

THE NEW ROBBÉ'S
OPERA
BOOK

EDITED BY

THE EARL OF HAREWOOD
AND ANTONY PEATTIE

THE NEW KOBBE'S OPERA BOOK

From its first appearance in 1922, Kobbé's Opera Book has been regarded as the opera-lover's bible. Now, seventy-five years later, it has undergone the most thorough revision in its history. The New Kobbé's Opera Book is a fully redesigned and expanded edition, with numerous prior entries completely rewritten, and nearly two hundred new operas added.

Almost five hundred works in all are covered, among them such important modern operas as Peter Maxwell Davies's The Lighthouse, Harrison Birtwistle's Gawain, and Thomas Ades's Powder Her Face, as well as long-forgotten or little-performed works currently being revived by the more adventurous opera companies: Rachmaninov's Alko, Bizet's Don Procopio, Donizetti's L'Assedio di Calais, for example. New to Kobbé are works by Adams, Ades, Argento, Arrieta, Barber, Berio, Bernstein, Blake, Cavalli, Enescu, Floyd, Gerhard, Glass, Goldmark, Goetz, Goldschmidt, Gomes, Granados, Grétry, Hamilton, Haydn, Kienzl, Kodály, Kokkonen, Korngold, Lehár, Marschner, Maxwell Davies, Meale, Méhul, Messiaen, Puccini, Rachmaninov, Rameau, Reyer, Rubinstein, Schreker, Schubert, Schumann, Smyth, Sondheim, Turnage, Vives, Weinberger, Weir, Wolf, and Zemlinsky – several old masters among the new. Also featured are additional works by previously represented composers.

Departing from earlier editions, this eleventh edition presents operas chronologically by composer, thus making them easier to find for those unsure of an opera's school or period. A full index is provided, as before, along with – a first for Kobbé – a selection of photographs.

Lord Harewood's commentaries, and his unparalleled knowledge of and enthusiasm for opera, are complemented in this new edition by substantial contributions from Antony Peattie. Together the two editors take the Kobbé tradition a stage further.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2019 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

THE NEW KOBBE'S
OPERA BOOK

THE NEW KOBBE'S
OPERA BOOK

EDITED BY
THE EARL OF HAREWOOD
AND ANTONY PEATTIE

G.P. PUTNAM'S SONS
NEW YORK

First published in Great Britain 1922

Ninth edition 1976

Tenth edition 1987

Eleventh edition 1997

G.P. Putnam's Sons

Publishers Since 1838

a member of

Penguin Putnam Inc.

200 Madison Avenue

New York, New York 10016

New material Copyright © The Earl of Harewood 1976, 1987, 1997

New material Copyright © Antony Peattie 1997

All rights reserved. This book, or parts thereof, may not be reproduced in any form without permission.

Published simultaneously in Canada.

Project manager: Elisabeth Ingles

Design and typesetting: Penny and Tony Mills

Music setting: Wessex Music Services

Index: Ingrid Lock

Additional research: Janet Jempson

Typist: Kim Griffiths

Printed and bound in the United States of America by RR Donnellys & Sons Company.

1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

CONTENTS

List of Illustrations xv

Preface xvii

ADOLPHE ADAM 1

Le postillon de Longjumeau.....1

JOHN ADAMS 2

Nixon in China2

The Death of Klinghoffer5

THOMAS ADÈS 7

Powder her Face7

EUGEN D'ALBERT 9

Tiefland.....9

DOMINICK ARGENTO 11

Postcard from Morocco11

EMILIO ARRIETA 12

Marina.....12

DANIEL-FRANÇOIS AUBER 13

La muette de Portici13

Fra Diavolo15

Le domino noir17

MICHAEL WILLIAM BALFE 18

The Bohemian Girl18

SAMUEL BARBER 19

Vanessa19

Antony and Cleopatra.....20

BÉLA BARTÓK 22

Duke Bluebeard's Castle22

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN 23

Fidelio23

VINCENZO BELLINI 25

Il pirata25

La straniera27

I Capuleti e i Montecchi.....28

La sonnambula.....30

Norma31

Beatrice di Tenda.....34

I Puritani36

JULIUS BENEDICT 37

The Lily of Killarney37

ALBAN BERG 39

Wozzeck.....39

Lulu42

LUCIANO BERIO 46

La vera storia.....46

Un re in ascolto.....48

HECTOR BERLIOZ 51

Benvenuto Cellini51

La damnation de Faust.....52

Les Troyens53

Béatrice et Bénédict58

LEONARD BERNSTEIN 61

A Quiet Place.....61

Candide62

SIR HARRISON BIRTWISTLE 65

| | |
|--------------------------|----|
| Punch and Judy | 65 |
| The Mask of Orpheus..... | 67 |
| Yan Tan Tethera | 71 |
| Gawain | 72 |
| The Second Mrs Kong..... | 74 |

GEORGES BIZET 75

| | |
|-------------------------------|----|
| Le docteur Miracle..... | 76 |
| Don Procopio..... | 76 |
| Les pêcheurs de perles | 77 |
| La jolie fille de Perth | 79 |
| Djamileh..... | 80 |
| Carmen..... | 81 |

DAVID BLAKE 84

| | |
|----------------|----|
| Toussaint..... | 84 |
|----------------|----|

MARC BLITZSTEIN 85

| | |
|--------------|----|
| Regina | 85 |
|--------------|----|

FRANÇOIS ADRIEN BOÏELDIEU 88

| | |
|-----------------------|----|
| La dame blanche | 88 |
|-----------------------|----|

ARRIGO BOITO 90

| | |
|------------------|----|
| Mefistofele..... | 90 |
| Nerone..... | 92 |

ALEKSANDR PORFIRYEVICH
BORODIN 93

| | |
|------------------|----|
| Prince Igor..... | 93 |
|------------------|----|

RUTLAND BOUGHTON 96

| | |
|-------------------------|----|
| The Immortal Hour | 96 |
|-------------------------|----|

BENJAMIN BRITTEN 98

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| Paul Bunyan | 98 |
| Peter Grimes..... | 100 |
| The Rape of Lucretia | 105 |
| Albert Herring..... | 107 |
| Let's Make an Opera..... | 110 |
| Billy Budd | 111 |
| Gloriana | 118 |

| | |
|--------------------------------------|-----|
| The Turn of The Screw..... | 122 |
| Noye's Fludde..... | 127 |
| A Midsummer Night's Dream | 128 |
| Parables for Church Performance..... | 131 |
| Curlew River | 132 |
| The Burning Fiery Furnace..... | 133 |
| The Prodigal Son..... | 134 |
| Owen Wingrave | 135 |
| Death in Venice..... | 138 |

FERRUCCIO BUSONI 142

| | |
|-------------------|-----|
| Arlecchino..... | 142 |
| Turandot..... | 143 |
| Doktor Faust..... | 145 |

JOHN CASKEN 149

| | |
|-----------------|-----|
| The Golem | 149 |
|-----------------|-----|

ALFREDO CATALANI 150

| | |
|----------------|-----|
| La Wally | 150 |
|----------------|-----|

FRANCESCO CAVALLI 152

| | |
|-----------------|-----|
| L'Ormindo | 152 |
| La Calisto..... | 153 |

ALEXIS EMMANUEL CHABRIER 156

| | |
|-------------------------|-----|
| L' étoile | 157 |
| Gwendoline | 159 |
| Le roi malgré lui | 159 |

GUSTAVE CHARPENTIER 162

| | |
|--------------|-----|
| Louise | 162 |
|--------------|-----|

ERNEST CHAUSSON 165

| | |
|---------------------|-----|
| Le roi Arthus | 165 |
|---------------------|-----|

LUIGI CHERUBINI 166

| | |
|-------------|-----|
| Médée | 166 |
|-------------|-----|

FRANCESCO CILEA 169

| | |
|-------------------------|-----|
| Adriana Lecouvreur..... | 169 |
|-------------------------|-----|

DOMENICO CIMAROSA 170

Il matrimonio segreto.....170

PETER CORNELIUS 172

Der Barbier von Bagdad172

LUIGI DALLAPICCOLA 175

Il prigioniero175

Ulisse177

ALEKSANDR SERGEYEVICH

DARGOMIZHSKY 178

The Stone Guest178

SIR PETER MAXWELL DAVIES 178

Taverner.....179

The Lighthouse180

CLAUDE DEBUSSY 181

Pelléas et Mélisande181

LÉO DELIBES 183

Lakmé.....183

FREDERICK DELIUS 186

Koanga.....186

A Village Romeo and Juliet188

GAETANO DONIZETTI 189

Le convenienze ed

inconvenienze teatrali.....190

Anna Bolena192

L'elisir d'amore.....194

Lucrezia Borgia195

Maria Stuarda196

Lucia di Lammermoor.....198

Il campanello200

L'assedio di Calais.....201

Roberto Devereux202

Poliuto.....204

La fille du régiment205

La favorite206

Linda di Chamounix.....209

Don Pasquale210

Dom Sébastien, roi de Portugal.....212

PAUL DUKAS 214

Ariane et Barbe-Bleue214

ANTONÍN DVOŘÁK 216

Dimitrij216

The Jacobin218

The Devil and Kate219

Rusalka220

GOTTFRIED VON EINEM 223

Dantons Tod.....223

Der Besuch der alten Dame225

GEORGES ENESCO 227

Oedipe227

MANUEL DE FALLA 229

La vida breve229

El retablo de maese Pedro.....230

GABRIEL FAURÉ 231

Pénélope.....231

FRIEDRICH VON FLOTOW 233

Martha233

CARLISLE FLOYD 235

Susannah235

JOHN GAY/J. C. PEPUSCH 237

The Beggar's Opera237

ROBERTO GERHARD 241

The Duenna241

GEORGE GERSHWIN 243

Porgy and Bess243

ALBERTO GINASTERA 247

Bomarzo247

UMBERTO GIORDANO 250

| | |
|----------------------|-----|
| Andrea Chénier | 250 |
| Fedora | 253 |

PHILIP GLASS 255

| | |
|-----------------------------|-----|
| Einstein on the Beach | 255 |
| Akhnaten | 256 |

MIKHAIL IVANOVICH GLINKA 258

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| A Life for the Tsar | 259 |
| Russlan and Lyudmila | 260 |

CHRISTOPH WILLIBALD GLUCK 261

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| Orfeo ed Euridice | 261 |
| Alceste | 263 |
| Paride ed Elena | 266 |
| Iphigénie en Aulide | 267 |
| Armide | 269 |
| Iphigénie en Tauride | 270 |

HERMANN GOETZ 272

| | |
|-----------------------------------|-----|
| Der Widerspänstigen Zähmung | 272 |
|-----------------------------------|-----|

KARL GOLDMARK 273

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| Die Königin von Saba | 273 |
|----------------------------|-----|

BERTHOLD GOLDSCHMIDT 275

| | |
|-----------------------------|-----|
| Der gewaltige Hahnrei | 275 |
| Beatrice Cenci | 276 |

ANTÔNIO CARLOS GOMES 277

| | |
|------------------|-----|
| Il Guarany | 277 |
|------------------|-----|

CHARLES FRANÇOIS GOUNOD 279

| | |
|-----------------------------|-----|
| Le médecin malgré lui | 279 |
| Faust | 280 |
| Mireille | 282 |
| Roméo et Juliette | 283 |

ENRIQUE GRANADOS 285

| | |
|----------------|-----|
| Goyescas | 285 |
|----------------|-----|

ANDRÉ-ERNEST-MODESTE GRÉTRY 286

| | |
|-----------------------------|-----|
| Zémire et Azor | 286 |
| Richard Coeur-de-Lion | 287 |

JACQUES FRANÇOIS FROMENTAL HALÉVY 289

| | |
|----------------|-----|
| La Juive | 289 |
|----------------|-----|

IAIN HAMILTON 293

| | |
|---------------------|-----|
| Anna Karenina | 293 |
|---------------------|-----|

GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL 294

| | |
|---------------------------------|-----|
| Agrippina | 295 |
| Rinaldo | 296 |
| Teseo | 299 |
| Acis and Galatea | 300 |
| Radamisto | 301 |
| Ottone, re di Germania | 303 |
| Flavio | 304 |
| Giulio Cesare | 305 |
| Tamerlano | 308 |
| Rodelinda | 310 |
| Partenope | 312 |
| Poro, re dell'Indie | 313 |
| Ezio | 314 |
| Orlando | 316 |
| Ariodante | 318 |
| Alcina | 320 |
| Giustino | 321 |
| Berenice, regina d'Egitto | 323 |
| Serse | 325 |
| Semele | 327 |

JOSEPH HAYDN 329

| | |
|-----------------------------|-----|
| L'infedeltà delusa | 330 |
| L'incontro improvviso | 331 |
| Il mondo della luna | 332 |
| La fedeltà premiata | 333 |
| Orfeo ed Euridice | 335 |

PETER HEISE 337

| | |
|---------------------|-----|
| Drot og Marsk | 337 |
|---------------------|-----|

HANS WERNER HENZE 338

| | |
|--------------------------|-----|
| Boulevard Solitude | 338 |
| König Hirsch | 340 |

| | |
|------------------------------|-----|
| Der Prinz von Homburg | 342 |
| Elegy for Young Lovers | 344 |
| Der junge Lord | 346 |
| The Bassarids | 348 |
| The English Cat | 352 |
| Das verratene Meer | 354 |
| Venus und Adonis..... | 355 |

PAUL HINDEMITH 356

| | |
|-------------------------------|-----|
| Cardillac | 357 |
| Neues vom Tage | 359 |
| Mathis der Maler | 360 |
| Die Harmonie der Welt..... | 364 |
| Das lange Weihnachtsmahl..... | 366 |

GUSTAV HOLST 367

| | |
|--------------------------|-----|
| Sāvitri..... | 367 |
| At the Boar's Head | 368 |

ENGELBERT HUMPERDINCK 369

| | |
|-------------------------|-----|
| Hänsel und Gretel | 369 |
| Königskinder | 370 |

LEOŠ JANÁČEK 372

| | |
|------------------------------------|-----|
| Její Pastorkyňa (Jenůfa) | 372 |
| Osud | 376 |
| The Adventures of Mr Brouček | 379 |
| Kátya Kabanová | 382 |
| The Cunning Little Vixen | 387 |
| The Makropulos Affair | 390 |
| From the House of the Dead | 394 |

WILHELM KIENZL 398

| | |
|------------------------|-----|
| Der Evangelimann | 398 |
|------------------------|-----|

OLIVER KNUSSEN 399

| | |
|---------------------------------|-----|
| Where the Wild Things Are | 399 |
|---------------------------------|-----|

ZOLTÁN KODÁLY 401

| | |
|------------------|-----|
| Háry János | 401 |
|------------------|-----|

JOONAS KOKKONEN 403

| | |
|---------------------------|-----|
| The Last Temptations..... | 403 |
|---------------------------|-----|

ERICH KORNGOLD 406

| | |
|----------------------|-----|
| Die tote Stadt | 406 |
|----------------------|-----|

ÉDOUARD LALO 408

| | |
|------------------|-----|
| Le roi d'Ys..... | 408 |
|------------------|-----|

FRANZ LEHÁR 409

| | |
|-------------------------|-----|
| Die lustige Witwe | 410 |
|-------------------------|-----|

RUGGIERO LEONCAVALLO 412

| | |
|----------------|-----|
| Pagliacci..... | 412 |
| La bohème..... | 413 |
| Zazà | 415 |

GYÖRGI LIGETI 416

| | |
|------------------------|-----|
| Le grand macabre | 416 |
|------------------------|-----|

ALBERT LORTZING 419

| | |
|-------------------------|-----|
| Zar und Zimmermann..... | 419 |
| Der Wildschütz..... | 420 |

HEINRICH AUGUST MARSCHNER 421

| | |
|------------------|-----|
| Der Vampyr | 421 |
|------------------|-----|

BOHUSLAV MARTINŮ 422

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| Comedy on the Bridge | 422 |
| Julietta..... | 423 |
| The Greek Passion..... | 426 |

PIETRO MASCAGNI 429

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| Cavalleria rusticana | 429 |
| L'amico Fritz..... | 431 |
| Iris | 432 |
| Le maschere | 433 |

JULES MASSENET 434

| | |
|------------------|-----|
| Hérodiade..... | 434 |
| Manon..... | 436 |
| Le Cid..... | 439 |
| Esclarmonde..... | 440 |
| Werther..... | 442 |
| Thaïs | 444 |

| | |
|--------------------------------|-----|
| La Navarraise | 445 |
| Cendrillon | 446 |
| Grisélidis | 447 |
| Le jongleur de Notre Dame..... | 448 |
| Chérubin | 450 |
| Don Quichotte | 451 |

RICHARD MEALE 453

| | |
|------------|-----|
| Voss | 453 |
|------------|-----|

GIAN CARLO MENOTTI 455

| | |
|------------------------------------|-----|
| Amelia al ballo | 455 |
| The Medium | 456 |
| The Telephone | 457 |
| The Consul | 458 |
| Amahl and the Night Visitors | 461 |
| The Saint of Bleecker Street..... | 462 |

OLIVIER MESSIAEN 463

| | |
|------------------------------|-----|
| Saint François d'Assise..... | 463 |
|------------------------------|-----|

GIACOMO MEYERBEER 465

| | |
|------------------------|-----|
| Robert le Diable | 465 |
| Les Huguenots..... | 466 |
| Le prophète..... | 468 |
| Dinorah | 470 |
| L'Africaine..... | 471 |

DARIUS MILHAUD 473

| | |
|-------------------------------|-----|
| Le pauvre matelot | 473 |
| Operas-Minutes..... | 474 |
| L'enlèvement d'Europe..... | 474 |
| L'abandon d'Ariane | 475 |
| La délivrance de Thésée | 475 |
| Christophe Colomb..... | 476 |

CARL MILLÖCKER 478

| | |
|------------------------|-----|
| Der Bettelstudent..... | 478 |
|------------------------|-----|

STANISŁAW MONIUSZKO 479

| | |
|------------|-----|
| Halka..... | 479 |
|------------|-----|

ITALO MONTEMEZZI 481

| | |
|--------------------------|-----|
| L'amore dei tre re | 481 |
|--------------------------|-----|

CLAUDIO MONTEVERDI 483

| | |
|--|-----|
| La favola d'Orfeo | 484 |
| Arianna..... | 487 |
| Il combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda | 488 |
| Il ritorno d'Ulisse in patria | 489 |
| L'incoronazione di Poppea | 491 |

WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART 494

| | |
|-------------------------------------|-----|
| Mitridate, re di Ponto | 495 |
| Lucio Silla..... | 495 |
| La finta giardiniera..... | 496 |
| Il re pastore | 497 |
| Idomeneo | 498 |
| Die Entführung aus dem Serail | 502 |
| Der Schauspieldirektor..... | 504 |
| Le nozze di Figaro | 504 |
| Don Giovanni..... | 509 |
| Così fan tutte | 515 |
| La clemenza di Tito | 519 |
| Die Zauberflöte | 521 |

MODEST PETROVICH MUSSORGSKY 527

| | |
|-------------------------------|-----|
| Boris Godunov..... | 527 |
| Khovanshchina..... | 532 |
| The Fair at Sorochintsy | 535 |

OTTO NICOLAI 537

| | |
|---------------------------------------|-----|
| Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor | 537 |
|---------------------------------------|-----|

CARL AUGUST NIELSEN 538

| | |
|----------------------|-----|
| Saul and David | 538 |
| Maskarade..... | 540 |

JACQUES OFFENBACH 543

| | |
|-----------------------------|-----|
| Orphée aux enfers | 543 |
| La belle Hélène | 545 |
| Barbe-Bleue | 547 |
| Robinson Crusoe | 549 |
| La Périhole | 550 |
| Les contes d'Hoffmann | 552 |

CARL ORFF 555

| | |
|-----------------|-----|
| Die Kluge | 555 |
|-----------------|-----|

KRZYSZTOF PENDERECKI 557

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| The Devils of Loudun | 557 |
|----------------------------|-----|

GIOVANNI PERGOLESI 561

La serva padrona.....561

HANS PFITZNER 562

Palestrina.....562

NICCOLÒ PICCINNI 565

La buona figliuola.....565

AMILCARE PONCHIELLI 566

La Gioconda.....566

FRANCIS POULENC 568

Les mamelles de Tirésias.....568

Dialogues des Carmélites.....570

La voix humaine.....572

SERGEI SERGEYEVICH PROKOFIEV 573

The Gambler.....573

The Love for Three Oranges.....575

The Fiery Angel.....579

Betrothal in a Monastery.....582

War and Peace.....584

GIACOMO PUCCINI 591

Le Villi.....592

Manon Lescaut.....593

La bohème.....594

Tosca.....595

Madama Butterfly.....597

La fanciulla del West.....599

La rondine.....601

Il tabarro.....603

Suor Angelica.....604

Gianni Schicchi.....605

Turandot.....607

HENRY PURCELL 610

Dido and Aeneas.....610

SERGEY VASILYEVICH
RACHMANINOV 613

Aleko.....613

Francesca da Rimini.....614

JEAN-PHILIPPE RAMEAU 615

Hippolyte et Aricie.....615

Les Indes galantes.....617

Castor et Pollux.....620

Dardanus.....621

Platée.....623

Zoroastre.....625

Les Boréades.....627

MAURICE RAVEL 628

L'heure espagnole.....628

L'enfant et les sortilèges.....629

ARIBERT REIMANN 632

Lear.....632

ERNEST REYER 634

Sigurd.....634

NICOLAI ANDREYEVICH
RIMSKY-KORSAKOV 635

A May Night.....636

The Snow Maiden.....637

Christmas Eve.....638

Sadko.....640

Mozart and Salieri.....642

The Tsar's Bride.....643

Tsar Saltan.....645

The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh

and the Maiden Fevroniya.....647

Le Coq d'Or.....649

GIOACCHINO ANTONIO ROSSINI 652

La scala di seta.....653

La pietra del paragone.....654

L'occasione fa il ladro.....656

Signor Bruschino.....657

Tancredi.....658

L'Italiana in Algeri.....660

Il Turco in Italia.....662

Elisabetta, Regina d'Inghilterra.....665

Il barbiere di Siviglia.....666

Otello.....669

La Cenerentola.....670

La gazza ladra.....671

Armida.....674

Ermione.....675

| | |
|--|-----|
| La donna del lago | 677 |
| Maometto II..... | 679 |
| Le siège de Corinthe | 680 |
| Matilde di Shabran..... | 682 |
| Zelmira | 683 |
| Semiramide | 685 |
| Il viaggio a Reims | 686 |
| Mosè in Egitto/ Moïse et Pharaon | 687 |
| Le comte Ory | 690 |
| Guillaume Tell..... | 692 |

ALBERT ROUSSEL 693

| | |
|----------------|-----|
| Padmâvatī..... | 693 |
|----------------|-----|

ANTON RUBINSTEIN 696

| | |
|----------------|-----|
| The Demon..... | 696 |
|----------------|-----|

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS 697

| | |
|-----------------------|-----|
| Samson et Dalila..... | 697 |
|-----------------------|-----|

AULIS SALLINEN 698

| | |
|-------------------------------------|-----|
| The Horseman..... | 698 |
| The Red Line | 701 |
| The King Goes Forth to France | 703 |
| Kullervo | 704 |
| The Palace..... | 706 |

ARNOLD SCHOENBERG 707

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| Erwartung..... | 707 |
| Die glückliche Hand | 709 |
| Von heute auf morgen | 709 |
| Moses und Aron | 711 |

FRANZ SCHREKER 714

| | |
|-----------------------|-----|
| Der ferne Klang | 714 |
|-----------------------|-----|

FRANZ SCHUBERT 715

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| Alfonso und Estrella | 715 |
| Der häusliche Krieg..... | 716 |
| Pierrabras..... | 717 |

ROBERT SCHUMANN 718

| | |
|----------------|-----|
| Genoveva | 718 |
|----------------|-----|

DMITRI DMITREVICH SHOSTAKOVICH 719

| | |
|---|-----|
| The Nose | 719 |
| Katerina Ismailova (Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk) | 722 |

BEDŘICH SMETANA 725

| | |
|------------------------------------|-----|
| The Brandenburger in Bohemia | 726 |
| The Bartered Bride | 727 |
| Dalibor | 730 |
| Libuše | 732 |
| The Two Widows | 734 |
| The Kiss..... | 736 |
| The Secret | 737 |
| The Devil's Wall | 739 |

DAME ETHEL SMYTH 740

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| The Wreckers | 740 |
| The Boatswain's Mate | 742 |

STEPHEN SONDHEIM 743

| | |
|-------------------------|-----|
| Pacific Overtures | 743 |
| Sweeney Todd | 744 |

GASPARO SPONTINI 746

| | |
|------------------|-----|
| La vestale | 746 |
|------------------|-----|

JOHANN STRAUSS 748

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| Die Fledermaus..... | 748 |
| Eine Nacht in Venedig..... | 751 |
| Der Zigeunerbaron | 753 |
| Wiener Blut | 755 |

RICHARD STRAUSS 757

| | |
|-----------------------------|-----|
| Guntram | 757 |
| Feuersnot | 760 |
| Salome..... | 761 |
| Elektra | 764 |
| Der Rosenkavalier | 767 |
| Ariadne auf Naxos | 770 |
| Die Frau ohne Schatten..... | 773 |
| Intermezzo..... | 775 |
| Die ägyptische Helena | 777 |
| Arabella..... | 779 |
| Die schweigsame Frau | 781 |
| Friedenstag..... | 783 |
| Daphne..... | 784 |

| | |
|---------------------------|-----|
| Die Liebe der Danae | 786 |
| Capriccio | 788 |

IGOR FYODOROVICH STRAVINSKY 790

| | |
|------------------------------|-----|
| Le rossignol | 791 |
| L'histoire d'un soldat | 793 |
| Renard | 794 |
| Mavra | 795 |
| Oedipus Rex | 796 |
| The Rake's Progress | 797 |

FRANZ VON SUPPÉ 801

| | |
|-----------------|-----|
| Boccaccio | 801 |
|-----------------|-----|

KAROL SZYMANOWSKI 803

| | |
|------------------|-----|
| King Roger | 803 |
|------------------|-----|

PETER ILYICH TCHAIKOVSKY 805

| | |
|---------------------------|-----|
| Eugene Onegin | 805 |
| The Maid of Orleans | 809 |
| Mazeppa | 810 |
| The Queen of Spades | 813 |
| Iolanta | 816 |

AMBROISE THOMAS 818

| | |
|--------------|-----|
| Mignon | 818 |
| Hamlet | 819 |

VIRGIL THOMSON 822

| | |
|---------------------------------|-----|
| Four Saints in Three Acts | 822 |
| The Mother of Us All | 824 |
| Lord Byron | 826 |

SIR MICHAEL TIPPETT 827

| | |
|------------------------------|-----|
| The Midsummer Marriage | 828 |
| King Priam | 832 |
| The Knot Garden | 835 |
| The Ice Break | 837 |
| New Year | 839 |

MARK-ANTHONY TURNAGE 841

| | |
|-------------|-----|
| Greek | 841 |
|-------------|-----|

VIKTOR ULLMANN 843

| | |
|-------------------------------|-----|
| Der Kaiser von Atlantis | 843 |
|-------------------------------|-----|

RALPH VAUGHAN WILLIAMS 845

| | |
|------------------------------|-----|
| Hugh the Drover | 845 |
| The Poisoned Kiss | 846 |
| Riders to the Sea | 847 |
| The Pilgrim's Progress | 848 |

GIUSEPPE VERDI 851

| | |
|--------------------------------------|-----|
| Oberto, Conte di San Bonifacio | 851 |
| Un giorno di regno | 852 |
| Nabucco | 854 |
| I Lombardi | 856 |
| Ernani | 858 |
| I due Foscari | 861 |
| Giovanna d'Arco | 862 |
| Alzira | 864 |
| Attila | 865 |
| Macbeth | 866 |
| I masnadieri | 870 |
| Jérusalem | 871 |
| Il corsaro | 872 |
| La battaglia di Legnano | 873 |
| Luisa Miller | 874 |
| Stiffelio | 875 |
| Rigoletto | 878 |
| Il trovatore | 881 |
| La traviata | 883 |
| Les vêpres siciliennes | 884 |
| Simon Boccanegra | 888 |
| Aroldo | 893 |
| Un ballo in maschera | 895 |
| La forza del destino | 897 |
| Don Carlos | 901 |
| Aida | 907 |
| Otello | 908 |
| Falstaff | 912 |

PARAM VIR 916

| | |
|----------------------------|-----|
| Snatched by the Gods | 916 |
| Broken Strings | 917 |

AMADEO VIVES 918

| | |
|-------------------------|-----|
| Doña Francisquita | 918 |
|-------------------------|-----|

RICHARD WAGNER 921

| | |
|-------------------------------|-----|
| Das Liebesverbot | 921 |
| Rienzi | 923 |
| Der fliegende Holländer | 925 |
| Tannhäuser | 928 |

| | |
|--------------------------------------|-----|
| Lohengrin..... | 930 |
| Tristan und Isolde | 932 |
| Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg | 935 |
| Der Ring des Nibelungen..... | 938 |
| Das Rheingold | 941 |
| Die Walküre | 942 |
| Siegfried..... | 944 |
| Götterdämmerung | 947 |
| Parsifal | 949 |

VINCENT WALLACE 952

| | |
|----------------|-----|
| Maritana | 952 |
|----------------|-----|

WILLIAM WALTON 953

| | |
|---------------------------|-----|
| Troilus and Cressida..... | 953 |
| The Bear | 955 |

CARL MARIA VON WEBER 957

| | |
|----------------------|-----|
| Der Freischütz | 957 |
| Euryanthe | 959 |
| Oberon | 962 |

KURT WEILL 965

| | |
|---|-----|
| Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny..... | 965 |
| Die sieben Todsünden | 969 |
| Street Scene..... | 969 |

JAROMÍR WEINBERGER 972

| | |
|-----------------------------|-----|
| Schwanda the Bagpiper | 972 |
|-----------------------------|-----|

JUDITH WEIR 973

| | |
|-----------------------------------|-----|
| A Night at the Chinese Opera..... | 974 |
| The Vanishing Bridegroom..... | 976 |
| Blond Eckbert | 977 |

HUGO WOLF 979

| | |
|---------------------|-----|
| Der Corregidor..... | 979 |
|---------------------|-----|

ERMANNIO WOLF-FERRARI 980

| | |
|-------------------------------|-----|
| I quattro rusteghi..... | 980 |
| Il segreto di Susanna | 982 |
| I gioielli della Madonna..... | 983 |

RICCARDO ZANDONAI 985

| | |
|--------------------------|-----|
| Francesca da Rimini..... | 985 |
|--------------------------|-----|

ALEXANDER ZEMLINSKY 986

| | |
|------------------------------------|-----|
| Eine florentinische Tragödie | 987 |
| Der Zwerg..... | 987 |

BERND ALOIS ZIMMERMANN 989

| | |
|--------------------|-----|
| Die Soldaten | 989 |
|--------------------|-----|

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

| | | | |
|---|-----|--|-----|
| JOHN ADAMS, Nixon in China (photo Alex Wilson) | 3 | GEORGE GERSHWIN, Porgy and Bess (photo Guy Gravett) | 245 |
| THOMAS ADÈS, Powder her Face (photo Ivan Kyncl) | 8 | CHRISTOPH WILLIBALD GLUCK, Iphigénie en Tauride (photo Clive Barda) | 271 |
| LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN, Fidelio (photo Ellinger, Salzburg Festival Archives) | 24 | CHARLES FRANÇOIS GOUNOD, Le médecin malgré lui (photo © Daniel Cande) | 280 |
| VINCENZO BELLINI, Norma (photo Metropolitan Opera Archives) | 33 | CHARLES FRANÇOIS GOUNOD, Faust (Harewood House) | 282 |
| LUCIANO BERIO, Un re in ascolto (photo Clive Barda/Performing Arts Library) | 50 | JACQUES FRANÇOIS HALÉVY, La Juive (photo Metropolitan Opera Archives) | 290 |
| HECTOR BERLIOZ, Les Troyens (photo Zoë Dominic) | 56 | GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL, Rinaldo (photo Walt Frerck) | 298 |
| HECTOR BERLIOZ, Béatrice et Bénédict (photo Bill Cooper) | 60 | GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL, Giulio Cesare (photo Reg Wilson) | 307 |
| HARRISON BIRTWISTLE, Punch and Judy (photo Zoë Dominic) | 66 | GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL, Ariodante (photo Catherine Ashmore) | 319 |
| HARRISON BIRTWISTLE, Gawain (photo Clive Barda/Performing Arts Library) | 73 | PAUL HINDEMITH, Mathis der Maler (photo Catherine Ashmore) | 363 |
| GEORGES BIZET, Les pêcheurs de perles (photo Metropolitan Opera Archives) | 78 | LEOŠ JANÁČEK, Kátja Kabanová (photo Julian Sheppard) | 384 |
| GEORGES BIZET, Carmen (photo Metropolitan Opera Archives) | 83 | LEOŠ JANÁČEK, The Cunning Little Vixen (© Archiv Komische Oper/Jürgen Simon) | 389 |
| BENJAMIN BRITTEN, Peter Grimes (photo Angus McBean/Royal Opera House Archives) | 101 | LEOŠ JANÁČEK, The Makropulos Affair (photo Guy Gravett) | 392 |
| BENJAMIN BRITTEN, Billy Budd (photo Roger Wood) | 114 | FRANZ LEHÁR, Die lustige Witwe (Courtesy Kobal Collection) | 411 |
| BENJAMIN BRITTEN, The Turn of the Screw (photo Giacomelli/Opera magazine) | 123 | BOHUSLAV MARTINŮ, The Greek Passion (photo Julian Sheppard) | 427 |
| FRANCESCO CAVALLI, La Calisto (photo Guy Gravett/ Glyndebourne Photographic Archive) | 155 | JULES MASSENET, Chérubin (photo Bill Cooper) | 451 |
| GAETANO DONIZETTI, Lucia di Lammermoor (photo Houston Rogers, courtesy Theatre Museum, Covent Garden) | 199 | GIACOMO MEYERBEER, L'Africaine (photo Reg Wilson) | 472 |
| | | CLAUDIO MONTEVERDI, Orfeo (photo Marco Borggreve) | 486 |

| | | | |
|--|-----|---|-----|
| WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART, Idomeneo (photo Roger Wood) | 501 | RICHARD STRAUSS, Elektra (photo Zoë Dominic) | 766 |
| WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART, Le nozze di Figaro (photo Sue Adler) | 506 | RICHARD STRAUSS, Der Rosenkavalier (photo Michael Le Poer Trench) | 769 |
| WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART, Die Zauberflöte (photo Royal Opera House Archives) | 523 | IGOR STRAVINSKY, The Rake's Progress (photo Guy Gravett) | 800 |
| MODEST MUSSORGSKY, Khovanshchina (photo © Laurie Lewis/Frank Spooner Pictures Ltd) | 534 | PETER ILYICH TCHAIKOVSKY, The Queen of Spades (photo Guy Gravett) | 815 |
| JACQUES OFFENBACH, Barbe-Bleue (photo Catherine Ashmore) | 548 | AMBROISE THOMAS, Hamlet (photo Bridgeman Art Library) | 821 |
| SERGEI PROKOFIEV, The Love for Three Oranges (photo Donald Cooper/Photostage) | 577 | GIUSEPPE VERDI, Stiffelio (photo Clive Barda/Performing Arts Library) | 877 |
| GIACOMO PUCCINI, Turandot (photo Maurice Seymour) | 609 | GIUSEPPE VERDI, Les vêpres siciliennes (photo © Daniel Cande) | 887 |
| MAURICE RAVEL, L'enfant et les sortilèges (photo Clive Barda/Performing Arts Library) | 631 | GIUSEPPE VERDI, Simon Boccanegra (photo © Daniel Cande) | 890 |
| NICOLAI RIMSKY-KORSAKOV, Le Coq d'Or (photo Roger Wood) | 650 | GIUSEPPE VERDI, Un ballo in maschera (Lebrecht Collection) | 896 |
| GIOACCHINO ROSSINI, Il Turco in Italia (photo Oliver Herrmann) | 664 | GIUSEPPE VERDI, Don Carlos (photo Houston Rogers/Theatre Museum) | 902 |
| GIOACCHINO ROSSINI, Il barbiere di Siviglia (photo David Fishman/Lyric Opera of Chicago) | 667 | GIUSEPPE VERDI, Otello (Harewood House) | 910 |
| GIOACCHINO ROSSINI, Ermione (photo Guy Gravett) | 677 | RICHARD WAGNER, Tristan und Isolde (photo Metropolitan Opera Archives) | 933 |
| ARNOLD SCHOENBERG, Erwartung (photo Ruth Walz) | 708 | RICHARD WAGNER, Das Rheingold (photo Clive Barda/Performing Arts Library) | 941 |
| ARNOLD SCHOENBERG, Von heute auf morgen (photo Ruth Walz) | 710 | RICHARD WAGNER, Siegfried (photo Carlo Edwards, New York) | 946 |
| DMITRI SHOSTAKOVICH, Katerina Ismailova (photo © Laurie Lewis/Frank Spooner Pictures Ltd) | 723 | JUDITH WEIR, A Night at the Chinese Opera (photo Catherine Ashmore) | 975 |
| BEDŘICH SMETANA, The Bartered Bride (photo Julian Sheppard) | 728 | ALEXANDER ZEMLINSKY, Der Zwerg (photo Joachim Thode, Germany) | 988 |
| RICHARD STRAUSS, Salome (photo Catherine Ashmore) | 763 | BERND ALOIS ZIMMERMANN, Die Soldaten (photo Donald Cooper) | 991 |

PREFACE

Gustav Kobbé (1857–1918) was a New Yorker by birth and his musical education took place there and at Wiesbaden in Germany. He was co-editor of the Musical Review when in 1882 he was sent by the New York World as correspondent to Bayreuth for the première of Parsifal. For eighteen years he was music critic of the New York Herald, and he was a regular contributor of articles on music to prominent American magazines. His death was unusual and occurred while he was sailing in the Great South Bay, Long Island, when a seaplane struck his boat and killed him instantly.

When Kobbé's Complete Opera Book was first published (posthumously), it was a pioneering work, replicated to some extent maybe on the continent of Europe but not otherwise in the English language. The scale was large, so was the view taken of the operas he tackled, and it was easy to see where his sympathies lay. He took, as was natural around the end of the Great War, what would have been considered a progressive view: Opera, he believed, like for instance Medicine, developed, and, as it did so, older discoveries were superseded. That for him as a man of his time meant that Gluck's Orfeo (the earliest opera then still playing) provided a parameter for his work. With Orfeo, he believed modern opera began.

Revising and enlarging the book just before the end of the twentieth century – the fourth time I have done it – I realise our parameters have necessarily changed and now stretch from the time of Monteverdi up to the present day. Immediately, an element of personal judgement comes into play – choice, if you prefer the word. If the contents now include your own preference among modern works – say, Klinghoffer, Greek, Harvey Milk or Goehr's Arianna – the New Kobbé meets with your approval; if they do not, it's not so sound! It's as simple as that. Or is it?

Our tendency now has been to include virtually anything Wagner, Mozart, Verdi, Puccini or Richard Strauss ever wrote; to treat everything by Handel or Rossini as a strong candidate for inclusion; and then to worry about space – the book is now in larger format than before but it should not require a lectern to make it readable. Kobbé expatiated on his favourite works – Mozart or Wagner – and went into much less detail about others he thought less important; similar criteria inevitably govern his successors. We have thought whoever uses the book would want only the bones of Verdi's Oberto or Heise's Drot og Marsk, but would expect something nearer a dissertation on Don Carlos or War and Peace or Die Soldaten as works of greater importance and profounder complexity. All choice such as we have had to make tends to the controversial: the field consists of thousands of operas; Kobbé includes only 500. Not everyone can be expected to agree with precisely what we have chosen.

Apart from choice, space is a consideration we have had to take into account. Is there likely to be renewed interest in Kienzl's Der Evangelimann or Mascagni's Le maschere, fringe operas at best in recent times, or should we leave them out in favour of something statistics suggest as more likely to be encountered by the operatic traveller? Will one-time favourites like L'amico Fritz and Die Königin von Saba disappear completely, as current lists imply, or will they regain a bit of favour? Is there any chance of revival of something once considered basic repertory like The Bohemian Girl – a big success (and hugely enjoyable) under Beecham in 1951, virtually unheard (though recorded) since? Will current interest in the lesser works of Verdi, to say nothing of Massenet (in either case to be applauded), blot out the chances of valuable but essentially non-repertory operas like Padmâvatî or Cardillac finding regular favour with operatic planners? Kobbé himself might have speculated in such a fashion, but in his time it would have been Così and Don Carlos that he would have cited as top priorities for production at the Met or Covent Garden and therefore for listing in anything purporting to be 'complete'.

The inclusion or omission of operetta has posed a problem. There are now admirable books devoted exclusively to operetta and the musical and embracing almost anything in the category. On the other hand, certain works, not only Die Fledermaus and The Merry Widow but Mikado and Sweeney Todd, are likely to find themselves in the repertory of opera companies and therefore to be encountered by subscribers or ordinarily enterprising opera-goers. Compromise here, as for instance in the area of 'national' operas – works to be found regularly in one country but virtually never exported – has to be the order of the day, and inevitably some compromise turns out to be controversial.

Kobbé's original scheme divided the book into centuries and subdivided by 'Schools' – German, Italian, French initially; Russian, Czech and so on did not get much of a look-in at the time he was writing. There were some odd choices, Flotow for instance being classified under 'French Opera' because Kobbé, with some but not total justification, decided that this was his style, as if he were Meyerbeer. We have decided, not without misgiving, to list composers alphabetically, thus making it easier for those unwilling to use an index to locate them but separating for instance Cavalleria rusticana from Pagliacci. On the other hand, such a listing obviates the soul-searching attendant on deciding whether Spontini and Cherubini were Italian composers (which they were) or Italians who wrote French operas (which is also true); and Stravinsky becomes an alphabetical entry without the need to classify Mavra as a Russian opera and The Rake's Progress as American – or might chauvinism stretch a couple of points and claim that the subject and one of the librettists qualify it as English?

By tradition operatic commentators have predicted woe – the repertory is ossified; no new works of any merit are being written; performance standards have never been lower; there are no good singers left; you can't cast Wagner/Verdi/Mozart any more; audiences are falling/getting older every day; and so on. At least the last complaint seems no longer true: audiences aren't falling off in most countries – maybe in Italy, but not in the U.S.A. or Britain. Nor is the repertory as narrow as it used to be, even if the widening is due more to revival than to new creations: we have the chance today of seeing works which a generation or more ago were hardly dictionary entries, let alone to be found in Kobbé.

A shadow of sadness hangs over this new edition. When in 1995 the New Kobbé was mooted, we rapidly settled on Nicholas John as co-editor – I had after all on my own filled that capacity for more than forty years and the book needed a new point of view to supplement the old. Nick John trained as a lawyer but worked at English National Opera for over twenty years, finishing up in the influential job of Dramaturge, which embraced everything from editing the daily programmes to research for directors, often advising them as well. At E.N.O. I had known him as a good colleague, over the years he had become a friend, and – even more important in the context – was steeped in opera and knew his way about the repertory and well beyond it as few others. Tragically, in June 1996 he was killed in an accident in Switzerland. Kobbé planning was well advanced; Nick's notes were voluminous, though he had written only a couple of new entries (Turandot appears under Puccini), but at short notice we looked for a new collaborator with more or less immediate availability and, as London taxi-drivers say, the Knowledge as well. We are lucky to have persuaded Antony Peattie, who had at Welsh National Opera filled a comparable job to Nick's at E.N.O., to take over and be associated with Kobbé in the future.

The Complete Opera Book was published after Kobbé's death, with a certain number of operas added to what he had written. In 1954, 1976 and 1985 I added more operas, and then as before the entry for each work was signed with an initial, 'K.' standing for what Kobbé wrote; 'K.W.' for the operas added after his death by Katherine Wright, who put together his material; 'F.B.' for Ferruccio Bonavia, who added a few more; and 'H.' for those I contributed. The same holds good for the New Kobbé, except that the earlier initials are supplemented by 'P.' for Antony Peattie, and, in one instance only, by Nicholas John's 'N.J.' Running times of operas (without intervals of course) have been included as a useful feature; needless to say they can only be approximate, lengths varying widely from conductor to conductor and edition to edition.

Many musicians and operatic friends have helped in one way or another to prepare the book, and I am particularly grateful to Charles Mackerras, David Lloyd-Jones, Winton Dean, Edmund Tracey and John Warrack for their suggestions, as well as, it goes without saying, to Antony Peattie and Nicholas John for their contributions. Elisabeth Ingles, as an indefatigable and constructive editor, helped vastly to see the new edition through the press.

HAREWOOD
July 1997

THE OPERAS

A

ADOLPHE ADAM

(born 24 July 1803, died 3 May 1856)

Adam assisted his teacher Boïeldieu in 1825 with the preparation of La Dame Blanche for the Opéra-Comique but it was his early collaboration with Eugène Scribe which set him off on the road to success. From 1826 until his death in 1856 he produced a stream of mainly light operas, and it is ironical that only one, Le Postillon de Longjumeau, is remembered today, and it mainly because of the brilliance of its one hit number. On the other hand, the music of his ballet Giselle is known wherever a ballet company points its toes.

LE POSTILLON DE LONGJUMEAU

The Coachman of Longjumeau

Opera in three acts, text by A. de Leuven and L.L. Brunswick. Première at Opéra-Comique, Paris, 13 October 1836, with Roy, Chollet, Henri. First performed St James's Theatre, London, 1837 (in English); Drury Lane, 1845 (in French); New York, 1840 (in English). Revived Berlin, 1930, with de Garmo, Roswaenge, Helgers, conducted by Blech; Vienna Volksoper, 1964, with Murray Dickie. Still performed in German opera houses. The most famous of all Chappelous was Theodor Wachtel, who himself began life as a stableman.

| | |
|--|----------|
| Madeleine, Chappelou's wife | Soprano |
| Rose | Soprano |
| Chappelou, a coachman | Tenor |
| Le Marquis de Corcy, head of the Paris Opéra | Tenor |
| Bijou, Chappelou's friend | Baritone |
| Bourdon | Bass |

Place: Longjumeau; Paris
Time: Early Nineteenth Century
Running Time: 2 hours 5 minutes

Act I. Chappelou, the coach-driver of Longjumeau, is about to be married to the young mistress of the post-house, Madeleine. The wedding over, his friends make him stay behind – as is the custom – to sing. He says he has no heart for it, but in response to their urging chooses a favourite song, on the subject of the Coachman of Longjumeau, who wins the love of a beautiful princess, mainly, one gathers from the music, because of his exquisitely beautiful post-horn playing. This is the song which has made the opera famous, and the tenor who can imitate the post-horn when it comes to the top Ds is sure of a success.

The effect of the song is further-reaching than either singer or those who asked for it could have guessed. Chappelou is heard by the Marquis de Corcy, who is head of the Opéra in Paris, and who urges Chappelou to come with him to augment the sadly depleted ranks of the tenors of his company. Chappelou tries to postpone his departure, but the Marquis is adamant; if he wants to come to Paris, he must leave straight away. Chappelou charges his friend Bijou, who also has a voice, to tell Madeleine he will be back tomorrow, or next week, but that he has had to leave hurriedly, to meet the King in Paris and to make his fortune. Madeleine is broken-hearted and furious with her inconstant husband, but Bijou makes up his mind to follow Chappelou, so that his voice may be given to the world as well.

Act II. Madeleine is now in Paris under the assumed name of Madame Latour. Having inherited a fortune from an old aunt who has died, she passes as a rich and noble lady, but the whole object of her expedition is to find her errant husband and punish him for what he has done to her. These sentiments she puts forward in an aria at the beginning of the act; but it is clear that in spite of the ten years of absence she still loves her husband.

A rehearsal is in progress at the Opéra, where Chappelou, under the name of St Phar, has become principal tenor, and where his friend Bijou (called Alcindor) is leader of the chorus. St Phar protests that they are all asked to sing too much, and he at any rate has a sore throat. The Marquis is in despair; the performance they are rehearsing is to be given in honour of Madame Latour, and the Marquis is in love with her. Immediately, St Phar seems better – he too is violently in love with the lady – and he is able to sing his song, top C, top D, and all.

There is an interview between St Phar and Madame Latour in which the tenor lays bare his heart and Madame eventually agrees to marry him. He is congratulated by his comrades and invites them all to the wedding. St Phar, it should be mentioned, unwilling to commit bigamy, has persuaded his friend Bijou to dress up as a priest and take the wedding ceremony, but Madame has somehow got to know about this and has locked Bijou up, together with the second leader of the chorus, so that the ceremony is performed by a real priest.

Act III. The Marquis remembers that St Phar has a wife at home and so is fully conscious that bigamy is being committed; however, since he is himself in love with the beautiful Madame Latour, he does nothing to prevent the marriage going through, but he rejoices to himself that tomorrow he will be able to bring the police to arrest his rival. St Phar is full of happiness in his marriage, but it is short-lived. Bijou escapes, and reveals the horrid truth to him; it was not he but a priest who officiated at the wedding, which is thus not mock, but real.

Madeleine has not yet finished with her husband, but comes to him in her original country clothes, and with Madeleine's voice. Then, blowing out the candle, she proceeds to hold a conversation with herself, altering her voice from that of Madeleine to that of Madame Latour and back again. Chappelou does not know what to say, and his despair is complete when the police are heard knocking at the door. Headed by the Marquis, they prepare to take him away – to be hanged, says the Marquis. Madeleine demands to be allowed to go with him – and then suddenly puts on her 'grand' voice, saying that there are two witnesses to the crime. She reveals the truth, and all is forgiven.

H.

JOHN ADAMS

(born 15 February 1947)

NIXON IN CHINA

Opera in three acts, libretto by Alice Goodman. Première Houston, 22 October 1987, with James Maddalena and Carolann Page as the Nixons, John Duykers as Mao Tse-Tung and Sanford Sylvan as Chou En-Lai; conductor John DeMain. Seen in New York, Amsterdam and at the Edinburgh Festival with largely the same cast. First performed Adelaide Festival, 1992, with Maddalena and Eilene Hannan, conductor David Porcelijn.

Chou En-Lai, *Chinese Prime Minister*Baritone

Richard Nixon, *President of the U.S.A.*Baritone

Henry Kissinger, American

Secretary of StateBass-Baritone

Nancy T'ang, First Secretary to

Mao Tse-TungSoprano

Second Secretary to MaoSoprano

Third Secretary to MaoContralto

Mao Tse-Tung, *President of China*Tenor

Pat NixonSoprano

Chiang Ch'ing (Madam Mao)High Soprano

Chinese Servicemen, Newsmen, Workers, Citizens

Place: Beijing, China

Time: 21–25 February 1972

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

Born ten years after Philip Glass and described by Alice Goodman as 'a minimalist bored with minimalism', John Adams is nonetheless regularly grouped with Steve Reich and Philip Glass. It was Peter Sellars, because he prefers to work on a new opera rather than an existing one, who came up with Nixon in China as an operatic subject. The three collaborators agreed from the start that this was to be a heroic opera and in no sense a satire. Its strength they believed would come from the extreme familiarity all over the world of characters such as the Nixons and Kissinger.

Nixon in China (Houston Grand Opera at Edinburgh Festival, 1988, director Peter Sellars, designer Adrienne Lobel). John Duykers (Mao), James Maddalena (Nixon), Thomas Hammons (Kissinger).

Adams has said: 'Something tremendously powerful was lost when composers moved away from tonal harmony and regular pulses ... Among other things the audience was lost.' He sees his score as 'ultra-American' and goes on, 'it is very important that people going to see this opera understand that what may seem on the surface like a divertissement or a comic strip, is actually a multilayered and extremely complex work.'

Act I. As prelude, the violins, violas and keyboards of the orchestra play rising scales, joined after a bit by woodwinds which add slower scales, the bass constantly changing. The scales continue as Chinese soldiers, waiting for the arrival of the American President, engage in slow, repetitive patriotic singing. Tension grows as the tempo gradually quickens and a crescendo develops to the moment when the Presidential 'plane (The Spirit of '76) comes to a stop, at which point banality takes over: 'Your flight was smooth, I hope? Oh yes, smoother than usual, I guess.' Nixon's aria, 'News has a kind of mystery' (the word 'news' reiterated twelve times), is neo-classical in style, with a nod to Stravinsky, and during its course Chou attempts to introduce various civic worthies while Nixon goes into ecstasy over the idea that the 'eyes and ears of Hissstory' are taking note of their actions. Clichés are resoundingly exchanged but the extensive aria suggests idealism ('The Eastern Hemisphere beckons to us, and we have flown east of the sun, west of the moon, across an ocean of distrust') as well as platitudes ('It's prime time in the U.S.A. ... they watch us now').

Scene ii. Chairman Mao's study. Mao receives President Nixon. His three secretaries echo Mao's words almost throughout and the ensemble bubbles along, with Mao dispensing (as Alice Goodman has written) 'philosophical apophthegms, unexpected political observations, and gnomic jokes'. Nixon falls back on diplomatic fencing, and Kissinger, cast throughout as a kind of villain,¹ is constantly, as he himself admits, out of his depth.

Mao continues to wax philosophical, the secretaries to echo, and Nixon and Kissinger only occasionally to get half an idea in edgeways. Suddenly Mao has a brainwave: 'Founders come first, then profiteers', and this will return to him every now and then until the end of the scene.

As Mao appears to doze off in his chair, Nixon attempts to seize the initiative:

... I think this leap
Forward to light is the first step
Of all our youth, all nations' youth;
History is our mother, we
Best do her honour in this way.

But Mao is not to be out-smarted:

History is a dirty sow:
If we by chance escape her maw
She overlies us.

The scene draws to a close and Mao is left to his books and his dictation: 'Founders come first ...'

Scene iii. A banquet is being held in the Great Hall of the People. President and First Lady sit on either side of Premier Chou. The atmosphere is more relaxed and Nixon and Pat exchange a few words at the start. Gentle verbal fencing between the principals precedes a toast – 'Gambai' – before Premier Chou's speech, which is assured and yet subtle, gaining in poise until Chou reaches his peroration:

All patriots were brothers once:
Let us drink to the time when they Shall be brothers again. Gambai!

Nixon seems at first nervous but confidence grows as he speaks, not without a glance at the watching media, until he reaches a purple climax and Enthusiasm takes over. Nixon plays a trump card:

... Everyone
Listen, just let me say one thing.
I opposed China. I was wrong.

The act ends in an orgy of toasts.

Act II, scene i. It is the morning of the second day. Snow has fallen in the night and it is Mrs Nixon's turn to meet China – or at least that part of it she is officially to be shown. She is taken to a glass factory, a clinic and a pig farm, she meets crowds of children and finishes with a visit to the Ming Tombs. The action occurs in the interludes of an extended scena and aria: 'I don't day-dream and don't look back.' The aria is personal in tone, full of home-spun wisdom and patriotic utterance.

Scene ii. Together with Madam Mao and Premier Chou, the Nixons are to see a ballet performance, 'The Red Detachment of Women', a revolutionary farrago (devised in real life for the cultural revolution in 1966) by Chiang Ch'ing. Her aim was to remove Western cultural influences and to replace them with scenarios of political significance. The trouble is that the music written specially for them (as John Adams once suggested, probably by a committee) had distinct overtones of the nineteenth-century Russian ballets they so despised.

From the outset the atmosphere for the ballet is one of expectancy. It is a bizarre affair. Young women are chained to posts on an estate and Lao Szu, the landlord's factotum (played by the singer of Kissinger), has one of them, Ching Hua, beaten into insensibility. Pat Nixon cannot bear the stage action and intervenes in spite of all the President's attempts to stop her. The stage rain (as is consistent with the surrealist action) appears to soak them both and Ching Hua is raised to her feet. The People's Army takes over and Ching Hua is presented with a rifle. In the courtyard of the tyrant's mansion, the girls dance and Ching Hua attempts rebellion. This is the cue for Chiang Ch'ing to start an aria and somehow bring the action to an end.

The music is ostinato-based and builds a considerable head of rhythmic steam. At one point the composer quotes Richard Strauss (Jokanaan from Salome) and at another Wagner (Götterdämmerung) and the dance grows again in rhythmic intensity, not without a debt to Carl Orff. Chiang Ch'ing's aria 'I am the wife of Mao Tse-Tung' is an extended solo, studded with top B flats, Cs and the occasional D, and the music's relentless nature mirrors that of the character.

Act III. It is the last night in Beijing and the elegiac music suggests we are in another world, contemplative and almost devoid of action. Too much action over the six days of the opera's duration has drained all energy from the protagonists, so that they are reduced to musings on present, past and future. Only Mao appears to retain a semblance of vitality, and he dances with his wife and remembers their first meeting. Chiang Ch'ing is as irrepressible as always but Dr Kissinger excuses himself and leaves. Conversations cross and duets momentarily blend to ensembles.

¹ A Harvard in-joke apparently on the part of the three alumni, Goodman, Adams and Sellars, on their former professor.

The atmosphere intensifies, the tempo quickens but the drama stays on a contemplative plane. Chou is the most cogently philosophical, Mao content to babble more or less purposelessly, Chiang Ch'ing mostly to reiterate Marxist slogans, Nixon to talk aimlessly of the war and risks perceived but not quite confronted, Pat to react to what her husband says. Often the composer, while writing lyrical music of considerable beauty, seems unconcerned to make the words audible. Nonetheless, we hear Chou's summing up of his own outlook and of the memorable five days:

'I'm old and I cannot sleep
For ever, like the young ...
How much of what we did was good?'

Nixon in China is not concerned with the dramatic situations and confrontations dear to the hearts of Verdi or Mozart, rather with the clashes of will and point of view and the meeting of opposites which inform Wagner's Ring. Of course John Adams's method differs from that of operatic masters of the past. But the acute observation of character set out and implied in the libretto – Mao's babbling nonetheless enshrining moments of truth, the Nixons' small talk revealing significant patterns of behaviour, Chou ready with a phrase to bridge gaps or encapsulate a philosophy – these verbal leads stimulate Adams's music so that it captivates listeners with its accessibility, holds their attention as he skilfully avoids patterns coagulating with repetition, and finally steers the opera not only through its use of a modern and historically important event but ensures that it adds up to a true dramatic experience. H.

THE DEATH OF KLINGHOFFER

Opera in a prologue and two acts, commissioned by Brooklyn Academy of Music, La Monnaie, Opéra de Lyon, Glyndebourne, Los Angeles Festival and San Francisco Opera, libretto by Alice Goodman. First performance at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie, Brussels, 19 March 1991, with James Maddalena as the Captain, Sanford Sylvan as Klinghoffer, Thomas Hammons as the First Officer and 'Rambo', Stephanie Friedman as Omar. U.S. première at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, New York, 1991. Performed in all the opera houses that commissioned it (except for Glyndebourne), as well as in Vienna.

The Captain of the *Achille Lauro*Baritone
The First Officer (Giordano Bruno)Bass-Baritone
'Rambo', a terroristBass-Baritone
Swiss GrandmotherMezzo-Soprano
Austrian WomanMezzo-Soprano
British Dancing Girl.....Mezzo-Soprano
Molqi, a terroristTenor
Mamoud, a terrorist.....Baritone
Leon Klinghoffer.....Baritone
Omar, a terroristMezzo-Soprano
Marilyn KlinghofferContralto

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

The Death of Klinghoffer is based on the hijacking of the Italian cruise liner Achille Lauro by Palestinian terrorists between 7 and 9 October 1985. As in Nixon in China, the subject was proposed by Peter Sellars, who directed both operas. The events were just as real, yet the same team of composer, librettist, director and choreographer (Mark Morris) treated them in very different ways. John Adams has suggested that his model in his second opera was Bach's Passions. This is helpful, in that it 'explains' why there is so little interaction between the opera's characters: most of the time they sing by themselves, looking back on the events on board. The opera's prologue comprises two symmetrical choruses; the first act has two scenes, each of which is made up of five separate monologues. The second act repeats this format in its first scene, and precedes it with a choral prologue devoted to the story of Hagar. Four other choruses interrupt the sequence of individuals expressing themselves. They are distinguished as Ocean, Night, Desert and Day Chorus. In the first production the same baritone sang The First Officer and 'Rambo'; the same mezzo-soprano sang the Swiss Grandmother, Austrian Woman and British Dancing Girl, and dancers shadowed several singers as their alter egos.

Prologue. Exiled Palestinians remember how Israel destroyed their houses. Exiled Jews left with nothing but 'empty hands' long for the promised land, Zion.

Act I. The Captain of the Achille Lauro remembers how the hijacking began. Most of the tourists were ashore, leaving the old and infirm. When he was told of the terrorists, he went to the restaurant where he saw two boys with guns. A Swiss Grandmother had stayed on board with her two-year-old grandson. The First Officer remembers how he supervised taking a wounded man to the sick bay and so had to imagine the Captain's speech exhorting calm. Molqi relives the hijacking: 'Give these orders. Nobody stirs.' The portentously slow Ocean Chorus asks 'Is not the ocean itself their past?'

Scene ii. As the ship moves towards Syria, Mamoud remembers firing his first gun and how his mother 'could not remember' expulsion or interment. He remembers closing his brother's eyes, after he had been decapitated. When the Captain suggests that if only Mamoud could talk like that with his enemies, peace would result, Mamoud replies that, then 'our hope dies and I shall die too'. For the Captain, the ship should be like a hotel, but is inevitably more like a prison. He sings this simultaneously with the Austrian Woman's reminiscence in mannered Sprechgesang of how she kept her distance, stayed in her locked cabin and sustained herself on fruit and chocolate, unafraid. The Night Chorus brings the first act to a dramatic close with a reflection on persecution, ending, 'I am afraid for myself, for myself, for myself'.

Act II, scene i. The Chorus tell the story of Hagar and her son Ishmael, whom Islam reveres as the prophet Mohammed's ancestor. Hagar was expelled by the barren Sarah, jealous that her handmaiden had given birth to her husband Abraham's son. Hagar had no milk for her son, who grew weak. Determined that 'My son will die as a free man on his own land' she turned from him (in despair, presumably), 'Then the angel struck open the abandoned well'. After the grim cross-rhythms of the accompaniment and the grinding vocal line, the last line lacks any epiphanic charge. Ominously introduced by stuttering keyboard figures and tense, high violin wails, Molqi comments on the impasse and dreads what he may have to do. The Captain reports that they have received no answer to the terrorists' demands. Mamoud announces 'Now we will kill you all.' Leon Klinghoffer tells the hijackers, 'There's so much anger in you. And hate.' He refuses to take their political aims seriously. 'You just want to see people die', he tells them, 'You're crazy.' Omar's monologue harps on the exile's feeling of exclusion and the desperation it engenders. The role is sung by a mezzo-soprano, following the eighteenth-century convention for stage adolescents, an apt comment on his passion for a martyr's 'Holy Death'. The Desert Chorus asks mysteriously: 'Is not their desert the garden of the Lord?' In silence, 'Omar and Molqi fight. Molqi wheels Klinghoffer away.'

Scene ii. Marilyn Klinghoffer imagines her husband has been taken to the ship's hospital. During a lengthy, loud orchestral passage he is killed off-stage. Unaware, she resolves to shut her eyes and pretend the hijacking never happened. Molqi hands over her husband's passport with the laconic (spoken) phrase, 'American kaput'. Mamoud announces that every fifteen minutes one more will be shot. The Captain remembers rebuking them; now he asks them to kill him and redeem his honour. Molqi asks, if they kill again, what will 'their answer' be?

During the 'Aria of the Falling Body (Gymnopédies)', Klinghoffer's double dances with the singer's body. Mamoud reports that it is 'over. It's done.' The Day Chorus ends the act, asking, 'Is not the day made to disperse their grief?'

Scene iii. The Captain tells Marilyn that her husband has been killed ('I am told his body was thrown overboard in the wheelchair') and attempts to comfort her. A saxophone adds its mournful comment, then she turns on him in fury, in some of the most convincing music of the opera: 'You embraced them!' For once, the music made of fragments speaks for feelings that cannot be articulated. She looks back on their close, loving marriage and ends the opera bitterly but with great dignity, 'They should have killed me. I wanted to die.'

While Bach's Passions supply an analogy for The Death of Klinghoffer's formality, the analogy unhelpfully raises high expectations of its emotional charge: perhaps because it deals with such an explosive topic as the relations between Jews and Arabs (or between the West and Islam) and was completed while the United States was bombing Baghdad, the opera distances itself from emotion. For all its instrumental inventiveness (particularly for woodwind, but also featuring three electronic synthesizers/samplers), the music deals in monotony occasionally inflected with orientalist melismas. Introductory ostinatos set a cracking pace, as they do in Handel (or Verdi, for that matter), but when the solo voices enter they add disappointingly little: in trying to avoid rhetoric, they take no risks. Alice Goodman's libretto veers from poetry to 'Poetry' – a vivid, colloquial idiom that has room for compact eloquence occasionally sinks into obscurantist bathos (particularly in the opera's choruses), which repels comprehension. P.

THOMAS ADÈS

(born 1 March 1971)

POWDER HER FACE

Opera in two acts, libretto by Philip Hensher. First performance by Almeida Opera, Cheltenham, 1 July 1995, with Jill Gomez as Duchess, Roger Bryson as Hotel Manager, Niall Morris as Electrician and Valdine Anderson as Maid, conducted by Brad Cohen. German première, Magdeburg, 21 September 1996, conducted by Mathias Husmann; U.S. première at University of California, Berkeley, 25 April 1997, conducted by Kent Nagano.

DuchessDramatic Soprano

Hotel Manager, also Duke, Laundryman,

Other GuestBass

Electrician, also Lounge Lizard, Waiter, Priest,

Rubbernecker, Delivery BoyTenor

Maid, also Confidante, Waitress, Mistress,

Rubbernecker, Society JournalistHigh Soprano

Time: 1934–90

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Powder Her Face owes as much to myth as to history. The Duchess has an archetypal quality not unrelated to Lulu, the subject of the librettist's first novel (Other Lulus, 1994). As in Berg's Lulu, multiple roles suggest that the action may take place in the heroine's mind. The opera alludes to Margaret, Duchess of Argyll (1912–93), but as an exemplar of a life devoted to what would not last. It helps to know that a photograph produced at her divorce trial showed her engaged in fellatio with 'a headless man' (his face was out of shot). To understand the opera she should be thought of as someone who 'died, as we all do, with nothing, and like all of us, left nothing behind except her memory'.¹

Act I follows a Laughter-Prologue. 1990. The Electrician mimics the Duchess to amuse the Maid: 'I was betrayed, girl'. As he quotes a popular song celebrating her infamy, he fails to notice that the Duchess herself has come in behind him. A door opens as the Duchess reminisces, anticipating the arrival of the Duke, 'my better angel'. During the interlude it shuts slowly and the Maid and Electrician dress up as Confidante and as Lounge Lizard respectively.

1934. A country house. The Confidante and Lounge Lizard discuss Mrs Freeling's divorce from her husband and look forward to the arrival of the Duke. Mrs Freeling's aria, 'I could never grow bored of dukedoms. But now I'm so bored', is sung simultaneously with the others' duet. The Lounge Lizard starts the gramophone and sings the song written about Mrs Freeling, 'Respectability stretch'. The door opens to reveal the Hotel Manager as Duke.

1936. A series of tableaux, lit only by flash bulbs, traces the course of the Duke's and Mrs Freeling's wedding before the Electrician as Priest. Frozen moments from the ceremony alternate with scenes from a troilistic orgy, illustrating the Maid as Waitress's Fancy Aria.

1953. Another hotel bedroom. The Duchess in a dressing gown rings room service and orders beef sandwiches and wine. The Electrician as Waiter brings her order, and walks over to the bed where she is sitting. In the words of the Radio 3 announcer, 'Room service takes a rather unusual form': her words stop and she 'goes off into humming'. A flash-bulb goes off as the Waiter has an orgasm. The Duchess succumbs to a fit of coughing.

¹ Philip Hensher, note in the programme for the première.

1953. The Duke's bedroom. The Maid as Mistress hints to the Hotel Manager as Duke that the Duchess is promiscuously unfaithful and suggests he look in her case. He finds the camera.

Act II. 1955. A courtroom. The Maid and the Electrician as Rubberneckers agree that the Duke knew what his wife was up to. The Duchess enters, followed by the Hotel Manager, who puts on a robe and a wig to act as Judge and give his verdict. He condemns the Duchess as a pervert, a beast, 'insatiable, unnatural and altogether fairly appalling'. The Duchess unveils herself and bravely faces the consequences, believing 'I am still loved.'

1970. The hotel bedroom. Interviewed by the Maid as Journalist for a women's magazine, the Duchess gives the secrets of her beauty regime, 'Go to bed early and often', but then goes on to rant against blacks, Jews, concrete. Meanwhile the Electrician as Delivery Boy delivers various hat boxes. The scene ends as the Duchess rips up the bill.

1990. The hotel bedroom. The Hotel Manager tells the Duchess that because her bill hasn't been paid for eight months, 'Everything is used up. And now you must go.' The Duchess looks back on a life surrounded by servants: 'The only people who were good to me were paid for it.'

Ghost Epilogue. The Electrician and Maid emerge from under the bed and then strip it in a 'sheet-folding Tango'. They flirt before she leaves.

Words and music are closely allied in Powder her Face. The librettist said that in choosing the subject itself, he was thinking of Thomas Adès's music, since the composer's 'tottering, extravagant inventions on the ruins of tonality' suggested 'the wrecked beauty of an old woman'. Philip Hensher also explained in a programme note that the title can be read as 'an instruction to a maquilleuse' and as a reflection on the Duchess's fate, our common fate as 'food for worms'. The music in Adès's first opera is not afraid to acknowledge its debts, to Astor Piazzola, in the tangos that frame Powder Her Face and connote a dance with death, for example, or to The Rake's Progress, so as to parallel the divorce trial with the auction scene. The wit and the spectacle, the music's occasional bursts of pastiche and its jokes accentuate a disturbing seriousness, which emerges ungloved in the interludes (as so often in twentieth-century operas). The première was marked by the unique performance of Jill Gomez, who invested the role of the Duchess with both glamour and pathos. She brought out the intensity of the Duchess's needs – Adès sets 'Come in' over thirty-two bars of music – and, as a result, ensured that the opera that began as a joke ended in something like tragedy.

Powder her Face (Cheltenham Festival, 1995, director David Farr, sets by Angela Davies). Jill Gomez as the Duchess.

EUGEN D'ALBERT

(born 10 April 1864, died 3 March 1932)

TIEFLAND

The Lowlands

Opera in a prologue and two acts, text by Rudolph Lothar after a Catalanian play Tierra Baixa, by Angel Guimerà. Première, Neues Deutsches Theater, Prague, 15 November 1903. First performed in Berlin, 1907, with Labia as Marta; Vienna, 1908; Metropolitan, 1908, with Destinn, Schmedes, Feinhals, conductor Hertz; Covent Garden, 1910, with Terry, Teyte, John Coates, Frederick Austin, conductor Beecham. Revived Berlin, 1939, with Rünger, Völker, Bockelmann; Vienna, 1947, with Helena Braun, Friedrich, Kamann, conductor Loibner. Kirsten Flagstad made her operatic debut as Nuri.

| | |
|--|-----------|
| Sebastiano, a rich landowner | Baritone |
| Tommaso, the village elder (aged ninety) | Bass |
| Moruccio, a miller | Baritone |
| Marta | Soprano |
| Pepa | Soprano |
| Antonia | Soprano |
| Rosalia | Contralto |
| Nuri, a little girl | Soprano |
| Pedro, a shepherd | Tenor |
| Nando, a shepherd | Tenor |
| The Priest | Mute |

Place: The Pyrenees and the Lowlands of Catalonia

Time: Early Twentieth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

D'Albert, who was born in Glasgow, was not only a pianist of very high attainments, but also a successful composer, whose operas range from comedy to a German form of verismo; Tiefland is an example of the latter aspect of his style. D'Albert was married no fewer than six times, his second wife being the great pianist Teresa Carreño.

Prologue. A rocky slope high up in the Pyrenees. A shepherd's hut can be seen. Pedro and Nando greet each other, Pedro observing that he has not seen anyone for three months, and has not spoken to a soul for six. He protests that he finds the shepherd's life perfect, but that he has in his prayers asked God to send him a wife ('Zwei Vaterunser bet' ich').

Sebastiano appears at the top, accompanied by Marta and Tommaso; he sends Tommaso off to look for Pedro. He explains the object of their errand to Marta, who has been his mistress for some time. He has brought her up here to show her to Pedro, whom he has picked out as a suitable husband!

Pedro tells Nando of his good fortune, but the latter warns him about conditions down there in the valley. Pedro sings a last greeting to the mountains ('Ich grüss' noch einmal meine Berge').

Act I. The interior of the mill. Moruccio is working, but is interrupted by the arrival and importunate questioning of Pepa, Antonia, and Rosalia; is it true that Marta is getting married?

Marta comes in for a moment, but, seeing all the people there, hurries out again. The three women begin to laugh at the curious situation which her marriage will create, not least for the duffer who is to become her husband. Marta comes back and drives them out. She seems pleased to see Nuri, and it looks as though she will confide in the child.

Marta reflects on her misery. She is Sebastiano's property, and had not the courage to free herself by drowning herself in the stream. Now she is to marry a mountain lout... She hurries out when she hears what she thinks may be the noise of the escort bringing her bridegroom-to-be. Moruccio asks Tommaso how he came to be a party to the arrangement of such a wicked marriage. Pedro arrives, closely followed by Sebastiano, who orders that Marta be brought from her room.

While Pedro is getting dressed outside, Marta and Sebastiano are alone. There is an extensive duet in which Sebastiano claims that Marta's love will be his even after she is married to Pedro. That very night, if she sees a light, it will be the signal that he is there.

Pedro comes with other villagers for Marta, and they leave for the church. Tommaso, however, asks to speak to Sebastiano. He hints at the accusation which Moruccio has made against Marta, but Sebastiano says it is false; moreover, he who made it shall no longer remain in his service.

The moon rises, the wedding procession can be heard returning, and Marta comes in, followed by Pedro. She will have none of him, and even refuses to accept the wedding present he offers her, a silver Taler. It was hard-earned, he says, and proceeds to tell Marta the story of his fight with a wolf which preyed on the sheep, and which he eventually managed to kill with his knife, receiving as a reward the Taler from Sebastiano's own hands ('Wolfserzählung').

Marta seems impressed by his narrative and touched that he wants to give the piece of silver to her. But she bids him goodnight, and points to a room which she describes as his in exactly the opposite direction from hers. When he protests, she presumes that he has been told what a shameful bargain he made when he married her. But Pedro knows nothing of her past, and speaks of nothing but his love for her. Suddenly, Pedro sees a light in her room. He feels in his pocket for his knife and is about to approach the curtain which covers the door when the light disappears and Marta says that she saw nothing. She resigns herself to spending the night in the main room, and Pedro lies down on the floor, determined to see her vigil through with her.

Act II. The curtain rises to show Marta and Pedro as at the end of Act I. Nuri is heard singing behind the scenes, and Marta goes out to her room. Nuri wakes Pedro, who thinks for a moment it is Marta. He says he will not stay any longer; he is sure there was a man in her room last night.

His suspicions are confirmed when Nuri says she is sorry everyone is laughing at him on account of the marriage he has made. He now knows that his dishonour is public property – but at whose hands is he dishonoured?

Marta sees him with Nuri, and has a spasm of jealousy. He goes out with Nuri, and Marta is about to follow them when she meets Tommaso coming to see her. He curses her for what she has let him all unwittingly do to Pedro. In a moving passage ('Ich weiss nicht, wer mein Vater war') she tells him her story, how she was left alone with her mother and they earned their living by begging in the streets. One day an old man, a cripple, joined them, and after that he lived with them. Her mother died, and she stayed with the cripple, who would not let her go as her dancing brought them money. Eventually their wanderings led them to this valley, where she was seen by Sebastiano, who spoke the first kind words she had ever heard. The cripple was installed as miller, and she became mistress of Sebastiano, the lord of the manor. She was fourteen years old when she arrived. Now she has been forced into marriage with Pedro; but a wonderful thing happened to her in the chapel when she fancied she heard a voice proclaiming him as her destined mate. Tommaso tells her she must, if she loves Pedro, tell him her secret.

As Tommaso is leaving, the women start to question him; what does he know? Nothing, he answers. Pedro is the next to be cross-questioned. He loses his temper and tries to force them to tell him why they laugh at him. Ask Marta, they tell him. Marta brings him his food, but he tells her that he should kill her, not forgive her, as she asks. She tells him she was another man's before she was married to him; everyone was laughing at the wedding for that reason. Pedro stabs her in the arm, and Marta weeps for joy. At last he has punished her for her fault; will he not strike her dead? Pedro is in despair; will she not come with him to the mountains where they will live together in peace? Marta joins her voice with his.

They are about to leave arm-in-arm when Sebastiano appears at the gate. Pedro tells him that he must take back his gift of the mill; he and his bride are returning to the mountains – but Sebastiano does not even notice Pedro. He commands Marta to dance for him, as she used to ('Hüll in die Mantille'). Pedro orders Marta to follow him. When Marta tells him whose light it was in her room the previous night, Pedro is with difficulty restrained from attacking Sebastiano. Men seize Pedro and drag him away, while Marta falls unconscious.

Tommaso appears and tells Sebastiano that the father of his bride-to-be will not be seeing him that day, as Sebastiano was expecting. He, Tommaso, has made it his business to inform him of the background to the projected marriage, and he will have nothing further to do with Sebastiano. There is a violent duet between Marta and Sebastiano, the latter proclaiming that she is all that is left to him now, Marta objecting that she loves Pedro. Pedro comes in, ready to fight Sebastiano for Marta.

Sebastiano makes for the gate, but Pedro heads him off. He draws his knife, but throws it away, saying that they will fight with bare hands. Sebastiano makes an effort to reach the knife but Pedro seizes him by the throat in a grip of iron, not releasing him until all signs of life are extinct. Pedro goes to the entrance of the mill calling for the villagers. They see the corpse on the floor. Now is the time to laugh, orders Pedro. As for him, he will away into the hills, taking Marta his wife with him. H.

DOMINICK ARGENTO

(born 27 October 1927)

Born of Sicilian immigrant parents, Argento studied with Nicolas Nabokov and Hugo Weisgall, and later with Dallapiccola. His first opera (1954) started a line of successful works, large and small, some with a dodecaphonic basis. Postcard from Morocco has proved the most successful, though The Aspern Papers has been described as a score 'having both twelve-note and bel canto implications'.

POSTCARD FROM MOROCCO

Opera in one act, libretto by John Donahue. Première, Minneapolis, by Center Opera Company, 14 October 1971, conductor Philip Brunelle. First performed King's College, London, 1976.

Lady with a Cake BoxSoprano
 Man with a Shoe Sample Kit/
 Second PuppetBaritone
 Man with a Cornet Case/Puppet Maker.....Bass
 Lady with a Hat Box/Foreign Singer.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Man with Old Luggage/First
 Puppet/Operetta SingerTenor
 Lady with a Hand Mirror/Operetta
 SingerColoratura Soprano
 Mr Owen, the man with a paintboxTenor

Place: A Railway Station in Morocco

Time: 1914

Running Time: 1 hour 35 minutes

The opera is scored for seven singers with eight instrumentalists in the orchestra. The abstract libretto has only one named character, Mr Owen, and the opera is built up of a series of surrealistically connected episodes, to which composer and librettist have attached a collage of nonsense sentences, ideas, disparate, often attractive, even lyrical, in themselves but little related apparently to what went before or comes later. Any number of dramatic interpretations are obviously possible, and the absurdist overtones are apparent. The scenery is described as wacky or exotic; there are entertainments present, says the librettist, and some of the people visible are real, some not. 'The decor is false but charming ... Accompanying this little comedy is an Algerian orchestra ... in costume and fez ... The live characters play more than one role ... We see each one trying hard to protect whatever small part of himself he has in his suitcase.'

Seven people are stranded at a station. Each character has a solo in which he or she seems as prepared to reveal some element of personality as they are unprepared to reveal the contents of the item of luggage they carry.

The Lady with a travelling mirror sings in high, coloratura style; two puppets plan to build a boat; the mezzo-soprano rather expressively sings nonsense. In lyrical phrases, one tenor declares he only travels with old luggage, not wanting to risk anything important. The Man with a cornet admits his uncle was a pro, which he is not; but he won't show the instrument. The Lady with the hat box is equally enigmatic. The band tunes, and there follows a version of the Spinning Chorus from The Flying Dutchman, some percussion and brass jokes, a snatch of the Ring, all lumped together as 'Souvenirs de Bayreuth'.

The Man with a shoe sample kit admits his case is specially made, but will show them his wares only by appointment. It is the turn of Mr Owen with his paintbox. What kind of pictures does he paint? Shoes, for example? Lovers sing in Viennese fashion before the lady with the cake box is quizzed in her turn. She keeps her beloved in a box, she says. You're joking, of course? In a duet of some charm, she and Mr Owen converse at cross purposes. Mr Owen kisses her, then confesses a dream to a cardboard priest.

The puppeteer declares he gets ideas by looking at people – their luggage, shoes, hats and so on. A pas-sacaglia begins, the coloratura soprano ascending climactically to a high E (or even G, if she has one), and Mr Owen's paintbox is revealed as empty. Isolated, he becomes the Captain of a ship, issues orders, and his grandiose tenor statements lead to an ensemble and the opera's end.

H.

EMILIO ARRIETA

(born 21 October 1823, died 11 February 1894)

Opera in Spain was always much concerned with Italian influence and Italian works. In the nineteenth century, sporadic attempts at Spanish opera began to bear fruit. The rapid rise from about 1850 of a grand, four-act form of zarzuela, with composers like Barbieri, Chapi and Serrano leading the way, established something approaching a school. In Catalonia, Pedrell was followed by Vives and later by Albéniz and Granados, Falla and Turina, but the flag was kept flying mainly by derivatives of zarzuela, whether direct (as for instance Arrieta's Marina) or simply zarzuelas on a bigger scale. The latter often had a less popular-style plot so that elsewhere they would have been styled as operas, or at least operettas, and would have been played in opera houses and sung by opera singers.

Arrieta, orphaned early on, contrived to reach Milan where he studied and even achieved the writing of an Italian opera, Ildegonda, with libretto by one of Verdi's collaborators, Solera. In Madrid, he was encouraged by Barbieri's success to take up zarzuela, and in 1853 was highly successful with El Dominó azul, every one of whose numbers is said to have been encored at the première. Marina followed in 1855, and he wrote over fifty zarzuelas, deciding in 1871 with a little doctoring to turn the successful Marina into an opera (he replaced spoken dialogue with recitative and restructured the two-act zarzuela into a three-act opera with a quantity of added music). He was professor of composition in Madrid from 1857, numbering Chapi and Bretón among his pupils, and director from 1868 to his death. Arrieta was regarded as a technically adroit composer, though Lionel Salter tells us some contemporaries regarded him as unromantic and 'the most academic and circumspect Spanish musician of his time'. Fortunately, that does not show in the very attractive score he wrote for Marina, where, in spite of the ups and downs of the story, the musical atmosphere is predominantly lively and full of the cheerfulness which so distinguishes the zarzuela genre. H.

MARINA

Opera in three acts, libretto by Francisco Camprodon. Première (as zarzuela), Teatro del Circo, Madrid, 21 September 1855; (as opera) Madrid, 16 March 1871, with Angioliana Ortolani and Enrico Tamberlik.

Marina, an orphanSoprano
Jorge, a sea captainTenor
Roque, Jorge's boatswainBaritone
Pascual, a boat-builderBass
TeresaSoprano
Alberto, a sea-captainBaritone

Place: Lloret, a Fishing Village

Time: The Recent Past

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

Act I. Marina is waiting for Jorge's return from sea. She is an orphan, adopted by Jorge's parents, and she and Jorge have fallen in love without ever declaring their feelings. Alberto, like Jorge a sea captain, tells her that he has a letter from her father, written to her mother just before his death in Trinidad. On her death, it was found among her papers, and he promises to send it to Marina. The boat-builder Pascual woos her ardently but vainly, until Marina hits on the device of accepting Pascual as a means to spur Jorge's interest.

A crowd welcomes Jorge back from his voyage, and he is confident enough of Marina's love to announce that he is shortly getting married. Pascual however steals a march on him and reveals that his fiancée is Marina. Jorge is thunderstruck but tries to disguise his feelings, nonetheless admitting his misery to Roque.

Act II. In the shipyard, Pascual with Marina at his side invites the workmen to his wedding, and Alberto promises to let her have the letter before long, which somehow rouses Pascual's jealousy. Jorge assures everyone that while he lives Marina will never want, Pascual asks Marina to visit his mother, who cannot leave the house, and Jorge is left downcast; even Roque is unable to suggest comfort.

Act III. With a group of seafarers, Jorge drinks to drown his sorrows, a Brindisi which skilfully alternates high spirits with Jorge's melancholy. Marina tries to provide some solace, believing another woman is the root of the problem, but she gets nowhere and leaves in tears. Pascual meanwhile prepares for the wedding festivities. A sailor comes in with the letter Alberto promised Marina, but Pascual, who is suspicious of Alberto and jealous of Marina, contrives to intercept it. He thinks it is a love letter to Marina and his accusation that she loves another brings from her an immediate admission of the charge, whereupon he breaks off the engagement. Jorge discovers that the letter from Marina's father was a wholly innocent affair and not, as he had suspected, a love letter from Alberto. He also finds out that it is he whom she loves, and he and Marina fall into each other's arms. H.

DANIEL-FRANÇOIS AUBER

(born 29 January 1782, died 12 May 1871)

Auber lived to be nearly ninety and played a prominent part in the history of French opera. After some early work of little lasting significance, he began a collaboration with the librettist Eugène Scribe which, with La Muette de Portici in 1828, created effectively a new genre, Grand Opera. Even Wagner was impressed with the novelty of the opera's revolutionary ideas and the scale of its stage production, and Auber followed it a couple of years later with the tuneful but much lighter Fra Diavolo, whose success was hardly less great. He wrote regularly for both the Opéra and the Opéra-Comique until the century was well past the half-way mark, and at least the names of many of these works are still half-familiar – Gustave III (on the story known from Verdi's Ballo, and itself an enjoyable precursor of a later masterpiece), Le Cheval de Bronze, Les diamants de la couronne, and Manon Lescaut (with its famous laughing song). Auber's work was enormously popular during his lifetime though later composers esteemed him less than had Wagner. He was sufficiently renowned to be appointed to succeed his old teacher Cherubini as Director of the Paris Conservatoire.

LA MUETTE DE PORTICI

The Dumb Girl of Portici

Opera in five acts, text by Scribe and Delavigne. Première at the Opéra, Paris, 29 February 1828, with Noblet, Cinti-Damoreau, Nourrit, Dabadie. First performed at Drury Lane, London (in English), 1829; New York, 1829 (in English); Covent Garden, 1845 (in French); 1849 (in Italian), with Grisi and Mario; Metropolitan, 1884, with Bely, Schott, Kögel, conductor Damrosch. Braham was a noted Masaniello. Revived with explicit revolutionary overtones, Berlin, Staatsoper, 1953, with Stolze.

Alphonse (Alfonso) d'Arcos, son of the Spanish

Viceroy of Naples.....Tenor

Lorenzo, his confidant.....Tenor

Selva, an officer of the Viceroy's guard.....Bass

Masaniello, a fisherman of Naples.....Tenor

Pietro, his friend.....Baritone

Fenella, Masaniello's sister.....Dancer

Borella, a fisherman.....Bass

Moreno, a fisherman.....Bass

Elvire (Elvira), a Spanish Princess.....Soprano

A Maid of Honour to the PrincessMezzo-Soprano

Place: Naples

Time: 1647

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

The story of La Muette de Portici is based on the historical happenings of the year 1647, when the people of Naples rose against their Spanish oppressors. The opera is perhaps the most successful Auber ever wrote; within twelve years of the first performance, there had been 100 representations at the Paris Opéra, and the 500th occurred in 1880. 'It is well known', says Loewenberg, 'that a performance (not the first performance though as sometimes stated) at Brussels, 25 August 1830, gave the signal to the outbreak of the Belgian revolution, which led to the independence of the country.'

Act I. After an overture of almost Rossinian animation, the setting is the garden next to the palace of the Duke of Arcos, Spanish Viceroy of Naples. Against a chorus of rejoicing, the Viceroy's son, Alphonse, laments his conduct in seducing an innocent and poor Neapolitan maid, Fenella, who loved him but whom he has had to cast off in view of his approaching marriage with Elvire, the Spanish Princess whom he loves. Fenella, who is dumb, has disappeared, and for a month there has been no sign of her. In a large-scale aria, Elvire proclaims her happiness to the girls who are attending her to the altar. Dances are performed for her entertainment, but Elvire hears that a fishermaid, pursued by soldiers, is asking for her protection. She questions Fenella, who tells her story in dumb show.

The Princess with her attendants goes into the chapel. When she emerges with her bridegroom, Alphonse recognises Fenella, whom Elvire beckons towards them. Fenella indicates that it is Alphonse who has betrayed her. Elvire is horrified, and the act ends in general consternation.

Act II. Portici, on the seashore between Naples and Mount Vesuvius. Fishermen are assembling, and greet their leader, Masaniello. He sings a barcarolle ('Amis, la matinée est belle'), which is fuller of foreboding than of the joy of living. As yet only Pietro, Masaniello's friend, knows of the sad fate of Fenella, but he now reports that he has been unable to find her anywhere. The two friends swear vengeance on the tyrants who have oppressed their people for so long and who have now done so grievous an injury to the most defenceless of their subjects; 'Amour sacré de la patrie' runs the refrain of the famous patriotic duet, which once provided the signal for the start of the Belgian revolution.

Fenella comes to seek Masaniello, and tells him her story. She will not admit her lover's name, but signifies that he is married and so cannot redeem her shame. Masaniello swears to be revenged, and calls the fishermen to arms. They swear perdition to the enemies of the country.

Act III. A public square in Naples. Alphonse tries to persuade Elvire that he loves her, and that his penitence for the wrong he did the fishergirl is sincere. She yields to his entreaty, and he commands the guards to find Fenella and bring her before Elvire. The market is in full swing, and people buy and sell; a tarantella is danced. The guards think they see Fenella and attempt to arrest her. Masaniello intervenes and, when the guards would arrest him too, calls on the people to rise. The soldiers are driven off, but before leading his improvised army off to further conquests, Masaniello calls on them to pray for God's guidance in their just enterprise. The act comes to an end as they prepare to subdue the city.

Act IV. Portici; the hut of Masaniello. Masaniello laments that the battle for liberty should have bred licence and destructiveness among the conquering rabble he led to victory. Fenella appears, pale and with faltering steps, and her brother gently sings her to sleep. Pietro and his companions come to incite Masaniello once more to place himself at their head and lead them to victory and revenge. He pleads for moderation, and for a cessation of bloodshed.

They go to the back of the house, and shortly afterwards a knock is heard. Alphonse and Elvire come to seek shelter from the bloodthirsty mob, little knowing from whom they are asking it. At first Fenella does not want to save Elvire, whom she thinks of as her rival, but Elvire's pleading wins her pity, and she vows to save them or die with them in the attempt. Much to Fenella's joy, Masaniello agrees to shelter the two fugitives.

Pietro appears with representatives of the people to ask Masaniello to take the keys of government and rule over them. Pietro recognises Alphonse, and an ensemble ensues between the two Spanish fugitives, Masaniello, Pietro, and the chorus. Pietro wishes to put them straight away to death, Masaniello urges that his oath of hospitality is binding. In the end Masaniello gives the Spaniards safe-conduct and threatens to slay anyone who makes a move against them. Pietro and his followers swear that Masaniello shall be the next to fall.

Act V. In front of the Viceroy's palace at Naples. Pietro sings a barcarole with the chorus; in between the two verses he confides to a friend that he has already administered poison to Masaniello, who seemed likely to become a greater tyrant than those they deposed in his favour. Even as he sings, the 'king of the day' is dying, and nothing can save him.

News comes that Alphonse is marching against them at the head of troops, and, almost as bad, that Vesuvius is in eruption; the credulous peasants think that the wrath of heaven is being visited on the rebels. Only Masaniello can save them, cry the people, but Pietro and his friends reveal that the poison has made the hero the victim of hallucinations. Masaniello himself comes out of the palace, and is obviously not in his right mind. All appeal to him as their only hope; but he takes no notice and sings the barcarole we heard in the second act. Not until Fenella appears can he grasp the import of the situation, but then he places himself at the head of the rebels and marches off with them.

Fenella prays for his safe return. Elvire appears, explaining that Masaniello has saved her life from the murderous stroke of one of his followers; Alphonse, who follows her, continues the story – Masaniello himself was struck down in revenge for his saving of Elvire. Fenella is overcome by the news and commits suicide.

H.

FRA DIAVOLO

Opera in three acts, text by Scribe. Première at Opéra-Comique, Paris, 28 January 1830, with Prévost, Boulanger, Chollet. First performed Drury Lane, 1831; New York, 1831; Lyceum, 1857 (in Italian), with Borsio, Gardoni, Ronconi, Tagliafico. Last performance at Covent Garden, 1896, with Engle, de Lucia, Pini-Corsi, Arimondi, Bispham. Revived Metropolitan, 1910, with Alten and Clément, conductor Hertz; Berlin, 1934, with Eisinger, Pattiera, Schützendorf, Hüscher, conductor Blech; la Scala, Milan, 1934, with Carosio, Pertile, Autori, Bettoni, Nessi, conductor Santini; Sadler's Wells, 1935 (in English), with Naylor, Arthur Cox (Carron); Berlin, 1936, with Berger, Völker; Stockholm, 1948; Naples, 1962, with Vicenzi, Lazzari; Wexford Festival, 1966, with Valentini, Benelli; Marseilles, 1966, with Mady Mesplé and Michel Sénéchal; San Francisco, 1968, with Mary Costa, Nicolai Gedda. Fra Diavolo was a favourite role of many famous tenors, among them Bonci and Schipa.

Fra Diavolo, a bandit chief.....Tenor
Lord Cockburn, an English tourist.....Tenor
Lady Pamela, his wife.....Mezzo-Soprano
Lorenzo, an officer of carabinieri.....Tenor
Matteo, an innkeeper.....Bass
Zerlina, his daughter.....Soprano
Giacomo, a bandit.....Bass
Beppo, a bandit.....Tenor

Place: Near Naples

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Fra Diavolo, one of the most popular of all opéras-comiques, is now remembered chiefly through recordings of its virtuoso arias. All the same, its admirable music and excellent story seem to entitle it to more frequent revival than in fact, outside Germany, it seems to receive.

The story is concerned with Fra Diavolo, a famous bandit leader in the district round Naples. His reputation is to some extent that of a Robin Hood, his chivalry being above question and his habit to give generously to the poor out of what he has taken from the rich. At the time of the story, he is travelling under the name of the Marquis of San Marco.

Act I. Matteo's tavern. A reward of 10,000 piastres has been offered for the apprehension of the bandit Fra Diavolo. Lorenzo and his troop of carabinieri are drinking at the inn, but the brigadier seems unusually preoccupied. It soon turns out that he is full of sadness at the prospect of losing his sweetheart, Zerlina, the innkeeper's daughter, whom her father has destined for a wealthier suitor. The party is interrupted by the precipitate arrival of Lord Cockburn, a wealthy English traveller, and his wife, Lady Pamela, complaining loudly that they have been set upon and robbed. Lorenzo starts off to look for the brigand, after hearing that Lord Cockburn means to offer a reward of 6,000 scudi for the return of his wife's jewels.

The English couple have only just finished an altercation on the subject of the attentions of a certain Marquis of San Marco to her ladyship when a carriage draws up at the door, and the Marquis himself is announced. He seems delighted to see Pamela, and says that he is going to stay the night. Matteo hastens to see that he is suitably provided with food, and then bids his daughter look after the Marquis well while he himself is away for the night making arrangements for her wedding.

The Marquis asks why the English lord seems in such a bad temper and is told that he has just been robbed by the notorious Fra Diavolo. The Marquis expresses incredulity at the idea that there should be bandits in such a civilised part of the country, but Zerlina is told to sing him the local ballad of Fra Diavolo. He joins in the last verse. A couple of beggars come in, and the Marquis says he will pay for their board and lodging. When the innkeeper and his daughter have gone out, these turn out to be Giacomo and Beppo, two members of Fra Diavolo's band, and they discuss the affair of the English nobleman, admitting that they were unable to find the gold he was reputed to have with him. Fra Diavolo says he will try to find out its whereabouts from Lady Pamela. He dismisses his retainers, and starts to pay compliments to the lady, turning their emotional duet into a barcarole when he catches sight of her husband. The Marquis flatters Milord into giving away the secret hiding-place of his money; he boasts that it is in bills, sewn into his cloak and his wife's gown.

There is a noise outside; it is the troop of carabinieri returning after a most successful sortie against the bandits. They report that they have killed at least twenty and recaptured the stolen property. Lady Pamela insists that Lorenzo be given his reward straight away, so that he can convince Matteo that he is wealthy enough to marry Zerlina. The act ends with Lorenzo and the soldiers announcing their intention to capture the bandit chief himself, Fra Diavolo swearing to be revenged for the loss of his followers.

Act II. The curtain rises to show Zerlina's bedroom. Lord Cockburn and his wife are sleeping next door, and the only way into their room is through hers. Zerlina prepares the room, singing a brilliant aria the while. Its occupants come up to bed, quarrelling as they do so sufficiently for Zerlina to remark that she and her husband will not be like that a year after their wedding day. Zerlina goes with them to their room to help Lady Pamela undress and to see if there is anything they need.

Enter Fra Diavolo, who has discovered that Zerlina's room is next to that of the English travellers, and who means to hide there himself, with his two followers, so as to relieve them for the second time of their valuables. He sings a barcarole to attract the attention of Giacomo and Beppo, and lets them in through the window. They hear Zerlina's voice and all hide, Beppo and Giacomo going through some glass doors from which the bedroom is in full view. Zerlina undresses and pauses for a moment to admire her face and figure in the looking-glass; this is too much for the watchers who cannot restrain their laughter. Zerlina says her prayers and goes to bed. Diavolo and his followers make their way towards Milord's rooms. Giacomo is about to stab Zerlina – might she not give them away if there were to be any noise? – but she murmurs a prayer in her sleep and he cannot bring himself to do the deed.

Suddenly, there is a sound downstairs; Zerlina wakes up to hear Lorenzo calling for her. He and his men have not found Fra Diavolo and would like food and shelter for the rest of the night. She admits them; Lord Cockburn makes an appearance to complain about the noise but that is forgotten when Beppo knocks something over in the cupboard in which he is hidden. All is not lost however, Fra Diavolo taking it upon himself to step out and confront the brigadier and the Englishman. He had, he confesses to each of them separately, a rendezvous; he whispers the names of Zerlina and Lady Pamela into the appropriate ear. He is challenged by Lorenzo, and accepts. When Zerlina and Lady Pamela appear, they are met with nothing but coldness by respectively the lover and the husband on whom they were counting for comfort.

Act III. The mountains, not far from Matteo's inn. Fra Diavolo has laid his plans carefully. He means to be revenged on Lorenzo for what he and his soldiers have done to the rest of his band. Meanwhile, he sings of the charms of a bandit's life. The Easter procession is about to start out from the inn, watched by Beppo and Giacomo, who have orders to wait until Lorenzo and his soldiers have moved off, then ring the church bell to indicate to Fra Diavolo that the way is clear. Lorenzo, in a romance, sings sadly of the love he had thought faithful but has found to be false. Suddenly, he remembers that he has a debt of honour to pay at exactly this hour. He reproaches Zerlina for her unfaithfulness, which she indignantly denies. Just then Beppo and Giacomo catch sight of her and recognise her as the girl they watched going to bed the previous night. They laugh at the memory and repeat some of her phrases, just a little too loudly it appears, for she hears them and demands that someone find out the truth about how they overheard her when she was alone in her own bedroom. A paper giving Fra Diavolo's plan is found on one of them and the plot is revealed.

Lorenzo orders that Giacomo be taken to ring the bell, and that when Fra Diavolo appears Beppo tell him the way is clear. He will then fall into their hands. All goes as he has hoped. Diavolo descends to the square, where he is ambushed and shot. (In a later version, the ending has Fra Diavolo surrounded by carabinieri and made prisoner.)

LE DOMINO NOIR

The Black Domino

Opera in three acts, text by A.E. Scribe. Première at Opéra-Comique, Paris, 2 December 1837, with Cinti-Damoreau as Angèle. Enormously successful all over Europe and in France, where it had reached 1000 performances at the Opéra-Comique by 1882.

Angèle d'Olivarès, a novice.....Soprano
 Brigitte de San Lucar, *a novice*Soprano
 Horace de Massarena, a young nobleman.....Tenor Count Juliano, *his friend*Tenor
 Jacinthe, *Juliano's housekeeper*Mezzo-Soprano
 Gil Perez, *porter at the convent*Bass
 Ursule, *a nun at the convent*Soprano
 An Extern SisterContralto
 Lord Elfort, Attaché at the British Embassy.....Baritone

Place: Madrid

Running Time: 1 hour 35 minutes

Le Domino Noir is one of the most successful of Auber's many light operettas, moreover one with his regular collaborator, the indefatigable Scribe. The music is lively, graceful and stylish, the plot would seem not inappropriate to one of the fancies of Offenbach himself, of whose comedies it seems a perfectly logical precursor.

A year before the story begins, Horace de Massarena, a young man about town, met at a masked ball given by the Queen a young woman with whom he fell in love but whose face he never saw. She is in fact a cousin of the Queen's, and she is not only about to take her vows but at the Queen's wish immediately to become abbess of the convent.

At the ball once again, Juliano thinks he will help his friend Horace's pursuit of the unknown lady by advancing the clock so that her friend Brigitte speeds off to the convent alone, leaving Angèle fearful that her late return will ruin her reputation. Meanwhile, Juliano's housekeeper, Jacinthe, expecting her master back with friends for supper, takes in a stranded Angèle, whom she passes off as the niece she is expecting from the country. Angèle waits at table and captivates the company with her charm but is recognised by Horace, who, mystified by the development and trying to save Angèle from the attentions of his friends, contrives to lock her in Jacinthe's room. There she is discovered by Jacinthe's admirer Gil Perez, the convent porter, who receives such a shock at the sight of Angèle in her mask and domino that he surrenders the keys which he is conveniently carrying, thus providing Angèle with the means of re-entering the convent.

Brigitte is overjoyed to see her, but Ursule, wildly jealous of Angèle's imminent preferment, nearly blows the situation until the arrival of a letter from the Queen at the same time gives the abbess's job to Ursule and instructs Angèle to find a husband forthwith. The coincidental appearance of Horace solves the problem and the opera ends with a chorus of rejoicing, Angèle and Horace engaged, likewise Brigitte and Juliano, the cross-grained Ursule about to be enthroned, and happiness and fulfilment in sight for all. (The English attaché plays a peripheral, if comical, role as he searches for a wife he suspects of two-timing him.)

The music skips along in as carefree a manner as the story, whether in the jaunty ensembles which abound or in arias on a grand scale like the Aragonaise ('La belle Inès fait florès') Angèle sings to convince Juliano's guests of her country origins. With her grand patter song in the third act ('Ah! quelle nuit!') as well as the Aragonaise, Angèle's is a virtuoso role, but Auber allots admirable solos to Jacinthe at the start of Act II ('S'il est sur la terre'), to Gil Perez when he sings the praises of left-overs from a feast ('Nous allons avoir grâce à Dieu'), and even to Brigitte in a sad little number in Act III ('Au réfectoire, à la prière').

H.

B

MICHAEL WILLIAM BALFE

(born 15 May 1803, died 20 October 1870)

THE BOHEMIAN GIRL

Opera in three acts, text by Alfred Bunn founded on the ballet-pantomime The Gipsy, by St Georges. Première, Drury Lane, London, 27 November 1843. First performed New York, 1844; Her Majesty's Theatre (in Italian), 1858. Revived Sadler's Wells, 1932, with Kemp, Coates, Tudor Davies, Kelsey, Austin; Covent Garden Company at Liverpool, 1951, and subsequently at the Royal Opera House, in a new version by Sir Thomas Beecham and Dennis Arundell with Roberta Peters, Coates, Marlowe and Lanigan, Dickie, Walters, Glynne, conductor Beecham. Like Maritana, continuously in the repertoires of British touring companies until the 1930s.

Arline, *daughter of the Count*Soprano
Thaddeus, *a proscribed Pole*Tenor
Queen of the GipsiesAlto
Devilshoof, *chief of the gipsies*Bass
Count Arnheim, *Governor of Pressburg*Bass
Florestein, *his nephew*Tenor
Captain of the GuardBass
OfficerTenor
Buda, *Arline's attendant*Soprano

Place: Pressburg, Poland
Running Time: 3 hours

The Bohemian Girl, now rarely given, owed its initial popularity to the easy melodies which abound in its score. There are no subtleties in the libretto, but the action is vigorous and as remote from everyday life as one could well imagine. The chief characters are either noblemen or gipsies – noblemen who have the power of life and death over the people, and gipsies who may rob and cheat but also number among their companions beings as innocent and pure as the hero and heroine of the story.

Act I. Thaddeus, a Polish noble exiled after a rebellion, has sought the company of Devilshoof and his gipsies in order to escape the punishment to which he has been condemned. As a gipsy he saves the life of Arline, the daughter of Count Arnheim, the Austrian governor of the province. The delighted father invites both Thaddeus and Devilshoof to his castle. They go, but refuse to drink the health of the Emperor as loyal subjects should. Devilshoof is cast into prison; Thaddeus, who saved the child, is allowed to go free. Devilshoof, however, is a master locksmith; he escapes from prison and, in revenge, steals Arline and hides her among the gipsies.

The chief numbers in Act I are Thaddeus's entrance aria, 'Tis sad to leave our fatherland', and 'In the gipsy's life you read', the gipsy chorus, which recurs often during the course of the action.

Act II. Twelve years have gone by and Arline, grown to womanhood, has fallen in love with her rescuer, Thaddeus, who returns her love and wishes to marry her. There is, however, an obstacle. The Queen of the Gipsies is herself in love with Thaddeus, and the Queen is not a woman to be slighted with impunity.

Devilshoof and his friends have robbed Florestein, nephew of Count Arnheim, of all he possessed while he was returning from a feast. The Queen, fearing the Count's power, orders the booty to be returned. The trinkets are returned accordingly, all but a medallion which Devilshoof has taken as his share, but which the Queen retains with a view to its later use. When she is forced by gipsy custom to unite Thaddeus and Arline, she begins to plot the girl's downfall, and the opportunity is not long in coming.

The gipsies have mingled with the crowds at the fair and there the Queen presents Arline with the medallion stolen from Florestein. This young nobleman, who was at first attracted to Arline and then piqued by her lack of response, on seeing the trinket accuses her of theft. In spite of the gipsies' resistance, Arline is taken to the castle to be tried. Count Arnheim would be merciful since the accused woman is just the age of his lost daughter, but the evidence is against her and he is forced to find her guilty. Arline does not know the secret of her birth although she has dreamt, as she confided to Thaddeus earlier on, that she 'dwelt in marble halls with vassals and serfs at my side'. Blood, however, will tell; feeling herself disgraced, she is about to stab herself to the heart when the Count himself stops her and, in grasping her hand, notices a scar, similar to that his lost daughter bore, on her arm. Recognition follows, to the great joy of all but Thaddeus, who fears that Arline is lost to him.

This act contains the best-known aria in the score, Arline's 'I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls', a simple tune which, when well sung as it was by, for instance, Roberta Peters in the Covent Garden revival in 1951, is of truly appealing character. There are also the Count's 'The heart bowed down', a duet for Arline and Thaddeus, and the repetition of the gipsies' chorus.

Act III. Arline is faithful to her lover, in spite of her high station and its advantages. The Count sternly objects to the marriage of his daughter with a gipsy, whereupon Thaddeus, stung to the quick, reveals his real identity. The fact that he rebelled against the Austrians is forgotten and forgiven, and a wedding-feast arranged. The Queen alone is angry and disappointed. She aims a shot at Arline, but the bullet ricochets and kills her. Thaddeus's aria, 'When other lips and other hearts', occurs early in Act III.

The Bohemian Girl, Maritana and The Lily of Killarney were collectively known for many years as 'The English Ring'.

F.B.

SAMUEL BARBER

(born 9 March 1910, died 23 January 1981)

A nephew of the celebrated American mezzo-soprano Louise Homer (Toscanini's Orfeo at the Metropolitan), Barber studied at the Curtis Institute of Music and was a sufficiently good singer to record his own Dover Beach. Fame came when Toscanini conducted a broadcast of his Adagio for strings but, although he regularly wrote for the voice, his first mature opera, Vanessa, was not written until 1958 when it had its première at the Metropolitan; the same company commissioned Antony and Cleopatra for the opening of its new theatre in 1966. In the meanwhile, Vanessa had been performed at the Salzburg Festival in 1958, and the following year at Spoleto (Menotti's Festival north of Rome) was heard a nine-minute chamber opera for four soloists, A Hand of Bridge, written before Vanessa. Barber's style is basically lyrical and traditional.

VANESSA

Opera in four acts, libretto by the composer, based on a story in Seven Gothic Tales by Isak Dinesen. Première at Metropolitan Opera, New York, 15 January 1958, with Steber, Elias, Resnik, Gedda, Tozzi, conductor Mitropoulos. First performed Salzburg, 1958, with the Metropolitan cast but Malaniuk instead of Resnik. In 1964 Barber revised the score, and the three-act version was heard for the first time at the Metropolitan in 1965, with Costa, Elias, Thebom, Alexander, Tozzi, conductor Steinberg.

Vanessa, an ageing beautySoprano
Erika, her nieceMezzo-Soprano
The Old Baroness, Vanessa's mother ...Mezzo-Soprano
Anatol, a handsome young manTenor
The Old DoctorBass
Nicholas, the Major-DomoBaritone
A FootmanTenor

Servants, Guests, Peasants

Place: Vanessa's House in a Northern Country

Time: c. 1905

Running Time: 2 hours

For twenty years, Vanessa has waited for the return of Anatol, the only man she has ever loved. The mirrors and a large painting are covered over.

Act I. Winter. Vanessa, her mother and her niece are awaiting the arrival of a guest. The Baroness, who won't speak to Vanessa, leaves; Erika sings a ballad: 'Must the winter come so soon?' Vanessa has her back to the door but her intense excitement is expressed lyrically: 'Do not utter a word, Anatol.' She does not want him to see her unless he still loves her, but excitement turns to something closer to revulsion as she realises the man she sees is not the man she loved. It is Anatol's son, searching for the woman whose very name so excited his father. Vanessa goes, and he asks Erika at least to share supper with him.

Act II. A month later. Erika confesses to her grandmother that she slept with Anatol the night he arrived – the Anatol 'who entered our house like a thief', comments the Baroness. Erika does not know if she loves him – perhaps he is incapable of love – but she knows that Vanessa does. Vanessa and Anatol come in from skating, followed soon by the Doctor; they dream of the past to the strains of a Ländler, 'Under the willow tree' (trio). Vanessa tells Erika she is in love, that this after all is the man she was waiting for (a coloratura passage cut in the 1964 version). When she goes to talk to the Pastor, the Baroness insists Erika speak up if she is not to lose her love. 'It is his love I want and not his capture.' He will choose the easier option, says the Baroness. Erika taxes Anatol with the position but when he proposes (Aria: 'Outside this house the world has changed'), she seems to turn him down. The others go off to the chapel, and an orchestral interlude precedes the act's end, with Erika sobbing on the sofa.

Act III. New Year's Eve, a ball in progress. The Doctor indulges in nostalgia, then practises his speech announcing the engagement. Vanessa is upset that her mother and niece seem to be boycotting the evening. Anatol attempts comfort, but reminds her that 'love has a bitter core'. Erika appears in time to hear the Doctor's voice, then faints at the crucial moment. Dances go on in the ballroom next door. Erika revives, clutches her stomach – she is carrying Anatol's child – then goes out. The Baroness suspects what is happening.

Act IV. Vanessa, the Baroness and the Doctor wait anxiously for news of Erika. Vanessa is close to despair, but Erika is found, Anatol carries her in, then assures Vanessa that Erika does not love him. Erika tells the Baroness the child will not be born.

Vanessa and Anatol are married and about to set off for Paris. More nostalgia for the Doctor before Vanessa unavailingly tries to get Erika to talk.

Anatol and Erika say goodbye, apparently without rancour, and the music reaches a climax with a quintet: 'To leave, to break, to find, to keep'. All say goodbye, leaving Erika with the Baroness, who except in the quintet does not utter. Erika orders the Major-Domo to cover the mirrors as they had been when it was Vanessa who was waiting. The gate-keeper is to admit no one; it is her turn now to wait. The quintet dominates the end of the opera. H.

ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA

Opera in three acts; libretto from Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra. Première at Metropolitan Opera, New York, 16 September 1966, with Leontyne Price, Rosalind Elias, Jess Thomas, Justino Diaz, Ezio Flagello, conductor Thomas Schippers. Revised version, 1976, Juilliard School, New York; 1983, Spoleto, with Esther Hines, Jeffrey Walls, conductor Christian Badea.

| | |
|--|-----------------------|
| Antony, Roman general | Bass-Baritone |
| Enobarbus, Antony's comrade | Bass-Baritone |
| Iras, Cleopatra's attendant | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Charmian, Cleopatra's attendant | Contralto |
| Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt | Soprano |
| Caesar, ruler of Rome | Tenor |
| Maecenas, a senator | Bass |
| Agrippa, a senator | Bass |
| A Messenger | Tenor |
| Eros, Antony's shieldbearer | Tenor |
| Dolabella, Caesar's emissary | Baritone |
| Thidias, Caesar's ambassador | Tenor |
| Alexas, Cleopatra's attendant | Baritone |
| A Soothsayer | Bass |
| Four Guards | Tenor, Baritone, Bass |
| A Rustic | Bass |
| Soldiers, Senators, Egyptians | |

Place: Egypt and Rome

Time: 42–31 B.C.

Running Time: 2 hours 5 minutes

Antony and Cleopatra was written for the opening in 1966 of the new building of the Metropolitan Opera at Lincoln Center in New York, a glittering occasion which tended to put the new work in second place. Franco Zeffirelli, who directed the opera, had collaborated with the composer on the reduction of one of Shakespeare's richest plays to manageable length, but a fine cast failed to shrug off a lavish production which overwhelmed singers, audience and particularly critics. The Met went through with the scheduled performances in the 1966–67 season but cancelled the revival and Barber was apparently devastated by the negative critical reaction to his work. He nonetheless worked with the aid of Gian Carlo Menotti on revising the score, removing characters, reducing spectacle, even adding a love duet for the protagonists and amending the tessitura of some of the vocal line. The revision, extensive as it was, did not carry complete conviction, and Andrew Porter wrote in The New Yorker: 'If the opera is revived a century or so hence, directors ... will want to combine both scores ... reinstating valued passages which the composer himself cut but retaining passages he strengthened by recomposition.' This synopsis concentrates on the revised version of the opera.

Act I. The Chorus angrily asserts that Antony in Alexandria neglects his duties for Cleopatra. Antony for his part tells Enobarbus he is resolved to leave, but Cleopatra will never accept it and the two lovers bid each other what can be no more than a temporary farewell. An orchestral interlude takes us to the Senate in Rome, where Antony and Caesar quarrel. To cement an alliance, Agrippa proposes a marriage between Antony and Caesar's sister, Octavia.

Cleopatra in the midst of her court whiles away Antony's absence, watches slaves dance, then chastises a messenger who brings news that Antony and Octavia are married. No amount of denigratory references to Octavia's physical disabilities can undo the initial damage.

At a banquet in Rome, Antony bids Octavia good-night and she leaves with her brother. The soldiers doze and Enobarbus assures Dolabella that Antony will never give up Cleopatra. He recalls the entrancing sight of her in her barge, and she appears as if in a vision. Antony resolves to return to Egypt.

Act II. In the Senate, Caesar denounces Antony for his actions in Egypt. He will meet him on the battlefield.

In Alexandria, a Soothsayer enigmatically foretells Charmian's future, before Antony and Cleopatra make an entrance to hear Enobarbus bring the bad news that Caesar has captured part of the empire. Antony will lead the army against him but Cleopatra inveighs against Enobarbus for preventing her following him into battle. Soldiers outside Antony's tent are inclined to believe the defection of the god Hercules, who has hitherto protected him. To the words of 'Take, o take those lips away', Antony and Cleopatra sing ecstatically of love.

The Egyptian army is ready for battle at Actium. Enobarbus brings news that Cleopatra led her fleet away from the action, and Antony followed. Enobarbus will find a way to desert. To Eros Antony admits that he is defeated and must beg for clemency. Cleopatra prepares to surrender to Caesar, but Antony orders the ambassador whipped, then flings Cleopatra to the ground and leaves. Her women advise her to repair to the monument and give out that she is dead.

Enobarbus is overwhelmed with remorse when he hears that Antony has so far forgiven him as to send his possessions after him. Orchestral interlude.

Antony hears from Eros the false news that Cleopatra is dead and resolves to the accompaniment mainly of flute and timpani to emulate her. Eros refuses to kill him but stabs himself, and Antony has no option but to fall on his own sword. Alexas follows him as he is borne away dying to the Queen.

Act III. Cleopatra's monument. With Charmian and Iras she resolves never to leave her stronghold, then hears that Antony is being carried to her. He is drawn up into the monument and dies in her arms, to be mourned by the Queen and her women. Caesar comes to make formal peace both with the Egyptian Queen and his dead adversary.

Cleopatra hears from Dolabella what she most dreads: that Caesar plans to display her in Rome as part of his triumph. Cleopatra's reaction is instantaneous and violent. A rustic brings her an asp in a basket of figs and she dies, nobly, her robe on her shoulders, her crown on her head. The chorus, in Greek style, mourns the lovers.

H.

BÉLA BARTÓK

(born 25 March 1881, died 26 September 1945)

DUKE BLUEBEARD'S CASTLE

A kékszakállú Herceg Vára

Opera in one act, text by B. Balázs. Première, Budapest, 24 May 1918, with Olga Haselbeck, Oszkar Kalman. First performed Frankfurt, 1922; Berlin, 1929. Revived Budapest, 1937; Florence Festival, 1938 (by Budapest company), with Ella di Nemethy, Szekely, conductor Failoni; New York, City Center, 1952, with Ayars, Pease, conductor Rosenstock; B.B.C., London, 1953, with Cross, Matters; Sadler's Wells, 1954, with Elliott, Ward; Edinburgh Festival, 1963,¹ by Budapest Opera with Olga Szönyi, Andras Farago.

Duke BluebeardBass
 Judith, his wifeMezzo-Soprano
 Bard.....Spoken
 Three Wives.....Silent

Running Time: 55 minutes

Bartók's short opera is one of the most impressive of his early works. Whatever it may owe in conception to Debussy and to Maeterlinck, the music is characteristic of its composer. Wrote Desmond Shawe-Taylor in 1972 in The Sunday Times: 'The fable can be understood on many levels: as a foreshortened process of mutual discovery between two persons such as in real life would take many years; as a conflict between rational, creative Man and emotional, inspiring, never fully comprehending Woman; more deeply still, as an allegory of the loneliness and solitude of all human creatures. Bartók, whose own need for inner solitude was imperious, and whose remoteness could be frightening, threw himself into the subject with an intensity which grips the listener.' The piece has almost no action, and yet the music is essentially dramatic, just as the orchestral colour retains life and vigour even in its most sombre moments.

A bard appears before the curtain to establish in spoken word that the action of the opera is legendary. When the curtain rises, it reveals a large round room, gothic in style.² On the left, a staircase leads up to a little iron door. To the right of this staircase can be seen seven larger doors. There are no windows or ornaments of any kind. The room is like a great, empty cavern.

Bluebeard enters, leading Judith by the hand. She has left her parents and her home to follow him, and is only just regaining her courage. She sees the doors and wants to open them to let light and air into the castle. She knocks at the first door, and hears a long sigh like that of the wind. With the key that Bluebeard gives her, she opens the door, from which immediately streams red light (violins tremolo, flutes arpeggio). It is the Torture Chamber, and Judith exclaims that the walls are wet with blood; but she is not afraid.

In succession, she opens four more doors. A shaft of bronze-coloured light (solo trumpet, woodwind trills) comes from the Armoury; golden light (violin solo, three trumpets) pours from the Treasury, from which she takes a jewelled cloak and a crown; bluish light (harp glissando, strings tremolo, solo horn) comes from behind the door which conceals the Garden; and a dazzling white light (full orchestra, organ) blinds her as she opens the door which gives on to Bluebeard's Kingdom. Not even perhaps in Fidelio or Die Meistersinger has C major been more grandly confident than in the magnificent outburst which accompanies the opening of the fifth door. At each door Judith sees signs of blood: on the weapons in the Armoury, on the jewels and robes in the Treasury, on the flowers in the Garden, even in the colour of the cloud over the Kingdom itself.

Judith will not heed Bluebeard's warning, but opens the sixth door (harp, clarinet arpeggios). When she asks Bluebeard what is the significance of the water behind it, he answers 'Tears'. He tries to turn her from completing her purpose and takes her lovingly in his arms. She asks him if he has loved other women, and, when he tries to evade the question, demands that he give her the seventh key so that she may find out what the door conceals. As he gives it her, he tells her that it will show her all his former wives.

¹ The three Bartók stage works, this opera and the ballets The Wooden Prince and The Miraculous Mandarin, conducted by János Ferencsik, played together in one theatrical evening as the composer (retrospectively) wanted.

² Such are the stage directions now more honoured in the breach than the observance.

She opens the seventh door and immediately the sixth and fifth doors close; at the same time the light in the hall begins to grow dimmer. Three beautiful women emerge. Bluebeard kneels before them and assures them that they are not forgotten; even Judith is filled with awe at their beauty. In his first wife Bluebeard sees the embodiment of the morning of his existence, in the second of his noonday, in the third of evening. One by one they disappear through the door, and the fourth door closes. Then he addresses Judith. She is the most beautiful of all, and her he met in the night; after her is eternal darkness. He goes slowly to fetch the crown and robe from the third door, which closes after him, and adorns Judith with them. For a moment she pleads with him, then turns and goes through the seventh door which shuts after her. Bluebeard is alone once more.

H.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN

(born c. 17 December 1770, died 26 March 1827)

FIDELIO

Opera in two acts, text by Joseph Sonnleitner and Georg Friedrich Sonnleithner after a drama by Jean Nicolas Bouilly. Première at the Theater an der Wieden, Vienna, 20 November 1805 (in three acts), with Anna Milder, Louise Müller, Demmer, Meier, Rother, Weinkopf and Cache, conducted by Beethoven.

Florestan, a nobleman.....Tenor
Leonore, his wife, in male attire as Fidelio.....Soprano
Don Fernando, the King's Minister.....Bass
Don Pizarro, Governor of the fortress.....Baritone
Rocco, chief jailer.....Bass
Marzelline, Rocco's daughter.....Soprano
Jaquino, assistant to Rocco.....Tenor
Soldiers, Prisoners, People

Place: A Fortress near Seville

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Bouilly's original libretto was written for the French composer Pierre Gaveaux in 1798 and was set by two other composers. The French Revolution subject for Beethoven and his audiences was as contemporary as Menotti's The Consul, Poulenc's La Voix humaine and Adams's Nixon in China in the late twentieth century.

The opera is in Singspiel form, with spoken dialogue between the musical numbers, and Beethoven cannot have found it easy to reconcile his predilection for high-minded, heroic themes with his chosen form's more domestic tendencies. The original version (1805), with an audience mostly made up of French troops occupying Vienna, was not a success. The 1806 revision reduced three acts to two, and the final re-working (1814) substantially revised music and text – alterations to every musical number except the March. The versions of 1805 and 1806 are very far from either incompetent or negligible, as revivals in 1970, the Beethoven bicentenary year, or on record testify, demonstrating too that dramatic improvement came with a maturer view – it is hard to agree with Ernest Newman who believed that the resigned andante second section of Florestan's scena in the original was preferable to the hallucinated and feverish ending Beethoven supplied in 1814. One is dramatically apt, the other a stroke of nothing less than genius.

Confusion reigns over the four overtures. Leonora No. 2 was played at the première in 1805, Leonora No. 3 at the 1806 revision, and a new, less 'symphonic' prelude (the Fidelio overture) was composed for 1814, though, modern scholarship says, not ready until the second performance. Leonora No. 1 (published as Op. 138 and first performed eleven months after Beethoven's death) may have been meant for the 1805 production and discarded before the first night, or for one planned for Prague in 1807 and never realised.

Before the opera begins, Florestan, who worked for the progressive Minister of State Don Fernando, has disappeared in mysterious circumstances. Only his wife Leonore refuses to believe he is dead and has narrowed her search for him to a prison whose reactionary governor was an enemy of Florestan's; there she works disguised as a young man.

Fidelio (Salzburg Festival, 1931). Lotte Lehmann as Leonore and Franz Völker as Florestan.

Act I. A prison courtyard. A brisk duet between Jaquino and Marzeline suggests that he is in love with her but that she prefers Fidelio, her father's new assistant, as her subsequent aria confirms. She is joined by her father, but the appearance of Fidelio brings, in a remarkable canon quartet, a change of mood to something almost mystic. The theme enunciated by each character is the same but their sentiments differ, and the quartet ('Mir ist so wunderbar') establishes, in contrast to the two earlier numbers, the lofty aspirations of much of the rest of the opera. With Rocco's jocular, almost vulgar, aria in praise of money and young people's need for it, the Singspiel convention reappears (the aria was dropped for 1806, reinstated in 1814), but it wavers again with the subsequent trio. Fidelio in effect volunteers for the more taxing side of a prison jailer's job, and Rocco praises him for his resolution; Marzeline continues her generalised adoration, and the trio is dominated by a heroic phrase for Fidelio, 'Ich habe Muth' (I have the strength).

A short, rhythmically striking March bridges the scenes and proclaims the arrival of Pizarro, the governor. One of the dispatches he peruses warns him that Don Fernando is on his way to inspect the fortress, and he weighs in with a hefty aria ('Ha! welch' ein Augenblick') presaging immediate action against Florestan. He posts a trumpeter to warn of the Minister's approach, then tosses a purse to Rocco with instructions to do away with the most dangerous of the prisoners. Rocco's reluctance grows in the course of a repetitious but effective duet, during which Pizarro determines to do the job himself. Fidelio overhears and reacts in the highly dramatic 'Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?' (Abominable man! Where are you hurrying?) The grandiose aria, with its moving middle section expressing continuing hope for the success of her rescue mission, is quite outside the Singspiel convention.

On Fidelio's intercession and because it is the King's birthday, the prisoners are allowed into the open air. Fidelio scans their faces to see if Florestan is among them. Act II's lofty aspirations are perhaps most fully anticipated in Fidelio's aria and the music of the prisoners as they grope their way towards light and hope (Prisoners' Chorus). With a great cry of 'Noch heute!' Fidelio learns that as Rocco's assistant she will that very day help him dig the grave in what may be her husband's cell. If she cannot save him, she can die with him! On Pizarro's reappearance, the prisoners are hustled back to their cells, but Rocco staves off retribution by an astute reference to the plot Pizarro wants him to be part of.

Act II. A dungeon. An orchestral introduction of extraordinary dramatic import, all heavily weighted chords, grinding turns on the strings and an apparently endless descent into the depths, prepares us for a first sight of Florestan in chains. His arioso-recitative is a triumph of word-setting, and, if the adagio cantabile aria relies on recollection of things past, the quick section that follows parts company with normality as Florestan's vision of Leonore leads to hysteria. A whispered scene between Fidelio and Rocco ends as Florestan recovers from his swoon and she recognises her husband. She is permitted to offer him a drink and a morsel of food and his thanks for an unexpected kindness lead to a trio of remarkable beauty and in the circumstances amazing serenity.

Pizarro enters and initiates the highly dramatic ensemble by making himself known to Florestan but, as he draws his dagger, Fidelio stands between him and Florestan, then reveals herself as Leonore: 'Tödt erst sein Weib!' (First, kill his wife!). A trumpet call rings out, Jaquino announces the Minister, and Pizarro's moment has gone. There ensues a rapturous duet ('O namenlose Freude!') and a happy ending to an opera, much of whose music has presaged tragedy, is in sight.

The chorus rejoices at the freeing of the prisoners (in C major, the brilliance of which is upstaged if the Leonora No. 3 is played to cover the scene change), Don Fernando recognises Florestan and sets Leonore to free him from his fetters, Pizarro is arrested, and the opera, with an anticipation of the Ninth Symphony, comes to a triumphant end. H.

VINCENZO BELLINI

(born 3 November 1801, died 23 September 1835)

Bellini came of a musical family in Sicily, and his early experience was in church music. Six years in Naples ended in 1826 with a successful operatic première (his second work for the stage), Bianca e Gernando (sic in earlier version), and a resulting commission for la Scala. Il Pirata was the first libretto written for him by Felice Romani, henceforth (apart from I Puritani) his invariable collaborator, and with it he emerged as a major operatic force.

IL PIRATA

The Pirate

Opera in two acts, libretto (from the French translation of a five-act tragedy by the Irish writer, the Rev. R.C. Maturin, Bertram, or The Castle of St Aldobrando) by Felice Romani. Première, la Scala, Milan, 27 October 1827, with Henriette Méric-Lalande, Giovanni Rubini and Antonio Tamburini; scenery by Alessandro Sanquirico (fifteen performances that season, twelve in 1830 and twelve in 1840). First performed King's Theatre, London, 1830, with la Scala cast; Paris, 1832, with Schroeder-Devrient, Rubini, Santini; New York, 1832. Revived Rome, 1935, with Iva Pacetti, Gigli, Mario Basiola, conductor Serafin; la Scala, 1958, with Callas, Corelli, Bastianini; New York (both times in concert), 1959 with Callas, 1966 with Montserrat Caballé; Philadelphia, 1968, with Caballé; London (in concert), 1969, with Caballé; Wexford, 1972, and York Festival, 1973, with Christiane Eda-Pierre.

Ernesto, Duke of Caldora.....Baritone
Imogene, *his wife*Soprano
Gualtiero, *former Count of Montalto*Tenor
Itulbo, Gualtiero's lieutenant.....Tenor
Goffredo, *a hermit, once tutor to Gualtiero*Bass
Adele, Imogene's companion.....Soprano
A Little Boy, *son to Imogene and Ernesto*Silent
Fishermen and Women, Pirates, Knights, Ladies

Place: The Castle of Caldora and Nearby, in Sicily

Time: Thirteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 55 minutes

The background of the Sicilian story has Ernesto, Duke of Caldora, and Gualtiero, Count of Montalto, as rivals in politics as well as for the hand of the fair Imogene. Gualtiero and Imogene's father followed the cause of King Manfred, Ernesto that of Charles of Anjou. Imogene loves Gualtiero, who is however banished following the death of King Manfred and the defeat of his followers by the Anjou party. In exile, he leads a band of pirates from Aragon to ravage the shores of Sicily, in the hope of revenge and recovering Imogene. She, however, has been forced through threats to her father's life to marry the Duke of Caldora. He has recently commanded the fleet which defeated the Aragonese pirates, their leader escaping only to be shipwrecked on the coast not far from Caldora.

Act I. After a conventional overture, the curtain rises to agitated music to show the anguished populace watching the shipwreck. The storm over, survivors come on shore, and the hermit Goffredo recognises Gualtiero, who proclaims that nothing but his continuing love for Imogene has supported him through his trials ('Nel furor delle tempeste').

Honouring old custom, the Duchess herself comes to offer hospitality to the strangers, for whom Itulbo acts as spokesman. Horrified at the idea that their leader may be dead, Imogene in a beautiful aria ('Lo sognai ferito') confides her fears to Adele. At sight of Imogene, Gualtiero can barely restrain himself and the sound of his involuntary cry awakes poignant memories for her.

At night, the pirates, drinking rousingly on the castle terrace, are warned by Itulbo not to give away their identity. Imogene is still troubled by thoughts of the stranger who has taken refuge with Goffredo, and it does not take long before he reveals to her who he is. The story of Imogene's coercion by Ernesto comes out, and Gualtiero's stupefaction, expressed in one of Bellini's most melting cantilenas ('Pietosa al padre'), turns, when he sees Imogene's small son, to thoughts of revenge.

Imogene, left alone in her grief, hears the sounds of carousal within, and the scene changes to the great hall of the castle, where the Duke's men celebrate. Ernesto himself rejoices in an aria (to the accompaniment of strings and three trombones, piano) and reproaches Imogene that she alone remains outside the general festivities. For himself, the sole shadow on his joy is doubt about the fate of the hated Gualtiero. He will question the fugitives and their leader. Itulbo poses as the pirate chief, Ernesto threatens imprisonment, Imogene pleads the general cause, the hermit restrains the frantic Gualtiero, who emulates Ernesto in his willingness to breathe fire and slaughter at every opportunity. A quintet (and soon a sextet) develops with comments from the chorus, and the act ends in a stretta but without public disclosure of Gualtiero's identity.

Act II. In the ante-chamber to Imogene's apartments, Adele tries to reassure her entourage as to Imogene's health. She tells her mistress that Gualtiero will not leave without seeing her, but it is the Duke who now confronts her squarely with accusations of infidelity. She defends herself by saying that it is true she still loves Gualtiero but as someone she knew in the past; Ernesto must be content that she is his wife and the mother of his son. The slow music of their fine duet suggests a degree of acceptance of the situation, but Ernesto's fury is unleashed when he gets a message to the effect that Gualtiero is even now sheltering in the castle.

On the terrace, Itulbo unsuccessfully tries to persuade Gualtiero to forgo his meeting with Imogene. The tone of the lovers' scene is one of passion as well as resignation, and towards its end they are watched by Ernesto, who remains in hiding to add his voice to a trio of finest inspiration. Ernesto is discovered, and he and Gualtiero go off to end their rivalry in mortal combat.

To the great hall of the castle come the Duke's retainers to mourn his death and to swear vengeance on his killer. To their amazement, Gualtiero surrenders voluntarily and is handed over to the Council of Knights, bidding farewell in an aria ('Tu vedrai la sventurata') to the absent Imogene and asking her forgiveness.

In Bellini's operas, it is the woman who is customarily protagonist and Il Pirata is no exception, in spite of its title and the unusual robustness of much of the music. Imogene's reason and strength of will have collapsed under the strain of events, and her last scene is introduced by a plaintive and beautiful cor anglais solo, which movingly expresses her anguished state. She thinks she sees Ernesto, and later their son, who pleads with his father for the life of Gualtiero who once spared Ernesto's. Musically, Bellini already inhabits the world of 'Casta diva' of four years later, and the slow 'Col sorriso d'innocenza' is a beautiful inspiration, with a worthy pendant in the cabaletta 'Oh sole, ti vela di tenebre oscure'; together, and after Imogene hears that the Council has condemned Gualtiero to death, they bring the opera to an impressive conclusion. H.

LA STRANIERA

The Stranger

Opera in two acts, text by Felice Romani based on Vicomte d'Arlincourt's novel L'Etrangère. Première, la Scala, Milan, 14 February 1829, with Henriette Méric-Lalande, Caroline Unger, Domenico Reina, Antonio Tamburini. First produced London, King's Theatre, 1832, with Giuditta Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini; New York, Park Theatre, 1834. Revived Catania, 1954, with Adriana Guerrini; Palermo, 1968, with Renata Scotto; New York (concert performance), 1969, with Montserrat Caballé; Edinburgh Festival, 1972, by Palermo company with Scotto, conductor Sanzogno.

Alaide (la Straniera)Soprano
 Il Signore di MontolinoBass
 Isoletta, *his daughter*Mezzo-Soprano
 Arturo, *Count of Ravenstal*Tenor
 Baron ValdeburgoBaritone
 The Prior of the TemplarsBass
 Osburgo, *confidante of Arturo*Tenor

Place: Brittany

Time: Middle Ages

Running Time: 3 hours 5 minutes

La Straniera was written in 1829 for la Scala, Bellini's second opera with Felice Romani. Like Il Pirata, La Straniera shows a more vigorous approach to drama than the later Bellini operas, where elegiac melody is as much in evidence as romantic passion. Leslie Orrey in his book about Bellini lays great stress on the fine quality of the choral writing in La Straniera.

All these operas were written like Handel's to display the skill and dexterity of the great prima donnas of the day. More recently, Callas for a few short unforgettable years at la Scala made works of this period her own, recreating perhaps three operas every two years. Newer claimants with technique but less imagination have attempted to emulate her, but one of these revivals is hardly to be distinguished from the other. Instant Bellini or Donizetti is not at all what Callas made.

Act I, scene i. Near the castle of Montolino, peasants and members of Lord Montolino's entourage celebrate in a barcarolle chorus the forthcoming marriage of Isoletta, his daughter, to Arturo, Count of Ravenstal. Only Isoletta cannot share in the rejoicing because, as she confides to her friend Baron Valdeburgo, she has detected a change in her fiancé. She fears he is in love with an unknown woman who lives across the lake – la Straniera. Valdeburgo, and later Isoletta's father and Arturo's friend Osburgo, do their best to comfort her, and in the distance they hear the voices of the crowd who are inveighing against la Straniera as a witch.

Scene ii. La Straniera's hut in the woods. Arturo has come to seek her out. Alaide, the Stranger, enters (introduced by harp) and muses on the sadness which can result from a love which trusts too much ('Ah! Sventurato il cor che fida'). She reproaches Arturo for having sought her out, and, in answer to a passionate declaration of love, assures him that Heaven has put an insurmountable barrier between them.

Scene iii. Osburgo is near the dwelling of the dreaded Straniera with a hunting party. Valdeburgo tries to persuade Arturo to return to his proper place at the heart of the wedding festivities. When he refers to the Stranger as unworthy of Arturo, the latter begs him at least to see her and to judge whether he can then still condemn her. As soon as he sees Alaide, Valdeburgo gives a cry of recognition. Alaide is equally delighted, and Arturo's suspicions are first aroused and then, when Valdeburgo tells him that for reasons he cannot reveal Arturo must renounce his love, as he thinks, confirmed. Only the intervention of Alaide prevents him falling upon his erstwhile friend with his sword. Arturo leaves only when Alaide reluctantly agrees to see him again.

Scene iv. A gloomy prelude brings us to the shore of the lake near the castle. Arturo learns from Osburgo and his friends that they have heard Alaide and Valdeburgo planning to elope. He himself believes he knows the worst when he overhears Alaide address Valdeburgo as Leopoldo, whereupon he attacks and wounds him so that he falls into the lake. Alaide in her horror reveals that he is her brother. Arturo jumps in after him and a group of countrymen, led by Osburgo, surprise her alone with a bloodstained sword and accuse her of murder.

Act II, scene i. In a room in the castle, the Prior of the Order of the Hospitallers is hearing the evidence of Osburgo against la Straniera. When she appears, he seems for a moment to recognise her voice. Arturo rushes in to say that it is he who is guilty of murder, but the problem is resolved with the re-appearance of Valdeburgo to announce that neither Arturo nor Alaide is guilty. Valdeburgo offers to protect Alaide and, when the members of the court demand that she shall unveil, she consents to do so only to the Prior himself. He is astonished at what he sees and announces that she is free to depart.

Scene ii. Arturo makes for Alaide's hut, but in a vigorous duet Valdeburgo heads him off. Arturo is persuaded to go back to Isoletta, after Valdeburgo has conceded that he will bring Alaide to the wedding.

Scene iii. The church. Isoletta is full of foreboding and in an aria, 'Ah! se non m'ami più' (flute obbligato) reveals her sorrow.¹ A wedding hymn starts the proceedings, but Arturo is obviously distraught and Isoletta threatens to abandon the ceremony. Suddenly Alaide intervenes, and insists that Isoletta and Arturo shall go towards the altar, Alaide herself rushing outside to pray movingly for God's forgiveness ('Pago, o ciel tremendo'). Arturo, with drawn sword, tries to order her to follow him, but the Prior announces that she must take her rightful place as Queen of France.² Arturo reacts by throwing himself on his sword, Isoletta falls on his dead body and la Straniera fulfils the prophecy contained in her opening words, to dwell on the sadness of a love which trusted too well.

It has been suggested – reasonably I think – that the impossibly violent loves of the romantics were less erotic in origin than manifestations of rebellion against the norms of society. By these canons, both Arturo and la Straniera are romantic figures sacrificed on the altar of self-fulfilment. H.

I CAPULETI E I MONTECCHI

The Capulets and the Montagues

Opera in four parts (two acts), libretto by Felice Romani, a reworking of his libretto for Nicola Vaccai's Giulietta e Romeo (1825), derived very remotely from Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet. Première, Venice, 11 March 1830 (in a double bill with the ballet Chiara di Rosenberg), with Giuditta Grisi as Romeo, Rosalbina Caradori-Allan as Giulietta. First produced London, King's Theatre, 1833, with Giuditta Pasta, Joséphine de Méric; New Orleans, 1847; Dresden, 1831. Revived Catania, 1935, for Bellini Centenary, with Ines Alfani-Tellini, Aurora Buades and Franco Lo Giudice, conductor Marinuzzi; Palermo, 1954, with Rosanna Carteri, Giulietta Simionato, conductor Vittorio Gui. A 'new' version of the score by Claudio Abbado with Romeo sung by a tenor was first given at la Scala, Milan, in 1966, with Renata Scotto, Giacomo Aragall, Luciano Pavarotti (Tebaldo); this production was seen at the 1966 Holland Festival, the 1967 Edinburgh Festival, and the same year in Montreal. The opera was staged in Philadelphia in 1968, with Scotto, Aragall (Romeo), Giuseppe Campora; Boston, 1975, with Beverly Sills, Tatiana Troyanos; Vienna, 1977, with Sona Ghazarian, Agnes Baltsa; London, Covent Garden, 1984, with Edita Gruberova, Agnes Baltsa, conductor Riccardo Muti.

Giulietta (Juliet), a Capulet Soprano

Romeo, head of the Montagues Mezzo-Soprano

Tebaldo (Tybalt), a Capulet partisan Tenor

Capellio (Capulet), head of the Capulets,

Juliet's father Bass

Lorenzo, physician in the employ of the Capulets Baritone

Capulets, Montagues, Ladies, Soldiers

Place: Verona

Time: Thirteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Bellini was at work on the score of I Capuleti e I Montecchi for a period of no more than six weeks, not signing the contract for the new opera for la Fenice until 20 January 1830, with rehearsals beginning at the end of February and the first night on 11 March! Bellini's opera was replacing one due from Giovanni Pacini, who could not deliver in time, and for it he plundered his recent and unsuccessful opera Zaira, and even pressed into service music from his earlier Adelson e Salvini. Romani also drew extensively on his own book for an opera he had written for Vaccai, and it is an irony of fate that the great Maria Malibran should herself have jettisoned Bellini's last act in favour of Vaccai's when it came to her turn to star in the opera – all this while both Vaccai and Bellini were still alive and flourishing!

Act I. A short, urgent prelude takes us to the Capulet palace, where Capulet's followers are gathered. Are they as Guelphs threatened again by Ghibellines?

¹ In the Palermo revival of 1968 transferred quite appropriately to the first scene of Act I.

² The historical King of France fled on his wedding night from his bride

Isamberg of Denmark, and later married Agnes of Pomerania, the opera's heroine. The Pope ordered the King to return to his first wife, Agnes going into exile. With the death of Isamberg, Agnes may now return to the King.

Tybalt tells them that Romeo, the most hated of the Montagues, is leading an army against them, the same man who earlier slew Capulet's son, and who now sends an envoy to offer peace terms. Lorenzo urges that the terms be considered, but Capulet says his son's death was never avenged and Tybalt in his cavatina swears in the name of Juliet, whom he loves, to carry out the act which will purge the offence against Capulet. During the course of his cabaletta, could the audience but catch his words through the ensemble, they would hear Lorenzo refer to Capulet's implacable outlook, which will not soften when he learns the secret his daughter Juliet conceals.

Preparations for Juliet's wedding to Tybalt are in hand as Romeo makes his entrance incognito, announced only as the Ghibelline envoy offering peace to the Guelphs. His soft words propose equal status in Verona for Montagues and Capulets, the peace to be signalled by the marriage of Juliet with Romeo. Capulet rejects the possibility but Romeo, still unrecognised, in a beautiful passage ('Se Romeo t'uccise un figlio') urges that Capulet's son was slain in the heat of battle, that his death has been mourned ever since by Romeo, and that Romeo will replace the son Capulet has lost. His pleading is dignified and persuasive but Capulet and his followers remain obdurate and the scene ends with Romeo in his cabaletta vowing to continue the feud; but let there be no mistake, the blood which will flow will be on the heads of those who rejected the peace offer.

In her own room, Juliet sadly contrasts her joyful wedding garment with her unhappy situation, and longs in a beautiful romanza ('O quante volte') for Romeo, whom she loves. Lorenzo brings her beloved Romeo to her and there ensues one of Bellini's most ardent love duets, ending with a sublime passage mainly in thirds which foreshadows Norma and Adalgisa. Romeo begs Juliet to leave with him, Juliet urges her duty to her father. In the end, he makes his escape through the secret passage by which he entered.

The scene changes to a courtyard of the palace, where the wedding festivities have started. Romeo, disguised as a Guelph, is urged by Lorenzo to save himself, but Romeo tells him that a force of Ghibellines is loose in Verona disguised as Guelphs and planning to descend on the palace to halt the wedding. Lorenzo's sympathy is with the young lovers but he cannot betray his allegiance to Capulet. Fighting can be heard as Romeo rushes off. Juliet is torn between fear for her lover's life and despair at the bloodshed. When Romeo reappears once again to urge her to flee with him, he is quickly discovered, and, when he announces himself as Tybalt's rival for Juliet's hand, his true identity is revealed. A grand finale starts with a slow, soft unaccompanied passage of much delicacy, but the intervention of armed Montagues brings the act to a spirited if more conventional end.

Act II. Juliet has no idea who was victorious in the fighting, and whether she should now mourn the death of kinsmen or lover. Lorenzo tells her Romeo is safe, but that, if she is not to be taken to Tybalt's abode, she must take a sleeping draught which he will deliver to her. This way she will appear dead, be buried in the family tomb and then later rejoin Romeo. In an aria, she denies fear of death, but takes the potion only when her father can be heard approaching. He is deaf to her pleas, but orders watch to be kept on Lorenzo, whom he now suspects of double-dealing.

In the grounds of the palace, preluded by clarinet, Romeo gloomily suspects that Lorenzo has deserted him. He and Tybalt confront one another and prepare to fight – the martial duet for mezzo-soprano and tenor is a rarity – until the sound of a funeral dirge for Juliet diverts them from their purpose. Both are horror-stricken and long for death.

The tomb of the Capulets. Romeo and the Montagues come to the vault to mourn Juliet, and, even though he knows she cannot hear him, Romeo begs Juliet to allow him to join her in death ('Deh! tu bell'anima').¹ Lorenzo has been prevented from informing Romeo of the plan and he takes poison, only for Juliet to wake to hear from her lover the dread truth. After a short but heartfelt duet, he dies in her arms and she expires from grief, leaving her father to contemplate the dead lovers. 'Killed! By whom?' Even his own followers join in the cry: 'By you, pitiless man!'

H.

¹ It was Malibran (in 1832 in Bologna) who first started the practice of substituting for Bellini's last scene, with its aria and duet. Vaccai's setting of the same scene, containing the aria 'Ah! Se tu dormi'. Many mezzos follow her.

LA SONNAMBULA

The Sleepwalker

Opera in two acts, text by Felice Romani. Première at the Teatro Carcano, Milan, 6 March 1831, with Pasta, Rubini. First performed in London, Haymarket, 1831, with Pasta, Rubini; Drury Lane, 1833 (in English), with Malibran (her début); Covent Garden, 1835, with same cast; New York, 1835 (in English); 1844 (in Italian). Performed at Covent Garden, 1910, with Tetrzzini, McCormack, Edmund Burke; revived Metropolitan, New York, 1932, with Pons, Gigli, Pinza, conductor Serafin; la Scala, Milan, 1935, with dal Monte, Schipa, Pasero, conductor Guarnieri; 1939, with Carosio, Malipiero, Pasero, conductor Marinuzzi; la Scala, 1955, with Callas, Monti, Zaccaria in Visconti's production (also Edinburgh, 1957, with Callas and later Scotto); Covent Garden, 1960, with Sutherland, conductor Serafin; Metropolitan, New York, 1963, with Sutherland, Gedda.

Count Rodolfo, lord of the castle Bass

Teresa, proprietress of the mill Mezzo-Soprano

Amina, her foster-daughter Soprano

Lisa, proprietress of the village inn Soprano

Elvino, a young farmer Tenor

Alessio, a villager Bass

Place: A Village in Switzerland

Time: Early Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Bellini wrote La Sonnambula for two of his finest collaborators, the great Giuditta Pasta and the hardly less magnificent tenor, Rubini. The pastoral opera which resulted is stylistically in strong contrast to Bellini's next work Norma, but it has never been long out of the repertory when a coloratura soprano of quality has been available.

Act I. The village green. The villagers are making merry, for they are about to celebrate a nuptial contract between Amina, an orphan brought up as the foster-child of Teresa, the mistress of the village mill, and Elvino, a young landowner of the neighbourhood. These preparations, however, arouse the jealousy of Lisa, the proprietress of the inn, for she is in love with Elvino. Nor do Alessio's ill-timed attentions please her. Amina enters with Teresa, and thanks her neighbours for their good wishes. She has two attractive solos, 'Come per me sereno' and the cabaletta 'Sovra il sen la man mi posa'.

When the village notary and Elvino appear, the contract is signed, and Elvino places a ring on Amina's finger, in a duet: 'Prendi, l'anel ti dono', a composition in long-flowing expressive measures.

A handsome stranger appears. Night is approaching, and, and urged by Lisa, he decides to spend the night at the inn. The villagers do not know it, but he is Rodolfo, the lord of the castle. He recalls the scenes of his youth ('Vi ravviso'), then gallantly addresses himself to Amina in a charming cabaletta.

Elvino is piqued at the stranger's attentions to his bride, but Teresa warns all present to go home, for the village is said to be haunted by a phantom. The stranger treats the superstition lightly, and, ushered in by Lisa, retires to the village inn. Elvino upbraids Amina for seemingly having found much pleasure in the stranger's gallant speeches, but before they part there are mutual concessions and forgiveness ('Son geloso del Zefiro errante').

Rodolfo's room at the inn. He enters, conducted by Lisa. She is coquettish, he quite willing to meet her halfway. He learns from her that his identity has now been discovered by the villagers, and that they will come to the inn to offer their congratulations.

He is annoyed, but quite willing that Lisa's attractions shall atone for the discovery. At that moment, however, there is a noise outside, and Lisa hurries out, in her haste dropping her handkerchief, which Rodolfo picks up and hangs over the bedpost. A few moments later he is amazed to see Amina, all in white, raise his window and enter his room. He realises almost immediately that she is walking in her sleep, and that it is her somnambulism which has given rise to the superstition of the village phantom. In her sleep Amina speaks of her approaching marriage, of Elvino's jealousy, of their quarrel and reconciliation. Rodolfo, not wishing to embarrass her by his presence should she suddenly awaken, extinguishes the candles, steps out of the window and closes it lightly after him. Still asleep, Amina sinks down upon the bed.

The villagers enter to greet Rodolfo. As the room is dark, and, to their amusement, they see the figure of a woman on the bed, they are about to withdraw discreetly, when Lisa, who knows what has happened, enters with a light, brings in Elvino, and points out Amina to him. The light, the sounds, awaken her. Her natural confusion at the situation in which she finds herself is mistaken by Elvino for evidence of guilt. He rejects her. The others, except for Teresa, share his suspicions. Teresa takes the handkerchief hanging over the bedpost and places it around Amina's neck, and when the poor, grief-stricken girl faints as Elvino turns away from her, her foster-mother catches her in her arms.

In this scene, indeed in this act, the most striking musical number is the duet near the end. It begins with Amina's protestations of innocence: 'D'un pensiero, e d'un accento'. When Elvino's voice joins hers there is no comfort for her in his words. An unusual and beautiful effect is the closing of the duet with an expressive phrase for tenor alone: 'Questo pianto del mio cor'.

Act II, scene i. A shady valley between the village and the castle. The villagers are going to the castle to beg Rodolfo to intercede with Elvino for Amina. Elvino meets Amina. Still enraged at what he considers her perfidy, he snatches from her finger the ring he gave her. Amina still loves him. He expresses his mixed feelings in the aria 'Ah! perchè non posso odiarti'.

Scene ii. The village, near Teresa's mill. A slender wooden bridge gives access from a window in the mill roof to a flight of steps.

Lisa has induced Elvino to promise to marry her, and preparations for the wedding are afoot. Rodolfo endeavours to dissuade Elvino from the step he is about to take, explaining that Amina is a somnambulist. But Elvino has never heard of somnambulism, and remains incredulous.

Teresa begs the villagers to make less disturbance as poor Amina is asleep in the mill. The girl's foster-mother learns of Elvino's intention of marrying Lisa. Straight away she takes from her bosom Lisa's handkerchief, which she found hanging over Rodolfo's bedpost. Lisa is confused. Elvino feels that she, too, has betrayed him. Rodolfo again urges Elvino to believe that Amina was never false to him – that she is the innocent victim of sleepwalking. Elvino demands proof, and at that moment Rodolfo points to the mill roof, where Amina, in her nightdress, lamp in hand, emerges from a window. Still asleep, she walks to the bridge spanning the mill wheel. She sets foot on the narrow, insecure bridge. The villagers fall on their knees in prayer that she may cross safely. As Amina crosses a rotting plank breaks under her footsteps, and the lamp falls from her hand into the torrent beneath. Still walking in her sleep, she advances to the villagers and Rodolfo. She kneels and prays for Elvino. Then she speaks of the ring he has taken from her, and draws from her bosom the flowers given to her by him on the previous day.

Gently Elvino replaces the ring upon her finger, and kneels before her. 'Viva Amina!' cry the villagers. She awakens and sees Elvino, with arms outstretched, waiting to beg her forgiveness and lead her to the altar. Amina's 'Ah! non giunge' is one of the show-pieces of Italian opera. Nor is its brilliance hard and glittering; it is the brightness of a tender soul rejoicing at casting off sorrow. Indeed, there is about the entire opera a sweetness and a gentle charm that account for its having endured so long in the repertory. K.

NORMA

Opera in two acts, text by Felice Romani, founded on L.A. Soumet's tragedy. Première at la Scala, Milan, 26 December 1831, with Pasta, Grisi, Donzelli, Negrini; London, Haymarket, 1833, with Pasta, de Meric, Donzelli, Galli; Drury Lane, 1837; Covent Garden, 1841, with Adelaide Kemble; New Orleans, 1836; New York, 1841 (in English); 1843 (in Italian); Metropolitan, New York, 1891, with Lilli Lehmann; 1927, with Ponselle, Telva, Lauri-Volpi, Pinza, conductor Serafin; Covent Garden, 1929, with Ponselle; Metropolitan, New York, 1936, with Cigna, Castagna, Martinelli, Pinza, conductor Panizza; 1943, with Milanov; la Scala, 1952, with Callas, Stignani, Penno, Rossi-Lemeni; Covent Garden, 1952, with Callas, Stignani, conductor Gui; 1967, with Sutherland, Marilyn Horne, conductor Bonyngé.

Pollione, Roman pro-consul in Gaul Tenor
 Oroveso, Archdruid, father of Norma Bass
 Norma, high priestess of the druidical temple... Soprano Adalgisa, a virgin of the temple..... Soprano
 Clotilda, Norma's confidante Soprano
 Flavio, a centurion Tenor

Priests, Officers of the Temple, Gallic Warriors, Priestesses and Virgins of the Temple

Place: Gaul

Time: Roman Occupation, about 50 B.C.

Running Time: 3 hours

Act I. The sacred grove of the Druids. The high priest Oroveso comes with the Druids to the sacred grove to beg the gods to rouse the people to war and accomplish the destruction of the Romans. Scarcely have they gone than the Roman pro-consul Pollione appears and confides to his centurion, Flavio, that he no longer loves Norma, although she has broken her vows of chastity for him and has borne him two sons. He now loves Adalgisa.

At the sound of the sacred instrument of bronze that calls the Druids to the temple, the Romans disappear. The priests and priestesses approach the altar, and Norma, the high priestess, ascends the steps. No one suspects her intimacy with the Roman enemy. But she loves Pollione and seeks to avert the danger that would threaten him, should Gaul rise against the Romans, by prophesying that Rome will fall through its own weakness, and declaring that it is not yet the will of the gods that Gaul shall go to war. She also prays to the goddess for the return of the Roman leader, who has left her.

In the sacred grove, Adalgisa is waiting for Pollione, who joins her and begs her to fly with him to Rome, where their happiness would be secure. After some hesitation, she agrees to go with him.

Norma's dwelling. The priestess is steeped in deep sadness, for she knows that Pollione plans to desert her and their offspring, although she is not yet aware of her rival's identity. Adalgisa comes to unburden her heart to her superior. She confesses that she has become untrue to her faith through love – and, moreover, love for a Roman. Norma, thinking of her own unfaithfulness to her vows, is about to free Adalgisa from hers, when Pollione appears. For the first time Norma learns the identity of the Roman Adalgisa loves. When she learns the truth the latter turns from Pollione; she loves Norma too well to go away with the betrayer of the high priestess.

Act II. Norma, filled with despair, is beside the cradle of her children. An impulse to kill them comes over her, but motherhood triumphs over unrequited love. She will relinquish her lover to Adalgisa, who must promise to take the place of mother to her children. Adalgisa, however, will not hear of treachery to Norma. She will go to Pollione, but only to remind him of his duty.

Scene ii. The temple. Norma awaits the result of Adalgisa's plea to Pollione; then learns that she has failed and has come back to the grove to pass her life as a priestess. Norma's wrath is now beyond control. She strikes the brazen shield, and, when the warriors have gathered, proclaims her message: war against the Romans! But with the war song now mingles the sound of tumult from the temple. A Roman has broken into the sacred edifice and has been captured. It is Pollione, who Norma knows has attempted to carry off Adalgisa. The penalty for his intrusion is death. But Norma, moved by love to pity and still hoping to save her errant lover, submits a new victim to the enraged Gauls – a perjured virgin of the priesthood. They ask her to name the wrong-doer, and to their amazement she utters her own name, then confesses all to her father, Oroveso, and confides her children to his care.

A pyre has been erected. She mounts it, but not alone. Pollione, his love rekindled at the spectacle of her greatness of soul, joins her. In the flames he, too, will atone for their offences before God. K.

Norma is a work of great lyrical beauty and considerable dramatic tension. The music unfolds in long scenes, but the listener never loses the feeling that the threads are drawing gradually and inevitably together towards the final tragic dénouement.

The overture is in the nature of a dramatic prelude. The Druids are shown first in a solemn introduction (in which occurs a haunting woodwind phrase), followed by an inflammatory pronouncement by Oroveso, which leads to a typical early nineteenth-century Italian march. Next we are introduced to the Romans, in the persons of Pollione and his friend Flavio; Pollione has a cavatina, 'Meco all'altar di Venere', whose ending is interrupted by the sounds of the Druids gathering for their ceremony, but he has time for a cabaletta before he disappears from view. The introduction to the great scene of Druidical rites is in the form of a march which is later used for the quick section of Norma's great and justly famous 'Casta diva', which forms the centrepiece of this scene and indeed of the whole opera. This prayer to the 'chaste goddess' is one of the most celebrated of soprano arias, and its form and melodic contour are said (with other pieces of the same kind in Bellini's works) to have had the strongest influence on the character and mood of Chopin's Nocturnes. Even transposed, the floriture ornaments are taxing to the average soprano – but the truth is that the average soprano cannot (and never could) tackle the title role.

Adalgisa is the fourth character to be presented musically; her impressive recitative, 'Sgombra è la sacra selva', is her only solo opportunity, but it leads to a big-scale duet with Pollione, 'Va crudele, al dio spietato', and is followed by an extensive scene with Norma herself as she confesses her guilt, and a trio which ends the act. Better known and even more beautiful is the great scene for the two sopranos in Act II, 'Mira, o Norma', after Norma has begged Adalgisa to marry Pollione and to look after the two children Norma has had by him. Adalgisa's devotion is touchingly and beautifully shown in this duet, which contains one of Bellini's finest melodies. Norma and Adalgisa sing in thirds together in the slow section and again in the decorated quick section with which it ends.

Norma (Metropolitan Opera House, New York, c. 1927). Rosa Ponselle as Norma and Marian Telve as Adalgisa.

The last part of the opera begins with Oroveso's solo, 'Ah, del Tebro' (marked 'con ferocia' in the score), gathers momentum when Norma summons the Druids and with them sings a determined chorus, 'Guerra!', and reaches its climax when Pollione is left alone with Norma. Their two great duets, of which 'In mia man alfin tu sei' takes place in private, 'Qual cor tradisti' in public and with choral support, form the climax of the opera. Bellini's vocal writing is at its most expressive, and the drama is no less intense than in, for instance, the duet between Radames and Amneris in the last act of Aida. The opera ends fittingly with a beautiful trio, 'Deh, non volerli vittime', for Norma, Pollione, Oroveso and the chorus.

'Bellini's and Romani's Norma', wrote Andrew Porter in The New Yorker in 1973, 'remains one of the most demanding parts in opera, both vocally and dramatically. It calls for power; grace in slow cantilena; pure, fluent coloratura; stamina; tones both tender and violent; force and intensity of verbal declamation; and a commanding stage presence. Only a soprano who has all these things can sustain the role. There have not been many such sopranos. The critics of the nineteenth century delighted to describe and compare the fine points of the performances by Giulia Grisi, Malibran, Adelaide Kemble, and, later, Lilli Lehmann.'

In the two periods before and after the 1939-45 war, Norma acquired two great protagonists: Rosa Ponselle and Maria Callas. With such exponents, Norma, above all Bellini's operas, flowers, gains in expressiveness and dramatic impact and the music grows to full stature. Partly, this gain is general and the result of technical attainments, of superior, more penetrating imagination; partly it is particular and the product of an ability to colour and weight every phrase individually and leave nothing open to the risks of the automatic or the routine. But, whatever the reason, let no one imagine he has genuinely heard Norma without a truly great singer in the title role. Not to have one is as dire in its consequences as a performance of Götterdämmerung with an inadequate Brünnhilde. The trouble as far as Bellini is concerned is that, in the twentieth century, there have been fewer great Normas than fine Brünnhildes. H.

BEATRICE DI TENDA

Opera in two acts, text by Felice Romani. Première at la Fenice, Venice, 16 March 1833, with Giuditta Pasta, Anna dal Serre, Alberico Curioni, Orazio Cartagenova. First performed Palermo, 1833; Naples, 1834, with Persiani; London, 1836; Vienna, 1837; Paris, 1841; New Orleans, 1842; New York, 1844. Revived Palermo, 1959, with Rubio, conductor Gui; New York (American Opera Society), 1961, with Sutherland, Horne, conductor Rescigno; la Scala, 1961, with Sutherland, Kabaivanska, conductor Gavazzeni; Naples, 1962, with Sutherland; Venice, 1964, with Gencer, conductor Gui.

Filippo Maria Visconti, Duke of Milan Baritone
 Beatrice di Tenda, his wife Soprano
 Agnese del Maino, beloved of Filippo Mezzo-Soprano
 Orombello, lord of Ventimiglia Tenor Anichino, friend of Orombello and formerly minister to Facino, Duke of Milan Tenor Rizzardo del Maino, Agnese's brother Tenor

Courtiers, Judges, Officials, Soldiers,
 Women-in-Waiting

Place: The Castle of Binasco

Time: 1418

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

Beatrice di Tenda is the composer's penultimate opera, first performed just over a year after Norma and nearly two before I Puritani. It was commissioned for the Carnival of 1833, and, by November 1832, Bellini and Romani, in agreement with the great singer Pasta, had settled on Beatrice di Tenda. By mid-December, Bellini, in Venice to produce Norma, had received nothing from Romani and by the end of the month police action had been invoked to persuade Romani to leave Milan to fulfil his contract. Between the beginning of January and 16 March 1833, the normally slow-working Bellini received his verses, set them, rehearsed the performers and produced the opera – to finish up with something of a failure with the audience¹ and to have Romani apologising to the public for the haste with which he had been constrained to work! The similarity of the story to that of Anna Bolena (Romani's libretto was set by Donizetti in 1830) is too marked to be disregarded.

¹ 'Beatrice is musically speaking one of Bellini's richest operas,' wrote that considerable authority, Vittorio Gui.

The story is based on an event in Italian history. Filippo Visconti, after the death of his brother and of their father Gian Galeazzo, joined with the general Facino Cane to restore order, and in due course married his widow Beatrice di Tenda, through whom he inherited army and possessions. When the opera begins, Filippo is bored with Beatrice and has fallen in love with Agnese del Maino.

Act I. The overture, which features Beatrice's fourth scene 'Deh! se mi amasti', brings us to the courtyard of the castle of Binasco. The courtiers are amazed that Duke Filippo has left the festivities early and hear from him that it is because of his lack of sympathy with his wife, who presides over them. The voice of Agnese can be heard singing from the castle ('Ah, non pensar che pieno sia'), and Filippo, encouraged by his sycophantic entourage, mellifluously admits his love for her ('Come t'adoro').

In her own apartments, Agnese awaits the result of an anonymous letter of assignation she has sent Orombello, lord of Ventimiglia, with whom she is secretly in love. In the course of their duet, Agnese comes to understand that Orombello is in love with Beatrice, and her furious reaction presages danger for the Duchess.

Beatrice, strolling in the grounds of the ducal palace with her maids of honour, laments in a beautiful cavatina ('Ma la sola, ohimé, son' io') and cabaletta ('Ah! la pena in lor piombò') her husband's oppressive treatment of her subjects as well as his spurning of her love, which had raised him to his present position as Duke. As she leaves, Agnese's brother, Rizzardo, brings Filippo to the scene. He longs for an excuse to rid himself of Beatrice but, now that he suspects her (falsely, as it turns out) of an amorous intrigue, finds himself furious at the discovery. Their confrontation, mildness itself at first on her side, is composed of insults and accusations on his, culminating in his claim to possess proof that she is plotting with their subjects to remove him.

The fourth scene takes place in a remote part of the castle. Armed soldiers discuss the Duke's behaviour – love or anger, they say, will soon force him to show his hand. Beatrice enters and kneels in front of a statue of Facino, her first husband, from whom she begs forgiveness ('Deh! se mi amasti un giorno') that she so soon forgot his memory in marriage with another. She is, she says, by all forsaken – by all, cries Orombello, but not by him! He knows her plight, knows too that her subjects venerate her still and will with him at their head come to her aid. But Beatrice knows she can accept no aid from Orombello, wishing to avoid all danger of compromising herself. As Orombello kneels at her feet, Filippo with his entourage appears on the scene to accuse her of furnishing him with proof of all his suspicions. A great ensemble, Verdian in its thrust and directness, builds up as each character protests his or her emotions, and the act comes to an end with Filippo, enraged at Orombello's protestations of Beatrice's innocence, ordering them both to prison.

Act II. A tribunal court inside the castle. A vigorous orchestral prelude leads to the revelation by the gentlemen of the court that Orombello has succumbed to the pressure of torture and confessed. Filippo is deaf to the pleas of Anichino, and at the appearance of the judges he demands an exemplary sentence for the guilty woman. When confronted with Orombello and the news that he has confessed, Beatrice berates him for what she can only think is a futile effort to buy his life, until, in a burst of revulsion, he proclaims that his confession was made under duress and is false. An ensemble develops, with Beatrice voicing her thanks to Orombello and to heaven, Orombello his newfound steadfastness, Agnese her doubts and remorse, Anichino his certainty of their joint innocence, Filippo his increased determination to make the charge stick, if necessary through further torture. There is a moment of pathos as Beatrice warns her husband that heaven is watching his actions, then Filippo baldly states his conviction that the law must run its course with maximum severity.

Filippo is face to face with his conscience. At first he cannot understand how others can feel remorse where he cannot, then, as he fancies he hears Beatrice's voice under torture, wonders whether he himself is as obdurate as he tries to make out, finally discovering the truth about his feelings as he learns from Anichino that, in spite of Beatrice's refusal to confess under torture, the judges have agreed on her death warrant, which now lacks only his signature. He cannot sign and so send to the block the woman who saved him from the life of a wandering fugitive ('Qui m'accolse oppresso, errante') – it is the one moment of humanity in a character otherwise drawn too black for credibility. But Filippo's clemency is short-lived, and the news that the people and elements of Facino's army are massing against him causes him to sign the decree, insisting that it is not he but Beatrice's own villainy which condemns her ('Non son io che la condanno').

A hall leading to the castle dungeons. Her maids of honour have left Beatrice at prayer in her cell, but soon she emerges to tell them that heaven has helped her triumph over the pain of her ordeal, that she will die wrapped in virtue's mantle, while Filippo and her enemies await God's punishment for their crimes against truth and justice. The appearance of Agnese to confess her part in Beatrice's torment – it was she who stole her letters, and with her own honour bought the death of Beatrice – leads to a change of heart in Beatrice as, in a beautiful trio initiated by Orombello from his nearby cell ('Angiol di pace'), she grants Agnese her pardon.

A funeral dirge announces the guards who are to escort Beatrice to the scaffold, and, as Agnese faints in anguish, Beatrice poignantly asks for prayers for Filippo and Agnese and not for herself ('Ah! se un'urna'), then in a brilliant cabaletta ('Ah! la morte a cui m'appresso') appears to welcome the prospect of death as amounting to victory over the sorrows of earth.

H.

I PURITANI

The Puritans

Opera in three acts, words by Count Pepoli. Produced Paris, Théâtre des Italiens, 25 January 1835, with Grisi as Elvira, Rubini as Arturo, Tamburini as Riccardo, and Lablache as Giorgio. London, King's Theatre, 21 May 1835 (in Italian); la Scala, Milan, 1835; Philadelphia, 1843; New York, 1844; Academy of Music, 1883, with Gerster. Revived, Manhattan Opera House, 1906, with Bonci as Arturo and Pinkert as Elvira; and in 1909 with Tetrizzini; Metropolitan, 1918, with Barrientos, Lazaro, de Luca, Mardones; Florence, 1933, with Capsir, Lauri-Volpi, Basiola, Pinza, conductor Serafin; la Scala, Milan, 1942, with Carosio; Rome Opera, 1948, with Pagliughi; la Scala, 1949, with Carosio, conductor Capuana; Fenice, Venice, 1949, with Callas, conductor Serafin; Glyndebourne, 1960, with Sutherland, conductor Gui; Covent Garden, 1964, with Sutherland; 1992 with June Anderson, Sabbatini.

Lord Walton, of the Puritans.....Bass
 Giorgio (Sir George Walton), his brother, of the Puritans Bass

Arturo (Lord Arthur Talbot), of the Cavaliers.....Tenor Riccardo (Sir Richard Forth), of the Puritans.....Baritone
 Sir Benno Robertson, of the Puritans.....Tenor Queen Enrichetta (Henrietta), widow of Charles ISoprano
 Elvira, daughter of Lord Walton.....Soprano
 Puritans, Soldiers of the Commonwealth, Men-at-Arms, Women, Pages

Place: Near Plymouth, England

Time: English Civil War

Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

Though the quartet of leading singers was the same in each case, nothing could be in stronger contrast to Bellini's opera than Donizetti's Don Pasquale of eight years later. In spite of a happy ending, Bellini's I Puritani demonstrates the melancholy side of his genius as few of his operas; a seriously prepared performance is as convincing an advocate for the lyrical tragedies of the first part of the nineteenth century as is Donizetti's Lucia.

Act I. A fortress, near Plymouth, held by Lord Walton for Cromwell. Lord Walton's daughter, Elvira, is in love with Lord Arthur Talbot, a cavalier and adherent of the Stuarts, but her father has promised her hand to Sir Richard Forth, like himself a follower of Cromwell. He relents, however, and Elvira is bidden by her uncle, Sir George Walton, to prepare for her nuptials with Arthur, for whom a safe conduct to the fortress has been provided.

Queen Henrietta, widow of Charles I, is a prisoner in the fortress. On discovering that she is under sentence of death, Arthur, loyal to the Stuarts, enables her to escape by draping her in Elvira's bridal veil and conducting her past the guards, as if she were the bride. There is one critical moment. They are met by Sir Richard, who had hoped to marry Elvira. The men draw their swords, but a disarrangement of the veil shows Sir Richard that the woman he supposes to be Lord Arthur's bride is not Elvira. He permits them to pass. When the escape is discovered, Elvira, believing herself deserted, loses her reason. Those who had gathered for the nuptials now, in a stirring chorus, invoke maledictions upon Arthur's head.

Act II. Another part of the fortress. The action is mainly to do with the exhibition of Elvira's madness. There is also the famous martial duet, 'Suoni la tromba' (Sound the trumpet), in which Sir George and Sir Richard announce their readiness to meet Arthur in battle and avenge Elvira's sad plight.

Act III. A grove near the fortress. Arthur, although proscribed, seeks out Elvira. Her joy at seeing him again temporarily lifts the clouds from her mind, but renewed evidence of her disturbed mental state alarms her lover. He hears men, whom he knows to be in pursuit of him, approaching, and is aware that capture means death, but he will not leave Elvira. He is apprehended and is about to be executed when a messenger arrives with the news of the defeat of the Stuarts and a pardon for all prisoners. Arthur is freed. The sudden shock of joy restores Elvira's reason. The lovers are united.

As an opera I Puritani lacks the naïveté of La Sonnambula, nor has it any one number of the celebrity of 'Casta diva' in Norma. However, it is sometimes revived for a tenor whose elegance of phrasing finds exceptional opportunity in the role of Arthur; or for some renowned prima donna of the brilliant coloratura type, for whom Elvira is a grateful part.

The principal musical numbers are, in Act I, Sir Richard Forth's cavatina, 'Ah! per sempre io ti perdei'; Arthur's romance, 'A te o cara'; and Elvira's sparkling polacca, 'Son vergin vezzosa'. In Act II we have Sir George's romance, 'Cinta di fiori', and Elvira's mad scene, 'Qui la voce sua soave'. This is a legato melody of infinite pathos and beauty – one of Bellini's finest inspirations and perhaps the loveliest and most purely musical of all nineteenth-century mad scenes. It is followed by a beautiful cabaletta, 'Vien, diletto'.

The act closes with the duet for baritone and bass, between Sir Richard and Sir George, 'Suoni la tromba', a fine sonorous proclamation of martial ardour. It was in this duet, on the occasion of the opera's revival for Gerster, that I heard break and go to pieces the voice of Antonio Galassi, the great baritone of the heyday of Italian opera at the Academy of Music. 'Suoni la tromba!' – he could sound it no more. The career of a great artist was at an end.

'A una fonte afflitto e solo', a beautiful number for Elvira, occurs at the beginning of the third act. There is also in this act the impassioned 'Vieni fra queste braccia' for Arthur and Elvira, with its two top Ds for the tenor. It is followed by a big ensemble, 'Credeasi, misera', dominated by the tenor's part, in which occurs a rare example of a top F written for the tenor.

K., H.

JULIUS BENEDICT

(born 27 November 1804, died 5 June 1885)

THE LILY OF KILLARNEY

Opera in three acts, text by J. Oxenford and D. Boucicault, after the latter's play Colleen Bawn. Première, Covent Garden, 8 February 1862, with Louise Pyne, Henry Haigh, Charles Santley, William Harrison. First produced New York, 1868; Brunswick, Hamburg and other German cities, 1863, as Die Rose von Erin. Revived Covent Garden, 1902, with Fanny Moody, Joseph O'Mara; Sadler's Wells, 1931, with Jean Kemp, Arthur Cox, Henry Wendon, Harry Brindle.

Eily O'Connor (The Colleen Bawn).....Soprano
Hardress Cregan, secretly married to Eily.....Tenor
Mrs Cregan, his mother.....Contralto
Mr Corrigan.....Bass
Myles na Coppaleen, in love with Eily.....Tenor

Danny Mann, a boatman, devoted to Hardress.....Baritone
Miss Ann Chute, an heiress.....Soprano
Sheelah.....Contralto
Father Tom.....Bass
O'Moore.....Bass

Place: Ireland
Time: Nineteenth Century
Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

Act I, scene i. The hall at Tore Cregan. Hardress Cregan, whose secret marriage to the beautiful peasant girl Eily O'Connor is unknown even to his mother, is entertaining his friends. Two guests squabble about the merits of their horses, and Hardress decides that only a steeplechase can satisfactorily settle the argument. Mrs Cregan is left alone, to be visited by Mr Corrigan, a vulgarian who holds a mortgage on the Cregan property and threatens that, if Hardress does not marry the heiress Ann Chute and so obtain the money, he will demand her own hand in marriage. She is outraged at the suggestion.

At this point Danny Mann is heard singing in the distance, and Corrigan tells Mrs Cregan that Mann is waiting to take Hardress to visit the Colleen Bawn. He forces her to watch the lantern signals as proof of her son's infatuation. They listen as Hardress and Danny sing 'The Moon has raised her lamp above', a duet that is probably the best-known piece in the score. In a quartet ('Ah, never was seen') Mrs Cregan and Corrigan sing of their anger and suspicion, while Danny and Hardress are heard singing on their way to Eily.

Scene ii. Eily's cottage. Corrigan tries to extract information about Hardress from Myles na Coppaleen, a peasant hopelessly in love with Eily, who sings of his unrequited love ('From Inchigela' and 'It is a charming girl'). Eily, with Myles, Sheelah and Father Tom (a good priest who watches over her), is waiting for her husband. She tells the story of her secret marriage in a romance ('In my wild mountain valley'), and the four sing a lively quartet which is interrupted, to the chagrin of Myles, by the sound of Hardress approaching. Father Tom begs Eily to make her marriage public, but when Hardress arrives he tries to induce her to surrender her marriage certificate to him and so conceal the matter altogether. Myles and Father Tom succeed in making Eily promise never to part with the precious document, and Hardress leaves in a passion.

Act II. There is a hunting chorus as Hardress begins to pay court to Ann Chute. She sings a florid air ('The eye of love is keen') which is followed by a duet ('Ah, never may that faithful heart'), in which Hardress is nagged by conscience as he thinks of Eily. Hardress is horrified when Danny Mann suggests that he should murder Eily so as to clear the way for him; if he decides on her death, he has only to send Danny his glove as a signal.

Scene ii. There follows a tempestuous scene with Hardress flying into a rage at Corrigan's attentions to his mother; Mrs Cregan crying that her son could save her from him if he wished, and Corrigan taunting Hardress with his love for Eily. All this is overheard by Danny Mann, who darkly hints to Mrs Cregan that if she can persuade Hardress to send him his glove, her troubles will be over. Mrs Cregan is puzzled but goes off to do as he suggests. She returns with the glove and gives it to Danny, whose momentary pangs at the prospect of his self-imposed task eventually yield to his feelings of loyalty to his master.

Scene iii. At her cottage, Eily sings of her loneliness and longing for her husband. Danny Mann, much the worse for drink, comes to tell her that he will row her across the lake to Hardress. Myles begs her not to go, but Eily mocks his fears and goes off in Danny's boat.

Scene iv. To a lonely cave comes Myles, still singing of his hopeless love for Eily. Seeing an otter slither off a rock, he goes to get his gun. Danny rows Eily into the cave, sets her ashore on a rock and demands her marriage lines or her life. She refuses to give them up and Danny pushes her into the water. A shot is heard and Danny too falls into the sea. Myles comes to look for the otter he thinks he has shot and finds Eily under the water. He plunges in and drags her out, as the song of the boatmen can be heard in the distance.

Act III. Myles sings a lullaby to Eily and he, Eily and Father Tom together thank heaven for her rescue. The scene changes to the town, where Hardress is about to marry Ann Chute. Suddenly, Corrigan arrives with soldiers who arrest Hardress for his part in the murder of Eily, Danny Mann having made a dying confession. Villainy is only kept from triumph by the timely arrival of Myles and Eily to refute the allegation. The truth about the marriage is revealed, Mrs Cregan allays suspicion about her son by admitting that he knew nothing about Danny Mann and the glove; and all ends in a bright Rondo Finale.

H.

ALBAN BERG

(born 9 February 1885, died 24 December 1935)

WOZZECK

Opera in three acts and fifteen scenes, text adapted by the composer from Büchner's drama Woyzeck. Première, Berlin Staatsoper, 14 December 1925, with Sigrid Johanson, von Scheele-Müller, Leo Schützendorf, Waldemar Henke, Martin Abendroth, conductor Erich Kleiber. First performed Vienna, 1930, with Pauly, Manowarda, conductor Krauss; Philadelphia, 1931, with Roselle, Ivantzoff, conductor Stokowski; New York, 1931, same cast; London (Queen's Hall, in concert form), 1934 with Blyth, Bitterauf, conductor Boult; Rome, 1942, with Gatti, Gobbi, conductor Serafin. Revived Düsseldorf, 1948, with Mödl, Nillius, conductor Hollreiser; Naples, 1949, with Danco, Gobbi, conductor Böhm; Covent Garden, 1952, with Goltz, Rothmüller, Parry Jones, Dalberg, conductor Erich Kleiber; la Scala, Milan, 1952, with Dow, Gobbi, conductor Mitropoulos; New York, Metropolitan, 1959, with Steber, Uhde, conductor Böhm; Paris, 1963 and 1966, conductor Boulez.

| | |
|--------------------------------|-------------------|
| Wozzeck, a soldier | Baritone |
| The Drum-Major | Tenor |
| Andres, a soldier | Tenor |
| The Captain | Tenor |
| The Doctor | Bass |
| First and Second Workmen | Baritone and Bass |
| An Idiot | Tenor |
| Marie | Soprano |
| Margret | Contralto |
| Marie's Child | Treble |

Soldiers, Maids, Servants, Children

Place: Germany

Time: c. 1830

Running Time: 1 hour 25 minutes

Conceived in 1914, when Berg saw a performance of Woyzeck, the stylistically prophetic play by Georg Büchner (1813–37), Wozzeck's composition was interrupted by the First World War, in which Berg served. The music was completed in 1921, and in 1923 Universal Edition undertook to publish the opera. In the meanwhile, Berg tried to persuade some opera house or other to mount the work (he was helped by the noted pianist Eduard Steuermann, who played the score to one uninterested General-musikdirektor after another). It was eventually accepted by Erich Kleiber for production at the Staatsoper, Berlin, but, eighteen months before the Berlin première, the public had the opportunity of hearing the so-called Fragments from Wozzeck (the first half of Act I, scene iii; Act III, scene i; and Act III, scene v and the interlude which precedes it), sung by Sutter-Kottlar and conducted by Scherchen. From that moment Wozzeck became a centre of controversy, and musicians and opera-goers divided into those who loved and those who loathed the work – in either case, the reaction was often stronger than the reasons which could be found to support the impression.

Wozzeck is in three acts, each of five scenes. The music is continuous and often Berg provides no more than a few seconds of interlude music during which the scene change must be made.

Berg himself has related music and drama in the most succinct way in the following key:

ACT I

| STAGE | MUSIC |
|--|---|
| Wozzeck in his relationship to his surroundings | Five Character-Pieces |
| Wozzeck and the Captain | Scene i Suite |
| Wozzeck and Andres | Scene ii Rhapsody |
| Marie and Wozzeck | Scene iii Military March and Lullaby |
| Wozzeck and the Doctor | Scene iv Passacaglia |
| Marie and the Drum-Major | Scene v Andante affettuoso (quasi Rondo) |

ACT II

| | |
|------------------------------------|---------------------------------------|
| Dramatic development | Symphony in Five Movements |
| Marie and the Child, later Wozzeck | Scene i Sonata Movement |
| Captain and Doctor, later Wozzeck | Scene ii Fantasy and Fugue |
| Marie and Wozzeck | Scene iii Largo |
| Beer-Garden | Scene iv Scherzo |
| Sleeping Quarters in the Barracks | Scene v Rondo con introduzione |

ACT III

| | | |
|--|-----------------------|-----------------------------------|
| Catastrophe and Epilogue | Six Inventions | |
| Marie with the Child | Scene i | Invention on a Theme |
| Marie and Wozzeck | Scene ii | Invention on One Note |
| Inn | Scene iii | Invention on a Rhythm |
| Wozzeck's Death | Scene iv | Invention on a Chord of Six Notes |
| Orchestral Interlude: Invention on a Key | | |
| Children at Play | Scene v | Invention on Quaver Figure |

However, the composer (in an article published in the Neue Musik-Zeitung 1928, and reprinted in Willi Reich's book on Berg) has given a warning to anyone who may be tempted to perform a mental analysis of Wozzeck during performance: 'However thorough one's knowledge of the musical forms which are to be found within the opera ... from the moment when the curtain rises until it falls for the last time, nobody in the audience ought to notice anything of these various Fugues and Inventions, Suite and Sonata movements, Variations and Passacaglias – everyone should be filled only by the idea of the opera, an idea which far transcends the individual fate of Wozzeck.'

Berg was a pupil of Schoenberg's, and his musical style is influenced by many of his teacher's theoretical and practical ideas. Wozzeck is not, however, composed according to Schoenberg's so-called dodecaphonic method, although the theme of the Passacaglia in Act II has twelve notes. Key signatures, except in the Act III Interlude, are discarded, and the composer makes considerable and subtle use of Sprechstimme, known from Schoenberg's employment of it in Pierrot Lunaire. Sprechstimme is best described as 'musically defined speech'. Rhythm and intonation are exactly prescribed, but 'in the execution each note is only defined in the moment when it is articulated, immediately afterwards the voice drops or rises as in natural speech'.¹ All authorities are agreed that an over-vocal and cantabile style in Sprechstimme is unfortunate, and that the finished result should sound something like the poetic declamation of a good actor.

Act I. The curtain rises in the third bar of the opera on Scene i, which takes place in the Captain's room. The Captain is being shaved by Wozzeck, his soldier-servant. The Captain is a garrulous, digressive individual, and he moralises to the bewildered Wozzeck: if he hurries so much, what will he do with the ten minutes he saves? He puts aside the subject of Eternity, and asks Wozzeck if the wind is not blowing south-north, chortling at the automatic 'Jawohl, Herr Hauptmann' which he gets as answer. The observation that Wozzeck is a good fellow, but without moral sense – witness the fact that he is unmarried but has a child – finally breaks through Wozzeck's preoccupation. Did not the Lord God say 'Suffer little children to come unto me', asks Wozzeck. The Captain's voice rises to a top C in his astonishment at this, and Wozzeck explains that only the rich can afford conventional morality (Ex. 1).

Wozzeck thinks too much, muses the Captain, and he dismisses him with the admonition that he is not to hurry so dreadfully.

Scene ii. Wozzeck and Andres are cutting sticks at sundown in a field from which can be seen the town. Andres sings to himself, but Wozzeck cannot rid his mind of an impression that the place they are in is haunted. He imagines every sort of thing, babbles of the intrigues of the Freemasons, thinks the ground is going to open under his feet, and is convinced the whole world is on fire when the setting sun colours the horizon red. This short scene contains some of Berg's most dazzling orchestral invention.

Scene iii. Marie's room; evening. The sound of a military march played behind the scenes makes it quite plain that what Marie is looking at out of the window is the band going back to barracks. The Drum-Major waves to her, and she sings happily to the band's tune, so happily in fact that her neighbour Margret cannot resist a malicious comment about her lively interest in soldiers. After an exchange of abuse Marie slams the window and shuts out the sound of the band. She sings a lyrical cradle song to her child, before there is a knock at the window, and Wozzeck himself is seen standing there. He cannot come in as it is too late, he has not even time to look at his child whom Marie holds up to him. His confused talk worries her and, after he is gone, she rushes out of the door.

¹ Erwin Stein's article on Wozzeck, in Opera, January 1952.

Scene iv (the Passacaglia). The Doctor's study, next day. Wozzeck, in return for a small pittance, is prepared to act as a guinea-pig for the Doctor's dietetic experiments. The Doctor complains that Wozzeck does not follow out all his instructions, and his scientific talk further confuses the unhappy man, whose outburst causes the Doctor to suggest that he may well end up in a lunatic asylum. The Doctor is ecstatic about the fame which will result when his new theories are published, and the curtain goes down as he re-examines Wozzeck's tongue.

Scene v. The street in front of Marie's house, where the Drum-Major is posturing to her evident admiration. He assures her that his present finery is as nothing to what he wears on Sundays. Marie repulses him once when he tries to embrace her, but the second time does not resist him, and, with the exclamation 'What does it matter? It's all the same', takes him into her house.

Act II. In her room, Marie is admiring herself and her new earrings in a bit of broken mirror. She tries to get the child to go to sleep, then falls to admiring herself again. Wozzeck comes in, and asks what it is that she is trying to hide. She says she found the earrings, and he observes that he has never had the luck to find things like that in pairs. He looks at the sleeping child, then, with a reference to No. 1, reflects that life is nothing but work, and that even in sleep man sweats. He gives Marie the money he has earned from the Captain and the Doctor (to the accompaniment of a string chord of C major) and goes out, leaving her to reflect sadly on her infidelity to him.

Scene ii. The street. The Doctor is hurrying along when he is stopped, in spite of his protests, by his friend the Captain, on whom he revenges himself by giving him details of various fatal cases he has recently seen, ending with a warning that the Captain's own flushed condition may easily be a symptom of an impending apoplectic fit, from which death, or at least paralysis, is likely to result. The Captain becomes lyrical at the thought of his own demise, but consoles himself with thoughts of what nice things people will say of him after he has gone.

His reverie is interrupted when Wozzeck comes rapidly down the street – he cuts through the world like one of his own razor blades, says the Captain in a depressed way. The mention of shaving reminds him of the scandal about Marie and the bearded Drum-Major, and he and the Doctor proceed to torment Wozzeck with innuendo (has he not lately found a hair of a beard in his soup?) and even the imitation of a military march. The seriousness with which Wozzeck takes their insinuations quite shocks his tormentors, and he bursts out with a fortissimo imprecation at the impossibility of finding satisfaction in life. The Doctor feels his pulse to see if emotion is affecting it, and both he and the Captain exclaim in surprise as their victim rushes off down the street.

Scene iii. The street in front of Marie's house. It is the slow movement of the symphony (largo) and is scored for a chamber orchestra of fourteen players, composed according to the distribution of Schoenberg's Kammersymphonie. Marie is standing in front of her house when Wozzeck comes up to her. She is as beautiful as sin, he says – but how can sin be beautiful? Did he stand there? Marie replies that she cannot control who walks in the street, and, when Wozzeck looks as though he will strike her: 'Better a knife blade in my heart than lay a hand on me ... My father would never dare when I was little.' Wozzeck repeats her words in a dazed sort of way as she goes into the house.

Scene iv. A beer-garden, where dancing is in progress to a slow Ländler played on the stage by a Heurige orchestra: two to four fiddles tuned a tone high, clarinet in C, accordion, several guitars, a bombardon in F (bass tuba). There is general dancing, and a couple of exceedingly drunk workmen sing in a maudlin way of the effect of brandy on the soul. Wozzeck comes in and sees Marie dancing with the Drum-Major; his jealousy grows until he is about to rush on to the dance floor and separate them, when the dance stops. The soldiers, with Andres as soloist, begin a lusty hunting song, ending on a sustained C for the soloist. The first workman climbs on to a table and starts a most effective example of one of those wholly logical, wholly nonsensical discourses traditionally associated with the very drunk. It is entirely conducted in Sprechstimme, and shows how effective and expressive a medium that can be.

A snatch of the male chorus succeeds the sermon, after which an Idiot appears on the scene, wanders over to where Wozzeck is sitting, and observes 'Lustig, lustig ... aber es riecht ... ich riech blut' (Joyful, joyful ... and yet it reeks ... I smell blood). The whole role contains only thirteen notes, and yet the tiny scene in which the Idiot appears, to a mainly accordion accompaniment, has an extraordinary fascination and significance. The dancing begins again and Wozzeck's imagination is obsessed with the idea of blood.

Scene v. Wozzeck's barrack room at night. Before the curtain goes up, the sound of snoring can be heard from the sleeping occupants of the room (the chorus in five parts hum wordlessly with half-open mouths), and as soon as the stage can be seen, Wozzeck is heard complaining to Andres that he cannot sleep for memories of the dance hall. The Drum-Major staggers into the room, proclaiming his conquest at the top of his voice and demanding that Wozzeck drink with him. The latter turns away and whistles to himself, whereupon the Drum-Major yanks him from where he stands; they fight for a moment, Wozzeck is knocked to the ground, and the Drum-Major shakes him and threatens to knock all the breath out of his body. He goes out, leaving Wozzeck staring in front of him. 'He bleeds', exclaims Andres. The suggestion of blood seems to Wozzeck like fate's prompting: 'One time after another.'

Act III. Musically, this act is particularly concentrated and consists of six Inventions (that is Berg's name for them).

Scene i. Marie's room at night. The solo viola gives out the theme. Marie is reading the story of Mary Magdalen in the Bible, and cannot help comparing what she reads with her own life. She ends with a cry for mercy: 'Saviour ... as You had mercy on her, have mercy now on me, Lord!' The scene, which is of haunting beauty, has Sprechstimme when Marie reads from the Bible, singing when she comments on what she has read.

Scene ii. A pond in the wood, later that night. Wozzeck appears with Marie, whom he prevents from going home as she wishes. He reflects on how long they have known each other, and, when Marie sees the moon rise, draws a knife and cuts her throat, then bends over her: 'Dead!' The interlude consists of two long crescendi on B natural, beginning with a ppp solo horn, and continuing through the whole orchestra until, after a percussive rhythm, the second crescendo takes in the percussion as well. Straight away the curtain rises on Scene iii, with the hammering of a quick polka on an out-of-tune piano. The scene represents an inn. Wozzeck is among the dancers. He takes Margret for partner, and leads her to a table, where he starts to flirt with her. She sings a short song, but stops when she sees blood on Wozzeck's hand. He makes some attempt to explain it away by saying he cut his arm, then pushes through the dancers who have by now crowded round him, and rushes from the room.

Scene iv. The pond, once again. Wozzeck searches for the knife, which he dropped after the murder and which would incriminate him if found. He finds it, pauses for a moment to look at the body of Marie, then throws the knife into the water, into which he watches it sink. The whole world seems to him bathed in blood; he sees spots on his hands and his clothes, and walks hopelessly into the water to wash it off. He walks further, until he has disappeared from sight. As the Doctor and the Captain come into view and comment on the sound they hear – the sound of a man drowning, hazards the Doctor – the orchestra suggests the waters closing over Wozzeck's head in rising chromatic scales.

The great D minor interlude forms the climax of the opera, and at the same time a lament for Wozzeck himself, the opera's hero. Reference is made to music from earlier scenes, and the themes most closely connected with Wozzeck himself are heard in ennobled form.

Scene v. The street outside Marie's house. Children are playing. Apart and playing by himself is Marie's child. Other children come running in, and one of them says that Marie has been found dead. The child cannot take in what he is being told, and goes on playing his game: 'Hopp-hopp, hopp-hopp, hopp-hopp.' The curtain drops slowly. H.

LULU

Opera in three acts, text adapted by the composer from Wedekind's Erdegeist and Die Büchse der Pandora. Première in the unfinished (two-act) form in which it was left by the composer at the time of his death in Zürich, 2 June 1937, with Nuri Hadzic as Lulu, Aster Stig (Dr Schön), Emmerich (Athlete), Peter Baxevanos (Alwa), Maria Bernhard (Geschwitz), Feichtinger (Gymnasiast), Paul Feher (Painter), Honisch (Schigolch), conductor Denzler. First performed Venice, 1949, with Styx, Reh fuss, Demetz, Zareska, conductor Sanzogno; Essen, 1953, with Spletter, conductor König; Hamburg, 1957, with Pilarczyk, conductor Ludwig, producer Rennert; Sadler's Wells, 1962, by Hamburg Company; Santa Fe, 1963, with Joan Carroll, conductor Craft; Stuttgart, 1966, in Wieland Wagner's production, with Silja, conductor Leitner, and Edinburgh Festival, 1967. The three-act version, completed by Friedrich Cerha, first performed Opéra, Paris, 1979, with Teresa Stratas, Yvonne Minton, Kenneth Riegel, Franz Mazura, produced by Patrice Chéreau, conducted by Pierre Boulez; Covent Garden, 1981, with Karan Armstrong, conductor Colin Davis; Glyndebourne, 1996, with Christine Schäfer, conductor Andrew Davis.

| | |
|---|---------------------|
| Lulu | High Soprano |
| Gräfin Geschwitz | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Wardrobe-Mistress | Contralto |
| A Schoolboy ('Der Gymnasiast') | Contralto |
| The Doctor, Lulu's husband | Speaking Part |
| The Painter, Lulu's second husband | Lyric Tenor |
| Dr Schön, a newspaper editor | Heroic Baritone |
| Alwa, Dr Schön's son, a composer | Heroic Tenor |
| An Animal-Tamer | Bass |
| Rodrigo, an athlete | Bass |
| Schigolch, an old man | High Character Bass |
| The Prince, a traveller in Africa | Tenor |
| The Theatre Director | Buffo Bass |
| Clown | Baritone |
| Manservant | Tenor |
| The Banker | Bass |
| The Journalist | Tenor |
| The Marquis | Tenor |
| Lady Artist | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Young Girl | Soprano |
| Her Mother | Contralto |
| Page | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Servant | Bass |
| Police Commissioner | Bass |
| The Professor | Tenor |
| The Negro | Lyric Tenor |
| Jack the Ripper | Heroic Baritone |

Pianist, Stage Manager, Attendants of the Prince, Policemen, Nurses, Wardresses, Dancers, Party
Guests, Servants, Workers

Place: A German City

Time: Last Quarter of the Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Lulu, Berg's second and last opera, is written throughout in the dodecaphonic system. When the composer died, he had finished Acts I and II, and part of Act III. In addition, he had sketched, in more or less elaborate form, the whole of the rest of the work, which is to say that, except for some lines in the ensemble, all the words had been set. Some of the music of this act was included among the five Symphonic Pieces from the opera, which he completed first. The Symphonic Suite (which requires a singer for performance) consists of (1) Rondo (duet Lulu-Alwa, II, i, and end of II, ii), (2) Ostinato (Interlude II, i-ii), (3) Song of Lulu (II, i), (4) Variations (Interlude III, i-ii), (5) Adagio (Interlude I, ii-iii, and end of opera, including arietta of Geschwitz).

Efforts were made after Berg's death to have the opera finished by one of his contemporaries sympathetic to his music. Schoenberg turned it down, on the grounds that the libretto contained unnecessary anti-Semitic references (there are two of them) and, when initial attempts failed, the composer's widow gradually imposed an embargo on any work on her late husband's opera. The two acts were performed and most commentators accepted Lulu as one of the great operatic masterpieces of the twentieth century, even without its third act. Frau Berg's reasons for refusing access to the manuscript, it was advanced by apologists, were artistic – also because she hated the decadent tone of the libretto, particularly of the last act. Others found them more personal and connected with an affair Berg is said to have had during the composition of Lulu. Backed by pressure from Pierre Boulez, Universal Edition eventually allowed Friedrich Cerha, the Viennese composer, to complete the work, which emerged in 1979 under the baton of Boulez as a masterpiece, even if rather a lengthy one, with its third act restored to full length.

Prologue. An animal-tamer, accompanied by the clown from his circus, steps in front of the curtain and introduces his troupe, among whom is Lulu, dressed in Pierrot's costume.

Act I. The curtain goes up on scene i to reveal a painter's studio, where Lulu, as Pierrot, is being painted. Dr Schön, a newspaper editor, watches the proceedings. Schön's son, Alwa, enters and is surprised to find Lulu there without her husband. She explains that she expects him at any moment, and Alwa, who works in the theatre, takes his father off to his dress rehearsal, leaving Lulu and the Painter alone. The latter admits he cannot give his mind to his work, and tries to embrace Lulu. He chases her vigorously round the room – the two voices are in canon and begin with Lulu's motif (heard first in the Prologue) – and kisses her hands just before the sound of her husband's knocking is heard.

He succeeds in forcing the door, only to collapse at their feet with the shock of finding them in a compromising position. They gradually come to realise he is dead and Lulu comments, with more interest than regret, on his death (Canzonetta introduced by saxophone solo). There is a duet for Lulu and the Painter, in which his questions about her beliefs receive the unvaried answer 'I don't know', and the Painter sings an arioso when Lulu leaves him alone while she goes to change her clothes.

An interlude leads to scene ii, which takes place in an elegant room in which hangs Lulu's portrait as Pierrot. The Painter, who is now her husband, comes in with the mail, and Lulu reads with amazement a notice of the engagement of Dr Schön. There follows a light-hearted Duetto between her and the Painter, at the end of which the studio bell rings. The Painter looks out and says it is a beggar. He goes off to his studio to work, and Lulu lets in the 'beggar', who turns out to be Schigolch, who is supposed to be her father, but in reality may be a former lover. He expresses admiration for her present surroundings; she has come a long way since he last saw her.

As he leaves, Schön enters (Sonata movement begins), recognises Schigolch with some surprise, and then tells Lulu that she must stop coming to see him now that he is engaged. She retorts that she belongs to him (the slow beginning of the coda of the sonata's exposition has something of the significance of a love theme); he rescued her from the streets as a child, and anyhow her husband is blind to anything she does, and does not think of her as a person but as his 'little darling'.

The Painter enters, Lulu leaves, and Schön urges him to watch Lulu carefully, then, as the music gains in urgency, gradually reveals something of her past. He himself introduced her to Dr Goll, her previous husband; it was just after the death of his (Schön's) own wife, and Lulu was doing her utmost to take her place. She has been known by a different name to each of her lovers; Schön calls her Mignon, Dr Goll called her Nelly, and the Painter refers to her as Eva. The Painter makes as if to go out and talk to Lulu, but presently groans are heard and Lulu and Dr Schön force open a locked door (rhythmical canon of percussion) to find the Painter lying dead.

The bell rings and Alwa comes in full of excitement at the news that revolution has broken out in Paris. Schön fears that the scandal which will inevitably follow discovery of the Painter's suicide will endanger his own engagement, but, editor-wise, hopes the sensation of the news from France may serve to cover it up. The curtain falls to Lulu's words, sung to her motif: 'You will marry me after all.'

An extended Interlude, in which the love theme is developed, leads to a third scene, which takes place in Lulu's dressing-room at a theatre. Alwa waits for Lulu to come off the stage, and reminds her how, as a young man, he wanted to induce his father to marry her after his mother's death. Lulu replies that she knows perfectly well that Dr Schön put her on the stage so that somebody rich should take her off his hands.

She goes out for the next part of her act, and Alwa observes that her life history would make a splendid story for an opera. A Prince, who intends to marry her, enters and launches into extravagant praise of Lulu. There is a noise off-stage, and Lulu is carried in after fainting during her act – an accident caused, Lulu explicitly says, because she had to dance in front of Schön's prospective bride.

Lulu and Schön are left alone (development section of the Sonata) and a scene ensues between them, Lulu taunting him for not having already married his innocent bride and for his unavailing attempts to free himself from her own domination. In despair, he tries to tear himself away, but she shows herself the stronger (recapitulation of the Sonata) and forces him to write, to her dictation, a letter to his fiancée, breaking off the engagement. The curtain falls as Schön exclaims 'Now comes my execution' (love music). Lulu prepares to continue the act interrupted by her fainting fit.

Act II, scene i. A palatial hall decorated in the German Renaissance style. Gräfin (Countess) Geschwitz, a lesbian and dressed in clothes of distinctly masculine cut, is paying a call on Lulu, to whom she is obviously very much attracted. Schön, who is now Lulu's husband, is present, and when Lulu has left with Geschwitz, he shows that jealousy has brought him to the verge of madness. He looks behind the curtains, a loaded revolver in his hand, as if he expected to find some lover there. Lulu returns and she and Schön leave the stage together.

No sooner have they gone than Geschwitz sneaks back into the room and conceals herself, just before Schigolch, an Athlete and a Schoolboy come in (the last-named a 'Hosenrolle', or travesty part). The boy is in love with Lulu and Schigolch has acted as go-between in arranging a meeting. They are drinking and smoking when Lulu comes in, but all hide when Alwa is announced. Alwa with rising excitement declares his love for Lulu. She counters that it was she who was responsible years ago for poisoning his mother. Dr Schön watches the scene from a hiding-place, and catches sight of the Athlete, who is also hiding. Schön leads Alwa, who is no longer in control of himself, from the room, and returns to launch a tirade against Lulu, offering her the revolver, with which he has been pursuing the Athlete, and telling her to use it against herself.

Next he finds Geschwitz and drags her from the room, all the time continuing to urge Lulu to commit suicide. Here follows Lulu's song (it is dedicated by the composer to Anton von Webern); in it, she justifies herself and says she has never tried to seem other than she is. Schön again attempts to force the revolver against Lulu, there is a cry from the boy, and Lulu fires five shots into Schön's body. The entire scene between Schön and Lulu is built up on an aria of five verses for Schön, the different episodes coming as interruption between the verses.

Lulu is horrified by what she has done; Schön was her only love. Alwa returns, and Schön's last words to him are in the nature of a demand for vengeance. Lulu in an arietta pleads to Alwa for mercy, but the curtain falls as the police appear.

The exciting Interlude between the scenes is designed to accompany a silent film, showing what happens to Lulu in the time which intervenes. It involves a court scene, during whose course Lulu is condemned for the murder of Schön; her entry into hospital after she has contracted cholera; and the means of escape (about which more later) through the intervention of Geschwitz.

Scene ii takes place in the same set as scene i, the room however looking dirty and ill-kept. Geschwitz, Alwa and the Athlete (dressed as a footman) are together, and from the conversation we gather that Lulu has had cholera, from which Geschwitz has also only just recovered, that Lulu is to be rescued from the prison hospital where Geschwitz will take her place, and that Lulu is going to marry the Athlete. Schigolch takes Geschwitz off to put the plan into execution – we hear that Geschwitz in her passion for Lulu purposely contracted cholera to make the plan of escape possible.

No sooner are Alwa and the Athlete alone than the Schoolboy appears with a plan for Lulu's escape. They try to convince him that she is dead, and hustle him out of the room just before she comes in, supported by Schigolch. The Athlete is so put out when he sees her looking pale and emaciated that he shouts abuse at her, and leaves the room. Schigolch goes off to collect the tickets for Paris, and Alwa and Lulu are alone. After a passionate love duet, they leave together for Paris.

Act III, scene i. A salon in a casino in Paris, obviously frequented by characters of the demi-monde. The Athlete proposes a toast to Lulu, and the company, as it moves into the gaming room, talks about the rise in the value of some railway shares in which they have all invested. The Marquis, an elegant white-slave trafficker who knows of Lulu's past, suggests that she should enter a brothel in Cairo; if she declines his suggestion, he threatens to expose her to the police. Lulu offers to pay, and the company returns in great heart from their gambling, everyone having won. The Athlete now threatens Lulu if she doesn't pay him too, and at this juncture the page brings the banker a telegram with news of the collapse of the railway shares. Even Schigolch asks Lulu for money and when she tells him of the Athlete's threats, Schigolch proposes to lure him to his hotel room and dispose of him. The Marquis leaves to inform the police and Lulu persuades Countess Geschwitz to go with the Athlete to Schigolch's hotel. The banker's announcement and insistence on payment in cash means that almost everyone present is bankrupt. Lulu dresses up the page in her clothes and herself puts on the boy's. The police find only the page.

Scene ii. An attic in a London slum. Lulu is now on the streets and with her earnings keeps Alwa and Schigolch. Her first client is a professor, whose overcoat pockets Schigolch searches while Lulu is in her room with him. It doesn't take long, and Geschwitz appears from Paris having saved Lulu's Pierrot portrait which she shows them. Lulu is back on the beat and Schigolch hides as a second client, the negro, argues with Lulu about money and Alwa, who tries to help, is struck dead before the negro leaves.

Lulu's last pick-up is Jack the Ripper. Geschwitz makes up her mind to return to Germany as a fighter for women's rights. Jack murders Lulu and, when Geschwitz tries to come to her aid, kills her as well. He washes his hands and leaves as Geschwitz dies.

After the first public hearing of the work, Erwin Stein wrote as follows: 'The music itself shows Berg at the height of his musical achievement. It enriches the picture we had already gained of the composer through his original and important achievements and is another confirmation of the fact that twelve-tone compositions are capable of the greatest variety of expression.'

'The lyrical passages ... are some of the most beautiful things Berg ever wrote. They belong for the most part to the character of Alwa, the contemplative artist who represents the opposite pole to the impulsive Lulu. No less effective is the drawing of the other characters. The music surrounds every figure with a special atmosphere, showing up the features and giving weight to their miming and gestures. The comic element, represented by Schigolch and the Athlete, is also depicted with incisive humour. Yet the whole is enveloped in sound of a unique character. And in spite of occasional powerful crescendos, the orchestration of Lulu shows a preference for the delicate, gracious colours befitting the heroine.'

H.

LUCIANO BERIO

(born 24 October 1925)

LA VERA STORIA

The True Story

Opera in two acts, libretto by Italo Calvino. First performance, la Scala, Milan, 9 March 1982, with Alexandrina Milcheva as Ada, Mariana Nicolesco as Leonora, Oslavio di Credico as Ugo, Roeloff Oostwoud as Luca, Alberto Noli as Ivo, conducted by Luciano Berio. French première, Théâtre National de l'Opéra de Paris, 1985, conducted by Sylvain Cambreling. U.K., Royal Festival Hall, 1989 (concert), staged performance, 1994 (with Felicity Palmer as Ada), both conducted by the composer.

LeonoraSoprano
Luca.....Tenor
Ada.....Mezzo-Soprano
Ivo, Comandante.....Baritone
Condemned Man.....Bass
Ugo, PriestTenor
Ballad-Singers
Three Passers-ByActors
Passer-BySoprano
Vocal Group Two Sopranos, Two Contraltos,
Two Tenors, Two Bases

Three Voices in the Street, Mimes, Dancers, Acrobats

Running Time: 2 hours

The 'true story' of the title has affinities with that quintessentially operatic work, Il trovatore, in terms of the distribution of the voices and the story. A Condemned Man is shot. In revenge, his daughter Ada steals one of Ugo the Commander's young sons. The boy, Luca, becomes the political opponent of Ugo's other son, Ivo. Ugo dies of grief, Ivo takes over as Commander. In a duel Luca wounds Ivo and is shot by an execution squad headed by his brother. This skeletal story constitutes part of the action of the first act, which celebrates the nature of the crowd and is punctuated by four feste. A festa is an important part of Italian culture, reflecting the role of street life in Italian history.

Act I explores the nature of crowds: one crowd 'contains in itself all crowds'.

First Festa. An empty square in the blazing light of midday. The score direction reads 'anxious and dreamy'. The music recreates the swirling movement of a group that forms a crowd. A Condemned Man in handcuffs is led in by soldiers. The fragmentary phrases that the crowd have been chanting complete themselves: 'at a festa everything is spent, enjoyed and burnt, a festa was and is a ferocious sacrifice'.

The Condemned Man reflects that while he is now a victim, 'you may be one tomorrow, if the city continues to suffer the nightmare of the man who wants us to be slaves.'

Second Festa. The crowd explodes and the palace goes up in flames.

The Abduction. Ada, the Condemned Man's daughter, steals the little son of Ugo, the city's commander. Calling Ugo 'the beast', she tells him that she stole his son because he has 'reduced us to beasts who tear one another apart. You killed pity.'

'If you Know what a Son is' (First Ballad). A Ballad-Singer recites the same text, accompanied by two electric guitar players. Berio makes haunting use of folksong-like intonations here, melismas that sound Islamic, to bring out the archetypal nature of the process: the mother who has lost her son has been treated like a beast and she will inflict the same on the man responsible.

Revenge. In a dark duet with his elder son Ivo, Ugo swears revenge: though even a thousand dead will not satisfy him, his son must exact bloody reprisals. At the end, he dies and the police disperse the onlookers.

Time. Leonora's aria, marked 'always very intense and tense', consists of almost incoherent impressions reminiscent of Lucky's monologue in Waiting for Godot. Fragments of meaning relating to public and to private time, to anxiety, to a vortex, a volcano and meteors occasion vivid illustrative details in the music.

'When We Remember' (Second Ballad). A Ballad-Singer accompanied by an accordion player surveys the panorama of history: it teaches us not to expect anything to improve in the future. The police remove them both brutally.

The Night. Berio opposes two disparate sound worlds for this scene, with woodwind (some sumptuous clarinet arabesques) for Leonora and Luca, hard-edged brass for Ivo. Leonora stands between tenor and baritone, as she does in Il trovatore. Separate lines for each soloist converge in a major concerted section as the two men confront each other, enmity bringing them as close as brothers.

The Duel. The antagonism between Ivo and Luca results in a fight, mimed by dancer-acrobats, with Ivo backed by the guards and Luca by the rebels. Luca wounds Ivo. The guards arrest him and the rebels retreat.

The Prayer. The crowd forms into a military parade, led by Ivo, surrounded by dignitaries of the church, the army and the police. A Priest sings Latin 'in a head voice'. The chorus produce noise with their hands and with maracas, claves, wood blocks, wood chimes, glass chimes, tamburelli. The scene has a grotesque liveliness.

'Nobody Knows' (Third Ballad). As the Priest reaches a hysterical pitch, the Ballad-Singer points out that 'Nobody knows who the other one is; nobody wants to know, but everybody knows why they do not want to see. This is how crime leads to crime.' Ada tries to get near Ivo to plead for Luca, but is always pushed back.

'Enemy Brothers' (Fourth Ballad). The pianola accompaniment gives it the feel of a blues song, while the text enumerates typical operatic stuff, such as enemy brothers and tyrannical fathers, instruments of revenge and jealousy, contrary sighs and tender griefs, ending, 'in every catalogue, however, there is always a hidden story'. The procession disappears. Leonora and Ada enter in a close embrace.

The Cry. Leonora and Ada share their grief, which is like 'a cry in the night'.

'Let the Song Make' (Fifth Ballad). Someone passes by, singing in the dusk, accompanied by a violinist and an accordion player. Her haunting song relates closely to the previous scene.

The Prison. Luca moves through despair, the feeling that living is no different from dying, to an awareness that outside there is change: hearing 'the roar of a crowd which will not disperse' and a song, he recovers his sense of meaning.

Third Festa. The crowd which was a passive participant in others' schemes now intervenes. It protests violently but, assaulted by the police, it disperses, leaving many dead on the ground. The singing takes on the character of wailing.

'Evening Comes Down' (Sixth Ballad). The battlefield seems to have become a vast cemetery. A woman passes through the bodies.

The Sacrifice. Luca is brought out in handcuffs; Ivo heads the execution squad. Ada and Leonora are among the crowd who watch the shooting. The ensemble is one of the highpoints of the opera.

Fourth Festa. In the crowd's last outburst the chorus accept that 'We advance, we fall, even one feast day we'll know defeat; waiting begins again; the festa was and will be at the end of ills.'

Memory. Ada looks forward to the possibility, after centuries, that evil may cancel itself out.

Act II. Berio himself said that while Act I was horizontal in structure, Act II is vertical. Act II's radical reworking of Act I's words and music is reminiscent of Berg's Lulu, but there are differences, too. In a sense, Berio here redresses the fundamental balance between words and music. There is literal meaning (more exploration of what the fiesta means) and narrative action, but the overall emphasis has shifted, from the stage to the pit. While the chorus is kept off-stage, Berio uses a virtuoso Vocal Group who fragment single lines and even words from Act I and create extraordinary and memorable sound patterns.

Scene i. Two Passers-By try to get into a building, while they stress that everything is contained in a fiesta. One of them gets in, the other is surrounded by the police. He is dragged inside.

Scene ii. Passer-By III, a soprano, recycles Luca's scene in prison, dislocating words to an elaborate effect. Passerby I is seen to be interrogated, beaten up and eventually thrown out of the window.

Scene iii (Encore). Gendarmes carry away the lifeless body of Passer-By I. There are cries (one evoking Tosca's words to Scarpia): 'I want to see him! Let's run away! Everyone's killing everyone!'

Scene iv (Pas de quoi). Picturesque movement on the street. An accordion player at her side, a reciter of poetry (Passer-By IV) addresses the crowd, recycling the words of Ada's scene and the First Ballad. She duets with her own, recorded voice. A man abducts a child, recreating the primal scene of Act I.

Tango. During the playfully sinister tango, which owes something to Weill, but rather more in its acerbic flavour to Berg's dances in Wozzeck, the man disappears briefly into the crowd and reappears without the baby.

Scene v (Rondo). The crowd experiences terror; the street gradually becomes the arena for guerrilla warfare. Fragments of text from Act I are treated to more intricate reworkings. The words at one point refer to Luca's experience of dislocation in prison, as though the music can resolve his dilemma.

Scene vi opens with a piano duet. Phrases from Act I's duel are recited mechanically by three voices from the crowd. The Priest returns, in a blowsy jazz-inflected passage. The building at the back explodes with lights and violence.

Scene vii. A magnificent concerto or duel for alto saxophone and wind (predominantly clarinet) is heard as the Vocal Group intone fragments from the prison scene, moving from despair to Luca's vision of hope outside the walls.

Scene viii. All the soloists join a huge ensemble, sparsely accompanied by harp and bells. They call for resistance and allow for defeat.

Scene ix. Ada ends the opera, as she ended Act I, contemplating a future in which, perhaps, evil may have ended.

La vera storia uses the Brechtian device of ballad-singers to comment on the action, and to relay the meaning of selected moments in directly accessible form. Another level of meaning is opera itself: the 'story' of the title is fiction as well as fact. The references to Il trovatore are symptomatic of a more general operatic content. Most of the scenes have titles, as they do in early nineteenth-century opera.

Calvino's poetry can be explicit in protestation but more often prefers the oblique. For all the score's complexity Berio aims at full-blooded theatrical impact: his favourite score marking is 'intensely'; the crucial endings to both acts could not be more powerful. Ada exhorts us to remember. If there is compensation for so much suffering, it may come in the distant future. Perhaps, 'forse', is the keyword, as the poet and musician construct something on which to rejoice. La vera storia culminates in Ada's moving recapitulation of her Act I lament and what could be more operatic than that?

P.

UN RE IN ASCOLTO

A King Listens

Azione musicale in two parts, texts by Italo Calvino, including material by Friedrich Wilhelm Gotter and W.H. Auden. Première, in German, Salzburg, 7 August 1984, with Theo Adam as Prospero, Heinz Zednik as the Director and Patricia Wise as the Protagonist, conducted by Lorin Maazel. Same production performed at Vienna State Opera, 1984, and at la Scala, Milan, 1986, with Victor Braun as Prospero. Revived Düsseldorf, 25 May 1988. U.K. première, Covent Garden, London, 1989, with Donald McIntyre as Prospero, Robert Tear as the Director, Graham Valentine as Venerdi, Kathryn Harries as the Protagonist, conducted by the composer. U.S. première, Chicago, 1996, conducted by Dennis Russell Davies.

Prospero.....Bass-Baritone
DirectorTenor

Venerdi (Friday) Actor
 Protagonist Soprano
 Soprano I (with her Pianist)
 Soprano II
 Mezzo-Soprano
 Three Singers Tenor, Baritone, Bass
 Nurse Soprano
 Wife Mezzo-Soprano
 Doctor Tenor
 Lawyer Bass
 Pianist, who sings

Accordion-Player, Mime, Messenger, Designer, Assistants, Tailor, Circus Performers etc.

