic jealousy in Otello, but peril is circumvented, and this is one of the great moments of the opera, moreover a complete re-creation of the Elizabethan delight in the comedy of the outraged cuckold. Falstaff returns, and, after some argument as to who shall go through the door first, they leave arm in arm.

The scene changes to Ford's house, where the four women get ready to give Falstaff the reception he deserves. We learn, quite casually from talk between Mistress Ford and Nannetta, that Ford wants to marry off the girl to the aged pedant, Dr Caius, while she of course will marry none but Fenton, with whom she is in love. Her mother promises to aid her plans. Alice leads an ensemble with a staccato melody, and Quickly gives warning of Falstaff's approach.

Alice sits herself down and starts to play on the lute, to whose accompaniment Falstaff begins to sing her praises in extravagant terms. He sings a little song of irresistible melody: 'Quand'ero paggio del Duca di Norfolk', in which he describes his own slender and comely build when he was a boy. They are interrupted by Quickly, who announces that Ford can be seen approaching. The fat lover must be concealed. This is accomplished by getting him behind a screen, just before Ford enters with his followers, hoping to surprise the man who has invaded his home. They begin a search of the rooms.

While they are off exploring another part of the house, the women hurry Falstaff into a big wash-basket, pile the soiled linen on top of him, and fasten it down. Scarcely has this been done when Ford comes back and hears the sound of kissing behind the screen. No longer any doubt! Falstaff is hidden there with his wife. He gathers everyone together, marches them towards the screen and knocks it down – to find behind it Nannetta and Fenton, who have used to their own purpose the diversion of attention from them. Ford, more furious than ever, rushes out, while his wife and her friends call in the servants, who lift the basket and empty it out of the window into the Thames below. When Ford comes back, his wife leads him to the window and shows him Falstaff striking out for the shore.

Act III. Falstaff is sitting recovering at the Garter. His thoughts are gloomy and he calls for more wine, but even that prospect does not seem to cheer him up. The world is in a sorry state, he reflects, when such a pearl of knighthood as himself can be bundled unceremoniously into a basket full of dirty linen and dropped into the water. Everything is going to the dogs – even a subdued memory of the little march only reminds him that he is the last of the old brigade. The host appears with wine, and Falstaff's mood alters perceptibly at the prospect of swamping some of the Thames water inside him with some good wine. The scene has begun as invective against an ungrateful world but finishes as a panegyric in praise of wine, with the full orchestra trilling in sympathy as the wine mounts to colour his view of humanity.

Once more Quickly curtseys to him (considerably, it must be admitted, to his dismay), and offers him a rendezvous with Alice. Falstaff wants to hear no more of such things, and it takes all Quickly's powers of persuasion to get him even to listen, much less to agree to a meeting-place. However, in the end, he cannot resist the temptation which is being dangled in front of him, and settles for midnight at Herne the Hunter's Oak in Windsor forest, where he is to appear (as we learn a moment later from the concealed Alice and her friends) disguised as the black hunter himself, who, according to legend, hanged himself from the oak, with the result that the spot is haunted by witches and sprites.

The scene ends with an ensemble as the women and Fenton arrange the details of the evening's fun, and Ford and Caius plot that Caius's betrothal to Nannetta shall be announced that very night. The women call to each other off-stage and the strings offer fifteen bars of idyllic commentary as night falls.

The last scene takes place by moonlight under Herne's Oak. Horn-calls and references to the love music form the basis for the prelude to Fenton's aria 'Dal labbro il canto estasiato vola', which begins the act. It is filled with the same sweetness as can be found in the love music. Disguises are hastily donned, and in a moment Falstaff is heard arriving. He is wearing a pair of antlers on his head and is wrapped in a heavy cloak. Midnight strikes, echoed at each stroke by Falstaff, who consoles himself for the incongruity of his disguise by remembering that Jove disguised himself as a bull for love of Europa. For a moment he is alone with Alice, but they are immediately interrupted by noises, and Alice disappears into the darkness leaving Falstaff to fend for himself.

Nannetta, who is disguised as Queen of the Fairies, calls her followers around her, and they pirouette until she begins to sing. Verdi has given them music of exquisite delicacy and the choral writing is as delicious as that for the soloist: 'Sul fil d'un soffio etesio'.

Bardolfo in disguise stumbles on the recumbent figure of Falstaff (who has hidden his face so as not to see the fairies), and calls everyone to him. The merry women, Ford's entourage, and about a hundred others, all disguised and masked, unite in mystifying, taunting and belabouring Falstaff, until the knight at last recognises Bardolfo among his tormentors. Everyone unmask in turn, and Falstaff's enormity and folly are displayed for his discomfiture. He makes a valiant attempt to recapture the initiative by complaining that without his participation a joke seems to have no wit in it, and all – even Ford – agree that his wit alone is sufficient to redeem him, in spite of his egregious faults.

Ford takes Nannetta by the hand and announces her betrothal to Caius, and does the same to another disguised young couple whom Alice leads up to him. He bids them all unmask – to find that Bardolfo has been dressed up in Nannetta's clothes and is now therefore betrothed to Caius, and that the other couple were Nannetta and Fenton in disguise. Falstaff cannot resist the temptation to turn Ford's question back on him: who is the dupe now? But Alice will not let him get away with it; he is to be placed beside Ford and Caius; if they are dupes, so is he. Ford is induced to bless his daughter and her sweetheart, and Falstaff leads the company in a final fugue: 'Tutto nel mondo è burla. L'uom è nato burlone' (Jesting is man's vocation. Wise is he who is jolly). For the second time in his career,¹ Verdi, who despised academicism, finished a Shakespearean opera with what is traditionally the most academic of forms, a fugue.

It would take most of a book to describe Falstaff in sufficient detail to do anything like justice to the kaleidoscopic variety of the score. There is a sparkle, a rapidity of utterance, a speed of movement, an economy of means in the ensemble writing that has no equal in music written since Mozart, and every bar is endowed with a refinement of expression and a restraint that it would be difficult to imagine in the composer of the operas before Macbeth. The music is even more fluid than in Otello and rhythmic ideas are caught up, dropped, and used again with a dexterity which Shakespeare himself never excelled in his own medium. It is all as light as air, and yet out of it has been fashioned Shakespeare's Falstaff drawn appropriately in the round, speaking Italian but more English at heart than in any English musical recreation of him.

H.

¹ Macbeth was the first.

PARAM VIR

(born 6 February 1952)

SNATCHED BY THE GODS

Chamber opera in one act, libretto by William Radice, based on the poem Dvatar Gras by Rabinranath Tagore. Commissioned by the Munich Biennale; first performed Amsterdam, 11 May 1992, with Broken Strings, conducted by David Porcelijn, then in Munich. Revived Almeida Theatre, London, 1996, conducted by Markus Stenz.

Maitra, a well-to-do Brahmin.....Baritone
Moksada, a young widow.....Soprano
Rahkal, her son.....Treble

| | |
|---------------------------------------|---------------|
| Ananda, her elder sister | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Boatman | Bass |
| A Young Wife | Soprano |
| Her Aunt..... | Contralto |
| Pilgrims | |
| A Young Man | Tenor |
| A Middle-Aged Man..... | High Baritone |
| An Old Blind Man..... | Bass |

At sunrise Maitra is to lead a group of pilgrims to a festival where everyone will wash away their sins by bathing in the Ganges. He agrees to allow the young widow Moksada to come too. She means to leave her young son Rakhal with her sister Ananda. While she is fetching her things, Rakhal is discovered hiding in the boat. He also wants to go to the festival. Moksada returns and orders him to get out. Maitra is impressed by his eagerness and lets him stay, even though the Boatman warns that the boat is overloaded. Without thinking, Moksada curses the boy: 'The sea can have you!' At once she regrets saying it. Ananda arrives, worried that she cannot find Rakhal, and is full of dread at his going. The journey begins.

The orchestral Interlude paints an extremely engaging picture of the voyage and the festival, complete with all manner of bell and gong sounds.

Afterwards, the passengers wait for the tide to turn so they can return home. Rakhal is homesick, Moksada is still beset with guilt at her curse. A strong wind drives the boat and soon builds into a storm. The Boatman loses control. He explains that the gods have been enraged: 'Someone among you has cheated the gods, has not given what is owing: hence these waves.' The passengers hurl their possessions into the water, but to no avail. Maitra points out that Moksada kept back the son she promised to the sea. All the passengers demand that Rakhal be thrown overboard. Moksada tries in vain to protect him. As he drowns he screams for his 'Aunt Ananda'. Maitra cries out, 'I shall bring you back', jumps in after the boy and drowns. The sun sets slowly in the river.

In a note on his double bill, the composer wrote of the meaning of the end: 'For the dying light of the setting sun, as it embraces the crumpled form of Moksada, contains the gentle promise of sunrise and rebirth.'

P.

BROKEN STRINGS

Opera in one act, libretto by David Rudkin, based on a traditional Buddhist story, Guttil Jatak. Commissioned by the Munich Biennale; first performed Amsterdam, 11 May 1992, with Snatched by the Gods, conducted by David Porcelijn, then in Munich. Revived Almeida Theatre, London, 1996, conducted by Markus Stenz.

| | |
|--|-------|
| The King | Bass |
| Musil, a brilliant young musician | Tenor |
| Guttil, a forgotten old musician | Bass |

Magical creatures

| | |
|-------------------|-----------|
| The Elephant..... | Contralto |
| The Fish | Soprano |
| The Peacock..... | Tenor |

| | |
|---------------------------|---------------|
| The Presiding Judge | Baritone |
| The Second Judge | Tenor |
| The Third Judge..... | High Baritone |

The King asks for a play to be performed. An actor offers a work called 'To Play before the King', set during the last stages of a competition for the post of royal musician. Musil assumes he has won, since no one's mastery comes near to his. The music he plays is 'a high scherzando, dancing, rapid, glittering, impressive; but empty, cold'. Worried that the judges remain impassive, he tunes his instrument down and plays 'something more melodic... phrases in high middle register, arching, plaintive', but the judges are unimpressed; they thought he was tuning his instrument. Rodney Milnes in Opera magazine wickedly noted 'a hint of Stravinsky' in the music of Musil, that 'insufferably arrogant and priggish young virtuoso'. The composer himself has denied the allusion but volunteered that he embedded in Musil's music a flaw 'which can be taken both literally and symbolically. His music lacks a bass line.' Musil himself remains certain of success and waits to hear the final candidate.

Guttil emerges in rags, 'a man reduced to his own minimum'. He strikes his (four-stringed) instrument and creates 'sour "rusty" tones'. He tries again, 'searching, as though tuning in to what he hears'. A lower string breaks but that does not perturb him: 'We can make music yet. On higher strings...' He plays 'a defiant high glittering scherzando, angry somewhat, shallow, shrill...' Somehow, a new, deep note emerges, which rouses a magical elephant to life, a dancing and trumpeting personification of rhythm, a role beautifully written for a real contralto. A second string breaks but Guttill is undaunted: 'With even less,' he resolves, 'play on.' With the two remaining strings he creates 'halting, fragmentary, spare' music, which summons, touches and teases the Fish (harmony), sung by a coloratura soprano. Her delicious, silvery music (including a laughing song) makes all the more impact, partly because no high voice has been heard until now. A third string breaks but Guttill continues to play. A fierce pizzicato passage yields to an exquisite cor anglais solo as Guttill plays on the last string, 'an unearthly arching birdlike calling', and the Peacock (melody), a lyrical tenor, responds, enraptured. The three creatures dance as their musics fuse and 'glow with incandescent intensity... Through it all sounds more and more the penetrating note of the final string about to break...'.

The King has been watching appalled. He intervenes to stop the play but the last string breaks. A magical light appears about Guttill as he becomes a radiance and 'the song itself burns all the instrument away'. Musil, unmoved, laughs satanically, calls it a 'great trick' and Guttill a charlatan. He nevertheless determines to pay Guttill to teach his 'freak effect' to him. First, however, he breaks his own instrument hoping to repeat the effect. No sound emerges. Musil flees, 'uttering a long howl of one damned'.

The King bursts on to the stage and dismisses the actors. The opera ends with his exposed, heroic baritone solo, in which he applies to himself the lesson that Guttill has taught. Tom Sutcliffe in The Guardian rightly praised Param Vir's 'melodic writing for this final passage, the object of the whole opera, [as] both touching and memorable'. Holding Guttill's broken instrument the King asks, 'Is this... myself? Some song I thought I was?... Must less sustain me too?' David Rudkin's insubstantial, oblique version of Buddhist teachings ensures that the opera ends on a note of poetry, rather than didactic philosophy, as the King wonders whether he must continue the process, 'Till I must make whatever song is mine... from nothing...? The song I am... from nothing? Nothing? Only then... I begin...?'

When Broken Strings was revived in 1996, the critics of The Times and The Guardian (in rare agreement) united in saluting 'a born opera composer'. P.

AMADEO VIVES

(born 18 November 1871, died 1 December 1932)

Vives studied in Barcelona, where he later founded with Luis Millet the famous choir, Orfeó Català. A success in his native city with an opera, Artus, brought a move to Madrid, where for the rest of his life he composed operas and zarzuelas – more than a hundred works for the stage in the space of thirty-five years. He was stricken with infantile paralysis as a boy and this, together with a badly set shoulder after a fracture, so severely limited his movement that he was unable for instance to attend the triumphant première of Doña Francisquita. In spite of his success with lighter works, he longed for recognition as a wholly serious composer, particularly of Catalan operas, but only Maruxa in this genre rivalled the popularity of zarzuelas like Bohemios and Doña Francisquita. Vives died in Madrid but is said on his deathbed to have asked the priest to be allowed to pray in Catalan. H.

DOÑA FRANCISQUITA

Lyric comedy in three acts, text by Federico Romero and Guillermo Fernández Shaw, after Lope de Vega's La discreta enamorada. Première in Madrid, 17 October 1923, with Mary Isaura, Cora Raga, Juan de Casenave (an inexperienced singer, hence the diffident nature of the role), Antonio Palacio, conductor Juan Antonio Martínez. The composer, who was in love with Mary Isaura, is rumoured to have restricted the number of encores allowed to the brilliant Cora Raga in the secondary role of Beltrana. Doña Francisquita has from the start captivated the Spanish public.

Doña Francisquita, in love with Fernando.....Soprano
Fernando Soler, a student.....Tenor
Aurora 'la Beltrana', an actress.....Mezzo-Soprano
Cardona, Fernando's friend.....Tenor
Doña Francisca, Francisquita's mother.....Contralto
Don Matías, Fernando's fatherBass
Lorenzo Perez, refreshment stall owner.....Baritone

Lañador, a tinker.....Baritone
 A Pedlar.....Mezzo-Soprano
 A NightwatchmanTenor
 Street Vendors, Bullfighters, Townspeople

Place: Madrid

Time: Mid-Century, at Carnival Time

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

It is as hard to avoid making some element of comparison between Spanish zarzuela and Viennese operetta as it is between Offenbach and Johann Strauss; neither's virtues are reduced by the appraisal. A composer like Franz Lehár is not diminished by the suggestion that his grandiloquent, full-frontal assaults on popular taste are at least matched by the Spaniard's subtler, rhythmically more varied, and scarcely less muscular effusions. The best of the zarzuelas, like the best of the operettas, are surely robust enough to travel.

Doña Francisquita provides a perfect exemplar of the 'high' zarzuela style – large of scale, with strong, lyrical writing for the soloists; lively rhythmical underpinning from the orchestra; 'big', potentially popular numbers to launch the work's fame into the popular media; and an atmosphere quintessentially Spanish. The invention seems inexhaustible, one delectable scene succeeds another, bolero attempts to outdo mazurka, lighter numbers somehow sound distinguished and larger statements contrive to sound popular. Vives is not afraid of writing an elaborate quintet just before the end of Act II, and solos like Francisquita's haunting waltz-time Song of the Nightingale and Fernando's heart-felt romance in Act II are candidates, one might think, for any aspiring artist's recital disc.

The action proceeds in a series of short scenes, several of them without music.

Act I. A square in Madrid, where tinker and pedlar are crying their wares and where Fernando meets his friend Cardona. Fernando is in love with the actress Beltrana, who makes fun of so inexperienced a suitor. From the church emerge Doña Francisca and her daughter Francisquita, the latter of whom has fallen for Fernando and resents the way he has eyes for no one but the actress. Francisquita's ploy of dropping her handkerchief works well and they strike up a conversation. Cardona praises Francisquita's beauty, but Fernando, not responding, can think only of the more sophisticated Beltrana.

Fernando's father, Don Matías, with none of his son's well-known shyness, has his eye on Francisquita, his manoeuvres unfortunately suggesting to that young lady's mother that she is his potential quarry rather than her daughter, a misunderstanding cleared up in a trice. Francisquita decides to take full advantage of what she sees as a chance to make Fernando jealous.

When la Beltrana puts in an appearance, she continues her not so subtle taunting of Fernando, and is promptly told off by Cardona. She retreats to a neighbouring refreshment booth, whose owner, Lorenzo, is another of her admirers. Cardona prevents an incident by stopping Fernando following her.

An encounter between Don Matías and the two young students produces another misunderstanding, this time suggesting to Fernando that he might make la Beltrana jealous by pretending to be interested in Francisquita. Students dance attendance on a wedding party, which Cardona and Fernando toast. When la Beltrana reappears, with Cardona's help Fernando makes up to Francisquita, noticing at the same time how genuinely attractive she is but not to the extent of extinguishing the torch he continues to carry for la Beltrana, who with a band of street musicians sings a pasacalle before disappearing with them. Francisquita is quietly confident she will still turn Fernando's head in her direction. The act ends with acclaim for the wedding party.

Act II. Near a tavern on the canal. La Beltrana sings; members of a noisy group reply. Cardona enters in drag, followed by 'admirers'. Fernando too comes in, with Doña Francisca and Don Matías not far behind, the latter intent on introducing his son to Francisquita, who he hopes will soon become Fernando's step-mother. This has the effect of making Fernando for the first time truly notice Francisquita's attractions and, in an appropriately wistful duet, regret that she contemplates matrimony with so old a man. He sounds more than half in love himself. When he hears la Beltrana's song, he is torn two ways and sings the romance which has become the best-known number of the opera.

Misunderstandings proliferate, with Cardona pretending to be Fernando's sweetheart, thus successfully provoking la Beltrana's fury; Fernando quite genuinely starting a break with la Beltrana and then declaring his love for Francisquita, so that she pretends to faint; and Don Matías reacting with extreme displeasure. The act finishes with Fernando dancing with Francisquita; la Beltrana flirting with Lorenzo, who takes it all seriously; Don Matías for a moment successfully wrestling with Lorenzo; then dancing with la Beltrana – all to the strains of a mazurka.

Act III. In the street. A nightwatchman sings. Carnival in a slow waltz relaxes between bouts of energy, and Doña Francisca and her daughter tell Don Matías that Fernando is pestering Francisquita and on that account they will not go dancing. He for his part decides to stay at home too. Francisquita schemes to get her mother to believe Fernando fancies her, then gets ready to go out. Things take a serious turn when Cardona quarrels with la Beltrana, who takes out her bad temper on Lorenzo, who decides that she really loves Fernando, leaving him no option but to challenge the young student to a duel.

In the patio of a house Carnival continues, and la Beltrana is joined by Cardona, watched by Fernando, who wonders how, with Francisquita at hand, he can ever have been so infatuated by her. La Beltrana with Cardona sings the 'Marabú', a gipsy bolero. After a fandango, Lorenzo, ready for the duel, is convinced Fernando's interest in la Beltrana is at an end. The situation clears rapidly, with Francisca disabused of the notion that Fernando loves her, Don Matías convinced by Cardona that he is too old for Francisquita, and finally celebrations in train for the wedding of Fernando and Francisquita. H.

W

RICHARD WAGNER

(born 22 May 1813, died 13 February 1883)

If Monteverdi was the progenitor of opera as we know it today and Gluck its first great reformer, Wagner with his reappraisal of the entire art form two hundred years after Monteverdi and nearly a hundred after Gluck caused an explosion so powerful that opera never regained the equilibrium it possessed in, say, the time of Handel, Mozart or Rossini. The sheer innovation of his music – Tristan once heard could never be forgotten – and the scale of his works, even the early ones, produced nothing less than revolution.

Wagner's earliest operas, Die Feen, Das Liebesverbot and Rienzi, are written without much regard for public taste – two of them are too long, for one thing – but the composer was pouring his music into moulds which are relatively conventional and obviously derived from the operas he knew in the theatre, some of which he himself was at the time conducting. It is only with The Flying Dutchman that his imagination soars (at the age of twenty-nine), that he starts to write to a theme – in this case what became an obsession, redemption through love – and that the path his career was to follow can with hindsight be seen mapped out in front of him. The difficulties were nonetheless enormous. Not only did musicians have inordinate problems with his music, but impediments to his career were the norm. His revolutionary activities led to exile and a cutting off from performance centres – he did not see Lohengrin on stage until a dozen years after it was finished – but no setback seems to have had the slightest effect on his convictions. He broke off work on the mightiest of his enterprises, The Ring, for a period of no less than a dozen years (during which he wrote in strict contrast Tristan and Meistersinger), and yet returned apparently unperturbed to finish the colossal endeavour. In his final years, he was enabled, partly through the favour of King Ludwig II of Bavaria, to build a Festival theatre at Bayreuth specifically for the performance of his mature works, a privilege accorded by fate to no other composer.

A random opinion poll would probably equate Wagner with huge enterprises – vastly long operas (music dramas he called them), huge themes, super-human protagonists – and yet he wrote music of delicacy and subtlety beyond the reach of almost any of his contemporaries. The love of Lohengrin for Elsa is suggested in music of unparalleled lyrical beauty – unparalleled until you call in evidence the burgeoning love of Eva for Walther von Stolzing in the second act of Die Meistersinger and find confirmation there. At the start of the last act of Götterdämmerung, Siegfried is within an ace of returning the ring to the Rhinemaidens, and his lyrical reaction to them and to nature is of an enchantment which comes close to matching their own incomparably melodious pleas. Siegfried draws back, and part of Wagner's mastery lies in moving within twenty minutes from an expressiveness worthy of Schubert to the implacable tragedy of the Funeral March, the music of what might be thought of as contrasting episodes perfectly balanced within a music drama whose inexorable flow is never at any point in doubt. Not only an architect of huge vision but a musical magician! H.

DAS LIEBESVERBOT

The Ban on Love

Opera in two acts, words by the composer (libretto adapted from Shakespeare's Measure for Measure). Première, Magdeburg, 29 March 1836 (for a single night). Revived Munich, 1923; Berlin, 1933; Munich, 1983, with Sabine Hass, Pamela Coburn, Marianne Seibel, Robert Schunk, Hermann Prey, conductor Sawallisch, producer Ponnelle.

| | | |
|--|-------------------------------|----------|
| Friedrich, the King's German | | |
| Viceroy in Sicily | | Baritone |
| Luzio | } young noblemen | Tenor |
| Claudio | | Tenor |
| Antonio | } their friends | Tenor |
| Angelo | | Bass |
| Isabella, Claudio's sister | | Soprano |
| Mariana | | Soprano |
| Brighella, captain of the watch | | Bass |
| Danieli, an innkeeper | | Baritone |
| Dorella | | Soprano |
| Pontio Pilato, a bawd | | Tenor |
| Nuns, Judges, Guard, Townspeople, Musicians | | |

Place: Sicily

Time: Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Wagner's second opera (his first, Die Feen, was performed only posthumously in 1888) was written when he was twenty-two, first performed in Magdeburg, where he worked as a conductor, and coldly received – not surprising, since it was long and complicated and had been allowed (according to accounts) only ten days of rehearsal. It had no success whatsoever during the composer's lifetime (Wagner, giving the manuscript to his patron, King Ludwig of Bavaria, referred to it as a youthful sin¹); it did not until 1923 get to Munich, where all the rest of the composer's oeuvre had been performed by 1888, and was only finally accepted there as late as 1983, when the work was mounted in exemplary fashion to celebrate the centenary of Wagner's death.

Wagner moved the action from Vienna to Palermo but kept the bones of Shakespeare's plot, Friedrich taking on Angelo's role as the stand-in Viceroy of Sicily and with it overtones of comedy absent from the original; Mariana (presumably to placate contemporary susceptibilities about seduction) becoming his wife, cast off as a burden once he has gained the favour of the King. The result is less an indictment of hypocrisy as in Shakespeare, more a comedy of licentiousness and intrigue.

The overture, molto vivace with castanets to the fore, puts forward leading motifs and anticipates the liveliness of the action.

Act I. Much to the displeasure of the crowds,

Brighella and his watch attempt to close down the bars and places of amusement proscribed by the new edict promulgated in the King's absence by Friedrich. This vetoes Carnival and all its accoutrements and allows him to place anyone who contravenes it under arrest; even one 'taken in drunkenness or lechery' faces a death sentence. Danieli, the publican, is arrested, as is Claudio, a young grandee, and also Dorella who now works for Danieli but who used to be lady's maid to Isabella, Claudio's sister. Claudio – arrested for love, he says – in a solo of Weber-like cut prevails on his friend Luzio to find Isabella (who has been in a convent since the death of her parents) and beg her to intervene on his behalf with the Viceroy.

A convent. Isabella and Mariana, friends from girlhood, commune like sisters from Così re-set by Weber. Mariana reminds her friend that she has returned to the convent following Friedrich's repudiation of their secret marriage. Luzio comes to beg Isabella's assistance for Claudio, whose crime is to have seduced one Julia but who now intends to marry her. For the first time Isabella hears of Friedrich's law-giving and determines to help her brother. Luzio meanwhile is smitten with Isabella's charms and asks her to marry him, something she, in view of his reputation as a philanderer, resolutely refuses to contemplate.

A courtroom. Brighella in the absence of Friedrich sets up as judge (buffo song) and for running a brothel sentences Pontio Pilato to exile. One look and Brighella has fallen head over heels for Dorella; only the intervention of the crowd frustrates his advances, which appear by no means unwelcome. Friedrich's arrival puts paid to Brighella's brief period on the bench. A petition asking him to grant permission for the forthcoming Carnival is handed in but he tears it up unread.

Both Claudio and Julia are condemned to death for transgressing the new law, but Isabella comes to demand a private interview with the Viceroy. This he grants, and, after hearing her plea for mercy, loses little time in offering Claudio's life in return for a night with her. She yells for bystanders to witness his hypocrisy but he warns her the accusation will be laughed out of court and she appears to give in (ensemble). But all is not the plain sailing Friedrich imagines. Isabella has had the notion of sending ¹ In 1939 it passed into Hitler's hands and disappeared.

Mariana to keep the assignation and thus expose Friedrich. Her apparent acceptance of his proposition brings Friedrich's agreement to free Claudio, but he declares publicly that he has no mind to go against the law. An ensemble of cross-purposes ends the act.

Act II. The prison. In music of some spirit, Isabella tells Claudio Friedrich's price. When Claudio's initial horror turns to pleas for her to make the sacrifice, Isabella is minded to punish what she sees as his selfishness and gives him no inkling of the Mariana plot. Dorella is given letters to Mariana and the Viceroy telling them the whereabouts – in Carnival costume – of the assignation. Luzio, reassured about Claudio's fate, turns his attentions to Isabella and is mocked by Dorella, to his considerable discomfiture (trio). However, when he hears of Friedrich's dastardly plan, his fury is so real that Isabella is convinced of his sincerity. She will play a trick on him nonetheless.

Pontio has been promoted, if only temporarily, to the rank of jailer. Luzio rails at him for such a breach of faith, but Isabella knows that to get hold of Claudio's reprieve will cost her only a purse full of money.

Friedrich's palace. The Viceroy recognises that falling for Isabella has turned his well-ordered world upside down (aria). Dorella brings him Isabella's note and he succumbs to temptation, but determines to send Claudio to execution. The infatuated Brighella asks Dorella for a rendezvous, to which she agrees on condition he comes masked.

Palermo disregards the new laws and is celebrating Carnival. Luzio sings a carnival song and prevents a brawl by getting the roistering citizens to unmask. Brighella dons pierrot costume for his rendezvous with Dorella. Isabella and Mariana are identically masked and Mariana waits for her assignation with the unsuspecting Friedrich (aria). Before clarification confusion must become worse confounded. Luzio recognises the Viceroy and conducts him towards other maskers, railing the while at the injustice of the new laws. He spies on Friedrich's meeting with Mariana and naturally takes her, to his jealous fury, for Isabella. Dorella throws her arms round his neck and will release him only at the price of a kiss, an action which infuriates both Brighella and Isabella who are watching. Luzio chases Friedrich and the putative Isabella, Dorella flees from Brighella, while Pontio Pilato gives the real Isabella Claudio's reprieve. She realises the 'safe conduct' is a fraud and as a last resort denounces Friedrich to the roistering populace as an arrant hypocrite. The Viceroy is unmasked and accepts to be judged by his new law, then, in a turn-up for the book, is let off; Isabella and Luzio are reconciled, Brighella even finds Dorella, and a masked procession led by Friedrich and Mariana goes off to find the King, who has just returned to Sicily.

The score of Das Liebesverbot has many signs of an early work, among others that it is far too long (nearly 600 pages of Breitkopf's vocal score). It is not hard to see it initially as a victim of operatic fashion, later as unrelated to other works of Germany's greatest operatic composer. There is plainly some looking back to Beethoven and more particularly Weber, also forward to Tannhäuser and to The Flying Dutchman, some reflection of Marschner and other German contemporaries, but an unprejudiced ear can notwithstanding find in it a lively opera, easy to accept in a well-integrated performance.

H.

RIENZI

Opera in five acts, text by the composer after Bulwer Lytton's novel of the same name. First performed at the Hofoper, Dresden, 20 October 1842, with Schröder-Devrient, Wüst, Thiele, Tichatschek, Dettmer, Wächter, Vestri, Reinhold, Risse, conductor Reissiger. New York, 1878; London, Her Majesty's (in English), 1879, conductor Carl Rosa; Metropolitan, New York, 1886, with Lilli Lehmann, Marianne Brandt, Emil Fischer, conductor Anton Seidl; revived Berlin, 1933, with de Strozzi, Klose, Lorenz, conductor Blech; Stuttgart, 1957, with Windgassen, producer Wieland Wagner; English National Opera, 1982, with Kenneth Woollam.

Cola Rienzi, Roman Tribune.....Tenor
 Irene, his sister.....Soprano
 Stefano Colonna, a nobleman.....Bass
 Adriano, his son.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Paolo Orsini, another patrician.....Bass
 Raimondo, Papal Legate.....Bass
 Baroncelli, Roman citizen.....Tenor
 Cecco del Vecchio, Roman citizen.....Bass
 A Messenger of Peace.....Soprano
 Ambassadors, Nobles, Priests, Monks, Soldiers,
 Messengers, Populace

Place: Rome

Time: Middle of the Fourteenth Century

Running Time: 4 hours 25 minutes (with cuts)

With two operas to his credit, Wagner in his mid-twenties pined for success, perhaps on Grand Opera lines – he had seen Spontini's Fernand Cortez in Berlin – and perceived in Bulwer Lytton's novel just what he needed. Politically, he was for the middle class and against the nobility and he hoped to have his new opera produced in Paris, where in 1840 he wrote Acts III, IV and V. Rebuffed in Paris, he offered the score to Dresden, where it was accepted and, in 1842, performed. The great Schröder-Devrient, whom Wagner had so much admired as Fidelio, undertook the male role of Adriano, and so early in his career Wagner found a nearly ideal Heldentenor in Joseph Tichatschek. In spite of cuts, the performance seems to have lasted from six until midnight, and Wagner set out to shorten the opera, but met strong objections from the chorus master and the singer of the title role. An attempt to divide it into two was not a success and eventually more cuts were adopted.

The overture is a brilliant affair, full of music which is heard to major effect in the opera, and five themes are particularly to be noted: the slow introduction, which has three long sustained notes on the trumpet, later used as a signal for the people to rise against the nobles; a broad melody well known as Rienzi's prayer in Act V; a theme heard first in the finale to Act I and associated with the people; the battle hymn; the march heard first in the finale to Act II.

The story is concerned with Rienzi, the people's Tribune, who succeeds in outwitting and then defeating the nobles and their followers and in raising the power of the people. Magnanimous at first, he is forced by events to crush the nobles' rebellion against the people's power, but popular opinion changes and even the Church, which has earlier urged him to assert himself, turns against him. In the end the populace burns the Capitol, in which Rienzi and a few adherents have made a last stand.

Act I. A Roman street. The Pope has fled Rome, violence has erupted between the noble houses of Orsini and Colonna, and now Orsini attempts to abduct Irene, Rienzi's sister, and she is saved only by the arrival of Adriano Colonna. Cardinal Raimondo tries unsuccessfully to quell the riot until the Tribune, Rienzi, appears with his henchmen, Baroncelli and Cecco del Vecchio, to restore order. The nobles and their followers leave Rome to continue their quarrel outside the city walls, and Rienzi orders his adherents to shut the city gates against them. Raimondo promises that the Church will support any attempt to break the tyranny of the nobles, and Rienzi bids the people be prepared to gather as soon as the trumpet signals the alarm.

Adriano, a noble, saved her honour, Irene tells her brother. Nevertheless, much as he hates the lawlessness of the nobles, Adriano finds it difficult to support the force against his family which Rienzi must use if Rome is to be his. Reminded that it was a Colonna who murdered Rienzi's brother, Adriano eventually agrees to join his cause. Irene is given over to the care of Adriano, who finds strength in their mutual love.

The trumpet sounds, and the finale has Rienzi and the Cardinal invoke Rome's ancient tradition of freedom and in its name proclaim peace in the city and death to Rome's enemies. Rienzi's 'Erstehe, hohe Roma, neu!' (Arise, great Rome, anew!) rouses the people to great enthusiasm and Cecco takes advantage of the situation to urge that the people make Rienzi king, a proposition he vigorously rejects.

Act II. In the Capitol, peace is the topic of the day, with youth groups from the leading Roman families forming a chorus of Messengers of Peace and processing in front of Rienzi to affirm their conviction that the surrounding countryside is free from trouble. Colonna and Orsini follow them and overtly accept Rienzi's leadership while covertly continuing to plot against him. Their colloquy becomes a trio when their plot is overheard by Adriano, who protests vehemently against their plans to murder Rienzi.

Rienzi returns to greet visiting ambassadors and order the public entertainment to begin, refusing to listen seriously to Adriano's warning of the plot to assassinate him. The ballet music was written in Riga in some haste and, apart from that written for Tannhäuser, is Wagner's only essay in this form.

Rienzi has already proclaimed Rome's refusal to recognise the Holy Roman Emperor, usually chosen from among the German Princes, and has demanded that the Emperor's powers be vested in him and the people of Rome, which provides added reason for the assassination attempt by the nobles. In the event, it is unsuccessful (Rienzi has chain-mail beneath his robe) and the people demand that the nobles be punished with the utmost severity. They are condemned to death by the Senators, but Irene joins Adriano in pleading for the life of Adriano's father. Rienzi, moved by their pleas and hearing the distant chant as the nobles are led to execution, agrees to spare their lives on condition that they swear a new oath of allegiance. This they agree to do and, in spite of the opposition of Baroncelli and Cecco, they are forgiven and the act ends with the energetic march from the overture.

Act III. In front of the Forum, the people, outraged by the treachery of the nobles who have broken their oath, call for Rienzi to crush the new insurrection and this time to show no mercy. He again rouses them to enthusiasm and they disperse to raise forces to fight the nobles.

It is the moment of decision for Adriano, who in a great aria, 'Gerechter Gott!', wonders how to choose between his beloved's brother, Rienzi, whose actions have caused his predicament, and his father, to whom he must be loyal but who threatens the safety of Rome. He prays that the two may be reconciled.

Rienzi makes a patriotic appeal and the people answer with the battle hymn (whose music has already been heard in the overture). Adriano cannot deflect Rienzi from his intention to do battle with the nobles and he is left behind with Irene and the Roman women. Fighting can be heard in the distance, and with the sounds of the battle hymn the people return victorious, leaving the nobles vanquished and Colonna and Orsini dead. Adriano mourns his father but Baroncelli is more concerned with the numerous ordinary Romans who have been killed in the fighting. All prepare to march in triumph to the Capitol.

Act IV. The heavy casualties have shaken the people's allegiance to Rienzi, and, in the square in front of the Lateran Church and led by Baroncelli and Cecco, they start to plot against him. With rumours afoot of the Pope and Emperor united against the regime, Adriano resolves to kill Rienzi. A procession reaches the church, Irene at Rienzi's side, and the Tribune addresses the crowd. When he mounts the steps, monks can be heard chanting a malediction and the Cardinal appears to announce his excommunication. The people leave in confusion, and Adriano tries unsuccessfully to persuade Irene to desert Rienzi; at curtain fall, brother and sister stand alone to the sound of the malediction from inside the church.

Act V. Rienzi prays movingly to God: 'Allmächt'ger Vater', to music heard in the overture. It is a moment of truth, with Rienzi for once seen not in public but in private, face to face with crisis and potential disaster.

In spite of his suggestion that if she stay with him she may also be cursed, Irene declares that she will not leave Rienzi. He is determined through his oratory to bring the people of Rome back to his side. In a short duet, Adriano warns Irene that the people seem likely to burn the Capitol and that she must leave Rienzi. But she refuses and he departs. Baroncelli and Cecco have done their work well, and the people are determined on Rienzi's death and will not even allow him to address them. They set the Capitol on fire, Rienzi and Irene can be seen inside it, and, as the nobles return to attack the people, the Capitol collapses in flames.

Rienzi, in spite of some foreshadowing of the future, is mostly written in a style which seems conventional in comparison with what Wagner later wrote and which reappears only at the most 'public' moments in the next three operas. Nonetheless, I find it difficult to agree with commentators who find in the score little of value; on the contrary, Wagner was a towering genius and even his earlier works are not without interest, Rienzi standing as a major essay in the field of Grand Opera, and, one drawback apart, more effective than most of its peers. The rock on which all revivals risk shipwreck is of course the opera's sheer length. Nevertheless, with drastic pruning of some of the weaker numbers and a bold approach to the great ensembles and finales, an exciting evening can be ensured and it is an unheeding ear which cannot find in the score's very considerable musical edifices something much more effective than in, for instance, the operas of Meyerbeer. H.

DER FLIEGENDE HOLLÄNDER

The Flying Dutchman

Opera in three acts, text by the composer, founded on an episode in Heine's Memoirs of Herr von Schnabelewopski. Performed at the Hofoper, Dresden, 2 January 1843, with Schröder-Devrient, Thérèse Wächter, J.M. Wächter, Reinhold, Risse, Bielezizky, conductor Wagner; Drury Lane, 1870 (in Italian; first Wagner opera to be performed in London), with Ilma di Murska, Santley, conductor Arditì; Lyceum, 1876 (in English), by Carl Rosa Company; Philadelphia, 1876 (in Italian); Metropolitan, 1889, with Sophie Weisner, Reichmann, Kalisch, Fischer, Mittelhauser, conductor Seidl.

| | |
|---------------------------------------|-----------|
| Daland, a Norwegian sea captain | Bass |
| Senta, his daughter | Soprano |
| Eric, a hunter | Tenor |
| Mary, Senta's nurse | Contralto |
| Daland's Steersman | Tenor |
| The Dutchman | Baritone |
| Sailors, Maidens, Hunters, etc. | |

Place: A Norwegian Fishing Village

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

From Rienzi Wagner took a great stride forward to The Flying Dutchman. This is the first milestone on his road from opera to music drama. Of his Rienzi the composer was in after years ashamed, writing to Liszt: 'I, as an artist and man, have not the heart for the reconstruction of that, to my taste, superannuated work, which, in consequence of its immoderate dimensions, I have had to remodel more than once. I have no longer the heart for it, and desire from all my soul to do something new instead.' He spoke of it as a youthful error, but in The Flying Dutchman there is little, if anything, which could have troubled his artistic conscience.

Wagner's libretto is based upon the picturesque legend of the Flying Dutchman – the Wandering Jew of the ocean. A Dutch sea-captain, who, we are told, tried to double the Cape of Good Hope in the teeth of a furious gale, swore that he would accomplish his purpose even if he kept on sailing forever. The devil, hearing the oath, condemned the captain to sail the sea until Judgement Day, without hope of release, unless he should find a woman who would love him faithfully until death. Once in every seven years he is allowed to go ashore in search of a woman who will redeem him through love.

In The Flying Dutchman Wagner employs several leading motifs, not indeed with the resource which he displays in his music-dramas, but with considerably greater freedom of treatment than in Rienzi. The overture, which may be said to be an eloquent and beautiful musical narrative of the whole opera, contains all these leading motifs. It opens with a stormy passage out of which there bursts the strong but sombre Motif of the Flying Dutchman himself, the dark hero of the legend. The orchestra fairly seethes and rages like the sea roaring under the lash of a terrific storm. And through all this furious orchestration there is heard again and again the motif of the Dutchman, as if his figure could be seen amid all the gloom and fury of the elements. There he stands, hoping for death, yet indestructible. As the excited music gradually dies away there is heard a calm, somewhat undulating phrase which occurs in the opera when the Dutchman's vessel puts into the quiet Norwegian harbour. Then, also, there occurs again the motif of the Dutchman, but this time played softly as if the storm-driven wretch had at last found a moment's peace.

We at once recognise to whom it is due that he has found this moment of repose, for we hear like prophetic measures the strains of the beautiful ballad which is sung by Senta in the second act of the opera, in which she relates the legend of The Flying Dutchman. It would not be too much to call this opening phrase the Senta Motif. It is followed by the phrase which indicates the coming to anchor of the Dutchman's vessel; then we hear the Motif of the Dutchman himself, dying away with the faintest possible effect. With sudden energy the orchestra dashes into the surging ocean music, introducing this time the wild, pathetic plaint sung by the Dutchman in the first act of the opera. Again we hear his motif, and again the music seems to represent the surging, swirling ocean when aroused by a furious tempest. Even when we hear the measures of the sailors' chorus the orchestra continues its furious pace, making it appear as if the sailors were shouting above the storm.

Characteristic in this overture, and also throughout the opera, especially in Senta's ballad, is what may be called the Ocean Motif, which most graphically depicts the aspect of the ocean during a storm. The overture ends with an impassioned burst of melody based upon a portion of the concluding phrases of Senta's ballad; phrases which we hear once more at the end of the opera when she sacrifices herself in order to save her lover.

Act I. The opera opens just as a term of seven years has elapsed. A wild and stormy scene is disclosed. Daland's ship has sought shelter in a little cove formed by the cliffs of the coast of Norway. The orchestra depicts the raging of the storm, and above it are heard the shouts of the sailors at work.

As the storm abates the sailors descend into the hold and Daland goes into the cabin to rest, leaving his Steersman in charge of the deck. The Steersman, as if to force himself to remain awake, intones a sailor song, but sleep overcomes him and the phrases become more and more detached, until at last he falls asleep.

Suddenly the ship of the Flying Dutchman, with blood-red sails and black mast, enters the harbour over against the ship of the Norwegian; then silently and without the least noise the spectral crew furl the sails. The Dutchman goes on shore.

Here now occur the weird, dramatic recitative and aria 'Die Frist is um' (The term is passed, and once again are ended seven long years). Daland perceives the Dutchman and going ashore questions him; in the course of their dialogue he discloses that he has a daughter. The Dutchman asks Daland to take him to his home nearby and allow him to woo his daughter, offering him his treasures. The storm having subsided and the wind being fair, the crews of the vessels hoist sail to leave port.

Act II. After an introduction in which we hear a portion of the Steersman's song, the curtain rises upon a room in Daland's house. On the farther wall the portrait of a pale man with a dark beard. Senta is absorbed in dreamy contemplation of the portrait. Her old nurse, Mary, and her young friends are spinning. Here we have that charming musical number famous all the musical world over, the 'Spinning Chorus'. It may be cited as a striking instance of Wagner's gift of melody. The girls tease Senta for gazing so dreamily at the portrait of the Flying Dutchman, and finally ask her if she will not sing his ballad. This begins with the storm music familiar from the overture, and with the strange measures of the Flying Dutchman's motif which sound like a voice calling in distress across the sea.

Senta repeats the measures of this motif, and then we have the simple phrases beginning 'A ship the restless ocean sweeps'. Throughout this portion of the ballad the orchestra depicts the surging and heaving of the ocean, Senta's voice ringing out dramatically above the accompaniment. She tells how he can be delivered from his curse, finally proclaiming that she is the woman who will save him. The girls about her spring up in terror and Eric, who has just entered the door and heard her outcry, hastens to her side. He brings news of the arrival of Daland's vessel, and Mary and the girls hasten forth to meet the sailors. Senta wishes to follow, but Eric restrains her and pleads his love for her in melodious measures. Senta, however, will not give him an answer. He tells her of a dream in which he saw a weird vessel from which two men, one her father, the other a ghastly-looking stranger, made their way.

Senta, worked up to the highest pitch of excitement by Eric's words, exclaims, 'He seeks for me and I for him,' and Eric rushes away. The door opens and the Dutchman and Daland appear. Senta turns from the picture to him, and remains standing as if transfixed without removing her eyes from the Dutchman. Daland in an aria tells her of the stranger's request, and leaves them alone. There follows a duet for Senta and the Dutchman, in which Senta gives herself up unreservedly to the hero of her romantic attachment, Daland finally entering and adding his congratulations on their betrothal.

Act III. The scene shows a bay with a rocky shore, with Daland's house in the foreground on one side, and the background occupied by his and the Dutchman's ships. The sailors and the girls in their merrymaking call loudly to the Dutch ship to join them, but no reply is heard. The sailors call louder and louder and taunt the crew of the other ship. Suddenly the sea, which has been calm, begins to rise. The wind whistles, and as blue flames flare up in the rigging, the weird crew show themselves and sing a wild chorus, which strikes terror into all the merrymakers. The girls have fled, and the Norwegian sailors quit their deck, making the sign of the cross. The crew of the Flying Dutchman, observing this, disappear with shrill laughter.

