

Enlarged Edition

$7.95

PRINCETON
ENCYCLOPEDIA OF

POETRY AND POETICS

EDITED BY

ALEX PREMINGER

FRANK J. WARNKE AND O. B. HARDISON, JR.

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

PRINCETON
ENCYCLOPEDIA OF POETRY AND POETICS

PRINCETON
ENCYCLOPEDIA
OF POETRY AND POETICS

THOMAS J. WARDEN AND D. D. HARRISON, JR.
ASSOCIATE EDITORS

Enlarged Edition

PUBLISHED BY PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS
PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY 08540

TO AUGUSTA FRIEDMAN PREMINGER

Copyright © 1965, Enlarged Edition Copyright © 1974
by Princeton University Press

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED

L.C. Card: 63-7076
ISBN 0-691-01317-9 (paperback edn.)
ISBN 0-691-06280-3 (hardback edn.)

First Princeton Paperback Edition, 1972
Enlarged Edition, 1974

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form or by any electronic or mechanical means including information storage and retrieval systems without permission in writing from the publisher, except by a reviewer who may quote brief passages in a review.

Printed in the United States of America
by Princeton University Press

PREFACE

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF POETRY AND POETICS is the most comprehensive treatment of its field yet attempted. It consists of about 1,000 individual entries ranging from twenty to more than 20,000 words, dealing with the history, theory, technique, and criticism of poetry from earliest times to the present. The entries are designed to be useful to the general reader, the student, and the professional scholar. They are supplemented by substantial bibliographies and generous cross-references.

Articles on individual authors, poems, and allusions have been excluded from the ENCYCLOPEDIA as readily available in other reference works. Otherwise, the policy of the editors has been to avoid arbitrary limitations. The danger of too narrow a definition of "poetry" has been recognized, and the reader will find numerous articles dealing with the area between prose and poetry (e.g., VERSE AND PROSE, PROSE POEM, PROSE RHYTHM, FREE VERSE), and topics equally relevant to prose and poetry (e.g., PLOT, MYTH, SYMBOL, IMAGERY). Of particular interest in view of the renaissance of literary criticism in the twentieth century are the numerous articles dealing with poetic theory, schools of criticism, and critical terms. Current interest in poetics also informs many of the entries dealing with the history and forms of poetry.

The entries in the ENCYCLOPEDIA are arranged in alphabetical order. However, they may be grouped under four general headings: (i) History of Poetry; (ii) Techniques of Poetry; (iii) Poetics and Criticism; (iv) Poetry and its Relationship to Other Fields of Interest.

(i). The history of poetry is treated in terms of languages, movements, and schools. The reader will find entries on the history of each of the major bodies of world poetry—English, American, French, Indian, Arabic, Japanese, etc.—as well as shorter entries on such minor bodies of poetry as Korean poetry, Yiddish poetry, American Indian poetry, and Eskimo poetry. Movements which cut across linguistic or national boundaries are treated in articles such as RENAISSANCE POETRY, ROMANTICISM, and SYMBOLISM. Shorter articles deal with movements or schools peculiar to one country (e.g., DOLCE STIL NUOVO, PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD, PLÉIADE). In every case the aim has been to provide a coherent summary of the important facts illustrated by frequent citations, together with the critical evaluation necessary to an intelligent understanding of the subject.

(ii). Technique is covered in articles on STYLE, POETIC DICTION, IMAGERY, RHYME, and the like. There is a general article on FIGURES

PREFACE

OF SPEECH, as well as articles on specific figures like METAPHOR, SIMILE, and CONCEIT. The more important terms of traditional rhetoric are included along with terms which have become current through the influence of modern criticism. The sound values of poetry are treated in SOUND IN POETRY, and in shorter entries on TONE COLOR, ONOMATOPOEIA, ALLITERATION, ASSONANCE, and the like. The major genres, such as tragedy, epic, and lyric, receive extended treatment in terms of both history and theory. More general forms (e.g., DRAMATIC POETRY, NARRATIVE POETRY) are discussed in separate articles, as are such rarely treated subjects as EROTIC POETRY and ORAL POETRY.

Prosody is treated in a general article as well as in more specific entries on CLASSICAL PROSODY, ENGLISH PROSODY, ROMANCE PROSODY, SLAVIC PROSODY, and CELTIC PROSODY, to name only a few. A general article on METER is supplemented by entries on such conventional "types" as HEXAMETER, HEROIC COUPLET, and ELEGIAC DISTICH. Special care has been taken to provide adequate representation for techniques and prosodic forms common in non-Western poetry, e.g., HAIKU, GHASEL, and SLOKA.

(iii). Poetics and criticism receive special emphasis in the ENCYCLOPEDIA. Poetics is treated most generally in POETICS, CONCEPTIONS OF and POETRY, THEORIES OF. These are supplemented by entries dealing with CLASSICAL POETICS, MEDIEVAL POETICS, NEOCLASSICAL POETICS, MODERN POETICS, etc. In addition, the discussions of major literary movements, schools, and genres deal extensively with theory.

The types, objectives, and problems of criticism are explained in CRITICISM, TYPES OF and CRITICISM, FUNCTION OF. They are explored in greater detail in entries on ANALYSIS, EXPLICATION, EVALUATION, and the like. A great many critical terms are discussed separately; e.g., IMAGINATION, FANCY, CONCRETE UNIVERSAL, INVENTION, DECORUM, IMITATION, OBJECTIVE CORRELATIVE, AMBIGUITY, TENSION.

(iv). The relationship of poetry to other fields of interest is examined in articles such as FINE ARTS AND POETRY, MUSIC AND POETRY, PHILOSOPHY AND POETRY, RELIGION AND POETRY, and SOCIETY AND POETRY.

The guiding policies of the editors of the ENCYCLOPEDIA have been accuracy, utility, interest, and (within necessary space limitations) thoroughness. Our contributors have been selected because of recognized excellence in their fields, and we have intentionally refrained from the attempt to impose a preconceived, uniform point of view on their contributions. Each author has been encouraged to present his material in terms of the approach which he feels to be most appropriate. The result is a variety of points of view, representative of the best modern criticism and scholarship. In the opinion of the editors, anything less would be unfair to both readers and contributors.

PREFACE

Two nonsubstantive types of revision have been made by the editors in preparing the manuscript of the ENCYCLOPEDIA for the printer.

(1) Abbreviations have been used throughout in the interests of brevity and consistency of format. As in several continental reference works, the entry word of an article has been abbreviated to its first letter (or letters) when it recurs in the text of the article. Thus imagery is abbreviated in the text of that article by i.; satire by s.; and so forth. Common abbreviations (c. for century [ies]), Gr. for Greek, etc.) have been used freely. Finally, authors and works referred to frequently throughout the ENCYCLOPEDIA are abbreviated by one or two key words. Full citations of these bibliographic references will be found in the LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS on Page xvi.

(2) Forms of citations, conventions of capitalization, use of italics (e.g., for titles of poems), and the like have been standardized where possible for the sake of consistency.

The ENCYCLOPEDIA OF POETRY AND POETICS has been a cooperative undertaking. It has been made possible only through the learning, dedication, and effort of the contributors. To them the editors wish to extend sincere and warm thanks. A special word of appreciation is due William Arrowsmith, Palmer Bovie, Alfred G. Engstrom, Alvin Eustis, Jr., Paul Fussell, Jr., the late Robert J. Getty, Ulrich K. Goldsmith, Fabian Gudas, Murray Krieger, David I. Masson and Roy Arthur Swanson; as well as M. H. Abrams, George Arms, John Arthos, Paull F. Baum, Max I. Baym, Jess B. Bessinger, Frank M. Chambers, Dorothy Clotelle Clarke, Procopé S. Costas, R. S. Crane, Fred A. Dudley, Charles W. Dunn, John J. Enck, Victor Erlich, Robert O. Evans, Solomon Fishman, Wolfgang Bernhard Fleischmann, Richard H. Fogle, Ralph Freedman, Albert B. Friedman, Norman Friedman, Joseph G. Fucilla, Samuel Hazo, Hanford Henderson, Roger A. Hornsby, W. T. H. Jackson, Charles W. Jones, John R. Krueger, Craig La Drière, R.-F. Lissens, Sverre Lyngstad, Clarence A. Manning, Vladimir Markov, Robert Marsh, Earl Miner, Luis Monguió, G. N. G. Orsini, Laurence Perrine, Allen W. Phillips, Seymour M. Pitcher, F. J. E. Raby, Brewster Rogerson, Aldo Scaglione, H. Stefan Schultz, Christoph E. Schweitzer, V. Setchkarev, A. J. M. Smith, Kiril Taranovski, Kurt Weinberg, Philip Wheelwright, A. S. P. Woodhouse, and Lawrence J. Zillman, whose help went beyond the boundaries of their signed contributions. Several scholars, it should be appreciatively acknowledged, also assumed the responsibility for completing or updating the articles of colleagues who had died while the ENCYCLOPEDIA was still in progress.

We are grateful, too, to the following scholars, critics, and poets who are not among our contributors but who have generously given us their advice, specific suggestions, and criticisms: Alfred Adler,

PREFACE

Brooklyn College; Sverre Arestad, University of Washington; Hayden Clair Bell, University of California (Berkeley); Armando Correia Pacheco, Pan American Union; Joseph F. de Simone, Brooklyn College; S. Dinamarca, Brooklyn College; David Djaparidze, Princeton University; David M. Dougherty, University of Oregon; Samuel H. Elbert, University of Hawaii; David C. Fowler, University of Washington; Marcel Françon, Harvard University; Thomas Greene, Yale University; Henry Hatfield, Harvard University; Gilbert Highet, Columbia University; Edwin Honig, Brown University; Langston Hughes; Lawrence Hyman, Brooklyn College; Ivar Ivask, St. Olaf College; S. F. Johnson, Columbia University; Walter Johnson, University of Washington; François Jost, University of Fribourg; Adolf D. Klarmann, University of Pennsylvania; Victor Lange, Princeton University; Wallace Lipton, Brooklyn College; Richard A. Long, Morgan State College; Roy MacNab; Percy Matenko, Brooklyn College; Fritz Mautner, Bryn Mawr College; Davidson Nicol, University College of Sierra Leone; Charles Passage, Brooklyn College; Daniel W. Patterson, University of North Carolina; Omeljan Pritsak; Guenther Rimbach, University of California (Riverside); D. W. Robertson, Jr., Princeton University; Alexander Rodger, Edinburgh University; Louis Schoffman, Brooklyn College; Thomas A. Sebeok, Indiana University; Stavro Skendi, Columbia University; Arnold Stein, University of Washington; Claude Vigée, Brandeis University; Eliseo Vivas, Northwestern University; Robert Vlach, University of Oklahoma; Ernst Waldinger, Skidmore College; Ronald N. Walpole, University of California (Berkeley); Sigfried Wenzel, University of North Carolina; Maria Widnäs, University of Oklahoma; and Mary Yiu, Brooklyn College.

We are very much indebted also to Antoinette Ciolli, Brooklyn College Library, Martin Fine, Nicole Stern, Pamela Williams, Jean-Claude Preminger, Toby Preminger, and Tamara Arney for assisting in the preparation of the manuscript.

It remains to thank the Bollingen Foundation without whose aid this book could not have been completed at this time; Mr. Herbert S. Bailey, Jr., director of the Princeton University Press, for his understanding and support; and Mrs. James Holly Hanford, Princeton University Press editor, for her devoted and inspired help.

Flushing, New York
December 1963

THE EDITORS

PREFACE TO THE ENLARGED EDITION

In the first edition of this work the editors committed themselves to an ideal of comprehensiveness, hoping to make the Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics the most complete and accurate reference source of its kind. Nevertheless, there were inevitable oversights. No separate entries were provided for a number of important movements in poetry (HARLEM RENAISSANCE), major aspects of literature (THEME), and perennial issues (CENSORSHIP). The Supplement of about 75,000 words to this new edition of the Encyclopedia attempts to rectify such omissions, and it also includes dozens of other new entries that reflect recent developments in poetry and poetics.

Poetry, like any art, is in a constant process of change, and in the nine years since the publication of this Encyclopedia there have been many significant shifts in poetic practice and in the intellectual and social world that surrounds the poet's art. Accordingly, the Appendix includes such entries as ROCK LYRIC and COMPUTER POETRY, as well as an overview of contemporary AMERICAN POETIC SCHOOLS AND TECHNIQUES. Moreover, the increased cultural awareness and articulateness of ethnic minorities and emergent nations has required treatment here of such subjects as recent BLACK POETRY in the United States, PUERTO RICAN POETRY, and AFRICAN POETRY in various languages.

Many articles in the Appendix also call attention to recent developments in poetic criticism. An essay on METACRITICISM critically examines criticism itself. Such entries as STRUCTURALISM, PHENOMENOLOGY, and the GENEVA SCHOOL deal with ideas and movements which have proved themselves during the last decade to be of value in the study of literature. Fresh debate over traditional issues is summarized and analyzed in the treatments of HISTORICISM and INTERPRETATION. And new emphases in disciplines ancillary to literature are accounted for in such articles as PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY and POLITICS AND POETRY.

The editors have again attempted to avoid construing "poetry and poetics" in either too inclusive or too narrow a fashion. They have not tried to encompass the whole area of imaginative literature: such an effort would have resulted in an unwieldy work of many volumes. Instead, they have restricted the province of the Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics to metrical or quasi-metrical composition, hoping to maintain a clear unity of subject matter. On the other hand, the editors have included some topics (e.g., articles on criticism or on general literary techniques) which apply to prose as well as to poetry. Moreover, they have made no effort to rule out occasional references to prose works in the entries. As in the first edition, the editors have adopted the policy of entrusting the articles to authorities recognized in their respective fields, and of allowing these contributors considerable freedom in point of view and development.

The editors owe a special debt of gratitude to the following contributors, past and present, for advice, concrete suggestions, and criticisms: Monroe C. Beardsley, David F. Dorsey, Paul Fussell, Fabian Gudas, Lyndon Harries, Kevin Kerrane, Murray Krieger, Sally N. Lawall, Sverre Lyngstad, Wallace Martin, Earl Miner, and Aldo Scaglione.

We should also like to thank: M. H. Abrams, Joseph G. Beaver, Seymour Chatman, Jonathan Culler, Paul de Man, Alvin Eustis, Bernard Wolfgang Fleischmann, Z. Folejewski, Ralph Freedman, Ulrich K. Goldsmith, John Hollander, Douglas Johnson, Samuel R. Levin, Richard A. Long, Louis Monguió, and Barbara Herrnstein Smith.

Various scholars, whose names do not appear in the List of Contributors, have assisted us by careful reading and helpful criticism of entries. We are grateful to: Barry Beckham (Brown University), Wilfred Cartey (Brooklyn College, City University of New York), Marshall Cohen (Graduate Center, City University of New York), Thomas Conley (University of California, Berkeley), Thomas R. Edwards (Rutgers University), Michael Fahey (University of Delaware), Mary Ann Geissal (Northeastern Illinois University), Albert S. Gérard (University of Liège), Norman N. Holland (State University of New York, Buffalo), Nathan Irvin Huggins (Columbia University), F. R. Jameson (University of California, San Diego), David Kalstone (Rutgers University), Edward Maxwell (Northeastern Illinois University), J. Hillis Miller (Yale University), Gerald Moore (University of Sussex), Gerald M. Moser (Pennsylvania State University), Edgar C. Polomé (University of Texas), Anthony Z. Romano (University of Delaware), Don Weller (University of Hawaii), and Carl Woodring (Columbia University).

Special thanks go again to Mrs. James Holly Hanford, our very able and dedicated Princeton University Press editor.

1974

THE EDITORS

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Great care has been taken to trace all the owners of copyright material used in this book. If any have been inadvertently overlooked or omitted, acknowledgment will gladly be made in any future editions.

Thanks are due to the following authors, publishers, and representatives who have so courteously granted permission to use selections from copyrighted publications.

The Africana Publishing Corporation for six lines of "Heavensgate" reprinted from Labyrinths by Christopher Okigbo, copyright 1971 by Legal Personal Representatives of Christopher Okigbo, by permission of Africana Publishing Corporation.

The Bernice P. Bishop Museum for a nature poem, "Moolelo o Hawaii," manuscript by S. M. Kamakau, translated by M. W. Beckwith and M. K. Pukui.

William Blackwood & Sons, Ltd., Hugh MacDiarmid, and The Macmillan Co. for six lines of "The Bonnie Broukit Bairn" from The Collected Poems of Hugh MacDiarmid, copyright 1948, 1962 by Christopher Murray Grieve.

The Bodley Head, Ltd., for four lines by Fedor Tyutchev, from Modern Russian Poetry. An Anthology. Chosen and translated by Babette Deutsch and Avrahm Yarmolinsky.

Cambridge University Press, for twelve lines, from Literary History of the Arabs by R. A. Nicholson, 2d ed.

Clarendon Press, Oxford, for the first eight lines of "Cheddar Pinks," from the Poetical Works of Robert Bridges. Excluding the Eight Dramas.

Editions Gallimard, for four lines by Paul Valéry from La Jeune Parque, copyright 1917 by Editions Gallimard, and three lines by Paul Valéry from Charmes, copyright 1922 by Editions Gallimard.

Faber and Faber, Ltd., for first stanza of "September 1, 1939," from Collected Shorter Poems by W. H. Auden; for excerpts from

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Poetic Diction: A Study in Meaning by Owen Barfield, new ed. 1952; for three lines of "Ash Wednesday," from Collected Poems by T. S. Eliot.

Farrar, Straus and Cudahy, for excerpts from The Heresy of Courtly Love by A. J. Denomy.

Grove Press, for "Oread," from Selected Poems by H. D., copyright 1957 by Norman Holmes Pearson.

Harcourt, Brace & World, Inc. for three lines of "Ash Wednesday," from Collected Poems of T. S. Eliot, copyright 1936 by Harcourt, Brace & World, Inc.

Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, Inc., for the poem "l(a)" by E. E. Cummings. Copyright 1958 by E. E. Cummings. Reprinted from his volume Complete Poems 1913-1962 by permission of Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, Inc.

Harvard University Press, for excerpts from Aristotle, The Poetics; "Longinus," On the Sublime; Demetrius, On Style, Loeb Classical Library.

Heinemann Educational Books, Ltd., for four lines of "The sounds begin again" from A Simple Lust by Dennis Brutus and for six lines of "Heavensgate" from Labyrinths with Path of Thunder by Christopher Okigbo. These lines reprinted by permission of the publishers, Heinemann Educational Books Ltd., London.

Hill and Wang, for four lines of "The sounds begin again" from A Simple Lust by Dennis Brutus. Reprinted with the permission of Hill and Wang, a division of Farrar, Straus & Giroux, Inc. Copyright 1963, 1968, 1970, 1971, 1973 by Dennis Brutus.

Holt, Rinehart and Winston, Inc., for "The Golf Links Lie So Near the Mill," from Portraits and Protests by Sarah N. Cleghorn. All rights reserved. Reprinted by permission of Holt, Rinehart and Winston, Inc.

Houghton Mifflin Co., for four lines of "Ars Poetica," from Collected Poems, 1917-1952 by Archibald MacLeish, reprinted by permission and arrangement with Houghton Mifflin Co. Copyright 1952 by Archibald MacLeish; for "Lilacs," from Complete Poetical Works of Amy Lowell. Copyright 1955 by Houghton Mifflin Co.

The Irish Texts Society, for lines from Aithdioghluim Dana, edited by L. McKenna.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., for first four lines of "Planting Bamboos" by Po-Chüi, from Translations from the Chinese, by Arthur Waley.

Little, Brown & Co., for lines from "If I can stop one heart from breaking," from The Complete Poems of Emily Dickinson, edited by Thomas H. Johnson.

The Macmillan Company, for six lines of "The Bonnie Broukit Bairn," from The Collected Poems of Hugh MacDiarmid, copyright 1948, 1962 by Christopher Murray Grieve; for lines from The King of the Great Clock Tower, The Collected Plays of W. B. Yeats, 1952, 1953; for one line of "After Long Silence," the epigram "On Those that Hated 'The Playboy of the Western World,' 1907," four lines of "Sailing to Byzantium," four lines of "Under Ben Bulbin V," eight lines of "Why Should Not Old Men Be Mad?" all from The Collected Poems of W. B. Yeats, definitive edition, 1956.

The Mediaeval Academy of America, for excerpts from A. J. Denomy, "Courtly Love and Courtliness," Speculum, 28 (1953), 44.

New Directions, for third stanza of "To a Friend," translated by Babette Deutsch, from Selected Writings by Boris Pasternak; for fifth stanza of "Apparuit," from Personae by Ezra Pound, copyright 1926, 1954 by Ezra Pound; for opening sentence from Under Milk Wood by Dylan Thomas, copyright 1954 by New Directions. Reprinted by permission of New Directions.

Oliver & Boyd, Ltd. and the Trustees of the Alexander Carmichael estate, for second stanza of "Lament for Seathan," from Carmina Gadelica, compiled and translated by Alexander Carmichael.

Random House, Inc., for first stanza of "September 1, 1939," from Collected Poetry of W. H. Auden, copyright 1945 by W. H. Auden. For excerpt from Ulysses by James Joyce, copyright 1914, 1918 and renewed 1942, 1946 by Nora Joseph Joyce. Reprinted by permission of Random House, Inc.

Charles Scribner's Sons, for excerpt from an Inca prayer, from Ancient Civilization of the Andes by Philip Ainsworth Means, copyright 1931 Charles Scribner's Sons, renewal copyright 1959 Louise Muntroe Means, reprinted with the permission of Charles Scribner's Sons; for four lines of "America For Me," from Poems by Henry van Dyke.

Speculum, The Editors, for excerpts from A. J. Denomy, "Courtly Love and Courtliness," Speculum, 28 (1953), 44.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Stanford University Press, for the following selections in translation: five lines each by Hitomaro, Okura, Akahito, Narihira, Komachi, Yoshitada, Izumi Shikibu, Anon., Yoshitsune, Saigyō, Shunzei, Teika, Tamehide, ex-Empress Eifuku; ten lines by ex-Emperor Hanazono and three lines by Bashō, from Japanese Court Poetry, by Robert H. Brower and Earl Miner, copyright 1961 by the Board of Trustees of the Leland Stanford Junior University.

University of Chicago Press, for lines from Greek Lyrics, translated by Richmond Lattimore, copyright 1955 by Richard Lattimore.

Twayne Publishers, Inc., for six lines of "If we must die," from Selected Poems of Claude McKay.

University of Wales Press, for lines 668-673 from Canu Aneirin, edited by Ifor Williams.

A. P. Watt and Son, Mrs. W. B. Yeats, the Macmillan Co. of Canada Ltd., and Messrs. Macmillan & Co. Ltd., for lines from The King of the Great Clock Tower, The Collected Plays of W. B. Yeats, 1952, 1953; for one line of "After Long Silence," the epigram "On Those that Hated 'The Playboy of the Western World,' 1907," four lines of "Sailing to Byzantium," four lines of "Under Ben Bulbin V," eight lines of "Why Should Not Old Men Be Mad?" all from The Collected Poems of W. B. Yeats, definitive edition, 1956.

CONTENTS

PREFACE TO FIRST EDITION	v
PREFACE TO ENLARGED EDITION	ix
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS	xi
ABBREVIATIONS, BIBLIOGRAPHICAL	xvi
ABBREVIATIONS, GENERAL	xix
CONTRIBUTORS	xx
PRINCETON ENCYCLOPEDIA OF POETRY AND POETICS	3
SUPPLEMENT	909

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL

- Abrams M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp. Romantic Theory and the Critical Tradition, 1953.
- AJP American Journal of Philology
- AL American Literature
- ASch American Scholar
- ASEER American Slavic and Eastern European Review
- ASR American-Scandinavian Review
- AUC Anales de la Universidad de Chile
- Auerbach E. Auerbach, Mimesis. The Representation of Reality in Western Literature, tr. W. R. Trask, 1953.
- BA Books Abroad
- Baum P. F. Baum, The Principles of English Versification, 1922.
- Beare W. Beare, Latin Verse and European Song, 1957.
- Behrens I. Behrens, Die Lehre von der Einteilung der Dichtkunst (Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für Romanische Philologie, 92, 1940).
- BHR Bibliothèque d'humanisme et renaissance
- Bowra C. M. Bowra, Greek Lyric Poetry from Alcman to Simonides, 1936, 2d ed., 1961.
- Bray R. Bray, La Formation de la doctrine classique en France, 1927.
- Brooks and Warren C. Brooks and R. P. Warren, Understanding Poetry, 2d ed., 1950, 3d ed., 1960.
- Brooks, Tradition C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradition, 1939.
- BZ Byzantinische Zeitschrift (Leipzig)
- Cabeen A Critical Bibliography of French Literature, general ed. D. C. Cabeen, 1- ; 1947- (in progress).
- Cassell's Cassell's Encyclopaedia of World Literature, ed. S. H. Steinberg, 2 v., 1954.
- CBEL Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature
- CE College English
- Chadwick H. M. and N. K. Chadwick, The Growth of Literature, 3 v., 1932-40.
- CHEL Cambridge History of English Literature
- CL Comparative Literature
- CP Classical Philology
- CQ Classical Quarterly
- Crane R. S. Crane, The Languages of Criticism and the Structure of Poetry, 1953.
- Crane, Critics Critics and Criticism, Ancient and Modern, ed. R. S. Crane, 1952.
- Crusius F. Crusius, Römische Metrik, 2d ed., 1955.
- Curtius E. Curtius, European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, tr. W. R. Trask, 1953.
- cw Classical World
- Daiches D. Daiches, Critical Approaches to Literature, 1956.
- Dale A. M. Dale, The Lyric Metres of Greek Drama, 1948.
- Deutsch B. Deutsch, Poetry Handbook, 1957, 2d ed., 1962.
- DVLG Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte
- E&S Essays and Studies by Members of the English Association
- EIC Essays in Criticism (Oxford)
- EIE English Institute Essays
- Eliot, Essays T. S. Eliot, Selected Essays, 1932, rev. ed., 1950.
- Eliot, Wood T. S. Eliot, The Sacred Wood: Essays on Poetry and Criticism, 1920.
- Empson W. Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity, 1930, 2d ed., 1947.
- FiR Filologia romanza
- FM Français moderne
- Frye N. Frye, Anatomy of Criticism, 1957.
- fs French Studies
- Gayley and Kurtz C. M. Gayley and B. P. Kurtz, Methods and Materials of Literary Criticism: Lyric, Epic and Allied Forms of Poetry, 1920.
- Gilbert and Kuhn K. Gilbert and H. Kuhn, A History of Esthetics, 1939, 2d ed., 1953.
- Hamer E. Hamer, The Metres of English Poetry, 1930.
- Hardie W. R. Hardie, Res metrica, 1920.
- HR Hispanic Review
- HSCL Harvard Studies in Comparative Literature
- HSCP Harvard Studies in Classical Philology
- HSS Harvard Slavic Studies
- JAAAC Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism
- JAF Journal of American Folklore
- Jeanroy A. Jeanroy, La Poésie lyrique des troubadours, 2 v., 1934.

ABBREVIATIONS

- Jeanroy, Origines A. Jeanroy, Les Origines de la poésie lyrique en France au moyen âge, 3d ed., 1925.
- JEGP Journal of English and Germanic Philology
- JHI Journal of the History of Ideas
- JNH Journal of Negro History
- JWCI Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institute
- Kastner L. E. Kastner, A History of French Versification, 1903.
- Ker W. P. Ker, Form and Style in Poetry, 1928.
- Kolář A. Kolář, De re metrica poetarum Graecorum et Romanorum, Prague, 1947.
- Koster W. J. W. Koster, Traité de métrique grecque suivi d'un précis de métrique latine, 2d ed., Leyden, 1953.
- KR Kenyon Review
- Krieger M. Krieger, The New Apologists for Poetry, 1956.
- Langer S. K. Langer, Philosophy in a New Key, 1948.
- Lausberg H. Lausberg, Handbuch der literarischen Rhetorik, 2 v., 1960.
- Lehmann A. G. Lehmann, The Symbolist Aesthetic in France, 1885-95, 1950..
- Lewis C. S. Lewis, The Allegory of Love, 1936.
- LonM London Magazine
- Martino P. Martino, Parnasse et symbolisme, 1850-1900, 1925, 4th ed., 1935.
- MdF Mercure de France
- MLF Modern Language Forum
- MLJ Modern Language Journal
- MLN Modern Language Notes
- MLQ Modern Language Quarterly
- MLR Modern Language Review
- Morris-Jones J. Morris-Jones, Cerdd Dafod, 1925.
- MP Modern Philology
- N&Q Notes and Queries
- Navarro T. Navarro, Métrica española: Reseña histórica y descriptiva, 1956.
- NED New English Dictionary
- Neophil Neophilologus (Groningen)
- Nicoll A. Nicoll, A History of English Drama, 1660-1900, 6 v., 1952-59.
- Norden E. Norden, Die antike Kunstprosa, 5th ed., 2 v., 1958.
- OED Oxford English Dictionary
- OSP Oxford Slavonic Papers
- Parry T. Parry, A History of Welsh Literature, tr. H. I. Bell, 1955.
- Patterson W. F. Patterson, Three Centuries of French Poetic Theory, 3 v., 1935.
- PMLA Publications of the Modern Language Association of America
- PQ Philological Quarterly
- PR Partisan Review
- QQ Queen's Quarterly
- QR Quarterly Review
- Raymond M. Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme, 1933, 2d ed., 1940.
- Reallexikon Reallexikon der deutschen Literaturgeschichte, ed. P. Merker and W. Stammer, 4 v., 1925-31; 2d ed., ed. W. Kohlschmidt and W. Mohr, 1958- (in progress).
- Ren Renaissance
- RES Review of English Studies
- RF Romanische Forschungen
- RFE Revista de filología española
- RHL Revue d'histoire littéraire de la France
- Richards, Practical I. A. Richards, Practical Criticism, 1929.
- Richards, Principles I. A. Richards, Principles of Literary Criticism, 1925.
- RLC Revue de littérature comparée
- RLR Revue des langues romanes (Montpellier)
- Rom Romania
- RPh Roman Philology
- Saintsbury G. Saintsbury, History of Criticism and Literary Taste in Europe, 3 v., 1900-04.
- Saintsbury, Prosody G. Saintsbury, A History of English Prosody, 3 v., 1906-10.
- SAQ South Atlantic Quarterly
- SAWW Sitzungsberichte der [österreichischen] Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien. Phil.-hist. Klasse
- SB Studies in Bibliography: Papers of the Bibliographical Society of the University of Virginia
- Schipper J. M. Schipper, Englische Metrik, 3 v., 1881-1888 (abridged and tr. as A History of English Versification, 1910).
- Schmid and Stählin W. Schmid and O. Stählin, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur, 2 v., 1929-48.
- Science and Literature International Federation for Modern Languages and Literatures. Literature and Science. Proceedings of the Triennial Congress held at Oxford 1954, 1956.
- SD Studi danteschi
- SEER Slavonic and East European Review [title changed to: Slavic Review]
- SFI Studi di filologia italiana
- Shipley Dictionary of World Literature, ed. J. T. Shipley, 1943, rev. ed., 1953.
- ShS Shakespeare Survey
- Smyth H. W. Smyth, Greek Melic Poets, 1906.
- SOED Shorter Oxford English Dictionary
- SP Studies in Philology
- SQ Shakespeare Quarterly
- SR Sewanee Review
- SRen Studies in the Renaissance
- Sutton W. Sutton, Modern American Criticism, 1963.
- SWR Southwest Review
- Sym Symposium
- TLS [London] Times Literary Supplement
- TPAPA Transactions and Proceedings of the American Philological Association

ABBREVIATIONS

- TPS Transactions of the Philological Society (London)
- TSE Tulane Studies in English
- Tuve R. Tuve, Elizabethan and Metaphysical Imagery, 1947.
- UNCSCS University of North Carolina Studies in Comparative Literature
- UNC SRL University of North Carolina Studies in the Romance Languages and Literatures
- UTSE University of Texas Studies in English
- Weinberg B. Weinberg, A History of Literary Criticism in the Italian Renaissance, 2 v., 1961.
- Wellek R. Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism, 1750-1950, 1955- (in progress).
- Wellek and Warren R. Wellek and A. Warren, Theory of Literature, 1949, 2d ed., 1956.
- Wheelwright P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain. A Study in the Language of Symbolism, 1954.
- Wilkins E. H. Wilkins, A History of Italian Literature, 1954.
- Wilson E. Wilson, Axel's Castle, 1931.
- Wimsatt W. K. Wimsatt, Jr. and M. C. Beardsley, The Verbal Icon, 1954.
- Wimsatt and Brooks W. K. Wimsatt, Jr. and C. Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History, 1957.
- WR Western Review
- YCS Yale Classical Studies
- YFS Yale French Studies
- ZDP Zeitschrift für deutsche Philologie
- ZRP Zeitschrift für romanische Philologie
- ZSP Zeitschrift für slavische Philologie
- ZVS Zeitschrift für vergleichende Sprachforschung

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

GENERAL

Am. American	jour. journal
anthol. anthology	L. Latin assoc. association	lit. literature (s); literary
b. born	LL Late Latin
bibliog. bibliography	loc. cit. loco citato , in the place cited
c. century; centuries	ME Middle English
ca. about	ms(s) manuscript(s)
cf. confer , compare	OE Old English
ch. chapter	OF Old French
cl. classical; classicism	ON Old Norse
crit. critical; criticism	p., pp. page; pages
d. died	pr. printed
dict. dictionary	prep. preparation
diss. dissertation	proc. proceedings
ed. editor; edited (by); edition	Prov. Provençal
e.g. exempli gratia , for example	publ. published
Eng. English	q.v. quod vide , which see
enl. enlarged	qq.v. quae vide , both which, or all which, see et al. et alii , and others	Ren. Renaissance
ff. following	repr. reprint; reprinted
fl. floruit , flourished	rev. revised fr., frag. fragment	Rus. Russian
Fr. French	s. siècle
Gesch. Geschichte	sc. scilicet , to wit
Gr. Greek	Sp. Spanish
hist. history, histoire	supp. supplement; supplementary
i.e. id est , that is	t. tome introd. introduction	tr. translated by; translation (s)
Ir. Irish
It. Italian

* An asterisk at the end of a word or phrase indicates that an entry on this subject will be found in the Supplement.

THE CONTRIBUTORS

- Kenneth M. Abbott, Professor of Classical Languages, Ohio State University
- M. H. Abrams, Frederic T. Whiton Professor of English, Cornell University
- Fernando Alegría, Professor of Spanish and Portuguese, Stanford University
- Robert P. apRoberts, Professor of English, San Fernando Valley State College
- Arthur J. Arberry, late Sir Thomas Adams's Professor of Arabic, University of Cambridge
- George Arms, Professor of English, University of New Mexico
- William Arrowsmith, University Professor, Boston University
- John Arthos, Hereward T. Price University Professor of English, University of Michigan
- Stuart Atkins, Professor of German, University of California (Santa Barbara)
- Arra Avakian, National Association for Armenian Studies and Research
- María Teresa Babin, Professor of Spanish, Graduate Center, City University of New York
- James Baird, Professor of English, Connecticut College
- Anna E. Balakian, Professor of Romance Languages and Comparative Literature, New York University
- Linton Lomas Barrett, late Professor of Romance Languages, Washington and Lee University
- Paull F. Baum, late James B. Duke Professor of English, Duke University
- Glen W. Baxter, Lecturer in East Asian Languages and Civilizations, Harvard University, and Associate Director of the Harvard-Yenching Institute
- Max I. Baym, Professor Emeritus of the Humanities, Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn
- Monroe C. Beardsley, Professor of Philosophy, Temple University
- William Beare, late Professor of Latin and onetime Pro-Vice Chancellor, University of Bristol
- Joseph C. Beaver, Professor of Linguistics, Northeastern Illinois University
- Richard Beck, University Professor Emeritus of Scandinavian Languages and Literatures, University of North Dakota
- Robert Beloof, Professor of Rhetoric, University of California (Berkeley)
- Allen R. Benham, late Professor of English, University of Washington
- Aldo S. Bernardo, Professor of Romance Languages and Chairman of the Division of Humanities, State University of New York (Binghamton)
- Jess B. Bessinger, Jr., Professor of English, New York University
- John L. Bishop, Lecturer in East Asian Languages and Civilizations, Harvard University
- Harold Bloom, Professor of English, Yale University
- Morton W. Bloomfield, Arthur Kingsley Porter Professor of English, Harvard University
- Arna Bontemps, late poet and writer
- Smith Palmer Bovie, Professor of Classics, Rutgers University
- Thomas O. Brandt, late Professor of German and Chairman of the Department of German and Russian, Colorado College
- David Bromwich, Scholar of the House in American Literature, Pierson College, Yale University
- Cleanth Brooks, Gray Professor of Rhetoric, Yale University
- Huntington Brown, Professor Emeritus of English, University of Minnesota
- Merle E. Brown, Professor of English, University of Iowa
- James Camp, Associate Professor of English, Newark College of Engineering
- Leonard Casper, Professor of English, Boston College
- Frank M. Chambers, Professor of French, University of Arizona
- Kun Chang, Professor of Oriental Languages, University of California (Berkeley)
- Seymour Chatman, Professor of Rhetoric, University of California (Berkeley)
- Arthur Melville Clark, Reader Emeritus in English Literature, University of Edinburgh
- Dorothy Clotelle Clarke, Professor of Spanish, University of California (Berkeley)
- Stanley K. Coffman, Professor and Chairman of the Department of English, Bowling Green State University
- W. E. Collin, former Professor of Romance Languages, University of Western Ontario
- Padraic Colum, late poet and author
- J. E. Congleton, Professor Emeritus of English, Findlay College
- Mercer Cook, Professor Emeritus of Romance Languages, Howard University
- Procopé S. Costas, Professor of Classics, Brooklyn College, City University of New York

CONTRIBUTORS

- Hardin Craig, late Professor of English, Stanford University, University of North Carolina, and University of Missouri
- R. S. Crane, late Distinguished Service Professor of English, University of Chicago
- John A. Crow, Professor of Spanish, University of California (Los Angeles)
- István Csicsery-Rónay, Hungarian writer and critic
- Jonathan D. Culler, Fellow and Director of Studies in Modern Languages, Selwyn College, University of Cambridge
- A. Grove Day, Professor Emeritus of English, University of Hawaii
- Paul de Man, Professor of Comparative and French Literature, Yale University
- Endre De Spur, formerly, The Gypsy Lore Society
- Vinton A. Dearing, Professor of English, University of California (Los Angeles)
- R. J. Dorius, Professor of English, San Francisco State College
- David F. Dorsey, Associate Professor of English and Afro-American Studies, Atlanta University
- Fred A. Dudley, Professor Emeritus of English, Washington State University
- Charles W. Dunn, Margaret Brooks Robinson Professor of Celtic Languages and Literatures and Chairman of the Department, Harvard University
- Robert M. Durling, Professor of English, University of California (Santa Cruz)
- John M. Echols, Professor of Linguistics and Asian Studies, Cornell University
- Brian R. Elliott, Reader in Australian Literature, University of Adelaide
- Robert C. Elliott, Professor of English Literature, University of California (San Diego)
- Gerald F. Else, Professor of Classical Studies and Director of The Center for Coordination of Ancient and Modern Studies, University of Michigan
- John J. Enck, late Professor of English, University of Wisconsin
- Alfred Garwin Engstrom, Alumni Distinguished Professor of French, University of North Carolina (Chapel Hill)
- Victor Erlich, Bensinger Professor of Russian Literature, Yale University
- Alvin A. Eustis, Professor of French, University of California (Berkeley)
- Robert O. Evans, Professor of English, University of Kentucky
- Robert P. Falk, Professor of English, University of California (Los Angeles)
- Leon Feraru, late Professor and Chairman of the Department of Modern Languages, Long Island University
- Palamandadige Eberg Edwin Fernando, Professor of Sinhalese, University of Ceylon
- Solomon Fishman, former Professor of English, University of California (Davis)
- Wolfgang Bernard Fleischmann, Professor of Comparative Literature and Dean of the School of Humanities, Montclair State College
- Richard Harter Fogle, University Distinguished Professor of English, University of North Carolina (Chapel Hill)
- Stephen F. Fogle, late Professor of English, Adelphi Suffolk College
- Zbigniew Folejewski, Professor of Slavonic Studies and Chairman, Comparative Literature, University of British Columbia
- Tatiana Fotitch, Professor Emeritus of Romance Languages and Literatures, Catholic University of America
- Wallace Fowlie, James B. Duke Professor of French Literature, Duke University
- Jean Franco, Professor of Spanish and Comparative Literature, Stanford University
- John Fraser, Professor of English, Dalhousie University
- Ralph Freedman, Professor of Comparative Literature, Princeton University
- Bernard J. Fridsma, Professor Emeritus of Germanic Languages, Calvin College
- Albert B. Friedman, Professor of English, Claremont Graduate School
- Norman Friedman, Professor of English, Queens College, City University of New York
- Northrop Frye, University Professor, Massey College, University of Toronto
- Joseph G. Fucilla, Professor Emeritus of Romance Languages, Northwestern University
- Paul Fussell, Professor of English, Rutgers University
- Naomi Garrett, Professor of Romance Languages, West Virginia State College
- Carolyn F. Gerald, Associate Professor of Black Literature, Atlanta University
- Robert J. Getty, late Paddison Professor of Classics, University of North Carolina (Chapel Hill)
- Pierre Gilbert, Professor of the History of Art, Université Libre de Bruxelles
- G. Giovannini, Professor of English, Catholic University of America
- John F. Goins, Professor of Anthropology, University of California (Riverside)
- Ulrich K. Goldsmith, Professor of German and Comparative Literature, University of Colorado
- Lewis H. Gordon, Professor of Italian and French, Brown University
- Bernard Groom, former Professor of English, McMaster University
- Fabian Gudas, Professor of English, Louisiana State University

CONTRIBUTORS

- Hans G. Güterbock, Tiffany and Margaret Blake Distinguished Service Professor of Hittitology, University of Chicago
- Theodore Johannes Haarhoff, Emeritus Professor of Classics, University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg
- Vernon Hall, Jr., Professor of Comparative Literature, University of Wisconsin (Madison)
- Talat S. Halman, Lecturer in Turkish, Princeton University
- O. B. Hardison, Jr., Director, The Folger Shakespeare Library
- Jacques Hardré, Kenan Professor of French and Chairman of the Department of Romance Languages, University of North Carolina (Chapel Hill)
- William E. Harkins, Professor of Slavic Languages, Columbia University
- Lyndon Harries, Professor of African Languages and Literature, University of Wisconsin (Madison)
- Sylvia C. Harris, Lecturer in German, Birkbeck College, University of London
- Samuel Hazo, Professor of Literature, Duquesne University
- George T. Hemphill, Professor of English, University of Connecticut
- Hanford M. Henderson, formerly, American Academy, Rome
- Marvin T. Herrick, late Professor of English, University of Illinois
- Daniel G. Hoffman, Professor of English, University of Pennsylvania
- John Hollander, Professor of English, Hunter College, City University of New York
- C. Hugh Holman, Kenan Professor of English, University of North Carolina (Chapel Hill)
- Urban T. Holmes, Jr., Kenan Professor of Romance Languages, University of North Carolina (Chapel Hill)
- Roger A. Hornsby, Professor and Chairman of the Department of Classics, University of Iowa
- Leo Hughes, Professor of English, University of Texas
- Gloria T. Hull, Assistant Professor of English, University of Delaware
- W.T.H. Jackson, Professor of German and History, Columbia University
- Vera Javarek, former Lecturer in Serbo-Croatian Language and Literature, University of London
- Douglas Johnson, Assistant Professor of Black Literature, Federal City College
- James William Johnson, Professor of English, University of Rochester
- Charles W. Jones, Professor of English, University of California (Berkeley)
- Michael K. Joseph, Professor in English, Auckland University, N. Z.
- Sholom J. Kahn, Assistant Professor of English, Hebrew University, Jerusalem
- John D. Kendall, formerly, School of Library Science, University of Minnesota
- Hugh Kenner, Professor of English Literature, Johns Hopkins University
- Kevin Kerrane, Associate Professor of English, University of Delaware
- Thomas A. Kirby, Professor and Head of the Department of English, Louisiana State University
- Charles A. Knudson, Professor of French, University of Illinois
- June Q. Koch, Assistant Professor of English, Bryn Mawr College
- Miriam Koshland-Joel, writer and translator
- Manfred Kridl, late Adam Mickiewicz Professor of Polish Studies, Columbia University
- Murray Krieger, University Professor of English, University of California (Irvine)
- John R. Krueger, Professor of Uralic and Altaic Studies, Indiana University
- James Craig La Drière, Professor of Comparative Literature, Harvard University
- Stephen A. Larrabee, author and critic
- Sally N. Lawall, Professor and Chairman of the Department of Comparative Literature, University of Massachusetts
- Laurence D. Lerner, Professor of English, University of Sussex, England
- Samuel R. Levin, Professor of English, Graduate Center, City University of New York
- John L. Lievsay, James B. Duke Professor of English, Duke University
- Herbert Lindenberger, Avalon Professor of Humanities in Comparative Literature and English and Chairman, Department of Comparative Literature, Stanford University
- René Felix Lissens, Professor of Dutch Literature and European Literatures, Universitaire Faculteiten, St.-Ignatius, Antwerp
- D. Myrddin Lloyd, Keeper of Printed Books, National Library of Scotland
- Edgar Lohner, Professor and Chairman of the Department of German, Stanford University
- Richard A. Long, Professor of English and Director, Center for African and African-American Studies, Atlanta University
- Albert B. Lord, Arthur Kingsley Porter Professor of Slavic and Comparative Literature, Harvard University
- Katharine Luomala, Professor of Anthropology, University of Hawaii
- Sverre Lyngstad, Professor of English, Newark College of Engineering
- Frederick P. W. McDowell, Professor of English, University of Iowa
- John MacInnes, Lecturer in Scottish Studies, University of Edinburgh
- Clarence A. Manning, former Associate Professor of Slavic Languages, Columbia University

CONTRIBUTORS

- Vladimir Markov, Professor of Slavic Languages, University of California (Los Angeles)
- Robert Marsh, Professor of English, University of Chicago
- Wallace Martin, Professor of English, University of Toledo
- David I. Masson, Librarian in Charge of Brotherton Collection, University of Leeds Library
- William Kleesman Matthews, late Professor of Russian Language and Literature and Head of the Department of Language and Literature at the School of Slavonic and East European Studies, University of London
- Rigo Mignani, Professor of Romance Languages, State University of New York (Binghamton)
- Louis T. Milic, Professor of English, Cleveland State University
- Elizabeth Maxfield Miller, former Instructor in French, Concord Academy
- Earl Miner, Professor of English, Princeton University
- Luis Monguió, Professor of Spanish, University of California (Berkeley)
- Stephen L. Mooney, late Professor of English, University of Tennessee
- Bayard Quincy Morgan, late Professor of German, Stanford University
- Wesley Morris, Associate Professor of English, Rice University
- John M. Munro, Professor of English, American University of Beirut
- Robert D. Murray, Jr., Associate Professor of Classics, Princeton University
- George Nakashidse, former Lecturer in Georgian History and Literature, Columbia University
- Lowry Nelson, Jr., Professor of Comparative Literature, Yale University
- William Van O'Connor, late Professor and Chairman of the Department of English, University of California (Davis)
- John B. Olli, Professor Emeritus of Germanic and Slavic Languages, City College, City University of New York
- Ants Oras, Professor of English, University of Florida
- G.N.G. Orsini, Professor and Chairman of the Department of Comparative Literature, University of Wisconsin (Madison)
- Kostas Ostrauskas, Lithuanian dramatist, literary historian, and musicologist
- Lucy B. Palache, editorial research assistant
- Douglass S. Parker, Professor of Classics, University of Texas
- Richard A. Parker, Wilbour Professor of Egyptology, Brown University
- John P. Pauls, Professor of Russian Language and Literature, University of Cincinnati
- Hla Pe, Professor of Burmese, School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London
- Laurence Perrine, Professor of English, Southern Methodist University
- Robert H. Pfeiffer, late Hancock Professor of Hebrew and Other Oriental Languages, Harvard University
- Allen W. Phillips, Professor of Spanish, University of Texas
- Seymour M. Pitcher, Professor of English and Comparative Literature, State University of New York (Binghamton)
- Alex Preminger, Associate Professor, Brooklyn College Library, City University of New York
- Frederick James Edward Raby, late Fellow of the British Academy. Honorary Fellow, Jesus College, University of Cambridge
- V. Raghavan, Professor Emeritus and former Head of the Department of Sanskrit, University of Madras
- Paul Ramsey, Alumni Distinguished Service Professor of English, University of Tennessee (Chattanooga)
- Joseph Remenyi, late Professor of Comparative Literature, Western Reserve University
- Elias L. Rivers, Professor of Spanish and Chairman of the Department of Romance Languages, Johns Hopkins University
- James K. Robinson, Professor and Head of the Department of English, University of Cincinnati
- Brewster Rogerson, Professor of English, Kansas State University
- George Brandon Saul, Professor of English, University of Connecticut
- Aldo Scaglione, W. R. Kenan Professor of Romance Languages and Comparative Literature, University of North Carolina (Chapel Hill)
- Bernard N. Schilling, Trevor Professor of English and Comparative Literature, University of Rochester
- H. Stefan Schultz, Professor of German, University of Chicago
- Alexander H. Schutz, late Professor of Romance Languages, Ohio State University
- Christoph E. Schweitzer, Professor and Chairman of the Department of Germanic Languages and Literatures, University of North Carolina (Chapel Hill)
- A. Lytton Sells, Professor Emeritus of French and Italian, Indiana University
- R. B. Serjeant, Sir Thomas Adams's Professor of Modern Arabic, University of Cambridge
- Vsevoled Setchkarev, Curt Hugo Reisinger Professor of Slavic Languages and Literatures, Harvard University
- Lawrence A. Sharpe, Associate Professor of Spanish and Portuguese, University of North Carolina (Chapel Hill)
- Albert Thompson Shaw, former Director of Music and Art Master, The Royal Grammar School, Worcester, England

CONTRIBUTORS

- Eisig Silberschlag, Professor of Literature and Dean, Hebrew Teachers College, Brookline
- Isidore Silver, Rosa May Distinguished Professor in the Humanities, Washington University
- John I. Simon, drama and film critic
- A. Neil Skinner, Professor of African Languages and Literature, University of Wisconsin (Madison)
- A.J.M. Smith, Professor Emeritus of English, Michigan State University
- Barbara Herrnstein Smith, Professor of Literature, Bennington College
- Robert W. Stallman, Professor of English, University of Connecticut
- Edward Stankiewicz, Professor of Slavic Languages and Linguistics, Yale University
- Martin Steinmann, Jr., Professor of English, University of Minnesota
- Stephen Stepanchev, Professor of English, Queens College, City University of New York
- Roy Arthur Swanson, Professor of Classics and Comparative Literature and Chairman of the Department of Comparative Literature, University of Wisconsin (Milwaukee)
- Kiril Taranovski, Professor of Slavic Languages and Literatures, Harvard University
- William Thalbitzer, late Professor of Eskimo Language and Culture, University of Copenhagen
- John Thompson, Professor of English, State University of New York (Stony Brook)
- Robert D. Thornton, Professor of English and Chairman of the Department of English and World Literature, State University of New York (New Paltz)
- Ernst S. Trümpler, Instructor, Kantonsschule Schaffhausen, Switzerland
- C. A. Trypanis, former Bywater and Sotheby Professor of Byzantine and Modern Greek Languages and Literatures, University of Oxford
- Louis Untermeyer, poet, anthologist, and editor
- Gustave Vanwelkenhuyzen, Académie Royale de langue et de Littérature Françaises, Brussels
- V. H. Viglielmo, Professor of Japanese, University of Hawaii
- Frank J. Warnke, Professor of English and Chairman, Comparative Literature, University of Washington
- Weber-Perret, Swiss author, journalist, and educator
- Kurt Weinberg, Professor of Foreign Languages and Comparative Literature, University of Rochester
- Uriel Weinreich, late Professor of Yiddish Language, Literature, and Culture on the Atran Chair, and Chairman of the Department of Linguistics, Columbia University
- Ulrich Weisstein, Professor of German and Comparative Literature, Indiana University
- Henry W. Wells, Curator Emeritus, Brander Matthews Dramatic Museum, Columbia University. Former Professor of English, Columbia University
- George Whalley, Professor and Head of the Department of English, Queen's University
- Philip Wheelwright, late Professor of Philosophy, University of California (Riverside)
- Harold Whitehall, Professor Emeritus of English and Linguistics, Indiana University
- William Willeford, Associate Professor of English and Comparative Literature, University of Washington
- William Carlos Williams, late poet and author
- Sir Richard Olaf Winstedt, former Reader in Malay, University of London
- A.S.P. Woodhouse, late Professor of English, University of Toronto
- Mabel P. Worthington, Professor of English, Temple University
- Stephen Wright, formerly, Haile Selassie I University, Addis Ababa
- Paul M. Zall, Professor of English, California State University
- Henri de Ziegler, former President, University of Geneva
- Lawrence J. Zillman, Professor of English, University of Washington

PRINCETON
ENCYCLOPEDIA OF POETRY AND POETICS

A

ABECEDARIUS. See ACROSTIC.

ABSOLUTISM IN CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

ABSTRACT. See CONCRETE AND ABSTRACT.

ABSTRACT POEM. Dame Edith Sitwell describes the poems in her Façade as "abstract poems [italics hers]—that is, . . . patterns in sound." She apparently understands "abstract" as it is used in connection with, say, painting (many prefer "nonrepresentational" or "non-objective") and/or in the sense in which music is said to be abstract—though all three arts obviously present concrete experiences of sound, shape, color, etc. Insofar as Dame Edith's phrase suggests a poetry of pure sound without sense, it is an exaggeration, for her critics agree that the Façade poems exemplify the familiar elaboration of Pope: that the total sense of a poem is in part a function of its sound.—E. Sitwell, "On My Poetry," Orpheus, 2 (1949); A Celebration for E. S., ed. J. Garcia Villa (1948); J. Lindsay, "Introductory Essay" to E. S., Façade and Other Poems (1950); Deutsch. J.D.K.

ABYSSINIAN POETRY. See ETHIOPIAN POETRY.

ACATALECTIC. See TRUNCATION.

ACCENT. The vocal emphasis with which a syllable is spoken relative to the emphasis received by contiguous syllables. Some linguists and prosodists equate a. with stress (q.v.); some maintain that stress is simply one of the constituents of a.; and some hold that the two are quite different things. Disagreement over the nature of a. is traditional in prosodic theorizing. Does an accented syllable have a higher pitch (q.v.) than an unaccented one? Does it have a longer duration (q.v.)? Is it louder? Has it a unique timbre or quality? Or is its emphatic characteristic connected with some sort of mysterious "energy" or "impulsion" which cannot be described in terms of either pitch, length, loudness, or quality? There is little solid agreement about these questions, even though the coarsest sensibility is capable of perceiving that the line

To me the meanest flower that blows can give consists of alternating "accented" and "unaccented" syllables. Although it is obvious that there are infinite degrees of a. (whatever it is), prosodists frequently discriminate three degrees for purposes of scansion (q.v.): primary a., secondary a., and weak a.

Accents are also classified by kind: etymological or grammatical ("lexical" or "word") a. is the accentual pattern customary to the word because of derivation or the relationship of prefix and suffix to root; rhetorical or logical ("sense") a. is the variable degree of emphasis given syllables according to their sense in context, e.g.

Have you the money? Have you the m^on^ey?

and metrical a. is the abstract pattern of more or less regularly recurring emphases in a line of fairly orthodox verse. Most modern prosodic theorists would hold that metrical a. almost always yields to rhetorical except in rare cases of presumably intentional "wrenched a.," as in some popular ballads:

And I fear, I fear, my dear master,
That we will come to harm.

(Sir Patrick Spens)

On the other hand, conservative prosodists of the 18th and early 19th c. frequently maintained that rhetorical a. yields to metrical.

A., however defined, is the metrical basis of Germanic accentual and accentual-syllabic prosodies (see METER), in which, most frequently, the rhetorical importance of words or syllables in context provides the pattern of metrical accents. See STRESS, PROSODY.

R. M. Alden, Eng. Verse (1903); J. B. Mayor, A Handbook of Modern Eng. Metre (1903); T. S. Omond, Eng. Metrists (1921); R. Bridges, Milton's Prosody (rev. ed., 1921); Baum; L. Abercrombie, Principles of Eng. Prosody: Part I (1923); P. Fussell, Jr., Theory of Prosody in 18th-C. England (1954). P.F.

ACCENTUALISM. See METER.

ACCENTUAL-SYLLABIC VERSE. See METER.

ACCORD. Term used by the unanimists J. Romaine and G. Chennetière in discussion of a supposedly new verse technique called by J. Hytier the vers classique-moderne. While the unanimists often employed conventional rhyme, in the accords proprement dits vowel rhyme is sacrificed and replaced by homophony of at least one of the consonants preceding or following the vowel. Like rhyme, the accord may be poor, with homophony of only one consonant (mer/cor; d'été/sept ans); sufficient (cri/croc; peste/buste), or rich (ruche/rêche); and it may be masculine (bonheur/mort), feminine (sentinelle/nulle), or mixed (seule/sol). The unanimists identified also an a. renversé, in which the homophonous consonants are in reverse order (riche/cher), and even theoretically an a. renversé imparfait (sac/col). Its champions considered le vers accordé superior to Fr. classical verse in richness and complexity of harmonious relations. Grammont disagreed and proclaimed much of their theory sheer illusion. Romans' use of accords in the poems of La vie unanime (1908) and Odes et prières (1913) may have influenced the "half-rhyme" verse of Wilfred Owen. See also NEAR RHYME.—J. Romans and G. Chennevière, Petit traité de versification (1923); J. Hytier, Les techniques modernes du vers français (1923); M. Grammont, review of the preceding study in RLR, 62 (1923); D.S.R. Welland, "Half-Rhyme in Wilfred Owen: Its Derivation and Use," RES, n.s. 1 (1950). A.G.E.

ACEPHALOUS (Gr. "headless"). Said of a line whose first syllable is, according to the strict pattern, wanting: "Whán that Áprill with his shóures sóote" (Chaucer, Canterbury Tales, Gen. Prol. 1). A. verse rarely occurs in ancient hexameters (but see Homer, Iliad 23.2), though it is commonly found in Gr. dramatic and lyric verse. Its effect is subtle when skillfully used by a master such as Pindar. Often, however, a unit labeled a. may more properly be given another name, e.g., in Gr. lyric an a. Ionic a. minore scans the same as a bacchius — — (q.v.). In Eng. an iambic line with a monosyllabic first foot is said to be a.—Schipper; P. Maas, Griechische Metrik (1929); Dale; Koster. R.O.E.

ACMEISM (Gr. acme, "utmost," "a pinnacle of"). A school in modern Rus. poetry. In 1910, A. Akhmatova, S. Gorodetsky, N. Gumilyov, M. Kuzmin, and O. Mandelstam—a group of young Rus. poets gathered about the magazine Apolon—set out to chart a new course in Rus. verse writing. The acmeists spurned the esoteric vagueness of symbolism, which then dominated the Rus. literary scene, its vaunted "spirit of music," i.e., the tendency to achieve maximum emotional suggestiveness at the expense of lucidity and sensory vividness. They strove instead for "Apollonian" clarity, for graphic sharpness of outline, and sought to convey the texture of things rather than their inner soul. To the acmeist, the poet was not a seer or a prophet, but a craftsman (hence the name of the principal literary association of the acmeists, the "Guild of Poets"). These tenets found expression in the highly cultivated poetry of Osip Mandelstam (1891–1942?), which combines classical learning with "modern" compactness of imagery, and in the sparse, intimate verse of Anna Akhmatova (1889–), one of modern Russia's finest lyrical poets. Nikolay Gumilyov (1886–1921), who, as a leading theorist of the school, preached neoclassicism, often tended in his own poetry toward the flamboyantly exotic and romantic. Acmeism produced some distinguished poetry, yet as a literary movement it proved short-lived and a rather inconclusive venture. After 1917, their aloofness from social problems and their relatively conservative aesthetics made the acmeists unpopular with both the official Soviet critics and the bulk of the literary avant-garde.—D. S. Mirsky, A Hist. of Rus. Lit. (1949); L. Strakhovsky, Craftsmen of the Word (1949); A Treasury of Rus. Verse, ed. A. Yarmolinsky (1949). V.E.

ACROSTIC. The most common a. is a poem in which the initial letters of each line have a meaning when read downward. There are many variations among which the following are the most important: an a. might be a prose composition in which the initial letters of each paragraph make up the word or words in question; the a. might use the middle (mesostich) or the final letter (telestich) of each line; finally, the key letters might be distributed by stanzas and not by lines.

According to some, the a. was first used as a mnemotechnic device to ensure completeness in the oral transmission of sacred texts. In ancient times mystical significance was attributed to a. compositions. In the Old Testament all the recognized acrostics belong to the alphabetical type (abecedarian). Psalm 119 offers the most elaborate example. Here the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet in their proper order form the initial letters of every other line of the 22 stanzas of the Psalm. Another example of this type of a. is Chaucer's poem An A.B.C. Gr. authors of the Alexandrian time as well as L. authors (e.g., Plautus) put the title of their plays in the a. verses of the arguments (as did Ben Jonson in The Alchemist). During the Middle Ages the a. often spelled out the name of the author or of a saint. Later also the name of the patron or the beloved was thus designated. Among the more famous poets to use the name of their beloveds are Boccaccio and Edgar Allan Poe. In the case of Der Ackermann aus Böhmen and of La Celestina the name "a." is important evidence for the identification of Johannes von Tepl and Fernando de Rojas respectively as their authors.

By extension, the forming of words—new or old—from the initials of other words is also called an a. In the early Christian church the famous symbol of the fish is the result of this type of a. The initials of the following five words spell out the Gr. word for fish, ichthys: Iēsous-CHristos-THEou-(H)Yios-Sōtēr. These words in turn mean Jesus-Christ-God's-Son-Saviour. Modern examples include words like AWOL and CARE.—R. Knox, Book of Acrostics (1924); R. Marcus, "Alphabetic Acrostics in the Hellenistic and Roman Periods," Jour. of Near Eastern Studies, 6 (1947). G.E.S.

ADNOMINATIO. See PUN.

ADONIC (Adoneus, versus Adonius). In Gr. and L. poetry this metrical unit was of the same form as the last 2 feet of the dactylic hexameter and took its name from the cry for the god Adonis:

ō̄ tōn ādōnīn. . .
(Sappho, fr. 168 Lobel and Page)

Certain Gr. proverbs in Adonics, e.g.

gnōthī seautōn.

The fourth and last line of the Sapphic (q.v.) stanza, as usually printed, was an A., although word-enjambement from the third to the fourth line would suggest that the two lines were metrically one, e.g. Horace's lābītūr rīpā īovē nōn prōbānt(e) ū-xorīŭs amnis

(Odes 1.2.19–20, a rare example in that poet). Seneca employed the A. sometimes in longer runs of "lesser Sapphics." Some poets later used it stichically:

nūbībŭs ātrīs
cōndītā nullŭm fŭndērē pōssŭnt
sīdērā lŭmēn.

Bowra; J. F. García, "La cesura en el verso 11 del carmen XI de Catulo," Emerita 9 (1941); Kolář; U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958). R.J.G.

ADYNATON. The use of the a. or impossibilia is a natural expression of exaggeration which has been in constant use from the primitive days of mankind. In Gr. and L. literature the two most common varieties are the "sooner-than type" bringing out that the impossible will come true sooner than that which is mentioned by a person will take place, and the "impossible count" type referring to the number of sands on the shore, the stars in the sky, pebbles on the beach, waves in the seas, ears of corn in the fields, etc. These varieties do not occur in the literature of the Middle Ages, or, in any case, are very rare. In contrast, a different brand was cultivated by OF writers known as the fatrasie, dealing with impossible or ridiculous accomplishments (cf. the fatrasies of Philippe de Beaumanoir and the anonymous Fatrasies d'Arras). Prov. writers used an allied form made popular by Petrarch's sonnet: Pace non trovo e non ho da far guerra. The Gr. and L. types were, however, abundantly revived by Petrarchists all over Europe, who primarily made use of them either to emphasize the cruelty of their lady loves, or as an affirmation of their eternal love, praise, loyalty, and the like. Since Petrarchism (q.v.) the device has suffered a marked decline in literary circles.—R. H. Coon, "The Reversal of Nature as a Rhetorical Figure," Indiana Univ. Studies, 15 (1928); H. V. Canter, "The Figure A. in Gr. and L. Poetry," AJP, 51 (1930); E. Dutoit, Le Thème de l'adynaton dans la poésie antique (1936); J. G. Fucilla, Studies and Notes (1953); L. C. Porter, La Fatrasie et le fatras (1960). J.G.F.

AEOLIC (properly the name of the dialect of Gr. in which were written the poems of Alcaeus and Sappho) is a term applied to a class of meters in which dactyls and trochees are brought closely together, so that choriambic appear conspicuously. Indeed opinions are divided as to whether choriambic is preferable in Aeolic verse to dactylo-trochaic ("falling") and, alternatively, iambo-anapaestic ("rising") scansion. In several forms the first 2 syllables vary in quantity between long and short and are called the "Aeolic base," the subsequent choriamb may be repeated, and the line may end with an iambic metron. The variability of the first 2 syllables (the first 4 in the case of the "polyschematist," q.v.) and the frequent presence of the choriamb have tempted theorists to see parallels with e.g., Vedic verse.—Hardie; Bowra; Dale; D. Page, Sappho and Alcaeus (1955); W. Borgeaud, "Analyse de quelques mètres éoliens," L'Antiquité classique, 26 (1957). W.B.

AESTHETIC DISTANCE. Aesthetic or physical d. is essentially a psychological rather than a spatial or temporal concept. It is meant to describe the attitude or perspective of a person toward an object when he contemplates it as separated from any personal or practical interest to himself. In the purely aesthetic sense, as formulated by Münsterberg, Puffer, Bullough, and others, "d." is the indispensable prerequisite for a contemplation of the artistic object as object by either the critic or the creator of it.

According to Bullough, who coined the term in 1912, aesthetic or "psychical d." may vary with respect to the individual and to the character of the artistic object being contemplated. A critic of a poem, for example, may fluctuate in his aesthetic attitude between the dangers of "overdistancing" and "underdistancing." If perspective is "overdistanced," the critic will be "too cold and withdrawn" in his appreciation of a poem. If perspective is "underdistanced," the critic's view will tend to become "unduly subjective and practical" (J. L. Jarrett, The Quest for Beauty, p. 112). The proper aesthetic d. could be said to lie somewhere between these two extremes, subject in the final analysis to the variables of individual taste and temperament. To illustrate personal variability with regard to "d.," Jarrett has noted that Bullough himself believed that the most desirable d. was consonant with its "utmost decrease" while Ortega y Gasset held that the ideal was possible only with the "utmost increase" of d. between the viewer and the object. Jarrett attributes this divergence to the romantic character of Bullough's taste as opposed to the more classical preferences of Ortega (Jarrett, p. 117).

The artistic object may itself determine the d. required for its appreciation. With respect to literature, for example, David Daiches has written that each "work of literary art, by its diction as well as other devices, provides an implicit set of directions concerning the distance from the object at which the reader must stand if he is to see it for what it is" (A Study of Literature for Readers and Critics, p. 63). Daiches' comment implies that every artist must bear the responsibility of incorporating into his work those devices that will help the reader determine the perspective or d. at which the work should be viewed. Milton's Paradise Lost, for instance, requires and demands a greater aesthetic d. for its appreciation than Frost's Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening or Herrick's Upon Julia's Clothes. It follows, therefore, that the artist, like the critic, is subject to the discipline of d. Distance for the artist permits him to cultivate a detachment toward his work even while he is creating it in order to consummate it with the proper "antinomy." D. for the critic enables him to keep his perspective free of irrelevant subjective discoloration in order to see in a work all the nuances that constitute the entirety of its meaning.—E. Bullough, "Psychical D. as a Factor in Art and an Aesthetic Principle," Brit. Jour. of Psychol., 5 (1912); H. S. Langfeld, The Aesthetic Attitude (1920); D. Daiches, A Study of Lit. for Readers and Critics (1948); J. L. Jarrett, The Quest for Beauty (1957). P. A. Michelis, "Aesthetic D. and the Charm of Contemporary Art," JAAC, 18 (1959); S. Dawson, "Distancing as an Aesthetic Principle," Australasian Jour.

of Philos. 39 (1961) questions Bullough's assumptions. S.H.

AESTHETICISM. A term applied to the point of view that art is self-sufficient, need serve no ulterior purpose, and should not be judged by moral, political, or other nonaesthetic standards. Proponents of a. have often displayed self-consciousness in their rebellion against didacticism in art, since they have often been a minority in middle-class communities distrustful of art and artists.

The genesis of this view of art can be traced to the writers and philosophers of the German romantic movement—Kant, Schelling, Goethe, and Schiller—who were all agreed that art must be autonomous. Kant stressed the "pure" and disinterested existence of the work of art; Schiller, the all-importance of form; Goethe, the work of art as an independent organism; and Schelling, the work of art as a unique revelation of the universal in the particular. In England, these ideas, at least in part, were diffused by Coleridge and Carlyle; in America, by Emerson and Poe; in France, by such enthusiasts for German culture as Mme de Stael, Victor Cousin, and his disciple Théophile Jouffroy. Cousin is reported to have made use of the phrase "l'art pour l'art" in his lectures on Le Vrai, le Beau et le Bien of 1818 (which were not printed until 1836); other early examples of the perhaps fortuitous use of this phrase can be found in the Journal Intime of Benjamin Constant (1804, publ. in 1895) and in discussion by Victor Hugo in 1829. The idea of "art for art" is also implicit in Hugo's Prefaces to Cromwell (1827) and Hernani (1830).

The first vigorous, self-conscious expression of a. in modern literature, however, is that of Gautier, who humorously but emphatically denied in the Preface to Mademoiselle de Maupin (1835) that art could be in any way useful. From Gautier and from Poe, with his view that poetry is "the rhythmical creation of Beauty" (The Poetic Principle, 1850), Baudelaire adopted an aesthetic view of experience, and in writing his poetry rejected all considerations save the sovereignty of the artist and the desire to apprehend an ultimate Reality through the process of creation itself. In his concern with the ultimate implications of his materials, however, Baudelaire revealed that his sensibility was partly moral; and despite his devotion to art in its purity, he was also led to protest against "the childish utopianism of the school of art for art's sake in ruling out morals."

Baudelaire's view of experience as "a forest of symbols" to which the poet must give order and his theory of the "correspondences" existing among the objects of sense and "spiritual reality" and among the perceptions of the various senses themselves were incorporated in the Fr. symbolist movement, with Mallarmé and Verlaine as its leaders. The symbolists tried to communicate concentrated feeling through the use of evocative symbols rather than rational statement, and they also tried to refine and purify language to obtain this sort of communication. Following Poe, they held that poetry was to approximate the disembodied emotion to be found in music and that Ideal Beauty was to be sought beyond the visible world, though paradoxically to be evoked in terms of the visible world—or of symbols (in Wagner, the symbolists found a counterpart of what they were trying to do). The symbolists were also conscientious craftsmen interested in the complex and subtle relationships existing between the total poem and its component words and images. In Fr. literature the line is clear from Mallarmé to Rimbaud, who emphasized "the derangement of all the senses" to achieve new poetic effects and a complete freedom of the mind; to Valéry, who organized his poetry about the vivid image in an effort to achieve a "pure poetry," intellectually as well as emotionally defined; to Apollinaire, who, in his free subjectivism, anticipated the surrealists; and to Breton and Éluard, surrealists who exploited the subconscious in their poetry, often in an hallucinatory ambience.

A. in England was the product of native and Fr. influence both. The sometimes exaggerated individualism and subjectivity of romanticism encouraged the Eng. aesthetic movement of the 1880's. The preponderantly aesthetic values of Keats and Ruskin's enthusiastic worship of beauty were appropriated by the Pre-Raphaelites (see PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD) and made for a decorative art and literature instead of an ethically inspired one. In this decade and later the influence of Walter Pater was great. In the Conclusion to The Renaissance (1873), Eng. a. received almost an official sanction. Pater urged the sensitive individual "to burn always with this hard gem-like flame" and to find the most precious moments of his life in the pursuit of his sensations raised to the pitch of "poetic passion, the desire of beauty, the love of art for art's sake." Pater dominated the poets of the 1890's—Wilde, Dowson, Lionel Johnson, Symons, and the early Yeats. George Moore, Arthur Symons, and Edmund Gosse made the work of the new Fr. writers and painters available to the Englishmen of the 1890's (though Swinburne had previously discovered Baudelaire); somewhat later James Huneker performed a similar service in America. The Eng. poets of the 1890's were influenced more by the diabolism of Baudelaire and by the insistence of Verlaine that the poet depict nuances of mood and strive for a state of music in verse than by the uncompromising artistry evinced by the work of Mallarmé.

The two British and Am. pioneers of modern verse, Eliot and Pound, were introduced to the work of the Fr. symbolists by Symon's The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899) and incorporated into the Anglo-Saxon tradition what was most vital in the a. of Fr. poetry, the concept of the impersonal and objective existence of the poem. In America the work of MacLeish, Aiken, Cummings, Marianne Moore, Stevens, Hart Crane, Ransom, and Tate owes much to the symbolists' dedication to, and delight in, the exercise of the poet's craft and to their refusal to be inhibited by moral convention. In England, the followers of Eliot (Auden, Day Lewis, Spender, MacNeice) have absorbed the all-important concept of the autonomy of art, despite their earlier sociological orientation. Modernists like Roy Campbell and Robert Graves write a tightly knit "symbolistic" poetry; and other poets like Edith Sitwell, Dylan Thomas, Lawrence Durrell, David Gascoyne, and George Barker have been influenced by the surrealist descendants of the symbolists. In Germany the earlier verse of Stefan George and Rainer Maria Rilke reveals the influence of Fr. a. In general, all these modern proponents of a., except for some of the surrealists, have tended to regard poetry more as a public and social activity than did Mallarmé and his immediate contemporaries. Yet for all the authors mentioned in this article, the most valid aspect of a.—a realization that the Beautiful has independent importance and that the poet must be technically scrupulous in his work—was the prime motivating factor in their lives as artists.

See books by and about writers mentioned in article. Consult also H. Jackson, The Eighteen Nineties (1913); Martino; J. Farmer, Le Mouvement esthétique et "décadent" en Angleterre (1931); L. Rosenblatt, L'Idée de l'art pour l'art dans la litt. anglaise . . . (1931); Wilson; B. I. Evans, Eng. Poetry in the Later 19th C. (1933); M. Praz, The Romantic Agony (1933); Gilbert and Kuhn; C. M. Bowra, The Heritage of Symbolism (1943); W. Gaunt, The Aesthetic Adventure (1945); G. Matoré, La Preface de 'Mlle de Maupin' (1946); G. Michaud, Le Message poétique du symbolisme (3 v., 1947); T. S. Eliot, From Poe to Valéry (1948); G. Hough, The Last Romantics (1949); W. Fowlie, Age of Surrealism (1950); Lehman; Raymond; T. S. Eliot, "Arnold and Pater," Selected Essays (1950); R. Z. Temple, The Critic's Alchemy (1953); J. Wilcox, "The Beginnings of L'Art pour L'Art," JAAC, II (1953); J. Chiari, Symbolism from Poe to Mallarmé (1956); H. N. Fairchild, Religious Trends in Eng. Poetry, iv-v (1957-62); Wimsatt and Brooks; L. Eckhoff, The Aesthetic Movement in Eng. Lit. (1959); E. Starkie, From Gautier to Eliot (1959).

AFFECTIVE FALLACY

F.P.W.MCD.

AFFECTIVE FALLACY. The a.f., as defined by W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., and Monroe C. Beardsley, is the critical error of evaluating a work of art in terms of its effects or "its results in the mind of its audience" (The Verbal Icon, p. xi). Although significant affective theories of criticism can be traced from Plato through Longinus to I. A. Richards, the fallacy of affective criticism arises from a propensity to confuse the poem with its effect. Wimsatt and Beardsley claim that this propensity of some affective critics often forces much of their criticism—based as it is on the individual critic's response rather than on more formalistic criteria—into the byways of "impressionism and relativism" (ibid., p. 21). David Daiches has questioned this position by claiming that some form of legitimate affectiveness is necessary if the qualified reader is to avoid the "ontological fallacy of believing that a work of art fulfils its purpose and achieves its value simply by being" (Literary Essays, p. 173). He has suggested that a real relationship does exist between poetic effect and poetic value, and that affectivism can be saved from impressionistic and relativistic fallacies if the reader traces the "actual or potential effect" of the work upon himself to the internal structure of the work which has caused such an effect. Daiches has thus suggested the relevance of "emotional effect as a guide to value" (M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics, p. 491). However, separation of effect and value, i.e., evaluation based upon what a poem does, immediately relegates the poem itself "as an object of specifically critical judgment" (The Verbal Icon, p. 21) to a position of subordinate consideration. Such is the outcome and nature of the a.f.—a concern with effect to the subordination or disregard of the effect's source and means of creation. Wimsatt; D. Daiches, Lit. Essays (1956); M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics: Problems in the Philosophy of Crit. (1958).

S.H.

AFFLATUS (L. afflo, "to blow into or on"). In reference to poetry it is a synonym for inspiration (q.v.). It is usually qualified by the adjective "divine." Cicero (De Oratore 2.46) says that no man can be a poet "who is not on fire with passion and without a certain touch (afflatus) of frenzy." In De Natura Deorum 2.66: "No one . . . was ever great without a certain divine afflatus."

A.R.P.

AFRICAN NEGRO POETRY. See NEGRO POETRY. AFRICAN.

AFRIKAANS POETRY. See SOUTH AFRICAN POETRY.

AIR. (a) A song, especially a form of strophic song (Eng. "ayre," Fr. air de cour, It. balletto) in which the upper (melody) line is carried by solo voice or instrument. Because of this arrangement there is greater emphasis on the words, or poetic text, than in such compositions as madrigal or choric song. "A." in the above sense flourished during the 16th c., particularly in the hands of the Eng. lutenist composers like Dowland and Campion. (b) In a strictly musical sense, "a." is used in 17th- and 18th-c. France to refer to dancelike instrumental pieces. (c) In a somewhat recondite sense by Eng. musical writers of the 17th c., "ayre" comes to mean the mode, or key, of a particular musical sequence; thus frequently mentioned are the "aires which the Antiquity termed Modi" (Thomas Morley, A Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke, p. 147). This usage is supported by that of Charles Butler, Thomas Mace, and other theorists. This sense of the word seems to be the one used by Milton in "Lap me in soft Lydian airs" (L'Allegro 1.136).—The Eng. School of Lutenist Song Writers, ed. E. H. Fellowes (16 v., 1920-32; 2d ser., 16 v., 1925-27); P. Warlock, The Eng. Ayre (1926).

J.H.

ALBA (Prov.), aube, aubade (Fr.), Tagelied (Ger.). A dawn song, ordinarily expressing the regret of two lovers that day has come so soon to separate them. It has no fixed metrical form, but each stanza usually ends with the word alba. The earliest examples in Prov. and in Fr. date from the end of the 12th c. The a. probably grew out of the medieval watchman's cry, announcing from his tower the passing of the night hours and the return of day. And in one a. it is a watchman who speaks, a friend of the lover's, who has been standing guard. Others are little dialogues between lover and beloved, with occasional comments from the author. In Eng. poetry, examples can be found in Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde and the Reeve's Tale.—A. Jeanroy, Origines . . . and La Poésie . . .; R. E. Kaske, "An Aube in the Reeve's Tale," ELH, 26 (1959) and "January's Aube," MLN, 75 (1960). See also TAGELIED.

F.M.C.

ALBANIAN POETRY. The Albanians, numerically one of the smallest peoples in Europe, are also one of the most divided. Their struggle to secure their national independence, a unified language, and a modern literature has been complicated and difficult. Their speech has two distinct dialects, Geg (in the north) and Tosk (in the south), and the people are divided into three religious faiths—Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and Mohammedan. Under Ottoman rule, which lasted for more than four centuries, the task of unification was especially difficult, for the Turkish government, while employing many educated Moslem Albanians in high posts, still frowned upon the publication of books in the Alb. language, many of which had to appear abroad in Rumania, Bulgaria, and Egypt.

Alb. folk songs are composed in lines of 7 and particularly 8 syllables, chiefly trochaic. One of the most beautiful cycles of the north, the Mujo-Halil cycle, is in 10-syllable lines. They deal with the exploits of Alb. and sometimes of Slavic heroes, the latter modified to accord with Alb. environment. Yet there are several songs which bear witness to a general Balkan opposition to all invaders from abroad, whether Christian or Mohammedan. Very rare are songs in Albania proper which tell of the national hero George Castriotis, or Skanderbeg, who was reared at the Sultan's palace but died for the Christian cause in Lesh (Alessio) in 1468. However, in the large Alb. colonies in southeastern Italy there exists a whole Skanderbeg cycle. It pictures the violent struggles of feudal and Christian Albania under the leadership of the national hero to preserve her independence against the Turks. The spirit which inspired the songs around Skanderbeg has remained creative until very recent times.

The oldest known example of Alb. poetry is in the dialect of the Italo-Albanians (Tosk) and is by Father Llukë Matranga (1598), from the Alb. settlements in Sicily. In general, Alb. verse has its true birth in the 19th c., largely as a result of the interest in folk poetry which was associated with romanticism. Girolamo de Rada, an Italian of Alb. parentage, collected folk verse and later used some of their materials for his own poetry. Another significant Italo-Alb. poet was Zef Skiro (Schirò). Subsequently the brothers Sami Bey and Naïm Frashëri gave a great impetus to native Alb. culture, Naïm being the apostle-poet of Alb. nationalism. His nephew Midhat Frashëri (Lumo Skendo, 1880–1949), while not a poet himself, published in Sofia a number of important Alb. exile works, among them those of Aleksander Drenova (Asdren). Another important poet, Anton Çako (Çajupi) published most of his lyrics in Egypt.

After Albania recovered its independence in 1919, the poets shifted the center of their activities to their homeland. The focal point of the literary revival was in the Catholic North, and the outstanding poet was Father Gjergj Fishta (1871–1940), whose poetic creativeness had begun to be appreciated as early as the turn of the century. He was the author of lyric, satiric, and dramatic verse as well as of the epic Lahuta e Malcis (The Lute of the Mountains). He has been called Albania's "national poet." Other important figures included Vinqenc Prennushi, Ndre Mjeda, Ernest Koliqi, and Etehem Haxhiademi. F. S. Noli, a bishop in the Alb. Orthodox Church, is known not for his original poems but for his verse translations of such literary masterpieces as Shakespeare's works and Omar Khayyâm's Rubā'iyat. Of the younger poets of this time who wrote in Tosk, Lasgush Poradeci aroused the most excitement. With truly new poetic accents he combined the influences of Goethe, Eminescu, and the Fr. symbolists. A poet who became popular because he created in the spirit of folk poetry and sang of a period on the wane was Ali Asllani.

In the 1930's Albania, despite the pressure of its neighbors, was drawn rapidly into the Western world, and even the Mohammedans tended to study in the West rather than in the traditional center of Istanbul. The country was replacing the tribal organization with national, and in Tirana and other cities groups of literary men were in close contact with Western literary movements. The invasion of Mussolini checked these tendencies and broke up the unity of the Alb. intellectual class, which became involved in the international complications. The Fascists were succeeded by the Communists, and the latter silenced or destroyed most of the older writers who did not find refuge abroad. In the meantime only one sensitive poetic voice emerged, Migjeni. The younger writers, such as Aleks Caci, Mark Ndoja, and Veli Islami have followed the dominant Soviet themes with such Alb. coloring as the authorities allow, but their work is far inferior to that of the older generation, which followed its own inclinations and models.

In Albania so far no poet has arisen who has been able to make his appeal to the whole of this much-torn country, and Alb. literature is still best represented by its epic songs from the past. Little information comes out of the country today, and that little is not particularly hopeful.

ANTHOLOGIES AND COLLECTIONS: Kângë popullore gegënishte (Geg Folk Songs), comp. V. Prennushi (1911); Anthologjia Shqiptare, ed. K. Floqi (1923; coll. of epic and lyric verse); T. Mitko, Bleta Shqypëtare (The Alb. Bee), ed. Gj. Pekmezi (1924); Poesia popolare albanese, ed. E. Koliqi (1957).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: P. F. Cordignano, La poesia epica di confine nella Albania del Nord (1943); G. Petrotta, Svolgimento storico della cultura e della letteratura albanese (1950); S. Skendi, "The South Slavic Decasyllable in Alb. Oral Epic Poetry," [Slavic] Word, 9 (1953) and Alb. and South Slavic Oral Epic Poetry (1954); S. E. Mann, Alb. Lit. (1955); A. Logoreci, "Dialogue of Modern Alb. Writing," BA, 30 (1956); Albania, ed. S. Skendi (1957; ch. on "Lit. and the Arts").

C.A.M.

ALCAIC. Generally a 4-line stanza of Aeolic (q.v.) type, named after the Gr. poet Alkaios (Alcaeus, late 7th and early 6th c. B.C.). The scheme is:

— — — — — (twice) ||
 — — — — — ||
 — — — — —
 — — — — —

Lines 1 and 2 are Greater (or hendecasyllabic) Alcaics; line 3 is a 9-syllable A.; line 4 is a Lesser (or decasyllabic) A. This is the strophe used most frequently—37 times—by the Roman poet Horace (65–8 B.C.). It was adapted in It. by Gabriello Chiabrera (1552–1638), Paolo Rolli (1687–1765), and Giovanni Fantoni (1755–1807). Like Chiabrera, Renaissance metrists in England and France attempted recreation of the A. among other classical meters. In 18th-c. Germany F. G. Klopstock composed 17 A. odes. Hölderlin, von Platen, and others contributed to the tradition of the meter. Tennyson ("O mighty-mouth'd inventor of harmonies, . . ."), A. H. Clough, and Swinburne composed Eng. A. verses. Recent examples of translations from Gr. and L. into Eng. Alcaics are to be found in, e.g., Richmond Lattimore's version of Alcaeus'

Asunnetēmmi tōn anemōn stasin
 (Greek Lyrics, 1955, p. 27) and J. B. Leishman's, H. R. Henze's, J. Michie's translations of Horace (1956, 1961, 1963).—For bibliog., see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES. Also, C. H. Moore, Horace (1902); H. G. Atkins, A Hist. of German Versification (1923); O. Francabandera, Contribuzioni alla storia dell' alcaica (1928); G. Highet, The Cl. Tradition (1949); Koster; J.P.M. Blackett, "A Note on the A. Stanza," Greece and Rome, 2 (1956).

R.A.S.

ALCMANIC VERSE. A dactylic tetrameter catalectic in syllabam (— — — — — — —), named after the lyric poet Alcman (7th c. B.C.). It is found in the Gr. drama and occasionally in L. dramatic poetry in dactylo-epitrite periods or in periods of pure dactyls. The A. strophe is a combination of the A. verse with a dactylic hexameter. It occurs twice in Horace.—Bowra; Koster.

P.S.C.

ALEXANDRIANISM. The literary works and critical principles of Hellenistic writers (ca. 325–ca. 30 B.C., the "Golden Age" of A. being ca. 280–ca. 240 B.C.). Chief poetical forms were elegy (e.g., Callimachus, Philetas), epigrams (Callimachus, Asclepiades, Poseidippos, and others), lyric (for instance, the hymns of Callimachus), epic (Apollonius Rhodius' Argonautica, Rhianus' The Messenian Women, Callimachus' Hekale, Philetas' Hermes), pastoral (for example, Theocritus' Idylls), and didactic (e.g., Aratus' Phaenomena and the astronomical works of Eratosthenes). The earlier Alexandrians (Callimachus, Philetas, et al.) instituted an experimental and learned fashion of writing. Their followers, the later Alexandrians (e.g., Euphron, Antipater of Sidon, Archias of Antioch, Philodemos, Parthenios of Nicaea) favored experimental composition in narrative elegy, epigrams, hymns, iambs, paignia, the epyllion (or short epic), catalogue poems, and didactic poems, and introduced A. to Roman audiences and artists. The Alexandrians selected their source materials from the more specialized and less known forms of earlier poetry (e.g., the Cyclic poems, Hesiod, the Homeric hymns, and the lyrics of Stesichorus and Pindar). Their reaction against the traditional and popular forms is exemplified by Callimachus' outspoken preference of the epyllion over the epic; his pupil, Apollonius Rhodius, differed with him in this matter and thereupon produced the Argonautica in an approximation to the traditional epic manner. Alexandrian drama included Herodas of Cos's Mimiambi, which combined archaic form and contemporary content, and the works of the "Tragic Pleiad." Lycophron, one of the Pleiad, is credited with having written the most obscure and recondite poem of his time (of any time, we might say, excluding that of Eliot and Joyce), the Alexandra (or Cassandra), a dramatic monologue in 1,474 lines, studded with perplexing allusions and periphrases, neologisms, and (over 500) hapax legomena ("said only once"). The major movements in Alexandrian criticism were (1) the change from philosophical to scholastic estimates of literature and (2) establishing canons of earlier authors.

Under the Ptolemies a vast number of manuscripts were collected and stored in the Bruchaeum and Serapeum libraries at Alexandria. The Alexandrian scholars authenticated the works and Callimachus published an initial catalogue (Tables of Outstanding Writers and their Works) comprising about 120 books classified according to drama, poetry, legislation, history, oratory, rhetoric, and miscellaneous. Authors preserved in substantial quantity were published in formal editions (ecdoseis) accompanied by annotations (hypomnēmata). Canons of such authors were drawn up by Aristophanes of Byzantium and Aristarchus; these lists were based on the quantity rather than the quality of extant works: for example, "five" tragedians and "nine" lyric poets represent the authors whose works survived in complete texts and remained current. Unlike their contemporaries, the scholars of Pergamum, who directed their criticism and scholarship toward prose, the principal interest of the Alexandrian scholars was in poetry. They attempted, for example, to determine the original texts of edited authors, especially Homer—evidence of the caliber of their work on Homer is available in the Venetian scholia of the 10th c.—; they introduced the use of critical symbols (e.g., the obelus, asterisk, dipla); seeking to clarify matters of accentuation, they invented accent signs; they also sought to clarify metric.

The Alexandrian influence on L. literature is particularly noticeable in Catullus (poems: 63, Attis; 64, Peleus and Thetis; 66, The Lock of Berenice; and 68. Poems 64 and 68 are epyllionic; 66 is virtually a translation of a poem by Callimachus). Callimachus appears also to have influenced Gallus, Propertius, and Ovid in elegiac composition. Epyllionic composition in general characterized the works of the Neoterici (the Catullan school, including Calvus, Cinna, and Cornificius). It is, moreover, the style and form of the pseudo-Virgilian Culex and Ciris, Virgil's Georgics, and Ovid's Metamorphoses. Virgil's Eclogues (or Bucolics) extend the tradition of Theocritus' Idylls. The element of eroticism is fairly standard in Alexandrian lyric and epigram and is sustained in L. elegy.

It is clearly possible to draw an analogy between Alexandrian and modern poetry and criticism. Joyce, Yeats, Pound, and Eliot—to name only the most obvious figures—show an Alexandrian interest in myth, linguistic experiments, eroticism, forgotten areas of history and literature, etc. Likewise, the extensive development of criticism which has occurred since the 1920's might be (in fact, has been) called "Alexandrian."

A. Couat, La Poésie alexandrine sous les trois premiers Ptolémées (1882; Eng. tr., J. Loeb, 1931); F. Susemihl, Gesch. der griechischen Lit. in der Alexandrinerzeit (1891–92); G. Knaack, "Alexandrinische Lit.," in Pauly-Wissowa, Realencyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft 1.1 (1893–); J. E. Sandys, A Hist. of Cl. Scholarship, 1 (3d ed., 1921); J. D. Denniston, Gr. Lit. Crit. (1924); P.-E. Legrand, La Poésie alexandrine (1924); U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Hellenistische Dichtung in der Zeit des Kallimachos (1924); W. R. Roberts, Gr. Rhetoric and Lit. Crit. (1928); A. Körte, Die hellenistische Dichtung (1925; Eng. tr., J. Hammer and M. Hadas, 1929); M. M. Crump, The Epyllion from Theocritus to Ovid (1931); J. W. H. Atkins, Lit. Crit. in Antiquity (1934); W. Van O'Connor, "This Alexandrian Crit.," A Sch., 14 (1945); Curtius, ch. 14; F. C. Sell, "The Fusion of Languages: Modern A.," Minnesota Rev., 4 (1963). R.A.S.

ALEXANDRINE. In Fr. prosody, a line of 12 syllables. The a. has been, since the 16th c., the standard meter of Fr. poetry, in which it has had an importance comparable to that of the quantitative hexameter in L. poetry or blank verse in Eng. poetry; it has been used especially in dramatic and narrative forms. The earliest Fr. alexandrines occur in Le Pèlerinage de Charlemagne à Jérusalem, a chanson de geste (q.v.) of the early 12th c., which abandons the traditional decasyllabic verse of Fr. epic style for the longer line. However, the a. probably takes its name from a slightly later poem, the Roman d'Alexandre (late 12th c.) of Lambert le Tort, a romance based on the legendary exploits of Alexander the Great. Having fallen into disuse in the later medieval period, the meter was revived in the 16th c. by J. A. de Baif and was widely used by Ronsard and other members of the Pléiade (q.v.). After being perfected by the great dramatists of the 17th c., especially Racine, it became the dominant meter of all serious Fr. poetry. A certain regularity, characteristic of even the earlier a. verse, was intensified by the theory and practice of the 17th-c. poets, who developed strict rules for the use of the meter. In particular, the position of the caesura after the sixth syllable tended to become standard:

Je le vis, je rougis, || je pâlis à sa vue . . .
(Racine, Phèdre)

After the days of Corneille, Molière, and Racine, each of whom was able to impress the meter with his own personality, the a. tended to become excessively mechanical, until the advent of the Fr. romantics revolutionized it by an extensive use of enjambement (q.v.) and a freer practice of the so-called alexandrin ternaire, with its two pauses:

J'ai disloqué | ce grand niais | d'alexandrin . . .
(Hugo)

The evolution is complete with Verlaine who, by his musical fluidity, deemphasizing of rhyme, and offhand treatment of mute e, brings the a. to the brink of free verse. Since symbolism, the a. has oscillated, depending upon the poet, between Malherbian rigidity and symbolist evanescence.

The a. has had great importance in the poetry of several other languages, notably Dutch, in which it was the most widely used meter from the early 17th c. until around 1880. It is a common meter in 17th-c. German poetry—widely used in the school of Opitz because of the sanction lent it by Pléiade practice, imaginatively exploited by Andreas Gryphius because of its formal appropriateness to his antithesis-filled style. The a. is also the basis from which developed the cuaderna via (q.v.), the important 14-syllable Sp. meter, as well as the It. meter analogous to it. The Eng. a. differs from the Fr. in being actually longer. Composed of iambic feet, it contains 6 stress accents rather than the fluid 4 accents (occasionally 3) of the Fr. poets. Spenser uses the length of the Eng. a. to good advantage in The Faerie Queene: the a. which concludes a Spenserian stanza (q.v.) contrasts with the 8-pentameter lines which precede it and enables the poet to achieve both emphasis and stanzaic continuity. Several Eng. works—Drayton's Polyolbion, Browning's Fifine at the Fair, Bridges' Testament of Beauty—are written entirely in alexandrines, but in general the Eng. a. has proved too unwieldy for continuous use in a long work.—H. P. Thieme, The Technique of the Fr. A. (1898); V. Horak, Le vers a. en français (1911); G. Lote, L'alexandrin d'après la phonétique expérimentale (3 v., 1911–12); A. Rochette, L'alexandrin chez Victor Hugo (1911); J. B. Ratermanis, "L'inversion et la structure de l'alexandrin," FS, 6 (1952); M. Burger, Recherches sur la structure et l'origine des vers romans (1957). F.J.W.; A.P.

ALLEGORY (Gr. allos, "other," and agoreuein, "to speak") is a term denoting a technique of literature which in turn gives rise to a method of criticism. As a technique of literature, a. is a technique of fiction-writing, for there must be some kind of narrative basis for allegory. We have a. when the events of a narrative obviously and continuously refer to another simultaneous structure of events or ideas, whether historical events, moral or philosophical ideas, or natural phenomena. The myth and the fable are forms closely related to, or frequently used for, a., and the works usually called allegories are genres of fiction: epic (Dante's Divina Commedia), romance (Spenser's Faerie Queene), prose fiction (Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress) or drama (Everyman). It is continuity that distinguishes a. from ambiguity or simple allusion. Fiction-writing has two aspects: (1) a progression of incidents which are imitations of actions, and (2) elements of meaning or thought which represent a poetic use of ideas. Hence there are two main types of a.: historical or political a., referring to characters or events beyond those purportedly described in the fiction; and moral, philosophical, religious, or scientific allegories, referring to an additional set of ideas. If the allegorical reference is continuous throughout the narrative, the fiction "is" an a. If it is intermittent, if a. is picked up and dropped again at pleasure, as in many works of Ariosto, Goethe, Ibsen, and Hawthorne, we say only that the fiction shows allegorical tendencies. A. is thus not the name of a form or a genre, but of a structural principle in fiction.

A. may be simple or complex. In simple a. the fiction is wholly subordinate to the abstract "moral," hence it often impresses the literary critic as naive. An example is the fable, which is directed primarily at the set of ideas expressed in its moral. Simple historical allegories (simple at least as regards their literary structure) occur in some of the later prophecies of the Bible, such as the a. of the four kingdoms in Daniel. More complex historical and political allegories tend to develop a strongly ironic tone, resulting from the fact that the allegorist is pretending to talk about one series of incidents when he is actually talking about another. Hence there is a close connection between historical or political a. and satire, a connection marked in Spenser's Mother Hubbard's Tale (Prosopopoeia), which uses a beast-fable to satirize a contemporary political situation; in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, which uses an Old Testament story for the same purpose; in Swift's Tale of a Tub, and elsewhere.

Moral allegories are apt to be deeply serious in tone. In these the fiction is supposed to provide entertainment and the a. instruction. The basic technique of moral a. is personification, where a character represents an abstract idea. The simpler the a., the more urgently the reader's attention is directed to the allegorical meaning. Hence simple or naive moral a. belongs primarily to educational literature: to the fables and moralities of the schoolroom, the parables and exempla of the pulpit, the murals and statuary which illustrate familiar ideas in official buildings. Often the allegorist is too interested in his additional meaning to care whether his fiction is consistent or not as a fiction. Bunyan, even Spenser, occasionally drop into naive a. In the First Book of The Faerie Queene, the Redcross Knight is being taught by Faith, Hope, and Charity, and Hope urges him to take hold of her anchor, the traditional emblem of hope. It is possible to think of Hope as a female teacher lugging this anchor into the lecture room to make her point—such emblems are still brought into classrooms—but it is simpler to think that the literal narrative is being naively distorted by the allegorical interest.

Allegorical interpretation, as a method of criticism, begins with the fact that a. is a structural element in narrative: it has to be there, and is not added by critical interpretation alone. In fact, all commentary, or the relating of the events of a narrative to conceptual terminology, is in one sense allegorical interpretation. To say that Hamlet is a tragedy of indecision is to start setting up beside Hamlet the kind of moral counterpart to its events that an a. has as a part of its structure. Whole libraries of criticism may be written on the fictions of Hamlet or Macbeth, bringing out aspects of their meaning that would not occur to other readers, and all such commentary might be said, by a ready extension of the term, to allegorize the plays. But this does not, as is sometimes said, turn the plays into allegories. A glance at Hamlet is enough to show that it is not structurally an a. to begin with. If it were, the range of commentary would be greatly limited, because the presence of a. prescribes the direction in which commentary must go. As Hamlet is not an a., it has an implicit relation only to other sets of events or ideas, and hence can carry an infinite amount of commentary. Strictly defined, allegorical interpretation is the specific form of commentary that deals with fictions which are structurally allegories. This leaves considerable latitude still, for there are many fictions, notably ancient myths, where the presence or absence of a. is disputable. In this situation the critic must content himself with offering his allegorical interpretation as one of many possible ones, or—the more traditional method—he may assume that the poet has, deliberately or unconsciously, concealed allegorical meanings in his fiction. The history of allegorical interpretation is essentially the history of typical forms of commentary applied to fictions where a. is present, or is assumed to be so.

Of these, one of the earliest and most important is the rationalization of myth, especially classical myth. The stories about the gods in Homer and Hesiod were felt by many early Gr. philosophers to be not serious enough for religion: as Plutarch urged much later, gods who behave foolishly are no gods. A system of interpreting the gods as personifications either of moral principles or of physical or natural forces grew up, known at first not as a. but as hyponoia. The practice is ridiculed by Plato in the Republic and elsewhere, but it increased with the rise of the more ethical and speculative cults, notably Stoicism. Judaism had similar difficulties, and the extensive commentaries of Philo on the Pentateuch are the most ambitious of the earliest Jewish efforts to demonstrate that philosophical and moral truths are concealed in the Old Testament stories.

With Christianity a special problem arose, that of typology, of which a. formed a part. To some extent the Old Testament had to be read allegorically by the Christian, according to the principle later enunciated by St. Augustine: "In the Old Testament the New Testament is concealed; in the New Testament the Old Testament is revealed." Certain Messianic passages in the Old Testament were held to refer specifically to Jesus; the Jewish law was abolished as a ceremony but fulfilled as a type of the spiritual life. St. Paul in Galatians, commenting on the story of Abraham, Sarah, and Hagar, explicitly says that the story is an a., though it later became more exact to say that such stories had or contained allegorical meanings. Hence a doctrine of multiple meanings in Scripture was elaborated which could be applied to religious literature as well. Dante has given us the best-known formulation of the medieval scheme in his Tenth Epistle, to Can Grande (also at the beginning of the second part of the Convito), partly in explanation of his own practice. We begin with the "literal" meaning, which simply tells us what happened; this narrative illustrates certain principles which we can see to be true (quid credas, as a popular tag had it), and this is the a. proper. At the same time the narrative illustrates the proper course of action (quid agas); this is its moral meaning, and is particularly the meaning aimed at in the exemplum or moral fable used in sermons and elsewhere, and which is also employed a good deal by Dante, especially in the Purgatorio. Finally there is its anagogic or universal meaning, its place within the total scheme of Christian economy, the Creation, Redemption and Judgment of the world. These last two meanings may also be called allegorical in an extended use of the term.

The allegorization of classical myth continued throughout the Middle Ages, though the emphasis shifted to L. literature, through the popularity of allegorical commentaries on Virgil and Ovid which remained in vogue for well over a millennium. The use of a. for educational purposes, largely popularized by Martianus Capella's Marriage of Mercury and Philosophy (early 5th c.), is still going strong in England in Stephen Hawes's Pastyme of Pleasure (ca. 1510). In secular literature, the most popular form of a. was the allegory of Courtly Love, which employed an elaborate system of parallels to religion, its God being Eros or Cupid, its Mother Venus, its great lovers saints and martyrs, and so on. A. also of course pervaded the plastic arts, and the emblem books which became popular in the 16th c. are an example of the literary absorption of pictorial iconology.

The original motivation for allegorical systems of commentary had been the defense of the sobriety and profundity of religious myths which appeared, on the face of it, to ascribe capriciousness or indecency to the gods. Hence attacks on Homeric theology by Plato, or on early Christianity by anti-Christian apologists, normally included a rejection, usually with some ridicule, of all such face-saving interpretations. With the rise both of Protestantism and of post-Tridentine Catholicism, the same problem entered literary criticism. Puritans attacked classical mythology as puerile fable, and scoffed at all efforts to allegorize it. In Elizabethan England Gosson's School of Abuse was one of the most articulate of such attacks, and was replied to by Sir Philip Sidney and by Thomas Lodge. Lodge concerned himself more particularly with the question of a.: "Why may not Juno resemble the air?" he protested; "must men write that you may know their meaning?" Tasso in Italy also defended his Jerusalem Delivered along allegorical lines. The conception of major poetry as concealing enormous reserves of knowledge through an allegorical technique was widely accepted in the Renaissance: the preface to Chapman's translation of Homer expresses it eloquently, and other men of letters discovered their own philosophical interests in classical mythology, as Francis Bacon did in his Wisdom of the Ancients.

Gradually the Aristotelian conception of poetry became the main basis for the defense, as well as for much of the practice, of imaginative literature. In the Poetics, which influenced criticism increasingly from about 1540 on, poetry is conceived as an imitation of nature which expresses the general and the typical rather than the specific and particular, and which consequently is not to be judged by canons of truth or falsehood. This is obviously far more flexible a principle than the assumption of concealed allegorical meanings, and the latter interpretations fell out of favor. In the romantic period a renewed interest in myth, where the myth became subjective and psychological, a part of the poet's own creative processes, developed a new conception of a., expressed in Goethe, Friederich Schlegel, and Coleridge (notably in the Statesman's Manual). In this conception a. is thought of as essentially the translating of a nonpoetic structure, usually of abstract ideas, into poetic imagery, and is thereby contrasted with symbolism, which is thought of as starting with the poetic image, and attaching concepts to it. This contrast then becomes the basis of a value-judgment, symbolism being good and a. bad. The distinction is uncritical, because it identifies all a. with naive a., but it became very popular, and helped to rationalize the growing prejudice against a. which still exists. The good allegorists, such as Dante and Spenser, were explained away by other means: readers were taught to think of a. as tedious or pedantic, or were encouraged to read Spenser or Bunyan for the story and let the a. go. Such criticism reflects the romantic conception of a direct firsthand encounter with experience as the key to great literature, in contrast to the secondhand approach to it through books.

Nevertheless, the allegorical tradition survived fitfully. In criticism, it is found notably in Ruskin, whose Queen of the Air, a treatise on classical mythology, practically defines a myth as an allegorical story, and classifies the canonical allegories into the moral and the cosmological. In poetry, more or less straightforward a. is found in the second part of Goethe's Faust; in Shelley's Prometheus Unbound; in Keats's Endymion; in Ibsen's Peer Gynt.

The new romantic conception of symbolism is illustrated by such fictions as Moby Dick, The Scarlet Letter, The Golden Bowl, To the Lighthouse, and others, where there is a central symbol, usually named in the title, with a great variety of suggestive implications, but which lacks the continuity necessary for genuine a. Hawthorne is frequently allegorical in his technique—some of his stories, such as The Bosom Serpent, might almost be called naive allegories—but the 19th and 20th c. are notable for fictions which carry a great deal of conceptual weight, such as War and Peace, or are mythopoeic, such as The Plumed Serpent, and yet are not strictly allegorical. The use of an archetypal model for a fiction, as Joyce uses the Odyssey in Ulysses and Faulkner the Passion in A Fable, is closer to traditional allegorical techniques. Continuous a., as we have it in Anatole France's Penguin Island, usually favors the historical type, with its natural affinity for satire; but the recent vogue of Franz Kafka indicates that even serious moral a. still makes a powerful appeal.

Since 1900 two new forms of allegorical interpretation have crowded out nearly all the older ones. Dreams have been from ancient times recognized as close to a., but it was only after the appearance of Freud's Interpretation of Dreams that there developed in criticism a technique of reading works of literature as psychological allegories, revealing the latent sexual drives and conflicts either of their authors or of their readers. There is now an extensive bibliography of such allegorical criticism in literature, most of it either Freudian or Jungian in reference. About the same time Frazer's Golden Bough began a school of criticism which approaches literature much as Christian typology related the New Testament to the Old. Works of literature, especially of ancient literature, are regarded as myths which contain and at the same time reveal the significance of earlier rituals and ceremonies. This form of allegorical interpretation, like the other, assumes the unconscious rather than the deliberate concealment of the allegorical allusion.

There is no comprehensive work on the subject: an immense amount of scholarly research has been done on classical and medieval a., much of it in areas remote from literature; critical treatments of modern literature usually deal with mythopoeia rather than a. The following studies are helpful: Lewis; R. P. Hinks, Myth and A. in Ancient Art (1939); J. Seznec, The Survival of the Pagan Gods, tr. B. Sessions (1953); E. D. Leyburn, Satiric A.: Mirror of Man (1956); H. Berger, Jr., The Allegorical Temper (1957); E. Honig, Dark Conceit: the Making of A. (1959); M. P. Parker, The A. of the Faerie Queene (1960); A. C. Hamilton, The Structure of A. in "The Faerie Queene" (1961); P. E. McLane, Spenser's Shepherdes Calender: a Study in Elizabethan A. (1961); A. Fletcher, A.: the Theory of a Symbolic Mode (1964).

N.FR.

ALLITERATION. Any repetition of the same sound(s) or syllable in two or more words of a line (or line group), which produces a noticeable artistic effect (see also SOUND IN POETRY and ACCORD). A. may occur involuntarily or by choice. It can produce emphasis and euphony (or cacophony!) comparable to the striking effects of end rhyme. The most common type of a. is that of initial sounds (hence the term "initial rhyme" or "head rhyme"), especially of consonants or consonant groups; a. of initial vowels is less frequent since they do not have the same acoustic impact as consonants. In Germanic alliterative meter (q.v.) or "Stabreim" any vowel can alliterate with any other, probably because the preceding glottal stop constitutes the repetition. A. may, however, include with notable effect the repetition of consonants, vowels, or consonant-vowel combinations in medial or even final position ("That brave vibration . . .,"—Robert Herrick). This applies especially in languages which, like Fr., lack stress accent ("J'ai couru les deux mers que sépare Corinthe"—Racine). On the other hand, in languages with stress accent, a. is not confined to stressed syllables, but may extend to the unstressed (called "submerged" or "thesis" a., e.g.: "Suppos'd as forfeit to a confin'd doom"—Shakespeare). Different alliterating sounds can be interwoven to produce intricate patterns extending through the whole or sections of a poem. A. on the one sound or sound combination may be followed by, alternate with, or include another alliterative sequence (parallel or crossed a.)

Other varieties of a.: the grammatical figure or polytoton, Fr. l'annomination (diverse forms of the same syllable in successive words not necessarily etymologically related: "vi vitam"—Ennius); homoeoteleuton (identity of word endings: "au travers . . . divers"—Malarmé; really a form of identical rhyme); suspended a. (reversal of the alliterating consonant and the succeeding vowel: "Herds of fallow deer were feeding"—Longfellow. All these varieties are combinations of a. with assonance (q.v.). So-called eye a. consists in identical spelling only: "Have wrought and worshipped" (Swinburne) or "Careless of censure" (Pope). It is doubtful whether such false a. is ever consciously intended by a poet.

In all literatures where a. is practiced, it is subject to changing literary fashions and tastes, but, generally speaking, it is more prominent in the poetry of languages with stress accent (especially where the accent regularly falls on the first syllable, as in Finnish, Estonian, and Czech) and in verse which is meant to be spoken rather than sung or chanted. Thus in the medieval Germanic idioms (ON, Old High German, Old Saxon, ME), in Finnish (Kalevala epic), and in early (7th-c.) Ir., a. served as the chief structural principle and was governed by rigid rules [see ALLITERATIVE METER], whereas in languages with tone systems or quantitative structures it is either completely absent (as in Chinese poetry, which is based on syllable count and tone patterns), or used rarely and only for very special emphasis (as in Sanskrit, e.g., Kalidasa, Kumarasambhava 1.18, and in Japanese where an 8th-c. tanka and a 17th-c. kyōka furnish notable but rare examples). In the modern Germanic languages, even after its substitution by end rhyme as a structural principle, a. is still more prevalent than in the chiefly syllable-counting Romance tongues.

Ancient Gr. poetry, based on a quantitative metric, uses a. rarely and only for special onomatopoeic effects. In Roman poetry a. is found throughout, beginning with the Saturnian carmina (Latin possesses stress accent, and the quantitative metric was taken over from the Greeks). The Romans used the Gr. term paromoeon, while alliteratio does not occur until the end of the 15th c. Ennius made ample use of the device and went to absurd extremes. While Cicero disdained it, Lucretius delighted in a. Among the "new" poets, Catullus had a marked preference for alliterative ornament in some parts of his work and practiced abstinence in others. Virgil employed a. with great subtlety as a conveyor of emotions. In late Imperial times and through the Middle Ages a. became a cherished mannerism.

All the troubadour poets of Old Prov. practiced a. (replicatio), aiming with great skill at achieving parallelisms between sound and meaning. They favored a. especially at the beginning and at the end of a poem. In the modern Romance literatures, It. poets use a. sparingly, the Sp. more frequently, though with discretion (a manneristic flowering occurred in the 16th and 17th c.). The Fr. used a. very sparingly until the romanticists, symbolists, and moderns sought to endow the Fr. poetic medium with a new musicality. In Baudelaire's Fleurs du mal the use of a. often coincides with the division of an alexandrine into anapaests. Mallarmé and Valéry achieve highly sophisticated alliterative effects.

Ir. (Gaelic) is among the most richly alliterative poetic media of world literature. Through the centuries, Ir. verse has preserved an unbroken tradition of decorative a. even though its metric has long since been based on rhyme and syllable count, whereas Welsh poetry uses, even today, the complex, versatile "cynghanedd" (q.v.), an ancient artistic device, involving a. and having a metric function.

In Eng. versification, likewise, a. continued as an ornamental device after its eclipse as a structural principle. In the 16th c., under the influence of rhetoric, which encouraged "the figure of like letter" (also called "parimion" or "letter-tagging"), some poets used it to excess. Shakespeare burlesques alliterative practices in Love's Labour's Lost, but where he chooses, he can use it with superb mastery (e.g. Sonnets 18, 29, 30, 128). During the 17th and 18th c., a. lost its importance somewhat. While it was used as an occasional ornament by some poets, such as Dryden, Richard Crashaw, Oliver Goldsmith, it was largely avoided by others, such as Milton. Pope could skillfully avoid the device through long sections of a poem and then suddenly use it with great effect, as at the end of the Essay on Criticism. With the romantic poets a new vogue set in. Effects were achieved which aimed to enhance the musicality of the language rather than to produce rhetorical emphasis. The Victorians, Pre-Raphaelites, and moderns continued the practice with further refinement and subtlety. Swinburne parodied his own alliterative abundance in Nephilidia. Gerard Manley Hopkins' use of a. (see CYNGHANEDD) is the most willfully original and strikingly bold (see, for example, The Wreck of the Deutschland).

The development of a. in Am. poetry runs parallel with the British vogue. Walt Whitman uses it amply, Melville frequently and effectively. T. S. Eliot tends to use repetition of identical words and whole phrases rather than a. proper. Carl Sandburg, Marianne Moore, H. D. like a.; W. H. Auden's Voices in the Desert in The Flight into Egypt imitates alliterative verse. Wallace Stevens, schooled by the musicality of the Fr. symbolists, does not depend on a. for his sound harmonies, but he can use it most effectively.

In modern German, aside from the sporadic and ineffectual attempts at resuscitating medieval "Stabreim" (W. Jordan, R. Wagner), a. is common as an occasional ornament. In Goethe it is less numerous than in Schiller and the romantic poets, but he uses it frequently enough to permit the conclusion that he did so deliberately, especially to express high emotional tension (e.g., in Marienbader Elegie). After the influence of Baudelaire and the symbolists had quickened the renewal of German poetry, a. became a far more consciously used, almost indispensable, euphonic device ("Hierssein ist herrlich"—Rilke; "Ich bin freund und führer dir und ferge"—Stefan George).

R. L. Taylor, A. in Italian (1900); K. Florenz, Gesch. der japanischen Lit. (2d ed., 1909); Schipper; M. Scholz, "Die A. in der altprovenzalischen Lyrik," ZRP, 37 (1913) and 38 (1914); A. Heusler, "Stabreim," Reallexikon, ed. J. Hoops, iv (1919); E. Sikes, Roman Poetry (1923); E. Rickert, New Methods for the Study of Lit. (1927); H. Schneider, "Stabreimvers," Sachwörterbuch der Deutschkunde, II (1930); E. Wölfflin, "Zur A.," Ausgewählte Schriften (1933); M. Grammont, Le Vers français (4th ed., 1937); R. E. Deutsch, The Patterns of Sound in Lucretius (1939); M. Dillon, Early Ir. Lit. (1943); U. K. Goldsmith, "Words out of a Hat? A. and Assonance in Shakespeare's Sonnets," JEGP, 49 (1950); N. I. Herescu, La Poésie latine: étude des structures phoniques (1960); W. Kayser, Gesch. des deutschen Verses (1960).

U.K.G.

ALLITERATIVE METER. A prominent feature of Old Germanic prosody (q.v.) is initial rhyme, used not for mere ornamentation but structurally, to link and emphasize important words within prescribed metrical units. The beginnings of the alliterative tradition are unknown, though one may guess that alliteration was partly a mnemonic aid to primitive oral recitation. Whatever its origins in Germanic antiquity, alliteration is part of a complex prosodic system, and indeed of the fabric of the Germanic languages themselves. The fondness for alliterative formulas is still noticeable in a language like Eng., which uses them easily and habitually in and out of poetry: "might and main," "time and tide," "to have and to hold."

The a. m. of the oldest poetry of Germany, Scandinavia, and England is superimposed upon the speech rhythms of these languages, with their constituent long and short syllabic quantities, in such a way as to increase the rhythmic emphasis of regular numbers of syllables in a given unit of verse, leaving different numbers of subordinatively stressed and unstressed syllables around them. The following lines from the Old Saxon Heliand (2242–2247), despite their varying syllabic totals, are metrically identical in that each typographical line (the arrangement of which on the page is a modern editorial convention) contains 4 heavily stressed syllables and several more lightly stressed or unstressed syllables in different patterns. Marks of vowel quantity are omitted from this and subsequent examples, and no attempt is made to indicate secondary accents.

ALLITERATIVE METER

Thuo bigan thes wédares cráft, úst úp stigan, úthiun wáhsan;
súang gísúerc an gimang; thie séu warð an hrúoru,
wan wínd endi wáter; wéros sórogodun, thiu méri warð so múodag, ni wanda thero mánno nigén léngron líbes.

Then the power of the storm, the tempest, became greater; waves grew larger; darkness fell; the sea was stirred up; wind and water contended; the sea raged so that men despaired, nor did one of them expect to live longer.

The long line, it should be noted, is divided into 2 metrically independent verses by a pause, and the verse pairs are linked by the alliteration of 1 or 2 stressed syllables in the first verse with the first stressed syllable of the second verse. Different types of verses will be formed from five possible arrangements of long and short, stressed and unstressed syllables, according to a complex system conventionally described by Eduard Sievers (see bibliog. below). As for the alliteration itself, each consonantal sound rhymes (usually) only with another occurrence of the same sound, but any vowel or diphthong may rhyme either with itself or with another vowel or diphthong.

The basic structure of this meter, it must be emphasized, is not stanzaic or even linear: each of the verses in a verse pair is a metrical unit; a sentence may begin or end in the middle of a line, and the verses may be strung together in long verse paragraphs which bring out a characteristic parallelism of thought and diction, like the sequence which concludes the OE Battle of Brunanburh:

on ðys íglánde fólces gefýlled swéordes écgum éalde úðwitan, Éngle and Séaxe ofer bráde brímu, wlánce wígsmiðas éorlas árhwate	Ne wearð wæl máre æfre gýta befóran ðýssum ðæs ðe us sécgað béc, siþþan éastan híder úpp becómon Brýtene sóhton, Wéalas ofercómon, éard begéaton.
---	---

Never yet in this island was a greater slaughter of an army by the sword's edge, as books tell us, ancient scholars, since the Angles and Saxons came hither from the east over the broad waters, sought out Britain, proud fighters defeated the Welsh, warriors keen for glory won a homeland.

Alliteration, then, is a device which associates phrases or individual verses within the verse pairs, but the series of lines which constitutes the poem may be loosely or compactly joined, depending on the syntax and style of the whole work.

In England the comparatively severe, remarkably regular alliterative poetry of the OE period gave way to a less systematic ME verse which tolerated much more freedom in the alliteration itself, and in the treatment of stressed and unstressed syllables: compare the resemblances to and the departures from the OE norm in the 14th-c. Piers Plowman:

I seigh a tóure on a tóft trielich ymáked,
A dépe dále binéthe, a dóngeon there-inne
With dépe dýches and dérke and drédful of sight.
A fáire féldé fúl of fólke fónde I there bytweéne,
Of álle mánér of mén, the méne and the ríche, Wórchyng and wándryng as the wórldé
ásketh.

I saw a tower on a raised place, excellently built, a deep valley beneath, a dungeon therein with deep dark ditches, dreadful to look upon. In between I discovered a beautiful plain full of people of all kinds, the common and the rich, working and wandering as the world requires.

Sometimes, as in the 14th-c. Pearl or Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, intricate patterns of rhyme and elaborate stanzaic forms are combined with a freely treated alliterative line. But with the end of the Middle Ages and the assimilation of Fr. and classical syllabic meters into Eng. poetry, the systematic a. m. disappeared for centuries, and only in modern times have Eng. and Am. poets returned to it as a potentially fresh and vital form. It is a hard meter to use well, or even to use at all, if its rhythmic characteristics are more or less faithfully observed; and the retention or rediscovery of its primitive quantitative rules is more difficult still, but not impossible, as shown by C. S. Lewis in the study mentioned below. Poems by Ezra Pound (The Seafarer), C. Day Lewis (As One Who Wanders into Old Workings), and Richard Eberhart (Brotherhood of Men) could be cited as notable experiments in a contemporary alliterative revival. W. H. Auden's The Age of Anxiety (1947) is a major work in which many varieties of the Old Germanic a. m. are displayed with great skill. On the Ir. a. m. see below.

E. Sievers, Altgermanische Metrik (1893); Saintsbury, Prosody, 1; J. P. Oakden and E. R. Innes, Alliterative Poetry in ME: A Survey of the Traditions (1935); C. S. Lewis, "The A. M.," in Rehabilitations (1939); G. Murphy, Early Ir. Metrics (1961); A. J. Bliss, An Introd. to OE

Metre (1962); M. Borroff, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (1962). J.B.B.

ALLOEOSTROPHA. A term used by Milton in the Preface to Samson Agonistes to describe verse composed in stanzas (or strophes) of irregular length and construction. Opposed to the strict and predictable strophic organization of the formal ode (q.v.). P.F.