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

In calling Un re in ascolto an azione musicale Berio alludes to Tristan und Isolde, which Wagner calls a Handlung or 'action'. Like Wagner, Berio explores music's capacity for action independent of the drama, so that it is 'the musical processes that are primarily responsible for the narration'. According to Berio himself, Italo Calvino 'wrote some very beautiful fragments describing the inner thoughts of a grand old man of the theatre as he lies dying'. Berio then fragmented them further: the political strand has been diminished while the thread of artistic endeavour emerges strongly – Berio highlights the action of listening, in terms of its import for music, rather than as an element in the plot (which it was for Calvino). Trying to track any one strand too closely misses the point, which is to accept the continuum of 'acoustic material' (the composer's phrase for music) and the accidental, incidental meanings it throws up. Berio warns us that 'when your "theatrical consumer" hears opera he feels a Pavlovian need for linear, finalised stories that will provoke tension in relation to the outcome rather than, as Brecht said, to the way things are.'

Part I, Aria I. In his room at the side of the stage, Prospero remembers his dream of 'another theatre ... where an "I" whom I do not know, sings ... the music that I do not remember and that I now would like to sing'. Berio highlights the word 'sing' ('canta'), which is so important for the opera as a whole, asking it to be sung as though 'from extremely far away and flexibly, with a different voice'. The rest of the stage reveals a rehearsal in progress.

Duet I. The Director takes Venerdi (i.e. Man Friday, a version of Caliban) through his 'aria', preparing the audience for a circus act. Meanwhile, the stage exhibits 'a kaleidoscope of actions'.

Concertato I. A Pianist and Venerdi rehearse and rework the same text; Three Singers envisage an idyll 'protected from the tempest'. While the Director shows the Chorus their moves, they sing of an ominous storm to come.

Audition I. A Soprano auditions with an aria that is a farewell to Prospero. It ends with the first of the many 'addio's that punctuate the work. They epitomise one sort of opera and highlight a valedictory note in this azione.

Duet II. The Director discusses the plot with Prospero. Their conversation hints at a plot, a king frightened of conspiracy, who confides only in his ugly servant, and experiences rebellion or a tempest.

Concertato II with performers. Prospero watches as the rehearsal continues to recycle fragments of text that has been heard already. The Director, Three Singers and Chorus intone Prospero's farewell speech from The Tempest in a magnificent threnody. One phrase, 'Ecco la vera storia: è finita la festa' (This is the true story, the festa is over), refers to Berio's previous opera and points to the important but elusive autobiographical level in this work.

Serenata. Venerdi repeats fragments from his duet scene. Prospero returns to his room.

Aria II. Prospero listens to the sounds that reach him from the harbour and the theatre, where another audition takes place.

Audition II. The Mezzo-Soprano sings of evening at sea and insists that her compass ('bussola') is hers, the first of the auditioning singers to claim some property or quality as her own.

Duet III. The Mime and Venerdi parody the scene between Prospero and the Director. Venerdi ends, 'You imagined.'

Aria III. Prospero hears 'a voice hidden among voices' that intimates his death. The act ends on a theatrical high note: he admits, 'I am afraid', then attempts to destroy the set and collapses.

Part II, Duet IV. As the cast gather round him, Prospero contemplates death. In a highly charged ensemble, Prospero's wife and the cast comment on his changed appearance, and singers and orchestra go into spasm, as though enacting a heart attack. The Chorus sing his farewell to theatre.

Air for orchestra alone, an emotive, highly condensed passage of some twenty-seven bars, as Prospero sits enthroned in the middle of the stage. Another Soprano comes for an audition.

Un re in ascolto (Covent Garden, 1989, director Graham Vick, designer Chris Dyer). Donald McIntyre as Prospero, Robert Tear as the Director.

Audition III. The Soprano sings of evening at sea. She is taken away by armed men, 'as though she were a guilty queen'.

Aria IV. Prospero contemplates his kingdom of music. The Protagonist arrives.

Aria V. The Protagonist asserts her independence (from any composer, from Prospero), claiming that her person, her will, her compass, her voice and her theatre are all her own. In some ways she represents the performer as heroine, rather in the mould of Cathy Berberian, the extraordinary singer whom Berio married and for whom he wrote some of his greatest works. The marriage was dissolved in 1964 and she died in 1983. Perhaps the Protagonist can be read as his tribute to her memory.

Concertato IV. The people surrounding Prospero react as a crowd (that vital element in La vera storia), first exploding with excitement, then calming down. They take off their costumes, bid farewell to Prospero and leave the stage.

Aria VI. Accompanied by the Chorus Prospero sings of a voice hidden among voices, hidden in silence, chasing memory and imagining the future, before he dies.

Un re in ascolto invites interpretation but it also supplies, almost against its will, a highly charged evening in the theatre. One fruitful way to approach it is to see it as a reflection on the complex nature of opera itself, the encounter (conflict or collaboration) between words, music, singers, production, chorus, stage, theatre and drama.

HECTOR BERLIOZ

(born 11 December 1803, died 8 March 1869)

BENVENUTO CELLINI

Opera in three acts, words by de Wailly and Barbier. Première Opéra, Paris,¹ 10 September 1838, with Dorus-Gras, Stolz, Duprez, Derivis; there were twenty-nine rehearsals, four complete performances. First performed London, Covent Garden, 1853, under Berlioz's own direction, with Julienne, Tamberlik, Tagliafico (in Italian); by Liszt, at Weimar, 1852; by von Bülow, Hanover, 1879. Revived Vienna, 1911; Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, Paris, 1912, conducted by Weingartner; Glasgow, 1939 (in English); Carl Rosa in London, 1957, with Charles Craig, conductor Arthur Hammond; Amsterdam, 1961, with Gedda, conductor Prêtre; London, Covent Garden, 1966, with Elizabeth Vaughan, Minton, Gedda, conductor Pritchard; San Carlo, Naples (Italian première), 1967; la Scala, Milan, 1976, by Covent Garden company with Nicolai Gedda, conductor Colin Davis.

| | |
|---|--|
| Cardinal Salviati ² | Bass |
| Balducci, Papal treasurer | Bass |
| Teresa, his daughter | Soprano |
| Benvenuto Cellini, a goldsmith | Tenor |
| Ascanio, his apprentice | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Francesco | } artisans in Cellini's workshop ...Tenor |
| Bernardino | |
| Fieramosca, sculptor to the Pope | Baritone |
| Pompeo, a bravo | Baritone |

Place: Rome

Time: 1532

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Berlioz's pull towards opera, foreshadowed, it is easy to see, in earlier concert works, did not reach fruition until in his mid-thirties Benvenuto Cellini, which had been conceived as an opéra-comique, and turned down at the eponymous theatre, was staged with little success at the Opéra. It was too difficult for audience and performers alike. Liszt admired it and chose it, after Lohengrin, as the second opera in his term as Kapellmeister in Weimar, but this was in a reduced version. In the later twentieth century, a return to the full version, with spoken dialogue and Pope rather than Cardinal, has tended to be the norm.

The overture, which makes use of material from the opera, is one of Berlioz's best-known.

Act I. The carnival of 1532. Shrove Monday. We are in the house of the Papal treasurer, Balducci, who scolds his daughter Teresa for having looked out of the window. The old man is vexed, because the Pope has summoned the Florentine goldsmith Cellini to Rome.

Teresa, however, is delighted. For she has found a note from Cellini in a bouquet that was thrown to her from the street by a mask – Cellini, of course. She sings of her delight in an attractive cavatina, followed by an allegro con fuoco. A few moments later Cellini appears at her side. There is a broad, andante tune for them both to sing (it is later used for the Carnaval Romain overture). Cellini proposes a plan of elopement. In the morning, during the carnival mask, he will wear a white monk's hood, his apprentice Ascanio a brown one. She will join them and they will flee together. But a listener has sneaked in – Fieramosca, the Pope's sculptor and no less Cellini's rival in love than in art. He overhears the plot and also the slighting remarks made about him by Teresa and Cellini. Unexpectedly, too, Balducci comes back. His daughter still up? In her anxiety to find an excuse, she says she heard a man sneak in. During the search Cellini disappears, and Fieramosca is apprehended. Before he can explain, women neighbours, who have hurried in, drag him off to the public bath house and treat him to a ducking.

Act II. In the courtyard of a tavern Cellini is seated with his assistants. In a romance, he sings that he is happy in his love, for he places it even higher than fame, which alone hitherto he has courted. He must pledge his love in wine. Unfortunately the host will no longer give him credit. Ascanio brings some money from the Papal treasurer, but in return Cellini must promise to complete his Perseus by morning. He promises, although the avaricious Balducci has profited by his necessity and has sent too little money. Ascanio is informed by Cellini of the disguises they are to wear at the carnival, and of his plan that Teresa shall flee with him. Again Fieramosca has been spying and overhears the plot. Accordingly he hires the bravo Pompeo to assist him in carrying off Teresa.

¹ The importance of a Paris production dominated French operatic history until late in the nineteenth century, and Berlioz, much as he despised the standards of the Opéra, moved heaven though not invariably earth in his efforts to get his work performed there.

² The part of Cardinal Salviati was originally allotted by Berlioz to Pope Clement VII. The Paris censorship forbade the representation of a Pope on the stage; but the ascription was restored in the Covent Garden production of 1966.

A change of scene shows the crowd of maskers on the Piazza di Colonna. It is carnival time and the music is a brilliant representation of the gaiety and spirit of the scene. Balducci walks by with Teresa and together they see the play in which, in revenge for his niggardly payment to them, Cellini and his friends have arranged that the snoring Midas shall look like Balducci. Cellini takes advantage of the confusion caused by Balducci's protests to approach Teresa with Ascanio. At the same time, from the other side come two more monks, also in the disguise she and her lover agreed upon. Which is the right couple? Soon the two couples fall upon each other. A scream, and one of the brown-hooded monks (Pompeo) falls mortally wounded to the ground. A white-hooded monk (Cellini) has stabbed him. The crowd hurls itself upon Cellini. At that moment the boom of a cannon gives notice that the carnival celebration is over. Cellini escapes, and in his place the other white-hooded monk, Fieramosca, is seized.

Act III. Before Cellini's house, in the background of which, through a curtain, is seen the foundry, the anxious Teresa is assured by Ascanio that her lover is safe. Soon he arrives in person to describe his escape. With his white habit he was able to join a procession of monks similarly garbed and so make his way home. While Ascanio prepares for their flight, the beautiful line of the duet Cellini and Teresa sing together makes this one of the most attractive episodes of the score.

Balducci and Fieramosca enter precipitately. Balducci wants to force his daughter to become Fieramosca's bride. The scene is interrupted by the arrival of Cardinal Salviati (or the Pope) to see the completed Perseus. Cellini's predicament seems dire. Accused of murder and the attempted kidnapping of a girl, the Perseus unfinished, the money received for it spent! Heavy punishment waits, and another will receive the commission to finish the Perseus.

The artist flies into a passion. Another finish his masterpiece! Never! The casting shall be done on the spot! He is left alone and sings a beautiful 6/8 andante aria. Then the casting begins. Not metal enough? He seizes his completed works and throws them into the molten mass. Eventually, the master shatters the mould. The Perseus in all its glory appears before the eyes of the astonished onlookers – a potent plea for the inspired master. Once more have Art and her faithful servant triumphed over all rivals. K., H.

LA DAMNATION DE FAUST

The Damnation of Faust

In its original form a 'dramatic legend' in four parts for the concert stage, words, after Gérard de Nerval's version of Goethe's play, by Berlioz, Gérard and Gandonnière. Produced as a concert piece at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, 6 December 1846; London, two parts of the work, under Berlioz's direction, Drury Lane, 7 February 1848; first complete performance in England, Free Trade Hall, Manchester, 5 February 1880; New York, 12 February 1880, by Dr Leopold Damrosch. Adapted for the operatic stage by Raoul Gunsbourg, and produced by him at Monte Carlo, 18 February 1893, with Jean de Reszke as Faust; Liverpool, 1894. Revived Monte Carlo, March 1902, with Melba, Jean de Reszke, and Maurice Renaud. Given in Paris with Calvé, Alvarez and Renaud, to celebrate the centenary of Berlioz's birth, 11 December 1903. New York, Metropolitan, 1906, with Farrar, Rousselière, Plançon. Revived la Scala, Milan, 1929, with Cobelli, Merli, Galeffi, conductor de Sabata; Paris Opéra (in Béjart's production), 1964; Sadler's Wells, 1969, with Curphey (later Janet Baker), Alberto Remedios, Herincx, conductor Charles Mackerras.

Marguerite.....Soprano

Faust.....Tenor

MéphistophélèsBass

BranderBass

Students, Soldiers, Citizens, Men and Women, Fairies

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Part I. In the first part of Berlioz's dramatic legend Faust is supposed to be on the plains of Hungary. Introspectively he sings of nature and solitude. There are a chorus and dance of peasants and a recitative. Soldiers march past to the stirring measures of the Rákóczi March. This splendid march Berlioz orchestrated in Vienna, during his tour of 1845, and conducted at a concert in Pest, when it created the greatest enthusiasm. It was in order to justify the interpolation of this march that he laid the first scene of his dramatic legend on the plains of Hungary.

The next part only required a stage setting to make it operatic. Faust is in his study, lamenting his joyless existence. He is about to quaff poison, when the walls part and disclose a church interior. The congregation, kneeling, sings the Easter canticle, 'Christ is Risen', and Faust is comforted by their singing. Méphistophélès appears and offers to show Faust all that his soul can desire. The two start off together to sample what joy and pleasure can be had on earth.

Auerbach's cellar, Leipzig. Revel of students and soldiers. Brander sings the 'Song of the Rat', whose death is mockingly grieved over in a 'Requiescat in pace' and a fugue on the word 'Amen', sung by the roistering crowd. Méphistophélès follows this up with the 'Song of the Flea'.

Part II. Faust is supposed to be asleep on the banks of the Elbe. Méphistophélès sings the beautiful 'Voici des roses', after which comes the most exquisite effect of the score, the 'Dance of the Sylphs', a masterpiece of delicate and airy illustration. Violoncellos, con sordini, hold a single note as a pedal point, over which is woven a gossamer fabric of melody and harmony, ending with the faintest pianissimo from drum and harps. Gunsbourg employed here, with admirable results, the aerial ballet, and gave a rich and beautiful setting to the scene, including a vision of Marguerite. The ballet is followed by a chorus of soldiers and a students' song.

Part III. The scenic directions of Gounod's Faust call Marguerite's house – so much of it as is projected into the garden scene – a pavilion. Gunsbourg made it more like an arbour, into which the audience could see through the elimination of a supposedly existing wall, the same as in Sparafucile's house in the last act of Rigoletto. Soldiers and students are strolling and singing in the street. Faust sings 'Merci doux crépuscule', and rejoices to be in Marguerite's room. He hides, Marguerite comes in and sings the ballad of the King of Thule. Berlioz's setting of the song is primitive, and he aptly characterises the number as a Chanson Gothique. It is a marvellously effective re-creation of the medieval spirit. The Invocation of Méphistophélès is followed by the 'Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps'; then comes Méphistophélès's serenade, 'Devant la maison', a brilliant, elusive piece of mockery (Allegro in tempo di valse).

Faust enters Marguerite's house. There is a love duet, 'Ange adorable', which becomes a trio when Méphistophélès joins the lovers and urges Faust's departure.

Part IV. Marguerite is alone. Berlioz, instead of using Goethe's song, 'Meine Ruh ist hin' (My peace is gone), substitutes a poem of his own. Introduced by the sad strains of the cor anglais, the unhappy Marguerite sings 'D'Amour, l'ardente flamme', an aria of extraordinary beauty. The singing of the students and the soldiers grows fainter. The 'retreat' – the call to which the flag is lowered at sunset – is sounded by the drums and trumpets. Marguerite, overcome by remorse, swoons at the window.

A mountain gorge. The scene begins with Faust's soliloquy, 'Nature, immense, impénétrable et fière', an invocation to nature that is enormously impressive. There follows the Ride to the Abyss; moving panorama; pandemonium; redemption of Marguerite, whom angels are seen welcoming in the softly illumined heavens, far above the town in which the action is supposed to have transpired.

The production by Damrosch in its original concert form in New York was one of the sensational events in the concert history of America. As an opera, however, the work has failed outside France to make the impression that might have been expected from its effects on concert audiences. K.

LES TROYENS

The Trojans

Opera in five acts, text by the composer after Vergil. The work was not produced in its entirety until twenty-one years after the composer's death. Part II was first performed at the Théâtre-Lyrique, Paris, 4 November 1863, with Charton-Demeur as Dido and Monjauze as Aeneas. Between that date and 20 December 1863, there were twenty-one performances of the opera, which was then dropped. The entire work was given at Karlsruhe on 5 and 6 December 1890 in a German version conducted by Mottl (Part I thus had its world première on 5 December 1890). Concert performances in U.S.: Part I, New York, 1877; Part II, 1887. Part I was first performed in French at Nice, 1891; in Paris, Opéra, 1899, with Delna, Lucas, Renaud, conducted by Taffanel. Part II was revived Opéra, Paris, 1892, with Delna, Laffarge; first performed Liverpool (in concert), 1897; first performed in Italy, Naples, 1951, with Cavelti, Tygesen, conductor Cluytens. Both parts on the same evening (i.e. Les Troyens as Berlioz conceived it) were performed in Cologne, 1898 (in German); Stuttgart, 1913 (arr. Schillings); Opéra, Paris, 1921 (in a reduced version); revived there 1939, with Anduran, Ferrer, de Trévi,¹ Singher; 1961, with Crespín, Chauvet, Massard. First performed Berlin, 1930 (in four acts), with Leider, Roswaenge, conductor Blech; Glasgow, 1935 (English translation by E.J. Dent), conductor Erik Chisholm; Oxford (reduced version), 1950, with Arda Mandikian and John Kentish, conductor Westrup; Covent Garden (virtually complete, in English), 1957, with Thebom, Shuard, Vickers, conductor Kubelik; la Scala (extensively cut), 1960, with Simionato, del Monaco, conductor Kubelik; Buenos Aires, 1964, with Crespín (as Cassandra and Dido), Chauvet; Scottish Opera, 1969, with Janet Baker, Ronald Dowd, conductor Gibson (uncut, in English); 1983, Metropolitan, New York, with Jessye Norman, Troyanos, Domingo, conductor Levine.

PART I: La Prise de Troie (The Fall of Troy)

Cassandra (Cassandra), a Trojan prophetess ...Soprano
 Ascagne (Ascanius), *son of Enée*Soprano
 Hécube (Hecuba), *wife of Priam*Mezzo-Soprano
 Polyxène (Polyxenes), *daughter of Priam*Soprano
 Enée (Aeneas), *a Trojan hero*Tenor
 Chorèbe (Choroebus), *fiancé of Cassandra*Baritone
 Panthée (Pantheus), *a Trojan priest*Bass
 Ghost of HectorBass
 Priam, *King of Troy*Bass
 A Trojan SoldierBaritone
 A Greek CaptainBass
 Helenus, *son of Priam*Tenor
 Andromaque (Andromache), widow of Hector ...Mime
 Astyanax, *her son*Mime
 Soldiers of Greece and Troy, Citizens, Women, Children

PART II: Les Troyens à Carthage (The Trojans at Carthage)

Didon (Dido), *Queen of Carthage*Mezzo-Soprano
 Anna, *her sister*Contralto
 AscagneSoprano
 EnéeTenor
 Iopas, *a Carthaginian poet*Tenor
 Hylas, *a young Phrygian sailor*Tenor
 Narbal, *Didon's minister*Bass
 PanthéeBass
 Two SoldiersBaritone, Bass

Two Trojan CaptainsBaritone, Bass
 The Ghost of CassandreMezzo-Soprano
 The Ghost of ChorèbeBaritone
 The Ghost of HectorBass
 The Ghost of PriamBass
 The God Mercure (Mercury)Bass
 Trojan Captains, Courtiers, Hunters, Carthaginians,
 Invisible Ghosts, Workmen, Sailors, Labourers,
 Naiads, Fauns, Satyrs, Wood Nymphs

Place: Troy; Carthage

Time: Twelfth (or Thirteenth) Century B.C.

Running Time: 4 hours; see below

Les Troyens is Berlioz's greatest opera, and in many respects his greatest achievement. In it he unites his yearning for the classicism of Gluck, for design and form, with his own passion for what is expressive and vivid. The work is on the grandest scale, and Berlioz himself noted the timings which the five acts would require: Act I, 52 minutes; Act II, 22 minutes; Act III, 40 minutes; Act IV, 47 minutes; Act V, 45 minutes – a total of 206 minutes.² With four intervals, each lasting a quarter of an hour (if the elaborate sets did not require more), the performance would thus take four hours and twenty-six minutes, he calculated. But he was fated never to hear his opera in the form in which he conceived it; when it was performed at the Théâtre-Lyrique, the first two acts were removed, and only the second part – known in vocal scores, and in most performances for that matter, as Les Troyens à Carthage – was given.

Les Troyens was until the mid-twentieth century one of the neglected masterpieces of opera from the past waiting to be discovered. On this subject, Donald Grout, in his A Short History of Opera (O.U.P.), wrote: '... Les Troyens is the most important French opera of the nineteenth century, the masterpiece of one of France's greatest composers, the Latin counterpart of Wagner's Teutonic Ring; its strange fate is paralleled by nothing in the history of music unless it be the century-long neglect of Bach's Passion according to St Matthew ... in a country properly appreciative of its cultural monuments it would seem that Les Troyens ought to be produced regularly at state expense until singers, conductors and public are brought to realise

¹ Georges Thill, the maker of a famous record of the great tenor scena, sang Aeneas in a revival in 1930 at the Paris Opéra of Part II.

² But these timings are usually exceeded in performance. Scottish Opera's had just over four hours of music, and the performance, with a dinner interval of one hour, lasted five hours 48 minutes. The acts were timed as 60 minutes; 25 minutes; 60 minutes; 45 minutes; 53 minutes.

its greatness. Of all the works of the French grand-opera school in the nineteenth century, this is the one most worthy of being so preserved.'

Berlioz's life-long enthusiasm for Vergil was second only to his love for Shakespeare; both contribute to the libretto of Les Troyens, the former to the narrative of the love of Dido for Aeneas as told in the first, second and fourth books of the Aeneid, the latter to the interpolation of the scene for Jessica and Lorenzo from The Merchant of Venice, which provides words for the great love duet between Didon and Enée in Act IV.

Les Troyens begins at the point in the Trojan war when the Trojans have lost Hector, the Greeks Achilles and Patroclus, and the Trojans have reason to believe that their enemies have had enough. The war has gone on for over nine years already, and the Greeks have retired, leaving behind them the wooden horse.

Part I, Act I. The scene is the abandoned camp of the Greeks on the wooded plain in front of Troy. On one side stands a throne, on the other an altar, at the back the tomb of Achilles, on which sit three shepherds playing the double-flute. The Trojans rejoice that their ten years of confinement are over. There is talk of the wooden horse, and all rush off to see this curiosity, everyone except Cassandre, who remains behind prophesying the doom of Troy ('Malheureux roi!'). Even Chorèbe, her lover, believes that her mind is deranged. He tries to console her, but she continues to predict the fall of the city and his death. She can't persuade him to leave Troy, and resigns herself to death on the morrow.

The character of Cassandre is splendidly depicted in the opening scene, Cassandre of whom Berlioz exclaimed when he finally gave up hope of hearing the first part of his opera: 'Ah, my noble Cassandre, my heroic virgin, I must needs resign myself to never hearing thee'. The classical feeling of the opening aria shows Berlioz's affinity with his beloved Gluck.

The second scene is set in front of the Citadel, again with an altar on one side, a throne on the other. The Trojans celebrate their deliverance from the Greeks with a procession and public games. The music is a great hymn of thanksgiving. Hector's widow and her son Astyanax, dressed in white clothes of mourning, place flowers at the foot of the altar, while Cassandre foretells for them an even greater sorrow than they have yet known.

The scene is broken in upon by the precipitate arrival of Enée who distractedly describes the terrible scene he has just witnessed on the seashore. The priest, Laocoön, suspecting some hidden design of the Greeks, threw a javelin into the side of the wooden horse, whereupon two serpents came up out of the sea and devoured him before the eyes of the Trojans. All assembled express their horror and fear at this phenomenon in a magnificent octet with chorus ('Châtiment effroyable'). Enée suggests that the disaster may have been brought upon them by Pallas, outraged at the insult to the horse, which has been dedicated to her. They should placate her by bringing the image within the walls and taking it to her temple. Cassandre alone remains behind as they leave to give effect to Enée's suggestion. The step they are taking will, she predicts, lead to disaster.

To the sound of a march, the horse is dragged inside the city walls (this is the 'Trojan March' sometimes heard in concerts).

In spite of the rumour that the sound of arms has been heard coming from inside the horse, the people persist in greeting its arrival with joy, and the sound of their song grows gradually in volume until it fills the whole city. Only Cassandre dissents from the rejoicing, but her suggestion that the horse should be destroyed forthwith meets with no favourable response from the crowd.

Act II. The first scene plays in Enée's palace. Enée's son, Ascagne, comes in, but seeing his father asleep, dare not wake him, and leaves the room. The ghost of Hector appears and marches slowly across the room.¹ Enée wakes, greets the hero, and hears from him that Troy has fallen. He is instructed to take his son and the images of the gods and to take ship across the seas, there – in Italy – to found a new empire. Hector's speech is impressively set to a descending chromatic octave, each sentence delivered on one note, a semitone below the previous one. At its end, Panthée comes to Enée bringing the images of the Trojan gods. He tells Enée of the happenings in the centre of the town; in the middle of the night, the horse opened to disgorge a troop of well-armed Greek soldiers. Priam is dead, and the town sacked and on fire. Enée rushes off to lead his men into battle.

Les Troyens (Welsh National Opera, 1987, director Tim Albery, designers Tom Cairns, Antony McDonald). The Trojans celebrate the Greeks' departure from the city.

The second scene takes place in the Temple of Vesta, where the Trojan women are gathered together, lamenting the fall of Troy. To them comes Cassandre, announcing the escape of Enée. For herself nothing remains, she says, since Chorèbe is dead. She urges the women to take their own lives rather than fall as slaves into the hands of the Greeks, and drives out the few who are unwilling to choose death rather than dishonour, herself staying as leader of those who are resolved to die. The tension mounts, some Greeks come in and demand to know where the treasure is hidden. Cassandre answers by stabbing herself. Some of the women throw themselves from the gallery of the temple, and as they die all cry 'Italie!'

Part II. The rest of the opera takes place in Carthage. When it was decided to give the second part alone, Berlioz composed a prelude to it, which is now printed in the vocal scores (although not in the one Berlioz prepared). At the first performance he made up his mind that it was crucial for the audience to know the events that should have taken place in the first half; he therefore had the story recited by a speaker in Greek costume, and followed this with a performance of the Trojan march together with the chorus which accompanies the entrance of the wooden horse within the walls of Troy.

Act III. An amphitheatre in the garden of Didon's palace at Carthage. A festival is taking place to celebrate the progress which has been made in building the city. Didon herself is greeted with a rapturous chorus, 'Gloire à Didon', when she takes her place on the throne. In a majestic aria ('Chers Tyriens'), she speaks of the work required to raise the city from nothing, and of what still remains to be done. The people for their part swear to protect her and her kingdom against Iarbas, who has demanded her hand in marriage and is invading their territory.

¹ Patrick J. Smith in The Tenth Muse points out that this strikingly dramatic scene is a descendant of the ombra scene of seventeenth-century operas, itself often allied to the slumber scene (cf. the play in Hamlet).

A harvest festival of a kind now takes place. Each section of national life files past the Queen, and is rewarded for its industry. Singing 'Gloire à Didon', the people march out, leaving Didon alone with her sister, Anna. In the conversation which ensues, it is made clear that Anna thinks Didon is badly in need of a husband (she is a widow), and that Carthage needs a king just as much. Didon thinks sadly of her dead husband, and Anna does not press the point, which she feels is already gained.

Iopas comes in to tell the Queen that a foreign fleet has anchored in their harbour, driven apparently by the recent storm, and the leaders are asking to see the Queen. She gives orders that she will receive them. The Trojan march is heard (this time in the minor), and the survivors are led in by Ascagne, Enée having assumed a disguise and allowing his son to speak for the whole company. Didon welcomes them, and says that Enée, the noble warrior and friend of the great Hector, cannot be anything but an honoured guest at her court. At that moment, Narbal enters in great perturbation; Iarbas at the head of a horde of Numidian troops is even now threatening Carthage itself. Instantly Enée proclaims himself leader of the Trojans and offers his services and theirs to help repel the Queen's enemies. His offer is accepted, and at the head of the army he marches out to fight the invader, leaving his son in Didon's hands.

In Berlioz's original plan, the third act ended with the great symphonic intermezzo, the Chasse royale et orage (Royal Hunt and Storm). In modern scores this appears at the end of the following act, where it is perhaps less happily placed.

The scene is a virgin forest near Carthage. The sound of the hunt can be heard in the distance; naiads listen anxiously, then disappear. There are signs that a storm is approaching. Ascagne is seen, and after him come Didon and Enée, the former dressed as Diana, the latter as a warrior, and both take shelter. Fauns and satyrs dance, and cries of 'Italie!' are heard. The storm dies down, and gradually peace returns. Ernest Newman¹ has described this scene as 'the finest and most sustained piece of nature painting in all music; it is like some noble landscape of Claude come to life in sound'. Later on he adds: 'The reader who knows his Vergil will not make the mistake, however, of seeing in the Royal Hunt and Storm only a piece of nature painting in music. He will listen imaginatively to it, as Berlioz certainly intended him to do, as the passionate climax to the realisation by Dido and Aeneas of their love for each other.'

Act IV. Didon's gardens, by the sea. Everything is decorated to celebrate Enée's victorious return. Narbal confides to Anna his fear that Enée's coming will not be for Carthage's or for Didon's good. Already she neglects affairs of state. Anna asks him if he cannot see that Didon is in love with her guest; where else could Carthage find a better king?

To an orchestral reminiscence of the crowd's greeting early in the previous act, Didon comes in with her royal guest. A ballet is danced for their entertainment. At its end, Didon asks Iopas to sing; he does so, charmingly, to the accompaniment of a harp and various instruments ('O blonde Cerès'). But Didon can find no pleasure in anything that diverts her attention from Enée. She asks him to continue his recital of the fate of Troy. What happened to Andromaque, she asks. Though at first determined to die, in the end she submitted to love's urgings and married her captor Pyrrhus. 'O pudeur', sings Didon, 'Tout conspire à vaincre mes remords' (All conspires to vanquish my remorse).²

Ascagne removes her ring, and Anna comments on his likeness to Cupid. Enée's voice has already been heard, but now Iopas and Narbal add theirs to make up the quintet. It is one of the loveliest moments in the score, and the ensemble is built up like one of Verdi's on the individual reactions to the now apparent love of Didon for Enée. It is followed by a septet (Didon, Enée, Anna, Ascagne, Iopas, Narbal, Panthée, and the chorus) which is no less beautiful.

Everyone leaves the scene except Didon and Enée, who are alone in the garden ('Nuit d'ivresse et d'extase infinie'). It is the beginning of the incomparable Shakespearean love duet, one of the finest in all opera: 'Par une telle nuit' (In such a night as this). Idea succeeds idea, and a reference to their own names brings the duet to an idyllic close. They go off with Didon leaning on Enée's shoulder, just as a shaft of moonlight reveals a statue of the god Mercure which comes to life and reiterates the knell of their hopes: 'Italie!'

¹ In Opera Nights: Putnam.

² Translations by Edward Dent.

Act V. The harbour at night. The Trojan ships are lying at anchor, and a young sailor, Hylas, sings sadly of his homeland ('Vallon sonore'). Panthée and the Trojan chiefs direct that preparations be made for the fleet's departure, which is only delayed because of Enée's love for Didon; every moment wasted is likely to bring down the anger of the gods – even now the disembodied cry of 'Italie' can be heard again. Two soldiers on sentry duty have little use for what they undoubtedly think of as the high-falutin' talk about 'Italie'. They are perfectly content in Carthage, where the food and the women are entirely to their liking. This new voyage is likely to lead to nothing but inconvenience for them – but they break off as they see Enée coming towards them.

Enée is torn between his overwhelming love for Didon, to whom he has broken the news that he must leave, and his sense of duty and of destiny: 'Inutiles regrets. Je dois quitter Carthage' (There is no turning back; this land I must relinquish). But he thinks longingly of Didon, and cannot bear the thought of their farewell: 'Ah, quand viendra l'instant des suprêmes adieux?' His initial agitation returns: 'En un dernier naufrage'. Once again he hears the voices, and now sees the spectre of King Priam, followed by those of Chorèbe, Cassandre and Hector, each in turn ordering him to follow his destiny. His mind is made up and he orders the Trojans to their boats: 'Debout, Troyens' (Awake, awake, Trojans awake), ending with a sad, slow farewell to the absent Didon. The scena is one of the most magnificent in the tenor repertory.

Didon has followed Enée, and a short scene takes place between them, Didon reproaching, weeping, begging him to stay, Enée almost prepared to give way until the sound of the Trojan march is heard in the distance. Then, with a cry of 'Italie', Enée rushes on to one of his vessels.

The second scene takes place in Didon's palace.

Didon tries to persuade her sister Anna to go to the harbour to intercede for her. Anna says Enée's departure had become inevitable, if the gods were to be obeyed; but she maintains that, in spite of the gods, he still loves her. Didon says this is impossible; her love would compel her to disobey Jupiter himself. When Iopas describes the ships putting out to sea, Didon bursts out in fury, ordering the Carthaginians to pursue and destroy the traitorous Trojans. She herself has done wrong by not from the start treating the Trojans as they have finished by treating her. Why did she not serve up the body of Ascagne to Enée at a feast? One thing only is left her: to raise an awful pyre to the god of the underworld, and on it burn everything that was ever connected with the traitorous Enée.

Anna and Narbal leave her, and Didon's grief overflows; she tears her hair and beats her breast in her anguish: 'Ah, je vais mourir'. Perhaps from his ship Enée will catch sight of the flames which will signal her terrible end. She bids farewell to the great city.

The last scene takes place on a terrace overlooking the sea. A funeral pyre is presided over by priests of Pluto. Didon, preceded by Anna and Narbal, comes slowly in. Anna and Narbal solemnly curse the Trojans, after which Didon prepares to mount the steps of the pyre. She looks sadly at Enée's accoutrements on it; then, taking his sword, stands with it while she prophesies that her people will one day produce a warrior to avenge on his descendants the shame now brought by Enée. Then she plunges the sword into her breast, reviving only long enough to communicate her further vision, in which she sees Rome triumphant. She dies as the Carthaginians hurl further curses at the Trojans. But the Trojan March contradicts them, and a vision of the eternal Rome rises behind Didon's pyre. H.

BÉATRICE ET BÉNÉDICT

Opera in two acts, words by the composer, after Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing. Produced at Baden-Baden, 9 August 1862, with Charton-Demeur, Monrose, Montaubry. First performed Weimar, 1863; Karlsruhe, 1888, conducted by Mottl; Vienna, 1890; Opéra-Comique, Paris, 1890; Glasgow (in English), 1936; Opéra-Comique, Paris, 1966; Cambridge, 1967, with Anne Howells, Kenneth Bowen, conductor David Atherton; Buxton Festival, 1981, with Ann Murray, Philip Langridge; Opera North, Leeds, 1983, with Claire Powell, John Brecknock.

| | |
|--------------------------------------|---------------|
| Don Pedro, a general | Bass |
| Léonato, governor of Messina | Actor |
| Héro, his daughter | Soprano |
| Béatrice, his niece | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Claudio, an officer | Baritone |
| Bénédict, an officer | Tenor |
| Ursula, Hero's companion | Contralto |
| Somarone, orchestral conductor | Bass |

Place: Messina, Sicily

Running Time: 1 hour 25 minutes

Berlioz envisaged an opera on the subject of Much Ado about Nothing nearly thirty years before Béatrice et Bénédict in 1862 became the last major work from his pen. He had given regular concerts at Baden-Baden when he was commissioned to write an opera, and after the première he added the female trio and a chorus to the original score. He himself famously described the score as 'a caprice written with the point of a needle'.

The story is an adaptation of a shortened version of Shakespeare's play, which preserves the spirit of the comedy, but omits the saturnine intrigue of Don John against Claudio and Hero. The gist of the comedy is the gradual metamorphosis of the brilliant but capacious Béatrice from pique and partially feigned indifference towards the witty and gallant Bénédict, to love. Both have tempers. In fact they reach an agreement to marry as a result of a spirited quarrel.

The overture, like that for Benvenuto Cellini, is made up of tunes used elsewhere in the opera. Thus the opening allegretto scherzando later accompanies the duet at the end of the opera, and the andante tune is Béatrice's 'Il m'en souvient'. The overture is a brilliant, lively piece of music, and it has become popular in the concert hall, where, probably, many of its admirers are entirely ignorant of the fact that it belongs to an opera.

Allegretto scherzando

Act I. The garden of Léonato, the governor of Messina. There is general rejoicing that the town is no longer in danger from the besieging army of Moors, which has finally been driven off. After some dialogue – this is an opéra-comique, with much of the action carried on in ordinary speech – the chorus starts to repeat its praises of the victorious general and his troops, much to Béatrice's dissatisfaction. There is a dance, a Sicilienne in 6/8 time, of charming individuality, and the stage empties.

Héro has a splendid aria in which she looks forward to seeing Claudio again. The lovely, calm tune of the opening larghetto section, 'Je vais le voir', is a fine example of that stylistic refinement and purity which is a feature of Berlioz's music, and the quick section, 'Il me revient fidèle', makes an exhilarating finish. Bénédict and Claudio arrive, and the skirmishing of the protagonists begins. 'Comment le dédain pourrait-il mourir?' (Is it possible disdain should die?), begins their duet, a true inspiration. It is followed by a trio for the three men, Bénédict, Claudio, and Don Pedro: 'Me marier? Dieu me pardonne' (Get married? God forgive me), a 3/8 allegretto, in which Bénédict makes furious answer when he is twitted on the subject of marriage. The trio is dominated by long musical sentences for Bénédict, upon which the others comment.

Berlioz introduces a non-Shakespearean character, Somarone, a maître de chapelle, who rehearses his chorus and orchestra in an Epithalame grotesque, a choral fugue on the subject of love. Gradually Bénédict is brought to realise that all is not well with his plans for perpetual bachelorhood. He sings a spirited rondo, 'Ah, je vais l'aimer'.

It is evening, and Héro and Ursula close the act with a slow duet – a Nocturne, 'Nuit paisible et sereine', 'a marvel of indescribable lyrical beauty in which Berlioz's feeling for nature is wonderfully expressed' (so says W.J. Turner). One has to turn to Così fan tutte to find idyllic writing for combined female voices of comparable beauty.

Act II opens with a version of the Sicilienne already heard. There is a dialogue between the servants, and Somarone starts up a drinking song, whose accompaniment is provided by guitars, trumpets, and tambourines (the guitar was the instrument on which Berlioz most enjoyed performing). The stage empties, and Béatrice comes in. Bénédict loves her; how to overcome her own increasing feeling for him? She has an aria on the grand scale, 'Il m'en souvient', whose tune has already been heard in the overture. The impressive scena finishes with an allegro agitato, 'Je l'aime donc?' (Do I love him, then?)

There is a flowing, 6/8 trio of outstanding lyricism for Héro, Béatrice and Ursula, in which Béatrice reveals that her feelings have undergone a considerable change since we first met her. She positively welcomes the tenderness which she earlier despised: 'Et ton époux restera ton amant'. This and the succeeding number, an off-stage chorus with guitar accompaniment, Berlioz added to the score after returning from Baden-Baden, where the opera was first produced.

Béatrice et Bénédict (Welsh National Opera, 1994, director Elijah Moshinsky, set designer Michael Yeargan, costume designer Dona Granata). Seated, Donald Kaasch (Bénédict), Sara Fulgoni (Béatrice), Karl Morgan Daymond (Claudio).

Both Béatrice and Bénédict try to conceal their mutual love, but it is in vain. After a general Marche nuptiale, the two marriage contracts are signed between Béatrice and Bénédict, Héro and Claudio – and the opera finishes with a brilliant duet for Béatrice and Bénédict: 'L'amour est un flambeau'. This, called a scherzo-duettino by the composer, is accompanied by the opening figure of the overture, and its sparkle and gaiety make the perfect comedy ending.

Béatrice et Bénédict not only reflects Berlioz's love of Shakespeare but also a mid-nineteenth-century view of the playwright. The 'serious' side of the story has gone, but in its place is a rich warmth of invention such as virtually no other composer has brought to Shakespeare. To try to re-interpret Berlioz's interpretation of his favourite poet – by for instance introducing Shakespearean elements Berlioz omitted – has no other effect than to distort (particularly since Much Ado can still be performed without Berlioz) an operatic masterpiece.

H.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

(born 25 August 1918, died 14 October 1990)

A QUIET PLACE

Opera in three acts, libretto by Stephen Wadsworth, incorporating Trouble in Tahiti (opera in seven scenes, libretto and music by Leonard Bernstein, Brandeis University, 12 June 1952). Commissioned by Houston Grand Opera, the Kennedy Center, Washington D.C., and la Scala, Milan. First performance in Houston (as a one-act opera in four scenes to follow Trouble in Tahiti), on 17 June 1983, with Chester Ludgin as Sam, Sheri Greenawald as Dede, Timothy Nolen as Junior and Peter Kazaras as François, conducted by John DeMain. Rewritten, as Stephen Wadsworth put it, with Trouble in Tahiti 'folded ... into' scene ii, it was first performed at la Scala on 19 June 1984, with Julian Robbins as Junior, Chester Ludgin as Old Sam, Diane Kesling as Dinah and Beverly Morgan as Dede, conducted by John Mauceri. Same production, Kennedy Center, 1984. Vienna State Opera, 1986, with John Brandstetter as Junior, Wendy White as Dinah and Chester Ludgin as Old Sam, conducted by Bernstein.

| | |
|------------------------|--------------------------|
| Old Sam | Baritone |
| Dede | Soprano |
| Junior | Baritone |
| François | Tenor |
| Susie | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Bill | Baritone |
| Mrs Doc | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Doc | Bass |
| Funeral Director | Tenor |
| Analyst | Tenor |
| Dinah | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Young Sam | Baritone |
| Jazz Trio | Soprano, Tenor, Baritone |
| Vocal Ensemble | |

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Prologue. 'Dark night'. A chorale establishes the ideal that reality will never reach. Voices evoke the car crash in which Dinah died.

Act I, scene i is set in the funeral parlour and comprises eleven dialogues. Dinah's brother Bill deals with the Funeral Director, her Analyst is evasive, Doc finds Dinah had been drinking, Mrs Doc exposes the Funeral Director's hypocrisy, and they wait for Dinah and Sam's two children – Junior, who is gay and mentally disturbed, Dede, who married François, previously a lover of Junior. Sam has seen neither for years. The dialogue is edgy, fragmented, while the music mixes disparate idioms, including jazz for the drunk, sarcastic Mrs Doc. Dede and François arrive first. Dede's nervousness leads her to a manic description of the drive ('Have you got an hour or two?') that ends enthusiastically, 'It's just to die', before she realises what she has said. She admits that she dreams about her mother, though they were never close. Bill tries to welcome François, Sam greets Dede. 'Words mean so little at a time like this', says the Chorus, adding 'So I made a pie'.

They start the ceremony before Junior has arrived. Private reminiscences occur simultaneously with the public readings and hint at unresolved tensions: 'What a fucked-up family'. Junior enters, dishevelled, rambling nervously, while the orchestra passes a sad, fragmentary motif from the lower strings to higher instruments to powerful effect. Amidst different reactions to Dinah, Bill's contribution emerges clearly: 'Dinah fought for her own private place. Her garden.' The guests file by the coffin, leaving Sam, his children and François behind. Sam's anger erupts in an aggressive aria, in which he attacks his son. Sam weeps alone. In a lyrical, nostalgic trio with prominent solo violin, Junior, Dede and François reflect on their troubled relationships with their fathers. Junior insults his father and stages a menacing strip show, but, in the moving postlude, he 'approaches the coffin tenderly'.

Act II, scene i. Sam reads Dinah's diary which records how much they had grown apart. He remembers how the idyll of married life became a nightmare, which is how we encounter the first extract from Bernstein's Trouble in Tahiti, written more than thirty years before A Quiet Place.

Scene ii. A Jazz Trio celebrates the suburban idyll ('Mornin' sun kisses the windows') and a Girl sings a delightful, apparently improvised nonsense song ('Ratty boo'). In the kitchen Dinah and Young Sam consume breakfast 'in grim silence'. Junior expects them to see him in his school show, Sam insists on taking part in a tournament at the gym, and they quarrel, although they both long for a reconciliation. Sam goes to the office and Dinah sees her analyst, recounting her dream of love leading them to 'a quiet place'. They meet by chance in the street and lie that they already have lunch appointments. 'Can't we find the way back to the garden where we began?'

Scene iii. Sam can't bring himself to read Dinah's diary entry 'To Whom It May Concern'. Dede helps Sam go through Dinah's things and their conversation leads to a partial reconciliation. Junior's mind is disturbed. François criticises Junior's behaviour to his father and rejects his embrace. Junior sings a song suggesting that as a child he had a sexual relationship with his sister. Dede puts on one of her mother's dresses (the one she wears in the Trouble in Tahiti flashback). In an elaborately constructed quartet Sam and Dede begin to understand one another, while Junior fantasises that Sam shot him. As Dede, Sam and François sing 'We all can help us all', Dede helps Junior to recover a memory of a happy family Christmas, and to accept that he loves his father. A chorale ends the scene: 'Give all for love. For love is strong as death.'

Scene iv. Trouble in Tahiti returns: the Jazz Trio evokes an idyllic suburbia. Sam celebrates winning the tournament in a show-stopping aria with butch brass fanfares, and exults in his fitness and his youth. Dinah has an equivalent bravura aria: having been to the cinema to see Trouble in Tahiti, 'escapist Technicolor twaddle', she performs its beguine or rumba rhythm ballad. She rushes home, but after dinner they cannot bring themselves to talk truthfully about their problems. Sam suggests they go out to a film, then goes into Junior's room and kisses his sleeping son.

Act III. After an intensely serious, tormented, but not unrheterical prelude the scene is Dinah's garden. Dede has done some therapeutic weeding. Junior brings coffee and they remember quarrels at meals.

Tag 1. They play an elaborate game of tag and François parodies a line from Candide, 'What a day, what a day for a café au lait!' In an elegant trio they re-enact Dede's twenty-first birthday, when she first met François, then Junior's boyfriend.

Tag 2. Back in the present, Sam joins in the game and eventually embraces François, with the words, 'Welcome to the family'. Sam reads out some of Dinah's diary, and her voice is heard off-stage. The family's reconciliation splinters on the question of changing bedrooms. A full-blown quarrel develops. Junior hurls the diary in the air. They collect the pages in silence, the chorus hums the opening chorale, and gradually the family make peace: Sam embraces his son, Dede takes François' hand and tentatively reaches for Sam's hand. The Chorus add the last word, 'Amen'.

It is hard to do justice to such a combustible work: the original one-act Trouble in Tahiti satirises the 'bright falsehood' of cheap sentimentality, whether evoked in suburban idylls of the conventional family unit or in escapist musicals. A Quiet Place adds several other levels, some of which work well: when Sam quotes from Dinah's diary the 'cheap slogan ... "Pretty as a picture"', Dinah's own voice can be heard singing 'Lie, lie, lie, lie Island Magic I'. But the conjunction of two separate works makes for an explosive combination. Elements such as the perfunctory pastoral and the psychobabble of François 'helping' Junior have already dated badly. The obvious parallel with Tippett's work can help, if it encourages us to look beyond A Quiet Place's disconcerting rubs and stylistic inconsistencies to appreciate its musical brilliance, its willingness to confront several different kinds of truth. It is meant to be, as the characters would say, 'conflicted'; it is never going to be an easy experience.

P.

CANDIDE

Comic operetta in two acts, libretto based on Voltaire's story Candide (1756). Original orchestrations by Leonard Bernstein and Hershy Kay; book by Lillian Hellman, lyrics by Richard Wilbur, additional lyrics by John Latouche, Dorothy Parker, Lillian Hellman and Leonard Bernstein. Première at the Colonial Theatre, Boston, 29 October 1956 (and on 1 December at the Martin Beck Theatre, New York), with Max Adrian as Doctor Pangloss/Martin, Barbara Cook as Cunegonde/Scrub Lady, Robert Rounseville as Candide, Robert Mesrobian as Baron/Prince Ivan and Irra Petina as Old Lady/Sofronia. This version is not available for performance. U.K. première at the New Theatre, Oxford, 30 March 1959, and in London at the Savile Theatre, 30 April 1959, in a version where the book was credited to Hellman assisted by Michael Stewart and for which Bernstein wrote a new number, 'We are women'. The cast included Laurence Naismith, Mary Costa, Denis Quilley, Edith Coates (as The Old Lady), Ron Moody (Governor of Buenos Aires) and Dennis Stephenson (Maximilian). Harold Prince directed a new one-act version, Chelsea Theatre Center of Brooklyn, 20 December 1973. The book was credited to Hugh Wheeler adapted from Voltaire; additional lyrics by Stephen Sondheim; orchestrations by Hershy Kay; music re-scored for thirteen players. Produced in a version revised for an opera house by the New York City Opera on 13 October 1982. John Wells and John Mauceri produced a new version for Scottish Opera, Theatre Royal, Glasgow, 19 May 1988, directed by Jonathan Miller and John Wells, with Nickolas Grace, Bonaventura Bottone, Mark Beudert, Marilyn Hill Smith and Ann Howard. Bernstein himself gave his blessing to a final version, based on Scottish Opera's edition, which he conducted in 1989 at the Barbican, London, and recorded.

| | |
|--|-------------------|
| Voltaire/Pangloss/ Martin/Cacambo | Baritone or Tenor |
| Candide | Tenor |
| Cunegonde..... | High Soprano |
| Maximilian..... | Baritone |
| The Old Lady | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Captain..... | Baritone |
| Paquette | Soprano |
| Governor | Tenor |
| Vanderdendur | Tenor |
| Bear-Keeper | Bass |
| Cosmetic Merchant | Tenor |
| Doctor | Baritone |
| Junkman | Baritone |
| Alchemist | Tenor |
| Inquisitor I/Judge | Tenor |
| Inquisitor II/Judge..... | Baritone |
| Inquisitor III/Judge | Bass |
| Señor I | Tenor |
| Señor II..... | Tenor |
| Prince Charles Edward | Tenor |
| King Hermann Augustus..... | Baritone |
| Sultan Achmet | Tenor |
| Tsar Ivan..... | Bass |
| Croupier | Baritone |
| Ragotski..... | Tenor or Baritone |
| Crook | Tenor or Baritone |

19 Non-Singing Roles; Chorus

Place: Westphalia, Lisbon, Paris, Cadiz, Buenos Aires, Eldorado, Surinam, Venice

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes (1989 version)

Even in his metropolitan musicals, On the Town (1944) and Wonderful Town (1953), Bernstein was aiming beyond the obvious limitations of the genre. With Candide, he set out to write 'a big, three-act opera with chorus and ballet'.¹ Composition was a long-drawn-out affair. During this period, he wrote a dialogue between himself and his demonic Id, who complained that Candide was 'beginning to look like a real fine old-fashioned operetta. Or a comic opera, or opéra comique ... but not a musical comedy, surely?' Bernstein answers himself and settles the matter: 'The particular mixture of styles and elements that go into this work makes it perhaps a new kind of show ...'² It is certainly operatic in its difficulties: Cunegonde calls for expert coloratura, for example, which was insouciantly tossed off by Barbara Cook, as the original cast album records. Voltaire satirised self-satisfied celebrations of the status quo. Bernstein and Hellman set out to fight against the prevailing climate of ideological intolerance, as America rode a wave of anti-communist sentiment. 'Puritanical snobbery, phony moralism, inquisitorial attacks on the individual, brave-new-world optimism, essential superiority – aren't all these charges leveled against American society by our best thinkers? And they are also charges made by Voltaire against his own society.'³

Act I. Candide is a bastard in the noble Westphalian family who inhabit the castle of Thunder-ten-Tronck. Though illegitimate, Candide is satisfied with his lot ('Life is happiness indeed'). The Baron and Baroness's two children, Maximilian and Cunegonde, are equally at ease ('Life is absolute perfection'). Candide falls in love with Cunegonde and she with him. For the moment, everything works out for the best in this, 'the best of all possible worlds', as the resident philosopher Dr Pangloss teaches. Inspired by watching Pangloss give 'private coaching' to Paquette, the maid, Cunegonde and Candide decide to marry. He looks forward to 'a rustic and a shy life' and she to the high life. Maximilian alerts the Baron who expels Candide. Candide is abducted and forced to join the army.

In the course of the war, Thunder-ten-Tronck is liberated, the inhabitants slaughtered. Candide finds Cunegonde's corpse and bids farewell to his love. After many months of wandering, he is given some money by an Anabaptist, which he gives away at once to a beggar. This turns out to be Pangloss, who has lost his nose from venereal disease, which he caught from Paquette. Pangloss and Candide travel to Lisbon, but they are wrecked in a storm. Lisbon is destroyed in an earthquake. On shore, they are arrested for heresy and sentenced to hang ('What a day, what a day/ For an auto-da-fé!'). Pangloss argues in vain that he is too sick to die ('Oh, my darling Paquette'). Candide, left alive, blames himself for his misfortunes.

¹ Quoted Humphrey Burton, Leonard Bernstein, London, 1994.

² New York Times, 18 November 1956.

³ Quoted Meryle Secrest, Leonard Bernstein, London, 1995.

Meanwhile in Paris, having escaped death, Cunegonde shares her favours between a rich Jew, Don Issachar, and the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris ('Glitter and be gay'). She meets Candide again, who kills both her protectors. Advised by an Old Lady, who accompanies them, they flee to Cadiz, where she tells them her story. Born the daughter of (the imaginary) Pope Urban the Tenth, she lost her fiancé to poisoned chocolate and her virginity to a Pirate Captain, repeatedly. As a slave in northern Turkey, she was deprived of one of her buttocks during the Russians' siege. Now she resolves to restore their fortunes ('I was not born in sunny Hispania ... I am easily assimilated', a show-stopping number to words by Bernstein). A South American half-caste called Cacambo arranges for Candide to travel to South America to join the war to save the Jesuits from being slaughtered by Protestants. The act ends with a quartet finale ('Once again we must be gone'), as they all set off for the New World.

Act II. The Governor of Buenos Aires inspects the new slaves. Among them are Paquette and Maximilian in drag. He rejects the former and chooses the latter, but when Candide, his servant Cacambo and Cunegonde arrive, the Governor falls in love with Cunegonde ('Poets have said'). She insists on marriage but substitutes her brother for herself at the wedding ceremony. When Maximilian's gender is discovered, Father Bernard buys him from the Governor for his seminary. Cacambo warns Candide that he has been denounced: he must escape. Cunegonde and the Old Lady wait impatiently until the Governor agrees to marriage ('No doubt you'll think I'm giving in').

Meanwhile, Candide and Cacambo encounter the Jesuits, who turn out to be Paquette and Maximilian. Candide and Maximilian quarrel over Cunegonde. Candide stabs Maximilian and escapes in his Jesuit robes, but abandons them just in time to avoid being killed by the Mump Indians. Candide and Cacambo arrive by chance in the land of Eldorado, where food is free and precious stones litter the ground. Candide grows sad without his love, however ('Up a seashell mountain') and they leave, loaded with gold and jewels. They reach the Dutch colony of Surinam. Candide charges Cacambo to ransom Cunegonde and bring her to Venice.

Candide's new companion, Martin, laughs at the absurdity of the world ('Words, words, words, words', words by Bernstein). Vanderdendur cheats Candide out of the rest of his wealth when he sells him a perfect wreck of a boat ('Bon voyage, dear fellow'). Martin drowns, but Candide is rescued. He finds that Pangloss is now a wretched galley slave. When four crowned heads appear in the water and are rescued, they resolve to pursue the simple life. In Venice, a croupier welcomes them to his casino. Candide is cheated out of his money by a Sailor who pretends that Paquette is his long-lost Cunegonde. He is briefly arrested by Maximilian, now Prefect of Police. Cacambo tells Candide that Cunegonde is kept as a slave by Prince Ragotski, who runs the most notorious casino in Venice.

Cunegonde and the Old Lady reflect on their privileged, captive state ('We are women'). In turn, the Old Lady, Ragotski, Maximilian and a Crook resent the way they have to work ('What's the use', in Venetian waltz time). Candide is cornered by two beggars, the Old Lady and Cunegonde, neither of whom recognises him. Ladies surround Pangloss when he wins at roulette. Suddenly, everyone recognises everyone else. Candide has enough money left to buy a small farm outside Venice. Having learned, in the words of the chorus, that 'Life is neither good nor bad', he proposes to Cunegonde and she accepts him ('You've been a fool and so have I'). He suggests that they 'try before we die/ To make some sense of life'. In the finale, everyone resolves to 'make our garden grow'.

Candide was reworked almost continuously as soon as it was written. Inevitably it takes lots of liberties with the original story, yet its spirit remains close to that of Voltaire in its exhilarating, picaresque pace: like the story, it never remains long in any one place or mood. This hectic sequence also means that as a work it has had room for any number of new ideas. Operetta? Musical? Comic opera? Candide succeeds on its own terms, with a homey sentimentality that is always undercut by biting New York or Voltairean cynicism.

HARRISON BIRTWISTLE

(born 15 July 1934)

Harrison Birtwistle was born at Accrington, Lancashire, and was associated with the Manchester New Music Group at an important period of his musical development (the composers Alexander Goehr and Peter Maxwell Davies, the trumpet player and conductor Elgar Howarth, the composer and pianist John Ogdon were other members). He was an active clarinettist in his early days, but an admiration for Stravinsky's music and theory as well as preoccupation with the emotional release of Greek drama are perhaps the most important influences on the early and middle periods of his creativity.

PUNCH AND JUDY

A tragical comedy, or a comical tragedy, in one act, libretto by Stephen Pruslin. Première, Aldeburgh Festival, 8 June 1968, with Jenny Hill, Maureen Morelle, John Winfield, John Cameron, Geoffrey Chard, Wyndham Parfitt, conducted by David Atherton (repeated that year at Edinburgh Festival and Sadler's Wells). First performed Minneapolis, 1970; London (concert), 1979, with Phyllis Bryn-Julson, Jan DeGaetani, Philip Langridge, Stephen Roberts, David Wilson-Johnson, John Tomlinson, London Sinfonietta, conductor David Atherton; Copenhagen, 1981; Gelsenkirchen, 1985. Opera Factory London performed the opera with great success in 1982 in a production by David Freeman.

Pretty Polly, later Witch High Soprano
 Judy, later Fortune-Teller Mezzo-Soprano
 Lawyer High Tenor
 Punch Higher Baritone
 Choregos, later Jack Ketch Lower Baritone
 Doctor Basso Profondo

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Birtwistle has said, 'When I embarked on Punch and Judy ... I knew the kind of world I wanted to create long before I'd chosen the subject ... I wanted a theatrical event that ... was very formal, a myth and English. The subject ... had the advantage of having a story everyone knew so that it wouldn't distract people from understanding what I was really trying to say.'¹ He worked with the pianist Stephen Pruslin to produce what the librettist has described as 'a stylised and ritualistic drama for adults that used all of the imagery, the trappings and paraphernalia of the original as a departure-point'.

Punch and Judy was commissioned on the basis of its scenario for the Aldeburgh Festival, written between January 1966 and January 1967 (partly while the composer was a visiting fellow at Princeton University), and performed in 1968. Critical acclaim was considerable but so was a certain public dismay, not least perhaps because the harsh, abrasive instrumental writing sounded harsher still in the confined space of the Jubilee Hall – 'his brass roars and brays, voices are pushed to their extremities and the woodwind squeals and screams so implacably in its uppermost register that it is not long before the ear is begging for mercy,' wrote Peter Heyworth in 1979, eleven years after the première (but he did not neglect to single the opera out for special praise then and at the première itself). With Punch and Judy the Theatre of Cruelty had set its mark on opera.

The scoring is for fifteen instrumentalists, including five wind players on a platform on stage, according to the composer's direction. It is to be played without interval, an instruction not invariably followed. In organisation it is highly stylised, full of set-pieces – over a hundred separate items altogether, some lasting only a few seconds. Bach's St Matthew Passion was the model for composer and librettist, and Punch and Judy is a baroque opera in shape, a morality rather than a tragedy in content, but also in certain aspects a 'quest' opera – the quest of Punch for his ideal.

This last claim requires some justification. The librettist invented the idea of Quest for Pretty Polly as a 'positive analogue' (as he calls it) to Punch's 'apparently motiveless acts of violence'. It is, to my mind, a very successful device and Pruslin emphasises that there is 'no necessary connection between the two sides of Punch's schizoid nature' – though there may be. In other words, that Punch murders in order to win Pretty Polly is plausible rather than an essential aspect of the plan. Both composer and librettist, says Pruslin, 'saw the work ultimately as an opera about opera. It is an opera in quotation marks. The characters are stock-characters raised to a principle. The set-pieces (quartet, love duet, etc.) are likewise formulas that recur with different meanings in many operas. Our aim was the collective generalisation of known operas into a "source-opera" which, though written after them, would give the illusion of having been written before them.'

¹ From Harrison Birtwistle by Michael Hall (Robson Books, 1984).

Punch and Judy (première, Aldeburgh, 1968, director Anthony Besch, designer Peter Rice). John Cameron as Punch and Maureen Morelle as Judy.

Michael Nyman, who collaborated with the composer in his next operatic essay, Under the Greenwood Tree, sees the opera's shaping, with its dozens of short musical forms, in terms of cinema, 'for, as with a film scenario, each action is broken down into a series of shots, each shot being a short self-contained musical entity. These units – word games, chorales, ensembles – gradually increase in number during the opera, as the plot progresses, and are repeated throughout the recurrent action-cycles.'¹

Choregos sings the prologue.

Melodrama I. Punch titters, sings to the baby a lullaby, described in the libretto as a serenade, emits his so-called war-cry, then throws the baby into the fire. Judy too has a lullaby, discovers baby burned to death, confronts Punch as a murderer and plays with him a word-game in which Choregos joins in comment. Murder is in the air and Choregos proclaims 'Punch ... consecrates the altar of arrogance ... for the holy sacrament of murder'. Doctor and Lawyer sing the first Passion Aria, Judy prepares for death and, after again venting his war-cry, Punch stabs her, celebrating in a catchy little gavotte of self-satisfaction (called Resolve, it will recur in connection with the other murders).

A very short toccata precedes and succeeds Passion Chorale I, for mezzo-soprano, tenor, baritone and bass, one of three very impressive ensembles described by this title.

The Quest for Pretty Polly I. In six short numbers – Travel Music, Weather Report, Prayer, Serenade, Pretty Polly's Rhapsody, Moral – Punch searches for Pretty Polly, woos her only to lose her, and leaves Choregos to mourn his failure and attempt consolation. There are four such Quests in the opera, and in each Punch travels on a hobby-horse, a Prayer is made for clement weather, and Pretty Polly is unsuccessfully wooed, in the first instance being offered a vast flower which she rejects with an oblique reference to the murder of the baby.

A short sinfonia introduces Melodrama II, leading up to the second Murder Ensemble, Punch's war-cry, and Punch's murder of Doctor and Lawyer. There follow Passion Chorale II, a condemnation of Punch's murderous propensities, and the second Quest for Pretty Polly. Melodrama III is a battle of wits between Choregos and Punch and includes a fine tune for Punch to the words 'Let the Winds be gentle' (Preyer it is called, consistent with the libretto's delight in puns). Punch contrives to shove Choregos into a bass viol case, bows vigorously on the viol, and opens the case to reveal Choregos dead.

A splendid aria for Judy is followed by a muted version of Punch's war-cry, before we embark on a shortened version of the Quest cycle, ending in Nightmare. Choregos, musically essential and therefore miraculously indestructible, introduces Tarot Games with Judy as Fortune-Teller. Pretty Polly's Black Rhapsody culminates in the rather surprising stage direction 'Punch faints and the Nightmare dissolves'.

The third Quest for Pretty Polly goes through the hoops but Passion Chorale III which follows foresees the possibility of redemption through love. Melodrama IV finds Punch in prison, visited by Choregos disguised as Jack Ketch, the Public Hangman, whom Punch by a trick contrives to hang. The last movement is called Punch Triumphant. Pretty Polly sings exultantly of spring, the love duet for her and Punch signals release – Punch has turned the tables with his one good deed, the murder of the Hangman! – and Choregos is left with the Epilogue.

Punch and Judy is an extraordinary work, inimitable in its construction, which is devised to suit Birtwistle's needs, as full of music as an egg is of meat. Michael Nyman in The Listener (10 October 1968) summed it up when he said that it is 'at once simple, obscure, direct and puzzling'. H.

THE MASK OF ORPHEUS

Opera in three acts, libretto by Peter Zinovieff. Première, 21 May 1986, by English National Opera, with Philip Langridge and Nigel Robson, Jean Rigby and Ethna Robinson, Tom McDonnell and Rodney Macann, Marie Angel, Richard Angas, conductors Elgar Howarth and Paul Daniel, producer David Freeman.

Orpheus: The Man.....Tenor
The Hero.....Mime
The Myth/Hades.....Tenor

¹ Spectator, 30 August 1968.

| | | |
|---|---------------------------|---------------|
| Euridice: | The Woman..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| | The Hero..... | Mime |
| | The Myth/Persephone | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Aristaeus: | The Man..... | Bass-Baritone |
| | The Hero..... | Mime |
| | The Myth/Charon | Bass-Baritone |
| The Oracle of the Dead/Hecate.....Soprano | | |
| The Troupe of Ceremony/Judges of the Dead | | |
| The Caller..... | | Bass |
| First Priest | | Tenor |
| Second Priest..... | | Baritone |
| Third Priest | | Baritone |
| The Three Women/Furies | | |
| First Woman..... | | Soprano |
| Second Woman | | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Third Woman..... | | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Mimes; The Troupe of Passing Clouds; Small Snakes; Large Snake | | |

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

When in the late 1960s Covent Garden's appointed but not yet resident joint artistic directors, Colin Davis and Peter Hall, were looking for a new opera with which to give point and 'signature' to their aspirations for the company, the obvious composer – after Punch and Judy – to write it was Harrison Birtwistle. Later, Peter Hall decided against taking up the position at Covent Garden, preferring to run the National Theatre and to put his operatic energies into regular summer work at Glyndebourne, and it was natural enough for Birtwistle to emigrate with him and to plan the new work for Glyndebourne. Its theme was originally Faust but by now had become Orpheus.

Two acts were sketched out before in 1973 it became apparent that neither scale nor box office potential suited Glyndebourne and the composer offered it accordingly to English National Opera, who grabbed it with both hands. The writing of the third act, after an interval and the composition of several other successful works, proved harder for the composer than had the last act of Siegfried for Wagner 100 years before in slightly comparable circumstances. 'It was a piece of archaeology,' said Birtwistle in an interview, 'months and months and months of unravelling what I'd done and where I'd got to and why I had made certain decisions. It was like piecing together a civilisation.' A period of a year free of other work had to be found for composition and work on the electronics, but the opera was finally declared in a fit state to be scheduled for performance. At this point E.N.O. could not see where the production money was coming from, but the cost of extra instruments and the substantial electronic set-up (not only the technical apparatus but the highly skilled technicians) was eventually covered and the work reached the stage in May 1986.

It is a work of infinite complication. 'Essentially I'm concerned with repetition, with going over and over the same event from different angles so that a multi-dimensional musical object is created, an object which contains a number of contradictions as well as a number of perspectives. I don't create linear music, I move in circles; more precisely, I move in concentric circles ... To find a narrative to match this way of proceeding, I had to turn to myth, for only in myth do you find narratives which are not linear. Myths are multi-dimensional narratives containing contradictions and ambiguities. In telling a myth, you have to tell the whole myth, not just a part of it.'¹ In the first act, Orpheus is instructed by Apollo, and we then see him falling in love with Euridice, married to her, her seduction by Aristaeus, her death, and finally the Oracle of the Dead telling Orpheus how to rescue her from the Underworld. For each major figure in the drama – Orpheus, Euridice, Aristaeus – there are three performers, two singers and a mime, and the story is constantly re-told and the music re-worked. The second act describes how Orpheus journeys to the Underworld, meets Euridice, attempts to lead her back to the world, until he looks back and she dies. He hangs himself. Orpheus' life after his return from the Underworld is the subject of the third act, and the various versions of his death are all woven into the musico-dramatic structure. Says the composer: 'I don't think it's an opera anyway. It doesn't necessarily use song to carry the narrative forward. It uses dance, dumb action, other things.'

Electronic music is important in The Mask of Orpheus, and Birtwistle worked on and off for two years with Barry Anderson at I.R.C.A.M. in Paris.

¹ Harrison Birtwistle interviewed by Michael Hall in the programme for the opera's première.

According to Elgar Howarth, who has conducted most of Birtwistle's music and who prepared the E.N.O. performance, it 'functions in different ways: periodically to provide background auras (of summer, of winter, of bees, etc.); as signals representing the voice of Apollo; and, most adventurously, to halt the flow of the normal music, abruptly "freezing" the action to present "panels" of extra drama outside the Orpheus-Euridice story, panels depicting other Greek myths ... stories told by Orpheus as examples of his magic gift of song, and here acted, mimed and danced without words or singing. These episodes – Three Passing Clouds and Three Allegorical Flowers – wrench our attention from the main drama quite deliberately, and contain some of the most remarkable music of the whole score.'

In all the circumstances, the carefully worked out synopsis¹ of the opera, prepared for English National Opera, seems the most succinct way of presenting a précis.

Parodos. The voice of Apollo, composed of purely electronic sound, dominates the action, uttering commands in his own language. Apollo presides at the birth of Orpheus. His first memory is of his heroic voyage on the Argos with Jason and his men.

Act I, scene i. Orpheus falls in love with Euridice. She agrees to marry him.

The myth of Dionysus. The Titans captured Dionysus, who tried in vain to escape by assuming the form of a bull, a snake and a lion. Although they killed him, Rhea, his grandmother, reconstituted him and brought him up as a woman. He discovered wine and its effects.

In the wedding ceremony, Hymen (god of marriage) is invoked and the priests ask ritual questions; but there are bad omens: Hymen arrives late and Euridice stumbles repeatedly in the ritual. Not even Orpheus can dispel this atmosphere with his love-song for Euridice.

Scene ii. Two versions of the death of Euridice. Euridice wanders by the river.

The myth of Lycurgus. Lycurgus and his men fought Dionysus and captured his followers. Rhea released them and made Lycurgus so mad that he killed his own son thinking he was pruning a vine. The earth turned barren at the crime. Dionysus returned and Lycurgus, taken by his people to a mountain, was torn apart by wild horses.

Aristaeus, Man and Hero, make love at the same time to Euridice. In one case she resists and in the other she does not. In both versions she dies from the bite of a water-snake.

The myth of the anemone. Venus loved the beautiful Adonis. Despite her warnings, he hunted wild boar and was fatally wounded in the genitals. She decreed that every year his death should be commemorated. From his blood sprang the anemone.

Aristaeus tells Orpheus of Euridice's death.

Scene iii. The first time distortion: Orpheus imagines it was he, not Aristaeus, who saw Euridice die.

There are echoes of the love duet during Euridice's funeral ceremony, and the priests invoke Hermes, who, it is hoped, will guide her to the Underworld. They enact a ritual of the Tree of Life. Orpheus leaves the ceremony to consult the Oracle of the Dead.

The Oracle envies his magic and gives him three clues to the Underworld in exchange for his magical power of music: 'Always face the way of the sun'; 'Choose without choosing'; 'Never address anyone directly'. But when the Oracle tries to copy his song, all she can manage is hysterical screeching.

Orpheus now imagines he can find the way to the Underworld. While he describes seventeen arches which connect the mountain of the living to that of the dead, Euridice is metamorphosed into myth.

Act II. The second time distortion: another version of Euridice's death, in which she is killed by a giant snake.

Orpheus Man, exhausted, has a deep and terrible sleep, in which he dreams that he, as Orpheus the Hero, descends through the arches into the Underworld. All the figures he confronts are grotesque versions of the characters he has encountered in Act I. As the Oracle instructed, he walks backwards, always facing the sun he is leaving behind.

The Descent. 1st Arch. 'Countryside'. Orpheus sings to Charon and crosses the River Styx.

2nd Arch. 'Crowds'. Orpheus' music brings tears to the eyes of the Furies.

3rd Arch. 'Evening'. The judges of the dead foretell his death. Orpheus sees a vision of Euridice.

¹ Which is reproduced here with permission, and which at some points refers to action specifically devised by David Freeman for the Coliseum staging. It was written by Nicholas John.

4th Arch. 'Contrasts'. Orpheus drinks from the pool of memory but refuses to drink from the pool of forgetfulness. He has a second vision of Euridice.

5th Arch. 'Dying'. Orpheus notices those in torment as he passes.

6th Arch. 'Wings'. His magic overcomes even the fiercest of the characters of the Underworld.

7th Arch. 'Colour'. At last Orpheus reaches the centre of the Underworld and stands before its rulers: Hades, his wife Persephone, and the Goddess of Witches, Hecate. He fails to see their resemblance to himself, Euridice or the Oracle.

8th Arch. 'Secrecy'. Orpheus is surrounded by the awesome trio but continues to sing.

9th Arch. 'Glass'. Orpheus escapes from them.

The Return. 10th Arch. 'Buildings'. He finds himself among myriads of wispy shadows resembling Euridice.

11th Arch. 'Weather'. Although the Euridice phantoms dance around him, he makes no choice.

12th Arch. 'Eyes'. Orpheus begins his return, imagining that the real Euridice is following, but in fact it is Persephone who follows.

13th Arch. 'Knives'. Persephone stumbles and another Euridice takes her place. Orpheus overcomes the same obstacles as on his descent. Euridice tries to follow but the dead cannot leave the Underworld. One form of Euridice takes the place of another. As Orpheus journeys, he hears Apollo's voice in his head.

14th Arch. 'Animals'. Orpheus crosses the River Styx. Charon refuses to take Euridice and she falls back. As Orpheus emerges into the sunlight, he awakes. Too late. Euridice is already fading from his memory.

15th Arch. 'Ropes'. Orpheus has lost Euridice for ever.

16th Arch. 'Order'. Orpheus realises he has dreamt his entire journey, and, as Orpheus Hero, he re-enacts it.

17th Arch. 'Fear'. Orpheus mourns Euridice and rejects the three women who offer to marry him.

The myth of the hyacinth. Apollo and the youth Hyacinth competed at the discus. Apollo's returning discus killed Hyacinth. He changed him into a flower, with the mournful Greek characters 'Ai-Ai' upon its petals. Orpheus hangs himself.

Act III. The structure of the act is based on the movement of tides on an imaginary beach. Nine episodes of the myth are played in an artificial time-sequence, which starts by receding into the past, then comes forward into the future and finally begins to return to the past.

The third time distortion: Orpheus Hero is rejected by the Underworld and is re-born as a myth.

Episode 1. Orpheus Hero re-enacts his journey out of the Underworld with Euridice. She dies and he hangs himself.

Episode 2. Orpheus Man sings of his imaginary descent to the Underworld.

Episode 3. The death of Euridice is seen again but this time observed by Orpheus Man and Hero, instead of Aristaeus.

The myth of the lotus. Beautiful Dryope was suckling her child by a pool. When she plucked a lotus flower, to her horror she found drops of blood upon her hand.

Orpheus sings a second verse and remembers his imaginary ascent from the Underworld.

Episode 4. Orpheus Hero re-enacts his journey out of the Underworld with Euridice. She dies and he hangs himself.

Even the animals gather and listen as Orpheus sings a third verse in a secret language which he has invented.

Episode 5. Aristaeus is punished by his bees. Orpheus consoles him. But Zeus is angered by Orpheus' presumption in revealing divine mysteries in his arcane poetry and music, and strikes him dead with a thunderbolt.

Orpheus sings a fourth verse of his magic song.

Episode 6. Orpheus Myth is sacrificed and dismembered by the Dionysiac women. His head is thrown into the River Hebrus.

Orpheus sings a fifth verse of his song.

Episode 7. The head of Orpheus floats down the river. He still murmurs. Orpheus challenges the sun-god with his song.

Episode 8. Orpheus Myth has become an oracle, and is consulted by Aristaeus. A snake, which tries to silence the oracle, is killed by Apollo. But the god himself finally silences Orpheus for rivalling his own oracle at Delphi.

The myth of Pentheus. Dionysus dressed Pentheus as a woman so that he could penetrate secretly into the Dionysiac women's revels. He tried to stop them tearing a bull apart with their bare hands, and instead, in their frenzy, they tore him apart. His own mother ripped off his head.

Episode 9. The sacrifice of Orpheus Myth is continued as if the two previous episodes had not happened. The Dionysiac women eat his flesh.

Exodos. The myth of Orpheus decays. H.

YAN TAN TETHERA

'Mechanical pastoral' in one act, libretto by Tony Harrison, based on K.M. Briggs's A Dictionary of British Folktales (1970–71). Première, Queen Elizabeth Hall, London, 7 August 1986, with Omar Ebrahim as Alan, Helen Charnock as Hannah, Richard Stuart as Caleb Raven, Philip Doghan as the Bad 'Un and Piper, and Tom McDonnell as Ram, conducted by Elgar Howarth; broadcast on Channel 4/Radio 3, 19 April 1987. Revived by Opera Factory at Queen Elizabeth Hall, 1992, with Geoffrey Dolton, Patrick Donnelly and Marie Angel, conductor Mark Wigglesworth.

Shepherd Alan.....Bass/Baritone
 Hannah, his wife.....Soprano
 Davie and Rab, their twin sons.....Trebles
 Caleb Raven.....Bass/Baritone
 The Piper/The Bad 'Un.....Tenor
 Jack and Dick, the dark-haired twins.....Trebles
 Black-Faced Cheviot Sheep, Horned Wiltshire Sheep, Twins

Place: Wiltshire

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

Commissioned for television by the B.B.C., this work takes its title from a numbering system for counting sheep in the North of England, i.e. 'One, Two, Three'.

The work begins with 'the "music" of the hill, which is composed of voices.' The hill is an ancient burial mound. As the sun rises, the music 'becomes less audible, goes "underground" ... There should be one or two sarsen stones on the scene.' Shepherd Alan sits at the foot of the hill with a Cheviot Ram and Ewe. On another hill in the distance stands Caleb Raven with his herd of horned Wiltshire sheep. The two hills revolve, rather like figures in an intricate clock mechanism. Alan has recently arrived from the North. Though he waves at Caleb Raven on the other mound, Raven never waves back. Alan longs to go back to the North, but his ewe is likely to lamb any day.

The hills revolve, bringing Caleb Raven to the foreground; he complains that Alan's sheep have black faces and don't have bells, unlike his. The Wiltshire sheep sing 'This is the sound of the bells folk hear in the valley', whenever the sheep move. Birtwistle sets the first line for overlapping entries of high-lying voices, sounding slightly like bells, but this is no idyll. Caleb Raven tells the audience that he stole the village bell and melted it down to make bells for his sheep. He is looking for the gold left in the graves under the mounds.

The hills revolve. Alan has two more sheep now. He explains that while his sheep have no bells, he hears music, a Northern air, which reminds him 'of how I'm not very happy and how my heart's not very content in these foreign parts'. It is played by the Piper behind Alan, but every time he turns round, the Piper vanishes. Alan counts his sheep up to ten: 'Yan, Tan, Tethera, Methera, Pimp, Sether, Lethera, Hovera, Dovera, Dik', and recites the charm 'Yan, Tan, Tethera, One-Two-Three, Sweet Trinity, keep me and my sheep', hoping it will stop him hearing the Piper play. His wife is about to give birth, so he is determined to stay where he is. Since it lost its bell, the church has fallen into decay, so all they have to keep the 'Bad 'Un' (the devil) away is this charm. Hannah learns the charm in a duet that becomes an ensemble when Alan's sheep join in.

Caleb Raven watches as Alan counts his sheep, furious that he has so many more. Their powerful duet takes the form of competitive systems of counting. Alan counts in tens, Caleb Raven in sinister units of thirteen. The phantom Piper lures Alan away with his music. When the Piper reappears, Caleb wonders whether the Piper taught him his spell. He recites 'Yan, Tan, Tethera', causing the Piper to spin round and round; his hat falls off, revealing a pair of horns – the Piper is the Bad 'Un. Caleb wants the 'Northman' dead, so he can have Hannah for himself. The Bad 'Un promises to lure away both Alan and the twins his wife will bear. Caleb also asks for gold. In an eerie ritual sequence, the Bad 'Un encourages Caleb to poke the mound with his crook. He finds a bracelet, brooch and ring.

Alan attempts to ward off the Piper by repeating his shepherd's charm, but he succumbs to the lure of his tune and disappears. Hannah's labour begins; her high-lying music becomes intensely anguished, she recites the shepherd's charm and appeals to the sarsen stones to lessen her pains. We see the Bad 'Un carrying two small bundles away.

Caleb leaves the gold at the foot of the mound, but Hannah is not impressed. As she tends the Cheviot sheep she counts the seven years that have passed since Alan and her twins disappeared. She and her sheep recite the charm, which sends Caleb off into a spin. He returns with two dark-haired twin boys, Jack and Dick; Hannah knows they are not her children, but agrees to look after them. The use of treble voices inevitably makes a powerful impact. Jack and Dick promise Hannah that the twins will return tomorrow at dawn.

Just before dawn, we see them kneeling in front of the mound. Birtwistle's music is at its most atmospheric here, with horn calls over the orchestra's collective sighing, yielding to upwardly spiralling woodwind. The hill opens. Hannah's twins Davie and Rab emerge, along with the ram and the ewe that Alan had brought with him. They promise that Alan himself will return the next day.

Caleb returns with his sheep, determined to steal more of the gold, so he can escape from the Bad 'Un. Caleb watches Jack and Dick go round the mound three times, clockwise. The hill opens and Alan emerges, carrying the church bell, now covered in gold. Caleb tries to imitate their ritual, but he goes round the mound thirteen times, anti-clockwise. The hill opens, Caleb rushes inside 'and the hill closes on him with a snap'. As the restored church bell chimes, Alan explains that 'when you're out on the downs alone', you can hear an agonised voice for ever stuck at 'Tethera Dik' (thirteen). P.

GAWAIN

Opera in two acts, libretto by David Harsent, based on the medieval legend of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. Première, Covent Garden, 30 May 1991, with Marie Angel as Morgan le Fay, Elizabeth Laurence as Lady de Hautdesert, Richard Greager as Arthur, Penelope Walmsley-Clark as Guinevere, François Le Roux as Gawain, John Tomlinson as the Green Knight/Bertilak de Hautdesert, conducted by Elgar Howarth. When Covent Garden revived it on 14 April 1994, Anne Howells sang Lady de Hautdesert and the composer shortened the 'turning of the seasons'.

Morgan le Fay, *Arthur's half-sister*Soprano
 Lady de Hautdesert, *wife of Bertilak*Mezzo-Soprano
 Arthur, *King of Logres*Tenor
 Guinevere, *Arthur's wife*Soprano

A FoolBaritone
 Agravain, *a knight, Gawain's brother*Bass
 Ywain, *a knight, Arthur's nephew*Tenor
 Gawain, *a knight, Arthur's nephew*Baritone
 Bishop Baldwin, *Arthur's confessor*Counter-Tenor Bedevere, *a knight*Actor
 The Green Knight/
 Bertilak de HautdesertBass-Baritone
 Clerics, Off-Stage Chorus

Place: King Arthur's Court; Hautdesert; The Green Chapel

Time: Medieval

Running Time (revised version): 2 hours 30 minutes

As he came off-stage from the première of The Mask of Orpheus in 1986, Birtwistle told the conductor Elgar Howarth that he had been asked to write an opera for Covent Garden. Howarth himself commented that 'Orpheus is a piece which a young man knew he had to write. Gawain is the work of a mature master. All of [his] theatrical virtuosity has gone into it.'

Act I. Camelot at Christmas. King Arthur and his court are attended by two invisible people, the witch Morgan le Fay and Lady de Hautdesert. Morgan hates King Arthur and his wife Guinevere, and hopes to destroy them. Lady de Hautdesert is chilled and excited by Morgan's purpose. Arthur feels that the 'rituals of the season [have been] tamed by habit'. His wife invites him to join the feast but he asks to hear or see some demonstration of courage.

The Green Knight rides in holding a branch of holly in one hand and an axe in the other. He insults Arthur (as Siegfried does Gunther in the Gibichungs' hall) by asking which is the King, and points out that 'There's a smell of timidity in the place, like rot.' He then issues a challenge: he will let anyone strike at his neck with the axe, as long as he is then allowed to do the same in return, a year and a day later. Arthur is intrigued: 'How can you kill a man if you are dead?' Gawain accepts the challenge and strikes off the Green Knight's head with his axe. In a moment of rare theatrical magic, the Green Knight picks up his own head, which continues to sing. He tells Gawain, 'Ride north ... the bargain's struck.'

In a long and elaborate ritual sequence, Gawain is stripped, washed and armed during the 'Turning of the Seasons', beginning and ending in winter. The Fool tells Gawain to look out of his window, out of the door, over the moor, in his mirror, where he might see someone: 'Who is it?'

Gawain (Covent Garden, 1991, director Di Trevis, designer Alison Chitty). John Tomlinson as the Green Knight holds up his severed head.

Act II. Morgan describes and controls Gawain's journey. Bertilak and Lady de Hautdesert wait for Gawain to arrive. Morgan prompts them to ask him to teach them something of courtly love, which Lady de Hautdesert compares to hunting. Bertilak offers him their house and everything within it. Gawain explains that he has a debt to pay and cannot rest until he has found the Green Chapel. Learning that it is not more than two miles away, he agrees to stay until he has rested. Bertilak is going hunting from dawn to dusk. He offers Gawain a pact: each evening they will give one another whatever they have gained during the day. Lady de Hautdesert leads Gawain to his bed and Morgan sings him a lullaby. Next day, the hunt and the attempted seduction of Gawain by Lady de Hautdesert are interwoven. She flatters Gawain and offers him her body. He ignores this and she kisses him. Bertilak kills a stag, throws the offal outside and the head at Gawain's feet. Gawain responds by kissing Bertilak. The sequence of lullaby, hunt and seduction is repeated, when Bertilak throws a boar's head at Gawain's feet and Gawain kisses him, and, when Bertilak hunts a fox and Lady de Hautdesert kisses Gawain again. However, she then offers him her sash as well: while he wears it, nothing can hurt him. At the exchange, Bertilak throws the carcass of the fox at Gawain's feet, but Gawain merely kisses him three times and does not mention the sash.

He sets off for the Green Chapel where he confronts the Green Knight and bows to receive the axe-blow. The Green Knight merely grazes his neck with the axe and explains that the first two blows were feints, because Gawain was honest on two occasions in the exchange of gifts with Bertilak. He cut him with the third blow, because Gawain lied to keep the sash, not out of greed or love, but fear of death, 'not sin enough to die for'. The Green Knight refuses to accept the sash that Gawain tries to give him and loops it round his chest. Morgan reveals that the Green Knight was Bertilak: the man has become the hero and is now a man again. She tells Gawain 'I've done the same to you. Become yourself; your purpose has just begun.'

Back at Arthur's court, the King is still longing to whet his appetite with courage. Someone knocks at the door three times. The Fool opens it and Morgan enters, though she is invisible to the court. Gawain returns and receives a warm welcome. They ask for news of brave feats, but he protests that he is 'not that hero'. As they disarm him, his responses disappoint them and he feels out of place. Morgan ends the opera by telling him and us, 'Think only of dreams and promises. Then with a single step your journey starts.'

Birtwistle's librettist David Harsent shared the composer's interest in the English folk tradition. A ritual element was already present in the medieval poem, with its two mirror scenes in Arthur's court, its journeys and mythical confrontation. According to Rhian Samuel (in a programme note for the première) Birtwistle 'chose the poem mainly for its wealth of formal patternings and its capacity for the inclusion of more (he claims the seasons sequence and the hunt/seduction intercutting in particular as his own creation)'. For some of the audience, the masque of the 'Turning of the Seasons' was a highpoint of the evening; for others, the year seemed to last forever. As Paul Griffiths pointed out in The Times, the libretto contains 'a certain amount of poetic phrase-making which looks wonderful on the page but sounds regrettably portentous in the theatre'. It is the mock-medievalisms that seem egregious: 'Now celebrate the hearth, the boar's head and the wine'. The text's facility, pomposity and sentimentality consort oddly with the grittiness, the intellectual complexity and emotional impact of Birtwistle's music. P.

THE SECOND MRS KONG

Opera in two acts, libretto by Russell Hoban. First performance by Glyndebourne Touring Opera at Glyndebourne, 24 October 1994, with Philip Langridge as Kong, Helen Field as Pearl, Michael Chance, Steven Page, Omar Ebrahim, conducted by Elgar Howarth. In German, Operntheater im Jugendstiltheater, Vienna, 1996, conducted by Andreas Mitisek; Theater der Stadt Heidelberg, 1996, conducted by Thomas Kalb.

Kong, the idea of him Tenor
 Pearl, Vermeer's 'Girl with a Pearl Earring' Soprano
 Orpheus, for ever singing his loss Counter-Tenor Anubis, a jackal-headed boatman Bass-Baritone
 Death of Kong, a wrong assumption Bass-Baritone
 Vermeer, left behind by Pearl Baritone

Inanna, Mrs Dollarama, dead former beauty queen Mezzo-Soprano
 Mr Dollarama, dead film producer Baritone
 Swami Zumzum, Inanna's dead spiritual adviser Character Tenor Mirror Lyric Soprano
 Mirror Echo Soprano
 Madame Lena, the customary sphinx Contralto
 Eurydice Soprano
 Woman Model Soprano
 Model 1 and Terror High Soprano
 Model 2 and Despair Soprano
 Model 3 and Fear Mezzo-Soprano
 Model 4 and Doubt Mezzo-Soprano
 Joe Shady Bass
 Monstrous Messenger Bass
 Chorus of the Dead

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Act I. An island in the world of shadows, inhabited by the dead. Anubis the jackal-headed boatman brings the souls of the dead to the world of shadows. At his command the dead relive their memories. Mr Dollarama finds his wife Inanna in bed with her guru Swami Zumzum. Orpheus looks back and loses Eurydice. Vermeer the painter sees Pearl in his mind and falls in love with her.

Vermeer's memory. Vermeer relives the moment when he first met Pearl in Delft, 1664.

As the dead watch the scene unfold, a monstrous messenger delivers a print of the film King Kong. Kong was taken to the World of Shadows by mistake in 1933, when the puppet ape died in the film. Kong himself knows he is an idea that will not die. But he is not sure what he is an idea of.

Meanwhile in Delft, 1664, Vermeer cannot find the model he needs to inspire him. Pearl comes collecting for the church. Vermeer invites her to sit for him. Kong cries out from the World of Shadows, a lost and lonely call. Vermeer finishes the painting, irritated at Pearl's lack of interest in him.

Kong's room, the world of shadows. Kong watches King Kong and realises that he is more than 'the giant head, the giant hand, the little puppet moving on the screen'. Inanna comes to him, hoping for love. Now that Kong has heard Pearl's voice, however, he can think of no one else.

Pearl, Pearl, the Vermeer Girl. Now in the twentieth eth century, the painting has become a popular icon, widely available.

Penthouse flat, Mammon House. Pearl has become part of the furnishings of a stockbroker's flat. She puts on the television and catches a re-run of King Kong. But this Kong is a puppet. The Mirror enlightens her, and she uses the computer to search for Kong. They fall in love. Kong vows to find her.

The dead have been watching from the World of Shadows. A quarrel between Mr Dollarama, Inanna and Swami Zumzum turns into a fight. In the confusion, Kong escapes and sets off to find Pearl among the living. He brings Orpheus to act as his pilot.

Act II. At sea. Kong and Orpheus are lost. Kong asks Orpheus the way to the world of the living. They are attacked by Doubt, Fear, Despair and Terror. Orpheus loses his head; Kong remains resolute: 'Beyond the soul's dark sea ... there waits my Pearl.' Kong rescues the head of Orpheus.

Anubis and some of the dead have followed. Inanna disparages Pearl to Dollarama, 'all she's ever done is hang on walls ... she's two-dimensional'. Vermeer defends her.

Customs barrier, a tunnel. The sphinx, Madame Lena, controls the customs barrier between the two worlds. She tries to seduce Kong and is disappointed when he runs off to find Pearl. Her riddle, 'What has two hearts and one desire?' remains unanswered.

On the road to the city. Kong and the head of Orpheus lose confidence in their quest for Pearl and Eurydice. The song of Orpheus charms a telephone and Kong calls Pearl to get directions. They remember falling in love.

A menacing figure challenges Kong. As an idea, however, Kong refuses to die. They fight and the dead bet on the outcome. Kong wins. He now knows who he is: 'I am the wild and wordless, lost and lonely child of all the world'.

Penthouse flat, Mammon House. Pearl cannot find her own reflection. Kong arrives. This is the moment they have waited for: 'there is nothing ... more real than our love'. Kong and Pearl try to touch each other. The Mirror intervenes: 'Look at me, see in my silver-shadowed waters yourselves together and apart forever. You cannot have each other.' Inanna, Dollarama, the head of Orpheus and Eurydice try to intercede but are helpless.

The Mirror tells them that 'it is not love that moves the world from night to morning ... it is the longing for what cannot be.' The love of Pearl and Kong cannot be fulfilled. They remember how they first fell in love.

The Second Mrs Kong represents an exciting development in Birtwistle's oeuvre. For the first time, the libretto stretches the composer: instead of merely supplying the ritual elements he needs, it takes him into new areas of humour and of human emotions. There is still a mythical quality to the story, and the music is as cerebrally rich as ever, yet it can also sound simple, and have a direct impact. Among the work's highlights are Madame Lena the Sphinx's formidable aria; the shimmering duet for two sopranos, the Mirror and Pearl; Inanna's longing for Kong; Kong's pathos; Orpheus mourning Eurydice. The work's open ending, its refusal to settle for a neat formula, also represents an advance on previous works. At the opera's core is the recognition that all lovers return to the moment when they fell in love, a phenomenon that seems ideally suited to Birtwistle's mind (his love of repetitive patterns) and heart. P.

GEORGES BIZET

(born 25 October 1838, died 3 June 1875)

Bizet was a prolific composer, pre-eminent in the theatre, where paradoxically his operas never achieved instant success. His delightful Symphony in C was written when he was only seventeen, Le Docteur Miracle a year later, and in 1857 he won the Prix de Rome, spending three years in that city. On his return, Les Pêcheurs de Perles was commissioned for the Opéra-Comique, where however it had little success. In 1871 he married the daughter of the composer Halévy, who had been his teacher. His career is littered with operas started and then abandoned, but Djamileh (1872) impressed du Locle, the co-director of the Opéra-Comique, sufficiently for him to commission Bizet and the librettists Henri Meilhac and Ludovic Halévy (his wife's cousin) to write Carmen.

LE DOCTEUR MIRACLE

Doctor Miracle

Operetta in one act, text by Léon Battu and Ludovic Halévy. Première at the Bouffes Parisiens, 9 April 1857. Not revived until 1951.

The MagistrateBaritone
Laurette, *his daughter*Soprano
Véronique, *his wife*Soprano
Captain Silvio/Pasquin/Dr MiracleTenor

Running Time: 1 hour

At eighteen, with the composition of the Symphony in C already behind him (though unperformed), and just before winning the Prix de Rome which entitled him to a sojourn in the eternal city, Bizet entered a competition organised by Offenbach. This was for an operetta in connection with the Théâtre des Bouffes Parisiens which Offenbach was about to open. All composers had to set the same libretto; there were over seventy entries, and Bizet shared first prize with Charles Lecocq. The premières of the two operettas occurred on 8 and 9 April 1857 and Bizet's effort was sufficiently successful with the public to clock up eleven successive performances.

A young soldier is in love with the daughter of an anti-militarist magistrate and contrives to get a job as the magistrate's cook. The omelette he serves up is so horrible that his beloved's father is convinced he has been poisoned and sends for the doctor. That worthy when he arrives – the soldier in disguise, of course – promises a cure in return for the hand of the daughter of the house. Happy ending!

All buzzes along as light-heartedly as if it were by Offenbach himself, sometimes tongue-in-cheek in parody of operatic practice, occasionally straight and lyrical. The music's climax comes with the 'Quatuor de l'omelette', an ensemble worthy of Rossini, an excellent example of the ensemble of misunderstanding in which the Italian master was so expert. H.

DON PROCOPIO

Opera in two acts, text (in Italian) by Carlo Cambiaggio after Luigi Prividalì's libretto I pretendenti delusi. Première Monte Carlo (in French) 10 March 1906, with Angèle Pornot, Rousselière, Jean Périer, Max Bouvet, conductor Léon Jehin (the opera was twinned with Pagliacci in which Rousselière and Bouvet played the leads opposite Geraldine Farrar). First performed University College, London, 1955.

Don AndronicoBass
Bettina, *his niece*Soprano
Ernesto, *her brother*Baritone
Don Procopio, *an old miser*Bass
Odoardo, *Bettina's lover*Tenor EufemiaMezzo-Soprano

Running Time: 1 hour

Having won the Prix de Rome, Bizet found a libretto in a bookshop and set it as the first composition he would send back to Paris. It was finished in 1859 but never performed in his lifetime, coming to light nearly twenty years after his death, when Charles Malherbe arranged the score and (quite superfluously) added recitatives.

Act I. Bettina loves Don Odoardo but her uncle, much to her chagrin, has arranged for her to marry the well-off Don Procopio. She plans with her brother Ernesto and Odoardo to pretend that she is delighted with the match, which will enable her to live in some style. Don Procopio has misgivings about the prospect even before he and Bettina are introduced.

Act II. Bettina is evidently planning to live it up, much to the horror of the thrifty Don Procopio, who wants to get out of the whole affair. He is pressed to keep to his side of the bargain, until Don Andronico decides to make the best of a bad job and allow the young lovers to marry.

The music is thoroughly Italianate in style, with Donizetti as Bizet's avowed model, and charming in effect – inventive, swift-moving, full of wit and patter, replete with the idiomatic twists and turns which make Don Pasquale such a masterpiece. The score includes a march borrowed from Bizet's earlier Symphony in C, and some music was later used in Les Pêcheurs de Perles and La Jolie Fille de Perth, the very attractive serenade in the last-named opera appearing first in Don Procopio. H.

LES PÊCHEURS DE PERLES

The Pearl Fishers

Opera in three acts, text by Carré and Cormon. Première at the Théâtre-Lyrique, Paris, 30 September 1863, with de Maesen, Morini, Ismaël. First performed Covent Garden, 1887, as Leïla, with Fohström, Garulli, Lhérie; Philadelphia, 1893; Opéra-Comique, Paris, 21 April 1893, with Calvé, Delmas, Soulaacroix, conductor Danbé; Metropolitan, 1896 (two acts only, in combination with La Navarraise), with Calvé, Cremonini, Ancona. Revived Metropolitan, 1916, with Hempel, Caruso, de Luca; Covent Garden, 1920, with Pareto, Tom Burke, Badini, conductor Beecham; Berlin, 1934, with Berger, Wittrisch, Schlusnus, conductor Blech; la Scala, Milan, 1938, with Carosio, Lugo, Biasini, conductor Capuana.

Leïla, priestess of Brahma.....Soprano
Nadir, a fisherman.....Tenor
Zurga, king of the fishermen.....Baritone
Nourabad, high priest of Brahma.....Bass

Place: Ceylon

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Act I. The scene is the seashore, where the fishermen are holding fête preparatory to choosing a chief. They sing and dance, and eventually select Zurga to rule them; he accepts their confidence. Nadir appears, is greeted after his long absence, and describes his adventures in the jungle. There is a fond reunion between Zurga and Nadir. They were formerly friends, but recall their rivalry for the hand of the beautiful priestess, Leïla, whom they had seen together in the Brahmin temple of Candy. Their love for her had brought enmity between them, but they recall that the oath of friendship which they swore has never since been broken. Their duet, 'Au fond du temple saint', is an example of Bizet's melodic inspiration at its finest. Its theme is used throughout the opera as a friendship motto.

News is brought that a boat has arrived, bringing with it the unknown virgin whose duty is to pray during the time the fishermen are at sea, so as to ward off evil spirits. Zurga tells Nadir that she is veiled and must not be approached or seen by anyone during the time of her vigil. She is brought in by the old priest Nourabad, and welcomed by the fisherfolk. Zurga swears her in as the inviolate virgin protectress of the fishermen, and threatens her with death if she prove false to her oath.

Leïla and Nadir recognise each other, and he stands watching as if in a dream as she ascends the cliff. In an aria of great beauty he reflects on his love, which has never been dimmed by the passing of time: 'Je crois entendre encore'. This is the best-known section of the score, not least in its Italian translation, 'Mi par d'udir ancora', and it is concerned, like the duet for tenor and baritone, like the love duet, with a kind of erotic hypnosis, gentle and seductive, musically elusive and yet compelling, with which Bizet ensnares his young lovers and impregnates his score – hence one of the secrets of its attraction. Leïla reappears, and sings an invocation to Brahma, echoed by the chorus, before she is left alone on her rock for her vigil. Before the end of the act, Nadir, gazing up at Leïla, sings ardently of his love for her and swears to protect her.

Act II. In a ruined temple, the high priest, Nourabad, warns Leïla on pain of death to be faithful to her religious vows. She will be alone but well guarded. Leïla tells him he need have no fear; she never breaks her promise. The necklace she wears was given her by a fugitive, whose hiding-place she refused to reveal although the daggers of his pursuers were pointed at her heart.

Nourabad leaves her, and she sings of the love which fills her heart ('Comme autrefois dans la nuit sombre'). Suddenly, she hears the voice of Nadir singing a serenade: 'De mon amie fleur endormie'. A moment later he is with her, and a passionate duet of almost Verdian character develops: 'Ton cœur n'a pas compris le mien'. Leïla begs Nadir to leave her, and they agree to meet again the next day; but Nourabad has seen Nadir, and he calls down anathema on both their heads, while the chorus mutter that they can see a storm arising. Nadir is captured by the guards, Nourabad accuses the lovers of sacrilege, the crowd take up his cry for vengeance. Zurga claims the right, as chief and therefore judge, to settle the case himself, and he inclines to be merciful for the sake of his friend. But Nourabad tears the veil from Leïla's head, and Zurga, recognising Leïla, swears to be revenged on Nadir for his treachery. The crowd call on him to avenge the sacrilege.

Act III. Zurga's tent. The chief contrasts his own restless state of mind with the abated storm, which for a time threatened destruction of the fishing fleet ('L'orage s'est calmé'). He laments the breaking of his friendship with Nadir: 'O Nadir, tendre ami de mon cœur'. It is a fine lyrical scena of considerable power. Leïla appears before him, and expresses her willingness to die, but in a melting tune pleads for Nadir. Zurga eventually gives in to jealousy at the idea of losing Leïla to Nadir, and is cursed by Leïla for his jealous cruelty. Just before leaving him, she asks that a last favour may be granted her; she has a necklace which she would like to have sent to her mother far away. This she puts into Zurga's hands.

Les pêcheurs de perles (Metropolitan Opera House, New York, c. 1916). Giuseppe De Luca (1876–1950) as Zurga, Frieda Hempel (1885–1955) as Leïla, Enrico Caruso (1873–1921) as Nadir.

The second scene of Act III is set at the place of execution, where a funeral pyre has been erected. There are savage dances and choruses before Nourabad leads Leïla out into the middle of the populace. Just as the guilty lovers are to meet death, a distant glow is seen. Zurga dashes in crying that the camp is on fire, and the people rush out to fight the flames. Zurga tells Leïla and Nadir that it was he who set fire to the camp; the necklace she gave him was once his, and he the fugitive she saved from death long ago. He unfastens their chains and bids them flee.¹ Zurga impedes their pursuers, but is denounced by Nourabad, who had stayed behind in hiding when the others left. The music of 'Au fond du temple saint' is heard in the orchestra, and the top line is sung by Leïla and Nadir in octaves as they appear safe on the top of the rock.

It is easy to mock the paste-board, over-romantic story – the kind of thing you would make up to show opera's fustian side – but not the lyricism of the music, which keeps it a best-seller some 150 years after the première.

K., H.

¹ Godard, in a misguided attempt to strengthen Bizet's ending, composed a trio, 'O lumière sainte', for insertion at this point, where for many years it was performed. Later editing of Bizet's score has been extensive and the duet for tenor and baritone usually closes with a reprise of the refrain, more effective one may think than the quick section Bizet intended.

LA JOLIE FILLE DE PERTH

The Fair Maid of Perth

Opera in four acts, text by J.H. Vernoy de Saint-Georges and J. Adenis, founded on Scott's novel The Fair Maid of Perth. Première Théâtre-Lyrique, Paris, 26 December 1867, with Devriès, Ducasse, Massy, Barré, Lutz. First produced Manchester, 1917, by the Beecham Opera Company with Sylvia Nelis, Walter Hyde, Webster Millar, and in London at Drury Lane, 1917, by the same cast; Covent Garden, 1919. Revived Oxford, 1955; B.B.C. (in concert, English), 1956, with Mattiwilda Dobbs, Alexander Young, conductor Beecham; B.B.C. again, 1973, with Eda-Pierre, Delia Wallis, Young, conductor David Lloyd-Jones.

Simon Glover, glove-maker Bass
 Catherine Glover, his daughter Soprano
 Mab, Queen of the gipsies Soprano
 Henri (Henry) Smith, the armourer Tenor
 The Duke of Rothsay Baritone or Tenor
 Ralph, Glover's apprentice Bass or Baritone
 A Lord in the service of Rothsay Tenor
 The Duke's Major-Domo Bass

Place: Scotland

Running Time: 2 hours

Bizet signed a contract with Carvalho for La Jolie Fille de Perth in July 1866 when he was twenty-seven and finished it in December of the same year; Winton Dean in his book about the composer describes the libretto as the worst Bizet ever had to set. Certainly it is far from Walter Scott, and the libretto's naive treatment of the novel's characters has probably led to the music's under-valuation. The part of Catherine was intended for Christine Nilsson, but that great prima donna preferred to create Ophelia in Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet. La Jolie Fille de Perth was well received at its first performance, better than any other opera of Bizet's during his lifetime, but it had a mere eighteen performances and was not heard again in Paris until 1890.

Act I. After a bout of communal singing in his workshop, Smith laments the absence of his beloved Catherine Glover, but his thoughts are interrupted by sounds from outside. He opens the door to give shelter to the gipsy Mab, who is being mobbed by a group of young men. She hides as Catherine comes in with her father and the apprentice Ralph, Ralph making little attempt throughout the scene to hide his jealousy of the sympathy between Smith and Catherine. Glover has brought provisions for a wedding feast, venison, pâté, pudding and whisky among them – his gourmand tendencies are recognised throughout the opera, not least in the first-act finale – and Catherine celebrates the holiday in a brilliant and rapid Polonaise.¹ Glover prefers Smith to Ralph as a suitor for Catherine's hand, and Smith and Catherine are left to sing sweetly in duet together. Will she be his Valentine? As token of his devotion, he gives her a gold-enamelled flower.

Enter the Duke of Rothsay, arrogant and at first unrecognised. He asks for Smith's professional services, but his interest is in Catherine and, in the course of a trio, he invites her to his castle at night, much to the rage of Smith, who seems at one point to be out-hammering Sachs in his effort to drown the words of a rival far more dangerous than any Beckmesser – all this to the most mellifluous music imaginable. The quarrel is about to blaze into a fight when Mab emerges from her hiding-place, to Catherine's considerable dismay and everybody else's embarrassment. The lively trio becomes a livelier quartet, and in the course of the finale, after her father's entry and recognition of the Duke, Catherine quarrels with Smith, throws down the flower which he had earlier given her – Mab picks it up – and flounces out.

Act II is introduced by a nocturnal march. But it is not a night for sleep, and carnival is in full swing, the Duke dispensing hospitality and all watching the gipsies dance to a musical number of real fame, which was encored at the first performance. The Duke enlists the help of Mab in his scheme to abduct Catherine, Mab (who was once his mistress) seeming in a charming song to fall in with the scheme but in fact determined to substitute herself for Catherine.

Smith sings a most attractive serenade in 6/8 outside Catherine's window ('A la voix d'un amant fidèle'),² one of the four numbers known outside performance, and it is followed immediately by the splendid, if lugubrious, drinking song of the bibulous Ralph, 'Quand la flamme de l'amour', hardly less well-known and perhaps even better.

¹ A more lyrical aria (by Bizet but unauthorised here) appears in an appendix to the vocal score as an alternative for the singer of Catherine.

² Its popularity in Britain is due to Heddle Nash's celebrated recording and it is comparatively far less known in France. Bizet originally wrote it for Don Procopio (1859).

Ralph collapses out of breath, and it is unfortunate that the Duke's major-domo chooses to ask him the way to Catherine's house, even more so that he watches a masked female figure, to a reminiscence of the Duke's love song, accompany the major-domo towards the castle. Ralph is indignant at the turn of events and rouses both Glover and Smith, who rush off, leaving Ralph in his befuddled state to observe the real Catherine lean out of her window in an attempt to answer Smith's serenade.

Act III. Introduced by a graceful minuet entr'acte,¹ familiar from its introduction into the second L'Arlésienne suite, the Duke of Rothsay in his castle is gaming with the gentlemen of his house and describes in a cavatina the effect his new love has had on him before starting to woo her (it is of course Mab unrecognisably masked). Mab is suitably cynical about the Duke's sincerity as he uses much the same words to his supposed Catherine as he had once upon a time used to her (and Bizet the tune of his entr'acte minuet). The Duke takes Catherine's rose, which Mab is wearing, and eventually Mab makes her escape pursued by the Duke, to be succeeded by Smith, who, albeit rather gently, voices his despair and determination to be revenged. Smith hides and is indignant when Glover accompanied by Catherine asks the Duke to give his permission for her to marry Smith. In the course of the extended finale – the score's most ambitious section – the unfortunate Catherine finds herself at first forgiven for her supposed infidelity, then apparently sharing a guilty secret with a lord of the manor whom she hardly knows, finally rejected by a lover whose fury knows no bounds when he sees the golden flower pinned to the Duke's tunic.

Act IV. It is the morning of St Valentine's Day, and Smith and Ralph quarrel when the latter defends Catherine's honour. They arrange to fight a duel. Catherine appears, and she and Smith sadly recall past love. Smith is aware that Ralph is likely to kill him in the duel, and Catherine collapses. The chorus greets St Valentine's Day, Mab enters to relate that the Duke at her insistence has stopped the duel, and all now turn their attention to Catherine, whose wits have conveniently, at least from the nineteenth-century operatic point of view (though in defiance of Sir Walter Scott), deserted her. Her Ballade is a graceful example of the mad scene – for all that Winton Dean in his splendid book on Bizet says it 'raises a critical blush' – but the situation is apparently resolved when Smith serenades under Catherine's window, and Mab acts her part. Smith greets her as his Valentine, and all ends happily.

'The development shown in La Jolie Fille de Perth is in some ways negative rather than positive: Bizet has eliminated many of the weaknesses of the two previous operas, but not pursued his advances, particularly in the harmonic sphere. It is a less arresting and a less uneven opera, and consequently has been underrated. For much of its apparent tameness the libretto is responsible'.² That it is a step on Bizet's road from graceful melody to major achievement (in Carmen) of the perfect opéra-comique is undeniable, as witness the serenade, Ralph's drinking song, the skilful, even ironic, use of the music associated with the Duke's wooing of Catherine, notably in the finale of Act II and in Act III. The opera, like Pêcheurs de Perles, is more than just a signpost on a road to a great capital city, and one hopes revivals – they will be no more than that – will continue while the tradition of opéra-comique (to which it belongs in spirit if not in literal fact) continues.

H.

DJAMILEH

Opera in one act, text by Louis Gallet, based on a poem by Alfred de Musset. Première Opéra-Comique, Paris, 22 May 1872, with Aline Preilly (a notorious beauty but a bad singer), Duchesne, Potel. Poorly cast, it received only eleven performances and was not revived at the Opéra-Comique until 1938, with Jennie Tourel, Louis Arnoult and Roger Bourdin, conductor Cloëz. The first English performance was in 1919, with Gladys Ancrum, Webster Millar, Walter Hyde, conductor Beecham. It had been given in Vienna under Mahler in 1898, was well thought of by Richard Strauss who recommended it in his 'artistic testament' to Karl Böhm, and was revived in Munich in 1965.

Djamileh, a slave girl Mezzo-Soprano
 Haroun, a rich playboy Tenor
 Splendiano, Haroun's servant Baritone (or Tenor)
 A Slave Merchant Speaking Role
 Slaves and Friends of Haroun's

Running Time: 1 hour 5 minutes

¹ Arranged by Guiraud.

² Winton Dean: Bizet, His Life and Works (Dent).

Haroun, a Cairo playboy, is in the habit of changing his mistress every month, Splendiano, his servant and once his tutor, buying him new ones at the slave market. His heart is ice-cold, he claims, and he loves only love. The snag to this scenario is that his latest, Djamileh, is in love with him and contrives to change places with Splendiano's newest candidate for his master's favours, with the expected result. Splendiano is left mourning his dream of himself enjoying Djamileh.

The story is too flimsy and too short of drama to carry the weight that the music with its instrumental subtleties, its nuances, twists and turns of colour, deserves. Haroun is an unattractive if melodious cypher, Splendiano a bawd in search of musical comedy, and only Djamileh engages sympathy. Nonetheless, the failure of his short opera did not cause Bizet to lose his conviction that, with this score, he had at last found his way in the theatre. Within three years, Carmen was in front of the public and within four Bizet was dead. Even so, Richard Strauss's advocacy says more for his sense of musical quality than for his theatrical instincts. H.

CARMEN

Opéra-comique in four acts, words by Henri Meilhac and Ludovic Halévy, founded on the novel by Prosper Mérimée. Première at Opéra-Comique, Paris, 3 March 1875, the title role being created by Galli-Marié with Chapuy, Lhérie, Bouhy. Her Majesty's Theatre, London (in Italian), 22 June 1878, with Minnie Hauck; same theatre, 5 February 1879 (in English); same theatre, 8 November 1886 (in French), with Galli-Marié. Covent Garden, 1882, with Pauline Luccà, Valleria, Lestellier, Bouhy. Minnie Hauck also created the role in America, 23 October 1879, at the Academy of Music, New York, with Campanini, del Puente. Calvé made her New York début as Carmen at the Metropolitan, 20 December 1893, with Jean de Reszke and Eames.

| | |
|---|--------------------------|
| Don José, a corporal of dragoons | Tenor |
| Escamillo, a matador | Baritone |
| El Dancaïro | } smugglers |
| El Remendado | |
| Zuniga, a captain | Tenor |
| Moralès, an officer | Tenor |
| Micaela, a peasant girl | Bass |
| Frasquita | } gipsies |
| Mercédès | |
| Carmen, a cigarette girl | Soprano |
| | Soprano |
| | Mezzo-Soprano |

Innkeeper, Guide, Officers, Dragoons, Boys, Cigarette Girls, Gipsies, Smugglers, etc.

Place: Seville, Spain

Time: c. 1830

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Carmen is an opéra-comique with a tragic story and a tragic ending, and a substantial portion of the action is carried on in dialogue. For Vienna in 1875, it was thought helpful to have portions (but not all) of the dialogue set as recitative, and Bizet's pupil/colleague, Ernest Guiraud, later responsible for 'doctoring' Offenbach's Les Contes d'Hoffmann before its première, undertook the task with sufficient success for his 'version' to be adopted for some eighty years in most of the large non-French opera houses (in a few, it is still used). But Carmen is a better work with the dialogue Bizet intended, so that his brilliantly inventive, subtly scored genre music recreates the world he aimed at so precisely, a world of sophisticated gestures on a small scale rather than grand arias, large ensembles or rumbustious finales. Even so, in any version and in theatres large or small, the opera has for well over a century been probably the most popular in the repertory, and is almost invariably revealed as a masterpiece of virtual perfection and unerring design.

In 1964 was published Oeser's so-called complete edition, which prints much material cut during and before rehearsal, but falsifies the text by re-writing stage directions and excising Bizet's own modifications and improvements. To follow it slavishly is to fall into new and by no means shallow pits.

The opera was not initially a success (nor yet quite the failure legend would have it – forty-five performances in its first year), mainly due to its low-life theme and violent conclusion offending against the traditionally family atmosphere of the Opéra-Comique. By 1883, after success abroad, Carmen returned in triumph to Paris and by the end of the year had clocked up its hundredth performance.

Act I. A square in Seville, containing cigarette factory and guard-house. The prelude introduces the music of the Corrida, then Escamillo, the bullfighter, finally the brooding, apprehensive motif of fate and Carmen's obsession with it.

The atmosphere is heat-laden as townsfolk idly watch the world go by. Corporal Moralès tries to pick up Micaela, who is looking for Don José and will return later, but the action proper starts with a march heralding the relief guard; children parody the soldiers' drill. Corporal José tells Lieutenant Zuniga that the girls from the cigarette factory tend to be pretty but that he has eyes for no one but Micaela, his foster-sister. A bell rings; the male crowd voyeuristically anticipates the arrival of the girls, who emerge to sing melodiously of the factory's produce. Electricity is in the music as the gipsy Carmen darts out of the factory to become the cynosure of all eyes but proof against any advances. She sings a sultry Habanera ('L'amour est un oiseau rebelle'). A musical reference to the fate motif brings Carmen face to face with José, who seems not to notice her. She chucks a flower at him and runs into the factory, leaving him to pick it up as Micaela returns. Micaela brings José money and news of his mother ('Parle-moi de ma mère') and they sing an extended duet full of charm but devoid of passion.

Shouts from the factory suggest that someone has been stabbed – by Carmen, cries one faction. Zuniga tries to get sense from the hubbub, then sends José to sort it out inside. He escorts Carmen out, but she answers Zuniga's questioning only with humming and singing and José is instructed to tie her hands. Zuniga makes out a warrant while Carmen urges José to let her go – because, she says, he is in love with her ('Près des remparts de Séville'). She is right, as is immediately clear when he joins his voice to hers, loosens the knots and lets her give him a shove and run off to freedom, the crowd frustrating the soldiers' pursuit.

Act II. Lillas Pastia's tavern. The prelude (or Entr'acte as it is called) anticipates Don José's entrance song of a little later. A crowd is drinking and smoking, soldiers as well as gipsies like Carmen, Frasquita and Mercédès, who form a trio to sing a Chanson Bohémienne ('Les tringles des sistres tintaient'). The soldiers including Zuniga want to flirt and Carmen elicits from him the information that José has finished his prison sentence. There follows the entry of Escamillo, the matador, attended by an admiring crowd (Toreador's Song). He is plainly attracted to Carmen, but she brushes him off, at least for the moment, and, when he has gone, she does the same to Zuniga, all for love of José, whom she expects at any moment in the inn.

Lillas Pastia shuts the inn, and smugglers in the persons of Dancairo and Remendado emerge as it were from the woodwork, and in a quintet of outstanding brilliance plan with the three gipsies the immediate future. Frasquita and Mercédès will of course join that night's foray, but Carmen says she has unfinished business: she is in love and they must go without her. They can't believe it and protest, but to no avail.

The sound of José's voice is heard outside (singing the melody of the Entr'acte), and Carmen sets about seducing him with a dance, interrupted to her fury when José hears the bugle sound 'retreat'. He must obey what amounts to an order and Carmen rounds on him, silenced only when he pours out his feelings in the so-called Flower Song ('La fleur que tu m'avais jetée'), a declaration of love wrung from the very heart. Carmen returns to the attack ('Non! tu ne m'aimes pas!') and embarks on an attempt to get him to join the outlaws ('Là-bas, là-bas, dans la montagne'). Don José is already almost in the net when Zuniga barges his way in, to be defied by José and disarmed by smugglers attracted by the noise of the fight. Don José has drawn his sword against a superior officer and has no option but to join the smugglers' band.

Act III. A rocky spot on the frontier. An Entr'acte of ethereal beauty, all solo wind and strings, has little relevance to the action, which involves the smugglers preparing to reconnoitre their route and starts with a big-scale ensemble with chorus. José cannot easily accept that he is a deserter; Carmen hints that their affair is winding down. Frasquita and Mercédès spread the cards and Carmen joins them to read her fortune. She foresees death and her fatalistic creed means she cannot evade it: 'En vain pour éviter'. The smugglers prepare to move off, the three girls, in a passage of high swagger and to José's jealous indignation, promising to take care of the guards.

José is left on watch and is out of sight when Micaela, led by a guide, comes to look for him. Her aria ('Je dis que rien ne m'épouvante') is a beautiful lyrical invention, but Micaela hides when José takes an unsuccessful shot at a stranger. Escamillo has come looking for a girl he admits he fancies, but it is not long before he squares up to José, the dragoon Carmen (he has heard) once loved. As Escamillo slips and looks likely to lose, their fight is interrupted by the returning smugglers. Escamillo and Carmen exchange glances, and he invites the whole band to the Corrida in Seville.

Carmen (Metropolitan Opera House, New York, c. 1900). Emma Calvé (1858–1942) as Carmen.

Micaela is discovered and Carmen advises José to comply with her plea to go to his dying mother. José is frantic ('Dût-il m'en coûter la vie') in one of the score's most dramatic incidents, but the act ends with the reiteration of Escamillo's song.

Act IV. Outside the bullring in Seville. The Entr'acte is a Spanish dance. Crowd animation precedes the entry of the various elements of the quadrilla (the music of the prelude to Act I), and eventually the crowd hails Escamillo himself. He embraces Carmen ('Si tu m'aimes, Carmen') and she is warned by Frasquita and Mercédès that José is lurking in the crowd. She confronts him alone but will not listen as his pleas turn to threats. To the sound of applause for the victorious Escamillo, she hurls at José the ring he once gave her. He stabs her and surrenders as the crowd starts to leave.

H.

DAVID BLAKE

(born 2 September 1936)

A pupil of Hanns Eisler's in East Berlin, David Blake was Professor of Music at York University before being commissioned to write for English National Opera following the success in 1972 of his cantata Lumina. Toussaint was composed between 1973 and 1976 and is a historical epic on a scale inspired perhaps by Prokofiev's War and Peace, which was in E.N.O.'s repertory at the time. Its success was mitigated by what was thought of as limited pace and excessive length and the 1983 revival was considerably shortened. His second opera, the conversation piece The Plumber's Gift, was in sharp contrast and, in spite of admiration for its musical quality, gained rather less success.

TOUSSAINT, OR THE ARISTOCRACY OF THE SKIN

Opera in three acts and twenty-two scenes, text by Anthony Ward. Première, English National Opera, London, 28 September 1977, with Sarah Walker, Neil Howlett, conductor Mark Elder, producer David Pountney.

Toussaint Bréda, a black slave Baritone
 Suzanne, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
 Boukman, a Voudoun priest Bass
 Moïse, Toussaint's nephew Bass
 Jean François Tenor
 Dessalines, a black general Baritone
 Mars Plaisir, a mulatto, Toussaint's valet Tenor Bayon de Libertat, a fussy old French colon,
Toussaint's master Tenor
 Madame de Libertat, his wife Soprano
 Christine, a rich mulatto, passing as white Soprano
 Boucannier, a French colon Baritone
 Laveaux, French general Bass
 Darban, a French colon Bass
 Bricard, a French colon Tenor
 Millet, delegate of the Colonial Assembly Tenor
 Sonthonax, French Chief Commissioner Tenor
 Napoleon Bonaparte, First Consul Baritone
 Pauline Leclerc, Napoleon's sister Soprano

Leclerc, French General Tenor French Colons, Commissioners, Generals, Members of the National Convention; Spanish Generals; Black Soldiers, Servants

Place: Saint Domingue (later Haiti)

Time: 1791–1803

Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

The story is concerned with Toussaint's successful revolt against the French on the island of Saint Domingue, and his gradual decline, due partly to his own arrogance, partly to the alienating as well as corrupting effect of power. After his early triumph, the story develops into a struggle between Toussaint and Napoleon, and ends with the betrayal of Toussaint. Composer and librettist use a Brechtian device in the person of Mars Plaisir as dispassionate (often spoken) commentator on events.

Act I, scene i. 1791. Toussaint does the accounts. Elsewhere, a Voudoun Priest chants and three self-appointed leaders proclaim revolt.

Scene ii. Toussaint deplores violence, advises his master and mistress to escape, then himself joins the revolutionaries.

Scene iii. Life in a society based on slavery: a rich mulatto woman is accused of illegally dressing like a white woman; in spite of her spirited defence, the 'poor whites' kill her.

Scene iv. Jean François and Toussaint discuss the possibility of coming to terms with the French. Jean François's willingness to compromise is noted.

Scene v. French commissioners demand unconditional surrender, which Toussaint refuses, and for good measure has Jean François shot.

Scene vi. General Laveaux, a soldier of integrity and Republican principles, opts not to fight the black insurgents.

Scene vii. In the National Assembly in Paris, Millet's speech in favour of slavery and its benefits is fiercely interrupted.

Scene viii. Toussaint and his wife Suzanne movingly discuss the realities of his new position, unable to trust even his friends, uncertain whether to ally himself to Spanish or English, King or Republic.

Scene ix. Sonthonax proclaims the emancipation of slaves.

Scene x. Toussaint, once in league with the Spanish, repudiates the alliance.

Scene xi. In April 1796, Laveaux announces Toussaint's appointment as French Lieutenant Governor; Dessalines and Moïse mistrust the latest turn of events. Toussaint's sons will be educated under French protection in Paris. Suzanne protests it is a trick; Toussaint agrees but can see no way out of a trap. Suzanne laments.

Act II, scene i. July 1801. At a reception, Toussaint vigorously proclaims the need for economic discipline. Mars is now his valet. Moïse is unconvinced: 'The voice of the politician takes the place of the voice of the people.' Over Quadrilles, Toussaint questions a Frenchman as to Napoleon's attitude to Saint Domingue. Toussaint, Moïse and Suzanne mull over the situation.

Scene ii. Paris. Napoleon decides to invade Saint Domingue. Leclerc will lead, Toussaint's sons and Napoleon's sister will sail with the fleet. Leclerc will publicly confirm Toussaint's status but must clandestinely restore slavery and capture Toussaint.

Scene iii. Moïse revolts against Toussaint, who orders his execution. Moïse cogently argues that the revolution has lost the very people for whom it was intended. Dessalines announces the arrival of a well-armed French fleet.

Scene iv. In her apartment at Port-au-Prince,

Pauline (scantily dressed, says the libretto, 'as in Canova's sculpture') bitchs about the boredom of a military wife. She and her maids sing a so-called 'Chant du Sens interdit'.

Scene v. The battle of Crête à Pierrot. Toussaint leaves Dessalines in charge while he goes to fight in the south. Dessalines's rabble-raising speech does the trick and battle is prepared. Suzanne volunteers to tend the wounded. Battle continues, the noise abates and Suzanne is left with the wounded.

Scene vi. Toussaint makes his sons choose between the French and the Black causes.

Scene vii. A fresh attack is expected. Women lament but all again take up battle positions.

Act III, scene i. April 1802. An uneasy truce; the people are miserable, Toussaint is growing old, Dessalines has defected and is bargaining for what he can get out of it.

Scene ii. Toussaint and Suzanne have retired to his estate, where he laments the way things have gone, the people theoretically free but the land uncultivated. He allows the French to arrest him. He and Suzanne in canon take a last desolate farewell of each other.

Scene iii. April 1803. Toussaint, in prison in the Jura Mountains, is looked after by Mars but dies of cold, alone and betrayed.

Scene iv. December 1803. The French have withdrawn; Dessalines, decked out in French finery, proclaims the first Black Republic – with himself as Emperor!

H.

MARC BLITZSTEIN

(born 2 March 1905, died 22 January 1964)

REGINA

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer from Lillian Hellman's play The Little Foxes. Première Shubert Theater, New Haven, Connecticut, 6 October 1949; New York, 46th Street Theater, 1949. Première in 'operatic' scoring, New York City Center, 1953, with Brenda Lewis as Regina, Ellen Faull, Lucretia West, William Wilderman, conductor Julius Rudel. First performed Houston, 1980, with Maralin Niska, Elizabeth Carron, Jennifer Jones, Giorgio Tozzi (Ben), Don Garrard (Horace), conductor John DeMain; Chicago, 1982; Wolf Trap, Virginia, 1982; Scottish Opera, 1991, with Katherine Terrell, Nan Christie, McCue, conductor Mauceri.

Regina Giddens.....Soprano
Alexandra Giddens (Zan), her daughter.....Soprano
Birdie Hubbard, Oscar's wife.....Soprano
Addie, Regina's housekeeper.....Contralto
Horace Giddens, Regina's husband.....Bass
Benjamin Hubbard, Regina's elder brother.....Baritone
Oscar Hubbard, Regina's younger brother.....Baritone
Leo Hubbard, Birdie and Oscar's son.....Tenor
Cal, Regina's house man.....Baritone

William Marshall, a businessman from the North Tenor
 Jabez, trumpeter in the Angel Band Baritone
 John Bagtry, an old flame of Regina's Silent
 Belle Silent

The Angel Band; a Chamber Trio; Townspeople

Place: The Town of Bowden, Alabama

Time: 1900

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Though his training was cosmopolitan and included study with Nadia Boulanger in Paris and Arnold Schoenberg in Berlin, Blitzstein's apprenticeship was served in the American theatre. He believed that all art is inevitably propaganda, and that conviction is the foundation of his operas as of his plays with music. The Cradle Will Rock (1936) was once banned for political reasons but on its first appearance became a Broadway hit, produced by Orson Welles and John Houseman, and, to beat the ban, with the composer playing the instrumental parts on the piano (it was not heard with orchestra until 1947). Popular music was the opera's foundation, as it was too for the play with music, No for an Answer, which followed it in 1941.

Regina was conceived on a much grander scale, and its orchestration eventually enlarged for operatic as opposed to theatrical performance. For all its sidelong glances at Broadway and the 'hit' tune, it is one of the most successful operas to come out of America. Revivals have been more rather than less successful than the original performances and Regina has found favour with critics as well as audiences. Its subject is American but that should no more inhibit performance outside the United States than the same quality has inhibited foreign production of Arthur Miller's plays.

Bowden, Alabama, is in the Deep South of America, and the action takes place on the veranda of the Giddens' house as well as in its living-room and ball-room.

Prologue. The Prokofiev-like violence of the prelude contrasts at curtain-rise with the gentle mood of an Alabama spring morning, adumbrated by Addie's leading of spiritual singing (black life and music stand in Regina for the ideals of the Good Life, the Hubbard men represent corruption, and the Deep South in general the decay of capitalism). Cal and Alexandra add their voices to the music, which turns to relaxed ragtime before Regina is heard demanding to know what the racket is, and peace retreats before her.

Act I. An orchestral introduction takes us to the dinner party Regina is giving for a visitor from the North, William Marshall, with whom she and her brothers intend to make a business deal which will safeguard the fortunes of the Hubbard clan. Birdie in an arietta (complete with cadenza) considers the pleasures of listening to music, something to which her father and mother were addicted. Mr Marshall seemed to appreciate hearing about it, she thinks, but her husband nonetheless berates her for taking up too much of their visitor's time.

The others come out, and their small talk is carried on partly through stylised and unaccompanied singing, partly in pregnant arioso, and partly in straight speech (Blitzstein throughout Regina achieves a successful solution to the perennial operatic problem of conveying information). Regina in an arietta hymns the virtues of old-fashioned gallantry, reference is made to the Hubbards having taken over the land (and the daughter) of the previous owners, and all drink to the new firm of Hubbard Sons and Marshall, Birdie touching a top D flat in her by now slightly sozzled enthusiasm. Goodbyes are said to an allegro grazioso, and after a moment of contented vocalising, Regina and her brothers celebrate con fuoco what they are all convinced is a 'big, rich' future. Regina dreams of shopping, but her enthusiasm tails off as Ben, acknowledged leader of the family, calls them to order: 'I am waiting'.

Regina must put up her share of the capital, the brothers insist, but Regina knows they can't raise enough without her and wants more than the straight one-third she is entitled to. Ben offers forty per cent for her share and Horace's, and says it will come out of Oscar's portion. To keep it all in the family, they start to plan a marriage between Regina's innocent daughter, Zan, and Leo, the feckless, not to say brutish, son of Oscar and Birdie. Zan shall set off to Baltimore now, says Regina, to fetch her father from hospital, where he is having treatment for a severe heart condition. Zan must tell him it is she who misses him and wants him back. Regina's aria is jazzy in tone to begin with, moving to 6/8 later, and in it she professes to admire her daughter's spirit in not giving in to her mother's wishes without at least some show of independence, a quality no one could think missing in Regina herself.

Birdie spills the beans to Zan about the marriage plans, and Zan speculates in an arietta about love and marriage (Zan is adolescent and there is perhaps less sense of character here than in ensembles, dialogue or the opera's satirical sections). Birdie much prefers Zan to her own son and the idea of their marriage is abhorrent to her, but her unbuttoned tongue earns her as the curtain falls a resounding and far from metaphorical slap from her husband.

Act II. Regina in a state of over-excitement waits for the start of the party she is giving to welcome Marshall back to Alabama. Above everything, when will Zan bring her father home to Bowden?

Leo's pleasure-conscious outlook and disinclination to take life seriously come over well in an attractive *scherzando*¹ scene with his father Oscar, who reads him a lecture about working harder. Leo lets drop the information that he has opened his Uncle Horace's safe deposit box and seen the bonds it contains – $88,000 worth, no less. Uncle Horace himself never looks inside it. Might he perhaps lend them the bonds, wonders Oscar; he wouldn't in any case miss them. From the knowing nature of Leo's music, in Blitzstein's best showbiz manner, it's hard to believe that the penny won't drop with him, but Oscar seems to think it hasn't.

Addie helps Horace into the room. He doesn't look at all well. Horace stops them announcing his return; now that he is home, he wants to savour it for a moment, but all that goes out of the window the moment he hears about the plot to marry off Zan. The others offer hypocritical greetings, and it is time for the confrontation between Horace and Regina. They both seem disposed to try to avoid quarrelling, Horace describing himself as an old dry-bones, and Regina in her rather soft-grained arietta attempting to maintain the mood. Horace admits he can't last very long, but this starts them quarrelling – about his infidelities, about her ten-year-long refusal of her bed which caused them. Regina wants him to talk business with Ben, but Horace would like to wait until tomorrow. Ben is beginning to explain the deal with Marshall when Horace feels an attack coming on and starts upstairs, just as the possibilities of the safe deposit dawn on Leo. Zan assumes that, with her father in a bad way, the party will be postponed, but that is the last thing in Regina's mind.

The scene changes to the ballroom, and the turning point of the opera, as Wilfrid Mellers says when 'the tension explodes in music that is also dramatic action. The piano on stage, playing ("in the style of Louis Moreau Gottschalk") prettied arpeggios in the fancy key of B major, is the tawdrily elegant façade behind which lurks the fury. This breaks out first in the chorus of merrymakers ... in E flat (which has become the stock key of Tin Pan Alley) ... the tune is both brutal and banal, its pulsing rhythm crude.' The guests relish the Hubbards' hospitality but detest the hosts, who have cheated and double-crossed each and every one of them. So the toast is 'Sing. Eat. Gobble. Guzzle. Swill. Perish. Rot. For what? For Hubbard!'

Horace instructs his lawyer to bring his safe-deposit in the morning so that he can make a new will; there is talk between the Hubbard menfolk about the chances of Leo pulling off the coup with Horace's bonds, after which polite salon music gives way to a jazz band.

Oscar attempts, on orders from Ben, to be nice to Birdie but only succeeds in putting her down once again, and it is left to the gentle, compassionate Addie to comfort her in a slow, low-lying lullaby of real beauty. Regina flirts with an old beau, more to hurt Horace than out of genuine interest. In her bravura aria, Regina makes no bones about being the most important person in her own life and valuing Things above People – and when she hears Leo and Ben reassure Marshall that the money is to hand and the deal on, her astonishment and expositions are drowned in the brilliance of the choral Gallop. Through its whirling vulgarity Horace can be heard: 'It's a great day when you and Ben cross swords', but Regina gets the last word, on a top C: 'I hope you die soon. I'll be waiting.'

Act III. Next afternoon. The act begins with a gentle orchestral adagietto, followed by the Rain Quartet. The four people in the opera on the side of the angels – Birdie, Zan, Addie and Horace – luxuriate in spring and listen contentedly to the sound of the rain peacefully falling. Theirs is gentle, sophisticated music of great potency, quick and light in tempo but unemphatic in manner except in its frank enjoyment of company, agreeable weather and an absence of immediate worries. Horace for once feels well (his solo in the middle of the quartet: 'Consider the rain') and just before the quartet ends, there is interruption from gospel singing at the back of the house. Nonetheless, the quartet finishes on a note of confidence, the opera's highpoint, and 'musically Blitzstein's most mature affirmation, and the most beautiful and original music he (had) so far created'.¹

¹ In Music in a New Found Land, Wilfrid Mellers has observed that 'the nastiest characters in Regina have a bastardised musical idiom hovering between jazz and the nineteenth-century salon'.

The Rain Quartet gives way to Birdie's confession aria. People say she gets headaches, but she knows she drinks – in order to remember her mother, her home at Lionnet, and singing, and in order to forget the horrors of the Hubbards, her beastly son and the husband who married her for her inheritance, for Lionnet. It is a moment not only of nostalgia but of lyrical self-revelation, a twentieth-century high coloratura soliloquy of power and truth. Zan takes her arm and guides her home – not, sadly, to Lionnet.

It is a time for revelation. Horace asks Addie to take Zan away after he is dead; he will make this possible by means of the legacy he had always planned for Addie. When Regina comes in, Horace tells her that he has discovered Leo has taken the bonds, and that without knowing it, they have already invested in Hubbard Sons and Marshall. Regina is instantly convinced they have Ben and Oscar in their hands, but Horace counters by saying he will tell the world the bonds are a loan from her – what's more, they are all she's getting in his will. His arietta is passionate but muted; by contrast Regina's aria ('You hate me very much') is a lot more vehement. She says she has always been confident he would die first. 'Horace,' she says, 'I've always been lucky.'

Horace can take no more, has an attack, and Regina sends for the doctor. But with her brothers, the upper hand is once more hers. Her terms are simple: while Horace lives, she tells the others they are safe. But when he dies, as she expects him to, she wants seventy-five per cent in exchange for the bonds – without which the deal with Marshall cannot be completed. If they refuse, it is jail.

Ben is trying to joss her out of it when they hear Addie keening on the stairs. Zan erupts in passionate grief – what was her father doing on the stairs? Regina in an aria appears to regain the initiative: either she gets the money or she will prosecute. Ben acts the good loser and all seems settled.

But the last word is Zan's. She will be going away and nothing her mother can do will stop her. That is what her father would have wanted her to do, and, to the sound of 'Certainly, Lord', she and Addie stare out of the window as Regina in defeat goes upstairs. H.

² Mellers: Op. cit.

FRANÇOIS ADRIEN BOÏELDIEU

(born 16 December 1775, died 8 October 1834)

LA DAME BLANCHE

The White Lady

Opera in three acts, text by Scribe, founded on Scott's Guy Mannering and The Monastery. Première at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, 10 December 1825, with Rigaud, Boulanger, Ponchard, Henry. First performed Drury Lane, London, 1826 (in English); Haymarket, 1834 (in German); New York, 1827 (in French). Revived Metropolitan, 1904, with Gadske, Naval, conductor Mottl; Paris, 1925, with Féraldy, Villabella; Brussels, 1936; London, Philopera Circle, 1955; Toulouse, 1961; Ghent and Bordeaux, 1963, the latter with Michel Sénéchal; Opéra-Comique, 1997, with Raphanel, Kunde, conductor Minkowski.

Gaveston, steward to the late Comte d'Avenel.....Bass
 Anna, his ward.....Soprano
 George Brown, a young English officer.....Tenor
 Dickson, tenant on the estate.....Tenor
 Jenny, his wife.....Soprano
 Marguerite, old servant of the Comte d'Avenel.....Soprano

Gabriel, employed by Dickson Bass
 MacIrton, Justice of the Peace Bass

Place: Scotland

Time: 1759

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

La Dame Blanche had one of the most successful premières in all operatic history, and still stands as one of the notable hits in the history of opéra-comique. The 1,000th performance at the Opéra-Comique in Paris was in 1862, the 1,675th in 1914. It was revived at the Opéra-Comique for the centenary in 1925 with Féraldy and Villabella and, notwithstanding a lack of sparkle in the libretto, remains a distinguished example of opéra-comique for the period.

Act I. In front of Dickson's house. Dancing and singing are in progress in honour of the christening of Dickson's small child. George Brown arrives, makes himself known as an officer in the King's service, and accepts to take the place of the child's missing godfather. He enquires about the history of the castle of Avenel, which dominates the countryside, and is told that, among other things, it boasts a ghost, not a malicious one, but a female, known as 'the White Lady', whose special office is to protect her sex from false-hearted suitors. Everyone believes in her, and most are firmly convinced that one time or another they have seen her. Dickson is summoned to meet her that very night, and, in spite of his very definite fears, he dare not disobey. George offers to go in his stead, and the offer is gratefully accepted. They wish him godspeed.

Act II. A Gothic room in the Castle. It is only half-lit and Marguerite is sitting there spinning. Anna comes in to tell Marguerite something of the story of the old Count's missing heir, whom Gaveston is thought to have spirited away so as to obtain the castle for himself. Gaveston tries unsuccessfully to discover from Anna where the Countess hid the treasure before she died. There is a ring at the door-bell and Gaveston says he will not allow anyone to enter; but Anna pleads with him – has he not enemies enough without making any more? She believes that it is Dickson, come at the order of the 'white lady' (for it is Anna who appears as the ghost, and who has summoned Dickson, hoping through him to prevent the castle falling into Gaveston's hands). Anna tells Gaveston that she will the next day reveal the Countess's secret if he will allow the traveller in. Marguerite opens the doors.

George Brown, who has come in Dickson's place, says that he has heard that the castle has a ghost, and he would like to have the opportunity of seeing it. He is left alone in the great room, stokes up the fire, and sings a serenade, hoping to entice the ghost to appear. She does, in the person of Anna, who to her amazement discovers that it is George Brown and recognises him as a wounded officer she had once nursed and grown fond of. He is astonished that the ghost should know such details of his past – he has been trying ever since to find his benefactress, with whom he fell in love – and promises that he will perform whatever she orders on the morrow.

She disappears and Gaveston invites George to stay for the auction which is about to take place. Jenny and Dickson ply George with questions, but he reveals nothing of what he has seen.

Dickson has been charged by his fellow farmers to bid as high as he dare in order to prevent the castle falling into Gaveston's hands. The bidding rises, Dickson is obliged to drop out, but George Brown comes into the reckoning. He is about to give up when the sight of Anna spurs him to greater efforts, and eventually the castle is knocked down to George. He must pay, says the justice, by midday. Gaveston is beside himself with fury.

Act III. The same room. Anna and Marguerite discuss the whereabouts of a certain statue of the 'white lady' in which, says Anna, all the family money was once hidden. Marguerite remembers a secret passage, and they go off to explore it. The crowd meanwhile assembles to do honour to the new owner, and sings a version of the old Scottish tune 'Robin Adair', which he recognises and is able to finish.

Gaveston asks George for some explanation of his extraordinary behaviour of that morning; has he the money to pay for the castle? No, says George, but the 'white lady' will provide it. George leaves and his place is taken by MacIrton, a friend of Gaveston's who warns him that the lost son of the house has turned up in England and now goes under the name of George Brown. Anna, in hiding, overhears.

Just before midday, MacIrton comes with representatives of the law to collect the money; George asks for time to communicate with the white lady, who is financing the whole transaction. Anna appears in the guise of the white lady, bringing the treasure chest with her – she has found it after all.

Moreover she declares that George Brown is the missing heir to the estates of Avenel.

The freshness of the tunes, the effervescent personalities at work in it – these qualities seem to survive the passing of years as far as La Dame Blanche is concerned. Such passages as George's invigorating 'Ah, quel plaisir d'être soldat', the agreeable ballad of 'la dame blanche' sung by Jenny and Dickson, and the charming allegretto section of the duet in Act II for Anna and George – these have the lightness of touch and distinction that even now personify the expression 'Opéra-comique'. Anna's aria at the beginning of Act III has an almost Weber-like feeling about it. The figure of George Brown himself is particularly attractive, his part in the action romantic, debonair and devil-may-care and yet never for a moment going against the logic of the drama. Highly successful are his two romantic solos, the one in Act II when he is waiting for the ghost to appear ('Viens gentille dame'), the other equally charming when he tries to catch the tune of 'Robin Adair' as the chorus starts to sing it in Act III.

H.

ARRIGO BOITO

(born 24 February 1842, died 10 June 1918)

MEFISTOFELE

Mephistopheles

Opera in a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue, words by the composer. Première at la Scala, Milan, 5 March 1868, with Reboux, Flory, Spallazzi Junca. Revised version produced at Bologna, 1875, with Borghi-Mamo, Campanini, Nannetti, with great success. First performed at Her Majesty's Theatre, London, 1880, with Christine Nilsson, Campanini, Nannetti, conductor Arditì; New York, 1880, with Valleria, Campanini, Novara; Metropolitan, New York, 1883, with Nilsson, Campanini, Mirabella; revived there 1889, with Lilli Lehmann, 1896, with Calvé, 1907, with Farrar, Martin, Chaliapin; Covent Garden, 1914, with Muzio, Raisa, McCormack, Didur; 1926, with Scacciati, Merli, Chaliapin; la Scala, 1918, with Cannetti, Gigli, de Angelis, conductor Toscanini; 1934, with Caniglia, Bruna Rasa, Masini, Pinza; 1952, with Tebaldi, Martinis, Tagliavini, Rossi-Lemeni, conductor de Sabata; Metropolitan, 1920, with Alda, Easton, Gigli, Didur; San Francisco, 1952, with Sayao, Fenn, Tagliavini, Rossi-Lemeni; Chicago, 1961, with Ligabue, Christa Ludwig, Bergonzi, Christoff; Sadler's Wells (Welsh National Opera), 1957, with Herincx; 1987, Genoa, with Burchaladze in a Ken Russell production which caused a scandal; 1989, San Francisco, with Beňačková, O'Neill, Ramey; 1991, Chicago, with Millo, Kristiansson, Ramey.

Mefistofele (Mephistopheles).....Bass
Faust.....Tenor
Margherita.....Soprano
Martha.....Contralto
Wagner.....Tenor
Elena (Helen of Troy).....Soprano
Pantalis.....Mezzo-Soprano

Nereo.....Tenor

Mystic Choir, Cherubs, Penitents, Wayfarers, Men-at-Arms, Huntsmen, Students, Citizens, Witches, Greek Chorus, Sirens, Naiads, Dancers, Warriors

Place: Frankfurt; Vale of Tempe; Ancient Greece

Time: Middle Ages

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

The history of Arrigo Boito's two operas (as opposed to his several, mostly successful, libretti for other composers) is full of surprises, even contradictions. He seems to have settled on two subjects, Goethe's Faust and the Roman Emperor Nero, while still a student and to have worked on them throughout his life. Mefistofele was a disastrous failure at la Scala in 1868, only two years after he had returned from service as a volunteer with Garibaldi's forces in 1866, partly perhaps because the composer's refusal to sanction the cuts insisted upon by the conductor, who had also been his teacher at the Milan Conservatory, led not only to the latter's withdrawal but his replacement by the inexperienced Boito himself. Revision not only shortened the opera but restored the title role from baritone to tenor, and the result was a considerable success, in Bologna this time rather than Milan. Further revision initiated a process of constant tinkering with work in hand that was to dominate the composer's other great preoccupation, his opera Nerone, which had still not reached a final version at the composer's death over forty years after the rehabilitation of Mefistofele.

Toscanini championed both operas, conducting the première of Nerone at la Scala in 1924, including the Prologue of Mefistofele in many concert programmes, and choosing it, together with Act III of the same opera and an act of Nerone, for his solitary postwar operatic appearance in a mixed bill at la Scala in June 1948.

Boito was anything but a dilettante composer, and his two operas were worked and re-worked with diligence and skill. But the fact remains that these two operas, together with half a dozen early works of little significance, comprise his entire oeuvre. At least ten libretti written for other composers suggest that the written word came more easily than music to this nevertheless highly gifted man.

Prologue. Announced in a slow prelude with frequent trumpet calls, it opens in space, populated by invisible legions of angels, cherubs and seraphs, who raise their voices in a hymn of praise to the Creator. Mefistofele, heralded by scherzo music, addresses God ('Ave Signor!') and sardonically offers to wager that he can win the soul of Faust. God through the chorus assents, and cherubim (a boys' chorus) and finally a group of penitents return to their chorus of praise, bringing to an end a movement which contains little action but plenty of drama through music – the very stuff of opera.

Act I. Frankfurt. Easter is being celebrated, a Cavalcade with the Elector at its head passes by, and the aged Dr Faust and his pupil Wagner shadowed by a mysterious grey friar make their entrance. Wagner thinks nothing of him but Faust senses something supernatural. The scene changes to Faust's study where his thoughts turn to eternal peace ('Dai campi, dai prati'), only to be interrupted by a shriek from the friar, who throws off his disguise and impressively declares himself as the spirit of negation ('Son lo spirito che nega sempre'). He offers in exchange for Faust's soul to serve him on earth, and Faust agrees to the bargain ('Se tu mi doni un' ora di riposo'), whereupon Mefistofele spreads his cloak and both disappear through the air.

Act II. A garden. Faust (rejuvenated and under the name of Henry) is strolling with Margherita, her friend Martha, and Mefistofele. Margherita agrees to meet him and he provides her with a sleeping draught for her mother. It is a scene of some charm and contains Faust's solo, 'Colma il tuo cor d'un palpito', and a quartet of farewell.

Scene ii. The heights of the Brocken mountain. Faust watches the orgies of the Witches' Sabbath. The Witches present a glass globe, reflected in which Mefistofele sees the earth which in a grand soliloquy he despises: 'Ecco il mondo' (Behold the earth). The Witches dance and Faust sees a vision of Margherita, her throat encircled by a blood-red necklace. The act ends in a witches' orgy.

Act III. In prison. Margherita lies on a heap of straw. She has drowned her baby, her mind is wandering and her lament is heart-felt: 'L'altra notte in fondo al mare'. Mefistofele and Faust appear outside her cell and Faust begs for Margherita's life. Mefistofele opens the prison door.

Margherita thinks her jailers have come to release her, but recognises her lover. She begs him to let her die beside her baby and her mother, whom she is accused of poisoning, but finally consents to flee with Faust; in some distant place they might yet be happy: 'Lontano, sui flutti d'un ampio oceano'. Mefistofele's voice recalls her to reality. She prays to Heaven for mercy ('Spunta l'aurora pallida') and dies. Voices of the celestial choir (as in the Prologue) sing softly, 'She's saved!' Faust and Mefistofele escape as the executioner appears in the background.

Act IV. Mefistofele takes Faust to the shores of the Vale of Tempe, where Helen and Pantis hymn the rising moon. Faust is ravished with the beauty of the scene, while Mefistofele remarks that the orgies of the Brocken were more to his taste.

It is the night of the Classical Sabbath. A band of young maidens appears, singing and dancing, much to the annoyance of Mefistofele, who retires. Helen enters and rehearses the story of Troy's destruction. Kneeling before Helen, Faust addresses her as his ideal of beauty and purity ('Forma ideal purissima') and in a rapturous duet they pledge love and devotion ('Ah! Amore! misterio celeste').

Epilogue. Faust's study. Once more an old man, Faust feels death approaching, his last dream filling his mind ('Giunto sul passo estremo'). It is his farewell to life but Mefistofele fears Faust may yet escape him and urges him to new adventures. He hesitates, then seizing the Bible, cries, 'Here at last I find salvation', and dies to the sound of a celestial choir.

NERONE

Nero

Opera in four acts, text by the composer. Première at la Scala, Milan, 1 May 1924, with Raisa, Bertana, Pertile, Galeffi, Journet, Pinza, conductor Toscanini. First performed Rome, 1928, with Scacciati, Bertana, Lauri-Volpi, Franci, Maugeri, conductor Marinuzzi; Buenos Aires, 1926, with Arangi-Lombardi, Bertana, Pertile, Franci, Formichi, Pinza, conductor Marinuzzi. Revived la Scala, 1939, with Cigna, Stignani, Voyer, Sved, conductor Marinuzzi; Rome, 1950, with Annaloro; RAI, Turin, 1975, conductor Gavazzeni; Carnegie Hall, New York (in concert), 1982, conductor Eve Queler.

Nerone (Nero), Emperor of Rome.....Tenor
 Simon Mago, a sorcerer.....Baritone
 Fanuèl, a Christian leader.....Baritone
 Asteria.....Soprano
 Rubria, a Vestal Virgin.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Tigellino, follower of Nero.....Bass
 Gobrias, follower of Simon Mago.....Tenor
 Dositèò, a Roman.....Baritone
 Pèrside, a Christian.....Soprano
 Cerinto.....Contralto

Place: Rome and Nearby

Time: c. 60 A.D.

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Act I. The Appian Way. Simon Mago and Tigellino are waiting for Nero on his way to bury the ashes of his mother, Agrippina, whom he has murdered. He arrives almost penitent but for the fact that in the Oresteia he finds a precedent for matricide. He has heard an unearthly voice saying 'I am Orestes', and he finds comfort in the thought that he is the reincarnation of Orestes. He apostrophises the grave where the ashes of Agrippina must be buried: 'Queste ad un lido fatal'. Simon Mago gives him absolution. Just as the rite is ending the figure of a woman, whose neck is encircled by snakes, seems to rise from the ground. Nero flees, but Simon stays and boldly challenges her.

The newcomer is Asteria, who loves Nero and follows him everywhere. Simon believes she may be of use to him and promises to bring her to Nero if she will do his bidding. Simon descends to the crypt where the Christians gather, while two Christians, Rubria and Fanuèl, meet above. Rubria loves Fanuèl, but Fanuèl has no other thought than his mission. Rubria recites the Lord's Prayer, watched by Asteria. When the two Christians see their arch-enemy, Simon, issuing from the crypt, Rubria is sent to warn the others, while Fanuèl remains to face whatever danger there is. But Simon has no hostile intentions. He sees the old world going to ruin and now offers power and wealth to Fanuèl if Fanuèl will but teach him how to work miracles. The music at this point works in the traditional 'intonation' of the Credo. Fanuèl, dreaming of a world in which neither power nor wealth has a share, indignantly refuses. The two must henceforth be enemies.

The news of Nero's return has reached Rome and a great procession comes to meet him. A scene of triumph closes the act.

Act II. The temple of Simon Mago. The stage is divided into two by the altar where Simon pretends to work a miracle. The faithful worship and pray; Simon's adepts laugh and count their gains. The mock ceremony over, Simon prepares the temple for the expected visit of Nero. To persuade the Emperor that Simon can work miracles, Asteria will pretend to be a goddess; echoes must be arranged, mirrors placed so as to make it appear that phantoms visit the temple. Nero addresses the supposed goddess: 'Oh, come viene a errar'. Everything follows the appointed course until Nero touches Asteria and the goddess reveals herself as a woman. In vain the metallic voice of the oracle is heard warning Nero. The Emperor no longer fears these gods. He calls to his guards, who arrest Simon and set about destroying the temple. Standing over the ruins, Nero takes a cithara and sings.

Act III. In an orchard away from the noise of Rome the Christians meet and their leader, Fanuèl, expounds the Beatitudes; Rubria tells the parable of the foolish virgins in music of utmost suavity. Asteria has escaped from her prison house to warn them that Simon has tried to purchase freedom by betraying the Christians to Nero. Rubria urges Fanuèl to fly but he refuses. Two beggars come to them in the darkness; they are Simon and one of his assistants who have come to spy. Discovering Fanuèl, Simon sends to warn the guards; there is a short scene of considerable power between Fanuèl and Simon Mago. When the guards arrive, Fanuèl orders the Christians to submit. He tells them his journey is ended. As he goes the women make a path of flowers before him. Rubria is left alone while the Christians' hymn dies away in the distance. The whole passage, with its mixture of Christian serenity and dramatic power, is most impressive.

Act IV. The first scene takes place in the 'Oppidum', where the mob has gathered to applaud the victors and abuse the vanquished. Here Simon and Gobrias plot to burn Rome and escape the punishment which awaits Simon. The conspiracy is made known by Tigellino to Nero, who refuses to interfere. He has planned the games; he is determined to succeed and to please the mob; if the mob demands victims it shall have them. Fanuèl is brought in together with other Christians, who go to their martyrdom in the circus.

A vestal demands their pardon. Nero angrily orders the veil to be torn from her. It is Rubria, who has come to help Fanuèl. She too is condemned. The Christians go to their deaths; Simon follows, and then the light of the flames which are consuming the city is seen in the distance.

The second scene takes us to the 'spoliarium', where those who died in the circus are thrown. Asteria and Fanuèl, who, thanks to the fire, have escaped, find Rubria wounded to death. Before dying, she confesses her sin. She was a vestal; she worshipped with the Christians and then returned every day to Vesta. There is time for another confession; she loves Fanuèl. He too loves and now calls her his bride. She asks Fanuèl to tell her once more of Galilee and of the sea on whose shore Christ prayed. Fanuèl obeys, and with that image in her eyes and in her mind, Rubria dies.

Nerone was originally planned in five acts. Boito worked at the opera all his life, adding and cancelling and improving till he wrote on the last page: 'The End: Arrigo Boito and Kronos'.

F. B.

ALEKSANDR PORFIRYEVICH BORODIN

(born 12 November 1834, died 27 February 1887)

PRINCE IGOR

Knyaz Igor

Opera in a prologue and four acts, text by the composer after a play by V.V. Stassov; completed by Rimsky-Korsakov and Glazunov. Première at St Petersburg, 4 November 1890. First performed London, Drury Lane, 1914, with Kousnetzova, Petrenko, Andreev, Chaliapin; Metropolitan, New York, 1915, with Alda, Amato, Didur; Covent Garden, 1919 (in English), with Licette, Thornton, Millar, Edmund Burke, Allin, conductor Coates. Revivals include Berlin, 1930, with Branzell, Roswaenge, Schorr, Scheidl, conductor Blech; Covent Garden, 1935, with Rethberg, Branzell, Kullman, Janssen, Kipnis, conductor Beecham; la Scala, 1940; Vienna, 1947, with Hilde Konetzni, Nikolaidi, Rothmüller, Alsen, conductor Krips; Montreal (EXPO 1967), by Bolshoi Company; New York City Opera, 1969; Opera North, 1982.

Igor Sviatoslavich, *Prince of Seversk*Baritone
 Yaroslavna, *his wife*Soprano
 Vladimir Igorevich, *Igor's son*Tenor Vladimir Yaroslavich, Prince Galitzky,
brother of YaroslavnaBass
 Khan Kontchak } *Polovtsian leaders*Bass
 Khan Gzak }Bass
 Kontchakovna, Kontchak's daughter ...Mezzo-Soprano
 Ovlour, *a Polovtsian*Tenor

Skoula } *Gudok players*Bass
 Eroshka }Tenor
 Yaroslavna's NurseSoprano
 A Young Polovtsian MaidenSoprano

Russian Princes and Princesses, Boyars and their Wives, Russian Warriors, People; Polovtsian
 Chiefs, Kontchakovna's Women, Slaves of Khan
 Kontchak, Russian Prisoners of War, Polovtsian Troops

Place: The Town of Poutivl; the Polovtsian Camp

Time: 1185

Running Time: 3 hours 20 minutes

Borodin, who divided his life between science and music, wrote his opera piece by piece. Rimsky-Korsakov often found him working in his laboratory. 'When he was seated before his retorts, which were filled with colourless gases of some kind, forcing them by means of tubes from one vessel to another, I used to tell him that he was spending his time in pouring water into a sieve. As soon as he was free he would take me to his living-rooms and there we occupied ourselves with music and conversation, in the midst of which Borodin would rush off to the laboratory to make sure that nothing was burning or boiling over, making the corridor ring as he went with some extraordinary passage of ninths or seconds. Then back again for more music and talk.'

Borodin himself wrote: 'In winter I can only compose when I am too unwell to give my lectures. So my friends, reversing the usual custom, never say to me, "I hope you are well" but "I do hope you are ill". At Christmas I had influenza, so I stayed at home and wrote the Thanksgiving Chorus in the last act of Igor.'

He never finished his opera. It was completed by Rimsky-Korsakov and his pupil Glazunov, and three years after his death received its first performance. Borodin never wrote down the overture, but Glazunov heard him play it so frequently that it was easy for him to orchestrate it according to Borodin's wishes. The composer left this note about his opera: 'It is curious to see how all the members of our set agree in praise of my work. While controversy rages amongst us on every other subject, all, so far, are pleased with Igor – Mussorgsky, the ultra-realist, the innovating lyrico-dramatist, Cui, our master, Balakirev, so severe as regards form and tradition, Vladimir Stassov himself, our valiant champion of everything that bears the stamp of novelty or greatness.'

The overture is composed entirely of music heard later. It opens with the music which precedes Igor's great aria in the second act, continues with themes later associated with Kontchak and Kontchakovna, before reaching the impassioned Ex. 1:

and Ex. 2:

Prologue. The market-place of Poutivl, where rules Igor, Prince of Seversk. Although implored to postpone his departure because of an eclipse of the sun, which his people regard as an evil omen, Igor with his son Vladimir departs to pursue the Polovtsi, a Tartar tribe, formerly driven to the plains of the Don by Igor's father, Prince Sviatoslav of Kiev.

Act I. The house of Prince Vladimir Galitzky, brother of Igor's wife, Yaroslavna. Galitzky in Igor's absence has been appointed to govern Poutivl and watch over the Princess Yaroslavna. He is popular with the crowd, on account of his easy-going, profligate ways. In an incisive, vigorous aria, which perfectly sets off his irresponsible character, he makes it clear that he is a man of mettle, and one to be reckoned with.

Some young girls venture into Galitzky's presence to appeal for his help and protection against his hangers-on, who have abducted one of them. He refuses to take any steps in the matter. Skoula and Eroshka, a pair of drunken Gudok players who have deserted from Igor's army, try to stir up the mob against their absent chief. They sing the praises of their patron, Galitzky, and demand rhetorically why he should not become their prince and rule over them.

The scene changes to Yaroslavna's room, where the same party of girls as had failed to enlist Galitzky's sympathy comes to ask for aid. This is preceded by a beautiful, warm arioso passage for Yaroslavna alone. That she is a match for her brother she proves a moment later when he enters her room. She compels him to agree to give up the girl who was abducted.

In the finale, an account is given of the disasters which have befallen Igor – he has been defeated, he and the young prince are prisoners, and the enemy is marching on Poutivl. The alarm bell is sounded, but the act ends on a note of defiance, the loyal boyars swearing to defend Yaroslavna, their Princess.

Act II. The camp of the Polovtsi. In this and the next act, Borodin has been highly successful in giving his music (to our western ears at any rate) something of an oriental colour. Khan Kontchak sings music that is totally different from Galitzky's (although the two roles are often, valuably, sung by the same singer), and Kontchakovna obviously inhabits a different world from Yaroslavna. This difference is immediately apparent when the young Polovtsian maidens sing their languorous song to their mistress. They dance for her, but the day is drawing to a close, and she puts an end to their activities, and herself sings a beautiful nocturne whose languishing, chromatic melody speaks longingly of love.

Kontchakovna sees a group of Russian prisoners coming into the camp, and bids her women give them water to drink. The prisoners sing their thanks, and move on towards captivity, followed by the Polovtsian guards. Prince Vladimir, Igor's son, has already fallen in love with the Khan's daughter, and he expresses his feelings in an aria of exquisite beauty, 'Daylight is fading away'. Kontchakovna tells Vladimir that she is confident her father will not oppose their marriage, but Vladimir is sure Igor will not even consider giving his approval to a match with the daughter of his enemy. They leave as Igor approaches, filled with longing for his homeland, and walks through the camp where he is held prisoner. We hear the music which began the overture. He sings desperately of his past happiness and present misery (Ex. 1), and longs for freedom to re-establish his glory and to ensure the safety of his people. There is tenderness in his reference to Yaroslavna (Ex. 2), but his scena dies away in a mood of despair.

To him comes the Tartar traitor Ovlour, and, in music of insinuating character, offers to help him escape. He refuses – honour prevents him taking such a course, however strong the temptation.

Hardly has Ovlour gone than Khan Kontchak himself appears. In a great bass scena, the Khan offers the Prince anything he may desire to make his captivity less irksome. He looks upon him as an honoured guest, not as a prisoner; will he choose hawks, horses, a finer tent, slaves? Igor answers that nothing in his captivity irks him – only his loss of liberty. Even liberty the Khan will restore him, if he will pledge his word not to make war on him again. Why should they not unite? Together the world would be at their feet. But Igor admits that if he were given his freedom, his first action would be to raise an army and march against the Tartars who threaten the peace of his land. The Khan appears to like his guest's frankness, and gives orders that the dancing slaves should be brought in to perform for their joint entertainment.

Now begin the famous Polovtsian dances, known from frequent performance with or without the chorus (which is in reality an integral part of them), in concert hall, and as a separate ballet. In scope they range from soft enticing melody to harsh vigour, with more than a touch of the barbaric in it. In context, they make a thrilling finale to an act whose varied musical splendours constitute perhaps Borodin's most enduring memorial.

Act III. The prelude is a savage Polovtsian march, augmented by the chorus, accompanying the entrance of Khan Gzak and his warriors, who, like Kontchak, have been victorious over their Russian foes, and who bring in their train a crowd of prisoners. We see the primitive side of Kontchak's character in the vigorous and triumphant aria in which he welcomes his brothers-in-arms and rejoices in the slaughter and devastation they have left behind them. The sound of trumpets announces the division of the spoils, as the two Khans go off to make new plans for their campaigns against the Russians. The Tartars keep up the mood of urgency, but the Russians, when they are left alone by their captors, lament the state into which their country has fallen. Is it not incumbent on Igor, they ask, to escape from captivity and lead his countrymen to revenge and freedom? Igor is persuaded that he must sacrifice honour to duty.

In celebration of their victory, the Polovtsi guards make merry, and it is not long before they are drunk. It is Ovlour's chance. He settles the details of the escape with Igor and Vladimir and arranges to meet them with the horses he has in waiting on the other side of the river. But Kontchakovna has had word that an escape is plotted, and she is full of reproaches, not at the treachery which is planned but that Vladimir should be prepared to leave her without so much as an attempt to take her with him. She pleads that the voice of love should be heard as well as that of duty. Vladimir is undecided, but his father hears what Kontchakovna is suggesting, and a fine trio ensues, in which Igor (to the tune of Ex. 1) opposes his will to Kontchakovna's. The Khan's daughter finally has recourse to a desperate expedient, and rouses the camp. Igor escapes, but Vladimir is left behind in the hands of the Polovtsi.

The Polovtsi pursue Igor, and at first cry for the death of Vladimir, in spite of the pleas of Kontchakovna. However, Kontchak appears on the scene, and admits his admiration for Igor; in his position, he would have followed the same course. In a couple of phrases, he shows both sides of his simple yet complex nature; let them hang the guards who should have prevented Igor's flight, but may Vladimir be spared to live among them as Kontchakovna's husband, and their ally. A chorus of praise to Kontchak brings the act to an end.

Act IV. The city walls and public square of Poutivl. Yaroslavna laments her lost happiness. Her plaintive phrases eventually give way to the passionate theme associated with Igor's love for her (Ex. 2). After the extensive scena for Yaroslavna, who sits absorbed in her gloomy thoughts, some peasants pass by, also full of woe.

But the tide is due to turn for the Russians. Yaroslavna sees in the distance two horsemen riding furiously towards the city; one of them seems arrayed like a prince, the other is evidently from his dress a Polovtsian. She recognises Igor, and in a moment they are in each other's arms. Their duet is rapturous with delight, and they go off towards the citadel, pausing in front of the gate just as Eroshka and Skoula come into sight, slightly drunk as is their habit, and giving vent to disloyal sentiments on the subject of their rightful prince. Igor is the cause of all their woes, they sing – but they are filled with consternation when they recognise the subject of their conversation standing only a few yards from them. Shall they go into voluntary exile to escape the penalty that must surely be theirs? No! The thought of enforced wandering is hardly less repugnant than the possibility of death; let them brave it out.

Borodin was much too fond of his drunken rascals to let them finish the opera with anything but a flourish (cf. Mussorgsky with Varlaam and Missail), and Eroshka and Skoula duly emerge on top when they announce the return of Igor to his as yet unsuspecting subjects. They are hailed as at any rate partially responsible for the joy which has come to the city and are allowed to participate in the finale (marked allegro marziale), in which the return of Igor and the imminent fall of Galitzky are jointly celebrated.

Borodin did not 'finish' Prince Igor (although he wrote all the music) and the kind of revision to which a composer of an epic of this sort might be expected to subject his work was not available to him. The organisers of modern performances are faced with a dilemma when confronted with an opera which sprawls (as to my mind does Prince Igor) and which yet contains music of such evident value. Some have revised it entirely as did Eugene Goossens for Covent Garden in 1937, others have simply omitted Act III, thus bringing the opera within manageable length while omitting little of the drama though much that is of musical value (some was included at the New York City Opera in 1969 and by Opera North in Leeds in 1982). A final – even an interim – editorial solution has not yet been reached, hardly even attempted.

K.W., H.

RUTLAND BOUGHTON

(born 23 January 1878, died 25 January 1960)

THE IMMORTAL HOUR

Opera in two acts, the libretto being adapted from the play and poems of Fiona Macleod. Performed at Glastonbury on 26 August 1914. It was an immediate success, and Elgar pronounced it a work of genius. The chief interpreters on that occasion were Irene Lemon (Etain), Frederic Austin (Eochaidh), Muriel Boughton (Spirit Voice), Neville Strutt (Manus), Agnes Thomas (Maive), Arthur Trowbridge (Old Bard), Arthur Jordan (Midir), and the composer himself sang the part of Dalua. The war delayed its production in London, and it was only in 1920 that it was given there at the Old Vic Theatre. In 1922 the Birmingham Players brought it to London, where it played at the Regent Theatre for 216 performances, with Gwen Ffrangcon Davies as Etain; Kingsway Theatre, London, 1926; New York, 1926; Royal Academy of Music, 1939; Sadler's Wells, 1953, with Patricia Howard, Lanigan, Hargreaves, Clarkson, conductor James Robertson.

| | |
|-------------------------------|---------------|
| Dalua..... | Baritone |
| Etain | Soprano |
| Eochaidh | Baritone |
| Spirit Voice | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Manus..... | Bass |
| Maive | Contralto |
| Old Bard | Bass |
| Midir | Tenor |
| Chorus of Druids and Warriors | |

Running Time: 2 hours

Act I, scene i. A forest. A pool in the background. Dalua, the Lord of Shadow, a creature of the fairy world, passes wearily through the forest. The trees dance around him while a ghostly chorus mocks him. He tells them to be still for he hears the voice of another wanderer. The spirits disappear. Dalua hides while Etain comes haltingly forward. Dalua recognises her and salutes her, 'daughter of Kings and Star among the dreams that are lives and souls'. She has forgotten the fairy world to which she belongs and which Dalua seeks to recall to her. She does not know why she is in the wood. But Dalua knows. A King of men has wooed the 'Immortal Hour'. He has called upon the gods to send him one fairer than any mortal maid, and the gods sent Etain. Who is this King? asks Etain. He is coming hither now, answers Dalua. Etain goes out slowly while the sound of the horn heralds the coming of Eochaidh, the King. Dalua salutes him and the King recognises in him one whom he has known in dreams – why is he in this lonely wood?

Scene ii. The hut of Manus and Maive. Manus sits before the pine-log fire. His wife stands at the back, plucking feathers from a dead cockerel. In a sheltered recess sits Etain.

Manus and Maive are discussing the stranger who has given them three pieces of gold – one for Etain, one for any stranger who might come, and one for keeping silence. Etain laments the beauty of her world, lost to her, and asks the peasants if they know of it. But Manus is afraid to answer. Just then the horn is heard outside. It is Eochaidh calling to the people in the hut. He is told to enter and, exchanging a greeting with his humble host, the King sees Etain. Manus and Maive retire in the shadow.

The King makes himself known to Etain who can only tell him her name because she is still bewildered by a strange darkness on her mind. The course of true love runs smooth enough until voices are heard singing the praise of the lordly ones 'who dwell in the hills'. The curtain descends, with Eochaidh kneeling by the side of Etain, who listens spellbound as the voices outside slowly melt away in the distance.

Act II. Druids are celebrating the anniversary of the meeting of King Eochaidh and his bride. Etain would like to thank them for their welcome when she is suddenly assailed by strange thoughts and longings. Wearily she bids them farewell and would retire, when Eochaidh begs her to remain and not leave him alone this night. He is full of forebodings. Surely Dalua has bewitched his eyes. Etain too has heard the magic music; she must go. Slowly she descends from her throne and goes out. The King sends away the bards and the warriors. As they move to go they are confronted by a stranger, Midir, who comes to claim a boon. He is himself a king's son. He wishes the King well; may he obtain his heart's desire. Eochaidh grants the boon and requests the bards and Druids to leave him alone with the stranger.

As soon as they are gone the King turns eagerly to Midir whose power he feels to be more than mortal, and asks: 'Give me my heart's desire. Tell me there is to be no twilight upon my joy.' Midir answers him by throwing off his cloak and, clad in pure gold, tells the story of Aedh the shining god and of Dana; how they loved and how Oengus was born of their union. Murmuring 'dreams, dreams', Eochaidh turns to the subject of Midir's request for a boon. Midir asks to be allowed to kiss the Queen's hand. Eochaidh has promised, and he sends for her. An old bard sings of dreams that have passed silent and swift like shadows.

Etain appears in the doorway dressed as she was when Eochaidh first saw her, in green with the mystic mistletoe in her hair. She does not recognise Midir but readily allows him, at the King's request, to kiss her hand and to sing a song he has made. The song is the one that has been heard at the close of the first act, exalting the 'lordly ones in the hollow hills'. Its effect on Etain is that of a spell, and when Eochaidh would come near her she seems unaware of his presence. Midir sings another more joyous song of the land of youth where there is no death, of the land of heart's desire, and Etain feels drawn irresistibly to him. Eochaidh implores Etain to stay, but Etain no longer hears him.

An unseen chorus takes up the haunting melody and Etain slowly follows Midir as in a trance. The stage grows dark; only a light shines where Midir stands. As he passes out of sight complete darkness falls on the stage. Dalua enters, and rapidly touches Eochaidh, who falls inert to the ground.

F.B.

BENJAMIN BRITTEN

(born 22 November 1913, died 4 December 1976)

The story of Benjamin Britten's sixteen operas can be told in terms of a search for twentieth-century operatic form. Essentially, he cut for himself four different paths. First, a traditional-force line, involving a big apparatus, designed by implication for nineteenth-century-style buildings and comprising Peter Grimes, Billy Budd and Gloriana. Next, he invented a new form of chamber opera, with initially an orchestra of thirteen, no chorus, a small number of soloists, and intended for smaller theatres (The Rape of Lucretia, Albert Herring, The Beggar's Opera and The Turn of the Screw). Even more out of the ordinary, and also made for smaller forces and buildings, were the children's operas – The Little Sweep, The Golden Vanity and Noye's Fludde, the last designed for performance in church. A fourth and wholly original category was the church parable, of which there were three examples: Curlew River, The Burning Fiery Furnace and The Prodigal Son. There is contrast between the forms he evolved but flexibility within them, and A Midsummer Night's Dream, Owen Wingrave, and Death in Venice (which are neither traditional nor chamber in form, nor in the forces they require) have proved almost as viable in theatres as large as the San Francisco Opera, Covent Garden and the Metropolitan as in Aldeburgh's Jubilee Hall, on television, or at the Snape Maltings, for which they were first designed.

Formal diversity then distinguishes the sixteen operas, from the Coronation Gala work, Gloriana, with its big solo statements, its pageantry and its ballet, to the loosely-knit Noye's Fludde, with its tuned mugs and children's bugle band; from the farcical comedy of Albert Herring to the almost ritualistic shaping of The Turn of the Screw; from the often deliberate and monodic church parables to the lightening changes and prestidigital compression of Owen Wingrave; from the relatively traditional Peter Grimes to the convention-defying Death in Venice.

When the last of the operas – as one had come to accept Death in Venice would be – had been heard the whole perspective was suddenly altered by the reappearance of a precursor, the hitherto suppressed Paul Bunyan. This was written a couple of years before Peter Grimes, and made no attempt either to keep or to defy operatic rules, but invented its own as it went along: improvising brilliant and effective stage stuff out of Auden's often mock-sophisticated, bookish libretto; paying no attention to the conventions of stage realism and characterisation, but instead scattering operatic seeds on ground which in the event proved stony – the work was a failure – but which might, had it been fertile, have immediately grown an operatic forest. Had that initial experiment met with acceptance, the elaborately-tested experiments of subsequent years might never have had to be made, and Minerva could have sprung fully-armed from the (invisible) head of Paul Bunyan!

PAUL BUNYAN

Operetta in two acts and a prologue, libretto by W.H. Auden and Chester Kallman. Première by Columbia University, New York, 5 May 1941, with Helen Marshall (Tiny), William Hess (Inkslinger), Mordecai Bauman (Narrator). First performed B.B.C. Radio, 1976, with Norma Burrowes, Peter Pears (Inkslinger), George Hamilton IV (Narrator), conductor Steuart Bedford; Aldeburgh Festival, 1976, with Iris Saunders, Neil Jenkins, Russell Smythe (and at Florence Festival, 1978); Cassel (in German), 1978, conductor James Lockhart; Albany Opera, London, 1981; St Louis, 1984.

| | |
|---|-------------------|
| Narrator | Baritone or Tenor |
| The Voice of Paul Bunyan | Spoken |
| Johnny Inkslinger, bookkeeper | Tenor |
| Tiny, Paul Bunyan's daughter | Soprano |
| Hot Biscuit Slim, a good cook | Tenor |
| Sam Sharkey } | Tenor |
| Ben Benny } two bad cooks | Bass |
| Hel Helson, foreman | Baritone |
| Four Swedes | Tenors, Bases |
| John Shears, a farmer | Baritone |
| Western Union Boy | Tenor |
| Fido, a dog | High Soprano |
| Moppet } | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Poppet } two cats | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Lumberjacks, Farmers, Frontier Women; Herons, Moon, Wind, Beetle, Squirrel | |

Place: United States of America

Time: Early Times

Running Time: 2 hours

Thirty-five years separate the first performance of Benjamin Britten's so-called operetta and its second, and there is a vast difference between the circumstances of the première in New York by the Music Department of Columbia University and the grandly cast B.B.C. broadcast of February 1976. In New York, it was a failure, and the composer withdrew the work, for years treating it as a youthful indiscretion, although he would occasionally play a snatch or two from it to friends.

Its origins are uncomplicated. Britten and Auden were living in New York and the composer's publishers, Boosey and Hawkes, wanted them to write something suitable for performance in high schools. Paul Bunyan, the giant lumberman hero, was conceived as '... a projection of the collective state of mind of a people whose tasks were primarily the physical mastery of nature ... Paul Bunyan says goodbye because he is no longer needed' (from the original programme note).

Britten began revising the operetta (or as he preferred to say, adjusting it) in 1974 with a view to performance by the about-to-be-formed English Music Theatre, deciding in the process to omit the original overture and composing a brief introduction in its place; revising Slim's and Tiny's songs in Act I and the mocking of Hel Helson in Act II. As well as the original overture, he dropped a song for Inkslinger and the lumberjacks in Act I, and composed a new finale to the first act.

Prologue. A slow solemn introduction suggesting the awakening of giant forces leads to a scene in the forest. The chorus quietly celebrates rivers, rain, trees. We hear the name of Paul Bunyan, who will only be born 'at the next Blue Moon'. Immediately the moon turns blue.

The operetta is interspersed with ballads in a folk-style sung by a Narrator. The first one, leading to Act I, describes the birth and raising of Paul Bunyan.

Act I. A clearing in the forest. The voice of Paul Bunyan (who is too big ever to be seen) can be heard: 'It is a spring morning without benefit of young persons ... It is America, but not yet'. Lumberjacks from Sweden, France, Germany and even England sing in full flood, and Bunyan welcomes them. Who shall be foreman? Four Swedes volunteer but can't agree which is the best, but the problem is solved when the Western Union boy brings 'A telegram from overseas'. The King of Sweden is sending his finest logger, Hel Helson, and he will be foreman.

Two cooks sing seductively together, larghetto, and the mention of food brings in Johnny Inkslinger, bookkeeper, poet, ultimately the camp's intellectual. He can join – and eat – only if he works. He says he won't. The cooks need dogs to clean up and chase away salesmen, and cats to catch mice and rats. A trio of animals, two of the former, one of the latter (singing always together), solve that problem, and Bunyan says goodnight, for the first of several times.

The next number is a highly effective Blues for alto, tenor, baritone and bass solos, after which Inkslinger enters to accept a job – on Bunyan's conditions: no work, no supper! Bunyan's second goodnight.

A second ballad interlude, during which the growing up of the lumberjacks is described and also Paul Bunyan's search for a wife of appropriate dimensions for someone of his vast size. He finds one and they marry, have a daughter called Tiny, are unhappy together, part, and later she dies.

Food is one of the camp's main preoccupations, and it is apparently not good enough. Inkslinger is most articulate in complaint, and after he has gently told Sam and Ben they are looking for more variety, the two cooks walk out. The others rat on Inkslinger and blame it all on him, but there is an interruption as Slim comes in. In his attractively lyrical song, he makes clear that he is looking for the self he knows he hasn't yet found. Is he perhaps the cook they need?

Bunyan returns with his daughter Tiny, a pretty girl, as the lumberjacks are not slow to notice.

Inkslinger tells the story of his life in a large-scale song which articulates the style of the new American writers, born and bred in the sticks. The others are more interested in Bunyan's daughter and each hopes he can supply what she lacks. Her song is more one of sadness for her mother's death than of confidence in the future.

Inkslinger regrets that life's timing seems constantly awry, but when Bunyan comes back, he warns him that Hel Helson seems a bit restive, like some of the others. Bunyan's third goodnight.

Act II. Bunyan's good-morning starts the act, and he reads the men a lecture about their conduct. Hel Helson is left in charge while Bunyan is away.

Helson and four cronies are alone together and though off-stage the chorus sings 'No! I'm afraid it's too late, Helson never will be great', he makes plain in his song that he is not without ambition.

It is the turn of the animals, and first Fido then the two cats parade their not-so-simple philosophies.

Bunyan is back and the cronies egg Helson on to challenge him. As Helson runs out, the chorus rushes in and their graphic description of what is going on off-stage is intercut with a love duet for Tiny and Slim on stage, an early example of Britten's ability to invent an operatic situation where none truly exists. To a mock funeral march, Helson is carried in unconscious. Bunyan suggests they let bygones be bygones. There is a choral hymn 'O great day of Discovery'.

The third ballad interlude celebrates peace between Helson and Bunyan and their future partnership which will be part of the founding of America.

It is Christmas Eve and the party is musically a very lively affair, with sung interjected solos from the animals and a speech from Inkslinger, who announces the engagement of Tiny and Slim and the latter's promotion to run a hotel in Manhattan. The chorus is delighted, the animals join in, and Hel's contribution to their life – he converts Paul's ambitious dreams into practical schemes – is not forgotten. Even the Western Union boy has a job as he brings Inkslinger a telegram from Hollywood; he will be famous! Paul is leaving and his Farewell bids them remember their freedom.

The operetta ends with a so-called litany, in which they ask to be saved from (for instance) 'a tolerance that is really inertia and disillusion'. But Paul reminds them that 'America is what you do, America is what you choose to make it', which may make a less than rumbustious ending to an operetta, but then this, with its soft, downbeat finish (marked solenne), is unlike other specimens, if in no other way than that its vocal score proclaims it an operetta on the title page, an opera under its last bar!

H.

PETER GRIMES

Opera in a prologue, an epilogue, and three acts, text by Montagu Slater, after the poem by George Crabbe. Première, Sadler's Wells, London, 7 June 1945, with Joan Cross, Coates, Iacopi, Blanche Turner, Bower, Pears, Roderick Jones, Donlevy, Brannigan, Morgan Jones, Culbert, conductor Goodall. First performed Stockholm, 1945, with Sundström, Svanholm, Sigurd Björling, conductor Sandberg; Berkshire Festival, U.S.A., 1946, with Manning, William Horne, Pease, conductor Bernstein; Zürich, 1946, with Cross, Cordy, von Sieben, della Casa, Moor, Pears, Andreas Boehm, Rehfuß, Vichegonov, Libero de Luca, conductor Denzler; Hamburg, 1947, with Schlüter, Markwort, conductor Hollreiser; Berlin, 1947, with Grümmer, Witte, conductor Heger; Covent Garden, 1947, with Cross, Pears, conductor Rankl, later Goodall; la Scala, Milan, 1947, with Danco, Ticozzi, Prandelli, Colombo, Borriello, conductor Serafin; Metropolitan, New York, 1948, with Resnik (later Stoska), Jagel (later Sullivan), Brownlee, Hines, Garris, conductor Emil Cooper; 1967, with Amara, Vickers, Geraint Evans, conductor Colin Davis. After Peter Pears, Jon Vickers had a marked success in the title role, playing it all over English-speaking countries.

Peter Grimes, a fisherman.....Tenor

John, his apprentice.....Silent

Ellen Orford, a widow, schoolmistress

of the Borough.....Soprano

Captain Balstrode, retired merchant skipper....Baritone

Auntie, landlady of 'The Boar'.....Contralto

Her Two 'Nieces', main attractions

of 'The Boar'.....Sopranos

Bob Boles, fisherman and Methodist.....Tenor

Swallow, a lawyer.....Bass

Mrs (Nabob) Sedley, a rentier widow of an

East India Company's factor.....Mezzo-Soprano

Rev. Horace Adams, the rector.....Tenor

Ned Keene, apothecary and quack.....Baritone

Dr Thorp.....Silent

Hobson, the carrier.....Bass

Chorus of Townspeople and Fisherfolk

Place: The Borough, a Fishing Village, East Coast of England

Time: Towards 1830

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

The idea of Peter Grimes came to Britten in America in 1941 after reading an article by E.M. Forster on the subject of George Crabbe, the poet of England and more particularly of East Anglia. Shortly afterwards, Koussevitzky, the conductor, offered to commission him to write an opera, and, immediately on his return to England (in the spring of 1942), he set to work with Montagu Slater to hammer out the libretto.

This is freely adapted from Crabbe's story, which forms a part of his long poem, The Borough. The venue remains Aldeburgh, where Crabbe was born and where Britten, shortly after the première of Peter Grimes, made his home, but the character of Peter Grimes is softened; he is no longer the uncomplicated sadist of Crabbe's poem, but a proud, self-willed outsider, whose uncompromising independence and unwillingness to accept help bring him in the end to disaster.

Peter Grimes (Sadler's Wells, London, 1947). Peter Pears as Grimes and Joan Cross as Ellen Orford.

The immediate success of Britten's opera is a matter of history. Its first performance came a month after the end of the war in Europe and coincided with the return of the Sadler's Wells Company to its London home; the music has unflagging vitality and invention; the subject was susceptible enough to traditional big-scale operatic treatment to please old opera-goers, and the anti-hero (an early example of the type) sufficiently 'different' to please the more sophisticated.

Prologue. The Moot Hall of the Borough, where the inquest is being held on Grimes's apprentice who died at sea. As the curtain goes up, we hear in the woodwind a theme which is associated with Swallow, the Borough lawyer and Coroner. The people of the Borough suspect Grimes of having caused the boy's death, and feeling runs high. When asked to give evidence, Grimes repeats the oath after Swallow in notes an octave higher and of double the time value. He tells a story of distress at sea, how he and the boy, when out fishing, were driven off course, how they were three days without water, and how the boy died of exposure.

When it comes to confirming what occurred when Grimes landed his boat, Swallow and Grimes refer in turn to Ned Keene, the Rector, Bob Boles, Auntie, Mrs Sedley, and Ellen Orford, who corroborate the evidence. There is some interruption from the onlookers, and at the end the Coroner gives his verdict: '... your apprentice died in accidental circumstances. But that's the kind of thing people are apt to remember', and advises Grimes to get a grown-up, not a boy, to help him in future. Grimes tries to make himself heard above the growing uproar, but it is impossible, and Hobson clears the court.

Grimes and Ellen Orford are left alone, and Ellen tries to give comfort. Their duet begins with Ellen singing in E major, Peter in F minor, but as Peter warms to her quiet confidence in his future, he takes up her key and they finish together: 'here is a friend'.

Britten begins each of his three acts with a so-called Interlude, and also connects the two scenes of each of them with a similar orchestral piece. Prologue and Act I are joined by a calm piece which seems to express the typical movement of waves and water so often heralding a new day for the fishermen of the Borough.

Act I. The beach, showing the Moot Hall, Boar Inn, and the church. The first part of the scene is in the form of an extended chorus, 'Oh, hang at open doors the net, the cork', with interruptions from Auntie, who opens up for the day; Boles, who protests at anything which comes into the category of fun; Balstrode, who is concerned with the weather; the Rector and Mrs Sedley, who wish each other 'Good morning'; and Ned Keene, who says he is anxious for an assignation with one of Auntie's 'Nieces' that night.

Meanwhile, the fishermen and their womenfolk go about their daily business, mending nets and preparing for the day's work. Grimes's voice is heard off, calling for help with his boat, which is refused him until Balstrode and Keene give him a hand.

Keene tells Grimes that he has found him another apprentice whom he has only to fetch from the work-house. Carter Hobson refuses to have anything to do with the transaction: the cart's full. 'I have to go from pub to pub,' sings Hobson, in what Britten describes as a 'half number'. The chorus supports Hobson's refusal, but Ellen Orford takes up his tune and offers to help him mind the boy if he will agree to bring him back. The chorus's protest rises in vigour until Ellen takes her stand firmly against them: 'Let her among you without fault cast the first stone.' Hobson yields to her pleading, and Mrs Sedley asks Keene if he yet has her laudanum. He says she must meet him in the pub to collect it.

Balstrode sees the storm cone has been hoisted, and leads a great fugal ensemble. Bob Boles calls on the Borough to repent, and the passage ends with the fervent prayer: 'O tide that waits for no man, spare our coasts.' The storm music dominates the rest of the act.

Balstrode comments on Grimes's apparently convinced isolation – even now, he stays out in the storm, instead of coming into the pub – and suggests that he would be better off working on a merchantman. He is 'native, rooted here', replies Grimes: 'By familiar fields, marsh and sand.' Touched however by the old captain's kindness, he tells him in an arioso passage the story of his horrifying experience with only the corpse of the dead boy to keep him company. He plans to stop the gossips with the one thing they listen to – money (a rapid scherzando passage). The duet grows in intensity as he refuses to listen to Balstrode's advice. Left alone, he reflects passionately on the peace which could be his were Ellen to become his wife.

The interval of the ninth has been thought to characterise Grimes's maladjustment, and we hear it in its minor form at the beginning of the scene with Balstrode (Ex. 1a) and resolved into the major when he thinks of Ellen and his possible salvation (Ex. 1b).

With the fall of the curtain, we hear for the first time the full force of the storm in the orchestral interlude which follows, and which is developed from the storm themes already heard, with a reference in the middle to Ex. 1b.

Scene ii. The interior of The Boar; the storm enters each time one of the characters opens the door. Mrs Sedley is an unexpected visitor, but she explains that she is waiting for Ned Keene.

Two episodes characterise the music: Balstrode complains about the noise the frightened 'Nieces' make, and is rebuked by Auntie in a half-humorous piece; Bob Boles makes drunken advances to one of the Nieces, tries to hit Balstrode, who overpowers him and leads the company in 'We live and let live, and look we keep our hands to ourselves.'

Grimes come in, and Mrs Sedley promptly faints. Grimes takes little notice of what has been or is going on inside The Boar but sings introspectively of the mystery of the skies and human destiny: 'Now the Great Bear and Pleiades'. The melody is in the orchestra and in canon, but the effective words, the contrasting molto animato in the middle, and the suggestive and reiterated 'Who, who, who, who can turn skies back and begin again' make this a scena of haunting beauty.

The reaction to Grimes's mood is, not unnaturally, one of consternation, and Ned Keene saves the situation by starting off a round: 'Old Joe has gone fishing', in which three distinct tunes are used and combined in the metre of 7/4. The storm is heard again, and Hobson the carter comes in with Ellen and Grimes's new apprentice. The bridge is down, they almost had to swim, and everyone is chilled to the bone. Auntie offers refreshment, but Grimes wants to be off. Ellen tells the boy gently: 'Peter will take you home', upon which the chorus comments derisively, 'Home! do you call that home!'

Act II. The opening prelude is in complete contrast to what has gone before. It is Sunday morning, and the sunlight is reflected off the waves as everyone goes to church. The interlude is made up of a brilliant toccata which contrasts with a broad, appealing lyrical tune, heard first on the violas and cellos and again, immediately on the rise of the curtain, sung by Ellen who comes in with John, the new apprentice ('Glitter of waves and glitter of sunlight').

The scene which follows takes place within a frame provided by the music of the church service which is heard from time to time off-stage. During the hymn (maestoso) Ellen talks to the boy about the workhouse, and her determination that the new apprentice's life shall be different from that of the old. The beginning of the Confession and Responses (Recitativo agitato) coincides with Ellen's discovery that the boy has a torn coat and – worse – a bruise on his neck. With the Gloria (Andante con moto) she tries, in music of aria-like stature, to provide comfort for herself almost as much as for the boy. Peter Grimes comes in quickly as the chorus begins the Benedicite (Allegro agitato), and tells the boy they are off to work, answering Ellen roughly when she reminds him that it is Sunday, a day of rest. The chorus starts the Creed (Adagio) as Ellen pleads with Peter to adjust his ways to the boy's tender years. 'Were we mistaken when we schemed to solve your life by lonely toil?' she asks him in music of the utmost tenderness, and concludes: 'Peter! we've failed.' At this he cries out in agony and strikes her, matching the chorus's 'Amen' with his own fortissimo 'So be it, and God have mercy upon me!' Grimes drives the boy off, and leaves Ellen to make her way weeping home.

Auntie, Bob Boles, and Ned Keene sing a brisk trio based on Grimes's phrase: 'Grimes is at his exercise', and the service comes to an end, spilling its congregation on to the beach. Some of them, Mrs Sedley naturally among them, have heard the noise of the quarrel during the service, and the chorus murmurs in indignation at what it only half understands. Balstrode tries to exert a calming influence, Swallow chips in with a sitting-on-the-fence platitude, but Bob Boles inflames popular sentiment and calls on Ellen Orford, who has come back to collect her things, to tell them what was going on.

She attempts to explain in terms of what they tried to do, but the weight of opinion is too solidly against her and though her voice rises higher and higher in her effort to make herself understood, the ensemble and the chorus cap her efforts with a cry of 'Murder!' In spite of Balstrode's protest that they are wasting their time, the Rector and Swallow organise a party to investigate what is going on at Grimes's hut, Carter Hobson beats his drum, and they march off together to the tune of a vindictive chorus.

As their voices die away in the distance, two flutes in seconds introduce a 6/8 'trio' for the two Nieces, Auntie, and Ellen (except in the first and last phrases the Nieces sing in unison), whose calm beauty provides a contemplative ending to a scene which has otherwise been dramatic and even violent.

The interlude joining the first scene of Act II to the second is a Passacaglia, which is the centrepiece of the whole opera. It is built up on the 'God have mercy upon me' theme, and through it runs a desolate viola solo, which represents the fate of the apprentice caught up in Grimes's destiny.

Scene ii. Grimes's hut, an upturned boat full of ropes and fisherman's tackle. Until the sound of the chorus off-stage just before its end, the scene consists of an extended monologue for Grimes, the boy's part being confined to a single scream.

The music settles down to an aria, in which Grimes seeks to contrast what he is in reality with what he has always dreamed and planned, with Ellen's help, to be. The florid cast of the music and the idyllic nature of the words eventually give place to a feverish description of that awful vigil with the dying apprentice in the boat. The aria comes to an end, and in the next bar the sound of the investigatory procession from the village can be heard. Grimes reacts violently to it, thinks the boy is the cause of its coming to his hut, and shouts his defiance of what it can do to him. With an admonition to be careful, Grimes hustles the boy down the cliff steps, turns as he senses the unwelcome visitors nearing his door, and hears the boy scream as he falls down the cliff to his death. Grimes climbs quickly after him. With the scream, the orchestral sound cuts off suddenly and leaves only an eerie echo on the celesta.

The Rector puts his head round the door, and is followed by Swallow, Keene, and Balstrode. They find nothing, but comment on the open door with the precipice almost directly beyond it, and the neatness of the hut, and Swallow sums up the feelings of all when he says that the whole episode seems to have ended by quieting village gossip once and for all.

Act III opens with a Moonlight prelude of great simplicity and beauty, whose rising theme is punctuated now and then by a little figure for flute and harp.

The same scene as the first of Act I (the Borough street and beach), this time at night. A dance is in progress in the Moot Hall, and there is a steady procession between there and The Boar. The off-stage band plays a rustic jig, and Swallow appears, all dignity discarded, chasing one of the Nieces and singing a raffish tune. The first Niece is presently joined by the second – they find safety in numbers – and together they elude Swallow, who angrily goes into The Boar, leaving the orchestra to enjoy his tune. Ned Keene's intentions are in no way dissimilar from Swallow's, but he is waylaid by Mrs Sedley, who, to the accompaniment of a Ländler from the off-stage orchestra, tries to enlist his interest in proving Peter Grimes a murderer.

While the orchestra starts up a hornpipe, the older members of the community bid each other goodnight, the Rector outdoing everyone in affability, a section of extraordinary musical refinement and inspiration. Mrs Sedley broods in the darkness and watches Ellen and Balstrode as they walk up from the beach, the latter revealing that Grimes's boat is in but he is nowhere to be found, the former overcome by recognising the boy's jersey, which Balstrode has found washed up by the tide.

Ellen's aria, 'Embroidery in childhood was a luxury of idleness', is, like the quartet at the end of the first scene of the previous act, a moment of stillness in the drama, which is here commented upon in music that is florid and exacting, but whose effect is one of tranquillity and resignation. It is the most extended aria of the opera.

Balstrode says there may yet be something they can do for Peter. Mrs Sedley now has the clue she needs, and she goes officiously towards the door of The Boar, and calls for Mr Swallow. When he hears that Grimes's boat is back he orders, as mayor of the Borough, that Hobson take a posse of men and find Grimes. In an atmosphere of hysteria and brutality, which is horrifyingly reflected in the big ensemble, 'him who despises us we'll destroy', the inhabitants set out to hunt down the fellow-citizen they cannot understand. The scene ends with fortissimo cries of 'Peter Grimes' before the curtain comes down.

The sixth interlude, a short one, has been described by Edward Sackville-West as 'one of the strangest and most imaginative passages in the opera ... The music, which transfers us from the one-track hysteria of the crowd to the echoing limbo of Grimes's mind, is ... bound together by a single chord, a dominant seventh on D – held, ppp, throughout the interlude by three muted horns. Figures of nightmare sea-birds fly through the fog uttering fragments of themes which Grimes has sung earlier ...'.

As the curtain rises, the search-party can be heard crying 'Peter Grimes', and at the same time a fog-horn (tuba off-stage) makes itself heard. Grimes drags himself in and has a long mad scene to himself, accompanied only by the off-stage chorus and the fog-horn against the background of the horn chord. He babbles of home, and sings snatches that remind him of the various stages of his tragic story. Ellen comes in with Balstrode and tells him they have come to take him home, but he appears not to recognise her until he sings a reminiscence of Ex. 1b, which represents his aspirations and is now associated with what he has failed to obtain. Balstrode drops into ordinary speech to tell Peter to take his boat out to sea and sink her there.

Very quietly, three violins begin to play the music of the prelude to Act I, as the stragglers return from the unsuccessful chase. It is morning, and the chorus sings the same tune as at the beginning of Act I. Swallow looks through his glasses to confirm that a boat has been seen sinking out at sea, but no one is interested. The Borough has forgotten its manhunt and prepares to get on with another day. H.

THE RAPE OF LUCRETIA

Opera in two acts, text by Ronald Duncan, based on André Obey's play, Le Viol de Lucrece. Première at Glyndebourne, 12 July 1946; the work was later toured throughout England with a double cast, the first-named singer in each case having sung at the première: Cross (Nielsen), Ferrier (Nancy Evans), Ritchie (Duff), Pollak (Lawson), Pears (Schjötz), Kraus (Rogier), Donlevy (Sharp), Brannigan (Norman Walker), conductor Ansermet (Goodall). First performed Basle, 1947, with Lorand, von Sieben, Wosniak, Gschwend, conductor Krannhals; Chicago, 1947, with Resnik, Kibler, Kane, Rogier, conductor Breisach; New York, 1949, with Kitty Carlisle, conductor Breisach; Rome, 1949, with Vitali-Marini, Gardino, Manuritta, Franci, conductor Santini; Salzburg Festival, 1950, with Kupper, Höngen, Gueden, Dagmar Hermann, Patzak, Uhde, Poell, Böhme, conductor Krips; English National Opera, 1983, with Kathryn Harries, Jean Rigby, Anthony Rolfe Johnson, Russell Smythe, conductor Steuart Bedford.

Male Chorus Tenor
 Female Chorus Soprano
 Lucretia Contralto
 Collatinus, her husband Bass
 Lucia, her attendant Soprano
 Bianca, her nurse Contralto
 Tarquinius, Prince of Rome Baritone
 Junius, a Roman general Baritone

Place: In or Near Rome

Time: 500 B.C.

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

In early 1946, the team which had successfully pioneered Peter Grimes at Sadler's Wells resigned from the company. Britten decided to accept an invitation from Glyndebourne to re-open the theatre, which had been closed during the war, and, for practical as much as aesthetic reasons (although he strongly developed the latter), set out the new opera for a relatively small but varied cast, no chorus, and an orchestra of thirteen instruments including piano.¹ The basis of the new venture was the Sadler's Wells team, and the opera was well enough received to encourage a tour of leading British cities (which lost money heavily), and of Holland, which has since always been receptive to Britten's works.

Although The Rape of Lucretia is the most lyrical of Britten's operas, its actual organisation is more formal than for instance that of Peter Grimes. The two acts, which are divided into two scenes each, take place within a musical and dramatic frame provided by a Male and a Female Chorus. These two commentators assume, together with the orchestra, the duties of preparation, comment, heightening of the tension, and summing-up which, in Grimes, were allotted to the orchestra alone, and in fact the interludes in the middle of each act are vocal as opposed to the purely instrumental equivalents in the earlier opera.

Act I. The Male and Female Choruses are discovered sitting on either side of the stage.

We are in medias res straight away as the Male Chorus announces con forza in the third bar: 'Rome is now ruled by the Etruscan upstart, Tarquinius Superbus.' In a nervous half arioso, half recitative style, he introduces the story by sketching in the historical background against which it is set. The particular situation – war against Greece – is specified by the Female Chorus before the two voices join in a lyric statement, 'Whilst we as two observers stand between this present audience and that scene'. The orchestra (muted strings and harp) suggests an atmosphere of oppressive heat, a night alive with the noise of crickets and bull-frogs. The scene is a camp outside Rome. The Male Chorus and the orchestra are interrupted in their description of the lights of distant Rome by an explosive drinking song for the officers.

The officers discuss the outcome of their bet the night before, when they rode home unannounced to see what their wives were doing in their absence. Only Lucretia, Collatinus' wife, was at home, and the others were all found in compromising situations. 'And Collatinus has won the bet', shouts Tarquinius, 'And Junius is a cuckold, a cuckold's a cock without a crow ...' Tarquinius' motif is heard for the first time at the words 'You forget I am the Prince of Rome' (the four descending notes C, B, A, and G sharp).

Tarquinius and Junius quarrel but are separated by Collatinus, who suggests they drink a toast together. Tarquinius immediately proposes it 'To the chaste Lucretia!' in a phrase which forms her motif.

To the chaste Lu - cre - - tia!

Junius rushes angrily from the tent. He is furiously jealous of Lucretia's chastity, and repeats her name again and again, easing his agony by abusing her. His aria is developed to a point at which the idea of revenge fills his mind, when for the second time the Male Chorus takes over from him. What Junius might not have said aloud, but what he would have admitted to feeling, is sung by him; the jealousy which causes his anger and the thoughts it suggests to him – things he would not have admitted to feeling – are described by the Male Chorus in music of insinuating character (Ex. 2).

¹ Flute (doubling piccolo and bass flute), oboe (doubling English horn), clarinet (doubling bass clarinet), bassoon, horn, percussion, harp, piano (doubling celesta), string quartet, double bass.

Junius ends his aria with a final explosive 'Lucretia!', and Collatinus walks out to reason with him and persuade him to take a less directly personal view of the situation. Collatinus' aria, 'Those who love create', replaces one written for the first version of the opera, which had the dramatic disadvantage of showing Collatinus not understanding that Junius' driving motive is jealousy. Collatinus goes off to bed, leaving Tarquinius and Junius to resolve their differences in a striking duet, which finishes with a canon at the half bar; as they put it,

It seems we agree,
But are not of the same opinion!

Junius leaves Tarquinius alone, after suggesting that to prove Lucretia chaste is something even the Prince will not dare to attempt. The Male Chorus comments on Tarquinius' indecision, until his cry of 'My horse! My horse!' reveals that his mind is now all too firmly made up.

The curtain falls rapidly and immediately the Male Chorus begins a graphic description of Tarquinius' Ride to Rome. The music's energy mounts until the Ride is brought to a temporary halt by the River Tiber. Tarquinius and his horse take to the water, and the Chorus describes their crossing (Ex. 2). The slow crescendo from the solo flute's ppp to the full orchestra's ff is extraordinarily evocative, and the Ride culminates in the Chorus's ff 'Lucretia' as the curtain goes up to reveal the hall of Lucretia's house.

All is apparently at peace. She and her two female companions are spinning, and the Female Chorus's beautiful spinning song, with its flute and harp accompaniment, not only sets the mood but also frames the three solo verses, each with its 'nostalgic ninth', which Lucretia, Bianca, and Lucia sing in turn. Lucretia thinks she hears a knock, but finding it is not Collatinus or his messenger, as she had hoped, sings an arioso, 'How cruel men are to teach us love'. The women prepare for bed, and a trio develops between Lucia and Bianca, who vocalise on 'Ah' while folding linen, and the Female Chorus who comments on this regular and calming feminine action.

'How quiet it is tonight', reflects Lucretia; '... it must be men who make the noise', retorts Bianca, and immediately we hear a suggestion of Tarquinius' Ride in the orchestra. A loud knocking announces that Tarquinius has arrived. The rest of the scene is carried on in pantomime, to the expressive comment of the two Choruses, until Lucretia's two companions remark on the strangeness of a visit so late from the Prince whose palace lies only just across the city, but who is asking for Lucretia's hospitality. She cannot refuse it, and there starts a chain of 'Goodnights', each one based on Tarquinius' motif but subtly different from the next, and each introduced by one or other of the Choruses.

Act II. The two Choruses introduce the act. Lucretia sleeps as the bass flute, muted horn, and bass clarinet introduce the Female Chorus's Lullaby 'She sleeps as a rose upon the night', a tune of exquisite sensitivity. The hushed atmosphere is continued in the next section, in which the Male Chorus, accompanied only by percussion, describes Tarquinius' approach to Lucretia's room. As Tarquinius reaches the head of the bed, the first phrase of the Female Chorus's Lullaby is heard again. In an extended and impressive aria, Tarquinius sings of his feelings for Lucretia; the middle section is heard against the Female Chorus's Lullaby, and at the end of the aria Tarquinius bends over Lucretia to wake her, as he has planned, with a kiss.

Lucretia wakes (to the sound of the 'whip' – a little-used orchestral instrument) and is confronted with the sight of Tarquinius. Lucretia pleads for mercy in music of rapidly rising tension, and Tarquinius does his best to establish that her resistance is diminishing:

'Can you deny your blood's dumb pleading?' The Choruses take Lucretia's part in the quartet which ensues, but it is too late, and Tarquinius pulls the cover from the bed and threatens Lucretia with his sword. The scene ends with a statement by the quartet a cappella of the music heard originally in Junius' soliloquy (Ex. 2), and Tarquinius beats out the candle with his sword as the curtain falls rapidly.

The Interlude takes the form of a figured chorale sung by the two commentators, in which they interpret in Christian terms the scene they have just witnessed, while the orchestra depicts the physical events of the rape. The Interlude dies away and the front-drop goes up to show the hall of Lucretia's house as in the second scene of Act I. Lucia and Bianca exult in the beauty of the day. Their aubade gives them plenty of opportunity for coloratura display before they discuss whether it was Tarquinius they heard gallop out of the courtyard earlier in the morning. Lucia sings a little arietta, 'I often wonder whether Lucretia's love is the flower of her beauty', before Lucretia is seen coming into the hall.

She is obviously full of foreboding, and her initially quiet behaviour gives way to hysteria when she is offered the orchids to arrange: 'How hideous! Take them away!' She bursts into wild activity and orders Lucia to send a messenger to Collatinus, telling him to come home. She calms sufficiently to arrange the rest of the flowers, which she does while she sings an aria, a miniature of beauty and pathos, and one of the major inspirations of the score. Bianca's aria is in complete contrast; she remembers when life was still sweet and fresh for all of them before the fatal yesterday.

There is a short interchange between Bianca and Lucia (Lucretia has left the stage) in which the former bids the latter prevent the messenger reaching Collatinus; but it is too late, and in a moment Collatinus and Junius are with them, demanding to know where Lucretia is.

Lucretia herself comes in, dressed in purple mourning, and in eleven bars of orchestral music (cor anglais and strings) the essence of her tragedy is conveyed. Collatinus addresses his wife in words and music that are calculated to comfort and sustain her, affirming that they must never again be parted. Their voices blend before Lucretia makes her confession to Collatinus, the orchestra punctuating what she has to say with sotto voce memories of the music which went with what she is describing. Finally she sings a modified version of Ex. 2, ending, 'For me this shame, for you this sorrow'. Collatinus attempts to forgive her, but she is overcome by what has happened, and stabs herself, dying in Collatinus' arms.

Her funeral march (marked alla marcia grave) takes the form of an extended chaconne. It is sung by all the characters in tableau, Collatinus and Junius first, then Bianca and Lucia, and finally the two commentators joining their voices in the magnificent ensemble. The Female Chorus cannot accept the finality with which the story has closed, and ends incredulously 'Is this it all?' to which she receives conclusive answer from her male companion: 'It is not all ... For now He bears our sin, and does not fall ... In His passion is our hope, Jesus Christ, Saviour, He is all, He is all.' The Christian ethic has been allowed – some commentators have said 'forced' – to draw a moral from the pagan story. The opera ends with a final statement of the lyrical passage heard at the end of the prologue.

H.

ALBERT HERRING

Opera in three acts, text by Eric Crozier, adapted from Maupassant's story Le Rosier de Madame Husson. Première, Glyndebourne, 20 June 1947, with Joan Cross, Ritchie, Nancy Evans, Pears, Sharp, Parsons, Lumsden, conductor Britten. First performed Tanglewood, U.S.A., 1949; Hanover, 1950; Berlin, 1950; New York, 1952, by Opera Futures Workshop; Berlin, Komische Oper, 1958, producer Herz; New York City Opera, 1971, conductor Bernardi; Glyndebourne, 1985, with Patricia Johnson, John Graham-Hall, conductor Bernard Haitink, producer Peter Hall.

Lady Billows, an elderly autocrat.....Soprano
 Florence Pike, her housekeeper.....Contralto
 Miss Wordsworth, head teacher.....Soprano
 Mr Gedge, *the Vicar*Baritone
 Mr Upfold, *the Mayor*Tenor
 Superintendent Budd.....Bass
 Sid, *a butcher's assistant*Baritone
 Albert Herring, from the greengrocer's.....Tenor
 Nancy, from the bakery.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Mrs Herring, Albert's mother.....Mezzo-Soprano Village children
 EmmieSoprano
 CisSoprano
 HarryTreble

Place: Loxford, a Small Market-Town in East Suffolk, England

Time: April and May of 1900

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

During a tour of English cities with Lucretia in 1946, Britten decided for the future to form his own chamber opera company, the English Opera Group, with the result that, though Albert Herring like Lucretia was first given at Glyndebourne, it was presented under the management of the English Opera Group. Albert Herring kept the chamber opera form of Lucretia but, as a comedy, represented a new departure for Britten, a fact given additional emphasis by his original choice, subsequently discarded, of Mansfield Park as the subject of his next opera. Kathleen Ferrier was to have had a leading part in it, but in 1947 at Glyndebourne she sang instead Gluck's Orfeo for the first time.

Act I. The curtain rises after two bars of the busy prelude to show the breakfast room of Lady Billows's house, where Florence, her housekeeper, is tidying up. Lady Billows is heard calling instructions from her room, and Florence checks off in her notebook what she has to see to that morning; sample: 'Advert in chemist's window ... indecent ... tear it up!' Florence seems about to favour us with some revelation of her private aspirations, when a knock is heard at the door, which Florence opens to admit Miss Wordsworth, the Vicar, the Mayor, and Mr Budd, the committee which is to decide between the rival candidates for the position of Queen of the May.

An alla marcia introduces her Ladyship, who seems at one point in danger of not noticing her visitors, except to complain that the room stinks of tobacco. But the situation is saved, and, while she greets the committee, the orchestra begins the fugal tune which develops after a bit into a full-blooded quintet: 'We've made our own investigations.'

Lady Billows rhapsodises on the subject of the position of May Queen, her first four notes constituting a 'Festival motif', and grows eloquent as she considers the 'state of complete moral chaos' from which it is expected to rescue the town. Names are put forward and vetoed with uncommon gusto by Florence. A short quartet, beginning with the Vicar's 'Oh, bitter, bitter is the fruit' and ending with Budd's pregnant 'and darkness has its uses', leads to a furious aria for Lady Billows.

It is the moment for a brainwave, and Superintendent Budd has it: why not a King of the May? He launches headlong into an aria: 'Albert Herring's clean as new-mown hay', but the other committee members hint delicately that he is perhaps an unusually backward boy. Lady Billows calls helplessly on the Vicar for some comfort in an awkward situation; there are apparently no virgins in Loxford. The Vicar rises to the occasion with a string of persuasive platitudes and a big cantabile tune which is taken up by the others.

'Right! We'll have him! May King! That'll teach the girls a lesson!' she says, and leads off the fugal finale. She leaves the room for a moment and returns to transform the finale into a florid, Purcell-like choral ode, with which the scene ends.

The interlude prepares us for the village children, and the curtain goes up to show the interior of Mrs Herring's grocer's shop, outside which can be seen playing Emmie, Cis, and Harry. The ball bounces, and Harry goes in after it, taking the opportunity to pinch some apples. They are interrupted by Sid, who empties Harry's pockets, and, pausing to take an apple for himself, shouts for Albert.

The hero makes his entrance backwards through the door, and carrying a hundredweight of turnips (or so he tells us). Sid gives his order and offers to toss Albert for it. But gambling is not in Albert's line. Sid tempts him to break the apron strings with a recital of the pleasures of independence. Albert tries not to listen, and Sid is just off, when Nancy, his girlfriend, comes in, obviously in the middle of her shopping.

Sid buys Nancy a couple of peaches, and tells her to bring them that night and meet him at quarter past eight for a walk in the moonlight. Albert comments on their duet, which thus becomes a trio. Sid and Nancy go off together, Sid of course forgetting to pay, and Albert is left alone. His monologue begins as he wonders if his mother's strictness really leads to anything valuable, and continues as he reflects on what he misses. It is interrupted by another customer – Emmie come to buy herbs for a stew – but ends with a half-defiant 'Golly, it's about time!'

Florence sends for Mrs Herring to tell her that the Festival Committee is about to pay her a visit. There is no time for further explanation before Lady Billows is upon them, announcing, 'We bring great news to you upon this happy day'. Once the visiting party has departed, the winner is left alone with the jubilant Mrs Herring, who is only momentarily put out when Albert says firmly that he intends to refuse the prize. Mum's firmness is very much to the fore as she sends him upstairs, to delighted cries of 'Albert's Mum took a stick, Whacked him on the thingmijig' from the children.

Act II. Horn calls on the Festival motif run through a short prelude, before the curtain goes up on the inside of a marquee set up in the vicarage garden. 'There is a long trestle-table loaded with cakes, jellies, and other good things.'

Sid tells Nancy what has been going on down at the church, in an aria that is richly ironical. What of Albert? 'The poor kid looks on tenterhooks. He's in the mood to escape if he could.' 'You've got some scheme,' says Nancy, and Sid takes her outside to tell her what it is.

With the flute twittering away presto above the strings, Miss Wordsworth brings in the children to run through the anthem in celebration of Albert's coronation as King of the May.

They are excited at the prospect of the feast, but at last, in spite of difficulties of pitch and enunciation, the rehearsal comes to an end, and teacher and children leave the tent just as Nancy and Sid return to it, the plot having been revealed. Sid pours rum into the lemonade glass in Albert's place (to the accompaniment of the Tristan chord) and all is ready for the reception of the official procession.

Miss Wordsworth hurries the children back, and Superintendent Budd, Mrs Herring, the Mayor, Florence, the Vicar, and Lady Billows come in successively, each singing characteristic music. The anthem goes off quite well, flowers are presented, and the children are thanked for their contribution to the feast before the Vicar rises to introduce the first speaker.

This, of course, is Lady Billows, who begins with phrases of an ambitious range that rivals even Fiordiligi's. She loses her notes, but general applause covers the gap and she presents Albert with his prize of twenty-five sovereigns. In turn come speeches from the Mayor, Miss Wordsworth and Mr Budd, and finally Albert is called on to make some sort of reply. He can get no further than 'Er ... er ... thank you ... very much', but rejoicing is general, and the Vicar leads off a congratulatory ensemble, 'Albert the Good! Long may he reign!'

Albert drinks to the toast, enormously likes what he tastes, and comes round to Nancy for more, reaching her with a resounding hiccup (on a top C flat). He is cured, by drinking from the wrong side of a glass, and the curtain goes down as a fugue starts on the melody of 'Albert the Good'.

The interlude continues with the noise of the feast, then changes character as May Day turns into May Night and becomes a nocturne. Scene ii takes place inside Mrs Herring's shop. Albert comes back from the feast and sings exuberant reminiscences of his triumph, punctuating his song by banging the shop door and ringing the bell. In his scena, he runs through a variety of subjects, starting with the necessity of finding some matches to the charms of Nancy – and at mention of her, Sid's whistle can be heard outside in the street. Nancy comments sympathetically on Albert's plight, they sing a short but forceful duet, kiss, and are off, leaving behind a much shaken, even an excited Albert. He remembers the money in his pocket and decides to toss for it, whether he shall go off on the bust ... or not. It comes down 'heads for yes', and he starts off to find out what he has been missing.

Act III. The prestissimo prelude immediately suggests the atmosphere of man-hunt which follows the discovery of Albert's disappearance. Nancy sings three verses of an aria which has been aptly described as Mahlerian in feeling, before Sid comes wearily into the shop, complaining that one can hear nothing but Albert's name everywhere.