Senta now comes with trembling steps out of the house. She is followed by Eric. He pleads with her and entreats her to remember his love for her, and speaks also of the encouragement which she once gave him. The Dutchman has entered unperceived and has been listening. Eric, seeing him, at once recognises the man whom he saw in his vision. When the Flying Dutchman bids her farewell, deeming himself abandoned, and Senta endeavours to follow him, Eric holds her and summons others to his aid. Senta seeks to tear herself loose. The Flying Dutchman announces who he is, thinking to terrify her, and puts to sea. Senta, freeing herself, rushes to a cliff overhanging the sea, proclaims herself faithful unto death, and casts herself into the water, with her arms outstretched towards him. The phantom ship sinks, the sea rises high and falls back into a seething whirlpool. In the sunset glow the forms of Senta and the Dutchman are seen rising in each other's embrace from the sea and floating upwards. The work ends with the portion of the ballad which brought the overture and spinning scene to a close.

Wagner intended The Flying Dutchman to be played in a single act – another example of his efforts to break with tradition – and at Bayreuth in 1901 his original design was adhered to. For this purpose, Ernest Newman tells us in his invaluable Wagner Nights, cuts were made from bar 26 before the end of the orchestral postlude to Act I to bar 19 of the prelude to Act II, and a dozen bars were omitted at the end of Act II.

K.

TANNHÄUSER

und der Sängerkrieg auf Wartburg

Tannhäuser and the Song Contest on the Wartburg

Opera in three acts, text by the composer. Première Dresden, 19 October 1845, with Johanna Wagner, Schröder-Devrient, Tichatschek, Mitterwurzer, Dettner, conductor Wagner. Revised and performed (in what is now known as the 'Paris version') Opéra, Paris, 1861, with Marie Saxe, Fortunata Tedesco, Niemann, Morelli, Cazaux, conductor Dietsch. First performed New York, 1859; Covent Garden, 1876 (in Italian) with Albani, d'Angeri, Carpi, Maurel, Capponi, conductor Vianesi; Metropolitan, New York, 1884, with Seidl-Kraus, Slach, Schott, Adolf Robinson; Covent Garden (in French, in 'Paris version'), 1896, with Eames, Adini, Alvarez, Ancona, Plançon, conductor Mancinelli. Famous Tannhäusers include Max Alvary, Winkelmann, Urlus, Slezak, Schmedes, Melchior.

Hermann, Landgrave of Thuringia Bass

Minnesingers

Tannhäuser Tenor
 Wolfram von Eschenbach Baritone
 Walther von der Vogelweide Tenor
 Biterolf Baritone
 Heinrich der Schreiber Tenor
 Reinmar von Zweter Bass

Elisabeth, the Landgrave's niece Soprano

Venus Soprano or Mezzo-Soprano

Nobles, Knights, Ladies, Pilgrims, Sirens, Naiads, Nymphs, Bacchants

Place: Near Eisenach

Time: Early Thirteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 20 minutes

Wagner drafted his libretto in 1842, conflating two medieval legends, one concerning the crusading knight Tannhäuser, the other involving the song contest on the Wartburg. He finished the score in 1845 and it was first performed in Dresden, where it had limited success. Within ten years however it had been played in more than forty German houses.

In 1861, the composer remodelled Tannhäuser for an ill-starred production in Paris. Dissatisfied with the music for the Venusberg ballet which followed the rise of the curtain, he re-wrote it, maintaining however the original form of the overture. It was not apparently until 1872 that a re-worked overture was joined to the new Venusberg music to give the opera's opening its final form. Not surprisingly and particularly in Vienna, there was something approaching a public outcry over the sensuous nature of the new music.

Evidence exists to suggest that even before 1861, Wagner contemplated a revised bacchanale, but it was unquestionably for Paris that he recast the scene of the Hall of Song, removing a solo for Wolfram von Eschenbach but retaining much solo music in the earlier style. For Paris, too, the orchestral introduction to Act III was shortened, and the end of the opera rewritten with Venus brought on to the stage in order to clarify her role in Tannhäuser's internal drama. One problem facing Wagner with his new version of the opera was that his Paris revision had been with French words, and not all of the new music went easily with the regular metric scheme of the German he had already written.

The opera takes place in and near the Wartburg, where the Landgraves of the Thuringian Valley presided over contests between the famous Minnesingers. Near the castle stands the Venusberg, inhabited by Holda, the Goddess of Spring, who had in time become identified with the Goddess of Love. She seduced the Knights of the Wartburg and held them captive. One such knight was Tannhäuser, who, in spite of Venus's beauty, has by the time the opera starts grown weary of her charms and longs for a glimpse of the real world.

The overture, as with that of The Flying Dutchman, amounts to little less than the story of the opera told in orchestral form. It is based on four episodes: the pilgrims' chorus, the seductive Venusberg music, Tannhäuser's impassioned song in praise of Venus, and the threatening music of the Landgrave.

Act I. The Venusberg. Tannhäuser lies in the arms of Venus (originally a soprano, in the Paris version a mezzo-soprano), as nymphs, satyrs and sirens dance about them. Music familiar from the overture is heard during this scene but to it is added the distant voices of the sirens and the dances of the denizens of Venus's court. Tannhäuser sings his hymn to Venus, but loses no time in proclaiming his longing to return to the world. Venus tries to tempt him to remain with her but he insists on leaving. She warns him that misfortune awaits him and predicts he will some day ask to be taken back.

The scene is highly effective in the original version but unquestionably gains in power through the additions Wagner made for Paris. As later re-thought, the overture does not come to a formal close but leads directly into the Venusberg scene. The dances are elaborated and planned on an allegorical basis, and Venus's music is substantially strengthened.

The scene changes to the valley of the Wartburg. Tannhäuser kneels before a crucifix as a young shepherd pipes a pastoral tune. The voices of pilgrims are heard in the distance and, as they cross the scene, swell into an eloquent hymn of devotion. Tannhäuser is deeply affected. Hunting horns are heard and gradually the Landgrave and his party gather. Tannhäuser is recognised by Wolfram von Eschenbach and is greeted in a septet. They are intent on persuading Tannhäuser to return with them to the Wartburg instead of following the pilgrims to Rome. Wolfram in a fine solo ('Als du in kühnem Sange uns betrittest') tells him that Elisabeth, the Landgrave's niece, has mourned him ever since he left, and Tannhäuser, who was in love with her, is profoundly moved and agrees to return.

Act II. The Hall of Song. The introduction depicts Elisabeth's overwhelming joy at the prospect of Tannhäuser's return and when the curtain rises she radiantly greets the scene of his former triumphs ('Dich teure Halle'). Wolfram brings Tannhäuser to her and she asks where he has been. He is evasive but finally tells her that she attracted him back to the castle. They sing a rapidly flowing and dramatic duet ('Gepriesen sei die Stunde'). The Landgrave tells Elisabeth that he will offer her hand as prize to the man who wins the song contest. To an effective grand march, the singers make their entrance. After an address by the Landgrave, they draw lots to determine the order of singing. The Minnesingers in turn sing tamely of the beauty of virtuous love, to the increasing contempt of Tannhäuser, who finally, no longer able to restrain himself, repeats his hymn in praise of the unholy charms of Venus ('Dir, Göttin der Liebe, soll mein Lied ertönen'). Horrified, the Knights draw their swords as Elisabeth, in spite of Tannhäuser's betrayal of her love, throws herself protectingly in front of him ('Zurück von ihm!'). In short and excited phrases the men inveigh against Tannhäuser's crime. He is overcome by guilt, and the ensemble reaches a splendid climax ('Erbarm' dich mein!').

Voices of pilgrims are heard from the valley. The Landgrave, moved by Elisabeth's willingness to sacrifice herself for Tannhäuser, announces he will be allowed to join the pilgrimage to Rome and plead with the Pope for forgiveness.

Act III. The Valley of the Wartburg. Elisabeth, waiting for Tannhäuser's return, prays before the crucifix, watched by Wolfram. A chorus of returning pilgrims sings the melody heard in the overture and in the first act. Vainly Elisabeth looks for Tannhäuser, then sings her prayer ('Almächt'ge Jungfrau'). She rises and slowly returns to the castle.

It is night. The evening star glows in the sky, inspiring Wolfram to sing the beautiful 'Song to the Evening Star' ('O du mein holder Abendstern'), privately confessing his love for Elisabeth. Tannhäuser appears, weary and dejected. He asks Wolfram to show him the way back to the Venusberg. Wolfram persuades him to tell the story of his pilgrimage. In a passage of great splendour, Tannhäuser tells how he suffered on his way to Rome, where the Pope passed judgment: he can expect forgiveness only when the Pope's staff sprouts leaves. Tannhäuser thinks he has lost all chance of salvation and intends to yield to the delights of the Venusberg. Venus stretches out her arms to him in welcome, and when he seems unable to resist, Wolfram invokes the memory of Elisabeth. Venus disappears. A tolling of bells and mournful voices precede a funeral procession and Tannhäuser, recognising the body of Elisabeth, falls upon her bier in anguish. The pilgrims arrive with the Pope's staff, which has burst into leaf, and the opera ends amid their hallelujahs.

Wagner's allegory of a man's struggle between sacred and profane love is in itself a highly dramatic theme but it evolves into the notion of redemption through love, the theme which runs through almost all his mature work.

K., H.

LOHENGRIN

Opera in three acts, text by the composer. Première, Weimar, 28 August 1850, with Agthe, Fasztlinger, Beck, von Milde, Hoder, conductor Liszt. First performed Covent Garden, 1875 (in Italian), with Albani, d'Angeri, Nicolini, Maurel, Seiderman, conductor Vianesi; Drury Lane, 1882 (in German), with Sucher, Dily, Winkelmann, Kraus, Koegel, conductor Richter. First performed in New York, 1871; Academy of Music, New York, 1874 (in Italian), with Nilsson, Cary, Campanini, del Puente; Metropolitan (in German), 1885, with Seidl-Kraus, Brandt, Stritt, Robinson, Fischer, conducted by Seidl.

Heinrich der Vogler (Henry the Fowler),
King of Germany Bass
 Lohengrin Tenor
 Elsa of Brabant Soprano
 Duke Gottfried, her brother Silent
 Friedrich of Telramund, Count of Brabant Baritone
 Ortrud, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
 The King's Herald Baritone

Saxon, Thuringian, and Brabantian Counts and Nobles, Ladies of Honour, Pages, Attendants

Place: Antwerp

Time: First Half of the Tenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 40 minutes

Wagner intended Lohengrin for the opera in Dresden but his sympathy with the unsuccessful Dresden revolution of May 1849 led to his banishment and abandonment of the project. In the end, it was taken by Liszt for Weimar, but Wagner himself remained in exile in Switzerland and he is supposed not to have heard the entire opera until May 1861 in Vienna.

Owing to the lyric character of its story, the opera, while by no means lacking in dramatic situations, is characterised by a subtler and more subdued melodiousness than Tannhäuser, and is in fact more lyrical than any other Wagner opera except Parsifal. The score contains typical themes but they are not treated in the manner of leading motifs. On the other hand,

Wagner uses the orchestra with rare imagination: the brass chiefly to accompany the King and the martial choruses; the plaintive, yet spiritual high woodwind for Elsa; the English horn and bass clarinet for Ortrud; the violins, especially in high harmonic positions, to indicate the Grail and its representative, Lohengrin. Even the keys employed are distinctive. The Herald's trumpets are in C; F sharp minor, dark and threatening, is used for Ortrud; and A, the purest for strings and most ethereal in effect, announces the approach of Lohengrin and the influence of the Grail.

The Prelude is based on a single theme: the beautiful and expressive one of the sanctity of the Grail. It opens with long, drawn-out high chords on violins and flutes, then on violins alone, and works up through a crescendo to a magnificent climax, after which it dies away again to the ethereal harmonies.

Act I. A plain near the River Scheldt. King Heinrich has summoned the Brabantians to join his army to defeat the threatened Hungarian invasion of Germany. The King has found Brabant in factional strife over Friedrich of Telramund's claim to the ducal succession. Telramund tells the King how the late Duke placed his children, Elsa and Gottfried, in his care. Gottfried, the heir, has disappeared, and Telramund accuses Elsa of murdering him in order to claim the title. Telramund says he was so horrified by this that he rejected his right to marry Elsa and has instead married Ortrud, daughter of the Prince of Friesland. He leads her forward and she bows to the King. The King has no choice but to appeal to the immediate judgment of trial by combat between Telramund and whoever may appear as champion for Elsa. The King summons Elsa.

So far, the music has been vigorous, even harsh, reflecting Telramund's excitement; but with Elsa's appearance the music becomes gentle and plaintive, without however renouncing hope.

As violins whisper the Grail Motif, Elsa, enraptured, describes her dream of a Knight in white, sent by Heaven to defend her cause: 'Einsam in trüben Tagen' – the passage usually known as Elsa's Dream. After a triple summons by the Herald, a Swan can be seen in the distance on the river, drawing a boat in which stands a Knight in silver armour. Elsa, hardly daring to trust her senses, gazes heavenward, and Ortrud and Telramund look at each other in amazement and alarm.

The Knight bids farewell to the Swan ('Nun sei bedankt, mein lieber Schwann'). He bows to the King and approaches Elsa, offering his hand in marriage and declaring his willingness to fight for her. But he warns her never to ask where he is from or what his name is ('Nie sollst du mich befragen'). The Warning Motif is one of the significant themes of the opera. Elsa agrees to the conditions.

Before the combat begins, the King intones a prayer ('Mein Herr und Gott'), in which the principals and later the chorus join to noble effect. Three Saxons for the Knight and three Brabantians for Telramund pace off the circle within which the two men are to fight. The King strikes his sword on his shield, and the fight begins. The Knight fells Telramund but spares his life and bids him rise. The King leads Elsa to the Knight while all praise him in a great ensemble as her champion and betrothed.

Act II, scene i. The fortress of Antwerp; outside the Knights' palace. It is night, and skulking in the darkness are Telramund and Ortrud, who have been banished by the King. He is dejected ('Erhebe dich, Genossin meiner Schmach!'; Arouse yourself, companion of my shame!). She still trusts in the power of the heathen gods she worships. Telramund is unaware of Ortrud's scheming to ruin Elsa and restore him to power and denounces her in an outburst of rage and despair, his bitterness fuelled by sounds of revelry from inside the palace. Ortrud unfolds her plot: as tomorrow's bridal procession reaches the steps of the Minster, Telramund will accuse the Knight of treachery and demand he disclose his name and origin. Thus will Elsa begin to doubt.

At this very moment, Elsa comes onto the balcony, enraptured by her approaching marriage ('Euch Lüften die mein Klagen'). Ortrud, sending Telramund away, calls to Elsa, who, moved by her apparent misery, descends to lead her into the palace. Ortrud has already begun her persuasive work but she has time to call on her gods to help in her plan of revenge ('Entweihte Götter!'). The scene ends with a beautiful duet as Ortrud is conducted by Elsa into the fortress.

Scene ii. In front of the Minster. After a spirited chorus the bride herself appears, followed by her ladies. Ortrud throws herself in her path, saying that Elsa still does not know who her Knight is, and casting doubt on his reasons for secrecy. The King, the bridegroom and the nobles enter from the palace and Elsa shrinks from Ortrud to her champion's side. At this moment, Telramund, taking his cue from Ortrud, appears and repeats his wife's accusations. The poison has already begun to take effect. Bride and groom go into the church, but the trembling Elsa catches sight of Ortrud and goes to the altar with feelings of love mingled with doubt and fear.

Act III, scene i. The bridal chamber. The wedding festivities are described in a brilliant introduction, followed by the famous bridal chorus (whose popularity in isolation Wagner deplored). The King ceremonially embraces the couple and the procession makes its way out, leaving Elsa and her champion alone for the first time.

It should be a moment of supreme happiness for both, and indeed, Elsa exclaims as her bridegroom takes her into his arms that words cannot express all love's hidden sweetness. When he tenderly says her name, Elsa is reminded that she cannot respond by uttering his. The Knight realises that the seeds of mistrust have been sown. Elsa begins to question him and, in a passionate musical phrase, he begs her to trust him. Elsa imagines she sees the Swan approaching to take her Knight away from her, and she asks him the forbidden questions. Immediately, Telramund and four of his followers burst in, intending to kill the Knight, but he fells Telramund with a single blow. The followers kneel in front of the Knight, who tells them to bear the corpse to the King.

This section is an extended love duet of quite extraordinary beauty, as Lohengrin throws open the window, points to the flowery garden below illuminated by the moon, and sings 'Atmest du nicht mit mir die süßen Düfte?'. Gradually the magic yields to suspicion, and, as Elsa collapses, the Warning Motif can be heard. The duet is in linked sections, but the flow is marvellously sustained as it proceeds from pure lyricism to the dramatic end. It is a high point of its kind in Wagner's output.

Scene ii. The banks of the Scheldt, as in Act I. The assembled nobles and Brabantians hail the King in a brilliant march and chorus. The Knight enters, saying he has come to bid them all farewell. Elsa has been induced to break her vow and he will now answer the forbidden questions. His narration, 'In fernen Land', is beautifully set to the music already heard in the Prelude. He reveals he is from Montsalvat, the Temple of the Holy Grail. The Grail gives its Knights the power to right wrong and protect the innocent, but only so long as the secret of their power remains intact. His father, Parsifal, rules as King, and he, a Knight of the Grail, is called Lohengrin. As he proclaims his name, we hear the same measures which Elsa sang in the second part of her dream in Act I. The Swan returns and Lohengrin bids Elsa a sorrowing farewell ('Mein lieber Schwann'). He hands Elsa his horn, his sword and his ring to give to her brother should he return; then enters the boat.

A triumphant Ortrud pushes her way through the spectators. She exclaims that the Swan is Elsa's brother, Gottfried, whom Ortrud changed into his present form. Had Elsa kept her vow, Gottfried would have been freed from the spell. Lohengrin prays and a white dove descends over the boat, as the Swan vanishes. In its place Gottfried stands on the bank. Ortrud falls with a shriek, while the crowd kneels and Gottfried bows to the King. Elsa gazes at her brother in rapture, as Lohengrin is drawn away in his boat by the dove. 'My husband! my husband!' she calls, and sinks back dead. The opera ends with a repetition of the music of the second portion of Elsa's dream, followed by a splendid climax of the Motif of the Grail.

The music of Lohengrin is so beguiling that no lesser advocate of Wagner's achievement than Ernest Newman once said that a true lover of Wagner's music might have wished that he had never turned from this aspect of his development to write his later masterpieces.

K., H.

TRISTAN UND ISOLDE

Tristan and Isolde

Opera in three acts, text by the composer. Première Munich, 10 June 1865, with Malvina and Ludwig Schnorr von Carolsfeld (the Tristan and Isolde were husband and wife), Anne Deinet, Zottmeyer, Mitterwurzer, Heinrich, conductor Hans von Bülow. Bülow was still married to Cosima, Liszt's daughter, at the time of the première of Tristan and did not divorce her until a year later, after which she became Wagner's wife. The first production after Munich was not until 1874, at Weimar. First performed Drury Lane, London, 1882, with Rose Sucher, Brandt, Winkelmann, Gura, Landau, conductor Hans Richter; Bayreuth, 1886, with Malten, Gisela, Staudigl, Gudehus, Gura, Plank, conductor Mottl; Metropolitan, New York, 1886, with Lilli Lehmann, Brandt, Niemann, Robinson, Fischer, conductor Seidl; Covent Garden, 1892, with Sucher, Schumann-Heink, Alvary, Knapp, conductor Mahler. Jean de Reszke was a great Tristan and others were Schmedes, Vogel, Urlus, Melchior, Vinay and Windgassen. Famous Isoldes have included Nordica, Ternina, Fremstad, Mildenburg, Wittich (the first Salome), Litvinne, Gadski, Kappel, Leider, Larsen-Todsen, Marta Fuchs, Lubin, Flagstad, Traubel, Varnay, Mödl, Birgit Nilsson. Giuseppe Borgatti and Giuseppina Cobelli were well-known exponents of the title roles in Italy.

Tristan, a Cornish knight, nephew to King Marke Tenor
Marke, King of Cornwall Bass
Isolde, an Irish princess Soprano
Kurwenal, one of Tristan's retainers Baritone
Melot, a courtier, Tristan's friend Tenor
Brangäne, Isolde's companion Soprano
A Young Sailor Tenor
A Shepherd Tenor
A Helmsman Baritone

Place: A Ship at Sea; outside King Marke's Palace in Cornwall; Tristan's Castle in Kareol

Time: Legendary

Running Time: 4 hours 15 minutes

Wagner subjected the Tristan legend to a thorough re-modelling before turning it into a music drama. Everything was pared down to essentials and the main episodes have been worked into a concise, vigorous, swift-moving drama, showing particularly keen insight in the matter of the love-potion. In the legends, the love of Tristan and Isolde is the result of the love-philtre, but Wagner presents them as in love from the outset, so that the potion does no more than quicken a passion already active. In the past, the story had been a favourite of the troubadours, whose fantasy decorated the tale as they told it. Dante mentions Tristan in the Inferno, Tennyson retold the story in Idylls of the King, and Frank Martin derived a chamber opera, Le Vin Herbé, from the same source.

Wagner mentions the subject as a definite project in a letter to Liszt in 1854 at a time when he was writing Die Walküre. He started to compose the music in mid-1857, when he was engaged on Siegfried, and during the twelve-year gap (1857–69) between finishing Act II of Siegfried and resuming with Act III, he wrote not only Tristan but Die Meistersinger as well – the need to write music in absolute contrast to what had seemed appropriate for the Nibelung legend must truly have been overpowering! Tristan was published in 1860 but for years considered unperformable.

Tristan und Isolde (Metropolitan Opera House, New York, c. 1936). Lauritz Melchior and Kirsten Flagstad in the title roles.

The opera is less a dramatic action brought to the stage, rather a musico-poetic idea remote from anything physical. Nonetheless, it is based on a story and, before the opera begins, we should know that Tristan, having lost his parents in infancy, had been brought up by his uncle Marke, King of Cornwall. He slew in fair combat Morold, an Irish knight, who came to Cornwall to collect the tribute that country had been paying to Ireland. Morold was betrothed to his cousin Isolde, daughter of the Irish King, and Tristan, who was dangerously wounded in the fight, placed himself, under the pseudonym of Tantris, in care of Isolde, whose healing skills were legendary. Isolde cured Tristan but became aware that she was harbouring the slayer of her intended husband; in spite of her thirst for vengeance, she fell in love with him. Tristan too fell in love, but each believed their love unrequited. After his return to Cornwall, Tristan was sent to Ireland by King Marke to win Isolde as his Queen.

The Prelude to Tristan tells in music the story of the two lovers. Its first bars contain the two Motifs of Tristan and Isolde and the Motif of the Love Glance – which expresses the couple's sensuous yearning; these motifs recur throughout the Prelude.

Act I. On the ship in which Tristan is taking Isolde to Cornwall, Isolde occupies the forward deck. A young sailor is heard singing a farewell song to his 'Irish Maid'. Brangäne replies to Isolde's question as to the ship's course and the orchestra seems to surge wildly around Isolde's outburst of impotent anger when she learns that Cornwall is near, breaking into fury as she invokes the elements to destroy the ship and all on it.

Isolde's mood is dominated by her passion for Tristan and her anger that he is taking her as bride to another man. For Tristan, she wishes for nothing less than death, but Brangäne sings his praises as Isolde demands she send Tristan to her. Tristan declines to leave the ship's helm and his retainer Kurwenal answers for him with a song. Isolde's anger at Kurwenal's taunts – his song amounts to nothing less – finds vent in a narrative in which she tells Brangäne how she came to love Tristan, bringing the story to a splendid climax with a furious outburst against his treachery. Brangäne whispers of the love potion and takes a phial from a casket. As Kurwenal brusquely calls to her and Brangäne to prepare to go ashore, Isolde orders Kurwenal to send Tristan to her and tells Brangäne to prepare the death potion. The motif which announces Tristan's approach is full of tragic defiance, as if he were prepared to meet death. Isolde claims she wants to drink to their reconciliation, but in a sombrely impressive passage, he asks Isolde to slay him with the sword she once held over him as he lay sick.

The sailors hail the land as Isolde hands Tristan the goblet containing, as she thinks, the death-draught, for which Brangäne has substituted the love potion. He seizes it and drinks and Isolde grabs it from him. The Love Glance motif is heard as they sink into each other's arms. Brangäne separates the lovers as people crowd the deck and the act ends as Isolde's motif is heard above the general jubilation.

Act II. A garden outside King Marke's castle. The King and his entourage are hunting. With them is Melot, who is outwardly devoted to Tristan but whom Brangäne suspects of double-dealing, with the hunt no more than a trap. As the sound of the hunt grows distant, Isolde urges Brangäne to extinguish the torch as a signal for Tristan to join her, laughs as Brangäne warns of Melot's treachery, says the love potion merely intensified her passion, and proclaims she will signal to Tristan even at the risk of putting out the light of her life.

Impatience leads to ecstasy as Isolde and Tristan rush into each other's arms, the music awash with passion. In a rapid exchange of phrases, they declare their mutual love. As day sinks into night, the music turns from urgency to rapture and the lovers commence their great duet, 'O sink hernieder, Nacht der Liebe'. Brangäne's voice interrupts, warning that night will soon be over ('Einsam wachend') and the arpeggios which accompany her warning are like the first grey streaks of dawn. The lovers refuse to listen to her, preferring to express their yearning for death through love: the Liebestod.¹

¹ The word, now customarily applied to the music of Isolde's death, was intended by Wagner to characterise the Prelude, which contains the seeds of death through love. He used it for the first time for concert performances he was giving in Paris in 1860. When the opera's closing section was given in concert in conjunction with the Prelude it was described as 'Verklärung' (Transfiguration).

As early as their declaration of love after drinking the potion, Tristan had pledged himself and Isolde to the mystical other-world of Night, and insisted that is where he and Isolde belong: Night protects their love while Day destroys it. Act II propounds the opposites of Night, where Tristan knows he thrives, and Day, from which all evil flows and which when it arrives at the end of the Act – the only period effectively they spend together – will separate them for ever.

Brangäne calls again, but Isolde exclaims that night will protect them. With the dawn, the dream ends. There is a cry from Brangäne and Kurwenal rushes in, calling to Tristan to save himself. Surrounded by the King's followers, including the treacherous Melot, the lovers awaken to the terror of the situation. The King, who is no commonplace cuckold but a saddened, noble, mature figure, in a philosophical soliloquy tries to understand the unfathomable nature of events.

Tristan turns to Isolde. Will she follow him to the bleak land of his birth? This is too much for Melot, who draws his sword. Tristan rushes upon him but, as Melot thrusts, allows his guard to drop and is wounded.

Act III. Tristan's castle at Kareol in Brittany. The melancholy introduction is prophetic of the desolation which broods over the scene. A long, ascending phrase seems to represent the broad waste of ocean overlooked by Tristan's castle. Tristan himself is lying under a great tree, Kurwenal by his side. A shepherd pipes a melancholy tune (solo cor anglais), then tells Kurwenal that the ship he has sent to Cornwall to bring Isolde to Kareol is not yet in sight. Eventually Tristan, to Kurwenal's great joy, wakes from his coma and loses himself in sad memories of Isolde. Kurwenal tells him Isolde is coming to try to heal his wound. The ship is still not in sight and jubilation gives way to yearning. Tristan's mind wanders until, in a paroxysm of anguish not far from insanity, he curses love. Three times the music reaches climax as Tristan pushes his physical resistance to the limits and after each climax he sinks into total exhaustion, so that Kurwenal wonders if his master can survive another bout of such hysteria. Tristan inveighs against sun and light, symbols of Day; against the loss of father and mother before he could do anything for himself; against the absence of Isolde. Gradually, his vision of Isolde becomes calmer and the music takes on an incomparably expressive quality with the passage beginning 'Wie sie selig'.

Suddenly the shepherd's piping takes a joyful turn. The ship is in sight! Kurwenal runs off to meet Isolde and Tristan struggles to rise, to music of frenzied urgency tearing the bandage from his wound. Isolde rushes in and Tristan, murmuring her name, dies in her arms. A second ship arrives with King Marke and his entourage. Kurwenal thinks they have come in pursuit of Isolde, attacks the newcomers, killing Melot, but in turn receives a mortal wound. Brangäne hurries in to tell Isolde she has confessed to the King that she switched the potions, but Isolde is beyond the understanding of mere events. In what we now call her Liebestod ('Mild und leise'), which reaches its climax with a stupendous crash of instrumental forces, she gazes in rapture on her dead lover, then sinks upon his corpse and dies.

Tristan is the most influential opera in all musical history. Hans Redlich, the German musicologist, wrote: 'The orchestral Prelude alone, in which the implicit tonality of A minor is never so much as touched upon, is to all intents and purposes the first piece of practical atonalism, conceived half a century before Schoenberg and Busoni had drafted their first tentative experiments in the direction of a music of undefined tonality.' Musicians since they came to know Tristan have known that this is true. Wagner knew it too, claims Ernest Newman, but his conviction was deep enough to convince him to leave the opera's music to speak for itself. Commentators and analysts would make claims on its behalf and he himself could remain silent.

H.

DIE MEISTERSINGER VON NÜRNBERG

The Mastersingers of Nuremberg

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer. First performed Munich, 21 June 1868, with Mathilde Mallinger as Eva, Sophie Dietz as Magdalene, Franz Betz as Sachs, Gustav Holzel as Beckmesser, Franz Nachbaur as Walther and Max Schlosser as David, conducted by Hans von Bülow. First U.K. performance at Drury Lane, 1882, conducted by Hans Richter; Covent Garden, 1889, in Italian, with Emma Albani, Jean de Reszke and Jean Lassalle. Friedrich Schorr sang Sachs there in 1925, succeeded by Hans Hotter, Josef Greindl, Norman Bailey, Hans Sotin, Bernd Weikl and John Tomlinson; as Eva, Lotte Lehmann, Elisabeth Schumann, Elisabeth Grümmer, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Irmgard Seefried, Joan Sutherland, Lucia Popp, Felicity Lott and Nancy Gustafson. Conductors have included Bruno Walther, Thomas Beecham, John Barbirolli, Karl Rankl, Reginald Goodall, Rudolf Kempe, Georg Solti, Christoph von Dohnanyi and Bernard Haitink. First U.S. performance, New York, 1886, with Seidl-Kraus, Marianne Brandt, Emil Fischer, Josef Staudigl, Kemnitz, Stritt, Kraemer, conducted by Anton Seidl; in Italian, 1892.

Walther von Stolzing, a young knight

| | |
|---|---------------|
| from Franconia | Tenor |
| Eva, Pogner's daughter | Soprano |
| Magdalene, Eva's companion | Mezzo-Soprano |
| David, apprenticed to Hans Sachs | Tenor |
| Veit Pogner, a goldsmith | Bass |
| Sixtus Beckmesser, town clerk | Baritone |
| Kunz Vogelsang, a furrier | Tenor |
| Konrad Nachtigall, a tinsmith | Bass |
| Hans Sachs, a cobbler | Baritone |
| Fritz Kothner, a baker | Bass |
| Hermann Ortel, a soap-boiler | Bass |
| Balthasar Zorn, a pewterer | Tenor |
| Augustin Moser, a tailor | Tenor |
| Hans Foltz, a coppersmith | Bass |
| Hans Schwarz, a stocking-weaver | Bass |
| Nightwatchman | Bass |

People of Nuremberg, Members of the Guilds, Journeyman, Apprentices, Girls

Place: Nuremberg

Time: Mid-Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 4 hours 55 minutes

Wagner first thought about Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg in 1845. The story of a young man whose radical ideas about art triumph over the hostile judgement of the establishment and win him the beautiful daughter of a goldsmith (and all her father's property) had considerable charm for the late-developing thirty-two-year-old composer. At one point, he thought of it as the 'satire play' to follow another opera about a singing competition, Tannhäuser: his satire against the mastersingers and their rules was originally much harsher than in the completed opera. Wagner himself reported that the Viennese critic Eduard Hanslick took offence when he attended a reading of the text in 1862. He may well have known that Wagner's original name for Beckmesser was Veit Hanslich. Wagner returned to the story after he had written Tristan und Isolde as a sort of light relief. He promised the publisher Franz Schott that it would be 'easily staged': every theatre, 'even the smallest', would be able to produce it.

It is the day before the Feast of St John the Baptist, when the Guild of Mastersingers stage their annual competition for the best composition and performance of a song by one of their members. The young knight Walther von Stolzing has come to Nuremberg to sell his land. The goldsmith Veit Pogner has been helping him and Walther has fallen in love with Eva, Pogner's daughter. Pogner is a mastersinger, devoted to the guild. He has decided that Eva will marry the winner of this year's competition. She can refuse the winner, but she must marry a mastersinger.

The opera's prelude gives, as Kobbé said, 'a complete musical epitome of the story'. The stately Motif of the Mastersingers is opposed by the Lyric Motif, which in turn is checked by the Mastersingers' March. The Motif of the Art Brotherhood leads to a climax in the Motif of the Ideal. The Motif of Longing leads to 'Walther's Prize Song' and then to the Motif of Spring and the Motif of Ridicule. At the end, the Prize Song 'soars above the various themes typical of the masters, [as] the new ideal seems to be borne to its triumph upon the shoulders of the conservative forces which, won over at last, have espoused the cause with all their sturdy energy.'

Act I. In St Catherine's church, the service is ending with a chorale. Walther succeeds in attracting Eva's attention. She sends her companion and chaperone Magdalene on various errands, and the young couple establish their mutual attraction. She swears she will marry only Walther. Magdalene tells David, who is apprenticed to the great Hans Sachs, the leading mastersinger, that he must instruct Walther, so that he becomes a mastersinger. As the apprentices convert the church into a song-school, David points out that it takes years of study. He warns Walther about Beckmesser, the mastersinger who acts as 'Marker' at auditions, chalking up faults on a blackboard. More than seven marks means failure.

Pogner assumes that Beckmesser himself will win the competition. Beckmesser shares this assumption, though he knows that he has not yet won Eva's heart. He resolves to serenade her that evening. The other mastersingers arrive and take their places. Pogner explains why he offers his daughter (as well as all he owns) as a prize in the competition. It is in order to counter the prevailing view that the middle classes are only interested in material values. Hans Sachs suggests they let the people at the festival choose the winner, but cannot secure the other mastersingers' agreement. Pogner introduces Walther as the new candidate to join the guild. The mastersingers' unease at a nobleman trying to join is confirmed when Walther sings an apparently improvised song in praise of spring. He also reveals that his only teachers have been old books and nature (he puns on Walther von der Vogelweide, whose name means 'bird-pasture'). Long before its end Beckmesser has filled his slate with faults (including 'no coloratura'). Only Sachs hears in its unconventionality that the nobleman's 'heart is in the right place'.

Act II. A square with Pogner's house opposite Sachs's. Magdalene is sad to hear from David that Walther was rejected by the mastersingers. Eva sits with her father under the lime tree (whose rustling is deliciously evoked by Wagner). He confirms that she must marry a mastersinger.

Hans Sachs sits up late. He doesn't work, but reflects on the song Walther sang: 'It sounded so old and yet it was so new, like birdsong in May.' Eva comes to find out more about the knight. She flirts playfully with Sachs, who tells her he is finishing a pair of shoes for Beckmesser, her eager suitor. But when he realises that she cares for the knight, Sachs determines to help him succeed in the competition.

Eva and Walther meet in the street and he persuades her to elope with him. He bitterly resents the way he was treated and draws his sword in protest. His tirade climaxes on a discord, which is resolved by the sound of the Nightwatchman's horn as he passes on his round. It is a magical moment. The Nightwatchman, incidentally, is one of the few roles in which a young, talented bass can make a considerable impact.

Sachs has overheard the lovers' plans. He positions a lamp so they cannot get away in the darkness. Beckmesser comes to serenade Eva, but Magdalene takes her place at the window. Eva stops Walther from killing his rival and draws him into the bushes. While Sachs works at his cobbling, he sings a song warning Eva that he knows what's going on. Beckmesser asks Sachs to comment on the song that he will perform tomorrow. Sachs offers to act as 'marker' and, as Beckmesser sings, hammers the sole on to the shoe every time he finds a fault. It drives Beckmesser into a frenzy, and the noise eventually wakes the town. David recognises Magdalene at the window and presumes he has a rival. He starts to fight Beckmesser. Their fight attracts the neighbours who soon turn it into a general mêlée. Walther is about to cut his way through with his sword when Sachs drags him inside his shop. The riot's climax repeats the sequence of Walther's protest. Music, in the form of the Nightwatchman's call, restores order once again.

Act III. Sachs's workshop, where David asks to be forgiven. His master is in abstracted mood. He reflects on everyone's madness in a monologue that is one of the highpoints of the score ('Wahn, Wahn, überall Wahn'). He encourages Walther to use the dream he had overnight as inspiration for his 'prize song'. Sachs writes the notes down, as Walther recounts his dream of a beautiful garden ('Morgenlich leuchtend in rosigem Schein').

Beckmesser limps in, aching from his beating, and discovers the pages with Sachs's handwriting. He assumes this is Sachs's own 'prize song' and steals it. When Sachs comes, Beckmesser accuses him of being his rival for Eva's hand. Sachs assures him he is not. Noticing that his papers have disappeared from his desk, he says Beckmesser may have them and promises he will never reveal his authorship.

Eva comes. While Sachs tackles one of her new shoes (which manages to be both too broad and too tight), she gazes at Walther and inspires him to improvise the last verse of his prize song. The emotions that have been hidden until now burst out: Eva weeps on Hans Sachs's breast, Walther presses his hand. She thanks Sachs for teaching her what love is; he replies that he did not want to share King Mark's fate, referring to the husband Isolde betrayed for Tristan. When David and Magdalene conveniently appear, Sachs arranges a mock christening for the new song. Since apprentices can't act as witnesses, Sachs releases David from his indentures. There follows a marvellous quintet.

The last scene is set in an open meadow outside the city, prepared for St John's Day. Guilds process, apprentices and journeymen dance, till the mastersingers march in with considerable pomp. When Hans Sachs arrives, the people sing the chorale 'Wach' auf', to the original Hans Sachs's words, in his honour. He addresses the crowd and reminds them that Pogner's promise demonstrates the respect in which art is held in Nuremberg. Beckmesser mangles the words of Walther's song, which reinforces the idea that he could not compose music that was worthy of the poetry. Everyone laughs at him. Sachs introduces Walther. His performance of his prize song wins the approval of both the people and the mastersingers. Pogner offers Walther the chain with a picture of King David that represents membership of the guild, but Walther refuses it. Hans Sachs intervenes and, in the last of his great monologues, he credits the mastersingers with preserving what is good and true in German art ('Verachtet mir die Meister nicht'). The opera ends as the mastersingers and the people unite in acclaiming Hans Sachs.

Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg's special strength is that, like the best comedies, it is a serious work. This is what justifies its inordinate length: when it was new it was the longest opera ever written (or, perhaps more properly, ever performed). At its heart is not the plight of the young lovers, but the role of art in the community. It is an opera about opera, but this is never a narcissistic exercise. Hans Sachs is one of the greatest bass-baritone roles in the repertory. His character combines aspects of both Wotan and the Marschallin, but more importantly, he encapsulates a humaneness that must represent Wagner's best aspects, those that were sometimes submerged by other instincts. This is why his final admonition to respect 'holy German art' carries such weight and has to be heard in context. Beckmesser can seem a more problematic portrayal. It is partly that the humour of his beating has lost its savour. The problem becomes more acute when we know that Wagner wrote into the role vocal characteristics that he associated with Jews.¹ On the other hand, recent productions have emphasised Beckmesser's normality: with singers of the calibre of Hermann Prey and Thomas Allen prepared to lend their weight to the role, Beckmesser has emerged as less of a caricature, more of a complex character, the Malvolio of opera. P.

¹ His serenade is 'a parody of Jewish cantorial style, with long melodic wailing syllables sung in a near-falsetto tessitura', Paul Lawrence Rose, Wagner Race and Revolution, 1992.

DER RING DES NIBELUNGEN

The Nibelung's Ring

Wagner's vast Ring cycle may or may not be the greatest event inside the form loosely known as opera but it is certainly the grandest. What is curious is that Wagner, the great musical architect, did not initially conceive it as the four-part structure we know, though he clearly always envisaged a huge canvas: modern commentators have compared it in scale with The Oresteia. He started work as early as 1848 and by 1850 had completed the book of what he called Siegfrieds Tod (Siegfried's Death), which subsequently became Götterdämmerung (The Twilight of the Gods) and ended originally with Brünnhilde leading Siegfried to Valhalla. He had considered immediately starting to compose Siegfried's Death, but came to feel the need to explain events which led up to it and in turn wrote The Young Siegfried, The Valkyrie and The Rhine Gold, thus creating the cycle as it were in reverse. The whole cycle was first performed at Bayreuth, 13–17 August 1876; Rhine Gold première, Munich, 22 September 1869; Valkyrie, 26 June 1870. The Bayreuth cast included Franz Betz (Wotan), Amalie Materna (Brünnhilde), Georg Unger (Siegfried).

Composition of The Rhine Gold was started in 1853 and the full score of Twilight finished in 1874, but amazingly there occurred an interregnum of nearly twelve years (1857 to 1869) during which he not only composed Tristan und Isolde (1857–59) and Die Meistersinger (1862–67), but attempted to cope with so severe a dip in his fortunes as to lead him at one stage to contemplate abandoning composition altogether. He must have felt an overpowering need to write music of a quite different nature from what he was composing for The Ring, music which in Tristan was to come close to parting company with tonality and to pointing a way for the future not fully taken up (though highly influential) until the time of Schoenberg's earliest experiments some fifty years later. The Ring, for all its inventiveness and innovative construction, was fashioned from music of slightly less iconoclastic cast.

Wagner's studies of Teutonic and Norse myth undertaken over many years provided him with the subject matter of The Ring, which involves gods, demi-gods, giants, earth-dwellers and inhabitants of the underworld. The fierce competition between them for wealth and ultimate dominance constitutes the stuff of the drama, but there is room for examination in depth of the more human motives of the characters involved. The music is held together by a large number of motifs, sometimes with meanings and attachments as straightforward as 'the Rhine Gold', 'the Ring', 'Valhalla', 'The Giants', 'the Sword', even concepts like 'Renunciation of Love'; often with strong initial attachments but shifting connotations, as, to take an example, that of 'the Rhine', specifically descriptive of the river during the prelude to The Rhine Gold but later taking on wider references as when two hours later and to its accompaniment Erda sings of her own all-pervading wisdom. To think of them as labels or visiting cards is not only confusing and inadequate but does an injustice to Wagner's incredibly dexterous and fertile use of his materials, which he employs hardly ever as musical shorthand but rather as means towards the creation of musical edifices great enough to carry the burden of a colossal epic drama whose overtones and ramifications later generations have not succeeded in exhausting.

In The Ring, the antagonists play for great stakes but their not infrequent moral transgressions are subject to high moral laws. Both Wotan, the King of the Gods, and Alberich, ruler of the underworld Nibelungen, aspire to ultimate heights of wealth and power. In order to rob the Rhinemaidens of the Rhine Gold, Alberich renounces Love (but later in the drama fathers Hagen by an act of near rape). From the gold he forges a Ring which will make its owner all-powerful. Wotan by an act indistinguishable from theft obtains gold and Ring from Alberich, who curses the Ring. Instead of returning it to the Rhinemaidens, Wotan ransoms Freia, goddess of youth, from Fafner and Fasolt, to whom he had promised her as fee for building Valhalla. No sooner have the giants obtained the Ring, than Alberich's curse claims its first victim, Fafner killing his brother and retiring to guard Ring and treasure in the obscurity of a cave.

Wotan takes twofold precautions against the future: first, the fathering with Erda of a race of war-like Valkyries. They carry to Valhalla dead heroes who will with the Valkyries defend it in case of war with the Nibelungs. The second is more complex. The Ring can be redeemed from Fafner, restored to the Rhinemaidens, and the curse lifted from the race of the gods only through the intervention of a hero impelled by pure and unselfish motive. The gods are ruled out because they have too much to gain. Wotan therefore casts off his divinity and fathers twins, Siegmund and Sieglinde. Siegmund, to steel him for his role of hero, is subjected to trials (like Tamino in The Magic Flute, like him magically supported, in his case by a sword), but the scheme founders when he and Sieglinde fall in love.

Their offspring Siegfried, fortuitously raised by the dwarf Mime, Alberich's brother, knows no fear, kills Fafner and becomes master of the gold, and at the same time the object of high-level plotting on the part of Alberich and Mime, who mean to regain what they lost, and of his grandfather Wotan, who must persuade or coerce him to part with the gold if he is to restore it to the Rhinemaidens. The foremost representative of the Valkyries, offspring of Wotan and Erda, is Brünnhilde, whose valour and sympathetic understanding of his own efforts make her her father's favourite. When she defies Wotan in an effort to save Siegmund's life (and incidentally saves the unborn Siegfried), Wotan puts her to sleep surrounded by magic fire which only a hero may penetrate. Armed with Siegmund's sword which he has succeeded in re-forging, Siegfried smashes Wotan's hitherto invincible spear and with it Wotan's power, rescues Brünnhilde and claims her as his bride, only to be bamboozled through a drug by Hagen (Alberich's son) into surrendering her to Gunther, king of the Gibichungs. Siegfried comes within an ace of voluntarily giving up the gold to the Rhinemaidens, regains his memory of Brünnhilde, and is slain by Hagen. It remains for Brünnhilde to perform the final act of renunciation, ignite the funeral pyre she has caused to be built, ride into the flames and at the same time return the gold to its owners, reunite with the slain Siegfried and expiate the crimes and follies of the gods, thus fulfilling Wotan's will to end the rule of the gods.