ALLUSION. Tacit reference to another literary work, to another art, to history, to contemporary figures, or the like. A. may be used merely to display knowledge, as in many Alexandrian and medieval poems; to appeal to a reader or audience sharing some experience or knowledge with the writer; or to enrich a literary work by merging the echoed material with the new poetic context. A. differs from mere source-borrowing, because it requires the reader's familiarity with the original for full understanding and appreciation; and from mere reference, because it is tacit and fused with the context in which it appears.

The technique of a. assumes: (1) an established literary tradition as a source of value; (2) an audience sharing the tradition with the poet; (3) an echo of sufficiently familiar yet distinctive and meaningful elements; and (4) a fusion of the echo with elements in the new context. It has analogues in biblical and religious writings, the novel, and elsewhere, and usually requires a close poet-audience relationship, a social emphasis in literature, a community of knowledge, and a prizing of literary tradition.

TYPES. Topical a., normally reference to recent events, is common up to the romantic movement, less frequent thereafter except in humorous poetry or ephemeral vers de société. Personal a., reference to facts concerning the poet himself, must be to facts widely known, easily grasped, or made familiar, and varies from Shakespeare and Donne's plays on their own names, to Virgil's lamenting his misfortunes in the Eclogues, to Dante's account of his love for an idealized Beatrice; but it should be distinguished from the romantic use of personal experience for subject matter, e.g. Coleridge's discussion of his failing poetic powers in Dejection: An Ode. Metaphorical a. is more complex in function and richer in interest and meaning. Found chiefly in periods setting value on tradition (e.g., Augustan Rome, China from early times, 11-14th-c., Japan, 17-18th- and 20-c. Europe), this technique uses the echoed element as a vehicle for the poetic tenor that it acquires in the new context (e.g., Dryden's allusion to Aeneid 5 and 6 in his poem to Oldham expresses through metaphor the relation between himself and Oldham and also between Roman and Eng. cultural values). Frequent in the older Chinese and Japanese poetry, such a. can also be found in Goethe (to religious services in Faust), in Foscolo (to Homer in Dei sepolcri), in Baudelaire (to the Aeneid in Le Cygne), and broadcast in the major works of Eliot and Pound. Imitative a. is either specific (Dr. Johnson to Juvenal, Satire 3, in London), generic (Dryden to epic in Absalom and Achitophel), parodic (Philips to Milton in The Splendid Shilling) or, commonly, synthetic (Pope's Rape of the Lock—at once specific to Milton and others, generic to epic, and parodic). Structural a. gives form to a new work by suggesting the structure of an older work; in this it resembles imitative a., but it is identifiably different when the a. is to other genres or arts (e.g., the Odyssey is alluded to structurally by Joyce's Ulysses, and music is alluded to by Eliot in Four Quartets). And in spite of Lessing's strictures, many poets from the 17th c. to the present have alluded structurally to nontemporal graphic and plastic arts (e.g., Auden to Breughel's Icarus in his poem Musée des Beaux Arts).

No comprehensive study of a. exists, but the following touch upon representative aspects of the subjects. H. J. Rose, The Eclogues of Virgil (1942); H. F. Brooks, "The 'Imitation' in English Poetry . . . Before the Age of Pope," RES, 25 (1949); M. Mack, "'Wit and Poetry and Pope': Some Observations on His Imagery," Pope and His Contemporaries (1949); J. R. Hightower, Topics in Chinese Lit. (1950); S. P. Bovie, "Classical Allusions," cw, 52 (1958); R. A. Brower, Alexander Pope: The Poetry of A. (1959); R. H. Brower and E. Miner, Japanese Court Poetry (1961). E.M.

AMBIGUITY. Term introduced by William Empson, who devoted a book, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930), to an examination of its critical applicability and usefulness. A more reasonable term probably is one employed by Philip Wheelwright, plurisignation. Most readers of poetry, Empson felt, reduced the meaning of a given word to a single denotation. For example, he found that Shakespeare editors differed strongly about the meaning of a word like rooky (Macbeth). Learned reasons were given why a single meaning, and no other meaning, was the correct one. Empson inferred that if collectively the editors saw multiple meanings in rooky, then Elizabethan audiences must also have seen multiple meanings, and that Shakespeare himself must have seen them "since he was no less sensitive to words than they." In explaining his method, Empson confesses an indebtedness to the analysis of a Shakespeare sonnet by Robert Graves in A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1938). (The method was also employed by Graves in Poetic Unreason [1925]). And both Graves and Empson had been anticipated by Frederick C. Prescott in The Poetic Mind (1922). Prescott used Freudian terminology, "displacement," "condensation," etc., but his analyses bring out the same sort of thing that Empson does. For example, Prescott analyzes two lines from a speech of Hotspur's against Henry IV: "We must have bloody noses and crack'd crowns/ And pass them current too. God's me, my horse."—"Here the 'crack'd crowns' are first cracked coins, secondly broken heads, and thirdly royal crowns upset. Note too that the third meaning is at once farthest from the literal, the most latent, perhaps the most unconscious (in Hotspur's mind), and the most far-reaching (involving the whole dramatic action)."

Many readers have felt that Empson's insistence on seven types of a. is unnecessary and mistaken. William York Tindall, who finds Empson's readings "exemplary," finds the division into seven types "pretentious." There seems little doubt, however, that Empson has helped to teach at least one generation of poetry readers to find more complicated meanings in poetry than they had hitherto been prepared to find. Again, in Mr. Ransom's words, "The ordinary critic cannot read them (Empson's analyses) and be the same critic again. . . ." Mr. Empson summarizes this method in these words: "We call it ambiguous . . . when we recognize that there could be a puzzle as to what the author meant, in that alternate views might be taken without sheer misreading. . . . An ambiguity, in ordinary speech, means something very pronounced, and as a rule witty or deceitful. I propose to use the word in an extended sense, and shall think relevant to my subject any verbal nuance, however slight, which gives room for alternative reactions to the same piece of language."

Empson says, to take an instance, that a concentration of meanings is a characteristic of Augustan poetry: "This way of suggesting grasp of mind, ingenuity, and control over things, this use of a word with several extended meanings so as to contract several sentences into one, is the fundamental device of the Augustan style. The word is usually a verb precisely because the process is conceived as an activity, as a work of the digesting and controlling mind." An example is seen in Pope's Of the Characters of Women: "One certain portrait (I grant) may be seen, / Which Heav'n has varnish'd out, and made a queen." The passage refers to Catherine Hyde, wife of the third Duke of Queensbury. There is a little cluster of meanings relevant to the verb "varnish": Heaven, or chance, has dressed her as a duchess, covered her in glistening robes, in the same way varnish gives a glow to the portrait; she is a duchess in name rather than in spirit, and the verb is appropriate in the sense that Pope, as he says, is sketching and finishing portraits. The pun on "queen" is obvious. The virtue in Empson's method is that it helps to enlarge one's sense of what a poem says. A weakness in the method, which Empson himself does not always avoid, is that it invites overly complicated, ingenious, and finally irrelevant readings.

J. D. Hubert (L'Esthétique des "Fleurs du Mal." Essai sur l'ambiguïté poétique, 1953) applies a similar approach to the poetry of Baudelaire. The categories of a. perceived by Hubert differ from Empson's and thereby not only suggest the unlimited wealth of plurisignation in Baudelaire's work but also indicate the usefulness of the concept as detached from Empson's specific scheme.

As a poetic device, a. also occurs, of course, in other literatures—ancient and modern—e.g., W. B. Stanford (Ambiguity in Gr. Literature. Studies in Theory and Practice, 1939) traces a. in Gr. poetry from Homer to Euripides.

J. C. Ransom, "Mr. Empson's Muddles," The Southern Review, 4 (1938); C. Brooks, "Empson's Crit.," Accent Anthol. (1946); W. Y. Tindall, Forces in Modern Brit. Lit. (1947); E. Olson, "William Empson, Contemporary Crit., and Poetic Diction," in Crane, Critics; P. Wheelwright, The Burning Fountain (1954) and Metaphor and Reality (1962); Wimsatt and Brooks. w.v.o'c.

AMERICAN INDIAN POETRY. NORTH AMERICA. The poems of the North Am. Indians cannot be fully understood unless the reader has some comprehension of their origins and the human needs and desires that brought them into being. This native poetry grew out of the use of the song as a part of tribal life, and few examples can be found which did not originally serve as the words to a religious or secular chant, ritual, or incantation. Song among the Indians was seldom used merely for entertainment or for voicing the soul-cry of the lyrical individualist. As one Indian said, "If a man is to do something more than human, he must have more than human power." Song was a way to tap this good superhuman force, and was used to obtain success in almost every act of Indian life.

The Indians made poems, then, for many reasons: to praise their gods and ask their help in life; to speak to the gods through dramatic performances at seasonal celebrations or initiations or other rites; to work magical cures or enlist supernatural aid in hunting, plant-growing, or horsebreeding; to hymn the praises of the gods; to chronicle tribal history; to explain the origins of the world; to teach right conduct; to mourn the dead; to arouse warlike feelings; to compel love; to awaken laughter; to ridicule a rival or bewitch an enemy; to praise famous men; to communicate the poet's private experience; to mark the beauties of nature; to boast of one's personal greatness; to record a vision scene; to characterize the actors in a folk tale; to quiet children; to lighten the burden of work; to brighten up tribal games; and, sometimes, to express simple joy and a spirit of fun.

The large majority of translated songs were made for essentially religious or magical purposes. Here is one of the 161 songs from the Navaho "Mountain Chant," translated by Dr. Washington Matthews:

The voice that beautifies the land!
The voice above,
The voice of the thunder.
Within the dark cloud
Again and again it sounds,
The voice that beautifies the land.

The voice that beautifies the land!
The voice below:
The voice of the grasshopper.
Among the plants
Again and again it sounds,
The voice that beautifies the land!

Even what seem at first to be poems descriptive of the beauties of nature are often found to be connected in the Indian mind with religion and worship. Many of the short chants of the Midé, the grand medicine society of the Chippewas, reveal a poetic awareness of surroundings. Here is a fresh impression of June days:

As my eyes search the prairie
I feel the summer in the spring.

Vision songs are widely found. These are often personal charms composed after fasting, or else spring from cult ceremonies, such as the trance-inspired songs of the revivalist Ghost Dance Religion. This example "summarized the whole hope of the Ghost Dance—the return of the buffalo and the departed dead, the message being brought to the people by the sacred birds, the eagle and the crow."

The whole world is coming.
A nation is coming, a nation is coming.
The Eagle has brought the message to the tribe.
The father says so, the father says so.
Over the whole earth they are coming.
The buffalo are coming, the buffalo are coming.
The Crow has brought the message to the tribe.
The father says so, the father says so.

On the secular side, a few pieces of satirical verse can be found, such as the boasting contests of the Northwest Coast. Cradle songs and lullabies are often delightful, and a few songs from games are of poetic value.

The Aztecs, who conducted schools for poets and singers, produced several first-rate lyricists, in particular the reflective royal poet Nezahualcoyotl, but elsewhere the pure lyric is a rare type. Neither is the romantic love song a common form, and with the exception of love-charms to arouse affection by magical means, most such songs are late and reflect the white man's idea of what an "Indian love call" should be.

Among the Indians there is a notable lack of rhythmic work songs comparable to our sea shanties or Negro labor songs. The most surprising lack, however, is in narrative verse. The Indian customarily told his tales and legends in prose, and reserved the poetic style and rhythm for nonprosaic purposes. No examples were found that could correspond to the European epic, ballad, or verse romance. However, the historical chronicle in rude mnemonic lines is fairly well represented by the "Walam Olum" of the Lenape tribe.

Indian songs vary in length from a few words to extended ceremonials that might run on for days at a time. Thus, a song in honor of a Chippewa brave consisted of only two words—one meaning "warrior" and the other the name of the hero. The people were supposed to know his valiant deeds and it was not necessary to mention even one of them. In contrast to this two-word poem, the "Night Chant" of the Navahos contains a sequence of no less than 324 different songs which made up one long ritual poem recited over a succession of days and nights.

Every Indian was a potential poet. Songs were the most important instruments of the medicine man; but any member of the tribe could by means of dreams and visions find a personal song to help in time of need. Many ceremonies encouraged the invention of such songs, which related experiences either real or else seen in visions. The names of the makers of most of the poems surviving among the Indians are unknown. The religious songs, in particular, are always anonymous, for they were presumed to have been inspired by supernatural beings. The lyrics of Nezahualcoyotl and the war songs of Sitting Bull were, however, known to be individual compositions.

The many excellent translations of Indian poetry to be found scattered through dozens of works of the past century are charming contributions to Am. literature. The best literary translations of Indian verse have been made by professional ethnologists who have united with their linguistic learning a talent for poetic rendition. Effective translation is made difficult chiefly because, when a song, chant, or recitative is taken out of its ceremonial setting, the meaning is not always clear to the modern reader. Therefore, explanation is often needed to give the reader an idea of the background from which the poem has come. Translation of meaning is further complicated by the frequent use of symbolism, figurative language, secret or archaic language, and allusions to Indian myths and other parts of the background which the native hearer was supposed to know and take for granted.

Stylistic qualities—such as rhythm, pattern, imagery, contrast, monotony, variation, poetic diction, parallelism, personification, euphony, and onomatopoeia—are found in Indian poetry, but these cannot always be literally translated. Although Indian verse lacks metrical accent and is not composed in iambs or dactyls, there is usually a measured rhythmic pattern for each type of Indian song; vocables are sometimes added to fill out the measure, and accents are misplaced to conform to some melodic scheme. One who listens for hours to the chants and wails of an Indian ceremonial will easily perceive a rhythm of a marked sort—one closely associated with the drum-beat—and this rhythm may often be quite elaborate.

The meaning of an Indian poem is often obscured in Eng. not only because of stylistic problems, but also because Indian verse frequently is intentionally cryptic or ambiguous. To say that we cannot enjoy such a poem in exactly the same frame of mind as that in which it was first heard by Indians, however, is not to say that the poem cannot be enjoyed today in a good Eng. version—particularly if the translator adds some commentary on its origin and background.

H. Hale, Iroquois Book of Rites (1883); D. G. Brinton, The Lenapé and Their Legends (1885), Ancient Nahuatl Poetry (1887) and Rig Veda Americanus: Sacred Songs of the Ancient Mexicans (1890); W. Matthews, "The Mountain Chant, a Navaho Ceremony," Bureau of Am. Ethnology, 5th Annual Report (1887); J. Mooney, "The Sacred Formulas of the Cherokees," BAE, 7th A.R. (1891) and "The Ghost-Dance Religion," BAE, 14th A.R. (pt. 2, 1896); A. C. Fletcher, Story and Song from North America (1900), and "The Hako: a Pawnee Ceremony," BAE, 22d A.R. (pt. 2, 1904); N. Curtis (Burlin), The Indians' Book (1907, 1923); F. Russell, "The Pima Indians," BAE, 26th A.R. (1908); F. Densmore, Chippewa Music, BAE, Bull. 45 (1910), The Am. Indians and Their Music (1926) and "Songs of the Indians," Am. Mercury, 7 (1926); N. Barnes, Am. Indian Verse, Characteristics of Style (1921); E. L. Walton and T. T. Waterman, "Am. Indian Poetry," Am. Anthropologist, 27 (1925); R. Bunzel, "Zuñi Ritual Poetry," BAE, 47th A.R. (1932); H. J. Spinden, Songs of the Tewa

(1933); R. M. Underhill, Singing for Power (1938); F. La Flesche, War Ceremony and Peace Ceremony of the Osage Indians, BAE, Bull. 101 (1939); A. G. Day, The Sky Clears: Poetry of the Am. Indians (1951; contains bibliog. and 200 poems in Eng. from 40 tribes), and "The Indian as Poet," Am. Indian, 6 (1952); I. Nicholson, Firefly in the Night: A Study of Ancient Mexican Poetry and Symbolism (1959).—RECORDINGS: Original Indian songs collected by Miss F. Densmore from at least a dozen Am. tribes are available at the Music Div., Library of Congress. A.G.D.

SOUTH AMERICA. The indigenous poetic literature of the South Am. Indians is of two fundamental kinds: the poetry of song, rhythmically repetitive in form and content, often the burden or accompaniment of music, dance, and ritual, turning on various but common themes, which is found universally among the non-literate native peoples of the continent; and the poetry of extraordinary speech and thought, reflective and lyrical, that was achieved at least twice in South America, by the Incas of Peru, and by the Araucanians of Chile and Argentina. This is an oral literature, not originally written down, of which only a few fragments have been preserved from the past, in 16th- and 17th-c. chronicles, and of which only meager examples have been transcribed in the present from the lore of contemporary Indian cultures.

Song covers a wide range of functions, themes, and formal elaborations. At one extreme are series of meaningless syllables in which there are rhythm and regularity but no sense, rude songs that are generally believed to have the power to control supernatural forces; and simple chants of a similar character, with words, such as the two-word verse—peitoló yavali (run into the valley)—which the Lule, a Chaco tribe, monotonously repeated through a whole night. At the other extreme are complex song recitals of people like the Tupinamba (Brazil), which were led by a man singing couplets, with answers in refrain from the whole community, and which were epic in content if not in form. The use of song in connection with magic and religion is primary everywhere in South America, and it is especially marked among tribes of simpler culture in the Circum-Caribbean area and the Pacific lowland. But the poetry of song is not always directed to supernatural purposes alone, and it is not always dependent for effect upon the simple, monotonous rhythms that are usually associated with magic and ritual. Cadenced work songs of native invention are reported for the Catto. Festive singing of secular songs with various themes—planting and harvesting, hunting, fishing, animals and birds—is a common form of entertainment. Among the Oto- mac (Venezuela), the whole village is said to assemble every night of the year in three concentric circles, with a leader in the center, to sing and dance together. And purely recreational song that approaches the level of genuine poetry, insofar as words and rhythm become more than the mere burden of melody, attains peculiar importance in a number of Tropical Forest tribes. The singing of such songs, both communally and individually, is the most popular pastime of the Tenetebara, Tapirapé, and Carajá Indians of Brazil. Improvisation occurs; simile is a highly developed element of style, although evidently not rhyme; and creative excellence is recognized, as among the Tupinamba, where, it is said, an outstanding composer might enjoy such prestige that an enemy tribe, taking him prisoner, would release him unharmed.

At a quite different level of achievement, the Araucanians produced a distinctive poetic literature, which, although still rooted in song, began to realize somewhat the inherent rhythms of language itself and to employ them consciously for the more forceful expression of thoughts and feelings. These Indians, socially aggressive and individualistic, placed a peculiarly high value upon eloquence as an art, and oratory was a skill not only esteemed but consciously cultivated and taught. There were "poets," individuals (ngenpin) whose sole occupation was the composition of songs for public ceremonial gatherings. Strict metrical forms were not known, nor was rhyme; but poetic style emerged from the rich use of metaphor, simile, and repetitive phrasing. Araucanian songs, whose verses can stand alone as poems, were being composed in the old style as late as the 19th c. and have been the inspiration, indeed, for some modern Chilean poetry. Common themes of Araucanian poetry were romantic love, eroticism and sex, war memories, insults and quarrels, satires, death, and events of daily life, like robbery and drunken parties.

Inca poetry was, however, unquestionably the most remarkable literary achievement of the aboriginal New World, and, in its present forms and language, modified through time but still clearly indigenous, it constitutes today one of the genuinely important, living heritages of the native Am. past. Examples of pre-Spanish Inca literature are few, but they are sufficient to suggest the underlying character of the poetry. Expressive of the deepest human sentiment, of moving religious thought and aspiration, sometimes humorous, melancholy, impassioned, noble, and austere, it was a true reflection of a great Andean civilization and of the Indian mind and spirit that created it.

Rowe and others have rightly stressed the unusual, poetical qualities of Quechua, the language of the ancient Incas (it is still spoken today by some five million Andean Indians, mainly in Peru and Bolivia), which, by uniformly accenting the penult of words, has a natural rhythm and, through free use of affixes, permits expression of the finest shades of meaning and emotion. In this subtle language were composed the prayers and hymns, long narrative poems (no complete example is known), poetic dramas, and songs that comprised the body of Inca literature. Recited, performed, and sung before large public gatherings, learned and repeated generation after generation, they were not only the repository of mythology, legend, and history, for a people who lacked writing, but a continuing affirmation as well of the Indian's personal relation to man and nature. Here, for example, is an excerpt from an Inca prayer (Means, p. 437):

The Sun—the Moon;
the Day—the Night; Summer—Winter;
not in vain,
in orderly succession,
do they march to their destined place, to their goal.
They arrive wherever Thy royal staff
Thou bearest.
Oh! Harken to me,
listen to me,
let it not befall that I grow weary and die.

Most Inca poetry was lyric love song, plaintive in spirit and rich in allusions to nature. It is still the commonest poetic form among present-day Quechua Indians; indeed, most popular verse in Peru and Bolivia, whether composed in Sp. or Quechua, bears the stamp of the old Inca style and theme. Beyond this, passages of considerable poetic value occur in modern Quechua dance-dramas, performed by the highland Indians on certain Roman Catholic religious holidays. The death of the Inca Atahualpa is a favorite subject. Such passages conserve both the spirit and language of a genuinely great and remarkably persistent poetic tradition.

GENERAL: Handbook of South Am. Indians, ed. J. Steward (6 v., 1946-49; comprehensive surveys of all tribes, including their lit., with excellent bibliog.).

ARAUCAIAN: T. Guevara Silva, Historia de la civilización de Araucanía (1898), Folklore araucano (1911); Félix José de Augusta, Lec-

turas araucanas (1910).—INCA and QUECHUA: E. Middendorff, Dramatische und lyrische Dichtungen der Keshua-Sprache (1891); P. A. Means, Ancient Civilizations of the Andes (1931); R. Rojas, Himnos Quichuas (1937); J. María Arguedas, Canto Kechwa (1938), Canciones y Cuentos del Pueblo Quechua (1949); J. Basadre, Literatura Inca (1938); J. M. B. Farfan, "Poesía folklórica Quechua." Instituto de Antropología, Tucumán, Revista, 2 (1942) and Colección de Textos Quechua del Peru (1952); J. Rowe, "Inca Culture at the Time of the Sp. Conquest," Handbook of South Am. Indians, II (1946; best crit. summary, references to early sources); J. Lara, La Poesía Quechua (1947; anthol. and crit. analysis); J. Lira and J.M.B. Farran, "Himnos Quechuas Católicos Chuzqueños," Folklore Americano, 3 (1955); R. Stephan, The Singing Mountaineers (1957; contemp. verse in good Eng. tr.). J.F.G.

AMERICAN NEGRO POETRY. See NEGRO POETRY. AMERICAN.

AMERICAN POETICS. See MODERN POETICS.

AMERICAN POETRY.† While no definitive history of Am. poetry has been written, within existing histories of Am. literature poetry has probably received its fair proportion of regard. Though R. H. Pearce's recent Continuity of Am. Poetry most nearly qualifies as a history, he calls his book an "inside narrative" and hopes "some day for a proper literary history, in which we shall be able to comprehend our poetry in its totality." Various extended essays (e.g., H. W. Wells) and introductions (e.g., F. O. Matthiessen) have appeared; studies of particular aspects (e.g., G. W. Allen) have been made; critical biographies of poets have been written; and histories of particular periods, especially the 20th c. (e.g., H. Gregory and M. Zaturenska) are available. Yet compared to the knowledge of other national poetries, that of our own is fragmentary; and perhaps this situation has justification, since such pioneer explorations as those of 17th-c. New England verse (by H. S. Jantz), of southern poets (by J. B. Hubbell), and of the 1890's (by C. T. Kindilien) reveal forgotten poems of interest, but not of greatness. This essay makes no pretense to explore, and depends heavily on works like those cited; in a consciously sketchy fashion it will follow the traditional framework of centuries and of groups within those centuries. If it can advance claims to novelty, these may lie in its implied sense that more sympathetic reading of poets before 1912 will be fruitful, that the revision of poetical reputations is a continuing and healthy process, that even though major groupings and norms may be basically established, they may just as well be radically revised or significantly modified.

THE 17TH C. For both the 17th and 18th c., the three geographical areas of New England, the middle colonies, and the South reflect significant cultural groupings and such poetical concentrations as existed. Of the writers of the middle colonies there is none now worth recording. The South, with its earlier settlement, can also make its earlier claim to a poet of rank. George Sandys (1578-1644), as colonial treasurer in Jamestown from 1621 to 1625, "bred [his translation of Ovid] in the New-world, of the rudeness whereof it cannot but participate," yet he was rewarded by Dryden's praise as "the ingenious and learned Sandys, the best versifier of the former age." Besides the work of Sandys, who was British in reputation and accomplishment, one fine poem emerged—the epitaph on Nathaniel Bacon by John Cotton of Queen's Creek in 1676, which in its compressed colloquialism and homely imagery reminds us of the presence of Vaughan and Herbert in southern colonial libraries. John Donne's not receiving the appointment in the Virginia colony that he may have sought in 1610 raises the interesting speculation of the foremost metaphysical becoming an Am. poet. Other than these matters, the rest is pretty much silence.

In New England, though publication was infrequent, silence hardly characterized the period. The work of Anne Bradstreet (ca. 1612-1672), first published in England in 1650, has long been known; that of Edward Taylor (ca. 1642-1729), was first discovered only in 1937. Perhaps John Saffin, Benjamin Tompson, and Richard Steere come closest to these two, though preferences among the many candidates for a resurrected immortality differ. In tradition, sensibility, and provincially all are close to their two better known contemporaries. Of these, Bradstreet is less metaphysical or baroque (the choice of terms is in dispute) than Taylor. While qualifying voices have sought to diminish the first enthusiasm for Taylor, the force of his exploration of baroque sensibility in terms of New England religion and common life moves most readers:

Make me, O Lord, thy Spinning Wheele compleat;
Thy Holy Worde my Distaff make for mee.

Certainly Bradstreet and Taylor represent the potential of Am. Puritan poetry better than Wigglesworth's Day of Doom (1662) and the Bay Psalm Book (1640), for whatever the drawbacks of the Puritan aesthetic, it prized a harmony that was deepened as well as narrowed by its theological concern.

It may well be argued (as has T. M. Pearce,

† In Supplement, see also AMERICAN POETIC SCHOOLS AND TECHNIQUES (CONTEMPORARY).

AL, 14 [1942], 277-84) that literary historians and anthologists have regrettably neglected an important tradition by ignoring Am. Indian poetry (q.v.). Certainly in the 20th c. the interest in it of creative writers has outweighed their interest in poetry of the colonial period; and in a somewhat similar fashion the Negro spirituals and secular songs of the 19th c. have provided sources of inspiration in Am. Negro poetry (see NEGRO POETRY. AM.) of the last sixty years.

THE 18TH C. Though the late baroque writers of New England extend past 1700, by that date they had already begun to show a knowledge of Dryden and the neoclassical movement, as in the work of Cotton Mather. In New England Mather Byles best represents the Am. Augustans. As the century progressed, Am. libraries contained not only the work of Dryden, but of Butler, Swift, Pope, Thomson, Gray, and Goldsmith. By 1770 around Hartford and New Haven there was a flowering in the work of the Connecticut Wits—principally John Trumbull, Timothy Dwight, and Joel Barlow. The Wits were satirical (The Progress of Dulness, 1773), didactic (Greenfield Hill, 1794), and epic (The Vision of Columbus, 1787). They had their conservative Federalism and (though not without exception) their New Haven theology, but can be more usefully seen as early nationalists with the secular ideals of the Enlightenment. Their anthology, American Poems, 1783, underscored this national tendency, for it included poems of Freneau of the middle colonies, who was concerned with political revolution and enlightened deism. As a poet Freneau fused Miltonic, neoclassical, and preromantic idioms into an authentic Am. manner. In language and attitudes his "burly expression," as H. W. Wells calls it, still rewards readers who are willing to allow for frequent shortcomings.

Freneau's close connection with Thomas Jefferson and with the Virginia democratic tradition might suggest more poetic activity in the South than we find. In the early 18th c. verse had been widely practiced. Principally under the encouragement of William Parks of the Virginia Gazette and of the Timothy family of the South Carolina Gazette there was a sense of group interplay that promised more than it yielded. In spite of Ebenezer Cooke's The Sot-Weed Factor (1708), William Dawson's Poems on Several Occasions (1736), and the work of Richard Lewis and Joseph Brown Ladd, no accomplishment emerged of a group like the Connecticut Wits, of such Philadelphians as Thomas Godfrey and Nathaniel Evans, or of a poet like Freneau.

THE 19TH C. In the post-Revolutionary period in the South we find poets (the best known are Edward Coote Pinckney and Richard Henry Wilde) who fulfill some of the promise of their by now fairly well composted soil. Yet, as with poets of the same generation in the North (Richard Henry Dana, Sr., Fitz-Greene Halleck, and James Gates Percival, for example), their quality appears petty when set against Bryant or such immediate successors as Poe and the New England worthies.

What were the advantages of the second generation of post-Revolutionary poets over the first? Apart from the sheer good luck of being in the right place at the right time, all of them were literary conservatives, writing within a tradition that absorbed Wordsworth rather cautiously into an essentially neoclassical mood and that neglected Byron and Moore. Lacking the ability to be originals, they had the good sense not to follow the latest fashion; except for Poe and Emerson, they were plodders, yet as plodders contributed a solid body of poetry that has possibly more merit than we are willing to recognize.

Of almost the same age as Dana and Halleck, Bryant published Thanatopsis in 1817, followed it with Poems in 1821, and by mid-century had come to be regarded as the literary pioneer of the new poetry of his time. Perhaps it is fair to say, as long as saying it does not accuse, that he rewrote Thanatopsis many times. With as penetrating a sense of nature as Wordsworth's, he retained a neoclassical vocabulary and stateliness. In no direction did he push very hard; yet his metaphors, his sense of dramatic occasion, even his irony thoroughly suffuse his verses at their best.

Though with individual variations and younger than Bryant by at least a dozen years, the poets that we group with him have much in common. Like him they utilize tradition rather than seek for a new one. Whittier, the least sophisticated, is also the least conscious of the British poets of his own time; and he draws from Burns and other preromantics in his forms and moods. When consciously exploring the paths of Am. history or putting his verse to use in the antislavery movement, he is not at all literary; but at moments when his greatness and his limitations can consort, as in Snowbound, The Pennsylvania Pilgrim, or Telling the Bees, one finds an unpretentious but fully self-sustaining poetry. At the extreme in education from Whittier is Lowell, alert to the younger British romantics and to his own Am. contemporaries. The weakest of the five in the bulk of his poetry, perhaps because he was the least traditional, he had the best potential. This potential—the flexible, digressive, witty verse essay—he unfortunately never quite accepted as his metier; within this genre The Biglow Papers and A Fable for Critics are recognized for topical reasons; but a rather sizable body of other work in this manner exists (e.g., Fitz Adam's Story), and when the now unfashionable odes are read in this light, they cease to become the "factitious rhetoric" that they have been accused of being.

Longfellow and Holmes also ought to be read with a far greater sense of their whimsicality or wit than is common today. Longfellow achieves a poised delicacy of image and sound that entitles him to a high place as a minor poet; his controlled geniality informs a good many of his verses and helps to explain why his didacticism, though misread by the man in the street, could in his time be appreciated by a cultivated audience; and to all readers he gave a cosmopolitan awareness of European literature from Dante to the German romantics. With Holmes, the humor is more open than with Longfellow and in many of his occasional verses becomes too evident. Yet his serious poetry—today pretty much repudiated—also has effectiveness in a tradition of wit. The greater part of this wit is of the 18th c., yet metaphysical techniques are present, for this group of poets did not neglect the school of Donne to the extent that post-1912 critics think. Indeed, looked at as writers accepting the 18th-c. poetic and at least mindful of the 17th c., sympathetic with the romantics but somewhat dubious of their excesses, these five poets exhibit a total quality that places them closer to the 20th-c. movements than we have thought.

In spite of this argument, they admittedly lack the interest for us of Emerson, Poe, Melville, and Whitman. The reasons for the vitality of these four differ from poet to poet, yet all have in common metrical experimentation, an intense sense of symbol, and an emotional or intellectual urgency to drive deep into individual experiences. Though few would agree with Robert Frost in calling Uriel "the greatest western poem yet," the judgment has its core of truth. While Emerson was the least professionally devoted of the four, in a mostly casual fashion he brought poetical rhythms close to speech and saw as the stuff of poetry not only common life but the philosophical explorations that he practiced in his essays—"Bread, kingdom, stars, and sky that holds them all." Also as a transcendentalist Emerson not only exhibited this polarity but expressed the infinitude of man, thus furnishing Whitman with his gospel and Poe and Melville with texts for both exegesis and denunciation.

Against the tendency toward colloquialism in Emerson, Poe's experimentation drives toward a highly artificial rhythm and phrasing: a musicality that is at times as bouncing as that of his coexperimenter Chivers and an allusiveness that with its "dark tarn of Auber" and "woodlands of Weir" is either meaningless or so recondite that it has taken scholars a century to identify. Yet this "jingle man" practiced poetry as an experience and even a form of knowledge, and by his Gothic scenery and dead beauties presents an image of life that with all its vulgarity makes him, in the words of Allen Tate, our "dejected cousin"—"if the trappings of Poe's nightmare strike us as tawdry, we had better look to our own." Though we may question the judgment of Baudelaire, Mallarmé, and Valéry in making him the precursor of Fr. symbolism, the historical fact (whatever the reasons or qualifications) assures us that they did. Nor should we neglect the judgment of W. C. Williams on the essential Americanism of Poe: "His greatness is in that he turned his back and faced inland, to originality, with the identical gesture of a Boone."

Of the same age as Lowell, Melville and Whitman spoke late as poets, the first only after his novels, the second after an extended period of journalism. Certainly Melville is the lesser of the two as a poet, for his work has its value more in being that of a great novelist than in having a poetical greatness of itself. Perhaps first recognized by Thorp in 1938, the poetry of Melville has shown an abiding attraction to such critics as Matthiessen, R. P. Warren, and Arvin. Much like Emerson's in its colloquialism, it cultivates roughness more fully. The "dualities and dubieties" of the themes of Melville's major novels fill it, and within its sharpened scope there is a precision that the novels lack.

With an even greater symbolic vision than Melville and with a colloquialism that surpasses any of his contemporaries, the poetry of Walt Whitman has stood so long for literary revolt that we are a little tired of it. Certain qualities may also cause the restrained enthusiasm that was present even in the celebration of the 1955 centennial of Leaves of Grass: an oratorical mannerism, a fluidity of symbol that approaches the soggy, a readiness to dismiss human limitations. Yet with all these qualifications, it is hard to shoulder Whitman aside from his claim to the greatest body of poetry in 19th-c. America.

Failing to fetch me at first keep encouraged,
Missing me one place search another,
I stop somewhere waiting for you.

Whatever wayward freedoms he gave to himself as wordmaker, as teacher, or as philosopher, he broke with tradition more thoroughly than Emerson, Poe, and Melville, who with less force (though with more taste) sought the same things. And while the direct line of descent from Whitman has not been an illustrious one in spite of his regard for himself as the progenitor of poets, it is hard to imagine 20th-c. poetry without this barbaric yawper.

Other experimenters in the latter part of the 19th c. shared our own hesitations about Whitman for literary reasons, though openly they condemned him on sexual grounds: Emily Dickinson's "disgraceful" and Sidney Lanier's "immeasurably shocked." Of the two poets named, Lanier had in common with Whitman (as he occasionally recognized) his thorough wedding of poetry with music, his freely metered verse, his overtures to modern science, his belief in the prophetic role of the poet, and his somewhat superficial transcendentalism. But in spite of such a brilliant tour de force as The Symphony and the solid accomplishment of The Marshes of Glynn, Lanier cannot survive in his total work as a fully accomplished poet. As with his two Southern poetical masters, Timrod and Hayne, time and place and health were unpropitious; though aware of the drawbacks of romantic attitudes and rhythms, all three duplicated them with intensity rather than questioned them. Lanier, with his faintly metaphysical strain, questioned most; and if he had not sought to restrain his "disposition to push [his] metaphors too far," more of his promise might have been realized.

Between 1858 and 1865, before Lanier had begun his career and while Whitman was preparing his third and fourth editions and Melville was meditating Battle-Pieces, Emily Dickinson wrote the greater part of her poetry. Her work is not so far from literary sources and the thought of publication as early critics believed. Nevertheless there is an isolation that still startles in view of the greatness of her accomplishment. Of her Am. predecessors she would appear most dependent on Emerson in her colloquialism and her metrical freedom; but more than Emerson she went back to a Puritan view of man and nature, although she was far from orthodox; and she sensed the fullness of experience that the poem as symbol might allow.

How frugal is the Chariot
That bears the Human soul.

Yet as she drew back from a transcendental view of man, she also drew back from full indulgence in symbolism: in their intensity her images are of the metaphysical rather than of the Fr. school. Hesitating at the orthodoxies of the Connecticut valley, she retained the view of limited man confronting sovereign godhead, and from the intensities of that confrontation came a poetry that since its publication in 1890 has constantly meant more to its readers. The extent of her influence has little weight in the 20th c. beside the Fr. symbolists, the metaphysical revival, or Whitmanian self-confidence; rather in Am. literary history her value is that of asserting the greatness that was always possible within provincial confines.

By 1890 what Whitman, Lanier, and Dickinson had understood in their various ways, and what Emerson, Poe, and Melville had anticipated, became still more apparent. The Am. schoolroom poets were close to the end of their careers or were no more; the great Victorians were dying off. The emptiness of the efforts of such late comers as Stedman, Aldrich, and Sill was widely felt if not openly spoken. Yet no poet appeared (except Robinson) who approached the success of Dickinson or Whitman. From either Dickinson or from her cultural situation stemmed several disciples. Stephen Crane confronted a sovereign universe instead of a sovereign god, breaking farther than she from traditional prosody, seeking the sharp but less functioning image. John Tabb attempted a synthesis of his Catholicism and his ante-bellum Southern attitudes. Lizette Woodworth Reese, without the theological strength of Dickinson, provided a counterpart in feminine sensitivity and unpretentiousness. More popular certainly were the pretentious poets, Bliss Carman and Richard Hovey, who took something from Whitman, something from Fr. bohemianism and symbolism, and a great deal from Kipling. Finally, George Santayana, William Vaughan Moody, George Cabot Lodge, and Trumbull Stickney made up an academic group centering at Harvard. The latter three were close to Santayana in displaying, as he stated it himself, verses that "mental and thin as their textures may be, represent a true inspiration." All present a poetry that, while traditional, moves toward modern poetry more certainly than that of either the Dickinson or the Kipling group. Less abstract than the older Santayana, Moody revived an old-fashioned Miltonism, yet at his best did this in order to treat such topical problems as Am. imperialism. Lodge is often merely Tennysonian. More effectively than either, Stickney catches an Am. idiom, elegiac rather than outspoken, but still authentic. For all four, Lodge, whose biography by Henry Adams focuses as shrewdly on the poetical crisis as the Education had on the cultural crisis, stated the problem: "The whole core of the struggle, for ourselves and for art, is to emerge from the envelope of thoughts and words and deeds which are not our own, but the laws and conventions and traditions formed of a kind of composite of other men's ideas and emotions and prejudices." Stickney succeeded best, and perhaps his early death in 1904 kept him from greater accomplishment. For again excepting Robinson it was not until the second decade of the 20th c. that Am. poets recovered from the earlier century's failures and triumphs.

THE 20TH C. "I suppose," John Crowe Ransom remarked (KR, 13 [1951], 445) of Eng. poetry since 1900, "no other period has been so copious for three hundred years, i.e., since 1600-1650." Even such a claim seems modest, and one might well set only the Am. side of Eng. poetry against the first half of the 17th c. without a sense of its inferior quality.

Both the quantity and diversity of poetry since 1912 make the establishment of norms and groupings difficult. If the attempt is made through decades, the tendency to produce merely a chronicle is hard to overcome; and if one tries to delineate schools, particularly in America the actualities deny the comfort of such an approach. In Poetry alone, founded in 1912 by Harriet Monroe and still the most influential magazine of poetry, the range has been consciously broad since the first several volumes, which printed everyone from Lindsay and Sandburg to Pound and Eliot. Perhaps at present one can, then, do no better than roughly group the poets into a first and second generation (with the dividing line for birth about 1907). With the first generation, allegiances are more clearly felt; with the second generation a kind of eclecticism seems to signal individual variations within a general mood rather than groupings. Of the poets of the first generation (from Robinson, 1869-1935, to R. P. Warren, 1905-) the three major allegiances that emerge are those to a renewed tradition, to a self-conscious Americanism that partakes strongly of Whitman, and to Fr. symbolism modified by the Eng. metaphysicals. In each of these is a mixed lot, in the last two are many poets who divide their allegiance, and in the third a dual allegiance is posited in the category itself.

Of Robinson and Frost, who are here presented as renewing the tradition, the first had well preceded the annus mirabilis of 1912. The closeness of Robinson and the Harvard academics both physically and spiritually might easily place him with them, were it not that he achieved what they only attempted and that he lived out a full poetical career. Frost too had his Harvard association, which his later association with the British Georgians did not obliterate; in both subject and manner he has much in common with Robinson. The earlier Frost, like the earlier Robinson, looked at the hard and sometimes sordid side of New England farm and village. Though both kept to a traditional prosody, they shared with the moderns an ear for a new poetic speech, a revulsion from standard poetical gestures, a searching for images that would render the poem. If some critics have depreciated Frost (perhaps mostly for his living into the present and for his refusal to participate in fashionable movements), the place of both Frost and

Robinson in modern Am. poetry has remained secure in spite of their lack of concern for the virtuosités of Valéry or of Donne. Edna St. Vincent Millay, a poet twenty years their junior, also had an essential allegiance to a renewed tradition, but her romantic bohemianism has not shown the power to sustain her reputation. A more academic traditionalist than either Robinson, whom he admires, or Frost, whom he has labeled a "spiritual drifter," Yvor Winters has published poetry that displays modern sensibility at its fullest without further involvement in modern manners or beliefs.

Robinson's later use of Arthurian romance and Frost's increasing pastoralism allow us to forget the close association of both poets with the realistic tradition in fiction. Along with the open relationships of the first poet's apostrophes to Zola and Crabbe or the second poet's materials in The Death of the Hired Man and The Hill Wife, in all their work we can see a pragmatic testing of ideals through concrete situations. Thus Robinson writes in The Man Against the Sky that we may of our transience here make offering To an orient Word that will not be erased, and Frost (more casually) observes, "One could do worse than be a swinger of birches."

Even the implication that truth appears only in the situation—a view not remote from a fundamental tenet of symbolism—is found to some degree in those whose allegiance is to Whitman, who had formed a bridge between Am. romanticism and realism of the earlier century. But Sandburg, Lindsay, and Jeffers follow Whitman in their realism rather than the pragmatic novelists. They present actuality and comment on it, or when they do not comment allow it less to speak for itself than for a democratic (or with Jeffers an antidemocratic) idealism. Again like Whitman, all incline toward an oratorical rather than poetic rhythm, and all would seem to mirror themselves as popular bards, not so much renewing a tradition as offering a superficially exciting escape from it. At their best they achieve an immediacy of communication more to be admired than deplored; and the younger poets may find a sustenance in these disciples of Whitman that could help them break from the grip of symbolistic and metaphysical restraints of the older generation.

Some of them have for many years found that sustenance in the work of William Carlos Williams, who essentially may belong to the Whitman group quite as much as to that of the symbolists. From an early association with such poets as Pound, Marianne Moore, and Hilda Doolittle, Williams has kept a concern for genuine speech, concise image, and probing of the human condition. Yet his essays mark him as one of the few poets of stature who have given Whitman unqualified fealty, and though he lacks the transcendental fulsomeness of the Brooklyn poet, his Patterson belongs more with Song of Myself than the Cantos. The work of Hart Crane may also be allied to that of Whitman in its search for emblems of the modern and in its very liberation. Still, Crane's poetry also carries despairing overtones that come not only from the symbolist enmity of the poet and society but from an existential awareness within the poet himself.

Whatever their primary allegiance, Williams and Crane point clearly to the fact that the undiluted tradition of Whitman would not fully serve. Rather it was from the Fr. symbolists (and by way of them from Poe) and from such British interpreters as Arthur Symonds that the major impact on modern Am. poetry came. In its unqualified form the symbolist influence may be felt most strongly in Stevens, Pound, and Cummings. With a commingling of the British metaphysicals, we find it in Eliot, Moore, and Ransom. Also with the last three might be allied MacLeish, Gregory, Tate, Merrill Moore, and R. P. Warren, but these five are perhaps most influenced by their older Am. contemporaries. Even with Stevens, Pound, Cummings, Eliot, Marianne Moore, and Ransom, the influence upon each other—after the first stimulus from non-Am. sources—must certainly be kept in mind.

The nature of the symbolistic and metaphysical strains introduced into modern Am. poetry is manifold. Both aspects have in common cosmopolitanism that offered liberation from the 19th-c. Eng. tradition. Both have the sense of the integrity of poetry, whether as a kind of knowledge in itself or as a knowledge fully compatible with other truth. Both reveal an uneasiness about the condition of man. Both assert a kind of exploration in prosody and word and image that marks an impatience with traditional poetics. At the same time they differ as much as the 19th from the 17th c. Symbolism (q.v.) is of modern Europe, is exclusive of logical discourse, urges itself as the only solution of the human problem, looks toward dadaism and surrealism in its denial of past literary values. The metaphysical (q.v.) belongs to a religious age, exults in scholastic logic, asserts a kinship with theology, challenges the literary tradition without discarding it. Possibly in the clash of the disparate elements modern British and Am. poets have found the completely satisfactory literary situation: in Eliot, who polarizes the two sets of values most adeptly, we have our greatest poet.

Though the symbolic-metaphysical impact would seem in perspective to have been decisive, modern poetry first became known as a new departure not through it but through the movement of imagism (q.v.). Related to symbolism, it was also inspired by Chinese, Japanese, and Prov. poetry. As it became popular, especially under the leadership of Amy Lowell and the manifesto of 1915, it quickly hardened into a naive simplicity. If it provided only a basis for poetry and not a fully articulated poetry in itself, it still demonstrated the pervasive necessity of experiment. Imagism also touched firmly upon some of the work of Eliot, Stevens, Moore, and Williams, while it gave major impetus to H. D., J. G. Fletcher, and Amy Lowell.

After his earlier alliance with imagism, Pound moved into symbolism with the Mauberley period and with his Cantos. This work, still being written, is certainly his poetic monument, a work of magnificence but also an artifact for examination by technicians. Its fragmentation and perverse social program exemplify one blind alley that symbolism may take. But the poetry of Wallace Stevens, beginning with Harmonium and enriched by every later publication until by the end of his career some critics placed him above Eliot, appears the perfection of symbolist technique and morality—an apotheosis of the literary imagination produced by elegance and infinite tact. With a sharpness and open humor lacking in Stevens, but without his elegance, Cummings also has created an enduring poetry. Enjambed, disjointed, and distorted words give to his work an immediate feeling of avant-gardism that Stevens' lacks; but the essentially simple lyric quality does not suffer from these devices and profited from them when a poetic jolting was needed. Though to future readers they may be an obstacle, they will always be a charming one.

Eliot, Marianne Moore, and Ransom, as already noted, drew upon the metaphysical tradition as well as upon the symbolistic, Eliot most fully absorbing Fr. symbolism and Ransom least. Certainly Eliot, who has written poems in the Fr. language, is close to his sources; and we hardly need his testimony of the effect upon him of Arthur Symonds' book in 1908 to assure ourselves of his alliance with Laforgue, Rimbaud, and Corbière: The apparent illogic of sequence and the shimmering of the surface over a depth of effect are there:

And I must borrow every changing shape
To find expression. . . .

Symbolism and imagism had also come to Eliot through Pound, whose Cantos Eliot has singled out as the only long poem by a contemporary that he could read with enjoyment and admiration. But in Eng. poetry Pound took most from Browning and the group of the nineties, as Eliot said, while in both critical writing and poetry Eliot shows a growing awareness of the school of Donne. Quite probably Eliot had already read Donne as an undergraduate in Cambridge, where Charles Eliot Norton, who in 1895 edited the poet on the basis of Lowell's earlier work, continued prominent after his retirement. The Waste Land is "For Ezra Pound"—and not inconsiderably by him; but it implies (negatively) a philosophical base in Christian orthodoxy that, though not unlike Baudelaire's, has little in common with Arthur Symonds' but much in common with Donne's. Yet this comment does not suggest simply a return to an older view. In the poem's free use of anthropologists a new psychological frame of reference is provided that had greater moment for later poets than the religious frame of reference that led to Ash Wednesday and The Four Quartets. In these later poems one feels more and more a metaphysical concern for the image as "objective correlative" (q.v.) and less a concern for the image as a self-sufficient experience. Eliot has never written "about" poetry but about life:

. . . the light is still

At the still point of the turning world.

Yet it would be false to regard Eliot's work as merely a coalescence of two aspects of modern poetry, for his greatness lies not in this but in a total effect that makes uniquely his own the newer sense of poetry as a form of knowledge, the traditional sense of poetry as a special kind of knowledge, and the need for a poet to create a new language and rhythm.

By Ransom's own definition of "Major Poet" (as producing "deliverances . . . of vital human importance . . . consistently in some volume . . . freshly rather than repetitiously") both he and Marianne Moore would seem to qualify as minor. Yet both are always memorable, as the former's

. . . the body bears the head

(So hardly one they terribly are two) and the latter's "imaginary gardens with real toads in them." With Moore there is a fuller use of psychological nuance and a more conscious experimentalism than in Ransom, but both share a tightness of structure, an architectural sense of function, and a liveliness of wit. Each has a following, especially the former, whose pervasive influence among the poets of the next generation has almost established a "school of Marianne Moore." But of the five poets mentioned whose source of inspiration belongs to other earlier modern poets (MacLeish, Gregory, Tate, Merrill Moore, and Warren), the latter three are of the Fugitive (q.v.) group and have kept a meaningful association with their former teacher Ransom.

Like him their work has been metaphysical in flavor, and they variously demonstrate what he has indicated as the distinctive characteristics of the poetry of the century: the relaxation of meters, satiric and even "hateful" poetry, extreme condensation and syntactical displacement. But all three have been drawn much more to depth psychology than Ransom, partaking possibly of the anthropological interests of Eliot as well as of the clinical findings of Jung and Freud. In Merrill Moore relaxation of meter, with his remarkable experimentation in the sonnet, is a hallmark: though his poetry is often satiric, the satire is that of the tolerant psychiatrist rather than of the moralist, while his many thousands of sonnets show no more condensation in each than in the number of the whole. Both Tate and Warren, along with their psychological concern, have shown a Christian awareness, the former traditionally Catholic and the latter neo-orthodox. Tate has demonstrated a condensation and syntactical displacement that is much more pronounced than Ransom's; but Warren, as a book-club novelist, has not exhibited a compulsion toward obscurity.

The work of MacLeish and Gregory has also avoided extreme condensation and syntactical displacement. Though MacLeish began his poetical career as much under the symbolistic influence as any modern poet, he turned rapidly toward public speech, for which he has been both condemned and praised. Along with him, Horace Gregory has exhibited a much more marked use of social material and commentary in poetry; and both have been liberals rather than conservatives, humanists rather than supernaturalists. Though in this respect they may be regarded as continuing the tradition of Whitman, their technique does not recall Whitman. As the last of the first generation to be named (but not the last that should be named in any roll call of significant poets) they finally demonstrate the constant crisscrossing of the groupings that have been used. Writing on "Vers Libre and Avant-Garde," Louise Bogan closes her chapter with a consideration of Stevens, Marianne Moore, and Williams as three distinguished experimentalists. In this essay each has been placed in a separate category; but their closeness of personal and literary association also warrants our thinking of them as having a unity of influence, of mood, and of style.

This kind of unity is even more marked in the second generation of modern Am. poets, who largely lack major allegiances that could form even fluid groupings among them. Less difficult is the distinguishing of them from the poets of the first generation, however, though obviously poets born a half-dozen years on either side of the year used as a dividing line (1907—the birthdate of Auden) might well be claimed to be either the poetic fathers or the sons. The principal difference between the two groups is that the second grew up reading Frost, Stevens, and Eliot, or their British contemporaries; they were the heirs of revolt and victory. And as with all heirs of emancipation and property, their systems and substances proved both a sustaining comfort and an embarrassing restriction. Shocks in subject matter or in medium were no longer as easily attained; linguistic and psychological awareness remained rewarding, but lacked novelty. Further, the second generation was working along with the first, for if we take 1885 as a composite date of birth for the first generation, by 1962 it had reached only its seventy-seventh birthday. (By 1912, in contrast, Lowell, Whitman, and Melville would have been ninety-three if they had not died in the early 1890's.) Lacking retirement rules and sustained by geriatric medicines, the first generation has continued in competition with its poetic offspring.

The use of Auden's birthdate as the line of division affords not only a convenience but a recognition of his impact on Am. poetry in the last twenty years. First generally known in this country in the middle 1930's (and later becoming a citizen of the United States in an almost even compensation for Eliot's becoming a British subject), Auden has had a direct effect upon some of the poets of the second generation, and for many others represents the kind of shift in sensibility that has taken place. His casual mastery of modern poetic idiom marks him as the child of his more pioneering but less gracious poetic forebears. This mastery he shares with poets of today; and he has also shared with many of them a thorough grounding in psychological and anthropological explorations, but with a commitment to theological or secular existentialism. He has shared too the renewed impact of a first generation poet, Yeats, and his elegy on Yeats not only deserves its high repute as poetry but documents the new freedom, questioning, indebtedness, and emotional strength.

In the prison of his days
Teach the free man how to praise.

With the acceptance of the unique pervasiveness of Eliot ("this dictatorship," as Peter Viereck has called it, of "an ambiguous mixture of snobism and real excellence"), and with the recognition of a particular attraction by the younger poets for such diverse figures as Hopkins, Lorca, and Rilke, still two other individuals as controlling to a great extent the present poetic destinies may be put forward. One is John Crowe Ransom, whose influence as poet, critic, and editor has hardly been equalled. His presence in the work of such poets as Richard Eberhart—self-contained, traditional, with recognized affinities to Frost—and Theodore Roethke—turbulent, self-conscious, with something of the prophetic quality of Dylan Thomas—suggests the extent of his penetration. The second is Marianne Moore, whose tremendously impressive minor poetry has been valued since its first appearance in 1921, but for whom a real clamor of enthusiasm was delayed until the middle 1950's when even the Ford Motor Company sought her advice (though it did not take it, New Yorker, April 13, 1957) on the naming of a new automobile. Among many, two distinguished poets who show her authority—more truly than the Edsel would have under another name—are Elizabeth Bishop and Richard Wilbur. The former stays closer to Moore; but both have brought into our poetry a sustained joyousness of wit—elegant, controlled, a little too mature, but probably lasting. To be contrasted with them are Randall Jarrell and Howard Nemerov, both much more varied and exploratory, deeply indebted to Auden, yet to Auden as a starting point and not as a complete journey. Like Auden they not only accept and probe their progenitors but make a demanding peace with their modern culture.

But these connections with Auden and Moore do not invalidate Ciardi's statement about his contemporaries in his introduction to Mid-Century Poets: "These poets are not imagists, nor vorticists, nor classicists, nor existentialists. . . . It is never, then, a poetry of movements or manifestoes." Except for the Beat Poets (q.v.), who have mostly published since 1950, we have been treated to no movements, and as yet it is hard to discern more than tentative accomplishments in this large grouping. Perhaps the best, those at some time associated with Black Mountain College, are also closest to their other academic contemporaries. If so, we must still accept the rest of Ciardi's characterization: "It is more nearly a blend of the classical and the metaphysical, a poetry of individual appraisal, tentative, self-questioning, introspective, socially involved, and always reserving for itself the right to meet experience in its humanistic environment. . . . It is therefore a poetry of great variety, and of some difficulty, but a poetry capable of offering great rewards."

To attempt to select the poets now writing who offer the greatest rewards would be unfair both to those omitted and those named. Instead, we may glance at five poems by poets of the second generation which have recently examined earlier poets of the Am. tradition and which are a happy augury for a continuity that was justly interrupted in 1912 but that never was completely shattered and that now calls for mending. The first, For T.S.E. Only, by Hyam Plutzik, upbraids Eliot for his strain of anti-Semitism and for its associated pride, but in a context of the common brotherhood of sinfulness—

Thomas, Thomas,

Come, let us pray together for our exile.

Edwin Honig's Walt Whitman, placed in juxtaposition with Swinburne's Victorian panegyric and Lorca's surrealist tribute, sharpens our sense of the fine surface and penetrating depth of which contemporary poetry is capable, while at the same time it exhibits the independence of the 20th-c. Am. poet in his appraisal of a powerful but one-sided poetic tradition. In Winfield T. Scott's Mr. Whittier—"It is so much easier to forget than to have been Mr. Whittier"—we find secure recognition of unfashionable virtues by a poet who admires Stevens but loves Thomas Hardy, "warts and all," and who perhaps has most notably displayed in his poetry a consistent wish to simplify the modern poetic manner without losing all of its complexity. Robert Lowell's Mr. Edwards and the Spider looks still farther into the Am. past at a poet of the pulpit; it epitomizes the struggle between Lowell's desperate Catholicism and his Calvinistic origins in an intense and gnarled poetic that contrasts with the urbanity of the general poetic of the day. With Homage to Mistress Bradstreet, John Berryman has offered to many readers a masterpiece of modern poetry, difficult but not obscure, allusive but not precious, forceful but lyrical. Even though Berryman's concern is with the woman and not the poet, he brings us full circle, suggesting with poetic image a historical meaning in the Am. experience of poetry that this essay has labored discursively to outline.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: Brown University Library, A Catalogue of the Harris Collection of Am. Poetry (1886); O. Wegelin, Early Am. Poetry (1930); U. S. Library of Congress, Sixty Am. Poets, ed. A. Tate (1945, rev. ed. 1954); Lit. Hist. of the United States, ed. R. E. Spiller et al., III (1948) and Bibliog. Supplement, ed. R. M. Ludwig (1959); current bibliog. in AL and PMLA.

ANTHOLOGIES: Specimens of Am. Poetry, ed. S. Kettell (1829); The Poets and Poetry of America, ed. R. W. Griswold (1842); An Am. Anthol., ed. E. C. Stedman (1900); The Poets of Transcendentalism, ed. G. W. Cooke (1903); Modern Am. Poets, ed. C. Aiken (1922); Major Am. Poets, ed. H. H. Clark (1936); Southern Poets, ed. E. W. Parks (1936); Minor Knicker- bockers, ed. K. B. Taft (1947); A Little Treasury of Am. Poetry, ed. O. Williams (1948); The Poetry of the Negro, ed. L. Hughes and A. Bontemps (1949); Mid-Century Am. Poets, ed. J. Ciardi (1950); Oxford Book of Am. Verse, ed. F. O. Matthiessen (1950); Modern Am. Poetry, ed. L. Untermeyer (mid-century ed., 1950; new and enl. ed. 1962); Criterion Book of Modern Am. Verse, ed. W. H. Auden (1956); Fifteen Modern Am. Poets, ed. G. P. Elliott (1956); New Poets of England and America, ed. D. Hall et al. (1958); Modern Verse in Eng., ed. D. Cecil and A. Tate (1958); The Conscious Voice: an Anthol. of Am. Poetry, ed. A. D. Van Nostrand and C. H. Watts (1959); The New Am. Poetry 1945-1960, ed. D. M. Allen (1960).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. C. Stedman, Poets of America (1885); W. B. Otis, Am. Verse 1625-1807 (1909); A. H. Strong, Am. Poets and Their Theology (1916); A. Kreyenborg, Our Singing Strength (1929); G. W. Allen, Am. Prosody (1935); L. Howard, The Connecticut Wits (1943); H. W. Wells, The Am. Way of Poetry (1943); H. S. Jantz, The First Century of New England Verse (1944); H. Gregory and M. Zaturenska, A Hist. of Am. Poetry 1900-1940 (1946); Y. Winters, In Defense of Reason (1947); F. W. Conner, Cosmic Optimism (1949); J. G. Southworth, Some Modern Am. Poets (1950); H. H. Waggoner, The Heel of Elohím (1950); L. Bogan, Achievement in Am. Poetry 1900-1950 (1951); S. K. Coffman, Jr., Imagism (1951); S. T. Williams, Beginnings of Am. Poetry (1951); B. Deutsch, Poetry in Our Time (1952); A. N. Wilder, Modern Poetry and the Christian Tradition (1952); G. Arms, The Fields Were Green (1953); J. B. Hubbell, The South in Am. Lit. 1607-1900 (1954); J. C. Southworth, More Modern Am. Poets (1954); C. S. Lenhart, Musical Influences on Am. Poetry (1956); C. T. Kindilien, Am. Poetry in the Eighteen Nineties (1957); J. M. Bradbury, The Fugitives: a Crit. Account (1958); L. Cowan, The Fugitive Group (1959); M. L. Rosenthal, The Modern Poets (1960); R. H. Pearce, The Continuity of Am. Poetry (1961); Aspects of Am. Poetry, ed. R. M. Ludwig (1962); G. Cambron, Recent Am. Poetry (1962) and The Inclusive Flame: Studies in Am. Poetry (1963).

G.A.

AMOEBEAN VERSES (Gr. "responsive verses"). Verses, couplets or stanzas, found chiefly in pastoral poetry (Theocritus, Virgil) and spoken alternately by two speakers. The second character is expected not only to match the theme introduced by the first speaker but also to improve upon it in any way possible. —Koster.

P.S.C.

AMPHIBRACH (Gr. "short at both ends"). A classical metrical foot consisting of a long syllable preceded and followed by a short one:

— — — ; habere

Rarely used in classical poetry either as an independent unit or in a continuous series. In Eng.

x / x : arrangement

the amphibrachic cadence is common in stress-groups.—Koster. P.S.C.

AMPHIMACER. See CRETIC.

AMPLIFICATION. The enlarging of a statement, dilating an argument, and sometimes diminishing one. (Meiosis, q.v., was often used when there was diminution.) A very comprehensive figure, a. is often more than a figure. Cicero (De Oratore 3.26) said that the "highest distinction of eloquence consists in amplification by means of ornament, which can be used to make one's speech not only increase the importance of a subject and raise it to a higher level, but also to diminish and disparage it." Quintilian (Institutiones Oratoriae 8.4.3) spoke of four principal means of a.: augmentation (incrementum), comparison, reasoning, and accumulation (congeries). Aristotle, in the Poetics (19), mentioned "maximizing and minimizing" as important elements of Thought (i.e., rhetoric) in the drama. In the Rhetoric (2.26.1) he remarked that a. and depreciation are "enthymemes which serve to show how a thing is great or small." Aristotle, Cicero, and Quintilian clearly regarded a. as something larger than a figure. So did some of the Renaissance rhetoricians. Melancthon, for example, in his Elementorum Rhetorices (1533, p. 76), said, "The universal design of eloquence consists of three things: first in grammatical speech, next in figures, third in amplifications." Nevertheless, amplificatio was also considered a figure. A good example of building up a simple idea into a powerful effect was cited by Quintilian (8.4.4.) from Cicero: "It is a sin to bind a Roman citizen, a crime to scourge him, little short of the most unnatural murder to put him to death; what then shall I call his crucifixion?" Cicero's amplifications, and there are many in his orations, were widely imitated in both prose and verse.

A., which is best suited to the grand or elevated style, is specially prominent in epic and tragic poetry. Among many examples in Shakespeare, one of Othello's speeches is a good one. Othello has just realized that Desdemona is innocent: "Whip me, ye devils, / From the possession of this heavenly sight! / Blow me about in winds! Roast me in sulphur! / Wash me in steep-down gulfs of liquid fire! / O Desdemona! Desdemona! dead!" 5.2. 276-80). More common in dialogue or monologue, a. may yet be very effective in narrative or descriptive passages, as in Paradise Lost 2.618-22: "Through many a dark and dreary vale / They passed, and many a region dolorous, / O'er many a frozen, many a fiery Alp, / Rocks, caves, lakes, fens, bogs, dens, and shades of death- / A universe of death."—W. G. Crane, Wit and Rhetoric in the Renaissance (1937); Lausberg. M.T.H.

ANACLASIS (Gr. "bending back"). Interchange of a long and a short syllable in Gr. verse either within a foot or metron or between the end of one foot or metron and the beginning of the next. Thus:

↓ 2 — may become 2 ↓ —

and

— — — 1 / 2 — — may be replaced by — — — 2 / 1 — —

W. J. W. Koster, "Over anaclasses en rhythmische metabole in de grieksche verskunst," Handelingen van het 19. Vlaamse Filologen-congres (1951). R.J.G.

ANACOLUTHON (Gr. "wanting sequence"). Primarily a term of grammar designating a change of construction in a sentence that leaves its beginning uncompleted, ordinarily seen as a fault, as betraying a lazy or confused mind. Some rhetoricians, however, have recognized that it is sometimes a quite natural and perspicuous mode of expression in spoken discourse (G. W. Hervey cites Matthew 7:9, which runs, in the Authorized Version, "Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone?" [Christian Rhetoric, 1873, p. 583]). Another authority observes that "Shakespeare sometimes showed depth of feeling in his characters" by this means, as at 4.3.34-36 of Henry V, where the King says: "Rather proclaim it, Westmoreland, through my host, / That he which hath no stomach to this fight, / Let him depart" (H. L. Yelland and others, A Handbook of Literary Terms, 1950, p. 5). Lausberg finds the commonest form of a. to be the so-called absolute nominative (like that in the lines just quoted from Shakespeare). The particular a. of the absence of the complementary member of a pair of correlative expressions has been known by the term particula pendens, where we have to do with correlative particles (like "either . . . or," or "both . . . and"), otherwise by the term anapodoton or anantapodoton (Gr. "wanting the apodosis," as of a conditional sentence). Thus C. T. Ernesti, Lexicon technologiae Graecorum rhetoricae, 1795, cites the authority of a nameless scholiast on a locus in Thucydides 3.3, which translated runs: "If the attempt succeeds," the understood but unexpressed apodosis being, "it will be well"; so also Lausberg and others. J. Marouzeau, however, distinguishes anapodoton from anantapodoton, making the former a term for an a. in which after an interruption, an antecedent expression is restated in a changed form ("si vous vous recusez,—et vous en avez le droit,—si c'est là votre attitude, j'agirai en conséquence." [Lexique de la terminologie linguistique, 1933]). See EPANALEPSIS. H.B.

ANACREONTIC. Named after Anacreon of Teos (6th c. B.C.), the regular Anacreontic (— — — — —) was the alteration of the lesser Ionic (q.v.) dimeter (— — — / — — —) by anacalasis (q.v.), whereby the final long syllable of the first foot was interchanged with the first short of the second. That the A. was an Ionic measure is supported by such passages as Euripides, Cyclops 495–502; 503–510; 511–518, where a sequence of Anacreontics is varied by lesser Ionics. Another view is that the A. was originally an iambic dimeter catalectic with the initial foot an anapaest (Sappho, fr. 102 Lobel and Page, combines pure iambic dimeters catalectic with Anacreontics), and iambic dimeters were indeed employed by both Anacreon and the authors of the later Anacreontea (composed in imitation of Anacreon between 200 B.C. and 500 A.D.). Whatever their origin, Anacreontics were used in L. apparently by Laevius (1st c. B.C.) and by Seneca, Petronius, Claudian, Martianus Capella, and Boethius. Hadrian's famous reply to Florus, ēgo nōlo Florūs esse,

is a notable and particularly good example of the meter, which can be paralleled in Longfellow's Hiawatha, e.g., "For a while to muse and ponder / On a half-effaced inscription."—Kolár; Dale; Koster; Crusius. R.J.G.

The Anacreontea or Anacreontics comprise about 60 short lyrical poems on wine, love and song—graceful and charming but rather shallow pieces. Edited for the first time by Stephanus (Henri Estienne) in 1554, they had a considerable influence on Renaissance and later European poets, e.g., in 16th-c. France, on Ronsard and Rémy Belleau and, in 16th-, 18th-, and 19th-c. Italy, on Tasso, Parini, Monti, Foscolo, and Leopardi who translated and imitated many of these poems. Anacreontic imitation was even more in vogue in 18th-c. Germany among the so-called Anakreontiker (Gleim, Uz, Götz, and their forerunner Hagedorn). In England, Abraham Cowley seems to have first used the term in his Anacreontiques (1656), but the probably best known verse translation is Odes of Anacreon (1800) by the Ir. poet Thomas Moore, dubbed by Byron "Anacreon Moore."—Schmid and Stählin, 1.; E. Merker, "Anakreontik," Reallexikon, 2d ed., 1. P.S.C.

ANACRUSIS (Gr. "the striking up of a tune"). One or more initial syllables which are not part of a regular metrical scheme. This term, for which the adjective "procephalous" would be a more descriptive and better attested alternative, was adopted by Bentley in principle and Hermann in fact, as well as by their successors in the 19th c. through analogy with modern music, i.e., when a note or notes occur before the first actual bar of the melody. Classical scholars have largely abandoned the view that a. could be assumed to alter rising (e.g., iambic) to falling (e.g., trochaic) rhythms, or vice versa. For an example in Gr. poetry see LOGAEDIC. An example in modern stress verse occurs in Blake's The Tyger:

When the stars threw down their spears
And watered heaven with their tears

where classical metricians would not now normally regard the first syllable of the second line as justifying a return to the falling rhythm of the first.—Dale; N. A. Bonavia-Hunt, Horace the Minstrel (1954). For a. in OE verse see J. C. Pope, The Rhythm of Beowulf (1942).

R.J.G.

ANADIPILOSIS, also epanadiplosis (Gr. "doubling"). Twice used by the Gr. rhetorician Demetrius (1st c. A.D.), once in the general sense of word repetition, e.g., "There were huge serpents in the Caucasus, both huge and many" (On Style 66); once where he calls it a "schema," quoting from Sappho to illustrate the "force" and "grace" imparted to her poetry by word repetitions. Observe that the repetitions in this example occur both with and without intervening words (W. Rhys Roberts' tr. in the Loeb Classics ed. is faithful to the original on this point: "Maidenhood, Maidenhood, whither away, / Forsaking me!" And her Maidenhood makes reply to her in the same figure: 'Not again unto thee shall I come for aye, / Not again unto thee!'" (140).

Synonyms of a. in this general sense of word repetition for emphasis have included palillogy (Johannes Susenbrotus, Epitome troporum ac schematum, 1541, ed. 1621, p. 45); epizeuxis (Herodian, grammarian of the 2d c. A.D., in C. Walz, Rhetores Graeci, 9 v. 1832–36, v. 8, p. 603); conduplicatio (Ad Herennium, 1st c. B.C., 4.28); and still others. In view of this plethora of other terms for the general sense, it would seem well, if the term "a." is to be used at all henceforth, to apply it, as most of the postclassical authorities do, only to the word repetition that serves to link two units of discourse such as consecutive stanzas or sentences (Susenbrotus, p. 45; George Puttenham, The Arte of Eng. Poesie, 1589, 1936 ed., p. 200; Henry Peacham, The Garden of Eloquence, 1593, p. 46). Such is the link between the final line of the 44th and opening line of the 45th stanza of The Faerie Queene 1.2: "Then turning to his Lady, dead with feare her found. / Her seeming dead he found with feigned feare."

Various other kinds of repetition have been distinguished, among others: antanaclasis or traductio (the witty repetition of a word in a changed sense, Quintilian, 1st c. A.D., Institutes of Oratory 9.3.68-73); epanalepsis (q.v.); ploce (the "weaving" of several repetitions of one or more words through a passage of some length, Quintilian 9.3.40-44); anaphora (q.v.); epiphora or epistrophe (the ending of a series of units of discourse with the same word or words, Peacham, p. 42; Abraham Fraunce, The Arcadian Rhetorique, 1588, D^v); symploce or complexio (anaphora and epiphora combined, Alexander, Gr. rhetorician of the 2d c. A.D., Peri schematōn 2, in Walz, v. 8, pp. 464-65; Ad Herennium 4.13); and climax (q.v.). H.B.

ANALOGY. See SYMBOL.

ANALYSIS. The resolution or breaking up, at least partially, of anything complex into its various elements; the opposite of synthesis. Its necessity is twofold: the experience of a poem, and any discourse about it, both take place in time; unable to read or say "everything at once," we proceed from the parts to the whole.

HISTORY. In Plato and Aristotle we find two basic types of a.: (1) Plato's method, generally, is to analyze an idea dialectically, i.e., by examining in a dialogue various definitions of it or aspects of the problem it presents; (2) in an Aristotelian treatise, there may also be a dialectic of ideas, but Aristotle's characteristic method is to generalize on the basis of examples (e.g., in the Poetics, tragedy, with some comparisons of comedy and epic) expounding the first principles of a subject in the form of definitions and sketching its broad outlines by a classification into genus and species of its various parts or aspects. This contrast between a dramatic-poetic-intuitive method and an empirical-scientific-expository one persists throughout the history of the criticism of poetry. The Platonic and Aristotelian traditions mingled in the Middle Ages (Abelard, Aquinas, Scotus), with that of Aristotle on the whole dominating. Of central importance was the fact that the methods of instruction practiced by the church were based on the inculcation of dogmas, systematically analyzed and formulated, and on the careful study and precise interpretation of texts. Dante's analyses of his own poems in Vita Nuova show the resuling habit of mind being applied on an elementary level; and the allegorical theory of interpretation, derived from Philo of Alexandria (the four levels of meaning distinguished by Aquinas, and by Dante in his letter to Can Grande della Scala), is an application "in depth" of the method of analysis developed by many generations of commentators on the Bible, Homer, and other classics.

In the Eng. tradition, it was Bacon (Novum Organum, 1620) who first clearly called for a new "form of induction (i.e., science) which shall analyze experience and take it to pieces," contrasting the conclusions to be extracted thus "out of the very bowels of nature" with those derived "merely out of the depths of the mind." Thus began the empirical-sensationalistic Eng. tradition developed by Hobbes, Locke, and others, with profound consequences for poetry and poetic theory (C. D. Thorpe, The Aesthetic Theory of Thomas Hobbes, 1940). The "esprit géométrique" represented by Descartes and Spinoza, also, was a pervasive influence on neoclassical literature, art, and criticism, which can be felt in the poetry of argument and ideas, in the increasingly rational approach to imagery and metaphor, and in other ways. In the arts, its impact is perhaps more obvious: the music of Bach, the architectural designs of Sir Christopher Wren. A key document in this development is W. Hogarth's The Analysis of Beauty (1752; ed. J. Burke [1955]), which attempts to relate all visual beauty to a single element (the "line of beauty").

It was in Germany that the problem of taste and judgment was given its classic formulation by Kant in his Critique of Judgment (1790). Here the distinction between analytic and synthetic judgments is thoroughly developed. Kant went beyond "synthetic judgments," into "a dialectic of the Critique of taste (not of taste itself) in respect of its principles." Hegel developed further the dialectical method, as a kind of synthesis of a.-and-synthesis, by means of which he hoped to transcend both; nevertheless, in much post-Hegelian philosophy and aesthetics, the a.-synthesis opposition remains of central importance.

Among the attempts to counter the analytic tendency which have had important consequences for literature and poetics, special mention may be made of Bergson's theories of time as durée and of "intuition"; Croce's conception of Aesthetic as Science of Expression (1902) or "spiritual activity"; and Whitehead's "organicism" theories of "synthetic prehension."

APPLICATION TO POETRY. In less theoretical terms, we may say that a. (and synthesis) are fundamental activities of the mind that are present in all critical discourse. Among the specific applications of a. to poetry have been:

1) A. of Language. As one way of defining grammar, this became, with the publication of Morell's Analysis of Sentences Explained (1852), a powerful pedagogic tool in England and the States, which may have influenced habits of reading poetry. More profound, probably, was the general tendency of Eng. to pass from its "synthetic," inflected Indo-European roots to "analytic" language patterns—which, by making the meanings of words dependent on their positions in a sentence or line of poetry, help determine their ambiguities or "plurisignation" (see, for example, W. Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity, 1930; The Structure of Complex Words, 1951).

Structural linguistics has begun recently to make its contributions to the a. of poetry (F. L. Utley, "Structural Linguistics and the Literary Critic," JAAC, March 1960; and see the typical counter criticisms of this tendency by Wimsatt and Beardsley, "The Concept of Meter: An Exercise in Abstraction," PMLA, Dec. 1959. The semiotic tradition (Cassirer, Morris, Langer) has been developed by E. G. Ballard toward a conception of the aesthetic object as "a self-significant natural symbol which is intrinsically valued" (Art and Analysis, 1957). And another related tendency, at its most ambitious and systematic in K. Burke (see section 6, below), is the return to rhetorical a. (e.g., J. J. Mahoney, "An Analysis of Winesburg, Ohio," JAAC, Dec. 1956, concerned with "voice and address" and "tone").

2) A. of an Idea. This is a logical process, characteristic of philosophy, which may enter into poetics by way of: (a) definitions (as when Aristotle says that "Metaphor consists in giving the thing a name that belongs to something else; the transference being either from genus to species, or from species to genus, or from species to species, or on grounds of analogy"); (b) critical discussions of such concepts as "nature," "imitation," "romanticism" (or "analysis"!); and (c) historical studies of the changes in meaning undergone by words such as the foregoing (see Empson, op. cit.; A. O. Lovejoy, Essays in the History of Ideas, 1948; Leo Spitzer, Essays in Historical Semantics, 1948; and the Journal of the History of Ideas).

3) A. of a Structure of Ideas. Often overlapping with no. 2, this may be restricted to individual literary works, as in the writing of briefs, summaries, conspectuses, or synopses (Wilkins, 1668: "A Scheme or Analysis . . . of things belonging to this design"), especially of such elements as their "arguments" or plots; or may be extended to entire systems of ideas—in relation to an individual poet (J. F. Danby, Shakespeare's Doctrine of Nature, 1949), to a limited age or movement (neoclassicism, imagism), or to an elaborate historical development (A. O. Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being, 1936).

4) A. of a Text. This may overlap with no. 3, but is really associated with the writing of critical commentaries (E. Huit, 1664: "The whole Prophecie of Daniel Explained by a Paraphrase, Analysis and Briefe Comment") and various other forms of interpretation (cf. John Wisdom, Interpretation and Analysis, 1931; see also articles on EXPLICATION and on TEXTUAL CRITICISM). The problems encountered in the explication of poetry, for example, may be related, theoretically and practically, to those involved in the interpretation of other "works of art" as well (M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics, 1958, ch. 2: "The Categories of Critical Analysis" and Ch. 3: "The Literary Work"), for which D. F. Tovey's Essays in Musical Analysis (1935) may be taken as one model. (See also C. L. Stevenson, "On the 'Analysis' of a Work of Art," Philos. Rev., Jan. 1958.)

5) A. of Causes. This is necessary for all writers of biography or literary history. Conceptions of causation vary: the Aristotelian a. is the most elaborate; the modern-empirical one has been influenced by developments in the various sciences. Thus, Taine formulated his deterministic a. in terms of race, environment, and time; a Marxist critic will relate a certain style of poetry to the economic and social conditions of the age which produced it; and so forth.

6) A. Involving Psychology. Whether in terms of Freudian "psychoanalysis" or an earlier "faculty" psychology, this is required for discussions: (a) of imagination and creative processes and aesthetic experiences (D. H. Parker, The Analysis of Art, 1926; D. W. Prall, Aesthetic Analysis, 1936; K. Burke, "Freud—and the Analysis of Poetry," The Philosophy of Literary Form, 1941; Art and Psychoanalysis, ed. W. Phillips, 1957); (b) of poets as individuals, especially in biographies; and (c) of characters or situations in poems.

7) A. of Types. Besides psychological types (see no. 6), this has resulted, by a kind of analogy to biological and other types or species, in considerations of literary genres (I. Ehrenpreis, The 'Types Approach' to Literature, 1945; S. J. Kahn, "Problems of Analysis and Criticism," in Science and Aesthetic Judgment, 1953).

SYNTHESIS AND CATEGORIES OF ANALYSIS. To the extent that a. is systematic, it implies a corresponding impulse toward synthesis, whether revealed by the analyst's choice of elements or categories, or made explicit in terms of some all-embracing philosophy or world-view. Thus, each of the emphases included in our historical sketch can be shown to have had, and to have, natural consequences for poetic theory and the actual practice of criticism; whether out of this variety a total synthesis or organon of analytic methods can emerge is a problem only the future can solve. S. C. Pepper, in The Basis of Criticism in the Arts (1945), for example, sketches four alternative syntheses (mechanistic, contextualistic, organicistic, and formistic), though he prefers the contextualistic categories for his own "analysis of the aesthetic work of art" (op. cit., "Supplementary Essay"). Thus, the character of the synthesis determines the nature of the a. to which it corresponds.

Though this aspect of our subject is well-nigh inexhaustible, it may help to provide a few illustrations. The Aristotelian analyst will approach the poem in terms of logical divisions of the "concrete whole" into its parts: objects, means, and manner of imitation; plot, character, thought, diction; and material, efficient, formal, and final causes. The Platonist may use similar distinctions, but will tend to subordinate all other elements, through a dialectic of ideas, to the all-embracing Idea of the Good; as the medieval or modern scholastic will, to the nature of God and His creation. The neoclassicist, to put a long story very briefly, will try to harmonize the foregoing categories with the requirements of Cartesian or Newtonian science. The romantic, emphasizing either the individual or the social or the transcendental aspect of experience, will utilize psychological categories (expression, or suppression, of emotion), or invoke humanitarian values, or pinpoint mystical experiences or symbols; and Coleridge's central distinction between "fancy" and "imagination" corresponds roughly to that between a. (in psychology, Lockean and Hartleian "associationism") and synthesis (his "esemplastic" power and the modern "Gestalt"). The naturalist will apply the methods and metaphors of evolutionary science (chiefly biology) in an attempt to achieve objectivity (Taine and Brunetière, in certain respects; L. A. Sherman, Analytics of Literature, 1893). The modern pragmatist or instrumentalist will be concerned chiefly with the relations of means to ends in the poem, giving a new formulation to a principle as old as Aristotle's Poetics and Rhetoric; one form of this tendency in our century is the concern with poetry as a form of communication, the complications of which have led to the young science of semantics, with its elaborate a. of meanings and motives (C. K. Ogden and I. A. Richards, The Meaning of Meaning, 1923). In I. A. Richards, to mention one of the most interesting and influential of those who have attempted a new synthesis, we generally find a complex mixture of romantic, pragmatist, and behaviorist psychological tendencies (see "Analysis," pt. 3 of Practical Criticism, 1929; also Principles of Literary Criticism, 1925; Coleridge on Imagination, 1934; Interpretation in Teaching, 1938; How to Read a Page, 1943).

Sometimes, as in Kenneth Burke ("Lexicon Rhetoricae," in Counter-Statement, 1931; A Grammar of Motives, 1945; A Rhetoric of Motives, 1952), we encounter an ambitious attempt to embrace all these elements, and more, in some sort of dialectical unity. Less ambitious, but more coherent, syntheses are found in P. Goodman, The Structure of Literature (1954), which, using a version of the Aristotelian categories, distinguishes "formal, genetic, and final modes of analysis" and applies a method of "inductive formal analysis" to dramatic and novelistic plots, and to lyrical poems; R. S. Crane, The Languages of Criticism and the Structure of Poetry (1953) in which various theories of criticism are discussed in the light of Aristotelian principles; and D. A. Stauffer, The Nature of Poetry (1946), in which an organic metaphor unites the various analytical chapters.

ULTIMATE ISSUES AND CONCLUSIONS. Behind the problems of synthesis lurk the profounder, often implicit, questions of epistemology and metaphysics—of what we know and of the nature of being. R. Wellek and A. Warren (Theory of Literature, 1949) have posed the problem of the "mode of existence" of a poem as follows: "What is the 'real' poem; where should we look for it; how does it exist?" They have based their formulation of the problem of literary study on a distinction between "extrinsic" and "intrinsic" approaches, strongly favoring the latter. Wellek's discussion of "The Analysis of the Literary Work of Art" (Ch. 12) provides a convenient review of our problem—but one subject to the limitation stated in the preceding paragraphs, in that its attempt at a constructive statement of the elements "intrinsic" to the study of literature is based on E. Husserl's "Phenomenology" ("which stresses the careful description of phenomena in all domains of experience without regard to the traditional epistemological questions": American College Dictionary), as applied by Roman Ingarden (Das literarische Kunstwerk, 1931). This method of a. distinguishes strata of sound, of units of meaning, of "world" (objects represented), and of "metaphysical qualities" (the sublime, the tragic, the terrible, the holy). The present writer, using another metaphysical framework, prefers the more neutral terminology of "external" and "internal" relations (used also by W. Shumaker, Elements of Critical Theory, 1952); the "external" relations would include all those elements discussed by Wellek and Warren in their chapters on biography, psychology, sociology, ideas, and the other arts. All these can be, and should be, embraced by a conception of experience as the interactions of an organism with its environment (S. J. Kahn, "What Does a Critic Analyze?" Phil. and Phenomenological Res., Dec. 1952); and, further, that such an "organic" a. can go beyond a naive "biologism" or "psychologism" or "sociologism" and incorporate the profoundest wisdom of the poets and modern science, if it returns to the full complexity of Aristotle's a. of causation ("Towards an Organic Criticism," JAAC, Sept. 1956).

ANAPHORA

However such ultimate issues may be settled, we should conclude with the modest caution that a.—however necessary, and even delightful, it may be as an exercise of reason—should never, where poetry is concerned, become an exclusive end in itself. Since poetry, in its nature, is something to be experienced aesthetically and enjoyed and valued, as well as studied and understood, the best style of poetic a. will naturally be one which best leads to the full realization of all these ends. Indeed, there are occasions in the reading of poetry, as in life, when a. is unnecessary, or does more harm than good. As T. S. Eliot put it in his lecture on The Frontiers of Criticism (1956): since the function of literary criticism is to “promote the understanding and enjoyment of literature . . . we do not fully understand a poem unless we enjoy it.” And if, as he quizzically concluded, the literary criticism of the last thirty years “in both England and America . . . may even come to seem, in retrospect, too brilliant,” the reason may lie in its overemphasis on a.

S.J.K.

ANALYZED RHYME may be broadly defined as the simultaneous, or interlocked, usage of two or more types of rhyme. Perhaps it is most commonly seen in a combination of assonantal rhyme and consonantal rhyme, as in run, hunt, fin, splint, but it can involve other combinations such as the consonantal and true rhymes in clear, where, tear, air.—S. L. Mooney, "New Devices in Sound Repetition," Word Study, 24 (1949); Deutsch. R.BE.

ANANTAPODOTON. See ANACOLUTHON.

ANAPAEST, anapest (Gr. "beaten back," i.e., either a "reversed" dactyl or a verse begun with a "beat" of the foot). A metrical unit, in quantitative verse, of 2 short syllables followed by 1 long one:

८८-; dēitās

Originally a warlike march rhythm, it was widely used, in combinations and pure, in

Gr. melic and dramatic verse, particularly by comic choruses:

*ēx hōu gē chōrōišin ēphēstēkēn trygikoīs hō
dīdaskālōs hēmōn*

(Aristophanes, Acharnians 628; anapaestic tetrameter catalectic, i.e., $7\frac{1}{2}$ anapaests, with normal substitution of spondee for a. in the first foot.) It was adopted by the Romans primarily in drama (Plautus, Seneca). The term has been adopted into Eng. for the accentual foot of 2 unstressed syllables followed by 1 stressed one:

$$(x \ x_1; \overset{x}{\overset{x}{\text{interrupt}}})$$

Used mainly in popular verse until the beginning of the 18th c., it was subsequently employed for serious poetry by Cowper, Scott, Byron, Browning, Morris, and especially Swinburne, who used it in lines of every possible length. While the a. is characteristically the foot of hurried motion and excitement:

“The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold”

(Byron, The Destruction of Sennacherib)

it can also be slow-moving and effective in conveying mourning or sadness, as, for instance, in Matthew Arnold's Rugby Chapel. Pure anapaests are comparatively rare in Eng. and tend to jig unless carefully varied with other feet.—A. Raabe, De metrorum anapaesticorum apud poetas Graecos usu . . . (1912); J. W. White, The Verse of Gr. Comedy (1912); Baum; Hamer; Crusius. D.S.P.

ANAPHORA (Gr. "a carrying up or back"); also epanaphora. The Gr. rhetoricians Demetrius (1st c. A.D.? [On Style 268]) and Longinus later (On the Sublime 20.1-2) apply the term epanaphora to the repetition of the same word or words at the beginning of several successive sentences or sentence members, and Demetrius (loc. cit.) and virtually all postclassical authorities treat a. as its exact synonym. Examples abound in argumentative oratory and sermons and in poetry. Longinus sees in this, as he does in many another figure, an imitation of the thought or action that the words express: "By his manner, his looks, his voice, when he strikes you with insult, when he strikes you like an enemy, when he strikes you with his knuckles, when he strikes you like a slave.' Here the orator [says Longinus] does just the same as the aggressor, he belabors the minds of the jury and assaults them again and again." It is, of course, a favorite pattern of Shakespeare's, e.g., for eulogy, as in John of Gaunt's lines on England: "This royal throne of kings, this sceptred isle, / This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars, / This other Eden . . . (Richard II, 2.1.40-42), and for expressions of nostalgia, like Richard's lines in the same play: "With mine own tears I wash away my balm, / With mine own hands I give away my crown, / With mine own tongue deny my sacred state [etc.] (4.1.207ff.).

A different meaning, ignored by the later rhetoricians of Europe and best regarded as obsolete, was assigned to a. by the Gr. rhetorician of the 2d c. A.D., Hermogenes (Peri deino-tētos, ch. 28), namely, the citation of testimony for support (asphaleia), as distinguished from bebaiōsis, i.e., confirmation thereof for proof ("pistis"), e.g., Herodotus: "So say the Corinthians" (anaphora), "and the Lesbians concur" (bebaiōsis). See C. Walz, Rhetores Graeci, 9 v., 1832-36, v. 3, p. 433. H.B.

ANAPODOTON. See ANACOLUTHON.

ANASTROPHE (Gr. "a turning upside down"). A dislocation of the normal (that is, prose) word order, restricted by Quintilian (1st c. A.D.) to the inversion (L. inversio or reversio) of only two words, for example, mecum for cum me, quibus de rebus for de quibus rebus (Institutes of Oratory 8.6.65). Quintilian defines a nearly related term, hyperbaton (Gr. "a stepping over," L. verbi transgressio) as primarily the separation of two words that normally belong together, by the interposing of an alien sentence element, which thus has to be "stepped over" ("as . . . 'in duas divisam esse partes'; for 'in duas partes divisam esse' was the natural order, but would be harsh and inelegant"). Longinus applies the term hyperbaton to an inversion of ideas rather than words, i.e., an inversion of what would seem the expected or logical order of the elements of an argument, in a very interesting passage in which he cites "the speech of Dionysius, the Phocaeen, in Herodotus," pointing out what extra force a surprising order imparts to ideas that thus seem "wrung from" the speaker rather than "premeditated" (On the Sublime, ch. 22). It is a commonplace that because of the almost unlimited freedom of word order normal in L. and Gr.—at least literary L. and Gr., prose as well as verse—one can hardly identify any inversions in these languages (Quintilian is near to pedantry on the subject), whereas inversions of the much stricter order normal in the modern languages are conspicuous. L. prose would easily tolerate the form of Horace's question, "ridentem dicere verum / Quid vetat?" (Satires 1.1.24-25), whereas Milton's word-for-word rendering of it, "Laughing to teach the truth / What hinders?" is distinctly "poetical." Inversions are naturally most exploited in poetry, whether merely to meet the exigencies of meter or rhyme (as in many a line by "regular" poets of the school of Pope) or for effects of melody or emphasis, or as one among other means by which a poet may impart to his work something of the spirit and prestige of ancient models (e.g., in Paradise Lost), or, again, as has sometimes been thought, out of a perverse eccentricity (the more cryptic poems of Browning have not escaped this charge). H.B.

ANCIENTS AND MODERNS, QUARREL OF. See BATTLE OF THE ANCIENTS AND MODERNS.

ANGLO-SAXON PROSODY. See OLD GERMANIC PROSODY; ENGLISH PROSODY.

ANTANACLASIS. See PUN; ANADIPLOSIS.

ANTHOLOGY. Etymologically a "bouquet"; from Gr. anthos (flower) and legein (to gather, pick up); originally a collection of poetic epigrams, generally composed in elegiac distichs and referent to specific poets or subjects. Compilations were made as early as the 4th c. B.C. About 90 B.C. Meleager of Gadara collected a Garland of short epigrams in various meters, but chiefly elegiac, and on various subjects; some fifty poets from Archilochus (7th c. B.C.) to himself were represented. About A.D. 40 Philippus of Thessalonica collected a Garland of exclusively elegiac epigrams by poets since Meleager. Approximately a century later Straton of Sardis put together some hundred epigrams on a single subject, homosexual love. About A.D. 570 the Byzantine anthologist Agathias collected a Circle of epigrams in various meters; he included selections, arranged by subject, from both Garlands as well as a large selection of contemporary epigrams.

Constantinus Cephalas, a Byzantine Greek who lived during the reign of Constantine VII (912-59), compiled an a. in which he combined and rearranged the collections of Meleager, Philippus, Straton and Agathias. In all, it included 15 divisions: Christian epigrams, descriptions of statuary, temple inscriptions, prefaces (by Meleager, Philippus, and Agathias), erotic poems, dedicatory poems, epitaphs (including Simonides' famous lines on the Spartan dead at Thermopylae), epigrams by St. Gregory of Nazianzus, epideictic epigrams, moral epigrams, social and satirical epigrams, Straton's collection, epigrams in special meters, riddles, and miscellaneous epigrams. The A., or Gr. A., as it is called, was edited, revised, and expurgated in 1301 by the monk Maximus Planudes. His edition was the only available Gr. a. until 1606, when the great Fr. scholar Claude Saumaise (Salmasius) discovered a single manuscript of Cephalas in the Elector Palatine's library at Heidelberg; hereafter it came to be known as the Palatine A.; it supplanted the Planudean A. but retained a Planudean appendix as a 16th division. The first edition of the Palatine A. was published in 13 vols. (1794–1814) by Friedrich Jacobs.

The influence of the Gr. A. in the modern world dates from Janus Lascaris' Florentine edition of Planudes in 1494. Translations of the epigrams into L. and later into the vernacular languages multiplied consistently until about 1800, when the enthusiasm for the unpointed Gr. epigram was succeeded by that for the pointed epigram as perfected by the Latin Martial (1st c. A.D.). Renewed interest in the Gr. A. is apparent today in current translations, e.g., Kenneth Rexroth's, of selections from it. Other anthologies include the 5th c. Stobaeus' Gr. Eclogae (Selections) and Anthologion, the Anthologia Latina (ed. Riese, Bücheler and Lommatsch, 1894–1926, including otherwise uncollected L. verse and a 6th-c. compilation which contained the Pervigilium Veneris), medieval florilegia, the Carmina Cantabrigiensia (11th c.) and Carmina Burana (13th c.), and Erasmus' Adagia early 16th c.).

The earliest anthologies in Eng. include: Tottel's Miscellany (orig., Songes and Sonettes, written by the right honorable Lorde Henry Haward late Earle of Surrey, and other, 1557); Clement Robinson's Very Pleasaunt Sonettes and Storyes in Myter (1566; surviving only as A Handefull of Pleasant Delites, 1584); The Paradyse of Daynty Devises (1576); A Gorgious Gallery of Gallant Inventions (1578); The Phoenix Nest (1593); Englands Helicon (1600, 1614); Davidson's Poetical Rapsody (1602).

Other significant European anthologies are: Jan Gruter's Delitiae (It., Fr., Belgian, and German poems in Latin; 1608–1614); J. W. Zingref's Anhang unterschiedlicher aussgesuchter Gedichten (1624); Thomas Percy's Reliques of Ancient Eng. Poetry (1765; an a. of early ballads which proved to be considerably influential); Oliver Goldsmith's The Beauties of Eng. Poetry (1767); Thomas Campbell's Specimens of the British Poets (1891); Palgrave's Golden Treasury of Eng. Songs and Lyrics (1861; the a. of lyric poetry in Victorian England); Le Parnasse contemporain (1866, 1871–76); Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch's Oxford Book of Eng. Verse (1900, 1939).

The popularity of anthologies in the 20th c. is so great as to preclude even a representative listing of titles in Eng. Mention should be made, however, of The New Poetry (1917) by Harriet Monroe and Alice C. Henderson because of its influence on modern poets, and of such anthologists as Robert Bridges, Louis Untermeyer, Conrad Aiken, Oscar Williams, Selden Rodman, James Reeves, William Cole, and of the collaborators Cleanth Brooks and

Robert Penn Warren, whose Understanding Poetry (1938, 1950, 1960) is a pedagogical a.

F. Lachère, Bibliographie des recueils collectifs de poésies publiés de 1597 à 1700 (1901); A. Wifstrand, Studien zur griechischen Anthologie (1926); J. Hutton, The Gr. A. in Italy to the Year 1800 (1935) and The Gr. A. in France and in the Writers of the Netherlands to the Year 1800 (1946); A.S.F. Gow, The Gr. A.: Sources and Ascriptions (1958). L.U.; R.A.S.

ANTIBACCHIUS. See PALIMBACCHIUS.

ANTICLIMAX. First recorded, it seems, by Dr. Johnson in a quotation from Addison, Dr. Johnson's definition being "a sentence in which the last part expresses something lower than the first" (Dictionary, 1755). It is commonly extended to include this kind of descent in longer or shorter units of discourse than the sentence, but usually refers only to the concluding part or nadir (1) to designate an ineptly expressed idea meant to be superlatively grandiose or pathetic (in this sense synonymous with bathos l., q.v.), or (2) to designate a deliberately ironical letdown of this kind, as in various absurd similes in Henry Fielding's burlesque of Elizabethan and Restoration tragedy, such as: "King [Arthur, to his queen, Dollalolla] . . . Whence flow those Tears fast down thy blubber'd Cheeks, / Like a swollen Gutter, gushing through the Streets?" (The Tragedy of Tragedies, 1731, 1.2.6–7), or Lord Grizzle's impassioned address to the Princess Huncamunca: "Oh! Huncamunca, Huncamunca, Oh! / Thy pouting Breasts, like Kettle-Drums of Brass, / Beat everlasting loud Alarms of Joy / . . ." (2.5.1–3). H.B.

ANTIMETABOLE. See CHIASMUS.

ANTISPAST (Gr. "drawn in the contrary direction"). A metrical foot consisting of 4 syllables, 2 long flanked by 2 short (— — — —), or iambus and trochee. It is not certain if this foot existed in classical poetry as an independent unit.—P. Shorey, "Choriambic Dimeter and the Rehabilitation of the A.," TAPA, 38 (1907); Koster. P.S.C.

ANTISTROPHE (Gr. "counterturning"). Originally in Gr. choral dance and poetry the second of a pair of movements or "stanzas" in an ode. It corresponds exactly in meter to the preceding strophe. In rhetoric the term means the repetition of words in reversed order, e.g., "The master of the servant and the servant of the master." It also describes the repetition of a word or phrase at the end of successive clauses. See STROPHE; EPODE. R.A.H.

ANTITHESIS, antitheton (Gr. "opposition"; L. contentio). A contrasting of ideas made sharp by the use of words of opposite or conspicuously different meaning in contiguous clauses or phrases, a form of expression recommended as satisfying by Aristotle "because contraries are easily understood and even more so when placed side by side, and also because a. resembles a syllogism, for it is by putting opposing conclusions side by side that you refute one of them" (Rhetoric 3.9.8). Some later authorities likewise stress the clarity and force that an a. may impart to any idea (e.g., the anonymous Rhetorica ad Herennium, 1st c. B.C., 4.15.21; Johannes Susenbrotus, 1541, on contentio, ed. of 1621, p. 63); but the Rhetorica ad Herennium sees in it also a means of embellishing a discourse, and this is the idea mainly emphasized by the moderns (e.g. Henry Peacham, "it graceth and bewtifieth the Oration," The Garden of Eloquence, 1593, p. 161; John Smith calls it "a Rhetoricall Exornation," The Myserie of Rhetorique Unveiled, 1657, pp. 172-73).

The a. that draws a broad, simple contrast of idea is the pattern of many a verse in the biblical Book of Proverbs, e.g., "It is better to dwell in the wilderness, than with a contentious and angry woman" (21.19; Smith quotes a number of examples, p. 175), and such antitheses are fairly frequent in Anglo-Saxon poetry, often pivoting on the adversative "nālaes," e.g., "Warað hine wraeclāst, nālaes wunden gold" (His lot is the path of exile, by no means twisted gold—The Wanderer, 32).

A. was cultivated more or less by the classical poets, and while these poets sometimes contrive a strict balance of form or a complex opposition of idea, e.g., "Non fumum ex fulgore, sed ex fumo dare lucem / Cogitat" (He aims to fetch not smoke from a flash, but light from smoke, Horace, Ars Poetica 142-43), this kind of ingenuity is still more characteristic of the Eng. and Fr. poets of the Age of Reason, e.g., "Je veux et ne veux pas, je m'emporte et je n'ose" (I would and would not, I am on fire yet dare not—Pierre Corneille, Cinna, 1640, 1.2.122); "Thus wicked but in will, of means bereft, / He left not faction, but of that was left" (Dryden, Absalom and Achitophel, 1681, ll. 567-68); "It is the slaver kills, and not the bite" (Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, 1735, l. 106). The convenience of the closed couplet, which had early emerged as the preferred verse form of the Restoration and Queen Anne poets, for balanced expressions probably goes some way toward explaining why these poets were minded to exploit a. as they did, sometimes to the point where it amounts to a major element of their style. They found it, in any case, an ideal resource for the display of their satirical wit.

The antitheses quoted above are among the many forms of expression that exhibit two or more "figures of speech," and may be labeled with one term or another according to the particular feature to be distinguished. Thus the second line of the quotation from Dryden exhibits chiasmus, epanalepsis (qq.v.), and isocolon (equality of length in the cola of a period; see COLON).

In contemporary writing the use of a. is chiefly in humorous verse.—P. Beyer, "Antithese," Reallexikon, I; Sister Miriam Joseph, Shakespeare and the Arts of Language (1947); Lausberg. S.F.F.; H.B.

ANTODE (Gr. "opposite song"). In the parabasis (q.v.) of Gr. Old Comedy the lyric odes sung by half the chorus in answer to an earlier ode sung by the other half chorus. Composed in lyric meters which correspond metrically to the ode, it contained an invocation to the gods or muse to assist the chorus. See EPIRRHEMA.—F. M. Cornford, Origin of Attic Comedy (1914); Koster. R.A.H.

ANTONOMASIA (Gr. "naming instead"). A figure of speech, in which an epithet or appellative, or the name of an office or dignity, is substituted for a proper name (e.g., "The Bard" for Shakespeare), or in which a proper name is used symbolically for a class or type: "Some village Hampden that with dauntless breast / The little tyrant of his fields withstood; / Some mute, inglorious Milton here may rest, / Some Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood (Gray, Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard). Quintilian (Institutes of Oratory 8.6.29) states that a., which is very common in poetry but less so in oratory, may be accomplished in two ways, by substitution of epithets such as "Pelides" (that is, son of Peleus for Achilles), and by substituting the striking characteristics of an individual for his name: "Divum pater atque hominum rex" (Father of gods and king of men) Virgil, Aeneid 1.65. To this he adds a third type wherein acts may indicate the individual; however, this type, which does not correspond to his twofold division, may well be a spurious emendation. Puttenham, in his Arte of Eng. Poesie, distinguishes carefully between epitheton ("fierce Achilles," "wise Nestor") and a. in which the particular individual is not named but referred to by a "type name," e.g., a "Machiavelli" for a crafty schemer.—Lausberg. R.O.E.

APHAERESIS (Gr. "a taking away"). Omission of an initial, unstressed syllable, specifically an initial vowel, e.g., mid for amid, as in "Mid the squander'd colour" (R. Bridges, Cheddar Pinks). In Gr. poetry the suppression of an initial short "e" following a word ending in a long vowel or diphthong, as in mē 'gō for mē ego. R.A.H.

APOCOPATED RHYME (from Gr. apocope, q.v.) occurs where the final accented syllables of two words are in true rhyme, but where one word is masculine, one feminine in accentuation, e.g., find, blinder; pal, callow. Though the device may be found most predominantly in modern poets, others (Burns and Spenser, for instance) have used varieties of it.—E. Guest, History of Eng. Rhythm (new ed., 1882); S. L. Mooney, "New Devices in Sound Repetition," Word Study, 24 (1949); Deutsch. R.B.E.

APOCOPE (Gr. "a cutting off"). Omission of one or more letters from the end of a word, e.g., "t'other" for "the other." In Gr. poetry the suppression of a short vowel before a consonant. This may occur within a compound word (kābbale for katēballe) or when two words are separate (kap pedion for kata pedion). R.A.H.

APOLLONIAN-DIONYSIAN. Antinomy first devised by Friederich Nietzsche in The Birth of Tragedy (1872). Nietzsche uses Apollo as a symbol for the poet's dream of form: The Apollonian impulse urges the poet to create an understandable and beautiful world. It further guides him to a cognition of symmetry, giving him the power to create an apparently real world within tragedy. By contrast, the Thracian god Dionysus is used by Nietzsche to characterize the poet's sense of music. Music, in this definition, is an expression of that basic awareness of blind irrationality, pain, and suffering in the world which gives rise to the Dionysian dance of orgiastic worship.

Both Apollonian and Dionysian impulses are seen as absolute, nonrational powers which work through the poet and are hence independent of his personal feelings or of his audience's understanding. The tragedy of Aeschylus represents the interaction of Apollonian and Dionysian forces at its best. When Socratic skepticism taught the Gr. world to differentiate between appearance and reality, and Euripides consciously separated the "stage world" from the "real world," Gr. tragedy died. Rationalism, with its distinction between "subjective" and "objective" views, undermined both Apollonian and Dionysian impulses. These are, however, perennial forces which, Nietzsche maintains, can re-create true tragedy if properly brought to the surface. In The Birth of Tragedy, Nietzsche sees Wagnerian opera as a valid Apollonian-Dionysian interaction—a view which he later abandoned.

The Apollonian-Dionysian antinomy is based, in philosophical conception, upon Schopenhauer's The World as Will and Idea (1819).

Further, the intellectual milieu of the late 19th c. abounded in the assumption of literary antinomies which, like Nietzsche's, attempt to distinguish instinctive from formal literary creation. The distinction between classicism and romanticism (qq.v.) and Schiller's antinomy of the naive and sentimental (q.v.) are perhaps the most important among these. For these reasons, the influence of the Apollonian-Dionysian antinomy on later poetics must be assessed with caution and only such writers named as adapters of it who explicitly followed Nietzsche's approach. Foremost among these was Stefan George, whose followers (George-Kreis) considered his poetry an execution of "what Nietzsche only thought out." Thomas Mann consciously endorsed the Nietzschean view of music as a Dionysian manifestation and made use of the concept in composing the novels Tristan, Death in Venice, and Doktor Faustus. It was the Dionysian part of the antinomy, also, which enticed the Fr. poetess Comtesse de Noailles to place epithets from The Birth of Tragedy over some of her verse. D. H. Lawrence, finally, showed strong interest in the antinomy, though its influence upon his work remains to be assessed.—C. G. Jung, Psychological Types (1923); A.H.J. Knight, "Dionysus" in Some Aspects of the Life and Work of Nietzsche (1933); O. Kein, Das Apollinische und Dionysische bei Nietzsche und Schelling (1935); O. Manthey-Zorn, Dionysus (1956); M. Krieger, The Tragic Vision (1960). W.B.F.

APOSIOPESIS (Gr. "a becoming silent"). A conscious anacoluthon (q.v.), that is, a speaker's abrupt halt midway in a sentence, accountable to his being either too excited to give further articulation to his thought (so Quintilian, 1st c. A.D., Institutes of Oratory 9.2.54) or thinking to impress his addressee the more with this kind of vague hint of an idea too awesome to be put into words (so Demetrius, 1st c. A.D., On Style 2.103. These different motives are not always distinguishable in given examples, e.g., Neptune's threat of punishment to the winds: "Iam caelum terramque meo sine numine, venti, / Miscere et tantas audetis tollere moles? / Quos ego—Sed motos praestat componere fluctus" (How dare ye, ye winds, to mingle the heavens and the earth and raise such a tumult without my leave? You I will—but first I must quiet the waves [Aeneid 1.133–35, one of Quintilian's illustrations]); or King Lear's threat of vengeance on his wicked daughters: "I will have revenges on you both / That all the world shall—I will do such things—" (2.4.282–83). According to the Gr. rhetorician Alexander of the 2d c. A.D., a is always followed by the speaker's explanation that he is passing over in silence matters either already known to the addressee or too sordid to be mentioned (Peri schematōn, C. Walz, Rhetores Graeci, 9 v., 1832-36, v. 8, p. 450); and Quintilian remarks that it is sometimes used as a merely transitional device, where the speaker wishes to introduce a digression or announce an impromptu change in the planned conduct of his argument, such as the circumstances of the moment might suggest (9.2.55-57).

A. should not be confused with paraleipsis (Gr. "a passing over," L. praeteritio, occultatio), a term for the trick by which a speaker emphasizes an idea by pretending to say nothing of it even while giving it full expression (the difference is explained by Gregory of Corinth of the 12th c., in his commentary on Hermogenes' Peri deinotētos, ch. 7 in Walz, v. 7, pp. 1166-67). H.B.

APOSTROPHE (Gr. "to turn away"). A figure of speech which consists in addressing a dead or absent person, an animal, a thing, or an abstract quality or idea as if it were alive, present, and capable of understanding, e.g., "Quid non mortalia pectora cogis, / auri sacra fames!" (Virgil, Aeneid 3.56); "Ahi, serva Italia, di dolore ostello" (Dante, Purgatorio 6.76); "O judgment! thou art fled to brutish beasts" (Shakespeare, Julius Caesar 3.2.10); "Milton! thou should'st be living at this hour" (Wordsworth, London, 1802); "Ring out, wild bells" (Tennyson, In Memoriam 106). The term originally referred to any abrupt "turning away" from the normal audience to address a different or more specific audience, whether present (e.g., one person out of the assemblage) or absent. In narrative verse the poet "turns away" from the generality of listeners or readers to address a specific reader, a character in the narrative, or some other person, thing, or idea. The use of a. gives life and immediacy to language, but is also subject to abuse and open to parody. L.P.

ARABIC POETRY. In the rich intricacy of his language the Arab experiences an intellectual and aesthetic pleasure unique perhaps in the world. To him Ar. is the greatest of the arts and its noblest expression is in poetry. Nor is this an art become the thing of a small coterie of the élite, divorced from the life of the common man; it remains a part of every day, to express the emotions, to commemorate an occasion, or to lampoon the latest twist of current politics.

PRE- AND EARLY ISLAMIC VERSE. The earliest known verse is attributed to the time of the War of al-Basūs (ca. A.D. 500), but at no time can an evolutionary stage of ancient Arabian poetry be discovered, for in form, meter, and theme, it is already fully developed at the period from which these first lines have survived.

It has been proposed that the earliest meters are the rajaz:

mus-taf-ḡ-lun / mus-taf-ḡ-lun / mus-taf-ḡ-lun and its derivative, the basīṭ:

mus-taf-ḡ-lun / fa-ḡ-lun / mus-taf-ḡ-lun / fa-ḡ-lun

both of which are much used for verse sung to tunes accompanying actions. The complete verse (bait) is composed of a couplet, often rhyming, formed of one of the many patterns (bis) of which the two above are examples. Older rajaz and basīṭ poems, however, are often so composed that each half bait has the common rhyme of the whole poem, as if complete in itself. The qaṣīdah or ode, however, has the form aabaca, etc. (i.e., the 2 hemistichs of the opening line rhyme; this rhyme is repeated at the end of every line), but in early verse there is an occasional tendency for an internal rhyme a, perhaps an archaic survival. Rhyming is a natural grace easily achieved.

Authorities name 16 meters but each has many variations, the metrical systems being based on schemes of long and short syllables. A consonant with a short vowel constitutes a short syllable. A long syllable may be (a) a consonant with a long vowel, (b) a consonant followed by a short vowel and a consonant. Even colloquial Ar. meters today are based on patterns of long and short syllables, notwithstanding the fact that colloquials are nearly devoid of classical Ar. inflections and have numerous contracted speech forms which figure occasionally in ancient Ar. as poetic licenses.

Extant ancient Arabian verse is that of the tribes and chivalry, for artisan and peasant poetry has survived only in rare quotations (e.g., A. Guillaume, Life of Muhammad [1955] pp. 228-29). Composed in Bedouin language, it sings of honor, revenge, the tribal preoccupations of war, the fantastic generosity of desert cavaliers like Ḥātim al-Tā'ī, encounters with lovely Bedouin girls when the rains have started the desert pastures into life, the boasting (fakhr) of one's nobility and doughty deeds with satire of the foe, and descriptions of animals and beasts and hunting. The qaṣīdah has a strict theme sequence, commencing by recalling the girl whose beauty keeps the poet from sleep and the ever shifting movements which inevitably tore her from him. The poet turns to describe his noble beast upon which he flees all too poignant memories—and so to the true subject of his poem. These lines introduce the Mu'allaqah of the greatest ancient poet Imra' al-Qais, known as the "Errant King." (The word mu'allaqah seems to mean a bead from a necklace, to which the Arabs are fond of comparing the verses of a poem as if they were beads strung together on a cord).

Fa-Tūḍiḥa fa-l-Miqrāti lam ya'fu rasmu-hā
Li-mā nasajat-hā min janūb-in wa-sham'ali
Tarā ba'ara l-ar'āmi fi 'araṣāti-hā
Wa-qī'āni-hā ka'anna-hū ḥabbu fulfuli

See the white doe droppings strewn by the wind on them, black on her floor forsaken, fine grain of peppercorn. Here it was I watched her, lading her load-camels, stood by these thorn-trees weeping tears as of colocynth. Here my twin friends waited, called to me camel-borne: Man! not of grief thou diest. Take thy pain patiently (W. S. and A. Blunt, The Seven Golden Odes of Pagan Arabia [1903]).

Only by considering how poetry is composed in Ar. can the evolution of the qaṣīdah be reconstructed. In its simplest form, verse is composed extempore, sung to some traditional tune, in one bait at a time; it is then taken up by the company, sung to rhythmical movement and hand clapping. Until the poet warms to his work he casts about among the many traditional themes in his conscious and sub-conscious memory—which doubtless explains the qaṣīdah sequence and the recurrent clichés of both classical and colloquial versification, for in Arabia mere originality for its own sake is not sought. When visited by Inspiration—which the Arabs conceive as supernatural, a species of demon—the poet now turns to the theme he wishes to treat. Preoccupied with the qaṣīdah form, critics have regarded poems on individual themes as pieces (qiṭ'ah) developed from the original qaṣīdah, but it is more logical to suppose that the qaṣīdah developed from a medley of single themes, such as the ghazal, fakhr, etc.

That ancient verse is couched in a poetic diction relatively unaffected by dialect can be deduced from classical writers and is confirmed by the study of colloquial verse in contemporary Arabia or Ar-speaking countries. Colloquial Arabian verse today, when treating of heroic or amatory themes, is generally free of the more markedly dialectical forms. In the Koran itself the poetic diction of such passages as those concerned with the "Signs" of God may be contrasted with sections concerned with ordinances and regulations delivered in language which an impartial observer can only pronounce as ordinary and commonplace as the colloquial speech we know today.

Certain critics (D. S. Margoliouth, "The Origins of Ar. Poetry," Jour. Royal Asiatic Soc. [1925]) have suggested that ancient poetry, if not mostly spurious, has been much tampered with by philologists, and this view at one time even won some acceptance with the Egyptian critic Tāhā Ḥusain (Fīl-Adab al-Jāhili [Cairo] 1926. Insofar as their views apply to some limited political categories of verse where an interested motive is easily discernible (many in fact already commented upon by ancient writers), there is a case for rejection. Where the bulk of ancient verse is concerned the evidence for authenticity, apart from minor accidents of time, is overwhelming. It would seem that even in the first century of Islam some tribal dīwāns or collections had already been assembled (I. Goldziher, "Dīwāns of the Arabic Tribes," Jour. Royal Asiatic Soc. [1897], pp. 325-34), but poetry was usually preserved by professional reciters (rāwī), probably families of professional poetasters like the Bā 'Aṭwah of Ḥaḍramawt today. It is evidence of the soundness of oral tradition that I collected poems from a Bā 'Aṭwah poet—only to discover that Count v. Landberg had already published some of them. The variants were of a trifling nature, the interval between collectors about fifty years, but the poems were not new then.

UMAİYAD VERSE. For a century and a half of Islam, tribal poetry flourished more or less unchanged. This was the age of that fine exponent of the ghazal 'Umar ibn Abī Rabi'ah, but the great personalities of the age are al-Farazdaq and his two rivals, al-Jarir and the Christian al-Akḥṭal with whom for many years he engaged in a contest of lampoon and counterlampoon. Jarir's panegyric composed on the Umayyad Caliph became a model imitated by later ages—followed, for instance, by al-Buḥturī (infra). The Umayyad aristocracy were deeply imbued with Bedouinism, retiring whenever possible to the Syrian desert fringes in pursuit of the chase. Poetry at the court continued to be composed in an Arabian milieu. To the dynasty and to its enemies it was in fact an important form of propaganda. This period saw the rise of propagandist poetry for the house of 'Alī, the prophet's cousin who had married his daughter Fāṭimah. Of this poetry al-Kumait was an early exponent. This period may also have seen the beginnings of the popular verse cycles like the 'Antar romance, though the latter is ascribed to the 'Abbāsīd period.

POETRY DURING THE 'ABBĀSĪD PERIOD. With the shift of the capital from Damascus to Baghdad after the 'Abbāsīds had supplanted the Umayyads the atmosphere changed. Influences of Hellenism and of Persia came into play, but the most significant new factor for poetry was the change in patronage from a Bedouin court to that of the great bureaucratic officials of the Caliphate and settled urban life. 'Abbāsīd poetry can hardly be said to be less "Arabic" than Umayyad, but the Baghdadi poet of mixed ancestry felt toward Bedouin verse sentiments rather similar to those of an "intellectual" for a sporting squire. The new school of smart sophisticated verse current at the Baghdad court is typified in the famous Abū Nuwās who with refined simplicity boasts his debauchery—his wine-songs are superb—or lechery, be it with town women or boys. He parodies the Bedouin qaṣīdah:

Let the south-wind moisten with rain the desolate scene
And Time efface what once was so fresh and green!
Make the camel-rider free of a desert space
Where high-bred camels trot with unwearied pace;
Where only mimosas and thistles flourish and where,
For hunting, wolves and hyenas are nowise rare!
Amongst the Bedouins seek not enjoyment out;
What do they enjoy? They live in hunger and drought.
Let them drink their bowls of milk and leave them alone,
To whom life's finer pleasures are all unknown.
(tr. R. A. Nicholson, Literary History, p. 286)

Apparently in sober contrast stands the verse of Abu Ḥ-Alāḥiyah, a low-born client Arab of Kūfah. Failing to win the love of the Caliph's slave-girl 'Utbah, he assumed the ascetic's robe and abandoned the poetry of love for reflections on religion, man's mortality, and predestination—a poet of pessimism; but a recent critic attributes this change of mood to the constant frustrations besetting a man of low birth in Baghdad:

Men vaunt their noble blood, but I behold
No lineage that can vie with righteous deeds.
(R. A. Nicholson, op. cit., p. 302)

He too turned to simple language from which to shape the stuff of poetry, venturing to introduce new metrical modes, and excelling in the urjūzah, couplets in rajaz meter. Persian antipathy to Arab domination finds expression in the verses of the blind Bashshār ibn Burd and his kind, but following the way of Arab poets in all ages he won patronage by the laudatory ode and satirized those who neglected him. Even in the early 'Abbāsīd period there are allusions to popular songs (mawwāl) composed in Ar. not strictly classical and consisting of four verses only.

CRITICS AND ANTHOLOGISTS. Antiquarian interest prompted the collection of ancient verse, the most famous anthologies being the Mu'allaqat of Hammād al-Rāwiyah (8th c.), the more varied and extensive Mufaḍḍaliyat of al-Dabbī (8th c.), the Ḥamāsah of Abū Tammām arranged according to motives like hardihood, dirges, manners, love satire, etc. The monumental Book of Songs of Abu Ḥ-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī (d. 967) contains ancient and modern Arab poems set to music with musical annotations and a mass of biographical anecdote (Cf. Blachère, Histoire de la littérature arabe [1952], pp. 139–52, for a well-documented discussion of this branch of literature). The link between Ar. verse and music is highly significant at all periods.

Early Muslim critics had formulated the principle that verse had attained matchless perfection before Islam, but the critic first to declare that ancient and modern verse should be judged by an aesthetic canon was Ibn Qutaibah (9th c.) contemporary with whom flourished the royal poet Ibn al-Mu'tazz—himself author of a treatise on poetics, Kitāb al-Badi'. With the critic al-Āmidī, the term badi' seems to mean the lavish employment of figures of speech in the new style of which he regards Abū Tammām as the epitome. Abū Tammām was unspontaneous, fond of far-fetched metaphors, differing from older poets, inclined to takalluf (deliberate composition; later this means affectation) and ṣan'ah (consciously creating poetry; later it came to mean artificiality, as opposed to al-Buhturī who is maṭbū' (a naturally spontaneous poet). It is the style of Abū Tammām which dominates Ar. poetry up to the 20th c.

The 'Abbāsīd poet who has won the greatest appreciation in the Arab world is al-Mutanabbī, court poet to the Ḥamdānids of Aleppo (10th c.), "panegyriste vénale de Saïf al-Dawlah, de Kāfūr, et d'Ibn al-Amīd," as Blachère styles him (R. Blachère, Abou ṭ-Taiyib al-Mutanabbī [Paris, 1953], p. 319), who has found scant favor with Western critics. The testimony of writers like Abu Ḥ-Alā' al-Ma'arri, though conscious of defects in al-Mutanabbī, and modern poets like Shawqī and Ḥāfiẓ Ibrāhīm is, however, incontrovertible evidence of the esteem in which he is held. Though reputedly a townsman, he spent much time with the Bedouin, and it has been suggested that his poetry shows a mingling—even a conflict—of Bedouin ideals and values with those of the sedentary Arabs of the towns and villages.