Superintendent Budd asks for Mrs Herring, who comes down, a picture of inconsolable grief. She has only one photograph of Albert, but the Superintendent is welcome to that for identification purposes. Mrs Herring begins the quartet (come un lamento) which ensues.

Harry complicates matters with his shouted: 'There's a Big White Something in Mrs Williams' well', and Mrs Herring collapses, just as Lady Billows comes to join in the practical side of the hunt. A procession appears escorting the Mayor, who carries a tray on which is Albert's orange-blossom wreath – 'Found on the road to Campsey Ash, crushed by a cart'. There ensues the Threnody, 'In the midst of life is death, Death awaits us one and all', a great ensemble for nine voices, on an ostinato. Each individual has a characteristic verse to himself, the others meanwhile continuing the lament, marked grave.

The shop bell rings, and Albert peers round the door. Immediately a storm of recrimination breaks around his head. Only Sid and Nancy take his part as Albert starts to tell them a story in which more is hinted at than actually described. Albert blames it all on the life of repression and mollycoddling he has been forced to lead. At the end of his recital of his doings, Albert sings a tune which is at the same time ridiculously mild and inoffensive, and also warm and curiously full of understanding, even wisdom. Its effect on everyone is electrical; they have met their match and can no longer patronise their innocent May King. 'I didn't lay it on too thick, did I?' Albert asks Sid and Nancy; then, seeing the children mocking him from the window, he invites them inside to sample what the shop can offer in the way of fruit. The opera concludes as they all sing Lady Billows' 'Great news' theme, and Albert throws his orange-blossom wreath into the audience. H.

LET'S MAKE AN OPERA!

An entertainment for young people, in two parts (and three acts), text by Eric Crozier. Première at the Aldeburgh Festival, June 1949, with Gladys Parr, Anne Sharp, Elizabeth Parry, Max Worthley, Norman Lumsden, John Moules, conducted by Norman Del Mar. First performed St Louis, 1951, and subsequently all over the world.

| The Opera | The Play |
|---|---|
| Miss Baggott, the housekeeper | Gladys Parworthy...Contralto |
| Black Bob, the sweep-master, and Tom, the coachman | Norman Chaffinch, a composer Bass |
| Clem, Black Bob's assistant, and Alfred, the gardener | Max Westleton.....Tenor |
| Rowan, the nursery-maid | Pamela WiltonSoprano |
| Juliet Brook (aged fourteen) | Anne Dougall.....Soprano |
| The Conductor of the Opera | Mr HarperSpoken |
| Sam, the new sweepboy (eight) | John.....Treble |
| Gay Brook (thirteen) | BruceTreble |
| Sophie Brook (ten) | MonicaSoprano |
| John Crome (fifteen) | PeterTreble |
| Tina Crome (eight) | Mavis.....Soprano |
| Hugh Crome (eight) | Ralph.....Treble |

Place: Children's Nursery of Iken Hall, Suffolk

Time: 1810

Running Time: 45 minutes (opera only)

It is suggested that the names of the actual performers be used for the characters of the play. The accompaniment is for solo string quartet, piano duet (four hands on one piano), and percussion (one player is enough). For the grown-ups, professionals or gifted amateurs are needed, but the children (apart from Juliet) should be played by children. The composer characteristically adds a note to the effect that the boys should not be scared of using their chest voices.

Britten had written more than once for boys' voices (notably in A Ceremony of Carols and the Spring Symphony) before his first children's opera, which started a productive line taking in The Turn of the Screw, Noye's Fludde and A Midsummer Night's Dream.

The first two acts of Let's Make an Opera! are in the form of a play and illustrate the preparation and rehearsal of The Little Sweep, a children's opera which is performed in Act III.

Act I. The drawing-room of Mrs Parworthy's house. Mrs Parworthy tells a story handed down to her by her own grandmother, the Juliet Brook of the opera. There is a discussion as to whether it would be better to do it as an opera or as a play, but the decision is never really in doubt.

The second scene is concerned with some early stages of rehearsal and the successful auditioning of Max Westleton, of the local building office.

Act II represents the stage of the hall or theatre just before the dress rehearsal of The Little Sweep. The conductor takes the opportunity of rehearsing the audience in the four songs it is required to sing.

Act III. The Little Sweep has no overture but opens with the first of the four audience songs, the 'Sweep Song'. When the curtain rises, the nursery can be seen in all its prettiness, and Clem and Black Bob in their turn are heard singing the 'Sweep Song' as they drag in little Sammy, their apprentice. One of the things attempted earlier in the play is an explanation of 'ensemble' – each person has his or her own musical line. An ensemble of exactly this type is the second number of the opera, and the definition is made doubly clear, since each character sings his own line as a solo before joining in with it in the ensemble.

Miss Baggott takes Rowan next door to cover everything up with dust-sheets, leaving the two sweeps to get on with the job. With horrid relish, they pull Sammy's clothes off, tie a rope round his waist and send him up the chimney, with the unambiguous instruction: 'Scrape that flue clean, or I'll roast you alive.'

The children can be heard off-stage organising a game of hide-and-seek. Juliet runs in, hides under a dust-sheet and is discovered by Jonny who promptly hides with her. Before the others arrive, they hear sounds from the chimney: 'Help! I'm stuck.' They call the others, who take hold of the rope and start to pull, at first gently, then more vigorously.

Sammy comes tumbling out of the chimney, there is a moment of gasped astonishment, and then 'Is he wounded?' is the question to which all want an answer. The best Sammy can do is repeat pathetically 'Please don't send me up again.' The children quickly decide that they must hide Sammy and lead him across the dust-sheets towards the window as they lay the false trail. Footsteps can be heard, and the children bundle Sammy into their toy-cupboard, and themselves disappear under the dust-sheets. When Miss Baggott and the sweeps come into the room it is apparently empty. Straight away they notice the tell-tale footsteps, and Clem and Black Bob yell for Sam; there is no answer, and, with Miss Baggott, they launch into a ferocious vengeance trio.

Rowan is left in the room, which is still apparently empty, and she gives fervent expression to her hope that Sammy will evade his masters. The children enlist her help, and decide that the first thing to do is to give Sammy a bath. Sammy's ablutions are described in the second audience song, 'Sammy's Bath', a synco-pated tune in triple time and of vigorous character.

Rowan and the children, still to the tune of 'Sammy's Bath' and (our eyes tell us) with complete justification, sing: 'O Sammy is whiter than swans as they fly.' Sammy thanks them, and they ask him how he came to be mixed up with his blackguardly employers. Sammy explains that his father broke his hip and had to sell him to find money to support the family. There is a slow, sad ensemble in which Rowan and the children try to offer Sammy comfort ('O why do you weep through the working day?'). Jonny suggests that they should take Sammy away with them, and, after some persuasion, Rowan agrees to leave a space in the top of a trunk.

Suddenly, Miss Baggott is heard coming along the passage. To the accompaniment of music marked presto furioso Sammy is hidden in the toy-cupboard, and the toys produced as if by magic. Miss Baggott punctuates her imprecations against the sweeps with frequent references to her poor feet. The children smother her with compassion, but it is not long before Miss Baggott is at her old games again, criticising the way Rowan has done the room ('Curtains crooked') and expecting to find that the toys have not been properly tidied in the cupboard. She goes towards it to make certain, but Juliet saves the situation by collapsing dramatically.

There is another interlude, and the audience sings 'The Night Song', whose haunting tune well lives up to its description of andante tenebroso. The last scene takes place the following morning. Juliet brings Sammy his breakfast and after kisses all round he is packed into the trunk.

Tom, red-faced and permanently short of breath, with the assistance of Alfred, laid low by chronic lumbago, comes to take the trunk downstairs. It won't shift. Miss Baggott makes a great deal of fuss, but Tom and Alfred are adamant: 'Either that there box is unpacked or we leave her where she lies.' Finally a solution is found when Rowan and the children offer to lend a hand, and the trunk is triumphantly transported from the room, Miss Baggott following it with her habitual grumble: 'Don't drop it!'

There remains only the finale – the envoi it might be called. Jonny, the Twins and Rowan rush in to say good-bye, Juliet, Gay, and Sophie wave from the window and describe the progress of the carriage down the drive. The percussion imitates the horse's hooves, and the entire cast returns to the stage and sings the verses, with the audience supplying the refrain:

Allegro

The hor-ses are champ-ing, ea-ger-ly stamp-ing crack! goes the whip, as the coach-man lets slip!

BILLY BUDD

Opera in four acts, words by E.M. Forster and Eric Crozier, based on the story by Herman Melville. Première, Covent Garden, 1 December 1951, with Pears, Uppman, Dalberg, conductor Britten. First performed Wiesbaden, 1952, with Liebl, Gschwend, Stern, conductor Elmendorff; Paris, 1952, with London cast; N.B.C. Television, New York, 1952; Bloomington, U.S.A., 1952.

Revised version,¹ B.B.C. broadcast, 1961, with Pears, Joseph Ward, Langdon, conductor Britten; Covent Garden, 1964, with Richard Lewis, Kerns, Forbes Robinson, conductor Solti; Florence Festival, 1965, with Picchi, Alberto Rinaldi, Rossi-Lemeni; New York, concert performance, 1966, with Richard Lewis, Kerns, Forbes Robinson, conductor Solti; Hamburg, 1972, with Harald Ek, Richard Stilwell, Louis Hendrikx.

Captain Vere, in command of

H.M.S. 'Indomitable' Tenor
 Billy Budd Baritone
 Claggart, Master-at-Arms Bass
 Mr Redburn, First Lieutenant Baritone
 Mr Flint, Sailing Master Baritone
 Lieutenant Ratcliffe Bass
 Red Whiskers, an impressed man Tenor
 Donald, a member of the crew Baritone
 Dansker, an old seaman Bass
 A Novice Tenor
 Squeak, ship's corporal Tenor
 Bosun Baritone
 First and Second Mates Baritones
 Maintop Tenor
 The Novice's Friend Baritone
 Arthur Jones, an impressed man Baritone
 Four Midshipmen Boy's Voices
 Officers, Sailors, Powder Monkeys, Drummers, Marines

Place: On board H.M.S. Indomitable, a 'Seventy-Four'

Time: During the French Wars of 1797

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Britten had already discussed the possibility of collaboration with the novelist E.M. Forster before deciding on a subject, and the story goes that writer and musician simultaneously and independently suggested Herman Melville's last story, Billy Budd, to each other. The co-operation of Eric Crozier was enlisted when Forster insisted that his own knowledge of stage procedure was inadequate. The libretto, apart from the shanties and a direct quotation from Melville's own ballad, 'Billy in the Darbies', is in prose, and there are no women in the cast.

The background to the story is to be found in the ideas aroused by the philosophical implications of the French Revolution, and in conditions in the British Navy at that time. The action is set in 1797, just after the mutinies at Spithead and the Nore, when memories of 'the floating Republic' were still very much in people's minds. Fear of mutiny, and of anything which might be a prelude to mutiny, dominated the reactions of the officers, and conditions on board ship in 1797 were such as to be conducive to unrest and disaffection.

Act I. In the Prologue, Captain Vere is shown as an old man. Years after his retirement, he meditates on his career and what it has taught him, on the mystery of good and evil, and on the unfathomable ways of Providence which allows a flaw in every attempt at good. Doubt, expressed musically by an ambiguity between the keys of B flat major and B minor, provides the emotional key to the scene. We hear the music later associated with Billy's stammer when Vere refers to 'some imperfection in the divine image'. The Prologue comes to an end as Vere's mind goes back to the year 1797.

The lights go up on the main deck and quarter-deck of H.M.S. Indomitable. An area of the main deck is being 'holy-stoned' by some sailors, who sing while they work. Their music has a double significance: it suggests the half-contented, half-dangerous swell of a calm sea in its motion, and derivations from it are used throughout the opera in connection with the idea of mutiny. In the last scene of the opera, it returns with increased emotional effect (Ex. 1):

Mr Flint watches the work, pulls a man up for not taking his full share in it, and gives orders to the Bosun; a party of young Midshipmen (trebles) try to show their authority by giving orders in their turn; and all the while the working song continues. One of the men, the Novice, collides accidentally with the Bosun and is threatened with the cat; the Bosun organises a working party to hoist a sail. The Novice slips and the Bosun turns savagely on him and has Squeak, the police corporal, list him for twenty strokes.

The stage empties, leaving Mr Flint alone on the quarter-deck. The look-out spots the guard-boat returning from a press-ganging expedition, Mr

¹ See footnote page 113.

Redburn comes up on deck, Claggart is sent for, and preparations are made for the reception of the recruits, while Mr Flint grumbles away. Mr Ratcliffe, who has led the party which boarded the merchantman, Rights o' Man, reports that he has returned with three recruits. As Claggart steps forward to question them, he is announced by the tuba and timpani, and his first utterance constitutes his motif: 'Your honour, I am at your disposal'.

musical score for Claggart's motif, 'Your honour, I am at your disposal'. The score is in 4/4 time, key of D major. It features a tuba part (p) and a timpani part (8va). The vocal line is marked 'dolce ad lib.' and 'p'. The lyrics are 'hon - our I am at your dis - po - sal'.

Red Whiskers does his best to protest, Arthur Jones replies meekly enough, and finally Billy Budd answers confidently and enthusiastically that the sea is his life and his trade is 'Able Seaman'. When asked about his parents, he is undismayed: 'Haven't any. They say I was a ... was a ...' – and the stammer music is heard as he tries to get out the word 'foundling'. The officers are delighted with their new recruit and place him in the foretop watch. In an exhilarating passage Billy rejoices in his new life: 'Billy Budd, king of the birds!' He ends with a farewell to the ship on which he served: 'Farewell to you, old comrades, farewell to you for ever ... Farewell, Rights o' Man' (Ex. 1). This brings an immediate reaction from the officers, who jump to the conclusion that it has political significance.

The decks are cleared, and Mr Redburn instructs Claggart to keep a watch on the new recruit. Claggart waits until the First Lieutenant has gone below, then vents his spleen: 'Do they think I am deaf? ... These officers! They are naught but dust in the wind.' He summons Squeak, who thinks at first it is Red Whiskers he is to watch but is told to keep an eye on Billy Budd, and to provoke him by petty thefts from his kit-bag. Claggart continues to express his hatred of the life in which he finds himself, but is interrupted by the arrival of the Novice's friend to report that the flogging has taken place and that the offender has collapsed as a result of it; he cannot walk. 'Let him crawl' is Claggart's cynical reaction as a sad little procession comes in to a pathetic tune on the saxophone (the particular colour of this instrument is associated with the Novice). In the subdued ensemble which follows (a trio, as the semi-chorus sings in unison), the Novice expresses utter despair and the others try to comfort him, in spite of their conviction 'We're all of us lost for ever on the endless sea' (Ex. 3):

musical score for the saxophone part, 'Lento Sax. pp espress.'. The score is in 3/4 time, key of D major. It features a saxophone part (Sax.) marked 'pp espress.'.

As they go out, Billy and Dansker, followed by Donald and Red Whiskers, emerge from the shadows. Their scherzando quartet is in complete contrast to what has gone before. The old hands make fun of Red Whiskers and assure him and Billy that it will be their turn next. The horse-play comes to a sudden end as Claggart appears on deck, and a moment later Captain's Muster is heard (on the flutes). Donald has just time to refer to the captain as 'Starry Vere' (it is Vere's motif, the inversion of Ex. 3, the lament) before musical score for the ship's company, 'Starry Vere'. The score is in 2/4 time, key of D major. It features a vocal line with the lyrics 'Star - - - ry Vere'.

the ship's company comes quickly on deck, and is ordered by Claggart to fall in without delay.¹

The officers make their way on to the quarter-deck, and as the music reaches a climax, Vere himself appears. In language and music that are quite free from bombast, he addresses the ship's company: they are nearing action. He will do everything he can for contact with Billy Budd is postponed to the second scene of that act. The music at the opening of Act IV being similar to that at the end of Act III, the running of those two acts together has the effect of eliding no more than a few bars of music. The original version has been followed in this synopsis.

¹ In 1961 Britten condensed the opera to two acts, a version which has found slightly less than universal favour. Act I's finale disappeared completely, with the consequence that Captain Vere is seen first in private, and not until Act IV face to face with the ship's company; and that direct

Billy Budd (Covent Garden, 1951). Claggart (Frederick Dalberg) interrupts the fight in Act II (now Act I scene iii); Theodor Uppman as Billy.

them when it comes to battle, and victory must come from their combined efforts. There is enthusiasm for what he has to say, and Billy leads a chorus of praise for Vere as the act comes to an end.

Act II. Evening, a week later. Vere, alone in his cabin, is reading, but looks up from his book, and in a few beautiful arioso phrases prays that he and his company may be allowed grace to emulate the virtues and the courage of the people of ancient times: 'O God, grant me light'. Mr Redburn and Mr Flint are announced, and together they and Vere drink the King's health, then fall to discussing the prospect of action. Flint takes a bluff seaman's view of the war, and starts a scherzando duet, 'Don't like the French', in which Redburn joins. Vere admits he shares their sentiments; another toast – 'The French, down with them!'

The word 'mutiny' creeps into the conversation, and in a short aria Redburn takes up Flint's reference to 'Spithead, the Nore, the floating republic' (Ex. 1). He was there, and he knows what mutiny of that sort can mean. Vere denounces the ideas, French in their origin, which gave rise to the scandal of the Nore. 'We must be on our guard' is his conclusion. The others remember 'that young chap who shouted out "Rights o' Man"', but Vere is of the opinion that there is nothing to fear from that quarter. The sound of singing can be heard from below, and Vere makes a kindly reference to the loyalty of their crew, before Mr Redburn knocks briskly on the door and announces, 'Land on the port bow ... Enemy waters.' The two officers leave Vere to go to their stations and the Captain is left alone, first reading, then listening more and more intently to the sound of the shanty which wells up from the berth-deck.

Scene ii. The berth-deck. It is preceded by an orchestral interlude, making use of the shanty which has already been hinted at in the cabin scene ('Blow her to Hilo'), going on to a second ('Over the water'), and then returning to the first to land with overwhelming effect on a great golden chord of E flat major (chorus and orchestra) as the curtain rises. The scene is animated and yet contented. The first shanty drifts slowly to an end and Donald starts another in a brisker tempo: 'We're off to Samoa, by way of Genoa.'

Billy and Red Whiskers try to persuade Dansker to join in the fun, but he pleads age and indifference. Billy offers to lend him the tobacco he wants and goes off to get it from his kit-bag. The sound of his stammer is heard, and a moment later he drags Squeak out, the corporal protesting that he has not been at Billy's kit-bag as Billy seems to think. A fight begins, Billy floors him, and next thing Claggart is among them, demanding to know how the whole thing started. He turns to Dansker for an explanation. Squeak is arrested, and, when he threatens to blow the gaff on Claggart, gagged as well. 'As for you ...', says Claggart, turning to Billy, 'Handsomely done, my lad. And handsome is as handsome did it, too' (the words are Melville's).

Claggart remains motionless, muttering 'Handsomely done, my lad' to himself. When the lights have receded from the hammocks, he permits expression of the thoughts which govern his heart: 'O beauty, O handsomeness, goodness, would that I never encountered you!' Claggart recognises in Billy what Iago found in Cassio, or, as Claggart himself puts it, 'The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness comprehends it and suffers'. His musical denunciation of the power of good with which he finds his own evil face to face is accompanied by a trombone solo, and the sinister power of the aria reaches a climax with its ending: 'I, John Claggart, Master-at-Arms upon the Indomitable, have you in my power, and I will destroy you.'

Claggart's revelation of his evil purpose is immediately followed by the entrance of the Novice (Ex. 3). Two curious scenes ensue, both nocturnal in character and marked pianissimo. The first is between Claggart and the Novice, whom he has summoned with a view to forcing him, through his fear of future punishment, to obtain evidence against Billy. The Novice, after a moment of revulsion against the scheme, accepts the guineas which Claggart gives him to pass on to Billy.

The second nocturne-like scene is between Billy and the Novice, and it is introduced by a tune of uncanny peace, on a solo cello over two bass clarinets (Ex. 5; the tune is heard again in a far more extended form at the beginning of Act IV):

Billy takes time to wake up, and even longer before he understands the import of what the Novice is driving at, with his talk of pressing and gangs and whether Billy won't lead them. When he tumbles to it, the Novice scampers off as Billy is seized with another fit of stammering, which resolves itself when Dansker appears on the scene. Billy's nervousness betrays itself in some agitated phrases as he tries to tell Dansker what the fuss is about. But Dansker understands all too well when he hears what Billy has to say about guineas and mutiny. The act ends with a big-scale duet for Billy and Dansker, which is cast in the form of a passacaglia. Dansker enunciates its theme with a variation of Claggart's motif:

Billy is convinced that Claggart likes him, that he himself likes the life on board where his ship-mates are his friends, that he is rumoured as a candidate for promotion. Dansker's rejoinder is unvarying: 'Jemmy-legs is down on you'.

Act III¹ brings the action with the French to an unachieved climax, and sees the conclusion of Claggart's efforts to pull down the power for good which he has detected in the ship's company.

The first scene is as for Act I, some days later. The music is already dominated by the ostinato rhythm which is used for the battle. Vere and Redburn are worried by the look of the rapidly increasing mist, but further conversation is prevented by the appearance of the Master-at-Arms, who removes his cap as a sign that he wishes to speak to the Captain. Vere's thoughts are still concerned with the effect the weather is likely to have on the prospect of action, but he consents to see Claggart. The latter, with frequent reference to his own long and faithful service, starts to formulate a charge against some sailor as yet unnamed, who, he says, is likely to endanger the safety of the ship. Vere grows impatient at Claggart's circumlocution, but the interview is cut short by a yell from the main-top: 'Enemy sail on starboard bow!'

The mist lifts and instantly the ship (like the music) hums with activity. Sail is crowded on, Vere orders action stations, and the heartfelt relief of the crew at the prospect of a reward for the weeks of waiting is expressed in an exhilarating, rising theme, 'This is our moment, the moment we've been waiting for'. Gunners run to their guns and start loading, seamen go to the nettings with lashed hammocks and stow them as a rough screen against shot, sand is scattered on deck, water-tubs and matches are made ready, powder monkeys with a high-pitched and continuous yell scramble to their stations, and finally the marines march into position. A call for volunteers for a boarding party is answered by Donald, Red Whiskers, Dansker, and (from high up in the rigging) Billy. All is ready and excitement reaches fever-pitch, but the enemy is still out of range. There is a general prayer for wind to fill the sails, a moment when it looks as though anticipation will be realised, the climax when a shot is fired, and then frustration which amounts almost to despair when the mist returns. Orders are given to dismiss.

Claggart is again seen standing cap in hand waiting to be noticed by the Captain. This time Vere makes no attempt to hide his impatience at the evasive way in which Claggart starts out to tell his story. When the Master-at-Arms shows the Captain the gold, Vere is sceptical; how would a sailor have gold in his possession? At Claggart's naming of Billy Budd, Vere is frankly incredulous. The Master-at-Arms persists, and Vere flares up at him: 'Claggart! Take heed what you say. There's a yard-arm for a false witness.' He sends a boy for Billy and tells Claggart to follow the accused into his room.

As the officers come forward Vere exclaims vehemently: 'O this cursed mist.' There is a short quartet, one of those moments of tenderness in which the score abounds and which seems to express a sympathy with the aspirations of the crew, as well as (from Vere's point of view) a determination to clear up a mystery which is rapidly becoming inextricably connected with the physical phenomenon of the mist. In the interlude which follows, the music of the mist surrounds chorale-like statements of Vere's prayer for light, and the conflict is clearly that going on in the mind of Vere.

Fanfares associated with Billy bring the interlude to an end, and the curtain goes up to reveal Vere with the mists cleared and his mind made up. Billy is confident he has been summoned to hear that he has been promoted, and Vere encourages him to talk, which he does enthusiastically, while, to a lyrical tune, Vere reflects 'this is the man I'm told is dangerous'.

Claggart is admitted, and, after Vere has cautioned both men to speak only the truth, proceeds immediately to charge Billy with mutiny. Billy is seized with stammering and suddenly hits out at Claggart, striking him a blow in the middle of the forehead. Claggart falls, and lies motionless. Vere quickly realises he is dead, sends Billy into his state-room, then orders his cabin boy to fetch the officers.

¹ Act II in the revised version.

Vere is in no doubt as to his predicament. Claggart's evil purpose is clear enough, and yet his innocent victim by his own action has doomed himself. Vere's agony is made very apparent in a monologue. The officers enter the cabin and are immediately told the facts.

Vere summons a drumhead court, which he will attend as witness. Billy is brought in, and Vere states the bare facts. Billy agrees that they are true, and can plead nothing but his innocence of what Claggart charged him with. Vere declines to add supposition to the facts. The three officers appeal for guidance to Vere, but he refuses to intervene. The verdict is 'Guilty'. Vere accepts the verdict, and orders that sentence be carried out next morning.

In Billy Budd, the tragedy is seen as it were through the eyes of Vere, and poignant expression of it comes at the end of this act, first in an arioso for Vere himself, and then in the extraordinary ending when, after Vere has gone to inform Billy of the verdict and the stage is left empty, Britten writes a succession of thirty-five common chords, whose different dynamics and scoring convey the changes of emotion with which the message is given and received. It is in effect a great cadence in F major, and in the last half-a-dozen bars recurs a suggestion of the 6/8 tune heard when Billy was woken up by the Novice in Act II (Ex. 5).

Act IV. The first scene shows a bay of the gun deck. Billy is in irons. The music continues where Act III left off, and above the gently swaying accompaniment Billy sings a slow, pathetic tune of resignation (Ex. 5). The words are Melville's, taken from the poem which he describes as composed by a shipmate after the execution and put posthumously into the mouth of Billy himself ('Billy in the Darbies').

Billy's introspection comes to an end when Dansker steals in. 'All's trouble,' he says, 'Some reckon to rescue you ... they swear you shan't swing.' The notion that his death may precipitate the mutiny which he abhors fills Billy with new courage. What has happened and is going to happen to him he ascribes to the workings of fate: he had to 'strike down that Jemmy-legs', and 'Captain Vere has had to strike me down, fate'. His new courage finds expression in an ecstatic ballad tune, which is as simple as it is moving ('And farewell to ye old "Rights o' Man!"). The chords from the previous act recur in the accompaniment.

The interlude is made up from the calls associated with the ship's routine and the music of the verdict. Daylight is just beginning to show, and the ship's crew assembles to the sound of a funeral march, which can be described as a fugue on a rhythm of timpani and drums, on which is imposed music characteristic of each group as it enters to watch the grim pageantry of the execution. Vere takes his place and straight away Billy is led in between a guard of marines. Mr Redburn reads the sentence, Billy turns to Vere and shouts to him 'Starry Vere, God bless you', and his cry is taken up by the crew. He marches smartly out. Vere removes his hat and all eyes turn to follow Billy as he ascends the mast.

The men on the main deck suffer an immediate revulsion of feeling, and turn in revolt to the quarter-deck. This is the moment described in Melville: 'Whoever has heard the freshet-wave of a torrent suddenly swelled by pouring showers in tropical mountains, showers not shared by the plain; whoever has heard the first muffled murmur of its sloping advance through precipitous woods, may form some conception of the sound now heard.'

Britten writes a presto fugue on a variation of the mutiny theme (to the sound of 'ur' in 'purple'), but this savage incoherence gradually changes to a passionate echo of the swelling music associated with the routine work in the first act (Ex. 1). Such ending to the drama seems to indicate that this is no theme of disillusionment but rather carries a message of confidence, if not in God itself, at least in Man's capacity to understand.

The light fades and presently Vere is seen standing alone, an old man as in the Prologue. For a moment it looks as though he finds the memory of what he might have prevented too much for him ('I could have saved him ... O what have I done?'), but he takes strength from Billy's ballad and this is combined with the 'cadence of comfort' from the end of Act III. The Epilogue comes quietly to an end as the orchestra stops playing, the lights fade, and only Vere's voice is heard rounding out the story. H.

GLORIANA

Opera in three acts, words by William Plomer. First performed Covent Garden at a Gala in connection with the Coronation of Queen Elizabeth II, 8 June 1953, with Cross (later Shacklock), Vyvyan (later Sutherland), Sinclair, Leigh, Pears (later Lanigan), Geraint Evans, Matters, Dalberg, Te Wiata, conductor Pritchard; Cincinnati, 1955, with Borkh, Conley, conductor Krips; London, Royal Festival Hall, 1963, with Fisher, Pears; Sadler's Wells, 1966, with Fisher, Vyvyan, Wakefield, John Cameron, Garrard, conductor Bernardi (by Sadler's Wells Company in Brussels and Lisbon, 1967); Münster, 1968, with Martha Mödl; English National Opera, Munich, 1972, Vienna, 1975, conductor Mackerras; 1984, San Antonio, New Orleans and Metropolitan, New York, in U.S. stage première, with Sarah Walker, Arthur Davies, conductor Mark Elder; Opera North, 1994, with Barstow, Thomas Randle, conductor Paul Daniel, producer Phyllida Lloyd.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Queen Elizabeth the First..... | Soprano |
| Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex | Tenor |
| Frances, Countess of Essex | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy..... | Baritone |
| Penelope (Lady Rich), sister to Essex | Soprano |
| Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary of the Council | Baritone |
| Sir Walter Raleigh, Captain of the Guard | Bass |
| Henry Cuffe, a satellite of Essex | Baritone |
| A Lady-in-Waiting | Soprano |
| A Blind Ballad-Singer | Bass |
| The Recorder of Norwich | Bass |
| A Housewife | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Spirit of the Masque..... | Tenor |
| The Master of Ceremonies | Tenor |
| The City Crier | Baritone |
| Chorus, Dancers, Actors, Musicians | |

Place: England

Time: The Later Years of the Reign (1558–1603) of Queen Elizabeth I

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Britten in 1952 became intrigued at the idea of writing a 'national' opera in connection with the coronation the following year of Queen Elizabeth II. He decided on a subject from an earlier, golden Elizabethan age, taking as his theme not the supposed romance between Elizabeth I and the Earl of Essex, rather the contrast between the public and private life of the Queen, the conflict between instinct and duty.

Act I, scene i. The prelude is marked 'very lively', and the rhythm of the brass calls anticipates the chorus's commentary on the events of scene i, which take place outside a tilting ground. A tournament is in progress inside. Cuffe watches and reports to Essex that Mountjoy has accepted a challenge and that the crowd acclaims its favourite. Essex is furiously jealous, when, to the evident delight of the crowd, Mountjoy is victorious and receives his prize – a golden chessman – from the Queen herself.

At this point the bustle and excitement of the tournament give way to a hymn-like tune sung by the crowd in praise of the Queen (Ex. 1):

Green leaves are we, Red rose our golden Queen,
O crowned rose among the leaves so green.

Slowly moving

The music symbolises the affectionate relationship between the Queen and her subjects, and is one of the opera's dominant themes.

Mountjoy appears and bids his page bind his prize upon his arm. Essex accuses him of arrogance and provokes him to fight. A trumpet fanfare off-stage causes Essex to drop his guard, and he is slightly wounded in the arm. The trumpets draw nearer, and the Queen emerges from the tilting ground, surrounded by her court. She wastes no time in summing up the situation and upbraids both lords for offending against the rule that no duel may be fought at court. It is to Raleigh for his view that she turns, and he gives it – as one 'of riper age'. In an aside, both Essex and Mountjoy make quite clear that they bitterly resent what they regard as Raleigh's insolence – he is older and more experienced than they are but of far less exalted rank, and they object the more for that.

The Queen summons the two late combatants and tells them she has need of them both; let them come to court as friends, and they can count on her support and protection. After an ensemble, a trumpet march brings the scene to an end (Ex. 1).

Scene ii. The Queen's ante-room in Nonesuch Palace. The Queen is closeted alone with Cecil. She refers to the recent duel between the two young lords, and asks Cecil whether he has had news of the reaction of Lady Rich to the fight – 'the dark Penelope' who is sister to Essex, mistress to oppressed', a little lyric whose enchanting, quicksilver grace is too remote from the Queen's mood to afford her the comfort she seeks. Essex sings again, this time quietly, slowly, and with a depth of feeling and sensitivity that affords a musical recreation of that quality which one may suppose caused the Queen to pin her faith for the future to her brilliant but unpredictable cousin (Ex. 4):

As the Queen and her counsellor turn to affairs of state, a theme is heard which is associated throughout the opera with the cares of government, and often, because his presence betokens preoccupation with them, with Cecil as well. Its optimistic rise in the major and measured fall in the minor are characteristic. At mention of the possibility of a new Armada from Spain, the Queen laments the certain waste of life and money:

Queen _____ of my life

The musical notation shows a melody for the vocal line and a piano accompaniment. The vocal line starts with a treble clef and a key signature of one flat (B-flat). The melody for 'Queen' is written on a single staff with a slur over the notes. The piano accompaniment is written on a grand staff (treble and bass clefs) with a key signature of one flat. The piano part features a simple harmonic accompaniment with a bass line and a treble line.

Very freely (slow)

Hap - - - py hap - - -

- - - py were he

There is an affectionate duet between the two, which is interrupted when Elizabeth points to the silhouette of Raleigh, which can be seen at the entrance. Essex refers to Raleigh as ‘the jackal’, and denounces him as his enemy who is, with Cecil, determined to prevent him going to Ireland, there to overthrow the Queen’s enemy, Tyrone. At this point occurs a phrase associated with Essex’s fatal ambitions, which plays a prominent part in the opera (Ex. 5):

³ Its first phrase is based on the opening of a madrigal by Wilbye, 'Happy were he'.

The Queen dismisses Essex and is alone.

Her thoughts run to duty and to love – the claims of one, the solace of the other, and their mutual incompatibility. Her soliloquy begins with a forte statement on the trombones of Ex. 1, which dominates it. After a triumphant resolution,

I live and reign a virgin,
Will die in honour,
Leave a refulgent crown,

the Queen prays to God for strength and grace to fulfil the high office to which she has been called.

Act II, scene i. The Guildhall at Norwich. It was Queen Elizabeth's custom to make periodic tours of England – during which time she was said to be 'On Progress' – and, when the curtain rises (in crushed-note chords, the town bells peal in the orchestra), she is attended by her court, Essex, Cecil, Raleigh, and Mountjoy among them, and the Recorder of the City of Norwich is coming to the end of his address of welcome. The Queen thanks him and the citizens for their greetings, and, when the Recorder comes to kneel in homage and stumbles, helps him solicitously to his feet. The Recorder asks her if she will see the Masque they have prepared in her honour, an invitation to which the Queen signifies her assent but which provokes an impatient aside from Essex, chafing at the enforced inactivity (Ex. 5). Ireland is again uppermost in his mind.

The Masque begins. The music is a set of six contrasted dances, introduced by the Spirit of the Masque and set for unaccompanied voices. The Queen graciously returns thanks to the citizens of Norwich, and the finale makes great use of Ex. 1.

Scene ii. The garden of Essex's house. It is evening. The fresh, lyrical atmosphere of the early part of the scene is immediately established. Mountjoy sings of his love for Penelope Rich, who presently appears and greets him rapturously. Their duet has not run its course before it is interrupted by the voices of Essex and Lady Essex, who do not see them and are discussing the Queen's continued refusal to advance Essex to the position of Lord Deputy in Ireland. Essex's anger mounts – 'In time, I'll break her will, I'll have my way' – and a quartet develops, in which Essex's impatience overflows, Lady Essex urges caution, and first Penelope, later even Mountjoy, encourage him to hope for preferment as time reduces the Queen's grasp on power.

Scene iii. The palace of Whitehall, at a ball given by the Queen. The whole scene is built up on a series of dances in the Elizabethan style, which are played on the stage and used to frame a considerable development of the dramatic situation. A majestic Pavane is taken up by the stage band as soon as the curtain rises; the court is dancing. The Queen's lady-in-waiting comments admiringly on the splendour of Lady Essex's dress. 'Will the Queen approve?' is Frances's less confident reply as the Master of Ceremonies announces a Galliard, a quick dance to slow music (it is marked gently flowing).

The Queen enters (Ex. 1), catches sight of Lady Essex and looks her up and down, then orders that 'La Volta' be played. This is a brilliant piece in 6/4 time; its salient feature was the tossing of the ladies in the air by their partners (a famous picture of Queen Elizabeth dancing 'La Volta' exists at Penshurst). The vigorous nature of the dance exhausts even the apparently inexhaustible Queen, and she commands that the ladies go to change their linen, while a Morris dancer performs for the entertainment of those who remain. At the end of the dance, Lady Essex hurries in, breathlessly complaining that her new dress has disappeared while she was changing. The reason is not far to seek, for the Queen suddenly returns, wearing the missing dress. It is much too short for her, and she looks grotesque. She stalks around, while the court looks on in amazement, then turns to Lady Essex:

If being too short it becometh not me
I have it in mind it can ne'er become thee.¹

The Queen leaves, and in an ensemble Essex, Mountjoy, and Penelope attempt to comfort the stricken Frances Essex, who for her part is more concerned with the inflammatory effect the episode may have on her husband than with the insult offered to herself. Her anxiety is not without foundation; to her own conciliatory 'And as the Queen hath her conditions, Robert, take care!' Essex retorts 'Conditions! Her conditions are as crooked as her carcase!' So unguarded and extreme an utterance dismays even Penelope, but as usual the Queen turns out to be unpredictable. She caps her insult to Essex's wife by returning to the stage with her Councillors to proclaim formally that Essex is appointed Lord Deputy in Ireland and charged to subdue the rebellious Tyrone (Ex. 5). The chorus salutes the 'Victor of Cadiz' and implores him to overcome the foreign threat, while the Queen and the other principal characters react to the appointment in their different ways. Essex himself sings of the charge entrusted to him (Ex. 5), and the scene comes to an end when the Queen commands a 'Coranto' which is danced by the entire court as the curtain comes down, the full orchestra, with its intimations of Essex's star in the ascendant, gradually swamping the stage band with its dance music.

¹ The episode may at first strike a modern audience as too grotesque to be credible, but it is based on an authenticated incident, when the Queen humiliated a lady of the court suspected of being Essex's mistress.

Act III. The tragedy of Gloriana is first of all that which almost inevitably, in some way or other, attends a ruling prince, and only secondly that of Essex, the individual in whose fate the sovereign's hopes for the future of the country are epitomised. The catastrophe which is to bring about the fall of Essex – the failure in Ireland – has already taken place when Act III begins; and it is the Queen we see take the 'tragic' decision, not Essex. The working out of his destiny involves the tragedy of the Queen whose trust he held.

Scene i. The prelude is marked quick and agitated. When the curtain goes up we are in the Queen's ante-room at Nonesuch. It is early morning and the maids of honour are in conversation. The subject is Ireland. The news is of delay, and instead of the defeat of Tyrone, it looks as though they will soon be talking of the fall of Essex. Suddenly another lady-in-waiting enters in great perturbation to ask if the Queen is yet dressed. There is a great stir below ... She need go no further, for Essex himself bursts into the room, demanding to see the Queen. When told she is not yet ready, he sweeps back the curtain behind which she can be seen at her dressing-table without her wig.

She dismisses her attendants, and turns to him. At first the interview is quiet. There is a moment of sadness ('You see me as I am'), which leads to a tender duet, and it is not until Essex mentions the foes who 'beset me now here in England, at home' (Ex. 5) that the Queen rounds on him and puts her as yet unspoken accusations into words. He has failed in his trust; he is not only unfit but untrue. Essex pleads his devotion, and the scene grows in intensity as the music gets slower and softer, anger replaced by the agony of the might-have-been, until Essex and the Queen together recall the song which has symbolised their relationship (Ex. 4). 'Go, Robin, go! Go!'

The Queen is joined by the ladies-in-waiting, who sing gently and comfortingly to their mistress. When Cecil arrives, the Queen is majestically arrayed (Ex. 1). He tells her that Tyrone is still unsubdued, and that Essex has not only failed in his mission but has brought with him a horde of his unruly followers. The Queen makes up her mind without delay and gives orders that Essex be kept under supervision. The music is dominated by Ex. 5.

Scene ii. A street in the City of London. The short orchestral prelude is based on a theme that is taken up by a blind Ballad-Singer¹ who sits outside a tavern and relays what he hears to his listeners. He is the medium through which we hear of the progress of Essex's rebellion, from the moment when it is first discovered that the Earl is free until Essex is publicly proclaimed a traitor by the City Crier. The scene is built up on the Ballad-Singer's tune ('To bind by force, to bolt with bars the wonder of this age').

Scene iii. A room in the Palace of Whitehall. The orchestra preludes on a theme later sung by the Queen ('Essex is guilty and condemned to die'). The curtain goes up to show Cecil, Raleigh, and other members of the Council waiting to acquaint the Queen with their decision in the case of the Earl of Essex. They are unanimously agreed that he is guilty, but Cecil warns them that the Queen may yet hesitate to make up her mind, may even pardon him. They inform her of the verdict and, when Cecil tries to press her to make a quick decision, she forbids him to prate to her of her duty.

She is alone and in a crucial scene her dilemma is forcefully portrayed until Raleigh steps in and announces that Lady Essex, Penelope Rich, and Mountjoy have come to intercede for the fallen Essex. After an ensemble, Lady Essex is promised (Ex. 1) that, whatever happens to her husband, her children will not suffer. It is the turn of Penelope to make her plea, which she does in terms which can only be described as feudal: it is not only Essex's service to his Queen but his rank which entitles him to a pardon. The Queen is roused to fury by her words, and sends for the warrant to sign it in the presence of the woman who opened her eyes to danger. Penelope shrieks with anguish as the orchestra has a fff statement of Ex. 4, which is to dominate the rest of the opera.

¹ In Elizabethan times, ballad-singers were accustomed to convey the news of the day in their impromptu ballads, which they sang accompanying themselves on the gittern, a stringed instrument; they were thus a cross between newspaper-seller, news commentator and calypso singer.

From the departure of Essex's three supporters, the stage darkens and the action becomes unrealistic – as if to emphasise this, the dialogue is mostly spoken against an orchestral background of Ex. 4. Various episodes of the end of Queen Elizabeth's life are recalled – Cecil pleads to be allowed to approach James VI of Scotland about his succession, the Queen makes her so-called Golden Speech to the House of Commons ('I have ever used to set the last Judgement Day before mine eyes'), Cecil appears again in an effort to get the Queen to go to bed. As the Queen's life draws to its close, from behind the scenes can be heard the chorus singing softly to the tune of Ex. 1.

Gloriana together with its composer was under strident attack at the time of its Coronation première, some critics, amateur rather than professional, deciding that it was an insult to the young Queen Elizabeth to show her ageing predecessor partly in a human rather than an exclusively regal light. Yet the work is a product of the composer's early maturity, full of operatic insight, arguably the most relaxed he had yet written, and a complete vindication, one might think, of his attempt to write at the same time a 'national' opera and for a specifically 'grand' occasion. That it was misunderstood and disliked by a 1953 assemblage of grandees and courtiers provides a rather acid comment on the different standards prevailing in the mid-twentieth and the late sixteenth centuries, when a luminary of the aristocracy could be the author of the words of 'Happy were he'.

H.

THE TURN OF THE SCREW

Opera in a prologue and two acts, libretto by Myfanwy Piper, after the story by Henry James. Première by the English Opera Group at the Venice Festival, 14 September 1954, with Jennifer Vyvyan, Joan Cross, Arda Mandikian, Olive Dyer, David Hemmings, Peter Pears, conductor Britten. First performed Sadler's Wells (by English Opera Group), 6 October 1954, by the same cast; Florence Festival, 1955; Stratford, Ontario, 1957; Berlin, 1957, all by the English Opera Group. First independent production, Darmstadt, 1958, with Ursula Lippmann, Martha Geister, Dorothea von Stein, George Maran, conductor Hans Zanotelli; Stockholm, 1959, with Elisabeth Söderström; Boston, U.S.A. (first professional American performance), 1961, with Patricia Neway, Richard Cassilly, conductor Julius Rudel; Scottish Opera, 1970, with Catherine Wilson, Gregory Dempsey; English National Opera, 1979, with Eilene Hannan, Ava June, Rosalind Plowright, Graham Clark, conductor Lionel Friend, producer Jonathan Miller.

| | |
|---|---------|
| The Prologue | Tenor |
| The Governess | Soprano |
| Miles } children in her charge | Treble |
| Flora } | Soprano |
| Mrs Grose, the housekeeper | Soprano |
| Miss Jessel, the former governess | Soprano |
| Peter Quint, the former manservant | Tenor |

Place: Bly, an English Country House

Time: The Middle of the Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

The Turn of the Screw is an operatic adaptation of Henry James's story, preserving almost every detail intact; certain episodes have been run together, but almost nothing has been omitted. The composition of the orchestra is the same as in Britten's other chamber operas, except that a thirteenth player has been added to take care of piano and celesta, which figure largely in the orchestration.

With a view to musical unity in an opera which is continuous and has a prologue and sixteen scenes (with each of which is associated a dominant instrument), the work is based on a single Theme. Each scene is connected to its successor by a musical variation on this Theme, which itself involves the twelve notes of the scale and is built up on alternatively rising fourths and falling minor thirds. It first occurs after the Prologue and before the first scene of Act I. The Theme employs the twelve semitones of the scale, but the music is so far from being dodeca-phonic that each variation and its succeeding scene has in fact a definite tonal centre, an exact calculation of key sequence being a principal means of preserving musical unity. One of the features of James's story is a series of reflections on its implications, particularly on the exact states of tension and emotion in his central character, and the variations turn the screw and form musical counterparts to these literary soliloquies, increasing the tension little by little until the final catastrophe is reached.

The Turn of the Screw (English Opera Group, Venice, 1954, director Basil Coleman, designer John Piper).
Jennifer Vyvyan (the Governess), David Hemmings (Miles), Peter Pears (Quint).

Prologue, for tenor accompanied by piano alone: 'It is a curious story. I have it written in faded ink ...'. The visit to the children's handsome guardian, the conditions which should govern the engagement (that she must assume complete responsibility and make all decisions, referring nothing to him), her doubts, and her final acceptance influenced by the trust her charming employer was prepared to put in her – these are set out in the explanatory prologue.

Act I. The Theme is presented on the piano above tremolo strings before the first scene, Ex. 1:

Very slow (♩ = 48)

The presentation of the Theme is followed by music illustrating the Governess's journey to Bly. In the first bar is heard the music associated with the main emotional influences on Miles's life, that is to say, Quint and the new Governess; it occurs a few moments later in more characteristic vocal form, Ex. 2:

The Governess voices her misgivings and wonders what her charges will be like. The variation, beginning with Ex. 1 in a higher position, takes us straight into the busy, everyday world of Bly.

The children are agog to know what their future governess will be like, Mrs Grose is more interested in getting them to practise their bows and curtsies, and before either enquiries or rehearsals are completed, the Governess is there to greet them (immediately, Ex. 2 is heard on solo violin). The children bow and curtsy and then, while Mrs Grose chatters unconcernedly on, the Governess rhapsodises on the beauty of the children and the grandeur of Bly.

The second variation (theme in the bass, otherwise music associated with the children's everyday life) takes us to the porch at Bly (scene 3). Mrs Grose brings the Governess a letter: 'Mrs Grose! He's dismissed his school.' (Here, for the first time, occurs the sound of the celesta, later associated with Quint; Ex. 3.)

The reason? 'An injury to his friends.' Has Mrs Grose ever known Miles bad? Wild, she says, but not bad, and as if to reinforce her conviction the children are heard singing the nursery rhyme 'Lavender's blue'; the duet becomes a quartet, and the scene ends with the Governess's determined answer to Mrs Grose's anxious question: 'I shall do nothing.'

Variation III, an idyllic synthesis of bird-calls on the woodwind. The Governess's lyrical aria (scene iv) shows that the peaceful environment has quieted her initial fears, but it is just at the moment when she admits herself 'alone, tranquil, serene' that a chill comes over the evening (Ex. 3) and she turns to see an unknown male figure high up on one of the towers of the house. The guardian? No! Is it a stranger or some madman locked away?

Variation IV (Ex. 1 again in the bass) marked 'very quick and heavy', anticipates the children's vigorous singing of 'Tom, Tom, the piper's son' (scene v), which in spite of its apparent gaiety takes on the character of a sinister march. The Governess comes in, and, as the children's tune dies away, Ex. 3 is heard again and the enigmatic figure of the tower is visible outside the window. She runs to see who is there, finds nobody, and returns to describe to Mrs Grose what she has seen: 'His hair was red, close-curling, a long pale face, small eyes ... He was tall, clean-shaven, yes, even handsome, but a horror!' Mrs Grose's reaction is instantaneous: 'Quint! Peter Quint!' (Ex. 3), and her grief and terror are made very evident as she tells the story of his domination of the household and of his death, Ex. 4:

Gradually Mrs Grose explains her hatred and fear of Quint, and a new figure emerges on her words 'It was not for me to say, Miss, no indeed', indicative of her diffidence. At first mention of Miss Jessel the characteristic sound of a low gong is heard, but the music is pervaded by Ex. 4.

The way the colour drains from the orchestra, like blood from the face, as the Governess understands she saw a ghost, is one of Britten's most potent strokes. The Governess thinks she understands. Her peace at Bly is at an end. Quint, in death as in life, returns to dominate the children, and her main charge must henceforth be their protection against influences which, if she cannot withstand their power, will ruin them.

A brisk double fugue introduces and rhythmically prepares the lesson scene. Miles recites the Gender Rhymes once to be found in every English school-boy's Latin Grammar ('Many nouns in -is we find ...') and Flora's enthusiasm for history is not allowed to divert him from repeating his lesson. What other tags does he know, asks the Governess; he answers in a curious, haunting melody, Ex. 5:

Slow moving ($\text{♩} = 60$)
MILES (to himself, hesitating)

Ma - lo, Ma - lo, Ma - lo I would ra - ther be, Ma - lo, Ma - lo in an ap - ple tree that seems to summarise everything mysterious that may lie behind his natural childlike gaiety. It disconcerts the Governess in its strangeness, and there is no reassurance in Miles's explanation 'I found it, I like it, do you?'

The seventh scene shows Flora in a not dissimilar light. She and the Governess are by the lake at Bly, and Flora asks if it figures in her geography book. She announces dramatically that the lake they are standing beside is called the Dead Sea. She turns from geography to the task of singing her doll to sleep while the Governess reads nearby. She arranges the covers for the doll, and deliberately turns to face the audience as the ghost of Miss Jessel appears at the other side of the lake. The Governess looks up from her reading, sees Miss Jessel (to the sound of her characteristic gong and chords), Ex. 6:

($\text{♩} = 60$)

Gong

who disappears, and immediately deduces from Flora's unnatural silence that she has seen her too. She hurries Flora away, and then faces a situation (Ex. 2) rendered doubly desperate by the certainty that each of the children under her charge is haunted by a presence from the dead.

Celesta and harp (Ex. 3) usher in the last scene of the first act, while the horn reminds us of Ex. 1 (Variation VII). It is night, and the sound of Quint's voice quietly breaks the silence with a long reiterated coloratura flourish (derived from Ex. 3), Ex. 7:

QUINT freely

Miles!

It is a moment of chilling beauty, made more effective because it is the first time a man's voice has been heard since the Prologue, and it might never have been put in quite these musical terms if the composer had not heard Peter Pears, the original Quint, singing unaccompanied Pérotin ('Beata viscera') in Aldeburgh Church a year or so earlier. Quint is eventually made out, high in the tower, as when the Governess first saw him, and Miles can be seen in the garden below him. 'I'm all things strange and bold ...', he sings to Miles who answers him. Miss Jessel's voice can be heard calling Flora, who responds. A pianissimo duet in 3/8 time, marked 'quick and lightly', develops for Quint and Miss Jessel. At its end the voices of the Governess and Mrs Grose can be heard calling for the children (Ex. 1 in the horn). As soon as they appear, the ghosts vanish, Mrs Grose hustles Flora indoors, and the Governess is left to hear Miles's enigmatic answers to her question – one of Henry James's unforgettable strokes: 'You see, I am bad, aren't I?'

Act II. Variation VIII begins with the clarinet imitating Quint's opening flourish, Ex. 7. It introduces a colloquy between Miss Jessel and Quint which mounts in urgency as each participant asserts (Ex. 2) that, with his or her peace of mind established, 'the ceremony of innocence is drowned' (the line is a quotation from Yeats, the theme derived from Ex. 2). As the ghosts fade from sight, the Governess can be heard in an agony of meditation, her aria 'Lost in my labyrinth, I see no truth', sung over a complicated ostinato bass.

The churchyard scene is heralded with an orchestral invocation of church bells (Variation IX) and the lights fade in on the children as they sing a Benedicite which is half straight, half parody ('O amnis, axis, caulis, collis ... bless ye the Lord'). Mrs Grose does not realise the implications until her attempts at comfort elicit from the Governess 'Dear, good Mrs Grose, they are not playing, they are talking horrors'. Mrs Grose bustles Flora into church, but Miles hangs back and asks when he is going back to school. His final remark before going inside – 'You trust me, my dear, but you think and think ... of us, and of the others. Does my uncle think what you think?' – elicits from the Governess a horrified 'It was a challenge!' She must leave Bly, now, straight away, while they are at church. She runs out, and Variation X (the theme in the bass) is a postlude to her flight.

The moment she is inside her room the Governess can feel Miss Jessel's presence and sees her sitting at the desk. In their duet, Miss Jessel exudes calm and inexorability: 'Here my tragedy began! Here my revenge begins!', but the Governess's nerves are screwed almost to breaking pitch (it is her nearest approach to the madness which in the story is a conceivable alternative to the haunting the Governess senses) and she now knows that she cannot after all abandon the children. When Miss Jessel has gone, she cries 'I must write to him now', then, in one of the most beautiful passages of the whole opera, sits at her desk and writes to ask the children's guardian if he will see her, as there are things she must tell him (Ex. 8).

At Variation XI's start, bass clarinet and bass flute have a canon on the Theme, interrupted by Ex. 3, and, as the curtain rises, the cor anglais adds Ex. 5 which the boy is heard humming (tragically?) when the lights go up, and on which the following scene is based, a scene where taut nerves threaten at any moment to crack into the relief of tears. The Governess tries to get him to tell her what happened at school. Quint's voice is heard, Miles shrieks and the candle goes out leaving the question still unanswered, the tears unshed. The short Variation XII has Quint's voice singing and the theme in pizzicato strings. Quint tempts Miles to take the Governess's letter: 'Take it! Take it!' He does so.

65 Quick
GOVERNESS writing
Vla., Ob., Vc., Horn

(Ex. 8)

With the thirteenth Variation the mood changes sharply and the solo piano imitates a late eighteenth-century sonata and nerves are seemingly under control again. Miles is seen playing to an audience of the Governess and Mrs Grose. Mrs Grose nods – Flora's peremptory 'Go to sleep!', from scene vii of Act I, has a sinister ring to it – and Flora steals out. Miles's triumphant attack on the piano (it reaches into Variation XIV) leaves no room for doubt that he was acting as a decoy to distract the grown-ups' attention.

Variation XIV is built up on Quint's 'on the paths'. Mrs Grose and the Governess find Flora by the lake. The Governess is aware of Miss Jessel's presence (Ex. 6) and tries to force Flora to acknowledge it, but her efforts are successful only in making Flora take refuge with Mrs Grose. Flora's furious 'I can't see anybody, can't see anything' is sung to the theme of the drowning of innocence and she leads a quartet of female voices in which Miss Jessel rallies Flora to her side and Mrs Grose affirms that she can see nothing. With the departure of Mrs Grose and Flora comes again the theme of Mrs Grose perplexed, and the Governess's cadence, dramatically transposed from Ex. 2, accompanies her acknowledgement of failure.

Variation XV begins with a twelve-note chord, and is concerned mostly with the music of 'I can't see anybody' (piccolo and timpani). The last scene takes place out of doors. Mrs Grose takes Flora away (Ex. 4) and, as if to atone for her own lack of support in the previous scene, reveals to the Governess that her letter to the children's guardian must have been stolen. Miles's entrance coincides with the beginning of a loose passacaglia on the first six notes of the theme. The melody in the upper parts, on strings when Miles is concerned, on clarinet when it is the Governess singing, is highly expressive and the whole scene one of great tension. It remains for the Governess, almost as in a ritual, to ask Miles to place his confidence in her and to tell her whether he stole her letter. His attempts at being straightforward are complicated by the admonitions of Quint, but, when the Governess presses him to tell her who it is that he can see (Ex. 1), the struggle for his soul reaches a climax and he dies with a scream of 'Peter Quint! You devil!', aimed, equivocal to the last, at one – or other – of his tormentors. Quint's voice joins with the Governess's, and in the end is heard at a distance with Ex. 3. The Governess is left with the body of the little boy, and it is with pathetic repetitions of his 'Malo' song that the opera comes to an end. H.

NOYE'S FLUDDE

The Chester Miracle Play¹ set to music. Première, Orford Church, during Aldeburgh Festival, 18 June 1958, with Gladys Parr, Owen Brannigan, Trevor Anthony, conductor Charles Mackerras.

The Voice of God.....Speaking Part
 Noye.....Bass-Baritone
 Mrs NoyeContralto
 Sem, Ham and Jaffett.....Boy Trebles
 Mrs Sem, Mrs Ham, Mrs Jaffett.....Girl Sopranos
 Mrs Noye's Gossips.....Girl Sopranos
 Chorus of Animals and BirdsChildren
 The Congregation

Running Time: 1 hour

Britten's skilful writing for immature performers, Bin a way that is within their scope and still meaningful for audiences, is virtually unrivalled, as witness numerous examples in The Turn of the Screw, Albert Herring, Let's Make an Opera, the cantata St Nicholas, A Midsummer Night's Dream and the Church Parables. Noye's Fludde may contain nothing so disturbingly apt as Miles's 'Malo' song, but it carries the principle of adolescent participation further than in the other operas. Noye and his wife are adult, as is the Voice of God, and probably conductor and a few key musicians of the orchestra, but the bulk of the cast consists of children: there is a sizeable children's chorus, and children provide a full string orchestra, groups of recorders and bugles, and a number of percussion players, the last-named contributing notably to the brilliant colouring of the score.

As Overture, Britten uses the hymn 'Lord Jesus, think on me',² sung by the congregation – the work is intended for church performance. God's voice commands Noye to build the Ark, and Sem, Ham, Jaffett and their wives enter to lively music. Mrs Noye and her chorus of gossips mock the preparations. Noye in solemn music leads his family in the building of the Ark, which is accomplished in a few minutes of music, but Mrs Noye remains vociferously sceptical and she and Noye quarrel.

God's voice commands Noye to take the animals into the Ark and, heralded by bugles, a march leads them in two by two and singing 'Kyrie eleison'. Only Mrs Noye resists, but in the end her children pick her up, more than a little drunk, and carry her inside.

The great centrepiece of the opera is an extended passacaglia in C, a favourite device of the composer's and here used to depict the various phases of the flood's progress: rain, wind, lightning, thunder and the rising waves. Various instrumental colours are used to point up each aspect of the disaster, Noye and his family sing a prayer before committing themselves to the Ark, and the climax of the episode comes with the singing of the hymn 'Eternal Father, strong to save'.³

The flood music ends and there is a kind of post-script, an inversion of the raindrop figuration which has appeared earlier on, played now on tuned mugs and piano; during it I once experienced a torrential downpour in normally dry Mexico when the opera was given in the open air with local forces in

¹ The text is from English Miracle Plays, Moralities and Interludes, edited by Alfred W. Pollard and published by the Clarendon Press, Oxford.

² Damon's Psalter, words by Bishop Synesius, translated by Chatfield.

³ J.B. Dykes, words by W. Whiting.

Guadalajara at the time of the 1970 World Cup (soccer) – a singularly inappropriate interruption of an otherwise enchanting performance.

Raven and dove are despatched, Noye rejoices at dry land, God's Voice commands disembarkation, and bugles cue the animals into an 'Alleluia' as they leave. The finale is built up on Tallis's Canon, 'The spacious firmament on high', the six verses differently treated and with the congregation joining in the last two to make the opera's climax. H.

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM

Opera in three acts, text after Shakespeare by the composer and Peter Pears. Première, Aldeburgh Festival, 11 June 1960, with Jennifer Vyvyan, April Cantelo, Marjorie Thomas, Alfred Deller, George Maran, Thomas Hemsley, Owen Brannigan, Peter Pears, conductor Britten. First produced Holland Festival with Joan Carlyle replacing April Cantelo as Helena, and Forbes Robinson singing Bottom, conductor George Malcolm; Covent Garden, 1961, with Joan Carlyle, Irene Salemkka, Marjorie Thomas, Margreta Elkins, Russell Oberlin, André Turp, Louis Quilico, Geraint Evans, John Lanigan, conductor Georg Solti; Hamburg State Opera, 1961, produced by Rennert; Berlin, Komische Oper, 1961, produced by Felsenstein; la Scala, Milan, 1961; San Francisco, 1961; New York, City Center, 1963; Glyndebourne, 1981, with Ileana Cotrubas, Felicity Lott, Claire Powell, James Bowman, Ryland Davies, Dale Duesing, Curt Appelgren, Patrick Power, produced by Peter Hall, conductor Bernard Haitink.

Oberon, King of the

| | |
|--|------------------------------|
| Fairies | Counter-Tenor (or Contralto) |
| Tytania, Queen of the Fairies | Coloratura Soprano |
| Puck | Speaking Role (Acrobat) |
| Theseus, Duke of Athens | Bass |
| Hippolyta, Queen of the Amazons, betrothed to Theseus | Contralto |
| Lysander | Tenor |
| Demetrius | Baritone |
| Hermia, in love with Lysander | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Helena, in love with Demetrius | Soprano |
| Bottom, a weaver | Bass-Baritone |
| Quince, a carpenter | Bass |
| Flute, a bellows-maker | Tenor |
| Snug, a joiner | Bass |
| Snout, a tinker | Tenor |
| Starveling, a tailor | Baritone |

Fairies

| | | |
|--------------|---|--------------|
| Cobweb | } |Trebles |
| Peaseblossom | | |
| Mustardseed | | |
| Moth | | |

Chorus of Fairies.....Trebles or Sopranos

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

To turn a masterpiece in one medium into a work of similar calibre in another is a mighty undertaking and yet this is what Benjamin Britten has succeeded in doing. His adaptation, with the perspicacious aid of Peter Pears, caused David Drew¹ to write à propos the première in 1960 of A Midsummer Night's Dream, 'A corner of Shakespeare's Empire has undergone a subtle change. It has not been ruthlessly invaded, it has not even been quietly exploited. But for those who were at Aldeburgh on 11 June, and for those who will follow them to Britten's new opera in the months and years to come, Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream will never be quite the same again.'

The opera elevates the fairies, and particularly Oberon, to a position of prime influence and also, to become the framework of the whole opera, places all except the final scene in the wood, and relegates the question of anachronistic Athenian ambience to the background. Britten's music moves on three sharply differentiated planes: fairies, mortals (lovers) and rustics. The snakes which infest Shakespeare's imagery are never far from the drama's surface, the fairies dispense a magic which is sure and purposeful but not inevitably benign, the equivocal figure of Oberon² flaunts the power to chill if he does not choose to warm, and only the wood is omnipresent, all-consoling.

Act I. The wood is represented by a slow-breathing string texture which rises and falls as the curtain goes up, and is heard again frequently throughout the opera (Ex. 1). The fairies make their entrance with 'Over hill, over dale, thorough bush, thorough briar'. They are Tytania's instruments, interrupted by Puck (trumpet and drum accompaniment throughout), of whom they are afraid. Puck announces Oberon and Tytania (slow march) who have quarrelled over an Indian page boy. Tytania departs and Oberon alone plots vengeance, summons Puck and sends him to

¹ New Statesman, 18 June 1960.

² 'Whether intended or not', wrote David Drew in the New Statesman.

'Britten's Oberon is a more grimly effective horror than the Peter Quint who called from the Tower and had no Puck to help him.'

(Ex. 1) Slow and mysterious

Str. pp

portamento

less p

fetch that herb whose juice 'will make or man or woman madly dote Upon the next live creature that it sees'. Celesta lends colour in its ostinato accompaniment to the spell motif, Ex. 2:

[20] (Slow and gentle)

OBERON

Be it on Lion, Bear or Wolf or Bull,

Or med-ling Mon-key or bu - sy Ape.

Oberon, his plot in motion, disappears and the wood is left empty (Ex. 1).

It is the turn of the lovers, whose themes throughout the opera are derived from Lysander's 'The course of true love never did run smooth'. We meet first Lysander and Hermia, eloping to avoid the forced betrothal of Hermia and Demetrius. If one senses at the start of the duet that they may not emerge from their predicament by their own efforts, the fire that has earlier been lacking in them starts to appear in the passage beginning 'I swear to thee'. They leave, the wood is empty again (Ex. 1), Oberon returns with schemes in his heart and music (Ex. 2), and the lovers, Lysander and Hermia, are succeeded by the quarrelling Demetrius and Helena, the latter breathlessly pursuing the former, who for his part wants nothing more than to be re-united with his betrothed Hermia. Helena has a short, character-revealing solo, 'I am your spaniel', and when they depart Oberon decides to put right the destinies of these star-crossed lovers. He sends for Puck who gives him the flower he demanded and lies at his feet. 'I know a bank where the wild thyme blows' is, for all its sinister undertones, an aria of exquisite sensibility, introduced by Ex. 2 with cellos supplying the vocal line and horns adding colour, and it marvelously rounds off the first half of the act.

Into the silent wood (Ex. 1) cautiously come six rustics, heralded by trombone pp. Peter Quince calls the roll and, not without frequent interruption from Bottom, assigns to each a part in the play. Each is neatly characterised, from the swaggering Bottom through the shy but tenacious Francis Flute to Snug the joiner, who is 'slow of study' and tends therefore to come in on the weak beat of the bar. Bottom at one point offers to play Lion as well as Pyramus, but Flute and the others think that the ladies would take fright, 'and that were enough to hang us all'. With promises to con their parts, they whisper 'Adieu' and once more leave the wood empty (Ex. 1).

Hermia and Lysander are exhausted with their wanderings and lie down together, only for Puck mistakenly to squeeze the juice of the magic flower on Lysander's eyes (celesta). Helena and Demetrius, still quarrelling, enter in their turn to look for a resting place. Helena perceives Lysander, he wakes and declares love for her and hatred for Demetrius, in either instance to her considerable discomfiture. She runs out, followed by Lysander; Hermia wakes and distractedly follows where Lysander led.

Tytania soon enters with her retinue whom she bids sing her to sleep. They oblige with an astonishingly fresh setting of 'You spotted snakes with double tongue', but Oberon moves invisibly past the single sentinel they have posted and (Ex. 2) squeezes the magic juice on to Tytania's eyes, bidding her 'Wake when some vile thing is near'.

Act II is concerned with sleep, and the prelude is based on four chords, very differently scored, covering the twelve notes of the scale (there is little twelve-notish about the score but its gradual influence on Britten, even more than in The Turn of the Screw, is here apparent). The curtain discloses Tytania asleep. The six rustics enter for rehearsal. Bottom is full of suggestions: ladies will like neither a killing on the stage nor the roaring of Lion – let there be a prologue to explain them. Quince himself has a couple of conundrums: how 'to bring the moonlight into the chamber' (the word 'moonshine' has a particular resonance for the rustics), and how to represent the wall. Rehearsal starts, watched now by Puck who follows Bottom at his exit and, when Flute has voiced his entire role without a pause, brings Bottom back with an ass's head on his shoulders, to the disgruntlement of the cast which runs off at top speed.

Bottom sings – or bellows – to keep his spirits up and Tytania wakes to love him. Her attendants are introduced to him, detailed to attend his every want, and in their turn greet him ceremoniously. A languorous tune on A flat clarinet and flute expresses Tytania's infatuation and eventually she sets the fairies to play and sing to him.¹ Bottom announces 'I have an exposition of sleep come upon me', Tytania sings ecstatically and then in her turn falls asleep.

A short interlude brings Puck on the scene and after him Oberon, who soon expresses his delight at Tytania's predicament. But Puck has been mistaken over the Athenians, and Demetrius and Hermia are clearly at cross-purposes. Puck is dispatched to find Helena, and Oberon squeezes more juice (Ex. 2) on to Demetrius' eyes, before Puck returns with Helena and Lysander. Helena upbraids Lysander for his faithlessness to Hermia, but Demetrius wakes up, sees Helena, and provides her with a second adoring swain. Hermia's re-entry adds a further complication, as Helena decides she is at the bottom of a plot against her. Helena's short aria ('O is all forgot?') describing her schooldays' friendship for Hermia starts off an ensemble of misunderstanding at the end of which the two girls quarrel bitterly (Hermia: 'She hath urg'd her height' ... Helena: 'Get you gone, you dwarf') and all leave, the girls at odds, the men to fight.

Oberon comes forward dragging Puck by the ear and complaining at what must either be incompetence or knavishness. He instructs him so to order the comings and goings of Demetrius and Lysander that their efforts to confront each other in mortal combat shall end in exhaustion before they contrive to come to blows. Puck carries out his instructions, until curtain-fall finds the four lovers correctly lined up. The fairies steal in to sing a benediction, and Puck squeezes the antidote to the juice on Lysander's eyes (Ex. 2).

Act III. From the strings at the outset we sense reconciliation and resolution in the morning air. In the wood can be seen lying asleep Tytania with Bottom, and the four lovers slightly apart. Oberon likes what he sees and having acquired the Indian boy who was the cause of the trouble, is prepared to undo 'This hateful imperfection of her eyes'. To the sound of the celesta, he undoes the spell: 'Be as thou wast wont to be; See as thou wast wont to see' (Ex. 2). Tytania awakes, is released from the spell and reconciled (very slow; quasi saraband) with Oberon, who himself proposes to unite the pairs of lovers to coincide with the marriage of Duke Theseus with Hippolyta.

Oberon, Tytania and the fairies disappear as the lovers, to the sound of horns (Theseus' rather than the horns of Elfland), awake and are in their turn reconciled: 'And I have found Demetrius like a jewel. Mine own, and not mine own', in a fine flowing ensemble.

Bottom, alone on the stage, starts to wake. Snatches of what has passed before go through his mind and he is indignant that his fellow mummers have abandoned him. He has dreamt – mysteries. But a ballad shall be made of his dream, 'And I will sing it in the latter end of the play before the Duke'. It is a key statement, not only musically and dramatically but because in it we have proof of the opera's mainspring, the omnipotent fairy power of Oberon; Bottom could not have imagined what he describes without its influence. As he walks away the others come in. Had it been possible to perform the play in front of the Duke and had Bottom been with them, he would surely have been granted sixpence a day for life for his playing of Pyramus! Bottom's voice is heard. All questioning is halted at the news that 'The Duke hath dined and our play is preferred'. In a flurry of ensemble, they prepare to leave, and horns and woodwind carry the burden of a quick march as the scene changes to:

Theseus' palace. Theseus and Hippolyta enter with their court and in a few phrases voice their impatience that the day's wedding events have not yet given way to the night's consummation. The four lovers enter to beg for the Duke's blessing, before Peter Quince comes in confidently with a playbill which he hands to Hippolyta: 'A tedious brief scene of young Pyramus, And his love Thisby.'

What follows is nothing less than a condensed comic opera, occupying thirty-six pages of vocal and forty of full score. Its introduction has all six rustics singing together in block harmony and marked pomposo: 'If we offend, it is with our good will' – but straight away there is a sting in the tail when they attempt a canon on 'All for your delight' and the climactic top D proves too high for Flute. Prologue, in the person of Quince, introduces the characters, predictably failing to fit action to word as he pushes them out while reiterating the word 'Remain'.

¹ To the tune of 'Boys and girls come out to play'.

Wall, played by Snout, introduces himself in Sprechstimme, before Bottom launches himself, in the character of Pyramus, into a short if full-blooded apostrophe to Night and to the obstacle between him and his love, in the manner of a big Italianate aria – indeed the whole thing is a satire on nineteenth-century romantic opera, as is plain from the rather timid flute tune introducing Flute in the character of Thisby and the overwrought if insubstantial duet for Thisby and Pyramus which follows it. Wall prepares to leave, still in Sprechstimme, and is succeeded by Snug as Lion and eventually Starveling as Moon. Thisby continues her allegretto flute-beset mood of before, but the music is quickly superseded by the roaring of Lion, who chases Thisby out. Pyramus enters, finds Thisby's mantle, assumes the worst and plunges a sword into his bosom. Thisby finds the body of Pyramus and, at the end of her wits, enters upon a mad scene to which the flute does full justice, before embarking on an adagio lamentoso with full orchestral postlude. Bottom offers the assembled worthies an epilogue or a Bergomask dance and it is the dance which is chosen. It involves a maximum of misunderstanding between the players and is in two parts, the first hesitating between 6/8 and 9/8, and the second a very fast 2/4. Midnight sounds, the rustics stop dancing and Theseus and Hippolyta, followed by the four lovers, adjure them and us 'Sweet friends, to bed'.

There is no change of scene but enter Cobweb, Mustardseed, Peaseblossom and Moth to sing 'Now the hungry lion roars, And the wolf howls the Moon'. Puck comes in with his broom, but the major musical statement is left to Oberon and the fairies with some help from Tytania. 'Now until the break of day' with its mesmeric Scotch snap is uncannily cathartic in its effect. Not even Captain Vere with his consolatory chords, not the return of the Borough's working chorus, not the reiteration of 'Malo' makes a greater effect, and for anything comparable in Britten one has to go back to Gloriana's final orchestral Lute Song and 'Green leaves'. After this, who could gainsay Puck's valedictory 'Gentles, do not reprehend'?

H.

PARABLES FOR CHURCH PERFORMANCE

The period following A Midsummer Night's Dream seems to have involved the composer in considerable reappraisal of his position, and his stage output for the decade is confined significantly to three Church Parables, Curlew River, The Burning Fiery Furnace and The Prodigal Son. That these parables derive to some degree from the successful church opera Noye's Fludde is obvious, but it should not be missed that their ancestry includes so dramatic (though non-stage) a church work as Saint Nicholas (1948). Formally they demonstrate a new conciseness, economy of means (rather under twenty singers each and an accompanying chamber orchestra of either seven or eight players), and stylistically a particularly successful synthesis of East and West as well as remarkable freedom for the performers.

Their genesis is interesting and must be seen against the background of something near crisis in the composer's approach to his art, a crisis growing perhaps out of seven or eight years of public and critical acclamation – as hard to digest for so serious and private an artist as Britten as had been a longer period of critical misunderstanding – culminating in the adulation which greeted the War Requiem (1961), a work the composer had felt embodied a very personal point of view.

During a journey to the Far East in February 1956, Britten underwent two new and fruitful musical experiences: in Bali, he heard gamelan music extensively for the first time (the influence comes out in his ballet The Prince of the Pagodas later the same year); and in Tokyo he encountered the Japanese Noh play. The Noh play seems to have haunted his imagination: 'The whole occasion made a tremendous impression upon me: the simple, touching story, the economy of the style, the intense slowness of the action, the marvellous skill and control of the performers, the beautiful costumes, the mixture of chanting, speech, singing which, with the three instruments, made up the strange music – it all offered a totally new “operatic” experience.’¹

Seven years later, it was the Noh play Sumidagawa which he asked William Plomer to transform into what became the first of his three ‘Parables for church performance’, and it was Curlew River which provided the formal terms of reference for the complete set. The story and its overtones were retained but the Japanese setting gave way to a modern version of the English medieval liturgical drama with the music based on a plainsong hymn. So successful did the formula prove in Curlew River that composer and librettist retained it throughout the set, each parable introduced by a different plainsong tune and based upon it, each deemed to be taking place inside a monastic community, which processes in at the start of the action, and which provides from its male ranks all the characters of the drama, whether masculine or feminine.

Unlike say Lucretia, Albert Herring or Les Mamelles de Tirésias, which are miniature ‘Grand’ operas and where the small orchestra skilfully substitutes a big one, these Parables are chamber operas of potentially seminal nature. Whether the seed is finally proved fertile or sterile is a matter only time can resolve. These works will remain.

CURLEW RIVER

Parable for Church Performance, libretto by William Plomer. Première, Aldeburgh Festival, 12 June 1964, at Orford Church, with Peter Pears, John Shirley-Quirk, Bryan Drake, Don Garrard. First performed Holland Festival, 1964, and Tours, 1965, by English Opera Group with substantially the above cast. First performed Denmark, Copenhagen, 1966; U.S.A., Caramoor, New York, 1966, with Andrea Velis; Mulhouse, 1968, with Michel Sénéchal; Australia at Adelaide Festival, 1970, with Peter Pears, where it was repeated in 1988 (in parallel with Noh performances of Sumidagawa by a Japanese company) with Gerald English.

The Abbot, Eleven Monks, Four Acolytes, Seven Lay Brothers who make up the cast of the Parable:

The Madwoman Tenor
The Ferryman Baritone
The Traveller Baritone
The Spirit of the Boy (an acolyte) Treble

Leader of the Pilgrims (the Abbot) Bass

Chorus of Pilgrims

Instrumentalists: Flute (doubling Piccolo), Horn, Viola, Double Bass, Harp, Percussion, Chamber Organ

Running Time: 1 hour 10 minutes

The story outline of Curlew River remains close to that of Sumidagawa, as evidenced when the Prince of Hesse and the Rhine, who went with Britten to Tokyo, described the Noh play in his diary²: ‘The ferryman is waiting in his boat, a traveller turns up and tells him about a woman who will soon be coming to the river. The woman is mad, she is looking for her lost child. Then she appears and the ferryman does not wish to take a mad person, but in the end he lets her into his boat. On the way across the river the two passengers sit behind each other on the floor as if in a narrow boat, while the ferryman stands behind them, symbolically punting with a light stick. The ferryman tells the story of a little boy who came this way a year ago this very day. The child was very tired for he had escaped from robbers who had held him. He crossed the river in his boat, but he died from exhaustion on the other side. The woman starts crying. It was her son. The ferryman is sorry for her and takes her to the child’s grave. The mother is acted by a tall man in woman’s clothing with a small woman’s mask on his face. Accessories help you to understand what is going on ... The play ends in the chanting of the chorus.’

It is precisely the ‘plot’ of Curlew River. To the three main characters Britten and Plomer add the Abbot of the monastery where the performance is taking place, the voice of the dead child, and nine pilgrims who act as chorus. In addition – and crucially – the action and motivation are changed from medieval Japanese and Buddhist to medieval English and Christian, and music and action start with ritual, the procession of monks up the nave of the church singing the Compline (i.e. evening) Office hymn, ‘Te lucis ante terminum, Rerum Creator, poscimus’, a prayer for protection at the ending of the day. The drama proper begins with the Ferryman’s vigorous announcement of his role in the action.

Much has been written about Curlew River and the other Church Parables, each of which embodies the paradox of very highly organised musical material (derived from the simple basis of plainchant) and a style of performance much freer than in Britten's other dramatic works. To take characterisation of performance first, the composer dispenses with a conductor, and treats the singers as being as much a part of a chamber ensemble as the instrumental musicians.

¹ From the composer’s sleeve-note to the recording of Curlew River.

² Printed in Tribute to Benjamin Britten (Faber, 1963).

Eric White¹ has drawn attention to 'an element of rhapsody' in the vocal parts which is a consequence of the freedom allotted the performers, and the score specifies the leading voice at each moment as well as making liberal use of dotted (as opposed to solid) bar-lines, in order to diminish the emphasis on regular pattern.

Much of the writing is monophonic (confined to a single part) or heterophonic (the simultaneous sounding of simple and decorated versions of the same theme) rather than polyphonic (individual voices moving in apparent independence though fitting together harmonically).

In Curlew River, each character is represented by certain motifs and has associated with him his own instrument. The Ferryman has an agitated version of the Compline hymn and his instruments are horn and to a lesser extent viola. The Traveller has harp and double bass, playing arpeggios to his 'heavy, trudging step'.² The Madwoman has flute, additionally flutter-tongued before her entry ('Whither I, Whither I go').

The Madwoman's original motif, all fourths and sevenths, leads to an entrance scene modelled on the traditional operatic mad scene, the difference here being that Curlew River's central figure starts insane and moves towards sanity rather than the more customary reverse. In her narrative aria, expression from an otherwise monotone line is achieved by means of the rising or falling of the final note by a tone or occasionally a semitone, upwards when she recalls her life or the child's loss, down when she refers to her grief. This simple, unemphatic yet in context highly expressive variation of the line is a precise echo of the simple, unemphatic gesture (the back of his hand slowly to his forehead) which the Noh player of the Madwoman in Adelaide (and in Japan) made to denote weeping.

The Parable moves through various stages of tension – notably the chorus's repeated enunciation of the Curlew River's Song of Separation, and an ensemble for Ferryman, Traveller, Chorus and flutes before the Madwoman is allowed to board the ferry – towards a climax as the Madwoman, now convinced that the grave on shore is that of her lost child whom the river people think of as a saint, prays with the travellers at the grave. Abbot and Chorus sing the hymn 'Custodes hominum' while Ferryman and Traveller pray in their turn, before, in a few phrases high in the treble (and followed by piccolo), the spirit of the boy releases his mother from her torment. At the final 'Amen' she has shed her madness, and the little drama of compassion can end as it began with the disrobing of the monks, an exhortation from the Abbot and the singing of the initial plainchant. It is a work of extraordinary tension and emotive power, which was hailed in the headline to Wilfrid Mellers's notice in the New Statesman,³ punningly and appropriately, 'Britten's Yea-Play'. H.

THE BURNING FIERY FURNACE

Parable for Church Performance, libretto by William Plomer. Première, Aldeburgh Festival, 9 June 1966, at Orford Church, with Peter Pears, Bryan Drake, Robert Tear, Victor Godfrey, John Shirley-Quirk, Peter Leeming. First performed U.S.A., Caramoor, New York, 1967, with Andrea Velis; in Australia, at Adelaide Festival, 1970, with John Fryatt.

The Abbot, Twelve Monks, Five Acolytes and Eight

Lay Brothers who make up the cast of the Parable:

Nebuchadnezzar.....Tenor

The Astrologer (The Abbot)Baritone

Ananias.....Baritone

MisaelTenor

AzariasBass

The Herald and Leader of the CourtiersBaritone

Chorus of Courtiers; Five Attendants (treble)

Instrumentalists: Flute (doubling Piccolo), Horn, Alto Trombone, Viola, Double Bass (doubling Babylonian Drum), Harp, Percussion, Chamber Organ (doubling Small Cymbals).

Running Time: 1 hour 5 minutes

¹ In his invaluable Benjamin Britten, his Life and his Operas (Faber, 1983).

² Patricia Howard: The Operas of Benjamin Britten (Barrie and Rockliff, 1969).

³ 3 July 1964.

The story, much less esoteric than that of Curlew River, is drawn from the Old Testament and is concerned with the theme of steadfastness in the face of tyranny.

In sixth-century B.C. Babylon, three young Israelites have been brought to the city as captives. On the advice of Daniel, they are appointed by King Nebuchadnezzar to rule over three provinces, their names changed to the Babylonian forms of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego. When at a feast they refuse to betray the faith of their forefathers by eating and drinking with the courtiers, the Astrologer persuades the King that this is an insult to nation and faith. The Herald announces that all must bow down to a great golden image of the Babylonian god Merodak when the royal music sounds, but Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego refuse to worship. At Nebuchadnezzar's command, a furnace is prepared for their execution and they are thrown in, only for an angel to join them in the furnace, whose heat their faith successfully defies. When they reappear untouched by the fire, Nebuchadnezzar repudiates the Astrologer and is converted to their faith.

Instrumentation remains the same as in Curlew River except that alto trombone is added to the eight players of the first Church Parable. Once again, plainchant – the Advent sequence 'Salus aeterna, indeficiens mundi vita' (Eternal Saviour of the world) – provides the musical basis of the work, this time with a wider intervallic range than before, and is followed as in Curlew River by instrumental heterophony (more Eastern-sounding than in Curlew River), as the processing monks robe for the drama. This is in two parts, each introduced by an important announcement by the Herald. In the first part, the main episode is the King's Feast; and in part II come the Processional March and Hymn to Merodak, and the Furnace and Conversion of the King.

Instrumental characteristics are associated with the Herald, alto trombone; and with Nebuchadnezzar (and his alter ego, the Astrologer – a role taken by the Abbot), flutter-tongued flute over harp and horn with chords on double bass and viola. Ananias, Misael and Azarias are more directly identified with the plainchant theme than the Babylonians, who are characterised at the Abbot's first pronouncement. The Feast itself is distinguished by an Entertainment given by three boys, two singers and a tumbler, the music deliberately in that simpler style regularly adopted by Britten in his writing, dramatic or otherwise, for children's voices, the words in the form of riddles, or at least question and answer. By the end of the Feast, Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego are isolated and in a touching scene reiterate their position of, as it were, passive resistance.

After the Herald's proclamation at the start of part II, we hear the sound of 'cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer and all kinds of music', at the first sound of which every subject of the King must fall down and worship the image of gold he has set up. In the Processional Music, the eight instruments have eight key phrases which they combine in ten different 'verses' of the march to astonishingly varied effect, after which comes the Hymn to Merodak, god of the Babylonians, whose slurs were suggested by the Herald when he first mentions the Feast, and later by Nebuchadnezzar and the Astrologer before the isolation of the three in part I.

The final episode is that of the Furnace, with the solvent of the Benedicite,¹ sung by the three with the addition of a solo treble voice to symbolise the Angel of the Lord and recalling the treble sound of the Spirit of the Boy in Curlew River. Nebuchadnezzar's conversion comes during a pause in the psalm, to which he later joins his voice.

H.

THE PRODIGAL SON

Parable for Church Performance, libretto by William Plomer. Première, Aldeburgh Festival, 10 June 1968, at Orford Church, with Peter Pears, John Shirley-Quirk, Bryan Drake, Robert Tear. First performed in U.S.A., Caramoor, New York, 1969, with Andrea Velis; Australia, Adelaide Festival, 1970, with Peter Pears.

The Abbot, Eleven Monks, Five Acolytes, Eight Lay Brothers who make up the cast of the Parable:

| | |
|------------------------------|---------------|
| Tempter (the Abbot) | Tenor |
| Father | Bass-Baritone |
| Elder Son | Baritone |
| Younger Son | Tenor |

Chorus of Servants, Parasites and Beggars; Young Servants and Distant Voices (trebles)

¹ Also set in the first scene of Peter Grimes's Act II and parodied in The Turn of the Screw.

Instrumentalists: Alto Flute (doubling Piccolo),
Trumpet (in D), Horn, Viola, Double Bass, Harp,
Chamber Organ, Percussion

Running Time: 1 hour 10 minutes

The story of the Prodigal Son, with its emphasis on repentance and forgiveness, is one of the best known and most beautiful of all New Testament stories, and it appropriately furnishes out the trio of Noh play, Old Testament legend and Christian parable which make up Britten's Triptych.

A family consisting of Father, Elder Son, Younger Son and their Servants lives by the fruit of its toil on the land. When the Elder Son and the men go off to work in the fields, the Younger Son hears a voice tempting him to unknown delights, his 'most secret longings'. He asks for and obtains his inheritance, but in the city, Parasites remove it from him and he is left penniless and alone. He joins some Beggars, shares the food of swine, and determines to return home to ask his father's forgiveness. He is received with rejoicing, orders are given that the fatted calf be killed, and even the envious Elder Son is finally reconciled to the restored situation.

The ground plan of The Prodigal Son is on lines made familiar by the other Church Parables, starting with a plainchant theme, the Prime (i.e. morning) Office hymn, 'Iam lucis orto sidere', the morning prayer for protection. As the characteristic tone colour of Curlew River comes from solo flute, so does that of The Burning Fiery Furnace from alto trombone, and of The Prodigal Son from trumpet and viola (alto flute, doubling piccolo, and trumpet replace The Burning Fiery Furnace's flute and alto trombone). Alto flute is associated with the Father, viola with the Younger Son, double bass with the Elder Son, horn with pastoral toil and its workers. The trumpet embodies the idea of Temptation.

Dramatic excitement is kindled from the moment the initial plainchant ends with the monks' 'Amen' echoed a third higher and then mocked a sixth higher as the Tempter introduces himself from the end of the nave in the garb of the as yet unseen Abbot, who in previous Church Parables has decorously introduced the burden of the drama before robing to take part in it himself. Here we plunge in medias res from the start, and it is not until the Tempter has put forward himself and his motives that we hear with heightened effect the plainchant theme in heterophonic statement to accompany, as in the previous Parables, the robing of the principal characters.

'See how I break it up,' breathes Quint-like the Tempter over the idyllic family scene with which we are introduced to the drama, and this is musically speaking the liveliest character, working his wiles on the Younger Son as they walk, gourd-accompanied, towards the City of Sin in splendid duet. With its two tenor voices, it recalls Monteverdi and Purcell in its outline just as it states Britten (and anticipates Tippett's Mel and Dov) in its melodic contours.

Choral writing is more prominent in The Prodigal Son than in its predecessors, and the quarter-hour sequence of the City and its temptations contains nine different choral sections as the Younger Son progresses from welcome by the Parasites to disintegration in face of the Beggars.

Apart from perhaps the opening arioso statement of the Father to his Sons and Servants, the duet for Tempter and Younger Son, and the City sequence, there are no set pieces in The Prodigal Son to compare with those of The Burning Fiery Furnace, nor has this Church Parable the musical or dramatic intensity of Curlew River, but the fact remains that there have been commentators to find it the best of the three. H.

OWEN WINGRAVE

Opera in two acts, libretto by Myfanwy Piper, based on the short story by Henry James. Commissioned for B.B.C. Television and first shown 16 May 1971, with Heather Harper, Jennifer Vyvyan, Sylvia Fisher, Janet Baker, Peter Pears, Nigel Douglas, Benjamin Luxon, John Shirley-Quirk, conductor Britten. Stage première, Covent Garden, 10 May 1973; Glyndebourne Touring Opera, 1995.

Owen Wingrave, the last of the Wingraves Baritone Spencer Coyle, head of a military cramming establishment Bass-Baritone
Lechmere, a young student of Coyle's Tenor
Miss Wingrave, Owen's aunt Soprano
Mrs Coyle Soprano
Mrs Julian, a widow and dependant
at Paramore Soprano
Kate, her daughter Mezzo-Soprano
General Sir Philip Wingrave,
Owen's grandfather Tenor
Narrator, the ballad singer Tenor

Distant ChorusTrebles

Place: London; Paramore

Time: Late Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Owen Wingrave was written for television, a fact which may have spurred the composer's creative dexterity, not least in transitional techniques already adumbrated in his earlier operas, but which should be taken to imply neither that it is unsuitable for stage nor that it makes very specific use of television techniques. Britten and Myfanwy Piper have together returned to Henry James for their subject (as with The Turn of the Screw), and the theme is the effort of the young scion of the military house of Wingrave to escape from the tyranny of the past and his family's military tradition and, more specifically, to make it possible for his pacifist conscience to prevail over the conventional instincts of his family. In a sense he wins, but at a cost.

The prelude to the opera consists of a dozen bars marked marziale, and ten instrumental 'portraits' of ten military forebears of Owen. In these few minutes Britten has set out the musical material of the opera. In the marziale section we are introduced to a rhythmic idea, which later gives rise to very many others in the course of the opera, and is always associated with the percussion. Owen's theme eventually provides the eleventh of the portraits. The other ten, each intended to go with a visual realisation of some member of the family, constitute a great orchestral cadenza, and are associated successively with bassoon; oboe; horn; clarinet; trombone and piccolo (Colonel and Boy); trumpet; woodwind; trombone; woodwind; all wind (Owen's father).

Act I, scene i. The study of Mr Coyle's military establishment. Discussion between Mr Coyle and his pupils, Owen Wingrave and Lechmere, is initially accompanied by consolatory and flowing triplets, but mention of casualties brings a bitter reaction from Owen. Coyle refers to the conduct of war as a science while Owen is inclined to condemn everyone who takes part in it. He confesses that he cannot go through with his military studies; he despises a soldier's life. This is too much for Coyle who finishes the scene wondering how he is either to set Owen's mind to rights or else contrive to intercede with Miss Wingrave on his behalf.

The interlude is based on the marziale as regimental banners wave brilliantly to instrumental cadenzas, notably a dialogue for two trumpets.

The second scene has Owen in Hyde Park, Miss Wingrave and Coyle in her London lodgings. There is cross-cutting between the two scenes as Owen reiterates his determination not to follow in his forefathers' footsteps, Miss Wingrave hers that tradition shall be upheld. To one of the most positive of the percussion rhythms of the opera, Owen is impressed by the beauty of the Horse Guards trotting by, Miss Wingrave by the military glory they represent. Coyle tries to persuade her that Owen's is not a childish fancy, but she decides that he shall be straightened out at Paramore.

The second interlude is subtitled 'A Sequence of Old, Faded, Tattered Flags', and Owen recites from Shelley's 'Queen Mab'.

The third scene finds Mr and Mrs Coyle at home with Lechmere. The three discuss the predicament Owen's decision seems to face them all with. Lechmere's offer to 'tell him it's a shame' – or more particularly the last word he uses – provokes a miniature ensemble, one of many in the course of this opera which contrive to define the attitudes of more than one character, bring the scene to a musical climax and lead into the next episode within the space of a few seconds; this one lasts forty-four seconds. The moment it is over Owen joins them and reiterates his determination not to change his mind. He plainly dreads facing his family.

The third interlude is concerned with Paramore, where the remainder of the act plays.

Scene iv introduces us to Kate and Mrs Julian, friends and dependants of the Wingraves who live at Paramore (Kate's uncle was Miss Wingrave's lover in the long distant past). They bemoan the latest turn of events, but both believe Owen will 'listen to the house'.

Owen returns to the very reverse of a hero's welcome, Mrs Julian resistant, Kate positively hostile, and the scene ends as Miss Wingrave ushers him peremptorily towards his grandfather's room, from which comes a cry of 'Sirrah! how dare you'.

Scene v. In four bars of music and to reiterated cries from the family of 'How dare you!' a week passes. They accuse him of rejecting the family's tradition and insulting not only the memory of his ancestors but everyone present as well. It is the most extended ensemble of the opera and ends as it begins with cries of 'How dare you!'

Scene vi. Mr and Mrs Coyle have arrived at Paramore and find the atmosphere eerie, the family gruesome. At mention of the possibility of the house being haunted, we hear the first adumbration of the Ballad theme. Owen tries to welcome them nonchalantly, but Coyle admits he has come down to make a last attempt at persuading Owen to conform.

Scene vii is preceded by an interlude and consists of the family dinner party. Small talk continually threatens to grow and is at best uncomfortable. As the dishes are cleared, each character in turn betrays his or her thoughts, in close-up as it were and in characteristic music (the nearest to a use of specifically television technique in the opera). After a particularly barbed comment from Sir Philip, Mrs Coyle is left pleading 'Ah! Sir Philip, Owen has his scruples'. A brilliant scherzando ensemble on this final word ensues for the family, and it goads Owen to the final insult: 'I'd make it a crime to draw your sword for your country, and a crime for governments to command it.' Sir Philip hobbles out in a fury and the Ballad theme is again heard in the orchestra (on the horn), a symbol no doubt of the inevitable clash between the head of the family and its rebellious son.

Act II. The stage directions of the Prologue: 'A ballad-singer is heard alternating with the distant chorus and trumpet. The verses of the ballad are illustrated by the actions in slow motion.' The haunting melody, to the words 'There was a boy, a Wingrave born', lies literally and figuratively at the heart of the work and the narrator tells the story of the young Wingrave from the past who, challenged by his friend at school to fight, refused, and was accused of cowardice by his father, only later to be struck down to his death in an upstairs room at Paramore. (The narrator, a tenor like Sir Philip, was in the original production¹ sung by the same singer.) A chorus of trebles sings a variation of Owen's motif ('Trumpet blow, Paramore shall welcome woe'), and accompaniment is confined to solo trumpet until just before Owen's voice joins that of the narrator. Lechmere is walking with the ladies and Owen contrives again to offend Kate; Mrs Coyle pleads with her for patience.

Suddenly Sir Philip shuffles out of his room and demands to see his grandson, whom he refers to as the traitor. Owen follows him in and the door is shut, but the drift of the interview can be heard outside and it is no surprise when Owen re-appears to say that he has been disinherited.

Mrs Julian breaks down sobbing at this shattering blow to her hopes. Lechmere instinctively starts to make up to Kate, who plays up to him, to the indignation of the Coyles. He would do anything to prove his worth to Kate, even sleep in the haunted room! Miss Wingrave ushers them all to bed and refers to Owen in his presence as if he did not exist.

Owen is left alone. He turns away from the portraits and in what is in many ways the climax of the opera sings, 'In peace I have found my image, I have found myself.' Suddenly he sees the ghosts of the old man and the boy slowly walk up the stairs and for a moment he thinks his rejection by the family has in some way expiated all sins of the past.

Kate appears thinking she is alone and sings sadly of what might have been. It is the first sign of her affection for Owen and their encounter quickens into a duet as they remember innumerable shared impressions of the past. But Kate will not change to please Owen, and their quarrel culminates in Owen's rating her for flirting with Lechmere. Kate accuses him of being a coward, and demands he prove his courage by sleeping in the haunted room. There is a moment of stridency from the orchestra as, at Owen's insistence, she turns the key behind him in the lock, before the scene changes to the Coyles' bedroom.

Coyle tries to reassure his wife, who is full of indignation about Kate, but an hour later (only a few bars of music) she is still not asleep, and later still Lechmere knocks at the door saying he knows of Kate's 'dare' and is worried at its possible consequences for Owen. As they are about to go off to investigate, they hear Kate's agonised cry from the distance, 'Ah, Owen, Owen, you've gone!' It might be the Governess with the dead Miles, but with her assumption of full responsibility she reaches towards tragic stature, as Sir Philip himself pushes open the door to disclose Owen lying dead on the floor. With a last piano reference to the ballad (narrator and chorus) the opera comes to an end.

H.

¹ And as in The Turn of the Screw.

DEATH IN VENICE

Opera in two acts, libretto by Myfanwy Piper after the story by Thomas Mann. Première at the Maltings during Aldeburgh Festival, 16 June 1973, with Peter Pears, John Shirley-Quirk, James Bowman, conductor Stuart Bedford, producer Colin Graham. First performed Covent Garden, 1973, and Metropolitan, New York, 1974, with same cast; Adelaide Festival, 1980, with Robert Gard; Geneva, 1983, with Anthony Rolfe Johnson; Glyndebourne Touring Opera, 1989, and 1992 at the Festival, with Robert Tear, Alan Opie, Michael Chance.

| | |
|--|-----------------|
| Gustav von Aschenbach, a novelist | Tenor |
| The Traveller | Baritone |
| who also sings | |
| The Elderly Fop | |
| The Old Gondolier | |
| The Hotel Manager | |
| The Hotel Barber | |
| The Leader of the Players | |
| Dionysus | |
| Voice of Apollo | Counter-Tenor |
| The Polish Mother | Dancer |
| Tadzio, her son | Dancer |
| Her Two Daughters | Dancers |
| Their Governess | Dancer |
| Jaschui, Tadzio's friend | Dancer |
| Hotel Porter | Tenor |
| Lido Boatman | Baritone |
| Hotel Waiter | Baritone |
| Strawberry-Seller | Soprano |
| Guide | Baritone |
| Glass-Maker | Tenor |
| Lace-Seller | Soprano |
| Beggar-Woman | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Newspaper-Seller | Soprano |
| Strolling Players | Soprano, Tenor |
| English Clerk at the Travel Bureau | Baritone |
| Two Acrobats | Dancers |
| Russian Mother and Father | Soprano, Bass |
| Russian Nanny | Soprano |
| German Mother | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Gondoliers | Tenor, Baritone |

Place: Munich; Venice, and the Lido

Time: 1911

Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

After Shakespeare, Melville and two stories by Henry James, Britten turned his attention to Thomas Mann, tackling in Death in Venice what is in most ways a more intractable problem precisely because Mann's story concerns itself so unremittingly with the thoughts, aspirations and worries of a single man. Britten and Myfanwy Piper have solved the problem by making Aschenbach himself, the successful writer at the centre of the story, serve additionally as narrator, so that his monologues provide something of the detached, ironic comment which is a feature of Mann's story. In place of the nuances and cumulative impact of Mann's writing – inevitably (and rightly) omitted from the libretto – Britten, wrote Peter Evans in *Opera*¹ before the Aldeburgh première, 'offers ... characteristic refinements of musical detail and a motivic chain, more complex yet less obtrusive than in his previous operas, that makes of the whole work his most sustained study of festering obsession'.

Aschenbach is a solitary, and opposite him are ranged two groups of characters. The main function of one group is to propel Aschenbach towards his predestined end: Traveller, Elderly Fop, Old Gondolier, Hotel Manager, Hotel Barber, Leader of the Players, off-stage voice of Dionysus. They are all played by the same baritone singer and they share the same musical material, much of it related to Ex. 2. The function of the other group is to lure him towards self-destruction, towards the Dionysian upsetting of his Apollonian (and therefore classical) balance. This group, headed by Tadzio and his mother but including also the other children who play on the beach, are represented by dancers. This emphasises the inability of Aschenbach to speak to Tadzio, the impossibility he, the most articulate of men, finds in formulating words for his thoughts, his basic failure in fact to communicate.

As Tadzio, his family and his companions are distinguished from the other dramatic characters by being danced and mimed rather than sung, so is the music associated with them generically different in that it is given to percussion. Tadzio's theme in fact is derived from the sounds of the gamelan orchestra, a sound Britten used extensively years previously in his ballet The Prince of the Pagodas (1956), and is played on the vibraphone. Its haunting, liquid A major (the key associated with Tadzio) suggests that it stands for the effect Tadzio has on Aschenbach² rather than for the healthy, vigorous youth himself, and it remains static throughout the opera, as does the beauty of Tadzio.

¹ Opera, June 1973.

² There is some kinship with Quint's celesta theme in The Turn of the Screw.

Aschenbach in contrast develops and changes musically just as he does morally and physically, and a number of themes are associated with him and his vision of his surroundings – the whole story in fact is seen through his eyes, as a psychoanalyst sees events through the mind of his patient. Exx. 2 and 4 (and to a lesser extent Ex. 3) are prominent exponents of Aschenbach's state of mind, changing as they do in the course of the action to show the changes within his mind. Ex. 2, for example, starts as the purest of diatonic scales, but by the end of Act I, distorted and dissonantly thickened, accompanies that moment of self-knowledge when his cry of 'I love you' brings him to his own particular key of E major.

Act I, scene i. Munich. Aschenbach muses on his inability to work. He is confronted by a Traveller, whose presence as much as his words conjures up an image (Ex. 1) so that Aschenbach obeys his injunction 'Go, travel to the South'. Varied and played usually on tuba, this theme later symbolises the physical plague which itself parallels the canker eating into Aschenbach's mind.

For the first time are heard the urgent yet unworried scales of Ex. 2:

Very slow (♩ = 50)

p smooth

Mar - vels un - fold:

Flowing (♩ = 112)

and it is not long before Aschenbach embarks on the first of several monologues in which he comments on the course of events and the motives which have led him to his current position. These piano-accompanied, prose monologues are a major feature of the score, with the singer's pitch indicated for him, but the duration of the notes and the 'shaping' of the phrases left to his imagination and discretion.

Scene ii. On the boat to Venice, youths shout to their girlfriends on shore (quiet chorus of 'Serenissima' underneath the banter), joined by an Elderly Fop, who has frequent recourse to a mincing falsetto and leads a vigorous song about the possibilities of life in Venice. Aschenbach finds him repulsive and starts to wonder why he ever decided to come ('Serenissima' theme in chorus and Ex. 2 in orchestra below his voice line).

Scene iii is preceded by an instrumental overture (Venice), marked Lazily, derived from the 'Serenissima' theme and consisting of barcarolle-like gondola music of some tenderness (Ex. 3):

OVERTURE: Venice

Lazily (♩ = 56)

(it even partly recalls the Lullaby in Act II of Lucretia), depicting the journey to the Lido. Aschenbach, by now looking forward to his stay, is rowed against his will (Ex. 3) by the Old Gondolier to his hotel on the Lido. There he is greeted by a Boatman and the Hotel Porter, but he finds when he turns to pay that the Old Gondolier has disappeared. He recognises the black gondola as a harbinger of death.

Scene iv. The first evening at the hotel. Aschenbach is welcomed by the Hotel Manager to a typically expansive Britten phrase, Ex. 4:

Aschenbach soliloquises on the prospect before him in Venice (with Ex. 4 and its variants very much in evidence), then watches the hotel guests assemble for dinner. Aschenbach sees the Polish family enter (Tadzio's theme heard for the first time) – Governess, two girls and Tadzio – and comments on Tadzio: 'Surely the soul of Greece lies in that bright perfection, a golden look ... mortal child with more than mortal grace.' When the Polish family goes in to dinner, Aschenbach in a further monologue reflects on the relationship of form and content, on the discipline of the family and its beauty, and concludes, 'There is indeed in every artist's nature a wanton and treacherous proneness to side with beauty.'

Scene v. On the beach (Ex. 4). Aschenbach is not at his ease, but watches the children playing (rhythmic percussion). He buys fruit from a strawberry-seller, watches Tadzio coming along the beach, approves as Tadzio mimes dislike of the Russian family, listens as voices apparently call 'Adziù' from the distance (Ex. 4 varied), but finally catches the boy's true name.

Scene vi. The foiled departure. On a visit to the city (Ex. 3), importunate guides, street-vendors and beggars together with the discomfort he feels from the sirocco prompt Aschenbach to leave Venice. He returns to the hotel where the Manager remains courteous and understanding, but the sight of Tadzio crossing the lobby impels second thoughts, which are confirmed when he discovers his luggage has been put on the train to Como. He will return to the Lido (Ex. 3) and his luggage must be sent to him there! He is greeted by the Hotel Manager with the news that the wind is now from a healthier quarter, and when he looks out of his window (Ex. 4) he sees Tadzio and the others playing on the beach. He begins to understand his relief at the foiled departure.

Scene vii. The games of Apollo. Aschenbach from his chair allows his fancy to play with thoughts of ancient Greece. He seems to hear the voice of Apollo, in imagination turns the children's beach games into some sort of Olympiad with Tadzio crowned victor of the pentathlon. The music is a series of choral dances, percussion-accompanied, linked by the off-stage counter-tenor Voice of Apollo. Competitive running, long jump, discus, javelin-throwing and wrestling leave Tadzio the winner, and Aschenbach, after his impressive Hymn to Apollo (founded on Tadzio's theme), comes to the realisation that through Tadzio he may find inspiration to write again. He tries vainly to congratulate the winner of the games, Tadzio smiles at him on his way to the hotel and Aschenbach falls helplessly back on what he thinks of later as the supreme cliché: 'I love you' (preceded by a distorted version of Ex. 2).

Act II sees an end of joy and the start of the process of destruction through corruption to which Aschenbach is inevitably committed. A slow orchestral introduction leads us to Aschenbach, who has been writing but is hardly less scornful of his inability to communicate with Tadzio than he is of his guilty feelings for the boy.

Scene viii. The Hotel Barber's shop. From the professional patter of the Barber, Aschenbach picks up a reference to 'the sickness'.

Scene ix. The pursuit. On his way to Venice (Ex. 3), Aschenbach starts to worry and subsequent events confirm his fears: the city is too quiet, people are reading notices advising against eating shellfish, the German newspapers talk of 'rumours of cholera in Venice officially denied'; and yet, when he sees the Polish family, his one thought is to keep the rumours from them in case they decide to leave Venice. Here the Tadzio theme is conflated on the top line, while beneath it can be seen and heard the yearning theme

(in crotchets) and at the bottom on the tuba (Ex. 1), in the form in which it is connected with the plague, Ex. 5:

Aschenbach follows the Poles, sits near them in a café, watches them pray in St Mark's and realises that Tadzio is conscious of his nearness. He follows them back to the hotel, then tries in soliloquy to justify his infatuation by reference to Greek examples.

Scene x. The strolling players. Outside the hotel, a group of performers sing and dance, and their Leader sings a ditty before going round with his hat. Aschenbach tries to pump him about the plague but he starts a laughing song.

Scene xi. The travel bureau. A young English clerk is attempting to cope with a crowd of hotel guests frantically seeking reservations to leave the city. To Aschenbach, when they have left, he admits that Asiatic cholera has spread from India and was diagnosed in Venice earlier that year. The authorities deny it – but his advice is that Aschenbach should leave.

Scene xii. The Lady of the Pearls. Aschenbach decides he must warn Tadzio's mother, the Lady of the Pearls, but, when she appears, he goes towards her, then turns into his room.

Scene xiii. The dream. He hears (Ex. 2) the Voices of Dionysus and Apollo and tries to reject the former's advice to 'stumble in the reeling dance', but finally in dream participates in a Dionysian orgy (the Tadzio theme distorted and Ex. 1 in the orchestra). Awake, he is resigned to his fall.

Scene xiv. The empty beach. Tadzio and a few friends are playing, watched by Aschenbach.

Scene xv. The Hotel Barber's shop. Aschenbach in a frenzied search for youth allows his grey hair to be tinted, his cheeks rouged, not without ironical recall of the Elderly Fop of Scene ii.

Scene xvi. The last visit to Venice. Aschenbach, in what the libretto describes as 'his new appearance', goes by gondola to Venice, follows the Polish family, sees Tadzio detach himself from his family and look full at him, then turn away. He buys some fruit from a strawberry-seller, finds it musty and over-ripe, and starts to take stock of his situation. In the most sustained lyrical section of the opera, he recalls the Socratic dilemma of the poet who perceives beauty only through the senses: 'Does beauty lead to wisdom, Phaedrus?', an inspired passage drawing on the reserves of the Donne Sonnets and Abraham and Isaac from more than twenty years before. One may doubt if Britten set out to prove that the strands of a drama can be drawn together and the work so revealed in a cantilena melody with only a characteristic rhythmical snap at the end of key lines, but in the event he did so.

Scene xvii. The departure (preceded by Ex. 4 as postlude to the previous scene). Hotel Manager and Porter discuss the weather and the departing guests, and it appears that the Lady of the Pearls and her party are leaving. Aschenbach comes in wearily and goes to the beach (Ex. 4 diminished so that no exuberance or expansion is left in it). He watches Tadzio and his friends playing at first listlessly, then more roughly, until Tadzio's face is pressed into the sand. Aschenbach starts to protest, but hears distant cries of 'Adziù' and is only able to answer them gently with 'Tadzio' before slumping dead in his chair as Tadzio walks slowly away. The final twenty-bar orchestral comment provides Aschenbach's threnody, with Tadzio's theme in percussion still plaintively, seductively, above the orchestra. H.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI

(born 1 April 1866, died 27 July 1924)

Busoni, whose father was Italian, his mother Austrian, grew up in a mainly Germanic atmosphere and before he was thirty had married a Swede. His career as a virtuoso pianist – those who heard him thought he was the greatest since Liszt – eclipsed during his lifetime his fame as a composer. He was drawn early to opera but produced only four during his maturity. He came to regard Berlin as home, in spite of an appointment in 1913 as director of the Liceo Musicale in Bologna and living in Zürich during the Great War.

He was theorist as well as practical musician and composer, and as far as opera was concerned believed that the proper subjects involved ‘the incredible, the untrue or the unlikely’, and that music was particularly apt for portraying the supernatural and the unnatural.

ARLECCHINO

Harlequin

Opera in one act, text by the composer. Première Zürich, 11 May 1917, with Alexander Moissi as Arlecchino. First performed Frankfurt, 1918; Berlin, 1921, conducted by Blech; Vienna, 1926; London (B.B.C.), 1939; Venice Festival, 1940, with Tellini, Mazziotti, Gelli, conductor Gui; New York, Carnegie Hall (semi-staged), 1951; Glyndebourne, 1954, with Malbin, Dickie, conductor Pritchard. Revived Berlin Staatsoper, 1946, with Beilke, Witte, conductor Schüler; Berlin, German Opera, 1966, with Johnson, Grobe, McDaniel, Lagger, conductor Patanè; Bologna, 1967.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Ser Matteo del Sarto, a tailor | Baritone |
| Abbate Cospicuo | Baritone |
| Dottor Bombasto | Bass |
| Arlecchino (Harlequin)..... | Actor |
| Leandro | Tenor |
| Annunziata, Matteo's wife | Silent |
| Colombina (Columbine), Arlecchino's wife | Mezzo-Soprano |

Place: Bergamo

Time: Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 5 minutes

Busoni called Arlecchino ‘ein theatralesches Capriccio’ (a theatrical caprice), and Edward Dent in his biography of the composer has suggested that it is in the nature of a play for puppets. As if to emphasise this, Arlecchino speaks a prologue in which he warns the audience not to take the play too literally; it is all in the spirit of a proverb.

The work is in four parts, each corresponding to an aspect of Arlecchino; we see him as rogue, soldier, husband, and conqueror. A lively introduction leads to the first scene. Matteo is sitting in front of his house sewing and reading Dante to himself. In a window upstairs, Arlecchino can be seen ardently wooing Matteo’s wife. Matteo comments on his reading, which reminds him, he says, of opera (the orchestra plays a bit of ‘Fin ch’han dal vino’ from Don Giovanni). Arlecchino wonders how he is to get away. In the end he jumps blatantly out of the window, and, when Matteo seems surprised to see him, says to him in an agitated way, ‘Don’t you know barbarians are surrounding the town?’, which so upsets the good man that he forgets where Arlecchino came from. In his confusion, Matteo drops the key to his front door, and Arlecchino picks it up and locks the door from outside, putting the key into his pocket when he has finished. Arlecchino can be heard singing briskly from behind the scenes.

The doctor and the abbé come into sight, arguing together rather in the manner of the doctor and the captain in Wozzeck. The abbé sings a song in praise of Tuscany and wine. Their slanging match abates, and they shout to Matteo, who is not, they notice, in his usual place in front of his house. In a trio in which a march theme is prominent, he explains about the barbarians who are surrounding the town and asks why they have not taken refuge themselves. They say they will go and consult the Burgomaster.

Arlecchino reappears dressed as a recruiting sergeant. The music is a parodistic reference to the march from La Fille du Régiment. He tells Matteo he is wanted immediately for the army. Matteo asks for permission to take his Dante with him, and then, to the sound of a funeral march, is marched away.

A minuet starts in the orchestra as Arlecchino tries the key he has copied from Matteo's; it fits, but at that moment he is spoken to from behind. He turns to find it is no other than his own wife, Colombina. Why, she demands in an aria, is he so cruel and unfaithful to her? She starts to flatter him but it is no use and Arlecchino disappears.

Colombina is determined to find out what Arlecchino was after in this particular house, but at that moment she hears the tenor voice of Leandro singing a romance, and she is quite unable to resist it. Leandro hears her version of her story, and immediately offers to revenge her honour. His first song is a parody of romantic German song, his second of a classical Italian equivalent. There is a flowery love scene for the two, which is almost too much for Colombina. At any rate, she enquires whether Leandro is not being just the least little bit sloppy in the aria he is singing; let her wait for the stretta, is his answer. Arlecchino comes on the scene, announces that Colombina is his wife and draws his wooden sword to fight Leandro. He knocks him out and, shouting 'murder' at the top of his voice, disappears into Matteo's house.

Colombina emerges from the tavern, together with the abbé and the doctor, who are both by now very drunk. They remember that they have to see the Burgomaster about the barbarian invaders, but the subject does not appear to be entirely clear in their minds. Suddenly, the doctor stumbles over the body of Leandro. With a shriek, Colombina recognises it. The other two start to wonder what they are to do at this hour of the night with the body of a dead man. On further investigation, Colombina decides he is not dead after all, which suggestion at first causes consternation in the minds of the other two. However, they eventually come round to her way of thinking, and try to enlist the help of the neighbours; heads appear at the windows, but are immediately withdrawn when it becomes known what is wanted of them. Suddenly a donkey appears, hitched to a cart. It is the work of providence, is the comment. In a quartet, the abbé prays, Leandro returns to consciousness, the doctor comments on the medico-philosophical aspects of the affair, and Colombina pours scorn on all men impartially. In the end, all get into the donkey cart and drive off.

Arlecchino looks down from the window of Matteo's house and waves to them as they go. He and Matteo's wife go off together. Matteo is seen coming towards his house. His companions have gone, he presumes peace has been concluded, and is returning home. He finds his wife has left the house, and so philosophically gets out his Dante and his sewing as before, and starts to read where he left off. The passage has to do with infidelity ...

A drop-curtain falls. In pairs, the various characters, including the donkey and his driver, come to make their bows to the audience. Last come Arlecchino and Annunziata, Matteo's wife. Arlecchino speaks an epilogue: he introduces Annunziata to them – they have not been lucky enough to see much of her during the evening – and then asks what the moral of the story is to be. Everything is new, everything goes on as before, is his conclusion; but his advice to the audience is that they should make up their own minds.

The stage directions suggest that if a second curtain call is needed, the drop should be raised to reveal Matteo still sitting and sewing and reading and waiting.

'Few of Busoni's compositions gave him so much satisfaction as Arlecchino,' says Edward Dent in his biography (O.U.P., 1933). 'Both from a literary and musical point of view he regarded it as his most individual and personal work. One reason for its lack of popularity up to the present is that it demands an unusual alertness of mind on the part of the spectator. The libretto is extremely terse in style, and was considerably reduced in the process of setting it to music, for Busoni was always determined to make the musical form the deciding factor in his works for the stage. With the older composers this principle led to the expansion of the libretto by frequent repetition of the words; with Busoni it led to compression.' H.

TURANDOT

A Chinese fable in two acts, after Gozzi, text by the composer. Première Zürich, 11 May 1917. First performed Frankfurt, 1918; Berlin, 1921, with Lola Artôt de Padilla, Ober, conductor Blech. Revived Venice Festival, 1940, with Carbone, Limberti, Ziliani, Colella, conductor Previtali; Hamburg, 1948, with Werth, Melchert, conductor Grüber; la Scala, 1962, with Kabaivanska, Cioni, conductor Sanzogno; Berlin, German Opera, 1966, with Annabelle Bernard, Haeffliger, conductor Patanè. New York, Little Orchestra Society, 1967, with Hannelore Kuhse.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| The Emperor Altoum | Bass |
| Turandot, his daughter | Soprano |
| Adelma, her confidante | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Calaf, a young unknown prince | Tenor |
| Barak, his faithful servant | Baritone |
| The Queen Mother of Samarkand | Soprano |
| Truffaldino, chief eunuch | High Tenor |
| Tartaglia } Altoum's ministers | Bass |
| Pantalone } | Bass |
| Eight Doctors | Tenor, Bass |
| A Singer | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Slaves, Weeping Women, Eunuchs, Soldiers, Dancers | |

Place: The Far East

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 1 hour 25 minutes

In 1905, Busoni composed incidental music for Carlo Gozzi's Turandot, not used for the stage until Reinhardt's production of 1911, and the opera was composed rapidly as a companion piece to Arlecchino in 1917. The action follows in the main the course which has become familiar to opera-goers through Puccini's later opera of the same name.

Act I. An introduction in march rhythm leads to the first scene. Calaf dashes through the city gates and rapturously greets Peking. His old servant Barak recognises him; not having seen him for so long, he had thought he was dead. Calaf tells him that his father, Timur, is also alive, and that he himself is looking for fortune in Peking. Barak tells him the story of Turandot and the riddles, whereupon Calaf laughs and seems unable to take the riddles too seriously, even though he catches sight of some heads impaled on spears at Turandot's order. Barak points to the procession which is at that moment going by, mourning the Prince of Samarkand, who has been put to death that very day. The lament is led by the Prince's mother, an aged negress. At its end, she curses Turandot, and throws the portrait of the Princess from her. Barak comments that even the portrait of Turandot is said to enslave those who gaze upon it. Calaf looks at it, and in an arioso proclaims his love for its subject. He will try his luck.

Scene ii. Truffaldino comes in front of the curtain and, in a high piping tenor, summons some slaves.

Slow, solemn music heralds the appearance of the Emperor Altoum, Turandot's father, preceded by wise doctors and attendants. The Emperor complains about his daughter's cruel behaviour, while his two comic advisers, Pantalone and the stuttering Tartaglia, gather round to flatter him. In a short aria, the Emperor prays to Confucius that he may at long last win a son in the coming trial between the stranger and Turandot. He commands that the unknown suitor be brought before him. Trumpets sound, and Calaf throws himself at the Emperor's feet. The old man is immediately impressed by the stranger's looks; who is he? Calaf answers that he is a prince, but his name must remain unknown for the present. The Emperor bids him retire now, but Calaf's reply is that he desires only Turandot or death: for him there can be no third option. Altoum offers him honours and riches if he will renounce the trial. Pantalone and Tartaglia add their voices in an effort to dissuade Calaf, but he is adamant. The brilliant quartet ends as Calaf reaffirms his determination on a series of high As.

Turandot enters, veiled. She demands to know who dares match his wisdom with hers, but, when she catches sight of the stranger, admits to herself that she is moved by the sight of him. Adelma, Turandot's confidante, in an aside recognises the Prince as the young man she fell in love with when she was a girl.¹ Calaf again denies that there is any possibility for him but Turandot or death; Turandot's rejoinder is that his death will be her death.

The Emperor suggests that Turandot ask three easy riddles so that the form of the trial may be honoured; after that the wedding can take place. Turandot refuses – the riddles are laid down by law. Truffaldino rings a bell and announces each riddle in turn. They are on a more metaphysical plane than those in Puccini's opera, and the answers are respectively Human Understanding, Morals, Art. After Calaf has guessed the second, Turandot offers to let her suitor go free and to forgo the last question. He refuses, but when Turandot unveils herself as she asks the third question, it looks as though he is lost. However, he pulls himself together and answers the third as he has the first two.

The Emperor and his entourage are delighted with Calaf's success; he calls for music, and the rejoicing is general. Turandot admits she has lost, but says the shame is more than she can bear; at the altar she will kill herself. Calaf admits that his victory is hollow if she still hates him. He offers her a fourth chance; he will ask her a riddle. What is his name?

¹ From this figure, Puccini and his librettist fabricated the tragic Liù.

Act II. The chorus and its leader sing before the curtain goes up showing Turandot's room. Slaves dance and sing, but Turandot stops them abruptly and sends them away. She cannot make out her own feelings: does she love the victorious stranger after all? She knows that if she were to give way she would soon regret it. Turandot shall die untouched, is her decision. Her aria is highly dramatic and, in spite of its greater economy, almost as taxing for the singer as the music Puccini wrote for his heroine.

Truffaldino has headed the search for the stranger's name. His aria is exactly calculated for the high, thin voice which has characterised him throughout the opera. When he interrogated the stranger, he got the answer, 'Death or Turandot'.

The Emperor comes to say he knows the stranger's name, but nothing will make him tell Turandot. She faces him bitterly – he will be sorry for his unjust words. She turns in her misery to Adelma. Adelma says the Emperor is not alone in knowing the Prince's name. In a pathetic, proud tune, Adelma says that the Princess has just addressed her as 'friend', and yet keeps her a slave; if she will give her her freedom she will in return reveal the stranger's name. The Prince once laughed at her when she was a girl, and she wants revenge more than anything in the world. Turandot greets her as sister, and Adelma whispers into her ear.

An intermezzo leads to the last scene, which takes place in the throne-room. Drums beat the rhythm of a funeral march, during which Tartaglia and Pantalone lament, asking themselves the while what the sound of mourning can be about. They are answered by the Emperor; it is for Turandot, no one else. Turandot at first agrees that it is for her, and Calaf admits that he is deeply grieved at the misery which his success induces in her. The Emperor thereupon orders bright music, but suddenly Turandot rounds on them and admits that the funeral music was part of her scheme to make her revenge the sweeter. She knows the stranger's name: Calaf! She dismisses Calaf, to the Emperor's obvious sorrow, and he turns to go, saying that he will easily find death in the wars. As he leaves, however, Turandot welcomes him as her husband, and lamentation is instantly turned to rejoicing, not least for the Emperor, for whom this means an end of sorrow. H.

DOKTOR FAUST

Opera in six tableaux (two prologues, one scenic interlude, and three scenes), text by the composer. Première, Dresden, 21 May 1925, with Meta Seinemeyer, Theo Strack, Robert Burg, conductor Fritz Busch. First performed Berlin, 1927, with Leider, Soot, Schorr; London, Queen's Hall (concert), in English translation by E.J. Dent, 1937, conducted by Boult, with Blyth, Parry Jones, Noble; Florence Festival, 1942, with Oltrabella, Renato Gigli, Manacchini, conductor Previtali; Berlin, 1954, with Fischer-Dieskau; London, 1959 (concert), with Harper, Richard Lewis, Fischer-Dieskau, conductor Boult; la Scala, 1960, with Roberti, Bertocci, Dondi; Holland Festival, 1962, by Wupperthal Opera; New York, Carnegie Hall, 1964 (concert), with Bjoner, Shirley, Fischer-Dieskau; Florence Festival, 1964; Stockholm, 1969, with Söderström, Erik Saeden; Bologna, 1985, in Anthony Beaumont's new edition; English National Opera, 1986, with Eilene Hannan, Graham Clark, Thomas Allen, conductor Mark Elder, producer David Pountney (Beaumont edition).

Doctor Faust.....Baritone

Wagner, his famulus Baritone

Mephistopheles in his various disguisesTenor

A Man Dressed in Black

A Monk

A Herald

A Chaplain

A Courier

A Nightwatchman

The Duke of Parma.....Tenor

The Duchess of Parma.....Soprano

The Master of Ceremonies.....Bass

The Girl's Brother, *a soldier*Baritone

A LieutenantTenor

Three Students from CracowTenor, Two Basses

A TheologianBass

A Jurist.....Bass

A Doctor of Natural HistoryBaritone

Four Students from WittenbergFour Tenors

Spirit voices

Gravis.....Bass

Levis.....Bass

Asmodeus.....Baritone

Beelzebub.....Tenor

Megärus.....Tenor

Sixth Voice (Mephistopheles).....Tenor

Church-Goers, Soldiers, Courtiers, Students

Place: Wittenberg; Parma

Time: Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Busoni drew his text from the old puppet-play of Faust, and he is indebted to Goethe only for the richness and nobility of the language in which he expressed his conception – he was a life-long student and devotee of Goethe. Doktor Faust represents the summing-up of his life's work.

Prologue I. The orchestral prelude is in the nature of an 'impressionistic study of distant bells'.¹ Towards the end of the prelude the chorus behind the scenes can be heard singing the single word 'Pax' (Edward Dent has aptly pointed out that this part of the work was written at Zürich in 1917). The curtain goes up and an actor steps out in front of a drop-curtain to recite the verse prologue, in which Busoni explains how the subject came to be chosen.

He disappears and the first scene is revealed: Faust's study in Wittenberg, where he is superintending some alchemical process. Wagner tells him that three students are asking to see him, and, when Faust seems reluctant to receive them, explains that they have with them a remarkable book, called 'Clavis Astartis Magica'. Faust is excited; this is perhaps the book which will give him the magic power he has so long sought. The three announce themselves as students from Cracow. Faust is reminded of his youth, with its hopes and its dreams and its plans. The students give him the book, a key with which to unlock it, and a letter which makes it his property. They take their leave. Will he see them again? 'Perhaps' is their only answer. Wagner returns, and Faust wonders why he does not show the visitors out. He saw no one, says Wagner. The pots on the hearth begin to hiss and crackle.

Prologue II. The scene is unchanged. It is night. With the key in hand which the students have given him, Faust loosens his girdle and with it draws a magic circle. Standing inside it, he calls upon Lucifer to send down his servant. Six tongues of flame appear hovering in the air. Each of them represents one of Lucifer's intimates. Faust questions the first five – how fast is each? – and dismisses each with contempt at the answer he gets. He steps out of the circle and seems reluctant to question the last spirit in case it too should disappoint him. A voice addresses him by name, and proclaims that it is as fast as human thought. 'The scene with six flames', says Edward Dent, 'is conceived musically as a set of variations on a theme; the first spirit is a deep bass, and the voices rise progressively, so that the last – Mephistopheles – is a high tenor'. Mephistopheles's musical entrance is cruelly exacting, as he is asked to sustain successively a high A natural, a B flat, and a B natural, and the phrase in which he boasts of his speed ends on a sustained C natural.

Faust appears satisfied by the answer of the sixth voice, and he summons him to appear in physical shape. Of Mephistopheles, Faust makes an unusual demand: 'Give me for the rest of my life the unconditional fulfilment of every wish ... let me understand the actions of mankind and extend them; give me Genius! give me its pain too, that I may be happy like no other – make me free.'² But Faust has stepped outside the magic circle, and Mephistopheles will only agree to serve him at a price: after he has done Faust's bidding, Faust must agree to serve him for ever. Faust says he will serve no one, and is about to dismiss him like the others, when Mephistopheles reminds him that his creditors are at the door, that the brother of the girl he has seduced is searching for him to kill him, and that no help but the devil's will suffice to extricate him from his predicament.

Faust reluctantly agrees to Mephistopheles's bargain, and the scene ends as he signs the agreement. During the later part of the scene, an unseen chorus sings the 'Credo' and the 'Gloria' and the curtain falls as an 'Alleluiah' is heard.

Intermezzo. This takes place in the Romanesque side-chapel of a great cathedral. The whole scene is dominated by the sound of the cathedral organ – Dent says that Busoni 'wanted the organ to be no mere background; it was to fill the whole theatre with its reverberation. Unfortunately there are few theatres which possess organs of sufficient power to carry out the composer's design.' A soldier, described as 'the girl's brother', is praying that he may be enabled to avenge her seduction. Mephistopheles points him out to Faust and then sets about the task of removing him. He takes on the aspect of a monk and kneels beside the soldier, who does his best to get rid of him. Suddenly, soldiers appear in the doorway and point out the soldier as the man who killed their captain. They fall upon him and kill him, leaving Mephistopheles triumphant; sacrilege and murder – and both laid to Faust's account – seems pretty good going for one day.

¹ E.J. Dent, Ferruccio Busoni (O.U.P.).

² E.J. Dent, op. cit.

Scene i. The main part of the action now begins. The scene is the court of the Duke of Parma who has just married a beautiful wife. The celebrations are suggested by the orchestral Cortège with which the scene starts (this in an extended form constitutes the second part of the 'Sarabande and Cortège from Doktor Faust', which Busoni arranged for the concert hall). Having regard to the end of this scene, when Faust elopes with the Duchess, it is hardly surprising that the music for all its brilliance has a sinister tang to it and Busoni's diabolism seems to owe something to Berlioz's crackling essays in the same vein. The pageant and ballet which introduce the rejoicing also make use of Busoni's Tanzwalzer, a work dating from 1920 and dedicated to the memory of Johann Strauss; this is a separate composition, unlike the Sarabande and Cortège which date from the same year but were always intended as sketches for Doktor Faust.

The master of ceremonies proposes that the Duke and his newly-wed Duchess shall receive Faust, by now famous throughout the world for his learning. Mephistopheles is on hand as Faust's herald, and he announces his master, who makes a distinguished appearance, with (according to the stage directions) either black boys or monkeys carrying his train. The chorus welcomes him and expresses open admiration; the Duchess wholeheartedly concurs but the Duke has misgivings.

Faust proceeds to show his powers by turning light into darkness. He asks the Duchess what he shall do for her delectation; ask for something impossible, suggests the Duke. She would like to see Solomon, she declares; in a moment he appears before them, with the Queen of Sheba at his side. The Duke is quick to notice that the Queen has a look of the Duchess about her, and that Solomon closely resembles Faust. For her next wish, the Duchess insists that Faust shall not only perform it but divine what it is. Samson and Delilah appear; under Delilah's bed hides a black slave holding the fatal shears. Once again the visions wear the features of the Duchess and Faust. The third apparition is conjured up by Faust of his own accord; Salome and John the Baptist stand before the court, and near them the executioner. Again, the protagonists seem to have borrowed the masks of Faust and his noble hostess, and this time the executioner resembles the Duke. 'At a word from Salome, his head falls,' comments Faust. 'He must not die,' answers the Duchess eagerly. Faust is confident that the Duchess loves him.

The Duke makes an end of the performance by inviting Faust to the ducal table, but Mephistopheles dissuades his master, warning him that the food is poisoned, and together they leave the stage. For a moment, no one is visible, but presently the Duchess comes into sight once more, convinced that Faust is calling her. She sings rapturously of her love for him, then goes slowly out.

It is suddenly daylight. The Duke of Parma is in excited conversation with his Chaplain, who tells him that the Duchess has eloped with Faust; he saw them disappear together on winged horses. It would be best to hush everything up and marry the sister of the Duke of Ferrara, who otherwise threatens war. The Duke accepts his Chaplain's counsel, and as the curtain falls, we see the hand raised in blessing turn to a claw.

Scene ii. The Sarabande, an extended and solemn orchestral piece described as a symphonic intermezzo, ushers in the next scene, an inn at Wittenberg, where Faust sits drinking and discussing philosophy with his students. The discussion soon approaches a quarrel, and Faust does his best to calm things down: nothing can be proved, he says; let them follow Luther's example ... He has not even time to get out Luther's name when the company divides into Catholics and Protestants, and a Latin Te Deum is heard in violent opposition to 'Ein feste Burg'.

Faust sits pensively aside until one of the students asks him to tell them of his amorous adventures with women. The orchestra sotto voce remembers the Cortège, and Faust starts to tell them of the most beautiful woman he ever loved, a Duchess, on her wedding day, only a year ago. Does she ever think of him now, he wonders. At that moment, in comes Mephistopheles in the guise of a messenger. The Duchess of Parma, who has just died, sends something to Faust for a remembrance. At Faust's feet he places the corpse of a new-born baby, to the general horror of the company. He proceeds to tell Faust's story in unromantic terms, and caps it by setting fire to the bundle, which was only straw. From the smoke he summons Helen of Troy.

At this point Mephistopheles leaves Faust alone. Faust raves of his dream of beauty but, just as he seems about to grasp the vision, it disappears into nothing, and he is alone once more. He turns to see three figures standing in the shadow, demanding the return of the book, the key and the letter which went with them. Faust motions them away: he has destroyed what they are demanding. They tell him his hour has come, but he has nothing but contempt for them and welcomes the end of his life.

Scene iii. A street in Wittenberg. It is winter, snow is on the ground, the Nightwatchman's voice informs the citizens that ten has struck (it is Mephistopheles in his last disguise). Students congratulate Wagner on his opening speech as Rector of the University, where he has succeeded Faust.

Faust comes in, recognises Wagner's house as once his, listens as the Dies Irae is sung in the church, and sees a beggar woman opposite, a child in her arms. He gives her some money, but as soon as he sees her, knows her as the Duchess. She gives him the child saying that she has already tried twice to do so. It is dead. She disappears. Faust tries to get into the church to pray, but his way is barred by the soldier who was killed in the Romanesque chapel. Faust removes him – his power still extends to spirits – and tries to pray before a crucifix at the door. But he cannot find words, and, when the light from the Nightwatchman's lantern shines on the crucifix, he sees the form of Helen of Troy upon it.

With a cry of horror he turns away, then masters himself for a supreme trial of strength. (At this point Busoni's score ends; the ending was supplied by Jarnach,¹ working from Busoni's papers. Research some fifty years later by the English conductor Anthony Beaumont suggested that the composer had music in mind other than that selected by Jarnach and he re-worked the ending of the opera with results that were first heard in Bologna in 1985 and which have been deemed an improvement on what Jarnach provided.) Faust lays the dead body of the child on the ground and covers it with his cloak. He throws his girdle on the ground, and steps within the circle. He exerts his will in a final effort to project his personality into the body of the child. May his faults be rectified in this child, and may it accomplish what he has failed to do. He dies, and as the Watchman announces midnight, a naked youth with arms uplifted and bearing a green twig in his hand rises from Faust's body and walks unconcernedly through the snow. The Nightwatchman lifts his lamp and looks down at the dead body. Has this man had an accident, he asks? H.

¹ Philipp Jarnach was Busoni's pupil. At one time, there was talk of asking Schoenberg to undertake the completion.

C

JOHN CASKEN

(born 15 July 1949)

THE GOLEM

Chamber opera, prelude and legend, libretto created in collaboration with Pierre Audi. First performed at the Almeida Theatre, London, 28 June 1989, with Adrian Clarke, Christopher Robson, Patricia Rozario and John Hall, conducted by Richard Bernas and directed by Pierre Audi. U.S. première at Orpheum Theater, Omaha, 1990, conducted by Richard Pittman. Revived for a tour by the Contemporary Music Network, beginning at the Playhouse, Newcastle, 1991. In German, Dortmund, 1994, conducted by Peter Kuhn.

The Maharal, a Rabbi; leader of his community.....Baritone

Golem, a large figure made from clay.....Bass-Baritone

Miriam, Maharal's wife.....Soprano

Ometh, a wounded, chained person.....Counter-Tenor

Stoikus, a senior figure.....Tenor

Gerty, a middle-aged woman.....Mezzo-Soprano

Stump, a cripple.....Tenor

Jadek, an old man.....Baritone

These voices also sing chorus parts (ghostly madrigalists in the Prelude and Celestial Voices in the Legend)

The Golem won the first Britten Award for Composition in 1990.

Prelude. The Maharal looks back on his youth, when he made a golem from clay. He is criticised by four ghostly madrigalists, as he remembers how his experiment failed: though not a man, the golem longed to live as one. The Maharal relives the golem's death. This touching scene is beautifully written. Its effect comes not just from the discreet, effective use of five clay plant-pots, suspended and struck like bells (with their reminder of how clay returns to clay); but also from the rigorously unsentimental use of solo wind, violin and cello to make the most of the simple text. Ometh's voice pleading not to be forgotten reminds the Maharal of how that wounded man supplanted the Maharal in the golem's eyes. The prelude ends with a lyrically nostalgic 'aria' for the Maharal, who longs for summer, for love, for solitude. A girl detaches herself from the chorus and becomes Miriam, his wife. She hands the Maharal a rose.

Legend, scene i. The Maharal creates the golem from clay, idealistically intending him to be 'A saint to do God's work in secret'. The voices of unborn spirits warn the Maharal and Ometh's voice is heard in pain.

Scene ii. The golem's coming to life occasions some extraordinary, apt orchestral effects: he stands with the bass clarinet and then the cello; staggers to glissandos from the double bass; hears to the sound of a bowed sizzle cymbal and speaks to the cor anglais. The Maharal names him Olem and harnesses his agitation to useful activity, chopping wood. His wild movements frighten the people from the village, Jadek, Stump and Gerty. He hears Miriam singing. She brings bread. The Maharal sees the attraction between them and sends Olem away.

Scene iii. The golem meets Stoikus, who is mourning the death of his son. Stoikus's angular, distorted vocal lines, accompanied by bitter alto saxophone runs, are followed by Miriam's sensuous, legato singing, offset by spare harp notes, as she washes sheets in the river. Olem helps her and their voices blend in a frenzied climax. The Maharal intervenes.

Scene iv. The Maharal also stops Miriam from helping Ometh, who is following the golem.

Scene v. An encampment. The four townspeople are plotting rebellion. Stoikus, their elder, tells them to wait for 'the saviour'. The golem arrives but Stoikus rejects him and leaves. When he returns, wild and uncontrolled, he tries to grab Olem's axe and the golem kills him.

Ometh and Olem recognise that they need one another. In a memorable duet, wreathed with arabesques from individual instruments, punctuated by rigorously controlled percussion and including a central lullaby section, initiated by oscillating clarinet and cello, Casken creates a powerful mood of reconciliation and intimacy. The Maharal prevents their union, however: he turns the golem into a rock which collapses, destroying Ometh. The Maharal insists that the golem, 'fearless, invincible', will defeat 'those who plot to destroy us'. A sinister, relentless rhythm on the bass drum alerts us to the funereal nature of this destiny. When the Maharal notices Stoikus's dead body, he realises the golem is not, after all, 'Our Saviour'. His pride turns to despair, as Jadek, Stump and Gerty drag away Stoikus's body. Their wordless lament ends the opera.

According to the composer, the legend of the golem 'warns of the dangers of creating the artificial in order to make our feelings of outrage more tolerable. It also warns against assuming that the solution to man's problems rests not within man himself, but can be found in spite of man.' If there is a hidden allegory about retaliation, it may point to the issue of Jewish revenge on an enemy identified by Maharal as 'Those who desecrate our graves, abduct our children'. Ometh, in chains, wounded and in desperate, but somehow unsympathetic need, could represent the Palestinians. Surely there is even, occasionally, a distinctively Islamic flavour to his melismatic vocal line. The implications of the story extend rather further, however. Ometh declares he will 'stand unbound'; the Maharal reminds him that 'The ancient Gods, whose purpose you opposed to save mankind with gifts of fire and hope, they saw your tricks.' Ometh, like his name, is at least in part Prometheus: his name incarnates his nature and his role. One of the rare strengths of The Golem is its openness: it will always mean different things to different people, at different times. P.

ALFREDO CATALANI

(born 18 June 1854, died 7 August 1893)

LA WALLY

Opera in four acts, text by Luigi Illica. Première at la Scala, Milan, 20 January 1892, with Darclee, conductor Mascheroni. First performed Metropolitan, 1909, with Emmy Destinn, Riccardo Martin, Amato, Campanari, conductor Toscanini; Manchester, 1919. Revived la Scala, 1922, with Sheridan, conductor Panizza; 1936, with Cigna; Rome, 1944, with Caniglia; 1946, with Caniglia; la Scala, 1953, with Tebaldi, Scotto, del Monaco, Giangiacomo Guelfi, conductor Giulini.

WallySoprano
 Stromminger, *her father*Bass
 Afra, *a landlady*Contralto
 Walter, *a strolling minstrel*Soprano
 Giuseppe Hagenbach, *of Sölden*Tenor
 Vincenzo Gellner, *of Hochstoff*Baritone
 The Messenger of SchnalsTenor

Place: Tyrol

Time: 1800

Running Time: 2 hours

Catalani died at the age of thirty-nine with effectively only four operas to his credit. La Wally was championed by Toscanini, who named his daughter after it; it is still occasionally revived.

Act I. Stromminger is celebrating his seventieth birthday. There is shooting, and Gellner hits the target. Hagenbach of Sölden would not have thought much of that, says Stromminger, adding that he cares little for the boasts of this individual, who is anyhow the son of his greatest enemy. While Stromminger and Gellner drink, Walter sings a song, which, he says, has been written by Wally. Hagenbach enters, flushed with triumph and holding the skin of a bear he has shot. Stromminger mocks his skill, then insults his father, so that Hagenbach throws Stromminger to the ground.

Wally recognises Hagenbach, who does not know her, as the youth she has been secretly in love with for some time. Gellner, who himself is in love with Wally, warns Stromminger that his daughter has fallen for his enemy, and Stromminger tells Wally that she must marry Gellner within the month. Wally tries to persuade Gellner to give her up, but Stromminger threatens to throw her out of his house if she does not agree to his demand. Wally retorts that if he does she will go off alone into the snow, and in a famous aria, 'Ebben, ne andrò lontana', confirms her resolve.

Act II. The Eagle Tavern at Sölden. The landlady Afra is engaged to Hagenbach. Stromminger is now dead, and Wally has inherited a fortune. Gellner is no longer carefree, but taciturn and even sinister. A festival is in progress, to which Wally is sure to come, they say, particularly since she will there meet her adored Hagenbach. He comes in, and seems to have little regard for Wally. He is bet that he will not succeed in snatching a kiss from Wally, and, in spite of the warnings of Afra that you cannot play with love, he accepts the challenge.

Someone suggests the kissing game, but Wally says that this is not the sort of thing that amuses her. Wally, who has not seen Gellner since she left home on his account, offers him money if he will go away. He protests that he still loves her madly, and that in any case there is no use her setting her cap at Hagenbach as he is engaged to Afra. Wally is furious, and insults Afra; Hagenbach tells her that he will avenge her.

The dance starts. Hagenbach has turned the eagle's wing in his hat upside down, which means that any promise made has no value. Only Gellner notices, but Wally dances all the same with Hagenbach. In the end, he finds her passionate fascination is too much for him, and what has started as a game has gone rather further. He kisses her, but is then dragged away amid shouts of 'Hagenbach has won his bet and Afra is revenged'. Wally turns to Gellner, asks if he still wants her, and then says that Hagenbach, for what he has done to her, must die.

Act III. Hochstoff. Wally's bedroom can be seen on one side, on the other is the bridge over the Ache. Wally returns from the dance, laments her broken dream of love, but finds enough forgiveness in her heart to wonder whether she should tell Gellner that he must not do her bidding and rid the world of Hagenbach. Suddenly there is a knock at the door; Gellner tells her he has taken advantage of the dark and has just pushed Hagenbach into the abyss.

Wally is horror-stricken, and drags Gellner out, promising Afra that Hagenbach shall be hers if he survives. She herself goes down with a rope to rescue him. He is brought up unconscious. Wally tells Afra that he has been restored to her by the grace of God. She kisses him, and says that Afra should tell him she has returned the kiss he gave her at the dance.

Act IV. Tired and hopeless, Wally contemplates the glacier near her house. Walter comes by and tells her that she is in danger from the avalanches which are prevalent at that time of the year – it is Christmas; why does she not come down to celebrate with them? She says goodbye to Walter, asking him only that he will pause on his way down and sing for her the song of the Edelweiss which was heard earlier in the opera.

He leaves her, and she prepares to die like the girl in the song. Suddenly, she hears another voice, not Walter's. She thinks at first that it is the elves of the glacier who are coming to fetch her, but soon understands that it is Hagenbach, recovered from his injuries and come to confess his love for her. Wally does not like to believe him, even when he tells her that his accident occurred when he was on his way to tell her he loved her. She admits her share in his 'accident', and he embraces her and tells her that it makes no difference to his love. Hagenbach goes to look for the path down. He shouts up to Wally, but the sound of an avalanche is heard. Wally calls anxiously to him, but all is silent. Opening her arms wide, she throws herself after the avalanche. H.

FRANCESCO CAVALLI

(born 14 February 1602, died 14 January 1676)

Having sung as a boy in the choir of St Mark's, Venice, under Monteverdi, whom he eventually succeeded as maestro di cappella, Cavalli worked as an organist, as a tenor soloist, as a composer of sacred music and of over thirty operas. His music is characterised by its breadth of feeling – it has room for witty, even salacious ditties and for many heartfelt laments. From the beginning, Cavalli worked with good writers: their lively invention continues to surprise. Among his greatest works are Didone to a text by Busenello that contrives a happy ending (1641); L'Egisto (1643), L'Ormindo (1644) and La Calisto (1651), to texts by Giovanni Faustini; Giasone (1649) to a text by C.A. Cicognini, and Ercole Amante, commissioned by Mazarin to celebrate the marriage of Louis XIV and the Infanta of Spain (1662).

L'ORMINDO

Opera in three acts, libretto by Giovanni Faustini. Première at the Teatro San Cassiano, Venice, 1644. Revived in 1967, in a radically re-worked, two-act edition by Raymond Leppard (which he also conducted) at Glyndebourne Festival, with John Wakefield as Ormindo, Peter-Christoph Runge as a baritone Amida, Irmgard Stadler as Sicle, Hugues Cuénod as Erice, Anne Howells as Erisbe, Jane Berbié as Mirinda and Federico Davia as Hariadeno.

Ormindo, Prince of Tunis Tenor
 Amida, Prince of Tremisene Alto
 Nerillo, his page Soprano
 Sicle, Princess of Susio, in Egyptian
 (i.e. gipsy) dress Soprano Melide, her lady-in-waiting,
 dressed likewise Soprano
 Erice, her old nurse, dressed likewise Tenor
 Erisbe, Queen of Morocco and Fez Soprano
 Mirinda, her waiting-woman Soprano
 Hariadeno, King of Morocco and Fez Bass
 Harmony Soprano
 Destiny Tenor

Love Soprano
 Fortune Mezzo-Soprano
 Osmano, Captain of Hariadeno's forces Tenor Guard in Ansa's Arsenal Tenor
 Messo Mezzo-Soprano
 Soldiers of Ormindo and Amida, Mauretanian (i.e. Moorish) Soldiers, Erisbe's Waiting-Women, the Winds

Place: Ansa, City in the Kingdom of Fez

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes (1967 version)

As Harmony points out in the prologue, opera was then new in Venice: it moved from private spaces to public theatres only seven years before the first night of L'Ormindo. Cavalli balances opera's noble, inherited ambition to revive the ancient synthesis of drama and music, whose primary medium was recitative, with the more popular entertainment of arias. L'Ormindo was the first of Cavalli's operas to be rediscovered this century, by Raymond Leppard. His edition of L'Ormindo, however, 'a response to unique circumstances', in Jeremy Noble's words, has since been discredited.¹ Any revival now would have to go back to the manuscript score.

Ormindo was born from the love between Hariadeno and Nearbe, who died in giving birth to him. He was brought up in ignorance of his parent-hood by Nearbe's sister Cedige, Queen of Tunis. Now an adult, he has come to Fez to help Hariadeno in his fight against Spain. With him is his friend Prince Amida, who has abandoned Sicle, the woman he was betrothed to marry. The two princes have fallen in love with Hariadeno's young wife Erisbe.

Prologue. Harmony appears before a curtain representing the Piazza San Marco. Since she came to tread the boards in Venice, she has gained in glory. The ancient Athenian and Roman stages, which she saw, never equalled the splendour of theatres in Venice, that immortal and most serene virgin.

Act I. Ormindo reflects that love has brought him to Fez and inspired him in battle. He overhears Amida's lovesick lament ('Cari globi di fiamme'). Gradually, they realise they both love the same woman, Erisbe, and agree to make her choose between them. Amida's young page Nerillo blames women's beauty for dividing such friends. Sicle, her nurse and her lady-in-waiting offer to tell Nerillo's fortune. Inadvertently, he reveals that Amida's love has been stolen by Erisbe. Lamenting that she has been betrayed, Sicle longs for death ('Chi, chi mi toglie al die'). Her nurse Erice advises women to love as she herself did, without getting involved.

¹ 'Cavalli's "Ormindo"', Musical Times, cx, 1969.

The Royal Garden. Erisbe longs for admirers, since her husband, King Hariadeno, is so old. Happily, she now has two suitors. When they approach, she sings a song about roses that wither on the stalk, unplucked, neglected. She boldly encourages first Ormindo and then Amida and explains that she loves them both. They withdraw, discomfited, when Hariadeno comes. The King asks his wife to give his allies a warm welcome. Mirinda reflects that she would never marry an old man. Destiny orders Love to ensure that Sicle's sufferings will now cease.

Act II. Erisbe and Mirinda celebrate beauty's power to reconcile discord ('Auree trecce'). The 'gipsies' appear. Sicle reads Amida's hand in Erisbe's presence and tells him that he once abandoned a princess whom he loved. She therefore warns Erisbe to love only Ormindo. Erice offers to help Amida win Erisbe. Melide reflects that now she's seen what servitude love brings, she will not get involved. Nerillo is outraged by his experience of impudent people in the city ('Che citta, che citta'), and longs to go home. Erisbe has decided to love only Ormindo ('No, no, non vo' piu amare'). He comes to take leave of her. She decides to run away with him. Mirinda comments that if she had an old husband she would do the same.

Act III. Erice reflects that in vulgar hearts, gold stimulates love. Telling Amida that Sicle committed suicide when she was betrayed she pretends to summon her spirit. Struck by Sicle's beauty, Amida begs for forgiveness. Once she has convinced him that she is alive, they are happily reunited. Fortune intervenes at the command of Destiny, and orders the Winds to send the ship carrying Ormindo and Erisbe back to Ansa. When Hariadeno hears that the fugitives have been recaptured, he orders Osmano to kill them with poison. Osmano is Ormindo's friend, however. Mirinda imagines Osmano's sighs are those of a frustrated lover and rejects his advances. When she hears that he is determined to save Ormindo's life, or die with him, she relents. Osmano meets the lovers and Ormindo tries to save Erisbe's life. She accepts her guilt, seizes and swallows some of the poison. Ormindo drinks it too; they look forward to death together and collapse. Seeing their bodies, Hariadeno repents of his fury. Osmano reveals his trick: he substituted a sleeping draught. The lovers awaken, Ormindo begs for forgiveness and blames Cupid for his treachery. Hariadeno acknowledges love's power ('Io son humano al fine'). When he learns from Cedige's letter that Ormindo is his long-lost son, he offers him his wife and his throne. They all celebrate love: it torments its followers only to reward them the more sweetly.

Francesco Bussi called L'Ormindo 'almost a Tristan und Isolde with a happy ending'.¹ While there are parallels in the plot, that makes no allowance for the work's false bottom: the way it interleaves comedy and serious opera in alternate scenes. This is not only so as to appeal to the new market: the servants' low-life solos generally comment satirically or ironically on their masters' predicaments. The opera boasts a remarkable range of characters, with a central pair of highly contrasted women. The characters also develop: Erisbe begins as a trivial flirt and ends as a passionate lover. Amida's return to his first love is a fully motivated response to the trauma of seeing her 'ghost'. Faustini's libretto for Cavalli is formulaic, however: typically, the dénouement is made the neater, rather than more interesting, when the hero's father gracefully allows him to marry his step-mother.

P.

LA CALISTO

Opera in a prologue and three acts, words by Giovanni Faustini, after Ovid. Première at Teatro Sant'Apollinari, Venice, 28 November 1651.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Nature | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Eternity | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Destiny | Soprano |
| Giove (Jupiter), King of the Gods | Bass |

¹ Storia dell'opera, Turin, 1977, vol.I.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Mercurio (Mercury) | Baritone |
| Calisto, one of Diana's nymphs | Soprano |
| Endimione (Endymion), in love with Diana | Counter-Tenor |
| Diana, Jupiter's daughter and goddess of hunting | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Linfea, an aged nymph | Tenor |
| A Little Satyr | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Pan, ruler of the sylvan world | Bass |
| Silvano, Pan's henchman | Bass |
| Giunone (Juno), Jupiter's consort | Soprano |
| Chorus of Wood Creatures, Furies | |

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

Cavalli (who took the name of his patron, Venetian Governor of Crema, where he was born) wrote some forty operas, and was, after Monteverdi, seventeenth-century Venice's leading composer. He sang in the choir of St Mark's when Monteverdi was director, and his first opera was performed in 1639, a mere two years after the first Venetian operatic performance to a paying audience, for which all Cavalli's operas were to be written. His style mixes Monteverdi's strikingly expressive recitative with the lyrical songs and arias which were becoming the vogue as audiences developed a taste for the medium. A curiosity is that it was the custom at the time, often to suit vagaries of staging, to add short instrumental ritornelli or sinfonie, frequently imported from outside and not by the composer of the opera itself. Reconstruction of his operas by Raymond Leppard, starting at Glyndebourne in 1967, played a considerable role, particularly in England, in re-establishing his work, of which La Calisto is a late and particularly brilliant example.

Prologue. Destiny persuades Nature and Eternity to agree, somewhat reluctantly, to add Calisto to the stars in heaven; instrumental ritornelli punctuate their formalised utterances.

Act I. A parched forest. Jupiter laments the state of the earth, waterless and laid waste by fire. Mercury reminds him that he has the power to restore nature but Jupiter's eye has already lit on Calisto, who is gentleness personified as she laments the lost beauties of a shattered world. Jupiter immediately replenishes a spring which gushes out for the delectation of Calisto, who nonetheless and in spite of the blandishments of Jupiter and Mercury rejects Jupiter as an old lecher and proclaims she will die a virgin. The King of the gods appeals to Mercury and is advised to take on the form of Diana, in whose retinue Calisto belongs and to whose charms she will surely succumb. Calisto, no longer bothered by importunate strangers, celebrates in song her enjoyment of the fountain's renewed freshness, seems all too easily to forget her recent proclamation, and accepts the affectionate greetings of Jupiter-Diana. They go to explore neighbouring groves and, their duet suggests, other pleasures as well, Mercury commenting cynically on the crucial role in courtship of deceit.

Endymion despairs at what he feels is his hopeless pursuit of Diana, but the goddess appears, attended by an ill-natured old harriidan, Linfea, and proceeds to lament the barren state of the forest ('Ardò, sospiro e piango'). Diana is plainly far from immune to the attractions of Endymion, but Linfea's mocking tongue drives him away, and Diana finds herself face to face with Calisto, ecstatic at the pleasure she has experienced with, as she thinks, her patroness, and anxious to renew it. Diana's indignation knows no bounds and she threatens, to Calisto's amazed incomprehension, to banish her from her entourage.

Linfea is plainly intrigued at passion breaking out all around her and wonders whether there could not after all be something in it for her. With an eye to the main chance, a little Satyr, who has been listening, offers himself as a solution to Linfea's problems, but this produces a barrage of insults from the aged nymph, and the way is left clear for Pan in his turn to declare his passion for Diana. But his love is in vain and he is left with only the support of Silvano, the Satyr, to fall back on. A ciaccona ends the act.

Act II. The summit of Mount Latmos. Endymion sings gloriously to the moon on the subject of his love for Diana, who comes in as he falls asleep and seems as smitten by what she sees before her as he was by what he only recalled in imagination. He dreams that he holds Diana in his arms and wakes to find the reality as attractive as the dream and as conducive to an impassioned love scene. Duty and her vow of chastity nevertheless call Diana away. The little Satyr, roused as always to thoughts of emulation by amorous behaviour, comments acidly on what he has witnessed and allows his imagination full play.

The plain of the Erymanthus. Juno in jealous majesty inveighs against her husband's amorous pro-

La Calisto (Glyndebourne, 1971, director Peter Hall, designer John Bury). Ileana Cotrubas as Calisto, Ugo Trama as Giove.

clivities. When Calisto innocently tells of her delicious experiences with 'Diana', the description convinces Juno that Jupiter has again been at his favourite exercise. Jupiter-Diana and Mercury come into view, the former assuring the latter of the pleasurable nature of his encounter with Calisto. Juno watches as her husband and Calisto prepare for a more private assignation but Jupiter-Diana remains behind to face out the confrontation with Juno, which ends with a little duet of triumph (premature, as we may think) between Jupiter and Mercury.

Endymion returns, sees what he supposes is Diana (but is in reality Jupiter) and causes the aroused god more than a little embarrassment with his lovesick blandishments. The situation is saved and at the same time complicated by the arrival of Pan and his followers, led on by the little Satyr. In revenge for his love of Diana, who is also loved by Pan, they take Endymion prisoner, a situation he mourns with less vigour than he does the rapidity with which Diana has abandoned him to his plight. Endymion's captors rejoice with some vigour in their triumph. Linfea makes matters worse by appearing in urgent search of a lover, a situation the little Satyr interprets as an opportunity to gratify vengeance and lust at one and the same time. He and his cohorts lose no time in putting theory into practice. The act ends with a dance.

Act III. The source of the Ladon. Calisto waits expectantly for her lover but things take a totally unexpected turn as an implacable Juno accompanied by the Furies appears to wreak jealous revenge. Calisto is metamorphosed into a little bear and Juno finishes the scene with a celebration of her triumph, ending with a sigh of regret at the propensity of presumably erring husbands to fall asleep the moment they get into bed.

Jupiter attended by Mercury attempts to turn the clock back and for a moment Calisto recaptures human form, but not for long. After Jupiter's reassurance that her place in the firmament is secure, Calisto seems reconciled to her now semi-divine status as a star, which after a nostalgic farewell she assumes.

Another part of the forest. Endymion is at the mercy of Pan and his followers who propose to teach Diana a lesson by beating him, but Diana routs them and leaves them only the satisfaction of spreading rumours about her lustful behaviour. Diana indulges in a tender love scene with Endymion during whose course, with more conviction than kindness, she reiterates her pledge of chastity.

It is time for Calisto to be received into the firmament as a star with Celestial Spirits preparing the way. Jupiter in his true form welcomes her lovingly and she takes her place as Ursa Minor, thus providing an ending seemingly full of propriety to an operatic libretto singularly – and entertainingly – devoid of that quality.

H.

ALEXIS EMMANUEL CHABRIER

(born 18 January 1841, died 13 September 1894)

Chabrier was the French composer with strongest connections with fellow artists, collaborating when he was in his twenties with the poet Paul Verlaine and numbering Manet among his friends (he owned the Bar aux Folies-Bergère soon after it was painted). At his family's insistence he trained for the law and joined the Civil Service, with the result that only in his thirties did his two comic operas L'Etoile and Une Education manquée mark him out as a composer to be watched. In the event L'Etoile had less than complete success, and two of his three remaining operas (Briséis unfinished) are profoundly serious. He was a keen Wagnerian and was regularly accused, even, amazingly, in L'Etoile, of Wagnerian tendencies. A visit to Munich brought him under the spell of Tristan and another soon after to Spain produced España and enrolled him in the list of French composers who excelled at Spanish music. There is a painting by Fantin-Latour of French Wagnerians, with Chabrier at the piano and d'Indy standing nearby.

L'ÉTOILE

The Star

Opéra bouffe in three acts, libretto by E. Leterrier and A. Vanloo. Première at Bouffes Parisiennes, Paris, 28 November 1877. First produced in New York (as The Merry Monarch), 1890, adapted by J.C. Goodwin and W. Morse, with the music arranged by J.P. Sousa. This version was given at the Savoy Theatre, London, in 1899, with new dialogue and lyrics and additional music by I. Caryl, the whole retaining little of Chabrier's original. Revived Paris, 1925; 1941, first given at Opéra-Comique, with Fanély Revoil, Lilie Grandval, Madeleine Grandval, Madeleine Mathieu, René Hérent, Balbon, Derroja, conductor Roger Desormière; revived 1985 in a production first seen in Lyons, with Michel Sénéchal, Colette Alliot-Lugaz; Opera North, 1991.

King Ouf I Tenor
 Siroco, Court Astronomer Bass
 Hérissou de Porc Épic Tenor
 Tapioca, his private secretary Baritone
 The Chief of Police Speaking
 The Mayor Speaking
 Lazuli, a pedlar Mezzo-Soprano
 Princess Laoula Soprano
 Aloès, wife of Hérissou Soprano
 Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, People, Guards
Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Act I. After a bracing, unpretentious overture, the curtain rises on a public square; on the right is some form of observatory, on the left a small hotel. Rumour has it that King Ouf in disguise is prowling round the town, and the citizens warn each other to be on the watch. Why? The appearance of a cloaked figure, which proceeds to ask leading questions of individuals about King and Government, soon provides the answer. The King must provoke one of his too law-abiding subjects into subversive talk if the rest of them are not to be cheated of their main pleasure at his birthday celebrations – a public execution. Nobody obliges with an anti-Ouf remark, so he vents his disappointment on Siroco, the Astronomer Royal, who descends opportunely from his observatory. The King explains a clause in his will under which Siroco must die a quarter of an hour after his employer, then orders Siroco to look into the omens which surround Ouf's projected marriage with Princess Laoula, the daughter of his neighbour, King Mataquin, by which he proposes to bring peace between the two countries and provide his own with an heir to the throne.

On to the empty stage come four cloaked figures, respectively Hérissou de Porc Épic, King Mataquin's ambassador, Tapioca, his confidential secretary, Princess Laoula, and Aloès, wife of Hérissou. In chorus they announce their intention of remaining incognito under the guise of shopkeepers. For reasons that he says are diplomatic, like those for their incognito, Hérissou has been passing Laoula off as his wife – a complicated manoeuvre, but where would diplomacy be without complications?

They all go into the hotel as Lazuli, a pedlar, comes on singing gracefully of the power of cosmetics in the female world ('Je suis Lazuli') – an undoubted 'hit' number. Lazuli admits to himself that he has fallen in love with one of four travellers, and he gives his last golden piece to Siroco in return for a promise to consult the stars about his future. While his horoscope is being cast, Lazuli prepares to sleep and sings a touching romance to the star on which so much appears to depend.

No sooner have Hérissou and Tapioca left the inn, than Aloès and Laoula come out too, resolved on adventure. They catch sight of the recumbent Lazuli and decide to wake him up. The obvious way is to tickle him, and this method is graphically illustrated in the music ('Il faut le chatouiller pour le mieux réveiller'). Lazuli pretends to be asleep until he has the chance of seizing hold of his tormentors. He declares his love for Laoula and gives practical proof of it in the form of a kiss, but the return of Hérissou and Tapioca spoils a promising scene. Lazuli is desolate to hear that Laoula is the wife of Hérissou, and when King Ouf, still on the lookout for a victim for the public holiday, approaches him, he is understandably out of humour, speaks ill of the government and finishes by boxing the ears of his interrogator. Beside himself with joy, Ouf summons his guards and reveals to Lazuli that the ears he has just boxed are the King's. For his offence he must die – and the King sends for the instruments of torture whose praises he sings in the 'Couplets du Pal'. As Lazuli is about to be ceremonially impaled, Siroco interrupts to say that the stars reveal that the King's death will closely follow Lazuli's. There is a quick change of plan, Lazuli is pardoned, and the King announces that he will install him in the royal palace.

Act II. The Throne Room in the King's palace; at the back, windows giving a view on to a lake. Lazuli, now richly caparisoned and waited on by maids of honour whom he thanks in a brindisi, is visited by the King and Siroco, who have come to satisfy themselves about his health, on which so much depends for each of them. Their solicitude leaves him a prey to considerable misgivings, and he escapes with the aid of a tablecloth through the window. Ouf and Siroco return, are seized with consternation at what they see, promise to grant Lazuli his liberty and so persuade him to climb back again. He tells them he is in love with a married woman but, in a lively song, rejoices that husbands have never bothered him much – at worst he challenges them to a duel. When Hérissou the new ambassador is announced and recognised by Lazuli as the husband of his innamorata, King Ouf, much to Hérissou's fury, cannot give him his full attention. He is very little concerned with the details of Hérissou's mission as an ambassador, very much with his skill as a duellist, so much so that he unwittingly almost provokes Hérissou to deliver the ultimatum he always carries in his pocket against emergencies. The crisis however is averted when Hérissou goes off to fetch Princess Laoula.

So that Lazuli may be assisted to win Hérissou's wife, Hérissou when he reappears is arrested and removed by Siroco, leaving the way clear for the lovers. At this point there is a charming quartet for Lazuli and Laoula, Tapioca and Aloès, which becomes a sort of double love duet as it is clear that Tapioca means to practise on Aloès all the attentions which Lazuli lavishes on Laoula. Ouf not unnaturally takes Aloès for the Princess he is betrothed to. Nobody disillusion him. Ouf offers Lazuli freedom and money, Laoula expresses gratitude in a charming song ('Moi, je n'ai pas une âme ingrate') and, in a trio, Ouf speeds them on their way – none too soon as Hérissou, who has escaped, at this moment charges into the room. Ouf calms him and everything is prepared for a ceremonial welcome to the Princess, when Hérissou returns, leading in Aloès and Tapioca, furious not only that Princess Laoula has disappeared but that he has found his wife and Tapioca in a highly compromising situation. The embroilment soon becomes plain even to Ouf, his dismay mounting as Hérissou reveals that he has sent the guards off in pursuit of the eloping lovers; the King's consternation explodes at the sound of a shot. Laoula is led in alone, and sadly starts to tell her story. When she describes how Lazuli suddenly disappeared to the bottom of the lake, her tune becomes brilliant and merry ('Et puis crac! Tout changea dans une minute').

Act III. An entr'acte based on the tickling trio brings up the curtain on another room in the palace. Even surreptitiously putting the clock back cannot disguise from Ouf and Siroco the unhappy fact that they are waiting for death. It is plain to them that only a glass of cordial can restore their spirits.

Lazuli now emerges from hiding. Confident of his own prowess as a swimmer, he had dived from the boat and so evaded his pursuers. The trouble is, as we learn in a song ('Enfin je me sens mieux'), that his ducking has given him a horrible cold and he sneezes throughout his number. He hides as Ouf and Siroco reappear. Even a glass of yellow chartreuse has not completely restored the King's morale and wits, and Lazuli from his hiding place sees him inadvertently insult Hérissou, receive the ever-ready ultimatum, but successfully evade the consequences by pleading that it is Hérissou's fault that Lazuli is dead and that the King must therefore shortly die.

The scene, with its references to his impending end, has tired Ouf, and Siroco timidly suggests that the remedy is another glass of cordial – this time perhaps some green chartreuse, at double the strength. There ensues the Duetto de la chartreuse verte, a hilarious parody of an early nineteenth-century Italian piece. Ouf and Siroco leave together, and Lazuli comes out of hiding a good deal clearer in his understanding of the situation than before. He listens while Aloès tries to console Laoula, who is clearly very unhappy at his (Lazuli's) death, then he himself joins in to make the duet a trio. There is a grand reunion, and Lazuli tries to explain to Laoula that he will eventually marry her.

Re-enter Ouf, clear in his mind about only one thing, that on the whole he prefers green to yellow chartreuse, because green is stronger. He has another look at Laoula then decides on a quick wedding, urging the joys of widowhood on the disconsolate Princess, who in a sweetly pretty song in 6/8 compares herself with a rose that once picked starts to wither and die. Just in time for Laoula, Ouf is reminded by the observatory clock that he has been tampering with the one in the palace, and seeing that the hour is at hand, renounces the proposed wedding. When the clock strikes and he remains alive, he finds time amidst his relief to assure Siroco of impending punishment, but regains his good humour in time to pardon Lazuli, who has been arrested by the diligent Chief of Police, and, to the tune of 'Le Pal', to bless Laoula and Lazuli and provide the necessary happy ending. H.

GWENDOLINE

Opera in three acts, text by Catulle Mendès. Première Brussels, 10 April 1886 (there were only two performances as the Director of la Monnaie was declared bankrupt). First performed Karlsruhe, 1889, conductor Mottl; Munich, 1890, with Ternina, conductor Hermann Levi; Lyons, 1893, conductor Luigini; Opéra, Paris, 1893, with Berthet and Renaud, conductor Mangin, by which time the composer was mortally ill. The opera was revived in Paris in 1911 with Kousnetsova and conducted by Messager, and there had been thirty-eight performances by 1941. It was revived at San Diego in 1982 with Rosalind Plowright.

Harald, a Dane, king of the sea Baritone
 Old Armel, a Saxon chief Tenor
 Gwendoline, his daughter Soprano
 Aella, Armel's retainer Baritone
 Erik, Armel's retainer Tenor

Danes; Saxon Men and Women

Place: Coast of Britain

Time: Eighth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

Chabrier after his visit to Munich in 1879 became an ardent Wagnerian, but the music of Gwendoline is that of a French composer and there is little Wagnerian about his third opera except maybe the bones of the slightly absurd plot. It was turned down by the Opéra and only heard there after performance in Germany under conductors such as Mottl and Hermann Levi. There had been a private performance at the Princesse de Polignac's in 1888, when Fauré and Chabrier himself on harmonium and piano, d'Indy and Messager playing percussion, twenty-four chorus members plus harp and string quartet, accompanied Mme Lureau-Escalaïs and the baritone Melchissédec. But there was no follow-up.

The action is uncomplicated. A peaceful Saxon fishing village is overrun by Danish invaders, whose leader, Harald, is prevented from killing Armel, their chief, by Armel's daughter Gwendoline. Harald is overcome by Gwendoline's beauty, is persuaded by her to bend his rough manners to her more civilised ways – he even sits at her spinning wheel – and he ends by asking her father to be allowed to marry her. The idyllic second act is dominated by an Epithalamium and a duet for the lovers, but Armel presses a knife into Gwendoline's hand instructing her to kill Harald while he sleeps. Harald will not listen to Gwendoline's warning, and in spite of his valiant defence with only the knife as weapon, he is mortally wounded. Gwendoline stabs herself and they die together upright against a tree.

Francis Poulenc, in his book on the composer, singles out for particular praise the brilliant overture, and in the first act Gwendoline's Légende as well as Harald's aria; also Harald's request to Armel for his daughter's hand. In the second, he particularly praises the tender prelude, the Epithalamium – which he calls the jewel of the score – and the duet for the protagonists. H.

LE ROI MALGRÉ LUI

King in Spite of Himself

Opéra-comique in three acts, libretto by Emile de Najac and Paul Burani. Première 18 May 1887, Opéra-Comique, Paris, with Adèle Isaac, Cécile Mézéray, Max Bouvet, Delaguerrière, Lucien Fugère, conductor Danbé. Revived in a new dramatic version by Albert Carré, at Opéra-Comique, 1929, with Brothier, Guyla, Bourdin, Musy; 1946, with Turba-Rabier, Vina Bovy, Bourdin, Musy; 1959, with Micheau, Castelli, Clément, Musy; Toulouse, 1978, conductor Plasson; Opera North, 1994.

Henri de Valois, King of Poland Baritone
 Comte de Nangis, a member of his suite Tenor
 Duc de Fritelli Buffo Baritone
 Count Laski, a Polish patriot Bass
 Basile, an innkeeper Tenor

French noblemen

Villequier Bass
 Liancourt Tenor
 Elbeuf Tenor
 Maugiron Baritone
 Quélus Baritone

A Soldier Bass

Minka, one of Count Laski's serfs Soprano

Alexina, Duchess of Fritelli Soprano

Six Serfs, Pages, French Noblemen, Polish Noblemen, Soldiers, Polish Ladies, People

Place: Poland

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Written in only nine months following the successful première in Brussels of Chabrier's ambitious serious opera Gwendoline, Le Roi malgré lui, in spite of a clumsy libretto (re-cast by Albert Carré for the revival in 1929 at the Opéra-Comique), is often considered Chabrier's masterpiece. Of it, Maurice Ravel, with as much use of hyperbole as Sir Thomas Beecham in his famous comparison of Manon and the Brandenburg Concertos, wrote, 'I would rather have written Le Roi malgré lui than the Ring of the Nibelung!' In truth, it is a score full of wit and erudition, of tender lyricism and comedy, perhaps amongst French opéras-comiques as much underrated in world estimation as was once Berlioz's more heroic Les Troyens.

Henri de Valois is King of Poland but he is bored with position and surroundings alike and nothing would please him better than to be rid of both.

Act I. The French nobles of Henri's court are gathered together in the castle near Cracow, playing cards and chess, fencing and generally whiling away the tedium of life in a court far from home. Nangis sings of the penance of existence in a barbarous capital, relieved only by the possibilities of a diverting love affair, then takes credit for the new soldiers he has succeeded in recruiting. The King enters, is acclaimed, reviews disinterestedly the soldiers drawn up for him, and receives in reply to an enquiry the answer that a bodyguard is necessary for him as many Poles opposed his election as their King – Villequier suspects a plot against his life. The post from France is brought ceremonially to the King, who in a beautiful romance hymns the praises of his longed-for native land. He is depressed at the unreality of his position: his senior French advisers fear he will rush off to France, his Polish subjects, led by Count Laski, dread his staying in Poland.

Enter Duke Fritelli, an Italian attached to the court but married to a Polish wife, niece moreover to the suspect Count Laski. With his conceit and cowardice and his lack of physical attraction, he is a recognised figure of fun, but the King asks him for his interpretation of the Polish character – this he gives in a remarkable and brilliantly characterised Mazurka ('Le Polonais est triste et grave'). The King insists on the attractions of Italian women, instancing an adventure he recently had with a masked Venetian in her native city. The Duke goes to fetch his wife, whom the King wishes presented, and the King discovers from Nangis that he is in love with Minka, a serf in the household of Count Laski. She regularly passes on information of her master's plots against the King. The King tells Nangis that they will go together in disguise to Cracow to spy out the land.

No sooner have the King and his attendants gone than sounds of a scuffle are heard, and Nangis has to rescue Minka from a soldier. In tender music they celebrate the love they feel for one another. Minka reveals that there is to be a ball that night at Count Laski's, then protests her love for Nangis in a graceful romance ('L'amour, ce divin maître'). She hides at the approach of the Duke and Duchess of Fritelli, intent on making obeisance to the King.

Thinking themselves alone, Alexina, the Duchess, reveals to her husband, who is also in the plot, that the Polish opponents of Henri de Valois meet that night at her uncle's house. When Fritelli suggests that he, her husband, should be the object of her passion, she bursts out laughing, and in a rapid interchange advises her husband to concentrate on ambition, while he urges on her the claims of love. She starts to tell him of an adventure she had in Venice when Fritelli realises that, for all the innocent slant she gives it, it is complementary to the one the King has just told; she was the Italian under whose spell he fell! When news comes that the King is too busy to receive the Duchess, Fritelli is overjoyed and announces to her his convinced adherence to the plot to drive out the foreign ruler.

Minka is about to tell Nangis of the plot against the King's life, when the King himself comes from his room. Minka, believing him like Nangis a member of the King's entourage, in a charmingly lyrical duet tells him about the plot, then points out Fritelli as one of the conspirators. The King immediately confronts Fritelli with the accusation, then pardons him on condition that Fritelli take him (the King) to the ball at Laski's that very night. The King looks for a pretext for a Frenchman to present himself as a prospective conspirator, then pretends to lose his temper with Nangis and sentences him to immediate imprisonment. The finale works up to a fine ensemble of perplexity à la Rossini ('Qu'a-t-il fait? En effet qu'a-t-il pu commettre?': What's he done? My goodness, what could he have done?) and the King departs as Nangis is led off.

Fritelli starts to explain to his wife that the King cannot now receive her, when he appears unannounced. It is immediately clear that each recognises the other as the nameless lover from Venice, but that neither has an inkling of the identity of the other. Fritelli is made to introduce the King as Nangis, who as a result of his unjust treatment is anxious to join the conspirators. The trio ('Quelle surprise, ma beauté de Venise') makes a brilliant effect but is interrupted by the voice of Minka, singing in the park as she waits for her rendezvous with Nangis. Henri brings the act to a close: 'Conspirons tous trois contre Henri de Valois'.

Act II. The great hall of Count Laski's palace at the start of the ball. The music – the well-known Fête Polonaise – is a choral dance, brilliantly orchestrated and altogether in the tradition of Berlioz (cf. the scene of the Roman Carnival in Benvenuto Cellini). Suggestions of Mazurka lead to an intoxicating and glitteringly orchestrated waltz sequence. The ball is an excuse for Count Laski to gather together the conspirators. Alexina presents as a sympathiser the Comte de Nangis (the King in disguise) but a complication is introduced when the ubiquitous Minka overhears the introduction and knows that some deception is afoot. During the course of a choral ensemble of conspirators, which rivals Meyerbeer for massive effect and far outdoes him for musical excitement, the soi-disant Nangis swears with the others to do all possible to remove the King from Poland, and Fritelli, in spite of efforts at evasion, is charged with abducting his master. However, when most have gone, the disguised King takes pity on Fritelli and says he has a more subtle plan to effect the removal of the King – who was once, Alexina points out, his greatest friend. 'Rien n'est aussi près de la haine que l'amitié' (Nothing is closer to hatred than friendship) is the burden of a witty and exquisite quartet, in which Alexina and the King are joined by Fritelli and Laski.

There follows an interlude, the Sextuor des Serves and the Chanson tzigane, dramatically superfluous but musically very much to the point, with its sensuous writing for concerted female voices and its exceptionally brilliant solo for Minka, who relates the story of her happy love to her fellow serfs.

The King enters, followed by Alexina, who is still ignorant of his identity but knows him as the man who swore eternal faith in Venice and then disappeared. 'Oui, je vous hais' (Oh yes, I hate you), she sings, but the duet turns to a barcarolle reminiscence of their rapturous experience – it is patently a delectable precursor of Reynaldo Hahn's operetta style. Alexina is clearly in love, and when she leaves, the King asks Fritelli whose wife she may be, is put off with vague hints of six children, false teeth and a wooden leg, but has the last word when he says he will ask Laski to release him from his promise. The reason: he is in love with a Pole!

Minka alone sings to attract her lover who appears just long enough to be told about the King's supposed presence at the ball before hiding. The news passes round until Laski has the doors shut and guarded. When Nangis does not remove his mask, Laski assumes that he is the King and an ensemble begins, Offenbachian in spirit and culminating in Nangis's spritely song (prompted by the real King), 'Je suis le roi'. The Poles demand his signature to an act of abdication, but prompted by Minka he refuses, and is immediately put gently but firmly under lock and key. When his death is voted as alternative to abdication, the real King proposes himself as the true victim.

Consternation is general, led by Alexina, who vouches for his bona fides as a mere member of the court. When the conspirators draw lots for the man to deal the fatal blow, each puts the name of Nangis on a paper, but when the King makes as if to enter and deal a death blow to himself, Minka appears and admits she has helped Nangis escape. The conspirators realise that vengeance may at any moment overtake them, and, the King promising to keep his oath, they agree to leave the house, to a thundering reprise of the ensemble de la conjuration.

Act III. The complications must be resolved, which they are, though not before some fairly extensive and choice red-herrings have been found, chased, pickled and discarded. The scene is the hall of an inn on the Polish frontier; numbered doors give off on either side and the hall is full of decorations, most of them bearing the letter H. A crowd sings of its joy at the prospect of a new King for Poland, but Fritelli has to explain that the new King is Archduke Ernest, not Henri de Valois! The music is a vivid allegro tempo mazurka, chorus and ensemble in the style of the opening of the last act of Carmen, spiced with ingredients peculiar to the composer of España and the Joyeuse Marche. In the course of a not too satisfactory conversation with Basile, the innkeeper, Fritelli learns that a distinguished-looking traveller arrived at the inn the night before and is now lodged in room eight. Obviously, thinks Fritelli, Archduke Ernest. Immediately bouquets are handed out, and Fritelli steps forward with a smile – only to see Henri de Valois step with a grin through the door.

The explanation is simple: horses were prepared to take him to the frontier but no further, and the coachman deposited him here – will the Duke please order a carriage to take him a stage further? More than that, will he convey his infinite regrets to the charming niece of Count Laski that he had to leave without saying goodbye? The Duke does not know whether to be angry or relieved, but goes off to do the King's bidding, leaving the field clear for the entrance of Alexina and Minka, who has been allowed to accompany her in her carriage. Together they lament the precipitate departure of the men they love (the sentiments are genuine enough, even if by now the names have got thoroughly mixed up).

At this moment Fritelli comes in carrying the hot water the King has demanded, delivers it, intimates to the despair of Alexina and Minka that the King and Nangis have both left for France, and then explodes at Alexina's complaint at his cavalier dismissal of her: 'Nous ne sommes plus à Venise, Madame!' He rates her for her indiscretions in a comic song: 'Je suis du pays des gondoles' (what is the reference to Berlioz's Marche Hongroise as refrain at the end of each verse?), explains that he is on an errand for the Archduke, and enters room number eight. Alexina for her part goes through the performance of collecting the peasants and preparing to salute the new King, only to see her lover come out.

All is explained, his identity as King and hers as the Duke's wife, but there is an interruption as Minka runs in, crying that Count Laski is at hand; she will be taken back to Cracow, the King will be slain. Henri consents to leave, saying that he has kept his word and the King is no more; Minka believes he has killed her lover and runs after him, vowing revenge; and Laski is told 'Le roi n'est plus' (The King is dead!). But an important change has taken place that morning, when news was received that the Archduke had renounced the throne, and the Polish nobles, impressed by Henri's chivalrous conduct the night before, had decided to renounce their opposition. He must be stopped before it is too late!

It remains to resolve Minka's dilemma, expressed in a despairing aria. Nangis appears to explain the deception and claim her in a love duet, before Henri returns in something like triumph. He extends grace to everyone, and the opera ends with the shields bearing the royal H once more to the front, and a general acclamation for 'Le Roi malgré lui'. H.

GUSTAVE CHARPENTIER

(born 25 June 1860, died 18 February 1956)

LOUISE

Opera in four acts, text by the composer. Première Opéra-Comique, Paris, 2 February 1900, with Marthe Riota, Deschamps-Jéhin, Maréchal, Fugère, conductor Messager. First performed Berlin, 1903, with Destinn, Goetze, Philipp, Baptist Hoffmann; Vienna, 1903, with Gutheil-Schoder, Slezak, Demuth, conductor Mahler; New York, Manhattan Opera House, 1908, with Garden, Bressler-Gianoli, Dalmorès, Gilibert, conductor Campanini; Covent Garden, 1909, with Edvina, Bérat, Dalmorès, Gilibert, conductor Frigara; Metropolitan, 1921, with Farrar, Harrold, Whitehill. Revivals include Covent Garden, 1919, with Edvina, Anseau, Cotreuil, conductor Coates; 1928, with Heldy, Kaisin, Journet; 1936, with Delprat, Verdière (later Maison), Bouilliez, conductor Sargent; Metropolitan, 1930, with Bori; 1939, with Moore, Maison, Pinza; 1947, with Dorothy Kirsten, Jobin, Brownlee, conductor Fourestier; la Scala, Milan, 1923, with Heldy, Casazza, Pertile, Journet, conductor Toscanini; 1929, with dalla Rizza; 1934, with Favero, Casazza, Ziliani, Stabile; New York, City Opera, 1962, with Arlene Saunders; English National Opera, 1981, with Valerie Masterson, John Treleaven, Richard Van Allan, conductor Cambreling.

LouiseSoprano
Her MotherContralto
Irma.....Soprano
Camille.....Soprano

| | |
|-------------------------------------|---------------|
| Gertrude..... | Contralto |
| Elise | Soprano |
| Blanche..... | Soprano |
| Suzanne | Contralto |
| Marguerite..... | Soprano |
| Madeleine | Contralto |
| An Errand Girl | Soprano |
| A Street-Sweeper | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Young Rag-Picker..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Forewoman..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Milk Woman | Soprano |
| A Newspaper-Girl..... | Soprano |
| A Coal-Gatherer | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Dancer | |
| Julien, a young artist | Tenor |
| Louise's Father | Bass |
| A Night-Prowler ('Noctambule')..... | Tenor |
| A Ragman..... | Bass |
| An Old Bohemian..... | Baritone |
| A Song Writer | Baritone |
| A Junkman | Bass |
| A Painter..... | Bass |
| Two Philosophers..... | Tenor, Bass |
| A Young Poet..... | Baritone |
| A Student | Tenor |
| Two Policemen..... | Baritone |
| A Street Arab..... | Soprano |
| A Sculptor | Baritone |
| An Old Clothes Man | Tenor |
| An Apprentice..... | Baritone |
| The King of Fools..... | Tenor |
| Street Pedlars, Workmen, etc. | |

Place: Paris

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Louise is not so much the best of Charpentier as, a few early works apart, virtually his only musical legacy. He re-worked La vie du poète, a product of his sojourn in Rome after winning the Prix, for Julien, a sequel to Louise which, even with the benefit of Farrar and Caruso in the leads, failed at the Metropolitan. The large-scale Fête du couronnement de la Muse, written for an open-air ceremony in Montmartre, had already been cannibalised for Louise.

Charpentier was socially aware and nothing if not a believer in his own preaching, and in 1902 he founded the Conservatoire populaire Mimi Pinson in order to provide a free artistic education for the working girls of Paris. About the poverty of the working classes and women's emancipation he felt passionately, and in Louise he mixed realism and symbolism with the skill of a master, realism dominating the outer acts and the scene in the atelier, symbolism taking over with the intertwined figures of the Night Prowler, who stands for the evils of Paris (which Charpentier deplored) and free love (which he endorsed), and the King of the Fools, who presides over the city's glamour. When street criers and workers crawl like insects from the woodwork, the two ingredients mingle easily, and the mixture they make emerges half actual, half allegorical.

Paris is in the end Charpentier's theme – his own love story – and he has succeeded in suggesting a sense of freedom and pleasure against a background of struggle and even misery. The emancipated story as much as the music worked initially for Louise, but even today when you hear the swirl of the waltz which suggests the intoxication of Paris, you can see how the theme caught hold of a whole generation. Here was the pull of the forbidden at its most seductive. After its first night, Paul Dukas, a composer five years younger than Charpentier, pronounced an elegant verdict: 'The first and last acts are those of a master; the other two are those of an artist; the whole is the work of a man.'

There is a short prelude, which reiterates a figure used extensively in the course of the opera:

It is associated rather with the call of freedom, which, to Louise, is inextricably bound up with Julien, than with Julien himself. Three bars before the end of the prelude is heard a motif which refers to Louise's father.

Act I. A room in a working man's tenement. Opposite, a terrace belonging to an artist's studio. As the curtain goes up, Julien can be heard and seen serenading Louise to Ex. 1. Louise comes into the room in answer to his cries, and a conversation ensues between them. Louise has suggested Julien should write formally to her parents asking for her hand in marriage; if they refuse permission, she will run away with him. This, she insists, must be a last resort, as she loves her parents and hates the thought of parting with them on bad terms.

Louise asks Julien to tell her again how he first fell in love with her. He goes over it in detail – not for the first time we may imagine – from a description of his dreams (he is a poet) to the meeting of their realisation – herself – on the staircase: 'Depuis longtemps j'habitais cette chambre'. At the climax of his story, in comes Louise's Mother. She does not immediately make her presence known (except in the orchestra), but hides to listen to what is being said. The tender conversation continues and is not without its disparaging reference to the Mother, who finally puts an end to it by dragging Louise away. She sneaks back for just long enough to see the letter to her parents that Julien holds up to her.

The Mother reappears and shuts the window. Louise makes an effort to keep up appearances and arranges the supper, but her Mother imitates the tone of the conversation she has overheard, and mocks Louise's love for Julien. Only the sound of the Father coming up the stairs from work stops her laying hands on her unfortunate daughter. The Father comes in, asks whether supper is nearly ready, and proceeds to open the letter which Julien has left for him. Louise and her Father embrace – they are obviously very fond of one another – and the family sits down to table.

Louise takes the letter to her Father, who re-reads it, and appears to want to give the whole matter his consideration. But the Mother is furious, and, when Louise contradicts a particularly vicious insinuation about Julien, she slaps her face, to the Father's obvious displeasure. Her Father asks Louise to read the paper to him. She starts, but mention of spring in Paris is too much for her, and she dissolves in tears.

Act II. The prelude is called 'Paris s'éveille' (Paris awakes). A street at the foot of the hill of Montmartre, five o'clock on an April morning. The house where Louise works as a dressmaker is seen on one side of the stage. Various derelict citizens of Paris go about their business, whether it be the setting up of a stall from which to sell milk, or the search for something worthwhile among the rags and refuse of the city. One of the figures in this scene is the Night-Prowler. He is represented as a late reveller returning home, but he is also intended to symbolise the 'Plaisirs de Paris' for which Louise and those like her long so ardently. In his symbolism, Charpentier has made use of a pun on the word 'plaisir', which is also a kind of wafer, and whose street-seller's cry is associated musically with the Night-Prowler.

Julien and some Bohemian friends come to wait for Louise, in order to find out the answer to his letter. The girls who work at the dressmaker's begin to arrive, and they are soon followed by Louise and her Mother. The Mother leaves, Louise goes inside but is soon dragged out by Julien, who questions her about the letter. He is furious at her lack of rebellion; will she go back on her promise to come away with him?

The work room of the dressmaker's establishment. The girls sit round the tables, sewing and chattering. They notice that Louise has been crying, and suggest that she is in love. She denies it furiously, but Irma launches into a song on the subject of love, and soon the sound of a polka is heard from down below, immediately followed by the voice of Julien serenading: 'Dans la cité lointaine'. The girls are at first pleased, but seeing that his song is addressed apparently to none of them they begin to find it a bore. Louise can bear it no longer, asks them to explain that she has had to go home, and is later seen arm in arm with Julien in the street. Peals of laughter from the girls.

Act III. A little garden on the side of Montmartre. The prelude sets the scene with adumbrations of 'Tout être a le droit d'être libre'. Panorama of Paris; almost twilight. As the curtain rises, Louise sings her celebrated romance, 'Depuis le jour où je me suis donnée' (Oh day of joy when you became my lover). Life has changed for her since she came to live with Julien. 'Depuis le jour' has become a favourite aria, and its soaring lyricism has sufficient fervour to enable it to make a considerable impression even when heard out of context.

Louise explains that in her workshop no one took trouble about her or appeared to like her; even her father, who loves her, always treated her as a little girl, and her mother beat and scolded her ('Qui aime bien, châtie bien'). Together she and Julien rejoice at the sight of the lights of Paris coming up one after another, together they sing rapturously of their freedom: 'Tout être a le droit d'être libre' (All men have a right to be free), as much the egalitarian Charpentier's philosophy as theirs.

There follows the curious episode of the 'Couronne-ment de la Muse'.¹ Into the garden come Bohemians, who proceed to decorate the front of the house with paper lanterns and streamers. They are followed by a procession whose centrepiece turns out to be none other than the Night-Prowler of Act II, now dressed up as the King of the Fools. Louise is crowned Muse of Montmartre. But the jollity is suddenly interrupted when a sad figure is seen standing apart. It is Louise's Mother, who seems very different from the fire-eater of Act I. She comes to say that Louise's Father is very ill and desperately anxious to see her again. For a time, they had kept up the pretence that she was dead, but she had found him creeping along to Louise's room at night, and crying out her name. Julien is at first suspicious, but he eventually agrees that Louise may go home, the Mother promising that she shall return to him as soon as she wishes.

Act IV. The scene is the same as that of the first act. Julien's terrace is no longer visible. Louise is still with her parents, who have broken the promise to allow her to return to Julien. Her Father is just recovering from the illness which has kept him from work, but he has changed a good deal since we last saw him, and the contented and resourceful man of the first act has become a grumbler: 'Les pauvres gens peuvent-ils être heureux?' Everything is against him now, and he complains of the ingratitude of children, who would throw off the authority of those who love them and are prepared to die for them.

The significance of what he says is not lost on Louise. But she looks longingly through the window at Paris, and when her Mother says that they cannot think of letting her go back to Julien, in spite of their promise, she says wanly that he who laughs last laughs best. She goes to say goodnight to her Father, who kisses her lovingly and long and takes her in his arms. She draws away unresponsively, but he calls her to him, puts her on his knee as if she were still a child, and sings a berceuse to her: 'Reste ... repose-toi ... comme jadis toute petite' (Stay here ... stay here and rest ... as once you did when you were little). There is real feeling in this music, and for a moment the Father's self-pity can be forgotten.

But Louise's distress is too poignant to be ignored for long – and that is just what her parents seem to be trying to do. Louise reminds them of their promise, and then quietly but feelingly asserts her right to be free: 'Tout être a le droit d'être libre'. The sound of a waltz she heard during her brief period of freedom – the voice of Paris itself – calls to Louise. She responds passionately and invokes the name of the city to set her free. All the efforts of her Father are not enough to stifle the feeling growing within her. At last her Father loses his temper completely, orders her from the house, and even chases her round the room, until she runs out of the door. His anger spent, the father calls pitifully for Louise. Then he shakes his fist at the city, and the curtain falls on his cry: 'O Paris'. H.

¹ The music is drawn from a composition of Charpentier's specially written for just such a ceremony in 1897. The Muse of Montmartre, chosen by popular vote, was to be publicly crowned, but owing to the appalling weather the function had to be put off until two years later.

ERNEST CHAUSSON

(born 20 January 1855, died 10 June 1899)

LE ROI ARTHUS

King Arthur

Opera in three acts, text by the composer. Première Brussels, 30 November 1903, with Paquot-d'Assy, Dalmorès, Albers, conductor Sylvain Dupuis. First performed Paris, 1916 (Act III only), conducted by Vincent d'Indy.

Guinevere, Arthur's queen.....Soprano
Arthur, King of the Britons.....Baritone

Lancelot, a knight.....Tenor
Mordred, Arthur's nephew.....Baritone
Lyonnel, Lancelot's retainer.....Tenor
Allan, an old squire.....Bass
Merlin, the wizard.....Baritone
A Labourer.....Tenor
A Knight.....Bass
A Squire.....Bass
Four Soldiers.....Two Tenors, Two Bases

Knights, Squires, Pages, Bards, Women of Guinevere's Court

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

Chausson, a man of wide culture, was captivated first by the music of Wagner, second by Celtic literature in general and by Arthurian legend in particular. His only opera was begun as early as 1885 and took most of the rest of his short working life (he was killed in a bicycling accident). The influence of Tristan is undeniable, both story and theme having much in common, but the music is very much that of a French composer, some commentators claiming it as the best of the group of works written under Wagnerian influence.

Act I. In his castle, Arthur welcomes his victorious knights, praising particularly Lancelot, to the disgust of his nephew Mordred. The latter is not only jealous of Lancelot's fame but of his clandestine love for Queen Guinevere, who has spurned the advances of Mordred.

The second scene consists of an extended love duet for Guinevere and Lancelot, over whose tryst watches a reluctant Lyonnell. Mordred surprises the lovers and is wounded by Lancelot, who leaves at Guinevere's behest. Mordred survives.

Act II. The atmosphere is peaceful as a peasant sings folk-like of the deeds of heroes. Lancelot is racked with guilt but Guinevere arrives to tell him that in spite of Mordred's accusations Arthur believes in him. She begs him to return to court, where she has publicly lied but where his testimony can still save her. He recoils from the lie, but she insists: only that will save her. Lancelot makes up his mind; he will go before the King ... and lie. Then, he will go into battle, and die. Guinevere having won one battle now urges their love, but Lancelot changes his tack and will tell no lie but escape with her.

At Arthur's court, the King is a prey to doubt. Merlin finally answers his call and prophesies nothing but doom. Their joint work is finished, the Round Table will perish, let the King ask him no more! He gets no answer to his questions about Guinevere and Lancelot, and the act ends in confusion as the old King sets off after his betrayer.

Act III. Lancelot has fled in horror at the prospect of battle with Arthur, whose right he acknowledges, and in spite of Guinevere's entreaties, he entrusts her to esquires who will take her to his ship. In despair she strangles herself with her own hair.

Lancelot has rushed unarmed into battle but is not dead as the King gazes on his body. He revives and begs Arthur to take revenge, then falls dead. Arthur mourns the loss of Guinevere and Lancelot, the two beings he held most dear, and the opera ends as he is apparently borne away to a better world.

Each act contains an extended duet for Guinevere and Lancelot, in some contrast to each other: a love duet; a duet of seduction as she persuades him to lie to the King; a duet where their power to control each other has evaporated. In spite of the apparent centrality of the love of Lancelot for Guinevere, it is Arthur who is the opera's most powerful figure, from his dignified address to his court at the outset, through the agonised consultation with Merlin to the final transfiguration.

H.

LUIGI CHERUBINI

(born early September 1760, died 15 March 1842)

MÉDÉE

Medea

Opera in three acts, text (in French) by François Benoit Hoffmann, after Euripides. Première at Théâtre Feydeau, Paris, 13 March 1797, with Scio, Gaveaux, Dessaulles. First performed in Berlin, 1800; Vienna, 1814, with Milder-

Hauptmann; London, 1865, at Her Majesty's, with Tietjens, Günz, Santley; 1870, at Covent Garden, with Tietjens. The spoken dialogue of the original was set to music by Franz Lachner in 1854 and by Arditi for the London production of 1865 (Lachner's recitatives have been used for most modern presentations). The opera was heard at la Scala in 1909 with Mazzoleni, conductor Vitale, but not subsequently revived until in 1953 at the Florence Festival Callas sang it for the first time with Tucci, Barbieri, Picchi, Petri, conductor Gui (subsequently Callas was responsible for revivals at la Scala, Venice, Rome, and in 1958 at Dallas and at Covent Garden). Revived 1958, Cassel, with Gerda Lammers; 1959, Covent Garden, with Callas, Carlyle, Cossotto, Vickers, Zaccaria; 1962, Paris Opéra with Rita Gorr; 1968, Venice, with Gencer; 1969, Buenos Aires, with Gwyneth Jones; 1971, Frankfurt, with Silja; 1971, Mantua, with Olivero; 1972, Vienna, with Rysanek. First performance in England of original Cherubini score, Durham, by the Palatine Group, 1967; 1984, Buxton Festival, with Rosalind Plowright, and 1996 by Opera North with Josephine Barstow.

Médée (Medea), *former wife of Jason*Soprano
 Jason, *leader of the Argonauts*Tenor
 Dircé (Glauce), *daughter of Créon*Soprano
 Créon, *King of Corinth*Bass
 Nérès, *servant of Médée*Mezzo-Soprano
 First MaidservantSoprano
 Second MaidservantSoprano

Two Children of Médée, Servants of Dircé, Argonauts, Priests, Soldiers, People of Corinth

Place: Corinth

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Cherubini, after study in Italy and performance there and even in England, found success in France in 1788 and remained there for effectively the rest of his life, writing operas for Paris well into the Napoleonic period. In spite of the intensely serious nature of the subject and indeed Cherubini's treatment of it, Médée with its spoken dialogue is technically an opéra-comique, and it was thus produced with great success in both Berlin and Vienna, the German-speaking stage providing the composer with some of his most lasting success.

In 1855, in response to contemporary taste, the German composer Franz Lachner turned Médée into a through-composed opera, adding extensive recitative in place of the spoken dialogue, and in this guise it continued intermittently in the repertory for more than a century. Recordings, starting with Callas in the 1950s, were by and large of the Lachner version and only relatively late in the twentieth century did the original version replace Lachner's successful but unidiomatic (because highly romanticised) edition.

Jason, rightful heir to the throne of Thessaly, at his coming of age was set the task of recovering the Golden Fleece by his uncle, the usurper, Pelias. In the Argo he sailed to Colchis, where with the help of the King's daughter Médée he accomplished his mission and ended by eloping with her. King Aeetes followed the Argo, but Médée, to delay the pursuit, had her young brother Absyrtus cut up and thrown into the sea, knowing that Aeetes would collect the pieces in order that they might be decently buried. Arrived safely in Thessaly, Médée caused the death of Pelias, but Jason eventually abandoned her, and with his two sons fled to Corinth.

Act I. The overture's format, content and style perhaps explain why Beethoven held Cherubini in such esteem – it is a piece of high seriousness and a fitting precursor of an operatic version of Greek tragedy by one of the composers who most benefited from Gluck's theories. The curtain rises on the royal court of Créon at Corinth. Dircé, Créon's daughter, is surrounded by her women, two of whom lead the others in a graceful serenade to their mistress, whose marriage to Jason is planned for the next day. Eventually their pleas seem to allay some of her forebodings and she sings an aria, praying the God of Love to help her against Médée: 'Hymen, viens dissiper' ('O Amore, vieni a me!') – a rewarding solo of considerable technical difficulty and built on an ample scale.

Créon enters with Jason and assures him of his support, even when the people, incensed against Médée, demand the lives of her children in default of her own. Jason announces that his sailors wish to offer the Golden Fleece in homage to Dircé. Dircé still fears that Médée will disrupt her happiness, but Jason in an aria does his best to reassure her: 'Eloigné pour jamais d'une épouse cruelle' ('Or che più non vedrò quella sposa crudele'). In a beautiful solo, to which Dircé, Jason and the Chorus later add their voices, Créon invokes the blessings of the Gods on the forthcoming marriage: 'Dieux et Déesses tutélaires' ('Pronube Dive, Dei custodi').

This trio is the end of tranquillity throughout the opera. An unknown woman enters and unveils herself to reveal Médée. The citizens and Argonauts retire, fearful of what may result from Médée's presence. Créon threatens her with imprisonment if the next day dawns to find her still in Corinth, and then all depart, leaving her face to face with Jason.

Médée is confident that the new and the old love struggle in his breast for supremacy: he can never forget his love for her nor what she has done for him. In a great aria, 'Vous voyez de vos fils la mère infortunée' ('Dei tuoi figli la madre tu vedi'), she pleads her love for him – she, who has never before abased herself in front of anyone, begs for his pity and his love. Her repeated cries of 'Ingrat!' ('Crudel!') would melt the heart of a stronger man than Jason, and it is quite clear from the succeeding duet that his resistance will not stand up unaided against Médée's wiles. Together they curse the fatal Golden Fleece, and he bids her go. She rounds on him: 'Si tel est son malheur ton épouse en fuyant te percera le coeur! Ingrat!' ('Medea col suo fuggir il cor strapperà! Crudel!')' The whole scene between Médée and Jason – her aria and the extended duet – is a splendid example of Gluckian music drama.

Act II. The scene represents Créon's palace on one side of the stage, the Temple of Hera on the other, and the drama begins straight away in the orchestra. Médée inveighs against an injustice that would teach her children to hate their mother. Nérís, her confidante, tells her that the mob is gathering and demands her blood, but Médée does not hesitate. She will stay. At that moment, Créon comes out, urging her to fly the country – if she remain, even he will not be able to save her. In a scene of some power Médée pleads her cause with Créon, but he is adamant, supported by his warriors. Suddenly Médée seems to realise that her case is hopeless; she begs for one more day and Créon has not the heart to refuse her. As Créon and his retinue retire to the palace, Médée collapses on the steps. Nérís dare not interrupt her brooding silence; she will weep with her mistress and be faithful until death. It is a beautiful, mournful aria ('Ah, nos peines': 'Solo un pianto') that Nérís sings with bassoon obbligato, the only moment of repose that the drama allows between the entrance of Médée and the final catastrophe.

Médée is implacable – Créon has granted her a day's grace, she will know how to use it! Her rival must die. More – is Jason not a father? As her thoughts begin to appal even her, Jason enters. Médée asks to see her children and rejoices at his evident love for them. In the course of their duet, Médée pretends that her heart will break if she never sees them again and Jason agrees to let them stay with her until her departure from Corinth.

Médée orders Nérís to bring her children to her, moreover to fetch as a wedding-present for Dircé the diadem and mantle once blessed by Phoebus Apollo. Nérís is astonished at such generosity but leaves to fulfil her mistress's command as the wedding music is heard. Créon, Jason, Dircé, priests, warriors and citizens go in procession to the Temple of Hera, while Médée curses the wedding hymns to which she is listening. As the procession emerges from the temple, Médée hurls herself at the altar, seizes a burning brand and runs with it out of sight.

Act III. A hill, surmounted by a temple, on one side of which can be seen Créon's palace. It is night and there is thunder. A short orchestral prelude of considerable power leads to the appearance of Médée before the temple. For the first time we see the sorceress in her true colours as she invokes the Infernal Gods to aid her purpose, the more so as she feels her resolve weaken at the sight of the children brought to her by Nérís. She cannot bring herself to plunge a dagger into their defenceless breasts, and laments the power they still have over her: 'Du trouble affreux' ('Del fiero duol'), but ends the aria with a renewed threat of vengeance on Jason.

Nérís tells of Dircé's grateful reception of Médée's gift, and Médée gloats over the fate that will be hers once she places the poisoned jewels on her forehead. Nérís begs her to be content with this revenge and spare her children. At her mistress's command she takes them into the temple, and Médée is a prey to indecision; she must have a full revenge, but they are her children as well as Jason's. At last all pity is purged from her heart. The cry can be heard from those in the temple who are witnesses to Dircé's horrible death, and Médée sets off like a wild beast to complete her vengeance. Jason appears with the crowd, Nérís reveals Médée's purpose, but before he can reach the entrance of the temple, Médée emerges, flanked by the three Furies and brandishing in her hand the knife with which she has killed the children. As Jason, Nérís and the crowd scatter, the temple bursts into flames. It is Médée's ultimate revenge.

Médée is a serious work of art and contains a splendid title role. Teresa Tietjens made it her most famous impersonation in the 1870s and '80s, and it is one of the several operas of the classical epoch revived in the middle of the twentieth century for Maria Callas. Her dramatic intensity and magnificently constructive musical gifts were peculiarly well suited to this role, and she, a Greek, was assisted in the London revival of 1959 by a Greek producer, Alexis Minotis, a Greek designer, John Tsarouchis, and a Greek bass, Nicola Zaccaria.

FRANCESCO CILEA

(born 26 July 1866, died 20 November 1950)

ADRIANA LECOUVREUR

Opera in four acts, text by Colautti, from the play by Scribe and Legouv . Premi re at Teatro Lirico, Milan, 26 November 1902, with Pandolfini, Ghibauda, Caruso, de Luca, conductor Campanini. First performed Covent Garden, 1904, with Giachetti, Anselmi, Sammarco, conductor Campanini; Metropolitan, New York, 1907, with Cavalieri, Caruso, Scotti, conductor Ferrari. Revived la Scala, Milan, 1932, with Cobelli, Pederzini, Pertile, Ghirardini, conductor Ghione; 1942, with Cobelli; Metropolitan, New York, 1963, with Tebaldi, Corelli; Edinburgh Festival, 1963 (by San Carlo Opera, Naples), with Magda Olivero, Oncina, Bruscantini. Magda Olivero has been one of the most famous of recent exponents of the title role.

Maurizio, Count of Saxony.....Tenor
 Prince de Bouillon.....Bass
 The Abb  de Chazeuil.....Tenor Michonnet, stage director of the
Com die-Fran aise Baritone

Members of the company

Quinault.....Bass
 Poisson.....Tenor
 Mlle Jouvenot.....Soprano
 Mlle Dangeville.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Major-Domo.....Tenor
 Adriana Lecouvreur.....Soprano
 Princesse de Bouillon.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Ladies, Gentlemen, Servants

Place: Paris

Time: 1730

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Cilea wrote two successful operas, L'Arlesiana and Adriana Lecouvreur, before he was forty, but for the remainder of his long life his success was limited, apart from his appointment as Director of the Naples Conservatory where he had been a student.

Act I. The foyer of the Com die-Fran aise. Actors and actresses going on to the stage demand their swords, hats, coats from Michonnet, who complains that everyone expects him to do everything at once. The Prince de Bouillon comes in with his crony the Abb  and greets the company. The Prince is the 'protector' of the actress Duclos, Adriana's rival, but he flatters Adriana as she tries over her speech. She says she is only the handmaid of the arts: 'Io son l'umile ancella'. It is Cilea's finest inspiration, and the tune is heard frequently throughout the opera as a 'motto'.

Michonnet is her best friend, she tells them all, and the faithful Michonnet bursts into tears of emotion; when all have left he admits the reason – he has been in love with Adriana since she joined the company. Dare he tell her now? He starts to, but she tells him she is in love with an unknown officer, Maurizio, attached to the Count of Saxony. Michonnet leaves her alone, and in a moment her as yet unknown lover is at her side. He addresses her in a passionate arioso: 'La dolcissima effigie'. Adriana says she will play only for him tonight, giving him before she leaves violets for his buttonhole.

Now begins the comedy of the letters. The Abb  has found a billet-doux which he and the Prince decide is from Duclos making an assignation for that very night with the Count of Saxony at the Prince's villa outside Paris. He will invite the company to surprise them! Meanwhile, Michonnet has mislaid a property letter which, when found, is used by the Count to warn Adriana that he cannot sup with her that night as he had intended – Maurizio is of course the Count himself.

Act II. The Prince and the Abb  were mistaken; the letter they found was not from Duclos to the Count but from the Prince's wife, who now reflects agitatedly on the torments of love: 'Acerba volutt '. Maurizio arrives and the Princess says she has interceded for him with the Queen. She notices the violets and asks whether they had nothing to do with his lateness; he says it was for her he brought them ('L'anima ho stanca').

A carriage is heard outside; it is her husband, exclaims the Princess – she must hide. The Prince de Bouillon, accompanied by the Abb , comes in to find Maurizio alone. They taunt him with being caught and are astonished when he threatens a duel. Why make so much fuss? The Prince is tired of Duclos; why should not the Count of Saxony take her on? Maurizio begins to understand when, a moment later, Adriana is let in and introduced to him. This time, the astonishment is hers: the man she had thought a retainer turns out to be the Count of Saxony himself. The Prince and the Abb  don't like being kept waiting for supper and Adriana and Maurizio are alone.

In a short duet they renew their passionate vows. Michonnet comes in asking that he may speak to Duclos, as an important decision has to be made over a new role before morning. She is here, says the Abbé; Maurizio tries to silence him, but Michonnet takes the decision into his own hands and goes firmly into the room which Maurizio has tried to bar. Maurizio swears to Adriana that Duclos is not there; his appointment had to do with his political position, not with love. She believes him, and Michonnet comes out saying it was not Duclos. The Abbé wants to discover the lady's identity and this time Adriana tells Michonnet she means to keep her word to Maurizio and help the unknown lady.

Adriana knocks at the door and tells whoever is inside that, with the aid of the key of the garden, she can save her. The Princess plies her with questions and eventually admits that she loves Maurizio. Adriana proudly, to the tune of her recent duet with him, claims his love as her own. The act ends as the Princess escapes before the Prince and his followers can catch her.

Act III. A party is in preparation at the house of the Prince de Bouillon. The Princess wonders to herself where she has heard the voice of her rival. The guests come in, amongst them Adriana, whom the Princess naturally recognises immediately, and who sings the tune originally heard to the words of 'To son l'umile ancella'. The Princess mutters something about Maurizio being wounded in a duel, and Adriana shows obvious signs of emotion. Maurizio comes in and is persuaded to talk about his battle experiences. A ballet entertainment has been arranged, and during its course the conversation continues, developing in the end into a battle of wits between the Princess and Adriana, which the latter wins as she recites the confession of adultery from Racine's Phèdre and aims the speech at the Princess.

Act IV. The scene is as in Act I. Michonnet waits for Adriana who seems in a mood bordering on suicide. Various actors and actresses congratulate her on her birthday and presently a casket is brought in. Adriana opens it and sees in it the violets she had given Maurizio the previous evening, by now old and mouldy. She sings sadly to the violets, in whose shrivelled appearance she sees the dying of Maurizio's love for her: 'Poveri fiori'. Michonnet comforts her and smiles when he hears Maurizio outside. Adriana cannot resist Maurizio's protestation of innocence, least of all when he proposes marriage to her and tells her in the same breath that all his claims have been met and he is once more in possession of his rightful titles. She tries to impress him by saying that the stage is the only throne she can ever mount, but his love is too much for her and she and Maurizio rest happily in each other's arms.

Suddenly, she seems about to faint and thinks it had something to do with the flowers that she gave Maurizio and which he sent back to her, but he denies ever having done such a thing. Adriana is convulsed with pain, and for a moment does not recognise him. Maurizio sends for help; Michonnet thinks the flowers were poisoned and suggests a rival has done it. After a further convulsion, Adriana dies. The Princess's revenge is complete.

Some of the figures in the opera were real people, Adrienne Lecouvreur a star at the Comédie-Française. But the plot is fiction and cuts made during rehearsal often make it hard to follow. H.

DOMENICO CIMAROSA

(born 17 December 1749, died 11 January 1801)

IL MATRIMONIO SEGRETO

The Secret Marriage

Opera buffa in two acts, text by Giovanni Bertati after Colman's The Clandestine Marriage. First performed at the Burgtheater, Vienna, 7 February 1792; la Scala, Milan, 1793; London, 1794; New York, 1834; Her Majesty's, 1842. Revivals include Metropolitan, 1937; Rome, 1948, with Alda Noni and Cesare Valletti; la Scala, Milan, 1949, with Alda Noni, Hilde Gueden, Fedora Barbieri, Tito Schipa, Boris Christoff, and Sesto Bruscantini; Fortune Theatre, London, 1949; Edinburgh Festival, by Piccola Scala, 1957, with Sciutti, Ratti, Alva, conductor Sanzogno; Glyndebourne, 1965; Buxton Festival, 1994, and Opera North, 1995, in Jonathan Miller's production.

Geronimo.....Buffo Bass
 Elisetta, his daughter.....Soprano
 Carolina, another daughter.....Soprano
 Fidalma, Geronimo's sister.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Count Robinson, an English milord.....Bass
 Paolino.....Tenor

Place: Bologna

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

Cimarosa's most famous opera has the distinction of being reputedly the only work ever encored in toto on the occasion of its first performance. History has it that the Emperor Leopold II, for whom Mozart wrote La Clemenza di Tito a few months earlier, so enjoyed the work that he invited all the participants to supper, after which the performance was repeated!

The story is concerned with events at the house of one Geronimo, a wealthy citizen of Bologna, whose sister Fidalma is installed as mistress of his house, and who has two daughters, Elisetta and Carolina.

Act I. We meet Carolina and Paolino, the latter a junior business associate of Geronimo's and secretly married to Carolina. In their first duet she urges him to hide the secret of their marriage no longer but to reveal it to everyone. There is another duet in lighter vein as Carolina says goodbye to her husband. Geronimo appears, inclined to deafness and definitely afflicted by the golden malady of the nouveau riche. He learns from Paolino that the latter's friend, the English Count Robinson, is on his way to Bologna with the firm intention of arranging a match with Elisetta, Geronimo's other daughter. Nothing will please him but to recount the news with all its import to his family, which he does in a buffo aria. The sisters immediately find cause to quarrel, much to Fidalma's annoyance; a trio brings the quarrel to a musical climax.

Fidalma admits to Elisetta that she herself is in love – she underlines it in a song – but she will not admit with whom, though she whispers in an aside to the audience that it is Paolino.

Geronimo cannot wait for the Count's arrival. The English nobleman duly appears and proceeds to address everyone with a maximum of words and a minimum of content – he hates a man who cannot be brief, he says. The situation develops until it becomes, musically speaking, a sextet, and the Count mistakes both the other ladies in turn for the Elisetta who is his bride-to-be. In conversation with Paolino shortly afterwards he reveals that the prospect of marriage with Elisetta fills him with consternation, while he looks with nothing but favour on union with Carolina – a fact which causes Paolino not a little concern. The Count proposes to Carolina, but is told as politely as possible that she is not disposed to welcome his proposal; she even lists in her aria the faults which she says she possesses.

Preparations are being made for the banquet which is to be given in the Count's honour when that worthy himself enters, protesting his love to Carolina. Elisetta interrupts and upbraids them for their conduct, but Fidalma manages to silence the quarrel which ensues by warning them that Geronimo approaches. He does his best to discover what is the cause of all the fuss, but his deafness, Paolino's unwillingness to let him find out that the Count wishes to marry Carolina, Fidalma's preoccupation with avoiding a family quarrel, and the fact that everyone talks at once, prevent him from carrying out his intention.

Act II. Geronimo is still trying to find out what it is all about, and he is found alone with the Count. After some misunderstanding, he gathers that his prospective son-in-law has not taken kindly to his bride-to-be. After voicing their mutual dissatisfaction, the two parties come to an agreement when the Count suggests that he relinquish half the dowry he has been promised if Geronimo will allow him to marry the younger of his two daughters. This arrangement suits Geronimo admirably, and their duet ends in complete accord.

Paolino is told of the new arrangement, and in his desperation is just going to throw himself on Fidalma's mercy, when she, encouraged by what she takes to be glances and sighs directed at her, says that she will accept his proposal and marry him! Paolino can stand the strain no longer and faints away. It is while Fidalma is trying to revive him that Carolina comes on the scene. Fidalma goes to fetch some smelling salts, and the wretched Paolino tries to explain the situation to Carolina, but it is not until the trio is over and he is able to embark on an aria that he manages to convince her that his protestations of love are not mere deceit.

The Count now tries, by depicting himself as an ogre and a monster of iniquity, to persuade Elisetta to break off the marriage. He fails in his object, and Elisetta and Fidalma (who has revealed that Carolina, though the object of the Count's affections, is herself in love with Paolino) plot to rid themselves of their rival and send her to a convent. Geronimo agrees, and tells her himself of his decision. Poor Carolina is broken-hearted, and her music takes on a moving character as she thinks of the future without her husband. The Count offers his help in her distress, and she is just about to tell him the whole truth when her sister, her aunt, and her father jump out on them declaring that there can be no further doubt since they have caught them in the act. Geronimo sends Paolino off at once with a letter to the Mother Superior of the convent.

The finale begins. The Count is out of his room, although it is night, and muses on the possibility of helping Carolina, when he is surprised by the watchful Elisetta; they say goodnight to each other and depart, to be succeeded by Paolino and Carolina planning an elopement. Disturbed by a noise, they quickly hide in Carolina's room, and in a moment the suspicious Elisetta is on the scene. She listens at the door, hears whispers, and rouses the house to come and catch the Count in her sister's room. Everyone rushes to the spot and together they demand that the Count shall come forth and reveal her perfidy. He does – but from his own room, where he has been asleep until woken up by the din. A moment later, Carolina and Paolino come out of their room and admit that they were married two months ago. Eventually, all is forgiven, the Count agrees to marry Elisetta, and happiness reigns supreme.