H.

| RHEINGOLD | WALKÜRE | SIEGFRIED | GÖTTERDÄMMERUNG |
|----------------------|------------------|----------------|-----------------------------------|
| Gods | | | |
| Wotan | Wotan | Wanderer |Bass-Baritone |
| Donner | | |Baritone |
| Froh | | |Tenor |
| Loge | | |Tenor |
| Fricka | Fricka | |Mezzo-Soprano |
| Freia | | |Soprano |
| Erda | | Erda |Contralto |
| | Valkyries | | |
| | Brünnhilde | Brünnhilde |Soprano |
| | Gerhilde | |Soprano |
| | Helmwige | |Soprano |
| | Ortlinde | |Soprano |
| | Waltraute | |Mezzo-Soprano |
| | Rossweiße | |Mezzo-Soprano |
| | Siegrune | |Mezzo-Soprano |
| | Grimgerde | |Mezzo-Soprano |
| | Schwertleite | |Contralto |
| | | |Contralto, Mezzo, Soprano |
| | | | |
| Rhinemaidens | | | |
| Woglinde | | |Soprano |
| Wellgunde | | |Soprano |
| Flosshilde | | |Contralto |
| | | | |
| Giants | | | |
| Fasolt | | |Bass |
| Fafner | | Fafner |Baritone |
| | | | |
| Nibelungs | | | |
| Alberich | | Alberich |Baritone |
| Mime | | Mime |Tenor |
| | | | |
| | Mortals | | |
| | Siegmond | |Tenor |
| | Sieglinde | |Soprano |
| | Hunding | |Bass |
| | | Siegfried |Tenor |
| | | | |
| | | | Gibichungs |
| | | | Hagen |
| | | |Bass |
| | | | Gutrune |
| | | |Soprano |
| | | | Gunther |
| | | |Baritone |
| | | | Gibichung Vassals and Women |
| | | | |
| | | Woodbird |Soprano |
| Running Time: | | | |
| 2 hours 35 mins | 4 hours | 4 hours 5 mins | 4 hours 35 mins |

DAS RHEINGOLD

The Rhine Gold

The prelude sets The Ring on its way with a soft low E flat from the depths of the Rhine; a horn intones the Rhine motif. In lyrical music, the Rhinemaidens sing, Alberich splashing lecherously around them until his eye is caught by the glint of the gold, a ring made of which he learns from the Rhinemaidens will invest its owner with great power – but only if he renounces love. Alberich, rejected by the Rhinemaidens, makes such a vow and seizes the gold, thus committing the first crime in its name.

Across the Rhine can be made out Valhalla, the castle of the Gods, and Fricka wakes Wotan who sings of its glories. Fricka reminds him he must pay for it by yielding Freia to the Giants who have built it, and Freia appears in flight from them. Froh and Donner, her brothers, try ineffectively to defend her against the Giants' insistence, but Wotan takes courage with the appearance of Loge. Loge tells Wotan of Alberich's theft of the gold, cunningly inciting the curiosity of the Giants as he describes his own wanderings and Alberich's renunciation of love. The Giants decide to accept the gold rather than Freia but retain her as hostage until Wotan can deliver. As she is led off, the Gods wilt in the absence of their sister, Goddess of Youth. Wotan's problem, urged by their predicament and his own by now overmastering desire for gold and Ring, is how to obtain both. 'Durch Raub!' (By theft!) says Loge in one of The Ring's more startling moments.

Das Rheingold (Covent Garden, 1996, director Richard Jones, designer Nigel Lowery). Matthias Hölle (Fafner), Peter Rose (Fasolt), Rita Cullis (Freia).

An orchestral passage takes us to the underworld of the Nibelungs, where Alberich is brutally insisting Mime give him the magic Tarn helmet he has just manufactured. Its wearer can assume any shape he chooses. To test his invisibility, Alberich pinches and punches Mime, who is alone when Wotan and Loge descend the shaft and enter the cave. Alberich forces a crowd of Nibelungs to pile up the treasure, then with a gesture of the Ring drives them off. He boasts that the Ring's power will soon allow him to threaten Valhalla, but Loge flatters him and he turns successively into a serpent, then a toad. Wotan is not slow to put his foot on the toad, Loge wrenches off the Tarn helmet and Alberich materialises writhing under Wotan's boot.

He is bound and dragged off towards the light, where it is clear his lease on power was brief. The gold shall be the price of his release, and Alberich with the Ring summons the Nibelungs with their hoard. When Wotan tears the Ring from the Nibelung's finger, he turns in his rage and not without dignity curses the Ring and all who henceforth possess it, until it be returned to him. Then he is allowed to slink off into Nibelheim.

It is the moment for Freia to be ceded to the Giants or for the ransom to be paid. They measure out a space the height and width of Freia, the gold is piled up, the Tarn helmet added and finally, to Wotan's fury, they demand the Ring. He seems about to refuse, but Erda slowly manifests herself and majestically warns Wotan against so rash an action. He chucks the Ring on the pile and Freia is free. But not so the Giants from the curse, as Fafner quarrels with Fasolt over his share and beats his brother to death, dragging Ring and gold out after him. Another crime has been committed but Loge congratulates Wotan on having given up the curse-laden Ring.

The curse rests on anyone who has touched the Ring and Wotan cannot forget that it has been through his hands. Finally, in a burst of not wholly justified optimism, Donner ascends to the top of a rock, swings his hammer and a flash of lightning dispels the clouds so that a rainbow bridge spans the valley to Valhalla. In a magnificent peroration ('Abendlich strahlt der Sonne Augen'), Wotan greets Valhalla and leads a procession of the Gods across to the castle. Wagner adds six harps to the orchestra to accompany the rainbow, but Wotan is to be denied full triumph as the Rhinemaidens beg him to restore the Ring to them, and Loge decides to defect before the Gods are overcome by the disaster he predicts. H.

DIE WALKÜRE

The Valkyrie

If The Valkyrie is the slow movement in the symphonic construction of The Ring, then Rhine Gold has been just as plainly its expository first movement, Siegfried the scherzo and Twilight the grandiose last movement in which all threads are to be pulled together and the grand design completed. Lyricism has flowered in Rhine Gold in such episodes as the long scene for the Rhinemaidens and the beautiful music associated however briefly with Freia and the idea of Eternal Youth, but it is sinewy narrative and argument, harsh dramatic collision between Gods, Nibelungs and Giants, or grand statements like Wotan's and Erda's with which we have been mainly concerned. This is music drama in its most epic form, but much of The Valkyrie, the first act in particular, is in marked contrast, full of lyrical outpouring, as in the entire encounter of Siegmund and Sieglinde, or in the tenderness of the second half of the third act, when Wotan proves unable to resist the pleas of his favourite daughter Brünnhilde.

Sieglinde, Wotan's daughter by a human woman, has been forced into a loveless marriage with Hunding and has no idea of the identity of her father whom she knows only as Wälse.

Act I. The orchestra suggests not only a storm sweeping through the forest but the headlong flight from his enemies of the fugitive Siegmund. He staggers exhausted into Hunding's hut and is found a moment later by Sieglinde. As his strength returns and she looks into his eyes, it becomes obvious from the music that the bond between them is so strong as to amount to love at first sight, but he protests he brings misfortune to anyone who helps him and is about to leave when the approaching Hunding is heard outside. Ordering her to prepare food, Hunding questions the stranger and discovers that Siegmund, whose name is as yet undisclosed, is a sworn enemy to him and his family. Hunding will respect the laws of hospitality, but in the morning his guest, who is his foe, must be prepared to defend himself in the working out of their blood feud.

Siegmund is alone. The Sword motif comes softly from the orchestra and light from the fire falls on a sword buried to the hilt in the tree round which Hunding's hut is built. From this point to the end of the act occurs what can only be described as one of Wagner's most inspired passages. Siegmund muses on his weaponless state ('Ein Schwert verhiess mir der Vater'), on his father's promise to provide him with a sword when his need is greatest and on the sympathy between him and the woman he has just met. He calls on his father – 'Wälse! Wälse!' – to help him. The image of the woman and the gleam from the tree link inextricably in his subconscious and when Sieglinde appears all becomes clear, as she tells the story of her wedding to Hunding and of the stranger who buried a sword deep in the ash trunk. Now she has found the hero who will draw the sword and so achieve what Hunding's relations failed to do! Her words seem to release a new spirit in Siegmund, who declares he will claim both weapon and bride for himself.

One side of the hut flies open and lets in the full moon which rouses Siegmund to new lyrical outpouring: 'Winterstürme wichen dem Wonnemond'. A love duet develops by the end of which Sieglinde has recognised Siegmund as her twin brother. He glories in his name and draws the promised sword from the tree before they rush off together into the night.

Act II. We leave the humans for a different world, dominated by the Gods and their power struggle. The orchestra, with forward references to the Ride of the Valkyries, introduces Wotan and Brünnhilde, the latter eager, as she shows in her war-cry 'Ho-jo-to-ho!', to accept his command to aid Siegmund in his forthcoming fight with Hunding.

It is not to be as sentiment might direct, and Fricka's intervention reminds Wotan that Hunding is calling for vengeance on a breaker of marriage vows, vows moreover that she herself is sworn to uphold. Wotan urges the sanctity of true love against the false values of loveless marriage but Fricka will have none of it, denouncing the incestuous twins and prophesying the end of the Gods' glory now that Wotan casts aside honour by whoring in cavern and on mountainside. Worse, he is prepared to stoop to abandon his wife and her honourable precepts in order to protect the fruits of his union with an earth-woman. Wotan reminds her of the need the Gods have for a pure hero to win back the Ring, but Fricka will not let him off the hook of the laws of morality, nor allow him to trick her by pretending that Siegmund is free to fight unaided when Brünnhilde will be by his side. To uphold Siegmund means exposing his own consort to the scorn of mankind, and in the end he has to agree that Siegmund shall die.

The motif of Alberich's Curse punctuates the return of Brünnhilde, who listens to her father's paroxysms of anger and despair before he embarks on his multifaceted narrative of the theft of the Gold, his own tricking of Alberich, the birth of the Valkyries, and his hopes, now thwarted, that an unsullied hero might regain the ground he – and the Gods – have lost. As it is, his plans are in ruins, and rumour has it Alberich has lovelessly impregnated a woman who will bear him a son and seal the fate of the Gods. His orders are plain: at Fricka's behest, Brünnhilde is to abandon Siegmund and sustain Hunding! Though it is clear from the early part of his narration that Wotan, while initially planning a world subject to good laws, had become embroiled in what Ernest Newman once called a network of evil, the music in which he expresses his rage, his hopes, his disappointments and now, as he sees it, looming disaster, is consistently grand in scale. The baring of his soul reveals on the one hand an unnerving tendency to believe the end justifies the means but, in apparent contradiction, a genuine nobility. Though vast narratives of past events have come to be accepted as part of Wagner's musico-dramatic scheme, they were once deplored as dealing mainly with events with which we are already to a greater or lesser extent familiar.

Terror of being overtaken by Hunding and his kinsmen has stretched Sieglinde's nerves to breaking point, and Siegmund tells her they will rest from their flight and wait for Hunding where she has collapsed. Brünnhilde appears to him in a foreshadowing of his death: 'Todesverkündigung'. She describes the joys of Valhalla in music of the utmost solemnity but Siegmund rejects any possibility which rules Sieglinde out of his life. When he makes as if to kill his sister with his drawn sword, Brünnhilde is moved to defy Wotan: she will throw her resources behind him in his fight with Hunding!

Hunding's horn calls sound nearer and nearer and Sieglinde wakes to hear his voice. As Siegmund raises his magic sword to fight, Wotan interposes his spear – the symbol of his power – and shatters it; Siegmund falls a defenceless victim to Hunding. Wotan orders the victor to kneel in thanks before Fricka, but a contemptuous gesture of his spear leaves Hunding dead on the ground. Brünnhilde gathers up the splintered sword and flees with Sieglinde, while Wotan breathes threats against the disobedient Valkyrie.

Act III. As the eight Valkyries gather on their rock, the act opens on a musical scene of wild energy founded on Brünnhilde's battle cry heard at the start of Act II, now become the motivating force of a great descriptive scene, the Ride of the Valkyries. Brünnhilde arrives pleading with her sisters to help her hide Sieglinde, who at first seems deaf to any notion of a future without Siegmund. She is eventually roused to pulsating life by reference to the child she is yet to bear him and with a stirring cry greets the future before making her escape (Wagner called this motif 'the Glorification of Brünnhilde' and it is heard again in full glory at the end of Twilight).

As Wotan approaches calling for her, Brünnhilde leaves her sheltering sisters and is face to face with the father whose orders she has defied. It is not he who is sentencing her, he tells her, but she herself. His will woke her to life, but now that she has rebelled against him she has chosen another fate for herself. No more will she ride as a Valkyrie, no more – and here his heart seems on the point of breaking – may she be considered his favourite child. Instead she will lie defenceless, asleep and shorn of divinity on the Valkyrie rock until claimed by the first man who wakes her.

The Valkyries are driven off by Wotan's wrath and the savagery of Brünnhilde's sentence, and it is to the sound of the bass clarinet, continuing on lower strings and taken up by cor anglais, that Wagner introduces the motif of Brünnhilde's pleading: 'War es so schmachlich?' (Was it so shameful?). Did not Wotan himself originally favour Siegmund's cause? Was what she did so disgraceful that she must herself be disgraced? His tone towards her softens and she pleads passionately for a mitigation of sentence: let the rock on which she sleeps be guarded by fierce flames so that only a dauntless hero may penetrate the barrier and claim her as bride.

Wotan, hedonist as well as master-strategist, has no defence against either her pleas or the inclinations of his heart, and there has been nothing in The Ring so far grander of scale or more touching in its examination of the human motives involved than his farewell to Brünnhilde. His last kiss is preceded by a lyrical hymn to the beauty of her eyes from which he has so often derived courage, before the orchestra meditates on the sleep which will envelop her, and Wotan with his spear invokes Loge to girdle the rock with fire.

H.

SIEGFRIED

Sieglinde has died giving birth to Siegfried, who has been reared by Alberich's brother Mime. Mime believes the young hero he recognises Siegfried to be will help him forge the broken but potentially all-powerful sword of his father (whose identity Mime knows but of which Siegfried is ignorant). With it Mime hopes Siegfried will kill Fafner, who has turned himself into a dragon, and regain Ring and treasure. Mime will then himself dispose of Siegfried and possess the Ring. Wotan, still with hopes that Siegfried may prove the hero of pure motive that he willed Siegmund to become, watches the development of events, as does Alberich, the two thus playing jackal to Fafner's (and in the end Siegfried's) lion.

The prelude suggests Mime brooding on Ring, hoard of gold and how to re-possess them. When the curtain rises, he is making a further attempt to forge the sword, with which he will attain his objective but which, every time repaired, is smashed at a single blow by the precocious Siegfried. Siegfried's music is initially hyper-active, Mime's plangent but full of venom and spite. Siegfried, whose horn call precedes him, torments Mime by bringing a captive bear into the cave they share, then shatters the latest product of Mime's work at the smithy before impatiently listening as Mime reminds him that it is to him, Mime, that he owes life and upbringing. How then, asks Siegfried, does he find his foster-father so repellent? Who indeed is his mother? Because Mime alone knows the answer to that question must be why he constantly returns to share the cave, says Siegfried. Mime admits Siegfried's mother died giving birth to him, and that his father, who was killed in battle, left nothing behind him but the fragments of the sword. Mime spends his time attempting to mend. Siegfried rejoices at the prospect of his father's sword reforged then runs from the cave, leaving Mime even more depressed than at the start of the act.

The second scene reintroduces Wotan, no longer recognisably a God but disguised as the Wanderer. He wagers his head that he can correctly answer any three questions which Mime may put to him, and, in music very recognisably belonging to Wotan, comes up with the Nibelungs as the race born in the earth's deep bowels, the Giants as those dwelling on the earth's back, and the Gods as inhabiting the cloudy heights, each answer accompanied by appropriate and by now largely familiar motifs. The Wanderer in his turn, postulating but not expecting the same forfeit and castigating Mime for failing in his questioning to search for knowledge, puts three questions to Mime. 'What noble race did Wotan treat harshly and yet hold most dear?' 'The Wälsungs' (Sigmund and Sieglinde). 'Name the sword with which Siegfried must strike to regain the Ring.' 'Notung' correctly answers Mime. 'Whose hand can forge the sword?' Mime cannot answer but the Wanderer assures him only a hero who does not know fear can weld the pieces together; moreover, though he may keep his forfeit head for a while, it is through that hero that Mime will lose his life.

Mime collapses behind the anvil, where he is found by Siegfried, returning full of the confidence of youth and impatient that Mime has again failed to forge the sword. Mime, remembering the Wanderer's warning, asks Siegfried if he has ever known fear, which the young hero denies, while affirming he is ready to learn if that will help him face the future. Mime describes Fafner in his guise as dragon, but that only inspires Siegfried to demand the sword with which to face Fafner. Impetuously he starts to file down the pieces, then, hearing from Mime that it is called Notung and addressing it by name, he blows up the fire with the bellows and in a scene crackling with energy and excitement heats the metal to melting point before pouring it off into a mould, thence into water to cool, finally heating it in the fire and beating it out with a hammer on the anvil. It is the most physical scene of the entire Ring cycle, and Siegfried with a shout of triumph splits the anvil in two with his newly-forged weapon, Mime, part menace, part comic, collapsing in terror behind the anvil.

Act II. Night, in the depths of the forest, near Fafner's cave. Alberich lying in wait recognises the Wanderer as Wotan, his enemy, the thief of the Ring. That his curse will bring about Fafner's downfall causes him satisfaction, but the Wanderer predicts that a young hero, guided by none other than Mime, will win the Ring, and even risks waking Fafner to warn him of what is in store. Mime leads Siegfried into the space in front of the cave and warns of the perils to be faced when Fafner emerges, but Siegfried drives him off and is left by himself.

There follows one of the supreme lyrical episodes of the cycle, a pastoral poem to nature which marks a crucial stage in the awakening of Siegfried's sensibilities. As he lies under a lime-tree and listens to the rustling of the leaves (the 'Waldweben' or Forest Murmurs it is called in the concert hall), he reflects on his parentage, then listens to the song of the Woodbird and plays on a reed in an effort to communicate with the bird. That effort ends in fiasco and he decides to blow his horn instead (the grandest manifestation of his horn call we shall hear). This rouses Fafner from his sleep, but in fight he is no match for Siegfried and his sword and it is not long before he is demanding who it is has mortally wounded him. The motif of the Curse sounds as he dies, and as he pulls the sword from Fafner's body Siegfried licks the scalding blood from his hand. Instantly, he acquires the power to understand the bird's song, hearing first of the gold, the Tarn helmet and the Ring, which he goes into the cave to fetch.

Alberich and Mime scuttle scavenger-like into the clearing in front of the cave, snarling and snapping like a couple of cur dogs and desisting only when Siegfried comes out of the cave with the booty Mime craves. The bird warns him first against Mime's wiles and eventually he understands that the dwarf is plotting to poison him. He gets in first and kills Mime with his sword, the motif of the Curse ringing out from the orchestra to remind us not only that it has claimed a second victim in this segment of the cycle but that the Siegfried (Metropolitan Opera House, New York, c. 1933). Lauritz Melchior in the title role.

Ring is now in Siegfried's possession. But that hero's thoughts are on the present, in the form of the beauty of the forest, and on a future in which the bird seems to be promising him Brünnhilde as bride.

Act III. The opening scene sees Wotan/Wanderer musically at the height of his powers, apparently dominant and carrying all before him. But in reality he is full of fear that through Siegfried and Brünnhilde, whose partnership he sees as inevitable, the rulership of the world may pass from the Gods to the human race. In his perplexity he calls in music of power and passion on Erda for counsel, but she can give no advice and he appears to abdicate not only hope but responsibility. Let human love supplant Gods and Nibelungs; perhaps the twilight of the Gods will be the dawn of a more glorious epoch.

The bird has guided Siegfried to the spot where Brünnhilde lies asleep and Wotan's final attempt to hold back the inevitable by barring the way with his spear ends as Siegfried smashes it with a single blow. The flames which surround the sleeping maiden are now visible and Siegfried advances towards his destiny.

The last scene is an extended duet, starting with Siegfried's first view of the sleeping Brünnhilde, his attempt to loosen the breastplate which covers her, and his discovery that this is no man but a woman, the first he has seen. The music swells to magnificence as she wakes, greets the sun, refers to her rescue of his mother, then turns to thoughts of their mutual love. For a moment of exceptional musical richness, Brünnhilde dwells on her once supernatural status ('Ewig war ich'), then Siegfried plights his troth with the curse-laden Ring, and the scene finishes with a magnificent hymn to love. H.

GÖTTERDÄMMERUNG

The Twilight of the Gods

Prologue. The first scene has the three Norns, daughters of Erda and guardians of fate, discussing the progress of events and passing a golden rope from one to the other until, as they foresee the end of the Gods and wonder whether Alberich is destined to supplant them, the rope breaks and they see catastrophe impending.

An orchestral interlude returns us to Siegfried and Brünnhilde striding heroically and in an aura of requited love through the dawn, Brünnhilde preparing him for the heroic deeds he must accomplish ('Zu neuen Thaten'), he leaving her with the fatal Ring as pledge. The orchestra describes Siegfried's journey down the Rhine, which takes us into the first act.

Act I. Siegfried arrives at the castle of the Gibichungs, where live Gunther, his sister Gutrune, and their half-brother Hagen, son of Alberich. Through Hagen, the product of Alberich's loveless union with Queen Grimhilde, the curse hurled by Alberich at all who possess the Ring will be worked out – with Siegfried betrayed and the rule of the Gods brought to an end. Hagen excites Gunther's concupiscence with ideas of Brünnhilde as his bride, even though he stipulates that she must be won by a stronger man than Gunther. Such a man is Siegfried, a worthy mate for the unwed Gutrune. Hagen plots to trick Siegfried with a magic potion into forgetting Brünnhilde and falling in love with Gutrune, after which it will not be hard to persuade him to stand in for Gunther and win him a bride. Siegfried is greeted, drinks from the cup Gutrune offers him, and Hagen's trick starts to work. Siegfried and Gunther swear an oath of Blood Brotherhood (introduced by the Curse motif), and Siegfried goes off to win Brünnhilde for Gunther, leaving Hagen to brood alone (Hagen's Watch: 'Hier sitz ich zur Wacht': I sit here and wait).

Back at the rock to which she was once bound asleep, Brünnhilde hears from her sister Waltraute that Wotan has passed into a near-catatonic state, brooding over his splintered spear and the imminent end of the power of the Gods. Only the return of the Ring to the Rhinemaidens can lift the curse. Will Brünnhilde take it on herself to cast the Ring back into the Rhine where it belongs? Brünnhilde refuses. The Ring symbolises her and Siegfried's love and she will yield it to no one.

The notes of Siegfried's horn are heard, but it is apparently a stranger who braves the flames, transformed by the Tarn helmet to look like Gunther. Brünnhilde tries to defend herself but she is powerless against the intruder, who tears the Ring from her finger and subdues her – laying his sword between them as pledge to his blood-brother's honour.

Act II. In front of the hall of the Gibichungs,

Alberich appears to Hagen, who sleeps, spear in hand, against a pillar. He exacts an oath from his son that he will murder Siegfried and seize the Ring from his finger, then dematerialises. Siegfried returns with Brünnhilde from his mission, wearing the Ring and boasting of his exploit. Hagen summons the Gibichung vassals to the double wedding, and in a moment Gunther is there dragging Brünnhilde by the hand. It is when she sees Siegfried standing, Ring on finger, with Guttrune and apparently oblivious to what has passed between them that Brünnhilde is consumed with the idea of vengeance. She accuses Siegfried of having passed himself off as Gunther, stolen the Ring from her, and delivered his own bride to another. His defence is to swear on spear-point that he found the Ring among the dragon's treasure and has never been parted from it and that the sword stayed between them when he found her. Hagen offers his weapon for the oath, in the knowledge that, should he swear falsely, Siegfried's death is certain at the point of that very spear. Siegfried takes his oath, and is followed by Brünnhilde in full knowledge that he has sworn falsely. She dedicates the weapon to his destruction.

Tension mounts, if that is possible, in the last scene of the act, when Hagen manipulates Brünnhilde and Gunther, the one in a state of fury and the other humiliated beyond endurance, so that they plot the murder of Siegfried in the course of a forthcoming boar hunt, intending to strike him from behind (his 'Achilles heel') with Hagen's spear on which the oath has just been sworn.

Act III. The final act is an extraordinary succession of melodic grace, Wagnerian narrative and high drama, followed by a peroration of unique and tragic grandeur. The hunt has taken its followers to the banks of the Rhine, where the Rhinemaidens in a scene of great melodic beauty endeavour to coax the Ring from Siegfried. He seems on the point of handing it over but one threat too many from the Rhinemaidens causes him to change his mind: he will never give in to pressure.

The hunting party assembles, and Hagen presses on Siegfried a drinking-horn containing an antidote to the potion before getting him to relate the story of his life. Memories of Mime precede those of Brünnhilde now coming back to his mind, and he relates in some detail the story of how he penetrated the wall of flame to claim her for his bride. Gunther now knows Brünnhilde's accusation was true, and Hagen loses no time in plunging the spear into Siegfried's defenceless back. Siegfried rears himself up on his shield and relives the moment when he awakened Brünnhilde from sleep, before he falls back dead. His Funeral Music is of overwhelming grandeur. In the hall of the Gibichungs, Guttrune awaits the return of the hunt. Hagen announces Siegfried's death and when Gunther refuses to allow him to take the Ring from Siegfried's finger, kills his half-brother and adds a further death to the day's tally. Siegfried's hand with the Ring upon it raises itself threateningly from the bier, and even Hagen falls back in some consternation as Brünnhilde advances solemnly.

The rest of the drama is Brünnhilde's. Guttrune falls in a faint on Siegfried's body as Brünnhilde bids the men erect a funeral pyre and place the body on it. She apostrophises the dead hero, who at the same time betrayed her and was the most faithful of men, then, the Ring upon her finger, mounts her Valkyrie charger and rides into the flames. She will expiate the crimes of lust and greed which started with the wresting of the Rhine gold from the Rhinemaidens, and Wotan's crisis will be at an end. The Rhine overflows, from Brünnhilde's finger the Rhinedaughters pluck the ring and, when Hagen tries to seize it, draw him down with them into the eternal waters. In the heavens, Valhalla is consumed in flames. It is Götterdämmerung, the Twilight of the Gods, and Brünnhilde through love – the emotion Alberich renounced to gain power – has caused a new human era to dawn in place of the old mythological one of the Gods.

It is the grandest example in all Wagner of redemption through woman's heroic love, from the time of The Flying Dutchman a constant motif in his writing. In that at least his thesis holds good today. Otherwise, the satirists are due a field day with Wagner's moral – the bastard daughter of the King of the Gods, through love of Wotan's doubly illegitimate grandson, her own nephew, purges her father's crime and rids the world of the curse which it precipitated. Or, as George Bernard Shaw would have it, we have the ultimate exposé of the Capitalist system, and only in the transcendent love of a decent woman can it have any hope of redemption.

PARSIFAL

Bühnenweihfestspiel (festival work for the initiation of a stage) in three acts, libretto by the composer, based on Chrétien de Troyes' Percival le Galois (1190), Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parsifal and the fourteenth-century Mabinogion. Composed specifically for Bayreuth's covered pit, first performed there 26 July 1882, with Winkelmann as Parsifal (later, Gudehus and Jager), Materna as Kundry (later, Marianne Brandt and Malten), Scaria as Gurnemanz (later, Siehr); Reichmann as Amfortas, Hill as Klingsor (later, Fuchs), conducted by Hermann Levi. U.S. première, Metropolitan, New York, 24 December 1903, with Burgstaller, Ternina, Blass, Van Rooy and Goritz, conducted by Hertz. U.K. première, 2 February 1914, with von der Osten, Heinrich Hensel, Vender, Knüpfer, August Kiess, Murray Davey, conducted by Bodanzky.

Amfortas, son of Titurel, ruler of the Grail kingdomBaritone
 Titurel, former rulerBass
 Gurnemanz, a veteran Knight of the Grail.....Bass
 ParsifalTenor
 Klingsor, a magicianBass
 KundrySoprano
 Two Grail KnightsTenor, Bass
 Four EsquiresSopranos and Tenors
 Klingsor's Magic Girls ...Three Sopranos, Three Altos
 The Brotherhood of the Grail, Boys, Esquires

Place: Domain and Castle of the Guardians of the Grail; Monsalvat; Klingsor's Magic Castle
Running Time: 4 hours 40 minutes

Gustav Kobbé attended the first performance of Parsifal in 1882. His confident description of what happened (or, rather, what happens) when the Grail is uncovered was reprinted unchanged until this edition: 'a ray of brilliant light darts down upon the sacred vessel, which shines with a soft purple radiance that diffuses itself through the hall'. There was no need to change that description because, once upon a time, wherever Parsifal was performed, the same events always took place on stage. This was a consequence of Wagner's own attempt to reserve performances of his last opera for Bayreuth itself. It no longer holds true.

Some time ago, Titurel led a group of Christian knights. When they were most threatened by heathen attack, angels appeared and brought two holy relics to sustain them. The Chalice is the cup from which Jesus drank at the Last Supper and which later received his blood when he bled on the Cross. It is known as the Grail. The Spear is the weapon that wounded him. Titurel built a sanctuary for these relics. His Knights were fortified by super-human nourishment provided by the Grail. Only the pure were allowed to join the order. Klingsor applied but was refused. When he then castrated himself to stop himself sinning, he was rejected scornfully. He turned in fury to magic and is now bent on destroying the Christian Knights. He uses women to seduce them, led by Kundry, a woman cursed to live forever unless she can find someone who resists her charms. She was punished for laughing at Jesus when he was on his way to be crucified. Now she is in thrall to Klingsor, since he can resist her. But in an attempt to expiate her crime she also serves the Knights as their messenger. They do not know of her other life.

In old age Titurel abdicated and his son Amfortas became King of the Grail. Impatient to free the Knights from Klingsor, Amfortas went to fight him, armed with the holy Spear. He was seduced by Kundry; Klingsor seized the Spear and wounded Amfortas with it. Returning to the sanctuary, Amfortas found his wound was incurable. He prayed for salvation and was told by angels to wait for 'the pure fool, the man made wise by compassion'.

Act I. Gurnemanz, Titurel's former esquire, hears the morning call and rebukes the esquires who guard the wood for being asleep. Amfortas will soon pass by on his way to bathe in the lake. Gurnemanz hears that the herb Gawan (Gawain) brought has not relieved Amfortas's pain. Kundry herself brings a balsam from Arabia for Amfortas, who is temporarily restored by the sight of the lake. He knows, however, that there is only one remedy: he must wait for the pure fool. He is still grateful for Kundry's trouble. The esquires mistrust her, but Gurnemanz reminds them that Kundry helped them in the past, though she cannot help them regain the Spear. He recalls how Amfortas was seduced by 'a fearsomely beautiful woman', which enabled Klingsor to seize the weapon and wound him. No one realises that this woman was and is Kundry.

The esquires return and Gurnemanz tells them of the Knights' history: how Titurel was entrusted with the Grail and the Spear, how Klingsor attempted to join the brotherhood and then resorted to magic. Cries are heard: someone has killed a wild swan flying over the lake. Amfortas had greeted it as a good omen. A young man boasts that he killed the swan, not knowing that the Grail's domain is a sanctuary for all creatures. Gurnemanz asks him how he could kill it, where he has come from, what his father is called, who sent him and what his own name is. The only answer the young man makes is that he does not know. All he knows is that his mother is called Herzeleide (heart's sorrows) and that they lived in the woods. Kundry interrupts and explains that his mother brought him up in ignorance of knightly arms, so that he would not die young, as his father Gamuret did. She also reveals that his mother is dead. Seeing he is about to faint, she fetches water from a spring. Gurnemanz thanks her for her good deed. Kundry denies that she ever does good. Against her will, she falls into a deep sleep.

Bells toll and Gurnemanz invites the young man to join him at the hallowed feast of the Grail Knights in their temple. If he is pure, the Grail will provide him with sustenance. The young man asks, 'Who is the Grail?' Gurnemanz explains that, if he is chosen to join the fellowship, he will understand. As they talk, the wood turns into the temple of the Grail because here, as Gurnemanz says, 'time becomes space'.

The Knights take their places for the ceremony and the young man watches as Titurel calls on his son Amfortas to officiate and uncover the Grail. Amfortas begs to be relieved of his office: each time he performs it, his wound bleeds and causes him terrible agonies. The Knights remind him that he must wait for 'the pure fool'. In the meantime he performs the office and his wound bleeds again. The young man watches but understands nothing. Disappointed, Gurnemanz sends him away. Unseen voices remind us of that 'pure fool, made wise by compassion'.

Act II. Klingsor waits in his magic castle for the young man. He summons Kundry from her sleep and calls up the renegade knights, those who fell victim to his spells. They fight the young man, and are defeated. Klingsor then turns the castle into a magic garden. Beautiful women invite the young man to join in their games. He is about to run away when he hears Kundry's voice calling him 'Parsifal', a name he remembers from his dreams. She describes how she saw him when he was still a baby, how he broke his mother's heart when he left home one day and did not return. Parsifal blames himself for her death. Kundry offers him, 'as a last token of his mother's blessing, the first kiss of love'. But this only reminds Parsifal of Amfortas's wound: suddenly, Parsifal himself suffers as Amfortas suffered during the Grail ceremony. As Kundry attempts to seduce him, Parsifal realises this is how Amfortas was seduced. He rejects her, knowing that if he yielded it would only increase her torment. He asks her to show him the way back to Amfortas. She refuses, curses him violently and calls on Klingsor to destroy him. But when the magician hurls the Spear at Parsifal, it remains suspended above his head. Parsifal seizes it and with it makes the sign of the Cross: the castle collapses and the magic garden withers. As he goes, Parsifal reminds Kundry, 'You know where you can find me again.'

Act III. It is Good Friday, some years later. Gurnemanz has become a hermit. He hears groaning from inside a thicket and discovers Kundry lying there in a cold trance. He restores her numb circulation and she wakes with a cry. All she wants to do now, she says, in the only two words she utters in this act, is to serve ('Dienen, dienen'). Gurnemanz comments that she won't have much to do, now that the Knights have given up fighting and travelling.

He sees someone approaching in dark armour. It is Parsifal, who has spent years trying to find his way back to the Grail sanctuary. He remains silent. Gurnemanz reminds him that this is Good Friday, when the weapons of war are most out of place, but then he recognises the Spear in Parsifal's hand. Parsifal has come to bring Amfortas salvation. Gurnemanz tells him that the whole brotherhood are in need of his healing power: since Amfortas refused to perform the office, the Grail has remained covered. Deprived of sustenance, the Knights wander about pale and unhappy. Gurnemanz himself has retreated to this corner of the wood: now that his old warrior-lord Titurel has died, he himself longs for death.

Parsifal's intense remorse that it took him so long to return brings him near to fainting. Kundry fetches him some water but, knowing that Parsifal will perform the holy office today, Gurnemanz leads him to the spring. Parsifal learns that Amfortas has agreed to uncover the Grail for the last time at the funeral of Titurel. Kundry and Gurnemanz prepare Parsifal for the rite. The 'pure, wise, compassionate healer', as Gurnemanz calls him, baptises Kundry. He notices that the meadow has never looked as beautiful as it does today. Gurnemanz explains that this is the magic of Good Friday – not a day of mourning, but of rejoicing at the salvation brought by suffering.

As the bells toll, the scene changes once more to the Temple of the Grail. The Knights assemble for Titurel's funeral. When they insist that Amfortas uncover the Grail, he asks them to kill him, rather than make him suffer renewed agony from his wound. Parsifal steps forward and touches it with the Spear: it is healed. As everyone gazes at the uplifted Spear they see its point bleeding, as it yearns to be united with the blood in the Grail. Parsifal promises that the Grail will never be enclosed again. As the Grail glows at its brightest, a white dove descends and hovers over Parsifal's head. Unseen voices from on high celebrate the miracle: the redeemer has been redeemed ('Erlösung dem Erlöser').

Doubts about Parsifal begin with Wagner's own definition of the work and end with the work's last words. For many people, ignorance is bliss and Parsifal can still be enjoyed as a Christian mystery. Others ignore the Christian symbolism or try to go behind it. Mike Ashman's essay, 'A Very Human Epic', works hard at this tack.¹ Parsifal makes rather more sense as a sequel to The Magic Flute, as an initiatory journey, a riddle that we can only partially solve at each performance. We then experience the enigmas of the deliberately obscure narrations, of Kundry, of Amfortas's wound, of the Grail ceremony, as Parsifal does: we know nothing. Music solves the enigmas because it evades logic. The opera becomes a symphony. Those who do not want to know what Wagner himself intended should stop here.

On the other hand, Wagner's now unread essays 'Religion and Art' and its supplements, published in the Bayreuther Blätter 1880–81, his letters and comments that Cosima recorded in her diary, provide overwhelming evidence of the anti-semitic programme he wrote into Parsifal. He defined it as a Bühnenweihfestspiel, meaning that it was conceived as the cornerstone of his Bayreuth crusade to free Christianity of its Judaic stain. This was why he could not bear the idea of Hermann Levi conducting the première. In a letter of 25 August 1879 Wagner told King Ludwig II that he wanted to preserve 'this most Christian of all artworks from a world which fades in cowardice in the face of the Jews'. He told the King on 28 September 1880 that because Parsifal represented the 'most sublime mysteries of the Christian faith', it could not be staged outside Bayreuth. Wagner tried very hard but unsuccessfully to convince Levi to convert to Christianity; at the last performance, he seized the baton from him at the beginning of the last act.

According to Wagner's 'thinking', Jesus wasn't Jewish; Judaism had corrupted Christianity (as Klingsor corrupted the Knights). Wagner assured Liszt in a letter of 7 June 1855 that 'modern research has succeeded in showing that pure and unalloyed Christianity was nothing but a branch of that venerable Buddhism which Alexander's Indian expedition spread to the shores of the Mediterranean'. Compassion ('Mitleid') mattered, because it was the virtue that Schopenhauer denied the Jews. The philosopher also blamed man's cruelty towards animals on Judaism and 'Jewish Christianity'.² Christianity can only be saved by the Aryan hero, Parsifal, once he has learned not to kill swans. Which is why the opera ends with unseen voices celebrating Parsifal's kingship of the Grail as 'Redemption to the redeemer'. Never has D.H. Lawrence's injunction, to trust the tale, not the teller, made more sense.

P.

¹ 'The "baptism" of Parsifal and Kundry, and the anointing of Parsifal in Act III, use the elements of oil and water present in initiation ceremonies since recorded time'; 'A dove is not a specifically Christian symbol', etc.,

Parsifal, Opera Guide Series 34, ed. Nicholas John, 1986.

² Paul Lawrence Rose, Wagner Race and Revolution, 1992.

VINCENT WALLACE

(born 11 March 1814, died 12 October 1865)

MARITANA

Opera in three acts, text by Edward Fitzball, based on the play Don César de Bazan by d'Ennery and Dumanoir. Première, Drury Lane, London, 15 November 1845. First performed Philadelphia, 1846; New York, 1848; Her Majesty's Theatre, London (in Italian), 1880. Revived Lyceum, London, 1925; Old Vic and Sadler's Wells, 1931, with Kennard (later Cross), Morris, Cox, Austin, Brindle. Continuously in the repertoires of British touring companies until about 1930.

Maritana, *a handsome gitana*Soprano
 Don Caesar de BazanTenor
 Don José de Santarem, an unscrupulous courtierBaritone
 Lazarillo, *a poor boy*Mezzo-Soprano
 The Marchioness of MontefioreMezzo-Soprano
 Captain of the GuardBaritone
 Marquis of MontefioreBass
 The KingBass
 The AlcaldeBass
 Soldiers, Gipsies, Populace

Place: Madrid

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Maritana deals, like Balfe's Bohemian Girl, with the very poor on the one hand, and the very rich and powerful on the other. The essential difference is that while there is no humour of any kind in The Bohemian Girl, the librettist of Maritana, Edward Fitzball, has contrived to invest the character of Don Caesar de Bazan with a lighthearted, whimsical humour. As regards the music, the soprano aria 'Scenes that are brightest' and the tenor's 'Yes, let me like a soldier fall' are the equals of Balfe's 'I dream that I dwelt in marble halls'.

Act I. Don José, a young and wealthy courtier of Madrid, is enamoured of the Queen of Spain. Don José believes that the Queen would be his if he could only persuade her that the King does not care for her. The King himself is of a roving disposition and he has been much attracted lately by the simple charms of Maritana, a street singer, whom we meet engaged in her occupation and surrounded by an admiring crowd. Don José naturally determines to do his utmost to further the King's interests in this quarter, although he well knows that Maritana is above the temptations of wealth and position. Since she does not care for the King, José has to wait until chance comes to aid his desires. The opportunity comes with the return to Madrid of Don Caesar de Bazan, a nobleman as poor as a church mouse and as proud as Satan. Don Caesar, the hero of countless duels, when told by Don José that duelling has been forbidden on pain of death, declares his intention never to fight again. He learns that anyone who forfeits his life to the law on this particular day of the year is not going to be shot in a clean, soldierly fashion, but hanged. But when Lazarillo, a poor apprentice, is pursued by the guards, he does not hesitate to challenge their captain so as to give Lazarillo a chance of escaping. Don Caesar wounds the captain, but is himself apprehended and marched to jail.

Act II. Interior of a fortress. The prospect of dying a felon's death horrifies him, and he accepts eagerly a strange proposal from Don José. The Don, believing that if Maritana could be married to a nobleman she could be got more easily to comply with the King's wishes, proposes a bargain. Don Caesar will be shot and not hanged if he consents to marry a veiled lady. Don Caesar is ready to do anything if he can escape the rope, and sings one of the best arias of the opera, extolling the advantages of a soldier's death: 'Yes, let me like a soldier fall'. Don José recalls his first sight of the Queen: 'In happy moments day by day', and resolves to go through with his scheme. The marriage takes place there and then and so does the execution – apparently, since Lazarillo, to show his devotion to the man who risked death to save him, has abstracted the bullets from the executioners' rifles. The soldier of the song fell only to rise again. As soon as the firing squad has gone, Don Caesar goes in search of the unknown lady he has wedded.

Meanwhile, the King, remembering Don Caesar's former services to the State, has pardoned him. But the pardon has fallen into the hands of Don José, who hides it and so frees himself of Don Caesar's presence.

Scene ii. Maritana has now been taken to the castle of the Marquis of Montefiore. There she is introduced to the King: 'Hear me, gentle Maritana'. Her heart has been given to the gallant Don Caesar and she refuses to listen to the advances of her royal master. Don Caesar comes to the Marquis's house, in search of his wife, whom he is sure he will recognise, although he has only seen her once heavily veiled: 'There is a flower that bloometh'. At Don José's instigation, the Marchioness poses as the wife of Don Caesar, who is completely disillusioned when he sees her age. He is about to sign away all claim on her, when he hears and recognises Maritana's voice and suspects that some intrigue is in progress. Don José has Don Caesar rearrested.

Act III. A magnificent apartment. Maritana laments the loss of her liberty: 'Scenes that are brightest'. The King comes to her pretending to be her husband. Lazarillo, ordered by Don José to guard their privacy and to shoot anyone who attempts to enter, fires on an approaching stranger. His aim is not accurate enough to hit Don Caesar, who climbs in through the window to meet the King, whom Maritana has left to nurse his disappointment alone. 'What are you doing here?' he asks, without recognising the King. 'I am the master here, the Count of Bazan,' replies His Majesty. 'Oh, well', retorts the nobleman, 'I, then, must be the King.' In the course of the wrangle, Don Caesar finds out from the King that he has been pardoned and that the execution which nearly cost him his life need never have taken place. The King leaves, and Don Caesar is face to face with Maritana. They recognise each other as husband and wife. The Queen arrives, escorted by Don José, who meant to show her her spouse's infidelity. Explanations ensue; Don Caesar runs his sword through Don José's body to save the Queen from his importunity, and all ends happily for Don Caesar and his true love, the street singer Maritana.

F.B.

WILLIAM WALTON

(born 29 March 1902, died 8 March 1983)

TROILUS AND CRESSIDA

Opera in three acts, text by Christopher Hassall. Première, Covent Garden, London, 3 December 1954, with Magda Laszlo, Monica Sinclair, Richard Lewis, Peter Pears, Otakar Kraus, Frederick Dalberg, conductor Sir Malcolm Sargent. First performed San Francisco, 1955, with Dorothy Kirsten, Richard Lewis, conductor Erich Leinsdorf; New York, City Center, 1955, with Phyllis Curtin, Jon Crain; la Scala, Milan, 1956, with Dorothy Dow, David Poleri. Revived Covent Garden, 1963, with Marie Collier, Josephine Veasey, André Turp, John Lanigan, conductor Sargent; Covent Garden, 1976, with Janet Baker, Richard Cassilly, Gerald English, Benjamin Luxon, Richard Van Allan, conductor Lawrence Foster; Opera North, Leeds, 1994, with Judith Howarth, Arthur Davies, conductor Richard Hickox.