Western taste, however, appraises highly the Syrian Abu Ḥ-Alā' born in 973 at Ma'arrash south of Aleppo (R. A. Nicholson, Studies in Islamic Poetry [1921], pp. 43–289, is the most accessible study of Abu Ḥ-Alā', but many Ar. books have been written on him in recent years). The favor of the West and the Syro-Lebanese writers of North America has enormously enhanced his reputation in Arab literary circles. A visit to Baghdad in his middle thirties turned him from the career of professional poetaster to the practice of asceticism and his later verse displays a boldness of thought coupled with a destructive philosophy which overshadows his high morality. Blachère suggests that the subversive writings of the Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ and Ismaʿīlīs had created the atmosphere in which Abu ʿAlāʾ could write in such cynical vein without fear of ill consequences, but while this may be, it is a fact that one encounters similar sentiments among quite unlettered persons in Arab countries. Abu ʿAlāʾ wrote:

Prophets arose and vanished: Moses, Jesus, Muḥammad last, who brought the prayers five—

And 'tis told there comes another Faith
Than this—and men still perishing away
Between a morrow and a yesterday.

His most curious writing, however, is the Risālat al-Ghufrān, in which he pictures a visit to heaven and hell to converse with the poets of olden times. It has been compared with Dante's Inferno.

SŪFISTIC, RELIGIOUS, AND OTHER VERSE. The Ṣūfis, or Mystics, apply the erotic imagery and symbolism of the ghazal to the description of the ecstasy of divine love, so that, says Nicholson (Studies in Islamic Mysticism [1921], pp. 163-64), "unless we have some clue to the writer's intention, it may not be possible to know whether his beloved is human or divine—indeed the question whether he himself always knows is one which students of Oriental mysticism cannot regard as impertinent." The Sp. Ibn al-ʿArabī and his contemporary Ibn al-Fāriḍ (d. 1235) are outstanding in this genre which flourishes persistently to this day. Typical of religious verse is al-Būṣīrī's Burdah, a panegyric of the Prophet. Mnemonic doggerel composed by the professions from lawyer to sailor, literary tricks, conceits, and artifices abound at all periods.

SPANISH ARABIC VERSE. In close cultural contact with the East, Ar. Spain at first saw verse develop along traditional lines, and the arrival of the singer Ziryāb from Baghdad in Spain in 821 is an important event in the history of Sp. verse. However, with the rise of the Berber Almoravids versification in classical Ar. declined, and the newer forms of muwashshah and zajal closely associated with music, and in a colloquial Ar. came into general vogue. These forms are held to have originated in the 9th c., and there can be little doubt that this type of Hispano-Ar. poetry strongly influenced troubadour verse in Aquitaine and even It. poetry. García Gómez, "Don Nuevas Jarjās Romances," Al-Andalus, 19 (1954), pp. 369-91, has published examples of kharjāhs or refrains, in a curious mixture of Ar. and Romance, not unlike the mixed Ar. and Hindustani of the poet Yahyā ʿUmar in R. B. Serjeant, Prose and Poetry from Hadramawt (1951), p. 90. The very word troubadour has been connected with the Ar. root tariba, from which is derived mutrib (singer). The anthologies of Maqqarī and Ibn Bassām are widely known collections of Sp. material. A charming example of sophisticated Sp. lyrical verse in elegant 18th-c. Eng. is quoted by W. A. Clouston (Arabian Poetry for English Readers [1881], p. 143): "Verses addressed by Waladata, daughter of Mohammed Almostakfi Billah Khalif of Spain to some young men who had pretended a passion for her and her companions."

When you told us our glances, soft, timid, and mild,

Could occasion such wounds in the heart,
Can ye wonder that yours, so ungovern'd and wild,

Some wounds to our cheeks should impart?
The wounds on our cheeks, are but transient,
I own,

With a blush they appear and decay;
But those of the heart, fickle youth, ye have shewn

To be even more transient than they.

THE DARK AGE. The Mongol Conquest of Baghdad (1258) closes an era. Though Mameluke poetry is known, the critics are hardly aware of the prolific activity of the 14th-19th c.; what is known appears severely conventionalized. Ar. ceased to be the language of the court and rulers after the extensive Turkish conquests, so patronage doubtless dwindled. It appears that aesthetic impulse was, to an increasing extent, satisfied by verse in one of the numerous Ar. vernaculars while classical composition became a sterile literary exercise. Men of letters often composed in near-classical Ar. known variously as Ḥumainī, Nabaṭī, or, in North Africa, as Malḥūn. In less conventional fields we find the versified shadow play, and the Qaṣīd Abī Shādūf, a satirical poem in "vulgar" Ar. on the fellahin of Lower Egypt. Peasants and tribesmen, as ever, composed verse necessary to their social occasions, though little was preserved until Europeans began to collect it for scientific purposes, but their work has not influenced Arab letters.

THE RENAISSANCE. The 19th-c. impact of Western culture set up a process of ferment, though each country is affected in different degree even within itself. As modern literary movements are diffused over much of the world in journals and newspapers it is difficult to form a coherent picture of them, and older genres survive unaffected by new fashions. Particularly affected by the West are the Lebanese through contact with France and the Syro-Lebanese of the Americas—where al-Rābiṭah al-Qalamīyah (The Pen Club) was founded to infuse a new creative spirit into Ar. literature. Egypt's first great new poet is al-Bārūdī who studied 'Abbāsid poets to revive classicism in Ar. verse. More celebrated is Ahmad Shawqī (1868–1932), called "The Prince of Poets." Of mixed racial origins, he is today regarded as the poet of the wealthy aristocracy. His contact with Fr. poetry while he was a student in Paris altered his whole outlook. Though a neoclassicist, his verse has an outstandingly lyric quality which has spread it far and wide, especially through the singers Umm Kulthūm and 'Abd al-Wahhāb. From 1920 on he identified himself closely with Egypt, and some of his plays have a Pharaonic theme of a type still not unfashionable. Also outstanding is Ḥāfiz Ibrāhīm (d. 1932) following classical techniques.

Syrian by birth, the journalist Khalīl Mutrān experimented with rajaz and muwashshah. Meter and rhyme, he maintained, should be subservient to the theme. A poem should be considered as a whole, and the mot juste carefully selected. In the younger 'Aqqād and Abū Shādī, both acquainted with the West through the medium of Eng., he found response. To Abū Shādī and a modernist group in fact belongs the credit of founding a verse magazine Apollo (1932) which, if short-lived, had profound influence. Both Lebanon and Egypt were affected by the symbolist movement of France (studied by Antun Ghattas Karam, al-Ramziyah [Beirut, 1949]), which has as its prominent Ar. exponent Bishr Fāris. Space permits no discussion of the latest trends in Egypt, and only the briefest reference to the many Syrian poets such as Khalīl Mardam Bey, or Sulaimān al-Bustānī, translator of the Iliad (1904), to the poets of the New World: As'ad Rustum, Ilyā Abū Mādī, Jabrān Khalīl Jabrān; the great poets of Iraq's long political emergence al-Zahāwī and al-Ruṣāfī, and her younger poets and those of other Arab countries experimenting in free verse, without rhythm or meter, influenced by existentialist and other current philosophies. The origins of free verse (al-shi'r al-ḥurr) with no rhyme or fixed meter can be traced back to the Apollo school of poetry; its exponents include Bayātī (Iraq), Nāzik al-Malā'ikah (Iraq), Yūsuf al-Khāl (Lebanon), Ṣalāḥ 'Abd al-Ṣabbūr (Egypt). Free verse is to be distinguished from blank verse (al-shi'r al-mursal) of which 'Abd al-Rahmān Shukrī (Egypt) is reckoned the first exponent. Though North African Arab poets are little known beyond their borders, the Tunisian Maḥmūd al-Mas'adī has made a notable impression with his verse play al-Sudd the approach of which is much influenced by Jean Paul Sartre's works. Nor can colloquial verse be neglected, for it flourishes in all Arab countries, and it too stems from an ancient tradition. Egyptian zajals and mawwāls are heard on the radio, and every country has famous colloquial poets. The Sudan, for instance, has its poets of the Mahdist era, such as Ḥārdallūh; Baghdad, the humorist al-Karkhī; South Arabia, its Yahyā 'Umar; while a host of colloquial poets exist in North Africa little known elsewhere; the Persian Gulf and Sa'ūdī Arabia have their own favorites. Egypt has begun to collect her colloquial verse in a new journal, Folklore (Cairo, 1959–).

The nature movement and nationalist, social, spiritual, and technical trends distinguished by recent authors in modern literary Ar. are mainly of occidental inspiration, for literati look to the West for novelty. Classical Ar. is securely and rightly enthroned in modern Ar., but the heritage of colloquial vocabulary and vigorous idiom could give it rich stimulus. When a new Ar. has been forged from these elements, we may perhaps look to a new era, but the present is an age of experiment.

The following selective bibliography is confined mainly to books in European languages, Eng. where possible. Since the appearance of Brockelmann's last Supplement many critical studies, in Ar., of ancient and modern poets have been published. J. D. Pearson's Index Islamicus and Supplement may be consulted for articles and reviews in Western periodicals; material in Arabic is far from so well served, but J. A. Dagher's two bio-bibliographies (listed below) are helpful.

GENERAL: Encyclopaedia of Islam (4 v. and suppl., 1913–38; 2d ed. 1954–; Eng., Fr., and German ed.; subject-entries, muwashshah, shi'r, etc.); J. D. Pearson, Index Islamicus 1906–1955 (1958; pp. 710–711, 734–743, 746–749 passim), and Supplement 1959–60 (1962; passim).

ANTHOLOGIES: Specimens of Arabian Poetry, ed. and tr. J. D. Carlyle (1796; elegant 18th c. renderings, perhaps not always accurate); Arabian Poetry for Eng. Readers, ed. W. A. Clouston (1881); Anthol. of World Poetry, ed. M. van Doren (1929; see pp. 61–95 for Ar. verse); Ancient Arabian Poetry, ed. C. J. Lyall (1930); Modern Ar. Poetry, ed. and tr. A. J. Arberry (1950; 19th- and 20th-c. verse from most Arab countries); Moorish Poetry, tr. A. J. Arberry (1953; tr. of Ibn Sa'īd's "Pennants"); Al-Shi'r al-'Arabī fī l-Mahjar, ed. Ihsān 'Abbas and Muḥammad Yūsuf Najm (Beirut, 1957; Ar. poets in America).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: C. Brockelmann, Gesch. der arabischen Lit. (2 v., 2d ed., Leyden, 1943–49; 3 suppl. v., 1937–42; immense standard bibliog. of Ar. but difficult to consult for the nonexpert); R. A. Nicholson, Lit. Hist.

of the Arabs (2d ed., 1930; standard work); A. R. Nykl, Hispano-Ar. Poetry and Its Relations with the old Prov. Troubadours (1946; comprehensive, with full bibliog. in text); L. Vecchia Vaglieri, "Notizie bio-bibliografiche su autori arabi moderni," Annali dell' Istituto universitario orientale de Napoli, 1 (1940); J. A. Dagher, Maṣādir al-Dīrāsāt al-Adabīyah (Ṣaidā; 1, 1950, in progress); Leaders in Ar. Modern Lit. (Beirut; 1, 1956, in progress); H. A. R. Gibb, Ar. Lit. (2d rev. ed., 1963).

POETICS: Ibn Qoteiba, Kitāb al-Shi'r wa-l-Shu'arā' (Introduction au livre de la poésie et des poètes, tr., introd., and commentary by M. Gaudefroy-Demombynes [1947]); A. Kh. Kinany, The Development of the Ghal in Ar. Lit. (Damascus, 1951); 'Abdullāh al-Ṭaiyib al-Majdhūb, Al-Murshid ilā Fahm Ash'ār al-'Arab (Cairo, 1955; important modern work of crit. of ancient Ar. verse); Amjad Trabulsi, La Critique poétique des Arabes (Damascus, 1956); W. Hoenerbach, Die vulgärrabische Poetik al-Kitāb al-Ātil al-Hālī wal-Murahḥas al-Gālī des Ṣafīyaddīn Ḥillī (Wiesbaden, 1956; development of postclassical verse forms). R.B.S.

ARAUCANIAN POETRY. See AMERICAN INDIAN POETRY. SOUTH AMERICA.

ARCADIAN ACADEMY (Accademia dell' Arcadia). An It. poetic association, organized in Rome in October 1690, by a group of poets and litterateurs who had frequented the Roman salon of Christina, former Queen of Sweden. The principal aim of the group was "to exterminate bad taste and see to it that it shall not rise again." In the early years of the association, the members devoted much energy to a systematic attack on marinism (q.v.), a poetic style which offended their sensibilities by its nonclassical tendencies toward the sensual and the sensational.

The dominant mode of Arcadian poetry was pastoral, and at their meetings the members often appeared in shepherd costume. Despite the sincerity of the Arcadians, and despite the real need for a movement toward simplicity in the poetry of the time, they produced little verse of true merit. Pietro Metastasio (1698-1782) was the only poet of distinction to emerge from the environs of Arcadia. He composed in all forms—lyric, pastoral, idyll, and the rest—but he is especially remembered for his opera libretti. Among the many minor poets of the Arcadia, Vincenzo da Filicaia (1642-1707) and Paolo Rolli (1687-1765) deserve special mention, Filicaia for a sonnet freely rendered in two stanzas of Byron's Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, and Rolli for his translation (1735) of Paradise Lost and for his defense of Milton and Tasso against their depreciation by Voltaire.

The Academy extended its influence through the establishment of "colonies" in various It. cities. Carlo Goldoni adorned the Arcadian academy of Pisa in the 1740's, shortly before producing his brilliant Putta Onorata and Vedova Scaltra. Leo XIII's (Giacchino Pecci, 1810-1903) most interesting secular poem was an ode, lauding such poets as Metastasio, Parini, and Alfieri, and contributed to celebrate in 1890 the 200th anniversary of Arcadia.

The last volume of poems issued by the Academy appeared in 1780, but the organization itself remained in existence, being renamed, in 1925, the Accademia Letteraria Italiana.—C. Calcaterra, "Arcadia," Dizionario Letterario Bompiani, 1 (1947); K. Clark, Landscape into Art (1949); Wilkins; Van Wyck Brooks, The Dream of Arcadia (1958); A. Piromalli, L'Arcadia (1963). H.M.H.

ARCHAISM, as a feature of literary style, is especially associated with poetry and was originally connected with meter. It sometimes happened that the older form of a word had, by its different number of syllables, an advantage in a metrical context over its modern equivalent. Readers of Eng. poetry are familiar with such archaism, the best known instance being the option to treat such words as loved, wished, etc., as dissyllabic, according to the older practice. Archaic forms of some other words have been preserved for use in verse, e.g., the dissyllabic marsh as an alternative to "marsh," and the monosyllabic marge in place of "margin." In certain languages, too, a select "poetic" body of words has been built up by tradition, since old expressions sometimes carry with them certain associations lost to the contemporary language. In Eng. the richest single source of such language is the King James Version of the Bible. A. has been a feature of much Eng. poetry since the time of Spenser's Faerie Queene in which old words are often used for the sake of their association with the chivalry and romances of the past. Milton, the most influential successor of Spenser, also drew on old language, though more sparingly. Since Spenser's time, archaisms such as morn for "morning" and adown for "down" have been so common in certain types of poetry that it is uncertain whether they have any association with the past or are simply a metrical convenience. Archaic language has sometimes been affected on a large scale, e.g., by the 18th-c. "Spenserians," by Coleridge, William Morris. Nor have archaic words ceased to be used today. In spite of the objection to a. expressed by some modern critics, it is certain that an old word is le mot juste in innumerable poetic contexts.—See T. Quayle, Poetic Diction (1924); B. R. McElderry Jr., "A. and Innovation in Spenser's Poetic Diction," PMLA, 47 (1932); O. Barfield, Poetic Diction (2d ed., 1952). B.G.

ARCHETYPE. Generally speaking, an a. is an original pattern from which copies are made or an idea of a class of things representing the most essentially characteristic elements shared by the members of that class. It is, in other words, a highly abstract category almost completely removed from the accidental varieties of elements contained in any particular species belonging to it. Thus, for example, the "Platonic" idea of a table would comprise a flat horizontal surface propped by vertical supports, and this is the a. of all tables everywhere when considered apart from their peculiar differences of size, height, material, shape, finish, and so on.

So, in poetry, an a. may be any idea, character, action, object, institution, event, or setting containing essential characteristics which are primitive, general, and universal rather than sophisticated, unique, and particular. This generality and universality may refer merely to similarities among various literary or subliterary works, as when scholars discover variants or analogues in time and place of certain types of legends and folk tales, or it may refer more broadly to similarities found outside of literary works, as when critics seek comparisons to things found in a poem among myths, dreams, and rituals. In the case of Hamlet, for example, one could either construct an a. of the revenge play on the basis of similarities found between Shakespeare's play and other revenge plays, or fashion an a. of the Oedipal situation on the basis of the similarities found between Shakespeare's play, myths, legends, folk tales, and anthropological and psychological literature. The former method tends to be more direct, as when one studies a series of hero stories and tabulates the characteristics which they share in common, while the latter method tends to be more tenuous, as when one tries to construct hypotheses to interpret the meaning of such recurrences in terms of the racial unconscious, the ritual origins of poetry, the diffusions of culture, or whatever. Needless to say, these methods may overlap.

Either way, when one speaks of archetypes in poetry one usually refers to basic, general, or universal patterns (cf. IMAGERY) of one sort or another: birth, coming of age, love, guilt, redemption, and death are archetypal subjects; the conflict between reason and imagination, free will and destiny, appearance and reality, the individual and society, and so on, are archetypal themes; the tension between parents and children, the rivalry among brothers, the problems of incestuous desire, the search for the father, the ambivalence of the male-female relationship, the young man from the country arriving for the first time in the city, and so on, are archetypal situations; the braggart, the buffoon, the hero, the devil, the rebel, the wanderer, the siren, the enchantress, the maid, the witch, and so on, are archetypal characters; and certain animals, birds, and natural phenomena and settings are archetypal images. Any of these elements in a poem, either alone or in some combination, when treated in such a way as to bring forth its general and universal attributes, forms an archetypal pattern or patterns.

Historically, the archetypal approach seems to have derived around the turn of the century from two sources: (1) the Cambridge school of comparative anthropology issuing from Sir J. G. Frazer (The Golden Bough [1890-1915]), and including, loosely speaking, Gilbert Murray, Jane E. Harrison, Jessie L. Weston, S. H. Hooke, Lord Raglan, E. M. Butler, and Theodor H. Gaster; and (2) the psychology of C. G. Jung (Psychology of the Unconscious: A Study of the Transformations and Symbolisms of the Libido [1916]) and, to a lesser extent, that of Sigmund Freud (see, for example, "Symbolism in Dreams" [1915-17], A General Introduction to Psychoanalysis [1920]), and including the further work in the psychology of ritual and myth of Theodor Reik, Otto Rank, Erich Fromm, and so on. The combination of comparative anthropology with depth psychology (in conjunction with certain ideas of Cassirer regarding the origins of language) has resulted in the following series of hypothetical arguments for the interpretation of literature: since dreams, myths, and rituals are basically disguised, indirect, and nonutilitarian ways of fulfilling universal emotional needs and resolving universal human problems, and since a symbol is a disguised, indirect, and nonutilitarian way of saying or doing one thing while intending another, therefore dreams, myths, and rituals are symbolic; if dreams, myths, and rituals are symbolic ways of fulfilling universal emotional needs and resolving universal human problems, and if an a. derives from what dreams, myths, and rituals share in common, then an a. is a universal symbol; and if an a. is a universal symbol, and if a given pattern in a poem is archetypal, then it too is a universal symbol (cf. MYTH).

Thus, according to Jung, "The primordial image or archetype is a figure, whether it be a daemon, man, or process, that repeats itself in the course of history wherever creative phantasy is freely manifested. Essentially, therefore, it is a mythological figure. If we subject these images to a closer examination, we discover them to be the formulated resultants of countless typical experiences of our ancestors. They are, as it were, the psychic residue of numberless experiences of the same type." A poet using archetypes, he continues, speaks in a voice stronger than his own: "he raises the idea he is trying to express above the occasional and the transitory into the sphere of the ever-existing. He transmutes personal destiny into the destiny of mankind. . . . That is the secret of effective art" (Contributions). Such contemporary critics as Knight, Bodkin, Bachelard, Chase, Campbell, Frye, and Auden have worked out, each in his own way, the implications of these assumptions, or similar ones, for the study of Shakespeare, Blake, Yeats, Wordsworth, Poe, Coleridge, Milton, and so on. So Bodkin can claim, "I shall use the term 'archetypal pattern' to refer to that within us which, in Gilbert Murray's phrase, leaps in response to the effective presentation in poetry of an ancient theme. The hypothesis to be examined is that in poetry . . . we may identify themes having a particular form or pattern which persists amid variation from age to age, and which corresponds to a pattern or configuration of emotional tendencies in the minds of those who are stirred by the theme" (Archetypal Patterns in Poetry). And so Frye can say, "By archetype I mean an element in a work of literature, whether a character, an image, a narrative formula, or an idea, which can be assimilated into a larger unifying category" ("Blake's Treatment of the Archetype").

An approach which looks in poetry for echoes and reenactments of ancient and ubiquitous patterns—for (in the words of Thomas Mann) a "mythical identification, as survival, as a treading in footprints already made"—finds general types implicit in the specific elements of a given poem, and then interprets those types as symbols of human desires, conflicts, and problems. It thus emerges as a kind of symbolic approach (cf. SYMBOL). One may trace the image of "The Descent into Hell," for example, from early myth and ritual, to Homer, Virgil, Medieval Romance, Dante, and up to Hart Crane's subway section of The Bridge and to T. S. Eliot's The Hollow Men, and then interpret it as an a. symbolizing the encounter with one's own repressed guilt. It will be observed further that such mythical identification need not depend upon the explicit and conscious presence in a work of actual names, places, and events from mythology—the procedure rests rather upon finding more or less unconscious similarities and resemblances.

An archetypal symbology may be reconstructed, then, based upon the parallels which exist between the cycles of human life and those of the external world, and the patterns which these parallels have caused to appear in myth, ritual, dream, and poetry: "In the solar cycle of the day," says Frye, "the seasonal cycles of the year, and the organic cycle of human life, there is a single pattern of significance, out of which myth constructs a central narrative around a figure who is partly the sun, partly vegetative fertility and partly a god or archetypal human being" ("The Archetypes of Literature").

On the other hand, many critics (see Block and Douglas, for example) have questioned the soundness of the theory and/or of the practice of the archetypal approach. In the first place, many poems contain symbols which are primarily personal, and to interpret them archetypally is to overread them, if not to misread them altogether. Secondly, even if a poem does contain universal symbols, they may not symbolize those kinds of depth-meanings which archetypal critics are looking for. Thirdly, this approach, in emphasizing the universal and general, tends to be reductive in its view of particular and unique works of art; it is an approach which simplifies a complex thing, and while it is capable of yielding exciting and valuable results, it tends to blur the essential distinctions, as Jung, for example, frequently does (although he is against the genetic fallacy in theory), between good poems and bad ones. Finally, anthropological and psychological specialists, especially of the American pragmatic school (A. Irving Hallowsell and Margaret Mead, for example), have been issuing repeated warnings that no two cultures are actually alike and that therefore it is dangerous if not false to seek parallels between European rituals and those of Africa, India, and the South Sea Islands.

Thus, while comparative and archetypal studies of poetry have an obvious value in helping the reader to see and perhaps interpret symbolically real and important resemblances among many different works, it is essential to recognize that such studies often rest upon assumptions and hypotheses whose validity and utility need continual reexamination.

C. G. Jung, "On the Relation of Analytical Psychology to Poetic Art" (1922), Contributions to Analytical Psychology, tr. H. G. and C. F. Baynes (1928); C. G. Jung, "The Problem of Types in Poetry," Psychological Types, tr. H. G. Baynes (1923); G. W. Knight, The Christian Renaissance (1933); M. Bodkin, Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934); T. Mann, "Freud and the Future," Freud, Goethe, Wagner, tr. H. T. Lowe-Porter (1939); E. Cassirer, Language and Myth, tr. S. K. Langer (1946); G. Bachelard, La Terre et les Rêveries du Repos (1948); R. Chase, Quest for Myth (1949); J. Campbell, The Hero with a Thousand Faces (1949); N. Frye, "Levels of Meaning in Lit.," KR, 12 (1950) and "Blake's Treatment of the A.," EIE 1950 (1951); W. H. Auden, The En- chafed Flood (1950); N. Frye, "The Archetypes of Lit.," KR, 13 (1951) and Anatomy of Crit. (1957); H. M. Block, "Cultural Anthropology and Contemp. Lit. Crit.," JAAC, 11 (1952); W. W. Douglas, "The Meanings of 'Myth' in Modern Crit.," MP, 50 (1953); Lit. Symbolism, ed. M. Beebe (1960); Myth and Mythmaking, ed. H. A. Murray (1960); Symbolism in Religion and Lit., ed. R. May (1960); B. Seward, The Symbolic Rose (1960); P. Wheelwright, Metaphor and Reality (1962); Myth and Symbol, ed. B. Slote (1963).

N.FRIE.

ARCHILOCHIAN. Archilochus of Paros (8th or 7th c. B.C.) was said to have been the inventor of metra episyntetha (lines or couplets in which different meters or metrical cola were combined). The following Archilochian systems of couplets were used by Horace in his Odes and Epodes: (1) dactylic hexameter and dactylic tripody catalectic in syllabam (hemiepes [q.v.]), as in Odes 4.7; (2) dactylic hexameter and iambegus, as in Epode 13; (3) iambic trimeter and elegiambus, as in Epode 11; (4) versus Archilochius and iambic trimeter catalectic, as in Odes 1.4. The versus Archilochius was a dactylic tetrameter (the fourth foot of which, in Horace but not in Gr. verse, was consistently a dactyl and not a spondee) together with an ithyphallic, e.g.

solvitur acris hiems grata vice | veris et Favoni
(Odes 1.4.1)

Kolář; B. Snell, Griechische Metrik (2d ed., 1957).

R.J.G.

AREOPAGUS. The names applied by some literary historians to a conjectural literary group or club active in London in the 1580's. Douglas Bush, among others, has rejected all references to the A. as "stubborn myths" (CL, 7 [1955], 284), and it is certain that no firm evidence for its existence has ever been presented. Still it is true that a group of Elizabethan poets and critics—Sidney, Spenser, Gabriel Harvey, Sir Edward Dyer—were interested in reforming Eng. verse in the direction of classical quantitative prosody, and their common interests may conceivably have led them to organize into a group analogous to the Fr. Pléiade (q.v.). Formally organized or not, the common pursuit of the classical meters was short-lived. The autocratic Harvey retained his belief that rhyme and accentual verse were barbarisms, but the great poets, Sidney and Spenser, went on to develop Eng. verse on It., Fr., and native models, stabilizing the principles of rhyme and accent in The Faerie Queene and Astrophel and Stella.

L.B.P.

ARGENTINE POETRY. See SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY.

ARGUMENT has several senses in literary criticism. Loosely used, it can mean "plot." This meaning is sanctioned by classical usage (e.g., Terence: argumentum fabulae, the plot of the story) and is common during the Renaissance. It can also refer to the individual debates and logical reasoning which an author must often use in narrative or dramatic poetry (e.g., Portia's defense of Antonio in The Merchant of Venice, or the debate of the fallen angels in Paradise Lost). But the commonest modern meaning, and the most important, is that of the logical structure of a poem: the framework which would be common both to the poem and to a paraphrase of it. Must a poem have an argument, in this sense? Has its a. much—or anything—to do with its value? Renaissance poetry was written in a tradition which linked poetry with logic, spoke about the "cause" of a poem, and considered details (the images of a lyric, the scenes of a play) in relation to their logical function. In contrast to this is the symbolist view, which sees the value of poetry as lying in those elements which it does not share with prose: the logical (or narrative) structure of a poem can be dispensed with, and this seems to be done in such poems as Mallarmé's L'Après-midi d'un Faune or Valéry's La Jeune Parque (though not in all Valéry). No logical thread links the images of these poems. Wallace Stevens, T. S. Eliot, Hart Crane, are all at least partly in this tradition.

A rather different antilogical tradition runs from Rimbaud to the surrealists and much of Dylan Thomas: here the brute juxtaposition of imagery is the result not of a careful act of poetic construction, but a direct expression of the unconscious. A modified symbolist theory is found in the criticism (perhaps not in the poetry) of John Crowe Ransom, who values the a., but insists that it exists for the sake of the poem, not the reverse: texture is more important, poetically, than structure. An attempt has been made, notably by Eliot, to see in the metaphysical poets an anticipation of this modern allogical poetry. This is hotly contested by Rosamund Tuve, who bases her a. on Elizabethan critical documents, which she treats with rather more respect than is common. She sees the finding of images as an application of the Aristotelian predicaments, and points out that a great deal which seems "allogical" may be an example of the figure catachresis, the desperate metaphor. This comment of course can be applied to modern as well as metaphysical poetry.

There seem to be three possible conclusions: that a. is unnecessary; that it is important mainly as a sop to the reader, to enable true poetic response to take place; that it is sometimes (always?) part of a poem's true value. It would not be possible to claim that it was the whole of this value without maintaining that the paraphrase was worth as much as the poem. The first view is the symbolist theory. The second is implicit in some romantic criticism ("word-magic"), and is likely to be held, more or less articulately, by modern admirers of romantic poetry (e.g., Housman). The perfect illustration of it would be a poem like Kubla Khan. The third is the traditional view, and in modified form is still common among critics, and almost universal among readers.—P. Valéry, "Avant-propos à la Connaissance de la Déesse," Variété, I (1924), "Au Sujet du Cimetière Marin," Variété, II (1929), "Questions de Poésie," Variété, III (1936); T. S. Eliot, "The Metaphysical Poets," Selected Essays (1932); A. E. Housman, The Name and Nature of Poetry (1935); J. C. Ransom, The World's Body (1938) and "The Bases of Crit.," SR, 52 (1944); Tuve; D. Davie, Articulate Energy (1955; discusses symbolist theory, and pleads for "authentic" syntax).

L.D.L.

ARMENIAN POETRY. On tablelands south of the Black Sea and the Caucasus Mountains lies ancient Armenia. Its people are the blend of the indigenous stock and the Eastern-migrating Indo-Europeans nine centuries before Christ. Its legendary origin, 1,000 years earlier, identifies patriarch Haic, great-grandson of Noah, whence the name, in Arm., Haïastan, and the people, Haï. It lies as a frontier between the Moslem East and the Christian West, an important factor in the development of its history and culture. Almost from the beginning a battleground of foreign nations, the territory and the frontiers of historical Armenia have varied greatly throughout the centuries, and what is known today as Armenia—one of the Soviet republics—is only a small part of the ancient country. Under the political domination of many powers, from the Persians in the 6th c. B.C. to the yoke of the Turks and Russians in the 19th and 20th c., Armenia has nevertheless preserved its cultural integrity to this day.

Arm. poetry in its earliest form, the ballad, reflects the dual influence, displaying Eastern iridescence and brilliance with Western restraint and symmetry. Unfortunately, most of the ancient, pre-Christian poetry, which included also hymns and epics, was destroyed when Christianity was adopted in Armenia in A.D. 301. Only some fragments of epics, legends, and songs have survived—collected by Movses of Chorene, 5th-c. Arm. historian, and preserved in his History of Armenia. One of the fragments describes, in free verse, the birth of Vahagn, Arm. god of war:

Yercner yercin yev yercir
Yercner yev tzirani tzov
Yercn i tzovoun ouner zcarmric yeghegnicn
.....

Heaven and earth were in labor,
The purple sea also labored.
The sea in labor bore a red reed.
From the reed rose smoke,
From the reed rose flame,
And from the flame a young lad sprang.
He had hair of fire,
His beard was of flame,
And his eyes were as the rays of the sun.

The 9th-c. epic of David of Sassoun is lost, but the 19th-c. poet Thoumanian immortalized the hero's struggle against the Arab invader.

The 4th-c. adoption of Christianity presaged the 5th-c. creation of the alphabet of 36 letters by St. Mesrob, introducing a Golden Age of literature with the translation of the Bible and the compositions of the sharacans (rows of gems), which are chants and hymns. Written in free or metrical verse, the sharacans are the unique property of the Arm. church and the main material in song and chant of its services, with themes of creed, history, the Bible, the life of Christ, the saints, etc. While most sharacans were composed in the 5th and 7th c., they continued to be written until the 15th c. Of the score of important later sharacan writers the poetess Sahakaduk (8th c.) and Nerses Clayetsi (12th c.) stand out in the poetical quality of their work. Lyric poetry continued to predominate through the following centuries. The 7th c. saw the mystic poetry of Catholicos Comitas (d. 628) and Stephanos Siunetsi. In the 10th c. the great mystic poet St. Grigor Narecatsi (951–1009), called the Pindar of Armenia, wrote his odes, elegies and panegyrics.

The so-called Silver Age of literature (12th–13th c.) witnessed a revival of learning and a new surge of poetical creation. Nerses Clayetsi (1100–1173), mentioned for his sharacans, wrote also elegies and narrative poems and left a voluminous body of verse. Other outstanding poets were three ecclesiastics: Constantine Erzincatsi (b. about 1250), Hovhannes Erzincatsi, and Khachatour Cecharetsi (d. about 1330), who wrote under the pen name of Fric. The work of Constantine Erzincatsi and Fric shows Arabic and Persian influences in its sensual mysticism. (Another earlier instance of Arabic influence was the introduction of rhyme in Arm. verse.) With the beginning of the Silver Age a new spirit entered Arm. poetry, and poets once again wrote about nature, valor, love, and beauty—themes which had, since the 5th c., been shunted in favor of hymns and other religious poems. This new spirit can be seen in the poetry of Constantine Erzincatsi and, later, that of Hovhannes Tulkourantsi (1450-1525) and Nahapet Kouchac (16th c.). It is also evident in the popular poetry of the minstrels (ashough), which enjoyed great favor. The best known of these was Sayat-Nova (1712-95), whose love songs are famous.

About the middle of the 19th c. a new literary language came into being. Writers and poets began to abandon classical Arm. (except for religious works) and wrote their stories and poems in modern Arm., which differs considerably in grammar but less so in vocabulary from the ancient language. With the division of the country into Rus. and Turkish Armenia two dialects developed: the Western in Turkish Armenia, Anatolia, Constantinople, and Europe, and the Eastern in Rus. Armenia. In both dialects the poets continued to sing of the sadness of the people, their love of homeland, their longing for national freedom. Coming into contact with the European literary tradition, the Arm. poets of the 19th and 20th c. have been influenced in the West by Fr. and It. writers and in the East by German and Rus. schools. Of those writing in the Western dialect, the short-lived Petros Dourian (1851-72) should be mentioned and his brother, the Patriarch Egishé (1860-1930), a master of the language. Among more recent poets Vahan Thekeian (1877-1945) is outstanding, especially by European standards. Two fine lyricists are Daniel Varouzhan (1884-1915) and Atom Yarzhanian (Siamantho; d. 1915). Of those writing in the eastern dialect, Khachatour Abovian (1804-48) will be remembered as the founder of modern Arm. literature. Raphael Patcanian and Hovhannes Hovhannesian were leading lyric poets and Hovhannes Thoumanian (1869-1922) the best epic poet. In the Arm. Soviet Republic (since 1920) Avetik Isahakian (1875-1957) must be considered the most important Arm. poet and his great poem Abou Lala Mahari perhaps his most significant work. Of the younger generation Gegham Sarian and Gourgen Mahari deserve special mention. There is no dearth of talented poets, but they are subjected to the dictates of socialist realism. A more integral part of the Arm. cultural heritage is the emigré poetry of the first third of the 20th c., a continuation of the Western Arm. literature, which once flourished in Turkish Armenia whence thousands of Armenians fled following the massacres in 1915 and earlier. Especially in three large centers: France (Arshak Tchobanian), the Middle East (M. Ishkan and Andranic Dzaroukian), and the United States (Lootfi Minas) the poetic spirit of Armenia lives on.

COLLECTIONS AND ANTHOLOGIES: Tonal (Tzayn-igh) Sharacan (Arm. ed., Jerusalem, 1914); Order of the Services of the Arm. Church (Arm. ed., Jerusalem, 1915); Les Trouvères arméniens, ed. and tr. A. Tchobanian (2d ed., 1906); Arm. Legends and Poems, ed., Z. C. Boyajian (1916, repr. 1959); Arm. Poems Rendered into Eng. Verse, ed. A. S. Blackwell (1917); Anthologie des poètes arméniens, ed. A. Navarian (1928).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: M. Matindjiane, "Etude sur la poésie populaire arménienne" (Paris, 1907; diss.); Z. C. Boyajian, "Arm. and Eng. Poetry: Some Parallels," Contemporary Rev., 119 (1922); E. Arch. Dourian, The Hist. of Arm. Lit. (Arm. ed., Jerusalem, 1933); A. Zaminian, The Hist. of the Early Lit. of Armenia (Arm. ed., Beirut, 1941); The Hist. of Arm. Lit., Part I. From the Beginning to 1700, ed. Mekhitharist (Arm. ed., Venice, 1944); R. Grousset, Hist. de l'Arménie des origines à 1071 (1947); V. Brussov, "The Poetry of Armenia," tr. A. S. Avakian, The Arm. Rev., 1 (1948); M. V. Janashian, Hist. of Arm. Modern Lit. (Venice, 1953); K. Mekhitarian, "Quarter Century of Arm. Lit. Abroad," BA, 30 (1956).

See also: H. Thorossian, Hist. de la littérature arménienne . . . (1951); S. Soghomonian, A Few Questions on Modern Poetry (Arm. ed., Erevan, 1960). A.A.

ARSIS AND THESIS (Gr. "lifting up" and "setting down"). Corresponding to the "rise" and "fall" of the foot in the march or dance, these terms meant respectively the upward and downward beat in keeping time to the enunciation of Gr. verse. Thus the long syllable, on which the beat naturally fell, of a simple metrical foot like the dactyl (—), anapaest (—), trochee (—), or iambus (—) in meters based on them was regarded as the t. and the remainder of the foot as the a. In the later Roman period a. for a time referred to the first part of a foot and t. to the second, but the grammarians came to think of the raising and lowering of the voice rather than the upward and downward beat, so that the original application of a. and t. among the Greeks was reversed and a. denoted the basically long syllable and t. the rest of the foot. The authority of Richard Bentley (1662-1742) and Gottfried Hermann (1772-1848) has made this meaning of the two words usual, but not universal, in modern works on Gr. and L. meter.—J. Caesar, Disputatio de verborum "arsis" et "thesis" apud scriptores artis metricae latinos . . . significatione (1885); E. H. Sturtevant, "The Ictus of Cl. Verse," AJP, 44 (1923); Hardie; Dale; Koster; Crusius; Beare. R.J.G.

ART FOR ART'S SAKE. See AESTHETICISM; POETRY, THEORIES OF (OBJECTIVE THEORIES).

ARTE MAYOR. As a general Sp. metric term a.m. may mean any line of 9 or more syllables.

However, a.m. almost always refers to a line of a certain pattern or to the strophe composed of such lines. The late medieval poets borrowed the a.m. directly from the Galician-Portuguese of the 13th and 14th c. The form reached the peak of its development in 15th-c. Sp. poetry and gave way to the Italianate hendecasyllable in the 16th, since which time it has occupied only a minor position in Sp. poetry. Juan de Mena (1411-56) is considered its greatest master. A recitative measure, it was the vehicle for most poetry of weighty or serious subject matter of the 15th c. Unlike most learned Sp. verse, the a.m. was not restricted by syllable count, but depended largely on rhythmic beat. The basic pattern was a 12-beat verse divided into 2 hemistichs of 6 beats each and having triple rhythm, thus:

— — — — — | — — — — —

The primary (') and secondary (") stress beats (the latter occasionally lacking) of each hemistich are supplied by accented syllables; the unstressed beats between these two are supplied by 2 obligatory unaccented syllables; the remaining unstressed beats may each be supplied by 1 or 2 unaccented syllables or a rest beat. The pattern was not always strictly followed. The a.m. was normally arranged in groups of 8 lines to form a stanza called copla de a.m., rhyming abbaacca, less often ababbccb or abbaacac. Although the original a.m. enjoyed great rhythmic and syllabic freedom, the line in later centuries became primarily a 12-syllable or a 6-plus-6-syllable verse with marked amphibrachic rhythm.—R. Foulché-Delbos, "Étude sur le Laberinto de Juan de Mena," Revue Hispanique, 9 (1902); J. Saavedra Molina, El verso de a.m. (1946); P. Le Gentil, La Poésie lyrique espagnole et portugaise à la fin du moyen âge. 2^e partie. Les formes (1953); Navarro; D. C. Clarke, Morphology of 15th C. Castilian Verse (1964).

D.C.C.

ARTE MENOR. Sp. octosyllabic, sometimes shorter, verse. The term is used in contrast to arte mayor and is generally applied to the verse characteristic of the copla de arte menor, a late medieval stanza having the rhyme scheme of any copla de arte mayor or variation thereof (see ARTE MAYOR). Both line and strophe were probably borrowed from the 13th- and 14th-c. Galician-Portuguese.—D. C. Clarke, "Redondilla and copla de a.m.," HR, 9 (1941); Navarro.

D.C.C.

ARZAMAS. A Rus. literary discussion circle which met between 1815 and 1818. Its members, partisans of the elegant, Westernized style of Nikolai Karamzin, included the poets Zhukovski, Batyushkov, Vyazemski, and, most important, Alexander Pushkin. The chief business of the group was the reading of parodies of the conservative Slavonicized style of their opponents, the followers of Admiral Shishkov. The circle was significant for the role it played in fostering the "golden age" of Rus. poetry, which came in the 1820's.—E. A. Sidorov, "Literaturnoe obshchestvo 'Arzamas,'" Zhurnal Ministerstva Narodnogo Prosveshcheniya, 6-7 (1901).

W.E.H.

ASCENDING RHYTHM (rising rhythm). The rhythm of lines written predominantly in iambic or anapestic feet. The most frequent kind of rhythm in Eng. poetry, a.r. is so called because the reader or hearer is presumed to feel, in each foot (q.v.), an "ascent" from a relatively unstressed syllable to a relatively stressed one. The term is of dubious usefulness, and it may lead to confusion and pedantry unless one remembers that it has no metaphoric or symbolic value whatever: a.r. does not, in itself, transmit a feeling of aspiration, elevation, levity, or cheer. Consider:

The stricken warrior sank to earth.

See DESCENDING RHYTHM.—H. L. Creek, "Rising and Falling Rhythm in Eng. Verse," PMLA, 35 (1920); G. R. Stewart, The Technique of Eng. Verse (1930).

P.F.

ASCLEPIAD. A meter named after the poet Asclepiades of Samos (ca. 290 B.C.). Whereas the glyconic (q.v.) had 1 choriamb, i.e. the central foot of —|—|—|—, the lesser a. had 2 and the greater a. 3. Diaeresis usually occurred between the choriambs, e.g.

Mācē|nās ātāvīs||ēdītē rē|gībūs
(Horace, Odes 1.1.1.)

tū nē|quāēsīrīs,||scīrē nēfās,||quēm mīhī,

quēm|tībī
(ibid. 1.11.1)

The a. was used long before the time of the poet who gave it his name, not only in monodic and choral lyric but also in tragedy. It is very common in Horace who employs five types of asclepiadean strophes.—H. Sadej, "De versu Asclepiadeo minore apud Romanos obvio," Eos, 45 (1951); Koster; L. Rotsch, "Zur Form der drei Horaz-Oden in Asclepiadeus maior (1.11; 1.18; 4.10)," Gymnasium, 64 (1957); A. R. Bellinger, "The Lesser Asclepiadean Line of Horace," YCS, 15 (1957).

R.J.G.

ASSAMESE POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

ASSONANCE, sometimes called "vocalic rhyme," denotes vowel identity in the tonic syllables, sometimes supported by the same device in the succeeding unstressed syllables, of words whose consonants differ or, if partly the same, avoid creating rhyme (grave/fate; votive/notice; glory/holy) and which (1) echo each other in the same line or in different portions of a poem, or which (2) appear at the end of successive or alternating lines.

The first type (internal a.) is used exclusively for stylistic effect and often occurs in combination with alliteration and consonance (qq.v.) producing elaborate sound textures (see also SOUND IN POETRY and TONE COLOR). To be noticeable, at least the first two assonances in a sequence must be in close proximity, or in the first and last words of a line. Internal a. is characteristic of poetry in any language. Thomas Gray: "Along the heath and near his favorite tree"; George Herbert: "Onely take this gentle rose." Thomas Hardy's The Voice has an assonantal pattern on "u," woven through the whole poem. Baudelaire: "Le gouffre a toujours soif; la clepsydre se vide." Goethe has many subtle internal assonances; for rhyme pair assonances echoing the internal ones see his An die Entfernte. Rilke is especially fond of assonances on a and ei (e.g., Duineser Elegien 2. 41-42; 10. 1-5, 73). For an interwoven pattern of alliteration and a. see Shakespeare's Sonnet 12; cf. also Marianne Moore's Spenser's Ireland.

The second type represents a device for linking lines or line parts. It is not used by poets of the Eng. language as a deliberate device, except very occasionally (e.g., Marianne Moore: "... swiftness / ... crevices" in The Fish). Sometimes an a. has to make up for the lack of a pure rhyme (e.g., the only two certain examples of impure rhyme in Shakespeare's Sonnets: "open / broken," 61.1-3, and "remember'd / tender'd," 120.9-11). In popular verse and folk song ("And pray who gave you that jolly red nose? / Cinnamon, Ginger, Nutmeg, and Cloves") a. appears as the result of "carelessness or blunted ear" (Edmund Gosse). In classical L. Virgil, Cicero, and especially Catullus made subtle use of a. as an alternative to rhyme while in ancient Gr. poetry vocalic rhyme echoes were used effectively within lines (e.g. Iliad 1.406). In late Vulgar L. and early Romance poetry final a. is part of the verse structure and links contiguous lines of indefinite number. The Sp. romances have up to 50 or 60 lines of rimas asonantes with the same a., which never becomes tedious because of the rich vocalicity of the language. (Note the endless variety of words with i-a or i-o in the last two syllables). Both the tonic penultimate and the ultimate are in a. Successful use of a. in modern Sp. poetry includes a. on either the ultimate or the penultimate alone (Már-mol, Bécquer) and mere vocalic analogies, as e/i and o/u (Martinez de la Rosa). In Rubén Darío's Sinfonía en gris mayor lines 2 and 4 of all 8 stanzas are in a. Semivowels i(y) and w(u) preceding a vowel do not destroy the a. (e.g., "universo / . . . ingenuo" or "Fulgencio / . . . esto"). A. is also used in the Sp. drama (Calderón, Antonio Hurtado, etc.).

The early OF chansons de geste have a. in place of rhyme. The assonant line groups are called laissez or tirades and vary greatly in number; in the Chanson de Roland the average laisse has 14 lines. A. takes place only between final syllables of the same category (i.e., masculine or feminine). In modern Fr. poetry Charles Guérin's attempt to reintroduce a. in place of rhyme in Le sang des crépuscules (1895) has found no imitators.

In Ir. poetry, rhyme includes an elaborate system of assonances (called "amus"), since g-b-d, c-p-t, or ch-ph-th are allowed to "rhyme."

Middle High German poetry uses a. often (but nowhere exclusively) instead of, or intermingled with, rhyme (e.g., in the Graf Rudolf fragments 15 per cent of the rhymes are thus "impure"). The German Volkslied uses a. occasionally, when at a loss for a rhyme. The attempts of the German romantic poets to reintroduce a. in place of rhyme into German poetry in their translations from the Sp. (the brothers Schlegel) and in their own romances and dramas (Tieck, Arnim, Heine) are tours de force rather than genuine artistic successes, since New High German, with its prevalence of the shwa-sound in final syllables, cannot produce sufficiently strong word echoes without the aid of consonance. Modern poets occasionally use a. with great effect, e.g., Stefan George in Verschollen des traumes . . . where identical rhyme is regularly interlaced with a. and in Der Widerchrist where assonances tellingly deviate "by a hair's breadth" from full rhyme, just as do the works of the Antichrist from Christ's.

A. W. Schlegel, Briefe an Tieck, ed. K. v. Holtei, III (1864), 275ff.; F. Brunetière, "A.," La Grande encyclopédie (1886); J. Minor, Neuhochdeutsche Metrik (2d ed., 1902); M. Méndez y Bejarano, La ciencia del verso (1908); W. Masing, Sprachliche Musik in Goethes Lyrik (1910); E. Gosse, "A.," Ency. Britannica (11th ed., 1911); A. Fischli, Über Klangmittel im Versinnern (1920); P. Habermann, "Assonanz," Reallexikon, I; E. Rickert, New Methods for the Study of Lit. (1927); L. P. Thomas, Le Vers moderne (1943); N. I. Heresu, La Poésie latine: Étude des structures phoniques (1960); W. Kayser, Gesch. des deutschen Verses (1960); C. C. Smith, "La musicalidad del Polifemo," RFE, 44 (1961).

U.K.G.

ASSYRO-BABYLONIAN POETRY. Babyl. literature flourished in the 2d millennium, and Assyrian from 1500 to 600 B.C.; the Neo-Babyl. period (625-538 B.C.) did not produce significant poetry. Written in cuneiform characters of Sumerian origin, on clay tablets, the poetic texts of Babylonia and Assyria hardly differed at all from each other, although the two spoken dialects differed almost as much as the vernaculars of London and New York. The language is East Semitic.

The meter of Semitic verses is identical to the Sumerian: usually the two halves of a verse have 4 stress accents each; for instance the Creation Poem (enuma eliš) begins as follows:

enuma elis la nabu samamu
sapis ammatum suma la zakrat

When on high the heavens had not been named,
Below the earth's surface had not been called by name . . .

The 2 hemistichs, as here, are usually in parallelism, as is also the case in Sumerian and ancient Near Eastern poetry in general. New in Babyl-Assyr. poetry of later periods is the use of acrostics, not alphabetic acrostics as in the Hebrew Bible (Psalms 25, 34, 37, 119; Proverbs 31:10-31; Lamentations 1-4, etc.) but forming names and sentences, as "For Janneus A. and his wife." Other acrostics have the word "Nabu" (the god Nebo), or the sentence, "I am Ashurbanipal who invoked thee: grant me life, O Marduk, and I will pay thee thy homage." One poet even repeats the same syllable of the acrostic at the beginning and end of the 4 verses in each stanza, producing a sort of rhyme.

The hymns and prayers used in the Babyl.-Assyr. worship are slightly revised versions from the Sumerian; their diction is so conventional that with hardly a change they could be used for another deity. We have hymns in honor of Anu, Enlil (some of which were later addressed to Marduk in Babylonia and to Ashshur in Assyria), Ninurta, Nabu (we have an antiphonal prayer of Ashurbanipal, with replies of Nabu), the fire gods (Gibil, Nusku, and Gira), and the goddess Ishtar; numerous hymns are addressed to the moon god Sin, the sun god Shamash, and the dying vegetation god Tammuz (Adonis).

Some of the mythological epics were used liturgically in the worship, notably the Creation Epic (enuma eliš) sung in Babylon to honor Marduk on the fourth day of the New Year festival (4 Nisan, about March 24). It begins with a genealogy of the gods and continues with the attack of the monsters of chaos against the gods, Marduk's victory over Tiamat (the primeval mother who led the monsters), the making of heaven and earth out of the two halves of her body, Marduk's organization of the world and his exaltation among the gods. In the extant Babylonian edition of this poem, Marduk usurps the original place of Enlil. The poem of Ishtar's Descent to the Nether World, presumably to bring back to earth her lover Tammuz, was apparently sung during the Tammuz festival. The Gilgamesh Epic is the best known and most admirable Babylonian poem. As in the poem about Adapa (who missed partaking of the food of immortality through Ea's wrong guess of Anu's intentions) and the one about Etana (who flew to heaven on the back of an eagle, but failed to obtain the herb of procreation), the theme of the Gilgamesh Epic is man's vain search for immortality.

Gilgamesh, whither rovest thou?
The life thou seekest thou shalt not find.
When the gods created mankind,
Death for mankind they set aside,
Life in their own hands retaining.
Thou, Gilgamesh, let full be thy belly,
Make thou merry by day and by night.
(Tablet 10, tr. E. A. Speiser)

The story of the deluge is told in the 11th tablet, but was not part of the Sumerian original of the Gilgamesh Epic.

In addition to proverbs and counsels for life, which are also known in Sumerian, Assyrian, and Babylonian poetry included the following genres unknown in surviving Sumerian texts: work songs, love poetry (a catalogue of erotic poems, listing the first lines, is known), and pessimistic and skeptical poems.

The best Eng. tr. of Assyro-Babyl. poems will be found in Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, ed. J. B. Pritchard (1950; these tr. are repr. in an inexpensive ed. by I. Mendelsohn, Religions of the Ancient Near East, 1955). See also A. Heidel, The Babyl. Genesis: The Story of Creation (1942), The Gilgamesh Epic and Old Testament Parallels (2d ed., 1949).—Tr. in other languages: Altorientalische Texte zum Alten Testament, ed. H. Gressmann (2d ed., 1926); G. Conteneau, Le déluge babylonien, suivi de: Ishtar aux enfers, la Tour de Babel (1941); G. Furlani, Poemeti mitologici babilonesi e assiri (1955).—Among the best literary histories are books by B. Meissner (see bibliog. of SUMERIAN POETRY for these and other pertinent volumes) and O. Weber, Die Literatur der Babylonier und Assyrier (1907). See also Sumerische und ak- kadische Hymnen und Gebete, tr. A. Falkenstein and W. von Soden (1953; important introd.); Gilgameš et sa légende, ed. P. Garelli (1960); W. G. Lambert, Babyl. Wisdom Lit. (1960). R.H.P.

ASTEISMUS. See PUN.

ASTROPHIC, astropha. Composition in verses without responson or balancing metrical structure. K.M.A.

ASYNARTETE (Gr. "disconnected"). A classical verse composed of independent cola (see COLON), loosely or not at all connected with each other metrically. The diaeresis between cola was at first strictly observed, but later poets (e.g., Cratinus) often neglected it. The creator of this type of verse was Archilochus (7th c. B.C.), and the cola he used in his asynartetes were dactylic, trochaic, and iambic. The comic poets made frequent use of these asynartetes.—Kolář; Koster; B. Snell, Griechische Metrik (3d ed., 1962). P.S.C.

ASYNDETON (Gr. "unconnected"). A rhetorical device consisting of the omission of conjunctions, articles, and sometimes even pronouns. A., which enables the poet to achieve effects of extraordinary speed and economy, occurs with special felicity in an inflected language such as L.; Horace and Statius were fond of the device, and their example was followed by many of the medieval L. poets. Medieval German poets (e.g., Walther von der Vogelweide, Wolfram von Eschenbach) also made much use of a. The figure was especially favored by baroque poets in Germany (Andreas Gryphius), Spain, and France.

In Eng. literature a., which Puttenham, in his Arte of Eng. Poesie, called "loose language," has occurred particularly in modern poetry—in the work of the imagists, for example, with their cult of brevity, and in W. H. Auden with his fondness for the pithy and loaded phrase. But in the Latinist Milton as well one can find numerous examples: "The first sort by their own suggestion fell, / Self-tempted, self-depraved; man falls, deceived / By the other first: man therefore shall find grace, / The other none." (Paradise Lost 3.129–132). See also POLYSYNDETON.—H. Pliester, Die Worthäufung im Barock (1930); Curtius; Lausberg.

ATONIC (Gr. "without tone, or stress"). Used in Gr. grammar of words which have no accent (pitch) of their own and are usually attached to another word which precedes or follows. Used in general of the unaccented syllables of a word. In accentual prosody the unstressed syllables of a word or foot. R.O.E.

AUBADE, aube. See ALBA.

AUDITION COLORÉE. An aspect of synaesthesia (q.v.) in which sounds are perceived or described in terms of colors. Coleridge observes in the Biographia Literaria that "the poet must . . . understand and command what Bacon called the vestigia communia of the senses, the latency of all in each, and more especially . . . the excitement of vision by sound and the exponents of sound." The phenomenon of a.c. is common in literature, where its most famous example is probably Rimbaud's sonnet Voyelles (Vowels), beginning: "A noir, E blanc, I rouge, U vert, O bleu, voyelles. . ." Such terms as golden voice, coloratura soprano, chromatic scale, Klangfarbe (German "sound-color," timbre) show the assimilation of a.c. into language. A vivid example occurs in Edward Thomas's Cock-Crow:

Out of the night, two cocks together crow,
Cleaving the darkness with a silver blow.

J. Millet, A.c. (1892); E. Noulet, Le premier visage de Rimbaud (1953). A.G.E.

AUREATE LANGUAGE, aureation. A type of poetic diction important in 15th-c. Eng. and Scottish poetry of official praise. It is also an important characteristic of the style of the contemporaneous rhétoriciens (q.v.) in France. A.I. is based on copious vernacular coinages from Latin ("Haile, sterne superne! Haile, in eterne,"); in its role as an "ornament" to style it illuminates one aspect of late medieval poetics. Although a.I. has generally been ridiculed by literary historians, it was the means by which Scotsman Dunbar, one of the finest of 15th-c. poets, earned his bread. One must also remember that many terms which do not strike us as aureate because they have since been absorbed into our language were indeed exotic coinages in their day. Much of Chaucer's diction may so have struck his contemporaries. Poets other than Dunbar whose work is distinguished by aureation include Lydgate and Hawes in England and King James I and Henryson in Scotland.—J. C. Mendenhall, Aureate Terms (1919); C. S. Lewis, Eng. Hist. in the 16th C. (1954).

AUSTRALIAN POETRY. Though in touch with trends elsewhere Aus. poetry has evolved along its own lines. It had a rougher origin than Am. or Canadian poetry. In the 19th c. some literary poetry was written, but until recent times almost all Aus. verse was related primarily, not to literature, but to soil and origin.

The difficulty of asserting a native image in a new country is illustrated by the persistence in early Aus. poetry of points of view inherited, not locally formed. Robert Southey's Botany Bay Eclogues (1794) caricature the landscape (which he never saw) in a fatuous pastoralism, a key from which later local poets found it hard to depart. Poets represented New South Wales (settled 1788 as a penal station) as a savage outpost, grim, romantic only by terror and remoteness. (Cf. Goldsmith's view of Georgia in The Deserted Village.) Relief was sought in facetiousness, as in the tag ascribed (as a joke) to the gentleman-pickpocket George Barrington:

True patriots all, for, be it understood,
They left their country for their country's good.

Although Australia soon ceased to be a penal colony, adjustment was slow. The European sensibility recoiled from a landscape of unfamiliar forms: "Here nature is reversed," wrote one early observer. Poetry was called upon to bridge an almost complete gap in cultural continuity. Many conventions and clichés were shattered by the change of environment (e.g., strange native animals and flowers; bright but raucous parrots; kookaburras which appeared to laugh at the newcomer; no nightingales; no violets, primroses, etc.). Charles Tompson (1806-83), the first native-born poet, expressed an affectionate but thin elegiac regard for the landscape. In Charles Harpur (1813-68) the true colonial imagination first appeared but was compromised by ineffectual literary imitation (couplet verse in styles from Collins to Wordsworth). His best was seen in a lyric, Midsummer Noon in the Australian Forest, and an epic fragment, The Creek of the Four Graves, describing a clash between settlers and Aborigines. The most popular colonial poet was Adam Lindsay Gordon (1833-70), came to Australia at the age of 20), known for his energetic meters and homespun tags, which were much appreciated as contributions to colonial morale. His verses as a rule described outdoor life, often associated with horses and riding, and characterized by an Eng. Public-School background, scraps of L. or Gr., and a plangent nostalgic tone. At his worst trite, at his best he really captured the spirit of Aus. life and landscape. His Aus. poems, especially those of a balladlike character, were universally known and repeated in their day, but later he was much criticized for some lines in which he appeared to belittle Australia as a land "where bright blossoms are scentless, / And songless bright birds." He must nevertheless be given credit for certain perceptions and insights, of a quite fleeting but invaluable kind, which endowed the ordinary Aus. landscape with an archetypal clarity beyond anything as yet seen in any of the arts:

In the Spring, when the wattle-gold trembles
Twixt shadow and shine,
When each dew-laden air draught resembles
A long draught of wine;
When the sky-line's blue burnished resistance
Makes deeper the dreamiest distance. . . .

This quality of essential vision was Gordon's best achievement; he bequeathed it to the painter Streeton.

Immediately following Gordon, Henry Kendall (1839-82, native born) added lyrical refinement to colonial diction. Monotonous but sensitive, his verse flows with musical fluency. Influenced by Poe, Swinburne, Shelley, his mellifluousness is sometimes excessive. His best poem, Bell Birds ("By channels of coolness the echoes are calling, / And down the dim gorges I hear the creek calling"), effectively corrects the stock inherited convention that the bush is unmusical.

At its inception (1880), the Sydney Bulletin, then a radical and widely circulated weekly, set deliberately about fostering a local literature in prose and verse. Two traditions quickly defined themselves: (1) a campfire style, displayed in what in Australia is called ballad verse, and in anecdotal narrative in prose; and (2) a genteel verse style, refined and "educated" (often naively), of journalistic or drawing-room provenance. A number of women contributed sentimental and picturesque lyrics, often with a decidedly nationalistic bias (e.g., Louise Mack: "Land I love! I will find your meaning. . . . You shall reveal the soul of your song!" etc., etc.) The best of these were men, journalists, and three of them Ir.: Victor Daley, D. M. Wright, Roderic Quinn (the last Aus. born but of Ir. parents). From these, later poets learned some of the needed disciplines of lyric verse. In the campfire style, energy counted for more than subtlety but over a very broad canvas a lively descriptive impressionism was achieved, related to Gordon but freer:

Beneath a sky of deepest blue, where never cloud abides,
A speck upon the waste of plain, the lonely mailman rides. . . .

(A. B. Paterson, The Travelling Post-Office)

The best of the bush balladists were Henry Lawson and A. B. ("Banjo") Paterson. Others worth naming were John Farrell, Will Ogilvie, Edward Dyson, E. J. Brady, Barcroft Boake; but there were a great many more. Their verses circulated widely in the Bulletin and were learned and repeated throughout the country. The bush ballad remains a fundamental Aus. popular idiom. C. J. Dennis' The Sentimental Bloke (1915), a wartime city pastoral with vivid local color, preserved the visible outline but not the spirit of the true bush ballad. There have been sophisticated modern treatments of it (e.g., Douglas Stewart, Glencoe, 1947), but in its original form its heyday is past. Poems like John Manifold's elegy for John Learmonth and Judith Wright's Bullooky (both in the Penguin Book of Aus. Verse) reflect its influence significantly. It remains undoubtedly the strongest native strain in contemporary Aus. poetry, and almost certainly accounts for the manifest reluctance of the poets to subscribe to an unreservedly intellectual poetical convention. Underneath every free image or concept there is sustained a hard, earthy skepticism; this seems to be the indwelling Aus. secret, and if it limits the intellectual range, at least it humanizes the effect.

Throughout the colonial period the poets continued obsessed with environment and description; but about 1890-1900 new impulses developed, culminating in three strong poets, Bernard O'Dowd (1866-1953), Christopher Brennan (1870-1932) and William Baylebridge (1883-1942). O'Dowd and Baylebridge were prophets of a new age, political idealists though of contrasting creeds, for whom poetry was an instrument rather than an end in itself. O'Dowd corresponded with Whitman; both were students of Nietzsche. Neither was so attractive a poet as was the sombre Brennan. Brennan represents probably the most brilliant poetic talent yet seen in Australia, the first fully developed literary and critical skill. A symbolist and follower of Mallarmé, a student of European ideas, he was intellectually stranded and alone in Australia, and his poetry suffered in consequence; it was often obscure, sometimes brutal, but never weak. His qualities are only now being recognized; in his own day, except for a limited circle, he was virtually unknown.

In the 20th c., lyrical poetry moves from the exuberant nationalism of Dorothea Mackellar ("I love a sunburnt country, / A land of sweeping plains," etc.—My Country, 1914) to a much more objective and critically tempered point of view (e.g., James McAuley's Envoi, "The people are hard-eyed, kindly, with nothing inside them, / The men are independent but you could not call them free"). Significant steps were taken by a group early associated with the painter Norman Lindsay (b. 1879) and the poet Hugh McCrae (1876-1958), both of whom boldly advocated a nonlocal subject matter. This amounted to echoing the aesthetic movement in England, with stress upon a Nietzschean or "Dionysian" formula of art and recourse to classical, mythological, or medieval themes. In McCrae there was wit and delicacy, though too much intellectual dissipation. Stronger work came from the younger poets who followed, first in the publication Vision (1923) and afterward independently. Chief of these were Kenneth Slessor (b. 1901), whose elegy Five Bells is one of the finest modern Aus. poems, and Robert D. FitzGerald (b. 1902), whose Essay on Memory won a sesquicentenary prize in 1938. Two poets whose work appeared about the same time were Shaw Neilson (1872-1942), a sensitive lyrist, and Mary (Dame Mary) Gilmore (1865-1962), who in her nineties could still produce an occasional lyric reminiscent of the wit and precision of her best days. Two wars had an influence on Aus. poetry, but the second had the profounder effect. It first revived, then broke the nationalistic obsession. Jindyworobakism, set up about 1935 by Rex Ingamells (1913-55), was a movement which endeavored to protect the image of Australia against cultural intrusions from abroad (including England), and took as its center the culture of the Aborigine, at once embraced as a valid symbolism by a large number of young followers. Not all of the movement decayed when later developments followed; for example, many still make use of the picturesque altjira or "dream time" concept fundamental to all Aus. native mythologies. Between the pre- and postwar moods of youth came the Angry Penguins, an undergraduate group whose brief rebellion was exploded by a widely publicized hoax. Two young soldier-poets (James McAuley and Harold Stewart, in collaboration) sent the editor of the magazine Angry Penguins (1944) a sequence of nonsense-poems, The Darkening Ecliptic, the work of a circumstantially documented but quite non-existent poet, "Ern Malley." It was accepted by the editor, Max Harris—himself a poet—and extravagantly praised. The result was the prophylactic collapse of showy but empty forms of "modernism" among the younger Aus. poets, and a new beginning to the art.

Contemporary Aus. verse is lyrical, commentative, satirical, and descriptive. It remains reflective in pattern, and is doggedly traditional by its lights. It has not denied its colonial origins but has developed from them; all the movements mentioned have been assimilated constructively, and it owes little, comparatively, to fashion abroad. Outstanding poets are A. D. Hope, James McAuley, Douglas Stewart, Judith Wright, David Campbell, Rosemary Dobson, Geoffrey Dutton, Vincent Buckley, Ray Mathew. All these are represented in the excellent but necessarily limited Penguin Book of Aus. Verse, which also has a good short introduction and brief notes on each of the poets.

ANTHOLOGIES: A Century of Aus. Verse, ed.

D. Sladen (1888; of historical interest mainly); An Anthol. of Aus. Verse, ed. G. Mackaness (2d ed., 1952); Modern Aus. Poetry, ed. H. M. Green (2d ed., 1952); Aus. Bush Ballads (1955) and Old Bush Songs and Rhymes of Colonial Times (1957), both ed. D. Stewart and N. Keesing; A Book of Aus. Verse (1956) and New Land, New Language (1957), both ed. J. Wright; The Penguin Book of Aus. Verse, ed. J. Thompson, K. Slessor and R. G. Howarth (1958).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: T. I. Moore, Six Aus. Poets: McCrae, Neilson, O'Dowd, Baylebridge, Brennan, FitzGerald (1942); E. M. Miller, Aus. Lit. A Bibliog. to 1938, Extended to 1950, ed. F. T. Macartney (1956); C. Hadgraft, Aus. Lit. (1960); H. M. Green, A Hist. of Aus. Lit. (2 v., 1962); J. P. Matthews, Tradition in Exile: A Comparative Study of Social Influence on the Development of Aus. and Canadian Poetry in the 19th C. (1962); A. D. Hope, Aus. Lit. 1950-1962 (1964).

B.R.E.

AUSTRIAN POETRY. Though Austr. poetry is lingually an intrinsic part of German lyrics, there is sufficient justification to deal with it separately, particularly since a peculiar multi-ethnic background, history, religion, and nature have drawn its characteristic features. When speaking of Austr. poetry one ought to bear in mind the realms of the Babenbergs and of the Hapsburgs which at various times extended from Switzerland over Hungary and Poland to Russia, and from Silesia and Bohemia to Croatia and Lombardy, as well as the influences from Spain through the imperial court and from Italy through the commedia dell'arte and music. Such growth, rarely brought about by wars, frequently by dynastic marriages, has molded Celtic, Roman, German, Slavic, and Magyar elements into a highly diversified and individualistic populace that increasingly cherished a vita contemplativa as opposed to a vita activa. Its attracting center was Vienna.

Austria in the 12th and 13th c. abounded in a multitude of Minnesänger after the stern religious vein exemplified in Frau Ava (d. 1127) and in the memento mori of Heinrich von Melk (12th c.) had run its course. Der Kurenberger (ca. 1150-1200) cultivated verses which combined folk song and minnesong in a knightly manner; Dietmar von Aist (d. ca. 1170) composed his verses in praise of love (Taglieder); the Alsatian Reinmar von Hagenau (ca. 1160-1205) had come to Vienna to enchant the court of the Babenbergs with his artful, amorous, though elegiac poems. It was he whom Walther von der Vogelweide (b. ca. 1170 in Austria, d. ca. 1230) recognized as his teacher and master, and it was Vienna where Walther, according to his own testimony, had learned "singen und sagen." His poems—with unaffected love, nature, religion, politics, and sagacity as main topics—signal the height of lyric poetry until Goethe, some 600 years later. They reveal a happy meeting of mind and senses, of color and form, music and rhythm, reflection and feeling; they express joy in living and truthfulness, but also sadness at the transitoriness of life. They do so in a manner which renders them timeless and great. This reliance upon eye and ear, the prevalence of the concrete over the abstract and of the mind over the intellect is noticeable also in minor poets of his period to the end of the Middle Ages, e.g., in Reinmar von Zweter and Neidhart von Reuenthal (both first half of the 13th c.), Der Tannhäuser (ca. 1230-70), Ulrich von Lichtenstein (ca. 1200-1276), Der von Suoneck (ca. 1250), Hugo von Montfort (1357-1423), Oswald von Wolkenstein (1377-1445) and up to our own time.

After the decline of the Middle High German period we listen in vain for a great lyrical voice in Austria (except folk songs) until the romantic period. Whereas Protestant church song, schools, and the homes of Protestant clergymen made the German language a vessel of poetic expression, Catholic Austria—with Latin the language of the church, as well as of the schools conducted predominantly by Jesuits who considered it the worthiest form of expression, and with no ministerial home as a center of learning and scholarship—can offer nothing comparable to the great German baroque poets A. Gryphius, P. Gerhardt, Fleming, Dach, Angelus Silesius, Logau (with the limited exception perhaps of Katharina Regina von Greiffenberg, 1633-94). Even at the time of M. Claudius, Klopstock, Goethe, Schiller, and Hölderlin, poetic art in Austria remained uninspiring, adhering to metric form but lacking in true rhythm—the versifications of Michael Denis (1729-1800), J. B. Alxinger (1755-97), A. Blumauer (1755-98), Karoline Pichler (1769-1843), L. Pyrker (1772-1847), J. C. v. Zedlitz (1790-1862) notwithstanding. Only Marianne von Willemer (b. 1784 in Linz, d. 1860 in Frankfurt o/M.) rose to poetic heights with Goethe in West-östlicher Diwan, but she hardly can be called an Austr. poetess in the proper sense.

The second flowering of Austr. poetry did not occur until the advent of F. Grillparzer (1791-1872, Vienna) and particularly of Nikolaus Lenau (b. 1802 near Temesvar, Hungary, d. 1850, Vienna). Deep melancholy and pessimism, Weltschmerz, loneliness, and restlessness pervade Lenau's poetry, during the Metternich period when political stagnation was unsuccessfully challenged by Anastasius Grün (b. 1806, Laibach, d. 1876).

Resignation, a bitter-sweet attitude towards life, psychological insight, a recognition of the relativity of values, but also a quiet joy in small things—echoes of the Biedermeier (q.v.) period, which was given to introspection and averse to confrontations with materialistic life—characterized Austr. poetry to the end of the 19th c. These traits are expressed in the lyrics of the Viennese E. v. Feuchtersleben (1806–49) and F. v. Saar (1833–1906), the Tyrolian H. v. Gilm (1812–64), and the Moravian M. v. Ebner-Eschenbach (1830–1916). Austr. poetry at that elegant and tender time does not reflect the labor and aftermath of the industrial revolution, and the veins of poetic realism and naturalism are apparent only in her dialect poets (F. Stelzhamer, 1802–74, P. Rosegger, 1843–1918, etc.). Austria then had no poets comparable to G. Keller, C. F. Meyer, Theodor Storm, D. v. Liliencron, F. Freiligrath, Arno Holz, R. Dehmel.

Around 1900, however, there was a lyrical burgeoning in Austria as at the time of Walther. As if latent dispositions had come to the fore and the array of half-tones and a molded heritage had gained sound, music, color, and form, Lebensweisheit revealed itself in its ripest lyrical fruit. This spring blossomed in the Indian summer and autumn of a dying era. The sweetness of life, its fragrance and wisdom were gathered once more in irretrievably fading hours while time seemed to allow itself to stand still to behold the gathering riches. With extraordinary sensitivity, sovereignty of rhythmical suggestiveness, uncanny insight, and vocal splendor, R. M. Rilke (b. 1875, Prag, d. 1926) and H. v. Hofmannsthal (b. 1874, Vienna, d. 1929) set music and images into words. Their art, impressionistic yet thoughtful, has no equal in Germany. An exceptional faculty of surrender and understanding of human nature (which for the Austr., as Hofmannsthal said, was a trait extending to the point of loss of character), a melancholy recognition of the futility of human doing and striving, had made the vita contemplativa an art in itself. Even a "chronicle" like Rilke's Die Weise von Liebe und Tod (1906) is a purely lyrical work. Content and form had become indistinguishable from each other. But beauty and splendor were felt to be, as Rilke put it, only "the beginning of the terrible." "We always play, he who knows it is wise," Hofmannsthal said, and Rilke who by inner necessity had made loneliness and suffering into self-recognition cast his heart into the Duineser Elegien and the Sonnette an Orpheus (1923), in which human isolation is no longer softened by the warmth of the senses. While R. Schaukal (b. 1874, Moravia, d. 1942), S. Zweig (b. 1881, Vienna, d. 1942, Brazil), K. Kraus (b. 1874, Bohemia, d. 1936), and M. Mell (b. 1882, Marburg) tried to preserve the heritage of the Occident in the purity of poetic creation, it broke quietly but frighteningly asunder in the verses of G. Trakl (b. 1887, Salzburg, d. 1914), to whom beauty had disintegrated into wintry hues and reality had become a decaying concept which he beheld from the threshold of expressionism (q.v.).

It is significant though not surprising that expressionism as a passionate, explosive, truth-seeking, activist movement brought forth only one Austr. lyric poet of stature, F. Werfel (b. 1890, Prague, d. 1945, Calif.). True, there are certain expressionistic features noticeable in other Austr. poets, e.g., F. T. Csokor (b. 1885, Vienna), A. Wildgans (b. 1881, Vienna, d. 1932), Th. Kramer (b. 1897, near Vienna, d. 1958), but, in general, Austrians who suspect any manifesto or tempestuous confession and prefer compromise over unconditional demands were no partners to this literary movement. Instead, Austr. poetry of the 1920's and 1930's revealed itself with new imagery, melodic rhythm, and sensitivity in its pursuit of adherence to form and in its endeavor to explore man's relationship to himself, to God, and to nature. Vienna in particular, a most humane metropolis, had a cultural climate which blended urbaneness and landscape happily into each other. This union offering perspectives into the past towards Biedermeier, romanticism, and baroque is apparent in the works of the older generation like Th. Däubler (b. 1876, Trieste, d. 1934), R. Beer-Hofmann (b. 1866, Vienna, d. 1945, N.Y.), F. K. Ginzkey (b. 1871, Pola), F. Braun (b. 1885, Vienna), but continues to the present also. Rustic elements, objectively and functionally shaped in woodcut manner—as in the work of R. Billinger (b. 1893, Upper Austria), G. Zernatto (b. 1903, Carinthia, d. 1943, N.Y.)—as well as Catholic accents—as in Paula v. Preradović (b. 1887, Vienna, d. 1951)—lend profile to the wealth of lyrical creation. One of the great, unfortunately almost forgotten, is Hans Leifhelm (1891–1947), Austr. by choice, whose nature poems remain almost unexcelled.

Other voices signaling rather the continuation of a long tradition than the beginning of a new one are those of E. Mitterer (b. 1906), A. Lernet-Holenia (b. 1897), E. Schönwiese (b. 1905), E. Waldinger (b. 1896), and J. Weinheber (b. 1892, Vienna, d. 1945). Weinheber in particular reveals in his poetry an Austr. tendency of thinking with the heart and feeling with the mind, a deep mistrust, pessimism, even despair to be borne only by constraining it into form, by resignation, or by humor. Unhappiness, suffering, an inability to accept the conditions of life (prevalent also in Grillparzer, Raimund, Lenau, A. Stifter) pervade his verses that reach from the heroic to rustic strokes, from delicate softness to humor written in Viennese dialect.

After the end of the Second World War the new Austr. generation, inclined as ever to evolution, not revolution, played the chords of old in different keys, advancing an unbroken tradition. In contrast to Germany (disregarding in this connection P. Celan, b. 1920 in what used to be Austr. Bukovina) no neo-expressionistic or surrealist experimentation of consequence can be discerned. Most of the younger poets adhere to a melancholy and subjective interpretation of life or assimilate thought and emotion to patterns designed in an exclamatory manner, softly and more quietly echoing German postwar tendencies. Worthy of attention and perhaps characteristic of Austria (rather a motherland than a fatherland) is the poetry of women who indeed have contributed most to the lyrical image of Austria after 1945, above all two Carinthians—Ingeborg Bachmann (b. 1926) whose sibylline, quiet rhythm casts the issue of life, love, and death into arresting images with new light and breath in newly revealed words, and Christine Lavant (b. 1915) in whom strength and mourning, apocalyptic visions and whispered tenderness fuse into mythical expression.

ANTHOLOGIES: Museum aus den deutschen Dichtungen österreichischer Lyriker und Epiker der frühesten bis zur neuesten Zeit, ed. S. H. Mosenthal (1854); Deutsche Lyrik aus Österreich seit Grillparzer, ed. C. Hoffman (1912); Lyrik aus Deutschösterreich—Vom Mittelalter bis zur Gegenwart, ed. S. Hock (1919); Die Botschaft, ed. E. A. Reinhardt (1920); Anthologie österr. Lyrik, ed. E. Rieger (1931); Die Gruppe, ed. F. Sacher (1932, 1935); Österr. Lyrik der Gegenwart, ed. R. Brasch and R. Schäfer (1934); Der ewige Kreis, ed. O. Brandt (1935); Vom Expressionismus zur neuen Klassik. Deutsche Lyrik aus Österreich, ed. J. Pfandler (1936); Um Zeitliches und Ewiges, ein Querschnitt durch Österreichs kämpferische Lyrik, ed. R. and A. Mühlher (1947); Österr. Lyrik aus neun Jh., ed. W. Stratowa; Unsterbliches Lied, Hausbuch österr. Lyrik, ed. F. Sacher (1948); Das Herz ist deine Heimat, ed. R. Felmayer (1956); Österr. Lyrik nach 1945, ed. E. Schönwiese, 1960.

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: J. W. Nagl, J. Zeidler, E. Castle, Deutschösterreich. Literaturgeschichte (4 v., 1899–1937); F. Sacher, Die neue Lyrik in Österreich (1932); A. v. Schmidt, Einführung in die Gesch. der deutschen Dichtung in Österreich (2d ed., 1947); E. Waldinger, "Die österr. Lyrik zwischen 1918 u. 1938," Erbe und Zukunft, 3 (1947); J. Nadler, Literaturgesch. Österreichs (2d ed., 1951); A. Schmidt, Dichtung und Dichter Österreichs im 19. und 20. Jh. (1964).

T.O.B.

AUTO SACRAMENTAL. An allegorical play in one act that deals with the mystery of the Eucharist, usually performed on a float or an especially constructed platform, in the public square, on the feast of Corpus Christi, in Spain. The characters of the autos are allegorical and represent abstract concepts like virtues, vices, the World, Sin, Everyman, Hope, Faith, Free Will, etc.

During the Middle Ages the word auto was used for any dramatic piece, religious as well as profane. Toward the beginning of the 16th c., however, the word came to be applied exclusively to religious plays and eventually to those religious plays that treated the miracle of transubstantiation so that around the middle of the same century the autos already show all the features that are part of the autos sacramentales. The autos are written in verse and contain a variety of metrical forms. Very often some of the best poetry of the age is found in the autos.

Although most of the leading playwrights of the Sp. Golden Age, like Lope de Vega, Tirso de Molina, etc., wrote autos sacramentales, the unsurpassed writer of autos is considered to be Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1600–81). The date of his death coincides with the beginning of the rapid decline of the genre.—Calderón: Three Plays, ed. G. T. Northup (1926); A. Parker, The Allegorical Drama of Calderón (1943); B. W. Wardropper, "The Search for a Dramatic Formula for the Autos Sacramentales," PMLA, 65 (1950) and Introducción al teatro religioso del siglo de oro (1953); E. Frutos Cortés, La filosofía de Calderón en sus autos sacramentales (1952); A. Valbuena Prat, Historia del teatro español (1956); J. L. Flecniakoska, La formation de l' "auto" religieux en Espagne avant Calderón (1961).

R.M.I.

AUTOTELIC (Gr. autos, "self," and telos, "end,"—i.e., a work of art or poem having an end-purpose in itself). See POETRY, THEORIES OF (OBJECTIVE THEORIES).

AWDL. The most highly regarded form of Welsh bardic composition. The "chair" of the National Eisteddfod of Wales is awarded for an awdl. The word, originally a variant of odl (rhyme) came to mean, successively, the stave bearing the rhyme, a run of monorhyming lines, a complete poem in monorhyme, a poem entirely in certain specified a. meters and, since the 15th c., a poem of some length in cynganedd (q.v.) and in one or more of the "24 strict metres" including at least some portions not in cywydd or englyn (qq.v.). Many of the best Welsh poems of the last two centuries, as in the medieval period, are awdlau. Among a. meters are (a) rhybynt, a 12-syllable line of 3 sections, each of 4 syllables, the first section rhyming with the second, and a consonantal correspondence woven around the main stresses of the second and third sections, and the twelfth syllable bearing the main rhyme: "Iawn o'i berchi i baw erchi o bob eirchiad"; (b) long rhybynt (16 syllables and 4 sections); (c) cyhydedd naw ban, a 9-syllable line; and (d) hir a thoddaid (long and blending)—a special pattern of 10-syllable lines with its own rhyme scheme and accentuation.—

Morris-Jones; Parry. D.M.L.

B

BACCHIUS (also called bacchiacus or bacchiac). A unit of verse composed of 1 short syllable followed by 2 long ones, — — —. The name supposedly derives from the use of the unit in ancient Gr. religious songs to the god Bacchus. Although comparatively rare in Gr. lyric verse, it appears frequently in L. poetry, especially in the plays of Plautus, e.g.,

nām vōx mē | p̄cānt (um h)ūc | fōrās
ēx|cītāvit
(Rudens 260f.)

where, as sometimes happens, the first syllable is a longa irrationalis. In L. verse the unit occurs usually in tetrameters, though sometimes it will be combined with spondees and iambs for a line of verse. The Romans felt it to be especially suitable for a serious and solemn style. Eng. poetry is said to admit the unit in such words as "aboveboard" where the second and third syllables receive about the same amount of stress. But the term is really appropriate to ancient quantitative poetry.—W. M. Lindsay, Early L. Verse (1922); P. Maas, Griechische Metrik (1929); Dale; G. E. Duckworth, The Nature of Roman Comedy (1952); Crusius. R.A.H.

BALADA. A Prov. dance song, of no fixed form, but with a refrain, which was often repeated several times in a stanza. The b. is hardly to be distinguished from the dansa by any objective criterion.—F. Diez, Die Poesie der Troubadours (2d ed. by K. Bartsch, 1883). F.M.C.

BALLAD. The "folk," "popular," or "traditional" b. is a short narrative song preserved and transmitted orally among illiterate or semilliterate people. Story-songs of this kind have been collected in all European countries, and though each national balladry has its distinctive characteristics, certain constants hold for all bona fide specimens: (1) Ballads focus on a single crucial episode or situation. The ballad begins usually at a point where the action is decisively directed toward its catastrophe. Events leading up to this crucial and conclusive episode are told in a hurried, summary fashion. Little attention is given to describing settings; indeed, circumstantial detail of every sort is conspicuously absent. (2) Ballads are dramatic. We are not told about things happening; we are shown them happening. Every artistic resource of the genre is pointed toward giving an intensity and immediacy to the action and toward heightening the emotional impact of the climax. Protagonists are allowed to speak for themselves, which means, of course, that dialogue bulks large in ballads. At strategic moments, dialogue erupts into the narrative. Such speeches are sparingly tagged; we must frequently deduce the speaker from what is being said. (3) Ballads are impersonal. The narrator seldom allows his own subjective attitude toward the events to intrude. Comments on motives are broad, general, detached. There may be an "I" in a ballad, but the singer does not forget that he is the deputy of the public voice and is not speaking from private judgment. Bias there is in ballads, of course, but it is the bias of a party, community, or nation, not an individual's particularistic point of view.

Stylistically the ballad is a species apart. This is because the b., like folk song in general but unlike all the literary genres, is an oral phenomenon, and, as a consequence, preserves traces of the archaic modes of preliterate. The story is the key thing in a b., all other artistic possibilities are subordinated to it. The language is plain and formulaic. A small stock of epithets and adjectives serves for all the ballads in a given language. There are few arresting figures of speech and no self-conscious straining after novel turns of phrase. And because the emphasis is on a single line of action precipitously developed, there is not time in a b. for careful delineation of character or for extensive research into psychological motivation. The heavy amount of repetition and parallelism one finds in the ballads may appear to be merely decorative rhetoric, but it is not so. Repetition in heightened passages was brilliantly explained by Coleridge as the singers' effort to discharge emotion that could not be exhausted in one saying. Much repetition is mnemonic: in a story being recited or sung, crucial facts must be firmly planted in the memory since the hearer cannot turn back a page to refresh himself about a fact that slipped by in a moment of inattention. (Incremental repetition, a rhetorical device in Eng. and Scottish popular ballads for achieving suspense, is discussed separately.)

Between the balladries of Western and Eastern Europe there are marked differences. Except for certain Rumanian ballads, rhyme and assonance are unusual in Slavic territories and in the Balkans, including Greece. The Ukrainian dumy, which assonate, are another exception. Finnish ballads employ alliteration as a binding principle. In Western countries, rhyme or assonance is general. All ballads are essentially narrative poems with a greater or lesser infusion of lyrical elements, and the strength of the lyrical quality is another discriminant in the classification of balladries. As a general rule, strophic (stanzaic) ballads tend to be more lyrical than nonstrophic. Rhyme, assonance, refrains, and short meters further suggest lyricism, as do singability and dance animation. Least lyrical are the viser of Denmark, lengthy, heroic ballads, which upset the criteria just established in employing rhyme and assonance and being stanzaic; the Serbian men's songs on historical and martial topics, written in a heavy pentameter line; the Sp. romances (q.v.), which seem, like the viser, to have been cut down from epic lays, and which, though held together by assonance, are not strophic. Lithuania, Poland, France, Italy, and Scotland possess the most lyrical story-songs. As to metrical schemes, British and Scandinavian ballads use a couplet of 4 stresses to the line or the common meter quatrain; an octosyllabic line is the staple of Sp., Bulgarian, Rumanian, and much German b. poetry; France and allied b. territory (Catalonia, Northern Italy, Portugal) take as standard a verse of 12 or 16 syllables broken into 2 equal members which rhyme or assonate with one another; the scansion of the Rus. byliny (q.v.) is free and highly irregular—the musical phrasing governing the organization of the verse.

The charms of British balladry were first brought to the attention of the lettered and learned world in the 18th c. During the period 1790–1830 many important recordings from tradition were made. F. J. Child, a professor at Harvard, made the definitive thesaurus of British popular ballads (1882–98), printing 305 ballads, some in as many as 25 versions. In this century, about 125 of Child's ballads have been recovered in the United States and Canada from the descendants of 18th-c. immigrants from the British Isles. Judas, the oldest b. in Child's collection, was recorded in a manuscript of about 1300. It deals with the betrayal of Christ. There are a few other religious ballads, mostly concerned with the miracles of the Virgin, but these are far outnumbered by the pieces dealing with the pagan supernatural, like Tam Lin, The Wife of Usher's Well, Lady Isabel and the Elf-Knight, etc. In America the supernatural elements in these ballads has been deleted or rationalized. The commonest b. theme is tragic love of a sensational and violent turn (Earl Brand, Barbara Allen, Childe Maurice). Incest and other domestic crimes are surprisingly common. The troubles on the Border in the 15th and 16th c. inspired a precious body of sanguine heroic ballads (Johnny Armstrong, Hobie Noble, Edom o'Gordon), many of which are partly historical. Most other historical ballads are the work of minstrels and transparently urge the causes of the minstrels' noble patrons. Propaganda seems also to inform the Robin Hood ballads, which exalt the virtues of the yeoman class.

The origin of the British popular ballads has been hotly argued among b. scholars. A school known as individualists (John Meier, Louise Pound) assert that all ballads are the work of individual poets and are "popular" merely in having been taken up by the folk. Communalists (F. B. Gummere, W. M. Hart, G. L. Kittredge) insist that the prototypical b. was concocted in assemblies of the folk in the exultations of choral dance. Current opinion concedes that the traits of "balladness" may be explained by the communal theory, but holds that all extant ballads are the work of individuals originally. As the individualists failed to understand, however, the work of an individual poet does not become a b. until it is accepted by the folk and remodeled by the b. conventions in the course of its tour in tradition.

Native Am. ballads, influenced partly by the British traditional ballads but mainly by the broadsides, exist alongside the imported ballads. The oldest perhaps is Springfield Mountain, the story of a Yankee farmboy fatally bitten by a snake, which may be pre-Revolutionary. Better known are outlaw songs like Jesse James and Sam Bass, the lumberjack classic The Jam on Gerry's Rock, the cowboys' The Streets of Laredo and the popular favorites Casey Jones, John Henry and Frankie and Albert (Frankie and Johnny). The last three pieces are sometimes classed as Negro ballads, but they are demonstrably the results of collaboration between the races.

Ballads have had an enormous influence on Eng. and German poetry, though Entwistle exaggerates when he writes that "the debt of [romantic] literature to the ballad has been comparable to that of the Renaissance to the Greek and Latin classics." The early 18th-c. imitations, Thomas Tickell's Lucy and Colin, for example, patterned themselves on broadsides and dealt mainly with village tragedies. Wordsworth and Hardy pursued a similar vein in much of their b.-colored poetry. Percy, the editor of the famous Reliques (1765), sentimentalized and prettified the b. style in The Hermit of Warkworth, but some of his completions of genuine fragments were reasonably faithful. His reconstruction of Sir Cauline lent many touches to Coleridge's Christabel. Scott's poetic career began with a translation of Bürger's Lenore, a German b. imitation, and he concocted several counterfeit ballads in early years, but he eventually came to feel that ballad impersonality and the stylization of b. language were contrary to the aesthetic of composed poetry. In the b.-like poems of Coleridge, Keats, Rossetti, Meredith, and Swinburne, we see the popular b. style being crossed with borrowings from medieval romances and from minstrel poetry to yield poems of richer texture, more circumstantial and more contrivedly dramatic than are the ballads. La Belle Dame Sans Merci and The Ancient Mariner, perhaps the finest of the so-called imitations, could never pass for the genuine article though greater poems than any b. Yeats's ballads (Moll Magee, Father Gilligan, etc.) are ballads only in stanza structure and simplicity; they do not employ stock language or the rhetoric peculiar to traditional song.

Herder's encouragement of folk song collecting resulted in Arnim and Brentano's Des Knaben Wunderhorn (1805-8), a collection which exerted an almost tyrannical influence over the German lyric all through the 19th c. Many of the best shorter poems of Heine, Mörike, Chamisso, Eichendorff, Uhland, and Liliencron purposely resemble Volkslieder. The narrative element in these poems is usually so completely overwhelmed by the lyrical that they would hardly be considered ballads by Eng. standards. See also FOLK SONG.

Child's collection cited above amalgamates the British collections to 1898. The Traditional Tunes of the Child Ballads have been edited by B. H. Bronson. The first v. appeared in 1958; the second in 1962; two others are projected. T. P. Coffin, The British Traditional B. in America (1950) documents the survival of Child's ballads. For Eng. collections to 1952, the most important of which are edited by C. J. Sharp, see M. Dean-Smith, A Guide to Eng. Folk Song Collections (1954). The most valuable post-Child Scottish collection is G. Grieg's Last Leaves of Traditional Ballads (1925). The European field is surveyed in W. J. Entwistle, European Balladry (1939), which lists the major European collections, among them A. Durán, Romancero general (1849-51), S. Grundtvig and A. Olrik, Danmarks Gamle Folkeviser (1853-1920), L. Erk and F. Böhme, Deutscher Liederhort (3 v., 1893-94), R. Trautmann, Die Volksdichtung der Grossrussen (1935). Of the numerous Am. collections, almost all restricted to particular geographical areas, the best edited are P. Barry and others, British Ballads from Maine (1929) and H. M. Belden, Ballads and Songs . . . Missouri (1940; 1955). A sampling of ballads from the entire Eng.-speaking world is set out in A. B. Friedman, The Viking Book of Folk-Ballads (1956). J. and A. Lomax, Am. Ballads and Folk Songs (1934), restrict themselves to this side of the Atlantic.

Especially valuable critical works are R. Menéndez Pidal, Poesía popular y poesía tradicional (1922), G. H. Gerould, The B. of Tradition (1932), W. Kayser, Gesch. der deutschen Ballade (1936), L. K. Goetz, Volkslied und Volksleben der Kroaten und Serben (1936-37), M. J. C. Hodgart, The Ballads (1950). To be used with caution are F. B. Gummere, The Popular B. (1907) and L. Pound, Poetic Origins and the B. (1921). The relations of the ballads to official poetry 1100-1960 are explored by A. B. Friedman in The B. Revival (1961), which supersedes the works of S. B. Hustvedt. D. K. Wilgus, Anglo-Am. Folksong Scholarship since 1898 (1959), surveys modern b. criticism and collecting techniques. A.B.F.

BALLAD METER, or common meter (The C.M. of the hymnals is roughly the same as ballad meter, except that the beat is more regular because of the deliberate style of singing and the first and third lines usually rhyme). In the characteristic ballad stanza the first and third lines are iambic tetrameter, the second and fourth lines iambic trimeter. Only the second and fourth lines rhyme. A typical quatrain:

The ladies cracked their fingers white,
The maidens tore their hair,
All for the sake of their true loves,
For them they ne'er saw mair.

It has been conjectured that this stanza is actually a couplet composed of two 7-foot lines, the 7-foot line deriving from the septenary (q.v.) of medieval church poetry. The conjecture is borne out to some extent by the musical phrasing of many ballad tunes, for many phrases round themselves over the 7 feet of two lines, ignoring the 4/3/4/3 arrangement of the text. There are so many exceptions to this musical pattern, however, that the conventional practice of printing the ballad stanza as 4 lines is still justified. The stanza is easily managed and is noted for its buoyancy and tunefulness. Folk singers and minstrels as well as the learned poets who have adopted the stanza vary the accentuation of the shorter lines, weighting the line by spondees and lightening it with extra unaccented syllables. An example of the latter effect is Herrick's famous stanza: "Gather ye rosebuds while ye may, / Old Time is still a-flying; / And this same flower that smiles today, / Tomorrow will be dying." Although the 4-line ballad stanza accounts for the form of most folk ballads, some of the more important traditional pieces are sung in tetrameter couplets, usually with an irrelevant refrain weaving among the story lines. F. J. Child, G. L. Kittredge, and other ballad scholars considered the tetrameter couplet the older ballad stanza.—See, for a brief discussion, G. H. Gerould, The Ballad of Tradition (1932), 124–30. Fuller is J. W. Hendren, A Study of Ballad Rhythm (1936).

A.B.F.

BALLADE. The most important of the so-called OF forms and the dominant verse form of Fr. poetry in the 14th and 15th c. The most common type of b. is made up of three 8-line stanzas rhyming ababbcbC and a 4-line envoi (q.v.) rhyming bcbC. As the capital letters indicate, the last line of the first stanza serves as the refrain, being repeated as the last line of each stanza and also of the envoi. In the tightness of its rhyme scheme and in its use of the refrain, the b. is one of the most exacting of verse forms. Some variants of the standard b. utilize 10- or (less often) 12-line stanzas and 5- or 6-line envois in place of the more common 8- and 4-line arrangements. The envoi, which frequently begins with the address "Prince" (a derivation from the medieval literary compositions at which the judge was so addressed), forms the climactic summation of the poem.

Although the b. may have developed from some Prov. form, it was standardized in Fr. by such 14th-c. poets as Guillaume de Machaut, Eustache Deschamps, and, less so, Jean Froissart. It was carried to perfection in the 15th c. by Christine de Pisan, Charles d'Orléans, and, most of all, François Villon, who made the b. the vehicle for the greatest of early Fr. poetry. Such works as his B. des pendus (B. of the Hanged) and his B. des dames du temps jadis (B. of Ladies of Times Gone By) achieved an unequaled intensity in their use of refrain and envoi. The b. continued in favor until the time of Marot in the early 16th c., but the poets of the Pléiade, as well as their neoclassical successors in the 17th c., had little use for the form and regarded it as a barbaric survival. Both Molière and Boileau made contemptuous allusions to the b.

The b. of the great Fr. period was imitated in England by Chaucer and Gower, but it never established itself firmly in that country. In the later 19th c. a group of Eng. poets, including Austin Dobson, Andrew Lang, and W. E. Henley, revived the form with enthusiasm, inspired perhaps by the example of Théodore de Banville in France. But the later b., with the possible exception of a few of Swinburne's, has not even aimed at the grandeur and scope of Villon; it has been essentially a delicate and artificial exercise for light or polite versifiers.

The double b. is composed of six 8-line stanzas or six 10-line stanzas. The refrain is included but the envoi is optional.—Kastner; P. Champion, Hist. poétique du XVe s. (2 v., 1923); J. Fox, The Poetry of Villon (1962).

BARD. A poet among the ancient Celtic peoples, whose function it was to celebrate the heroes, victories, or laws of the nation. By extension, in modern usage, any poet, though the term has often been applied to specific poets, notably Shakespeare and Milton.

The term (Welsh, bardd; Ir., bard) is used by the later L. writers, Lucan, for example, to describe the poets of Gaul and Britain. The bards, who constituted an entire separate social class with hereditary privileges, became extinct in Gaul at a relatively early date, but their existence in Ireland and Scotland until the 18th c. and in Wales, in some respects, until the present day supplies many details as to their organization.

The 10th-c. Welsh code of Hywel Dda, with its division of the bardic class into three categories, the pencerdd (chief of song), the bardd teulu (household bard), and the cerddor (minstrel), suggests the earlier Ir. distinction of druid, filid, and baird. These groups ultimately fell together under the classification bard as their separate functions merged.

The Welsh festivals or contests of poetry, known as Eisteddfodau (sing. Eisteddfod, q.v.) continued until the reign of Elizabeth I and were revived in 1822, since which date they have been regularly held. In modern Welsh usage, a bard is a poet who has participated in an Eisteddfod.

The art of the bards was essentially social in function, related to the life, traditions, and ideals of the community. Hence, it is in actuality far removed from the personal, lyric emotionalism connected with the term by the 18th-c. Eng. poets, such as Gray and Beattie, who revived it.—E. C. Quiggin, Prolegomena to the Study of the Later Ir. Bards 1200–1500 (1914); H. I. Bell, The Development of Welsh Poetry (1936); G. Murphy, "Bards and Filidh," Éigse, 2 (1940); J. J. Parry, "The Court Poets of the Welsh Princes," PMLA, 67 (1952).

F.J.W.; A.P.

BARDOLATRY. Literally, "worship of poets." The word was coined by George Bernard Shaw in the preface to Three Plays for Puritans (1901). Shaw used the term satirically to describe the adulation of Shakespeare which he felt was having a stifling effect on Eng. drama.—For a different point of view, see R. B. Heilman, "Bardolatry," Yale Rev., 50 (1961).

A.R.B.

BAROQUE describes the style that prevailed in European literature between, roughly, 1580 and 1680; from the Gerusalemme Liberata to the last autos of Calderón. For those who view Western literature as a whole, and whose concern is to find a period term for the literary style between the decline of the Renaissance and the rise of the Enlightenment, no other word is as convenient. Indeed, no other could now be imposed. B. is by no means universally accepted as the sole designation for the period; considerable opposition to its use comes from partisans of separate national literatures. Since the term is embattled, and perhaps always will be, it is necessary to deal with its etymological origin and with the history of its application to the arts and to literature. Once a settlement of these questions is generally accepted, it will then be possible to liberate the term from its wayward origins, to lay the ghost of its past, and proceed to investigate the traits of the period style which it designates.

HISTORY OF THE WORD. The usual derivation of "b." from barroco (Portuguese: "irregular pearl") and eventually verruca (L.: "declivity," "wart") will have to be abandoned. Not only is the linguistic evidence untenable, but also there is practically no textual support. Instead, a good case can be made out for deriving the word from the mnemonic hexameters constructed in the 13th c. by William of Shyreswood as a code version of Aristotle's categories of syllogisms. The early history of the word can be traced by putting together citations from writers like St. Bernardine, Vives, Erasmus, Montaigne, Ferrari, Soldani, Saint-Simon, and others. In all these instances the word baroco was singled out as representing the absurd or grotesque pedantry of late medieval logic-chopping.

HISTORY OF THE CONCEPT. Until the later 19th c., "b." was used mostly as a fancy synonym for "absurd" or "grotesque." On occasion one finds it used in the older way: Baudelaire, for example, addressing the city of Paris, speaks of "Tes petits orateurs, aux enflures baroques, / Prêchant l'amour" ("Projet d'épilogue pour la seconde éd. des Fleurs du Mal"). The art historians J. Burckhardt (1855) and H. Wölfflin (1888) began the rehabilitation of the term, the first giving it historical limits and the second freeing it of pejorative associations. It was quickly accepted in art history as a necessary term to designate the period after the High Renaissance; in fact, in the early part of the century, the succession of period styles was made more precise by the definition of an intermediate style between High Renaissance and b., to which the name "mannerism" was given. As far as literature is concerned, the first application of the concept b. was made in 1888 by Wölfflin, who, in his Renaissance und Barock, sketched a stylistic contrast between Ariosto (Renaissance) and Tasso (b.), based on the opening stanzas of Orlando Furioso and Gerusalemme Liberata. He further suggested that the same sort of contrast exists between Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato and Berni's rifacimento of it. From Boiardo to Tasso he traces a continuous trend away from clear visual imagination toward mood and atmosphere ("weniger Anschauung, mehr Stimmung"). Though literary historians were long in responding, it is from Wölfflin's contrast that we can date the beginnings of interest in b. as a literary concept.

Because of its enormous success, the concept of b. in art history has continued to exert strong influence on its literary counterpart. In 1922 Theophil Spoerri wrote a thorough study, Renaissance und Barock bei Ariost und Tasso, which attempted to fill Wölfflin's prescription. By this time Wölfflin had also published his Kunstgeschichtliche Grundbegriffe (May 1915; Eng. tr. Principles of Art History [1932]), which set forth categories (such as closed versus open form, linear versus painterly) for distinguishing between Renaissance and b. styles in art. Some have been tempted to apply the categories almost directly to literature, while others have emulated them at a distance. An instance of the former would be D. H. Roaten and F. Sánchez y Escribano, Wölfflin's Principles in Sp. Drama: 1500-1700 (1952); and of the latter, I. Buffum, Agrippa d'Aubigné's Les Tragiques: A Study of the B. Style in Poetry (1951). Buffum takes his point of departure from Wölfflin, as well as purely literary devices such as asyndeton, verbal echo, and oxymoron, and arrives at general characteristics like forcefulness, theatricality, and mutability. With his Four Stages of Renaissance Style (1955), W. Sypher increases the indebtedness to Wölfflin. He undertakes to include both literature and art in a set of general stylistic categories drawn from Wölfflin and others. By means of them he attempts to distinguish his four styles: Renaissance (e.g., Spenser); mannerism (Hamlet, Lear); b. (Othello, Paradise Lost); late-b. (Dryden, Racine).

In varying degrees the debtors to Wölfflin show their awareness of the great difficulties in transferring art categories of style to literature. But in the end the difficulties remain unsolved. More independent attempts to define b. style in literature, based solely on literary aesthetics, have yielded results. Among the first was Fritz Strich, who in 1916 proposed that the use of the rhetorical figure asyndeton (Worthäufung) was the most characteristic element of b. style, at least in German poetry. In 1929 H. Hatzfeld, in his analysis of the religious lyric in France, went beyond rhetorical or syntactical devices and derived what he found to be characteristic motifs or themes, such as veiled antithesis (Schleierantithese) and solitude (tout-seul-Formel). Later, in his book Literature Through Art: A New Approach to Fr. Literature (1952), Hatzfeld undertook to establish other motifs common to literature and art of the b.: renunciation, resignation, boundlessness, to name a few.

STATUS OF B. IN IMPORTANT NATIONAL LITERATURES. (1) Germany: The rapid success of the term among German art historians and the early work of Strich, Viëtor, and others, led to a general acceptance among literary scholars. It is now taken for granted that b. is the proper name for the period embracing, for instance, Grimmelshausen, Gryphius, and Angelus Silesius. (2) Spain: The old term siglo de oro still competes; but the fact that the "century" lasted for considerably more than a hundred years, as well as the renewed interest in the Sp. Renaissance, has opened the way for the use of b. Central figures like Cervantes, Lope de Vega, and Quevedo have been analyzed as b. writers. Góngora, whose rehabilitation began in 1927, is now considered the extreme of b. style. A certain amount of confusion results from the continued use of the term barroquismo, which has pejorative and nontemporal connotations. (3) France: Interest in b. among Fr. critics has arisen mostly since the war. Partly this has come about as a result of reevaluating the traditional concept of classicism and the grand siècle, and partly from a reconsideration of the poets, such as Saint-Amant and Théophile de Viau, inaccurately called précieux. The essays and radical anthologies of Thierry Maulnier and the work of M. Raymond have been influential. So far, apart from the early work of German critics, the most ambitious book has been J. Rousset's La Litt. de l'Âge B. en France: Circé et le paon (1953). (4) Italy: Here the b. was a relative decline. In poetry the important figures are few after Tasso, Marino, Tassoni, and Redi. Most scholarship on Marino and his followers has been concerned with mechanical detail, biography, or influence on Fr., German and Eng. poets of the time. Marinismo is generally deplored as a disease, and B. Croce finds barocco almost synonymous with bad taste.

More recently, however, there has been an upsurge of interest, and no fewer than three congresses on b. have been held since 1954, the latest (Manierismo, Barocco, Rococò) in 1962. In general, the term "b." seems to be accepted as the designation for the whole age. (5) England: Eng. critics have proved the most reluctant to adopt the concept of b. A main source of opposition is the happy coincidence between literary movements and the reigns of kings. The two episodes of the Renaissance in England roughly correspond to the reigns of Henry VIII and Elizabeth, and what elsewhere would be called b. corresponds in its origins to the reign of James I. In Eng. literature we find a special difficulty: the belated flowering of the Renaissance comes so close upon the beginning of the b. that the two styles for a time coexist. Nevertheless, a start has been made in distinguishing the styles, with Morris Croll's early analysis of b. prose style pointing the way.

B. STYLE IN POETRY. Among the least promising ways of approaching the question are to view b. as an eternal phenomenon, recurrent in all ages, or to limit it to the Counter-Reformation, or to depend wholly on the criteria of art history. Far preferable are independent formulations that begin with single works of literature and generalize on the basis of their purely literary traits. Among these we may consider rhetorical figures such as metaphor, the element of time, the dramatic situation of the poem, and the implied world view.

A common way of describing b. poetic style is to say that it abounds in conceits (concetti, conceptos), that is, puns or unusual similes. As examples, there is Donne's image of the compass and Marino's statement that if he cannot enjoy sleep he will at least enjoy the image of death (which is, of course, sleep). But it can be urged that such expressions represent habits of thought known in the Middle Ages and Renaissance: e.g., the pen as plowing furrows on the page or Petrarch's "I burn and am as ice." Some critics have tried to show that Eng. metaphysical poetry is characterized by extended metaphors running through the poem, but they have been effectively countered by L. Unger in Donne's Poetry and Modern Criticism (1950). It may be suggested that the quality of wit makes the difference; but that remains to be shown.

If a poem is looked upon as a communication in time, then time itself becomes an important element of structure. It can be shown that Renaissance poetry is generally simple in its use of tense and time reference, whereas b. poetry exhibits not only explicit awareness of the nature and passage of time but also a tendency to manipulate time and exploit its paradoxes.

The dramatic situation of a poem can be defined as the interaction between the speaker, the audience, and the reader. In Renaissance poetry, generally speaking, an attitude is expressed and then elaborated. In b. poetry, to state the contrast starkly, a tentative attitude is expressed and then, through interaction of the several dramatis personae, it is gradually modified until in the end a new attitude is achieved.

A final possible criterion is the so-called world-view of b. poetry. B. poetry often attempts to cover the enormous range between religious sentiments and libertinage, beauty and ugliness, egocentricity and impersonality, temporality and eternity. It is not surprising that such issues should arise in b. poetry; whatever their antiquity, they were presented with new immediacy by thinkers like Montaigne, Descartes, and Hobbes. We may look to Montaigne for a touchstone: "Je ne peins pas l'être; je peins le passage." Commonly words like disequilibrium and disillusionment (desengaño) are used of the period. If they are adopted, it may be considered that they express transitory resolutions of the problem of opposites.

It must be emphasized that a theory of b. poetic style ought to strike a balance between the general and the particular; that it ought to be able to account for the major works of the time in such a way as to distinguish their style significantly from what preceded and what succeeded them.

F. Strich, "Der lyrische Stil des 17. Jh.," Abhandlungen zur deutschen Literaturgesch. Festschrift für Franz Muncker (1916); H. Hatzfeld, Don Quixote als Wortkunstwerk (1927) and "Der Barockstil der religiösen klassischen Lyrik in Frankreich," Literaturwissenschaftliches Jahrbuch der Görresgesellschaft, 4 (1929); K. Viëtor, Probleme der dt. Barocklit. (1928); B. Croce, Storia della età barocca in Italia (1929); M. W. Croll, "The B. Style in Prose," Studies in Eng. Philology . . . in Honor of F. Klaeber, ed. K. Malone and M. B. Ruud (1929); W. P. Friederich, Spiritualismus und Sensualismus in der englischen Barocklyrik (1932); R. Wellek, "The Concept of B. in Lit. Scholarship," JAAC, 5 (1946); M. Mincoff, "B. Lit. in England," Annuaire de l'Université de Sofia, Faculté Historico-Phil., 43 (1947); C. Calcaterra, "Il Problema del Barocco," Problemi ed orientamenti critici di lingua e di lett. ital., ed. A. Momigliano (1949); Revue des sciences humaines (numéro spécial), fasc. 55-66 (1949), containing articles by the institutors of B. in France, M. Raymond, R. Lebègue, etc.; O. de Mourgues, Metaphysical, B. and Précieux Poetry (1953); L. Nelson, "Góngora and Milton: Toward a Definition of the B.," CL, 6 (1954) and B. Lyric Poetry (1961); F. Strich, "Die Übertragung des Barockbegriffes von der bildenden Kunst auf die Dichtung," Die Kunstformen des Barockzeitalters, ed. R. Stamm (1956); I. Buffum, Studies in the B. from Montaigne to Rotrou (1957); A. Cioranescu, El barroco (1957); M. Praz, The Flaming Heart (1958); H. Hatzfeld, "Use and Misuse of 'B.' as a Critical Term in Lit. Hist.," Univ. of Toronto Quarterly, 31 (1962). See also J. Rousset, "La Définition du terme 'B.,'" Intern. Comparative Lit. Assoc. Proc. of the Third Congress (1962); R. Daniells, Milton, Mannerism and B. (1963); R. Wellek, Concepts of Crit., ed. S. G. Nichols, Jr. (1963; see "Postscript 1962" to b.). L.N.

BAROQUE POETICS. It could hardly be claimed that the baroque age was original and productive in elaborating a theory of poetry. Actually, it inherited, modified, and passed on to the age of neoclassicism the formulations of the Renaissance: Castelvetro, Scaliger, Minuturno, and others (see RENAISSANCE POETICS) had placed Aristotle in the center of importance where he went almost unchallenged until the stirrings of the romantic revolution. B. poetics, therefore, derived its theory ultimately from the precepts of Aristotle, with a varying admixture of Horatian loci and rhetorical dicta: poetry is both useful and pleasing, the poet must possess the faculty of invention, poetry is related to the real world in that it is an imitation of nature, art is in some way distinct from nature and yet it cannot transgress the norms nature imposes, the poet should be good as well as eloquent. Only in matters of emphasis can a few theoreticians be called original.

Apart from exposition of theory, treatises of the time often had ulterior motives: to reaffirm the worth and dignity of poetry, to provide a didactic guide or handbook to poetic practice, and to make a case for poetry in the vernacular. Such purposes had also been served by Renaissance "defenses" and "arts of poetry"; in fact, there seems little new in most of the many b. treatises of the kind. Martin Opitz' Buch von der deutschen Poeterey (1624), for example, is heavily indebted to Ronsard and Heinsius, among others. Likewise, Ben Jonson's Timber, or Discoveries (first published in 1641) is almost wholly derivative from classical and Renaissance sources. For the most part their fame as critics is due to their chronological originality within the hypothetically closed system of a national literature. On the other hand, Jonson's opinions as recorded in his Conversations (1619) with Drummond of Hawthornden are refreshingly pungent and personal. Though they are hardly argued criticism, they surpass in interest, because of their sharp and imperious phrasing, the many "roll calls" (to use Spingarn's term) from Cervantes' Viaje del Parnaso (1614) to Boileau's historical sketch of poetry in his Art poétique (1674).

As the 17th c. progressed there was a trend, parallel with the growing influence of Fr. critics, toward stricter and stricter interpretation of neoclassical doctrine. At the same time, several relatively new concepts were given some prominence; relatively new, because in one form or another they could be found anticipated in the Renaissance. In general, they had to do with the "ineffable" in art, the phenomena which escaped traditional analysis. First of all, the notion of taste (gusto, goût) became a means of explaining bewildering differences of opinion among readers and unargued judgments of critics. Its consequences for later criticism are much greater than its prominence in the b. Second, the notion of "wit" or "genius" (ingegno, ingenio, génie or esprit) accounted for the inventive faculty (corresponding to "fancy" or the later "imagination"). The obvious problem presented itself: could a poet without "wit" but possessed of skill write satisfactory poetry; and could a poet with "wit" but without skill do the same? One must keep in mind, while following the word "wit" through its many convolutions, that its meanings, ranging from "ingeniousness" to "imagination," ultimately depend upon the L. substratum ingenium and its customary contrast with iudicium or "judgment." A third important concept evolved during the age was the je ne sais quoi (in the later phrase of Pope, the "grace beyond the reach of art"). It is a vague recognition that the "rules" (q.v.) did not account for everything. Later in the century it may be seen to be related to the new interest in the "sublime" which brought about the resuscitation of Longinus. Again, its substratum is the Latin nescio quid; but it is important to observe that the common locution has become almost a technical term. In most instances, however, these relatively new concepts did not receive thorough exposition and analysis until the age of neoclassicism proper.

It is true that there were conservative and liberal interpretations of the rules. There were, in the major European literatures, proponents of the strictest observance (e.g., La Mesnardière, el Pinciano) whose appeal to authority was as dogmatic as it was inadequate. On the other hand, there were independent interpreters of the ancients whose "liberalism" has sometimes been given exaggerated importance. Nothing will make up for the obvious lack of original theory in the age, especially at a time when new modes of lyric poetry and the drama, not to mention the novel, were being created. In England, for instance, Shakespeare, Milton, and Donne had varying receptions at the hands of different critics, but none, despite often recognized excellence, was properly explicated or accounted for by contemporary criticism. The less revolutionary Corneille caused a split in orthodoxy; and even Racine was attacked. Lope de Vega felt himself within the bounds of a liberal classicism, and yet his practice in writing the seemingly hybrid form of the Sp. comedia was censured by the strict. In general, it may be said that the critics, as so often happens, were unprepared for novelty: their ready-made theory gave them the hardihood to reject anything for which they could not cite precedent; mere mechanical conformity often received their highest praise.

It is a custom to view Fr. literature at times as a long sequence of controversies or "quarrels." Certainly there is one whose importance cannot be denied and whose international consequences are part of the aesthetics of the age: the quarrel of the ancients and the moderns. The problem of "imitation" (in many of the possible meanings of that unfortunate translation of mimesis) led illogically to the problem of how and with what fidelity to "imitate" the ancients, which in turn led illogically to the question of whether the ancients were superior to the moderns. Though the most interesting consequences of that quarrel belong to the succeeding age, it must be recognized that the dispute was already implicit in the tenets of Renaissance neoclassicism, and that it was the newly expounded notion of "progress" that brought it into prominence.

In the larger context of aesthetics and philosophical systems one may find plausible reasons for the absence of an original poetics and for the prevailing poetic practice of the time. Generally speaking, the rationalist cast of thought in Bacon and Descartes required a separation between reason and imagination, thought and feeling. Hence a theoretical "distrust of the imagination" and a "dissociation of sensibility" (q.v.). But Descartes's neglect of aesthetics and Bacon's perfunctory consideration of poetry had no immediate effect on poetics. Whether the anti-Aristotelian reformer, Petrus Ramus, whose works on dialectic (1555, 1556) long remained textbooks, actually influenced poetic practice by making the elements of poetry a part of logic rather than rhetoric, remains a difficult, perhaps wrongly posed, problem. There is a danger in mistaking mere reshufflings of terms and categories for real innovation, just as there is a danger in assuming that poets wrote their poetry according to prescription. Nevertheless, it is obvious that b. poetry is characterized by intricacy and ingeniousness and that the most original poetics of the time were influenced by rhetoric and dialectic, whether the classical-medieval tradition or the newer systems.

Before surveying the major countries, it is appropriate to recall what was in the common heritage, common above all because most of it was in L. Horace was of course immediately available; Aristotle's Poetics was in L. and commented and presented by, for instance, Castelvetro; Vida and Scaliger, too, were in the learned language. They also had in common the rhetorical tradition which, unlike the tradition of poetics, had gone unbroken from antiquity through the Middle Ages. In fact, before Aristotle became ascendant in the middle of the 16th c., the poetics were heavily dependent on rhetorical theory. That dependence continued, and can be clearly seen in, for example, Puttenham, Gracián, and Tesauro.

Within Fr. literature of the 17th c. it would be possible to make an elaborate and microscopic analysis of the fortune of various parts of the neoclassical canon, from Malherbe to Boileau. There would, predictably, be the liberals and the conservatives, but the basic theory would appear quite static. If one were to conceive of neoclassicism in the most rigid fashion, it would then be easy to cull eccentric opinions and label them anticlassical (or, as Spingarn does, "romantic"); but the whole question would have been formulated falsely. As for the relation between poetry and theory, it may be said that only as poets began to conform to the "rules" did a rapprochement come about. B. poetic theory was certainly powerless to deal with D'Aubigné or even Théophile de Viau. Its precepts, however, could be made to fit more conservative poets, such as Malherbe and Voiture. Even the doctrines of préciosité (q.v.) are more an evidence of neoclassical purism than a defense of novel poetic practice. The triumph of current theory, in a sense its proof after the fact, were the great tragedies of Racine.

In England, aside from occasional comments by Jonson or Milton or other poets (Carew's, in his Elegy upon the Death of Doctor Donne, are the most perceptive), perhaps the greatest interest to be found in b. poetics is the question of epic poetry. It is presented most fully in the exchange between William Davenant and Thomas Hobbes in regard to the former's epic Gondibert (1650). Davenant makes the conventional remarks about the epic, and argues that it is proper for him to write on a Christian subject, especially for the purpose of "instruction." True, he allows for effects beyond the rules ("shadowings, happy strokes, secret graces"), but we have seen that b. neoclassicism quickly granted such "liberties." A great deal of the treatise is directed toward demonstrating the moral efficacy of poetry; in fact, he comes close to the reductio ad absurdum of neoclassical criticism, the sugar-coated pill theory of poetry. Hobbes's answer is hardly more than a perfunctory agreement. One turns in vain to Cowley's "Preface to Poems" (1668) for some sketch of a poetics of the "Metaphysicals"; unfortunately, the few hints of theory are quite traditional. Nor do Henry Peacham's chapter on poetry in The Compleat Gentleman (1622) or Henry Reynolds's Mythomystes (1633?) arouse more than antiquarian interest.

In Italy there is some rapprochement between contemporary practice and theory. From letters and poetic passages of Marino (see MARINISM) one can derive a few traits of a primitive theory of poetry. Its purpose is hardly to instruct at all: it tries to please, to play upon the senses, to be an end in itself. The goal of the good poet is to astonish or dazzle his readers by the brilliance and opulence of his descriptions and turns of phrase. The only important treatise is Emanuele Tesauro's Cannocchiale aristotelico (1654), which is more a handbook of rhetoric than a poetics. It can be seen as representing the old rhetorical tradition; yet its emphasis on wit and the conceit is relatively novel. Of similar interest is Matteo Pellegrini's Delle acutezze (1639).