Cimarosa's main disadvantage vis-à-vis a modern audience is that his music reminds them, now of Mozart, now of Rossini, and that in each case they are inclined to compare him unfavourably with the greater and more familiar master. But there is a quantity of excellent music in this opera; the two finales are models of their kind, as are the arias for Carolina and Paolino, and the comedy duet between Geronimo and the Count.

H.

PETER CORNELIUS

(born 24 December 1824, died 26 October 1874)

DER BARBIER VON BAGDAD

The Barber of Baghdad

Opera in two acts, text, based on a story from the Arabian Nights, by the composer. First performed at Weimar, conducted by Liszt, on 15 December 1858. As a result of the feud between Liszt, Weimar's head of music, and Dingelstedt, the manager of the theatre, the first night was made the occasion of a showdown on the part of their rival adherents, and the opera was a fiasco; Liszt resigned his position, and the opera was not given again during the composer's lifetime. Revived Hanover, 1877, and again a failure. Revised and re-orchestrated by Felix Mottl, produced at Karlsruhe, 1885, and in many other German theatres. Metropolitan, New York, 1890, conducted by Damrosch; Savoy Theatre, London, 1891, by students of the Royal College of Music; Covent Garden, 1906, conducted by Richter. Revived Metropolitan, 1925, with Rethberg, Laubenthal, and Bender; London Opera Club, 1949; Vienna Volksoper, 1949, with Jurinac, Dermota and Edelmann; Edinburgh Festival, 1956, by Hamburg Opera.

The CaliphBaritone

Baba Mustapha, *a Cadi*Tenor
Margiana, *his daughter*Soprano
Bostana, *a servant of the Cadi*Mezzo-Soprano
NureddinTenor
Abul Hassan Ali Ebn Bekar, *a barber*Bass
Nureddin's Servants, Friends of the Cadi, the Caliph's Entourage

Place: Baghdad

Running Time: 2 hours 5 minutes

When he was twenty-five, Cornelius wrote that he was clear in his mind that his natural bent was towards operatic comedy. Considering the success which he achieved in his one attempt at this genre (a posthumous success unfortunately), it seems a pity that his two other operas should have been on serious subjects; neither has had anything like the number of performances Der Barbier has collected since the composer's death.

Originally Cornelius planned Der Barbier in one act, with an extended final scene occupying something like a third of the whole work. Later, he decided on two acts of equal length. After the unsuccessful première, Liszt persuaded the composer to re-write his overture, and instead of the comedy prelude to substitute something based on the themes of the opera itself. Cornelius died before he could orchestrate the new overture, and this was done after his death by Liszt. For the revivals they conducted, both Mottl and Levi made a number of changes in the orchestration, and it was not until 1904 that the opera was given in the form (and orchestral dress) Cornelius had intended.

The D major overture – that is to say the one written at Liszt's suggestion – is based on references to the Barber's theme, his patter song, Nureddin's appeal to the absent Margiana, the assignation duet between Nureddin and Bostana, and the chorus of Nureddin's servants.

Act I. Nureddin is lying on a couch at his house, nursing his apparently hopeless love for Margiana. He and his servants, scorning the more scientific forms of diagnosis, fear that his life is in danger. The servants' chorus and Nureddin's love song are delightfully sentimental, and he repeats the name Margiana in the apparent hope that it will ameliorate his sufferings. Left alone, Nureddin again conjures up a vision of his beloved, 'Vor deinem Fenster die Blumen versengte der Sonne Strahl', a song of charmingly romantic character.

To assuage his sufferings comes Bostana, an aged relation of Margiana's father, the Cadi. She tells him that Margiana will receive him that very day when her father goes to the mosque at noon. Before she goes, she prescribes a bath and a shave for him. With a last 'Don't forget the barber' (she has recommended her own favourite to him), she leaves the lover to contemplate his prospective bliss in an ecstatic allegro, 'Ach, das Leid hab' ich getragen, wie ertrag' ich nun mein Glück?'

He is too occupied to notice the entrance of the barber, Abul Hassan Ali Ebn Bekar, carrying with him his towel, his basin, a looking-glass and other apparatus of his calling, and, in addition, an astro-labe, with which he is accustomed to foretell his clients' futures. Nureddin is anxious to be shaved straight away, but he has to do with the most garrulous man in Baghdad, and the barber tells him at length and in a series of ingenious multiple rhymes exactly how fortunate it is that Nureddin should have chosen him.

Nureddin tries to make him get on with the shaving, but Abul must first cast his horoscope. This he does to the accompaniment of Nureddin's rapidly rising impatience, and having finished, once again puts forward his own qualifications in a brilliant patter song. Nureddin, not without justification by now, tells him he is nothing but a chatterbox. This fills the barber with righteous indignation; his brothers it is true were talkative, but he, the youngest of the family, has always been known for his virtue and his taciturnity. Things seem to be out of hand, and Nureddin yells for his servants to come and deliver him from this plague of a barber. Their attempts are successful up to a point, but, just as they get him to the door, the barber flourishes his razor and succeeds in turning them out.

Nureddin resorts to tact, and the barber is soon ready to begin operations, ready that is to say until his client lets fall the word 'Margiana' from his lips. This starts a flood of reminiscence; the barber himself was once in love with a Margiana – and this is the song he used to sing to her. He is delighted that Nureddin is in love, but horrified to hear that his Margiana is the daughter of Cadi Baba Mustapha, a villain, he says, who shaves himself.

Nureddin advises him to go back to his doubtless innumerable other customers, but the barber soliloquises in his absence on the disastrous effect women can have on a man's life: 'So schwärmet Jugend'. What was the ruin of all his six brothers? Love – and the catalogue of their respective misfortunes is punctuated by references to the world 'Lieben'. Cornelius's ingenuity in varying this repetition is no less to be admired than the old man's ability to find a topic to suit every occasion and, having found it, to dilate upon it endlessly.

Nureddin returns, and is horrified to find the barber still there and fully intending to accompany him to Margiana's house. He calls his servants again, and instructs them to minister to the barber, who, he tells them, is very ill; let them put him to bed and keep him there, sparing no remedy whatsoever. The servants are delighted at the prospect of getting their own back. The last we hear of them is their recital of the barber's names in five-part harmony.

Act II. The Intermezzo is based on the figure associated with the Muezzin's call to prayer. The melody is varied throughout and the effect is a delightful anticipation of the moment when Nureddin meets his Margiana for the first time. We are in the Cadi's house. Margiana expresses her delight at the prospect of Nureddin's arrival: 'Er kommt, er kommt, o Wonne meiner Brust!' Bostana rushes in and expresses the same sentiment in an identical melody, only to be joined some moments later by the Cadi, whose sentiments are made known in exactly similar terms, but of course for very different reasons. The women rejoice that Nureddin is coming, the Cadi is excited at the thought of his rich friend Selim's arrival from Damascus, bringing with him splendid presents and a request for the hand of Margiana in marriage. The trio is one of the most beautiful numbers in the score. A chest arrives from Damascus full of the expected treasures, and Margiana is dutifully pleased that her father is happy. Into the general rejoicings comes the sound of the Muezzin, sung off-stage by a bass and two tenors; the chant is taken up by the three characters on-stage, and the Cadi goes off to the mosque.

In a moment Nureddin is in the room, and he launches into a declaration of his love, which is taken up by Margiana: 'O holdes Bild in Engelschöne'. The duet has a cool, almost innocent feel about it, as is suitable for a first, almost formal declaration of love. The idyllic scene is interrupted by the sound of the Barber's voice from down below. He assures Nureddin that he is safe with so faithful a watchdog, and starts to sing his own love song. To it are added the howls of a slave who has broken the Cadi's favourite vase and is being punished out of hand by his master on his return from the mosque.

The situation takes a turn for the worse when Abul, hearing the screams of the slave, construes them as meaning the Cadi is murdering Nureddin, and yells for help. The sound of a crowd shouting hostile remarks about the Cadi can be heard below, as Nureddin is bundled into the treasure chest, which is quickly emptied. When Abul bursts into the room, bringing with him some of Nureddin's servants, Bostana tries to tell him that the unlucky lover has been hidden in the chest, but he takes it into his head that the box contains nothing but his friend's corpse. The servants are on the point of carrying out the chest when the Cadi returns and thinks they are stealing his treasure. The ensuing alliterative abuse was thought by Ernest Newman to have been intended as a parody of Wagner's alliterative methods in The Ring: Cornelius was Liszt's secretary and must certainly have seen the printed copy of the libretto which Liszt had as early as 1853.

The Cadi, the barber, the Cadi's friends and retainers, Nureddin's servants, women already in mourning for him, and a mixed crowd of inhabitants of Baghdad join in an ensemble of accusation and counter-accusation, during which the chest is turned upside down. It is only brought to an end by the arrival of the Caliph, suitably attended by magnificently uniformed soldiers. The Cadi explains that Abul is a thief who is stealing his daughter's treasure. Abul denies that he is a thief but accuses the Cadi of having murdered his friend and hidden the body in the chest. Margiana and Bostana return, and the Caliph tells Margiana to open the chest and show him what her father persists in describing as her treasure.

Nobody's consternation could be more genuine than the Cadi's when the senseless body of Nureddin is disclosed in the chest. 'He! Mustapha!' he exclaims, and the cry is taken up by the Caliph and Abul in an ensemble, which is later joined by Margiana and Bostana, who lament the untimely death of the young man. Abul has been bending over the 'dead' body and he brings the lamentation to an end by announcing that Nureddin is not dead after all, but only unconscious. The Caliph suggests that this is the moment when the barber's miraculous healing powers can suitably be brought into use. Abul starts off with a line from his love song to Margiana but with no result; he tweaks Nureddin's nose and ears and tries smelling salts on him. But the simultaneous application to his nose of the rose Margiana has given him, and to his ears of the second line of the love song, works the trick: Nureddin opens his eyes and gets up.

The Cadi joins the lovers' hands but the Caliph tells his soldiers to arrest the barber – merely, he assures him, in order that he may benefit from his advice and his story-telling which have been denied him so long. Abul leads the assembly in a song of praise to the Caliph, 'Heil diesem Hause', and everyone repeats the refrain, 'Salamaleikum'. H.

D

LUIGI DALLAPICCOLA

(born 3 February 1904, died 19 February 1975)

IL PRIGIONIERO

The Prisoner

Opera in a prologue and one act, text by the composer from La Torture par l'espérance by Villiers de l'Isle-Adam and La Légende d'Ulenspiegel et de Lamme Goedzak by Charles de Coster. Première, 1949, by Radio Italiana, Turin, in concert with Magda Laszlo, Emilio Renzi, Scipione Colombo, conductor Hermann Scherchen. First staged at Teatro Comunale, Florence, 20 May 1950, with Mario Binci replacing Renzi. First performed Essen, 1954; London (in concert), 1954, with Laszlo, Krebs, Willy Heyer, conductor Scherchen, and on stage in English, Sadler's Wells (by New Opera Company), 1959, with Rosina Raisbeck, Alexander Young, John Cameron, conductor Leon Lovett; Teatro Colon, Buenos Aires, 1954; City Center, New York, 1960, with Anne McKnight, Richard Cassilly, Norman Treigle, conductor Stokowski; la Scala, Milan, 1962, with Laszlo, Aldo Bertocci, Eberhard Wächter, conductor Sanzogno, producer Rennert. The publisher records that in the first dozen years after its première, there were no fewer than 186 performances of this modern opera on radio, concert platform and stage.

The MotherDramatic Soprano
The PrisonerBaritone
The JailerTenor
The Grand InquisitorTenor
Two PriestsTenor and Baritone
A 'Fra Redemptor' (or Torturer)Silent

Place: Saragossa

Time: Second Half of the Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 50 minutes

In 1955, Roman Vlad, in one¹ of an illuminating series of commentaries on Dallapiccola's music, described the composer's activity to date as having been in three periods: the first, 1930–36, predominantly diatonic; the second, lasting in to the war years, 'characterised ... by the constantly increasing number of chromatic threads which Dallapiccola wove into the diatonic fabric of his works. They tended to resemble actual twelve-note rows and ultimately absorbed the diatonic elements.' In the third phase, 'he began to adopt a systematic row-technique', and Vlad describes this as a period 'in which the composer achieves mastery of his own language', an arrival in effect at artistic maturity. Il Prigioniero belongs to this period of Dallapiccola's activity, and is the composer's second stage work, its predecessor the successful one-act opera Volo di Notte (1937–39, based on Saint-Exupéry's novel of night-flying, Vol de Nuit), its successors the 'sacra rappresentazione', Job (1950), and the ambitious Ulisse.

The opera was written between 1944 and 1947 and orchestrated in spring 1948. At the Maggio Musicale in 1950, the composer, at the last of many solo curtain calls, bowed ironically to a solitary detractor in the gallery (so enthusiastic as to have brought a whistle with him), as if in sympathy with Shaw's famous curtain speech in a comparable situation: 'You and I may know there's nothing in it, but who are we against so many?'

Dallapiccola substituted the anonymous Prisoner for the named hero of Villiers de l'Isle-Adam's story and added the figure of the Mother.

Prologue. The Mother is waiting to visit her son in prison, and sings in a *Ballata*² of the recurring dreams which haunt her sleep and in which she sees at the end of a dark cavern a figure, which terrifies her as it approaches and can be recognised as King Philip II until it changes imperceptibly into the image of Death. 'The Prologue is based', says Vlad, 'on the dodeca- phonic combination set out in the impetuous dramatic statement with which the opera opens', Ex. 1:

¹ This and other quotations by Roman Vlad are from The Score.

² This and similar descriptions are quoted from The Score.

Con impeto (♩=120)

Strings
W.W.

Trpts.
Trmbs. (sord.)

As the Mother's voice rises to a hysterical B flat, the off-stage chorus cuts her short with 'Fiat misericordia tua, Domine, super nos' (Let thy mercy prevail, O Lord) in the first Intermezzo Corale.

Act I. The curtain rises on a dark cell within the Inquisitor's Prison in Saragossa, where the Prisoner is in process of telling his Mother of the torture he has suffered and of how the Jailer, addressing him finally as 'Fratello' (Brother), Ex. 2, has led him back to faith

(Ex. 2) | molto esitando | riprendendo

(cantato) ppp suoave

'Fra - tel-lo,' Dol - cis-si-ma pa - ro-la, 8va pp (armonioso)

ppp

(Ex. 3)

KA. sempre pp
come di lontano

Molto lento, ma non trascinto (♩=44 48)

Si - gno - - re, a -

-iu - ta - mi a cam-mi - na - re, and hope and even to want to pray as in childhood (Ex.3). This is one of the three fundamental rows on which the whole opera is based.

Scene ii. The conversation is interrupted by the Jailer who gently encourages the Prisoner to new hope with the news that Flanders is in revolt and the great bell Roelandt, symbol of liberty, about to ring out again. In this section of the opera appear first the two other fundamental rows which Dallapiccola has described as 'rows of hope and liberty'. The Jailer's description of events takes place in an Aria in tre strofe, and he leaves the Prisoner with the words 'There is one who watches over you ... Have faith, brother. Sleep now ... and hope.' The prisoner repeats the words as if he cannot believe them, then notices that the Jailer has left the cell door slightly ajar and rushes out.

Scene iii, following a short orchestral interlude, shows the successive stages of the Prisoner's slow and agonised attempt to make his way through the underground passages of the prison to freedom. The path of the Prisoner's 'escape' is complicated by the sight of a torturer, who does not see him, the passage of a couple of monks too engrossed in theological discussion to notice him, and finally by his perception of a draught of fresh air which encourages him to think he is nearing safety. He prays 'Signore, aiutami a salire!', and a moment later opens the door to hear as he thinks the great bell Roelandt.

A second Intermezzo Corale, sung as before by off-stage chorus, provides a climax, and indeed in the score the composer instructs that its 'sonority ... must be formidable; every spectator must feel literally swept away and drowned in the immensity of the sound. Mechanical means (loudspeakers etc.) should unhesitatingly be used if necessary to obtain this effect.'

Scene iv. The Prisoner is in a spring garden, under a starry sky. 'Alleluiah!' he sings at the prospect of freedom and moves towards a great cedar which dominates the foreground. In a kind of ecstasy, he spreads his arms towards the tree in a gesture of love towards all humanity – only for the choral background to his exuberant cries to shut off abruptly and to be succeeded by a soft 'Fratello' this time from the lips of the Grand Inquisitor, whose arms open as if part of the tree to embrace his captive: 'Why do you want to leave us now, on the very eve of your salvation?' As if to underline the thoughts of both protagonists, a brighter light is seen in the background, and the Prisoner comes to see that his ultimate fate is to gain salvation at the stake, just as certainly as he knows that the ultimate torture was hope. A small chorus intones a quotation from the Canti di Prigionia, almost muffling the last whispered 'La libertà?' (Freedom?) of the Prisoner.

ULISSE

Opera in two acts, text by the composer. Première (in German) in Berlin, 29 September 1968, by Deutsche Oper, with Erik Saeden, conductor Lorin Maazel. First performed at la Scala, 1971.

| | |
|--|--------------------|
| Ulisse (Ulysses), King of Ithaca | Baritone |
| Calypso | Soprano |
| Penelope, Ulisse's wife | Soprano |
| Nausicaa, daughter of King Alcinoos | Soprano |
| Two Maids | Contralto, Soprano |
| King Alcinoos (Alcinous) | Bass |
| Demodoco, a bard at Alcinoos's court | Tenor |
| Tiresia (Tiresias), a seer | Tenor |
| Circe, a siren | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Melanto, a girl in Penelope's entourage | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Anticlea, Ulisse's mother | Soprano |
| Penelope's suitors | |
| Antinoos (Antinous) | Baritone |
| Pisandro (Pisander) | Baritone |
| Eurimaco (Eurymachus)..... | Tenor |
| Eumeo (Eumaeus), a shepherd | Tenor |
| Telemaco (Telemachus), son of Ulisse and Penelope | Counter-Tenor |
| Sailors, Lotus-Eaters, Courtiers | |

Place: The Mediterranean

Time: Thirteenth Century B.C.

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

If Dallapiccola stands in the mid-twentieth century in relation to Italian music as Busoni did in the first quarter of the century, then Ulisse is his Doktor Faust, the culmination of a life's work, even though it was finished some seven years before he died. At the time of the première in 1968, he declared that he had been caught by the story of the Iliad since boyhood, that interest had been reawakened in 1938 by the prospect (unfulfilled) of a ballet on the subject, by work on Monteverdi's Il Ritorno d'Ulisse in 1941, and by a life-long admiration for Dante's interpretation of the legend. As with all his dramatic works, he said, he was intrigued by the theme of man's struggle against a superior force.

Prologue, scene i. Calypso laments Ulisse's abandonment of her. Poseidon, an invisible but potent influence, is evoked in the orchestral interlude.

Scene ii. Nausicaa. Girls play. Nausicaa in high-lying, lyrical music dreams of a man from afar who will become her husband. She joins in the game and flushes out Ulisse who is struck by her beauty.

Act I, scene iii. In King Alcinoos's palace, Demodoco recites the deeds of the Greek heroes of the Trojan War. The reference to himself prompts Ulisse to take up the narrative in flashback.

Scene iv. Ulisse starts his story as his ship reaches the Island of the Lotus-Eaters; some of his companions succumb to temptation and stay.

Scene v. After a year in her thrall, Ulisse finds strength to leave Circe, who takes revenge by assuring him his adventures are reflections of his own inner turmoil.

Scene vi. In search of clues to his destiny, Ulisse visits Hades, where he meets his mother, Anticlea, who tells him she died of despair at his absence; and Tiresia, who prophesies that he will return home but will later continue his wanderings.

Scene vii. At Alcinoos's court, the King promises to take Ulisse to Ithaca. Nausicaa is left disconsolate.

Act II, scene viii. Penelope's suitors plan to kill Telemaco, her son, returned to Ithaca after a fruitless search for his father. Melanto, a frivolous girl attracted to Antinoos, will report on events. Ulisse disguised as a beggar is welcomed by Eumeo, who has warned Telemaco. When Telemaco appears, Ulisse demands the names of the plotters, amazing Telemaco and Eumeo with his vehemence.

Scene ix. Ulisse arrives home and is sad his son failed to recognise him. The sound of Penelope singing indoors reminds him of Calypso, Nausicaa and his mother. Melanto remembers the look in the beggar's eyes, but is comforted by Antinoos. Ulisse decides it is time to act.

Scene x. In the banquet hall, Antinoos gives Melanto Ulisse's bow, and asks her to dance. Telemaco enters to general consternation. Ulisse reveals his identity, takes the bow, orders the hanging of Melanto, shoots the suitors one by one, and is reunited with Penelope.

Scene xi. Tiresia was right; Ulisse finds no peace at home and is left on the open sea, a prey to doubts. H.

ALEKSANDR DARGOMIZHISKY

(born 14 February 1813, died 17 January 1869)

THE STONE GUEST

Kamennyi Gost'

Opera in three acts, text by Aleksandr Pushkin. Première at Mariinsky Theatre, St Petersburg, 20 February 1872, with F.P. Kommissarzhevsky as Don Juan. U.S. première, 1986; U.K. by English National Opera, 1987, with Graham Clark as Don Juan.

Don JuanTenor
Leporello.....Baritone
Donna Anna.....Soprano
LauraMezzo-Soprano
Don Carlos.....Baritone
Monk.....Bass
The StatueBaritone
GuestsTenor, Baritone, Bass

Running Time: 1 hour 20 minutes

Dargomizhsky was encouraged in his studies by Glinka, but early failure in Russia as a composer induced him, like Glinka before him, to go abroad, in his case to Paris. His opera Rusalka (1856) is still current in Russia, but after it Dargomizhsky set to work on a radical scheme, the word-for-word setting of Pushkin's 'Little Tragedy' The Stone Guest, allowing as he said the words to dictate music and form. The work consists of continuous recitative, apart from two songs called for in the text, and is better known in discussion than in performance.

Act I. Don Juan with Leporello has returned from exile to Madrid, spurred by the boredom of provincial life, drawn by longing for the actress Laura, and defying both the royal order of banishment and the potential vengeance of the murdered Commendatore's relations. He is told that Donna Anna, the Commendatore's widow (Pushkin is the only writer to make Donna Anna widow rather than daughter), will come to pray at her husband's tomb and he waits for her, vowing to add her to his list of conquests.

Laura's latest flame Don Carlos is jealous when he learns her song was written by Don Juan, who once killed her brother in a duel. When Don Juan interrupts their scene, a duel quickly results in the death of Don Carlos. Laura resents the strife in her house, but cannot resist Don Juan.

Act II. At the Commendatore's tomb, Don Juan disguised as a monk waits for Donna Anna, who is impressed by his ardour and invites him, under the name of Don Diego di Calvido, to her home. He tells Leporello of the progress of his latest affair, then demands Leporello invite the statue to supper to witness in silence the seduction of his widow. The statue seems to move in response.

Act III. Donna Anna finds her guest irresistible and, even when she learns his true identity, cannot bring herself to send him away. There is a knocking at the door, and Don Juan when he goes to answer it finds the statue standing on the threshold. He accepts the hand the statue offers, but its grip is lethal.

H.

PETER MAXWELL DAVIES

(born 8 September 1934)

The music of Sir Peter Maxwell Davies represents a rare and welcome fusion between native British tradition and a wider, European musical dimension. He has written some sixteen operas, whose formats have ranged from traditionally operatic, such as Taverner (1972) and The Doctor of Myddfai (1996), to masques, Blind Man's Buff (1972), Le jongleur de Notre Dame (1978), Songs of Hoy (1982) and The No.11 Bus (1984); chamber opera, The Martyrdom of St Magnus (1977) and The Lighthouse (1980); children's opera, The Two Fiddlers (1978), Cinderella (1980) and The Rainbow (1981); and music theatre, Eight Songs for a Mad King (1969) and The Medium (1981). With the possible exception of Resurrection (1988), he has demonstrated an acute sense of theatre and a marked sensitivity to words (he has written many of his own librettos).

TAVERNER

Opera in two acts, libretto by the composer, inspired by 'John Taverner' in Tudor Church Music, ed. P.C. Buck, E.H. Fellowes, A. Ramsbotham and S. Townsend Warner, and based on sixteenth-century documents. First performed Covent Garden, 12 July 1972, with Ragnar Ulfung as Taverner, John Lanigan, Benjamin Luxon, Raimund Herincx, James Bowman and Gillian Knight, conducted by Edward Downes. First U.S. performance Boston, 1986, conducted by Sarah Caldwell.

John TavernerTenor
 Richard Taverner, later St John.....Baritone
 Cardinal, later ArchbishopTenor
 KingBass
 Jester, later Death and Joking Jesus.....Baritone
 White Abbot.....Baritone Priest-Confessor, later
 God the Father.....Counter-Tenor
 BoyTreble
 CaptainBass
 Antichrist.....Tenor (Spoken)
 Archangel GabrielHigh Tenor
 Archangel Michael.....Deep Bass
 Two MonksTenors
 Rose Parrowe, later Virgin MaryMezzo-Soprano
 Council, Monks, Demons, Townspeople, Choirboys

Place: London and Boston, Lincolnshire

Time: c. 1538

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes¹

Peter Maxwell Davies began sketching music for an opera based on the life of John Taverner (1495–1545) while he was studying at Manchester University in the mid-1950s. In 1962 he wrote the First Fantasia on an 'In Nomine' by the earlier composer. He worked on the text while he was at Princeton (1962–64), and finished the music in 1970. Davies incorporates several elements of Taverner's own music, from his mass Gloria Tibi Trinitas, his 'In Nomine' and his Five Motets, into Taverner. Like Lulu, the opera balances around a central pivot: Act I's scenes are repeated in Act II in altered, parodied form.

Act I. A courtroom. John Taverner is on trial for heresy before the White Abbot. His father Richard blames Taverner's temper, but insists, 'His music is witness that he believes'. Taverner's mistress and muse, Rose Parrowe, defends him. His grotesque priest-confessor accepts a bribe and testifies against him, as does a boy from Taverner's choir-school. The Council expounds dogma and justifies capital punishment for heretics. Taverner is condemned to death by slow burning but reprieved by the Cardinal, because he is useful as a musician.

The chapel. Taverner has his doubts.

The throne room. A consort of viols and lute accompanies the Cardinal's consultation with the King, who is irritated by the Pope's delay in allowing him to get rid of his first wife. The Jester comments ironically. At the end of the scene he removes his mask to reveal the skull-face of Death.

Darkness, identified at the 1972 première as 'Taverner's skull'. The scene dramatises the conflict in Taverner's soul, which appears as a white dove, strangled by two Monks. Death challenges Taverner to be saved, to reject the paraphernalia of the Church of Rome, and also to reject his own art, his music and his mistress. Rose warns him that if he denies his art, he will betray what is divine in him. Death orders demons to perform a gaudy mystery play of the passion. Taverner is persuaded to repent.

Act II. The courtroom. In a scene 'conceived as a parody of Act I, Scene i', Taverner prosecutes the White Abbot for idolatry, but there is no reprieve: Death controls the Wheel of Fortune.

The throne room. A pantomime-ballet (Dance of Death) is performed aside. When the King learns the Pope has prohibited his second marriage he replaces the Church of Rome with the Church of England and is licensed by the Cardinal, recostumed by the Jester as the Archbishop of Canterbury. The King announces the dissolution of the monasteries.

The chapel. While the White Abbot celebrates mass and the monks chant, Taverner confesses that he took part in the corruption of the old order. Soldiers take over the monastery. Monks sing Taverner's setting of the Benedictus.

¹ Composer's own timing from the score.

The market-place in Boston. From the scaffold the White Abbot speaks out: 'I am fell into the hands of those who, preaching free thought, do burn me for opposing it'. As the fire burns, Taverner appeals to God, 'Forsake not thy faithful servant'.

As it happens, the facts on which Maxwell Davies based the story have now been discredited. In the opera longueurs occur, partly because of the obscurity of the ideas themselves. On the other hand, Taverner's scoring boasts an almost Puccinian variety and intensity: the opera is bell-haunted, using extraordinary means to simulate tintinnabulation; it delights in juxtaposing such extremes as monks chanting in Latin, over brass and wind, with an orchestral interlude featuring mournfully eloquent solo cello, violin and viola. It is perhaps characteristic of the opera's priorities that, when Taverner is corrupted by the Devil, the strings are asked to play with 'a maximum of nauseatingly sentimental vibrato'. The emotional weight of the opera is borne by the orchestra: none of the fiercely demanding vocal lines is as touching as the deeply felt, even romantic, pianissimo elegy for lower strings in the last scene's silent confrontation between Taverner and the Abbot.

P.

THE LIGHTHOUSE

'A chamber opera in a prologue and one act', libretto by the composer, based, in his words, on an incident described in 'Craig Mair's book on the Stevenson family in Edinburgh',¹ commissioned for the 1980 Edinburgh Festival. First performed there, 2 September 1980, with Neil Mackie (tenor), Michael Rippon (baritone) and David Wilson Johnson (bass), conductor Richard Dufallo. First U.S. performance Boston, 1983, directed by Peter Sellars and conducted by David Hoose. Toured widely by the Fires of London; Bremen, 1982; Salzburg and Copenhagen, 1983; Sydney and Gothenburg, 1984; Barcelona, 1986.

Sandy/Officer 1Tenor

Blazes/Officer 2Baritone

Arthur, Voice of the Cards/Officer 3Bass

Place: Edinburgh and the Flannan Isles

Time: 1900

Running Time: 1 hour 25 minutes

The Lighthouse is probably Maxwell Davies's most successful opera so far. Written for a small ensemble, the Fires of London which he founded in 1971, its theatricality exploits minimal means to considerable effect.

Prologue (Part I). The scene begins in the Courtroom, Edinburgh, where the officers who discovered the deserted lighthouse answer 'questions' posed by a solo horn, sometimes played from the back of the auditorium ('From the records of a court of enquiry into the unnatural disappearance of three lighthouse-keepers'). The officers relive their strange journey to the lighthouse, meeting first a sudden eddy 'where none had been' and then emerging into a calm that was 'more nerve-wracking than the storm'. The first officer sees a triangle of lights, which he calls 'the Angel of Death', but neither of the other officers sees it. They all hear foghorns from different directions, where there are no foghorns. As they step ashore they are watched by birds, but no lighthouse-keepers meet them. A chair and a cup have been broken. The court of enquiry records an open verdict. No one wants to replace the dead men, so an automatic lantern has been installed.

Part II. 'The Cry of the Beast'. Arthur's blessing on their meal is rejected by Sandy: storms have forced them to stay together longer than the normal three months, so their nerves are frayed. Arthur goes up to light the lantern. As Sandy and Blazes play cribbage together, the Voice of the Cards is heard from above. The two men quarrel. Arthur returns and rebukes them. Sandy tries to keep the peace and Blazes agrees to sing a song if the others do too. Blazes' jaunty song about a dysfunctional family involves alcoholism, child abuse and murder. Its moral is, 'If you're both clever and lucky, you can do just what you please.' The others join in Sandy's sad, sentimental love-song. Arthur's religious song is, as Blazes says, 'a bit of old blood and thunder'. Sandy hopes they will be preserved from Arthur's imagination and from his God.

The mists come down, so Arthur goes up to start the foghorn, 'The cry of the beast across the sleeping world'. Blazes sees a vision of the old woman he murdered in his song. Sandy sees faces from his past, his sister and a boy who now invites him to go away into the night. Arthur returns, singing a crazed 'Hymn', 'The Beast is called out from his grave'. Gradually, he himself assumes what the stage directions call 'characteristics of the Beast'. As Blazes and Sandy follow Arthur towards the door, they plead with God to turn his wrath against the Fiend and to spare them. Suddenly, the three lighthouse-keepers become the three officers from the Lighthouse Commission boat, while the eyes of the Beast are revealed as the lights of their ship. The officers' comments seem to indicate that when they found the keepers had become 'unnatural, demonic beasts' and run amok, they killed them to protect themselves and then decided to report that the men had simply disappeared. In a final brief episode, we relive the scene's opening blessing 'to keep the Beast from the door', but in an eery, pianissimo version. Are they the relief keepers or, perhaps, ghosts of those who disappeared? The opera ends with the lighthouse lantern flashing in automatic mode.

¹ 'The Composer's Notes on his Works', Paul Griffiths, Peter Maxwell Davies, London, 1982.

The ghost that haunts The Lighthouse is obviously

Britten, but it is a case of influence digested. The open-ended ghost story format may be reminiscent of The Turn of the Screw; its structure of official enquiry followed by re-enactment and its seascape may suggest Peter Grimes, while Arthur whistles the same marine hymn that runs through Noye's Fludde; yet the opera's integrity is never in doubt. The way the composer handles the central theme of the Beast also recalls Britten: Maxwell Davies leaves its exact nature open to interpretation but its 'daemonic' quality obviously includes an element of homoeroticism ('No. I didn't, we didn't'). According to the composer, the musical structure is based on number symbolism taken from the Tarot. The orchestration is dazzlingly inventive, not just because it asks for new instrumental colours (a 'plastic soap-dish [is] scraped around inside of tam-tams to produce a "howl" resembling electronic "feedback"') but in the fascinating way he combines conventional instruments, such as a high-lying, muted violin eerily paired with the bass clarinet as 'fingers of mist, clammy, unnatural, reached down from the tower towards us'.

P.

CLAUDE DEBUSSY

(born 22 August 1862, died 25 March 1918)

PELLÉAS ET MÉLISANDE

Opera in five acts, text from Maeterlinck's play of the same name. Première at Opéra-Comique, Paris, 30 April 1902, with Garden, Gerville-Réache, Périer, Dufranne, Vieuille, conductor Messenger. First performed New York, Manhattan Opera House, 1908, with Garden, Gerville-Réache, Périer, Dufranne, Arimondi, Crabbé, conductor Campanini; Covent Garden, 1909, with Féart, Bourgeois, Warnéry, Vanni Marcoux, conductor Campanini; Metropolitan, New York, 1925, with Bori, Johnson, Whitehill, Rothier. Revivals include Covent Garden, 1920, with Edvina, Maguénat, conductor Pitt; 1930, with Teyte, Bourdin, Brownlee; 1937, with Perli, Gaudin, Vanni Marcoux; 1949, with Joachim, Jansen, Etcheverry, conductor Désormière; 1969, with Söderström, George Shirley, conductor Pierre Boulez; la Scala, 1925, with Heldy, Bertana, Legrand, Journet, conductor Toscanini; 1949, with Géori Boué, Bourdin, Etcheverry, conductor de Sabata; Glynde-bourne, 1962, with Duval, Henry Gui, Roux, conductor Gui; English National Opera, 1981, with Eilene Hannan, Robert Dean, Neil Howlett, conductor Mark Elder (in English).

| | |
|---|--------------------|
| Arkel, King of Allemonde | Bass |
| Geneviève, mother of Pelléas and Golaud | Alto |
| Pelléas } King Arkel's grandsons | Tenor ¹ |
| Golaud } | Baritone |
| Mélisande | Soprano |
| Yniold, Golaud's son by his first marriage | Soprano |
| A Physician | Bass |

Some works of art sum up the past, some presage the future – amongst operas, one thinks of Mozart's in the first category, of Tristan or Falstaff or ¹ Or high baritone. Jean Périer, the original Pelléas, also sang Scarpia, Colline. Sharpless; Warnéry was Gonzalve in L'Heure Espagnole, Mime in Siegfried; Bourdin an Onegin, Shirley a celebrated Don Ottavio.

Wozzeck in the second. Pelléas seems to do neither. It belongs to no line and (unlike Debussy's piano and orchestral works) has few imitators. However, if the work is something of a dead end, it is anything but sterile; in fact, every time one hears it, one is more convinced than ever that it is a work of outstanding, uncanny beauty, of incredibly perceptive imagination, and its very lack of followers is some indication that what it has to say has been said once and for all.

So much has been written about the tenuous nature of Pelléas that it is perhaps worth while emphasising that such a description applies only to the dramatic side of the work. The characters do not reveal the full extent of their feelings in their every utterance – to that limited extent Pelléas is a 'realistic' opera – and they prefer to deal in indefinite, non-committal phrases rather than in a grandiose flaunting of feelings. But there is no musical under-emphasis in the ordinary sense of that term; what Debussy was after was surely the exact opposite – a precise, unexaggerated musical statement of the sentiments which are expressed, and an equally precise indication of what the characters concerned clearly feel to lie behind those sentiments.

Each scene is connected to its predecessor by an orchestral interlude, and the acts are thus musically continuous.

Act I, scene i. In a forest, Golaud, grandson of King Arkel, while hunting has lost his way following a wild boar and come to a place he does not know. There he sees a girl sitting by a spring. She behaves like a person isolated from the world but Golaud succeeds in inducing Mélisande – she at last tells him her name – to follow him out of the woods.

Scene ii. A room in the castle. Geneviève, mother of Golaud and Pelléas, is reading to the aged, almost blind King a letter which Golaud has written to his half-brother: 'Voici ce qu'il écrit à son frère Pelléas'. From this letter we learn that Golaud has already been married for six months to the mysterious Mélisande. He loves her, but knows no more today than he did at first in the woods. He is worried that his grandfather may not accept that he has married Mélisande and asks Pelléas to give him a sign that the King is ready 'to honour the stranger as his daughter'. Otherwise, he will steer his ship to a remote land and never return home. King Arkel has arrived at that time of life when the wisdom of experience makes one forgive whatever happens. He pardons Golaud and commissions his grandson Pelléas to give his brother the sign agreed upon. Pelléas has asked him if he may leave to say farewell to a dying friend; but Arkel reminds him that his duty is to await his brother's return, and look after his father who lies sick in a room above them.

Scene iii. Before the castle. Geneviève seeks to calm Mélisande's distress at the gloominess of the world into which she has wandered. Pelléas is there. Together they watch a ship sail away out to sea.

Act II, scene i. A fountain in the park. Pelléas and Mélisande go together to this thickly shaded spot in the heat of the day. Is Mélisande a Melusine-like creature? Water attracts wonderfully. Pelléas bids her take care: 'Prenez garde de glisser'. She is tempted to play with the ring that Golaud gave her. It slips from her hand to the sound of a harp glissando, and sinks.

Scene ii. There must have been some peculiar condition attached to the ring. At the precise time that it fell into the fountain, Golaud's horse shied so that he fell and now lies injured in bed. Mélisande is looking after him. She tells Golaud that she does not feel well and is oppressed by foreboding. Golaud tries to comfort her; he takes her hands and sees that the ring is missing. She must go immediately to look for it. Pelléas will help her find it.

Scene iii. Mélisande has lied to Golaud by telling him that the ring slipped from her hand into the sea. Pelléas must therefore show her the place she has suggested so that she may at least know where she claimed to have lost the ring – a horrible place in which the shadow of death stalks. They see three mysterious bearded beggars asleep.

Act III, scene i. A tower in the castle. At the window of the tower Mélisande is combing her hair: 'Mes longs cheveux'. Pelléas comes to say goodbye; early next morning he is going away. Mélisande will at least once more reach out her hand to him so that he may press it to his lips. Their hands do not touch but as Mélisande leans forward, her hair falls over Pelléas's head and fills him with passion. Their words become warmer – then Golaud comes by and reproves their 'childishness'. He goes off with Pelléas.

The whole scene, from the ravishing harp sound of the opening until the appearance of Golaud, is no more no less than a passionate love scene (although no word of love is spoken) – but with what sensitivity has Debussy set it!

Scene ii. In the vault under the castle. Golaud leads Pelléas into these underground rooms where the breeze of death blows. Seized with shuddering they leave.

Scene iii. At the entrance to the vault, Golaud warns Pelléas to keep away from Mélisande.

Scene iv. Before the castle. Jealousy fills Golaud's heart and he lifts up his little son, Yniold, offspring of his first marriage, to spy through a window on Pelléas and Mélisande inside. The child cannot describe anything remotely improper, yet Golaud senses that there is something between the couple. He himself is much older than Pelléas or Mélisande. Dramatically, this is one of the tensest scenes of the whole score, and Golaud's agony and impotence are made more apparent by the innocence and fright of Yniold as he reports what he sees.

Act IV, scene i. In a room in the castle, Pelléas tells Mélisande that he must see her that evening. She promises to go to the old fountain in the park where she lost the ring. It will be their last meeting. She still has no idea what is driving Pelléas away.

Scene ii. Old King Arkel enters the room. He has taken Mélisande to his heart and feels she is deeply unhappy. Golaud also comes in. The sight of his wife, apparently the picture of innocence, irritates him so much ('Une grande innocence') that in a fit of madness he throws her down and drags her across the room by her hair. Only Arkel understands and pities.

Scene iii. By the spring in the park. There is a feeling of disaster in the air. Yniold has dropped something behind a stone and is looking for it. He catches sight of some sheep being driven past and listens to them as they go. (This scene is often omitted in performance.)

Scene iv. It is dark when Mélisande goes to her rendezvous with Pelléas. As they say goodbye, perhaps because of Golaud's outburst of anger, they clearly see what has caused the situation and are overcome with something like an affirmation of death and the joy of dying. Fate shuts the gates of the castle upon them; like fate they see Golaud coming. Pelléas falls from a thrust of Golaud's sword, while Mélisande flees from her husband into the night.

Act V. A room in the castle. Mélisande lies in bed, Arkel, Golaud and the Physician talking softly in the room. Mélisande is not dying from the insignificant wound Golaud gave her and perhaps her life can be saved. Golaud's bitter remorse at what he has done cannot be calmed: 'J'ai tué sans raison! ... Ils s'étaient embrassés comme des petits enfants ... Je l'ai fait malgré moi' (I have killed without cause! ... They were kissing like children, just playing games ... An uncontrollable impulse).¹ Mélisande wakes up. Everything that has happened seems to her like a dream. Desperately Golaud begs her pardon but still asks her for the truth. He is willing to die too, but before his death he must know whether she has betrayed him with Pelléas. She denies it. Golaud presses her so forcibly that she seems near death. Earthly things fall away as if her soul were already free. Arkel brings her the child she has borne and offers the last services for the dying girl, to make her free of earthly pain and the pressure of persons left behind. H.

¹ Translation by Hugh Macdonald.

LÉO DELIBES

(born 21 February 1836, died 16 January 1891)

LAKMÉ

Opera in three acts, text by Edmond Gondinet and Philippe Gille, after Pierre Loti's Le Mariage de Loti. Première at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, 14 April 1883, with van Zandt, Talazac, conductor Danbé. First performed London, Gaiety Theatre, 1885, with van Zandt; New York, 1886, with Pauline L'Allemand; Metropolitan, 1892, with van Zandt, Montariol, Edouard de Reszke; Covent Garden, 1910, with Tetrassini, McCormack. Revived Metropolitan, 1916, with Barrientos, Martinelli, Rothier; 1931, with Pons, Thill; 1938, with Pons, Jagel, Pinza; Wexford, 1970, with Christiane Eda-Pierre. New productions of Lakmé were mounted for Joan Sutherland in Philadelphia, 1964, Seattle, 1967, Sydney, 1976; and for Luciana Serra in Trieste, 1979, Bologna, 1981, Chicago, 1983.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Lakmé..... | Soprano |
| Mallika, her slave | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Ellen } English ladies | Soprano |
| Rose } | Soprano |
| Mistress Bentson, their governess | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Gérald, an English officer | Tenor |
| Frédéric, an English officer | Baritone |
| Nilakantha, a Brahmin priest | Bass-Baritone |
| Hadji, servant of Nilakantha | Tenor |

Place: India

Time: Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Delibes's reputation after his death relies on four theatrical successes, the operas Lakmé and Le roi l'a dit and the ballets Coppélia and Sylvia, yet his career as a leading French musician took him from the organ loft through the theatre to the heights of a professorship at the Paris Conservatoire.

Lakmé was written after the two successful ballets and had achieved at the Opéra-Comique over 1500 performances within 100 years of its première. As drama through music its rating on the Kerman scale cannot be high, but the composer had a great melodic gift and knew moreover precisely how to flatter the French voice. For Lakmé herself, Delibes wrote expressive lyrical music of a high order, only the Bell Song demanding an extravagant coloratura technique.

Act I. Lakmé is the daughter of Nilakantha, a fanatical Brahmin priest. While he nurses his hatred of the British invaders who have forbidden him to practise his religion, his daughter and other devotees of his cult sing an invocation to the gods: 'Blanche Dourga, Pâle Siva, Puissant Ganea'. Lakmé's vocal embroidery over the top of the chorus is full of coloratura work. Nilakantha leaves for another gathering of the faithful, and Lakmé is alone with her companions in the idyllic garden which surrounds the temple. Lakmé and Mallika sing together a most attractive barcarolle as they prepare to bathe in the stream: 'Dôme épais, le jasmin'. The rippling theme of the music and the oriental beauty of the surroundings perfectly set the atmosphere in which Lakmé moves.

We are next introduced to the English figures of the opera, two army officers, a couple of young girls, and their ineffably comic governess, Mistress Bentson. They are all in varying degrees suspicious of the Orient and its mystery, which they profess to find very peculiar indeed. They break through the bamboo fence which surrounds the temple, and exclaim with delight at what they can see inside. Frédéric warns them that several of the flowers are poisonous; he also says that the hut belongs to a dangerous and implacable Brahmin, whose one delight is in his beautiful daughter. In a quintet they speculate on the feelings of such a girl, who is shut off by her priestly vocation from contact with the outside world.

The women want a sketch done of Lakmé's jewels, and Gérald, who is something of an artist, says he will stay behind and do one, if they will go back to the town. Left alone, he is fascinated by the jewels, and he speculates on the beauty and youth of their owner. Gérald's aria, 'Fantaisie aux divins mensonges', is one of the gems of the score, in aptness, melodic freshness and unpretentious charm.

He sees Lakmé and Mallika returning, and hides. Lakmé dismisses Mallika and wonders to herself why she should feel so oddly sad and happy at the same time ('Pourquoi dans les grands bois'). She sees Gérald, and, filled with alarm, cries for help. But, when Mallika and Hadji come to her aid, she sends them off to look for her father. Alone with Gérald, she tells him that a word from her could have brought about his death; he must leave and forget he ever saw her. But Gérald is infatuated, and he sings passionately of love: 'C'est le dieu de la jeunesse, c'est le dieu du printemps'. Lakmé's voice joins his, until the sound of her father returning brings her back to reality. As Gérald disappears through the gap in the bamboo Nilakantha cries for vengeance on whoever has dared profane his temple precincts.

Act II. The scene is a bazaar, with a temple in the background. The stage is crowded with soldiers, sailors, and tourists, who mingle with the street-sellers and people. Mistress Bentson is surrounded by beggars and sellers, who, in the course of conversation, relieve her of her watch and handkerchief, before she is rescued by Frédéric. A bell rings to signal the closing of the market, and the festival begins. Girls perform various exotic dances, and Nilakantha appears, disguised as an old Hindu penitent and accompanied by his daughter. By now Gérald and his fiancée Ellen have appeared on the scene, and Gérald, out of earshot of the girls, has been told by Frédéric that their regiment leaves before dawn. Lakmé hints to her father that Brahma might not be averse to pardoning an offence by a stranger, but her father indignantly denies any such possibility. He sings tenderly of his love for Lakmé: 'Lakmé, ton doux regard se voile'.

Nilakantha demands that his daughter sing to attract the man who has dared to venture on to sacred ground – drawn, Nilakantha is sure, by the beauty of Lakmé herself. A brilliant passage of roulades is designed to attract the attention of the crowd, to whom Nilakantha introduces his daughter as a traditional Hindu singer. She tells the story of the Indian maiden, a pariah, who one day sees a handsome stranger lost in the forest and asleep, defenceless against the wild beasts, who wait to devour him. She plays on her bells and charms the animals, thus keeping the stranger safe from them. When he awakens, she discovers that it is Vishnu, the son of Brahma. He transports her with him to the skies, and ever since that day the traveller has heard the sound of bells in that particular part of the forest. This is the famous Bell Song ('Où va la jeune Hindoue?'), to which more than to anything else the opera owes its continued renown. Its bell effects and seductive melody have made it a favourite of sopranos with pretensions to vocal agility; in the hands of a coloratura soprano who is also musically inclined its effect is considerable.

To Nilakantha's fury, nobody appears in answer to Lakmé's singing, and he bids his daughter continue, which she reluctantly does, until, seeing Gérald, she utters a cry of anguish and faints in his arms. Nilakantha is convinced that he knows his enemy, and plots to isolate and destroy him during the course of the procession of the goddess which takes place later that night.

Lakmé is left alone with the faithful Hadji, who tries to console her, and promises to do whatever she asks him, whether to help a friend or dispose of an enemy. Hardly has he finished speaking when Gérald returns and rushes to Lakmé's side. There is a love duet for them ('Dans la vague d'un rêve'), during whose course Lakmé admits her love for the young officer whose religion is not her own. Lakmé plans a new life for them far away: 'Dans la forêt près de nous'.

The procession comes into sight, the priests chanting their hymn to Durga. Frédéric comments ironically on Gérald's infatuation for the Hindu

'goddess', and says that he would be really worried were it not that they have to leave that very night. As the procession passes, Nilakantha's plan is put into operation, and Gérald falls stabbed. Lakmé rushes despairingly to him, but finds that he is only slightly injured. Hadji will help her to remove him to her secret hiding-place, and he will be hers.

Act III. The entr'acte suggests a lullaby, and when the curtain goes up, we are in the hut in the forest, where Gérald is lying on a couch, while Lakmé sings to him ('Sous le ciel tout étoilé'). When he wakes up, he is at first not sure what has happened to him, but Lakmé reminds him that it was Hadji who carried him to the forest. In one of the happiest pieces of the score, 'Ah, viens dans la forêt profonde', Gérald gives lyrical expression to his happiness far from the world with Lakmé as his only companion.

From afar off can be heard the sound of singing, and Lakmé tells Gérald that it is a band of lovers come to drink of the sacred spring. She herself will fetch water from the spring in which they may pledge their love. As she goes, Frédéric, who has been watching, appears at Gérald's side. He reminds Gérald that he is due to go with his regiment that very night, but Gérald is intoxicated with his love for Lakmé. He can forget Ellen, to whom he was engaged, but can he, asks Frédéric, forget his honour as a soldier? As he leaves, Frédéric knows he has triumphed over Gérald's infatuation, and Gérald himself knows it too when he hears in the distance the sound of soldiers marching.

Lakmé notices the change which has come over her lover during her short absence, and, while his attention is concentrated on the sound of the march, she tears off a leaf of the fatal datura tree, and bites it. 'Tu m'as donné le plus doux rêve', she tells Gérald when he again becomes conscious of her existence. Together they drink the water from the cup, and swear to love each other through all eternity. Lakmé admits to Gérald that she thinks he is in no danger of breaking his oath, since she is dying. Their voices join again in a duet, but Lakmé dies a moment later, though not before she has had time to tell Nilakantha, who discovers them, that she and her lover have together drunk of the sacred spring. As Gérald cries out in despair, Nilakantha thinks of Lakmé transported to eternal life, and is content. H.

FREDERICK DELIUS

(born 29 January 1862, died 10 June 1934)

KOANGA

Opera in three acts, original libretto by C.F. Keary from an episode from George Cable's The Grandissimes. Première, Elberfeld, Germany, 30 March 1904, with Rose Kaiser and Clarence Whitehill, conducted by Fritz Cassirer. Revived Covent Garden, 1935, with Oda Slobodskaya and John Brownlee, conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham; Washington, 1970, and Camden Festival, London, 1972, with Claudia Lindsey and Eugene Holmes, conductor Sir Charles Groves.

Uncle Joe, an old slave Bass

Planters' daughters

Renée Soprano

Hélène Soprano

Jeanne Soprano

Marie Soprano

Aurore Contralto

Hortense Contralto

Olive Contralto

Paulette Contralto

Don José Martinez, a planter Bass

Simon Perez, Don José's overseer Tenor

Koanga, an African prince and Voodoo priest ... Baritone

Rangwan, a Voodoo priest Bass

Palmyra, a quadroon, half-sister to Clotilda Soprano

Clotilda, wife to Don José Martinez Contralto

Black Slaves, Creole Dancers, Servants

Place: A Plantation on the Mississippi in Louisiana

Time: Second Half of the Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

Koanga is based on an episode from George Cable's book The Grandissimes (1880). Charles Keary wrote a libretto for Delius in 1895 and the score was finished in Paris in 1897. Two years later, some of the music was heard in a concert of Delius's works in London and in 1904 the opera was staged at Elberfeld in a German translation by Jelka Rosen, Delius's wife. Many changes seem to have been made from the original libretto, which itself may not have been the finished work of Keary, with whom Delius had quarrelled, and in 1933 – to complicate matters – Jelka translated it back into English for the London première, adding an element of Christianity versus Voodoo to the existing mixture. A further and more coherent revision was made by Douglas Craig and Andrew Page in connection with the 1972 London revival and this has been published.

Prologue. The verandah of a southern plantation house. Uncle Joe agrees, after a graceful ensemble for female voices, to tell the young plantation ladies one of their favourite stories, that of Koanga and Palmyra.

Clouds descend during the beautiful interlude, which is redolent of spirituals,¹ and lift to disclose the garden of a sugar-cane plantation on the Mississippi in Louisiana, with slave huts to the right and the forest at the back.

Act I. Palmyra, a mulatto slave-girl, sings sadly of the turmoil in her mind: 'How far removed my spirit seems from that of master or of slave'. Simon Perez, foreman of the plantation, rouses the slaves and then starts to pester Palmyra, who, not for the first time it would appear, rejects his advances.

Don José Martinez, the owner of the plantation, appears and demonstrates his authority. His instructions must if necessary be reinforced by use of the whip, and, as for the new batch of slaves due that day, it includes a Dahomey prince, and 'we must find a way to render him of service'. Black workers sing a variety of spirituals and working songs throughout the scene but the entrance of Koanga, prince and Voodoo priest, gives rise to a grandiose solo utterance which has its effect on all, not least Palmyra. Martinez insists he must work like the others, but Perez feels even the whip will be of little avail. Don José notices the mutual attraction of Koanga and Palmyra and offers Palmyra to Koanga if he will work. The act ends in an ensemble which grows in intensity and in volume as the slaves add their disinterested singing to the voices of the principal characters who voice their feelings, Koanga and Palmyra of mutual attraction, Martinez of satisfaction at the working of his stratagem, Perez alternating between pleasure at the prospect of getting Koanga to work and fury at the likelihood of losing Palmyra for himself. There is a lull in the music's flow as Clotilda enters to protest at the prospective loss of Palmyra as her maid ('She was placed in my care by my father when she was a little girl'), but her voice joins the ensemble as the act's finale runs its course with gathering momentum.

¹ Beecham, in his book on the composer (Hutchinson, 1959), tells of Delius's playing black tunes on the fiddle to his future wife Jelka and his poet Keary one day in summer 1896 at Bourron, near Grez-sur-Loing, some forty miles from Paris.

Act II. The main entrance to Don José's house, where the slaves are celebrating their master's birthday and the wedding-day of Koanga and Palmyra. Clotilda enjoins Perez to prevent the forthcoming marriage, revealing to him that Palmyra is the daughter of Clotilda's father and so her half-sister. She promises to give Palmyra to Perez if he is successful. Palmyra, at first behind the scenes, sings an aria full of confidence for the future, 'How time flows on!' When Clotilda tries to head her off from her marriage to Koanga as likely to bring everlasting shame – 'Would you renounce your faith and creed?' – Palmyra rounds on her with 'Your faith! Your creed!' The wedding music starts, and even though Simon Perez tells Palmyra the secret of her birth, she continues to reject him. Palmyra sings a beautiful aria, 'The hour is near when I to him my soul surrender' (composed apparently during rehearsals for the 1904 Elberfeld première), and in response to her pledging of her soul to him, Koanga expressively renounces his inheritance in order to be a slave for love of her. Palmyra gives him wine, and the slaves sing to the seductive rhythm of the Creole dance, la Calinda, which, shorn of chorus and ensemble, has become one of Delius's most attractive and best-known concert pieces.¹

During the dance, Palmyra and Koanga pledge their troth but before its end Palmyra is swept to the back of the stage and abducted by a group of servants under the direction of Simon Perez.

Koanga at first cannot understand what is happening but then demands the return of his bride until, threatened by Martinez, he is driven to strike his master down. There is a clap of thunder and Koanga, alone on the stage, kneels to bring a Voodoo curse down on the white men who have seduced him from his ancient allegiance. Lit by flashes of lightning, he can be seen making his way through the forest and, just before the fall of the curtain, his voice is heard again in the distance, threatening doom.

Act III. A swamp at nightfall. The attractive and atmospheric prelude replaced the original piece during rehearsals at Elberfeld. It is taken from Delius's first opera, then unperformed, The Magic Fountain,² and its charm is undoubted even if its suitability to open an act of sinister import may be in question.

Off-stage voices establish the eerie overtones of the scene as it is prepared for the arrival of Koanga, who proceeds to cast a magic spell with Rangwan, another Voodoo priest. Koanga and Rangwan gash their arms with knives, blood from a gourd is poured on a fire, the chant continues impressively and there is a wild dance before the fire dies down and a mist covers the scene, to change to a vision of Martinez's stricken plantation, where slaves lie prostrate on the ground. The men bemoan their fate and Koanga imagines he hears Palmyra's voice raised in lamentation, which rouses him to a splendid outburst in which he calls on the morning star to lead him to her.

The scene returns to the plantation where Christian slaves pray for deliverance and Don José curses their feebleness of spirit and promises vengeance on Koanga. Palmyra appears in a state of collapse but Perez still pursues her with protestations of love, until Koanga emerges from hiding, and, urged on by Palmyra, follows Perez into the forest and kills him. Palmyra's moment of triumph is short-lived as a band of horsemen set on Koanga behind the scenes and beat him. He is carried in and set down beside Palmyra, dying, torn between his love for her and his repentance at having even momentarily forsaken Voodoo. Palmyra sings in lyrical ecstasy over his body, then stabs herself. After a long, sinuous and beautiful postlude to this latter-day Liebestod, the scene changes for the epilogue to the girls sitting on the verandah and listening to Uncle Joe's story. The gentle charm of the ending, as they watch the day dawn, is in considerable contrast to the heroic qualities of the act it follows. H.

¹ In reality, la Calinda was a frenzied dance and appears to have been banned in Louisiana on the grounds of obscenity. It is thus hard to stage in anything like its original form to the graceful music Delius wrote for it!

² The Magic Fountain was first publicly heard in a B.B.C. studio performance recorded during 1977.

A VILLAGE ROMEO AND JULIET

Opera in six scenes, text by the composer, based on a story by Gottfried Keller. Première, Berlin, 21 February 1907. First performed Covent Garden, 1910, with Ruth Vincent, Walter Hyde, Dearth, Maitland, conductor Beecham. Revived 1920 with Miriam Licette, Hyde, Heming, Michael, conductor Beecham; Royal College of Music, 1934, conductor Beecham; Bradford, 1962, by Sadler's Wells with Morison, Wakefield, conductor Meredith Davies. American première, Washington, 1972, with Patricia Wells, John Stewart, John Reardon.

| | |
|--|------------------------|
| Manz, a rich farmer | Baritone |
| Marti, another farmer | Baritone |
| Sali, son of Manz, as a child | Soprano |
| Sali, son of Manz, as a man..... | Tenor |
| Vreli, daughter of Marti..... | Soprano |
| The Dark Fiddler, rightful heir to the wood..... | Baritone |
| Two Peasants | Baritone |
| Three Women | Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano |
| Gingerbread Woman..... | Soprano |
| Wheel-of-Fortune Woman | Soprano |
| Cheap Jewellery Woman | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Showman | Tenor |
| Merry-go-Round Man | Baritone |
| The Slim Girl..... | Soprano |
| The Wild Girl | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Poor Horn-Player | Tenor |
| The Hunchbacked Bass Fiddler..... | Bass |

Place: Seldwyla, Switzerland

Time: Mid-Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 45 minutes

Professor Arthur Hutchings, author of an authoritative book on Delius, admonishes the listener: 'Opera-goers who require the stage properties and dramatic interruptions of Italian opera, the pageantry and ballet of Russian opera, the discrimination of character and emotional versatility of Mozartian opera, cannot fail to be disappointed in A Village Romeo and Juliet. No opera is more musical, because in no opera has the composer been more certain that by music he would tell the tale; Cecil Gray has called it "a symphonic poem with the implicit programme made explicit upon the stage." ... In this work the opera-goer must expect only music, and music chiefly of the same kind – sustained, dreamy beauty, slightly off-set by the sinister strains of the Dark Fiddler or the litigious quarrels of the farmers.'

Scene i. September. A piece of land luxuriously overgrown on a hill. The broad fields of Manz and Marti lie on either side, only a small piece of either field being visible. Manz and Marti are rivals for the strip of wild land which lies between their fields. They are both ploughing when the action begins, and each, when the other is not looking, takes an extra furrow out of the waste land.

Sali and Vreli brings their parents' midday meals, then go off to play together in the woods. Manz and Marti reappear to eat together. The children come out of the wood as the Dark Fiddler can be heard in the distance. Marti recognises him, and knows that the land should be his, but that, being a bastard, he has no legal right to it. The Fiddler disappears, watched by the children. Their parents start to discuss the prospective sale of the land, each criticising the way the other has stolen a furrow here and there. They quarrel furiously, and forbid their respective children ever again to play with each other.

Scene ii. Six years later. Outside Marti's house, which has a neglected air about it. The children are now grown up, and ever more closely drawn towards one another. Sali comes towards the house, from which Vreli presently looks out longingly. They patch up a quarrel, caused one imagines by the lawsuit in which their parents have been frittering away their heritages. They are pessimistic about the situation, but Sali hopes all may yet come right if they stick together. They make an appointment for the evening, in the fields.

Scene iii. The wild land, overgrown with poppies. Sali waits for Vreli, who comes in and calls him, then hides until he finds her. Their delight in each other's company is obvious. The sound of the Dark Fiddler's playing is heard, and he reminds them that they played on his land. Now that they are all beggars, he feels they are equal. Why do they not come with him and share his vagabond's existence? He does not seem to expect an answer, but is confident they will meet again. Vreli remembers that the last time they saw him was on the dread day when their fathers quarrelled. Sali reassures her, and they talk happily of their childhood days. They embrace.

Marti can be seen looking for Vreli. He spies them, and is dragging Vreli away when Sali fells him with a blow.

Scene iv. A slow introduction leads to a new scene, the interior of Marti's house, now quite bare, apart from a bed and a bench. Vreli is sitting in front of the fire, reminding herself sadly that this is her last night in her old home. Sali comes in, and after an ecstatic greeting, they sing of their love, and pledge never to leave each other again. Vreli tells Sali that she has just taken her father away, as he has lost his mind as a result of Sali's blow. She will have to leave as the house has been sold. They sit down together in front of the fire, and fall asleep in each other's arms. The stage grows dark as they dream they are being married in the old church of Seldwyla. Church bells ring, the organ plays, a hymn is sung, and finally the bells ring out again merrily.

Dawn breaks, and the lovers awake to understand that it was all a dream. Can they not have a whole day together, asks Vreli, in which to wander through the woods and dance? 'To Berghald,' exclaims Sali. The sound of yodelling can be heard in the distance as they leave.

Scene v. The fair. The various sellers cry their wares, and the showman leads some of the crowd into a tent. Sali and Vreli arrive, looking happy, and join in the gaiety until they are recognised by a woman from Seldwyla, with her companions. They buy everything that attracts them, but suddenly notice that they are being watched curiously by the crowd. Self-consciously they leave the fair, and make for the Paradise Garden, another dancing place.

The interlude during the change of scene is the famous Walk to the Paradise Garden (composed five years later than the rest of the opera to themes from it). During it, Sali and Vreli rest on their journey.

Scene vi. The vagabonds are heard in the distance before the curtain rises to reveal a dilapidated country house, now used as an inn. The river flows nearby, and a barge full of hay is moored on it. The Dark Fiddler and his vagabond companions sit round a table. It is evening. The Dark Fiddler is evidently telling his friends the story of the strife between Manz and Marti and its origin.

Sali and Vreli come into the garden. The Dark Fiddler strongly advises them to take to the road and join him and his friends. He plays while they dance. All join him in trying to persuade the two young lovers to join them, but they fear they are too respectable for a vagabond's life. Bargemen are heard singing in the distance, and gradually it dawns on Sali and Vreli that the only way out for them is to 'drift down the river' like the bargemen, but with a difference; they can never return.

Watched by the Dark Fiddler and the vagabonds, they get into the barge. Vreli throws her nosegay into the river, and Sali draws the plug from the bottom of the boat and throws it in too. As the boat moves out into the middle of the stream, Sali and Vreli fall into each other's arms on the bed of hay. Boatmen can be heard in the distance singing 'Ho, travellers we a-passing by'. Of the end, Professor Hutchings has written: 'The orchestra alone then concludes the work with a perfection unattainable by words; the music can suggest the deep and enfold-ing waters. However much the pathetic emotions have been stirred, we are satisfied and comforted almost as by the "happy ending" of comedy.' H.

GAETANO DONIZETTI

(born 29 November 1797, died 8 April 1848)

Donizetti, like Rossini and Verdi, unlike Beethoven and Wagner, was a practitioner not a questioner. He could invent music that was original, but he accepted the aesthetic conventions of his day and sought inspiration within them, seldom attempting to break new ground. By his time, Beethoven and romantic striving had burst the moulds of symphonic form but Italian opera in the first half of the nineteenth century was nonetheless a period of certainty. Viable forms (different for tragedy and comedy) had been forged by Rossini and his contemporaries and were being exploited by Bellini, Donizetti, and even (for his first dozen creative years) Verdi. This process satisfied audiences, who knew what to expect; singers, whose status it enshrined and whose prowess it displayed; and composers, whose formal problems were largely solved and who had merely – merely! – to find the notes to express the situations which were to hand.

In Donizetti's tragedies, you will find the expected introductory chorus, the heroine's opening cavatina, the meetings and partings of lovers and would-be lovers, the confrontations of rivals, the mistakes of identity, and of course the mad scenes (sometimes masquerading as death scenes, but mad scenes nonetheless, with their jumps through time and space so that a quotation of earlier music may poignantly recall earlier bliss). A Donizetti subject, whether from Schiller or Scott, whether concerned with a Scottish queen or an Amazonian heroine, will follow the same well-trodden path. Occasionally a great scene will emerge – the sextet in Lucia, or the pathetic end of Anna Bolena – but the form will be predictable throughout, which need be no more than to say that some Haydn symphonies are better than others, that a choice is permissible even among the many examples of Madonna and Child by Giovanni Bellini. H.

LE CONVENIENZE ED INCONVENIENZE TEATRALI

Conventions and Inconveniences of the Stage

Dramma-giocosso in two acts, libretto by Domenico Gilardoni, based on Antonio Simone Sografi's plays Le convenienze teatrali (1794) and Le inconvenienze teatrali (1800). Original one-act farsa with dialogue Le convenienze teatrali first performed at Teatro Nuovo, Naples, 21 November 1827. Revised, with recitatives, incorporating part of Le inconvenienze teatrali, first performed at Teatro Cannobiana, Milan, 20 April 1831. First U.S. performance Terre Haute, Indiana, 1966, as An Unconventional Rehearsal. Revived in Munich, 1969, as Viva la Mamma. First U.K. performance broadcast by B.B.C. Radio 3, 1969, as Upstage and Downstage; 1827 version by Opera Rara, Collegiate Theatre, London, 1972, as The Prima Donna's Mother is a Drag, with Lissa Gray, Peter Lyon. 1831 version, Teatro Donizetti, Bergamo, 1995, with Maria Costanza Nocentini and Bruno De Simone, conducted by Fabrizio Maria Carminati; Teatro Regio, Turin, 1996, with Luciana Serra, José Fardilha, conducted by Fabrizio Carminati.

Daria Garbinati¹, prima donna.....Soprano
Procolo², her husband.....Bass
Biscroma Strappaviscere³, conductor.....Baritone
Donna Agata Scanagalli, Luigia's mother, a Neapolitan.....Baritone
Luigia Castragatti⁴, seconda donna.....Soprano
Guglielmo Antolstoinoff, primo tenore,
 German.....Tenor
Pippetto⁵, primo musico.....Soprano/Tenor
Cesare Salzapariglia⁶, druggist and poet.....Baritone
Impresario.....Bass
Director of the Theatre.....Bass
Soldiers, Servants, Workmen

Place: A Hotel next to the Theatre in Lodi
Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Donizetti wrote Le convenienze ed inconvenienze teatrali for his benefit evening. While it pokes fun at contemporary operatic clichés, and can prove genuinely funny, it also serves to display his skills at opera seria exhibitionism and at opera buffa. The target is provincial mediocrity.

Act I. After a short prelude the chorus are rehearsing a new opera based on Metastasio.⁷ The conductor takes the Prima Donna through her aria, explaining that she will move the audience to feel 'pietà'. She and her husband Procolo look forward to the furor her trill will produce. The rest of the cast resent being asked to supply the pertichini, the small vocal entries that support the main feature. In her aria the Prima Donna rebukes a tyrant and warns him that heaven will avenge her suffering. The tyrant (played by the Musico, i.e. the castrato) yields to compassion, which occasions the equally conventional cabaletta expressing relief.

The rest of the cast plead with the conductor for larger roles. The Maestro passes their requests to the Poet, who is so evasive that they suspect the Prima Donna's influence. Publicly, everyone looks forward

¹ 'Garbato' would mean polite, so her surname may suggest she is not quite that. Piero Molli gives her name as Corilla Scorticini (from scorticare, to flay or scratch), Donizetti: 70 Melodrammi, 1988.

² Piero Molli (idem) gives his surname as Cornacchia, which must be derived from corno, horn.

³ His name means, literally, Demisemiquaver Bowel-Ripper.

⁴ Her surname means, literally, Cat-Castrator.

⁵ This is bound to be rude. Piero Molli gives his name as Neocle Frescopane, literally, 'Fresh bread'.

⁶ This is, probably, obscurely funny.

⁷ In his one-act farsa Donizetti used a scene from his own 'inane heroic opera Elvida, which would have been readily identifiable to the original audience because [it] had been heard at the San Carlo sixteen months earlier', William Ashbrook, Donizetti and his Operas, 1982.

to the important stage rehearsal; privately, several of the cast plan to be elsewhere. Donizetti builds up a magnificent ensemble: the cast's lyrical effusions soar above the librettist and conductor's pattering (and unrealistic) anticipation of bravos for their contribution. Their squabbling is interrupted by Mamm'Agata, played by a baritone en travesti. Threatening to beat them up if they don't show respect for her and for her daughter, the Seconda Donna, she dictates the musical effects she wants Luigia's rondo to contain ('Mascalzoni, sfaccendati'¹). Her cavatina is as funny as it is illuminating: the instrumental effects she prescribes are reproduced in the pit, more or less faithfully, such as muted violins going 'zinghete, zinghete', accompanied by an oboe going 'piripi', while the double bass's 'frunchete' go in thirds with the horn's 'tuturutu'.

When the Librettist reads out the playbill for the new opera, the singers insist on enlarging their credit lines. Mamm'Agata reminds the Prima Donna that she knew her when she sold cakes on the street. Her husband leaves in a huff. Mamm'Agata reminds the Librettist that he promised to write a duet for the Prima and the Seconda Donna. Daria refuses adamantly: she never sinks to the level of her inferiors. Her duet with Mamm'Agata, in which each insults the other, verges on slapstick: while the soprano navigates some delicious, aerial vocal lines, Mamm'Agata promises a pomegranate will be thrown from the auditorium ('Ch'io canti un duetto').

The Impresario returns with bad news: the Musico has fled. Mamm'Agata volunteers to replace him in the travesti role of Romolo, as long as her daughter can sing the duet with the Prima Donna. The Tenor returns and finds to his horror that he must sing a duet with Mamm'Agata. Faced with the score, she asks about the 'forest of houses and little boats' (i.e., quavers and semiquavers). In the trio Mamm'Agata sings out of tune. The Tenor refuses to sing with her. She flies into a rage, and threatens to have a fainting fit, but recovers in time to launch the stretta, attack the Tenor physically and tear up her score. Procolo happens to have learnt the Tenor's part and offers to sing the role, as long as his wife does not have to sing a duet with Luigia and he is given a box, eleven free tickets, portraits and sonnets in honour of his wife. Mamm'Agata returns, the singers' incompatible demands lead to an impasse, but this time it's the Impresario who walks out.

Luigia reads out a letter from the agent in Livorno and so launches the remarkable sextet: three separate lines reflect ironically on one another and occasion more quarrelling. The Impresario in Livorno offers Luigia a contract, as long as she tells her mother to go to hell; meanwhile, the Librettist reads the Conductor the new dialogue he has written (inevitably, it involves 'Vendetta') and Procolo reads out the devastating review of a new opera in Cremona. This becomes a larger and more animated ensemble when the Stage Director summons the cast to rehearse in the theatre. They refuse to leave, so soldiers intervene and carry them away in sedan chairs.

Act II. The stage, in chaos. The crowds outside have forced the management to make the rehearsal an open one. The Prima Donna feels tired and insists that the Seconda Donna sing first. In the event Mamm'Agata begins, with a Romanza that parodies Desdemona's 'Willow Song' from Rossini's Otello, featuring sardines, turnips and limpid broccoli. A very long ritornello with prominent bassoons is the only overt sign of humour, for the aria succeeds on its own terms (larghetto: 'Assisa a pie d'un sacco'). Describing herself as a timid débutante, Mamm'Agata rejects any criticism and goes to dress. The rehearsal moves on to the triumphal march for Procolo's entry. In a neat detail, the Poet teaches the Chorus their moves during its introduction. They salute Procolo as the 'Trionfator' of his 'Vendette'. Appalled by his performance, the Maestro hurries on to the Funeral March. Mamm'Agata overacts her role as sacrificial victim. The Impresario interrupts with the news that the Director has cancelled the performance, which launches the finale ('Ch'è successo?'). They all wonder how they can repay their creditors. At Procolo's suggestion, the entire cast agree to run away. This brings events to an exhilarating, aptly absurd climax. The opera ends on their unison 'Scappiamo!' (Let's clear off!).

P.

¹ The role was originally written (and is still occasionally sung) in the Neapolitan dialect, when Agata sang 'Lazzarune, scauzacane'.

ANNA BOLENA

Anne Boleyn

Opera in two acts, libretto by Felice Romani. Première, Teatro Carcano, Milan, 20 December 1830, with Giuditta Pasta, Rubini, Galli. First performed at la Scala, 1832, with Pasta (later Grisi), Deval and Negrini. London, King's Theatre, 1831, with Pasta, Rubini, Lablache; New York, 1843 (in French). Revived Covent Garden, 1847, with Giulia Grisi, Alboni, Mario, Tamburini; Drury Lane, London, 1871, with Tietjens; Bergamo, 1956 (after 113 years' absence from Italy) with Marina Cucchio; la Scala, 1957, with Callas, Simionato, Raimondi, Rossi-Lemeni, producer Luchino Visconti, conductor Gavazzeni; New York (in concert), 1957, with Gloria Davy, Simionato; Glyndebourne, 1965, with Gencer, Patricia Johnston, Oncina, Cava, conductor Gavazzeni; New York (in concert), 1967, with Suliotis, Horne and Domingo.

Enrico (Henry) VIII, *King of England*Bass

Anna Bolena (Anne Boleyn), *his second wife*Soprano

Giovanna (Jane) Seymour, *her lady-in-waiting*Soprano

Lord Rochefort, *Anne's brother*Bass

Lord Richard PercyTenor

Smeaton, *the Queen's page*Contralto

Hervey, *official at the court*Tenor

Courtiers, Officials, Lords, Huntsmen, Soldiers, etc.

Place: Windsor and London

Time: 1536

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Operatic legend once had it that in the autumn of 1830 – a year which saw the première in Paris of that source of the romantic movement, Victor Hugo's Hernani – both Bellini and Donizetti were working on operatic commissions from the impresario of the Teatro Carcano, Milan. Each composer had a libretto from the celebrated Felice Romani and each was determined to outdo the other. Like most legends, the facts are a little different; Donizetti's libretto for Anna Bolena was in his hands on 10 November (the composition was finished by 10 December), Bellini's for La Sonnambula only in December.

At the time of Donizetti's death, the critic of the Revue des Deux Mondes pointed to five of his operas as most likely to survive: Lucia, La Favorite, L'Elisir, Don Pasquale and Anna Bolena, and certainly the opera was in as high favour with the public as with prima donnas, who found a perfect vehicle for their gifts in Anne's 'Piangete voi?' and 'Al dolce guidami', a mad scene to vie with those from Sonnambula and Puritani, Lucia and Linda. In the 1950s, Anna Bolena was one of the most successful of the operas benefiting from the sovereign interpretative powers of Maria Callas.

It was with Callas in the title role and in a magnificent production by Visconti that the opera triumphed at la Scala in 1957, and it was in this role a year later that Callas returned to the Italian stage after the most resounding scandal of her career. She had inaugurated the 1957–58 season in Rome in Norma and, with the President of the Republic in the house, withdrew after the first act, at which point the performance came to an unscheduled end. The storm which broke about her head next day accused her among other things of insulting the Head of State, and quite ignored the fact that she was ill and had asked for a substitute but had mistakenly yielded to the pleas of the management to sing. She did not appear in Italy again until nearly four months later, at which time la Scala's Gala for the President was rather ostentatiously changed from the originally scheduled Anna Bolena with Callas to something less controversial. I was present when a few days later Anna Bolena had its seasonal première. The atmosphere in the house was full of nervous expectancy and not until the finale of Act I did the hostility abruptly change, but then it would have taken an even more partisan audience than la Scala's to ignore Callas's 'Giudici, ad Anna! Ad Anna! Giudici!', a less than Italianate reaction to operatic drama to resist her impassioned attack in the stretta and her ability at the repeat to cap the intensity of the first section. That hundreds of enthusiastic Milanese waited two hours at the stage door to escort the exhausted prima donna to supper at three in the morning seemed no more than a fitting ending to an evening that had begun with assassins lurking round every corner and had ended in triumph.

Act I. The great staircase at Windsor Castle. A crowd of courtiers discuss the King's growing love for Jane Seymour, who presently appears, troubled that the Queen should show such solicitude to one whom she does not recognise as her rival. To solemn music, the Queen enters, full of forebodings which are only increased by the sad little song with which her page Smeaton tries to beguile her mood. The Queen's slow cavatina ('Come, innocente giovane') is followed by a cabaletta, after which she and the Court withdraw. Jane Seymour gives voice to her anxiety, but the appearance of the King and his ardent wooing soon remove her doubts and the scene ends with a duet, in whose course the King reveals that he intends to expose the unfaithfulness of his wife and marry Jane.

Scene ii. A courtyard in the castle. The Queen's brother Rochefort is astonished to see Percy, whom the King has recalled from exile in the hope that he will provide the evidence against the Queen. Percy admits that the love he felt for Anne Boleyn as a girl is not dead (cavatina, 'Da quel dì che lei perduta'). When the King and Queen appear, Percy's hopes are encouraged by the Queen's obvious confusion. The scene ends with an impressive quintet ('Io sentii sulla mia mano'), during whose course the King instructs Hervey to watch Percy's behaviour with the Queen, Rochefort laments Percy's lack of discretion, and the courtiers are filled with apprehension at the new turn of events.

Scene iii.¹ In a corridor leading to the Queen's private apartments, Smeaton is gazing enraptured at a miniature of the Queen, which he kisses as he sings of his love for her ('Ah, pareo che per incanto'). He hides when the Queen comes into view with her brother, who is trying to persuade her to grant an audience to Percy. When Percy appears, the Queen remains adamant: she is a wife and a Queen and will not listen to his protestations. At the end of their duet, the Queen refuses to see him again and Percy draws his sword to kill himself, only for Smeaton to rush from his hiding place. The Queen faints as Rochefort runs to warn her that the King is on his way, and Henry arrives to catch her in what he purports to find a compromising situation: 'Tace ognuno è ognun tremante!' Smeaton's protestation of her innocence is rendered less credible by the discovery of the portrait he wears round his neck. The King condemns the conspirators to separate cells and orders the Queen to make her defence before the judges, not to him. 'Giudici, ad Anna' comes her despairing cry; 'Ah, segnata è la mia sorte' (My fate is sealed), she leads the stretta to what with a Callas can be extraordinary effect.

Act II. The Queen is in custody. In the first scene, her ladies-in-waiting try to comfort her as she waits for trial, but Hervey announces that the King has decided to deprive her of even their support. Jane Seymour comes to advise her to try to save her life with a plea of guilty, then confesses that she is the one the King has designated to take the Queen's place. In the course of a grandiose duet, Anne generously forgives her.

Scene ii. A vestibule before the Council Chamber. Hervey tells the assembled courtiers that Smeaton has confessed and implicated the Queen. The King passes through and the Queen proudly refutes the accusations which are about to be levelled at her, at the same time admitting that before becoming Queen she had loved Percy. The King's rage and determination to be revenged ('Ambo morrete'), Percy's ecstatic proclamation of his love, the Queen's regret that no hope now is left her, are combined in a noble trio, after whose stretta, as the Queen and Percy are led off by guards, Jane Seymour herself comes to intercede for the unfortunate Queen ('Per questa fiamma indomita'). Her plea avails nothing since Hervey comes to announce the Council's unanimous sentence of death on the Queen and her accomplices.

In the Tower of London lie the conspirators. When Hervey comes to convey the King's clemency to Percy and Rochefort, each indignantly refuses to live while the guiltless Queen must die. (This scene, which contains a beautiful lyrical aria for Percy, 'Vivi tu, te ne scongiuro', was omitted in la Scala's revival.)

The last scene is one of Donizetti's great masterpieces of melodic and dramatic inspiration. In the Tower of London the Queen waits for death. She has lost her senses and chides her ladies for weeping (in a fine prelude chorus) on her wedding day when the King awaits her. Her mood shifts from terror to joy and, when she thinks she sees Percy smile at her, she sings ecstatically 'Al dolce guidami', movingly preluded by cor anglais solo. Hervey comes to order the Queen and the three condemned with her to proceed to the scaffold, and Smeaton admits that the false confession he made, hoping to save his own life, has contributed to her downfall. Anne again loses her reason, orders Smeaton to tune his harp and sing to her, then intones a prayer ('Cielo, a miei lunghi spasimi')² while Smeaton, Percy and Rochefort join their voices to hers. The firing of a cannon and ringing of bells are heard acclaiming the new Queen, and the opera ends with an impassioned outburst of denunciation from Anne ('Coppia iniqua'). H.

¹ Now, often Act II.

² The tune is a decorated version of 'Home Sweet Home' (from Bishop's opera Clari, 1823), which enjoyed enormous popularity at the time.

L'ELISIR D'AMORE

The Elixir of Love

Opera in two acts, text by Felice Romani after Scribe's libretto for Auber's Le Philtre. Première at the Teatro della Canobbiana, Milan, 12 May 1832, with Sabina Heinefetter, Genero, Dabadie (who sang the equivalent role in Auber's opera the previous year), Frezzolini. First performed in London, Lyceum Theatre, 1836; New York, 1838; Metropolitan, New York, 1904, with Sembrich, Caruso, Scotti, Rossi, conductor Vigna; revived 1941, with Sayao, Landi, Valentino, Baccaloni, conductor Panizza. Covent Garden, 1950, with Carosio, Tagliavini, Gobbi, Tajo, conductor Capuana (during la Scala's visit); Glyndebourne, 1961, with Ratti, Alva, Sordello, Badioli, conductor Cillario. Famous Nemorinos of this century have also included Schipa, Gigli, di Stefano, and Pavarotti.

Nemorino, a young peasantTenor
 Adina, wealthy owner of a farm.....Soprano
 Belcore, a sergeant.....Baritone
 Dulcamara, a quack doctor.....Bass
 Giannetta, a peasant girl.....Soprano

Place: A Small Italian Village

Time: Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Romani derived his text – rather closely – from Scribe's for Le Philtre, but Donizetti's music was sufficiently beguiling to keep the opera in the repertory from the time of composition to the present day. Auber's opera appeared only a year before Donizetti's. The opera has always been liked – thirty-three performances in its first season in Milan – and the role of Nemorino one of the most popular with Italian tenors.

Act I. The entrance to Adina's farm. It is midday, the sun is hot and Giannetta and the harvesters are sheltering under a tree. Adina reads, watched by Nemorino, who loves her but laments, in a cavatina (the famous 'Quanto è bella'), the impossibility of someone so beautiful and so clever as Adina ever falling in love with a goose like himself. Suddenly, Adina bursts out laughing. It is the bizarre love story she is reading which has provoked her mirth: Tristan won Isolde, she explains, by means of a magic love potion that made him irresistible! 'If only I had such a recipe', sings Adina, as the others (including Nemorino, who is listening from the sidelines) urge her to continue the tale.

To the sound of a drum, in marches a detachment of soldiers, headed by Sergeant Belcore, who presents Adina with a posy of flowers and loses no time in proposing marriage. In a quartet, Belcore urges her rapid acceptance, Adina seems in no particular hurry, Nemorino pleads for courage from above, and Giannetta predicts that Adina is too shrewd to be so easily caught out.

Nemorino begs for a word and tries to tell Adina how desperately he loves her. She for her part says his efforts are in vain as she is as fickle as the wind ('Chiedi all'aura lusinghiera'), but Nemorino's response is to the effect that his feelings for her are as inevitable as the course of a river.

The village square. A trumpeter announces the arrival in a splendid carriage of a travelling quack doctor, Dulcamara, who, in a buffo cavatina, 'Udite, udite, o rustici', offers the crowd startlingly effective cures for anything from wrinkles to toothache. Nemorino plucks up courage to ask Dulcamara for Queen Isolde's love potion – an elixir of love, in effect, like the one he has heard Adina reading about from her book. He engages in attractive duet with Dulcamara ('Voglio dire') and manages to buy from him what he thinks is just the job, in point of fact a bottle of cheap Bordeaux. It should take effect within twenty-four hours, says Dulcamara, allowing himself plenty of time to leave town. Nemorino drains the flask at a draught, and becomes happily inebriated.

Adina, attracted by her shy swain's raucous singing and dancing, is astounded at his unaccustomed indifference to her. Belcore in contrast comes back to renew his offer of marriage which Adina promptly accepts, saying she will marry him within the week. Unfortunately, no sooner is this agreed than Belcore receives an order for him and his party to leave the village the next morning. Adina, stung to fury by Nemorino's apparently detached reaction, agrees to Belcore's request to bring the marriage forward to that very day. The news has a temporarily sobering effect on Nemorino, who begs Adina to wait just twenty-four hours. Adina reassures Belcore that this village lad is nothing more than an infatuated boy. Belcore threatens Nemorino and in a lively finale, Adina invites everyone to her wedding banquet and she and Belcore head off to the notary to make the arrangements, allowing time for a serious, lyrical intervention in Nemorino's 'Adina credimi'. Nemorino finds his store of Dutch courage running out and calls urgently for Dulcamara's help.

Act II. Inside Adina's farm. The wedding breakfast is in progress, even though Adina has not as yet signed the marriage contract. Rejoicing is general and Dulcamara produces a piece of music which he says is the latest thing from Venice. He and Adina sing the barcarolle, 'Io son ricco, e tu sei bella', a catchy number which tells how a girl rejects a senator's wealth in order to marry instead the young gondolier whom she truly loves.

The notary arrives, the opening chorus is repeated, and now Nemorino becomes desperate to secure Dulcamara's aid. Another dose of the elixir should help, advises Dulcamara, adding sotto voce that he'll be gone in half an hour. The only way Nemorino can find the money for another bottle, as he learns from Belcore in a lively duet, is to enlist in the Sergeant's regiment, which will earn him twenty scudi. Nemorino signs the paper, takes the money and rushes off to find Dulcamara.

The story takes another twist with Giannetta's news that Nemorino's uncle has died, leaving him a fortune. He knows nothing of all this but will become quite a catch as a husband. An ensemble develops as Nemorino comes back, Dutch courage bolstered by another draught of Bordeaux, and is immediately pounced on by Giannetta and the girls, which makes him believe that the potion is at last working. Adina comes in with Dulcamara, and both are astonished at Nemorino's new-found way with the girls. Adina makes an attempt to tell him that he has made a mistake in enlisting in Belcore's regiment but he is dragged away to dance.

In a duet, 'Quanto amore!', Dulcamara explains Nemorino's behaviour to Adina, and tells her about the elixir. He quickly twigs that she is herself in love with Nemorino and offers her a bottle, which she has the gumption to refuse, saying she needs nothing further by way of elixir than her eyes.

When they leave, Nemorino returns. He sings one of the great tenor arias of all opera, 'Una furtiva lagrima', whose tranquil introduction, dominated by a plaintive bassoon, suggests Nemorino's discovery: as she gazes enviously at the flirting village girls, there is a furtive tear in Adina's eye. She loves him after all!

In a most attractive aria ('Prendi, per me sei libero'), Adina tells Nemorino that she has bought him out of his contract with Belcore and then admits she loves him and will do so forever. The finale begins with the phlegmatic Belcore accepting that he is losing Adina. Dulcamara for his part tells the world that, thanks to his uncle, Nemorino is now a wealthy man, and that the elixir not only cures the lovesick but also makes them rich! He sells his remaining stock of cheap red wine to the eager villagers, hops into his carriage and rides away to a chorus of admiration and farewell.

H.

LUCREZIA BORGIA

Opera in a prologue and two acts, text by Felice Romani (after Victor Hugo's fictional account of the doings of this legendary heroine, who has been acquitted by modern research of much of what she was once accused). Première at la Scala, Milan, on 26 December 1833, with Méric-Lalande, M. Brambilla, Pedrazzi, Mariani; Her Majesty's Theatre, London, 1839, with Grisi, Ernesta Grisi, Mario, Tamburini; New York, 1844; Covent Garden, 1847, with Grisi, Alboni, Mario, Tamburini; Metropolitan, 1904, with de Macchi, Edyth Walker, Caruso, Scotti, conductor Vigna. Revived Colón, Buenos Aires, 1919, with Mazzoleni, Gigli; Florence, 1933, with Arangi-Lombardi, Pederzini, Gigli, Pasero, conductor Marinuzzi; la Scala, 1951, with Mancini, Pirazzini, Picchi, Rossi-Lemeni, conductor Capuana. Teresa Tietjens in the last century, Montserrat Caballé and Leyla Gencer in the 1960s and Beverly Sills and Joan Sutherland in the 1970s have been five of the most famous exponents of the title role.

| | |
|---|-----------|
| Alfonso d'Este, Duke of Ferrara | Baritone |
| Lucrezia Borgia..... | Soprano |
| Maffio Orsini | Contralto |
| Young noblemen | |
| Gennaro..... | Tenor |
| Liverotto | Tenor |
| Vitellozzo | Bass |
| Gazella | Bass |
| Rustighello, in the service of Don Alfonso | Tenor |
| Gubetta, in the service of Lucrezia | Bass |
| Astolfo, in the service of Lucrezia | Bass |
| Gentlemen-at-Arms, Officers, Nobles and Ladies of the Venetian Republic and the Este Court | |

Place: Venice and Ferrara

Time: Early Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

After the opera was first given in Paris in 1840, Victor Hugo, on the grounds that the French translation (not the whole work) infringed his copyright, successfully sued for plagiarism, and the opera was not quite so quick as some others by Donizetti to make its way in Italy. Nonetheless, it is one of the more successful of his serious works and the title role remains a magnet for a soprano of an appropriate type.

Prologue. Gennaro, unbeknown to him, is the son of the infamous Lucrezia Borgia. When the opera opens, he is in Venice celebrating carnival with his friends, who include Maffio Orsini. Gennaro falls asleep and is discovered by Lucrezia, who sings of her love for the young man ('Com'è bello! quale incanto'). The aria is in Donizetti's grandest vein, and Gennaro wakes and appears to return her love. 'Di pescatore ignobile' he sings, describing (quite untruthfully) his humble origin as the supposed son of a fisherman. Gennaro's companions return, recognise Lucrezia and one by one denounce her as the murderer of their relations. Gennaro, who had no idea of the identity of the woman with whom he was falling in love, is horror-stricken.

Act I. A public place in Ferrara. Duke Alfonso, Lucrezia's fourth husband, has identified Gennaro as Lucrezia's lover and vents his fury in a full-scale aria ('Vieni, la mia vendetta'). Gennaro and his friends arrive in the square, see the letters BORGIA under the escutcheon of the palace, and Gennaro, to show his detestation of Lucrezia's crimes, with his sword hacks away the first letter of the name, leaving only ORGIA. On command of the Duke, he is arrested. Not knowing who has committed the outrage, Lucrezia demands that its perpetrator be put to death. Alfonso consents, but when Gennaro is led in, Lucrezia recognises him and pleads for his life. Alfonso remains firm, even when Lucrezia reminds him that he is her fourth husband and may yet share the fate of the other three. His rejoinder is to insist that Gennaro meet death by drinking a goblet of poisoned wine handed to him by Lucrezia herself. In the course of an ensemble, the Duke pours poison into Gennaro's cup unaware that Lucrezia has an antidote which, when he has left, she gives to Gennaro with the injunction to flee from Ferrara.

Act II. At a ball in Princess Negroni's palace in Ferrara, Maffio, who has sworn eternal faith with Gennaro, sings the most famous number of the opera, 'Il segreto per esser felici', a ballata which has proved to the taste of mezzo-sopranos since the opera's first performance. Sinister voices are heard from next door and Lucrezia appears to announce that, in revenge for their insults, she has poisoned all the guests at the banquet. She is horrified to find Gennaro of the company but he refuses the antidote she offers him, even though she tells him she is his mother and pleads with him ('M'odi, ah m'odi') in an aria which is one of the most impressive passages of the score. He dies in her arms. H.

MARIA STUARDA

Mary Stuart

Opera in three acts, text by Giuseppe Bardari. First performed under the name of Buondelmonte at the Teatro San Carlo, Naples, 18 October 1834, with Ronzi de Begnis. Produced under its original title but with alterations at la Scala, Milan, 30 December 1835, with Maria Malibran. Revived Bergamo, 1958, with Renata Heredia Capnist; Stuttgart, 1958, with Maria Kouba, Grace Hoffman; London, St Pancras Festival, 1966; Florence Festival, 1967, with Leyla Gencer, Shirley Verrett, Franco Tagliavini, conductor Francesco Molinari-Pradelli (Edinburgh Festival, 1969, with the same cast); Barcelona, 1968, with Montserrat Caballé. Rome, 1970, with Caballé; la Scala, 1971, with Caballé, Verrett; London (concert), 1971, with Caballé, Verrett; San Francisco, 1971, with Sutherland; New York, City Opera, 1972, with Sills, Tinsley, conductor Rudel; London Coliseum, 1973, with Janet Baker, Tinsley, Erwen, Garrard, conductor Mackerras.

Elisabetta (Elizabeth), Queen of EnglandSoprano
 Maria Stuarda (Mary, Queen of Scots)Soprano
 Anna (Hannah Kennedy).....Mezzo-Soprano
 Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester.....Tenor
 Talbot (Earl of Shrewsbury)Baritone
 Cecil (Lord Burleigh)Bass
 A Herald.....Bass

Place: The Palace of Westminster, London;

Fotheringay Castle, Northamptonshire

Time: 1567

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

Maria Stuarda's early history is stormy, involving censorship troubles in Naples and a first night with a new libretto under the title of Buondelmonte; rivalry between prima donnas ending in fisticuffs on the stage; and a rehabilitation in Milan for which Malibran (in the title role) was wretchedly out of voice but refused to give up the part because of the fees involved.

At the start of the opera Mary, Queen of Scots, has fled from Scotland and been imprisoned in Fotheringay Castle by her cousin, Elizabeth, Queen of England. We do not meet her until Act II of Donizetti's opera, which is modelled on Schiller's play and includes the famous scene of the encounter between the two Queens, a dramatically effective falsification of history on Schiller's part.

Act I. In the Palace of Westminster, courtiers await with some excitement the arrival of Queen Elizabeth, rumoured to be about to unite by marriage the thrones of England and France. The Queen, however, has inclinations towards another and less exalted man, as she reveals in her graceful cavatina 'Ah, quando all'ara scorgemi'. The court and Talbot urge clemency in her dealings with her cousin Mary Stuart, Cecil reminds her of the untrustworthiness of her rival, while the Queen remains firm in her path of indecisiveness. When Leicester enters, she appoints him her ambassador to France, notices his reluctance to accept, raises suspicions in the minds of the bystanders that this may be the man whom she secretly loves, and leaves the stage.

Talbot reveals to Leicester that he has been to Fotheringay and that Mary Stuart (referred to throughout the opera indiscriminately as 'Maria' and 'Stuarda') has asked by letter for Leicester's help in her predicament. Leicester, impressed again by the beauty of her portrait ('Ah, rimiro il bel sembiante') and the poignancy of her situation, longs to free her but promises Talbot not further to jeopardise her safety by any impetuous action. When the Queen returns and demands to see the letter he is holding, she realises from it that Mary has at one time or another had designs both on the throne which she herself occupies and the man whom she at present favours. In the course of their duet, Leicester pleads successfully that the Queen agree to visit Mary in prison at Fotheringay ('Era d'amor l'immagine', and 'Sul crin la rivale').

Act II. In the Park at Fotheringay, Mary recalls with her companion Hannah the soft, far-off days of her happy life at the French court ('Oh nube! che lieve per l'aria ti aggiri'). Her reminiscences turn to agitation at the approach of the Queen's hunting party and the prospect of the meeting which she has yearned for and now dreads. Leicester is first on the scene, to counsel her to adopt a submissive attitude towards Elizabeth, to swear himself to exact vengeance if the Queen remain obdurate, and, at the end of their duet, to ask for Mary's hand in marriage.

When Elizabeth appears, she brings with her an atmosphere of suspicion (egged on by Cecil), mistrust (because of her doubts of Leicester's motives), and apprehension (because she and her imprisoned cousin are to meet face to face for the first time). The confrontation is preceded by one of those moments of frozen drama that are peculiar to opera, a sextet in the composer's best vein, which opens with Elizabeth's reaction to her first sight of Mary: 'E sempre la stessa, superba, orgogliosa' (Unchanged she remains, proud and haughty). Mary forces herself to kneel before her cousin and beg for forgiveness, only to hear herself accused of treachery and in effect of murdering her husband, Darnley. In furious reaction, she insults the Queen, addressing her as 'Figlia impura di Bolena' and 'bastarda'. Her cause is all too evidently lost as the Queen summons the guards, and the act ends with Elizabeth in impassioned tones condemning her rival and cousin to death.

Act III. The first scene plays at the Palace of Westminster, where Queen Elizabeth waits to sign the death warrant ('Quella vita a me funesta'). The appearance of Leicester, whom she suspects of an amorous involvement with her cousin, and the persistent promptings of Cecil combine to resolve her doubts and she signs, to start a fine trio of mutual recrimination, during whose course she orders Leicester to witness the execution.

At Fotheringay, Mary hears of the sentence from Cecil and is offered and refuses the services of an Anglican priest. There follows the great scene of the confession by the loyal Talbot, which, with its linked chain of expressive melodic sections, seems to look forward to Verdi and the series of similarly constructed scenes, such as Gilda's with Rigoletto in the first act of Rigoletto and Leonora's with Padre Guardiano in the second of Forza. Mary at one moment seems to see, and we and Talbot through Donizetti's trombones to perceive, the ghost of her second husband, Henry Darnley, whom the librettist makes her refer to as Arrigo ('Delle mie colpe lo squallido fantasma'). She poignantly remembers the murdered Rizzio, but, as she clears her conscience ('Quando di luce rosea'), denies all complicity in her husband's death, which she claims was the direct result of Elizabeth's jealousy of their mutual love. Schiller's play leaves this issue unresolved, but there is no doubt that Donizetti's music demands that, though she admits to complicity in the Babington plot, Mary be judged innocent of murder.

In a room next to the scene of the impending execution, Mary's supporters protest what they think of as a crime against an innocent woman. Hannah tries to stop them disturbing the last hours of her mistress, who enters, sees them for the first time since her condemnation and prays calmly and movingly to God ('Deh! tu di un umile preghiera'). We hear the first of the three cannon shots which are to announce the moment of the execution, and Cecil brings the Queen's offer of a last wish. Mary asks that Hannah may go with her to the steps of the scaffold. She continues in a mood approaching resignation ('Di un cor che more') until the appearance of the distraught Leicester and the sound of the second cannon shot precipitate a last protest of innocence ('Ah, se un giorno da queste ritorte'). The third cannon shot sounds and Mary walks upright and dignified to her death. H.

LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR

Lucy of Lammermoor

Opera in three acts, text by Salvatore Cammarano after Sir Walter Scott's novel. Première at Teatro San Carlo, Naples, 26 September 1835, with Persiani, Duprez, Coselli. Her Majesty's, 1838; New Orleans, 1841; New York, 1843; Metropolitan, New York, 1883, with Sembrich, Campanini, Kaschmann. Revived Covent Garden, 1925, with Toti dal Monte, Dino Borgioli; 1959, with Sutherland, conductor Serafin; la Scala, Milan, 1923, with dal Monte, Pertile, Stracciari, Pinza, conductor Toscanini; 1936, with dal Monte, Schipa; 1938, with Pagliughi, Gigli, conductor Marinuzzi; 1947, with Pagliughi, Gigli, conductor Panizza; 1954, with Callas, di Stefano, Panerai, under Karajan. Other celebrated Lucias have been Lucca, Patti, Gerster, Melba, Tetrizzini, Galli-Curci, Barrientos, Pacini, Pareto, Scotto.

Enrico (Lord Henry Ashton) of Lammermoor...Baritone
 Lucia (Lucy), *his sister*Soprano
 Edgardo (Edgar), Master of Ravenswood.....Tenor
 Arturo (Lord Arthur Bucklaw).....Tenor
 Raimondo (Raymond), chaplain at Lammermoor..Bass
 Alisa (Alice), *companion to Lucia*Mezzo-Soprano
 Normanno (Norman), follower of Ashton.....Tenor Relatives, Retainers, Friends of the House of Lammermoor

Place: Scotland

Time: c. 1700

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

Lord Enrico Ashton, in order to retrieve his fallen fortunes and extricate himself from a political position endangered by his former opposition to the King, has unbeknown to her arranged a marriage between his sister Lucia and Lord Arturo Bucklaw. He for his part has only just become aware of an attachment which has grown up between Lucia and their neighbour Edgardo of Ravenswood, whose family and the Ashtons are sworn enemies.

Act I. A wood near Lammermoor. On suspicion that Edgardo has been seen lurking near the castle, retainers beat the bounds but to Ashton's fury find nothing. He inveighs against Edgardo (aria: 'Cruda, funesta smania').

A fountain in the park. Atmospherically introduced by the harp, Lucia, who has an assignation with Edgardo, in the first of two graceful solos tells Alisa the legend of the fountain: 'Regnava nel silenzio'. Here an ancestress of hers was stabbed to death by her lover and has reappeared as a ghost, which the impressionable Lucia believes she has seen. Alisa begs Lucia to give up Edgardo, but she affirms he is the light of her life: 'Quando, rapita in estasi'. Edgardo comes to tell Lucia he leaves in the morning for a mission abroad but wants to make peace with his traditional enemies – the Ashtons have apparently in the past usurped his family's inheritance. Lucia warns him that her brother still breathes fire and slaughter at mention of his name and the duet proper ('Sulla tomba') starts with his fiery reiteration of his hatred for her family. Lucia is melting and conciliatory and eventually, as he puts a ring on her finger, Edgardo sings of his feelings of ardent love. Their voices join in an expression of tenderness ('Verranno a te sull'aure'), the only time in this opera of deception and madness when there is room for such sentiments.

Act II. Ashton's apartment. Ashton has decided that nothing but a politically correct marriage on Lucia's part will save his fortunes and he tells her Lord Arturo Bucklaw will shortly arrive for their betrothal ceremony. He has not only intercepted and destroyed letters from Edgardo but now shows her a forgery purporting to prove Edgardo's unfaithfulness. Already the music suggests Lucia's mental instability and during the long scene with her brother, he rages at her daring to oppose his wishes and she dissolves into another, less real world ('Soffriva nel pianto, languia nel dolore'). Ashton remains adamant.

Though she now believes herself betrayed by Edgardo and is moved that only she can save her brother from a traitor's death, Lucia will not take the fatal step without the family chaplain's advice. He advises her unequivocally to accept her brother's plans (this scene is sometimes omitted).

Lucia di Lammermoor (Covent Garden, 1959, director/designer Franco Zeffirelli). Lucia (Joan Sutherland) descends the stairs, having murdered her husband. Sutherland became famous almost overnight for her performance, particularly her singing of the celebrated mad scene.

A hall in the castle of Lammermoor. Guests rejoice, Arturo makes his entrance, Lucia is led in like a sacrificial lamb, and the wedding contract is signed. It is the moment for Edgardo's grand gesture, as he returns from his foreign duties to find what he thought was his prospective bride about to be affianced to another. The great sextet begins ('Chi mi frena in tal momento?') and builds as Lucia's and the other voices are added to create an edifice of sound from the tensions of the antagonists. Before the act ends with a stretta the chaplain adjures all to return swords to scabbards. Edgardo curses the day he fell in love with Lucia.

Act III. Edgardo's castle. Edgardo is alone when Ashton comes to challenge him in an extended and impressive duet (the scene is often – wrongly – omitted to bring the opera more swiftly to its climax, and indeed the heroine to hers).

The great hall of Lammermoor Castle. The chaplain interrupts the wedding celebrations with news of disaster. Lucia, her mind unhinged by the sequence of events, has, on her wedding night, killed her husband. She appears, pale and with a dagger in hand, and there follows the Mad Scene. In her hallucination Lucia, heralded by the flute, believes she and Edgardo are to be married. She is now reminded of past happiness – the love duet; now spurred to fear by memory of the ghost at the fountain; now involved in the marriage itself ('Ardon gli incensi'). The aria traditionally finishes with a huge cadenza with the voice vying for brilliant effect with a flute; though Donizetti originally allowed for a cadenza, this was elaborated starting in the mid-nineteenth century until it grew to its present proportions, indeed in many ways to dominate the opera. On the other hand, it must be said that the effect of the duet for soprano and flute is so full of virtuosity and so well known that to abandon it would demand a conductor of strong conviction and a soprano of monumental complacency. The expressive lyricism of the aria proper is set off by the grand scale of the cabaletta ('Spargi d'amaro pianto').

Finale. The Ravenswood cemetery. Edgardo still believes Lucia has betrayed him and longs for death. His recitative ('Tombe degli avi miei'), and aria ('Fra poco a me ricovero'), as if to balance Lucia's great scene, are on the grandest scale, and the finale of the opera, as a procession leaves Lammermoor and approaches Ravenswood, is no less impressive. The chaplain announces Lucia's death, Edgardo sings despairingly of his lost love ('Tu che a dio spiegasti l'ali') and stabs himself.

Once regarded as the epitome of early nineteenth-century romantic opera, Lucia deteriorated into little more than a vehicle for a brilliant high soprano until the advent of Maria Callas in mid-twentieth century freed the opera from the light sopranos whose exclusive property it seemed to have become. No longer was attention focused almost exclusively on the Mad Scene and Lucia was once again seen as a work of real musical subtlety and genuine dramatic skill, indeed a highlight of pre-Verdian Italian opera. It requires a tenor on as high a level as the soprano and its wealth of dramatic music makes it just as likely to appeal to audiences used to modern music theatre as to canary-fanciers anxious to compare the newest soprano sensation with their recordings. H.

IL CAMPANELLO

The Doorbell

Opera in one act, text by the composer. Première 1 June 1836, with Amalia Schütz, Giorgio Ronconi, Raffaele Casacci.

Serafina, *a young bride*Soprano
 Don Annibale di Pistacchio, an apothecary,
her husbandBass
 Spiridione, Don Annibale's servant.....Tenor
 Madama Rosa, *Serafina's aunt*Mezzo-Soprano
 Enrico, Serafina's cousin.....Baritone

Place: Naples

Time: The 1830s

Running Time: 55 minutes

After the traumatic events of late 1835 – the death of his father coincided with the difficult rehearsals in Milan of Maria Stuarda, with Malibran in the title role – Donizetti was delighted to be offered a French vaudeville, which he proceeded himself to translate and adapt as Il Campanello, one of the not so common one-act comedies with which he punctuated the full-length melodramas in which he specialised. It was successful from the start.

The story (it amounts to little more than a sketch) revolves round the marriage of a young wife to an older man which, unlike the much more substantial Don Pasquale, is neither a fake nor, it would appear, does the bride's younger suitor win her in the end.

Don Annibale di Pistacchio, a village apothecary who is a stickler for the rules, has just been married to Serafina and the chorus celebrates in style. Annibale himself, not without smugness, rejoices in his new condition until Spiridione announces the arrival of none other than Enrico, Serafina's cousin, whom he greatly dislikes. It is not long before Serafina herself puts in an appearance, dancing a galop with Don Annibale's bête noire. In an extended duet, Enrico remonstrates with her for having married and left him desolate. There is some tenderness in her insistence that he is himself nothing but a ladies' man, but Donizetti skilfully avoids eliciting sympathy for Enrico by giving him no romantic music.

Don Annibale interrupts, but Enrico tries to gain a point by describing a ludicrous scenario of which he is the hero, until midnight sounds and, even though Enrico encourages a dispensation of wine all round, he is sent packing.

Enrico will see to it that Don Annibale's wedding night does not go uninterrupted. Spiridione's offer to dispense drugs for him elicits from the chemist an insistence on keeping to the rules which lay down that he must do so himself. First comes a Frenchman, cross-eyed with hangover and requiring from the apothecary a bottle of champagne. As he leaves, he manages to blow the candle out and rearrange crucial bits of furniture, so that Annibale knocks over his best china. Next, an opera singer rings the bell to say that his début is at hand and he has lost his voice serenading a girl. The cure is either to marry her or forget her, says the chemist. But what about my début, asks the singer? He gets some pills and tries out his voice in a virtuoso display.

When he has gone, Don Annibale finds in his keyhole a hostile note – probably from Enrico, helpfully suggests Spiridione. Next, the bell is rung by an old man with a prescription to be made up. He reels off his friend's symptoms, then suggests a list of nonsense ingredients he maintains the prescription contains. As he leaves, Spiridione returns and by mistake in the dark grabs Don Annibale.

Enrico bounces in to announce the imminent departure of the stage coach Don Annibale must catch the morning after his wedding night, and Serafina leads a grandly romantic start to the Finale. For all the mockery and horseplay, Annibale's marriage, as he departs with his baggage, seems intact and Enrico has not won the girl. H.

L'ASSEDIO DI CALAIS

The Siege of Calais

Opera in three acts, libretto by Salvatore Cammarano. Première at San Carlo, Naples, 19 November 1836, with Paul Barroilhet, Almareinda Manzocchi, Caterina Barilli-Patti. Barilli was the mother of Adelina Patti.

Eustachio de Saint-Pierre, *Mayor of Calais*Baritone

Aurelio, *his son*Mezzo-Soprano

Eleonora, *Aurelio's wife*Soprano

Burghers of Calais

Giovanni d'AireTenor

Jacomo de WisantsTenor

Pietro de Wisants.....Baritone

ArmandoBass

Eduardo (Edward) III, *King of England*Baritone

Isabella, *Queen of England*¹Soprano

Edmundo, *English general*Tenor

An English SpyBass

Place: Inside and Outside Besieged Calais

Time: 1347

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

The opera starts with a scene in which Aurelio lets himself down from the battlements in order to steal some loaves for his starving family. He ties them to the rope, is discovered but escapes.

Inside the besieged city, Eustachio rapidly establishes himself as a powerful figure, as he sings nobly and with resignation of the city's plight – commentators have compared him as a figure to Simon Boccanegra. In a duet with Eleonora, his daughter-in-law, he mourns the loss of his son then celebrates the news of Aurelio's safety. Aurelio is a virtuoso musico (trouser role) typical of the period and his aria expresses his joy at seeing his family again.

There is little optimism within Calais but a bold face is put on the situation, starting when a stranger^{*} makes his appearance to stir popular feeling against Eustachio, who is the sole impediment, he maintains, between them and a reasonable peace with the English. The finale is dominated by the resolute figure of Eustachio who loses no time in unmasking the stranger as an English spy, and the act comes to an energetic conclusion.

¹ Historically incorrect: Isabella was Edward III's mother, his wife was Philippa of Hainault.

Act II. Eleonora and Aurelio pray for Calais and Aurelio reveals a sinister dream he has had in which his son is murdered. The duet is on a grand scale and full of attractive invention.

The citizens are in despair as Edmundo, an English general, comes to lay down the conditions under which the English King will accept the city's surrender. Failing this his army, reinforced by the English army which has conquered the Scots, will renew its attack on Calais and destroy the city. Six nobly born citizens must present themselves ready for death in expiation of the crime, as King Edward sees it, of the city having resisted him. Reaction to the demand is one of devastation but Aurelio leads a moment of spirited defiance. Eustachio reluctantly agrees to the harsh conditions. Before the sun sets, he says, six burghers will be brought to the English camp.

Edmundo leaves and Eustachio explains that death may to a soldier seem preferable; for the women and children to fall into enemy hands would be little short of disaster. He himself is the first volunteer and five others follow suit including, to Eustachio's great distress, his son Aurelio. The act ends with a great ensemble of lamentation.

Act III. The English encampment. King Edward receives news that his demands will be met and rejoices in an aria less warlike in character than one might have expected from the ferocity of his earlier sentiments. He greets his Queen at the head of her victorious army and assures her Calais will soon be his. A military show and dance in her honour precede the arrival of hostages (Donizetti appears to have provided only two out of the four ballet movements, and his letters after the première suggest he was dissatisfied with the undramatic effect made by Act III, particularly its opening scene).

With the appearance of the hostages, the mood changes to one of universal gloom. Edward appears adamant, Eustachio is dignity personified as he leads an ensemble of resignation, Aurelio bids farewell to his wife and child, but finally Edward's Queen pleads successfully with her husband, who relents amid general rejoicing and pardons the hostages. H.

ROBERTO DEVEREUX

Robert Devereux

Opera in three acts, libretto by Salvatore Cammarano after Ancelot's Elisabeth d'Angleterre. Première, Naples, 29 October 1837, with Giuseppina Ronzi de Begnis. First performed in Venice in 1838 with Carolina Ungher and Moriani; Paris, 1838, with Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini; la Scala, 1839; London, 1841, with Grisi and Rubini; New York, 1849. After 1882, when it was given in Pavia, there is no record of performance until it was revived in 1964 at the San Carlo, Naples, with Leyla Gencer. Revived in concert form, 1965, Carnegie Hall, New York, with Montserrat Caballé; Barcelona, 1968, with Caballé; Bonn, 1969; London (in concert), 1970, with Caballé; New York City Opera, 1970, with Sills, Domingo.

Elisabetta (Elizabeth), *Queen of England*Soprano
 Duke of Nottingham.....Baritone
 Sarah, *Duchess of Nottingham*Mezzo-Soprano
 Roberto (Robert Devereux), *Earl of Essex*Tenor
 Lord Cecil.....Tenor
 Sir Walter RaleighBass
 A Page.....Bass
 Nottingham's ServantBass

Ladies of the Court, Courtiers, Pages, Guards, Nottingham's Attendants

Place: England

Time: 1598

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Roberto Devereux is the fifty-seventh of Donizetti's seventy operas, and it was written only nineteen years after his first, under circumstances about as unpropitious as can be imagined. In 1836, he lost his father and his mother within a few weeks of each other and his wife died in July 1837. Roberto Devereux was commissioned for Naples, which city, while he was struggling to complete the opera, was in the grip of a disastrous cholera epidemic. The opera was nonetheless a success at its première, though it was not long before Donizetti was speaking of a jinx on the work, both the baritone and the prima donna falling ill during the first run of performances and the opera being performed elsewhere in a pirated edition, a disaster more from the point of view of his pocket than his pride.

The overture, written for the Paris première, includes anachronistically a woodwind variant of God Save the Queen.

The opera has only a slender basis in historical fact, but it is convenient to place it in 1598, the year of Essex's rebellion and execution. As a background to the story it is important to know only that Essex is back from his unsuccessful military mission to Ireland and is about to stand trial. Sarah, Duchess of Nottingham, pines with love for Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, and cannot hide her tears from the other ladies of the court as she reads the story of fair Rosamond (the heroine incidentally of Donizetti's opera Rosamunda d'Inghilterra): 'All'afflitto è dolce il pianto'. The Queen enters and reveals to Sarah that she has consented to see Essex, without whom her life has no meaning, and whom she suspects not of the treason of which he is accused but of infidelity to her: 'L'amor suo mi fe' beata'. Cecil comes to demand the Queen's approval of his Peers' judgement on Essex, but she asks for further proof of treason and says she will see him, her cabaletta revealing her unabated feelings for her subject.

Essex proclaims his fidelity to his Sovereign but, in the course of a grandiose scena during which she refers to the ring she once gave him and which he has only to produce for her to guarantee his safety, so far forgets himself as to fancy for a moment that the Queen knows of his secret passion for Sarah. No amount of protestation can allay the suspicion he has created and the unhappy Essex is left alone to lament the turn fate has taken against him. His friend Nottingham, come to assure him of his support in the Council, reveals in a cavatina ('Forse in quel cor sensibile') that his wife Sarah, a prey to grief and weeping, has even aroused his own jealous suspicions. Cecil summons Nottingham to the Council and he goes reiterating his devotion to Essex.

Scene ii. To Sarah's apartments in Nottingham House, Essex comes to upbraid her that she married another. She pleads that her father's sudden death while Essex was abroad precipitated her into a loveless marriage and urges him to turn towards the Queen. Protesting that his heart is dead to love, he tears the Queen's ring from his finger and throws it on the table. In the course of their duet, Sarah gives him a blue scarf she has embroidered and he swears to wear it near his heart.

Act II. The Hall at the Palace of Westminster (as Act I, scene i). Lords and Ladies of the court brood on Essex's likely fate; without the Queen's aid, he is lost – and her present mood suggests this will not be forthcoming. Cecil enters to tell the Queen that the Council, in spite of Nottingham's defence of his friend, has brought in a sentence of death, which now awaits only her approval. Cecil leaves and Raleigh comes to tell Elizabeth that when Essex was arrested and searched a silk scarf was found next to his heart. No sooner has the Queen recognised it as the Duchess of Nottingham's than Nottingham himself comes in to plead in a duet for Essex's life. Essex himself is brought in under guard, and the Queen confronts him with the scarf, proof that he lied to her once when he denied being in love. Nottingham, too, recognises his wife's scarf and calls down the vengeance of Heaven on his faithless friend. The trio ('Un perfido, un vile, un mentitore tu sei') runs the gamut of emotions of the betrayed friend, the discovered and anxious lover, and above all the scorned woman before, with the summoning of the courtiers, it becomes a finale in which all voices join for their different reasons in condemning Essex's treachery.

Act III. Sarah Nottingham's apartments. She receives news of Essex's condemnation, plans immediately to take the ring Essex has left with her to the Queen in token of his plea for mercy, only to look up into the unforgiving eyes of her husband. In the course of their duet, he denounces Essex and, when sounds of a procession taking the condemned man to prison are heard in the distance, makes clear his intention of preventing her conveying the ring to the Queen.

The scene changes to the Tower of London, where Essex waits for news of the pardon which he believes will certainly follow delivery of the ring to the Queen. He pictures offering himself to the sword of Nottingham and with his dying breath assuring his friend that Sarah has remained chaste in spite of all temptation ('Come uno spirito angelico'). But the anticipated pardon does not arrive, rather are heard the sounds of the guard approaching to take him to his death. In spite of the urgency of the situation, it is not hard to see in Donizetti's reaction to it, both in march and cabaletta, the sort of operatic cliché on which Sullivan in his comic operas seized with such relish.

The last scene shows the Queen in the Great Hall surrounded by her ladies and anxiously awaiting the arrival of the trusted Sarah to comfort her, as well as a sight of the ring which she believes Essex will send her (she does not of course connect the two events). Her beautiful aria ('Vivi ingrato') shows a forgiving side to her nature not before revealed in the opera, but the sight of the distraught Sarah bringing the ring, and her immediate recognition of a hated rival, does not sway her from her purpose. She orders a stay of execution at the very moment when a cannon shot is heard giving the signal to the headsman. The Queen turns in misery to blame Sarah until Nottingham himself reveals his guilt in preventing the ring reaching the Queen. The opera ends as Elizabeth, beside herself with grief, sees visions of the Crown bathed in blood, of a man running through the palace corridors carrying his own head, of a tomb opening for her where once stood her throne. It is rare among cabalettas in being marked maestoso for most of its course, and only in the last few seconds is it superseded by the more conventional allegro. H.

POLIUTO

Tragedia lirica in three acts, libretto by Salvatore Cammarano, based on Pierre Corneille's Polyeucte (1641–42). Banned in rehearsal in 1838 by the King of Naples because of its Christian subject (St Polyeuctus d. A.D. 259). First performed in a four-act French version by Scribe as Les martyrs, Opéra, Paris, 1840. Teatro San Carlo, Naples, 1848. First U.S. performance New Orleans, 1846. First U.K. performance Covent Garden, London, 1852. Often staged for great tenors, such as Tamberlik, Tamagno, Gigli, Corelli (opposite Callas at la Scala in 1960). Revived Vienna, 1986, for Carreras; Rome, 1989, with Nicola Martinucci, Elizabeth Connell, Renato Bruson, conducted by Jan Latham-Koenig.

Poliuto, *Roman convert to Christianity*Tenor
 Paolina, *his wife*Soprano
 Severo, *Roman proconsul*Baritone
 Felice, *Paolina's father, governor of Armenia*Tenor Callistene, *high priest of Jupiter*Bass
 Nearco, *a Christian, Poliuto's friend*Tenor
 A ChristianTenor

Place: Armenia

Time: c. A.D. 259

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Donizetti wrote Poliuto for Naples, but he always intended it for export. Its religious, spectacular element was directly inspired by Halévy's La Juive, which he had admired in an awesome staging at the Opéra in 1835, while he was directing Marino Faliero at the rather less prestigious Théâtre des Italiens. From the very beginning, when timpani rolls introduce an extraordinary passage for four bassoons, Poliuto was intended to make its mark. Donizetti wrote the title role for Adolphe Nourrit, the most important French tenor of the day, who had created leading roles for Rossini and Meyerbeer, but felt threatened by the arrival of Gilbert Duprez. Nourrit came to Italy to study with Donizetti and make his Neapolitan début as Poliuto. Discouraged by the opera's cancellation and by continuing vocal problems, he committed suicide on 8 March 1839.

Act I. 'The Baptism'. A gloomy cave. Christians have assembled in secret to witness the baptism of Poliuto. Urging discretion on one another, they also anticipate martyrdom for their faith. Poliuto confesses to his friend Nearco that he suspects his beloved Paolina is unfaithful to him with Callistene, the high priest of Jupiter. She knows nothing of his conversion to Christianity. Poliuto prays that God will make him worthy of his new faith ('D'un'alma troppo fervida'). Paolina appears, to an elaborate clarinet solo over pizzicato strings. She has followed her husband, suspecting that he has joined the prohibited sect. Nearco confirms her suspicions but begs her to keep the secret since, as he reminds her, a recent law condemns neophytes to death. She hears the Christians praying for their enemies, and is deeply moved and impressed. Poliuto confirms his wife's fears. In the distance military music announces the arrival of the new Roman proconsul, Severo, whose death in battle had been prematurely reported. Paolina had previously been in love with Severo. She is delighted at the news of his return, but represses her feelings – her F major music seems unrestrainedly jolly, however (cabaletta, 'Perchè di stolto giubilo').

In a magnificent piazza the people salute Severo. The proconsul declares that he has been sent to Armenia by the Emperor to root out the Christians' rebellious cult. Privately, he looks forward with joy and trepidation to seeing Paolina, whom he adores, in a cavatina that is a gift to a sensitive baritone ('Di tua beltade immagine'). Felice, Paolina's father, tells him that she has been married to Poliuto. Severo now wishes he had died in battle ('No, l'acciar non fu spietato').

Act II. 'The Neophyte'. A hall in Felice's house. Callistene tells Severo that Paolina's father forced her to become engaged to Poliuto. Severo declares his love for Paolina, while she tries in vain to conceal her feelings (duet, 'Il più lieto dei viventi'). She begs him to leave and allow her to keep her honour. Poliuto overhears their encounter; convinced that Paolina has betrayed him, he swears revenge. A Christian tells him that Nearco has been dragged in chains to the temple of Jupiter. Poliuto bows to the will of God and resolves to forgive, not punish ('Sfolgorò divino raggio').

The temple of Jupiter. The people's prayers mingle with the priests' invectives against the Christians.¹ Callistene accuses Nearco of having recruited a new convert last night. Nearco refuses to name the neophyte. Severo prescribes imprisonment and torture. Poliuto steps forward and reveals that he was the neophyte. All the observers are amazed and furious, except for Paolina, who offers the Christian God a deal: if the 'Nazarene' saves Poliuto's life, she will accept Him as her only god. Paolina then begs her father to pardon Poliuto, but he remains adamant. She throws herself at Severo's feet. Poliuto is so outraged by the sight that he repudiates his wife and upsets the altar to Jupiter, the 'lying, worthless' god who presided at his marriage. The priests curse him, while Callistene drags Paolina away and Poliuto and Nearco are taken back to prison.

Act III. 'Martyrdom'. The sacred wood. The people look forward to the bloody spectacle of martyrdom in the circus. Callistene worries that Paolina may convince Severo to pardon the Christians. He therefore commands the priests to mingle with the crowds and insist that punishment is exacted.

In prison, Poliuto has a celestial vision, in which his wife's virtue is exalted. Paolina confesses to him that she did indeed once love Severo, but insists that she has since followed the path of virtue. As for Callistene, his calumnies are caused by his infatuation with her. Convinced that she is innocent, Poliuto declares that he is now ready to die. Paolina begs him to abjure his faith and to have pity on her, but Poliuto remains firm (duet 'Ah! fuggi da morte'). Poliuto's courageous example inspires Paolina to embrace the Christian faith and share his martyrdom. Poliuto is momentarily abashed but then he seals Paolina's conversion by baptising her. United in the face of death, they are rapt with divine ecstasy ('Il suon dell'arpe angeliche').

Forced by Severo to choose between life and death, Poliuto confirms his decision. Paolina reveals that she has become a Christian and asks to share her husband's fate. Severo tries to make her change her mind, on the grounds that her father will suffer. As the priests curse and the people cry out, Paolina and Poliuto anticipate the joys of paradise, while Severo admits that he loves the guilty, blasphemous woman more than he loves Jupiter, but is prevented from committing suicide.

Poliuto is what matters, not the artificially inflated frenchified version that Donizetti made for Paris, Les martyrs, even though that omits the jealousy motif, which was only included to distract from the story's (potentially offensive) religious elements. Les martyrs does include a magnificent new trio in Act I, as well as excrescences such as a 'gladiatorial combat'. The tenor role was rewritten to suit Gilbert Duprez, and went as high as the F above high C; the soprano role was made even more demanding. P.

LA FILLE DU RÉGIMENT

The Daughter of the Regiment

Opera in two acts, text by J.H. Vernoy de Saint-Georges and F. Bayard. Première at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, 11 February 1840. First performed in Milan, 1840; New York, 1843 (in French); London, Her Majesty's, 1847; Metropolitan, New York, 1902, with Sembrich, Salignac, Gilibert; revived 1917, with Hempel, Carpi, Scotti, and 1940, with Pons, Jobin, Baccaloni. Heard at la Scala, Milan, 1928, with dal Monte, Lomanto, di Lelio; Covent Garden, 1966, with Sutherland, Pavarotti, Malas; la Scala, Milan, 1968, with Freni, Pavarotti, Ganzarolli. Famous Marias have also included Lind, Sontag, Lucca, Patti, Tetrazzini.

Marie, the 'Daughter of the Regiment'Soprano
Sulpice, *sergeant of French Grenadiers*Bass
Tonio, a *Tyrolese peasant in love with Marie*Tenor Marquise de BirkenfeldSoprano
Hortensio, *steward to the Marquise*Bass
CorporalBass
A PeasantTenor
Duchesse de KrakenthorpSoprano
Soldiers, Peasants, Friends of the Marquise

Place: Mountains of the Swiss Tyrol

Time: 1815

Running Time: 1 hour 25 minutes

¹ Marked to be sung 'with fanatic zeal', this scene is, as William Ashbrook says, 'one of Donizetti's major accomplishments' and clearly set a precedent that Verdi followed in Aida.

Act I. A valley in the Tyrolese mountains, the outskirts of a village. Tyrolese peasants are grouped on rising ground, as if on the lookout. Their wives and daughters kneel before a shrine to the Virgin. The Marquise de Birkenfeld is seated on a rustic bench; beside her stands Hortensio, her steward. They have been caught in the eddy of the war. A battle is in progress not far away. The Tyrolese chorus sings valiantly, the women pray: the French are victorious – no surprise, since the unbeaten Twenty-First Regiment of Grenadiers are among them.

One of them comes in, Sergeant Sulpice, an old grumbler. After him comes a pretty girl in uniform, a vivandière – Marie, the daughter of the regiment, found on the field of battle when she was a mere child, and brought up by a whole regiment of fathers, the spoiled darling of the grenadiers. She sings 'Au bruit de la guerre j'ai reçu le jour' ('Apparvi alla luce, sul campo guerrier'), which ends in a brilliant cadenza.

The Sergeant puts her through a drill. Then they have a 'Rataplan' duet, a repetition of Marie's solo with an accompaniment of drum-rolls. The drum is the music that is sweetest to her; and, indeed, Marie's manipulation of the drumsticks is a feature of the role.

But for a few days Marie has not been as cheerful as usual. She has been seen with a young man, and Sulpice asks her about him. She tells the Sergeant that this young man saved her life by preventing her from falling over a precipice. That, however, establishes no claims upon her. The regiment has decreed that only a grenadier shall have her for wife.

There is a commotion. Some soldiers drag in Tonio, whom they charge as a spy. They have discovered him sneaking about the camp. He would receive short shrift, but Marie pleads for him, for he is none other than her rescuer. As he wants to remain near Marie, he decides to become a soldier. The grenadiers celebrate his decision by drinking his health and calling upon Marie to sing the 'Song of the Regiment', a dapper tune, which is one of the best-known numbers of the score: 'Chacun le sait, chacun le dit' ('Ciascun lo dice, ciascun lo sà!'). There is then a love scene for Marie and Tonio, followed by a duet for them, 'De cet aveu si tendre' ('A voti così ardente').

Afterwards the grenadiers sing a 'Rataplan' chorus. But the Sergeant has been informed that the Marquise de Birkenfeld desires safe conduct. Birkenfeld is the name to which were addressed certain papers found on Marie when she was discovered as a baby on the battlefield. The Marquise examines the papers, declares that Marie is her niece and henceforth must live with her in the castle. Poor Tonio has become a grenadier in vain. The regiment cannot help him; it can only lament with him that their daughter is lost to them. She herself is none too happy. She sings a sad farewell, 'Il faut partir, mes bons compagnons d'armes' ('Convien partir! o miei compagni d'arme').

Act II. In the castle of the Marquise. Marie is learning to dance the minuet and to sing classical airs. But in the midst of her singing she and Sulpice, whom the Marquise also has brought to the castle, break out into the 'Song of the Regiment' and stirring 'Rataplans'. The liveliness, however, is only temporary, for poor Marie is to wed, at her aunt's command, a scion of the ducal house of Krakenthorp. The march of the grenadiers is heard. They come in, led by Tonio who has been made a captain for valour. Sulpice can now see no reason why Marie should not marry him instead of the nobleman selected by her aunt. And, indeed, Marie and Tonio decide to elope. But the Marquise confesses to the Sergeant, in order to win his aid in influencing Marie, that the girl is really her daughter, born out of wedlock. Sulpice informs Marie, who now feels that she cannot go against her mother's wishes.

In the end, however, it is Marie herself who saves the situation. The guests have assembled for the signing of the wedding contract, when Marie, before them all, sings fondly of her childhood with the regiment, and of her life as a vivandière. The society people are scandalised. But the Marquise is so touched that she leads Tonio to Marie and places the girl's hand in that of her lover. The opera ends with an ensemble, 'Salute to France!'

K.

LA FAVORITE

The Favourite

Opera in four acts, text in French by Alphonse Royer and Gustav Vaez after a drama Le Comte de Comminges by Baculard d'Arnaud. Première at the Paris Opéra, 2 December 1840. First performed in London, Drury Lane, 1843 (in English); New Orleans, 1843 (in French); Covent Garden, 1845 (in French); Her Majesty's, 1847 (in Italian); Metropolitan, New York, 1895, with Mantelli, Cremonini, Ancona, Plançon; 1905, with Edyth Walker, Caruso, Scotti, Plançon; 1912, at London Opera House, with Augusta Doria, Orville Harrold. Revived la Scala, 1934, with Stignani, Pertile; Rome, 1935, with Cobelli, Gigli; la Scala, 1939; Rome, 1946; la Scala, 1949, with Stignani, Poggi, Silveri, Siepi; Rome, 1951, with Barbieri, Lauri-Volpi; la Scala, 1962, with Simionato, Raimondi; Chicago, 1964, with Cossotto, Alfredo Kraus, Bruscantini, and Florence, 1966, with same cast.

Alphonse (Alfonso) XI, *King of Castile*Baritone Fernand (Ferdinand), a young novice of the Monastery of St James of CompostellaTenor
 Don Gaspard (Gaspere), *the King's Minister*Tenor Balthazar (Baldassare), Superior of the Monastery of St JamesBass
 Léonor (Leonora) di GusmanMezzo-Soprano
 Inès (Inez), *her confidante*Soprano

Courtiers, Guards, Monks, Ladies of the Court, Attendants

Place: Castile, Spain

Time: c. 1340

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

Fernand, a novice in the Monastery of St James of Compostella, has chanced to see and has fallen in love with Léonor, the mistress of Alphonse, King of Castile. He neither knows her name, nor is he aware of her equivocal position.

Act I. The interior of the monastery. Fernand tells Balthazar, the Superior, that he desires to renounce his novitiate, because he has fallen in love and cannot banish his beloved from his thoughts. He describes her to the priest as 'Un ange, une femme'.

Balthazar's questions elicit from Fernand that his only knowledge of the woman is of her youth and beauty. Name and station are unknown to him, although he believes her to be of high rank. Balthazar, who had hoped that in time Fernand would become his successor as superior of the monastery, releases him reluctantly from his obligations, and prophesies that he will retrace his steps to seek refuge once more within the monastery's walls.

The scene changes to an idyllic prospect on the island of St Leon, where Léonor lives in splendour. She is deeply enamoured of Fernand, yet is convinced that, because of her relations with King Alphonse, he will despise her once he discovers who she is. But, without letting him learn her name or station, she has arranged for him to be brought blindfolded to the island.

'Rayons dorés', a graceful solo and chorus for Inès, Léonor's confidante, and her woman companions, opens the scene. The boat conveying Fernand touches the island; he has the bandage withdrawn from his eyes, and looks in amazement upon the charming surroundings amid which he stands. He questions Inès regarding the name and station of her who holds gentle sway over the island, but in vain. Inès and her companions retire, as Léonor enters. She interrupts Fernand's delight at seeing her by telling him – but without giving her reasons – that their love can lead only to sorrow; they must part. He protests vehemently. She, however, cannot be moved from her determination, and hands him a parchment, which she tells him will lead him to a career of honour.

Inès, entering hurriedly, announces the approach of the King. Léonor bids Fernand farewell and goes hastily to meet Alphonse. Fernand now believes that the woman with whom he has fallen in love is of so high a rank that she cannot stoop to wed him, yet expresses her love for him by seeking to advance him. This is confirmed when, on reading the scroll she has given him, he discovers that it gratifies his highest ambition and confers upon him a commission in the army. The act closes with his martial air, 'Oui, ta voix m'inspire'. He sees the path to glory open up before him, and with it the hope that some great deed may yet make him worthy to claim the hand of the woman he loves.

Act II. Gardens of the palace of the Alcazar. Fernand's dream of glory has come true. We learn, through a brief colloquy between Alphonse and Don Gaspard, his minister, that the young officer has led the Spanish army to victory against the Moors. The King, who has no knowledge of the love between Fernand and Léonor, sings of his own passion for her in the expressive air, 'Léonore, viens, j'abandonne'.

The object of his love enters, accompanied by her confidante. The King has prepared a fête in celebration of Fernand's victory, but Léonor, while rejoicing in the honours destined to be his, is filled with foreboding. Moreover, these fears find justification in the return of Gaspard with a letter in Fernand's handwriting, and intended for Léonor, but which the minister has intercepted in the hand of Inès. The King's angry questions regarding the identity of the writer are interrupted by Balthazar, preceded by a priest bearing a scroll with the Papal seal. He faces the King and Léonor while the lords and ladies, who have gathered for the fête, look on in apprehension, though not wholly without knowledge of what is impending.

There is at the court a strong party that condemns the King's illicit passion for Léonor, so openly shown; this party has appealed to the Papal throne against the King. The Pope has sent a Bull to Balthazar, in which the Superior of the Monastery of St James is authorised to pronounce the interdict on the King if the latter refuses to dismiss his favourite and restore his legitimate wife to her rights. It is with this commission that Balthazar has now appeared before the King, who at first is inclined to refuse obedience. He wavers. Balthazar gives him until the next day, and until then withholds his anathema. His vigorous yet dignified denunciation of the King, 'Redoutez la fureur d'un Dieu terrible' (Do not call down the wrath of God, the avenger), forms a broadly sonorous foundation for the finale of the act.

Act III. A salon in the palace of the Alcazar. In a brief scene the King informs his minister that he has decided to heed the behest of the Church and refrain from braving the Papal malediction. He bids Gaspard send Léonor to him, but, at the first opportunity, to arrest Inès, her accomplice.

It is at this juncture, as Gaspard departs, that Fernand returns from the war, in which he has not only distinguished himself by his valour but actually has saved the kingdom. Alphonse asks him to name the prize he desires as recompense for his services. Léonor enters. Fernand at once asks for the bestowal of her hand upon him in marriage. The King, who loves her deeply, and has nearly risked the wrath of the Pope for her sake, nevertheless gives his assent, but with reluctance, as appears from the irony that pervades his impressive solo, 'Pour tant d'amour'.

Léonor, touched by the King's magnanimity, inspired by her love for Fernand, yet shaken by doubts and fears, because aware that he knows nothing of her past, now expresses these conflicting feelings in her principal air, 'O mon Fernand'. She considers that their future happiness depends upon Fernand's being truthfully informed of her relations with the King. Accordingly she despatches Inès with a letter to him. Inès is intercepted by Gaspard, who orders her arrest. She is therefore unable to place in Fernand's hands the letter from Léonor.

Into the presence of the assembled nobles the King now brings Fernand, and announces that he has created him Count of Zamora. The jealous lords whisper among themselves about the scandal of Fernand's coming marriage with the mistress of the King; but Léonor, who enters in bridal attire, finds Fernand eagerly waiting to wed her, notwithstanding, as she believes, his receipt of her communication and complete knowledge of her past.

While the ceremony is being performed in another apartment, the nobles discuss further the disgrace to Fernand in this marriage. That Léonor was the mistress of the King is, of course, a familiar fact at court, and the nobles regard Fernand's elevation to the rank of nobility as a reward not only for his defeat of the Moors, but also for accommodatingly taking Léonor off the hands of the King to save him from the malediction of Rome. They cannot imagine that the young officer is ignorant of the relations that existed between his bride and the King.

Fernand re-enters. In high spirits he approaches the courtiers, offers them his hand, which they refuse. Balthazar now comes to learn the decision of the King. Fernand, confused by the taunting words and actions of the courtiers, hastens to greet Balthazar, who, not having seen him since he has returned victorious and loaded with honours, embraces him, until he hears Gaspard's ironical exclamation, 'Léonor's bridegroom!' Balthazar starts back, and it is then Fernand learns that he has just been wedded to the mistress of the King.

At this moment, when Fernand has just been informed of what he can only interpret as his betrayal by the King and the royal favourite, Alphonse enters, leading Léonor, followed by her attendants. In a stirring scene, the dramatic climax of the opera, Fernand tears from his neck the chain Alphonse has bestowed upon him, breaks his sword and casts it at the King's feet, then departs with Balthazar, the nobles now making a passage for them.

Act IV. The cloisters of the Monastery of St James. The ceremony of Fernand's entry into the order takes place: 'Les Cieux s'emplissent d'étincelles', a distinguished solo and chorus for Balthazar and the monks. Left alone, Fernand gives vent to his sorrow in the romance, 'Ange si pure' (Spirit of Light), one of the most exquisite solos in the Italian repertory.

Balthazar and the monks return, with them Fernand. Léonor, disguised as a novice, comes in and hears the chanting of the monks, Fernand's voice enunciating his vows. He comes out from the chapel, recognises Léonor, bids her be gone: 'Va-t-en d'ici de cet asile'. She tells him of her unsuccessful effort to let him know of her past, and craves his forgiveness for the seeming wrong she has done him: 'Fernand, imite la clémence'.

All of Fernand's former love for her returns: 'Viens, viens, je cède éperdu'. He wants to bear her away to other climes and there happily pass his days with her. But it is too late. Léonor dies in his arms. 'By tomorrow my soul, too, will want your prayers', are Fernand's words to Balthazar, who calls upon the monks to pray for a departed soul. K.

LINDA DI CHAMOUNIX

Opera in three acts, text by Gaetano Rossi. Première at the Kärnthnertheater, Vienna, 19 May 1842. First performed in London, Her Majesty's Theatre, 1843; New York, 1847; London, 1888, with Fursch-Madi, Trebelli, Navarini. Revived Metropolitan, New York, 1934, with Pons, Swarthout, Crooks, de Luca, Pinza, conductor Serafin; San Carlo, Naples, 1934, with dal Monte; la Scala, Milan, 1939, with dal Monte, Elmo, Malipiero, Basiola, Pasero, conductor Marinuzzi; Trieste, 1949, with Carosio.

| | |
|--|-----------|
| Marquis de Boisfleury..... | Baritone |
| Carlo, Vicomte de Sirval | Tenor |
| Prefect..... | Bass |
| Pierotto..... | Contralto |
| Linda..... | Soprano |
| Antonio, Linda's father | Baritone |
| Maddalena, Linda's mother | Soprano |
| Intendant..... | Tenor |

Peasant Men and Women, Savoyards

Place: Chamounix and Paris

Time: 1760, During the Reign of Louis XV

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Claiming pride of place among Donizetti's pastoral Operas, and belonging to a line that includes such works as Bellini's La Sonnambula and Meyerbeer's Dinorah and of which Mascagni's L'Amico Fritz is a late representative, Linda is still the subject of occasional revival, as a repository of several admirable singing roles and much highly agreeable music, including one of Donizetti's most famous soprano arias.

Act I. An overture typical of its period and excellent of its kind leads to a chorus of villagers on their way to church. The scene is Chamounix, a village of Savoy, at dawn. Maddalena awaits with some trepidation the return of her husband Antonio from a visit to the Marchesa, who owns their farm and the mortgage which has been raised on it. Antonio returns, says they have the Marchesa's brother, the Marquis de Boisfleury, speaking for them, and then sings melodiously of the valley they have both known all their lives as their home: 'Ambo nati in questa valle'.

The shout of the villagers outside heralds the arrival of the Marquis de Boisfleury himself, a man by no means averse to self-congratulation and unquestionably on the prowl for Linda, Antonio's daughter, of whose charms he has received excellent reports – hence his supposed support in the matter of the mortgage. He is disappointed not to see her, but promises for them his protection in the future and for Linda a position at the castle.

All leave, and Linda comes out of the house. She has been to an assignation with her lover, a young and penniless painter named Carlo, but has arrived late and found only the flowers he left for her. There is no doubt she is in love and hopes to see him again in the very near future – 'O luce di quest' anima' she sings in the best-known aria of the score, a delightful allegretto piece in the repertory of all coloratura sopranos.

A group of young men and women from the village are on their way to France, among them Pierotto, the village poet and a childhood friend of Linda's. All beg him to sing his latest song and he obliges with a sentimental ditty ('Per sua madre andò una figlia'), about a young girl who leaves her native village to earn money for her mother, loves, is betrayed, and dies. When they have gone Carlo comes in to find Linda plunged by the ballad into sombre thoughts, from which his ardent protestations lead her into an impassioned love duet.

They leave and the Prefect comes to see Antonio, warning him that the Marquis has sinister designs on Linda. In an extended and beautiful duet, Antonio protests to heaven against such a fate for her, the Prefect goes on to suggest more practically that she be sent away with the band of Savoyards. Antonio agrees. Linda accepts to go and for the finale the Prefect bestows a blessing on the departing group.

Act II. Linda is in Paris. Her beloved Carlo has caught up with her, made known his real identity as the Vicomte de Sirval, son of the Marchesa, and installed her in style preparatory to their marriage. She hears Pierotto's tune outside and has him brought in to her. He is astonished to find her in these circumstances, but she explains her forthcoming marriage to Carlo. In a florid duet Linda and Pierotto declare their devotion to one another and Pierotto leaves.

No sooner has Pierotto gone than the old Marquis bursts into the room, to Linda's surprise and dismay. In a buffo duet, the old man offers to better in every respect the comparative splendour in which she now lives. Linda protests and in a charming andante mosso tune, the Marquis wonders if he has got himself in too deep, and Linda (in the accents of Don Pasquale's Norina) worries in case Carlo were to come in unexpectedly. Finally, amidst much ado, Linda sends him packing.

Carlo, alone, laments in a beautiful aria his inability either to combat his mother's decision that he shall make a rich marriage or to communicate this thoroughly unwelcome news to Linda ('Se tanto in ira'). Linda returns and their duet ('Ah! dimmi, dimmi io t'amo') is full of passion, but Linda refuses a kiss when she hears the sound of Pierotto's hurdy-gurdy which reminds her of childhood and innocence.

Carlo leaves, and this time her own father appears at Linda's apartment. He has come to plead with the son of the owner of his farm and he urges his suit with what he takes to be the Vicomte's mistress ('Un buon servo del Visconte di Sirval'). Linda hides her identity from him at first, but inevitably he discovers who she is. Pierotto bursts in: he has seen a wedding feast in progress at Carlo's house! The news and her father's repeated curses carry Linda over the borderline of sanity, a state of mind so ardently coveted by the nineteenth-century soprano. In the beautiful and expressive duet which ends the act, she takes Pierotto for Carlo, demands to be taken by him to the altar, and ends singing with Pierotto for all the world as heartrendingly mad as Lucia.

Act III. The village square at Chamounix: a scene of rejoicing as the Savoyards return home, considerably richer than when they set out. Only Antonio, says the Prefect, is denied the pleasure of welcoming home his child. At that moment, there rushes in the young Vicomte de Sirval. His mother has relented and he may now marry the girl of his choice. She is dead, replies the Prefect. In a duet of considerable warmth, the Prefect begs Carlo to trust in the mercy of heaven.

The square fills again as the Marquis is heard returning from his Parisian jaunts. The teasing of the Savoyards – some of them saw his flirtations in Paris – disconcerts him not at all, and he expatiates in a buffo aria on the forthcoming marriage between his nephew and a beautiful and virtuous girl.

But a happy ending is in store. Pierotto leads Linda into the village, playing his hurdy-gurdy to remind her of home and so bring her step by step nearer Chamounix, her family and friends. Carlo, bringing the deed of Antonio's farm, is appalled to see Linda in so parlous a condition. Suddenly she recognises her mother and seems to know Carlo's voice. His aria ('E la voce che primiera') half convinces her that it is he, and after a repetition of their first-act duet, her reason returns and she recognises everyone gathered compassionately round her. Only the Marquis has to create some diversion until Linda addresses him as 'Uncle'. The opera ends with a short and joyful duet for Linda and Carlo.

K.

DON PASQUALE

Opera in three acts, text by Giovanni Ruffini and the composer. Première at the Théâtre-Italien, Paris, 3 January 1843, with Grisi, Mario, Tamburini, Lablache. First performed la Scala, Milan, 1843; Her Majesty's, London, 1843; New Orleans, 1845; New York, 1846. Revived Metropolitan, 1899, with Sembrich, Salignac, Scotti, Pini-Corsi, conductor Mancinelli; 1935, with Bori, Schipa, de Luca, Pinza, conductor Panizza; 1940, with Sayao, Martini, Valentino, Baccaloni, conductor Papi (1945, conductor Busch); Covent Garden, 1920, with Pareto; 1937, with Favero, Dino Borgioli, Biasini, di Lelio; Glyndebourne, 1938, with Mildmay, Dino Borgioli, Stabile, Baccaloni, conductor Busch; Cambridge Theatre, London, 1946, with Noni, MacPherson, Stabile, Lawrence, conductor Erede. Revived la Scala, Milan, 1930, with dal Monte, Lomanto, Stabile, Autori; 1936, with Carosio, Schipa, de Luca, Badini, conductor Marinuzzi; 1950, with Noni, Prandelli, Taddei, Pasero, conductor Capuana. Revived Vienna, 1944, with Noni, Dermota, Kunz, Vogel, conductor Paulik; Piccola Scala, Milan, 1959, with Sciutti, Alva, Panerai, Bruscantini, conductor Sanzogno; Edinburgh Festival, 1963 (by San Carlo Opera, Naples), with D'Angelo, Alfredo Kraus, Capecchi, Corena, conductor Erede; Covent Garden, 1973, with Elizabeth Harwood, Ryland Davies, Gabriel Bacquier, Geraint Evans, conductor Pritchard.

Don Pasquale, an old bachelor Bass
 Dr Malatesta, his friend Baritone
 Ernesto, Don Pasquale's nephew Tenor
 Norina, a young widow Soprano
 A Notary Baritone

Place: Rome

Time: Early Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Written for Paris and performed with the four most celebrated singers of the day, Don Pasquale is Donizetti's most masterly comic opera. It combines the product of his lyrical gift at its most mellifluous – the soprano and tenor arias of the first act, the tenor's of the second and third, and his duet with Norina – and of his comical genius – Malatesta and Don Pasquale in the last scene. By the end of the year of its première, the first signs of Donizetti's mental illness were apparent.

The overture is mainly concerned with Ernesto's serenade from the last act, and Norina's aria from the first. It admirably suggests the lively tone of the opera.

Act I. Don Pasquale's room. The wealthy Don Pasquale is about to marry. Though determined himself to have a wife, he is very angry with his nephew Ernesto for wishing to do likewise, and threatens to disinherit him on that account. Ernesto is greatly disturbed by these threats, and so is his lady-love, the sprightly young widow Norina, when he reports them to her.

When the curtain rises, Don Pasquale is impatiently waiting for Malatesta, who, unable to dissuade his friend from marriage and still less able to influence him to allow his nephew to follow the dictates of his heart, pretends to acquiesce in the madcap scheme. He proposes that his 'sister' shall be the bride (Don Pasquale has no one in particular in mind), and describes her in a graceful aria, 'Bella siccome un'angelo', as a timid, ingenuous girl, brought up, he says, in a convent. She is, however, none other than Norina, who is in no way related to Malatesta. At this description, Don Pasquale is quite unable to contain his delight and when he is alone, he breaks into a cavatina, 'Ah, un foco insolito'.

Don Pasquale lectures his nephew on the subject of his future conduct, and tells him that he is proposing to take a wife himself. This arouses Ernesto's incredulity, and his uncle is obliged to repeat it several times before he can take it in. When he does, it is to realise that it finally cuts him off from the marriage he himself proposed to enter into: 'Sogno soave e casto', he sings, in one of Donizetti's soaring inspirations, while the old uncle grumbles away in the bass. When Don Pasquale says he has already consulted Malatesta, Ernesto's last remaining hope vanishes; there is no one now to dissuade the old fool.

The scene changes to Norina's room, where she is reading. Her aria, 'So anch'io la virtù magica', shows her sprightly nature in an enchanting tune. A letter is brought to her, and when Malatesta comes to tell her that Ernesto's old uncle has fallen for the scheme which shall finally make him agree to his nephew's marriage, she is anything but pleased with the way things have gone; they have not had time to tell Ernesto about their scheme and he has written that he is furious. However, Malatesta is convinced all is going well, and he and Norina rehearse how they shall behave with Don Pasquale when finally he meets his convent-bred bride. The music is pure effervescence, with its sparkling coloratura and its brightly changing tunes.

Act II. Ernesto's lodgings. The owner is in despair at the prospect of losing his bride and his home (Don Pasquale has told him to clear out of the house). A long horn prelude ushers in the recitative and aria, 'Cercherò lontana terra', one of the best known of the opera.

At home, Don Pasquale receives his prospective bride and her sponsor, his friend, Malatesta. She is shy, he urges her on, and the husband-to-be watches every manoeuvre enraptured. Norina is eventually persuaded to speak to Pasquale, and assures him that she is only interested in the things of the household – sewing, making clothes, and looking after the kitchen. A notary has been sent for, and Malatesta dictates the terms of the marriage, the others, including the notary, repeating his words after him. A witness is needed, but none seems forthcoming until Ernesto rushes in proclaiming his betrayal to anyone who chooses to listen. Malatesta has his work cut out to explain the situation to him, without letting Don Pasquale know the way the wind is blowing.

The moment the contract is signed, Norina's temper seems to change, and she spits fire at every one of Don Pasquale's attempts at either conciliation or authority. He is confounded at the contrast, and dumb with horror when she says that Ernesto is just the person to take her out walking, something that is plainly beyond the capacity of a man of his years – or girth, for that matter. The quartet redoubles in vigour, and Norina and Ernesto have a charming lyrical aside which leaves no one in any doubt as to their mutual feelings. When Norina calls together the servants, and, finding there are only three in all, laughingly directs that more be engaged and that the wages of those at present in service be doubled, Don Pasquale can bear it no more. 'Son tradito, son tradito' he shouts in his rage, and the stretta of the quartet brings the act to a spirited conclusion.

Act III. Don Pasquale's house. Servants are rushing hither and thither executing Norina's commands. Don Pasquale sees her dressed up to the nines and about to go out of the house; may he ask where? To the theatre, she says – without him. Their duet works the quarrel up until Norina finds occasion to box her 'husband's' ears. As far as Don Pasquale is concerned, it is the end of his hopes and pretensions as well as his hateful marriage, and even Norina is sorry that she has had to go so far. She rushes from the room, but takes care to drop a note as she goes. It purports to be from Ernesto, and makes an assignation for that very evening in the garden. Don Pasquale reads it, and sees in it his chance of getting quit of the whole affair; he will send for Malatesta.

When he has left the room, the servants flock back into it, and in a charming chorus comment on the happenings in the house. Malatesta arrives and proceeds to give Don Pasquale the benefit of his advice. The two men confer in a famous comic duet, whose every performance has reduced an audience somewhere to helpless laughter. Its buffo 6/8 finish is one of the funniest pieces of music in the post-Rossinian repertory.

The scene changes to the garden, where Ernesto sings to Norina the beautiful serenade, 'Com'è gentil'. The story is that after one of the rehearsals Donizetti asked the music publisher, Dormoy, to go with him to his lodgings. There he rummaged among a lot of manuscripts until, finding what he was looking for, he handed it to Dormoy. 'There,' he said, 'give this to Mario and tell him to sing it in the last scene in the garden as a serenade to Norina.' When the opera was performed, Mario sang it, while Lablache, behind the scenes, played an accompaniment on the lute. Most of the great lyric tenors of history, from Mario to Schipa, have tried at one time or another to prove that never before has it been so stylishly sung.

It is immediately followed by a duet that is no less charming and hardly less well known, 'Tornami a dir'. This is all thirds and sixths for the two voices, but the effect is entrancing. Don Pasquale and Malatesta surprise the lovers, Ernesto escapes, but Norina stays as if to brave it out. Malatesta twists everything round to everyone's satisfaction, and soon Ernesto and Norina are waiting to be married, and moreover with the full approval of Don Pasquale. Suitably, Malatesta leads off the Rondo finale with which the work ends.

K., H.

DOM SÉBASTIEN, ROI DE PORTUGAL

Don Sebastian, King of Portugal

Opera in five acts, libretto by Eugène Scribe, after Paul-Henri Foucher's play Dom Sébastien de Portugal (1838), dedicated to the Queen of Portugal. First performed Paris Opéra, 13 November 1843, with Gilbert Duprez as Dom Sébastien, Paul Barroilhet as Camoëns and Rosine Stoltz as Zayda. Shortened version (in German), Kärthnertortheater, Vienna, 6 February 1845, conducted by the composer. First U.S. performance, New York, 1864; New Orleans, 1875. Revived Maggio Musicale, Florence, 1955, conducted by Carlo Maria Giulini.

Dom Sébastien, King of Portugal Tenor

Dom Antonio, his uncle Tenor

Dom Juam de Sylva,
Grand Inquisitor Basso Profundo

Dom Louis, Spanish ambassador Tenor

Camoëns, soldier and poet Tenor

Ben-Selim, governor of Fez Bass

Abayaldos, leader of the Arab tribe Baritone

Zayda, his betrothed, daughter of Ben Selim Mezzo-Soprano

Dom Henrique Sandoval,
Dom Sébastien's lieutenant Bass

Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court; Portuguese
Soldiers and Sailors; Arab Soldiers and Women;
Members of the Inquisition

Place: Lisbon and the Moroccan desert

Time: 1577

Dom Sébastien was intended to trump the success Donizetti had enjoyed in Paris with Don Pasquale earlier in 1843. Its original raison d'être was as a vehicle for Donizetti's friend, the tenor Gilbert Duprez, then thirty-two, who had created Edgardo in Lucia and Arnold in the Italian version of Guillaume Tell. But Donizetti was the victim of his own success: French composers resented the way his works had enjoyed a monopoly on stages and in popular acclaim for so long. It is grand opera on the grandest scale, with a number of set pieces that tend to dwarf individual characters. It also has an overwhelmingly tragic impact: Donizetti himself called it 'arcitrasta'.

Of all his unknown works, Dom Sébastien is the one most neglected, neither commercially recorded nor performed in recent times.

Act I. The King of Portugal, Dom Sébastien, is about to lead a crusade to Africa. His uncle, Dom Antonio, who will act as regent in the King's absence, intends to share power with the Grand Inquisitor, Juam de Sylva. Meanwhile the Inquisitor is secretly determined to help Philip II, King of Spain, usurp the Portuguese throne. Dom Antonio tries to stop a soldier importuning the King, but the King insists on knowing his identity. The poet Camoëns introduces himself in a splendid cavatina: he followed Vasco da Gama and was inspired to write his Lusiads, which will bring lustre to his ungrateful country. He himself has gained only grief from his travels and his writing. The King declares himself Camoëns's protector. Camoëns asks for the honour of following the King.

A procession passes, as the Inquisition leads heretics to the stake. The beautiful African girl Zayda is among them. Juam de Sylva explains that she was captured in Africa and baptised in front of Dom Sébastien, who remembers he was touched by her grief. Some months later, however, her heart broken by secret pain (presumably her love for the King), she took refuge in a convent and swore to remain there for ever. Later she broke her sacred oath. Zayda explains that she only wanted to see her country and her aged father again. Even though Juam de Sylva insists the King should not interfere with the Inquisition's death sentence on this apostate, Dom Sébastien commutes her sentence to eternal exile in Africa, near her father. The people, led by Camoëns, applaud this verdict, while Juam and the Inquisitors rage. Zayda herself, in the cantabile romance 'O mon Dieu sur la terre', swears to consecrate her life to her tutelary god, the King. There is a chorus with trumpet fanfares as the Portuguese look forward to conquering a new world. They request a song of departure and ask Camoëns what fate awaits them. In his dramatic, pianissimo accompanied prophétie, he predicts disaster: the desert wind will bring the cries of triumphant warriors. How many? What does it matter? He concludes: 'En avant soldats!' The soldiers swear to die for their King. When the sun comes out, Camoëns gives a more positive forecast of their bravery. In a major ensemble the King asks heaven's blessing, while the Grand Inquisitor swears aside that monarch and soldiers will never leave Africa. Donizetti ensures that the Inquisitors' cries of 'Anathème' are heard in isolation.

Act II. A ballet and chorus of Arab women celebrate Zayda's return: she had been captured on the eve of her marriage to the warrior Abayaldos. In a touching larghetto romance, Zayda admits that her soul is still Dom Sébastien's ('Sol adoré de la patrie'). Her father, Beni Salem, governor of Fez, knows that she no longer favours Abayaldos, but insists she receive her friends' homage. This occasions much ballet.

Abayaldos points out that the Christians are in their deserts, and calls them to arms (in a phrase that must have resonated strangely in Paris), 'Aux armes, Africains'. Holy war is declared and, for once, the Moors beat the Christians. Dom Sébastien is more concerned to save Camoëns than himself. To save the King's life, his friend Sandoval pretends to be Dom Sébastien as he dies. Zayda finds the King and determines to save him in a harp-inflected larghetto, 'Grand Dieu sa misère est si grande'. They declare their love; he promises to make her his Queen.

The Moors are still bent on killing the survivors. Zayda bargains with Abayaldos: she will marry him, if he lets the prisoners return home. He agrees to her terms and in another powerful ensemble Zayda and the King implore heaven to watch over one another.

Back in Portugal, Dom Sébastien sings an affecting and very difficult aria in a half voice ('Seul sur la terre'): it includes an octave leap up to a high D flat on 'l'amour', which Donizetti optimistically asks to be sung sweetly.

Act III. Abayaldos comes as an ambassador to Portugal offering a peace treaty. Zayda has accompanied him. He knows he has not won her heart. She asks him to kill her. Camoëns appears and sings a beautiful romance in 6/8, as his broken soul revives on seeing Lisbon ('O Lisbonne, o ma patrie'). Camoëns and Dom Sébastien meet and recognise each another. Dom Sébastien explains that a greedy uncle has usurped the throne, believing him dead. A Funeral March is heard: with consummate hypocrisy, Dom Antonio mourns the 'death' of his nephew. When Camoëns disrupts the occasion, Dom Juam has him arrested. Dom Sébastien intervenes and reveals his identity. He is acclaimed by the crowd, but Abayaldos swears he buried the real king. Dom Juan summons Dom Sébastien to appear before the Inquisition. Abayaldos warns Zayda that he will watch her every move.

Act IV. Members of the Inquisition swear to keep its secrets. Dom Juam pretends not to recognise the King. Zayda comes to witness in his defence, though Dom Sébastien tells her to keep quiet. When she reveals she saved the King's life, Dom Juan greets this as blasphemy and a remarkable septet is launched.¹ Zayda gives in to despair and terror; Dom Juam calls her an apostate and condemns her to be burnt to death. Abayaldos rejects her as an impious perjurer and curses her. She defies them all, fortissimo ('Que le bûcher').

Act V. Dom Juam hears that the Spanish will be under Lisbon's walls by evening. He is promised power in return for giving the crown to Philip II – as long as he can make this look legitimate. With breathtaking cynicism, Dom Juam offers to pardon Zayda and save the King's life if Dom Sébastien agrees to abdicate in Philip II's favour.

Zayda is ready, even happy, to die for the King ('Mourir pour ce qu'on aime'²). Dom Sébastien realises he can live only at the expense of his honour. He and Zayda agree it would be better to die and Donizetti shares the line 'l'avvilir jamais' (life must never be vilified) between the two lovers to express their unanimity. However, when Dom Sébastien realises that Zayda will die if he refuses to sign the abdication, he does sign it.

Camoëns has recruited sailors to save them and in a memorable off-stage barcarolle, which Donizetti was forced to cut by one verse because the original Zayda refused to stay on stage and listen to it all, he addresses his song of hope to the tower prison ('O matelots, o matelots').

Abayaldos and Dom Antonio, however, know of the conspiracy. The prisoners are allowed to escape, so they can be executed. Their bodies fall into the sea. Dom Antonio assumes he is therefore now King but the Inquisitor brandishes the act of abdication and disillusion him: 'Glory to Philip II'. Camoëns has the last word: 'Glory to Dom Sébastien'.

Donizetti himself realised that Dom Sébastien's dénouement was problematic: in a letter of 9 November 1843 he commented that 'the music can do nothing... my opera finishes with a rat's tail, as they say, or like wax in the sun'.³ He added a new 'largo concertato' for the Vienna revival, which will be included in Mary Ann Smart's impatiently awaited new critical edition from Ricordi. Dom Sébastien has enjoyed the status of rough diamond for a long time now: it will be interesting to see whether the work itself can deliver all that is expected of it. P.

¹ During one performance of Dom Sébastien in Vienna in 1845 this septet was repeated three times.

² Donizetti had to fight for this phrase, when his librettist Scribe preferred

'saving someone you love' to 'dying for someone you love'.

³ Quoted by William Ashbrook, Donizetti, 1965.

PAUL DUKAS

(born 1 October 1865, died 17 May 1935)

ARIANE ET BARBE-BLEUE

Ariadne and Bluebeard

Opera in three acts, text after Maeterlinck's play of the same name. Première, Opéra-Comique, Paris, 10 May 1907, with Georgette Leblanc (Maeterlinck's wife), Brohly, Vieuille. First performed Metropolitan, New York, 1911, with Farrar, Rothier, conductor Toscanini; la Scala, Milan, 1911, with Pierich, Ludikar, conductor Serafin; Covent Garden, 1937, with Lubin, Etcheverry; Paris, 1975, with Grace Bumbry, Irina Arkhipova, Jacques Mars; Amsterdam, 1989, with Kathryn Harries; Opera North, 1990, with Anne Marie Owens, conductor Paul Daniel; Paris, 1991, with Françoise Pollet, conductor Inbal, producer Berghaus.

Barbe-Bleue (Bluebeard) Bass
 Ariane Mezzo-Soprano
 The Nurse Contralto
 Sélysette Mezzo-Soprano
 Ygraine Soprano
 Mélisande Soprano
 Bellangère Soprano
 Alladine Mime
 Three Peasants Tenor, Basses
 Peasants, Crowd

Place: Barbe-Bleue's Castle

Running Time: 2 hours

Two works for the stage – Ariane et Barbe-Bleue and the ballet La Péri – and the orchestral L'apprenti sorcier comprise the work for which Dukas is known. Other operas were contemplated, may even have been started and then destroyed, but Dukas was a slow worker and lacked confidence; late in life he destroyed the unpublished residue of his work. Ariane was from the start intended by Maeterlinck as an operatic libretto.

Act I. A vast and sumptuous hall of semicircular form in Barbe-Bleue's castle. Through the open window can be heard the sound of an angry crowd. They believe that Barbe-Bleue has murdered his wives one by one, and that the beautiful Ariane is to be the next victim. They comment on the arrival of the carriage. Is it true that the previous five wives are not dead, but still alive in a dungeon?

The windows of the hall shut, the roar of the crowd recedes to a murmur, and Ariane and her nurse come in by a side door. The nurse starts to lament their fate; he is mad and has already killed five wives. Ariane is calmer; she is convinced that Barbe-Bleue loves her. He has given her seven keys, six of silver, and one of gold; those of silver she may use to open any door she likes, that of gold she must not touch. It must be that one, then, that guards his secret; she will have nothing to do with the silver keys, only the gold will answer her purpose.

Taking the silver keys, the nurse unlocks the six doors. From them in succession pour cascades of amethysts, sapphires, pearls, emeralds, rubies and diamonds. Ariane is not looking for treasures, but she cannot resist the sight of the diamonds: 'O mes clairs diamants!' she sings, in a great lyrical outburst, whose high tessitura makes one wonder whether any true mezzo-soprano ever negotiated the title role successfully.

Ariane is intent on discovering what is behind the seventh, forbidden door. Nothing can be seen when the door opens, but a sad, subdued sound is heard; it is the sound of the other five wives, says Ariane. Barbe-Bleue himself comes into the hall. He reproaches Ariane for her faithlessness, but she demands to know the truth. He takes her by the arm, she struggles to free herself, the nurse joins in and the sounds of the quarrel penetrate to the crowd waiting outside. A stone is thrown through the windows, and the nurse runs to unbolt the door, through which streams a crowd of peasants. Barbe-Bleue prepares to defend himself, but Ariane goes gently but firmly to the people and assures them that she has not been hurt. She closes the door.

Act II. A vast subterranean hall. It is nearly dark. Ariane and the nurse appear, the former holding a lamp. Ariane stumbles on the other wives, lying huddled in the middle of the vaulted hall. In her joy that they are alive, she rushes to them and embraces them: 'Ah! Je vous ai trouvées!' They look dazed and frightened at the unaccustomed light. One by one Ariane calls them to her¹ and reassures them; she has not come to join them as a captive but to free them, has in fact obeyed a higher law than Barbe-Bleue's. A drop of water extinguishes Ariane's light, but she shows no signs of fear. The others, who are used to the dark, lead her to the light – they say there is some light in the corner of the dungeon. When she gets there, Ariane finds that there are bars and bolts, which, say the other wives, they have never tried to open. The sea is behind the wall, and to open it would let in the waves. Ariane throws herself against it, and opens it, like a door, to admit light through what appears to be a great window: 'Ah, ce n'est pas encore la clarté véritable.' She takes a stone and smashes this, and immediately the whole chamber is bathed in brilliant, blinding light. Ariane encourages the others to look out at the world from which they have been cut off, and she leads them off to freedom, singing joyfully as they go.

Act III. The scene is the same as that of Act I. All the wives are adorning themselves with the jewels which were revealed with the aid of the six silver keys. They were unable to escape from the castle, since the drawbridges rose when they approached them, the moats filled magically with water. They speculate as to where Barbe-Bleue has gone, but Ariane bids them concentrate on adorning themselves for the freedom which will surely be theirs.

The nurse comes in hurriedly to say that Barbe-Bleue has returned. He is attacked by the villagers, who are determined to end what they consider his tyranny. His bodyguard deserts and Barbe-Bleue himself is wounded. The peasants bind him and offer him to the wives; let them take what revenge they like – he is securely fastened. Ariane thanks them and bids them go to their homes to tend their wounds.

¹ When Mélisande's name is mentioned, the theme from Debussy's Act I, scene iii is heard.

When they have left the castle, the women all crowd round Barbe-Bleue to see what can be done for his wounds. They are found not to be serious, but the bonds with which he is secured are so tight as to risk strangling him. Ariane cuts them with a dagger, and he is able to get up. She herself departs, although Barbe-Bleue makes a movement as if he wished her to remain. But when she in turn asks the five wives to go with her, they decline and she leaves them with Barbe-Bleue in the castle. In the composer's own words, 'no one wants to be liberated'. H.

ANTONÍN DVOŘÁK

(born 8 September 1841, died 1 May 1904)

As an operatic composer, Dvořák is less widely known outside Czechoslovakia than he should be. His symphonic, choral and chamber music has been successful from relatively early times, initially perhaps because of the advocacy of Brahms, who introduced him to his publisher, Simrock, but the operas with their subjects embedded in Czech history and folklore have had a rougher ride. It would be foolish to deny that there may have been a grain of truth behind his remark to a friend that he regretted the amount of time he had spent writing operas; his natural bent lay elsewhere. Nonetheless, he wrote one opera of quite sovereign merit – Rusalka – and not only Czechs would mourn if the others did not exist.

Dvořák played the viola in the orchestra of the Prague Provisional Theatre from 1862 to 1871 (in that respect learning his trade, like Nielsen in Copenhagen), and his operatic output falls quite neatly into two halves: works written early in his career (between 1870 and 1888) and comprising seven operas, from Alfred to The Jacobin; and the three belonging to the final period, 1898–1903, comprising The Devil and Kate, Rusalka and Armida, as well as revisions of Dimitrij and The Jacobin. Rivalry between Dvořák and Smetana seems to have been a matter more for their adherents than for the composers themselves, who were on respectful terms, but the writer Zdeněk Nejedlý, in his enthusiasm for Smetana, stirred up feeling against Dvořák which Czech commentators maintain affected Czech musical life up to and including the scheduling by Supraphon of long-playing gramophone records in the second half of the twentieth century. H.

DIMITRIJ

Opera in four acts, libretto by Marie Červinková-Riegrová. Première, Prague, 8 October 1881; revision, Prague, 1894.

Dimitrij Ivanovic, assumed son of
Ivan the Terrible..... Tenor
 Marfa Ivanovna, widow of Ivan the Terrible ... Soprano
 Marina Mnishkova of the Sandomirs Soprano
 Xenia Borisovna, daughter of the late Tsar,
Boris Godunov..... Soprano
 Pyotr Fyodorovich Basmanov, commander of the Tsar's armies..... Bass
 Prince Vasili Ivanovich ShuiskyBaritone
 Yov, the Patriarch of Moscow.....Bass
 Neborsky, member of the Polish Contingent.....Tenor Buchinsky, member of the Polish Contingent...Baritone

Place: Moscow

Time: 1605–06

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Dvořák's longing for international reputation as an opera composer was a natural follow-up to his success in the symphonic and chamber fields. Wagner's enemy, the critic Eduard Hanslick, influenced him to re-write the episode of Xenia's murder in Act IV of Dimitrij, his sixth opera, in order to make it more acceptable for Vienna. Various other changes followed but, disappointingly, no performances abroad materialised and in 1894 the composer revised the entire score. This was not his last word on the subject and for the last production of the work in his lifetime (in 1904) he allowed a certain mixing of the two versions. Students of Janáček will not be surprised that Karel Kovařovic when he was Director of the National Opera in Prague subjected the score to further revision before he produced it in 1906, with considerable reversion to the original of 1886. Modern opinion inclines towards the first version, with some admixture of the later revision.

The subject matter of the libretto concerns the struggles for the Russian throne in the early seventeenth century, following the period of Tsar Boris Godunov's death. The pretender, Dimitrij, is here convinced (in contradistinction to the drama of Pushkin and Mussorgsky) of the legitimacy of his claim to the throne. That he owes his victory to Polish intervention in Russian politics is a considerable contributory factor to the tragedy which unfolds and ends with his death.

Act I. Boris is dead and factions quarrel about the succession. An invading army of Poles led by Dimitrij is nearing the city but the crowd hears from Patriarch Yov that the Boyars have taken an oath of allegiance to the late Tsar's children. Prince Shuisky adds his voice and warns of the consequences of victory for the Poles and the ruler they bring with them, but when Basmanov, the Commander of the Army, tells them that the Russian army has gone over to Dimitrij's side, the people swear loyalty to the new ruler. The mob has murdered Boris's son Feodor, and his daughter Xenia takes refuge with Shuisky, who sides with the old regime.

Dimitrij enters Moscow in a spirit more conciliatory than triumphant and immediately encounters Czarina Marfa, widow of Ivan the Terrible. She soon realises that Dimitrij is not her son but his charismatic behaviour she finds sympathetic and, partly driven by an instinct for revenge, she makes up her mind to acknowledge him publicly.

Act II. The wedding of Dimitrij and Marina Mnishkova is solemnised in the Kremlin. They are alone after the ceremony but their happiness is threatened by Marina's refusal to accede to Dimitrij's request that she become a Russian. At the celebratory court ball, Russians and Poles quarrel – the latter incited by the ambitious Marina – and only the intervention of Dimitrij prevents a serious clash.

Dimitrij goes to pray for peace in the cathedral of Uspensk. To this sanctuary comes Xenia in flight from marauding Poles and when Dimitrij successfully intervenes to protect her, it becomes evident in their extended duet that there is powerful mutual attraction between him and Xenia, who as yet has no idea who it was who saved her.

Prince Shuisky leads a group of Boyars met to form a patriotic alliance against the invading Dimitrij and the Poles, but their cause undergoes a severe setback when no sooner has Shuisky sworn that it was long ago that he himself saw the corpse of the true Dimitrij, than Dimitrij himself stands in front of the conspirators, and persuades the majority of them to join his faction.

Act III. Moscow. In a beautiful soliloquy, Dimitrij yearns for Xenia. He is saluted as Tsar by the assembled company and the Patriarch asks him publicly to intervene against the increasingly overweening Poles, in particular to forbid the Latin Mass being celebrated in the Kremlin. If it persists, the Orthodox Church will withhold recognition of his marriage to Marina. This causes consternation and fury among the Poles, but in Dimitrij's mind suggests the possibility of union with Xenia.

Xenia interrupts the altercation to intercede movingly for mercy for Prince Shuisky who is under sentence of death. She is taken aback when she recognises as Tsar the man who protected her earlier from molestation.

Dimitrij's luck is running out and when he pardons Shuisky, the Russians rejoice but the Poles are brought to the edge of rebellion. Marina, alone with Dimitrij and jealous of Xenia, tells him that she knows his true origin: his name is Grishko Optrepjev. Ever since he was a child, he was passed off as the murdered son of Tsar Ivan. Partly to save his position and partly to forestall the chaos which would follow his abdication, Dimitrij resolves to stay on the throne and, if he can, to reject Marina. The confrontation is on a grand scale and Marina for her part is sufficiently impressed by Dimitrij's determination to long to win him back.

Act IV. Shuisky's house in Moscow. Xenia is convinced she has been betrayed but Dimitrij pleads with her that his emotions have always been sincere.

Marina has overheard everything and attacks Xenia with a dagger (successfully, in the original version). Xenia convinces her that her love for Dimitrij originated long before she had any idea he was Tsar, and Marina takes her part against the Poles, who would have her killed. When the Patriarch makes his appearance, Xenia takes a vow to spend the rest of her days in a nunnery, which Dimitrij, even with the authority of the Tsar, cannot reverse. Marina in a spirit of revenge denounces him as a Pretender, Shuisky does his best to persuade Marfa to stand by her supposed son, Marfa agonises between expediency and the truth, but Dimitrij in the highly effective ensemble emerges at last as a true hero and prevents Marfa from committing the perjury demanded of her. The opera ends with the people praying over the dead body of the false Tsar whom Shuisky has shot. H.

THE JACOBIN

Jakobín

Opera in three acts, text by Marie Červinková-Riegrová. Première, Prague, 12 February 1889; revised version, Prague, 1898.

Count Vilém of Harasov, a retired general.....Bass
 Bohuš of Harasov, his son.....Baritone
 Adolf, his nephew.....Baritone
 Julie, wife of Bohuš.....Soprano
 Filip, the Count's steward (burgrave).....Bass
 Jiří, a young forester.....Tenor
 Benda, teacher and village choirmaster.....Tenor
 Terinka, his daughter.....Soprano
 Lotinka, housekeeper at the castle.....Contralto
 Townspeople, Schoolchildren, Musicians, Country Folk

Place: A Country Town in Bohemia

Time: During the French Revolution, 1793

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

The Jacobin was very much a product of Dvořák's maturity, in his canon coming after Dimitrij and before The Devil and Kate, another opera firmly rooted in the Czech nationalist tradition. It is odd to reflect that Dvořák was apparently in 1884, at the time he received Marie Červinková-Riegrová's libretto, looking for something a little less emphatically Czech, which would travel easily to the foreign capital cities where his symphonic work was now being performed. After some initial misgivings he had started to compose by November 1887 and a year later had completed the full score.

Act I. Bohuš and his wife Julie are returning from France to his native town, where he longs to be reconciled with his father. The machinations of his cousin Adolf have caused an estrangement, the old Count falsely believing Bohuš's liberal inclinations to have turned to positive support for the revolutionaries in France.

Townspeople come from church, among them Filip the Count's pompous steward, who flatters Benda, the schoolmaster, as a prelude to paying court to his daughter, Terinka. This infuriates Jiří, who is himself in love with Terinka and, egged on by his friends, makes elaborate mockery of the steward. Filip for his part threatens them all with conscription, but, in spite of his sarcastic interruptions, Jiří and Terinka sing ecstatically of their love for one another. The mood changes with the return of Bohuš and Julie, who describe themselves as itinerant performers and ask to see the Count. Filip is suspicious of this unexpected turn of events but matters are taken out of his hands by the appearance of the Count, who peremptorily announces that Bohuš is disinherited, Adolf now his heir.

Act II. A schoolroom, where Benda is rehearsing a serenade for performance up at the castle, a rehearsal with more affection in the way it is depicted than parody. Terinka is worried in case her father prefers Filip to Jiří as a suitor, and when, after a long and attractive duet, he catches her and Jiří together, she finds that he does. The young people threaten to ruin the serenade in which they have solo parts, but the contretemps is interrupted if not resolved by the exciting news that soldiers are searching the town for revolutionaries.

Bohuš and Julie come to ask for lodging. They are plainly speaking from the heart when (in a fine duet with nationalist overtones) they insist that only music sustained them in their wanderings abroad, and Benda finds it easy to agree to their request and let them stay. But things are not destined to go smoothly and the arrival of Filip to pursue his wooing of Terinka leads to his discovery of Jiří and immediate decision to list him for conscription. Even Benda's pleas on behalf of the serenade do no good and things go from bad to worse when Adolf puts a spoke in Jiří's wheel by backing Filip. Disaster looms nearer when Bohuš speaks up for Jiří and at the same time denounces Adolf, with the result that he is arrested as a revolutionary.

Act III. Up at the castle, Jiří attempts to tell the Count his son has come back, but Adolf has him ejected. With the help of Lotinka, the housekeeper, Julie and Benda manage to get near enough to the Count to make a plea for Bohuš, but the Count won't hear a word on behalf of his son whom he persists in thinking of as a Jacobin and a revolutionary. The Count reflects sadly on how hard he has made it to believe in his son's innocence, but he has reckoned without Julie who has concealed herself next door and, to the accompaniment of his dead wife's harp, sings what was once her favourite lullaby. Resistance crumbles and disappears altogether when she shows him a document which proves that, so far from having joined the Jacobins, Bohuš was once condemned to death by them.

The Count learns that his son is imprisoned in the castle, and as he listens to the serenade makes up his mind to see him after all. Reconciliation is in the air, and in an arioso added in the later revision, Bohuš sings with the utmost conviction of his dream of remaining at the home he has only just rediscovered. Bohuš and the Count are reunited, Adolf and Filip thwarted, and the way is clear for the marriage of Jiří and Terinka. Choral dancing brings this most Czech of operas to an end.

Apart from the period setting, the opera's subject matter is for Dvořák full of autobiographical overtones. He was born in a village a few miles north of Prague, near a castle; his mother's uncle and grandfather had served as stewards to a certain Count Kinsky; and his German teacher was a local school-master-organist, an obvious model for Benda even to the coincidence that he had a daughter called Terinka. His sister-in-law, whom he at one time wanted to marry, eventually became the wife of a nobleman on whose estate Dvořák himself built his family home.

Much of the music of The Jacobin is in the vein of Smetana's Bartered Bride, rhythmically very lively, full of dance overtones, peasant choruses and so on; but the story, based like Smetana's masterpiece on the idea of reconciliation, is far from full-blown comedy. Darker themes, music of considerable seriousness, characters whose very existence is threatened – these sombre shadows colour the score almost as insistently as its folkloric basis. The comedy figures of the affectionately drawn Benda and the only just less-than-sinister Filip bulk large in the opera but its character derives hardly less from the lyricism of Jiří and Terinka, and the darker, near-tragic predicament of Bohuš and his wife. H.

THE DEVIL AND KATE

Čert a Káča

Opera in three acts, text by Adolf Wenig on a Czech folk tale. Première, Narodni Divadlo, Prague, 23 November 1899, with well-known Czech singers – Ružena Maturová as the Princess, Bohumil Pták as Jirka – in the leading roles, Adolf Čech conducting.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Jirka, a shepherd | Tenor |
| Kate, a middle-aged spinster | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Her Mother | Contralto |
| Marbuel, a devil | Baritone |
| Lucifer | Bass |
| The Door-Keeper Devil | Bass |
| The Princess | Soprano |
| The Chambermaid | Soprano |
| The Marshal | Baritone |
| A Musician | Tenor |
| Courtiers, Villagers, Devils | |

Place: A Country Inn in Summer; Hell; the Princess's Castle

Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

More than ten years elapsed between The Jacobin (1888) and The Devil and Kate, a period Dvořák filled, operatically speaking, with revisions to Dimitrij and The Jacobin under his newly acquired interest in Wagnerian aesthetic. The latest opera, though a product of Dvořák's 'late' period, returns to the 'village comedy' atmosphere of the composer's earlier work, but the new emphasis on orchestral music gives it a fresh dimension, and, in spite of the oddity of its subject – no love interest! – it remains one of the most often played of Dvořák's operas.

Act I follows a substantial overture. A country inn. The villagers have some fun at Jirka's expense over the obviously amorous intentions of Kate towards him, a situation only underlined when the village lads so pointedly ignore Kate during a waltz that she announces she would willingly dance with the devil. Marbuel, dressed as a hunter, answers her call with exemplary alacrity, and starts to ask questions about the Princess and her overbearing steward – perhaps they are candidates for Hell? – but Kate is more interested in a drink, a spot of flirtation and a dance, the last to a whirlwind tune. Marbuel suggests she go with him, Jirka reappears to say he has been given the sack and has told the steward to go to Hell, whereupon Marbuel stamps his foot so that he and Kate disappear through a hole in the floor. The villagers have a fair idea where they have gone; Jirka says he will follow them.

Act II. Hell, where the gate-keeper snoozes, devils play cards and kettles are kept constantly on the boil. The prelude is atmospheric; Lucifer (tagged with a very attractive tune) asks for news of Marbuel's whereabouts. He appears with Kate, who scolds him about everything that comes into her mind. Lucifer wants the steward at least temporarily reprieved but the Princess brought down to Hell; he insists meanwhile they get rid of Kate. Jirka appears and suggests they pay her to go back to earth. What about some gold for him too? If Marbuel were to threaten the steward, Jirka could chase him away and claim a reward, suggests Marbuel. A great dance begins and during its course Jirka dances Kate out of the door, to general relief.

Act III. The Princess's castle. The Princess begins to see the error of her ways and to lament the prospect of Hell. Jirka persuades her to abolish serfdom, then suggests Kate should hide behind the palace door and so surprise the devil, who will have to pay ransom to get away from her. When Marbuel comes to take the Princess to Hell, Kate's appearance puts him to instant flight – Czech devils, it would appear (see Smetana's The Devil's Wall, page 739), are a bumbling crew, attempting much but achieving little; but that's how they like them. Kate gets her reward – a new house – and is confident she will soon get a bridegroom; the peasants get their freedom; and the Princess gets in Jirka a new Prime Minister. H.

RUSALKA

The Water Nymph

Opera in three acts, libretto by S.J. Kvapil. Première, National Theatre, Prague, 31 March 1901, with Maturová, Kabátová, Pták, Kliment, conductor Kovařovič (by 1950, the opera had been performed over six hundred times at the National Theatre). First performed in London by John Lewis Musical Society in 1950 in an English version by Christopher Hassall; Sadler's Wells, 1959, with Joan Hammond, Charles Craig, Howell Glynn, conductor Vilem Tausky; English National Opera, 1983, with Eilene Hannan, Lois McDonall, Sarah Walker, John Treleaven, Richard Van Allan, conductor Mark Elder.

Wood NymphsSoprano, Contralto
The Spirit of the LakeBass

Rusalka, *his daughter*Soprano
Ježibaba, the Witch.....Mezzo-Soprano
Voice of a Huntsman.....Baritone
The PrinceTenor
The Forester.....Baritone or Tenor
The Kitchen BoyMezzo-Soprano
The Foreign PrincessSoprano
Water Nymphs, Courtiers and Wedding Guests

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

In 1899, six months after finishing his comedy Čert a Kača (The Devil and Kate), Dvořák let it be known that he was looking for a new libretto. The thirty-one-year-old poet and dramatist, Jaroslav Kvapil, responded with one already written and Dvořák set Rusalka without asking for changes. The origins of the story lie in the French Mélusine, Hans Christian Andersen's Little Mermaid, Friedrich de la Motte Fouqué's Undine, and Gerhart Hauptmann's The Sunken Bell, and the resulting story and score are far from the kind of subject which was popular in Prague in the 1890s, when the tendency was for younger composers to turn to verismo rather than fairy story and folklore. But Rusalka is a triumph of lyricism at the service of a major symphonist, in the annals of Czech opera next in popularity to Smetana's Bartered Bride, and it is peculiar that for his last opera, Armida (1902/3), Dvořák should have chosen an almost baroque libretto.

Act I. The short and beautiful prelude admirably suggests the poetical, twilight atmosphere of the opera, its tenderness and yearning. In the fourth bar occurs an important melodic phrase associated with Rusalka and her native watery element (Ex. 1). A clearing on the shore of the lake; in the background, a cottage. The good-natured old Spirit of the Lake is tempted out of the lake depths, where he has his abode, by the spirited singing of the Wood Nymphs. When they have gone, Rusalka, heralded by the harp, rises from the water and sadly asks her father for advice. The music has a warmth and tenderness that is Dvořák at his finest as she tells him in an aria that she has fallen in love with a handsome young prince and wants to become human in order to know the bliss of union with him. Her confession fills her father with sadness, but he advises her to visit the old Witch who lives nearby. When she is alone Rusalka confides to the moon the secret of her longing – this passage is justly famous as one of the most touching and yet chaste of operatic love songs.

(Ex. 1)

Andante sostenuto

Rusalka calls to Ježibaba, the Witch, and in a passionate scena (Ex. 1 prominent in the orchestra) begs for her help. Ježibaba will grant her human attributes, but she will not be able to speak and, if he prove false to her, both she and her lover will be damned for ever. Together Rusalka and Ježibaba cast the spell. The voice of the Spirit of the Lake is raised in anguish from the depths, but Rusalka's decision is irrevocably taken.

The sound of horns and of a huntsman's song in the distance – rapt, intense, lyrical music – sets the scene for the Prince's entrance. He is in pursuit of a white doe, but feels a mysterious attraction when he is by the shores of the lake. He suspects magic but sends his companions back to the palace saying he wants to stay alone with whatever power rules the place. To the strains of Ex. 1, Rusalka comes into sight. The Prince is immediately enchanted at her appearance and sings her praises in music of the utmost tenderness (derived from the huntsman's distant song). Her sisters and the Spirit of the Lake are filled with alarm but without a word – in the Prince's presence she is dumb – Rusalka clings to him. He is enraptured – the music becomes a kind of one-handed love duet – and flinging his cloak round her, takes Rusalka off towards his palace.

Act II. The palace grounds. The palace is full of guests invited to the wedding of the Prince and the mysterious Rusalka. In a charming scene, a forester and a boy from the palace kitchen exchange the latest news – the kitchen boy is frankly scared by Rusalka, who gives him the creeps; the forester suspects witchcraft. There is more gossip: the Prince is said already to have begun to tire of his silent beauty and his eyes have turned towards a foreign Princess. They hurry out as the Prince and Rusalka are seen approaching. That she has given him so little sign of her love has begun to baffle him, and he fears for his happiness once they are married. When the foreign Princess comes by, the Prince sends Rusalka into the palace to dress for the ball and he himself goes off with the Princess, who clearly takes it as a personal slight that he is to marry Rusalka. Rusalka goes sadly into the palace as Ex. 1 is heard.

The dance music strikes up and a brilliant scene follows as the ball begins. It is temporarily interrupted by the melodious lament of the Spirit of the Lake, who emerges from the fountain to express his despair at the downfall of his favourite daughter. He continues to mourn while the chorus sings the beautiful 'White flowers are blooming by the way'. Rusalka runs to him and is now able to give passionate voice to her misery that the Prince has all evening paid court to the foreign Princess and not to her. Before long the Prince leads his new lady-love away from the dancing and their fiery duet contains all the warmth that the Prince had missed in Rusalka. They embrace, but Rusalka throws herself into her bridegroom's arms, and the Spirit of the Lake proclaims that the Prince will now never be free of her. The Prince implores the foreign Princess's help, but she turns proudly away from him.

Act III. A glade by the side of the lake, as in Act I. Evening. Rusalka is now the victim of her lover's infidelity and condemned to wander for ever as a will-o'-the-wisp. In a grandiose aria, with insidiously beautiful orchestral accompaniment, she longs for death, but Ježibaba comes out of her hut to say that only the shedding of human blood can now redeem her from the curse which hangs over her. Rusalka sings touchingly and resignedly of her fate and, as the Wood Nymphs comment on her short sojourn in the world, she sinks alone into the waters.

The forester and the kitchen boy come to ask the Witch to help the Prince, who is, they fear, under supernatural influence. The forester pushes the boy forward, but neither dares knock at the door. When Ježibaba answers to the cries of her name, she makes short work of their plea to help restore the confidence of the Prince, and between them she and the Spirit of the Lake put the timid pair to flight.

The Wood Nymphs gather at the side of the lake and sing and dance to music of graceful character – the first Nymph has a particularly appealing solo 'Golden is my Hair' – until stopped by the Spirit of the Lake, who reminds them of Rusalka's melancholy fate.

The Prince staggers out of the wood, muttering about the snow-white doe, which first led him here to Rusalka. He recognises the place and to the music in which he addressed her at their first meeting, calls on Rusalka to come back. It is a magically tender setting of Ex. 1 which returns Rusalka to him. The Prince begs her if she is a ghost to take his life too, and he asks her forgiveness for his cruelty towards her. Tenderly she reproaches him for having lied to her; she was not able to give him the passion he craved, and now, if she were to embrace him, he would die at her caress. In ecstatic phrases he begs for the kiss which will end his life, and he dies in her arms. Even the Spirit of the Lake's pronouncement that Rusalka's fate will not be mitigated by her lover's sacrifice cannot mar the apotheosis of Rusalka and the Prince through the love that finally they share.

In 1983 for English National Opera, David Pountney staged the opera as a young girl's dream of adolescence and awakening. The Spirit of the Lake was Rusalka's grandfather, the Wood Nymphs her sisters, the Prince an older man in whose presence the young girl is tongue-tied, and the foreign Princess a sophisticated threat to first love. The Witch became that Victorian source of comfort and enlightenment as well as of alarm, a black-bombazined and beetle-browed governess. The psychoanalysts Freud and Jung, the painters Magritte and Delvaux, the writer Apollinaire, bulk larger in this production than Hans Christian Andersen or de la Motte Fouqué, and there was protest at the lack of romantic trappings. Nonetheless, without the distancing almost inevitable with Prince and Witch, Water Spirit and trailing Nymphs, the tendency was for critics and most audiences to fall under the opera's spell as too seldom outside Czechoslovakia – too seldom at least for those of us who always found in Rusalka a rare and in my view complete vindication of the power of inspired lyricism to express drama and human emotion. H.

E

GOTTFRIED VON EINEM

(born 24 January 1918, died 12 July 1996)

DANTONS TOD

The Death of Danton

Opera in two parts, text by the composer and Boris Blacher after Büchner's drama of the same name (1835). First produced at the Salzburg Festival, 6 August 1947, with Maria Cebotari, Julius Patzak, Paul Schoeffler, conductor Ferenc Fricsay. Subsequently produced in Vienna, Hamburg, Berlin and Brussels. Revived Munich, 1956, conductor Lovro von Matačić; New York, City Opera, 1966 (in English), with John Reardon, conductor Ernst Märzendorfer; Berlin, 1967, with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau; Vienna, 1967, with Lisa Della Casa, Eberhard Wächter, conductor Josef Krips; Rome, 1970, with Maria Chiara, Mario Basiola (jr.), conductor Bruno Bartoletti; Brighton Festival, 1997.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Georges Danton..... | Baritone |
| Camille Desmoulins..... | Tenor |
| Hérault de Séchelles | Tenor |
| Robespierre..... | Tenor |
| Saint-Just | Bass |
| Herrmann, President of the Revolutionary Tribunal | Baritone |
| Simon, a prompter | Buffo Bass |
| A Young Man | Tenor |
| First Executioner | Tenor |
| Second Executioner | Tenor |
| Julie, Danton's wife | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Lucile, Desmoulins's wife | Soprano |
| A Woman | Soprano |
| Madame Simon..... | Contralto |

Men and Women of the People

Place: Paris

Time: 1794

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Einem's first opera was written towards the end of the Second World War at the suggestion of his teacher, Boris Blacher, with whom he collaborated in adapting Büchner's play for the operatic stage. Few operas of this vintage and of German or Austrian background have stayed so persistently in the repertory, a survival due as much to musical strength as to dramatic excellence.

Act I, scene i. Danton and his friends are in the Gaming Rooms. The scene is lively and conversational and there are spirited and pointed exchanges – it is the year 1794 and the power of Robespierre is absolute. Most of those who fought in the struggle for freedom have by now been liquidated. Camille Desmoulins, a younger revolutionary leader and a friend of Danton's, states his view that the moment has now come to call a halt. He is revolted by the ever-increasing number of executions and urges Danton himself to oppose Robespierre's reign of terror. Danton however seems to have grown tired and sceptical and events have caused him to lose his faith in human virtue. 'The statue of freedom is not yet cast; the furnace is glowing and we can all burn our fingers on it.'

Scene ii. An urgently lyrical interlude takes us from the leaders of the revolution to the people who are led. The theatrical prompter, Simon, is furious with his wife because, as he thinks, she has put their daughter on the streets, and the choruses have a savage note as the crowd masses to listen to Simon inveigh against the rich who can buy the love of the poor. They seize a young aristocrat and are about to hang him from the nearest lamp-post when he catches their fancy with a cool witticism and to his surprise finds his death sentence commuted to a round of applause. Robespierre himself appears before the excited crowd and announces new death sentences, to popular acclaim. The lonely figure is chillingly characterised in music and, when the crowd leaves the square and Danton enters it, the contrast between the two is very marked. Danton challenges his opponent with 'You are disgustingly upright', but Robespierre's reaction is completely without heat, though the short scene is one of considerable power. No sooner has Danton departed, to Robespierre's comment that he must clearly be done away with, than St-Just enters with documentary evidence to support Danton's indictment before the tribunal. Camille Desmoulins must also die – Robespierre hesitates for a moment since Camille was his friend, then, as near to passion as his nature can contrive, makes his decision: 'Away with them. Quickly. Only the dead do not return.' The orchestra's larghetto coda underlines the dictator's final words, 'They all desert me. All is bare and empty. I am alone.'

Scene iii. The Desmoulins' house. Camille, who is an enthusiastic patriot and humanist, is in conversation with Lucile his wife and Danton his friend. Danton is called out of the room, and immediately the tone of the music becomes lyrical as Camille and Lucile sing of their involvement, only a moment later to be interrupted by Danton's re-entry to tell them that he has been denounced and that the committee has decided on his arrest. His friends beg him to escape but he refuses: 'I shall know how to die courageously. It is easier than living.' Camille, who has no suspicion that his own arrest is impending, wants to talk to Robespierre, but his departure leaves Lucile full of foreboding. In an effective aria she reflects on the horror of the times in which they live, then rushes out into the street to look for Camille, their thoughts underlined by a funeral march in the orchestra.

Act II, scene iv. Arrests have continued and Danton and Camille and many of their friends now lie in prison. The dark scene shows at the same time the interior of the prison and its exterior, where the mob rages. At first their enthusiasm is for the newly arrested leaders, but soldiers are in front of the jail, and Simon stirs them to hatred with his allegations that Danton has lived in luxury, for all the world like any aristocrat, while Robespierre has trodden the path of virtue and righteousness: 'Long live Robespierre, down with the traitors.'

The interior of the prison now lights up, showing a group of prisoners, among them Danton and Camille, who are awaiting trial. Camille is full of thoughts of Lucile and cannot accept that his life hangs in the balance. Danton, in contrast, awaits death with sad composure, and his beautiful monologue perfectly expresses his resignation. Lucile appears at the barred window of the prison, driven mad by sorrow but still able to recognise Camille and speak to him. The voices of Danton, Camille and Lucile blend in a beautiful trio which is supported and then interrupted by the shouting of the other prisoners as they rattle the bars of their windows.

Scene v. The Revolutionary Tribunal. Herrmann presides and the scene begins with the hearing of Danton's case, to constant interruptions from the mob. Danton passionately denies the charge that he has conspired with the royalists and the aristocrats, and when he reminds the court of his own revolutionary achievements, the power of his oratory starts to win over the crowd. Herrmann announces a recession, and Saint-Just brings in new evidence. When the court reassembles, Danton speaks even more boldly than before and in a great prophetic speech the accused becomes the accuser of a bloody regime. The mob starts to turn against Robespierre, and the scene ends in tumult as the prisoners are hustled out by soldiers.

The last scene takes place in the public square, where a mob surrounds the guillotine, dancing and singing the Carmagnole in celebration of the impending executions. Danton's passion may have carried the mob at his trial, but the verdict has already been decided and nothing now will prevent the mob's enjoyment of its favourite form of entertainment. A tumbril brings in Danton, Camille and Hérault who sing bravely: 'Our enemy is the stupidity of the masses which can be pierced only by the sword of the spirit.' The crowd continues to roar the Carmagnole as Danton and his two friends mount the scaffold and, after a few words from each to the crowd, the executions proceed.

The heads are in the basket, the show is over, the crowd can leave and night has fallen. Two executioners are tidying up after the day's work, singing a sentimental song as they clean. When they leave, Lucile appears and stands on the steps of the guillotine, singing forlornly of what she and France have lost. Whatever her state of mind, she cannot forget Camille and the last word will inevitably be with the guillotine.

DER BESUCH DER ALTEN DAME

The Visit of the Old Lady

Opera in three acts, libretto by Friedrich Dürrenmatt, adapted from his tragi-comedy of the same name (1956). First performed at the Staatsoper, Vienna, 23 May 1971, with Christa Ludwig as Claire Zachanassian, conducted by Horst Stein. First U.S. performance, War Memorial Opera House, San Francisco, 1972, with Regina Resnik, conducted by Maurice Peress, directed by Francis Ford Coppola. First U.K. performance, Glyndebourne (in English, at the composer's insistence), 1973, with Kerstin Meyer, conducted by John Pritchard. Revived Zurich, 1971, with Astrid Varnay; Berlin, 1972, with Patricia Johnson.

The Visitors

| | |
|--|-----------------|
| Claire Zachanassian, multi-millionairess..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Her Husband VII | Actor |
| Husband IX | Tenor |
| The Butler | Character Tenor |
| Toby, Roby, chewing chewing-gum | Actors |
| Koby, Loby, blind | Tenors |

The Visited

| | |
|----------------------------------|-----------------|
| Alfred Ill | High Baritone |
| His Wife | Lyrical Soprano |
| His Daughter | Mezzo-Soprano |
| His Son | Tenor |
| The Mayor | Heldentenor |
| The Preacher | Bass-Baritone |
| The Teacher | Baritone |
| The Doctor | Baritone |
| The Policeman | Bass-Baritone |
| First Woman | Soprano |
| Second Woman | Soprano |
| Hofbauer } citizens | Tenor |
| Helmesberger } | Baritone |

The rest

| | |
|----------------------|---------------|
| Station Master | Bass-Baritone |
| Train Driver | Bass |
| Conductor | Tenor |
| Reporter | Spoken Role |
| Cameraman | Bass |
| A Voice | Tenor |

Citizens of Güllen

Place: Güllen, a Small Town in Central Europe

Time: The Present

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Act I, scene i. Station I. Güllen's male citizens wait for the return of Claire Zachanassian: she left the town forty-five years ago. Now Güllen is bankrupt and she is a billionaire. Her close friend, when they were young, was Alfred Ill, now the most popular man in town, scheduled to be mayor next year. Can he persuade her to save Güllen? He remembers her as 'devilishly beautiful' and claims that it was only life itself that separated them. The express train stops unexpectedly: Zachanassian pulled the emergency cord. Her entry is to an elegant adagio: von Einem's music highlights an unexpected aspect to her character, her grace and her unlikely charm. Ill assures her she hasn't changed, but she laughs and reveals that her left leg is an ivory prosthesis. She presents her seventh husband, an actor with a black moustache, whom she calls Moby. Before leaving in a litter to visit the sites of her affair with Alfred, the barn and the wood, she mentions that she brought a coffin along with her luggage. The last members of her entourage appear, Koby and Loby, two smiling, blind eunuchs.

Scene ii. The Konradswiel wood. An atmospheric chorus representing the 'authentic German, rooted wilderness' sets the Romantic scene. Zachanassian remembers how she and Alfred met and kissed here, when she was seventeen and he was twenty. Then he married a grocer's daughter and she an Armenian millionaire, who found her in a Hamburg brothel. Alfred tells her that since she left, he has been living in hell. 'And I have become hell', she replies. She promises that she won't leave Güllen in the lurch.

Scene iii. The Golden Apostle. Zachanassian asks the Doctor if he fills out death certificates and tells him in future to put 'heart attack'. In his speech the Mayor praises her sense of justice and her philanthropy. She offers 500 million to the town and 500 million to be distributed among the citizens – on one condition. Her butler Boby, formerly Güllen's judge, explains that forty-five years ago he presided over the case brought by Claire Zachanassian, then Klara Wäscher, who accused Alfred Ill of being the father of her child. Ill denied the charge and bribed two false witnesses to swear that they slept with Klara. Now called Koby and Loby, they recount how Zachanassian later had them tracked down, blinded and castrated. Claire's child died after a year; the verdict forced her to become a prostitute. Now she wants justice: she offers a billion to Güllen, if someone kills Alfred Ill. The Mayor rejects her offer – 'better poor than spotted with blood' – to tremendous applause. The act ends with Claire's words, 'I'm waiting'.

Act II, scene iv. The grocer's shop I. A series of customers buy expensive goods from Alfred Ill, all on credit, in exquisite, lilting 3/4 time. They insist that they support him and are 'dead sure' he will be mayor next year. Ill loses his temper, shouts 'What are you going to pay with?' and throws goods at them.

Scene v. The sacristy. Ill comes for comfort, but the Priest is more concerned about Ill's immortal soul than his life, and suggests he should repent. This scene is one of the best: the confrontation between high baritone and bass-baritone manages to refer to the scene in Don Carlos between Philip II and the Grand Inquisitor without merely imitating it. When the church bell rings (to magnificent effect), Ill realises it is new. The Priest cannot keep up the hypocrisy: embracing Ill he tells him to run away: to stay is 'to lead [them] into temptation'.

Scene vi. Station II. The station has been smartened up. A poster advertises the Passion Plays in Oberammergau, a parallel made in the music by the choral writing, which briefly borrows from Bach's Passions.¹ Ill appears with his suitcase, but is soon surrounded, 'as though by chance', by all the inhabitants of Gullen. They assure him no one wants to kill him. When the train arrives, they even tell him to go on board. He hides his face in his hands and admits, 'I am lost!'

Act III, scene vii. The barn. Claire Zachanassian is wearing a wedding dress, veil etc., having married her ninth husband in Gullen's church.² The Teacher and Doctor ask her to spend less and invest in the town, but it turns out that she already owns everything and has deliberately let it rot. The Teacher appeals to her humanity. 'The world turned me into a whore', she answers, 'now I turn it into a brothel.' The brass intervene between the sung phrases to highlight the menace that is not apparent on the surface.

Scene viii. The grocer's shop II. The shop has been redecorated. Ill's children now have expensive tastes; his wife has a fur coat ('on approval'). The Mayor calls in, and leaves a gun, even though Ill says he does not need it. The community are to meet that evening. Ill agrees to abide by their decision. The Mayor goes on to suggest that Ill does need the gun, as a man of honour ... With great dignity, Ill agrees to accept the verdict, but not to execute it himself. The scene ends in a gruesomely lightfooted dance, as Ill's family assemble in their best clothes for a drive to the wood in his son's new Mercedes.

Scene ix. The Konradswel wood II. Claire introduces Ill to her ninth husband, a Nobel prizewinner. Ill tells her that when the town meets tonight, he expects to be sentenced to death. She promises to bury his body in the mausoleum she has built in Capri.

Scene x. The theatre auditorium. The media are present. The Teacher asks the citizens to consider the injustice they had tolerated, for 'This is not a question of money (tremendous applause)'. Apart from Ill, they vote unanimously 'with a pure heart to see justice realised'. The proceedings take on a solemn, ritual aspect, though the sequence has to be repeated when the cameraman reports a technical hitch. Once the media and the women have left, the Mayor orders the doors to be shut and the lights extinguished. In the moonlight the men form a tunnel. Ill is surrounded and disappears from view. The percussion erupt and die down, but drumbeats continue to the end. The Doctor kneels at the corpse's side and diagnoses 'heart attack', which the Mayor interprets 'dead from joy'. Claire gazes at Ill's face and orders his body to be brought to the coffin. On her way out she hands the Mayor a cheque. The tempo changes to molto allegro, the Mayor begins to dance and everybody joins in. The infectious jollity makes for a memorable, gruesomely repellent end.

There are several moments, particularly in the opening scenes, when von Einem seems to have been daunted by the demanding, witty density of Dürrenmatt's text. For the sake of audibility, he reins the music in so sharply that it seems unduly reticent. He makes up for it in the interludes, mini-concertos for percussion and timpani that keep the issue of violence at the forefront of our awareness. When it was first performed in Britain Der Besuch der Alten Dame made a mixed impression: Desmond Shawe-Taylor in The Sunday Times playfully quoted his companion, who insisted it was 'Albert Herring refurbished'. He then explained that the 'action, ¹ In case we still have not got the point, the Teacher mentions in the next scene that his 'mixed choir' performed extracts from Bach's St Matthew Passion at Zachanassian's wedding.

² The score specifies ninth, but productions generally amend this to eighth husband.

superficially amusing, fundamentally appalling, is an obvious allegory of the corruption of capitalism and liberal democracy, but it stirs no indignation or pity, or satiric rage in the spectator, it just keeps him comfortably entertained – which might, I suppose, be regarded as the final turn of the screw'. For William Mann in The Times it was 'musically forgettable'.

P.

GEORGES ENESCO

(born 19 August 1881, died 3 May 1955)

OEDIPE

Oedipus

Opera in four acts, libretto by Edmond Fleg (after Sophocles and earlier sources). Première, Opéra, Paris, 13 March 1936, with André Pernet, conductor Philippe Gaubert (revived there 1937 but not thereafter). First performed Brussels, 1956, with Germain Ghislain; Bucharest in Romanian, 1958 (in 1963 in Paris in this version, which was also recorded); Berlin and Vienna, 1996–7, conductor Lawrence Foster.

Oedipe (Oedipus) Bass-Baritone
Tirésias (Tiresias), a seer Bass-Baritone
Créon (Creon), a Prince of Thebes Bass
A Shepherd Tenor
Theban High Priest Bass
Phorbas, Queen Mérope's counsellor Baritone
A Watchman Bass
Thésée (Theseus), King of Attica Baritone
Laios (Laius), King of Thebes Tenor
Jocaste (Jocasta), Queen of Thebes Mezzo-Soprano
The Sphinx Contralto
Antigone, Oedipe's daughter Soprano
Mérope (Merope), Queen of Corinth Contralto
A Theban Woman Mezzo-Soprano
Men and Women of Thebes, Corinth and Athens

Place: Thebes, Corinth, Attica

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 3 hours

Enesco was a musical polymath: composer, violinist, pianist, conductor, teacher, mentor. As a composer, he worked slowly and painstakingly, leaving only thirty-three works to which he attached opus numbers.

The genesis of Oedipe itself was slow. Enesco had for several years wanted to write an opera when in 1909 at the Comédie-Française he saw a performance of Sophocles' King Oedipus with Mounet-Sully in the title role. Wartime commitments prevented him starting the music until the beginning of 1921. Excerpts were performed in the 1920s but the orchestration was not completed until mid-1931 and Enesco continued to work on it up to the première in 1936.

Act III corresponds roughly with Sophocles' King Oedipus (Stravinsky's source) and Act IV with Oedipus at Colona, but the first two acts are taken from Greek legends not previously staged. Oedipe amounts to a vast work, and its greatest admirers make vast claims for it – 'one of the peaks of twentieth-century music, it is among a handful of works that are to be reckoned on a par with Pelléas, Wozzeck, Lulu or Die Soldaten', says Harry Halpreich in notes to the complete French recording – and there is no doubt that it is a work of high seriousness and noble aspiration, though not yet one which has caught the imagination of opera planners.

Act I. A gloomy prelude in G minor introduces the Royal Palace of Thebes, where the people hymn the child newly born to Queen Jocasta and King Laius. As Jocasta and Laius discuss how to name the baby they are warned by Tiresias that the child is doomed to kill his father and marry his mother. As the horror of the prophecy sinks in, Laius gives the baby to the Shepherd; he is to abandon him in the mountains.

Act II, scene i. Twenty years later. King Polybus' and Queen Merope's palace in Corinth. Oedipus, who has consulted the Oracle and knows what is foretold, refuses to reveal to Phorbas, the Queen's counsellor, the cause of his gloom. But to Merope, whom he believes his mother, he confesses. Her protests are genuine enough; she has no idea that her own child died at birth and was replaced by Oedipus. He tells Merope of the prophecy and leaves Corinth.

Scene ii. A vigorous orchestral interlude leads to the insidious flute playing of the Shepherd. We are at the crossroads.

A chariot appears, and the impetuous King Laius strikes out at Oedipus, who in a scene of uncommon violence kills him, his guard and the charioteer. Sombre music of less vigorous cast takes us towards Thebes (scene iii) where crouches the sleeping Sphinx. A watchman attempts to warn off Oedipus. Whoever can answer the Sphinx's riddles will save the town, be offered the crown and win Jocasta as wife. The Sphinx wakes to mock Oedipus. Then comes the question: name something or someone greater than Destiny. 'Man is stronger than Destiny', answers Oedipus – correctly – and the Sphinx, cackling with manic laughter – ironical? triumphant? – expires. The watchman is transformed from harbinger of doom to herald of victory and peace. Jocasta comes out to welcome Oedipus and the music of rejoicing changes to the sound of the Shepherd's flute; destiny has caught up with Oedipus.

Act III. Thebes; twenty years later. Funeral processions pass in the background. Oedipus has sent an envoy, the Queen's brother Creon, to Delphi to consult the Oracle. Creon returns to say that the murderer of Laius is within the city; if he can be found and punished, the plague will pass. A shepherd witnessed the murder all those years ago and Creon has summoned him, together with the seer Tiresias. Oedipus endorses the action taken: the murderer shall be exiled. Tiresias prevaricates, then points to Oedipus as the killer of Laius. Oedipus rails at Tiresias, and turns on Creon and banishes him.

Jocasta is unconvinced by Tiresias' pronouncement; did he not once foretell that her son would kill his father, whereas Laius was in point of fact killed by brigands? Oedipus feels the trap closing. The Shepherd confirms his worst fears as Phorbas comes in to reveal that Merope and Polybus were not his parents but he was their adopted son. With a great cry Oedipus acknowledges the truth and rushes into the palace, to re-appear blind. A woman announces that Jocasta has killed herself. Oedipus' daughter Antigone prepares to help him on his way into exile.

Act IV. A sacred wood near Attica. Theseus, King of Athens, sings of justice and peace. Oedipus and Antigone come into sight, but the peaceful atmosphere is shattered by the arrival of Creon, hypocritically trying to bolster his own shaky position by persuading Oedipus to resume the throne of Thebes. Theseus intervenes and Oedipus is allowed a grand apologia: 'I have done nothing! Did I have any part in the crimes ordained by Destiny before I was born?'¹

The opera ends in an atmosphere of serenity as Oedipus, followed by Theseus and leading Antigone, goes peacefully towards his last resting place, his sight restored.

H.

¹ Translation by John Rushby-Smith.

F

MANUEL DE FALLA

(born 23 November 1876, died 14 November 1946)

LA VIDA BREVE

The Short Life

Opera in two acts, text by C. Fernandez Shaw; French version by P. Milliet. Première, Nice, 1 April 1913, with Lillian Grenville, David Devriès, Cotreuil, conductor Miranne. First performed Opéra-Comique, Paris, 1914, with Carré, Brohly, Francell, Vieuille, conductor Ruhlmann; Madrid, 1914; Buenos Aires, 1923, with Hina Spani; Metropolitan, 1926, with Bori, Tokatyan, d'Angelo, conductor Serafin. Revived la Scala, Milan, 1952, with Araujo, Francesco Albanese, Beuf, conductor Giulini; Holland Festival, 1953, with de los Angeles, Vroons; Edinburgh Festival, 1958, with de los Angeles.

Salud, *a gipsy*Soprano
Her GrandmotherMezzo-Soprano
Carmela, *a young girl*Mezzo-Soprano
PacoTenor
Uncle SarvaorBass
A SingerBaritone
Manuel, *Carmela's brother*Baritone
A Voice in the ForgeTenor
Voice of a Street-SellerTenor
A Distant VoiceTenor

Place: Granada

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 1 hour 10 minutes

La Vida Breve is the earliest of Falla's works which is still generally performed. It was written in 1904–05 and won a prize in Madrid, but was not immediately mounted on the stage. When Falla went to Paris, he took the score with him, and the work was finally performed in 1913.

Act I. The curtain rises after a dozen bars of introduction. Courtyard of a gipsy habitation. On one side of the stage, the house where the gypsies live, on the other the entrance to a smithy, from which can be heard a mysterious sound of singing. Salud's old grandmother is feeding some birds in a cage. One is going to die, she thinks – perhaps of love, like Salud. The voices of street-sellers (off-stage, like that of the soloist in the smithy) can be heard.

Salud comes in from the street, looking unhappy. Her grandmother tries to reassure her; of course Paco will come. Salud is fearful that she may lose one of the two things she most values: the love of Paco and of her grandmother. Alone Salud listens to the voices from the forge, and then sings a song with a sad philosophy – long live those who laugh, short life to those who cry: 'Vivan los que rien!' The poignant beauty of the music is like that of a folk-song, and indeed it is founded on the Andalusian style.

Her grandmother comes to tell Salud that Paco is on his way. Her joy is complete, and in their duet her sincerity and innocence contrast with his more conventional utterances. Salud's grandmother and her uncle observe the scene, and he mutters that he would gladly take revenge on Paco, whom he knows to be going to marry another girl the very next day. He is only playing with Salud.

The second scene is in the form of an intermezzo. A view of Granada from Sacro Monte can be seen.

Act II. A small street in Granada. Through the open railings can be seen the courtyard in which is being celebrated the betrothal of Paco and Carmela with song and dance. A professional singer performs an Andalusian song, which is followed by a dance, made famous all over the world by generations of fiddlers who have appropriated it as an encore piece.

Just before the dance finishes, Salud appears and rushes to see what is going on. She is in despair when she finds her worst fears realised, and Paco laughing and talking with the girl who is separating them for ever. Her grief spills over in a terrible lament, and she longs for death. Her grandmother and uncle arrive, and the latter tries to relieve the situation by cursing Paco and everything to do with him. Salud hears Paco's voice and makes up her mind to speak to him once again. She repeats the sad song of the forge.

During an interlude the scene changes to the courtyard of the house. Immediately the curtain rises there is a dance, hardly less well known than the previous one. Paco has heard the voice of Salud and is uneasy. Manuel makes a speech to congratulate the happy pair, but Paco becomes more and more uncomfortable as Uncle Sarvaor comes into the patio, followed by Salud. Sarvaor offers their services to entertain the company, but Salud denounces Paco's treachery towards her in tones that would almost appear calm did they not so obviously conceal deep feeling. She falls dead of shock at Paco's feet, and her grandmother and Uncle Sarvaor curse Paco as the curtain falls. H.