Calkas, High Priest of Pallas Bass
Antenor, Captain of Trojan spears Baritone
Troilus, Prince of Troy Tenor
Pandarus, brother of Calkas Tenor Buffo
Cressida, daughter of Calkas Soprano
Evadne, her servant Mezzo-Soprano
Horaste, a friend of Pandarus Baritone

Diomede, Prince of Argos Baritone

A Woman's Voice within the Temple; Priests, Soldiers, Trojans, Greeks, etc.

Place: Troy

Time: About the Twelfth Century B.C.

Running Time: 2 hours

Sir William Walton's only full-length opera was commissioned in 1947 by the B.B.C. Its first performance was at Covent Garden towards the end of 1954 and it was an immediate success, its straightforward manner and late romantic style appealing to the London public and press. It was no more successful in its foreign productions than were other British operas of the period – Gloriana, The Midsummer Marriage, Billy Budd – but revival has suggested that the music's strong lyrical impulse, from the same source as that of the composer's Violin Concerto, puts it into a longer-lasting category than that of the 'well-made' opera.

Act I. Before the temple of Pallas in the citadel of Troy. Quiet timpani and a murmuring chorus of worshippers from within the temple set the scene, but soon the muttering becomes desperate, and it is apparent that the starving population of Troy is liable to riot in protest against conditions. Calkas tries to quieten them and reminds them that the oracle at Delphi has already spoken. His unequivocal if defeatist interpretation is to advise them to parley with the Greeks while there is still time. Antenor, intent on a foray with his warrior companions, overhears him and challenges his right to utter such counsel of despair. He rouses the crowd, and Calkas is obviously in some danger until Troilus appears and restores order. He wishes Antenor luck on his mission and is hardly ruffled when his friend guesses that it is the presence of the beautiful Cressida which draws him to the temple.

In a gently lyrical aria Troilus admits to himself that he loves Cressida, and as the music reaches a climax the temple doors open and Cressida, preceded by two priests, appears in the doorway. Troilus has never spoken to her before and her first musical utterance is subdued: 'Morning and evening I have felt your glance follow me out of sight.' She is a widow and is soon to take her vows as a priestess; in Pallas, she feels, lies her only hope for the future.

Troilus unavailingly protests his love, and as Cressida disappears her place is taken by her uncle Pandarus, whose arrival produces a complete change of musical mood, from the lyrical to something much more volatile. He takes in the situation at a glance and proceeds to win Troilus' confidence. Pandarus is about to enter the temple in search of Cressida when the doors open and Calkas emerges, followed by Cressida and Evadne. Pandarus listens to Calkas admit to his daughter and her companions that he plans to quit the city and desert to the enemy. Cressida's pleas fail and he departs, leaving her to sing of an incident in childhood which she now recognises as representing presentiments of desertion, always connected with her father ('Slowly it all comes back'). Warmth enters the music as she interprets the warrior in her dream of long ago as the Troilus of today – the Troilus they (and the gods who preside over our destinies at birth) will not allow her to love!

Pandarus and Evadne confirm that Calkas has deserted, and Pandarus prays to Aphrodite to ensure that his tongue has not lost its golden touch; only with its aid can he rescue the family from crisis. In lively, flexible music, he starts to plead Troilus' cause with Cressida but is interrupted by the arrival of the prince himself. Troilus is met by Antenor's soldiers with the news that their captain has been taken prisoner. Troilus swears that he will be rescued, either by means of an exchange of prisoners, or else by force of arms. As Troilus goes to look for Calkas, Pandarus persuades Cressida to come next day to a supper party at his house, then, before she leaves, prevails upon her to leave her crimson scarf as a token of esteem for Troilus. Troilus for his part has discovered that Calkas, the father of his beloved, is a traitor, but the music returns, as he catches sight of Cressida's scarf, to the ecstatic lyricism of his earlier aria.

Act II. A room in Pandarus' house the following evening. The music, with its syncopated rhythms, immediately recalls us to the mood induced by Pandarus' arrival in the previous act. Supper is over and the guests are playing chess, Cressida with Horaste. A storm is blowing up and Pandarus, thinking this will suit his book, dispatches a messenger to fetch Troilus. At the first sign of rain, Pandarus urges Cressida and the other guests to stay the night and promptly shows her an alcove furnished with a bed. In gently decorative music, her ladies prepare Cressida for the night. She cannot sleep and in an aria admits to herself that she is in love – her basically cool music (the languor of beauty long accustomed to admiration?) soon turns to passion as she proclaims 'friend and foe, Troilus my conqueror'.

Pandarus comes in to say that Troilus is in the house, racked with jealousy and begging to see her. 'On jealousy's hot grid he roasts alive', begins the ensemble, which becomes a trio when Troilus overhears Pandarus' barefaced fabrication – one of the liveliest moments of the score, cut by the composer for Covent Garden's 1963 revival. Troilus interrupts, denounces the trickster who admits he has made it all up, and starts to woo Cressida from her tears. A love duet develops, under the star, as it were, of Aphrodite, whose protection the lovers invoke. Pandarus looks in, is delighted at what he sees, snuffs the candles and tiptoes away.

The storm breaks in an orchestral interlude, which depicts the love-making within as well as the wind and rain outside and which might not have been as it is without Peter Grimes but is nonetheless essentially Walton. It ends with peaceful dawn.

Scene ii opens as Troilus and Cressida together watch the sun rise over the roofs of Troy. Like Pandarus, they are disturbed to hear the sound of approaching drums, and Pandarus is particularly concerned for the good name of his family. A military deputation is at the door and Troilus must not be discovered; Pandarus will cope with the visitors.

It is Diomedes, a young Greek commander, who explains that Calkas wishes to have his daughter restored to him and that the commanders of the army have agreed that Cressida shall go to the Greek camp in exchange for the Trojan warrior Antenor. When Pandarus claims that Cressida is not in his house, Diomedes searches, discovers her and marvels at her beauty. Troilus emerges at Diomedes's departure and says he will not rest until the agreement is revoked and Cressida back in Troy. In the meanwhile, he will send daily messages and will corrupt the sentries so that he may visit her in the Greek camp. There is a moving vocal postlude, as it were, to their grand duet, and, as Cressida leaves, Troilus gives her back the crimson scarf which she had given him and which she must keep as a token of their love.

Act III. The Greek encampment. Early evening ten weeks later. Calkas' tent can be seen at the side, and at the back the battlements. A sad cor anglais solo (marked lugubre) introduces the scene and the sound of nightwatchmen's voices can be heard. Cressida, whose distraught loneliness is all too apparent in every bar she sings, implores Evadne to see if there is a message from Troilus at the palisade. She has not heard from him since they parted and is beginning to despair. Evadne knows Cressida's coldness to Diomedes jeopardises their safety, and her solo ('Night after night the same') offers her mistress no comfort. Cressida for her part is a prey to every kind of fear, most of all that Troilus is already dead, and she prays movingly to the goddess either to allay or confirm her fears. Calkas interrupts her reverie and protests that it is madness to continue to flout Diomedes, whom Cressida admits to finding attractive. No sooner has she mentioned his name than Diomedes is standing in front of her, demanding her final decision as to whether she will become his wife. Abandoning all hope of seeing Troilus again (return of cor anglais solo), Cressida yields to Diomedes's demands, even ceding him the scarf he begs from her as a favour. Evadne overhears and secretly destroys the last of the many messages Troilus has sent Cressida, all of which at Calkas' behest she has concealed from her mistress.

Troilus and Pandarus have gained admittance to the Greek lines in an hour of truce, and they urge Evadne to fetch Cressida, whose ransom has at last been arranged. Cressida comes from her tent, richly dressed to meet Diomedes, but her music speaks of heartbreak rather than rejoicing, and only the sound of Troilus' voice brings a quickening of the musical pulse. His pleading is full of tenderness, but, in spite of the many messages he protests he has sent, the news of her ransom obviously perplexes Cressida. Before she can convince Troilus that he has come too late, Greeks can be heard acclaiming her as Diomedes's bride.

Diomedes himself comes into view wearing the crimson favour on his helmet and in time to hear Troilus claim Cressida as his, body and spirit. Diomedes orders Cressida to denounce him, and when she hesitates, he is overcome by the public humiliation and begins an embittered lament which develops into a full-scale and impressive sextet eventually swelled by the chorus. It is broken off by the infuriated Diomedes, who stamps on Cressida's scarf. Troilus falls on him with his sword and is getting the better of their fight when Calkas stabs him mortally in the back. Diomedes gives orders that the body of the gallant Trojan prince be carried away with due honours, that Calkas be sent in fetters back to Troy, and that Cressida shall stay in the camp of the Greeks for the enjoyment of whoever chooses her. Left alone for a moment, she utters a final lament to the gods, then, seeing Greek soldiers approach, snatches up Troilus' sword and, binding it with her scarf, kills herself.

H.

THE BEAR

Opera in one act, libretto by Paul Dehn. Première Aldeburgh Festival, 3 June 1967, with Monica Sinclair, John Shaw, Norman Lumsden, conductor James Lockhart (later the same year at Sadler's Wells, London, and in Montreal). Première B.B.C. TV, 1970, with Regina Resnik, Thomas Hemsley, Derek Hammond-Stroud, conductor Walton.

Yeliena Ivanovna Popova,
a young widow Mezzo-Soprano
 Grigory Stepanovich Smirnov,
a middle-aged landowner Baritone
 Luka, Madame Popova's servant Bass

Place: The Drawing Room of Madame Popova's
 House in the Country in Russia

Time: 1888

Running Time: 55 minutes

This light-hearted one-acter was commissioned by the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in 1965; its completion was interrupted when the composer had to undergo a serious operation, and the opera waited for first performance until the 1967 Aldeburgh Festival.

Written on a framework of Chekhov's short story of the same name, the plot concerns Madame Popova, the pretty young widow of a landowner, who clings, against the strongly proffered advice of her old manservant, Luka, to the idea of a virtuous, life-long widowhood, although, as she well knows, her late husband was no paragon of virtue. It seems that, while he was impervious to her reproaches during his lifetime, she intends, perhaps for this reason, to pursue him with them into the hereafter.

Luka announces that a man has arrived, saying he is determined to see her on what he describes as urgent business. The visitor forces his way in and introduces himself as Grigory Stepanovich Smirnov, landowner and retired lieutenant of artillery. The late Popov owed him 1,300 roubles for oats. His bank is demanding interest on a loan tomorrow, and, if his estate is not to be forfeit and he himself declared a bankrupt, he must be paid at once. Refusing to listen to Madame Popova's promise that her bailiff will pay, he insists that she alone can help. When his language becomes too strong, Madame Popova sweeps out slamming the door and leaving the frustrated Smirnov bemoaning the fact that all his debtors vanish when he pursues them while his creditors are all too readily available.

As Smirnov works himself up into a fine state of rage and indignation at his evil fortune and emphasises his total aversion to dealing with women, Luka enters to say that Madame Popova is indisposed and can see no one. Smirnov announces that he will get his own back even if he has to stay for a year and he orders the servant to unharness his horses and bring him a bottle of vodka. Catching sight of his unkempt reflection in the looking-glass, he is temporarily disconcerted at his own boorishness but soon flies again into a passion when reproached by Luka for his behaviour.

Madame Popova returns, eyes modestly cast down. Will Smirnov not wait until the end of the week? He is adamant; unless he is paid at once, he will hang himself! With Smirnov's insistence that he will remain there until he is paid deadlock seems to have been reached. Their quarrel is lively but capped by a sprightly aria from Madame Popova who, stung by Smirnov's assertion that men are more faithful than women, tells him the dreadful tale of her husband's infidelities and emphasises her own hyper-virtuous conduct and her intention of remaining pure for evermore.

Unconvinced, Smirnov makes the point that her clinging to widow's weeds has not made her forget to powder her face. This is too much for Madame Popova and she orders him out. At the argument's height, Smirnov proposes they settle the quarrel with a duel. Let there be real equality between the sexes! Madame Popova accepts the proposition with alacrity and goes off to fetch her late husband's pistols. Smirnov is full of admiration for her spirit and regrets the need to kill such a splendid creature. Madame Popova returns with the pistols (to the horror of Luka) and asks Smirnov to instruct her in their use as she has never handled them before. By the end of the lesson, Smirnov is head-over-heels in love and says he will fire into the air. She mistakes his infatuation for fear and orders him out. They gaze at each other and Smirnov declares his love for her. She threatens to shoot. He announces that to be shot by her would be a pleasure. She clings rather shakily to her dignity and rings for Luka to show Smirnov out but, by the time the old man arrives, the couple are in a tender embrace.

The charm of the piece is enhanced by its liberal spicing with parodies of other composers, including Stravinsky and Britten, and the connoisseur will enjoy picking them out like sixpences from a Christmas pudding.

H.

CARL MARIA VON WEBER

(born 18 November 1786, died 5 June 1826)

Weber's place in operatic history is secure as the high priest of German romanticism and an important precursor of Wagner. His death before he was forty limited his output to six operas, one of which was short, another unfinished. Only three remain as candidates for the repertory, for which the quality of their music undoubtedly fits them.

Der Freischütz was by far Weber's biggest success but its story now seems old-fashioned. Fifty years ago there would have been half a dozen new productions each season in Germany, now its appearance is a rarity. Yet the music is masterly, consistent, even popular, and, in the Wolf's Glen, it contains a scene which continues to stir the blood in anything like a decent production. Oberon is a different case altogether. It has always been claimed that sublime music is left to waste away in the desert of an impossible libretto. Yet the fairy-tale theme is by no means unattractive and, given a bold approach to story and casting, success should be assured.

The most consistent and ambitious of all Weber's operas remains Euryanthe, handicapped again according to tradition by an awkward libretto. The first hurdle to overcome is the theme, which belongs less to the romantic era than to the age of chivalry and courtly love, to evoke which must be the producer's first task; his next, to present the serpent, from which Euryanthe saves Adolar, in such a way as to avoid the obvious risk of risibility.

Weber is one of the great composers of opera, and it is little short of scandalous that most opera-goers outside Germany have not witnessed a stage performance of his work. H.

DER FREISCHÜTZ

The Free-Shooter

Opera in three acts, text by Johann Friedrich Kind. First produced at the Schauspielhaus, Berlin, 18 June 1821, with Mmes Seidler, Eunicke, Messrs Stümer and Blume. First performed in London at the English Opera House, 1824, with Miss Noel, Miss Povey, Mr Braham, Mr Baker, Mr Bartley, and Mr Bennett; in German at Her Majesty's Theatre, 1832. First performance in New York (in English), 1825; (in German) 1845; at Metropolitan Opera, 1884. For the performance in Italian at Covent Garden in 1825, Costa wrote recitatives to replace the spoken dialogue, as did Berlioz for the production at the Opéra, Paris, 1841.

Prince Ottokar.....Baritone
Cuno, *the head ranger*Bass
Max, a forester.....Tenor
Caspar, *a forester*Bass
Kilian, *a rich peasant*Tenor
A HermitBass
Samiel, the wild huntsman.....Speaking Part
Agathe, *Cuno's daughter*Soprano
Aennchen, her cousin.....Soprano

Place: Bohemia

Time: Middle of the Seventeenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

The overture to Der Freischütz is the first in which an operatic composer has unreservedly made use of melodies from the opera itself. Beethoven, in the Leonora overtures, utilises the theme of Florestan's air and the trumpet call. Weber has used not merely thematic material but complete melodies. Following the beautiful passage for horns at the beginning of the overture is the music of Max's outcry when, in the opera, he senses the passage of Samiel across the stage, after which comes the sombre music of Max's 'Hat denn Himmel mich verlassen?' This leads up to the music of Agathe's outburst of joy when she sees her lover approaching.

Act I. At the shooting range. Kilian, a peasant, has defeated Max, the forester, at a prize shooting, a Schützenfest. Max, of course, as a forester accustomed to the use of firearms, should have won, and it is disgraceful for him to have been defeated by a peasant. Kilian rubs it in and the men and girls of the village join in the mocking of Max.

The hereditary forester, Cuno, is worried over the poor showing Max has made not only that day but for some time past. There is to be a shoot on the morrow before Prince Ottokar. In order to win the hand in marriage of Agathe, Cuno's daughter, and

The concluding scene – the shooting test – begins with a spirited hunting chorus. Only the seventh bullet, the one which Samiel controls, remains to Max, the others having been used up during the hunt. Caspar, who expects Max to be Samiel's victim, climbs a tree to watch the proceedings from a safe place of concealment. Before the whole village and Prince Ottokar himself the test shot is to be fired. The Prince points to a flying dove and Max raises his gun. At that moment Agathe appears, accompanied by a Hermit, and calls out to Max not to shoot, that she is the dove. But Max has already pulled the trigger; Agathe falls – but only in a swoon – and it is Caspar who tumbles from the tree and rolls, fatally wounded, on the turf. Samiel has had no power over Max, for the young forester had not come to the Wolf's Glen of his own free will, but only after being tempted by Caspar; therefore Caspar had himself to be the victim of the seventh bullet. There is general uproar, Agathe is seen to be alive and Caspar dying, but Max's confession results in a sentence of banishment from the Prince. Only through the intercession (in a chorale-like aria) of the Hermit, a holy man revered by the whole district, is disaster for Max averted and the Prince's forgiveness obtained. The opera ends with the jubilant melody from Agathe's second-act scene.

No less notable as portent than as music, Der Freischütz holds an important position in the logical development of music and particularly of opera. If anyone can be said to qualify for such a title, Weber was the founder of the German romantic school – a school which reached its climax with Wagner, its culmination perhaps with Richard Strauss.

But Weber is much more than just Wagner's fore-runner – just as Bellini and Donizetti have importance of their own beyond being predecessors of Verdi. He is one of the great melodists of musical history, and perhaps no other composer of the romantic movement so completely preserved musical freshness at the same time as he introduced the literary element into music. K., H.

EURYANTHE

Opera in three acts, book by Helmine von Chezy, adapted from L'Histoire de Gérard de Nevers et de la belle et vertueuse Euryanthe, sa mie. This is Weber's only 'Grand Opera', i.e. without spoken dialogue. Produced Vienna, Kärnthnertortheater, 25 October 1823, with Henriette Sontag; London, Covent Garden (in German), 1833; Drury Lane (in German), 1882, with Mmes Sucher, Peschka-Leutner, Messrs Nachbaur, Gura, conductor Hans Richter. Probable American première, Metropolitan, New York, 1887, with Lilli Lehmann, Marianne Brandt, Max Alvary, Emil Fischer, conductor Anton Seidl. Euryanthe was re-staged in Vienna under Mahler in 1904, with Förster-Lauterer and Weidt, Mildenburg, Winkelmann and Slezak, Weidemann and Mayr.

Euryanthe of SavoySoprano
Eglantine of Puiset.....Mezzo-Soprano
Count Lysiart of Forêt.....Baritone
Count Adolar of NeversTenor
Louis VI.....Bass
Rudolph, a knight.....Tenor
Bertha.....Soprano

Ladies, Knights, Peasants

Place: France

Time: Beginning of the Twelfth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Much of Weber's theatrical life, in Prague as a young man and then for most of the rest of its short duration in Dresden, was spent consciously promoting the cause of German opera. These persistent endeavours combined with a preoccupation with the supernatural and a love of the Gothick to produce Euryanthe, itself a cornerstone of the edifice of German romantic opera. Wagner, who pronounced the funeral oration when Weber's body was returned from London to Germany eleven years after his death, was not only an admirer but a prime beneficiary of his pioneering efforts, the debt Lohengrin owes to Euryanthe being too obvious to need emphasis.

The weaknesses of Euryanthe's libretto have been so notorious from the outset as to cause cuts within months of the première and a series of new versions and perversions throughout its history. Even so fervent an admirer of Weber as Mahler – the most constant of revisers but also the most sensitive – tried his hand and at the revival in Vienna in 1904 omitted the ghostly element and the serpent. Particular objections have been to the impossible naïveté of Euryanthe's non-reaction to the public accusations of Lysiart, to the obdurate refusal of Adolar in the desert to consult reason, and to the slightly absurd manifestation of the serpent in the same scene. Defence has urged a comparable innocence in Desdemona and comparable obduracy in Othello, and the last quarter of the twentieth century at least has been more inclined than past generations to accept the supernatural as, in certain circumstances, a plausible explanation of events. Perhaps the truth is that Euryanthe needs, indeed can stand, no special pleading, and requires only a straightforward performance – which is not easy to achieve, not least since the opera's conventions are those of the medieval Courts of Love, the attitudes those of the Troubadours; their restrained though ardent actions sometimes fit a little strangely to our eyes and ears with the romantic music they inspire in Euryanthe.

The overture, like that of Freischütz, is full of thematic references to the material of the opera, notably at the start Adolar's defiance of Lysiart and affirmation of his faith in Euryanthe; Adolar's romance from the second scene of the second act introduced on violins; and the ghostly apparitions (eight muted violins over tremolo violas). Because of the complicated nature of the story, Weber once went so far as to suggest that a tableau vivant, depicting Euryanthe at prayer by the tomb of Emma, Adolar's deceased sister, should be acted during the overture.

Act I, scene i. The Royal Court at Prémery. King Louis VI has successfully waged war against his rebellious barons and his kingdom is now at peace. The graceful conventions of the court are straight away apparent from the gently swaying chorus of Ladies, soon echoed by the returning Knights and succeeded by a stately dance. The King perceives Adolar's melancholy, says he will invite Euryanthe to court and, in response to the King's request, Adolar sings a graceful Minnelied, 'Unter blüh'nden Mandelbäumen'. Adolar and Lysiart are rivals and the latter provokes a quarrel by casting doubt on the virtue of Euryanthe, which Adolar vehemently defends: 'Ich bau' auf Gott und meine Euryanth', to the music of the opening of the overture. The rival noblemen pledge their lands on a trial of her fidelity and Lysiart swears to prove that she is untrue.

Scene ii. At their castle in Nevers, Euryanthe longs for Adolar's return from the wars and her sweetness of character is fully apparent from her cavatina, 'Glöcklein im Thale'. Eglantine, her family outlawed as a result of the rebellion and herself once in love with Adolar but now ostensibly Euryanthe's friend and guest, reproaches her that her trust is less than absolute. Her own, she says, is a passionate nature ('O mein Leid ist unermessen'), and, stung by the reproach, Euryanthe reveals the secret which she and Adolar share but which she has sworn not to give away (ghost music). His sister Emma once appeared to them in spirit and revealed how she had taken poison from her ring, mad with grief at the death in battle of her betrothed Udo. Her guilty soul cannot be at peace until the tears of an innocent girl have been shed on the ring. Euryanthe is aghast at what she has done but she and Eglantine pledge faith in a duet, falsely on Eglantine's side as is immediately apparent from her aria of jealous hatred: 'Bethörte! die an meine Liebe glaubt', a grand piece of bravura in which she shows herself the true ancestress of Ortrud, and plans to ransack Emma's tomb in search of a proof of Euryanthe's betrayal of trust which she may proffer to Adolar.

Trumpets proclaim the arrival of Lysiart who announces that he has come to escort Euryanthe back to court. The peasants' chorus of welcome is answered by the Knights, and Euryanthe greets Lysiart and his party in music of such carefree elegance that the tension audible earlier in both music and text eases under the gentle influence of her personality.

Act II, scene i. Nevers. Lysiart has come to understand that his task is hopeless and has even started to fall in love with the guileless Euryanthe himself. The music ('Wo berg ich mich?') is a grand expression of frustrated longing for Euryanthe, jealousy of Adolar and thirst for vengeance, and the spirit of Caspar hangs over it as it harks back to Beethoven's Pizarro and forward to Wagner's Telramund. Lysiart hides to hear Eglantine admit to having stolen Emma's ring from her tomb and to her plan to use it as a weapon with which to destroy the innocent Euryanthe. But how? In return for the ring she has stolen, he himself will be her instrument, promises Lysiart, and they will be married with Adolar's lands hers for ever! The unholy alliance is sealed in a duet vibrant with exultancy and purpose.

Scene ii. Prémery. Adolar, alone, voices his love for Euryanthe in music of such inspiration, poise and ardour as to convince the most sceptical of listeners of its purity and enduring nature ('Wehen mir Lüfte Ruh'). Here is Weber at his most lyrically evocative, here the pure spirit of courtly love which this opera is almost unique in celebrating. The tune provides the lyrical core of the overture, and the mood it sets is continued in a rapturous short duet for Euryanthe and Adolar as they are reunited, but disrupted when, the King and court having made their entrance, Lysiart announces that he has won his wager. Adolar is again defiant (music from the finale of I.i) and Euryanthe cannot understand what Lysiart is trying to establish until he produces Emma's ring, saying he knows its secret. Euryanthe knows she is guilty of a betrayal of trust, Adolar is convinced that she has been unfaithful, and all are prepared to believe Lysiart's assertion of his triumph. Dressed now in black armour, Adolar leads Euryanthe from the court with general opinion apparently united against her.

Act III, scene i. The music is in stark contrast to what has gone before as we move from court and castle to a deserted place at night. The Wolf's Glen seems not far away and Euryanthe, urging that she has unquestioningly followed Adolar through the wilderness, pleads for some sign of tenderness, even forgiveness. Adolar continues to reproach her but Euryanthe can only protest her innocent love, contrasting states of mind which carry through a short duet. It is plain that Adolar means to kill her but Euryanthe warns him of the approach of a serpent and even throws herself between it and Adolar, who fights and kills it. As recompense for her attempted self-sacrifice, Adolar determines not to kill her but rather to abandon her to heaven's will. Bassoon and flute introduce Euryanthe forsaken and her prayer is that Adolar may visit her grave and hear the trees and flowers hymning her innocence. The sound of a royal party approaching can be heard (hunting chorus, accompanied by horns and trombones), and the King is quickly – too quickly – convinced of Eglantine's treachery and Euryanthe's guiltlessness, assuring her that she will soon see Adolar again, so that the scene finishes with an ecstatic cabaletta for Euryanthe and chorus, at the end of which she collapses.

Scene ii. Nevers. Lysiart is now lord of Adolar's castle and domain, and his wedding to Eglantine in preparation, first in a dance (added by Weber for the Berlin première) and then in a charming chorus sung by Bertha and the villagers. When Adolar appears, he is at first not recognised but it is not long before the villagers pledge their renewed loyalty. As the sound of the wedding procession draws near, it is plain that Eglantine is in the grip of hallucinations and haunted by visions of Emma (ghost music). When he recognises him, Lysiart defies Adolar, but the knights hail him with joy and only the King's appearance prevents a duel. The King says that Euryanthe is dead and at the news, Eglantine becomes possessed with fury and confesses not only that she herself once loved Adolar but also that she has been the author of the plot which has precipitated the tragedy. Lysiart kills her, but when the King orders his arrest, Adolar urges his own guilt as being the more heinous, until Euryanthe, borne in on a litter by the hunters, revives and is restored to her husband. As her tears fall on Emma's ring, which she sees on Adolar's finger, the ghostly music, now reassuringly diatonic, makes it clear that that troubled spirit can rest for ever.

Euryanthe is one of those operas which gets more honourable mentions in operatic commentaries than it receives serious stage productions. Yet the generous Schumann¹ was able to write in 1847, 'this music is as yet far too little known and recognised. It is heart's blood, the noblest he had; the opera cost him part of his life – truly. But it has also made him immortal'; and Liszt, 'We find in Weber a marvellous divination of the future shaping of the drama; and the endeavour to unite with opera the whole wealth of instrumental development'. John Warrack in his admirable book² on the composer pinpoints the reasons for the musicologist's interest: 'in no other work does Weber take chromatic harmony to such extreme limits; indeed it was not until Liszt and Wagner that certain passages of Euryanthe were overtaken – principally, the ghost music of the overture, some of Eglantine's scenes and the extraordinary opening to Act III as the unhappy Adolar and Euryanthe pick their way through the desert, while bleakly shifting harmonies reflect, with true romantic imagery, their misery against the desolation of the scene. The loosening of the closed forms also allowed him a much greater range of harmonic relationships.'

H.

¹ Robert Schumann: Theaterbüchlein.

² John Warrack: Carl Maria von Weber (Hamish Hamilton 1968).

OBERON

Opera in three acts, text, in English, by James Robinson Planché. The original story appeared in La Bibliothèque Bleue under the title of Huon de Bordeaux. Wieland adapted this story to form his poem Oberon, and Planché took his libretto from Sotheby's translation of Wieland. First performed at Covent Garden, 12 April 1826, with Miss Paton as Reiza (Rezia only in German versions), Mme Vestris as Fatima, Braham as Huon and Bland as Oberon, the composer conducting. First performance in New York, 1828. Revived, Metropolitan Opera, 1918, with Ponselle, Martinelli, conducted by Bodanzky (with recitatives composed by Bodanzky, instead of spoken dialogue); Salzburg, in German under Walter, with, in 1932, Maria Müller, Lotte Schoene, Helge Roswaenge; Holland Festival, 1950, with Gré Brouwenstijn, Frans Vroons, conducted by Monteux (in German); Florence Festival, 1952, in the Boboli Gardens in a production by Herbert Graf, with Doris Doree, Gianna Pederzini, Tyge Tygesen, Gino Penno, conducted by Fritz Stiedry (in Italian); Opéra, Paris, 1953, with Araujo, Gedda, conducted by Cluytens.

Sir Huon of Bordeaux Tenor
 Sherasmin, his squire Baritone
 Oberon, King of the Fairies Tenor
 Puck Soprano
 Reiza,¹ daughter of Haroun el Rashid Soprano
 Fatima, her attendant Mezzo-Soprano
 A Sea Nymph Soprano

Speaking parts

Charlemagne, Emperor of the Franks
 Haroun el Rashid, Caliph
 Babekan, a Saracen Prince
 Almanzor, Emir of Tunis
 Abdullah, a Corsair
 Titania, Oberon's wife
 Roshana, wife of Almanzor
 Namouna, Fatima's grandmother
 Nadina, a female of Almanzor's harem

Oberon has always resisted the efforts which have from time to time been made to fit it neatly into the category of German romantic opera. Its pattern is undeniably unconventional, and the signs are that Weber himself was disturbed by several aspects of the dramatic plan. Various attempts have been made to adapt the opera for performance. Bodanzky composed recitatives in place of the spoken dialogue for the production at the Metropolitan in 1918, but otherwise left the score intact. More important is the version prepared by Mahler in conjunction with the scenic designer Alfred Roller, with a new German translation by Gustav Brecher. Mahler arranged a number of musical sections, usually (but not always) in conjunction with spoken dialogue as opposed to singing, which he designated 'Melodram'; these are not given separate numbers in his edition but are clearly indicated as 13a and 13b in the score. There are eight of these additions, and they have the effect of connecting certain sections of the music very closely with the dramatic action, most particularly of course the horn call, which is heard at the beginning of the overture, and which in Mahler's arrangement assumes a musical status comparable to that of Papageno's pipes. A section of music is introduced to lead up to the vision of Reiza in Act I, and another to reinforce the giving of the magic horn by Oberon to Sherasmin before the ensemble during which takes place the transformation from France to Baghdad. In Act II, the bewitching of Haroun's court is made more plausible by means of musical accompaniment, and the flight of the two pairs of lovers has orchestral accompaniment from the moment the horn invokes Oberon's aid, Oberon and Reiza later between them singing the short aria of Oberon which occurs in the finale of the third act (in Mahler's version it is thus heard twice). After Reiza has been carried away by the pirates (which occurs immediately after she has sung 'Ocean, thou mighty monster'), Oberon laments the hard nature of their trials in a shortened version of his first aria, and Puck anticipates the fairy music of the finale by singing a reminiscence (shortened, and in C instead of F) of the fairy chorus at the opening of Act I. In Act III, Huon's return just before the trio with Fatima and Sherasmin is heralded by a melodrama for Puck, and Mahler omits entirely the rondo for Huon which should follow Reiza's F minor aria. The preparations for the public burning of Huon are made to the sound of the march which, later in the finale, reintroduces Huon to the court of Charlemagne.

The overture, which is one of the best known and most popular of concert pieces, is made up entirely of music employed elsewhere in the opera. The horn call (Ex. 1) with which it opens plays a prominent part throughout and is used in rather the same way as the magic instruments in The Magic Flute. It is followed by a figure of soft, quickly descending woodwind chords (Ex. 2), which at once suggests the atmosphere of fairyland; its light, airy quality sets the scene for the opening fairy chorus. Two themes follow, still played softly and mysteriously; they are heard again at the end of the opera, as a triumphant march. Atmosphere and tempo change and we hear a stormy figure in the strings; this returns as an accompanying figure to the quartet in Act II, when the four lovers escape to the ship. The fairy chords have the effect of calming down the violent allegro section, and a theme of great beauty (Ex. 3), which Huon later sings in the big scena, is heard on the clarinet and is then taken over by the strings. This leads straight into an exultant tune (Ex. 4), which is typically and unmistakably Weber – most people will recognise it as from the closing section of Reiza's great aria 'Ocean, thou mighty monster'. As is so often his way with his triumphant themes, Weber first introduces it quietly and unpretentiously, and it is not till after a recapitulation of the existing material and the introduction of a new, strong theme (later associated with Puck), that he allows us to feel the full force of this exhilarating tune. It brings the overture to an exciting close.

¹ Reiza is the original form, as found in the libretto and in the first English edition of the score. It appears as Rezia in the earliest German score, where Huon is spelled Hüon.

Act I. The curtain rises to reveal Oberon's bower, where a group of fairies sing over their sleeping King a chorus which breathes the very atmosphere of enchantment. Ex. 2 punctuates the various sentences, and the composer's marking is Andante quasi allegretto (sempre tutto pianissimo possibile). Puck appears and explains that Oberon, having quarrelled with his fairy partner Titania, has vowed never to be reconciled to her until he shall have found two lovers constant through every peril and temptation. To seek such a pair, Puck, his 'tricksy spirit', has ranged through the world in vain. Oberon wakes and, in an aria which fulfils the implications of its agitato introduction, laments the 'fatal oath' he has sworn. He learns that Puck has heard sentence passed on Sir Huon of Bordeaux, a young knight, who, having been insulted by the son of Charlemagne, has killed him in single combat and for this has been condemned by the Emperor to proceed to Baghdad, slay him who sits on the Caliph's right hand, and claim the Caliph's daughter as his bride.

Oberon instantly resolves to make this pair the instrument of his reunion with his Queen, and for this purpose he conjures up Huon and Sherasmin asleep before him, and enamours the knight by showing him Reiza, daughter of the Caliph, in a vision. Introduced by the horn call of the overture (Ex. 1), she begs for help.

Oberon wakes Huon to the sound of fairy music, Huon promises to be faithful to his mission, and Oberon with a wave of his wand transports him and his squire to Baghdad. The contrast between the utterances of the mortal Huon and the immortal Oberon is most marked, and the transformation (an enharmonic change from F minor to D major) makes as lovely an effect musically as it should when staged. Huon rejoices at the prospect before him in music of florid cast accompanied by the chorus, and prepares, with the help of the magic horn Oberon has given him, to fulfil his mission.

Two non-musical episodes follow. In the first, Huon and Sherasmin rescue Prince Babekan from a lion. He turns out to be the betrothed of Reiza, but his evil disposition is soon apparent when he and his followers set on their rescuers; they are, however, put to flight. The knight next learns from an old woman, Namouna, that Reiza is to be married next day, but the Princess has been influenced, like her lover, by a vision and is resolved to be his alone. She believes that fate will protect her from her nuptials with Babekan.

Huon exults in his chivalrous role in a great scena, whose music exactly fits his youthful heroic character. The magnificent flourish of the opening section is succeeded by a lovely andante for the cello (Ex. 3) which later expresses Huon's sentiments as opposed to his heroic resolves. The scena returns to the Allegro energico of the beginning and the close is strenuous and forthright.

The scene changes to the palace of Haroun el Rashid, where Reiza tells Fatima that nothing will induce her to marry anyone other than her destined knight; better death than union with the hated Babekan. The finale begins with a big solo for Reiza, in which she swears to be true to the knight she has as yet seen only in a vision. Fatima tells Reiza that her deliverer is at hand, and mistress and maid contemplate their coming bliss in a simple duettino. The sound of a march is heard and Reiza sings jubilantly above a soft chorus of palace guards and eunuchs.

Act II. We are at the court of Haroun el Rashid. A chorus of attendants and slaves sings the praises of the mighty Caliph, who sits serenely in their midst with Prince Babekan at his right. The Prince asks that there shall be no more delay before he is married to his promised Reiza, and Haroun orders that she be led into his presence. Preceded by dancing girls (to a short orchestral allegretto grazioso) she comes in. No sooner is the music ended than the clash of swords is heard outside and in a moment Reiza is in the arms of her rescuer. Huon fights Babekan and vanquishes him, and having spellbound the rest by a blast of the magic horn, he and Sherasmin carry off Reiza and Fatima.

A scene without music serves to establish the flight of the four fugitives (they are set on by palace guards, but frighten them off with the help of the horn); it also gives them an opportunity to lose the horn in the course of the fight. Later, we find Fatima and Sherasmin together, and, in the course of a love scene, Fatima finds occasion to sing a song of nostalgic import, 'A lonely Arab maid', marked by the composer Andante amoroso. The four lovers take ship to the sound of a quartet, the two women answering the two men, all four later joining in a rapturous ensemble to the accompaniment of the string figure of the overture.

The scene changes to a rocky seashore. Puck calls together his spirits and instructs them to bring about the wreck of the ship in which Reiza and Huon are crossing the sea; the music ends with the rousing of the storm. No sooner are they gone about their work than Huon appears supporting the fainting figure of Reiza. His short adagio prayer for her recovery is one of the most beautiful passages in the score and reveals a tender, poetic side to Huon's character. His prayer is answered, Reiza revives, and Huon goes off to see if there are other survivors of the wreck.

Reiza is alone. She apostrophises the sea, whose very repose carries menace but whose fury is terrible indeed. 'Ocean, thou mighty monster' is a justly famous aria for dramatic soprano, and, with the overture, it is the one number of Oberon which will be familiar to everybody. It is an extended scena, modelled on the lines of Agathe's great solo in Freischütz but more dramatic in content. It opens with a grand recitativic introduction, continues with a swelling allegro con moto section describing the storm still in progress, sinks to the comparative calm of the maestoso assai, but rises again steeply as Reiza catches sight of something moving, reaching a climax of excitement as she realises it is a ship; the concluding Presto con fuoco is one of the most thrilling passages in opera and is familiar as the final section of the overture (Ex. 4).

But the ship Reiza has seen turns out to be manned by pirates, who pause only to make her prisoner, and leave Huon, who attempts to rescue her, senseless on the shore.

For the finale, we are back in an atmosphere which is Weber at his most idyllic. The sensuously graceful song of the Sea Nymphs in 6/8 has a magic of its own, but the whole scene, with its short duet for Oberon and Puck and its extended and mostly pianissimo chorus of fairies, is wonderfully beautiful. This is pure fairy music, which even such a specialist as Mendelssohn never excelled (the Midsummer Night's Dream overture, like Oberon, was written in 1826), and its delicacy and soft charm can never fail to astonish an unsuspecting listener and ravish his musical susceptibilities.

Act III. Fatima, saved with Sherasmin from the wreck but now like him a slave in Tunis, laments her changed fortune in a song with a pronounced Oriental flavour, 'O Araby, dear Araby, my own native land'. But she cannot prevent her natural cheerfulness breaking into the refrain with its repeated 'Al, al, al, al, al, al'. Sherasmin, who works in the same establishment for one Ibrahim, joins her and together they reflect sadly on the distance each of them has come since childhood; again, they finish by looking on the bright side – at least they are together in their slavery, and have a kind master. But a surprise is round the corner and Puck brings in Huon. There is a great recognition, and Fatima says she has even heard that Reiza is in Tunis, but where she does not know. They plan to dress Huon up and get him employment with Ibrahim.

The scene changes to the palace of the Emir of Tunis, where Reiza lies a captive, and has become, like Mozart's Constanze before her, the principal object of a noble master's affections. She grieves for her lost love in an F minor aria of pure and mournful beauty, the counterpart of Huon's prayer in the previous act, 'Mourn thou poor heart'. Like the Pasha Selim, Almanzor respects the grief of his prisoner and tells her he will not force her to yield to his love.

Huon receives a message, conveyed in the symbolic language of the East by means of flowers. Fatima interprets it for him and tells him it is from Reiza; he is to go at once to her. Huon's rondo, 'I revel in hope and joy again', is likely to test the agility of the tenor but is of comparatively conventional musical value. He is led to the Emir's palace where, in fact, Reiza is incarcerated, but is confronted instead with the Emir's wife, Roshana, thirsting for revenge on the husband who has discarded her in favour of the beautiful captive. She assures Huon that he will have earned her love and the throne of Tunis if he will help her dispose of her erring husband. Neither the prospect of power nor of her love can turn the hero from his purpose, which is to free Reiza, and he has little difficulty in resisting the efforts which Roshana employs to seduce him; his musical answers to the blandishments of Roshana's attendants are nothing if not firm.

As Huon is rushing from her presence he is surprised and seized by Almanzor and his guard; Roshana tries to stab her husband and is arrested in her turn and led off by attendants. Almanzor commands that a pyre be erected and Huon burnt within the hour, and the efforts of Reiza to obtain his pardon only succeed in gaining for her a similar sentence. At this juncture, Sherasmin, who has contrived entrance to the palace, has the magic horn miraculously restored to him, and with its help he is able to change the situation completely.

The sound of music has an exactly similar effect on Almanzor's court as it had on Monostatos' slaves; they no longer have a desire to do anything but dance, and the four lovers, now reunited, resolve to summon the aid of Oberon in an effort not only to suspend but to dissolve completely the nightmare situation in which they find themselves. The Fairy King appears in answer to the horn's blast, and in a short but beautiful aria hails the faithful, loving pair and tells them that their prayers are answered and he will restore them to safety and happiness. They are transported to the court of Charlemagne, who takes his place with his entourage to the sound of a march. Huon tells him his commands have been fulfilled, and he is here with Reiza to claim the promised pardon. This is granted and the opera ends with a chorus of praise and thanksgiving. H.

KURT WEILL

(born 2 March 1900, died 3 April 1950)

AUFSTIEG UND FALL DER STADT MAHAGONNY

Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny

Opera in three acts, libretto by Bertolt Brecht. Première, Leipzig, 9 March 1930, with Mali Trummer, Marga Dannenberg, Paul Beinert, conductor Gustav Brecher, producer Walter Brüggmann, designer Caspar Neher. First produced Berlin, 1931, with Lotte Lenya, Trude Hesterberg, Harold Paulsen, conductor

Alexander von Zemlinsky, producer Ernst Anfricht, after which it was banned in Germany under the Nazis. A Paris production of the Songspiel was agreed to by Weill in 1932, and this version was heard in Venice, 1949, with Hilde Guden; Cologne, 1952; and on the Turin Radio, 1953. First post-war stage performances (in a garbled version) Darmstadt, 1957, and Kiel, 1961. Operatic (Leipzig) version, Heidelberg, 1962; Hamburg, 1962, with Helga Pilarczyk, Gisela Litz, Helmut Melchert, conductor Janos Kulka; London, Sadler's Wells, 1963, with April Cantelo, Patricia Bartlett, Ronald Dowd, conductor Colin Davis; English National Opera, 1995, with Lesley Garrett, Sally Burgess.

| | |
|---------------------------------|-----------|
| Leokadja Begbick | Contralto |
| Fatty, the book-keeper | Tenor |
| Trinity Moses | Baritone |
| Jenny | Soprano |
| Jim Mahoney | Tenor |
| Jake Schmidt | Tenor |
| Alaska Wolf Joe | Bass |
| Pennybank Bill | Baritone |
| Toby Higgins ¹ | Tenor |

Six Women of Mahagonny; the Men of Mahagonny

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Brecht's first collaboration with Kurt Weill, a pupil of Busoni's,² was in 1927, when at Baden-Baden a Songspiel [sic], Kleine Mahagonny, was given on 17 July in the same programme as short operas by Milhaud, Toch and Hindemith. This work consisted of five songs of Brecht's set to music by Weill (it is interesting to note that Brecht himself had earlier set them to music) and it was not until after their collaboration on Die Dreigroschenoper (a play with music, 1928), Der Lindberghflug (a cantata, 1928) and Happy End (a play with music, 1929), that they were able to finish the full-length opera which they had straight away started to develop from the material of the Songspiel. Later collaboration was on Der Jasager (a children's opera, 1930), Mann ist Mann (a play with songs, 1931) and Die sieben Todsünden (The Seven Deadly Sins: a ballet-opera, 1933).

Whatever else it may be, The Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny is an opera, written for opera singers (it was not until the Berlin production that Lotte Lenya took over the role of Jenny), and designed in what can only be described as the operatic convention, that is to say with the characters singing not just songs but frequently when in real life they would speak. Brecht on the one hand had the strongest antipathy to what he described as 'culinary' opera – opera with 'a hedonistic approach' – and on the other believed that the theatrical art of the future would make frequent use of music, not least as a means of halting the action and driving home a message; music to his way of thinking even in an opera would be at the service of the dramatist. Most theoreticians believe that in opera, on the contrary, whatever the content of the piece, the form is dictated by the music. Here comes a fundamental clash. After his stage collaboration with Weill came to an end, Brecht went on to write a series of committed plays (his study of Marx began only in 1927) and to found in East Berlin after the war one of the great theatrical companies of our time.

In the years after his early death, Weill came to be identified in the minds of many listeners in the first place with the Berlin of the Weimar Republic and its overtones, and in the second with the singing of his wife, Lotte Lenya. Lenya was an extraordinary interpretative singer, endowed with a voice essentially more suited to cabaret than to opera, a fragile instrument moreover for which Weill and even later musicians had over the years progressively to transcribe what she sang in order that she could sing it. She was a great artist but the results of transposition, and of her success in the recording studio late in her career, often produced results rather different from what Weill wrote, or originally intended.