In Spain the situation is generally as elsewhere: liberals and conservatives manipulate the same counters. There is some novelty and interest in Gracián's treatise Agudeza y Arte de Ingenio (1642, 1648), which can be set in the same tradition as Tesauro's. Essentially, it is an elaborate and not always consistent classification of kinds of wit (ingenio). With great patience and perseverance it attempts to categorize and exemplify the "ingenious" effects achieved by poets ever since antiquity, with special pride of place for such contemporaries as the Argensolas and Góngora. In the main, however, its theory is traditional: there is a sort of poetic substance on which the poet attaches his "ornament" and the "ornament" is a local achievement which is almost seen as independent of the total poem. Gracián's work is mostly a commented anthology of "ingenious" poems and passages.

It could not be gainsaid that there are points of particular interest in b. poetics, such as the development of some important concepts (taste, wit, the je ne sais quoi) and a new comprehension of poetics and rhetoric (e.g., Tesauro and Gracián, and the somewhat exaggerated influence of Ramus). But we must conclude that it was unsuccessful in elaborating an original theory of poetry, that it fails to account for the poetic practice of the age, and that its main importance is to transmit the canons of neoclassical criticism from the Renaissance to the full flowering and achievement of the age of neoclassicism.

SOME ADDITIONAL PRIMARY WORKS: P. de

BATTLE OF THE ANCIENTS AND MODERNS

Deimier, L'Académie de l'art poétique (1610); J. Chapelain, Preface to Marino's L'Adone (1623); P. de la Mesnardière, Poétique (1639).—G. Chapman, Prefaces to his Homer (1610-16?); B. Jonson, "To the memory of my beloved the author, Mr. William Shakespeare" (1623); W. Alexander, Anacrisis (1634?).—G. Galilei, Considerazioni al Tasso and Postille all'Ariosto (ca. 1600); T. Boccacini, Ragguagli di Parnaso (1613); A. Tassoni, Pensieri diversi (1620).—L. A. de Carvalho, El cisme de Apolo (1602); L. Carrillo de Sotomayor, Libro de la erudición poética (1611); C. Suárez de Figueroa, El pasajero (1617); J. de Jáuregui, Discurso poético (1623).

GENERAL WORKS: M. Menéndez y Pelayo, Historia de las ideas estéticas en España (9 v., unfinished, 1883-91); J. E. Spingarn, A Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the Renaissance (1899) and Crit. Essays of the 17th C. (3 v., 1909); B. Croce, Estetica (1902; best Eng. ed. 1922) and "I trattatisti italiani del Concettismo e Bal-tasar Gracián," Problemi di estetica (1909); H. Gillot, La Querelle des anciens et des modernes en France (1914); Bray, G. Marzot, L'Ingegno e il genio del seicento (1944); H. T. Sweden-berg, The Theory of the Epic in England, 1650-1800 (1944); Tuve; E.B.O. Borgerhoff, The Freedom of Fr. Classicism (1950); A. Vilanova, "Preceptistas de los siglos xvi y xvii," His-toria general de las literaturas hispánicas, ed. G. Díaz-Plaja, III (1953); M. Raymond, B. et Renaissance poétique (1955); W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England, 1500-1700 (1956); A. J. Smith, "An Examination of Some Claims for Ramism," RES, n.s., 7 (1956); E. Haase, "Zur Bedeutung von 'Je ne sais quoi' im 17. Jh.," Zeitschrift für französische Sprache und Lit., 67 (1956); Wimsatt and Brooks; S. L. Bethell, "The Nature of Metaphysical Wit," Discussions of John Donne, ed. F. Kermode (1962). L.N.

BARZELLETTA. It. verse form originally characterized by an accumulation of unconnected, bizarre, and sometimes senseless subject matter and by haphazard meter and rhyme. By the early 14th c. its epigrammatic qualities were utilized to make the composition a vehicle for moral instruction. By the end of the 14th c. it had assumed truly artistic proportions. Notwithstanding its moral, political, or satirical intent, the b. often remained on the level of the rigmarole full of proverbs or witty didacticisms in 7-syllable couplets or unrhymed pentameters, heptameters, or hendecasyllables with internal rhyme. In the 15th and 16th c. it was known as the frottola-barzelletta, really a sort of ballata, and was much in vogue with courtly poets who used it to sing of their loves or whims in simple meters. The octosyllabic carnival songs of Lorenzo de' Medici afford the most famous ex-amples of these.—V. Pernicone, "Storia e svolgimento della metrica," in Problemi ed orientamenti critici di lingua e di letteratura italiana, ed. A. Momigliano, 2 (1948); Wilkins. A.S.B.

BATHOS (Gr. "profundity" or "height," ac-cording to the point of view, cf. L. altitudo). 1. Though Longinus made b. a synonym of hypsos (the sublime) in On the Sublime 2.1), Pope, who can hardly be supposed ignorant of Longinus' meaning, took a new departure and made it an antonym in his parody of Longinus' treatise, Peri Bathous: or, Martinus Scriblerus His Treatise of the Art of Sinking in Poetry, 1728. The commonest meaning of the word ever since has been that of Pope, namely, an unintentionally ludicrous because ill-managed attempt at elevated expression, in the 18th c. most often an expression of pathos in its wide Aristotelian sense of passion (i.e., any of the passions or emotions), later, of pathos in its more modern, narrower sense of the sad or pitiable. These meanings are obviously accountable in no small measure to the accidental similarity of the two Gr. words, pathos and bathos. Pope illustrates with "Ye Gods! annihilate both Space and Time, / And make two Lovers happy" (ed. E. L. Steeves, 1952, p. 52); Elizabeth Barrett Browning ardently recalls "Our Euripides, the human— / With his droppings of warm tears" (Wine of Cyprus 89-90); and Tennyson misfires with "He suddenly dropt dead of heart-disease" (Sea Dreams 64). A veritable feast of b. is to be enjoyed in "an anthology of bad verse" entitled The Stuffed Owl, selected and ar-ranged by D. B. Wyndham Lewis and C. Lee (1930).

2. The use of the word for a deliberately contrived effect of pathos manqué or any kind of deliberate anticlimax, in the way of irony, gay or serious, is also current, though less common, and is perhaps best avoided. See ANTICLIMAX 2. H.B.

BATTLE OF THE ANCIENTS AND MOD-ERNS. The name given to two more or less specific literary "battles," one in France and a somewhat related one in England, in the last part of the 17th and the earliest part of the 18th c.

The backgrounds are found, first, in the growth in prominence of France and England, especially France, economically and culturally, and the consequent increase of nationalistic pride; and, secondly, in the growth of the sci-entific spirit and the idea of Progress. A cen-tury before the battle proper, the relative value of Fr. as against L. for literary purposes had been argued and explored, most significantly in du Bellay's famous Défense et Illustration (1549). The rise of the Fr. Academy in the first half of the 17th c., and especially the argument over Corneille's Cid in the 1630's indicated how deeply some important Fr. minds were committed to the rules derived from ancient poetry and the Aristotelian tradition. Veneration for Homer reached a height in Discours . . . Moïse et d'Homère in 1604 and in du Souhait's Préface to his translation in 1620. And Descartes' Discours de la Méthode in 1636, with its contempt for the past and its wholehearted faith in rational method, was one of the most important books in the development of the modern spirit. Then the several serious, unsuccessful attempts at Christian epics by Saint-Amand, de Scudéry, and Chapelain also helped to prepare the ground.

The battle can be said to have begun with Desmarests de Saint Sorlin's comments on heroic poetry and the Christian Marvellous in the Préface to his poem Marie-Magdeleine, 1669. In it and Traité pour Juger des Poètes Grecs, Latins, et Français (1670), he speaks for modern, Christian poetry as against the pagan, improbable, immoral, and inelegant epics of Homer and Virgil. In 1676, the year of his death, he formally gave over the defense of the cause to Charles Perrault.

In 1678, Perrault, in his introduction to an edition of Jerusalem Delivered, praised Tasso over the ancients. In 1682, Pierre Bayle's Pensées Diverses sur la Comète, a devastatingly brilliant attack on traditional modes of thinking, came out, and the next year Fontenelle, a précieux popularizer of the ideas of Bayle, published his Dialogue des Morts, where he defends the moderns. In 1687 Perrault's Le Siècle de Louis le Grand, an extravagant piece of flattery of the modern century, was answered by La Fontaine's L'Épître à Huet, a graceful defense of the ancients, and also attacked by Boileau, Dacier, and Longepierre. Perrault and Fontenelle replied to these attacks in the following year. In 1693 Boileau wrote Pensées sur Longin and Perrault wrote a response. By 1694, through the offices of Arnault, the quarrel was pretty well ended, and Boileau set the capstone by a conciliatory letter to Perrault in 1700. A bit over a decade later, there was a flareup of the battle concerning Homer, but it did not last long.

In England the quarrel arose in the 1690's when Wotton and Bentley pointed out some manifest inadequacies in Sir William Temple's classical scholarship (he had praised ancient over modern learning). This is important in that it involved the beginnings of genuine historical scholarship in England and in that, more important from a literary standpoint, it led to Swift's defense of Temple, The Battle of the Books.

The quarrel has its paradoxes: its chief historical importance is that it was closely related to a greater quarrel, that between the positivistic and the Christian spirits. Nonetheless, the moderns began by defending the Christian Marvellous, and Pierre Bayle, the greatest of the moderns, contemned the idea of Progress. Perhaps the moral is that the fight and some bigger, later ones need not have occurred. Pascal, in Fragment d'un Traité sur le Vide, 1646-51, had explained clearly that the sciences are progressive and cumulative, in a sense "perfectible," in a way that philosophy, theology, and the arts are not.—H. Gillot, La Querelle des Anciens et des Modernes en France (1914); R. F. Jones, Ancients and Moderns (1936). L. Wencelius, "La Querelle des Anciens et des Modernes et l'Humanisme," Bulletin de la Société d'Etude du XVII^e s., 9-10 (1951).

P.R.

BEAST EPIC. A long tale using animals for characters and told in a quasi-epic manner. The L. fable collection of Phaedrus (1st c. A.D.), based upon what is called Aesop, inspired numerous fables and fable collections in Western Europe, and some of these, simplifying the actions of men under beast forms, were well suited to satire. In the Fredegarius (7th c.) there is the story of the deer who had no heart (because the fox had already eaten it). In Lorraine in the 10th c. there were two poetic tales in L.: the Ecbasis cuiusdam captivi (leonine hexameters) and the De Gallo et Vulpe (iambic dimeter). The second of these is the first appearance of the Chanticleer theme. Around 1152 there was a movement to oppose a continuation of the Second Crusade and Nivard of Flanders composed, to this purpose, his Ysegrimus (elegiac couplets). This has twelve episodes, all satirical.

The term "beast epic" is properly applied to the Roman de Renart. Pierre de Saint-Cloud composed the earliest branch of this (no. 2) in 1173. In this the first episode is the tale of Chanticleer. Gradually the creatures were portrayed as knights on chargers, and their dens were sometimes called castles. Faint mockery of epic themes grew as the Branches continued. In the late 12th c. Heinrich der Glîchezære adopted some of these tales in his Reinhart Fuchs. The finest version, Van den Vos Reinaerde, developed in Flanders in the early 13th c. Goethe's Reineke Fuchs goes back ultimately to this. Chaucer retold the Chanticleer theme in his Nun's Priest's Tale making use of the Fr., and possibly of the Glîchezære versions. In these later adaptations there is less epic satire, and more of the animal fable.—H. Büttner, Studien zu dem Roman de Renart and dem Reinhart Fuchs (2 v., 1891); L. Sudre, Les Sources du Roman de Renart

(1893); L. Foulet, Le Roman de Renard (1914); A. Graf, Die Grundlagen des Reineke Fuchs (1920); M. de Meyer, Les Contes populaires de la Flandre (1921); R. Bossuat, Le Roman de Renard (1957); H. R. Jauss, Untersuchungen zur mittelalterlichen Tierdichtung (1959).

U.T.H.

BEAT. Regularly recurring metrical emphasis in accentual poetic lines. The term is often used instead of "stress" (q.v.) by prosodists who are pressing the analogies between verse and music and who are thinking of the metrical foot (q.v.) as an almost exact parallel with the musical bar. The expression "a 5-beat line" emphasizes the "ideal" or "normal" accentual pattern and suggests that the number of syllables may vary as long as the five structural beats are present. See METER.

P.F.

BEAT POETS. The term is applied to a loosely knit group of Am. lyric poets identified more by period of productivity (1955–60), by common outlets (Evergreen Review, Pocket Poets Series, Beatitudes), and by a sharing of social attitudes (apolitical, anti-intellectual, romantic nihilism—"beat" meaning variously "beaten down," "beaten up," and "beatific") than by stylistic, thematic, or formal unity of expression. Membership in the group known as beat is or was held by such widely diversified poets as the neo-Whitmanesque Allen Ginsberg (b. 1926), the "spontaneous" automatic writer Jack Kerouac (b. 1922), the pure romantic symbolist Gregory Corso (b. 1930), and the careful dadaist-surrealist (qq.v.) craftsman Lawrence Ferlinghetti (b. 1919). The vague poetic antecedents of beat creation thus include the whole tradition of Am., British, and Fr. romanticism (q.v.), ranging from realistic outbursts of protest in the style of Am. proletarian Marxist poetry of the 1930's through visions of cerebral-emotional ecstasy à la Rimbaud to experiments in language and form tangential to the work of E. E. Cummings. Kenneth Rexroth initially served the movement as a kind of mentor, as did Henry Miller; after their disillusionment with its aims and membership, Paul Goodman and Norman Mailer assumed roles of "adult" sponsors for the b. movement. If b. poetry has any common denominator apart from the proclivity of its authors to make it recitable to the accompaniment of jazz, this would consist in its exaltation of ecstatic, visionary states of emotion and apperception. For that reason, its more religious votaries tend to subscribe to forms of mystical adoration including Roman Catholic (Brother Antoninus, O.P., b. 1912), Jewish (Allen Ginsberg), and Buddhist (Gary Snyder, b. 1930) modes; more secularly minded b. poets, on the other hand, place explicit faith in the visionary powers of drugs (Gregory Corso, Michael Rumaker, b. 1932). The work of the b. poets has been widely translated and diffused in Europe, notably in Germany and in the Scandinavian countries. It came to be recognized more fully as an important form of Am. literary expression in the Berlin, Paris, or Copenhagen of 1961 than in its native centers of San Francisco and New York.—Evergreen Review, 1, no. 2 (1957) and later issues; W. B. Fleischmann, "Those 'Beat' Writers," America, 161 (Sept. 26, 1959); L. Lipton, The Holy Barbarians (1959); The Beats, ed. S. Krim (1960); The New Am. Poetry, 1945–1960, ed. D. M. Allen (1960).

W.B.F.

BEGINNING RHYME. See RHYME.

BELGIAN POETRY (in French. For FLEMISH POETRY see that article). It was about the year 1880 that Belgium awakened to poetry. Romanticism, of course, had already hatched a few talents, but with more sincerity or ambition than real success. To the writers of La Jeune Belgique must be granted the merit of having begotten the literary and poetical works which were still wanted, after half a century of independence, by a prosperous nation. Albert Giraud, Ivan Gilkin, and a few others remained true to the motto "l'art pour l'art" of the Fr. Parnassians. In 1887, about ten years after the publication in Paris of the last volume of Le Parnasse contemporain français, the poems of eighteen Belg. authors were assembled in Le Parnasse de la Jeune Belgique. But already three or four of them were searching other paths. A new way was shown by Georges Rodenbach whose delicate and nostalgic inspiration could not accord his mezzotinto with the austere objectivity of the Parnassian school. Emile Verhaeren, for his part, broke off with Albert Giraud who was the declared enemy of the so-called vers libre. Thus the unity of the group became loose.

About the same time, poets of France and Belgium were regrouping elsewhere. In 1886, the Moréas manifesto and the first issue of Le Symboliste came out in Paris. In Liège, Albert Mockel founded La Wallonie, which, after an unsteady start, became soon one of the most important spokesmen of the new tendency, with contributions by Charles Van Lerberghe, Max Elskamp, Grégoire Le Roy, Maurice Maeterlinck. André Fontainas introduced there Stuart Merrill and Pierre Quillard, the fellow mates of the lycée Condorcet. In 1887, the Mockel review opened its columns to the set of Les Ecrits pour l'art which had ceased their publication in Paris and whose manager, René Ghil, with Emile Verhaeren already known in the Fr. literary world, joined the Belg. group. Moréas, Verlaine, Vielé-Griffin, André Gide, Henri de Régnier, and Paul Valéry, these two last at their start, sent contributions to the Belg. review, and a binding fellowship mingled ages and nationalities. The bonds were not broken between the prewar poets and the postwar poets like Georges Marlow, Thomas Braun, Jean de Bosschère, Franz Hellens, Pierre Nothomb, Lucien Christophe, Noël Ruet, and others who, after 1918, continued the works of the elders.

Emile Verhaeren, after his tragic death in 1916, stood in all minds with higher honor than any one else, dead or alive, of his generation. His impetuous verse, with fiery rhythm, abode in all memories. He was unforgettable, the visionary of Les Villes tentaculaires, the powerful conjurer of the people and sites of Toute la Flandre, the marveled songster of Les Heures, the social prophet and apostle of human brotherhood, who finds his expression in many other books.

After 1918, the young poets, although they did homage to their predecessors, were seduced by the symbolist renewal which was starting in France. These tendencies found their assertion in La Lanterne sourde of Paul Vanderborght (1921) and in Le Disque vert which Franz Hellens published at the same time. Both of them arranged meetings of poets of France and Belgium in order to fix the common line of their literary intentions. Ten years later, in 1931, Pierre-Louis Flouquet founded in Brussels Le Journal des Poètes, which brought together the newcomers. After the second war, the same paper resumed its mission to defend genuine poetry.

It is difficult to single out, today more than ever, an autonomous poetical current in Belgium, although both the Flemish mood and the Walloon have had an influence on the Fr.-writing authors. It has been admitted that the rally of the Belg. symbolist poets took place on the Walloon territory, but was held by a majority of Flemish-born authors. It seems that the mystery of inner life and the manifestations of subconscious feelings which are the main topics of symbolism are linked with the mystical aspirations expressed by the brilliant school of painting of old Flanders. The innate liking for images, the keen observation of reality inherited from their ancestors, may have disposed these poets toward a symbolic form of expression.

Surrealism did not find as many adepts amidst those who came later. Its fantasy, its hermeticism, its incoherence may have shocked their good sense and their stern and minutely ordained realism. In return, the Walloon, imbued with Latinity and more open to all literary currents, has hailed without umbrage, if not always without surprise, the curious, unexpected and many times successful achievements of surrealism, following the excesses of dadaism. The new generation of Walloon poets has given several clever interpreters to the surrealist movement. To Charles Plisnier, Robert Vivier, Marcel Thiry, Edmond Vanderammen, Robert Coffin, Maurice Carème, Armand Bernier, Roger Bodart and their congeners, Flanders opposes but a very few Fr.-speaking poets, namely Franz Hellens, Marie Gevers, Camille Melloy, Robert Guiette.

If it has happened that Belg. writers have led the way for the Fr. ones—Franz Hellens and Jean de Bosschère were amidst the fore-runners of surrealism—how much greater has been the influence of the Fr. poets. Yet the Belg. contribution to the vast Fr. literary production of today is at least as important and original as in the past.

ANTHOLOGIES: Contemporary Belg. Poetry, ed. and tr. J. Bithell (1911); Poètes belges d'esprit nouveau, ed. P. Vanderborght (1924); Petite Anthologie des poètes belges d'expression française, ed. O. Meurice (1932); Florilège de la nouvelle poésie fr. en Belgique, ed. G. Norge (1934); Pages choisies des écrivains français de Belgique, ed. L. Demeur et G. Vanwelkenhuyzen (1936); Anthol. de la décennie, 1930-40 (1942) and Anthol. de la deuxième décennie, 1940-50 (1951); Poètes fr. de Belgique. De Verhaeren au surréalisme, ed. R. Guiette (1948); Lyra Belgica, tr. C. and F. Stillman (2 v., 1950-51; in Eng.); Jeune Poésie fr. de Belgique, ed. G. Varin (1954).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: Fr. Nautet, Hist. des lettres belges d'expression fr. (2 v., 1892-93); H. Liebrecht and G. Rency, Hist. illustrée de la litt. belge de langue fr. (1926); F. Castillo Najera, Un Siglo de poesia belga (1931; includes anthol.); G. Charlier, Les Lettres fr. de Belgique (1938); G. Deutrepont, Hist. illustrée de la litt. fr. en Belgique (1939); G. Charlier and J. Hanse, Hist. illustrée des lettres fr. de Belgique (1958). c.v.

BELIEF, PROBLEM OF. As it has recently been formulated, the question of beliefs in poetry primarily concerns the relation of the reader to the poem. It asks how, as readers, we respond to those statements that can be extracted from the literary work as the poet's version of "truth" and, aside from whether we agree or disagree with them, in what ways they enhance or inhibit our aesthetic response to the work as a whole. It is a question that has come increasingly to the fore as positivistic criteria for truth have achieved more exclusive dominance in the philosophical arena.

Of course, from Plato on, writers on poetics have explored the relation of the truths supposedly being expounded in a literary work to the truth of actual reality as maintained by the reader. And since, throughout much of the history of poetics, the presentation of truth has been held to be a major function of poetry (see MEANING, PROBLEM OF), this relation has been seen to be crucial in our valuing of the poem. Aside from the skeptical Plato, few earlier writers questioned the poet's inherent capacity qua poet to write truth. The dedication of the poet's talent was generally not so distinguished from that of the philosopher's or the scientist's as to require the setting of any precise "problem of belief" in the way we are now accustomed to finding it set. The reader's or the audience's belief could be taxed only by the patently unbelievable: by the fantastic or, for the more literal-minded, by the obvious delusions—the counterfeiting—of theatrical presentation. Indeed, through much of the 18th c. most of the talk about belief was confined to dramatic poetry. The argument of Samuel Johnson (Preface to Shakespeare, 1765) in which, using other terms, he distinguishes stage illusion from delusion—an argument taken up, with certain important changes in emphasis, by Samuel Taylor Coleridge (Biographia Literaria, 1817)—comes immediately to mind.

As, with the help of Coleridge and other defenders of poetry on the one hand and anti-poetic positivistic thinkers on the other, the opposition of poetry to science was so urgently posed in the 19th c., what we now call the problem of belief was forced to be raised by both sides. For as the one saw the poet as superciliously transcending "mere" scientific truth, so the other arrogantly denied him access to its sacred precincts. In either case something had to be substituted for the poet's previously maintained responsibility to tell us that which, being true, we ought to believe, whether this something be raised to the ultimate mystical truths of the transcendental philosopher or relegated to the emotional satisfactions permitted by the coldblooded devotee of scientism. Since the increasingly scientific temper of the 19th c. was likely to translate the former of these into a kind of wish-fulfillment—of emotional origin itself—it was the latter which found expression as the "problem of belief," "belief" here taking on a meaning utterly separated from that of "truth."

Of course, an additional incentive toward the setting of this problem was found in the difficulty, frequently mentioned but never resolved and rarely specifically confronted, which asked how—if poems were to present statements of truth—we were to handle two or more excellent poems which rested on world-views that were mutually exclusive; or, more personally, how we were to accommodate poems whose world-views were uncongenial to our own.

In several places in his writings, but especially in the opening paragraphs of "The Study of Poetry" (1880), Matthew Arnold puts the problem most cogently. This formulation is very likely not original with him (for example, M. H. Abrams in The Mirror and the Lamp—see bibliography—cites earlier and more philosophically sophisticated statements of this position by John Stuart Mill and Alexander Smith of Banff, and, of course, though in a less clear way, by Coleridge himself); but in his influence generally, and specifically on I. A. Richards in our own day, Arnold can claim an especially significant place. In his poetry and prose alike Arnold frequently pines for the lost Christian medieval unity which, addressed primarily to human needs, proved so emotionally satisfying. Unfortunately, as he sees it, this unity had the advantage of being everything but right. And confronted by the truths of modern science, man has no choice but to abandon "the shadows and dreams and false shows of knowledge." But the truth which man gets in exchange for his religion—by the very virtue of being the cold, natural truth rather than the warm, human myth, of being adapted to the facts of nature rather than to the demands of human psychology—has none of the soothing power of the older, blessed falsehoods. Yet as reasoning creatures we dare not let this new truth go, although as feeling creatures we cannot do with it alone.

What is needed, then, is something which will do religion's job while not, like religion, depending upon a falsification of facts to get the job done. But, as we see also in his debates with T. H. Huxley (for example, "Literature and Science," 1882), Arnold appears implicitly to concede to the positivists that science's is the only way of putting the facts that does not falsify them; and this is the cold, humanly unsatisfying way. If poetry, then, is to take religion's place while avoiding its fatal errors, it would seem to be required to serve as a kind of objectless religion which can give us the emotional satisfaction without demanding the commitment. Thus, despite other discussions of his—like those which speak of "poetic truth"—which reveal more than anything else his ambivalence and inconsistencies, Arnold seems to set the terms more systematically employed by I. A. Richards (see PSEUDO-STATEMENT) to dissociate the seeming statements of poetry from any claims to literal truth.

What poetry says it says only provisionally in order to inculcate sufficient make-believe belief to produce the emotional effect which our psychological needs have a right to demand of the poetic occasion. Consequently the poet need fear no clash between the seeming beliefs in his poem and either the truths of science, the seeming beliefs presented in other poems, or the beliefs of his readers. In the realm of myth all can accommodate and be accommodated. And all this becomes precisely the formulation of Richards who, in his discussion of poetry as "emotive" in contrast to "referential" discourse (Principles of Literary Criticism, 1924), in his invention of the term "pseudo-statement," and in the very title of the chapter in which he employs this term ("Poetry and Beliefs," Science and Poetry, 1926), explicitly sets this forward as a major problem in contemporary literary criticism.

T. S. Eliot's approach to poetics would seem to be diametrically opposed to that of the early Richards. His religious orthodoxy leads to an absolutism that would deny the positivistic psychologizing of Richards. Yet surprisingly we find his ideas about beliefs in poetry close in many ways to Richards'. According to Eliot, the poet borrows his beliefs from his environment and in the poem deals with how it feels for one to hold them. He need neither create his beliefs nor defend them since his concern is not with the beliefs themselves—his mere raw materials—but with their "emotional equivalents," although, as dictated by the "objective correlative" (q.v.) he can convey only the "objective equivalents" of these emotions. Thus the quality of the beliefs is essentially irrelevant to the quality of the poem.

Eliot does realistically acknowledge that beliefs must be fairly "mature" if, though we should not agree with them, they are not to get in the way of our reading of the poem. We must credit them with being respectable enough for a reasonably adult and intelligent man to hold so that we can forget about them and focus on what counts—the objectification of the emotions he feels as a holder of these beliefs. But, as Eliot claims is the case when we read Shelley, if the beliefs are puerile they obtrude upon us and block our attempt to read the poetry sympathetically as poetry.

Thus Eliot too separates the poem and its beliefs from any kind of "truth." The function of the beliefs is the rather negative one of staying out of the way so that the poetry can carry out its emotive assignment. Further, his dichotomy between the beliefs in the poem and the "poetry" in the poem, like the older form-content dichotomy which it resembles, prevents the more organic and contextual treatment of poems which our most influential recent critics have called for. Critics like Allen Tate and Cleanth Brooks, for example, must treat this problem differently from Eliot. They would see the poetic weakness of a Shelley as arising not so much from the puerility of his beliefs as from his failure to hold them in the formal context of his poem. As a result they present themselves out of context as ideas; they leap forth as ideas and plead to be judged as true or false much as we would judge a scientific or philosophic idea. If they were held in the context, they would never so present themselves and could not fairly be so judged. Of course, it can be argued, if a Shelley were to hold his beliefs in the poem's context in the manner suggested, he would perforce have to give them depth and complexity so that they would no longer betray the puerility with which Eliot charged them.

There is, however, more than a verbal difference between the two charges. While Eliot's objection is aimed at the content side of a form-content dichotomy, the other objection is aimed at a weakness in the unified context which should combine these two elements organically. Our agreement with Eliot's objection would depend upon whether or not we thought the poet's beliefs to be puerile; this is hardly a literary problem and surely not one that can be resolved by reference to the objective features of the work. Our agreement with the other objection would depend on how similar our analysis of the poem would be to that of those making the charge. This is a literary problem which can be solved only by a constant appeal to the objective features of the work. We should have simply to decide, although in practice it is rarely simple, whether or not the poem was functioning as a fully self-contained aesthetic object; to decide, in other words, whether the statements in the poem were functioning merely referentially or whether they were functioning purely cross-referentially, contextually. Thus this matter of beliefs is still a major source of difficulty even in the objective and perhaps somewhat neo-classical form of practical criticism as it is performed today.

I. A. Richards, "Poetry and Beliefs," Science and Poetry (1926); T. S. Eliot, "Dante," Selected Essays 1917-1932 (1932) and The Use of Poetry and the Use of Crit. (1933); C. Brooks, "The Problem of Belief and the Problem of Cognition," The Well Wrought Urn (1947); A. Tate, "Three Types of Poetry," On the Limits of Poetry (1948); M. H. Abrams, "Science and Poetry in Romantic Crit.," The Mirror and the Lamp (1953); E. Vivas, "Lit. and Knowledge," Creation and Discovery (1955); Lit. and Belief, ed. M. H. Abrams (1958; EIE, 1957); K. Smidt, Poetry and Belief in the Work of T. S. Eliot (2d ed., 1961); N. Frye, The Well-Tempered Critic (1963).
M.KRIE.

BENGALI POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

BERGERETTE. See VIRELAI.

BESTIARY. A didactic genre, popular in the Middle Ages, in which moral or religious significance is attached to the real or reputed characteristics of animals, many of them legendary. Written in prose or verse, the medieval bestiaries go back ultimately to a lost Gr. work named Physiologus (The Naturalist), which was probably written in Alexandria in the 2d c. It was widely imitated and translated, and versions exist in Arabic, Armenian, Ethiopian, ON, and Old Syriac.

Often referred to as a manual for "unnatural natural history," the b. is important both as a source of symbolic types for later medieval art and as an example of the medieval habit of allegory. Some of the fabulous material of the bestiaries was utilized by such later writers and poets as John Lyly (Euphues), Milton, and Dryden.

Most bestiaries date from the 12th-14th c., and examples can be found in various European languages. Although bestiaries are usually Christian in their symbolic application, the Bestiaire d'amour (ca. 1250) of Richard de Fournival is a secular love allegory. The earliest surviving example in Fr. is Philippe de Thaon's Bestiaire (ca. 1125), written in 6-syllable couplets. Other Fr. bestiaries include Le Bestiaire divin (about 1210) by Guillaume le Clerc and the Bestiaire (end of 12th or beginning of 13th c.) by Gervaise. Interestingly, this genre was revived by G. Apollinaire with his Bestiaire in 1919. The poems on the Panther and the Whale in the Anglo-Saxon Exeter Book, together with a fragment on the Partridge, constitute the earliest Eng. b. A more complete example is the illustrated ME Bestiary of the 13th c. Partly rhymed and partly alliterative, it is based on the L. Physiologus of Theobaldus (an 11th-c. It. abbot) and other sources.—Fr. Lauchert, Gesch. des Physiologus (1889); M. Wellman, "Der Physiologus," Philologus, supp. 21 (1930); F. Sbordone, Ricerche sulle fonti e sulla composizione del Physiologus greco (1936); G. Cronin, Jr., "The B. and the Mediaeval Mind—Some Complexities," MLQ, 2 (1941); J. Calvet and M. Cruppi, Le Bestiaire de la littérature française (1954) and Le Bestiaire de l'antiquité classique (1955); F. McCulloch, Mediaeval L. and Fr. Bestiaries (rev. ed., 1962). A.P.

BIEDERMEIER. The term was first formulated by Ludwig Eichrodt (1827-1892) in analogy to F. Th. Vischer's bourgeois figure "Shartenmaier." Eichrodt and his circle parodied this bourgeois type and published, from 1885 on, Die Gedichte des schwäbischen Schulmeisters Gottlieb Biedermaier und seines Freundes Horatius Treuherz in the Münchner Fliegenden Blättern. These naive, rhymed verses were collected later in Biedermaiers Liederlust (1869), a book responsible for popularizing the type B. as a philistine caught in a narrowly idyllic conception of the world.

These parodies were especially directed at the literary efforts of Samuel Friedrich Sauter.

B. came into prominence as a stylistic and historical term, especially regarding painting, through the 1906 centenary exhibition in Berlin. As the name for a period of German literature, B. was introduced by J. Wiegand, P. Kluckhohn, W. Bietak, G. Weydt, etc. The term was supposed to encompass those writers and poets between romanticism and realism (e.g., Raimund, Nestoy, Niebergall, Grillparzer, Droste-Hülshoff, Mörike, Stifter) who could not be ascribed to the movement Junges Deutschland.

The characteristics of B., as defined by the above literary historians, especially P. Kluckhohn, were the degrading of the ideals of the classical and romantic movements to the limited, conservative sphere of a bourgeois idyll, characterized by such terms as "resignation," "love of details," "the glorification of a secure and simple middle-class life." Because of this limited attitude B. exhausted itself in minor literary productions: genre scenes, idylls, brief verse tales etc. The term "B." is, however, insufficient to describe and define adequately the works of major poets such as Stifter, Droste-Hülshoff, Mörike, Grillparzer. As so many other designations of literary periods (e.g., "baroque," "realism," "expressionism," etc.), the term "B." is to be treated with caution. It has never been satisfactorily defined and is beset with ambiguity and vagueness. There is an unbridgeable gulf between the term itself and its application to a literary work of art. Neither the artistic value nor the poetic uniqueness of the major writers of the period can be fully explained by this term. B. is, therefore, only a convenient term for an indistinct period of German literary history.—M. von Boehn, B.-Deutschland 1815-1847 (1911, 2d ed., 1922); H. Beyer, "Lit. B. in Deutschland," Reallexikon, 1; P. Kluckhohn, "Die Fortwirkung der dt. Romantik in der Kultur des 19. und 20. Jh.," Zeitschrift für dt. Bildung (1928), "B. als lit. Epochenbezeichnung," and "Zur B.-Diskussion," DVLG, 13 (1935) and 14 (1936), respectively; W. Bietak, Das Lebensgefühl des B. in der österr. Dichtung (1931); G. Weydt, "Lit. B.," DVLG, 9 (1931); A. von Grolman, "B.-Forschung," Dichtung und Volkstum (1935); R. Haller, "Goethe und die Welt des B.," DVLG, 14 (1936); A. Holske, "Stifter und die B. Crisis," Studies in Honor of John A. Walz (1941); G. Weydt, "B. und junges Deutschland," DVLG, 25 (1951); B. Emrich, "B.," Reallexikon, 2d ed., 1. E.L.

BIOGRAPHICAL CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

BLANK VERSE. Unrhymed iambic pentameter lines. Neither originally nor exclusively Eng., b.v. is nevertheless the distinctive poetic form of our language; it is the medium of nearly all verse drama and of much narrative and reflective verse. B.v. was introduced with the first substantial body of poetry written in Standard Modern Eng.: Surrey's b.v. translations from the Aeneid, written ca. 1540, were printed by Tottel in 1557. In Tottel's Miscellany, also 1557, the work of Wyatt, Surrey, and others (including two short b.v. poems by Grimald) introduced the iambic line and decisively marked the course that poetry in the modern Eng. tongue would take.

Some verse forms, like the triolet, the ballad measure, the limerick, seem to carry in themselves a suggestion of meaning or tone regardless of the language set to them; others, like the sonnet or the heroic couplet, have acquired a strong traditional manner from their exemplary employment during one literary period or by one great master. B.v. has no inherent tone. Except for free verse, it is the form closest to the form of our speech. Its stresses alternate as our Eng. speech stresses tend to do, and its measure of 5 strong stresses marked by the juncture of the line end, a measure readily apprehended without counting, both simulates and accommodates the way we make phrases and clauses as we speak. This is perhaps the reason no one poet, not even Shakespeare or Milton, has stamped b.v. forever with the mark of his own style as Pope did the heroic couplet. The freedom of the form is also a challenge; lacking the extrinsic mark of rhyme, poets must prove themselves in b.v. by their powers of conception and by their deployment of the sound-patterns of the language in interaction with the ideal pattern of the metrical form. The shifts of dominance in this interaction constitute the metrical history of b.v.

Surrey evidently sought a close relation between the order of stresses in his phrases and the ideal metrical pattern. Probably borrowing the idea of b.v. from the unrhymed hendecasyllabic versi scioliti, q.v. ("freed" verse) of Molza's It. translations from the Aeneid (Venice, 1539), and being encouraged perhaps by the dislike of the Eng. classicists Cheke and Ascham for "rude beggarly rhyming," as well as by the tradition of ME unrhymed alliterative verse, he worked closely with the Scots Vergil of Gavin Douglas, which was in couplets (ca. 1515, publ. 1553). He manipulated Douglas' phrases to fit them smoothly into an iambic line.

Clam vp againe in the greit hors maw
(Douglas)

Clambe vp again vnto the hūgie horse
(Surrey)

Yet Surrey's lines are not monotonously iambic, his pauses are varied, and as Padelford (Surrey, Poems 1928) calculated, run-on lines make up one-fourth of his b.v. Early Elizabethan b.v. shows, in minor works by Turberville, Sackville, Barnaby Rich, Greene, and others, a movement toward strict metrical regularity, culminating in Gascoigne's The Steele Glas (1576). Here the stress-pattern is unvaried, run-on lines are rare, and a pause occurs always at the fourth syllable, indicated by punctuation if not by the phrase.

But holla: here, I see a wondrous sight,
I see a swarme, of Saints within my glasse 783-784)

Marlowe's Tamburlaine (1587), while not the first Eng. b.v. play (Sackville and Norton, Gordobuc, 1562; Gascoigne and Kinwelmarsh, Jocasta, 1566), inaugurates the great Elizabethan drama. In metrics, Marlowe exercised originality and freedom in stress and phrasing within the line, but composed his lines as individual units, often balanced in two vivid epithets (H. Baker, Induction to Tragedy, 1939); he did not join his lines in longer rhythms.

See see where Christs blood streames in the firmament,

One drop would saue my soule, halfe a drop,
ah my Christ.
(Faustus, 1593; 1463-1464)

Many Elizabethan plays contain passages like this which resist the conventions of scansion. One line here has 11, the other 12 syllables; it would not seem profitable to try to rationalize the stresses. Marked as it is above, the scansion may suit some. Yet the excess of syllables alone might indicate that the lines are meant to strain the metrical pattern to the breaking point. Dramatic verse (like satire) never held to the strict metric developed by other Elizabethan verse, although it was based on the same convention. A line such as Friends, Rōmans, countrymēn, lend mē your ears,

spoken as marked here, strains at the convention, yet it does not actually violate it. The metrical system provides that while words of more than one syllable must retain their proper sound, monosyllables may be considered either strong or weak-stressed in a line of verse, regardless of their degree of stress in normal speech. The metrical feet have reference only to syllables; they have nothing to do with the divisions into words or phrases of the sounds of speech. This line would be scanned, but surely never spoken, thus:

^x Friends ^x Romans [/] countrymen [/] lend ^x me [/] your ^x ears.

Shakespeare, beginning with this convention, kept a relation to it throughout his career; yet it is plain that he often wrote lines which were willing, if temporary, departures. The increasing freedom with the line of Shakespeare and the later Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists, Fletcher, Middleton, Webster, Massinger, Ford, was only one mark, and perhaps not a necessary one, of the progress made in b.v. The movement of rhythm through a series of lines, and the accommodation of every range of subject, idea, and feeling to the pentameter line gave this verse a flexibility unequalled, so it is sometimes said, in any language. It could shift from excited eloquence to prosaic statement; in fact, Eliot has said that the achievement of b.v. at this time was the evolution from the "intractably poetic" medium of Marlowe to one which could "carry the burdens and exhibit the subtleties of prose" (Poetry in the 18th C., 1930).

Milton, it would appear, worked in Paradise Lost (1667) to restore to b.v. both a more poetic tone and a strong conventional relation to the iambic line. To accomplish this, he deliberately distorted the normal syntax and sound-patterns of Eng. speech. He retained the privilege of drastic metrical variation, though by some views he had entirely other principles (F. T. Prince, The It. Element in Milton's Verse, 1954). His chief metrical achievement is usually said to be the construction of masterful rhythmic periods and "verse paragraphs," or as he put it in his preface to PL, where he maintains that b.v. is the noblest medium for verse, lines with "the sense variously drawn out from one verse to another." In Paradise Regained (1671) Milton employed a line generally freer than that of PL, and in Samson Agonistes (1671) a highly individual form including short lines and rhymes.

During the times of Dryden and Pope, b.v. was practiced by minor imitators of Milton, while the heroic couplet dominated the drama and longer poems. Dryden argued against b.v. (Essay of Dramatic Poesy, 1668), although he used it in some later plays, following All for Love (1671). When the vigor of b.v. was revived, notably by Thomson in The Seasons (1726), some Miltonic mannerisms of diction were retained, and although phrases and sentences were arranged freely to run over the line end, which they seldom did in the 18th-c.

couplet, b.v. in this period did not attain the easy colloquial mode of Dryden and Pope's couplets. Later in the century, Young's Night Thoughts (1742) and Cowper's The Task (1785) are distinguished by a certain departure from the conventionally "poetic" diction of the time; metrically they are composed largely in the style of the "single-moulded" line, as Saintsbury called it, and they maintain regularity in stress and syllable.

Nearly every great poet of the 19th c. employed b.v. for his longer poems; some, like Tennyson, wrote lyrics in it (Tears, idle tears, 1847). The limits and flexibility of the form were established, and while each poet used it in a manner suitable to his own poetic voice, no basic metrical innovations were made. Wordsworth's Prelude (1805-50), Keats's Hyperion (1820), Browning's The Ring and the Book (1868), demonstrate much the same qualities in phrasing and stress-groupings that mark their poetry in other forms.

In contrast with the experimental meters favored by many 20th-c. poets, b.v. for the first time appears as a conservative force. Thus the b.v. in Eliot's The Waste Land (1922) appears ordered and traditional in its context, as do Stevens' b.v. poems among his free-verse works. Poets who have maintained the older forms, like Frost and Auden, use b.v. in idioms little different from those of their rhymed poems. Verse drama and longer poems are rare today; b.v. is not a favorite with contemporary poets.

S. Johnson, "Milton," Lives (1781); R. Bridges, Milton's Prosody (1894); J. A. Symonds, B.V. (1895); R. M. Alden, Eng. Verse (1903); Saintsbury, Prosody; F. G. Hubbard, "A Type of B.V. Line Found in the Earlier Elizabethan Drama," PMLA, 32 (1917); T. Brooke, "Marlowe's Versification and Style," SP, 19 (1922); M. Robertson, "The Evolution of Eng. B.V.," Criterion, 2 (1924); H. Baker, "Some B.V. Written by Thomas Norton Before Gorboduc," MLN, 48 (1933); T. S. Eliot, Elizabethan Essays (1934); G. K. Smart, "Eng. Non-Dramatic B.V. in the 16th C.," Anglia, 61 (1937); C. S. Lewis, "The 15th-C. Heroic Line," E&S, 24 (1938); H. Baker, Introduction to Tragedy (1939); A. Swallow, "The Pentameter Line in Skelton and Wyatt," MP, 48 (1950); G. L. Trager and H. L. Smith, Jr., An Outline of Eng. Structure (1951); F. T. Prince, The It. Element in Milton's Verse (1954); J. Thompson, The Founding of Eng. Metre (1961).

J.T.

IN OTHER LANGUAGES. B.V. (versi sciolti, q.v.) originated in Italy. Its derivation is disputed between those who consider the It. endecasillabo, in rhymed form used as early as 1135, an offshoot of the Fr. rhymed decasyllable (later called vers commun), and those who trace both these metrical lines to a common double source: L. dactylic tetrameter catalectic and Horatian sapphic. B.v. came into being in response to the need of It. tragedians for a metrical form that would match as closely as possible the iambic trimeter of Gr. tragedy. By adopting unrhymed hendecasyllables, or versi sciolti, for his tragedy Sofonisba (1515; publ. 1524), Trissino—incidentally, not the first to use b.v.—made this meter the standard one for It. drama. Though b.v. was brought from Italy to Spain in the early 16th c. by Boscán and Garcilaso, verso suelto never became assimilated to the Sp. metrical tradition; and the attempts to accommodate vers blanc in France were likewise unsuccessful.

Outside of Italy b.v. celebrated its greatest continental triumph in Germany, which received it from England. Notable is a translation of Milton's PL as early as 1682. For original creation b.v. was first used much later, namely by Wieland in his Erzählungen (1752) and in the tragedy Lady Johanna Gray (1758). But it was Lessing's Nathan der Weise (1779) which established b.v. as the standard metrical form of German drama, subsequently to be used by such poets as Goethe (in Iphigenie and Tasso), Schiller, Kleist, Grillparzer, Hebbel, Hauptmann, and others. Broad differences in metrical usage exist from the start, between, say, the predominantly end-stopped lines of Goethe and the typically run-on pattern of Lessing's verse. These divergent practices imply two different theoretical conceptions of b.v.: in the first, the line has preserved its metrical integrity; in the second, it has been replaced by the verse paragraph. Grillparzer is the most conservative in his usage, and his b.v. has a lyrical quality; the verse of Kleist, who most consistently disregards the line as metrical unit, is carried forward by a powerful dramatic impulsion. Schiller's position is an intermediate one. Beginning in Don Carlos (1787) with a b.v. much like Lessing's, he adopted from Wallenstein (1800) on a more conservative form. Besides Wieland, Liliencron wrote b.v. narrative, and Schiller, Heine, Storm, and George used b.v. in the lyric.

The Scandinavian countries received b.v. from three sources, Italy, England, and Germany, with Germany providing the chief models in the dramatic verse of Goethe and Schiller. With Balders Død (1773) Johannes Ewald introduced hendecasyllabic b.v. in Denmark, evidently of It. extraction. Preferring the 10-syllable line with masculine endings, Oehlenschläger created a medium capable of a wider range of dramatic effects; his treatment of b.v. in his numerous historical tragedies is very much like that of the later Schiller. Oehlenschläger's followers in the drama, Ingemann and Hauch, naturally adhered closely to the verse form of their master; more individual is the b.v. used later by Paludan-Müller (in his dramatic poems on mythological subjects) and by Rørdaam. In Swedish poetry b.v. was introduced with Kellgren's narrative fragment Sigvarth och Hilma (1788), in the It. form acquired from Ewald. Excellent Eng. b.v. appeared as early as 1796 in a few scenes of a projected historical play by the Finn Franzén; but not until 1862 did Wecksell, another Finn, produce the only significant b.v. drama in Swedish, Daniel Hjort. Unlike the situation in Denmark and Norway, where b.v. appears infrequently in narrative, didactic, satirical, and reflective poetry, in Sweden b.v. has a long and still living tradition in these genres, with contributions by such poets as Tegnér, Stagnelius, Sjöberg, Malmberg, Edfelt, and Ekelöf. The form of Swedish b.v. is generally conservative, not unlike that of Goethe. Norwegian poets started using b.v. about the same time, but the first significant works in this form are several farces and dramas (beginning in 1827) by Wergeland. Wergeland's metrical usage, modeled on Shakespeare's, is exceedingly free. Neither Andreas Munch's imitations of Oehlenschläger (beginning in 1837) nor Ibsen's Catilina (1850) displays a distinctive form of b.v. The rhymed verse intermittently used in Catilina is by far superior to the b.v.; this may partly explain Ibsen's subsequent preference for such a form. Bjørnson, on the other hand, composed excellent b.v. in his saga dramas, in a free form which points to Shakespeare and Schiller as the chief models.

In Russia b.v. appeared with Zhukovsky's translation of Schiller's Die Jungfrau von Orléans (1817–21). It was subsequently used by Pushkin in Boris Godunov (1825; publ. 1831) and his "Little Tragedies," and by Mey, Ostrovsky, and A. K. Tolstoy in their historical dramas. Tolstoy's Czar Fyodor Ioannovich (1868) has been a popular success up to recent years. B.v. also appears in narrative and reflective poetry. In Russia, as elsewhere, b.v. varies within a certain range, from the conservative line-structured form with constant caesura of Boris Godunov to the more loosely articulated verse of "little tragedies" like Mozart and Salieri and The Covetous Knight. In Poland, the hendecasyllabic b.v. of It. origin used by Kochanowski in his tragedy Odprawa posłów greckich (The Dismissal of the Gr. Envoys, 1578) failed to inaugurate a tradition. Rhymed verse became standard for Polish drama, and neither J. Korzeniowski's many b.v. plays (beginning in 1820) nor his persistent theoretical advocacy of the medium greatly modified the situation. Of individual works in b.v. may be mentioned Lilla Weneda (1840), one of Slowacki's best tragedies, Norwid's comedy Miłość czysta u kąpieli morskich (Chaste Love at the Bathing Beach), and J. Kraszewski's epic trilogy Anafielas (1840).

In conclusion, it may be noted that, although b.v. in all these countries, except Italy and Poland, is designated as a 5-stress iambic meter, its lines rarely have 5 full stresses. According to K. Taranowski's computation, in Boris Godunov only 22.5 per cent of the lines have 5 stresses, 53.5 per cent have 4, and 24 per cent have 3. This distribution also holds roughly for b.v. in the other literatures here treated.

F. Zarncke, Über den fünffüssigen Jambus mit besonderer Rücksicht auf seine Behandlung durch Lessing, Schiller, und Goethe (1865); A. Sauer, Über den fünffüssigen Jambus vor Lessings "Nathan" (1878); L. Hettich, Der fünffüssige Jambus in den Dramen Goethes (1913); H. G. Atkins, A Hist. of German Versification (1923); O. Sylwan, Den svenska versen från 1600-talets början (3 v., 1925-34) and Svensk verskonst från Wivalius till Karlfeldt (1934); A. Heusler, Deutsche Versgesch. (v. 3, 1929); K. Taranowski, Ruski dvodelni ritmovi I-II (1953); B. O. Unbegaun, Russian Versification (1956; with bibliog.); Poetyka III: Wersyfikacja, v. 3: Sylabizm, ed. M. R. Mayenowa (1956; with bibliog.); P. Habermann, "Blankvers," Reallexikon, 2d ed., 1; W. Kayser, Gesch. des deutschen Verses (1960); L. J. Parker, "Wielands Lady Johanna Gray: Das erste deutsche Blankversdrama," cq, 34 (1961). S.L.

BLASON. According to Thomas Sebillet, Art poétique françois (ed. F. GaiFFE, 1932, p. 169-70), the b. is a poetic genre devoted to the praise or blame of almost anything. V. L. Saulnier (see bibliog.) regards Sebillet's definition as too narrow and speaks of two types of b.: the b. satirique and the b. médaillon. The purpose of the former is sufficiently indicated in the name; that of the latter is to describe briefly a single object. The genre had its origin in 1536 with Clément Marot's Blason du beau tétin. Sebillet is inclined to think, incorrectly, that the b. represented an effort to do in poetry what heraldic art did with armorial bearings. In reality, the satiric b. is a distant descendant of the L. satire, while the descriptive b. traces its beginnings to the Gr. epigram. The good b., says Sebillet, will be brief, of 8- or 10-syllable verses, and will have a sharp [i.e., epigrammatic] conclusion. Most blasons, like the one by Marot that initiated the genre, celebrated some part of the female body, and by 1550 it was possible to gather many of them into an anthology entitled Blasons du corps féminin.—J. Vianey, Le Pétrarquisme en France au XVI^e s. (1909); R. E. Pike, "The blasons in Fr. Lit. of the 16th C.," RR, 27 (1936); V. L. Saulnier, Maurice Scève (2 v., 1948-49); H. Weber, La Création poétique au XVI^e s. (2 v., 1956). I.S.

BLUES. As folk songs the b. differs strikingly from Negro spirituals (q.v.). Where spirituals are choral and communal, the b. are solo and individual. Where the spirituals sing of heaven, the b. are earthy. The spirituals are fervently hopeful, the b. cry of hopelessness and despair. Originally, the spirituals were sung unaccompanied. The b. always called for instrumental backing. And while the spiritual has no set verse pattern, the b. song is based on a 3-line lyric: "Sometimes I feel like nothin', somethin' th'owed away / Sometimes I feel like nothin', somethin' th'owed away / Then I get my guitar and play the blues all day." Created by the down-and-out, giving voice to feelings and experiences hard to endure, these brief, agonizing, sometimes impromptu expressions appear to be derived from an earlier form known as "hollers." They did not become known as "b." until introduced into Am. "popular music," through the compositions of W. C. Handy and others. Several Negro poets, notably Langston Hughes and Waring Cuney, have used the verse pattern of the b. for poems intended mainly for reading.—H. W. Odum and G. B. Johnson, The Negro and His Songs (1925); C. S. Johnson, "Jazz Poetry and B.," Carolina Magazine, 58 (1926); J. W. Work, Am. Negro Songs (1940); W. C. Handy, Father of the B., ed. A. Bontemps (1942); A Treasury of the B., ed. W. C. Handy and A. Niles (1949); P. Oliver, B. Fell this Morning (1960). A.B.

BOB AND WHEEL. A bob is the refrain of a song or, as first used by E. Guest (A History of Eng. Rhythms, 1838), a short line, often only 2 syllables, at the end of a stanza, a device frequently employed in ME romances. A wheel is a set of short lines used at the end of a stanza. Sometimes the first line is very short and is then called a bob and the whole is referred to as a "bob wheel" or "bob and wheel." For example, the unrhymed alliterative stanzas of Gawain and the Green Knight each end with a bob of 2 syllables followed by a wheel consisting of quatrains, either in ballad form (8686) or in sixes, rhymed alternately (abab); the bob is rhymed with the second and fourth lines.—Saintsbury, Prosody, 1. R.P.APR.

BOUTS-RIMÉS. Words rhyming in accordance with a given rhyme scheme, ordinarily that of the sonnet, and used as the basis of a verse-making game. The object of the game, which originated in the précieus circles of early 17th-c. Paris, was to write a poem which would utilize the given words as end rhymes yet achieve an effect of naturalness and ease. Accordingly the list of words was made as bizarre and incongruous as possible. The diversion became highly fashionable and remained so, in both France and England, until the 19th c. Such important poets as Corneille and Boileau tried their skill at b.-r., and an amusing sally is attributed to Fontenelle, who, on being given the words fontanges, collier, oranges, soulier by a beautiful woman, improvised the following lines: "Que vous montrez d'appas depuis vos deux fontanges / Jusqu'à votre collier! / Mais que vous en cachez depuis vos deux oranges / Jusqu'à votre soulier."

BRACHYCATALECTIC. See TRUNCATION.

BRAZILIAN POETRY. Brazil's three races, Portuguese, Indian, and Negro, severally and in various combinations, account for many factors in the development and the character of her poetry, including its "periods." But more than the racial subject matter and attitudes and, as literature matured, the themes of ever increasing emphasis on reality, what gives unity to Braz. literature is the persistence of the national spirit, once awakened.

After the Jesuits' didactic and religious poems in the 16th c. and the mediocre vers d'occasion of the early 17th, the first strong personality in Braz. poetry emerged. Gregório de Matos (1633-96) was the first to depict in verse the defects of colonial society. He reflects not only preoccupation with the landscape, as in his lyrics, which are good but not outstanding, but also concern with the human scene in his satiric poems, his best work. And with the emergence of Man, added to Nature, poets acquired a national consciousness and a desire to be independent of Portugal. During the mid-18th c. gold rush in Minas Gerais were born those who were to form the mineira (from "Minas") school. Educated in Portugal, some becoming members of literary "academies" proliferating at the time, these youths wrote poetry in the academic-Arcadian fashion and, once back at home, conspired in the ill-timed, ill-fated Inconfidência Mineira, the earliest attempt at revolt. Their artistic leader, Tomás Antônio Gonzaga (1744-1810), is regarded as one of Brazil's greatest lyric poets, as the author of the most popular love poems in the language, Marília de Dirceu (1792; the pastoral names stand for "Gonzaga's Maria"). These poems are purely lyrical, all grace and beauty in their exaltation of carnal and spiritual love in balanced proportion. Two other names complete the trio of the great mineiro lyric poets, Cláudio Manuel da Costa (1729-89) and Alvarenga Peixoto (1744-93).

Still other mineiros wrote the best epics in Brazil. The more original and sensitive, a major precursor of romantic Indianism, is O Uruguai (1764), by Basílio da Gama; it recounts the war waged by Portugal with Spain's aid against the Indians of the Mission Towns who rebelled at transfer from Jesuit to Portuguese rule. More truly Braz. in subject, of greater art and culture but less original and less imbued with poetic genius, is Caramuru, by Santa Rita Durão; it is the story of Diogo Álvares, the shipwrecked sailor who discovered Bahia and became chieftain among the Indians there under the name of Caramuru (moray). In these poems nature varies from the bucolic, pantheistic nature of Arcady to the majestic indigenous nature as seen through baroque, gongoristic eyes: nature stylized, not as it really is.

The mineiros, influenced by theories absorbed from Rousseau and other Encyclopedists, have been called "proto-romantics." But it is only later, with political independence, that romanticism first asserts itself, firmly based, after its early steps, upon the idealized aborigine. The movement, however blurred the lines, falls into four phases:

1. Initiation (1836-40), with lyricism and religious inspiration its major characteristics. Gonçalves de Magalhães (1811-82) is its main representative, although perhaps his importance is more historical than lyrical: his Essay on the History of Literature in Brazil (1836) is the equivalent of a romantic manifesto, though the adjective does not figure in it. To theory he added example with Suspiros Poéticos e Saudades (Poetic Sighs and Yearnings), finding enthusiastic reception and disciples in Brazil, despite a lack of genuine romanticism and of poetic talent in his work.

2. Indianism (1840-50), with Gonçalves Dias (1823-64) its major exponent. He dominates all romantic poetry through his sense of sobriety and harmony. All is balanced: love and religion, feeling for nature, patriotism, sympathy for the Indian. He, better than most, infused life into the Indian theme. But one of his most famous poems is "Canção do Exílio" (Song of Exile), a delicate, poignant expression of saudade (yearning) for Brazil.

3. Phase of individualism, subjectivism, pessimism (1850-60). Least Braz. of all, these poets cultivated the worst habits and practices of the European decadents, and most died young. Principal names: Álvares de Azevedo (1831-52), Junqueira Freire (1832-55), Casimiro de Abreu (1839-60). The last-named is the simplest, most ingenuous of Braz. poets, therefore the favorite of the common folk. Junqueira Freire's poems reflect deeper and more intense suffering than any other Romantic's verse.

4. Condoreira (from the condor, bird symbolic of grandeur of flight) school of social poetry (1860-ca. 1880), linked with abolitionism and the Paraguayan War (1865-70). Now the movement bound itself more closely to Braz. reality while still remaining romantic and lyrical. The great "condor" poet, Castro Alves (1847-71), developed a social conscience, turning away from native Indianism to nativist antislavery themes, so felicitously expressing general contemporary sentiment that he became the most popular poet in Brazil. His verses exude the physical and spiritual anguish of the Negro slave, as they also do the desire of the most progressive elements in Brazil for the abolition of the Empire as well as of slavery. His Os Escravos (The Slaves) contains the two poems in which he reaches supreme heights of inspiration: Vozes de África (Voices of Africa) implores justice of God, and Navio Negreiro (Slave Ship) evokes the sufferings endured by the black cargo therein. They are impressive despite the defects of grandiloquence inherent in condoreira poetry.

Fagundes Varela (1841-75) comes between phases 3 and 4, chronologically, but in his verse all the main trends of Romanticism are found blended.

Sated with such magniloquent flights of language and with the wild subjectivism of the ultra-romantics, poets welcomed Parnassianism as a kind of panacea. Although essentially identical with the Fr. original, the movement shows some tropical modification in Brazil. Alberto de Oliveira (1857-1937), most rigidly Parnassian of the major trio, even so reflects better than the other two the lure of Braz. nature. Raimundo Correia (1859-1911) is more subtle, musical, pessimistic, of graver and more intense emotion. Olavo Bilac (1865-1918) shows a more facile sensibility, an evident virtuosity (Ronald de Carvalho calls him "pan-sensual"), and a fluent, brilliant grace of language. His Panóplias (Panoplies, first of three parts of his first edition of poems), contains a profession of faith in his Fr. masters. Parnassianism having entered the country, symbolism inevitably followed, but found fewer disciples, among whom Cruz e Sousa (1863-98) is the major poet in reaction to the narrow materialism of the Naturalists, the chill polish of the Parnassians. Symbolism was short-lived, although its effects proved lasting, as Andrade Murici has shown. The mystic poet par excellence of Braz. symbolism is Alphonsus de Guimaraens (1870-1921), who found inspiration in the themes of his Catholic faith.

The turn of the century saw a complex of influences in Braz. literature: skepticism, the cynicism of an Oscar Wilde, the defeatist satire of an Eça de Queiroz, the "barbaric" meters of a Carducci or a d'Annunzio, the ironic agnosticism of an Anatole France. Poetry was no coherent genre, had no common aim. Constructive action came only in 1922, when a group of young poets of São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro organized a "Modern Art Week" in São Paulo, consisting of a series of concerts, lectures, and exposition of the plastic arts, the whole inaugurated with an address by the celebrated novelist Graça Aranha, who lent his support to the new movement. So began Braz. modernism, not to be confused with other "modernisms."

These poets, at first destructive (first phase, 1922-30) in order to be constructive later, broke with the past, stripped away Parnassian eloquence and symbolist mistiness, cast off logic together with the syntax and vocabulary of Portugal, ignored meter and rhyme in favor of absolutely free verse, extended the scope of poetry to include the most prosaic details of life, and took on a markedly national tone, interpreting their country's past and present and stressing the Negro elements in its formation. Among the pioneers of modernism the principal name is Mário de Andrade's (1893-1945), who in 1922 published his Paulicéia Desvairada (Hallucinated City), a volume of modern poems that became the bible of modernism, as its author came to be called the "Pope of the new creed," a role thrust upon him. Not only a poet, he was a master of modernism in music and the visual arts as well as in aesthetics and criticism. Some of the first generation, like Menotti del Picchia (1892-) and Guilherme de Almeida (1890-), were converts from earlier movements; some, like Ronald de Carvalho (1893-1935), Sérgio Buarque de Holanda (1902-), and, greatest of these, Manuel Bandeira (1886-), became literary historians and critics also. Bandeira, called "the Saint John the Baptist of the new poetry" for certain elements in his work prior to 1922, is an independent spirit even though he shared in the establishment of modernism. He warns that the poet must first look to genuine inspiration, and only then to technique. His language is simple, but his concepts are not. His importance lies, besides in his verse, in his rare ability to interpret Braz. poetry and other letters to the public. The world of his poetry is the commonplace daily world, apparently nonpoetic yet transmuted by his genius to lyricism.

The first generation São Paulo poets were the most radical, their liveliest leader Oswald de Andrade (1890-1954; no relation to Mário). The cult of nationalism and regionalism permeated the group, united for a time in the magazine Klaxon (a typically grotesque name). The ebullient Oswald de Andrade advocated what he termed "primitivism," something very like the exotisme of France. A restless soul, he later formed the group that published the magazine Antropofagia (Cannibalism), a name inspired by Montaigne's famous essay. Opposing such Fr. influence, and indeed all alien "isms," Menotti del Picchia, Cassiano Ricardo (1895-) who reached the fullness of his powers only much later, Plínio Salgado (1901-) and others founded the verde-amarelo (green-yellow) group, nationalistic on an Amerindian basis; their magazine was Anta (Tapir), which they said was an animal that symbolized the barbaric original power of the land.

Modernist groups in Rio were less eager to shock the bourgeoisie, and tended to be more conservative in general. A representative example would be the group that published Festa (Holiday), to which many modernists contributed. The highest feminine poetic genius of Brazil, Cecília Meireles (1901-), was a member. Their manifesto included four points: velocidade (velocity of expression, not physical speed), totalidade (total view of reality in all its aspects), brasileidade (Braz. nationality and reality), and universalidade (universality).

The next generation of modernists is nationwide in distribution, but in general their verse possesses similar characteristics, philosophical and religious—or, more accurately, socio-political and religio-mystical. Carlos Drummond de Andrade (1902-) represents the socio-political trend. A master of irony, his Brejo das Almas (Fen of Souls, 1934) was one of the most important books of the decade. Lately this great poet has lost some of his earlier illusions about politics (e.g., belief in socialism or communism as the ideal society), but none of his reverence for poetry. Murilo Mendes (1902-), Augusto Frederico Schmidt (1906-), and Cecília Meireles are the finest examples of the religious-mystical current. Mendes has written surrealist poetry, metaphysical in tone; Schmidt (poet-wealthy industrialist-politician!) has combined Biblical inspiration and Whitmanesque rhythms; Cecília Meireles has turned to nature and Brazil's heroic past, as well as to medieval Europe, for her materials. Vinícius de Moraes (1913-) and Jorge de Lima (1895-1953) must be mentioned. Despite his youth relative to the first generation, Moraes's poetic evolution has brought him closer to those older poets, although his first two books show a sustained gravity of tone in their universal themes of religion and death. Jorge de Lima, he who wished to "restore poetry in Christ" and who wrote the mystical A Tunica Inconsútil (The Seamless Robe, 1938), compellingly presents the Negro theme in Poemas Negros (1946). His work is profoundly Christian and wholly Braz., grave in tone, deliberate in rhythm, expressed in long lines. His later works, e.g., Livro de Sonetos (Book of Sonnets) and Invenção de Orfeu (Invention of Orpheus), remain constant in feeling if they lack the proselyting force of his earlier poems. Contemporary with the oldest generation, Jorge de Lima showed himself highly versatile as he underwent successive spiritual experiences ending with a phase of symbolic verse of personal anguish; indeed, he is really contemporary with all Modernist generations.

The poets who have appeared since 1942 can be categorized only arbitrarily. Some call themselves the "Generation of 1945," although all came on the scene either before or after that year. Amoroso Lima (pseud. Tristão de Atafide) calls this period Neomodernismo, saying that Modernism died in 1945. Léo Ivo (1924-), Domingos Carvalho de Silva (1915-), João Cabral de Melo Neto (1920-), and Geir Campos (1924-) are the principal names among these younger poets who have in common an intellectualist attitude and perhaps a touch of Swiss Concretism ("A poem is a graphic thing"), a strangeness of poetic images, and other traits of previous generations, all reduced to what amounts to a system, but characterized by restraint.

Meanwhile, the older poets still living continue their creative work, although most have evolved beyond their early phases, e.g., Cassiano Ricardo, who reached his peak only after the original modernism had declined, turning into a great psychological poet who seeks his material in modern science. Generally there is now a sense of discipline (though complex), with no return to traditional forms but with a policy of aesthetic expression in the construction and the final polishing of the poem.

ANTHOLOGIES: F. A. de Varnhagen, Florilégio da Poesia Brasileira (Anth. of Braz. Poetry; v. I & II, Lisbon, 1850; v. III, Madrid, 1863; v. I is a historical sketch of Braz. letters, a genuinely pioneer work of great probity); A Nova Lit. Bras.: Crítica e Antologia (The New Braz. Lit.: Crit. and Anthol.; 1936; a collection of modernist poetry with crit. and biographical notes), and Panorama do Movimento Simbolista Bras. (3 v., 1951-52; anthol. of Braz. symbolist verse with biogr. & bibliogr. notes), both ed. J. C. de A. Murici; Antol. dos Poetas Bras. da Fase Romântica (2 ed., 1940), Antol. dos Poetas Bras. da Fase Parnassiana (2 ed., 1940), and Apresentação da Poesia Bras., seguida de uma Antol. de Versos (2 ed., 1954; an excellent introd., with crit. essay, to Braz. poetry), all ed. M. Bandeira; Modern Braz. Poetry (1962; with extremely brief but informed intr., followed by tr. of poems by twelve modernists), ed. and tr. John Nist.

HISTORY AND CRITICISM (besides above items): S. Romero, História da Lit. Bras. (1888; 5 ed., enl., 5 v., 1953-54; sociological attitude causes bias, but basic and standard, although should be reevaluated in light of subsequent criticism); J. V. D. de Matos, Hist. da Lit. Bras. (1916; 3 ed., 1954; coldly objective in considering work of art as such, with scant attention to artist as man or to society in which he moves; still basic and standard); R. de Carvalho, Pequena Hist. da Lit. Bras. (1919; 7 ed., 1944; valuable for crit. opinions; his attitude a synthesis of Romero's and Matos'); I. Goldberg, Studies in Braz. Lit. (1922; a pioneer work in Eng., treating representative figures from viewpoint similar to that of Matos); A. Grieco, Evolução da Poesia Bras. (1932); A. A. Lima, Estudos (6 v., 1927-33; series of crit. essays on many subjects, including poetry), Contribuição à Hist. do Modernismo: I. O Pre-Modernismo (1939), and Poesia Bras. Contemporânea (1942); S. Putnam, Marvelous Journey (1948; a comprehensive, very readable, introd. in Eng. to four centuries of Braz. writing); A Lit. no Brasil (Lit. in Braz.; 3 v. in 5 tomos, 1955-59; a collaboration by many critics in the most ambitious attempt yet at a lit. hist. of Braz. on aesthetic principles), gen. ed. A. Coutinho; M. Bandeira, Brief Hist. of Braz. Lit. (1958; tr., introd., and notes by R. E. Dimmick; despite its brevity and the author's modesty about his own role as poet, extremely valuable for the insight of an active participant in and interpreter of Braz. poetry; this ed. incorporates many of the author's notes for revision of the orig. ed., and many helpful data by the tr.). L.L.B.

BRETON POETRY. The language of Lower Brittany (Breiz Izel) belongs, like Welsh and Cornish, to the Brythonic or "P"-Celtic group, and is derived from the speech of settlers from southwest Britain who left their homeland from the 5th to the 7th c. when the Saxons were encroaching from the east. The earliest Bret. poetry to survive dates from the 14th c. and consists of a few scraps of verse, discovered in 1913, as doodlings on a copy of a medieval L. text. Though fewer than 20 lines in all they are the residue of a body of popular verse, now almost entirely lost, in an indigenous metrical system related to that of Cornish and early Welsh but with its own characteristics. The main feature is the occurrence in each line of a form of internal rhyme very similar to the Welsh cynganedd lusg (q.v.), although not necessarily with penultimate stress:

An heguen am louénas

An hegarat an lacat glás.

(Her smile gladdened me, the blue-eyed love.)

There is evidence, from Marie de France and others, that medieval Bret. poets sang of heroes and romance, but nothing, except the above-mentioned fragments, has survived of all that was written before the 15th c., and most of the poetry until the 19th c. is of mediocre literary merit, consisting mainly of works of religious edification. Fr. had become the language of the learned and the well-to-do, and this had arrested the development of a cultivated literary norm. Four main dialects have emerged: those of León, Tréguier, Cornouailles, and Vannes, but a literary language common to all four is hard to establish. Stemming from the work of the grammarian, Le Gonidec (1775-1838), there appeared a school of purists bent on ousting as many as possible of the Fr. words in common use, and coining others from Celtic roots. The tendency among 19th-c. poets to follow this lead has reached its extremity in the Gwalarn school of 20th-c. writers. Nevertheless, works of religious edification have continued to appear in the much decried Brezonec belec (Priest Bret.).

Most of the verse from the 15th to the beginning of the 19th c. consists of long plays of no great literary merit intended for the untutored peasantry. The native prosody of penultimate rhyme survives to the 17th c. when it is superseded by the Fr. manner of syllable counting and final rhyme, although regularity of stress is not always ignored. The themes of most of the plays are drawn from the Bible and the lives of saints. A few of the most popular plays, such as the Pevar Mab Emon (Les Quatre Fils Aymon), are based on themes drawn from chivalry, and there are a few farces. The influence of Fr. models on all these types is evident. Apart from these plays there is very little else in verse until the 18th c. is almost ended, except a few long and dreary religious poems such as the Mellezour an Maru (The Mirror of Death, 1519), metrical devout meditations, the Creed in verse, a metrical Book of Hours and a collection of carols (1650).

New stirrings begin with the two mock-epic poems of Al Lae (close of the 18th c.), but the real impetus came with the rise of 19th-c. romanticism. Auguste Brizeux published his Kanaouennou (Songs) in 1837. La Fontaine's Fables had appeared in Bret. the previous year. The great event was the publication in 1839 of Villemarqué's Barzaz Breiz (Poetry of Brittany). Much of the contents is spurious, and the claims of high antiquity are not valid, but the style is vigorous, and the effect was profound. A romantic vision of the Bret. past was created, which stirred the imagination of many, and it led to new literary enthusiasm. Luzel was impelled to collect the genuine Bret. folk poetry, of which there were two main kinds: the gwerziou, usually dramatic, in form, direct and simple in style, and concerned with local events, legends, beliefs, and folklore, and the soniou, consisting of more lyrical verse, including love songs and satires.

Prosper Proux recounted his escapades with rough humor in his native Cornouailles dialect

in 1839, but by 1866 he had acquired a more "literary" expression though not without loss of vigor. The Vannetais dialect shared early in the new literary activity, and was used in a volume of Georgics in 1849. A tone of conscious literary creation prevailed throughout the second half of the 19th c. This was set by a group of poets, the Breuzier Breiz, who derived their impulse from the purism of Le Gonidec and the romantic nationalism of Villemarqué. Luzel, and the others, many of whom lived uprooted from the Bret. countryside, expressed in a somewhat artificial diction their love of the simple life, of the homeland, and of the inheritance which was no longer secure. This tradition was maintained and reinvigorated in the 90's by the rich lyricism of Taldir, and the more artistic Erwan Barthou. The outstanding poet of the present century has been J. P. Calloc'h, killed in action in 1917, whose posthumously published volume of verse in the Vannetais dialect reveals a poet of very sensitive religious and patriotic feeling.

The 20th c., up to 1944, saw the vigorous growth of Bret. literary periodicals. Poets and other writers formed groups around each journal. Vannetais writers found expression in Dihunamb. The Gwalarn group, however, was by far the most enterprising and talented, widest in culture and most creative. Under the leadership of Roparz Hémon they pushed the synthetic and purifying tendencies of the Le Gonidec-Vallée tradition to extreme lengths, thus establishing a literary norm far removed from spoken Bret. New metrical experiments, including vers libre were encouraged, while at the same time the Gwalarn poets experimented with the native metrical system after its long disuse. Their journal, however, did not survive the "Libération." Breton poetry of fine quality continues, nevertheless, to appear, and there are signs of renewed vigor, particularly among the "Al Liamm" group.

ANTHOLOGIES: Barzhaz Breiz, comp. H. de la Villemarqué (1839); Gwerziou Breiz-Izel, comp. F. M. Luzel (2v., 1868-74); Soniou Breiz-Izel, comp. F. M. Luzel and A. le Braz (2 v., 1890); Chrestomathie bretonne, comp. J. M. Loth (1890); Les Bardes et poètes nationaux de la Bretagne Armoricaïne (1919) and La Chanson des siècles bretons, both comp. C. le Mercier d'Erm; Barzhaz: kant barzhoneg berr, 1350-1953, ed. P. Denez (1953).

GENERAL SURVEYS, with bibliog.: A le Braz, Le Théâtre celtique (1904); P. le Goff, Petite Hist. littéraire du dialecte bret. de Vannes (1924); M. Guieyesse, La Langue bretonne (1936); R. Hémon, La Langue bretonne et ses combats (1947); F. Gourvil, Langue et littérature bretonnes (1952); Istor Lennegezh

Vrezhonek an Amzer-Freman, ed. Abeozen, i.e. Y. F. M. Eliès (1957). D.M.L.

BREVE. See PROSODIC NOTATION.

BROADSIDE BALLAD. A song printed on a single sheet and hawked about the streets of British towns and at country fairs during the period 1500-1920. The broadsheet was usually decorated with a crude woodcut and advised that the song be sung "To the tune of . . ."—here specifying a tune in the common repertory. Musical notation was seldom given. Although mainly doggerel verse, especially the topical songs, literary poetry was also occasionally vended on broadsheets. In the course of time, the sheets shrunk from five-column folio size to single-column slips. Many broadside ballads were remade by rural tradition into folk song; reciprocally, folk songs were sometimes printed as broadsides. The three of four decades after the Civil War were the heyday of broadside balladry in America; its last stronghold was in Negro communities before World War I.—The Common Muse, ed. V. de Sola Pinto and A. E. Rodway (1957); L. Shepard, The Broadside Ballad (1962). A.B.F.

BROKEN RHYME refers to the division of a word (not the rhyme) at the end of a line in order to produce a rhyme: forgetful/debt (Pope); tu-tor/U-niversity (George Canning). Poets from Shakespeare to Ogden Nash have used b.r. for comic or satiric effects; yet Hopkins has taken it as a resource for serious poetry, e.g., in The Windhover and To what serves Mortal Beauty? J. Schipper (A History of Eng. Versification, 1910) cites another type of b.r., which, however, is usually referred to as mosaic rhyme (q.v.).

BUCOLIC. The term is ordinarily used as a synonym of pastoral. Virgil's ten pastoral poems, to which he refers as "pastorem carmen" in the fourth georgic and to which the term "eclogue" is now generally applied, were called "bucolics" by the grammarians. During the Renaissance and 17th c. there was a tendency to reserve the term "b." for Virgil's eclogues and for the imitations of them. The critics argued that in primitive times wealthy men—princes, even—were the keepers of cattle, not the keepers of sheep or of goats. Since pastorals in the Virgilian tradition portray people of culture and refinement, they insisted that it would be more accurate to use the term "b." when referring to poems of this type. In modern Eng. the term has a slightly humorous connotation, though it is too vague to be recorded except in a few dictionaries. See ECLOGUE, PASTORAL. J.E.C.

BULGARIAN POETRY

BUCOLIC DIAERESIS. See DIAERESIS.

BULGARIAN POETRY. Bulg. literature is old, but Bulg. poetry is relatively young. This paradox can be easily explained by the fact that, although Bulgaria was the original home of the Church Slavonic language, which was spread among all the orthodox Slavs, the Bulg. clergy was predominantly Gr. for many centuries, and their control of the church and the economy forced the Bulgarians into a backward state, while the Turkish political occupation almost completed the ruin of the country.

The early folk poems are of many types. They deal with all the aspects of peasant life and its hardships. Many of them are epic narratives similar to those of the Serbs and dealing with the same heroes, such as Marko the King (Marko Kral) of Prilep. As compared with the Serb epics, they seem to contain more original history and less idealization.

For some centuries in Bulgaria, there was no poetry in the modern sense of the word. Its place was taken by Gr. songs, sometimes with Bulg. phrases inserted in alternate lines. Truly Bulg. poetry was not written until the emergence of modern Bulgaria, usually dated by the History of Father Paisi in the latter part of the 18th c.

The earliest writers produced by this revival worked with the object of arousing their people against the Turks. Many of them, such as Dobri Chintulov (1822-86), Georgi Stoykov Rakovski (1821-65), and Lyuben Karavelov (1837-79), had lived in Russia, chiefly in and around Odessa, and thus had come to know Rus. literature, especially the works of the revolutionists of the day. Yet their works are less influenced by abstract ideas than by the needs of the Bulg. people. Perhaps the first author to pass beyond purely political poetry was Petko Rachev Slaveykov (1827-95). A teacher as well as an active patriot, he wrote to replace the popular Gr. songs and produced many lyrics of high quality.

Of this early group the outstanding poet was Khristo Botev (1848-76). A typical revolutionist, he died with a small band of men who tried to cross the Danube into Bulgaria to start an uprising. His poetry is so full of dynamic beauty, together with passion against the oppressors of his people, that his position is secure among the Bulg. people, no matter what the regime.

After the liberation of the country, a somewhat similar position was held by Ivan Vazov (1850-1921). Vazov was the first to introduce a knowledge of world literature into Bulgaria; he handled all forms of writing—poetry, prose, drama—and dealt with all phases of Bulg.

life, from the earliest coming of the Bulgars to his own day. Unlike the storm-tossed Botev, he led a quiet and literary existence and achieved his fame by hard and continued work. He is undoubtedly the foremost Bulg. author of his day.

The next generation was represented by Pencho Slaveykov (1866-1912), Peyu Yavorov (1877-1914), and Petko Yu. Todorov (1879-1916). Definitely poets in the Western sense, these men were self-conscious artists, and their work reflects contemporary movements in the West. They formed, as it were, a reaction against the Rus. tradition and devoted themselves to Western ideas, whether taken from Germany or from Ibsen, although they did not isolate themselves from Bulg. reality.

Symbolism was the next movement to appear in Bulg. poetry. Introduced by Todor Trayanov (1882-), a poet of considerable importance, the movement found further exponents in Dimcho Debelyanov (1887-1916), who was killed in World War I and left only some fifty poems, which are, however, recognized as masterpieces, and in Nikolay Liliyev (1886-).

The defeat of Bulgaria in the Second Balkan War and World War I, and the political and social unrest which followed, changed the spirit of the literature. Less optimistic, the newer generation sought to resolve its problems by mysticism, particularly a revival of Bogomilism, a medieval Bulg. religious movement. It expressed its nationalism in a glorification of the past which developed into a definite historical school. At the same time, there were many independent authors of various types, such as Elisaveta Bagryana (1894-) and Angel Karaliychev (1902-). During these years the more radical poets and those connected with the Peasant Party, such as Geo Melev (1895-1925) and D. Polanov (1899-1953), dropped into the background.

At the conclusion of World War II, the Communists seized control in Bulgaria and forced literature into the mold of socialist realism by silencing or imprisoning all authors who would not accept this doctrine. They re-examined the writers of the past, enthusiastically accepting Botev and overstressing certain aspects of his genius. They have been more hesitant in regard to Vazov. At first they condemned him, but he was so popular that they now tend to praise some of his earlier works, while criticizing or ignoring later ones that do not fit their purposes.

In general terms, the dean of Bulg. authors is now Lyudmil Stoyanov (b. 1888), long accepted as a competent writer with some orientation to the Left, who—after the rise of Fascism—swung definitely into the Communist camp. There are also such men as Anton Rastsvetnikov, who began to write before World War II, and Krum Kyulyakov (b. 1893). Still, far too much work has been published like Partisan Songs of V. Georgiev (1947), which scarcely goes beyond the setting in verse of the ordinary political clichés.

During the early postwar years when Communism was taking root, literature was heavily controlled. The principles of the Soviet writer Zhdanov were carefully inculcated and followed. Younger authors, such as Khristo Radevski, Mladen Isayev, and others, stoutly pledged their devotion to the Party, and knew no limits to their adulation. This mood was easier to induce because of the pro-Russianism of the population, especially after the events of 1876-77.

With the downfall of the cult of personality as practiced by Chervenkov, signs of revolt appeared, and after the Twentieth Congress of the Party, there were even demands that more freedom be given to the writers, although they were opposed by some of the more ardent. Even Stoyanov pleaded for the recognition of objective truth in literature, but the liberal movement was soon defeated, especially after Khrushchev in 1957 declared that the Party had to maintain control over literature. Since that time Bulg. poetry seems to have acquiesced in its Communist role. It has none of the independence and variety that formerly marked the differing schools of Bulg. writers and found vent in long and earnest discussions.

The contrast between a strong tendency to follow the Rus. spirit and a deep peasant individualism creates the present impasse in Bulg., and it is still too early to see how it is to be solved and what form Bulg. poetry will take.

ANTHOLOGIES: Poètes bulgares, ed. G. A. Dzivgov (1927); Antologia della poesia bulgara contemporanea, ed. E. Damiani (1950); Bolgarskiye Poety (1952); Canti popolari bulgari, tr. L. Salvini (1958).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: D. Shishmanov, A Survey of Bulg. Lit., tr. C. A. Manning (1932); B. Penev, Istoriia na novata bulgarska literatura (4 v., 1930-36); N. Donchev, Influences étrangères dans la litt. bulgare (1934) and Esquisse d'un tableau de la nouvelle litt. bulgare (1935); A. Cronia, Saggi di litt. bulgara antica (1936); G. Hateau, Litt. bulgare (1937) and Panorama de la litt. bulgare contemporaine (1937); C. A. Manning, "Communism and Bulg. Lit.," Am. Bulg. Review, 5 (1956); C. A. Manning and R. S. Smal-Stocki, Hist. of Modern Bulg. Lit. (1960).
C.A.M.

BURDEN, burthen. (a) The refrain or chorus of a song: "Foote it featly heere and there, and sweete Sprights beare the burthen, Burthen dispersedly. Harke, harke, bowgh, wawgh"

(Shakespeare, Tempest 1.2.380). (b) The chief theme, the leading sentiment, of a song or poem: "The burden or leading idea of every couplet was the same" (L. Hunt, Men, Women & Books 1.11.199).—R. L. Greene, The Early Eng. Carols (1935).
R.O.E.

BURLESQUE. No good purpose can be served by a too rigid insistence upon nomenclature in a discussion of parody, burlesque, or travesty in literature. All three employ the device of incongruous imitation and deflationary treatment of serious themes for satiric purposes. There is some general agreement among authorities that parody (q.v.) is the more exclusively literary and critical method, fixing the attention closely on an individual style or poem, while b. is freer to strike at social or literary eccentricity by employing such established verse conventions as the love-romance, the pastoral, the courtly tradition, or the Homeric manner. More important than such distinctions perhaps is what they have in common. George Kitchin states that parody and b., in modern times, have both represented "the reaction of custom to attempted change" and of established social forces and literary forms to subversive excess. They have increasingly become voices of conservatism. Four main types or genres have become identified with the history of poetic b.: Scarronesque poetry (from Paul Scarron's Fr. Virgile travestie, 1648-52); Hudibrastic poetry (from Butler's burlesque poem Hudibras, 1663-64); dramatic b. like Gay's Beggar's Opera, 1728, a burlesque of It. opera sometimes described as an early forerunner of the operettas of Gilbert and Sullivan; and the straight mock-heroic as practiced by Dryden and Pope. B. poetry has had a long foreground in classic comedy (Aristophanes), in medieval church history and ritual where it usually served as a weapon against hierarchy, in Chaucer who used satire against the medieval romance and mock-heroic technique in "The Nun's Priest's Tale," in the Renaissance when anti-Petrarchans debunked the love and pastoral conventions, and in the 17th c., when metaphysical verse was often burlesqued. About 1650, however, b. began to be used as a conscious critical term derived from the Fr. anticlassical burlesque of Scarron and Boileau (Le Lutrin, 1674) in which the primary device was the substitution in a heroic composition of bourgeois for aristocratic manners. Scarron had many Eng. imitators, but it remained for Butler to evolve an original Eng. form of the b. in which jogging couplets and quick turns of mood and line are combined with a central theme parallel to Don Quixote, in a broad attack on Puritanism, pedantry, romance, religious bigotry, and superstition.

In the 18th c. the accent shifted from Scar-ron and Butler to mock-heroic verse in couplets. Leaving aside prose burlesques of Defoe, Swift, and Fielding (and Irving in America), the historian must mention Dryden's burlesque animal fable used for polemical purposes (The Hind and the Panther), Pope's vengeful satires in the Dunciad vein, and the dramatic b. of which Buckingham's The Rehearsal was the archetype. These and other belittling treatments of Augustan modes fall within the class of the older satirical imitations where types and general styles, social and religious practices, or literary rivals are the targets. Modern critical parody of specific poems or poets emerged as a later form leaving b. mainly as a form of popular stage entertainment or a looser form of parody often in prose. Parody and b. existed side by side in the early Punch which, under Douglas Jerrold's editorship, was dedicated to liberal social causes. Punch later grew conservative becoming an organ of well-bred mid-Victorian complacency.

In modern times b. has most commonly been found on the stage, ridiculing the drama or the fashions of the day. Fielding's and Gay's satiric plays (The Thumb, The Beggar's Opera) are early examples. Gay's work anticipates the extremely popular 19th-c. form of musical entertainment exemplified in the work of W. S. Gilbert, G. A. Sala, and F. C. Burnand. In Germany stage b. was a popular way of deflating the romantic vogue of Sturm und Drang (q.v.) and the classical tragedy or Wagnerian opera. The names of Platen, Heine, and Johann Nestroy are usually mentioned in accounts of German literary humor. Weber and Fields turned the stage b. into a musical vaudeville successful on the Broadway stage around 1900, and since that time the tendency of b. has been more and more toward light, ribald stage effects or comic operas and away from the critical purpose of literary parody.—K. F. Flögel, Geschichten des Burlesken (1794); G. Kitchin, A Survey of B. and Parody in Eng. (1931); A. H. West, L'Influence française dans la poésie burlesque en Angleterre entre 1660–1700 (1931); R. P. Bond, Eng. B. Poetry, 1700–1750 (1932); E. A. Richards, Hudibras in the B. Tradition (1937); V. C. Clinton-Baddeley, The B. Tradition in the Eng. Theatre after 1660 (1952); F. Bar, Le Genre b. en France au 17^e s.: Etude de style (1960). R.P.F.

BURMESE POETRY. Many Burm. poems have been discovered in stone inscriptions of dates from 1310 A.D. onward. The passages describing the glory and achievements of kings and princes, and the noble lineage of queens and princesses are usually in verse, as are also prayers for the donor and his friends and curses on those who damaged his benefaction.

These stone poems were clearly designed to be permanent records.

Side by side with these there existed another kind of poetry, less formal and more emotional in character. This was scratched with stylus on palm-leaves, and the best known of the older specimens is dated 1455 A.D. From the 15th to the last quarter of the 19th c. under the patronage of Buddhist monarchs, poems of varied lengths and on varied subjects were composed by monks (Shin Thi-la-wun-tha, Shin Ra-hta-tha-ra), courtiers (Na-wa-de the First and Nat-shin-naung), or royal ladies (Mi Hpyu and the Hlaing Princess). Their poems were not addressed to posterity but to royal patrons or beloved ones.

There are altogether more than fifty different kinds of poems and songs, among which the most important are: (1) E-gyin, historical ballads, some of which were sung as cradle songs while others informed young princes or princesses of the achievements of their ancestors. (2) Maw-gun, panegyric odes, perhaps the oldest type of poem. Their subjects range from the arrival at the Court of a white elephant to the campaign in and conquest of Siam, and from the completion of a canal to an essay on cosmography. (3) Pyo, metrical versions of Buddhist and non-Buddhist stories, in narrative or expository form, transferred to a Burm. setting and made more vivid by small imaginative details, and homilies in verse. (4) Lin-ga (Pali alankāra, ornamentation) a variety of pyo but generally shorter; often used as a generic term for all kinds of verse. (5) Ya-du (Sanskrit ritū, season) the shortest type, usually of 3 or fewer stanzas, deal generally with romantic subjects such as emotions called forth by the changing seasons, the mood of longing and memories of loved ones.

The forms in which Burm. poetry is cast are of uncertain origin. Writers on Burm. prosody have attempted to force these poems into a Procrustean bed of Sanskrit and Pali pattern. But their distinguishing feature (the climbing rhyme schemes) appears to be peculiar to Burma and the 4-syllable lines with an end or break marked by lines of usually 7 syllables, is in harmony with the rhythm of the spoken language. The foundation of the verse is the than-jat chorus, e.g.: "tabe: ya. lou. tamu: hlu / dou. shan: taun-dhu / tu-nain you: la:" // (We, Shan Taungthus, earn one anna and give away two. Could anyone rival us?) From this followed the than-bauk, a 3-line epigram "min: pari. ye / ngatin.de / na: we male-sha" // (Poor Nga Tin Dè did not understand the king's trick!) The rhyme schemes are rigid. As a rule each line has 4 syllables and the stanza contains, as in the than-bauk, climbing rhymes in groups of three. In other forms of verse the rhyme scheme is looser. The lines may consist of 3, 4, 5, or more syllables. A rhyme may be confined to 2 lines. These forms, however, may be regarded as variations of the main scheme of Burm. pyo prosody, rather than as an essentially different type of verse.

The last eighty years have seen the advent of the printing press, the cessation of royal patronage in 1885, the introduction of Eng. education, the founding of the University of Rangoon in 1920, and the creation of the Union of Burma in 1948. During this eventful period Burm. poetry underwent significant changes. In the 1930's an influential literary movement called Khitsan ("Experiment for a new age") was formed, which stressed simplicity, directness, and purity of language. Commoners have assumed the role of poets and have to cater to a larger public with a catholic taste. Short poems have replaced the traditional long epics. But Burm. poetry still retains its distinctive character.

IN ENGLISH: Jour. of the Burma Research Soc., Rangoon (1910-), esp.: (a) Ba Han, "Seindakyawthu, Man and Poet," v. 8; (b) Po Byu and B. H., "Shin Uttamagyaw and his Tawla, a Nature Poem," v. 7-10; (c) U Ba Thein, "A Dictionary of Burm. Authors," tr. G. H. Luce and Maung Ba Kya, v. 10; (d) G. H. Luce, "Prayers and Curses," v. 26; Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies (London), v. 12 and esp. v. 13 (article on Maw-gun); Minthuwun (a selection of Minthuwun's poems and prose with Eng. tr. by G. H. Luce, 1961); Maung Htin Aung, Burm. Drama (1937); Hla Pe, Konmara Pya Zat (pt. 1, introd. and tr., contains various rhyme schemes and forms of Burm. prosody, 1952); U On Pe, "Modern Burm. Lit.: Its Background in the Independence Movement," Atlantic Monthly, 201 (Feb. 1958); Hla Pe, Burm. Proverbs (1962).

IN BURMESE: Anth. of Burm. Lit., ed. U. Kyaw Dun (4 v., 1926-31); U Tin, Kabyabandhathara Kyan (1929; Burm. prosody); Saya Lun, Kabyatharahta Thingyo (1931; Burm. prosody); Pe Maung Tin, Hist. of Burm. Lit. (1947); Zawgyi and Min Thu Wun, Sa-pe Loka (1st ser., 1948; "On Life and Letters"; anthol. of verse with comments); E. Maung, Kabya Pan Gon (1950; "A Garland of Burm. Poems"). See also Ba Thaug, Sa-hso-daw-mya Athokpat-ti (1962; "Biog. of Burm. Authors"). H.P.

BURNS STANZA, or Burns meter (also called "Scottish stanza," "Habbie stanza," and the "6-line stave"). A 6-line stanza rhyming aabab, lines 1, 2, 3, and 5 being tetrameter and lines 4 and 6 dimeter. It takes its name from the use made of it by Burns in To a Louse, Holy Willie's Prayer, and in many of his other vernacular poems. The stanza, however, may be found in Prov. poems of the 11th c., and it occurs commonly in Eng. romances and miracle plays of the Middle Ages. Despite its intricacy, the form is highly effective, especially in the hands of a master like Burns. Following the crescendo of the initial tercet, the short lines lend themselves to effects of irony and epigram:

Ye ugly, creepin, blastit wonner,
Detested, saunt'd by saunt an' sinner,
How daur ye set your fit upon her,
Sae fine a lady!
Gae somewhere else, and seek your dinner
On some poor body.

(To a Louse, stanza 2)

The meter was also used by Wordsworth in his At the Grave of Burns.—A. H. MacLaine, "New Light on the Genesis of the Burns Stanza," N&Q, 198 (1953).

BYELORUSSIAN POETRY reflects the sad fate of its people. Being Eastern Slavs living in the vicinity of Polotsk, Smolensk, Minsk, Homel, and Grodno, the Byelorussians received Christianity and learning from Ukrainian Kiev, the center of ancient Rus'. In the 1st half of the 13th c., the Tartars destroyed Kievian Rus' and the B-r. lands were merged with Lithuania, which as a less civilized country adopted B-r. as its official language (actually there was a fusion of B-r., Ukr. and Church Slavic, and the writings are claimed by all Eastern Slavs).

After the Union of Lithuania with Poland in 1569, almost all of the B-r. upper class became Polonized and embraced Catholicism, while the peasantry remained Orthodox and preserved the B-r. language and rich folk songs, some of which date from pre-Christian times. The earliest monuments of written literature (in Church Slavic with B-r. influence) are the Lithuanian Annals (1380-1446), the Annals of Avraamka (1495), Dr. F. Skaryna's (1490-?) Bible translation (in Prague, 1517), and Poems by A. Rymsha (16th c.). The Polish Jesuits used B-r. (influenced by Polish) for their rhymed "intermedia" in the "school dramas" (16th c.). Simon Polotsky (1629-80), the court poet of Tsar Alexis of Moscow, wrote in Rus.: Rhythmologion, Flowery Plesauince (1678) and Rhymed Psalter. His baroque style was quite elaborate, but there was little true feeling in his verse.

In 1795 Russia acquired all B-r. territory. Soon after, modern B-r. poetry began with V. Rovinski's travesty of the Aeneid after the similar Ukrainian version of Kotlyarevsky (1798) and the anonymous comic epos, Taras on Parnassus, ridiculing serfdom. Some liberal landowners contributed to the national awakening. The didactic poet Y. Chachot (1797-1847) and the poet-dramatist V. Dunin-Martsinkevich (1807-84) created romantic types of benevolent landlords, who saw their peasants as human beings (poems: Hapon, 1854, Evening Party, 1855, Harvest Festival at Shawrovo, 1857). I. Nosovich in 1874 collected and published B-r. Songs, a collection of folklore and poems on the life of the peasants.

But it was a peasant's son, Maciej Burachok (F. Bahushevich, 1840-1900) who with his B-r. Flute (Krakow, 1891) and B-r. Bow (Posen, 1894) created realistic, truly national poetry, extolling the human dignity of his countrymen and calling upon them to struggle for a better, freer life. His works, banned in the Rus. Empire, only with difficulty reached his homeland. Similar work was done by Yanka Luchyna (1851-97) and the ardent revolutionist "Ciotka" (the Aunt) Aloyza Pashkevich (1876-1916).

After the Revolution of 1905, the ban on B-r. writing imposed in 1863 was relaxed, and in 1906 the first B-r. literary periodical Nasha Niva (Our Field) began to appear in Vilna and marked the real New Renaissance in B-r. literature; all of the younger poets contributed. As a result of their work and the patriotism of the people, an independent B-r. National Republic was proclaimed on February 25, 1918. It was overrun by the Bolsheviks and replaced by the BSSR on January 1, 1919. However, this was partitioned in 1921 by Poland and Soviet Russia, whose armies "united" it again on September 17, 1939. All these turbulent events and wars were deeply reflected in B-r. literature.

Among the new poets was the highly talented Maksim Bahdanovich (1891-1917), a symbolist with strong realistic leanings. In his collection Wreath (1912) he treated universal problems and also the simple beauty of Byelorussia and the richness and charm of its nature and stressed the coming of a newer, brighter day.

From the Niva group emerged the greatest B-r. poet and spiritual leader, Yanka Kupala (I. Lutsevich, 1882-1942). In his lyric and social poems, The Flute (1908), Eternal Song (1910), The Dream on the Mound (1910), he defended the human dignity of the peasants and their desire "to be called people," and he and Kolas (see below) even won the encouragement of M. Gorky. Kupala's next poems, Along the Road of Life (1913), Legacy, On the Nemen River, The Destroyed Nest (1919), are his most mature works. He continued to dwell on social problems, urged his people to struggle for an independent Byelorussia, and wrote indignantly after the Bolshevik occupation on August 28, 1919, about "Byelorussia in shackles," an act which caused angry retorts by Communist critics. In 1922, Kupala wrote a highly artistic comedy, Natives, and the poem Facing the Future. His last free poem was My Village,

You are Disappearing, 1929 (about forced collectivization).

In 1929-30 the Bolsheviks began to liquidate "B-r. Nat. Democrats." Kupala was arrested (1930) and attempted suicide in his cell. His life was saved and as the critics said: "The attention [terror] of the Party helped Kupala and Kolas to become active builders of the new, national in form but socialist in content, culture and literature." In his new role he glorified the Party and Soviet reality in various poems, On the River Aresa (1933), Barysaw (1934), The Song on Construction (1936), To Decorated Byelorussia (1937). Only in The Song of Taras (1939) on the Ukrainian poet Shevchenko and in such short poems as Lavonikha, Turochka, Alesya and Flax, written in folk song style, did he show his former poetical talent. During the invasion of Hitler in 1941, he composed highly patriotic poems such as To the B-r. Partisans, The People Arose, Again We Will be Free, and he showed Soviet fanaticism in The Dictatorship of Labor which will "Destroy the palaces, the gangsterism of the dollar" and "build life as in a fairy tale for all ages and generations." However, in Kupala's collected works edited by the Soviets, all his B-r. patriotic poems are excluded.

Yakub Kolas (K. Mitskevich, 1882-1956), the second greatest B-r. poet, showed in his first lyrics, Songs of Sorrow (1910), great talent and profound sensitivity to social injustice. In To Work (1917) he appealed to God for his people's independence and condemned the Soviet regime in Native Pictures (1921) and Repercussion (1922). His best works are the New Land (1923) on the peasant life in the 19th c. and Simon the Musician (1925), depicting a poor village artist who lives to please the people. Some have seen the poem as an allegory with Simon as a renescent B-r. poet, awakening the conscience of his people; his sweetheart Hanna as Byelorussia; the evil Mr. Daminik as an occupying power.

But by 1926 Kolas had embraced communism and expressed his new faith in such works as Our Days (1937) and Under Stalin's Sun (1940). During World War II, he wrote poems on the partisans such as Trial in the Forest (1943) and Retribution (1945), and on hardships in Poland, e.g., The Fisherman's Hut (1947). In addition he wrote novels, dramas, and articles, and has been considered along with Kupala the real creator of modern B-r. literature.

The pressure applied after 1930 broke the spirit of all the free writers, and if it failed to do so, authors by the hundreds disappeared forever, though a few reappeared after the death of Stalin. It did not spare even earlier Communist authors, such as Tsishka Hartny (Zm. Zhylunovich). Stalinization reached its peak in the submissive, collective poem, Letter of the B-r. People to the Great Stalin (1936). Later poets like Zmitrok Byadula (S. Plawnik, 1886-1941) son of the Jewish ghetto, who had been a free spirit and praised an independent Byelorussia, suffered; while M. Lyn'kow, K. Chorny, R. Trus, P. Browka, A. Zvonak, P. Hlebka and K. Krapiva wrote on the duly legalized Soviet themes in terms of Socialist realism.

In 1939 after the liberation of Western Byelorussia, new poets born under Polish rule appeared, such as M. Mashara, P. Pyastrak (Z'vyastun) and the talented Maksim Tank (E. Skurko, b. 1912) who wrote Naroch (1937), Yanuk Syaliba (1943) and a collection So They Know (1947) on Soviet heroism.

In the Zhdanov period (1946) a new campaign was launched against "cosmopolitanism" and in 1951 against "B-r. nationalism." Literature was not affected by the Russian "thaw" (1954-56), but there were enough deviations to arouse Party anger and cause "confessions of errors" by authors during the Twenty-Third Congress (1959). Only Communist didacticism, the cult of Lenin, and the Party are regarded as fit subjects for poets, as is shown by M. Kalachynski's Harvest Festival at Kalasowka (1956) which treats the Party Congress as a source of joy in every home, or P. Browka's Always with Lenin (1956), Voice of Mother (1960), P. Panchenko's Patriotic Song (1957), and A. Makayanka's Lyavonikha in Orbit (1960). Among the new poets U. Karatkevich and Y. Los' are worthy of mention, but, under the vigilance of the Party, B-r. literature is kept at a provincial "national" level and does not rise to the height of the early achievements of Kupala, Kolas, and their group.

The B-r. Diaspora continues its modest literary tradition; for instance, in Canada there exists a poetical group, Bayavaya Ūskalos', publishing a journal by the same name, wherein short poems appear by A. Zmahar, P. Sirata, A. Ivers, M. Khvedarovich, and others.

ANTHOLOGIES: Xrestamatyja belaruskaj literatury, ed. M. Harecki (1921); Xrestam. novaj b-r. lit., ed. I. Dvarcanin (1927); V. Zub, Mastachaj slova (1956); Bayavaya Ūskalos', nos. 6 and 7 (Toronto, 1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. F. Karskij, Belorussy, III (1922) and Gesch. der weissrussischen Volksdichtung und Lit. (1926); M. M. Pjotuxovič, Narysy historyi b-r. lit. (1928); L. Blende and A. Kuxar, "Mataryjaly da narysow pa historyi b-r. lit.," Maladnjak, no. 5 (Minsk, 1931); S. Stankievich, "Kupala in Fact and Fiction," B-r. Review, no. 3 (Munich, 1956); B-r. soveckaja lit., ed. V. Barysenka and M. Lyn'kow (AN BSSR, 1958); A. Adamovich, "Forty Years of B-r. Lit. in the BSSR," B-r. Review, no. 7 (1959); Pis'menniki Soveckaj

Belarusi (1959; biographical directory). See also other articles on B-r. poetry in B-r. Review, nos. 1- (1954-); L. I. Zaleskaja, Po-ezija Sovetskaj Belorussii (1960); S. I. Vasilënok, Folklor i literatura Belorussii (1961). J.F.P.

BYLINA (also called starina). A Rus. oral epic, couched in blank verse, with occasional grammatical rhymes, which celebrates in a highly formalized style the exploits of a folk-hero (bogatyř). Typically the action of a b. is set in Kievan Russia of the 10th-12th c. and revolves around an outstanding member of the ruler's retinue and his superhuman deeds of valor. Prince Vladimir, the King Arthur of the Rus. epic tradition, usually appears here as a secondary character. The apotheosis of the hero is bolstered by grandiose similes and extravagant hyperboles. The "ancient history" quality of the b. is reflected in the lavish use of morphological and lexical archaisms. While most of the b. plots seem to have originated in Southwestern Russia, in the Pre-Mongol era, in modern times they were preserved chiefly in the outlying provinces of the Far North, e.g., along the coast of the Arctic Ocean and around Lake Onega. It was there that, in the 18th and 19th c., these epics were heard and recorded by collectors of Rus. folklore such as K. Danilov, Rybnikov, Gilferding. Today the art of narrating byliny is well-nigh extinct.—M. Speransky, Byliny (2 v., 1916-19); A. Skaftymov, Po-etika i genezis bylin (1924); N. K. Chadwick, Rus. Heroic Poetry (1932); Yu. Sokolov, Rus. Folklore (1950). V.E.

BYZANTINE POETRY. The majority of Byz. literary works labor under the classical Gr. linguistic and literary traditions, which smothered much of their originality. Only in religious poetry did Byz. literature break fresh ground and approach greatness, and only from the 13th c. onward did it use a language approximating that spoken by contemporary Greeks.

The first three centuries of the Eastern Roman Empire were a period of transition from pagan Roman and Hellenistic to a Christian Byz. culture. This is reflected in the poetry of the time. Christian fervor appears side by side with an orgiastic love of life; hymns are composed in a Christian and pagan spirit, and grandiose ekphrasis (descriptions of works of art) celebrate Christian and pagan masterpieces. Of these the description of the Church of Sancta Sophia by Paul the Silentary (fl. 563) is undoubtedly the most significant, extolling the twin grandeur of church and state, around which Byz. life was to revolve.

I. RELIGIOUS POETRY. Originally Byz. religious poetry used a number of classical Gr. meters, the hexameter, elegiac, iambic, anacreontic, and anapaestic, as can be seen from the writings of Methodius, Synesius, and Gregory of Nazianzus (4th-5th c.). But very soon the new rhythmic meters prevailed, whose effect relied on the number of syllables and the place of the accents within a line. These, together with the admiration for the martyrs and devotion to the mysteries of the new religion, gave Byz. religious poetry a power and freshness which remained unequalled in subsequent medieval Gr. writings.

The rhythmic Byz. hymns fall into three periods; the first (4th-5th c.) characterized by short hymns, the Troparia; the second (6th-7th c.) by long and elaborate metrical sermons, the Kontakia; and the third (7th-9th c.) by a form of hymn-cycle called Kanon. The second is the great period of Gr. hymnography. In its early part lived Romanus (6th c.) the most celebrated Byz. religious poet. Some eighty-five of his works have been preserved, all metrical sermons for various feasts of the Orthodox Church. They were accompanied by music, which is now lost, and were apparently rendered in a kind of recitative resembling oratorios. Romanus, being a conscientious Christian, treated his subjects exactly as the church ordained. Occasionally, however, he gives rein to his fancy, and at such times becomes grandiloquent in the style of epideictic oratory. His language on the whole is pure; he is rich in metaphor and imagery, and often interweaves in his narrative whole passages from Holy Scripture. His main fault is an oriental love of size, unpalatable to the modern reader. Andrew, Bishop of Crete (ca. 660-740) initiates the third period of Byz. religious poetry with his Major Kanon, a composition of huge size, in which elaboration of form results in a decline of power and feeling. The two most important representatives of this period are St. John Damascene (7th-8th c.) and his foster brother Kosmas of Maiouma. As a hymnographer, St. John Damascene was greatly renowned. He returned to the use of quantitative verse, even endeavoring to combine it with modern meters.

The storm of the iconoclastic controversy, which broke out in the lifetime of St. John Damascene, brought in its wake a reaction which resulted in a new florescence of hymnography. Works (mostly anonymous) of writers of this period finally found their way into the liturgy of the Eastern Church, and replaced the older hymns and metrical sermons of the days of Romanos. Of the posticonoclast poets Symeon the Mystic (949-1022) certainly ranks highest. In Byz. poetry he is the most important figure after Romanos, although his fervent mystical poems tend to be formless and often obscure. Moreover, he is the first person known to have used the 15-syllable verse (politikos stichos; see VERSUS POLITICUS) in personal poetry, the verse which in later years was to become supreme in the Gr. world.

Byz. religious poetry was to accomplish a great historical mission. It not only kept alive Gr. national and Christian feeling in the face of numerous barbarian invasions, but also scattered to East, West, and North the seeds that later blossomed into the literatures and cultures of other peoples—the Russians, the Southern Slavs, the Rumanian, the Syrians, the Copts, and the Armenians.

II. EPIC POETRY. The historical court epics of the late Hellenistic era survived in the early Byz. centuries. If we are to judge by their scanty remains, they had limited artistic merit. The greatest representative of the historical epic, or rather the epic encomium, and one of the most distinguished Byz. poets was George Pisides (7th c.). Some of his most important verse is in praise of his patron emperor Heraclius, whose victory over the Persians he celebrated. In the hands of Pisides new Byz. meters begin to take shape, and in particular the Byz. 12-syllable iambic verse, which was to become the principal meter of subsequent "highbrow" medieval Gr. poetry. But the most important Byz. epic cycle apparently originated in the provinces of the East in the course of the 10th c. It centered round the heroic figure of Digenes (who symbolized the ideal of medieval Gr. manhood) and spread from the deserts of Syria to the Rus. steppes, and even reached the remote Gr. colonies of Southern Italy. Of this we possess today only a small number of isolated folk songs (the Akritic Ballads), some of great power and beauty, and half a dozen versions, ranging from the 12th to the 17th c., of a long poem now lost, the so-called Epic of Basil Digenes Akritas. They all differ in language and style and even in the sequence of the narrative. In this epic we find Gr. and Hellenistic motifs blended with Eastern elements, as well as a number of baffling historical facts anything but contemporary.

III. LYRIC POETRY. The epigram in the Hellenistic sense of the term (the short occasional poem) was the type of lyric poetry most cultivated in Byzantium. At first it followed the late Hellenistic patterns, as the works of Agathias (6th c.), Paul the Silentiary, and others show. But from the 7th c. the new religious spirit permeates it and is expressed in the predilection of churches, monastic life, and holy relics as subjects. Theodore Studites (759-826) is the most important representative in this trend. Cassia, often and unjustly called the Sappho of Byzantium, followed him in the 9th c. But the heyday of the Byz. epigram is the 10th and the 11th c. For it was then that John Geometres (Kyriotes), Christophoros of Mitylene, and John Mavropous flourished.

They reverted to the older Hellenistic influences, and their verse displays both feeling and refined wit. The only other type of Byz. "highbrow" lyrical poetry worth mentioning is the Lament. This often takes the form of an address to the poet's soul, or of a dirge or complaint, full of the ascetic spirit of the time. It was influenced by the long and insipid autobiographical poetry of Gregory of Nazianzus, yet many important Byz. poets, like George Pisides or Christophoros of Mitylene, indulged in it, and it continued in the form of "a moral admonition" or "the prayer of a sinner" till the end of the Byz. era.

Medieval erudite poetry, permeated as it was by the ascetic spirit, did not draw on profane love for inspiration, one of the greatest sources of lyricism of all centuries. Such Byz. love poetry as has survived is written in a more or less demotic tongue, and is to be found in the love letters (the Pittakia) of the verse romances (see below, section 4), or in certain modern Gr. folk songs whose origins can be traced back to the Middle Ages.

IV. VERSE ROMANCES. After the fall of Constantinople to the Fourth Crusade (1204), Frankish chivalrous poetry was translated into Gr. and, influenced by this, a new type of Gr. chivalrous poetry arose. It used a more supple and lively language, and broke away from the sterile tradition of the highbrow Byz. verse romances of Niketas Eugenianos (12th c.) and Theodoros Prodromos (12th c.), which blindly followed the patterns of the late Hellenistic romances of Heliodorus and Achilles Tatius. Such are Callinachos and Chrysorrhoe, Belthandros and Chrysantza, Imperios and Margarona, and Florios and Platsiaflora, all the works of unknown poets. The essence of these tales is boundless romanticism. Arduous love and the amazing fortitude of their heroes color the narrative. Yet in the hands of the Byz. poets the Western were blended with Eastern elements, so that an oriental atmosphere of magic suffuses certain episodes of these poems, lending them a charm and a character of their own. Closely connected to these are two long biographical verse romances, The Poem of Alexander the Great and The Story of the Famous Belissarios. The first follows the pseudo-Callisthenes life of Alexander, the second has as its subject the deeds of Belissarios the famous general of the Emperor Justinian. To this group one should perhaps add the Achilleis, which treats of the life and deeds of the Homeric Achilles, presenting him, however, as a medieval Western knight.

V. SATIRICAL VERSE. In the 12th c. certain satirical didactic poems appeared, permeated by a mordant Byz. humor, not always refined. These are generally grouped under the title of Prodromic Poems, and are traditionally attributed to the beggar and scholar Theodoros Prodromos. Their chief interest lies in the picture of the social and monastic life they give, and in the type of language they use, in which spoken (demotic) forms abound.

VI. DIDACTIC POETRY AND DRAMA. If we exclude the epigram, perhaps no other poetic form was so assiduously and continuously practiced in Byzantium as didactic poetry. But these endless prose-in-verse creations on birds, fish, stones, vegetables, etc. are certainly not poetry in the real sense of the word, and it is very doubtful if their authors ever sought an original artistic effect. Information was all they wished to convey. Moreover, drama proper remained unknown in Byzantium. Such literature as exists in dramatic form (of which the 11th-c. cento Christus Patiens is the most important example) was always meant to be read and not acted. The dramatic instinct of the Greeks revealed itself in the long dialogues of the Kontakia and in the Acclamations to the Emperors, and found ample nourishment in the pageantry of the palace ceremonies and the liturgies of the Gr. Orthodox Church.

ANTHOLOGIES: Anthologia Graeca Carminum Christianorum, ed. W. Christ and M. Paranikas (1872); Byzantinische Dichtung, ed. G. Soyter (1930); Poeti Byzantini, ed. R. Cantarella (2 v., 1948); Medieval and Modern Gr. Poetry, ed. C. A. Trypanis (1951; bibliog. on all important Byz. poets in the notes); Sancti Romani Melodi Cantica, ed. P. Maas and C. A. Trypanis (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: K. Krumbacher, Gesch. der byzantinischen Lit. (2d ed., 1897; still the standard work on the subject); W. Schmid and O. Stählin, Gesch. der griechischen Lit. (1929-48); F. Dölger, Die byzantinische Dichtung in der Reinsprache (1948); F. H. Marshall, "Byz. Lit.," in N. H. Baynes and H. St. L. B. Moss, Byzantium (1948); N. B. Tomadakis, Eisagoge eis ten Byzantininen Philologian (1952). On the Kontakion see esp. P. Maas, "Das K.," Byzantinische Zeitschrift, 19 (1910).

C.A.T.

C

C.M. Abbreviation for common measure or meter. Hymn stanza. See BALLAD METER.

CACCIA. An It. verse form believed by some to have evolved from the madrigal (q.v.), though this is generally disputed since the form was known in late 13th-c. France. Its lines are mostly short, telling as they do of exciting outdoor activity. Like the madrigal, it has a final refrain, but its core consists of an undetermined series of uneven verses with or without rhyme or in assonance. Its name probably derives from the fact that in its early stages its contents dealt chiefly with the hunt. It is also maintained that the name could derive from its musical form which had 2 or more voices repeating, at a distance of 3 or more beats, the same melody and words, thus giving the impression of a "hunt" between the voices. The c. flourished in the 14th and 15th c., especially at the hands of Franco Sacchetti.—V. Pernicone, "Storia e svolgimento della metrica," in Problemi ed orientamenti critici di lingua e di lett. ital., ed. A. Momigliano, II (1948); Wilkins. A.S.B.

CACOPHONY. The quality of being harsh-sounding or dissonant; the opposite of euphony (q.v.). Though poets ordinarily avoid c., they may use it deliberately to reinforce meaning. In the following example, the first and third lines may be considered appropriately euphonic, the second appropriately cacophonous:

How charming is divine philosophy!
Not harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute.

(Milton, Comus)

L.P.

CADENCE. (1) the expressive melodic pattern (interrogatory, hortatory, etc.) preceding a pause or at the end of a sentence; (2) the rhythm of accentual phrasal units; (3) a term used to describe the rhythmical flow of accentual free verse, Biblical poetry, and "poetic prose." The term when used in this last sense implies a looser concept of poetic rhythm than that assumed by adherents of orthodox graphic scansion (q.v.). The imagists and the vers librists of the early 20th c. frequently exhorted poets to abandon composition by the traditional foot system and to compose instead in loose cadences; as Ezra Pound told his contemporaries, "Compose in the sequence of the musical phrase, not in sequence of a metro-

nome." Again, Pound warns, "Don't chop your stuff into separate iambs. Don't make each line stop dead at the end, and then begin every next line with a heave. Let the beginning of the next line catch the rise of the rhythm wave. . . ." (Make It New, 1934). W. C. Williams is another modern who has supported composition in loose cadences over composition in more conventional British prosodies. Williams begins with the proposition that the Am. idiom is unique and that it thus requires a unique rhythmical garment, not one imported without alteration from the very different tonalities of the British language. "We must break down," he writes, "the line, the sentence, to get at the unit of the measure in order to build again." Williams suggests that much modern Am. poetry is empty, tired, and unreal because poets have maintained a misplaced allegiance to the traditional accentual-syllabic British line in ascending rhythm (q.v.). The "stasis" of much modern poetry, he believes, can be broken if Am. poets will examine their own natural idiom and deduce from it cadences to form the basis for a genuinely native prosody. As he writes, "We have had a choice: either to stay within the rules of English prosody, an area formed and limited by the English character and marked by tremendous masterwork, or to break out, as Whitman did, more or less unequipped to do more. Either to return to rules, more or less arbitrary in their delimitations, or to go ahead; to invent other forms by using a new measure" ("An Approach to the Poem," EIE, 1947 [1948]). This "new measure consonant with our day," Williams makes clear, must be a cadence midway in formality between the regularity of traditional British prosody and the whimsical rhythmical anarchy of totally unmetered free verse. The repeated phrasal rhythms of Gertrude Stein's work seem to exemplify the concept of "c." as employed by Pound and Williams. Whitman is clearly one of the important progenitors of the "c." concept. P.F.

CAESURA (cesura). A rhetorical and extra-metrical pause or phrasal break within the poetic line. If the pause occurs near the beginning of the line, it is called initial c.; if near the middle of the line, medial; if near the end, terminal. A c. is masculine if it follows an accented syllable, feminine if it follows an unaccented syllable. Feminine caesuras are of two types: lyric if the syllable before the pause is the normal weak element in the foot (q.v., and see SCANSION), epic if an extra weak syllable occurs at the pause. The c., which is frequently marked by punctuation, corresponds to a breath-pause between musical phrases, and its constant intersection with the more or less constant metrical scheme of the poem provides a form of expressive counterpoint. A line may have no c., and it may have more than one. It may also have one or more briefer or less conspicuous caesuras called (by conventional prosodists) secondary pauses or (by "linguistic" or "acoustic" prosodists) junctures.

In Gr. and L. metrics, the term "caesura" designates a word end within a foot (opposed to diaeresis, coincidence of word and foot ending); the "main c." in a line is usually found within the third or fourth foot. In classical metrics, c. is an important technical element of composition but is wholly metrical and should not be confused with pause in modern prosodies. In prosodic analysis of classical verse, terms such as "penthemimeral" or "semiquinarian" (i.e., after the fifth half-foot) are employed to designate caesura position. For example, c. occurring after the first long syllable of the second foot, that is, after the third half-foot, is called trihemimeral or semiternarian; c. after the seventh half-foot is called hephthemimeral or semiseptenarian, and so on.

The c. is generally used with great regularity in much classical, romance, and OE verse. It is only with the development of the iambic pentameter line that varied and expressive c. placement (as in Chaucer) becomes, in Eng., a subtle prosodic device. Whereas in OE verse the medial c. had been rather mechanically used to separate each line into 2 isochronous hemistichs and to emphasize the regularity of the structure, in modern Eng. the c. is often used as a device of variety, a device whose purpose it is to help mitigate metrical rigors by shifting from position to position in various lines. In formal verse, whether classical, Romance, or OE, the medial position of the c. is frequently predictable; in verse of greater flexibility and informality, the position of the pauses cannot be anticipated.

In the syllabic Fr. alexandrine (q.v.) the predictable medial c. occurs with great regularity:

Trois fois cinquant jours le général naufrage
Dégasta l'univers; en fin d'un tel ragage
L'immortel s'émouvant, n'eût pas sonné si tôt
La retraite des eaux que soudain flot sur flot
Elles gaignent au pied; tous les fleuves s'abaissant.

Le mer rentre en prison; les montagnes renaissent.

(Du Bartas, La Première Semaine)

It is also extremely regular in accentual, alliterative OE poetry:

Hige sceal þe heardra, heorte þe cenre,
Mod sceal þe mare, þe ure maegen lytlaþ.
(The Battle of Maldon)

In early Eng. blank verse:

O knights, O Squires, O gentle blouds yborne,
You were not borne, al onely for your selves:
Your countrie claymes, some part of al your paines.