EL RETABLO DE MAESE PEDRO

Master Peter's Puppet Show

Opera in one act, libretto by the composer from an episode in the twenty-sixth chapter of the second part of Cervantes's Don Quixote de la Mancha. Written for Princesse Edmond de Polignac, the première was in her drawing room, 25 June 1923, with Amparito Peris, Thomas Salignac, Hector Dufranne, conductor Golschmann (publicly in Paris later the same year). First performed Seville in concert, 23 March 1923, with Redondo, Segura, Lledo, conductor Falla; Bristol, 1924 (in English). Revived Ingestre Festival, England, 1957, with Adèle Leigh, conductor Pritchard.

| | |
|--|-----------------------------------|
| Don Quixote | Bass or Baritone |
| Master Peter | Tenor |
| The Boy (El Trujamán) | |
| | Boy Soprano or High Mezzo-Soprano |
| Sancho Panza | Silent |
| The Innkeeper | Silent |
| The Scholar | Silent |
| The Page | Silent |
| The Man with the Lances and Halberds | Silent |

Figures in the puppet show

Charlemagne
Don Gayferos
Don Roland

Melisendra
King Marsilius
The Enamoured Moor

Heralds, Knights, etc., at Court of Charlemagne; Moors

Running Time: 30 minutes

The little opera was originally intended to be performed entirely with puppets, double-sized when doing duty for human beings, ordinary-sized when representing puppets. The action takes place in the stable of an inn at la Mancha on the borders of Aragon. At the back of the stable is the puppet-show itself, standing on legs covered by curtains, behind which Master Peter works the puppets. The work introduces Master Peter and the stage audience, and then tells the story of the Deliverance of Melisendra, each episode being first introduced by the boy narrator in an extraordinary recitative style and afterwards mimed by the puppets. At the end Don Quixote interrupts the action. The grave beauty of much of the music, the irresistible liveliness of the boy's narration (when it is properly performed¹), and Falla's fastidious orchestration (note the subtle use of muted trumpet throughout) and vivid sense of contrast as evidenced in the different sections, combine to make a work of peculiar distinction.

The wind section over a side drum plays a southern, cornemuse type of tune, a bell rings and Master Peter invites the guests at the inn to come to the show. While the orchestra plays Master Peter's Symphony, a combination of dignity and impudence in 6/8, the audience assembles, the last to appear being Don Quixote and Sancho Panza. The boy announces that they will see the story of the Deliverance of the fair Melisendra by her husband Don Gayferos from her captivity by the Moors. In the first scene, Don Gayferos is discovered playing chess with Don Roland. The Emperor Charlemagne, Melisendra's father, is furious that Don Gayferos prefers gaming to rescuing his imprisoned wife. Gayferos overturns the chess board, tries unsuccessfully to borrow Roland's sword, then prepares to set out alone to rescue his wife.

The second scene shows the Moorish Tower of Saragossa, where Melisendra appears on a balcony. A Moor creeps up behind her and steals a kiss, whereupon Marsilius, King of the Moors, orders that he be whipped. In the third scene, he is to receive 200 strokes, a sentence carried out summarily, says the boy, and without legal proceedings. At this Don Quixote interrupts to complain about the boy's embroidery of the story: there must always be a legal weighing of the evidence – Master Peter agrees with him: 'Sing your proper plainsong and do not meddle with other voices, for much counterpoint ruins the lute strings.' The fourth scene shows Don Gayferos crossing the Pyrenees on horseback – a perfect piece of musical stylisation – from time to time sounding his hunting horn. In the fifth scene, Melisendra, who at first does not recognise her husband, is rescued and carried away to safety.

¹ The boy's voice must be 'nasal and rather forced – the voice of a boy shouting in the street ... devoid of all lyrical feeling. It should be sung by a boy soprano, but when this is not possible, a woman's voice (high mezzo-soprano) may be used.'

The sixth scene shows the pursuit by the Moors. The boy starts by wishing the couple happiness and long life in the most flowery terms, and is again pulled up by Master Peter for departing from the text. The alarm is given and the bells ring out from the mosques and minarets – Don Quixote objects: 'among Moors is no ringing of bells, but beating of drums and squealing hautboys'. Master Peter pleads stage licence, and the boy describes the Moorish horsemen setting out to overtake the fugitives. Don Quixote can bear the tension no longer, but sword in hand leaps into the puppet show and proceeds to attack the Moorish puppets, beheading some, knocking others over and dealing destruction all round, in spite of the protests of Master Peter. In some beautiful phrases Don Quixote invokes Dulcinea, praises the deeds of the knights errant, and the opera ends with him triumphant, and Master Peter sadly contemplating the ruin of his puppets. H.

GABRIEL FAURÉ

(born 12 May 1845, died 4 November 1924)

PÉNÉLOPE

Opera in three acts, libretto by René Fauchois. Première Monte Carlo, 4 March 1913, with Lucienne Bréval, Charles Rousselière, conductor Léon Jehin. First performed in Paris at Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, 1913, with Bréval, Muratore, conductor Hasselmans; Brussels, 1913, with Croiza, Darmel; Opéra-Comique, 1919, with Germaine Lubin, Rousselière. Revived Opéra, 1943, with Lubin, Jouatte; Bordeaux, 1957, with Régine Crespin, Raoul Jobin; Buenos Aires, 1962, with Crespin, Guy Chauvet; Nantes, 1996, with Isabelle Vernet.

Ulysse (Ulysses), King of Ithaca.....Tenor
Eumée (Eumaeus), an old shepherd.....Baritone

Pénélope's suitors

Antinoös.....Tenor
Eurymaque (Eurymachus).....Baritone
Léodès (Laertes).....Tenor
Ctésippe (Ctesippos).....Baritone
Pisandre (Pisander).....Baritone

A Shepherd.....Tenor

Pénélope, Queen of Ithaca.....Soprano

Euryclee (Eurycleia), Ulysse's nurse....Mezzo-Soprano

Servants

Cléone.....Mezzo-Soprano
Melantho.....Soprano

Alkandre.....Mezzo-Soprano
Phylo.....Soprano
Lydie.....Soprano

Eurynome, the housekeeper.....Soprano

Shepherds, Servants, Dancers and Flute Players

Place: Ithaca

Time: Twelfth (or Thirteenth) Century B.C.

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Pénélope is Gabriel Fauré's first true opera, composed when he was fifty, thirteen years after Prométhée, a big-scale drama, which used many operatic ingredients. Its success has been spasmodic, Fauré's admirers, such as the composer Koechlin, insisting on it not only as a major work of one of France's leading composers but also as something of a landmark in the history of French lyric drama, its detractors finding it undramatic. It has been the subject of occasional revival but has never truly established itself, even in the French capital.

Act I. Pénélope waits for her husband Ulysse, plagued not only by the pretenders to his throne and his marriage bed, but also by her own efforts to retain faith in his ultimate return. The first three scenes, playing in an ante-room to Pénélope's chamber, serve as exposition. After a prelude, which aptly sets out the opera's seriousness of purpose, we meet Pénélope's serving maids, who admit that in Pénélope's place they would long since have succumbed to the suitors' blandishments. The suitors suddenly push their way in, demanding to see the Queen, and opposed by the aged Eurycleé; when Pénélope herself appears, it is with incomparable dignity of posture, music and phrase, and the music is fired to splendour as she protests that Ulysse, her husband, has bidden her wait for him; every day she expects him to return, in all the glory in which he left. The suitors are cynical but worried that the shroud she has been weaving for old Léodès, the father of Ulysse, is still far from finished, and the Queen thus protected from their wooing by their promise to respect her privacy until she has finished the shroud. She must work under their supervision.

Eurymaque signs for flute players and dancers to enter, which they do to a most attractive tune in triple time. Deaf to the suitors' blandishments, Pénélope, in another moment of musical inspiration, launches a last appeal: 'Ulysse, proud husband ... gentle warrior ... come, help me in my distress', and outside a voice answers her appeal. It is Ulysse, disguised as an old beggar. In spite of the opposition of the suitors, Pénélope receives him and promises him hospitality. As every other night, she refuses an invitation to the feast, and the suitors go off with the more amenable of the palace girls.

Pénélope confides the old man to the care of Eurycleé, who is not long in recognising him. When she is alone, Pénélope starts, as is her wont every night, to unravel the work she has done during the day, but this time the suitors surprise her and insist that the very next day she choose between them.

The old beggar returns, and his words are of such comfort that Pénélope agrees to take him with them when she and Eurycleé mount their nightly vigil on the hill which commands a view of the sea and any approaching ship. Left alone for a moment, Ulysse voices his excitement in exuberant phrases.

Act II. A shepherd is singing mournfully of his occupation. Pénélope comes to the promontory, followed by Eurycleé and Ulysse. Memories of her husband crowd in on her, and in a duet with the old man she is told that the warrior king has lived under his roof in Crete for twelve days. His description of Ulysse convinces Pénélope, and before long he is assuring her of Ulysse's innermost feelings. Suddenly the old man proposes a stratagem: let Pénélope yield only to the suitor who can bend the great bow Ulysse left behind him! She agrees and goes sadly home, while Ulysse, galvanised to life, calls together the shepherds, makes himself known to them, and enlists their help.

Act III. The act opens with great urgency as Ulysse reveals that he has chosen the great sword of Hercules with which to wreak his vengeance. Eurycleé is overcome by the Queen's distress, but Ulysse reassures her: the stratagem will work and by nightfall she will have seen her mistress smile again. Eumée arrives to tell the King that fate has played into their hands in that the shepherds have been ordered by the pretenders to bring beasts to the court for a sacrifice.

The suitors enter and summon Pénélope to make her choice. She tells them that the man among them who can bend the bow of Ulysse shall remain in the palace; then, struck by a sudden revulsion of feeling, begs them to leave before her presentiment of death is fulfilled. Each in turn tries his hand and each fails, until Ulysse, still in disguise, asks to be allowed his turn, to the undisguised contempt of the suitors. He bends the bow, shoots an arrow through the twelve rings of axes, then aims the bow in turn at each of the suitors, and with the aid of Eumée and the shepherds, slays the pretenders and their followers. Justice is done and the opera ends in triumph as the court rejoices in the happiness of the reunited couple.

H.

FRIEDRICH von FLOTOW

(born 27 April 1812, died 24 January 1883)

MARTHA

Opera in five acts, text by W. Friedrich after a ballet-pantomime, Lady Henriette, ou La Servante de Greenwich, by St-Georges, for which Flotow wrote part of the music. Première at the Kärnthnertortheater, Vienna, on 25 November 1847. First performed New York, 1852, with Anna Bishop; London, Drury Lane, 1849 (in German), 1858 (in English); Covent Garden, 1858, in Italian with Bosiol, Didiée, Mario, Graziani; Paris, Théâtre-Lyrique, 16 December 1865, when was interpolated the famous air 'M'Appari', from Flotow's two-act opera L'Ame en Peine. Metropolitan, New York, 1884, with Sembrich, Trebelli, Stagno, Novara; 1905, with Sembrich, Walker, Caruso, Plançon; 1923, with Alda, Howard, Gigli, de Luca; 1961, with de los Angeles, Tucker. Revived Covent Garden, 1930, with Edith Mason, Gigli; la Scala, 1931, with Favero, Pederzini, Pertile, Stabile; 1938, with Favero, Gigli.

Lady Harriet Durham, Maid of Honour
to Queen AnneSoprano

Sir Tristram Mickleford, her cousin.....Bass

Plunkett, *a young farmer*Bass

Lionel, his foster-brother.....Tenor

Nancy, *waiting-maid to Lady Harriet*Contralto

Sheriff.....Bass

Three ManservantsTenor, Basses

Three Maidservants.....Soprano, Mezzo-Sopranos

Courtiers, Pages, Ladies, Farmers

Place: In and Near Richmond

Time: c. 1710

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

In his original article, Gustav Kobbé went so far as to group Martha with the French repertory on stylistic grounds. Its rightful place is among German works – oddly enough, it was as an Italian (rather than French or German) opera that it made its way in the international repertory, but in the latter half of the twentieth century, it has held its position mainly in Germany. Although I cannot agree with Kobbé's view of Martha as a French opera, his reasoning is interesting and this is what he wrote:

'It is not without considerable hesitation that I have classed Martha as a French opera. For Flotow was born in Teutendorf, and died in Darmstadt. Moreover, Martha was produced in Vienna, and his next best known work, Alessandro Stradella, in Hamburg (1844).

'The music of Martha, however, has an elegance that not only is quite unlike any music that has come out of Germany, but is typically French. Flotow, in fact, was French in his musical training, and both the plot and score of Martha were French in origin. The composer studied composition in Paris under Reicha, 1827–30, leaving Paris solely on account of the July revolution, and returning in 1835, to remain until the revolution in March 1848 once more drove him away. After living in Paris again, 1863–8, he settled near Vienna, making, however, frequent visits to that city, the French capital, and Italy.

'During his second stay in Paris he composed for the Grand Opéra the first act of a ballet, Henriette, ou La Servante de Greenwich. This ballet, the text by Vernoy de St-Georges, was for Adèle Dumilâtre. The reason Flotow was entrusted with only one of the three acts was the short time in which it was necessary to complete the score. The other acts were assigned, one each, to Robert Bergmüller and Edouard Deldevez. Of this ballet, written and composed for a French dancer and a French audience, Martha is an adaptation. This accounts for its being so typically French and not in the slightest degree German.'

H.

Act I, scene i. Lady Harriet's boudoir. It is dull at the court of Queen Anne. Even the resourceful Nancy is at last driven to exclaim: 'If your ladyship would only fall in love!'

But Lady Harriet has bewitched every man at court only to remain unmoved by their protestations of passion. Just as Nancy has spoken, a footman announces the most persistent of her suitors, Sir Tristram Mickleford, an elderly cousin who presumes upon his relationship to ignore her rebuffs. When Sir Tristram opens the window, in come the strains of a merry chorus. Who are these women? Nancy knows all about them. They are servants on the way to Richmond Fair to hire themselves out to the farmers, according to time-honoured custom.

The Richmond Fair! 'Nancy,' cries Harriet, 'let us go to the fair dressed as peasant girls. Who knows, someone might want to hire us! I will call myself Martha, you can be Julia, and you, cousin, can go along with us as plain Bob!'

Scene ii. Richmond Fair is at its height. The Sheriff reads the law by which all contracts for service made at the fair are binding for at least one year as soon as money has passed. Among those who have come to bid are a young farmer, Plunkett, and his foster-brother Lionel. The latter's parentage is shrouded in mystery. As a child he was left with Plunkett's mother by a fugitive, who confided the boy to her care, first, however, handing her a ring with the injunction, if misfortune ever threatened the boy, to show the ring to the Queen.

One after another the girls proclaim their deftness at cooking, sewing, gardening, poultry-tending. Lionel and Plunkett see two attractive girls arguing with a testy old man, and when they hear one of them call out 'No, we won't go with you!' they hurry over. 'Can't you hear her say she won't go with you?' asks Lionel. Martha and Julia are in high spirits. After a few reassuring glances, Plunkett speaks up: 'You're our choice, girls!' 'Done!' cry the girls, who think it all a great lark. The escapade seems to have gone far enough and the two girls look about for Sir Tristram to take them away, even though money has passed to bind the bargain. 'None of that', say the two farmers, and they hurry the girls off and drive away.

Act II. Plunkett's farmhouse. The adventure has carried Lady Harriet and Nancy further than they had expected. To prepare supper is more than they had bargained for and Lionel suggests that they be allowed to try their hands at the spinning-wheels. Nancy brings the lesson to an abrupt close by overturning Plunkett's wheel and dashing away with the young farmer in pursuit, leaving Lionel and Martha alone.

It is an awkward moment; to relieve the situation Martha begins to sing a favourite air, 'The Last Rose of Summer'. But it has the very opposite effect to what she had planned. Lionel completely carried away exclaims: 'Ah, Martha, if you were to marry me, you would no longer be a servant, for I would raise you to my own station!' A distant tower clock striking midnight, the young farmers allow their servants to retire to their room.

Act III. When morning comes, the birds have flown. There is neither a Martha nor a Julia in the little farmhouse, but at the court of Queen Anne a certain Lady Harriet and her maid Nancy are congratulating themselves that Sir Tristram has had sense enough to be in waiting with a carriage near the farmhouse at midnight and help them escape through the window. Lady Harriet is no longer bored; even Nancy has lost her sprightliness. The simple fact is that they are in love.

It chances that Lionel, in much the same state of mind, comes upon a young rider in whom, in spite of her different costume, he recognises the Martha over whose disappearance he has been grieving. However her heart might go out towards Lionel, her pride of birth rebels against allowing a farmer to address words of love to her. 'You are mistaken. I do not know you!' she exclaims. Her cries for help bring not only Sir Tristram but a host of other riders to her side, and Lionel now perceives the trick that has been played upon himself and Plunkett at the fair.

Act IV. The farmhouse. Before very long there is a material change in the situation. Lionel remembers his ring and asks Plunkett to show it to the Queen and plead his cause. The ring proves to have been the property of the Earl of Derby. He it was who, after the failure of a plot to recall James II from France, had died a fugitive and confided his son to the care of Plunkett's mother, and that son was none other than Lionel, now seen as the rightful heir to the title and estates. Lionel is nonetheless miserably unhappy. He is deeply in love with Lady Harriet, yet he can hardly bring himself to speak to her, let alone notice the advances which she, in her contrition, so plainly makes towards him.

Nancy's nimble wit comes to the rescue. She and Plunkett have been quick to come to an understanding, and they plan to bring Lionel and Lady Harriet together. One afternoon, Plunkett joins Lionel in his lonely walk and guides him into Lady Harriet's garden. There Lionel hears a sweet, familiar voice singing 'Tis the last rose of summer'. A moment later, he holds his Martha in his arms.

Martha teems with melody. The best known airs are 'Letzte Rose' (The Last Rose of Summer) and Lionel's 'Ach, so fromm' ('M'appari')¹; the finest ensemble, a quintet with chorus, occurs near the close of Act III – 'Mag der Himmel euch vergeben' ('Ah! che a voi perdoni Iddio'). But, as indicated, there is a steady flow of light and graceful melody in this opera. Almost at the very opening of Act I, Lady Harriet and Nancy have a duet, 'Von den edlen Kavalieren' ('Questo duol che si v'affana'). Bright, clever music abounds in the ¹ Internationally, the Italian words are better known than the original German and are here kept in brackets throughout.

Richmond Fair scene, and Lionel and Plunkett express their devotion to each other in 'Ja, seit früher Kindheit Tagen' ('Solo, profugo, reietto'). Then there is the lively quartet when the two girls leave the fair with their masters, while the crowd surrounds Sir Tristram and prevents him from interfering. It was in this scene that the bass singer Castelmarty, the Sir Tristram of a performance of Martha at the Metropolitan Opera House, 10 February 1897, was stricken with heart failure and dropped dead upon the stage.

A capital quartet opens Act II, in the farmhouse, and leads to the spinning-wheel quartet 'Was soll ich dazu sagen?' ('Che vuol dir ciò?'). There is a duet between Lady Harriet and Lionel, in which their growing attraction for each other finds expression; there follows 'Letzte Rose' ('Qui sola, vergin rosa'), the music an old Irish air, 'The Groves of Blarney', to which Tom Moore adapted 'The Last Rose of Summer'. The scene ends with another quartet, one of the most beautiful numbers of the score, known as the 'Good Night Quartet', 'Schlafe wohl! Und mag Dich reuen' ('Dormi pur, ma il mio riposo').

Act III opens with a song in praise of beer, the 'Porterlied' by Plunkett, 'Lass mich euch fragen' ('Chi mi dirà'). The pièces-de-résistance of this act are 'Ach, so fromm' ('M'appari'); a solo for Nancy, 'Jägerin, schlau im sinn' ('Il tuo stral nel lanciar'); Martha's song written for Nantier Didiée, 'Hier in stillen Schattengründen' ('Qui tranquilla almen possio') and the stirring quintet with chorus. In Act IV there is a solo for Plunkett, 'Il mio Lionel perira', and a repetition of the sprightly music of the fair scene. K.

CARLISLE FLOYD

(born 11 June 1926)

Brought up in South Carolina, Floyd has tended to give his operas a Southern background. He taught the piano at Florida State University in Tallahassee and eventually became professor of composition. Two one-act operas preceded Susannah, which by the composer's own account took him six and a half months – ten days for the libretto, three months to compose, three months to orchestrate – and turned out an enormous success, first in Tallahassee and eighteen months later in New York. Susannah started a successful line, his eight subsequent operatic ventures maintaining the essentially veristic style of plot, based (as one might claim for Virgil Thomson) on traditional American folk genres.

SUSANNAH

Opera in two acts, words by the composer. Première at Florida State University, Tallahassee, 2 May 1949, with Phyllis Curtin, who also sang in the first performance in New York, at the City Opera in 1956, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting. First performed in Europe, by New York City Opera at Brussels, with Curtin, Norman Treigle, conductor Julius Rudel; Chicago, 1993, with Renée Fleming, Samuel Ramey.

Recorded 1994, Lyon Opéra, with Cheryl Studer, Ramey, conductor Nagano.

Susannah PolkSoprano
Sam Polk, *her brother*Tenor
Olin Blich, *an itinerant preacher*Bass-Baritone
Little Bat McLean, *a fifteen-year-old*Tenor
Elder McLean, *his father*Bass
Elder GleatonTenor
Elder HayesTenor
Elder OttBass
Mrs McLeanMezzo-Soprano
Mrs GleatonMezzo-Soprano
Mrs HayesSoprano
Mrs OttSoprano

Citizens of New Hope Valley, Tennessee

Place: The Mountains of Tennessee

Time: The Recent Past

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

Act I. The mountains of Tennessee; New Hope Valley. A menacing prelude leads to a square dance which is in progress in front of the church; the wives of the Elders are gossiping maliciously about Susannah Polk, the belle of the ball. Her mother is dead and her brother drinks. Olin Blitch arrives with a reputation for bringing sinners to repentance, and it is not long before Mrs McLean is bad-mouthing Susannah to him, which does not prevent him joining the dance and making for her square.

The same evening outside the Polk farm. Susannah has been walked home by Little Bat, a fifteen-year-old. She is affected by the beauty of the night sky (Aria: 'Ain't it a pretty night?') and wonders what it's like away from the valley. Sam comes in and asks about the dance, then sings the Jay-bird song she's liked since childhood before dancing her round the yard.

The Elders are out looking for a baptism creek; their search brings them near the Polks' farm and they catch sight of Susannah bathing. Seeing her naked sets them all off and they blame her for their own randy thoughts. She must be reported to the Church and made to confess her sin.

There is a picnic supper set up outside the church. The Elders and their wives mutter about Susannah when she arrives carrying a dish. Elder McLean tells her she is not welcome there and she runs off in distress. Little Bat steals up to the Polk place and tells her that his father and the other Elders saw her bathing naked that morning and mean to punish her. She protests that it was they who were in the wrong spying, not her. Little Bat says it's worse than he said; his father and mother forced him to say publicly 'you'd let me love you up'. Sam tries to comfort her; when she sees he has nothing more to say, she sobs as she asks him to sing the Jay-bird song again.

Act II. Outside their house, Sam and Susannah discuss the hostile atmosphere. Sam is afraid it won't improve until she confesses – but she says she has nothing to confess. She tells him the preacher talked pleasantly to her in the store and wants her to go to the meeting that evening, but she feels she can't face it. Sam has to go away that night to empty his traps, which fills Susannah with foreboding. But he persuades her against her will to agree to go.

Inside the church the same evening, the Rev Blitch starts to preach. He tells them of a dying man in Texas who failed to confess and was damned to eternal fire. Are any of them in the same state? During the hymn, some boys and girls come forward and he lays his hands on them until they all turn towards Susannah. He urges her to leave her seat and she walks towards him, then turns with a cry and runs into the night.

Susannah is alone singing a folk-like aria ('The trees on the mountains are cold and bare'). The preacher steals up and tells her to pray with him. She refuses, then tells him Little Bat confessed to her he lied. She is at the end of her tether and Blitch starts to leave, then turns back: 'I'm a lonely man, Susannah, An' every now an' then it seems I gotta have somebody, Somebody I can love'. He leads her into the house.

Next day, Blitch in church castigates himself for his sin before the Elders and their wives gather. In mounting disbelief they hear his attempt to exonerate Susannah – 'I ask y' to beseech her forgiveness An' humbly ask her pardon fer your misjudgement' – then leave. Blitch asks Susannah to forgive him but to no avail.

Susannah at home watches Sam come back from his expedition, as ever slightly drunk but as ever affectionate. Susannah tells her terrible story, Sam starts to threaten revenge, then, as she goes into the house, takes down his gun. Susannah waits in anguish, a shot rings out, and Little Bat comes running to tell Susannah what has happened, then makes his escape as the mob comes to get Sam. She bursts into uncontrollable laughter, pulls a gun on them when they threaten to find Sam and string him up, and they leave muttering curses. Little Bat emerges from the bushes, Susannah cajoles him into embracing her, then slaps him hard across the face, and is left standing defiantly in the doorway – as the libretto says, 'an inviolably strong and inexorably lonely figure in self-imposed exile'. H.

G

JOHN GAY and J. C. PEPUSCH

(born September 1685, died 4 December 1732; born 1667, died 20 July 1752)

THE BEGGAR'S OPERA

Ballad opera in three acts; words by John Gay, music collected and arranged by John Christopher Pepusch. Première, Lincoln's Inn Fields, 9 February 1728, with Mr Walker as Macheath and Lavinia Fenton (later Duchess of Bolton) as Polly. First performed Covent Garden, 1732; New York, 1750. Revived at Covent Garden in an abridged, two-act version in 1813 with Miss Stephens, Mrs Davenport, Incledon; 1878, with Sims Reeves as Macheath. In a new version by Frederic Austin, revived Lyric, Hammersmith, 1920, where it ran for 1,463 consecutive nights, with Frederick Ranalow as Macheath, Sylvia Nelis, and Frederic Austin; revived there 1925, 1926, 1928, 1929, 1930; at Brighton, 1940 (under Glyndebourne auspices), with Audrey Mildmay, Michael Redgrave, Roy Henderson. New version by Benjamin Britten produced Cambridge, 1948, and subsequently at Sadler's Wells, with Nancy Evans, Rose Hill, Peter Pears, Otakar Kraus, conductor Britten; Vienna, 1949, with Rohs, Funk, Liewehr, conductor Zallinger; Hamburg, 1950, conductor Schmidt-Isserstedt. The English Opera Group mounted a new production at Aldeburgh in 1963 with Janet Baker, Harper, Pears, which was subsequently heard (with various cast changes) in Edinburgh, London, Montreal and other centres.

| | |
|--------------------------------------|-----------------|
| Beggar | Speaking Role |
| Mrs Peachum | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Mr Peachum, a 'fence' | Bass |
| Polly, their daughter | Soprano |
| Captain Macheath, a highwayman..... | Tenor |
| Filch, in Peachum's employment | Tenor |
| Lockit, the jailer | Baritone |
| Lucy Lockit, his daughter..... | Soprano |
| Ladies of the town | Sopranos, |
| Mrs Vixen | Mezzo-Sopranos, |
| Suky Tawdry | Contraltos |
| Mrs Coaxer | |
| Dolly Trull | |
| Mrs Slammekin | |
| Molly Brazen | |
| Jenny Diver | |
| Betty Doxy | |

| | |
|-----------------------------|------------|
| Gentlemen of the road | Tenors, |
| Harry Paddington | Baritones, |
| Ben Budge | Basses |
| Wat Dreary | |
| Matt of the Mint | |
| Jemmy Twitcher | |
| Nimbling Ned | |

Mrs Trapes, the 'tally woman'Mezzo-Soprano

Place: London

Time: Early Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours

Opera in the early part of the eighteenth century, for England as for the rest of Europe, meant Italian opera. Such works as Clayton's Rosamond were freaks and, more important, failures. But in 1728, The Beggar's Opera was a success. It is a ballad opera, the music a compilation of tunes drawn from every imaginable source – contemporary opera, traditional ballads, folk songs – and arranged to form a whole connected by dialogue.

Swift remarked to Gay: 'A Newgate Pastoral might make an odd, pretty sort of thing', and Gay's libretto aims partly at satire, partly at parody. Fun is poked at the fashionable – for instance Handelian – opera of the day ('I have observed such a nice impartiality to our two Ladies that it is impossible for either of them to take offence ... I hope I may be forgiven that I have not made my Opera throughout unnatural, like those in vogue; for I have no recitative'). There is political and social satire, aimed at the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Walpole, and everyone in a position of authority and able to give and receive bribes. Corruption is the stuff of the drama, and the objects of its political satire were seriously worried at the effect it had.

In its own time, The Beggar's Opera had its imitators, none so successful as the original, and in the twentieth century composers have attempted forms of modernisation. Frederic Austin, who also sang the role of Peachum, arranged the tunes in 1920 and his version ran in London for several years. Kurt Weill and Bertholt Brecht adapted the theme two hundred years after the première, Weill using few of the old tunes and Brecht modernising the setting to conform to his rather than Gay's political ideas. Benjamin Britten made a new version in 1948, keeping more of the original melodies than had Austin and re-setting them with the aim of producing 220 years later some of the sharpness of 1728.

So strong is Britten's reaction to the drama and the old tunes, so vigorous his new setting, harmonically and orchestrally, so sharp his sense of operatic 'shape', that this amounts to a Britten opera in its own right and is so listed in his catalogue, as Op. 43.

There is a Prologue, spoken by a Beggar and a Player and explaining that the piece is written 'for the celebrating the marriage of James Chaunter and Moll Lay, two most excellent Ballad-Singers'.

Act I. The curtain goes up to reveal a room in Peachum's house where the owner is sitting at a table, before a book of accounts. He sings 'Through all the employments of life, Each Neighbour abuses his brother'. Filch reports on the fates of various members of Peachum's gang who are up before the courts, and sings the smoothly-flowing 'Tis Woman that seduces all mankind' before being sent off to deliver Peachum's messages to the various prisoners.

Peachum goes through a register of his gang, commenting on the earning (i.e. pick-pocket) capacities of each. Some, he thinks, he will give up at the next sessions and take the money offered for their apprehension. He reaches the name of Bob Booty, when his wife interrupts to enquire why he should mention that name; women, she admits, are notoriously bad judges of a man whom they love primarily for his courage: 'If any wench Venus' girdle wear'. They exchange words on the subject of murder, a crime Mrs Peachum seems to fancy less than her husband, and fall to talking about Captain Macheath. It appears that Polly, their daughter, 'thinks him a very pretty man'. 'If love the virgin's heart invade', sings Mrs Peachum; if she does not marry, 'she's – what I dare not name'. But Peachum is still worried: '... I would indulge the girl as far as prudently we can. In anything but marriage.' Leaving his wife to take the coronets out of some handkerchiefs, he goes off to 'terrify her from it, by the example of our neighbours'.

Mrs Peachum is philosophical – 'Why must Polly's marriage, contrary to all observations, make her the less followed by other men?' – and she sings 'A maid is like the golden ore'. Filch comes in and Mrs Peachum questions him on the relationship between Captain Macheath and Polly. He seems embarrassed, and she takes him off to tell her more in private.

Enter Polly and her father. She urges her ability to look after herself, 'Virgins are like the fair flower in its lustre'. Peachum utters a stern warning against her marrying, when 'enter Mrs Peachum, in a very great passion'. 'Our Polly is a sad slut' she sings in her fury, and proclaims for all to hear that Polly has got herself married. 'Can Love be control'd by advice?' asks Polly, but Mrs Peachum in a delectable tune objects, 'O Polly, you might have toy'd and kiss'd'. Polly tries to keep her end up ('I, like a ship in storms, was tossed'), but is sent off to deal with customers in the front room. Peachum and his wife plot to turn the whole affair to their advantage, not forgetting that a lawyer may get his hands into the business and take all profit out of it: 'A fox may steal your hens, sir'. Polly returns and is told she must straightaway make plans to become a widow; in a word, Macheath must be delivered up to the law in time for the next session! 'O ponder well! be not severe', objects Polly; as a widow, she would cry her heart out: 'The turtle thus with plaintive crying'.

Polly goes, but hides to hear her parents continue their plot, which even gets to the stage when the Old Bailey is mentioned. She is in despair, but the scene changes and she is shown with Macheath. Their duet goes through half-a-dozen emotions and as many glorious melodies, starting

Pretty Polly, say,
When I was away,
Did your fancy never stray
To some newer lover?

Macheath protests his own constancy: 'My heart was so free, It rov'd like the Bee, 'Till Polly my passion requited', and they swear mutual adoration in 'Were I laid on Greenland's coast', with its refrain of 'Over the hills and far away'. But Polly remembers that Macheath's life is not now safe; her father is plotting against him. 'Oh what pain it is to part', she sings.

Their love scene reaches its climax with 'The miser thus a shilling sees', a superb and entirely appropriate ending which is unaccountably omitted from Austin's published score.

Act II. A tavern near Newgate. Macheath's gang discuss their profession and its hazards, but drown their sorrows: 'Fill every glass'. Macheath comes to tell them that he cannot go with them that night, owing to his 'difference' with Peachum. He wishes them luck and they go off singing 'Let us take the road', to the tune of the march from Handel's Rinaldo.

Macheath, alone, muses on the delights to be had from women – he is emphatic about the plural. His romance, 'If the heart of a man', is set to one of the most delightful tunes of the whole score. He does not have to wait long; the women of the town begin to arrive in answer to his invitations previously sent out. He welcomes them and leads them in a dance, 'Youth's the season made for joys'. After some dalliance, Jenny Diver sings suggestively 'Before the Barn-door crowing', and, while the ladies sing 'The gamesters and lawyers are jugglers alike', manages to secure one of his pistols, Suky Tawdry getting hold of the other. They signal to Peachum, who is waiting outside, and he comes in with constables and arrests the Captain. Macheath turns furiously on the women ('At the tree I shall suffer with pleasure'), and is led away, leaving them to dispute the division of the reward for their work.

The scene changes to Newgate Jail. Macheath is received by the sinister Lockit, who reminds him that nothing can be had in prison free of charge; 'garnish' is the custom. Macheath, alone, reflects that it is Woman that has brought him to his present condition: 'Man may escape from rope and gun'. The tune marvellously combines the lyrical with the dramatic.

Enter Lucy, daughter of Lockit. She loses no time in referring to the 'load of infamy' which she carries, and does not hesitate to blame her pregnancy on Macheath. Revenge is what she is after, she tells him, 'Thus when a good housewife sees a rat'. Macheath pleads with her, and refers to himself as her husband. Lucy is not so easily taken in ('How cruel are the traitors'), but Macheath works on her to good purpose, and explains away Polly's report of their marriage as mere vanity on her part: 'The first time at the looking-glass'. Lucy takes Macheath off in search of the priest attached to the prison.

Enter Peachum and Lockit, intent on the record of their mutual transactions. Working for the law and at the same time helping to organise crime, they are in a position to make the best of both worlds. Peachum refers openly to the betrayal of friends, and Lockit cautions him to be more careful in his use of words: 'When you censure the age'. Peachum goes further, and questions the probity of Lockit's dealing. There is a row and the two men are at each other's throats until more moderate counsels prevail, and Peachum eventually leaves, with the two reprobates in seeming accord.

It is Lucy's turn to have a disagreement with her father; she begs for mercy for Macheath: 'Is then his fate decreed, sir?' Lockit rejoins with rough comfort – be grateful for release, like other widows: 'You'll think ere many days ensue' (Britten combines the two tunes in an effective duet). Macheath rejoins Lucy, and speculates on his chance of bribing his way out of prison: 'If you at an office solicit your due'. Lucy promises to do what she can to help him – but at that moment Polly herself appears and throws herself about Macheath's neck – 'my dear husband'. Seeing him thus languishing she feels an ornithological comparison appropriate: 'Thus when the swallow seeking prey'.

Macheath's situation seems desperate: 'How happy could I be with either, Were t'other dear charmer away!' he sings in one of the best-known airs of the opera. The two 'wives' come back at him with a duet, 'I'm bubbled. I'm bubbled. O how I am troubled'. (Britten follows the air with the duet and combines the two to make a trio.) Things look black, but at last the two women begin to notice one another. Polly addresses Lucy, 'Cease your funning', and presently they have at one another, 'Why how now, Madam Flirt'. Peachum enters in search of Polly, but she resists his efforts to take her away: 'No power on earth can e'er divide', set to the 'Irish Howl'. Peachum eventually prises her away from Macheath, and it is left to Lucy, after comparing herself to a fox's mate ('I like the fox shall grieve'), to release him from his chains.

Both Austin and Britten have omitted the short final scene for Lucy and Macheath, and have taken the eminently suitable tune of 'No power on earth', set it as an ensemble, and used it as a finale.

Act III. Newgate. Lockit is admonishing Lucy for her part in Macheath's escape. She explains that it was not through bribes but from love that she was impelled to help him, and blames Lockit for teaching her to be promiscuous with her kisses – Macheath's naturally tasted so sweet after what she had been through that she lost her heart to him: 'When young at the bar' (the tune is Purcell's). Her mood changes from one of regret for her lost lover to one of recrimination, 'My love is all madness and folly', and Lockit sends her out to repent where he cannot hear her caterwauling. He sums up the whole matter; Peachum is evidently trying to outwit him in the affair of the Captain, and he must at all costs get even with him. 'Of all animals of prey', he reflects, 'Man is the only sociable one.' The aria, 'Thus gamesters united in friendship are found', is biting satirical.

The scene changes to a gaming-house, where are assembled ladies and gentlemen, together with Macheath, who there meets Ben Budge and Matt of the Mint, and gives them money. They discuss their affairs, but the scene is dominated by the singing of 'The modes of the court so common are grown' to the magnificent tune of 'Lillibulero'.

Peachum's house. Peachum and Lockit are again making an attempt to arrive at a settlement of their intricate accounts. They give it up and fall to drinking, agreeing at the same time that it will not be long before Macheath is in their hands again, if they keep a careful watch on Polly: 'What gudgeons are we men'. Mrs Diana Trapes calls on them, and, before getting down to the business of her visit, toasts them in a fascinating tune, 'In the days of my youth I could bill like a dove'. They join in the refrain. She has come, she says, to see what they have got for her in the way of 'Blacks of any kind ... Mantoes – velvet scarfs – petticoats ...' In the course of conversation she lets on that she has seen Captain Macheath that very day. Immediately they are all over her, and bid her name her own price for the goods, provided she lead them to the Captain forthwith.

The scene returns to Newgate. Lucy, although still bemoaning her fate ('I'm like a skiff on the ocean tossed'), is planning to even her account with Miss Polly Peachum, whom she is expecting and against whose coming she has the rat's-bane handy. Polly is announced and Lucy receives her graciously: 'When a wife's in her pout'. She tries to get her to drink the gin she pours out, but nothing will induce Polly to let a drop pass her lips. They are outwardly all affection; 'A curse attends that woman's love' is not the quarrel the words might suggest, and Polly could not be more affable ('Among the men, coquets we find') nor Lucy more pressing ('Come sweet lass') as she presses her guest to accept her offer of a drink. The scene is brought to an abrupt conclusion by the precipitate entrance of Macheath, again in chains.

The quarrel is almost forgotten in the duet of commiseration which Lucy and Polly sing together, 'Hither dear husband, turn your eyes', but Macheath seems to take a rather different view of events: 'Which way shall I turn me'. Both Polly and Lucy plead with their respective fathers ('When my hero in court appears', and 'When he holds up his head arraign'd for his life'). Peachum and Lockit remain adamant ('Ourselves like the great'), and order Macheath to prepare himself to be conducted to the Old Bailey. He sings 'The charge is prepared', which, in Britten's version, leads to an extensive ensemble.

The condemned hold. Macheath laments his fate, and fortifies himself with copious draughts of liquor for the ordeal of hanging. He sings snatches of tune, culminating in an outburst against the injustice of the times, set to the tune of 'Greensleeves'. Austin uses only four of the ten tunes specified for this scene, and omits 'Greensleeves'. Britten makes it into a scena on the lines of Purcell's Mad Scenes – it is the climax of the opera – and binds it together on a bass derived from 'Greensleeves' itself. The result is impressive, and lends real dignity, not only to the figure of Macheath, but to the ideals for which the satire was battling – and satire is mere bitterness unless reared on an ideal and a truth.

Ben Budge and Matt of the Mint come to say farewell to Macheath; his last request is that they should revenge him upon Peachum and Lockit before they themselves come to the sorry pass in which he finds himself. Lucy and Polly appear, protesting that they would gladly take his place: 'Would I might be hanged'. Macheath joins in and the piece takes on the character of a dirge, more particularly when the sound of the passing-bell is heard (Britten uses this to good effect). Four more wives appear claiming Macheath as husband, until he protests that he is ready to go with the Sheriff's officers to execution. At this point, the Player protests to the Beggar that, if Macheath is hanged, the piece will be downright tragedy. The Beggar is persuaded to allow a reprieve, and Macheath returns to lead the finale, 'Thus I stand like the Turk, with his doxies around'.

ROBERTO GERHARD

(born 25 September 1896, died 5 January 1970)

Gerhard, the son of Austrian and Swiss parents, a pupil at one time in Barcelona of Felipe Pedrell, at another in Vienna and Berlin of Arnold Schoenberg, was born and brought up in Spain, lived in England from the fall of the Republican Government in 1939, and was the most Spanish – the most Catalan – of composers. His music was never completely sidelined, as happened with other refugees, but heard intermittently throughout the war and afterwards, in the concert hall, on radio, in the theatre, as a basis for ballet, but it was only in the last decade of his life that he began to acquire an international reputation.

THE DUENNA

Opera in three acts, text by the composer from the play by Richard Brinsley Sheridan. First performance, B.B.C. broadcast, 1949, with Victoria Sladen, Gambell, Joan Cross, Pears, Dowling, Martin Lawrence, conductor Stanford Robinson; Wiesbaden (in concert; the planned stage performance was cancelled because of illness), 1951, conductor Franz-Paul Decker; 1972, B.B.C. broadcast with Jill Gomez, Delia Wallis, Coster, Keith Erwen, Thomas Allen, conductor Atherton. Stage première Madrid, 21 January 1992, with Sheila Cooper, Anne Mason, Felicity Palmer, Rendall, Anthony Michaels Moore, Richard Van Allan, conductor Antoni Ros Marbá; Opera North, Leeds, 1992, conductor Ros Marbá.

Don Jerome, a nobleman of Seville Bass
 Don Ferdinand, his son Baritone
 Donna Luisa, his daughter Soprano
 The Duenna, her chaperone Mezzo-Soprano
 Don Antonio, Luisa's suitor Tenor
 Donna Clara d'Almanza Mezzo-Soprano
 Don Isaac, a Portuguese Jew Baritone
 Father Paul Tenor
 A Gipsy Soprano
 Brethren of Deadly Sin Tenor, Baritone
 López, servant in Don Jerome's house Spoken
 Don Antonio's servant Spoken
 Maid to Donna Luisa Spoken

Ladies and Gentlemen of Fashion, Townspeople, Beggars, Strumpets etc.

Place: Seville

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 25 minutes

The chance find in 1945 on a Cambridge bookstall of a copy of Sheridan's The Duenna (itself originally a play with music by the Linleys, father and son) started Gerhard writing an opera that was almost immediately accepted by the B.B.C. for broadcast. In his music Gerhard's youthful enthusiasm for the Spanish zarzuela was tempered by the 'learned' outlook he naturally acquired from Pedrell and Schoenberg, but the combination found favour neither initially in England, where it was thought too 'modern' for contemporary taste, nor at the I.S.C.M. Festival in Germany, where it was too romantically 'tuneful' to please the avant garde. Gerhard's own, written, claim¹ – 'students of Spanish Art and Literature know that the opposition between the "popular" and the "high-brow" has never been allowed in Spain to lead to a real divorce' – has until recently been tacitly ignored. Yet it is important. Only twenty-two years after his death did the opera find a natural outlet in Spain, where it was acclaimed as 'a Catalan masterpiece', and in the English production which immediately followed.

Gerhard set great store by The Duenna, which has been described as a summation of the first thirty years of his creative life, and refused to contemplate another opera until it had been produced. He revised the score immediately after its first broadcast, and continued to alter and improve it until in 1967 he contemplated a major re-think, which was prevented by urgent work on new music and by the onset of his final illness. David Drew was responsible for the edition which finally reached the stage, the composer Dmitri Smirnov for reconciling the orchestral score of the broadcasts with the composer's revisions, which had been confined to the vocal score.

Act I. In front of Don Jerome's house, Antonio's serenading of his beloved Donna Luisa is interrupted by the gloomy Brethren of Deadly Sin chanting a memento mori and by a strumpet and her bawd, but Luisa joins her voice to his before Don Jerome pokes a blunderbuss through the window and Antonio makes his escape. The Brethren reappear.

¹ In Opera magazine, 1952.

Antonio's friend Ferdinand feels less than secure in his love for Donna Clara (aria), and he confides to Antonio, in flight from Don Jerome, that he had contrived access to Clara's bedroom at dead of night, with the intention of foiling the scheme by her father and stepmother to consign her to a convent. His intentions were of the purest but she chased him from the room, and he is wondering if she is at that very moment in the process of eloping with another lover – Clara with whom Antonio himself was once in love! Antonio jauntily (and to a tune Lalo used in the Symphonie espagnole) admits that used to be the case, but 'I ne'er could any lustre see in eyes that would not look on me'. Ferdinand must have confidence in Antonio's love for his sister, Luisa, he says – and is he not in just as bad a case as Ferdinand, with Don Jerome planning the very next day to marry Luisa to Don Isaac, the Jew? All the same, Antonio seems more buoyant than he perhaps should.

At home, Donna Luisa and her Duenna plot. She will thwart her father's plan to marry her to Don Isaac by leaving the house disguised as the Duenna and agrees that, if their plan works, she will resign to the Duenna all right to Don Isaac. To Don Jerome and Ferdinand Luisa reaffirms her refusal to contemplate marriage to Don Isaac and her father declares he will neither see nor speak to her until she falls in with his wishes. Ferdinand is in despair for Antonio, but Jerome returns dragging the Duenna after him, not suspecting that the note from Antonio he has intercepted was a plant. He fires her on the spot, the plot is afoot, and a few minutes later he ejects Luisa dressed as the Duenna, who is left in a solo to enjoy their joint triumph.

Nearby, Luisa meets her friend Clara, in her turn escaped from home. Clara in a striking aria which turns into a duet tells Luisa the story of Ferdinand's arrival in her room. If she had not summarily dismissed him, she could not vouch for what her feelings might have led her to. Clara will now find refuge in a convent where the Abbess is her cousin, and Luisa will use Don Isaac, who has no inkling what she looks like, to help her find Antonio!

By Seville's riverside, Don Isaac, in conversation with Father Paul, is waylaid by Luisa, who claims to be Clara and says she is in love with Antonio. Don Isaac thinks to remove his rival for Luisa's hand and falls for the ruse, deputing Father Paul to help find Antonio. The crowd, recognising the runaway Clara and scenting scandal, seems at one point likely to impede Luisa's getaway, particularly as her brother Ferdinand, in love with the real Clara, puts in an appearance and, distraught as ever, takes the disguised Luisa for his beloved. Don Jerome complicates things, but not enough to stop everyone making an escape, leaving a Gipsy, in the absence of Donna Luisa, to top the ensemble's soprano line for the rest of the act.

Act II alternates between Don Jerome's house and Don Isaac's lodgings. At home, Don Jerome and Don Isaac make Clara's disappearance an occasion to mock her father. Jerome waxes lyrical on the subject of Luisa's beauty, which Isaac is convinced will overpower him completely. Don Isaac's wooing of the Duenna, or in many respects the other way round as she makes most of the running, is a scene of high comedy; the music a Habanera. He is horror-stricken as she unveils, then falls totally for her flattery until in the end she proposes they elope together. After all, she is the daughter of a rich man and Don Isaac sees a way of dodging an expensive marriage settlement, the Duenna of avoiding an uncomfortable meeting with her erstwhile employer. In a duet, the bargain is struck.

Isaac nearly ruins everything with some snide remarks to Don Jerome about his daughter's age and looks but, with the unexpected but opportune arrival of Ferdinand, contrives to wriggle out of a nasty situation. A rousing drinking trio ensues (another number in triple time), at whose end Ferdinand still does not know Clara's whereabouts and Isaac is carried out dead drunk. Ferdinand's attempt to plead Antonio's cause with his father has the sole effect of bringing him a lecture on the conflicting demands of love and money.

At Don Isaac's lodgings, where Luisa is in temporary hiding, the poor girl alone muses on her odd situation – the man she does not want to marry looking on her behalf for the man she does! The aria has nocturnal overtones.

Antonio arrives protesting to the insistent Don Isaac and Father Paul that Clara loves another and not him. Nonetheless, they push him through the door and watch his rapturous reunion – with Luisa. Father Paul disappears and the act ends in a spirited trio.

Act III. The priory where Antonio and Isaac plan to marry, the one the true and the other the false Luisa. Offstage voices of the Brethren of Deadly Sin cast no more than a momentary pall over proceedings, and it takes but a sniff of a purse of money to overcome Father Paul's scruples about the two clandestine marriages he is to perform. The appearance of Ferdinand is another matter; only the arrival of Clara prevents a duel and provides the occasion for a double marriage of young couples, celebrated with a wedding march for five voices (Don Isaac presumably has left to make an honest woman of the Duenna elsewhere).

The last scene is in Don Jerome's house, where guests are expected. The host is plainly disconcerted by a letter announcing his daughter's elopement with Don Isaac, the very man she refused that morning to contemplate, but he shrugs his shoulders and prepares for the party. Ferdinand introducing his bride Clara disguised as a nun hardly disconcerts him; she is an heiress after all. He waits impatiently to forgive Luisa, who is led in by Don Isaac; fulminates at recognition of the Duenna; melts and admits defeat when Antonio arrives married to the real Luisa; and joins in the laughter as the Duenna routs Don Isaac, who leaves in dudgeon, but returns for a scene of reconciliation with his bride. Don Jerome throws his doors open to everyone and the opera ends in rejoicing and conviviality. H.

GEORGE GERSHWIN

(born 26 September 1898, died 11 July 1937)

Gershwin was not only the leading writer of American musicals for fifteen years from the early 1920s to his death but a fairly frequent composer of instrumental music, most notably Rhapsody in Blue (1924). In addition, he dabbled in opera from as early as 1922, when his twenty-minute jazz opera Blue Monday was a feature of George White's Scandals of 1922. Porgy and Bess was the climax of his career, the first American opera to score a world-wide success, also the only opera founded on the jazz of the 1920s to survive the Second World War, perhaps because European composers tended to use the medium satirically (e.g. Křenek in Jonny spielt auf), Gershwin as the folk basis of a story whose participants use jazz as a natural means of expression.

Fifty years after Porgy's première, the opera received the not wholly relevant accolade of a production at the Metropolitan in New York. By the terms of Gershwin's will and the inflexible rule of the Gershwin Estate, English-speaking countries may only produce Gershwin's masterpiece with black casts, which limits its possibilities in for instance England, whereas paradoxically productions in translation may employ non-black singers in appropriate or even highly stylised make-up. The decision is admittedly not without point but a Swiss production had its singers coloured blue-black and included in the cast a Peter Grimes, Wotan and Baron Ochs; this may not be folk opera at its truest but the potential is close to mind-boggling!

PORGY AND BESS

Opera in three acts, text by du Bose Heyward and Ira Gershwin. Première, Boston, 30 September 1935, with Todd Duncan (Porgy), Anne Brown (Bess), Warren Coleman (Crown), Eddie Matthews (Jake), Abbie Mitchell (Clara), Bubbles (Sporting Life), Eva Jessye Choir, produced by Rouben Mamoulian, conductor Alexander Smallens. First performed Copenhagen, 1943; Zürich, 1945, with Cordy, Boehm, conductor Reinshagen; Copenhagen, 1946, with Anne Brown and Einar Nørby. In 1952, an all-black company set out from the States and toured with the opera through the capitals of Europe (notably Berlin and Vienna), ending up in London in the autumn at the Stoll Theatre, where they stayed until 10 February 1953, playing to packed houses. The cast included Leontyne Price, Thigpen, Warfield, Cab Calloway, conductor Smallens. Produced Vienna Volksoper, 1965, with Olive Moorefield, William Warfield; Metropolitan, New York, 1985, with Grace Bumbry, Simon Estes, conductor Levine; Glyndebourne, 1986, with Cynthia Haymon, Willard White, conductor Simon Rattle.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Porgy, a cripple | Bass-Baritone |
| Bess, Crown's girl | Soprano |
| Crown, a tough stevedore | Baritone |
| Serena, Robbins's wife | Soprano |
| Clara, Jake's wife | Soprano |
| Maria, keeper of the cook-shop | Contralto |
| Jake, a fisherman | Baritone |
| Sportin' Life, a dope pedlar | Tenor |
| Mingo | Tenor |
| Robbins, an inhabitant of Catfish Row | Tenor |
| Peter, the honeyman | Tenor |
| Frazier, a black 'lawyer' | Baritone |
| Annie | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Lily, Peter's wife, strawberry woman | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Jim, a cotton picker | Baritone |
| Undertaker | Baritone |
| Nelson | Tenor |
| Crab Man | Tenor |

Speaking parts

Mr Archdale, a white man
 Detective
 Policeman
 Coroner
 Scipio, a small boy

Place: Charleston, South Carolina, U.S.A.

Time: 'Recent Past'

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

The scene is laid in Catfish Row – 'a former mansion of the aristocracy, but now a negro tenement on the waterfront of Charleston, South Carolina'.

Act I, scene i. The inside of the tenement. After a short allegro con brio introduction, we are introduced to the variegated night life of the building. There is singing and dancing and presently a lazy lullaby can be heard, sung by Clara, who nurses her baby. It is 'Summer time', and the song's lyric beauty has made it the most famous in the opera, and one of the best known in the entire song literature. A crap game is going on. The episodic music reflects the varied nature of the stage action, and the Lullaby is heard again as background to the game. Jake says he will take it on himself to send his and Clara's baby to sleep, and he sings 'A woman is a sometime thing'.

The honeyman's call is heard before Porgy is spied coming towards the tenement. He is a cripple who gets about in a little goat-cart. Everybody seems pleased to see him, and they twit him about his love life – 'I think he's soft on Crown's Bess,' says Jake. Porgy defends Bess's reputation and blames her present low ebb on 'the Gawd fearin' ladies an' the Gawd damnin' men'. Crown comes in with Bess, calling loudly for drink and going unsteadily to join the crap school. He finds difficulty in reading the dice and objects to losing his money when Robbins beats him. He throws Robbins to the ground, attacking him with a cotton hook and killing him, to the horror of the inhabitants of Catfish Row. Bess gives Crown money and urges him to be off out of the way of the police; he says firmly that he will be back; any arrangement she may care to make in the meanwhile with another man will be with his permission – but strictly temporary.

Sportin' Life approaches Bess and offers to take her to New York with him, but she spurns his offer, and tries to find shelter from someone in the tenement – unsuccessfully, until Porgy opens his door and lets her in, just as police whistles can be heard outside.

Scene ii. Serena's room; Robbins's body lies on the bed, a saucer on its chest to receive contributions against the expense of his burial. Porgy and Bess enter and put money in the saucer, and Porgy leads a rhythmic spiritual before a detective puts his head round the door. By accusing Peter of the murder he gets the others to say that Crown did it – but he hauls off the protesting Peter as a 'material witness'.

Porgy reflects on the injustice of taking off an old man who never did anyone any harm, while a criminal like Crown wanders about scot-free. The wake goes on, and Serena begins a grandiose lament, 'My man's gone now'. The undertaker agrees to bury Robbins for the $15 which is all that is in the saucer. Bess leads the last of the spirituals, 'Oh, we're leavin' for the Promise' Land'.

Act II. A month later. Jake and the fishermen are repairing their nets, singing as they do so, 'It take a long pull to get there'. In spite of the warning that the time of year is coming round for the September storms, Jake and his friends are determined to go. Porgy appears at his window singing his Banjo song, 'Oh, I got plenty o' nuttin'', a brilliant piece with an infectious lilt which causes comment on the improvement since Bess has been living with him.

Sportin' Life is sauntering around the tenement when Maria the cook sees that he has dope on him, catches him by the throat and treats him to a lecture on what he has got coming to him. Lawyer Frazier

*Porgy and Bess (Glyndebourne, 1986, director Trevor Nunn, sets John Gunter, costumes Sue Blane).
Willard White as Porgy and Cynthia Haymon as Bess.*

comes in, looking for Porgy, to whom he sells a 'divorce' for Bess, clinching the bargain when he points out that it is naturally more difficult (and expensive) to divorce somebody who has never even been married.

There is another visitor, when Mr Archdale appears, also asking for Porgy. At first everybody is too suspicious to tell him, but he wins them over, and informs Porgy that he will go bond for his friend Peter now in jail. Porgy exclaims in horror at the sight of a buzzard flying over the tenement. If it alights, it brings bad luck. Porgy's Buzzard song, with the chorus, is sometimes omitted,¹ seemingly at the suggestion of Gershwin himself, who thought the role of Porgy needed shortening if the singer were going to stand the strain of eight performances a week for a long run (one may be forgiven, too, if one thinks of it as a long way from the best number in the opera).

Sportin' Life sidles up to Bess and again suggests they should team up and go off to New York, but she tells him she hates the sight of him and his 'happy dust'. Porgy twigs what is going on and reaches round his door to catch hold of Sportin' Life's wrist, making him cry out with the strength of his grip.

It is the day of the organised picnic, and everybody disappears to get ready, leaving Porgy alone with Bess, who tells him she does not want to go since he cannot. There is an extended love duet for the two of them, 'Bess, you is my woman now', at whose end the stage fills with life, a military band strikes up a tempo di marcia giocoso, and with a maximum of noise the picnickers are on their way.

¹ In the 1952 London production it was transferred to the last act.

Maria persuades Bess that she must come along after all, and she takes a fond farewell of Porgy, who is left singing happily 'I got plenty o' nuttin'.

Scene ii. Kittiwah Island, the evening of the same day. The picnickers dance riotously and Sportin' Life treats them to a sermon in praise of the virtues of scepticism, whose jaunty tune and brilliant lyrics have made it one of the most popular numbers of the score. Two samples of its outrageous rhymes:

It ain't necessarily so,
De t'ings dat yo' li'ble
To read in de Bible,
It ain't necessarily so;

and

Oh, Jonah, he lived in de whale,
Fo' he made his home in
Dat fish's abdomen
Oh, Jonah, he lived in de whale.

Serena denounces the whole pack of them for sinners, reminding them, more prosaically, that the boat is leaving soon.

Bess waits behind a moment, and Crown appears in front of her. He tells her that he will be back for her soon, but she pleads to be allowed to stay in peace with Porgy, who has taught her to live decently. Crown laughs, and says he regards her living with Porgy as a temporary arrangement. Bess suggests he find some other woman ('Oh, what you want wid Bess?'), but she cannot resist Crown's old fascination, and when he takes her in his arms, she is too weak to deny him anything. She stays behind with him as the boat leaves.

Scene iii. Jake and the fishermen prepare to go to sea, singing a snatch of 'It take a long pull to get there'. Peter is back from prison, and the sound of Bess's voice coming in a delirium from Porgy's room indicates that she too has returned from Kittiwah Island. She was lost for two days and was incoherent when she got home. Serena prays for her, and at the end tells Porgy: 'Alright now, Porgy. Doctor Jesus done take de case.' The cries of respectively the strawberry woman, the honeyman, and the crab man are heard, before Bess calls from off-stage, evidently on the way to recovery. Porgy says that he knows she has been with Crown, but that it makes no difference to his love for her. She pleads with Porgy to keep her for himself; she wants to stay but is afraid of the effect Crown's presence may have on her: 'I loves you, Porgy.' Porgy tells her he will take good care of Crown if he returns.

Clara is anxiously watching the sea, and presently her apprehension is confirmed, and the sound of the hurricane bell can be heard.

Scene iv. Serena's room. Outside there is a terrific storm; inside all pray that the danger may be averted. 'I hear death knockin' at de do'', sings Peter – and almost immediately a real knock comes, and is answered with a hysterical rush to hold the door. It turns out to be Crown. He orders Bess to him, throwing down Porgy who makes a move to come between them. Serena warns him against violent behaviour; at any moment the storm may get him. 'If God want to kill me,' he sings, 'He had plenty of chance 'tween here an' Kittiwah Island.'

The keening seems likely to go on indefinitely, but Crown strikes up a cheerful jazz number, 'A red-headed woman makes a chow-chow jump its track'. Suddenly, Clara sees Jake's boat floating upside down in the river. She goes off to learn the worst. Bess urges some man to follow her, but only Crown will venture out. The act ends with a renewal of the prayer for mercy.

Act III, scene i. Inside the courtyard. The inhabitants are mourning Clara, Jake, and Crown, all of whom they think lost in the storm. When they reach the point of praying for Crown, they are interrupted by laughter from Sportin' Life who hints that he knows Crown is not dead. He slyly wonders what will be the upshot of the rivalry between Crown and Porgy. Bess is heard singing Clara's Lullaby to the baby she left behind her, and the inhabitants of the tenement drift off to bed.

Suddenly, Crown can be seen at the gate. He picks his way stealthily across the courtyard, then crawls towards Porgy's door. As he passes the window, the shutter opens silently and an arm is extended, grasping a long knife, which it plunges into Crown's back. Crown staggers into an upright position, and is seized round the neck in Porgy's iron grip and slowly throttled. Porgy exclaims: 'Bess, you got a man now, you got Porgy.'

Scene ii. Next afternoon. The police come to clear up the mystery of Crown's death. They question Serena, who it appears has been ill and knows nothing of the death of the man who – every inhabitant of Catfish Row is prepared to swear – was responsible for killing her husband, Robbins. Porgy is roped in to identify Crown's body, and is dragged away protesting that he won't have anything to do with Crown, his reluctance increased by Sportin' Life's helpful suggestion that Crown's wound will begin to bleed the moment the man that killed him comes into the presence of his body.

Bess is left alone, and Sportin' Life offers her some 'happy dust' to tide over her nerves at the prospect of losing Porgy. She cannot resist it, and Sportin' Life sings a persuasive Blues, 'There's a boat dat's leavin' soon for New York'. He leaves a second packet of dope, and Bess sneaks out of her room and takes it inside.

Scene iii. Catfish Row, a week later. Normal life is going on, children dance and sing, and Porgy is welcomed home after his week away – he would not look at Crown and was jailed for contempt of court. Everyone is disconcerted by Porgy's arrival, but he distributes the presents he has brought them (as a result of some successful crap-shooting in prison), and does not notice anything wrong until he looks for Bess, whose present is the last and best. She is nowhere to be found, and he sees Serena looking after Clara's baby, which had been left in Bess's charge. 'Oh, Bess, oh where's my Bess?' he sings; Serena and Maria join in his song with explanations, the one excusing, the other condemning Bess. Porgy's longing is admirably expressed in this trio, and in the final 'Oh, Lord, I'm on my way', a spiritual with chorus, which Porgy sings as he starts off to follow Bess to New York. He drives out of Catfish Row in his goat-cart with his mind made up that, wherever she is, he will find her and bring her back. H.

ALBERTO GINASTERA

(born 11 April 1916, died 25 June 1983)

BOMARZO

Opera in two acts (fifteen scenes), libretto by Manuel Mujica Lainez. Première, 19 May 1967, Washington, D.C., with Salvador Novoa, Isabel Penagos, Joanna Simon, Claramae Turner, Richard Torigi, conductor Julius Rudel. First performed City Opera, New York, 1968, with substantially the same cast. European première, Kiel, 1970 (in German), with Charles O'Neill; performed Buenos Aires, 1972, with Novoa; English National Opera, 1976, with Graham Clark, Barbara Walker, Katherine Pring, Sarah Walker, Geoffrey Chard.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Pier Francesco Orsini, Duke of Bomarzo | Tenor |
| Silvio de Narni, astrologer | Baritone |
| Gian Corrado Orsini, father of Pier Francesco | Bass |
| Girolamo } brothers of Pier Francesco | Baritone |
| Maerbale } | Baritone |
| Nicolas Orsini, nephew of Pier Francesco | Tenor |
| Julia Farnese, wife of Pier Francesco | Soprano |
| Pantasilea, a Florentine courtesan | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Diana Orsini, grandmother of Pier Francesco | Contralto |
| Messenger | Baritone |
| Shepherd Boy | Treble |
| Pier Francesco, Girolamo, Maerbale as Children | |

Place: Bomarzo, Florence and Rome

Time: Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

The rather prolific output of Alberto Ginastera, who was born in Buenos Aires, had included music in every form, including a successful ballet (Panambi, 1939–40) and an even more successful opera, Don Rodrigo (1964), when he was commissioned to write a new opera for the Opera Society of Washington. Over the years, his style changed from something with a basically Argentinian flavour to an international professionalism that allowed him in the new work to range (in the words of Norman Fraser) 'from neo-organum in some of the chorales to serial variations and free-for-all pandemonium when they are required'.

His librettist was the Argentinian writer Manuel Mujica Lainez (born Buenos Aires, 1910), who had published in 1962 a novel on the subject of the strange monsters in the gardens of Bomarzo, near Viterbo, north of Rome, and their creator in the sixteenth century, Pier Francesco Orsini. Lainez's programme notes (somewhat shortened) are reproduced in italics at the beginning of each scene. Ginastera's comment on his hero: 'I see Bomarzo not as a man of the Renaissance, but as a man of our time. We live nowadays in an age of anxiety, an age of sex, an age of violence. Bomarzo struggles with violence, and is tormented by anxiety, the metaphysical anxiety of death.'

Slow, deep, preludial mutterings in the orchestra lead to the intervention of the chorus (confined, unamplified, to the pit throughout), sometimes precisely notated, sometimes aleatoric¹ – a portent of things to come.

Act I, scene i. The potion. I, Pier Francesco Orsini, on the last day of my life went through the park until I reached a figure carved into the rock known as The Mouth of Hell. My astrologer, Silvio de Narni, and Nicolas, my nephew, came with me. We heard a shepherd boy sing that he would not change places with the Duke because I went through life dragging in my hump the burden of my sins. I heard the voice of my beloved grandmother saying they had betrayed me and I was going to die. I saw pass before my eyes all the events of my secret life which, like the hump on my back, encumbered my soul.

The music is concerned mainly with the innocent security of the boy's 'folk song', with its medieval overtones, and with Pier Francesco's two short solos, one bewailing the lack of peace and certainty in his life and the other a monologue when he confronts his fate. The first interlude, which uses the chorus, derives from the prelude and leads to:

Scene ii. Pier Francesco's childhood. I saw my brothers Girolamo and Maerbale, when they were children, playing in one of the rooms of the castle. Girolamo decided that, since he was to be the Duke, I would be the Duchess of Bomarzo, and that Maerbale would marry us. They dressed me in an absurd female costume, but when my eldest brother tried to kiss me, I escaped. Suddenly, Girolamo fell upon me in a fury, pierced the lobe of my ear with an earring, saying that it was a present for the Duchess. My father heard my agonised cries and calling me an effeminate hunchback pushed me into the inner cell. Inside, I saw a skeleton crowned with rose-like rags.

The Orsini children speak their roles, and the music supplies background to their sinister pantomime, until it assumes more importance at the entry of the warrior Duke himself, characterised by the decisive tapping of his stick on the floor. The dance of the skeleton is suggestively depicted by string glissandi and assorted percussion.

Scene iii. The horoscope. I next found myself as a young man in my study with the astrologer, who told me that I should be immortal, and consequently the most glorious of the Orsinis. A messenger announced that my father, the condottiere, was returning to Bomarzo badly wounded. I realised that the astrologer's forecast was coming true.

Silvio's incantation is rendered the more impressive by a whispered choral background, and the screams of peacocks are heard from the orchestra. An extended interlude, depicting perhaps the mixed nature of Pier Francesco's reaction to the news of his father's serious wounds, leads to:

Scene iv. Pantasilea. The Duke sent me to Florence to a famous courtesan, Pantasilea, who was naturally disappointed when she saw a hunchback enter her chamber. I was attended by Abul, my slave, whom I loved dearly. I remember the terror I felt when I was left alone with Pantasilea in a room of mirrors peopled by my shameful image. I gave the voluptuous creature my sapphire necklace, and I asked her to let me go. I ran away, as the peacocks echoed the ominous cry I had heard in the castle.

The scene opens with Pantasilea's song of praise to Florence. Pier Francesco's horror of mirrors and their revelation to him of his crooked body is exposed for the first time, as also his homosexual security with the faithful, dumb Abul.

Scene v. By the Tiber. Memory then took me to a place in Bomarzo, where my grandmother told me the story of the marvellous Orsinis. Suddenly I saw Girolamo on top of the rocks about to bathe in the river. He jeered at me and, as he stepped back, lost his footing and fell into the river. My grandmother wouldn't let me go to his assistance, though I realised he had hit his head on a rock and was dying.

Musically, the scene is dominated by the powerful figure of Diana Orsini. The interlude consists mainly of bells – on the whole festive for the proclamation of the new Duke rather than mournful for the death of the old.

Scene vi. Duke of Bomarzo. Soon after Girolamo's death, my father died, and I succeeded to the Dukedom. We held the traditional ceremony in the castle, where my grandmother introduced me to one of the guests, the beautiful Julia Farnese. Julia left the hall with my brother, Maerbale. I remained alone with Abul, and a hooded man approached; I recognised the ghost of my father.

¹ Allowing a strong element of choice for the performer.

The scene opens with a brilliant chorus, 'O Rex Glorïae', contains the disconcerting reappearance of Pier Francesco's father (accompanied by his stick-tapping), and ends with Diana Orsini's affirmation 'You are the Duke'.

Scene vii. Fiesta at Bomarzo. The courtiers were dancing and I passed from one dream to another, and had the impression Abul, the slave, Julia Farnese and Pantasilea were dancing with me.

A march and a musette precede Pier Francesco's soliloquy, in which he declares his identification with Bomarzo. This in turn is followed by two galliards and a masquerade, the latter in a maniacal tempo di Saltarello and the occasion for one of the scenes which has been most praised by critics as a successful fusion of dance and opera.

Scene viii. The portrait by Lorenzo Lotto. I was back from the Picardy campaign, and I went to my study, my eyes eager for my portrait painted by Messer Lorenzo Lotto. I told Abul that the artist had reflected in it the best of myself. In a large mirror, I saw a version of my painful body in contrast with that in the lordly portrait. From the depth of the mirror, there emerged the countenance of the Devil. I shattered the mirror with my helmet.

While looking at the portrait with Abul, Pier Francesco speaks over orchestral background, regretting incidentally that Julia Farnese does not love him as does Abul. He breaks into song for an aria of longing for Julia, and, in a faster tempo, expression of his fear and loathing for the mirror and the demon which appears to him in it. The chorus at the end of the scene echoes his cries of horror.

Act II, scene ix. Julia Farnese. Julia Farnese was a constant obsession with me. I saw her in her father's palace in Rome. Maerbale was singing with her and when he and Julia were about to drink a glass of red wine, I could bear it no longer and involuntarily spilt the contents of the goblet on Julia's dress.

In one of the main lyrical passages of the score, Julia's madrigal becomes a duet as Maerbale takes up the tune, and a trio when Pier Francesco, Otello-like, overhears it and in his jealousy interrupts the scene.

Scene x. The bridal chamber. Julia and I were married in Bomarzo. After the ceremony, we retired to the bridal chamber. I pointed out to Julia the mosaics that in heraldic design combined the roses of the Orsinis and the lilies of the Farneses. Suddenly I saw, among the designs, one that represented the face of the Devil.

A slow nuptial hymn precedes Julia's Canto triste de amor, in which Pier Francesco, almost reluctantly it seems, finally joins. As the ladies-in-waiting finish undressing the Duchess, she hums to herself the song of the previous scene, until Pier Francesco screams in anguish at the apparition of the Devil, visible only to him. He orders the courtiers to leave him, and, clutching his bride by the wrist, seems to be trying to outstare the demon of the mosaics.

Scene xi. The dream. I couldn't possess Julia that night and sank into despair, made worse by a dream. The painted figures of the men and women that people the Etruscan graves of Bomarzo came to life capturing Julia and myself in their dances.

Pier Francesco's fruitless attempts to consummate his marriage are symbolised by the momentary substitution of the figure of Pantasilea for that of Julia, and, in between his soliloquy of frustration and a short, violent lament that it is only in dream that he can possess his wife, there takes place an erotic ballet to aleatoric music. The G sharp of Pier Francesco's concluding cry of 'Dios mío' becomes the basis of an aleatoric choral interlude, intended to 'produce the sensation that Pier Francesco's shout is extended to the chorus and orchestra'.

Scene xii. The Minotaur. Like a madman, I left the chamber and made my way along the corridor, until I came to the central sculpture, the Minotaur. I felt the proud Orsinis around me, and on recognising my fated brother in the dreadful image, the Minotaur, I kissed its marble lips. Bomarzo trembled with passion, yet I found solace only in that sweet brother.

As Pier Francesco enters, he repeats the sustained G sharp of his lament, then sings to the Minotaur, subsequently in a final stanza embracing the marble body as the only refuge of his lips, his passion, his doubts. The interlude is a beautiful, unaccompanied choral Villanella.

Scene xiii. Maerbale. I couldn't erase from my feverish mind a suspicion that Julia and Maerbale were deceiving me. To ascertain whether it was true, Silvio de Narni convinced Maerbale that Julia was awaiting him on the loggia. Nicolas Orsini, my brother's son, was also watching. They kissed, and Nicolas, sensing the danger, warned his father to escape. Urged on by me, Abul pursued him with his naked dagger. Thus Maerbale met his end.

There is a short duet for Maerbale and Julia, and the scene ends with Maerbale's murder and cries from Julia and Maerbale as Pier Francesco violently embraces his wife. The interlude provides savage comment on Pier Francesco's crime.

Scene xiv. The alchemy. Silvio de Narni devoted all those years to search for the formula that would win eternity for me and at last he found it. I didn't realise that Nicolas was watching us. He had sworn to avenge his father.

As the scene of the invocation mounts in intensity the chorus joins its mouthings to the exhortations of Silvio. The last interlude is in the nature of a threnody for the dying Duke.

Scene xv. The park of the monsters. And now, for Nicolas Orsini mixed the potion of immortality with poison, I know I am going to die. The monsters of Bomarzo keep watch by the Duke whose life is dying away.

The music recalls that of the first scene, as the chorus echoes the dying ravings of Pier Francesco. The little shepherd boy, who thinks the Duke may be asleep, finishes the opera as he had begun it.

'Bomarzo', wrote the critic Robert Jacobson in the Saturday Review, 'is governed by a strict structure, beginning with the division of its fifteen scenes (separated by fourteen interludes), each of which is subdivided into three microstructures reproducing the classical Greek form of exposition, crisis and conclusion.' His partial employment of a post-Webern serialism avoids, says the same critic, the greyness which is often found in a twelve-tone opera, and the result, wrote Irving Lowens in the Washington Evening Star at the time of the première, 'is the masterwork which Don Rodrigo foretold'. Such a laudatory press did not prevent a ban on its production in the composer's native Argentina, where it had been accepted for the Teatro Colón only to be thrown out by decree of the Mayor, who had apparently read the American notices! The whole episode seems not wholly unconnected with the official visit shortly before of President Ongario to a performance in the same theatre of the ballet Sacre du Printemps: 'If you show me anything dirty like that again, I'll close this place' was his reported reaction. H.

UMBERTO GIORDANO

(born 28 August 1867, died 12 November 1948)

Giordano's first full-length opera, an essay in Neapolitan low-life, Mala Vita, enjoyed some success in German-speaking countries but was thought inappropriately shocking for the Italian stage. He was not without influential connections (his parents-in-law owned the hotel in Milan where Verdi customarily stayed), and the composer Alberto Franchetti, for whom Luigi Illica had written Andrea Chénier, allowed him to take over the libretto. Its success at la Scala established his position and Fedora (an opera of much lesser calibre) two years later seemed to confirm his standing but was in fact to prove the first step in a long decline. His operas continued to be performed by leading artists – the names of Geraldine Farrar, Martinelli, Amato, Zenatello, de Luca, Toti dal Monte, Lina Pagliughi and Arturo Toscanini figure in the casts of his operatic premières and revivals – but only Chénier and to a lesser extent (and only with a leading singing-actress) Fedora have continued in the repertory since his death.

ANDREA CHÉNIER

Opera in four acts, text by Luigi Illica. Première at la Scala, Milan, 28 March 1896, with Carrera, Borgatti, Sammarco. First performed New York, 1896; Manchester, 1903 (in English); Camden Town Theatre, London, 1903 (in English); Covent Garden, 1905, with Strakosch, Zenatello, Sammarco, conductor Mugnone; Metropolitan, New York, 1921, with Muzio, Gigli, Danise. Revived Covent Garden, 1925, with Sheridan, Lauri-Volpi, Franci; 1930, with Sheridan, Gigli, Inghilleri; la Scala, fiftieth anniversary performance in 1946, with Caniglia, Beval, Piero Guelfi, conductor Giordano; 1949, Giordano Commemoration performance, with Tebaldi, del Monaco, Silveri, conductor de Sabata; Metropolitan, New York, 1954, with Milanov, del Monaco, Warren; 1962, with Eileen Farrell, Corelli, Merrill; London, Drury Lane, 1958; London, Sadler's Wells, 1959, with Victoria Elliott, Craig, Glossop.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| A Major-Domo | Baritone |
| Charles Gérard | Baritone |
| Maddalena (Madeleine) Coigny | Soprano |
| Countess de Coigny, her mother | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Bersi, Maddalena's mulatto maid | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Fléville, a cavalier ('Romanziere') | Baritone |
| The Abbé | Tenor |
| Andrea Chénier, a poet | Tenor |
| Mathieu, a waiter | Baritone |
| Incredibile, ¹ a spy | Tenor |
| Roucher, a friend of Chénier's | Bass |
| Madelon, an old woman | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Dumas, president of the tribunal | Baritone |
| Fouquier-Tinville, attorney-general | Baritone |
| Schmidt, jailer at St Lazare prison | Baritone |
| Courtiers and Ladies, Citizens of France, Soldiers, Servants, Peasants, Prisoners, Members of Revolutionary Tribunal | |

Place: Paris

Time: Before and After the French Revolution

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Historical as a character though André Chénier was, Giordano's librettist, Luigi Illica, has turned his life into fiction. Chénier was a poet, dreamer, and patriot; he was born in Constantinople, but returned to Paris for his education, and there became a participant in the Revolution, and later a victim of it.

Act I. Ballroom in a château. Preparations are in train for a party, and Gérard is among the servants setting the room to rights. He mocks at the falsities and conventions of aristocratic life, but his words take on a more menacing character when, provoked by the sight of his old father carrying in some furniture, he launches into a denunciation of the masters he works for and the system which keeps them in their unearned luxury: 'Son sessant'anni'. The Countess, her daughter Maddalena, and Bersi come to see that the last-minute preparations for the party are going well. Gérard comments on the beauty of the daughter of the house, with whom he is secretly in love.

The guests arrive, notable among them the Abbé and Fléville, the latter of whom introduces an Italian musician and the poet Chénier. The Abbé wants to talk politics, but with some graceful phrases Fléville bids the guests turn their minds to the serious business of the Pastoral they are about to see and hear. There is a pastoral chorus, and then Chénier agrees to recite at Maddalena's invitation.

He sings the well-known Improvviso di Chénier, 'Un dì, all'azzurro spazio', in which he contrasts the beauty of nature with the misery man makes around him; he denounces the selfishness of those in authority – priests, politicians, aristocrats – and his extremist sentiments find little favour with the guests (though the aria itself has become enormously popular since first sung).

Maddalena apologises to him for the situation her request has brought about, but the Countess quickly gets the band to strike up a gavotte. Even that is interrupted when Gérard bursts in at the head of a band of beggars, announcing, butler-like, 'His Lordship, Misery!' The major-domo gets them to leave, but not before Gérard has torn his coat from his back, and denounced it as a sign of slavery. The gaiety goes on as if nothing has happened.

Act II. The Café Hottot in Paris. The first phase of the Revolution is over, and at one side of the stage stands a bust of Marat. Chénier sits alone at a table, and at another are Bersi and Incredibile, the spy. Bersi asks whether it is true that there are spies about and remarks that she herself has nothing to fear; is she not a true daughter of the Revolution, who thoroughly enjoys the new freedom, the drinking, and even watching a tumbril go by? Incredibile reads aloud from the note he is making about Bersi and about Chénier, each of whom he thinks a suspicious character.

Roucher appears and goes up to Chénier with a passport which he has been influential in getting for him. It is important he should flee at once, as he has powerful enemies. Chénier rejects such counsel of despair, and sings of his confidence in his own destiny ('Credo a una possanza arcana'). Chénier moreover has received several anonymous letters from a woman, whose image has been built up in his mind until she is the most beautiful creature he has ever imagined. Chénier is about to leave, when Robespierre and several other leading Revolutionaries appear, followed by a cheering crowd. Gérard is one of the leaders, and Incredible stops him to enquire more details about the woman he is trying to find. Gérard gives him a lyrical description of the beauty of Maddalena. Roucher is approached by Bersi, who tells him that someone wishes to see Chénier, someone who is in danger.

¹ 'Incroyable' = a beau, of the French Directoire period. This one is an informer, or spy.

Maddalena arrives at the meeting-place and is soon joined by Chénier. It is some moments before he recognises her and discovers that it was she who wrote the letters; at the same time, Incredible looks from his hiding-place, makes up his mind that this is the woman Gérard is looking for, and goes off to tell him where she is. Maddalena asks Chénier for help in her loneliness, and he declares his love in a passionate duet. They are about to rush away together, when Gérard appears in their path, closely followed by the spy and by Roucher. Chénier shouts to his friend Roucher to take Maddalena into his charge, and he and Gérard draw their swords. They fight, Gérard falls wounded, and recognises his opponent; he murmurs to him to be on his guard – he is on Fouquier-Tinville's list as a counter-revolutionary.

Incredible returns with police, the crowd demands vengeance on the assailant of a leader of the people; but Gérard says he did not recognise his attacker.

Act III. The Revolutionary Tribunal. Mathieu tries to get the crowd to contribute money and valuables to the common fund. The response is listless, until Gérard makes an impassioned speech. Immediately, all are ready to give, among them an old woman (Madelon), who says that she has already lost two sons fighting for France, but now offers the youngest, a boy of about fifteen. The crowd disperses singing the revolutionary song, La Carmagnole.

Gérard asks Incredible whether there is news of either Chénier or Maddalena – as to the former, a newsboy can be heard crying that he is arrested, and the latter, says the spy, will not be long in coming to look for her lover. Gérard is shocked by the spy's cynicism, still more so when Incredible urges him to write out the indictment against Chénier; it will be needed for the forthcoming session of the Tribunal.

Gérard is haunted by conscience and memory of his former patriotic enthusiasm. Can he in all honesty denounce Chénier as 'an enemy of his country' ('Nemico della patria')? His revolutionary zeal, which formerly fed on such ideals as brotherly love, is now kept alive by jealousy and lust. It is an effective outburst. Swayed by his desire for Maddalena, he impulsively signs the indictment.

Maddalena is brought in by Mathieu, and Gérard explains that Chénier has been arrested by his orders and because of his own passion for her. She turns from him, but then offers her love in exchange for Chénier's freedom. She tells Gérard the story of her mother's horrible death, in the flames of her house as it was burned by the mob: 'La mamma morta'. The Tribunal is ready to sit and Gérard tells her he will do what he can for Chénier.

The Tribunal is in session. Several prisoners are summarily condemned, to applause from the crowd, and when Chénier's turn comes, he is refused permission by the court to answer the charge. On Gérard's insistence, he is finally allowed to defend himself. He has fought for his country and his ideals with sword and with pen; let them now take his life, but leave his honour unstained: 'Sì, fui soldato' (Yes, I was a soldier). Gérard raises his voice in Chénier's defence; the indictment was false, he says. But all is in vain, and the death sentence is duly passed.

Act IV. In the courtyard of the Prison of St Lazare, Chénier waits for the tumbril. Roucher is with him, and when he finishes writing, his friend asks him to read the poem he has written. 'Come un bel dì di Maggio' (Just as a fine day in May time) he sings in a beautiful aria which describes his feelings as a poet in the face of death. Roucher bids him farewell and leaves him to return to his cell.

Gérard appears at the outer gate, with Maddalena. The jailer agrees to allow Maddalena to take the place of a female prisoner condemned to death, and so to die with Chénier. Gérard leaves, determined to make a last effort in their defence, and Chénier is brought in. Their duet is on a grand scale; they exult in their love and rejoice that death will unite them for ever ('Vicino a te'). In an opera in which Giordano has indulged to the full his gift for passionate, lyrical melody, it is fitting that the most lyrical and the most passionate moments should come in the short last act, in the shape of Chénier's aria and the great duet.

FEDORA

Opera in three acts, text by A. Colautti from the play by Sardou. Première at the Teatro Lirico, Milan, 17 November 1898, with Bellincioni, Caruso, conductor Giordano. First performed Covent Garden, 1906, with Giachetti, Zenatello, Sammarco, conductor Mugnone; New York, Metropolitan, 1906, with Cavalieri, Caruso, Scotti, conductor Vigna. Revived Metropolitan, 1923, with Jeritza, Martinelli, Scotti, conductor Papi; Covent Garden, 1925, with Jeritza, Lappas; la Scala, Milan, 1932, with Cobelli, Pertile, Stabile, conductor de Sabata; 1939, with Pacetti, Gigli, conductor Marinuzzi; 1941, with Pederzini; 1948, with Caniglia, conductor de Sabata; 1956, with Callas, Corelli, Colzani, conductor Gavazzeni; Covent Garden, 1994, with Freni, Carreras.

| | |
|------------------------------------|---------------|
| Princess Fedora Romanov | Soprano |
| Count Loris Ipanov | Tenor |
| De Siriex, a French diplomat | Baritone |
| Countess Olga Sukarev | Soprano |
| Grech, a police officer | Bass |
| Cirillo, a coachman | Baritone |
| Dmitri, a groom | Contralto |
| A Little Savoyard | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Désiré, a valet | Tenor |
| Baron Rouvel | Tenor |
| Lorek, a surgeon | Baritone |
| Borov, a doctor | Baritone |
| Nicola, footman | Tenor |
| Sergio, footman | Baritone |
| Boleslao Lazinski, a pianist | Mime |

Place: St Petersburg, Paris, Switzerland

Time: Late Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

Act I. St Petersburg, at the house of Count Vladimir Andreyevich. The Count's servants are waiting for his return home, playing dominoes and gossiping about his way of life – gambling, drinking, and women are his diversions, which, they say, will have to stop now that he is marrying the rich widow, Princess Fedora. A bell rings; it is the Princess herself, asking where her fiancé is.

The sound of a sledge is heard, and Grech enters quickly, asking where the Count's room is. The Count is carried to it, gravely wounded. No one knows who has wounded him, and Grech, the police officer in charge of the case, questions everyone present. The coachman gives his evidence dramatically and with emotion. He drove his master to the shooting gallery, he said, and, a quarter of an hour after arriving, he heard two shots. Someone rushed out and disappeared into the darkness. He (Cirillo) hailed a passing cab (in which was de Siriex) and together they went into the house, to find the Count upstairs covered in blood. It comes to light that the Count received a letter that very morning, brought by an old woman – and the building in which he was found wounded was let to an old woman. Was anyone else seen in the house during the morning? Yes, a young man who eventually rushed out.

Suddenly, one of the servants remembers that it was Count Loris Ipanov who was there that morning – and Fedora jumps at the idea that it must have been he who carried out the attack. Grech goes to his rooms – he lives just opposite – but returns to say that their quarry has escaped them. In the meanwhile the doctor summons Fedora, whose shriek of consternation tells us that Vladimir is dead.

Act II. Fedora has determined to devote herself to the capture of the man she presumes is her fiancé's murderer, Count Loris Ipanov, and to extract a confession of guilt from him. A reception is in progress at her house in Paris, and Countess Olga introduces her friend, the pianist Boleslao Lazinski, to the guests. Fedora comes up to de Siriex, now French Foreign Secretary, and says to him with peculiar emphasis: 'I may need your help. You are an old friend, this is a newer one – Count Loris Ipanov.' De Siriex is astonished at the speed with which Fedora has caught up with Loris.

Fedora is alone with Loris, and he declares his love in the passionate arioso, 'Amor ti vieta', whose flowing cantilena is one of the best-known songs in the repertory of the Italian tenor.

Fedora tells Borov, who asks her if she would like to give him a message for any Russian friend, that she too is going back to Russia almost immediately. She has been pardoned and her possessions restored to her. Loris is disconsolate, and admits that he cannot go. Fedora says she will intercede for him, but he tells her that this in itself is unlikely to prove sufficient to have his sentence revoked. While Lazinski, with much comic pantomime, starts to play for the guests, Loris confesses to Fedora that he was in fact responsible for the death of Count Vladimir, but that he is innocent of his murder. Fedora can hardly contain her triumph. Loris says he can bring proof of his innocence, and she bids him return that very night with his documents.

Fedora, alone, sits down at her writing table. She calls to Grech and confirms that he and his men are to kidnap Loris once he has given her proof of his guilt and convey him on board a Russian ship. She has written to General Yarichkin in St Petersburg to inform him of the way events have been moving, and has added the names of Loris's brother and of his friend Sokolev as accomplices in his crime.

Loris arrives, and Fedora immediately accuses him of being a Nihilist and implicated in the plot against the Tsar's life, as well as guilty of the murder of Count Vladimir. He denies that this act was murder, and tells her the story of the Count's duplicity in carrying on a clandestine affair with Loris's wife, Wanda. He discovered the liaison by chance, and found proof in the shape of a letter from Wanda to Vladimir. He shows Fedora letters from Vladimir to Wanda, and she knows that he is speaking the truth. Loris's confession, 'Mia madre, la mia vecchia madre', is one of the best-known passages in the score. He continues his story: he went to the place of assignation and caught the guilty pair together, was shot at by Vladimir and wounded, and, when he fired in his turn, inflicted a mortal wound on his enemy.

Fedora is overcome at the story, but Loris tells her he is still pursued by an unknown adversary, who sets spies on him and will not let him live out his exile in peace. 'Vedi, io piango' (See, I am weeping), he sings, thinking of the mother and the native land he cannot see again. The signal is heard, and Fedora with difficulty prevents Loris from rushing out to meet his accusers. Only when she admits she loves him and will keep him with her does he succumb to her persuasion.

Act III. Fedora's villa in Switzerland. Mountain-eers sing a Swiss song as a prelude to a short but passionate interchange between Fedora and Loris, who are living happily together. Olga interrupts the idyllic scene, and is prepared to be enthusiastic about everything – even the bicycle she sees propped up against the wall. Loris recommends a tandem as better suited to Olga's amatory purposes. Loris goes to collect his mail as de Siriex enters. He cannot resist telling Olga that her Polish pianist was in reality a spy, set on her trail to pump information from her.

When they are alone, de Siriex tells Fedora that Yarichkin had pursued his vengeful career until his dismissal by the new Tsar. Two young men, accomplices so it was said in the murder of Count Vladimir, were arrested; one disappeared, the other was shut up in a prison on the banks of the Neva, where, the tide rising suddenly, he was slowly drowned in his dungeon. It was Valerian, Loris's brother. The news of his death proved such a shock to his aged mother that she fell ill and died.

Fedora is left alone, and prays that Loris may be saved from the net she has unwittingly drawn around him ('Dio di giustizia'). Loris enters and finds a telegram telling him he has been pardoned and is free to return to Russia. His joy knows no bounds. But he has a letter from his friend Borov, who also sent the telegram, in which he indicates that a woman's accusation has been the means of prolonging his exile, and has even caused the deaths of his supposed 'accomplices', Valerian and Sokolev, which in their turn have broken the heart of his mother.

Loris will not listen to Fedora's attempt to suggest that the woman in question may have done what she did believing him to have been guilty of a monstrous crime, but a renewal of her pleading shows him that his enemy has been none other than Fedora herself. He rushes at her in fury, but she drinks poison, and Borov arrives to find her dying. Loris's grief knows no bounds, and to the tune of 'Amor ti vieta', he forgives the woman who has brought such hate and such love into his life.

H.

PHILIP GLASS

(born 31 January 1937)

EINSTEIN ON THE BEACH

Opera in four acts by Robert Wilson–Philip Glass, spoken texts by Christopher Knowles, Samuel M. Johnson and Lucinda Childs, lyrics by the composer. First performance Avignon Festival, 25 July 1976. First U.S. performance, Metropolitan Opera, New York, November 1976, conducted by the composer. Revived Brooklyn Academy of Music, New York, 1984; Stuttgart, 1989, in a production designed by Achim Fryer, which did not meet with the composer's approval.

Soprano, Tenor, Actors, Dancers, Violinist, Chorus

Running Time: 4 hours 40 minutes

Einstein on the Beach was inspired by Robert Wilson's drawings (which often resemble architectural plans and sketches) and by his performance art (which aims to change audiences' perception of time, usually by doing very little, very slowly, very often). Robert Wilson had more influence on the opera than the libretto itself. There are literary threads running through the work, but it would be misleading to suggest that their role is much more than anecdotal. While the title refers to the historical figure, his relation to this opera is playfully relative: a violinist on-stage is dressed as Albert Einstein – but so are the other performers. The composer himself has highlighted a series of recurring images, Train, Trial and Field with Spaceship. He has added, with disarming caution, 'one might say that, in a general way, the opera begins with a 19th-century train and ends with a 20th-century spaceship. Events occur en route – trials, prison, dances – and throughout, the continuity of the Knee Plays.' The Knee Plays connect one joint of the opera to another, incidentally. The lyrics by Philip Glass himself are in a sense more straightforwardly abstract and consist of numbers (which represent the music's rhythmic structure) and solfège ('do, re, mi') which does the same for the pitch. Like a Jasper Johns painting of numbers (and the relationship may not be entirely coincidental), this is art that focuses on minimal subjects, in order to celebrate the means of expression themselves (paint/sound, colour, texture and surface pattern/rhythm, etc.). While the music is undoubtedly complex in its creation, as the composer has eloquently described, its most obvious feature is its apparent simplicity. The effect is still controversial. Minimally varied phrases are repeated so often that they can generate a mesmerised, trance-like state of bliss or numbing boredom.

Knee Play 1 (chorus and electronic organ).

Act I, scene i. Train. The 'scene' is headed 'These are the days', a quotation from a Beatles song that recurs in the spoken text,¹ and Chapter 1.

Scene ii. Trial. The words,¹ ignoring repetition and lineation, are 'Mr Bojangles if you see any of those Baggy pants It was huge Chuck the hills If you know it was a violin to be Answer the telephone And if anybody asks you please It was trees It...It... It... is like that Mr Bojangles, Mr Bojangles, Mr Bojangles, Mr Bojangles I reach you'.

Paris. A speaker intones a mostly banal (very probably a deliberately banal) text² about Paris. Another speaker repeats a section of the previous text¹ longing for 'some wind for the sailboat'.

Knee Play 2 (violin solo). Taking off from Bach, it does not get far before two voices intervene, echo and overlap with one another, reciting a text¹ involving gasoline and the Beatles line.

Act II, scene i. Dance 1 – Field with Spaceship. Two notes are repeated fast and then slowly and then fast again in unpredictable groupings. Time slows: while tiring to listen to, this sequence inhibits sleep; it is indeed evocative of a journey, 'not so much in a spaceship, as on a Night Train'.

Scene ii. Night Train. Language fragmented under the impact of a very simple musical figure is briefly audible as 'One, two, three, four, five, six', before relapsing into what may be Japanese, and later consists of 'Baa, baa, baa', proving the ultimate secondariness of literary material in opera of this nature.

Knee Play 3 (chorus a cappella). A virtuoso choral recitation of 'One, two, three, four' at a very fast tempo sandwiches an arresting, multiple-layered exercise in solfège, repeated twice.

¹ Text by Christopher Knowles.

² Text by Samuel M. Johnson.

Act III, scene i. Trial/Prison. Electronic organ patterns introduce and then underlie choral recitations of numbers and a spoken text, repeated reminiscences of shopping in a supermarket.¹ This is followed by the text from Trial 1, by 'Bank robbery is punishable by twenty years in Federal prison', increasingly fragmented, and by 'I feel the Earth move',² a haunting recitation 'about' court and jail, ending with the night schedule of a New York radio station. As before, moments of coherence are disconcertingly (though inevitably) undercut by incoherence.

Scene ii. Dance 2 – 'Field with Spaceship'. Choral patterns adhere to organ patterns, at first rhythmically and melodically nearly monotonous, then taking off into looser structures. The syllables are indistinguishable, the effect by turns irritating and bewildering. In the last few bars the choral sequence is revealed as identical to a phrase Bach wrote for the solo violin.

Knee Play 4 (chorus and violin). The chorus articulate solfège patterns of a simple, blockish kind, while a violinist works away tirelessly. Is there something monkish about this dedicated chanting and scraping? If so, whose glory is it for?

Act IV, scene i. Building/Train (chorus and ensemble). Slow, choral crescendos and diminuendos build and decay over a constant bass, giving the effect of another train journey, complete with sirens.

Scene ii. Bed (solo electric organ and voice). The organ's right-hand doodling after Bach yields after a trill to a repetitive sequence that nevertheless refuses to settle down to predictable formulae. A soprano voice then soars over a simple, even simple-minded organ accompaniment in a long, wordless vocalise, faintly reminiscent of Mendelssohn.

Scene iii. Spaceship (chorus and ensemble). More organ doodling is abruptly overlaid by choral muttering which in turn yields to some fast scales.

Knee Play 5 (women's chorus, violin and electric organ). The chorus continue to count again, before a speaking voice joins in, reciting the text from Knee Play 1. Two female voices alternate, counting and reciting. A third, male voice recites 'Lovers on a Park Bench',² over a solo violin. The impact of the passion that emerges ('I love you more than tongue can tell') has a curiously stronger effect for all the aural impediments. The opera ends with his voice: 'How much do I love you? Count the stars in the sky... Number the grains of sand on the sea shore. Impossible, you say.' Its eloquence disarms all criticism and renders further analysis otiose.

In 1976 Einstein on the Beach was designed and directed by Robert Wilson. It lasted four hours and forty minutes without an interval, but by all accounts it worked well. Since then, following a well established historical pattern, the margin has appropriated the centre: what was once radically different, exotic, unique to Robert Wilson, has become a widely available manner: it is not just that his vision has become an overworked stylistic device in the hands of epigones, but rather that Mr Wilson's own work is now widely available all over the world, even in conservative contexts, like the Opéra de la Bastille. It is no longer quite so refreshing to see arbitrary, chic, unemotive but exquisitely lit stage pictures. On the poster for the 1976 performances at the Met Einstein on the Beach was described as 'by Robert Wilson–Philip Glass'. Having chained the work so definitively to one man's vision it remains to be seen whether it can survive it. The recording can give a misleading impression, because some of its musical events 'take place at a somewhat quicker pace than would occur in a live performance'. Perhaps it will always need the participation of a visual artist whose authority is at least the equal of the composer's. P.

AKHNATEN

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer in association with Shalom Goldman, Robert Israel and Richard Riddell (vocal text derived from original sources by Shalom Goldman). Première, Stuttgart, 24 March 1984, with Paul Esswood in the title role, conductor Dennis Russell Davies, producer Achim Freyer. First performed in Houston, 1984, with Marie Angel (Queen Tye), Christopher Robson; English National Opera, 1985, with Angel, Robson, Sally Burgess (Nefertiti), conductor Paul Daniel, producer David Freeman.

Akhnaten, King of Egypt.....Counter-Tenor
Nefertiti, *Akhnaten's wife*Alto
Queen Tye, *Akhnaten's mother*Soprano
Horemhab, General and future Pharaoh.....Baritone
Aye, *Nefertiti's father and Pharaoh's adviser*Bass
The High Priest of Amon.....Tenor

¹ Text by Lucinda Childs.

² Text by Christopher Knowles.

Akhnaten's Six DaughtersFemale Voices
 Funeral PartyEight Men's Voices
 Tourist GuideActor (voice-over)

Place: Egypt

Time: 1370 B.C. to Present Day

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Philip Glass's third opera follows the tradition of the previous two, about Einstein and Gandhi, in taking a central figure in world thinking and mythology and portraying him on the operatic stage. Narrative is at a discount – the introduction to Satyagraha (1980) describes it as 'not a "story" opera but an episodic-symbolic portrait of an historical personality' – and the libretto of Akhnaten draws on ancient texts mostly sung in the original languages. If there is a similarity here with Stravinsky's use of sung Latin in Oedipus Rex, it might be argued that Glass's music has something in common with the neo-classical outlook of its great predecessor. Infinite repetitions of cell-like musical statements – often triads, arpeggios, patterns derived perhaps from Monteverdi's procedures, ostinati, bounding rhythms – this is the stuff of the 'minimalist' school, as it has been called. The sophistication and fastidious sense of instrumental colouring in Glass's music (no violins in the orchestra of Akhnaten) belong however to the techniques of the 'learned' composer (as have been most other members of the school), and words like 'serene', 'incantatory', expressions such as 'elegantly mechanised simplicities', 'gently atmospheric', 'trance-like' were used to describe the music at the first English performances of Akhnaten in 1985. More important, Glass has certainly demonstrated an ability with his operas to touch the public's sensibility as have few of his contemporaries.

Amenhotep IV changed his name to Akhnaten and after five or six years on the throne of Egypt abandoned its capital Thebes for a site to the north. There he took up a position of hostility to Amon, the God of Thebes, and not only built a new capital but developed a monotheistic and exclusive worship of the sun under the name of the Aten (or solar disc). Twenty-five years later, he was dead and his capital abandoned. His mummy was never found, but his capital, Akhetaten, has been excavated to reveal a ground plan which suggests a city of great splendour. He and his wife, Queen Nefertiti, were constantly depicted by artists, and the effigy of Nefertiti, now in Berlin, suggests a classical beauty of the Middle East.

Act I. Thebes, 1370 B.C. Prelude. The funeral of King Amenhotep III is being prepared by the priests of Amon. Amenhotep's son, together with his widow, Queen Tye (who ruled as Regent until her son came of age) and other members of the royal entourage join the procession – Aye, Queen Tye's brother and the late King's counsellor; Horemhab, commander of the army; and Nefertiti, Aye's daughter and wife to the new Pharaoh.

The funeral of Amenhotep III. With beating of drums and chanting, eight Priests of Amon, together with Aye, celebrate the rites of Isis, Osiris and Horus, and the King's body is carried in procession through the temple.

The Coronation. A gentler mood prevails as the new King undergoes a purification ceremony before he is crowned. Then the double crown of Egypt is placed on his head and he is greeted by the High Priest of Amon, Horemhab and Aye in trio as the incarnation of Horus, son of Isis and Osiris. The chorus solemnly follows their lead in the chant.

The Window of Appearances. The new Pharaoh, who has the other-worldly voice of a counter-tenor, is a reformer with religious ideas quite different from those of his predecessor. He draws the symbol of the Aten, with the rays of the sun containing each an Ankh, the symbol of life. The High Priest of Amon, who does not yet know that the King will change his name to Akhnaten, is bewildered and affronted by the rejection of the old God and he departs, leaving the voices of Akhnaten, Nefertiti and Queen Tye – that powerful figure, the Queen Mother – to combine almost ritualistically before they dance blasphemously through the Temple of Amon. The scene, with its infinite repetitions and its incantatory quality, has a power that is little short of hypnotic.

Act II. The Temple. Amon's Priests, led by the High Priest, chant ritually, surrounded by the images and totems of the many gods among whom Amon was supreme. It is not long before, almost gently, they are overthrown by the King, his mother and their followers. Everything – temple, the images of the gods, even the priests – is destroyed, and Queen Tye's reiterated top As, Bs, and A flats provide a trumpet-like top line to the implacable chant before the music dies away.

Akhnaten and Nefertiti. Queen Tye is the leader of the new thinking and she teaches Akhnaten a poem to the Aten, which he in duet (slow, as has been all the vocal music, even when at its most urgent) teaches to Nefertiti. The Queen Mother gives over to Akhnaten the maiden Bekhetaten, whom many believe to have been their daughter.

The City. The plan for the city is ready and celebrated in a solemn dance.

Hymn. Akhetaten is built and Akhnaten sings a hymn to the Sun, one of the score's most appreciable and extended vocal movements. The words are by Akhnaten himself. Psalm 104 is intoned by the chorus and Aye is rewarded for the part he has played in bringing the new city to reality. Akhnaten in his delight and ecstasy attempts to touch the sun.

Act III. Akhetaten, 1358 B.C.

Portrayals of Akhnaten and his family are well known, he slouching, with spindly legs and slanting eyes, pot-bellied and full-hipped, Nefertiti beautiful and long-necked, and the pair surrounded by their nude daughters with shaven heads. The opening of the act shows them living inside the city which the King has built.

The Family. The six daughters sing in block harmony, Nefertiti and Akhnaten join them (Nefertiti now, unlike in their duet in Act II, taking the higher line) and the gentle, almost idyllic mood of togetherness is inescapable. But in this case, contentment goes before a fall. Letters to the King from princes in outlying provinces are read to him by Aye and Horemhab, all calling for help against the hostile powers which threaten to invade Egypt. The King will not listen and finally even the faithful Aye in despair deserts him. In the unkindest cut, he takes with him his daughter Nefertiti and her eldest daughter, and Akhnaten is left with only two of his daughters beside him.

Attack and Fall. The High Priest of Amon is now in a position to ally with Aye and Horemhab to overthrow the King. The new triumvirate in music of energy and resolve, soon joined by the chorus, destroys the city. Akhnaten disappears – perhaps, if theories connecting him with Oedipus are to be believed, he blinds himself.

The Ruins. A prologue celebrates the eclipse of Akhnaten and reinstatement of Amon as Egypt's God.

Akhetaten; the present. Tourists are being guided round the ruins of Akhnaten's city (the disembodied voice of the guide provided the present writer with his only operatic role – spoken, some will be relieved to hear – in the last new production of his time as Managing Director of English National Opera).

Epilogue. The spirits of its founder, his mother and his wife still hover ghost-like over the ruins of the city, and theirs is, vocally speaking, the last word, though dramatically in David Freeman's production for Houston, New York and English National Opera it belonged to the constants of life by the Nile – the threshing of wheat, the making of bricks, and the slow-motion fighting continue in the precise form they have taken over the centuries. H.

MIKHAIL IVANOVICH GLINKA

(born 1 June 1804, died 15 February 1857)

Glinka, a landowner by birth and upbringing but far from the amateur composer such a background might suggest, received his early training in Russia but was heavily influenced by Italian composers of the day, notably Rossini, a round dozen of whose operas he heard in Moscow from a touring Italian company. A period in Milan and Berlin preceded his return to Russia and with his first opera the establishment of a Russian operatic school. A Life for the Tsar not only treats a nationalist subject but was the first opera to use a Russian text.

In Ruslan the composer mixes style and idiom even more than in his first opera, the Italianate cut of Lyudmila's music (like Antonida's in the earlier opera) alternating with music of oriental and fantastic colouring to make an early 'Russian' masterpiece, if such a word can be applied to an opera whose pacing is so relentlessly undramatic. Glinka's use of whole-tone scales (particularly in connection with the villainous Tchernomor) is innovative, as is his employment of strikingly new rhythmic patterns.

A LIFE FOR THE TSAR¹

Ivan Susanin

Opera in four acts and an epilogue, text by G.F. Rozen. Première 9 December 1836, St Petersburg. This work opened every new season at St Petersburg and Moscow until 1917. First performed la Scala, Milan, 1874; Covent Garden, 1887, with Albani, Scalchi, Gayerre, Devoyod; Manchester, 1888 (in Russian); San Francisco, 1936 (in Russian); Stuttgart, 1937; Berlin, Staatsoper, 1940, with Cebotari, Roswaenge, Prohaska; la Scala, 1959, with Scotto, Raimondi, Christoff; San Carlo, Naples, 1967, with Christoff.

Antonida, *Susanin's daughter*Soprano
 Ivan Susanin, *a peasant*Bass
 Sobinin, *Antonida's bridegroom*Tenor
 Vanya, *an orphan boy adopted by Susanin*Contralto
 A Polish CommanderBaritone

Place: Domnin, Moscow, and a Polish Camp

Time: 1613

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

Act I. A village street at Domnin. The peasants sing a patriotic song to celebrate the imminent return of Sobinin from the wars. Antonida, his fiancée, is no less glad, and in a cavatina she pours out her happiness at the prospect of seeing him again. Susanin enters with news that is less to the taste of the company; a Polish army is advancing on Moscow. The bystanders are alarmed, but their fears lessen when Sobinin himself appears and tells them that the Poles have been repulsed. He is anxious that his marriage with Antonida should immediately be celebrated, but Susanin is full of forebodings at the state of the country and will not bless their union until a Tsar has been elected. Sobinin finds this objection easy to overcome; a Tsar has in fact just been chosen, and it is none other than their own landlord, Romanov. Susanin withdraws his objections, and agrees to the wedding.

Act II. The Polish headquarters. A magnificent ball is in progress, and the Poles are full of confidence that their forthcoming campaign against the Russians will be crowned with success. A series of dances follows, including a Cracoviak and two Mazurkas. A messenger tells the Polish commander of the Polish defeat and of the election of Romanov as Tsar of Russia. The Poles plan to capture the young Tsar at the monastery where he lives.

Act III. Susanin's house. Vanya sings a song, and Susanin comments on Russia's present happy state. He goes on to say that he hears rumours that the Poles are planning to capture the young Tsar. Vanya and Susanin look forward to the day when the boy will be old enough to take his place among Russia's soldiers. Peasants enter to congratulate Antonida and Sobinin on their wedding, and a quartet follows for Antonida, Vanya, Sobinin, and Susanin.

In the middle of the rejoicing Polish troops enter and try to force Susanin to tell them the way to the monastery where the Tsar lives. Susanin at first refuses, but then manages to convey to Vanya that he must ride ahead to warn the Tsar while Susanin himself leads the Poles out of their way. He pretends to accept their bribe, and goes off with them much to the despair of Antonida, who comes in just in time to see her father taken away.

She tells Sobinin of the disaster which has come upon them; he does his best to console her, and gathers together a band of peasants whom he leads in an attempt to rescue Susanin.

Act IV. A forest, at night. Sobinin's men are disheartened by the intense cold, but in a vigorous aria he restores their confidence. Glinka composed an alternative version for this scene, and set it in the forest near the monastery. Vanya, who has ridden his horse to death, rushes in, knocks at the monastery doors and convinces the servants of the danger which threatens the Tsar's life.

The scene changes to another part of the forest. Everything is covered in snow, and the Poles accuse Susanin of having lost the way. He denies it, and they light a fire before settling down to rest for the night. Susanin is left alone, and in a famous scene he makes up his mind that it is his duty to give his life for his country. A storm blows up, the Poles awake, and Susanin tells them that he has led them astray into the wildest part of the forest; the Tsar is safe and beyond their reach. They kill him.

¹ Glinka originally called his opera Ivan Susanin and changed it only after prompting from the Imperial Court to A Life for the Tsar. In Soviet Russia (though not invariably outside) the original title was used.

Epilogue. A street in Moscow. Everyone is festively dressed and they sing the praises of the Tsar. Antonida, Vanya and Sobinin join the crowd. The news of Susanin's death has reached the capital, and the crowd shares the grief of his dependants.

The scene changes to a square in front of the Kremlin. The Tsar's procession enters the capital. H.

RUSSLAN AND LYUDMILA

Opera in five acts, text after Pushkin. Première at St Petersburg, 9 December 1842.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Svietosar, Prince of Kiev | Bass |
| Lyudmila, his daughter | Soprano |
| Russlan..... | Baritone |
| Ratmir, an oriental prince | Contralto |
| Farlaf, a warrior | Bass |
| Gorislava, Ratmir's slave | Soprano |
| Finn, a good fairy | Tenor |
| Naina, a bad fairy | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Bayan, a Bard | Tenor |
| Tchernomor, an evil dwarf | Silent |

Place: Russia

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

Glinka's second opera is based on one of Pushkin's Gearly dramatic poems. The poet had already agreed to prepare a dramatic version of his fairy tale when he was killed in a duel. As a result, no fewer than five different librettists worked on the opera and Glinka wrote much of the music before having any words to set. The opera was a considerable success at first but it was soon superseded by the Italian operas enjoyed by the Tsar, and Glinka left Russia totally disillusioned.

The overture is a brilliant piece, based partly on the music of the last act's finale and partly on the theme of Russlan's aria in the third scene of the second act.

Act I. Svetosar is entertaining the suitors of his daughter Lyudmila – Russlan, whom he and she prefer; Ratmir, an oriental prince; and Farlaf, a cowardly warrior. The bard Bayan prophesies wonders in the future in connection with Lyudmila and Russlan, and Lyudmila herself welcomes her suitors and sings of her reluctance to leave her own home where she has been so happy. Russlan is quite obviously the favoured suitor but a loud clap of thunder interrupts music and drama alike, and when darkness gives way to light, Lyudmila has disappeared. After a canon for Lyudmila's father and her three suitors, Svetosar promises her hand in marriage to whoever succeeds in rescuing her.

Act II. The first scene takes place in the cave of Finn, the wizard, to whom Russlan has come for advice. Finn tells him the abduction is the work of Tchernomor, the dwarf, and warns him against the interference of Naina, a wicked fairy.

The next scene shows Farlaf in consultation with Naina, who encourages him to overcome his natural cowardice. He sings his famous Rondo, a brilliant patter song whose indebtedness to Italian models is as obvious as is its own ancestry of Varlaam's song in Boris Godunov.

Russlan is found on a battlefield, strewn with spears, helmets, shields and swords. He muses on the silent field, where perhaps he will die, then sings exultantly of his beloved Lyudmila. The mist clears and he sees a gigantic head, which by its superhuman breathing creates a storm. The head is represented musically by a chorus, but Russlan subdues it with a single stroke of his lance. He finds the magic sword which will make him victorious over Tchernomor and the head explains that it belonged to the brother of that evil dwarf, whom Russlan with the aid of the sword will now be able to behead.

Act III. The enchanted palace of Naina. Here the oriental atmosphere and the magic dances provide Glinka with his most dramatically compact and therefore musically cogent section in an opera which can easily appear disjointed.

Naina's Persian girls sing enticingly before Gorislava, languishing for love of Ratmir, sings a cavatina. Ratmir himself, exhausted after his long journey, with cor anglais demonstrates in a beautiful aria that his erotic inclinations, given that Lyudmila is no longer likely to be his, are easily aroused by the harem in Naina's palace. The girls dance – a well contrasted series of several movements – and even the re-appearance of Gorislava does not at first distract his attention.

The arrival of Russlan, still intent on finding Tchernomor and rescuing Lyudmila, provides a distraction and at first it is quite evident that he is far from immune to Gorislava's charms. Ratmir continues to hesitate, Gorislava to pine, but the appearance of Finn causes the Persian girls to disappear, the castle to turn into a forest, and the act ends with a fine quartet in which all, even Gorislava, assert their determination to deliver Lyudmila from her captivity.

Act IV. Tchernomor's magic garden on the borders of a lake. Lyudmila in an aria refuses to be consoled by any distraction but she is soothed to sleep before a band of musicians and Tchernomor's serfs enter in procession, with the old dwarf finally carried in on cushions by black slaves. Dances (described as Turkish, Arabian, and Caucasian) are performed for his delectation before a trumpet announces the imminent arrival of Russlan. He is victorious over Tchernomor but fails, even with the assistance of Gorislava and Ratmir, to rouse Lyudmila.

Act V. Ratmir's romance testifies to his love for Gorislava and when slaves bring the news that Lyudmila has again been abducted and Russlan has disappeared in pursuit, only the intervention of Finn with the offer of a magic ring breaks the impasse.

Back in Svietosar's castle, Lyudmila lies asleep, having apparently been brought there by Farlaf who is quite unable to wake her. This however Russlan, with the aid of the magic ring, succeeds in doing and he joins with Gorislava, Ratmir, Svietosar and the courtiers in the music which began the overture and now provides a brilliant finale. H.

CHRISTOPH WILLIBALD GLUCK

(born 2 July 1714, died 15 November 1787)

Gluck was an Austrian composer of Bohemian parentage, who studied in Prague and Italy and wrote his first operas for Milan, Venice and London ('Gluck knows no more counterpoint than my cook, Waltz' famously, but maybe apocryphally, opined Handel, neglecting to say that his cook was a trained musician) before settling in Vienna, where he wrote for the court. Encouraged by the Viennese impresario Count Durazzo, after 1761 he became identified as the leader of a move to reform opera, producing in succession for the Court Opera Orfeo ed Euridice (1762), Alceste (1767) and Paride ed Elena (1770).

When he became active in Paris, the Italian composer Nicola Piccinni was set up in opposition (1772), but Gluck held an important court card in the person of Queen Marie Antoinette, the Austrian princess who had been his pupil in Vienna. Piccinni's work was no match for that of the Viennese, whose achievement with hindsight can be seen as both more and less than the claims made for it in Gluck's manifesto – his 1769 preface to the published edition of Alceste sets out his precepts. Orfeo is a model of classical integrity, put forward with a marmoreal correctness which in no way precludes dramatic fervour; Alceste and Iphigénie en Aulide carry the movement forward in not dissimilar vein; Paride ed Elena and, even more, Armide, add passion and fantasy to the earlier classicism; and Iphigénie en Tauride rounds out the picture – a work of classical proportions imbued with sufficient romantic fervour to cause many to claim it as his masterpiece. That Echo et Narcisse was a failure in Paris in 1779 sent him back disillusioned to Vienna, where in 1781 his last operatic venture, a German reworking of Iphigénie en Tauride, ended his theatrical career with a resounding success.

ORFEO ED EURIDICE

Orpheus and Eurydice

Opera in three acts, libretto by Ranieri da Calzabigi. Productions and revivals: Vienna, 5 October 1762, in Italian, with Guadagni as Orfeo; Paris, as Orphée et Eurydice, with Legros, the tenor, as Orphée, 1774, in French; London, 1770, with Guadagni. Berlioz's revision of the opera was first heard in 1859 in Paris, with Pauline Viardot-Garcia in the title role; New York, 1863 (in English).

Famous revivals: Covent Garden, 1890, with Giulia and Sofia Ravogli; Metropolitan, New York, 1909, with Homer (later Delna) and Gadschi under Toscanini; Covent Garden, 1920, with Clara Butt and Miriam Licette under Beecham; Metropolitan, 1938 and 1941, with Thorborg and Jessner (later Novotna) under Bodanzky (later Walter); Glyndebourne, 1947, with Kathleen Ferrier; Salzburg Festival, 1948, with Höngen, 1959, with Simionato, both conducted by Karajan; Covent Garden, 1953, with Kathleen Ferrier.

A summary of the different versions of Orfeo may be useful. In effect, Gluck composed the opera twice: for Vienna in 1762, and for Paris in 1774. Each version was written for a male hero, in Vienna for the contralto castrato Guadagni, in Paris for the tenor Legros. The 1762 version is short (about 90 minutes) and dates from before Gluck's conscious attempt at reforming opera (the famous manifesto forms the preface to the 1769 printing of Alceste,¹ whose première in 1767 provided the first hearing of a reform opera). The 1774 recomposition retains the old material while adding much that is new, and gives Orfeo himself bravura music ranging up to a D. The 1762 version was produced at Drottningholm and brought by that company with Kerstin Meyer in the title role to the 1972 Brighton Festival, but most modern revivals which claim to be of the original version in fact retain the 1762 score, recitatives and all, but slyly incorporate the most famous of the 1774 additions. The 1774 Paris version has been frequently revived, usually with some discreet transposition, notably at Sadler's Wells in 1967, and at the Paris Opéra in 1973 to inaugurate the Liebermann regime. The first attempt at a compromise between the two versions was made by Berlioz (with the help of Saint-Saëns) in 1859 for Pauline Viardot. Then, the 1774 version was used, but the tenor role of Orfeo was transposed to fit a female alto voice. (One example of the transmogrification of key and therefore tessitura: 'Che farò' in 1762 was in C major, in 1774 in F, in 1859 in C, and at Sadler's Wells in 1967 in E flat!) H.

Orfeo (Orpheus) Contralto
 Euridice (Eurydice) Soprano
 Amor, God of Love Soprano
 A Happy Shade Soprano
 Shepherds and Shepherdesses, Furies and Demons, Heroes and Heroines in Hades

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Act I. Following a brief and solemn prelude, the curtain rises to show a grotto with the tomb of Euridice. The beautiful bride of Orfeo has died. Her husband and friends mourn at her tomb. During an affecting aria and chorus ('Chiamo il mio ben così'²) funeral honours are paid to the dead bride. A second orchestra, behind the scenes, echoes, with moving effect, the distracted husband's cries to his bride, until, in answer to the piercing cries, Amor appears. He tells the bereaved husband that Zeus has taken pity on him. He shall have permission to go down into Hades and endeavour to propitiate Pluto and his minions solely through the power of his music. But, should he rescue Euridice, he must on no account look back at her until he has crossed the Styx.

Upon that condition, so difficult to fulfil because of the love of Orfeo for his bride, turns the whole story. For should he, in answer to her pleading, look back, or explain to her why he cannot do so, she will immediately die. But Orfeo, confident in his power of song and in his ability to stand the test imposed by Zeus and bring his beloved Euridice back to earth, receives the message with great joy.

'Fulfil with joy the will of the gods', sings Amor, and Orfeo, having implored the aid of the deities, departs for the Nether World.

Act II. Entrance to Hades. When Orfeo appears, he is greeted with threats by the Furies. The scene, beginning with the Chorus, 'Chi mai dell'Erebo?' is a masterpiece of dramatic music. The Furies call upon Cerberus, the triple-headed dog monster that guards the entrance to the Nether World, to tear in pieces the mortal who so daringly approaches, and the bark of the monster is reproduced in the score. What lifts the scene to its thrilling climax is the infuriated 'No!' which is hurled at Orfeo by the dwellers at the entrance to Hades, when, having recourse to song, he tells of his love for Euridice and his grief over her death and begs to be allowed to seek her. The sweetness of his music wins the sympathy of the Furies. They allow him to enter the Valley of the Blest, a beautiful spot where the good spirits in Hades find rest, a state that is uniquely expressed in their slow dance with its famous flute solo. Euridice (or a Happy Spirit)³ and her companions sing of their bliss in the Elysian Fields: 'E quest'asilo ameno e grato'. Orfeo comes seeking Euridice. His peaceful aria (with its oboe obbligato) 'Che puro ciel' is answered by a chorus of Happy Shades. To him they bring the lovely Euridice. Orfeo, beside himself with joy but remembering the warning of Amor, takes his bride by the hand and, with averted gaze, leads her from the vale.

¹ See page 264.

² The original Italian words are here used, although it is the French version, moreover in Berlioz's edition, which is described. The only logic behind such a decision involves the fact that the opera was originally in Italian, and that something like Berlioz's edition is most likely to be heard.

³ As to whether Euridice or another singer should be entrusted with this aria, Edward Dent wrote: 'Managers never realise that Euridice in Act III is a highly sexed person, and wants conjugal rights at once, whereas the Happy Spirit is clearly quite devoid of all human instincts. It is almost impossible to find one singer who can express both these things.'

Act III. She cannot understand his action. He seeks to soothe her injured feelings (duet: 'Sù, e con me vieni, o cara'). But his efforts are in vain; nor can he offer her any explanation, for he has also been forbidden to make known to her the reason for his apparent indifference. She cannot comprehend why he does not even cast a glance upon her and protests in a passionate aria and duet, 'Che fiero momento', that without his love she prefers to die.

Orfeo, no longer able to resist the appeal of his beloved bride, forgets the warning of Amor. He turns and passionately clasps Euridice in his arms. Immediately she dies. It is then that Orfeo intones the lament, 'Che farò senza Euridice', that air in the score which has truly become immortal. In fact it is so beautiful that Amor, affected by the grief of Orfeo, appears to him, touches Euridice and restores her to life and to her husband's arms.

The role of Orfeo was written for the celebrated male contralto Gaetano Guadagni. For the Paris production the composer transposed the part of Orfeo for the tenor Legros, for whom he introduced a vocal number entirely out of keeping with the role¹ – a bravura aria which for a long while was erroneously ascribed to the obscure Italian composer Ferdinando Bertoni. It is believed that the tenor importuned Gluck for something that would show off his voice, whereupon the composer handed him the air. Legros introduced it at the end of the first act, where to this day it remains in the printed score. When the tenor Nourrit sang the role many years later, he substituted the far more appropriate aria 'O transport, ô désordre extrême', from Gluck's own Echo et Narcisse. It may be of interest to note that, for the revival which he conducted at the Metropolitan in 1910, Toscanini introduced the aria 'Divinités du Styx' (from Gluck's Alceste) into the scene in Hades.

Einstein sums up: 'Orfeo ed Euridice marked an epoch not only in Gluck's work, but in the whole of operatic history. Here for the first time is an opera without recitativo secco ... here for the first time was a work so closely grown together with its text that it was unique and could not be composed again. ... An opera at last whose manner of performance required the composer's supervision, the first opera that culminated in the musician's labour!' K., H.

ALCESTE

Alcestis

Opera in three acts, text by Ranieri da Calzabigi. Première at the Burgtheater, Vienna, 26 December 1767, with Antonia Bernasconi (Alceste), Giuseppe Tibaldi (Admète), Laschi (High Priest and Voice of Apollo), in Italian. Produced in Paris in a revised version, 23 April 1776, with Mlle Levasseur, and sung in French. First performance in London, King's Theatre, 1795 (in Italian). Important revivals include Florence Festival, 1935 (in Italian) under Gui, with Gina Cigna, Nicola Rakowski and Benvenuto Franci; at Covent Garden, 1937, in French, under Gaubert, with Lubin, Jouatte and Martial Singher; at the Metropolitan, New York, 1941 (in French), under Panizza, with Marjorie Lawrence, René Maison and Leonard Warren, and in 1952 (in English) with Flagstad; at Glyndebourne, 1953, with Laszlo; at la Scala, Milan, 1954, with Callas, conductor Giulini; 1974, Edinburgh Festival, with Julia Varady, conductor Alexander Gibson; 1983, Covent Garden, with Janet Baker, conductor Mackerras.

| | |
|-----------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| Admète (Admetus) | Tenor |
| Alceste (Alcestis) | Soprano |
| High Priest | Baritone |
| Hercule (Hercules) | Baritone |
| Evandre (Evander) | Tenor |
| Thanatos | Baritone |
| Voice of Apollo | Baritone |
| Herald | Baritone |
| Leaders of the People | Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Baritone |
| A Woman | Soprano |

Place: Ancient Thebes

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Gluck goes down to history as a reformer, who turned from a capable practitioner of the art of opera as currently practised to a zealot for unadorned dramatic truth. Einstein has suggested that the normal eighteenth-century method of reform being by means of satire and parody, and Gluck being constitutionally unfitted to this medium or to that of opera buffa, he was obliged to become the first critical creator in opera's history if he was to express his thoughts on the subject; he had no other 'safety valve'. His preface to Alceste (1769) is one of the most famous documents in the annals of opera, and it is reproduced here in the translation of Eric Blom (which occurs in his translation of Einstein's biography of Gluck in Dent's 'Master Musicians' Series):

¹ So it may once have been thought, but tastes change and Kathleen Ferrier, with John Barbirolli conducting, did not scorn to include it and indeed made a great hit with it in what turned out to be her last operatic appearance; Janet Baker at Glyndebourne did no less in hers.

'When I undertook to write the music for Alceste, I resolved to divest it entirely of all those abuses, introduced into it either by the mistaken vanity of singers or by the too great complaisance of composers, which have so long disfigured Italian opera and made of the most splendid and most beautiful of spectacles the most ridiculous and wearisome. I have striven to restrict music to its true office of serving poetry by means of expression and by following the situations of the story, without interrupting the action or stifling it with a useless superfluity of ornaments; and I believed that it should do this in the same way as telling colours affect a correct and well-ordered drawing, by a well-assorted contrast of light and shade, which serves to animate the figures without altering their contours. Thus I did not wish to arrest an actor in the greatest heat of dialogue in order to wait for a tiresome ritornello, nor to hold him up in the middle of a word on a vowel favourable to his voice, nor to make display of the agility of his fine voice in some long-drawn passage, nor to wait while the orchestra gives him time to recover his breath for a cadenza. I did not think it my duty to pass quickly over the second section of an aria of which the words are perhaps the most impassioned and important, in order to repeat regularly four times over those of the first part, and to finish the aria where its sense may perhaps not end for the convenience of the singer who wishes to show that he can capriciously vary a passage in a number of guises; in short, I have sought to abolish all the abuses against which good sense and reason have long cried out in vain.

'I have felt that the overture ought to apprise the spectators of the nature of the action that is to be represented and to form, so to speak, its argument; that the concerted instruments should be introduced in proportion to the interest and intensity of the words, and not leave that sharp contrast between the aria and the recitative in the dialogue, so as not to break a period unreasonably nor wantonly disturb the force and heat of the action.

'Furthermore, I believed that my greatest labour should be devoted to seeking a beautiful simplicity, and I have avoided making displays of difficulty at the expense of clearness; nor did I judge it desirable to discover novelties if it was not naturally suggested by the situation and the expression; and there is no rule which I have not thought it right to set aside willingly for the sake of an intended effect.

'Such are my principles. By good fortune my designs were wonderfully furthered by the libretto, in which the celebrated author, devising a new dramatic scheme, had substituted for florid descriptions, unnatural paragons and sententious, cold morality, heartfelt language, strong passions, interesting situations and an endlessly varied spectacle. The success of the work justified my maxims, and the universal approbation of so enlightened a city has made it clearly evident that simplicity, truth and naturalness are the great principles of beauty in all artistic manifestations. For all that, in spite of repeated urgings, on the part of some most eminent persons to decide upon the publication of this opera of mine in print, I was well aware of all the risk run in combating such firmly and profoundly rooted prejudices, and I thus felt the necessity of fortifying myself with the most powerful patronage of Your Royal Highness¹ whose August Name I beg you may have the grace to prefix to this my opera, a name which with so much justice enjoys the suffrages of an enlightened Europe. The great protector of the fine arts, who reigns over a nation that had the glory of making them rise again from universal oppression and which itself has produced the greatest models, in a city that was always the first to shake off the yoke of vulgar prejudices in order to clear a path for perfection, may alone undertake the reform of that noble spectacle in which all the fine arts take so great a share. If this should succeed, the glory of having moved the first stone will remain for me, and in this public testimonial of Your Highness's furtherance of the same, I have the honour to subscribe myself, with the most humble respect,

'Your Royal Highness's most humble, most devoted and most obliged servant,

'CHRISTOFORO GLUCK.'

This summary and the cast list refer to the Paris

¹ Leopold, Duke of Tuscany, who, on the death of Joseph II, was to become Emperor Leopold II.

version of Alceste, almost as much a recomposition of the opera as was the Paris version of Orfeo.

Calzabigi has not followed the lines of Euripides' tragedy, where the role of Admetus is an inglorious one, and the intervention of Hercules due to his desire to abide by the laws of hospitality, not to any motive of pity for the sorry plight of Alcestis and Admetus.

Act I. A magnificently sombre overture fully vindicates Gluck's avowed intention as set forth in the preface; here indeed is the argument of the action. The scene represents a great court in front of the palace of Admetus; at the back can be seen the temple of Apollo. The people crowd into the courtyard and mourn the illness of their King, which, the herald tells them, is likely to prove fatal. Evander announces the entrance of Alcestis, and the Queen appears flanked by her two children. She laments the prospect in front of her children, soon to be fatherless, and bids the crowd come with her to the temple, there to offer sacrifice to the gods.

In the temple of Apollo, we hear first a simple tune, designated 'Pantomime' in the score, which may serve as background for a dance as well as for the entrance of Alcestis. The High Priest and the chorus call upon the god to avert the fate which is about to overtake Admetus, and, through him, his wife and his people. Alcestis adds her prayer, and a sacrifice is prepared, to the music of another 'Pantomime'. The High Priest, in music that grows more and more awe-inspiring, invokes the god and commands the people to be silent to hear the Oracle's judgement. When it comes, it is more terrible than they had expected: Admetus must die, unless a friend can be found to die in his stead. The people lament the harsh pronouncement and rush from the temple in fear, leaving Alcestis and the High Priest alone. Alcestis comes to understand the reality of the situation and resolves to die for her husband, without whom she cannot live. 'Non, ce n'est point un sacrifice', she sings in an aria of noble simplicity. The High Priest tells her that her prayer is granted and she has the rest of the day to prepare herself for the advent of death.

In an aria which has become the most famous of the opera, Alcestis invokes the gods of the underworld and defies them to do their worst. 'Divinités du Styx' is Gluck at his most intense, justifying his own maxims as regards the situation, but with a result that is no less impressive as music than as drama.

Act II. In a great hall of his palace, Admetus stands to receive the congratulations of his people, headed by Evander, on his apparently miraculous recovery. Dances are performed in his honour. The King enquires what brought about his recovery, and Evander tells him the condition imposed by the Oracle but does not name the victim. The King is horror-stricken and refuses to accept such a sacrifice. Alcestis joins him and shares his joy that they are reunited. The chorus of praise and rejoicing continues, but Alcestis is quite unable to hide the grief she feels as the moment draws near when she must leave her husband and her children for ever. Admetus tries to comfort her in a da capo aria of great beauty, 'Bannis la crainte et les alarmes', but to no avail. The Queen avows her love, but finally admits that it is she the gods are taking in place of Admetus. Dramatically, he refuses to accept the sacrifice: 'Non, sans toi, je ne puis vivre'. Alcestis is left alone with the people, and, as they mourn for her grief, sings 'Ah, malgré moi, mon faible coeur partage vos tendres pleurs'.

Act III. The courtyard of the palace. The people are mourning the deaths of both Alcestis and of Admetus, who has followed her. Hercules arrives, rejoicing that his labours are over, but Evander informs him of the death of his friend Admetus, and of the circumstances surrounding it, and he swears to restore their King and Queen to the people of Greece.

The scene changes to the gates of Hell. Alcestis pleads with the gods of Hell (who remain invisible) that her torment be not prolonged, that she be received at once. Admetus joins her, asking only to be reunited with her in death. He reminds her of her duty to their children, but their duet is interrupted by the voice of Thanatos announcing that the time has come for one of them to offer themselves to Death; the choice is left to Alcestis as to which of the two it shall be. Alcestis will not renounce her right to die for her husband, and the choice appears to have been made, much to the grief of Admetus, when Hercules appears on the scene, determined to deprive the underworld of its prey. He and Admetus defy Hell and its rulers and fight to rescue Alcestis. At the moment of their success, Apollo appears, and announces to Hercules that his action has won him the right to a place among the gods themselves, while Admetus and Alcestis are to be restored to earth, there to serve as a universal example of the power of conjugal love.

The scene changes to the palace court, and Apollo bids the people rejoice that their King and Queen are restored to them. Alcestis, Admetus, and Hercules join in a trio, and the opera ends with rejoicing.

More perhaps than any other of the operas of his maturity, Alceste illustrates the ideal of 'beautiful simplicity' which Gluck's preface tells us is his aim. Berlioz's admiration for the temple scene is well known, but Ernest Newman quotes this composer's detailed objection to the changes made in what we now know as 'Divinités du Styx' when the opera was translated from Italian, changes which ruined the beginning of the aria, according to Berlioz. Ironically, when an Italian soprano now sings this aria, she will use an Italian translation of the French translation of the original Italian, and of course employ the musical form of the French version! It should be noted that the original score included a scene in a gloomy forest near Pherae at the beginning of the second act, omitted in the French version, which begins with the festivities attending the recovery of Admetus. The third act, while employing much of the music of the original, is entirely altered dramatically, and, says Ernest Newman, distinctly for the worse. Du Roullet's¹ introduction of Hercules has, according to Newman, a vulgarising effect, and only the new scene at the gates of Hell (the entire act originally took place in the courtyard of the palace, where Alcestis died, Admetus tried to commit suicide, and a happy ending was provided by the appearance of Apollo) constitutes a worthwhile addition to the score as it stood. H.

PARIDE ED ELENA

Paris and Helen

Opera in five acts, libretto by Raniero di Calzabigi. Première in Vienna, 3 November 1779, with Katherina Schindler as Helen and Giuseppe Millico as Paris. Success was limited, with only twenty-five performances reported in Vienna before 1800. First performed in Naples 1777, then forgotten until 1901 when it was revived in Prague. Modern performances have been uncommon.

Paride (Paris), son of King

Priam of Troy.....Soprano Castrato

Elena (Helen), Queen of Sparta.....Soprano

Cupid, under the name of Erasto,

Helen's confidantSoprano

Pallas Athene, the goddess.....Soprano

A TrojanSoprano

Place: Sparta

Time: Just before the Start of the Trojan War

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Paride ed Elena is the last of Gluck's Italian works, written for Vienna in the line of his so-called 'reform' operas. That it is a curious work, concentrating throughout its five acts on Helen's wooing by Paris and without a hint of drama, let alone tragedy, accounts for its relative lack of success through more than two hundred years. On the other hand, with its contrast between Spartan rigour on the one hand and Asiatic hedonism on the other, it is one of the composer's more notable musical achievements, of which he was justly proud. Moreover, there is great passion in the final two acts.

Act I. The seashore near Sparta. Paris has heard that Helen is the most beautiful woman in the world, as he makes clear in two exceptionally graceful arias, separated by dances: 'O del mio dolce ardor' and 'Spiagge amate', the first regularly recorded by sopranos, mezzos, tenors, even baritones throughout the twentieth century. Erasto comes to spy out the lie of the land and in soliloquy avows he will help Paris win Helen. The act ends with an extended dance.

Act II. The royal palace. Helen admires Paris as much as he does her and Erasto encourages their mutual admiration. Paris pins his hopes on Venus ('Le belle imagini').

Act III. Paris is invited to judge the winners in a Spartan version of the Olympic games, but confesses in a fervent scene (Orfeo-like, with its harp accompaniment) that he has eyes only for Helen. When she urges her virtue and loyalty, he thinks the gods have betrayed him, and seems to fall in a faint. The festivities nonetheless continue.

Act IV. Helen asserts that she remains loyal, but Erasto acts as intermediary between her and Paris, who pleads his love. In the trio, full of urgency, Erasto echoes Amor in Orfeo (even to the earlier opera's hint of 'John Peel'). Paris reacts to Helen's suggestion he should forget her in an aria of real feeling ('Di te scordami e vivere!'); this is no philandering prince but a youth overcome by love. Helen alone follows with a splendid aria – her first of the opera – full of indecision as well as passion, but the situation, minutely examined in the course of the act, remains unresolved at its end.

¹ Leblond du Roullet was responsible for the French translation and some adjustments in 1776.

Act V. The palace gardens. Paris is about to leave but Erasto tells Helen his own misgivings on the subject of the imminent departure, and announces when Paris appears that Helen truly loves him. He is revealed as Cupid, Venus' son, but the situation moves beyond his control when Pallas Athene with theocratic authority proclaims that the love of Paris and Helen will lead to much suffering. They bow to their destiny and the opera's only love duet, slightly formal in expression and joined by Erasto, leads to the finale. H.

IPHIGÉNIE EN AULIDE

Iphigenia in Aulis

Opera in three acts, text by Lebland du Roullet. First performed at the Académie de Musique, Paris, 19 April 1774, with Sophie Arnould (Iphigénie), du Plant (Clitemnestre), Legros (Achille), Larrivée (Agamemnon).

In 1846 Wagner revised the opera, changing the orchestration, re-writing some of the recitatives. This version, produced at Dresden in 1847, was given on many German stages. There was a famous revival under Mahler in Vienna in 1904 with Gutheil-Schoder, Mildenburg, Schmedes and Demuth. The opera was heard in England for the first time as late as 1933 (at Oxford) and in 1937 (Glasgow). First American performance 1935, in Philadelphia, conducted by Alexander Smallens, and sung by Rosa Tentoni, Cyrena van Gordon, Joseph Bentonelli, and George Baklanoff. Revived at Florence Festival of 1950 (in the Boboli Gardens), with Guerrini, Nicolai, Penno, and Christoff; and at la Scala, Milan, in 1959, with Simionato, Lazzarini, Pier Miranda Ferraro, Christoff; New York (concert performance), 1962, with Gorr, Marilyn Horne, Simoneau, Bacquier; Salzburg, 1962, with Christa Ludwig, Borkh, King, Berry, conductor Böhm; Drottningholm (Sweden), 1965, with Elisabeth Söderström in the title role; 1996, Opera North, in Leeds.

Agamemnon, King of Mycenae Bass-Baritone
Clitemnestre (Clytemnestra), his wife Soprano
Iphigénie (Iphigenia), their daughter Soprano
Achille (Achilles), a Greek hero Tenor
Patrocle (Patroclus) Bass
Calchas, the High Priest Bass
Arcas Bass
Diane (Diana) Soprano

Chorus of Priests, People

Place: The Island of Aulis

Time: The Beginning of the Trojan War

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Iphigénie en Aulide was Gluck's first opera written originally to a French text, and its success was immediate. He insisted, contemporaries record, on the distinguished French cast throwing themselves into the drama of their roles, and the opera has kept a hold however precarious on the repertory ever since. Wagner's 1847 revision amounted in certain passages to no less than a recomposition; it was this version Mahler mounted in 1904.

Act I. Agamemnon, after consulting the oracle, has vowed to sacrifice his daughter, Iphigenia, to Diana in return for a favourable wind to take him and his army safely to Troy. He is persuaded to send for his daughter, on the pretext that her marriage to Achilles shall be solemnised in Aulis. He secretly sends word to his wife, Clytemnestra, telling her to delay the voyage as the marriage has been postponed. When the opera opens, Agamemnon is seen a prey to agonising remorse, and torn by the conflicting claims of duty and love. The Greeks demand to know the reason for the gods' continued displeasure, and Calchas, the high priest, is filled with sorrow at the thought of the sacrifice that is demanded. He prays to the goddess to find another victim, Agamemnon joins him in prayer, and the Greeks demand the name of the victim that they may immediately make the sacrifice the goddess demands. Calchas assures them that the victim shall be found that very day.

Calchas reasons with Agamemnon in an effort to persuade him to agree to the sacrifice, but the Greek King breaks out into an agonised expression of his overwhelming sorrow. Is it possible that the gods wish him to commit so dreadful a crime? Calchas asks him if his intention is to go against his oath, but Agamemnon replies that he has sworn to sacrifice Iphigenia only if she sets foot on the soil of Aulis. At that very moment, and in the midst of Calchas' denunciation of the King's duplicity, they hear the cries of the Greeks as they welcome Clytemnestra and Iphigenia, newly arrived on the island. As the King and the High Priest comment on the possible consequences of the arrival, the Greeks sing the praises of the Queen and her daughter. Agamemnon secretly informs his wife that Achilles has proved unworthy of Iphigenia and that she and her daughter are therefore to return immediately on their journey. She denounces Achilles to Iphigenia, who is ready to believe her until Achilles himself appears on the scene, overjoyed at her unexpected arrival. Iphigenia is at first cold and unwelcoming, but explanations follow and the act ends with a duet of reconciliation.

Act II. In spite of the chorus's attempts at reassurance and congratulation on her forthcoming marriage, Iphigenia is filled with foreboding at the prospect of a meeting between Agamemnon and Achilles who by now knows that his prospective father-in-law was responsible for the rumour of his infidelity to Iphigenia. Clytemnestra bids her daughter rejoice, Achilles, after introducing the warrior Patroclus to her, leads a chorus in her praise, and songs and dances are offered in honour of the happy couple. As Achilles is about to lead his bride to the altar, Arcas, Agamemnon's messenger, intervenes and protests that Agamemnon waits at the altar to sacrifice her in fulfilment of his sacred vow. Clytemnestra begs Achilles to protect his young bride from the consequences of her father's rash action. Achilles impulsively swears to defend her, but Iphigenia reminds him that Agamemnon is her father, and that she loves him in spite of the terrible situation in which fate has placed him.

Agamemnon and Achilles meet, and, in answer to Achilles' reproaches, Agamemnon reminds him that he is supreme commander of the Greek forces and that all owe allegiance to him and obedience to his decisions. Achilles defies him and says that whoever means to lay hands on Iphigenia will have to overcome him first. Agamemnon is left alone with his conscience and the necessity to decide between his duty to the gods and his love for his daughter. In the end he decides to send Clytemnestra and Iphigenia straight away to Mycenae, and by this means he hopes to avoid the consequences of his oath.

Act III. The Greeks demand that the vow shall be fulfilled as the only means by which the present wrath of the gods may be averted. Achilles begs Iphigenia to fly with him, but she protests her willingness to die, he his determination to save her. Clytemnestra is left alone with her daughter, and tries every means to save her, but the Greeks are implacable in their demand that the sacrifice shall take place. Clytemnestra calls down the fury of Jove on the cruel hosts of the Greeks.

All is ready for the sacrifice and the Greeks beg for an answer to their prayer. The ceremony is interrupted by the arrival of Achilles at the head of the Thesalians, who fall on the assembled Greek troops. A pitched battle is averted by Calchas, who announces that the gods are appeased and prepared to grant fair weather even though Agamemnon's oath is not fulfilled. Husband and wife, parent and child, lover and beloved are reconciled and the opera ends with rejoicings as the Greeks prepare to set sail for Troy.

Although Iphigénie en Aulide has not quite the unity of style and construction that is so marked a feature of the later Iphigénie en Tauride, it is full of remarkable music. The leading figures are strongly characterised. Agamemnon is never less than a heroic figure, and the conflict which is the result of his vow makes him the most interesting character in the drama. His arias are magnificently expressive, that of the first act ('Diane impitoyable') immediately establishing his commanding stature and essential nobility as well as the appalling dilemma he sees before him, the great scena at the end of the second act (after the scene with Achilles) even more impressively dramatic ('O toi, l'objet le plus aimable'). Clytemnestra is less positively involved in the drama, but her intense reaction to its events is expressed in wonderfully dramatic music. In her solo scenes, she passes from straightforward fury when she hears from Agamemnon of Achilles' supposed unfaithfulness to Iphigenia, through the extremes of grief when she pleads with Achilles to save her daughter, until in the third act she collapses altogether when her pleas to the Greeks go unheeded. The intensity of her emotions is immediately apparent, and one can imagine that such musical expressiveness must have made an extraordinary effect in Gluck's time.

Like Ilia in Idomeneo, Iphigenia is the victim rather than the agent of the tragedy, but her resignation and acceptance of her cruel fate gives rise to music of remarkable beauty. Achilles is the ancestor of Radames and a whole line of heroic tenors, uncomplicated as a person and accustomed to express himself vigorously and uncompromisingly. His aria in Act III when he resolves to save Iphigenia by force of arms apparently made an effect at the first performance comparable to that felt by Italian audiences hearing

Verdi's music at the time of the Risorgimento. We are told that the gentlemen in the theatre could hardly refrain from drawing their swords and joining him on stage in his attempt to rescue his Princess. H.

ARMIDE

Opera in five acts, libretto by Philippe Quinault (originally written in 1686 for Lully). Quinault based his libretto on Tasso's La Gerusalemme liberata. Première, Paris, 23 September 1777, with Rosalie Levasseur, Joseph Legros (Gluck's tenor Orphée). Performed in Germany, notably in 1843 when it was heard in Berlin and Wagner conducted it in Dresden with Wilhelmine Schröder-Devrient in the title role. Revived in Paris in 1905 for Lucienne Bréval (Litvinne in 1907); it opened the season in 1911 at the Metropolitan, New York, with Toscanini conducting and Fremstad, Caruso, Homer and Amato in leading roles; and at la Scala the following year Serafin conducted it with Burzio in the title role. Heard at Covent Garden, 1928, with Frida Leider, Olszewska, Walter Widdop, conductor Heger (in German); at Spitalfields, London, 1982, with Felicity Palmer and Anthony Rolfe Johnson. Only in Paris was it regularly in the repertoire, with 399 performances between 1777 and 1913.

| | |
|---|-----------|
| Armide, a sorceress; Princess of Damascus..... | Soprano |
| Renaud, a Crusader | Tenor |
| Phénice } confidantes of Armide | Soprano |
| Sidonie } | Soprano |
| Hidraot, a magician, King of Damascus..... | Baritone |
| Hate | Contralto |
| The Danish Knight } Crusaders | Tenor |
| Ubalde } | Baritone |
| Aronte, in charge of Armide's prisoners..... | Baritone |
| Artémidore, a Crusader | Tenor |
| A Naiad..... | Soprano |
| Spirits, Demons, Soldiers, Citizens of Damascus, Nymphs, Shepherds | |

Place: Damascus

Time: The First Crusade

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

For his fifth French opera Gluck boldly took over the text Lully had set some ninety years before, and set it to music almost unaltered. There is some truth in the contention that it is musically the richest of all his works, just as there is rationale behind its neglect at a time when its convention was as far from contemporary experience as was once Handel's. Though its première occurred at the height of the war of the Gluckists and the Piccinnists – roughly speaking, supporters of French and Italian music, but a war just as much literary and political as musical – its merits have little to do with that controversy, and it is interesting that Gluck in retirement (quoted by Max Loppert in a revealing sleeve note for the Spitalfields recording) wrote of Armide as 'perhaps the best of all my works'.

Act I. Sidonie and Phénice congratulate Armide on her triumph against the Crusaders but she is dissatisfied that the bravest of them, Renaud, is still free. When Hidraot, her uncle, urges her to marry, she says that she would consider only the man who vanquishes Renaud. Aronte announces that Renaud has freed all the prisoners she was holding. She calls for revenge.

Act II. Renaud and Artémidore (one of the prisoners Renaud freed) have been lured by magic into deserted country. Renaud is determined to resist the wiles of Armide, but Hidraot and Armide pursue him. He falls asleep under her spell – a beautiful aria precedes this episode ('Plus j'observe ces lieux'). Demons disguised as nymphs beguile him. As Armide raises a dagger to kill him, she understands that nothing but the power of love holds her back. To make him love her is the revenge she determines to take (aria: 'Ah! Quelle cruauté de lui ravir le jour!').

Act III. Although she is now secure in Renaud's love, Armide has failed to control her own feelings, as she admits in a magnificent monologue: 'Ah! si la liberté me doit être ravie'. Her destiny is to choose between love for Renaud and hatred and revenge, and she summons Hate to save her from her love. The impressive incantations of Hate and her entourage and their dances have the effect of confirming Armide's love. Hate curses her; let her never seek her help again.

Act IV. Ubalde and the Danish Knight have been commissioned to free Renaud. A magic shield and sceptre first protect them against Armide's demons and then keep them proof against visions conjured up to seduce them.

Act V. Armide's palace. In the only approach to a love scene in the opera, Armide tells Renaud he taught her to know love; now she feels he may be seduced by the pull of glory. When Armide leaves him in order to secure the aid of dark powers, the elaborate attempts of her retinue (chaconne and dance) fail to entertain Renaud, and Ubalde and the Danish Knight have no difficulty with the help of their talismanic shield and sceptre in breaking the spell which binds him. He resolves to return to his comrades and Armide comes back to find her worst fears realised. Renaud is torn between love and duty but, with some reluctance, embraces duty, and Armide, unable to decide whether to give way to despair or pursue revenge – a Dido before her time – eventually destroys her own palace and is carried off in a chariot. H.

IPHIGÉNIE EN TAURIDE

Iphigenia in Tauris

Opera in four acts, words by François Guillard. Produced in the Académie de Musique, Paris, 18 May 1779, with Levasseur, Legros, Larrivée; London (in da Ponte's Italian translation), 1796; Metropolitan Opera House, New York, 25 November 1916, with Kurt, Sembach, Weil, Braun, and Rappold (in German, arranged Richard Strauss). Revived la Scala, 1937, with Caniglia, Parmeggiani, Armando Borgioli, Maugeri, conducted by de Sabata; Berlin, 1941, with Müller, Svanholm, Domgraf-Fassbänder, Ahlsmeyer; Aix, 1952, with Neway, Simoneau, Mollet, Massard, conductor Giulini; la Scala, 1957, with Callas; Edinburgh Festival and Covent Garden, 1961, with Gorr, conductor Solti; Holland Festival, 1964, with Brouwenstijn, Ilosfalvy, Přibyl,¹ conductor Erede; Opéra, Paris, 1965, with Crespin, Chauvet, Massard.

Iphigénie (Iphigenia), *Priestess of Diana*Soprano
 Oreste (Orestes), her brother.....Baritone
 Pylade (Pylades), *his friend*Tenor
 Thoas, *King of Scythia*Bass
 Diane (Diana)Soprano
 Scythians, Priestesses of Diana, Greeks

Place: Tauris

Time: After the Trojan War

Running Time: 2 hours

There is much to support the argument that this is Gluck's greatest opera. Here he comes nearest to a complete reconciliation of his dramatic style with his lyrical, and the extremes represented by Alceste and Armide are to some extent amalgamated. The dramatic and the sensuous meet in Iphigénie en Tauride to form a whole that is more consistent and more expressive than anything Gluck had previously written. Nowhere else did he achieve such homogeneity of style, with whole scenes dominated by a single idea expressed in music of the greatest power, and seldom before had he displayed such invention in the individual arias.

Gluck's last work for Paris has retained its hold on the repertory since its initial success. Richard Strauss's re-working in 1900 was less radical than Wagner's for Aulide.

Iphigenia is the daughter of Agamemnon, King of Mycenae. Agamemnon was slain by his wife, Clytemnestra, who, in turn, was killed by her son, Orestes. Iphigenia is ignorant of these happenings. She has become a priestess of Diana on the island of Tauris and has not seen Orestes for many years.

Act I. Before the atrium of the temple of Diana. To priestesses and Greek maidens, Iphigenia tells of her dream that misfortune has come to her family in the distant country of her birth. Thoas, entering, calls for a human sacrifice to ward off danger that has been foretold to him. Some of his people, hastily coming upon the scene, bring with them as captives Orestes and Pylades, Greek youths who have landed on the coast. They report that Orestes constantly speaks of having committed a crime and of being pursued by Furies.

Act II. Temple of Diana. Orestes bewails his fate. Pylades sings of his undying friendship for him. Pylades is separated from Orestes, who temporarily loses his mind. Iphigenia questions him. Orestes, under her influence, becomes calmer, but refrains from disclosing his identity. He tells her, however, that he is from Mycenae, that Agamemnon (their father) has been slain by his wife, that Clytemnestra's son, Orestes, has slain her in revenge, and is himself dead. Of the once great family only a daughter, Electra, remains.

Act III. Iphigenia is struck with the resemblance of the stranger to her brother and, in order to save him from the sacrifice demanded by Thoas, charges him to deliver a letter to Electra. He declines to leave Pylades, nor, until Orestes affirms that he will commit suicide rather than accept freedom at the price of his friend's life, does Pylades agree to take the letter, and then only because he hopes to bring succour to Orestes.

Act IV. All is ready for the sacrifice. Iphigenia has the knife poised for the fatal thrust, when, through an exclamation uttered by Orestes, she recognises him as her brother. The priestesses offer him obeisance as king. Thoas, however, enters and demands the sacrifice. Iphigenia declares that she will die with ¹ In 1780–1, Gluck revised his opera for its performance in German in Vienna, giving the role of Orestes to Josef Valentin Adamberger (like Vilem Přibyl in Holland in 1964, a tenor). Antonia Bernasconi, Josef Souter and Ludwig Fischer made up the remainder of the cast. Fischer, like Adamberger, was to sing the first performance of Mozart's Entführung the following year.

Iphigénie en Tauride (Welsh National Opera, 1992, directors Patrice Caurier and Moshe Leiser, sets Christian Rätz, costumes Etienne Couleon). Diana Montague as Iphigénie, Simon Keenlyside as Oreste.

her brother. At that moment Pylades at the head of a rescue party enters the temple. A combat ensues in which Thoas is killed. Diana herself appears, pardons Orestes and returns to the Greeks her likeness which the Scythians had stolen and over which they had built the temple.

The mad scene for Orestes, in the second act, has been called Gluck's greatest single achievement. Mention should also be made of Iphigenia's 'O toi, qui prolongeas nos jours', the dances of the Scythians, the air of Thoas, 'De noirs pressentiments mon âme intimidée'; the airs of Pylades, 'Unis dès la plus tendre enfance' and 'O mon ami'; Iphigenia's 'O malheureuse Iphigénie', and 'Je t'implore et je tremble'; and the hymn to Diana, 'Chaste fille de Latone'.

Here may be related an incident at the rehearsal of the work which indicates the dramatic significance Gluck sought to impart to his music. In the second act, while Orestes is singing 'Le calme rentre dans mon coeur', the orchestral accompaniment continues to express the agitation of his thoughts. During the rehearsal the members of the orchestra came to a stop. 'Go on all the same,' cried Gluck. 'He lies. He has killed his mother!'

The version used at the Metropolitan was that made by Richard Strauss, which involves changes in the finales of the first and last acts. Ballet music from Orfeo and Armide was also introduced. K., H.

HERMANN GOETZ

(born 7 December 1840, died 3 December 1876)

DER WIDERSPÄNSTIGEN ZÄHMUNG

The Taming of the Shrew

Comic opera in four acts, libretto from Shakespeare's comedy by Joseph Viktor Widmann. Première, Mannheim, 11 October 1874, with Otilie Ottiker and Eduard Schlosser. First performed Vienna, 1875; London, Drury Lane, 1879; New York, 1886. Revived Metropolitan, New York, 1916, with Ober and Goritz, conductor Bodanzky; Berlin, 1952; London, City Opera Club, 1959.

| | |
|--|-------------------------------------|
| Baptista, a rich gentleman of Padua | Bass |
| Bianca | } his daughtersSoprano |
| Katharina | |
| Hortensio | } Bianca's suitorsBass |
| Lucentio | |
| Petruchio, a gentleman of Verona | Baritone |
| Grumio, Petruchio's servant | Bass |
| A Tailor | Tenor |
| Hortensio's Wife | Mezzo-Soprano |

Baptista's and Petruchio's Servants, Wedding
Guests, Neighbours, etc.

Place: Acts I, II, III in Padua; Act IV in Petruchio's
House in the Country

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Goetz, a pupil in Berlin of Ulrich and Hans von Bülow, spent much of his life in Switzerland as organist in Winterthur and Zürich. Apart from The Taming of the Shrew, he wrote one other opera, Francesca da Rimini, which was much less successful than the first, some songs, piano and chamber music, a symphony, concertos for piano and for violin, and some works for chorus and orchestra. The Taming of the Shrew is his masterpiece.

The overture, for the most part vigorous and forthright, suggests the changes of mood of the opera itself and its underlying lyricism.

Act I. Outside Baptista's house in Padua, at night. Introduced by the clarinet, Lucentio sings an ardent and beautiful serenade to Bianca ('Klinget, klinget, liebe Töne'), until he is interrupted by the noise of Baptista's servants, about to leave his employment because of the scolding ways of his daughter, Kate, whose fury at her father's attempts to pacify them seems warrant enough for their decision. Bianca appears and there follows a charming love duet for her and Lucentio ('O wende dich nicht ab'). The arrival of Bianca's grey-beard suitor, Hortensio, with a band of musicians, puts a stop to the tender scene, and the quarrel of Hortensio and Lucentio eventually wakes up Baptista, to whom Lucentio reveals his love for Bianca. None shall pay suit to Bianca, declares Baptista, until her elder sister is married; meanwhile, Bianca shall study with the best masters in Italy.

In their allegretto duet, Lucentio and Hortensio offer Katharina to one another, until each is struck by the bright idea of disguising himself as a teacher and so gaining admittance to Bianca's presence. Petruchio arrives with his servant, Grumio; he would like nothing better than to share his wealth with a woman worthy of his metal. Hortensio immediately suggests Kate, Petruchio falls for the idea and proclaims his determination to marry her ('Sie ist ein Weib, für solchen Mann geschaffen').

Act II. A room in Baptista's house. Kate mocks Bianca about the previous night's serenades; her sister's supine behaviour, she says, shows why men call women the weaker sex. She makes Bianca accompany her on the lute while she sings 'Ich will mich Keinem geben' (I'll give myself to no one). Petruchio comes in and asks Baptista for Kate's hand in marriage; he will listen to no warning about her character, and resolves that nothing will stop him winning her as his wife. Their first exchange leaves Kate wondering whether she has not at last met her match, in both senses of the word. At the end of the duet, Kate sings of her dawning tenderness for Petruchio.

Baptista comes in to be told by Petruchio that he and Kate are to be married, by Kate that nothing could be further from the truth. Petruchio dominates the quintet which follows (Hortensio and Lucentio have come in as well), and at its end Kate agrees to marry him, more apparently to pay him out than for any other reason.

Act III. Baptista, with Katharina and Bianca, Lucentio and Hortensio (still disguised as teachers), are waiting to welcome the wedding guests, to whom shortly Baptista has to make excuses for the absence of Petruchio. Bianca resumes her lessons, and, under guise of translating the Aeneid, Lucentio makes himself known. Hortensio joins them to turn the duet into a trio, one moreover in the best traditions of German comic opera. Baptista bursts in to say that Petruchio has arrived. Deaf to remonstrance about his lateness or the untidiness of his dress, he leads the procession to church, while the servants prepare the wedding breakfast. It is not long before they are back, Hortensio describing Petruchio's disgraceful behaviour during the ceremony, and Petruchio himself announcing that he and Kate have no time to stay for the party but must be off at once.

Act IV. Petruchio's house. When the newly married couple come in, Kate is pale, Petruchio flourishing a riding whip and complaining about everything in sight. The food is whisked away untouched, and Kate is left to soliloquise on her troubles and admit that her spirit is broken: 'Die Kraft versagt'.

Grumio announces a tailor, who urges the qualities of his wares. Kate likes them, but Petruchio finds fault as usual. Next he plays tricks with the times of day; at first, according to Petruchio it is moonlight, then, when Kate agrees with him, midday. She owns she is beaten; she is now his loving wife. Immediately, Petruchio consoles her, and reconciled, they hear Grumio announce the arrival of Baptista with the newly married Bianca and Lucentio, and also Hortensio and his wife. They rejoice to hear of the taming of the shrew (in the last century, when Minnie Hauck sang Kate, this excellent septet was omitted and a waltz for Kate substituted), and the opera ends with a chorus of wedding guests congratulating Petruchio and Kate.

H.

KARL GOLDMARK

(born 18 May 1830, died 2 January 1915)

DIE KÖNIGIN VON SABA

The Queen of Sheba

Opera in four acts, text by Hermann von Mosenthal. Première at the Hofoper, Vienna, 10 March 1875, with Materna, Wild, and Beck. First performance Metropolitan, New York, 1885, with Lilli Lehmann (Sulamith; in 1889 at the same house, she sang the Queen of Sheba), Krämer-Wiedl, Marianne Brandt, Albert Stritt, Adolf Robinson, Emil Fischer, conducted by Anton Seidl; Metropolitan, 1905, with Rappold (Sulamith), Walker, Alten, Knote, van Rooy, Blass, and conducted by Hertz; Manchester, 1910; London, Kennington Theatre, 1910. The opera was in the repertory of the Vienna Staatsoper continuously from 1875 to 1938. Revived New York in concert, 1970, with Kubiak, Alpha Floyd, Arley Reece.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| King Solomon..... | Baritone |
| Baal Hanan, the Palace overseer | Baritone |
| Assad | Tenor |
| The High Priest | Bass |
| Sulamith, his daughter | Soprano |
| The Queen of Sheba..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Astaroth, her slave | Soprano |
| Voice of the Temple-Watchman | Bass |

Place: Jerusalem

Time: Tenth Century B.C.

Running Time: 3 hours 35 minutes

Goldmark was a Viennese composer of Hungarian and Jewish origin, whose Königin von Saba made a big enough success in 1875 to establish him as a leading composer. Only his comedy Das Heimchen am Herd (1896: from Dickens' The Cricket on the Hearth) made a remotely comparable effect. Of his later operas, Wintermärchen (1908: on Shakespeare's Winter's Tale) won a certain réclame with a strong cast in Vienna.

Act I. In Solomon's magnificent palace everybody is preparing for the reception of the Queen of Sheba. Nobody is more delighted than Sulamith, the daughter of the High Priest, for Assad, whom she is to marry and who had gone to meet the foreign queen, will return with her. But when he comes in, Assad confesses to King Solomon that he has not yet seen the Queen of Sheba, but at a cedar grove in Lebanon a wonderful woman favoured him with her love and since then his mind has been confused. The King tells the young man that God will restore his peace of mind through marriage to Sulamith. The Queen's train approaches, she greets Solomon, and unveils herself. Assad rushes towards her; this was the woman of the cedar grove! What does the young man want of her? She does not know him.

Act II. The Queen declined to recognise Assad but the woman in her is consumed with longing for him. Happy love unites them. The scene changes and shows the interior of the Temple, where the wedding of Assad and Sulamith is about to be solemnised. At a decisive moment the Queen appears; Assad, throwing the ring on the floor, hurries to the Queen, who, for her part, declares a second time that she has never seen him; she came only to bring a wedding gift for Sulamith. Assad has offended the Almighty and has incurred the penalty of death.

Act III. Solomon is alone with the Queen. She has one request to make of him, that he shall release Assad. Why? He is nothing to her but she wants to test whether the King has regard for his guest. Solomon sees through his guest's scheme and refuses her request. The Queen, breathing vengeance, strides out of the palace. Sulamith is in the depths of despair but Solomon consoles her; Assad will shake off the unworthy chains. Far away on the borders of the desert, she will find peace with him.

Act IV. On the border of the desert stands the asylum of the young woman consecrated to God in which Sulamith has found rest from a deceitful world. Assad staggers thither, a weary, banished man. Again the Queen of Sheba appears before him offering him her love, but he flees from the false woman for whom he had sacrificed the noble Sulamith. A desert storm arises, burying Assad in the sand. When the sky becomes clear again Sulamith, taking a walk with her maidens, finds her lover. She pardons the dying man and sings of the eternal joys which they will taste together.

Die Königin von Saba belongs in the category of operas whose music is basically conventional and which require a lavish scenic display if they are to be seen at their best. Much of the music in its day must have sounded agreeably exotic; on the other hand, such a section as Assad's narration to Solomon (Act I) reaches an almost Wagnerian length without displaying quite Wagnerian expressiveness. The beginning of the second act, however, with the scena for the Queen followed by Astaroth's luring song (marvellously effective in the hands of a great artist), Assad's well-known 'Magische Töne' and the extended love duet for him and the Queen are, musically speaking, of considerable appeal. Sulamith's two great scenes with the chorus ('Der Freund ist dein' in the opening scene, and the wailing lament in Act III) have a passionate, exotic colouring and demand considerable powers of execution on the part of the singer. The Queen has a striking duet with Solomon at the beginning of Act III, when she attempts to seduce him from the path of duty and to obtain Assad for herself.

K.W., H.

BERTHOLD GOLDSCHMIDT

(born 18 January 1903, died 17 October 1996)

Berthold Goldschmidt studied at the Berlin Hochschule with Franz Schreker, worked as co-répétiteur at the Berlin State Opera under Erich Kleiber, and had his first success as a composer in 1925, around the time he helped coach Wozzeck. In 1932 his first opera, Der gewaltige Hahnrei, was successfully staged. Carl Ebert scheduled it for the Städtische Oper, Berlin, but the advent of the Nazis brought cancellation and Goldschmidt's flight as a refugee to England, where he subsisted as a composer for ballet and with the B.B.C.'s Overseas Service.

After 1945 he worked for Glyndebourne, of which Ebert was artistic director, conducting a famous revival of Verdi's Macbeth at the 1947 Edinburgh Festival. In 1951 his second opera, Beatrice Cenci, won an Arts Council prize, but no performance followed and, in spite of sporadic success as a conductor – notably, the first performance in 1964 of Deryck Cooke's reconstruction of Mahler's Tenth Symphony – his music found little favour in a period dominated by reverence for the avant garde. In his eighties, Goldschmidt's career came back on the rails when conductors, particularly Simon Rattle, rediscovered his music and a concert performance in 1988 of Beatrice Cenci put him once again, in the last few years of his life, on the musical map.

DER GEWALTIGE HAHNREI

The Magnificent Cuckold

Opera in three acts, after Le Cocu magnifique (1920) by the Flemish playwright Fernand Crommelynck, which had success in Paris, Russia, Berlin and London. Première in Mannheim, 14 February 1932, with Else Schulz, Heinrich Kuppinger, conductor Joseph Rosenstock. First performed Berlin (concert), 1992, with Roberta Alexander, Robert Wörle, conductor Zagrosek; Komische Oper, Berlin, 1994, with Yvonne Weidstruck, Günter Neumann, conductor Yakov Kreizberg, director Harry Kupfer.

Stella.....Soprano
Bruno, her husband.....Tenor
Petrus, Stella's cousin.....Baritone
An Oxherd.....Baritone

Mémé, Stella's old nurse.....Mezzo-Soprano
Estrugo, Bruno's secretary.....Tenor
A Young Man.....Tenor
Cornelie, a neighbour.....Soprano
Florence, a neighbour.....Mezzo-Soprano
A Policeman.....Baritone

Neighbours

Running Time: 2 hours 5 minutes

Act I. After a brisk overture, domestic small talk establishes Stella's devotion to her husband Bruno. An Oxherd asking for help with a letter makes play for Stella so roughly as to amount to attempted rape, but Mémé sends him packing with a whack over the head. A burst of lyricism accompanies the ecstatic greeting of Bruno and Stella, before, for her seafaring cousin Petrus, Bruno bids Stella show her paces, capping it all by baring her breast. In a fit of jealousy, Bruno knocks Petrus to the ground, then questions his secretary Estrugo as to Stella's faithfulness. He tries to get Stella to admit to some misdemeanour while he was away, then chucks Petrus out of the house.

Act II. Stella wears a black coat and mask as Bruno demands the name of her lover. For a moment the interrogation gives way to Bruno's old affection, but a knock at the door rouses new suspicions. A young man asks Bruno to write a letter for him, which Bruno affects to believe is addressed to Stella – who else could be 'the most beautiful girl in the district'? Estrugo has the sense to warn him to get away while the going is good.

Bruno announces the only cure for his insane suspicions is certainty: Stella must be unfaithful beyond any doubt. He comes quickly to the point: Petrus must put him out of his misery by providing proof. Goaded by insults, Petrus takes Stella upstairs and a furious interlude brings back Estrugo to spy through the keyhole and report what he sees. Bruno reacts by fetching a gun. Villagers gather and with a touch of solemnity mock Bruno as a cuckold.

Act III. Bruno regulates traffic as young men queue up outside, assuring one another anyone can have Stella. The policeman is scandalised. Estrugo and Bruno put a ladder up to Stella's window and Bruno sings extravagant love music. Stella seems to recognise his voice and eventually, after an extensive duet, lets him in. Village women armed with pitchforks attack the masked figure of Bruno, quickly turning their fury against Stella herself. They plan to throw her in the canal but the Oxherd rescues her and demands she come with him. After a struggle of conscience – she still loves Bruno – and a moment of fastidious revulsion – her saviour is a filthy fellow – she starts to give in, and when Bruno takes aim at the Oxherd, instinctively protects him. Nonetheless, it is Bruno, her husband and tormentor, she begs to force her to swear an oath of eternal fidelity. Bruno agrees but as he watches them leave, 'the magnificent cuckold' allows an expression of satisfaction to cross his face as he says: 'Ah no, I'm not so stupid! Another of her tricks! I won't be taken in again!' H.

BEATRICE CENCI

Opera in three acts, libretto by Martin Esslin after The Cenci by Percy Bysshe Shelley. Excerpts 1952, B.B.C.; Queen Elizabeth Hall, London, 1988, with Helen Lawrence, Henry Herford, conductor Odaline de la Martinez. Première, Berlin (concert and recording), 1994, with Roberta Alexander, Simon Estes, conductor Zagrosek; Magdeburg, 1994, with Heather Thomson, David Cumberland, conductor Matthias Husmann.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Count Francesco Cenci | Bass-Baritone |
| Lucrezia, his second wife | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Beatrice, his daughter from a first marriage | Soprano |
| Bernardo, her brother | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Cardinal Camillo | Bass |
| Orsino, a Prelate | Tenor |
| Marzio, a hired murderer | Baritone |
| Olimpio, a hired murderer | Baritone |
| A Judge | Tenor |
| A Singer at Count Cenci's feast | Tenor |
| Prince Colonna | Baritone |
| Andrea, a servant | Baritone |
| An Officer | Tenor |
| Carpenter I | Tenor |
| Carpenter II | Baritone |
| Servants, Dancers, Jailers, People | |

Place: In and Near Rome

Time: 1599

Running Time: 2 hours

In spite of the Arts Council prize won by the composer at the 1951 Festival of Britain for Beatrice Cenci, it remained unstaged, apart from a couple of widely spaced concert performances of excerpts, until Goldschmidt was in his nineties.

Shelley's verse drama (1819) was printed but not seen in his lifetime because of the shocking subject – Count Francesco Cenci, a rich nobleman born in 1549, was known for a life of debauchery: he hated his sons and was guilty of incest with his daughter Beatrice. He was three times imprisoned for his vile behaviour but always able to buy freedom through hefty donations to the Papal Treasury. Beatrice and her mother were found guilty of employing murderers to kill him and the death sentence was upheld by the Pope, incensed, it is said, in the knowledge that the Count could no longer pay the heavy ransoms which after each crime procured his release.

Act I. The garden of the Cenci palace. Heavy chords and music of some solemnity usher in the drama. Lucrezia and Beatrice join with Bernardo, who has just been struck by his father out of pure malice, to lament their sufferings.

Orsino is announced and they go in, leaving Count Cenci to hear Cardinal Camillo deliver the Pope's judgment: the murder the Count has recently committed will be hushed up provided he cedes a certain property, which he describes as a third of his possessions. No doubt, says Cenci, the Pope will pray that he long enjoy the strength to sin.

Beatrice remembers the love she and Orsino once felt for each other, to which the prelate replies that he remains hopeful the Pope will not only sympathetically consider her petition against her father's cruelty but may even grant Orsino a dispensation to marry – something, the moment Beatrice's back is turned, he denies he has any intention of pursuing.

At a grand reception in Count Cenci's palace, the host greets his guests. They dance and listen to an arietta before the Count with relish announces the death of his two elder sons, long the object of his hatred. Cardinal Camillo hopes it was a jest but Cenci in a little song gloats triumphantly before defying the guests' revulsion and even Beatrice's eloquent plea for help. They fear Cenci's revenge.

Act II. A tumultuous prelude precedes Beatrice's impassioned denunciation to Lucrezia of her father's as yet unspecified crime. Orsino's arrival sets in motion the terrible chain of events which will lead to the deaths of each of them. He will procure a trustworthy pair of assassins – and when the Count calls for Beatrice, she pours an opiate in his wine. As she and Beatrice wait for deliverance, Lucrezia sings impressively of their hopes.

The deed is quickly done but no sooner have the murderers left than Cardinal Camillo thunders at the door, demanding to see the Count, who must answer new and grave charges. Tension mounts, the murder is discovered, and the Cardinal is obliged to arrest Lucrezia and Beatrice as suspects.

Act III. Bernardo is brought to Lucrezia and Beatrice as they lie in prison and he hears Beatrice describe how she dreamed of Paradise. Camillo, the Judge and their attendants tell them one of the murderers has confessed under torture, but neither woman will admit guilt. The incriminating letter found on the murderer is in Orsino's writing, but he is not to be found and the Judge decrees Lucrezia be put to the torture. Beatrice tries to comfort Bernardo but Lucrezia confesses and in despair Beatrice follows suit. The Judge sentences them to death but the Cardinal attempts a word of comfort with a promise to plead for mercy from the Pope.

They sleep and an eloquent orchestral nocturne precedes Camillo's return with the news that the Pope has confirmed the Judge's sentence. Beatrice sings a gentle lullaby in an effort to comfort Lucrezia and an interlude takes us to the square, where carpenters prepare the scaffold and the mob waits for victims. Beatrice bids a brief farewell to Bernardo, and they are led away to a short reprise of the lullaby, the Cardinal after a moment confirming their deaths. The Pope himself is heard passing in procession 'to pray for forgiveness for the souls of these poor sinners' and the sound of a Requiem brings the opera to an end. H.

ANTÔNIO CARLOS GOMES

(born 11 July 1836, died 16 September 1896)

For the Brazilian composer Gomes, opera meant Italian opera. Geographical remoteness from the musical mainstream produced not originality, but old-fashioned bel canto within a spectacular, if conventional theatrical framework borrowed from Meyerbeer. Il Guarany brought him success at la Scala, Milan, and is the only one of his works to have lasted.

IL GUARANY

Opera-ballo in four acts, libretto by Antonio Enrico Scalvini and Carlo D'Ormeville, based on the novel O Guarany by Jose Martiniano de Alencar (1857). Première at la Scala, Milan, 19 March 1870, with Teodoro Coloni as Antonio, Maria Sass as Cecilia, Giuseppe Villani as Pery, Enrico Storti as Gonzales, Victor Maurel as Il Cacico, conducted by Eugenio Terziani. British première Covent Garden, 1872, with M. Sessi, Ernesto Nicolini, Antonio Cotogni and Jean Baptiste Faure. First U.S. performance in San Francisco, 1884. Recent production at the Oper der Stadt, Bonn, 5 June 1994, with Veronica Villaroel, Plácido Domingo, Carlos Alvarez and Boris Martinovic, conducted by John Neschling.

Don Antonio de Mariz, *elderly Portuguese nobleman*Bass
Cecilia, *his daughter*Soprano
Pery, *chief of the Guaraní tribe*Tenor
Don Alvaro, *Portuguese adventurer*Tenor
Gonzales, *Spanish adventurer*Baritone
Ruy-Bento, *Spanish adventurer*Tenor
Alonso, *Spanish adventurer*Bass
Il Cacico, *chief of the Aimoré tribe*Bass
Pedro, *Don Antonio's man-at-arms*Mute

Adventurers, Men and Women of the Portuguese Colony, Savages of the Aimoré Tribe

Place: Rio de Janeiro

Time: c.1560

Running Time: 3 hours 25 minutes

The opera's strong suit is melodies of a popular slant that are hard to resist. His characters remain conventional types, beneath a thin veneer of exoticism, but they can prove grateful roles. Cecilia calls for exquisite vocalism from the trilling start (typically off-stage, like Bellini's Elvira and many others). Victor Maurel (Verdi's Iago and Falstaff) created the role of Il Cacico, while Pery, the noble savage, represents a quintessential tenor role, popular with Tamagno and Mario del Monaco; Plácido Domingo has since championed its cause outside South America.

The Portuguese nobleman Don Antonio de Mariz governs a part of Brazil that is home to two indigenous tribes, the bellicose Aimoré, led by Il Cacico, the Cacique, and the peaceable Guaraní, whose chief, Pery, loves Antonio's daughter, Cecilia.

Act I. In front of Don Antonio's castle. The Spaniard Gonzales resolves to deprive the Portuguese Don Alvaro of Cecilia, whom they both love. Her father Antonio brings news that one of his men accidentally killed a girl from the Aimoré tribe: now the Indians insist on revenge. His daughter Cecilia was recently saved from the Aimoré; Antonio introduces the Guaraní, Pery, and embraces him as his brother and friend. All are struck by Pery's nobility. Pery swears to protect the Europeans from the Aimoré. Cecilia is heard singing a love song off-stage (polacca). Antonio introduces her to the husband he chose for her, Don Alvaro. She goes white, but before Antonio can find out why, bells ring for the Ave Maria. They all kneel in prayer for peace ('Salve, possente Vergine'). Pery notices how furtively Gonzales arranges to meet Ruy and Alonso later, in secret, at the Savage's Grotto. He determines to prevent any treachery. The act ends with a duet for Pery and Cecilia ('Sento una forza indomita', recorded by Caruso and Destinn), in which they explore their burgeoning feelings for one another.

Act II. The Savage's Grotto. In a scena and aria ('Vanto io pur') Pery reflects that although he is in thrall to his 'signora', Cecilia, he himself is of high birth. He watches as Gonzales tempts Ruy and Alonso with a story of a rich silver mine, but when they agree to let Gonzales abduct Cecilia, Pery calls out 'Traditori!' (Traitors). Ruy and Alonso go to investigate. Pery fights Gonzales, but spares his life when the Spaniard swears to leave ('Giurar debbo').

The adventurers' barracks. Alonso and Ruy bribe the adventurers with the promise of gold ('L'oro è un ente sì giocondo'). Gonzales himself sings a lilting song celebrating the adventurer's life ('Senza tetto, senza cuna'). They all swear to follow wherever he leads.

Cecilia's bedroom. She takes up her guitar and sings a ballata about the power of love ('C'era una volta un principe'), before retiring to rest and dream of Pery. Gonzales climbs through the window. When Cecilia refuses to yield ('Donna, tu forse l'unica'), he tries to seize her. From outside Pery fires an arrow that wounds Gonzales in the hand. Don Alvaro rushes in, but so do the adventurers. Pery accuses Gonzales of treachery. Discordant music for 'savage instruments' signifies that the Aimoré have surrounded the castle. They all rush off to defend it.

Act III. The camp of the Aimoré. Cecilia has been taken prisoner in the recent battle. The Indians swear to exterminate the Portuguese. The Aimoré chief, the Cacique, protects Cecilia: he wants her to be the queen of his tribe ('Giovinetta, nello sguardo'). The Indians have captured Pery, who defiantly admits that he intended to kill the Cacique. The Cacique insists that sacred rites must be accomplished before Pery can be killed and eaten. Cecilia will first be given to him as his 'bride of death'. She urges Pery to escape. He refuses ('Perchè di meste lagrime'), and secretly swallows poison, intended to kill the Aimoré when they eat him. The Cacique offers Pery in prayer to their god; Cecilia prays for deliverance. Don Antonio leads the Portuguese in an attack which rescues his daughter. He gives the credit to God.

Act IV. The cellars of the castle, lit by a flaming torch. Gonzales tells the adventurers that he is going to let the Aimoré into the castle, though he will save Cecilia for himself ('In quest'ora suprema'). Antonio has overheard them and swears to forestall their treachery. Pery also appears: he used his knowledge of forest herbs to concoct an antidote to the poison he took. He asks Antonio to allow him to save Cecilia. When Antonio points out that he worships idols, Pery asks to be initiated into Christianity. Antonio baptises him. Cecilia runs in: the Aimoré are coming, bent on destruction. Antonio entrusts her to Pery's care, but she refuses to leave her father. When she faints, Pery carries her away to safety. The adventurers burst in. Antonio seizes the torch and ignites the barrels of gunpowder. An explosion destroys the castle. In the distance, on a hill, Cecilia can be seen, supported by Pery, who points to heaven.

Il Guarany is the national opera of Brazil. For audiences elsewhere, its subject matter is little more than harmless hokum. As a drama, it moves jerkily towards static tableaux. On the other hand, its music, like its hero, throbs with a full-blooded naïveté: the various set pieces, Christian and heathen prayers, curses and lovesongs, disarm criticism with their full-frontal Italianità – by 1870 Verdi's operas sounded less Italian than this. And when Verdi himself heard Il Guarany he saluted Gomes's 'true musical genius'. P.

CHARLES FRANÇOIS GOUNOD

(born 17 June 1818, died 18 October 1893)

Gounod divided his life between writing music for Church and for stage. His earliest opera was written for Pauline Viardot when he was over thirty, but Sapho heralded a list of regular if not unremitting successes, starting with Faust (1859) and running through the brilliantly written Le Médecin malgré lui, the mythological comedy Philémon et Baucis, the grandiose La Reine de Saba, the Provençal Mireille, culminating in the lyrical and tragic Roméo et Juliette. What transpired after the Franco-Prussian War is another matter. A sojourn in England produced a mass of songs, which on his return to France he turned into French and sold as new work, and unsuccessful operas like Cinq-Mars, Polyeucte and Le tribut de Zamora. That his last operatic effort was a re-hash of Sapho, his first, has been taken as a sign of the short distance he had travelled in the more than thirty years involved. Nonetheless, the composer of at least four operas of very high quality, wholly representative of the era of their composition, is entitled to forget a rather large number of near-misses.

LE MÉDECIN MALGRÉ LUI

Doctor in Spite of Himself

Opera in three acts, text by Barbier and Carré after Molière's Le Médecin malgré lui. Première Théâtre Lyrique, Paris, 15 January 1858. Revived at the Opéra-Comique in 1902 with Lucien Fugère as Sganarelle, and later with Louis Musy, conductor Désormière; 1978 with Jean-Philippe Lafont, conductor Cambreling, during which run it achieved its 100th performance in the house.

Sganarelle, a woodcutter Baritone
Léandre, Lucinde's lover Tenor
Martine, Sganarelle's wife Mezzo-Soprano
Jacqueline, Lucas's wife Mezzo-Soprano
Lucinde, Géronte's daughter Soprano
Géronte, a wealthy bourgeois Bass
Valère, Géronte's valet Baritone
Lucas, Géronte's servant Tenor

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

When Faust, already scheduled, was in 1857 postponed, Gounod was lucky that the impresario Léon Carvalho, to make up for the disappointment, asked him to write this opera to a Molière text. Berlioz praised the score but the short work was not often performed during the composer's lifetime. Nonetheless its charms are considerable and demonstrate that Gounod was accomplished in comedy as well as lyric tragedy – Queen Mab and Faust's Dame Marthe come into their own! Revivals reveal attractive solo numbers like Sganarelle's 'Qu'ils sont doux' and Léandre's second-act serenade 'Est-on sage dans le bel âge', and overall lively, elegant, rewarding invention of a sort which will agreeably surprise opera-goers familiar only with the composer's more sentimental effusions.

The text of the opera closely follows Molière's play, to such an extent that the Comédie-Française tried initially to block performance. Sganarelle the woodcutter is inclined to get drunk and beat his wife. She vows to get her own back. Valère and Lucas, who work for Géronte, are looking for a doctor to cure Lucinde, Géronte's daughter, of a mysterious loss of speech, in reality a pretext to extricate her from an undesirable engagement.

Le médecin malgré lui (Paris, Opéra-Comique at Salle Favart, 1978, director Jean-Louis Martin-Barbaz, designer Pierre-Yves Leprince). Jean-Philippe Lafont as Sganarelle, Joscelyne Taillon as Jacqueline.

Martine points Sganarelle out as a learned but eccentric doctor, who acknowledges his profession only to those who beat him. Léandre, Lucinde's impoverished but otherwise eligible lover, explains to Sganarelle the precise nature of Lucinde's malady and they become accomplices when Sganarelle takes him on as his assistant. Sganarelle pays court to Lucas's wife Jacqueline, and enables Léandre to get into Géronte's house. Denounced by Lucas, Sganarelle seems to have run out of luck but Léandre informs Géronte that an uncle has just died leaving him a fortune, information which diverts that worthy's fury and sets a happy ending in train. H.

FAUST

Opera in five acts, words by Barbier and Carré. Première at Théâtre Lyrique, Paris, 19 March 1859, with Miolan-Carvalho, Barbot, Reynald, Balanqué. Gounod composed 'Even bravest heart may swell' for the great English baritone Charles Santley in 1864 when the opera was first performed in English; for many years French performances omitted this splendid aria.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Faust, a learned doctor | Tenor |
| Méphistophélès (Mephistopheles) | Bass |
| Marguerite | Soprano |
| Valentin, a soldier, Marguerite's brother | Baritone |
| Siébel, a village youth in love | |
| with Marguerite | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Wagner, a student | Baritone |
| Martha Schwerlein, Marguerite's | |
| neighbour | Mezzo-Soprano |

Students, Soldiers, Villagers, Angels, Demons

Place: Germany

Time: Sixteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 30 minutes

Originally composed with sections of spoken dialogue, Faust was re-worked more than once, sung recitatives being added in 1860, Valentin's aria in 1864, and an extensive ballet at the time the work reached the Opéra (1869).

A brief prelude is mostly concerned with the aria Gounod wrote for Santley, which was indeed derived from the prelude's melody.

Act I. Faust's study. The philosopher is alone reading, before dawn. In despair he is about to drink poison when he hears cheerful singing outside. He curses life and advancing age and calls for Satan's help. Méphistophélès appears and offers him wealth and power but Faust wants neither unless accompanied by the gift of youth. A vision of Marguerite at her spinning wheel produces a rapturous response: 'A moi les plaisirs!'

Act II. A fair outside a city. Students, among them Wagner, soldiers, burghers of every age are drinking and making the most of carnival. Siébel and Valentin make their entrance, the latter examining a medal given him by his sister Marguerite as a talisman against harm in battle. He sings the aria written for Santley. Méphistophélès sings the song of the Calf of Gold, an ironic celebration of man's worship of Mammon, before telling Siébel that every flower he touches will henceforth wither. He picks a quarrel with Valentin by toasting Marguerite, swords are drawn but Valentin finds his powerless until he and the other soldiers extend their swords' cruciform hilts and counter the might of Méphistophélès.

Méphistophélès and Faust watch as develops the famous waltz, whose grace undulates exquisitely throughout the action. Siébel is in love with Marguerite but Méphistophélès manoeuvres him away from her and Faust is at last allowed to meet his vision. In a short but telling episode he offers her his arm, only, with matching elegance, to be rejected (notoriously, the only time the soprano voice is heard during two and a half acts of operatic action!). The waltz scintillates to the end.

Act III. Marguerite's garden. Siébel in a charming song attempts to leave flowers in front of his beloved's house but they wither as he touches them, and only when he has dipped his fingers in holy water do they remain fresh. Faust sings rapturously ('Salut! demeure chaste et pure'); the graceful aria with its floated top C is a touchstone of the French romantic tenor repertory. Méphistophélès substitutes a casket of jewels for Siébel's flowers and Marguerite, with the handsome stranger in mind, at first daydreams at her spinning wheel ('Il était un roi de Thulé') then bursts into the brilliant Jewel Song.

There is a short interlude in the form of a quartet for Faust and Marguerite, Méphistophélès and Martha, before Méphistophélès invokes night and the scent of flowers to render lovers impervious to all but their own mounting passion. Faust declares his love in an extended and justly famous duet, at whose end he and Marguerite agree to meet next day. He listens to her soliloquising into the night ('Il m'aime'), then folds her in his arms as Méphistophélès shakes with laughter outside.

Act IV. Marguerite's room. Though she has been betrayed and deserted, Marguerite cannot find it in her heart to respond to Siébel's callow protestations of love ('Versez vos chagrins'); she still loves Faust.

A church. Marguerite kneels to pray but the voice of the invisible Méphistophélès reminds her of her sin and demons call her name. The 'Dies irae' resounds, Marguerite joins in, but Méphistophélès condemns her to eternal damnation.

The street in front of Marguerite's house. Soldiers return from war and sing a rousing chorus (the attempts of modern producers to suggest in general the horrors of war and in particular wounded men returning from the front involve so great a solecism as to be doomed to failure). Valentin enters the house, alerted to trouble by the obvious distress of Siébel. Méphistophélès sings a ribald serenade which provokes Valentin to an attempt to avenge what he rightly takes to be an insult. A spirited trio leads to a duel, in which Faust mortally wounds his lover's brother. Marguerite throws herself on his body but with his dying breath Valentin curses her.

Act V. The ballet which was obligatory for the Paris Opéra produced one of Gounod's most mellifluous scores, and the action involves the courtesans of antiquity who pass before Faust. A vision of Marguerite causes Faust to demand of Méphistophélès that he see her again. She is in prison, condemned to death for killing her child, and Faust tries by recalling past happiness to persuade her to escape with him. The reappearance of Méphistophélès banishes any idea of flight and Marguerite thinks only of the salvation she prayed for and which he interrupted in church. 'Anges purs, anges radieux' she sings in a soaring melody which brings a final cry from an angelic chorus: 'Sauvée!' (Saved!)

Faust's fame is built on its principal numbers – the tenor-bass duet in Act I; the waltz, Valentin's solo, and the scene between Faust and Marguerite in Act II; in Act III, the tenor aria, Marguerite's two solos, the love duet; the ballet and the trio in the last act.

Faust. The great bass-baritone Vanni-Marcoux (1877–1962) as Méphistophélès, a role which he first sang at the Paris Opéra in 1908.

Gounod's gift was for lyricism of a high order, but also for a theatrical effectiveness which has over the years brought audiences to opera. The popularity of Faust in the nineteenth century and the frequency with which it was given there were so great that the Metropolitan Opera in New York came for a time to be known as the Faustspielhaus! H.

MIREILLE

Opera in five acts, text by Michel Carré after Frédéric Mistral's poem Mireio. Première at the Théâtre-Lyrique, Paris, 19 March 1864, with Miolan-Carvalho and Michot. First performed at Her Majesty's, London, 1864, with Tietjens, Giuglini, Santley; Philadelphia, Covent Garden, 1864; 1891, with Eames. Revived at Metropolitan, 1919, with Barrientos, Hackett, Whitehill, conductor Monteux. In the open air at the Val d'Enfer, Les Baux, 1954, with Vivalda, Gedda, Dens, conductor Cluytens. English National Opera, 1983, with Valerie Masterson, Adrian Martin.

Mireille.....Soprano
 Vincent, her lover.....Tenor
 Ourrias, a bull-tender.....Baritone
 Maître Ramon, father of Mireille.....Bass
 Taven, an old woman.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Vincenette, Vincent's sister.....Soprano
 Andreoun, a shepherd.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Maître Ambroise, father of Vincent.....Bass
 Clémence.....Soprano

Place: In and Near Arles

Time: Mid-Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

Even before the first performance, the compliant Gounod allowed his pastoral tragedy to be savaged, mostly at the behest of the director of the Théâtre-Lyrique and his wife, who created the title role. There were cuts and additions, characters were amalgamated, the tragic dénouement was even changed into an operetta-style marriage. No wonder the opera failed to achieve the success which it deserved. Only seventy-five years later, under the determined leadership of Reynaldo Hahn, Henri Busser and Guy Ferrant, the producer, was the work in 1939 performed as Gounod had composed it, and a worthy element in the French repertory revealed.

Act I. The overture sets the Provençal atmosphere, with its cornemuse tunes. The scene is a mulberry plantation. After a pastoral chorus, Mireille confesses that she is in love with Vincent, who returns her affection. Her song, 'O légère hirondelle', in the waltz rhythm in which Gounod liked to introduce his heroines, is attractively ingenuous, and was written at the express request of Miolan-Carvalho, wife of the all-powerful manager of the Théâtre-Lyrique.¹ In spite of the warning of Taven that a girl should not give her heart away so openly, least of all when there is little possibility of parental approval for the proposed match, Mireille makes no pretence of hiding her feelings when Vincent comes towards her. In duet they repeat their vows, and pledge each other to meet in a particular sanctuary if ever trouble should threaten their lives.

Act II. A festival is in progress at Arles. A faran-dole chorus makes a vigorous introduction to the act. Mireille and Vincent are there together and, when asked by the company to sing, they perform the graceful Chanson de Magali: 'La brise est douce'. Taven warns Mireille that Vincent has a rival, Ourrias, who has admitted his love for her. Mireille is indignant at the idea that she might prove unfaithful to Vincent: 'Tahir Vincent!' She will be true to him all her days: 'Non, jamais, jamais! A toi mon âme'.

Mireille's fervent avowal of her love is followed by the entrance of Ourrias, 'Si les filles d'Arles', a typically bucolic song. Before the act ends, Ourrias has asked for Mireille's hand and been refused, Vincent's father, Ambroise, has likewise pleaded for his son and been told that his reasons were nothing short of mercenary, and Mireille has emphasised the firmness of her attachment for Vincent, in spite of her father's preference for Ourrias.

Act III. Near Taven's cave, late at night. Ourrias is furiously jealous, strikes Vincent and leaves him for dead. Taven revives him and hurls a curse after Ourrias. Ourrias tries to escape across the Val d'Enfer, only to be confronted by the reproaching voices of conscience in the shape of the spirits of deceived lovers which haunt the place. Even the ferryman who comes to his aid seems to know of his crime, and he drowns attempting to escape.

Act IV. Late the same evening, at Ramon's farm. Midsummer night celebrations are in progress, and Ramon is full of regret that his opposition to Mireille's marriage seems to have broken her heart and may blight his own old age. Mireille recalls the song of Magali and thinks enviously of the carefree life of the shepherds. She hears from Vincenette what has happened to Vincent and decides that this is just such a situation of crisis as made them in happier times vow to meet at the Church of Les Saintes Maries by the sea. There she will go.

The scene is the plain of La Crau, where little has a chance to grow before being burnt up by the heat of the sun. Mireille, on her way to the sanctuary, hears a charming shepherd's song: 'Le jour se lève', sung by Andreoun. His life in contrast with hers seems wonderfully free of care: 'Heureux petit berger'. With a supreme effort, she goes on her way.

Act V. The scene changes to the sanctuary itself, the Church of Les Saintes Maries. There is a march and chorus for the pilgrims, after which Vincent appears, vainly searching for Mireille. In an effective aria, 'Ange du Paradis', he prays that she may win her way to their meeting place, in spite of the torrid heat of the Provençal sun. Mireille arrives in a state of collapse, and, by the time Ramon arrives to forgive her, she is already dying. A heavenly voice welcomes her soul into the realm of God.

H.

ROMÉO ET JULIETTE

Romeo and Juliet

Opera in five acts, words by Barbier and Carré, after the tragedy by Shakespeare. Produced Paris, Théâtre-Lyrique, 27 April 1867, with Miolan-Carvalho, Michot, Barre, Cazaux; January 1873, taken over by the Opéra-Comique; Opéra, 28 November 1888, with Patti, Jean and Edouard de Reszke, Delmas.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| The Duke of Verona | Bass |
| Count Paris | Baritone |
| Count Capulet | Baritone |
| Juliette (Juliet), his daughter | Soprano |
| Gertrude, her nurse | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Tybalt, Capulet's nephew | Tenor |
| Roméo (Romeo), a Montague | Tenor |
| Mercutio | Baritone |
| Stéphano, Roméo's page | Soprano |
| Grégorio, a Capulet retainer | Baritone |
| Benvolio, retainer to the Montagues | Tenor |

¹ It is now sometimes omitted in performance as being a display piece and out of character for the introvertedly lyrical Mireille.

Frère Laurent (Friar Lawrence)Bass
 Frère Jean (Friar John)Bass
 Nobles and Ladies of Verona, Citizens, Soldiers, Monks and Pages

Place: Verona

Time: Fourteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 20 minutes

Having pillaged Goethe for Faust, Gounod's librettists went to Shakespeare for Roméo et Juliette, which, like Faust, reached the Paris Opéra by way of the Théâtre-Lyrique. This is not Shakespeare distilled in music (like Verdi's Otello); it is, on the contrary and like Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, a French romantic opera of high calibre, containing moreover some of Gounod's finest lyrical music.

The libretto is in five acts and follows closely, often even to the text, Shakespeare's tragedy. There is a prologue in which the characters and chorus briefly rehearse the story that is to unfold.

Act I. The grand hall in the palace of the Capulets. A masked ball is in progress. Tybalt speaks to Paris of Juliet, to whom Paris is engaged and who at that moment appears with her father. Capulet greets his guests – 'Allons! jeunes gens! Allons! belles dames!'

Romeo, Mercutio, Benvolio and half a dozen followers arrive in masks. Despite the deadly feud between the two houses, the Montagues have decided to come to the Capulets' ball in disguise. Mercutio sings the ballad of Queen Mab, a number as gossamer-like in the opera as the monologue is in the play (or indeed in Berlioz's dramatic symphony).

The Montagues head off to another part of the palace as Juliet returns with her nurse, Gertrude. Full of high spirits, she sings the graceful and animated waltz, 'Je veux vivre dans ce rêve, qui m'enivre'. Gertrude is called away and Romeo encounters Juliet. Their attraction, as in the play, is instantaneous. Romeo, with great passion, addresses his new-found love: 'Ange adorable'.

Tybalt comes in and Romeo quickly replaces his mask. But Tybalt's suspicions are aroused, and Juliet learns that the youth she finds so attractive is a Montague. Tybalt is all for revenge, but old Capulet, respecting the laws of hospitality, orders that the ball proceed.

Act II. The garden of the Capulets. Romeo is with his page, Stéphano, below Juliet's apartment. He sings one of Gounod's finest tenor arias, 'Ah! lève-toi soleil'. Juliet comes out on to the balcony and Romeo hides. From her soliloquy he learns that, although he is a Montague, Juliet loves him. Their exchange of pledges is interrupted briefly, as Grégorio and servants unsuccessfully search the gardens for a suspected intruder.

Gertrude calls and Juliet goes into her apartment. Romeo sings meaningfully 'O nuit divine', and Juliet steals out on to the balcony. The act ends with a ravishing duet, 'Ah! ne fuis pas encore!', and a brief farewell.

Act III, part i. Friar Lawrence's cell. The Friar, hoping that Romeo and Juliet's union may lead to peace between the two houses, is to marry the couple. Lawrence's hopes are summed up in his prayer, 'Dieu, qui fis l'homme à ton image'. There is an effective trio, in which Romeo and Juliet respond passionately to the marriage vows the Friar intones, and a final quartet for Juliet, Romeo, Friar Lawrence and Gertrude, 'O pure bonheur'.

Part ii. A street near Capulet's house. Stéphano, thinking Romeo may still be hiding in Capulet's garden, sings an attractive song ('Que fais-tu, blanche tourterelle') calculated to bring the Capulets into the street and allow Romeo to escape. Grégorio rushes out and he and Stéphano fight. This brings out various Montagues and Capulets, including Mercutio, who fights Tybalt and is killed. Romeo in revenge kills Tybalt. At the height of the fighting, the Duke appears and banishes Romeo from Verona.

Act IV. Juliet's room. Romeo has come to bid her farewell before he goes into exile. Their feelings, their despair, find utterance in the music. There follows the duet, 'Nuit d'hyménée, O douce nuit d'amour', during whose course Romeo hears the lark, a sign of dawn. Juliet protests, 'Non, ce n'est pas le jour', Romeo follows with 'Ah! reste! encore dans mes bras enlacés'; and the composer rises to new heights of eloquence.

Hardly has Romeo gone than Gertrude appears to warn Juliet that her father is approaching with Friar Lawrence. Tybalt's dying wish, says Capulet, was that Juliet marry Count Paris at once. Capulet orders her to prepare and no one dares tell him of Juliet's secret marriage to Romeo. Capulet leaves and Friar Lawrence gives Juliet a potion which, when taken, will make her appear dead ('Buvez donc ce breuvage').

In a scene often omitted, in the grand hall of the palace, there occurs a ballet (essential for a production at the Opéra), after which Juliet drinks the potion and falls senseless.

Act V. The tomb of the Capulets. After an exchange between Friar Lawrence and Friar John, there occurs a short interlude, an exquisite miniature, which Gounod called 'Le Sommeil de Juliette' (Juliet's sleep). Romeo, having in exile heard that Juliet is dead, has broken into the vault ('Salut, tombeau sombre et silencieux').

He sings to what he takes to be the corpse of Juliet, 'O ma femme! o ma bien aimée!', then takes poison. Juliet, who is beginning to recover from the effects of the potion and is unaware that Romeo is dying, awakens. They sing 'Viens, fuyons au bout du monde', but it is too late: Romeo, feeling the poison working, tells Juliet what he has done, 'Console-toi, pauvre âme'. Juliet will not live without Romeo and stabs herself. H.

ENRIQUE GRANADOS

(born 27 July 1867, died 24 March 1916)

GOYESCAS

Opera in three scenes (one act), text by Fernando Periquet. Première, Metropolitan, New York, 28 January 1916, with Fitziu, Perini, Martinelli, de Luca, conductor Bavagnoli (in Spanish). First performed Opéra, Paris, 1919; Buenos Aires, 1929; la Scala, Milan, 1937, with Carbone, Elmo, Civil, Poli, conductor Capuana; Royal College of Music, London, 1951; Florence, 1963; London, Morley College, 1965.

Rosario, *a highborn young lady*Soprano
 Fernando, *a young officer, her lover*Tenor
 Paquiro, *a toreador*Baritone
 Pepa, a young girl of the people,
 Paquiro's sweetheart Mezzo-Soprano

Majas and Majos

Place: Madrid

Time: About 1800

Running Time: 1 hour 5 minutes

Granados is mainly famous as an inspired composer of piano music and songs, though his early stage works for Barcelona achieved some local success and are thought of as contributions to the establishment of opera in Spain. Goyescas was developed from existing piano music, and once the composer had organised the musical form, the librettist wrote round what had been composed. The work was intended for Paris but the war caused cancellation and it was given in New York; the composer was drowned when his ship was torpedoed by a German submarine as he was returning to Europe.

The characters and setting of the opera are suggested by the work of the great Spanish painter Goya. The opera opens with a crowd of majas and majos enjoying a holiday on the outskirts of Madrid. Some of the majas are engaged in the popular pastime of tossing the pelele (a man of straw) in a blanket. Paquiro the toreador is paying compliments to the women. Pepa, his sweetheart of the day, arrives in her dogcart. Soon Rosario, a lady of rank, arrives in her sedan-chair to keep a tryst with her lover, Fernando, a captain in the Royal Spanish Guards. Paquiro reminds her of a baile de candil (a ball given in a room lit by candlelight) which she once attended. He invites her to go again. Fernando overhears his remarks, and his jealousy is aroused. He informs Paquiro that Rosario will go to the ball, but that he, Fernando, will escort her. He extracts Rosario's promise to go with him, while Pepa, enraged by Paquiro's neglect, vows vengeance upon her.

The second tableau shows the scene at the ball. Fernando appears with Rosario. His haughty bearing and disdainful speech anger all present. The two men arrange for a duel that evening, and when Rosario recovers from a swoon, Fernando takes her away.

The third tableau reveals Rosario's garden. She is sitting on a bench listening in pensive mood to the song of the nightingale. This is the famous aria called 'The Lover and the Nightingale' (La Maja y el Ruiseñor), one of the most beautiful and luxuriant nocturnes ever written for voice and orchestra.

Fernando visits Rosario before keeping his appointment with Paquiro. When a bell strikes the fatal hour, Fernando tears himself away. He is followed hesitatingly by Rosario. Soon the silence is broken by a cry from Fernando, followed by a shriek from Rosario. They reappear. Rosario supports Fernando to a stone bench where he dies in her arms.

Granados adapted the music of his opera from a set of piano pieces (1911) inspired by the paintings of Goya:

1. Los Requeibos (Endearments)
2. Coloquio en la Reja (Conversation at the Window)

3. El Fandango del Candil (The Fandango by Moonlight)
4. Quejas o la Maja y el Ruiseñor (Complaints, or the Maiden and the Nightingale)
5. El Amor y la Muerte (Love and Death)
6. La Serenada del Espectro (The Spectre's Serenade)
7. El Pelele (The Straw-Man)

The first tableau begins and ends with No. 7; No. 3 starts the second; and the third is almost entirely based on the music of Nos. 4, 2 and 5. H.

ANDRÉ-ERNEST-MODESTE GRÉTRY

(born 8 February 1741, died 24 September 1813)

Grétry began his career with Les Mariages samnites, privately performed for the Prince de Conti in 1768. Given in a public theatre, it brought him widespread recognition. The day after Le Huron was first performed at the Comédie-Italienne (i.e. the Opéra-Comique) in 1769, Grétry was offered five librettos to set; his career was made and his popularity endured for the next thirty years and over fifty operas. He set out to write French operas in the Italian style and mostly succeeded, particularly when he collaborated with the encyclopédiste Jean-François Marmontel (1723–99), who managed to treat serious themes lightly. Together, between 1768 and 1775, they created a string of distinguished works that defined and extended the opéra-comique tradition, among them Zémire et Azor, a version of Beauty and the Beast which has proved Grétry's most lasting opera. Marie-Antoinette loved Zémire et Azor, but Grétry was also pleased that one of the guards in the palace was such a fan that he presented arms when the composer passed.¹ Grétry received a pension from Louis XVI and from Napoleon.

ZÉMIRE ET AZOR

Comédie-ballet mêlée de chants et de danses in four acts, dedicated to the Comtesse du Barry, libretto by Jean-François Marmontel, based on Mme J.M. Le Prince de Beaumont's story La belle et la bête (1756). First performed at Fontainebleau, 9 November 1771, and later at the Comédie-Italienne, 16 December 1771. It reached Moscow in 1775; first U.K. performance, King's Theatre, London, 1779 (in Italian); American première, Philadelphia, 1787. Leipzig, 1993, conducted by Volker Robde.

Sander, a Persian merchant Baritone
 Ali, his servant/slave Tenor
 Azor, a Persian prince, King of Kamir Tenor

Sander's daughters
 Zémire Soprano
 Fatmé Soprano
 Lisbé Soprano

A Fairy Spoken

Troupes of Genies and Fairies (mute)

Place: Ormuz, Persia

Time: Legendary

Running Time: 2 hours

Act I. Inside a fairy palace at night. The overture portrays the storm that forces Sander and Ali to shelter in a deserted palace. Terrified, Ali tells himself that the storm has stopped, but, as the score points out, 'the accompaniment contradicts his words' (ariette, 'L'orage a cessé'). Sander is not frightened: since he lost all his worldly goods in a shipwreck, he does not care. Ali stays, for the sake of the food and wine that appear magically. He just wants to sleep (duet, 'Le temps est beau'), but before they leave, Sander remembers that his youngest daughter Zémire asked him to bring back a rose. He cuts one, which causes their host to appear. Azor is a prince who has been transformed into a monster. He demands Sander's life in exchange for the rose. Sander pleads to be allowed to see his daughter for the last time, promising that one of his daughters or he himself will return.

¹ Grétry neveu, Grétry en famille, Paris, 1814.

Act II. Sander's house. Zémire and her sisters wait for their father to return. He tells them that they face poverty. The prospect does not daunt Zémire, who loves the rose he brings her (ariette, 'Rose chérie'). She realises something else is worrying her father. Ali swears he'll never travel again, certainly not by air ('Plus de voyage qui me tente'). Foreseeing his death, Sander writes a farewell letter to his daughters. Zémire forces Ali to tell her the truth and then to lead her to Azor (duet, 'Je veux le voir, je veux lui dire').

Act III. Inside Azor's palace. The spell that turned Azor into a monster forces him to love in vain, until he can find someone to love him as he is ('Ah! quel tourment d'être sensible'). Zémire sees that an apartment has been prepared for her and tells Ali to reassure her father. Genies dance for her. Zémire faints when she sees Azor, but soon realises how noble he is. Azor commands Ali to leave and promises Zémire he will not devour her. At his invitation, she sings a song ('La fauvette avec ses petits'). When he realises how much Zémire misses her family, he shows them to her in a magic vision. Azor tells Zémire he loves her, but allows her to return to her family for an hour, giving her a magic ring which frees her from his power, as long as she wears it. She promises to come back before sunset.

Act IV. Sander's house. Zémire arrives by flying chariot. Her family will not believe what she says about Azor (quartet, 'Ah! Je tremble. Quelles alarmes'). She throws the ring away and vanishes.

In a grotto of his palace, Azor sees the sun set and despairs ('Le soleil s'est caché dans l'onde'). Zémire searches for him, her voice echoed by distant horn-calls ('Azor, Azor! en vain ma voix t'appelle'), and when she declares that she loves him, the scene changes to another palace. The Fairy restores Azor's beauty and presides over the couple's wedding.

Given the opera's date and courtly provenance, it would be unwise to expect Grétry and Marmontel to plumb the mythic depths of the story of Beauty and the Beast. Indeed, the librettist intervened in the first production to reject the original designs for Azor's costume, and as a result, Marmontel congratulated himself that Azor's mask looked 'frightening, but not at all deformed, nor anything like a snout'. Marmontel's enlightened, eighteenth-century framework enabled him to tell the story with a striking degree of truth. If it is no longer about monstrosity, it is still about fathers, daughters and growing up. Music and words are marked by the cult of sensibility, yet the result is far from a grisaille or a Greuze. P.

RICHARD COEUR-DE-LION

Richard the Lionheart

Comédie mise en musique in three acts, libretto by Michel-Jean Sedaine, based on a story in the Bibliothèque universelle des romans (1776). First performance, Salle Favart, Comédie Italienne, Paris, 21 October 1784, with Philippe as Richard, Clairval as Blondel, Madame Dugazon as Laurette and Mademoiselle Rosalie as Antonio. First U.K. performance, Covent Garden, London, 1786, adapted by Shield in an English translation by Thomas Linley, with Kemble as Richard and Mrs Jordan as Matilda. Revived Opéra Comique, 1841, when Adolphe Adam revised the orchestration.

Richard Coeur-de-Lion,

King Richard I of England Tenor
Blondel, his squire, a troubadour Baritone
Antonio Soprano
Sir Williams, a Welsh knight Bass
Laurette, his daughter Soprano
Colette Soprano
Florestan, Governor of the castle Baritone
Countess Marguerite d'Artois Soprano
Peasants, Soldiers, Marguerite's Retinue

Place: Austria

Time: Twelfth Century

Running Time: 2 hours

Act I. The opera opens with a lilting, rustic chorus, as peasants look forward to the party to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of old Mathurin's marriage to Mathurine. It sets up a vision of harmony, to which the opera eventually returns, in the last scene.

Seeking his master King Richard, who may have been incarcerated in the nearby castle, Blondel pretends to be blind. He is guided by the young peasant, Antonio. When Blondel asks if he likes to dance, Antonio replies there are other activities he prefers, such as embracing his fifteen-year-old girlfriend.

Unlikely as it may sound, his song has much charm ('La danse n'est pas ce que j'aime'). In a rather grander vein, Blondel reflects that, though the universe abandons Richard, he remains faithful, as does Marguerite, the woman who loves him. As a troubadour, Blondel is bound by love, faithfulness and constancy ('O Richard, o mon roi'). Sir Williams rebukes Guillot for having brought love letters from the Governor of the castle to Sir Williams's daughter, Laurette. Realising that this may provide him with access to the castle, Blondel tries to pacify him. Laurette arrives and denies that she sees or talks to the Governor. Antonio reads out the letter: the Governor explains that he cannot leave 'the prisoner', but if she appoints a time to see him at night, he will come.

We learn that Sir Williams is a Welshman who followed King Richard to the crusades, but when he returned home, he lost his property and was obliged to flee. When Sir Williams leaves, Blondel has a chance to question his daughter. Unfortunately, Laurette has no idea of the prisoner's identity, but she is not unhappy to learn that the Governor, or Chevalier Florestan, as he signed himself, longs to throw himself at her feet. Blondel tells her that Florestan hopes to see her tonight, which occasions her haunting ariette, 'Je crains de lui parler, la nuit'. This is the song that the old Countess sings in Tchaikovsky's Queen of Spades. In that context, Laurette's tremulous heartbeat (occasioned by Florestan's declaration of love) takes on a new, rather sinister sound, which is not appropriate in its original setting. Laurette confides in Blondel, who encourages her to see Florestan this evening. He sings her a little song, about love's blindness. She determines to learn it, so as to sing it to Florestan, and repeats it one beat after him ('Un bandeau couvre les yeux').

Blondel asks whether he can stay the night in her father's house. She explains that Sir Williams has agreed to let a 'grand lady' take over his entire house for one night, so the decision is up to her. When the lady arrives, Blondel recognises her as Marguerite, whom Richard loves. To make sure, he plays a fragment of a tune that Richard himself once composed. She recognises the tune at once and willingly allows Blondel to stay. The orchestra takes over the melody and elaborates it beautifully. The Countess's men offer him a drink. In return, Blondel sings his 'Chanson du Sultan Saladin'.

Act II. An entr'acte portrays the 'Ronde de Nuit', or night watch, in which Florestan allows Richard to enjoy the fresh air: when day dawns he must return to his cell. The Governor refuses to listen to his prisoner's attempts to enlist his support, rather as Rocco in Fidelio refuses to listen to another, rather different, Florestan. The parallel has even more point in the prisoner's aria, the highlight of the opera as its grand introduction suggests. Richard's vocal line is full of heroic leaps, as he reflects that his glory and his worth are of no use if the world is to forget his existence. He consoles himself by summoning the image of Marguerite to comfort him, but ends by longing for death to break his chains. His air is as moving as it is spectacular ('Si l'univers entier m'oublie').

Antonio leads Blondel to the edge of the parapet and then leaves. Blondel sings the romance that Richard himself once composed, and it becomes a duet as Richard recognises Blondel's voice. Curiously, the orchestral playout is the most effective section of all ('Une fièvre brulante'). Soldiers arrive (their music has a markedly Turkish flavour) and interrogate Blondel. They threaten to incarcerate him, but relent when he pleads blindness. When the Governor arrives, Blondel relays Laurette's reply to his letter: she will see him, if he comes to the party given by the noble lady that evening.

Act III. Blondel promises to give his friends Urbain and Guillot gold if they enable him to talk to the Countess. Their trio has a rather heartless vivacity ('Mon cher Urbain, mon ami Charle [sic]'). Blondel's singing can be heard from off-stage. He reveals that he recognised the Countess, tells her who he is and that Richard is nearby. She summons her knights and Sir Williams. Blondel tells Sir Williams to hold a party, ostensibly to celebrate Mathurin's anniversary. The Governor will attend, hoping to see Laurette. They will take advantage of his absence to storm the castle. Laurette is delighted to hear that the Governor will come. Peasants dance, led by Guillot, who sings a comic song in praise of marriage: when cattle couple, ploughing improves; everything goes better à deux.

The castle is successfully attacked to stirring, brass-inflected music. The finale proves disappointingly undistinguished: perhaps its very faint anticipation of Fidelio's final scene makes it seem even worse than it is. They all salute King Richard, celebrate their happiness and the faithful friendship that ended their sadness. P.

H

JACQUES FRANÇOIS FROMENTAL HALÉVY

(born 27 May 1799, died 17 March 1862)

LA JUIVE

The Jewess

Opera in five acts, text by Scribe. Première at the Opéra, Paris, 23 February 1835, with Falcon, Dorus-Gras, Nourrit, Levasseur. First performed New Orleans, 1844; Drury Lane, London, 1846; Covent Garden, 1850 (in Italian), with Pauline Viardot, Tamberlik; Metropolitan, 1885, with Materna, conductor Damrosch. Revived Metropolitan, 1887, with Lilli Lehmann, Niemann, Fischer; 1919, with Ponselle, Caruso, Rothier, conductor Bodanzky; 1936, with Rethberg, Martinelli, Pinza; Paris, 1933, with Hoerner, Franz, Huberty; New York, 1944, with Dorée, Carron; Karlsruhe, 1952; Ghent, 1964, with Tony Poncet; London (in concert), 1973, with Richard Tucker. Rosa Raisa was famous in the role of Rachel, and Duprez one of Nourrit's most famous successors in the role of Eléazar. Both Caruso and Martinelli enjoyed great success as Eléazar.

Princess Eudoxie, *niece of the Emperor*Soprano
Rachel, *daughter of Eléazar*Soprano
Eléazar, Jewish goldsmith.....Tenor
Léopold, *prince of the Empire*Tenor
Ruggiero, *provost of the city of Constance*Baritone
Albert, *sergeant in the army of the Emperor*Bass
Cardinal de Brogni, *president of the Council*Bass

Place: Constance, in Switzerland

Time: 1414

Running Time: 3 hours

Halévy was thirty-five at the time of the first performance of La Juive; later he wrote a number of other operas, many of them successful, but La Juive remains the work by which his name goes down to posterity. Wagner had more than a little admiration for his work, and he was, apart from Rossini, Verdi and Berlioz, perhaps the most talented of the composers who tackled the specifically French form of 'grand opera' – more so on the evidence of La Juive than Meyerbeer, but unfortunately without quite Meyerbeer's drive and energy.

The original plan was to give the role of Eléazar, one of the greatest in the nineteenth-century tenor repertory, to a high bass, and to place the scene of the opera in Spain at the time of the Inquisition's greatest power, but in the end the chief role was written for the great tenor Nourrit, who himself, if tradition is to be believed, had a hand in the writing of certain portions of the opera, notably the famous aria 'Rachel, quand du Seigneur'.

Before the opera opens, various relevant events have taken place. De Brogni was once chief magistrate of Rome. During one of his periodical absences from the city, it was captured by the besieging Neapolitans and considerable portions burnt. Among the houses pillaged and destroyed was Brogni's own; he returned to find his wife dead and his child vanished. In his agony, Brogni gave up his civic dignities and joined the Church, later rising to become the Cardinal who is one of the principal figures of the story.