The première in Leipzig³ provoked demonstrations by the Nazis, who were later to banish composer and author and ban their works, and every subsequent revival has been attended by controversy, the Hamburg production scheduled for autumn 1961 being postponed until the following year because it was felt unwise to risk such a work in the weeks following the building of the Berlin wall. It remained for Lotte Lenya, the composer's widow, in her notes on the complete recording in which she sang Jenny, to remind readers that the opera, which is now solemnly worked over by the critics, had once – for her and Brecht and Weill – been such fun to create.

Act I. As the music⁴ dashes energetically into action, a much battered truck comes to a stop in a desolate part of America, and from it emerge Leokadja Begbick, Trinity Moses and Fatty the book-keeper, all on the run from the police. If they can't go any further, why not stay here and found a new city, where no one has to work and where there are prize fights every third day – so explains Leokadja in an extended arioso ('Sie soll sein wie ein Netz').

¹ This part is sometimes taken by the singer of Jake.

² Busoni at one time accused Weill (before the collaboration with Brecht, by which time Busoni was dead) of attempting to become a 'poor man's Verdi'.

³ Klemperer refused to do it at the Kroll Oper in Berlin, and years later (in Conversations with Klemperer, edited by Peter Heyworth) referred to it as a 'complete failure'.

⁴ For a small orchestra with emphasis on saxophone, banjo, bass guitar, piano, zither, accordion.

And so the city was founded and called Mahagonny, and the first sharks moved in. Enter Jenny, the mulatto from Cuba, and six other girls, who sit on their suitcases and introduce themselves in the famous 'Alabama-song', written originally in Brecht's peculiar pidgin-English¹ and set to one of Weill's most haunting tunes, Ex. 1:

The news of the founding of a city of pleasure reaches the big cities, where the inhabitants hymn their misery while Fatty and Moses cry the praises of Mahagonny. In the next few days, all the malcontents of the continent move to Mahagonny, notably the lumberjacks Jim, Jake, Bill and Joe, who sing a quick fox-trot in anticipation of the pleasures to come (including a parodistic phrase from the Bridesmaids' Chorus in Freischütz).

The hero of the story is Jim Mahoney, and he and the others are greeted by Mrs Begbick, Trinity Moses losing no time in proffering pictures of the available girls from whom they may care to choose. Jenny and the six girls are produced, and Jake offers $30 for Jenny, who protests in a song: 'Ach, bedenken Sie, Herr Jakob Schmidt' – just think how little you get for $30. Jim says perhaps he'll take her, and when the others have gone, he and Jenny exchange to a wistful tune such vital information as whether Jenny shall comb her hair forward or back, shall or shan't wear underwear under her skirt.

Disillusion has set in and, says Mrs Begbick, people are starting to leave town. Fatty counters with the news that the police are catching up with Begbick. Jim comes in, planning to leave because he has just seen a notice 'Forbidden!' Jake, Bill and Joe sing the praises of the city with its everlasting freedom, but Jim's blues come straight from the purposelessness of it all.

In front of the inn, which is known as 'Nothing barred', the men are sitting drinking and listening to the strains of 'The Maiden's Prayer' – eternal art, thinks Jake. Jim's mock ballad of the sufferings he underwent in Alaska in order eventually to reach a haven of rest complains of the inadequacy of what he has found, and it takes a concerted effort to prevent him carving up everything in sight with his famous knife.

The loudspeaker announces a 'typhoon', and a fugato introduces an impressive set piece of lamentation. The next scene is called 'The Night of the Hurricane'. The men sing determinedly in chorus (echoes of the chorale from Die Zauberflöte), Jake laments and Jenny sadly repeats the Alabama-song. Jim mockingly expounds his philosophy: what sort of horror is a hurricane when compared to man? The long scena, in whose course we learn that the hurricane is heading straight for Mahagonny and that the police who were pursuing Mrs Begbick have been killed, reaches its climax with Jim leading what is perhaps the best (as well as the best-known) of the songs: 'Denn wie man sich bettet, so liegt man' (As you make your bed, you must lie there), Ex. 2.

As the curtain falls, there can be seen a map with an arrow moving slowly across it towards Mahagonny.

Act II. Again the map, with the arrow still moving towards Mahagonny and successive radio announcements indicating the imminence of danger, until 'the hurricane has been diverted past Mahagonny and continues on its way!' The citizens rejoice; if they have learnt anything, it is to enjoy what luck has unexpectedly sent them. From now on the motto is 'nothing barred'. First, gluttony. To a slow parodistic waltz (zither and accordion), Jake sits down to dine and eats three entire calves, expiring as he asks for more.

Next, love. In the room at the back can be seen a girl and a man with Mrs Begbick between them. She admonishes the man to spit out his gum, wash his hands and behave decently. The lights go out, the chorus sings the Mandalay-song and urges him to get on with it, but when the lights go up, Jenny and Jim are seen sitting a little way apart, he smoking, she making up. They sing tenderly about two cranes flying in the sky, a duet in which Brecht's lyrical invention is matched by Weill's to form one of the most purely 'operatic' numbers in the whole score. It was placed here in the published score apparently at the behest of Weill's publishers, though intended by author and composer for the third act.

¹ Brecht thought at one time that a form of pidgin-English would be the world's first universal language!

Next, prize fights. Trinity Moses and Alaska Wolf Joe are matched to the astonishment of Fatty and the other men, who predict a walk-over for Trinity Moses. Jim and Joe rather sentimentally remember the seven winters they spent together in Alaska, and Jim puts his money on Joe, who duly fulfils expectations and is knocked out. 'Dead!' says the referee. The crowd laughs, and the men come forward with a reminder that here nothing's barred, that we may now expect the boozing as well.

Jim, Bill and Jenny are playing billiards, and Jim invites everyone to drink with him. Jim finds he has run out of money and asks Jenny to help him. They make a boat out of the billiard table, and Jim, Bill and Jenny climb on it, until Jim announces that they have arrived back in Alaska. Trinity Moses and the widow Begbick demand payment, but Jim has nothing left and everyone except Bill and Jenny move away from him, and even they refuse to come to his financial rescue. As Jim, who has committed the ultimate capitalist crime of running out of money, is bound and led away, Jenny repeats, 'Denn wie man sich bettet, so liegt man'. The act ends with Jim alone in the forest, tied by one foot to a tree and longing in an impressive scena (which rises to a 'culinary' top C) for the night to continue and for the day never to arrive.

Act III. Jim is to be tried in what passes for a Court of Justice in Mahagonny – the widow Begbick sits as judge, Fatty is defence counsel and Trinity Moses prosecutes. One Toby Higgins is being tried for murder, and as Trinity Moses waxes eloquent on the depravity of the crime, the accused can be seen bargaining in mime with the judge. Apparently he offers a big enough bribe because defending counsel is allowed to ask for the injured party to be produced, and nobody coming forward the case goes by default.

It is Jim's turn and he asks his friend Bill to let him have $100 so that his case can be conducted decently. Again they remember their seven winters together in Alaska, but sentiment cannot interfere with financial considerations as far as Bill is concerned and he refuses the loan. As the prosecution starts its case, Begbick again bargains, but Jim is unable to respond and the prosecution gets down to details. Jim is accused of the seduction of Jenny, of singing cheerfully during the approach of the 'typhoon', of corrupting the entire city, of sending his friend to certain death in a prize fight merely to win his bet, of not being able to pay for the whisky which he drank and the curtain rod he broke. Each time the question is, 'Who is the injured party?'

The men demand Jim's acquittal on the grounds that his behaviour during the typhoon injured nobody, that it certainly wasn't he who killed Alaska Wolf Joe, but as he is undoubtedly guilty of the last charge, he is sentenced on all five, and the penalty becomes increasingly stiff, ending with death for the failure to pay for the whisky.

People are sitting around in a bar reading a newspaper and displaying the disillusion which has once again overtaken Mahagonny. Jointly they long for a change. The loudspeaker announces the impending execution of Jim Mahoney and suggests that, though many will dislike seeing the spectacle, most of the spectators in the audience would be no more willing than have been the inhabitants of Mahagonny to stump up money for him. A tender farewell between Jenny and Jim, who consigns her to his best friend Bill, precedes his walk to the place of execution. Jim in rather lugubrious music proclaims that he has no regrets, that his philosophy is unchanged and that life is meant to be drained in gigantic draughts. Jim is seated on the electric chair but asks whether they do not know that there is a God. During his execution the others act out the coming of God to Mahagonny, Trinity Moses taking the chief role.

The loudspeaker announces that giant processions took place in protest against the tremendously high cost of living, and that these heralded the end of the 'City of Nets'. During the march-finale which is dominated by 'Denn wie man sich bettet, so liegt man' and the Alabama-song, the processions appear, each of them carrying an appropriate banner, and the opera ends with 'Können uns und euch und niemand helfen!' (We can't help ourselves or you or anyone). H.

DIE SIEBEN TODSÜNDEN

The Seven Deadly Sins

Ballet chanté in one act, text by Bertolt Brecht, scenario by Edward James and Boris Kochno. Première Paris, 7 June 1933, with Lotte Lenya and Tilly Losch as the singing and dancing Anna. Choreography was by Balanchine; Maurice Abravanel conducted. First performed 1933, Savoy Theatre, London; 1958, City Center, New York; 1961 in Italy, in Brussels (by Béjart), and at the Edinburgh Festival with Cleo Laine, Anya Linden, choreographed by Kenneth Macmillan; 1978, English National Opera, with Julie Covington, Siobhan Davies.

Anna ISoprano

Anna IIDancer

The FamilyTwo Tenors, Baritone, Bass

Running Time: 35 minutes

Weill arrived in Paris in March 1933, and only days later Edward James had commissioned him to write a work for Les Ballets 1933, the company founded by Balanchine and Kochno which he backed. The original cast was packed with ambivalence: Tilly Losch was James's estranged wife, Lenya and Weill were in the throes of a divorce (and the music had to be transposed to fit her vocal resources), and Lenya's current lover, Otto Pasetti, sang one of the tenor members of the family. Casper Neher, with whose wife Weill was having an affair, designed the sets. The season lost money, but the work was an artistic success and it seems to have been during this season that Lincoln Kirstein recognised the genius of Balanchine and made up his mind to take him to America, where between them they later founded the New York City Ballet. Brecht appears to have been less than enthusiastic about the project and the scenario but, for what turned out to be his last stage collaboration with Weill, contrived to inject enough social criticism to suit his own agenda.

Prologue. Anna I and Anna II set out from Louisiana to make enough money in seven years in the big cities of the U.S.A. to build a house for their Family. Anna I is practical, Anna II pretty and romantic, though they are in reality two halves of one personality, with a single savings-bank account. The Family (the bass is the Mother) don't do much to help beyond biblical exhortations to avoid sin, which reduces earning power and is therefore to be avoided for practical reasons.

Sloth. The Family hopes Anna II will become industrious, but she falls asleep, accosts strange men in the park, and only quick thinking extracts a fee for removing her.

Pride. In Memphis Anna II wants her dancing to be treated as Art, but this is show-business and the cabaret audience prefers striptease. Pride is something for the rich.

Anger. Working in film in Los Angeles, Anna II is fired for complaining of the ill-treatment of a horse. The Family complains of the poor financial results so far.

Gluttony. In Philadelphia Anna has problems over her weight and the specifications of the contract. The Family is confident – and eating well.

Lust. In Boston, they find Edward, who has money and pays for love, and Fernando, whom Anna loves but who has none.

Avarice. Anna II ruins Edward who kills himself. In Baltimore she is famous, but if she's not careful, avarice will turn fame to notoriety.

Envy. In San Francisco, Anna envies the people who get away with anything. Her sister rebukes her. The world is not for idealists. Don't try to do good when you're doing well.

Epilogue. The sisters go back to live in Louisiana.

Weill's achievement is to have created a synthesis of popular music, often jazzy or barber-shop in style, within a classical framework, the music constantly prompting the mood, underlining the irony, insisting the practical trips up the romantic. By the end, Anna II can only respond, crushed, to Anna I's 'Nicht wahr, Anna?' with 'Ja, Anna'. Too downbeat an ending to be bittersweet?

H.

STREET SCENE

Opera in two acts, libretto by Elmer Rice and Langston Hughes (based on Elmer Rice's play). Première Philadelphia, 16 December 1946, and New York, 9 January 1947, with Polyna Stoska, Anne Jeffreys, Brian Sullivan, Sydney Rayner, Norman Cordon, conductor Maurice Abravanel; 1989, Scottish Opera; English National Opera.

Abraham Kaplan.....Tenor

Greta FiorentinoSoprano

Carl Olsen.....Bass

Emma Jones.....Mezzo-Soprano

Olga Olsen.....Contralto

Shirley Kaplan.....Speaking Role

| | |
|---|------------------------|
| Henry Davis | Baritone |
| Willie Maurrant | Treble |
| Anna Maurrant | Soprano |
| Sam Kaplan | Tenor |
| Daniel Buchanan | Tenor |
| Frank Maurrant | Bass-Baritone |
| George Jones | Baritone |
| Steve Sankey | Speaking Role |
| Lippo Fiorentino | Tenor |
| Jenny Hildebrand | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Mrs Hildebrand | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Rose Maurrant | Soprano |
| Harry Easter | Baritone |
| Mae Jones | Dancer/Singer |
| Dick McGann | Dancer/Singer |
| Two Nursemaids | Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano |
| Inhabitants of the Street, Policemen, Milkman, Old Clothes Man, Interne, Ambulance Driver, Neighbours, Passers-By, Children, etc. | |

Place: New York City

Time: The Present (1946)

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Kurt Weill left Germany for America in 1935 and, once naturalised, lost few opportunities to emphasise his identification not only as an anti-Nazi but as an American. His European successes (which included American references in Happy End, Seven Deadly Sins and particularly Mahagonny) were followed by a number of shows written for wartime New York and eventually an American folk-ballad opera, Down in the Valley (written in 1945).

It is easy with hindsight to see that, from the moment he arrived in the U.S.A., Weill had been inching his way towards writing an American opera; his association with theatrical success in Berlin made it more or less inevitable that this should be a Broadway opera. By late 1945 he was in discussion with Elmer Rice, and the new work was ready for performance a year later. It was critically panned in Philadelphia but had considerable success in New York, though its total of 148 performances on Broadway was considered a disappointment. It was not revived in his lifetime but when he visited London in 1947 he seems to have had hopes that it might have an English production, perhaps at Covent Garden. This never eventuated and when after his death it was heard in Germany, it was greeted with total misunderstanding, though increasingly successful in revival elsewhere.

Act I. An evening in June. The Prelude opens with a phrase from Sam Kaplan's aria 'Lonely house', which Weill emphasised to Langston Hughes is one of the show's centrepieces. An off-stage radio introduces us to the action. It is indescribably hot and neighbourhood talk is of little else: 'Ain't it awful, the heat.' The slow-moving but highly effective ensemble gives way to a blues sung by Henry, the Janitor. Willie Maurrant yells up to his mother which doesn't please Mrs Jones, who is not slow to lead a trio of neighbours gossiping about the man they have more than once seen Mrs Maurrant with recently. Mrs Maurrant's return pushes the gossip in other directions and we discover in quick succession that she thinks she and her daughter don't always have the same tastes as her husband; that the neighbourhood harbours considerable xenophobic sentiment; that Sam Kaplan is more than a little interested in Rose Maurrant. But the most urgent topic is Mrs Buchanan's pregnancy and in slow 6/8 her husband emphasises how difficult having a baby can be, particularly for the husband; he is interrupted by a scream from his wife at the top of the building.

We meet for the first time the cross-grained Mr Maurrant. Rose staying out late is a particular bone of contention, and he is quite happy to blame it on his wife. 'Somehow I never could believe that life was meant to be all dull and grey' she sings, and her substantial aria tells us about her early hopes. Steve Sankey the Milk Company Collector strolls by on his way to the drugstore. Mrs Maurrant says she must look for her son Willie, and the field is clear for the gossips: 'Get a load of that!' But life on the Street is not all gossip and threat and Lippo Fiorentino, the Ice Cream Salesman, leads a substantial Ice Cream Septet. His high-flying tenor soars over everyone (originally sung by an ex-Metropolitan tenor, Sydney Rayner), though Mrs Fiorentino is not to be outdone and finishes the extended ensemble on a top D flat.

Kaplan and Maurrant, liberal and traditionalist, disagree vigorously on the handling of children and Maurrant rams home his point of view in an aria 'Let things be like they always was'. Children march in (to a tune belonging to a New York High School) which gives place, as girls come from graduation, to one of the score's most obviously popular numbers: 'Wrapped in a ribbon and tied in a bow'.

Mrs Maurant dances for a moment with Lippo Fiorentino, Sankey passes by on his way home (Maurant wonders why he's hanging around), and Willie Maurant has apparently been fighting with another boy who has been rude about his mother. When the Maurrants leave, he for a drink with a neighbour, she and Willie to go up to their room, gossip breaks out again, but Sam explodes with indignation and, when the others have left, embarks on his big arioso, 'Lonely house, lonely me!' He disappears as Rose comes in with Harry Easter, manager of her office, who sneaks a kiss and attempts to entice her away from the neighbourhood: 'Wouldn't you like to be on Broadway?' Rose is obviously tempted, but at the moment more worried by the notion that the neighbours might see her with a stranger and tell her father. Still, Rose doesn't figure on being a mistress: 'What good would the Moon be, Unless the right one shared its beams?' Maurant nearly catches them saying goodnight and bawls Rose out, which provokes an element of rebellion in her before she reverts to a reprise of 'What good would the Moon be'.

When Mr Buchanan rushes from the house Rose says she will telephone the doctor. The arrival of Dick and Mae brings a complete change of mood in the most obviously Broadway-style number in the score, 'Moonfaced, starry-eyed', designated Song, Scene and Dance, and ending with a Blues on the trumpet. Vincent Jones, a slob if ever there was one, makes a pass at Rose and then knocks down the unfortunate Sam who answers her cry for help. He is obviously not seriously hurt and Rose asks him, rather shyly, if he thinks it's true what they are saying about her mother. His awkwardness confirms her fears but their duet not only makes a fine ending to the act but, when Sam quotes Walt Whitman, 'In the door yard ... Stands the lilac bush', an emblem for their love.

Act II. Daybreak, the next morning. Neighbourhood comings and goings precede a game for the children, 'One, Two, Three, for Superman, come and catch me if you can', during whose course a scrap breaks out. Mrs Buchanan has had a baby girl and Mary Hildebrand makes a passing reference to the fact that she and her family are to be evicted that day because they are behind with the rent. Rose attempts to get her father to be gentler with her mother but when Mrs Maurant comes in, he is just as brusque as ever. An impassioned trio follows, full of expostulation from all three participants, and when his wife asks when he'll be back he rounds on her, 'In case somebody came calling, huh?' Rose tries without much success to comfort her mother, then makes an effort to tidy Willie before he goes off to school, but he'll have none of it until his mother intervenes: 'A boy like you'.

Shirley Kaplan quite gently tries to warn Rose off Sam, who will have another three years before he is a fully-fledged lawyer. When Sam comes out, the two young people fantasise of a happier future away from their dreary neighbourhood and, above everything, together: 'We'll go away together'. They are interrupted by the reappearance of Easter, who offers Rose a lift to the office funeral. Rose and Sam show considerable embarrassment but in the end she walks off with Easter and leaves the coast clear for Sankey to reappear and, on hearing from Mrs Maurant that her husband is away for the day, to go into the house with her. Sam has noticed all this but is distracted by the appearance of the Marshal whose job is to supervise the eviction of the Hildebrands. When Maurant reappears, Sam can't block his way and he goes menacingly upstairs, leaving Sam to yell a warning to Mrs Maurant. There is a scream of terror, then shots and a moment later Maurant reappears covered in blood, and disappears down the cellar steps. The crowd erupts in general hubbub before the Marshal regains control of them and Rose reappears. There is a threnody for the tragedy, then Rose makes an attempt to talk to her mother as she is carried out on a stretcher. It is in many ways the most impressive number in the score.

An interlude takes us to mid-afternoon the same day. The eviction of the Hildebrands is over but some of their furniture is still on the sidewalk. Two Nursemaids go by with a pram and stop under the Maurant windows to sing a satirical lullaby in 6/8, partly quieting their charges, mostly reading from the sensational tabloids.

Maurant is captured but the police let him have a word with his daughter. It is his moment of truth. In 'I loved her too', he seems to ask for understanding, not mercy. Sam is left attempting to console Rose. She says she will go away, alone, and no argument Sam can advance will dissuade her, not even a reference to the lilac bush. They say goodbye, Mrs Jones not missing the opportunity for an acid comment; the neighbours go back to moaning about the heat.

Street Scene works at every level: it strikes a blow for Weill's instinctive feeling for popular contact; it is in no sense a betrayal of his former work; though rather long and certainly downbeat in content, it is unmistakably a Broadway show; and it is no less obviously an opera. At the time it was being produced Weill quoted his teacher Busoni as having insisted to him 'the fear of triviality is the greatest handicap for the modern artist ... the main reason why "modern" got more and more removed from reality'. Weill's greatest admirer would never deny that he harboured no such fear. H.

JAROMÍR WEINBERGER

(born 8 January 1896, died 8 August 1967)

SCHWANDA THE BAGPIPER

Švanda Dudák

Opera in two acts, text by M. Kareš. Première, Prague, 27 April 1927, conductor Ostrčil. First performed Berlin, 1929, with Müller, Branzell, Soot, Scheidl, Schützendorf, Helgers, conductor Erich Kleiber; Vienna, 1930, with Angerer, Rünger, Piccaver, Hammes, Mayr, conductor Krauss; Metropolitan, New York, 1931, with Müller, Branzell, Laubenthal, Schorr, Andresen, Schützendorf, conductor Bodanzky; Covent Garden, 1934, with Ursuleac, Rünger, Kullmann, Schoeffler, Kipnis, Sterneck, conductor Krauss. Revived Sadler's Wells, 1948; Düsseldorf, 1949.

Schwanda the BagpiperBaritone
Dorotka, *his wife*Soprano
Babinsky, *a romantic robber*Tenor
The QueenMezzo-Soprano
The MagicianBass
The JudgeTenor
The ExecutionerTenor
The DevilBass
The Devil's Familiar SpiritTenor
The Captain of Hell's GuardTenor
Two Forest Rangers.....Tenor, Bass

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Though Weinberger wrote other operas, only Schwanda caught the public imagination, to such a tune in this case that its publisher claimed it had been performed some 2,000 times in its first five seasons. Its lively story and jaunty rhythms – the Polka and Fugue survives as an occasional concert piece – carried it round the world, but success evaporated after 1939 and the composer, described as a recluse in his life in exile in Florida, committed suicide in 1967.

Act I. Close to a forest is the cottage where Schwanda dwells with his young wife, Dorotka. As the curtain rises, two armed foresters hasten to the cottage to enquire whether a suspicious stranger has been seen in the neighbourhood. They are after the robber, Babinsky. Dorotka, however, cannot help them; she has seen no one.

No sooner have they gone than Babinsky, who has been hiding in the high branches of a tree, drops to the ground before the astonished Dorotka. She learns that Babinsky has never heard of her famous husband, Schwanda, the bagpiper of Strakonitz. Why, the devil himself envies Schwanda his gift. 'Are you the Devil?' asks the gentle Dorotka. Babinsky is rather hurt. Schwanda arrives from the fields where he has been working, and courteously asks his unknown guest to share their meal. In the course of the conversation Babinsky tells the story of the great robber Babinsky, the friend of the poor, the hero of a thousand adventures. The story makes an impression on Schwanda.

'A man gifted as you are,' says Babinsky, 'could easily make his way.' He tells of people who are wealthy and bored and of the Queen whose heart is ice. Schwanda's ambition is on fire. Dorotka would hold him back but, while she is out of sight, Schwanda departs with Babinsky.

The second scene shows the chamber of Queen Iceheart, who vainly hopes to find a cure. To the tune of the now famous polka, Schwanda enters. His music is simply irresistible; the Queen's maids-of-honour and pages dance. 'Who art thou, bringer of jollity?' asks the Queen. 'I am Schwanda,' replies the piper in a jovial aria, in which the chorus joins; 'I go where there is bitterness and sorrow; I blow on my pipe and at once the clouds melt and the whole world rejoices.' The Queen is so much enamoured of the music that she decides to wed the musician forthwith. Schwanda, fascinated by the prospect of sharing a throne, agrees and kisses the Queen.

But if Schwanda can forget the faithful Dorotka, Dorotka, far from forgetting Schwanda, has followed him, and now overtakes him to tax him with infidelity. Schwanda's forgetfulness, however, was but a moment's aberration. The Queen, learning this, orders both to appear before the judge, who will condemn them to death.

Sentence is passed on Schwanda and Dorotka. Just as the execution is about to take place, the executioner discovers that his axe has been stolen. It is Babinsky who has come to the rescue of his friend, and now hands him the pipes. Schwanda plays and the public are helpless; they must dance while Schwanda and his friends move slowly towards the gate (Furiant).

Once they are well away Dorotka turns on him and taunts her errant husband. Schwanda denies everything: 'If I have given the queen a single kiss may the Devil take me'. Schwanda disappears.

Act II. Hell. The Devil is playing cards by himself; no one trusts him, and he is reduced to Patience. Schwanda is there too. Since he has not been sent there but came of his own free will, the rules of Hell do not apply to him. The Devil is very bored, and begs Schwanda to play for him. His requests meet with a blank refusal. The Father of Lies is at a loss for arguments, but he overhears Schwanda's lament for Dorotka, who made life pleasing to him. Here is his opportunity. He shows Schwanda the spectre of Dorotka and tells him he has but to sign a paper to get her. Schwanda signs the paper giving away his soul. The Devil tells him that now he is bound to obey and, to begin with, he must play on his pipes.

The timely arrival of Babinsky saves Schwanda for the moment. The robber is, of course, well known to the Devil. Moreover, he is only too pleased to welcome a man who is not afraid of having a game of cards with him. They gamble and in the end the Devil loses everything.

Babinsky, however, is generous. He will leave the Devil his kingdom and his insignia; only Schwanda must be free to go with him. The servants of Hell cheer Babinsky, while the Devil thanks him and promises that should he ever return he will be welcomed as 'a son of the house'. To crown it all the piper will play them a tune so that they may learn what the playing of the great master Schwanda of Strakonitz is like. This is the ingenious fugue.

Schwanda's cottage. Babinsky makes a last attempt to divide the lovers. He tells Schwanda that, although he may not have known it, he has lived twenty years in Hell; that Dorotka is now an old peasant woman who, most likely, will not know him again, and invites him to go back to the great world.

Schwanda has learnt his lesson. Never again will he depart from his beloved. 'Dorotka! Dorotka!' he calls, and Dorotka comes to him as beautiful as ever. Babinsky retires discomfited. Peasants rush to congratulate Schwanda on his return.

F.B.

JUDITH WEIR

(born 11 May 1954)

Judith Weir's first two major music-theatre works, the ten-minute 'Grand Opera in Three Acts' King Harald's Saga of 1979 and the twenty-five-minute song-cycle The Consolations of Scholarship of 1985, were not intended to be staged. As she said later (in a 'Note on the Opera' to A Night at the Chinese Opera)

'the constant quick character changes in the soloist's part ensure that unstageability is perhaps their most striking dramatic feature'. In this context it is notable that 'the most formative experience of [her] early opera-going life was a performance of the Stravinsky-Cocteau Oedipus Rex'.

A NIGHT AT THE CHINESE OPERA

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer based on Chi Chun-hsiang's drama The Chao Family Orphan (thirteenth century). Commissioned by the B.B.C., first performed by Kent Opera, Everyman Theatre, Cheltenham, 8 July 1987, with Tomos Ellis as Nightwatchman/Marco Polo, Michael Chance as Military Governor, Gwion Thomas as Chao Lin, Meryl Drower as Little Moon/Actor, Enid Hartle as Mrs Chin/Old Crone, conducted by Andrew Parrott. First U.S. performance, Santa Fe Festival, 1989, conducted by George Manahan.

A Nightwatchman/Marco Polo.....Tenor
 A Military Governor.....Counter-Tenor
 A Mongolian SoldierBass
 Chao Sun, an explorer and mapmaker/
 A Fireman.....Baritone
 Little Moon, wife of Chao Sun/An ActorSoprano
 Chao Lin, their son, as a boy.....Silent
 Chao Lin, as a young man.....High Baritone
 Mrs Chin, housekeeper/Old Crone.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Old P'eng, *a scholar/Old Mountain-Dweller*Tenor
 An Actor.....Mezzo-Soprano
 An Actor.....Tenor

In Act II the roles are shared as follows

| | | |
|--|---------|---------------|
| Chao-the-Loyal-Civil-Servant's-Wife | } | Soprano |
| Kung-Sun Ch'u Chiu, the pig farmer | | Actor |
| General Tu-an-Ku | } | Mezzo-Soprano |
| General Han Chueh | | Actor |
| Chao-the-Loyal-Civil-Servant | } | Tenor |
| Wang Piao, Personal Assistant to General Tu-an-Ku | | Actor |
| Ch'en Ying, the loyal retainer | | |
| The Immortal, T'ai-Po | | |

Judith Weir's interest in Chinese music-theatre fuses with her liking for plays-within-plays. Here, she sets a real Chinese play, Chi Chun-hsiang's The Chao Family Orphan, reduced from five acts to one operatic act. For this Act II, Weir avoids chinoiserie but aims at 'imaginative reconstructions of Chinese originals', using a reduced Western orchestra of flutes, violas, basses and percussion with occasional reeds. This is a numbers opera: each scene of the outer acts is a self-contained musical unit with its own musical form (a trace of the influence of Berg's Wozzeck).

Act I takes place in Loyan, a small, provincial city on the north-west borders of late thirteenth-century China.

Scene i. Nightwatchman's Song with three sky pictures. These are evoked poetically by the Nightwatchman, who fails to notice Kublai Khan's army invading the city.

Scene ii. Sextet. Chao Sun goes into exile, leaving behind his wife, Little Moon, and baby son. She dies soon afterwards.

Scene iii. Kite, in Moto Perpetuo. His son, Chao Lin, is brought up by neighbours in ignorance of his parents and becomes influenced by the invaders' martial culture.

Scene iv. Aria, with rising floodwaters. Fifteen years later, China has been flooded. The Military Governor relates how the invaders lacked Chinese expertise in irrigation and agriculture. They turn to Chao Lin for help.

Scene v. Chansonette. One of the actors who once served the Chinese Emperor strums a lute: they have no work now. In a seven-part motet Chao Lin conscripts three of these ex-actors to work on his project to dig a canal from the city to the mountain. Chao Lin's neighbours surprise him when they talk approvingly of his father's escape into exile. They hand him the map his father started but never completed. It covers the mountains that Chao Lin's canal must run through.

Scene vi. Finale. Before he leaves, he hears from the Nightwatchman that the actors will stage an old Chinese play this evening, in defiance of the Mongolian curfew, The Poor Orphan of the Chao Family, in which an orphan is befriended by his father's enemy. Chao Lin decides to go and see it.

Act II. 'The Orphan of the Chao Family'. The Wedge (or Prelude). The wicked General Tu-an-Ku plots against Chao-the-Loyal-Civil-Servant, his rival for the Emperor's trust. The General hands Chao an order to commit suicide, pretending that it came from the Emperor. Chao obeys and asks his pregnant wife to ensure that if she has a son, he will avenge him.

First Act of The Orphan. Chao's Wife gives her son, the Orphan of Chao, to her loyal physician Ch'eng Ying and then kills herself. Ch'eng Ying hides the baby in a medicine chest. He is allowed through the city gates by General Han Chueh, who then commits suicide, to avoid revealing this to General Tu-an-Ku.

Second Act of The Orphan. Ch'eng Ying leaves the baby with Kung-Sun Ch'u-Chiu, a former colleague of Chao-the-Loyal-Civil-Servant and now a pig farmer. General Tu-an-Ku is heard approaching in pursuit of the Orphan of Chao. A pig is substituted for the baby and Ch'eng Ying then escapes into the mountains. Kung-Sun Ch'u-Chiu tells the General that the baby is in the medicine chest, and the General stabs it with his sword. To reward Kung-Sun for collaborating, the General offers to adopt the baby he assumes is Kung-Sun's child, but who is in fact the Orphan of Chao.

A Night at the Chinese Opera (Kent Opera, 1987, director Richard Jones, designer Richard Hudson). Three Citizens (Tomos Ellis, Alan Oke, Frances Lynch) peer at pictures of the Emperor Kubilai Khan.

Third Act of The Orphan. Twenty years have passed. The General plots to dethrone the Emperor. An immortal is shocked by this plan to upset the natural, divinely ordained order and sends a minatory earthquake which the General ignores. He invites his adopted son to join him and gives him a coin that he has had minted to commemorate his putsch.

Ch'eng Ying has returned from exile. He leaves a scroll commemorating the events of twenty years ago where the Orphan finds it. Ch'eng Ying helps him understand it and the Orphan realises who he is. In a radiant aria he swears revenge on General Tu-an-Ku.

Fourth Act of The Orphan. The Orphan has arranged to meet the General secretly but when the Orphan is about to kill him, the Fireman and the Soldier interrupt the performance in a coda with news of a small earthquake in the north. The audience is asked to leave and rebuked for breaking the curfew by gathering after dark. Chao Lin reflects on what he knows.

Act III. Marco Polo, in Italian, sketches in the historical background: China's elaborate feats of canal-building in the fourteenth century.

Scene i. Prisoners' Chorus. Chao Lin is about to set off the morning after the play with his team, the three Actors. The Military Governor congratulates him on his work which will 'overcome the laws of nature', and presents him with a seal of office, which increases his authority and his anxiety.

Scene ii. Misterioso. Chao Lin marks out the route his canal will take. An Old Crone suggests he use a nearby mountain as a vantage point. It is where those who ran away from the city took refuge.

Scene iii. The Ascent. Chao Lin longs to know what happened to his father. He uses his map to go up the mountain.

Scene iv. Scena. On the summit he sees an Old Mountain-Dweller who tells him that Chao Sun, his father, was among those who died in the mountains. Chao Lin decides to exact revenge.

Scene v. Nocturne. The Military Governor has come to the mountain, along with a Soldier, in response to a message from Chao Lin. Chao Lin hesitates before striking and is arrested.

Scene vi. Finale. The Actors have been released and now prepare to rehearse. Chao Lin is sentenced to death for treason. After he is led away the Actors present the final events of their play, which were not performed at the end of (the opera's) Act I. The Orphan of Chao prevents General Tu-an-Ku's treason, the Emperor sentences the General to death and rewards the Orphan and all those who assisted him.

A Night at the Chinese Opera is that rarity, a genuinely popular new opera. It revels in the exotic and yet finds poetry in the perfunctory. The original thirteenth-century Chinese play was greatly admired by Voltaire, who knew it in a French translation by the Jesuit Father Joseph Prémare (1735). Weir has said that Voltaire's remark about the play, 'everything is of the most brilliant clarity', 'was always in [her] mind as a compositional ideal for [her] own opera'. Genuinely curious, the opera is more than picturesque, however, and exerts a strong emotional and theatrical hold on its audiences.

P.

THE VANISHING BRIDEGROOM

Opera in three parts, libretto by the composer, based on J.F. Campbell of Islay's edition of Popular Tales of the West Highlands, vol. 2 (1860) and Alexander Carmichael's edition of Carmina Gadelica, vol. 2 (1900). First performed by Scottish Opera, Theatre Royal, Glasgow, 17 October 1990, with Peter Snipp, Virginia Kerr, Robert Poulton and Harry Nicoll, conducted by Alan Hacker. First U.S. performance, St Louis, Missouri, 1992, conducted by Scott Bergeson.

The Inheritance

| | |
|-------------------------|---------------------|
| Narrator..... | Tenor/High Baritone |
| Youngest Son..... | Tenor |
| Middle Son..... | Tenor/Baritone |
| The Doctor | Low Baritone |
| The Dying Man | Tenor |
| The Bride..... | Soprano |
| The Bride's Lover | Tenor |
| The Bridegroom..... | High Baritone |
| Two Bad Robbers | Baritones |
| A Good Robber..... | Tenor/High Baritone |

The Disappearance

| | |
|---------------------------|--|
| Three Women..... | Soprano, Soprano or Mezzo, Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Wife..... | Soprano |
| The Husband's Friend..... | Tenor |
| The Husband | High Baritone |
| The Policeman | Low Baritone |

The Stranger

| | |
|--------------------|---------------|
| The Daughter..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Stranger | Low Baritone |
| The Mother | Soprano |
| The Father | High Baritone |
| The Preacher | Tenor |

Two Little Girls, Fairies, etc.

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

For her libretto, Judith Weir assembled three entirely separate stories from an 1860 anthology of Scottish tales, attracted by the language's 'severity and barrenness, which seems utterly truthful and documentary'. In so doing, she constructed a narrative about one particular marriage. She created very different sound pictures for each part of her opera. Male voices dominate the first part, which suits the story of a Bride victimised by men. 'Translated out of Gaelic into English, the language and themes have a formality and severity that recall the dourest and least religious parts of the Old Testament.' Apart from brief interventions from the female chorus, representing the Thick Wood, there is only one female voice, surrounded by the stern, judgemental choir who open and close the act, and by the Three Sons who 'voyeuristically follow her, in close harmony, through the events of the story'.

In the second part, 'the balance in the opera between male and female voices is redressed ... by a group of three women who, together with the deserted wife, sing a progressively developing refrain which motivates the musical development of the act'.

The composer herself described the action of the third part as follows: 'The romantic lead proposes marriage to the heroine, she decides this would not be in her best interests and destroys him; she leaves the stage perfectly content and in control. It is an unusually optimistic ending.'¹

The Inheritance. A man dies but his legacy is missing: one of his three sons must have stolen it. The Doctor decides to find out which one did it, by telling this parable:

A woman who is not allowed to marry her lover is married off to another man, who is rich. When the Bridegroom hears that his Bride loved someone else, he sends her back to him. But her Lover rejects her because she is married and sends her back to her husband. As she is goes through a thick wood she is robbed. However, one of the robbers takes her back to her husband.

The Doctor asks the three sons whose behaviour they admire most, out of all the people in the story. The Eldest Son answers, 'The rich husband'; the Middle Son says, 'The forbidden lover'; the Youngest Son says, 'The robbers who got away with all the money'. And it was he who stole the legacy.

The Disappearance. When the Bride of the previous story gives birth to a daughter, the Bridegroom goes to fetch the Priest, but he is lured into a hillside and is not seen again. His Friend (his wife's former lover) is accused of his murder but allowed to stay and watch for his return. Many years later, the Husband returns, having spent the intervening time with the fairies, in the Land of the Young. He is unwilling to believe any time has passed, until he sees that the Daughter, whose christening he had gone to arrange, is now an adult.

The Stranger. A handsome Stranger courts the Daughter, encouraged by her parents. A Preacher identifies him as the Devil and advises her to stand on a piece of earth that is holy when the Stranger returns. Frustrated that he cannot get any closer to her, the Devil reveals himself and, in the words of the composer's own synopsis, 'assails her with the worst perils of the Highlands – inclement weather and voracious insects – but eventually he has to retire defeated, while the sanctified ground blooms beautifully'.

In The Vanishing Bridegroom Judith Weir demonstrates a masterly control of her material, in terms of both the language and the music. She conjures up whole worlds of feeling with the most elegant economy of means: vast issues (feminism, satanism et al.) are summoned, made to dance to her tunes, which deftly transform the given in terms of melodies based on folksongs, and then playfully dismissed. P.

BLOND ECKBERT

Opera in two acts, libretto by the composer, based on Ludwig Tieck's tale, 'Der blonde Eckbert'. First performed by English National Opera, Coliseum, London, 20 April 1994, with Nerys Jones as the Bird, Anne-Marie Owens as Berthe, Christopher Ventris as Walther/Hugo/An Old Woman and Nicholas Folwell as Blond Eckbert, conducted by Sian Edwards.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| A Bird | Soprano |
| Berthe, Blond Eckbert's wife | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Walther, his friend } | |
| Hugo, his friend } | Tenor |
| An Old Woman } | |
| Blond Eckbert | Baritone |

Running Time: 1 hour 5 minutes

Act I. Flying Prelude. A Bird tells a story to a dog. 'Far away and long ago', Blond Eckbert and his wife Berthe lived quietly in the Harz mountains. 'They appeared to love each other deeply.'

Scene i. Eckbert and Berthe at home. One night Eckbert sees his only friend, Walther, approaching. Eckbert reflects how sometimes 'it is a grief to have any secrets at all', but revealing them to a friend can be dangerous: 'it can happen that one can recoil with fear from the face of the other'.

Scene ii. Walther has arrived. Walther tells Berthe and Eckbert how he was deep in the mountains listening to the rushing water and the birdsong. He sang a huntsman's song, 'Through the woods the horns resounding'. Then he thought of his friends, 'at home and safe', and came to see them. Eckbert invites him to stay and hear Berthe tell the story of her life. She does so, but first asks Walther not to take her story as a fairy tale.

¹ Quotations are from the composer's own programme note, 1990.

Scene iii. Berthe's ballad. When she was a child, her parents worried that they could not afford to feed or clothe her. Her father beat her, so she ran away. She was brought up elsewhere by a strange old woman who had a dog (whose name Berthe has forgotten) and a magic bird which laid jewels instead of eggs.

Berthe learnt to spin and looked after the dog and the bird. Eventually she became curious about the world and escaped, taking the jewels and the bird with her. She heard the bird warning her 'You did wrong and you'll pay'. When Berthe reached her original home, she found that both her parents had died. She married Blond Eckbert and they settled down, selling the jewels to live. Blond Eckbert comments, 'She brought me prosperity – our marriage has caused us no regrets.' As they go to bed, Walther tells her that she told her story so vividly that he can just imagine 'the bird and that friendly little dog, Strohman'.

Scene iv. Strohman! Berthe is amazed that Walther knew the name of the dog that she had forgotten. She leaves for bed. In a monologue Eckbert reviews his suspicions ('And when he said good-night'): will Walther abuse their trust and want to steal their jewels?

Act II. Prelude. Walther's death. Eckbert has gone hunting in the forest. He sees an object moving in the distance. It is Walther. 'Scarcely knowing what he did' (the words from the original story are quoted in the score) he shoots and kills Walther.

After a moving orchestral passage, the bird is heard singing (in German) of repentance.

Scene i. Berthe's last breath. On her deathbed, Berthe writes to Eckbert, still worrying how Walther knew her dog's name ('My dearest husband'). On another part of the stage, Eckbert is seen reading her letter, repeating her terrified phrases.

Scene ii. Accusation. Eckbert goes to the city to distract himself. The Chorus's repeated exclamation 'Ah!' punctuates the scene to suggest what the score calls 'the brutal business of an urban scene'. Eckbert meets a man called Hugo (doubled by the tenor who sang Walther) who hears his tale and reassures him. Eckbert becomes suspicious of him, however: he even thinks that Hugo looks like Walther. He rushes away.

Scene iii. Eckbert, fugitive. He finds himself in a landscape that looks familiar, because it is the countryside that Berthe had described. He hears the same bird singing of 'truth's clear, blinding light'.

Scene iv. At the end. He arrives at the hut of the Old Woman who reared Berthe. She asks him if he is bringing back her bird and her jewels and tells him that she was Walther as well as Hugo. She also reveals that Berthe was his sister. Eckbert realises that he had suspected this. The Old Woman tells him that he had heard his father mention it when he was a child. In agony, Eckbert sings only 'Ah!' The Bird tells us that Eckbert lies on the ground, 'insane and dying'. The Bird flies away, chased by the dog.

From the overture on, as themes are fragmented, repeated and passed urgently from one section of the orchestra to another, Blond Eckbert grips the listener remorselessly. Eventually the Bird takes up one of the themes, singing wordlessly 'Ah!', the sound that returns at the end of the opera as Eckbert's raving. The composer said she was drawn to Ludwig Tieck's original tale partly by 'the way it was told ... there's a seeming simplicity, yet the more you read it, the more the complexities of the story come out'. P.

HUGO WOLF

(born 13 March 1860, died 22 February 1903)

DER CORREGIDOR

The Magistrate

Opera in four acts, text by Rosa Mayreder-Obermayer, founded on P. de Alarcón's story El sombrero de tres picos. Première in Mannheim, June 1896. First performed in Vienna, under Mahler, 1904, with Förster-Lauterer, Breuer, Demuth and Hesch; London, Royal Academy of Music, 1934; Salzburg Festival, 1936, with Novotna, Thorborg, Bella Paalen, Gunnar Graarud, Jerger, Zec, Ludwig Hoffmann, conductor Bruno Walter; London, 1955, by City Opera Club; New York, 1959, in concert form; Wiesbaden, 1960; Zürich, 1972.

Don Eugenio de Zuniga,
the Corregidor (magistrate)Buffo Tenor
 Doña Mercedes, *his wife*Soprano
 Repela, *his valet*Buffo Bass
 Tio Lucas, *a miller*Baritone
 Frasquita, *his wife*Mezzo-Soprano
 Juan Lopez, *the alcalde (mayor)*Bass
 Pedro, *his secretary*Tenor
 Manuela, *a maid*Mezzo-Soprano
 Tonuelo, *a court messenger*Bass
 A NeighbourTenor
 A Duenna, employed by the CorregidoraMezzo-Soprano

Running Time: 2 hours

Wolf was established as the late nineteenth century's most renowned writer of Lieder when, after completing the Spanisches Liederbuch in 1890, he contemplated more than one possible operatic subject with a Spanish theme. He settled in 1894 on the story popularly known as The Three-Cornered Hat (from Massine's later ballet on music by Manuel de Falla), wrote it fast as was his invariable habit, but had it turned down by more than one theatre before it was accepted for Mannheim. Der Corregidor contains many incidental felicities but it shows overall a limited sense of either drama or the stage. Mahler conducted a slightly revised version of the opera in Vienna in 1904, and his disciple Bruno Walter revived it in Salzburg in 1936, but success constantly eluded it. Nonetheless, Wolf embarked on another Spanish subject, Manuel Venegas, which remained unfinished at his death.