There should you live, and therein should you toyle.

(Gascoigne, The Steel Glass)

And in much Eng. Augustan poetry:

Careless of censure, nor too fond of fame;
Still pleased to praise, nor yet afraid to blame;
Alike averse to flatter, or offend;
Not free from faults, nor yet too vain to mend.
(Pope, Essay on Criticism)

In later blank verse, on the other hand, and particularly in that of Milton, the placement of the c. is extremely flexible:

Thus with the Year
Seasons return, but not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of Ev'n or Morn.

And Bush with frizl'd hair implicit: last Rose as in dance the stately Trees.

(Paradise Lost)

Its flexibility is also notable in much modern iambic-pentameter verse:

An aged man is but a paltry thing,
A tattered coat upon a stick, unless Soul clap its hands and sing, and louder sing
For every tatter in its mortal dress . . .
(Yeats, Sailing to Byzantium)

From these examples, one can see clearly that, in general, the c. is used in two basic and quite antithetical ways: (1) as a device for emphasizing formality of poetic construction and distance from colloquial utterance; and (2) as a device for investing fairly strict meters with something of the movement of informal speech. If the c. occurs regularly in the medial position, one is dealing with a different kind of verse from that in which caesura placement is more varied and unpredictable. The surprisingly unvaried medial caesuras in Frost's Out, Out, for example, suggest that Frost is seeking to raise a domestic rural tragedy to the level of formal art; while, on the other hand, the unexpectedly varied caesuras in Eliot's Journey of the Magi suggest that Eliot, proceeding in the opposite direction, is interested in giving a colloquial cast to speech which might otherwise seem excessively chill, distant, and artificial.

C. M. Lewis, The Foreign Sources of Eng. Versification (1898); Saintsbury, Prosody; A. L. F. Snell, Pause: A Study of its Nature and its Rhythmical Function in Verse (1918); G. R. Stewart, The Technique of Eng. Verse (1930); S. E. Sprott, Milton's Art of Prosody (1953). P.F.

CANADIAN POETRY. IN ENGLISH. The earliest Eng. Can. poetry was produced by the United Empire Loyalists who emigrated to the Maritime provinces after the success of the American Revolution. The poets of this loyalist tradition were disappointed Tories like Jonathan Odell (1737-1818) and Joseph Stansbury (1740-1809), whose best work consisted of convivial songs and lively political satires, or Puritan evangelists like Henry Alline (1748-84), who wrote hymns and pious ejaculations. The first poet to attempt the inescapable theme of the challenge of the new land to the hardy European settler was a grandnephew and namesake of the famous 18th-c. poet Oliver Goldsmith. The Can. Goldsmith (1781-1861) was born in Nova Scotia and lived there the greater part of his life. In 1825 he published an ambitious descriptive poem in heroic couplets, The Rising Village, the sketch of the development of an eventually happy and prosperous community of Loyalist settlers in the Acadian wilderness. The work is a rather pedestrian essay in neoclassic sentimentalism, but it is redeemed by some vivid touches of realism. Joseph Howe (1804-73), editor, political philosopher, and statesman as well as poet, produced in Acadia a descriptive and reflective narrative in the same tradition. It is notable for a vivid and painful description of an Indian massacre. The earliest poets in Lower Canada (Quebec and Montreal) were romantic sentimentalists of the school of Byron and Tom Moore. Among these, Adam Kidd (1802-31) enjoyed a popular success with The Huron Chief and Other Poems (1830).

No poet of more than spasmodic ability appeared until the 19th c. had reached the halfway mark. The hard task of subduing the wilderness and the achievement of a sense of national unity rising from the War of 1812, the rebellions of 1837, and the growing threat of Am. annexation occupied the energies of the British North Am. colonists, and it was not until the late 1850's and 1860's that a national ideal began to take shape in reality and find expression in poetry. Then in the old-fashioned, high-spirited verses of Alexander McLachlan (1818-96), some of the lyrics of Charles Sangster (1822-93), and the western descriptive pieces of Charles Mair (1838-1927)

Can. poetry began little by little to individualize itself. The most original poet of the pre-Confederation period, however, was Charles Heavyside (1816-76), whose mammoth closet drama Saul (1857, 1859, 1869) soars from the almost ridiculous to the near sublime. Showing a greater, if unfulfilled, promise than any of these was George Frederick Cameron (1854-85), whose accurately titled Lyrics on Freedom, Love and Death was published posthumously in 1887. Isabella Valancy Crawford (1850-87) in a narrative poem of the western settlement, Malcolm's Katie (1884), wrote some descriptions of the northern forest that have not been excelled for vigor and imagination.

What has been called the "Golden Age" of Can. poetry began with the publication by Charles G. D. Roberts (1860-1944) of Orion and Other Poems (1880). This was the first of a long series of carefully wrought volumes in which ambitious patriotic odes, nature poems, love lyrics, and transcendental rhapsodies combined native and cosmopolitan elements. A competent craftsman, Roberts' inspiration has been most genuine in his simpler, more homely descriptions and his often classical nature poems. Roberts' early books were followed by those of a remarkable group of friends or contemporaries who all applied a classical distinction of form to descriptions of nature in Canada and to themes of love or philosophical or ethical speculation. The most widely known of the group was Roberts' cousin, Bliss Carman (1861-1929), a mellifluous lyric poet who hymned the beauties of nature, the vicissitudes of love, and the joys of the open road. Among the best of his books were Low Tide on Grand Pré (1893), The Pipes of Pan (5 vols., 1902-5), and three series of Songs from Vagabondia written in collaboration with the Am. poet Richard Hovey (1894, 1896, 1901). Carman's later poetry and his transcendental prose essays are a somewhat vague and diffuse echo of his early work.

Not as widely known as these two New Brunswick poets but equally accomplished as craftsmen were three Ontario poets whose finest work, like theirs, was produced in the 1890's and the early years of the new century. These were Archibald Lampman (1861-99), Duncan Campbell Scott (1862-1947), and Wilfred Campbell (1858-1919). Lampman is generally regarded as the finest of all Can. poets, though his mastery is limited to the vivid and sensitive interpretation of nature. The poems in Among the Millet (1888), Lyrics of Earth (1893), and Alcyone (1901) show his fine painter's eye for details of landscape and are distinguished by an impressionistic radiance and a genuine power. His magnificent sonnet "Winter Evening" (admired by R. L. Stevenson) is characteristic of his best quality. Its close is as fine as any 19th-c. sonnet in Eng.:

... soon from height to height
With silence and the sharp unpitying stars, Stern creeping frosts, and winds that touch like steel,
Out of the depth beyond the eastern bars,
Glittering and still shall come the awful night.

Like Lampman, Duncan Campbell Scott spent the greater part of his life as a civil servant in Ottawa. A scholarly poet and a conscientious craftsman, he has a wider range of human interest and a deep knowledge of Indian life and legend that made him successful in ballads and dramatic lyrics. Wilfred Campbell began as a poet of the wild lake country of northern Ontario and achieved his best work in his earliest volume Lake Lyrics (1889). Campbell's later work consists of grandiose odes on patriotic and imperialistic themes and Tennysonian closet dramas and is of comparatively little interest. Other poets of this generation were William Henry Drummond (1854-1907), famous for his tender and humorous dialect poems of Fr. Can. farm life, the Indian poetess Pauline Johnson (1862-1913), and the Anglican poet Canon Frederick George Scott, the beloved padre of World War I. The influence of Carman, Roberts, and Lampman had a somewhat overpowering effect on their successors for two generations, and a period of diluted romanticism followed in which European movements such as Pre-Raphaelitism and the Celtic Twilight made themselves felt in the work of such graceful lyricists as Marjorie Pickthall (1883-1922), Francis Sherman (1871-1926), and Audrey Alexandra Brown (b. 1904). The best poets of this period were Theodore Goodridge Roberts (1877-1953), a younger brother of Sir Charles, Tom MacInnes (1867-1955), a West Coast poet whose Rhymes of a Rounder (1913) are unique for their high spirits and for the skill with which MacInnes has breathed life into the ballade, villanelle, and rondeau and made them vehicles for the expression of a genial and intelligent bohemianism. Whether Robert W. Service can be regarded as a Can. poet or merely a visiting Englishman, his rollicking vaudeville verses have been read with delight by thousands who never read poetry.

The modern movement in Can. poetry began in the 1920's with a simplification of diction and a broadening of themes. Romanticism began to be modified by realism on the one hand and by the introduction of a metaphysical complexity on the other. Thus Can. poetry followed the same path that can be discerned in Fr., Eng., and Am. poetry in the 20th c. E. J. Pratt (1883-1964) produced a series of forceful narrative poems that include The Cachalot (1925), The Roosevelt and the Antinoo (1930), The Titanic (1935), Brébeuf and His Brethren (1940), his masterpiece, Dunkirk (1941), and Towards the Last Spike (1952), a story of the building of the first Can. transcontinental railway. Pratt created boldly and on a large scale and has achieved a greater measure of popular success as well as critical acclaim than any of his contemporaries in Canada, though the West Coast poet Earle Birney (b. 1904) has shown a comparable energy and virtuosity in the tragic narrative of mountain-climbing, David (1942) and the satirical dramatic poem Damnation of Vancouver (1952). A native tradition of social realism and proletarian sympathy appears in the work of the western poets Dorothy Livesay (b. 1909) and Anne Marriott (b. 1913) and in the Ontario farm poems of Raymond Knister (1900-1932). With these should be mentioned W. W. E. Ross (b. 1894), whose Laconics (1930) is a fine example of imagism devoted to purely Can. themes. The impact of the modern cities of Montreal and Toronto upon the sensitive and disillusioned generations can be noted in the poetry of Louis Dudek (b. 1918), Raymond Souster (b. 1921), and most remarkable of all Irving Layton (b. 1912).

The cosmopolitan tradition of symbolist and metaphysical verse developed in Canada in the late 1920's and 1930's with the work of the Montreal Group, F. R. Scott (b. 1899), A. J. M. Smith (b. 1902), and the magnificent Jewish poet A. M. Klein (b. 1909). These published their early poems in a significant anthology New Provinces (1936) in which they were joined by E. J. Pratt, Leo Kennedy (b. 1907), and the Toronto poet Robert Finch (b. 1900). During the 1940's and 1950's these and a number of younger poets, Patrick Anderson and Miss P. K. Page in the war years and more recently Douglas Le Pan, John Glassco, Miriam Waddington, Anne Wilkinson, James Reaney, Jay Macpherson, and Daryl Hine, have developed a modern school of metaphysical or neoromantic poetry in various individual ways that reveal a sensibility and expression unmistakably, if indefinably, Can. At the beginning of the 1960's the poetry of Margaret Avison might be singled out. Collected in Winter Sun (1960), it was given the Governor General's award in that year. More original, if more complex and difficult, her poetry is at least as rewarding as the work of any other modern Can. poet.

ANTHOLOGIES: Selections from Can. Poets, ed. E. H. Dewar (1864); Songs of the Great Dominion, ed. W. D. Lighthall (1889); Can. Poets, ed. J. W. Garvin (1926); The Book of Can. Poetry, ed. A. J. M. Smith (1943, 3d ed. rev. and enl., 1957); Other Canadians, ed. J.

Sutherland (1947); Can. Poems, 1850-1952, ed. L. Dudek and I. Layton (2d ed., 1952); 20th C. Can. Poetry, ed. E. Birney (1953); Can. Poetry in Eng., ed. B. Carman, L. Pierce, and V. B. Rhodenizer (1954); Can. Anthol., ed. C. F. Klinck and R. E. Watters (1955); The Penguin Book of Can. Verse, ed. R. Gustafson (1959); The Oxford Book of Can. Verse (Eng. and Fr.), ed. A. J. M. Smith (1960); Poetry 62 (Eng. and Fr.), ed. E. Mandel and J.-G. Pilon (1961).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: R. P. Baker, A Hist. of Eng.-Can. Lit. to the Confederation (1920); A. M. MacMechan, Head-Waters of Can. Lit. (1924); L. Stevenson, Appraisals of Can. Lit. (1926); L. Pierce, An Outline of Can. Lit. (1927); V. B. Rhodenizer, A Handbook of Can. Lit. (1930); W. E. Collin, The White Savannas (1936); E. K. Brown, On Can. Poetry (rev. ed., 1944); Leading Can. Poets, ed. W. P. Percival (1948); D. Pacey, Ten Can. Poets (1958) and Creative Writing in Canada (2d ed., 1961).
A.J.M.S.

IN FRENCH. The earliest Fr.-Can. poets Joseph Quesnel and Michel Bibaud, were men of the 18th c.: satirists. Under the influence of Rousseau and Lahontan they used the notion of the virtuous Indian to ridicule the pretended virtue of the Fr. residents. What they neglected to do in their satires, that is to note the grandeur of the landscape and celebrate the heroes of the race, the men of the "patriotic" school of 1860 did to their heart's content. Their imaginations were fired by their "national" historian, François-Xavier Garneau, and they found their epic voices in the poetry of Victor Hugo. Much of this fanfare has died away. Of Octave Crémazie all that is left is a song of an old Can. soldier. Louis Fréchette's aim, like that of his idol Hugo, was to dramatize the upward march of a race. His poetry, like his master's, suffers from excessive fervor, overemphasis, the abuse of antithesis and repetition. The next generation of poets, in founding the "Ecole littéraire" (1895), destroyed the formulas of romanticism; they turned their backs on Can. history, refused to worship their ancestors, and sought a purely aesthetic ideal. Parnassians at heart, they introduced into Fr.-Can. literature a sense of formal and exotic beauty which they found in far-away places: France, Italy, Greece, Persia. The poet whose work has endured is Emile Nelligan (1879-1941), a symbolist. Pieces like Le vaisseau d'or, in which he pictured his soul as a ship laden with treasures, sailing unknown seas, "shipwrecked in the abyss of Dream," and Le romance du vin, in which he made mockery of the philistines by pretending that a poet's life was merry and bright, still shine gemlike in the Can. anthology.

Farther down the river another group made its appearance about this time (1902) in whose work the two patriotic strands, awareness of the grandeur of Can. nature and the cult of ancestors, blended together in what Mgr. Camille Roy, the critic of the day, called literary "nationalism." Because they were concerned with racial survival, religion, language, traditions, people and their work, these poets are often referred to as the "terroir" school. Blanche Lamontagne, the most prolific of the group, is inspired by the folk songs and religious traditions of her native Gaspésie. It is often a question of a peasant at work and folk songs enter the poetry to mark the rhythm of consecrated labor, as in the picture of her grandmother, "la belle et robuste fermière," whom she sees sitting at the window of the old house, spinning. The vogue of this art extended over the first third of the 20th c.

The last twenty years have produced richer and more significant poetry, but more austere, more difficult. Experience has been more complex. Saint-Denys Garneau, François Hertel, and Robert Charbonneau made their debut in 1934, in the pages of a review they launched, La Relève. Charbonneau wrote little poetry; he was a novelist, editor, polemist. To him life in Quebec lacked grandeur. He expressed disgust with the prevailing conformist spirit. He tried to open wider the windows of Fr. Canada to take in the great Rus. and Am. writers. It was the appalling conformist spirit that drove Hertel to seek freedom abroad. An ex-Jesuit, he seems to have lost his faith. Even in Paris he is a tormented soul, suffering from fissure, and his imagination, whether it creates verse or prose, expresses itself ironically in the form of brilliant paradoxes. Whereas Hertel writes endlessly, Saint-Denys Garneau (1912-43) wrote very little: a small collection of poems with a metaphysical title, Regards et jeux dans l'espace (1937), an odd essay and a Journal. Then he died. To him poetry was a child's game because it was a way of building his life with pure motives, unbiased judgments, with charity. When he talked of "bones" he expressed his will to strip language to its essential truth. Garneau was the first to venture away from traditional verse forms, to destroy the tyranny of the alexandrian line. The way for the free rhythms of Edmond Labelle's poetry in La quête de l'existence (1944) was prepared by Garneau. Something of Garneau's spirit is found in the poetry of Anne Hébert, his cousin. It expresses a nostalgia for a childhood paradise and at the same time, by means of symbols such as room, drawer, cupboard, courtyard, tomb, it translates an experience of psychic oppression. Alain Grandbois, the most important of the older poets today, expresses his inner life through the symbol "voyage." By this token he recognizes his literary ancestors: Baudelaire and Rimbaud. Grandbois has traveled through Europe, Egypt, and China, and the poems in Les îles de la nuit (1947) re-create the nightmares that torment the poet's soul during a voyage over a dark ocean. The lights of islands that appear are points where, in his journey through the unconscious regions of his soul, the poet touches the mystery of life.

A new critical attitude toward the Church and the part it has traditionally played in politics and education and toward Can. federation is found in the poetry of the young rebels who are coming to dominate Fr.-Can. letters. Among the most brilliant of the new men, cosmopolitan or nationalistic, are Pierre Trottier, Gilles Henault, Roland Giguère, J.-G. Pilon, Eloi de Grandmont, Sylvain Garneau, Gilles Vigneault, and the fine woman poet Michèle Lalonde.

ANTHOLOGIES: Anthologie des poètes canadiens, comp. J. Fournier and O. Asselin (3d ed., 1933); L'Âme de la poésie canadienne française, ed. L. Rièse (1955); Anthologie de la poésie can.-fr., ed. G. Sylvestre (4th ed., 1963). See also CAN. ENG.

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: I. F. Fraser, Bibliog. of Fr.-Can. Poetry (1935) and The Spirit of Fr. Canada (1939); A. Dandurand, La Poésie can.-fr. (1933); J. M. Turnbull, Essential Traits of Fr.-Can. Poetry (1938); B. Brunet, Hist. de la littérature can.-fr. (1946); J. Paul-Crouzet, Poésie au Canada (1946); C. Roy, Hist. de la litt. can. (14th ed., 1950); A. Viatte, Hist. littéraire de l'Amérique fr. des origines à 1950 (1954); G. Tougas, Hist. de la litt. can.-fr. (1960). W.E.C.

CANCIÓN. The term is now loosely applied to any Sp. poem consisting of strophes in Italianate lines (11 and 7 syllables) and in which the poet invents a first strophe and then models all following strophes of the poem exactly after it. Canciones of a few lines are often called liras, canciones aliradas, canciones clásicas, and odas. Many variations have been developed since the Italianate c. (cf. CANZONE) was introduced by Boscán and Garcilaso near the middle of the 16th c. The c. petrarquista (also called c. a la italiana, c. extensa, and estancias) is generally considered the purest form of the Italianate type.

In the 15th and early 16th c., before the use of the Italianate form, an entirely different type of c.—an octosyllabic form of cantiga (cf. DECIR)—was widely employed. Although some variety in pattern was allowed in the early period, by the end of the 15th c. the form was usually restricted to either a quatrain (abab or abba) followed by a copla de arte menor (8 lines only) whose last 4 rhymes are identical with those of the initial quatrain though the order of the rhymes may be changed, or a quintilla (2 rhymes only, no set order) followed by a copla real or a copla de arte menor of 9 or 10 lines, whose last 5 rhymes are identical with and follow the same sequence as those of the initial quintilla. Variation in the first type, then, may occur only in the order of rhymes, and in the second type, in the length of the second strophe. F. Vendrell de Millás (ed. El Cancionero de Palacio, 1945, pp. 95–100) lists other variations. This c. may be distinguished from the closely related villancico (q.v.), according to P. Le Gentil (La Poésie lyrique espagnole et portugaise à la fin du moyen âge, II [1953] 263ff.), by its longer refrain (4 or 5 lines having redondilla, serventesio, or quintilla rhyme); its vuelta, which parallels exactly the initial theme; its shorter length, which rarely exceeds one stanza; and its courtly nature and love theme. See Le Gentil, loc. cit., for examples. D.C.C.

CANCIONEIROS (Portuguese, "songbooks"). See CANTIGA; GALICIAN POETRY; PORTUGUESE POETRY. CANCIONERO (Sp., "songbook"). See SP. POETRY.

CANTAR. Throughout Sp. literature the term has been used loosely to mean words for a song. In the 15th c. it was probably the equivalent of cantiga. In modern times it has come to mean specifically an octosyllabic quatrain having assonance (occasionally consonance) in the even-numbered lines and, preferably, unrhymed oxytones in the odd-numbered: "Algún día me verás / cuando no tenga remedio; / me verás y te veré, / pero no nos hablaremos." The composition, also called copla, is usually contained in one strophe. The seguidilla gitana (see SEGUIDILLA) is sometimes called c. The c. is sometimes defined as an octosyllabic 5-line poem of one strophe assonating ababa. The c. de soledad, also known as soledad, soled, terceto, and triada gallega, is an octosyllabic c. reduced to 3 lines. The first and third lines rhyme in either assonance or consonance and the second is left unrhymed. The form is of popular origin. Dance songs, such as the jota and the malagueña, are also termed "c." The c. de gesta, also called simply c., is an epic poem, usually of the medieval period. The lines vary in length, but are long and divided into 2 hemistichs each. The poem is divided into laises of unequal length. Each laisse is monorhymed in assonance. The anonymous C. de Mio Cid (c. 1140) is the best known example.—N. Alonso Cortés, Elementos de preceptiva literaria (6th ed., 1919); S. G. Morley, "Recent Theories about the Meter of the 'Cid,'" PMLA, 48 (1933); Navarro. D.C.C.

CANTE JONDO. Andalusian phrase for cante hondo (deep song), also called cante flamenco. It is the typical folk song (and poetry) of Southern Spain characterized musically by plaintive tremolos and accompanied by the guitar. Assonance is generally used instead of rhyme, and the main themes are love, loss of love, death. The c.j. bears a strong kinship with the music of North Africa, Arabia, and other regions of the Near East. It also resembles the Hebrew lament. The gypsies of Andalusia are particularly noted as c.j. performers. Some musicologists believe that the Moors introduced this style of song into Spain, others that it antedated the Moorish conquest and underwent only slight modification through contact with this extraneous culture. The c.j. is an integral part of Andalusian gypsy dancing, and has inspired many of the finest compositions of Sp. music. During the years between World Wars I and II it became a focal point of poetic creation among the younger writers in Spain, particularly García Lorca. This poet and the composer Manuel de Falla together organized a Fiesta of the Cante Jondo in the year 1927, and thus gave further impetus to a tremendous revival of interest in this type of poetry and music all over the Hispanic world. —G. Chase, The Music of Spain (2d ed., 1959).

J.A.C.

CANTICUM. In the Roman drama the part of the play that was declaimed or sung to musical accompaniment, as opposed to the diverbum (q.v.) or spoken dialogue. The cantica of Plautus are very numerous, constituting approximately two-thirds of each play while those of Terence are very few. They are chiefly monodies or duets sung or declaimed by an actor or by actors in a great variety of meters. The cantica of Seneca are choral songs written in meters which derive primarily from the metrical system of Horace.—F. Leo, Die Plautinische Cantica und die hellenistische Lyrik (1897); G. E. Duckworth, The Nature of Roman Comedy (1952); W. Beare, The Roman Stage (2d ed., 1955).

P.S.C.

CANTIGA. Term applied to variety of literary and folk songs in the Iberian Peninsula, but commonly referring to around 2,000 Galician-Portuguese lyrics written between the late 12th and 14th c. and contained principally in three great cancioneiros of the 14th and 15th c. The four main categories are, according to subject, cantigas de amigo (sung by woman to or about her lover), cantigas de amor (addressed by a man to his lady), cantigas de escarnio (or de mal dizer, songs of vilification, sometimes obscene) and religious songs (dealing usually with miracles of the Virgin as in Alfonso X's Cantigas de Santa Maria). Prov.

inspiration is quite apparent in pastorelas (shepherd songs), albas (dawn songs), bailadas (dance), etc., but indigenous influences are found especially in the cantigas de amigo. The best of these are characterized by saudade (melancholy longing), simple haunting rhythms, parallelism in structure, idea, and rhyme, as well as refrains, and restricted vocabulary with systematic synonymy.

TEXTS OF CANCIONEIRO: Il canzoniere portoghese della Biblioteca Vaticana, ed. E. Monaci (1875); Cancioneiro da Ajuda, ed. C. Michaëlis de Vasconcellos (2 v., 1904) and diplomatic ed. by H. H. Carter (1941); Cancioneiro da Biblioteca Nacional, antigo Colocci-Brancuti, ed. E. Pacheco Machado and J. Pedro Machado (7v., 1949-60); Cantigas de Santa Maria, ed. Marqués de Valmar (1889) and in course of publication ed. by W. Mettmann (1959).

ANTHOLOGIES: Cantigas d'amigo dos trovadores galego-portugueses, ed. J. J. Nunes (3 v., 1926-28); Cantigas d'amor dos trovadores galego-portugueses, ed. J. J. Nunes (1932); Escolma da poesia galega, v. 1, ed. X. M. Álvarez Blázquez (1952); An Anth. of Medieval Lyrics, ed. A. Flores (1962; tr.).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. F. G. Bell et al., Da poesia medieval portuguesa (2d ed., 1947); M. Rodrigues Lapa, Lições de literatura portuguesa. Época medieval (4th ed. rev., 1956). On the cantiga in Castilian poetry, consult P. Le Gentil, La Poésie lyrique espagnole et portugaise à la fin du moyen âge. 2. Les formes (1953).

L.A.S.

CANTO. A subdivision of an epic or narrative poem, that divides and orders the content, like the chapter in a novel. The end of each c., in long epic poems, gave the singer an opportunity to rest for a while or perhaps to defer the rest of the recitation to the following day. The subdivision into cantos may apply to poems of all stanzaic patterns. Although the subdivision into smaller units is found in long epic poems of all times and literatures, the It. word canto to indicate such a subdivision was adopted mainly by the Romance and Eng. literatures. It appears in the works of Dante, Ariosto, Tasso, Ercilla, Voltaire, Pope, Byron, etc.

R.M.I.

CANZONE. Due to the intimate link between poetry and music the term canzone (from cantio) has come to be applied to quite a number of verse forms with differing metrical patterns. Among the better known types are the c. epico-lirica whose center of diffusion was originally the Gallo-It. dialect area. It belongs to the Celtic substratum and is akin to compositions of the same genre in France and Catalonia. More indigenous to the It.

soil is the c. a ballo or ballata and other popular compositions such as the frottola, barzelletta, the canto carnascialesco and the laude sacra. At various times these types have been used by the poeti d'arte, but the type exclusively employed for refined artistic expression is the so-called c. petrarchesca. It is obscure in origin but bears strong traces of Prov. influence. The strambotto, ballata and minnesong are also said to have conditioned its architectonic structure. It takes its beginning among the poets of the Sicilian school (q.v.) is employed extensively by Guitone d'Arezzo and his followers and by the poets of the dolce stil nuovo (q.v.), but acquires fixed patterns and perfection in Petrarch's Canzoniere, hence the qualifying adjective petrarchesca. Its greatest vogue in Italy occurred, as one might expect, during the Petrarchistic period. It lasted until the death of Torquato Tasso. While in Eng. the Petrarchistic type of c. was employed by William Drummond of Hawthornden and in German by A. W. von Schlegel and other German romantic poets, Spain and Portugal were really the only countries outside of Italy where it was used to a considerable extent. In this type of poem the division for each of its stanzas is tripartite, consisting of two like parts, pièdi, and one unlike part, sirima or cauda. There is usually a single commiato at the close of the poem in the form of a valediction to the c. Stanzaic length is indeterminate, varying from a maximum of 20 to a minimum of 7 verses. The lines are normally hendecasyllabic with some admixture of heptameters and pentameters. After Tasso, under the strong influence of the Fr. Pléiade, this type was supplanted by new forms labeled canzoni—the Pindaric and Anacreontic odes. Chiabrera played a leading rôle in their diffusion. He also revived the canzonetta originally employed by the poets of the Sicilian School. This became the favorite type used by Metastasio and the Arcadian school. Toward the close of the 17th c. Alessandro Guidi acclimated the c. libera which reached its highest development at the hands of Leopardi.—P. E. Guarnerio, Manuale di versificazione italiana (1893); F. Flamini, Notizia storica dei versi e metri italiani (1919); R. Murari, Ritmica e metrica razionale ital. (1927); E. Segura Covarsí, La canción petrarquista en la lírica española del Siglo de Oro (1949); E. H. Wilkins, "The C. and the Minnesong," The Invention of the Sonnet and Other Studies in It. Lit. (1959). J.G.F.

CAPITOLO. It. verse form originating either in imitation or parody of Dante's terza rima (q.v.) of which it has all the characteristics. Its name probably derives from the name given by Petrarch to the chief divisions of his Trionfi. Up to the 15th c. its subject matter was primarily political or didactic, but by the end of that century it was also widely used to sing of love. Beginning with the 16th c. its use spread to humorous and satirical subjects. Since Ariosto the c. has remained the chief verse form for It. classical satire. A.S.B.

CARMEN. The L. word usually meant "song" or "lyric"; e.g., Catullus' Carmina or Horace's Odes. On occasion it had a broader meaning of "poetry" including epic, drama, and lampoon. Its broadest usage covered prophecies, oracular responses, incantations, triumphant hymns, epitaphs, charms, and even legal formulas in prose. The word seems to connote divine inspiration, the song of the poet as the agent of a god or muse; e.g., Horace's usage in the Odes. The word in modern languages suggests a conscious archaism intending to impart a serious quality to a work of poetry. R.A.H.

CAROL, a light-hearted song of religious joy. The pre-Elizabethan c. was a lyric of definite verse form and reflected stylistically its close connection with the dance, but since the 16th c., the word has come to mean any festive religious song, whatever the metrical or stanzaic form, sung to a tune which in pace and melody follows secular musical traditions rather than those of hymnody. In America the c. is now almost invariably associated with Christmas; this is less true of England, where Easter carols are also widely sung. The Fr. noël (from L. natalis), a joyous song of the Nativity, is the counterpart of the Christmas c.; it has been an established song type since the 15th c. An earlier Fr. form, the carole, was a dance-song similar in structure and movement to the early Eng. c. and probably its ancestor.

The surviving medieval carols are composed of uniform stanzas interspersed with a refrain, usually a rhymed couplet, which seems to have been sung—or read—also at the beginning of the c. A tetrameter triplet (3 rhyming lines of 4 stresses each) makes up the base of the c. stanza. The stanza is completed by a tag line shorter than the triplet lines and normally rhyming with the refrain. The following example is from a 15th-c. carol of moral advice; it has been slightly modernized:

Man, beware, beware, beware,
And keep thee that thou have no care.

Thy tongue is made of flesh and blood;
Evil to speak it is not good;
By Christ, that died upon the rood,
So give us grace our tongues to spare.

Commonly the stanza rhymes abab; it may also be extended to 5, 6 or 8 lines and bound together by a variety of rhyme schemes. Refrains, too, are sometimes extended by 1 or 2 lines. Perhaps the most notable single variation from the norm is having the tag line of the stanza identical with a refrain line. This tendency to integrate stanza and refrain frequently sets in when a dance-song ceases to be danced.

In the round dances at which carols were originally performed, the stanza was probably sung by the leader of the dance; the refrain was sung by the chorus as they executed an accompanying dance figure. Modern children's games like "Now We Go 'Round the Mulberry Bush" and "A Tisket, A Tasket" represent corrupt descendants of the medieval round dances—then, of course, an adult pastime. From the violent denunciations of caroling that culminated from medieval clerics, it is clear that caroling, even though the songs, in most cases, dealt reverently with Christian matter, was regarded as a wicked pagan survival. And, in fact, many of the older specimens are highly erotic and suggest pagan fertility rites. Doubtless the reason why caroling flourished strongest at Christmas and Easter was that these Christian festivals coincided with and supplanted the pre-Christian winter and spring fertility revels. Of some 500 medieval carols extant in manuscript, about 200 deal directly or indirectly with Advent and the Nativity. Easter, the New Year, and Epiphany were less frequently celebrated with caroling. Abundant political, moral, and satirical carols are met with, and there are besides many amorous pieces, some of which are frank to the point of lewdness.

Carols were popular in both courtly circles and among the folk, but most of those that have been preserved show learned influences, such as uncorrupted L. tags, and the various manuscript versions of the same c. do not exhibit the variation that one would expect if carols had been orally transmitted and recreated in the manner of folk song.

With the Reformation the medieval c. began to die out. The decline was mainly due to the more sober fashion of celebrating Christmas and other religious holidays that came to prevail. The formal c. was thus gradually replaced by festive songs learned from broadsides, chapbooks, and devotional songbooks. Some carols of this new kind, like The Seven Joys of Mary, I Saw Three Ships, God Rest You Merry, Gentlemen and The Virgin Unspotted, are regularly described as "traditional," a term which means only that such pieces were long popular and are anonymous, not necessarily that they are folk songs.

The carols which supplanted the medieval carols were themselves beginning to wither in popularity when musical antiquaries like Gilbert Davies (Some Ancient Christmas Carols, 1822) and William Sandys (Christmas Carols, Ancient and Modern, 1833) collected and revived them. J. M. Neale and Thomas Helmore in 1852 introduced the practice, since followed in most British and Am. c. books, of plundering Fr., Basque, Dutch, Sp., It., German and Scandinavian collections for tunes to which Eng. words could successfully be adapted. Since 1870 the rural counties of England have been scoured for folk carols and the collectors' discoveries have been impressive. By being made available to school children in excellent arrangements by Cecil J. Sharp, Vaughan Williams, and other folk-music experts, the folk carols have been artificially revitalized among educated people. Folk carols are comparatively rare in America; the only ones widely reported in this century, The Seven Joys of Mary, Jesus Born in Bethlehem and The Twelve Days of Christmas, are all Eng. imports.

R. L. Greene, The Early Eng. Carols (1935) is the definitive collection of medieval carols. Greene furnishes a lengthy crit. introd. His theory of the popular character of the extant carols (also held by E. K. Chambers and W. W. Greg) has been contested by R. H. Robbins in "Middle Eng. Carols as Processional Hymns," sr, 56 (1959), who applies to the Eng. carols current Fr. theories that the caroles were composed for ecclesiastical festivals. Carols of the later kind are collected in The Oxford Book of Carols (1928 and later ed.). E. Routley, The Eng. C. (1959) is a running commentary on the Oxford coll. but includes much information on the reputation of the carols and their modern liturgical use. Sir. R. R. Terry's coll., Two Hundred Folk Carols (1933), is notable for preserving the Roman Catholic features of the Continental carols he prints. Folk c. collections of the greatest importance are A. E. Gillington, Old Christmas Carols of the Southern Counties (1910), C. J. Sharp, Eng. Folk-Carols (1911) and R. Vaughan Williams, Eight Traditional Carols (1919). For Am. folk carols, see the F. C. Brown Coll. of North Carolina Folklore, II (1952), 199–212, where abundant references to other sources are given. A.B.F.

CARPE DIEM (L. "seize [enjoy] the day"). A motif in poetry which usually advises the enjoyment of present pleasures. The locus classicus of the phrase occurs in Horace, Odes 1.11, though the fullest treatment of the theme by that poet appears in Odes 3.29. The motif, which is found in Gr. poetry (Aeschylus, Persians 840–42; Anacreon 4.11.7–10) as well as in L. poetry, arises from the realization of the brevity of life and the finality of death. Hence the injunction to enjoy this life. Such enjoyment ranges in L. poetry from the refined pleasures of the mind and spirit (Horace, Odes 3.29) to purely sensual and momentary delights (Catullus, Carmina 5). Even at the height of the single, joyous experience the motif encourages objectivity and detachment, implying full awareness of the sadness of the human situation. To this basically epicurean thought Ausonius added the rose motif wherein the brevity of life becomes symbolized by the brevity of the rose (De rosis nascentibus 35-36). In subsequent goliardic verse as well as Fr. and Eng. poetry the rose and its brevity further symbolized the loss of virginity (Roman de la rose). The 15th c. poets used the c.d. theme and the rose to rail against fruitless chastity (Lorenzo de' Medici, Corinto 28-31). In this same tradition were the Eng. Cavalier poets such as Herrick ("Gather Ye Rosebuds").

But in Christian writing and poetry the c.d. theme has been used as a persuasion to goodness (J. Taylor, Holy Dying, p. 31). Herbert used the motif to emphasize not only the transitoriness of this life but the eternity of the Christian life, especially after death. So also did Spenser in the Faerie Queene. The motif in one aspect or another is found in Carew, Thomas, Marvel, Milton, and Blake. It is found also in Persian poetry (Omar Khayyám) and ancient Egyptian poetry (The Song of the Harper).—J. A. Symonds, Essays Speculative and Suggestive (1893); F. Bruser, "Comus and the Rose Song," SP, 44 (1947); Frye. R.A.H.

CATACHRESIS (Gr. "misuse"). The misapplication of a word, especially in a strained or mixed metaphor or in an implied metaphor. It need not be a ridiculous misapplication as in bad poetry, but may be a deliberate wrestling of a term from its normal and proper significance. Sometimes it is deliberately humorous. Quintilian called it a necessary misuse (abusio) of words and cited Virgil's Aeneid 2.15-16: "equum divina Palladis arte/aedificant" (They build a horse by Pallas' divine art). Since aedificant literally means "they build a house," it is a catachresis when applied to a horse. Puttenham, in his Arte of Eng. Poesie, called c. a figure of "plain abuse, as he that bade his man go into his library and fetch him his bow and arrows." Two celebrated examples of this figure are found in Shakespeare and Milton: "To take arms against a sea of troubles" (Hamlet 3.1.59) and "Blind mouths! that scarce themselves know how to hold a sheep-hook" (Lycidas 119-120). A very effective c. is Shakespeare's "'Tis deepest winter in Lord Timon's purse" (Timon 3.4.15), which suggests comparison with some of the strained metaphors or implied metaphors in more modern poetry, e.g., "The sun roars at the prayer's end" (Dylan Thomas, Vision and Prayer, last line).—Lausberg. M.T.H.

CATALAN POETRY. It has been the peculiar fate of the poetry of the Catalans that during a number of centuries it was written by them mainly in languages that were not their own: Prov. in the Middle Ages, Castilian during the age of Sp. ascendancy. It is only since romanticism that a poetry in their own vernacular has continuously flourished in Catalonia and the Cat.-speaking Valencia and Balearics.

In the Middle Ages, the geographic, linguistic, and political propinquity of Catalonia and Provence, and the European prestige of Prov. poetry, caused the Catalans to write theirs in the literary language of Provence, borrowing also the patterns—courtly love, satire, moralization—and the poetics of the troubadours. Most Cat. poets held to this practice from the 12th c. to the 15th. Guillem de Berguedà (1140-ca. 1200) and Cerverí de Girona (fl. 1250-80) are among the best of the early Cat. troubadours and Jaume March (1335-1410?) and Pere March (1338?-1413) among the late ones.

Relics have been found, however, of a poetry written in Catalonia in the same centuries, not in literary Prov., but in Cat.: a popular, religious poetry (mainly Marian, and usually addressed to the Virgin of Montserrat), of a type still common in Cat. literature. Ramon Llull (1232?-1316) wrote more formal poetry in Cat., reaching lyric heights in his Desconhort and the Cant de Ramon. His greatest lyric is the Llibre d'Amic e Amat, a prose poem somewhat under the influence of the Arab mystics and celebrating the ascension of Man's soul toward God through the ways of Love.

In the 14th and 15th c. there appeared in Catalonia a narrative poetry, usually written in octosyllabic couplets. One might include in this type the Spill or Llibre de les dones by Jaume Roig (d. 1478), a book on the wiles and vices of women, written in 4-syllable couplets.

The close political ties of the Crown of Aragon with Sicily, Naples, and Italy in general, soon added to the Prov. influence the influence of the It. dolce stil nuovo (q.v.). A slight Petrarchan tinge has been noticed in the verse of Jordi de Sant Jordi (ca. 1400-1424), although he was still very much a writer in the Prov. tradition. The language of his poetry was quite close to the Cat. of his own time, as we know it from prose literature. Completely Cat. already is the language of the poetry of Ausiàs March (1397-1459), who is the heir to both troubadour and It. lyricism. Within these traditions, March reveals a profound psychological insight that can transform apparently medieval or Italianate topics into expressions of universal human emotions. His work is usually divided into songs of love, songs of death, moral songs and a spiritual song, in all of which—as he himself said—there is no fiction, but rather truth, trouble, and solitude. To complete a trilogy of great Cat. poets of the 15th c. mention should be made of Joan Roïç de Corella (ca. 1430-ca. 1490), a poet first of sensual love, then of pure love and finally of divine love. He was a writer of great visual and imagistic power, and also the first to introduce into Cat. poetics the It. hendecasyllable.

Just as it seemed that Cat. poetry had established itself in the work of Ausiàs March and Roïç de Corella and the constellation of minor poets that surrounded and followed them, a decadence set in which brought about the almost complete disappearance of Cat. poetry. In fact, from the beginning of the 16th c. to the beginning of the 19th, most Cat. poets abandoned Catalan to write in Castilian, and although the Cat. language remained the tongue of the people of Catalonia, it was used in poetry only by minor writers. The poetry in Cat. that remained truly alive during the period was the ballad and the popular religious song, both transmitted orally by a people more attached to their tradition than were at that time the literate upper classes.

In the 19th c., with the spread of the romantic ideals of individualism and nationalism, a revival or rebirth—la Renaixença—of Cat. literature took place. Romanticism naturally tended to foster a return to the native tongue as the means of expressing the sentiments of the men of a Cat. nation that was finding again its ancient pride and soul. The ode to La Pàtria (1833) by Bonaventura Carles Aribau (1798–1862) has often been cited as the symbolic beginning of this rebirth. Then the work of a number of poet-scholars like Joaquim Rubió i Ors (1818–99) and Manuel Milà i Fontanals (1818–84) gave it momentum, leadership, and organization. The revival in 1859 of the annual “Jocs Florals” (poetry contests) inspired a number of writers consistently to exercise their faculties in the vernacular. This stimulated floods of patriotic, religious, dramatic, and lyric verse, not always of the best; but the instrument was finally ready and all previous efforts were crowned with the work of Jacint Verdaguer (1845–1902), a peasant priest.

After Verdaguer, no Cat. has had to apologize for the literary use of his native tongue. Verdaguer's poetry ranges from the epic of L'Atlantida (1877) and of Canigó (1886), to religious poetry, to nature poetry, to the most subjective and intimate lyricism; his meters range from the short lively quadrisyllable through the traditional and popular ballad meter to the solemn alexandrine, his strophic combinations are varied and always appropriate as he had a keen ear for harmony both formal and internal.

After Verdaguer, modern Cat. poetry, having come of age, shed its Romantic-Renaixença character. Joan Maragall (1860–1911) brought to it a new sense of freedom by using free verse as well as the traditional forms. Maragall's poetry expresses his enjoyment of beauty, his love of life, of nature, of strength, work and creation: what is now called the “Maragallian optimism.” Perhaps his best loved books are Pirenénques, Vistes al mar, and Cants. He was the poet whose “measure was human” and could say:

Si el món ja és tan formós, Senyor, si es mira amb la pau vostra a dintre de l'ull nostre, què més ens podeu dà en una altra vida?

If the world is already so beautiful, Lord, when one looks at it with your Peace within one's eye,
what more can You give us in another life?

While Maragall observed or broke the classical rules, the Balearic poets of Cat. language, Miquel Costa i Llobera (1854–1922), the author of Horacianes (1906), and Joan Alcover (1854–1926), the author of Cap al tard (1909) and Poemes bíblics (1918), reasserted the love of measure and of wisdom, the classical Mediterranean inheritance of Cat. culture.

The following generation of poets was heir to both the classicism of Costa i Llobera and Alcover and the vitalism of Maragall. For instance, there is Josep Carner (1884) who added grace, lightness, and style to Cat. poetry; Guerau de Liost (pen name of Jaume Bofill i Mates, 1878–1933) with his intellectualism; Josep Maria López-Picó (1886–1959) with his Catholic vision of the world; Josep Maria de Sagarra (1894–1961) with his popularism; Carles Riba (1893–1959), a professor of Gr. by trade, with his “pure poetry.”

The post-Spanish Civil War (1936–39) generation of Cat. poets, at home and in exile, continues to write poetry although the political restrictions imposed by the Franco régime on publication in Cat. on the Peninsula have somewhat isolated the poets from their public. Salvador Espriu (1913) is perhaps the best known of the poets living in Catalonia; Agustí Bartra (1910) perhaps the best known of those writing abroad. They carry on the flame of living Cat. expression.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: J. Massó i Torrents, “Bibliografia dels antics poetes catalans,” Anuari de l'Institut d'Estudis Catalans, 1913–14, and Repertori de l'antiga literatura catalana, 1, La Poesia (1932); A. Elías de Molins, Diccionario biográfico y bibliográfico de escritores y artistas catalanes del siglo XIX (1889–95).

ANTHOLOGIES: Anthol. of Cat. Lyric Poetry, ed. J. Triadú and J. Gili (1953); and the collection of Cat. classics of Biblioteca Catalana of M. Aguiló (Barcelona).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: L. Nicolau D'Oliver, Resum de literatura catalana (1927); M. de Riquer, Resumen de lit. catalana (1947); J. Ruiz i Calónja, Història de la lit. catalana (1954); G. Díaz Plaja, De lit. catalana (1956); J. Fuster, La poesia catalana (2 v., 1956). L.M.

CATALEXIS, catalectic. See TRUNCATION.

CATALOGUE VERSE. A term to describe lists of persons, places, things, or ideas which have a common denominator such as heroism, beauty, death, etc. The device, which may be of any length, is of ancient origin and found in almost all literatures of the world. But the purpose of such verse has changed in the course of the history of literature. One of its original functions was educative. In Polynesian and Abyssinian literature lists of islands and places seem primarily used to inform by supplying geographic information. Rhymed lists of rules of conduct frequently were used to inculcate moral training in the young. Such, too, may be the chief purpose of the genealogical lists found in all ancient literatures and especially in the Bible (Genesis 10). In lists of this sort there is often an encroachment of antiquarian information on the original purpose. But frequently c.v. has a more artistic intention, such as indicating the vastness of a war, a battle, or the power of a prince or king. This is the primary purpose of the catalogue of heroes in epic literature, for example the heroes of the Trojan war found in Iliad 2, the Argonauts in Apollonius Rhodius' Argonautica 1, the heroes in Aeneid 7, and the list of fallen angels in Milton's Paradise Lost 2. Closely allied with this notion is the treatment of God's power as found in the canticle, "Benedicite omnia opera Domini" (Book of Common Prayer).

The device often appears in secular medieval poetry to enumerate many things such as beautiful women. This seems to follow from ancient example such as Ovid's catalogue of trees in Metamorphoses. A similar use appears in modern song writing, for example, Cole Porter's "They couldn't compare with you." Often it has been used for the sake of play or whimsey or because the poet enjoyed the sound of particular kinds of words, e.g., the list of jewels in Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parzival, and Cole Porter's "You're the tops."

In 19th- and 20-c. European poetry a different aspect of c.v. has appeared. Whitman, for example, by employing long lists of things demonstrates the essential unity of the universe, which to him is evident through the individual's awareness of his connection with all aspects of the world (cf. Crossing Brook- lyn Ferry). Modern poets such as Rilke and George as well as Auden and Werfel have in varying degrees followed Whitman in this use. Indeed, in some poems the use of catalogues supplies the meaning of the entire poem rather than illuminates a particular aspect of it as in ancient poetry.—T. W. Allen, "The Homeric C.," Jour. of Hellenic Studies, 30 (1910); Chadwick; D. W. Schumann, "Enumerative Style and its Significance in Whitman, Rilke, Werfel," MLQ, 3 (1942) and "Observations on Enumerative Style in Modern German Poetry," PMLA, 59 (1944); L. Spitzer, "La enumeración caótica en la poesía moderna," Instituto de Filología (Buenos Aires), Collección de estudios estilísticos, anejo 1 (1945); S. K. Coffman, "Crossing Brooklyn Ferry: a Note on the C. Technique of Whitman's Poetry," MP, 51 (1954); H. E. Wedeck, "The C. in Late and Medieval L. Poetry," Medievalia et Humanistica, 13 (1960). R.A.H.

CATHARSIS. The use of the word c. ("purgation") in connection with the theory of literature, originates in Aristotle's celebrated definition of tragedy in the sixth chapter of the Poetics. Unfortunately, Aristotle merely uses the term without defining it (though he may have defined it in a putative second book of the Poetics); and the question of what he actually meant is a cause célèbre in the history of literary criticism. Insofar as there is no agreement yet, and none in sight, all definitions, including this one, must be regarded as interpretations only.

The essential function of tragedy, according to Aristotle's definition, is a representation (mimesis—q.v.) of an action that is serious, complete, and of an appropriate magnitude; and when such representation is effectively carried out it will succeed "in arousing pity and fear in such a way as to accomplish a purgation (c) of such emotions." The definition was doubtless framed as an answer to Plato's charge that poetic drama encourages anarchy in the soul by feeding and watering the passions instead of starving them. Aristotle held, on the contrary, that anarchy in the soul is most effectively prevented not by starving and repressing the emotions but by giving them expression in a wisely regulated manner. Tragedy he regarded as a chief instrument of such wise regulation, for it works in a twofold way, first exciting the emotions of pity and fear and then allaying them, thereby effecting an emotional cure.

Aristotle's somewhat technical understanding of c. acquires its overtones of meaning from a double linguistic heritage, in part medical and in part religious. On the one hand the idea of c. finds early expression in the writings of the Hippocratic School of Medicine, where it refers to the discharge of whatever excess of bodily elements has produced a state of sickness, and the consequent return of the body to that state of right proportion which is health. There is, in Hippocratic language, a preparatory process of slow "digestion" (pepsis), produced by the body's heat, wherein the bodily elements are recombined and fused in such a way that waste products are generated, ready for discharge at the proper time; and when this discharge, or c., has taken place, the result is a new balance or proportion of bodily elements, which is health. Analogously, Aristotle considers that in its "natural" condition the human psyche is well-balanced and serene, but that it falls readily away from this natural state into intemperance; and that the action of a well-made tragedy strikes pity and fear into the beholder in such a way that these emotions become "digested" (as in the Hippocratic description of returning health), with the result that a new proportion and blend of the emotions is produced, and the residue of superfluous emotional impulses is "catharated." The religious meaning of c., on the other hand, finds a diversity of expressions in the dialogues of Plato, and therefore must have entered into the conversations and teachings which surrounded Aristotle during the intellectually formative period of his young manhood. In the Phaedo, for instance, Plato declares that c. consists "in separating, so far as possible, the soul from the body, and in teaching the soul the habit of collecting and bringing itself together from all parts of the body, and in living, so far as it can, both now and hereafter, alone by itself, freed from the body as from fetters."

When Aristotle's definition is reconsidered in the light of these two trends of thought, the medical and the religious, an important corollary stands forth. Since the new blending which is attained in the cathartic process is psychic, not merely physical, it involves a new emotional perspective, and even, arising from that, a new intellectual vision. A wisdom is distilled from tragic suffering: man is pathei mathos, "taught by suffering," as the chorus in the Agamemnon sings. The tragic c. and the ensuing emotional calm have produced in the spectator a new insight into what the plot of the drama most essentially represents, what its action—which is to say, its meaning in motion—essentially is. Such insight is what justifies Aristotle's assertion (ch. 9) that "poetry is something more philosophical and more highly serious than history, for poetry tends to express universals, history particulars."

Subsequent critics, on the whole, have been more inclined to accept than to reject the doctrine of c., although their acceptance has usually involved some degree of reinterpretation.

In the It. Renaissance Aristotle's definition was revived by such writers as Minturo (The Art of Poetry, 1563) and Castelvetro (Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata e eposta, 1570), although in the former the emphasis is shifted to the "delight and profit" which result to the spectator from his cathartic experience. In France a century later both Corneille and Racine accept the principle of c. in the fairly plain moral sense of regarding the spectator as purified by the tragedy and thus as deterred from performing such evil acts as he has been witnessing. Corneille, in addition, assumes that either pity or fear might operate separately.

In Germany, Lessing in his influential Laokoön (1766) opposed the latter view of Corneille, insisting that the special effect of tragedy must come from the union of the two emotions, from which there emerges the cosmically oriented emotion of awe, as the spectator recognizes through the tragedy the sword of destiny that is suspended above us all. Lessing also emphasizes (Hamburger Dramaturgie, 1768) the applicability of Aristotle's ethical standard of "due measure" to the principle of c.; for tragedy, if it is to transform our pity and fear into virtue, "must be capable of purifying us from both extremes"—from "too little" by its emotional contagion, and from "too much" by the restraint which its formal pattern imposes. Schiller in his essay "On Tragic Art" (1792) reaffirms the importance of measure, and in "On the Sublime" (1801) he draws two corollaries: that the most perfect tragedy is one which produces its cathartic effect not by its subject matter but by its tragic form; and that it has aesthetic worth only so far as it is "sublime"—i.e., as by representing the indifference of the universe to moral ends it produces in the soul of the spectator an "inoculation against unavoidable fate." Goethe, in his Nachlass zu Aristoteles Poetik (1827), sees the main importance of the purgatorial, or cathartic situation, not in reference to the spectator, whose condition is incidental and variable, but in the reconciliation and expiation of the characters in the play. Among later German writers on aesthetics we may note Schopenhauer (The World as Will and Representation, 1819), who equates the cathartic principle of tragedy with an idealized and universal experience of fellow-suffering wholly disproportionate to moral deserts; and Nietzsche (The Birth of Tragedy, 1872), who interprets the matter through the complementary symbols of Dionysus and Apollo, the unresisting plunge into whatever sufferings and joys life may offer and the calm vision that results from this self-surrender.

Of Eng.-speaking writers, Milton in the Preface to Samson Agonistes (1671) interprets Aristotle to mean that tragic c. operates on the homeopathic principle, and he draws an analogy from medicine, wherein "things of melancholic hue and quality are used against melancholy, sour against sour, salt to remove salt humours." Wordsworth, shifting the reference from dramatic to lyric poetry, offers a humanitarian interpretation: that readers are to be "humbled and humanized," and to be purged of the prejudices and blindnesses arising from false sophistication and snobbery, "in order that they may be purified and exalted" (Nowell C. Smith, ed., Wordsworth's Literary Criticism, 1905). In our own day I. A. Richards (Principles of Literary Criticism, 1925) interprets the cathartic process as a reconciliation and reëquilibration of "Pity, the impulse to approach, and Terror, the impulse to retreat," along with various other groups of discordant impulses, and he affirms the importance of tragedy on the ground that "there is no other way in which such impulses, once awakened, can be set at rest without suppression." Among other contemporaries we might mention Elisabeth Schneider (Aesthetic Motive, 1939), who has argued that just because the pity and terror are painfully and utterly irreconcilable in real life, the one always driving the other out, we receive the greatest pleasure from their stylized union in art. So here again, at the end as at the beginning of our survey, we are reminded that c. is not a simple elimination, but always operates hand in hand with a process of stylization and an aesthetic creation of significant form.

Aristotle, Poetics, or The Art of Poetry, tr. Bywater (1909; Fyfe's commentary on a reissue of this translation in 1940 is helpful), Cooper (1913), Butcher (1917), Fyfe (1927), Epps (1942), Wheelwright (1951). See also Else (1957) for a good comprehensive study but controversial theory.—I. A. Richards, Principles, chs. 7, 15, 32; M. T. Herrick, The Poetics of Aristotle in England (1930); J. C. Ransom, "The Cathartic Principle," The World's Body (1938); E. Schneider, Aesthetic Motive (1939); European Theories of Drama, ed. B. H. Clark (rev. ed., 1947); F. Fergusson, The Idea of a Theatre (1949); F. L. Lucas, Lit. and Psychology (1951) and Tragedy; Serious Drama in Relation to Aristotle's Poetics (rev. ed., 1957); Wellek; R. Kuhns, The House, the City and the Judge (1962; ch. 5).
p.w.

CAUDA, coda (L. "tail"). The short line, or tail, which in a stanza of longer lines usually rhymes with another, similar, short line, thus serving to divide the stanza into parts. When the caudae rhyme, the stanza is known as a tail-rhyme stanza, characteristic of Romance languages. The use of caudae was especially popular in medieval metrical romances (e.g., Aethelston, Horn Childe). A school of tailrhyming romance writers is supposed to have flourished in East Anglia in the 14th c. See TAIL-RHYME.

R.O.E.

CAUDATE SONNET. A form of the sonnet in which the normal (usually It.) pattern of 14 lines is supplemented by one or more codas or "tails." Usually the coda is introduced by a half-line, followed by a couplet in pentameters, and this in turn may be followed by additional "tails" in similar line-lengths. The c.s., established by Francesco Berni (1497–1536), has usually been employed for satirical themes, as in Milton's On the New Forcers of Conscience Under the Long Parliament, the coda of which, following the 14th line, is as follows:

That so the Parliament
May with their wholesome and preventive shears
Clip your phylacteries, though baulk your ears,
And succour our just fears,
When they shall read this clearly in your charge,—
New Presbyter is but old Priest writ large.

J. S. Smart, The Sonnets of Milton (1921; p. 127).
L.J.Z.

CAVALIER LYRIC. The term is used to describe not only the work of the Cavalier poets or lyrist but also any poem which, like Browning's Cavalier Tunes, is written to illustrate their attitudes and evoke the spirit of their time.

CAVALIER POETS, Cavalier lyrist. A group of Eng. poets in the time of Charles I (1625–49), characterized by the lightness, grace, and polish of their verse and by the wit and gallantry of their attitudes. Since there was no formal group of "C. poets," as such, recognized in the 17th c., it is impossible to determine with precision what poets should be included in the category. Certainly Richard Lovelace and Sir John Suckling, who in their lives as much as in their poems gave an origin to the term, should be included. Other poets who resemble them in both attitude and style are Herrick, Carew, Waller, Randolph, and Godolphin. Love was the favorite theme of the C. lyrist, and their treatments of the subject ranged from the conventional Petrarchism of Lovelace to the cynicism of Suckling and the pagan sensuality of Carew. Poems of courtly compliment, jeux d'esprit, and expressions of loyalty to the king are also typical of the Cavaliers.

The greatest influence on the style of the C. lyrist was that of Ben Jonson; indeed, most of them considered themselves "Sons of Ben." Their lyrics usually employ the shorter rhythmic line, the more precise diction, the tighter logical structure with which Jonson had signified his departure from his more expansive Elizabethan predecessors. And, like Jonson, the Cavaliers abandoned the sonnet almost entirely. However, Jonson's influence is often modified by that of Donne, particularly in the work of Carew and Suckling. Perhaps the best known of the poems of the C. lyrists are Suckling's Why so pale and wan, fond lover?, Lovelace's To Althea, from Prison and To Lucasta, on Going to the Wars, Herrick's Delight in Disorder, and Carew's Ask me no more where Jove bestows.—G. Walton, "The C. Poets," From Donne to Marvell, ed. B. Ford (1956); R. Skelton, C. Poets (1960; Writers and Their Work no. 117).

CELTIC PROSODY. No direct information is available about the nature of the poetry composed by the Celts on the continent of Europe before they settled in the separate areas in which they now live. From Caesar we know that in the 1st c. B.C. students learned verses by memory in the druidic schools of Celt. Gaul, but no actual examples of poetry have survived among the remains of the Gaulish language.

Of the Celt. Poetry composed in Welsh, Cornish, and Breton, and in the Gaelic of Ireland, Man, and Scotland, the earliest remains are Ir. and Welsh. These date back only to about the 7th c. A.D., by which time both the Ir. and the Welsh had begun to use rhyme, familiar to them through the Latin hymns of the church, as their central prosodic device.

Some archaic Ir. texts preserve sporadic examples of an ancient verse form which was presumably the dominant type from prehistoric times down to at least the 6th c. It is derived from the same Indo-European system which can be traced in the gnomic and epic poetry composed in Vedic Sanskrit, Gr., and Slavic. A typical line consists of a free initial colon, a separating break, and a final colon with fixed cadence:

Mo chride crúaid | crechtnaighther.
(Grievously my heart is wounded.)

In the Ir. poetry belonging to this tradition, lines were regulated to certain syllabic counts. Alliteration provided optional decoration but was not, as in later Celt. poetry (and in Germanic), requisite as a patterning device.

The mainstream of Celtic poetry, however, springs from the time that the Celtic peoples heard rhyming L. hymns such as that composed in the 5th c. by Sedulius, which though nominally composed in quantitative iambic dimeter, foreshadowed the stressed, rhyming verse later to become common in European vernacular poetry:

A solis ortus cardine	a
Ad usque terrae limitem	b
Christum canamus principem	b
Natum Maria virgine.	a

From the quarter of the rising of the sun to the boundary of the earth let us sing Christ the Prince born of the Virgin Mary.

The new prosodic systems inspired by rhyme are in many cases so intricate that their indebtedness to L. is far from obvious, but the relationship is undeniable and is substantiated by the sudden emergence of, for instance, an Ir. stanza which like Sedulius' consists of 4 rhyming lines, each exactly 8 syllables in length.

An early example of the impact of rhyme upon the Welsh is afforded by Aneirin's Gododdin, the original of which may reach back to about A.D. 600. In the following stanza the old and the new meet together, for each line is linked to the next by a final rhyme (-ant), while the traditional Celt. device of alliteration is retained as an optional decoration (k in line 1, g in 2, h in 3, l in 4, g in 5):

Kywyrein ketwyr, kyuaruuant,
y gyt en vn vryt yt gyrchassant.
Byrr eu hoedyl, hir eu hoet ar eu carant.
Seith gymeint o Loegrwys a ladassant.
O gyvrysseid gwragedd gwyth a wnaethant, llawer mam ae deigyrr ar y hamrant.
(Canu Aneirin, ed. Ifor Williams [Cardiff, 1938], 668-673.)

As one the warriors arose, foregathered, together attacked with single purpose. Short were their lives, long the lament of their kinsmen for them. Seven times their number of English they slew. Through strife they left women widows, many a mother with tears on her eyelids.

Even in a poem as early as the Gododdin, there are other, more intricate stanzaic forms; but these are a mere tentative preliminary to the later developments of Welsh cynghanedd, q.v. (harmony), in which rhyme becomes an integral part of an extraordinary network of sound effects. At this subsequent stage, a disciple of the 14th-c. poet Dafydd ap Gwilym writes couplets such as the following:

Dyrcha ael fain, d'orchwyl fu
Dristau gŵr dros dy garu.

(Caradar, Welsh Made Easy, III. 92. See Gwaith Dafydd ap Gwilym, ed. T. Parry [Cardiff, 1952], p. clxxvi.)

Raise your fine eyebrows! Your achievement has been to make a man sad for love of you.

Here he not only satisfies the requirements of cywydd, q.v. (coupled lines), that each line contain 7 syllables and that each couplet contain an end rhyme between a final unstressed syllable and a final stressed syllable (fu: garu). He has also arranged the cynganedd within the line so that a sequence of as many as 5 or even 6 consonants in the first half of the line recurs in the second half of the line: d--r--ch--l--f: (n) d--r--ch--l--f; d--r--s--t--g--r: d--r--s--d(/)-g--r. And, at the same time, he has followed the rule that the corresponding vowels should be dissimilar (dris:- dros, etc.). And, throughout the remainder of the poem, he has alternated at will four different kinds of cynganedd, each with its own stringent requirements.

In the Gaelic poetry common to Ireland, Man, and Scotland, rhyme was early developed into an equally intricate prosodic system known as bardic verse. Its chief characteristics are the limitation of each line to a fixed number of syllables (often 7 or 8) and the use of what may be called generic rhyme—that is, any member of a particular genus of phonetically similar consonants may rhyme either with itself or with any other member of that genus, provided that the preceding vowels are identical. These six rhyming groups are as follows:

1. c t p
2. ch th ph, f
3. g d b
4. gh dh bh, mh l n r
5. m ll ng,nn rr
6. s

The source of the syllabic measure, as in Welsh, is obviously the Latin hymn. The development of generic rhyme is less clear. An analogous system appears in early Welsh, involving four consonantal sets—g:d:b, dd:l:r, 3:f:w, and certain nasal clusters. This may have been borrowed from Irish, for bards of the two nationalities visited one another; or both systems may have been suggested by the tentative rhymes in early L. hymns. (In Sedulius' stanza quoted above, [im]item makes full "Ir. rhyme" in its last two syllables with [princ]item, and [ca]rdine with [vi]rgine.)

A typical example of Ir. syllabic prosody is the following stanza composed by an anonymous medieval bard, who is describing an ornate goblet owned by a king of Connaught:

Eoin bas n-dearg 's a n-druim r' a thaoibh, 1 mar do chuim an ceard go cóir 2 lucht 'gar chasmhail cleasa ceoil— 3
eoin 's a sleasa d' asnaibh óir. 4
(McKenna, Aithdioghluim Dána, no. 9)

Birds red of claw stand backed against its borders, just as the artist deftly shaped them as figures seeming really to sing—birds whose sides are ribbed with gold.

This particular meter, known as rannaiheacht mhór (the Great Versification), requires a stanza of 4 lines which must each contain 7 syllables and end in a stressed monosyllable.

The last words in lines 2 and 4 must show generic rhyme with one another (óir:óir). The last words in 1 and 3 must consonate but not assonate with these (the consonants bh in aoibh and l in ceoil both show generic rhyme with the r in óir, while the vowels aoi and eoí are identical with the ói in 2 and 4 only in length).

All the stressed words in 2 other than the final rhyming word show generic rhyme with stressed words in 1—(ch)uim:(dr)uim, (c)eard:-(d)earg. All the stressed words in 4 other than the final rhyming word must show generic rhyme with stressed words in 3—eoin:(c)ceoil, (sl)easa:(ch)easa, asnaibh:(ch)asmhail. (In a dissyllable such as the last, both syllables must rhyme,—s:s, n:nh, bh:l.)

Every line must have at least one alliteration between adjacent stressed words, and in the last line this alliteration must be between the last two stressed words—dearg, druim; chuim, ceard, cóir; chasmhail, cleasa, ceoil; asnaibh, óir (a consonant alliterates either with itself or with its corresponding form produced by initial grammatical mutation, and a vowel alliterates with itself or any other).

The professional bard was allowed to use measures less cramping than the 7-syllable line. A stanza from a 16th-c. religious poem will illustrate the greater scope available. The meter is droighneach, whose lines average from 9 to 13 syllables. In the following quatrain the lines number respectively 11, 15 (exceptionally), 11, and 13 syllables.

Tairm na n-éal, foghar na n-uile ainmhidhe, 1
foghar ainglidhe na n-éan, foghar duille gach 2
dhionnmhuighe,— ag soin moladh na n-úileadh dá 3 n-daghruire—bùireadh an doimh dhamhghoire, foghar na 4 fhiodhbhuidhe.
(Aithdioghluim Dána, no. 76.)

The crash of clouds, the sound of all animals, the angelic sound of birds, the sound of leaves on every hillside, the belling of the stag among the deerherd, the sound of the forest—through these comes the praise of the elements to their kind King.

Such amplitude as this measure permits does not, however, exempt it from the stringencies of bardic law. To conform to the pattern of droighneach each line must end in a tri-syllable. The finals in 2 and 4 must make generic rhyme—(dh)ionnmhuighe: (fh)iodhbhuidhe (nn may rhyme with dh in a consonant cluster). The finals in 1 and 3 must consonate and must not assonate with the finals in 2 and 4. All the stressed words in 2 except the last must make generic rhyme with words in 1—(f)oghar (twice): (f)oghar, ainclidhe:ainmhidhe, ēan:(n)ēal, (d)uille:uile (a permissible rhyme). And, similarly, 4 must rhyme with 3—(b)uileadh:(d)uileadh, (d)oimh:(s)oin, (dh)amhghoire:(d)aghruire, (f)oghar:(m)oladh. In 2 and 4 at least the last two stressed words must alliterate—duille, dhionnmhuighe; foghar, fhiodhbhuidhe. In 1 and 3 at least two of the last three stressed words must alliterate—uile, ainmhidhe; duileadh, daghruire.

Since long measures like droighneach occur less frequently than the compact 7 or 8-syllable measures such as rannaigheacht mhōr, it seems apparent that most bards preferred to work under the more severe limitations of their miniaturist's art. Like the decorators of the Book of Kells, they found their satisfaction in challenging their ingenuity to fill each minute space in the most colorful, varied, and exhaustive manner possible.

Medieval Gaelic and Welsh verse was produced by professional poets who were schooled in their art for years. The earliest vernacular manuals of prosody known in Western Europe are the Ir., dating back to the end of the 8th c. (See Thurneysen, in Göttingen Abhandlungen, 14, no. 2, 78–89.) It is not surprising, therefore, that the prosodic complexities which the bards evolved have never been matched. Within the realm of European poetry, Norse skaldic verse (see OLD NORSE POETRY) alone approaches Celt. in intricacy, and the reason for its similarity probably lies in the fact that Norse poets attempted to emulate the traveling Ir. bards.

Aesthetic judgment of such poetry is consequently very difficult for those unused to its requirements. In their use of Eng. near-rhyme both Hopkins and Owen have imitated the resources of Celt. generic rhyme, but they have not really accustomed the modern reader to it, for they use such rhyme merely as an optional decoration, not as an unavoidable necessity, and they do not submit to any systematic rules. (For them rob would make an equally good rhyme with either rod or rot; for the Ir. bard only rod would be acceptable.) Mere metrical virtuosity will not make an otherwise poor poem remarkable; but a good poem written in the strict Celt. measures derives much of its force from the subtleties of its workmanship.

With the decline of the bardic orders in the Celt. countries, new and simpler meters emerged. In part these are the products of amateur versification, in part they may represent the dignification of popular and perhaps ancient song-meters hitherto unrecorded, and in part they certainly represent the adaptation of alien measures. When the secret of generic rhyme was lost, the most appealing device seems to have been assonance. Thus, in one of the songs of Geoffrey Keating (17th c.), which is typical of the new Ir. stressed verse known as abhrān, not only do the final stressed syllables assonate (as in the OF laisse), but all the others assonate in order, each of the first stressed syllables with one another, and each of the second, and the third, and the fourth:

Öm sgeol ar ärd-mhagh Fáil nī chodlāim
oidhche,

'S dō bhreodh gō brath mē dāla ā pobuil dīlis.

Gīdh rō-fhāda ātaid 'nā bhfal rē broscar biodhbhadh,

Fā dhcoidh gūr fhas ā lān dō'n chogāl triōtha.

(Dánta . . . Sheathruin Céitinn, ed. E. C. mac Giolla Eáin [Dublin, 1900], no. 3; see Hyde, Irish Poetry, p. 128.)

Because of what I've heard about Fail's noble plain [Ireland] I cannot sleep at night, and it has crushed me utterly to think of her noble people. Though in the rampart they have stood too long facing a hostile rabble, enough of these tares at last have spread among them.

The assonance thus runs

Ö--ā--ā--ö--ö--ī

through each line.

Since Keating's time some Gaelic poets have become satisfied to use only a single final assonance. In Wales, though cynganedd is still practiced, many song writers have adopted the patterns familiar to rhymed, stressed Eng. poetry even in such nationalistic songs as the original Welsh version of Men of Harlech.

Wele goelcerth wen yn fflamio,	a
A thafodau tân yn bloeddio	a
Ar i'r dewrion ddod i daro	a
Unwaith eto'n un.	b

(Caradar, 3.68)

Lo, the beacon brightly flaming, and tongues of fire shouting to the brave ones to go once again to strike together.

Only in its alliteration (which is not fully reproduced in the familiar Eng. version of this song) does its prosody retain any peculiarly Celt. flavor. But the most notable mark of the Europeanizing of Celt. prosody lies in the fact that several of today's outstanding Celt. poets have written their best work in vers libre devoid of any of their traditional devices. See also BRETON POETRY, CORNISH POETRY, IRISH POETRY, SCOTTISH GAELIC POETRY, WELSH POETRY.

IRISH: R. Thurneysen, "Entwicklung der irischen Metrik," Revue celtique, 6 (1884; on L. origin of Ir. rhyme), and "Mittelirische Verslehren," in Irische Texte, ed. W. Stokes and E. Windisch, III, pt. 1 (1891; cf. Königl. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaft zu Göttingen, Philol.-hist. Klasse, Abhandlungen, 14, no. 2, 78-89) (prosodic manuals 8th-11th c.); D. Hyde, Ir. Poetry (1902; partly outdated, but imitations in Eng. verse tr. are suggestive); K. Meyer, A Primer of Ir. Metrics (1909; still valuable but inadequate—see Ériu, 8 (1916), and "Ueber die älteste irische Dichtung," Königl. Preussische Akad. der Wissenschaften, Philol.-hist. Klasse, Abhandlungen, Jahrg. 1913, nos. 6, 10 (early unrhymed and rhymed poetry 7th-8th c.); O. Bergin, "The Principles of Alliteration," Ériu, 9 (1921-23); Tadhg Dall Ó Huiginn, ed. and tr. E. Knott (Ir. Texts Soc., 22-23, 1922-26; good introd. to bardic verse); E. Knott, An Introd. to Ir. Syllabic Poetry (1928, 2d ed. 1957; thorough and reliable), and Ir. Classical Poetry (1957); Aithdioghluim Dána, ed. and tr. L. McKenna (Ir. Texts Soc., 37, 40, 1939-40; wide variety of bardic meters, succinctly classified); G. Murphy, Early Ir. Metrics (1961); C. Watkins, "Indo-European Metrics and Archaic Ir. Verse," Celtica, 6 (1963; important discovery).

SCOTTISH GAELIC: W. J. Watson, Bardachd Ghaidhlig (2d ed., 1932; important; though, for bardic rhyme, insufficient).

WELSH: J. Loth, La métrique galloise (2 v., 1900-1902; on all W. meters, including comparison with Cornish, Breton, and Ir.); J. Morris-Jones, Cerdd Dafod [Poetic Art] (1925; in W., indexed by G. Bowen, Mynegai i Cerdd Dafod, 1947); A.S.D. Smith (Caradar), W. Made Easy, III (n.d.; very helpful introd.); T. Parry, A Hist. of W. Lit., tr. H. I. Bell (1955; appendices to several chapters discuss meters).

C.W.D.

CENTO (L. "patchwork"). A poetic composition made up of passages selected from the work of some great poet of the past. Homer largely served this purpose in Gr. literature from the adaptations by Trygaeus of various lines in the Iliad and Odyssey (Aristophanes, Peace 1090-94) to the Homerokeñtrones of the Byzantine period. Similarly Virgil was the most popular source for centos in later Roman times. The oldest of those extant is the tragedy Medea by Hosidius Geta (2d c. A.D.), while the C. nuptialis of Ausonius and the C. Vergilianus of Proba (4th c. A.D.) are among others drawn from his work. Renaissance and later works of this kind included the It. Petrarca spirituale (1536) and the Eng. Cicero princeps (1608), which was a treatise, compiled from Cicero, on government. In the modern era may be mentioned a Shakespearean c. which appeared in English (Nov. 1919) and humorous centos which are occasionally published in popular literary reviews.—J. O. Delepiere, Tableau de la littérature du centon chez les anciens et chez les modernes (2 v. 1874-75); R. Lamacchia, "Dall'arte allusiva al centone," Atene e Roma n.s. 3 (1958).

R.J.G.

CENTROID. See PROSODY.

CHAIN RHYME. A rhyming device, akin in structure to rime riche (q.v.), which takes up the last syllable of a line and repeats it as the first syllable of the line immediately following. It must be noted that the repeated syllable, though having the same sound as its predecessor, must carry a different meaning: "Dieu gard ma Maistresse et regente / Gente de corps et de façon. / Son cuer tient le mien en sa tente / Tant et plus d'un ardent frisson" (Marot). Occasional brief examples of chain r. may be found in Eng., as in Hopkins: "O there's none . . . / Be beginning to despair, to despair, / Despair, despair, despair, despair. / Spare! / There is one . . ."—M. Grammont, Le Vers français (2d ed., 1913); J. Suberville, Hist. et théorie de la versification fr. (new ed., 1956).

S.L.M.

CHANSO (canso, chanson). A love song, the literary genre par excellence among the Old Prov. poets. Its distinguishing characteristics are precisely the two great contributions of the troubadours to all subsequent European literature—a new conception of love involving the exaltation of the lady, and a constant striving for perfection and originality of form. It is impossible to draw a sharp line between the ch. and the older vers (q.v.); but by the time the name ch. came into common use (toward the end of the 12th c.), the ideals of courtly love (q.v.) had become generally accepted and the technique of composition more polished, so that the ch. is apt to be more artistic, but also more conventional and artificial, than the vers. The typical ch. has 5 or 6 stanzas, of identical structure, plus an envoi, or tornada (q.v.). Far from following any set metrical pattern, every ch. was expected to have a stanzaic structure and a tune that were completely original. This proved too high a hurdle for many poets, but the metrical diversity of the extant chansos is still very impressive. Unfortunately, the same can hardly be said for their contents, which simply ring the changes on a few well-worn themes and situations. The poet's lady love is almost never named, and she is described in such vague generalities that an identification is ordinarily out of the question. The proper names used in a ch. (commonly in the tornada) are for the most part those of friends or patrons to whom the poem is dedicated.—Jeanroy, II.

F.M.C.

CHANSONS DE GESTE is the term by which the OF epic poems relating the deeds of Charlemagne and his barons, or other feudal lords of the Carolingian era, were known in their time, principally the 12th and 13th c. "Geste" has, aside from the original sense of "deeds," additional senses of "history" and "historical document," and by further extension it comes to mean "family, lineage." Upward of eighty of the poems survive, in whole or in part, in existing mss., some of them in several redactions. They celebrate heroic actions, historical or pseudo-historical, and the chivalric ideals of a Christian, monarchical, and feudal France. Critics have not succeeded in reaching firm conclusions as to whether the ideological preoccupations are primarily those of Carolingian times or of the period of the Crusades and 12th-c. France. The history is at best considerably overlaid with legend, and many of the epics are largely or wholly fictitious, reworking the themes made popular by the earlier poems. This is particularly true where the taste for the romantic and the fantastic nurtured by the romances imitated from Gr. and L. antiquity, the Arthurian romances, and folklore was carried over into the invention of plots for the epics: this hybrid type is best illustrated by poems like Huon de Bordeaux, Renaud de Montauban, and Le Chevalier au Cygne.

CYCLES. Several more or less well-defined groups of these poems may be distinguished. The most cohesive of these (24 poems) is the cycle of Guillaume d'Orange, to be identified with the historical Count Guillaume de Toulouse, contemporary of Charlemagne, and in which are recounted his deeds and those of his six brothers, his nephews, particularly Vivien and Bertrand, his father Aymeri de Narbonne, and others of his line. The principal poems of this cycle are Le Couronnement de Louis, Le Charroi de Nîmes, La Prise d'Orange, Le Couvenant Vivien, La Chanson de Guillaume, Aliscans, Le Moniage Guillaume, and Aymeri de Narbonne.

The so-called cycle of Charlemagne is less extensive and less unified. To it are assigned the poems treating of Charlemagne's wars (La Chanson de Roland, Aspremont, Les Saxons) or of his youth (Mainet) or of earlier royal heroes such as Floüvant, son of Clovis. One of these is the partly comic Pèlerinage de Charlemagne, which includes the description of a highly fanciful visit to the court of the Emperor of Constantinople.

The third main group has as its common element the theme of a feudal lord's revolt, usually provoked by an act of injustice, against his seigneur, who is in several cases Charlemagne, as in Girart de Roussillon (the only chanson de geste surviving in a dialect of the langue d'oc), La Chevalerie Ogier de Danemarque, Renaud de Montauban, known also as Les Quatre fils Aymon, and Huon de Bordeaux. In the oldest poem of this group, the 11th-c. Gormont et Isembart, surviving only in a fragment, the renegade Isembart fights against his lord King Louis III. Raoul de Cambrai relates the sombre violence of feudal warfare following a forcible dispossession. The unforgiving bitterness of struggle between two great families is the subject of a minor cycle, Les Lorrains, of which the principal poems are Garin le Lorrain and Hervis de Metz.

LA CHANSON DE ROLAND. La Chanson de Roland is the masterpiece of the genre and the earliest surviving example, composed most likely in the second half of the 11th c. in continental France and preserved in an Anglo-Norman manuscript of the mid-12th c. (Oxford version). Later versions lengthen the poem and insert additional episodes. The historical event on which the poem is based is the annihilation of Charlemagne's rear guard under Count Roland while recrossing the Pyrenees after an expedition against Saragossa in 778. In the poem the attackers are referred to as Saracens, whereas they were in all probability Basques, and a succession of councils is related, leading to the decision to leave Spain. A traitor Ganelon is introduced, as Roland's stepfather, who urges the Saracens to attack the rear guard in revenge for Roland's having designated him for the perilous embassy to the enemy camp. The disaster is assured when Roland overconfidently refuses to call back Charlemagne by sounding his horn when attacked, in spite of the urgings of his companion Oliver. After the defeat at Roncevaux, the poem ends with another battle in which Charlemagne is victorious, and with the trial and execution of Ganelon.

The Chanson de Roland is remarkable for the ideals it exalts—unstinting devotion to God and to feudal lord, and to the fatherland, "douce France,"—for its vigorous and incisive portrayals of great characters, closely knit structure, elevation of tone, and firm, concise language.

FORM, VERSIFICATION, STYLE. The usual line is of 10 syllables, with caesura after the fourth, not counting a possible unstressed syllable with schwa-vowel after the accented tenth syllable or after the accented fourth. Among the earlier epics the 8-syllable or the 12-syllable line may be used (Gormont et Isebart, Pèlerinage de Charlemagne). The strophic form is that of the laisse, a variable number of lines bound together by the same assonance in the earlier poems, by rhyme in later ones. In the Chanson de Roland the laissez average 14 lines in length; in later poems they tend to be much longer. In length, the c.d.g. range from about a thousand lines (Pèlerinage de Charlemagne) to 10,000 lines and over; the Chanson de Roland has 4,000 in the Oxford version. As their name would indicate, the c.d.g. were sung, and the notation of some music has been preserved.

In coherence of composition, the epics vary greatly, from well-knit poems like the Chanson de Roland or the Pèlerinage de Charlemagne to rambling and even self-contradictory successions of episodes. The style is vigorous and stamped with the mark of talent in the best poems, but diffuse and filled with clichés ("epic formulas") in the poorer ones. The use of clichés has been used by some scholars as an argument for the theory that the epics were improvised orally by the performing jongleur.

ORIGINS. The debate over the origins and the prehistory of the c.d.g. has been, for three-quarters of a century, the outstanding controversy in Fr. medieval literary history. In the 19th c. it was customary to consider the surviving chansons as deriving ultimately from poems inspired by contemporary historical events, constantly altered and expanded in the course of oral transmission through two, three, or even four centuries. At the beginning of the 20th c., J. Bédier denied the continuity of transmission and argued to reduce the historic content of the poems to a few data discovered by jongleur-poets in sanctuaries along the pilgrimage routes in the 11th and 12th c. Bédier's "individualism," as it has been called, has increasingly been subject to massive attack by numerous scholars who have revived the older view and buttressed it with new "traditionalist" arguments. It is principally around the Chanson de Roland that controversy wages, according to the degree of originality the critic is willing to ascribe to the author of the Oxford version. Traditionalists see him as a mere arranger of a poem with a long prehistory of collective elaboration, an intermediate group see his sources in medieval L. hagiography or epic, while "individualists" minimize his debt to hypothetical predecessors and credit him with the largest possible measure of creativeness.

DIFFUSION. The c.d.g. early became popular outside their own domain of northern France and Norman England, being translated notably into Middle High German and Old-Norse-Icelandic. In Italy they were made accessible in an Italianized Fr. before serving as the inspiration for wholly It. poems. They were known in Spain, where, however, national epic heroes were preferred. In France, the 15th and 16th c. knew the epic legends through prose adaptations, before these in turn were forgotten through two and a half centuries of classicism.

In spite of its age and the obsolescence of many of the views expressed, the best general reference is still L. Gautier's Épopées françaises, to be consulted in the 2d ed., 4 v., 1878-92, supplemented by his Bibliographie des c.d.g., 1897. J. Bédier's celebrated Légendes épiques, 4 v., 1908-13, repr. 1914-21 and 1926-29, is not a general history of the genre, but a series of studies which constitute a sweeping criticism of the theory of historical continuity. M. de Riquer's C.d.g. françaises (1957), the 2d ed. and tr. of a work originally publ. in Sp., is a very good recent general study, treating at length the most important poems. P. Le Gentil's concise Chanson de Roland (1955) is the best and most recent introduction to the study of this poem. Questions of text and prehistory are extensively examined in J. Horrent, La Chanson de Roland dans les littératures française et espagnole au moyen âge (1951) and M. Delbouille, Sur la genèse de la Chanson de Roland (1954). A compendious état présent is furnished by A. Junker, "Stand der Forschung zum Rolandslied," Germanisch-Romanische Monatsschrift, 1956.

The arguments for oral transmission with free improvisation of the c.d.g. are given by J. Rychner in La C.d.g.: essai sur l'art épique des jongleurs (1955), and more briefly in an article in La Table Ronde (Dec. 1958). Rychner's views are subjected to close scrutiny and criticism in a study by M. Delbouille, "Les C.d.g. et le livre," in Liège. Université. Faculté de philosophie et lettres. La Technique littéraire des c.d.g. Actes du Colloque de Liège, Sept. 1957. (1959). Les Origines des c.d.g. by I. Siciliano (1951), the 2d, rev. ed. of the original in It., is a brilliant critique of origintheories. R. Menéndez Pidal's La Chanson de Roland et la tradition épique des Francs (1960), a 2d, rev. ed. of a work first publ. in Sp., is a substantial defense of the neotraditionalist view of Roland origins.

In 1955 the Société Rencesvals was founded at Pamplona for the study of the Romance epic. Communications delivered at meetings of the society have been publ. in Coloquios de Roncesvalles (Saragossa, 1956), v. 3 of Cahiers de civilisation médiévale, and v. 21 of Cultura Neolatina. The society publ. an occasional Bulletin bibliographique (1958, 1960, 1963-).

Ample bibliographical treatment will be found in A Crit. Bibliog. of Fr. Lit. (D. C. C. Cabern, general ed.), 1, The Mediaeval Period, ed. by U. T. Holmes, Jr., 2d ed., 1952, and more fully in R. Bossuat, Manuel bibliogra- phique de la littérature française du moyen âge (1951) and its two supplements (1955, 1961).

C.A.K.

CHANSON DE TOILE. See FRENCH POETRY.

CHANT (OF chanter, L. cantare, "to sing"). (1) Any song or melody: the "Chant of tuneful birds," Paradise Regained 2. 290. (2) Sometimes the actual melody to which the Psalms, Canticles, etc. are sung. (3) Or the Psalm or Canticle itself. (4) A poem intended to be chanted rather than sung or read, as especially those of W. B. Yeats or Vachel Lindsay:

Booth led boldly with his big bass drum . . .
(General William Booth Enters Into Heaven)

Chants are most commonly found in liturgical services. The Anglican chants, which have doubtless influenced secular poetry intended to be recited in a similar fashion, derive from the Gregorian, the plain song or cantus firmus used in Roman ritual and named for Pope Gregory.

When a poem is set to music, the rhythm is controlled by the music, but when it is chanted the musical elements are subordinated to the verbal. Chanting gives verse a "hieratic quality, removing it from the language of common speech, and it thereby increases the exhilaration of poetry, bringing it nearer to the sphere of the heroic . . ." (N. Frye, "Introduct.: Lexis and Melos," Sound and Poetry, 1957). R.O.E.

CHANT ROYAL. One of the most complex and difficult of the OF verse forms. Related to the ballade (q.v.), the c.r. in its most common form (as described in the 14th c. by Eustache Deschamps) consists of 5 stanzas of 11 lines each, rhyming ababccddedE, followed by an envoi (q.v.), rhyming ddedE. It is further distinguished by the use of a refrain—as indicated by the capital letters—at the end of each stanza, including the last line of the envoi, and by the fact that, except in the envoi, no rhyme words may be used twice. Thus, 60 lines must be rhymed on 5 rhyme sounds, a formidable technical task. Perhaps the technical challenge of c.r. explains the regal element in its name, but it is more likely that it is called "royal" because of its address to the "prince" presiding over a puy, or poetic contest. In addition to Deschamps, who composed numerous chants royaux, Charles d'Orléans, Jean Marot, and, especially, his son Clément excelled in the use of the form.

Ironically, this most solemn and grandiose of the Fr. forms has had the fate, in the 19th and 20th c., of being employed almost solely as vers de société by such light poets as Richard Le Gallienne and Don Marquis.—Kastner; Paterson.

CHANTE-FABLE. A romance of adventure composed, as the name implies, of alternating assonantal verse and prose, the former intended to be sung, the latter to be spoken. Bossuat refers to Aucassin et Nicolette (ca. 1200) as the sole witness to a genre that must have had a certain vogue. The rhythmic and musical structure of the verse portions seems to resemble that of the chansons de geste (q.v.). The alternation of prose and verse has sometimes been thought to be an imitation of an Arabian technique. Aucassin is characterized by the delicate treatment of detail that reminds one of the work of medieval miniaturists, exquisite charm, combined with simplicity and even naïveté in the expression of sentiment, and an every-day realism entirely divorced from crudity.—Aucassin et Nicolette, chante-fable du XIIIe s., ed. M. Roques (1925; 2d ed., 1936; see the crit. biblog., introd. and the note additionnelle at the end of the 1936 ed.); R. Bossuat, Le Moyen âge (1931); Cabene, 1, nos. 2127–35. I.S.

CHARM. An incantation or spell; a song, verse, phrase, or word sung or spoken to invite or control supernatural power. Charms may ward off evil, expel diseases, destroy enemies, summon spirits, endow objects with supernatural power, attract good luck, win success in love. One of the earliest recorded forms of written literature, charms accompany the magical rites of almost all preliterate peoples. They are universally known in the literatures of all the Indo-European cultures. Their chief influences upon the poetry of literary tradition have been to provide a formulaic structure, traditional content, and incantatory diction for poetry of invocation. These elements have been used in widely varying contexts. E.g., Shakespeare uses charms in the witches' cauldron scene, Macbeth 4.1.1–38, to invoke the spirit of evil; in Lear 3.4.44f., Edgar invokes snatches of charms against "the foul fiend." Thomas Campion's lyric, Thrice toss these oaken ashes in the air, adapted from Ovid's Metamorphoses, submits magic to the greater power of his mistress. Modern instances of charms as invectives are James Stephens's Righteous Anger and Robert Graves's Traveller's Curse After Misdirection. —F. Grendon, "The Anglo-Saxon Charms," JAF, 22 (1909); Chadwick. D.H.

CHASTUSHKA. A short Rus. folk song, often humorous and epigrammatic; at times vulgar. In content it reflects the attitudes of its cultivators, particularly youth, toward current social reality. Rhymed, the c. is usually of four lines, and shows relative rhythmic regularity. Two and six-line forms are also found. The c. has been known since the middle of the 19th c. and has had a steady growth in popularity.—

D. K. Zelenin, "Das heutige russische Schnaderhüpfel," ZSP, 1 (1915); Y. M. Sokolov, "Folk Rhymes," Rus. Folklore (1950). W.E.H.

CHIASMUS (Gr. "a placing crosswise," from the name of the Gr. letter X, "chi"; L. decussatio, from the symbol X for ten, "decem"). According to the Gr. rhetorician Hermogenes (2d c. A.D.), the pattern of a sentence consisting of two main clauses, each modified by a subordinate clause, in which sentence each of the subordinate clauses could apply to each of the main clauses, so that the order of these four members could be altered in several ways without change in the meaning of the whole (Peri heuresēōn, i.e., On Invention 4.3, in C. Walz, Rhetores Graeci, 9 v., 1832-36, v. 3, p. 157), e.g. "Pardon me, God, I knew not what I did! / And pardon, father, for I knew not thee!" (Henry VI, part 3, 2.5.69-70). C. has been more recently defined as the criss-cross placing of sentence members that correspond in either syntax or meaning, with or without word repetition (Oxford Dictionary; Lausberg), e.g., "With comely haveour and count'nance sage" (The Faerie Queene 3.12.3.8).

The similar figure antimetabole (Gr. "transposition," apparently first recorded in Quintilian), though Quintilian defines it merely as a figure of words "repeated with variations in case or tense," is illustrated by him with examples in which two words of the early part of a sentence are later repeated in reverse order, e.g., "Non ut edam vivo, sed ut vivam edo" (Institutes of Oratory, 1st c. A.D., 9.3.85); and it is primarily this symmetrical pattern of word repetition (abba) that the term antimetabole is most often made to designate by later authorities, e.g., John Hoskins, Directions for Speech and Style, ca. 1599 (ed. of 1935, p. 14), John Smith, The Mysterie of Rhetorique Unveiled, 1657, and others, most of whose illustrations are from prose. A clear example from Eng. poetry can be seen in the final line of Shakespeare's 154th Sonnet: "Love's fire heats water, water cools not love."

It would seem convenient to use the term "c." for the criss-cross order and correspondence in meaning or syntax of two pairs of words, whether or not involving word repetition, and restrict antimetabole to the narrower meaning of a pair of words repeated (usually with some morphological change) in reverse order. H.B.

"CHICAGO CRITICS, THE." Originally the authors of Critics and Criticism: Ancient and Modern (1952), so called because of their association with the University of Chicago; the label has since been extended to some of their pupils and to others who have acknowledged indebtedness to them. The present account can touch only on those broad features of their approach to criticism which distinguish them most clearly, as a group, from other contemporary critical schools. These may be summed up under two heads: first, what they have called their "pluralism" and, second, what has been called by others their "Neo-Aristotelianism," the two terms referring respectively to their concern, as theorists and historians of criticism, with investigating the logical grounds of variation among critical positions and to their interest, as students of literature, in exploring the possibilities of one particular approach, which has seemed to them too much neglected, to the analysis and evaluation of literary works.

(1) The most explicit statements of their "pluralism" are contained in McKeon's "The Philosophic Bases of Art and Criticism," Olson's "An Outline of Poetic Theory," and Crane's The Languages of Criticism and the Structure of Poetry; the same view also underlies the various studies by these and other writers of figures and episodes in the history of criticism. The basis of the view is the recognition that what any critic says on a literary subject, general or particular, is determined only in part by his direct experience with literary works; it is conditioned no less importantly by the tacit assumptions concerning the nature of literature and the most appropriate method of studying it which he brings to his immediate task: he will say different things about a given poem, for example, or at least mean different things, according as he conceives of poetry as a species of artistic making or as a mental faculty or as a special kind of knowledge, and his results will likewise differ widely according as his reasoning about it rests primarily on literal definitions and distinctions within his subject matter or primarily on analogies between it and other things; and so on through a good many other possible variations in principle and method.

The Chicago writers have thought it likely that much, though by no means all, of the notorious diversity in doctrine and interpretation observable in the criticism of all ages can be accounted for in these terms; and they have taken this possibility as a working hypothesis in their writings on critics and critical movements from Plato and Aristotle to the present day. In these they have sought to judge the achievements of critics, not by any universal criterion of what literature or poetry "truly" is or of what criticism "ought" to be, but by the relative standard of what they have given us, within the limits of their widely variant principles and methods, in the way of verifiable and usable solutions to the different problems they set out to solve. They have gone on the assumption, in short, that though some modes of criticism are more restricted in scope than others, there are and have been many valid critical approaches to literature, each of which exhibits the literary object in a different light and each of which has its characteristic powers and limitations, so that the only rational ground for adhering to one of them rather than to any of the others is its superior capacity to give us the special kind of understanding and evaluation of literature we want to get, at least for the time being.

(2) The so-called Neo-Aristotelianism of the Chicago group represents a choice of this pragmatic sort. The special interest in the Poetics which appears in their earlier writings and explains the currency of this label had its origin in their concern, as teachers of literature, with developing a kind of practical criticism of literary texts that would emphasize the specifically artistic principles and reasons governing their construction, as distinct from their verbal meanings, their historical and biographical backgrounds, or their general qualitative characteristics, and that would attach more importance to the principles peculiar to different kinds of texts and to individual texts within a given kind than to those common to literature in general. The questions to be asked of any text in this sort of criticism would concern primarily the problems of organization, presentation, and expression imposed on its writer by the particular end he was trying to achieve in composing it, the nature of the means he employed in solving them, and the reasons governing his choice of these means rather than others; they would be questions, in short, the correct answers to which, since they pertain to a unique work of human art, can never be predicted in advance or deduced from any a priori critical theory, but have to be arrived at by considering which one among various conceivable answers best accounts for what is in the text. But if general presuppositions about what any given literary work must be can only serve to impede the critic's inquiry into what its writer was actually attempting to do and why, he is almost certain, on the other hand, to become more accurate and discriminating in his judgments the more he knows of what it might be—of the range of possible things that writers may do in different kinds of works and of their reasons for doing them, insofar as these can be induced from their productions past and present.

The appeal of Aristotle to the Chicago group lay in the fact that he, more than any other critic they knew, had conceived of literary theory in this posteriori and differential way and had not only formulated some of its necessary distinctions and principles in his brief discussions of ancient tragedy and epic but pointed the way to further inquiries of the same general sort concerning possibilities in these and other literary arts still unrealized at the time he wrote. They have attempted to pursue some of these, and with increasing independence of the letter of the Poetics, in their writings on the lyric, the drama, and the novel.

R. S. Crane, W. R. Keast, R. McKeon, N. Maclean, E. Olson, B. Weinberg, Critics and Criticism: Ancient and Modern (1952); abridged ed. with new introd. and list of other related writings by the same authors to 1957 (1957). Later publications in the same tradition: W. J. Hippie, Jr., The Beautiful, the Sublime, and the Picturesque in 18th-C. Brit. Aesthetic Theory (1957); R. Marsh, "The 'Fallacy' of Universal Intention," MP, 55 (1958); W. C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961); N. Friedman and C. A. McLaughlin, Poetry: An Introd. to Its Form and Art (1961); E. Olson, Tragedy and the Theory of Drama (1961); B. Weinberg, A Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the It. Renaissance (1961); A. M. Wright, The Am. Short Story in the Twenties (1961). Critical discussions: W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., "The Chicago Critics," The Verbal Icon (1954); J. Holloway, "The New and the Newer Critics," ELC, 5 (1955), repr. The Charted Vision (1960); Krieger; H. P. Teasing, "The Chicago School," Orbis Litterarum, Supp. 2 (1958); Sutton. R.S.C.

CHILEAN POETRY. See SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY.

CHINESE POETRY. Nowhere has poetry been more widely or continuously esteemed and practiced than in China. From ancient times it was sung and chanted in the fields and in the halls of kings and princes; long transmitted by memory, it began to be preserved among the earliest records. It has been composed by emperors and concubines, generals and conscripts, governors and prostitutes. It has been written in solitary studies and on the walls of inns and brothels, at farewell meetings of friends or chance encounters by the wayside. Like poetry elsewhere, it has been sometimes a spontaneous expression of genuine feeling, sometimes a product of pure artifice—contrived for a polite occasion, a contest, or even the imperial examinations for public office. Until very recently the writing of verse was an accomplishment expected of any educated Chin., and although many have been remembered chiefly for their poems, only two or three who failed at everything else could be said to have been professional poets. A person could not, in fact, be called a poet in Chin., in the general sense, because there is no Chin. word for poetry—only different words for different kinds of verse.

However, in modern times one of these words is often used to connote poetry in general. The shih, because of its ancient origin, great prestige, and almost unbroken practice over the centuries, may be called the standard class of Chin. verse, subsuming many of its varied forms and styles. The word shih first appears as the name for the folk and courtier songs, hymns, and ceremonial libretti which comprise China's earliest recorded poetry, brought together before the time of Confucius (5th c. B.C.) in what came to be known as the Shih Ching (Classic of Songs). There is a tradition, not now much credited, that Confucius himself made the collection; he may have revised it. It is certain that he set great store by the Songs, both words and music. They were all sung or chanted; in China, as elsewhere, music and poetry were closely related in origin and development.

The main characteristics of Chin. verse are already present in the Songs: its strong rhythms, its abundant use of rhyme, its basic expressive devices, its succinctness.

The monosyllabic word, represented by a single graph, is the basic rhythmic unit of Chin. poetry. Length of line therefore sets the meter, so that one speaks of 4-word-line (4-beat) poems, 7-word-line poems, etc. The early ritual chants mix long and short lines, but among the folk songs the uniform 4-word-line poem is predominant. The usual rhyme scheme is ABCB; initial and internal rhyme also appear, as does alliteration. Words are often doubled, usually with onomatopoeic or similar effects—the sound of nets thrown in the water, of fish flapping their tails, the glistening of leaves, the whirling of wind. The first words in the collection are guan-guan, the cry of the osprey. As in folk poetry the world over, phrases or lines are often repeated from stanza to stanza:

I go out the East Gate—
There are girls like clouds.
Though [many] as clouds,
None absorbs my thoughts.
White robe, grey kerchief,
She delights my heart.

I go out the Gate Tower—
There are girls like reeds.
Though [many] as reeds,
None detains my thoughts.
White robe and maddler,
She can delight me.

This simple kind of repetition and variation, a natural and easy unifying device, foreruns a whole complex of structural and verbal parallelisms elaborated in Chin. poetry, as well as in some types of prose, many centuries later.

Despite repetition of components, the Songs are remarkably terse, as is Chin. poetry in general—partly because of the nature of the language, and partly because of a preference for suggestion rather than exposition. The Songs are by no means reticent, and abound in direct declaration of emotion. Directness, however, does not mean complete statement; Chin. directness may seem like ellipsis to the Western reader. In the poem given above it is not said that "I know a girl who wears a white robe and grey kerchief." The two articles of clothing stand for the girl, and the line stands alone with its syntactical relation to the next line indeterminate (an example not lost on modern poets acknowledging Chin. influence). Comparisons are seldom grammatically indicated with "like" or "as if." Philosophical observation, likewise, is seldom stated, and is sometimes rendered obliquely, as when the imagery of nature is used in contrast to man's plight rather than as a sympathetic reflection of it—the brightness of flowers, the permanence of hills providing a poetic counterpoint to man's sorrow and evanescence.

The themes of the Songs are those of an ordered, by no means primitive society: the joys and sorrows of love and marriage, of agricultural labor and feudal service, of food and drink or their lack. Poems by educated courtiers deal with pleasures and trials of court life, praising or blaming the kings and lords. Although the courtier poems are full of stereotypes as compared to the folk songs, many clichés are common to both and are repeated in verse of later centuries. The whole body of Chin. poetry is replete with direct and indirect allusions to the Songs, allusions with multiple levels of association derived in part from a moral-allegorical interpretation of the classic text (compare The Song of Solomon) which was standard from the Han dynasty (206 B.C.–A.D. 221) until recent times. Modern scholarship has performed a signal service to literature and anthropology by restoring the Songs minus the accretions of intervening ages; but Chin. poetry of these intervening ages owes perhaps more, in allusive subtlety and complexity, to the traditional interpretations than it owes to the Songs themselves.

The Songs reflect life in the North; China's next known poetry, preserved in the Ch'u Tz'u (Elegies of Ch'u) originated in the more luxuriant Yangtze basin, in the Warring Kingdoms period after Confucius. This collection includes the Nine Songs, a group of erotic incantations by shamans summoning various deities. Essentially dance libretti, they are rhapsodic in structure and content, richly sensuous in imagery. They were believed to have been set down by Ch'ü Yüan, a loyal minister who drowned himself after scheming courtiers estranged the King of Ch'u from him. Other verse compositions attributed to or associated with him appear in the Elegies, notably a long personal lament called Li Sao (usually rendered Falling into Trouble). It describes a journey to the gates of heaven and back in vain search of a suitable mate and a prince worthy of Ch'ü Yüan's services. The two goals, curiously confused in the extant text, have been taken as one by commentators (the treatment of love poetry in terms of political allegory being a convention of Confucian critics, often adopted by poets themselves). In addition to its unprecedented length and personal emphasis, the Li Sao differs from the classic Songs in being independent of music and in employing a new metric. It is mostly in 7-word lines of coupletlike structure: two 3-word groups separated by the extra character hsi which effects a central caesura. This hsi seems to be equivalent to the indrawn sigh which Chin. to this day sound at the end of a line of verse when intoning it. The Li Sao and its companion pieces established a new genre, the sao (elegy).

Similar in metric but usually less personal in content was the fu (rhymeprose). This generally had a short narrative or expository introduction in prose, and the main body (descriptive or persuasive or both) used rhyme at will, here and there shifting to a different meter. Probably the first Chin. form of "pure" literature, the rhymeprose became the favorite rhythmic vehicle of Han writers. However, tradition dates some of the most remarkable examples considerably earlier and attributes them to Sung Yü, supposedly a nephew of Ch'ü Yüan himself: e.g., the Kao-t'ang Fu, a fantastic description of the wonders of Mount Kao-t'ang. Such exuberant exercises in word-magic suggest that the fu also harks back to shamanistic incantations. But composition in rhymeprose became progressively regularized, and the "parallel style" (verbal and syntactical balance of lines within couplets or larger groups) became an inseparable element of it. The regularized form was practiced with frequent distinction through the Six Dynasties (221-589), reaching its highest development in the Lament for the South by Yü Hsin, a historical and personal poem on the fall of the Liang dynasty. Other outstanding fu include Hsi K'ang's On the Lute, Lu Chi's On Literature (an analysis of the creative process), and Chiang Yen's On Separation.

Meantime other verse genres arose. The history of Chin. poetry consistently shows a pattern of overlapping development: as an established genre became rigidly prescriptive in form and imitative in content and diction, poets tended to discover and exploit the novelty of some popular oral type of poetry or song-words. The supplanted genre seldom became obsolete but continued to be used, generally with a deliberate effect of archaism, occasionally rejuvenated in the hands of some poet of genius. By the end of the Han a new lyric form had emerged, inspired by popular songs and borrowing from them many of its themes.

Chin. music had changed greatly since ancient times, affected by foreign importations during the expansion of the Han empire. Distant military expeditions, foreign trade, and growing cosmopolitanism also gave a wider range of themes to popular song-words, which along with the music were collected and recorded by the imperial Music Bureau (yüeh-fu) and are therefore known as yüeh-fu poems. (The term is also applied to later popular songs and to countless literary imitations of the genre.) These balladlike lyrics usually present through monologue or dialogue a dramatic situation such as that of the abandoned wife or concubine, the princess sent as bride to a barbarian tribal chief, the abused orphan, the soldier at the front or in captivity.

Early yüeh-fu are characterized by mixed meters, but 5-word lines are frequent, and probably from these arose the new 5-word-line shih, the dominant verse form for centuries to come. Length and number of stanzas varied, but the individual line became regularized with a caesura after the second word, avoidance of enjambement, use of the couplet as a structural unit, and rhyming of alternate lines. Use of the 5-word-line shih by the literati became prominent around the Chien-an period (196-220), which lends its name to a renaissance of lyric poetry at the end of the Han era. This renaissance centered at the court of the Ts'ao family (founders of the succeeding Wei kingdom), and the prince Ts'ao Chih invested the new form with his personal emotions. A sense of transience and insecurity, for himself and for the age, colors his poems.

The period of the Three Kingdoms (including Wei) and the Six Dynasties spanned three centuries of political, social, and cultural disintegration and reformation, during which alien invaders and the foreign missionary religion of Buddhism were gradually assimilated. Many literati, deeply disturbed by the collapse of the imperial structure and its Confucian orthodoxy, retreated into Taoist or Buddhist seclusion, individualistic eccentricity, or the solace of wine—attitudes traditionally typified by a group of poets known as the Seven Sages of the Bamboo Grove. T'ao Ch'ien (T'ao Yüan-ming) shares the conflicts of the period but rises above his contemporaries in stature as a complex personality and an individual stylist. Flight from public office to a life of poverty as a farmer epitomizes his personal tragedy of divided allegiance between Confucian duty and Taoist freedom from social convention; his poetry expresses a mixture of desperation and delight, often with an undercurrent of guilt. Wine, of which he writes often, represents not so much an easy solution as a resigned acceptance of the tangible pleasures in a universe apparently unconcerned with man's questionings and desires (e.g., the poem Substance, Shadow, and Spirit). Yet of all Chin. poets he has perhaps the strongest affinity for the world of nature, drawing from it simple symbols (chrysanthemum, pine, homing bird) which acquire special significance in the context of his entire work. He wrote fu and some archaistic 4-word-line poems, but is best known for those in pentameter. They show an unstudied parallelism in thought and syntax. Hsieh Ling-yün and Pao Chao, more typical poets of the period and more deliberate in technique, further developed the craft of the 5-word-line poem.

Increasing speculation on the nature and function of literature was beginning to amplify the rudimentary critical theory inherited from Han times. Orthodox tradition regarded the ancient classics as the basis of all literature, and thus viewed the Classic of Songs as the fountainhead of poetry and the touchstone for its evaluation. Evaluation was by and large ethical; the standard Han preface to the Classic of Songs (Shih Ching), defining shih as the emotional expression of purposeful thought, stressed the didactic function of poetry allegedly laid down by Confucius.

The concept of poetry as an art was foreshadowed in a fragmentary Essay on Literature by Ts'ao P'ei, who became emperor of the succeeding Wei dynasty (220-264). Later in the 3d c., Lu Chi's Rhymeprose on Literature gave "expression of feeling" as the motive for any writing beyond the utilitarian; his analysis of the creative process was that of an artist, both in purpose and in effect. He was not, however, seeking to assail the classical tradition, but to revitalize and enrich it. The tradition was brilliantly restated in the most systematic critical work produced in the Liang dynasty (502-556), under which Chin. literary theory reached its height. This was Liu Hsieh's Wen-hsin Tiao-lung (the title defies translation), which classified all forms of writing in 21 categories, derived from one or another of the Classics: from the Shih Ching came the elegy (sao), songs (shih), the later folk songs (yüeh-fu), the rhymeprose (fu), praise odes (sung), and hymns (tsan). He gave examples of each and appraised them on the basis of their suitability to their purpose. Liu's work was by no means merely an elaborate bit of scholasticism; its second half dealt earnestly with the individual creative faculty and process, and astutely with problems of style, technique, and balance of form and content.

Liu Hsieh's patron, the Liang prince Hsiao T'ung, compiled in the Wen Hsüan (Anthology of Literature) a large collection of short writings up to his time which is our chief source for Six Dynasties poetry, and upon which later writers drew heavily for both diction and allusion. While ostensibly supporting the didactic tradition in his preface, Hsiao T'ung admitted pleasure as a guiding principle in his selection. Hsiao Kang, his brother and later Emperor, took an extreme position in defining poetry as a medium for free self-expression, and dissociating it from the ethics of canonical literature. His views were implemented in an anthology about love and beautiful women compiled at his order (Yü-t'ai Hsin-yung or New Lyrics from Jade Terraces). The contents were mostly by recent poets whose erotic preoccupation, preciosity of diction, and decorative artifice characterized the "palace style," which long continued in fashion. As a narrow preserve of aristocrats at beleaguered regional courts, the "palace style" eventually was pushed aside in the new social synthesis of the T'ang Dynasty (618-907).

The T'ang was another period of imperial expansion, foreign intercourse, and successful assimilation of new ideas and cultural innovations. In these three centuries new verse genres were developed and some old ones revitalized. The 5-word-line poem shared favor with a corresponding form based on a 7-word line with much the same prosodic features, the caesura coming after the fourth word. By the end of the 7th c. both forms had become regularized in such a way as to crystallize the prosodic tendencies of earlier poets. A prominent factor in the new lǚ-shih ("regulated poems") was the requirement of tonal contrast between the two lines of each couplet. Tone (relative pitch) as a phonemic element in each monosyllable undoubtedly had existed in ancient Chin., with a definite if unrecognized function in poetry; but the Chin. seem to have been unconscious of this linguistic peculiarity until zeal to translate the Buddhist scriptures brought them into contact with Sanskrit, which lacked it. In the 5th c. Shen Yo distinguished four tones, which were later grouped in two categories: "level" (constant in pitch) and "deflected" (changing in pitch). On the basis of general tendencies in poetry, Shen Yo formulated a set of euphonic prescriptions which, amplified by the practice of the 6th- and 7th-c. poets, resulted in the "regulated poem."

The great T'ang poets of the 8th and 9th c., in writing their lǚ-shih, conformed to a length of 8 or 12 lines (later 8 became standard), to the use of rhymes only in level tones and at the ends of alternate lines, to syntactical parallelism in certain couplets, and (less strictly) to rules of tonal contrast in all couplets. A poet who chose to work outside these limitations, as all did on occasion, was writing ku-shih ("old-style poems"). Some suggestion of the difficulty imposed by verbal parallelism and tonal contrast can be conveyed by a word-for-word translation (followed by a free one) of a lû-shih by Wang Wei, accompanied by its tonal pattern. Level tones are indicated by O, deflected tones by X, optional tones by an asterisk, and rhyme-words by an added R:

CHINESE POETRY

Late * X	years O X	only O X	love X O	peace X O-R
Myriad	affairs	not	involve	mind
Self * X	examine X O	no O X	long-term O X	plan X O-R
Only	know	return	old	woods
Pine * O	wind O X	blow O X	loosen X O	girdle X O-R
Mountain	moon	shine	play	lute
Your * X	question X O	failure O X	success O X	principle X O-R
Fishers'	song	enter	estuary	deep

In later life I only care for peace;
Affairs of state are none of my concern.
I know I have no plan to save the world,
Only my old retreat here in this wood.
My girdle loosened to the cool pine wind,
I play the lute beneath the mountain moon.
You ask the laws of failure and success?
The fishermen are singing in the cove . . .

Besides tonal contrast, note the strict verbal correspondencies of the couplet in italics. Classical allusions expand the meaning of lines 2, 3, and 7; line 8 suggests the typical non-sequitur answers of Zen Buddhists to abstruse questions. Such compact verse requires the most exacting economy; each word must contribute its full share of meaning, often on more than one plane. An even briefer form, the chüeh-chü ("stop-short"), limited to a single quatrain of five- or 7-word lines, nearly always leaves in suspension several levels of suggestion. The T'ang chüeh-chü was often set to music, and may in fact have originated as a song-form upon which the exigencies of tonal contrast were later imposed.

The master poets of the age were Li Po and his friend Tu Fu. They lived in the reign of one of history's most fabled patrons of the arts, Emperor Hsüan-tsung, and through the rebellion which not only ended it but shattered the T'ang empire almost beyond repair. Yet Li Po continued writing much the same sort of poetry as before. He inevitably commands Western attention as being closest to the romantic prototype of poets, self-centered, volatile, incapable of practicality. Impatient of restraint, he usually favored the less stringently controlled verse forms. Into these he put more intensity of feeling and boldness of imagination than profundity of thought, and he was more successful with personal than with social or historical themes. Some of his most celebrated pieces depict fanciful flights into a kind of Taoist fairyland, or at least into the wilder realms of nature. Tu Fu, in many respects his antithesis, was an introspective, disciplined, and responsible personality. A diligent minor official, he felt a personal involvement in the imperial disaster, which indeed brought bitter hardship to him and his family. The humility and sense of empathy pervading his poems have made him for the Chin. a spokesman for the universal suffering of mankind and for its power to endure and hope. A meticulous craftsman, he was a master of the regulated poem, to which he contributed great density of texture and a wealth of learned, though not pedantic, allusion.

Wang Wei, equally noted as painter and poet, retired to a Buddhist monastery after a busy if somewhat equivocal official career. His lyrics reflect his religious bent and his love of rural seclusion. His pastoral experience seems more aesthetic and less grounded in realities than that of T'ao Ch'ien, whom he greatly admired.

Po Chü-i, one of the most translatable of Chin. poets, strove for transparency of idea and simplicity of diction. His work was exceedingly popular, some of it becoming standard repertory among singing-girls, but he was disappointed at the neglect of an experimental group of "new yüeh-fu" by which he hoped to call the attention of the throne to social abuses. Much more difficult are the poems of Han Yü, chiefly known in the West as a model prose writer. He championed a return to the simplicity characteristic of Chin. prose before it accumulated a set of elaborate rules for almost verselike regularity. As a poet he accepted and excelled in the regulated forms, but carrying into poetry his dislike of pretty verbiage, he made use of unhackneyed vocabulary and did not hesitate to experiment with harsh combinations when he wanted a harsh effect. His verse thus abounds in the kind of "unpoetic" juxtapositions esteemed in modern poetry. Yet here is a major poet who, despite a complete German translation, is almost totally unrepresented in Eng.

Much of the work of these and most other Chin. poets was written as occasional verse, exchanges with friends or celebrations of social events, and it often suffers from the inconsequentiality or obscurity of such origins. On the other hand its relation to daily experience contributed spontaneity, concreteness, and not infrequently the stimulus for flashes of insight transcending time and circumstance.

Toward the end of the T'ang (907) a previously subliterate genre, the tz'u [song-]words, began to enjoy artistic status. The term referred to songs heard in the brothels and tea-houses, following melodies quite different from the old yüeh-fu pieces. Further infiltration of music from northern and central Asia, even from India, had again remolded Chin. musical modes. The symmetrical verses of T'ang poets had often been sung to this now domesticated music, but they did not fit its rhythms and melodic contours unless the singers stretched some words and slighted others, or improvised a few here and there. With the political decline of the T'ang, the quality of formal verse (a literary accomplishment required for the state examinations) declined too; young men found it more diverting to write song-words about love and pretty girls, with the uneven lines and varied patterns of rhyme and tone which they heard in the pleasure quarters, such as the following by Yen Hsüan:

Autumn rain,
Autumn rain,
No noon, no night,
Drip, drip, pour, pour.
Lamp gone out, pallet cold, brooding loneliness.
Pretty wench,
So very sad!
West wind rustles faintly in the bamboo by the window,
Stops and begins again;
On painted cheeks two teardrops gleam like jewels.
How many times he promised, "When the wild geese come . . ."
He let the date go by—
The geese returned, he didn't.

First poet to write a great many of these songs was Wen T'ing-yün, whose rich ornamentation of erotic verse-pictures is yet so impressionistic as to be today obscure as often as not. More personal were the bittersweet songs of Li Yü (Li Hou-chu), reminders of the felicities he enjoyed as ruler of the ephemeral Southern T'ang state and lost as prisoner of the conquering Sung emperor. During the Sung Dynasty (960-1280) the tz'u took in a much wider variety of subjects and often, especially with Hsin Ch'i-chi, diction from everyday speech. Much of the best Sung verse was written to the hundreds of different tz'u patterns. Eventually the tunes were forgotten and only literary models remained, to be carefully followed in form and prosody.

Sung poets also revitalized the rhyme-prose, making of it a reflective thing of less rhyme and more prose; the "prose fu" of Ou-yang Hsiu (e.g., one on "The Sound of Autumn") are noteworthy. The most popular Sung poet, Su Tung-p'o, reworked as a tz'u one of his two famous fu about visits to the Red Cliff. He was also a major shih writer, achieving a unified style (informed with wit and good spirits) even while borrowing heavily from the phrases of earlier poets. On the whole, Sung poetry is less imaginative and more philosophical than that of the T'ang period. The tendency of Sung poets to form schools and prescribe methods of composition is exemplified by Huang T'ing-chien, who left a clearly enunciated set of poetic principles, one of which called for constant use of erudite allusion. (Adherence to this method by less gifted men calls to mind Arthur Waley's dictum that classical allusion, always the bane of Chin. poetry, finally destroyed it altogether.)

As poetic creativity among the literati declined and even the tz'u became an antiquarian pastime, once again a popular song-form carried the fresher currents of the time. The music of the ch'ü came both from South China and from the northern regions controlled by the Tartars of the Chin Dynasty (1115-1234). Similar to tz'u in the irregularity of their rhythms, the ch'ü allowed greater prosodic freedom in the rhyming of level with deflected tones and in the insertion of any number of extra "patter" words or asides independent of the basic pattern. Linguistically these songs, apparently performed in street entertainments for all to hear, show a greater use of vernacular vocabulary and grammar; the range of subject matter includes social and humorous themes. The device of grouping together tunes in the same mode produced "song chains" with a narrative frame, a device which made the ch'ü the prosodic basis of the lyric drama of the Yüan period (1280-1368). Very few of these songs, not to mention the dramas of which they are the artistic core, have been translated.

No further popular genres rose to the literary surface to mold new verse forms. For historical reasons the Ming and Ch'ing (1644-1912) were periods of cultural conservatism. As critics, poets wrote a great deal of reanalysis and reevaluation of their great heritage with the aim of re-creating it in their own work; but, partly from the sheer length and weight of the tradition, in practice they concentrated more on their models than on the creative inspiration they sought to derive from them. The most esteemed models were the major T'ang poets; an 18th-c. lyricist, Huang Chin-jen, perhaps came nearest to recapturing the authentic T'ang manner. Yüan Mei of the same century was almost unique in his "natural inspiration" theory emphasizing the poet's individual endowment; his comparatively transparent and lively verses are conventionally regarded as somewhat frivolous. A stupendous body of verse was produced in these centuries, much of it still read and esteemed, but only in exceptional instances ranked with the poetry of earlier periods.

Although exceptions may be found to any generalization about Chin. poetry, in its totality it shows certain salient differences from that of the Occident. Thematically, it is little concerned with some of the major subjects of Western verse—idealized love, heroic adventure, religious devotion. Feminine charms are often described with delicate and sometimes with heavy eroticism, but consuming passions are reserved for fiction. Unfulfilled love is conventionally presented from the standpoint of the abandoned wife or concubine, though the number of such poems known to be actually by women is comparatively small. Writing in their own person, men prefer the theme of separation and reunion of friends. The epic is unknown, and long narrative poems of any kind are rare. Even the yüeh-fu poem usually differs from the European ballad in describing a dramatic situation rather than narrating a sequence of events, and seldom involves ghosts, animals with human attributes, or supernatural intervention. The relatively small place of the supernatural in Chin. poetry is perhaps explained by an absorption with this world, not the next, which on the whole has characterized the Chin. ethos. Religions have colored, but rarely if ever dominated, the poet's view of this world. Chin. poetry often has mystical overtones and Taoist, Buddhist, or other religious referents, but religious verse as such is a very minor category.

Stylistically, Chin. poetry displays a marked restraint in the use of simile, metaphor, symbol, and (almost wholly absent) personification, those figures of speech so common in Western poetry. Complexity is supplied by diction which accumulates through tradition an ever-increasing range of ideological and emotional implication. On the whole, Chin. poets achieve their effects by reticence not rhetoric; draw their images from nature more often than from mythology or religion; imply their emotions instead of anatomizing them; and integrate what they have to say with existing poetic forms and conventions, rather than attempting to create new media to fit individual needs.