Act I. The overture is concerned with contrasting the themes representing the Jewish and the Christian elements of the story, and the curtain rises to reveal a square in the city of Constance. On one side, the great door of a church; on the other, the house and work-room of Eléazar. Inside the church, the choir is chanting a Te Deum, outside a bystander resents the fact that some Jew seems to be working on a Christian feast-day. Léopold, the young general who has just triumphantly led his armies to victory over the Hussites, is in Constance in disguise – on a previous visit he had met and fallen in love with Eléazar's daughter, Rachel, and he wishes to resume the acquaintance. He is recognised by one of his own soldiers but enjoins the fellow to silence, at the same time enquiring the cause of the festivity he seems to have stumbled upon. Albert tells him that it is in honour of the state visit of the La Juive (Metropolitan Opera House, New York, c. 1919). Enrico Caruso (1873–1921) and Rosa Ponselle (1897–1981) as Eléazar and his daughter Rachel.

Emperor, who has called a great council with a view to uniting all the Christians of the world into one solid faith, an undertaking only envisaged since Léopold's own victories over the dissident Hussites.

A great choral 'Hosanna' resounds from the church, and the congregation pours out, to listen to the proclamation in the Emperor's name of a public holiday by Ruggiero, the provost of the town. Nothing could better suit the temper of the people, but no sooner have they voiced their enthusiastic reaction than Ruggiero hears the sound of work going on in Eléazar's shop and orders the occupants to be brought before him. Eléazar answers Ruggiero's questions with defiance; did he not watch his own sons burned by Christians? Why should he bow to their laws? Ruggiero threatens him with a similar death, but Cardinal Brogni is passing with his retinue, and asks what is the cause of the noise. He recognises Eléazar, and the jeweller reminds him that it was in Rome that they formerly knew each other (there is no mention of it in the opera, but in Scribe's original story it is made clear that Brogni had banished Eléazar from Rome, thus saving his life after he had been condemned to death as an usurer). Brogni sings a smoothly flowing cavatina, 'Si la rigueur et la vengeance', in which he prays that enlightenment may come to the Jewish unbelievers.

Only Léopold is left behind. He takes up a position outside Eléazar's house (he has been taken on there as a workman under the name of Samuel, and they believe him to be Jewish), and proceeds to serenade Rachel. It is a charming, high-lying melody, and it is not long before Rachel answers it from inside. She bids him come that very evening, when her father and his fellow-believers will be celebrating the feast of the Passover. Léopold is about to object when a crowd rushes into the square, intent on making the most of the Emperor's largesse. The choruses pile up on one another, there is a brisk dance, and drinking is general. Eléazar and Rachel, trying to cross the square, are recognised as Jews by Ruggiero and set upon by the mob. Eléazar confronts them with dignity, but they are for throwing him in the lake, when salvation comes in the person of Léopold who, though still disguised, is immediately recognised by Albert, who causes the crowd to leave the Jewish pair alone. Rachel is astonished at the effect Samuel has on the Christians and at first tries to restrain him from intervening. Eléazar continues to pour scorn on the hated Christians.

Act II. A room in Eléazar's house, where the feast of the Passover is being celebrated. Eléazar leads the chant ('O Dieu, Dieu de nos pères'), which the others, together with Rachel, repeat after him. Eléazar pronounces a curse upon anyone who dares profane the holy feast ('Si trahison ou perfidie') and then distributes the unleavened bread, Samuel being the last to receive it. He thinks he has escaped notice when he drops it without tasting it, but Rachel has seen his gesture, and is worried by what it may mean. The scene is immensely impressive, and the measured incantation of the opening is one of the most remarkable moments in the opera.

Eléazar's supplication to God ('Dieu, que ma voix tremblante') is barely finished when there is a knock at the door. He commands the Jews to put away the ritual vessels and candles, and the table is removed, the Jews themselves going out through a back door. Léopold is about to depart, when Eléazar commands him to stay with him. The door is opened, and in comes the Princess Eudoxie. She makes herself known, and Eléazar kneels before her. Her object is to buy from him a fine chain for her husband Léopold, whom that day she expects back from the wars. Léopold overhears the conversation, and is filled with remorse at his deceit.

While Eléazar sees Eudoxie to the door, Rachel returns and asks Samuel to explain his conduct when saving them from the mob, and also, that evening, at the Passover service. He protests that he must see her in great privacy.

Rachel comes back to keep her rendezvous with Léopold. Her heart is full of foreboding, even fear ('Il va venir! et d'effroi je me sens frémir'). The aria admirably expresses the mixture of feelings of which she is conscious, and is full of the apprehension with which she awaits their meeting. Léopold admits that he has deceived her, and is in fact a Christian. Rachel bitterly reproaches him for his deception; he can but defend himself by saying that there was no thought in his mind but love of her. His pleading is so passionate that Rachel is on the point of yielding, when her father confronts them.

Eléazar declares that their offence is such that they shall not escape punishment. In a trio they admit their guilt and express terror at the wrath of Eléazar, who tells them that only the fact that Samuel is a Jew prevents him from striking him dead on the spot for his falsity. Léopold bids him strike; he is a Christian. Rachel intercepts the blow, and pleads distractedly for her lover; she also is guilty. Eléazar declares himself willing to agree to the marriage, but his wrath knows no bounds when Léopold says that he is unable to marry Rachel.

Act III in some versions begins with a scene for Eudoxie and Rachel, who asks to be allowed to serve as a slave in her palace for one day only; she has trailed Léopold to the palace, and does not yet know his real identity. Eudoxie agrees to her request.

When this scene is omitted, the act begins in the gardens of the Emperor's palace, where a festival in honour of Léopold is in progress. The Emperor himself is seated at the high table, together with Brogni, Léopold and Eudoxie. A ballet is performed for their entertainment, and at its end, Eléazar and Rachel come to bring Eudoxie the chain she has bought for Léopold. When she is about to place it round her husband's neck, Rachel snatches it from her and announces that Léopold has committed the heinous crime of consorting with a Jewess, and that she herself is the Jewess in question.

There is a moment of stupefied horror. When Eléazar asks if the Christian laws are directed only against Jews or apply equally to themselves – Léopold has silently admitted the charge – Cardinal Brogni rises to his feet and pronounces a terrible anathema on all three, who have dared to break the laws of heaven ('Vous, qui du Dieu vivant': You, who defy the living God).

Act IV. All have been condemned to death, but Eudoxie resolves to risk humiliation in order to save Léopold, whom she still loves. She begs Rachel to retract her charge. Rachel at first proudly refuses, then says she will do as she has been asked, saying to herself that a Jewess can outdo a Christian in magnanimity. The scene is highly dramatic and is succeeded by one hardly less compelling when the Cardinal confronts Rachel and begs her to abjure her faith and to save herself from death. She refuses.

Brogni resolves to send for Eléazar in a last effort to save Rachel. He pleads with him to renounce his faith, and in so doing to save her life; but the old man is resolute in the face of temptation, and refuses to deny his forefathers' creed. He reminds Brogni of the time when his house and family perished in the conflagration; his daughter was saved by a Jew who came to fight the flames, and she is alive now. But though her whereabouts are known to him, he will take his revenge by carrying the secret with him to death. Brogni implores him to reveal what he knows, but he will say no more.

Eléazar is torn with doubts; can he bear, by his orthodoxy and his own uncompromising hatred of Christians, to send his daughter to her death? The thought tortures him, and resolves itself into a great expression of emotion ('Rachel, quand du Seigneur'). This is the climax of the opera, and Eléazar is at one and the same time at his noblest and his most human. He hears the savage cries: 'Au bûcher, les Juifs' (The Jews to the scaffold!) from outside, and is strengthened in his decision; Rachel shall die a victim of their hate. The end of the act is hardly less moving than the great aria a little earlier.

Act V. From a tent a view is to be had of the ground on which the scaffold is erected for the martyrdom of the two Jews – Léopold's sentence has been commuted to one of banishment. The people howl for the death of the Jews, and presently Eléazar and Rachel are seen coming slowly into view. Just as he is about to mount the scaffold Eléazar asks Rachel if she would like at the last moment to abjure her faith and adopt Christianity, but she proudly disdains any such idea. She is thrown into the cauldron at the very moment when Brogni is told by Eléazar, 'Your daughter perished in those flames'.

H.

IAIN HAMILTON

(born 6 June 1922)

Iain Hamilton's success as a composer included no staged opera before The Catiline Conspiracy, after Ben Jonson's play, was mounted in 1974 by Scottish Opera. The earlier The Royal Hunt of the Sun, based on Peter Shaffer's highly successful play and described by the composer as 'much more a music-theatre work than an opera', followed in a performance by English National Opera in 1977. Tamburlaine, written for radio, was his third opera concerned, as has been written, with the use and misuse of power. With Anna Karenina, commissioned for English National Opera, both his music and the drama inspiring it moved from a largely atonal basis to something much more lyrical and tonal. Raleigh's Dream was performed at Duke University, Durham, in the U.S.A. (1984), Lancelot in the open air at Arundel Castle in 1985, and the large-scale Dick Whittington has so far remained unperformed.

ANNA KARENINA

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer after Tolstoy's novel. Première by English National Opera, London, 7 May 1981, with Lois McDonall and Geoffrey Pogson, conductor Howard Williams. First performed Los Angeles, 1983, conductor Chris Nance, who also conducted E.N.O.'s revival in 1985.

Alexei Karenin, Minister in Imperial Government Baritone
 Anna, his wife Soprano
 Count Alexei Vronsky Tenor
 Prince Stiva Oblonsky, Anna's brother Baritone
 Dolly, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
 Kitty, her sister Soprano
 Colonel Yashvin, friend of Vronsky's Bass
 Countess Betsy, Anna's friend Mezzo-Soprano
 Countess Vronskaya, Vronsky's mother Soprano
 Countess Lydia, friend of Karenin's Contralto
 Seriosha, Anna's son Treble
 Landau, a mystic Tenor
 Servants, Guests, Travellers

Place: In or Near St Petersburg and Moscow

Time: 1870s

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Act I. Vronsky is at Moscow's railway station to meet his mother, who arrives from St Petersburg with Anna, whom Vronsky meets for the first time. Anna is deeply affected when a railwayman is crushed to death.

Dolly is distraught at Stiva's unfaithfulness, and Anna tries to comfort her. There is talk that Vronsky will propose to Kitty, Dolly's sister. A visitor is announced. Stiva goes to meet him and says it was Vronsky but he wouldn't come up. Anna seems a little nervous.

Waltz music introduces the ball and a sequence of five dances. Vronsky and Anna are obviously drawn to each other, to the dismay of Dolly and Stiva and the consternation of Kitty, who runs from the room.

Countess Betsy's, St Petersburg. There is gossip about Anna and Vronsky, who arrive and are soon in close conversation. Vronsky says they will either be the most happy or the most miserable of people. When Karenin arrives he warns Anna people are talking. He is left alone with his jealousy.

At the racecourse and watched by the fashionable crowd, Vronsky has a bad fall. Karenin observes Anna's horror and tries to take her home, but she rounds on him and declares her love for Vronsky.

In a garden house at Karenin's, Anna hears that Vronsky is safe. She regrets telling him before the race that she is carrying his child, but when he comes in, their love consoles them and they dream of travelling to Italy.

Act II. Karenin decides not to give Anna a divorce. Vronsky drinks with Yashvin, then tries to dispel Anna's forebodings. Anna sings a lullaby for Seriosha, her son, then has a bitter exchange with Karenin.

Dolly is coldly received when she asks Karenin not to divorce Anna because of the scandal. Anna's telegram begging Karenin to come to Moscow where she is dying produces a dilemma: he fears a trick but worries what people would say if he did not go.

In St Petersburg, Anna is delirious after giving birth to a daughter. Karenin arrives, Vronsky on his own expresses his love for Anna, who demands he and Karenin forgive each other. If he does not divorce Anna, says Stiva, she will die. Karenin agrees and the three men reflect on what she means to each of them. Vronsky and Anna again dream of Italy.

Act III. Vronsky's estate outside Moscow. Stiva is optimistic about Anna's acceptance in society, but Dolly and Vronsky discuss a recent snub at the opera. Vronsky fears that without a divorce, even their children will be legally Karenin's. Anna feels she cannot ask Karenin for anything: even Seriosha is now with Countess Lydia.

Stiva finds Karenin changed, declining, since Anna once refused it, to countenance divorce. Karenin is totally under the influence of Countess Lydia and the mystic Landau.

In Moscow, Dolly and Yashvin visit Anna and Vronsky who, once they have gone, quarrel over something as trivial as the day they should leave for the country. Vronsky leaves, is about to turn back, then goes. Time becomes vague, Anna tries to contact him by message and note, then is found at the railway station where, half out of her mind, she staggers on to the track in front of a train. Vronsky, overcome with remorse that he never turned back when instinct suggested it, falls by her body.

It is interesting that the composer decided that the important figure of Levin was peripheral to the drama he was looking for. In structure, the opera is traditional, with ensembles like the trio between Vronsky, Stiva and Karenin in Act II; and large-scale scenes such as the opening at the station, the ballroom dances, and the racecourse. The music, in comparison with what he had written before, might be described as romantic, and as the composer has written, 'one thing matters above all else – love. It is born, rejoiced in, suffered through, betrayed, and finally lost.'

H.

GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL

(born 23 February 1685, died 14 April 1759)

The music of Handel's operas represents a high point of the first half of the eighteenth century, and such obstacle as there is between us and them lies in conventions which they respect and from which we were until recently remote. This was a period of consolidation in operatic history, and in Handel's day convention had become entrenched, with the aria, and more particularly the 'aria da capo' with its obligatory repeat, reigning supreme; with an exit following virtually every aria, itself a purely individual expression; with virtually no ensembles and no chorus, so that even a final number tended to be sung by the principals together; with libretti geared to provide opportunities for 'typical' arias (expressing pity, sorrow, amorous intention, regret, despair, determination, martial ardour, etc.) rather than for character development and surprise. Castrati ruled the roost, and the music for such heroes as Julius Caesar and Tamburlaine was written for vocal virtuosi whose breath control and volume were apparently sufficient to compensate for a physique which was often obese.

The revival of interest in Handel's operas which came in the early 1920s brought with it much revision, sometimes of musical detail in the interest of musico-dramatic continuity, almost always in the tessitura of the voices, so as to preserve an attempt at physical verisimilitude. In a word, castrato heroes became baritones or basses. In the mid-twentieth century, during the consolidation period of the Handel revival, an opposite and more scholarly attitude began to prevail, so that more or less strapping mezzos tackled the great heroes of antiquity, with results which were occasionally surprising to look at and not always heroic vocally, but which allowed Handel's orchestration to be retained and such anomalies avoided as for instance the changing of an obbligato for flute to one for oboe, in order to cut out the solecism of matching the higher instrument to a baritone when Handel had intended it to be in double harness with a mezzo. Each solution has its snags, as has the more obviously reprehensible (but, in view of length, tempting) practice of truncating 'da capo' arias, which when cut often sound either pointless or too long, sometimes paradoxically both. All the same, performance of Handel's operas, more or less complete, with the pitch of the original voices maintained (even in an age with no castrati), is by the late twentieth century the accepted norm.

Handel himself often made changes to suit the exigencies of a new situation, altering a soprano part for tenor, importing a number from another work (and another situation) for a new prima donna, adding or subtracting as seemed to him best in each new set of circumstances. But his changes often involved recomposition, and there is an overwhelming case to be made for his dramatic awareness within the convention, for his sheer stagecraft; most modern revivals which are sung to anything like the composer's requirements, and respect his intentions, serve to demonstrate that Handel's operas are the product of one of the medium's sovereign composers of genius. H.

AGRIPPINA

Opera in three acts, libretto by Cardinal Vincenzo Grimani. Première Venice, January 1710, with Durastanti, Diamante Maria Scarabelli, Valeriano Pellegrini (castrato), Francesca Vanini-Broschi, Antonio Carli. First performed Naples, 1713; Hamburg, 1718; Vienna, 1719. Revived Halle, 1943; first English performance, Abingdon, 1963; Buxton Festival, 1992.

Agrippina, *the Emperor's wife*Soprano
 Poppea (Poppaea).....Soprano
 Nerone (Nero), *Agrippina's son*Soprano
 Claudio (Claudius), the Emperor.....Bass
 Ottone (Otho).....Contralto
 Pallante (Pallas), a freedman.....Bass
 Narciso, a freedman.....Alto
 Lesbo, *Claudio's servant*Bass
 Giunone (Juno)Contralto

Place: Rome

Time: First Century A.D.

Running Time: 2 hours 55 minutes

Agrippina was the second of the two operas Handel wrote during his sojourn in Italy (1706–10), one of the few texts written specially for him and not set by other composers. The serious issues and conflicts which arise in the course of the action are far from flipantly treated, but there is no doubt that composer and librettist have a satirical intent in mind, in this respect following, according to Winton Dean,¹ Italian taste of an earlier generation – nearer to Busenello and Monteverdi in their treatment of a classical subject in L'Incoronazione di Poppea than to Metastasio.

The plot is involved but not unnecessarily complicated. Agrippina, the Empress, schemes untiringly to secure the throne after Claudius' death for her son Nero by her first marriage. Claudius is weak and self-indulgent, Poppea self-seeking, Nero youthful and far from the monster of later life. Ottone, the loyal lieutenant, is in love with Poppea whom he subsequently marries, though later losing her to Nero once he becomes emperor.

Act I. The overture suggests the brilliant, fast-moving character of the opera. Agrippina has no difficulty in rousing Nero's ambitions by convincing him that the recently received news of Claudius' death suggests he should set about wooing the plaudits of the mob. She will use both Pallante and Narciso, each of whom is in love with her, to further her ambitions, but these receive a setback when to the sound of trumpets the safe arrival of the Emperor is announced. Ottone has saved Claudius' life and won a promise of the succession; he is however in love with Poppea, as, we quickly discover, are both Claudius and Nero, and would if need be sacrifice the throne for her. Poppea learns Claudius will visit her that very night but would much prefer Ottone, whom she fancies, as in an unguarded moment she admits to Agrippina. The Empress sees her chance and persuades Poppea to arouse Claudius' jealousy by convincing him Ottone has bargained to give her up in return for the succession. Poppea, furious at Ottone's apparent duplicity, successfully works on Claudius, who little knows that Poppea and Agrippina are in deadly league.

Act II. Pallante and Narciso now believe Agrippina has hoodwinked both of them. Agrippina effusively greets Claudius and turns him against Ottone, who is soon proclaimed a traitor, Agrippina,

¹ Handel's Operas (O.U.P. 1987), a definitive study.

Poppea and Nero all joining in denunciation of his conduct. Poppea still yearns for Ottone and, when he protests his innocence of the charge that he bartered her love, returns the sword he has handed her rather than plunging it into his heart. In pursuit of her goal, Poppea strings Nero along as well as Claudius, while Agrippina to strengthen her position promises her favours in succession to Pallante and Narciso, provided each will dispose of the other as well as Ottone. She persuades Claudius in his own interest and for his own safety to announce Nero as his successor, then crows over her manipulative success.

Act III. Poppea in succession hides Ottone and Nero behind curtains in her apartment, then manoeuvres Claudius when he too comes for an assignation into denouncing Nero, who to his fury is caught apparently in flagrante delicto. Only if Claudius protects her against Agrippina's rage, insists Poppea, will he enjoy her love. It is Ottone's turn; he must promise Poppea he loves her more than the throne itself. Nero asks for Agrippina's help and is told the throne is more important than Poppea. Narciso and Pallante meanwhile decide a full confession to Claudius is their one chance of preferment, but Claudius is baffled as to who is telling the truth and who not. Agrippina, in a masterstroke, when accused of plotting against the Emperor, admits the charge but insists it was all done to protect him. Pallante and Narciso shamefacedly feel forced to confirm her claim.

Claudius in an effort to sort things out sends for Poppea, Nero and Ottone, gets Nero to admit he was hiding in Poppea's room and orders him to marry her, confirming Ottone as his successor. Ottone chooses Poppea rather than the throne, Claudius reverses his previous decision, seems glad to be rid of Poppea, and has Juno solemnly bless the new arrangement.

The figures of the opera, apart from Lesbo, are real enough though historical facts are rearranged, and opinion is agreed that this is one of the most satisfactory texts Handel ever set – compact, logical, freely flowing. Apart from Ottone who behaves with decency throughout, the characters are by and large immoral though not wholly without redeeming features: Agrippina is ferociously ambitious, but for her son, not herself; the scheming Poppea is courageous and seems genuinely in love with Ottone; even the bumbling

Claudius ends by being magnanimous. Handel's music splendidly mirrors their faults and foibles, the arias full of feeling however ambivalent the situations in which they find themselves and however much Handel was indebted to earlier works of his own, to say nothing of his borrowings from composer-colleagues like Keiser and Mattheson. Of more than forty numbers, only five arias are completely new – but when was borrowing to greater effect?

Agrippina is a formidable figure, richly endowed with arias of power and character, rising to a climax in the scena late in Act 2 ('Pensieri, voi mi tormenta') when, her ambitions apparently working out, she is overcome with foreboding. Later, triumphant now that Nero's star is in the ascendant and in G major now after G minor, she ends the act in exuberant mood. Poppea, however manipulative, is a superficially more attractive figure – a 'sex kitten' like Cleopatra, Winton Dean calls her – with arias which depict her essential frivolity, from the light-hearted mirror-gazing when we first meet her ('Vaghe perle') to the most attractive of all ('Bel piacere'), a kind of love song to Ottone, with which she closes her solo account. Ottone, written for a contralto, is in strong contrast, full of passion, preferring to demand justice rather than pity.

Altogether and in spite of borrowings, an extraordinary opera for a composer not yet twenty-five. H.

RINALDO

Opera in three acts, libretto by Giacomo Rossi after Aaron Hill. Première Haymarket, London, 24 February 1711 (7 March new style), with Francesca Boschi as Goffredo, Isabella Girardeau as Almirena, Nicolini as Rinaldo, Elisabetta Pilotti Schiavonetti as Armida and Boschi as Argante. First performed in Dublin, 1711, by Nicolini's company; Hamburg, 1715, in German; Naples, 1718 (with additional music by Leonardo Leo). Rinaldo was very successful in London, given fifteen times in the first season, twenty-two times between then and 1715 and revived with extensive alterations in 1717 and 1731. First performed in America at Houston in Martin Katz's musical edition, in March 1975, with Marilyn Horne, Noëlle Rogers, Evelyn Mandac, Samuel Ramey, conductor Lawrence Foster. Revived Halle, 1954, in German; London, Sadler's Wells, by Handel Opera Society, 1961 and 1965, with Helen Watts/Yvonne Minton, Jennifer Vyvyan; New York, Metropolitan, 1984, with Horne, Benita Valente, Edda Moser, Ramey, conductor Mario Bernardi.

Goffredo, Captain General of the Christian Army Contralto¹

¹ See note opposite.

Almirena, his daughter, affianced to Rinaldo.... Soprano
 Rinaldo, a Christian hero Mezzo-Soprano¹
 Eustazio, Goffredo's brother Contralto¹
 Argante, King of Jerusalem and Armida's lover Bass¹
 Armida, a sorceress, Queen of Damascus.....Soprano
 A Christian MagicianBass¹
 A Herald.....Bass
 A Siren.....Soprano
 Two Mermaids.....Soprano

Time: The Crusades

Place: Palestine

Running Time: 2 hours 55 minutes

Rinaldo was the foundation of Handel's success in England. At the instigation of the impresario John James Heidegger, manager of the Queen's Theatre, London, he met Aaron Hill, an extraordinary character, learned in many arts and sciences, not least those of the theatre, and Hill very rapidly wrote a libretto on the legend of Rinaldo and Armida, drawing on Tasso and Ariosto. Giacomo Rossi translated it into Italian for Handel, who composed the opera in what seems an incredibly short space of time, some say as little as fourteen days. Since he re-used, for as much as two-thirds of the opera, music he had already written, the feat is partly one of skill in re-organising existing material.

One of the features of Rinaldo is extravagant use of stage spectacle, one of Aaron Hill's specialities, and a modern production has to provide magic and transformation scenes if justice is to be done to the original concept. Handel altered the opera a number of times, re-allocating the roles according to the voices available to sing them (Goffredo moving from soprano to castrato, Rinaldo from castrato to mezzo-soprano, Eustazio starting as contralto and being eventually eliminated altogether). In 1731, he substantially remodelled the whole work, rewriting most of the role of Almirena, toning down some extravagances, omitting subsidiary characters and fashioning a more convincing ending, with Armida and Argante no longer converted to Christianity but rather descending to hell in a chariot.

Act I. The Crusaders are besieging Jerusalem and, in expectation of victory, their general, Goffredo, promises the hand of his daughter Almirena to the hero, Rinaldo, who is in love with her, a passion she indicates she returns.

A Saracen herald announces that Argante, King of Jerusalem, is asking that Goffredo will treat with him. Spectacularly preceded by his troops and announced by trumpets and drums, Argante arrives to ask for a three-day truce. His aria ('Sibillar gli angui d'Aletto') is a mighty and magnificent challenge to a bass and in it Samuel Ramey won the Metropolitan audience in a night. Goffredo unhesitatingly accepts and Argante, who is more confident in the wiles of Armida (for whose charms he admits he languishes) than in the force of arms of his troops, is delighted with the result of his action.

Armida makes her appearance, drawn by dragons and, in a fine aria marked furioso, invoking the Furies. She leaves Argante in no doubt that only with the disappearance of Rinaldo can the Crusaders be defeated, and indicates that she herself will undertake his elimination.

In charming surroundings, Rinaldo and Almirena exchange pledges of love. Almirena's aria, 'Augelletti, che cantate', is with its twirling recorders not only charming in its own right but was accompanied in 1711, says Winton Dean in Handel and the Opera Seria, 'by the release of a flock of live birds, which left their mark not only on the opera and the press, in the persons of Addison and Steele, but on the heads of the audience'. She and Rinaldo sing a delightful duet but Armida suddenly appears and with the help of her supernatural powers abducts Almirena. Rinaldo movingly laments ('Cara sposa') that he is powerless to intervene. When Goffredo and Eustazio arrive, they mourn together the misfortune which has overtaken them. Goffredo and Eustazio believe that they may get help from a Christian magician – the aria demonstrates optimism that is nothing short of jaunty – and Rinaldo recovers his fortitude and in a rapid virtuosic aria ('Venti, turbini, prestate') swears vengeance.

Act II. A boat, at its helm a spirit in the guise of a lovely woman, lies at anchor in the bay. Seductive songs in 6/8 fill the night and when Rinaldo, Goffredo and Eustazio arrive, Rinaldo is invited on board to be conducted to Almirena. Goffredo, horror-struck to see Rinaldo apparently forgetting his warlike duties in favour of the charms of a siren, has not understood that Rinaldo's departure has as objective the rescue of his beloved, and tries vainly to restrain him.

¹ These five parts were sung in one or other of the groups of performances in Handel's own day by castrati, and four of them in the same period by female singers.

Rinaldo (Houston Grand Opera, 1975; first U.S. performance). Marilyn Horne in the title role.

In Argante's palace, Almirena is held prisoner and continues to mourn her captive state, deaf to declarations of love from the King, whose attachment to Armida has faded. Her aria ('Lascia chi'io pianga') is one of Handel's most celebrated, and is derived from a sarabande in his Almira (1705).

When Rinaldo arrives, he is immediately intercepted by Armida, who herself has fallen in love with the Christian knight, and, in order to seduce him, takes on the outward appearance of Almirena. Rinaldo is on the point of succumbing to temptation, but something holds him back. His bravura aria ('Abbruggio, avampo, e fremo') is followed by an outburst from Armida, who is furious that Rinaldo is proof against her blandishments and yet cannot bring herself to invoke the Furies against someone she loves. The largo section is all tenderness and warmth, but in a short presto middle section she rivals Rinaldo's virtuosity.

Argante comes on the scene and, believing in his turn that he is talking to Almirena, continues to protest his love, promising to deliver her from the spells of Armida. When the sorceress Queen resumes her own personality, there is a violent quarrel between her and her former lover, and in a splendid aria ('Vo' far guerra') she swears to remove from him the support she has so far supplied.

Act III. Goffredo finds himself near a mountain on whose summit is Armida's magic castle, guarded by monsters. The monsters repel the first assault but the Christian Magician eventually promises to help deliver Goffredo's daughter and the knight Rinaldo, and he gives him magic wands which will help overcome Armida's spells.

In the garden of the palace, Armida plans to kill Almirena. Rinaldo however arrives in time to prevent the crime and himself is about to strike Armida with his sword when the Furies intervene and save the sorceress.

With Goffredo's arrival and with the help of the magic wands, the castle disappears to be replaced by a desert in which can be seen the city of Jerusalem. For the Christians, it is victory, which Rinaldo celebrates with much conviction. Armida and Argante are reconciled and their troops pass before them (March). Their duet celebrates the forthcoming battle and their own reconciliation.

Goffredo, Almirena and Rinaldo rejoice in deliverance from Armida's thrall – Almirena's aria ('Bel piacere'), the singing in unison with violin, is a charmingly airy inspiration – before Eustazio recalls them all to the task in hand. It is the turn of the Christian army to march in review before its commander; the catchy tune of the March, with its drum and trumpets, is known from the Beggar's Opera (see page 239). Rinaldo retains trumpets and drum for his bravura proclamation of his resolve ('Or la tromba'), which is shortly followed by the battle itself, and marching and counter-marching by both sides, until the outcome is settled by Rinaldo's intervention. Argante and Armida are taken prisoner, but are pardoned and converted to Christianity (in his 1731 version, Handel changed this dénouement). Rinaldo is free to marry Almirena and a final chorus glorifies virtue.

H.

TESEO

Dramma tragico per musica in five acts, libretto by Nicola Haym, based on Philippe Quinault's tragédie lyrique Thésée for Lully (1675).¹ First performance, Queen's Theatre, Haymarket, London, 10 January 1713, with Valeriano Pellegrini, Margherita L'Epine and Elisabetta Pilotti-Schiavonetti. Not revived until 1947 at Göttingen. U.S. première, Boston College Theater Arts Center, 1985.

Teseo, *Egeo's son, unknown to his father*Soprano
 Agilea, engaged to Egeo, in love with Teseo.....Soprano
 Medea, *enchantress, in love with Egeo*Soprano
 Egeo, *King of Athens, in love with Agilea*Alto
 Clizia, Agilea's confidante, in love with Arcane.....Soprano
 Arcane, Egeo's general, in love with Clizia.....Alto
 Fedra, *Medea's confidante*Mute
 Minerva, goddess.....Mute
 Priest of Minerva.....Bass

Running Time: 3 hours

Handel was at the beginning of his career when he wrote Teseo. The title-page to the libretto published in 1713 describes him as Maestro di Cappella di S.A.E. di Hannover. Having found that his pastorate Il Pastor Fido was in advance of contemporary London taste, with Teseo the composer returned to safer ground and imitated the spectacular magic and machinery of Rinaldo.

Act I. Overture. The temple of Minerva. Agilea is engaged to marry Egeo, the aged King of Athens. As battle rages, she tells her confidante Clizia that Egeo's heroic general, Teseo, led her to safety here and confesses that she has fallen in love with him. When Arcane brings news of Teseo's bravery, Agilea prays to the gods to protect him. Arcane loves Clizia, who feels, however, that she cannot trust him completely. When she sends him to report on Teseo, he assumes Clizia is in love and is tormented by jealousy ('Ah! cruda gelosia!'). They say goodbye to one another (duetto, 'Addio! mio caro bene').

King Egeo tells Agilea to rejoice, now that the rebels have been defeated: soon she will share his throne ('Serenatevi, o luci belle'). He discounts her suggestion that she should honour him as a father, rather than as a lover, and when she further reminds him that he was supposed to marry Medea, he explains that he plans to marry the sorceress to the son he has had brought up in Troezen. Egeo reminds Agilea that he loves only her. Agilea comforts herself with the thought that she and Teseo love one another ('M'adora l'idol mio').

Act II. Egeo's palace. Medea envies the happiness of anyone who enjoys rest and innocent peace. Having already been driven by passion to murder her brother and children, she recognises that love that is forced can never last. Egeo arrives and thanks Medea for her contribution to his victory. She sees through his scheme to marry her off to his son, so that he himself can marry Agilea, but agrees, as long as she can marry Teseo. Arcane warns the King that the troops want their hero Teseo to succeed him.

A square in Athens. Teseo enters in triumph; he tells Medea that he loves Agilea. She promises to intercede for him. Alone, Medea resolves either to secure Teseo for herself or to destroy her rival.

Act III. Clizia asks the friendly stars to use their influence on her behalf. Arcane promises her he will ask the King to let them marry. Agilea longs for Teseo to return ('Vieni, torna, idolo mio'). He comes to tell her that he will either appease the King's jealousy or leave with her for some other country.

¹ For further details of how a French opera became Italian, Handel's only five-act opera, see David Kimbell, 'The Libretto of Handel's Teseo', Music & Letters, vol. xlv, Oxford, 1963.

When her threats have no effect on her rival Agilea, Medea changes the scene into 'a horrid Desert full of frightful Monsters'¹ ('Numi, chi ci soccorre!'). Medea then summons spirits that 'bring Eternal Night'. On her instructions, they torment Agilea before carrying her off.

Act IV. Hearing that Medea has attacked Agilea, Egeo determines on revenge. When Agilea refuses to obey Medea, the enchantress brings on Teseo, sleeping; Agilea cannot wake him. Medea threatens his life and so forces Agilea to yield and agree to the royal marriage. Medea changes the scene into an 'Inchanted Island' and wakes Teseo, who wonders who restored him to consciousness. Faithful to her word to Medea, Agilea refuses to speak to Teseo. He cannot understand what has changed her affections so drastically. She weeps and eventually admits that she had to seem pitiless to save him. He reveals that he is in fact Egeo's son, brought up in Troezen, so she can indeed make a 'royal marriage'. Having overheard their conversation Medea appears to them out of a cloud and seems to bless their union, since their virtues withstand her fury. The lovers in duet affirm their fidelity to one another.

Act V. Medea's enchanted palace. Medea determines that Teseo and Agilea must die to satisfy her longing for revenge ('Morirò, ma vendicata'). Knowing Egeo is ignorant that Teseo is his son, she persuades the King that Teseo threatens the throne's stability. At first, Egeo stands firm, but Medea persuades him that Teseo must die for the sake of his son in Troezen. She hands him a poisoned cup to give Teseo, who arrives leading Agilea and followed by a crowd of admirers. Teseo takes the cup and swears fidelity to the King on his sword. At once the King recognises the sword as the one he left with his son as a token. 'Medea flies away, having heard [Teseo] own'd by his Father.' United by his father with Agilea, Teseo 'expresses his Joy in the Approach of his Happiness', Egeo also gives his blessing to Arcane's marriage to Clizia and the happy couple declare their love for one another, now free from any jealous suspicions (duo, 'Unito a un puro affetto'). Medea appears, 'in a Chariot drawn by flying Dragons', but her threats to destroy the palace are answered by the Priest of Minerva who relays the goddess's blessing. Everyone (except Medea) joins in celebrating the peace that is love's sweet reward.

The eponymous hero Teseo seems to interest Handel rather less than the contrast and conflict between the two principal women, Agilea and Medea. Handel writes beautifully for Agilea in her first aria, 'E pur bello', the disarming simplicity of whose vocal line takes us inside her heart, and even more so in her second aria, 'Deh' serbate, o giusti Dei', where string figures portray her agitation, going first one way then the other, while the bass beats out her agitated pulse. Medea is one of Handel's great character studies, a sorceress in the line of Armida (Rinaldo, 1711) and Melissa (Amadigi, 1715), all of whom were written for the same remarkable soprano, Elisabetta Pilotti-Schiavonetti, whom Handel already knew in Hanover before he came to London. Medea is capable of spectacular fire and fury, but also of considerable tenderness: by a master-stroke, the aria which introduces her explores her soft, pitiful side. When she invokes the spirits of Hell, Handel invests her intensity with an extraordinary, unmelodramatic charge. This means that the Deus ex machina, Minerva's descent, the Priest's intervention with her blessing and the final coro all carry unusual weight: after such chaos, there is a real need for order to be re-established. In particular, Handel turns the coro into something like an anthem for deliverance from peril. P.

ACIS AND GALATEA

A masque in two acts to English words, ascribed at a 1739 revival to John Gay. Première 1718, probably at Cannons, the country house of the Earl of Carnarvon (later Duke of Chandos), for whom Handel wrote it. First performed in London, 1731; 1732 by Thomas Arne's English company, with the future Mrs Cibber as Galatea; 1732 by Handel's company, in a conflation of the mature work together with music from his earlier Neapolitan serenade and other works, and in a mixture of English and Italian (the performance was an attempt on Handel's part to establish his copyright to the music). The masque became the most popular of all his works during his lifetime.

| | |
|---------------------------|---------|
| Galatea | Soprano |
| Acis, a shepherd | Tenor |
| Damon, their friend | Tenor |
| Polyphemus, a giant | Bass |
| Chorus | |

¹ Quotations here and later are from the 1713 translation of the libretto.

Place: Near Mount Etna
Time: Antiquity
Running Time: 50 minutes

Act I. The action takes place in what the score calls 'a rural prospect'; Acis and Galatea are seated by a fountain, the chorus round about, and Polyphemus on a mountain.

The overture, presto followed by a very short adagio, sets the undemanding pastoral scene for the chorus to hymn the pleasures of being alive in idyllic surroundings. Galatea languishes away from Acis ('Hush, ye pretty warbling quire'), who returns her sentiment no less melodiously ('Where shall I seek the charming fair?'). Damon gently urges Acis to bask in present pleasures rather than pursuing elusive love, but sight of Galatea leaves no doubt of Acis' devotion and spurs him to one of Handel's most glorious love songs, 'Love in her eyes sits playing'. Galatea for her part won't be outdone ('As when the dove'), and together they briskly celebrate the joys that are so evidently theirs ('Happy we!').

Act II. The chorus predicts an end to lovers' bliss ('Wretched lovers') with the intervention of the monster Polyphemus, who strides through the forest to proclaim his infatuation with Galatea. Polyphemus is half comic, half serious, his recitative ('I rage, I melt, I burn') in the style of a true bass villain, the aria ('O ruddier than the cherry') decked out with obbligato for flauto piccolo or flageolet to provide a note of mockery for the giant's gawky love song.

Galatea protests her antipathy but Polyphemus renews his protestations ('Cease to beauty to be suing'). Damon attempts advice but Acis valiantly protests he will defy the monster ('Love sounds th' alarm'). More advice from Damon ('Consider, fond shepherd') leads to the dénouement, a trio in which the lovers protest eternal fidelity ('The flocks shall leave the mountains'), while Polyphemus blusters at his frustration. He hurls a stone down the mountain, Acis is crushed beneath it and the chorus is left to mourn: 'The gentle Acis is no more'. In two exceptionally beautiful arias, one with chorus, Galatea mourns her loss, then is left to accept the chorus's assurance: 'Acis now a god appears!'

Acis and Galatea, Handel's first dramatic essay with English words, is generally pointed to as a precursor of his oratorio style. Its gentle pastoral atmosphere, little preoccupied with drama, puts it into quite another category from the operas. But it was intended to be staged and the music is of too high a quality for it to be divorced entirely from Handel's other stage work. H.

RADAMISTO

Opera in three acts, text by Nicola Francesco Haym from Domenico Lalli. Première at Haymarket Theatre, London, 2 April 1720, with Margherita Durastanti (Radamisto), Anastasia Robinson (Zenobia), Ann Turner Robinson (Polissena) and Alexander Gordon (Tiridate). In December 1720, the opera was substantially revised and presented with a new cast: Senesino as Radamisto, Durastanti as Zenobia, the bass Giuseppe Boschi as Tiridate. Revised again in 1728.

Radamisto, son of FarasmaneSoprano
 Zenobia, Radamisto's wife.....Contralto
 Farasmane, King of Thrace.....Bass
 Tiridate, King of ArmeniaTenor
 Polissena, Tiridate's wife and Farasmane's daughter..... Soprano
 Tigrane, Prince of Pontus.....Soprano
 Fraarte, Tiridate's brotherSoprano

Place: Near Mount Ararat, West of the Caspian Sea
Time: About A.D. 51
Running Time: 2 hour 55 minutes

Though Handel regularly revised his operas, mostly to suit singers new to their roles, not many are so substantially re-written as Radamisto. That the title role moved from soprano to castrato in the mezzo range accounts for some of the changes, the assumption by Durastanti (a soprano and the original Radamisto) of the role of Zenobia (at first a contralto) for others, while Farasmane turned from tenor to bass. But that was far from all. There were ten new arias in all, a duet and, most significantly, a fine quartet to be inserted in the penultimate scene to its great advantage.

The plot has seemingly a minor historical basis and deals in the quarrels of the lesser kings of Asia Minor, their dynastic marriages and their efforts to ally military victory to amorous conquest. Farasmane, King of Thrace, has a son, Radamisto, living in married bliss with Zenobia, and a daughter, Polissena, less happily matched with Tiridate, king of neighbouring Armenia. Tiridate, visiting his father-in-law when Radamisto was absent, fell in love with Zenobia and, seeing no other way of satisfying his amorous longings, attacked and conquered Thrace, taking Farasmane prisoner. Tigrane, Prince of Pontus, is his ally as is his brother, Fraarte, but as the opera begins, they have as yet failed to capture Thrace's capital.

Act I. The overture, allegro after a solemn introduction, takes us straight to Tiridate's camp in front of the city. In noble accents ('Sommi dei') his wife Polissena prays for divine help as she learns from Tigrane that her husband's motive for attacking Thrace was his passion for Zenobia. She nevertheless repulses Tigrane who loves her.

Tiridate now shows his muscle. Radamisto must die, the city and its inhabitants be wiped out! Polissena pleads in vain, but Farasmane asks to be allowed to speak to his son. Tiridate agrees – but if the city does not surrender, not only will its inhabitants be slaughtered but Farasmane himself will die. Tiridate celebrates in a triumphant aria with trumpet obbligato.

Radamisto and Zenobia emerge from the city, and when she refuses to leave him, he comforts her in music of surpassing beauty ('Cara sposa'). Farasmane and Fraarte deliver Tiridate's terms, the former urging his son to place his own honour above his father's life. Both Zenobia and Radamisto have arias of defiance, and Tigrane prevents the wholly unjustifiable killing of Farasmane. The old man leaves on a note of resolution: 'Son lievi le catene'.

During a sinfonia, the city is taken. Tiridate rejoices but is furious Farasmane still lives, acceding nonetheless to Tigrane's pleas provided Radamisto and Zenobia are brought captive before him. Polissena pleads unsuccessfully for Radamisto, then begs Tigrane, grateful as she is that he saved her father, to save Radamisto too. Her expansive resolve in the face of adversity brings the act to an end.

Act II. Radamisto and Zenobia have escaped and, on the banks of the river Araxes, she slowly and movingly laments their plight, then begs him to kill her rather than let her fall into enemy hands. He succeeds only in lightly wounding her and she flings herself into the river. A prisoner, Radamisto laments what he erroneously believes to be the loss of Zenobia in one of Handel's most affecting arias ('Ombra cara'). Zenobia, however, saved by Fraarte from drowning, calls down the vengeance of the Furies on the tyrant Tiridate.

When Zenobia is brought before him, Tiridate tells her that far from losing a kingdom, she has gained an empire, then exuberantly celebrates the zenith of his success. Fraarte urges his own love, but Zenobia asserts her loyalty to her husband in an impressive slow aria.

Tigrane is by now disillusioned with Tiridate's implacability and brings Radamisto in disguise to his sister Polissena, while he laments his predicament, caught between love of Polissena and loyalty to the King. Polissena refuses to side with her brother, however great her affection for him, against the husband she still loves, but Radamisto is unreservedly indignant that she remains loyal to a man who keeps her father imprisoned and would kill her brother ('Vanne, sorella ingrata').

Tiridate renews his assault on Zenobia's defences and hears from Tigrane the (false) news of Radamisto's death. Radamisto, disguised as one of his own servants, Ismeno, is immediately recognised by Zenobia (Tiridate has never seen his brother-in-law), but delivers what purports to be Radamisto's dying message of love for Zenobia and hatred for Tiridate. In a remarkable passage, Zenobia alternately denounces Tiridate's pretensions and reiterates her love for Radamisto. Tiridate offers Ismeno a reward if he can shake Zenobia's loyalty, and Radamisto and Zenobia end the act by pledging in duet their undying love.

Act III. Tigrane and Fraarte, disgusted by Tiridate's excesses, plot revolt, with reform rather than his death their objective. Zenobia warns Radamisto not to risk discovery by sticking too close to her, and in a spacious aria ('Dolce bene di quest'alma') he assures her of his constancy. When Tiridate attempts to embrace Zenobia, Radamisto rushes forward to protect her. Polissena saves his life and the King orders Radamisto's execution. This is too much for Polissena who warns him her love will turn to hate in the face of such intransigence, to which Tiridate replies that Radamisto shall be pardoned if he will hand over Zenobia ('Alzo al volo di mia fama'). Zenobia and Radamisto bid solemn farewell to each other and to life.

Tiridate reiterates his threats, but Polissena brings news that the army is in revolt. He fails to rally his supporters, is arrested, and the throne offered to Farasmane. Radamisto, invited by his father to avenge his wrongs, asks Polissena to forgive her husband. That worthy in the twinkling of an eye manages total repentance, with the result that he and Polissena are confirmed on the throne of Armenia. Only Fraarte seems out on a limb, and he takes it on himself publicly to repent of his unhallowed love for Polissena. Zenobia rejoices in the new situation and the opera comes to an end with a grand chorus for all seven voices.

H.

OTTONE, RE DI GERMANIA

Otho, King of Germany

Opera in three acts, libretto by Nicola Haym, adapted from Stefano Benedetto Pallavicino's libretto for Teofano (1719). First performance, King's Theatre, London, 12 January 1723, with Senesino as Ottone, Francesca Cuzzoni as Teofane, Giuseppe Broschi as Emireno, Margherita Durastanti as Gismonda, Berenstadt as Adalberto, Anastasia Robinson as Matilda. Handel introduced three more arias for Teofane for the twelfth performance, a benefit for Cuzzoni, and he strengthened Ottone's part in a revival in 1726. It was the first of Handel's operas to be revived in the twentieth century, at Göttingen, 1921, though Oskar Hagen's corrupt edition initiated an unfortunate tradition of altering the characters' vocal pitches. Handel Opera Society at Sadler's Wells, London, 1971; Göttingen, 1992.

Ottone (Otho II), *King of Germany*Alto Castrato Teofane (Theofano), daughter of Romano, emperor of the East Soprano
 Emireno, a pirate, actually Teofane's brother
BasilioBass
 Gismonda, widow of Berengario,
Italian tyrantSoprano
 Adalberto, *her son*Soprano Castrato
 Matilda, Ottone's cousin,
Adalberto's fiancée Mezzo-Soprano

Place: Rome

Time: 972 A.D.

Running Time: 2 hours 55 minutes

Handel wrote Ottone for his Royal Academy venture, and changed the part of Teofane at the last minute to suit the great Italian soprano, Francesca Cuzzoni, who was making her London début. When she objected that the touching but vocally unspectacular 'Falsa imagine' was unsuitable for her entrance aria, Handel threatened to throw her out of the window. She agreed to sing it and it soon proved a popular hit. Anastasia Robinson, who sang Matilda, wrote to an intermediary to try to persuade Handel to rewrite the role to suit her. Her indirect approach paid off, since Handel did indeed change the role for her.

On his way to be acclaimed king of Italy, Ottone has been delayed by an encounter with the pirate Emireno. In Rome, Ottone is due to marry the Princess Teofane, who is already there. Neither has seen the other, though Teofane has a small portrait of Ottone.

Act I. A courtyard. Gismonda is ambitious for her son Adalberto to reign. When he agrees to impersonate Ottone so as to marry Teofane, his mother is delighted ('La speranza è giunta in porto'). Teofane meets Adalberto and is disappointed to discover that the portrait she carries is nothing like the man. He proposes marriage, as if he were Ottone, and looks forward to marital delights ('Bel labbro, formato'). Teofane, confused and upset, blames the portrait for cheating her ('Falsa imagine'). A Concerto is heard as Ottone arrives, bringing Emireno as his prisoner. Emireno hints that he is more than a pirate but boasts that his pride will remain inviolate, even in defeat. Unmoved, Ottone consigns him to prison. When Matilda tells Ottone about Adalberto, he swears to help her have revenge. Meanwhile, he longs to embrace Teofane ('Ritorna, o dolce amore'). Matilda is torn between her affection for Adalberto and her longing to punish him for his treachery.

A square within the palace. Gismonda pretends that she is Ottone's mother, Adelaide, and tells Teofane that she must love Adalberto and not merely do her duty. Gismonda's haughty manner offends Teofane. She is about to mount the throne at Adalberto's side, when Gismonda returns with the news that the real Ottone has arrived in Rome. Gismonda commands her son to fight him at once. Realising that someone has been impersonating Ottone, Teofane feels overwhelmed by mental anguish. Ottone's troops fight Adalberto's supporters. Adalberto remains defiant in defeat and refuses to reveal where Teofane is. Ottone remains optimistic, declares an amnesty in the city and looks ahead to his marriage ('Dell'onda ai fieri moti').

Act II. Adalberto is on his way to prison, when he is rebuked by Matilda for his infidelity and by Gismonda for failure. When Matilda suggests that the two women should beg Ottone for mercy, Gismonda rejects the idea as beneath her. Matilda's priority remains Adalberto's freedom ('Ah! tu non sai'). Alone, Gismonda reveals that she too feels compassion for her son.

Before Ottone and Teofane can actually meet and talk, Matilda begs Ottone to be merciful. Teofane hides and misunderstands as Ottone embraces Matilda in pity, when he refuses her request to save Adalberto's life. Outraged, Matilda calls on heaven to punish Ottone for his inflexibility. Teofane accuses Ottone of betraying her with Matilda. When he in turn rebukes her for agreeing to marry Adalberto, she asks Ottone to tell her truthfully whether he does not love her, now that he sees her ('Alla fama, dimmi il vero'). Wondering who has turned her against him, Ottone compares the suffering heart to a stormy sky that is calm once more ('Dopo l'orrore').

A garden. Abandoned and alone, Teofane appeals to nature to comfort her ('O grati orrori, o solitarie piante!'). She knows, however, that if she could admit to Ottone how unhappy she is, he would have pity on her ('S'io dir potessi').

Matilda has helped Emireno and Adalberto to escape. Emireno intends to become a pirate again and swears to exact revenge. Adalberto hides when he hears people coming. Matilda realises that Ottone is looking for Teofane and offers to help him. Teofane recognises her voice, hides and hears Ottone ask Matilda not to tell everyone how ridiculous love makes him. Naturally, she misunderstands again. When Emireno invites Adalberto to sail away with him, Adalberto seizes the fainting Teofane and abducts her in the boat. Matilda returns, having shaken off Ottone. She and Gismonda rejoice that Adalberto escaped with Emireno, under cover of the kind night, a welcome accomplice in love's enterprises ('Notte cara, a te si deve').

Act III. A royal apartment. Ottone grieves at Teofane's disappearance ('Dove sei? dolce mia vita!'). Though Gismonda realises it will cost her her life, she warns him that he can never rest in peace again, now her son is free. Ottone is convinced that everyone has betrayed him ('Io son tradito'). If he cannot even find Teofane, he will lose all hope ('Tanti affanni').

A wood beside a stormy sea, where the fugitives have been forced to disembark. Adalberto hopes that the storm will be over soon, if only so that Teofane calms down and eventually feels sorry for him ('D'innalzar i flutti al ciel'). He leaves to find a refuge. When Teofane assures Emireno that either Ottone, her father Romano, or her brother Basilio will punish her abductors, Emireno realises she is his sister and tries to embrace her. Adalberto comes to her defence, but Emireno disarms him and promises Teofane that she will soon be happy. Teofane anticipates death but determines to remain true to Ottone, even if he is unfaithful to her ('Benchè mi sia crudele').

A courtyard in the palace. Gismonda tells Ottone that Matilda helped the prisoners to escape. Matilda repents and swears to kill Adalberto. Emireno brings Adalberto back as his prisoner. When Ottone orders his death, Matilda asks to execute him herself. Adalberto confesses all and arouses her pity. Teofane stops Gismonda killing herself and rejoices with Ottone that they are reunited ('A' teneri affetti'). She also explains that Emireno is her brother Basilio. Gismonda swears loyalty to Ottone, while Matilda admits that she still loves Adalberto and frees him. They all invoke peace to take the place of pride and call on love to purge treachery.

Haym's libretto compresses the original story crudely, so that the motivation is often perfunctory. Another problem seems to be that the title role, written to suit the castrato Senesino's expressive brilliance in tender pathos, lacks heroic dynamism. Perhaps we need to adjust our expectations of heroic behaviour? The irony would not be beyond Handel's sense of humour. The other castrato role, Adalberto, is notable for its equivocal manner: weak-minded toy in the hands of his dominant mother (the three-dimensional virago-with-a-heart Gismonda), he rises to a peak of sensuality in the aria 'Bel labbro, formato', but remains wordless when the Amazon Matilda proposes marriage in the final scene. Of course, both men cannot help looking and sounding limp next to the blustery rodomontade of the pirate Emireno (the historical Emperor Basil II, known as 'the Slayer of the Bulgarians'¹).

P.

FLAVIO

Opera in three acts, libretto by Nicola Haym after Matteo Novis's Flavio Cuniberto (1682). Première at the King's Theatre, Haymarket, London, 14 May 1723, with Cuzzoni as Emilia, Durastanti as Vitige, Mrs Robinson as Teodata, Senesino as Guido, Berenstadt as Flavio, Alexander Gordon as Ugone and Giuseppe Boschi as Lotario. After Handel revived it in 1732 it was not staged again until 1967 in Göttingen. Innsbruck, 1989.

Flavio, King of the Lombards.....Alto
Guido, *Ugone's son*Contralto
Emilia, *Lotario's daughter*Soprano

¹ Winton Dean and John Merrill Knapp, Handel's Operas, 1704–1726, rev. ed., Oxford, 1995.

Teodata, daughter to Ugone.....Alto
 Vitige, *Teodata's lover*Soprano
 Ugone, *counsellor*Tenor
 Lotario, *counsellor*Bass

Place: Lombardy

Time: Early Middle Ages

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Handel originally called this work Emilia but changed the name to avoid confusion with another opera then on in London. It is in the serio-comic style with which he initiated his operatic career in Venice (Agrippina) and ended it in London (Deidamia). This may have militated against Flavio's popularity, yet it is a remarkable opera, covering an unusually broad range of human feeling. Guido and Emilia inhabit the world of opera seria, more or less, with some varied, but spectacular and serious arias. The other characters are presented in ways that involve elements of comedy, irony and parody. Flavio himself has three love-songs, including a gavotte and a gigue. There is a lot of truth in the unpredictable way they all react to one another.

Ugone, father of Teodata and Guido, and Lotario, father of Emilia, attend the court of King Flavio, who rules over Italy and Britain. Guido and Emilia have fallen in love and will marry; Teodata's affair with Vitige, a courtier, remains a secret.

Act I. Vitige leaves Ugone's house, having secretly spent the night with Teodata. The two fathers, Lotario and Ugone, approve of the marriage between Guido and Emilia and agree to seek the King's blessing on the union. When Ugone presents his daughter Teodata to King Flavio, the King falls in love with her. She feels respect rather than love.

Flavio learns that his deputy in Britain wishes to resign and at first favours Lotario to replace him, but then appoints Ugone. Lotario determines on revenge. When Flavio asks Vitige what he thinks of Teodata, Vitige pretends to find her unattractive. Alone, Vitige admits that he is tormented by jealousy. Ugone tells his son Guido that Lotario insulted him: he must now restore the family's honour. Guido presumes that honour lasts, unlike beauty or love, so he determines on revenge: family loyalty has triumphed over his feelings for Emilia. When the lovers meet, Guido tests her and she remains resolute: for her, love takes precedence over all other claims.

Act II. Ugone tells his daughter that he has been dishonoured. Misunderstanding him, Teodata confesses that she has been sleeping with Vitige, but adds that he has promised to marry her. Ugone rages against fate, which has made him look ridiculous. Lotario orders Emilia to forget Guido. She assures Guido, however, that she remains constant to him. Flavio asks Vitige to procure Teodata for him. Vitige urges Teodata to hide their love: she agrees to pretend to be attracted to the King, as long as Vitige won't torment her with his jealousy. Guido fights a duel with Lotario to avenge the insult to his father and wounds him severely. Lotario dies in the arms of his daughter Emilia, leaving her longing for death.

Act III. Emilia and Ugone both appeal to the King for justice. When Vitige brings Teodata, Flavio asks him to court her on his behalf. Covertly, Vitige urges her to dissimulate but when Flavio's offer to make Teodata his Queen seems to appeal to her, he suffers bitterly. Emilia attacks Guido for killing her father, yet when Guido invites her to kill him, she draws back. Flavio overhears Teodata and Vitige and realises they lied to him. She confesses that they love one another. Guido offers to die for his crime, if that is what Emilia wishes. To test her, Flavio tells her that Guido has already been executed. She immediately asks for death and when she finds Guido is alive, she forgives him, since it was for his honour's sake. Flavio 'punishes' Vitige by marrying him to Teodata and reconciles Guido with Ugone. Everyone rejoices.

Handel gives Emilia one of his most beautiful and saddest laments, moving gracefully to his favourite siciliano rhythm. Her arias are also distinguished by their orchestration. Apart from this, for its refreshing variety of moods and characters alone, Flavio deserves to be better known.

P.

GIULIO CESARE

Julius Caesar

Opera in three acts, libretto by Nicola Haym. Première Haymarket Theatre, London, 20 February 1724, with Cuzzoni as Cleopatra, Durastanti as Sesto,¹ Mrs Robinson as Cornelia, ¹ Margherita Durastanti was a soprano, but when the opera was revived in 1725, the role of Sesto, rewritten, was sung by the tenor Borosini.

Senesino as Caesar, Berenstadt as Ptolemy.¹ First performed in Germany, Brunswick, 1725; Hamburg, 1725; Vienna, 1731. First performed in Oskar Hagen's revision, 1922, Göttingen, with Wilhelm Guttman as Caesar, Hagen-Leisner as Cleopatra, G.A. Walter as Sesto, Eleanor Reynolds as Cornelia. First performed Northampton, Mass., U.S.A., 1927; London, Scala Theatre, 1930. In the post-war period, heard at Leipzig, 1950; Düsseldorf, 1953; Vienna, 1954, with Seefried, Höngen, Schoeffler, Berry; Munich, 1955, with della Casa, Malaniuk, Metternich, conductor Jochum; Rome, 1956, with Fineschi, Barbieri, Christoff, Petri; la Scala, 1956, with Zeani, Simionato, Rossi-Lemeni; New York, 1956 (concert version), with Leontyne Price and the counter-tenor Russell Oberlin; and on several German stages during the Handel bicentenary celebrations in 1959. By Handel Opera Society at Sadler's Wells, 1963, with Joan Sutherland and Margreta Elkins; at Barber Institute, Birmingham, in 1977 with the 1724 score complete and uncut; London, English National Opera, 1979, with Valerie Masterson, Janet Baker, Sarah Walker, Della Jones, John Angelo Messana (Ptolemy), conductor Charles Mackerras (this production in San Francisco, 1982).

Giulio Cesare (Julius Caesar).....Contralto
 Curio, a Roman tribuneBass
 Cornelia, widow of Pompeo (Pompey)Contralto
 Sesto, son to Cornelia and PompeoSoprano (Tenor)
 Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt..... Soprano
 Tolomeo (Ptolemy), King of Egypt..... Contralto
 Achilla, General and counsellor to TolomeoBass
 Nireno, Cleopatra's confidantContralto

Place: Egypt

Time: 48 B.C.

Running Time: 3 hours 25 minutes

Undoubtedly, the historical overtones and associations of Julius Caesar had something to do with the positive reaction of audiences in the early days of the Handel revival in Germany in the 1920s. But that accounts for only part of its success. Few other scores contain so many numbers which have made their way with the public out of context – and it is generally admitted that Handel's arias are far more effective in the dramatic circumstances which provide for the situation and the emotion they are intended to express than without them. It is in fact one of his most completely satisfactory works for the stage.

Act I. Egypt, after Caesar's victory over his rival Pompey at Pharsalus. During a short overture the curtain rises to show a broad plain by the Nile with a bridge over the river. The Egyptians in chorus greet the victorious Romans, who fill the scene until Julius Caesar himself enters to celebrate his triumph ('Presti omai l'Egizia terra'). To him come Cornelia and her son Sesto to beg him to show clemency in his hour of victory, only for Achilla in the same moment to offer Caesar the hospitality of Ptolemy (whose military help Pompey had invoked) and to show him the severed head of Pompey as proof of Ptolemy's change of heart. Caesar condemns the senseless cruelty ('Empio, dirò, tu sei, togliti') and leaves Cornelia to attempt suicide, to dismiss the proffered love of Curio, the Roman tribune, and to lament her wretched loneliness in a beautiful slow aria ('Priva son d'ogni conforto'). Her son Sesto in his turn excitedly vows vengeance on the criminals ('Svegliatevi nel core').

The scene changes to the palace of Ptolemy, where Cleopatra resolves to pit her celebrated beauty against her brother's gift of Pompey's head in a bid for Caesar's favour ('Non disperar'). Now Achilla tells Ptolemy of Caesar's fury at the murder of Pompey and himself offers to kill Caesar and so stabilise Ptolemy's throne if the King will grant him in reward the hand of the beautiful Cornelia. Ptolemy agrees and inveighs against Caesar ('L'empio, sleale, indegno').

In his camp, Caesar in an expressive recitative contemplates the monument he has raised to Pompey's memory and reflects on the transience of fame. To him comes Cleopatra, describing herself as Lidia, one of the Queen's women. Caesar is completely captivated by her beauty ('Non è sì vago e bello') and Cleopatra celebrates her success ('Tutto può donna vezzosa') and then with Nireno hides to watch Cornelia dressed in mourning kneel before the monument of her dead husband and movingly apostrophise the urn which contains all that she adored ('Nel tuo seno, amico sasso'). When she vows vengeance on her husband's murderer, her son takes the burden upon himself. Cleopatra, still calling herself Lidia, offers her help. Sesto rejoices because his dream of justice may now come true ('Cara speme'), and the scene ends as Cleopatra exults at the prospect of victory over Ptolemy, then sings an aria ('Tu la mia stella sei'), whose melodious and lovelorn accents to some degree contradict the uncompromising nature of the recitative.

¹ Deutsch's Handel, a Documentary Biography refers to Berenstadt as a bass, presumably, suggests Winton Dean, because a German castrato (which he was) seemed like a contradiction in terms.

Giulio Cesare (English National Opera, 1979, director John Copley). Janet Baker in the title role.

The scene changes to the palace of Ptolemy. The King greets Caesar effusively, offering him entertainment but in no way deceiving the Roman, who in a fine aria with (uniquely in Handel's operas) a horn obbligato, invokes a hunting simile ('Va tacito e nascosto') to describe the relationship of Egyptian king and Roman general. Caesar and the Romans leave Ptolemy and his Egyptian courtiers, and Achilla points out Cornelia to Ptolemy, who is no less struck by her beauty than is his general. When the Roman lady and Sesto advance and challenge Ptolemy to mortal combat, guards are ordered to take the youth to prison and Cornelia to the King's harem. When the King has gone, Cornelia scorns Achilla's offer of freedom in return for marriage, and the act ends with a fine duet of farewell for mother and son.

Act II. Cleopatra has planned to have Caesar brought to her palace, where she can ravish his senses with the sight of Virtue enthroned on Mount Parnassus. The orchestral sinfonia which accompanies his entrance and the revelation of the goddess starts a process of seduction which is fully accomplished when Cleopatra herself, in the guise of the goddess, sings the delectable 'V'adoro pupille', an aria of a tender, sensual beauty that puts it among Handel's greatest melodic inspirations. Though the vision of his beloved is removed from him when the mountain closes, Caesar's growing passion is evident in his aria 'Se in fiorito ameno prato'.

The scene changes to the garden of the harem where Cornelia sings sadly of her departed happiness ('Deh piangete, oh mesti lumi'), and resists the blandishments successively of Achilla and Ptolemy, who, unbeknown to Achilla, is his rival for her favours. Ptolemy's determination is well portrayed in his aria 'Si spietata, il tuo rigore sveglia'. Cornelia is now joined by Sesto, bent on avenging his father's death, to which end Nireno contributes by offering to take him secretly to the King's presence. Cornelia urges him onward ('Cessa omai di sospirare') and Sesto proclaims his resolve in a splendid martial aria.

The scene returns to Cleopatra, who waits in the guise of Lidia for Caesar. As they are about to declare their love, Curio announces an imminent attempt by Ptolemy's soldiers on Caesar's life, whereupon Cleopatra declares herself in her true identity and, announcing she will quell the conspirators herself, leaves the scene. In a moment she is back urging Caesar to flee the danger, a solution he scorns ('Al lampo dell'armi'). He rushes out and the conspirators can be heard shouting for his death. In a splendidly realised scene of accompanied recitative and aria ('Se pietà di me non senti'), the music depicts the Queen's conflicting emotions – her desire for revenge on her enemies and her self-pity, set against her fears for the safety of the man whose love she now craves more than the political favour she once sought.

The scene changes again to Ptolemy's harem where the King sits surrounded by his favourites, among them Cornelia, and sings of his amorous feelings. Sesto rushes in and attempts to stab him, but is prevented by Achilla, who brings news that Caesar defended himself against the attacking soldiers and succeeded in jumping from the palace window into the harbour, where he was presumably drowned. Cleopatra is now bringing her troops against Ptolemy to avenge Caesar's death. As Ptolemy leaves, Achilla asks for the promised reward of Cornelia's hand in marriage, is sharply turned down by Ptolemy, and, as the King departs for battle, goes off muttering of the revenge that will be his. Sesto in despair tries to kill himself, but Cornelia again nerves him to the task in hand.

Act III. In a wood near Alexandria. Achilla, with a band of soldiers, prepares to defect to Cleopatra's side, in revenge for Ptolemy's treachery towards him in the matter of his love for Cornelia ('Dal fulgor di questa spada').

A Battle Symphony describes the conflict, from which Ptolemy's supporters emerge victorious. The King orders his sister to prison ('Domerò la tua fierezza') and the scene ends with her great lament at the turn her fortunes have taken ('Piangerò la sorte mia'), a beautiful largo aria with a vocal line of the greatest possible simplicity and containing, as contrasting middle section, a vision of herself returning as a ghost to haunt her wicked brother.

By the side of the harbour, and to andante music that breathes the very spirit of consolation, Caesar reappears to describe his escape from death by drowning ('Dall'ondoso periglio') and to pray for comfort in his loneliness ('Aure, deh, per pietà') in music that is as touchingly simple and as memorable as the famous 'Ombra mai fu'. Also to the harbour side come Sesto and Achilla, the latter mortally wounded in the battle which, he explains, he joined to revenge himself on the treacherous Ptolemy. Caesar sees him give Sesto the signet ring which will gain them the instant obedience of his troops, who know a subterranean approach to the palace where they may overthrow Ptolemy. Caesar takes charge of the situation and his determination is displayed in his comparison of his progress to that of a waterfall ('Quel torrente che cade dal monte'). With Achilla's death and Caesar's departure to organise the final assault, Sesto feels that the processes of justice are nearing completion ('La giustizia ha già sull'arco').

The scene changes to Cleopatra's apartments where her sad farewell to her attendant women is interrupted by the precipitate and victorious arrival of Caesar to free her. Immediately, Cleopatra's mood changes to one of jubilation and she celebrates the prospect of victory ('Da tempeste il legno infranto').

Ptolemy meanwhile makes a last attempt to persuade Cornelia of his love for her, is threatened by her with a dagger, and eventually falls dead after a duel with Sesto, whose entry prevents his mother from herself avenging her murdered husband, a deed she nevertheless greets with proper enthusiasm.

The harbour at Alexandria is the scene of the final triumph of Caesar and Cleopatra, celebrated with a march, a duet for the happy couple and a chorus of rejoicing. H.

TAMERLANO

Tamburlaine

Opera in three acts, text by Nicola Haym from Agostino Piovene's original text after Jacques Pradon's tragedy Tamberlan ou La Mort de Bajazet. Première King's Theatre, Haymarket, London, 31 October 1724, with the castrati Senesino and Andrea Pacini as Andronicus and Tamburlaine, the tenor Francesco Borosini as Bajazet, Francesca Cuzzoni as Asteria, and Anna Dotti (Irene) and Giuseppe Boschi (Leone). First performed in Germany, Hamburg, 1725, in German, with the music adapted by Telemann (the arias were sung in Italian and between the acts intermezzi, probably Telemann's Die ungleiche Heyrath, were performed). Revived London, 1731 (abridged by Handel). Modern revivals: Karlsruhe, 1924; Leipzig, 1925; Halle, 1940 and 1952; Birmingham, 1962 (first performance in England since 1731) in English translation by Nigel Fortune and Brian Trowell with Catherine Wilson, Patricia Clark, Janet Baker, Alexander Young, conductor Anthony Lewis; Batignano, 1976; Edinburgh Festival, 1982, by Welsh National Opera with Eiddwen Harrhy, Anthony Rolfe Johnson; Bloomington, U.S.A., 1985 (first American performance) in English; Opera North, Leeds, 1985, with Eiddwen Harrhy, Felicity Palmer, Sally Burgess; Lyons, 1985, conductor John Eliot Gardiner.

Tamerlano (Tamburlaine), Emperor of the Tartars..... Alto
 Bajazete (Bajazet), Emperor of the Turks, Tamerlano's prisoner..... Tenor Asteria, Bajazete's daughter, in love with Andronico..... Soprano
 Andronico (Andronicus), a Grecian Prince, Tamerlano's ally..... Contralto
 Irene, Princess of Trabisond, Tamerlano's fiancée..... Contralto
 Leone, friend to Andronico and Tamerlano..... Bass
 Zaida, Asteria's confidante..... Silent

Place: Prusa, Capital of Bithinia

Time: 1402

Running Time: 3 hours

Tamerlano seems to have been written in the astonishingly short time of twenty days, between 3 and 23 July 1724. The Tartar ruler, Tamerlano, has conquered the Ottoman Emperor, Bajazete the First, and holds him prisoner. Tamerlano, who has yet to see his betrothed, Irene, the Princess of Trabison, falls in love with Bajazete's daughter, Asteria, and renounces Irene. But Andronico, Tamerlano's Grecian ally, himself has come to love Asteria.

Act I. The overture, with its solemn introduction, contrapuntal allegro (rather severe in tone) and minuet, leads not without foreboding to Tamerlano's palace, where Bajazete has been brought captive. At Tamerlano's behest, Andronico frees Bajazete from his chains but Bajazete rejects what he feels is Tamerlano's false-hearted clemency. Only his love for his daughter Asteria, as he insists in an aria characteristically firm in tone ('Forte e lieto a morte andrei'), prevents his suicide. Tamerlano now enters to order Andronico to plead his cause with Bajazete and Asteria, offering (in recitative and aria) as reward for success the throne of Greece, the hand of Irene in marriage, and freedom for Bajazete.

Andronico's predicament is harsh. He it was who brought Asteria to Tamerlano, thinking to soften the tyrant's heart, but the result has been to cause Tamerlano instantly to fall in love with her. Andronico himself loves her deeply, as we learn from an aria full of the tenderest feeling ('Bella Asteria'). Nonetheless, Tamerlano approaches Asteria and makes clear at the same time his intentions towards her and the bargain he thinks he has struck with Andronico. Asteria is both saddened and angered by what seems to her Andronico's betrayal of her love.

Bajazete scorns the freedom his enemy offers and in an aria reacts vigorously to the apparently ambivalent attitude of Asteria. Alone Asteria reveals ('Deh! lasciatemi il nemico') that, however wounded she might be by Andronico's apparent treachery, the tenderness of her feelings is unchanged.

The arrival of Irene adds further complication, since she learns from Andronico that Tamerlano has resolved on a change of plan: she is now to marry Andronico rather than the Tartar monarch. The situation may yet be saved, he suggests, if she, still unknown to Tamerlano, will represent herself as Irene's confidante in order to remonstrate with him. She agrees in music of rather placid cast, in contrast to the heartfelt and grandiose recitative and aria in which Andronico laments the cruel twists of fortune which have brought him to his present plight.

Act II. Tamerlano tells Andronico that Asteria has accepted to be his Empress and their wedding, together with that of Andronico and Irene, will shortly be celebrated. There is a note of triumph in his aria ('Bella gara'), mockery in Asteria's 'Non è più tempo' as she dissembles. Andronico is left alone to his grief ('Cerco in vano').

The disguised Irene is conducted by Leone into Tamerlano's presence, where her pleading of the real Irene's cause is received with surprising equanimity by the tyrant, and then, when they are alone together, with sympathy by Asteria, who unburdens her own true feelings to Irene. That unfortunate if imperturbable lady discerns a ray of hope in what she has heard – her 'Par che mi nasca' is described by Winton Dean¹ as 'a miracle of beauty and psychological insight'.

Bajazete learns with horror that Asteria is to join Tamerlano on his throne and resolves in an aria of tragic gloom to prevent her ('A suoi piedi'). Andronico is stung at last to fury as he threatens vengeance on Tamerlano and an end to his own life ('Più d'una tigre').

Asteria, secretly resolved to slay the tyrant who holds her and her father in his power, is about to ascend Tamerlano's throne but Bajazete vigorously intervenes. Tamerlano attempts to force him to the ground in homage only for Bajazete to kneel and forestall the attempted humiliation. Asteria, with meaningful looks at Bajazete and Andronico, prepares to mount the dais but Bajazete interposes his body in protest. Asteria draws a dagger and announces that this would have been her wedding present to Tamerlano. A trio for Asteria, Tamerlano and Bajazete ensues, at the end of which Tamerlano orders their execution. This is followed by a great scene in which Asteria in a bar or two of recitative demands in succession of her father, her lover and her rival for Tamerlano's throne whether she was unworthy or untrue. Each, in short arias with no da capo and starting with the word 'No!', admits the purity of Asteria's actions. Alone Asteria rejoices in her vindication, regretting only that she failed in her assassination attempt.

¹ Handel and the Opera Seria (O.U.P. 1970).

Act III. Asteria and Bajazete determine to commit suicide by the poison Bajazete has concealed, and Asteria, who grows in stature as her plight worsens, is left alone to lament that she will soon bid farewell to father and lover alike ('Cor di padre'). Tamerlano now reveals another side of his nature in his renewed attempt to enlist Andronico's aid in persuading Asteria of his love, even of his resolve to pardon Bajazete. Andronico screws up his courage to defy Tamerlano and he and Asteria declare their mutual love. Tamerlano's mood changes and in a splendid though technically very difficult aria of rapid semi-quavered fury he vows revenge. Bajazete tries to raise the courage of the lovers who mellifluously in duet lament the prospect before them.

How fares Irene? In a lively allegro aria she announces that her love, provided it is requited, is pledged to Tamerlano.

Tamerlano is set to indulge his rage by humbling his victims, and first Bajazete, later Asteria, are summoned to his presence. Andronico protests that this is the unjust action of a tyrant and pleads for clemency. Tamerlano is obdurate and orders Asteria to act as his cup-bearer. She pours the poison Bajazete had given her into Tamerlano's cup, but Irene observes her action and gives her away, at the same time revealing to Tamerlano her own true identity. On Tamerlano's orders Asteria must choose whether to offer the cup first to her father or her lover, after which she may bring it to him. She is about to drink it herself when Andronico knocks it from her hand. Tamerlano rages at Asteria and orders her arrest; he will hand her over to the common seraglio – and Bajazete shall witness her shame! Bajazete is outraged and in his virtuoso aria ('Empio, per farti guerra') vows that his ghost will return to haunt the tyrant. Tamerlano and Irene, dramatically as if they were Monteverdi's and Busenello's Nero and Poppea, musically more like Handel's own Caesar and Cleopatra, celebrate in duet the prospect of future pleasure.

Asteria enters Tamerlano's presence followed by Bajazete. Bajazete astonishes them by his apparent serenity but it is not long before he reveals that he has taken poison and will soon be free of his tormen-

tor. In a scena of great power he takes an agonised farewell of his beloved daughter, then turns to scarify Tamerlano. As his words become more incoherent, he staggers out to die.

Asteria comes back to beg for death in an aria of great beauty ('Padre amato'), as her submission is something Tamerlano can never win. Irene and Andronico send after Asteria to prevent her suicide, but Tamerlano himself, now moved to pity by the horror of events and the dignity and pleas of Irene, pardons his erstwhile foes. The opera ends with Tamerlano and Irene pledging love, and the chorus announcing that love's bright torches have dispelled the dark of night, albeit in accents more appropriate to the opera's gloomy events than the statutory happy ending of opera seria. H.

RODELINDA

Opera in three acts, libretto by A. Salvi (originally written for Perti's opera of 1710), revised by Nicola Haym. Completed in January 1725, première at King's Theatre, Haymarket, 13 (or 24) February 1725, with Cuzzoni, Senesino, Dotti, Paccini, Boschi, Borosini. First performed in Germany in Hamburg, 1734. Revived Göttingen, 1920 (the beginning of the German Handel revival) in a new German version by Oskar Hagen; Smith College, Northampton, Mass., 1931; Old Vic, London, 1939. More recently Göttingen, 1953; Leipzig, 1955; Sadler's Wells, London, by Handel Opera Society, 1959, with Sutherland, Elkins, Janet Baker, Hallett, Herincx, conductor Farncombe.

Rodelinda, Queen of Lombardy Soprano
 Bertarido, King of Lombardy Contralto
 Grimoaldo, usurper of Bertarido's throne Tenor
 Eduige, sister of Bertarido Contralto
 Unulfo, adviser to Grimoaldo
 but secretly loyal to Bertarido Contralto
 Garibaldo, Duke of Turin, friend to Grimoaldo Bass
 Flavio, Rodelinda's son Silent

Place: The Royal Palace, Milan

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

Rodelinda has always been one of Handel's most successful operas,¹ revived many times during his lifetime and frequently in the twentieth century. It casts a tenor in the villain's role – there are few important tenor parts in Handel's operas, the heroic roles which the nineteenth century might have assigned to tenors being customarily taken by castrati. The opera's one really famous air, 'Dove sei', was once well known in England as 'Art thou troubled', but has also been given biblical words and sung as 'Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty' – a curious example of the English nineteenth century's tendency to turn all music to oratorio.

¹ Not only was its initial success quite out of the ordinary, but Cuzzoni's brown and silver dress became the rage for the rest of the London season!

After a maestoso opening, the overture is brilliant and florid.

Act I. A room in Rodelinda's apartments. Rodelinda, alone, mourns the death of her husband, Bertarido ('Ho perduto il caro sposo'), little knowing that he is alive and awaiting his opportunity for revenge on the treacherous Grimoaldo, who has deposed him. Grimoaldo proposes marriage to Rodelinda, but she furiously rejects him.

Grimoaldo consults his friend Garibaldo as to the best method of ridding himself of Bertarido's sister, Eduige, to whom he is betrothed, and of winning Rodelinda. Garibaldo promises to help him, and, when Eduige enters and reproaches Grimoaldo with his fickleness, Grimoaldo vigorously tells her that he is going to find a more worthy consort than she. When he has gone, the despised Eduige castigates him, leaving Garibaldo to sing of his aspiration to her hand and so to the throne itself.

The second scene is set in a cypress wood, where the kings of Lombardy are traditionally buried. Bertarido in disguise contemplates his own tomb which has lately been erected by Grimoaldo, and gives vent to his longing for his beloved Rodelinda in the chaste and very famous 'Dove sei'. When Rodelinda and her son Flavio approach to lay a wreath, Bertarido is prevented from speaking to them by his friend Unulfo, and the two men conceal themselves behind the tomb as Rodelinda mourns her husband in a largo aria, hardly less beautiful than its predecessor.

Garibaldo appears and, to the fury and despair of the hidden Bertarido, tells Rodelinda that unless she marries Grimoaldo her son will be killed. She agrees, but in a tempestuous allegro ('Morrai sì, l'empia tua testa') swears to have Garibaldo's head as forfeit. Garibaldo tells Grimoaldo the outcome of his efforts, not forgetting his fear of Rodelinda's revenge once she is queen. Grimoaldo will protect him. Unulfo tries to comfort the distraught Bertarido who is forced to admit that Rodelinda does believe him dead.

Act II. A room in Grimoaldo's palace. Eduige swears to be revenged on Grimoaldo. Rodelinda refuses to marry him until he has killed her son – in this way he will appear in the sight of the world as a monster ('Spietati, io vi giurai'). Grimoaldo hesitates, but Garibaldo urges him to agree to what Rodelinda exacts. Garibaldo expounds his Machiavellian theories to Unulfo and leaves the grief-stricken young man to reflect on the horror of the situation ('Frà tempeste funeste a quest'alma').

The scene changes to 'a delightful place' where Bertarido calls upon the brooks and fountains to share his sorrow. Eduige enters and after recovering from her amazement at finding her brother alive, assures him that Rodelinda is faithfulness itself. Unulfo supports her, and Bertarido rejoices at this sign of a change in his fortunes.

Rodelinda in her apartment is told by Unulfo that her husband lives and sings of her happiness. Husband and wife are united, but Grimoaldo bursts in and tells Bertarido to say farewell to Rodelinda as prison and death await him. He sings to Rodelinda of his hatred for her husband. Bertarido comforts Rodelinda and the act ends with a duet of great tenderness.

Act III. Eduige gives Unulfo a key to Bertarido's dungeon and they plan to rescue him. Garibaldo and Grimoaldo are agitated at the possible effect of the death of Bertarido on their respective ambitions and Grimoaldo expresses his fears.

The scene changes to a dark dungeon where Bertarido sings of the cruelty of love: 'Chi di voi fù più infedele, cieco Amor'. He is interrupted as a sword thrown through the window by Unulfo crashes to the ground. In the darkness and confusion, Bertarido slightly wounds his friend as he enters but the two escape by way of a secret passage.

Rodelinda and Eduige, also bent on rescue, find Bertarido's bloodstained cloak and jump to the conclusion that he has been murdered – Rodelinda demands movingly, with the force of a cry from the heart, why such pain must be endured.

In the palace garden Bertarido binds Unulfo's wound and sings of freedom. Grimoaldo meanwhile in a fine scena is troubled by conscience and finds consolation only in the idea of changing places with a simple shepherd (a charming Siciliana: 'Pastorello d'un povero armento'). He falls asleep after his reverie, and Garibaldo attempts to kill him with his own sword but is himself slain by Bertarido. Grimoaldo in gratitude renounces the throne and returns Rodelinda to her husband. The happy Queen sings joyfully 'Mio caro bene', and the opera ends with a triumphant chorus, sung originally of course by the principals. H.

PARTENOPE

Opera in three acts, libretto after Silvio Stampiglia's La Partenope (published 1699; previously set by Manzo and Caldara). Première King's Theatre, Haymarket, London, 24 February 1730, with Strada in the title role, Bernacchi as Arsace. Senesino sang Arsace the following year. Performed in Brunswick and Hamburg during Handel's lifetime, revived at Covent Garden, 1737. Revived 1935, Göttingen; Abingdon, 1961.

Partenope, *Queen of Naples*Soprano
 Arsace, *Prince of Corinth*Contralto
 Rosmira, *Princess of Cyprus*Alto
 Armindo, *Prince of Rhodes*¹Alto
 Emilio, *Prince of Cuma*Tenor
 Ormonte, *captain of Partenope's Guard*¹Bass
 Guards, Soldiers, People of Naples

Place: Naples

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Anyone familiar with Stampiglia's libretto for A Serse and Handel's treatment of it will not be surprised to find that Partenope partakes of some of the mocking spirit of Agrippina and Serse rather than of the solemnity of opera seria. It is one of Handel's most attractive operas, though not as yet the most frequently revived.

Act I. In a scene of great ceremony, Partenope invokes the blessing of Apollo on her newly founded city of Naples, but soon finds herself the centre of a multi-faceted intrigue such as could serve as the plot of a Feydeau farce. Arsace and Partenope renew vows of eternal fidelity, but Arsace has already tacitly admitted he loves Rosmira, who has arrived in Naples disguised as an Armenian prince. Armindo also loves Partenope, but will not say so publicly as he knows of her involvement with Arsace. To complicate matters, Rosmira in her male disguise as Prince Eurimene claims also to love Partenope, whose hand as his queen is solicited by the invading Prince Emilio. When she refuses Emilio, he declares war. Even the appointment of a prince to command her army causes confusion, and she eventually decides to do the job herself.

Act II. The troops face up to each other, Partenope is saved from death by Armindo, Arsace rescues Rosmira and captures Emilio, and Partenope's triumph is apparently complete. But not for long. Rosmira/Eurimene reminds her that it was Armindo who saved her life, Emilio claims to be Arsace's prisoner rather than Eurimene/Rosmira's, and Rosmira prepares to fight Arsace, who cannot accept the challenge since he, and he alone, knows her true identity as a woman but has sworn not to reveal it. Though Partenope sticks by him, Arsace loses face with the others, who think him a coward, all except Rosmira/Eurimene, who defends him. Partenope orders the release of Eurimene, then starts to make up her mind whether she prefers Arsace or Armindo, the latter of whom has just declared his love. Rosmira complicates matters by asking (as Eurimene) to impart a secret to Partenope which will help the cause of Armindo.

Act III. Eurimene's secret comes into the open: 'his' quarrel with Arsace is on account of Arsace's abandonment of a certain Rosmira, Princess of Cyprus, a charge Arsace admits. In the forthcoming duel, Emilio will be Arsace's second, Armindo Eurimene's. Arsace is in a trap and, to the surprise of Partenope, addresses Rosmira, who wakens him from sleep, by her true name. Rejected by both women, he inveighs against love's cruelty, then prepares for the duel. He is mocked for his half-hearted efforts by Rosmira, but turns the tables by demanding they should fight bare-chested. Rosmira is outwitted, admits who she is, and claims Arsace has proved his love by maintaining silence in the face of provocation. Partenope renounces Arsace to Rosmira, takes Armindo for her husband, and finishes the opera by proclaiming Emilio her ally.

Partenope consistently parodies opera seria and the heroic style which have been mainstays of Handel's output so far. Handel comments on various aspects of love, alluding off and on to military matters but, the battle at the start of Act II apart, not taking them too seriously. Partenope herself starts as a buoyant if many-sided personality, but her music takes on a serious tone after her victory. Arsace, written for virtuoso castrato (Bernacchi originally, Senesino at revival) initially shows unaccustomed restraint, later revealing more than one side of his personality and finishing Act II with considerable bravura ('Mà quai note'). Rosmira is lively and lyrical by turns; with horns in attendance, she has brought Act I to a resounding conclusion, and the love between her and Arsace is tantalisingly but touchingly portrayed in the extended music of Act III.

¹ For the 1737 revival, Armindo became a soprano and Ormonte an alto, and Handel made various alterations to the score, in particular to the conclusions of the second and third acts.

H.

PORO, RE DELL'INDIE

Porus, King of India

Opera in three acts, libretto based on Pietro Metastasio's libretto Alessandro for Leonardo Vinci (1729). First performance, King's Theatre, London, 2 February 1731, with Senesino, Anna Maria Strada del Po, Margherita Antonia Merighi, Francesca Bertolli, Annibale Pio Fabri, and Giovanni Giuseppe Commanno. Revived December 1731, when Antonio Montagnana sang Timagene and Handel gave him three arias from earlier operas. At Covent Garden in 1736 Strada sang Cleofide and the mezzo-soprano castrato Domenico Annibali sang Poro. Handel himself conducted Poro at Covent Garden on 5 May 1737. Revived 1928 in Brunswick and staged in Britain at Bangor, 11 September 1966. U.S. première (in concert) Washington, 1978.

Poro, King of one part of India,
in love with CleofideSoprano

Cleofide, Queen of another part of India, in love with Poro Soprano

Erissena, Poro's sister, engaged to GandarteMezzo-Soprano

Gandarte, a general in Poro's army, in love with Erissena Contralto

Alessandro (Alexander the Great)Tenor

Timagene, Alessandro's confidant and secret enemyBass

Time: Antiquity

Place: The River Hydaspes; Alessandro's Camp,
Cleofide's Palace

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Poro was one of Handel's last settings of a text by Metastasio. As Jonathan Keates points out, Handel's treatment is cavalier and his revisions 'grew more radical as the drama progressed'.¹

Handel adapted Metastasio for his own ends: where Metastasio stresses public, political intrigues, Handel is interested more in the private world of emotions. Crucially, the duet at the end stresses not Alessandro as role model, but the private love of two individuals.

Act I. A battlefield on the banks of the river Hydaspes. Having been defeated by Alessandro, Poro prepares to commit suicide. Gandarte encourages him to fight and not yield his beloved Cleofide to the conqueror. He exchanges helmets with him. When Poro is brought before Alessandro and Timagene he tells them he is Asbite, a chieftain loyal to Poro. Impressed by his boldness, Alessandro asks him to obtain Poro's avowal of defeat and gives him Darius's sword to protect him. Poro takes it, meaning to use it against him ('Vedrai con tuo periglio'). Alessandro also frees Poro's sister Erissena from her chains, telling her that her tears shame him. Seeing that she is impressed, Timagene asks whether she has fallen for Alessandro. Erissena points out that she displays none of the symptoms of love.

In Cleofide's palace. Cleofide assures Poro that she pretends to like Alessandro only for her lover's sake. Poro swears he will not feel jealousy. Cleofide also swears fidelity to Poro ('Se mai turbo il tuo riposo'). Yet when she leaves to see Alessandro, Poro ignores Gandarte's arguments and gives way to jealousy ('Se possono tanto due luci veggose'). Erissena tells Gandarte that she admires Alessandro and when he complains, she warns him that he asks too much in the way of exclusive fidelity.

Alessandro's tent. Cleofide arrives in state and makes a great impression on Alessandro. Still in disguise as Asbite, Poro returns from his mission and reports to Alessandro that the King refuses to admit defeat. Poro's jealousy so annoys Cleofide that she flirts with Alessandro, who remains impervious. Poro and Cleofide rebuke one another for failing to keep their word: she seems unfaithful, while he is jealous (duet, 'Se mai turbo').

Act II. Cleofide welcomes Alessandro, but suddenly Poro's men attack. Alessandro's troops drive them away, however. Gandarte destroys the bridge and escapes. Cleofide convinces Poro that she is faithful to him when she threatens to commit suicide (duet, 'Caro amico amplesso!'). He prepares to kill her to save her from being taken prisoner, but is prevented by Alessandro. Cleofide protects Poro's identity. Alessandro leaves to calm his troops, who blame Cleofide for the Indians' revolt and demand her death. He tells Cleofide not to heed the barbarians' discourtesy and leaves Timagene to guard Asbite. Cleofide asks Asbite to assure Poro that she remains faithful ('Digli ch'io son fedele'). Timagene then lets Asbite go and gives him a letter promising to help Poro; meanwhile, he will report that Asbite died. Poro reflects that it is easy to fool a man who trusts too easily: like a sleeping helmsman, he is liable to wake and find himself in the midst of a storm ('Senza procelle').

¹ Jonathan Keates, Handel: the Man and his Music, London, 1985.

In Cleofide's palace Alessandro is so concerned to protect her from his troops' fury that he offers to marry her. Gandarte tries to save Poro by claiming that he himself is Poro and was responsible for the revolt. Alessandro refuses to lose face, confronted by such magnanimity: he frees Cleofide and gives her to the man he believes to be Poro. Erissena brings news that Poro drowned in the river. Cleofide mourns him ('Se il ciel mi divide'). Gandarte resolves that if he cannot live with Erissena, he will die with her. Erissena will no longer trust in hope that cannot be trusted ('Di rendermi la calma').

Act III. The gates to the royal gardens. Poro asks Erissena not to tell anyone that he is still alive, even Cleofide, and to ensure that Timagene brings Alessandro to this garden, where Poro will kill him. He tries to rouse her anger, since he depends on his sister completely. Cleofide now agrees to marry Alessandro, apparently to protect herself from the Greeks' anger. She warns Erissena against judging on appearances. Erissena reveals Timagene's treachery to Alessandro but warns him not to let doubt of her fidelity poison their relationship. When Timagene begs for forgiveness Alessandro pardons him: as long as he now behaves nobly, Alessandro will be satisfied. Poro overhears this and realises his hopes are lost. He asks Gandarte to kill him.

Erissena reveals that Cleofide is preparing to marry Alessandro. Torn apart by jealousy, love and fury, Poro longs for death. Before he follows Poro to the temple, and possibly to death, Gandarte asks Erissena to remember how much he loved her ('Mio ben, ricordati'). Terrified, like a shepherdess lost in a dark wood, Erissena has lost all hope of seeing day ('Son confusa pastorella').

The temple of Bacchus. Poro prepares to kill both Alessandro and Cleofide. The pyre is lit. Suddenly, she announces that she will be united with Poro in death. Poro is recaptured but his courage so impresses Alessandro that he restores to him his crown, his wife and his freedom. Gandarte is allowed to marry Erissena and is granted the lands beyond the Ganges that Alessandro conquered. Poro and Cleofide embrace and after so much suffering, everyone looks forward to the compensations of joy.

The highlights of Poro include the eponym's intense aria 'Se possono tanto due luci vezzose', the quarrel duet, whose melting discords are from voices superimposed on one another, the lovely duet of reconciliation, what Winton Dean and John Merrill Knapp call the 'haunting poetry'¹ of 'Senza procelle', scored for two horns, two recorders and four-part strings, the aria of mourning, 'Se il ciel mi divide', the regal grandeur of 'Serbati a grandi imprese', and Poro's remarkable 'Dov'è', which Burney described as 'in a grand style of theatrical pathetic'. P.

EZIO

Opera in three acts, libretto by Pietro Metastasio for Nicola Porpora (1725), adapted and abridged by Handel. First performance, King's Theatre, London, 15 January 1732, with Senesino, Anna Strada del Po, Anna Bagnolesi, Francesca Bertolli, Giovanni Battista Pinacci, and Antonio Montagnana. After five performances it was not given again until Göttingen, 1926; revived in Britain by the Handel Opera Society at Sadler's Wells, 1977. Performed at the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, Paris, 1995, with James Bowman, in his last operatic appearance, as Ezio, Dominique Visse and Susan Gritton.²

Valentiniano III, Emperor of Rome, in love with Fulvia.....Alto
 Fulvia, Massimo's daughter, promised to EzioSoprano
 Ezio, *general, in love with Fulvia*Contralto Onoria, Valentiniano's sister, secretly in love with Ezio..... Alto Massimo, Roman patrician, secret enemy of ValentinianoTenor

¹ Quoted in Winton Dean and John Merrill Knapp, Handel's Operas 1704–1726, Oxford, 1995.

² 'Probably not one of Handel's masterpieces', Hugh Canning, Opera, September 1995.

Varo, prefect of the Praetorian Guard,
 Ezio's friend Bass

Place: Rome

Time: c. A.D. 451

Running Time: 3 hours

There is nothing perfunctory about Ezio: Handel makes the most of his third Metastasio text, which he also cut skilfully, and writes gratefully for his excellent cast. The bass, Antonio Montagnana, was new and needed to be shown off, which is why the minor role was so well endowed with arias. The title role, in the safe hands of the star castrato Senesino, allows for much tenderness, as well as the heroic vocalism you would expect in an operatic general. His first aria could not be more different from that of the other (travesti) alto, Valentiniano: where the latter displays a hard-edged, grand public manner, Ezio's unsupported vocal entry creates the impression of great intimacy. And the roles of the ruthlessly duplicitous Massimo and ambivalent Onoria assume the singers can act as well as they can sing.

Act I. Ezio returns from defeating Rome's enemy, Attila the Hun, and is acclaimed by Valentiniano, who descends from his throne to congratulate him, confident that with Ezio's help, Rome will always triumph. Ezio loves Fulvia and is expecting to marry her, so he is shocked when her father Massimo, the Emperor's confidant, reveals that the Emperor wants her for himself. Undaunted, Ezio reassures Fulvia: he can resolve everything.

Massimo explains to Fulvia that he wants her to marry the Emperor, who once insulted Massimo's wife, because then she can help her father murder him. She is appalled. Alone, Massimo swears that the Emperor will be dead by dawn: if his accomplice Emilio does not succeed, Massimo will pretend that Ezio was behind the attempt.

Onoria, Valentiniano's sister, rebukes Varo, who adores her, for being part of Ezio's victories, instead of achieving sole glory. She is in fact in love with Ezio, but scheming to exploit Varo's love for her. Meanwhile Massimo feeds Valentiniano's incipient resentment of Ezio's glory. Valentiniano decides to marry Ezio to his own sister Onoria, but Ezio explains that this honour is to him a punishment, since he loves Fulvia. Horrified, Valentiniano warns Ezio to be wiser and curb the daring needed in battle but inappropriate elsewhere. His peremptory aria bristles with emphatic, but brief, rising and falling phrases, expressive of someone on a short fuse ('So chi t'accese').

Onoria takes pleasure in announcing to Fulvia that the Emperor intends to marry Fulvia tomorrow and is surprised when Ezio makes a covert threat. More in sorrow than in anger, Ezio explains that if the Emperor wishes him faithful, then he should not wound him in his heart ('Se fedele brama il regnante'). Onoria and Fulvia quarrel, since each knows that the other loves Ezio. Fulvia reflects that Fortune is testing her constancy.

Act II opens with a darkly atmospheric Sinfonia. Massimo waits to hear whether Emilio has succeeded in his attempt on the Emperor's life. Fulvia is horrified. Valentiniano himself appears, intact, having foiled Emilio. He assumes that Ezio was behind this scheme. When Fulvia defends him, the Emperor turns on her but is reassured when Massimo insists that she was motivated by pity, not by love. The Emperor entrusts Massimo with his life ('Vi fida lo sposo').

Fulvia rebukes her father for his hypocrisy. He responds by accusing her of treachery, since she would sacrifice her father to save her lover, in an F minor aria charged with a jagged, bullying rhythm ('Va! va, dal furor portata'). Fulvia's dilemma is expressed in a brief but highly emotional passage of orchestrally accompanied recitative, before Ezio arrives and she warns him to flee. He is fearless. When Varo asks for his sword, on behalf of the Emperor, Ezio hands it over, asking him to remind Valentiniano who he is. The voice enters without a ritornello and is shadowed by unison strings ('Recagli quell'acciaro'). Varo advises Fulvia that if she wants to save Ezio, she needs to marry the Emperor and, as a woman, she won't find it hard to pretend; she disagrees. Varo reflects that fortune can take a man born a shepherd and make him rule the empire, while someone royally born can end up grazing sheep. The aria makes spectacular demands on the extremes of the bass voice and on the singer's flexibility, suggesting, perhaps, how suitable he is for promotion ('Nasce al bosco in rozza cuna').

Onoria longs to save Ezio. When the Emperor asks her, for political reasons, to marry someone she may dislike, she assumes he means Ezio and is horrified when he names Attila. She suggests he still needs to hear from Ezio and explains that while she still worries about her brother's safety, she cannot feel love. Fulvia asks Valentiniano to pardon Ezio. The Emperor summons Ezio and asks Fulvia to sit in judgement at his side. Ezio himself points out that the Emperor is at once prosecutor, judge and witness. He antagonises him further by reminding the ungrateful Emperor that he is in his debt. Fulvia tries to leave, but the Emperor forces her to confirm she once loved Ezio. When Ezio accuses her of breaking her word, she confesses that she loves only him, adding in a remarkable allegro aria that her feelings will never change. Handel expresses her constancy and her bravery in a heroic vocal line, holding one note for over six bars ('costanza') and with splendidly showy coloratura on the word 'speranza' (hope), and octave leaps. Consumed with jealousy, the Emperor consigns Ezio to his worst prison. Ezio's relief at finding that Fulvia still loves him is expressed in a memorably poignant F sharp minor siciliano: relief that 'Caesar yields to me' is complicated by regret for having doubted Fulvia.

Act III. Inside the prison. Onoria sends for Ezio: she loves him the more for the danger he faces, while his smiling calm proves his innocence. She declares her love for him. He promises her that, as his innocence is evident, his fate will arouse envy, not pity ('Guarda pria se in questa fronte'). Onoria tells the Emperor that she cannot believe in Ezio's guilt and urges her brother to let them marry. She has just as much to lose by their union; love is enemy to them both, a symmetry Handel echoes in the phrasing of her sympathetic aria ('Peni tu per un ingrata'). Valentiniano orders Varo to stand by for a test: if Ezio is not at his side, he must be made to commit suicide. Valentiniano offers to let Ezio marry Fulvia, if only he will betray the conspiracy against the Emperor's life. Ezio prepares to return to prison. Surprisingly, the Emperor seems convinced of Ezio's innocence; he frees him and unites him with Fulvia. Ezio responds in an Andante larghetto festively coloured by horns, recorders and bassoons, swearing that he'll make 'the Snow-clad Scythia give, With the scorch'd Aethiop's torrid Land Their Realms to Caesar's great Command'. He leaves.

Almost immediately, Varo reports to the Emperor that 'Following your orders, Ezio has died'. Meanwhile, Onoria blithely announces good news: before Emilio died, he swore Ezio was innocent and identified the malefactor as 'the person Caesar loved best and who was injured by him in love'. Onoria identifies this as Massimo. The Emperor asks him to clear himself. To save her father, Fulvia takes the blame on herself. Valentiniano feels he may as well die now, since in one day fate has deprived him of hope, peace, his love and his friend ('Per tutto il timore periglia m'addita'). With its busy accompaniment, jaunty allegro tempo and vocal line of marked limited compass, its cumulative effect is of monstrous petulance, which may be what Handel intended. When Massimo is left alone with Fulvia, she rejects his comforting embraces and asks him to kill her. With typical lack of tact, Massimo tries to cheer her up by reminding her that she can still become the Emperor's wife. Fulvia reflects that she cannot be living, she must be in hell. In her remarkable aria (aptly distinguished by its eloquence) grief has taken over her identity and speaks for her ('Ah! non son io che parlo').

The Capitol, full of people. Massimo inflames the crowd with news of Ezio's death and invites them to avenge their hero. Varo is outraged by his behaviour. Trumpets are heard in the opening of his aria ('Già risonar d'intorno'). Guards descend and fight with the mutineers. When the Emperor asks for help, Massimo tries to kill him. His daughter prevents him and suddenly Ezio saves his life: Varo had pretended that he had died. Ezio is rewarded with Fulvia. He further intercedes for Massimo and the disobedient Varo. In the finale happy, short solos for Ezio, Fulvia, Onoria and Varo are followed by the coro in which everyone agrees 'That Constancy the brightest shines Which Anguish with its Flame refines; So to the Fire that fiercely glows, The Gold its purest Lustre owes'. P.

ORLANDO

Opera in three acts, text after Carlo Sigismondo Capece's L'Orlando, ovvero La Gelosia pazzia, based on Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. Première King's Theatre, London, 27 January 1733, with Senesino (Orlando), Strada (Angelica), Francesca Bertolli (Medoro), and Montagnana (Zoroastro). Revived Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1981.

Orlando, a warrior.....Contralto
 Angelica, Queen of Cathay, beloved of Medoro.....Soprano
 Medoro, African prince, beloved of Angelica....Contralto
 Dorinda, a shepherdess.....Soprano
 Zoroastro, a magician.....Bass

Running Time: 2 hours 55 minutes

Orlando is an opera in some contrast with the works that preceded it, and involves not only magic and the supernatural but also considerable musical innovation – short songs as well as the customary da capo arias; instrumental novelty; a famous, flexibly shaped mad scene. It has been conjectured that this scene in Act II may have as antecedents English mad scenes such as Purcell's and that the whole work was influenced by the spectacular aspects of the English masque – the stage directions are highly ambitious.

The opera ran for ten performances in 1733 and was not revived in Handel's lifetime. It was produced in the penultimate season for which the composer was responsible, in partnership with the impresario J.J. Heidegger; after these performances, Senesino resigned and went over to Handel's rivals, a new company later known as the Opera of the Nobility.

Act I. Zoroastro surveys the firmament and reads the stars to the effect that the knight Orlando will in the future return to deeds of valour, a prediction Orlando finds hard in prospect, preferring to laud the feats of valour Hercules performed while pursuing his affair with Omphale.

In a wood, Dorinda laments her love-lorn situation. Angelica, despite the recent attentions of Orlando, is now in love with Medoro, who once paid court himself to Dorinda but now returns Angelica's affections. He gives out that Angelica is a relation of his in order to comfort Dorinda, who enjoys the pretence but sees through it. Zoroastro warns Angelica that Orlando is likely to seek revenge, and when her erstwhile suitor appears, Angelica has not the heart to confront him with the new situation but instead pretends to jealousy of the Princess Isabella he has just rescued. Zoroastro conceals the approaching Medoro behind a fountain and Angelica demands Orlando prove his love by renouncing the Princess.

Medoro and Angelica continue a demonstration of their love, to the discomfiture of Dorinda, who finds a jewel given her by Angelica a poor substitute for the lover she has lost. Medoro's efforts to comfort her are less than successful – he will never know the pangs she feels, she says, and the act ends with a rare trio, Dorinda having the last word.

Act II. The love-lorn Dorinda now confuses matters; berated by Orlando for spreading the rumour that he loves Isabella, she says she was misunderstood and was referring to the new-found love of Angelica for Medoro. Orlando is beside himself with jealousy and fury.

Urged to escape by Zoroastro, Medoro and Angelica leave a memento behind when he carves her name on a tree. She feels gratitude to Orlando for having saved her life but affects to think he will understand that her new love cannot be bound by mere gratitude or reason.

Orlando pursues Angelica but is prevented from catching her by the magic of Zoroastro, who hides her behind a cloud. Rage and jealousy now destroy the balance of Orlando's mind. In his madness, he believes Angelica has been transported to the underworld, crosses the Styx with Charon, hears Cerberus bark and is attacked by the Furies. He thinks Medoro is among his foes, but, as he sees Proserpina weep for him, Orlando's torment momentarily abates, then returns with redoubled fury, until Zoroastro comes with his chariot and bears off the stricken hero.

Act III. Dorinda gives refuge to Medoro, but before long Orlando comes to declare his love for her, seeming to believe she is Venus. He is plainly still unhinged, as evidenced by his subsequent conviction that Dorinda is Angelica's murdered brother, whose death he must avenge. Dorinda tells Angelica of Orlando's pitiable condition, news she accompanies with the not too surprising opinion that love is liable to set the brain a-whirling.

Zoroastro attempts to mend matters and transforms the scene to a 'horrid cavern'. Dorinda brings news that Orlando in his insanity has destroyed her cottage (which is true) and buried Medoro in the ruins (which is not). Orlando now mistakes Angelica for a sorceress and hurls her into the cavern, which changes instantly into a temple of Mars. Orlando boasts he has slain the monsters there and falls asleep (Handel showed a propensity to treat sleep as an aspect of the supernatural, says Winton Dean).

Zoroastro determines to restore Orlando's senses, and the eagle of Jupiter brings a golden vessel containing healing liquid which Zoroastro sprinkles on the sleeping hero. He is no sooner back to normal than Dorinda tells him he has in his frenzy killed Medoro, news which causes him to contemplate suicide, from which he is deterred only when Angelica assures him Zoroastro intervened to save Medoro. Orlando finally accepts the betrothal of Angelica and Medoro and invites all to join him in celebrating love and glory.

The role of Orlando is one for a singer of the utmost virtuosity, and the mad scene at the end of Act II with its many sections is one of the peaks of Handel's operatic creation. Though he has no more than three of the majestic da capo arias a singer like Senesino would have expected (and none in the last act), Orlando offers to fight monsters to prove his love for Angelica in brilliant coloratura, reacts to the news of Angelica's love for Medoro with a vigour which is nothing less than martial and already presages madness, and, purged of his frenzy, falls asleep to music of haunting beauty. The music the composer has allotted to Angelica is only a little less original, spirited and serene by turns; Dorinda is a soubrette role full of charm; Zoroastro's function is to act as deus ex machina but he does so four times in music that is as full of determination as it is of coloratura writing. H.

ARIODANTE

Opera in three acts, libretto by Antonio Salvi, after Ariosto's poem Orlando furioso (1516), originally called Ginevra, Principessa di Scozia, and first set to music by Perti in 1708. Première Covent Garden, London, 8 January 1735 (19 January new style), with Carestini in the title role and Anna Strada¹ as Ginevra, and Maria Negri, Cecilia Young, John Beard, Gustavus Waltz, and Michael Stoppelaer. Revived Covent Garden, May 1736. First produced Stuttgart in German, September 1926; New York, Carnegie Hall, March 1971, with Sophia Steffan, Judith Raskin, Patricia Wise. Revived Berlin State Opera, 1959, with new German text and Gerhard Unger in title role, Jutta Vulpius, Martin Ritzman, Theo Adam, Kurt Rehm (production later given in Prague, 1959, and Halle); Birmingham, Barber Institute, 1964, with Janet Baker, Jacqueline Delman, Patricia Clark, conductor Anthony Lewis; Drottningholm, 1965; London by Handel Opera Society, 1974, in English version by Brian Trowell with Maureen Lehane, Janet Price, Patricia O'Neill, James Bowman, Philip Langridge, conductor Charles Farncombe; Nancy, 1983 (first performance in France) with Zehava Gal; English National Opera, 1993, with Amanda Roocroft, Lesley Garrett, Ann Murray, Christopher Robson, conductor Nicholas McGegan.

Ariodante, a prince.....Mezzo-Soprano
Ginevra, daughter of the King of ScotlandSoprano
Dalinda, a lady of the court.....Soprano
Polinesso, Duke of Albany.....Contralto
Lurcanio, Ariodante's brother.....Tenor
King of Scotland.....Bass
Odoardo, a courtier.....Tenor

Place: Scotland

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Handel's operatic career was full of ups and downs, depending less on the ebb and flow of inspiration than on the vagaries of fashion and the strength or weakness of rivalries, whether artistic or political – the King's support of Handel's Royal Academy of Music against the Whigs' Opera of the Nobility by no means guaranteed Handel a winning hand. 1735 saw one of the high points of his career, with a move to Covent Garden and the production in succession of Ariodante and Alcina, two of his most inspired operas, moreover works in which the forces to hand suggested greater emphasis than before on chorus and on dance.

Act I. A formal overture introduces us to the palace of the King of Scotland, where Ginevra, his daughter, sings buoyantly of her love for her affianced Ariodante, an engagement which has the full blessing of her father. Polinesso bursts in declaring his love but Ginevra, in an aria of some determination, rebuffs him. Dalinda, Ginevra's attendant lady, has quite different feelings for Polinesso and reveals them in a charmingly artless aria, leaving Polinesso scheming an intrigue whereby Dalinda's infatuation may be made to serve his purposes.

In the idyllic surroundings of the royal gardens, Ariodante dreams of his love for Ginevra, who soon appears to join her voice with his in duet. The King interrupts to confirm his blessing on their anticipated union and Ginevra celebrates her happiness. The King once more assures Ariodante of his affection and of the pleasure he takes in the prospect of his daughter's marriage. Ariodante in his own happiness reckons without Polinesso's plotting, which moves forward as he persuades Dalinda, dressed against her better judgment in Ginevra's clothes, to admit Polinesso himself to her chambers. When she succumbs to his blandishments, Polinesso compliments her with the aplomb of a successful predator. Lurcanio pays court to Dalinda, who advises him to look elsewhere, then declares the lasting nature of her own love for Polinesso. There ensues a pastoral scene redolent of requited love for Ariodante and Ginevra, opening with a duet and finishing with chorus and dance as all celebrate the royal love.

¹ One of the most celebrated sopranos of the day, Strada is quoted by Čapek and Janáček in The Makropulos Affair (see page 393) at the same time as an example of renowned vocalism and proof of the heroine's longevity.

Ariodante (Welsh National Opera, 1994, director David Alden, designer Ian MacNeil). Ariodante (Della Jones) comes to free Ginevra (Alwyn Mellor), watched by Lurcanio (Gregory Cross).

Act II. Moonlight is gracefully painted in ten bars in the orchestra before Polinesso ensnares Ariodante by pretending to know nothing of his engagement to Ginevra but declaring that she rather favours him with every token of love. Ariodante challenges him in an aria of some grandeur to prove the calumny, which he proceeds to do. Dalinda, dressed as Ginevra, opens the door of the private apartments, observed by Lurcanio as well as by Ariodante. Ariodante is beside himself and would commit suicide if not restrained by Lurcanio, who urges him not to throw away his life on a worthless woman. Ariodante magnificently laments his despair ('Scherza infida'), and Polinesso gloats in triumph.

The King, who has as yet heard nothing of the untoward events, is about to declare Ariodante his heir when news comes by the hand of Odoardo that the prince has thrown himself into the sea and is dead. When the King tells Ginevra, she collapses. It is Lurcanio who comes now to accuse Ginevra of having by her unchaste behaviour been the cause of his brother's death. Lurcanio asks for justice and promises to fight in the lists anyone who will champion Ginevra's cause. The King is not prepared to acknowledge a wanton as his daughter and Ginevra, totally bewildered, in music of tragic cast goes out of her mind ('Il mio crudel martoro'). The act ends with a series of dances as Ginevra lies dreaming.

Act III. Ariodante in disguise laments a fate which has both destroyed him and left him alive. By chance he is at hand to save Dalinda from the two assassins whom Polinesso has hired to murder her and so conceal the only evidence against him. From her Ariodante learns the truth and impressively inveighs against night, disguise, suspicion, which have contributed to rob him of all he held most dear.

The King insists a champion for Ginevra's cause be found, and when Polinesso offers himself, in spite of her refusal, orders that she accept him, at the same time offering her pardon from his heart whatever his public position may be ('Al sen ti stringo'). Trumpets announce the setting of the scene for single combat, Polinesso fights Lurcanio, who fells him with a mighty blow and then, not content with that, in order that he may avenge the slight to his brother's honour, offers to fight anyone else who comes forward. An unknown knight with lowered visor appears but it is not long before he is revealed as Ariodante, come to explain all on condition the King will pardon Dalinda for her unwitting part in the shameful masquerade. News comes that Polinesso as he lay dying has confessed his guilt, and the King hastens to find his daughter and tell her the welcome news, Ariodante meanwhile ('Dopo notte') rejoicing at the happy turn of events. Dalinda, at Lurcanio's special urging, consents to become his wife (one of Handel's most beautiful duets: 'Dite spera, e son contento').

Ginevra, confined in her apartment, awaits death. The King brings her the news of her vindication, embraces her, and she is reunited with Ariodante. The opera ends in general rejoicing, not excluding the balm of dancing.

H.

ALCINA

Opera in three acts, text by A. Marchi from Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (originally set by Albinoni, 1725). Première Covent Garden, London, 27 April 1735, with Anna Strada, Signora Negri, Carestini, Beard, Waltz. First performed in Germany, Brunswick, 1738. Revived Leipzig, 1928; Halle, 1952; London, St Pancras Town Hall, 1957, by Handel Opera Society with Sutherland, Monica Sinclair, conductor Farncombe; Venice, 1960, with Sutherland, Dominguez, Monica Sinclair, in Zeffirelli's production, later seen in Dallas, Texas, with Sutherland; Covent Garden, 1960, by Stockholm Opera, with Hallin, Söderström, Meyer, Wixell, and in 1962, in Zeffirelli's production, with Sutherland.

Alcina, a sorceressSoprano
 Ruggiero, a knightMezzo-Soprano
 Morgana, sister of AlcinaSoprano
 Bradamante, betrothed to RuggieroContralto
 Oronte, commander of Alcina's troopsTenor
 Melisso, Bradamante's guardianBass

Oberto, a young noblemanSoprano

Place: An Enchanted Island

Running Time: 3 hours 35 minutes

Alcina was among the most popular of Handel's later works and was much performed from 1735 to 1737, after which it was unaccountably neglected, the next performance in England not taking place until 1957. Then the revival was associated with the as yet uncelebrated Joan Sutherland, who for the next few years chose Handel operas and Handel arias as vehicles for her skill as often as she selected Bellini or Donizetti.

Alcina's original performances were not without set-back and incident. It is related that the famous castrato Carestini refused at first to have anything to do with what became his most celebrated aria 'Verdi prati', on the grounds that it did not suit his voice, and it took a severe dose of spleen from the irascible composer to convince him of his mistake.

Act I. The enchantress Alcina lives with her sister Morgana and her General Oronte on a magic island, which she rules. Many a brave knight has come to woo her but at her hands has suffered transformation into alien form, animal, vegetable or even mineral. Her latest captive is Ruggiero, who still retains human form but in his infatuation has entirely forgotten Bradamante, to whom he is betrothed. Bradamante, disguised as her own brother Ricciardo, sets off in search of her lover with her guardian, Melisso, and the two are shipwrecked on the very island ruled over by Alcina.

When the action begins, Bradamante and Melisso are discovered by Morgana, who is distinctly attracted by 'Ricciardo' and after a short andante aria leads them off to Alcina's court, where they meet the still bedazzled Ruggiero and Oberto, a young nobleman searching for his father. Ruggiero, really believing that he speaks to Ricciardo, announces that he is now in love with Alcina. Morgana rejects Oronte, and announces that she will protect Bradamante, who sings a florid aria on the perils of jealousy. The infuriated Oronte tries to revenge himself by telling Ruggiero that Alcina has fallen in love with Ricciardo, and sings a spirited 12/8 aria in which he mocks Ruggiero for having believed in Alcina.

Bradamante and Melisso vainly attempt to convince Ruggiero that his supposed rival is really his betrothed, but he rushes off to plead with Alcina to do away with Ricciardo. Morgana begs Bradamante to leave the island, and the act ends with a brilliant aria 'Tornami a vagheggiar', which, appropriated to Alcina, became one of the most spectacular vehicles of Joan Sutherland's talents.¹

Act II. Melisso, in the form of Ruggiero's old tutor Atlante, rebukes him for his behaviour and gives him a magic ring which has the power to remove the spell Alcina has cast over him. Ruggiero at once recovers from his infatuation, and thoughts of his beloved Bradamante come flooding back to him. The plot takes another twist when Bradamante reveals her true identity to Ruggiero, only to have him conclude that this is another of Alcina's spells and rebuff her angrily. Bradamante renews her efforts to convince him and eventually he believes her. In order to escape from Alcina he asks her to allow him to go hunting.

Oberto comes to beg Alcina to help him discover his father's whereabouts; she promises, not intending to keep her word, and he sings of his anxiety.

Oronte tells Alcina that Ruggiero has fled, taking with him the sword and shield which she had hidden because of their magic powers, and in a glorious and extended aria Alcina calls on the gods to witness her distress ('Ah! mio cor!'). Oronte taunts Morgana with the loss of her new lover, but she refuses to believe him. However, she comes upon the lovers and confronts them with accusations of treachery. At this point, Ruggiero sings the justly famous 'Verdi prati', whose apparently simple melody carries with it Ruggiero's subconscious reluctance to leave the scene of the happiness on which he is turning his back. The act ends with a scene in the subterranean cave, where Alcina weaves her spells; in a dramatic accompanied recitative she bewails her betrayal, then in an aria ('Ombre pallide') invokes the spirits from whom proceed her powers. This is Handel's operatic genius working at the top of its bent – richly melodious writing, grateful to the singer and expressive of the dramatic situation.

Act III. Morgana with some difficulty persuades Oronte to forgive her fickleness. Alcina makes a last desperate attempt to hold Ruggiero, but without success, and he sings a triumphant aria ('Stà nell'Ircana pietrosa tana'). Bradamante rejoices at the happy outcome of her efforts. Alcina for her part realises the futility of her love for Ruggiero and in downcast mood sings 'Mi restano le lagrime', whose tender cast of melody seems to suggest unexpected depths in the sorceress.

An invisible chorus foretells that the marriage of Ruggiero and Bradamante will found a great family. The unfortunate Oberto, still pleading with Alcina for the release of his father, is ordered by her to kill a lion, but he realises just in time that it is in fact his father, transformed by Alcina.

Alcina tries once more to part Ruggiero and Bradamante (a beautiful and expressive trio: 'Non è amor, nè gelosia') and once more fails. Ruggiero now smashes the urn in which rest all Alcina's magical gifts, and immediately all the knights, including Oberto's father, are restored to human shape. All ends happily in a lively chorus and dance, once familiar to British ears by its inclusion in the ballet 'The Gods go a-begging'.
H.

GIUSTINO

Opera in three acts, libretto based on a three-act version of Nicolò Beregan's libretto for Giovanni Legrenzi (1683), originally made for Antonio Vivaldi (1724). First performance Covent Garden Theatre, 16 February 1737, with Domenico Annibali, Anna Maria Strada del Po, Gioacchino Conti, William Savage. Revived Brunswick, 1741, in a version by G.C. Schurmann. Not performed again until 1963 at Abingdon. U.S. première San Francisco, 1989. Göttingen Handel Festival, 1994, in an edition by Nicholas McGegan, who also conducted, with Michael Chance, Dorothea Roschmann and Dawn Kotoski.

Giustino, a ploughboy.....Alto
Arianna, betrothed to Anastasio.....Soprano
Anastasio, emperor of Byzantium.....Soprano
Fortune, goddess.....Soprano
Polidarte, confederate of Vitaliano.....Bass
Leocasta, Anastasio's sister.....Soprano
Vitaliano, a tyrant of Asia Minor.....Tenor
Amanzio, Anastasio's general.....Contralto
Voice from WithinBass
Knights, Ladies, Guards, People, Spirits of Fortune

Time: Sixth Century A.D.

Place: Byzantine Empire

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

¹ Handel gave the aria to Alcina in the brief revival of November 1736, when his Morgana, Rosa Negri, was a mezzo of limited voice and capacity.

Giustino's spectacular series of plot reversals and elaborate changes of scene reflect Handel's need to compete with his commercial and artistic rivals, the Opera of the Nobility. The composer ensures, however, that they are organic to the work by giving a central, emblematic role to Fortune. Her influence and the motion of her wheel are mirrored in the music's impetuous flow at several points, from the overture onwards. The political lesson Giustino teaches – that merit is found outside the inner circle of the court – would have had a particular contemporary resonance for the Hanoverian kings. They would particularly have liked the allusions to the age of gold that both begin and end Giustino. That may explain why no less than three numbers in Act I recall Arne's setting of 'Rule Britannia'.

Act I. A majestic hall decorated for the coronation of Anastasio as Emperor of Byzantium. Arianna, widow of the previous emperor, crowns him with the imperial laurel wreath, as the congregation salute him. Amanzio warns the emperor that Vitaliano advances on Byzantium. The enemy's emissary Polidarte brings his master's terms: Anastasio can enjoy peace, as long as he surrenders and allows Vitaliano to have Arianna. Anastasio rejects the offer and goes to lead the attack, strengthened, as he tells Arianna, by her love. She decides to follow her beloved, using the charms that she has learnt from him ('Da tuoi begli occhi imparà').

In the countryside, leaning on his plough, Giustino considers the role Fortune plays in men's affairs, how nobility and courage are her gifts. Sleep overpowers him. The goddess of Fortune appears and invites Giustino to find success on the battlefield ('Corri, vola, a' tuoi Trofei'). He saves Leocasta, the emperor's sister, from a bear and she is so impressed that she invites him to accompany her to court.

Arianna commands Amanzio to lead her to her husband. Amanzio has his own agenda, however, and will employ deceit as a means to power.

Arianna has been taken hostage by Vitaliano. Anastasio appoints Giustino to rescue her. Giustino swears fidelity in a spectacular aria with trumpet obbligato ('Allor ch'io forte avro').

A vast plain below Byzantium. Vitaliano urges his troops to take the city. When his prisoner Arianna dares to reject him, he threatens to punish her. He orders Polidarte to expose Arianna to a monster's murderous appetite. Undaunted in her constancy, she regrets only that her beloved will not hear her last farewell ('Mio dolce amato Sposo').

Act II. Having been shipwrecked, Anastasio is inspired by Giustino's courage and they take shelter nearby. While Arianna is chained to a rock to await the monster, Polidarte tells her that beauty so disdainful deserves to be condemned, not admired or pitied. A terrible monster makes for the rock. Arianna cries for help and the echoes reach Giustino, who kills the monster. Arianna and Anastasio celebrate their happy reunion (duet, 'Mio bel tesoro!'). Amanzio brings a boat in which they embark, welcomed by sailors who wish them a calm sea.

Leocasta has fallen in love with Giustino. Vitaliano has been defeated. Anastasio celebrates his victory, as his brows are crowned with laurels ('Verdi Lauri, cingetemi il crine'). He also congratulates Giustino, who looks forward to still greater triumphs in the Emperor's service. When Vitaliano is brought before Arianna in chains he declares that he loves her. She consigns him to the tower, confident that his love has been vanquished by her contempt, as a torrent is swallowed by the sea ('Quel Torrente che s'inalza').

Act III. Vitaliano escapes and looks forward to revenge. Amanzio disturbs Anastasio by suggesting that he has lavished too much honour on that ploughboy Giustino. Anastasio accepts Amanzio's present of a jewelled sash (taken from Vitaliano) and asks him to keep an eye on Giustino. Against his will, the Emperor begins to doubt his wife's fidelity.

As Arianna rewards Giustino with the same jewelled sash that Anastasio gave her, Amanzio watches suspiciously. Giustino reflects that, like a breeze playing over a field, suspicion can reach the heart's recess ('Zeffiretto, che scorre nel prato').

Hearing that Arianna gave Giustino the jewelled sash, Anastasio assumes they have betrayed him and condemns Giustino to death. He refuses to listen to his wife and tries to frighten her with an outburst of anger. Arianna is overwhelmed with grief but refuses to display her feelings ('Il mio cor già più non sa'). Leocasta resolves to save Giustino. Amanzio congratulates himself on the success of his ambitious plans: soon the whole world will applaud him.

Thanks to Leocasta, Giustino has escaped. Exhausted, he falls asleep. Vitaliano is about to kill him, when the mountain opens to reveal the tomb of his father. A voice from within warns Vitaliano not to kill Giustino, his brother, who will both save his life and bring him power. Vitaliano wakes Giustino and tells him they are brothers. They agree to avenge Anastasio and punish Amanzio.

A delicious landscape with a structure representing the Temple of Fame and a throne. While Anastasio, Arianna and Leocasta are in chains Amanzio enjoys wearing the victor's laurels ('Or che cinto ho il crin d'alloro'). They hear the crowd saluting Giustino who orders Amanzio's execution. He then reunites Anastasio with Arianna, who declares her unchanging love for her husband ('Ti rendo questo cor'). At Giustino's behest the emperor forgives Vitaliano, who swears allegiance to him. Anastasio appoints Giustino his successor as Caesar and joins him in marriage to Leocasta. Everyone celebrates the new reign of peace.

'Few of his operas display such a remarkable catholicity of style, and the various troughs of doodling and banality typical of an overburdened invention such as Handel's during this period are counterbalanced by the untiring range of his resources.'¹ The constellation of characters in Giustino sets up some unexpected juxtapositions: in comparison with the dogged, Boy's Own heroics of Giustino himself, Anastasio's waverings look pointedly erratic, and his easily aroused jealousy is of a piece with his inconsistency. Handel refuses to set the straightforwardly heroic words of his aria 'Non si vanti un'alma audace' heroically: instead, the melting music breathes vulnerability and sensibility. On the other hand, Anastasio's character gains a third dimension when he gives in to an access of jealousy, because Handel ensures that the emotion is made real, even tragic, in the music for his aria 'O fiero e rio sospetto'. The opera pivots on a central contrast between pastoral innocence and courtly intrigue (Giustino and Leocasta's straightforwardness as against Amanzio's and Vitaliano's deviousness), followed through into the orchestration, with its rich writing for a consort of 'rural' recorders set against splendid parts for the brass section. Giustino's instrumentation is one of its glories and shows how Handel relished having a good, even virtuoso oboist in his orchestra.

P.

BERENICE, REGINA D'EGITTO

Berenice, Queen of Egypt

Opera in three acts, libretto adapted from Antonio Salvi's libretto (1709). Alternative title: Le gare di politica e d'amor (The Quarrels between Love and Politics). First performance at Covent Garden, 18 May 1737, with Anna Strada del Po as Berenice, Francesca Bertolli as Selene, Gioachino Conti as Alessandro, Domenico Annibali, Maria Caterina Negri, John Beard and Thomas Reinhold. It was probably revived in Brunswick in 1743 and then not heard until Keele University staged it in April 1985 (Handel's tercentenary), conducted by George Pratt. Cambridge Handel Opera Group, 1993.

Berenice, *Queen of Egypt*Soprano
Selene, *her sister, Demetrio's lover*Alto
Alessandro, *a Roman prince*Soprano
Demetrio, *a Macedonian, Selene's lover*Alto
Arsace, *an Egyptian, in love with Selene*Alto
Fabio, *envoy from Rome*Tenor
Aristobolo, *court councillor*Bass

Place: Egypt

Time: c.81 B.C.

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

Act I. Berenice loves Demetrio, who is allied with Egypt's enemy, King Mitridate, but she is ready to allow politics to govern her heart: for the sake of an alliance with Rome, she will marry a Roman. Fabio, the Roman envoy, introduces the man Rome has chosen as her husband, Alessandro. He falls in love with Berenice as soon as he sees her. She, however, now refuses to have her choice made for her. Fabio reminds the love-struck Alessandro that if Berenice refuses him, he must marry her sister Selene. He suggests that Alessandro follow the example of the bee, which never stops long at one blossom.

In Princess Selene's royal chambers. Demetrio and Selene are secretly in love. Selene knows that her sister the Queen would be furious if she found out, and urges him to leave. He suggests that his friend Mitridate would help Selene depose her sister. He leaves and Selene learns from Aristobolo that Rome now insists on Berenice's marrying Alessandro; Demetrio is to be executed. The news shocks Selene. Berenice comes to tell Selene that she must marry 'a royal prince'. When she hears this means Arsace Selene is bitterly disappointed. Berenice deliberately misinterprets her burning cheeks as evidence of love. Arsace imagines that his love for Selene now has some hope of success.

¹ Jonathan Keates, Handel: the Man and his Music, London, 1985.

A hall in the palace. Alessandro saves Demetrio's life, which makes Berenice look at him with new eyes. But he rejects her gratitude: he seeks only the merit of honour. Berenice promises Demetrio that she will stand by him: his enemies shall be her enemies (duet 'Se il mio amor').

Act II. In the Queen's chambers. Without his beloved Selene Demetrio pines and has lost his taste for power. He is appalled when he hears Fabio announce that Rome now wishes Alessandro to marry Selene. Berenice refuses the request, saying that Selene is already engaged to marry Arsace. Fabio presents her with a simple alternative, war or peace. Demetrio remains undaunted by the prospect of war, which pleases Berenice, who loves to see him angry. Alone, Demetrio presumes that Selene has betrayed him by agreeing to marry Arsace. In revenge, he'll conspire with Mitridate, and even with the furies from Hell, against Egypt ('Su, Megera, Tisifone, Aletto!').

Alessandro dreams of worshipping his goddess Berenice. He hears Aristobolo instructing Arsace to give up Selene to Alessandro, to keep peace with Rome. Alessandro refuses to marry without love and is therefore happy to yield Selene to Arsace. Aristobolo persuades Arsace that he must give up Selene. Arsace weighs up the conflicting demands of love and glory and agrees doubtfully. As Aristobolo points out, without politics the world would be a more honest place.

In Selene's apartments. Jealousy drives Demetrio to accuse Selene of infidelity, threaten to kill his rival Arsace and admit he pretended to love Berenice. Berenice overhears this and erupts in fury against Demetrio's treachery. Vindictively, the Queen forces Selene to give her hand to Arsace. Arsace, however, insists on sacrificing his own happiness for Egypt's sake, and therefore offers Selene to Alessandro. He in turn refuses Selene, because she does not love him. Infuriated, Berenice sends Demetrio to the tower. At last, he declares himself: he will always love Selene, even in prison ('Si, tra i ceppi'). Selene rejects Arsace, on the grounds that he has proved himself unworthy of her.

Act III. Berenice hears Demetrio confirm that he is ready to die for Selene. Rome is losing patience with Egypt. Berenice entrusts Fabio with her royal signet ring: he shall decide whom she is to marry; that man will bring the ring back to her. Alone, she reflects that the caprices of that blind deity, love, are incomprehensible ('Chi t'intende?').

The royal garden. When Arsace pays court to Selene again, she promises to marry him, as long as he frees Demetrio. Alessandro brings Arsace the royal ring: since it came from Fabio, and not from Berenice herself, Alessandro naturally refuses to take advantage of it. Arsace accepts it and promises to let the Queen know this is how Alessandro feels. When Fabio returns to lead Alessandro to his wedding he is horrified to discover that the Roman still insists on letting Berenice choose her husband for herself. Alessandro explains that Cupid has placed his fate in the Queen's hands.

Berenice determines to punish Demetrio for his double treachery and commands Aristobolo to bring his head to her in the temple. She orders herself not to weep ('Avvertite, mie pupille').

Berenice consigns Demetrio to the goddess Isis and to her ministers. Selene begs for his life and then asks to join him in death. Arsace intervenes to offer his own life and return Berenice her ring. Alessandro explains that he gave it to Arsace, as he wishes Berenice, rather than Rome, to choose him as her husband. Moved by Alessandro's noble gesture, she finds that she now loves him. In duet, they celebrate their mutual love. When Berenice lets Alessandro decide Demetrio's fate, he spares his life. Arsace then allows Demetrio to marry Selene and they all join in celebrating an end to the quarrels between love and politics.

Handel's distinctively thin orchestration for Berenice may reflect the economic pressure on a composer who persisted in presenting Italian opera to a London public that, by 1737, had largely lost its taste for the genre. Handel's use of his resources is as inventive as ever, while the opera itself shows no sign of fatigue. It explores a world dominated by Realpolitik with playful objectivity. This is the real world, it seems to say, pompously coloured by splendid Sinfonias, but seething with vicious, internecine intrigue, occasionally illuminated by altruism. Perhaps this is why the distinguished Handelian Curtis Price recently called it 'a rather seedy opera', when it is one of Handel's most graceful.¹

¹ Opera, July 1985.

One of the strengths of Berenice is its richness of characterisation. Not all are complex: Alessandro never wavers in his sentimental, even Romantic, high-principled devotion to his goddess Berenice; Selene the survivor seems to waver fecklessly but merely displays an engaging resourcefulness. Handel's wide sympathies even embrace a Polonius-like courtier, Aristobolo, whose repellent precepts buzz appropriately as they meander, in 'Vedi l'ape'. The soprano-alto duet that ends Act I, 'Se il mio amor', presents a public statement of solidarity, built on an exuberant march rhythm that breathes the determined optimism of those over-long, flash-lit public handshakes that end summits. The harmony between Berenice and Demetrio lasts as long as the act-break. Yet Handel also gives Demetrio an aria whose seriousness reminds one how near are Handel's late oratorios: 'No, che soffrir non può' is matched only by Selene's aria 'Tortorella che rimira', which suggests how well suited they are. Demetrio's later arioso 'Se non ho l'idol mio', his accompagnato 'Selene, infedele' and magnificent aria 'Su, Megera, Tisifone, Aletto!' show a consistent depth of feeling. Handel draws a three-dimensional portrait of the eponymous Queen, wayward as the violin line in her first aria, surrounded by yes-men, longing for someone to stand up to her, but desperately hurt and almost inarticulate with rage when her lover betrays her. In her ruminative address to the god of love 'Chi t'intende', a virtuoso oboe obbligato, the frequent changes of tempo and four-part string harmony speak for the complexity of her feelings. All in all, Berenice deserves to be heard more often.

P.

SERSE

Xerxes

Opera in three acts, libretto by Nicola Minato and Silvio Stampiglia. Première 26 April 1738, with Caffarelli as Serse, La Francesina (Elisabeth Duparc) as Romilda, Maria Antonia Merighi (Amastre), Maria Antonia Marchesini (Arsamene), Margherita Chimenti (Atalanta), Antonio Montagnana (Ariodate). There were only five performances and the opera waited until 1924 before it was revived at Göttingen, the fifth in the series of Handel resuscitations by Oskar Hagen; a tenor, Gunnar Graarud, sang Serse (he was later a Bayreuth Tristan), another tenor, Georg S. Walter, was Arsamene, Thyra Hagen-Leisner sang Romilda, Marie Schultz-Dornburg Amastris and Emmy von Hettin Atalanta. The opera has been frequently revived since, notably by the Barber Institute, Birmingham, with Alexander Young, Heather Harper, Helen Watts, conductor Anthony Lewis, 1959; 1985 for the Handel Tercentenary by English National Opera, London, with Valerie Masterson, Lesley Garrett, Jean Rigby, Ann Murray, Christopher Robson, conductor Mackerras, producer Nicholas Hytner.

Serse (Xerxes), the King.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Arsamene (Arsamenes), his brother....Mezzo-Soprano
 Amastre (Amastris), a foreign princess..... Mezzo-Soprano
 Ariodate, *Commander of the Army*Bass
 Romilda, his daughter.....Soprano
 Atalanta, her sister.....Soprano
 Elviro, *servant to Arsamene*Baritone

Place: Persia, King Serse's Court
Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

In 1737 Handel's London opera company, the Royal Academy of Music, collapsed, as did its rival, the Opera of the Nobility, even though the latter had the great castrato Farinelli under contract. Handel fell ill but his powers of recovery were great and, engaged in autumn 1737 by the impresario Heidegger, he had finished Faramondo by Christmas Eve and started Serse on Boxing Day! The libretto of Serse is an adaptation made by Stampiglia for Bononcini (whose opera of the same name had its première in 1694) from an original by Minato set by Cavalli for Venice in 1654. Anyone acquainted with Monteverdi's masterpiece L'Incoronazione di Poppea (or indeed one of Cavalli's operas) will know that in them serious, even tragic, scenes alternate with comedy and farce. Serse belongs in this category.

Handel's reaction, conscious or unconscious, to the success of such a ballad opera as The Beggar's Opera (1728) led him to write three comedies in his last four operas, moreover in a less formal style than hitherto, and it is strange that nonetheless the public should have rejected him as a composer of Italian opera to such a degree that Serse had only five performances in 1738 and was not revived in the composer's lifetime; indeed it remained unperformed for 190 years. Not so strange perhaps that, following the success of an oratorio season in 1735 and the triumph in 1738 of Saul, the composer abandoned Italian opera and embarked on a new line of dramatic works, sung in English, based on the chorus, employing solid but not flamboyant singers, and with it found something much more to the English taste than the 'exotic and irrational entertainment' as Dr

Johnson had, not wholly without reason, described the Italian opera, with its strict conventions, foreign language, singers of often bizarre appearance, and an audience understanding hardly a word.

Serse (Xerxes) is the ancestor of the Persian King Darius III, whom Alexander the Great spectacularly defeated in 331 B.C., but his invasion of Greece figures hardly at all in the opera, apart from a mention of the destruction of the bridge of boats across the Hellespont. Instead, it is his misfortunes in love with which Minato is concerned, that and the absolute authority wielded by a tyrant. Serse and his brother Arsamene are in love with the same girl, Romilda. Romilda loves Arsamene, and Serse in retaliation banishes him from his kingdom. Serse is already betrothed to Amastre, who is distressed by his infidelity but disguises herself in military uniform in order to be near him and regain his love. Atalanta, Romilda's sister, is also in love with Arsamene and tries to make certain that Romilda marries Serse in order that she may have Arsamene. Two other less than serious figures play their part in the story: the comic servant Elviro, ancestor of those to be found in later Italian opera; and the sisters' father, Ariodate, the bumbling commander of Serse's army, whose crass misunderstanding of the King's instructions leads to the opera's dénouement.

Act I. The overture, slow, then quick, and ending with a gigue, leads straight to one of the most famous tunes ever written. Once known as 'Handel's celebrated Largo', this Victorian sanctification does less than justice to a glorious tune (itself apparently developed from Bononcini's setting of 1694) in which Serse whimsically apostrophises the beauties of a tree in his garden in a tune of chaste simplicity and total memorability. It has been noted that Handel marks it larghetto and not largo at all.

Arsamene and the always grumbling Elviro arrive in time to hear the sinfonia which heralds the off-stage singing of Arsamene's beloved Romilda, who sings charmingly of love's victims, and not least of Serse, who now appears to listen to and be enraptured by her singing. Romilda's second aria ('Va godendo vezzoso e bello') has two flutes in the accompaniment.

Arsamene shall be the ambassador to declare his brother's new love, orders Serse, in a charming song, whose melody is taken up in a second verse with precisely opposite sentiments by Arsamene, declaring his confidence in Romilda's love for him. Arsamene alerts Romilda to Serse's intentions, a turn of events which intrigues Atalanta (arietta). Serse's advances to Romilda are rejected, whereupon, finding Arsamene false to his charge, Serse banishes him from his kingdom. Arsamene laments the new situation in a beautiful aria, and the lovelorn Serse addresses Romilda in music only slightly less serious in tone, but to no avail. In an aria of touching simplicity, Romilda asserts that she is proof against temptation.

It is the turn of Serse's spurned betrothed, the foreign Princess Amastre, to take the stage in an aria of resolute character as befits the military disguise she has adopted, and she observes Serse congratulate his victorious general Ariodate whose daughter Romilda he promises shall marry a member of the Royal Family. Ariodate's simplistic philosophy is never to question, and he puts it forward in an aria of some complacency. Serse celebrates the strength of his new love in an extended da capo aria.

Elviro is entrusted by Arsamene with a letter for Romilda, an assignment he accepts with an easy show of confidence, leaving his master to lament his fate in a touching larghetto aria. Amastre for her part takes a more robust view of her situation, vowing vengeance on her false betrothed.

Confronting Romilda, Atalanta refers to the King as 'your Serse', but Romilda refuses to listen to insinuations that Arsamene may be false to her. Atalanta alone has temporarily the last word as she brings the act to a close with an extended and convincing exposition of her soubrette philosophy which amounts to a belief that all's fair in love as in war.

Act II. Elviro, disguised as a flower-seller and singing snatches of street cries, is on his way to deliver Arsamene's letter to Romilda, but pauses to tell Amastre about Serse's passion for Romilda. Amastre inveighs against her false lover, and Elviro is easily persuaded to deliver Arsamene's letter to Atalanta who promises to give it to Romilda. The plot thickens when, encountering the lovesick Serse, Atalanta gives him the letter, pretending it was written to her and that Arsamene is only feigning to love Romilda, which, she assures the King in a charming aria, Arsamene will persist in denying.

Serse seizes his chance and shows the letter to Romilda, who seems to believe it was written to Atalanta but persists in rejecting the advances of the monarch. He reacts with considerable passion in a grand da capo aria ('Se bramate d'amar'), which is as full of pain as of spleen. Romilda alone gives way melodiously to jealousy, but Amastre takes her case even harder and only Elviro's intervention prevents her suicide. Elviro tells the unfortunate Arsamene what he has heard from Atalanta, namely that Romilda has yielded to the importunity of Serse.

Serse comes with Ariodate to inspect the famous bridge but Arsamene, still suffering the shock of love betrayed, continues his lamentations, until discovered by Serse, who proclaims his intention not only to pardon his brother but to unite him with the woman he now knows he loves: none other than Atalanta! Arsamene, in spite of disappointment, seems to take heart from the new situation, and continues to express confidence not only in his love for Romilda but in the belief that it is requited. Atalanta will have none of the advice offered by Serse on hearing this, that she should forget Arsamene, but Serse half convinces himself to take comfort from the precarious position of the lover who does not know whether to hope or despair.

Elviro witnesses the storm which causes the bridge of boats to collapse. Serse, overheard by Amastre, in duet bemoans the sting of jealousy, Serse sighing for Romilda, Amastre for Serse, a dramatic situation both complex and full of irony. Amastre unobserved watches Serse attempt yet again to seduce Romilda but Romilda stands firm and when Amastre in soldierly guise takes her side, the guard on Serse's orders intervenes. Only Romilda's standing with the King induces them to withdraw, and Amastre leaves Romilda to finish the act with a splendid celebration of the steadfast quality of her love for Arsamene.

Act III. Romilda and Arsamene finally force Atalanta to admit her devious scheming, but she buoyantly looks to the future and a new lover. Serse takes advantage of Romilda's presumption in freeing what he thinks of as the young soldier and Romilda goes so far as to agree to marry him if her father consents. Serse rejoices in a da capo aria of confident elegance, but Arsamene turns angrily on Romilda. She goes off, as she says, to death, leaving Arsamene to bemoan his solitary fate in music of true poignancy.

Serse, in terms which turn out to be too oblique by half, tells Ariodate that his daughter shall soon be affianced to one equal in rank to the King himself. Ariodate assumes Serse must mean his brother Arsamene, and rejoices at the honour. Serse for his part attempts to press his advantage with Romilda, but she confesses that Arsamene once loved her and contrives to make him doubt her virtue. His immediate reaction is to order the guards to kill Arsamene and Romilda in despair seeks help from her supposed champion, Amastre, who gives her a letter for the King.

Arsamene and Romilda return to indulge in lovers' quarrelling, their duet a charming expression of misunderstanding, and they go off in opposite directions, only to return, still arguing to the same tune, to interrupt the ceremony which Ariodate is preparing and which promises, when once they grasp its full import, to become their wedding. Serse arrives in time to hear that Ariodate's bungling misunderstanding of his instructions has resulted in his beloved Romilda marrying Arsamene. Only the disconcerting arrival of Amastre's letter turns his fury away from Ariodate and towards his own frustration, which he vents in a magnificent virtuoso aria ('Crude furie'). It remains for Amastre to reappear, offer Serse her love and prepare for an ending apparently happy for all except Atalanta. H.

SEMELE

Opera in three acts, libretto by William Congreve. The music was written between 3 June and 4 July 1743, but the work was not performed (and then in oratorio form) until 10 February 1744, when it was put on at Covent Garden with the French soprano Elisabeth Duparc (better known as La Francesina) as Semele and John Beard as Jupiter. Six performances in this and the following season, always in oratorio form, preceded a century and a half of neglect, until in 1925 the work was first performed on the stage, at Cambridge, in a version prepared by Dennis Arundell. First stage performance in U.S.A. at Northwestern University, Evanston, 1959. First London stage performance, Sadler's Wells by Handel Opera Society, 1959, with Heather Harper, Monica Sinclair, John Mitchinson, Owen Brannigan, conductor Charles Farncombe; Caramoor Festival, New York, 1969, with Beverly Sills, Elaine Bonazzi, Leopold Simoneau, conductor Julius Rudel; Sadler's Wells, 1970, with Lois McDonall, Alexander Young, conductor Charles Mackerras; Covent Garden, 1982, with Valerie Masterson, Robert Tear, Gwynne Howell, conductor Charles Mackerras.

Jupiter, King of the Gods Tenor
Juno, his wife Contralto
Iris, her messenger Soprano
Cadmus, King of Thebes Bass
Semele, his daughter Soprano
Ino, his other daughter Contralto

Athamas, a Prince of Boeotia.....Alto
 Somnus, God of sleep.....Bass
 Apollo.....Tenor
 Cupid.....Soprano
 Chief priest of Juno.....Bass
 Priests and Augurs, Zephyrs, Nymphs and Swains, Attendants

Running Time: 3 hours

The Novello vocal score (about 1878) of Handel's Semele carries the following introduction: 'The libretto was originally written as an opera-book by Congreve but, being found unsuitable for the stage, was converted by some slight alteration into an Oratorio.' What the unsuitability was and why stage performances in England had exclusively been given by amateurs until the summer of 1959 – the bicentenary year of Handel's death – remain a matter of very considerable mystery. To decide which is the best of Handel's mature operatic works involves recourse to individual preference, but the music of Semele is so full of variety, the recitative so expressive, the orchestration so inventive, the characterisation so apt, the general level of invention so high, the action so full of credible situation and incident – in a word, the piece as a whole is so suited to the operatic stage – that one can only suppose its neglect to have been due to an act of abnegation on the part of opera companies, unless of course it is caused by sheer ignorance.

Act I. There is an Overture, maestoso followed by an allegro of no less consequence. A stately gavotte sets the scene – the Temple of Juno at Thebes, where religious ceremonies are in progress. Semele, the daughter of King Cadmus, is betrothed to Athamas, Prince of neighbouring Boeotia, but is secretly in love with Jupiter, who has appeared to her in disguise. The priest proclaims the acceptance by Juno of a sacrifice, and the assembled people rejoice. Her father and her fiancé ask Semele to delay the wedding ceremony no longer, and she begs the deity to help her in her predicament.

In a scene, which could in performance be omitted, Semele describes her mournful state and Athamas urges his love for her. Ino is afraid Semele will yield to Athamas' pleas, and seems about to admit her own passion for Athamas; Semele urges her to tell all her thoughts. Cadmus admonishes Ino ('Why dost thou thus untimely grieve?'), and her comments on the situation, together with those of Semele and Athamas, turn what seems to begin as a bass aria into a magnificent quartet. The fire on the altar dies down and this sign of godly displeasure is received with dismay by the populace. Once more the flames rise, but when they die down again, it is clear that it is Jupiter's displeasure they have incurred. The people are alarmed and rush out of the temple. There is a scene for Ino and Athamas, by the end of which the latter has understood Ino's love for him. Cadmus returns with his followers, and tells of having seen Semele snatched aloft by an eagle. The priests hail Cadmus and tell him that Jove's favour has lit on his family, an explanation of events which brooks no contradiction, as Semele from a cloud appears to reassure them in a beautiful aria: 'Endless pleasure, endless love Semele enjoys above'.

Act II. A purposeful sinfonia leads to a scene where Juno inveighs against Semele and vows vengeance. Iris tells her of the protective obstacles with which Jupiter has surrounded his new favourite; they include two fierce dragons. In a vigorous aria full of resolution ('Hence, hence, Iris hence away') Juno tells her attendant they will together persuade Somnus, the God of sleep, to 'seal with sleep the wakeful dragons' eyes'.

Semele is asleep in her palace, surrounded by Loves and Zephyrs. Cupid sings an aria ('Come, Zephyrs, come while Cupid sings') which is omitted from older vocal scores, as in the arrangement of Congreve's libretto the character of Cupid was cut out altogether – in fact Handel used the first half of the aria in Hercules as 'How blest the maid!'

Semele wakes and sings one of the most famous of Handel's inspirations, 'Oh sleep, why dost thou leave me?', an air of chaste and immaculate beauty, much admired away from the opera but doubly effective in context. Jupiter comes to her side and lyrically reassures her of his love. Pressed to say whether she has any wish Jupiter may gratify, Semele refers to the fact that she is mortal and he a god, and Jupiter, alarmed at the way her thoughts are inclining, hastens to provide distraction: 'I must with speed amuse her'. He announces his intention of bringing Ino to provide company for Semele, in an Arcadian setting to which he will transport them. If his serene aria ('Where'er you walk'¹) is any indication of the bliss that should obtain there, the sisters' lot will indeed be a fortunate one.

¹ Words by Alexander Pope.

Ino understands that she has come at Jove's express command to a hallowed spot, and together she and Semele sing 'Prepare, then, ye immortal choir', leaving the final comment to the chorus: 'Bless the glad earth with heavenly lays'.

Act III. Rocking quavers introduce the Cave of Sleep where Somnus lies in slumber. Music that is suddenly energetic accompanies the entrance of Juno and Iris, intent on enlisting Somnus' help to remove the barricade Jupiter has set up around Semele. Somnus' slow aria, 'Leave me, loathsome light' – perfect characterisation and a wonderfully beautiful piece of music – ends with the evocative line 'Oh murmur me again to peace'. Juno knows how to rouse him – at the mention of Pasithea's name he springs to life: 'More sweet is that name than a soft purling stream'. Juno gives her orders: Jupiter is to be distracted by dreams of Semele, the dragons are to be soothed by Somnus' leaden rod, and Ino must sleep so that Juno may appear to Semele in her guise. In a duet ('Obey my will') the amorous Somnus, in return for the promise of Pasithea, agrees to all her demands.

Juno disguised as Ino appears to Semele, comments on her beauty and asks if this is a sign that Jupiter has already made her immortal. She holds up a magic mirror and Semele is overcome with admiration of herself. Her bravura aria ('Myself I shall adore'), with its echo effects, shows how miraculously Handel could transform a frivolous idea into music of surpassing grace and loveliness. Juno, still in Ino's shape, urges her to refuse her favours to Jupiter until he promises her immortality and himself appears, not as mortal, but in his own godly shape – Juno knows that at sight of the god, Semele will be destroyed. Juno retires as Jupiter approaches.

Jupiter tells Semele that he has had a dream in which she repulsed him, but in spite of the ardour of his aria ('Come to my arms, my lovely fair') she keeps to her resolve: 'I ever am granting, you always complain'. Jupiter solemnly swears to grant her desire, whatever it may be, and immediately Semele asks him to appear in all his godly splendour. Jupiter cannot conceal his consternation, which shows in agitated ornamentation, but Semele, in coloratura which is no less emphatic, insists: 'No, no, I'll take no less'. In a moving recitative, Jupiter, alone, laments his oath and its inevitable consequence. Juno celebrates her forthcoming triumph ('Above measure is the pleasure'). What the libretto describes as 'a mournful symphony' accompanies Jupiter as he appears to Semele, who realises too late that the vision will scorch her to death. She dies.

At Cadmus' court, the people comment on the story they have heard Ino tell of Semele's love and death. Ino reveals that it has been prophesied she shall marry Athamas. A sinfonia heralds the appearance on a cloud of Apollo, who announces that a phoenix will arise from Semele's ashes, and the people rejoice. H.

JOSEPH HAYDN

(born 31 March 1732, died 31 May 1809)

As Kapellmeister at the court of Prince Nicholas Esterházy, Haydn conducted (and rearranged ad lib) roughly a different opera every week, including Italian operas by the leading composers of the day. Not content with repeating a formula, when he composed opera himself he made several important innovations. In particular, he wrote more interestingly for the orchestra than was normal. Nearly all his works are comic; his opera seria L'isola disabitata was given few performances after its première in 1779. After pioneering work by Glyndebourne, Garsington Festival near Oxford has led the way in stimulating interest in Haydn's operas, staging them in a setting that usefully recalls the court ambience for which he composed them. As soon as they are heard (and, of course, preferably seen) they tend to convert their audiences into admirers. Perhaps the only thing that stands in the way of their wider appreciation is their long stretches of dry recitative. The most prominent feature of Haydn's operas may seem the weakest: their charm which, in a sympathetic performance, is as difficult to resist as it is to analyse.

L'INFEDELTÀ DELUSA

Infidelity Prevented

Burletta per musica in two acts, libretto adapted (probably by Carl Friberth, the first Filippo) from a libretto by Marco Coltellini (1773). First performed at Eszterháza, 26 July 1773, to celebrate the name-day of Prince Nicholas Eszterházy's sister, the Dowager Princess Maria Anna Louise. Revived 1773 to celebrate the Empress Maria Theresa's visit. First British performance by the Haydn Opera Society, in concert, Royal Festival Hall, 1960; revived at St Pancras Town Hall, 1964, and at Garsington in 1993 with Philip Doghan, Paul HARRY, David Mattinson, Claire Daniels and Patricia Rozario, conducted by Wasfi Kani.

Vespina, Nanni's sister, in love with Nencio.....Soprano
 Sandrina, *in love with Nanni*Soprano
 Filippo, *her father, a farmer*Tenor
 Nencio, *a rich farmer, in love with Sandrina*Tenor
 Nanni, a young farmer, in love with Sandrina.....Bass

Place: The Italian Countryside

Time: 1700

Running Time: 2 hours

Act I. Filippo, Vespina, Nencio and Nanni enjoy the evening breeze that relieves the day's heat, hoping it will grant them their wishes ('Bella sera'). Like the overture, this ensemble is on a large scale (over ten minutes) and was the most important addition Haydn made to the original libretto. H.C. Robbins Landon suggests it is there because Haydn 'considered that the traditional sequence of aria after aria was dull; [it] establishes right from the outset that this is not a conventional Italian opera.'¹ It has an emblematic function, initiating various patterns of behaviour (obedience and rebellion; order and disorder; hope and reality) that will be enacted in the rest of the work. Sandrina seems prepared to do what her father decides, which is that Nencio shall be her husband rather than Sandrina's choice, Nanni, who is poor. She offers to marry Nencio if she can still love Nanni, but such behaviour is unacceptable in the country, though common in town. In an aria combining elegance and authority, Filippo insists, but Sandrina cannot quite forget Nanni. After courting her for three years, Nanni for his part feels cheated and swears that either he or Filippo must die. His aria covers a surprising amount of emotional and vocal ground, but ends in reassuringly farcical patter and horn fanfares.

As she washes the salad in Nanni's kitchen, Vespina muses on her experience of love: so far, she has felt its sting but not tasted any honey. Nanni tells her that he has lost Sandrina to Nencio and they swear revenge.

Nencio serenades Sandrina, a lilting rhythm and pizzicato strings standing in for the guitar he holds. Vespina and Sandrina overhear Nencio threaten, if necessary, to abduct Sandrina. Vespina emerges and slaps him, thus occasioning the lively finale, which opposes Vespina and Nanni against everyone else.

Act II. Disguised as an old woman, Vespina pretends to Filippo that Nencio seduced and married her daughter in secret and had three children by her. She also claims to be suffering from several illnesses, and her aria limps and coughs in sympathy. Sandrina sees it is better to stay poor, and Filippo tells Nencio that he clearly cannot marry Sandrina. Vespina, now disguised as a drunken German servant, forces wine on Nencio and lets him know Sandrina is going to marry his master, a Marquis. Vespina returns, dressed as the Marquis in question and explaining that he means to trick Filippo: Sandrina will in fact marry his servant. Nencio agrees to witness the marriage and looks forward to seeing Filippo foam at the mouth in fury. Meanwhile Vespina has no time to tell Nanni what is going on. Haydn enriches the hunting metaphor in this splendid aria with bird-like melismas for the soprano imitating her prey, tiptoeing strings and horn flourishes.

Filippo is delighted Sandrina will marry a Marquis. All Sandrina herself wants is bread, onions and her Nanni; peace, rather than luxurious pomp, as she explains in a surprising (but aptly) grand, expansive aria, distinguished by its richly decorated vocal line. Vespina has now dressed up as a notary public (anticipating Despina in Così), while Nanni pretends to be the Marquis's servant, there to act as proxy bridegroom. The notary's dry, pedantic delivery of the date (1700) launches the ceremony and a particularly delicious finale, which is undercut by chuckling string figures and includes an unexpected solo for timpani ('Nel mille settecento'). Its relentless rhythm makes the explosive revelations still more funny: once the ceremony is complete, Vespina and Nanni reveal themselves. Filippo and Nenci are furious, but reconciliation is not long delayed. They agree that what's done cannot be undone (kettle-drums emphasise the point). A double wedding follows for Sandrina and Nenni, Vespina and Nencio.

¹ 'L'Infedeltà Delusa in context', Garsington Festival programme, 1993.

The way Haydn's Infedeltà delusa pre-echoes Mozart's operas is intriguing. It is known that Mozart copied out sections of Haydn's Armida and he may well have known other works. Mozart frequently referred to Haydn as his teacher and dedicated six quartets to him. In particular, he praised him for his ability to move people and make them laugh – the aptest criticism of this opera.

P.

L'INCONTRO IMPROVVISO

The Unexpected Encounter

Dramma giocoso per musica in three acts, libretto by Carl Friberth after L.H. Dancourt's libretto for Gluck, La Rencontre imprévue (1764), first performed in Eszterháza on 29 August 1775. Revived, broadcast in Russian, on Leningrad radio, 1956; performed Moscow, 1962. First U.K. performance, St Pancras Town Hall, 23 March 1966, in a translation by Andrew Porter; revived Garsington, 1994, with Thomas Randle, Eirian Davies, Paul Nilon, Roger Bryson, conducted by Wasfi Kani.

Ali, Prince of Balsóra, in love with Rezia Tenor

Rezia, Princess of Persia, the Sultan's favourite Soprano

Balkis }
Dardane } Rezia's slaves and confidantes Sopranos

Osmin, Ali's slave Tenor

A Calender, supervisor of the caravan storehouse Bass

Three Calenders Basses

Sultan of Egypt Bass

An Officer Tenor

Slaves, Janissaries

Place: Cairo

Running Time: 2 hours 55 minutes

Haydn wrote L'incontro improvviso for the celebrations attendant on the visit of the Archduke and Archduchess to Eszterháza. The first performance was followed by a masked ball for 1,380 guests in the Chinese ballroom. Accounts for the lavish production survive and were reprinted in the Garsington programme, showing that most of the soloists' costumes incorporated tufts of heron's feathers.

Prince Ali of Balsóra has come to Cairo in pursuit of his beloved Rezia. She had eloped with Ali to avoid marriage to a man her father had chosen for her. Since the lovers were separated by pirates, she has become the Sultan's favourite in his harem.

Act I. In the storehouse. The Calender and his dervishes celebrate their secret hoard of gold, food and wine. As professional beggars, they accumulate money by pretending to be starving.

Ali's servant Osmin encounters the Calender, whose begging routine consists of a nonsense song. Osmin explains he has no money and the Calender invites him to join them as a fake Dervish.

Rezia learns that Ali has been seen in Cairo. Surprised by the intensity of her feelings, she prays that they will soon be reunited for ever. She tells her confidantes Balkis and Dardane, who are as delighted as she is. Their large-scale terzetto is, as Robbins Landon says, ravishing ('Mi sembra un sogno').

In despair, Ali prays that heaven will either give him his beloved back or let him die. He watches as Osmin and the Calenders arrive and rehearse a Turkish-sounding begging-song. Ali refuses to join this 'crowd of madmen', but Osmin explains that their astute 'madness' has practical benefits, as their kitchen and cellars prove. Balkis pretends to Ali that the Sultan's favourite (who, incidentally, resists his advances) has seen him from her window and fallen in love with him. Ali politely explains that he has sworn fidelity to another.

Osmin is enjoying a feast but he remembers to pack some food away for his master. The sound of trumpets and drums punctuates their toasts. Ali is offended when Osmin urges him to respond to such generosity, but he distracts himself by reading aloud from a book. Dardane pretends that she has fallen in love with Ali. When he rejects her politely, she explains that she was only pretending: it is her mistress who loves him. Rezia reveals that it was she who was testing his fidelity. She also reassures Ali that the Sultan is, in effect, her slave and promises to escape from the harem. Balkis determines to leave the harem as well and longs for freedom.

Osmin tells the Calender that he is going to escape with his master and Rezia, using the Sultan's money that she has accumulated. They celebrate with wine, while the Calender rebukes the Prophet, who forbade it. Osmin mentions they will escape at night.

At Rezia's request, Ali sings the song in praise of her eyes that he used to sing to her (duet, 'Son quest'occhi un stral d'Amore'). Suddenly Balkis and Dardane report that the Sultan has returned to the harem. They turn to Osmin for help and on his advice leave by the secret staircase.

Act III. Night. They have taken refuge in the Calender's storehouse. Osmin brings back a notice offering a large reward for Rezia's recapture. The Calender leaves and Rezia prays that her guiding star will be propitious. Guards surround the store. Osmin thinks up a solution: Ali must dress in a smock as a French painter, the ladies must dress as dervishes and he will pretend to be a camel-driver. The Calender brings in the guards and Ali sings a splendid song about some paintings of a banquet, musicians, a stream and a battle. The Officer lifts Ali's smock, however, and shows him the Sultan's warrant. They abandon their disguises and prepare to die, but the Officer has another surprise. The Sultan only feigned severity: he knows that Rezia is really a princess and Ali a prince. He reveals that the Calender's punishment for treachery is to be flayed alive and impaled. They promise to plead for him.

The Sultan unites the two lovers and Rezia salutes him as their beloved father. Everyone celebrates the end of sorrow and fear. When Rezia and Ali plead for the Calender, the Sultan commutes his sentence to banishment. He promises to cultivate integrity and the opera ends amid renewed rejoicing.

When Garsington revived L'incontro improvviso, Leonard Ingrams noted in the programme that 'Haydn ... lavished a prodigious quantity of inspired music on this alternately witty and feeble text.' Even H.C. Robbins Landon, who has done so much to awaken interest in Haydn's operas, has his doubts about the work, calling it 'not really a first-rate opera: it is too long, too diffuse and lacks the driving pace of its 1773 predecessor [L'infedeltà delusa]' P.

IL MONDO DELLA LUNA

The World of the Moon

Dramma giocoso in three acts, libretto by Carlo Goldoni. First performance at Eszterháza on 3 August 1777. First U.K. performance, Scala Theatre, London, 1951; first U.S. performance, Greenwich Mews Playhouse, 1949; revived Holland Festival and Aix-en-Provence, 1959, Camden Festival, 1960; Schleswig, 1984; Garsington, 1991, with Philip Dughan, Martin Nelson, Carol Smith and Riikka Hakola, conducted by Peter Ash.

Ecclitico, a false astrologer Tenor
 Ernesto, a cavalier Alto
 Buonafede, a protective father Baritone
 Clarice } his daughters Soprano
 Flaminia } Soprano
 Lisetta, his maidservant Contralto
 Cecco, Ernesto's servant Tenor

Pupils of Ecclitico, Gentlemen, Dancers, Pages, Servants, Soldiers

Place: Italy

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 55 minutes

The dramma giocoso Il Mondo della luna was commissioned to celebrate the marriage of Count Nicholas Esterházy to Countess Maria Anna Weissenwolf.

Act I. A terrace before Ecclitico's house, night. For all its jokiness, the opera begins on a serious note: Ecclitico and his four students sing a hymn to the moon, distinguished by its genuine graciousness. Ecclitico boasts of his capacity to fool stupid people. Buonafede comes to consult him: as a dilettante in astrology, he has never understood what the moon is. Ecclitico explains that his new telescope is so powerful he can see through the moon's transparent surface and into the houses inside it to spy on women as they undress before bed. Buonafede looks through the telescope, while Ecclitico's servants move puppet figures about in front of it. This fools Buonafede who says that he has seen a beautiful girl with an old man, a husband punishing his wife for infidelity and a man leading his beloved by the nose. He rewards Ecclitico with some money. When he is alone, Ecclitico reveals that he is in fact in pursuit of Buonafede's lovely daughter Clarice. He is joined by Ernesto, who loves her sister, Flaminia, and Cecco, his valet, who loves Lisetta, Buonafede's servant. Unfortunately, Buonafede is bent on marrying his daughters off to more important husbands. Ecclitico promises to get them all they want, as long as they can supply a little money. In another, more serious aria Ernesto dreams of Flaminia's eyes and looks forward to their life together. Cecco, on the other hand, assumes that everyone pretends and insists on seeing the funny side.

Inside Buonafede's house. Clarice and Flaminia long to escape from their tyrannical father. In a major aria of opera seria weight, Flaminia accepts that while reason should rule in the soul, when love intervenes, it takes control. Buonafede rebukes Clarice, who responds by asserting she will find herself a husband, if he will not. As in Così, the sisters are clearly differentiated: Clarice has her feet on the ground and her aria bristles with determined practicality. Buonafede attempts to make up to Lisetta and offers to let her look through the telescope. Bent on getting his money, she assures him of her love, her fidelity and her virtue, none of which is for real.

Ecclitico comes to take his leave of Buonafede, as the emperor of the moon has invited him to attend his court. He is to travel there by drinking 'a certain liquid'. Buonafede asks to have some and to travel with him. Ecclitico agrees. Buonafede drinks it and, as he falls asleep, he imagines he is flying to the moon. Once again, the idea of the moon inspires some delightful, airy music. Clarice and Flaminia assume their father has died, but when Ecclitico reads out the will the thought of their dowries consoles them.

Act II. Ecclitico's garden, transformed into the moon. An orchestral prelude sets the scene. Buonafede wakes to see dances performed by the moon's inhabitants. He is dressed in appropriate costume and congratulated on his good fortune. Ecclitico promises Buonafede that his daughters and his maid will arrive soon and will be humble and obedient. A march announces the entry of the emperor (Cecco in disguise), who welcomes Clarice and Flaminia but demands Lisetta for his wife. Buonafede is delighted by everything he has seen in this friendly world. His aria is one of the opera's highpoints, and not just because he is required to whistle along with the woodwind at one point ('Che mondo amabile'). He is presented to Lisetta, who wears a blindfold and resists his wooing. The emperor (Cecco) insists, however, on marrying her. She agrees delightedly. The emperor unites Ernesto with Flaminia, who welcomes the news ecstatically, and Ecclitico with Clarice, who is just as pleased. During the finale the wedding ceremonies are completed. Buonafede suddenly realises that his daughters have achieved what they wanted.

Act III. Inside Ecclitico's house. Before they agree to release Buonafede, Ecclitico and Ernesto force him to free his daughters' dowries. Ecclitico and Clarice celebrate their union and everyone joins in the final chorus of rejoicing at the 'world of the moon'. P.

LA FEDELTÀ PREMIATA

Fidelity Rewarded

Dramma pastorale giocoso in three acts, libretto adapted from Giambattista Lorenzi's text for Cimarosa's L'infedeltà fedele (1779). First performed at Eszterháza, 25 February 1781. Revised version 1782. First modern revival, Holland Festival, 1970, with Romana Righetti, Pietro Bottazzo and Eugenia Ratti, conducted by Alberto Erede. First U.K. performance, Collegiate Theatre, London, 1971; Zürich, 1975; Glyndebourne, 1979; Garsington, 1995, with Sara Fulgoni, Neill Archer, Janis Kelly, Mary Hegarty, conducted by Wasfi Kani.

Fillide/Celia, lover of Fileno Mezzo-Soprano
 Fileno, lover of Fillide Tenor
 Amaranta, a vain and arrogant woman Mezzo-Soprano
 Count Perrucchetto Baritone
 Nerina, a nymph, inconstant in love Soprano
 Lindoro, brother of Amaranta Tenor
 Melibeo, high priest Bass
 The Goddess Diana Soprano
 Nymphs, Shepherds, Hunters, Followers of Diana

Place: Near Cumae, Italy

Running Time (revised version): 2 hours 45 minutes

Haydn wrote La fedeltà premiata for the opening of Eszterháza's new opera house, some two years and three months after the old one had gone up in flames. The overture, which is more familiar as the last movement of his Symphony No. 73 in D, 'La Chasse', declares the festive nature of the work with its horn calls and timpani part.

Act I. Nymphs and shepherds assembled in front of Diana's temple beg the goddess to show mercy and restore peace. Melibeo the priest welcomes the flirtatious Amaranta, who reads out the oracle's text: each year two faithful lovers must be sacrificed to the monster, until some brave man offers his life voluntarily. This has been going on for ten years; the latest sacrifice is due today. Melibeo loves Amaranta and assumes she loves him – as a priest, he is exempt from this cruel law. Meanwhile Nerina rebukes Lindoro, Amaranta's brother, who has been neglecting her for Celia. Nerina annoys Amaranta, who encourages Lindoro to marry Celia. Amaranta reassures Melibeo that she loves him and will marry him one day. With its intricately worked introduction, slow pace and touching tone, this aria portrays a rather more serious capacity for love, even though we know she is faking it ('Per te m'accese amore'). Count Perrucchetto enters, faint, having been attacked by robbers. He asks for help and some wine and is horrified when Melibeo offers him water, but comforted when he sees and falls in love with Amaranta. She is thrilled to meet a count. Melibeo warns him off, in an aria about the conflict between two jealous bulls, featuring an apt role for the horns.

Fileno cannot forget his beloved Fillide. Haydn's memorable adagio setting makes this one of his most beautiful and affecting tenor arias ('Dove, oh dio, rivolgo il piede'). Nerina is immediately attracted to him. He explains that on the eve of his marriage to Fillide, she was bitten by a snake and died. She tells him that on the eve of her marriage to Lindoro, he left her for a nymph who calls herself Celia.

As she tends her sheep, Fillide (who now calls herself Celia) asks the streams whether they ever saw a more unhappy heart than hers. Once again, Haydn transforms a conventional text into an intensely individual cavatina, only faintly reminiscent of the great aria Gluck wrote for Orfeo in the Elysian Fields. She falls asleep. Nerina points out Celia to Fileno and leaves him to present her case. Celia awakes to see her beloved Fileno. She sees they are being watched by Lindoro and Melibeo. She realises that they risk being sacrificed as faithful lovers, and therefore avoids Fileno's questioning. He presumes she no longer loves him. When Melibeo questions her, Celia denies that she ever saw Fileno before. Understandably, Fileno feels betrayed. His sense of shock is brilliantly evoked in a spasmodic vocal line and staccato accompaniment, later punctuated by passionate cello accents ('Miseri affetti miei'). Celia follows him; Lindoro and Perrucchetto follow her. The count's fickleness appals Amaranta, who threatens to pursue him as an avenging fury in a long, spectacular aria ('Vanne ... fugge ... traditore!').

Melibeo threatens Celia: either she marries Lindoro, or he will send her and her lover Fileno to the monster. Celia asks Nerina to find Fileno and tell him to flee. In 1781, this major aria ('Deh soccorri un'infelice') included parts for three horns, with an elaborate solo part for one of them, muted, played by the virtuoso Anton Eckhardt, whose wife created the role of Amaranta. In the revival, the role of Celia was rewritten for a soprano, and the solo was reallocated to the bassoon. Perrucchetto tries to court Nerina, but when she runs away, in mid-aria, and he realises Amaranta has been listening, he tells her her doubts of his fidelity are insufferable ('Coll'amoroso foco'). She launches the first finale in a towering fury that prevents her from saying what caused it. Celia enters, worried about Fileno's fate. When Lindoro tries to court her, she slaps his face and leaves. Nerina rejects Perrucchetto almost as brutally. Amaranta drags Celia in and Melibeo tries blackmail: if she does not agree to marry Lindoro, Fileno will die. Fileno's entry is given intensely serious, beautiful music, as he looks forward to death. Nerina enters, pursued by satyrs, one of whom carries Celia off.

Act II. Melibeo swears to destroy the count, his rival for Amaranta's love. He encourages Nerina to pursue Fileno, reminding her that heartless beauty is of no avail. When Fileno sees Celia he punishes her supposed cruelty by declaring his love for Nerina.

The hunt in honour of Diana is taking place. Perrucchetto is pursued by a bear. Amaranta runs on, fleeing from a boar, and faints. Fileno kills it, but Perrucchetto tries to take the credit. When this version of events is disputed, he appeals to the boar for confirmation. As the boar stirs, he begs for mercy and runs away.

The scale of the orchestral introduction reaffirms the seriousness with which Haydn treats Fileno. He resolves to commit suicide, but first he carves the reason on a tree: 'For Fillide ... unfaithful ... died ... Fileno'. Celia reads the inscription. She seems to hear her lover's reproaches and determines to join him on the banks of Lethe ('Ombra del caro bene').¹

Melibeo tells Nerina to send the count into the cave and orders shepherds to prevent anyone leaving it.

¹ The best and longest analysis of this aria was first published in 1783 and is reprinted in H.C. Robbins Landon, Haydn at Eszterháza, London, 1978.

When Amaranta asks after the count, Lindoro tells her that, according to some shepherds, he was seen making love to Celia 'in a desperate manner'. Melibeo declares that the goddess has chosen her victims. He sends Lindoro and shepherds to enter the cave and dress the sacrificial couple in white. Lindoro returns, appalled, to report that Celia and Perrucchetto are inside. Amaranta flies into another rage, asking whether this is the reward for her faithful love, but this time there is nothing comic about her plight. Fileno arrives and asks where Celia is. When nobody answers, he presumes the worst and so launches the second, grief-stricken finale. The victims emerge from the cave to some haunting, exquisitely mournful music. Melibeo presents them to Diana, refusing to listen to Perrucchetto's plea that he is an innocent little lamb. We are no longer in the realm of unmitigated tragedy.

Act III. The sacrifice has not happened yet. Celia and Fileno meet but, instead of sorting out their misunderstanding, neither listens to the other. Perrucchetto pleads that he is ineligible because he has never been faithful, and Amaranta tries to discredit the priest but Melibeo remains adamant.

The monster appears but suddenly Fileno steps forward and offers himself as a victim. The monster turns into a grotto with Diana enthroned. She promises that peace will now return to Cumae; announces that Melibeo has been killed, as punishment for his fraud; prescribes Amaranta's marriage to the count and reunites Celia and Fileno. In a straightforward, four-square allegro chorus, nymphs and shepherds point out that we enjoy peace all the more when it is preceded by trouble and grief. Everyone concurs ('Quanto più diletta e piace'). P.

ORFEO ED EURIDICE ossia L'ANIMA DEL FILOSOFO¹

Orpheus and Eurydice or The Philosopher's Soul

Dramma per musica in four acts, libretto by Carlo Francesco Badini, based on Ovid's Metamorphoses IX and X. Commissioned by Salomon for the newly rebuilt King's Theatre and written in London, 1791 – the title role was conceived for the virtuoso tenor Giacomo Davide – it was rehearsed but never staged. Recorded by the Haydn Opera Society, 1950, and staged at the Maggio Musicale in Florence, 9 June 1951, with Maria Callas as Euridice, Tygge Tyggesen as Orfeo and Boris Christoff as Creonte, conducted by Erich Kleiber. Revived Theater an der Wien, Vienna, 1967, with Joan Sutherland as Euridice (and, for 'Al tuo seno fortunato', as the Genio) and Nicolai Gedda as Orfeo; 1987, for Cecilia Bartoli. Performed in concert at Queen Elizabeth Hall, London, 1997, with Christiane Oelze, Kurt Streit, Claron McFadden, conducted by Frieder Bernius.

Euridice, King Creonte's daughter.....Soprano

Orfeo, *a singer*Tenor

A Sibyl ('Genio', spirit guide)Soprano

Creonte, King of Athens.....Baritone

Servants, Cupids, Virgins, Men, Furies, Unburied
Bodies, Bacchantes

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

After some twenty-four years in service at the court at Eszterháza, Haydn was at last free to travel and work elsewhere when his employer Prince Nicholas Esterházy died. Haydn relished the new possibilities that London represented, particularly the chorus, which plays a major role in Orfeo, but also the enlarged orchestra (now including clarinets, trombones and a harp). Some mysterious features of this opera, such as its 'real' title, or the oratorio-style role of the chorus, reflect the fact that Haydn never saw it performed and may not even have completed it. There is more than enough in Orfeo as we now know it, however, to astonish and delight.

The tragic overture immediately sets the scene for a tale of grief and drama, in the solemn tones of opera seria.

Act I. A wood with a pyre visible in the middle. Euridice is in despair; the Chorus warn her not to enter the wood, whose inhabitants are more savage than the beasts. They run away as savage shepherds surround her. She guesses that they mean to sacrifice her to their god, but she is ready to die. Her aria begins modestly and the voice enters demurely, but by the time she reaches the word 'crudeltà' she has taken flight into spectacular melismas. Two members of the Chorus call for Euridice's beloved Orfeo to help her. He uses his lyre (represented by the orchestra's harp) to appeal to the savages to show mercy. They release her and the lovers embrace, while the Chorus pay tribute to the power of music.

¹ This was its real, though rarely used title.

Creonte had arranged for his daughter to be married to Arideo, though she loves Orfeo. She fled to the forest and a servant reports that Orfeo rescued her from the savages. Creonte is now convinced that she should be allowed to marry Orfeo. He gives his blessing to the lovers' marriage.

Act II. In the countryside. Orfeo and Euridice are surrounded by cupids who tell them to 'drink love's nectar from the cup of pleasure' while they are young. When Orfeo goes to investigate a noise, Arideo and his followers burst in to abduct Euridice. As she attempts to escape she steps on a snake which bites her. She can feel death coming. Her magnificent, moving recitative and aria comprise a miniature tribute to Gluck: Haydn evokes with diagnostic skill the way Euridice feels the poison slow her blood, but in a markedly more simple, affecting style than any of her earlier, bravura showpieces ('Del mio core'). Orfeo discovers her body and is overwhelmed with grief, which finds expression in some spectacular coloratura, coloured by clarinets.

A messenger tells Creonte that Arideo now threatens his court, his throne and his life. Creonte swears to avenge Arideo's insults and declares war on him.

Act III. Groups of Virgins and Men offer sympathy to Orfeo. He says goodbye to Euridice and asks nature to echo back his laments. Creonte hears that Orfeo is near to losing his mind. He reflects how love lets a man live more intensely, but leaves him vulnerable. He tries to console Orfeo.

Orfeo consults the Sibyl in her cave. She offers to lead him into the underworld and promises, in an exceptionally florid, beautiful aria, that if he can be brave and constant, he will recover his beloved ('Al tuo seno fortunato'). The Chorus twice admonish him to let justice reign in his heart and adore only one god. The words have only a forced relevance to Orfeo at this moment; in 1791 they may have had a Masonic meaning, such as has been posited for Creonte's Act I aria.

Act IV. In the underworld, Orfeo passes through limbo and is greeted by the Furies, who suffer from 'horrible, desperate howls' that torment the soul, in a chorus distinguished by the trombones that Haydn uses here for the first time.

When Orfeo arrives at the gates of the King of the Underworld he begs him to feel pity. Pluto is impressed by Orfeo's devotion and allows him to pass.

Orfeo is delighted with the Elysian Fields. A chorus of the blessed explain that Orfeo can have Euridice back, as long as he does not look at her when he leads her to the world of the living. Euridice approaches, limping from the wound to her foot, but Orfeo cannot help himself: he looks at her and she dies. Orfeo's grief is expressed in his aria, 'Mi sento languire', charged with urgency, built on short, impetuous vocal phrases as he repeatedly asks 'Perchè?' (Why?) and rages against fate's cruelty.

The opera's last scene, which may have been its fifth act, is set on the seashore, where Orfeo weeps. A group of Bacchantes try to seduce him into joining their life of pleasure. Their chorus, with overlapping entries, moves to an unemphatic, lilting dance rhythm. He refuses but they force him to drink something they call the 'nectar of love', which is a lethal poison. Once again the orchestra describes its course through his body. Orfeo accepts that his suffering will end with his death.

The Bacchantes feel a strange fury possess them. The music suggests this is less a Bacchic frenzy, more a stimulating itch. They aim for the 'island of pleasure', but before they can take refuge, they feel 'a hundred furies' in their hearts, a violent storm arises and destroys them.

Haydn was aware of previous operas on the Orpheus myth. Marc Viglan has suggested that the overture's graceful presto refers in the oboe's theme to the aria 'Ho perduto il caro bene' from Gluck's Orfeo ed Euridice of 1762, which Haydn had conducted at Eszterháza. Haydn avoided dramatising the central scene of Orpheus pacifying the Furies, perhaps because he wished to avoid competing on Gluck's territory, and surprises us by placing his demonstration of music's power to soothe savage hearts in the opera's very first scene. The ending is a remarkable, if temptingly loose treatment of another aspect of the Orpheus myth, his involvement in the Dionysiac cult and his death at the hands of the maenads.

PETER HEISE

(born 11 February 1830, died 12 September 1879)

DROT OG MARSK

King and Marshal

Opera in four acts, text by Christian Richardt. Première, Copenhagen, 25 September 1878. A recording was made in 1981, with Inga Nielsen.

King Erik GlippingTenor
 Marshal Stig Andersen.....Baritone
 Ingeborg, his wife.....Soprano
 Rane Johnsen, a courtier.....Tenor
 Count Jakob af Halland.....Bass
 Archdeacon Jens GandBass
 Arved Bengtsen, a conspirator.....Tenor
 Aase, a charcoal-burner's daughter.....Soprano
 A Herald.....Bass

Knights, Ladies, Courtiers, Servants, Soldiers

Place: Jutland

Time: 1286

Running Time: 3 hours 5 minutes

Heise, one of the most successful and prolific of Denmark's song-writers, though he had written incidental music for stage and ballet, was not experienced as a writer of music drama when, at the age of forty-five, he began work on his only opera, although nearly twenty years earlier he had composed an overture on the same subject. Drot og Marsk is something of a landmark in nineteenth-century Danish musical history and has been fairly often revived.

The characters are historical and the story has been the subject of literary treatment in Denmark, but historians are divided as to whether Marshal Stig Andersen was in fact guilty of the King's murder.

The King in the opera is represented as a compulsive womaniser and we meet him first chasing Rane away from Aase, whom he loses no time in seducing; then, after a moment of dalliance with Aase at court, he is all too plainly captivated by the charms of Ingeborg, the Marshal's wife, whose virtue he has just promised her husband to protect while he is away at war. Rane cynically watches as he prepares to break his promise. On his return, the Marshal discovers his wife has been seduced, and she demands revenge. At the People's Council at Viborg, the Marshal denounces the King, and it is apparent churchmen as well as senior courtiers have been waiting for a chance to rebel against him.

Rane has his own grievances and agrees to betray his master; other conspirators join Marshal Stig and Ingeborg in swearing revenge. Preparing to go hunting, the King has a crisis of conscience as he remembers his wanton burning of the heath long ago and equates its current desolation with the destruction of his own soul, but he leaves with a cry of defiance. In the hut where he takes refuge, he finds Aase. She rejects him, but her instinct to save him is to no purpose when Rane betrays him to the conspirators. The Marshal stabs him to death but recognises that he will be looked on as an outcast, and the people end the opera with a cry of 'Now the land is plunged in sorrow'.

Heise studied in Germany in the 1850s but Drot og Marsk suggests no evidence of exposure to Wagner's operas. Nonetheless, right from the purposeful-sounding overture, the music is well contrasted, with charm in the opening scene in Aase's hut, and animation in the dance rhythms of the court. There is grandeur in the Council scene and an atmosphere of menace and gloom surrounds the conspirators as they plot, led by the implacable Ingeborg. Aase is in many ways the opera's most attractive figure, and her folk-like song in the first scene contrasts well with the large-scale lyrical utterance in the last act which ends with a prayer.

H.

HANS WERNER HENZE

(born 1 July 1926)

Henze was the first to come to international attention of the musicians associated with Darmstadt, where after 1945 a centre grew up for German composers whose interests lay in the currents of contemporary music banned as decadent by the Nazi regime. He was a pupil of Wolfgang Fortner and rapidly became the leading composer of his generation and rose 'to be inspiration, and interpreter and prophet for those whose musical understanding was formed after the war. Then, Schoenberg and Stravinsky were the old gods, still speaking; but Henze speaks for, and with, us.'¹

Henze has contributed to the continuing vitality of the operatic form as much perhaps as anyone of his generation, and his versatility comes partly from the wealth of practical experience he gained as a conductor for ballet and opera in provincial theatres. The long list of his compositions comprises a number of symphonies and other music with orchestra, chamber music on a considerable scale, a full-length ballet for Covent Garden (Ondine) as well as, by 1990, no fewer than nine full-length operas, all richly and variously wrought. All the more disconcerting was it to read in the summer of 1970 an interview with the composer which suggested he was disposed to reject the medium altogether. He was quoted (accurately, I am quite sure) as saying: 'My crisis was not so much about opera as about music, music-making and people, and in this context I could see that I would contribute no more new operas, masquerades, charades ... I feel opera is finished. Of course, the basic idea of putting drama to music is not finished.' He went on to give a more or less Marxist explanation of his current position, but believers in the cause of opera took comfort from the reference to 'putting drama to music', which had an encouraging ring to it. And indeed, 'drama through music' has continued to flow from his pen. H.

BOULEVARD SOLITUDE

Opera in seven scenes, text by Grete Weil, after the play by Walter Jockisch, in its turn a modern version of Manon Lescaut. Première, Hanover, 17 February 1952, with Sigrid Klaus, Walter Buckow, conductor Johannes Schüller. First produced Düsseldorf, 1953, with Anna Tassopoulos; San Carlo, Naples, 1954, with Lydia Styx, conductor Jonel Perlea; Rome, 1954, with Magda László, conductor Nino Sanzogno; London, at Sadler's Wells by New Opera Company, 1962, with April Cantelo, John Carolan, Peter Glossop.

Manon LescautHigh Soprano
Armand des Grieux, *a student*Lyric Tenor
Lescaut, *Manon's brother*Baritone
Francis, *Armand's friend*Baritone
Lilaque père, *a rich old gentleman*High Tenor Buffo
Lilaque filsBaritone
A ProstituteDancer
Servant to Lilaque filsMime
Two Drug AddictsDancers
A Cigarette BoyDancer
Newspaper-Sellers, Beggars, Whores, Police,
Students, Travellers

Place: Paris

Time: After the End of the 1939–45 War

Running Time: 1 hour 15 minutes

Henze's first opera (1950–51) is a modern version of the Manon story and with it he secured an immediate success with the critics and before long with the public as well. Henze's style is eclectic, and this thoroughly attractive little work – small in pretensions and length, considerably greater in achievement – invokes some jazz and popular elements as well as Stravinsky and Berg.

Scene i. The crowded waiting room of a large French railway station; the music at first entirely timpani and percussion. When a train is announced, Francis claps his friend Armand on the shoulder and leaves. Manon comes in with her brother who steers her in the direction of Armand's table. Manon takes out a cigarette which Armand lights, asking her if she too is going to Paris. No, says Manon, to a finishing school in Lausanne. Armand launches into a sad account of the loneliness of student life in Paris. Manon joins in and the two get up and leave together; the pick-up is complete.

¹ Andrew Porter writing in 1962.

Scene ii. A small attic room in Paris. Armand and Manon lie in bed in the morning and sing a wistful song. Manon announces her intention of buying a hat which has caught her fancy. No, protests Armand; his father has cut off his allowance and they have no money. He goes off in search of his friend Francis. Lescaut comes in. What does he need – more money? No, says Lescaut coarsely, just her two ravishing breasts. He has found her a new admirer, old and fat and rich. Armand comes back and Manon embraces him tenderly. Lescaut in a wild song sardonically compliments his sister on her cruelty to Armand – the more brutally she treats her lovers, the higher will she rise – then gives her five minutes to make up her mind. Manon reproaches the absent Armand for leaving her a prey to the old temptations; but as she sings, she is preparing to leave him.

Scene iii. An elegant boudoir in the house of Lilaque père. Manon sings an aria as she writes to Armand, reassuring him that she is treated with every consideration by the generous Monsieur Lilaque. The only flaw in her existence is that Armand cannot visit her, and that could easily be remedied as every day at five in her own little carriage she drives in the Bois de Boulogne. Lescaut is furious that she prefers to write to her lover instead of looking after Lilaque and tears the letter up. When Manon protests, he retorts that she is his source of income and he needs more money at once. He notices a strongbox, forces it and in spite of Manon's protests steals from it. Lilaque enters, greets Manon tenderly and Lescaut with courtesy, at once offering to leave brother and sister alone. However, as he is about to leave the room he notices the broken safe and his good humour turns to rage as he throws the two out. The grotesque (but not by any means despicable) figure of Lilaque is characterised by very high tenor writing notably in the lyrical trio which constitutes the musical form of the scene.

Scene iv. A university library. Armand and Francis, with other students (who provide a choral background), are studying Catullus. Francis is enthralled, but Armand can think only of Manon, and when Francis tells him that she and Lescaut have been chucked out of Lilaque's house, Armand protests that he would believe anything of Lescaut but that Manon could commit no crime. Francis goes off in a huff as Manon enters and sits by Armand. They join in reading a love poem which gradually becomes an impassioned love duet. The parallel with Massenet's St Sulpice scene is apt and only the protests of des Grieux are absent.

Scene v. A dive. The reconciliation has not lasted long, Armand has taken to drugs, and while he sings of the forgetfulness he buys, everyone else dances to music that recalls Wozzeck with overtones of Gershwin. Lescaut comes in with Lilaque's son – Manon's latest 'suitor' – and they sit at the bar. Lescaut asks Armand where Manon is, but Armand's only interest is in more cocaine, which he gets from Lescaut.

Manon enters and joins her brother and Lilaque fils. Stimulated by the drug, Armand starts to rave and tries to stop Lilaque touching Manon. Lescaut orders him off but Lilaque finally loses patience and goes off with Manon and her brother. A beautiful girl comes in and gives Armand a letter. As he reads it, Manon's voice is heard telling him to come and see her the following night as Lilaque will be away; as consolation she sends him one of the prettiest girls in Paris. But Armand is too far gone to notice her and the girl shrugs apathetically and leaves him asleep.

Scene vi. After a striking interlude, we find ourselves in a room in the apartment of Lilaque fils. Manon and Armand are together. Manon gaily remarks on the change in her fortunes but Armand reminds her that once they were alone together, a point of view Manon cannot understand. Lescaut, who has been keeping watch, hurries in and tells Armand he must be off. As he is about to take Armand out, he notices an abstract painting on the wall. Is it a Picasso? No, but all the same beautiful, says Armand. Manon and Lescaut ridicule the picture, but Lescaut, with an eye to the main chance, rips it from its frame and hides it under his coat. They hear the voice of Lilaque père who has been called by a suspicious servant and Manon quickly hides the two men behind a curtain. The old man protests that his delight at seeing her quite erases his memories of her past misdeeds, but to her horror he insists they return to the room she has just left, especially because it contains a modern painting which, although he personally finds it incomprehensible, is said by psychiatrists to be most beneficial to the subconscious. All Manon's efforts are in vain and he steers her back the way she has come. The moment he sees the picture has gone he starts to raise the roof with his accusations. Lilaque shouts to the servant to call the police and himself bars the door. Lescaut draws a revolver and shoots him dead, pressing the gun into Manon's hand as he escapes. Lilaque filis enters and sees Manon and Armand standing over his father's body.

Scene vii. An intermezzo introduces the last scene, outside a prison on a grey winter's day. Armand waits to catch a last glimpse of Manon as she is taken off to prison and sings an aria of hopelessness. The police herd Manon and other prisoners away before she and Armand can exchange a word and from this point the action becomes a symbolical pantomime, involving people from the railway station, police, singing children, Lilaque filis following the corpse of his father, even (in the London production) Lescaut and a bikini-ed girlfriend holidaying by the sea on the proceeds of what we have been watching. 'Et c'est là l'histoire de Manon, de Manon Lescaut.' H.

KÖNIG HIRSCH

Il Re Cervo/King Stag

Opera in three acts, text by Heinz von Cramer after the story by Carlo Gozzi. Première (as König Hirsch), Berlin, Städtische Oper, 23 September 1956, with Helga Pilarczyk, Nora Jungwirth, Sandor Konya, Martin Vantin, Helmut Krebs, Tomislav Neralic, conductor Hermann Scherchen. First performed Darmstadt, 1959. Revised (as Il Re Cervo) 1962, Cassel, conductor Henze; Munich, 1964, with Felicia Weathers, Claude Heater, Hans-Günter Nöcker, conductor Christoph von Dohnanyi; Santa Fe, 1965; Helsinki, 1971; B.B.C., 1973 (in English), with Philip Langridge; Stuttgart, 1985, with cuts restored and Toni Krämer as the King, conductor Dennis Russell Davies.

Leandro, the King.....Tenor
 Costanza, his beloved.....Soprano
 Tartaglia, the Chancellor.....Bass-Baritone
 Scollatella I.....Coloratura Soprano
 Scollatella II.....Soubrette
 Scollatella III.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Scollatella IV.....Alto
 Checco, a melancholy musician.....Tenor Buffo
 Coltellino, an unsuccessful murderer.....Tenor Buffo
 Six Alchemists.....Silent

Two Statues.....Contraltos
 Cigolotti, a magician.....Speaking Role
 The Stag.....Speaking Role
 Voices of the Wood, Voices of the People, Voices of the Wind, Courtiers, Pages, Wild Animals, People from the City, Soldiers, Huntsmen

Place: Near Venice, between Sea and Forest

Time: Antiquity

Running Time: 4 hours 20 minutes

Henze's second opera, Il Re Cervo, is an adaptation of one of the fables of Carlo Gozzi, the Venetian contemporary and rival of Goldoni and source of such twentieth-century operas as Busoni's and Puccini's Turandot, Casella's La Donna Serpente and Prokofiev's The Love for Three Oranges. Much of it was written on the island of Ischia, where Henze went to live in 1953, so that the music is perhaps the most influenced by the composer's chosen Italian environment of any opera he has yet written. The first version of the opera was heavily cut for the Berlin première in 1956, according to those who already knew it, to its considerable detriment. By 1962, the composer had decided on a revised version, about half as long. The full-length version was restored in Stuttgart in 1985.

King Leandro (Deramo in Gozzi's play) has grown up in the forest among animals. He succeeds to the throne, returns as an innocent to the complicated world of men, is crowned, chooses a bride, only to abdicate when his Chancellor, Tartaglia, has her arrested. Through a magic spell the King takes possession of the body of a dead stag, with the result that the Chancellor is able to use the same spell to assume the lifeless form of the King and take control. He reduces the country to ruins until the Stag King reappears to the joy of the populace. The false king is killed and the true one re-enters his body to general acclamation.

Act I. The King's castle, where preparations are in hand for his coronation. A fearful storm rages (depicted in the Vivace orchestral opening) and an early candidate for the role of Queen – Scollatella – emerges to complain of the appalling effect the weather has had on her clothes. She feels she will win the King's hand, but is frightened at being alone while the thunder rages; she looks into a mirror and summons up a double. Scollatella II comes out of the mirror, and it is not long before Scollatella III and IV are also involved in thinking up schemes to win the King's favour. Scollatella I insists that, if their plans go right, she alone will be called Queen.

The coronation procession. Scollatella I hides as Tartaglia, the King's Chancellor, comes in and, obviously up to no good, conceals himself, storming about the futility of it all – a boy King being led like a lamb to the slaughter, fawning courtiers all over the place, while he is not accorded his just deserts. From the attitudes he strikes Scollatella thinks Tartaglia must be King and makes herself known before disappearing into the background.

At this point, Costanza is brought in by two guards. Tartaglia questions her and assures her that the King is a monster. He gives her a dagger with which he instructs her to murder him.

The animals, who have been the King's friends in the forest, form a semi-circle round him as in movingly direct vocal terms he bids them goodbye. Two statues warn him of the dangers he faces among men. Their music goes some way towards evoking the purity of the world of the boys in The Magic Flute, and they assure the King that they will help him by laughing the moment anyone tells him an untruth.

Tartaglia makes his entrance and announces that the moment to choose the royal bride is at hand. To more fanfares, Scollatella I comes in and makes her obeisance, followed by II, III and IV. They compete for the King's interest, and he asks which of them, if married to him, would be saddest if he died; the answer eludes them. The King assures Scollatella I that no one has given him more pleasure than she. The statues laugh and the King knows that none so far is worthy to be his bride.

Tartaglia introduces Costanza. She admits she is no longer afraid of the King and he is reassured by the silence of the statues. They sing together in an adagio section, the first love duet in the opera, and at its end, Leandro, unable to bear the idea that he may lose Costanza, attacks the statues and breaks them. Immediately Tartaglia shows the King Costanza's concealed weapon. She is arrested and when the King says he will exercise clemency, Tartaglia insists on death for a potential regicide. The King decides he will abdicate and Cigolotti (disguised as a parrot) leads him away.

The stage is Tartaglia's; he rejoices that he has set his net and the fishing has been good. Spirits of the Wind dash across the stage, and Coltellino, Tartaglia's hired assassin, and Checco, a musician who follows Cigolotti and carries a guitar on his back, enter after them. Coltellino, who has lost his pistol and dagger to the Spirits of the Wind, hastens to Tartaglia's summons. Doesn't he want to be an honest murderer like his father? Let him then follow the King and murder him! Even the loss of dagger and pistol is not accepted as excuse, and Tartaglia hands Coltellino replacements. The act ends with a curious postscript as alchemists come in announcing that they have come to give a party for King Leandro. They are too late, says Tartaglia.

Act II takes place in the wood – a great breathing organism – and we hear the forest sounds. There is a stranger present, a voice announces, and soon others proclaim that the wood is full of men. Leandro appears and it is not long before Scollatella's voice joins with his. Scollatella is obsessed with the idea that she is in reality a Queen, and Leandro turns from her. Animals flee from humans; the alchemists reappear disguised as animals and are themselves terrified of the huntsmen, who will try to kill them, and of the other animals, who may find them even easier prey. Tartaglia attempts to murder Leandro, and both Checco and Coltellino complicate the action with their fears and failures.

Cigolotti plans that Checco alone shall know the secret of the transformation spell, which he shall give only to the King and thus save the King's life. Checco has a beautiful, enigmatic song, nearer perhaps to Britten or Tippett than to most other Italian or German music, and lightly accompanied on guitar. A stag appears and Tartaglia wounds it so that it escapes. Tartaglia's designs are murderous. He tries to get news of the King's whereabouts from Checco. By magical means, they see the stag die and Tartaglia hears the transformation spell from Checco, who intends only to give it to the King. Leandro by its aid changes into the stag and goes off, but Tartaglia in his own turn repeats the spell and assumes the King's body. Tartaglia's credo follows: he will impose his will on the country, stamp on it if he choose. Meanwhile, he sets in motion a stag hunt which will eliminate Leandro for ever.

Act III plays in the deserted city, where Tartaglia has been exercising absolute rule. The people are oppressed and their only hope comes from the legend that when a stag appears in the streets, the rule of peace will return. This is in effect what happens. Quite quietly, Leandro as the Stag King walks through the streets, finding that no one answers his calls, although Coltellino melodiously laments his lack of prowess as a murderer.

Even the alchemists are persecuted under Tartaglia's rule, but gradually news of the King's return reaches the city, and Costanza comes to look for the man she was allowed to love for so short a time. The Stag King approaches her, and their second duet confirms their mutual love until her touch makes the stag flee the scene, just in time too, as Tartaglia appears, in the guise of the King and armed to the teeth. He greets Costanza as if he were the King she loves, but she detects the fraud and disappears.

People start to become conscious of the presence in their midst of the stag, against whom Tartaglia continues to rail, demanding that it be shot. Finally, Coltellino, taking straight aim with the assistance of Cigolotti but mistakenly thinking the King he sees is the King whom Tartaglia has retained him to murder, shoots his target – but it is of course Tartaglia who falls dead just as he is about to kill the stag.

Leandro works the transformation spell and the opera ends with choral rejoicing, enclosing a short, simple duet for Leandro and Costanza, in which he claims her as his bride.

The plot is said to have been one which Brahms contemplated for an opera and it has obvious affinities with Bartók's Cantata Profana. For Henze at the age of twenty-nine it was a fairy story with overtones of the Nazi Germany of his boyhood, and the opera has excited ardent admiration so that William Mann in The Times, at the time of the B.B.C.'s English performance in 1973, was able to write: 'in 1955 ... Henze's head was full of marvellous vocal and orchestral music, longing to be released'. H.

DER PRINZ VON HOMBURG

The Prince of Homburg

Opera in three acts, text by Ingeborg Bachmann after the drama by Heinrich von Kleist. Première, Hamburg State Opera, 22 May 1960, with Liselotte Fölser, Mimi Aarden, Helmut Melchert, Vladimir Ruzdak, Toni Blankenheim, Herbert Fliether, conductor Leopold Ludwig. First performed London, Sadler's Wells Theatre, 1962, by Hamburg Company; Paris, Frankfurt Opera, 1962; Düsseldorf, 1964, with the title role rewritten for tenor and sung by Andor Kaposy; English National Opera, 1996, with Peter Coleman-Wright (in the baritone version).

Friedrich Wilhelm, *Elector of Brandenburg*Dramatic Tenor
 The Electress, *his wife*Contralto
 Princess Natalie von Oranien, her niece,
Colonel-in-Chief of a Dragoon RegimentSoprano
 Field Marshal DörflingBaritone
 Prince Friedrich Artur von Homburg,
General of CavalryHigh Baritone
 Colonel Kottwitz, *of the Princess's Regiment*Bass Count Hohenzollern, attached to the ElectorLyric Tenor
 Three OfficersTenor, Baritone, Bass
 Three Ladies of the Court
Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Contralto
 SergeantBaritone
 First and Second OrderlyTenor, Baritone
 Other OfficersTenors and Basses
 People of the Court (Pages, Servants, etc.), Military Personnel (Guards, Cadets, Soldiers)

Place: Fehrbellin, Germany

Time: 1675

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

The libretto by Ingeborg Bachmann, a regular collaborator of Henze's, is based on Kleist's last play, Prinz Friedrich von Homburg (1811). The background is the successful world of Prussian militarism in the seventeenth century, and the hero of the play is a poet and dreamer who nonetheless accepts the values of his environment. It was at a performance by Jean Vilar's Théâtre National Populaire, with Gérard Philippe as the hero, that Ingeborg Bachmann discovered, far from Prussia and outside Germany, that she loved the play. To some degree, composer and librettist have consciously de-Germanised what Kleist wrote, and Kleist's lines for the Elector, 'He will teach you, be assured, what military discipline and obedience are', have been changed in the libretto to '... what freedom and honour are'.

Act I, scene i. Garden of a castle in Fehrbellin. The Prince of Homburg is sitting as if in a trance, twining a wreath in his hand. The remainder of the Elector's entourage is killing time before the battle, and they have noticed that their General of Cavalry is missing. They find him alone and some wonder whether he is ill. The Elector takes the wreath from his hand, places a silver chain round his neck and gives him the hand of Princess Natalie. They depart and the Prince is left stroking the glove of the Princess. Count Hohenzollern wakes his friend from his dream ... but the glove remains for him as an unexplained link between dream and reality, with fantasy still to him, in his state of half-trance, the more believable condition.

The whole scene has the softness of a dream but the interlude takes us to a different world, a military conference in a hall in the castle. Field Marshal Dörfling dictates the plan of battle, instructing the Prince to hold the attack with his cavalry force until he receives specific orders. The Prince listens dreamily, has to be continually reminded where he is, and is obsessed with the idea that Princess Natalie is looking for the glove she has lost.

Scene iii. The battlefield of Fehrbellin. Officers wait for the battle to begin and Homburg tries to check with his friend Hohenzollern as to the orders he received yesterday. He is dreaming of Natalie when the first cannon shot is heard. Officers watch its progress, the Swedes are seen to be giving way and suddenly Prince Friedrich, without waiting for his orders, orders a fanfare to be sounded, and rushes into battle.

During the interlude with its plaintive saxophone solo, it becomes dark and then gradually lightens to show the scene the following morning. Dead and wounded are being carried away and rumour has it that the Elector has been killed. The Electress and Princess Natalie are overcome with grief and the Prince of Homburg joins them in their mourning. Friedrich and Natalie avow their love for one another. But rumour was false, and the Elector stands before them safe and sound. The Elector declares that victory was endangered because the cavalry attack was started too early and that he will have whoever was responsible court-martialled and condemned to death. When the Prince comes to bring him trophies of victory, he orders his sword taken from him and the act ends, after an ensemble, with the Prince escorted towards Fehrbellin and prison.

Act II, scene iv. Prison. Prince Friedrich has been condemned to death, and he realises the gravity of the situation when he hears that the Elector has sent for the death warrant in order to sign it.

Scene v. On his way to appeal, he sees with horror the grave which has been dug for him in the courtyard of the castle.

Scene vi. The Electress's room. Homburg begs the Electress to intervene on his behalf but she feels, however great her love for him, that she is powerless in the present situation. Natalie tells him she loves him and will make an attempt to persuade the Elector to change his mind.

Scene vii. The Elector's room. Natalie begs her uncle to pardon Homburg; he is taken aback to find that the young man has so far forgotten his training as to think exclusively of his freedom. Finally, the Elector gives Natalie a letter in which he offers to let Homburg go free if he can find it in his heart and mind to consider the judgement made against him unjust.

Scene viii. Prison. Natalie brings the Prince the Elector's letter and tells him that he will immediately be free. But Friedrich hesitates, then decides the judgement was just and that he cannot write the Elector the letter which would set him free. Natalie kisses him and says that if he feels it right to follow the dictates of his own heart, she will follow hers – she decides to order her Regiment of Dragoons to free the Prince by force.

Act III, scene ix. The Elector's room. The Field Marshal brings the news that Princess von Oranien's Regiment is in the town intending to free the Prince of Homburg from prison. At the same time, the Elector receives a letter conveying the Prince's decision. Officers come to the Elector to request that the Prince be pardoned and the Elector decides to bring him from prison, saying that he will teach them what freedom and what honour are. The Prince comes in, but will not change his decision. The Elector is overjoyed, believes Friedrich has re-established his honour and gives orders that he be conducted back to prison. As he prepares to go, he makes it plain that he will not change his mind. But the Elector believes he has established a crucial point of principle and can now tear up the death warrant.

Scene x. To the sound of a funeral march, Prince Friedrich is brought blindfold by Count Hohenzollern into the garden. The Prince, who believes he is about to be executed, feels himself already withdrawn from life. Suddenly, the Elector leads in his court, the Prince's blindfold is removed as he stands before the Elector, just as in his dream before the battle. What had been a dream of victory wreath, princely chain and bride becomes reality.

H.

ELEGY FOR YOUNG LOVERS

Opera in five acts, libretto by W.H. Auden and Chester Kallman. Première (in German), 20 May 1961, at Schwetzingen Festival (Munich Opera), with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, producer Henze, conductor Heinrich Bender. First performed in England, Glyndebourne, 1963 (in English), with Dorow, Söderström, Kerstin Meyer, Turp, Carlos Alexander, Hemsley, conductor John Pritchard; Zürich, 1961, by Munich Opera; Berlin, 1962, with Catherine Gayer, Martha Mödl, Fischer-Dieskau.

Gregor Mittenhofer, a poet Baritone
 Dr Wilhelm Reischmann, a physician Bass
 Toni Reischmann, his son Lyric Tenor
 Elisabeth Zimmer Soprano
 Carolina, Gräfin von Kirchstetten Contralto
 Frau Hilda Mack, a widow High Soprano
 Josef Mauer, an alpine guide Speaker
 Servants at the 'Black Eagle' Silent

Place: Austrian Alps

Time: 1910

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Elegy for Young Lovers, like The Bassarids, was first performed in German translation. The librettists have told us that Henze asked them late in autumn of 1958 for a libretto with 'a subject and situation which would call for tender, beautiful noises' and the composer planned a 'small, subtle orchestra' as the basis for his chamber opera, in which certain instruments could be associated with various leading characters, a flute for instance with Hilda Mack, the brass with Mittenhofer, violin and viola with the young lovers, cor anglais with Carolina, bassoon or saxophone with Dr Reischmann.

The story is packed with incident, psychological nuance and wit. It is concerned basically with (wrote the composer in 1970) 'the Birth of a Poem that is in process throughout the three acts, from the moment of the first idea to the final public reading. What happens around this process of birth, the hilarious, the wicked, the vulgar, the banal, the murderous, serves mainly to put into question the figure of the Artist as Hero as the nineteenth century created it, as the twentieth century has not yet completely liquidated it.'

'The artist as hero' is the great poet Gregor Mittenhofer, who goes every year to a mountain inn, the Schwarze Adler, in the Austrian Alps. This particular spring he arrives with Carolina von Kirchstetten, his patroness and unpaid secretary, Elisabeth Zimmer, his young mistress, Dr Reischmann, his doctor. He hopes that as in former years he will get inspiration from the crazy 'visions' of the widow Mack, who has lived at the inn for the past forty years, ever since her bridegroom was killed climbing the Hammerhorn on the first day of their honeymoon. Not all the poet's hopes are realised. The body of the long dead Herr Mack is found preserved in a glacier and the widow's lunacy is replaced by pungent insight into the motives of her neighbours. Elisabeth falls in love with Toni, Dr Reischmann's son; and Mittenhofer, deprived of one of his sources of inspiration, finds another in the predicament of the two young lovers who have, with his knowledge, ventured up the mountainside, a fact he neglects to mention to a guide who could save them. The opera ends as he reads his new Elegy for Young Lovers to a fashionable audience.

Act I: The Emergence of the Bridegroom (each act and each scene have been given a title by the librettists).

I. Forty years past. Hilda Mack, still dressed and made up in the style of a young woman of the 1870s, sings in eloquent music of wide range (well over two octaves) of the day her husband went to climb the Hammerhorn.

II. The order of the day. The inside of the inn shows Carolina at her desk. Dr Reischmann watches her sort press cuttings. Each is summoned in turn, the one to take the Master his second egg, the other to give him his morning injection, and the doctor feels Carolina's pulse to diagnose a bout of flu. That Carolina must finance the poet by hiding coins where he may expect to find them, elicits from Dr Reischmann a 'What would poets do without their nannies?'

III. A scheduled arrival. The doctor is waiting for the arrival of his son Toni, who is going through a 'phase' and seems likely to prove poor company.

IV. Appearances and visions. Carolina entices Frau Mack inside just as Mittenhofer, his arm round Elisabeth Zimmer, makes his entrance. 'His high forehead and Beethoven-like mane of snow-white hair are impressive, and he is apt to accentuate both by shaking his head back.' Frau Mack starts on one of her coloratura visions, to the intense satisfaction of the poet, who begins to take notes. It is a big-scale aria in typically wide-ranging style that Frau Mack sings, and in it she seems to foretell what hindsight tells us is the death of the two young lovers.

V. Worldly business. Mittenhofer is delighted at what he has got, then starts to read yesterday's typing, interrupting it to yell at Carolina about a mistake she has made until she falls in a faint.

VI. Help. Mittenhofer disappears to his study, but reappears a moment later to search the room for his money, like a child looking for sweets.

VII. Unworldly weakness. Poor Carolina is in a state – 'death in fact looks dazzlingly attractive' is her comment.

VIII. Beauty in death. Josef Mauer, an Alpine guide, comes in to tell them that a body has been found on the Hammerhorn – fresh and young-looking, his skull cracked at the back. It must be Frau Mack's husband!

IX. Who is to tell her? Carolina says she is feeling too ill; it must be Elisabeth.

X. Today's weather. Gently and kindly, Elisabeth breaks the news to Frau Mack, who is full of foreboding for Elisabeth's own future. In the end she succeeds (in a beautiful canonic duet) in telling her the news, which Frau Mack appears to understand. Toni watches the end of the scene.

XI. A visionary interlude. Toni sings a song in tender remembrance of his mother.

XII. Tomorrow: two follies cross. Hilda, who has remained still throughout Toni's song, suddenly rises in a state bordering on ecstasy. To end the act, she joins in climactic duet with Toni, she because 'the crystal is broken', he because he realises he is falling in love with Elisabeth.

Act II: The Emergence of the Bride.

I. A passion. Elisabeth and Toni are now plainly in love, and Toni urges her to break with Mittenhofer. Carolina catches them in each other's arms and calls for the doctor to help her settle what she thinks of as nonsense.

II. Sensible talk. Dr Reischmann tries to reason with Toni inside, Carolina with Elisabeth outside.

III. Each in his place. In a duet which is composed of two separate monologues, the two young people express their outrage.

IV. The Master's time. Elisabeth in one room asks Toni to take her away, Mittenhofer in another is told by Carolina that there is a situation between Elisabeth and Toni, and asks Carolina to have Elisabeth join him at tea.

V. Personal questions. Mittenhofer's tack is to criticise himself and play on Elisabeth's guilt feelings. The gist of the scene is an apologia pro vita sua. Elisabeth leaves, without having told him anything.

VI. The troubles of others. Elisabeth (and later the orchestra) is sad.

VII. What must be told. Elisabeth admits to Toni that she has said nothing, partly because they know nothing about each other, partly because she did not dare. Toni says he will do the job.

VIII. The wrong time. As Toni goes towards Mittenhofer's door, the poet himself emerges, to listen to Toni's protestations of love for Elisabeth. An ensemble of considerable dimensions builds up, involving Mittenhofer, Elisabeth (Carolina taking her place at its end), Toni, the doctor.

IX. The bride. Elisabeth bursts into tears, and Frau Mack comes into sight, singing tipsily (and higher than ever) and rejoicing in the new situation, which she relishes to the full. Top Cs abound, Frau Mack demands ten per cent of Mittenhofer's future royalties, and after a ringing top E natural, turns to Elisabeth and starts to comfort her. Mittenhofer resolves the situation by asking Dr Reischmann to bless the lovers.

X. The young lovers. In a grandiose ensemble, Mittenhofer explains his new poem, 'The Young Lovers'. The characters seem to breathe life from his words, which perfectly express their different situations for them.

XI. The flower. The doctor blesses the match and Mittenhofer, taking advantage of the moment and the fact that in a day or two's time he will be sixty, begs the young couple to pick him on the slopes of the Hammerhorn an Edelweiss, which he needs to finish his poem. They agree; Frau Mack plans her departure.

XII. The vision of tomorrow. The young lovers will stay, Mittenhofer refuses his tonic – to watch young love is enough – and, after a moment of six voices together, the rest leave and Mauer comes in to tell Mittenhofer that tomorrow will be warm and the weather on the slopes of the Hammerhorn propitious enough for them to find the Edelweiss he craves.

XIII. The end of the day. The atmosphere changes from one of acquiescence to another of unbridled fury. Mittenhofer inveighs against all around him, from Frau Mack to the doctor, from Carolina to Elisabeth. 'Why don't they die?' He is about to hurl an inkwell across the room when Frau Mack comes back to confront him, so that he departs with a bellow of rage leaving her in peals of uncontrollable laughter.

Act III: Man and Wife.

I. Echoes. Hilda is ready to travel; Toni and Elisabeth ascend the mountain. An ensemble mounts, during whose course Mittenhofer can be heard trying out rhymes and prepositions.

II. Farewells. It remains for Frau Mack to bow tenderly out of the opera, giving Carolina the colossal scarf she has been knitting for the past forty years. Mittenhofer comes out to persuade Carolina to laugh, and Frau Mack has a good word even for him.

III. Scheduled departures. 'The young in pairs, the old in two proceed'; the music is a quartet.

IV. Two to go. Carolina makes some attempt to damp down the fires which still burn within Mittenhofer, but to little avail. Mauer hurries in to say that a threatening blizzard is blowing up. Is anyone still up there? Mittenhofer, without looking at Carolina, denies knowledge of anyone, and Mauer hurries off to ask the question elsewhere.

V. Mad happenings. As the sky darkens, Mittenhofer and Carolina confront each other and the Master slyly suggests that she go away 'for a change of scene'. If she was ever quite sane, she is no longer.

VI. A change of scene. For the first time we are outside the inn, and the Hammerhorn is visible, in a blizzard. An extended orchestral interlude leads us to Toni and Elisabeth in the last stages of exhaustion on the mountain.

VII. Man and wife. Their duet takes the form of reminiscences of a long-married husband and wife.

VIII. Toni and Elisabeth. They have discovered something beyond love: Truth. This will help them to die.

IX. Elegy for young lovers. Mittenhofer is tying his white tie before going on stage to read poetry in Vienna. He goes through a cheer sequence – 'One. Two. Three. Four. Whom do we adore?' – then dedicates the poem he is about to read to 'the memory of a brave and beautiful young couple, Toni Reischmann and Elisabeth Zimmer'. He mouths beneath an invisible ensemble of Hilda Mack, Elisabeth, Carolina, Toni and the doctor; the poem is, with the help of others, finished, and the opera therefore at an end.

H.