Act I. The miller, Tio Lucas, is living a happy life with his beautiful wife, Frasquita. Her love is so true that jealousy, to which he is inclined, cannot thrive. Yes, he has a bump of jealousy. True, the Corregidor, who is keenly interested in the Miller's pretty wife, has one too. But no matter, he is a high, very influential functionary. Meanwhile Frasquita loves her Tio Lucas so truly that she can even allow herself a dance with the Corregidor. Perhaps she will cure him, perhaps she will obtain in addition the wished-for official place for her nephew. Frasquita flirts with the Corregidor and makes him so much in love with her that he becomes impetuous. As she eludes his attempt to kiss her he loses his balance and falls in the dust, out of which the miller, unsuspecting, raises him up. But the Corregidor swears revenge.

Act II. The opportunity for this comes very quickly. As the miller one evening is sitting with his wife in their cosy room, there comes a knock at the door. It is a drunken court messenger, Tonuelo, who produces a warrant of arrest. Tio Lucas must follow him without delay to the alcalde who has fallen in with the Corregidor's scheme. Frasquita is trying to calm her anxiety with a song when outside there is a cry for help. She opens the door and before it stands the Corregidor dripping with water. He has fallen in the brook. Now he begs admission from Frasquita, who is raging with anger. He has even brought with him the appointment of the nephew. But the angry woman will pay no attention and sends the Corregidor away. He falls in a swoon. His own servant now comes along. Frasquita admits both of them to the house and herself goes into town to look for her Tio Lucas. When the Corregidor hears this, full of anxiety, he sends his valet after her; he himself, however, hangs his wet clothes before the fire and goes to bed in the miller's bedroom.

Scene ii. In the meantime Tio Lucas drinks the alcalde and his fine comrades under the table and seizes the occasion to flee.

Act III. In the darkness of the night, Tio Lucas and Frasquita pass by without seeing each other.

Scene iii. The miller's house. Everything is open.

In the dust lies the deed of appointment for the nephew; before the fire hang the Corregidor's clothes. A frightful suspicion arises in Tio Lucas's mind which becomes a certainty when through the keyhole he sees the Corregidor in his own bed. He is already groping for his rifle to shoot the seducer and the faithless woman, when another thought strikes him. The Corregidor also has a wife, a beautiful wife. He quickly slips into the Corregidor's clothes and goes back to town. In the meantime the Corregidor has awakened. But he does not find his clothes and so he crawls into those of the miller, and in them is almost arrested by the alcalde who now enters with his companions and Frasquita. When the misunderstanding is cleared up, they go to the town after the miller.

Act IV. Now comes the explanation and the punishment of the Corregidor, at least in so far as he receives a sound thrashing. The miller too is recognised and likewise beaten black and blue – that he must suffer in reparation for his churlish doubt of the faithful Frasquita.

The comedy of Der Corregidor is through-composed. The overture opens with the Corregidor theme (later played on the trombones), and makes play also with the E major love music, which is later heard in the first scene of the second act. Two of Wolf's songs are worked into the libretto of the work, the first, 'In dem Schatten meiner Locken', sung by Frasquita to the Corregidor, the second to words by Heine, 'Herz, verzage nicht geschwind', sung by the Corregidor at the end of the first scene of Act II.

K.W.

ERMANNO WOLF-FERRARI

(born 12 January 1876, died 21 January 1948)

A Bavarian father and Venetian mother gave Wolf-Ferrari musical dual nationality, compounded by musical education in Germany, some Italian librettos and frequently Italianate musical style, and the fact that he spent much of his life in German-speaking countries. His best operas are comedies which build on the legacy of the Verdi of Falstaff, but the Great War, with Germany and Italy on opposite sides, found him traumatised in Zürich, and, in spite of Sly (1920), it was years before he regained his touch with three further comic operas. He was an industrious composer and the years between the operas are filled with instrumental music of one kind or another, none of which had quite the impact of his operas.

I QUATTRO RUSTEGHI

The School for Fathers

Opera in four acts, text by G. Pizzolato from Goldoni; German text by H. Teibler. Première Munich, 19 March 1906, in German. First performed Teatro Lirico, Milan, 1914; la Scala, Milan, 1922, with Labia, Soster, Fabbri, Azzolini, Scattola, conductor Panizza; Buenos Aires, 1927, with Cobelli, Cravenco, Marengo, Azzolini, Vanelli, conductor Panizza; Berlin, 1937, with Berger, Heidersbach, Marherr, Spletter, Prohaska, Neumann, Helgers, Fleischer; Sadler's Wells, London, 1946; City Center, New York, 1951.

Lunardo, merchant Bass
 Margarita, his second wife Mezzo-Soprano
 Lucietta, his daughter by his first wife Soprano
 Maurizio, merchant Bass or Bass-Baritone
 Filipeto, his son Tenor
 Marina, aunt to Filipeto Soprano
 Simon, her husband Bass-Baritone
 Canciano, a wealthy merchant Bass
 Felice, his wife Soprano
 Count Riccardo Arcolai, a visitor to Venice Tenor
 A Young Maid

Place: Venice

Time: End of the Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

Wolf-Ferrari set to music more than one of Goldoni's Venetian comedies, which, written mostly in dialect, have a somewhat limited appeal. I Quattro Rusteghi is one of the finest of them. The character-drawing is finished and the action moves quickly to its climax. The provincial colours of the picture have militated against rapid and wide acceptance of the opera, as of the comedy. But Germany has given it a welcome – indeed its première was in German translation – and the London production, whose translator, Edward Dent, transferred the action from Venice to London, met with success.

The 'rusteghi' (in no sense 'rustics') are the honest, plain-speaking, conservative, domestic tyrants who, believing that woman's place is the home, forbid anything that might enliven the tedium of domestic work. The opera has been called a comedy of bad manners.

Act I. Lunardo's wife, Margarita, and her step-daughter, Lucietta, are sitting knitting and embroidering. It is carnival and their thoughts turn to the amusements and gaiety of more fortunate people. Margarita remembers that before she married Lunardo there were parties at home and occasional visits to the theatre. Lucietta is of marrying age and hopes for a husband and better times. Lunardo enters silently, desiring to speak with his wife yet unwilling to interrupt her occupation. When the two are finally alone he tells her as an important secret that he and his friend Maurizio have arranged to wed Lucietta to Maurizio's son, Filipeto. The fact that the young people have never seen each other is, to them, immaterial. Margarita's very reasonable objections are rudely ignored. Lunardo's will is law. He answers Margarita's arguments with: 'I am the master.' Maurizio is announced and Margarita retires. The two 'rusteghi' now discuss the details of the contract – Lucietta's dowry, her clothes (no silk but good, honest home-spun), jewels which must not be re-set as the fashionable people do who thus pay twice for the gems. The dour, rigid character of the domestic bears is well described in this scene.

The second part of the act takes us to the house of Marina and her husband – even more of a 'rustego' than Lunardo. Marina is singing the tune familiar from its use as an interlude before Act II. Filipeto enters and begins by asking whether his uncle is in. He is in great dread of his uncle and means to avoid him. The purpose of his visit is to enquire whether his aunt has heard anything about his own wedding. His father has informed him abruptly that he intends to give him a wife and the homely youth is flustered, yet determined not to marry a girl he does not like; he begs his aunt to help him. If having seen the girl he does not like her, he will run away rather than marry her: 'Lucietta! Xe un bel nome' (Lucietta! her name at least is pretty). Simon arrives and unceremoniously dismisses Filipeto. Marina has another caller, the talkative Felice, accompanied by her husband and her 'cavalier servente', Count Riccardo. The husband, Canciano, stands mute and disapproving. The two women put their heads together determined that the men shall not be allowed to have it all their own way.

Act II. The act is preceded by the famous intermezzo, which serves admirably as an example of the composer's light, graceful style. When the curtain rises, we are back in Lunardo's house. Lucietta has persuaded Margarita to lend her a few trinkets but Lunardo arrives on the scene and orders the girl to take off her borrowed finery. They are joined by Marina and Simon. When the women retire the men rail at them and lament the passing of the good old days when women were women and did as they were told ('What has become of the old sort of women?'). The appearance of Felice is the signal for their departure. The other women join her, and Lucietta is congratulated on her betrothal. 'Shall I see my future husband?' she asks and hears that Felice and her friends have found a way to bring the young people together. It is carnival and Filipeto, escorted by Riccardo, plans to arrive disguised as a girl. If they should be discovered they will pass him off as a distant female relative. He soon arrives, and in a charming little scene Marina persuades him to take off the mask. Meanwhile the men have settled their business and Filipeto's father, Maurizio, has gone off to bring the youth to the betrothal. Now Lunardo surprises the women who have just time to hide Filipeto in a closet and Riccardo in another. The situation is tense. Maurizio returns very angry with the news that Filipeto is not to be found anywhere. All that is known is that he left the house with Riccardo. Canciano then begins to show himself in his true colours. He dislikes Riccardo; he will have no dealings with him; he must be an impostor. But Riccardo is a man of spirit and, hearing all that Canciano is saying, comes out of hiding and challenges him. Filipeto is found, the whole conspiracy discovered, and a very angry Lunardo orders the callers to leave his house. There will be no wedding for Lucietta.

Act III. The act begins with Lunardo, Simon, and Canciano considering in gloom the wickedness of the women's conduct. What is the next step to be? Lucieta can be sent away to the country but how can the other women be punished? The plain truth is that the women are necessary to their own comfort and, if they were sent away, the men themselves would suffer. This homely commination is interrupted by the arrival of Felice. She is received with hostility at first, for she is the arch-plotter. But her arguments are unanswerable, and, delivered with the speed and accuracy of aim which she commands, irresistible. What harm has been done? Would it not have been much worse if the young people had not liked each other's looks? Slowly, slowly the men begin to relent and finally and not very graciously are won over. The opera ends like a fairy story with wedding bells.

At the time of the first performance of the opera at Sadler's Wells (1946), The Times wrote as follows of the music: 'It flows spontaneously; it has a touch of distinction which saves it from the obvious; it is technically modern yet picks up the opera buffa tradition of the eighteenth century with the utmost grace and learning; it has a vein of lyrical melody and excels in ensemble.'

F.B.

IL SEGRETO DI SUSANNA

Susanna's Secret

Opera in one act, text by Enrico Golisciani (German version by Kalbeck). Première Munich, 4 December 1909 (in German), conductor Mottl. First performed New York (by Chicago company), 1911, with Carolina White and Sammarco; Rome, 1911; Covent Garden, 1911, with Lipkowska, Sammarco; Metropolitan, 1912, with Farrar, Scotti, conductor Polacco. Revived la Scala, Milan, 1917, with Vallin, Parvis, conductor Panizza; Covent Garden, 1919, with Borghi-Zerni, Sammarco, conductor Coates; Metropolitan, 1921, with Bori, Scotti; la Scala, 1934, with Oltrabella, Biasini; Glyndebourne, 1958, with Costa, Roux, conductor Pritchard. The little opera is a direct descendant of the eighteenth-century Intermezzo.

Count Gil, aged thirty.....Baritone
 Countess Susanna, his wife, aged twenty.....Soprano
 Sante, their servant, aged fifty.....Silent

Scene: Piedmont

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 45 minutes

Given in Munich in German translation only three and a half years after the successful production there of I Quattro Rusteghi.

After a short overture suitably labelled vivacissimo, the curtain rises to show a handsome apartment in the Count's house. Gil in walking clothes enters hurriedly: 'The light grey cloak, pink hat and feather ... could I be mistaken?' He goes out quickly, and a moment later Susanna comes in wearing a grey cloak and a pink hat. She gives her coat and hat and a parcel to the servant, and goes out again, having first made sure that her husband is in his room. No sooner has she gone than Gil reappears, and listens at the door of her room, seeming relieved to find that she is there. He must be mistaken – and yet: he has distinctly caught a smell of tobacco in his house – and he is a non-smoker. He catches himself out being unmistakably jealous. He questions Sante whether he is a smoker ... or his mistress? The old servant shakes his head at each question. Who can it be then?

Gil is in even more of a state by the time Susanna comes into the room. He comments on having seen someone just like her while he was out walking; it could not be her because he has forbidden her to go out alone. But why does she blush? Only because he is unkind for the first time. Rapturously, Gil assures her of his undying, unswerving devotion: 'Il dolce idillio'; a love duet follows, and at its end Gil is about to embrace his wife, when he smells the hated tobacco smell. She is horrified that he should notice – she knows how much he hates the smell – and he thinks he has turned suspicion that she is visited by an admirer into certainty. In a moment they are at cross purposes: Susanna suspects he knows her secret – 'If I'm left at home and you're late at the club, the time goes quicker ... Do like other husbands, and shut one eye discreetly to my little secret'; but Gil suspects something quite different, and smashes the vases in his fury. Susanna escapes to her room ('to have a good cry'), and Gil throws himself into a chair in a paroxysm of grief. Sante surveys the room in comic dismay, and proceeds to tidy up the mess.

After an intermezzo, during which Sante gets the room straight again, Susanna comes out and brings Gil his gloves, hat, and umbrella; she is sure he must want to go out. Just before he goes, she sings sweetly to him; will he not give her a word of love, one tender look, before he goes ('Via, così non mi lasciate')? He relents to the extent of kissing her on the forehead, and departs.

Susanna, alone, relaxes and Sante brings her the cigarettes she has been out to buy. No sooner has she lit one than Gil is back. He hunts everywhere but finds no one, only the smell of tobacco. Beside himself with rage, he goes out again. This time, Susanna has time to sing an aria to the cigarette for whose refreshing perfume she so yearns: 'O gioia, la nube leggera.' But she is not undisturbed for long. Gil suddenly appears through the window, and confronts his wife. She puts her hand behind her back, he snatches to see what she is hiding, and burns himself. The secret is out: she smokes. All is forgiven, and they each light a cigarette, dancing round each other with joy.

H.

I GIOIELLI DELLA MADONNA

The Jewels of the Madonna

Opera in three acts, text by Golisciani and Zangarini; German version by H. Liebstockl. Première Berlin, 2 December 1911; Chicago and New York, 1912, with Carolina White, Bassi, Sammarco; Covent Garden, 1912, with Edvina, Martinelli, Sammarco; Metropolitan, New York, 1926, with Jeritza, Martinelli, Danise, conductor Papi. Revived Covent Garden, 1925, with Jeritza, Merli, Noto, conductor Bellezza. Italian stage première not until 1953, in Rome, with Clara Petrella, Prandelli, Gobbi.

Gennaro, a blacksmith.....Tenor
Maliella, adopted daughter of Carmela.....Soprano
Rafaele, leader of the Camorristi.....Baritone
Carmela, Gennaro's mother.....Mezzo-Soprano
Biaso, a scribe.....Tenor
Ciccillo, a Camorrist.....Tenor

Friends of the Camorristi

Stella.....Soprano
Concetta.....Soprano
Serena.....Contralto
Rocco, a Camorrist.....Bass
Totonno, a young peasant.....Tenor

Grazia, a Dancer; Vendors, Monks, Populace

Place: Naples

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

After his comedies Wolf-Ferrari, surprisingly, turned to verismo at its crudest, a violent story set in Naples and more popular in the U.S.A. and England than in either Germany or Italy, in which latter country it found no favour in Fascist times as showing Italy in a poor light.

Act I. A small square in Naples, near the sea. Carmela's house, Gennaro's smithy, an inn, and the little hut of Biaso, the scribe, among many other details. 'It is the gorgeous afternoon of the festival of the Madonna, and the square swarms with a noisy crowd, rejoicing and celebrating the events with that strange mixture of carnival and superstition so characteristic of Southern Italy.' This describes most aptly the jolly, crowded scene, and the character of the music with which the opera opens. It is quite kaleidoscopic in its constant shifting of interest.

Gennaro in his blacksmith's shop is seen giving the finishing touches to a candelabrum. He places it on the anvil, as on an altar, kneels before it, and sings a prayer to the Madonna – 'Madonna, con sospiri'.

Maliella rushes out of the house pursued by Carmela. She is a restless, wilful girl – a potential Carmen, from whom opportunity has as yet been withheld. Striking an attitude of bravado, and in spite of Gennaro's protests, she voices her rebellious thoughts in the 'Canzone di Cannelletta'.

A crowd gathers to hear her. From the direction of the sea comes the chorus of the approaching Camorristi. Maliella and the crowd dance wildly. When Carmela reappears with a pitcher of water on her head, Maliella is dashing along the quay screaming and laughing.

Carmela tells her son the brief story of Maliella. Once when he was ill as a baby, she vowed to the Madonna that she would adopt a baby girl and treat her as her own daughter if only her beloved son were allowed to recover. There is a touching duet for mother and son ('T'eri un giorno ammalato bambino'), in which Carmela bids him pray to the Madonna, and Gennaro asks for her blessing before he leaves to do so.

Maliella runs in. The Camorristi are in pursuit of her. Rafaele, the leader of the band, is a handsome, flashy blackguard. When he advances to seize and kiss her, she draws a dagger-like hat-pin. Laughing, he throws off his coat, like a duellist, grasps and holds her tightly. She stabs his hand, making it bleed, then throws away the skewer. Angry at first, he laughs disdainfully, then passionately kisses the wound ('Bacio di Lama'). The Camorristi buy flowers from a passing flower-girl and make a carpet of them, Rafaele picks up the hat-pin, kneels before Maliella, and hands it to her. Maliella slowly replaces it in her hair, and then Rafaele sticks a flower on her breast, where she permits it to remain. She throws it away but Rafaele picks it up, and carefully replaces it in his button-hole. A little later he goes to the inn, and raises his filled glass to her, just as a subtle influence compels her to turn and look at him.

Tolling of bells, discharge of mortars, cheers of populace, announce the approach of the procession of the Madonna. While hymns to the Virgin are chanted, Rafaele pours words of passion into Maliella's ears. The image of the Madonna, bedecked with jewels, is borne past. Rafaele brags that for love of Maliella he would even rob the sacred image of the jewels and bedeck her with them.

Gennaro warns her against Rafaele as 'the most notorious blackguard in this quarter', and orders her into the house. Rafaele's mocking laugh infuriates him. The men seem about to fight, but the procession returns, and they are obliged to kneel. Rafaele's looks, however, follow Maliella. He tosses her the flower she has previously rejected. She picks it up, puts it between her lips, and flies indoors.

Act II. The garden of Carmela's house. It is late evening. Intermezzo. Carmela, having cleared the table, goes into the house. Gennaro starts in to warn Maliella. She insists she must have freedom, rushes up the staircase to her room, where she is seen putting her things together, while she hums, 'E ndrighete' (I long for mirth and folly).

She is ready to leave but Gennaro pleads with her. With eyes half-closed, she recalls how Rafaele offered to steal the jewels of the Madonna for her. Gennaro, at first shocked at the sacrilege, appears to yield. He bars the way to Maliella, locks the gate, and stands facing her.

Her laugh still ringing in his ears, he goes to a cupboard under the stairs, takes out a box, selects from its contents several skeleton keys and files, wraps them in a piece of leather which he hides under his coat, crosses himself, and sneaks out.

From the direction of the sea a chorus of men's voices is heard. Rafaele appears at the gate with his Camorrist friends. To the accompaniment of their mandolins and guitars he sings to Maliella a lively waltz-like serenade: 'Aprila, o bella, la fenestrella.' The girl, in a white wrap, a light scarlet shawl over her shoulders, descends to the garden. There is a love duet: she promises she will join him.

Left to herself, she sees in the moonlight Gennaro's open tool box. As if in answer to her presentiment of what it signifies, he appears with a bundle wrapped in red damask. He is too distracted by his purpose to question her presence in the garden. He spreads out on the table for Maliella the jewels of the Madonna.

Maliella – in an ecstasy, half mystic, half sensual, and apparently seeing in Gennaro the image of the man who promised her the jewels, Rafaele – no longer repulses Gennaro, but yields herself to his embrace.

Act III. A haunt of the Camorristi on the outskirts of Naples. Intermezzo, to the tune of Rafaele's serenade.

The Camorristi gather. There is singing with dancing – the 'Apache', the 'Tarantelle'. They do not anticipate Maliella's expected arrival with much pleasure. When Rafaele comes in, they ask him what he admires in her. In his answer, 'Non sapete ... di Maliella la preziosa qualità' he tells them her chief charm is that he will be the first man to whom she has yielded herself.

In the midst of an uproar of shouting and dancing, while Rafaele, standing on a table, cracks a whip, Maliella rushes in. In an agony she cries out that, in a trance, she gave herself to Gennaro. The women laugh derisively at Rafaele, who has just sung of her as being inviolable to all but himself. For Rafaele she is a plucked rose to be left to wither. Furiously he rejects her. The jewels of the Madonna fall from her cloak.

Gennaro, who has followed her to the haunt of the Camorristi, enters, half mad. Maliella, laughing hysterically, flings the jewels at his feet. The crowd recoils from both intruders. Rafaele curses the girl. At his command, the band disperses. Maliella goes out to drown herself in the sea. 'Madonna del dolor! Miserere!' prays Gennaro. His thoughts revert to his mother: among the débris he finds a knife and plunges it into his heart.

Z

RICCARDO ZANDONAI

(born 30 May 1883, died 5 June 1944)

FRANCESCA DA RIMINI

Opera in four acts, text by Tito Ricordi after D'Annunzio's play of the same name. Première, Teatro Regio, Turin, 19 February 1914, with Canetti, Crimi, Cigada, Paltrinieri, conductor Panizza. First performed Covent Garden, 1914, with Edvina, Martinelli, Cigada, conductor Panizza; la Scala, Milan, 1916, with Raisa, Pertile, Danise; Metropolitan, 1916, with Alda, Martinelli, Amato, conductor Polacco. Revived la Scala, 1929, with dalla Rizza, Pertile, Maugeri, conductor Panizza; 1937, with Cigna, Parmeggiani, Maugeri, conductor Zandonai; 1942, with Somigli, Ziliani, Maugeri, conductor Guarnieri; 1946, with Carbone, Ziliani, Stabile, conductor Guarnieri; 1950, with Caniglia, Prandelli, Biasini, conductor Capuana; 1959, with Olivero, del Monaco, Giangiacomo Guelfi; San Francisco, 1956, with Gencer; Metropolitan, 1984, with Scotto, Domingo, Cornell MacNeil, conductor Levine.

The son and daughters of Guido Minore of Polenta

FrancescaSoprano
SamaritanaSoprano
OstasioBaritone

Sons of Malatesta of Verrucchio

Giovanni (Gianciotto) lo Sciancato
(the Lame)Baritone
Paolo il Bello (the Handsome).....Tenor
Malatestino dall'Occhio (the One-Eyed)Tenor

Francesca's women

Biancofiore.....Soprano
Garsenda.....Soprano
Altichiara.....Mezzo-Soprano
Donella.....Mezzo-Soprano
The Slave.....Contralto

Ser Toldo Berardengo, a lawyerTenor

A Jester.....Bass

An ArcherTenor

A Torchbearer.....Baritone

Archers, Torchbearers, Musicians

Place: Ravenna; Rimini

Time: End of the Thirteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Zandonai, a pupil of Mascagni's, had a round dozen operas to his credit before he died at the age of sixty-one. Several are of more than passing interest, but only one, Francesca da Rimini, has been the subject of regular revival, D'Annunzio's play inspiring him to effects of real delicacy and to music of greater passion than elsewhere.

Act I. The scene is a court in the house of the Polentani, in Ravenna. A colloquy between Francesca's brother Ostasio and the notary Ser Toldo Berardengo informs us that for reasons of state Francesca is to be married to one of the three sons of Malatesta da Verrucchio, who, although named Giovanni, is known as Gianciotto, the Lamester, because of his deformity and ugliness. A plot has been formed by which she is introduced to his handsome younger brother Paolo, with whom, under the impression that he is her destined bridegroom, she falls in love at first sight, a passion that is fully reciprocated.

Act II. The interior of a round tower in the fortified castle of the Malatestas. The summit of the tower is crowned with engines of war and arms. The castle is a stronghold of the Guelfs. In the distance, beyond the city of Rimini, are seen the battlements of the highest Ghibelline tower.

Soon after the act opens, an attack takes place. Amid the tumult occurs the first meeting between Francesca and Paolo since the marriage into which she was tricked. Their love is obvious enough. Paolo despairingly seeks death, to which Francesca also exposes herself by remaining on the platform of the tower during the combat.

The Malatestas are victorious. The attacking foes are driven off. Gianciotto comes up on the platform and brings news to Paolo of his election as Captain of the people and Commune of Florence, for which city Paolo presently departs. Malatestino is carried in wounded (he has lost the sight of an eye), but he exhibits great courage and wishes to continue the fight.

Act III. The scene is the apartment of Francesca, where she is reading to her women the story of Lancelot and Guinevere. The women dance and sing until Francesca dismisses them. Paolo has returned. The greeting from her to him is simple enough: 'Benvenuto, signore mio cognato' (Welcome, my lord and kinsman), but the music is charged with deeper significance. Even more pronounced is the meaning in the musical phrase at Francesca's words, 'Paolo, datemi pace' (Paolo, give me peace).

Together they read the story which Francesca had begun reading to her women. Their heads come close together over the book, and when, in the ancient love tale, the queen and her lover kiss, Francesca's and Paolo's lips meet and linger in an ecstasy of passion.

Act IV. The scene is an octagonal hall of grey stone. A grated door leads to a subterranean prison.

Malatestino is desperately in love with Francesca, and even hints that he would go to the length of poisoning Gianciotto. Francesca repulses him. Cries of a prisoner from the dungeon have disturbed Francesca. When she complains of this to Malatestino, he says he will go down into the prison and kill the captive.

Gianciotto enters the room and Francesca complains to him of Malatestino's cruelty and of his attitude towards her – what it is she does not specify. Francesca has prepared food for her husband before his journey, and he removes his sword and helmet before eating. Suddenly there is a terrible cry from the dungeon; it is evident that Malatestino has carried out his intention of beheading the prisoner. A moment later, knocking is heard at the door through which Malatestino went down to the dungeon; Francesca quickly goes out so as not to have to see him again.

Out of revenge for his slighted passion, Malatestino excites the jealousy of Gianciotto by arousing his suspicions of Paolo and Francesca. Gianciotto works himself into a passion and demands to be shown proof of the accusation. Malatestino bids him wait until nightfall.

The scene changes to Francesca's chamber. It is night. Francesca is lying on the bed. From her sleep she is roused by a wild dream that harm has come to Paolo. Her women try to comfort her. After an exchange of gentle and affectionate phrases, she dismisses them.

A light knocking at the door, and Paolo's voice calls, 'Francesca!' She flings open the door and throws herself into the arms of her lover. There is an interchange of impassioned phrases. Then a violent shock is heard at the door, followed by the voice of Gianciotto, demanding admission. Paolo spies a trap-door in the floor of the apartment, pulls the bolt, and bids Francesca open the door of the room for her husband, while he escapes.

Gianciotto rushes into the room. Paolo's cloak catches in the bolt of the trap-door. He is still standing head and shoulders above the level of the floor. Seizing him by the hair, the Lamester forces him to come up. Paolo unsheathes his dagger. Gianciotto draws his sword, thrusts at Paolo. Francesca throws herself between the two men, receives her husband's sword full in the breast, and falls into Paolo's arms. Mad with rage, her deformed husband with another deadly thrust pierces his brother's side. Paolo and Francesca fall to the floor. With a painful effort, Gianciotto breaks his blood-stained sword over his knee. K.

ALEXANDER VON ZEMLINSKY

(born 14 October 1871, died 15 March 1942)

Zemlinsky, who was born in Vienna, was a man of the theatre. As a student of the Vienna Conservatory, he was enthusiastic about Brahms but equally enthralled by Wagner. His first opera, Sarema, had its première in Munich in 1897 with Milka Ternina, the great Wagnerian and Covent Garden's first Tosca, in the title role, and his second, Es war einmal (1900), was conducted in Vienna by Mahler with a cast which included Selma Kurz and Erich Schmedes, two of the stars of the Vienna Opera. From 1900 he conducted in various theatres in Vienna, resigning from the Court Opera when Mahler left and later joining the Volksoper where he conducted Salome when it was first heard in the Austrian capital. In 1911 he moved to the Deutsches Theater in Prague, conducting in 1924 the première of Schoenberg's Erwartung, and from 1927 he was with Klemperer at the Krolloper in Berlin. With the advent of the Nazis, he moved back to Vienna, and after the Anschluss to America. He was the teacher and later brother-in-law of Arnold Schoenberg, but his outlook was essentially romantic and Expressionist and his music, which was always eclectic, remained by and large tonal. H.

EINE FLORENTINISCHE TRAGÖDIE

A Florentine Tragedy

Opera in one act, text translated by Max Meyerfeld from Oscar Wilde. Première Stuttgart, 30 January 1917, with Helene Wildbrunn, Rudolf Ritter, Felix Fleischer, conductor Max von Schillings, and the same year in Vienna. The opera was revived in 1980 for the Florence Festival, with Sigune von Osten, Werner Götz, Heinz Jürgen Demitz, conductor Friedrich Player; and with even greater success in 1981 in Hamburg, with Elisabeth Steiner, Kenneth Riegel and Guillermo Sarabia, conductor Gerd Albrecht; this production was taken to the Edinburgh Festival in 1983.

Guido Bardi, Prince of Florence.....Tenor
 Simone, a merchant.....Baritone
 Bianca, his wife.....Mezzo-Soprano

Place: Florence
Time: Sixteenth Century
Running Time: 50 minutes

Zemlinsky's operas span most of his life, from Sarema in 1897 to Der Kreidekreis in 1933, with two (Der König Kandaules and Circe) unfinished at his death. The Oscar Wilde double bill, of which Eine florentinische Tragödie is the first, re-established his reputation in the last quarter of the twentieth century, but, partly because of his outstanding conducting, he was never truly sidelined during his lifetime, except when the Nazis ruled the German-speaking theatre.

The overture graphically compensates for the opera's lack of an explicit love scene, Simone surprising his wife Bianca and the Prince as the curtain rises in what is evidently an assignation. Simone is the opera's central figure, and he at first seems to pretend that Guido is a customer. He sells him a robe of state, then proceeds to offer him anything in his house. He is disconcerted when Guido opts for Bianca and says she is fit only for housework. Simone digresses into a discussion of English merchants and Italian politics before going into the garden. When he returns, he recognises the strength of his wife's spleen but this seems to galvanise him into a state of hyper-activity, and, to a frenzied waltz rhythm, he invites the Prince to play the lute, then to drink wine. Left alone again, Bianca and Guido indulge in a love scene, after which Simone cannot hide his thoughts of revenge and hands Guido his sword, reminding him that those who steal from him do so at their own risk. Guido is caught in a trap as lethal as the one Pirandello devised in his play Rules of the Game. The duel mounts in tension and ends with Simone disarming and then strangling his victim. He turns to kill his wife but instead embraces her, aware at last of her beauty as she is in her turn of his strength.

The music is saturated in orchestral magic, the virtuosity of Salome and the Gurrelieder, and the work is as representative of the Viennese Secession as Mahler's later music, the early works of Schoenberg, Berg or Webern, Korngold's opera Violanta, or Schreker's Die Gezeichneten (it is an odd reflection that for some time Puccini contemplated Wilde's play for his own purposes). Zemlinsky's opera was begun just before the start of the Great War and finished in 1916, and is a product of his most fecund period, when he was in Prague and, like Mahler before him, composed every summer. Schoenberg, no easy critic even of his adherents of which Zemlinsky was certainly one, described Eine florentinische Tragödie as 'ein prachtvolles Werk' – a magnificent work. H.

DER ZWERG

The Dwarf or The Birthday of the Infanta

Opera in one act, text by Georg C. Klaren after Oscar Wilde's story The Birthday of the Infanta. Première Cologne, 28 May 1922, with Erna Schröder, Karl Schröder, conductor Otto Klemperer. Revived Hamburg, 1981, with Janet Perry, Kenneth Riegel, conductor Gerd Albrecht (and at the Edinburgh Festival, 1983).

Donna Clara, Infanta of Spain.....Soprano
 Ghita, *her favourite maid and confidante*Soprano
 Don Estéban, *the Major-Domo*Baritone
 The Dwarf.....Tenor
 Three MaidsSopranos
 Playmates of the Infanta

Running Time: 1 hour 15 minutes

In 1911, Zemlinsky commissioned his colleague Franz Schreker to write him a libretto, the result being Die Gezeichneten, which Schreker eventually set himself. Its principal figure is an ill-favoured dwarf, not unlike the central character of Wilde's story and, it would appear, not unlike Zemlinsky himself, who is said never to have recovered from a rebuff at the hands of Alma Schindler-Mahler, who was his pupil and with whom he was in love (in her memoirs she described him as 'a horrible dwarf'). Klaren's libretto differs somewhat from Wilde's original in that the Infanta is no longer an innocent girl but a young woman whose cruelty is more intentional than inadvertent.

The opera was successful from the start, has been a significant feature in the new focus on the composer, and is generally thought of as Zemlinsky's masterpiece. For the highly successful production in Hamburg, Adolf Dresen rewrote a text closer to Wilde's original, with the dwarf no longer a courtier accustomed to royal circles, instead a rough peasant lad unused to sophisticated behaviour.

Don Estéban, the court major-domo, is supervising preparations for the Infanta's birthday. Ghita, the Infanta's confidante, swiftly emerges as the most sympathetic member of her entourage, indeed of the entire cast. The Infanta herself joins in a dance, then insists on seeing her presents until Don Estéban persuades her to the contrary. She is dressed for the birthday festivities and the great mirror is afterwards covered over. One of the presents, it transpires, is from the Sultan and consists of a dwarf, who has no idea that others find him hideous. The major-domo addresses him as Prince and, when they meet, it is obvious he finds the Infanta attractive. He sings a romance and when she starts to play with her new 'toy' and asks him to name a 'wife' from among her companions, it is she whom he predictably chooses. They are left alone, the Infanta sings wistfully and the dwarf's narrative makes plain that he thinks of himself as some kind of latter-day knight, handsome and romantic. With no regard to consequences, she lets him think she loves him, details what he must do to be worthy of her, and only narrowly avoids his kiss when Ghita surprises them.

Der Zwerg (Hamburg State Opera at Edinburgh Festival, 1983). Kenneth Riegel in the title role, Janet Perry as the Infanta.

The Princess tells Ghita that the dwarf has no idea of his ugliness and instructs her to show him his face in a mirror. This Ghita has not the heart to do, though she urges him to understand the futility of his chase after the Infanta. She leaves him near the Infanta's throne with the Infanta's white rose in his hand and, as he goes towards the ballroom, he sees himself for the first time in the mirror and screams in horror. He is near hysteria and, when the Infanta reappears, begs her to tell him he is not ugly: 'I am a dwarf and I love you.' But she has made it clear that she finds him repulsive and he falls down. Ghita tries to comfort him but sees that he is dead. The Infanta's reaction is that her new toy is broken; let them get on with the dance – and music is heard from the ballroom.

The brilliance of the music at the outset has the effect of conjuring up an exotic Spanish ambience, just as the lazy rhythms early on suggest the hedonistic atmosphere of the court. The score waxes romantic for the long scene between Princess and dwarf, but follows the action minutely through the dawning of the dwarf's disillusion and his long monologue up to the agony of his full understanding of how others see him, then the disaster of rejection by the Infanta. An extraordinary, bittersweet score and a total success as an opera. H.

BERND ALOIS ZIMMERMANN

(born 20 March 1918, died 10 August 1970)

DIE SOLDATEN

The Soldiers

Opera in four acts, fifteen scenes, libretto from the play (1775) by Jakob Michael Lenz. Première in Cologne, 15 February 1965, with Edith Gabry, Liane Synek, Helga Jenckel, Anton de Ridder, Claudio Nicolai and Zoltan Kelemen, conductor Michael Gielen, producer Hans Neugebauer. First performed Cassel, 1968, conductor Gerd Albrecht; Munich, 1969 (after a reported thirty-three rehearsals for orchestra and no less than 377 for soloists), with Catherine Gayer, Charlotte Berthold, Gudrun Wewezow, de Ridder, Hans Wilbrink, Keith Engen, conductor Gielen, producer Václav Kašlík, designer Josef Svoboda; Düsseldorf, 1971, conductor Günther Wich, and in 1972 at Edinburgh Festival; first British production, 1996, at English National Opera, conductor Elgar Howarth.

Wesener, a fancy goods merchant in Lille Bass
 Marie } his daughters High Soprano
 Charlotte } Mezzo-Soprano
 Wesener's Old Mother Contralto

Stolzius, a draper in Armentières High Baritone
 Stolzius's mother Contralto
 Obrist, Graf von Spannheim Bass
 Desportes, a young nobleman in the French Army High Tenor
 A Young Gamekeeper, in the service of Desportes Actor
 Captain Pirzel High Tenor
 Eisenhardt, an Army chaplain Baritone
 Major Haudy Baritone
 Major Mary Baritone
 Three Young Officers
 High Tenor (or High Soprano)
 Comtesse de la Roche Mezzo-Soprano
 The Young Count, her son High Lyric Tenor
 An Andalusian Waitress Dancer
 Three Cadets Dancers

| | |
|---|--------|
| Madame Roux, hostess of the coffee house | Silent |
| Servant of Comtesse de la Roche..... | Actor |
| Young Cadet | Actor |
| A Drunken Officer | Actor |
| Three Officers | Actors |
| Eighteen Officers and Cadets; Ballet, doubles of the actors and dancers | |

Place: French-Speaking Flanders

Time: Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

‘What are the requirements for a modern opera?’ asked Zimmermann. ‘The answer can be given in one sentence: opera as total theatre! This is the way to think about opera, or rather about theatre, by which I mean the concentration of all theatrical media for the purpose of communication in a place created specially for this purpose. In other words: architecture, sculpture, painting, musical theatre, spoken theatre, ballet, film, microphone, television, tape and sound techniques, electronic music, concrete music, circus, the musical, and all forms of motion theatre combine to form the phenomenon of pluralistic opera ... I have employed speech, singing, screaming, whispering, jazz, Gregorian chant, dance, film, and the entire modern “technical” theatre to serve the idea of the pluralistic form of musical theatre.’ But this pluralism of Zimmermann’s goes far beyond the combining of the many factors in the one art-form of opera and refers just as much to ‘the simultaneous occurrence of past, present and future as one complicated cross-relationship of inseparable factors in our lives, ever-present to each other, as if they were taking place on the inside surface of a vast globe with the audience suspended somewhere in the middle taking in the sweep of cause and effect simultaneously.’¹

It was presumably because it deliberately ignored the classical unities of time, place and action in favour of a rapid cross-cutting of the often very short scenes – which approached his own notion of a pluralistic scene – that Zimmermann chose a play by Jakob Michael Lenz, the German dramatist of the second half of the eighteenth century, whose work exhibited a certain iconoclastic turn of mind (a lesser, though earlier, worker in Büchner’s field) and whose play was distinctly anti-establishment. Zimmermann’s attraction was not of course to the relatively prosaic events of Lenz’s play – the seduction of the middle-class Marie by the upper-class Desportes and her decline from respectability to the miserable existence of a soldiers’ whore; rather it sprang from his conviction that Lenz’s characters ‘inevitably collide with an inescapable situation – innocently rather than guiltily – which directly leads towards rape, murder and suicide and finally towards the destruction of everything existing’.

In the event, neither Zimmermann’s theories nor his practice led as smoothly and inevitably to performance as the quality of his work would suggest. He started work on the opera in 1957 and in 1958 it was officially commissioned by the Opera in Cologne, his native city. It was not long however before the Opera House’s direction, the producer Oscar Fritz Schuh and the conductor Wolfgang Sawallisch, decided that it was impossible to perform in its original form. In 1963–64 the composer prepared a simplified score, which had its première in early 1965. What was lost was mainly due to Zimmermann’s acceptance, reluctant we may suppose, of standard theatrical architecture instead of a ‘theatre of the future’ capable of giving more vivid expression to his attempt to show the inevitability of events and the unimportance of the time-order in which they take place – ‘Kugelgestalt der Zeit’ is the expression he used; ‘the spherical shape of time’, you might translate it. He wanted to surround the audience with action either live or on film, so that in, for instance, scene vii or xiii, the use of twelve surrounding stages, each with its attendant musicians together making up the vast orchestral resources required, would force listeners to focus on either the past, the present or the future, each a candidate for their attention.

Act I. An extended and violent prelude, dominated by an obsessive drum beat, leads us straight into Scene i (Strofe), which plays in Wesener’s house in Lille. Marie asks the advice of her sister Charlotte as she writes a bread-and-butter letter to Madame Stolzius in Armentières, where she has recently been staying. What she does not want her sister to know is that she has fallen in love with young Stolzius and hopes to see him again.

¹ James Helme Sutcliffe in Opera, June 1969.

Die Soldaten (English National Opera, 1996, director David Freeman, designer Sally Jacobs).
 Foreground: Nicholas Folwell (Major Mary), Roberto Salvatore (Stolzius), David Burrell (Major Haudy).

Scene ii (Ciaccona I). Stolzius's house in Armentières. Stolzius is obviously labouring under stress, and it is some time before his mother shows him a letter from Marie, with whom he in his turn has fallen in love. Immediately the clouds lift, for him at least though not for his mother, since she plainly has been less taken with the girl's charms than has her son.

A short interlude (Tratto I) takes us to Scene iii (called Ricercari I), again in Lille. Baron Desportes, a young officer in the French army, calls on Marie in her father's house. He opens his courtship of her with a florid, wide-ranging phrase, 'Mein göttliche Mademoiselle' (a kind of modern 'Reverenzal'¹), which effectively characterises an ardent, not too sincere young man used to expressing himself in formal fashion and which remains typical of his music throughout the opera. He affects to be shocked when Marie tells him that her father has warned her that men are false, and his 'göttliche Mademoiselle' becomes even more fulsome and exaggerated than before. When Wesener comes in, Desportes tries to take advantage of the situation by inviting Marie to the theatre, but Wesener is adamant that she cannot go. Her disappointment is quite apparent, and Wesener tries to read her a lecture on the situation, excusing his severity by assuring her, not without tenderness, that she is his only joy in life.

Scene iv (Toccata I). Armentières, where we meet for the first time the military in force. Haudy, Pirzel, and the chaplain Eisenhardt lead a discussion about the comparative merits of the theatre and the sermon as opportunities for moralising, and the others, particularly three young officers, join in spasmodically. 'A whore will always be a whore,' announces Haudy at the top of his voice, only to have the chaplain rebuff his contention with, 'a whore never became a whore without being made one'.

¹ Mistress Quickly's greeting to Falstaff in Verdi's opera.

Scene v (Nocturne I). Lille. Marie is alone in her room and her father comes to ask whether Desportes' intentions towards her are honourable. She shows him the letter in the form of a love poem which he has written her, and Wesener reads it over with some satisfaction. Though he advises her not to accept presents from him, it is quite apparent that the prospect of a Baron for a son-in-law is not unattractive to him, but he wants her to hedge her bets by not breaking off with young Stolzius before Desportes has proposed to her formally. Marie left alone reveals in an important arioso not only that she still has misgivings but her love for Stolzius is far from dead. Thunder and lightning outside the window and a comparable turmoil in the orchestra seem to bode no good.

Act II, scene vi (Toccata II). Armentières – the café where Madame Roux holds sway, with the Andalusian waitress as one of the principal attractions of her establishment. Zimmermann specifies the layout of tables, partly to secure ensemble balance, and partly because he makes provision for the occupants of each one to tap with tea or coffee spoon, fist, open or closed hand, on table or vessel in the course of the action (an exactly notated effect). A drunken young officer announces to all and sundry, 'If I had a wife, I should give you permission to sleep with her, if you could persuade her to it.' The chaplain and Pirzel take their places well to the front, as also the young Count de la Roche. An elaborate dance begins, full of jazz complications and led by the Andalusian (it is during this dance that the percussion effects on glass, cup and table-top are most in evidence). Stolzius comes in and is unmercifully teased with insinuations about the behaviour of Marie in Lille. He pretends not to know what they're talking about and certainly not to have heard of their brother officer Desportes. It is not long before he precipitately leaves. An Intermezzo with organ, stage music, a variety of percussion leads to the next scene.

Scene vii. Lille (Capriccio, Corale and Ciaccona II). Marie sits in tears after reading a reproachful letter from Stolzius, and hands it to Desportes, who is indignant at what he describes as the impertinence of the writer, then says he will dictate an answer. But the letter is soon lost sight of in the hysteria of coloratura laughter as the physical seduction of Marie begins. At this point the scene, like the means the composer employs throughout, becomes for the first time pluralistic as Zimmermann simultaneously shows the seduction, Stolzius's far-off instinctive reaction to it, and a third party ruminating on the situation. As well as Marie and Desportes, we see Wesener's old mother, perhaps in the centre, foretelling misfortune for her beloved granddaughter and, on the side of the stage opposite to Marie's room in Lille, Stolzius in Armentières miserable at the tone of Marie's letter which has in effect broken off the engagement. He tries to defend Marie to his mother but vows vengeance on Desportes. Meanwhile, the wordless love scene has continued and we have effectively reached the halfway point in the action with Marie's seduction complete and her downfall therefore more or less assured – a musical scene of remarkable complexity and brilliant invention.