The unique nature of the Chin. written language poses unusual problems for the translator of poetry. Amateur sinologists have produced interesting but far-fetched results by a pseudo-semantic method based on a fundamental misconception of the function of the Chin. graphs, supposing that the various pictorial and metapictorial elements of a single character create a word. Generally speaking the opposite is true: a word with a certain sound has a certain meaning, or complex of meanings, and a graph is devised to represent that word. Often the graph contains no more than a vague hint at the general meaning and perhaps a mnemonic device for the approximate sound—the latter frequently being taken by self-taught foreigners as contributing to the meaning. Even when such a phonetic element is absent, it is risky to translate separately the component significs of a single character. The Chin. graph for "autumn" is composed of a sign for "grain" and one for "fire"—but it is no less presumptuous to render it as "season of grain and fire" than it would be for a Chin. to reverse the process and translate Keats's "season of mists and mellow fruitfulness" merely as "autumn."

The feature of Chin. poetry which has had the most influence on modern Western poets is its use of concentrated images instead of diffuse description or exposition. Curiously enough, the imagist movement was the first strong Western influence on Chin. poetry, when in the literary revolution that followed the political one, traditional verse forms were abandoned along with the restricted literary language. Next came the personal and social rhapsody characterized by a recent critic as "Whitmanism." With the imposition of a new (Communist) orthodoxy in continental China, poetic as well as other literary principles and practices became governed by political ideology. Modern Chin. poetry has little connection with that of previous ages and belongs to a separate study, one which cannot yet be undertaken with the hope of any conclusions of lasting validity.

ANTHOLOGIES: The Temple (1925), The Book of Songs (1937), Chin. Poems (1948), and The Nine Songs (1955), all tr. A. Waley; The Jade Mountain, tr. W. Bynner and Kiang Kang-hu (1931); Chin. Lyrics, tr. Ch'u Ta-kao (1937; tz'u poetry); Selections from the Three Hundred Poems of the T'ang Dynasty (1940), A Further Selection . . . (1944), both tr. S. Jenyns; The White Pony (1947), Contemporary Chin. Poetry (1947), both tr. R. Payne; Anthologie raisonnée de la litt. chinoise, tr. G. Margouliès (1948); La Poésie chinoise, tr. P. Guillermaiz (Paris, 1957); Ch'u Tz'u, The Songs of the South, tr. D. Hawkes (1959); The Penguin Book of Chin. Verse, ed. A. R. Davis (1962); 20th C. Chin. Poetry: An Anthol., ed. and tr. Kai-Yu Hsu (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. Waley, "Notes on Chin. Prosody," Jour. of the Royal Asiatic Soc. (1918); Kiang Kang-hu, "Various Poetic Regulations and Forms," The Jade Mountain, xxviii-xxxv; C. D. Le Gros Clark, The Prose-Poetry of Su Tung-p'o (1935); J. Ingalls, "Chin. for Poets," Saturday Review (Mar. 20, 1948); A.

Fang, "Rhymeprose on Literature," Harvard Jour. of Asiatic Studies, 14 (1951), "From Imagism to Whitmanism in Recent Chin. Poetry," Indiana Univ. Conference on Oriental-Western Literary Relations (1955); G. Margouliès, Hist. de la litt. chinoise—Poésie (1951); J. R. Hightower, Topics in Chin. Lit. (rev. ed., 1953; with crit. bibliog.), "The Fu of T'ao Ch'ien," Harvard Jour. of As. St., 17 (1954), "The Wen Hsüan and Genre Theory," Harvard Jour. of As. St., 20 (1957); G. W. Baxter, "Metrical Origins of the T'zu," Harvard Jour. of As. St., 16 (1953); J. L. Bishop, "Prosodic Elements in T'ang Poetry," Indiana Conference; Yi-tsi Mei, "Tradition and Experiment in Modern Chin. Lit.," Indiana Conference; Liu Hsieh, The Literary Mind and the Carving of Dragons, tr. V. Yu-chung Shih (1959); Ch'ên Shou-Yi, Chin. Lit.: A Historical Introd. (1961); J. J. Y. Liu, The Art of Chinese Poetry (1962); B. Watson, Early Chin. Lit. (1962).

J.L.B.; G.W.B.

CHŌKA. See JAPANESE POETRY.

CHOLIAMBUS (Gr. "lame iambic") or scazon (Gr. "limping"). Hipponax of Ephesus (ca. 540 B.C.) employed this meter in his invectives. Its "limping" effect was suggested by the substitution of a spondee (or trochee) for the obligatory iambus in the 6th foot of the normal iambic trimeter. When the 5th foot was also a spondee, the verse was called ischiorrhogic ("with broken hips") and was ascribed to Ananias (also 6th c. B.C.). The c. was used in the Alexandrian period by Herodas for his mimiambi and by Callimachus. In L. poetry Catullus and his successors apparently imitated Callimachus in keeping the 5th foot a pure iambus, while they admitted few resolutions in the first 4 feet. An example is:

Mīser | Cātūl'lē, dē|sīnās | īnēp|tīrē
(Catullus 8.1).

Hardie; Kolář; Koster.

R.J.G.

CHOREE. See TROCHEE.

CHORIAMB (Gr. "consisting of a choree [i.e., a trochee] and an iamb"). A metrical unit of the structure — — — — —, frequently found in Gr. dramatic choruses and lyric verse and used often by Sappho, Alcaeus and, in L. poetry, by Horace. It is found mostly in combination with other units, e.g., in glyconics and asclepiads (qq.v.) but is sometimes pure as dēina mēn ōun, | dēina tārass | ēi sōphōs ōi |

ōnōthetās

(Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus 484)

Some assign it a far greater role in the rationalization of Gr. lyric, either considering it (with Wilamowitz) the basic element in a widespread "choriambic dimeter" whose first foot can evidently be almost anything, or (with Dale) holding it and its resolutions to be one of the two basic "building blocks" of any lyric. In an accentual form, the c. has been used in modern languages, e.g., in German (Goethe's Pandora, written in choriambic dimeters) and in Eng. Its occurrence in Eng. verse is fairly rare, but undoubted, varying from single lines such as Marvell's

Lilies without, | roses within

(The Nymph and her Fawn) to Swinburne's protracted use in his Choriambics.—U.v. Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Griechische Verskunst (1921; 2d ed., 1958); E. W. Scripture, "The Choriambus in Eng. Verse," PMLA, 43 (1928); Hamer; A. M. Dale, "The Metrical Units of Gr. Lyric Verse," CQ, 44 (1950) and CQ, n.s.1 (1951); Koster; E. Martin, Essai sur les rythmes de la chanson grecque antique (1953).

D.S.P.

CHORUS (Gr. choreuein, "to dance"). Presumably, Gr. tragedy somehow arose from, or in conjunction with, the lyric and religious performances of a ch. of masked and singing dancers. But despite the crucial bond between tragedy and its characteristic ch. (no extant 5th-c. tragedy lacks a fully developed ch.), our information is lamentably scanty. The following facts, however, deserve mention. (1) The tragic ch., rectangular in formation and often military in movement, is not to be confused with the "cyclical" ch. of dithyramb. (2) The early number of the ch. is said (on flimsy evidence and by an improbable analogy with the dithyrambic ch.) to have been 50; Aeschylus (cf. Agamemnon 1347–1371) used 12 and Sophocles is said to have raised the number to 15. (3) Choral odes (including kommoi) were sung by all or part of the ch., while the lines of the coryphaeus (or chorus leader) were spoken. (4) The expenses of training the ch. were assigned by the state to a wealthy man (called the choregus), and the "giving of a chorus" by the archon constituted the poet's official admission to the tragic contest.

Both tragedy and ch. appear to have been religious in origin. However, whereas tragedy and comedy in the later 5th c. became secularized as they lost touch with their ritual origins, the ch. remained the conservative soul of the play, the articulate spokesman for traditional religion and society, clinging stubbornly to the forms and wisdom and even the style of the worshipping group from which it arose. This conservative element is visible not only in the elaborately figured archaic lyrics with their "poetic" syntax and heavy load of Doricisms in sharp contrast to the more colloquial dialogue, but in the traditionalism of its moral beliefs, its conventional theodicy, and its commitment to proverbial social wisdom. And so the normal mode of choral utterance is a characteristic group speech, of great power but often limited precision, rising from sheer banality to the apocalyptic gnomic richness of the Aeschylean ch. Dramatists might adapt the ch. to their practical needs by making it serve such simple functions as spectacle, widening emotional range etc., but they seem to have found it difficult to alter this communal and traditionalizing role of the ch. There is, however, little tension between the nature of the ch. and the dramatist's needs until the time of Euripides. But as Olympian religion declined and the old social order went under in the convulsions of the late 5th c., the ch. lost the context that gave it life as a convention, and in post-Euripidean tragedy appears to have been degraded to ornament. According to Aristotle, it was in the 4th c. that the practice arose of writing choral odes that had little or nothing to do with the play.

Conservatism was strengthened by function. For the ch. attends the action as a dependent society in miniature, giving the public resonance of individual action. Thus the ch. exults, fears, wonders, mourns, and attempts, out of its store of traditional moralities, to cope with an action whose meaning is both difficult and unfamiliar. By so doing, the ch. generalizes the meaning of the action and at the same time the action revives and refreshes the choral wisdom. But almost never is the chorus' judgment of events authoritative; if it is an intruded voice, it is normally the voice of tradition, not the dramatist. In Aeschylus perhaps the ch. is least fallible, but in both Aeschylus and Sophocles the ch. tends to lag behind the meaning implicit in the action; that lag is the secret of the chorus' dramatic power and the means whereby the tension between the tragic hero and his society is made clear. Euripides, less easy with tradition and hence self-conscious, tends to rely on his ch. more for poetic intensity than dramatic tension (though in no Gr. play is the ch. so fully and ironically exploited against tradition as in the Bacchae).

The power of the choral convention explains why the ch. has been so constantly revived in subsequent literature—in the undramatic virtuosos choruses of Seneca; in Milton's Samson Agonistes, formally and dramatically the most perfect Gr. choruses in Eng.; in the quasi-Euripidean ch. of Fr. tragedy; in the cosmic choruses of Shelley and Goethe, and finally in the remarkable ch. of Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral, to mention but one of the many modern attempts to resuscitate the choral convention. But with almost all of these revivals, no matter how remarkable the mastery, the choral convention has failed somehow to flourish, or flourished only as a literary and archaic device, deprived of the context and ground that in the Gr. theatre gave it a natural rightness. Only Eliot, by placing his ch. within the context of a religious society in the dramatic act of worship, has overcome the difficulties, but the limits imposed by such a context must prove unacceptable to a living and secular theatre.—A. E. Haigh, The Tragic Drama of the Greeks (1896); R. C. Flickinger, The Gr. Theater and Its Drama (1916); A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, Dithyramb, Tragedy and Comedy (1927) and The Dramatic Festivals of Athens (1953); T.B.L. Webster, Gr. Theater Production (1956); M. Bieber, The Hist. of the Gr. and Roman Theater (2d ed., rev. 1961). w.a.

CHRISTABEL METER. The meter of Coleridge's Christabel (free, 4-stress couplets, generally iambic or anapestic, but with frequent substitution). In his preface to the poem Coleridge made three claims: 1. that the meter is based not on a count of syllables, but on a count of accents ("in each line the accents will be found to be only four"); 2. that this is a new principle; 3. that the length of line varies with the passion. As various critics have said, the principle was not new. Coleridge assumed that previous poets had measured their lines by counting syllables (as in Fr. and It. verse), but this is not quite true, for from the earliest times native Eng. verse had been accentual, as in the long line of Beowulf. With Chaucer there seems to have been a blend of the two systems, accentual and syllabic.

What makes Christabel meter different is that in a few places Coleridge went the whole way and reduced the line to 4 syllables only—monosyllabic feet, as in the much-cited Break, break, break of Tennyson. As to the success of the handling of the accentual meter in Christabel, Bridges' charge seems unanswerable that Coleridge never shook off the tradition of conventional metric stress, as opposed to word or sense stress. Thus, in important respects Christabel does not provide a good example of accentual prosody. One might also question the appropriateness of the particular usage of the meter in Christabel in relation to its theme and tone. Nevertheless, there is little doubt that the meter was an important milestone on the road to some of the most important accentual experiments and successes of succeeding times.—Saintsbury, Prosody; R. Bridges, Milton's Prosody (1921); A. R. Morris, The Orchestration of the Metrical Line (1923); A.L.F. Snell, "The Meter of Christabel," in

The Fred Newton Scott Anniversary Papers (1929). R.BE.

CHRONICLE PLAY. See HISTORY PLAY.

CH'Ü. See CHINESE POETRY.

CINQUAIN. (a) A form of 5-line stanza of varying meter and rhyme scheme; probably of medieval origin. According to Georges Lote, it was used by the author of Vie de Saint Alexis and later reemployed by Guernes de Pont-Sainte-Maxence, "et cette fois en alexandrins." The term eventually became generalized to include almost any 5-line stanza: "One of Sher Kan's boon-companions . . . reciting the following cinquains" (J. Payne, 1001 Nights 2.205). (b) The precise 5-line stanza invented by Adelaide Crapsey for her volume of Verse, employing lines of, respectively, 2, 4, 6, 8, and 2 syllables. This stanza is supposed to bear a resemblance to the Japanese haiku (q.v.), a form dating from feudal times employing three lines of 5, 7, and 5 syllables, but the resemblance is superficial.—G. Lote, Hist. du vers français, II (1951); J. D. Hart, The Oxford Companion to Am. Lit. (3d ed., 1956). [R.O.E.]

CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES. The ancient Gr. poet marked his arsis and thesis (q.v.) by variance in voice pitch. The "pitch accent" reflected syllable quantity: a syllable was "long" if its vowel was long or diphthongized or if its vowel was short and followed by two consonants (including, in the case of a final syllable, the initial consonant of a following word); a syllable was "short" if its vowel was short and followed by a single consonant sound (see CLASSICAL PROSODY). Vowel quantity can be illustrated by the word "ibidem": the first i is short, the second long (by classical standards); in pronunciation the two sounds would correspond respectively to the first and second i of "intrigue." (Similarly using the macron (—) to indicate length and the micron (˘) to indicate brevity:

māchine, fāther, mēt, mēet; ōbey, mōle, pūt, clue.

The Gr. quantitative pitch accent was succeeded by the L. quantitative stress accent, in tune with L. speech and early L. verse patterns, e.g., the Saturnian (q.v.); this succession partially anticipated the full (nonquantitative) stress accent of medieval L. and modern European poetry.

The stress accent of modern languages, including Fr., makes it practically impossible, except by sheer artifice, to divide syllables into "longs" and "shorts." Modern versification depends upon syllable-counting (syllabic verse: flexible in Eng. and German, rigid in Polish and Fr.) and the occurrence of naturally stressed syllables (accentual verse). In Eng. and German the stressed syllables usually alternate with unstressed syllables; in Fr. they occur at the verse's caesura and end. It is safe to say that no modern language approximation to quantitative verse has been completely successful. The most that can be said for Robert Bridges' experiments with Eng. syllable quantities, in testing the theories of his friend W. J. Stone, is that quantity and stress coincide rather frequently. But "quantity" in Eng. is considerably erratic. Except for accent stress, the sounds e and ie in "believe" are quantitatively equal. But in a scazon verse Bridges scans the word as bēlieve,

quantitatively invalid, but in keeping with modern stress. Modern language accent stress frequently determines vowel "quantity." In L. and Gr. the reverse is true. Some modern language syllables, when recorded on the kymograph, prove to be six times as "long" as others. Consonant clusters in the modern languages, with the exception of, e.g., It. and Sp., neither regularly render actual syllable quantity (except as in "below" and "bellow") nor regularly determine accent.

Generally, a modern approximation of a cl. meter involves the substitution of stress for quantity. Longfellow's

This is the forest primeval. The murmuring pines and the hemlocks would scan, according to quantitative principles alone, something like this: — — — — — — — — — —. A dactyl, then, in the cl. situation, consists of a long syllable followed by 2 short syllables (— — —); in the modern situation it consists of a stressed syllable followed by 2 unstressed syllables (× × ×).

The earliest recorded attempt at quantitative "versing" in Fr. is the elegiac couplet written by Estienne Jodelle in 1558:

Phébus, Amour, Cypris, veut sauver, nourrir et orner
 Ton vers, cœur et chef, d'ombre, de flamme, de fleurs.

As in all such modern attempts it is not quantity as such, but coincidence of accent with "quantity" that marks the scheme. In or about 1567 Antoine de Baïf attempted to classify syllables as "longs" and "shorts" in effecting various "quantitative" strophes, such as the sapphic. His effort forced him to adopt phonetic spelling.

CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES

In 1555 Conrad Gessner, a German Swiss, produced a Mithridates in spondaic hexameters. Phrases like

$\frac{1}{\sim}$ alle $\frac{1}{\sim}$ die / $\frac{1}{\sim}$ cere show how questionable his "quantity" is. But his accent coincidence is quite regular. Dean W. R. Inge quotes Goethe's "pentameter" line,

Röthstrumpf immer gehasst und Violetstrumpf
dazu

and rightly asks "If the vowel of strumpf is not long by position [i.e., followed by more than one consonant] what vowel can be?"

The Renaissance literati, in exalting, discovering, and reexamining literary products of the cl. world, were seriously concerned with the reproduction of cl. quantitative meters. Successful reproduction was limited, however, to the L. language itself, e.g., Petrarca's unfinished and unpublished Africa and the Davidiad of Marco Marulo (1450-1524) in 14 books. The vernacular languages did not and could not sustain quantitative distinctions. In Spain Estéban de Villegas produced sapphics and hexameters by substituting stress for quantity. Gabriello Chiabrera similarly attempted cl. meters, including the sapphic, in It. In France Ronsard and the Pléiade imitated Horace and translated his quantitative L. odes into stress-accentual Fr. verse. The Renaissance spirit of classicism is reintroduced into It. by the 19th-c. poet, Giosuè Carducci, whose Odi barbari (init. 1887) include cl. meters in stress-accentual modern It.

Rus. poetry does not originate before the post-Renaissance period (ca. 1650). There have not been many attempts made in Rus. to reproduce cl. quantitative meters. The "learned" meters include binary iambics and trochaics and ternary dactyls, amphibrachics ($\sim \text{—} \sim$) and anapaests. Rus. verse disallows feet of more than 3 syllables (e.g., the proceleusmatic, $\sim \sim \sim$).

Likewise stress-accentual is the meter in the modern Gr. "sequel" to the Odyssey by Nikos Kazantzakis. His verse measure comprises 17 syllables and 8 stresses. Traditionally, the modern Gr. verse measure comprises 15 syllables and 7 stresses. Kazantzakis achieved a closer approximation to the Homeric hexameters (5 dactyls and a spondee = 17 syllables) in the matter of syllabism but did not minimize the force of stress.

Early attempts to introduce quantitative verse into Eng. were mediocre at best. (See Thomas Watson's hexameter version of the first two lines of the Odyssey, noted by Roger Ascham in The Scholemaster, 1570.) In the discussion between Edmund Spenser and Gabriel Harvey the great problem began to appear: Should "length" be determined by cl. rules or by ear? Poetically, a high point of Eng. experiment in cl. meters was reached in the examples (especially "Rose-cheeked Laura") offered by Thomas Campion to illustrate his modified cl. system based on stress-equivalents to cl. feet (1602).

In the middle of the 17th c. John Milton "rendred almost word for word without Rhyme according to the Latin Measure [third asclepiadic strophe], as near as the Language will permit" an Eng. version of Horace's Ode 1.5:

Quis multa gracilis te puer in rosa

His first line, "What slender youth bedew'd with liquid odours," is not "according to the Latin Measure" of the poem, since it is more nearly an accentual approximation of the choliambic line. Possibly "without Rhyme . . . Measure" means simply "without rhyme as in Latin poetry"; but Horace's ode presents skillfully wrought internal rhyme. Milton's impatience with quantitative "versing" is expressed in his sonnet to Mr. H. Lawes. Of the many experiments in Eng. during the 19th c. none fully reproduced its cl. exemplar. Tennyson, intensely concerned with syllable quantity, concluded that the Eng. hexameter was "only fit for comic subjects." He comments accordingly in one of his humorous elegiac distichs:

These lame hexameters the strong-wing'd music of Homer!
No—but a most burlesque barbarous experiment.

The proper accents of "hexameters" and "experiment" have been sacrificed in the interest of "quantity." A. H. Clough used a stress-accentual hexameter for light effect:

Tea and coffee were there; a jug of water for Hewson. . . .

Swinburne's stress-accentual choriambics, sapphics, hendecasyllabics, and elegiacs show no concession to quantity. Both Tennyson and George Meredith imitated Catullus' galliambic. Tennyson's version is the more rigidly "quantitative": e.g.,

Mā and mādēñing āl thā heārd hēr in hēr

fīrce volubility.

His quantitative alcaic ode to Milton, e.g.

Whōse Tītān āngēls, Gābriēl, Ābdīēl . . .

Rīngs tō the rōar ōf ān āngēl ōnset is perhaps as close to perfection as any Eng. poet has come in this endeavor. The 20th c. has seen no Tennysonian concern for quantitative cl.-verse equivalents. But accentual cl.-verse equivalents are still, indeed perennially, attempted, primarily in translation, e.g., J. B. Leishman's Horace, Helen R. Henze's The Odes of Horace (1961), and Rolfe Humphries' Ovid (The Art of Love, 1957).

STUDIES OF CLASSICAL METRICS: W. Christ, Metrik der Griechen und Römer (1874); J.H.H. Schmidt, Introd. to the Rhythmic and Metric of the Cl. Languages, tr. J. W. White (1883); Hardie; Dale; W. Rupprecht, Einführung in die griechische Metrik (3d ed., 1950); Koláf; Crusius; U. v. Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958); G. Thomson, Gr. Lyric Metre (2d ed., 1961).—MODERN LANGUAGES: Kastner; Schipper; W. R. Inge, "Cl. Metres in Eng. Poetry," Royal Soc. of Lit. of the United Kingdom, Transactions, 3d ser., 2 (1922); R. C. Trevelyan, "Cl. and Eng. Verse-Structure," E&S, 16 (1930); J. Körner, Einführung in die Poetik (1949); G. L. Hendrickson, "Elizabethan Quantitative Hexameters," rq, 28 (1949); V. Turri, U. Renda, P. Operti, Dizionario storico della letteratura italiana (3d ed., 1951-52); R. Graves, "Harp, Anvil, Oar," The Crowning Privilege (1955); B. O. Unbegaun, Rus. Versification (1956); Beare; J. B. Leishman, Translating Horace (1958); J. Thompson, The Founding of Eng. Metre (1961); W. Bennett, German Verse in Cl. Metres (1963).

R.A.S.

CLASSICAL POETICS. 1. DEFINITION. Cl. poetics can be defined in either of two ways: (1) as the aggregate of opinions and doctrines which were put forward concerning poetry during cl. antiquity, i.e., roughly, between 750 B.C. and A.D. 200, or (2) as that more or less coherent body of critical doctrine which is represented for us chiefly by the Poetics of Aristotle and the so-called Ars Poetica of Horace and which gave rise, during the Renaissance, to the poetic creed called "classicism" (q.v.). We shall take the term here in the first and broader of the two senses, but with particular attention to the origin and development of classicism.

2. PRE-PLATONIC POETICS AND CRITICISM. So far as the Western world is concerned, the very concept of poetics, in fact of literary criticism in general, is a Gr. invention. Although it is a commonplace that criticism follows rather than precedes the making of literature, in the case of the Greeks the striking thing is not how late the critical impulse was in making its appearance, but how early. Criticism followed close on the heels of poetry, and insisted from the beginning on raising fundamental questions and fundamental issues.

Before summarizing this earliest stage of Gr. criticism, we must point to certain tacit presuppositions which it shared with Gr. poetry itself and which underlie the whole later development, namely, that (1) the chief subject of poetry is man, his life—and death—, his actions, his happiness. (The Homeric gods, with their advanced anthropomorphism and their consuming interest in men, confirm rather than belie this principle.) (2) Poetry is a serious, public concern, the cornerstone of education and of civic life. (3) It is also a delightful thing, endowed with a fascination that borders on enchantment. (4) It is not merely terrestrial and utilitarian, but somehow or other divine, being inspired by the gods or the Muses. (5) It is at the same time an art (techne), a craft or profession, requiring native talent, training, and long practice. (6) The poet, though inspired from on high, is after all not a priest or a prophet but a secular person. His work is respected, even revered, but it can be criticized.

Some of these preconceptions can be detected in the Homeric poems themselves, especially the Odyssey; in any case the poems were later judged by the Greeks in terms of them. Gr. criticism was born and grew to maturity on Homer, assuming implicitly that he was—as indeed he had become—the teacher of his people. The earliest criticisms were not "literary" or aesthetic but moral and philosophical, and the issues they raised were fundamental ones, as to the truth and moral value of poetry. Hesiod (7th c. B.C.; Theogony 27-28) and Solon (early 6th c.; frag. 21 Diels) agree that, as the latter puts it, "The bards tell many a lie." Xenophanes (end of the 6th c., beginning of the 5th) objects to the immoral goings-on of Homer's gods and casts ridicule on the whole concept of anthropomorphism; see frags. 11-16 Diels. These are, for us, the opening guns of what Plato (Republic 10) calls "the ancient feud between poetry and philosophy." The objectors grant that poetry, especially the epic, is a source of delight and the recognized custodian of truth and moral values, but insist that she is an unworthy custodian. This struggle between poetry and philosophy for the position of teacher to the Gr. people is of fundamental importance for later theory.

One way of saving Homer's gods was to take their quarrels as representing conflicts of natural elements (earth, air, etc.) or of social and political principles. This "allegorical interpretation," which was to have a long history, originally sprang from a scientific motive and went hand in hand with the rise of cosmology and the natural sciences. Appearing as early as the end of the 6th c. (Theagenes of Rhegium), it was adopted by some of the Sophists and later by the Stoics, though rejected by Plato (Phaedrus).

The aristocratic Theban poet Pindar (518-ca. 445 B.C.) shows an interesting blend of traditional and personal attitudes toward poetry. For him it is (see particularly his First Olympian and First Pythian) both a high and exacting craft and a thing inspired. The poet's wisdom (sophia) embraces technical proficiency and insight into truth; his mission is to glorify great prowess or achievement ("virtue," arete) and guide his fellow men. Pindar was conscious of the dubious morality of some of the older tales. His solution was to "pass by on the other side" and leave them untold.

In the 5th c. poetry was still, as it had always been, the basis of primary education and an official repository of truth. But two potent new forces came into play at Athens which enhanced and at the same time threw doubt upon the honor traditionally paid to it. These were (1) the drama and (2) the Sophists. Tragedy and comedy, with their vividness of presentation and their semiofficial status, tended to bring every citizen into direct contact with literature and make him a potential critic. Moreover the Old Comedy arrogated to itself the right to satirize anything and everything, including poetry. The Sophists were characteristically, in addition to their other activities, grammarians, philologists, and expounders of literature. But they were also, characteristically, rationalists, skeptics, and positivists, and the net effect of their teaching was to break down traditional standards, in literature as in other fields. It has been suggested but not proved that Gorgias was the first promulgator of a poetic theory; in any case he had a shrewd and accurate idea of the effect, particularly the emotional effect, of poetry on its hearers.

We can gauge the impact of these new tendencies by the reaction they called forth in Athens' premier comedian and judicial critic, Aristophanes (ca. 445-ca. 385 B.C.). His brilliant gift for literary satire, especially parody, was exercised above all on Euripides and other representatives of modernism (intellectualism, skepticism, preciosity, etc.) in poetry. His unremitting crusade against Euripides (see particularly the Acharnians and the Thesmophoriazusae) reaches its climax in the Frogs (405 B.C.), the most sparkling exhibit of judicial criticism in antiquity. Aeschylus, champion of old-fashioned moral principles and lofty style, finally wins his bout against the challenger Euripides—logic-chopper, corrupter of morals, and writer of dull prologues—but not before the two combatants have agreed (lines 1009, 1055) that the poet's duty is to instruct and improve his fellow citizens. We may be sure that most Athenians accepted this principle, at least in theory.

3. PLATO (427-347 B.C.). With Plato, a born poet and lover of poetry who renounced it for the higher truth of philosophy, the "ancient feud" reaches a major climax and crisis. There is no room in Plato's thought for literary criticism or theory as a separate intellectual pursuit. Truth is one, and Poetry must appear before that inflexible judge on the same terms as any other human activity. Nevertheless the great issue of the justification of literature haunted Plato all his life, and he grapples with it repeatedly in the dialogues—nowhere, however, in truly complete and systematic form. He tends to view poetry from two quite different, perhaps incommensurate, points of view: as "inspiration" (enthousiasmos) and as "imitation" (mimesis). Seen inwardly, in its native character as experience, poetry is inspiration or "possession," a form of madness quite beyond the poet's control. The reality of the experience is unquestionable; its source and value remain an enigma. Is it merely irrational, i.e., subrational (Ion; cf. the end of the Meno), or might there be a suprarational poetic inspiration, winged by Love (Eros), that could attain Truth (Phaedrus)? The question is left open. Meanwhile, viewed externally, in its procedures and its product, poetry appears as "imitation" (q.v.), and as such falls under the ban of excommunication (Republic 3, 10) or at least under rigid state control (Laws 2 and 7). Plato's utterances about poetry have a deep ambivalence which has aroused fascinated interest, but also fierce protest, ever since. Outwardly he seems one with the Puritans and obscurantists who have always wanted to banish or muzzle the poetic impulse; inwardly he is one of those who feel poetry to be, not merely a technical pursuit and not merely a representation of men, or action, or whatever, but a communication from the soul: supremely personal, then—and supremely dangerous.

4. ARISTOTLE (384-322 B.C.). Aristotle was no poet. His cooler spirit was devoted to poetry in quite another way: as an objective, uniquely valuable presentation of human life in a particular medium. The Poetics is not formally or in method a polemical work, but in effect it constitutes an answer to Plato's doubts and objections and thereby a resolution of the "ancient feud." Here, conducted in a dispassionate, scientific spirit, is an inquiry into the nature of poetry which restores it to an honorable—not a supreme—place in the scheme of things. The heart of Aristotle's achievement is a new theory of poetic structure, based on a new concept of "imitation" not as a copying of ordinary reality but as a generalized or idealized rendering of character and action (ch. 9). In proportion as poetry attains this goal it approaches the condition of drama, and the drama, as the most perfectly objective presentation of action, is the supreme poetic genre (ch. 4, 26). In Aristotle's eyes, that which constitutes poetry is not the writing of verses but the building of a poetic "structure of events." This structure is the plot (mythos) of the poem; it therefore is by far the most important part of the poet's task (ch. 6, 9). The other constituent elements of the poem, or rather of the art of making a poem (poesis, "making"), viz. (1) character portrayal (ethos), (2) "thought" (dianoia), i.e., the presentation of ideas or arguments by the characters, (3) poetic language or expression (lexis), (4) song composition (melopoiia), and (5) costuming (opsis), stand in decreasing order of importance (ch. 6); none can vie with plot. The making of plots is essentially a creative activity. But poetic creativity is not, for Aristotle, a subjective efflorescence. It goes to the bodying forth of reality, the essential truth about human beings and their actions, not the invention of fantasies or private worlds.

A poetic structure should be beautiful. This requires (a) unity (the famous "unity of action"; see UNITY), (b) symmetry of the parts with each other and with the whole, and (c) proper length, such that the poem can make a sizable aesthetic impression but not so great as to blur or dissipate it. The crux of the matter is the unity of action, and the corollary—duly emphasized by Aristotle himself—is that the events which constitute the action must succeed each other according to the law of necessity or probability. This is what he means by the famous statement (ch. 9) that poetry treats of "universals" while history deals with particulars.

A tragedy ought to be not only serious and beautiful, but tragic as well (whether this requirement also applies to the epic is a question to which the Poetics gives no clear answer). Plato had said (Republic, 10) that poetry threatens the moral equilibrium in states and individuals alike by "feeding" the appetitive and emotional side of human nature, especially its tendencies to pity and fear. Aristotle implicitly sets aside this verdict. But he also calls for something to be done to or with or through pity and fear which he designates by the obscure term "catharsis" (q.v.). All that can be said with confidence is that the tragic catharsis somehow represents a defense and acceptance of the emotional side of the drama, against Plato. If pity and fear are desirable effects of tragedy, certain kinds of plot are better fitted to arouse them than others. All tragic actions involve a change or passage from one pole of human fortune—"happiness" or "unhappiness"—to the other (ch. 7, end). In a simple plot the change is direct, unilinear; in a complex plot it is brought about by a sudden and unexpected reversal (peripety), or a recognition (anagnorismos), or both (ch. 11). Aristotle demands that the hero who undergoes the tragic vicissitude be a good man, but not a perfect one. The change to unhappiness, which is the tragic change par excellence, should not be caused by wickedness but by some hamartia (ch. 13). Here, as in the case of "catharsis," battles of interpretation have raged (does hamartia mean "moral flaw" or simply "error"?), without conclusive result. Aristotle further prescribes (ch. 15) that the tragic characters be "appropriate," i.e., true to type; "like," i.e., true to life or human nature in general; and self-consistent.

Aristotle regarded the linguistic side of the poet's activity as needful in order to please and impress the public, but ultimately less important than plot construction and character-drawing. The first virtue of poetic diction, as of language in general, is to be clear (ch. 22). But it should also not be "low": that is, it should maintain a certain elevation above the level of ordinary life, through the use of archaic, foreign, or unfamiliar words, ornamental epithets, and figures, especially metaphor. For further remarks on style, including poetic style, see Book 3 of the Rhetoric.

The discussion of the epic (ch. 23-25) forms a kind of appendix to Aristotle's analysis of tragedy. Its outstanding feature is that he measures the epic by the drama and insists that it should follow the model of the latter as far as it possibly can. The logical, though paradoxical, result is that Homer figures as the supreme poet not so much qua epic poet as qua dramatist. The epic should have a central action, like tragedy, but may "dilute" it generously with episodes. It also has a special license to deal in marvels and the supernatural. In these, and indeed in all respects, Homer is the perfect exemplar.

Aristotle's main discussion of comedy is lost (it was contained in a second book), but enough remains to show that he disliked the formlessness and satiric bent of the Old Comedy and approved the trend of his own time (represented subsequently by the New Comedy and its imitators at Rome, Plautus and Terence) toward regular plots and the humorous portrayal of generalized character types rather than the pillorying of individuals.

The Poetics is a work of paramount importance, not only historically, as the fountainhead of "classicism," but in its own right. But from neither point of view is it a complete treatise on poetry. Aside from the loss of the main discussion of comedy, it deals only sparsely and obliquely with the epic and all but ignores lyric, not to mention other genres which were not cultivated in Aristotle's day. Moreover it is very uncertain whether the Poetics was directly known to anybody in antiquity after Aristotle's death, though many of his ideas were transmitted by his pupils. In any case the fully developed doctrine of classicism embraces a number of interests and attitudes which are not Aristotelian, and which still remain to be accounted for.

5. HELLENISTIC POETICS (3d-1st c. B.C.). Both poetry and poetic criticism were carried on in a new environment in the Hellenistic age. The center of gravity in literature, as in other fields, shifted from old Greece, with its civic traditions, to Alexandria, Pergamum, and other royal courts. Alexandria in particular, with its Library and "Museum"—originally sprung from the Lyceum—was a hive of literary scholarship (philology, grammar, editing of texts, Literaturgeschichte), with which criticism now came in close contact. Indeed we owe the terms "critic" and "criticism" to the Hellenistic grammarians, who regarded the judgment of poems, krisis poiematon, as the climax and capstone of their art. The typical critic is now a scholar who dabbles in poetry and poetic theory. Unfortunately, of the lively critical squabbles of the time we have only disiecta membra such as Callimachus' disparagements of long poems: "I loathe the cyclic poem" and "Big book, big nuisance" (it may be only a coincidence that he was the compiler of the catalogue of the Alexandrian Library, in 120 volumes), or Eratosthenes' dictum that "poetry is for delight."

We can, however, make out that two ideas of basic importance for the development of classicism were, if not invented, at least given canonical form in the Hellenistic period: (a) the concept of a "classic" (the word is Roman but the idea Gr.), and (b) the concept of genre. A belief which had been implicit in the Poetics was now proclaimed explicitly, that the great age of poetry lay in the past (7th through 5th c.) and that it contained all the models of poetic excellence. This backward-looking view was enshrined in official lists (kanones): the Nine Lyric Poets, the Three Tragedians, etc. Further, each poetic "kind" was thought of as an entity more or less to itself, with its special laws of subject matter, arrangement, and style, and its particular supreme model, Homer for epic, Sappho or Alcaeus for love poetry, Archilochus for "iambic" poetry, and so on. These ideas needed only to be reinforced by the rhetorically inspired idea of imitation (see below, section 7) to become the full-fledged doctrine of classicism. Since the genres were defined primarily by their versification and style, a further result was a tendency toward absorption in style at the expense of other interests.

The philosophical schools participated unevenly in the critical development. The Stoics officially approved of poetry, especially the Homeric epic, but tended to judge it by moral and utilitarian standards and therefore indulged rather freely in the allegorizing of Homer. Orthodox Epicureanism frowned on poetry as "unnatural" and a bait for the passions, but Philodemus, an Epicurean (1st c. B.C.) and himself a poet, put forward a theory that recognized multiple forms and aims of poetry and granted wide autonomy to the poet. Philodemus lived at Rome and Naples for many years and had influence on Horace and other Roman poets. From polemical remarks of his we can further reconstruct a Peripatetic doctrine, put forward by one Neoptolemus of Parium in the 3rd c., which has been shown to underlie Horace's Ars Poetica. In it the subject was treated under the triple heading of poiesis, the poetic process of composition, poiema, the poem, and poietes, the poet. Actually poiesis had to do chiefly with the selection or invention and the arrangement of subject matter (hypothesis or pragmata; res) and poiema chiefly with style (lexis; elocutio).

Others, for example the Platonizing Stoic Posidonius (1st c. B.C.), accepted at least parts of this scheme, and it provided a handy framework for discussion of three cardinal issues that were much agitated in the Hellenistic period: (a) which is more important, subject matter or expression? (b) which is the purpose or function of poetry, instruction or delight? and (c) which is more essential for the poet, native genius (physis; igenium) or art (techné; ars)? In these formulations we see the cl. poetics taking on the physiognomy which it was to keep down through the Renaissance. The answers were various. We have already quoted Eratosthenes' dictum that the end of poetry is delight; others, especially among the Stoics, argued the claims of (moral) instruction; while the Peripatetic view called for both (Horace: "omne tulit punctum qui miscuit utile dulci"). Similarly with the debate over subject matter and style. It would seem, however, that a considerable amount of tacit agreement underlay the dispute, namely that poetry is a way of discoursing about "things," and that these things, whether matters of historical or scientific fact (historia; fama), myth (mythos; fabula), or pure invention (plasma; res ficta), were all equally admissible (hence, e.g., didactic poetry, which Aristotle had excluded from the realm of poetry altogether) and had essentially the status of facts, i.e., were to be judged by reference to the ordinary laws of reality.

Nowhere do we find a reaffirmation of Aristotle's principle that the objects of poetry are universals.

6. HORACE (65-8 B.C.). We have devoted what may seem a disproportionate amount of space to the Hellenistic period because, although most of its critical production is lost, it played an even more important role than Plato or Aristotle in the rise of classicism and exerted a decisive influence upon Roman and therefore upon Renaissance thinking about poetry. The most significant transmitter of this influence is Horace. To be sure, neither Horace nor his literary milieu was Gr. He was a thorough Italian, blessed with a consuming interest in people, a sharp eye for their foibles—and his own—and sturdy independence of judgment. He came to literary criticism by an indirect road, through satire, and to the end his treatment of it remained occasional and essentially unsystematic. Criticism of his own Satires led him (Satires 1.4 and 10) to a spirited defense of the genre and of his right to pursue it in his own way. He admits that satire is not quite true poetry, because it lacks inspiration and sublimity of style (1.4.43: "mens diviniior atque os magna sonaturum"); but it performs a useful and honorable social function by exposing vice and folly. Attacked for depreciating his predecessor Lucilius, Horace insists (1.10) on appropriateness of style and above all on elegance and polish, attained by hard work. Again and again (Satires 2.1.12ff.; Epistles 2.1.208, 250ff.; cf. Odes 1.6; 4.2) he resists the importunities of well-meaning friends, urging him to write epic or drama: it is essential that the poet choose and stick to the genre or genres for which he is best fitted.

These themes recur in the three major critical letters in verse which constitute the second Book of the Epistles, but against a broader background. The Epistle to Augustus (2.1) surveys the current literary scene, derides the blind worship of the poetry of the past (the Roman past), and deplores the vulgarity of popular taste. The essay, with its blend of urbanity and seriousness, reveals especially well two important aspects of Horace's classicism: (1) He felt deeply that Rome deserved and was capable of a great literature, to set alongside that of cl. Greece; but (2) he was convinced that the result could be achieved only by hard work and the emulation of that same cl. Gr. literature. Thus classicism was in Horace's eyes a progressive and patriotic creed, the means to a specifically Roman achievement. The paradox has significant parallels in the Renaissance, in both Italy and France.

The Epistle to Florus (2.2) returns to one of Horace's favorite themes, the haste and sleaziness of much of the current scribbling of poetry ("scribimus indocti doctique poemata passim"). But it is in the Epistle to the Pisos (2.3), the so-called Ars Poetica, that he gives fullest expression to his view of poetry. Based though it is on the Hellenistic poetics mentioned above (section 5), it carefully maintains the easy, discursive air appropriate to its genre: it is after all a verse epistle, not a formal treatise. Still, the tone is a shade more systematic and apodictic than usual. Poiesis (see above, section 5) is dealt with summarily in the first 45 lines, with a plea for poetic unity. The rest of the first section, down to line 294, really treats of Horace's main interest: style and matters connected therewith—originality and appropriateness (decorum—46-98); emotional appeal (99-113); faithfulness either to poetic tradition or to general type in character portrayal (114-178). As he progresses it becomes clear that Horace, following the Peripatetic doctrine (not the state of affairs at Rome in his own day), is assuming the drama, and particularly tragedy, to be the major poetic genre. Hence we find a number of detailed prescriptions for the dramatist (179ff.: no deed of violence on stage; five acts, no more and no less; three actors; choral odes germane to the plot; etc.), a thumbnail history of the drama, interrupted by a long passage on the satyr-play, and finally (280ff.), the adjuration—really the most important of all in Horace's codex—to polish, polish, polish ("the labor of the file") rather than publish, publish, publish. The last section of the poem (295-476), is devoted to the poet: his training (309-332), with emphasis on moral philosophy (Socratic dialogues); his purpose, which may be either to profit or to please or, best of all, to do both (333-346); his faults, venial and otherwise (347-390); his need for both ability and training, and for unsparing criticism (419-452). The end-piece (453-476), is an uproarious sketch, in Horace's best satirical vein, of the mad poet.

Our summary may suggest how many of the leading ideas of classicism are enshrined in the Ars Poetica. What no summary, and no translation, can convey is the brilliance of the poem as a poem: not in its structure but in its texture, its striking figures, and memorable phrases. "Purpureus pannus" (purple patch, q.v.); "brevis esse laboro, obscurus fio"; "in medias res" (q.v.); "bonus dormitat Homerus," and dozens of others have passed into the common stock. To the It. critics of the Renaissance, Latinists and stylists all, it was a breviary. They might admire Aristotle; Horace was in their bones. And they learned more from him than rules. He encouraged them in the proud belief that poetry is an honorable and exacting craft, fit to offer serious counsel and occupy a high place in a nation's culture.

7. RHETORICAL CRITICISM, GREEK AND ROMAN. The establishment of rhetoric as the prevailing mode of higher education, especially at Rome in the 1st c. B.C. (in Greece proper it goes back to the 4th c.), had major effects on both poetry and poetics. Poetry itself began to show rhetorical tendencies; and, more important for our purpose, literary criticism now tended to become the professional property of the rhetoricians. (Horace is the lone exception among extant critics from this period.) In the rhetorical schools poets were read, and to an increasing extent imitated, on the same basis as prose writers. This practice helped to foster the extension of two influential concepts from the rhetorical sphere to the poetic: (1) "imitation," in the sense of imitation of authors (see IMITATION), and (2) the analysis of style into three (occasionally four) kinds or levels, high, middle, and low or plain (see SUBLIME). It also tended to dislodge poetry from its old preeminence, in favor of a more catholic and eclectic view of all "literature" (grammata; litterae), prose and verse alike, as belonging to a liberal education.

The extant critical works which represent this trend all belong—not by accident—to the 1st c. B.C. and A.D. We can mention them here only briefly, without distinction between Greeks and Romans (in any case rhetorical study and theory in that period were essentially international). The treatises of "Demetrius" On Style (1st c. B.C.?) and of Dionysius of Halicarnassus On Literary Composition (actually on the placing of words; perhaps around 10 B.C.), though technical and rhetorical in nature, deal with prose and poetry impartially. Poets like Sappho, Pindar, Sophocles, Euripides, and above all Homer, are cited and analyzed, particularly by Dionysius, in illuminating detail. Cicero is a conservative but intelligent and informed critic of poetry, ancient and modern, a not contemptible poet himself, and a firm believer (see particularly the speech For Archias and the De Oratore) in the necessity of a liberal, i.e., a literary, education for the orator and man of affairs. Tacitus's Dialogue on Orators (date uncertain; perhaps a youthful work) canvasses the reasons for the decline of oratory and of literature in general, and presents poetry as a garden of refreshment and delight, a retreat from the hurly-burly of everyday life. Quintilian, Imperial Professor of Rhetoric, incorporated into Book 10 of his major work, the Institutio Oratoria (The Training of the Orator; after A.D. 88) a complete thumbnail sketch and appraisal of all the important Gr. and L. authors, poets and prose writers, from the point of view of their uses in education and as exemplars of style.

"Longinus" (see SUBLIME) stands apart, a "sport" among the rhetoricians. In his lexicon, Homer and Archilochus, Pindar and Sophocles figure equally with Plato and Demosthenes—

Homer, in fact, above the rest—as models of greatness of spirit. It is he who gives us the best definition of a classic, as a work that has pleased men of all ages, tastes, and situations throughout the centuries. "Longinus'" enthusiasm for great literature is perennially infectious. But with his indifference to poetic structure, and to genre and the rules of genre, he really stands outside the tradition of classicism as it was formulated in antiquity.

8. SURVIVAL AND INFLUENCE. Ancient criticism was never, at any stage of its history, a continuing, stable enterprise. Its survival into the modern world was even more precarious. From cl. Greece, only Aristophanes, Plato, and Aristotle outlasted antiquity. Plato, though preserved complete, was not completely known or studied in the West until the Renaissance, and then seen mainly through Neoplatonic spectacles. The Poetics survived only as a torso (see above) and apparently by accident, through its inclusion in a miscellany of rhetorical works by "Demetrius," Dionysius, and others. A medieval L. translation by William of Moerbeke (1278) has come to light in the last twenty years; otherwise the treatise was available to the Middle Ages and the early Renaissance only in a L. translation of an Arabic paraphrase by Averroes. Horace and the Roman rhetoricians were never lost, though considerable parts of Cicero and Quintilian were not recovered until the Renaissance.

Poetic theory could not flourish as such in the Middle Ages, being assigned normally, like rhetoric, to a humble place in the trivium, as a part of grammar or logic. Petrarch and his followers, the humanists of the early Renaissance, began the process of recovery of the ancient heritage, but only gradually and, as it were, backward. The literary ideal of the Quattrocento was the Poeta Orator, and its critical attitudes were mainly Horatian, rhetorical, and based on L. literature. To the early It. humanists, whose consuming passions were L. style (in prose and verse) and personal glory, Horace, Cicero, and Quintilian spoke a familiar language that the Greeks could not rival. Plato, however, was drawn to some extent into the battle over the defense of poetry, which gained new point from the reawakened enthusiasm for pagan literature. In this struggle it was natural that he should appear now on the side of the attackers, e.g., Savonarola (in the De Divisione ac Utilitate Omnium Scientiarum, ca. 1492), now on that of the defense: in the latter case either for the idea of inspiration or for the notion—actually Neoplatonic in origin—that the artist creates according to a true "Idea."

Systematic theorizing about the art of poetry as such, its nature, effects, and species, appears only in the 16th c., in the train of the re-

discovery and gradual dissemination of the Poetics (L. tr. by Giorgio Valla, 1498; editio princeps of the Gr. text, Aldus, 1508; L. tr. by Paccius [Pazzi], 1536, It. by Segni, 1549; commentaries by Robortelli, 1548, Madius [Maggi], 1550, Victorius [Vettori], 1560, Castelvetro, 1570, and many others). The first treatises on poetics, by Vida (1527), and Daniello (1536), were still essentially L. and Horatian. It was Minturno's De Poeta (1559) and Scaliger's Poetices Libri Septem (1561), together with Castelvetro's commentary, that established Aristotle's dictatorship over literature; but even these works are only very imperfectly and halfheartedly Aristotelian.

In spite of the rage for "Longinus" in the 18th c., and sporadic phenomena like Shelley's literary Platonism in the 19th, the prestige and influence of cl. poetics have waned steadily since Lessing's dethronement of the "French"—actually the It.—rules (Hamburgische Dramaturgie, 1767–69). The last twenty years, however, have witnessed a revival of critical allegiance to Aristotle, on the part of the so-called Chicago school (see CHICAGO CRITICS) and others (see IMITATION). The interest of this newest phase of Aristotle's influence is that he is now being viewed and interpreted directly, instead of through the distorting prism of Horace and the cl. tradition as a whole.

PRIMARY WORKS. (1) PLATO: Ion; Phaedrus; Republic 10. For these dialogues as well as the remarks on poetry scattered through other dialogues see the standard tr. of B. Jowett (5 v., 1892); Phaedrus, Ion, etc., tr. L. Cooper (1938); Republic, tr. F. M. Cornford (1941). (2) ARISTOTLE: Poetics: See L. Cooper and A. Gudeman, A Bibliog. of the Poetics of A. (1928), with supp. by M. T. Herrick, AJP, 52 (1931); G. F. Else, "A Survey of Work on A.'s Poetics," cw, 48 (1954–55). Eds. with Gr. text and comment.: A. Rostagni (1927, 2d ed. 1945; best ed., excellent It. introd. and notes); A. Gudeman (1934; radical text, fullest comment [German], but judgments erratic). Text, tr., and comment.: I. Bywater (1909; text outdated, but only complete comment. in Eng.; tr. often repr.); S. H. Butcher, A.'s Theory of Poetry and Fine Art (4th ed. 1911, repr. 1951; good text, standard Eng. tr., essays in lieu of comment; excellent but sometimes overmodernizes A.); mod. Gr.: S. Menardos (tr.) and I. Sykutris (excellent text, comment., introd.; 1937). Text and tr.: S. H. Butcher (4th ed. 1907; as cited above, without essays); French: J. Hardy (1932; "Budé" ed.). Eng. tr. without text: L. Cooper (2d ed. 1947; with supplementary illustrations for studs. of mod. lits.); L. J. Potts, A. on the Art of Fiction (1953; original, sometimes erratic); G. M. A. Grube (1958). "Amplified versions" of the Poetics include L. Cooper, A. on the Art of Poetry (1921), An Aristotelian Theory of Comedy (1922). Rhetoric: ed. and tr. with comment. by E. M. Cope and J. E. Sandys (3 v., 1877). (3) HORACE: Ars Poetica: text and Eng. tr., H. Fairclough (Loeb ed.), 1929. Convenient for comparisons is A. S. Cook, The Poetical Treatises of Horace, Vida, and Boileau (1892). (4) RHETORICAL CRITICS: Demetrius, On Style, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, The Three Lit. Letters and On Lit. Composition (1902, Loeb ed. 1927; 1901; 1910). Cicero, Pro Archia, Brutus, Orator, and De Oratore, all available in the Loeb series. Tacitus, Dialogues on Oratory, tr. W. Peterson (1914; Loeb). Quintilian, Institutio Oratoria, tr. H. E. Butler (4 v., 1920–22; Loeb). Longinus: see SUBLIME.

SECONDARY WORKS. (1) GENERAL: Besides the general histories of crit. by Saintsbury (thin and outdated) and Wimsatt and Brooks, see K. Borinski, Die Antike in Poetik und Kunsttheorie (2 v., 1914–24); C. S. Baldwin, Ancient Rhetoric and Poetic (1924; fresh and vigorous); E. E. Sikes, The Gr. View of Poetry (1931; somewhat sketchy); J. F. D'Alton, Roman Lit. Theory and Crit. (1931); J. W. H. Atkins, Lit. Crit. in Antiquity (2 v., 1934; full but not definitive); J. J. Donohue, The Theory of Lit. Kinds (2 v., 1943, 1949); W. C. Greene, "The Gr. Crit. of Poetry," HSCl, 20 (1950; good survey); A. D. Gomme, The Gr. Attitude to Poetry and Hist. (1954). (2) PRE-ARISTOTELIAN CRIT.: M. Pohlnz, "Die Anfänge d. gr. Poetik," Göttinger Nachrichten (1920); G. Finsler, Platon und die Aristotelische Poetik (1900); W. C. Greene, "Plato's View of Poetry," HSCP, 29 (1918). (3) ARISTOTLE: J. Vahlen, "Beiträge zu Aristoteles Poetik," saww (1865–67, repr. 1914; fundamental work of interpr.); A. Rostagni, "Aristotele e aristotelismo nella storia dell' estetica antica," Studi Ital. di Filol. Class., n.s., 2 (1922; fullest survey); L. Cooper, The Poetics of A., Its Meaning and Influence (1923; brief, lucid); F. L. Lucas, Tragedy in Relation to A.'s Poetics (1927); A. P. McMahon, "Seven Questions on Aristotelian Definitions of Tragedy and Comedy," HSCP, 40 (1929); E. Bignami, La Poetica di Aristotele (1932); S. H. Butcher, A.'s Theory of Poetry and Fine Art: see above under primary works; H. House, A.'s Poetics (1956; shrewd, sensible); G. F. Else, A.'s Poetics: the Argument (1957); J. Jones, On Aristotle and Gr. Tragedy (1962). (4) HORACE: J. F. D'Alton, Horace and His Age (1917; ch. 7); G. C. Fiske and M. A. Grant, Cicero's De Oratore and Horace's Ars Poetica (1929); O. Immisch, "Horazens Epistel über die Dichtkunst," Philologus, Supplementband 24, Heft 3 (1932); C. O. Brink, Horace on Poetry: Prolegomena to the Lit. Epistles (1963). G.F.E.

CLASSICAL PROSODY is, with respect to Gr. and L., the science which deals with the nature of syllables, whereas meter is the technique of their arrangement. In its technical sense Gr. prosōdia (L. accentus) meant primarily accentuation as determined, in Gr. at any rate, by musical pitch; but the scope of the word was subsequently extended, and prosody is now regarded as describing the facts concerning the "quantities" of syllables, i.e., the time taken to pronounce them. Quantity, not stress, was the basis of cl. Gr. and L. metric, with the possible exception of the Saturnian measure in early L. Syllables were regularly either long (—) or short (˘), the latter quantity being the time unit (Gr. chronos, L. mora), and a long syllable was conventionally regarded as equivalent in time value to two shorts (— = ˘˘). As variations of this simple "disemic" scheme, syllables with greater or less length than either quantity have been postulated in modern times on the ground that syllabic irrationality was apparently recognized in antiquity, not indeed by metricians, but in rhythmical and musical theory. But while the hypothesis of the existence of such irrational syllables in metric was acceptable to scholars of the 19th c. who tried to explain Gr. lyric meters in the light of their own conjectures about the accompanying music, it has little favor with the modern school which adheres to the "graphic" prosody of the long and short syllables of spoken verse. (See CYCLIC FOOT, DISEMIC and TRISEMIC, and MORA.)

Most Am., British, and German metricians, accustomed as they are to stress accent in their own languages, maintain that the L. accent was similar, and many have held that coincidences or clashes of ictus (q.v.) and accent were intentional in certain writers (e.g., Plautus and Virgil). But the existence of a pitch accent is arguable from the testimony of the Romans themselves, and Fr. scholars, with the example of their own language before them, are convinced that such was the nature of the L. accent, at any rate during the literary period. Whichever it was, in cl. and post cl. L. it conformed to the "penultimate law," whereby the accent of a dissyllabic word fell on its first syllable, while a polysyllabic word was accented on its last syllable but one if this was long, and on the syllable before that if the penultimate was short.

A syllable containing a short vowel was normally short if the vowel was followed by a single consonant either in the same word or at the beginning of the next, or by no consonant at all. In L. qu was regarded as a single consonant, h was ignored metrically as being no more than an aspirate [as in transliterated Gr.], and occasionally, in the republican period, a final s preceded by short i or u was disregarded if the following word began with a consonant, e.g.

mēntībūs[s] cāptī.

On the other hand a syllable was long by nature if it contained a long vowel or diphthong, and long by position if its vowel, being short, was followed either by a double consonant (zeta, xi, or psi in Gr. or x or z in L.), or by two or more consonants. However, since a mute and a liquid consonant in sequence (like gr, pl, pr, etc.) could be pronounced together, a syllable containing a short vowel which immediately preceded such a combination in the same word or at the beginning of the next might remain short or be scanned as long in verse (except that of Gr. comedy and early Roman tragedy and comedy where it was not lengthened), e.g.

agrestis

If, however, the mute and the liquid belonged to separate words or to separate parts of a compound word, the syllable was long by position, e.g.

incumbūt ripis, ōb-ruit

The varying quantity before a mute and a liquid is sometimes referred to as syllaba anceps (syllable with two possibilities), but the term is usually applied to the particular case where the final syllable of a verse was permitted to be either short or long.

Metricians and linguists, with the support of ancient authorities like Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1st c. B.C.), generally maintain that a syllable with a short vowel is long if it is "closed," i.e., ends with a consonant (or consonants) not belonging to the next syllable. This is so with the first (or more) of a group of consonants which, in their respective languages, cannot normally begin a Gr. or L. word, e.g., the syllables of am|bo, an|trum, or sanc|tus must be divided as shown. A double consonant is divisible between two syllables (e.g., x = c + s) and the combination of mute and liquid in the same word may be divided or not as occasion demands. But a single consonant between two vowels is assumed to belong to the syllable containing the second and (as a rule) at the end of a word to be theoretically transferable to the first syllable of the next word in the same verse, if this word has an initial vowel or diphthong, without regard to the intervening punctuation. Thus in the division of feet within the L. hexameter

*ēxsēquā|r. hānc ētī|ām, Māē|cenā|s, āspīcē|
pārēm*

the final consonants of the first and fourth words belong respectively to the first syllables of the second and fifth feet. But the occasional retention of the final consonant with the word to which it belongs is at least a mechanical explanation of the not infrequent lengthening in hexameters of short syllables in the first place or "rise" of the feet to which they belong, e.g.

ipse ubi tempus erit omnis in fonte lavabo.

The treatment in syllable division of the final consonant of a word is thus parallel to the functioning of vowel elision and hiatus. Elision occurred in Gr. when a word which began with a vowel or diphthong was preceded by another which ended with a short vowel other than y (or, on occasion, with the diphthongs ai and oi) and the first vowel (or diphthong) disappeared in the second. In L. verse it was usual for a vowel or diphthong (or for a short vowel followed by m which presumably nasalized it) to be likewise elided, although some scholars, particularly in continental Europe, prefer to apply the cl. term synaloepha (coalescing) to describe what happens to a long vowel or diphthong in elision. In written Gr., but not L., elision is regularly indicated by omitting the elided vowel and inserting an apostrophe, e.g., legoim' an for legoimi an. Hiatus on the other hand occurred when the final and the initial vowel or diphthong remained separated each in its own syllable, particularly when there was a recognized metrical division or sense-pause between them. A strong sense-pause, however, was not an obstacle to elision, which might take place even when there was simultaneously a change of speaker in drama. An example, first of elision and then of hiatus, is provided by the L. hexameter:

ut vi|di (elision or synaloepha of the final i),
ut p̃e|ri|ĩ (hiatus), ut|mē mā|ũs āb|stul|ĩt ěr|rōr.

In Gr. metric, when a short initial vowel was absorbed into a long vowel or diphthong at the end of the preceding word, this occurrence is called aphaeresis or prodelision and was especially common in dramatic verse. Akin to elision and prodelision are crasis (q.v.) and synizesis or the combination of two separate vowels within a word into one, e.g.,

dē|inde for dē|inde.

In L. the shortening, without elision or synaloepha, of a long before a short vowel in the next word, e.g.

an quĩ amant, was, as a prosodic expedient, much rarer than in the Gr. hexameter or elegiac couplet, where such "correction" of a long vowel or diphthong was convenient for either of the two shorts in the second half of a dactyl (— — —) and can be illustrated by the shortening of the second element in āgrōũ ěp' ěschātĩes and of the third in āndrā mōĩ ěnnēpē.

This too was a form of elision, inasmuch as the second of the two temporal units into which the quantity of the long syllable could be resolved (— = — —) was elided to leave the first in its place. Other apparent anomalies of quantity in Homeric verse are often to be explained by the disappearance from the traditional text of consonants which were once valid in pronunciation, especially the digamma, which had the sound of L. v or Eng. w.

A knowledge of syllabic quantity is the indispensable introduction to any study of the various metrical forms. It is to be acquired in the first place only by means of a thorough acquaintance with vocalic quantity, which of course has to be learned by students of both languages as an essential of pronunciation. But, when this has been done, the laws of cl. prosody are on the whole straightforward.

E. Kalinka, "Griechisch-römische Metrik und Rhythmik im letzten Vierteljahrhundert," Bursian's Jahresbericht, 250 (1935), 290-507; 256 (1937), 1-126; 257 (1937), 1-160; A. M. Dale, "Gr. Metric 1936-1957," Lustrum 2 (1957), 5-51; P. W. Harsh, "Early L. Meter and Prosody 1935-1955," Lustrum 3 (1958), 215-280. — E. H. Sturtevant, The Pronunciation of Gr. and L. (2d ed., 1940); Kolář; P. Chantraine, Grammaire Homérique: Tome I, Phonétique et Morphologie (1948); J. D. Denniston and J. F. Mountford, "Metre, Gr." and "Metre, L." respectively, The Oxford Cl. Dict. (1949), pp. 564-570 (with brief but important bibliog.); M. Platnauer, L. Elegiac Verse (1951); C. G. Cooper, An Introduction to the L. Hexameter (1952; contains a careful account of syllable division); Koster; Crusius; Beare; P. Maas, Gr. Metre, tr. H. Lloyd-Jones (1962). R.J.G.

CLASSICISM. A definition of the term will be attempted here in the form of an analysis of its divergent and often contradictory meanings and of the different ways in which "classic" and "classical," root adjectives of "cl.," are understood. Six different meanings of "classic," "classical," and "cl." may be used as a frame of reference for a general definition. It should be emphasized that these meanings will not include connotations of the term "cl." in reference to arts other than literary (music, painting, architecture, etc.): the object of this analysis is solely to furnish a way of understanding the main contexts of cl. within the development of poetics and of the theory of literature.

A. AS "GREAT" OR "FIRST CLASS." This meaning stems from the oldest application of the term to literary matters. Aulus Gellius, a grammarian of the 2d c. A.D., cites (Noctes Atticae 9.8) Cornelius Fronto as distinguishing a scriptor classicus from a scriptor proletarius, a "classical" from a "proletarian" writer. The terms classicus and proletarius were taken from Roman tax law: the first designated a member of the highest income bracket; the second, a wage-earner with an income below the taxable minimum. Fronto's distinction, as cited by Aulus Gellius, was made in reference to the use of genteel language by the scriptor classicus and was by that token alone a social distinction which the borrowing of terminology from the tax collectors served to enhance: the scriptor classicus writes for the few; the proletarius, for the many. This meaning of "classic" and "classical" has survived only indirectly: its original antonym, "proletarian," has become a term in Marxist criticism to designate the opposite of aristocratic or bourgeois literature. In the Soviet presentation of the literary history of Russia, however, predominant poetic styles in the reign of Catherine the Great, termed c. are contrasted with the contemporaneous rise of "popular" elements in letters—in this instance, the old Gellian dichotomy is preserved.

B. AS "WHAT IS READ IN SCHOOL." This meaning was first formed in the 6th c. A.D. by Magnus Felix Ennodius who spoke (Dict. 9) of a student who attends classes in school as a classicus. Classicus (classique, classico) was sometimes used by Fr. and It. Renaissance critics of the 16th c. to describe works of literature read in school. Since what is used as a school text was usually adjudged excellent, a combination of definition A ("first-rate") and of the present meaning formed a concept of cl. as denoting general excellence or "of value as a model" which will be discussed under the next heading. Modern Fr. and It. meanings of classicisme and classicismo are still colored, however, by the earlier association of the term with school usage of texts.

C. AS A TERM USED TO DENOTE "GREATEST" OR "STANDARD" WORKS OF LITERATURE OR PERIODS OF EMINENT LITERARY DEVELOPMENT. This definition, still current in both Germanic and Romance languages, was first developed in the 16th c. Thomas Sebillot's Art Poétique Français (1548) speaks of Alain Chartier and Jean de Meung as "bons et classiques poètes français," i.e., as standard or model authors. The Discorsi Fiorentini (1581) of Agnolo Segni speak of "Autori classici e toscani" in the same sense. The New Eng. Dictionary gives instances of the use of "classical" as synonymous with "canonical" or "worthy of imitation" for the years 1599 (Sir George Sandys) and 1608–11 (Bishop Hall). The German term klassisch (classisch) to denote standard works of literary excellence did not become current until the second half of the 18th c.

Modern uses of the term "classic" in this sense are the division of the history of letters into "classic ages" (e.g., the Elizabethan Age as the classic age of Eng. literature), ages of highest poetic achievement rather than of specific literary forms, and the naming of collections which include works of recognized merit, though of no common literary form, as "classics." Thus the Harvard Classics include the Arabian Nights and Charles Darwin's Voyage of the "Beagle" as well as the Odyssey and the Aeneid. Les Classiques Français du Moyen Age contain over 80 outstanding literary products of the Middle Ages in France which, for the most part, have no connection with that form of Fr. literature called cl. Sainte-Beuve, Babbitt, and others have attempted to give formal definitions of what a classic, understood as a work of general excellence, should be. T. S. Eliot's answer to What is a Classic? (1944) is that such a work must be the product of a mature civilization reflected in a mature mind and must show a "common style" which fully exploits the possibilities of the language in which the work is composed. Further, a classic should comprehensively represent the spirit of the nationality it belongs to and have some claim to universal meaning, to dealing with questions of general philosophical import.

D. AS SPECIFICALLY GR. AND ROMAN—CL.—AS THE IMITATION OF ANCIENT GR., AND ROMAN AUTHORS. As the writers of Gr. and Roman antiquity became increasingly standardized both as models for imitation and as school-texts, a fused meaning of definitions A, B, and C ("first-rate," "school-text," "standard work") became current in the 17th c.: Cl. was made synonymous with the imitation of Gr. and Roman authors who, in turn, captured the appellation "classics" as a collective term for their works. At present this meaning still stands. In the 20th c., critics use it, however, to designate two different practices: sometimes cl. denotes the imitation of Gr. and L. themes in the modern literatures (as in G. Highet, The Classical Tradition, 1949); at other times, cl. is taken to mean the imitation of Gr. and Roman literary forms in composing works on any theme. It is thus necessary to divide the discussion of this definition into one of thematic and one of formal imitation.

D. 1. As the thematic imitation of Gr. and Roman models. Under this heading, much of Roman literature constituted cl. in that Gr. letters furnished its themes. Seneca's imitation of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides; and Virgil's emulation of Homeric themes would be cases in point. In modern literature, thematic imitation of Graeco-Roman models began with the Fr. and German courtly romances of the 12 c. (Benoît de Saint Maure's Le Roman de Troie, Heinrich von Veldeke's Enéid). These inaugurated a tradition, continuous to the present, of recasting Gr. and Roman stories into the language of the day and country. To a great degree, this meaning of cl. was to merge with the emulation of Gr. and Roman poetic forms (See D. 2., below). In the late 19th and early 20th c., however, many works have used Graeco-Roman myth and legend as an apt commentary on perennial human problems, though their authors paid no heed to the literary forms in which their stories had been cast in Gr. and Roman literature. In the field of lyric poetry, Stéphane Mallarmé's L'Après Midi d'un Faune (1876), Carl Spitteler's Der Olympische Fruehling (1900-10), and T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land (1922) could be cited as notable examples of this trend. The modern novel shows this aspect of cl. in James Joyce's Ulysses (1922), André Gide's Thésée (1946), and Elisabeth Langgasser's Die maerische Argonautenfahrt (1950). Notable examples in drama are O'Neill's Mourning Becomes Electra, Sartre's Les Mouches. In the 20th c., anthropology, psychiatry, and psychology have also added to renewed interest in the thematic imitation of Graeco-Roman models. Sir J. G. Frazer (1854-1941), in The Golden Bough, showed Gr. and Roman myth to be linked to the agricultural and sexual myths of primitive peoples and hence to be of far more general import to the understanding of the human imagination than had been supposed before. Sigmund Freud (1856-1939), looking at Gr. myth from his psychoanalytic point of view, found it to illustrate striking parallels to certain unconscious drives manifested in the symbolic pattern of dreams. Some of the neurotic situations in the Freudian system received Gr. mythological names (Oedipus complex, Electra complex). Finally, the work of C. G. Jung (1875-1961) has shown myth to be an aspiration of the "collective unconscious," i.e., a wish-fulfillment of desires perennially present in man. Frazer's anthropology, Freud's psychoanalysis, and Jung's research in psychology have all contributed heavily to the present resurgence of interest in Graeco-Roman myth and legend which is reflected in 20th-c. literature.

D. 2. Cl. as the Formal Imitation of Gr. and Roman models. Cl. in this sense concerns the attempt to construct, from Gr. and L. sources, a poetics for vernacular literature. The imitation of modern "classical" poetics in the creation of vernacular literature is also subsumed here. Two works of antiquity, one Gr., the other Roman, may be used as keys to an understanding of formal cl.: Aristotle's Poetics and Horace's Art of Poetry. During the It. revival of Graeco-Roman letters in the 15th and 16th c., the Poetics of Aristotle achieved attention which was to earn its rules a complete tyranny over the development of European drama from 1560 to 1780. The ideas of poetry as imitation (to be interpreted in 17th-c. France "as a mode of imitation of nature, with Aristotelian regularity understood as nature"), the exaltation of tragedy and epic as "highest" forms of poetry, and, above all, the idea of unity of action in tragedy (to be extended, by later critics, to unities of place and time) were the main tenets of the neo-Aristotelian poetics. These were disseminated by 16th-c. It. commentators on Aristotle's Poetics like Fr. Robortelli (1548), B. Segni (1549), V. Maggi (1550), P. Vettori (1560), L. Castelvetro (1570), and A. Piccolomini (1575). Julius Caesar Scaliger's Poetica (1561) and Giorgio Trissino's work of the same name (1563) used Aristotle's theory as a basis for practical criticism. Coincidental with the rise of neo-Aristotelian poetics was a revival of interest in the drama of Seneca. Thus Senecan tragedies of the 16th c. like Trissino's Sofonisba (1515), Jodelle's Cléopâtre captive (1553), and Sackville and Norton's Gorboduc (1561) combined with concurrent interest in Aristotle's Poetics to create a background for European "classical" drama of the 17th and 18th c.

If Aristotle's ideas influenced the development of a theory of "imitation" and effected the regularization of the drama, it was Horace's Art of Poetry which inspired that idea of propriety (decorum) in composing poetry central to imitative cl.: the use of the right form for a suitable subject (only an epic may accommodate giants), of language to suit the dramatic character's social and native background, and of action to match the nature of the character (Medea, a mother, cannot slaughter her children on stage). In addition, Horace stressed the importance of polished craftsmanship, of long labor to achieve a consciously balanced work of art, a doctrine much stressed in the poetics of this aspect of cl. Important works which spread the Horatian doctrine in 16th-c. Italy were Vida's De Arte Poetica (ca. 1520), Robortello's paraphrase of Horace in an appendix to his edition of Aristotle's Poetics, important for the coupling of the two critical theories in one volume, and Minturno's De Arte Poetica (1563). In France, Joachim du Bellay's Défense et illustration de la langue française (1549) and Pierre de Ronsard's Abrégé de l'art poétique français (1565) were poetics Horatian-Aristotelian in spirit with an almost immediate effect on the development of styles and forms in Fr. verse and drama. Even though the Horatian-Aristotelian doctrine found critical exposition in Sir Philip Sidney's Apologie for Poetry (1595) and Martin Opitz's Buch von der deutschen Poeterei (1624), its canon was to dominate 17th-c. literature only in France. In the 18th c., when the emulation of Graeco-Roman form was central to critical doctrines in England, Germany, and elsewhere, the expositions of Fr. 17th-c. critics, rather than the Ancients themselves, were looked to for guidance. For this reason, c. as a mode of imitation of form is often identified totally with Fr. emulation of Graeco-Roman doctrines and forms, notably with the canon of Nicolas Boileau-Despréaux' Art Poétique (1674).

Boileau's defense of Horatian proportion and Aristotelian "regular tragedy" is supported by the philosophical framework of Cartesian rationalism: reason should be the poet's guide in selecting what he desires to imitate from nature; outstanding Gr. and Roman works are even safer to imitate than nature itself since the perennial character of what they have described assures the rationality and universality of their themes. Indeed they were, in a sense, nature. As Alexander Pope's Essay on Criticism (1711), a guide for critics based on Boileau's poetics, was to say of Virgil's imitation of Homer: "Perhaps he seem'd above the Critic's law / And but from Nature's fountains scorn'd to draw: / But when t' examine ev'ry part he came, / Nature and Homer were, he found, the same" (132-135). Of Gr. and Roman genres to be imitated, Boileau stressed the epic, tragedy, comedy, ode, eclogue, elegy, satire, and fable. He did not reject, however, forms of poetic expression inaugurated or developed mainly in the vernacular tradition—the novel, the sonnet, or the ballad—but demanded that these forms also follow the same regularity of proportion and observe the same proprieties as genres imitated from the ancients. The doctrine of formal imitation of Graeco-Roman letters thus gained ascendancy over all directions of poetic activity in France. It was supported, in this respect, by a series of outstanding works which anticipated, paralleled, or reflected theories codified in the Art Poétique: the most important of these were the tragedies of Pierre Corneille (1606-84), Jean Racine (1639-99), and Voltaire (1694-1778), the comedies of Molière (1622-73), the fables of Jean de La Fontaine (1621-95), and Boileau's (1636-1711) own satires. In England, Boileau's critical precepts were expounded by John Dryden (1631-1700), Thomas Rymer (1641-1713), and Alexander Pope (1688-1744) and were best reflected in the literary productions of the first and last named, in tragedies like Thomas Otway's Titus and Berenice (1677) and Joseph Addison's Cato (1713), and in the satirical style of Jonathan Swift (1667-1745). While Daniel Georg Morhof's Unterricht von der deutschen Sprache und Poesie (1682) already upheld Corneille and Molière as dramatic models for the German theatre and Boileau's verse was imitated, during his lifetime, by Friedrich von Canitz (1654-99), the Fr. canon of formal classical imitation was introduced to Germany by Johann Christoph Gottsched (1700-1766). His Versuch einer kritischen Dichtkunst (1730) was a paraphrase of Boileau's Art Poétique; Gottsched's almost single-handed theatrical reforms placed the German stage under a Fr. neo-Aristotelian spell for a dozen years. Yet Gottsched had few followers: the only German poets of some merit to follow Fr. critical doctrine were Gottsched himself, the fabulist Friedrich von Hagedorn (1708-54), and the dramatic poet Johann Elias Schlegel (1718-49). Later in the 18th c., German literature was to develop another aspect of formal cl., to be discussed below.

In France, England, and Germany, the critical vocabulary of Boileau and his followers became part of the philosophical polemic between partisans of the "ancients" who saw Greece and Rome as storehouses of perennial wisdom and the "moderns" who saw current progress in the arts. Works like Swift's Battle of the Books (1704) on the "ancient" or Charles Perrault's Parallèles des Anciens et des Modernes (1688) on the "modern" side which drew readers from beyond literary circles perhaps intensified the importance which neo-classical critical theory (as opposed to poetic practice) seems to have had in these countries. In Spain and Italy, where the "quarrel of the ancients and moderns" was not fought in the 18th c., the followers of Boileau were of a more academic character and had, besides, less influence upon the poets. In Italy, Gian Vincenzo Gravina's Della tragedia (1708) and Saverio Bettinelli's Lettere Virgiliane (1757) expressed a Fr. neoclassical canon which was to be eminently realized only during the last quarter of the 18th c. when Vittorio Alfieri (1749-1803) created some 19 tragedies in the style of Corneille and Racine. The learned Poética (1737) of Ignacio Luzan, based on Horace and Boileau, fell short of animating outstanding literary productions in Spain. In one measure or the other, however, Fr. neo-classical doctrine became known and imitated in the 18th-c. literature of almost every European country—Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Russia, Poland, and Hungary all had their "classical" periods under Fr. influence. Thus the term cl., in the critical sense, refers, in most European literary histories, to the imitation of Gr. and Latin models by Boileau's rules, or to the emulation of Fr. works "classical" by virtue of their Horatian-Aristotelian character.

The main exception to this rule is German literary historiography, where cl. (Klassik) carries a meaning distinct from the appellation of Fr. neocl., German cl. (Klassizismus, Klassik) consciously rejects both Fr. neoclassical poetics and Roman works of art as models for emulation in favor of a direct imitation of Gr. forms. German concentration of interest upon Greece was animated, during the latter half of the 18th c., by the work of Johann Joachim Winckelmann (1717-68) who saw Gr. graphic and plastic forms as models of human perfection. His conception of all Gr. art as the emanation of a harmonious soul was challenged by Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-81) whose Laokoon (1766) points to the realism of Gr. literature manifested in its portrayal of both beautiful and ugly elements in human nature. Winckelmann's and Lessing's controversy, far from being destructive of a German understanding of Greece, helped to redefine it: Gr. letters were now seen as both preeminent aesthetically and human in their emotional appeal: Lessing's Hamburgische Dramaturgie (1767-69) sought to reinterpret Aristotle's Poetics as placing emphasis upon the purgation of pity and fear in the spectator to tragedy, rather than on the formal unities inherent in the play. In so doing, Lessing rejected the tragedies of Corneille and Racine insofar as these claimed to be true imitations of Aeschylean and Sophoclean tragedy. Among German writers, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832), Friedrich Schiller (1759-1805), and Friedrich Hölderlin (1770-1843) most eminently imitated Gr. forms in some parts of their work. The most noteworthy aspect of their emulation of Gr. forms is that they used these in the portrayal of non-Gr. themes or for the expression of personal feelings. Outstanding examples are Goethe's epic Herrmann and Dorothea (1797), Schiller's tragedy Wilhelm Tell (1804), and the Pindaric hymns of Hölderlin (1801ff.). Friedrich Nietzsche's (1844-1900) preoccupation with the Apollonian-Dionysian (q.v.) components of Gr. tragedy as well as the use of elegy and hymn in the poetry of Stefan George (1868-1933) and Rainer Maria Rilke (1875-1926) can be seen as aspects of a German cult of Gr. form which extends from Winckelmann through Goethe and Hölderlin to the 20th c.

E. AS THE ANTITHESIS OF ROMANTICISM. The antinomy cl. vs. romanticism (q.v.) was first coined by Friedrich von Schlegel (1772-1829) who saw cl. as an attempt to express infinite ideas and emotions in finite form (Das Athenaeum, 1798). Schlegel envisaged a finite (classical) poetics coexisting with his own idea of romanticism—a progressive universal poetry in the making of which the poet was law unto himself. Mme de Staël (1766-1817), whose De l'Allemagne (1813) first brought the antinomy to the attention of Fr. and Eng. critics, drastically rejected cl. as a sterile form of literary creation: a mechanical imitation, by means of predetermined rules, of Graeco-Roman models statically conceived. Whereas Schlegel saw his idea of romanticism as antithetical to Goethe's Klassik and with implicit reference to Schiller's antinomy of the naive and sentimental (q.v.) poet. Mme de Staël attacked in cl. the poetics of Boileau and of his followers. Her polemic rejected the Fr. tradition of classical imitation not only on aesthetic but on political grounds. Accordingly, De l'Allemagne engendered 19th-c. views of cl. vs. romanticism as meaning "conservative" vs. "revolutionary" as well as "bound by sterile rules" vs. "originally creative." Goethe (in a conversation with Eckermann, 1820) originated yet another view of this antinomy by equating cl. with health and romanticism with sickness. This idea has remained current in the 20th c. (cf. M. Praz, The Romantic Agony, 1933). Generally, however, 20th-c. critics have come to see the contrast between cl. and romanticism as an emphasis on poetic form and conscious craftsmanship opposed to a poetics of personal emotion and logically incommensurable inspiration. It is in this sense that T. S. Eliot (The Sacred Wood, 1920) rejected romanticism in letters in favor of cl.

F. AS A PERIOD DESIGNATION IN LITERARY HISTORY. The confusion engendered by the many meanings which "classic," "classical," and cl. have carried throughout the last 1700 years is reflected in the designation of "classical" movements and epochs by 20th-c. historians of literature. Since those authors whose works have fallen under the heading of cl. in literature, as discussed in definitions D. 1 and 2, above, seldom referred to their own creations as "classical," the aesthetic and historical grounds for establishing national or general classicisms in literature have had to be reconstructed from hindsight. In this respect, historians of Fr. literature have had the easiest task since the polemics of Fr. romanticism clearly defined what its contrary, cl., was and the canon of Boileau's precursors and followers created a clear-cut vocabulary for purposes of grouping and analysis: In the histories of Fr. literature (and in works on general and comparative literature from a Fr. point of view) the period 1660-1700 is noted as the high point of Fr. cl.; the influence of its critical theory and works upon the literatures of 18th-c. Europe constitutes an international age of cl. German literary historians tend to see the Fr. classical canon as a neocl. (with the pejorative connotation of mannerism and second-rate literary production) and include the period of adherence to Boileau's standards in the development of German letters (ca. 1725-45) within the neoclassical category. By contrast, the period 1787-1800, when Goethe's and Schiller's emulation of Gr. form reached its high point, is taken to be the epoch of true German cl. Since there is no clear-cut distinction on aesthetic grounds between that Klassik and the romantic period which begins at an overlapping point in time, historians of German literature and some comparative literature scholars have tended to borrow from art history plastic concepts which would distinguish the restrained style of what is considered classical from the "open" forms of romanticism and the irregularities of baroque (q.v.) literature. Further, the notion of "classic" as "model" (definition C) tends to enter German notions of cl.—since Goethe, Schiller, and Hoelderlin represent the best of German literature, their age is therefore classical. Historians of Eng. literature are beset by a central problem when questions relating to a definition of Eng. cl. arise: Emulation and imitation of Graeco-Roman motifs and forms runs through Eng. letters from 1550 to the present and was perhaps more intensive among the "romantic" and "Victorian" poets of the 19th c. than among the avowed followers of Boileau in the late 17th and 18th c. Historians of Eng. letters have, especially of late, chosen to speak of classical "contexts" and "aspects" related to individual works or groups of writers—a definition of cl. in Eng. literature, based on these phenomena, is yet to be formed. Historians of other European literatures have generally restricted themselves to employing the term cl. to epochs in which their national literature imitated the Fr. 17th-c. doctrine of formal classical imitation. Scholars of comparative, general, or world literature have either analyzed European cl. as a Fr. or Gallic phenomenon or have attempted the difficult task of seeing the poetics of such diverse writers as Boileau, Goethe, and T. S. Eliot as aspects of one historical trend. The question can be asked, legitimately, whether the term cl. continues to be useful or instructive as a description of periods of literary history. Its many and at times contradictory meanings should certainly lead scholars to apply it with great caution.

A. Spingarn, A Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the Renaissance (1908); G. Murray, The Cl. Tradition in Poetry (1927); F. Strich, Deutsche Klassik und Romantik (1928); Wellek and Warren; H. Peyre, Le Classicisme français (1942) and "Classicisme" in Hist. des litt. occidentales, ed. R. Queneau (1956); P. Van Tieghem, Hist. littéraire de l'Europe et de l'Amérique de la

Ren. à nos jours (1946); Curtius; T. E. Hulme, "Romanticism and Cl.," in Modern Lit. Crit., ed. R. B. West (1952); W. Rehm, Griechentum und Goethezeit (1952); A. Heussler, Klassik und Klassizismus in der deutschen Lit. (1952); W. P. Friederich, Outline of Comparative Lit. (1954); H. Levin, Contexts of Crit. (1957); G. Luck, "Scriptor Classicus," CL, 10 (1958); R. Wellek, "The Concept of Cl. and Classic in Lit. Scholarship," in Intern. Comparative Lit. Assoc., Proc. of the 4th Congress (1965). W.B.F.

CLAUSULA. See PROSE RHYTHM.

CLERIHEW. A form of comic poetry invented by Edmund C. (for Clerihew) Bentley (1875-1956). A c. consists of two couplets of unequal length often with complex or somewhat ridiculous rhymes and presents a potted biography of a famous personage or historical character. The humor consists in concentrating on the trivial, the fantastic, or the ridiculous and presenting it with dead-pan solemnity as the characteristic, the significant, or the essential. Actually it celebrates the triumph of the nonsequitur and indirectly satirizes academic pedantry as well as amateur inconsequence in biographical research. Bentley wrote his first c. as a schoolboy of sixteen.

Sir Humphrey Davy
Detested gravity.
He lived in the odium
Of having discovered sodium.

Famous as the author of the "perfect" detective novel Trent's Last Case, Bentley is honored by a coterie of enthusiastic connoisseurs for three collections of capsule biographies: Biography for Beginners (1905), More Biography (1929), and Baseless Biography (1939). In the "Introductory Remarks" to an omnibus volume, Clerihews Complete, the author states and illustrates the nature of his work:

The Art of Biography
Is different from Geography.
Geography is about Maps,
But Biography is about Chaps.

It is clear that this art form, which is not unrelated to the limerick (q.v.), is very British and quite Old School Tie, but it has nevertheless attracted many practitioners in America as well as England, among them being W. H. Auden, Clifton Fadiman, Ellen Evans, Diana Menuhin, and others.—C. Fadiman, "Clerihology" in Any Number Can Play (1957).

A.J.M.S.

CLICHÉ. A phrase or figure which from overuse, like a dulled knife, has lost its cutting edge; a trite expression. Clichés in verse result when the poet's inspiration arises from other poems rather than from a fresh response to experience. Examples of poetic clichés are: fettered soul, eagle-eyed, break of day, rolling wave, purling brook, whispering breeze, ruby lips, pearly teeth, white as snow. Good poets sometimes use clichés intentionally for ironical purposes.—E. Partridge, A Dictionary of Clichés (1947); L. D. Lerner, "Clichés and Commonplace," ERIC, 6 (1956) presents a different view. See also T. Y. Booth, "The Cliché: A Working Bibliog.," Bulletin of Bibliog. and Magazine Notes, 23 (1960).

L.P.

CLIMAX (Gr. "ladder"). (1). As a term of rhetoric, according to the anonymous Ad Herennium 25, and Quintilian (Institutes of Oratory 9.3.54-57), both of the 1st c. A.D., and the Gr. rhetorician Demetrius (On Style 270, 1st c. A.D.), c. is the pattern of a series of sentences or other units of discourse linked chainwise, a meaning of the term now mostly abandoned for fear of confusion with sense 2 below. The opening word or words of each unit after the first repeats a word or words, usually the final ones, of the preceding unit, sometimes with a morphological change. The purpose is commonly to build up a crescendo of force or excitement, e.g., "I will grind your bones to dust / and with your blood and it I'll make a paste, / And of the paste a coffin I will rear / And make two pasties of your shameful heads, / And bid that strumpet, your unhal-low'd dam, / Like to the earth swallow her own increase" (Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus 5.2.187-92). A c. is known as a sorites when the linked elements are truncated syllogisms in a chain of argument, the conclusion of each before the last becoming the premiss of the next (see, e.g., Richard Whately, Elements of Logic 2.4.7). (2). The meaning currently designated by c. is the point of supreme interest or intensity of any graded series of events or ideas, most commonly the crisis or turning point of a story or play, e.g., the fall of Adam in Paradise Lost or the murder of the king in Macbeth.

H.B.

CLOAK AND SWORD. See COMEDIA DE CAPA Y ESPADA.

CLOSET DRAMA is designed for reading in the study (closet) or to small groups rather than for performance on the public stage. Classifying a specific play as c.d. can be difficult since it is not always clear what the dramatist intended. In some cases he may well have hoped for theatrical production but have been rejected by a theatre catering to a non-receptive audience. The classic example, Seneca, wrote at a time when the Roman stage was monopolized by mimes and tumblers. It seems clear that such Senecan plays as Hercules Furens, Phaedra, and Thyestes, all highly rhetorical pieces, were designed for oral reading at most, though centuries later, in the Elizabethan period, they were to exert a strong influence on such important dramatists as Marlowe and Kyd. In the period of great dramatic activity in England from 1580 to 1642 at least a few c.d. appeared. These seem to have been written in academic or provincial isolation from a theatre restricted almost entirely to the London populace. Milton also wrote for the closet. His Samson Agonistes might have suited the Athenian stage; it was clearly not intended for the Restoration one.

The period most productive of c.d., the 19th c., affords the clearest example of divergence of dramatist and audience. Shelley, Keats, Landor wrote a highly poetic though perhaps inadequately dramaturgic form of tragedy usually based on Gr. or Elizabethan models. Shelley's Prometheus Unbound and Cenci—this last piece was produced generations later by the poet's admirers—are excellent examples of the type. In France the plays of Alfred de Musset, though several were eventually performed, belong in the class of c.d. In the 20th c. much "poetic" drama would appear to fit the definition of c.d., in its ultimate fate if not because of the authors' intentions. The plays of Yeats, Eliot, and Fry, for example, are better known in the "closet" than on the stage though they were clearly intended for the theatre. Only a few minor figures, such as Lawrence Binyon or W. W. Gibson, wrote plays for the reader alone.—F. E. Schelling, Elizabethan Drama 1588-1642 (1910); H. A. Smith, Main Currents of Modern Fr. Drama (1925); T. S. Eliot, "Seneca," Selected Essays (1932, 1950); P. W. Harsh, A Handbook of Classical Drama (1944); Nicoll.

L.H.

COBLA. This is the usual word for "stanza" in Old Prov. It is also used, either alone or in the expression c. esparsa (isolated stanza), to designate a poem consisting in its entirety of a single stanza. These coblas are fairly common from the end of the 12th c. on. In theme they are usually like miniature serventes (q.v.), and in their concision they represent the troubadours' closest approach to the epigram. It often happened that a cobla would inspire an answering cobla, and this might well follow the metrical structure of the first, in which case the resultant combination resembles a short tenso (see under TENZONE).—Jeanroy, II.

F.M.C.

COCKNEY SCHOOL OF POETRY. A derivative name applied (Blackwood's Magazine, Oct. 1817) to a group of writers, including Keats, Shelley, Leigh Hunt, and Hazlitt, who were Londoners by birth or adoption. Hunt, and Keats as his protégé, were the chief targets of the anonymous attack (long but, as it appears, mistakenly attributed to J. G. Lockhart), which was motivated at least as much by the reviewer's opposition to the radical social and political views of the group as by his disagreement with the artistic principles which he believed they shared, a motivation which is underlined by his references to the humble origins of Keats and Hunt. The term was also used by John Wilson Croker in the course of his notorious attack on Keats' Endymion (QR, Sept. 1818).

COLOMBIAN POETRY. See SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY.

COLON (Gr. "limb"). A colon may be composed of a number of feet or metra or else may be a single sequence which cannot be thus analyzed. As a metrical phrase it should not exceed 16, 18, or 25 morae in, respectively, isomeric, diplastic, and hemiolic genres (where the constituent feet can be classified as divisible into parts in the respective proportions of 1:1, 1:2, and 2:3 morae). In Gr. lyric verse cola may be combined into a periodos or subordinate period, but colometry (i.e., their identification within a passage) is not always easy to decide. —Kolář; Dale; Koster. R.J.G.

COMEDIA DE CAPA Y ESPADA. A play of intrigue, very popular during the Sp. Golden Age, that elaborates upon the life of the lower aristocracy or of the upper middle class and takes its name from the cloak (capa) and sword (espada) that were part of the street costume of these classes. The plot is usually centered on the obstacles which chance or society create to the marriage of one or two couples, and the obstacles are overcome at the end. A comic level is provided by a parallel situation that arises among servants and also ends happily in marriage. The plot is often complicated by disguises, mistaken identities, and misunderstandings. Although the origin of the comedia . . . may be seen in the Comedia Ymeneia (1517) by Torres Naharro, the great masters of this dramatic form are Lope de Vega (1562–1635) and Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1600–81). The comedia . . . , like all other plays of the Sp. Golden Age, is in verse. Lope de Vega in his Arte nuevo de hacer comedias (1609) gives advice (which he did not always heed himself) on the type of verse to be used for each dramatic situation: décimas (q.v.) for sad scenes, romance (q.v.) for narration, redondillas (q.v.) for love scenes, and sonnets and tercets for grave and serious matters.—R. Schevill, The Dramatic Art of Lope de Vega (1918); M. Menéndez y Pelayo, Estudios sobre el teatro de

Lope de Vega (7 v., 1919–27); A. Valbuena-Prat, Calderón (1941). R.MI.

COMEDY. Homer's Odysseus affords us in some respects the first of the ancient prototypes for c. His characteristics are in many ways the opposite of those we associate with protagonists in tragedy. Clever, flexible, resourceful, when confronted with a serious challenge or obstacle, Odysseus applies his wits to good effect or nimbly gets out of the way. He is never at a loss; he can extricate himself from the tightest scrapes, and his shrewdness renders him, like many clever gentlemen among his successors, the object of some suspicion. Indeed, the Eng. word most frequently used to describe him is "wily," suggesting perhaps the faintly or clearly disreputable qualities often associated with many of the greatest figures of c. Nevertheless, the amiability and energy of Odysseus, and of later figures with his temperament more properly called "comic," are attractive to other characters and to listeners and readers alike. Comic characters of this type always seem to be freer than we are, partly able to ignore or transcend ordinary relationships between people and events. The predicaments in which they find themselves seem to be, if anything, tests of their quick-wittedness, and not necessarily, as in tragedy, means for exhibiting their characters. The problems they face are usually worked out on the level of action rather than of abstract thought. Their minds are strictly empirical. They believe in what they can touch, see, and understand, and in preserving—not too pompously—their sense of dignity and, above all, their lives. The varieties of comic character, however, may be even greater than those of tragic. Characters of a kind very different from these sketched here—those who are startled, baffled, or defeated by everything, who mistake the nature of everything they see, who respond to the world in exaggerated, uncontrolled, inflexible, or irrational ways, or who are predictable as simple animals or machines—are equally interesting comic types, in a tradition at least as old as Aristophanes. We often laugh at the comic eccentric (odd in mind or body), the butt, gull, zany, pantaloone, braggart, and clown because they seem to cut a more ridiculous figure than we. But we may also laugh with or at the rogue, trickster, wit, or the court fool of earlier drama because they outsmart or outmaneuver the world that we find so troublesome. We may suspend judgment about their morality because of our delight in their freedom.

From Aristotle's few extant remarks on the nature of c. to the writings of Freud and Bergson and beyond, valuable insights have illuminated the subject from very diverse points of view. Theories of comedy discriminate with difficulty between work of art and the feelings of audience or reader, antic clown and laughing observer, object and subject. Two of the principal "stimulus" theories—one pointing out our satisfaction in feelings of superiority and the other our perceptions of contrast in c. or sense of sudden disappointment—attempt to bring object and subject into a relationship with one another. The theory of superiority, developed by Hobbes, Bergson, Meredith and others, emphasizes our delight in seeing ourselves less unfortunate than some human beings; that of contrast, developed by Aristotle, Kant, Schopenhauer, and others, emphasizes our delight in any form of incongruity, any difference between our ideas of things and things themselves: what ought to be as opposed to what actually is. The former, now the principal theory, often emphasized our feelings of derision or need to degrade. The two are often combined, and neither perhaps fully accounts for the laughter of the holiday spirit. A fusion of sympathy and laughter is possibly the most pervasive kind in c., in which there is a union between mocker and mocked, and in which art holds the mirror, however exaggerated, up to our own natures. Other, but related theories of c. often stress an element of triumph or liberty, and they take many specialized forms, emphasizing humor as aggression or as playfulness, the liberation of energy, the removal of inhibitions, or a return to childhood. Laughter can be construed as the sudden relief from tension, fear, or danger, the overcoming of tragedy, or as a failure of vital energy, the freezing of life in a stereotype or automatism. A comedy can involve our "thoughtful" laughter at the spectacle of the tensions between the sexes in society, or the simpler laughter associated with motor activity, or its suddenly being arrested. Much c. is conservative. It justifies, defends, or elevates us in relation to the oddity, the alien, the scapegoat. It enables us to surmount our doubts about those who are different by laughing them out of existence. But the implications of c. can also of course be profoundly revolutionary.

An author therefore seems to write c. for a wide variety of reasons—because he finds the entire spectacle of human life, or a small part of it, amusing or absurd, because he wishes to satirize, mock, scorn, or ridicule this spectacle, because he wishes to correct or reform it, because he feels that it cannot be corrected, because he wishes to caricature, parody, or burlesque it, to grace, embellish, or even to destroy it. And as listeners or readers we laugh when we perceive that the relationship of anyone to himself, to society and its conventions, to nature or natural law is very different from our own, or from what we pretend is true for ourselves. We laugh when established roles or patterns are altered, and someone behaves like a god, animal, an inanimate object, or like someone very different from himself. We may laugh "at" a comic character, in detachment or scorn, or we may feel somehow allied with him, and laugh "with" him, recognizing common human failings. Or we may even feel inferior to or uneasy about him, laughing in embarrassment or a kind of fear. Like most forms of the drama, c. is in part an art of juxtaposition—the tall and short, fat and thin, clever and dull, formal and informal, brave and cowardly, idealist and realist frequently occur together: Falstaff and Justice Shallow, Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, and so on.

If c. is related to our perceptions of incongruity, it follows that a congruity of meanings must be securely established first, before such perception can be possible. Patterns in society or in art must be generally acknowledged before varying or breaking them proves to be amusing. Thus most societies seem to develop clearly recognized traditions and conventions before their great artists turn to c. Both c. and tragedy present individuals in the context of groups, of society, or of human life generally. The individual's variation from the norm of thought or behavior is the source for much of the dramatic tension in both genres. But in c., unlike tragedy, this variation is without serious or fatal consequences; hence, in part, the feeling of exhilaration and release we derive from much c., Hobbes's "sudden glory." We are delighted to see persons acting stupidly, oddly, or recklessly with relative impunity, or to see the exceptional so freed from the "laws" governing everyday life that it elicits neither our disapproval nor our strong sympathy.

By and large, c. is a more secular and earth-bound form than tragedy. It concentrates upon the local, established, familiar, upon problem-solving, the probable rather than, as in tragedy, upon mystery or wonder. It usually emphasizes the middle range—neither pity nor terror, neither the sublime nor the extremely grotesque. The well-known commonplace—that c. is the expression of the man who thinks and tragedy of the man who feels—possesses this grain of truth: strong feeling is inimical to the experience of much c., the object of its mockery rather than the effect it seeks to induce. The norm in c. frequently lies in the group, in society, or in a social arbiter of some kind, and it is often suggested through the author's point of view or tone. Indeed, the arbiter is often clearly the author himself. The exceptional behavior of heroes, which in tragedy may be admirable or appalling, is laughable in c. In the latter the central virtues are not the ability to endure, courage, or heroic magnanimity, but the ability to adjust, common sense, and humility, or a clear-eyed sense of one's relationship to others. Inflexibility, obsession, vanity, or pride—all frequently allied with tragic grandeur—and hypocrisy or folly have always been the targets of c.

Relationships between plot, character, and action are usually very different in c. from what they are in tragedy. Events in c. frequently do not follow one another with the same sense of inevitability as they do in tragedy, and they do not seem to grow out of or in turn to shape character to the same degree. Indeed, as we have seen, it is the apparent dislocation of events in a series, the disruption of laws of cause and effect or other kinds of logical relationships, that gives the audience in c. its sense of freedom from everyday patterns. Plot or story is often of the essence in this genre. The comic writer tends to choose a rapidly moving plot or dialogue, affording him a diversity of surprises within an over-all unity. C. frequently gives the impression of exploring horizontally rather than vertically: it often suggests meaning in depth by a manipulation of elements on the surface. The writer of c. also tends to choose or to invent individuals with a dominant trait or traits—physical, mental, emotional, or moral—anything in appearance, character, behavior, or all three which will serve as an index to essential human nature. Much of the apparent ease with which comic situations can be manipulated derives from this necessity in c. for heightening and exaggerating. Thus style is of the utmost importance. This is not to imply, of course, that c. need be in any way superficial, in choice or treatment of subject matter or in effect. Indeed, the evocation of an entire world through revelation of a part is the goal of every art.

The imprecise terms we employ for the major types of c.—c. of humors or of character, of intrigue, of manners, of ideas; high c., sentimental, romantic, realistic, social, or fantastic c.; satire, farce, and so on—are scarcely adequate for distinguishing between the varieties of c. that may occur even within a single great play. And there are many comic forms and styles. Most c. falls somewhere in the range between "high" or "pure" c. (presenting a world of uniform tone in which virtually no one is exempt from comic treatment) and mixed forms, such as romantic c., problem c., or tragicomedy. The poetic language of c. is as various as the range of man's comic attitudes, forms, and purposes—from the rich exuberance of Aristophanes, Plautus, or Lope to the more formal manner of Restoration c. Clearly the poetry of an author who wishes to comment significantly upon life will be composed as carefully as that in tragedy. A relatively small part of the world's humorous, witty, or satiric writing in verse occurs in dramatic form, and the following brief survey will be concerned only with major dramatists of the West.

Though it has since Aristotle frequently been considered an inferior form, c. can be the vehicle for insights as profound as those of tragedy. On the highest level, furthermore, it is as rare as tragedy, perhaps even rarer. Much of the great poetic c. of the Western world appears approximately in the same periods as its great tragedy—in the 5th and 4th c. B.C. in Greece and in Europe in the 16th and 17th c. Greek c. was from the beginning associated with the worship of Dionysos, with the komos or revel, and emphasized a chorus, often fantastically garbed as animals. As it developed, its emphasis shifted from a concern with gods, to heroes, to mortal men. At the head of c. stands Aristophanes (448?–380 B.C.), whose plays show great variety, verbal brilliance, and daring, and who wished to reconcile man to the world he inhabits and yet to save Athens from impending doom. He is the master of an art in which poetry, dance, and drama form a unity, and which combines vigorous mockery or satire of contemporary customs and living persons—social, political, and literary—with a series of fantastic plots and characters. Few writers of c. have ever profited as has Aristophanes from so much freedom, and Middle C., which began to emphasize escape from trouble through fantasy, produced no successors whose work has survived. It is the New C. of Menander (343?–291 B.C.) which has exercised the greatest influence over later writers. In this c., in which the first fairly complete play, the Dyskolos, has recently been discovered, the emphasis is social rather than political, the chorus is less important, and young love is the theme. Frequently a slave or parasite enables a young man to win his girl, over opposition, and the slave is then given his freedom. This is a c. of manners, employing domestic situations and frequently mythological themes. Menander's plots, his stock types of character, and his comic attitudes are adapted or taken over in detail by the only other writers of verse c. in the ancient world of whom we have adequate record, the Romans Plautus (254?–184 B.C.) and Terence (190–159 B.C.). Here too, the theme is the difficulties confronting young love, and many of the stock types of character are the opponents of the lovers—the wealthy rival, the slave merchant, and the old parents. The lively figures and situations in the c. of these poets serve in turn as patterns for much of the subsequent c. in Europe written up through the Renaissance and beyond. Apart from a few academic exercises, very little dramatic c. is produced in the Middle Ages, though the medieval farce and interlude are frequently lively forms. The word "c." comes to be applied to any narrative or poem with a happy ending, as in Dante's Divine Comedy. With the Renaissance, the word is restored to the theatre, and a distinction of Aristotle's remains generally applicable: tragedy attempts to depict persons who are "better" than we are; c., those who are "worse."

The burst of great c. in the Renaissance is richly indebted to the perennial c. of the folk and of traveling entertainers, as Gr. c. is to the Megarean farce and Roman to the mime. But the rediscovery of and renewed interest in the classics are paramount in giving the new men of the theater a sense for drama as a literary form, with act and scene divisions and a highly organized structure. In Spain the prolific and versatile Lope de Vega (1562-1635) and the graver Calderón (1600-1681) and other gifted writers produce a brilliant variety of verse comedies, both romantic and realistic, chiefly on the usual Sp. themes of love and its intrigues and honor and its defense. Their plays, few of them what we would call "pure" comedies, employ many different styles and meters and soon furnish the dramatists of northern Europe with countless clever plots and with vivid types of character. The precept and example of Italy prove to be equally exciting for northern playwrights. Though few It. comedies achieve the stature of those in other countries, the It. store of folk and literary tales and the professional and popular theater developed in the 16th and 17th c., the commedia dell'arte, are enormously influential. The commedia is a c. of improvisation, in which a few stock types of character—Harlequin, Columbine, Pantaloon, the Doctor, Punch, and the braggart captain—invent dialogue and action according to a few basic types of plot, often derived from antiquity. Its fullest flowering can be seen in the later It. comedies of Goldoni (1707-93) and the Fr. c. of Marivaux (1688-1763).

From the verse c. of Shakespeare (1564-1616) and Ben Jonson (1573-1637) to the prose c. of Bernard Shaw (1856-1950), the Eng. theater is distinguished by a remarkable number of comic writers. The romantic c. of Shakespeare and some of his contemporaries and the c. of humors (of types or idiosyncrasies) of Jonson suggest from the outset two dominant directions which later comic writers will take: a c. which revolves about love and marriage and which frequently employs nature and its rhythms as central to both dramatic structure and theme, and a more "classical" c. which satirizes hypocrisy, eccentricity, manners, and morals, and which is predominantly urban. In the development of later comedies of intrigue and manners, many writers adopt elements from both of these forms. As in Volpone and The Alchemist, few of Jonson's characters, following ancient example, are exempt from comic treatment. These plays exhibit a uniform tone and great vitality, and are built around a central image or theme. Shakespeare's comedies usually exhibit a central character, frequently a woman, who partly directs, tests, illumines, and transforms those around her. The particular balance between the wit and humor of Shakespeare's verse and the earnestness of his preoccupation with the mystery of the seasons, with birth and death, loss and restoration, sickness and healing, is rare in the history of c. The poetic elements of this c. are very similar, however, to those of many of Shakespeare's Eng. contemporaries: an alternation between rhymed verse, blank verse, and even prose, many songs, and an experimenting with all kinds of comic tone—from the merry "Roman" farce of The Comedy of Errors, through the witty lyricism of As You Like It and the bitter probing of the problem c., Troilus and Cressida, to the serenity of the last romances (The Tempest).

The great age for nondramatic comic verse in England (if we exclude a few great figures like Chaucer) extends from about the first quarter of the 17th c. to about the middle of the 18th. Much of the comic verse of this period is witty, ironic, or satiric, and it is often characterized by rather strict forms, direct (or disguised) reference to persons still alive, and a subtle and precise adjustment of the tone and texture of a poem to the character of the person or occasion for which it is written. Poets as different as Marvell, Dryden, and Pope, writing in or near an age of great comic drama, command many of the resources of dramatic dialogue. A similar mastery of tone and style is achieved by the writers of Restoration stage c. Congreve and his fellows write a series of glittering comedies of manners, but the language of dramatic c. is now chiefly prose. Similarly, after the Restoration, most of the greatest writers of c. turn toward nondramatic poetry (Pope or Byron) or, in ever greater numbers, toward prose (Swift, Fielding, Sterne, Jane Austen, Dickens, and so on). The only comic dramatists (whose works are still performed today) of the 18th (Goldsmith and Sheridan) and later 19th c. (Wilde) also write almost wholly in prose. In the 20th c., Yeats, Synge, Eliot and others have written comic dramas in poetry, or something like poetry, with varying degrees of success.

The greatest writer of c. in France, Molière (1622-73), is also, like Aristophanes or Shakespeare, one of his country's greatest poets. In both prose and verse, he writes a c. of situation, of intrigue, of manners, and of character (almost of humors), in a variety of modes that range from farce, which he revived, through comédie-ballet to something near tragedy. Inheriting the "masks" of It., Sp., and early Fr. c., he turned them into fascinating characters. His plays do not primarily concern love or the exploring or refining of attitudes toward it, as in Shakespeare. They revolve, as in Tartuffe, Le Misanthrope, and Les Femmes Savantes, around basic human frailties or obsessions, like exaggerated purity, avarice, hypocrisy, snobbery, or pride. Though written in part for an aristocratic audience, Molière's twenty-two c. are universal, based as they are upon native Fr. tradition (folk play, farce, and sottie), classical example, and the commedia dell' arte. Many of his verse lines, like Shakespeare's in Eng., have sunk deeply into the fiber of the language. Molière's great contemporary, Corneille, also writes c., similar to the Sp. c. of intrigue (Le Menteur). Comic styles in Fr. throughout the 18th and 19th c. vary greatly—c. of manners, and moralizing, sentimental, romantic, and realistic c. But even the most interesting of the later writers—Marivaux, Beaumarchais, de Musset, and so on—in France as in other countries, write primarily in prose. Since c. now takes many lesser forms—farce, tearful c. and operetta—the marvelous balance of elements in the c. of Molière and other writers of his century is weakened. This is not to imply, of course, that writers of the later 19th and the 20th c. in all countries have ceased to entertain, characterize, or satirize the world. Ibsen (writing partly in verse) in Norway, Chekhov in Russia, Shaw in England, Pirandello in Italy, Giraudoux and Anouilh in France, Brecht (partly in verse) in Germany, and many more recent writers (such as Beckett and Ionesco) have written prose c. of ideas, of social conditions, of manners, of fantasy, and many other forms which will probably rank with the comic writing of the last hundred years in the short story or the novel. And during the last 200 years, in an allied form of theatre, a series of composers with a genius for c., from Mozart through Rossini, Verdi, and beyond, have produced a number of brilliant comic operas.

G. Meredith, An Essay on C. and the Uses of the Comic Spirit (1877); H. L. Bergson, Laughter (1912); F. M. Cornford, The Origin of Attic C. (1914); S. Freud, Wit and its Relation to the Unconscious (1916); W. Smith, The Nature of C. (1930); G. Norwood, Gr. C. (1931); K. M. Lea, It. Popular C. (2 v., 1934); J. Feibleman, In Praise of C. (1939); H.T.E. Perry, Masters of Dramatic C. and their Social Themes (1939); E. E. Stoll, Shakespeare and Other Masters (1940); P. A. Chapman, The Spirit of Molière (1940); M. Turnell, The Cl. Moment (1947); L. J. Potts, C. (1948); A.

Koestler, Insight and Outlook (1949); D. H. Monro, Argument of Laughter (1951); G. E. Duckworth, The Nature of Roman C. (1952); L. Kronenberger, The Thread of Laughter (1952); A. Rapp, The Origins of Wit and Humor (1952); Eng. Stage C., ed. W. K. Wimsatt, Jr. (1954); H.D.F. Kitto, Form and Meaning in Drama (1956); W. Sypher, C. (1956); Frye; P. A. Arnott, An Introduction to the Gr. Theatre (1959); C. L. Barber, Shakespeare's Festive C. (1959); M. T. Herrick, It. C. in the Renaissance (1960); M. C. Swabey, Comic Laughter (1961); A. Nicoll, The World of Harlequin (1963).
R.J.D.

COMEDY OF HUMORS. The comedy of humors was an outgrowth of the Renaissance stress on decorum in life which required a well-balanced personality unmarked by any grave eccentricities. The concept of humors was derived from a traditional theory of physiology in which the state of health—and by extension the state of mind, of character—depended upon a balance among the four elemental fluids: black and yellow bile, blood, and phlegm. Though perhaps first applied to drama by Chapman, the notion, by then largely analogical or figurative, was seized and fully developed into a theory of comedy by Ben Jonson, whose bent toward a satiric and normative drama is clearly shown in his first play, Everyman in His Humour (1598). In this and subsequent plays, such as The Silent Woman (1609) or The Alchemist (1610) Jonson parades before his audience a variety of eccentrics, each marked by some particular bias of character, some folly or meanness—short, however, of crime—which prevents his being satisfactorily human. Hence Jonson's humors comedy is closely related both to comedy of character, since he deals with peculiarity of character as a root of action, and to comedy of manners, since he goes to contemporary society for his norm. Though he had ardent followers in later generations—Shadwell, even Congreve, in the drama, Smollett and Dickens in the novel—this type of comedy is usually associated in literary history with Jonson and his times. Obviously Jonson used the term humor in a far more restricted sense than we do today when it can mean a great many things.—F. E. Schelling, Elizabethan Drama 1558-1642 (1910); Ben Jonson, Works, ed. C. H. Herford and P. and E. Simpson (11 v., 1925-54); P. V. Kreider, Elizabethan Comic Character Conventions as Revealed in the Comedies of George Chapman (1935); H. L. Snuggs, "The Comic Humours: a New Interpretation," PMLA, 62 (1947); Nicoll; J. J. Enck, Jonson and the Comic Truth (1957).
L.H.

COMMON RHYTHM. See RUNNING RHYTHM.

COMPARATIVE CRITICISM

COMPARATIVE CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

COMPENSATION. One of several devices used to schematize a basically irregular foot or line (see METRICAL VARIATIONS). A pause (see REST) is sometimes said to substitute (or compensate) for a missing part of a foot or a whole foot. This is one of two main varieties of c. The other kind occurs when an extra syllable in one foot may be said to compensate for a missing syllable in another, or when a missing metrical unit in one line may be compensated for by an extra unit in an adjacent line.—Baum; Deutsch. R.BE.

COMPLAINT. A plaintive poem, plaint. (1) Often the c. of a lover to or about an unresponsive mistress (cf. Greek Anthology, Villon, Surrey's A Complaint by Night of the Lover Not Beloved); (2) a plaint in which the poet seeks relief from his unhappy state (Chaucer's A Complaint unto Pity); (3) a plaint about the sorrows of the world or the poet's affairs (Spenser's Complaints); (4) less frequently a c. in a lighter vein about some trivial subject (Chaucer's The Complaint of Chaucer to his Purse). Usually the poem is in the form of a monologue in which the poet explains the cause of his sorrow and pleads for a remedy. Ponsonby, the printer, claims Spenser's complaints are more serious than usual, that the book is composed of "all complaints and meditations of the worlds vanitie, verie graue and profitable." Dr. Johnson disliked the form, saying that Cowley's ode, The Complaint, "seems to have excited more contempt than pity." Sometimes a mournful c. is indistinguishable from a lament (q.v.).—J. Peter, C. and Satire in Early Eng. Lit. (1956). R.O.E.

COMPLEXIO. See ANADIPLOSIS.

COMPOSITE VERSES. Verses composed of feet of different kinds, e.g., dactylo-trochaic. See also episyntheton. K.M.A.

CONCEIT. An intricate or far-fetched metaphor, which functions through arousing feelings of surprise, shock, or amusement; in earlier usage, the imagination or fancy (qq.v.) in general. The term is derived from the It. concetto (concept), and all types of conceit share an origin which is specifically intellectual rather than sensuous. The poet compares elements which seem to have little or nothing in common, or juxtaposes images which establish a marked discord in mood. One may distinguish two types of c.: (1) the Petrarchan, in which physical qualities or experiences are metaphorically described in terms of very different physical objects; it often verges on hyperbole (q.v.):

Quando a gli ardenti rai neve divegno
When I turn to snow before your burning rays. . .
(Petrarch, Canzone 8)

(2) the "metaphysical," in which the spiritual qualities or functions of the described entity are presented by means of a vehicle which shares no physical features with the entity:

As lines, so loves, oblique may well
Themselves in every angle greet;
But ours, so truly parallel,
Though infinite, can never meet.
(Marvell, The Definition of Love)

The Petrarchan type, valid for its originator and the more gifted of his followers because of the rich psychological content it often implies, degenerated ultimately into the fanciful and decorative figures of marinism (q.v.), but it was widely employed by the Elizabethan sonneteers and by Tasso. The metaphysical type, so-called from its use by the metaphysical poets (see METAPHYSICAL POETRY), was characteristic not only of Donne and his followers in 17th-c. England and their contemporaries on the Continent, but also of the Fr. symbolists in the latter 19th c. It has been widely used by contemporary poets.

The metaphysical c. is usually intended in critical discussions of the c. Within this type of c. one may perceive two general forms: (1) the extended, in which the initial analogy is subjected to a detailed and ingenious development, as in Donne's famous figure from A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning:

If they be two, they are two so
As stiff twin compasses are two;
Thy soul, the fixed foot, makes no show
To move, but doth, if th' other do . . .

(2) the condensed, in which the ingenious analogy or discordant contrast is expressed with a telling brevity, as at the opening of T. S. Eliot's The Love-Song of J. Alfred Prufrock:

When the evening is spread out against the sky
Like a patient etherised upon a table.

The lines of Eliot will serve to typify two important aspects of the c.: its subtle use of controlled connotation to enrich the meaning of the poem, with the associated dependence on the imaginative sensitivity of the reader, and its consistent evocation of paradox (q.v.).

The faculty of wit (q.v.), the capacity for finding likenesses between the apparently unlike, is central to the c., and the presence of this faculty largely determines the success of a given c. For the emotion evoked by a good c.

is not simply surprise, or, in Dr. Johnson's terms, wonder at the perversity which created the c., but rather a surprised recognition of the ultimate validity of the relationship presented in the c., which thus serves not as an ornament but as an instrument of vision.

R. M. Alden, "The Lyrical C. of the Elizabethans," sp, 14 (1917) and "The Lyrical Conceits of the Metaphysical Poets," sp, 17 (1920); K. M. Lea, "Conceits," MLR, 20 (1925); E. Holmes, Aspects of Elizabethan Imagery (1929); G. Williamson, The Donne Tradition (1930); C. Brooks, "A Note on Symbol and C.," Am. Review, 3 (1934); M. Praz, Studies in 17th-C. Imagery, 1 (1939); G. R. Potter, "Protest against the Term C.," pq, 20 (1941); Tuve; T. E. May, "Gracián's Idea of the 'Concepto,'" HR, 18 (1950); J. A. Mazzeo, "A Critique of Some Modern Theories of Metaphysical Poetry," MP, 50 (1952); D. L. Guss, "Donne's C. and Petrarchan Wit," PMLA, 78 (1963). F.J.W.; A.P.

CONCEPTISM. See CULTISM.

CONCRETE AND ABSTRACT. In poetics concreteness has usually been valued and abstractness decried. Sidney in The Defense of Poesie (1583) exalted poetry above philosophy because of poetry's greater concreteness. Later neoclassical doctrine shifted to a distinction between generality and particularity, and in keeping with the neoclassical interpretation of nature preferred generality. Sir Joshua Reynolds's conception of the ideal is literally an abstraction of chosen qualities, and Dr. Johnson praised Shakespeare for the generality of his characterizations. The preference for concreteness reappears with romanticism, in Wordsworth's and Coleridge's attacks upon stock poetic diction and abstract personifications and in Shelley's reinforcement of Sidney in his Defence of Poetry with a new theory of metaphor and an enlarged conception of poetry's function ("We want the power to imagine that which we know"). Keats's "Axioms in philosophy are not axioms until they are proved upon our pulses" is his characteristic phrasing of the general romantic distrust of the "understanding," or abstract reason.

In the 20th c. the distinction between the concrete and the abstract has been turned against the romantics, chiefly because modern poets and critics have suspected the romantics of smuggling in scientific and philosophic statement disguised as poetry. Ezra Pound (in his early days), T. E. Hulme, and the imagists tried before 1920 to formulate a wholly concrete poetry of things uncontaminated by idea and statement. The imagists oversimplified the problem, but their position was refined and strengthened by T. S. Eliot, whose famous "objective correlative" (q.v.) is a blow for concreteness, by John Crowe Ransom, who found in The World's Body that "the rich, contingent materiality of things" is poetry's proper matter, by I. A. Richards and, after him, Cleanth Brooks and others, who condemned "exclusive poetry" and the poetry of statement in favor of inclusiveness and the poetry of metaphor and indirection. During the 20th c. the distinction has been no longer, as it was in Sidney, between the abstractness of philosophy and the concreteness of poetry, but between the abstraction which science uses as its weapon and the disinterested concreteness and wholeness of poetic contemplation.—O. Barfield, Poetic Diction (1928); J. C. Ransom, The World's Body (1938); C. Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn (1947); R. H. Fogle, The Imagery of Keats and Shelley (1949; ch. 5); Wimsatt. R.H.F.

CONCRETE UNIVERSAL, the term and in part the concept, has come to literary criticism from idealist philosophy. Hegel proposed his theory of the c.u. as a solution to the ancient philosophical problem concerning the nature and reality of universals. Later idealists regarded this theory as revolutionizing the study of logic and metaphysics and, like Hegel, drew out its implications for ethics, politics, and aesthetics. In the works of these philosophers the c.u. (or organic universal) is opposed to the abstract universals, or general ideas, of science and Aristotelian logic. Abstract universals, whether they be concepts of attributes ("blue," "round") or of syntheses of attributes ("dog," "man"), are only mental creations and, as such, have no "real" existence. Philosophy must go beyond the abstract universals of science and be oriented to the study of the "individual," the "true" or "concrete" universal. The criteria for determining whether or not an object is a c.u. are diversity of parts, interrelatedness of parts, completeness, unity, independence, and self-maintenance. In terms of these criteria, the only true c.u. is the "Absolute" or "World Whole"; but the phrase is also used in a secondary sense to denote microcosms within this macrocosm. A human being, a work of art, or an integrated society would be examples of such "finite" concrete universals.