DER JUNGE LORD

The Young Lord

Comic opera in two acts, libretto by Ingeborg Bachmann, after a fable from Der Scheik von Alexandria und seine Sklaven by Wilhelm Hauff. Première, Deutsche Oper, Berlin, 7 April 1965, with Edith Mathis, Patricia Johnson, Loren Driscoll, Donald Grobe, Barry McDaniel, conductor Christoph von Dohnanyi. First performed Stuttgart, 1965; Rome, 1965, with Maria Chiara, Fedora Barbieri, Giuseppe Campora, Aldo Botton, conductor Henze; London, 1969 (by Cologne company), with Wendy Fine, Cvetka Ahlin, Hubert Mohler, James Harper, Claudio Nicolai, conductor Marek Janowski.

| | |
|---|----------------|
| Sir Edgar | Silent |
| His Secretary | Baritone |
| Lord Barrat, Sir Edgar's nephew | Tenor |
| Begonia, his Jamaican cook | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Mayor | Bass-Baritone |
| Councillor Hasentreffer | Baritone |
| Councillor Scharf | Baritone |
| Professor von Mucker | Buffo Tenor |
| Baroness Grünwiesel | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Frau von Hufnagel | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Frau Hasentreffer | Soprano |
| Luise, the Baroness's ward | Soprano |
| Ida, her friend | Soprano |
| A Maid | Soprano |
| Wilhelm, a student | Tenor |
| Amintore La Rocca, a circus director | Dramatic Tenor |
| A Lamplighter | Baritone |
| Monsieur La Truiare, dancing master | Silent |
| Meadows, the butler | Silent |
| Jeremy, a Moor | Silent |
| Circus Performers, a Teacher, a Military Band, a Dance Band, Ladies and Gentlemen of Society, Men and Women of the People, Children | |

Place: Hülldorf-Gotha, Germany

Time: 1830

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Henze's fifth opera written for the stage (as opposed to radio) is a black comedy, based on Wilhelm Hauff's parable Der Affe als Mensch, written after he had been living for some time in Italy and drawing on his enthusiasm for early nineteenth-century opera composers – Rossini and Bellini for instance. There is lyrical writing in plenty – Der junge Lord is a thoroughly 'vocal' opera – but the main expression is through the ensemble as developed by Rossini and the Verdi of Falstaff. It all bustles along at a capital pace, easy to listen to, witty, but in no sense a classical comedy with a happy ending. The monkey screams because he is learning the hard way, the rose he gives to Luise has a sharp enough thorn to draw blood.

Act I. The small but pretty square of the town. It is autumn and the leaves are turning yellow. Rumour has it that a rich Englishman – a man of learning – is about to arrive in the town, where he has rented a house and where he proposes to spend some time (and doubtless money too). The senior citizens speculate on the possibilities and rehearse their speeches of greeting. Luise, the most eligible girl in the town, is obviously attracted to Wilhelm, a student, and they sing lyrically standing a few yards apart. Schoolchildren are rehearsed in a cantata of greeting for the visitor, when the arrival of the first carriage is signalled. The Mayor and the other worthies form up as a welcome committee and watch, with some stupefaction, as emerge one after another, not the grandee they had expected, but his retinue, starting with a collection of animals, continuing with a black page and some other servants, and finishing with Begonia, his black cook from Jamaica, who succeeds in dominating the scene. She takes a swig of rum, lapses occasionally into English, and then joins with the others in expectation of a third, even more splendidly decorated carriage.

From it with much ceremony (including a snatch of Turkish music from Die Entführung) emerges Sir Edgar,¹ a little tired from his journey but prepared through his secretary to make a relatively gracious answer to the blandishments of the reception committee. Nonetheless he refuses all invitations; he only wants to put the town to no inconvenience whatsoever. The skies grow dark, Begonia puts up her umbrella, and embarrassment if anything increases at the way the weather has added to the general farce and confusion. Only Luise and Wilhelm welcome the distraction.

Scene ii. Baroness Grünwiesel's salon. Even though Sir Edgar has so far turned down all invitations, Baroness Grünwiesel, as Hülndorf-Gotha's leader of society, has gathered together its ladies to meet him, hoping that an appropriate exception will be made in her case. Her plans for him and Luise are all too obvious, but everything changes when a message is brought by Jeremy, the black page, to the effect that Sir Edgar cannot accept her invitation. Such an insult is not to be borne and nothing will calm the Baroness's mounting fury. From now on she has only one aim, to make life in the town impossible for their odious visitor! Will she prove a worthy successor to Rossini's Don Basilio? The interlude suggests she may.

Scene iii. The town square. An unpretentious country circus has established itself and its performance is coming to an end. Its Neapolitan director, Amintore La Rocca, thanks the public just as Sir Edgar emerges to watch the circus. The only gesture of recognition he makes towards the townspeople is at their children, and comments – for instance that he goes to the circus but not to church – are fairly free. The town council attempts to flatter Sir Edgar, his secretary tries to put them off, Wilhelm and Luise indulge in the mildest of flirtations, La Rocca continues to salute the public, until a crisis develops when the councillors decide to deny the circus a licence to perform. Sir Edgar offers to pay their dues and ends by inviting director, dancing girl, fire-eater and 'human monkey' into his house, leaving the citizens outside, the humblest admiring his generosity, the more puffed up complaining at the slight he seems to offer them. Two men creep in to percussive accompaniment and write the word SHAME on the front of Sir Edgar's house.

Act II, scene iv. The front of Sir Edgar's house with snow on the ground. The sympathy of the townspeople has turned against the Englishman, and children pelt the unfortunate Jeremy with snowballs as he returns from a shopping expedition. A lamplighter is making his rounds and hears from the house bloodcurdling cries and shrieks suggestive of something appalling going on inside. He rushes off, and the scene is clear for Luise and Wilhelm to confess their love to each other in a lyrical duet.

Their idyll is interrupted by more shrieks from the house and then by the arrival of the Mayor and town council, led by the lamplighter to the scene of the supposed crime. The Mayor demands to be admitted to investigate. Sir Edgar's secretary tells them that the door is open and indeed Sir Edgar appears at it, but leaves the secretary to explain that what they have heard are the sighs and complaints of Sir Edgar's nephew, recently arrived from London and now hard at work learning German, a process he finds thoroughly disagreeable and against which they have heard his protests. As soon as he is proficient, they will all be invited to meet him! They depart in a much better mood.

¹ An operatic curiosity was the appearance of Sir Rudolf Bing, long-time General Manager of New York's Metropolitan Opera, in this silent role at New York's City Opera in 1973. Bing, who had retired from the Metropolitan in 1972, had always maintained a lofty hostility towards rival companies, particularly those close to home.

Scene v. A reception in the library of Sir Edgar's house. Final preparations for a party are in hand, and Begonia waltzes across the stage with a vast dish of goodies in either hand. She is on top of the world and breaks into English to inform us (as so often before) of Napoleon's attitude towards these edibles, in this case favourable. All is ready for the entrance of the guests, headed by the Baroness herself, with Luise and Ida and the other worthies of the town, not forgetting Wilhelm. The secretary greets them, tea or punch or champagne is served and there are expressions of general gratification.

The secretary says that Sir Edgar still has reservations about his nephew's ability to speak German, but everyone makes light of the problem and in a moment Sir Edgar becomes visible on a staircase, with the young Lord. Sir Edgar kisses the Baroness's hand, and so after a moment's hesitation does Lord Barrat. He is wearing gloves and spectacles and is very smartly dressed. His conversation is a bit limited but everyone is impressed, not least Luise, whose handbag he seizes, and, after a quick look round, chucks behind him. The Baroness appears by no means nonplussed and tells Luise to offer him a cup of tea. After a moment's hesitation and conversation with Ida, she brings him the cup, which he takes in both hands, empties and then throws behind him. When he starts to kiss in rapid succession the hands of the Baroness and Luise, everyone, after a moment's stupefaction, breathes again.

Nothing goes absolutely right, in spite of the Mayor's interest in Begonia, and when Lord Barrat puts first one leg and then the other on the table, there is nothing to do for the ladies but comment on the elegance with which he pursues his eccentricities, a point of view with which Wilhelm is not in accord. The Mayor continues to pay court to Begonia, and the ladies cluster round Lord Barrat. This worthy distinguishes himself by pulling a ribbon off Luise's dress and then starts to dance. He plays with Luise's shawl, and Begonia comments 'Jamaica girls call this hanky-panky. Napoleon hated it.' Wilhelm can stand it no longer and faces up to Lord Barrat, to whom Sir Edgar and the Secretary make signs to depart. Luise faints, and Wilhelm feels everyone against him.

Scene vi. The great ballroom in the Casino. Luise leaves the scene of activity and comes in by one of the doors to sing of her happiness in an aria. Her love for Lord Barrat has transformed her from the naïve girl who fell for Wilhelm to somebody much more knowing. Lord Barrat comes in giving her a rose so that the thorn scratches her hand until the blood flows. Barrat and Luise sing together and after a moment Wilhelm comes in. Soon everyone is a party to the secret of the betrothal.

The room fills up and all start to dance (Débutantes' waltz), Lord Barrat in so exaggerated a manner as to cause everybody else to try at first to copy him (as they have earlier his clothes and manners) until, after a bit, he takes Luise alone on to the floor and the others draw back. Watched all the time by Sir Edgar's secretary, he seizes an instrument from one of the band and blows it savagely to the mild astonishment of the councillors, who continue to contrive some form of admiration. When he starts to swing from the chandeliers, astonishment gives way to alarm, and even the appearance of Sir Edgar, who greets Wilhelm, does not prevent an element of panic creeping in. Lord Barrat dances Luise into exhaustion, then proceeds to tear his gloves, tie and clothes off, throwing them in every direction. Before long the monkey is revealed and led from the room at a sign from Sir Edgar. Luise and Wilhelm clutch one another, but the comedy comes to an end in general consternation. H.

THE BASSARIDS

Opera seria with intermezzo (cut in 1992 revision of the score) in one act, libretto, based on The Bacchae of Euripides, by W.H. Auden and Chester Kallman. Première, Salzburg, 6 August 1966, with Ingeborg Hallstein, Kerstin Meyer, Vera Little, Loren Driscoll, Helmut Melchert, Kostas Paskalis, conductor Christoph von Dohnanyi. First produced Deutsche Oper, Berlin, 1966, with the same cast and conductor; la Scala, Milan, 1967, in Italian, conductor Sanzogno; Santa Fe, 1967, in English, with Regina Safarty, Driscoll, John Reardon, conductor Henze; English National Opera, 1974, with Barstow, Katherine Pring, Dempsey, Woollam, Welsby, producer and conductor Henze.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Dionysus (also Voice and Stranger) | Tenor |
| Pentheus, King of Thebes | Baritone |
| Cadmus, his grandfather, founder of Thebes | Bass |
| Tiresias, an old blind prophet | Tenor |
| Captain of the Royal Guard | Baritone |
| Agave, Cadmus' daughter and mother of Pentheus | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Autonoe, her sister | Soprano |
| Beroe, an old slave, once nurse to Semele and later to Pentheus | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Young Woman, slave in Agave's household | Mute |
| Child, her daughter | Mute |
| Bassarids (Maenads and Bacchantes), Citizens of Thebes, Guards, Servants | |
| Place: The Royal Palace, Thebes, and Mount Cythæron | |
| Time: Antiquity | |
| Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes | |

The Bassarids.¹ Henze's second collaboration with W.H. Auden and Chester Kallman, is a free adaptation of The Bacchae of Euripides. The composer asked his librettists to mould the opera in the form of a symphony, and the result is a continuous work, about as long as Das Rheingold, cast in four movements – composer and librettists use this title to designate the changes of mood. It was freely said at the time of the opera's première that the writers agreed to provide the tragic libretto of The Bassarids provided Henze 'made his peace with Wagner'. Peter Heyworth² suggested that this stipulation was very much in the composer's interests. 'In a period when the orchestra has evolved into such a uniquely supple and expressive instrument and the springs of melody have run so low ... there has seemed something almost perverse in Henze's devotion to the closed and essentially melodic forms of the old Italian opera ... in his manner of manipulating material, Henze is deeply indebted to the Schoenbergian dodecaphonic technique, and the most natural means of applying this to opera lies in the quasi-symphonic Wagnerian music drama, if only because both are rooted in the art of variation.'

The story symbolises 'the terrible revenge taken by the sensual Dionysian side of human nature if its existence is denied and its demands repressed',³ and the achievement of the librettists is to have not only reflected the brutality of the century in which they write (and during which we watch and listen) but also to have filled the book with a web of psychological motivation. In the process, they have inspired the composer to one of his most important operatic scores.

Thebes was founded by Cadmus, son of Agenor, King of Tyre, and brother of Europa, who had been loved by Zeus in the guise of a bull. Five warriors, known as the Sown Men because they sprang from the dragon's teeth Cadmus sowed, helped him to build the citadel of Thebes and themselves founded the city's noble families, one of their number Echion marrying Cadmus' youngest daughter Agave. Another of Cadmus' daughters was Semele, whom Zeus courted as a mortal. Zeus' wife, Hera, disguised herself as Semele's servant, Beroe, and persuaded her to demand that Zeus should reveal himself in all his divine splendour, a piece of mortal folly whose gratification reduced her to ashes.⁴ Zeus, legend goes, succeeded in rescuing her unborn child, Dionysus, and sewing him into his thigh from which eventually the boy was born.

Before the opera starts, Semele's tomb is already a shrine of pilgrimage for devotees of the cult of Dionysus, but some people, including Semele's own sisters, believe that Semele's lover was a mortal and not Zeus at all and consequently view the cult with contempt. Cadmus has abdicated in favour of his grandson Pentheus, who now reigns as King of Thebes. On his shoulders rather than on those of his grandfather lies the momentous responsibility of deciding whether to risk offending the other gods by recognising Dionysus' divinity, or run the consequences of Dionysus' wrath by opting for the theory that Semele's lover was mortal. Pentheus' invidious position is complicated by his absolute belief in reason and conviction that the source of all human blindness and wrongdoing lies in the passions of the flesh.

First movement. The courtyard of the royal palace in Thebes, with the palace on one side and the tomb of Semele on the other; in front of the tomb is an altar on which a flame burns. The citizens of Thebes are gathered in tribute to their new King. Their theme is the founding of Thebes and its present – they hope auspicious – rule by a Sown Man's son, Pentheus.

¹ The title Bassarids is an alternative name for Bacchae, or worshippers of Dionysus.

² Writing in The Observer after the Salzburg première.

³ The Times after the première in Salzburg.

⁴ See pp. 327–29.

Suddenly a voice is heard from a distance: 'Ayayalya! the God Dionysus has entered Bœotia!' The musical atmosphere dramatically changes from the matter-of-fact to one of mystery, and the reaction of the people is instantaneous: they take up the chant and go off in the direction from which the singing seems to have come – the populace has turned in the course of a few bars of music into Bassarids.

When Cadmus, Beroe, Agave and Tiresias make their entry, it is to find the space in front of the palace empty. Tiresias, the old blind prophet whose weakness is that he cannot bear to be excluded from the latest movement, longs to join the worshippers of Dionysus and go to Mount Cythaeron. Cadmus urges caution, on the grounds that no one yet knows for sure that Dionysus is a god, and moreover the mere mention of his name seems to infuriate Pentheus the King. When Agave asks Beroe if Semele was loved by Zeus, she can elicit from her no more than 'I know nothing', which only increases her contempt for Tiresias' enthusiasm.

During the following scene, the Bassarids' hymn continues as background. Cadmus is concerned with the crucial matter of whether Dionysus is divine or not, but Agave's attention is quickly diverted by the sight of the Captain of the Guard, a handsome man no longer in his first youth but sufficiently attractive to appeal to her deprived, widow's eyes. Autonoe comes in behind Agave, and it is plain that she too is attracted by the Captain of the Guard. Beroe tells them that the King wants his most prominent relations to hear the first proclamation of his reign, which the Captain of the Guard now reads; the royal message denounces the idea that Semele was the object of the affections of one of the immortals and therefore that her offspring could himself be a god, and forbids Thebans to subscribe to any such belief.

Before his grandfather, mother, aunt and nurse have had time to do more than begin their comment on his proclamation, Pentheus himself appears. He is a young man, spare, athletic, even ascetic in appearance, and immediately starts to dilate on the ignorance which has permitted women to light a flame on Semele's tomb. After a moment's hesitation, he flings his cloak over the flame on the altar and extinguishes it. Only then does the King notice that the people, who had been summoned to listen to his proclamation, are not in the square and, when Agave reveals to him that they danced off to Cythaeron, he departs in a fury, leaving his relations to comment on the course of events. Suddenly the off-stage voice of Dionysus is heard singing mysteriously and beautifully the praises of Cythaeron (usually referred to as his Serenade). Agave and Autonoe are hypnotised by what they hear and dance away so that they are out of sight by the time Pentheus reappears.

Second movement. Cadmus in his despair reasserts his authority – Pentheus after all rules by his consent. But Pentheus refuses to listen to him, proclaims that in future Thebes will know a harder rule, and, to Cadmus' evident dismay, orders the guards out, instructing them to proceed to Cythaeron and return with what prisoners they can take. The sound of the Bassarids' chant is heard again, and during Pentheus' aria (its burden: Thebes must once again know Truth and spurn what is false) his old nurse Beroe mutters a prayer to herself. When he has finished, Pentheus turns to Beroe, and swears in her presence to 'abstain from wine, from meats, and from woman's bed, live sober and chaste till the day I die'.

The guards return with their prisoners, among them Agave, Autonoe, Tiresias, a youthful stranger who is in fact Dionysus, a few male Bacchants, and a young woman with her child. All are in a state of trance and the Bassarids' chant continues as Pentheus, unable to get any sensible answer from his prisoners, orders the Captain to take them away and question them with torture, leaving behind only Tiresias, the unknown young man, and his own relations to be examined by the King himself.

Agave is the first to be questioned and in an aria she attempts to describe what she saw on Mount Cythaeron – 'a kind of Wordsworthian mystical vision of nature', the librettists have called it. Beroe tries to warn Pentheus, but the scene is soon out of his control as each one present pursues his or her own line of thinking. To the King's fury, not only can he himself get nothing out of the prisoners, but the Captain tells him that even under torture the others seemed to feel no pain and gave no information. The King orders Agave and Autonoe to their palace, bids the Captain of the Guard demolish Tiresias' house, and himself starts to question the stranger (whom he imagines a priest of Dionysus), at first casually, but gradually, as he reacts to the answers he gets, with barely suppressed fury. In the course of an aria, the stranger tells him of the curious adventure which befell him in the Aegean, when he hired a ship and crew to take him to the island of Naxos. The sailors turned out to be pirates and altered course, meaning to sell him as a slave. But Dionysus caused a vine to grow from the deck and wild animals to appear on board, so that the seamen leapt overboard in terror and were turned into dolphins.

Third movement. The Bassarids continue to sing, the Captain returns and waits for orders, and Pentheus' calm finally breaks with the result that he orders the Captain to take the stranger away and 'break that smiling mouth of its lie. Lay whips to his pampered flesh ...'.

Influences beyond Pentheus' control take over. There is the sound of an earthquake, Pentheus' cloak is plucked from Semele's tomb so that the flame shoots up again, and the prisoners can be heard shouting as they escape towards Cythaeron. The King orders the Captain to take the guard on to the hill and wipe out all the worshippers of Dionysus he can find, but the stranger urges a more cautious course, his words having a curious effect on Pentheus, who seems to agree with the advice he is being given and who welcomes, repelled and fascinated at the same time, the offer which is made to him, that he may by magic see the rites in which his mother and his aunt are engaged. The audible laughter of the Bassarids serves as a link as the scenery disappears to be replaced by what is described in the score as 'a realistically painted representation of a Boucher-like garden, with statues of mythological groups'.

Intermezzo.¹ In a period, up-dated setting – 'Marie Antoinette' is the style – Agave and Autonoe are breathless with laughter in their reaction to the behaviour of Pentheus. With the Captain of the Guard, whom each thinks of as a kind of sexual plaything, they enact the story of the Judgement of Calliope – as will be seen at the end, in reality Pentheus' repressed fantasies, where sex is far from the robust thing known to Thebes, but, in a decadent world, the subject of giggles.

Cinryas, King of Cyprus, has boasted that his daughter Smyrna is more beautiful than the goddess Aphrodite. In revenge, Aphrodite has had Smyrna fall in love with her own father by whom, while he is drunk, she becomes pregnant. When Cinryas discovers what has happened, sword in hand he chases his daughter, whom Aphrodite turns into a myrrh tree at the moment Cinryas' sword splits her in two. Out falls the infant Adonis. With an eye to the future, Aphrodite hides him in a chest and entrusts it to Persephone, Queen of the Dead, who herself falls a prey to feminine curiosity and opens the chest, immediately to fall in love with Adonis, whom she takes off to her own palace. Aphrodite appeals to Zeus and he appoints the Muse Calliope to make judgement. The verdict of Calliope is that each of the goddesses has rendered Adonis signal service and therefore has an equal claim on him; his year should therefore be divided into three parts, one for Aphrodite, one for Persephone and one to be spent as he himself chooses. Aphrodite cheats and by her magic contrives that Adonis spends all the year with her, with the result that Persephone, with more than a little justification, goes to Ares (Mars) and tells him that Aphrodite has a mortal lover whom she prefers to him. The god in his jealous rage disguises himself as a boar and gores Adonis to death on Mount Lebanon.¹ As part of the up-dating process (for the modern audience in the theatre rather than the voyeur king) the names of the characters in the story are changed from their Greek versions to Mars, Pluto, Jove, Venus, Proserpine.

The story is worked out in semi-formal musical terms and played as a charade by Agave, Autonoe and the Captain, while Tiresias enters dressed as a kind of Bacchant to act as Calliope. A pair of mandolins and a guitar on the stage give the accompaniment an element of period flavour, and recitatives, arias (usually with a specified cabaletta), duets, a round for four voices, a formal trio and a final quartet follow each other in sequence, to music which owes something to the Stravinsky of the 1920s, until all four dissolve in laughter and the Captain starts to make good his escape, averring 'my prospects here are gross and grim: those two will have me limb from limb'. The laughter of the Bassarids ends the Intermezzo as it had begun it.

A courtyard of the palace once again. Pentheus is beside himself with righteous horror and indignation and determines to go off to Mount Cythaeron to learn the worst. The stranger seems to warn him of the

¹ In 1992 the composer revised the score to exclude the Intermezzo, which was henceforth to be known as 'Das Urteil der Kalliope' and to be available to be performed separately.

¹ See page 355 for Henze's later approach to this legend.

perils he will run but insists that he must dress as a woman if he is to have any chance of escaping detection. Beroe begs the stranger to spare him, addressing him as Dionysus. He refuses, and Pentheus emerges tricked out incongruously in one of Agave's dresses. The voices of Dionysus and Pentheus join and by the end of their scene together sound – literally, as they sing together – as one. Dionysus takes Pentheus by the hand and leads him towards Cythæron. Beroe is left alone lamenting the loss of the King and Cadmus adds his own lament, this time for the prospective fall of Thebes.

With the sound of the Bassarids becoming insidiously audible again, the scene changes, a procession of torches can be seen, the world of the senses has again taken over and through the foliage Pentheus can be observed crouching on a branch of a tree. The Bacchic orgy proceeds, Pentheus temporarily disappears and the voice of Dionysus himself is heard greeting the Maenads and inviting them to hunt down a trespasser who must, he says, be in their midst. The movements of the Bassarids have started as ritual but, as the music mounts in tension, they acquire purpose and the manhunt is on. Suddenly, a shaft of light falls on Pentheus and he is seen to be surrounded. In a moving final statement, half dignified, half imploring, he begs his mother to recognise him, but in vain, and as the lights go out, nothing but his scream is left of what had once been King of Thebes.

Fourth movement. The Maenads are heard in a chorus of triumph, and, back in the courtyard of the palace, Cadmus and Beroe are still keeping watch. When they appear, Agave is seen to be carrying the head of Pentheus torn from his body, and, shuddering, Cadmus attempts to introduce an element of the rational into a situation which, he sees clearly, poses the end of the Thebes he himself had created. When Agave demands to see the King, he starts slowly to question her, as to what she can see, what she can remember and finally, what she can recognise in the gory object she carries. She tries to maintain her belief that it is the head of a young lion, but in the end – agonisingly – recognises her own son. As the Captain and the guards carry in the mangled corpse of King Pentheus on a litter, Autonoe and the Chorus disclaim all part in the murder, but Agave understands and asks her father to take Pentheus' sword and slay her with it. An ensemble of lamentation covers the efforts of Agave to move from a state of shock to one where the deepest grief is possible, and she mourns the death of her son in a slow aria.

Suddenly, Dionysus is on the scene, proclaiming, with so little preamble that the effect is one of insensitivity, his godly condition, and banishing Cadmus, Autonoe and Agave from Thebes, ordering the Captain to set fire to the palace. In a sudden burst of defiance, Agave turns to Dionysus and tells him to remember the fate of Uranus and Chronos.¹ Tartarus waits for them all in the end.

As the stage is bathed in flame, Dionysus sings of his purpose in coming to Thebes – vengeance for what the city and its inhabitants have done to his mother; it only remains now for him to restore Semele to the position from which her enemies tried to remove her. As the opera ends in a soft chorus of the Bassarids, two statues are seen standing on Semele's tomb, representing Dionysus and Thyone (the new name of the translated Semele) and appearing to the eyes of the twentieth-century audience as 'two enormous primitive fertility idols of an African or South Seas type'.

H.

THE ENGLISH CAT

Opera in two acts, libretto by Edward Bond (from a short story by Honoré de Balzac). Première Schwetzingen, 2 June 1983, by Württemberg State Theatre, Stuttgart. First performed Edinburgh Festival, 1987.

Lord Puff, a cat, President of the Royal Society for Protection of Rats Tenor Arnold, his nephew Bass
 Jones, a cat, money-lender, member of R.S.P.R. Baritone
 Judge, a dog Baritone
 Tom, a cat Baritone
 Peter, Tom's friend, a cat Tenor
 Mr Keen, member of R.S.P.R. Tenor Defence, a dog Tenor

¹ Uranus in Greek mythology was the personification of Heaven. He hated his children, the Titans, and confined them in Tartarus. But they broke out and his son Chronos dethroned him, only later in his turn to be dethroned by his own son Zeus.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Parson, a sheep..... | Tenor |
| Lucian, a fox | Tenor |
| Minette, a cat | Soprano |
| Babette, Minette's sister | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Louise, a mouse | Soprano |
| Miss Crisp, a cat, member of R.S.P.R. | Soprano |
| Miss Gomfit, a cat, member of R.S.P.R. | Soprano |
| Lady Toodle, a cat | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Mr Plunkett, a cat, member of R.S.P.R. .. | Bass-Baritone |
| Prosecutor, a dog..... | Bass-Baritone |
| Ensemble of Moon and Stars | |

Place: London

Time: 1900

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Written between 1978 and 1982, The English Cat is a satirical black comedy, in form a sophisticated ballad opera with separate songs, in the manner as it were of John Gay or Brecht. It is Henze's fourth opera written to an original English text, his second with Edward Bond. It is scored for big chamber orchestra, with a large percussion section. Different instrumental colours are associated with the leading characters, Lord Puff with chamber organ, Minette with zither, Arnold with heckelphone.

Act I. Mrs Halifax's drawing room. Lord Puff announces his plan to marry; his impecunious, prospectively bankrupt nephew Arnold schemes to frustrate the match. Enter Babette, Minette's sister, to spy out the land. Minette follows and is plainly unused to city ways (cavatina). Enter Louise, a mouse, collecting for the R.S.P.R. (Ländler). Arnold contends that Minette, from a rough, unsophisticated country background, is an unfit mate for his uncle; Lord Puff demurs (ensemble).

The roof of Mrs Halifax's house. Lovers are heard mellifluously serenading, and Minette warns Tom and Peter they are trespassing. She sings wistfully (aria) until Tom returns and almost immediately tells her he is in love with her (cavatina). Minette wants him to join the R.S.P.R. – to please her husband! Moon and Stars provide the scene's extended nocturnal finale.

The instrumental interlude is labelled 'Collages'. Mrs Halifax's chapel. Arnold's money-lender, Jones, pretends to be a doctor and on medical grounds warns Lord Puff against his marriage. Lord Puff's friends frustrate an attempt to poison him, but, when Minette comes in dressed as a bride (waltz), Arnold demands she publicly declare what she and Tom were doing on the roof the previous night. Lord Puff still wants to go through with the marriage, on which depends his forthcoming election as President of the R.S.P.R., and as it is celebrated the act ends with an ensemble.

Act II. Mrs Halifax's drawing room. Babette and Minette bemoan the former's country poverty (duet). Tom appears outside the window, and Minette lets him in (tango). He is a deserter from the army but throws himself at her feet and is caught in this compromising position by Lord Puff and his friends (waltz). Minette explains she and Tom plan to marry when Lord Puff dies and devote themselves to serving the R.S.P.R. Lord Puff would forgive (trio) but his friends urge divorce. Minette thinks of Tom and ends the scene with a lament.

Divorce Court. The Judge and Jury are assembled and Arnold gives his evidence. Tom, pretending to act for the defence, cross-examines Lord Puff and when the court is empty seems about to throw himself at Minette's feet until she remembers the disastrous effect the last time he did it and tries to stop him. Nonetheless he completes the manoeuvre and is again caught in the act. Defence counsel has been discovered bound and gagged and now reveals that Tom is far from being counsel but is himself the co-respondent in the case. Minette is found guilty and heavily fined; Tom is made ready for prison (canzonetta), until suddenly the prosecutor recognises him as the heir of Lord Fairport who has just died. He is now the possessor of a large fortune. The Judge recognises him too.

Mrs Halifax's drawing room. Babette discovers Minette bundled up in a sack and ready on Mrs Halifax's orders to be thrown from London Bridge. Tom would gladly die with her if that would help but since it won't, he plans to console Babette, and at the same time himself (terzetto). Tom again throws himself at Minette's feet, just in time to reject Lord Puff's request that he hand over his new fortune to the R.S.P.R. (moresco). He leaves, Lord Puff and the others rack their brains for a way to get hold of the money, and the odd-job man carries the sack out and dumps it in the river (arietta and rondo).

Lincoln's Inn Fields: Lawyer's chambers. Tom is stabbed to death by Lucian, a lawyer's clerk. As he died intestate, his money passes, as Lord Puff and friends had hoped, to the R.S.P.R. Tom and Minette sing a duet of death, and it remains for Louise, the mouse, to steal a coin from her collecting box, put it in Tom's pocket and sing a requiem which celebrates her return to a life of thieving and frightening ladies into standing on chairs (villanella). H.

DAS VERRATENE MEER

The Betrayed Sea

Musikdrama in two acts, libretto by Hans-Ulrich Treichel, after Yukio Mishima's Gogo no eiko (1963). First performed Berlin by Deutsche Oper, 5 May 1990, conducted by Markus Stenz, with Beverly Morgan singing, Stephanie Sundine miming Fusako, Clemens Bieber as Noboru, Andreas Schmidt as Ryuji. Revived Wiesbaden, 1990, conducted by Ulf Schirmer. Italian première, Teatro Lirico, Milan, 1991, with Morgan, Sacca and Lenus Carlson, conductor Stenz; first U.S. performance, San Francisco, 1991, with Ashley Putnam, Craig Estep and Tom Fox.

Fusako Kuroda,
a thirty-three-year-old widow.....High Soprano

Noboru, her thirteen-year-old son, known as No. ThreeTenor

Ryuji Tsukazaki, a merchant navy officer.....Baritone

The Gang, friends of Noboru

No. One, the leader.....Baritone

No. TwoTenor

No. Four.....Baritone

No. FiveBass-Baritone

Ship's MateBass-Baritone

Ship's Officer, Sailors, Harbour Master, Boutique
Manager, Three Shop Assistants

Place: Yokohama

Time: 1950s

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Henze's Das verratene Meer surprised a lot of people: why would a left-wing European composer want to adapt a story by the right-wing Japanese author Yukio Mishima? The story has been read as an allegory on Japan's willing surrender to Western, industrial culture. Fusako runs a boutique selling Western clothes, called 'Rex', while the gang occupy an ex-U.S. army installation. To some extent, Henze colours the conflict with his instrumentation: saxophone on one side; exotic percussion instruments (Chinese gongs, o-daiko and guiro) on the other. He certainly does not present the conflict as between sickness and health, however: divided violas and cellos invite our sympathy with the love affair between Fusako and Ryuji, whereas the gangleader's psychopathic ravings sound particularly lurid because they mostly lack string support and are backed by lower woodwind. Yet Henze refuses to conclude: the opera ends not with the murder and the chord marked quadruple forte, but in the silence before it.

Part I: Summer. Scene i. Fusako Kuroda puts her son Noboru to bed, promising that they will visit the ship tomorrow. She locks him into his bedroom, to prevent him meeting his gang of friends during the night. She goes into her room and undresses. Noboru gets up and looks through a hole in the wall between their rooms. In the moonlight she rubs oil into her skin, looks at a photo of her dead husband and compares herself to a garden buried under snow. Noboru gazes in rapture, his thoughts ranging from his gang of friends ('When they call I must follow; they order I obey') to his longing to have 'no heart' and, instead, the pounding engine of a ship. The interlude evokes 'Noboru's dream'.

Scene ii. In Yokohama harbour, Fusako and Noboru are welcomed on board the freight-ship Rakuyo-Mar by the Second Officer, Ryuji Tsukazaki. Fusako and Ryuji are drawn together as Noboru investigates the machinery. Fusako invites the officer to dinner in a French restaurant. Ryuji's dream emerges as 'perhaps a kind of bourrée'.

Scene iii. Two days later, in a park near Fusako's house, Ryuji tells Fusako about his life at sea: at first he dreamed of travelling further than his eyes could see. But now, all ports seem the same. They kiss.

Scene iv. An hour later, in Fusako's bedroom. She is fascinated by Ryuji; he reflects that until now he has always paid for sex. Meanwhile, Noboru watches them through the spyhole. Their feelings are superimposed in a trio. Having looked into the sailor's eyes, Noboru is convinced that 'He belongs to me, the night belongs to me.'

Scene v. Next morning, at the gang's meeting place, Noboru excitedly describes the sailor in idealised terms, as 'an animal from the depths, with iron muscles and shoulders of stone'. But the gangleader ridicules his hero-worship, and suggests that Ryuji is just after Fusako's money.

Scene vi. Later that afternoon in a park high above the sea, Ryuji cools himself off with some water from the fountain and inadvertently soaks himself. He encounters Noboru and the gang, who look critically at his wet shirt.

Scene vii. A few days later, at the port, Ryuji leaves, but promises that he will be back for the new year. The ship's siren drowns out Noboru's farewell cries.

Scene viii. The gangleader has brought a sack to their meeting point and pulls out a kitten. The others are chilled, uneasy. The leader puts on rubber gloves and lays out instruments such as scissors and knives on a work bench. They all hand the kitten around and, on the leader's instructions, Noboru kills it.¹

Part II: Winter. Scene ix. New Year's Day, before dawn. Fusako and Ryuji look forward to the new day and the new year in a duet inflected by the rhythm of a tango. Ryuji asks Fusako to marry him and offers her all his savings. Fusako cries but reminds him his ship is waiting. Ryuji tells her that it must wait for him, 'perhaps... for ever'.

Scene x. The gang agree all fathers are cowards. They laugh at Noboru's hero Ryuji and are appalled to hear that the sailor now helps Fusako in her boutique. The scene ends as the leader pulls on his leather glove and turns back the cuff to reveal its red lining.

Scene xi. While Fusako lays the table for dinner, Ryuji reads out of a textbook on 'Selling Textile Wares'. Noboru is appalled to hear that his mother plans to marry him. She asks her son to call Ryuji 'Papa'. Noboru retreats to his bedroom and uncovers his spyhole but falls asleep with his light on. In their bedroom Fusako and Ryuji see light coming from the hole in the wall and realise what this implies. Fusako is furious, but Ryuji refuses to beat Noboru; instead, to Noboru's disgust, he forgives him.

Scene xii. In the warehouse where the gang assemble, Noboru summarises Ryuji's 'crimes' while the leader awards him penalty points. Worse than Ryuji's flattery of Noboru, or his exaggerated laughter (glissando on solo soprano saxophone), is the fact that he forgave Noboru (total: 150 penalty points). The leader insists that they cannot do anything more for the sailor and orders Noboru to bring Ryuji to them, using the excuse that they would like to hear about the sea and his adventures. The violent interlude raises the tension further.

Scene xiii. Fusako prepares to leave the shop. In a rhapsodic, melismatic arioso she looks forward to Noboru's further education and assumes he will learn to love Ryuji. Meanwhile the boys are seen climbing up to their 'dry dock', the remains of a U.S. Forces installation.

Scene xiv. A tape of musique concrète colours in the frantic industrialisation around Yokohama. Ryuji starts to tell the boys about the reality of life at sea, beginning with seasickness (vividly evoked in a mass outbreak of instrumental trills). Sensing their evident lack of interest, instead, he sings them his favourite song 'Ich setzte grosse Segel auf'. This just makes them snigger. Ryuji explains that he became a sailor not because he loved the sea, but because he hated the land. The leader takes off his leather gloves and puts on long rubber ones, while the other boys assemble their weapons. Ryuji does not notice. He drinks a cup of drugged tea. His voice becomes weaker, almost delirious, as he reminisces about tropical birds, the sun and the longing that gripped his heart in the evening, 'darker than the darkest night'. In the ensemble that ends the opera the boys' reflections all end with the same resonant phrase, 'darker than the darkest night'. The sailor falls asleep and the boys raise their weapons.

Das verratene Meer is a work of astonishingly powerful theatricality, owing more to the tradition of Puccini, say, than Verdi. The score registers every nervous tremor in the relationships between the characters, both their surface reactions (the heat in the ship's engine-room; the chill before dawn on New Year's Day) and their emotional implications. The masterly orchestration is an object lesson in inventiveness – the oboe d'amore used to sound hard and cold, for example. Only close inspection of the score convinced me the seagull cries were indeed taped seagull cries and not some exquisitely witty writing for woodwind. P.

VENUS UND ADONIS

Opera in one act, text by Hans-Ulrich Treichel. Première, Bavarian State Opera, Munich, 11 January 1997, with Nadine Secunde, Chris Merritt, Ekkehard Wlaschiha, conductor Marcus Stenz.

The Prima DonnaSoprano
Clemente, a young opera singerTenor
The Leading ActorBaritone

¹ Never has an interval drink seemed more necessary: listening to a tape of B.B.C. Radio 3's broadcast of the première, which I attended, reminded me how shocked the audience was at this point.

Six Madrigalists (Shepherds)

.....Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Tenor, Bass

| | | |
|--------|---|--------------|
| Venus | } |Dancers |
| Adonis | | |
| Mars | | |

Running Time: 1 hour 15 minutes

The action is simple. Preparation is in hand for an opera involving Venus, Adonis and Mars. Love develops between Venus and Adonis, Mars is overcome with jealousy and a wild boar kills Adonis.

Dancers mirror the singers, reflecting the action in between episodes where the solo singers dominate. Additionally, there are six madrigal singers, described as shepherds, but in Munich, in the production supervised by the composer, remaining hidden throughout the opera in a tree which dominated the set. They comment obliquely on what takes place.

As they rehearse, Clemente is attracted to the prima donna, with whom the leading actor is himself besotted. His jealousy grows as he watches the amorous couple and, when the boar kills Adonis, the actor stabs Clemente. As the opera ends, Adonis flies up to the planet Venus, the singer in Munich finishing the opera symbolically in the Royal Box at the front of the Grand Circle.

Features of the score are the division of the sizeable orchestra into three to accompany the three singers, and the comments on the action in music of ravishing quality by the invisible madrigalists.

PAUL HINDEMITH

(born 16 November 1895, died 28 December 1963)

Hindemith's career in opera follows a sad trajectory. Success came to him at an early age: when he was twenty-six, Fritz Busch conducted the premières of his two one-act operas, Morder, Hoffnung der Frauen and Das Nusch-Nuschi, in Stuttgart. They demonstrated how at home Hindemith was in radically chic, contemporary culture, where Expressionism and its parody could co-exist happily on the same playbill. He added a third one-act piece in 1922, the scandalous Sancta Susanna. His first full-length opera followed in 1926, with a prestigious première at the Staatsoper, Dresden: Cardillac, the first of three works in which Hindemith considered the role of the artist in society. They were never conceived as a trilogy (and individual revivals of any of them are rare enough), but they add up to a coherent treatment of the theme. They reveal that the composer thought of himself in progressively grander and more remote terms: as a murderous goldsmith, as the painter Mathias Grünewald, as the astronomer who discovers the 'harmony of the world', Johannes Kepler. The middle opera, Mathis der Mahler (1938), has long enjoyed the reputation of Hindemith's greatest work, in terms of sustained musical argument. It is another, comparatively neglected work, however, Neues vom Tage (1929), that proves to be his most enjoyable opera. Hindemith had worked with the poet Marcellus Schiffer on the sketch Hin und zurück (1927), which featured a married couple quarrelling. Neues vom Tage is a Zeitoper, part of the wave of operas that surfaced in the late Twenties, concerned to reflect contemporary reality, such as Křenek's Jonny spielt auf (1927) and Weill's Die Burgschaft (1932). Its theme of the media's corrupting influence on private life has not dated. The musical richness that Hindemith lavishes on Schiffer's spare frame provides repeated delights: bureaucratic ineptitude, stenographical rhapsody, tourism, hot baths, escorts and media intrusions generate wonderful melodies and brilliant comedy. Ironically, the magnum opus with which Hindemith hoped to secure his reputation, Die Harmonie der Welt (1957), never lived up to the composer's expectations. He once began a lecture by reflecting on what 'A composition of everlasting value' means.¹ When he eschewed actuality in pursuit of what were meant to be eternal verities, however, Hindemith created a work that died as soon as it was born.

¹ The Charles Eliot Norton Lectures, 1949–50, reprinted as A Composer's World, Horizons and Limitations, 1952.

P.

CARDILLAC

Opera in three acts, libretto by Ferdinand Lion, from E.T.A. Hoffmann's story Das Fräulein von Scuderi. Première in Dresden, 9 November 1926, with Robert Burg, Claire Born, Grete Merrem, Max Hirzel, Ludwig Eybisch, Adolph Schoepfin, Paul Schöffler, conductor Fritz Busch. First performed in Vienna, 1927, with Jerger, Stünzner, Achsel, Hofer, Maikl, conductor Heger; Prague, 1927; Berlin, 1928, with Krenn, Hüni-Mihacsek, de Strozzi, Fidesser, conductor Klemperer; London, 1936, Broadcasting House (concert in English) with Arthur Fear, Noel Eadie, Miriam Licette, Frank Mullings, John McKenna, conductor Clarence Raybould; Venice, 1948, conductor Sanzogno. New version: Zürich, 1952, with Herbert Brauer, conductor Reinshagen. Revived (in original version), Wuppertal, 1960, producer Reinhardt, conductor Ratjen (and at Holland Festival); Vienna, 1964, with Wiener, Lipp, Seefried, Nocker, Stolze, conductor Ludwig; Munich, 1965, with Fischer-Dieskau; Santa Fe, 1967, with Reardon, conductor Craft (the outdoor opera house was burned out following the first night); London, New Opera Company, 1970.

| | |
|---|-----------|
| The Goldsmith Cardillac..... | Baritone |
| His Daughter | Soprano |
| The Lady | Soprano |
| The Officer | Tenor |
| The Cavalier | Tenor |
| The Gold Merchant | Bass |
| The Officer of Police..... | High Bass |
| The King; Knights and Ladies of the Court; the Police; the Crowd | |

Place: Paris

Time: Seventeenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

Cardillac was Hindemith's fifth opera, his first of full length, and written after the one-acters Mörder, Hoffnung der Frauen (to libretto by the painter Kokoschka), Das Nusch-Nuschi (in 1921), Sancta Susanna (rejected as obscene by Stuttgart but given in Frankfurt in 1922) and the Christmas fairytale, Tuttifantchen. It concerns itself with the relationship between the artist and society, a theme stated here in more extreme form than in the composer's later operas Mathis der Maler and Die Harmonie der Welt.

As befits a period of Hindemith's creative life which was combative and progressivist, the original score of Cardillac, if cool, is muscular and purposeful, and its energy suits a story which shows the artist insisting on his prerogatives rather than the philosophical Mathis setting the world more patiently to rights. The music is scored for inflated chamber orchestra (eighteen strings are specified) and is in style contrapuntal and linear, in form baroque – Hindemith uses Aria, Duet, Fugato, Passacaglia, etc., and the tension of the opera comes less from the drama and inherent moments of pathos than from the musical impetus of taut, closed forms.

Cardillac expresses a reaction against the German tradition of through-composed dramatic music, as epitomised by Wagner and carried on during Hindemith's youth by Strauss. The more astonishing is it that the composer saw fit in 1952, nearly a generation after the opera's first performance, to revise it extensively.¹ An act is added (consisting musically of Lully's opera Phaeton, with the Lady of Act I transformed into a leading singer), a new and milder text by the composer himself is substituted for Ferdinand Lion's original adaptation of E.T.A. Hoffmann, there are some cuts and some new music, but basically the orchestral part is retained with a new vocal line above it setting new words.

Hindemith's revised version of the opera had its première in Zürich and was generally looked upon as watered-down, even sentimentalised, in comparison with the original. The composer's embargo on the 1926 version was not generally lifted until his death in 1963.

Act I. An energy-laden prelude takes us into the first scene, a street in the city on to which lead streets from all sides. The Paris mob is in the grip of panic, as we hear when the curtain goes up. A series of murders has been committed and their mysterious perpetrator cannot be found. The mob is looking for a victim to assuage its fear and seizes on one suspect after another, threatening to come to blows within itself, until interrupted by a posse of the King's Guard. Its officer, in an extended declamatory passage (sung at the first performance by the young ¹ One must not forget that Hindemith had already produced, many years apart, two quite different versions of Das Marienleben, a song cycle to words by Rainer Maria Rilke.

Paul Schöffler), announces the King's edict: that the murderer shall be slowly burnt alive. The crowd seems satisfied, even appeased at this announcement and starts to disperse, making way with some reverence for a lone figure, who salutes them and leaves the square.

A Lady asks the Cavalier who it is that is treated with such unusual respect. He explains that it is the goldsmith Cardillac, an artist of unsurpassed skill, whose creations moreover are intimately connected with the recent series of murders; each of the victims is known to have bought an example of Cardillac's work shortly before death. As the Cavalier grows more pressing, the Lady has an idea: she will be his that very night if he bring her the finest piece to be found in Cardillac's workshop! She leaves and the Cavalier's ardent reaction finds expression in an aria, contrasting the possibility of a night of love with a night of death, one of which he feels must within hours be his reward.

The curtain falls quickly and we are taken into the second scene by an interlude, during whose course the atmosphere of action is exchanged for the languor of the bedchamber. The mood is sustained as the Lady sings a nocturne of considerable lyrical appeal, surrendering sensuously to sleep at the prospect of the arrival of her lover and the great gift he will bring her. There follows a scene which quickly became notorious, a pantomime to the accompaniment of a duet started by two solo flutes. The Cavalier arrives, bringing with him a golden belt of the greatest splendour. The Lady wakes, seems at first about to express surprise at the intrusion but then succumbs to the beauty of Cardillac's creation and the proximity of her lover. Before they can consummate their desire, at the duet's climax (if the word can be used in connection with so cool a structure) a dark figure appears cloaked and masked in the room. The intruder stabs the Knight to death and disappears, taking the belt with him – the action takes place in a moment of complete silence before the curtain music dashes to a conclusion.

Act II. Cardillac's workshop, with the master in full activity. To the cool, impersonal sound of a tenor saxophone, Cardillac sings an arioso, with gold as his subject ('Mag Sonne leuchten!'). A gold merchant, plainly nervous at the prospect of the interview, brings him gold, which he rejects as impure. The gold merchant already suspects that it is more than coincidence that the murder victims have all been customers of Cardillac's. He believes that the great artist's creations possess a beauty beyond the deserts of men, and must be thought of as causes of the crimes rather than their innocent accompaniment. Cardillac's firm 'Was ich erschuf, ist mein' ('What I created is mine') causes the gold merchant to leave the shop, muttering that he will keep a watch on the goldsmith. Cardillac leaves his daughter in charge and goes off with the merchant.

In an aria, cast in the form of a concerto grosso movement with violin, oboe and horn concertante, the daughter waits in a mood of some trepidation for her lover. He is a young officer (in Hindemith's 1952 revision, as in Hoffmann's original story, Cardillac's apprentice), and their duet together reveals her as divided between her love for him and their plan to elope, and her duty towards her father.

Cardillac returns, this time with gold that he has passed as unalloyed. His daughter chides him for caressing the metal with an affection he never shows her, then tells him she is in love – but that she will nevertheless not leave him! To the first part of her announcement, Cardillac blandly asserts that he noticed a change in her weeks ago, but to the second he retorts that he is no old man but able to renew his hold on life with each new creation. He will give her to her lover. Their scene ends with a slow fugato duet, after which the girl goes inside.

In a curious episode, Cardillac observes the King and his court outside, shows the monarch (who remains silent throughout) his finest works, and ends by contriving to rebuff the King when he wishes to buy, and admitting when he is alone, 'I should have had to murder him! He would have had to die!' The golden belt, which the Cavalier bought, is now restored to its place in the collection, to its creator's unconcealed glee. He notices a spot of blood on the belt and cleans it with loving care.

Into the shop comes the Officer, announcing that he must have the most beautiful of all Cardillac's creations. He asks for his daughter's hand in marriage, much to Cardillac's relief; shows surprise at the ease with which his request is granted; then in Cardillac's rejoinder receives a clue to the latter's obsession: 'Could I ever love what is not entirely mine?' The Officer tries to buy the golden chain, Cardillac attempts to dissuade him, but the purchase is completed. The curtain falls after an aria (saxophone obbligato again) in which Cardillac appears at first to be contemplating the replacement of the chain he has just sold, only, by its end, to have donned the black coat and mask in pursuit of his obsession.

Act III. A street in front of a tavern. The gaiety of roisterers at night is expressed in the orchestra (including instruments behind the scenes), and the Officer strolls by, singing an arietta as he goes and wearing the chain round his neck. Observed by the gold merchant, Cardillac is following him. He attacks and slightly wounds the Officer, is recognised and bidden make good his escape, while the gold merchant raises the alarm at the top of his voice. Guards and members of the crowd drag in Cardillac, but the Officer says this was not his assailant and points to the gold merchant as possibly the criminal. All express various shades of amazement in an extended and full-blooded quartet in which the original three voices are joined by that of Cardillac's daughter. There is a duet between the daughter and her lover in which the former calls down damnation on the assailant's head only to be rebuked by the Officer, and the crowd celebrates Cardillac's vindication.

In the last section of the opera (a Passacaglia), Cardillac has a final confrontation with the mob and ultimately with his conscience. The gold merchant is at most an accomplice, he asserts; he himself understands the workings of the mind of such a criminal, has even been watching him, but he will never give him away. The crowd turns against Cardillac, threatening to destroy his workshop and all it contains if he will not reveal the murderer's identity. To save his works, he cries out that he himself is the murderer, and the mob beats him to death as the Officer fights his way through to put a stop to the riot. He it was against whom Cardillac raised his dagger that very evening; why does the mob set itself up as Cardillac's judge? He is no murderer but the victim of a sacred madness. As his daughter and her lover raise Cardillac's body, a flicker of life runs through him and, catching sight of the chain – his chain – with a last despairing effort he raises his head to kiss it, then falls back dead.

The opera finishes with a beautiful threnody over the dead Cardillac, with the high voices of the daughter and the Officer raised above those of the crowd ('Nacht des Todes ... Ein Held starb': 'Night of death ... a hero died').

H.

NEUES VOM TAGE

News of the Day

Opera in three acts, text by Marcellus Schiffer. Première, Kroll Oper, Berlin, 8 June 1929, with Grete Stückgold, Fritz Krenn, Erik Wirl, Artur Cavara, Sabine Kalter, Deszö Ernster, conductor Otto Klemperer. Revised version San Carlo, Naples, 1954, with Fortunati, Valdengo, Pirazzini, Modesti and Sinimberghi, conducted by the composer; Santa Fé, 1961, again conducted by Hindemith.

LauraSoprano
 Eduard.....Baritone
 The Handsome Herr Hermann.....Tenor
 Herr M.Tenor
 Frau M.Mezzo-Soprano
 Hotel Director.....Baritone
 Marriage ClerkBass
 Six Business TypesTenor, Baritone, Bass
 Museum GuideBaritone
 Chamber Maid.....Soprano
 Secretaries, Museum Visitors, Tourists, Show Girls, Theatre-Goers

Place: Germany

Time: The 1920s

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

Hindemith had already collaborated with Marcellus Schiffer on the short, palindromic Hin und Zurück (Round Trip) in 1927 before he worked with him on the full-scale Neues vom Tage, a product of the later Weimar Republic, when such topical operas had become the vogue. Von heute auf morgen was written at almost exactly the same time, but Schoenberg's music, and indeed his attitude to the little story of marital crisis, is wholly serious, in strict contrast to Hindemith's, which is satirical and obviously written with the intention of tweaking the ears of the establishment. This it succeeded in doing – some of the hostility of the Nazis towards the composer, and indeed part of the row between officialdom and Furtwängler over Hindemith's planned Mathis der Maler, can be traced not so much to the theme of Mathis as to what the Nazi authorities thought of as the frivolity of the soprano's aria in the bath in praise of hot water!

Part I. Preludial music bustles mellifluously along before we find Laura and Eduard arguing over breakfast. By the end of their duet they have agreed on a divorce and Herr and Frau M., back from honeymoon, are drawn into the contretemps and, in less time than it takes to tell, find themselves in the same situation as Laura and Eduard.

At the Marriage Licence Bureau, Herr and Frau M. are delighted with their newly awarded divorce, and recommend Eduard and Laura to find grounds for their own separation by applying to another office, advice that couple, after an argument with the Marriage Clerk, seem inclined to follow.

The Office of Family Affairs (third scene) revolves round the handsome Herr Hermann (thus described in the cast list), who is much admired by the secretaries but whose main function it seems is to provide couples with grounds for divorce. He has however apparently committed a professional solecism and fallen in love with a client, none other than Frau M.

The fourth scene takes place in a museum, where a guide fatuously describes a famous statue of Venus. Laura is there waiting to meet the potential correspondent but surprised he is so good-looking. She and Herr Hermann (for it is he) sing together what Hindemith calls the Duett-Kitsch, a hilarious parody of an operatic love scene, but not sufficiently hilarious for it to do other than enrage Eduard. He attacks Herr Hermann and ends up by breaking the famous Venus, to the consternation of the other museum visitors. He is arrested. Soon after the première, the whole scene was the subject of considerable approval by none other than the musical sage Wiesengrund Adorno, who disliked most of the rest of the opera but was full of praise for this episode, which he felt might with advantage be performed on its own!

Part II. A hotel bathroom. Laura sits naked in the bath singing the praises of the hot water supply – parody of opera, however easy on the ear, had not hitherto gone further, and scandal at early performances was inevitable and presumably anticipated. The bathroom is between two hotel rooms and Herr Hermann comes in from next door and, in spite of Laura's protestations, starts to undress. The appearance of Frau M., by now Herr Hermann's lover, provides an unexpected complication but only when the two women start to argue over who has prior rights to the bathroom do things start to go wrong. The row rouses the entire hotel and ends with cries of 'Oh, how embarrassing!'

The sixth scene shows simultaneously Laura in her hotel room and Eduard languishing in jail. The tentacles of the media hold them fast and each reads aloud headlines about scandals involving the other.

In the seventh scene, Eduard, out on probation, adds up what he owes in fines and discovers he's broke. Herr Hermann, who now loves Laura as well as Frau M., offers him money but in the finale six business types take him over, the scene culminating in a march which Hindemith called 'The Wreath of Fame crowns your Head', a sentiment unlikely to endear him overmuch to the German establishment.

Part III. In the Office of Family Affairs, a chorus of secretaries sings happily, and Herr Hermann seems not dissatisfied with the way business is going.

In the foyer of a theatre, Herr and Frau M., back from a second honeymoon, are about to witness a stage representation of the matrimonial upheavals of Laura and Eduard.

On the stage, after a couple of contrasting dance scenes, we find Laura and Eduard re-enacting their marital rows, even to the fight in the museum at the end of Part I.

In the final scene, Eduard and Laura have saved enough for their divorce, though they confess they would much rather retire to married life. But their existences no longer belong to them so much as to the media, and they finish by finding the evening paper as full of their doings as they are of the activities in Rome of il Duce.

In the last decade of his life, Hindemith turned to revision of early works in order to remove what he felt were youthful excesses. Neues vom Tage was not immune (Laura and Eduard for instance early on repent their decision to divorce), but its attraction some three generations after its creation lies in the way its relentless parody and the music which goes with it represent a period of history. H.

MATHIS DER MALER

Mathias the Painter

Opera in seven scenes, text by the composer. Première, 28 May 1938, Zürich Stadttheater, with Hellwig, Funk, Stig, Baxevanos, Mossbacher, Honisch, Rothmüller, Emmerich, conductor Denzler. First performed London, Queen's Hall (concert version), 1939, with Stiles-Allen, Eadie, Noble, conductor Raybould; Stuttgart (first performance in Germany), 1946; Edinburgh Festival, 1952, by Hamburg ensemble; 1967 in Montreal and at Metropolitan, New York; 1995, Covent Garden.

Cardinal Albrecht von Brandenburg Tenor

| | |
|---|-----------|
| Mathis, painter in his employ | Baritone |
| Lorenz von Pommersfelden, Dean of Mainz | Bass |
| Wolfgang Capito, the Cardinal's counsellor | Tenor |
| Riedinger, a rich citizen of Mainz; a Lutheran | Bass |
| Hans Schwalb, leader of the peasants' army | Tenor |
| Truchsess von Waldburg, leader of the Confederate army | Bass |
| Sylvester von Schaumberg, one of his officers | Tenor |
| Graf von Helfenstein | Silent |
| Gräfin von Helfenstein, his wife | Contralto |
| Ursula, Riedinger's daughter | Soprano |
| Regina, Schwalb's daughter | Soprano |

Place: In and Near Mainz

Time: The Peasants' War, c. 1525

Running Time: 3 hours 15 minutes

Hindemith was a native of Mainz, and for his eighth opera he took as his central figure the early sixteenth-century painter Mathias Grünewald, who spent much of his life in the service of the Archbishop of Mainz, and who is famous for the great altarpiece of Isenheim. Hindemith worked on the opera during the early period of the Nazi regime in Germany, and it is not hard to trace a direct relationship between the political circumstances of Germany at that time and the happenings of the opera, whose philosophical argument had to Hindemith, as to Mathis, a significance that was practical as well as theoretical.

The story takes place against a background of the Reformation and of the Peasants' War in Germany. It is divided into seven scenes, which are not continuous, and it is customary to have an interval after the fourth scene, by which time the opera has already lasted nearer two hours than one.

The prelude to the opera bears the subtitle of 'Engelkonzert' (Concert of Angels) and is inspired by part of the Isenheim polyptych. It is well known in the concert hall from its position as the first movement of the symphony Hindemith arranged from the music of his opera, and its contrapuntal character is typical of the composer's method in this opera as in many of his other works.

Scene i. The courtyard of St Anthony's monastery at Mainz, where Mathis is painting a fresco. The seriousness of purpose which distinguishes the opera is immediately shown in Mathis's introspective monologue, in which his rejoicing at the coming of spring cannot be separated from his doubts as to whether he is worthily fulfilling his mission as a painter. His thoughts are interrupted by the breathless arrival of Schwalb and his daughter Regina, who are seeking sanctuary from the pursuing troops of the Fürstenbund. Mathis extends his help to them, and takes pity on Regina, who, in the midst of her misery, sings a sad little folk-song. Mathis gives her a ribbon with which she binds her hair, and their conversation is interrupted by the return of Schwalb, refreshed and with his wounds bound up. He expresses astonishment that Mathis is content to occupy himself with painting instead of taking part in the struggle for freedom. The painter appears convinced by his argument, and their voices join in an expression of conviction in the importance of the peasants' cause.

Regina rushes in to warn her father that their pursuers are in sight, and Mathis gives them his horse, telling Schwalb that he can in future count on his help. The scene ends after Mathis has admitted to Sylvester that he has helped the rebel leader to escape, and has claimed his right to answer for his actions to no one but the Cardinal.

Scene ii. The hall in the Martinsburg, the Archbishop's palace in Mainz. The rival factions of Papists and Lutherans dispute while waiting for the arrival of the Archbishop. Pommersfelden stands with the Papists, Capito with the Lutherans, amongst whom can be seen Riedinger and his daughter, Ursula. Peace comes momentarily with the Archbishop's entrance, and all leave except Pommersfelden, Capito, Riedinger and his daughter. Mathis comes in after his year of absence to be greeted with an expansive phrase from Ursula, who is in love with him. A quartet ensues in which Mathis and Ursula talk of their pleasure in seeing each other again, while the Cardinal promises Riedinger that the order to burn Lutheran books shall not be executed in Mainz. Pommersfelden objects that the order is from Rome and the Cardinal reluctantly agrees that it must be carried out.

There is some dispute about the suitability or otherwise of Mathis's representation of the saints in his pictures, which turns before long to a discussion of the empty state of the Cardinal's treasury. Sylvester enters and accuses Mathis before the Cardinal of having helped Schwalb's escape. Mathis admits the accusation but pleads strongly for the peasants' cause, and begs the Cardinal not to furnish the Fürstenbund with the money they have just asked for, but instead to support the juster cause of the rebels; in return, he will serve his patron without payment for the rest of his life. The Cardinal replies that his official conduct is bound by treaties; only where art is concerned has he a free hand. Let Mathis not interfere with what he does not understand. Mathis defies his patron and his prince, and the differing points of view of the Cardinal, Mathis, Pommersfelden, Capito, and the warlike Sylvester are combined in a noble quintet. The scene ends with Mathis receiving permission to withdraw from the Cardinal's service.

Scene iii. A room in Riedinger's house; in the background can be seen the preparations for the public burning of the Lutheran books. Riedinger and his friends attempt to hide their treasured possessions, but Capito reveals the hiding place. He appeases the wrath of the Lutherans by showing them a letter purporting to have come from Luther to the Cardinal in which he urges him strongly to give a lead to the clergy by renouncing his celibacy. Capito's scheme is to persuade the Cardinal, who is in urgent need of money, to make a rich marriage – and with whom more suitable than Riedinger's daughter, Ursula, who at that moment comes into the room. Riedinger himself hints at what is planned for her before he leaves Ursula, to join his fellow-Lutherans as their books are burnt in the market-place, a scene that is suggested by the chorus in the background. Ursula inveighs against her role as a mere chattel in a man's world.

Mathis appears to bid Ursula farewell. She welcomes him exultantly, and tells him how much she has missed him during his year of leave from the Cardinal's service. He answers that his spirit is sick within him and he must leave her and his work to join in the struggle for freedom; only through contact with misery can he recover his own soul. They protest their undying love for each other, but their duet ends with the cry: 'The love, the unity in which we have lived, gives way to suffering.' Mathis embraces Ursula and leaves.

When Riedinger asks her how she can preserve her calm through the calamity which has befallen those who share her religious beliefs, Ursula says she has made up her mind to accept the sacrifice demanded of her by her faith. Riedinger rejoices and proclaims that the fire lit by their enemies has signalled the beginning of a new period of determination which shall end in victory.

Scene iv. The rebellious peasants have seized a war-ravaged village and are terrorising the local nobility. They drag in Count Helfenstein and his wife, and kill the Count almost before her eyes. Mathis protests against this betrayal of the principles for which they are fighting, and tries to defend the Countess from their molestations, but he is knocked down. Only the advent of Schwalb saves him from further injury. The peasants' leader calls them all to arms to fight the Fürstenbund army, which is even now entering the village. But they are already downhearted at the prospect of meeting trained troops, and soon come back in disorder. Schwalb himself is trapped and falls before the lances of his enemies, who come through the village to the sound of a march. Mathis only escapes with his life through the Countess's intervention, and he comes to understand his own complete failure as a man of action; his lofty ambitions, his efforts to better the lot of the peasants, have ended in this. He sees Regina, overcome with horror at her father's death, and takes her away with him to look for shelter.

[Act II] Scene v. The Cardinal's study in the Martinsburg in Mainz. Capito has been trying to persuade the Cardinal to renounce his oath of celibacy and to adopt the course Luther advocates, and marry. His most cogent argument is that a rich wife would solve the Cardinal's very considerable financial difficulties; but Albrecht resents Capito's attempt to interfere with his conscience, and to treat him as if he were not capable of making up his own mind. Capito tries flattery, and then introduces Ursula as the prospective bride. The Cardinal is astonished to see her. In music of ever-increasing fervour she explains to him that only her abiding faith in Lutheranism would have driven her to the position in which she now finds herself. Love has grown cold within her, but she is willing to submit to marriage for the sake of the cause she loves.

The Cardinal calls Capito and Riedinger into the room and tells them that he is convinced by Ursula's show of faith: her example has shown him that he too must stand by what he has been taught. He dismisses Capito from his post as adviser, saying he will lead a simpler life in the future; and he gives permission to the Lutherans to declare themselves openly.

Mathis der Maler (Covent Garden, 1995, director Peter Sellars, sets George Tsypin, costumes Dunya Ramicova). Alan Tytus (Mathis), Inga Nielsen (Ursula), Stig Andersen (Cardinal Albrecht), Christiane Oelze (Regina, on floor).

There is an impressive quartet between the Cardinal, Ursula, Capito, and Riedinger, and at its end Ursula asks the Cardinal to bless her before she goes out again into the world. He consents to do this, and Ursula departs, leaving behind her a man whom she has ennobled by teaching him at one and the same time the meaning of Faith and of Tolerance.

Scene vi. In the Odenwald, Mathis and Regina pause during their flight. Regina says she still dreams she is pursued by the image of her dead father. Mathis tries to calm her by describing to her his vision of the Concert of Angels, accompanied in the orchestra by the music we heard in the prelude. Together they sing the chorale ('Es sungen drei Engel'), also heard in the prelude, until Regina falls asleep and Mathis despairingly contrasts his present spiritual misery with the comparative state of grace in which he painted the picture he has just described.

In the manner of the Temptation of St Anthony, Mathis is tempted by Luxury, wearing the face of the Countess; by wealth (Pommersfelden); a beggar, a courtesan, and a martyr (Ursula); scholarship (Capito); and a knight in shining armour (Schwalb). They enter successively, Mathis answers each in turn, and the music works up to a climax when the demons appear to torment the Saint. There is a great ensemble, at whose end the Cardinal, in the guise of St Paul, comes to comfort and advise St Anthony (part of the Isenheim altar depicts the Conversation between St Paul and St Anthony). St Anthony asks what he has done that he should have reached his present state of uncertainty. St Paul tells him that he has been untrue to himself. In throwing in his lot with the people, he has denied the gifts he had from God, and has in fact withdrawn from the people he tried to help. Let him return to his art, denying himself but dedicating his work to God. In so doing he will become part of the people. The tree knows nothing of its fruits. At the end of the vision, in which the composer speaks his mind on the subject of the artist, the two voices join together in a paean of praise, ending with a magnificent 'Alleluiah'.

It is the crucial scene of the opera (Hindemith has used the themes from it as a basis for the last movement of his symphony), and it was presumably from the Temptation section of the Isenheim altar and the Conversation of St Anthony and St Paul that the composer initially drew inspiration for his theme and his central figure.

Scene vii. Mathis's studio in Mainz. Mathis is lying asleep, exhausted with his work, and Ursula watches alone by the side of the dying Regina. Ursula reflects on the meaning of their lives, and on Mathis's unprecedented inspiration since his return to Mainz and to art. Regina wakes and raves about the memory of her dead father, whose face she can see in Mathis's painting of the Crucifixion. She asks Ursula to give Mathis the ribbon which she originally received from him at their first meeting, and Ursula recognises it as one she herself had given Mathis. Regina sings a couple of sentences of the chorale, before dying with Mathis by her side.

The interlude, marked 'Very slowly', is entitled 'Entombment' (it serves as the slow movement of the symphony). At its end, the curtain rises to show the studio empty except for a table, on which lie several objects. The Cardinal comes to say farewell to Mathis, embracing him for the last time. Mathis himself takes a case and puts away materially and symbolically the things which have represented the main efforts of his life. It is in this spirit of utter humility that the opera ends.

Hindemith's concentration on the issues at stake never blinded him to the need for putting them forward dramatically within the framework he chose; he made no concessions, but he worked in terms of opera as a medium. No listener who is seriously interested in opera can come away from a performance of the work without having been impressed by Hindemith's lofty conception of the artist's responsibility, and his equally lofty view of what opera can and must accomplish. Integrity shines through Mathis, and the opera is perhaps strongest in the composer's conviction in his theme and its expression. And there is no denying that the theme is an elevated one. H.

DIE HARMONIE DER WELT

The Harmony of the World

Opera in five acts, libretto by the composer. First performed Prinzregententheater, Munich, 11 August 1957, conducted by the composer. Revived, with cuts, Bremen, 1957, conducted by Heinz Wallberg; Linz, 1967, conducted by Kurt Wöss; Wuppertal, 1980, conducted by Hanns-Martin Schneidt.

Emperor Rudolf II/Ferdinand II, Sol.....Bass
 Kepler, the Imperial mathematician, Earth.....Baritone
 Wallenstein, the General, Jupiter.....Tenor
 Ulrich Grusser, Kepler's assistant, Mars.....Tenor
 Daniel Hitzler, a priest, Mercury.....Bass
 Tansur, Saturn.....Bass
 Baron Starhemberg.....Baritone
 Christoph, Kepler's brother.....Tenor
 Susanna, Kepler's second wife, Venus.....Soprano
 Katharina, Kepler's mother, Luna.....Contralto
 Susanna, Kepler's daughter by his first wife.....Soprano
 Bailiff and Lawyer, People, Soldiers, Sternbilder

Place: Prague and Linz

Time: 1607–30

Running Time: 3 hours

Hindemith started thinking about an opera centred on the historical figure of Johannes Kepler as early as 1939, when he wrote sonatas for several different instruments in preparation for what was always intended to be his magnum opus. Hindemith wrote the text himself, as he had with Mathis der Maler.

Act I. A street in Prague, 1607. The Town Crier, Tansur, warns that the comet will bring disaster. Ulrich, who assists the imperial astronomer Johannes Kepler, contradicts Tansur and spoils his business. General Wallenstein orders his horoscope from Kepler. He then enlists Tansur, because of his capacity for lying, to act as recruiter for his army.

A cemetery in Württemberg. Three scenes are juxtaposed simultaneously on stage. Katharina, Kepler's mother, disinters her father's skull to make a drinking bowl out of it. She means to warn Kepler against the spiritual self-aggrandisement which leads him to attempt to uncover nature's secrets. Christoph, her younger son, is disgusted by his mother's recourse to magic.

Four women appear briefly: in susurrations reminiscent of the love-sick secretaries of Neues vom Tage they decide Katharina is a witch and must be tried.

In another part of the stage, Kepler tells the old Emperor Rudolf about the order that determines the movements of the stars. The Emperor looks through a telescope but sees only a reflection of the chaos on earth.

Kepler returns to his home, having lost his wife and his son. He sings his daughter Susanna a song of mourning, using words by the historical Kepler written in 1611, and music by Johann Hermann Schein from 1627. When Kepler hears that Rudolf has been forced to abdicate in favour of his brother Matthias, he decides to go to Linz.

Act II, 1613. Wallenstein decides to raise an army to be put at the disposal of Ferdinand, the pretender to the throne. Tansur acts as his recruiting officer.

In Linz Kepler has become an object of scorn: having had a difference of opinion with the pastor Hitzler, he is excluded from communion. Susanna, the foster-daughter of Baron Starhemberg, supports Kepler. Her behaviour arouses the jealousy of Kepler's assistant Ulrich Grusser, who had his eye on her for himself.

Kepler and Susanna recognise that they love one another. The tempo changes, four muted horns enter quietly and 'with elegiac expression', as Kepler resolves to teach the world to recognise the harmony that he has found.

As Tansur recruits an army, Ulrich, embittered by his failure to secure Susanna's love, is the first to sign up to become a soldier. Meanwhile Susanna describes, in an exquisite wedding hymn, how she became a bride.

Act III, 1616–21. Kepler's little daughter Susanna sings a child's song to the moon, while Kepler's second wife Susanna quietly reads the bible. Suddenly her stepmother Katharina bursts in, seeking refuge from persecution. After another burst of the child's song, the two older women are seen reading from bibles in separate rooms. A quartet builds up, made up of Kepler's and the child's musings on the moon and the older women's bible readings. Kepler asks his mother to return to Württemberg.

Katharina is tried for witchcraft. She is about to undergo torture when Kepler intervenes and saves her. She asks him to help her in her search for ways of healing, but he refuses.

Act IV, 1628. The act opens with a 'Ballet, Polonaise', as Wallenstein, now at the height of his power, gives a party in his palace in Prague. Ulrich is so fascinated by the spectacle that he leaves his guard-post. When Wallenstein discovers Ulrich's derogation of duty he flies into a rage. He tries to enlist Kepler as his 'house astrologer', in his campaign for world domination. Having been more moved by Kepler's Harmonie der Welt than by any other book, he now plans to harness the world's harmony and create heaven on earth. 'What does an ocean of blood matter', Wallenstein asks Kepler, 'if at the end it gives birth to an Eden?' Despite his doubts, Kepler agrees and joins in a trio along with Wallenstein and his major-domo, Tansur. Ulrich swears revenge for the humiliation he suffered: he will 'exchange roles' with Wallenstein. Tansur comments that often the smallest insect can, with its poison, bring down the greatest beast of prey.

Act V, 1630. Now lonely and desperate, Susanna feels that Kepler avoids her and their children, driven by his pursuit of knowledge. Ulrich appears, at first bent on punishing Kepler, who 'stole' Susanna and witnessed his humiliation at Wallenstein's hands. Ulrich despises Kepler's obstinate search for the key to the world's harmony: for him, chance rules everything. When he leaves, Susanna contemplates her lonely life, concluding that she never achieved harmony.

Regensburg. After an 'Old Warsong' and variations, the princes warn Emperor Ferdinand that Wallenstein aims to depose him.

Kepler, lying ill nearby, addresses the assembly in his mind, but cannot prevent the fall of his master. He reflects that he left his home and wife in order to see, for once, harmony on earth. Now he accepts that harmony can only be achieved in death itself, and his last words suggest disillusionment, despair. He dies, but a chorus advocates optimism.

The Emperor appears, now in his planetary form as Sol, and urges Kepler to join him 'above, in order to understand the greater picture'. The stage directions call for a Baroque painting of heaven to fill the stage gradually, as a passacaglia begins. Sol is joined by Hitzler as Mercury, Susanna as Venus. Wallenstein is rebuked for his bloodthirsty hubris ('a false tone in the world's chord') and murdered by Ulrich, among others. But soon after Kepler is taken up into the harmony of the world (as Earth), Wallenstein joins him as Jupiter, Ulrich as Mars and Tansur as Saturn, all of whom have their part to play in the 'Harmony of the World'.

With exemplary tact, Hindemith's biographer Geoffrey Skelton comments on Harmonie der Welt:

'That it was overlong he himself acknowledged by making cuts. Whether much of the music is uninteresting, as even some of Hindemith's supporters claim, is of course a matter of opinion, but the circumstances under which a good deal of it was written, in hotels and dressing-rooms, suggest that it would not be surprising if this were so.'

The mystical aspects of the opera should not obscure its more immediate pathos: towards the end of his life, Hindemith felt out of step with most trends in contemporary music. He identified with Kepler's lonely pursuit of the truth. In composing Harmonie der Welt he aimed to redress in music the imbalance he found in the world. He was much struck by the comparatively invidious celebrity that posterity has (rightly) visited on his earlier, so-called 'occasional' works. P.

DAS LANGE WEIHNACHTSMAHL

The Long Christmas Dinner

Opera in one act, libretto by Thornton Wilder after his own play The Long Christmas Dinner (1931), in a German version by the composer. First performance Nationaltheater, Mannheim, 17 December 1961, with Hindemith conducting. First U.K. performance, International Students' House, London, 1967, conducted by Michael Graubart. First U.S. performance, Juilliard School of Music, New York, in a double bill with Hindemith's ballet Der Dämon, 1963, with the composer conducting.

| | |
|----------------------------------|---------------|
| Lucia ¹ | Soprano |
| Mother Bayard ² | Contralto |
| Roderick ³ | Baritone |
| Brandon | Bass |
| Charles | Tenor |
| Genevieve | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Leonora | High Soprano |
| Ermengarde ² | Alto |
| Sam ³ | High Baritone |
| Lucia II ¹ | Soprano |
| Roderick II | Tenor |

Place: The Dining Room of the Bayard House

Running Time: 1 hour

The 'dining table is handsomely spread for Christmas dinner'. The note in the score goes on to identify three doors in the set: the middle one leads to the hall; the left-hand one signifies birth and the right-hand one death. 'Ninety years are to be traversed in this play which represents in accelerated motion ninety Christmas dinners in the Bayard household.' It begins with 'God rest you merry, gentlemen' in the orchestra.

^{1, 2, 3} These roles may be doubled.

Lucia announces, 'We're ready'. The family assembles for their first Christmas dinner in the new house. Roderick pushes Mother Bayard in in her wheelchair. He also carves, offering her 'The light, or the dark?', alternatives which, alas, turn out to have symbolic resonance. Mother Bayard remembers their first Christmas Day in the West, as a child, when there was no city there. Cousin Brandon takes his place; Roderick proposes a toast to the firm of Bayard and Brandon. A Nursemaid pushes a baby carriage through the Door of Birth, left. They call the child Charles. Mother Bayard rises and 'starts walking uncertainly to the Door of Death, right'. She has scarcely left when the Nursemaid appears, left, with the baby carriage, this time containing Genevieve. Twenty-seven bars after Mother Bayard has exited, Lucia says, 'I was thinking this morning of Mother Bayard, – two years ago!' There are a few more incidents: Cousin Ermengarde comes to stay; Roderick yields his place at table to Charles; Roderick dies; Charles marries Leonora, who takes Lucia's place; they have a child that dies, then twins; there is a war overseas...

The longest ensemble ('We talk of the weather') occurs when Sam, one of the twins, 'stands with his back to the dark door', saying, 'I shall remember you so'. We are not surprised when he is referred to in the past tense in the bar subsequent to his exit. Genevieve leaves to go 'to a town where something happens'; shortly afterwards, Roderick II does the same thing. Leonora follows to visit them and Ermengarde reads in a letter from her of 'a little new Roderick. And a little new Lucia, too'. But it's what doesn't change that matters: the ritual comments about the weather, the toasts to the family and the firm, the continuity 'from father to son, from cousin to cousin, from husband to wife' and so on.

Das lange Weihnachtsmahl suffers like so many good one-act operas from its format. Hindemith hoped Thornton Wilder would write him a libretto for a companion piece (a comic opera, incidentally), based on Wilder's play Pullman Car Hiawatha, about a journey on a night train. According to Hindemith's wife Gertrud, the composer 'dreams of the travelling virtuoso who practises at night on his violin'. Geoffrey Skelton points out that Das lange Weihnachtsmahl's lack of a companion piece has contributed to its failure to establish itself firmly on the stage.¹ P.

GUSTAV HOLST

(born 21 September 1874, died 25 May 1934)

Holst's interests included the whole range of Indian culture, not least music, and he taught himself Sanskrit and set Hindu texts. Several early operas precede Sita, on a Hindu story, finished in 1906 but still unperformed, and Sāvitri, also Hindu-based. In the years before the Great War of 1914–18, Holst set a number of other Hindu texts, but his future operatic essays comprised The Perfect Fool (1923), which involved spoofing Wagner, Italian opera and Debussy, and was performed at Covent Garden in 1923; At the Boar's Head (1925); and The Wandering Scholar (1934). None of them has made much mark on the repertory.

SĀVITRI

An episode from the Mahā Bhārata in one act. Words by the composer. Première Wellington Hall, London, 5 November 1916. First performed Lyric Theatre, 1921; Covent Garden, 1923, with Dorothy Silk, William Heseltine, Farrington, conductor Pitt; Chicago, 1934; Sadler's Wells, 1935; Oxford, 1937; Cincinnati, 1939; St Pancras Town Hall, London, 1952, with Cantelo, Young, Hemsley, conductor Colin Davis; Aldeburgh, 1956, with Mandikian, Pears, Hemsley, conductor Mackerras.

Satyavān, a woodman Tenor
Sāvitri, his wife Soprano
Death Bass
Female Chorus

¹ Paul Hindemith: the Man behind the Music, 1975.

Place: A Wood at Evening in India

Running Time: 30 minutes

The following note has been added to the score by the composer: 'The piece is intended for performance in the open air or in a small building. When performed out of doors there should be a long avenue or path through a wood in the centre of the scene. When a curtain is used, it should be raised before the voice of Death is heard. No curtain, however, is necessary. The orchestra consists of two string quartets, a contra-bass, two flutes and an English horn. There is also a hidden chorus of female voices.'

The stage is empty. A voice is heard calling to Sāvitri. Death, the Summoner, whose path may not be turned, draws near to carry Satyavān, Sāvitri's husband, through the dark gates that sooner or later open for all. Sāvitri enters, distracted by the awful cry she has heard, unable to realise how or why Satyavān, young, strong, and fearless, should be taken from her. His voice is heard as he approaches on the homeward way after the day's labour, singing of Sāvitri's loveliness. He finds her sick with fear and trembling. The distant voices of the chorus give an eerie colour to the scene while Sāvitri laments the vanity of all things. The only reality is Death. Hearing her cry out wildly, 'He comes', Satyavān picks up his axe and boldly challenges the stranger. The brave words die on his lips, the axe falls from his hand, and after an appeal to Sāvitri he sinks to the ground while Death slowly approaches to claim him. Sāvitri gathers the body in her arms and sings softly to weave a spell so that no evil thing may come near.

When Death is quite close she is herself overcome for a moment, but conquering her fears, she finds the strength to welcome the 'Just One'. She asks Death to take her together with Satyavān. That may not be, answers Death, but, since Sāvitri, far from shrinking, gave him welcome, he will grant her a boon which, however, must not be Satyavān's life. 'Well then,' says Sāvitri after a while, 'grant me life.' 'But thou hast life now,' objects Death. 'If thou art not a blind spirit,' retorts Sāvitri, 'thou must understand that, for a woman, Life means stalwart sons and bright-eyed daughters: Life is a communion and eternal.' Her passionate pleading succeeds. Death grants her the boon – Satyavān's life, because if Satyavān dies Sāvitri's voice must become mute and she herself but 'an image floating on the waters of memory'. True to his word, Death goes away and Satyavān comes to life again. The opera ends with Sāvitri singing gently to Satyavān as she sang when she held him lifeless in her embrace. F. B.

AT THE BOAR'S HEAD

Musical interlude (the composer's description) in one act. Première Manchester, 3 April 1925, by British National Opera Company, with Norman Allin as Falstaff, Tudor Davies as Prince Hal (a hurried replacement for a sick Walter Hyde; Steuart Wilson sang it later); conductor Malcolm Sargent.

| | |
|-----------------------------|---------------|
| Prince Hal..... | Tenor |
| Falstaff | Bass |
| Hostess (Dame Quickly)..... | Soprano |
| Doll Tearsheet | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Pistol | Baritone |
| Peto | Tenor |
| Bardolph..... | Baritone |
| Poins | Bass |
| Gadshill | Baritone |
| Pistol's Companions | Baritones |

Running Time: 1 hour

As a result of a fall, Holst was ordered to spend much of 1924 resting in the country, and he took the opportunity to compose At the Boar's Head. Looking through an album of folk music, he was struck by the way certain tunes fitted sentences from Shakespeare's Henry IV; following up his discovery, he found it 'an opera that wrote itself'. His daughter, Imogen Holst, nonetheless describes it as something at the time 'condemned by nearly everyone who heard it ... a brilliant failure'. At the same time she praises the skill with which he accomplished the self-imposed task, the dexterity with which he joined one tune to another, the touches of characterisation wrought with a harmonic twist here or a pizzicato discord there. Yet 'there are far too many excitements happening all the time', concludes the composer's daughter. The opera's early audiences were bewildered by its pace and unfamiliarity, and success in the composer's lifetime was very limited. Subsequent appraisal has been considerably more generous.

Holst has taken the Falstaff scenes of Henry IV and added two of the Sonnets for the Prince to sing. The tunes are from Playford's English Dancing Master of 1651 and other collections, particularly those by Cecil Sharp. Only three are Holst's own.

Falstaff accuses Prince Hal and Poins of deserting him when that morning he was set on and robbed. His own story of the encounter is embroidered to such a degree that Hal can hardly contain himself before admitting that it was he and Poins who robbed Falstaff of the money he had just taken – from unarmed travellers at that! When a messenger from the court is announced, the Prince is left alone and in a soliloquy likens himself in his present condition to the sun who permits clouds to obscure his glory.

Falstaff comes to tell him civil war has broken out. If he is to return to court, he had better practise what to say to the King his father. In a scene of some length, Falstaff at first plays the King, then roles are reversed.

Hal and Poins get themselves up as servants to watch Falstaff woo Doll Tearsheet. When Falstaff calls for a song, Hal obliges with one of Shakespeare's sonnets, 'Devouring Time, blunt thou the lion's claws', which with its references to old age is not at all to Falstaff's taste. Bardolph runs in calling on Prince Hal to return at once to Westminster, and the Prince and Poins remove their disguises and to a march go off to court.

Pistol comes looking for his crony Falstaff. He is let in against better judgement but quarrels with Doll and is thrown out. A dozen captains are below looking for Falstaff, announces Bardolph, and he and Falstaff march off to the war, leaving the women weeping. But it is not long before the situation improves as Bardolph pokes his head round the door and whispers 'Bid Mistress Tearsheet come to my master.' H.

ENGELBERT HUMPERDINCK

(born 1 September 1854, died 27 September 1921)

HÄNSEL UND GRETEL

Opera in three acts, text by Adelheid Wette (the composer's sister). First performed at the Hoftheater, Weimar, 23 December 1893; Daly's Theatre, London, 1894 (in English), conductor Ardit; Drury Lane, 1895 (in German), by the Ducal Court Company of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha; Covent Garden, 1896, conductor Mancinelli; New York, Daly's Theatre, 1895 (in English); Metropolitan, 1905 (in German), with Lina Abarbanell, Bella Alten, Louise Homer, Marion Weed, Otto Goritz, conductor Alfred Hertz; Covent Garden, by B.N.O.C., January 1923 (first broadcast of a complete opera from an opera house in Europe).

| | |
|--|----------------------------|
| Hänsel | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Gretel, his sister | Soprano |
| The Witch | Mezzo-Soprano ¹ |
| Gertrude, mother of Hänsel and Gretel | Soprano |
| Peter, their father, a broom-maker | Baritone |
| Sandman | Soprano |
| Dew Fairy | Soprano |

Running Time: 2 hours

Act I follows the well-known overture, which is based on themes from the opera. In the broom-maker's hut, Hänsel is binding brooms and Gretel is knitting. The children romp, quarrel, and make up – they have a long duet, culminating in a dance. When their mother, Gertrude, enters she is angry to see them idle, and trying to smack them she upsets a pitcher of milk instead. With all hope of supper vanished she sends the children out into the woods to look for strawberries, while she herself, bemoaning their poverty, sinks down exhausted upon a chair and falls asleep. A riotous 'Tra-la-la-la' song announces the approach of her husband, drunk as usual. She is about to reproach him when she notices that he has brought sausages, bread and butter, coffee – enough for a feast. He tells her that he has had good luck at the fair and bids her prepare supper. When he asks for the children he is horrified to hear that they have been sent into the woods, for a wicked witch lives near the Ilsenstein who entices children in order to bake them in her oven and devour them. Both parents rush off in search of Hänsel and Gretel.

¹ Occasionally sung by a character tenor.

Act II. Near the Ilsenstein. The act opens with the Witch's Ride. Hänsel has filled his basket with berries and Gretel has made a wreath with which her brother crowns her. Before they realise what they are doing the children have eaten all the berries; then they see that it is too dark to look for more or to find their way home. Gretel weeps with fear and Hänsel comforts her. They grow sleepy. The Sandman in a delightful song sprinkles sand into their eyes, but before going to sleep the children are careful not to forget their evening prayer. Fourteen guardian angels are seen descending the heavenly ladder to protect them, in a long orchestral passage which reminds us that Humperdinck was devoted to Wagner.

Act III. Morning. The Dew Fairy sprinkles dew on the children. Suddenly they notice a little house made of cake and sugar. Hungry, they start to break off small pieces when a voice cries out from within and the Witch opens the door. She throws a rope around Hänsel's throat, and tells them both to come in. Frightened, they try to escape, but after binding them with a magic spell she imprisons Hänsel in a kennel, and forces Gretel to go into the house.

When she believes Hänsel to be asleep she turns her attention to lighting the oven, then rides around the house on her broomstick. When she alights she orders Hänsel to show her his finger. But he pokes a stick through the bars and, finding the 'finger' still thin, the Witch orders more food for him. While she turns her back, Gretel seizes the juniper bough with which the old woman makes her spells, speaks the magic words and breaks her brother's enchantment. Then the Witch tells Gretel to get into the oven and see if the honey cakes are done. But Gretel pretends to be stupid and asks her to show her how to get in. Together the children push the old Witch into the oven and slam the door, and the oven soon falls apart. The children then see a fence of gingerbread figures standing stiffly against the house. Gretel breaks the spell for them as she had done for Hänsel, and they turn into a row of boys and girls. There is general rejoicing, Gertrude and Peter appear, the old Witch is pulled out of the ruined oven as a gigantic honey cake and everyone on the stage joins in a hymn of thanksgiving.

K.W.

KÖNIGSKINDER

King's Children

Opera in three acts, libretto by Ernst Rosmer. Rosmer's play was produced in 1897 with incidental music by Humperdinck and the opera's première was on 28 December 1910, at the Metropolitan, with Geraldine Farrar, Louise Homer, Hermann Jadowker, Otto Goritz, conductor Alfred Hertz. First performed Berlin, 1911; Covent Garden, 1911, with Gura-Hummel, Otto Wolff, Hofbauer, conductor Schalk; Milan, 1911, with Lucrezia Bori, Giuseppe Armanini, Taurino Parvis; English National Opera, 1992, conductor Mark Elder, producer David Pountney.

| | |
|--------------------------------|-----------------|
| A King's Son | Tenor |
| A Goose-Girl | Soprano |
| A Fiddler | Baritone |
| The Witch | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Woodcutter | Bass |
| A Broom-Maker | Tenor |
| Children | Sopranos |
| A Senior Councillor | Bass |
| The Innkeeper | Baritone |
| The Innkeeper's Daughter | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Tailor | Tenor |
| A Stable Maid | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Gate-Keepers | Tenor, Baritone |

Place: Germany

Time: Medieval

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Act I is preceded by a lively and colourful orchestral introduction, which will surprise no one who knows Hänsel und Gretel. An old witch has cast a spell upon a King's daughter and forces her to act as a goose-girl in the forest. The witch wants to teach her all the magic arts and compels her to bake a magic loaf, to eat which will bring death. 'Ach, bin ich allein' begins the girl's attractive solo as she admires her reflection in the water and calls to her geese. At this point appears a Prince, who has come into the forest in search of adventure. The goose-girl has never seen a human being apart from the witch, and is greatly impressed by him. The Prince tells her of the world beyond the wood and they fall in love. The wind blows off her garland of flowers but he gives her his crown and wants her to go away with him. She however cannot break the spell which holds her prisoner.

A broom-maker and a woodcutter are guided by a wandering fiddler to the witch's hut. They have come on behalf of the townspeople to ask her who will be their King. The answer is simple: the first person to enter the gates of the city after the bells have rung the hour of noon on the following day, which is the festival day of Hella. The woodcutter and the broom-maker refuse to share with the minstrel their reward from the townspeople and go off, but the fiddler has been impressed by the beauty of the goose-girl and recognises her to be of royal blood. She tells him about the Prince, invokes her father and mother to help free her and, with the aid of the fiddler, breaks the witch's spell. They leave together.

Act II. A lively dance introduces the scene, a square outside the town gates of Hellabrunn. The news has reached the people, who await the arrival of their new King in a state of considerable excitement. Meanwhile, the Prince has entered the town at midnight and is lodged in the innkeeper's pigsty. That worthy's daughter is greatly impressed by the handsome young man, but he dreams of the goose-girl and remains indifferent. Even a slap from the infuriated innkeeper's daughter cannot deflect his thoughts, and the sight of the goose-girl's garland, with the flowers revived and fresh, confirms his love. He will wait for her in Hellabrunn. He ends by accepting the innkeeper's offer of a job as swineherd.

Woodcutter and broom-maker are among the crowd, the latter with a brood of children. His youngest daughter offers to sell the Prince a broom. He cannot pay and instead offers her a dance, which she happily accepts.

The Prince suggests that the King when he comes may be wearing simple garments and not splendid robes, but he is laughed at as a fool – moreover the innkeeper's daughter accuses him of not paying for food and drink.

At that moment, bells announce midday, and the gates are thrown open. Through them comes the goose-girl wearing her golden crown, followed by her geese, with the fiddler at her side. The lovers embrace, the Prince greeting her as his Queen. At first there is laughter but that is succeeded by fury at what the townspeople think of as a trick, and they make as if to attack the girl, whom the Prince defends. They are run out of town and the fiddler, who takes their side, is beaten. An old town councillor asks why the broom-maker's little daughter is crying and she says: 'They were the King and Queen.'

Act III. Before the curtain comes a long prelude, quite devoid of the dance undertones of the earlier orchestral music. A woodland clearing as in Act I. It is midwinter, and the fiddler is living in what was the witch's hut, by now much dilapidated and damaged. He sings eloquently of his sadness. The broom-maker has been charged with the job of getting the fiddler to return to Hellabrunn and he comes to the hut with his children. The fiddler accepts, saying that for the sake of the children and because of the Prince and Princess he is ready to go. But first, he must look for them and, taking the townspeople's children with him, he sets out on his mission. Woodcutter and broom-maker return to the hut to get warm. The fiddler's song can be heard in the distance.

On the hillside can be seen the Prince and the goose-girl coming down towards the hut, starving and half-frozen. At first the woodcutter refuses to let them in, but the Prince forgets his indignation, so shocked is he at the state of misery to which the goose-girl has come. She tries to dance and sing to show him that all is still well, but she collapses. To obtain a little food, the Prince gives his crown to the woodcutter, but it is the witch's deadly magic loaf that they are given. They eat it and in a last embrace fall happily into a final sleep. The children of Hellabrunn and the fiddler find them dead, the fiddler mourns them movingly – his last song, he says – and on a litter they carry the two bodies back towards the town.

K., H.

J

LEOŠ JANÁČEK

(born 3 July 1854, died 12 August 1928)

In the canon of Janáček's operas, Jenůfa (1904) is preceded by Šárka and the one-act The Beginning of a Romance, two early and unsuccessful works, Šárka not even reaching the stage until 1926. Between Jenůfa and the four great works of his maturity are two operas which have not achieved universal fame: Osud (Fate), 1903/4, a highly unconventional conversational piece, and the fantastic burlesque The Adventures of Mr Brouček (written between 1908 and 1917). Osud is usually thought of as representing a transition between Janáček's early style, which reached its height in Jenůfa, and his later and more mature work. Though it does not exclude folk derivations, it is not based on folk music like the earlier works. Its production in Brno during the International Janáček Congress in 1958 (in a doctored version) was by no means a failure, but in spite of its quality the work has not made an impact on the international repertory. Mr Brouček has however gradually gained ground and has even been produced successfully outside Czechoslovakia.

The final flowering of Janáček's operatic genius, generated, it would not be fanciful to say, by his meeting with Kamila Stösslová in 1917 in Luhačovice, demonstrates four quite different styles of operatic creation, the one thing they have in common being their extraordinary conciseness of musical utterance. Kátja, for all the intensity of its drama, is a lyrical piece. The Cunning Little Vixen is something quite unique in opera, a pantheistic work in which animals and humans can apparently move on the same plane and with equal facility. The Makropulos Affair allows for little lyrical flowering in an extraordinary drama, and in From the House of the Dead the composer attempts and achieves the impossible, the encapsulating of a major and lengthy novel in a comparably major and extremely short opera.

Janáček admired Dvořák rather than Smetana (compare Kátja's prelude with that of Rusalka), was a close student of folk music (though in his mature operas he composes rather than quotes it), and he recommended the operatic composer to study the natural rhythms (particularly those of speech) around him. He was an operatic master, slow to be appreciated outside his native Moravia, but now established as one of the form's pre-eminent practitioners in the twentieth century. H.

JEJÍ PASTORKYŇA

(JENŮFA)

Her Stepdaughter

Opera in three acts, text by the composer founded on a story by Gabriella Preissová. Première, Brno, 21 January 1904, with Marie Kabeláčová, Leopolda Svobodová, Staněk-Doubravský, Procházka; it was Janáček's first performed opera and scored a considerable local success. First performed Prague, 1916, with Ungrová, Horvátová, Schütz, Lebeda, when it immediately became a popular favourite. Translated into German by Max Brod (from whose version most other translations have been taken), and performed Vienna, 1918; Cologne, 1918; Berlin, 1924, with Jurjewskaya, Ober, Soot, Jöken, conductor Erich Kleiber; Metropolitan, New York, 1924, in German, with Jeritza, Matzenauer, Oehmann, Laubenthal, conductor Bodanzky; Venice, 1941, with Cigna; Stockholm, 1941, with Herzberg, Wettergren, Beyron, Svanholm; Berlin, 1942, with Müller, Marta Fuchs, Argyris, Anders; Vienna, 1948, with Welitsch, Helena Braun, Patzak, Treptow; Holland Festival, 1951, with Brouwenstijn, Vroons; Buenos Aires, 1951, with Lemnitz, Fischer; London, Covent Garden, 1956, with Shuard, Fisher, conductor Kubelík; Chicago, 1959, with Brouwenstijn, Fisher, conductor von Maticic; Vienna, 1964, with Jurinac, Höngen, conductor Krombholz; Edinburgh Festival, 1974, in Swedish Opera production by Götz Friedrich, with Söderström, Kerstin Meyer, Höiseth, Johnny Blanc; Metropolitan, 1974, with Teresa Kubiak, Astrid Varnay, Jon Vickers.

Grandmother Buryjovká, owner of the mill ..Contralto
 Laca Klemeň.....Tenor
 Števa Buryja, Laca's half-brother.....Tenor
 Kostelnička Buryjovká.....Soprano
 Jenůfa, her stepdaughter.....Soprano
 Foreman at the Mill.....Baritone
 Mayor of the Village.....Bass
 His Wife.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Karolka, his daughter.....Mezzo-Soprano
 A Maid.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Barena, servant at the mill.....Soprano
 Jano, shepherd boy.....Soprano
 Old Woman.....Contralto
 Musicians, Village People

Place: A Village in Moravia

Time: Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

Jenůfa, to give the opera the name by which it is known abroad, was the composer's first success, earned at the age of fifty, and in the natural course of events it should have been given immediately in Prague. Unfortunately, some years earlier, Janáček had written woundingly about a composition of Karel Kovařovic, and Kovařovic was now head of the opera in Prague. He put off hearing the new work, and it was only after extraordinary efforts by the composer's friends and admirers that twelve years later he accepted Jenůfa for Prague, and then only with the stipulation that he should 'edit' the work. The editing consisted of some re-orchestration and a large number of small cuts, often only of a bar or two, but for this edition Kovařovic received a royalty and his widow after him. The opera triumphed nonetheless in Prague and eighteen months later in Vienna, the latter a rather extraordinary success considering that Czechoslovakia had just declared its independence of the Austrian Empire.

Long before the opera begins, Grandmother Buryjovká has had two sons, each of them dead before the action starts. The elder, who owned the family mill, married the widow Klemeň, who already had a son Laca. Together she and the Miller had another son Števa, who is of course heir to his father and grandmother. The second son, Tomas, had by his first wife a daughter named Jenůfa; after the death of Jenůfa's mother, he married Kostelnička (as she was later known because of her work as sacristan of the village chapel).

Act I. A lonely mill in the mountains. Jenůfa, a pot of rosemary in her arms, stands by the stream looking into the distance. The Old Grandmother sits in front of the mill peeling potatoes. Laca is near her, shaping a whip-handle with his knife. It is late afternoon. The prelude (in 6/4 time) has running through it the tinkling sound of the mill at work (xylophone). Jenůfa laments that Števa has not yet returned, and wonders despairingly whether he has been taken as a soldier by the recruiting officer. She is in love with him – in fact, carries his child within her – and her heart will break if he leaves her.

Laca makes sarcastic reference to his place in the household; he is only worth his food and lodging in return for the work he can do, and Števa has always been the idol of old Grandmother Buryjovká. At this point the orchestra shows the pity for the foibles and misfortunes of his characters which is one of Janáček's strongest qualities and which pervades his operas, but Laca's vocal line remains uncompromisingly bitter, and Jenůfa reproaches him for the way in which he speaks to the old woman. Laca wonders aloud what would be Jenůfa's reaction if Števa were taken for the army.

Jano, the shepherd boy, is heard calling happily from the mill. A new sense of joy comes into the music as he announces that he really can read now. Grandmother Buryjovká observes that Jenůfa is as much the teacher at heart as her stepmother.

The foreman of the mill comes on to the scene, and asks Laca what he is working at. A whip-handle – but his knife is blunt, says Laca, and gives it to be sharpened. Laca and Jenůfa quarrel for a moment, and Laca remarks bitterly to the foreman that she will make a splendid sister-in-law with those sweet ways of hers. The foreman, however, is not deceived and pays a compliment to Jenůfa's beauty, commenting that this is anyhow not news to Laca. What if Števa be taken for a soldier, says Laca; but the foreman has heard that he has been passed over. Jenůfa and Grandmother Buryjovká are delighted at his words, but Laca cannot conceal his jealousy. Kostelnička appears and goes into the mill, and Grandmother Buryjovká suggests they follow her.

The jaunty song of the approaching recruits can be heard in the distance, and they are followed by Števa, who is extremely drunk. With an almost hysterical cry, Jenůfa tries to bring Števa to his senses, but he answers crossly, boasting of his prowess with the girls and throwing money to his companions. They start up a song, in which Števa joins, and the orchestra plays for the dance, into which Števa drags the unwilling Jenůfa.

Kostelnička interrupts imperiously. She is a formidable and authoritative – almost authoritarian – character, and when she reads the company a lecture there is no gainsaying her. Until Števa can prove that he has stopped drinking by a year of sobriety, there is to be no more talk of a wedding with Jenůfa. Nobody tries to contradict her, although the chorus comments that she is a bit too severe.

Grandmother Buryjovká sends the musicians packing, and tells Števa to go and sleep off his drunken condition. It is partly the fault of his companions that he is so drunk, she says – this causes an ironic comment from the said companions. The scene comes to an end with a short fugato in which her Grandmother warns Jenůfa that life is full of sorrow, which must be borne. In turn, she is joined by the foreman, Laca, the chorus and finally Jenůfa herself, whose line soars up to C flat.

Jenůfa and Števa are left alone, and Jenůfa pleads her love for him and her fear that her secret should be found out. Her music at this point is dominated by a recurrent figure (Ex.1). Jenůfa's confession of love and anxiety is dragged out of her, almost in spite of herself, with long pauses between phrases, yet the music never fails to convey the warmth of her nature. Števa answers crossly, and practically accuses Jenůfa and her stepmother of nagging at him, so that Jenůfa loses her patience. Even when he partially pulls himself together, his answers have a conventional gallantry. When Laca returns Jenůfa is alone in her misery; he makes derisive reference to Števa's hang-dog look when he felt the rough side of Kostelnička's tongue, but this only provokes Jenůfa to take Števa's side even more firmly than before. Laca picks up the flowers which Števa has dropped and which were given him by some female admirer; let her pin them on her dress! Even this attempted insult Jenůfa accepts defiantly, for Števa's sake. Laca's comment is that Števa only looks at her because of her rosy-apple cheeks. He makes as if to embrace Jenůfa and slashes her across the cheek with the knife.

She runs into the house screaming, while Laca laments the horrible thing he has done. The servant Barena suggests that it happened accidentally, but the foreman accuses Laca of having, for all his present remorse, committed the crime on purpose.

Act II. The living-room of Kostelnička's house. A tense atmosphere is established in the music straight away, and the curtain goes up to show Kostelnička and Jenůfa sewing, the latter's wound still visible. They are talking about Jenůfa's secret; the baby has been born, but Jenůfa has not seen his father for weeks now. Kostelnička cannot find it in her heart to forgive Števa. Every utterance of Jenůfa's shows her joy in her child, every one of Kostelnička's the pride which has been so cruelly hurt by the shame which has come to her beloved stepchild and which has become an obsession. Kostelnička gives Jenůfa a drink with a narcotic in it to make her sleep, and Jenůfa goes into the bedroom.

Kostelnička has sent for Števa. She admits to herself that she has prayed that the child might die, but now she must steel herself to the thought of a marriage between Jenůfa and Števa. When Števa comes, she reproaches him for not having been to see them before; he admits he did not even know that the child had been born. He seems half remorseful for what he has done to Jenůfa, half resentful that her beauty has been spoilt – for that at least he cannot be blamed, although it means the end of his love for her. He will not grudge the child money – but no one must know that it is his.

Kostelnička pleads with him; at least he must see his child. As Števa says, her pleas would melt the heart of a stone:

They grow in intensity when Števa breaks down, but he eventually admits that he is contracted to marry Karolka, the mayor's daughter. Števa runs out and, as Kostelnička screams in horror, Jenůfa's voice is heard calling in her sleep. For a moment Kostelnička is afraid she has woken up, but there is no further sound and she continues to brood on the problem which seems now to be left to her to solve.

Laca comes in, angry that Števa was there but still anxious above all things to win the love of Jenůfa. He asks Kostelnička if Jenůfa is yet back from Vienna – it was given out that she went away – and is delighted to hear that she has returned. But Kostelnička has not the heart to hide the truth from him any longer, and she tells him about the child. He is horrified at the idea that marriage with Jenůfa involves taking Števa's baby, and Kostelnička makes her decision and tells him that the baby is dead. She sends him out to make enquiries about the wedding of Števa and Karolka, and is left alone, face to face with the facts as they are and the facts as she has represented them. For a moment she wonders whether she can hide the baby. No, he would always bring bad luck on Jenůfa; he is a true child of Števa. There is no other way but to kill him. The music represents her agony and indecision, and the scene is one of terrible power, particularly towards its end, when Kostelnička yells her own name in horrible reproach at her shadow. She goes into the bedroom and brings the child out, wrapped in her shawl.

Jenůfa wakes, and calls for Kostelnička, tenderly at first, then more urgently as she begins to realise, half-drugged by the sleeping draught as she is, that Kostelnička is not there. She suddenly sees that her baby has gone too; Kostelnička must have taken him to the mill to show to Števa. She prays for his future, and the music is suffused with sadness and tenderness, which is dispelled for a moment when Kostelnička comes back in a state of extreme agitation, but returns after Jenůfa has been told that her child is dead and buried (Kostelnička explains this by saying that Jenůfa has been unconscious and delirious for two days, during which time his death and burial occurred).

Kostelnička tells Jenůfa that Števa has been there, and has offered to give the child money, but steadfastly refused to marry her. When Laca comes in, his joy at seeing Jenůfa again is touching in its sincerity. He asks Jenůfa if they cannot finish their lives together. Jenůfa is at first dignified and reserved, but she cannot hide her tender feelings for Laca, and Kostelnička exclaims to herself that her action has put everything right. Just then, the window blows open, and the icy blast brings a horrible sense of foreboding and disaster to Kostelnička who cries out in alarm, and clings desperately to Jenůfa and Laca.

Act III. The scene is the same as in Act II. Jenůfa, now looking much better, is preparing for the wedding, and Laca sits by her side. Near them is old Grandmother Buryjovká. Kostelnička, looking haggard and worn, paces up and down the room. The maid prattles away, but Kostelnička is obviously in a state of nervous exhaustion, and, when there is a knock at the door, she startles them all with her agitated reaction. It turns out to be only the mayor come to offer his congratulations, but even his equanimity cannot restore Kostelnička's calm. Eventually, she takes them all in to see the trousseau she has made for Jenůfa, and bride and bridegroom are left alone. Jenůfa is unhappy that her decision not to wear the customary wedding garland should have occasioned comment from the mayor's wife, but Laca gives her flowers and she pins them to her dress. He cannot stop reproaching himself for what he has done to her; all his life must be spent making her amends, if that is ever possible. It transpires that it is at Jenůfa's insistence that Laca has been reconciled to Števa, even to the extent of asking him to the wedding, with his bride-to-be.

Karolka comes in with Števa to congratulate the happy couple. The visit looks likely to be completed without a word from Števa, but Laca asks him whether his own wedding-day is yet fixed. In two weeks' time, says Števa; but Karolka is determined to play the minx, and says she may yet change her mind. Števa is indignant at the idea, but relapses into silence when Jenůfa expresses the hope that true love will never hurt him. The others return, and outside gathers a group of girls, headed by Barena. They sing a little wedding song, and then bride and bridegroom are blessed by Grandmother Buryjovká.

Suddenly, cries are heard outside. The body of the murdered baby has been discovered in the mill-stream now that the ice has melted. All rush out except Števa, Kostelnička and Grandmother Buryjovká. Kostelnička becomes hysterical, but attention shifts from her when the voice of Jenůfa can be heard from outside crying that she recognises the baby as hers. In spite of Laca's efforts, she continues to ask why the baby was not properly buried, and feeling against her rises until the mob is ready to stone her. Laca prepares to defend her, but silence falls on them all when Kostelnička raises her arms and tells them quite quietly that the guilt is hers. She tells the story, and for a moment Jenůfa turns from her in revulsion. But it is only too clear that her crime has been committed in an effort to do good, and Jenůfa's great act of forgiveness towards Kostelnička somehow redeems her action from its criminal implications. For a moment it looks as though Kostelnička will kill herself, then she remembers she will be needed as a witness if Jenůfa is not to suffer for something of which she is guiltless, and she goes quietly away with the mayor.

The others leave, but Jenůfa and Laca remain behind. Sadly Jenůfa tells him to follow them. She must live out her life alone, though she is grateful to him for his greatness of spirit, and readily forgives him for the injury he did her. Laca begs to be allowed to remain at her side, and his reward is Jenůfa's great cry of exultation as she understands that their sufferings have brought them a greater love than she has ever known. This is not just a conventional happy ending. The music has a freshness of its own, and the quality of Laca's devotion is pointed up by situation and music alike.

H.

OSUD

Fate

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer and Fedora Bartošová. Première on Brno radio, September 1934; stage première, Brno, October 1958, with Jindra Pokorná, Jaroslav Ulrych, conductor František Jílek; Stuttgart, 1958, with Lore Wissmann, Josef Traxel; B.B.C. (radio), 1972, with Marie Collier, Gregory Dempsey, conductor Vilem Tausky (in English); 1978, České Budějovice, in original form; London (in Czech, in concert), 1983, with Eilene Hannan, Philip Langridge, conductor Simon Rattle; English National Opera, 1984, with Hannan, Langridge, conductor Mark Elder (in English).

| | |
|---|----------------|
| Míla Valková | Soprano |
| Živny, a composer | Tenor |
| Míla's Mother | Soprano |
| Dr Suda | Tenor |
| Two Ladies | Sopranos |
| Old Slovak Woman | Soprano |
| Major's Wife | Soprano |
| Councillor's Wife | Soprano |
| Lhotsky, a painter | Baritone |
| Konečný | Baritone |
| Miss Stuhlá, a teacher | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Miss Pacovská, a student | Soprano |
| Two Guests | Baritone, Bass |
| Waiter | Tenor |
| An Engineer | Tenor |
| A Young Widow | Soprano |
| A Student | Tenor |
| Fanča | Soprano |
| Doubek, Míla and Živny's son (Act II) Treble, (Act III) Tenor | |
| Hrázda | Tenor |
| Verva | Baritone |
| Součková | Soprano |
| Košinká | Soprano |

Schoolmistresses, Students, Schoolgirls, Guests at the Spa, Students at the Conservatory

Place: A Spa Town

Time: About 1900

Running Time: 1 hour 20 minutes

The genesis of Osud is one of the most curious in operatic history, just as curious as its almost total rejection for more than seventy-five years of its existence. In 1903, with Jenůfa completed but unperformed, his beloved daughter Olga dead, and his marriage more or less at an end, Janáček went on his own to the spa town of Luhačovice (a holiday in Luhačovice became a habit in later life). In 1903, he met Kamila Urválková, a pretty young woman who told him that the composer Vítězslav Čelansky had written an opera called Kamila and in it depicted her as a heartless flirt who jilted her sincere admirer (the composer disguised as poet). Would Janáček right this wrong by composing another opera whose theme would clear her name? The astonishing thing is that Janáček agreed, attracted presumably by the idea of the wronged composer who writes an opera which he cannot finish because he cannot predict the future. He himself drafted a scenario, calling the principal female character Míla Valková, and asked a young female friend of Olga's to put the whole thing into verse.

Real life continued to play a part in the drafting and, when Mrs Urválková's husband discovered her relationship with Janáček, the correspondence was brought to an abrupt end. Janáček showed remarkable consistency and Míla Valková, who is prominent in the first act of Osud, plays a lesser part in Act II and is killed off at its end. What had started as some kind of justification of Kamila Urválková finishes as an exposition of Janáček's own creed and particularly his feelings about the interplay of an artist's private life and his creative function.

The opera seems to have been accepted in principle for production at Brno but not performed, and it was even accepted by a small theatre on the outskirts of Prague where none other than Čelansky was music director. Later on, even his friend and translator Max Brod, whom Janáček trusted, felt that because of its weak libretto there was little future for Osud, and it was not until a broadcast in 1934 that the work was first heard at all. When it was staged in 1958, its shape was altered and the first two acts were inserted into Act III as a huge flashback. In 1978 it was at last heard and seen as Janáček planned it.

Perhaps 'flashback' is an important word, as it was after a hugely successful concert performance under Simon Rattle at the Queen Elizabeth Hall in London that David Pountney was inspired to present the opera at the Coliseum, not using the technique of flashback, but making use of the quick cutting between scenes which is a cinematic commonplace. In this way the work's unusual shaping – it was Janáček's work after all, and he was by then an experienced composer – and the close juxtaposition of one disparate event with another emerged as perfectly natural and the opera could be seen as a mature work. In Pountney's view, Fedora Bartošová was inexperienced but far from incompetent and acted as the composer's faithful collaborator, turning into verse the unusual scenario of a man whose ideas were ahead of their times.

Before the opera begins, we are to know that Míla has had an affair with the composer Živny. He was neither rich nor respectable enough to please Míla's mother, who contrived to drive a wedge between them and even introduced Míla to someone more appropriate as her future husband. But Míla was pregnant by Živny and her mother's marriage plans came to nothing. Nevertheless, Živny was convinced that he had been jilted for someone richer, and he put his bitter personal feelings into the opera he was writing.

Act I. It is a beautiful day in a spa town and everyone – Dr Suda, his female companions, students, schoolgirls – to a seductive waltz worship the sun and the pleasures that come with it. Míla, fashionably dressed, is greeted by Lhotsky and Dr Suda, before she notices Živny, whom she has not seen since their affair was abruptly ended. Živny's identity is a matter for speculation among the other bystanders, but Konečný knows him. Živny cannot keep away from Míla and seems to make rather acid reference to the subject of his opera.

Míla asks Živny if he has come to see their son. It is obvious that for him the affair is not at an end and that her interest has quickly returned, but their conversation is interrupted by Miss Stuhlá, a schoolteacher, as she exhorts her group of ladies at their choral rehearsal. Students mock them and it is pretty obvious that the rehearsal is not going to go uninterrupted. Organised for a picnic, Dr Suda and Lhotsky bring in a bagpiper and that doesn't help the rehearsal either. Schoolgirls join in and decorate Dr Suda's umbrella with ribbons, and the fun includes a song from Dr Suda and chorus. Guests sit down for a meal, Miss Stuhlá can be seen and heard having another go at rehearsal, but even respectable people like Dr Suda don't seem to take her seriously and the hubbub increases until Míla's mother can be made out pushing through the throng looking for her daughter, and very put out when someone suggests that she was seen with Živny. To a jaunty tune, Dr Suda and the bagpiper set off followed by the school-girls. Miss Stuhlá's rehearsal is all too plainly in ruins.

Živny and Míla have not found it difficult to get together again and they sit ostensibly ordering something in the restaurant but in reality falling in love all over again. Živny is romantic, even passionate, and after she has heard his account of how his love survived the grief of separation, Míla in a beautiful passage more calmly describes the false position her mother forced her into, confessing that she was always in love with Živny, even once willing him to look at her while he was conducting in the opera house, but in vain. She used to fantasise about a rapprochement, and believed somebody must have spoken badly about her to Živny. They are interrupted by the return of the excursion, and Konečný starts to read a poem. Janáček's 'poetic' timescale, as at the end of Kátja, is very much his own, and a quarter of an hour after they have hymned the rising sun, the picnickers are returning home in pairs at night! Míla and Živny plan to go away together but she still worries about the effect that might have on her mother. The mother comes in, and explodes when it is suggested that Míla is with Živny. Students flirt, Míla's mother metaphorically wrings her hands, the other guests at the spa call it all 'just a summer romance'.

The first act adds up to an extraordinary mosaic of crowd activity depicted in music of brilliance and variety and contrasted well with the joyful intensity of the revived relationship between Míla and Živny.

Act II. Four years later. Míla and Živny are married, but the atmosphere is uneasy and somehow dominated by the instability of her mother's personality. It is evening in winter, we are in Živny's study, the piano in the background, their son Doubek at play. Živny and Míla look through his opera and they seem unable to resist reliving the pain its story recalls. Whether they now like it or not, he wrote the early part of the opera when he was in a state of shock and indignation after what he felt was her infidelity; can Míla now hear it without recrimination? Míla's mother continues to fulminate like a background dragon, and Míla sends her little boy off to his nanny. Živny plays, and takes the initiative in asking Míla to put her trust in him; in a sinister way Míla's mother continues to echo his sentiments. He tries to excuse the way he wrote the opera; he wanted to strike at her, but in one sense it was always a lie.

At this point Doubek intervenes. His nanny and her boyfriend have impressed the child with their love and he wants his mother to explain what love is. Míla's mother is distraught, nothing can restrain her, and she rushes at Živny. In her mad struggles, both mother and daughter fall over the balcony. Míla is dead and the little boy can't understand what has happened. To Živny it all appears 'a bolt from the blue', with no warning thunder.

Act III. It is eleven years later – the present. The orchestral introduction is stormy. At the conservatory where Živny works, students are singing a chorus from his opera. They will be at the première; Živny has told them that it is finished apart from the finale, which is in God's hands. The hero is Živny himself, Verva says, and starts to explain it, quoting bits from the opera including the scene of Doubek and his nanny. When Živny comes in, they ask him to tell them about it and this he does in a long scena in which he talks of Míla's beauty and sweetness, and moves on to a grandiose apology for his own life and creed, rising to moments of almost hysterical intensity. It is one of Janáček's great scenes and Živny explains his sense of failure, which painfully matches what must have been Janáček's own feelings: years of teaching students, years of trying to get his music performed in Prague, years convinced of failure. He is roused to an impassioned climax and when his son brings him a glass of water, lightning seems to strike the room and Živny collapses. He continues to murmur snatches of the opera but insists that the last act is 'in God's hands'. Janáček's biographer, Jaroslav Vogel, astutely says that his last remark somehow implies to the listener that Osud as well as Živny's opera-within-an-opera lacks a last act.

It is on record that Janáček himself attempted more than once to have the libretto re-written but it is doubtful if that would have solved the opera's problems, which in terms of balance between acts (or 'scenes', as we may think of them), to say nothing of the lack of overt drama in the last act (in spite of its magnificent inner tensions), are very real. Curiously enough, the solution seems uncomplicated: play the opera for what it is worth and on its own terms and, with a powerfully musical singer as Živny, it will justify the dislocated but poetic scenario, which was after all Janáček's own. To be in advance of one's times may seem unrealistic at the moment, but with hindsight, not unjustified.

THE ADVENTURES OF MR BROUČEK

Vylety Páně Broučkovy

Opera in two parts, libretto by V. Dyk and F.S. Procházka, after Svatopluk Čech. Première, Prague, 23 April 1920, with M. Stork, M. Jeník, E. Miriovska, V. Pivonková, V. Zitek, B. Novak, conductor Otakar Ostrčil.¹ Revived Brno, January 1939. First performed Munich, 1959, with Lorenz Fehenberger, Wilma Lipp, Antonie Fahberg, Fritz Wunderlich, Kurt Böhme, Keith Engen, conductor Joseph Keilberth. Revived Prague, 1968, with Beno Blachut and Helena Tattermuschová, conductor Jaroslav Krombholc (this production seen at Holland and Edinburgh Festivals, 1970); Berlin, German Opera, 1969, with Martin Vantin; B.B.C. broadcast, 1970, with John Winfield, conductor Mackerras; English National Opera, 1978, with Gregory Dempsey, conductor Mackerras; 1992, with Graham Clark, conductor Mark Elder, producer David Pountney.

| Prague 1888 | The Moon | Prague 1420 |
|--|------------------------------------|--------------------------------------|
| Mathias Brouček, ² a landlord | | Tenor |
| Mazal, a painter | Blankytny ³ | PetřikTenor |
| Sacristan | Lunobor | DomšíkBass-Baritone |
| Málinka | Etherea | KunkaSoprano |
| Würfl | President ³ | A Magistrate.....Bass |
| Pot-Boy at the Inn | An Infant Prodigy | Student.....Soprano |
| Mrs Fanny Novak | — | KedrutaContralto |
| A Guest at the Inn | Oblačny ³ | VacekBaritone |
| A Professor | Duhoslav, the painter | Vojta of the PeacocksTenor |
| A Composer | Professor Harfoboj ³ | Miroslav the goldsmithTenor |
| Apparition of the Poet ⁴ | — |Baritone ⁴ |

Place: Prague, 1888; the Moon; Prague, 1420

Time: The Night of 12/13 July, 1888

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

For many years Mr Brouček was criticised, partly because the book is peculiar and some commentators have felt that the composer made an unhappy choice, and partly because it neither continues the 'folk' line of Jenůfa nor employs the concise and fully evolved style of the last four operas.

The story is taken from two novels by the poet

Svatopluk Čech chosen from several works in which he satirises a worldly but typical citizen of Prague – The Excursion of Mr Brouček to the Moon (1887) and New, Sensational Excursion of Mr Brouček, this time into the 15th Century (1888). No fewer than nine different literary figures contributed something to the first part of the libretto, which was on the stocks between 1908 and 1917 and was finally edited and put into its present shape by Viktor Dyk. The second part was written by F.S. Procházka, and Janáček set it in a matter of seven months in 1917, spurred on no doubt by the war situation, the prospect of a better future for the Czech nation, and the parallel with events of five hundred years earlier. In the figure of Mr Brouček, Janáček satirises the philistinism of Bohemia's middle class, just as ridiculous on the unattainable Moon as in the equally remote past, and identifies his unimaginative hero firmly with the petit bourgeois of his own times.

Part I. The Adventures of Mr Brouček on the Moon. The prelude, in typically Janáček vein, alternates a matter-of-fact rapid staccato quaver figure associated with Brouček (first heard early on in bassoon), Ex. 1:

Allegro (♩ = 63)

and a glorious and expansive lyrical phrase, Ex. 2:

(♩ = 63)

associated with the love of Málinka and Mazal initially but perhaps also with the idealism which a compassionate spirit can find within us all. The two conflicting themes and their variants permeate the music.

It is a moonlight night outside the Vikárka Inn

¹ Ostrčil was second conductor in Prague at the time, newly engaged, and Janáček's old enemy Kovařovic was still music director.

² Brouček in Czech is a small beetle.

³ For the London Coliseum in 1978 translated respectively as Starry-Eyes, Wonderglitter, Dreamy Cloud and the Harper.

⁴ Written in the bass clef and sung by a high baritone, or even (as in the Prague recording) by a tenor.

below Hradčany Castle in Prague. To the right is the Cathedral and near it the home of the Sacristan. Málinka, the Sacristan's daughter, is quarrelling with her lover, Mazal, whose quasi-ecstatic phrases contrast throughout with the more fragmentary sounds of the argument. Yesterday he was out dancing with Fanny, Mr Brouček's housekeeper – and she for her part might as well marry Mr Brouček! Their quarrel is interrupted first by the Sacristan, then by carousing in the inn, and a moment later by Mr Brouček, each of whom contributes to further misunderstanding, the Sacristan by supposing that he must defend his daughter's honour, Mr Brouček by his quarrelsome tipsiness and unfortunate references to Fanny and by his insistence on the possibility of life on the Moon. Mazal tries to divert his landlord's attentions by references to the Moon and then goes back inside the inn. Brouček makes an absent-minded attempt to comfort the distraught Málinka by telling her she is not bad-looking and will certainly find a man.

Artists are drinking in the inn and everyone shouts something after the departing Mr Brouček, some about the sausages he has forgotten, Málinka about marriage, and Würfl the innkeeper merely with his mechanical invitation to come again soon. Initiated by Ex. 2, there is a short duet of considerable tenderness for Mazal and Málinka at the end of which Mr Brouček comes unsteadily back into sight, staring at the Moon. At least up there he would have no worries about tenants like Mazal who don't pay their rent. Gradually, to the sound of hidden voices, Brouček seems to rise towards this desirable dwelling place, everything is covered in a white mist and we are conducted by an ecstatic violin solo to the Moon itself.

In the background is a castle and in the foreground Brouček lies asleep. A moonbeam, Blankytyn by name but wearing the aspect and voice of Mazal, arrives on a horse and ties it to the stem of a flower. He is a poet and reacts with astonishment and horror when Brouček addresses him as Mazal and tries to shake him by the hand. Brouček is equally angry that his tenant fails to recognise him and misunderstanding grows as Blankytyn speaks with mounting lyrical enthusiasm of beauty and the exalted nature of his lady love (whom to touch would be to dissolve), only for Brouček's answers to be as matter-of-fact as the sausages which fall out of his pocket. Lunobor, a sort of Moon wizard-monster to look at, an aesthete by outlook, announces the arrival of the object of Blankytyn's exaggerated affections, his daughter Etherea, who sounds like Málinka and sings a pretty waltz. The sight of Brouček has the strangest effect on them all, and the trio of Etherea, Blankytyn and Brouček ends with Etherea embracing Brouček and flying off with him on the back of the horse on which Blankytyn arrived, just as Lunobor returns to read them some chapters of Moon wisdom.

We move (with Ex. 2 to the fore in the orchestral preamble) to the Temple of Arts. The scene seems to be presided over by the President (Würfl), who says he himself lacks all talent and might have decided to become a critic had he not been kind-hearted by nature. He corrects and praises the musicians, and describes himself as a patron, regularly painted and sculpted by the artists and the subject of their songs. The horse alights at the foot of the staircase with Etherea and Brouček on board. She proclaims them lovers and asks for the protection of the President, who reacts with some mildness to the highly matter-of-fact answers Brouček returns to his questioning. Blankytyn laments his lost love, but Lunobor, Etherea's father, catches her and starts to take her away, while Brouček remains an object of admiration and wonder to all the lunar dwellers.

Oblačný leads the artists in their attempts to welcome Brouček, dancers perform in his honour, a child-prodigy (with an ever-playing piccolo at its lips) joins the chorus of admiration, until the President suggests a meal. The prodigy sings the National Anthem,¹ whose gist is that Moon creatures smell their food instead of eating it, Etherea returns to the scene and makes up to Brouček again, but he finds her little more than a cobweb, will never kneel down when he is asked to, and finally shocks them by falling asleep and in a half-voice muttering, 'Waiter! Roast and two veg., please!'

The flowers which the child prodigy waves under his nose succeed in waking him up and he tells them that he has had sufficient delectation for his nose. The coarse word shocks them again and they start to withdraw from him. Duhoslav the painter insists that he admire the picture which he is painting – such glorious colours! Brouček surreptitiously covers his face and eats a sausage, deceiving the artists at first into thinking that he is weeping, only, a moment later, for the horrible truth to emerge. They are sorry for him and are astonished that he cannot feed on flowers like them. He tells them in a matter-of-fact way that only vegetarians behave like that on earth, sensible people preferring meat. Etherea makes a last attempt on his virtue, dancing round him until Brouček blows furiously at her and she subsides on the ground in a tangled cobwebby mess. Brouček mounts Pegasus and flies away, leaving Harfoboj and the child-prodigy to lead the musicians in praising the President.

¹ A verbal parody of the (in 1917) newly established Czech National Anthem.

Fog starts to invade the scene and an ecstatic interlude (Ex. 2 important again) takes us back to the Vikárka Inn, with the artists about to leave and Mr Würfl standing at the door. They thank him and say goodnight, the pot-boy announcing that Mr Brouček is being carried helplessly home (Ex. 1). The scene is left to Málinka and Mazal, the former returning home after a night of love with the latter; the music touchingly foreshadows the great double love duet of Kátja Kabanová's second act.

Part II. The Excursion of Mr Brouček into the Fifteenth Century.

Act I. In the foreground, the Vikárka Inn; in the background, the Treasure Chamber of King Wenceslas IV. The period will shortly be that of the Hussite Wars,¹ 1420; jewels, helmets and armour in gold and silver, swords, shields, dishes, crowns and so on stand all around. The music at first is much less lyrical than that of Part I. Voices can be heard in the distance talking of subterranean passages and underground hideouts, and Brouček in an aside proclaims his belief in such a passage. Würfl is unkind enough to mention Brouček's excursion to the Moon and there is laughter, but when Würfl bids them all goodnight, Brouček is left calling for help and light and, in an extended monologue, wondering what on earth has happened.

The portrait of King Wenceslas suddenly turns round and Brouček falls into the treasure chamber.

Suddenly he is confronted with the apparition of the poet Svatopluk Čech,² from whose works the opera derives, in an unearthly light and explaining in a passage of measured solemnity,³ Ex. 3:

that the idealistic actions of the past necessarily, in view of present circumstances, inspire him to celebrate freedom with a certain irony. It is not just an old man longing for the past, but the statement of a disappointed patriot,⁴ and the chorale-like music (not derived from subsequent chorale quotations) colours the whole of the medieval section of the opera.

Brouček now stands outside, wondering if he has found a short-cut to remember in future. There is no proper light – he must write to the press and complain – but he is very taken aback when a moment later he is stopped by a citizen who at first does not understand what he says and then takes him for a German, moreover a spy for King Zikmund. The Magistrate (who sings with the voice of Würfl) is astonished at Brouček's reference to 'the late Žižka' and at his insistence that Žižka beat King Zikmund in 1420 but that this is now history as he speaks in 1888. In spite of his cries for help they take him before the judge.

In front of his house, and as the voices of the armed populace can be heard singing from the distance, the judge Domšík (Sacristan) asks Brouček who he is. Brouček at last grasps the situation and, remembering the Moon, says that he has come from the land of the Turks, which explains why his Czech sounds strange. They agree to enroll him, as the Hussites, the warriors of God, enter the square singing a chorale and going into church – a concise but splendid musical climax to the scene.

Act II. A room in Domšík's house. Through the window can be seen the Town Hall and the Square. Brouček sits on the bed and wonders what on earth has happened to him that he should find himself a Hussite –

¹ Jan Hus, burnt at the stake in 1415 for heresy, was influenced by the Englishman Wycliffe and like him advocated the printing of the Scriptures in the vernacular. His followers split into two, one group based on Prague, the other – the Taborites – adopting an extremist position and opposing much of the Church's ritual. In 1420, King Zikmund led an army against the Hussites, who, under Jan Žižka, defeated their opponents at the battle of Vitkov Hill.

² In Brno's production of 1967 transferred to form a prologue to Part II.

³ Heard first at the rise of the curtain in the orchestra.

⁴ In Edinburgh in 1970, at the opera's first British performance, the role of Svatopluk Čech was sung by the baritone Zdeněk Otava, who had been the original Baron Prus at the première of The Makropulos Affair in 1926 – an opera many in the audience had been listening to the night before. The poised intensity of his singing made an extraordinary effect, as if the veteran baritone were embodying all that is best in the Czech soul.

the music suggests his nervous state. He is interrupted by the sight of Kedruta, whom he takes for his housekeeper Fanny (referred to but not visible in the first scene). Domšík comes in and tells him to put on some proper – medieval – clothes, which Brouček does with neither enthusiasm nor competence. The people can be heard coming from church, again singing, this time the Hussite chorale 'Hear ye, the warriors of God'.¹

Kunka (the daughter of Domšík and bearing as much resemblance to Málinka as her father does to the Sacristan) leads in her father's guests. In succession, Brouček is introduced to Vacek, Miroslav and Vojta. Kunka reports a militant sermon and all drink to the future, not least Brouček, who is congratulated on his prowess as a potman. When he says that abroad the Czechs are not much liked, all agree that this is a calumny which must be repudiated as soon as possible by victory over the oppressors. A student blames it all on the Taborite priests, to the anger of Vacek, but Brouček diverts attention by proclaiming that he is not interested in fighting Zikmund, who means nothing to him. Domšík is in process of rescuing him from an embarrassing situation when the voice of Petřík can be heard calling them to arms. Brouček cannot elude the distribution of arms and finishes by finding a pike in his hands. The music momentarily takes a lyrical turn as Kunka bids her father a tender farewell, kneeling at his departure and praying for victory for him and for the patriots (Ex. 3 in orchestra). As soon as they have gone she seizes a weapon and runs out in spite of the efforts of Kedruta to restrain her. Kedruta is left behind singing the Lord's Prayer while the Hussite chorale is heard outside. Suddenly Brouček appears, tears off his costume to put back his own clothes, lights a cigar and rushes out.

The next scene is in the old Town Square. The sun is setting and the square is full of people. The returning armies of Praguers and Taborites, Jan Žižka at their head, enter after their victory over King Zikmund, to the acclamation of children and populace alike in a scene of considerable musical splendour. Brouček is noticed trying to escape from Domšík's house, and he spins an obviously false story to the questioning Taborites. Before Petřík can finish explaining what really happened, Kunka appears lamenting the death of her father and trying to take comfort from Petřík's presence among them. She goes into the house as Petřík recounts the story of Brouček's cowardice: he ran straight up to one of the German knights, knelt before him crying, 'My lord, I am yours! No Prager, no Hussite! Gnade!' The Councillor, Vojta and the people demand his death. Brouček's excuses – that he is a child of the future and not yet born – seem of little avail.

As the barrel, Brouček inside it, catches fire, the stage grows cloudy again, tension relaxes (music from the Moon) and the light of the fire turns into a candle in Würfl's hand outside the Vikárka Inn, where Mr Brouček can be seen in a barrel (into which he fell drunk before going to sleep). His cries seem nearer to lamentation in his predicament than to rejoicing at his salvation, but he accepts Würfl's help up the stairs, assuring him that his adventures have indeed been strange – but let nobody be told about them! The opera ends, fast and brilliant without even a glance at the idealistic Ex. 2, but with a sly reference in the harps to Ex. 3.

In the past, commentators in and out of Czechoslovakia used to describe the music as feeble and stress the savage nature of Janáček's attack on the shortcomings of his fellow-countrymen through the central figure of Brouček, preferring his musical mockery of Prague-1420 as compared with the Moon-1888. Granted the sheer peculiarity of the stories Janáček has chosen, the music remains engaging, moving, and above all original. With its kaleidoscopic mixture of satire and sentiment, of genuine patriotic fervour and relentless spoofing of aesthetic and chauvinistic pretension, it will yet win acclaim due to the power of its musical invention, which creates a sound world of its own, enveloping, invigorating and wholly delightful. H.

KÁTYA KABANOVÁ

Opera in three acts, text by Cervinka, founded on Ostrovsky's The Storm. Première, Brno, 23 October 1921, with Marie Veselá, Karel Zavřel, conductor Neumann. First performed in Prague, 1922, conductor Ostrčil; in German, translated by Max Brod, at Cologne, 1922, with Rose Pauly, Schröder, conductor Klemperer; Berlin, 1926. First performed in England, Sadler's Wells, 1951, with Shuard, Rowland Jones, conductor

¹ Used by Smetana in the finale of Libuše.

Mackerras (later Kubelik); in America, New York, 1960, with Shuard, Doree, Gari, Petrak, conductor Halasz; Edinburgh Festival, 1964, by Prague Opera with Domaninská; Florence (Italian première), 1957, by Belgrade Opera; Glyndebourne, 1988 (in Czech), with Nancy Gustafson, Felicity Palmer, Louise Winter, Barry McCauley, conductor Andrew Davis, producer Nikolaus Lehnhoff.

Vanya Kudrjash, clerk to Dikoy.....Tenor
 Glasha, a servant.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Dikoy, a rich merchant.....Bass
 Boris Grigoryevich, his nephew.....Tenor
 Feklusha, a servant.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Marfa Kabanová, a rich merchant's widow
 (Kabanicha).....Contralto
 Tikhon Ivanich Kabanov, her son.....Tenor Varvara, foster-child in the Kabanov
household.....Mezzo-Soprano
 Katerina Kabanová (Kátya), Tikhon's wife.....Soprano
 Kuligin, friend of Vanya.....Baritone

Place: The Little Town of Kalinov on the Banks of the Volga, in Russia

Time: About 1860

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Janáček's marriage in 1880 to a German-speaking girl from Brno seems to have been a stormy affair from the start – within a year, Zdenka had returned to her parents and the young composer was attempting to woo her back by escorting her to the door of the German-speaking theatre, which he would himself on principle not enter. In 1917, on holiday in Luhačovice, he met Kamila Stösslová, and at the age of sixty-three fell in love with this twenty-five-year-old married woman in such a way as to revolutionise the remainder of his life. Two-thirds of his greatest music was written in his last dozen years, much of it explicitly inspired by Kamila, and nowhere else in musical history is there an instance of such late flowering on so prolific a scale, and for so romantic a reason. Czech musical historians are not charitable about Kamila, but the rest of the world has reason for gratitude for what she meant to the composer. Their association lasted to the end of Janáček's life, and its first musical fruit is Kátya.

In Kátya Kabanová, written between 1918 and 1921, Janáček contrasts the old and the new, the ancient Slavonic matriarchy (symbolised in Kabanicha) and the independent, enlightened modern generation (symbolised by Varvara and Vanya Kudrjash). In between these two conflicting forces are found the unemancipated Kátya and Boris; Kátya is oppressed by Kabanicha and Boris by his uncle, Dikoy.

The prelude, with its pp B flat chords and its fateful drum figure against muted trombones, is concerned with setting the atmosphere which is to prevail throughout the opera, but at the same time it serves as an exposition of leading motifs. We are made acquainted soon after the opening with an agonised figure of three (later four) adjacent chromatic notes which, it has been suggested, symbolises the painful friction of people living too closely together; the first allegro passage has an important theme in the oboe (much used later in the opera) against a background of flute and sleigh-bells (Tikhon's departure); but most important of all is the tender which dominates the prelude, and, with its derivations, is heard frequently in the course of the opera.

Act I. The curtain rises to show the outside of the Kabanovs' house, which stands on the banks of the Volga. Kudrjash exclaims at the beauty of the river – a point of view with which Glasha, who works for Kabanicha, cannot sympathise. In the distance can be seen Dikoy, waving his arms about angrily as is his custom; Vanya and Glasha retire out of sight in case he takes it into his head to give them a piece of his mind. Dikoy comes in, complaining at his nephew Boris's laziness – though what he is expected to work at on a Sunday morning Boris himself is unable to guess. Dikoy makes no secret of his impatience with Boris, but he goes away when he learns from Glasha that Kabanicha is still in church.

Kudrjash listens sympathetically while Boris explains that he only stays with his tyrannical relation because of the terms of his grandmother's will; the money is to go to him and his sister when they come of age, provided they do what their uncle tells them. His sister has so far been kept away from Dikoy by their mother's family in Moscow, and if it were not for her, Boris himself would long ago have left Dikoy and given up his inheritance.

At that moment, church-goers are seen coming back from the service, and Kudrjash has to be restrained from leaving by the overwrought Boris. As Boris laments his rapidly-departing youth, Kátya's theme is stated dolce and for the first time by the oboe.

*Kátia Kabanová (Welsh National Opera, 1982, director David Pountney, designer Maria Bjørnson).
Rita Gorr as Kabanicha, Elisabeth Söderström as Kátia.*

At the same time, Glasha tells Feklusha that her employer, Kabanicha, is a hypocritical old tyrant. Boris gazes into the distance and his rapturous phrases tell the listener as plainly as his words that he is in love. To the accompaniment of repeated statements of Kátya's theme, he admits to Kudrjash that Kátya is the object of his adoration – a married woman! The theme is heard in its most characteristic form as Kátya comes into sight:

Kabanicha leads her little family party back from church. She pauses in front of the house to urge Tikhon, if he wants to please his mother, to go that very day to the market at Kazan. He immediately agrees, but Kabanicha makes a sneering reference to his wife Kátya, and suggests that since his marriage he has paid his mother less than the respect and deference due to her. Tikhon hotly protests that he loves both, but when Kátya also gently claims to love her mother-in-law, Kabanicha turns and insults her. Varvara is sarcastic: 'Oh, what a place to choose for a sermon!'¹ Kátya goes into the house, and Kabanicha continues her abuse; Tikhon is too soft with Kátya, and would make no protest even if she were to take a lover. Kabanicha goes, and Varvara abuses Tikhon for not taking Kátya's part more firmly; she knows exactly what he will do now – drink to forget the scene. Varvara is alone as the curtain falls; 'Oh, how could anyone not love her?' is her comment on Kátya's unhappiness.

The second scene is set inside the Kabanovs' house. Kátya and Varvara are in conversation, and the former pours out her heart to Varvara. She is unhappy in her present surroundings – a fact Varvara knows well. When she was young and unmarried, she was as free as the birds, and like them she wandered unhindered wherever she wished. She describes her girlhood. Even then, her mother knew nothing of her fancies and longings. The music grows in intensity as she describes going to church alone: 'I felt as if I was entering Paradise', she says. She saw visions of angels, lofty golden cathedrals high in the sky; she felt as if she were flying over the mountains and forests, surrounded by invisible choirs.

Varvara encourages her to describe her dreams. She says she feels that a voice is whispering in her ear, someone is embracing her and urging her to go with him – and she yields to his persuasion. Kátya breaks off; how can Varvara, a child, understand what she means? But Varvara protests that she is not as innocent as Kátya thinks; she has sins on her own conscience. Kátya says that no sin can be worse than that of loving some other man than one's own husband, but Varvara asks why that should seem so dreadful; perhaps when Tikhon has gone, Kátya will see this other man.

Kátya protests vehemently, and at this moment Tikhon appears, saying that he must leave immediately for Kazan, as his mother wishes him to. In spite of Kátya's protests, he can neither remain nor take her with him. Kátya asks him to make her swear a dreadful oath not to see or speak to a stranger while he is away, but he flatly refuses to ask her to do any such thing. Kátya starts to formulate an oath, but Kabanicha comes in and bids her son prepare for the journey. Before he leaves, he must give his orders to his wife – and in the presence of his mother, so that she may hear exactly what he says. He repeats in a milder form the injunctions of Kabanicha, and, in spite of his protests, they include a prohibition against seeing other men. It looks as though Kátya will break down as she kisses her husband goodbye – Kabanicha's grim comment is 'Shameless girl! Is he your lover?'

Act II. Living-room of the Kabanovs' house, later the same day. When the curtain rises, Kabanicha is obviously in the middle of a spate of nagging at Kátya. Why can't she be like other wives – those that love their husbands, that's to say – and stay weeping in her room for the rest of the day when he goes away? She might at least pretend to weep; that would show people her word is to be trusted! Having vented her spleen, Kabanicha leaves the room.

Varvara says the room is stuffy; she will go into the garden, using the key which Kabanicha thinks she has hidden, but for which Varvara has substituted another. If she should see 'him', says Varvara cryptically, she will tell him that Kátya is waiting by the gate of the garden. Varvara goes out leaving the key. For a while Kátya wrestles with temptation; she has the key to hand, should she use it? Suddenly, she can hear the voice of Kabanicha, but the danger passes, and the flood of relief which succeeds it tells her more certainly than could anything else that her love for Boris is too strong for her. Nothing could be more psychologically right than the musical portrayal of this sudden and involuntary crumbling away of resistance.

¹ Translation by Norman Tucker.

Kátya goes out, to be succeeded by Kabanicha, followed by Dikoy. Straight away he admits that he is a bit drunk but protests that he does not want to go home. 'Speak to me harshly' is the request he has come to make of Kabanicha – she alone dares do such a thing. Money is the thing that causes him to sin. The other day a peasant asked him to repay some money; he cursed him, all but thrashed him, and then went down on his knees to beg forgiveness. 'You should learn better manners' is Kabanicha's retort. The whole episode has a coarse and overblown erotic base, the very converse of what is to follow.

The scene changes to the garden below the house. The summer night is hot. Vanya arrives first and sings a carefree peasant song to balalaika accompaniment. He is waiting for Varvara, and is surprised to see Boris, who explains that someone he passed in the dark told him to come there, and he felt that he should not ignore the suggestion. Vanya tries to warn him, but Boris is plainly too much in love to benefit from warnings. Varvara signals her arrival by singing another snatch of folk-like melody, to which Vanya makes appropriate answer. As she passes Boris, she tells him that Kátya will not be long. He waits impatiently and with growing excitement as Kátya comes into sight. In spite of herself, Kátya admits her love for him and falls into his arms. There is apprehension as well as poignancy and yearning in their duet. The whole scene is saturated with the magic of the summer night, and a unique effect is produced by the blend and contrast of the characteristics of the two pairs of lovers, the one passionate and carefree, the other rapturous but guilty. The singing ends with a little folk-like duet for Varvara and Vanya, but the shattering emotional climax comes in the orchestra, when Kátya and Boris return to the stage and their pent-up feelings are expressed in three highly charged orchestral phrases, which are more revealing than might be a vocal section of ten times the length.

Act III. Ten days later. A tumbledown summer-house on a terrace by the Volga. Kudrjash and Kuligin, his friend, take shelter from the storm which threatens, and which bursts upon them with considerable violence. They look at the pictures on the walls; there is one of Ivan the Terrible, which elicits the sarcastic comment that Russia has never wanted for tyrants – there is one in every family. As if to match the words, Dikoy comes in, pushing everyone out of his way, and complaining that he sees far too much of Kudrjash every day to want to see him again. Kudrjash suggests that the frequent storms indicate the village should have lightning-conductors; he tries to explain what they are, but meets short shrift from the superstitious Dikoy, who takes each storm to be a warning from God.

The rain stops and all leave the shelter, except Boris and Kudrjash. Varvara appears, and whispers to Boris that Tikhon is back, and his return has driven Kátya quite out of her senses, so that she seems ill with worry. Boris hides as Kátya comes in, supported by her husband and preceded by Kabanicha. Thunder can be heard in the distance and the storm starts all over again at just the moment when Kátya catches sight of Boris. In spite of the efforts of Varvara, who tries to restrain her, she calls to Tikhon and Kabanicha at the top of her voice, and confesses not only her adultery but names the man with whom she has sinned. The scene has an added horror in that it builds up with incredible rapidity from comparative calm to climax and catastrophe. Tikhon at first does not want to listen to Kátya's confession, and is beside himself with unhappiness, but Kabanicha's comment is one of self-justification: 'Son, your mother warned you!'

The second scene re-introduces the great unifying influence of the story, taking place as it does on the banks of the Volga. Kátya has fled from her family after her confession, and they are looking for her. It is night, and Tikhon's remarks to Glasha reveal that his mind is a turmoil of doubt; women like that should not just be killed, he says, but buried alive – and yet he still loves Kátya, and how could he harm her? Varvara and Vanya run in, the former explaining the behaviour of Kabanicha. They agree that there is nothing for it but to run away together, and their careless decision accords well with what the music has told us about them earlier in the opera.

The voices of Tikhon and Glasha can be heard calling in the distance. Kátya comes slowly on to the empty stage, hoping sadly to see Boris once again. The thought of the night overwhelms her with horror, but she reflects that she will never see another night. Suddenly, remembrance of her love fills her heart with longing; she calls for Boris, and, as if in answer to her cry, he appears. Perhaps nothing in the opera is more poignant than the quiet way in which the two lovers accept one another and each finds consolation in the presence of the other. Boris tries to comfort her, but her mind wanders and she cannot remember what she wants to say to him. At first she wants to go away with him, then changes her mind. Sadly she asks him to give alms to all the beggars he meets, with the request that they pray for her. They say goodbye.

Kátya is alone. She thinks of the birds and the flowers which have comforted her in life and will be with her in death, 'so peaceful, so lovely ... and I must die'. She throws herself into the river. Voices are heard of one or two men who have seen her fall; Tikhon and Kabanicha rush to the spot, Tikhon protesting that it is Kabanicha who has killed Kátya. Her body is carried up on to the bank by Dikoy, and the last words of the opera are sardonically given to Kabanicha: 'Let me thank you, friends and neighbours, for your kindness.'

Kátya is the logical development of Jenůfa. The extraordinarily tense atmosphere of the story is matched by the music, which has an economical, compressed quality rare in other composers' operas. It is from the very close juxtaposition of the broadest of lyrical themes with the most insistent of dramatic that Janáček derives his unusual power. H.

THE CUNNING LITTLE VIXEN

Příhody Lišky Bystroušky

Opera in three acts, text by the composer from R. Tešohlídek's stories. Première, Brno, 6 November 1924, with H. Hrdlicková, Flögl, conductor František Neumann. First performed Mainz, 1927, conductor Paul Breisach; Zagreb, 1939, conductor Milan Sachs; Leipzig, 1951; Komische Oper, Berlin, 1956, in Felsenstein's production (in German), with Irmgard Arnold, Rudolf Asmus, conductor Václav Neumann (this production was subsequently seen at Wiesbaden and Paris); la Scala, Milan, 1958 (in Italian), with Mariella Adani, Dino Dondi, conductor Sanzogno; London, Sadler's Wells, 1961 (in English), with June Bronhill, Neil Easton, conductor Colin Davis; U.S. première, Mannes College of Music at Hunter College, 1964; Edinburgh Festival, 1970, by Prague Opera with Tattermuschová, conductor Gregor; Glyndebourne, 1975, with Norma Burrowes, Benjamin Luxon, producer Jonathan Miller.

Animals

Bystrouška, *the Vixen*Soprano
The FoxSoprano¹
Lapák, *the Dachshund*Mezzo-Soprano¹
The CockSoprano
Chocholka, *the Hen*Soprano
The BadgerBass²
The Screech-OwlContralto³
The WoodpeckerSoprano

Humans

The ForesterBass-Baritone
The Forester's WifeContralto³
The SchoolmasterTenor
The ParsonBass²
Pásek, *the innkeeper*Tenor
The Innkeeper's WifeSoprano
Harašta, *the pedlar*Bass

Birds, Flies, Insects, Cricket, Grasshopper, etc.

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Few operas, even by Slavs, have an odder genesis than Janáček's The Cunning Little Vixen. The composer had read with growing pleasure a series of newspaper articles by the journalist Tešohlídek, based on a Czech rural community and featuring a half-tame vixen. He was particularly enthusiastic about the way the writer could jump naturally from the human to the animal worlds and, to the astonishment of Tešohlídek himself, he asked if he might make an operatic text from the newspaper strips.

The opera, with its juxtaposition of humans and animals, was once thought unstageable, but in 1956 at the Komische Oper, Berlin, came complete vindication of Janáček's ideas in the wonderful production of Walter Felsenstein. The work was performed over 120 times in the four years following 1956.

¹ In some productions, the Fox and the Dachshund have been sung by tenors.

^{2,3} The score instructs that the following parts are to be doubled: Badger and Parson; Forester's Wife and Owl.

Just as Vaclav Talich in his shortened orchestral arrangement of Act I of The Cunning Little Vixen (brilliantly preserved in a Supraphon disc) has pointed up the orchestration for the purposes of the suite, so Janáček's friend Max Brod in his German translation occasionally went further than the original libretto allows, underlining points Janáček no more than hinted at and stressing the implied symbolism. The glosses of this translation were once substantially accepted in German performances, even in Felsenstein's, but by no means in Czechoslovakia, though Brod was a close friend of the composer's. When the Forester in the first scene lies down for a nap, Brod introduces a first reference to the gipsy girl Terinka, of whose beauty and love of freedom all humans in the opera are reminded when they meet the little Vixen. It doesn't contradict what one may think of as the sub-text, but it isn't what Janáček wrote.

Act I, scene i. The curtain rises in the first bar, to show a shady spot in the woods; the early afternoon sunlight plays through the leaves of the trees. Animals and insects dance in the heat, a badger smoking a pipe pokes his head out of his earth, a blue dragonfly hovers in a dance. The Forester comes looking for a place for an afternoon nap – he feels as tired as after his wedding night!

He goes to sleep, the insect noises begin again, there is an enchanting waltz as the flies dance round the Forester, and the tempo (now in duple time) quickens as a frog chases a mosquito. A vixen cub looks in amazement at the frog; can one eat it, she wonders. She pounces, the frog jumps quickly and lands cold and slippery on the Forester's nose, much to his disgust. His eyes meet the vixen's, and after a couple of feints he catches her and goes away with her under his arm. The dragonfly darts towards the place where the vixen cub was playing, looks for her, and dances a touching little lament for his lost friend.

The interweaving forest motifs, the contrasting dance rhythms, the varying and unfailingly apt orchestral invention, above all the homogeneity of the themes and Janáček's skill and lightness of touch in putting the whole thing together contribute to a musical scene in its way unparalleled in operatic literature. The mixture of peaceful contemplation and feverish animal and insect activity which goes to make up the atmosphere of a hot summer afternoon is a familiar enough country phenomenon but not one often attempted in music.

The second scene is set outside the Forester's house. From the outset the music is pregnant with heartache and longing, Ex. 1:

The Forester's wife pours some milk for dachshund and fox cub, which she and her husband are bringing up as a pet. The little vixen is miserable and the dog tries to preach resignation as a desirable state of mind; he has learnt to make the best of a bad job. When the Forester's son teases the cub, he is rewarded with a sharp nip. The Forester quickly ties her up, and she is left in a state of dejection as the others go in.

As it gets dark, there begins an extraordinary musical episode, built up on Ex. 1. The vixen seems almost to change into a girl – perhaps the gipsy Terinka? – and provokes passionate orchestral love music starting in B flat, Ex. 2:

In Felsenstein's production in Berlin, the already highly charged situation was pointed up by having the Forester stare at the little vixen on her chain until what he saw merged with his memory of his free gipsy love. It is music of great intensity and one could think of Ex. 2, with its exhilarating leaps, as contrasting with the pathetic Ex. 1, with its close intervals and repeated notes, in the same way as does an extraordinary experience with everyday life.

With the dawn, the Forester's wife throws out food for the chickens, who cluck to a parody of Ex. 2 and strut around the yard until the vixen starts a revolutionary harangue. It is a brave new feminist world that she preaches, but the hens are unresponsive and in disgust the vixen digs herself a grave, and shams dead. There is a headlong orchestral stretta as the vixen suddenly springs up and bites off the heads of one chicken after another. The Forester's wife runs out in alarm, and the vixen snaps her leash, trips up the Forester and escapes.

The Cunning Little Vixen (Komische Oper, Berlin, 1956, director Walter Felsenstein, designer Rudolf Heinrich). The Vixen (Irmgard Arnold) is taunted by children, Act I.

Act II. For the first scene, we are back again in the sanctuary of the wood. The vixen teases the badger, enlists the sympathy of the other animals, and when the badger goes off in a huff, moves as she always intended into his vacated sett.

We arrive at the village inn by means of an interlude, which suggests the bustling atmosphere inside. There we find Forester and Schoolmaster playing cards, watched by the village priest. The Forester mocks the Schoolmaster for his backwardness in courting his sweetheart, but the ribaldry is general, and it is not long before they tease the Forester about the exploits of his pet fox. The Innkeeper is worried at the amount of noise coming from the back room, the Parson takes comfort in his Latin tag, 'Non des mulieri corpus tuum' (Give not thy body to a woman) and the Forester wonders if one can describe a bag of bones like the Schoolmaster as a body. The Innkeeper warns the Parson to leave if his drinking is not to become a scandal with his new parishioners, and the Forester is left to wonder whether the Schoolmaster may not get married after all. He orders another beer, the Innkeeper says he will one of these days get him to tell the details of his adventures with the vixen, but the Forester reacts crossly and leaves the pub in a bad temper.

The wood at night. Moonlight shows a bridge; there are sunflowers behind the fence. The Schoolmaster comes a little shakily down the road, lamenting his propensity to waste his time drinking. The vixen peeps out from behind a sunflower, to the joy of the Schoolmaster, who takes her for the gypsy Terinka, a past love, and in his ardour topples over the fence and lies supine. Next it is the turn of the Parson, who comes down the road trying to remember the source of a classical tag. He catches sight of the vixen, confuses her in his mind with Terinka, whom he also loved in student days and for whose pregnancy he was unjustly blamed. The appearance of the Forester puts an end to his moralising, and he and the Schoolmaster fall into each other's arms in their fear of where the Forester may shoot at this time of night. The Forester mutters that he is shooting at the vixen whom he has seen slinking through the woods – but the explanation seems scarcely sufficient to the frightened Parson and Schoolmaster.

The scene changes back to the vixen's earth. Moonlight. Behind the scene the voices of the forest sing a wordless chant, which will play a great part at the end of the scene. The vixen meets a fox and tells him a romanticised story of her life. When the fox refers to her as beautiful, she starts to wonder about the significance of his remark. He brings her a rabbit he has killed, kisses her, and a full-scale duet ensues, at the end of which they go off together into the vixen's earth, leaving the dragonfly – her guardian angel, surely – to rejoice. The owl positively bubbles with joy with such a juicy bit of gossip. When the foxes emerge, the vixen whispers to the fox that she is now an expectant mother, and his reaction is to send for a priest, the woodpecker, who marries them as the wood voices celebrate the wedding in a paean of wordless joy.

Act III. It is midday under a clear autumn sky. The quiet is disturbed by the singing of Harašta, out on a poaching foray. He comes on a dead hare lying where it has been killed by a fox, is about to pick it up when he catches sight of the Forester, who greets him sarcastically. Does he enjoy his lonely life? 'Lonely? I'm going to marry Terinka', is Harašta's answer. To cover his chagrin, the Forester sets a trap for the foxes near the hare they have killed and goes off, leaving Harašta to laugh at his discomfiture.

The vixen's family of cubs rush out and dance round the clumsily set trap. Harašta's song is heard in the distance and all hide except for the cunning little vixen herself. She attracts Harašta's attention as she limps away from him, and leads him a dance which finishes with him flat on the ground. He gets up to see the fox cubs pulling the poultry out of his basket, shoots into the middle of them and by pure chance kills the vixen, who lies dead on the ground as the curtain falls.

The garden of the inn. The Innkeeper's wife brings the Forester his beer. He is out of humour and tells the Schoolmaster that every time recently he has been to the fox's earth he has found it deserted; he will never get the muff he has promised his wife. Terinka gets married today, says the Schoolmaster; and gets a new muff, sniffs the Innkeeper's wife. The Forester is even more put out than before but he tries to console himself by telling the Schoolmaster that Terinka was wrong for either of them. They miss the Parson with his ready Latin tag: he writes sometimes, says the Innkeeper's wife, and sounds homesick – Janáček's few bars of orchestral comment exactly hit off their regret at this news of someone they liked, who through nothing but goodness of heart has been hurt. The Forester pays and goes, as he tells them, off to the wood.

The last scene takes us back to the clearing where the Forester caught the little vixen. He is looking for peace, but the scene's introduction is much more turbulent, more full of longing, than the music at the start of the opera. Again the Forester muses in music of movingly human character on the forest, where life provides never an ending, only a new beginning, and where men if they know how to look may find the happiness of eternal things. As he starts to fall asleep, he sees a fox cub playing on the edge of the clearing. 'I'll catch you like I did your mother, only this time I'll bring you up better, so that people don't talk about you and me in the newspapers.' He makes a move towards the cub, and finds a frog in his hand!

The wheel has come full cycle, and with it the end of an opera that is the product of a wise (and passionate) old age, a unique example of pantheism in music drama – one of the great masterpieces of opera. H.

THE MAKROPULOS AFFAIR

*Věc Makropulos*¹

Opera in three acts, libretto by the composer, founded on Karel Čapek's play of the same name. Première, Brno, 18 December 1926, with Čvanová, Zdeněk Otava, E. Olsovsky, conductor František Neumann. First performed Prague, 1928; Frankfurt, 1929, with Gentner-Fischer, Jean Stern, conductor Josef Krips. Revived Düsseldorf, 1957 (and the following year at the Holland Festival), with Hildegard Hillebrecht, Patzak, Wiener. First performed Sadler's Wells, 1964, in English, with Collier, Dempsey, Herincx, conductor Mackerras; revived 1972 and 1984, with Josephine Barstow; Edinburgh Festival, 1970 (by Prague Opera), with Kniplová, conductor Bohumil Gregor; New York City Opera, 1970, with Maralin Niska; San Francisco, 1976, with Anja Silja; Glyndebourne, 1995, with Anja Silja.

Emilia Marty, *a singer*Dramatic Soprano
 Albert GregorTenor
 Vitek, *a solicitor's clerk*Tenor
 Kristina, *his daughter*Mezzo-Soprano
 Jaroslav Prus, *a Hungarian nobleman*Baritone
 Janek, *his son*Tenor
 Dr Kolenaty, *a barrister*Bass-Baritone
 A Stage HandBass
 A Stage 'Dresser'Contralto
 Count Hauk-Šendorf, *an old man-about-town*Operetta Tenor Chamber-MaidContralto

Place: Prague

Time: The 1920s

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

For his penultimate opera (November 1923–December 1925), Janáček himself adapted Karel Čapek's The Makropulos Secret, using the play in spite of Čapek's offer to write him something round the figure of the 300-year-old woman, but more suitable for opera. The background to the story emerges gradually during the opera's action, but might be conveniently summarised beforehand. In 1565, Hieronymus Makropulos, court physician to the Habsburg Emperor ¹ The Czech word 'Věc' means 'thing', so that the title literally translated should be The Makropulos Thing, the object in question being the paper on which is written in Greek the secret of eternal life. Charles Mackerras, whose splendid conducting of the opera has been one of the glories of Sadler's Wells, suggests that The Makropulos Secret is both a more accurate and a more suggestive translation than the commoner The Makropulos Case or The Makropulos Affair.

Rudolph II, succeeded in finding an elixir of life. The Emperor refused to believe him and compelled his daughter Elina, a girl of sixteen, to drink it first. Makropulos died years later in prison, but Elina's life was prolonged through the potion. Every sixty or seventy years, she changes her identity to avoid suspicion, but throughout her 300 years and more of existence she has retained the initials 'E.M.'

As the Scottish singer Ellen MacGregor (in the opera, Ellian), early in the nineteenth century, she had a love affair in Prague with Baron 'Peppi' Prus, by whom she had a son, Ferdinand MacGregor, whom she entered under the name Makropulos in the parish register of the village in which he was born. In 1827,¹ Baron Prus died intestate, and the estate went to a cousin. It was not long before a new claimant appeared, one Ferdinand MacGregor, whose case was circumstantially plausible in spite of there being no written proof. All the same, Baron Prus conceded that there was reasonable evidence to suggest that a certain Gregor Mack should be a major beneficiary. Since no one could claim this identity, the case between the families of Prus and Gregor has continued for nearly a century.

Action in the opera revolves around Emilia Marty, sated with life so that her reaction to virtually everything is cold and negative; only two things rouse her interest: memories of the past and her fear of death.

The prelude contrasts, as is Janáček's habit (in for instance Káťa Kabanová), lyrical themes like Ex. 1:

[1] Andante (♩ = 109)

from which much later material derives, with orchestral ejaculations, and includes brilliant fanfares for brass and kettle drums, Ex. 2:

[4] Più mosso (♩ = 66)

symbolising the Rudolphian period of Elina Makropulos's birth.

The curtain rises on the office of the lawyer Dr Kolenaty, where the chief clerk Vitek is tidying away papers for the night. He is concerned with the case of Gregor v. Prus, which has been going on for as long as anyone can remember, and which Albert Gregor now comes in to discuss. They are interrupted by the arrival of Vitek's daughter Kristina, who is studying singing and is full of enthusiasm for the famous prima donna Emilia Marty, whose reputation greatly intrigues Gregor. Kolenaty's voice is heard and he introduces none other than Marty herself, with viola d'amore to play her rather old-fashioned theme.

She explains that she is interested in the Gregor-Prus case, and proceeds to show extraordinary knowledge of its details. Kolenaty, with frequent comments from Emilia Marty, goes through the case from its origins in 1827, when Baron Prus died apparently childless and intestate. Marty states categorically that the son of the Baron Prus in question was Ferdinand MacGregor, his mother a singer at the Hofoper, Ellian MacGregor. Her motif is Ex. 3:

Questioned further, she reveals the probable hiding place of the paper which could furnish proof, and Gregor excitedly insists that Kolenaty examine this crucial evidence, even though it appears to be among some love letters (derivation of Ex. 1 on clarinet) in the archives of his adversary in the case, the present Baron Prus. (Ellian MacGregor had left the paper containing the elixir's secret in Prus's hands, perhaps as a kind of pledge that she would return, and Emilia badly wants it back.)

Kolenaty goes off protestingly on what he is sure will prove a wild-goose chase, and Gregor is left alone with Emilia Marty, enthusiastically convinced that at one and the same time she can furnish the proof to win him his case, the evidence he has so long sought about his ancestry (particularly the mysterious Ellian MacGregor), and the love of his life

¹ Norman Tucker in his translation for Sadler's Wells changed this date to 1817, having worked out that Čapek had miscalculated by ten years!

*The Makropulos Affair (Glyndebourne, 1995, director Nikolaus Lehnhoff, designer Tobias Hoheisel).
Anja Silja as Emilia Marty, Nigel Douglas as Hauk-Šendorf.*

(Ex. 3 in various manifestations). But Emilia will have none of him, and he is shocked to see her take on the look of an old woman. As she insists, apparently on the spur of the moment, that he give her some old Greek papers he will on inheriting find among his great-great-grandfather's effects, the scene is interrupted by the return of Kolenaty, who has found all exactly as Emilia Marty had described. Prus follows him and congratulates Gregor on having collected almost – but not quite – all the evidence he needs. Emilia offers to furnish written proof that the Ferdinand of the will and Ferdinand Gregor (Ex. 3) are the same person, but the curtain comes down with Kolenaty refusing to be persuaded to accept her assistance again.

Act II. On to the empty stage of the opera house, where a stage-hand and a dresser are gossiping, comes Prus, looking for Emilia Marty. He is followed by his son, Janek, and Kristina, who is mesmerised by Marty and tells Janek that their romance must take second place to her career. La Marty makes an entrance and Prus introduces to her Janek, who makes a poor showing. She is irritable and not in the mood for compliments, reimbursing Gregor for the jewellery hidden in a bunch of flowers which he brings her, commenting when Vitek essays a comparison between her and the prima donna of the past that Strada¹ used to sing out of tune, and asking Kristina if she has yet slept with Janek.

There follows a curious episode as a stammering old roué, Count Hauk-Šendorf, brings flowers for the diva in whom he finds an uncanny resemblance to his one-time Spanish mistress, Eugenia Montez. In the course of a short but sharply-etched scene, it transpires to Hauk's amazement that Marty is in fact the Andalusian singer of fifty years ago.

An autograph for Vitek, a wave of dismissal for Janek and Kristina, an evasion of Gregor's attempt to stay with her, and Emilia Marty is alone with Prus. Immediately he questions her about her special interest in Gregor, and goes on to ask about the mysterious Ellian MacGregor,² from whose illegitimate child by the Baron Prus of more than a hundred years ago stems the present litigation. Prus is fascinated by the mystery surrounding her; what was her real name? In her letters to his ancestor, she signs only 'E.M.' (Ex. 3 dominates the discussion), and this could equally stand for Ellian MacGregor, Eugenia Montez, Emilia Marty – or even Elina Makropulos.³ He has discovered that it was in the last name that the birth of a child, Ferdinand, was registered on the appropriate day, which seems to disprove Gregor's claim to the estate. His archives contain one further packet, still unopened; with the announcement of this new mystery, Prus withdraws, refusing even to respond to Emilia Marty's offer to buy the document.

Marty is sitting exhausted when Gregor returns and, in spite of his presentiment that there is something unnatural about her, renews his protestations of love. When she asks him to get back from Dr Kolenaty the document he found in the Prus archives, he threatens to kill her, at which she shows him a scar on her neck where such an attempt has been made in the past. When he renews his pleas, he is astonished to find her fast asleep in her chair. He kisses her hand and leaves, and, when she wakes, it is to find the tongue-tied Janek gazing at her. Will he help her? His father has an old letter addressed 'To my son Ferdinand' in a sealed packet; will he steal it for her? He is about to agree when he is shamed and put to flight by the appearance of his father. Prus and Emilia Marty now face each other as adversaries but, like the others, he succumbs to her beauty and agrees in return for her favours to give her the unopened packet.

Act III. Behind a curtain in Marty's hotel bedroom, two people can be seen dressing. Emilia emerges and demands the promised letter, which Prus silently gives her – due to her coldness, it seems that the night together amounted to fraud. She breaks the seal and agrees it is what she wanted. To Prus, already depressed and disillusioned, is brought a message – his only son Janek has committed suicide for love of Emilia. Emilia for her part continues to arrange her hair and refuses to accept any responsibility for his death. Hauk reappears to invite Emilia to come to Spain with him, and in a short while Gregor,

¹ See Handel's Ariodante, page 318.

² Emilia has sent Dr Kolenaty a paper signed by Ellian MacGregor acknowledging Baron Prus as the father of her son Ferdinand.

³ Janáček took immense pains to base his musical conversation on the rhythms and stresses of spoken Czech, but when it came to setting foreign languages (in this opera, Spanish for Hauk, some German for Kolenaty and Greek for the heroine), he behaved as if the stresses were Czech. Thus the word 'Makropulos', where the Greek stress would be on the second syllable, is accented in the opera on the first, so that it tends to emerge as Makropulos!

Dr Kolenaty, Vítek, Kristina, Prus and a doctor are announced. The doctor removes the senile old man and Kolenaty says he has some questions he must ask Emilia Marty. To begin with, the autograph she gave Kristina and the writing on the sealed packet found in Prus's house are the same, indicating presumably that the old letter was forged by her. She answers wearily that it was nobody but Ellian MacGregor who wrote the letter and goes off into the bedroom, while Kolenaty and the others start to search her luggage. Finally, reeling from the effects of drinking half a bottle of whisky but with her toilet complete, she starts to answer Kolenaty's questions.

Her name is Elina Makropulos, and she was born in Crete in 1549. Her father was Hieronymus Makropulos, physician and alchemist to Emperor Rudolph II (Ex. 2), and she it was who, to convince the Emperor that it was not poisoned, was made to drink the elixir of life her father had brewed. She was the Elina Makropulos who registered her son by Baron Prus a hundred years ago as Ferdinand Makropulos. Ellian MacGregor was her theatrical name, but she had at various times used the names Ekaterina Myshkin and Elsa Müller. To her son she left the most precious thing she owned, the prescription for the elixir of life which has caused her for 300 years to vindicate his alchemical skill. Now the 300 years is up and she must renew life with the elixir, or shrivel into old age and die.

In the course of the scene, Emilia Marty ages until at its end she can hardly stand up. Her sceptical listeners begin to suspect she may have been speaking the truth after all, and carry her to bed. When she reappears, preceded by the orchestra's insistence on a beautiful variant of Ex. 1, played initially on solo violin and perhaps denoting finally Marty's resignation to death and therefore her salvation, she looks like a ghost. The former hardness of manner has disappeared and she has come to understand how desperately she has wanted to die. She gives the Makropulos 'secret' (Ex. 2) to Kristina, who throws it into the fire as Marty sinks gratefully into death. With the understanding that Elina Makropulos can – must – die, comes the end of a splendid final scene, in which the music transcends the details and carries the burden of Čapek's drama – that length of life is far less important than man's fulfilment within it, that mankind's fear of death must be replaced by an awareness of what life would be without death. H.

FROM THE HOUSE OF THE DEAD

Z Mrtvé ho Domu

Opera in three acts, text by the composer from Dostoevsky's novel. Première, Brno, 12 April 1930, with F. Olšovský (Filka Morosov), A. Pelc (Skuratov), G. Fischer (Shishkov), V. Sima (Goryanshikov), conductor Břetislav Bakala. First produced Mannheim, 1930, conductor Rosenstock; Berlin, Kroll Opera, 1931, with Soot, Cavara, Domgraf-Fassbänder, conductor Fritz Zweig (last première at Kroll before its closure); Düsseldorf, 1931, conductor Horenstein; Wiesbaden, 1954, conductor Elmendorff; Holland Festival, 1954; Edinburgh Festival, 1964, by Prague Opera with Blachut, Zidek, Přemysl Koci, conductor Gregor; London, Sadler's Wells, 1965, with Dowd, Dempsey, D. Bowman, conductor Mackerras; Milan, la Scala, 1967; New York (television), conductor Adler; Hamburg, 1972, with Cassilly, W. Caron, Mittelman, conductor Kubelik; Welsh National Opera, 1982, with John Mitchinson, Graham Clark, Donald Maxwell, conductor Richard Armstrong, producer David Pountney.

Alexander Petrovich Goryanshikov, a political prisoner Bass
 Alyeya, a young Tartar Soprano (or Tenor)
 Filka Morosov, in prison under the name of Luka Kuzmich Tenor
 The Big Convict Tenor
 The Small Convict Baritone
 The Commandant Baritone
 The Very Old Convict Tenor
 Skuratov Tenor
 Chekunov Baritone
 The Drunken Convict Tenor
 The Cook Baritone
 The Smith Bass
 The Priest Baritone
 The Young Convict Tenor
 A Whore Mezzo-Soprano
 A Convict (playing the roles of Don Juan and the Priest) Baritone
 Kedril Tenor
 Shapkin Tenor
 Shishkov Baritone
 Cherevin Tenor
 A Guard Tenor
 Chorus of Convicts and Guards; Silent Persons in the Play: a Knight, Elvira, the Cobbler's Wife, the Priest's Wife, the Miller, the Miller's Wife, a Scribe, the Devil

Place: Siberia

Time: Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 25 minutes

From February 1927 until the end of the year Janáček was engaged on From the House of the Dead, finishing the score, according to his letter to Kamila Stösslová, on 4 January, having it copied out, and then, at the end of January 1928, starting to compose his second String Quartet. But later dates (7.v.1928 at the end of Act II, 24.iv.1928 at the end of Act III) appear on the score, and in point of fact the opera was not truly finished at the time of the composer's death, some of it existing only in short score. Orchestration and the filling of whatever gaps remained was undertaken by the composer's disciples, Břetislav Bakala, the conductor, and Osvald Chlubna, the composer. The juxtaposition of the Glagolitic Mass with the new opera contrasts the extremes of the Slav mind, from the gentle but convinced exultation of the Mass to the despair of some of the characters in the opera.

Janáček's art developed as time went on (one can hardly write 'as he grew older' about a composer whose first local success came when he was fifty and who was not known in the capital of his native land until he was well over sixty). Roman Vlad's comment about Brouček – that melodic motifs flower throughout the drama and are not employed in Wagnerian fashion – becomes less true over the years. In The Cunning Little Vixen he already weaves a motivic tapestry in order to create his forest, The Makropulos Affair carries the process a stage further, and by the time of From the House of the Dead, it is possible for Erik Chisholm to write with justice 'From even a casual study (of the music of Shishkov's story) it should be clear that Janáček employs as highly complex a system of leitmotif as any composer has attempted since the death of Wagner.'

Act I. There is an extended prelude, moving and evocative and derived from material originally intended for a Violin Concerto to be called 'Wanderings of the Soul'. The curtain rises on a penal settlement on the river Irtysh in Siberia; it is winter and early morning. The prisoners waiting about aimlessly outside their huts hear that a new prisoner is to arrive, a city man, perhaps an aristocrat. They argue and quarrel until Alexander Petrovich Goryanshikov is brought in by the guard. The Camp Commandant reacts sarcastically to the prisoner's smart clothes, then orders him to behave while in prison. Questioned about the nature of his crime, Goryanshikov says he is a political prisoner, which answer produces a spasm of rage in the Commandant, who yells for him to be taken away and flogged. Nobody but Alyeya, a young Tartar prisoner, takes much notice when cries of pain are heard coming from behind the huts, but the music reacts in sympathy. The other prisoners occupy themselves with an eagle with a broken wing, which they keep in a cage. The eagle in his present condition clearly has symbolic significance to them, and an old man contrasts the eagle's pride with man's smallness of mind. The episode is interrupted by the Commandant, and the prisoners are forced to resume work by the guards, singing a lament for the homes they suspect they will never see again. Skuratov, the camp's self-appointed entertainer, joins the group and sings a folk song. There is clearly some tension between him and Luka Kuzmich, and Skuratov suddenly pours out his homesickness for Moscow, where he was happy in his work as a cobbler. He dances and collapses exhausted.

The remainder of the act is dominated by Luka's story of how he came to be in the camp. Baited by a brutal Commanding Officer, he first lulled him into a sense of security and then stabbed him to death. During the beating and torture which followed, he thought all the time that he would die. When he finishes his story, full of hideous detail, the old prisoner looks up and asks him, 'And did you die?' The characteristic speech of the prisoners is ejaculatory, as if they were forced to relieve nervous tension by their confessions.

Alexander Petrovich is brought back after his flogging; all watch the gates close after him and eventually stop working. In the revisions which were made to the score after Janáček's death and before the première at Brno, a dramatic episode was here superimposed on the music, in which Goryanshikov makes a futile attempt to kill the Commandant, an addition which is wholly questionable, since the music at this point is dominated by Skuratov's motif.

Act II. The banks of the River Irtysh.¹ The sun is shining and the steppes stretch away to the horizon

¹ Janáček clearly wants contrast as a relief between the gloom of Act I and the grim horror of the hospital in Act III and in order to obtain it has not scrupled to put Dostoevsky's account of the play into the open air. To play this act inside is wrong, and Max Brod, in his German translation, has underlined this by additionally placing it in summer.

(empty fifths on the flutes and then plaintive singing in the distance characterise the barren loneliness of the plain). Before the curtain rises, the working sound of hammers can be heard as the convicts break up an old boat. Goryanshikov asks Alyeya about his sister, but Alyeya is convinced she has died of grief at his disgrace. Goryanshikov tries to distract his attention and, much to Alyeya's delight, offers to teach him to read and write.

It is a holiday and the other prisoners have no patience with anything that distracts them from one of their few opportunities for rest and pleasure. They are going to have a theatrical performance of sorts, and a satirical march ushers into the camp the Commandant, the guards and the priest. The prisoners are given food, and Skuratov starts to describe the circumstances of his crime. It is a simple case of murder for jealousy, described with much of the conviction and agony which must have accompanied its commission. He was head over heels in love with a German girl, Luisa, who lived with her aunt. Unfortunately, though she had agreed to marry him, a richer compatriot asked for her hand in marriage and her aunt insisted that she make the better match. Skuratov shot him, was captured after escaping and condemned to prison for life. It is a touching narrative, and in its course Skuratov attacks and knocks to the ground a drunken man who has been continually interrupting with cries of 'It's lies!' Someone at the end asks what happened to Luisa, and Skuratov's cry of 'Oh, Luisa' remains to haunt the imagination.

It is time for the play to start and one may at first think it contradictory that, apart from dance tunes, Janáček employs similar musical language here as for the main action, his point being presumably that the fantasies of the prisoners are at least as real as their everyday thoughts and actions, in fact hardly to be distinguished from them. Don Juan and his servant Kedril are beset by devils, but Don Juan has three adventures before he finally succumbs to them. He makes love to Elvira and, when a knight appears to defend her, kills him. He spurns a cobbler's wife introduced by Kedril, but shows interest in the wife of a priest before the reappearance of the devils heralds his end. After a good deal of general laughter stylised in the music, Kedril announces that the next piece will be the Tale of the Beautiful Miller's Wife.

The Miller says goodbye to his wife, who is satirised in a tune with the bite of early Prokofiev in it and proceeds to take advantage of his absence to receive a succession of lovers, each one hiding when the next is about to appear. The last is Don Juan, dressed as a priest; when the Miller returns, Don Juan kills him and dances with the woman to the music of a slow waltz of considerable intensity.

The play is over and the prisoners start to disperse, leaving Alexander Petrovich and Alyeya sitting together and drinking tea. They watch a young prisoner make off with a particularly unprepossessing whore and shortly afterwards one of the other prisoners takes it into his head that they are privileged in having tea and attacks Alyeya, leaving a gaping wound in his head. The guards advance on the prisoners as the curtain falls.

Act III. It is again winter, and the scene shows the inside of the prison hospital. The Muslim, Alyeya, lying in bed, tells Alexander Petrovich that what has most impressed him in the Bible – he can now read a bit – is the idea that men should love their enemies. Luka mumbles away from the bed in which he lies dying, Shapkin's story of how he was caught poaching and had his ears pulled by the Chief of Police is told against an accompaniment more than usually consolatory, and Skuratov's feverish but heart-rending cries of 'Oh, Luisa' eventually exasperate the other prisoners who drag him back to his own bed.

Shishkov now embarks on what is to prove the longest of the three major narratives of the opera. With a bitter irony, his story is punctuated by the death agony of Luka, who eventually turns out to have been the villain of Shishkov's narrative. A young girl called Akulka is generally believed on his evidence to have lost her honour to a certain Filka Morosov. Her parents beat her but eventually Shishkov is persuaded to marry her, and on his wedding night he discovers that she is a virgin and has been grossly slandered. When Filka is called up to the army, Akulka admits that she has been in love with him all along and that after her marriage she has in fact been guilty of the sin of which she was once falsely accused. Shishkov in his shame and agony takes her out into the woods and cuts her throat. The story is punctuated by the vain efforts of his listeners to hurry Shishkov on to the point, by the heavy breathing of the sick prisoners, and by the groans and sobs of Luka, who dies and is carried out as the story comes to an end. As it passes, Shishkov recognises the body as Filka Morosov's masquerading under another name, and in spite of the forgiving comment of an old prisoner, Shishkov curses the corpse all the way out of the door. The scene ends as the guards call Alexander Petrovich Goryanshikov, Alyeya clutching despairingly at him as he is taken out.

The camp as in the first scene. The sun is shining, the prisoners are at their work as the Commandant addresses himself drunkenly to Goryanshikov and asks his forgiveness for having had him flogged on his arrival. He is to go free straight away and his fetters are taken off him. As Alexander Petrovich tries to comfort the despairing Alyeya, the music takes on a character almost of optimism that lies somewhere at the heart of Dostoevsky's masterpiece, the optimism that believes, in spite of the evidence, that there is goodness in life, honesty and integrity in man, a purpose behind it all. Goryanshikov leaves the camp and the prisoners free the eagle, whose wings have now recovered their strength, and the music is momentarily in the nature of a hymn to freedom.

The end is controversial. In Janáček's original, after Goryanshikov has left, the guard shouts at the remaining prisoners 'March!', and with their chains clanking they are herded back to their huts – after a glimpse of freedom, life in the House of the Dead returns to stark normality. Only Alyeya, in his hospital nightgown and forgetful of everything else now that he has lost Goryanshikov, remains behind, 'as a symbol of God's spark in man'. At the suggestion of the producer, Ota Zítek, Bakala the conductor and Janáček's pupil, the composer Chlubna, omitted the intervention of the guard and chose to maintain the optimism of the final chorus, carrying it through to the end. Conductors responsible for a revival of the opera must decide which of the two versions to adopt; the vocal score contains only the revision, but the original is reproduced in Jaroslav Vogel's Leoš Janáček: His Life and Works.

Perhaps no other composer than Janáček would have attempted to turn Dostoevsky's vast book into an opera. Certainly no one else could have compressed it into three acts of less than thirty minutes each, and still have preserved so magnificently the spirit of the original.

H.

K

WILHELM KIENZL

(born 17 January 1857, died 3 October 1941)

DER EVANGELIMANN

The Travelling Preacher

Opera in two acts, text by the composer. Première Berlin, 4 May 1895. First performed 1897, Covent Garden, with Ernest van Dyck; New York, 1924.

Friedrich Engel, *magistrate in St Othmar*Bass

Martha, *his niece*Soprano

Magdalena, her friend.....Contralto

Johannes Freudhofer, teacher in St Othmar ...Baritone

Mathias Freudhofer, his younger brother.....Tenor

Tradesmen, Monks, Peasants, Children

Place: St Othmar in Lower Austria; Vienna

Time: 1820; 1850

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

Kienzl was an Austrian composer whose experience in 1876 of the first Ring at Bayreuth left him a convinced Wagnerian. In spite of a reactionary style, his operas enjoyed success in his native country until after his death. The story of Der Evangelimann is said to be founded on fact.

Act I. Johannes is jealous of his brother Mathias's love for Martha, and warns her uncle who forbids them to see each other. Johannes proposes to Martha and is rejected. That evening, after the villagers' regular session of ninepins, Johannes overhears Mathias and Martha pledge eternal fidelity and in a mad fit of jealousy sets fire to the barn. Mathias is discovered near the scene of the crime and arrested.

Act II. Thirty years later, Magdalena, Martha's friend, is nursing Johannes who is dying. Nothing has been heard of Mathias. Children dance, and an 'Evangelimann' – a travelling reciter of biblical verses such as once existed in Austria – teaches them Christ's Sermon on the Mount. Magdalena recognises him as Mathias, and hears he has been twenty years in prison for a crime he did not commit. Martha drowned herself soon after he was condemned and as an ex-convict he found himself unemployable. Next day, Johannes recognises Mathias's singing and confesses his crime to him, begging for forgiveness, which Mathias after a struggle concedes. Johannes dies as Magdalena prays and the children are heard singing outside: 'Blessed are they that are persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven'.

The music is mainly memorable for the popular, much-recorded episode of the Sermon on the Mount, the genuine pathos of whose tone dominates the score and which remains a scene of affecting power. Beside it the liveliness of the ninepins, Martha and Mathias's love-making, Magdalena's over-ripe if shapely memories of youth ('O schöne Jugendtage'), even Johannes's confession and forgiveness amount to not much more than the building blocks of a well-made opera – valuable in their own way but unlikely to alter significantly one's view of Der Evangelimann's place in operatic history.

H.

OLIVER KNUSSEN

(born 12 June 1952)

WHERE THE WILD THINGS ARE

A fantasy opera in one act (nine scenes), with libretto by Maurice Sendak from his children's book of the same name. Première, Brussels, 28 November 1980, with Jane Manning, conductor Ronald Zollman (as Max et les Maximonstres). First performed London in concert, 1982; by Glyndebourne Opera at National Theatre, London, 1984, and at Glyndebourne, 1985, all with Rosemary Hardy or Karen Beardsley as Max, and the London Sinfonietta conducted by the composer or Jane Glover. First heard in U.S.A. in concert in 1984 and on stage in 1985 by Minnesota Opera.

Max, a small boy.....Soprano
Mama.....Mezzo-Soprano
Tzippy, the female Wild Thing.....Mezzo-Soprano Wild Thing with Beard.....Tenor
Goat Wild Thing.....Tenor
Wild Thing with Horns.....Baritone
Rooster Wild Thing.....Bass-Baritone
Bull Wild Thing.....Bass

Running Time: 40 minutes

Let the very articulate composer speak for himself:¹ 'Conceived for the resources of an opera house – six singers, dancers, an orchestra of forty-seven players, and extensive scenic requirements – Where the Wild Things Are is an attempt to revive and develop the too long neglected genre of fantasy opera, in the traditions of, among others, Hänsel und Gretel, Le Rossignol, and L'Enfant et les Sortilèges (whose final 'Maman' was in a sense the sound from which our ideas grew) ... What resulted, to me at least, is a very big work articulated in miniature.'

The composer goes on: 'The score is headed by quotations from Mussorgsky (Boris Godunov) and Debussy (La boîte à joujoux). These references are symbolic: Mussorgsky is the supreme composer of music about children (The Nursery and Act 2 of Boris), and Debussy's music for his daughter Chouchou is the perfect example of how a composer can make children's music not by "writing down" to them, but by illuminating his harmonic language in particularly gentle and subtle ways. Both quotations can be heard in the music of Wild Things, overtly and covertly – which is a polite way of saying that virtually every note of the opera grows from one or the other.'

It is nonetheless Knussen's music and his response to the book (one can't say 'response to the text' when most of Sendak's story is told in his marvellous pictures) which made the opera (perhaps because of, rather than in spite of, its short duration) something of an instant classic for children, one of the few operas which seems aimed at them rather than at the grown-ups who go to the opera with them.

Its gestation was not easy. Maurice Huisman, the perspicacious director of the Opéra National, Brussels, wanted an opera from Oliver Knussen on the occasion of the International Year of the Child, and Sendak wrote the scenario and libretto in 1978–79. Knussen composed the first version of the opera in 1979–80 and this was heard in Brussels in late 1980, still not yet quite finished and with elements of the score repeated to cover the areas not yet composed. Substantial revision brought a further version to the concert platform in 1982, still without the sixth scene (The Wild Rumpus), but the complete opera hit London in a Glyndebourne production by January 1984, and proved well worth waiting for.

The story is simple. Max, like the child in Ravel's L'Enfant et les Sortilèges, is wilful, and after being cheeky to his mother, is sent to bed without any supper. His confrontation with the Wild Things parallels that of the child in L'Enfant with his toys and characters from his books, but once he has learned to dominate the Wild Things, he puts his room in order and is ready for the food – hot food! – he can smell cooking.

The overture is short, quiet, even menacing. During its course, in less time than it takes to tell, a curtain with the face of a Wild Thing on it becomes visible, and soon, through it, the hall of the house where Max lives. A scherzino develops as Max cavorts into view, threatening his toy soldiers, and hanging a bear melodramatically from a coat-hanger. He turns confidently to humming – there is no need to ask who is king of the castle. But his mother's shadow comes into view, and to her, particularly when he jumps out from ambush, he is a naughty rascal, and fit to be sent to bed without any supper. There is the noise of the vacuum cleaner as she comes into sight, an angry mother-son dialogue (Max: 'And I'll tell Papa you were bad'), and, as Max jumps down at her, a reprise of the scherzo music to which she made her entrance, and during whose course she shouts 'Wild Thing' at him.

¹ In the sleeve note for the first recording of the opera (by Unicorn Records), which he conducted himself.

They freeze, his mother leaves and the vacuum cleaner pursues Max round the hall and into his own room. He is alone and out of humour and sings Arietta 1, whose angular vocal writing does not conceal its innate lyricism. The atmosphere is that of L'Enfant, most of all when Max's room is transformed into a forest, round which he dances ecstatically (Arietta 2 to a quicker 'Rag' music). Water invades the scene and Max gets into a boat, which moves off.

Interlude 1, with its horn solo and jabbering flutes, is mysteriously atmospheric. It is black night, but the sun rises and proceeds to play Box and Cox with the moon. At dawn, the sea becomes turbulent and a great Sea Monster – the first of the Wild Things – appears, only to subside at a gesture from Max. He moors the boat to an island – we are by now far from the world of Ravel – and quite soon the sound of the Wild Things, still off-stage, begins to make itself heard. They are pretty threatening, even though sleep sounds mingle with something more startling, and their noise rises to a great crescendo before they hurtle on to the stage, baiting Max and doing their best to scare the pants off him. It is a simple musical moment of inspired complication.

The row continues for a bit, the monsters using what Sendak has called 'a childish, naughty, upside-down pidgin Yiddish', sometimes yelled, sometimes whispered, until Max loses patience, stamps his foot and quells the din. He stares into the eyes of the Wild Things and they cower before him, and in turn sing quietly and gently, taking the opportunity to creep up on him threateningly when his back is turned, only to freeze when they think he can see them.

It is the beginning of the Coronation scene, which starts with the Goat-Dance. One by one, they prepare the accoutrements of the Coronation – velvet cushion, sceptre, casket, crown – and form a procession. The throne lights up and, after a chant of something like adoration on the part of the Wild Things, Max reaches it, sits and is crowned, at which point the opera's climax starts to build: a brilliantly direct, if highly compact, paraphrase of the Coronation scene from Boris Godunov, with the Goat as Shuisky and the other Wild Things, andantino alla marcia, standing in for the Russian crowd.

Max announces fortissimo 'And now let the WILD RUMPUS start!!' The music begins molto vivace, moves into a Valse-Mazurka and, with Max on the Bull's back and the other Wild Things stamping round him, there is general jubilation, the music perhaps remotely indebted to Ravel, but to the Ravel of La Valse, not of L'Enfant. This is the opera's centre-piece, and it was the last section to be completed to the composer's satisfaction.

Abruptly, Max stops the riot, dominating and controlling the Wild Things just as surely as his mother had him, and orders them too off to bed without supper. Max is alone and sings a tender aria about his dream of flying so high he was scared, his music for the first time a slow cantilena, marked at one point 'like an incantation, calmissimo'. He gets into his boat and suddenly there is a recrudescence of suppressed violence as the monsters whisper furiously, nightmarishly ('like an unbelievable rage when heard through ear-plugs'). Max turns round and the music changes instantly, first into a sanctimonious Barbershop quintet and then into nothing less than passionate fury again. The island recedes until, with the voices of the Wild Things still audible, the music becomes gently consolatory and in the Second Interlude a point of reconciliation seems achieved. After the Rumpus, we rejoin the world of L'Enfant, Max's vocal line takes on a note of ecstasy, and it is not long before Mama is heard singing reassuringly off-stage, a palpable rather than a visible comfort. We are back in Max's room – and he can smell hot soup.

H.

ZOLTÁN KODÁLY

(born 16 December 1882, died 6 March 1967)

HÁRY JÁNOS

Fable in three acts, text by Béla Paulini and Zsolt Harsányi. Première, Budapest, 16 October 1926, with Isabella Nagy and Imre Palló, conductor Nador Rékai. First performed Cologne, 1931; Zürich, 1950, with Malaniuk, Boehm, conductor Reinshagen. New production Budapest, 1952, with Maria Matyas, Imre Palló. New York, Juilliard School, 1960, in English; London, Camden Town Hall, 1967, with Frank Olegario; Vienna Volksoper, 1967, with Mirjana Irosch, Harald Serafin, conductor Carl Melles; Buxton Festival, 1982. Very successful in Hungary.

Háry JánosBaritone
 Ilka (Orzse), *his fiancée*Soprano
 Empress of Austria.....Soprano
 Emperor NapoleonBaritone
 Marie-Louise, *his Austrian wife*Mezzo-Soprano
 Old Marczi, *Marie-Louise's coachman*Baritone
 Ritter von Ebelasztin,
Chamberlain to Empress Marie-LouiseTenor

Speaking roles

Kaiser Franz of Austria
 Countess Melusine } ladies-in-waiting
 Countess Estrella } to Marie-Louise
 Hungarian Sentry
 Russian Sentry
 General Blood-and-Thunder
 General Dufla
 First and Second Hussars
 First and Second Artillerymen
 Village Elder
 A Student
 Abraham, an innkeeper
 First and Second Peasants

Generals, Hungarian and French Soldiers, Peasant Women, Court Servants, People

Place: Hungary

Time: Beginning of the Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 20 minutes

Háry János is less a true opera than a play with a quantity of incidental music. Nevertheless its home in Hungary is in the opera house, and it has been successfully played abroad. Only a few of the large number of characters actually sing, but there are no fewer than thirty musical numbers in the score, varying from a full-dress operatic finale to a few bars of incidental, atmospheric music. The play is conceived as a fantastic adventure told to his cronies by an uneducated but imaginative Hungarian peasant, and nothing that happens in it bears any relation to reality, being based exclusively on what Háry would expect it to be like. Kodály has clothed the story in music of great charm and individuality, as will be readily acknowledged by anyone who knows the attractive orchestral suite drawn from the opera.

Prologue. The prelude (called The story begins in the suite) aptly sets the 'once upon a time' atmosphere. The scene is in an inn, on one of whose walls hangs a crude picture of Napoleon. What sort of story is Háry János likely to tell today, asks the village elder. When Háry appears, a student points to the picture of Napoleon: that was a great hero. I once took him prisoner with my own hands, is Háry's rejoinder!

First adventure. The scene is the border of Galicia and Russia. On the Russian side, it is deep winter; the sentry is muffled in furs and stamps about, blowing on his hands. On the Hungarian side, the sun is shining, the flowers are out, and the Hussar drips with sweat. They comment on the weather. One's drink is too hot, the other's is frozen; they exchange. As the curtain goes up and during the early part of the conversation, a flute solo gives out the tune of the duet, which occurs later in the scene.

Ilka appears, singing a little unaccompanied song. When the sentry makes eyes at her, she warns him that she will set Háry János on him if he does not stop. Háry appears, asks for Ilka, is told which way she went, and goes off to find her.

Herr von Ebelasztin, Chamberlain at the French court, puts his head out of the Russian side of the guardroom and complains that his Empress has not been allowed to pass the frontier. The Hungarian coachman employed at the French court tells Háry that the Empress is being kept in the Russian guardroom. Háry demands of the guard that she be let through. 'No one in, no one out' is the Russian's answer. There seems no solution until Háry takes hold of the guardroom and pulls it bodily into Hungarian territory, whereupon the ice and snow immediately begin to melt.

Háry and Ilka sing a beautiful duet: 'Tiszán innen, Dunán túl'. The tune, of haunting, nostalgic beauty, occurs as the third item in the orchestral suite.

Marczi, the coachman, returns and toasts the lovers in a drinking song, but Ebelasztin complains of the noise and they are all ashamed at the thought that they may have disturbed the Empress's rest. She, however, emerges and asks who it was who sang so attractively. When told it was Háry, she asks him to come to Vienna with her.

The Russian re-appears, full of apprehension that he will be hanged if the guardroom's altered position is found. Ebelasztin tries to push it back but cannot, and it is not until Háry consents to do it that any progress is made. It immediately starts to freeze again.

Second adventure. This section is introduced by the famous Intermezzo with its intoxicating rhythms. The scene is the park of the Imperial Palace in Vienna, viewed strictly through the eyes of Háry's imagination, i.e. the bushes have blossoms in the shape of an Imperial crown, the trees are of gold, the dovecot is inhabited by a two-headed eagle. It appears that all are conscious of the animosity with which Ebelasztin regards Háry, although they are somewhat reassured when, a moment later, Ebelasztin sends Háry off to the riding-school. There he is put on to the fiercest horse in the stable, which immediately dashes on to the roof. Háry returns quite unconcerned, having put Lucifer quietly away in his stall. Marie-Louise gives Háry a violet she has picked, much to the fury of Ebelasztin, who has asked for it for himself.

The Austrian Empress joins the group, and Marie-Louise blushing points out the mighty Háry to her. Ilka appears from the kitchen with a dish of sweet-corn, whose seeds she proceeds to feed to the two-headed eagle. Ebelasztin joins her, and says he carries in his bag Napoleon's declaration of war on Austria, to use when he thinks fit. Marie-Louise's gift of the violet to a peasant bumpkin is quite sufficient provocation, and he will use it forthwith. Military noises are heard from the palace, and everyone rushes in saying that war has been declared by France. Háry, by now promoted Captain by the Emperor, kisses Ilka goodbye, and the curtain falls as General Dufla wheels on an enormous cannon.

Following the Intermezzo, the music of the Second Adventure consists of three songs and an extended orchestral incident depicting the palace clocks striking midday, much to the delight of the astonished Háry (this is included in the suite). Marie-Louise sings a little song about a cuckoo as she picks the violet which is to cause the ructions between Ebelasztin and Háry. Ilka has two songs, one almost pathetic in character as she reflects on the danger Háry ran when he rode the wild Lucifer, the other brisk and lively as she feeds the Imperial fowls.

Third adventure. The battlefield; in the background is the fortress of Milan, and behind that the mountains. Cannon are in evidence, and Hussars stand about, among them Háry, by now promoted Colonel. Hussars discuss the military situation with General Blood-and-Thunder; shots are heard, and the General's immediate reaction is to give the order: 'Withdraw according to plan.' French soldiers appear, Háry draws his sabre and, by the mere act of doing so, creates a draught which fells his opponents. The music of the battle (included in the suite) is in three stages. First of all, the French band can be heard off; when it comes on, Háry is laying low the army with the wind of his sword, with the result that the playing of the band becomes more and more confused. Very soft percussion heralds the entry of Napoleon but soon the brass enters fortissimo, with a hint of the 'Marseillaise' somewhere in the music. Napoleon falls on his knees and is taken prisoner by Háry, who declares the war over. There is a funeral march, dominated by a moaning little tune on the saxophone.

Marie-Louise comes on the scene and is contemptuous of the beaten Napoleon, who has a little song to the tune of the funeral march. Everyone congratulates Háry and to the accompaniment of gipsy music a feast is prepared. Ebelasztin and Ilka come in, the latter admitting that the former's warnings seem to have had something behind them when she sees how Háry is behaving – 'Is this war's hardship?' she asks bitterly.

There is an acrimonious exchange between Ilka and Marie-Louise, when the former dances with Háry. Marie-Louise announces she is going to marry Háry, and when the latter demurs, she rushes off threatening to commit suicide. Háry naturally manages to save the situation, and he leads a marching ensemble as the episode comes to an end.

Fourth adventure. Háry's room in Vienna. The Empress and Marie-Louise sing a duet, Marie-Louise wondering which of her ten suitors to marry, her mother plumping for Háry.

To the accompaniment of outrageously noisy music, the Emperor leads in a procession in honour of Háy, who will in future, he announces, be endowed with half the Empire and half the Imperial Palace. At the feast Háy is not himself and will eat nothing; he is even cross when told that double-headed chickens are normal fare for the Imperial table. The Emperor toasts Háy in a speech, and then, to a march, in come the little archdukes to shake hands with the hero of the day.

Háy admits that he cannot marry Marie-Louise, not least because he has a sweetheart of his own – Ilka. If he is to have a reward, says Háy, may he be let off half his military service, so that he can go home and get married. Ilka comes in, knowing nothing of what has happened, and sings a melancholy and very beautiful song. Háy, now dressed as an infantryman, returns (for a Hussar, infantry uniform is practically the same as civilian clothes, he observes), and swears allegiance to the Emperor. There is only one more complication to clear up. Ebelasztin is sent in chains to Háy by the Emperor Napoleon, but Háy magnanimously pardons him and leads him over to his beloved Marie-Louise. The finale, for Háy, Ilka, and the chorus, makes use of material already used in the opera, notably the love duet and the intermezzo.

Epilogue, set in the same inn as the prologue. Háy János finishes his story: he and Ilka walked home and were married. Now, Ilka having died, there is no one to witness his story but he. H.

JOONAS KOKKONEN

(born 13 November 1921, died 2 October 1996)

THE LAST TEMPTATIONS

Viimeiset kiusaukset

Opera in two acts, libretto adapted from Lauri Kokkonen's play of the same name (1959). First performed in Helsinki, Finnish National Opera, 2 September 1975, with Martti Talvela, Ritva Auvinen and Seppo Ruohonen, conducted by Ulf Söderblom. After an unprecedented 166 performances it toured to seven foreign opera houses, including the Metropolitan Opera, New York. Yet to be staged in Britain.

Paavo Ruotsalainen, Finnish farmer, leader of a religious revival.....Bass
 Riita, his first wife.....Soprano
 Juhana, their son.....Tenor Jaako Högman, the smith who converted PaavoBaritone
 Anna Lovisa, *Paavo's second wife*Spoken Role Albertiina Nenonen, *servant*Spoken Role
 First ManTenor
 Second Man.....Baritone
 Third Man.....Bass
 First Woman.....Soprano
 Second WomanMezzo-Soprano
 Third WomanAlto

Place: Finland

Time: 1852, and Flashback

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Paavo Ruotsalainen (1777–1852) was a revivalist preacher who led a movement that briefly galvanised Christianity in Finland. He was inspired by the writings of Thomas Wilcox, gathered in A Choice Drop of Honey from the Rock Christ, 1739, which the smith Hogman gives Paavo in the opera. Kokkonen follows his brother Lauri Kokkonen's play in portraying the inner, rather than the outer man: we scarcely hear Paavo preach but we do see what a disastrous impact his mission has on his family; his cruelty, vanity and selfishness, which are part of his journey towards redemption. The ambivalence of this portrait, the storm music and the community's hostility to a visionary probably witness to the influence of Britten's Peter Grimes.

Act I, scene i. Paavo's deathbed. As Paavo Ruotsalainen lies dying, he calls out for Riita, his first wife who died twenty years ago. He refuses to recognise either the servant, Albertiina, or his second wife Anna Lovisa. The two women's roles are spoken (except when they sing a hymn 'with untrained voices') and their speech is independent of the orchestra, while all Paavo's singing is shadowed and enriched by complex layers of orchestration. At Albertiina's suggestion, the two women sing a hymn: hymns form one of the keystones of the work's construction. After one verse, he joins in so passionately that the others fall silent. He sends them away, convinced, as he says, that Heaven's gate must be approached alone, that 'there's no need for women past or present'. This leads to the first of the interludes that link all the scenes.

Scene ii. Riita at the dance. Like the others, this scene is experienced by Paavo at the end of his life: he is young here, but also on the edge of death. When he asks Riita to come with him, three men and three women mock him and warn her that she faces thirty-three years of suffering. She agrees to go, to retrace his steps in life. She suggests they start with a visit to the smith who inspired Paavo with a sense of his Christian mission. The trudging interlude seems to take up Paavo's last line, that he will 'plod on'.

Scene iii. The smith. Riita blames the smith for making Paavo so religious that he neglected his family. He rejects her criticisms firmly but does not answer them, contemptuously dismissing women's contribution to doctrinal discussion. Paavo himself confesses that he now has no strength, that the gate is shut. The smith reassures him that Christ will open it.

Scene iv. The frost. Paavo and Riita with their first child are in their first home in summer, playfully contemplating the future. Paavo plans to build a proper house but is daunted when a farm gate reminds him of Heaven's gate that he cannot open. A crowd appears, led by the same men and women as in Scene ii, who menace Paavo and describe how the frost is rising to threaten his crops. Paavo's frantic efforts to dispel it lead to disaster when the baby is trampled underfoot.

Scene v. Juhana and Riita. While Juhana mends Paavo's knapsack he tells his mother that he longs to get away and experience the world. She despairs at being left alone and Juhana abandons the idea for the moment. Riita hides the knapsack.

Scene vi. The last loaf. Riita begs Paavo to stay at home and not go off to meetings. He is more concerned to do God's business than look after his family and takes the last loaf in the house, as he is going on a long journey. In desperation, unable to feed their children, Riita throws an axe at Paavo. It misses.

Scene vii. Paavo's monologue. Paavo describes how he cannot open the door and remembers how he was drawn to the outside world, how people flocked to see and hear him. The orchestra vividly portrays their rowing across the water to him. He could not help them: 'I was talking to the air'. The interlude for strings that follows is particularly poignant.

Scene viii. Juhana's death revealed. The village women visit Riita, and reveal brutally that her son Juhana has died. She comments that the frost is destroying the corn, but she can no longer weep. Paavo himself sees this as God's just punishment on him.

Scene ix. Riita's death. It is late winter and she longs for spring. Despite everything, she looks back on a good life and thanks God for it. In her mind, she sees that the gate is open and asks Paavo to recite the psalm of thanksgiving ('Bless the Lord O my soul', psalm 103). He realises that, unlike her, he has wavered in his faith. He begins the psalm, but Juhana appears in a bright light and continues it. The act ends as Riita moves towards Juhana, saying, 'Now the gate is open'.

Act II, scene i (x). The Klajoki assizes. Even if we did not recognise Paavo's tormentors in the men sitting on the flagstones, the music would remind us of their taunts at the dance. It is the site of Paavo's famous victory against the authorities who once accused him and others of heresy. The men determine to hang him with his own words. His enemies distort what happened and what he said, and bring on beautiful women to tempt him. Paavo appeals to Christ to have mercy and falls down. The chorus sing a hymn.

Scene ii (xi). The fisherman (Paavo's second monologue). Riita appears (to shimmering strings and xylophone) and asks him 'Where are you?' 'In hell' he answers (to a clarinet descending into the lowest depths). In a memorably lyrical, soaring phrase she invites him 'to the island' ('Tul saareen'). In his second long monologue he reaffirms his mission. Riita begs him again to come to the island and give thanks, but he is determined to attack academic Christianity 'in its lair', at the graduation ceremony of the University of Helsinki.

Scene iii (xii). The graduation. The First, Second and Third Men wait in front of Helsinki Cathedral, still determined to destroy Paavo. Pretending not to recognise him, they laugh at him for being dressed as a farmer and imagining that he belongs with guests of honour. The works of devotion he has read do not count or even exist, according to them. He hears his hymn being played as the procession approaches and they stop him joining it.

Scene iv (xiii). The call to the island. Riita again invites Paavo to come to the island. She reassures him that he will be accepted.

Scene v (xiv). The dead. 'Only Paavo's face is visible... Suspended, "timeless" atmosphere'. The smith explains that 'All temptations are caused by self-righteousness'. The smith, Riita and Juhana remind Paavo of important elements in his life, such as the book (his mission), the scythe (his duties at home) and the axe. He leaves the resolution to God.

Scene vi (xv). Paavo's prayer. On his deathbed once again, Paavo imagines he is going to join the procession (we hear fragments of his hymn in the orchestra). When the First, Second and Third Men and Women enter they are revealed as Paavo's family and household, all speaking, rather than singing. Paavo gradually returns to consciousness, and the orchestra stops playing as he speaks. Recognising that his death is near, he tells his girls not to cry and orders them to plant a tree on his grave – an extremely prickly one, to reflect his own nature. He asks Albertiina to read from the book the smith gave him. She does so, in speech that verges touchingly on song, or chant. Paavo begins his hymn. Soon the others take over and the chorus enter the room to join in as well. Until now we have only heard the minor-key version; Kokkonen reserves for this moment the major-key version, accompanied by the full orchestra. Finally, we hear Riita's lyrical invitation from off-stage. Paavo asks Christ to intercede for him. The orchestra has the last, eloquent word: a prolonged discord followed by timpani beats, silence, then resolution.

The Last Temptations has no formal numbers and only two extended solo passages (Paavo's monologues). Kokkonen orders his prose material with ensembles based on the interaction of the six anonymous soloists. He also uses recurrent rhythmic patterns: in the first and last scenes the timpani tap out a fairly constant rhythm that is at once Paavo's heartbeat and an anticipatory funeral march. Kokkonen delights in dances; the score's other principal structural motif is generated by the hymns' sacred, as opposed to the dances' secular patterns. It is characteristic of the opera's complex portrayal of its hero that Paavo loves dancing.

The opera proved an immense success in Finland, where it has become the national opera, and has been enthusiastically received wherever it has played abroad, thanks to its musical accessibility, occasional grim humour and the intensity of its near-verismo domestic scenes. It also helps that it stresses the human rather than the theological aspects of the story. The sustained string phrases under the biblical quotations go back to Bach passions, but are also not so far removed from Strauss's presentation of Jokanaan. When the dying Riita sees a vision of her dead son Juhana reciting a psalm 'in a bright light' and then moves towards him, sentimentality is only very nearly avoided – the situation is all too reminiscent of the dying nun's vision in Suor Angelica.

The role of Paavo Ruotsalainen was created and to a large extent defined by Martti Talvela, who managed superbly to incarnate the character's strengths and, of equal importance to this opera, his weaknesses, all the more touching for being portrayed by a magnificent bass voice: Kokkonen does not shirk from showing the inhumanity of the visionary, as well as his heroism.

P.

ERICH KORNGOLD

(born 29 May 1897, died 29 November 1957)

DIE TOTE STADT

The Dead City

Opera in three acts, libretto by Paul Schott (pseudonym for the composer and his father Julius), based on Georges Rodenbach's novel Bruges-la-morte (1892). First performances Hamburg, conducted by Egon Pollak; Cologne, conducted by Klemperer, both 4 December 1920. First U.S. performance, Metropolitan Opera, New York, 1921, with Maria Jeritzka making her New York début as Marietta, Orville Harrold as Paul, conducted by Artur Bodanzky. Not yet apparently staged in the U.K.

Paul Tenor
 Marietta, dancer/The Ghost of Marie,
 Paul's late wife Soprano
 Frank, Paul's friend Baritone
 Brigitta, Paul's housekeeper Mezzo-Soprano
 Fritz, Pierrot in Marietta's troupe Baritone
 Juliette, dancer Soprano
 Lucienne, dancer Soprano
 Gaston, dancer Tenor
 Victorin, stage director Tenor
 Count Albert Tenor

Dancers, Beguine Sisters, Children, People

Place: Brussels

Time: Late Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Act I. Brigitta lets Paul's friend Frank in to the room where Paul keeps mementoes of his dead wife Marie. Brigitta warns him about Paul's unhealthy obsession with the past. Yesterday, however, Paul changed and wanted light to come inside his 'temple', saying, 'The dead rise again!' Brigitta uncovers a portrait of Marie wearing a shawl and holding a lute and shows Frank the braid of her golden hair that Paul keeps under glass. Paul explains to Frank that Marie is not dead: he has seen her in Bruges; she will visit him today. Korngold lavishes all his seductive art on Paul's narration, his 'fairytale, a miracle'. Somehow the shadowy, oneiric dankness of Bruges wells up, as Paul evokes his strolls by the canal, the vision of Marie... Frank warns him that he should not fantasise, but let the dead sleep. The score is haunted by Strauss, by Salome at this point, with Paul as obsessed as the Princess of Judaea was. When Frank has gone, Paul tells the painting of Marie that he is waiting for her.

Somewhat reluctantly, for she is afraid of scandal, Brigitta lets Marietta in. The dancer is full of life, uninhibited. Paul wraps Marie's shawl around her shoulders and hands her the lute. She sings an intensely romantic, sad Lied, which she calls 'the song of true love that must die'. They sing the second verse together ('Glück, das mir verblieb'). She sees to her amused surprise that he is moved by 'the stupid song'. When she hears her lover Gaston singing outside, Marietta comments on how she likes his voice. She explains she is a dancer on tour and begins to dance, accompanying herself on the lute. The dance is supposedly an ecstatic celebration of Dionysiac life, which rouses Paul to try and embrace her. In avoiding him, she inadvertently draws back the curtain over Marie's portrait and recognises the lute and shawl. She refuses to take anything seriously, however, and reminds him that she can be found at the theatre, where she is dancing Hélène in Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable. Paul yields to desire. In the darkness, Marie steps out of the portrait and asks whether Paul has remained true to her. Assuring him that their love 'was, is and will be', she urges him to go into life, to see and understand. The act ends as Marietta appears to Paul in a fantastic costume.

Act II. The stage directions tell us that we briefly see Paul in his armchair, 'as at the end of Act I', to indicate that this scene is still part of his dream. We are on a deserted quay in Bruges, outside Marietta's house, near a convent with a bell-tower. In the exceptionally beautiful prelude, the bells ring out repeatedly. We need to know that in Bruges they are known as 'Iron Confessors'. They remind Paul of Marie's funeral and rouse his conscience: his longing to see Marietta is mixed with fear. Nuns cross the bridge and remind him that he, too, was once pure in heart. Suddenly he recognises Brigitta among them. She left Paul because he betrayed Marie's memory. Paul sees Frank approach Marietta's door and realises that his friend is his rival.

Marietta's troupe arrive in a boat without her. They pretend to be in Venice. Victorin, one of the dancers, and the Count, their rich patron, sing in honour of Marietta. The others suggest that as Gaston missed the show, he is probably in bed with Marietta. We are haunted by Strauss again, by Ariadne auf Naxos, with the troupe serenading their soprano. Marietta turns up on Gaston's arm and flirts with the Count. They drink a toast, 'Down with Bruges', and Marietta calls for a song. Franz obliges, accompanied by a piano and, at one point, by eight off-stage sopranos. The song is a display piece for the baritone voice, as Harlequin's was in Ariadne. Its aptly haunting refrain says it all: 'My yearning, my imagining, my dreams return to the past.' At its end Franz sinks to Marietta's feet. She decides to dance her solo from Meyerbeer's opera in the open air and lies down on the bench as though in a coffin, saying: 'As soon as I am a resurrected corpse, I'll seduce Robert.' Victorin whistles the resurrection theme, bells toll, an organ heaves and the music builds to a nightmarish climax – to Paul's disgust. She welcomes him as a 'true Robert', but he accuses her of lying and corruption. She refuses to let him judge her. He reveals that he only ever loved his dead wife in her; now he despises her. She pities him, however, and justifies her ecstatic life as necessary for her art. She offers him life, the sun, herself. He lets himself be seduced, agrees that he loves her for herself and even agrees that they should spend the night together in his house, in her (i.e. Marie's) room.

Act III. The entr'acte's blaring horns, repeatedly rising strings, and busy percussion make it quite clear how Marietta and Paul spent the night. The next morning, Marietta tells the portrait of Marie that she has now died again: since Paul loves Marietta, he is free from Marie ('Dich such'ich Bild!'). Bells chime once more: a religious procession goes by outside, to the sound of a potently mysterious march, garlanded with solo violin, cello and children's voices to ensure it resonates with innocence. Paul watches and describes the procession: monks carry statues and banners; citizens portray historical figures from the past. The procession seems to come through the room, glowing with radiant light (the scene is clearly intended to trump Tosca). Everyone kneels, including Paul. Marietta is piqued by Paul's piety, a part of him that remains inaccessible to her. As the procession invades the room, Marietta resolves to confront the ghosts and superstition that fill Paul's mind. In a major passage, almost an aria, she looks back on her hard struggle to succeed: she made her own faith, when she made her own way in life. She insists that Paul kiss her. He rejects her. She declares the fight is between her and Marie, between life and death. Seizing the braid of Marie's hair she drapes it around her neck and begins to dance, expressing, as she does so, 'the conquering power of life'. He strangles her with it and then sees, to his horror, that she is, at last, exactly like Marie.

Paul wakes up and realises it was all a dream. Brigitta announces that Marietta has returned for her umbrella. She hints that perhaps she should stay. Paul remains silent, so she leaves. Frank sees Marietta and comments ironically, 'So that was the miracle?' The short scene between Paul and Frank carries a surprisingly high emotional charge, managing to be both realistic and nostalgic: some sort of resolution has been achieved. Paul will not see Marietta again. He has learnt his lesson: Bruges is the dead city; he agrees to try and leave with Frank. Alone, he sings another verse of the Lied he sang with Marietta. This time, he concludes that life and death must remain separate: 'Here on earth', as the composer himself wrote on the occasion of the opera's first performance in Vienna in 1921, 'there can be no reunion with those who have left us, there can be no resurrection.'

Die tote Stadt's dream-device enables Korngold to have it both ways: his music invites us to revel in obsession, to mix Dionysiac, sensuous abandonment with proto-blasphemous indulgence in religiosity, while also offering to make it all right by presenting this combination as the past which we have now superseded: so it was only a phase, after all... This makes for a heady combination even now: far from being a period piece, its power to disturb has brought it a new popularity on the continent and in New York as a thriller, an 'opéra noir'. When he directed it in Düsseldorf, Günter Krämer used apt references to Hitchcock's films (Psycho, Vertigo) to reveal it as 'a first-rate stage work' (Opera, May 1987). P.

L

ÉDOUARD LALO

(born 27 January 1823, died 22 April 1892)

LE ROI D'YS

The King of Ys

Opera in three acts, text by Edouard Blau. Première at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, 7 May 1888, with Deschamps-Jéhin, Simonnet, Talazac, conductor Danbé. First performed New Orleans, 1890; Covent Garden, 1901, with Paquot, Adams, Jerome, Plançon; Metropolitan, 1922, with Ponselle, Alda, Gigli, Danise, Rothier, conductor Wolff.

| | |
|-------------------------------------|----------|
| Le Roi d'Ys | Bass |
| Margared } | Soprano |
| Rozenn } His daughters | Soprano |
| Mylio | Tenor |
| Karnac | Baritone |
| Saint Corentin..... | Bass |
| Jahel | Baritone |

Nobles, Warriors, Soldiers, People

Running Time: 1 hour 40 minutes

Lalo's career lay in orchestral and chamber music but there is evidence that his aspirations were operatic, for all that he composed only one substantial example. Even Le Roi d'Ys, successful the moment it was publicly heard and never long out of the repertory since, had to wait a dozen years from the time it was written until it was staged.