Act III. After a short prelude, scene viii (Rondino) takes place in Armentières, where, in the principal square, the chaplain and Captain Pirzel are engaged on one of their interminable discussions. The chaplain wants to discuss the implications of Mary's intended move to Lille, but Pirzel insists on philosophising. The chaplain observes that you cannot go out of the door without finding a soldier embracing a girl, but this provokes further theoretical stuff from Pirzel, whose lengthy military service seems to have driven him into some kind of private mental corner, as a refuge presumably from the irrationality of what has been going on around him.

Scene ix (Rappresentazione). Mary's room. A knock at the door heralds the arrival of a stiff and nervous Stolzius, dressed in uniform and applying to become Major Mary's batman. Mary accepts him.

The tenth scene (Ricercari II) follows after a single silent bar and takes place in Wesener's house in Lille. Charlotte is scolding her sister for taking up with Major Mary the moment Desportes has left the town. Marie tries to excuse herself, but Charlotte is not to be put off and, as Marie makes up in the looking glass, hisses 'Soldier's hussy!' at her back. Major Mary comes in to be greeted by Marie with a sort of parody of Desportes' greeting in the third scene, a gallantry he echoes in his turn. All three prepare to leave, but the girls notice before doing so a resemblance between Mary's batman, standing discreetly in the background, and 'a certain person'. The interlude is called Romanza, and is one of the score's most considerable pieces.

Scene xi (Nocturne II). The house of Comtesse de la Roche. It is evening, and the Countess is waiting up for the return of her son, musing that it seems inevitable that children regularly cause their parents pain from the womb to the grave. Her thoughts are conveyed in a wide-ranging solo arioso, which becomes, with the entrance of her son (the young Count whom we have already rather unobtrusively met in the two regimental scenes), an extended and vocally grateful duet, vociferously and aptly applauded by the audience when I first heard the opera. The burden of their conversation is basically the unsuitability of Miss Wesener as a potential consort for the young Count. Countess de la Roche herself will take responsibility for the girl's future.

Scene xii (Tropi). Lille, Wesener's house. From the conversation of Charlotte and Marie, it seems that Major Mary, like the Count, has in his turn deserted Marie, but their discussion is interrupted by the arrival of a servant asking on behalf of the Countess de la Roche if the young ladies are at home. With a perfectly contrived mixture of condescension and warmth, the Countess insists that she is Marie's best friend, commiserates with her on the gossip which is rife in the town, bids her in a firm but kindly way to forget all about the young Count, and offers to take her as a companion into her own house. The scene develops into a splendid trio for female voices and the Countess leaves.

Act IV, scene xiii (Toccata III). The café in Armentières. Zimmermann's pluralistic theories are here put more extensively and effectively into practice. The subject is the various stages of Marie's downfall, represented simultaneously as if in a kind of dream on different levels on the stage, one with dancers, another with all the performers, a third with their doubles, and yet again in film on three screens.¹ The whole thing is conceived as if Marie were on trial. Mixed on the three screens and cross-cut from one to another, the salient events of the action are shown. Major Mary has quickly found out where Marie is to be found, and the Countess has surprised them in a garden rendezvous. Marie has run away from the Countess's house and is not to be found at her father's. At the same time, Desportes, who, the original play tells us, has been trying, even though Wesener has guaranteed debts he left behind him in Lille, to rid himself of his discarded mistress by getting her well and truly involved with Mary, has written to his gamekeeper at home to say he has found a woman for him. Marie, homeless and terrified, is raped by the gamekeeper, and becomes a common prostitute. Stolzius, apprised of events, buys poison with which to effect his revenge. The threads of the very complex scene are drawn together in a great common utterance on the part of all the participants: 'And must those who suffer injustice tremble, and only those who do wrong be happy.'

An interlude (Tratto II) leads to scene xiv (Ciaccona III). Armentières, Major Mary's room. Desportes is dining with his friend, and Stolzius keeps on fetching them fresh napkins so as to overhear the conversation. Desportes speaks in the most callous manner imaginable of Marie, who wrote to tell him she planned to visit him at home, and goes on to explain that he quickly arranged for his keeper, a strong masculine sort of chap, to give her the kind of reception she deserved. Mary protests at so revolting a stratagem, but Desportes thinks that Marie would have nothing to complain about if his keeper were to marry her. Major Mary insists that he himself would have married her if the young Count de la Roche had not got in the way. At this point, Stolzius serves soup, into which he has put the poison he bought, and its effect on Desportes is almost immediate. Stolzius seizes Desportes by the ears and yells 'Marie!' in his face, then, as he watches Desportes' agony, drinks poison himself and dies.

The last scene (Nocturne III) takes place on the road. To the accompaniment of stylised and amplified vocal noises, a miserable beggar woman – Marie of course – accosts old Wesener and begs for money.

¹ And this is the composer's simplified, compromise version!

At first he refuses but then he thinks of the possible plight of his daughter and relents. He does not recognise her. While the end of the tragedy is being played out, various scenes are enacted in contrapuntal contrast, from a view of groups of officers having recourse to Madame Roux's café to films of soldiers of all ages and all nationalities marching relentlessly over the cobblestones, until the latter idea takes over the scene entirely to the accompaniment of an amplified march on the drums. Marie lies motionless on the stage throughout and it is emphasised that the soldiers are only symbolical of those who are responsible for the misery of others, by no means intended as exclusive perpetrators of those crimes against humanity which Zimmermann so cogently protests.

Zimmermann has written a complicated serial score, involving vast stage and musical resources, but what impresses the listener at the end of a performance is the clarity of organisation, the audibility of text, the subtlety of the sounds he has heard. His vocal line is often angular and complex but also lyrical and expressive, his orchestra is filled with colour as well as weight of sonority. Above all, he has written an opera that is full of compassion and humanity, that speaks to the hearts of audiences which see and hear it.

H.

INDEX

A

A kékszakállú Herceg Vára 22
Abandon d'Ariane, L' 475
 Abbado, Claudio 717
Abraham and Isaac 791
Acis and Galatea 300–1
 Adam, Adolphe 1–2
 Adami, Giuseppe 601, 603, 607, 608
 Adams, John 2–7
Adelson e Salvini 28
 Adenis, J. 79
 Adès, Thomas 7–8
Adriana Lecouvreur 169–70
Adventures of Mr Brouček, The 372, 379–82
Aegyptische Helena, Die 757, 777–9
Affe als Mensch, Der 346
Africaine, L' (The African Maid) 471–3
 Agostini, Philippe 570
Agrippina 295–6
 Ahna, Pauline de 757
Aida 907–8
Akhnaten 256–8
 Alarcón, P. de 979
 d'Albert, Eugen 9–10
Albert Herring 107–10
 Albinoni, Tommaso 320
Alceste (Alcestis) 261, 262, 263–6
Alcina 318, 320–1
Aldeburgh Festival 65, 98, 100, 110, 127, 128, 132, 133, 134, 138, 956
Aleko 613–14
 Alencar, Jose Martiniano de 277
Alessandro 313
 Alfano, Franco 607, 608
Alfonso und Estrella 715–16
Alzira 864–5
Amahl and the Night Visitors 455, 461–2
 Amato, Pasquale 250, 599
Amelia al Ballo (Amelia Goes to the Ball) 455–6

Américains, Les 864
Amico Fritz, L' 429, 431–2
Amore dei Tre Re, L' 481–3
Amorous Indies, The 617–20
Anato 854
 Ancelot, François 202
 Andersen, Hans Christian 220, 791, 817
 Andersen, Vilhelm 540
 Anderson, Barry 68
 Anderson, June 674, 685
Andrea Chénier 250–2
Andromaque 675
 Anelli, A. 660
 Anfossi, Pasquale 496, 565
Ange de Feu, L' 579–82
Anima del Filosofo, L' 335–6
Anna Bolena (Anne Boleyn) 35, 192–3
Anna Erizio 679
Anna Karenina 293–4
Annals of Opera 612
Antigone 555
Antony and Cleopatra 19, 20–1
 Antropov 811
 Apollinaire, Guillaume 568, 569
Arabella 757, 779–81
Arabian Nights 172
 Arditi, Luigi 166
 Argento, Dominick 11
aria da capo 294, 295, 318
Ariadne auf Naxos (Ariadne on Naxos) 757, 770–3
Ariadne and Bluebeard 214–16
Ariadne Deserted 475
Ariane et Barbe-Bleue 214–16
Arianna 484, 487–8
Ariodante 318–20
 Ariosto, Ludovico 316, 318, 320
Aristocracy of the Skin, The 84–5
 Aristophanes 716
Arlecchino 142–3
Arlesiana, L' 169
 Arlincourt, Vicomte d' 27
Armida 674–5

Armide 261, 269–70, 272
 d'Arnaud, Baculard 206
Aroldo 876, 893–5
 Arrieta, Emilio 12–13
Artus 918
 Arundell, Dennis 327
Ashbrook, William 190n., 205n., 214n.
 Ashman, Mike 951
 Ashton, Frederick 470n., 823
Aspern Papers, The 11
Assedio di Calais, L' 201–2
Assedio di Haarlem, L' 873
At the Boar's Head 367, 368–9
Attaché d'ambassade, L' 410
Attila 865–6
 Auber, Daniel-François 13–17, 194, 895
 Auden, W.H. 48, 98, 99, 344, 348, 349, 797, 798
 Audi, Pierre 149
Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny 474, 965–8, 970
Aureliano in Palmira 665, 667
 Auric, Georges 569
 Austin, Frederic 238
 Autreau, Jacques 623

B

Babbitt, Milton 743
Bacchae, The 348, 349
 Bach, J.C. 496
 Bachmann, Ingeborg 342, 346
 Badini, Carlo Francesco 335
 Badoaro, Giacomo 489
 Bakala, Břetislav 395
Bal Masqué, Le 895
 Balakirev, Mili A. 635, 637, 696
 Balanchine, George 969
 Balázs, B. 22
 Balfe, Michael William 18–19
Ballad Singer, The 566–8
Ballade du Grand Macabre, La 416
Ballo delle Ingrate, Il 484

- Ballo in Maschera, Un* 895–7
 Ballola, Giovanni Carli 656n.
 Balocchi, Luigi 680, 686
 Balzac, Honoré de 352
 Balzer, Jürgen 540
Bandits, The 870–1
 Barbaia, Domenico 665, 669, 674, 678n., 688, 715
Barbe-Bleue 547–9
Barber of Baghdad, The 172–4
 Barber, Samuel 19–21
Barber of Seville, The 665, 666–8, 669
 Barbier, Auguste 51
 Barbier, Jules 279, 280, 283, 470, 552, 818, 819
Barbier von Bagdad, Der 172–4
Barbiere di Siviglia, Il 665, 666–8, 669
 Bardari, Giuseppe 196
 Bardi di Vernio, Count Giovanni 484
Barkouf 549
 Barry, Comtesse du 286
Bartered Bride, The 423, 727–30
 Bartók, Béla 22–3
 Bartošová, Fedora 376, 377
Bassarids, The 344, 348–52
Bat, The 748–5
Batilde di Turenna 885
Battaglia di Legnano, La (The Battle of Legnano) 873–4, 894
 Battu, Léon 76
 Bayard, F. 205
 Bayreuth 921, 949, 951
 B.B.C. 98, 112, 135, 142, 953, 974
Bear, The 955–6
Béatrice et Bénédict 58–60
Beatrice Cenci 275, 276–7
Beatrice di Tenda 34–6
 Beaumarchais, Pierre 666, 667
 Beaumont, Anthony 148
Beauty and the Beast 286, 287
Beauty and Ironheart 682
 Beecham, Sir Thomas 186n., 188, 636, 740, 741n., 742, 771
 Beethoven, Ludwig van 23–5
Beggar Student, The 478–9
Beggar's Opera, The 237–41, 299, 325
Beginning of a Romance, The 372
 Belasco, David 599
Belle et la Bête, La 286, 287
Belle Hélène, La 545–7
Bellezza e Cuor di Ferro 682–3
 Bellini, Vincenzo 25–37, 189
 Belloy, Dormont de 683
 Belsky, Vladimir Ivanovich 647
 Bely, Andrey 580n.
 Benedict, Julius 37–8
 Benelli, Sem 481, 483
 Benvenuti, G. 484, 491
Benvenuto Cellini 51–2
 Beregán, Nicolò 321
Berenice, Regina d'Egitto (Berenice, Queen of Egypt) 323–5
 Berg, Alban 39–46, 562
 Berio, Francesco Maria 669
 Berio, Luciano 46–50
 Berkoff, Steven 841
 Berlin, Isaiah 841
 Berlioz, Hector 51–60, 262, 263n., 279, 634, 690, 957
 Bernanos, Georges 570, 571
 Bernard, Pierre-Joseph 620
Bernauerin, Die 555
 Bernhoff, John 740
 Bernstein, Leonard 61–4
 Bertati, Giovanni 170, 509–10
 Bertoni, Ferdinando 263
Bertram 25
Besuch der alten Dame, Der 225–7
Betrayed Sea, The 354–5
Betrothal in a Monastery 582–4
Bettelstudent, Der 478–9
 Bey, Mariette 907
Bianca e Gernando 25
Bibliothèque Bleue, La 962
Bibliothèque universelle des romans 287
 Bielsky, V.I. 640, 645, 649
Billy Budd 111–17
 Bing, Sir Rudolf 347n., 901n.
Birthday of the Infanta, The 987–9
 Birtwistle, Sir Harrison 65–75
 Bis, L.F. 692
 Bishop, Sir Henry Rowley 672
 Bizet, Georges 75–83
 Blacher, Boris 223
Black Domino, The 17
 Blake, David 84–5
 Blas, Gil 620n.
 Blau, Alfred 634
 Blau, Edouard 408, 439, 440, 442
 Blitzstein, Marc 85–8
 Blom, Erik 264
Blond Eckbert 977–8
 'Blonda, Max' 709
Blue Monday 243
Bluebeard 547–9
Boatswain's Mate, The 740, 742
Boccaccio 801–3
 Bodanzky, Artur 801, 962
Bohème, La 413–15, 592, 594–5
Bohemian Girl, The 18–19
Bohemios 918
 Boieldieu, François Adrien 1, 88–90, 746
 Boito, Arrigo 90–3, 565, 566, 592, 888, 908, 909, 912
Bomarzo 247–50
 Bonci, Alessandro 15
 Bond, Christopher 744
 Bond, Edward 352, 353
 Bononcini, Giovanni Battista 325
Boréades, Les (The Boreads) 627–8
Boris Godunov 527–32
 Borodin, Aleksandr Porfiryevich 93–6, 635, 637
Borough, The 100
 Borovsky, Victor 643n.
 Boucicault, Dion 37
 Boughton, Rutland 96–7
 Bouilly, Jean Nicolas 23
 Boulanger, Nadia 86, 820
Boulevard Solitude 338–40
 Bourgeois, Eugène 875, 876
Bourgeois Gentilhomme, Le 770, 771
 Boutet de Monvel, J.M. 682
 Brahms, Johannes 216, 342
Brandenburgers in Bohemia, The 726–7
Branibořiv Čechách 726–7
 Brauner, Patricia 656n.
Breasts of Tiresias, The 568–70
 Brecher, Gustav 962
 Brecht, Bertolt 238, 965, 966, 969
 Bretón, Tomás 12
 Bretzner, Christoph Friedrich 502
 Brewster, Henry 740
 Briggs, K.M. 71

- Briséis* 156
 Britten, Benjamin 98–141, 237, 238, 611, 612
 Briusoff, Valery 579, 580n.
 Brod, Max 372, 377, 382, 388, 395n.
Broken Strings 916, 917–18
 Bruckberger, Rev. Fr. 570
Bruges-la-morte 406
 Brunswick, L.L. 1
Buch der Liebe 717
 Büchner, Georg 39, 223
Büchse der Pandora, Die 42
 Budden, Julian 851, 871, 875, 876, 897
 Bülow, Hans von 272, 480, 932, 935
 Bunn, Alfred 18
 Bunyan, John 848, 849
Buona Figliuola, La 565–6
Buondelmonte 196
 Burani, Paul 159
 Burenin, V.P. 810
Burgschaft, Die 356
Burlador de Sevilla, El 509
Burning Fiery Furnace, The 131, 133–4
 Busch, Fritz 356, 357
 Büsching, J.G.G. 717
 Busenello, G. Francesco 152, 491
 Busoni, Ferruccio 142–8, 966n., 972
 Busser, Henri 282
 Byron, Lord 826, 861, 872
- C
- Caballi, Francesco 491
 Cable, George 186
 Caccini, Giulio 484
 Cahusac, Louis de 625, 627
 Cain, Henri 445, 446, 450, 451
 Cairns, David 828n.
 Caldara 312
Calisto, La 152, 153–6
 Callas, Maria 27, 167, 168, 192, 200, 663, 674
 Calvino, Italo 46, 48
 Calzabigi, Ranieri da 261, 263, 265, 266
 Cambiaggio, Carlo 76
Cambiale di Matrimonio, La 653, 658
Cambio della Valigia, Il 656–7
 'Camerata' 484
 Cammarano, Salvatore 198, 201, 202, 204, 864, 873, 874, 875, 881
Campanello, Il 200–1
 Campanini, Cleofonte 576
 Campbell of Islay, J.F. 976
 Campra, André 498, 615
 Camprodon, Francisco 12
Candide 62–4
 Canning, Hugh 314n.
 Capece, Carlo Sigismondo 316
 Čapek, Karel 318n., 390
Capriccio 757, 788–90
Capuleti e i Montecchi, I (The Capulets and the Montagues) 28–9
Cardillac 356, 357–9
 Carestini, Giovanni 320
Carmen 76, 81–3
 Carmichael, Alexander 976
Carmina Burana 555
Carmina Gadelica 976
Carosse du Saint Sacrement, Le 550
 Carré, Albert 159, 160, 598
 Carré, Marguerite 436
 Carré, Michel 77, 279, 280, 282, 283, 470, 552, 818, 819
 Caruso, Enrico 599, 696, 882
 Carvalho, Léon 79, 279
 Caryll, I. 157
 Casken, John 149–50
 Castelli, J.F. 716
Castle of St Aldobrando, The 25
Castor et Pollux 620–1
 castrati 262, 263n., 294, 315, 317, 318, 320, 682
 Catalani, Alfredo 150–1
Catulli Carmina 555
 Cavalieri, Caterina 503
 Cavalieri, Emilio de' 484
Cavalleria Rusticana 429–31
 Cavalli, Francesco 152–6, 325
Cecchina 565–6
 Čech, Svatopluk 379, 381n.
 Čelansky, Vítězslav 377
Cenci, The 276
Cendrillon 434, 446–7, 670
Cenerentola, La 667, 669, 670–1
 Cerha, Friedrich 42, 43
Čert a Káča 219–20
Čertova Stěna 739–40
 Cervantes, Miguel de 230
 Červinka, Vincenc 382
 Červinková-Riegrová, Marie 216, 218
 Chabrier, Alexis Emmanuel 156–62, 568
 Chaliapin, Fyodor 643, 696
 chamber opera 98, 108, 122, 132, 149, 180
Chao Family Orphan, The 974
 Chapí, Ruperto 12
 Charles X 686
 Charpentier, Gustave 162–5
 Chaussou, Ernest 165–6
 Chazet, Alissan de 657
 Chekhov, Anton 956
 Cherepnin, Nicolas 535, 536
Chérubin 434, 450–1
 Cherubini, Luigi 13, 166–8
Cheval de Bronze 13
 Chezy, Helmine von 959
 Chi Chun-hsiang 974
 Child, Harold 845
Child and the Magic, The 629–32 children's opera 98, 107, 110, 122, 127, 128, 179, 966
 Childs, Lucinda 255, 256n.
 Chisholm, Erik 395
 Chlubna, Osvald 395
Christ Recrucified 426
 Christiansen, E. 538
Christmas Eve 635, 638–40
 church parables 98, 127, 131–5
 Cicognini, C.A. 152
Cid, Le 435, 439–40
Cigarette, La 445
 Cigna-Santi, Vittorio Amedeo 495
 Cilea, Francesco 169–70
 Cimarosa, Domenico 170–2, 333
Cinderella 446–7, 670–1
Circe 987
Ciro in Babilonia 658
 Civinini, G. 599
Clandestine Marriage, The 170
 Claretie, Jules 445
 Claudel, Paul 473, 476
 Clayton, Thomas 237
Clemenza di Tito, La (The Clemency of Titus) 519–21

- Clever Girl, The* 555–6
Cloak, The 603–4
Coachman of Longjumeau, The 1–2
 Coates, Albert 574
 Cocteau, Jean 473, 572, 573, 796
Cocu Magnifique, Le 275
 Coe, Richard N. 659n., 675n., 684n.
 Colautti, A. 169, 250
 Colbran, Isabella 665, 674, 675, 677, 679, 683, 685, 688
 Colette 629, 631
Colleen Bawn 37
 Colman, George 170
Colomb, Christophe 473, 476–7
 Coltellini, Marco 330
Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda 484, 488–9
Comedy on the Bridge 422–3
Comte de Comminges, Le 206
Comte Ory, Le 686, 690–1
 Congreve, William 327
Consolations of Scholarship, The 973
Conspirators, The 716–17
Consul, The 455, 458–60
Contes d'Hoffmann, Les 81, 552–5
 Conti, Prince de 286
Convenienze ed Inconvenienze Teatrali, Le (Conventions and Inconveniences of the State) 190–1
 Cooke, Deryck 275
Coq d'Or, Le 649–52
 Cormon, Eugène 77, 549
 Corneille, Pierre 204, 439
 Cornelius, Peter 172–4
Coronation of Poppaea, The 484, 491–4
Corregidor, Der 979–80
Corsaro, Il 872–3
 Corsi, Jacopo 484
Così fan tutte 515–19
 Costa, Michael 957
 Coster, Charles de 175
Count Ory 686, 690–1
 Crabbe, George 100
Cradle Will Rock, The 86
 Craig, Douglas 186
 Cramer, Heinz von 340
 Cramer, J.B. 502
 Crémieux, Hector-Jonathan 543, 549
Cricket on the Hearth, The 274
 Croisset, Francis de 450
 Crommelynck, Fernand 275
 Crozier, Eric 107, 110, 111, 112
 Cruvelli, J.F.C. 885
 Cuberli, Lella 685
 Cui, César Antonovich 535, 635
Cunning Little Vixen, The 372, 387–90
Curlew River 131, 132–3
 Cuzzoni, Francesca 303, 310n.
- D
- da Ponte, Lorenzo 504, 505, 509, 510, 515
Dalibor 730–2
 Dallapiccola, Luigi 11, 175–7, 489
Dame aux Camélias, La 876, 883
Dame Blanche, La 1, 88–90
Damnation de Faust, La (The Damnation of Faust) 52–3
 Damrosch, Dr Leopold 52, 53, 468
 Danchet, Antoine 498
 Dancourt, L.H. 331
 Daniélou, J. 796
 D'Annunzio, Gabriele 985
 Dante 605, 614, 932
Dantons Tod 223–4
Daphne 757, 784–6
Daphnis et Chloé 628
Dardanus 621–3
 Dargomizhsky, Aleksandr S. 178, 642
 Daspuro, N. 431
Daughter of the Regiment, The 205–6
 David, Giovanni 669
 Davide, Giacomo 335
 Davies, Sir Peter Maxwell 65, 178–81
 Davis, Sir Colin 68
Dead City, The 406–7
 Dean, Winton 79, 80n., 295, 296, 304n., 306n., 314
Death of Danton, The 223–4
Death of Klinghoffer, The 5–7
Death in Venice 98, 138–41
 Debussy, Claude 181–3, 399
 Dehn, Paul 955
 Delavigne, J.F.C. 13, 465
 Delestre-Poirson, Charles-Gaspard 690
 Delibes, Léo 183–5
 Delius, Frederick 186–9
Délivrance de Thésée, La 475–6
 De Luca, Giuseppe 250
Demetrio e Polibio 653, 658
Demon Barber of Fleet Street, The 744–6
Demon, The 465, 696
 Dent, Edward 142, 143, 146n., 262n., 264, 476, 504, 505n., 509, 513n., 516, 521
 Deschamps, Emile 466
 Desforges 657
 Destinn, Emmy 599
 Deutekom, Christina 674
Devil and Kate, The 219–20
Devils of Loudun, The 557–60
Devil's Wall, The 739–40
 Dexter, John 885
 Diaghilev, Serge 792, 793, 794, 795
Dialogues des Carmélites (Dialogues of the Carmelites) 570–2
Diamants de la Couronne, Les 13
 Dickens, Charles 274
 Dickie, Murray 751
Dido and Aeneas 610–12
Didone 152
 Dimitrij 216–18, 528
Dinorah 470–1
 Dische, Irene 706
Discovery of America, The 476
Discreta Enamorada, La 918
Djamileh 76, 80–1
Docteur Miracle, Le (Doctor Miracle) 75, 76
Doctor in Spite of Himself 279–80
Doge von Venedig, Der 861
Doktor Faust 145–8
Dom Sébastien, Roi de Portugal 212–14
Domestic Warfare 716–17
Dominó Azul, El 12
Domino Noir, Le 17
Don Alvaro o La Fuerza de Sino 897, 898

- Don Carlos* 901–7
Don César de Bazan 952
Don Giovanni 505, 509–15
Don Giovanni Tenorio o sia il Dissoluto 509
Don Pasquale 36, 210–12
Don Procopio 76, 79n.
Don Quichotte (Don Quixote) 451–3
Don Quixote de la Mancha 230
Don Rodrigo 247
Don Sebastian, King of Portugal 212–14
Doña Francisquita 918–20
 Donahue, John 11
 Donizetti, Gaetano 36, 189–214
Donna del Lago, La 677–9
Doorbell, The 200–1
 Doré, Gustave 543
 Dostoevsky, Fyodor 394, 426, 573, 574
Down in the Valley 970
 Downes, Sir Edward 574n., 587n., 720n., 874n.
Dragon, The 455
dramma giocoso 332, 494
Dreigroschenoper, Die 966
 Dresen, Adolf 988
 Drew, David 128, 241
Drot og Marsk 337
 Dryden, John 612
Dschinnistan 522
Due Foscari, I 861–2
Duenna, The 241–3, 582
 Dukas, Paul 214–16
Duke Bluebeard's Castle 22
 Dumanoir, Philippe 952
 Dumas, Alexandre, fils 876, 883
Dumb Girl of Portici, The 13–15
 Duncan, Ronald 105
 Duplessis, Marie 883
 Duprez, Gilbert 204, 212
 Durazzo, Count 261
 Durey, Louis 569
 Dürrenmatt, Friedrich 225
 Duveyrier, Charles 884
Dvatar Gras 916
Dvě Vdovy 734–6
 Dvořák, Antonín 216–22, 528
Dwarf, The 987–9
 Dyk, Viktor 379
 Dykes, J.B. 127n.
- E
- Ebert, Carl 275
Echo et Narcisse 261, 263
Edgar 592, 594
Education Manquée, Une 156
Efebos 803
Eginhard und Emma 717
Egyptian Helen, The 757, 777–9
 Einem, Gottfried von 223–7
 Einstein, Alfred 263, 264, 499, 502, 515, 521n., 716
Einstein on the Beach 255–6
 Eisenstein, Sergei M. 586n.
 Eisler, Hanns 84
 electronic music 68–9
Elegy for Young Lovers 344–6
Elektra 757, 764–7
 Elgar, Edward 96
 Eliot, T.S. 828
Elisabeth d'Angleterre 202
Elisabetta, Regina d'Inghilterra (Elizabeth, Queen of England) 665–6
Elisir d'amore, L' (The Elixir of Love) 194–5
Elvida 190n.
 Emilia 305
Emperor of Atlantis, The 843–4
Emperor, The 706
 Enesco, Georges 227–8
Enfant et les Sortilèges, L' 629–32
English Cat, The 352–4
English Dancing Master 368
English Miracle Plays, Moralities and Interludes 127n.
English Ring, The 19
Enlèvement d'Europe, L' 474–5
 d'Ennery, Adolphe 439, 952
Entente Cordiale 740
Entführung aus dem Serail, Die 502–4, 706
 Enzensberger, Hans Magnus 706
Epicoene 781
Equivoco Stravagante, L' 658
 Erckmann-Chatrion 431
Ercole Amante 152
Erdgeist 42
 Erdmann-Guckel, Hanns 484
Ermione 675–7
Ernani 858–60
Erwartung 707–9, 987
- Es war einmal* 986
Escape from the Seraglio, The 502–4
 Eschenbach, Wolfram von 949
Esclarmonde 440, 442
España 156, 468
 Esslin, Martin 276
 Etienne de Jouy, V.J. 670, 687, 692, 746
Etoile, L' 156, 157–8
Etrangère, L' (The Stranger) 27
Eugene Onegin 588n., 805–9
Euridice 484
 Euripides 166, 265, 348, 349, 615
Euryanthe 715, 717, 959–61
Evangelimann, Der 398
Evangile et le Foyer, L' 875
 Evans, Peter 138
Evenings in the Village of Dikanka 535, 638, 639
 Everding, August 632
Evocations 694
Exchange of a Suitcase, The 656–7
Expectation 707–9
 Ezio 314–16
- F
- Fair at Sorochintsy, The* 535–6
Fair Helen, The 545–7
Fair Maid of Perth, The 76, 79–80
Fairies, The 592–3
Fairy Queen, The 612
 Falla, Manuel de 229–31
Fallen Woman, The 883–4
Falstaff 909, 912–16
Fanciulla del West, La 592, 599–601
Fantasio 740
Faramondo 325
 Farrar, Geraldine 250
Fate 372, 376–8
Fateful Hand, The 709
Fatinitza 801
 Fauchois, René 231
 Fauré, Gabriel 159, 231–2
Faust 52, 90, 145, 280–2, 718
 Faustini, Giovanni 152, 153
Favola d'Orfeo, La 484–7
Favorite, La (The Favourite) 206–9

Fedeltà Premiata, La 333–5
 Federico, G.A. 561
Fedora 250, 253–4
Feen, Die 921, 922
 Fegejo, Polisseno 565
 Felsenstein, Walter 387, 388, 552, 751
Fernando Cortez 924
Ferne Klang, Der 714–15
 Ferrant, Guy 282
 Ferretti, Jacopo 670, 682
 Ferrier, Kathleen 263n.
Festin de Pierre, Le 509
Fête du couronnement de la Muse 163
Fête Galante 740
Feuersnot 760–1
 Feuillère, Edwige 550n.
 Fezelier, Louis 617
Fidelio 23–5
Fidelity Rewarded 333–5
Fiend Father, The 465
Fierrabras 715, 717–18
Fiery Angel, The 579–82
Figaro see Nozze di Figaro
Fight between Tancredi and Clorinda, The 484, 488–9
Fille du Régiment, La 205–6
Fille Mal Gardée, La (ballet) 666n.
Fils par hasard, Le 657
Financial Times 707
Finta Giardiniera, La 494, 496–7, 505
Finto Stanislao, Il 852
Firebird, The 792
 Fischer-Dieskau, Dietrich 632
 Fitzball, Edward 952
 Flaubert, Gustav 435
Flavio 304–5
Fledermaus, Die 748–5
 Fleg, Edmond 227
 Fleming, Renée 674
Fliegende Holländer, Der 925–8
Flood, The 791
Florentinische Tragödie, Eine (A Florentine Tragedy) 987
 Flotow, Friedrich von 233–5
 Floyd, Carlisle 235–6
Flying Dutchman, The 921, 925–8
 Fontaine, Charles 436
 Fontana, Ferdinando 592
 Foppa, Giuseppe Maria 653, 657

Force of Destiny, The 897–901
 Forster, E.M. 100, 111, 112
 Fortner, Wolfgang 338
 Fortune, Nigel 308
Forza del Destino, La 897–901
 Forzano, Gioacchino 603, 604, 605
 Foucher, Paul-Henri 212
 Fouqué, Friedrich de la Motte 220, 717
Four Saints in Three Acts 822–3
Fra Diavolo 13, 15–16
 Franc-Nohain 628
 France, Anatole 444
Francesca da Rimini 272, 614, 985–6
 Franchetti, Alberto 250
Francis Poulenc 571n.
 Fraser, Norman 247
Frate 'nnamorato, Lo 565
Frau ohne Schatten, Die 757, 773–5
Fraulein von Scuderi, Das 357
Free-Shooter, The 957–9
 Freeman, David 69n.
Freischütz, Der 957–9
 Friberth, Carl 330, 331
Friedenstag 757, 783–4
 Friedrich, W. 233
Friend Fritz 431–2
From the House of the Dead 372, 394–7
From One Day to the Next 709–11

G

Galilei, Vincenzo 484
 Gallet, Louis 80–1, 439, 444
Gambler, The 573–5
 Gamerra, Giovanni de 495, 496
 Gandonnière, Almire 52
 Garden, Mary 576, 579n.
 Gardiner, John Eliot 484
Gare di politica e d'amor, Le 323
 Garnett, Richard 846
 Garsington Festival 329, 331, 332
Gärtnerin aus Liebe 496–7
 Gasparini, Quirino 495
 Gautier, Théophile 634
 Gaveaux, Pierre 23, 653

Gawain 72–4
 Gay, John 237–41, 300
Gazza Ladra, La 671–4
 Gazzaniga, Giuseppe 509
 Gebler 494
 Geliot, Michael 522n.
 Genée, Richard 478, 748, 751, 801
Genoveva 718–19
 Geoffroy-Dechaume, Antoine 628
 Gerhard, Roberto 241–3, 582n.
 Gershwin, George 243–7
 Gershwin, Ira 243
Gerusalemme liberata, La 269, 674
Gewaltige Hahnrei, Der 275–6
Gezeichneten, Die 988
 Ghelderode, Michel de 416
 Gherardini, Giovanni 671
 Ghiaurov, Nicolai 451
 Ghislanzoni, Antonio 898, 901, 907
 Giacosa, Giuseppe 595, 597
Gianni Schicchi 603, 604, 605–7
 Gieseke, K.L. 521
 Gilardoni, Domenico 190
 Gill, Dominic 417n.
 Gille, Philippe 183, 436
 Ginastera, Alberto 247–50, 248
Ginevra, Principessa di Scozia 318
Gioconda, La 566–8
Gioielli della Madonna, I 983–4
 Giordano, Umberto 250–4
Giorno di Regno, Un 851, 852–4
Giovanna d'Arco 862–4
Giovanna de Guzman 884
Giovanni Gallurese 481
Gipsies, The 613
Gipsy, The (ballet-pantomime) 18
Gipsy Baron, The 753–5
 Girdlestone, Cuthbert 615n., 620n.
Girl from Navarre, The 445–6
Girl of the Golden West, The 599–601
Giulio Cesare 305–8
Giustino 321–3
 Glass, Philip 2, 255–8
 Glazunov, Alexander 93, 94
 Glinka, Mikhail Ivanovich 178, 258–61
Gloriana 118–22
 Gluck, Christoph Willibald 108, 261–72, 331, 336, 543, 565

- Glückliche Hand, Die* 709
 Glyndebourne 68, 74, 105, 108, 152, 154, 275, 329, 344, 399, 492, 653, 866
 Godefroid, Philippe 464n.
 Goehr, Alexander 65, 469n., 488
 Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von 52, 146, 280, 442, 718, 818
 Goetz, Hermann 272–3
Gogo no eiko 354
 Gogol, Nikolai 340, 535, 636, 638, 639, 719, 720
 Gold, Didier 603
Golden Coach, The 550n.
Golden Cockerel, The 635, 649–52
 Goldman, Shalom 256
 Goldmark, Karl 273–4
 Goldoni, Carlo 332, 509, 565, 980
 Goldschmidt, Berthold 275–7
Golem, The 149–50
 Golisciani, Enrico 982, 983
 Gomes, Antônio Carlos 277–9
 Gondinet, Edmond 183
 Gonzaga, Francesco 487
Good Maid, The 565–6
 Goodman, Alice 2, 5
 Goodwin, J.C. 157
 Goossens, Eugene 96
 Gorrio, Tobia 566
 Goss, Robert 569n.
 Gossett, Philip 656n., 677
 Gotter, Friedrich Wilhelm 48
Götterdämmerung 921, 938, 940, 947–8
 Gounod, Charles François 279–85
Goyescas 285–6
 Gozzi, Carlo 143, 144, 340, 575, 576, 607
Gräfin Dubarry 478
 Graham, Colin 552
 Gramont, E. de 440
 Granados, Enrique 285–6
Grand Macabre, Le 416–18
Grandisimes, The 186
 Gray, Cecil 188
Great Friendship, The 586
Greek 841–2
Greek Passion, The 426–9
 Gregor, Hans 552
 Gregor, Joseph 757, 759, 783, 784, 786
 Grémont, Henri 434
 Grétry, André-Ernest-Modeste 286–8
 Griffiths, Paul 74, 180, 464n.
 Grimani, Cardinal Vincenzo 295
 Grimm, Ludwig and Wilhelm 555
Grisélidis 434, 447–8
 Grisi, Giulietta 685
 Grosser, Maurice 823
 Grout, Donald 54, 485n.
 Grünewald, Mathias 357, 361
 Guadagni, Gaetano 262, 263
Guarany, Il 277–9
 Gueymard, Pauline 903n.
 Gui, Vittorio 653
 Guillard, François 270
Guillaume Tell 653, 692–3
 Guimerà, Angel 9
 Guiraud, Ernest 80n., 81, 552
 Gunsbourg, Raoul 52, 450
Guntram 757–9
Gurrelieder 714
Gustave III 13, 895
 Gutiérrez, Antonio Garcia 881, 888
Guttil Jatak 917
Guy Mannering 88
Gwendoline 159
Gypsy 743, 744
 Gyrowetz, Adalbert 852
- H
- Haavikko, Paavo 698, 703
 Haffner, Carl 748
 Hagen, F.H. von der 717
 Hagen, Oskar 310, 325
Hagith 803
 Hahn, Reynaldo 282
 Halévy, Jacques François Fromental 75, 204, 289–92
 Halévy, Ludovic 76, 81, 543, 545, 546n., 547, 550, 748
Halka 479–81
 Hall, Peter 68
 Halpreich, Harry 227
 Hamilton, Iain 293–4
Hamlet 79, 284, 819–22
 Hammond, Tom 672, 772
Hand of Bridge, A 19
 Handel, George Frideric 261, 294–329, 393n.
Hans Heiling 421
Hänsel und Gretel 369–70
 Hanslick, Eduard 216, 936
Happy End 966, 970
Harlequin 142–3
Harmonie der Welt, Die (The Harmony of the World) 356, 357, 364–6
 Harnoncourt, Nikolaus 484
 Harris, W.H. 484
 Harrison, Tony 71
 Harsányi, Zsolt 401
 Harsent, David 72, 74
 Hartmann, Georges 442
Háry János 401–3
 Hassall, Christopher 220, 410n., 953
 Hauff, Wilhelm 346
 Hauptmann, Gerhart 220
Häusliche Krieg, Der 716–17
 Hawthorne, Nathaniel 846
 Haydn, Joseph 329–36
 Haym, Nicola Francesco 299, 301, 303, 304, 305, 308, 310
 Heartz, Daniel 500n.
 Hebbel, C.F. 718
 Heidegger, John James 297, 317, 325
 Heilbronn, Marie 436
Heimchen am Herd, Das 274
 Heine, Heinrich 925
 Heise, Peter 337
 Hell, Henri 571n.
 Hellman, Lillian 62, 63, 85
 Henneberg, Claus H. 632
Henry IV 368, 913
 Hensher, Philip 7
 Henze, Hans Werner 338–56, 803n., 841
Her Stepdaughter 372–6
 Herbert, A.P. 545
Heritage of Music 487n.
Hernani 192, 860
Hérodiade 434–6, 439
Heure Espagnole, L' 628–9
 Heyward, DuBose 243
 Heyworth, Peter 65, 349, 966n.
 Hill, Aaron 296, 297
Hin und zurück 474
 Hindemith, Paul 356–67, 474

Hippolyte et Aricie 615–17
Hippolytos 615
Histoire de Gérard de Nevers et de la belle et vertueuse Euryanthe, sa mie 959
Histoire d'un Soldat, L' 790, 791, 793–4
History of the Russian State 527
Hlas lesa 422
Hoban, Russell 74
Hoffmann, E.T.A. 357, 515
Hoffmann, François Benoit 166
Hoffmann, Tales of 81, 552–5
Hofmannsthal, Hugo von 757, 764, 767, 768, 770, 771, 773, 777, 779, 786
Holberg, Ludvig 540
Holst, Gustav 367–9
Homer, Louise 19
Honegger, Arthur 569
Hoppenot, Henri 474
Horne, Marilyn 685
Horseman, The 698–700
Hotel Golden Lily, The 686–7
Houppelande, La 603
Houseman, John 86
Howard, Patricia 133n.
Howarth, Elgar 65, 69, 72
Hubička 736–7
Hugh the Drover 845–6
Hughes, Langston 969
Hugo, Victor 192, 195, 858, 860, 878, 879, 897
Huguenots, Les 465, 466–8, 718
Huisman, Maurice 399
Human Voice, The 572–3
Humperdinck, Engelbert 369–71
Huon de Bordeaux 962
Huron, Le 286
Hutchings, Arthur 188
Huxley, Aldous 557

I

Ice Break, The 837–9
Idomeneo 494, 498–501
Idylls of the King 932
Igrok 573–5
Ildegonda 12

Illica, Luigi 150, 250, 251, 432, 433, 593, 595, 597
Immortal Hour, The 96–7
Impresario, The 504
Incontro Improvviso, L' 331–2
Incoronazione di Poppea, L' 484, 491–4
Indes Galantes, Les 617–20
Indigo 748
d'Indy, Vincent 159, 444, 484, 489, 491, 621
Infedeltà Delusa, L' (Infidelity Prevented) 330–1
Inferno, The 605, 614, 932
Inganno Felice, L' 658
Ingrams, Leonard 332
Instant Operas 474–6
Intermezzo 757, 775–7, 982
Iolanta 816–17
Iphigénie en Aulide (Iphigenia in Aulis) 261, 267–9
Iphigénie en Tauride (Iphigenia in Tauris) 261, 270–2
Iris 429, 432–3
Isabeau 429
Isaura, Mary 918
Isle-Adam, Villiers de l' 175
Isouard, Nicolo 670
Israel, Robert 256
Israelites in Egypt, The 687
Italiana in Algeri, L' (The Italian Girl in Algiers) 660–2
Ivan Susanin 258, 259–60
Ivan the Terrible (film) 586n.
Ivanhoé 681
Iwazskiewicz, J. 803

J

Jacob, W.W. 742
Jacobin, The 218–19
Jacobs, Arthur 615
Jakobín 218–19
James, Edward 969
James, Henry 122, 135
Janáček, Leoš 216, 318n., 372–97
Japanese influences 131–2, 135, 743
Jarnach, Philipp 148n.
Jasager, Der 966

jazz operas 243
Jean-Philippe Rameau, his Life and Work 615n., 620n.
Jení Pastorkyňa 372–6
Jenůfa 372–6
Jérusalem 856, 871–2
see also Gerusalemme liberata, La
Jewels of the Madonna, The 983–4
Jewess, The 289–92
Joan of Arc 862–4
Jockisch, Walter 338
Joffe, Judah A. 643n.
John, Nicholas 69n.
Johnson, Dr 325–6
Johnson, Samuel M. 255
Jolie Fille de Perth, La 76, 79–80
Jongleur de Notre Dame 448–50
Jonny spielt auf 243, 356
Jonson, Ben 757, 781
Joseph II, Emperor 515, 522
Journey to Rheims, The 681, 686–7
Jouy, V.J. Etienne de 670, 687, 692, 746
Juive, La 204, 289–92
Julien 163
Julietta 423–6
Juliette ou La Clé des Songes 423, 424
Julius Caesar 305–8
Junge Lord, Der 346–8
Jungfrau von Orleans, Die 862

K

Kabale und Liebe 874, 875
Kabelevsky, D.B. 586
Kabuki 743
Kaiser von Atlantis, Der 843–4
Kalbeck, Max 982
Kalevala 704, 706
Kallman, Chester 98, 344, 348, 349, 797, 798
Kamennyi Gost' 178
Kapuscinski, Ryzsard 706
Karamzin, Nikolai 527
Kareš, M. 972
Karneval in Rom, Der 748
Karr, Alphonse 592
Kashchey the Immortal 635
Katerina Ismailova 722–5