J. C. Ransom has long been an opponent of holistic theories in aesthetics and literary criticism. In the 1930's and 1940's he repeatedly attacked the idealist notion of the c.u. and the more recent versions of holistic theory expressed in the terminology of "organic whole," "functional unity," "fusion," or "funding." In Ransom's opinion, to call a poem a c.u. is either to state a "gaudy paradox" or to class it with the products of applied science ("Art Needs a Little Separating," p. 121). Ransom's model for the c.u. is a complex machine in which each part has significance and justification only as it works with the other parts to achieve the purpose for which the machine was designed. A natural object is not a c.u. in this sense; it always exhibits characteristics which are "irrelevant" in terms of human conceptions of order and purpose. Poetry (and literature generally) arises from the human desire to contemplate, love, and enjoy the confused multitudinous particularity of nature for its own sake. Hence holistic structure in poetry, which would necessarily impose a "rational order" on the objects imitated, would prevent the satisfaction of this desire. An analysis of a good poem will indeed show the presence of a "logical structure" or "argument" that provides a skeletal organization for the poem and may be interesting or valuable in itself; but it will also show the presence of irrelevant "local details" which reflect the particularity of nature and which cannot be fitted into or assimilated by the logical structure. Should analysis show that the local details in a poem are being used only to support, illustrate, or express the argument, the poem may justly be called a c.u., but it then becomes a species of what Ransom has called "Platonic poetry"—discourse "which is really science but masquerades as poetry by affecting a concern for physical objects" (The World's Body, pp. 121-22).

The holistic connotation of "c.u." which made Ransom view the term with suspicion, has made it an attractive term for other modern critics who argue that a work of literature should be regarded as an organic unity from which nothing can be subtracted and to which nothing can be added without detriment to the whole. W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., in his article "The Structure of the 'Concrete Universal' in Literature" (1947), formally proposed "c.u." as a key term for a holistic poetics which would be "objective and absolute" (p. 279). He classifies as a c.u. any natural or artificial object which exhibits "organized heterogeneity" of a complexity sufficiently great to make it seem "in the highest degree individual" (ibid., pp. 270-72). In poetics he recommends that the term be used to denote not only the poem as a whole but also any of its distinguishable parts, such as characters or metaphors, which may be considered as small wholes within the larger whole. Perhaps the chief reason for Wimsatt's preference for "c.u." is that it provides him with a pair of polar terms which suggest the structure of the organic unity of the poem. He regards a work of literature as discourse which expresses a "meaning," "value," "idea," "concept," or "abstraction" (the universal) by means of the specific details (the concrete) which constitute the matter of the poem. Thus the meaning is the form or unifying principle; and the poem is an organic unity if the characters, actions, metrical devices, words, and metaphors combine to body forth this universal. Furthermore, the concrete is the only possible means for expressing the universal, which (in a good poem) is so subtle and individual that ordinary language cannot provide a substantive class name for it. For example, the unique feeling of surprise which receives its formulation in Keats's On First Looking into Chapman's Homer can be conveyed only by the sequence of the particular metaphors which appear in the poem.

Wimsatt accepts this theory of the structure of the c.u. in literature because it can be used successfully for the analysis and evaluation of poetry and because the history of literary and aesthetic criticism shows that critics have been preoccupied with an opposition in which one extreme is called "universal," "general," or "abstract," and the other "particular," "individual," or "concrete." Critics have used this opposition to define poetry, to determine its subject matter and structure, and to generate principles for evaluation. It has been incorporated in critical dicta like the following: poetry "tends to express the universal, history the particular" (Aristotle); the poet "coupleth the general notion with the particular example" (Sidney); "The business of a poet is to examine, not the individual, but the species" (Johnson); the object of poetry is "truth, not individual and local, but general, and operative" (Wordsworth); Shakespeare had "the universal, which is potentially in each particular, opened out to him" (Coleridge); "All sensuous and concrete ideas, even abstract thought-sequences as embodied in a whole of individual and typical import, can be the material of this [penetrative] imagination, and therefore it enters into and is operative in all recognition and production of the beautiful" (Bosanquet). The recurrence of this opposition suggests that the concepts of "concrete" and "universal" must both appear in any acceptable theory of the nature and structure of poetry. Wimsatt says that modern criticism, especially that of Empson, Brooks, Blackmur, and Tate, has finally formulated correctly the doctrine which had been adumbrated in earlier critical writings.

Ransom took the occasion of the republication of Wimsatt's article in The Verbal Icon for a fresh restatement of his poetics and his arguments against "Hegelianism." In the past he had made frequent attempts to distinguish the different elements or components which are found in poetry and to state their relationship. He had spoken of "contingents" and "constants"; "thing" and "idea"; "local texture" and "logical structure"; "particularity" and "universality." Regardless of how he had named the components, he had always looked upon a poem as an "aggregate" in which several different interests are loosely combined. He is now willing to accept "c.u." as a term designating the components if a "Kantian," rather than "Hegelian," relationship between them is allowed (that is, if the term can be used in a nonholistic sense).

CONNOTATION AND DENOTATION

The preceding discussion suggests that in modern criticism "c.u." is an ambiguous term naming a variety of concepts. It functions as both a descriptive and an evaluative term, carrying the recommendation that of the objects which have in the past been denoted by the term "poetry" only those which also fall into the genus "c.u." are to be considered "true" poems or "good" poems. "C.u." should be useful to critics who wish to defend one of the following positions (or some combination of these): (1) that a poem or other literary work should (or should not) be an organic whole; (2) that a poem should be both a concrete object and a universal object; (3) that the elements found in poems may be exhaustively classified into those which are concrete and those which are universal and that a certain proportion or relationship should be maintained between these two sets of elements; or (4) that poetry is a peculiar use of language that "fuses" the concrete and the universal, or "reveals" the universal "hidden" in the concrete, or expresses a universal theme, meaning, or archetype (by way of the concrete of allegory, example, symbol, or metaphor) which could not receive as precise or as effective a statement in any other way. Because of the notorious vagueness and ambiguity of "concrete" and "universal" (Wimsatt and Brooks list nine different meanings for "universal" in their Literary Criticism: A Short History, pp. 331-33), varying concepts of the c.u. can also be developed within any one of these four broad positions. Some objection may be raised to the substitution of "c.u." (in its holistic sense) for "unity in variety" or "organic whole." In spite of Ransom, holism dominates modern literary theory and aesthetics and will presumably continue to do so. However, some holistic critics may argue that "c.u." begs the question with respect to the structure of the organic unity which is (or ought to be) present in literary works.

J. Royce, The Spirit of Modern Philosophy (1892; especially pp. 222-27, 492-506); B. Bosanquet, The Principle of Individuality and Value (1912); F. H. Bradley, The Principles of Logic (2d ed., 1922); J. C. Ransom, The World's Body (1938), "Crit. as Pure Speculation," The Intent of the Critic, ed. D. A. Stauffer (1941), "Art Needs a Little Separating," KR, 6 (1944), "Art Worries the Naturalists," KR, 7 (1945), and "The C.U.," KR, 16 (1954), 17 (1955); W. K.

Wimsatt, Jr., "The Structure of the 'C.U.' in Lit.," PMLA, 62 (1947) and The Verbal Icon (1954); Wheelwright; Wimsatt and Brooks. F.G.

CONDUPLICATION. See ANADIPLOSIS.

CONNECTICUT WITS. See AMERICAN POETRY.

CONNOTATION AND DENOTATION. Contemporary critics who have concerned themselves with the "multi-dimensionalism" of language and who advocate that poets should exploit the full resources of language have found the terms "c." and "d." useful to mark distinctions among these resources. These terms are usually applied only to words, and d. almost always signifies the intension and/or extension of a word; however, c. names a variety of concepts.

C. has been used to designate any or all of the responses which a word in a particular context disposes a reader to make other than his recognition of its denotative meaning. Thus c. may be (1) any sensory or emotional response; (2) any cognitive response which is a consequence of suggestion, association, or inference, or of the look, spelling, or sound of a word, or of some device such as Empsonian ambiguity or the symbolic use of a word. Most critics, however, prefer to call such responses the result of the "extralogical" dispositions of words, and use c. as a name for one of these dispositions.

M. C. Beardsley (in his Aesthetics, pp. 125-126; see also pp. 116-124, 149-151) has proposed the following terminology: the "signification" of a term is the sum total of its "conceptual" or "cognitive" meaning; the "denotation" is the referent it points to; the "designation" is the set of characteristics that the referent must have to be correctly denoted by that term; and the "connotation" is the "secondary" or "accompanying" meaning. (Empson's "Implication" is another name for such secondary meaning.) Connotative meanings are also characteristics of the referent: "What a word connotes . . . are the characteristics that it does not designate but that belong, or are widely thought or said to belong, to many of the things it denotes" (ibid., p. 125. "Characteristic" is interpreted broadly and includes the effects, uses, etc. of the referent. Beardsley should have added that sometimes some of the most important connotations are characteristics that a speech-community thinks a referent ought to have). Beardsley says that the connotations of a term are just as "objective" as its designation, and are to be distinguished from "personal associations" which have little value for the explication of poetry. In literature the connotations of a word are "liberated," especially by the power of metaphor, and the explication of metaphor consists in listing the connotations of the "modifier" that may appropriately be attributed to the "subject."

The value of c. depends on the value of the effects the poet can produce by its use. C. has been praised as one of the means by which poetic language achieves depth, density, thickness, richness, and condensation. Enthusiastic critics have said that the meanings of great poems are infinite and hence inexhaustible. But tastes differ; and although some latent or hidden meaning is present (or can be discovered) in all poetry, even the humblest (see Beardsley's interpretation of Little Jack Horner, ibid., p. 405), the recommendations of critics and the practice of poets show no uniformity with respect to the amount of c. and other implicit meaning that is desirable in an imaginative work (see Bateson and Tillyard). Certainly, "The more connotation, the better!" must not be irresponsibly urged; and, as has often been pointed out (see Sparrow, Tate, and Winters), neglect of d. in favor of c. leads to obscurity and incoherence or, at best, to a very limited range of poetic effects.

L. Abercrombie, The Theory of Poetry (1926); G. H. W. Rylands, Words and Poetry (1928); W. Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930, rev. ed. 1947), and The Structure of Complex Words (1951); F. W. Bateson, Eng. Poetry and the Eng. Language (1934); J. Sparrow, Sense and Poetry (1934); E. M. W. Tillyard, Poetry Direct and Oblique (1934); A. Tate, "Tension in Poetry," Reason in Madness (1935); Y. Winters, "Preliminary Problems," "John Crowe Ransom," The Anatomy of Nonsense (1943); C. Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn (1947); R. B. Heilman, "Preliminaries: Crit. Method," This Great Stage (1948); M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958); I. C. Hungerland, Poetic Discourse (1958). F.G.

CONSONANCE. Aside from the broader meaning of a pleasing combination of sounds or ideas, it is (1) the counterpart of assonance (q.v.) and refers to partial or total identity of consonants in words or syllables whose main vowels differ (e.g., pressed-past, shadow-meadow). For c. restricted to sounds following the main vowel, see NEAR RHYME. As a deliberate device to replace rhyme, rich (i.e., total) c. has been used in a number of poems by Wilfred Owen, e.g., "Has your soul sipped / Of the sweetness of all sweets? / Has it well supped / But yet hungers and sweats?" Such poems as his Strange Meeting are virtually entirely constructed with this type of impure rhyme, intended no doubt to convey the discordant anguish of war and death. (2) In Ir. poetry there is c. ("uaithe") between words when the corresponding vowels are of the same quantity, the corresponding consonants or consonant groups of the same class, and the final consonants of the same class and quality.—E. Rickert, New Methods for the Study of Lit. (1927); W. Owen, The Poems of W. Owen, ed. E. Blunden (1931); E. Knott, Ir. Syllabic Poetry 1200-1600 (2d ed., 1957). U.K.G.; S.L.M.

CONSTRUCTIVISTS. A group of young Soviet poets founded in 1924, including Ilya Selvinski, Vera Inber, and, as the group's theoretician, K. L. Zelinski. The c. declared that a poem should be a "construction," in which all images and devices should be directed toward the subject. Thus, a poem about war might employ a marching rhythm. This rigid aesthetic was never followed very literally, and the movement itself broke up around 1930.—"Konstruktivizm," Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, v (1931). W.E.H.

CONTE DÉVOT. A pious tale, in prose or verse, in the 13th and 14th c. It is distinct from the saint's life and from the moral tale. The most famous one is the Tombeor Nostre Dame, or Jongleur de Notre Dame, where a minstrel, whose only talent is dancing, performs before the image of Our Lady, to her approval. Such tales were undoubtedly inspired by the big collections known as the Vita Patrum and the Miracles Nostre Dame. Most of these contes are miracle tales, but not all. There is the Conte del'hermite et del jongleur. A holy hermit is told by an angel that his companion in heaven will be a minstrel. The hermit is disgusted and goes to the town marketplace. There he talks with a poor minstrel and hears his life story. Knowing that the poor man is better than he the hermit repents, and eventually the two are admitted to heaven together.—O. Schultz-Gora, Zwei altfranzösische Dichtungen (4th ed., 1919); E. Lommatzsch, Del Tumbleor Nostre Dame (1920). U.T.H.

CONTESTS, POETIC. See POETIC CONTESTS.

CONTRACTIONS. See POETIC CONTRACTIONS.

CONVENTION. By "c." is meant (1) "rule that, by implicit agreement between a writer and some of his readers (or of his audience) allows him certain freedoms in, and imposes certain restrictions upon, his treatment of style, structure, and theme and enables these readers to interpret his work correctly" or (2) "product of the observance of such a rule." The number of readers who are parties to the agreement (that is, who have knowledge of the c.) may be very small indeed; else a writer could never create a new c. (for example, free verse or sprung rhythm), revive an old (alliterative verse, in the 14th c. and, by Auden, in the 20th), or abandon an old (the heroic couplet). Readers who are not parties to the agreement (that is, who are ignorant of—or, at least, out of sympathy with—the c.) must to some extent misinterpret a work that exemplifies it; and, when the number of such readers becomes large, writers may abandon the c.—though, of course, works that exemplify it remain to be interpreted (or misinterpreted). The conventions of the pastoral elegy are instances of abandoned conventions; and Dr. Johnson is an instance of a reader who misinterprets a work (Lycidas) because he is ignorant of or out of sympathy with these conventions. Conventions both liberate and restrict the writer because they usually go in sets, because, therefore, a writer's decision to use a certain c. obliges him either to use certain others or to risk misleading his reader, and because the freedom given him by the set as a whole or by some of its parts may well be restricted by other parts. The conventions of the epic, for example, allow a writer to achieve the sublime but compel him to forgo the conversational idiom of the metaphysical lyric (and thus, of course, to risk, as Milton does, the censure of those modern critics who take the conventions of that lyric to be the conventions of all poetry). Some examples of conventions of style are the rhyme scheme of the sonnet and the diction of the ballad; of structure, beginning an epic in medias res and representing the subject of a pastoral elegy as a shepherd; and, of theme, the attitudes toward love in the Cavalier lyric and toward death in the Elizabethan lyric.

To break with conventions (or "rules") is sometimes thought a merit, sometimes a defect; but, merit or defect, such a break is never abandonment of all conventions but replacement of an old set with a new. Wordsworth condemns 18th-c. poetry for using poetic diction (Preface to the 2d edition of the Lyrical Ballads); F. R. Leavis condemns Georgian poetry for adhering to "nineteenth-century conventions of 'the poetical'" (New Bearings, p. 14). But—though conventions come and go and though we may regret the passing of the old or welcome the advent of the new—literature, new or old, cannot escape conventions.

Insistence upon the necessity of knowing what the conventions of a given work are (as in the criticism of E. E. Stoll) does not entail, as some theorists wrongly hold (for example, Wellek and Warren, Theory of Literature, pp. 32–33), either judgment of the work by the extent to which it conforms to the conventions of its genre or the "intentional fallacy" (or, if it entails the latter, then insistence upon the necessity of knowing the Elizabethan sense of, say, "passing"—as in "passing fair"—also entails that "fallacy"). The concept of genre nowadays is in some disrepute (or, more exactly, sets of conventions are looser than they used to be); but now as always a c. in Sense 1 is a rule of interpretation; and, to understand a given work, a reader must understand its conventions—not only its linguistic ones, but its more specifically literary ones of style, structure, and theme.

R. S. Crane proposes that the sense of "c." be restricted in such a way that "'convention' denotes any characteristic of the matter or technique of a poem the reason for the presence of which in the poem cannot be inferred from the necessities of the form envisaged but must be sought in the historical circumstances of its composition . . ." (The Languages of Criticism, p. 198, n. 62). In other words, those conventions that all works in a certain genre must, by definition, share are not (in Crane's sense) conventions. Thus he would not count an unhappy ending as a c. of tragedy but does count the chorus in Gr. tragedy as such. But he acknowledges that his proposed sense does not conform to modern usage of "c."—S. Johnson, Lives of the Eng. Poets (1779–81); W. Wordsworth, Preface to the Lyrical Ballads (2d ed., 1800); J. L. Lowes, C. and Revolt in Poetry (1922); E. E. Stoll, Poets and Playwrights (1930); F. R. Leavis, New Bearings in Eng. Poetry (1932); M. C. Bradbrook, Themes and Conventions of Elizabethan Tragedy (1935); Wellek and Warren; Crane. M.S.

CONVERSATION PIECES. The c. piece or poem is relaxed and informal, but serious. Like Horace's epistles and satires, from which it probably springs, it is a genre intermediate between poetry and prose—propriora sermoni, which in Coleridge's case Charles Lamb translated as "proper for a sermon." Not uncommon in the latter part of the 18th c., the c. poem is peculiarly a favorite with Wordsworth and Coleridge, doubtless because of its unique combination of unpretentiousness and depth, attributes given it by Cowper. Wordsworth's Expostulation and Reply and The Tables Turned are c. poems, though blank verse is the genre's most appropriate medium; the Lines Composed a Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey might be thought of as a c. piece which got out of hand and burst its bounds. Coleridge's Dejection: an Ode is another such, but as a Pindaric ode it does not quite correspond to the type. Coleridge, however, is the great practitioner of the c. piece in The Eolian Harp, This Limetree Bower My Prison, The Nightingale, To William Wordsworth, and a number of other poems. We have nothing quite like this genre today, but W. H. Auden and perhaps Theodore Roethke might be mentioned as poets who have written in its spirit.—G. M. Harper, "Coleridge's C. Poems," QR, 244 (1925); D. G. James, The Romantic Comedy (1948); R. H. Fogle, "Coleridge's C. Poems," TSE, 5 (1955). R.H.F.

COPLA. Since the Sp. term "c." often means simply stanza, it is necessary to specify the type, such as c. de arte mayor (see ARTE MAYOR) or c. de arte menor (see ARTE MENOR). The c. de pie quebrado, developed during the 14th and 15th c., is any variation of the c. de arte menor in which one or more lines have been reduced to half-length (4 syllables or their equivalent) and/or half-lines have been added. The most famous, though not the most common, has the rhyme scheme ABCABCDefDef and is often called c. (or estrofa) de Jorge Manrique, or c. manriqueña after the author of the famous Coplas por la muerte de su padre. The c. real (also called décima, décima falsa, estancia real, or quintilla doble) is an important 15th-c. variation of the c. de arte menor. It is a 10-line octosyllabic strophe, the equivalent of two quintillas, the two usually having different rhyme schemes. The c. real was widely used in the 16th c., but in the 17th gradually gave way in popularity to one of its late 16th-c. variations, the espinela. See also CANTAR.—F. Rodríguez Marín, El alma de Andaluía en sus mejores coplas amorosas (1929); D. C. Clarke, "The c. real" and "The 15th C. c. de pie quebrado," HR, 10 (1942); Navarro. D.C.C.

COQ-À-L'ÂNE. Name derived from an OF proverbial expression, "C'est bien sauté du coq à l'asne," which was, and still is, used to describe an incoherent manner of speaking or writing. The content of the genre is the satiric treatment of the vices, faults, and foibles of individuals, social groups, and even institutions. Clément Marot, who created the form in 1530, was the author of four coq-à-l'âne, all of them in the form of (generally) octosyllabic verse epistles of varying length.—J. du Bellay, Defense et Illustration de la Langue Françoyse, ed. H. Chamard (1904), pp. 218–21; C. E. Kinch, La Poésie Satirique de Clément Marot (1940); article by H. Chamard in Dictionnaire des Lettres Françaises: Le Seizième Siècle (1951). I.S.

CORNISH POETRY. The Corn. language, now extinct, belonged to the Brythonic or 'P'-Celtic group, but had closer affinities with Breton than with Welsh. It died out in the 18th c. Apart from one long narrative poem and five plays, all on religious topics, the literary remains are meager in the extreme. Although Cornwall must have supplied to medieval romance a good deal of the "Matter of Britain" in the extant Corn. literature, this rich vein is left unexploited. The earliest verse to survive is a fragment of 41 lines on a charter dated 1340, but the poem may have been copied on it some sixty years later and seems to be part of a lost play. The speaker is offering a lady in marriage and giving her advice based on Corn. folklore. The rhyme scheme is aabccb, with lines varying from 4 to 9 syllables. Pascon agan Arluth (The Passion of our Lord) is a narrative poem, consisting of 259 stanzas of 8 lines, each line of 7 syllables, trochaic, and the lines rhyme alternately. The earliest manuscript is mid-15th c. The theme is the fasting and temptation of Christ, followed by the story of Holy Week, based on Biblical and apocryphal sources.

The main interest of Corn. poetry lies in the plays. They were composed by men of learning but for a popular audience, and were performed in open-air theatres, the "plenys-angwary," spaces enclosed by circular banks of earth, now known as "rounds," some of which can still be seen, e.g., at St. Just and Perranzabuloe. Three of the plays, called the Ordinalia, form a sequence. These are the Origo Mundi (2,846 lines), based on Old Testament history and some incongruent legendary material, the Passio Domini (3,242 lines) recounting the life and death of Christ, and the Resurrectio Domini (2,646 lines) which has a greater accretion of legend including lives of saints and the death of Pilate. Rhythm is basically trochaic, but stress regularity is not meticulously observed. Rhymes are often stricter to the eye than to the ear, a sure sign of "learned" or "literary" composition. Full lines of 8 or 7 syllables can rhyme alternately, shorter lines or half-lines of 4 syllables can do likewise, and lines of varying or equal length within the same sequence or "stanza" can conform to aabccb or aabaab rhyme schemes. More intricate patterns also occur, but otherwise such metrical features as alliteration and internal rhyme are random and not woven into a strict pattern like Welsh cynghanedd (q.v.).

Beunans Meriasek (The Life of St. Meriasek, 4,568 lines), was discovered by Dr. Whitley Stokes in a manuscript written in 1504. This play has linguistic forms which indicate a later period than the Ordinalia, but metrically it is similar. Local references associate it with the cult of Meriasek at Camborne, a 7th-c. saint whose legendary life, told with anachronisms involving the appearance of Pope Sylvester and the Emperor Constantine, forms the topic of the play. The latest, at least in its extant form, of the Corn. plays is Gwreans an Bys (The Creation of the World, 2,548 lines). The earliest MS bears a colophon in the hand of William Jordan, of Helston, and is dated 1611. The play borrows much from Origo Mundi, but has features of its own. Lucifer and his demons revert to Eng. except when they are on their good behavior—then they speak Corn. The most noticeable metrical innovation is a more frequent disregard of syllable-counting. In all the plays there are passages of touching poignancy, and considerable literary merit, but the quality is not sustained.

The few remaining scraps of late Corn. verse (mostly 17th c.) indicate a falling away, foreshadowed in Gwreans an Bys, from the more strictly syllabic verse patterns of medieval Corn. It may be asked whether this was merely a phase of the decay of the language, or an increased awareness of stress as a metrical principle. The remains, however, are too scanty for one to judge with assurance. A few enthusiasts in our own day have learned Corn., and poems in this long neglected Celtic tongue have been written and published of recent years.—H. Jenner, Handbook of the Corn. Language (1904; general survey, with bibliog.). See also the following editions and translations: E. Norris, The Ancient Corn. Drama (1859); W. Stokes, "Pascon agan Arluth," TPS (1860–61), "Gwreans an Bys," TPS (1863) and "Beunans Meriasek," TPS (1872). D.M.L.

CORONACH. A funeral lament or dirge, originating in Ireland and in the Scottish Highlands. The term, which in Gaelic means "wailing together," owes its currency in Eng. literary history to Sir Walter Scott, who refers to the custom in his novels and introduces into his Lady of the Lake (3.16) a c. of his own composition, beginning: "He is gone on the mountain. / He is lost to the forest, / Like a summer-dried fountain, / When our need was the sorest . . ." According to Scott's presentation, the c. was usually sung by women.

CORRELATIVE VERSE takes its name from the literary device of correlation which consists in a linear relationship of two or more members (first correlative plurality), matched by at least another one (second correlative plurality) whose members are symmetrically related to the members of the first plurality. A Gr. epigram from the Anthologia Graeca (3.241) gives a very clear idea of this type of poetry in one of its simplest forms: "You [wine, are] boldness, youth, strength, wealth, country [1st plurality] / to the shy, the old, the weak, the poor, the foreigner." [2d plurality]. Examples of correlation are found in Gr. poetry starting with the 3d c. B.C. and in L. poetry starting with the 1st c. A.D. Medieval L. poets were very fond of this device, and early Romance poetry, especially Prov., made use of it too.

A special type of correlative poetry, the disseminative-recapitulative type, used by Petrarch, spread, together with Petrarchism (q.v.), in Italy, France, Spain, and England during the Renaissance and the baroque period. An example of the disseminative-recapitulative type is the following first quatrain of a sonnet by the Elizabethan poet Thomas Watson: "Here end my sorrow, no here my sorrow springeth / Here end my woe, no here begins my wailing: / Here cease my griefe, no here my griefe deepe wringeth, / Sorrow, woe, griefe, nor ought else is auailing" with the recapitulation in the last line.

Correlative poetry has been found in Sanskrit, Persian, and Arabic literatures and—even though its relationship to the Western tradition has not been studied yet—it seems to offer to the scholar a valid tool to investigate the propagation of literary material within and without the Western tradition.—Curtius; D. Alonso and C. Bousoño, Seis calas en la expresión literaria española (1951); D. Alonso, "Antecedentes griegos y latinos de la poesía correlativa moderna" in Estudios dedicados a Menéndez Pidal, iv (1953); J. G. Fucilla, "A Rhetorical Pattern in Renaissance and Baroque Poetry," SRen, 3 (1956); D. Alonso, "Poesía correlativa inglesa en los siglos XVI y XVII," Filología moderna, 2 (1961). R.M.I.

COUNTERPOINT (syncopation). A rhythmic effect achieved through metrical variations. C. results from the establishment of a relatively stable metrical structure (e.g., iambic pentameter) and then the occasional departure from this structure so as to create a sense of two metrical patterns, the old and the new, continuing at once. C. is impossible except in moderately regular metrical compositions, for any variation must have something fixed to vary from. In general, at least two contiguous feet must be varied or reversed from the initial metrical pattern if a counterpointed rhythm is to be felt. In the following line by G. M. Hopkins,

The world is charged with the grandeur of God,

the third and the fourth foot constitute a counterpointed section, for they interrupt and "reverse" the ascending rhythm (q.v.) of the earlier part of the line. See METRICAL VARIATIONS.—"Author's Preface," Poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins, ed. R. Bridges and W. H. Gardner (3d ed., 1948). P.F.

COUPLET. Two lines of verse, usually rhymed. Ever since the advent of rhymed verse, the c. has counted as one of the principal units of versification in the Western literatures, whether as a stanzaic form in extended composition, as a subordinate element in other stanzaic forms, or as an independent poem of an epigrammatic nature. The c. composed of two lines of iambic pentameter—the so-called heroic couplet (q.v.)—is the most important c. form in Eng. poetry. As perfected by Dryden and Pope, the heroic c. is "closed"—syntax and thought are fitted neatly into the envelope of rhyme and meter—and in this form it dominates the poetry of the neoclassical period: "Know then thyself, presume not God to scan; / The proper study of Mankind is Man" (Pope, Essay on Man). Although the heroic c. is generally associated with its 18th-c. masters, one should recognize that it is a form of great antiquity, used by Chaucer in The Legend of Good Women and most of The Canterbury Tales, by Marlowe, Chapman, and other Elizabethans, and by Donne, whose free use of enjambement achieves effects utterly different from those of Pope and Dryden.

The iambic tetrameter or octosyllabic c. (see OCTOSYLLABIC VERSE) has a distinguished history in Eng. verse as the form of Milton's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, Marvell's To his Coy Mistress, and Coleridge's Christabel (see CHRISTABEL METER). The 4-beat couplets of Samuel Butler's Hudibras really constitute a separate type, known as Hudibrastic couplets. Not all Eng. couplets utilize regular line length. Poets as diverse as George Herbert and Robert Browning have developed verse forms in which the couplet rhyming of irregular lines occurs: ". . . With their triumphs and their glories and the rest. / Love is best!" (Browning, Love Among the Ruins).

The c. of rhyming alexandrines is the dominant form of Fr. narrative and dramatic poetry (see ALEXANDRINE). In the hands of the classical masters—Corneille, Molière, Racine, La Fontaine—the alexandrine c. is end-stopped and relatively self-contained, but a freer use of enjambement is found among the romantics. Under Fr. influence, the alexandrine c. became the dominant metrical form of German and Dutch narrative and dramatic verse in the 17th and 18th c. After being neglected during this period, a more indigenous German c. form, the tetrameter c. called Knittelvers (q.v.), was revived by Goethe and Schiller.

Although the c. ranks as one of the major forms for extended poetic composition, its function as a constituent of more complex stanzaic forms is scarcely less important. The principal stanzaic forms created by the later Middle Ages and the Renaissance—ottava rima and rhyme royal (qq.v.)—both conclude with a c., which may be used for purposes of formal conclusion, summation, or epigrammatic comment. The pithy qualities inherent in c. structure are evident not only in these stanzas but also in the independent epigrammatic c., and in the Shakespearean sonnet (see SONNET), which concludes with a c.

As a unit of dramatic verse the c. occurs in the classical Fr. drama, the older German and Dutch drama, and the "heroic plays" of Restoration England. It also fills an important function in Elizabethan-Jacobean drama as a variation from the standard blank verse; its principal use is at the conclusion of a scene or at a peak of dramatic action. The relative frequency of couplet variation is an important means of determining the chronology of Shakespeare's plays, as he tended, with increasing maturity, to abandon the device.

In Fr., the term couplet is sometimes used with the meaning of stanza, as in the couplet carré (square couplet), a stanza composed of 8 lines of octosyllabic verse. See also DISTICH.

F.J.W.; A.P.

COURTLY LOVE (Fr. amour courtois, It. amore cortese, Prov. domnei, German Frauentienst) is a group of conventions widely observed in the amatory poetry and romance writing of Western Europe during the Middle Ages and continued in much of the literature of the Renaissance both on the Continent and in England. In the general sense in which the term is usually employed, c.l. is primarily a literary phenomenon; though there is little doubt about the actual existence of courts of love as a form of social diversion, they did not exist as formal judicial assemblies.

During the earlier Middle Ages the status of woman was vastly different from that which obtains today. There was no concern about passionate love between male and female as a normal feeling. Such love was frowned upon by the theologians, even to the extent of being considered improper between husband and wife. Woman was the perennial Eve, and man regarded her primarily as the potential mother of his children, hardly as a companion enjoying equal status, and certainly never as a lady commanding abject devotion. In the early 12th c. a markedly changed view of man's relationship to woman developed in southern France in the poetry of the troubadours (q.v.), a concept which is perhaps most clearly reflected in the lyrics of a poet who wrote during the last half of the century, Bernart de Ventadorn. It is this treatment of love which has come to be known as c.l., though the term itself was unknown in medieval times; it is derived from a phrase amour courtois, coined by Gaston Paris in 1883 to describe the new concept.

C.l. is a noble passion; the courtly lover idealizes his beloved; she, his sovereign lady, occupies an exalted position over him; his feelings for her ennoble him and make him more worthy; her beauty of body and soul makes him long for union with her, not for passion's sake but as a means of achieving the ultimate in moral excellence. It is a striking paradox that love as presented by most of the troubadours is adulterous and illicit and, at the same time, ennobling and conducive to virtue. "C.L. is a species of that movement inherent in the soul of man towards a desired object. It is this object, the final object, which specifies love and differentiates one from the other. When the object of love is the pleasure of sense, then love is sensual and carnal; directed towards the spiritual, it is mystic, towards a person of the opposite sex, sexual, towards God, divine. C.L. is a type of sensual love and what distinguishes it from other forms of sexual love, from mere passion, from so-called platonic love, from married love is its purpose or motive, its formal object, namely, the lover's progress and growth in natural goodness, merit, and worth" (A. J. Denomy, Speculum, 28:44).

The product of an essentially aristocratic and chivalric society, c.l. is essentially Ovidian in much of its machinery, but it also owes much to the feudalism under which it flourished (the lover as vassal, for instance) and the Christianity of the day, especially the cult of the Virgin (e.g., the exaltation of the beloved). The troubadour concept of love spread to Italy, where it attained its ultimate refinement in the poetry of the dolce stil nuovo, q.v. (e.g., Guinicelli, Cavalcanti) and especially in the Vita Nuova; to northern France, where it provided the essentials for the love poetry of the trouvères (q.v.) and became an important element in the romances (cf. especially Chrétien de Troyes' Le Chevalier de la Charrette, the most polished early treatment of the Lancelot and Guinevere story); to Germany, where it enriched the poetry of the Minnesingers (q.v.); to England, where it found its fullest early use in Chaucer, particularly his Troilus and Criseyde. Through the poetry of Petrarch especially (but not exclusively) c.l. came to the Eng. poets of the 16th c. (notably the sonneteers and Spenser) as well as to the Fr. poets of the Pléiade, q.v. (e.g., Ronsard, Du Bellay). Thus any attempt to frame a single brief statement adequately describing the concept as reflected in so many literatures and literary forms spread over so many centuries is basically impossible. Much of the confusion concerning c.l. stems from the assumption that there was a single generalized type which all authors, writing in different genres at various times in several languages, celebrated or at least drew upon. The nonsensual, idealized love of the troubadours, the fin amors of the canzon, is hardly the same as the adulterous love of Tristan and Isolde or of Lancelot and Guinevere, nor is married love totally excluded (e.g., Parzifal and Chrétien's Yvain). "The novelty of C.L. lies in three basic elements: first, in the ennobling force of human love; second, in the elevation of the beloved to a place of superiority above the lover; third, in the conception of love as ever unsatiated, ever increasing desire. Of course, the troubadour lyrics were embellished with other conceits, formulae and situations: the nature introduction, the personification of love as a god with absolute power over his army of lovers, the idea of love as a sickness with all its familiar exterior manifestations, the ceaseless fears of the lover at losing his beloved, at not being worthy of her, at displeasing her, the position of inferiority of the lover and the feeling of timidity to which the feeling gives rise, the capriciousness, haughtiness and disdain of the beloved, the need of secrecy, stealth and furtiveness in the intrigue, the danger of tale-bearers, and so on. These notions and conceits have their parallels and analogues in classical literature, in medieval Latin and Arabic love literature. They are not peculiar to C.L., but are, rather, universally human and belong to the general fund of love literature. It is, on the contrary, the three basic elements of the conception of love as desire, the ennobling force of love, and the cult of the beloved that make C.L. to be C.L. and which set it apart from all other conceptions of love. They provide, as it were, the skeleton framework, the mechanics or thought pattern of C.L.: the surge of the lover to rise in worth and in virtue towards the beloved through the force and energy of desire" (A. J. Denomy, The Heresy of C.L., pp. 20-21).

For general purposes, the codification attempted by Andreas Capellanus in the late 12th c., the De Amore, is still helpful as a point of reference; its alternate title, De Arte Honestae Amandi, which is found in some mss., is more aptly descriptive, for the idea of love as an art is basic to the notion of c.l. The fact that Andreas obviously wrote with tongue in cheek and that he is often contradictory does not reduce the value of his treatise for the modern reader.

T. P. Cross and W. A. Nitze, Lancelot and Guenevere: A Study on the Origins of C.L. (1930); C. S. Lewis, The Allegory of Love (1936); A. Capellanus, The Art of C.L., tr. J. J. Parry (1941); A. J. Denomy, "An Inquiry into the Origins of C.L.," Mediaeval Studies, 6 (1944); A. J. Denomy, The Heresy of C.L. (1947); T. Silverstein, "Andreas, Plato, and the Arabs: Remarks on Some Recent Accounts of C.L.," MP, 47 (1949); A. J. Denomy, "C.L. and Courtliness," Speculum, 28 (1953); H. J. Weigand, Three Chapters on C.L. in Arthurian France and Germany (1956); D. de Rougemont, Love in the Western World, tr. M. Bellion (rev. ed., 1957); W. T. H. Jackson, "The De Amore of Andreas Capellanus and the Practice of Love at Court," RR, 49 (1958); M. Valency, In Praise of Love (1958); J. F. Benton, "The Court of Champagne as a Lit. Center," Speculum, 36 (1961); G. de Lorris and J. de Meun,

COURTLY MAKERS

The Romance of the Rose, tr. H. W. Robbins (1962); D. W. Robertson, Jr., "Some Medieval Doctrines of Love," A Preface to Chaucer (1962).

T.A.K.

COURTLY MAKERS. A group of court poets who, during the reign of Henry VIII, introduced the characteristic forms of Renaissance poetry into England from Italy and France, and thereby laid the foundations for the great poetic achievement of their Elizabethan successors. One of their number, Sir Thomas Wyatt (1503?-1542), wrote the first Eng. sonnets, and another, Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (1517?-1547), is credited with the first Eng. blank verse. Most of the work of the c.m. does not have major artistic importance. Some of the best of it was compiled from manuscript collections and published as Tottel's Miscellany in 1557. The work had a great influence on the Elizabethans.

The term maker, as a literal translation of the Gr. poiein from which poet is derived, was in common use in 15th- and 16th-c. England and Scotland.—J. Stevens, Music and Poetry in the Early Tudor Court (1961); R. Southall, The Courtly Maker (1964).

CRASIS (Gr. "mixing," "blending"). The fusion in Gr. of a vowel or diphthong (usually in a monosyllable like the forms of the definite article, the conjunction kai, and the exclamation of address o, but sometimes at the end of a dissyllable like mentoi) with another which follows, e.g., haner for ho aner, kago for kai ego, onax for o anax, and mentan for mentoi an.—Koster; A. Sidgwick and F. D. Morice, An Introd. to Gr. Verse Composition (new impression, 1955).

R.J.G.

CREATIONISM. One of the many postwar poetic isms that endeavored to annul past literary tendencies and establish a new aesthetic creed. Vicente Huidobro, a Chilean, propounded the central ideas of c. in Buenos Aires in 1916, and the Fr. poet Reverdy initiated the movement in France. Huidobro's visit to Spain in 1918 made the new creed known there, where it was received with intense but brief and limited enthusiasm. Ultraism (q.v.), however, carried on many of its tendencies. Juan Larrea and Gerardo Diego are the two Sp. poets whose works most reflect the ideas of c. "To create a poem as Nature creates a tree," is the core of c. according to Huidobro. In daring, oftentimes strained metaphors, he and his followers tried to create a new pure poetry which broke abruptly with the past, and which brought a sense of Godification to the written word. Huidobro wrote:

Why do you sing the rose, O, poets?
Make it flower in the poem.

Only for you Live all things under the Sun.
The poet is a small God.

G. de Torre, Las literaturas europeas de vanguardia (1925); R. Cansinos-Asséns, La nueva literatura, III (1927); A. de Undurraga, "Teoría del creacionismo," Vicente Huidobro, Poesía y prosa. Antología (1957); Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana, ed. F. de Onís (1961).

J.A.G.

CRETIC or amphimacer (Gr. "long at both ends"). The cretic foot (— —) and verse form are thought to have originated with a Cretan poet called Thaletas (7th c. B.C.) and to have been at first a meter for the hyporchema (q.v.). As is obvious from resolution of either long syllable, the c. is really a form of the paeon (q.v.) and cretic-paeonic measures, though rarely employed in the choruses of Gr. tragedy, are not infrequent in comedy. Cretics occur in early Roman drama and are common in the clausulae of Cicero (see PROSE RHYTHM). An example in the former is the song of Phaedromus in Plautus, Curculio 147-154:

pēssūli, heūs | pēssūti, | vōs sālū | tō lūbēns,
vōs āmō, | vōs vōlō, | vōs pēto āt | que ōbsēcō

the meaning and meter of which G. E. Duckworth thus reproduces: "Bolts and bars, bolts and bars, gladly I greetings bring, / Hear my love, hear my prayer, you I beg and entreat." Imitations of cretics are not common in Eng., but lines composed of single feet are found in Tennyson's The Oak. Coleridge imitated and described the c. thus: "First and last being long, middle short, Amphimacer / Strikes his thundering hoofs like a proud high-bred Racer."—E. W. Scripture, "The Choriambus in Eng. Verse," PMLA, 43 (1928); Dale; G. E. Duckworth, The Nature of Roman Comedy (1952); Koster; Beare.

R.J.G.

CRISIS. See PLOT.

CRITICISM. FUNCTIONS.† This article differs from the longer article on types of criticism (q.v.) in being less thorough and more theoretical: it divides criticism according to its possible purposes, a division which cuts across that into schools. There are four (some would say five) functions of c.: technical, social, practical, theoretical. Judicial is a doubtful fifth. There are also a number of related purposes which are not strictly critical.

By technical c. is here meant a guide to the actual practice of writing. There is no recognized term for this, and we might equally well call it "workshop," "didactic" or "pragmatic" c., or even "creative" c. (though this last might cause confusion with the kind of c. associated with Carlyle and Lamb, in which a foiled creative impulse uses the critical essay as a pretext for its own expression). Such technical c. was common in Elizabethan times: George Gascoigne's Certain Notes of Instruction concerning the Making of Verse or Ryme in Eng. announces its purpose in its title, and Puttenham's Arte of Eng. Poesie tells us that its chief purpose is "the learning of Ladies . . . or idle Courtiers . . . to make now and then ditties of pleasure." No serious critic would undertake this task today. Our respect for the individuality of the work of art is so great that we no longer believe that any issues of real concern to the practicing poet can be discussed in general terms: rules and common problems (from the metrical details of Gascoigne up to the theory of the unities) may have an approximate validity or relevance, but they must always in the last resort be considered in relation to the aims of the particular work. If there can be technical c., it must be specific, as in the creative writing class.

† In Supplement, see also METACRITICISM.

Of more importance is the indirectly technical. A great deal of c. which takes the form of comment on existing texts has as one of its aims the improvement of literature as yet unwritten. Thus Donald Davie says of his Purity of Diction in Eng. Verse (which is about the attitude of Augustan and romantic poets to their language) "It is to the would-be poet of today that I should like to address myself." The leading examples of this sort of practitioner-critic are Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot. Eliot has observed that the reader for whom Pound wrote his early c. was primarily "the young poet whose style was still unformed." This concern with the future of poetry is found not only in the prose of Pound, but also in much of his verse: in Hugh Selwyn Mauberley, or in his monstrous translation of The Seafarer, defensible only as a stylistic hint to the young poet. In the same essay, Eliot observes of himself "the best of my literary criticism . . . is a by-product of my private poetry workshop." This would not necessarily make it technical, since we are concerned with function, and not with origins; but it is also the case that in drawing attention to the resemblances between the Fr. symbolists and the 17th-c. metaphysicals Eliot's aim was not only to promote understanding of these poets, but also to open a vein that would be fruitful in modern Eng. poetry. So that although his reading of the metaphysical poets can be challenged (as it has been by Rosemond Tuve and others), the use to which this reading (or misreading) has been put, by Eliot himself and by others, is an achievement that cannot be undone.

It is important that poetry should matter, and should be felt to matter, in the community; and as well as its more specific tasks, c. has what we may call a social, or journalistic, function: the building up of the prestige of literature. This can be done at many levels. At the lowest, it does not matter what is said, as long as books are talked about: the function of the book page in a daily or weekly paper is not merely (perhaps not mainly) to assess the books actually reviewed, but to contribute to the ceaseless discussion of literature. At a rather higher level, this social function consists in the arousing of enthusiasm: the work of such writers as Robert Lynd, Desmond McCarthy, Philip Toynbee, as well as popular academics like Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, falls here. To read them is to meet a (usually attractive) personality describing with obvious sincerity his love of literature. The dangers of such writing are clear: explicit enthusiasm easily becomes strident (as often in Swinburne), the display of the critic's personality easily becomes exhibitionist, the rapprochement with a wide public is too easily attained by philistinism; but insofar as it sets people reading, and talking about what they read, it is wholly admirable. Once this sort of c. becomes more serious, it will take on one of the other critical functions. The review, if it has something to say about its book, becomes practical c.; remarks on the importance and value of literature, if they become systematic, turn into apologetics, which is a branch of theoretical c. We now turn to these two, which are by far the most important critical functions.

Practical c. is not very old. Few if any commentaries on individual works before the 18th c. are either thorough or illuminating. Such things begin, perhaps, with Addison's Spectator essays on Paradise Lost, and some of the close attention paid to Shakespeare by such writers as William Richardson and Maurice Morgann; but the real father of practical c. is Coleridge. In him we can for the first time see the qualities of the best of the "New Critics": intense brooding on a work to grasp its essential quality, and illustrating this by careful and subtle reference to details. The editors of Scrutiny or the Kenyon Review would readily have accepted Coleridge's discussions of Wordsworth or Venus and Adonis (from Biographia Literaria) or some of his Shakespeare lectures, whereas one fancies they might boggle over Addison's papers on Milton. Not even Coleridge, however, is a fully formed, modern specimen of the practical critic, and most of the leading names in 19th-c. criticism (Bagehot, Pater, Arnold) leave us dissatisfied with their particular comments, or else conceding that their aims were slightly different from ours. Matthew Arnold's idea of "touchstones," for example, looks at first like the sort of comparison of actual passages that is so popular today, but in fact it is only pioneer work—it has none of the careful choice of comparable passages, the juxtaposition of like with almost like, that the good modern critic will insist on. One of Arnold's successors in the Chair of Poetry at Oxford, A. C. Bradley, though his critical approach is no nearer to modern tastes, was far more conscientious about getting down to detail; and his Shakespearean Tragedy, though based on assumptions about the nature of drama almost universally rejected now, conducts its argument with a thoroughness and particularity congenial to the rejecters, and eminently worth attacking.

By practical c. is meant the close study of particular works; and if it has a beginning, it was on the day in the 1920's when I. A. Richards started giving unsigned poems to his students at Cambridge for their comments and appraisal. The result was horrifying. Magazine poetasters were extravagantly praised, Donne, Hopkins, and Christina Rossetti firmly damned; every felicity was ridiculed, and every absurdity praised, by large minorities and even majorities. Richards described the experiment in Practical Criticism, and added a discussion of the main problems of c. This book and its sequel (Interpretation in Teaching) are among the main sources of what has become standard lecture-room practice in America and (to a lesser extent) in England: close reading, or explication de texte (for it had always been standard practice in France). Outside the universities, a similar direction was being given to c. by the work of a number of poets: Robert Graves, T. S. Eliot, William Empson. Eliot's The Sacred Wood has become the most influential critical work of the century; it mingled a habit of wild and radical generalization with great shrewdness in commenting on actual quotations. Graves and Riding's Survey of Modernist Poetry discussed Shakespeare as well as Hopkins and E. E. Cummings: it was a main influence behind the vastly more subtle and daring work of William Empson. Empson carried the search for hidden meanings in great poetry further than ever before, and began a growing and often fantastic hunt for puns, ambiguities, and multiple ironies. Empson's fundamental position is that all great poetry is complex: "Whenever a receiver of poetry is seriously moved by an apparently simple line, what are moving in him are the traces of a great part of his past experience and of the structure of his past judgements." If this is so, there is clearly a great deal for the practical critic to say. Other influences in this movement are F. R. Leavis, Cleanth Brooks, R. P. Blackmur, John Crowe Ransom, and L. C. Knights. Leavis has always maintained that the critic should deny himself the luxury of any general remarks that cannot be clearly related to particular texts: his own best practice has always conformed to this, and the precept is embodied in the title as well as the contents of Scrutiny, the periodical run by him and his collaborators for twenty-one years. Brooks is the great popularizer of the movement, not only in his own critical works, but in the college textbooks written with Robert Penn Warren. A typical product of such c. is the collection of essays by various hands, each on a single poem or book: such as Determinations, edited by Leavis, or Interpretations, edited by John Wain.

Practical c. is a method as well as an aim. As a method, it consists in basing closely on actual texts whatever one is doing; as an aim, it is pedagogic, and its goal is the full appreciation of the work discussed. Once a reader has appreciated the poem, the commentary (as far as he is concerned) ceases to matter, just as technical c. ceases to matter to a poet once he has written the poem it was intended to stimulate in him. This aim, of course, assumes that there is such a thing as the right reading of a poem, toward which the reader is being led, and objections to practical c. as an aim have mainly been based on denial of this.

The extreme objection is that since taste is subjective, each man's reading is valid only for himself: if two readers disagree about the meaning or value of a poem, each of them, so far as he himself is concerned, is right. F. L. Lucas is an extreme exponent of this position. This view is more often stated than believed. Taken literally, it would make literary discussion futile; there would not even be any point in rereading in order to sharpen and improve one's reactions, since if there is no external standard there can be no improvement. The theoretical answer to this objection is contained in Charles Morris' doctrine of intersubjectivity; and in practice even the strongest relativists pay more attention to the interpretations of some readers than of others, and speak of particular commentaries in such normative terms as shrewd, eccentric, sensitive, or imperceptive.

A less radical but more serious objection is that a work of art is a growing thing, and changes with succeeding generations. When a new work of art is created, says T. S. Eliot, "something . . . happens simultaneously to all the works of art which preceded it." This view received its best theoretical statement in the discussion by Wellek and Warren of the mode of existence of a literary work (Theory of Literature, ch. 12); and it is perfectly exemplified in the impact of Eliot's own poetry. It leads naturally to a historical relativism: to the belief (as stated for example by C. Day Lewis) that "every classical poem worth translating should be translated afresh every fifty years," and to the observation that every generation reads the masterpieces of the past in its own way.

It is not enough to reply that there may nonetheless be a right reading for one's own time. Epochs overlap, and what seems an eccentric reading may be the first signs of a new movement, or the last fizzle of the old; and the chronological division between generations easily extends itself to include a division between different communities or different viewpoints (such as Catholic, liberal humanist, and Marxist in our time), and even perhaps between different personality types. This line of argument need not lead us back into complete relativism: it means that instead of one right reading we must postulate an area of readings, shading through the doubtful and the eccentric to the absurd, through the tendencies to those incompatible with our own point of view, and perhaps through the old-fashioned to the outmoded. How much variety is allowed among "legitimate" readings will depend largely on the work itself. A lyric by Campion, Landor, or Housman will very nearly have one right reading, which will not even change much with time; while at the other extreme the number of defensible readings of King Lear (and even more of Hamlet) is clearly very large. In the case of Lear this is due to the range and richness of experience embodied in it; in the case of Hamlet, to that, and also to certain ambiguities in the nature of the work.

This discussion has assumed that the practical critic influences not only our interpretation but also our judgment of a poem, thus rejecting the view that interpretative and judicial are two separate critical functions. For it is at least arguable that a really thorough interpretation of a poem must be evaluative: as we consider the exact meaning and associations of each phrase, its relation to the whole, the effect of the poem's rhythm and formal qualities, we are either assuming that these effects are achieved, or else drawing attention (implicitly at least) to inadequacies. As for purely judicial c., it is hard to see what this can consist in (apart from a dogmatic assertion that a poem is good or bad) unless it is substantiated by a discussion of the success of actual details. Judicial c. may be a by-product or a conclusion of practical c.: it cannot exist without it.

How far can practical c. go? When two readers disagree about a work, can they be reconciled by one persuading the other that he has misread it? Or must we assume that they are reading the same poem, but reacting differently because they look for different things in poetry? C. S. Lewis, disagreeing with Leavis about the style of Paradise Lost, says "he sees and hates the very thing that I see and love." If this is a typical literary disagreement, there is very little for practical c. to do; but if readers with similar general positions differ in their ability to see exactly what is happening in a poem, then the practical critic has a task: to enlighten those readers who lack his sensibility, or his experience, or his special knowledge, or even his opportunity to devote a great deal of time to puzzling over a work.

Finally, theoretical c. This is a consideration of what literature is: it is a descriptive study insofar as "imaginative" or "creative" writing is being distinguished from science, propaganda, entertainment, or memoirs, and a normative study insofar as genuine literature is being distinguished from inferior. Whereas the practical critic asks "What is this poem saying?" and "Is it good?," the theoretical critic asks, "What constitutes poetic merit?" Apart from the cases in which such an issue arises out of specific disagreements, theoretical c. is c. in its own right: its existence assumes that when we have read and reacted to a poem, it is natural and proper to ask, disinterestedly, what exactly we have done. The first great work of theoretical c. is Aristotle's Poetics; and Longinus' On the Sublime is probably theoretical in intent. Defenses of poetry, which have been common since ancient times, naturally tend toward systematic apologetics, and so raise the question of the nature of literature and the literary experience.

This question has always been, and must be, the central concern of c. The answers depend of course on the general social or ethical attitudes of the critic, or even on a polemical literary purpose: theories of literature depend far more on a concern for its future (and so shade into the indirectly technical) or for its contemporary influence, than upon a detached reflection on its past. For a full treatment of this problem, see POETRY, THEORIES OF; here we can only indicate some of the main positions.

Cognitive theories assert that literature conveys knowledge, or states truths. This is a commonplace of Renaissance and neoclassic c.: the fictions of the poet are a means toward the formulating of some general truth—particular truth is the province of the historian, universal of the poet. This view is used by the Augustans to justify a poetic style that refuses to number the streaks on the tulip; the romantics, though rejecting the style, often retain the theory, Wordsworth for example applauding Aristotle and saying that the object of poetry is "truth, not individual and local, but general, and operative." Poetic knowledge is not the same as ordinary knowledge, and the difference is usually stated in terms of a contrast between imaginative or emotional knowledge, and mere intellectual acquiescence. This contrast is found in Shelley's Defence of Poetry, and implied in Keats's famous reference to "proving on the pulses." If literature is purely cognitive, it is difficult to see how, in principle, it differs from science, and the cognitive view has traditionally been combined with the affective view that it arouses emotion. In symbolist theory, and in much of the poetry associated with it, we can see the first systematic attempt to reject the cognitive completely: to Valéry and (especially) Mallarmé, as largely to Eliot, poetry should reject the prose functions of narrative, exposition, and argument, confining itself to the building of a nonrepresentational universe like that of music. Parallel to this movement, though distinct from it, is the transfer of interest from conscious to unconscious mental processes, and the claim that poetry should talk the language of dreams, not that of ratiocination. Rimbaud, Lautréamont and Lewis Carroll are immediate ancestors of this movement, and its theory is formulated in surrealism. Even more far-reaching than the contrasting views over the cognitive nature of literature, is the contrast between didactic views, which emphasize the effects of the literary experience, and aesthetic views, which emphasize the experience itself. The traditional view is didactic. The Horatian commonplace (dulce et utile) combines didactic and affective views, and is cited almost universally until the 18th c.: its naïveté (to modern eyes) consists in its assumption that these two purposes are independent and unaffected by each other. Only if you believe that literature affects the attitudes (and ultimately the conduct) of its readers can you claim for it a useful social function, so that all apologists must take a didactic view, whether naïvely like most of the Elizabethans, or in a more sophisticated form like that of I. A. Richards. The weaknesses of didactic theories are these. First, their corollary that literature is replaceable: could not something else produce the improvement in morals or the finer organization of attitudes that results from the appreciation of poetry—a change of environment, a course in psychoanalysis, or a drug? This corollary it shares with purely cognitive theories, and while we ought perhaps to be prepared to contemplate a social order in which the arts will have no part to play, the thought arouses violent and natural hostility in the breasts of the literary. Second, didactic views often seem remote from the actual appreciation of poetry: hence the attractiveness of the critic whose theories spring from an intense awareness of what it is like to be moved by a poem, even if this leads to a total lack of interest in its consequences. Such awareness lies behind T. S. Eliot's insistence that "poetry is not a substitute for philosophy or theology or religion," Keats's objections to didacticism, or Dewey's belief that a philosopher's capacity to build a theory of aesthetics (based on an awareness of what a work of art is actually like) is a test of the capacity of his system to grasp the nature of experience itself. These three very different thinkers are all concerned that talk about poetry should not distort its nature. Finally, the didactically minded critic is greatly tempted to judge a poem by extrinsic and (strictly speaking) irrelevant standards. Dr. Johnson, for example, condemned Pope's Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady for the sympathy it showed for a disobedient daughter. Since there is nothing in the poem to attach it to such a situation, Johnson can be accused of passing off his disapproval of Pope's personal action in entering the quarrel as if it was a disapproval of the poem. To draw the borderline between such external points, and what is part of the poem's effect, and therefore the concern of a legitimate didactic theory, is often very delicate; c. of such modern writers as Pound and Lawrence has been much concerned with this problem.

Perhaps the first demand we make on theoretical c. today is that it should not go back on the achievements of the "close reading" movement; and the best meaning that can be given to the overworked phrase "New Criticism" is that it is c. which, whatever its aim (practical, theoretical, didactic, even noncritical) tries to preserve and use these achievements. It is even possible for the theoretical critic to begin, like the practical, from an explication de texte; whether he does this or not may depend largely on whether he was trained as a philosopher or a man of letters. Almost all the work of William Empson is closely related to actual poems: but he often takes for granted the appreciation of what he is discussing, and concerns himself with the general literary or semantic issue which it raises. At the other extreme, we have works like The Principles of Art, by R. G. Collingwood, or Art as Experience by John Dewey, or the Principles of Literary Criticism of Richards: here the contrast in title with Practical Criticism points clearly the distinction in function. Somewhere between these extremes come writers such as W. K. Wimsatt (The Verbal Icon) or John Crowe Ransom (The World's Body). Each of the major figures in the history of Eng. c. has dealt with theoretical problems; most prominently, perhaps, S. T. Coleridge (e.g., Biographia Literaria, chs. 12-14).

If we interpret "c." strictly, as a concern for literature as literature rather than as evidence for some other study, then these are its only functions. There are other disciplines which use the same subject matter, but they do not center, as c. must, on the response of the modern reader, but may provide the means for c.: such are textual studies, bibliography, and other forms of "scholarship" (in the narrow meaning of this term); or they may set themselves other aims. Mainly, there are two such aims, historical and psychological. The literary historian concerns himself with what past generations have thought poetry to be, or have found in a particular poem, and refuses to start from the critic's basic assumption, that the poem has something to say to him, here and now. The psychological student of literature studies the relation of a poem to its origins in the poet's personality, but without necessarily altering its meaning for us. The historian certainly, and perhaps the biographer and the psychologist also, can provide certain necessary aids to the critic: in the case of a poem written several centuries ago, the literary historian may need to tell us what some of its words meant then before we are in a position to react fully to its poetic quality. Literary history, biography, and the study of the creative process, however, insofar as they are studies pursued in their own right, strive to be impersonal, rather than, as c. must be, committed.

L.D.L.

For bibliog., see below.

TYPES. The various patterns of critical interests that are commonly regarded as types have achieved their status not because they fit together into any preconceived system, but simply because they recur constantly and independently in the actual study of literature. A few represent theoretical cross sections of c.; for example, the evaluation of works and authors is sometimes distinguished from analytical description on one side and literary theory on the other and considered as a type—judicial c. Others arise out of philosophical issues that extend into and beyond literature, e.g., absolutist and relativist c. Such theoretical distinctions cut across another range of types, those which correspond to the different fields of knowledge or opinion upon which critics often draw in interpreting their literary experience. Most of the generally recognized types belong to this last category.

No critic can deal with literary phenomena without relating them either implicitly or explicitly to some framework of facts or ideas, and his choice of a framework may have a determining influence upon the kinds of results he can achieve. He may choose to limit his context to specifically literary facts and ideas, as the formal critic does when he treats the individual poem as a self-contained universe and the poet strictly as a maker of poems. On the other hand, he may find that for him the central avenue into literature lies through history or anthropology or psychoanalysis or some other related discipline, so that the most meaningful way for him to take hold of his literary experience is to place it in the perspective of that second field. Out of this procedure come the several types of c. that are known as sociological, psychological, and so on.

Such labels obviously do not tell the whole story when they are applied to individual critics. Though it is convenient to speak of the historical critic or the psychological critic as though he were a distinct order of being with a fixed quota of interests and a standard set of methods, no individual critic is quite so pure a specimen. In practice, he may habitually move back and forth from one context to another, becoming formal analyst, historian, and ethical or social commentator by turns. But like everyone else, he is subject to academic shorthand, and if his predominating interests seem to lie in some one of these directions, he will hardly escape being classified accordingly.

The one critical context that is automatically available to every reader, if he chooses to exploit it, is himself. No one, from the casual reader who "knows what he likes" to the most subtly trained of observers, can detach himself altogether from his own temperament and personal history, and from the judgments that spring out of them. But critics differ widely in their willingness to depend upon openly personal estimates. Some regard it as the first duty of c. to establish checks and balances against the subjectivity of individual taste; others, notably the critics who are classified as impressionists, deliberately depend upon personal estimates and, without arguing the point, take the private sensibility as the only meaningful context for critical discussion.

Though impressionistic c. may draw at will upon history and other disciplines for all sorts of incidental information, it owes its name to the habit of concentrating on the direct insights and "impressions" of an individual reader. Typically, the impressionistic critic gives his account of a poem by singling out the most vivid of the sensations and attitudes it evokes in him and exploring them as he pleases, sometimes within the framework of the poet's other writings, but more often within a free range of his own literary and personal experience. He assumes, with Walter Pater, that "in aesthetic criticism the first step towards seeing one's object as it really is, is to know one's own impression as it really is, to discriminate it, to realise it distinctly" (Preface, Studies in the History of the Renaissance). He seldom attempts to reinforce his impressions by any appeal to literary theory, or to round out methodical descriptions of the poems and poets he discusses. Conscious impressionism is likely to rely heavily on good stage management, as the critic, well aware that it is his own sympathetic imagination that is on view, dramatizes his individual impressions one by one. In effect, he may create a second work of art interpreting the first. It is thus no accident that such critics often have a reputation of their own as personal essayists—witness Hazlitt and Lamb, Anatole France and Virginia Woolf. As critics they have a difficult balance to keep, to avoid toppling off into sheer autobiography on one side and a random feasting upon sensations on the other; less skillful writers, by losing that balance, have brought the method itself into disrepute, until nowadays it is usually mentioned only to be dismissed as mere impressionism. But such c. at its best is not the shallow and fragmentary thing that some of its detractors seem to imply; it has a personal coherence of its own, and often an atmospheric suggestiveness that enables a reader to see something new for himself, so that it has its uses as a kind of c. by contagion.

Nevertheless, when c. aspires to offer something beyond what Anatole France asked of it—the adventures of the soul among masterpieces—it is obliged to find more “objective” methods. Virtually all the other types of c. supply some context that is more accessible than that of the impressionist’s mental world, some method that is more regular and sharable than his purely intuitive one. Each aims at results that can be observed and described in some consistent way and referred to definite principles. Of all the types, those that adopt the most exclusively literary context for their observation of poetry are the different branches of technical (i.e., formal and stylistic) c. As their background they take no field of interests outside literature, but simply the collective experience of poetic structure and style. For the purist these types constitute what is meant by “literary” c. in the strict sense. Technical critics have generally gone about their work in one of three different but complementary ways: by relating the individual poem to a genre or kind of poetry, by taking it as a formal entity complete in itself, or by studying it as a phenomenon of style.

Genre-c. is essentially a means of classifying poems by their formal properties, and thus of setting up fairly definite expectations as to the elements they will contain and the kind of effect they will produce. During the two centuries or so from Vida’s time to Dr. Johnson’s, it was a basic procedure in c. A critic like Addison (see his Spectator papers on Paradise Lost) accepts the independent validity of certain “kinds” of poems mostly inherited from ancient literature, and his first question in taking up a new work is likely to be, “What kind of poem is it?” If it purports to be an epic, for example, it will presumably have certain parts that belong to the form by definition—not merely certain sections and conventional devices, but generalized elements of the sort that Aristotle had found in tragedy (plot, character, diction, and the rest), all of them adjusted to one another in such a way as to create a recognizable literary pattern. If some of these ingredients are missing, or their balance is altered, the structure and effect will be altered correspondingly; the poem may differ from epic in one set of ways and be a heroic romance, in another and be a mock-epic, in another and be merely a miscalculation. In any case, the critic cannot apply the relevant standards until he knows what kind of object it is. But once he has classified it, he can move on to observe (as Addison did with Milton) how the poet uses the essential resources of the form, adapting each of the “parts” to his chosen subject and bringing them all into unity.

The prescriptive authority of the genre-system fell apart during the 18th c.; and though critics did not abandon its basic vocabulary, and some of the most important of them (e.g., Goethe and Schiller) concerned themselves with reinterpreting its principles, genre-analysis as a means of concrete literary description was largely handed over to the historian rather than pursued and extended by the critic. As a result, though it established itself in literary historiography, little was left of it in the mainstream of c. beyond certain traditional distinctions among types of poetry—epic, lyric, dramatic, and so on. Today, in a climate more favorable to a close structural analysis of poetry, the purely descriptive side of genre-theory is once more in common use. It cannot be said to have regained a place as an independent type of c., let alone the ruling type, but it is an indispensable fixture in historical c., and critics of all persuasions draw upon it for a standard glossary of forms, from the tragedy down to the limerick. The forms are no longer regarded as autonomous, but that they have an identity at all is an indication of the perseverance of genre-theory.

A second way in which the technical critic may operate is to take the individual poem itself as his context, conceiving of it as a unique entity, the product of a unique combination of elements. He may find the idea of genre incidentally useful, but he is less interested in charting class-relations among poems than in seizing on the specific means of integration in any given one. In his view the form of a poem, like the life of an organism, is a property of the individual, not of a class; and the aim of c. should be to observe how every detail in the poem shares in the determination of this individual form. One of the most publicized of critical developments in this century has been the rise of a painstaking technical analysis of poetry from this point of view, accepting the notion of "organic form" as a basic metaphor, and redefining form 'so as to make it immediately correlative with "meaning."

Since the materials out of which form or meaning is realized are words, modern analytical critics have concerned themselves intensively with the various ways in which words act and react upon one another in a poem, and their study of a text is characteristically devoted to a close explication (q.v.) of the interconnected verbal patterns that make it up—their literal sense, their figurative and symbolic suggestions, the images they produce, their rhythmical texture, and so on. Among the critics prominently associated with this technique are I. A. Richards (whose theoretical work on meaning in poetry was a strong initial stimulus), William Empson, and Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren (whose Understanding Poetry brought the method into uncounted Am. classrooms). Such analysis at its strictest, being unconcerned with any hierarchy of values outside the poem, confines itself to judging internal relations, and thus at most to distinguishing good poems from bad; it does not readily lend itself to ranking one good poem above or below another (except on grounds of comparative intricacy) or explaining how one poem is great and another simply good. In practice, of course, the method is often yoked to some independent set of standards, moral or social—as in the work of F. R. Leavis—by which the critic relates the poem to a wider area of experience.

Much of the technical equipment of both genre-c. and modern formal explication is shared with or reinforced by rhetorical analysis. Yet the stock image of a "rhetorical critic" is that of a man who goes through a text marking splendid examples of zeugma and hysteron proteron without much concern for the totality of the meaning. Traditional rhetoricians often have gone through a text marking figures, but not because the total meaning did not matter; each figure was a tactical move creating a certain localized effect in a larger design. The classical authorities on rhetoric from Aristotle to Quintilian handed down an elaborate roster of such figures of thought and language, from tropes and personifications to devices of syntax and meter, each representing a different artifice by which an orator could give a special force or color to what he was saying at any point. Originally a kind of applied psychology for the public speaker, the whole loose system of figures proved easy to transport into the analysis of prose and verse in general, and even in classical times it was not restricted to oratory. In medieval and Renaissance education it held an important place; and though it began to be elbowed off the stage as early as the 17th c., the study of the figures continued to have practical consequences in poetic technique for another hundred years and more. Nowadays it is so far fallen that a man who knows the difference between syllipsis and chiasmus has presumably just looked them up; yet remnants of the old system are still everywhere in the standard language of literary description (e.g., metaphor, antithesis, onomatopoeia), and various other figures have been absorbed into new contexts by modern rhetorical theorists such as I. A. Richards and Kenneth Burke.

More important than the figures, however, is a general conception that underlies them—the conception of style. For the classical rhetorician, a discourse consisted not only of certain things that were said and a certain order in which they were placed, but of a certain manner of expression—a high or middle or low "style" that suited the purpose of the discourse and the dignity of the subject. It was with this conception that traditional rhetoric supported the theory of genres, for it was universally held that the difference between the elevated forms like tragedy and epic and the lower ones like comedy and elegy inhered in their manner no less than their matter, and much of the discussion of genres hinged upon this decorum of style. But style has proved to be an endlessly expandable concept. Almost any quality that can be attributed to literature can be regarded from some point of view as a stylistic quality, with the result that the c. of style, far from remaining the property of the rhetorician, has come to belong equally to the impressionist who may waive all technical analysis and the historian who may often take such analysis largely for granted. Critics have used it not only for describing the texture of language in a poem (rough or smooth, plain or flamboyant, and so on) and for generalizing upon modes of literary experience (sublime, pathetic), but for defining the special manner of an individual poet (Virgilian, Petrarchan, Byronic), or the expression of national character (Gallic, Germanic), or even the "spirit" of whole eras in the arts (Hellenistic, Baroque). Stylistic discussion may therefore seem at times to be carried on at a considerable remove from the observation of specific poems.

Two independent techniques for keeping such discussion rooted in concrete detail require to be noticed here: metrical analysis and stylistics. Though metrical theory has been in an embattled condition for centuries, faced with an extremely complicated body of linguistic and rhythmical problems, critics have fortunately been able to make themselves understood with a variety of pragmatic systems for pointing out the metrical movement of a poem and for characterizing an author's metrical habits. Even a rough and ready prosody is sensitive enough to find distinctive idioms not only in verse with a strongly marked manner, such as Milton's or Hopkins', but in the work of poets far less unusual in their metrical behavior. Such rhythmical idioms have often been taken as keys to a poet's style, and related significantly to his rhetorical technique, his place in a particular tradition, and his individual temperament. Whereas metrical analysis is a traditional tool for the exploration of style, stylistics (q.v.) is comparatively new and highly specialized. Professedly a branch of linguistic science, it aims primarily at characterizing the total system of expressive conventions that make up a given language at a given time; some students of the field, however, extend it into the analysis of individual and period styles, taking the view that any style is a distinctive selection from the total system that is available, and that it should therefore be possible to describe it in concrete and objective terms.

Literary study is often held to be at its most objective when it concerns itself with enterprises of this kind—with collecting and authenticating various kinds of "facts," and not with evaluating works and authors. It has long been a custom to distinguish such fact-finding operations from c. by describing them rather loosely (not to say disparagingly) as scholarship. The exact relations between scholarship and c. have been argued and reargued at length, often with a practical turn toward the problem of training critical scholars and scholarly critics (see, for example, Foerster et al., Literary Scholarship; Wellek and Warren, Theory of Literature, chs. 6 and 20; Daiches, Critical Approaches to Literature, ch. 6). For some writers, auxiliary studies such as paleography and bibliography, the establishment of texts, linguistic and literary history are preliminary to c., in the sense that their results have to be in before the work of interpretation and evaluation can properly begin. For others, these disciplines cannot come into play at all without involving a constant exercise of literary judgment, so that they are at least implicitly forms of c. in their own right. The issue is complicated by the fact that the various branches of scholarship depend upon literary judgment in differing degrees and for different reasons.

Textual c., for example, certainly does not profess to say how good a poem is, nor to give any interpretative account of it; instead, it provides the indispensable Exhibit A, an accurate text. It aims at reproducing exactly what the author wrote, with all doubtful readings and corruptions cleared away as far as possible and all the evidence duly recorded. Editors have been known at times to take a high hand with their materials, putting their literary judgment ahead of documentary evidence; Pope's edition of Shakespeare and Bentley's of Paradise Lost are notorious instances of an editor's freely emending a text on the basis that his author surely could not have intended a given passage as it stood, or that if he did, he was writing much below his usual manner and deserved to be protected from himself. But such instances chill a modern editor's blood. Since the middle of the 19th c., editors have generally outlawed any kind of personal interference with the text, and have followed a strict and often highly ingenious editorial logic that tries to take into account all ascertainable facts about the history and transmission of the text—the origin, date, and comparative reliability of each separate manuscript or printing, and all the possible sources of error or confusion at every stage from the time the work left its author's hands. It is in the highest attainable degree an objective weighing of the evidence. Inescapably, however, the evidence will sometimes be artistic evidence. To the extent that there is a recurrent necessity of judging which of two readings equally attested in the sources is more probable in the context—or simply of deciding whether a given reading is a corruption, a misprint, or a characteristic license of the author's style—there is still a last appeal to literary acumen in the editing of texts. To that very limited extent, the editor serves in advance as a critic of the poem.

When he goes on to annotate his text, providing the information that a reader will need to understand the language, to follow the allusions to persons and places and ideas, and to set the work in its historical matrix, he draws more fully and obviously upon his literary judgment. Though he may be chiefly concerned with detailing the facts that seem to be relevant, it is for him to decide what the grounds of relevance are. Time after time he must decide whether a given passage does or does not invoke a certain precedent, whether it does or does not presuppose some special knowledge or some pattern of associations, and so on. To the extent that he must explicate the poem in advance, his scholarly findings rest upon his critical sense and literary experience. At the same time, he generally thinks of it as his fundamental job not to evaluate, but to explain.

When c. interests itself systematically in some range of explanatory materials outside the poem, its center of gravity naturally shifts from the poem alone to the relation between the poem and its setting. Several of the types of c. (historical, biographical, sociological, psychological) have distinctive ways of defining that relation and of investigating the background of a poem—which is to say, they have their own criteria of relevance in c., and their own scholarship to depend upon. Though most of them have more than one point of entry into c., their approach to a poem is commonly genetic: they seek to explain how it came into being, and what influences were at work to give it exactly the qualities that it has. Characteristically, they try to suggest what is in the poem by showing what lies behind it. And since for them the poem is one element in a partly nonliterary situation, and thus may be regarded not only as a product of the situation but as an expression of it in turn, these types of c. are quite ready to treat the poem itself as documentary evidence. They may use the background to illuminate the poem, or the poem to illuminate the background. Modern formal critics have often objected to this procedure on the grounds that there is no necessary connection between an idea or experience inside a poem and that "same" idea or experience outside it; but the procedure is nonetheless standard in what Wellek and Warren have called the "extrinsic" approaches to the study of literature.

The historical critic may agree with the formal analyst that a poem should be accepted on its own terms, but he may well take issue with him as to what those terms actually are. For him the poem is essentially a historical phenomenon, arising out of conditions of thought and experience that may differ in countless ways from modern conditions, and that therefore require to be studied if the poem is to yield up its full meaning. He attempts to set the poem once again in its original context in time, reconstructing the circumstances of its composition and public reception, pointing out its connection with the artistic and intellectual assumptions of its age, and thus restoring as fully as he can the aspect it would have worn for a contemporary reader. He may tend to identify the poem with its original meaning, and insist that it is accessible only to a thoroughly instructed reader; this extreme position, in terms of which a critic could not hope to discuss the Aeneid intelligently without committing himself to think and feel as an Augustan Roman would (and in L.), is often to be found in historical c. Or he may take the less stringent view that any poem will offer the reader more in proportion as he learns to see the sense it makes historically, and thus that the study of many sorts of detail—the conventions of courtly love, the psychology of humors, the political difficulties of Charles II, or the influence of Frazer's Golden Bough—may help to clarify and enrich a given poem here and now. Though he is well aware that a modern cannot turn himself into an ancient by an act of will, nor even arm himself at all points with the appropriate knowledge, the historical critic nonetheless regards the past of the poem as implicit in its present, and devotes himself to learning as much of it as he can.

As historian, however, he has a broader terrain to cover than the background of any single poem. His work is to generalize from all such backgrounds an account of the literary past. Notable historians of literature such as Friedrich Schlegel, Taine, De Sanctis, and Courthope have differed greatly in scope and method and individual sympathies, but they have had in common a conception of their task not as the reporting of a gigantic congeries of mere events and names and dates, but as the finding of meaningful patterns and correlations, the sorting out of the facts that have consequences from those that seem to have none. Their work is critical from the beginning, in the sense that at every stage they must make the basic distinctions between what is and what is not literature, between authors who do not count and those who do. But there is an important reservation to be made about the range of critical judgment in such histories, apart from the fact that they may occasionally impose patterns from outside fields upon the data of literature. To the historian's eye, certain works and authors may stand out above their surroundings because they bring some new development into play, or because they represent with unusual clarity some element in the life of their time. For him, such works and authors have a greater "significance" than others, and he naturally gives them a special prominence. He may go further and assert that they are good in themselves, or great, and it is within his prerogative as a critic to do so; but in doing so he makes a leap beyond what history can tell him. Historical evidence by itself may reveal the instrumental value of poems and poets—their representativeness or their influence in producing historical consequences—but not their intrinsic value. It is the failure to distinguish between these two things, the tendency to assume that what is "significant" is by that very fact good, that opens the gates to enormous amounts of antiquarian research into third-rate literature, thus widening the gap between scholar and critic to the disadvantage of both.

Beyond literary history lie the realms of cultural and ideological history in which literature is only one of many sources of evidence. The cultural historian may or may not expect to find uniformities among all the productive activities of a given age, but he regards them all as expressions of the age as well as "institutions" with a continuity of their own. The particular kind of cultural history known as Geistesgeschichte does look for uniformities within any given age, its premise being that every age is informed by a certain Zeitgeist, a distinctive spirit that underlies its ways of thought and action and reveals itself in all contemporary institutions. The historian of this Zeitgeist takes his lead from the formal philosophy as well as the sciences, arts, and social conventions of an era, and may be interested in literature only as testimony to the ideological pattern of the time—or possibly, as in the extreme case of Spengler's Decline of the West, to the value of his own theory of civilization.

Another province of intellectual history, more explicitly philosophical and less concerned with the "spirit" of individual ages, is the study called by its founder Prof. A. O. Lovejoy the "history of ideas," which aims at tracing specific motifs in philosophical thought from their origin to their dissolution, showing how their implications fan out not only into the systems of particular philosophers but into many different cultural phenomena over long periods of time. For such history, literature provides a major source of illustrative detail. (See the opening chapter of Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being, for the classic statement of the method.) The use of such disciplines as these for the practicing critic lies partly in their constant association of literature with the other forms of creative expression, but even more immediately in the fact that they may alert him to the intellectual assumptions in a poet's work—to meaning that is below the surface, implied rather than expressed, but nonetheless central to the coherence of the whole.

Another related province with its own principles of organization is that of the sociologist. Sociological c. begins with the axiom that literature is an expression of society: that social forces inescapably form and condition the poet and his work and his audience, and that what he creates is therefore to be studied as a social phenomenon. Though the status of literature as a product and a reflection of society interested many earlier thinkers from DuBos to Madame de Staël, the introduction of a full-fledged sociological c. is usually credited to the Fr. historian Hippolyte Taine, who set out to interpret the course of a whole national literature in strictly scientific terms (History of Eng. Literature, 1863–67), and who proposed for that purpose the celebrated formula "the race, the milieu, the moment." These three factors, the second being the totality of social conditions and attitudes existing at a given time, were taken as the essential determinants of literary history. As if by chemical action, they combined to make a certain author inevitable at a certain time and to govern the character of his work. Later sociologists of literature have abandoned virtually all of Taine's majestic generalizations beyond the handy concept of the writer's milieu; but there has often remained in the background a faith in the possibility that literature and the other arts conform ultimately to general laws of society—or at the very least that their development can be explained in large part by the analysis of environmental causes. The sociologist thus may go considerably beyond the issues that are central to c., since he is concerned with all the aspects of literature as a social institution that can be examined statistically, or reported in factual terms. According to his lights, he may concentrate upon the environment of the poet as a private man or as a professional writer, the image of society that emerges from his writings and the social attitudes implicit in them, the causes and consequences of shifts in public taste, or the mutual relations between social ideologies and artistic movements. (See Duncan's Language and Literature in Society for an extensive bibliography in each of these fields.) Most of the practical c. of poetry along such lines has been devoted to the influence of a given poet's milieu upon his work (e.g., F. W. Bateson's Eng. Poetry: A Critical Introduction, and many essays of Edmund Wilson), or to the social origins of various forms and conventions and movements (e.g., Herbert Read's Phases of Eng. Poetry, much of the scholarship in folklore, or almost any attempt at defining the concept of "modernity" in literature). These interests shade off naturally into psychological biography on one side and anthropology on the other.

Such c. is not always primarily descriptive and interpretative. A critic who regards a poem as the reflection of certain social or ideological forces is likely to have his own views as to the health or malignancy of those forces, and he may therefore assert himself for or against them, in effect holding the writer responsible for promoting some end outside his work, and even requiring him to be an advocate for the critic's own views. Thus, Tolstoi would require a writer to put himself directly into the service of the Christian brotherhood of man; Vernon Parrington would find better things to say of a writer who professed Jeffersonian principles than of one who did not; Julien Benda would make it a condition of praise that a writer should detach himself from popular ideologies and function as a reproving force against them—in itself a requirement no less limiting than the others. Of the kinds of c. that make specific ideological demands upon the artist, the most prevalent in this century has been Marxist c. Marxism is first a philosophy of history and second a program of political action; it is only derivatively a theory of c., and from the beginning it has had the disadvantage that the founders of its doctrine, Marx and Engels, provided little in the way of a ground plan for relating their economic determinism to questions of aesthetic value. One prominent Marxist frankly pointed out that the virtue of Marxist theory lay not in evaluating works of art but in explaining the basic social and economic influences that operated to produce them; but this was Trotsky (Literature and Revolution, tr. 1925), and Trotsky did not carry the day. The more common approach of the Marxist critic has been to take on both tasks, and to view a given work not only as a reflection of the class interests and aspirations of its author, but as a valuable or a hurtful contribution to the understanding of the true goals of society. In its crudely militant form, Marxism asks of the writer that he should use his art as a weapon, exposing the falsities of bourgeois culture, and becoming a propagandist for the destined society in which all men will be happy and free because they will have lost their economic chains; the writer who does not subserve these ends is unacceptable and even dangerous, since his art may encourage the formation of erroneous "group psychologies" (Nikolai Bukharin: see bibliog.). Such starkly utilitarian principles, taking a work of art almost exclusively as a political document, can often lead to bizarre results—as when one critic sees The Tempest as Shakespeare's study of the political basis of colonial expansion, and Caliban as the only genuine lover of freedom in the play. It is clear that if such judgments were all that Marxist c. had to offer, it would not have made a perceptible impact outside its ideological circle. But at one remove from the stresses of polemical warfare, it has seemed to many critics to provide a useful added dimension in the study of literary history, through its insistent focus upon the influence of class structure and the distribution of wealth and social power from age to age. Critics who hold no brief for a rigid economic determinism have sometimes derived much of their equipment for inspecting the economic background of literary tendencies from the Marxists. Thus a highly diversified group of writers have made constant or occasional use of Marxist theory in discussing poetry—Christopher Caudwell, Kenneth Burke, William Empson, and D. S. Savage, among others. Perhaps the most influential of European Marxist critics at present is the Hungarian Gyorgy Lukács, much of whose work is as yet unavailable in Eng.

In the types of "genetic" c. so far mentioned, the individual poet himself may sometimes seem to vanish behind a thicket of influences and forces and tendencies; but there is one type of historical c., the biographical, in which he obviously holds the center of the stage. The motto of the biographical critic might well be Sainte-Beuve's remark in his Nouveaux lundis ("Chateaubriand"), "I can enjoy the work itself, but I find it hard to judge in isolation from the man who wrote it." The assumption is that the life and personality of the author, down to the last apparently trifling detail, may provide an essential key to the understanding and thus the appraisal of his poetry. Much literary biography, of course, has been written without any such regard to its critical relevance. The lives of authors may be interesting quite independently of their possible bearing upon the works, and many a student has been interested in both without supposing that there is any inevitable correspondence between them. For example, Boswell's Life does not undertake to "explain" the works of Johnson by tracing them to their origins in his personal experience, nor does it rest any case for their value upon the personality behind them; it aims simply (if that is the right word) at delivering to posterity a just image of a great man who is also a great author. Similarly, Johnson's own Lives of the Poets make a fairly plain distinction between the biographical enterprise, which has its own humane interest, and the critical one; the specifically critical part of each "life" is usually a separate section, a formal review of the man's works, after the portrait has been duly accomplished. Such biography is very different, as David Daiches says (Critical Approaches to Literature, p. 250) from the kind "which draws from the psychology of the author clues for the interpretation and appreciation of what he has written"—or from the kind that reverses the process, drawing upon what he has written for clues to his life and personality. Biography of these latter sorts is largely an outgrowth of romantic literary psychology, with its stress upon individual creativity and its absorbed contemplation of the Poet. Carlyle furnishes a good example; his studies of such men as Schiller, Burns, and Shakespeare are heroic portraits, in which the literary works figure chiefly as elements in that "greatest work of every man, the Life he has led." Sainte-Beuve himself, little as he has in common otherwise with Carlyle, takes the personality of the author as his principal object, immersing himself in historical and personal detail, and bringing the works and the life together in a single impression. His Causeries du lundi form a celebrated casebook of such c. If such a critic has an occupational hazard, it is the temptation to use the life and works interchangeably to illuminate each other, deducing the personality from the poetry and then judging the poetry in the light of the personality. The tendency is outstandingly obvious in the attempts of Georg Brandes and later critics to read Shakespeare's plays and sonnets biographically; but it is implicit in much other biography—in works written under the influence of Stefan George's concept of "inner form," for instance, and in such a study as Tillyard's Milton, which holds that the real subject of a poem is the state of the author's mind at the time of composition. But in all biographical c., from the casual reminiscences of a Frank Harris to the comprehensive life-and-times scholarship of a David Masson, there is the fundamental conviction that though the events of a writer's life may be only behind the work, his personality is in it and of it, and an evaluation which ignores his presence there is doomed to miss the mark. The critic who declared that the author of the Iliad could not have written the Odyssey because no one man could have two such different attitudes toward dogs was not writing authentic biography, perhaps, but he was illustrating very clearly the fact that the movement from the work to the man and back again is an all but involuntary impulse in c.

In recent years, biographical c. has drawn a new if somewhat reckless vitality from important developments in psychological theory, especially those that are popularly lumped together under the name of psychoanalysis. Though the various branches of psychological c.[†] are by no means exclusively genetic or biographical in their approach to poetry, the most influential ones (leaving aside the work of I. A. Richards) have been those that center upon the personality of the poet or that seem to offer some clue to the mysteries of the creative process. The idea of the poet as the half-unwitting instrument of irrational or at least obscure forces has a history reaching back to Plato's Ion; it is implied in every invocation to the Muse, and in every reference to the furor poeticus, the divine fire of inspiration. Though modern critics are not fond of such terms, they have made unparalleled efforts to analyze the creative activity itself, or at least to see how far it can be analyzed. The most famous detailed study of an individual poet in action, J. L. Lowes' Road to Xanadu, attempts to track the synthesizing imagination of Coleridge through the vast mazes of his reading, showing the raw materials he had to work with and the transformations that they underwent, if not the way in which the transforming was done. Another approach, represented in such a book as Poets at Work (ed. C. D. Abbott, 1948), has been to examine the stages through which a poem has passed during composition, as far as they are apparent in the author's drafts and worksheets; here the emphasis is often more formal than psychological, concentrating on the deliberate changes that the author made in his text, and leaving a margin for that unexplained something at the beginning that, as Stephen Spender says in The Making of a Poem, is simply "given." The mysterious force is still there. But many critics, taking their cue from Sigmund Freud and his followers, have looked for that force in the promptings of the poet's "unconscious," and have turned therefore to one or another of the several versions of psychoanalytic theory as at least a partial answer to the riddle of personal creativity.

Even apart from the differences between early Freud and late, and between the contending systems of his successors, the relation of psychoanalytic theory to c. is too complex and unsettled to be summarized in brief. But in rough terms the basic connection arises from the concept that an individual personality is constituted in part by needs and cravings which the mind in its conscious activity rejects or represses, and that these powerful drives, constantly seeking an outlet, thrust their way to the surface in disguised forms, expressing themselves not openly but symbolically—in dreams, for example, and in works of art. A poem may thus be read as a symbolic expression of the author's unconscious fantasies and desires, and as such it offers a conjectural means of access to the hidden depths of his personality. Not all the prominent psychoanalytical critics have focused on the inner life of the poet; Charles Baudouin's study of Verhaeren, for instance, devotes itself at some length to psychoanalytic factors in the reader's response to poetry (Psychoanalysis and Aesthetics, tr. 1924). But most such investigations are irresistibly drawn at last into the subliminal storehouse of the author's mind. Ernest Jones' Hamlet and Oedipus, probably the best-known Freudian study of a literary subject, is first of all an attempt to explain Hamlet's irresolution as the result of an Oedipus complex; but the quest is not finished until it develops that Hamlet's latent conflict is "an echo of a similar one in Shakespeare himself"—a biographical finding that is somewhat diluted by the further comment, "as to a greater or less extent it is in all men." Freud's own view that the early sexual history of the individual is of prime importance in the determination of his latent drives has met with much opposition, but it has been enormously influential. The roster of poets whose salient qualities have been traced to Oedipus complexes, castration fears, repressed homosexuality, infantile menstruation traumas, and other felicities is truly impressive. But since it is a major tenet of Freudian doctrine that such phenomena are universally distributed among mankind, the apparently high incidence of them among poets would seem to mean nothing more than that the supposed evidence in their cases, being in print, is relatively easy to collect. Neither Freud's influence nor the relevance of his findings to literature can be said to rest on such studies. But whatever may be thought of them, there is a further range for the qualified critic in the interpretation of works that are directly indebted to Freudian or other psychoanalytic ideas. Hardly any writer for the last forty years or more can have been wholly untouched by Freud's vision of man and the controversies it has provoked (see the titles by Trilling and Hoffman in the bibliography), and a critic can do much for the reader by elucidating the effects of that influence in actual poems and plays and novels.

[†] In Supplement, see also PSYCHOLOGY AND POETRY.

In some of Freud's work (e.g., Totem and Taboo) and much more extensively in the work of Carl Jung, the search for recurrent patterns of symbolism has gone beyond the practical limits of individual experience, into the realm of a more general cultural heritage. It was Jung who formulated the search as an investigation of the "collective unconscious," the primitive layer of the individual psyche that serves as a reservoir of racial memory. Many critics who accept little else in Jung's psychology have found this concept a fruitful one in accounting for the steady reappearance and powerful impact of certain stories and "motifs" in the literature of different ages. His emphasis on primordial images or "archetypes" (q.v.) has gone along with independent research in several fields—anthropology, comparative religion, classical archaeology, iconology in the graphic arts, and the study of symbolism in language—to focus attention upon the ritualistic and mythical elements in literature (see MYTH); and out of this potent combination of sources has sprung a whole school of critical mythography that is at present one of the most vigorous influences in c. The taproot of this interest is as much anthropological as psychological, and if any single book has been fundamental to it, it is not one of Jung's, but Sir James Frazer's Golden Bough. The breadth of implication in such studies may be seen in a work like Suzanne Langer's Philosophy in a New Key; from the standpoint of literary c. the most elaborate theoretical essay in the field to date is Northrop Frye's Anatomy of C. Of critical works directly indebted to Jung himself, the most instructive is still Maud Bodkin's Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934).

Apart from the psychoanalytic movement there are at least two branches of current psychology that are directly concerned with literary questions, and neither of these is primarily genetic. One is the experimentalist school, from Fechner to Birkhoff and beyond, which has attempted to get at the bases of aesthetic judgment by a variety of statistical techniques—aptitude and preference tests, projective devices such as the Thematic Apperception Test, and physiological studies of aesthetic responses. The other is the "Gestalt" school, which has centered upon the process of perception, working out the implications of its theory that aesthetic and other insights are characterized by the apprehension of complex wholes as wholes, rather than by a merely additive recognition of parts and their relations. A brief summary of the accomplishments of both schools in studying the arts may be found in the essay by Douglas N. Morgan listed below. Most students of literature have found the experimentalist approach largely unpromising; and though Gestalt psychology has produced interesting results in the analysis of perceptual patterns in the visual arts, it has so far been unable to transfer its methods into literary analysis with any degree of success. See, however, Rudolf Arnheim's "Psychological Notes on the Poetical Process," in Poets at Work, which once more turns back to the poet himself.

Of the important contribution of I. A. Richards, with his theory of aesthetic experience as the harmonious integration of impulses, little can be said here. It has already been mentioned that his stress upon the interplay of various properties of language in a poem helped to launch the modern development of close verbal analysis. It may be added that in his early stand against the idea that poetry has a cognitive or knowledge-giving validity (see PSEUDO-STATEMENT), he brought on a renewal of an age-old dispute in c. as to the relation between art and "truth"—or in his terms, poetry and science. Though many of Richards' views have altered since he published The Foundations of Aesthetics (with C. K. Ogden and James Woods) in 1921, his first positivistic spelling-out of the function of poetry has remained one of the most productive irritants in modern literary theory. On his views and their influence, see John Crowe Ransom's The New C. (1941), Murray Krieger's The New Apologists for Poetry (1956), and chs. 27-28 of Wimsatt and Brooks.

In contrast to the types of c. so far discussed, the type known loosely as comparative c. draws such unity as it has from its method rather than from any one distinctive body of knowledge or theory. The method is that of directly comparing one work with another, one artist with another, one artistic movement with another. Since such comparison may be made from any of the points of view already mentioned—since it may be formal and stylistic, or historical, or sociological, and so on—this kind of c. cuts obliquely across the other types, and might reasonably be taken as a subdivision of each of them. But it does have a sphere of its own, in that the name "comparative" properly refers to c. that jumps the boundary lines between national literatures, comparing (say) Shakespeare with Racine or Lope de Vega, or between the different arts, comparing Milton with Poussin, Shakespeare's Othello with Verdi's, or the formal balance of Augustan verse with that of Palladian architecture. A great deal of such c. has been incidental rather than systematic, aimed at isolating particular qualities of style, particular themes and motifs, or special analogies among the arts. But there is nonetheless a natural tendency in such c. to lead on into historical generalizations that attempt to catch the Zeitgeist in action, or into aesthetic theory. An interest in the theoretical and practical connections among the arts has figured in c. since the day of Leonardo da Vinci's Paragone, sometimes as a major issue, producing scores of essays on the "parallels" of poetry with painting or music or some other art, along with some noted works that stand out against the trend and insist on the folly of confusing the arts—e.g., Lessing's Laokoön and the New Laokoön of Irving Babbitt. (See Wimsatt and Brooks, ch. 13.) Modern aesthetics itself may be said to have sprung out of 18th-c. comparative c. on the theoretical level.

When any of the foregoing types of c. advances a judgment as to the value of a poem or the artistic rank of an author, it becomes to that extent judicial c. In one sense, as has already been suggested, c. is bound to involve implicit value-judgments even in its earliest stages; merely to recognize a literary phenomenon is to place it in some way, at least tentatively, and thus to have an attitude toward it. The attitude may turn out to need revision, but it is normative from the first. But c. becomes fully and explicitly judicial when it measures out praise and blame to a poem or a poet in accordance with some generalized standard of excellence. Although standards of value may seem to differ so widely in practice that there is little hope of finding common denominators among them, they do fall into various categories, and each type of c. has its own appropriate range of them. One broad distinction may be made between aesthetic and ideological standards. The critic for whom a poem is something to be contemplated in and for itself will make judgments of value that are primarily aesthetic, keyed to the inner economy of the piece and the uniqueness of its psychological effect; see the discussion of modern technical analysis above. Such a critic may go on to apply other standards, but formal and (immediate) psychological values are his home ground. On the other hand, the critic for whom a poem is interesting chiefly as a commentary on experience will judge it primarily by the ideological standards—political, social, ethical, religious—that seem to him to matter most in judging experience as a whole. In an extreme instance, as in Marxist c., or any c. based single-mindedly on social or religious commitments, the ideological implications of a poem may mean everything, and the fact that it is a poem little or nothing. But the great bulk of ideological c. is not so doctrinaire as to demand that a poem support the critic's own views or devote its powers to a practical cause. The central position of such c. is simply that literature draws much of its value out of a serious and complex relevance to the rest of experience, and that in evaluating a poem one needs to consider what that relevance is, how far it goes, and what light there may be in it.

From the beginning, the most pervasive of ideological standards in the critical tradition have been ethical standards. The profound moral influence that poetry is capable of exerting has been an active issue in c. since Plato banished from his ideal republic all poetry except hymns to the gods and praises of famous men. For much subsequent c. the problem of the relation between moral and aesthetic standards was posed in Horace's finely ambiguous formula that the end of poetry is "aut prodesse aut delectare," to instruct or to delight—or both. The grounds on which Renaissance critics defended poetry from philistines and philosophers were ethical: poetry incited men to virtue through representing the beauty of noble actions. And this was no mere tactical maneuver. It was an axiom in older genre-theory that each of the major forms had its own contribution to make toward the inculcation of valuable ideas about human conduct; Rapin and LeBossu, not to mention Virgil and Spenser, regarded the epic as potentially a lesson in ethical and even political wisdom. Between the two extremes of outright didacticism and "art for art's sake" there has traditionally been a wide range of argument; to disagree with Tolstoi is by no means to agree with Oscar Wilde.

Few would deny the proposition that literature exhibits human character and action in situations that have serious moral meaning, and thus that it is in part, in Matthew Arnold's phrase, a criticism of life. It is when the critic assumes that the prime function of a poem is to deal in a morally positive way with experience, to punish vice and reward virtue, or to provide improving images of goodness—in short, when he judges the poem as a right or wrong reaction to life—that ethical c. becomes overbearing and runs into opposition. For even if art were definable simply as the representation of life, it is not the same thing as the life it represents, and the standards by which it is to be judged must take account of the difference as well as the likeness. This is basically the distinction that underlies the much-quoted observation of T. S. Eliot in Religion and Literature: "The 'greatness' of literature cannot be determined solely by literary standards; though we must remember that whether it is literature or not can be determined only by literary standards." It is characteristic of ethical c.—as of ideological judgment in general—that it does attempt to grapple with the problems of truth and greatness in literature, the very problems that aesthetic or "literary" standards alone seem least able to solve.

Critics have often applied their judicial standards without looking into the philosophical status of the values they entail. But there is a long-standing theoretical dispute about the very nature of values and the way in which they get into experience, and critics customarily take part in it, even if only inadvertently and by implication. They are likely to feel a strong temperamental assurance either that the values they discover in poems are aspects of a permanent and unalterable reality, or that those values, while firm and vivid enough in present experience, are dependent upon all sorts of temporary conditions, and thus may change as the conditions change. The first attitude is that of the so-called absolutist, the second that of the relativist. The absolutist position is that there is one universal order of things, and thus one ultimate hierarchy of values, lying behind the variety of appearances, and that the diversity of standards on every side is simply an indication of the difference in the power of individuals (and even of whole eras) to see through to the truth. This is generally an unpopular view today, to judge by the number of critics who congratulate themselves and others on being relativists. But there are several possible meanings of the word relativism; the two most common forms of relativist doctrine in c., though they agree in accepting a psychological rather than an ontological definition of value, do not necessarily agree either in their implications or in their critical methods. These two chief forms are personal and historical relativism. The first holds that all valuation is subjective, that values therefore may differ from one man to another, that no man's perceptions in this kind are to be regarded as definitive, and that, in fact, de gustibus non est disputandum. A thoroughgoing impressionist might be expected to take this stand, though there is nothing to keep him from believing instead that his own values are indelibly graven in the nature of things. The extreme subjectivity of personal relativism is missing from the other form, historical relativism, which stresses the influence of social and educational conditioning upon the individual. The historical relativist holds that values change as times and manners change, that what is significant and satisfying to one age or nation may seem the very reverse to another, and that in judging the work of any poet the critic must take into account the standards of the age in which he lived. For a lively exposition of this point of view, see Frederick A. Pottle's The Idiom of Poetry (2d ed., 1947).

One final type of c. calls for comment, though there is a reasonable doubt that it does or can exist. Whether there is such a thing as scientific c. depends mainly upon definition. The various operations that have been described occasionally as scientific c.—sociological, psychological, and anthropological studies of different sorts, but also linguistic commentary, textual editing, attribution, the dating of manuscripts, and even biography—are not distinguished by any uniformity of criteria as to what constitutes a science. Most writers who refer to such studies as scientific mean presumably that they exhibit a high respect for empirical fact and strive for the utmost clarity and consistency in describing their data. If this is science, then there is no doubt that c. should bend its efforts toward becoming altogether a science, as critics sometimes propose. But it may be observed that a study is scientific only as far as its materials and their relations prove to be subject to empirical verification, so that the laws of their behavior can be inferred and prediction can be based on them. Whatever may be said of phonemes, watermarks, and rates of respiration, values are not amenable to such treatment. They are not "public" data; they can be reported and discussed but not "verified," as that term is understood by the scientist. Until there is an empirical science of value (as opposed to a mere statistical technique for finding out how many people prefer Keats to Wordsworth), there can be no science of c. in any but a superficial sense. In the meantime, for those who regard "science" as an honorific name, it will have to continue to apply to the various factual disciplines that inform and support but cannot in themselves complete the act of c.

B.R.

J. Guyau, L'art au point de vue sociologique (1889); M. Dessoir, Asthetik und allgemeine Kunstwissenschaft (1906); Eliot, Wood; Richards, Principles (1924); and Practical C. (1929); C. S. Lewis and E. M. W. Tillyard, The Personal Heresy in C. (1934); E. Pound, Guide to Kulchur (1938); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Tradition (1939); Gilbert and Kuhn; T. M. Greene, The Arts and the Art of C. (1940); F. A. Pottle, The Idiom of Poetry (1941; enlarged ed. 1946); N. Foerster et al., Literary Scholarship (1941); Langer; H. J. Muller, Sci- ence and C. (1943); F. J. Hoffman, Freudianism and the Literary Mind (1945); S. Pepper, The Basis of C. in the Arts (1945); H. Levin, "Lit. as an Institution," Accent, 6 (1946); C. Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn (1947); The Importance of Scrutiny, ed. E. Bentley (1948); S. E. Hyman, The Armed Vision (1948); Wellek and Warren; H. Dingle, Science and Literary C. (1949); D. N. Morgan, "Psychology and Art Today: A Summary and Critique," JAAC, 10 (1950); L. Trilling, The Liberal Imagination (1950); The Creative Process, ed. B. Ghiselin (1952); Abrams; H. D. Duncan, Language and Lit. in Society (1953; bibliog. 143-214); Wimsatt; V. Erlich, Rus. Formalism (1955; see esp. ch. 6, "Marxism versus Formalism"); Daiches; Wimsatt and Brooks; Frye; F. Kermode, The Romantic Image (1957); Y. Winters, The Function of C. (1957); F. Bowers, Textual and Lit. C. (1959); H. Gardner, The Business of C. (1959); L. D. Lerner, The Truest Poetry (1960); S. E. Hyman, Poetry and C. (1961); R. E. Lane, The Liberties of Wit . . . (1961); C. S. Lewis, An Experiment in C. (1961); N. Frye, The Well-Tempered Critic (1963); R. Wellek, Concepts of C., ed. S. G. Nichols (1963); Sutton; Explication as C., ed. W. K. Wimsatt (1963).

B.R.; L.D.L.

CROWN OF SONNETS. Traditionally a sequence of 7 It. sonnets so interwoven as to form a "crown" of panegyric for the one to whom they are addressed. The interweaving is accomplished by using the last line of each of the first 6 sonnets as the first line of the succeeding sonnet, with the last line of the seventh being a repetition of the opening line of the first. A further restriction prohibits the repetition of any given rhyme sound once it is used in the crown. Employed first in Italy early in the development of the sonnet as a form, the c.o.s. is probably best known in John Donne's Holy Sonnets, where it stands as a prologue to the sequence proper, the 7 sonnets being titled as follows: La Corona, Annunciation, Nativitie, Temple, Crucifying, Resurrection, and Ascension; with the opening and closing line of the series being "Deigne at my hands this crown of prayer and praise."

L.J.Z.

CUADERNA VÍA. A Sp. meter (also called alejandrino, mester de clerecia, nueva maestría) in which syllable-count verse was used for the first time in Castilian, though the line soon deteriorated or was modified to one of somewhat more flexible length. It was introduced, probably under Fr. influence, in the first part of the 13th c. or earlier by the clergy (hence the name mester de clerecia in contrast to the mester de juglaria, or minstrel's meter or craft, typical of the popular epic and other narrative poetry). This meter, particularly in the work of its earliest known exponent, Gonzalo de Berceo (late 12th to mid-13th c.), is noted for its rigidity of form: lines were made up of carefully counted syllables; each line consisted of 2 hemistichs of 7 syllables each; the lines were grouped into stanzas of 4 monorhymed lines each, the rhymes being in consonance. According to Fitz-Gerald, hiatus was obligatory, though contraction, apocope, apharesis, dialysis, synizesis, and sometimes syncope were permitted. An example of the c.v. from the work of Berceo is the following:

Yo Maestro Gonzalvo de Berceo nomnado, iendo en romeria, caeci en un prado, verde e bien sencido, de flores bien poblado;
logar cobdiciaduero pora homne cansado.

The best known works written largely in c.v. are Juan Ruiz's Libro de buen amor and López de Ayala's Rimado de Palacio, both of the 14th c. The c.v., which was employed for most of the serious poetry written in the 13th and 14th c., was completely supplanted in the 15th by the arte mayor (q.v.).—J. D. Fitz-Gerald, Versification of the C.V. as Found in Berceo's Vida de Santo Domingo de Silos (1905); J. Saavedra Molina, "El verso de clerecia," Boletín de Filología, 6 (1950-51); Navarro.

D.C.C.

CUBAN POETRY. See SPANISH AMERICAN POETRY.

CUBISM is the name that in mockery Henri Matisse gave in 1908 to the new school of art in Paris which under the leadership of Picasso and Braque was trying to represent modernism. A common denominator for art and poetry, at the dawn of the 20th c., was recognized by a number of poets, most gifted among them Guillaume Apollinaire and Pierre Reverdy. The cubists veered away from the reproduction or imitation of the dimensions and perspectives of nature. While retaining concrete forms and living entities as subject matter, they appeared to reduce them to simplified or stylized geometric patterns. But Apollinaire, better than the art critics, understood that the dehumanization and the distortion of reality, which resulted from a new concept of beauty, were in effect investing geometry with a fourth dimension. His book, The Cubist Painters, explained the united effort of the poet and the painter to renew nature's appearances and to convey the inner sense rather than the outer forms of reality, thereby stretching the limits of human imagination. For poets of that pre-war epoch, c. became the bridge from traditional techniques toward a more subtle and flexible comprehension of the subject-object relationship in the arts.—G. Lemaître, From C. to Surrealism in Fr. Lit. (1941); W. Sypher, Rococo to C. in Art and Lit. (1960). A.E.B.

CUBO-FUTURISM. A school in Rus. poetry, which originated on the eve of World War I. The first c.-f. miscellany, Sadok sudei (A Trap for the Judges) appeared in 1910. At first they called themselves "budetlyane" (Rus. neologism for "men of the future"). Only as late as 1913 did they begin to call themselves futurists. In their manifestos (1912–14) D. Burlyuk, V. Khlebnikov, A. Kruchonykh, and V. Mayakovsky called for a complete overhauling of poetic language, for doing away with any and all literary conventions—from the "sentimental" themes of love and romance to the "obsolete" rules of grammar. The iconoclastic arrogance of this credo is clearly reminiscent of the leader of It. futurism (q.v.), F. I. Marinetti. Yet in their tendency toward "creative deformation" of reality, and toward free, untrammelled verbal play, the Rus. futurists were more akin to the cubists (hence the term "c.-f.") and to the Fr. dadaists. Not unlike the latter, the cubo-futurists espoused the gospel of pure euphony; they favored the sound, or more broadly the sensory texture of the word, at the expense of its semantic aspect. This revolt against meaning found its expression in the slogan of "trans-sense language" (zaumny yazyk) and in Kruchonykh's and Kamensky's attempts to write verse composed solely of arbitrary combinations of sounds.

More rewarding than the crude experiments with nonsense syllables was the path-breaking poetry of Velimir Khlebnikov (1885–1922). His poem, Incantation by Laughter, based entirely on an ingenious play with derivatives, is perhaps the most characteristically "futurist" Rus. poem. Khlebnikov was deemed too difficult by the general public, but for many young poets his linguistic discoveries were a major source of inspiration. If Khlebnikov was the most original figure in Rus. futurism, its most popular exponent was Vladimir Mayakovsky (1894–1930), who combined poetic craftsmanship with boisterous coarseness and a genuine lyrical talent with a blatant propagandistic zeal. In the first years of the Revolution, Mayakovsky and some of his futurist confrères sought hegemony in Soviet letters, but their Bohemian antics were viewed with increasing disfavor. By the mid-1920's the Rus. futurist movement had run its course.—A. Kaun, Soviet Poets and Poetry (1943); C. M. Bowra, The Creative Experiment (1949); D. S. Mirsky, A Hist. of Rus. Lit. (1949); R. Poggioli, The Poets of Russia (1960); An Anthol. of Rus. Verse, ed. A. Yarmolinski (1962); V. Markov, The Longer Poems of Velimir Khlebnikov (1962). v.e.

CUECA CHILENA. A South Am. popular dance song, also called chilenita, zamacueca, zamacueca peruana. It is an 8-line seguidilla (q.v.) in which the basic quatrain is separated from the estribillo (refrain) by the insertion of a line that is a repetition of the fourth line plus the word sí.—F. Hanssen, "La seguidilla," Auc, 125 (1909). d.c.c.

CULTERANISM. See CULTISM.

CULTISM, which may be considered synonymous with gongorism and culteranism, is best understood in relation to conceptism. Traditionally, in Sp. literary history, cultism describes a poetic style in which learned words, Hispanized from L. and Gr., are prominent. Conceptism, on the other hand, is a style in poetry or prose characterized by ingenious or "precious" ideas. In other words, according to this view, cultism concerns poetic vocabulary and conceptism concerns the expression of thought in literature. But even in theory this is too simple: it is impossible absolutely to divorce thought from expression. In practice, cultism and conceptism are often found intermingled. If they are kept provisionally separate in the interest of analysis, cultism may be found best exemplified in Luis de Góngora y Argote (1561–1627) and his followers, and conceptism best exemplified in Francisco de Quevedo y Villegas (1580–1645) and Baltasar Gracián (1601–58).

While it is true that Góngora often drew on L. in fashioning neologisms, it must be recognized that L. has always been the reservoir of Sp. and also that many new creations did become permanently naturalized. Contemporary testimony in the form of satire (e.g., Quevedo's "La Culta Latiniparla") is misleading in that it suggests that Góngora and his school wilfully displaced good Sp. words with Latinisms and various preciosities. More characteristic of Góngora is his strange use of common words: e.g., peinar ("to comb") in the sense of "to plow" or "to pass through" (as in "peinar el viento"). The effect is that of a striking and original metaphor, and, in general, of a new linguistic system built right into the old. In the new language common objects or qualities take on a multiple existence: grain becomes gold and wool becomes snow; white may be snow or crystal or ivory. In syntax, Góngora tends to compress by following as closely as Sp. inflection allows the freedom of L.; hyperbaton, dislocated word-order, is the result. For instance, "De este, pues, formidable de la tierra / bostezo, el melancólico vacío / a Polifemo, horror de aquella sierra, / bárbara choza es, albergue umbrío / y redil espacioso . . ." (Describing a cave: "For the melancholy void of this formidable yawn of the earth is for Polyphemus, terror of that range, rude hut, shady lodging, and roomy sheep-fold").

The major literary contest in the Sp. baroque age was carried on by Góngora and Quevedo, supported on either side by lesser partisans. If Quevedo refrained from using Latinate words and bending Sp. words to his own esoteric uses, nevertheless he made capital of word play, drawing on slang (germanía), double meaning, and etymology. He is also fond of syntactical contrast, paradox, and oxymoron. It can be seen, therefore, that Góngora and Quevedo had several things in common: a use of language (whether in "word" or "thought") which broke with usual Renaissance practice in its expanded and "indecorous" vocabulary, its compressed and "difficult" expression, its thorough exploitation of multiple meaning. Quevedo's criticism of Góngora may be reduced, without much loss, to his disapproval of Latinizing Sp. Indeed, cultism may be restricted to describing this aspect of gongorine style. The true affinities of the two poets are best seen under the light of general baroque (q.v.) poetic style. Their close relation was, in effect, recognized by the chief theorist of the time, Baltasar Gracián, in his highly specialized anthology and commentary, the Agudeza y Arte de Ingenio (1648; earlier version, El Arte de Ingenio, 1642). Gracián himself is a master of baroque artifice, and his work, while emulating the older rhetoric, is in part an original analysis of poetic taste and practice of the time. In it, Góngora and Quevedo, as well as the whole range of ancient and modern poetry, serve side by side as examples of wit and ingeniousness and art.—B. Croce, "I trattatisti italiani del concettismo e Baltasar Gracián," Problemi di estetica (1905); L. P. Thomas, Le Lyrisme et la préciosité cultistes en Espagne (1909); D. Alonso, Evolución de la sintaxis de Góngora (1928), La lengua poética de Góngora (1935, 3d corr. ed., 1961) and Poesía española (2d ed., 1952); E. Mérimée and S. G. Morley, A Hist. of Sp. Lit. (1930); W. Pabst, "Góngoras Schöpfung in seinen Gedichten Polifemo und Soledades," Revue Hispanique, 80 (1930); T. E. May, "Gracián's Idea of the 'Concepto,'" HR, 18 (1950); F. García Lorca, "La imagen poética en don Luis de Góngora," Obras completas (1954); D. Alonso, Góngora y el Polifemo, II (1961).

L.N.

CURSUS. See PROSE RHYTHM.

CYCLIC FOOT. The "cyclic dactyl," which is rejected by almost all modern metricians, was a faulty assumption by J. A. Apel in 1806 from a passage in Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1st c. B.C.) that the component syllables of dactyls in lyric verse might on occasion have their morae or time-units in the proportion of $1\frac{1}{2}: \frac{1}{2}: 1$ (indicated by $\sim\sim=\sim\sim$) instead of the normal ratio $2: 1: 1$ (indicated by $\sim\sim\sim$). In other words such dactyls (and anapaests) were assumed to be in triple instead of common time (diplasic instead of isomeric). See CLASSICAL PROSODY.—J. W. White, The Verse of Gr. Comedy (1912); Hardie; Kolář; Koster.

R.J.G.

CYNGHANEDD. A scheme of sound correspondences peculiar to Welch poetry, involving accentuation, alliteration and internal rhyme. Described by Gerard Manley Hopkins as "chimes," he admitted that they were a main influence on his own formal experiments. In Welsh it was well developed by the 14th c., although not finally codified until the Caerwys Eisteddfod (Bardic Assembly) of 1524. It was, and still is, a main feature of strict-meter poetry, but it has often been practiced, with varying degrees of strictness, in the free-meters, and in our own day even in vers libre.

Cynghanedd is of three kinds: consonantal; sain, involving both rhyme and alliteration; and lwg (dragging), a form of internal rhyme, which was practiced also in Breton.

Consonantal c. is of three kinds: crossing, leaping, and interlinked crossing. In all examples of the "crossing" type, the alliteration forms a pattern in relation to 2 stressed vowels—the last before the caesura and the last in the line. There are three kinds of "crossing": stressed, unstressed, and "uneven-falling." In the first type, for example, the 2 stressed vowels above-mentioned are not followed by unstressed vowels within the same half-lines. In this type, all consonants within the half-lines which precede the final stressed vowels must be repeated in the same order, e.g.

Yr ydwyf í / ar dy fedd (r d f / r d f).

In the unstressed and "uneven-falling" types, the sound relations, though similar to the above, are more complex. In the "leaping" types, the correspondences are as for the "crossing" types, except that, after the caesura, the repetitions are preceded by one or more unrepeatable consonants, and where the "crossing" is interlinked, the repetitions begin before the caesura. In c. sain the line is in 3 sections, each with a main stress, the first section rhyming with the second, and the second related to the third as in consonantal c. In c. lwg, each line must end with a penultimate stress, the unstressed final syllable bearing the main rhyme, and the preceding stressed syllable rhyming with one of the earlier syllables in the same line, which may be stressed or post-stressed.

The rules of c. are stated above only in broad outline. Much of the skill and delight of c. poetry is in the variation of types in successive lines, and in the contrasting of vowel sounds alongside the repetition of consonants. It is an art form capable of a very rich, melodious, highly wrought and subtle effect, extensively exploited by Welsh poets.—Morris-Jones; Parry. D.M.L.

CZECH POETRY

CYWYDD. A group of Welsh meters, including the cywydd deuair hirion, popularized by Dafydd ap Gwilym (14th c.). The 14th to the early 16th c. are known as the Cywydd Period because during this time it became the normal Welsh meter. It was revived in the 18th c. by Goronwy Owen and Ieuan Fardd and is still popular. The earliest known examples are without cynghanedd (q.v.). Dafydd, however, embellished most of his lines with cynghanedd, and in the 15th c. this became obligatory in every line. The c. is closely similar to Ir. debhidhe. It is composed in rhyming couplets (aa, bb, cc, etc.), each line having 7 syllables, with the accentuation of the rhyming endings uneven, that is, with the stress penultimate in the one and final in the other. Unlike the rule for debhidhe, either type of ending may precede the other.—Morris-Jones; Parry. D.M.L.

CZECH POETRY. The earliest known example of verse in the Cz. vernacular is a hymn dating from the late 12th or early 13th c., addressed to the patron saint of Bohemia, Václav ("Good King Wenceslaus"). The 14th c. saw a great flowering of Cz. poetry, epic and lyric. Outstanding are an epic about Alexander of Macedon, and the numerous verse legends of lives of New Testament figures and saints, in particular a Life of St. Catherine of Alexandria noted for the brilliance of its imagery. These works all had medieval L. prototypes, but were often original in details. The lyric also came to Bohemia, especially from France and Italy; worthy of note is a Cz. variant of the Prov. aubade. An indigenous satiric poetry also flourished in the 14th c.: perhaps the most original example is a burlesque disputation, Podkoní a žák. (The Groom and the Student), in which each antagonist maintains that his life is the better. The form of most of Cz. 14th-c. verse was an 8-syllable trochaic line with couplet rhymes, though chronicle and lyric verse showed variations.

The Hussite period of the early 15th c. severely curtailed poetic expression, though it did produce interesting polemic poetry. Humanism brought new forms of L. verse, but poetic expression in the vernacular lagged behind, though the Cz. humanists made their native prose one of the most expressive of the written languages of Europe. The Counter-Reformation, which followed the loss of Cz. independence in 1620, saw the cultivation of a contemplative religious poetry of hymns and prayers, remarkable for their brilliant, flowery imagery and plays upon words, if at times too sentimental and overburdened with diminutives of endearment.

The end of the 17th and the 18th c. witnessed the virtual death of national literature; not till the latter half of the 18th c. were systematic attempts begun to revive Cz. as a literary language. This movement was nationalistic and patriotic; opposing the Jesuit Baroque heritage, it reached back further to the Cz. Protestant humanist tradition of the 16th and early 17th c. The result was that written Cz. as revived was somewhat archaic, and has remained so until today. But this tie with an ancient literary tradition has given modern Cz. a decided advantage over many other Central and East European literary languages.

Classical influences were strong in the early 19th c., and a period of vacillation between quantitative and qualitative (accentual) systems of verse ensued. Eventually qualitative verse triumphed (Cz. has a weak stress fixed on the first syllable), but length of syllables undoubtedly plays an important prosodic role in Cz. verse.

Didactic, biblical, laudatory and idyllic verse predominated at the end of the 18th c. in the work of such poets as A. J. Puchmajer (1769–1820). The beginning of the 19th c. brought preromanticism and a poetry dedicated to the national patriotic cause. The kinship of Czechs and other Slavic peoples was stressed. The Slovak poet Ján Kollár (1793–1852), who wrote in Cz., produced a collection of sonnets, Slávica (The Daughter of Sláva, 1824 and 1832), a grandiose and sometimes moving attempt to construct a Slavic mythology and to foretell a happier future for the Slavic peoples. F. L. Čelakovský (1799–1852) utilized the inspiration of Slavic folk songs in his Ohlasy ("Echoes") of Rus. and Cz. folk songs (1829 and 1839, respectively).

Romanticism came full-fledged with K. H. Mácha (1810–36), probably, in spite of his early death, the greatest Cz. poet. His solitary masterpiece, the narrative poem Máj (May 1836), is Byronic in subject, but is remarkable for the saturated intensity of the imagery, which portrays the poet's favorite romantic antitheses of age and youth, love and death. May is the time of youth and love:

Byl pozdní večer—první máj—
večerní máj—byl lásky čas.
Hrdliččin zval ku lásce hlas, kde borový zaváněl háj.

It was late evening, the first of May—
Evening May—it was the time of love.

The voice of the turtle-dove summoned to love

Where the pine grove wafted its scent.

These opening lines are the best known in all Cz. poetry. But this time of childlike innocence is fleeting:

Daleko zanesl věk onen časů vztek, dalekot' jeho sen. . .
to jesti' zemělých krásný dětinský čas.

The fury of the times bore that season far away,

Far off his dream. . .

The fair childhood age of the dead.

Mácha introduced iambic verse to Cz.: before him modern Cz. verse had been exclusively trochaic (even Kollár's sonnets were in trochees); occasional iambic lines were considered as trochaic with anacrusis. This was because Cz. has fixed stress on the first syllable, so that lines normally open with a stress. Mácha varied the treatment of the first foot of the line and, emphasizing the iambic character of the other feet, thus shaped a true iambic verse. More conservative was K. J. Erben (1811-70), who created the Cz. romantic ballad, inspired by the popular ballad of folk poetry.