The story is founded upon a Breton legend. The impressive overture uses themes from the opera, prominent among them the duet 'En silence pourquoi souffrir?', which occurs as a cello solo, and Margared's aria in the second act.

Act I. Outside the palace of Ys. The people rejoice that the war in which they have recently been engaged is at an end, and that peace has been brought to them through the betrothal of the King's daughter Margared to the enemy leader, Karnac. As the crowd leaves the stage, the two sisters appear. Rozenn asks Margared why her looks are sad on the day on which her engagement is announced: 'En silence pourquoi souffrir?' At first Margared will not share her grief with anyone else, but eventually she admits that her heart was secretly given to a man, and that man was in the ship on which sailed the soldier Mylio, whom nobody has seen since the cessation of hostilities. She hates Karnac with a double loathing; he takes her away from the man she loves, and he is the enemy of her country. Rozenn tries to comfort her; she must lose no time in admitting her repugnance for Karnac, before it is too late and the marriage contract signed and sealed.

Alone, Rozenn in an aria avows her own love for Mylio himself. He appears suddenly at her side, and they pledge eternal faith to each other. Mylio disappears, and the King leads out Margared to meet Karnac, who appears with his followers. The people rejoice at the marriage which will put an end to their sufferings. During the course of the ceremony, Rozenn whispers to Margared that not only has Mylio returned – she has seen him – but his companions too, and among them must be the man for whom Margared languishes. Margared turns impulsively to her father, and repudiates Karnac; she cannot marry, she says, a man she does not love. The general consternation grows when Karnac pledges himself in revenge to carry the war through until Ys is totally destroyed. But at this moment, Mylio pushes his way through the crowd and swears to fight for Ys until the war is brought to a victorious conclusion. The people acclaim their champion.

Act II. The great hall of the palace. Margared looks from the window at Karnac's troops assembling on the plain below. Mylio will lead the armies of Ys, and Margared is filled with turbulent feelings on his account, which she expresses in a fine aria: 'Lorsque je t'ai vu soudain'. She suspects that Mylio loves Rozenn; if it is so, her love for her sister and Mylio would turn to implacable hate.

No sooner are the words out of her mouth than Rozenn and the King enter with Mylio. Margared hides, and hears Mylio reassure Rozenn – Saint Corentin has blessed the battle on which he is embarking – and, a moment later, her sister proclaims her love for the valiant general. The King gives his blessing to them, and then leaves with Mylio. Margared confronts Rozenn as her rival for the love of Mylio. May he die rather than be united with Rozenn! Rozenn is horror-stricken at her sister's words and tries to defend herself; were she in Margared's place, her heart might break, but she would not give way to hate: 'Tais-toi, Margared!' (Be silent, Margared!) But Margared is not to be appeased; she curses her sister and vows vengeance on her for having stolen Mylio.

The scene changes to the great plain in front of the castle of Ys. Mylio is proclaimed victorious, but ascribes the enemy's defeat to the intervention of Saint Corentin, the patron saint of Ys. The stage empties, and Karnac appears, dishevelled and worn after his unsuccessful fight. Margared stands before him, and offers him revenge for his defeat; she will, with his help, open the flood-gates and let in the sea to drown the town. As they go off together past the chapel of Saint Corentin, Margared challenges the saint to avert the disaster she will bring on Ys. The sky darkens, the statue of the Saint comes to life and calls on her to repent.

Act III. Gallery in the palace. On one side is the door to Rozenn's apartments. In accordance with Breton marriage custom, it is protected by young girls against the efforts of the friends of the bridegroom to force an entrance. Mylio himself joins his retainers and pleads his own cause. He sings the famous Aubade, 'Vainement, ma bien-aimée', a tune of delicious fragrance, accompanied by the female chorus. It accomplishes its purpose, and Rozenn to a Breton tune says she will grant his request. The procession forms up, and makes its way into the chapel opposite. As the sound of the Te Deum can be heard from the chapel, Margared and Karnac make their way into the castle. Karnac demands that Margared fulfil her promise, and when she seems reluctant to bring disaster on her relations and her countrymen, he taunts her until she is mad with jealousy.

Karnac and Margared leave together, and Mylio and Rozenn emerge from the ceremony, and sing of their love ('A l'autel j'allais rayonnant'). Margared reappears and overhears Rozenn and her father pray for her return. She is overcome with remorse and, when cries of alarm are heard outside, hastens forward to warn them of their impending fate. She tells them that Karnac has thrown open the gates which keep the sea from drowning the city, but that she herself has killed him for his deed.

The scene changes to the highest point of the city, where the people have taken refuge to escape the fate which threatens them all. The noise of the angry sea can be heard, and the crowd prays for deliverance from death. The water still mounts, and the King laments that half the city has already disappeared, carrying away most of his subjects. Suddenly Margared, as if in a trance, reflects that the waters will not recede until they have claimed the required victim. She herself is that victim, she opened the gates; she will die in expiation of her crime. She throws herself into the sea, which immediately grows calmer, and the people thank Saint Corentin for their deliverance. H.

FRANZ LEHÁR

(born 30 April 1870, died 24 October 1948)

Franz Lehár was of Czech and Hungarian parentage, studied in Prague and later led military bands. With the dawn of a new century, he forsook bands and took exclusively to the theatre, where he had one success after another, hitting the bull's eye in 1905 with The Merry Widow, an operetta of something approaching perfection. In the 1920s his association with the tenor Richard Tauber brought fortune to each, and after a series of new or re-written operettas with Tauber in the lead (Das Land des Lächelns – The Land of Smiles – is perhaps the most famous), his last new work was an opera, Giuditta, written for the Vienna Opera with Jarmila Novotná and Tauber in the leads. H.

DIE LUSTIGE WITWE

The Merry Widow

Operetta in three acts, text by Victor Léon and Leo Stein after Henri Meilhac's L'attaché d'ambassade. Première Theater an der Wien, Vienna, 30 December 1905, with Mizzi Günther and Louis Treumann (who made one or two early recordings). The operetta almost immediately became a hit and has been seen and heard all over the world ever since.

Baron Mirko Zeta, Pontevedrian

Ambassador in Paris Bass

Valencienne, his wife Soprano

Count Danilo Danilovitsch, First Secretary Tenor

Hanna Glawari, a rich widow Soprano

Camille de Rosillon, a Parisian Tenor

Raoul de St Brioché, a Parisian Tenor

Vicomte Cascada, a Parisian Baritone

Bogdanowitsch, Pontevedrian Consul Baritone

Sylviane, his wife Soprano

Kromow, Pontevedrian Councillor Baritone

Olga, his wife Mezzo-Soprano

Pritschitsch, Pontevedrian Military Attaché Bass

Praskowia, his wife Mezzo-Soprano

Njegus, an Embassy secretary Tenor

Grisettes, Dancers, Guests

Place: Pontevedrian Embassy, Paris; Hanna Glawari's House in Paris

Time: Early Twentieth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

The Merry Widow's première turned out to be the opening of an era for the 'musical', but, sadly, the start of the obituary of the operetta, as from 1905 the genre began to decline and, with the death of Lehár after World War II, to die.

Count Danilo back in Pontevedro fell in love with Hanna, but his family disapproved of marriage to an impecunious girl, and she married a rich, elderly banker, by name Glawari, who promptly died leaving a very rich widow. She has now taken a house in Paris, to whose Pontevedrian embassy Count Danilo is posted.

In 1940 Lehár wrote a quite unnecessary but occasionally revived overture, but the operetta customarily begins with only a few bars of quick music.

Act I. The Prince's birthday is being celebrated in the Pontevedrian Embassy by Parisian guests and the Embassy staff led by the Ambassador, Baron Mirko Zeta. His present preoccupation, toasts and greetings out of the way, is to find the wealthy widow Hanna Glawari and make quite sure she doesn't marry a Frenchman, her millions being vital to the future of the shaky Pontevedrian economy. The Baron's young French wife Valencienne flirts with Camille de Rosillon, and, in spite of her protestation 'Ich bin eine anständ'ge Frau' (I'm a highly respectable wife¹), their duet contains bittersweet seeds which may well – who knows? – bear fruit in the future. Hanna Glawari is expected and the Baron has sent Njegus, a trusty Embassy secretary, to make sure Count Danilo is around when she arrives. He seems like a good match for her, thinks the Ambassador, who has been assured that the only Frenchman of comparable standing is out of the reckoning as he is known to be in love with a married woman.

La Glawari is announced and, to general acclaim, makes her entrance, the cynosure of all male eyes, singing a mazurka over the murmured admiration of the male throng. She invites everyone to a party next day at her house. Valencienne, to keep her own nose clean, orders Camille to marry Hanna, then countermands her order immediately. It is time for Danilo to put in an appearance after a night on the town, and his song, 'Da geh' ich zu Maxim' (I'm off to chez Maxim), is justly famous as one of the great throw-away entrances of all time. He is a patriotic man all right, he says, but his first duty is to the girls at Maxim's restaurant. He subsides onto a sofa where Hanna finds him, and their sparring, which is to continue for most of the rest of the action, gets under way. At the outset, because he refuses to be branded a fortune-hunter, he swears never to say to Hanna 'I love you'.

¹ Translation throughout by Christopher Hassall.

Die lustige Witwe (The Merry Widow). Maurice Chevalier as Count Danilo in the 1934 MGM film, directed by Ernst Lubitsch.

Camille and Valencienne daydream prettily of an unattainable future, but the Ambassador, thinking he sees a chance, instructs Danilo that it is his duty to marry the widow and so secure the Pontevedrian financial future. The finale is 'Ladies' Choice', with Danilo working hard to outmanoeuvre all the men who want to dance with Hanna until she chooses him, whereupon he offers to auction the prize he has seemingly won. Finally, partly out of instinct to beat the opposition, partly out of re-kindling of the old flame which pride insists no longer burns, he dances a waltz with her with all the genuine warmth which lies at the heart of this operetta.

Act II. The garden of Hanna Glawari's Parisian palace. Pontevedrian dancing precedes Hanna's singing of the score's best-known solo, the Vilja-Lied, 'Es lebt' eine Vilja' (There once lived a Vilja), the legend of a mountain sprite, with its haunting refrain and floated final top B. When Danilo arrives, Hanna continues her not-so-subtle advances, Danilo his impressive but constantly less believable evasions until they confront each other in a wooing duet disguised as a piece of fooling but so full of charm as to fool nobody: 'Dummer, dummer Reitersmann' (Silly, silly cavalryman).

The mood changes and Pontevedrians and Frenchmen, led of course by Danilo but including the unsuspecting Baron, nudge each other on the subject of women and fidelity, a rollicking septet which concludes that the whole subject is shrouded for most of them in mystery ('Ach, die Weiber, diese Weiber!': Oh these women, dreadful women). The Baron for his part believes the fool of a husband of the married woman Camille loves should be persuaded to give her up. To the rhythms of kolo and then waltz – the waltz – Hanna and Danilo remain determinedly, at least on his part, at cross-purposes but move nonetheless ever closer together. As far as Hanna is concerned, the hunt is on!

The rest of the act's action revolves round a pavilion in the garden. Valencienne is still determined to keep her flirtation with Camille at that level and nothing more, but he pursues her not only with ardour but, for an operetta, with quite exceptional gallantry. His aria, 'Wie eine Rosenknospe' (Red as the rose of Maytime), with its elegant balance, stands out in Lehár's output as a solo of quite extraordinary quality.

They go into the pavilion, and are observed by the all-seeing, nil-revealing Njegus, who knows that the Baron and Danilo are due to meet there. The Baron's curiosity is aroused and he looks through the keyhole to see to his horror Valencienne with an anonymous man. The situation requires all Njegus's skill if it is to be resolved happily and he contrives somehow to get Valencienne out of the pavilion and Hanna into it before the Baron comes back to open the door. When he does, it is Hanna who emerges with Camille, who repeats the declaration of love he has just made to Valencienne, to the Baron's relief but to the consternation of the by now thoroughly jealous Danilo.

The cat is truly among the pigeons, and Hanna keeps the pot boiling by announcing her engagement to Camille, somewhat to that worthy's surprise. Danilo reacts with sarcasm about marriage and its durability, but celebration seems general until Danilo embarks on a sad little parable, beginning 'There once were two royal children', outlining the unwilling silence of one and the ultimate betrayal by the other, and ending in such obvious distress that Hanna is left in no doubt of his love.

Act III. The ballroom of Hanna's house is now decorated like Maxim's. Valenciennes and grisettes – real ones – dance and sing to general delight, but a telegram from Pontevetro announces imminent bankruptcy unless Hanna's millions are retrieved for the national treasury. Hanna tells Danilo that not everything that took place in the pavilion was quite as it seemed, and she and Danilo plight their troth – after so much ado, what other expression will serve? – to the strains of the Merry Widow waltz – lazy, over-familiar perhaps, but still packing a romantic punch.

Explanations pour out. The Baron's rejoicing turns to ashes as Valenciennes's fan is found in the pavilion; he declares himself divorced and free to marry Hanna, but all is saved when Hanna tells him her late husband's will declares her fortune forfeit if she re-marries, and the fan turns out to have 'I am a respectable wife' written on it in Valenciennes's unmistakable hand. 'I never knew that', says the Baron, shaken but not stirred. Danilo without risk of appearing a fortune-hunter can openly declare his love for Hanna, and even revelation of another clause in the will giving the fortune to Hanna's new husband causes no new twist to the tale. The last chorus hymns, as it had halfway through Act II, the eternal mystery of women as seen through men's eyes, only this time the women are allowed to shed some light on proceedings by joining in.

Casting of the operetta is not quite straightforward. Hanna is no soubrette, closer, a Viennese soprano once said to me, to a young Tosca than to a Susanna; Danilo on the other hand is a personality, preferably (to avoid transposition) belonging to a tenor, or at least a baritone with an easy top G. Camille is a straightforward tenor, essentially one with a top C, and Valenciennes is the kind of singer Viennese operetta throws up, a soubrette with an ability to sing the low tessitura Lehár often writes. But the whole is much more than the sum of its parts: an operetta not only of apparently unquenchable popularity but with a splendid, witty book, and a variegated, brilliant score, each with uniquely erotic overtones. A quite unusual masterpiece! H.

RUGGIERO LEONCAVALLO

(born 23 April 1858, died 9 August 1919)

PAGLIACCI

Strolling Players

Opera in two acts, words by the composer. Première, Teatro dal Verme, Milan, 21 May 1892, with Stehle, Giraud, Maurel, Ancona, Daddi, conductor Toscanini.

Canio (in the play, 'Pagliaccio'), head of a troupe of strolling players.....Tenor

Nedda (in the play, 'Colombina', Columbine), wife of Canio.....Soprano

Tonio (in the play, 'Taddeo'), a clown.....Baritone

Beppe (in the play, 'Arlecchino', Harlequin).....Tenor

Silvio, a villager.....Baritone

Villagers

Place: Montalto, in Calabria

Time: The Feast of the Assumption in about 1865–70

Running Time: 1 hour 5 minutes

It would not be accurate to suggest that Pagliacci was Leoncavallo's only successful opera, La Bohème and Zazà figuring at least spasmodically in the repertory for much of the twentieth century. But Pagliacci far outstrips the others in number of performances.

Pagliacci opens with a prologue as Tonio pokes his head through the curtains – 'Si puo? Signore, Signori' (By your leave, ladies and gentlemen). The prologue, successful even as a concert piece, rehearses the story of the opera in musical phrases which recur later.

Act I. The outskirts of the village. People are celebrating the Feast of the Assumption and waiting for the arrival of a group of peripatetic players. Beppe in his Harlequin costume leads in a donkey cart in which reclines Nedda, followed by Canio in his Pagliaccio costume and Tonio, dressed as Taddeo.

Canio addresses the crowd. At eleven o'clock their play will begin; the troubles and vengeance of Pagliaccio is the theme. Tonio starts to help Nedda out of the cart but Canio shoves him aside and Tonio goes off muttering. A villager suggests Tonio might in real life be after Nedda, and Canio grimly replies that in the play he would risk a beating, but in life much more.

Nedda is alone. Canio's manner worries her but the birds are singing and she thinks of her childhood (ballatella: 'Oh! che volo d'augelli'). Tonio sneaks back to protest his love. The more he pleads, the more she mocks him and the angrier he gets. He attempts a kiss, but she strikes him across the face and he goes off, muttering revenge.

Nedda's lover Silvio comes in, telling her their meeting is perfectly safe as Canio is drinking at the inn. Nedda must leave with him that very night after the performance. She is not confident but eventually agrees. After an impassioned love duet, 'E allor perchè, di', tu m'hai stregato', the lovers agree not to see each other again until after the play.

Tonio has been listening and goes to fetch Canio, who arrives in time to hear Nedda call after Silvio. Canio, knife in hand, rushes forward but Nedda obstructs him and Silvio escapes. The enraged Canio demands his name, but Nedda refuses to give it. Tonio and Beppe restrain him: Nedda's lover will be at the play.

Left alone to prepare for the performance, Canio laments his predicament. His soliloquy, 'Vesti la giubba' (On with the motley), is one of opera's famous moments. 'Ridi Pagliaccio' (Laugh then, Pagliaccio), he sobs; the clown must make others laugh even though his heart is breaking.

Act II. The audience is waiting and the play begins. Colombina's husband, Pagliaccio, is away until morning, Taddeo is at the market and she is waiting for her lover, Arlecchino. A minuet provides the musical background. Arlecchino/Beppe sings a serenade, 'O Colombina, il tenero fido Arlecchin'.

Taddeo enters and makes advances to Colombina, who summons Arlecchino to throw him out. As well as his bottle of wine, Arlecchino has brought a sleeping potion for Pagliaccio. Taddeo bursts in – Pagliaccio is on his way, full of suspicions and hopping mad at her. Arlecchino nips out of the window, instructing Colombina to pour the philtre into her husband's wine. She calls after him 'Tonight, love, and forever I am yours!' – the very words Canio heard his wife use to her lover a few hours before.

Colombina tells Pagliaccio that she is alone, apart from Taddeo who is hiding in the cupboard. The audience laughs, but Canio loses control and demands Nedda tell him her real lover's name. The more Nedda tries to stay in character, the more desperate Canio becomes, insisting that he is not Pagliaccio but a man with real feelings. The audience sees his intensity as great acting. Still trying to keep up appearances, Nedda begins a gavotte, 'Suvvia, così terribile'. She stops, Canio grabs a knife and demands the name. Nedda tries to leave but Canio catches and stabs her. Silvio rushes to help and Canio stabs him in his turn, then stands stupefied: 'La commedia è finita' (The comedy is ended).

Confidence behind the première of Pagliacci is suggested by the engagement of a brilliant cast of leading singers (no less than two top baritones) as well as the up-and-coming Toscanini. That confidence has been justified and tenors and baritones of the top rank have queued for the leading roles, de Lucia and Caruso making an early mark as Canio, Battistini and Ruffo as Tonio. Nedda, less showy, was sufficiently well thought of early on to have Melba as her first exponent both at Covent Garden and the Metropolitan. The opera, which Leoncavallo maintained was based on a true story witnessed by his father, a magistrate, is admirably shaped, highly effective, and has been paired with a number of other one-acters, though never so compatibly it would seem as with Cavalleria Rusticana. H.

LA BOHÈME

Commedia lirica in four acts, libretto by the composer, based on Henry Murger's novel Scènes de la vie de Bohème (1847–49) and his play (with Barrière) La vie de Bohème (1849). First performance at La Fenice, Venice, 6 May 1897. Leoncavallo's revision (with Rodolfo as a tenor) as Mimi Pinson, scene della vita di Bohème given at the Teatro Massimo, Palermo, 1913, revived Teatro San Carlo, Naples, 1957, La Fenice, Venice, 1990. First U.K. performance, Camden Town Hall, London, 1970.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Marcello, a painter..... | Tenor |
| Rodolfo, a poet | Baritone |
| Schaunard, a musician..... | Baritone |
| Barbemuche..... | Bass |
| Visconte Paolo..... | Baritone |
| Gustavo Colline | Baritone |
| Gaudenzio | Tenor |
| Durand | Tenor |
| The Gentleman from the First Floor | Tenor |
| Musette..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Mimì | Soprano |
| Eufemia, a laundress..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Students, Neighbours, Café Customers, Waiters, Salesmen | |

Place: Paris, Latin Quarter

Time: 1837–38

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Leoncavallo began to construct a libretto from Murger's Scènes de la vie de Bohème in 1892 and only thought of setting it himself when Puccini refused it. Puccini, however, was always keener on a project for an opera if someone else had already shown interest in it. In 1893 he denied that Leoncavallo had told him he was writing an opera on the subject and welcomed the competition. Puccini finished first (in 1895) and his opera was given in Turin the following year. Leoncavallo followed with his La Bohème in 1897 and for a time both operas co-existed in the repertory.

Act I. 24 December 1837. In a room on the first floor of the Café Momus, Gaudenzio, its proprietor, rebukes Schaunard and his Bohemian friends for eating little and paying less. Marcello imported his easel and models; Schaunard taught singing there. A potential student arrives in answer to the advertisement and is chased away by Gaudenzio. Schaunard promises they will reform. His friends the poet Rodolfo and the painter Marcello arrive, both almost penniless. The philosopher Colline turns out to have no money, either, when he arrives with Eufemia, Schaunard's girlfriend. Mimì, Rodolfo's girlfriend, a flower-girl, introduces her friend Musette, a seamstress who has left her wealthy banker friend in order to meet the Bohemians. Marcello falls instantly in love with her (parodying Raoul's recitative from Meyerbeer's Les Huguenots). Schaunard introduces them all to her. In return, Mimì presents Musette to them as a delicious flirt, in love with love.

They sit down and consume a hearty meal. Musette sings for them, this time about Mimì ('Mimì Pinson la biondinetta'). Marcello makes love to Musette, who warns him that she is vain and capricious, while the others complain about the service. When the bill comes they realise they have no money to pay for it. One of the other guests, Barbemuche, a teacher and writer who longs to join the Bohemians, offers to pay but his offer is refused. Instead, Schaunard challenges him to a game of billiards. The Bohemians' comments on the match counterpoint Musette's scene with Marcello. He offers to paint her portrait and declares his love; she agrees to mend his waistcoat, but warns him to be her friend, rather than her lover ('Signorina Musette'). Schaunard wins, Gaudenzio is paid and the bells ring out for Christmas Day.

Act II. 15 April 1838. Musette lost the apartment her rich banker rented for her when he discovered she had installed her lover, Marcello. Her furniture has been piled up in the courtyard. Marcello offers to share his attic with her, if she will sometimes sing for him and the swallows that haunt it ('Io non ho che una povera stanzetta'). She remembers she has invited guests for a party that evening, and decides to hold it in the courtyard itself. Rodolfo bribes the concierge, Durand, and explains that he has sold his tragedy Vendicator (The Avenger). The Bohemians arrange the furniture and look forward to the party in a hectic ensemble obviously inspired by Verdi's Falstaff.

Durand announces the guests. Barbemuche brings his pupil, the rich Viscount Paolo. Schaunard rebukes Eufemia: for the second time he has found evidence she has another lover. Schaunard goes to the piano and directs a performance of the Bohemians' Hymn, celebrating youth and love. Schaunard threatens to perform his cantata 'On the Influence of Blue on the Arts'. The Viscount tempts Mimì by offering her riches. She knows she would regret it forever... At Marcello's suggestion Musette sings her song in praise of the voluptuous waltz. An ensemble builds up as the Viscount tempts Mimì to leave poverty and accept his 'protection'. Schaunard imitates Rossinian opera in his cantata on the theme of blue. Mimì leaves in the Viscount's carriage. Other lodgers complain at the Bohemians' riotous party and, in a noisy finale, chase them away.

Act III. October 1838. Marcello's attic. Schaunard and Marcello are hungry and sick of poverty. They comment on Rodolfo's unhappiness, since Mimì left him for the Viscount. Musette is still there, but very hungry, which Marcello takes as a reproach. He sees their rose has died. When Musette came to him, she promised to stay till it died. The two men go off to find some money. Musette decides to leave Marcello and writes him a letter: hunger is driving her out to wander the boulevards. She asks the porter to hand the letter to him. She meets Mimì, who has come back to Rodolfo, and they compare notes in a duet. Mimì hides behind a screen when Marcello arrives in fury, having read Musette's letter. She tells him how much pain the letter cost her and he realises she does love him. When she asks for a farewell kiss, he repulses her violently. The screen is overturned, revealing Mimì. Marcello blames her for finding Musette a new protector. Rodolfo arrives and refuses to listen to her. She leaves. Once Musette has also left, Marcello gives in to his grief at losing his beloved.

Act IV. 24 December 1838. Rodolfo's attic. In a sumptuous showpiece for the baritone voice, Rodolfo welcomes the bitter wind that suits his new poem: rejecting glory, riches and poetry, since he cannot have love, he welcomes death ('Scuoti, o vento'). Schaunard brings lunch (bread, potatoes and herrings) and all three remember their last Christmas. Mimì arrives, near to death. Abandoned by the Viscount, she could not afford to stay in hospital and has nowhere to go. Musette arrives, singing her song from Act II, and immediately sends Schaunard to pawn her jewels for money. It is too late, however: Mimì dies, remembering the last Christmas Eve they spent together, with 'Natale!' (Christmas!) on her lips.

Inevitably, Puccini's masterpiece has pushed Leoncavallo's version of La Bohème out of the lime-light. Where they try to do the same things, such as manipulating bitter-sweet emotions, Puccini's opera is funnier, sadder, more intense, more real – better. Instead of interleaving them, Leoncavallo devotes the first two acts to comedy, the last two to tragedy. The superiority of Puccini's opera is most evident in its ending, whose overwhelming theatrical power makes the sentimentality of Leoncavallo's ending sound even cheaper than it is. It would be easy to say they are very different works; they are not. And yet, on its own merits, Leoncavallo's La Bohème undoubtedly deserves to be more widely performed. It is full of meaty, grateful roles. It is refreshingly unmealy-mouthed about money and sex: when Marcello asks, 'What is your new lover's name?' Musette answers, 'I don't know yet'. It also moves fluently, with frequent brief excursions into lyricism, while many of the arias are incorporated into the drama as performances of songs, a hymn, a cantata and a letter. The tension doesn't slacken, as it does with Puccini occasionally – when the tenor sits, you know it's time for the soprano's aria.

P.

ZAZÀ

Opera in four acts, text by the composer. Première at the Teatro Lirico, Milan, 10 November 1900, with Storchio, Garbin, Sammarco, conductor Toscanini. First performed in London at Coronet Theatre, 1909; Metropolitan, New York, 1920, with Farrar, Crimi, Amato. Revived la Scala, 1940, with Favero, Gigli, Bechi; Naples, 1950, with Favero, Prandelli, Tagliabue.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Zazà, a music-hall singer | Soprano |
| Anaide, her mother..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Floriana, a music-hall singer..... | Soprano |
| Natalia, Zazà's maid | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Mme Dufresne | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Milio Dufresne, a young man-about-town | Tenor |
| Cascart, a music-hall performer | Baritone |
| Bussy, a journalist..... | Baritone |
| Marlardot, proprietor of a music-hall..... | Tenor |
| Lartigon, monologist..... | Bass |
| Duclou, stage manager | Bass |
| Michelin, journalist..... | Tenor |
| Courtois | Bass |
| Marco, Dufresne's butler..... | Baritone |
| Toto, Dufresne's child..... | Soprano |
| Auguste..... | Tenor |
| Claretta..... | Soprano |
| Simona | Soprano |

Place: Paris

Time: The Present

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

Leoncavallo is supposed to have preferred Zazà to Pagliacci, but the public has been reluctant to accept the later opera at the composer's own valuation. All the same, it has enjoyed a certain success whenever a singing actress of sufficient personal appeal has been available for the title role.

Act I. The scene is backstage at the music-hall where Zazà is the star attraction. On one side of the stage can be seen her dressing-room, on the other the back of a stage set. Zazà and her stage partner Cascart are lovers, but Zazà has taken a fancy to Milio Dufresne, and she boasts to the journalist Bussy that it will not be long before Dufresne in his turn succumbs to her charms. Zazà and her rival Floriana argue furiously and we meet her drunken mother before Zazà and Cascart sing a charming 'kiss' duet, a parody of the sentimental music-hall ditties of the period. Dufresne waits for Zazà to come off-stage, and gossips with Bussy, revealing as he does so that he is considerably attracted to Zazà. He describes her smile with more rapture than caution: 'È un riso gentil'. It is obvious to Bussy that Zazà's conquest is already made.

Act II. The love affair between Dufresne and Zazà is quickly under way, and the two of them go off to Zazà's house in the suburbs of Paris. Dufresne says that he must go away on business, and Zazà accepts this philosophically enough, until Cascart comes to see her. He hints that the trip may have other reasons than business behind it, and says that Dufresne has been seen with another woman in Paris. The scene includes a well-known aria for Cascart, 'Buona Zazà'. Zazà resolves to see for herself whether these suspicions are justified or not; she will follow Dufresne.

Act III. Dufresne's Paris residence. Dufresne sings unhappily of his prospective separation from Zazà ('Mai più, Zazà'), then leaves the house with his wife. Zazà, accompanied by Natalia, goes to the address she has been given. She sees a letter addressed to Madame Dufresne and realises with a shock that the 'other woman' in Dufresne's life is his wife. Dufresne's little child tells Zazà that her mother is out, and, when she is alone, Zazà gives way to her grief: 'Mamma usciva di casa'. She makes an excuse that she has come to the wrong address and leaves.

Act IV. Zazà's house. Cascart tries to persuade Zazà to give up Dufresne, who is likely to bring nothing but sorrow and suffering into her life. The stage is her career, and his old affection for her is just as strong as ever: 'Zazà, piccola zingara'. But she cannot go against the dictates of her heart, for all her affection for Cascart, and she sends him away. When Dufresne returns to the house, Zazà taxes him with what she has discovered. She says that his being married makes no difference to her love for him, but, in an effort to punish him for his deception, pretends that she revealed their liaison to Madame Dufresne. Dufresne furiously curses her for what she has done and throws her to the floor in his anger. Zazà's love is cured, and she sends Dufresne away, after telling him that she revealed nothing to his wife, who does not even know of her existence. H.

GYÖRGI LIGETI

(born 28 May 1923)

LE GRAND MACABRE

Opera in two acts (four scenes), libretto by Michael Meschke and the composer after Michel de Ghelderode's 'La Ballade du Grand Macabre'. Première, Stockholm, 12 April 1978, with Britt-Marie Aruhn, Elisabeth Söderström, Kerstin Meyer, Barbro Ericson, Sven-Erik Vikström, Erik Saeden, Arne Tyren, conductor Elgar Howarth. First performed Hamburg, 15 October 1978; Bologna, 1979 (in Italian); Paris, 1981;

English National Opera, 1982, with Marilyn Hill Smith, Penelope Mackay, Jean Rigby, Ann Howard, Roderick Keating, Geoffrey Chard, Dennis Wicks, conductor Howarth.

Chief of the Secret Police

(Gepopo)¹.....Coloratura Soprano

Venus¹.....High Soprano

Clitoria.....Soprano

Spermando².....Mezzo-Soprano

¹ May be sung by the same singer.

² Trousers role.

| | |
|--|------------------|
| Prince Go-Go ¹ | Soprano |
| Mescalina, Astradamors's wife | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Piet the Pot | High Buffo Tenor |
| Nekrotzar | Baritone |
| Astradamors, an astrologer | Bass |
| Three ruffians | |
| Ruffiak | Baritone |
| Schobiak | Baritone |
| Schabernak | Baritone |
| White Minister | Speaking Role |
| Black Minister | Speaking Role |
| Secret Police, Prince Go-Go's Servants | |

Place: Breughelland

Time: Nebulous

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

It was more than a dozen years before its eventual première that the then director of the Stockholm Opera, Göran Gentele, asked Ligeti to write an opera. Initially the composer envisaged a music drama without narrative but, when Gentele was killed in a motor accident, he abandoned the work and only after several false starts settled on a play by the Flemish dramatist Michel de Ghelderode (1893–1962).

After the première, Ligeti's music was described as 'a brilliant, exotic music-box of medleys, set pieces, recurrent motifs, quotations and references proposed with the greatest delicacy, bound together with a quick, taut thread'.² It is an individual work, bizarre for much of the time, often jocular, always imaginative, and so far from narrative-opera that no one of its several productions in the first years of its life closely resembled any other. If the composer appeared to prefer the one in Bologna, because its jocularly pornographic nature most resembled his imaginings, he seems not to have favoured its original staging (with which he was closely associated), but to be an opera composer constantly in search of the perfect realisation.

The prelude is written for twelve tuned motor-horns, precisely notated, less precise in intonation, but producing an effect that combines rhythmical, even melodic, interest with the sheer quirkiness that somehow typifies one aspect of Ligeti's vision.

Act I, scene i. Breughelland. It is a mixture of the Dies Irae and the praises of his own country which Piet the Pot sings while an epicene pair of lovers, Clitoria and Spermando, search for a place where they can make eternal love. Piet is sometimes tipsy, sometimes drunk (say the stage directions). Clitoria and Spermando duet in a land of unending 'O altitudo!' and have found, if the gentle strains of their love duetting are to be believed, the secret of suspended, but continually erotic, animation (Clitoria climaxes on a top D). As Piet watches them in amazement and delight, Nekrotzar can be heard prophesying death, and indeed grandiloquently claiming to be no less a person than Death himself. It is, he says, his task to bring the world to an end. The music of Piet and Nekrotzar cavorts until it almost gets out of hand, and in the end Piet, in spite of his efforts at evasion, is conscripted to help Nekrotzar in what he conceives to be his mission. Piet collects scythe, hat, cloak, from the tomb which Clitoria and Spermando have appropriated for love-making, and Nekrotzar makes a proclamation of doom as he rides off on Piet's back.

The last word, amorous needless to say, goes to Clitoria and Spermando before motor-horns take us in a short interlude to scene ii. Astradamors, the astrologer, is fortunate, as a masochist, in that his nymphomaniac wife Mescalina is a sadist. She is seen whip in hand at curtain rise and their love play is extensive and explicit, she in leather, he at first in female clothing. But Astradamors after all concerns himself primarily with the heavens and he goes to his telescope only to discover elements of the skyscape just as alarming, it would appear, as what has been going on on earth. Mescalina falls asleep totally drunk, and implores Venus to send her down a lover a bit more active than her husband.

It is not long before her prayer is answered as Nekrotzar comes in with Piet, and he turns out to be not at all backward in responding to her appeal. His love-making is so vigorous that she expires.

Astradamors, who does not conceal his delight to be quit of her, joins Nekrotzar and Piet in their journey to the Prince's palace.

Act II, scene iii. In contrast to Act I, Act II starts with tuned and tinkling electric bells, which bring us to Prince Go-Go's palace. The Prince at first seems scared of anything, but in the course of the action turns out to be not without his effective moments. Two politicians are trading insults and the Prince does not seem disposed to intervene. At one point he is lifted against his will on to a rocking horse for his riding lesson, and later he is required to memorise a speech. Eventually, the Ministers in dudgeon resign and the Prince, to their astonishment, accepts their resignations.

¹ Trouser role; may be sung by countertenor.

² Dominic Gill in the Financial Times.

The Chief of the Secret Police, disguised as a brightly coloured bird (so say the stage directions), comes in, all brilliant coloratura, staccatos, high notes, two-octave jumps, to bring news of serious public disturbances and the approach of a procession. This galvanises the Prince to action and he makes a speech to produce quiet among the people.

The peace turns out to be short-lived, as the imminent arrival of Nekrotzar, with his retinue of Piet and Astradamors, will produce little short of panic. The Chief of Police starts to expostulate in even greater flights of coloratura, and, after reading a dispatch, he warns of some terrible coming. When Astradamors appears, he is jovial, it must be admitted, rather than terrible.

Here in the published score (but in Stockholm at the première it preceded Act II) comes a large-scale instrumental number based on the theme from the finale of Beethoven's Eroica (on timpani and lower strings) with four solo instruments (violin, piccolo, E flat clarinet, bassoon; in Stockholm, on stage) playing variations above it. During its very attractive course, Nekrotzar, still riding on Piet's back, enters in procession. Nothing apparently can stop his prophecies of doom, but Piet and Astradamors unwittingly cause a diversion by filling him up with drink, which he takes at first absent-mindedly from them. Eventually, after a lengthy and in the end almost ritualistic carousal, Nekrotzar starts to wax almost lyrical, so that, with Prince Go-Go joining in, when it comes to it, he has just enough control of speech to utter the words that should, as midnight strikes, bring the world to an end.

Scene iv. The music at first is as dimly lit as the scene, but briefly accelerates before the trombones apparently run out of steam and we are in calmer waters, back in Breughelland, with Piet and Astradamors hovering just above the ground, dreaming that they are in heaven. They leave the scene but Prince Go-Go seems to have survived as well, nervous when he finds himself apparently alone, and, it would seem, with some reason when three cut-throats set about him. He is rescued by Nekrotzar, thoroughly hung-over from the night before and amazed to find any survivors of the apocalypse. When Nekrotzar tries to get back into the tomb from which he emerged in the first place, Mescalina jumps out of it and starts chasing him. Prince Go-Go tries to assert his authority, and it is not long before the two Ministers, as well as Piet and Astradamors, come on to the scene. Piet, Astradamors and Prince Go-Go drink, and there ensues a quiet and very beautiful musical section marked andante calmo during which Nekrotzar starts to shrivel up and collapse, until by the end of this mirror canon, he has entirely disappeared.

At this point, the two lovers emerge from the tomb, quite ignorant of what has been going on. Their mood, post-coital and serene, starts to affect everyone and in a final passacaglia they decide that there is nothing to fear in death.

Le Grand Macabre (how translate the title? The Great Horseman of the Apocalypse?) is, it has been said, an opera for a time without answers, an opera whose subject is sex and death, and in which the only victim of the holocaust is the bringer of death himself. The composer called it an 'anti-anti-opera' (in 1965, he had planned to write no more than an anti-opera, in the vein of the attractive Aventures and Nouvelles Aventures), and yet the publisher of Le Grand Macabre was able at the end of a brochure devoted to it to quote from an English newspaper: 'If anyone can resurrect the art of opera, Ligeti looks the man.' H.

ALBERT LORTZING

(born 23 October 1801, died 21 January 1851)

ZAR UND ZIMMERMANN

Tsar and Carpenter

Comic opera in three acts, text by the composer, founded on a French play by J.T. Merle. First produced Leipzig, 22 December 1837; New York, 1851; London, Gaiety Theatre, 1871 (in English, as Peter the Shipwright), with Santley and Blanche Cole.

Peter I, Tsar of Russia Baritone
 Peter Ivanov, a runaway soldier Tenor van Bett, Burgomaster of Saardam Bass
 Marie, his niece Soprano
 Admiral Lefort, Russian Ambassador Bass
 Lord Syndham, English Ambassador Bass
 Marquis de Châteauneuf, French Ambassador ... Tenor
 Witwe Browe Contralto

Place: Saardam, Holland

Time: 1698

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

The composer's popularity in German-speaking theatres was demonstrated during 1958–59 when 565 operas by 290 composers were performed. Lortzing, with 1,044 performances in sixty-two theatres, came fourth in the list of composers, after Verdi, Mozart and Puccini. His Der Wildschütz was the second most popular individual opera! This popularity waned in late twentieth century.

Act I. Peter the Great of Russia, under the name of Peter Michaelov, is working in the shipbuilding yards at Saardam, in Holland, with a view to gaining experience and knowledge such as he could never find in Russia itself. He has become friends with Peter Ivanov, another Russian and a deserter from the armed forces. Peter Ivanov has fallen in love with Marie, the Burgomaster's niece, a coquette who cannot resist showing him that he is not the only attractive man about the place. Van Bett, the comically self-opinionated Burgomaster, has been approached by the Ambassadors of England and France to find out if the Tsar is secretly working in Saardam. He calls together the shipworkers, and finding many are called Peter, determines on a subtle and, he thinks, foolproof stratagem: which of them, he asks, is a foreigner? To his consternation, two step forward – Peter Ivanov and Peter Michaelov. He needs time to fathom it all out; let everyone go back to work – he has all the information he requires. He decides that Peter Ivanov is the man he is looking for, and accordingly offers him whatever he chooses, even the hand of his niece in marriage, if he will admit his identity to the foreign gentleman to whom he will presently introduce him. At the end of the act, the French Ambassador has recognised the Tsar and even made contact with him, while Syndham and van Bett, thinking Ivanov is their man, start to pay court to him.

Act II. A local festivity is in progress. All watch the dancing and listen to the singing, and the French Ambassador even sings a song in praise of Flemish beauty, much to the chagrin of Peter Ivanov, who takes it to be aimed at Marie. The principal characters divide into two groups: Peter Michaelov, the French and Russian Ambassadors on one side, Peter Ivanov, van Bett, and Lord Syndham on the other, and negotiations proceed. Van Bett has had a good deal to drink, and he thinks the time has come for him to solve his problem in his own way. He demands, with more forthrightness than manners, the names and identification of the three Ambassadors present in the inn. Somewhat taken aback by their answers, he announces he will arrest the two Peters, and is only prevented from carrying out his design when the Tsar draws his sword and announces he will not be taken alive.

Act III. Van Bett prepares to send 'the Tsar' on his way with full musical honours. He rehearses his choir and tells them that he himself will sing the solo part; nothing is too much trouble if it will honour their noble visitor. The Tsar himself has in the meanwhile found the means to provide himself with a ship in which to sail home, promising before he leaves a safe conduct for Peter Ivanov. Van Bett starts off his anthem (which he directs at Ivanov, still thinking him the Tsar), but is interrupted by the sound of a cannon shot; the real Tsar is about to leave the harbour. He pauses for a moment to take leave of his friends, and is gone, to the acclamation of the crowd.

The best role is for van Bett, whose entrance aria in Act I, with its catch-phrase, 'Oh, ich bin klug und weise', is a favourite with German comic basses. Perhaps the most enjoyable moment in the opera is his rehearsal in the last act; this is capital fun, with van Bett's 'diddle-dum, diddle-dum, diddle-dum' to show when the orchestra plays alone, and his relish of the excellence of his own words. In Act II, the French Ambassador has a charming solo, 'Lebewohl mein flandrisch' Mädchen', and in the last act occur the Tsar's song, 'Sonst spielt' ich mit Szepter und Kron', and the Clog dance, the latter a direct fore-runner of Wagner's apprentices. H.

DER WILDSCHÜTZ

The Poacher

Opera in three acts, text by the composer based on a play by A. von Kotzebue. First produced at Leipzig, 31 December 1842. First performance in England, Drury Lane, 1895 (in German); New York, 1856. Edinburgh Festival, 1958, by Stuttgart Opera, with Lore Wissmann, Plümacher, Wunderlich, Schmitt-Walter, Fritz Linke, conductor Leitner.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| The Count of Eberbach..... | Baritone |
| The Countess, his wife | Contralto |
| Baron Kronthal, her brother | Tenor |
| Baroness Freimann, the Count's sister | Soprano |
| Nanette, her maid | Soprano |
| Baculus, a schoolmaster on the Count's estate | Buffo-Bass |
| Gretchen, his fiancée | Soprano |
| Pancratus, major-domo to the Count | Speaking Part |
| Servants, Huntsmen, Peasants, Schoolboys | |

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

Der Wildschütz is, with Zar und Zimmermann, Lortzing's most popular opera; the story is entertaining, and the excellent comic role of Baculus has the additional merit of being unique – there can be no other poaching schoolmaster in operatic annals. His 'Fünftausend Thaler' aria is one of the most celebrated solos in the repertory of the German bass. In addition, the score contains another unique feature, a fine comedy quintet – at the billiard table!

Act I. Baculus has accidentally shot a buck in a wood belonging to Count Eberbach, on whose estate he is employed as schoolmaster. He is filled with consternation when he receives a summons to the castle to account for his poaching. Gretchen, his bride-to-be, says she will intercede for him, but Baculus mistrusts this offer and will not allow her to go. A young student offers to help them in their dilemma and go dressed as Gretchen to ask for the Count's pardon (the student is in reality the Baroness Freimann in disguise; accompanied by her maid Nanette – also dressed as a boy – she wishes, unknown to him, to observe her betrothed, Baron Kronthal). Count Eberbach and the Baron arrive at the school and the Count, taking an instant liking to the supposed Gretchen, invites her and her friends to his birthday celebrations next day.

Act II. Baculus accompanies the disguised Baroness to the castle. Here everybody is enchanted by her country airs, the Count tries to make love to her on the sly, Baron Kronthal even goes so far as to contemplate matrimony. To save the situation, the Countess takes the 'village girl' into her own room for the night. Meanwhile the Baron offers Baculus no less than 5,000 thalers if he will give up his bride. It is more than the schoolmaster can resist.

Act III. Baculus sets about persuading Gretchen to fall in with the new situation, only to find to his consternation that the Baron is interested in the Gretchen he first met, not in the real bearer of that name. Baculus's admission that this was a student in disguise has unforeseen consequences: Baron Kronthal is furious that a man should have passed the night in his sister's room – for the Countess, it appears, is his sister. The discovery that the supposed Gretchen is really a student who is really Baroness Freimann solves all problems: the Count, who has been caught kissing her, is able to pass it off as only natural that he should kiss his sister, and the Countess is cleared of all blame.

As for the unhappy Baculus, he receives a full pardon from the Count, and he is even reconciled to Gretchen. H.

M

HEINRICH AUGUST MARSCHNER

(born 16 August 1795, died 14 December 1861)

Thought of historically as the link between Weber and Wagner, Marschner was far from negligible as a composer in his own right. Der Vampyr was his first notable success, but with Der Templer und die Jüdin (an adaptation of Scott's Ivanhoe) and Hans Heiling he showed that his way with high romanticism, the supernatural and horror was no flash in the pan. If his style is firmly rooted in Singspiel, he experimented sufficiently boldly to make his widely touted influence on his much greater successor a matter of more than conjecture. Wagner knew his music well and even wrote additional music for his operas.

DER VAMPIR

The Vampire

Opera in two acts, text by Wilhelm August Wohlbrück after Ritter's play Der Vampyr (an adaptation of John Polidori's story The Vampyre, itself derived from an idea of Byron's). Première in Leipzig, 29 March 1828. Performed all over Germany, as well as in Moscow, St Petersburg and London, it was taken up and revised in 1924 by the composer Hans Pfitzner, a version which had considerable success. In 1987 it was revived at the Gärtnerplatztheater, Munich.

Lord Ruthven,¹ *the vampire*Baritone
Sir John BerkleyBass
Janthe, his daughter.....Soprano
Sir Humphrey Davenaut.....Bass
Malwina, *his daughter*Soprano
Edgar Aubry, *employee of Davenaut's*Tenor
The Vampire Master.....Spoken
John Perth, *Lord Ruthven's steward*Spoken

Emmy, his daughter and Dibdin's fiancée.....Soprano
George Dibdin, servant of Davenaut's.....Tenor
Berkley's ManservantBass

Peasants on Davenaut estate

James GadshillTenor
Richard ScropTenor
Robert GreenBass
Toms Blunt.....Bass

Suse Blunt, Toms's wife.....Mezzo-Soprano

Demons and Creatures of the Underworld; Peasants and Retainers; Ladies and Gentlemen

Place: Sir Humphrey Davenaut's Estate in Scotland

Time: Eighteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

Act I. Ruthven, a vampire, is about to be dragged to hell but is granted by the Vampire Master another year on earth provided he can sacrifice three brides by midnight. Janthe is the first victim; Berkley stabs Ruthven and leaves him for dead. He is rescued by Aubry, who realises to his horror that Ruthven is a vampire but, because Ruthven once saved his life, swears to keep his secret.

From a window in the castle, Malwina watches the approach of her beloved Aubry, who is appalled to find that her father, Sir Humphrey, has plans for her to marry none other than the Earl of Marsden – Ruthven in person!

Act II. Guests are arriving for the wedding of George Dibdin and Emmy, whom Ruthven contrives to lead off as his next victim. Gadshill, Scrop, Green and Blunt provide comic relief in a drunken scene (encored at early performances), Suse remonstrates, and they are interrupted by a shot. George has found Emmy murdered but has, he says, shot the vampire.

¹ Pronounced 'Rivven', even in German.

Malwina, who has no idea he is a vampire, is resigned to marrying Ruthven. With the ceremony about to begin, Aubry denounces Ruthven, who is dragged off to hell, leaving Malwina and Aubry to be united with Davenaut's blessing.

The world of Carl Maria von Weber is not far away and Marschner in Der Vampyr plainly thinks of his opera as in line of succession to Der Freischütz. It presents singers and audiences with lyrical music for each of the three sopranos, with dramatic opportunities such as Ruthven's first-act aria and Emmy's Romance in Act II, and with a highly effective male-voice drinking ensemble. The composer knows how to advance the action by musical means as in Act I's trio for Malwina, Aubry and Davenaut or the same act's finale, when Aubry, watched by the eager Davenaut and the apprehensive Malwina, tries, without breaking his sworn oath, to warn Ruthven off Malwina who is plainly marked out as the next victim. Act II's extended finale is a brilliant affair, its action developing rapidly, as preparations for Malwina's wedding to Ruthven are advanced and then dramatically interrupted by Aubry's denunciation of the bridegroom as a vampire. H.

BOHUSLAV MARTINŮ

(born 8 December 1890, died 28 August 1959)

Bohuslav Martinů was born in Polička in the Bohemian-Moravian highlands. For a time he was a pupil of Josef Suk but when he was thirty-three he started to study in Paris with Albert Roussel, a significant influence on his development. He wrote no fewer than fourteen operas including two for radio and two for television. Most of his life was spent outside Czechoslovakia and it was while he was living in Paris in the 1930s that he embarked upon the first of three collaborative ventures with the poet Georges Neveux, French surrealist and self-styled anarchist.

COMEDY ON THE BRIDGE

Veselohra na mostě

Radio opera in one act and six scenes, libretto by the composer, based on Václav Kliment Klicpera's play of the same name (1826). First broadcast by Czech Radio on 18 March 1937, conducted by Otakar Jeremiáš, first staged on 9 January 1948 at the State Theatre, Ostrava, conducted by Frantisek Jílek. First U.K. production 1965, Lamda Theatre, London. First U.S. production, staged on 28 May 1951, at the Mannes School, New York.

Popelka, the village beauty.....Soprano
Sykos, a fisherman, her fiancé.....Baritone
Bedroň, a hops-grower.....Bass

Eva, his wife.....Contralto
The Schoolmaster.....Tenor
Friendly Sentry.....Spoken
Enemy Sentry.....Spoken
Friendly Officer.....Spoken

Place: A Bridge over a River
Running Time: 40 minutes

Having already written some six operas, Martinů was commissioned by Prague Radio which had started shortly before. The success of his first radio opera, The Voice of the Forest (Hlas lesa), led to the second commission, which has since established itself independently as a stage work.

A war is on. The river separating friendly from enemy forces is crossed by a bridge that is manned at its left by the Enemy sentry and at the right by the Friendly sentry. Coming from the Enemy camp and on her way home, Popelka presents her safe-conduct and is allowed on to the bridge. At the other end, however, the Friendly sentry refuses to recognise its validity. Popelka turns back, only to discover that the Enemy sentry will not let her through again: she is trapped on the bridge. She is joined by Bedroň, the hops-grower, who comes from the right, but is equally trapped on the bridge. Each refuses to tell the other why they had been on the opposite side. He insinuates that she may have been unfaithful to her fiancé, Sykos, and then himself kisses her. Sykos sees this and rebukes Popelka bitterly, when he joins them on the bridge. When he discovers he can't get off it, he threatens to jump into the river, but instead tells Bedroň's wife Eva that he saw her husband embracing Popelka. She determines to sue him and turns to the newly arrived Schoolmaster for help. The Schoolmaster has no time for their worries or for such matters as victory or peace. He cannot solve a riddle that Officer Ladinsky told him: a stag is trapped inside a high-walled game preserve; how can it escape, when there is no gate, hole or ditch? They cannot help him.

As the battle resumes around them, Popelka puts Sykos's mind at ease: she went across the bridge because she heard that her brother had been killed. She found his headless corpse and buried it. Bedroň confesses to Eva that he went across (in the other direction) to tell the soldiers how to get the better of the 'enemy'. Eva confesses that although she pretends to be innocent, she once kissed another man. Sykos admits to Popelka that he once kissed another girl. Voices are heard, crying 'Victory!' The Friendly Officer thanks Bedroň for the information he gave them, reassures Popelka that her brother is still alive and answers the Schoolmaster's riddle: how can the stag escape? It can't. They all laugh and the opera ends with their cries of 'Victory!'

The overture begins with a trumpet fanfare, echoed in a jarringly different key by a violin: it illustrates the gulf between the military principle and humanity, a dislocation which is emblematic for the whole opera. None of the anonymous soldiers sings:¹ dialogue between them and the named characters is across an unbridged gulf. The two Kafkaesque sentries repeat the Czech injunction 'Zpatky!' (Go back!) no less than twenty-nine times. When war resumes and cannons boom, the civilians are reduced to shouting, rather than singing.

With the smallest details, Martinů and Klicpera achieve the most resonant effects. Comedy on a Bridge certainly has farcical elements, patter sequences started off by Bedroň's verbal twitch of 'Aj!', for example, and a Rossinian frozen ensemble, but it also has elements in common with Beckett's work. The way it mixes the trivial and the serious is reminiscent of Smetana's Bartered Bride. Martinů refers to this, the first Czech opera, in occasional polka rhythms and in the moment when all the characters repeat 'A millstone weighs the secret down'. Characteristically, the Schoolmaster's riddle, which Martinů's music associates with childhood, nursery rhyme and fairytale, turns out to have a bleak non-solution: the stag cannot escape. No wonder that the civilians' laughter should sound so well drilled and that the final victory march seems nicely ambiguous, even, perhaps, hollow. It is symptomatic of the opera's liveliness, of its unmistakable contemporaneity, that Comedy on the Bridge was awarded the New York Critics' Award for opera of the year in 1951, fourteen years after its first performance. P.

JULIETTA

Opera in three acts, based on the play Juliette ou La Clé des Songes by Georges Neveux. Première at National Theatre, Prague, 16 March 1938, with Horáková, Jaroslav Gleich, conductor Václav Talich. First performed in Germany, 1959, Wiesbaden; London, 1978, by English National Opera, with Stuart Kale and Joy Roberts, conductor Charles Mackerras. Revived Prague, 1963, with Maria Tauberová, Ivo Zidek, conductor Krombholc.

| | |
|------------------------------|------------------------|
| Michel..... | Tenor |
| Julietta..... | Soprano |
| An Old Arab..... | Bass |
| A Man at a Window..... | Bass |
| A Man in a Helmet..... | Baritone |
| Act I | |
| A Small Arab..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Woman Selling Poultry..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Woman Selling Fish..... | Soprano |
| A Policeman/Postman..... | Tenor |
| Six Townsfolk..... | Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano |
| Act II | |
| Three Gentlemen..... | Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano |
| Grandfather 'Youth'..... | Bass |
| An Old Man..... | Bass |
| An Old Woman..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Fortune-Teller..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Seller of Memories..... | Baritone |

¹ The Schoolmaster names the Friendly Officer as Ladinsky, but he remains anonymous in the cast list and the score.

| | |
|-----------------------|---------------|
| An Old Sailor..... | Bass |
| A Young Sailor | Tenor |
| A Gamekeeper | Tenor |
| An Old Lady | Soprano |
| Act III | |
| An Official..... | Tenor |
| A Bell Boy | Mezzo-Soprano |
| A Beggar | Baritone |
| A Convict | Bass |
| An Engine Driver..... | Tenor |
| A Nightwatchman..... | Bass |
| Men in Grey | Silent |
| A Small Arab | Mezzo-Soprano |

Place: A Small Coastal Town in France

Time: The 1930s

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Georges Neveux's play Juliette ou La Clé des Songes was written in 1927 and first performed in 1930, and it immediately became a subject of controversy in Paris. Martinů seems not to have seen it but to have read it and then to have been seized with the idea of setting it. Before the opera's first English performance, Neveux himself told me that the first enquiry about setting the play came from Kurt Weill. Neveux was soon after invited by Martinů to hear his first act, which was already written. Neveux went, not without misgivings, only to find that Martinů had exactly caught the mood he had sought, so that he gave him the rights to the play and withdrew them from Weill. He himself went by sleeper from Paris in March 1938 to attend the first performance in Prague, and travelled entirely alone in an otherwise unoccupied train, arriving in Prague as Hitler advanced his threats to occupy the Sudetenland. In the circumstances, it was not surprising that the poet was on his own in the train, but somehow suitable as a prelude to the première of a work which puts forward so ambivalent a view of the nature of reality.

The spectator must make of Julietta what he chooses. It is a philosophical poem on the nature of man and experience; it is a dream, in which inevitably all situations, all persons, however sharply defined, are projections of the dreamer's subconscious; it shows the lurching of a mind between sanity and madness; it is pure schizophrenia.

Act I. Michel, the travelling bookseller from Paris – the only 'real' man in the story, through whose eyes we view it all – once paid a visit to a village with a harbour, and ever since, back in Paris, he has been haunted by the memory of a song he heard a beautiful girl singing through an open window. He wants to find her again and returns to the town. It seems to be more or less the same, but something crucial has changed: none of the people he meets has any memory of the past and all are aware only of the present. A little Arab boy has never heard of the Sailors' Inn and can't carry Michel's bag because he has no legs. Michel starts to give him some money but the boy demands more, and then jumps up and calls his father, who threatens and jostles Michel. Two shopkeepers wonder what the row was about and the argument becomes general and heated until the little Arab calls for someone to play the accordion, which has the effect of calming people down. A man in a window has been playing it and he says it helps jog his memory; a moment of lyrical nostalgia in the music. But the sound is too much for the man in a helmet, who has more authority than the others and is captain of a ship.

Michel seems to be fighting his way out of the inn and the Policeman is quickly on the scene. The bystanders are less than helpful and when Michel complains about the Sailors' Inn, no one seems to know of it or indeed any other hotel. Michel maintains that the old Arab threatened him with a knife until he told the story of his life. The trouble, explains the Policeman, is that all in the town have lost their memories. Only a few can remember anything at all from the past and when a stranger arrives people try to persuade him to tell stories, adopting them afterwards as their own memories. Michel gets more and more embroiled. Suddenly the man at the window asks if he has ever been to Warsaw, which seems to provide a note of reassurance, and the Policeman is happy that someone will vouch for Michel. The Policeman asks him about his earliest memories and Michel dredges something up.

The Policeman remembers that the village statutes lay down that anyone who can precisely recall any subject from his childhood by sunset will be chosen Mayor. Michel is therefore now Mayor! He is invested with chain and top hat and a parakeet to remind him of his office. Also a pistol, which he must not use.

Michel starts to talk about going home and of having reached the village by train, but this proves a new bone of contention as nobody remembers either train or station. Matters take a turn for the worse when, having reassured the man with a helmet he does not propose to steal his ship, he starts to recall his election as Mayor, only to have everyone tell him he is dreaming. At last he gets a chance of telling the man with a helmet about his shop in Paris, his earlier visit to the village and the sight (and sound) of the beautiful girl he saw there. He tries to remember the song which has haunted him ever since, and then to get corroboration from the shopkeepers, but they are shutting for the night. He returns to the man with a helmet, who has forgotten about listening to a story but maintains they were interrupted in the middle of a game of dominoes; Michel says he does not even know how to play!

Just then, the sound of Julietta's voice can be heard and with it lyricism returns to the music, as for a moment she and Michel seem to recognise each other. She is perhaps an idealised fantasy and represents for him security, and she leaves him promising to come back.

Michel sees the Policeman coming by but he claims he is the village postman and they play cards for a moment until Julietta returns. Michel and Julietta come very close to declaring their mutual love and she makes a date to meet him at the cross-roads in the forest.

Act II. The Forest. Michel goes off to keep his assignation with Julietta as three gentlemen who have lost their way appear (their singing and in some ways their behaviour derive from the Water Sprites in Dvořák's Rusalka). They call for Julietta and are confident they will find her. Michel is offered a glass of wine by Grandfather 'Youth', who keeps a roadside stall and makes no more sense than anyone else. He gossips with an old couple and then a Fortune-Teller offers to read his hand – foretelling the past, naturally, not the future. The music has a new intensity and seems to foreshadow the next scene.

When Julietta appears, she seems to exhibit true affection and Michel is overwhelmed, even though she obviously does not know his name. They embark on a love scene, of deep seriousness on Michel's side but mostly of fantasy on Julietta's. They are interrupted for a moment by the Seller of Memories and Julietta collects all sorts of things from him which she says were once theirs or at least connected with shared past experiences. Michel tries to tell her what really happened when he saw her first three years ago, but she will have none of it and in the end she starts to tease him and they quarrel. As Julietta leaves, Michel draws the pistol and shoots in her direction. A scream comes from the woods. He cannot believe that he really fired, but the inhabitants of the village descend on him and seem more likely to lynch him than give him proper trial. The Fortune-Teller intervenes and suggests he tell them some story of his past – that way they will forget why he is there. He embarks on some nonsense derived from Julietta's bogus memories of their times together, and gradually all leave.

Michel starts to make himself scarce but a Gamekeeper turns up and agrees he heard a shot; he himself fired it. Michel meets some sailors and begs them to go back and see if Julietta is in the wood. They do as he asks and can find nothing but her scarf. The man with a helmet asks Michel if he is not the passenger who booked on his ship and Michel confesses that he is so muddled he can't make head or tail of anything. In desperation, Michel bangs on a door but an old woman complains that he has just woken her up to tell her a pack of silly stories and it is quite lucky that the young sailor comes along at that moment to ask if he can keep the veil they've found. The man with a helmet shouts 'all aboard!', as Julietta's melody can be heard from the distance. There seems no escape for Michel.

Act III. The Central Office of Dreams, where everyone, on payment of a small fee, may choose his dream. Tension mounts as the official in charge says that Michel, a regular, has already been to visit him a few hours ago, before his journey. Now it is time to wake up and go home. 'I am the only one not dreaming. I have no time to dream!' says the official. In succession come a bell-boy, to dream about Westerns; a beggar to dream of a stay at the seaside; a convict to dream about rooms whose vastness will contrast with his tiny cell; and an engine driver to look at photographs of his dead daughter in the blank pages of an album – deeply-etched musical portraits, all of them.

Michel meets them all and tries, as each leaves the inside room – a cinema, as it might be – to get in to look for Julietta, whose image somehow seems to dominate every customer's conversation.

The official warns Michel that his dream is ending and, if he stays there when it is finished, he will become like the men in grey, who are wandering about and who failed to wake from their dream and had to stay for ever. All of them are lost in dreams – or is it insanity? But his obsession remains too strong.

Michel is near breaking point when suddenly Julietta's voice can be heard; but he cannot open the door. The Nightwatchman announces closing time and when Michel demands to go in, flashes his torch round the empty space and shows that there is no one there. Michel's obsession is now total and, in the words of the composer (written in New York in April 1947), 'rejecting sanity and reality, he settles for the half life of dreams'.

The Arab boy reappears and the action ends, or starts again.

Martinů weaves his dream-web with considerable musical subtlety from the basic material of a kind of post-Debussyism associated with Michel; the often motoric music of the various situations in which he finds himself; and the string-supported lyricism of Julietta herself. Echoes in music and words, sometimes chorally behind the scenes, sometimes in the orchestra, help to depict the unreality of the scene, which is set by music, illustrative for the most part, always apt and attention-catching, if seldom with the compelling power of Martinů's greater Czech predecessor, Janáček. The opera has though the great merit that musical and dramatic interest increase throughout and Act III has usually been found the best. H.

THE GREEK PASSION

Řecké Pasije

Opera in four acts, text after the novel Christ Recrucified by Nikos Kazantzakis. Première, Zürich, 9 June 1961, with Sandra Warfield as Katerina, Glade Peterson as Manolios, James Pease as Grigoris, conductor Paul Sacher. First performed Brno, 1964, with Vilem Přibyl as Manolios; Antwerp, 1969; Prague, 1969, with Kniplová, Zidek, Haken, Kroupa; Welsh National Opera, 1981, with Helen Field, Mitchinson, Richard Van Allan, Geoffrey Moses, conductor Mackerras.

Village elders

The Priest GrigorisBass-Baritone
PatriarcheasBaritone
LadasSpeaking
Michelis, Patriarcheas's son.....Tenor
Kostandis, proprietor of the café.....Baritone

Yannakos, a merchant.....Tenor
Manolios, a shepherd.....Tenor
Nikolio, a shepherd boy.....Soprano¹
Andonis, the village barber.....Tenor
Katerina, *a widow*Soprano
Lenio, *Manolios's fiancée*Soprano
The Priest FotisBass-Baritone
Despinio, a refugee.....Soprano
An Old RefugeeBass
PanaitTenor
An Old Woman.....Contralto

Villagers, Refugees

Place: In and Near the Village of Lycovrissi in Greece

Time: Early Twentieth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 10 minutes

It was as far back as 1953 that Martinů first started to look for a tragic subject on a grand scale, and, after rejecting Dostoevsky's The Devils as too large for operatic treatment, he suggested to Nikos Kazantzakis that he might turn Zorba the Greek into a two-hour opera. Kazantzakis convinced him that Christ Recrucified would make better operatic material, and the composer himself between August 1954 and January 1956 compressed the 400-page novel to forty pages of libretto, losing some important aspects of the original and involving a too ruthless compression of, for instance, the figure of Manolios. Rafael Kubelík for Covent Garden and Herbert von Karajan for the Vienna Opera successively showed interest in the work but various delays caused interest to cool, so that in the event, the première took place nearly two years after its composer's death.

Act I. On Easter morning in the village of Lycovrissi, Mass is over and the villagers are leaving church, among them the priest Grigoris, and the other village elders, the rich Patriarcheas and the miserly Ladas. Grigoris appoints individual villagers (as at the more famous Oberammergau) to the roles they will fill at the Passion Play in a year's time. Kostandis, the café proprietor, will be the Apostle James – and henceforth mix no barley with the coffee he serves, come to church more often, and stop beating his wife! Yannakos, the merchant, will play Peter – and cease from the practice of giving short measure. Yannakos offers his donkey for Christ's ride into Jerusalem. Michelis, Patriarcheas's son, will be John, the disciple Jesus loved. Mary Magdalene by popular acclaim will be incarnated by the widow Katerina, and Judas Iscariot, in spite of his protests, by Panait. Manolios, the shepherd, though he proclaims his unworthiness, will be Jesus. They receive the priest's blessing and, as the crowd disperses, are left to wonder how they may live up to their new responsibility.

¹ Sometimes, for reasons of verisimilitude, taken by a baritone.

The Greek Passion (Welsh National Opera, 1981, director Michael Geliot, sets John Gunter, costumes Sally Gardner). The Priest Fotis (Geoffrey Moses) leads the refugees into exile.

Lenio, Manolios's fiancée, now comes to beg Manolios to name their wedding day. She cannot understand his reluctance even to look at her, a protest given some substance when he appears less interested in her than in the sounds of a crowd singing the Greek chant 'Lord save thy people', which can be heard from the direction of Mount Sarakina. A band of refugees reaches the village square and Fotis, the priest who leads them, asks in the name of all for land on which to settle and from which to scratch a new living.

Grigoris seems disposed to turn them away and seizes on the collapse and death from starvation of Despinio, one of the band, to proclaim that she is a victim of cholera. During the impressive confrontation of Fotis and Grigoris, the two priests, Katerina has tried to attract the attention of Manolios, a move jealously observed by Panait. Manolios suggests the refugees go to Mount Sarakina where there is at least brushwood to burn, and Fotis leads his flock sadly away.

Act II. The musical atmosphere brightens and the houses of Yannakos and Katerina can be seen. Yannakos whispers to his donkey of the honour which will be his the following Easter, and Katerina compliments Yannakos on his cheerfulness and tells him about the dream she has had in which Manolios plays a leading part. Yannakos is approached by old Ladas with a proposition. Let Yannakos offer the refugees the necessities of life in return for their rings and bracelets; Ladas will get rich and Yannakos be in a position to buy the respect of the village. Yannakos agrees.

By the spring of St Basil, Katerina approaches Manolios, who is drawing water. She talks of her dreams – to her he is like an archangel – and their mutual attraction is obvious, but he manages to turn away from her.

An extensive interlude takes us to a desolate spot on Mount Sarakina, where the refugees have settled. There Fotis and his flock dedicate the foundations and the gates of the village community they mean to establish, in a scene which, with the chanting priest and answering chorus, makes a considerable effect. To them comes Yannakos, intent on the profitable mission he and old Ladas have cooked up between them, but he watches the preparations for the 'gate' and the 'city' with a mixture of incredulity and awe. An old man bids the refugees dig and himself jumps into the pit proclaiming that a village can only flourish if a human being is entombed in its foundations. Fotis welcomes Yannakos, who breaks down and is starting to confess his sinful mission when the people call out that the old man has died. Fotis again proclaims his faith in the future of the village as the act comes to an end.

Act III. Manolios's hut on Mount Parragia, near Sarakina. As they warm themselves in their blankets beside the fire, Manolios tells Nikolio to play on his pipe (cor anglais solo). In his dream Manolios starts to identify himself with Christ and hears the voices first of the pleading Lenio, then of the admonitory Grigoris, and finally of the temptress Katerina. He wakes up for a moment, then sleeps again, and this time Yannakos in the dream accuses him of making no more than a pretence of his role as Christ in the Passion Play, the reality being that he is thinking all the time of his impending marriage. The dream continues until a woman dressed in black, possibly the Holy Virgin, appears, only as Manolios stretches towards her to reveal herself as Katerina. He wakes again, and Nikolio wonders if someone is putting the evil eye on him. Next Lenio appears in person and asks Manolios, if they are not to marry, to free her from her betrothal vows. Manolios does not dissent but goes down to the village and Nikolio is left alone playing his pipe. Lenio comes back and Nikolio seizes her passionately as the stage darkens.

There is an interlude, after which the sound of a waltz played on an accordion brings us to Katerina's room. Manolios comes in and their encounter turns into a love scene in reverse, he asking her to think of him no more, she telling him ecstatically that he is her saviour, without him she is damned.

The accordion waltz introduces an interlude. The road leading to Sarakina. Yannakos is sitting eating olives as Katerina comes in carrying a bundle of provisions and leading a couple of goats. She is plainly taking what she can to the refugees on the mountain, and he offers her an onion. It is obvious too that her interest in Manolios is increasing rather than diminishing, and she speaks of washing, in her role of Mary Magdalene, the feet of her Lord. Yannakos since his visit to Mount Sarakina appears nearer to understanding the mysterious events which seem to be overtaking them all.

The village Elders, together with Panait and others, are infuriated with the increasing tendency of Manolios to live out his Passion Play role and preach to the people. He is the sort of man, says Panait, to prepare the way for a revolution (a theme much developed in the novel, little emphasised in the opera) and in a moment the voice of Manolios can be heard speaking with an eloquence which causes an old woman, the mother of Andonis, to wonder whether these aren't the words of Christ himself. Andonis says he will give one tenth of his harvest to the poor, but Grigoris now denounces Manolios in public: he will hound him from the village.

The cor anglais introduces Michelis's news that Lenio has asked her father to give her in marriage to Nikolio rather than to Manolios, and at that moment Nikolio appears, assuming that Manolios will want to fight him because of the new turn of events and surprised when he does not. The act ends with the Passion Players, now joined by Katerina, somehow more united than ever.

Act IV. Lenio's wedding to Nikolio is celebrated with suitable musical jollity until the figure of Grigoris appears at the church door, fulminating about the canker which eats into the peaceful life of the village. Manolios must be driven from the community, just as a sheep with mange is separated from the flock and destroyed. No one may henceforth speak to him. But Grigoris does not have everything his own way, and successively Michelis, son of the rich Patriarcheas, Yannakos and Kostandis – the Passion Players – proclaim that Manolios does not stand alone: they are with him. Grigoris extends his interdiction to them, but, as the village people echo his words, Manolios himself comes from the church. In a big-scale utterance of great lyrical beauty he proclaims that his first attempts to live his Passion Play role were inadequate. He continued to think of his impending marriage to Lenio, and he was sorely tempted by the rosy lips of Katerina as she sat by the well. It is his confession, and his faith is now confirmed – but he is interrupted by the distant sound of the refugees from Mount Sarakina approaching Lycovrissi. He starts to plead their cause – they and their children are starving and Christian charity demands that Lycovrissi help them. The reaction of the villagers, egged on by Grigoris, is violent, and Panait-Judas strikes Manolios dead.

The procession of fugitives, led by Fotis, fills the square, there is an impressive choral threnody with the voices of Lenio and Katerina over all, Katerina sings a valediction and then Fotis to a 'Kyrie' leads the fugitives sorrowfully away. H.

PIETRO MASCAGNI

(born 7 December 1863, died 2 August 1945)

Mascagni's career in retrospect can be seen as the story of a composer seeking more and more desperately to cap initial and worldwide success, and on the whole failing. He was twenty-six when Cavalleria Rusticana in 1890 won the Sonzogno competition and catapulted him to fame. The rustic comedy L'Amico Fritz (1891) was in strong contrast and suggested more versatility than the composer was later able to demonstrate successfully, and even his well-received conducting in Italy and abroad did not make up for several years of relative failure before Iris in 1898 to some extent restored public faith. Le Maschere in 1901 had simultaneous premières in six different Italian theatres; Isabeau (1911), a romantic derivation from the story of Lady Godiva, started well but failed to maintain its initial success; Il piccolo Marat (1921) saw a return to verismo set in the French Revolution; and his career shone again briefly at the height of the Fascist régime with Nerone, whose première at la Scala achieved at least a succès d'estime with Pertile in the title role and the composer conducting. H.

CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA

Rustic Chivalry

Opera in one act, text by G. Menasci and G. Targioni-Tozzetti, based on a story of G. Verga. Première at Teatro Costanzi, Rome, 17 May 1890, with Bellincioni, Stagno, Salasso, conductor Mugnone.

Turiddu, a young soldier Tenor
 Alfio, the village carter Baritone
 Lola, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
 Mamma Lucia, Turiddu's mother Contralto
 Santuzza, a village girl Soprano

Villagers, Peasants, Boys

Place: A Village in Sicily

Time: The 1890s, Easter Day

Running Time: 1 hour 10 minutes

Cavalleria Rusticana is based on a compact short story by Giovanni Verga, which also inspired a stage play. It is a drama of swift action and high emotion; of passion, betrayal, and retribution. In this opera, Mascagni, at the age of twenty-six, 'found himself', and ever after through fourteen operas was trying, less successfully, to find himself again.

The prelude contains three significant passages in the development of the story: the phrase of the despairing Santuzza; the melody of the duet between Santuzza and Turiddu; and the Siciliana, which, as part of the prelude, is sung by Turiddu behind the curtain in the manner of a serenade to Lola: 'O Lola, ch'ai di latti'.

The scene is a public square in a Sicilian village. It is Easter morning. Church bells ring, followed by a chorus which combines delight in the beauty of the day with the lilt of religious feeling.

Santuzza approaches Mamma Lucia's house, as she comes out. She asks for Turiddu, but his mother says he has gone to Francofonte to fetch wine for the trattoria. Santuzza tells her that he was seen during the night in the village. Mamma Lucia, touched by the girl's distress, asks her in to her house, an offer Santuzza refuses – she is pregnant and feels excommunicated and unclean. Mamma Lucia's questions about her son's whereabouts are interrupted by the sounds of a whip cracking and bells jingling. Alfio, the carter, makes an entrance (in the libretto, with horse and cart), accompanied by the villagers. He sings his cheerful song, praising a carter's life and the beauty of his wife, Lola, and the villagers join in the chorus, 'Il cavallo scalpita'. Alfio asks Mamma Lucia if she still has some of her fine old wine, but she tells him that Turiddu has gone to buy fresh supplies. Alfio says he has seen her son that very morning, not far from his own cottage. Santuzza signals to Mamma Lucia to keep silent.

Alfio leaves. Singing can be heard from the church – the 'Regina Coeli'; the people in the square join in with the 'Alleluiahs', and all kneel and led by Santuzza sing the Easter Hymn, 'Inneggiamo, il Signor non è morto'.

Mamma Lucia asks Santuzza to explain Turiddu's presence in the village. 'Voi lo sapete, o mamma', she sings, and in one of the most impassioned numbers of the score tells the story of her betrayal. Turiddu was in love with Lola but left to go into the army, whereupon the fickle Lola married Alfio. On his return, Turiddu took up with Santuzza, has made her pregnant, but meanwhile has gone back to Lola, whom he sees when Alfio is on one of his frequent absences. Mamma Lucia pities Santuzza, who asks her to pray for her in church.

We see and hear Turiddu for the first time since his Siciliana. Santuzza reproaches him for pretending to have gone away when he is really visiting Lola, but when Turiddu admits his life would be in danger if he were rumbled by Alfio, Santuzza is terrified: 'Battimi, insultami, t'amo e perdono'. The mood is interrupted by Lola with a happy-go-lucky song, 'Fior di giaggiolo'. She mocks Santuzza and goes into church. As Turiddu follows her, Santuzza begs him to stay: 'No, no, Turiddu'. Turiddu shoves her aside and, as he goes into church, she curses him.

Alfio comes on the scene, looking for Lola. Santuzza, in the fewest possible words and in the white heat of suppressed passion, tells him of his wife's infidelity ('Turiddu mi tolse l'onore'). Alfio's reaction has brute strength and the outcome can no longer be in doubt. Santuzza and Alfio leave.

The famous intermezzo recapitulates in its forty-eight bars what has gone before, foreshadows the impending tragedy, and so justifies a century of worldwide popularity.

The congregation emerges into the sunshine. Turiddu, in high spirits because he is with Lola and because Santuzza is no longer hanging round to reproach him, invites his friends over to his mother's wineshop. Their glasses are filled and Turiddu dashes off a drinking song, 'Viva il vino spumeggiante'. Alfio appears and Turiddu offers him wine which he refuses. The women sense trouble and take Lola off with them. In a quick exchange Alfio challenges Turiddu and in Sicilian fashion the two men embrace, Turiddu, in token of acceptance, biting Alfio's ear. Alfio goes off to get ready for the fight.

Turiddu calls for his mother. He tells her he is going away. 'Mamma, quel vino è generoso', he sings, and his aria mounts in tension as in great melodic phrases and a flood of remorse he begs his mother to look after Santuzza.

He goes, as Santuzza comes in to comfort the weeping Mamma Lucia. People crowd in and all is suppressed excitement. There is a murmur of distant voices. A woman's voice can be heard and shrieks: 'Hanno ammazzato compare Turiddu!' (They have murdered neighbour Turiddu!). The women support Mamma Lucia but Santuzza falls in a swoon.

Verismo in Grove's Dictionary (1954) is 'a term used to classify Italian Opera of a sensational, supposedly "realistic" kind, including the works of Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Puccini, Giordano, etc.' Other works of reference (including the New Grove, 1980), less tendentiously, allow that the essential difference between verismo operas and their predecessors lies in the libretti, which deal with everyday situations as opposed to costume plays, historical episodes or poetic legends. By that definition, Stiffelio and Traviata are verismo operas as opposed to Aida and Simon Boccanegra.

Whatever definition may be preferred, the average opera-goer has throughout the twentieth century understood from the word a distinct comment on the music and expects something demanding first and foremost power and attack from the singer and only secondarily a smooth legato or any relevance to the art of bel canto. This is not the whole truth, and it is the more unfortunate that the verismo school is often (in dictionary or history) held to have started with Cavalleria Rusticana in that it deals with a violent story contemporary to the 1880s but whose composer at that time wrote more as an instinctive successor to Bellini. Only occasionally in Cavalleria (notably in the duet for Alfio and Santuzza) is the score touched by the violence audiences have come in an over-simplified way to think of as verismo, and to interpret the composer otherwise is to do him an injustice.

The opera's motivation moreover is tragic and steeped in the ritual of a primitive, believing people. Turiddu knows that, if Alfio challenges him, he cannot refuse to fight and he knows too that in justice he will be killed. In comparison, Pagliacci, with which Cavalleria is usually teamed, is highly effective, but as a lurid, newspaper anecdote of a crime passionnel rather than tragedy. K., H.

L'AMICO FRITZ

Friend Fritz

Opera in three acts, text by P. Suardon (N. Daspuro), founded on Erckmann-Chatrian's novel. Première at Teatro Costanzi, Rome, 1 November 1891, with Calvé, de Lucia. First performed Covent Garden, 1892, with Calvé, Ravogli, de Lucia; Philadelphia, 1892; Metropolitan, New York, 1893, with Calvé, Scalchi, de Lucia, Ancona. Revived Metropolitan, 1923, with Bori, Fleta, Danise; la Scala, Milan, 1930, with Marengo, Dino Borgioli, conductor Mascagni; 1937, with Favero, Schipa, Danise; London, Drury Lane, 1958, with Panni, Misciano; la Scala, Milan, 1963, with Freni, Raimondi, Panerai, conductor Gavazzeni; Chicago, 1986; Trieste, 1987; Zürich, 1994, with Dessi, La Scola.

Fritz Kobus, a rich bachelor landowner Tenor
 Suzel, a farmer's daughter Soprano
 Beppe, a gipsy Mezzo-Soprano
 David, a Rabbi Baritone
 Hanezò, friend of Fritz Bass
 Federico, friend of Fritz Tenor
 Caterina, Fritz's housekeeper Soprano

Place: Alsace

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 1 hour 30 minutes

After the success of Cavalleria Rusticana, Mascagni settled on a simple, pastoral successor, L'Amico Fritz, which had its première in Rome only eighteen months later. Though its reception in no way duplicated that of Cavalleria, it was well liked and its melodic charm has overcome a low-key dramatic scheme to ensure regular revival.

Act I. The dining-room of Fritz's house. He complains to his friend David that he has once again been asked to provide the dowry for two neighbours who want to get married. He himself cannot understand this business of falling in love and sighing for a woman. Two friends, Hanezò and Federico, come in with Caterina his housekeeper to wish him luck on his fortieth birthday. They are coming to sup with him, but David must leave to give the good news to the young lovers; he prophesies that within a year Fritz himself will be married.

Caterina brings in Suzel, the daughter of one of Fritz's tenants, who gives him flowers as a present: 'Son pochi fiori' she sings, a pretty little song. Fritz makes her sit beside him; before long they hear the sound of Beppe's fiddle outside and he is asked to sing for the company. This he does, and at the same time contrives to pay Fritz a graceful compliment on his charitable disposition: 'Laceri, miseri'.

Suzel leaves to rejoin her family, and her attractiveness now that she is nearly grown-up is generally remarked on. David comments that he is likely soon to be marrying her off to someone or other, and Fritz protests that she is only a girl. David says he is prepared to bet Fritz that he will soon be married himself, and they agree that Fritz's vineyard shall be the subject of their wager. A party of orphans who have been befriended by Fritz come in to the sound of a march, and the act ends in general rejoicing.

Act II. An orchard near a farm. Suzel is picking cherries; she sings a little ditty to express her happiness and the whole scene is full of pastoral charm. Fritz comes in ('Suzel, buon dì'), compliments Suzel on her singing, and thanks her for the flowers she has picked; she tells him the cherries are already ripe. She mounts a ladder, picks the cherries and throws them down to Fritz, who is charmed and captivated by her youth and freshness. Where else can he find such peace and innocence ('Tutto tace'); when but in spring ('Tu sei bella, O stagion primaverile')? Did Mascagni ever elsewhere write music of such delicacy and inspiration?

The sound of bells and cracking whips heralds the arrival of David, Beppe, Hanezò, and Federico. They suggest a drive round the countryside, but David pleads fatigue and stays behind. When Suzel offers him some water to drink, he tells her the scene reminds him of the story of Isaac and Rebecca, and makes her read the appropriate passage from the Bible. This she does, David thinks, with evident understanding of its relevance to her situation. When Fritz and the others return, David determines to test Fritz's reaction and tells him that he has found a suitable husband for Suzel and that her father approves. Fritz is horrified at the idea, and when David has left him, he admits to himself that he must be in love, but immediately determines to return with his friends to town. David does his best to comfort the unhappy Suzel, who watches him go – he has not even said goodbye – with a heavy heart.

Act III. The intermezzo which begins the act attained considerable popularity with Italian audiences, and was at one time more likely to be encores than the famous vocal numbers of the score. The scene is the same as that of the first act. Fritz is distracted with the worry that the discovery of love has brought him. Beppe comes in and tries to comfort him, even going so far as to sing him a song he wrote while himself under the influence of unhappy love.

Left alone, Fritz laments that even Beppe should have been troubled with love; what hope, he implies, is there for him? He launches into a full-scale aria on the subject of the fatal passion: 'O amore, o bella luce del core'. David comes to him and tells him that all is arranged for Suzel's wedding; only his consent is now needed. Fritz distractedly refuses it, and rushes from the room. David calls in Suzel, who has brought fruit for Fritz. Why does she look so sad? he asks. She sings plaintively of her love for Fritz: 'Non mi resta che il pianto'.

Fritz himself comes in and asks her if it is true that she is going to be married. She begs him to save her from a match she does not want. He finally admits that he loves her himself, and they sing happily of their future bliss. David wins his bet, and all congratulate Fritz on his new-found happiness. H.

IRIS

Opera in three acts, text by Luigi Illica. Première at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome, 27 November 1898, with Darclée, de Lucia, conductor Mascagni; revised version performed at la Scala, Milan, 1899, with the same singers. First performed Philadelphia, 1902, conductor Mascagni; New York, 1902, with Farneti; Metropolitan, 1907, with Eames, Caruso, Scotti, Journet; Covent Garden, 1919, with Sheridan, conductor Mugnone. Revived Metropolitan, 1915, with Bori; Chicago, 1929, with Mason, Cortis; Metropolitan, 1931, with Rethberg, Gigli, de Luca, Pinza; la Scala, 1924, with Vigano, Pertile, conductor Toscanini; 1936, with Pampanini; 1944, with Carbone, conductor Guarnieri. Revived London, Opera Viva, 1967, with Victoria Elliott and Robert Thomas; Wexford, 1995.

Il Cieco, the blind man Bass
Iris, his daughter Soprano
Osaka, a rich young man Tenor
Kyoto, a takiomati Baritone

Ragpickers, Shopkeepers, Geishas, Mousmés
 (laundry girls), Samurai, Citizens, Strolling Players, Three Women representing Beauty,
 Death, and the Vampire; a Young Girl

Place: Japan

Time: Nineteenth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 35 minutes

Six years after the success of Cavalleria Rusticana, Mascagni went to the successful librettist Luigi Illica for a new subject and was much taken with the idea of an opera set in Japan, with the possibilities for local colour and novelty that it suggested (only Sullivan with Mikado seems to have preceded him; Madama Butterfly was still eight years away). The opera's story is not strong and with its paucity of action presents the composer with problems.

Act I. The home of Iris near the city; before dawn. The music depicts the passage from night into day. It rises to a crashing climax – the instrumentation including tamtams, cymbals, drums, and bells – while voices reiterate, 'Calore! Luce! Amor!' (Warmth! Light! Love!). In warmth and light there are love and life; a naturalistic philosophy, to which this opening 'Hymn to the Sun' gives the key, runs through Iris.

Iris, who loves only her blind father, comes to the door of her cottage. She has dreamed that monsters sought to injure her doll, asleep under a rosebush. With the coming of the sun the monsters have fled.

Iris is young and beautiful. She is desired by Osaka, a wealthy rake, and Kyoto, keeper of a questionable resort, plots to obtain her for him. While her father prays and mousmés sing on the bank of the stream, Iris tends her flowers: 'In pure stille'. Osaka and Kyoto come to her cottage with a marionette show. The play starts, and after a while Osaka, in the person of Jor, son of the sun god, sings a serenade: 'Apri la tua finestra'. While Iris is intent upon the performance, three geisha girls, representing Beauty, Death, and the Vampire, dance about her. They conceal her from view by spreading their skirts. She is seized and carried off. Osaka, by leaving money for the blind old father, makes the abduction legal. When Il Cieco returns, he is led to believe that his daughter has gone voluntarily to the Yoshiwara. In a rage he starts out to find her.

Act II. Interior of the 'Green House' in the Yoshiwara. Kyoto and Osaka regard the sleeping Iris, who awakens. At first she thinks it is an awakening after death. But death brings paradise, while she is unhappy. Osaka, who has placed jewels beside her, comes to woo, but vainly seeks to arouse her passions. In her purity she remains unconscious of the significance of his words and caresses. His brilliant attire leads her to mistake him for Jor, the sun god, but he tells her he is Pleasure. That frightens her. For, as she narrates to him, one day, in the temple, a priest told her that pleasure and death were one: 'Un dì (ero piccina) al tempio'.

Osaka embraces her in a last effort to win her love ('Or dammi il braccio tuo'), then wearies of her innocence and leaves her. But Kyoto, wishing to lure him back, attires her in transparent garments and places her upon a balcony. The crowd in the street cries out in amazement over her beauty. Again Osaka wishes to buy her. She hears her father's voice, and joyously makes her presence known to him. He, ignorant of her abduction and believing her a voluntary inmate of the 'Green House', takes a handful of mud from the street, flings it at her, and curses her. In terror, she leaps from a window into the sewer below.

Act III. Ragpickers and scavengers are dragging the sewer before daylight. In song they mock the moon. A flash of light from the mystic mountain awakens what is like an answering gleam in the muck. They discover and drag out the body of Iris. They begin to strip her of her jewels. She shows signs of life. The sordid men and women flee. The rosy light from Fujiyama spreads over the sky. Warmth and light come once more. Iris regains consciousness. Spirit voices whisper of earthly existence and its selfish aspirations typified symbolically by the knavery of Kyoto, the lust of Osaka, the desire of Iris's father, Il Cieco, for the comforts of life through her ministrations.

Enough strength comes back for her to acclaim the sanctity of the sun. In its warmth and light – the expression of Nature's love – she sinks, as if to be absorbed by nature into the blossoming field about her. Again, as in the beginning, there is the choral tribute to warmth, light, love – the sun!

K., H.

LE MASCHERE

The Maskers

Opera in three acts, text by Luigi Illica. Première 17 January 1901, simultaneously at la Scala, Milan (conductor Toscanini), and in Rome (conductor Mascagni), Genoa, Turin, Venice and Verona; and, two days later, in Naples (conductor Mugnone), where the première was delayed by the illness of the tenor. Revived at la Scala, 1931, with Caniglia, Favero, Minghetti, conductor Mascagni; 1941 with Magnoni, Adami Corradetti, Ferrauto, Luise, Maugeri, Bettoni, conductor Marinuzzi; Bologna, 1988 (successfully), with Maria José Gallego, La Scola, Romero, Dara, conductor Gelmetti.

Giocadio, impresario.....Speaking Part
Pantalone de' BisognosiSoprano
Rosaura, his daughter.....Soprano
Florindo, her lover.....Tenor
Doctor Graziano, *a lawyer*Baritone
Colombina, his maid.....Soprano
Brighella, a pedlar, confidant of Florindo.....Tenor
Captain Spavento, a fraud.....Baritone
Arlecchino Battocchio, *his servant*Tenor
Tartaglia, *Pantalone's servant*Baritone
Citizens, Peasants, Musicians, Scribes, Maskers

Place: Venice

Time: The Present

Running Time: 2 hours 50 minutes

The extraordinary matter of the opera's six coincidental premières is famous. All but the one in Rome, where the composer conducted, were failures, and at la Scala Toscanini led a cast which included Emma Carelli as Colombina and the twenty-eight-year-old Caruso as Florindo. Cuts were the order of the day and when the Naples première followed the other six, the Furlana had to be cut after the first night. Revision in 1905 did not improve the opera's fortunes.

The overture is interrupted by the impresario and the characters introduce themselves, but when it arrives it is as lively as the Opera's commedia dell'arte action. We are in Venice, in Wolf-Ferrari territory – or could Mascagni legitimately, as the older man, have claimed to have started it all? The story, for all its complications, is basically simple. Rosaura and her lover Florindo combine with Colombina, the maid for all circumstances who works for Doctor Graziano, and Brighella the pedlar who is also Florindo's confidant and Colombina's lover, to outwit the rest of the world and its untoward schemes. Specifically, Pantalone, Rosaura's father, plans to marry her off to a certain Captain Spavento and this must be prevented. Brighella has a scheme involving a magic powder which has the power of spreading untold confusion. Also involved are Tartaglia, Pantalone's stuttering servant, and Arlecchino, Captain Spavento's not so faithful follower. Captain Spavento turns out to be nothing but a swaggering braggart and eventually Pantalone renounces Rosaura to Florindo, and there is general praise of the Italian maskers.

The first act takes place in a piazza, the second in Pantalone's house. There is a party with dances – the slow, elegant Pavan, the hot and hectic Furlana. The third act is in a piazza behind Pantalone's house with the powder still having its effect and much nonsense talked all round.

Le Maschere appeared eleven years after Cavalleria rusticana, and Mascagni later complained that people thought of him as a one-opera composer without knowing most of his operas – did they for instance know Le Maschere? At the time of the première he went on record to say 'When I wrote Le Maschere I went recklessly against the current of public opinion.' Nearly a hundred years later, the opera appears to be full of graceful music – lively ensembles, Florindo's attractive serenade, the love duet, and the hardly less romantic scene for Colombina and Arlecchino. Yet its initial fiasco is a matter of history. H.

JULES MASSENET

(born 12 May 1842, died 13 August 1912)

Massenet was a prolific and highly gifted composer of French opera, who for over thirty years dominated the French operatic stage, not so much because of the weight of his contribution as by its variety of subject, his dramatic and musical skill, fluency, lyrical invention, and that underestimated virtue, charm. From a few years before his death and particularly after World War II, his operas went into partial eclipse, though Manon and Werther never disappeared from the repertory, but revivals in the last quarter of the twentieth century suggest that even his lesser-known works – Chérubin, Cendrillon, Grisélidis for instance – contain much to attract later audiences, longing paradoxically for an antidote to the newer styles which had once elbowed Massenet's work out of favour.

He composed in all forms, but it is a truism that he was most at home writing music for intimate scenes, for conversations, where his inspired ordering of the small as opposed to the large gesture paid high dividends. Here, in a performance of proper sensibility, Massenet can still catch the operatic listener by the throat and bend him to the human situation he encapsulated with such skill. H.

HÉRODIADE

Opera in four acts, libretto by Paul Milliet and Henri Grémont. Première Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, 19 December 1881, with Duvivier, Blanche Deschamps, Vergnet, Manoury, Gresse. Forty-five performances in Brussels in its first season did not qualify the opera for Paris until 1884, when it was staged (in Italian, as it had been at la Scala in 1882) at the Théâtre Italien, with Jean and Edouard de Reszke and Maurel. Covent Garden saw it in 1904 with Emma Calvé, Dalmorès, Renaud and Kirkby Lunn, but with numerous modifications in order to mollify the censor. It was first heard in New York in 1908, with Lina Cavalieri, Gerville-Réache, Dalmorès and Renaud.

Phanuel, a Chaldean astrologer Bass
 Salomé (Salome), daughter of Hérodiade Soprano
 Hérode (Herod), King of Galilee Baritone
 Hérodiade (Herodias), wife of Hérode .. Mezzo-Soprano
 Jean (John the Baptist) Tenor
 A Young Babylonian Soprano

Vitellius, Roman Proconsul.....Baritone
 The High PriestBaritone
 A Voice from the TempleTenor
 Merchants, Romans, Slaves, Priests, Soldiers, Temple
 Guards, People

Place: Jerusalem

Time: The Reign of King Herod Antipas

Running Time: 3 hours 10 minutes

Massenet's characteristic musical gesture belonged to the world of feeling, conversation and human interaction rather than to the pomp and circumstance of Grand Opera, but it is generally felt that Hérodiade is the best of his three attempts at the less sympathetic form, Le Roi de Lahore and Le Cid being the others. Massenet subjected the score to some revision between the performances at Brussels and la Scala and those in 1884 in Paris, but it would be a fervent admirer who could put his hand on his heart and maintain that total dramatic coherence had thus at a stroke been achieved. What is certain is that, in spite of some success here in the world of the large gesture, the memorability of Massenet's score comes precisely in the areas of his greatest expertise – the music connected with Salomé's vulnerability and love for the prophet, Hérode's erotic fascination with what turns out to be his stepdaughter, Jean's highly charged scenes with the infatuated Salomé.

Crucial to the development of Flaubert's conte, on which the opera is rather surprisingly based, is the fact that Salomé is in Jerusalem searching for the mother who abandoned her in childhood, and that neither Hérode nor Hérodiade has any idea who she is until just before the opera's end.

Act I. In the courtyard of Hérode's palace, merchants and slaves prepare for the day's trading. Quarrels are quelled by the appearance of Phanuel, who insists Rome is the common enemy, not each other. When Salomé makes her appearance, she voices her determination to find her mother, somewhat to the surprise of Phanuel who knows her identity. In a large-scale aria ('Il est doux, il est bon') she insists that only the prophet Jean, known as the Baptist, shows her understanding. They depart and are succeeded by the King and Queen, the former searching for Salomé, with whom he is infatuated, the latter vowing vengeance on the so-called prophet, who this very morning anathematised her (aria, 'Hérode! ne me refuse pas'). She has abandoned family and child for Hérode and demands retribution. For political reasons, Hérode turns her down, but Jean comes to assail her ears with shattering cries of 'Jezebell', until Hérode and his queen retreat into the palace.

Salomé returns and the mood changes from public recrimination to private involvement. A lyrical theme emerges as Salomé movingly declares her love, only for Jean to turn her gently away. The music grows in passion but the Baptist commands her to 'love as one loves in dreams'. This is a scene of the greatest lyrical fervour – thus three years later might Manon have proffered her love and thus, had he been so minded, might des Grieux have resisted it.

Act II. Hérode's apartments. Slaves dance but Hérode in one of the great baritone solos of French opera sings obsessively of his love for Salomé ('Vision fugitive et toujours poursuivie'). Phanuel comes to accuse him of hiding behind private preoccupation in order to avoid a confrontation with the Romans, but Hérode says he relies on the pull of Jean with the mob to defeat the Romans, after which he will deal with what he thinks of as religious agitators.

A public square in Jerusalem. In a scene of some grandeur, Hérode incites the mob to revolutionary frenzy until the appearance of Vitellius, the Roman Proconsul, quells their ardour. Vitellius promises religious freedom, and the act ends as Canaanites, led by Salomé and the Baptist, urge the greater effectiveness of spiritual power over temporal force.

Act III. At home at night, Phanuel (in a scene inserted for Edouard de Reszke in 1884) muses ('Astres étincelants') on the significance of the Baptist: prophet or revolutionary? Hérodiade asks him the name of the girl who has stolen her husband's love and he, hinting at the child she left when she married Hérode, indicates that she and Hérode's inamorata are one. Hérodiade refuses to believe him.

The temple, where Jean lies in prison. Salomé's musings are interrupted by Hérode, gloomy and downcast at the turn of events which seems to leave him at the Romans' mercy. He drags her from hiding to indulge in a desperate outpouring of love ('Salomé! Demande au prisonnier'). Salomé repulses him and he threatens her and the man she loves with death as the High Priest summons the people to prayer. The ritual over, the Jews demand of Vitellius that he sentence the Baptist to death as a false Messiah. Vitellius hands justice over to Hérode, who presides over a trial which, once Salomé has made it plain that it is Jean she loves and whose fate she would share, condemns him to death.

Act IV. In prison, the Baptist in an eloquent aria prepares for death ('Adieu donc, vains objets') and, when she appears, admits to Salomé his love for her.

In the banquet hall of the Proconsul's palace, celebrations in the manner of Meyerbeer and including a ballet are in full swing. Salomé begs for the Baptist's life so that even Hérodiade is moved, but it is too late. The executioner appears with a blood-stained sword. Salomé's attempt to stab Hérodiade is prevented by a despairing cry of 'Grâce! je suis ta mère!' (Mercy! I am your mother). Salomé turns her dagger on herself. H.

MANON

Opera in five acts, text by Meilhac and Gille, based on the story by the Abbé Prévost. Première, Opéra-Comique, Paris, 19 January 1884, with Marie Heilbronn, Talazac, Taskin, Cobalet, conductor Danbé. First performed in England, Liverpool, 1885, with Marie Roze; Drury Lane (in English), with Roze, Maas, conductor Eugene Goossens (Snr.); Covent Garden, 1891, with Sybil Sanderson, van Dyck; New York, Academy of Music, 1885, with Minnie Hauck, Giannini, del Puente; 1895 (in Italian), with Sybil Sanderson, Jean de Reszke, Ancona, Plançon. Covent Garden revivals include 1919, with Edvina and Anseau, conductor Beecham; 1926, with Hedy and Anseau; since 1947, McWatters, Schwarzkopf, de los Angeles, Leigh, Scotto, Valerie Masterson, Elizabeth Harwood, Leontina Vaduva have sung the title role in London.

Chevalier des GrieuxTenor
Comte des Grieux, *his father*Bass
Lescaut, *Manon's cousin*¹Baritone
Guillot de Morfontaine, *an old roué*Tenor
De Brétigny, *a nobleman*Baritone
Manon LescautSoprano
Poussette, Javotte, Rosette, *actresses*Sopranos

Students, Innkeeper, a Sergeant, a Soldier, Gamblers,
Merchants and their Wives, Croupiers, Guards, etc.

Place: Amiens, Paris, Le Havre

Time: 1721

Running Time: 2 hours 40 minutes

M*anon*, the fifth of Massenet's twenty-five operas, was partly written in 1882 in The Hague in the very house where the Abbé Prévost had once lived. It is dedicated to Madame Miolan-Carvalho, wife of the Opéra-Comique's Director, Léon Carvalho – she is supposed after the composer had played it to her and her husband to have exclaimed 'If I were only twenty years younger!' – and was a success in its initial run at the Opéra-Comique, withdrawn after twenty-four performances only on the death of the leading soprano, Marie Heilbronn. The Opéra-Comique was burned down in 1887 but Manon was revived in the new House with the American Sybil Sanderson, who was still singing there at its 200th performance. At the time of Massenet's death in 1912 it had passed its 740th performance at the Opéra-Comique, where it marked its 1000th performance in 1919 with Marguerite Carré and Charles Fontaine, and by the 1950s its 2000th.

Act I. All glitter and bustle at the start (the music foreshadows the crowd in the big public scene of the Cours la Reine, III, i), the prelude moves, after a brief hint at Le Havre (V), to a statement on the clarinet of des Grieux's impassioned confession of total if occasionally disillusioned love which illuminates Act IV:

After a further reference to Le Havre, we are involved in the bustle of the inn at Amiens, where the first scene takes place. Guillot and de Brétigny are waiting impatiently to dine with three lively ladies of the town, and supper is served and in advance celebrated by the five diners. Townspeople come to ogle the passengers as they descend from a stagecoach, watched also by Lescaut, who takes time off from gambling to meet his cousin on her way to a convent. Manon duly makes her appearance, heralded by a naive tune on the clarinet which becomes her first song: 'Je suis encore tout étourdie', in which, partly self-possessed, partly chattering with over-excitement, she celebrates the joys and surprises of her first experience of travel. The coach once again on its way, Guillot comes out to be dazzled by the sight of Manon, elegantly mocked by the three ladies, and to suggest to Manon that, when his postilion appears, his carriage is at her disposal. Lescaut reappears, puts Guillot to flight, then reads Manon a lecture as to her future conduct: 'Ne bronchez pas' (Don't move!).

¹ In the novel, he is her brother.

Manon is alone and a little sad that the brilliance of the outside world, which she perceives for the first time, seems to be forbidden her: 'Voyons, Manon, plus de chimères'. The aria breathes the spirit of innocence, albeit of innocence ready to be awakened. Temptation is at hand in the person of Chevalier des Grieux, who has come to catch the stagecoach home. He, like Guillot before him, is overcome by the sight of Manon, but the pair are the same age and never was coup de foudre more devastating.

As their duet develops, we watch young love grow until it sweeps both celebrants along to a realisation that fate could remove Manon to the convent; they belong together, and a solution to their immediate problem is at hand in the shape of Guillot's carriage. 'Enchanteresse! Au charme vainqueur! Manon, vous êtes la maîtresse de mon coeur!' sings des Grieux; and after a little encouragement from Manon, 'Nous vivrons à Paris, tous les deux'. Most performances end the act here, as permitted in the revised score of 1895, but originally Lescaut, having lost at cards, comes out to find Manon gone and to blame Guillot, who in turn understands he has been duped and vows revenge.

Act II. The lodgings of Manon and des Grieux in the Rue Vivienne, in Paris. A constantly reiterated tune heralds a first sight of the lovers happily together, she interrupting his writing, he gently chiding and then getting her to read aloud the letter explaining her to his father: 'On l'appelle Manon'. The music hints delicately at the confidence and privacy of first love requited but as yet barely explored. Manon feels their love is enough but des Grieux says he wants to make her his wife, and is about to go off to send his letter when he notices some flowers – thrown in at the window, explains Manon.

There is a noise outside and the maid says that two guardsmen demand to be admitted. One turns out to be Manon's cousin and the other, the maid whispers, is the nobleman Monsieur de Brétigny, who lodges nearby. When they come in, it is clear that de Brétigny is masquerading as a soldier in Lescaut's regiment, and that Lescaut smells more profit for himself in a liaison between Manon and a wealthy nobleman than in her relationship with des Grieux. He demands a firm 'yes' or 'no' to his question as to whether des Grieux intends to marry the girl. Des Grieux shows him the letter and everything appears satisfactory, but de Brétigny contrives to let Manon know that the Chevalier's father has arranged to have him carried off that very night. She threatens to warn des Grieux, an action, says de Brétigny, which would lead to misery all round, whereas if she keeps quiet, he himself will surround her with the wealth and luxury which he believes is her destiny. From the music, there can be little doubt of the genuine nature of de Brétigny's feelings for Manon, and though she protests that she loves des Grieux, in the face of threats she is somehow incapable of translating words into action.

After a lively quartet, Lescaut and de Brétigny take their leave. When des Grieux goes out with his letter, Manon sings sadly and touchingly to the table which she takes as a symbol of her domestic life with des Grieux, then hides her tears as he returns, to tell her that he had a daydream, in which he saw a veritable paradise, which was yet a place of sadness since it lacked one thing: Manon! Des Grieux's dream of Manon is an example of the delicate side of Massenet's art at its best – sensitive, expressive, and full of that indefinable thing called 'style'.

There is a disturbance outside and Manon knows that men have come to snatch her lover away. He is overpowered and she is left alone with a heartfelt exclamation of 'Mon pauvre Chevalier!'

Act III, scene i. Introduced by a graceful minuet, a wholly successful pastiche of eighteenth-century style, we are at a popular fête in the Cours la Reine in Paris. The crowd circulates to the figure heard at the start of the prelude, Pousette, Rosette and Javotte for the moment escape Guillot's vigilance and are out to enjoy themselves on their own, and Lescaut finds an opportunity for an eloquent expression of his gambler's happy-go-lucky philosophy: 'A quoi bon l'économie'. Guillot appears, to the discomfiture of 'his' three ladies, and is discovered by de Brétigny, who has to admit (to Guillot's ill-concealed glee) that he recently refused Manon's caprice to have at her house the Ballet of the Opéra.

It is the moment for the appearance of Manon as the climax to a parade of elegance and at the height of her worldly success, admired by all and not disinclined to bask in her popularity and fame: 'Je marche sur tous les chemins' (I rule as queen of the land). The music of her entrance, a bravura arioso, demonstrates the panache of her mood and is succeeded by the famous gavotte: 'Obéissons quand leur voix appelle'.¹

The Comte des Grieux, the Chevalier's father, comes in and, from a conversation between him and de Brétigny, Manon learns that the Chevalier is about to take holy orders at Saint Sulpice. She timidly, if somewhat disingenuously, approaches Comte des Grieux, of whose knowledge of her identity she is ignorant, and asks, as if enquiring about his experience with an acquaintance of hers, whether the Chevalier has recovered from his recent love affair. The old man makes it very plain that the affair is quite finished and his son recovered. It is a passage of delicacy and economy and a perfect example at the same time of Massenet's conversational style and of his ability to advance drama in a set piece.

The time has arrived for Guillot's moment of triumph, and eventually for his discomfiture. The Ballet arrives and goes through its paces in a four-movement pastiche, together with a Prélude, during whose fourth entrée Manon broods over her lost love before making up her mind and asking Lescaut for her chair – to take her to Saint Sulpice. Guillot is left paying the bill and with no more than a nod of indifference from the preoccupied Manon.

Scene ii. Organ chords take us into the church of Saint Sulpice, where devout ladies enthuse over the maiden sermon of the new Abbé des Grieux, who shortly comes in followed by his father. Nothing the older man can say seems to shake his son's resolve to take orders, not even a calculated plea that he marry a suitable girl with a view to settling down to family life: 'Epouse quelque brave fille'. Assuring him his inheritance from his mother's side will be made over without delay, the old Comte leaves the Chevalier, who launches into an impassioned wrestling with his past and his conscience, 'Ah, fuyez douce image'.

No sooner has he moved off to take part in the service than Manon appears, asking to speak to the Abbé des Grieux and sailing into a dramatic and heart-felt arioso prayer to God for a restoration to her of the love of des Grieux. In a moment, he is at her side, denying her pleas albeit with a note of mounting hysteria, until Manon plays her last card: 'N'est-ce plus ma main que cette main presse?' (Don't you feel my hand on your own hand pressing?) As the melody winds its tendrils round his very heart, des Grieux finds his resolve crumbling into an avowal of eternal love.

Act IV. A fashionable gambling house at the Hôtel Transylvanie. Lescaut, Poussette, Javotte and Rosette are at the tables and there are signs that not all the play is above board, when Guillot enters to sing a risqué song with gestures about the Regent and his mistress. Manon makes her entrance with des Grieux, whom she urges to play until she wrings from him an avowal of love more complete if possible than any that has gone before. Twice comes the phrase of total surrender before Manon, apparently in an ecstasy of pleasure, sings 'A nous les amours et les roses!', the most frivolous of her musical utterances, in whose refrain the three filles de joie join. Lescaut has meanwhile been cleaned out but Guillot challenges des Grieux, who wins and attempts a repetition of his love-song only to have Guillot abruptly close the game with an accusation that his opponent has been cheating. He leaves the gaming room but des Grieux will not escape as Manon urges, believing this would be an admission of guilt. Guillot is quickly back, the police at his side, to demand the arrest of des Grieux as a cheat and of Manon as his accomplice. When des Grieux makes towards Guillot, the old Comte des Grieux interposes himself and tries to shame his son into accepting the situation, which develops into the arrest of the two lovers, des Grieux to prison and a quick release, Manon to trial and the near-certainty of transportation as a condemned lady of easy virtue.

¹ At the Opéra-Comique, instead of the Gavotte used to be sung the Fabliau 'Oui, dans les bois', written for Bréjean-Silver.

Act V. The road to Le Havre is announced in music of which a snatch has already been heard in the prelude. Des Grieux has plotted with Lescaut to effect Manon's escape as she is led towards the ship and transportation, but Lescaut reveals that, at first sight of the guards' muskets, his men have fled. The party is heard approaching and one of the guards tells the sergeant that Manon is at the end of her strength. Lescaut bribes the sergeant and Manon shortly appears in a state of complete exhaustion. With much recall of music already heard but with a new theme as basis of the scene, Manon and des Grieux in their present misery remember past happiness, Manon even finding it in her heart to ask her lover for forgiveness for the wrong she has done him, before dying with a half-smile and a quote from the first meeting on her lips: 'Et c'est là l'histoire de Manon Lescaut' (Now you know the story of Manon Lescaut).

History has tended to put forward Manon as Massenet's chef d'oeuvre, and it is certainly his most-performed work. If for nothing else, his portrayal of his heroine would proclaim him an operatic master. Manon's solos plot her development, and we see her awakening from child to young woman; the gradual development from the disingenuous 'On l'appelle Manon' and the heartrending 'Adieu, notre petite table' through the proud confidence of Act III's entrance and the touchingly vulnerable scene with des Grieux père to the impassioned and wholly sincere arioso at Saint Sulpice and the calculating and irresistible 'N'est-ce plus ma main' which closes that scene. The brittle frivolities of the Hôtel Transylvanie give way to cruel reality at its end, and the various strands of Manon's musical character – the genuinely simple, the passionate, the sincere, the mundane – are combined in the music at her death. It is a woman seen through the eyes of a man, but an insidiously compelling portrait nonetheless, which celebrates the glitter and accepts the selfishness, at the same time insisting on the qualities of warmth and ultimately gentleness which bring her lover (and chronicler) back to her at each crook of her little finger. Massenet's celebration of an aspect of the eternal feminine inspired him to write what is, with Carmen, the greatest example of the genre created for the Opéra-Comique and its audience, incidentally a more typical specimen than Carmen. A good performance of Manon can easily persuade the listener that Beecham was right when he said he would happily give all the Brandenburg Concertos for Manon and feel he had vastly profited by the exchange! H.

LE CID

Opera in four acts, text by d'Ennery, Gallet and Blau, after Corneille's Le Cid. Première Opéra, Paris, 30 November 1885, with Fidès-Devries, Jean and Edouard de Reszke, Plançon, Melchissédéc (fifty-three performances in two seasons). First performed in U.S.A., New Orleans, 1890; Metropolitan, New York, 1897, with Litvinne, Jean and Edouard de Reszke, Plançon, Lassalle. Revived in Paris for Rose Caron and Saléza in 1893 and later for Bréval and Alvarez. In Paris there were over 150 performances by 1919.

| | |
|--|----------|
| Chimène, a noble Spanish lady | Soprano |
| The Infanta, daughter of the King of Spain | Soprano |
| Rodrigue, a knight | Tenor |
| Don Diègue, father of Rodrigue | Bass |
| The King | Baritone |
| Count de Gormas, Chimène's father | Bass |
| A Vision of Saint James | Baritone |
| The Moorish Envoy | Baritone |
| Don Arias } | Tenor |
| Don Alonzo } nobles | Bass |
| Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, Priests and Bishops, Soldiers, People | |

Place: Spain

Time: Eleventh Century A.D.

Running Time: 2 hours 20 minutes

Le Cid is Massenet's sixth opera (if you don't count five early, unperformed or suppressed works), and immediately follows Manon, his greatest success to date. His three attempts at the Grand Opera formula fall within eight years. At the time of Le Cid, Le Roi de Lahore (1877) was the last work of Massenet's to have been heard at the Opéra, but Hérodiade, comparable in scale to Le Cid, had been a triumph as recently as 1884 at the Théâtre Italien.

Act I follows an overture built on a scale befitting a grand opera. Rodrigue is to be made a knight in recognition of his military exploits and nobles assure the Count de Gormas that he too will be honoured as guardian of the King's son. Chimène receives her father's blessing on her forthcoming marriage to Rodrigue. The Infanta confesses that she too loves Rodrigue but that, since he is not of royal blood, there can be no rivalry between her and Chimène.

With much ceremony Rodrigue is dubbed a knight, and receives his ceremonial sword, which he apostrophises: 'O noble lame étincelante', an aria of force and fervour. The ceremony continues in church but the King stays outside and announces that Don Diègue, Rodrigue's father, will become his son's guardian. This news infuriates Count de Gormas, who, when the King has gone, insults Don Diègue and provokes him to a duel. Don Diègue is an old man and is first disarmed and then mocked by Gormas. When Rodrigue reappears, he swears to avenge his father's honour before knowing that the perpetrator of the outrage is none other than Chimène's father.

Act II. Rodrigue challenges Gormas and in the ensuing duel mortally wounds him. Chimène is outraged at her father's death and soon knows that it was Rodrigue who killed him. Mourners sing a Requiem.

It is spring, all rejoice, and the crowd watches an extensive ballet, containing some of Massenet's most attractive dance invention, with the seven movements based on the provinces of Spain: Castillane; Andalouse; Aragonaise; Aubade; Catalane; Madrilène; Navarraise. When the Court hears from Chimène that Rodrigue has killed her father, opinion is divided between those who believe he was provoked and others who demand a life for a life. A Moorish envoy brings a declaration of war and Don Diègue pleads for his son to lead the Spaniards. Rodrigue pledges to return and accept whatever verdict the King – and Chimène – have decided upon.

Act III. Chimène loves the man who killed her father and in a fine utterance reflects on a desperate situation ('Pleurez, pleurez, mes yeux'). Rodrigue comes to bid Chimène farewell and in a duet which reminds the listener of Massenet's finest vein, she makes a move to forgive him, then says she will do so if in battle he saves Spain.

Before the battle, some of Rodrigue's officers are so convinced of impending defeat that Rodrigue sends them packing. In his tent, he himself in one of Massenet's great arias ('O souverain, o juge, o père') prays movingly for victory and a vision of Saint James reassures him. Battle is joined, led by Rodrigue with cries of 'O noble lame étincelante'.

Act IV. The officers who deserted Rodrigue tell his father that he is dead, but the entry of the King brings different news: Rodrigue was the victor. The King asks Chimène for the verdict. She seems unable to pronounce the words she longs to say but when Rodrigue threatens to draw his sword to kill himself she rushes to save him and the opera ends in rejoicing.

Massenet's grand operas are well made and far from negligible, but it is the lyrical set-pieces and incidental felicities, like the motif attached to Chimène, rather than the grand gestures and structures which delight devotees of French opera. H.

ESCLARMONDE

Opera in four acts and an epilogue, text by E. Blau and E. de Gramont. Première Opéra-Comique, Paris, 15 May 1889, with Sybil Sanderson. The hundredth performance at the Opéra-Comique was on 6 February 1890. First performed Brussels, 1889, New Orleans, 1893. Revived Paris with Fanny Heldy, later Ritter-Ciampi; for Joan Sutherland in San Francisco, 1974, at Metropolitan, New York, 1976, Covent Garden, 1982, with Richard Bonynghe conducting; 1992 in Saint-Etienne and at Opéra-Comique, Paris, with Denia Mazzola; Turin, 1992, with Alexandrina Pendachanska.

Esclarmonde, *Empress of Byzantium*Soprano
 Parséis, *her sister*Mezzo-Soprano
 The Emperor PhorcasBass
 Roland, *Count of Blois*Tenor
 The Bishop of BloisBaritone
 Enéas, *a Byzantine knight*Tenor
 Cléomer, *King of France*Bass
 A Saracen EnvoyTenor
 A Byzantine HeraldTenor

Nobles of the Empire, Knights, Guards, Monks, Priests, Warriors, Maidens, Children, Spirits,
 Courtiers, Populace

Place: Byzantium, an Enchanted Island, Blois, the Forest of Ardennes

Time: The Middle Ages

Running Time: 2 hours 45 minutes

Sybil Sanderson, the American soprano, was the daughter of a judge, beautiful and endowed with a voice of striking range – three octaves in the air of the Queen of the Night, 'from lower to upper G' said Massenet, allowing, one imagines, for a cadenza. She sang Manon in Holland in preparation for Esclarmonde which Massenet wrote for her, and her success was striking in this opera and in Thaïs. She was twenty-two when Massenet met her, only thirty-eight when she died.

The opera was planned to coincide with the Universal Exhibition in Paris in 1889.

Prologue. The Basilica in Byzantium. Emperor Phorcas, magician as well as ruler, abdicates in favour of his daughter Esclarmonde, whom he has instructed in the mysteries of which he is master. The sole condition he makes is that she remain veiled and out of reach of men until she is twenty. At a tournament then, the winner will be awarded her hand in marriage. Esclarmonde appears with her sister Parséis who is charged with responsibility for Esclarmonde.

Act I. Esclarmonde broods on memories of the knight Roland, whom she once saw and fell instantly in love with. To her sister she confesses she feels her father has condemned her to a life of solitude, and Parséis recommends that she use her magic powers to bring the man she loves to her. Enéas, the fiancé of Parséis, tells them that Roland is the only knight to overcome him at a tournament, moreover that he knows he is about to marry the daughter of the King of France. Esclarmonde is greatly put out by the news but summons spirits to bring Roland to her, starting the process with two irresistible top Ds. Esclarmonde and Enéas glimpse him first hunting in the forest of the Ardennes, then as he comes by ship to join her on an enchanted island.

Act II. On the enchanted island, Roland is lulled to sleep. Esclarmonde wakens him and promises him glory and honour in return for his love and pledge to make no attempt to lift her veil. Roland accepts the conditions and the couple join in rapturous duet.

Scene ii. The night of bliss is over, Roland repeats his oath and Esclarmonde tells him he must go to fight the Saracens who are besieging Blois. She will by magic join him every night. She gives him a sword whose powers will render him invincible for as long as he keeps his vow to her.

Act III. The King of France mourns the ruined city of Blois and waits for an envoy to bring him the Saracens' terms, which will involve the surrender as tribute of a hundred virgins. As the envoy arrives and the Bishop adjures the crowd to put their trust in God, Roland stands to challenge the Saracen king to single combat. Soldiers accompany him to the battle; the Bishop leads the people in prayer. Roland is victorious, and King Cléomer offers him his daughter's hand in recompense, which Roland declines. The King forgives him but the Bishop is determined to find out the reason behind his behaviour.

Scene ii. In King Cléomer's palace Roland waits for night and the magical appearance of Esclarmonde. The bishop comes to demand the reason for his refusal of the princess's hand but Roland says he is bound by an oath to secrecy. The prelate threatens him with damnation if he maintain silence; in the end, Roland, in accents almost of ecstasy, admits that every night the woman to whom he is bound appears mysteriously at his side. The bishop is horrified at what he hears and withdraws. Esclarmonde materialises and celebrates with a top F and an ossia G as Roland admits to fear that he may have broken his vow. The bishop returns at the head of a group of monks and soldiery, perceives Esclarmonde as a diabolical manifestation and carries out a rite of exorcism, ending by tearing the veil from her face. Roland tries to protect her, only for his sword to shatter in his hand. Esclarmonde's spirits help her disappear as she curses Roland for his betrayal of trust.

Act IV. Phorcas is living as a hermit in the forests of the Ardennes. Spirits dance before him as heralds appear to announce a tournament in Byzantium whose victor will receive the hand of Esclarmonde. Parséis and Enéas make their appearance and to Phorcas Parséis relates the story of the love of Esclarmonde for Roland and its sad outcome. Phorcas in fury commands his spirits to bring his erring daughter to him. She appears at first not to know what has happened, but Phorcas resumes his powers and decrees that she will not only lose her throne but that unless she renounce his love, Roland will die. She reluctantly accepts the decree, but Roland begs her forgiveness and urges her to escape with him. Phorcas insists she keep to the path of duty, she declares she no longer loves Roland and, with her crime expiated, Roland is reprieved. They are briefly but ecstatically united, then Esclarmonde is recalled to duty. Roland longs for death, then joins the heralds and their escort on their way back to Byzantium.

Epilogue. In the Basilica, Phorcas and Esclarmonde wait for the victor in the tournament to claim his prize. He appears, says his name is Despair, and that he came to the tournament seeking death. He will not accept his reward, but Esclarmonde unveils, and she and Roland are reunited, to the acclamation of the crowd.

Esclarmonde lacks for much of the time genuine dramatic and therefore musical conflict – unless it be the scene between Roland and the Bishop of Blois, and later, Esclarmonde's decision to renounce Roland rather than that he lose his life – but its attractions remain. It contains voluptuous music of real grace, fine exploitation of the higher reaches of the soprano voice, and instrumentation to match the hedonistic quality of the vocal writing. For Sybil Sanderson, it must have been the realisation of a dream, as, in different circumstances more than eighty years later, for Joan Sutherland. Without sopranos of this calibre, it cannot be mounted, but when they become available it would be masochistic not to try.

H.

WERTHER

Opera in four acts, text by Edouard Blau, Paul Milliet and Georges Hartmann, after Goethe's novel. Première in a German version at the Vienna Opera, 16 February 1892, with Marie Renard, van Dyck. First performed Opéra-Comique, Paris, 16 January 1893, with Marie Delna, Ibos; Chicago, 1894; New York, 1894, and Covent Garden the same year, with Eames, Arnoldson, Jean de Reszke. Revived Metropolitan, 1910, with Farrar, Alma Gluck, Clément, Dinh Gilly; 1971, with Christa Ludwig and Franco Corelli; His Majesty's Theatre, London (in English), 1910; la Scala, Milan, 1939, with Pederzini, Schipa; 1951, with Simionato, Ferruccio Tagliavini; Sadler's Wells (in English), 1952, with Marion Lowe and Rowland Jones; Glyndebourne, 1966, with Hélia T'Hézan, Jean Brazzi; English National Opera, 1977, with Janet Baker, John Brecknock, conductor Mackerras.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Werther, a poet, aged 23..... | Tenor |
| Albert, a young man, aged 25 | Baritone |
| The Magistrate, aged 50 | Bass |
| Schmidt } the Magistrate's cronies | Tenor |
| Johann } | Bass |
| Charlotte, the Magistrate's daughter, aged 20 | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Sophie, her sister, aged 15 | Soprano |
| Children, Neighbours | |

Place: Frankfurt

Time: About 1780

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

The idea of Werther as an operatic subject came to Massenet a dozen years before his opera reached the stage, though that process was itself curiously roundabout. A block in composition was resolved by a visit to the part of Germany where Goethe had written his novel, but the opera was turned down by the Opéra-Comique in favour of the less harrowing Esclarmonde and eventually, following the enormous success there of Manon, staged in Vienna, with (paradoxically we might now think) the singer of Manon's title role now cast as Charlotte. An attractive picture of Marie Renard as Manon has pride of place in Vienna's Volksoper to this day.

Act I. After a prelude consisting of the music associated with the more forceful as well as the idyllic side of Werther's character, the curtain rises to reveal the garden outside the Magistrate's house. The owner is rehearsing his children in a Christmas song; they sing it badly, but his comment – that they would not dare sing like that if their sister Charlotte were there – has the effect simultaneously of introducing Charlotte and improving the singing. Two friends of the Magistrate's, Johann and Schmidt, pause to listen and to remind the Magistrate of his promise to meet them later that night at the 'Raisin d'or'. Sophie has come in to mention the dreamer Werther and the practical Albert; the last-named will make, says Schmidt, a model husband for Charlotte. Schmidt and Johann go off singing 'Vivat Bacchus', and everyone else goes into the house.

Werther appears, asking for the Magistrate's house, and expressing his pleasure in the country atmosphere in a graceful recitative and aria ('O nature pleine de grâce'). Charlotte, dressed for the dance which is to take place that night, comes out of the house with the children and takes advantage of the lateness of her escort to cut them their bread and butter. Various guests arrive and Charlotte says goodnight to the children, who, the Magistrate says, have been in her charge since their mother's death. Most successful is the way Massenet in a few minutes of music suggests the passage of time while Charlotte and Werther are at the ball: a few sentences for the Magistrate alone and then with Sophie, an empty stage before the entry of Albert, his recognition by Sophie followed by his aria – and night has fallen completely, the moon risen, and the scene is set for the return of the principals.

The music of 'Clair de lune' (Moonlight) is heard in the orchestra as Charlotte and Werther come into the garden, arm in arm. Their mutual attraction is obvious and Werther declares his overwhelming love for Charlotte before Massenet interrupts the duet with an effect that is as simple as it is telling: the Magistrate calls out from the house that Albert is back – the idyll is shattered, and we have taken the turn towards tragedy which is to be the eventual outcome. The ‘Clair de lune’ duet shows many of Massenet’s qualities – the elegant simplicity of the vocal line, the economical role of the orchestra, the shapely, rewarding contours of the tunes, the evocative atmosphere of the whole. It is not undramatic – the vocal line becomes gradually animated as the situation develops, and Charlotte’s reticence is influenced by Werther’s rising passion – but it remains the world of understatement.

A few hasty sentences explain that Albert is the fiancé Charlotte’s mother wished for her, and the curtain falls on Werther’s desperate cry, ‘Un autre! son époux!’ (She’ll be another’s wife!¹)

Act II. In front of the church. The two bons vivants Johann and Schmidt are drinking at the inn. Inside the church the golden wedding of the village pastor is being celebrated. Charlotte and Albert appear, apparently full of happiness after three months of marriage, and go into the church. Werther catches sight of them as they disappear: ‘Un autre est son époux’. He soliloquises in music of more vigorous character than we have previously heard from him as he laments that marriage with Charlotte is an impossibility for him (‘J’aurais sur ma poitrine’). He sinks down overcome with misery, and, when he comes out of the church, Albert takes the opportunity of talking to his friend, who, he thinks, is, or has been, in love with Charlotte. After a painful admission, Werther affirms his loyalty to both: ‘Mais, comme après l’orage’. Sophie, in a little song which might have done duty for the immature Manon, ‘Le gai soleil’, sings of the happiness which is in her heart. Werther resolves to leave, but the sight of Charlotte is too much for him and he renews his protestations of love. She begs him to go and at all events to stay away until Christmas time. Werther is overcome by the situation; unable to give up his love, he prays at the same time for strength to stay away and for the happiness which his return could bring him: ‘Lorsque l’enfant revient d’un voyage’. Seeing Sophie, he tells her he is going away, never to return. She loses no time in informing her sister and brother-in-law of this decision, and Albert comments darkly that this can mean only that Werther is still in love with Charlotte.

Act III. It is Christmas. Charlotte realises that she returns Werther’s love; merely to re-read the letters he has written her is enough to bring her to the verge of hysteria. Her sister’s efforts to cheer her up are in vain, and when Sophie refers to Werther, Charlotte’s reserve breaks down and she collapses in floods of tears: ‘Va! laisse couler mes larmes’. Left alone, she prays for strength: ‘Ah! mon courage m’abandonne’. When she is in contact with other people, Charlotte’s words and behaviour are conventional and short of compassion (fortunately, this is not by any means always the case with her music), but this can to a large extent be forgiven her for the depth and vehemence of feeling she shows in this scene. In a moment Charlotte becomes a real and believable person, not the prig we have known in the other two acts.

Suddenly, Werther himself appears, confessing that his reason had urged him to stay away but instinct had proved too strong; he is here on the appointed day of Christmas. They look together at the books they used to read, the harpsichord they used to play, and Charlotte reminds Werther that he was translating Ossian before he went away. The sight of the book awakens memories in Werther’s mind, and from it he sings a song of tragic love: ‘Pourquoi me réveiller?’ This aria has become enormously popular, and in it for the first time in Charlotte’s presence Werther uses the directness of musical expression which has hitherto been reserved for soliloquies.

When Charlotte’s voice betrays her feelings, Werther abandons restraint and embraces her. The music has a genuine tragic ring about it as Werther becomes more and more excited, and in fact, from the beginning of Act III right through to the end of the opera, there is a straightforwardness and a decisiveness that contrasts with the frustration, the continual second thoughts of the first two acts. Werther draws back and Charlotte rushes from the room, locking the door behind her. Albert returns and connects his wife’s agitation with Werther’s return, of which he has already learned. The servant comes in with a message from Werther: ‘I am going on a long journey, will you lend me your pistols?’ Albert tells Charlotte to give them to the servant; she does so mechanically, but fully understands the significance of the message.

¹ Translation by Norman Tucker.

Act IV. The scene changes to Werther's apartment (Acts III and IV are played without an interval). Charlotte comes in to find him dying. He prevents her going for help, and is contented when she tells him she has loved him from the moment they first met. As he dies, the voices of the children celebrating Christmas can be heard outside his room. H.

THAÏS

Opera in three acts, text by Louis Gallet after the novel by Anatole France. Première at Opéra, Paris, 16 March 1894, with Sybil Sanderson, Alvarèz, Delmas, conductor Taffanel.

Athanaël, a Cenobite monk.....Baritone
 Nicias, a young Alexandrian.....Tenor
 Palémon, an old Cenobite monk.....Bass
 Thaïs, actress and courtesan.....Soprano
 Crobyle and Myrtale,
 two slaves.....Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano
 Albine, the abbess.....Mezzo-Soprano
 La Charmeuse.....Dancer
 Cenobites, Actors and Actresses, Friends of Nicias, Nuns

Place: In and near Alexandria

Time: End of the Fourth Century

Running Time: 2 hours 5 minutes

Vincent d'Indy, not only a sharp critic but a rival composer, wrote of the 'discreet and semi-religious eroticism' of Massenet's music and it was Thaïs he had in mind. But the central relationship between Thaïs, courtesan turned nun, and Athanaël, the monk drawn irresistibly to the world of the flesh he thought he despised, is a stronger one than d'Indy's bon mot suggests. Anatole France, in the novel on which Thaïs is founded, mocks more than he pities Paphnuce/Athanaël, but the figure Massenet and his librettists have created is pivotal to the opera, and the pull between his urge to denounce sin and Thaïs's irresistible attraction provides a powerful basis for musical drama.

Massenet wrote Thaïs for Sybil Sanderson, who had created Esclarmonde and to whose voice and beauty he was strongly attracted.

Act I. A Cenobite establishment on the banks of the Nile. It is evening and the monks are at table when Athanaël returns from Alexandria scandalised by the sensation caused there by the activities of the shameless courtesan and dancer, Thaïs. Before joining the Cenobites he knew her ('Hélas! enfant encore') and once as a young man hesitated in front of her door. Now, a man of God, he must save her soul. Palémon advises against any such action, but once asleep Athanaël has a vision of Thaïs in the theatre and wakes to proclaim his mission.

Scene ii. A terrace with a view of Alexandria. A grandiose orchestral introduction leads to Athanaël's majestic apostrophising of the city of his birth ('Voilà donc la terrible cité'). The voices of Crobyle and Myrtale can be heard from inside before Nicias comes out to greet his friend. He is a young Alexandrian who has purchased the love of Thaïs for a week, of which there is still one day to run. Nicias will clothe and bathe Athanaël so that he may be introduced to the high priestess of Venus whom he plans to save. Graceful music depicts the adorning of Athanaël, supervised by Crobyle and Myrtale, the meeting of Thaïs and Athanaël, and the act's finale as Athanaël goes off to wait outside her house. Athanaël is a handsome young man and does not appear out of place as the devotees greet Thaïs. He strikes her as angry and her 'Qui te fait si sévère?' is one of the score's most attractive moments.

Act II, scene i. Thaïs's house. Thaïs's mood of introspection as she contemplates herself in a mirror turns to something closer to a celebration of her beauty as she demands reassurance ('Dis-moi que je suis belle'). In a splendid bravura piece, she worries about getting old. Reassurance is not what Athanaël plans to provide in his forceful attempt to convert her. He argues that the word 'Amour' has connotations beyond the physical and her hysterical outburst suggests the breaking down of barriers.

Scene ii is preceded by an interlude, the so-called 'Méditation', which consists of a violin solo over harp and eventually full orchestra and chorus, and is the score's most famous number. Thaïs in a rough woollen dress is prepared to forsake the past and follow Athanaël. She must destroy her possessions, he says, but she begs to be allowed to keep a little statue of Eros: 'L'amour est une vertu rare' – an aria graceful and chaste to set beside the scintillation of the Air du Miroir – but Athanaël dashes it to the ground. Here occurs the ballet, a divertissement in seven movements danced for Nicias and his friends, at whose end Thaïs's house disappears in flames (the ballet is often cut in modern performance though once de rigueur for the Opéra).

Act III, scene i. The Oasis. This scene was added during the opera's first run, and orchestrally it is full of the shimmering heat and destructive sun which beat down on Thaïs and Athanaël as they make their way towards the nunnery Albine has established far from the contamination of civilisation. Thaïs is at the end of her strength and, in an extended duet, she pleads her exhaustion; he goads her forward, until the extent of her plight moves him to fetch water from a well and she sings 'O messenger de Dieu'. Their voices join in the scene's culmination, a duet of exquisite tenderness: 'Baigne d'eau mes mains et mes lèvres'. Thaïs is consigned to Albine for the rest of her earthly life, and only then does Athanaël know the unbearable agony of saying goodbye.

Scene ii. With the Cenobites once more, Athanaël confesses that since he returned from his conversion of Thaïs, he has not known a moment's peace. As he sleeps, a vision of the courtesan invades his mind; she is about to die and he must go to her.

Scene iii. Arrived at the huts of Albine's nunnery, Athanaël's vision is confirmed, and Thaïs's pious thoughts as she dies ('Te souvient-il du lumineux voyage?') are contrasted with the powerless rage of Athanaël. The Méditation returns to haunt the monk in his despair.

H.

LA NAVARRAISE

The Girl from Navarre

Episode lyrique in two acts, libretto by Jules Claretie and Henri Cain, after the former's story La cigarette. Première Covent Garden, 20 June 1894, with Emma Calvé, Albert Alvarez, Pol Plançon, Charles Gilibert, conductor Philip Flon. New York, Metropolitan, 1895, with Calvé, Lubat, Castelmaly, Plançon; Paris, Opéra-Comique, 1895, with Calvé, Jérôme, conductor Danbé. Widely produced in Europe 1894–1900. Revived Paris, Opéra, 1924; New York, Metropolitan, 1921, with Geraldine Farrar, Giulio Crimi, Léon Rothier, Louis D'Angelo, conductor Albert Wolff; Chicago, 1915, with Julia Claussen, Charles Dalmores, Vittorio Arimondi, and 1930, with Mary Garden, René Maison, Jean Vieuille; London Collegiate Theatre, 1972, with Joyce Blackham.

Anita, the girl from Navarre.....Soprano
Araquil, a sergeant.....Tenor
Garrido, the General.....Bass

Remigio, Araquil's father.....Baritone
Ramon, a captain.....Tenor
Bustamente, a sergeant.....Baritone
Basque Women, Officers, Wounded Soldiers, an Almoner, a Surgeon, Peasants

Place: Spain

Time: The Carlist Wars in 1874

Running Time: 50 minutes

Within just over two years of the première of Werther, some three months after that of Thaïs, and influenced perhaps by the success in Italy of Cavalleria Rusticana, Massenet placed himself in a position to be accused of emulating the Italians of the Verismo school.

Act I. The short prelude, during which the action starts to be revealed, begins with a reiterated and forceful theme heard frequently throughout the opera. The scene is a village square near Bilbao, in the Basque country, with at the back an improvised barricade made from wagons, sandbags, mattresses and anything to hand. Soldiers in considerable disorder cross the scene, some wounded and supported by their mates.

General Garrido, whose troops are investing the Carlists after their capture of Bilbao from him, laments the unsuccessful attack his men have just launched. Zuccaraga is still in possession. Were he dead, Bilbao would fall and peace would be won!

A young girl, Anita, hesitatingly approaches Captain Ramon and asks if he has seen Sergeant Araquil. Ramon has no idea where he is and Anita prays to the leaden image of the Virgin she wears round her neck. Another group of soldiers crosses the square and still Anita does not see Araquil, until with a cry she notices that he is bringing up the rear, encouraging the stragglers. He is very obviously as much in love with her as she with him and their duet is youthful and passionate. Remigio, a rich farmer who is Araquil's father, makes his appearance, hardly able to believe his son is still alive and evidently keen to dismiss 'la Navarraise', whose love for his son is to him totally unwelcome. She describes how she met him first, but Remigio is quite unmoved and demands from her, if it is marriage she is after, a dowry equal to what he will settle on his son. She protests their love and begs him to bless their union. The voices join for a moment in a trio until Remigio, not without irony, renews his insistence on a dowry equal to his son's inheritance.

At this point, General Garrido comes out to question Araquil about the recent action, discovering that all his officers have been killed and that Araquil commanded the retreat. He is promoted Lieutenant on the spot, and father and son leave the square. Garrido mourns the loss of his old companions in arms, takes out a map and starts to plot another attack, while Anita, half-hidden, wonders if Remigio were not right. Ramon brings news of another casualty and Garrido starts to inveigh against his old enemy. Whoever can kill Zuccaraga deserves a fortune! Anita steals out of the shadows and asks if he will give two thousand douros – the dowry Remigio mentioned – if she will rid him of his foe. He seems to agree but she refuses him her name and disappears, leaving Garrido to discuss his plans with his entourage. Araquil, now with a lieutenant's insignia on his uniform, sings sadly and beautifully to himself of his beloved Anita: 'O bien aimée, pourquoi n'es-tu pas là?', the score's longest lyrical passage. Ramon questions him about Anita and says that he himself does not trust her. He has just heard that she was seen leaving the camp and asking the way to Zuccaraga's headquarters. Araquil is furious and leaves, the soldiers, led by Bustamente, indulging after he has gone in a brilliant 6/8 camp song, which ends only as bugles sound 'lights out'.

A beautiful nocturne, all woodwind staccatos and turns, suggests the passage of the night and is interrupted by a succession of single shots and the arrival, observed by the alert Garrido, of Anita, dishevelled, wounded in the arm and in a state of very considerable agitation. She demands her money from Garrido who comes to believe that she has killed Zuccaraga. He gives her a heavy purse of leather and its sight seems to hypnotise her. Now at last Araquil will be hers! Her triumph acts almost as a signal for the reappearance of Araquil, badly wounded and sustained by two soldiers. He says he is dying, and because of her, and asks his friends to leave him. He looked for her everywhere and thought her still at Zuccaraga's side; no amount of indignation on her part can persuade him that she is other than unfaithful to him. She protests that she has done everything for their future happiness.

Remigio appears and his son asks why there is a bell tolling in the distance, only to be told that it is for the chief of the Carlists who has been murdered that night. Araquil looks at Anita's hands, which she instinctively hides. Araquil dies and the distraught Anita searches frantically for the knife she realises she has left in Zuccaraga's tent. To the sound of the tolling bell she goes mad, and the curtain falls on the motif of the opening prelude. H.

CENDRILLON

Cinderella

Opera in four acts and six tableaux, text by Henri Cain (after Perrault). Première, Opéra-Comique, Paris, 24 May 1899, with Julie Guiraudon, who later married the librettist, as Cendrillon, Emelen (Prince Charming), Deschamp-Jéhin (Mme de la Haltière), Bréjean-Gravière (the Fairy), Lucien Fugère (Pandolphe), conductor Luigini, with fifty performances by the end of the year. Revived in 1909 with Heilbronner and Geneviève Vix.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Cendrillon (Lucette)..... | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Prince Charming | Soprano |
| Madame de la Haltière, Cendrillon's step-mother | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Pandolfe, her husband, Cendrillon's father | Bass-Baritone |
| The Fairy | Soprano |
| Pandolfe's stepdaughters | |
| Noémie..... | Soprano |
| Dorothée | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The King..... | Baritone |
| The Master of Ceremonies | Baritone |
| The Dean of the Faculty | Tenor |
| The Prime Minister | Baritone |
| A Herald | Baritone |

Running Time: 2 hours 15 minutes

Massenet conspired with Henri Cain as early as 1894 to write an opera based on Perrault's retelling of the Cinderella story. The opera's première was postponed from 1897 (in favour of Sapho with Emma Calvé) until 1899 when it met with immediate success. Fairy music was much to the composer's taste, and the opera never quite lost its hold on the repertory. With the Massenet revival of the 1980s, this was one of the first scores to be re-examined.

Act I. Madame de la Haltière's household is preparing the mistress and her two disobliging daughters for the evening's court ball, while Pandolfe, her husband, wryly reflects on the pleasures of the past when he and his daughter Cendrillon lived in peace in the country. Servants, hairdressers and milliners scurry to considerable effect and all four depart leaving Cendrillon to lament, in a typical Massenet entrance aria and with just a hint of self-righteousness, her exclusion from the party. The Fairy materialises in a great celebration of coloratura, galvanises her entourage to improvise a costume, wakes Cendrillon and packs her off to the palace, giving her a glass slipper to make her unrecognisable and enjoining a return by midnight.

Act II. The Palace. Three musicians (flute, viola d'amore and crystal flute) play mysteriously more or less throughout the scene, but at first nothing will rouse Prince Charming from his melancholy. The King commands him to choose a bride from the company shortly to be assembled, guests arrive, a ten-minute suite of five dances ensues (devised with all Massenet's usual facility for ballet music), and Pandolfe and his three ladies make their entrance. So, shortly after, does Cendrillon, to general admiration. The Prince is plainly captivated, Cendrillon returns his interest, and there ensues a love duet of the greatest simplicity and subtlety – one of Massenet's finest, short and as insinuating as so many of his best lyrical inspirations ('Vous êtes mon Prince Charmant'). But midnight sounds ...

Act III. Cendrillon runs home in despair having mislaid the slipper, but disappears before her father and the three termagants return, praising their own prowess at the ball and disapproving everything else. Pandolfe can't stand up to them, but they eventually disappear and he and his daughter look forward to a happier life in the country together. He leaves, but Cendrillon cannot forget her stepsisters' remark to the effect that the Prince's interest in the unknown girl was no more than a passing fancy, and she rushes despairingly into the night.

The Fairy holds court in the forest, and, when an apparently broken-hearted young man appears, contrives to allow Cendrillon to hear him without being seen. Together, she and the Prince implore the Fairy to dissolve the magic barrier which separates them, then once again pour out their love. However real it seems, it is still only a dream ...

Act IV. Months pass and Pandolfe is seen keeping watch over the sleeping Cendrillon, and, when she wakes, offering comfort. He assures her her ravings – of the Prince whom she has never met, of a glass slipper she never owned – are nothing but a dream. She accepts what he says, but father and daughter make their escape before Madame de la Haltière and her daughters put in an appearance and end tranquillity. A herald announces that this very day all the ladies of the court are summoned to try on the glass slipper found in the palace after the ball. Cendrillon realises that her 'dream' was in fact real, and begs her fairy godmother to make it possible for her to go.

At the palace, ladies of rank and fashion enter to the liveliest possible march and try the slipper, all to no avail. The Fairy announces Cendrillon and she and the Prince greet one another rapturously. The court renders homage as Pandolfe and his wife make their entrance, she brushing past him to embrace Cendrillon with the words: 'My own child!' Pandolfe turns to the audience: 'You see, all has ended well!'

H.

GRISÉLIDIS

Opera in three acts and a prologue, text by Armand Silvestre and Eugène Morand from their play Le Mystère. Première Opéra-Comique, Paris, 20 November 1901, with Lucienne Bréval, André Maréchal, Hector Dufranne, Lucien Fugère, conductor André Messager (creators respectively of Pénélope, Julien, Golaud, the Father in Louise). First performed la Scala, Milan, 1902, with Monti-Baldini, de Luca, Ruffo; Buenos Aires (in Italian), 1903; Manhattan Opera, New York, 1910, with Garden, Dufranne, Huberdeau, Dalmorès; Chicago, 1917, with Garden, Dufranne, Maguénat, conductor Campanini.

GrisélidisSoprano
 Fiamina, *the Devil's wife*Soprano
 Bertrade, *companion to Grisélidis*Soprano
 Loys, *son of Grisélidis and the Marquess*Treble
 The DevilBass or Baritone
 Alain, *a shepherd*Tenor
 The MarquessBaritone
 The PriorBaritone
 GondebaudBass or Baritone

Soldiers, Servants, Spirits, Celestial Voices

Place: Provence

Time: Middle Ages

Running Time: 1 hour 50 minutes

Massenet composed Grisélidis immediately after La Navarraise and while Thaïs was being prepared for performance, but it bears only slight resemblance to its neighbours.

The setting is medieval, and the Prologue opens with a convincing expression of sheer joy on the part of Alain, a shepherd, at the prospect of seeing Grisélidis and perhaps winning her love ('Ouvrez-vous sur mon front'). It is the Marquess however whose proposal she accepts. Alain despairingly repeats the phrases of his opening celebration.

Act I. In the Castle, Bertrade sings a love song. The Marquess is off to the Crusades but opposes a suggestion from his Prior that Grisélidis should stay indoors during his absence, capping his protest by defying the Devil himself to disrupt his marriage. The Devil pops up and turns out to be at least superficially a good fellow. He bets against the probability of Grisélidis staying faithful and the Marquess gives a ring as a pledge of his conviction in her strength.

Act II. Six months later. The Devil is in holiday mood ('Loin de sa femme'). His wife comes in to break up his good humour, the Devil prevaricates, Fiamina threatens to pay him out in kind. With some panache, they plot against the Marquise, who presently appears praying sadly for her husband and those in danger. The Devil and Fiamina tell her they are messengers from the Marquess who has bought Fiamina in a slave market and proposes she should be installed in the Castle with full powers until his return, when he will marry her! Grisélidis reluctantly accepts the situation and retires with her son. She has passed her first test but the Devil will find another, not unconnected with the person of the shepherd, Alain. He conjures up spirits who dance and Alain is compelled by a stronger force than himself to sing what turns into a moonlight serenade ('Je suis l'oiseau'). His duet with Grisélidis develops into a declaration of love and, from Grisélidis, a partial admission of its return. The sight of her son breaks the spell but the Devil seizes the child and abducts him. Grisélidis has again resisted – but at what a cost!

Act III. Grisélidis laments the loss of her son and means to pray but the statue of St Agnes has been spirited away. The Devil demands she give a kiss to his abductor as the price of her son's return and she accepts the bargain, failing to notice that when she touches holy water, the Devil writhes in agony. The Marquess returns, the Devil in disguise accuses Grisélidis, thinking her husband dead, of infidelity, and tells the Marquess to watch her going down towards where waits the supposed abductor of their son. The Marquess hesitates between suspicion of the worst and confidence in his wife's strength of mind. When she comes back, his doubts start to vanish as she enquires after the replacement 'wife' he has sent and a reconciliation is on the cards. The Devil laughs at the Marquess's consternation when he realises his child is gone for good but he and Grisélidis resort to prayer and the opera finishes with their child safely returned.

There is little medieval about Massenet's music for his distantly-rooted subject, unless it be an occasional modal reference. His lyrical gift, as for all his best work, underpins the opera, and there is tenderness in the utterances of Grisélidis and her husband the Marquess, apparent even when he is protesting most sternly. Alain is something of a cypher, ardent in his convincing avowal of love at the opera's start, no more than a typical Massenet tenor in Act II's duet (in which only through the Devil's intervention does he participate), and he plays little part in the drama itself. New is the scherzo-like music allotted to the Devil, evocative of Berlioz in his opening ditty's sardonic humour – worthy at least of Gounod's Mercutio. This is a devil with a grim sense of humour, which must have suited the original singer, the great Lucien Fugère, down to the ground. A hundred years after the event it is not easy to see how Grisélidis can have been successful as a play but history suggests Comédie-Française audiences liked it, and the not too frequent revivals of the opera suggest the subject presents little impediment to enjoyment. H.

LE JONGLEUR DE NOTRE DAME

Our Lady's Tumbler

Opera in three acts, text by M. Léna. Première at Monte Carlo, 18 February 1902, with Charles Maréchal, Renaud. First performed at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, 1904, with Maréchal, Allard, Fugère, Huberdeau (later the part of Jean was taken over by Mary Garden); Covent Garden, 1906, with Laffite, Gilibert, Crabbé; New York, 1908, with Garden, Renaud, Dufranne; London Opera House, 1912, with Fer, Chadal, Combe. Revived Chicago, 1929, with Garden, Formichi, Cotreuil; la Scala, Milan, 1938, with Malipiero, Maugeri, Bettoni, conductor Marinuzzi; la Fenice, Venice, 1948, with Malipiero; Wexford Festival, 1984, with Patrick Power, Sergei Leiferkus, Christian du Plessis, conductor Yan Pascal Tortelier.

Jean, a tumbler Tenor (or Soprano)
 Boniface, cook at the monastery Baritone
 The Prior Bass
 A Poet-Monk Tenor
 A Painter-Monk Baritone
 A Musician-Monk Baritone
 A Sculptor-Monk Bass
 Two Angels Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano

Place: Cluny, France

Time: Fourteenth Century

Running Time: 1 hour 20 minutes

Le Jongleur was the first of Massenet's operas to have its première in Monte Carlo, but four of the remaining six operas to be staged in his lifetime were first seen in the principality.

Act I. The square of Cluny. The façade of the abbey can be seen. It is market-day, and dancing is going on in the square. A hurdy-gurdy is heard in the distance, and Jean, the tumbler, comes into view. He starts his patter, but is mocked by the crowd, and has no sort of success until in desperation and with a bad conscience he sings the so-called 'Alleluiah du vin', in which the chorus joins happily. They are interrupted by the Prior, furious at the near-sacrilege which has been committed outside the monastery.

The Prior vents his wrath on Jean, who alone stays behind. When he finds that the blasphemer is disposed to regret his actions, the Prior bids him dedicate himself to the Virgin. Jean is doubtful about renouncing his freedom at so early a stage of his life; he has valued his liberty: 'Liberté! Liberté! c'est elle que mon cœur pour maîtresse a choisie'. Jean's resolve to repent seems to be weakening, but he is particularly anxious not to have to leave behind the cap and bells, which have been the symbols of his trade. The Prior turns on him with some asperity, but decides to make a last attempt to win him over; he shows him the good things being taken by Brother Boniface into the monastery; all are destined for the monks' table. Boniface goes over the splendid array of provisions which he has brought for the greater glory of the Virgin and the greater comfort of her servants: 'Pour la vierge'. The Benedicite is heard from inside the monastery, and Jean follows the others in.

Act II. Interior of the abbey. Monks are at work. A painter is finishing a statue of the Virgin, a musician is rehearsing a hymn with the choir, Boniface prepares vegetables. Only Jean has nothing to do. To the Prior, he confesses that he knows no Latin, and that the songs he used to sing were all profane and in French. His fellow brethren mock him for his idleness, and each advises him that his own profession – be it painting, sculpture, poetry – is the only one for him. The Prior is obliged to intervene and ask for some concord in place of the dispute which seems to be growing. Only Boniface, when the others have gone, tries to comfort Jean; there are other things in life than art – and think of the pride which seems to go with it. He tells him a story to console him – the legend of the humble sage, which opened at the request of the Virgin to hide the Saviour from the sight of the soldiers sent to kill him, and in doing so outshone the rose, which was too proud to perform the service asked of it: 'Fleurissait une rose'. The passage has become the best known in the whole work.

Boniface reflects before dropping the subject that the sage is of course extremely valuable in cooking, and he then leaves to look after his kitchen. Jean is struck with what he has heard, and begins to believe that even the humblest can serve the Virgin in a way acceptable to her. Can he not do so himself?

Act III. The abbey chapel. The painted figure of the Virgin, which we saw early in the previous scene, is now set up, and the monks are singing a hymn. As they leave the chapel, the painter who was responsible for the statue takes a last look at his work. He is about to leave when he catches sight of Jean, coming in with his tumbler's gear. He hides before Jean can see him, and watches while Jean prays at the altar. Jean takes off his monkish garb and arrays himself in his old clothes. He plays a few chords on his hurdy-gurdy, just as he had at his first entrance in the square – but the painter-monk waits for no more; Jean is mad, and he must run and tell the Prior.

In the meanwhile, Jean goes through his repertory, not without some lapses of memory, such as when he starts to hand round his begging bowl. He has not got very far before the Prior arrives, led by the monk who had first seen Jean at his strange occupation. Fortunately Boniface has come too, and he restrains the Prior whose immediate reaction is that Jean is committing sacrilege and must be stopped at once. Eventually Jean dances, just as the monks begin to arrive. They are all horrified by what they can see, but they stay out of sight of Jean, who goes on until he falls exhausted.

As they are about to rush forward and seize Jean as a malefactor, Boniface stops them and points to the Virgin, whose arm is miraculously extended to bless the man lying at her feet. Jean awakes from his trance to find the Prior and the others bending over him. He expects punishment, and cannot understand their talk of a miracle. With a last song of praise, he falls back dead. H.

CHÉRUBIN

Opera in three acts, text by Francis de Croisset and Henri Cain. Première at Monte Carlo, 14 February 1905, with Mary Garden as Chérubin, Lina Cavalieri as l'Ensoleillad, Marguerite Carré as Nina and Maurice Renaud as the Philosopher, conductor Jéhin. First performed at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, 1905, with Garden, Vallandri, Carré, Fugère; Covent Garden, 1994, with Susan Graham, Maria Bayo, Angela Gheorghiu, Robert Lloyd, conductor Mario Bernardi.

| | |
|---|---------------|
| Chérubin, a young man | Soprano |
| Le Philosophe, his tutor | Baritone |
| L'Ensoleillad, a Spanish dancer, the King's mistress | Soprano |
| Nina, a young girl | Soprano |
| The Count | Baritone |
| The Countess | Soprano |
| The Baron | Baritone |
| The Baroness | Mezzo-Soprano |
| The Duke | Tenor |
| Captain Ricardo | Tenor |
| The Innkeeper | Baritone |
| An Officer | Bass |

Officers, Servants, Travellers

Place: Spain, near Seville

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Massenet at the age of sixty saw a play by Francis de Croisset which so took his fancy that he determined there and then to take it for the subject of his seventeenth opera. Henri Cain, a seasoned librettist, was called in to work on adapting the text, and Prince Albert of Monaco had no difficulty in persuading Raoul Gunsbourg, general manager of the Monte Carlo Opera, to secure the opera for the Principality. It has little to do with Beaumarchais, though purporting to deal with the later adventures of the playwright's page boy, and for Massenet, though he is said to have been captivated by the subject, it is not much more than a musical confection, a soufflé – brilliant, effervescent, only occasionally verging on the sentimental. The marvel is that its tunefulness and high spirits outlasted its star-studded première and that it can be revived to give pleasure to this day.

Act I. It might almost be Offenbach or Chabrier whose prelude introduces us to Chérubin's palace, although Massenet takes over with alacrity when celebrations of the young man's military commission and his seventeenth birthday are in hand. Nina's love for him is more than a passing affair, but he looks forward to the imminent arrival of the celebrated dancer l'Ensoleillad from Madrid – the King's mistress, no less – then tells his tutor he is sad because he falls in love with every woman he meets. The Count has found a letter to his wife from Chérubin, but calls off the duel he intends when Nina convinces them all that the verses were meant for her by reciting them. Chérubin for his part enthusiastically celebrates l'Ensoleillad's arrival.

Act II. An inn. L'Ensoleillad will have the best rooms. Officers are surprised at their new recruit's small stature, but Chérubin makes a pass at Captain Ricardo's mistress before all are engulfed by the beauty of l'Ensoleillad, her dancing and singing. The tutor warns Chérubin against the dangers of his amorous life and is sent packing; his pupil entices l'Ensoleillad to walk in the garden. Baron, Count and Duke, partly from jealousy, partly because l'Ensoleillad is after all the King's mistress, try to intervene but are thwarted and find Chérubin embracing l'Ensoleillad through the bars of her window. Police arrive and arrest the outraged husbands for inciting a riot. Chérubin escapes. The women, on their balconies, faint.

Act III. Chérubin prepares for three duels and in a moment of seriousness (but not, he maintains, of sadness) draws up his will. His tutor attempts to teach him a duelling ploy but he eventually admits it was l'Ensoleillad he was last night serenading and thus avoids the duels, although he is mightily put out when l'Ensoleillad is summoned by the King back to Madrid. She for her part in a beautiful Chérubin (Covent Garden, 1994, director Tim Albery, designer Antony McDonald). Angela Gheorghiu as Nina, Susan Graham in the title role.

Aubade seems to extol one perfect night of love, but Chérubin is left disillusioned, even prepared to take his tutor's advice and wait for the kind, understanding woman who will look after him when he is in trouble – Massenet's own advice, maybe, to a young man? Or to himself?

Nina, about to retire to a convent, confesses she once loved Chérubin. He falls into her arms, taking care as he does so to pluck from his pocket the Countess's ribbon which was sticking out.

Massenet's songs, ensembles and dances, for what are for the most part puppets, are consistently graceful, though it is hard to be more than superficially involved with most of them. Nina, Chérubin and maybe the Philosopher are the exceptions: Chérubin intoxicated with women and in love with all of them; Nina transparently sincere and in love only with him; the tutor trying to bring a note of sobriety, or at least of the real world, into the madcap proceedings.

It is surely not for nothing that in the last bars Massenet quotes Don Giovanni's serenade and the tutor refers to Donna Elvira!

H.

DON QUICHOTTE

Don Quixote

Opera in five acts, text by Henri Cain, after Le Lorrain's play based on Cervantes's novel. Première Monte Carlo, 19 February 1910, with Lucy Arbell, Chaliapin, Gresse. First performed Paris, 1910, with Arbell, Vanni Marcoux, Fugère; London Opera House, 1912, with Kirlord, Lafont, Danse; New Orleans, 1912; New York, 1914, with Garden, Vanni Marcoux, Dufranne; Metropolitan, 1926, with Easton, Chaliapin, de Luca. Revived Opéra-Comique, 1931; Brussels, 1934; Opéra, Paris, 1947, with Renée Gilly, Vanni Marcoux, Musy, conductor Cluytens; Belgrade, 1956, with Čangalovič (subsequently toured all over Europe including 1962 Edinburgh Festival). Nicolai Ghiaurov and Ruggero Raimondi were responsible for a number of revivals in the 1970s and 1980s. English National Opera, 1994, with Richard Van Allan.

| | |
|--|-----------|
| La belle Dulcinée (Dulcinea) | Contralto |
| Don Quichotte (Don Quixote) | Bass |
| Sancho Panza..... | Baritone |
| Admirers of Dulcinée | |
| Pedro..... | Soprano |
| Garcias..... | Soprano |
| Rodriguez..... | Tenor |
| Juan | Tenor |
| Two Servants | Baritone |
| Ténébrun, and other Bandits; Friends of Dulcinée | |

Place: Spain

Time: The Middle Ages

Running Time: 2 hours 30 minutes

Don Quichotte was first heard two years before Massenet died, though there were four more operas to follow it, the last two posthumously. He was already ill but seems to have very much enjoyed its writing. It was the fourth of his operas to have a first hearing in Monte Carlo, and, with Chaliapin in the cast, its success was very considerable. Having said which, it would be idle to pretend that Massenet is not here a late nineteenth-century composer, making use of a very famous literary source (as had Gounod, Berlioz and Thomas before him) and turning it from a masterpiece in one sphere into a romantic opera – and perhaps a masterpiece – in another. Don Quichotte is also a work of Massenet's old age, and in it inspiration runs surely but is spread with a little more economy than in the great romantic operas of twenty years and more earlier. Nonetheless, it is a work of elegant inspiration, beautifully scored, and, in its simplicity, a by no means unworthy frame for the great figure of the title.

Act I. Outside Dulcinée's house, the fiesta is going great guns (as only French composers engaged on Spanish pastiche know how) and her four admirers (two of them travesti roles) are much to the fore. Will she desert her latest lover and devote herself to them? 'Quand la femme a vingt ans' (When a girl is but twenty) she sings provocatively from her balcony. Rodriguez and Juan stay behind to muse on Dulcinée's charms and the need to enjoy them briefly, then notice the imminent arrival of Don Quichotte. Juan mocks his bizarre appearance and behaviour but Rodriguez perceives the sincerity and benevolence behind the bizarre exterior. The crowd rejoice at the appearance of the Knight of the Long Countenance and Sancho Panza on their redoubtable steeds, and Don Quichotte, lance in air, distributes what little money they have to the delighted populace, whose mockery is full of high spirits and more than a trace of affection.

Don Quichotte blows a kiss towards Dulcinée's window, but Sancho murmurs of thirst and his determination to assuage it at the inn. Don Quichotte is not to be put down and, sending Sancho ahead, proceeds to serenade his lady love: 'Quand apparaissent les étoiles', a gently graceful melody heard later as a symbol of Don Quichotte's unquestioning love. He brushes aside the interruptions of Juan, finishes the song to such effect that Dulcinée from her balcony joins her voice to his, and draws his sword to avenge the earlier insult. Only Dulcinée's tactful flattery in admiring the verses he has previously flung up at her window saves the day, and Don Quichotte easily falls to her blandishments, vowing to recover the necklace she says she lost recently to the bandit Ténébrun. As the others go, the Don hums his serenade to himself, only in his turn to hear Dulcinée's voice in the distance.

Act II. Early morning mist in the country. Don Quichotte searches his mind for rhymes for his song in Dulcinée's honour. Sancho remembers warily the disastrous exploit of yesterday, when the Don charged and routed a flock of sheep and some little black pigs. In any event, Sancho resents being out in the country looking for a mythical bandit simply because Dulcinée took it into her head to ask his master to do so. He launches into a tirade against women in general but Don Quichotte has no time to pay heed as at this moment he catches sight of great giants on the plain. That Sancho thinks them windmills weighs with him not at all and he sets his lance and charges. The curtain falls as he spurs on Rosinante, then rises again to reveal him caught up in the windmill by the seat of his breeches.

Act III follows a gently lyrical entr'acte based on the serenade. Don Quichotte is on all fours examining the ground for tracks of the bandits. Sancho finds it a creepy place, but Don Quichotte will go nowhere except forward to glory. It is not long before the bandits appear, heard first in the distance as they half-heartedly pursue the fleeing Sancho. The band easily overpower Don Quichotte, but for all the fun they make of him, the bandit chief senses something different in his impassive gaze. Don Quichotte prays, then in answer to a question, puts forward his creed of knight errantry: 'Je suis le chevalier errant'; to redress wrongs, to love the poor – even to honour bandits when they are proud of bearing. So moved are the bandits by his strange utterance that they return the jewellery they had stolen, then leave extolling the Knight of the Long Countenance.

Act IV. Dulcinée in her garden is surrounded by admirers but remains pensive and impervious to their compliments. She dreams, she says, of a love of another kind, but the frenzied dancing starts again and Dulcinée changes to a livelier mood. Sancho formally announces his master and he and Don Quichotte wait for the appearance of Dulcinée who greets them playfully but is delighted at the reappearance of her necklace. His reward is a kiss which impels Don Quichotte to express his love extravagantly ('Marchez dans mon chemin'), finishing with a request that Dulcinée become his wife. This provokes a burst of laughter, but Dulcinée attempts to let her beau down lightly, dismissing everyone else and, when they are alone, saying it is her affection for the old man which prevents her accepting his offer. Let him abuse her, but let him stay with them, the same as ever. Their voices join together for a moment and Dulcinée kisses Don Quichotte on the forehead, before the others return. Mockery starts again, but Dulcinée will have none of it ('C'est un fou sublime': He is a madman of genius) and leaves. Their laughter is too much for Sancho, who turns on them and lashes them with his tongue ('Ça, vous commettez tous un acte épouvantable'), before embracing his old master.

Act V. An interlude takes us into the forest, the cello solo developing a tune which will become important before the short act is over. It is a starlit night, and Don Quichotte rests upright against a tree, watched over by Sancho, plainly overcome at the prospect of his master's death. The Don expects Sancho to be dreaming already of his native village, but bids him spare a thought for the master who fought only for good. Then he thinks of the presents with which he meant to reward Sancho's faithful service – castles, islands – but when Sancho tries to remove his armour, he demurs. He stares at a star, before the voice of Dulcinée singing the cello tune comes with a little magic to illuminate his last moments. That Massenet's sense of music theatre was just as sure in his late sixties as it had been at the time of Manon, more than twenty-five years before, is well demonstrated in this death scene, economical, understated, and going straight to the emotional heart of the matter.

H.

PETER MAXWELL DAVIES

See under Davies

RICHARD MEALE

(born 24 August 1932)

VOSS

Opera in two acts, text by David Malouf from the novel by Patrick White. Première, Adelaide Festival, 1 March 1986, by Australian Opera, with Marilyn Richardson, Geoffrey Chard, conductor Stuart Challender.

The expedition

Johann Ulrich Voss, a German explorer Baritone
Frank Le Mesurier, a gentleman Tenor
Palfreyman, a naturalist Baritone

Judd, an ex-convict Bass-Baritone
Harry Robarts, a young man Tenor
Dugald and Jacky, Aboriginal guides Mime

In Sydney

Mr Bonner, a merchant, backer of the expedition Bass
Mrs Bonner, his wife Mezzo-Soprano
Belle Bonner, their daughter Soprano
Laura Trevelyan, their niece Soprano
Rose Portion, a servant Soprano

Lt. Tom Radclyffe, officer, engaged to Belle.....Tenor
 Mr Topp, *Voss's landlord, a music teacher*Tenor Mercy, Rose's child, adopted by Laura.....Soprano
 A ReporterTenor
 A PhotographerMime

Outside Sydney

Mrs JuddContralto

Guests, Children

Place: Sydney and Central Australia

Time: 1845 and 1865

Running Time: 2 hours

Richard Meale's education in Sydney seems to have been surprisingly general for someone who was to become one of Australia's leading composers, but study in Los Angeles preceded success at the I.S.C.M. Festival of 1960 in Amsterdam with his Flute Sonata. Later he came to be regarded as the leading avant-gardist in Australia, and was appointed to the University of Adelaide in 1969. He was commissioned to write for Australian Opera and the resulting work was seen at the 1986 Adelaide Festival, where it enjoyed considerable success.

The story-line from Patrick White's novel is simple: the German explorer, Voss, is determined to be the first man to cross the Australian continent. Bonner backs him and at a party he is introduced to Bonner's niece, Laura Trevelyan, who is his equal in temperament and determination. The expedition ends in disaster but Laura and Voss enter into a relationship, mostly by correspondence, which takes no account of time or space but stands as effectively the one monument to the great enterprise.

Act I. Crashing chords introduce Voss. Guests dance at Bonner's house. Voss is a dreamer but that seems not to worry Bonner; the other guests cannot take it all quite so seriously.

In the garden, Belle thinks she is in love with Tom Radclyffe, but Laura dreams of Voss, with whose destiny, like Senta's with the Flying Dutchman (as her aria explains), she feels involved. Voss responds, sings a German song, and they part with a bond established, Laura singing his names as if they were talismanic.

Voss gathers his band: Harry Robarts, the young man with few qualifications but enthusiasm; Le Mesurier, the idealist; Palfreyman, the naturalist. Topp, Voss's landlord, plays the flute, and his music develops into a march as they leave on the great adventure, Voss confident that Laura's prayers, as she finally admits, will follow them.

Act II. Voss sings another German song, takes on Judd as guide and two Aborigines, expert on the outback. Much of the action requires a split stage from now on; Laura and Rose sew at one side, Palfreyman is with Voss on the other, Laura affirming that she understands Voss even when she does not agree with him, the others reflecting on the beauties of nature. The colloquy between Laura and Voss, half correspondence, half thought-transference, makes one of the opera's central episodes.

Christmas Day finds the explorers preparing a feast, Laura offering to Voss as a pledge, as it were, of their 'union' the child of the dead Rose, whom she has adopted. Voss sits alone, rejects the food Judd brings him and, somehow at the same time, Laura's offering: 'I will not accept the terms.'

Voss sleepwalks, watched anxiously by Harry, more suspiciously by Judd.

Voss lies delirious – 'I do not accept the terms!' Judd plans to go back, Harry refuses to go with him, and Le Mesurier appears to have gone mad. Reality recedes, Voss and Laura appear able to offer each other strength, but the others are lost. Aborigines seem to attack them, Palfreyman is killed, Le Mesurier cuts his own throat. Harry sings a message of hope, Laura still offers comfort. Voss and Harry are at the mercy of Jacky, who kills them.

Epilogue. Twenty years later, in Tom and Belle Radclyffe's house in Sydney. Children play, guests look askance at the gaunt, black figure of Laura, who is approached by a reporter to talk about Voss, whose statue has just been unveiled. Judd is introduced, half insane, and tells a garbled tale before being led away. Mercy, Rose's child, tries to take Laura away, but she seems somehow at peace, the shadow of Voss's statue falling across her as she stands alone.

It will be apparent that the opera's emphasis is on relationships, particularly that of Voss and Laura, which gradually acquires a heroic character, not on narrative or even the geographic force natural to Australia and a story of exploration. In this respect the libretto of the distinguished Australian writer David Malouf follows the novel, at the same time stressing something which opera is well qualified to achieve.

H.

GIAN CARLO MENOTTI

(born 7 July 1911)

Gian Carlo Menotti was for nearly four decades America's most prolific operatic composer,¹ though his meteoric success of the 1940s and early 1950s was not sustained into the 1960s and 70s. His attempts at innovation, or at all events at a stylisation of traditional operatic form, in for instance The Unicorn, the Dragon, the Manticore (1958), were not widely successful, Maria Golovin (1957) met with a cold reception from critics, audiences and managements, and The Saint of Bleeker Street, for all its obvious appeal in Catholic countries, failed to duplicate the sensational success of the earlier Medium or Consul.

As a child in Italy, Menotti was taken by his nurse to a shrine, and a little later his crippled leg was found to be cured. It can be seen therefore that, just as The Medium stemmed from the vivid impressions of a real-life experience of a séance, so even the most successful of his later operas, Amahl and Bleeker Street, owe a good deal to experiences towards which Menotti's attitude is, to say the least of it, ambivalent. H.

AMELIA AL BALLO

Amelia Goes to the Ball

Opera in one act, text by the composer. Première (in English translation by G. Meade), Philadelphia, 1 April 1937, conductor Reiner. First performed at Metropolitan Opera, New York (in English), 1938, with Muriel Dickson, Chamlee, Brownlee, Cordon, conductor Panizza; San Remo, 1938 (in Italian), with Rosina Torri, Ugo Cantelmo, Luigi Borgonovo, Roberto Silva, conductor Votto; Berlin, 1947, with Irma Beilke, Kurt Rehm, Paul Schoeffler.

AmeliaSoprano
 Her HusbandBaritone
 Her LoverTenor
 Her FriendContralto
 The Commissioner of PoliceBass
 First MaidMezzo-Soprano
 Second MaidMezzo-Soprano

Neighbours, Passers-By, Policeman

Place: The Luxurious Bedroom of Amelia

Time: Early Twentieth Century

Running Time: 50 minutes

A lively prelude is dominated by a lyrical andante passage which refers to the trio in the second half of the work. The curtain rises as Amelia, wife of a wealthy, upper-middle-class citizen of a large European city, is being dressed by her two maids for the first ball of the season, while her friend sits, threatening to leave without her if she does not hurry. The two women sing a duet ('La notte, la notte') in which they agree that nothing in the world, neither love nor honour, is of the slightest importance when a woman wants to go to a ball.

Amelia's husband arrives and announces that they cannot go as he must discuss something privately with her. The others go off as Amelia furiously demands an explanation of such behaviour. The unhappy man tells her that he has found among her papers a love letter in passionate language. Amelia denies any knowledge of it, whereupon her husband reads the letter aloud to her. Now will she tell him her lover's name? 'What then?' asks Amelia anxiously, 'Shall we go to the ball?' At last she says she will divulge the name, provided her husband promises to take her to the ball. He agrees and Amelia tells him it is the gentleman upstairs on the third floor. 'When do you see him?' demands the husband. 'Only at night', replies Amelia, and when reproached for her disloyalty to her sleeping husband retorts that, since sleeping is all he ever does do in bed, her infidelity is less than surprising.

Her husband puts on his top hat and coat and hurries to the door. Amelia is incredulous, but the husband says he will keep his promise – but first he would like to have a little chat with the gentleman on the third floor, assisted by his pistol; they can go dancing while her lover patches up his punctured skull.

Amelia reflects irritably that once the men begin to fight she will never get to the ball. She runs out on to the balcony to call to her lover to climb down the lattice and thus avoid her husband. While she waits for him, she sings a romanza – men demand impossible boons, but all she wants is to go to the ball.

¹ Though continuing to think of himself as an Italian.

The lover arrives (by rope), full of ideas about defending Amelia against her husband until he hears about the pistol, when he suggests an immediate elopement. The husband comes in, furious at being balked of revenge. 'So, we can go now?' asks Amelia. The husband agrees in the interests of peace to take her to the ball. He notices the rope on the balcony and discovers the hidden man; he aims and fires, only to be rewarded by a loud but unlethal click. The lover advances menacingly, but the husband reasons with him and the two sit down to discuss the situation in a calm masculine manner.

After the lover's sentimental romanza ('Fu di notte'), discussion is renewed, to the mounting fury of Amelia. There follows the trio referred to in the prelude, in which action is interrupted for the three to sing directly to the audience ('Chi può saper?' – 'Who knows right from wrong?').

When Amelia, exasperated beyond measure, asks her husband, 'For the last time, will you take me to the ball, yes or no?' and he refuses, she snatches up a vase and hits him over the head with it. He collapses and Amelia, horrified, shouts for help.

To the sound of a short orchestral interlude, a crowd of neighbours and passers-by gather, intent on discovering what has happened. Eventually the Chief of Police himself arrives. Amelia at her most bewitching flatters him and tells him that her husband was assaulted by a robber – she points to her lover who, despite his protests, is dragged off to prison. An ambulance takes away the husband, who, the Police Chief assures Amelia, will soon recover. 'I know,' says that single-minded lady. 'But who will take me to the ball now?' As the chorus sings the moral – when a woman sets her heart on going to a ball, that's where she'll go – the Chief of Police is preparing to transform himself into a gallant escort, and so bring to its ordained end one of Menotti's least pretentious but most sparkling and appreciable scores.

H.

THE MEDIUM

Opera in two acts, text by the composer. Première, Brander Matthews Theatre, Columbia University, 8 May 1946, with Evelyn Keller, Claramae Turner, conductor Luening. First performed New York (revised, and sponsored by Ballet Society), 1947, with Keller, Marie Powers, conducted by Barzin; London, Aldwych Theatre, 1948, with Powers, conductor Balaban; Genoa, 1950, with Pederzini, conductor Sanzogno; Venice, Bari, Palermo, Turin, 1951–52, each time with Pederzini; Paris, Opéra-Comique, 1968, with Eliane Lublin, Denise Scharley.

Monica, daughter of Madame Flora Soprano
Toby, a mute Dancer
Madame Flora (Baba), a medium Contralto
Mrs Gobineau Soprano
Mr Gobineau Baritone
Mrs Nolan Mezzo-Soprano

Place: U.S.A.

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 50 minutes

Of The Medium, the composer himself has written (in notes to a complete gramophone recording): 'Despite its eerie setting and gruesome conclusions, The Medium is actually a play of ideas. It describes the tragedy of a woman caught between two worlds, a world of reality which she cannot wholly comprehend, and a supernatural world in which she cannot believe. Baba, the Medium, has no scruples in cheating her clients ... until something happens which she herself has not prepared. This insignificant incident ... shatters her self-assurance, and drives her almost insane with rage.' He goes on to explain that the idea for the opera came to him in 1936 when he was asked to go to a séance by some friends. It was not so much his own scepticism that struck him as the way his friends were pathetically anxious to believe that the spirit of their dead daughter was talking to them through the medium.

Act I. Madame Flora's parlour. A puppet-theatre in one corner of the room. In a corner a tiny statue of the Virgin. Toby is kneeling near a trunk from which he takes out bits of stuff and improvises a costume. Monica combs her hair and sings to herself. She tells him he is the King of Babylon, and they bow to each other. Madame Flora enters: 'How many times I've told you not to touch my things ... Is anything ready? Of course not.' Monica calms her mother, and they prepare for the séance, Monica putting on a white dress and veil, and Toby testing the various devices hidden in the puppet-theatre.

The clients arrive. One of them has not been before, but the others, who have been coming for two years, tell her how wonderful Madame Flora is. Mrs Gobineau talks about her little child who was drowned in a fountain in their garden in France. The séance begins. All the lights, except the candle in front of the Madonna, are put out, and they sit round the table, their hands touching. Baba moans, and Monica slowly appears in a faint blue light, singing 'Mother, mother, are you there?' Mrs Nolan is convinced it is her daughter, and she asks her various simple questions, which are answered to her satisfaction. Monica asks her about a gold locket, but it appears she has never had one, and immediately the apparition starts to disappear.

Monica next imitates the sound of a child laughing, for the benefit of the Gobineaus. Suddenly, Baba shouts hysterically, and turns on the light. 'Who touched me?' They try to reassure her but she sends them away. As they go they sing a trio: 'But why be afraid of our dead?'

Baba is in a paroxysm of fear, and she seizes Toby from the puppet-theatre, and tries to blame the whole phenomenon on him. Monica takes her away and soothes her with an extended melody, which Toby accompanies on a tambourine: 'O black swan, where, oh where, is my lover gone?' Baba suddenly thinks she can hear voices, and sends Toby to see what is there; when he indicates there was nothing, she falls on her knees and prays.

Act II. Evening, a few days later. Monica sits in front of the puppet-theatre watching a performance which Toby is giving. She applauds, and then sings while he dances barefoot round the room. The dance becomes a sort of love duet, in which Monica sings for both and Toby mimes his part. She has guessed his love for her, and tries to divert it into play-acting, which she knows he enjoys.

Baba drags herself up the stairs, and Toby retreats into a corner before she gets into the room. Baba questions Toby about the incident of a few days back; did he touch her throat? Was he the one? She cannot get him to admit it, tries to keep her temper, then loses it hopelessly, seizes a whip and beats the unfortunate boy unmercifully. The doorbell rings, and the Gobineaus and Mrs Nolan enter. Is it not the night of the séance? Yes, she says; but there will be no more – they were all frauds. She wants to give them their money back, but they will not admit they have been cheated. Nothing will convince them, and they beg for another séance, until Madame Flora loses her temper suddenly and yells to them to get out. She tries to send Toby too, but Monica pleads for him, helpless as he is. Baba however is insistent.

The voices come back to Baba. In desperation she goes to the cupboard and pours herself several drinks. 'Afraid? Am I afraid?' she asks herself. She passes her life in review, and thinks of the horrible things she has known; then tries to comfort herself with the song of the black swan. For a moment she prays for forgiveness; then falls asleep, exhausted.

Toby comes up the stairwell, tiptoes across to Monica's room, finds the door locked, and hides behind the sofa when Baba stirring in her sleep knocks the bottle over. He starts to look in the trunk, but the lid falls with a bang, Baba wakes up with a start, and Toby hides behind the puppet-theatre. She yells 'Who's there?' but gets no answer, and taking out a revolver from a drawer shoots hysterically at the curtain. There is a moment of stillness, then a spot of blood appears on the white curtain. 'I've killed the ghost,' says Baba. Toby's hands clutch the side of the screen, which collapses with his weight, and he falls dead into the room. 'I've killed the ghost,' says Baba, as Monica pounds on the door to be let out: 'I've killed the ghost.' H.

THE TELEPHONE

Opera buffa in one act, text by the composer. Première, Heckscher Theater, New York, 18 February 1947, with Marilyn Cotlow, Paul Kwartin, conductor Barzin. First performed New York, Ethel Barrymore Theater, 1947, with Cotlow, Rogier, conductor Balaban; London, Aldwych Theatre, 1948, conductor Balaban; Zürich, 1949, with Oravez, Rehfuss; Hamburg, 1952, with Rothenberger, Günther; Sadler's Wells, 1959, with Bronhill, Sharp, conductor Alexander Gibson; Paris, Opéra-Comique, 1968, with Berton, J.C. Benoît.

LucySoprano
BenBaritone

Place: U.S.A.

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 20 minutes

Most performances of The Medium, at any rate those in English, have been preceded by performances of The Telephone, the little comedy Menotti wrote for the Ballet Society's first New York presentation of The Medium. But The Telephone would appear to have a life of its own, and it makes a capital curtain-raiser, a modern intermezzo as it were, in the style of Wolf-Ferrari's Il Segreto di Susanna.

The scene is Lucy's apartment. The opening music clearly indicates the opera buffa nature of the ensuing work. Lucy is busy opening a parcel which Ben has just handed her. 'Oh, just what I wanted,' she exclaims, as she unwraps a piece of abstract sculpture. Ben has something to tell her, he says, before his train goes in an hour's time. He seems to be reaching the point, when the telephone rings. Lucy answers it in a little arietta which seems to comprise all the things she always says to all her friends on the telephone.

Ben is about to start again, is again interrupted, but this time it turns out to be a wrong number. An unfortunate mention of the time prompts Lucy to dial TIM, to discover that it is 'four-fifteen and three and a half seconds'. Another attempt is frustrated by another peal of the telephone bell. This time the conversation is fast and furious, and Lucy seems to quarrel with a boyfriend. Ben comforts her, but she goes off to her bedroom to get a handkerchief. Ben thinks wryly of the impossible rival he has to face, with its 'hundreds of lives and miles of umbilical cord'. He is about to cut the line when the telephone rings loudly and desperately ('like a child crying for help,' says the libretto), and Lucy comes in and takes it protectively in her arms.

Lucy must make a call to tell her friend Pamela about the quarrel with George. Again the conversation makes an arietta, but this time Ben's voice joins in underneath Lucy's, complaining that he will never get the chance to say what he wants to say. He goes out, much to Lucy's surprise ('I have a feeling he had something on his mind'). At one side of the stage Ben now becomes visible dialling in a telephone box. Presently Lucy's bell rings, and she is confident it must be him. This time he gets the proposal in early, and is immediately accepted. Lucy demands only one thing: that he shall not forget ... What? asks Ben; her hands, her eyes, her lips? No, her number, exclaims Lucy, and the opera ends in a skittish waltz tune, in which Ben promises never to forget her number. She dictates it to him ... H.

THE CONSUL

Opera in three acts, text by the composer. Première, Philadelphia, 1 March 1950, with Neway, Powers, Lane, Marlo, MacNeil, Lishner, McKinley, Jongeyans, conductor Lehman Engel. First performed New York, 1951, by same cast; Cambridge Theatre, London, 1951, with Neway, Powers, Lane, Lishner, Kelly, conductor Schippers; Hamburg, 1951, with Mödl, Koegel, Wasserthal, Ilosvay; Zürich, 1951, with Schulz, Malaniuk, conductor Reinshagen; la Scala, Milan, 1951, with Petrella, Powers, conductor Sanzogno; Vienna, 1951, with Zadek, Schürhoff, Rohs, Braun, Jerger, Szemere, Rus, conductor Zallinger; Berlin, 1951, and Munich, 1952, with Borkh; Sadler's Wells, 1954, with Shuard; New York City Opera, 1960, with Neway.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| John Sorel..... | Baritone |
| Magda Sorel, his wife | Soprano |
| The Mother | Contralto |
| Secret Police Agent | Bass |
| First and Second Plain-Clothes Men | Silent |
| The Secretary | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Mr Kofner..... | Bass-Baritone |
| The Foreign Woman | Soprano |
| Anna Gomez..... | Soprano |
| Vera Boronel..... | Contralto |
| The Magician (Nika Magadoff)..... | Tenor |
| Assan, friend of John Sorel | Baritone |
| Voice on the Record..... | Soprano |

Place: Somewhere in Europe

Time: After World War II

Running Time: 1 hour 55 minutes

Menotti's first full-length opera deals with a subject which was familiar to every member of every one of its early non-English-speaking audiences. Its immediate success was perhaps due as much to the grippingly theatrical nature of its story as to a corresponding power in its music.

The country in which the action takes place is not identified, any more than is the consulate whose secretary is the embodiment of every form-ridden bureaucrat in every big city in the world.

Act I. The home of John Sorel. It is early morning. The sound of a gramophone record is heard coming from a café across the street: 'Tu reviendras ...' Suddenly the door is flung open and Sorel staggers into the room and throws himself into a chair. Magda runs to him and immediately starts to bandage the wound which she sees in his leg. He tells her and the Mother the story: there was a secret meeting, the police had been tipped off and shot at them as they made their escape across the roofs, wounding him and killing another. Magda looks out of the window and sees the police. John is helped towards the window, and goes to what is obviously an agreed hiding-place, leaving his wife and her mother to tidy up the room in preparation for the questioning which must shortly follow.

As the secret police agents enter, the Mother is rocking the cradle, in which lies the little child of Magda and John. She sings a mournful lament for the peace which has vanished from their lives: 'Shall we ever see the end of all this?' The agent starts to question Magda. His threats are not just those of a bully, but carry potential danger in them: 'Courage is often a lack of imagination. We have strange ways to make people talk. Oh, not at all the way you think ... People like you can defy strength, but not the beat of your own heart.'

The agents leave, and John comes down from his hiding-place; he must get away. He tells them that the signal which shall tell them that there is a message from him will be the breaking of their window by a stone. They are then to send for Assan, the glass-cutter, who will bring them news. Magda and John say goodbye and their duet becomes a trio when the Mother joins her voice with theirs.

Scene ii. The cheerless waiting-room of the Consulate, in one corner of which is the Secretary's desk, and behind it a door leading to the Consul's room. Mr Kofner comes forward to renew his application for a visa; he has everything now ... but the photographs turn out to be the wrong size. A 6/8 allegretto movement suggests the monotonous, automatic nature of the dealings between applicant and Secretary. The Foreign Woman comes up to the desk and starts to make an enquiry. She does not know the Secretary's language, but Mr Kofner volunteers to act as interpreter. It appears that her daughter ran away with a soldier, who has now left her with a three-month-old baby. The daughter is ill and needs her mother's help; can she have a visa to visit her? Yes, says the Secretary; if she fills out the forms and her application is accepted, she may be able to leave in a couple of months' time. She is stunned by this information, but Mr Kofner leads her away to fill in the forms.

Magda advances to the desk. The dialogue between her and the Secretary is typical of Menotti's style:

MAGDA: May I speak to the Consul?

SECRETARY: No one is allowed to speak to the Consul, the Consul is busy.

MAGDA: Tell him my name.

SECRETARY: Your name is a number.

MAGDA: But my name is Sorel, Magda Sorel. The wife of Sorel, the lover of freedom.

SECRETARY: Sorel is a name and a name is a number.

MAGDA: May I speak to the Consul?

SECRETARY: No one is allowed to speak to the Consul, the Consul is busy.

The duet gains in intensity: 'Explain to the Consul, explain ... that the web of my life has worn down to one single thread ...' But it is still a question of filling in forms and making applications in the customary manner. Nika Magadoff comes forward and starts to do some simple conjuring tricks in an effort to impress the Secretary with his bona fides, but a slow ensemble begins ('In endless waiting-rooms'), and he joins in it. As the curtain falls, it has become a quintet in which Magda, Anna Gomez, Vera Boronel, the Magician and Mr Kofner express frustration.

Act II, scene i. Sorel's house, a month later. The same record is being played in the café opposite. Magda and her Mother are discussing the possibility of getting a visa. The Mother tries to cheer up the little baby. She sings him a lullaby, and, after Magda has fallen asleep in a chair, goes out. Magda in a nightmare sees John and the Secretary, whom he introduces as his sister. Magda is terrified of her, more particularly since John seems drawn to her. The nightmare comes to an end with a horrible vision of a dead child.

Magda wakes up with a scream, and is comforted by her mother. Suddenly, a stone shatters the glass of the window, and Magda rushes to the telephone to carry out John's instructions. There is a knock at the door, which opens to reveal the Secret Police Agent. He starts to insinuate that there would be no obstacle to her joining her husband if she would only give him the little information about her husband's friends which he wants. She loses control and yells at him to get out, and threatens to kill him if he returns. Assan arrives to mend the window.

Assan tells Magda that John is still hiding in the mountains, and will not leave the country until he knows that his wife has a visa and can follow him. She says that he must be told that arrangements are complete; it is not true, but there is no other way of compelling him to save his own life. Assan agrees to do as he is asked.

During the scene between Magda and Assan, the Mother suddenly realises that the little half-starved child has died quietly in his sleep. She gives no sign to Magda, but remains quite still by the cradle, not rocking it, not singing to the child. As soon as she looks at her, Magda knows what has happened. She stops her mother weeping, but the Mother says she is thinking of John, 'who will never see his baby again'.

Scene ii, in the Consulate, a few days later. The Secretary is standing by the filing-cabinet, Anna Gomez, the Magician, Vera Boronel, Mr Kofner, and the Foreign Woman are waiting. Magda asks to jump the queue, but the Magician explains that he has been seven times to the Consulate, and always when his turn came it was time for the Consulate to close; he must take his turn now. He again demonstrates his professional powers of conjuring and of hypnotism, much to the Secretary's dismay. He puts all the occupants of the waiting-room in a trance, and then makes them dance happily together, until the Secretary becomes quite desperate. She begs Magadoff to return everyone to normal, which done, he leaves the room.

The others allow Magda to go ahead of them. She is frantic with worry and demands to see the Consul but is again refused. Finally, she can bear it no more, and throws self-control to the winds, launching out into a denunciation of the bureaucratic system and the injustice it leads to. The rest of the act is given up to a scena for Magda, with interruptions from the Secretary and the others: 'To this we've come: that men withhold the world from men.' Her passionate indignation is finally summed up in a brave phrase: 'Oh, the day will come, I know, when our hearts aflame will burn your paper chains. Warn the Consul, Secretary ...'

The Secretary cannot conceal her own feelings, although she does her best: 'You're being very unreasonable, Mrs Sorel.' She goes into the Consul's office, saying that she will ask if he can see her just a minute. The improbable happens when she comes out and informs Magda that she may go in when the important visitor who is with him has left. Anticipation rises as two shadows are seen on the glass panel of the door. The visitor shakes hands, but, when he turns into the room, he is seen to be the Secret Police Agent. Magda faints.

Act III, scene i. The Consulate. Magda is waiting to see the Consul, in spite of the Secretary's warning that the place will be closed in ten minutes' time. Vera Boronel comes in, states her name, and is greeted with something like pleasure by the Secretary; at last there is somebody to whom she can give good news – her papers are through!

Assan hurries in, looking for Magda. John has heard that his child and the Mother are dead, and intends to come back over the frontier to fetch his wife. Magda and Assan try to think of a way of convincing him that he must not come back. Magda thinks she knows one, and writes a note which she confides to Assan, refusing however to tell him what she has written.

Everyone leaves, and the Secretary is about to leave when John rushes into the room, looking behind him to see that he is not being followed. He asks if Magda has been there, and is told he may still catch up with her if he hurries after her. But that he cannot do, he protests, since he was followed to the Consulate by the police, who will not allow him to leave. At that moment, a confused noise is heard outside, and the Secret Police Agent comes in, followed by two plain-clothes men. When the Secretary protests that no arrest can be made in the Consulate, the Secret Agent says that Sorel will be coming with him of his own free will, not as an arrested man.

As they leave, the Secretary dials furiously, and when the curtain goes up again on scene ii, after an interlude based on a march rhythm, the telephone can be heard ringing in Magda's room, which she presently enters, though only after the bell is silent. She makes preparations to commit suicide, and turns on the gas.

As she bends over towards the stove with a shawl over her head, the walls dissolve and figures from the Consulate appear, looking exactly as Magda has known them there. Behind them are John and the Mother. Gradually the figures disappear, and all that can be heard is the sound of Magda's deep breathing. Suddenly the telephone begins to ring. Magda stretches out her hand as if to answer it, but her reaction is feeble, and she falls inert over the chair, while the telephone bell continues to ring. The curtain falls as the orchestra gives out the tune associated with Magda's protest at the end of Act II. H.

AM AHL AND THE NIGHT VISITORS

Opera in one act, libretto by the composer. Originally written for television. Première, N.B.C. studios, New York, 24 December 1951, with Rosemary Kuhlmann and Chet Allen, conductor Schippers. First stage performance, Indiana University, Bloomington, 21 February 1952, conductor Ernest Hoffmann. First performed New York, City Center, 1952; Florence Festival, 1953, with Simionato, Alvaro Cordova, Lazzari, Capecchi, Corena, conductor Stokowski. B.B.C. Television, 1967, with Cantelo; Hamburg State Opera, 1968–69, with Kerstin Meyer; Geneva, 1971, with Kerstin Meyer; Vienna State Opera, 1980, with Helga Dernesch. Frequently performed in Italy, the United States and the United Kingdom.

Amahl, a crippled boy of about twelve.....Treble
 His MotherSoprano
 King Kaspar.....Tenor
 King MelchiorBaritone
 King BalthazarBass
 The PageBaritone
 Shepherds, Villagers, Dancers

Running Time: 45 minutes

After a few introductory bars the curtain rises to show the outside of a little shepherd's hut, where Amahl sits playing his pipe. Beside him is his home-made crutch. His mother calls him in. He makes one excuse after another to stay outside, and even after his mother loses her patience he tries to persuade her to go out to look at the beautiful sky and the brilliant new star – 'as large as a window and with a glorious tail'. She thinks it is another of his stories and scolds him for lying, but eventually breaks down in tears at the prospect of going out begging next day. They say goodnight and go to bed.

In the distance can be heard the voices of the three Kings. As they draw near, their way is lit by their black Page, bowed under the weight of rich-looking bundles, everything from a jewel box to a parrot in a cage. They stop at Amahl's home and King Melchior knocks. Amahl goes to the door and scurries back to his mother. Three times she thinks he is lying, but eventually she follows him to the door, the Kings bid her a grave good evening, and she for her part offers her meagre hospitality to the splendid visitors.

To a jaunty march, the Kings make their way into the hut. As the Page spreads out the treasures on a rug, the woman goes off to look for firewood, telling Amahl not to pester their visitors. As soon as she is out of the way, Amahl goes straight to the Nubian King Balthazar and bombards him with questions, meanwhile looking out of the corner of his eye at Kaspar, who is feeding his parrot with bits of food from his pocket. Amahl cannot resist Kaspar's eccentricity. Kaspar however is deaf and things do not warm up until Amahl asks what is in the box, whereupon Kaspar becomes enthusiastic and shows Amahl the precious stone he keeps against all kinds of misfortune. When his mother scolds him for being a nuisance, Amahl protests: 'It's not my fault; they kept asking me questions.'

Amahl goes off to fetch the other shepherds and the Kings tell his mother that they are looking for the Child, and in an andante describe their vision. In her mind the mother identifies the Child with her own son.

The shepherds' calls are heard. As they approach, led by Amahl, they sing a bright pastoral unaccompanied chorus. When they reach the door of the hut with their baskets of fruit and vegetables they are struck dumb by the splendour of the Kings, but the mother urges them to come in and shyly they present their humble gifts. The Kings thank them, and the mother asks the young people to dance for her guests. After some persuasion they do so, at first slowly and formally but gradually accelerating into a kind of tarantella.

Balthazar thanks the dancers and they file out, bowing to the Kings. As their song grows fainter, Amahl wistfully asks Kaspar if he has perhaps a magic stone to cure a crippled boy. But Kaspar, as usual, does not hear properly and Amahl goes sadly to his straw bed.

They all settle down for the night, the Kings sitting side by side on the bench and the Page lying at their feet, his arms round the precious gifts. Time passes, dawn breaks. Everyone is asleep except the mother, who sings of the unfairness of all this wealth going to an unknown child while her own is starving. She takes hold of one of the bundles and the Page wakes up. The noise of their struggle disturbs Amahl who flings himself at the Page, beating him and pulling his hair in a desperate attempt to rescue his mother. Kaspar orders the Page to release the woman, and King Melchior says she may keep the gold as the Child they seek has no need of it.

The mother is enthralled with Melchior's glowing description and begs him to take back the gold – were she not so poor she would herself send a gift to the Child. Amahl wants to send his crutch. He lifts it and then, to everyone's amazement, takes a step without it. For a moment no one believes the miracle, then the Kings give thanks to God, as Amahl dances and leaps about the room until at last he falls down. One at a time the Kings ask Amahl to let them touch him. When the Page in his turn asks, Amahl, a little self-importantly, at first refuses but, at a sign from his mother, relents. Amahl begs to be allowed to go with the Kings to give the crutch to the Child and when the Kings join their voices to his, the mother gives her permission. With a wealth of maternal advice to sustain him, Amahl sets off with the Kings and, as the procession moves away, he plays on his pipe the tune which began the opera. H.

THE SAINT OF BLEECKER STREET

Opera in three acts, text by the composer. Première, Broadway Theater, New York, 27 December 1954, with Virginia Copeland, Gloria Lane, David Poleri, conductor Thomas Schippers. First performed la Scala, Milan, 1955, with Eugenia Ratti, Gloria Lane, David Poleri, conductor Schippers; Volksoper, Vienna, 1955, conductor Hollreiser; England, B.B.C. Television, 1957, with Virginia Copeland, Rosalind Elias, Raymond Nilsson; New York City Opera, 1964–65, with Joan Sena, Beverly Wolff, Muriel Greenspon, Enrico Di Giuseppe; Spoleto, 1968, with Maria Mirandara, Gloria Lane, Anna Assandri, Franco Bonisolli, conductor Schippers.

| | |
|--|---------------|
| Assunta | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Carmela | Soprano |
| Maria Corona, a newspaper-seller | Soprano |
| Her Son, sixteen years old and dumb | Silent |
| Don Marco, a priest | Bass |
| Annina | Soprano |
| Michele, her brother | Tenor |
| Desideria, Michele's mistress | Mezzo-Soprano |
| Salvatore | Baritone |
| A Young Man | Tenor |
| Neighbours, Wedding-Guests, etc. | |

Place: A Quarter of New York known as Little Italy

Time: 'The Present'

Running Time: 2 hours

An overture establishes the atmosphere of feverish religiosity; a cold-water flat in Bleeker Street on Good Friday afternoon as a crowd of neighbours wait for Annina. She is a frail, religious girl, subject to mysterious visions.

The crowd is impatient to be blessed by the girl, whom they consider a saint; the hubbub is broken by the sudden appearance of the priest Don Marco, who announces that the vision has begun. At first Annina lies motionless, then suddenly cries out in pain, and begins a detailed description of the Crucifixion; on her hands appear the bleeding stigmata. Don Marco and Carmela try to fend off the hysterical neighbours, but the crowd falls back at the sight of Michele, Annina's brother, who drives them away. With Carmela's help, he carries Annina back into her room, then reproaches the priest, saying her visions are mental delusions. Don Marco warns Michele that his adversary is not a priest but God himself.

Scene ii. An empty lot on Mulberry Street, flanked by tenement houses, from one of which can be heard the voice of Assunta singing a lullaby to her child. On the steps, Annina and her best friend Carmela are sewing gold paper stars on to the white gown of little Concettina, who is to be an angel in the forthcoming procession of San Gennaro, to which Annina says her brother will not let her go. When Carmela tells Annina that she is to be married and so they will not be able to take the veil together as they had planned, Annina says she will gladly go to Carmela's wedding if Carmela will come to hers when she becomes a nun. Assunta laughs at Carmela's dreams of happiness. What is heaven like, they ask Annina. Saint Michael once, says Annina, took her in a dream to the gates of Paradise, and the three are singing in wonder at this splendid vision when Maria Corona rushes in, warning Annina that the Sons of Gennaro refuse to have their procession without their 'Little Saint' and are threatening to take her by force. Annina says she is not afraid. Maria Corona confesses that she once doubted Annina's miracles, but since she touched her son, dumb since birth, he has begun to speak – he is grunting pathetically when Michele enters and angrily sends the women away.

There is an extended scene for Annina and Michele. She is afraid for him, because he makes people hate him; he argues that he loves her and wants to protect her. His arguments seem useless and Michele grows desperate; she is the centre of his life, and he swears he will hide her away and that she shall never take the veil.

The procession is heard approaching. A group of young men overpower Michele, leaving him helpless as they carry the frightened Annina off to head the procession. As the last stragglers vanish, Desideria appears and unbinds Michele who bursts out sobbing. She embraces him passionately.

Act II. The following May, Carmela's marriage to Salvatore is being celebrated. Desideria comes looking for Michele; let him take her in with him to the wedding party and show he is not ashamed of her. When Michele refuses, Desideria flies into a rage. Why can't Michele leave Annina alone? He is obsessed with her, whereas Desideria and he need each other.

Michele reluctantly agrees to go in with her, but at the door they find Don Marco, who begs Michele not to cause a scandal. Michele immediately swings over to Desideria's side, shouting that she is worth more than any woman there. Annina rushes to him but he pushes her away and sings bitterly of his treatment at the hands of those whom he wished to be his friends.

Annina is distressed at the upheaval and asks Michele to take her home. Desideria suddenly appears from a corner and accuses Michele of being in love with his sister. Michele suddenly seizes a knife from the bar and stabs her in the back. He leaves Annina praying with Desideria, who dies as police sirens are heard in the distance.

Act III, scene i. In a deserted passage near a newspaper kiosk in a subway station, Annina and Maria Corona are waiting nervously for Michele. He comes in with Don Marco, and there is a tender reunion between brother and sister. Annina begs Michele to give himself up but he refuses and they comment on their terrible situation in a tragic duet. When she tells him that she is afraid of dying and is going into a nunnery, Michele is shocked and horrified. Nothing he can say affects her resolve, and the scene ends with Michele cursing her and rushing off in a rage.

Scene ii. Annina's room, a week later. She is dying and wants to take the veil immediately. She has no white dress to wear, but Carmela offers to lend her own wedding dress. A letter arrives for Don Marco – it is the Church's permission for Annina to become a nun. Annina sends everyone out except Don Marco and Carmela, and prays that death will spare her long enough to attain her great wish. As Don Marco robes for the ceremony, Assunta brings the news that Michele has been seen nearby. The ceremony proceeds calmly until at the end Michele bursts in and begs his sister to reconsider. She appears not to hear him and the ritual continues as her hair is cut off and the black veil is put on. Michele watches incredulously as Annina collapses and Don Marco places the ring on her finger just before she dies. H.

OLIVIER MESSIAEN

(born 10 December 1908, died 28 April 1992)

SAINT FRANÇOIS D'ASSISE

Scènes Franciscaines in three acts and eight scenes, libretto by the composer, based mainly on the Saint's writings. Première by the Opéra de Paris at the Palais Garnier, 28 November 1983, with Christiane Eda-Pierre as the Angel, José Van Dam as St Francis, Kenneth Riegel as the Leper, Michel Philippe as Brother Léon, Georges Gautier as Brother Massée, Michel Sénéchal as Brother Elie, Jean-Philippe Courtis as Brother Bernard, conducted by Seiji Ozawa who toured three scenes (3,7,8) in concert to Tokyo, 1986. Berlin (concert), 1986, with Fischer-Dieskau. Kent Nagano conducted a semi-staged performance of four scenes (3,6,7,8) at the Royal Festival Hall in 1988 with David Wilson-Johnson in the title role. Revived 1992 in Salzburg and Paris, conducted by Esa-Pekka Salonen, directed by Peter Sellars, with José Van Dam.

| | |
|-----------------------------------|----------|
| The Angel | Soprano |
| Saint François (St Francis) | Baritone |
| The Leper | Tenor |
| Brother Léon | Baritone |
| Brother Massée | Tenor |
| Brother Elie | Tenor |
| Brother Bernard | Bass |

Place: Assisi

Time: Thirteenth Century

Running Time: 3 hours 50 minutes

As the composer himself makes clear, his only stage work is not a conventional opera, rather, a sequence of 'scenes that show different aspects of Grace in the soul of St Francis'. 'I have always admired St Francis,' he wrote, 'first, because he's the saint who most resembles Christ and then for a wholly personal reason: he spoke to the birds, and I'm an ornithologist.'

Messiaen's opera celebrates the life and work of St Francis of Assisi, and quotes from his writings. It also comprises a whole aviary of birdsong that the composer loved, some of which the saint could never have heard in his native Umbria, such as species native to Morocco, Australia and Japan. These are faithfully recreated in the huge orchestra of 120 players. The prelude to scene vi reproduces the 'organised disorder' of a dawn concert. St François d'Assise is rather more than a hagiography or an ornithological compendium, however. Paul Griffiths points out that 'one of the attractions of birdsong for Messiaen may have been that it allowed him to abolish or ignore the distinction between reality and representation. He spoke of "trying to trace as exact as possible a musical portrait" of a bird, but the portraits he produced are icons, doing duty for the real, and in the same way Saint François is an iconic opera.'¹

Act I, scene i. The Cross. When Brother Léon admits he is frightened on the road as night falls, St François comforts him with the thought that perfect joy is not found in curing the sick, in prophesying the future, in converting others or in knowledge, but in bearing suffering patiently and cheerfully, for the love of Christ.

Scene ii. Lauds. St François prays alongside his fellow monks. Led by him, they praise God for Brother Wind, Sister Water, Brother Fire and Mother Earth. St François accepts that God created ugliness, the poisonous mushroom alongside the dragonfly; he confronts his own horror of lepers, asking God to let him meet a leper and make him capable of loving him.

Scene iii. The Kissing of the Leper. The Leper refuses to be comforted by St François. An Angel's voice is heard, promising that God is greater than the Leper's heart: he who dwells in love, dwells in Him. The Leper begs for forgiveness. St François calls him his brother, his friend, his son and asks the Leper to forgive him: he hasn't loved him enough. Suddenly, all the Leper's sores disappear: he is healed. The Choir draw the moral, 'To those who have loved greatly, all is forgiven!'

Act II, scene iv. The Journeying Angel. The Brothers fail to recognise an Angel when it knocks at the monastery door and asks them about predestination. The Vicar, Brother Elie, resents being disturbed from his writing and his planning; Brother Bernard asks the name of their visitor. Before the Angel goes to speak to St François, 'better than in words', it tells Bernard that its name is Wonderful. Bernard and Massée wonder, was this an Angel?

Scene v. The Angel-Musician. While St François is meditating on the beauty of creation and on the joy of the blessed a kestrel calls, at a time when he was not expected; the Angel appears to St François, quotes from St Thomas Aquinas and announces that God will speak to him in music 'that suspends life from the ladders of heaven'. The melody is passed between three widely spaced ondes martenot at this point, the climax of the opera. The other monks mistake François's rapture for illness. He reassures them, saying, 'If the Angel had played the viol a little longer', his soul might have left his body.

Scene vi. The Sermon to the Birds. St François preaches to the birds, those of Umbria and those he hears in his dreams, from further away. He compares their song to the Angel's music and blesses them. They fly off in four groups, forming a kind of Cross in the sky. For St François, the birds teach man to seek the kingdom of God, for then, 'the rest will be added to us'.

Act III, scene vii. The Stigmata. St François prays to feel in his body the pain Christ suffered on the Cross, as well as the love He felt for man. A Chorus speaks for Christ and promises St François, 'If you carry my Cross with a good heart, it will carry you, and lead you to the desired end.'

Scene viii. Death and the New Life. As he lies dying, St François says farewell to the birds, to Assisi and to the other monks and sings the final verses of his Cantico del sole. The Angel assures François that it will be with him when he enters Paradise, along with the Leper, who died holy. He will hear the music of the unseen. The Choir look forward to resurrection through God.

¹ Quoted from Philippe Godefroid's conversation with the composer in Paul Griffiths, 'Saint François d'Assise', The Messiaen Companion, ed. Peter Hill, London, 1995.

Messiaen anticipated that his opera would be attacked because it calls for such rich means to portray the work of a man dedicated to poverty. In answer, he pointed out that, since his infancy, St Francis had loved the beauty that surrounded him: 'he was rich in the sun, the moon, the stars, the colours of the sky, the clouds, the trees, the grass, the flowers, the sound of the wind, the force of the fire and the limpidity of water. He was rich in everything ... Far from doing him an injury, a music loud in the colours of timbres, of [varying] lengths, of sonorous complexity, seems to me, on the contrary, perfectly in accord with his true inner nature.'

For Messiaen, God speaks through music, not words. The opera makes huge demands on its soloists. Messiaen himself said that the central baritone role combines the vigour of Debussy's Golaud with the 'declamatory solemnity' of Boris Godunov.¹ It also makes considerable demands on the chorus of 150 and on its audience, since it moves slowly. It aims to recreate the divine experience, taking us through the exhilaration of nature, the leper's despair, the saint's mystic suffering to a foretaste of heavenly joy. All these are refracted through Messiaen's dazzling patterns of sound to bring us close to what is invisible, ineffable, or simply 'beyond', to quote from the title of his last major orchestral work, Eclairs sur l'au-delà. P.

¹ Idem

GIACOMO MEYERBEER

(born 5 September 1791, died 2 May 1864)

Born in Berlin, Meyerbeer, with an independent income, set out on a prolonged study of opera. He started in Germany, where he wrote his first works; from 1815 lived in Italy and wrote Italian operas in a post-Rossini style, some (e.g. Il crociato in Egitto) outstandingly successful; and from 1825 was active in Paris, where his Robert le Diable followed Spontini's Paris operas, Rossini's Guillaume Tell and Auber's La Muette de Portici in establishing spectacular opera on a grand scale as a French speciality. Though Meyerbeer wrote only four operas in this style, Les Huguenots has come to be thought of as the epitome of the genre. He exploited his talent with consummate skill, wrote as effectively for grand voices as he did for the boulevardier audience, and influenced even composers far more gifted, like Verdi and Wagner. Monumental set pieces like the duel septet, the 'Bénédiction des Poignards' and the great fourth-act duet still stir the blood of audiences grown accustomed in succeeding centuries to more direct operatic styles than Meyerbeer's.

ROBERT LE DIABLE

Robert the Devil

Opera in five acts, words by Scribe and Delavigne. Première Grand Opéra, Paris, 22 November 1831, with Dorus-Gras, Cinti-Damoreau, Nourrit, Levasseur. First performed Drury Lane, London, 1832 (in English), as The Demon, or the Mystic Branch; Covent Garden, 1832 (in English), as The Fiend Father, or Robert of Normandy; Her Majesty's Theatre, 1847 (in Italian), with Jenny Lind (her London début); New York, 1834 (in English), the opera being followed by a pas seul by Miss Wheatley, and a farce, My Uncle John; Astor Place Opera House, 1851; Academy of Music, 1857, with Formes as Bertram; Metropolitan, 1883, with Fursch-Madi, Valleria, Stagno, Mirabella. Last Covent Garden performance, 1890, with Fanny Moody, Charles Manners, conductor Arditì. Revived Florence Festival, 1968, with Scotto, Merighi, Christoff; Paris, 1985, with June Anderson, Vanzo, Samuel Ramey.

Alice, *foster-sister of Robert*Soprano
 Isabelle, *Princess of Sicily*Soprano
 The AbbessDancer
 Robert, *Duke of Normandy*Tenor
 Bertram, *the Unknown*Bass
 Raimbaut, *a minstrel*Tenor

Place: Sicily

Time: Thirteenth Century

Running Time: 4 hours

The production of Robert le Diable in Paris was such a sensational success that it made the fortune of the Grand Opéra. Whatever criticism may now be directed against this opera, it was a remarkable creation for its day. Meyerbeer's score not only saved the libretto, in which the grotesque is carried to the point of absurdity, but actually made a brilliant success of the production as a whole.

The story is legendary. Robert is the son of the arch-fiend by a human woman. Robert's father, known as Bertram, but really the devil, ever follows him about, and seeks to lure him to destruction. The strain of purity in the drama is supplied by Robert's foster-sister, Alice, who, if Bertram is the prototype of Méphistophélès in Faust, may be regarded as the original of Micaela in Carmen.

Act I. Robert, because of his evil deeds (inspired by Bertram), has been banished from Normandy, and has come to Sicily. He has fallen in love with Isabelle, she with him. He is to attend a tournament at which she is to award the prizes. Tempted by Bertram, he gambles and loses all his possessions, including even his armour. Raimbaut, the minstrel, sings of Robert's misdeeds; he is saved from the latter's fury by Alice, who is betrothed to Raimbaut, and who, in an expressive air, pleads vainly with Robert to mend his ways and especially to avoid Bertram, from whom she instinctively shrinks.

Act II. Robert and Isabelle meet in the palace. She bestows upon him a suit of armour to wear in the tournament. But, misled by Bertram, he seeks his rival elsewhere than in the lists, and by his failure to appear there, forfeits his honour as a knight.

Act III. In the cavern of St Irene. There takes place an orgy of evil spirits, to whose number Bertram promises to add Robert. Next comes a scene that verges upon the grotesque, but which is converted by Meyerbeer's genius into something highly fantastic. This is in the ruined convent of St Rosalie. In a big solo ('Nonnes, qui reposez') Bertram summons from their graves the nuns who, in life, were unfaithful to their vows. The fiend has promised Robert that if he will but seize a mystic cypress branch from over the grave of St Rosalie, and bear it away, whatever he wishes for will become his. The ghostly nuns, led by their Abbess (Taglioni at the Paris première), dance about him. They seek to inveigle him with gambling, drink, and love, until, dazed by their enticements, he seizes the branch. Besides the ballet of the nuns, there is a scene for Raimbaut and Bertram – 'Du rendezvous', and 'Le bonheur est dans l'inconstance'.

Act IV. The first use Robert makes of the branch is to effect entrance into Isabelle's chamber. He threatens to seize her and bear her away, but yields to her entreaties, breaks the branch, and destroys the spell. In this act occurs the famous air for Isabelle, 'Robert, toi que j'aime'.

Act V. Once more Bertram seeks to make a compact with Robert, the price for which shall be paid with his soul. But Alice, by repeating to him the last warning words of his mother, delays the signing of the compact until the clock strikes twelve. The spell is broken. Bertram disappears. The cathedral doors swing open disclosing Isabelle, who, in her bridal robes, awaits Robert. The finale contains a trio for Alice, Robert and Bertram, which is considered one of Meyerbeer's finest inspirations. K.

LES HUGUENOTS

Opera in five acts, text by A.E. Scribe after Deschamps. Première at the Opéra, Paris, 29 February 1836, with Falcon, Dorus-Gras, Nourrit, Levasseur, Serda.

Valentine, daughter of St Bris, betrothed to de Nevers Soprano Marguerite de Valois, betrothed to
Henri IV of Navarre Soprano
 Urbain, Marguerite's page
Soprano (or Mezzo-Soprano)
 Count de St Bris, *Catholic nobleman*Baritone
 Count de Nevers, *Catholic nobleman*Baritone
 Raoul de Nangis, *Huguenot nobleman*Tenor
 Marcel, Raoul's servant.....Bass
 Catholic and Huguenot Nobles, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, Soldiers, Pages, Citizens, Populace

Place: Touraine and Paris

Time: August 1572

Running Time: 4 hours 15 minutes

The background to Les Huguenots is political, just before the Massacre of St Bartholomew, when feeling between Catholics and Huguenots was running murderously high. The feud came to an end only with the accession in 1589 of Henri IV (a Huguenot), who in 1572 had married the Catholic Marguerite de Valois, daughter of Catherine de Medici and sister of François II, Charles IX and Henri III (and therefore sister-in-law of Mary Queen of Scots).

The action revolves round Marguerite's attempt to effect a dynastic and 'politically correct' marriage between the prominent Huguenot, Raoul de Nangis, and Valentine, daughter of a leading Catholic noble. Quite fortuitously, they are already in love, but equally fortuitously de Nangis is led to believe – erroneously – that there exists a liaison between Valentine and de Nevers, a notoriously womanising Catholic leader.

Act I. Touraine. Count de Nevers has invited friends to a party at his château. Among them is the Huguenot Raoul de Nangis, who makes his entrance with considerable musical panache. Invited to toast his love in a song, Raoul obliges: 'Plus blanche que la blanche hermine'. A viola obbligato adds spice to the romance, in which he praises an unknown beauty whom he recently rescued from a group of students. Raoul's retainer, Marcel, defies the Catholics with a stout rendition of 'Ein feste Burg', which provokes amusement and elicits from Marcel a brisk Huguenot battle song: 'Piff, paff, pouff'. De Nevers is called away, and Raoul sees him outside in the garden with a woman he recognises, to his consternation, as the lady he rescued not so long ago. He immediately assumes a liaison between them.

De Nevers rejoins his guests and Urbain, page to Marguerite de Valois, makes his entrance with a brilliant recitative ('Nobles Seigneurs, salut!') and aria. Urbain has been instructed by his mistress to conduct Raoul, blindfolded and knowing nothing of the circumstances, to a rendezvous with an unknown lady. The Catholics are impressed that Raoul is sought after by so important a Catholic.

Act II. In the garden of the Château de Chenonceaux, Marguerite sings of the beauties of Touraine ('O beau pays de la Touraine'), following with a spectacular cabaletta 'A ce mot tout s'anime'. It was at Marguerite's behest that Valentine has just visited de Nevers to ask him to release her from her engagement to him, a request which, however reluctantly, he granted. A so-called bathers' chorus and a scene for Marguerite and Urbain precede the removal of the