- Kátya Kabanová* 372, 382–7
 Kay, Hershy 62
 Kazantzakis, Nikos 426
 Keary, Charles F. 186
 Keates, Jonathan 313, 323n.
 Keller, Gottfried 188
 Kepler, Johannes 356, 357, 365
 Ketel, J. 760
Khovanshchina (The Khovansky Rising) 532–5
 Khrennikov, Tikhon 586
 Kianto, Ilmari 701
 Kien, Peter 843
 Kienzl, Wilhelm 398
 Kimbell, David 299n.
 Kind, Johann Friedrich 957
King Arthur 165–6, 612
King Goes Forth to France, The 703–4
King Harald's Saga 973
King Lear 632
King Listens, A 48
King and Marshal 337
King Priam 832–4
King Roger 803–4
King in Spite of Himself 159–62
King Stag 340–2
King of Ys, The 408–9
King's Children 370–1
 Kirstein, Lincoln 969
Kiss, The 736–7
Kitezh 635, 647–9
 Kivi, Aleksis 704
 Klaren, Georg C. 987, 988
 Kleiber, Erich 39, 275, 972
Kleine Mahagonny 966
 Kleist, Heinrich von 342
 Klemperer, Otto 966n., 987
 Klicpera, Václav Kliment 422, 423
Kluge, Die 555–6
 Knapp, John Merrill 304n.
Knight of the Rose, The 767–70
 Knopfler, Mark 841
Knot Garden, The 835–7
 Knowles, Christopher 255, 256n.
 Knussen, Oliver 399–400, 841
Knyaz Igor 93–6
Koanga 186–7
 Kobbé, Gustav 233, 754, 949
 Kochno, Boris 795, 969
 Kodály, Zoltán 401–3
 Koechlin, Charles 231
 Kokkonen, Joonas 403–5, 698
 Kokkonen, Lauri 403
 Kokoschka, Oskar 357
 Kolisch, Gertrude 709n.
König Hirsch 340–2
König Kandaules, Der 987
Königin von Saba, Die 273–4
Königskinder 370–1
 Korngold, Erich 406–7, 752n.
 Korngold, Julius 406
 Kotzebue, August von 420
 Koussevitzky, Serge 100, 579
 Kovařovic, Karel 216–17, 373, 379n., 738
 Krásnohorská, Eliška 736, 737, 739
 Kraus, Ernst 775n.
 Krauss, Clemens 783, 786, 788
Kreidenkreis, Der 987
 Křenek, Ernst 243, 356, 491
Kullervo 704–6
Kuningas Lahtee Ranskaan 703–4
 Kupelwieser, Josef 717
 Kupfer, Harry 645
 Kurz, Selma 987
 Kvapil, S.J. 220
- L
- Lachmann, Hedwig 761
 Lachner, Franz 166, 167
Lady Henriette, ou la Servante de Greenwich 233
Lady of the Lake, The 677–9
Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk 722–5
 Lainez, Manuel Mujica 247
Lakmé 183–5
 Lalli, Domenico 301
 Lalo, Édouard 408–9
 Laloy, Louis 693
 Lambert, John 841
 Lamm, Paul 535, 536
 Lange, Aloysia 504
Lange Weihnachtsmahl, Das 366–7
 Large, Brian 731n., 733
 Larson, Jack 826
Last Temptations, The 403–5, 698
 Latouche, John 62
 Lavery, Emmet 570
 Le Clerc de La Bruère, Charles-Antoine 621
 Le Fort, Gertrude von 570
 Le Lorrain, Jacques 451
 Le Prince de Beaumont, Mme J.M. 286
 Le Valois d'Orville, Andrien-Joseph 623
Lear 632–3
 Lee, Sophia 665
Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh and the Maiden Fevroniya, The 635, 647–9
Legend of Orpheus, The 484–7
Légende d'Ulenspiegel et de Lamme Goedzak 175
Leggenda di Sakùntala, La 608
 Legouvè, G.E. 169
 Legrenzi, Giovanni 321
 Legros, Joseph 262, 263
 Lehár, Franz 409–12
 Lemaire, Ferdinand 697
 Léna, M. 448
 Lenya, Lotte 966, 969
 Lenz, Jakob Michael 989, 990
 Léon, Victor 410, 755
 Leoncavallo, Ruggiero 412–16, 593
Leonora overtures 23, 25
 Leopold II, Emperor 171, 264n., 520
 Leppard, Raymond 152, 154, 484, 488n., 491, 492
 Lermontov, Mikhail Yurievich 696
 Leskov, N. 722
Leskov's Story 725
 Leterrier, E. 157
Let's Make an Opera 110–11
 Leuven, A. de 1
 Lev, Josef 726
 Levi, Hermann 173, 758
Libertine, The 509
Libuše 732–4
Liebe der Danae, Die 757, 786–7
 Liebeskind 522
Liebesverbot, Das 921–3
 Liebstockl, H. 983
Life of Rossini 659n., 675n., 684n.
Life for the Tsar, A 258, 259–60
 Ligeti, Györgi 416–18

Lighthouse, The 180–1
Lily of Killarney, The 19, 37–8
 Lind, Jenny 465
Linda di Chamounix 209–10
Lindberghflug, Der 966
 Linley, Thomas 287
 Lion, Ferdinand 357
 Liszt, Cosima 932, 951
 Liszt, Franz 172, 173, 697, 715,
 718, 926, 930, 932, 938, 961
Little Foxes, The 85
Little Mermaid 220
Little Sweep, The 110
Little Tragedy 642
 Lockspeiser, Edward 568
 Locle, Camille du 634, 901, 907
 Loewenberg, Dr. Alfred 612
Lohengrin 758, 921, 930–2, 959
Lombardi, I (The Lombards) 856–8, 871
Long Christmas Dinner, The 366–7
 Loppert, Max 269, 704
Lord Byron 826–7
 Lorenzi, Giambattista 333
 Lortzing, Albert 419–20
 Losch, Tilly 969
 Lothar, Rudolph 9
 Loti, Pierre 183
 Louise 162–5
Love of Danae 786–7
Love of Three Kings, The 481–3
Love for Three Oranges, The 575–8, 579
Lowlands, The 9–10
 Lucca, Francesco 872
Lucia di Lammermoor 198–200
Lucio Silla (Lucius Sulla) 495–6
Lucretia, The Rape of 105–7
Lucrezia Borgia 195–6
Lucy of Lammermoor 198–200
 Ludwig II, King of Bavaria 921, 922
Luisa Miller 874–5
 Lully, Jean-Baptiste 269
Lulu 7, 42–6, 521
 Lunacharsky, Anatol 720
Lustige Witwe, Die 409, 410–12
Lustigen Weiber von Windsor, Die
 537–8
Lysistrata 716
 Lytton, Bulwer 923, 924
Lyubov k trem Apelsinam 575–8

M

Mabinogion 949
 McAllister, Rita 586n.
Macbeth 275, 866–70
 Macdonald, Hugh 183n.
 McGegan, Nicholas 321
 Maciejewski, B.M. 803
 Macleod, Fiona 96
Madama Butterfly 592, 597–9
Maddalena 574, 579n.
 Maeterlinck, Maurice 181, 214
 Maffei, Andrea 607, 870
Magic Flute, The 520, 521–6
Magistrate, The 979–80
 Magnani, Anna 550n.
Magnificent Cuckold, The 275–6
 Mahā Bhārata 367
Mahagonny 474, 965–8, 970
 Mahler, Gustav 552, 761, 962,
 979, 987
Mahomet, ou Le fanatisme 679
Maid of Orleans, The 809–10
Maid of Palaiseau, The 672
Maid of Pskov 635
 Mair, Craig 180
Maiskaya Noch 636–7
Makropulos Affair, The 318n.,
 372, 381n., 390–4
Mala Vita 250
 Malefille, P.J.F. 734
 Malherbe, Charles 76
 Malibran, Maria 29n., 30, 685
 Malouf, David 453, 454
 Malipiero, Gian Francesco 484,
 491
Mamelles de Tirésias, Les 568–70
Mann ist Mann 966
 Mann, Thomas 138
 Mann, William 227, 342, 557n.
Manon 434, 436–9
Manon Lescaut 13, 338, 591,
 592, 593–4
Manticore, The 455
Manuel Venegas 979
 Manzo 312
Manzoni Requiem 909
Maometto II 679–80, 682
 Marchi, A. 320
 Marcolini, Marietta 654
Maria Golovin 455
Maria Stuarda 196–8

Mariage de Loti, Le 183
Mariages samnites, Les 286
Marienleben, Das 357n.
Marina 12–13
Marino Faliero 204
Maritana 19, 952–3
 Marmaduke-Browne, Rev. 516n.
 Marmontel, Jean-François 286,
 287
Marriage 639
Marriage of Figaro, The 504–9
 Marschner, Heinrich August
 421–2
Martha 233–5
 Martin, Frank 932
 Martinelli, Giovanni 250
 Martinoty, Jean-Louis 615
 Martinů, Bohuslav 422–9
Martyrs, Les 204
Maruxa 918
Mary Stuart 196–8
 Mascagni, Pietro 429–34, 567, 985
Maschere, Le 429, 433–4
Mask of Orpheus, The 67–71
Maskarade 540–2
Masked Ball, A 895–7
Maskers, The 433–4
Masnadieri, I 870–1
Masquerade 540–2
 Massenet, Jules 434–53, 594,
 818
 Massine, Leonid 793
Master Peter's Puppet Show 230–1
Mastersingers of Nuremberg, The 921, 932, 935–8
Mathilde 682
Mathis der Mahler 356, 357, 359,
 360–4
Matilde de Shabran 682
Matrimonio Segreto, Il 170–2
 Maturin, Rev. R.C. 25
 Maupassant, Guy de 107
Mavra 791, 794, 795–6
Maximilien 473
 Maxwell Davies, Peter see Davies,
 Peter Maxwell
May Night, A 635, 636–7, 639
 Mayreder-Obermayer, Rosa 979
 Mazarin, Cardinal 152
Mazeppa 810–12
 Mazzola, Caterino 519, 520, 521

- Meade, G. 455
 Meale, Richard 453–4
Measure for Measure 921, 922
Médecin Malgré Lui, Le 279–80
Médée (Medea) 166–8
Medium, The 455, 456–7
Mefistofele 90–1
 Méhul, Etienne-Nicolas 746
 Meilhac, Henri 76, 81, 410, 436, 545, 546n., 547, 550, 748
Meistersinger von Nürnberg, Die 921, 932, 935–8
 Melba, Nellie 685
 Mellers, Wilfrid 87n., 88n., 133, 828
Mélusine 220, 632
 Melville, Herman 111
Memoirs of Herr von Schnabelewopski 925
Men Like Gods 839
 Menasci, G. 429
 Mendelson, Mira 582, 584, 585, 586n.
 Mendès, Catulle 159
 Menotti, Gian Carlo 455–63
Mephistopheles 90–1
Merchant of Venice, The 55
Mercure de France 617
 Merelli, Bartolomeo 851, 852, 863
 Merikanto, Aare 698
 Mérimée, Prosper 81, 550
 Merle, J.T. 419
 Merrill, John 314
Merry Monarch, The 157
Merry Widow, The 409, 410–12
Merry Wives of Windsor, The 537–8, 913
 Méry, G. 901
 Meschke, Michael 416
 Messenger, André 159
 Messiaen, Olivier 463–5
Metamorphoses IX and X 335
 Metastasio, Pietro 313, 314, 497, 498, 519, 520, 521
 Mey, Lev 643
 Meyerbeer, Giacomo 277, 465–73, 718, 901
 Meyerfeld, Max 987
 Meyerhold, Vsevolod 576
 Michel, André 579
Midsummer Marriage, The 828–32
Midsummer Night's Dream, A 110, 128–31, 612
Mignon 818–19
 Milhaud, Darius 473–7, 569, 690
 Millar Craig, D. 489
 Millet, Luis 918
 Milliet, P. 229, 434, 442
 Millöcker, Carl 478–9
Mimi Pinson, scene della vita di Bohème 413–14
 Minato, Nicola 325
 Minotis, Alexis 168
 Miolan-Carvalho, Mme 436
Mireille 282–3
Mireio 282
 Mishima, Yukio 354
 Mistral, Frédéric 282
Mithridates, King of Pontus 495
 Mitousoff, S. 791
Mitridate, Re di Ponto 495
Mlada 635, 639
 modern opera, beginnings 484
Mohammed II 679–80, 682
Moïse et Pharaon 687–90
 Molière 279, 509, 757, 770, 771
 Molina, Tirso de 509
 Molli, Piero 190n.
Monastery, The 88
Mondo della Luna, Il 332–3
 Monelle, Raymond 615n.
 Moniuszko, Stanisław 479–81
 Montagnana, Antonio 315
 Monte, Toti dal 250
 Montemezzi, Italo 481–3
 Monteux, Pierre 579n.
 Monteverdi, Claudio 152, 154, 483–94, 555
Monteverdi (Schrade) 487n.
 Moody, John and Mary 873
 Mór, Jókai 753
 Morand, Eugène 447
Mörder, Hoffnung der Frauen 356, 357
 Morse, W. 157
 Mosca, L. 660
Mosè in Egitto (Moses in Egypt) 681, 687–90
 Mosenthal, Hermann von 273, 537
Moses und Aron (Moses and Aaron) 711–13
Mother of Us All, The 824–6
Motsart i Sal'yeri 642–3
 Motte Fouqué, Friedrich de la 220, 717
 Mottl, Felix 172, 173, 717
Movements 791
Mozart: his Character, his Work 502
Mozart and Salieri 642–3
 Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus 494–526
Much Ado about Nothing 58, 59, 60
Muette de Portici, La 13–15
 Müller, Adolf 755
 Müller, Wenzel 522
 Muradely, Vano 586
 Murger, Henry 413, 414
 Murray, David 707
Music and Musical Life in Soviet Russia 1917–1970 586n.
 Musset, Alfred de 80
 Mussorgsky, Modest Petrovich 399, 527–36, 635
My Uncle John 465
Mystère, Le 447
Mystic Branch, The 465

N

 Nabokov, Nicolas 11
Nabucco 854–6
Nacht in Venedig, Eine 751–3
 Najac, Emile de 159
 Napoleon III, Emperor 543, 546n.
 Nápravník, Eduard 574
 Nash, Heddle 79n.
Navarraise, La 445–6
 Neher, Casper 965, 969
 Nejedly, Zdeněk 216
 Nemirovich-Danchenko, Vladimir Ivanovich 613
 Nepomuk, Johann 715
Nero 696
Nerone 91, 92–3, 429
 Nerval, Gérard de 52
Neue Zeitschrift für Musik 480
Neues vom Tage 356, 359–60
 Neveux, Georges 422, 423, 424
New Year 839–41

- Newman, Ernest 266, 759, 928, 932, 935
News of the Day 356, 359–60
Nibelung's Ring, The 921, 938–40
Nicolai, Otto 537–8, 854
Nielsen, Carl August 538–42
Night at the Chinese Opera, A 974–6
Night in Venice, A 751–3
Nightingale, The 790, 791–3
Nijinska, Bronislava 794
Nikisch, Arthur 740
Ninetta 671
Nino 854
Nixon in China 2–5
No for an Answer 86
Noces, Les 791, 794
Noch'pered rozhdestvom 638–40
Noh play 131–2, 135
Norma 30, 31–4, 192
Norrington, Roger 484, 491
Nose, The (Nos) 719–22
Nourrit, Adolphe 204, 289
Novis, Matteo 304
Noye's Fludde 110, 127–8
Nozzari, Andrea 669, 687
Nozze di Figaro, Le 504–9, 757
Nusch-Nuschi, Das 356, 357
Nutcracker (ballet) 817
Nyman, Michael 67
- O
- O Rosalinde (film)* 748
Oberon 962–5
Oberto, Conte di San Bonifacio (Oberto, Count of San Bonifacio) 851–2
Obey, André 105
Obrucheniye v monastire 582–4
Oca del Cairo, L' 505
Occasion Fait le Larron, L' 656
Occasion Makes the Thief, The 656–7
Occasione Fa il Ladro, L' 656–7, 658
Oedipe (Oedipus) 227–8
Oedipus Rex (Oedipus the King) 791, 796–7
Oeser, Fritz 81
- Offenbach, Jacques 543–55, 657
Ogdon, John 65
Ognenniy Angel 579–82
Oliva, Domenico 593
Opera 615n., 675n.
opera buffa 170, 457, 494, 497, 504, 515, 543, 565, 568, 653, 852
opéra comique 15, 81, 159, 408
Opera of the Nobility 317, 318, 322, 325 opera seria 348, 495–6, 499, 521, 652
Opéras-Minutes 474–6
Orefice, Giacomo 484
Orestie, L' 473
Orfeo ed Euridice (Gluck) 108, 261–3, 272
Orfeo ed Euridice (Haydn) 335–6
Orfeo, La Favola d' 484–7, 555
Orff, Carl 484, 555–6
Orlando 316–18
Orleanskaya Dyeva 809–10
d'Ormeville, Carlo 277
Ormino, L' 152–3
Orphée aux Enfers 543–5
Orpheus and Eurydice (Gluck) 108, 261–3, 272
Orpheus and Eurydice (Haydn) 335–6
Orpheus, The Legend of 484–7, 555
Orpheus, The Mask of 67–71
Orpheus in the Underworld 543–5
Ostrovsky, Alexander Nikolaievich 382
Ostrovsky, N. 637
Osud (Fate) 372, 376–8
Otava, Zdeněk 381n.
Otello (Ponchielli) 568
Otello (Rossini) 669–70
Otello (Verdi) 888, 908–12
Ottone, Re di Germania (Otho, King of Germany) 303–4
Our Lady's Tumbler 448–50
Ourry, E.T.M. 657
Ovid 153, 335
Owen Wingrave 135–7
Oxenford, J. 37
- P
- Pacific Overtures* 743–4
Pacini, Giovanni 682
Padmâvatî 693–5
Page, Andrew 186
Pagliacci 412–13
Pagliughi, Lina 250
Paisiello, Giovanni 667
Palace, The (Palatsi) 706–7
Palestrina 562–5
Pallavicino, Stefano Benedetto 303
Pamela 565
Panambi (ballet) 247
Pappenheim, Marie 707
Pardon de Ploërmel, Le 470–1
Parergon 791
Paride ed Elena (Paris and Helen) 261, 266–7
Parker, Dorothy 62
Parsifal 758, 949–51
Partenope 312–13
Pasetti, Otto 969
Pasta, Giuditta 30, 31, 34, 685, 686
Pasteur, Le 875, 876
Patineurs, Les (ballet) 470n.
Paul Bunyan 98–100
Paulik, Anton 751, 753n.
Paulini, Béla 401
Paumgartner, Bernhard 519
Pauvre Matelot, Le 473–4
Peace Day 783–4
Pearl Fishers, The 75, 76, 77–8
Pears, Peter 98, 100, 111, 128, 132, 133, 134, 138
Pêcheurs de Perles, Les 75, 76, 77–8
Pedrell, Felipe 241
Pelléas et Mélisande 181–3
Pellegrin, Abbé Simon Joseph 615, 621
Penderecki, Krzysztof 557–60
Pénélope 231–2
Pepoli, Count 36
Pepusch, Johann Christoph 237–41
Percival le Galois 949
Perfect Fool, The 367
Pergolesi, Giovanni 561–2
Peri, Jacopo 484

- Périchole, La* 550–2
 Périer, Jean 181n.
 Perinet, Joachim 522
 Periquet, Fernando 285
 Perrault, Charles 446
Pérsephone 791
 Perti, Giacomo Antonio 310, 318
Peter Grimes 100–4, 585n.
Peter the Shipwright 419
 Petrovskaya, Nina 580n.
 Pfitzner, Hans 421, 562–5
Phaedra 615
Phantom Sound, The 714–15
Phèdre 615
Philosopher's Soul, The 335–6
Philtre, Le 194
 Piatti, Alfredo 870
 Piave, Francesco Maria 858, 861, 866, 867, 872, 875, 876, 878, 883, 888, 893, 897, 898
 Piazza, Antonio 851
 Piccinni, Niccolò 261, 269, 565–6
Piccolo Marat, Il 429
Pietra del Paragone, La 654–5
Pietro l'Eremita 687
Pikovaya Dama 813–16
Pilgrimage of Ploërmel, The 470–1
Pilgrim's Progress, The 848–50
 Piovene, Agostino 308
 Piper, Myfanwy 122, 135, 138
Pique Dame 813–16
Pirata, Il (The Pirate) 25–7
 Pitt, Charles 615n.
 Pizzolato, G. 980
 Planard, François-Antoine-Eugène de 653
 Planché, James Robinson 962
Platée ou Junon Jalouse 623
Platée (Plataea) 623–5
 Playford, John 368
 Plomer, William 118, 132, 133, 134
Plumber's Gift, The 84
Poacher, The 419, 420
Poisoned Kiss, The 846
 Pognon, Princesse Edmond de 230, 794
Poliuto 204–5
 Pollard, Alfred W. 127
Poltava 810
Polyeucte 204
 Ponchielli, Amilcare 566–8
 Ponte, Lorenzo da 504, 505, 509, 510, 515
Poor Sailor, The 473–4
 Pope, Alexander 328
Popular Tales of the West Highlands 976
Porgy and Bess 243–7
Poro, Re dell'Indie 313–14
 Porpora, Nicola 314
 Porter, Andrew 21, 331, 338n., 660, 665n., 863, 901n., 903n.
Porus, King of India 313–14
Postcard from Morocco 11
Postillon de Longjumeau, Le 1–2
 Poulenc, Francis 159, 568–73
 Pountney, David 222, 377, 639
Powder Her Face 7–8
 Pradon, Jacques 308
 Preis, A. 722
 Preissová, Gabriella 372
 Prémare, Father Joseph 976
Pretendenti Delusi, I 76
Prétendu par hasard, Le 656
 Prévost, Abbé 436, 593
 Price, Curtis 324
Prigioniero, Il 175–6
Přihody Lišky Bystroušky 387–90
Prima Donna's Mother is a Drag, The 190
Prima la Musica poi le Parole 504
 Prince, Hal 743
 Prince, Harold 62
Prince Igor 93–6
Prince of the Pagodas, The (ballet) 131
Prinz von Homburg, Der (The Prince of Homburg) 342–3
Prinzessin auf der Erbse, Die 474
Prisoner, The 175–6
 Prividali, Luigi 76, 656
 Procházka, F.S. 379
Prodaná Nevěsta 727–30
Prodigal Son, The 131, 134–5
 Prokofiev, Sergei Sergeyevich 573–91, 635
Promessi Sposi, I 566
Prométhée 231
Prophète, Le (The Prophet) 468–70
Proscritto, Il 860
 Pruslin, Stephen 65, 66
 Puccini, Giacomo 414, 567, 591–610
Pullman Car Hiawatha 367
Punainen viiva 701–2
Punch and Judy 65–7
 Purcell, Henry 610–12
Puritani, I (The Puritans) 36–7
 Pushkin, Alexander 178, 259, 527, 613, 642, 643, 645, 649, 795, 805, 810, 813

Q

Quattro Rusteghi, I 980–2
Queen of Sheba, The 273–4
Queen of Spades, The 805, 813–16
Quiet Place, A 61–2
 Quinault, Philippe 269, 299

R

 Rachmaninov, Sergey Vasilyevich 613–14
 Racine, Jean Baptiste 495, 615, 675
Radamisto 301–3
 Radice, William 916
 radio, operas written for 98, 422
 Raimondi, Ruggero 451
Rake's Progress, The 790, 791, 797–801
 Rameau, Jean-Philippe 615–28, 697
 Ramuz, C.F. 793, 794
Rapaccini's Daughter 846
Rape of Europa, The 474–5
Rape of Lucretia, The 105–7
Rapsodie Espagnole 628
Ratsumies 698–700
Räuber, Die 870
 Ravel, Maurice 160, 628–32
Re in Ascolto, Un 48–50
Re Cervo, Il 340–2
Re Pastore, Il 497–8
Recess, The 665
Řecké Pasije 426–9
Red Line, The 701–2
 Redlich, Hans 485, 935
Regina 85–8
 Reich, Willi 40

- Reichert, H. 601
 Reimann, Aribert 632–3
 Reinhardt, Max 144, 771
 Reinick, Robert 718
 Renard 791, 794–5
Rencontre Imprévue, La 331
 Rennert, Günther 654
 Renoir, Jean 550n.
Requiem 520
 Respighi, Ottorino 484
Retablo de Maese Pedro, El 230–1
Réveillon, Le 748
Revue des Deux Mondes 192
 Reyer, Ernest 634–5
Rheingold, Das (The Rhine Gold)
 938, 939, 940, 941–2
 Rice, Elmer 969, 970
Richard Coeur-de-Lion (Richard the Lionheart) 287–8
 Richardson, Samuel 565
 Richardt, Christian 337
 Ricordi, Giulio 592, 607–8, 909
 Ricordi, Tito 901n., 985
 Riddell, Richard 256
Riders to the Sea 847–8
 Rienzi 921, 923–5, 926
Rigoletto 878–81, 884
 Rilke, Rainer Maria 357n.
 Rimsky-Korsakov, Nikolai
 Andreyevich 93, 94, 527,
 532, 533, 635–52, 790, 792
Rinaldo 296–9
Ring des Nibelungen, Der 921,
 938–48
 Rinuccini, Ottavio 487, 488
Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny 965–8, 970
Ritorno d'Ulisse in Patria, Il 484,
 489–91
 Ritter, Alexander 421, 757, 758
 Rivas, Duke of 897, 898
 Robbins Landon, H.C. 332, 334n.
Robert le Diable (Robert the Devil)
 465–6
Robert of Normandy 465
Roberto Devereux (Robert Devereux) 202–4
Robinson Crusoe 549–50
Rodelinda 310–12
 Rodenbach, Georges 406
Roi Arthus, Le 165–6
Roi de Lahore, Le 435, 439
Roi d'Ys, Le 408–9
Roi l'a dit, Le 183
Roi Malgré Lui, Le 159–62
Roi s'amuse, Le 878
 Roller, Alfred 962
 Romanelli, Luigi 654
 Romani, Felice 25, 27, 28, 30,
 31, 34, 192, 194, 195, 662,
 852
Roméo et Juliette 283–5
Romeo and Juliet 28, 283, 811
 Romero, Frederico 918
Rondine, La 601–3
 Ronsard, Pierre de 789n.
Rosamond 237
Rosamunde 715
 Rosen, Jelka 186
Rosenkavalier, Der 757, 767–70,
 771
Rosier de Madame Husson, Le 107
 Rosmer, Ernst 370
 Rossi, Gaetano 209, 658, 685
 Rossi, Giacomo 296, 297
Rossignol, Le 652, 791–3
 Rossini, Gioacchino Antonio 189,
 652–93
 Rouché, Jacques 694
 Roullet, Leblanc du 266, 267
 Roussel, Albert 422, 693–5
 Royal Academy of Music 318,
 325
 Royer, Alphonse 206, 871
 Rozen, G.F. 259
 Rubini, Giovanni Battista 30, 36
 Rubinstein, Anton 696
 Rudkin, David 917
 Ruffini, Giovanni 210
 Rumyantsev, Pavel 645n.
 Ruotsalainen, Paavo 403
Rusalka 178, 216, 220–2
Ruse et Folie 657
Russlan and Lyudmila 258, 260–1
Rustic Chivalry 429–31
Ruy Blas 897
- S
- Sabina, Karel 726, 727
 Sacchini, Antonio 565
 Sackville-West, Edward 104
 Sadie, Stanley 500n., 615
Sadko 635, 636, 640–2
 Sadler, Graham 623
Saint of Bleecker Street, The 455,
 462–3
Saint François d'Assise 463–5
Saint Louis, roi de France 473
Saint Nicholas 127, 131
 St Polyeuctus 204
 Saint-Georges, J.H. Vernoy de 79,
 205, 233
 Saint-Saëns, Camille 697–8
Salammbô 634
 Salieri, Antonio 504, 565, 715
 Sallinen, Aulis 698–707
Salome 757, 761–4, 803, 987
 Salvi, Antonio 310, 318, 323
 Samosud, Samuil Abramovich
 586
Samson et Dalila (Samson and Delilah) 697–8
 Samuel, Rhian 74
Sancta Susanna 356, 357
 Sanderson, Sybil 436, 440, 442, 444
Sandrina's Secret 496–7
 Santley, Charles 280, 281
 Sardou, Victorien 253, 595
Sarema 986, 987
Šárka 372
 Satie, Erik 569
Satyagraha 257
 Sauguet, Henri 473
Saul 325
Saul and David (Saul og David)
 538–40
Sāvitri 367–8
 Savoia, Margherita di 487
 Sawallisch, Wolfgang 990
Scala di Seta, La 653–4, 658
 Scala, Piccola 662
 Scalvini, Antonio Enrico 277
Scandals 243
Scènes de la vie de Bohème 413,
 414
 Schalk, Franz 773
Schatzgräber, Der 715
Schauspieldirektor, Der 504, 505
*Scheik von Alexandria und seine
 Sklaven, Der* 346
 Schiffer, Marcellus 356, 359
 Schikaneder, Emanuel Johann
 521, 522, 526

- Schiller, Johann Christoph
Friedrich von 196–7, 607,
692, 809, 862, 870, 874,
875, 901, 907
- Schindler-Mahler, Alma 988
- Schipa, Tito 15
- Schmedes, Erich 987
- Schmidt, Giovanni Federico 665, 674
- Schneider, Hortense 545, 547,
550
- Schnitzer, Ignatz 753
- Schober, Franz von 715, 716
- Schoenberg, Arnold 40, 43, 86,
148n., 241, 359, 707–13,
714, 843, 987
- Schöne Galathee, Die* 801
- School for Fathers, The* 980–2
- Schott, Franz 936
- Schott, Paul 406
- Schrade, Leo 487n.
- Schreker, Franz 275, 711n., 714–15, 988
- Schröder-Devrient, Wilhelmina
924, 925, 928
- Schubert, Franz 715–18
- Schuh, Oscar Fritz 990
- Schuh, Willi 758n.
- Schuller, Gunther 476
- Schumann, Robert 480, 718–19,
961n.
- Schumann-Heink, Ernestine 764
- Schwanda the Bagpiper* 972–3
- Schwarz, Boris 586n.
- Schweigsame Frau, Die* 757,
781–3
- Scott, Sir Walter 79, 88, 198,
421, 677, 681
- Scribe, Augustin Eugène 1, 13,
15, 17, 88, 169, 194, 204,
212, 289, 465, 466, 468,
471, 656, 690, 884, 885,
887, 895
- Second Mrs Kong, The* 74–5
- Secret, The* 737–9
- Secret Marriage, The* 170–2
- Sedaine, Michel-Jean 287
- Segreto di Susanna, Il* 982–3
- Seidl, Arthur 758n.
- Sellers, Peter 2, 5
- Semele* 327–9
- Semiramide (Semiramis)* 685–6
- Sendak, Maurice 399
- Seneca, L.A. 615
- Senesino 315, 317, 318
- Sermon, A Narrative, A Prayer, A* 791
- Serse (Xerxes)* 312, 325–7
- Serva Padrona, La* 561–2
- Seven Deadly Sins, The* 966, 969, 970
- Shadwell, Thomas 509
- Shakespeare, William
Antony and Cleopatra 19, 20
Hamlet 79, 284, 819
Henry IV 368, 913
King Lear 632
Macbeth 275, 867
Measure for Measure 921, 922
Merchant of Venice, The 55
Merry Wives of Windsor, The 537
Midsummer Night's Dream, A
110, 128, 612, 962
Much Ado about Nothing 58,
59, 60
Othello 568, 669–70, 888,
908–12
Romeo and Juliet 28, 283, 811
Taming of the Shrew, The 272
Twelfth Night 736
Winter's Tale, A 274
- Sharp, Cecil 369
- Sharp, Evelyn 846
- Shaw, Guillermo Fernández 229, 918
- Shawe-Taylor, Desmond 22, 226,
805
- Shebalin, Vissarion Yakovlevich
535
- Shelley, Percy Bysshe 276
- Sheridan, Richard Brinsley 241, 582
- Shield, William 287
- Shilovsky, K.S. 805
- Short History of Opera, A* 485n.
- Short Life, The* 229–30
- Shostakovich, Dmitri Dmitrevich
533, 719–25
- Sicilian Vespers, The* 884–8
- Sieben Todsünden, Die* 966, 969, 970
- Siege of Calais, The* 201–2
- Siège de Corinthe, Le* 679, 680–2
- Siegfrieds Tod (Siegfried's Death)*
932, 938, 940, 944–7
- Signor Bruschino, Il Figlio per*
Azzardo (His Son by Chance)
657–8
- Sigurd 634–5
- Silent Woman, The* 781–3
- Silken Ladder, The* 653–4
- Silvestre, Armand 447
- Simon Boccanegra* 888–93
- Simoni, Renato 607
- Singspiel form* 23, 421, 494, 497, 502, 966
- Sister Angelica* 604–5
- Sita 367
- Skelton, Geoffrey 367
- Slater, Montagu 100
- Sleeping Beauty, The* 795
- Sleepwalker, The* 30–1
- Sly* 980
- Smetana* 733n.
- Smetana, Bedřich* 216, 382n., 423, 725–40
- Smirnov, Dmitri 241
- Smith, Patrick J. 56n.
- Smyth, Dame Ethel 740–2
- Snatched by the Gods* 916–17
- Snegurochka* 637–8
- Snow Maiden, The* 635, 637–8, 639
- Sografi, Antonio Simone 190
- Soldaten, Die (The Soldiers)*
989–94
- Soldier's Tale, A* 793–4
- Solera, Temistocle 12, 851, 854,
856, 862, 865
- Sombrero de tres picos, El* 979
- Somma, Antonio 895
- Sondheim, Stephen 62, 743–6
- Sonnambula, La* 30–1
- Sonnleithner, Georg Friedrich 23
- Sonnleithner, Joseph 23
- Sophocles 227, 764, 796
- Sorabji, Kaikhosru 803
- Sorochinskaya Yarmarka* 535–6
- Sotheby, William 962
- Soumet, Alexandre 680
- Soumet, L.A. 31
- Sousa, J.P. 157
- Souvestre, Emile 875, 876
- Spaak, Paul 573
- Spanish Hour, The* 628–9

- Spindler, Erwin 732
 Spontini, Gasparo 746–7, 924
Sposo Deluso, Lo 505
Sprechstimme form 40, 42
 Stadler, Anton 521n.
 Stampiglia, Silvio 312, 325
 Stanislavsky, Constantin 643, 645
Star, The 157–8
 Stassov, Vladimir 93, 532, 637
 Stefan, Paul 874n.
 Stein, Erwin 712n.
 Stein, Gertrude 822, 824, 826
 Stein, Leo 410, 755
 Stendhal 657, 659, 660, 666, 672, 675n., 683, 684, 688, 689
 Stephanie, Gottlieb 502
 Stephanie, Gottlieb, the Younger 504
 Sterbini, Cesare 666
 Stewart, Michael 62
Stiffelio 875–8, 884, 894
Stone Guest, The 178, 642
 Stösslová, Kamila 372, 383, 395
Strandrecht 740
Straniera, La (The Stranger) 27
 Stransky, Joseph 775n.
 Strauss, Johann, the Younger 748–57
 Strauss, Richard 270, 272, 498, 757–90
 Stravinsky, Igor Fyodorovich 635, 652, 790–801
Street Scene 969–72
 Strepponi, Giuseppina 854, 884
 Strettel, A. 740
 Striggio, Alessandro 484
Strolling Players 412–13
 Stuart, R.L. 491
 Suardon, P. 431
 Suk, Josef 422
Sumidagawa 132
Sunken Bell, The 220
Suor Angelica 604–5
 Supervia, Conchita 653
 Suppé, Franz von 478, 801–3
Supposed Garden-Girl, The 496–7
Susannah 235–6
Susanna's Secret 982–3
 Süßmayer, Franz 520
 Sutcliffe, James Helme 990n.
- Sutherland, Joan 320, 442, 685
Švanda Dudák 972–3
 Svoboda, Josef 885
Swallow, The 601–3
 Swarenski, Hans 581n.
Sweeney Todd 744–6
 Swift, Jonathan 237
 Synesius, Bishop 127n.
 Synge, J.M. 847, 848
Szenen aus Goethes Faust 718
 Szymanowski, Karol 803–4
- T
- Tabarro, Il* 603–4
 Tagore, Rabinranath 916
 Tailleferre, Germaine 569
Tajemství 737–9
Tales of Hoffmann, The 81, 552–5
 Talich, Vaclav 388
 Tamberlik, Enrico 897
Tamburlaine 308–10
Tamerlano 308–10
Taming of the Shrew, The 272–3
Tancredi 658–60
Tannhäuser und der Sängerkrieg auf Wartburg (Tannhäuser and the Song Contest on the Wartburg) 928–30
 Targioni-Tozzetti, G. 429
 Taruskin, Richard 580n.
 Tasso, Torquato 269, 488, 607
 Tate, Nahum 610
 Tauber, Richard 410
Taverner 179–80
 Tchaikovsky, Modest 614, 813, 816
 Tchaikovsky, Peter Ilyich 639, 696, 805–16
 Teibler, H. 980
 Telemann, Georg Philipp 308
Telephone, The 457–8
 television, operas written for 135, 422, 461
Tempest, The 612
Templer und die Jüdin, Der 421
 Tennyson, Alfred Lord 932
Teofano 303
 Ternina, Milka 986
Teseo 299–300
 Tešnohlídek, R. 387
- Teufel von Loudun, Die* 557–60
Teufels Lustschloss, Des 715
Thaïs 440, 444–5
Thamos, König in Egypten 494
Thésée 299
Theseus Redeemed 475–6
Thieving Magpie, The 671–4
 Thomas, Ambroise 79, 284, 818–22
 Thomson, Virgil 822–7
Three-Cornered Hat, The 979
 Tichatschek, Joseph 924
 Tieck, Ludwig 977, 978
Tiefland 9–10
 Tierck, L. 718
Tierra Baixa 9
 Tietjens, Teresa 168
 Tippett, Sir Michael 827–41
Tirsi e Clori (ballet-opera) 484
 Toch, Ernst 474
 Tolstoy, Leo 293, 584, 591
Torture par l'espérance, La 175
Tosca 595–7
 Toscanini, Arturo 91, 150, 250, 263, 413, 599, 607, 608
Tote Stadt, Die 406–7
 Tottola, Andrea Leone 675, 677, 683, 687
Touchstone, The 654–5
Toussaint 84–5
 Toye, Francis 672, 688, 885, 897
 Tracey, Edmund 552
Travelling Preacher, The 398
Traviata, La 881, 883–4
 Treichel, Hans-Ulrich 354, 355
Tristan und Isolde 921, 932–5
Trittico, Il 592, 603
Troilus and Cressida 953–5
Trojans, The 53–8
Trojans at Carthage, The 54
Trouble in Tahiti 61
Trovatore, Il (The Troubadour) 881–3
 Trowell, Brian 308
Troyens, Les (The Trojans) 53–8
Troyens à Carthage, Les 54
 Troyes, Chrétien de 949
True Story, The 46–8
Tsar and Carpenter 419–20
Tsar Saltan 635, 645–7
 Tsarouchis, John 168
Tsar's Bride, The (Tsarskaya

Nevesta) 635, 643–5
 Tucker, Norman 385n., 391n.
Tudor Church Music 179
 Tunick, Jonathan 743, 744
Turandot 143–5, 592, 607–10
Turco in Italia, Il (The Turk in Italy)
 662–5
Turn of the Screw, The 110, 122–7
 Turnage, Mark-Anthony 841–2
Tuttifantchen 357
Twelfth Night 736
Twilight of the Gods, The 938,
 947–8
Two Foscari, The 861–2
Two Widows, The 734–6
 Tyumenev, I. 643

U

Ulisse 177
 Ullmann, Viktor 843–4
 Ulrich 272
Ulysses' Return Home 484,
 489–91
Unconventional Rehearsal, An 190
Under the Greenwood Tree 67
Undine 220
Unexpected Encounter, The 331–2
Unicorn, The 455
Upstage and Downstage 190
 Ursuleac, Viorica 783, 786, 788
 Urválová, Kamila 377

V

Vaccai, Nicola 28
 Vaëz, Gustav 206, 871
Valkyrie, The 932, 938, 940,
 942–4
 Valle, Cesare della, duca di
 Ventignano 679
Vampyr, Der (The Vampire) 421–2
Vanessa 19–20
Vanishing Bridegroom, The 976–7
 Vanloo, A. 157
 Varesco, Abbé 498
 Vaughan Williams, Ralph
 845–50
 Vaughan Williams, Ursula 846
Věc Makropulos 390–4

Vechten, Carl van 643n.
 Vega, Lope de 918
Venus und Adonis 355–6
Vêpres Siciliennes, Les 884–8
Vera Storia, La 46–8
Verdi: The Man in His Letters
 874n.
 Verdi, Giuseppe 189, 275, 279,
 565, 851–916
 Verga, Giovanni 429
 Vergil 53, 55
verismo 429, 430–1, 445, 983
 Verlaine, Paul 156
 Vernoy de Saint-Georges, J.H. 79,
 205, 233
Verratene Meer, Das 354–5
Verschworenen, Die 716–17
Vespri Siciliani, I 884–8
Vestale, La (The Vestal Virgin)
 746–7
Viaggio a Rheims, Il 681, 686–7, 690
 Viardot, Pauline 697
Vida Breve, La 229–30
Vie du Poète, La 163
Viennese Spirit, The 755–7
 Viglan, Marc 336
Viimeiset kiusaukset 403–5
Village Romeo and Juliet, A 188–9
Villi, Le 592–3, 594
Vin Herbé, Le 932
 Vinci, Leonardo 313
Viol de Lucrece, Le 105
Viola 736
 Vir, Param 916–18
Virtue Rewarded 565
 Visconti, Luchino 663
 Vishnevskaya, Galina 643
Visit of the Old Lady, The 225–7
 Viskovatov, Pavel 696
Viva la Mamma 190
 Vivaldi, Antonio 321
 Vives, Amadeo 918–20
 Vlad, Roman 175, 395
 Vogl, Johann Michael 715, 717
Voice of the Forest, The 422
Voix Humaine, La 572–3
 Voltaire 62, 64, 615, 658, 679,
 685, 864, 976
Von Heute auf Morgen 359,
 709–11
 Voss 453–4

W

Wachtel, Theodor 1
 Wadsworth, Stephen 61
 Wagner, Cosima 932, 951
Wagner Nights 928
 Wagner, Richard 267, 718, 758,
 921–51, 959
 Wailly, Léon de 51
Wald, Der 740
Walküre, Die 932, 938, 940,
 942–4
 Wallace, Vincent 952–3
 Wallerstein, Lothar 498
Wally, La 150–1
 Walter, Bruno 579, 740, 979
 Walton, William 953–6
Wandering Scholar, The 367
War and Peace 584–91
War Requiem (Britten) 131
 Ward, Anthony 84
 Warrack, John 961n.
Water Nymph (Rusalka) 178, 216,
 220–2
 Weber, Carl Maria von 957–65
 Wedekind, Frank 42
 Weidman, John 743
 Weil, Grete 338
 Weill, Kurt 238, 356, 424, 474,
 965–72
 Weimar 930, 932, 966
 Weinberger, Jaromír 972–3
 Weir, Judith 973–8
 Weisgall, Hugo 11
 Welles, Orson 86
 Wells, H.G. 839
 Wenig, Adolf 219
 Wenzig, J. 730, 732
 Werfel, Franz 854, 874n., 901
Werther 434, 442–4
West Side Story 743
 Westrup, Prof. Jack 484, 487
 Wette, Adelheid 369
 Wheeler, Hugh 62, 743, 744
Where the Wild Things Are 399–400
 White, Eric 133
 White, George 243
White Lady, The 1, 88–90
 White, Patrick 453, 454
 Whiting, John 557

- Widerspänstigen Zählung, Der* 272–3
 Widmann, Joseph Viktor 272
 Wieland, Christopher Martin 522, 962
Wiener Blut 755–7
 Wilbur, Richard 62
 Wilcox, Thomas 403
 Wilde, Oscar 761, 987, 988
 Wilder, Thornton 366, 367
Wildschütz, Der 419, 420
Wilhelm Meister 818
Willis, Les 592
 Willner, A.M. 601
 Wilson, Robert 255, 256
Wintermärchen (Winter's Tale) 274
 Wohlbrück, Wilhelm August 421
 Wojcicki, K.W. 479
 Wolf, Hugo 979–80
 Wolf-Ferrari, Ermanno 498, 980–4
 Wolski, W. 479
 Wolzogen, Ernst von 760
Woman without a Shadow, The 757, 773–5
World of the Moon, The 332–3
- Wozzeck* 39–42, 275, 579
Wreckers, The 740–2
- X
- Xerxes* 312, 325–7
- Y
- Yan Tan Tethera* 71–2
Yevgeny Onyegin 588n., 805–9
Young Lord, The 346–8
Young Siegfried, The 938
- Z
- Zaccaria, Nicola* 168
Zaïde 502
Zaira 28
Zandonai, Riccardo 672, 985–6
Zangarini, C. 599, 983
Zar und Zimmermann 419–20
Zarathustra 625–7
zarzuela 12, 241, 918, 919
- Zauberflöte, Die* 520, 521–6, 757, 773
Zauberharfe, Die 715
Zauberoper 715
Zazà 415–16
Zeitoper 356
 Zell, F. 478, 751, 801
Zelmira 683–5
Zémire et Azor 286–7
 Zemlinsky, Alexander von 986–9
 Zenatello, Giovanni 250, 253
 Zhdanov, Andrei 586
 Zhukovsky, Vassily Andreyevich 809
Zigeunerbaron, Der 753–5
 Zille, Moritz 522n.
 Zimmermann, Bernd Alois 989–94
 Zinovieff, Peter 66
Z Mrtvé ho Domu 394–7
Zolotoy Pyetushok 649–52
Zorba the Greek 426
Zoroastre 625–7
 Züngel, Emmanuel 734
 Zweig, Stefan 757, 781
Zwerg, Der 987–9
Zwillingsbrüder, Die 715

The Earl of Harewood has been editor of Kobbé's Opera Book since 1953. Born in 1923, he has had a long, distinguished career in arts administration. He was on the staff and a director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, from 1951 to 1972; artistic director of the Edinburgh Festival from 1961 to 1965; and managing director of the English National Opera from 1972 to 1985. He is chairman of the ENO and has been president of the British Board of Film Classification since 1985. Antony Peattie was a founder, and the first editor, of the highly successful magazine Opera Now. For ten years publications officer for the Welsh National Opera, he now lectures and writes on opera for leading publications around the world.

Jacket design by David Fordham

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS
a member of
Penguin Putnam Inc.

The first major revision in more than ten years, the new edition of Kobbé's Opera Book has been expanded to cover nearly five hundred works. This eleventh edition of the world's leading opera guide includes:

- full descriptions of the operas
- plot synopses, cast lists, performance histories, and many other details
- new illustrations and musical examples
- nearly two hundred new entries for operas not covered before
- thoroughly revised previous entries
- full accounts of leading opera composers