The failure of the Revolution of 1848 brought an end to the movement for independence and to the first wave of romanticism.
Not till the 1860's did a strong new romantic movement emerge. The national cause was once again dominant, but now found a more practical expression through the creation of popular institutions, including a national theater. Writers were concerned with social problems: democracy, the emancipation of women, the correction of economic injustice, as well as with the longing for national independence.
The leading poet of this period was Jan
Neruda (1834-91), who strove to develop national consciousness, at times indulging in sharp ironic criticism of his too contented people. During the 1870's and 1880's the nationalist tendency continued to dominate, notably in the work of Svatopluk Čech (1846-1908), a follower of the Pan-Slavic poet Kollár.
Čech's style, often bombastic, at times attained real rhetorical power. In his lyrics he dealt with the political misfortunes of his people and, like Neruda, was capable of sarcasm at the expense of national self-satisfaction.

The technical side of Cz. verse had suffered during this era, but the 1870's saw it rise to a new brilliance with the work of the Parnassian poet Jaroslav Vrchlický (pseudonym of Emil Frida, 1853-1912). A superb technician, Vrchlický introduced many new forms as well as poetic themes from abroad; in this he and his followers opposed the more nationally minded poets who were his contemporaries.

Vrchlický even rejected the traditionally canonized use of folk motifs and forms in Cz. higher poetry. He wrote voluminously, and translated from most contemporary European tongues as well as from the classical languages; his total production exceeds one hundred volumes, and includes much narrative and dramatic as well as lyric verse. A follower of Victor Hugo's evolutionary optimism, he was more limited in ideas than in form. Tending towards aestheticism and the cult of classical antiquity, he failed, however, to turn the current of Cz.
poetry permanently in either direction.

Vrchlický was followed by J. S. Machar (1864-1942), who sought to create a great poetic panorama of world history; like Nietzsche, he believed that history follows a spiral movement, alternately rising and falling. Greater as poets were the Cz. symbolists, influenced by Fr. and Belgian symbolism. The most important of these was Otokar Březina (pseudonym of V. I. Jebavý, 1868-1929), who wrote rhapsodic verse celebrating the mystic union of all men and of man and cosmos. Themes of decadence appear in the work of such poets as Jiří Karásek ze Lvovic (1871-1951) and Karel Hlaváček (1874-98). Viktor Dyk (1877-1931) wrote sarcastic epigrams on superficial Cz.
patriotism, as well as giving a poetic portrait of the contemporary "lost generation" of the fin-de-siècle. The Cz. symbolists, particularly Březina and Antonín Sová (1864-1928), did much to strengthen the musical aspect of Cz.
verse as well as to cultivate an impressionistic imagery.

The achievement of national independence in 1918 was followed by a period of intense creativity. The early 1920's brought a wave of so-called proletarian poetry, expressing a warm
if naive sympathy for the Soviet experiment.
The leading poet of this trend was Jiří Wolker (1900-1924). The late 1920's saw a sudden and violent shift to "poetism," a school of "pure poetry" which had its roots in dadaism, futurism (qq.v.) and vitalism. The poetists sought to create a poetry of joy of living, of urban life and technology, a poetry inspired by peripheral arts such as the film, circus, and musical revue. Leading "poetists" were Vítěz-slav Nezval (1900-58) and Jaroslav Seifert (1901-).

The early 1930's saw the sudden collapse of poetism as a movement: Nezval went over to surrealism, while Seifert turned to a more personal poetry of sensual imagery. The period also saw the cultivation of a spiritual and meditative poetry in the work of Josef Hora (1891-1945) and such Catholic poets as Jaroslav
Durych (1886-1962) and Jan Zahradníček (1905-60). Probably the greatest poet of this period is František Halas (1901-49), a complex writer obsessed by themes of death, old age, and decay. Most of these poets (except the Catholics) were leftists in politics, but their poetry remained individualist.

World War II and the subsequent Communist coup virtually destroyed the older poetic tradition. Durych was silenced, as was Seifert until 1955, while Zahradníček was long imprisoned. In the spring of 1956 demands for greater freedom began to be heard, and Seifert and František Hrubín (1910–) sharply criticized the restrictions imposed on literature. But it is still too soon to determine whether any significant relaxation will be effected.

Cz. poetry has almost always been the dominant form of expression in Cz. literature, and prose has lagged far behind. The poetic culture attained a particularly high level under symbolism and again in the 1920's and 1930's. This occurred in spite of the frequent predominance of nationalist and didactic trends, and of the relative weakness of aestheticist, Parnassian, or classicist tendencies in modern Cz. literature. The native folk lyric has had a strong influence in many periods, as has the folk epics of other Slavic peoples: Russians and Serbs. During the 19th c. the leading foreign influences were those of Shakespeare, Milton, Goethe, Schiller, Byron, Pushkin, Mickiewicz, Béranger, Heine and Hugo, with the Fr. symbolists, Whitman, and Verhaeren important at the very end of the century. The 20th c. has seen extreme variety of foreign influence.

The lyric has had a stronger tradition than the epic; perhaps the lack of a native folk epics is to blame here. But the ballad, a mixed epic-lyric form influenced by the Cz. folk ballad, has been important. Dramatic poetry is on the whole weak, though there are many plays in verse. In the 20th c. the predominance of the lyric has been absolute, as in European poetry generally.

In prosodic form binary meters are virtually exclusive, since the language has a tendency to accent on every odd syllable. Mixed trochaic-dactylic forms based on classical or native folk models are common, however, particularly under romanticism.

ANTHOLOGIES: Česká poesie XIX. věku, I-III, "Máj" (1897–98); Česká lyra (1911) and Česká epika (1912), both ed. F. S. Procházka; Modern Cz. Poetry, ed. P. Selver (1920); Anthologie de la poésie tchèque, ed. H. Jelinek (1930); Zpěv českého obrození, 1750–1866, ed. M. Očadlík (1940); poetry of the Cz. Revival; Lyrika českého obrození, ed. V. Jiráček (1940); Modern Cz. Poetry, ed. E. Osers and J. K. Montgomery (1945); Česká poesie, Československý spisovatel (1951); Nová česká poesie, Československý spisovatel (1955); A Book of Cz. Verse, ed. A. French (1958); The Linden Tree, ed. M. Otruba and Z. Pešat (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: J. Jakubec and A. Novák, Gesch. der tschechischen Lit. (1907); P. Selver, Otokar Březina (1921; in Eng.); J. Král, O prosodii české, I (1923); F. Chudoba, A Short Survey of Cz. Lit. (1924); R. Jakobson, Základy českého verše (1926; opposes Král's book); H. Jelinek, Hist. de la litt. tchèque (3 v., 1930–1935); J. and A. Novák, Přehledné dějiny literatury české (1936–39; most thorough survey; abridged and supplemented as Stručné dějiny lit. české, 1946); F. X. Šalda, Studie literární historické a kritické (1937) and Kritické glosy k nové poesii české (1939; poetry of the 1920's and 1930's); J. Mukařovský, Kapitoly z české poetiky (3 v., 1948); B. Meriggi, Storia della letteratura ceca e slovacca (1958); J. Hrabák, Studie o českém verši (1959; studies of Cz. verse). W.E.H.

CZECH PROSODY. See SLAVIC PROSODY.

D

DACTYL (Gr. "finger"). A metrical unit, in quantitative verse, consisting of a long syllable followed by two short ones:

— ∪ ∪; filíus

In accentual verse, an accented syllable followed by two unaccented ones:

ˈ x x; tenderly

Widely used in classical poetry, especially in the hexameter and the elegiac distich (qq.v.), where it may be replaced by a spondee (— —).

Also, in lyric verse, pure or in combination with other forms, such as the epitrite (one short and three long syllables, in any order; see DACTYLO-EPITRITE). Except in imitations of the classical hexameter, the use of the d. as a basis for Eng. verse is infrequent till the 19th c., when Browning, Scott, Swinburne, and others employed it, and is still rarely done well, its prolonged use tending to override the normal word-accent and result in a grotesque jiggling. But this very grotesqueness is sometimes what is wanted in modern verse.—Hardie; Hamer; Koster; U. v. Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958).

D.S.P.

DACTYLO-EPITRITRIT. This Gr. lyric meter of Pindar, Bacchylides, and the drama is a compound of dactyls, spondees, and epitrits. The dactyls generally form cola of the type ----- (dactylic tripod catalectic in syllabam or hemiepes) and -----, and the epitrits are normally of the form ---- rather than -----. The name "dactylo-epitritr" as a compound word is not ancient but was given currency by the 19th-c. metricians A. Rossbach and R. Westphal. See EPITRITRIT.—Hardie; Kolář; Dale; U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958). R.J.G.

DADAISM. In Zurich in 1916, a Roumanian, Tristan Tzara, an Alsatian, Hans Arp, and two Germans, Hugo Ball and Richard Huelsenbeck, chose a word to represent their need for total freedom. The word was "Dada," independent of specific connotations, signifying everything and nothing at the same time, primitive but all-encompassing. In 1919 Dada moved to Paris, where its international character became even more pronounced. Dadaism proved a potent nucleus for the poetically ardent, socially rebellious Fr. youths, including André Breton, Philippe Soupault, Paul Eluard, Louis Aragon, Georges Ribemont-Dessaignes and others, who were seeking to shape a new "cénacle." The Dadaists received encouragement and assistance from the slightly older and equally unconventional cubists. The basic word in the vocabulary of the Dadaists became "nothing." Dissatisfied with reason, morality, and religion, which they believed to have led the world into a senseless war, they undertook to sweep clean all the ideals and rules prevalent among the successful poets and artists of their time. Their performances consisted of public demonstrations verging on exhibitionism; "collage" in art and poetry, consisting of the juxtaposition of unrelated objects or words picked out at random and linked into an illogical unit; and poems and manifestoes which appeared in their official journal, Dada, and other periodicals. They waged war against cliché imagery, and standard syntax, and they invested the metaphor with elements of absurdity and irony. In 1921 they considered Dada to have outlived its usefulness and thereupon buried it, making way for surrealism (q.v.), which the Paris contingent proceeded to endow with a more solid and more positive ars poetica, conceived in the spirit of Dada. Elsewhere, particularly in Germany and America, under the initiative of Huelsenbeck and Arthur Cravan respectively, and with the cooperation of many artists, dadaism has survived as a trademark. However, its most permanent effects are deemed to have been felt by the poetry of France.—The Dada Painters and Poets, an Anthol., ed. R. Motherwell (1953); Dada, Monograph of a Movement, ed. W. Verkauf (2d ed., 1961); R. Huelsenbeck, En avant Dada. Eine Gesch. des Dadaismus (1920). A.E.B.

DAINA. See LITHUANIAN POETRY; LATVIAN POETRY.

DANISH POETRY. Rune (q.v.) inscriptions indicate that the ancient Danes were familiar with the verse form of Norse heroic poetry; however, no Dan. heroic poetry has been preserved in the original form. When Saxo Grammaticus (fl. 1200) recorded the oral poetic traditions, he used L. prose and hexameter, and furthermore the material is adulterated with non-Dan. elements. The reconstructed poems reflect the ethos of a ruling aristocracy: the main themes are war, love, and loyalty. Bjarkamál, whose heroes also appear in the Anglo-Saxon poems Widsith and Beowulf, is a powerful war song in dialogue form; the lay of Ingjald (ca. 950) is the monologue of an old warrior who castigates the ruling king's cowardice in failing to avenge his father's murder. The prevailing genre was the kviða (lay), a short heroic narrative in which one simple action, involving a limited number of characters, is rushed to a violently dramatic climax. The most common stanza used, fornyrðislag (q.v.), consists of 8 lines—each with 2 heavy beats—rhyming alliteratively in pairs.

In the Middle Ages (1100–1500) Dan. poetry assimilated the spirit and form of European courtly poetry. The folk ballad, which is the chief poetic monument of the age, reached Denmark from France in the early 12th c. But the Dan. ballad, with its rapid dramatic narrative, has also preserved essential elements of the old native poetry; and like the latter, it mirrors the life of the nobility. The most important single poem of the age is Den danske Rimkrønike (The Dan. Rhymed Chronicle, ca. 1478), written most likely by Brother Niels of Sorø. In the 16th c., poetry in the vernacular was still medieval in spirit and form; the folk ballad and the rhymed chronicle dictated the styles, notably subject to a growing German influence. In the drama, which was late in developing, the first significant contributions were those of Hieronymus Justesen Ranch (1537–1607), particularly the masterly farce Karrig Nidding (The Miserly Miscreant), the best Dan. play before Holberg. The form is the knittelvers (q.v.) rhymed couplet, interspersed with lyrical measures.

In the 17th c., when the Renaissance reached Denmark, the poets endeavored to create a national Dan. poetry on classical models. Foremost was Anders Arrebo (1587-1637), whose Hexæmeron (ca. 1622; pr. 1661), based on Du Bartas' La Semaine, was composed partly in twice-rhymed hexameter, partly in alexandrines. The style, with its classical-mythological imagery, is ineluctably artificial, achieving transparency only in rare passages of nature description. Most eminent of the grammarians who were simultaneously developing a theory of Dan. metrics was Hans Mikkelsen Ravn (1610-63), who in Ex Rhythmologia Danica epitome brevissima (1649), following Opitz, Ronsard, and Bembo, analyzed and illustrated a variety of metrical forms, mostly classical. This theoretical work provided the necessary technical instruments for the two greatest poets of the century, Bording and Kingo.

Anders Bording (1619-77) is best known as a versatile singer of wine, women, and song. But he also wrote delightful nature lyrics, although the classicizing tendency occasionally proved baneful, as in his Phaetonvise (Phaeton Ballad). In his hand the novel metrical forms became subtle vehicles of poetic expression. Thomas Kingo (1634-1703), however, was the first poet great enough fully to exploit the new-found metrical variety. He is remembered primarily for his Aandelige Syngekor I, II (Spiritual Choirs, I, II, 1674, 1678). Kingo's hymns, largely inspired by the Hebrew prophets, are unmistakably baroque in style, a characterization borne out by their thematic counterpoints and sensuous imagery. Metaphors are often forced and images revolting, especially in poems on the Passion and on death. He is most successful where the baroque does not predominate, as in his morning and evening hymns. Here a devout fervor has achieved a sublimely simple and forceful expression.

Whereas in the 17th c. the dominant foreign influence in Dan. poetry was German, in the 18th c. Fr. neoclassicism as formulated by Boileau provided the models. This change was due mainly to the activity of the Norwegian Ludvig Holberg, important both in Dan. and Norwegian literature. Although known chiefly as the creator of bourgeois prose comedy, in his verse mock-epic Peder Paars (1719-20), Holberg achieved notable distinction. Influenced by Boileau's Le Lutrin and Cervantes' Don Quixote, the satire of the poem was both literary and social. In the battle between the ancients and the moderns Holberg sided with the latter, employing Homer, Virgil, and their heroic lines as vehicles of commonplace emotion. Simultaneously, he attacked the pedantry and narrow-mindedness of the official dignitaries and the superstition of the commoner. The poem marks Holberg as the first great spokesman of the middle classes in Dan. literature.

Lyric poetry was in the first half of the 18th c. represented by Ambrosius Stub and Hans Adolf Brorson. Stub (1705-58) practiced a wide variety of genres, from the religious lyric to the drinking song. His form, influenced by the It. operatic aria, is concise as well as graceful; his style, in its delicate picturesqueness, has some features of the rococo. As Holberg expressed the rationalism of the age, Brorson expressed religious pietism, which especially during the reign of Christian VI (1730-46) was a strong cultural force in Denmark. In the second half of the century the rationalistic and the sentimental currents in Dan. literature assumed new and more programmatic forms. The inheritance from Fr. neoclassicism and Eng. empiricism was taken up by the Norwegian authors then settled in Copenhagen, who in 1772 organized Det norske Selskab, q.v. (The Norwegian Society); the claims of feeling and imagination were upheld by Det danske Litteraturselskab (The Dan. Literary Society), organized in 1774, with Johannes Ewald as honorary member. Decisive for the development of Ewald (1743-81), the preromantic poet of Denmark, was the German poet Klopstock, who with his Nordic dramas had adumbrated a Germanic renaissance. Klopstock introduced Ewald to Saxo Grammaticus; simultaneously Ewald read Macpherson's Osian and Shakespeare. His first important poetic drama, Balders Død (The Death of Balder, 1773), is a mixture of Fr. classical and Klopstockian Nordic tragedy, composed in blank verse with feminine endings, a form Ewald was the first to use in Dan. His most mature play is Fiskerne (The Fishermen, 1780), which was revolutionary by its treatment in the grand style of the life of the common man. The only noteworthy poet of the last twenty years of the century was Jens Baggesen (1764-1826), a mercurial spirit who alternated between 18th- and 19th-c. sensibility in accordance with the tenor of his personal experience.

Guldhornene (The Golden Horns, 1802) by Adam Oehlenschläger (1779-1850), the greatest poet of Denmark, precipitated the romantic movement. Oehlenschläger's genius was awakened—and his poem inspired—by the Norwegian Henrik Steffens, who in 1802 expounded the aesthetic theories of Schelling and the two Schlegels in Copenhagen. The poem condemns the rationalist and glorifies the born genius, alone capable of interpreting nature and history and of joining past and present. The form, an adaptation of Old Icelandic fornyrðislag, objectifies this historical consciousness, which enabled Oehlenschläger to create a Nordic as well as a nationally Dan. poetry. Oehlenschläger's works embrace epic, lyric, and drama. Noteworthy are his romances—based on native ballads, but composed in forms like ottava and terza rima—and the Shakespeare-inspired Sanct Hansaften-Spil (Midsummer Night Play, 1803), a lyrical comedy in knittelvers which ironically satirizes the contemporary view of poetry. The chief vehicle of Oehlenschläger's romantic philosophy is Aladdin (1805), a fairy-tale drama in blank verse with a Shakespearean richness of contrasting moods ranging from the sublime to the quotidian. After 1806, Oehlenschläger's subjectivism became tempered by his admiration for Goethe's and Schiller's objective poetry. Swayed by the German-national Heidelberg romanticism, he recast his universalist art into a national mold. Nordiske Digte (Northern Poems), published in 1807, contained Baldur hin Gode (Balder the Good), Thors Rejse (Thor's Journey), and his best drama, Hakon Jarl, a blank verse tragedy modeled on Schiller's Wallenstein. Although the principal value of these works was cultural, in that they restored, in artistic form, the heritage of Scandinavian myth, even their purely aesthetic merits are high, in some respects surpassing those of their German predecessors. National in inspiration was also the work of another romantic of stature, N.F.S. Grundtvig (1783-1872), who, less poet than cultural leader, nevertheless created an enduring monument in his hymns. In their imagery, impregnated with Dan. landscape and Nordic mythology, these hymns represent a deeply original poetic achievement, in its power comparable to that of Kingo.

About 1830 the older naive form of romanticism was superseded by romantisme, at the same time more socially aware, more contemplative, and formally more sophisticated. Johan Ludvig Heiberg (1791-1860), its chief representative, is noted for his romantic plays, which by their charming alternation between actuality and the dream world—as between prose and poetry—dissipated the public's desire for Oehlenschläger's tragedies. Although social satire abounded, as in Syvsoverdag (Seven Sleepers' Day, 1840), it was only with the delightful apocalyptic comedy En Sjal efter Døden (A Soul after Death, 1841) that satire of bourgeois inanity became Heiberg's primary purpose. The soul, used to the "fat, phlegmatic life on earth," adjusts painlessly to hell, the realm of the immediate, where no idea ever enters.

As early as the 1820's Steen Steensen Blicher (1782-1848) and Poul M. Møller (1794-1838) had written poems of realistic inspiration. Blicher's best work, Æ Bindstouw (The Knitting-room, 1842), which is a collection of stories with interspersed poems and ballads, marks not only the beginning of Dan. regional poetry, but also the first modern use of dialect. With Frederik Paludan-Müller (1809-76), second only to Oehlenschläger among Dan. poets, appeared critical realism, in his case the outcome of a rigorous ethical philosophy. The early lyric-narrative poem Dandserinden (The Dancing Girl, 1833) still exuded aestheticism; inspired by Byron's Don Juan, it features the ottava rima and a style alternating between pathos and ironical satire. After writing three successive mythological dramas, the poet reassumed the Byronic manner and form in his principal work, the three-volume epic Adam Homo (1841-48), in order to present a satirical picture of contemporary Dan. culture. Like Heiberg in En Sjal efter Døden he found it stripped of idealism and dominated by the insidious spirit of compromise.

Realism and satire notwithstanding, the same period brought forth, in the poetry of Ludvig Bødtker, Emil Aarestrup, and Christian Winther, the fairest flowers of romanticism, now largely aesthetic in inspiration. These poets express the subtly Epicurean side of the Dan. temperament, Bødtker (1793-1874) and Aarestrup (1806-56) through their love lyrics, in a minor and major key respectively. The poetry of Winther (1796-1876), one of Denmark's finest lyricists, is more complex. His themes, nature and love, are usually intimately combined, as in Træsniit (Woodcuts, 1828), ten romances giving genre pictures from the village. His greatest achievement, besides the poignant love poetry in Til Een (To Someone, 1843, 1849), is the romance Hjortens Flugt (The Flight of the Deer, 1855). The verse form used in this series of medieval idylls is a freely modified Nibelungen stanza (q.v.); the idiom is colloquial and slightly archaizing.

Winther's lyricism, which excels in the idyll, typifies Dan. lyric poetry in general in that the latter is seldom pure, but usually combines lyric and narrative elements. This feature may derive from the particular deficiencies and excellences of the Dan. language. Compared to Swedish and Norwegian, Dan. evinces but slight sonority, modulation, and melody; and the glottal stop causes a measured, if not staccato, rhythm. These qualities make Dan. only moderately effective as a medium for conveying high passion, whether erotic or cosmic, an area in which Swedish is supremely expressive. Also, they indicate a lack of the rhythmical impetus required for great dramatic poetry, the demands of which Norwegian more readily fulfills. Generally, the strength of Dan. lies in delicate and intimate lyricism and in descriptive poetry. With its subdued music and unemphatic but varied rhythm it is also an effective vehicle for reflective and satirical poetry, a significant tradition in Dan. literature from Holberg to the present. To illustrate the qualities of Dan., which like the other Scandinavian languages lends itself with about equal felicity to each of the four metrical movements, here is a stanza from Winther's poem Hvile (Repose, 1858), in dactylic-trochaic rhythm:

Solen er slukket, dagen forstummer, skyerne staa ved himlens rand.
 Stjernerne smile; drømme og slummer favne i stilhed hav og land.

The sun is extinguished, day's voices drowned,
 The clouds hover at heaven's end.
 The stars are smiling; in stillness wound
 Dreamy slumbers clasp sea and land.

A new age was marshaled in by the critic Georg Brandes, who demanded a literature that "subjected problems to debate." He could hardly fail to affect the work of three contemporary poets, Jens Peter Jacobsen (1847-85), Holger Drachmann (1846-1908), and Karl Gjellerup (1857-1919). By way of Edgar Allan Poe, Jacobsen found his form in the capriciously winding monologues he called "arabesques," free-verse poems whose violent coloring and veiled music suggest a subconscious origin. Drachmann was in Digte (Poems) of 1872 a revolutionary Brandesian, most characteristically so in English Socialists. Later he turned from radicalism both in politics and love, and a neoromantic attitude marks the plays which, like Der var engang (Once Upon a Time, 1885), dramatize themes from medieval fairy tales. But in the verse drama Vølund Smed (Wayland Smith, 1894), influenced by Shakespeare and Wagner, he appeared again as a passionate eroticist. In his best collection, Sange ved Havet (Songs by the Sea, 1877), Drachmann evoked with deep empathy the changing moods of the sea, where he perceived an image of his own protean spirit. As a lyric poet Drachmann is undoubtedly Denmark's greatest; at its best his style is distinctively individual. By varying line length and loosening rhythm, he created a most flexible form, preserved from flux through structural rhyme.

In the 1890's naturalism retreated before a neoromantic movement. Its program was formulated in Taarnet (The Tower, 1893-94), a monthly published jointly by Johannes Jørgensen (1866-1956), Viggo Stuckenberg (1863-1905), and Sophus Claussen (1865-1931). With Stemninger (Moods, 1892) Jørgensen, the editor, had introduced the dreams and visions of Fr. symbolism into Dan. literature. His later poetry, mostly reflective, is marked by his conversion, in 1896, to Roman Catholicism. The lyrics of Stuckenberg, usually love poems pale in color and melancholy in tone, universalize intimately personal experience. The quality of Claussen's verse, which is highly original, was largely determined by his doctrinal adherence to symbolism, not only as an aesthetic theory, but as a metaphysic. This is evident in his erotic poetry, where beneath the surface theme an ontological pattern is discernible, a tension of irreducible opposites. Dualism also permeates the splendid hexameter poem Atomernes Oprør (Revolt of the Atoms, 1925), in which Claussen foresaw the Atomic Age. Two other neoromantics were Helge Rode (1870-1937) and Ludvig Holstein (1864-1943). Rode's lyricism is notable for its ethereal quality. In this, as also in its deep concern with death, his best work, Ariel (1914), is reminiscent of Shelley's poetry. The best of Holstein's simple lyrics, quite unaffected by symbolism, flow from his steady vision of man's oneness with nature.

Dan. poetry of the 20th c. has precipitated various currents and styles, determined partly by international vogues, partly by socio-political events. The prewar period broke with the soul-searching symbolist lyricism of the 1890's; this was the decade of Jutland regional poetry, dominated by Jeppe Aakjær (1866-1930) and Johannes V. Jensen (1873-1950). Aakjær, a disciple of Blicher and Robert Burns, was also the poet of the fourth estate, whose sensibility he articulated in vigorous, eminently singable verse. Ultimately, however, he embraced the entire people, its past as well as its present. Jensen's expansion was cultural and racial: Inspired by the doctrine of evolution, he created a strange myth about the progressive "Jute-Anglo-American" race, whose mentality he saw epitomized in Columbus, the explorer. Accordingly, the main themes of his poetry are vitality and longing, alternating with the Weltschmerz that ineluctably accompanies the fulfillment of desire and dream. Jensen's diction, which in its incongruous mixture of brutally suggestive realism and florid sensuousness seeks to render living reality in all its changeableness, has been vastly influential in modern Dan. poetry, as has his free verse influenced by Jacobsen and Whitman. Traditional in form, the voluminous and varied production of Valdemar Rørdam (1872-1946) is comparable in its manly vigor and musical resonance to the poetry of Drachmann.

During and after World War I, Dan. poetry experienced a veritable renewal, which continued throughout the 1920's. Inspired by Jensen and by expressionism in painting and in German poetry, Emil Bønnelycke (1893-1953) and Tom Kristensen (b. 1893) developed a revolutionary aesthetic designed to create new forms of beauty as well as new social forms. Kristensen's Fribytterdrømme (Freebooter's Dreams, 1920), which projected the restless spirit of the Jazz Age, conveys the brutal explosions of instinct in a style intoxicated with color and sound. In singular contrast stands the work of Otto Gelsted (b. 1888), whose Reklameskibet (The Show Boat, 1922) recalls The Waste Land of T. S. Eliot. An admirer of Jensen, Gelsted maintained the radical-humanistic tradition in Dan. poetry between the Wars. Informed with humanism is also the poetry of Nis Petersen (1897-1949) and Paul La Cour (1902-56), who dominated the scene in the 1930's. Petersen displayed, especially in Brændende Europa (Europe Aflame, 1933), a gloomy concern for Western culture. La Cour, whose sensibility was formed by Claussen and modern Fr. poets, especially Paul Eluard, was able to combine the quest for the secret sources of personal renewal with a view of poetry which emphasized its profoundly cultural value. Two significant individualists were Per Lange (b. 1901), whose lapidary verse shows a supreme artistry, and Jens August Schade (b. 1903), an earthy philosophical humorist of surrealist affinities.

Under the pressure of war and foreign occupation the 1940's instilled new vigor and urgency into Dan. poetry. Inspirational was the work of Gustaf Munch-Petersen (1912-38), a modernist rebel who, through his death in Spain fighting against Franco, became the prototype of the "engaged" writer. Another originitive poet was Morten Nielsen (1922-44), who in a hard, weighty, and unfinished form expressed a deep reverence for life and freedom. Closely related to these two figures are Halfdan Rasmussen (b. 1915) and Erik Knudsen (b. 1922). The second main group of young Dan. poets, whose original forum was the periodical Heretica (1948-53), is religiously oriented. Inspired by the example of T. S. Eliot, Ole Sarvig (b. 1921) and Ole Wivel (b. 1921) embody in their poetry, by way of an essentially Christian symbolism, the pattern of rebirth after catastrophe and wasteland. Stylistically, however, Sarvig's closest affinities are with abstract painting. Wivel's with Rilke. Rilke-inspired is also Thorkild Bjørnvig (b. 1918), perhaps the most significant of the new poets. Finally, one may mention Jørgen Nash (b. 1920), a gay heir of Munch-Petersen; Tove Ditlevsen (b. 1918), the best living poetess; Ove Abildgaard (b. 1916), a baroque antiromantic; Frank Jæger (b. 1926), a droll successor to Schade; and Robert Corydon (b. 1924), whose objective nature poetry is distinguished by stylized imagery. Although in the 1950's prose again predominated, these and the preceding contemporary poets justify optimism in regard to the immediate future of poetry in Denmark.

ANTHOLOGIES: A Book of Dan. Verse, tr. S. F. Damon & R. S. Hillyer (1922); The Oxford Book of Scandinavian Verse, ed. E. W. Gosse and W. A. Craigie (1925); A Book of Dan. Ballads, sel. Axel Olrik, tr. E. M. Smith-Dampier (1939); A Second Book of Dan. Verse, tr. C. W. Stork (1947); Ung dansk Lyrik, ed. N. K. Johansen (1949); 20th C. Scandinavian Poetry, ed. M. Allwood (1950); Modern Dan.

Poems, ed. K. K. Mogensen (2d ed., 1951); Danske lyriske Digte, ed. M. Brøndsted and M. Paludan (1954); Ti danske Poeter, ed. E. Knudsen (1956; a selection of recent lyricism); Den danske Lyrik 1800-1870, ed. F.J.B. Jansen (2v., 1961).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: G. Brandes, Danske Digtere (1877); E. W. Gosse, Northern Studies (1890) and Two Visits to Denmark (1911); J. Jørgensen, Gesch. der dänischen Lit. (1908); A. Olrik, The Heroic Legends of Denmark, tr. L. M. Hollander (1919); C. Rimestad, Fra Stuckenbergt til Seedorf (2 v., 1922-23); H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Lit. from Brandes to Our Own Day, tr. I. Anderson (1929); C. S. Petersen and V. Andersen, Illustreret dansk Litteraturh. (4 v., 1924-34; standard lit. hist.); H. Kjørgaard, Die dänische Lit. der neuesten Zeit (1934); F.J.B. Jansen, Danmarks Digtekunst (3 v., 1944-58; a fine hist. of Dan. poetry); S. Norrild, Dansk Litt. fra Saxo til Kaj Munk (2 v., 1949; an informative survey); E. Bredsdorff et al., An Introd. to Scandinavian Lit. (1951; useful short survey); P. M. Mitchell, A Bibliog. Guide to Dan. Lit. (1951); M. Paludan, Ti unge Lyrikere (1951); J. Claudi, Contemporary Dan. Authors, tr. J. Andersen and A. Rush (1952); F.J.B. Jansen, "Romantisme Européen et Romantisme Scandinave," L'Âge d'Or (1953); O. Wivel, Poesi og eksistens (1953); S. M. Kristensen, Dansk Litt. 1918-52 (1956); P. M. Mitchell, A Hist. of Dan. Lit. (1958; best survey in Eng.); G. C. Schoolfield, "The Recent Scandinavian Lyric," BA, 36 (1962). S.L.

DEAD METAPHOR. A metaphor which has been used so often in common parlance that its force as a figure of speech is no longer felt and which, therefore, is used as a literal expression. Max Müller found, upon investigating etymologically the history of languages, that a very large proportion of words in current use which are taken literally today were once metaphors. Most words describing the operations of the mind, for example, derive ultimately from descriptions of physical processes—such as "conceive," which goes back to the L. concipere, "to take." Or again, the word "metaphor" itself goes back to the Gr. metapherein, "to carry over." Müller termed this sort of figure "radical" (i.e., understood in terms of roots or origins), and it has also been called "fossil" or "faded" or "petrified" metaphor. Owen Barfield has suggested that it is the special duty of the poet, in his effort to achieve vividness, to use such expressions in a poem so as to revive their lost metaphorical powers. So, too, the critic, in his search for avenues of interpretation, may trace apparently literal words in a poem back to their source so as to uncover relevant meanings.—M. Müller, Lectures on the Science of Language (2d ser., 1864); G. Buck, The Metaphor (1899); G. Stern, Meaning and Change of Meaning (1931); O. Barfield, Poetic Diction (2d ed., 1952).

N.FRIE.

DÉBAT. See POETIC CONTESTS.

DECADENCE. A term used ostensibly in reference to periods or works whose qualities are held to mark a "falling away" (L.: de-cadere) from previously recognized conditions or standards of excellence. The term is often applied in relation to the Alexandrian (or Hellenistic) period in Gr. letters (ca. 300-ca. 30 B.C.) and to the period in L. literature after the death of Augustus (14 A.D.). In modern poetry d. has been identified most persistently in works related to the Fr. symbolist-decadent movement of the late 19th c., whose influence in the British Isles encouraged native tendencies already nurtured by the ideas of Walter Pater, the poetry of Rossetti and Swinburne, and the general ambience of the Pre-Raphaelite Movement. Symbolist influence was widespread also among the poets of fin-de-siècle Europe outside France. It did not significantly affect the poetry of the United States until the 20th c., although Poe was himself a progenitor of important ideas and practices of the Fr. symbolists.

In a limited sense, d. may be seen exemplified in the tastes and habits of such fictional characters as Petrus Borel's Passereau l'Ecolier, Poe's Roderick Usher, Huysmans' Des Esseintes, Wilde's Dorian Gray and Lord Henry Wotton, and Villiers de l'Isle-Adam's Axël d'Auersperg; in passages like those on the language of decaying civilizations by Baudelaire (in the note to his poem Franciscæ meae laudes) and by Gautier (in his essay on "Charles Baudelaire" [1868], probably the most memorable passage ever written on d.); in the apostrophe of Mallarmé's Hérodiade to her mirror; in Verlaine's verses beginning "Je suis l'Empire à la fin de la décadence. . ."; in Wilde's Salomé and Dowson's famous poem to Cynara; in the affectations of Count Robert de Montesquiou-Fézensac and the remarkable production in 1891 of P. N. Roinard's Cantique des cantiques in the perfumed atmosphere of Paul Fort's Théâtre d'Art. D. in this sense was in great part a mannerism of the sort prevalent in the England of the "Yellow Nineties," with its brilliant and superficial fin-de-siècle aesthetic pose that played perhaps a more significant rôle than is generally recognized in opposition to the crushing force of modern materialism. But the word decadence has come to be used by hostile critics in a larger sense than this.

A basic characteristic of d. has been a failure to recognize objective or timeless values that transcend and give form and direction to individual experience and effort. In these terms the decadent poet is seen living in a state of Heraclitic or Bergsonian flux, with his values confined within narrowly egocentric limits and unlikely to satisfy his desires. Here the poet tends to be concerned not with "the fruit of experience" but with "experience itself" and with private sensations; and his poems are likely to reveal a number of the following "decadent" characteristics: search for novelty with attendant artificiality and interest in the unnatural; excessive self-analysis; feverish hedonism, with poetic interest in corruption and morbidity; abulia, neurosis, and exaggerated erotic sensibility; aestheticism, with stress on "Art for Art's Sake" in the evocation of exquisite sensations and emotions; scorn of contemporary society and mores; restless curiosity, perversity, or eccentricity in subject matter; overemphasis on form, with resultant loss of balance between form and content—or interest in jewel-like ornamentation, resulting at times in disintegration of artistic unity; bookishness; erudite or exotic vocabulary; frequent employment of synaesthesia (q.v.) or transpositions d'art; complex and difficult syntax; attempt to make poetry primarily a means of enchantment, with emphasis on its musical and irrational elements; experiments in the use of new rhythms, rich in evocative and sensuous effects, alien to those of tradition and often departing from the mathematical principles of control in established prosody; anti-intellectualism and stress of the subconscious; abandonment of punctuation, and use of typography for visual and psychological effects; substitution of coherence in mood for coherence and synthesis in thought; "postromantic" irony in the manner of Corbière, Laforgue, and the early Eliot; obscurity, arising from remote, private, or complicated imagery or from a predominantly connotative and evocative use of language, with obvious reluctance to "name an object" ("Le suggérer, voilà le rêve."); an overall aura of something lost—a nostalgic, semi-mysticism without clear direction or spiritual commitment, but with frequent reference to exotic religions and ritual, or to such mysterious substitutes as Tarot cards, magic, alchemy, Rosicrucianism, Theosophy, the Kabbala, Satanism, and the like.

Dr. Emile Laurent (1897) even thought he could identify certain characteristics of a physiognomie décadente: a lack of forehead; prognathous features; oddly shaped heads ("plagiocéphales, oxycéphales, acrocéphales"); deformed noses; glabrous, asymmetrical faces; wide ears; enormous cheek bones, etc., etc. All this was a continuation of the thesis of Max Nordau's Entartung (Degeneration) [1892-93], which found that the Fr. symbolists "had in common all the signs of degeneracy and imbecility." G. B. Shaw's "The Sanity of Art"

(1895) was an effective reply to this sort of nonsense.

In a discussion of important modern and contemporary poets, the term decadence can hardly on the whole be applied and interpreted to suggest decline in literary quality from an immediately preceding period. The decline seems to be rather in the values in terms of which earlier poetry had been made. Unusual distinction is evident in many modern poets who have been identified as showing "decadent" tendencies (e.g., Whitman, Baudelaire, Verlaine, Mallarmé, Rimbaud, Valéry, Rilke, Yeats, Hart Crane, Eliot, Pound, to mention only a few). Even hostile critics recognize that poets "decadent" in this sense have furnished much of the most memorable poetry of the modern world.

C. Baudelaire, note to Franciscæ meae laudes in 1st ed. of Les Fleurs du Mal (1857); T. Gautier, "Charles Baudelaire" (1868); J.-K. Huysmans, A rebours (1884; esp. chs. 3, 12, 14); M. Nordau, Entartung (Degeneration) (1892-93); A. Symons, "The Decadent Movement in Lit.," Harper's Magazine, 87 (1893); G. B. Shaw, "The Sanity of Art" (1895); E. Laurent, La Poésie décadente devant la science psychiatrique (1897); A. Cassagne, La Théorie de l'art pour l'art en France (1906); I. Babbitt, The New Laoköon (1910) and Rousseau and Romanticism (1919); H. Jackson, The Eighteen Nineties (1913); E. von Sydow, Die Kultur der Dekadenz (1921); J. W. Duff, A Lit. Hist. of Rome in the Silver Age from Tiberius to Hadrian (1927; 2d ed., 1960); G. L. Van Roosbroeck, The Legend of the Decadents (1927); A. J. Farmer, Le Mouvement esthétique et décadent en Angleterre (1873-1900) [1931]; M. Praz, The Romantic Agony (1933; 2d ed., 1951); Y. Winters, Primitivism and D. (1937); H. W. Rosenhaupt, Der deutsche Dichter um die Jahrhundertwende und seine Abgelöstheit von der Gesellschaft (1939); O. Cargill, "The Decadents," Intellectual America (1941); C. M. Bowra, The Heritage of Symbolism (1943) and The Creative Experiment (1949); W. Gaunt, The Aesthetic Adventure (1945); C. E. M. Joad, D.: A Philosophical Inquiry (1948); J. M. Smith, "Concepts of D. in 19th-C. Fr. Lit.," SP, 50 (1953); O. Ragusa, "Fr. Symbolism in Italy," RR, 46 (1955); A. E. Carter, The Idea of D. in Fr. Lit., 1830-1900 (1958); G. R. Ridge, The Hero in Fr. Decadent Lit. (1961).

A.G.E.

DECASTICH. A poem composed of 10 lines. See also DIZAIN, a Fr. stanza or poem of 10 lines, and DÉCIMA, the 10-line stanza of classical Sp. poetry.

DECASYLLABLE. Line of 10 syllables. Appeared in Fr. verse about the middle of the 11th c. in La Vie de St. Alexis and Le Boèce (later in La Chanson de Roland) as a line of 10 syllables with a pause (coupe) after the fourth and 2 fixed accents on the fourth and tenth syllables (M. Burger, Recherches sur la structure et l'origine des vers romans, 1957, p. 20). In It. the endecasillabo appeared early in the 12th c.: "Li mile cento trenta cenqe nato, fo questo templo a san Gogio donato . . ." (Iscrizione Ferrarese, / 1135 [Testi volgari italiani, ed. A. Monteverdi]) and was used by Dante, Petrarch, and many Boccaccio. Chaucer may have discovered the line through their work if he had not already become acquainted with it in Machault, Deschamps, Granson, etc. His influence helped to associate the d. with the 5-stress line, and thus to provide (whether one is syllable- or stress-counting) a line which becomes fundamental to the sonnet, the Spenserian and many other stanza forms, the heroic couplet, and blank verse. The real number of syllables in a d. varies in accordance with fashions in pronunciation and with conventions of prosodic practice: thus the Fr. line frequently has 11 syllables because of the addition of a feminine ending; it may have 12 if a further syllable is added at an epic caesura. The It. d. always has at least 11 because a feminine ending is required. In Eng. feminine endings are also employed, but the d. may have as few as 9 syllables when an initial syllable is omitted, resulting in an acephalous line. Frequently what appear to be extrametrical syllables are suppressed by one form of elision or another: "When such / was heard / declar'd / the Almighty's will" (Milton, Paradise Lost 7.181).—B. Ten Brink, Chaucer's Sprache und Verskunst (1885); M. Kaluza, A Short Hist. of Eng. Versification (1911); P.-E. Guarnierio, Manuale di versificazione italiana (1913); R. Bridges, Milton's Prosody (1921).

R.O.E.

DÉCIMA. Sp. stanza form used loosely to denote any 10-line stanza, but now usually used as the equivalent of espinela (q.v.), occasionally of copla real. The first décimas approximating the final form were the 14th- and 15th-c. 10-line variations of the copla de arte menor, though 10-line stanzas may be found earlier. The d. italiana, probably first used in the 18th c., is an octosyllabic strophe rhyming ababc:dedec, the c rhymes being oxytones and the colon denoting a pause. Other meters, particularly the hendecasyllable with heptasyllable, may be used and the rhyme scheme and position of the pause may vary, or lines may be unrhymed provided that the two oxytones rhyme and be found one at the end of the strophe and the other at the pause. This strophe is directly related to the octava italiana.—Navarro.

D.C.C.

DECIR. Most of the Castilian court poetry of the pre-Renaissance period (late 14th through early 16th c.) may be divided, according to Le Gentil, into two principal categories: the free-strophe composition intended to be read or recited and the poem of fixed form intended to be sung, generally termed decir (or dezir) and cantiga respectively. Both forms were borrowed from the Galician-Portuguese, but show Fr. influence. The d. usually is narrative, satiric, didactic, or allegorical and sometimes attains considerable length. The copla de arte mayor (see ARTE MAYOR), rarely used for the cantiga type of poem, was considered the appropriate meter for d., though the copla de arte menor (see ARTE MENOR) was also employed. The strophes of a given poem have the same pattern, but are otherwise metrically independent of each other. The best known examples of the d. are Decir a las siete virtudes heretofore generally attributed to Imperial, and Juan de Mena's Laberinto de Fortuna, both of the 15th c.—P. Le Gentil, La Poésie lyrique espagnole et portugaise à la fin du moyen âge. 2^e partie. Les formes (1953); Navarro. D.C.C.

DECORUM in poetry is propriety, a careful attention to what is proper and becoming in action, character, and style. In a good poem, action should fit situation and character, thought and feeling should fit character, expression should so fit subject matter that weighty matters are treated with dignity and trifling matters with humbleness.

Cicero, in the Orator (21), defined the term in its general application to real life, oratory, and poetry. Horace illustrated its specific application to poetry, at least to epic and dramatic poetry. Cicero remarked that decorum was the L. equivalent of the Gr. prepon, which pointed straight to Aristotle's discussion of propriety of style in the Rhetoric (3.7.1–2 and 3.7.6). Aristotle also used prepon in ch. 17 of the Poetics, wherein he recommended that the tragic poet visualize every scene he composes so that he will devise what is appropriate and avoid incongruities. In an earlier chapter, 15, Aristotle used harmotton to define appropriateness of dramatic character, and this term was virtually synonymous with prepon. There is no evidence that the Romans knew the Poetics, but when the Renaissance rediscovered the treatise Aristotle joined Cicero and Horace as leading arbiters of poetic d. In 1536, Paccius translated prepon as decorum and harmotton as conveniēns; the terms were interchangeable, but d. became the favorite.

Although Horace never actually used the word decorum in his Ars poetica, his chief doctrine was literary propriety. The favorite passage for his modern disciples was lines 89–127, wherein Horace argued that each style should keep its proper place since a speaker's words should never be discordant with his station; it makes a great difference whether a god or a hero or a slave is speaking, an old man or a youth, a great lady or a nurse, a merchant or a plowman, an Assyrian or a Greek. Moreover, comic themes are distinct from tragic, and the two should never, or very rarely, be mingled. Throughout the Renaissance and long afterward this doctrine of d. was paramount in the theory of poetry and highly influential in its practice. Milton, in his Tractate of Education, spoke of the crowning study of poetry as "that sublime art which in Aristotle's Poetics, in Horace, and the It. commentaries of Castelvetro, Tasso, Mazzoni, and others, teaches what the laws are of a true epic poem, what of a dramatic, what of a lyric, what decorum is, which is the grand masterpiece to observe." As interpreted by the critics and commentators, d. called for distinct poetic genres, consistent characters, and the careful observance of the classical hierarchy of styles (grand, moderate, plain). Neoclassical d. came to emphasize literary propriety in the sense of elegance and correct taste, a propriety that avoided the vulgar as well as the unconventional.

Even while this neoclassical theory of d. was forming, however, it was being challenged by some poets. As Croce has said in his Aesthetic, art is intuitive, the rules of criticism concepts, and intuitive poets are always upsetting the rules. Medieval poets had more often than not either ignored or modified classical d., and many Renaissance poets, influenced by the Bible and Christian literature as well as by the medieval anarchy of forms, flouted fixed genres, conventionalized characters, the hierarchy of styles, and studied elegance of expression. "Right" tragedies and comedies, "true" epic poems and odes were written, but along with these neoclassical productions there also flourished tragical comedies, comical tragedies, tragicomedies, histories, romances, simple narrative poems and lyrics. To name just one example among several notable rebels, the actor-playwright Angelo Beolco (b. 1502), better known as Ruzzante from his favorite role, understood classical d. which fostered "literary" poetry, but argued for a different kind of artistic propriety, namely, simple nature. The characters in his peasant elogues and farces spoke in their native dialects, using the most naive and sometimes the coarsest expressions.

Ruzzante of Padua was a naturalist, and soon turned from verse to prose as even more appropriate for his representations of pure nature. Naturalism in poetry, however, has always distrusted the conventional and traditional d. Wordsworth's revolt against "false refinement" and "poetic diction" was in large part the revolt of the naturalist against an artificial d. As he explained in his Preface to the Lyrical Ballads, he had chosen incidents and situations from "humble and rustic" life, and had related these in a "selection of language really used by men." Although Coleridge, in his Biographia Literaria, showed that the very act of "selection" plus the use of meter removed this poetry from rusticity, Wordsworth was demonstrating the truth of Croce's assertion that the intuitive artist is always upsetting the rules. For Wordsworth, not rules but the author's own feelings were his "stay and support."

It should be said, however, that although the neoclassical d. that long governed both critics and poets has fallen into disrepute, the original Ciceronian-Aristotelian concept of d. is still valid. No sensible poet or critic can quibble very much with the admonition that it is unseemly to use high-sounding expressions when speaking of the gutter and equally unseemly to use mean expressions when speaking of the majesty of Rome.—R. K. Hack, The Doctrine of Lit. Forms (HSCP, 1916); G. C. Fiske, Cicero's De Oratore and Horace's Ars Poetica (1929); J. W. H. Atkins, Lit. Crit. in Antiquity (1934); M. T. Herrick, The Fusion of Horatian and Aristotelian Lit. Crit. (1946); Wimsatt and Brooks; Weinberg. M.T.H.

DEFECTIVE FOOT. In a conventional metrical line, a foot which lacks one or more unstressed syllables. In this example,

This is the forest primeval, the last foot is defective: the normal pattern calls for a final dactyl, but the clause ends with a trochee instead. The term "defective" is unfortunate, for a foot lacking one or more syllables can be considered "faulty" only by those who are gratified by absolute metrical monotony. See TRUNCATION; METRICAL VARIATIONS. P.F.

DENOTATION. See CONNOTATION AND DENOTATION.

DÉNOUEMENT. See PLOT.

DESCENDING RHYTHM (falling rhythm). The rhythm of lines written predominantly in trochaic or dactylic feet. D.r. is so called because the reader or hearer is presumed to feel, in each foot, a "descent" from a relatively stressed syllable to a relatively unstressed one. The traditional jest that the firm name Batten, Barton, Durstine, and Osborn sounds "like a trunk falling downstairs" will suggest something of the nature of d.r. The term is useful only if one remembers that it has really no metaphoric or symbolic connotation: d.r. does not, in itself, transmit a feeling of depression, gloom, or physical descent. See ASCENDING RHYTHM. P.F.

DESCORT. A Prov. song whose distinguishing feature is its irregularity. Instead of having all its stanzas alike, as in the ordinary chanso (q.v.), the d. theoretically has them all different. These stanzas are often quite long and the individual verses quite short. In one poem called a descort, the stanzas are similar in structure, but all are in different languages, to furnish the "discord" which the genre demands.—I. Frank, Répertoire métrique de la poésie des troubadours, I (1953). F.M.C.

DIAERESIS. The pronunciation of two successive vowels as separate sounds and not as a single vowel or diphthong, e.g., Chloë, coöperate. In classical prosody d. denotes the coincidence of a word-ending with the end of a metrical foot or unit, e.g.

spārsīs | hāstīs | lōngīs | cāmpūs | splēndēt ||
ē | hōrret
(Ennius, Scipio 6)

A dactylic hexameter such as this, in which d. after every foot precludes caesura, is an example of the hyporrhythmic (i.e., deficient) verse. D. after a fourth-foot dactyl is called "bucolic d." by virtue of its frequency in pastoral or bucolic poetry. D. is often confused with caesura (q.v.), which in Gr. and L. poetry strictly means the ending of a word within a foot. D. can be used for a deliberate effect as in the example from Ennius, and in certain verse forms such as the elegiac distich. In the classical hexameter, however, it was generally avoided as being disruptive to a line of verse. The coincidence, within a line, of a sense-pause with a d. is called a diaeresis-pause. D. can occur in the verse of modern languages, e.g.,

Had cást | him out | from Heav'n, | with á | his Hóst
(Milton, Paradise Lost 1.37)

The pause after "Heav'n" might be termed diaeresis-pause, but in Eng. versification it is permissible to label it a caesura.—Hardie; Shipper; H. Drexler, "Hexameterstudien," Aevum, 25 (1951). R.A.H.

DIALECT IN POETRY. The social values of literature determine that most writing will at the time of its composition be regarded as standard speech. But dialectal peculiarities are, nevertheless, of great significance. Many of the most important poems in any literature are in the dialects of the provinces or in an idiom deliberately given the patina of the antique. Mastery of several dialects is essential to the thorough appreciation of any literature.

Since dialects are more generally distinguished by divergence from the standard language phonetically than semantically, much of the stylistic significance of d. poetry derives from the ear. It is, accordingly, a favorite device of poetry for the stage or for recitation. In Aristophanes' comedies, for example, Spartan and Athenian characters speak the idiom of their respective regions. Such shadings as a rule much embarrass translators, but B. R. Rogers, in his celebrated translation of Lysistrata, by placing a Scottish d. in the mouths of the Spartans achieved a memorable linguistic tour de force. Obsolete linguistic forms are occasionally used for poems with subject matter suggesting a past age. A defensible instance occurs in Adriaan Barnouw's rendering of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales into a Dutch having a number of archaisms. Edmund Spenser affected an archaistic style, as, to a still greater degree, did Thomas Chatterton.

The theory of d. commonly presumes that local characteristics are best revealed in local speech. So a Southerner is most expressive of his native characteristics when speaking in his native idiom. Shakespeare, in Henry V., offers a picture of a united people by sketching soldiers of the Eng. army from various sections of Great Britain, representing different temperaments, each using a different idiom. It has been of special importance for popular poetry that as class distinctions in the modern world have increased, d. has acquired new values, as conspicuously seen in London at the close of the 19th c. In another context, much of the vitality of Ir. poetic drama since 1900 reflects the playwrights' knowledge of d.

In classical poetry, d. is often used to distinguish foreigners or countryfolk from citizens, and a similar distinction remains notable in It. verse throughout the Renaissance. In England an artful use of d. with a dramatic sensibility occurs in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, especially the Friar's Tale. Much of the finest medieval Eng. verse, including the work of the "Pearl poet," was in the native dialects, ranging from Devonshire to Lancashire and Kent. Scottish poetry has been most retentive of the Eng. d. forms, as seen from Henryson and Dunbar to Robert Burns and Edwin Muir. It is typical that Burns commanded a greater artistic skill when using his mother tongue, that of Ayrshire, than when writing in the standard idiom of literary London. In modern times Tennyson exploited d. in his Northern Farmer—Old Style. Some of Thomas Hardy's best poems use Dorset speech. James Russell Lowell's Bigelow Papers are a comic reflection of New England rural speech, and Rudyard Kipling's Barrack Room Ballads are in cockney and with a dash of slang. (Slang consists of dialectal usages in the lowest levels of society. Outstanding poetry devoted in subject matter to the poorer classes has flourished in Europe, from Pushkin to Bertolt Brecht). In America the largest part of d. poetry appears in the unselfconscious art of ballad singers, especially Negroes, but Robert Frost has written much poetry echoing New England d. Because of the preponderant importance of the voice in d. poetry, the phonographic recordings of the British Dialect Society and the Library of Congress, and the readings by Dylan Thomas and Robert Frost surpass whatever can be provided by critical or scholarly commentary.

H.W.W.

DIALOGUE. There are two major meanings to the term. In its more general sense it signifies an exchange of words between any number of imaginary speakers, in fiction, drama or poetry. So we may speak of d. in a novel. In its more limited sense it denotes a literary usage largely or entirely based on speaking parts without intention of theatrical presentation. The word has an identical meaning in referring to verse or prose, although used more often for the latter. It is best employed to signify a general method of composition, not a particular genre. Nevertheless, based on the use of verse d. several traditional forms have been established, such as the satirical poem after the Horatian manner, in which an exchange of words between two speakers often occurs. In such instances it is correct to speak of a "d. poem" as well as to say that the poem uses d. The term has been most frequently employed in the case of poetry where two speakers are present, but this numerical limitation is inessential. Poems having only a minor portion of their lines in direct discourse are seldom included under the term, although works may be so described where a moderate amount of the lines remains outside direct speech, especially if the leading voice addresses an imaginary audience and speaks in the first person. A series of monologues, as in Robert Browning's The Ring and the Book, does not constitute d.

Although not essential to drama, since there are brilliant specimens of the dramatic monologue, or address to one or more silent figures, d. lies at the basis of the theatre, and the writing of successful d. constitutes a large part of the dramatist's task. In the limited sense of the word, d. is a literary device containing a germ of the theatre that remains only in its initial stage, a change of scene, for example, being generally avoided. The most celebrated prose dialogues, those by Plato, are said to have been founded on dramatic works, the mimes, in the 5th c. B.C., by the Sicilian poets, Sophron and Epicharmus. D. verse in some instances remains purely literary; in others, its direct speech has encouraged either recitation, or musical forms, such as the duet or the oratorio, where the words are sung. D. has often been used in conjunction with the antiphonal forms of music, as appears in religious chants, hymns, and litanies. But the word is not used where a refrain introduces a voice unheard elsewhere in the poem. D. signifies an exchange of words, not a monologue punctuated by interruptions nor a poem in which an interlocutor merely starts the main speaker on his way. It is much at home in love lyrics, where the lovers address each other.

During the Classical Age, verse d. flourished in the pastoral, the satire, and the philosophical poem. In the Middle Ages it appeared with much frequency as "debates" and "flytings" (scolding matches). A favorite subject was the debate between the Soul and the Body. The philosophical dichotomies of the times encouraged this form, a good example of which in Middle Eng. is The Owl and the Nightingale. D. in the more general sense abounds in medieval allegories and romances to such a degree that doubt occasionally arises whether a manuscript presents a poem for reading or one intended for the stage. This condition is common in the Orient. D. is often employed in the popular ballad; it is also found in satirical poetry (for example, in that of Robert Burns, who, though writing in the last quarter of the 18th c., wrote in close touch with medieval tradition).

The philosophical verse d. enjoyed much popularity in the Renaissance, as seen in the poetry of Samuel Daniel, author of the much-admired dialogue, Ulysses and the Siren. Songs with questions and answers are also common, as may be observed in lyrics from Shakespeare and Sir Philip Sidney to Robert Herrick. Andrew Marvell found use for the form, as in A Dialogue Between the Resolved Soul and Created Pleasure. Direct speech is freely used in the poetry of the 18th c., as in Alexander Pope's Satires. Although subjectivity in the romantic period conferred a relative advantage on the monologue, the d. was not forgotten. Examples of Eng. d. poems of this period are found in the work of Walter Savage Landor, although the greater number of his dialogues are in prose. It found much favor with German and Scandinavian writers of romantic song and ballad.

D. poems have often been dialect poems, as in the Dorset eclogues by William Barnes. Verse dialogues are notable in Robert Frost's

North of Boston and other volumes by this poet where the influence of the classical eclogue is still perceptible. As example of d. in more recent verse may be cited William Butler Yeats's Dialogue of Self and Soul. The radio provides a new field for verse-d. Although Dylan Thomas's Under Milk Wood has been called a d. The device assists nondramatic poetry in obtaining dramatic tension and vigor and in objectifying its subject. It must be recognized as one of the major resources of the poet's art.—A. H. Hawkins, D. (1909); E. Merrill, The D. in Eng. Lit. (1911); H. Thielmann, Stil und Technik des Dialogs im neueren Drama (1937); R. Wildbolz, Der philosophische D. als literarisches Kunstwerk (1952); J. Andrieu, Le D. antique, structure et présentation (1954). H.W.W.

DIBRACH. See PYRRHIC.

DICHOREE. See DITROCHEE.

DICHRONOUS (Gr. "of 2 times or quantities," "common"). Term applied to the Gr. vowels alpha, iota, and upsilon, each of which may be either short or long. In some words a syllable containing a dichronous vowel is likewise variable, e.g.,

Āres Āres

at the beginning of a Homeric hexameter.—Koster. R.J.G.

DICTION, POETIC. See POETIC DICTION.

DIDACTIC POETRY is poetry which is primarily intended to instruct. Most commonly, the label is used for poetry which teaches a moral. It can also refer to poetry which conveys factual information, like astronomy, mathematics, or rhetoric; or systematic philosophy. Aesthetically it seems to be the first stage in the evolution of literary forms: the earliest literature we possess, Eastern, Hebrew, Greek, is in verse and uses meter as a mnemonic device to make the hearer remember and thereby learn what is being said. The seed of all literature is the proverb, the gnomic line, the memorizable rhyme ("Thirty days hath September"), and from such seeds d. poetry evolved in antiquity as it was to do again in northern Europe in the early centuries of the Christian era. The truest d. poetry, in accordance with Horace's utile et dulce, both explains and provides subjective experience of that which is explained, e.g., Virgil's Georgics (cf. L. Richardson, Poetical Theory in Republican Rome, 1944).

As a genre, d. verse is difficult to define and somewhat foreign to the usual poetic taste. Aristotle explicitly excluded it from the branches of poetry when he said "Homer should be called a poet, while Empedocles should be called a natural philosopher rather than a poet" (Poetics, 1). In A.D. 9 Ovid disparaged "technical" poems as trivial (Tristia 2. 471-492), and 17 centuries later when d. poetry was about to become fashionable in Eng. literature Thomas Hobbes challenged it anew. "The subject of a poem is the manners of men, not natural causes," Hobbes wrote, and denied poets the right to use "terms from any science, as well mechanically as liberal" (Answer to Davenant's Preface to Gondibert, 1650). Nevertheless, d. verse entered early into the stream of Western literature and has periodically risen to eminence, in antiquity, in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, in Eng. literature of the 17th and 18th c., serving poets from the earliest times down to the present (cf. V. Sackville West, The Land, 1926) as a valid means of artistic expression.

1. IN ANTIQUITY. Formal d. poetry begins with Hesiod, who wrote at the end of the 8th c. B.C., and whose principal works, the Theogony and the Works and Days, represent two related types of d. composition. They have in common the "didactic" purpose, which means that they are written to instruct the reader (or listener), to pass on knowledge; but it is apparent from Hesiod's example that the poet can "teach" in two different ways and make use of two different kinds of subject matter. As in the Theogony, he can convey myths, or a knowledge of the gods (his emphasis is along genealogical lines), inform man of the nature of the gods, or of the nature of things (i.e., the cosmos), inform man of his spiritual obligations and cultural ancestry, tell him significant stories about his past. Or, as in the Works and Days, he can convey useful information about work techniques (in this case, how to farm) and describe the rules and laws governing a specific technical method. In general, all d. poetry falls into one or the other of these two categories: it instructs the reader either along general lines, objectively, telling him what he ought to know about his world and its structure, or along specific lines, telling him how to do different kinds of things.

In theory, Gr. literature distinguishes between d. as a branch of epē, or lengthy verse written in hexameters, and melē, the lyric modes, and although d. poetry did eventually assume elegiac and iambic meters, the immediate followers of Hesiod continued to employ the hexameter framework. D. poems, now lost, were written which apparently were modeled on Hesiod and therefore came to be known as works of the school of Hesiod. Then, in the 6th and 5th c. B.C. appeared the writings of philosophers and moralists, e.g., Xenophanes (fl. 535), Parmenides (ca. 450), Empedocles (fl. 444-41). From the fragments now left it seems definite that d. poetry was well established as an instructive literary genre, its purpose being to advance speculative knowledge of the cosmos. At this point d. poetry disappeared from the scene of Gr. literature, to emerge several centuries later, during the Alexandrian Age. What then came back was the manual type of "applied" poetry descended from the Works and Days. Such Alexandrian writers as Aratus and Nicander of Colophon represent the new cosmopolitan vogue for technical, erudite verse packed with information. In Gr. literature d. poetry continued to serve this purpose as a minor form until the 4th c. A.D.

Roman literature made impressive use of the d. genre. Even the early writers Ennius and Accius probably experimented with the form, and in the 1st c. B.C. d. poetry soared to great heights. Translations of Empedocles existed; Cicero in his youth made an adaptation of Aratus' Phaenomena, and work of this sort inevitably paved the way for the two notable masterpieces, Lucretius' De Rerum Natura and Virgil's Georgics. The former, a lengthy expository poem concerned with science, ethics, and the philosophy of materialism, and the latter, a beautifully proportioned work of some 2,188 lines on the subject of "how to farm," both satisfy to a singular degree the requirements of the two types of d. poetry that originated seven centuries earlier. In quite different vein, Horace's Art of Poetry (ca. 13 B.C.) and Ovid's Art of Love, Art of Makeup and Remedy of Love (ca. 1 B.C.) are related to the d. genre. Horace's "instructions" are more aesthetic than methodological; his verse letter is a critical masterpiece that sharpens the reader's powers of literary observation and elevates his taste. In the course of the poem Horace formulated an aesthetic ideal that corresponds closely to the ideal of d. poetry: "omne tulit punctum qui miscuit utile duci / lectorem delectando pariterque monendo" (The man who mingles the useful with the sweet carries the day by charming his reader and at the same time instructing him, Epistles, ("Art of Poetry," 2.3. 343-44). Ovid's witty pointers for getting on "in the field of sex and society" are little more than a travesty of the d. ideal, although this reductio ad infandum of methodology may be one of the poet's greatest strokes of irony. However, the various purposes of Roman d. poetry may be compared and evaluated, four major poets in the golden age turned their attention to the didactic medium. Minor works ensued, chief among them Manilius' five-book poem on astrology.

In summary, d. poetry offered writers of antiquity certain real possibilities, and underlying the whole theory is perhaps the larger relationship of science and religion to human affairs. How was civilized man to absorb and codify his knowledge of the nature of things? How was he to apply the knowledge? D. poetry helped make it possible for men to remember what they ought to know or ought to do. Speculative knowledge having been made more widely available, the later d. literature became narrowly technical and dwindled into insignificance. Other literary forms could satisfy the general need for instruction more satisfactorily than the d. genre—moral instruction would readily find outlet in the major literary forms, while technical information would flourish in prose treatises, or simply in directions for the use of tools.

2. IN THE MIDDLE AGES AND RENAISSANCE. Medieval literature was, in one sense, entirely d., for it stressed moral content in accordance with Christian doctrine and always sought to inform and enlighten the reader. From Martianus Capella's On the Marriage of Mercury and Philology (primarily, a work in the form of Menippean Satire) on through Spenser's Faerie Queene an unending succession of allegorical poems conveyed various kinds of doctrine. The most outstanding example is perhaps Le Roman de la Rose. In addition, medieval literature abounded in rhymed chronicles, metrical specula, or encyclopedias, and offered many examples of metrical and later dramatic versions of saints' lives, miracle stories, popularized excerpts from church doctrine, and collections of aphorisms. Chaucer epitomized the dominant tendency when his narrator concluded the Nun's Priest's Tale by saying:

For seint Paul seith that al that writen is,
To oure doctrine it is ywrite, ywis;
Taket h the fruyt, and lat the chaf be stille.

This seems to suggest that all knowledge and all understanding should accord with Christian truth (for if that is the truth, how can anything contradict it?), and represents the widespread medieval attitude. But spiced though it was with information and misinformation, and seasoned with moral flavors, medieval literature could nevertheless assume an aesthetic quality distinct from knowledge per se, as it did in such works as The Divine Comedy or the medieval romances, or the poetry of Chaucer.

It remained for the Renaissance to give another impetus to the composition of d. poetry based on Gr. and L. models. The movement began in Italy before the 16th c. and continued well on into the 18th c. in England. It. Renaissance theory led the way by affirming the ancient ideal of conveying information in artistic form, one writer for instance claiming that Virgil was a better teacher than Cato or Varro because he wrote poetry (Fracastoro, Naugerius sive De Poetica dialogus, 1555). From the mid-16th c. on, d. poetry found favor among Eng. writers (T. Tusser, Hundreth Pointes of Good Husbandry, 1557) and became so popular indeed that by the mid-18th c. d. poetry virtually dominated the field of lyric composition.

3. IN THE 18TH C. AND AFTER. A variety of works in a variety of meters satisfied the 18th-c. Englishman's demand for a descriptive nature poetry that was realistic, methodological, informative, and beautiful by analogy with the landscape painting of the period. The 18th-c. "georgic," epitomized in James Thomson's staggeringly successful Seasons (1726) manifested considerable changes from the classical models. It emphasized heterogeneous information rather than detailed instructions; it exalted landscape over work processes; it invited the reader to feast on the native beauties of rural life, not to wring a living from the recalcitrant soil.

Thomson's Seasons was translated into Fr. for the first time in 1759; later on in the century the widely admired poet Jacques de Lille (1758–1813) was chiefly instrumental in bringing the genre descriptif into considerable vogue, with his translation of Virgil's Georgics and his original d. poem Les Jardins. In German literature "d. poetry" is generally taken to refer only to medieval examples of moralizing verse, e.g., Bescheidenheit by "Freidank" (1215–16) or Der Renner (ca. 1300) by Hugo von Trimberg; or to refer to such Reformation satires as Narrenschiff by Sebastian Brant (1494) or Narrenbeschwörung (1512) and Gauchmatt (1514) by Thomas Murner. In Sp. literature d. poetry makes its appearance in the Golden Age briefly and incidentally in the form again of moralizing treatises or discussions of aesthetics, by such authors as Francisco Pacheco, Lope de Vega, and Cervantes, the works in question being of distinctly minor importance.

In It. literature few traces of d. poetry may be detected except for imitations of Virgil's Georgics. Poems of a generally diffused moral intent, e.g., the satires of Parini, cannot be placed within the tradition of d. poetry without extending the category beyond its reasonable bounds. Pope's "Essays," for instance, or Boileau's L'Art Poétique belong to the category of argumentative moral verse rather than to that of d. poetry proper with its emphasis on technical content. The line between d. purpose and moral content is real, for while the d. authors occasionally step over it, they always return ultimately to their own area of knowledge and instruction, in the interests of which the whole poem has been originally conceived. Satire in general offers another instance of the point of departure at which information and instruction leave off and fiction and moral implication assume the main function in the literary design. A moral poet or a satirist expects the reader to be somewhat the better for having read his work; the d. poet expects him to be better informed.

By the end of the century (e.g., Cowper's Task, 1785) the Eng. fashion of "georgic" poetry was in the decline, and this style of writing has never reappeared in our literature on any comparable scale. In the late 18th and early 19th c. more "georgics" were composed, but the genre was virtually obsolete. Nevertheless, in view of the fact that it did assume so phenomenal a place in the aesthetic experience of neoclassical England (continental examples being negligible), we may conclude this survey by evaluating the theory and purposes animating the poetry in its final phase. The Eng. poems are subjective, rambling, effusively appreciative of nature. But if ancient writers tended to separate knowledge of nature from knowledge about utilizing her resources and to write either one or the other kind of d. poem, the most popular 18th-c. writers managed to combine both elements again and to incorporate them in single works. Their mission was neither so explicit nor so limited as the mission of the classical d. poets. Inquiring studiously into the facts, the later writers were concerned with teaching the reader to visualize, to understand, and even to rejoice in nature.

Throughout its history, d. poetry has coincided with scientific awareness. The early writers after Hesiod produced poems virtually coterminous with the first great advances in Ionian speculative science. Again, d. poems coincided with the rising scientific interest of the Alexandrian Age. Lucretius and Virgil were Romans, i.e., members of a society with a strong affinity for technological progress. The "new science" of the Renaissance found its counterpart to some degree in the d. poems of Italy and their early Eng. descendants. The Newtonian world of the Enlightenment in England accorded the warmest hospitality of all to a great number and great variety of d. poems. The somewhat elusive genre, d. poetry, has perhaps not always conveyed "the impassioned expression which is in the countenance of all Science," but it has quite frequently displayed the glow of understanding that steals over the face of inquisitive man.

There is no comprehensive book on the subject of d. poetry. The best guides to the subject are: (1) for the classical period, the articles in the Oxford Cl. Dict. under "D. Poetry," and separate scholarly editions of the works of the major authors. (2) For the Eng. tradition, Dwight L. Durling, Georgic Tradition in Eng. Poetry, 1935. This thoroughgoing study contains an invaluable discussion of the whole subject and includes a comprehensive bibliog. See also G. Pellegrini, La poesia didascalica inglese nel settecento italiano (1958). S.P.B.

DIAMB. A syzygy consisting of 2 iambs (— — —) and known also as iambic monometer. It is occasionally found in combination with or as part of other cola.—Kolář; Koster. P.S.C.

DIMETER (Gr. "of 2 measures"). A line consisting of 2 metra or measures. In classical iambic, trochaic, and anapaestic verse the metron is a dipody (pair of feet). Thus the trochaic dimeter

blāstānēi kái | sýkhōphāntēi
(Aristophanes, Birds 1479)

contains 4 feet. But, as used by Eng. prosodists, "meter" is synonymous with foot. The Eng. dimeter (a 2-stress line), therefore, consists of 2 feet, the trimeter of 3 feet, etc. P.S.C.

DIMINISHING METAPHOR. A type of metaphor which utilizes a deliberate discrepancy of connotation between tenor and vehicle (q.v.). It is thus a type of conceit (q.v.), but its special quality lies in its use of a pejorative vehicle in reference to a tenor of value or desirability. One of the most extreme examples of d.m. occurs in Donne's First Anniversary, in which the surpassing and divine virtue of Elizabeth Drury, the subject of the obsequies, is described in these terms:

But as some Serpent's poyson hurteth not,
Except it be from the live Serpent shot,
So doth her vertue need her here, to fit
That unto us; shee working more than it.

The function of d.m. seems thus to lie in its forcing on the reader an intellectual rather than a sensuous reaction. It is, understandably, a figure especially favored in metaphysical poetry (q.v.) and in the work of many modern poets. F.J.W.

DINGGEDICHT. A type of poetry concerned with the description of objects from within rather than from the point of view of the observer. Early examples are to be found in the poetry of Eduard Mörike (Auf eine Lampe) and C. F. Meyer (Der römische Brunnen). As a form, the D. is fully developed in R. M. Rilke's Neue Gedichte (1907). These are parodied by Christian Morgenstern in certain of his Galgenlieder. Based on Goethe's ("Die Schöne bleibt sich selber selig"—Beauty rests content with itself) and Mörike's ("Was aber schön ist, selig scheint es in ihm selbst"—But that which is beautiful seems [or shines] content with itself) concept of beauty, the D.—a name first given to the genre by K. Oppert—deifies the object by stressing its self-sufficiency and its imperviousness to change. The object, to which a pure state of being is attributed, is said to be "separated from chance and time" (Rilke). The theory underlying the D. is implicitly stated in Rilke's essays on Rodin, where Skulptur and Ding are treated as synonyms. This explains the close relationship between the D. and the art of sculpture. Although, strictly speaking, the term D. refers only to German poetry of the 19th and early 20th c., certain parallels can be drawn between it and the art of the Parnassiens in France (with its emphasis on sculptural hardness) and that of the imagists in England and America (with its craving for spatialization).—K. Oppert, "Das D.," DVLG, 4 (1926); W. Rehm, "Wirklichkeitsdemut und Dingmystik," Logos, 19 (1930); E. Feise, "Rilkes Weg zu den Dingen," Monatshefte, 28 (1936); H. Kunisch, Rainer Maria Rilke und die Dinge (1946); F. Martini, "D." in Reallexikon, 2d ed., I. U.W.

L. nenia. Although in ancient literature it was sometimes influenced by the consolatio and closely connected with the elegy, its chief aim was to lament the dead, not console survivors. The meter in L. was the hexameter or the elegiac distich. The subject matter included lamentation and eulogy, often with consolatory reflections, apostrophes, invocations, etc. Not only may human beings be mourned but animals as well (cf. Catullus 3.). Simonides, Pindar, and the Alexandrian poets used the genre in Gr. In L., Calvus and Catullus first used it and Propertius brought it to its greatest perfection (4.11). The medieval writers combined the L. form with the church's lamentation for the dead, employing in the process Christian themes. In Eng., such poems as Henry King's Exequy on his young wife or George Meredith's Dirge in the Woods are examples of dirges.—G. Herrlinger, Totenklage um Tiere in der antiken Dichtung (1930); E. Reimer, Die rituelle Totenklage der Griechen (1938). R.A.H.

DIPODIC VERSE. Verse constructed rhythmically so that, in scansion, pairs of feet must be considered together. That is, the metrical unit is less the individual foot than a dipody (2 related but slightly dissimilar feet, one of which normally has a stronger stress than the other). Crude dipodic verse, of the sort encountered in children's rhymes, nursery songs, and popular ballads, provides simple examples:

$\begin{array}{c} \text{' } \times \text{' } \times \text{' } \times \\ \text{Taffy was a | Welshman,} \\ \text{' } \times \text{' } \times \text{' } \times \\ \text{Taffy was a | thief.} \end{array}$

Here the first 4 syllables in each line constitute similar dipodies: to scan as if each line began with a trochee and a pyrrhic would be to underemphasize the force of the "secondary accent" on the word "was"; to scan as two trochees would be to overemphasize the stress on "was." More complex dipodic arrangements are to be found in a poem like Masefield's Cargoes.—G. R. Stewart, Modern Metrical Techniques as Illustrated by Ballad Meter, 1700–1920 (1922) and "The Meter of the Popular Ballad," PMLA, 40 (1925); L. Woody, "Masefield's Use of Dipodic Meter," PQ, 10 (1931).

P.F.

DIPODY (Gr. "combination of 2 feet"). In classical prosody, a group of 2 metrical feet constituting a single measure. A ditrochee.

DIRGE. The name derives from the beginning of the antiphon in L. of the Office of the Dead ("Dirige, Domine . . ." adapted from Psalms 5.9). As a literary genre it comes from the Gr. epicedium (q.v.), the song sung over the dead, and the threnody (q.v.), sung in memory of the dead, both of which were found in the DISEMIC (Gr. "of 2 time-units"). Term applied to the regular principle of Gr. and L. prosody whereby a long syllable was regarded as equivalent to 2 shorts (the short syllable being the time-unit or mora). See CLASSICAL PROSODY, MORA, and TRISEMIC. R.J.G.

DISINTERESTEDNESS IN CRITICISM. "D." is a key word in "The Function of Criticism at the Present Time," first delivered by Matthew Arnold as an Oxford lecture in 1864 and published as the opening essay of Essays in Criticism (1865). In the first paragraph of the essay, Arnold quotes his own definition of the function of criticism, first enunciated at Oxford in "On Translating Homer, Lecture II" of 1860. Criticism is "the endeavour, in all branches of knowledge, theology, philosophy, history, art, science, to see the object as in itself it really is." That is, criticism is properly a broadly cultural rather than merely belletristic activity, objective rather than partisan or given to practical ends.

Such activity depends on an attitude toward the objects of criticism which Arnold calls "d.," a free play of mind or consciousness. Obstructed by the practical character of the modern Englishman and the conservatism of the age, criticism in the 1860's, Arnold says, must take d. as the rule for its course. It must keep aloof from practical considerations and partisan causes, must come to know "the best that is known and thought in the world and by in its turn making this known, to create a current of true and fresh ideas" out of which can come a new creative epoch of literature. D. is thus an antidote to the predominantly provincial, self-interested criticism of his time. Arnold's disinterested critic is to allow his mind to play freely with the best ideas in the world.

DISSOCIATION OF SENSIBILITY

Arnold recommended, and sometimes exhibited, a disinterested disposition, a detached stance. He also often adopted a disinterested manner as a rhetorical strategy. As early as his 1849 sonnet, To a Friend, he praised Sophocles, "Who saw life steadily, and saw it whole." Several of the subjects in Essays in Criticism were chosen as examples of the disinterested disposition: Maurice de Guérin, Joubert, Marcus Aurelius display unified aims, generous elevation of feeling, predominance of spirit over everything else. Arnold used d. as a strategy by professing concern for his subject matter not as material for the world of facts but for the world of ideas, by disavowing fixed principles, and by assuming an attitude of great intellectual flexibility, of modesty to the point of self-deprecation. However, though he argued the cause of d. with eloquence, Arnold himself had a disposition not basically disinterested, and, as he moved from literary to social criticism, even his strategy ceased to be disinterested.

Important modern critics, from Eliot on, have expressed sympathy for Arnold's principle of criticism as a disinterested endeavor, though some of them have adopted a highly interested point of view in their practical criticism.

H. W. Garrod, Poetry and the Crit. of Life (1931); E. K. Brown, Matthew Arnold: A Study in Conflict (1948); G. Tillotson, "Matthew Arnold: The Critic and the Advocate," Crit. and the 19th C. (1951); D. G. James, Matthew Arnold and the Decline of Eng. Romanticism (1961). J.K.R.

DISPONDEE. A combination of 2 spondees into a single measure (----). It is seldom found as an independent foot and never occurs in a connected series.—Koster. P.S.C.

DISSOCIATION OF SENSIBILITY. The terms "d.o.s." and "unification of sensibility" were introduced into the discussion of Eng. literary history by T. S. Eliot in an essay entitled "The Metaphysical Poets" (1921). Some students believe, however, that, insofar as they relate to "metaphysical" poetry (q.v.), concepts similar to Eliot's (in which there has been discovered the influence of Rémy de Gourmont or, alternatively, of F. H. Bradley) considerably antedate Eliot's formulations.

In his essay, Eliot sets out to discover what, if anything, justifies us (and Dr. Johnson) in considering the "metaphysical" poets a "school" or (aberrant) "movement" in the history of Eng. poetry; he concludes that there is no such justification. He therefore adopts the hypothesis that, rather than an aberration, they are "the direct and normal development of the precedent age. . . ." Furthermore, he sets out (by implication) to counter the view which he supposes to underlie Johnson's adverse criticism of the metaphysicals; the view that in poetry, thought, as manifested in learning and wit, is incompatible with feeling. To compass this end, Eliot offers the theory of unified and dissociated sensibilities. The early 17th-c. poets, he suggests, were learned men in the tradition of Dante and the stilnovisti (see DOLCE STIL NUOVO) and equipped like them with a "mechanism of sensibility" (or unified sensibility) which has subsequently and unfortunately disappeared. Through this "mechanism" they were capable of a "direct sensuous apprehension of thought" such that, for them, thought and feeling were "fused." After Donne and Herbert of Cherbury, however, "a dissociation of sensibility set in, from which we have never recovered." The results of the d., aggravated by the peculiar excellences of Milton and Dryden, were a refinement of language together with a progressive crudeness of feeling, and later a sentimental revolt "against the ratiocinative" in the 18th c. Since then poets have "thought and felt by fits, unbalanced."

Although Eliot has recorded his astonishment at the success of the theory, and although he soon began to make statements about Donne which are diametrically opposed to those in "The Metaphysical Poets," the theory gained widespread acceptance during the 25 years after it was enunciated; more recently, it has been subjected to considerable criticism on logical, psychological, and historical grounds. It is accepted and elaborated with particular reference to Donne and the "metaphysicals" by Williamson (1930) and with reference to 17th-c. intellectual history in general by Willey (1934). Reflexes of the theory are to be found in the poetics of such critics as Cleanth Brooks, Ransom, and Tate. Knights (1946) follows Eliot and Willey, but finds evidences of the d. already in the style of Bacon, Donne's older contemporary. O'Connor (1948) accepts the main outlines of Eliot's theory as elaborated by Williamson and Willey as the basis of his study of 20th-c. poetics and poetry. Maxwell (1952) accepts the concepts of unified sensibility and "felt thought," but finds that they are conditions aimed at by Donne (and not perfectly achieved even by Dante) rather than conditions inherent in a culture and thus necessarily imposed upon its representatives.

On the other hand, since at least 1939 doubts have been expressed as to the validity of the theory and of its elaborations. The mild skepticism of Spencer and Van Doren (1939) and of Dobrée (1946) gives place to the thoroughgoing criticism of Unger, who (1950, 1956) tests and finds wanting many of the assertions about "metaphysical" poetry by Williamson, Ransom, Brooks, and Tate from Eliot. Bateson (1951, 1952) finds Eliot guilty of equivocation in his use of the term "sensibility" and traces both term and equivocation to the "ram-shackle" psychological theory of Gourmont. Leishman (1951) finds that the fusion of thought and feeling, the hallmark of the undissociated sensibility, is evident in few of Donne's poems and that Eliot's theory is more intelligible as a program for a poet in the 20th c. than as an account of poetry in the 17th. Kermodé (1957) finds the theory unsatisfactory as historical explanation and considers it merely an attempt to rationalize the position of the poet in a scientific world.

The fullest accounts of the theory and of its elaborations are to be found in the critiques of Unger, Leishman, and Kermodé, the fullest applications in Williamson and Willey.—[T. S. Eliot], "The Metaphysical Poets," TLs, Oct. 20, 1921 (repr. in Selected Essays [1932]); G. Williamson, The Donne Trad. (1930); B. Willey, The 17th C. Background (1934); T. Spencer and M. van Doren, Studies in Metaphys. Poetry (1939); L. C. Knights, Explorations (1946); B. Dobrée, "The Claims of Sensibility," Humanitas (Manchester), 1 (1946); W. V. O'Connor, Sense and Sensibility in Modern Poetry (1948); L. Unger, Donne's Poetry and Modern Crit. (1950) and The Man in the Name (1956); F. W. Bateson, "Contributions to a Diction. of Crit. Terms II. D.o.S.," ELC, 1 (1951) and "D.o.S.," ELC, 2 (1952); J. B. Leishman, The Monarch of Wit: an Analytical and Comparative Study of the Poetry of John Donne (1951); D.E.S. Maxwell, The Poetry of T. S. Eliot (1952); H. W. Smith, "'The D.o.S.," Scrutiny, 18 (1952); E. Thompson, "D.o.S.," ELC, 2 (1952); F. Kermodé, Romantic Image (1957). See also F. M. Kuna, "T. S. Eliot's D.o.S. and the Critics of Metaphysical Poetry," ELC, 13 (1963).

J.D.K.

DISSONANCE. The quality of being harsh or inharmonious in rhythm or sound; akin to cacophony (q.v.). Insofar as the terms may be distinguished, cacophony is what is harsh-sounding in itself, d. is that which is discordant or inharmonious with what surrounds it. By extension the term may refer to poetic elements other than sound that are discordant with their immediate context. Donne and Browning have made notable use of d.—J. B. Douds, "Donne's Technique of D.," PMLA, 52 (1937).

L.P.

DISTICH. A couple of metrical lines, usually rhymed and expressing a complete idea (see COUPLET). In classical poetry the most common d. is the elegiac (q.v.), consisting of a dactylic hexameter followed by a dactylic "pentameter." It was very often used by writers of epigrams and is common in modern Gr. poetry.—Koster; G. Soyter, "Das volkstümliche Distichon bei den Neugriechen," Laographia, 8 (1925). P.S.C.

DIT (many other terms are used as synonyms: conte, lai, traitie, esmple). This is primarily an exemplum, a poem which has some instructional value, without necessarily supporting a moral. There is the dit d'Aristote which has something to say about the wiles of women; there is the dit des rues de Paris which lists all 310 of the streets as they were at the close of the 13th c. Since the middle of the 13th c. the term began to be used particularly for a long poem of contemporary observation and reflection. It could be a treatise on how to behave: le dit d'Urbain le Courtois; it might be concerned with religion and morals; it could be satire; it could be personal musing; it could even be an historical account. Guillaume de Machaut made use of the term for narratives that described his love adventures, allegorical and real. The Voir Dit, or "True Story," had to do with his relations with Peronelle d'Armentières. The inspiration for the dit comes from the L. exemplum and treatise of the 12th c. At first the form was the 8-syllable rhymed couplet; but soon, with Jean Bodel and Gautier de Coincy, 4-line monorhymed stanzas in alexandrines came into vogue.—Hist. littéraire de France, xxiii (1895).

U.T.H.

DITHYRAMB. Gr. choric hymn, accompanied by mimic gestures, describing the adventures of Dionysus, the god of fertility and procreation. The etymology of the term is not very certain. Many consider it of Thracian or Phrygian origin. It was probably introduced into Greece early in the 7th c. and became very popular among the Dorians. In its earliest form it was led off by the leader of a band of revelers, a group of dancers, probably dressed as satyrs and dancing around a burning altar. Arion of Corinth (ca. 600 B.C.) gave it its regular form and raised it to the rank of artistic poetry. Shortly before 500 B.C. it was introduced into Athens by Lasus of Hermione and was soon recognized as one of the competitive subjects at the various Athenian festivals. For more than a generation after its introduction into Athens the d. attracted the most famous poets of the day and reached its highest point of development in the hands of Pindar and Simonides. By this time, however, it had ceased to concern itself exclusively with the adventures of Dionysus and begun to choose its subjects from all periods of Gr. mythology. Furthermore, even as early as before the middle of the 5th c. the d. had begun to undergo changes which affected seriously its original character. These changes consisted primarily in the abandonment of the antistrophic arrangement of the verses introduced by the Dorians, greater metrical freedom, the preponderance of the music over the words, the introduction of solo songs, and the use of bombastic and affected language. The results of these changes are illustrated in the lyric passages of the poet Timotheus (fl. 400 B.C.). In the 4th c. and subsequently, the d. continued to lose steadily in importance, even in Athens. But we know that it was performed there as late as the imperial period.

In modern literature pure dithyrambs have been very rare. In Eng. poetry the d. probably finds its best expression in Dryden's Alexander's Feast (1697). The adjective "dithyrambic" is often used to describe both an enthusiastic and elevated and a wildly vehement and passionate composition.—Smyth; A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, D., Tragedy and Comedy (1927); Schmid and Stählin, 1; G. A. Privitera, Appunti intorno agli studi sul ditirambo (1957). P.S.C.

DITROCHEE, dichoree. Two trochees or chorees viewed as a unit (—~—~). It is also known as trochaic monometer and is found in combination with other cola and is used occasionally as a clausula (see PROSE RHYTHM).—Koster. P.S.C.

DITTIE, ditty, dictie, etc. (a) a composition intended to be sung, a lay; now any short, simple song—sometimes disparaging in tone; or, more generally, any composition in verse, particularly a ballad (Kipling, Departmental Ditties & Barrack-Room Ballads). (b) Sometimes the words of a song as separate from the music; i.e., the theme or burden. (c) The verb, meaning to sing a ditty, or (rarely) to adapt the words to music, is now obsolete. R.O.E.

DIVERBIUM. The spoken dialogue in the Roman drama to be distinguished from the cantica (see CANTICUM), the sung or declaimed part. It was written, as a rule, in iambic senarii. In some manuscripts of Plautus the d. is indicated by DV and the canticum by C.—Hardie; W. M. Lindsay, Early L. Verse (1922); W. Beare, The Roman Stage (2d ed., 1955). P.S.C.

DIZAIN. A Fr. poem of 10 octosyllabic or decasyllabic lines which, with Clément Marot, Hugues Salel and Mellin de Saint-Gelais, had the rhyme scheme ababbccdd. On the same scheme Maurice Scève wrote the 449 related dizains of his Délie (1544). When the d. stood alone as a separate composition, it tended to have the characteristics commonly associated with the epigram (q.v.), and Thomas Sebilllet in his Art poétique françoys of 1548 (ed. F. Gaiffe, 1932, p. 110), defines the d. as "l'épigramme aujourd'hui estimé premier." Three or five dizains, each group with an envoi, could be brought together to form a ballade or a chant royal (qq.v.), respectively. As employed later by the Pléiade, the d. has the rhyme scheme ababccdeed, is less often found as a separate poem, and may be composed of verses of different length.—P. Martinon, Les Strophes (1912); H. Chamard, Hist. de la Pléiade, iv (1941). I.S.

DOCHMIAC or dochmius (Gr. "slanted"). A metrical foot of 3 long and 2 short syllables occurring most commonly in the form — — — —. Very often each long syllable is resolved into 2 short ones, and the first and fourth syllables may be long. Dochmiacs are almost exclusively used in Gr. tragedy, chiefly in passages expressing intense emotion, agitation, or grief, and are frequently found in combination with iambs, anapaests, and cretics. As for Roman drama, the existence of dochmiacs in Plautus is disputed. In the hypodochmius or anacastic dochmius, the first two elements are inverted.—J. F. A. Seidler, De versibus dochmiacis tragicorum graecorum (1811); Dale; Koster. P.S.C.

DOGGEREL (origin unknown). Rough, poorly constructed verse, characterized by strong, monotonous rhyme and rhythm, cheap sentiment, triviality, and lack of dignity. Chaucer referred to his burlesque Tale of Sir Thopas as rym doggerel, and Dr. Johnson stigmatized the vice in the following parody:

As with my hat upon my head
I walk'd along the Strand,
I there did meet another man
With his hat in his hand.
(G. Steevens, Anecdotes of Johnson [Miscellanies] p. 315.)

Northrop Frye (in The Anatomy of Criticism, 1957) has characterized d. as the result of an unfinished creative process, in which a "prose initiative" has never assumed the associative qualities of true poetry, revealing its failure in a desperate attempt to resolve technical difficulties through any means which suggest themselves. There are, however, some works of real poetic value in which doggerel-like features are deliberately used for comic or satiric effect. John Skelton, Samuel Butler, and Jonathan Swift are all masters of artistic d., and much German Knittelvers (q.v.) also achieves a brilliant parodistic effect. L.B.P.

DOLCE STIL NUOVO. The style of It. lyric poetry written in the second half of the 13th c.; marked by sincerity of feeling and musicality of verse. The term was first used by Dante, "Purgatory," 24.57, where it is spoken by the poet Bonagiunta Orbicciani of Lucca. Dante's term has considerable validity. The "sweetness" of his style is attained, analysts have discovered, through his careful selection of words of pleasurable sound and their ordering. The "newness" scholars have long disputed. Most probably Dante refers to the poet's creative variations on traditional poetic themes. As we shall see presently, Dante's content is not without some new accent and variation. The literary background from which the stil nuovo emerged included the tradition of 200 years of Prov. troubadour poetry. This tradition was still vital in Italy at the time of Dante's birth. From Prov. poetry the stilnovisti learned the conventions of courtly love with its religious overtones, its idealization of women, its emphasis on gentility (gentilezza), and its faith that love is an ennobling influence on the lover. From Prov. poetry the stilnovisti also learned how to use intricate poetic forms like the trobar clus, a lesson which is important for the development of such native forms as the canzone and the sonnet. A second influence important for the stil nuovo is the Franciscan revival, which stressed sincerity, simplicity and a feeling for the unity of man with nature. Finally, philosophy had an important influence on the s.n. From Guido Guinizelli to Guido Cavalcanti and even Petrarch all of the important stilnovisti had contact with the University of Bologna where Thomistic theology and medicine were taught, both of which were allied to the great 13th c. revival of Aristotelianism. Avicenna on medicine and Averroes on Aristotle were not without their influence too. The result of these influences was to deepen the analysis of love found in the poetry of the s.n. In fact, it has been suggested (e.g., Karl Vossler) that the philosophical and often metaphysical bent of the poetry of the s.n. is its most distinctive characteristic. Another important influence is that of the Sicilian school (q.v.) of poets which flourished in the 13th c. and whose most prominent figure is the Notary Jacopo da Lentini.

The first of the triad of poets who composed important doctrinal canzoni is the jurisconsult Guido Guinizelli. His contribution was imitated by Dante, the third member, in the first canzone of the Vita Nuova. Guinizelli repeats the trobadour commonplaces, but seems to expand on the basis of platonic doctrine. The eyes (as in Plato's Republic Book 4) are the most beautiful part of the body—the windows of the soul. The saluto ranks second (in accordance with Aristotle's teaching of the "smile"). Love and the noble heart are one and the same. Love cannot exist anywhere save in a noble heart, and a noble heart cannot exist without love. This nobility is of the spirit, not of heredity through blood. It derives from one's own virtue. In Guido's conception, the beloved activates the lover's inborn disposition toward good and is instrumental in raising the lover's soul to the Highest Good, making for communion with the Absolute and the Eternal. Guinizelli's method is scholastic—a mode that developed to its perfection contemporaneously with Aristotelianism. His manner is distinguished by use of scientific observation of natural phenomena in images and similes to objectify the internal sensations of love. Cavalcanti, Dante's "first friend," is the second member of the triad. He devoted the best of his two canzoni to his Christian, neoAristotelian understanding of love. He deals with Love's origins and nature and may possibly show some overtones of Averroes' notions. Cavalcanti is concerned with profoundly intimate reveries upon womanly beauty. He is haunted by the phantom of Love and Spectre of Death amid the agitation and anguish of his state.

Dante brought the literary trend to a climax in the first canzone of the Vita Nuova. His earliest poetry is in the s.n., but that canzone (composed about 1289) and the several subsequent sonnets in the Vita Nuova (compiled probably in 1292, two years after Beatrice's death) show his adoption of Guinizelli's view of love, although he rejects Cavalcanti's views. The later poems of the Vita Nuova begin a series of paeans of "praise." They contain elements of the platonic outlook, particularly the seeing of the beloved as an angel-lady. The death of the lady in the case of Dante's Beatrice (as well as of Petrarch's Laura) is a supreme milestone in the pilgrim's progress in love. Having died, she becomes an angelic form, who through the light of the eyes and radiance of the smile, leads the lover as true guide, symbol of virtue, to God in His Goodness, to the ideal of perfection. In Dante's Convivio (1308), we learn (2.15.10; 2.16; 3.12.2-3; and 4.2) that he reserved a special manner of sweetness of expression for rhymes of love and that his conception of amore included the eager pursuit of knowledge. In his L. De Vulgari Eloquentia, written in about the same period (2.8, 12), Dante further elaborates his ideas as to style (the tragic being the highest); as to language (the illustrious vulgar being the sweetest); as to form (the canzone, sonetto, ballata being the noblest); and as to meter (hendecasyllabic being the most excellent). In the same work he names Cavalcanti, Lapo Gianni, himself, and Cino da Pistoia, whom (we do not understand why) he favors especially for his subtlety and sweetness, as partakers in the "sweet new style." Dante's remarks have led some critics to feel that there was a more or less self-conscious "school" of the dolce s.n. More likely it was a group of friends with more or less common poetic interests. Critics have added to the supposed group Gianni Alfani, Dino Frescobaldi, Guido Orlandi, and even Guido Novello da Polenta, Dante's host in days of exile.

Petrarch throughout his several reworkings of his Canzoniere shows much influence of the dolce s.n. However as Nesca Robb aptly points out, he was not altogether successful in his attempt to subjugate his "very mortal passion" to the Dantean ideal. His awareness of this dilemma is expressed in the crescendo and diminuendo, the ebb and flow throughout the carefully contrived Canzoniere. Later followers of the stilnovisti include Matteo Frescobaldi, Franceschino degli Albizzi, Sennuccio del Bene, Boccaccio (the last two, poetic correspondents of Petrarch), Cino Rinuccini, and Giovanni Gherardi da Prato. Through the influence of Petrarch, the conventions of the s.n. were spread throughout Europe and profoundly affected the development of lyric poetry in France, Spain, England, and elsewhere. Lorenzo de' Medici, the reviver of Petrarchism for the It. Quattrocento, consciously imitated the s.n. He also appreciated the minor stilnovisti, as is evidenced by the letter to Frederico of Aragon accompanying the anthology of early It. poetry he compiled for him (see A. Lipari, The Dolce S.N. According to Lorenzo de' Medici [Yale Romanic Studies, xii], 1936). Later, Michelangelo, Pietre Bembo, and Torquato Tasso showed the influence of the s.n., as did Ugo Foscolo in the 19th c. An It. refugee in England, Dante G. Rossetti, reintroduced Eng. Victorians to the s.n. through both translations and original compositions. The continuing significance of the s.n. is apparent in the critical discussions of the school by Ezra Pound and (more recently) Francis Ferguson, Edward Stambler, and John Anthony Mazzeo.

K. Vossler, Die Göttliche Komödie (1906; tr. Mediaeval Culture, 1929; surveys the philos. background of the poetic development); A. Figurelli, Il Dolce S.N. (1933; surveys historically attitudes toward poetically inspiring love, see review by M. Casella, ib., 18 [1934]); J. E. Shaw, "Guido Guinizelli, Cavalcanti, Dante," and "The Dolce S.N.," Guido Cavalcanti's Theory of Love, The Canzone d'Amore and other Related Problems (1949; penetrating analysis); U. Bosco, "Il 'Nuovo Stile' della Poesia Dugentesca," Medievo e Rinascimento, Studi in onore di B. Nardi, ed. C. Antoni (2 v., 1955; sensitive and discerning); A. Del Monte, "Dolce S.N.," FiR, 3 (1956); J. A. Mazzeo, "The Analogy of Creation in Dante," Speculum, 32 (1957) and Structure and Thought in the Paradiso (1958); L. Russo, "Lo Stilnovo," Storia della lett. ital. (3 v., 1957; magnificent survey);

G. Favati, Guido Cavalcanti Rime (1957; culmination of a polemic on text and interpretation); Poeti del Duecento, ed. G. Contini (2 v., 1960); G. Petrocchi, Il Dolce S.N. (1960). L.H.G.

DOUBLE, DUPEL METER. (a) Any meter in which the feet are composed of 2 syllables; i.e., iambic or trochaic, exemplified by most Eng. verse. (b) But in classical poetry the double measure, or dipody, was usually thought to contain 2 feet; thus the Gr. iamb, a dipodic measure, contained 4 syllables, the first either long or short, the second long, the third short, the fourth long; though in comedy considerable freedom of construction was allowed. (c) The term "duple meter" is sometimes used to describe dipodic verse (q.v.) in Eng. R.O.E.

DRAMATIC IRONY. See IRONY.

DRAMATIC MONOLOGUE. See MONOLOGUE.

DRAMATIC POETRY. The limits of genres, upon whose conventions most creativity and surely all criticism in the arts depend, keep shifting from one generation to the next. On the other hand, were the boundaries of poetic categories, such as lyric, narrative, and dramatic, wholly fixed, writing would long since have grown mechanical. The 20th c. has prized the dr. highly, thus its emphasis on show rather than tell and its addiction to formulae such as, "never apologize, never explain," for authors. Poets, particularly, have taken to dramatization: they speak through interior monologues or assume masks; they liberate minor objects and elevate them as striking symbols; they indulge in contrasts between great and small, or private and public, or ancient and contemporary, or elegant and tawdry—in short, they strive for a heightening, not by connected discourse, but by ellipses. A major advocate for this manner, T. S. Eliot, observed that the past directs the present, which then may modify former orders. Consequently, by the standards of this century works have been resurrected from neglect or undergone reevaluation. One criterion for excellence rests on how objective, and therefore dr., poets now sound. It follows that Dante, creating a self and expressing it through concrete figures, enjoyed a revival, and that Milton's reputation resting on vague images and didacticism declined. Donne, with two personalities of sinner and prelate, rose in popularity among readers who appreciated his nervous juxtapositions and vivid contrasts. Baudelaire's creating from a dandy's sensibilities an anxiety and vocabulary more witty and analytic than Tennyson had risked placed the Fr. master of postromantic despair far beyond his Eng. counterpart. Examples might extend for paragraphs. The result of this tendency complicates a definition of dr. poetry: older lines have blurred so that much more poetry now sounds dr., and the word has partly lost its descriptive nature and nearly changed into a standard for evaluation.

The traditional groupings of lyric, narrative, and dr., nevertheless, help delimit basic boundaries. Whether any man ever composed as a man rather than self-conscious poet probably no one can affirm. Certain poems do look almost anonymous, perhaps sincerely naive, as though the author expressed only his direct perception and, in some cases, his audience. With such compositions, however dramatized their images, the lyric attributes stay predominant. The narrative poem (including the epic) tells a story so that the writer speaks in his own person while setting the scene or giving exposition, but he puts on varied personalities and adopts different voices as the episodes require. In the dr., finally, the bare narrative fades away, and a group of characters embodied by actors remains. These distinctions have no fixed historical developments, and some works may partake of all three: Shakespeare's sonnets offer an instance. By itself the sonnet generally belongs to lyric poetry. Taken together the separate parts interact and produce a narrative which tells a kind of story. To the extent that the individual sonnets constitute a unified whole for which the author appends no direct commentary, it may look dr. The frequently explicated sequence lacks the precise lines which dr. poetry needs. One can compare Shakespeare's with other lyric poems and his Troilus and Cressida, for all its idiosyncrasies, with other plays, but one can scarcely cite any other dr. composition, however loosely that term is applied, quite like the sonnets. When a word which should describe a genre extends to embrace almost unique titles, it has lost its primary function.

Putting aside the subtleties of aesthetic and subjective prejudices, one might then agree upon the approximate range for dr. poetry. Its origins provide clues for the abiding attributes. In the Western world drama had two origins, one in Gr. festivals and, after nearly disappearing, another in the medieval church. A very early example from the Christian era belongs to the enactment of the Easter story called, after the angel's inquiry, the Quem Quaeritis Trope. Drama poses a question whose answer must unfold in human terms and not as abstract theology or a single emotion. For another dimension: the development of plays in Gr. culture depended upon adding to the traditional chorus in Dionysiac festivals a speaker, called the hypocrites or answerer. The questioner receives his reply from someone who need not reveal all he knows. Taken together these two (or more) constitute the cast or dramatis personae. In its origins persona seems associated with the term for mask; those who ask and respond assume a distinct personality and project their special traits through what they say. Finally, drama derives from dran, to do or act, so that the development does not occur simply as a dialogue but as a recognizable imitation of a happening. Why these speeches initially appear in poetry causes no uncertainty for the moment; it existed before plays themselves as part of the rites. Prose, although it soon enters in passages or takes over entirely, may represent a decline, just as pieces which deviate too far from the stage may grow overly speculative.

One paradox in evaluating any play depends upon its need for production; until having seen a performance one can scarcely possess a very accurate grasp of it, but, afterwards, that single interpretation may unduly influence one's judgments. This condition marks all drama, but, especially, the poetic will partake of the cast's inflections. A more vexing question hinges upon whether a prose translation of a play in verse distorts it seriously, whether, for example, Yeats's prose rendering of Oedipus Tyrannus gets closer to or further from Sophocles than Gilbert Murray's stanzas do. Similar problems hinge upon performances; does a dedicated troupe of students declaiming The Birds in the original before a non-Gr. audience commit a greater violence on Aristophanes than a professional company acting Lysistrata in translation? Here, again, to emphasize dr. qualities and the primacy of the theatre itself at least helps. At present, the Comédie Française in Paris, the Piccolo Teatro in Milan, the Old Vic in London, and the Burgtheater of Vienna among others keep on their active repertoire Molière, Goldoni, Shakespeare, and Schiller respectively in productions which, with varying degrees, exhibit tradition and experiment. Drama, to a greater extent than most other arts, relies on continued revaluations; every mounting entails another approach and in instances will stress novel aspects. At the same time, since printing, plays also remain available on the page, and, no matter how drenched in atmosphere with scrims, lighting, music, and stylization, dr. poetry needs, self-evidently, its language and not just the shifting tricks which directors, rather than authors themselves, may stumble upon through private predilections.

The kind of verse congenial to the stage varies a good deal from country to country and a bit less from time to time, as does the strictness of its uses. Generally the complete script rather than impressive parts sets the prevalent tone. Some examples might help define these conditions. When Lear realizes that Cordelia is dead, he says, in a moment of tragic recognition, "Thou'lt come no more, / Never, never, never, never, never!" The celebrated line, which out of context hardly looks striking, depends for its effects upon many circumstances: the suffering king whom it describes, his change from irascibility at the opening and rage on the heath, pity for Cordelia, and tragic awe. By itself it is not necessarily poetry, but the dr. rhythm undeniably reaches one of its heights here. In contrast, at the end of Ghosts, as Oswald declines into imbecility, he mutters, "Mother, give me the sun. . . . The sun, the sun," and Mrs. Alving wonders whether she can ever bring herself to poison him. Whatever pathos the scene may arouse, the line, scannable in translation, does not partake of poetry because the play throughout relies upon prose and a more pragmatic level—hence the irony of the title—than verse allows. At another extreme, to close The Rake's Progress a quartet sings a warning, "For idle hands / And hearts and minds / The Devil finds / A work to do, / A work, dear Sir, fair Madam, / For you and you." This passage indisputably belongs to verse and also the stage. About its merits opinions may differ, depending perhaps upon how clearly the echo from the end of Don Giovanni comes through. Opera, however, does not count as dramatic poetry because it fits more suitably into another genre where music has taken over as the medium and replaced a sustained repetition in the movement of language. For their effectiveness many operas rely upon the simplicity of the words. Finally, when Samson laments his condition, "O dark, dark, dark amid the blaze of noon / Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse / Without all hope of day," the poetry projects a special fervor but does not move rightly on the stage. At least, from a few experimental productions Samson Agonistes has not held its own and so fits more suitably with closet drama, dialogue designed only for the printed page. To turn back, finally, to Aristotle for a confirmation of such points—and he, of course, knew only plays in verse and closely associated with festivals—drama must contain plot, character, diction, thought, spectacle, and song. Although Aristotle, like most academicians since, did not rate spectacle highly, to ignore it raises too many extraneous questions.

Dr. poetry seldom exists in its pure state, just as, perhaps, Oedipus Tyrannus alone quite fits Aristotle's definition of tragedy. Granted imprecise limits, where it leaves off and turns into something else, basic essentials for its unique attributes do emerge. In addition to the general qualities which distinguish all poetry, metrical language, especially when recited on a stage, sustains the tableaux at a more intense level, whether for grandeur or satire, than prose can. Moreover, every production must establish some kind of rhythm, and, here again, if the voice as well as the body furthers the tempo, the performance gains commensurately. Prose has its own cadences, many brilliantly orchestrated, as in Congreve's comedies, and actors may, indeed, sometimes prefer it because it encourages their own mannerisms to cover a wider range. Over the years poetry has held its own for reasons which no one has yet fully explained; were no mystery connected with it, probably it would long since have vanished. One cause for its continuity may hark back to its origins: the theater retains aspects of participation by a group in an established ceremony. For this reason, among others, poetry has seldom attained prominence in motion pictures or television, which direct their products to frankly commercial ends. To mention individual titles as illustrations will probably pin down the range which poetry can encompass more effectively than added speculation here will. Before a chronological survey, one representative title—not necessarily the greatest within the conventional divisions of comedy and tragedy—will establish bases for noting later deviations.

A neoclassical play, obeying the rules promulgated in 17th-c. France, Phèdre, observes nearly impeccable proportions. Racine's language, in the expected couplets, establishes a tragic, elevated tone so that, with its deliberate aloofness, it creates its speakers as both individuals and types. Inside such confines it can, exploiting restricted variations, display much subtlety for both euphony of phrase and nuance. It investigates a persistent problem, that of passionate love, here a woman's for her stepson, but the dénouement cannot, by definition, dispel the mystery beyond clarifying the particular circumstances. By restricting himself to his notoriously small vocabulary, Racine manages a full exploration of his complex theme. The concepts must refer to psychological complications, and the fewer purely external interferences, the better: character is fate. Inevitability unfolds with unswerving logic. As Phèdre describes her suffering to the confidante, with a minimum of gestures reinforcing the words and in a functional mise en scène, the mind operates upon but fails to quell the emotions, which, expressed through the analytic alexandrines, gather to themselves intensity and amplitude. For an indicative comparison, Robert Lowell's Eng. rendering, with gratuitous figures and intensifying words added, sinks into rant and does not commensurately rise to terror. As with architecture, so with poetry in the theatre: less is more. In Fr. the deliberate artificiality of the verse prevents the frenzy from spilling over into mere bombast. Phèdre stays a nearly unique example, even for the Fr. theatre and Racine, and, like most models, the very lack of singularity may restrict it as less engrossing than others with slightly distorted proportions. To place Phèdre at a figurative center will indicate different types of diction in plays on similar themes, not by implication better or worse.

When the emotions no longer quite contain themselves in such simplicity of language, and when the characters fall victim to forces disproportionate to their strength and situations, the effect tends toward melodrama, for instance Dryden's heroic play Aureng-Zebe. To sustain mounting tensions the story may swell with improbabilities or collapse in an anticlimax. If a musical accompaniment serves to hold the whole together and make acceptable simplified exaggerations which the poetry by itself can no longer contain, the result grows entirely operatic, Verdi's Don Carlos based on Schiller's romantic play. Toward an opposite direction, when Phèdre herself serves as not merely a woman but directly embodies a myth, the situation may call for more than she can say in her own person, particularly if an awareness of her as an archetype emerges for an audience to whom she reveals, partially, a religious mystery. The play may then need a chorus for commentary with ceremonial songs and dances, the difference between Racine's Phèdre and Euripides' Hippolytus. If, too, as in the Gr. tragedy, the obsessive emotions loom as almost supernatural and Artemis and Aphrodite actually occupy the stage, then the verse may incorporate incantation, verging on the goal of all rituals, which bring knowledge of earth from heaven. If one thinks of these two movements as upward and downward, then toward the left, should Phèdre lose her status as a queen, a woman elevated, and become an unhappy wife, the verse may seek more idiomatic turns, paradoxically often away from directness, the effect in Lope de Vega's Punishment without Revenge. Eventually it may terminate with a domestic tragedy in prose, such as Desire Under the Elms, set forth through O'Neill's typically choked dialogue. Opposite from this point, to the right, when the characters begin uttering words meant primarily to evoke patterns nearly independent of the tableaux, then the effect approaches closet drama or, ultimately, ballet, where the voice separates from individuals and the poet gives up dramatization through words, such as Cocteau's ballet based on Phèdre. These directions are not absolutes, and intricate variations may arise through joining them, but, generally, diction must shape and control the episodes; when it no longer does, then a genre freed from the conventions strictly governing a play in verse has evolved.

If tragedy depicts the analysis of a continuing enigma, comedy explodes false mystifica-

tion through people who should shun pretensions. The language, consequently, revels in weird extravagances. Volpone, for example, like Phèdre belongs to the neoclassical pattern of the 17th c. It shows three men bringing presents in order to be named the sole heir of a man who pretends to be dying. Because the characters deceive themselves, their vocabulary has lost touch with reality. Vain ambitions, which they project through their speeches, puff all of them. Commensurately with this bent, their baseless wishes swell as disproportionate and ridiculous. Only Jonson's firmly reined blank verse prevents parts from disintegrating into rant. Whereas tragedy must veil an uncontrollable fate, comedy must expose people who deceive themselves. In tone comic diction ranges from satire to benignity, from Aristophanes to Molière. Comedy also expands in four approximate directions. That acceptable examples of tragedies on similar topics come to mind at once, whereas nearly every memorable comedy in verse looks nearly unique, suggests that the ridiculous must examine contemporary failings, which seldom endure. When it reverts to an affirmed joy, that man with all his limits will ultimately triumph, it partakes of its origins in celebrating fertility or harvests, and all may dissolve in songs, feasts, games, and wedding ceremonies.

Comparable with tragedy's approach to opera, comedy may quite yield to spectacle so that in the 17th c. the masque (q.v.), where décor buried the poetry, may supersede it and, in the 20th, musical comedy, where prose ties together a spate of lyrics. Again, parallel with tragedy, if the scene grows domestic and the language idiomatic, then what passes for comedy in popular usage has evolved. Finally, just as tragedy veers toward slighting language, comedy may abandon thought and revert to a clown's pantomime, where a touching tragic admixture occurs in the very inarticulate quality of its performers' lacking eloquence. Although circus and farce do not enjoy very high reputations at the present time (nor, until recently, has the musical comedy as evolved in the United States, nor, except to academic studies, have whatever spring rites may survive), these forms, if they overcome clichés, need not be judged by their natures minor; they simply have left off being instances of dr. poetry.

Such a schematic outline does violence to the wayward growth of the drama itself, and a loosely chronological order will help modify the generalizations. The Gr. theatre, to which nearly all western developments owe some debt, arose out of rituals, for tragedy those devoted to Dionysus. The large amphitheatres still remaining attest to its popularity, and authors received official prizes for their works. Drama itself started when a speaker exchanged dialogue with the chorus which sang in a rhythmic movement. Consequently, the poetry attendant upon all religious ceremonies accompanied secular plays from the outset, as did dancing or, at least, formal movement. The very nature of this diction required stylization, and the staging itself corresponded, with the actors garbed for tragedy in high masks. The short lines exchanged between speakers, stichomythia, kept to a rigorous pattern. Varied meters served, particularly for the chorus with its standard turns divided into strophe, anti-strophe, and epode, but dialogue stayed chiefly in alexandrines. Plays by three writers of tragedy remain, although in each case far from the total number which they composed. Their styles differ, but all elude translation; recently the challenge has intrigued a number of poets in England and the United States, and their versions remove the seeming falsifications perpetrated by preceding centuries. The problem, of course, plagues all dr. poetry. By its nature it incorporates deliberate artificiality, and, yet, if it sounds only stiffly contrived, it fails to catch living accents. As a result, any translation must adhere to limits acceptable by literary and idiomatic standards for less than a century. Moreover, the Gr. dramatists worked in traditional materials so that their audiences could often respond with a directness to nuances not understandable later. Aeschylus, the earliest, while observing an austerity in plots and actions, can rise to solemnity and exuberance poetically. Sophocles indulged in a more personal vocabulary which favored the ironic implications of words as well as action. The characters' discovering the full implications of their sentences and deeds only with the unfolding of the story constitutes his theatrical effectiveness. With Euripides the tone sounds decidedly more mixed. His tragic figures, the women, especially, reveal psychological suffering in images more tortured than his predecessors'. The action, likewise, draws mixed responses; the puzzling Alcestis still causes controversy.

Where and how Gr. comedy originated remains more debatable. Aristophanes has left the first surviving examples, although he clearly drew upon antecedents. Indicatively the oral and physical extravagances which adhere to comedy occur in all his plays, as men search vainly to realize their desires and endure indignities, such as ascending to heaven on a beetle. Somehow, in spite of their bewilderment by an unpredictable world, they ultimately triumph. The language features sharply biting exchanges, and the plots revel in exaggerations unavailable to the stage since. The basically personal bias, using more meters than tragedy, represents old comedy. The need for this mode to depict mainly contemporary foibles restricts it more persistently to an idiom of an obvious verisimilitude than tragedy must observe. As part of this nature, Gr. comedy apparently moved through a middle phase, which stays conjectural, and a late phase called new comedy, with which the works of Menander have become virtually synonymous; the recently discovered Dyskolos is the only reasonably complete play extant by which Menander's talents can be judged. Although prized above Aristophanes by some critics, Menander's poetry represents a descent toward mere speech. He specializes in the stereotypes who form so conspicuous a part of comedy and who, themselves unchanging, always mouth the fashionable clichés so that plays featuring them age quickly. Plautus and Terence, the Roman dramatists who copied Menander, fill their plots with similar intrigues and cross purposes. While differences set off these two writers, they treat the same topics: clever slaves, lost children, braggarts, and wayward sons. These complications may copy life, particularly Gr. and Roman life, but for language they necessitate a looseness which no versification can entirely rescue and require those embarrassing notes in which editors translate foreign idioms into the outmoded slang of their own youth. As a whole, such works probably give the social historian more pleasure than the playgoer. Seneca, the author of L. tragedies, barely exceeding closet drama, retains an ambiguous reputation. His tortured syntax and melodramatic twists perhaps deserve mention more for their later influence than achievements on their own; in the 17th c. the Roman dramatists exerted a heavier influence than the Gr.

With the medieval period, almost all drama of any sort disappeared, as far as records can prove, until it sprang again mainly from the churches. For a second time European theatre took direction from a religious ceremony. Although some critics make the development one toward secularization, or an intrusion of realistic material, such a theory denies art special attributes and reduces it to mirroring events rather than reinterpreting persistent impulses in human terms. For whatever causes, during the 17th c. both tragedy and comedy reached their most impressive achievements since the classical era. Among the conflicting factors credited—such as a popular and/or aristocratic audience, the appearance of gifted authors and/or actors, a culmination from earlier developments, and simply the historical moment—a large measure indisputably depends upon making and perfecting a native idiom for stage poetry in each country. Without merely copying classical patterns, the stage took over its measures and fitted them to the vernacular so that they display both directness and grace.

No single tendency will define all of them, but everywhere the crossing between the native and the classical accounts for the vigor. The proportions vary, with the Fr. theater almost determinedly neoclassical and the Eng. more mixed.

For England, Gorboduc in the mid 16th c., whatever its limits, hit upon blank verse, which continues almost the basis in Eng. dr. poetry. Until Marlowe's Tamburlaine, with his modulation of the line into a more pliant instrument, stage verse stayed awkwardly stiff. His swelling syllables reinforce a conqueror's vision and emphasize man's despair in containing human wishes. In spite of its seeming freedom, Elizabethan poetry obeyed, while expanding, the formal rules for grammar, rhetoric, and logic formulated by Renaissance rhetoricians, who founded their trivium upon classical models. Nevertheless, later, under less skilled hands, drama may disintegrate into mere melodrama or sensational effects of speech and action, a danger perhaps inherent from the outset in Kyd's Spanish Tragedy with its Senecan touches. To count Shakespeare the heir of these earlier writers emphasizes once again how greatly any artistic creation must exceed the source upon which it draws. Indeed, to the astounding degree that Shakespeare excels any other dramatist, at least in the qualities now prized, counting him the measure for excellence may limit one's appreciation of other, not necessarily less interesting, playwrights. In language, as any other theatrical trait, he ranges as he chooses and breaks rules with impunity. This very assurance leads lesser authors to fiascos, as, for example, the succession of dull plays based vaguely upon Hamlet sufficiently proves. His poetic resources can range in tragedy from passages of formal balance to quite simple, idiomatic speeches without disrupting a deeply sustained tone. Because his career traces a consistent development, no single title can wholly exemplify his technique, although the movement in diction strives toward greater freedom with meters and a simplified vocabulary. In the great tragedies, through the metaphors, the exploration of thought and emotions ranges so widely that it almost exceeds containable limits. The presence of running patterns in imagery, which comments upon the story, contributes further to this richness. Passages in prose handle effects from realism to humor which verse by itself probably could not sustain.

In comedy he likewise displays assurance from the tavern scenes with Falstaff to the happy endings for lovers. Shakespeare excels in comedy which relies upon romance, but infrequently, except in early works, does he undertake the grotesque extremes in which Jonson specialized. Jonsonian comedy, as in Volpone, already discussed, loses contact with actuality while the vocabulary further distorts the speakers' swollen dreams. Few other writers commanded Jonson's assurance, and comedy, even in the Jacobean period, stressed such pyrotechnics less and relied more upon a kind of realism and prose. Tragedy, while partly leaning toward domestic commonplaces after Shakespeare, became generally more extreme with an emphasis upon nearly pathological states. The verse, unable always to contain these effects, therefore verged upon pathos and grew sentimental except in Webster and, unevenly, Ford. The hiatus in theatrical production for nearly twenty years cleared the way for a different style with the Restoration. Comedy moved almost uniformly into prose and explored the foibles of fashionable society. Tragedy, influenced to a degree by the Fr. theatre, abandoned blank verse briefly and copied the foreign couplets. The narrow limits of this mode, and its requiring a simplified diction, could not hold the scene very long. Moreover, by featuring unexpected reversals in plots and reducing psychology to the claims of love and honor, debated at length, the action lay stilted and frozen. Nevertheless, the impetus from which much of this derives, the Fr. theatre, yields far richer effects.

In France a group of dramatists devotedly serving restrictions more severe than those which Aristotle promulgated produced tragedies distinguished by lines nearly as clear-cut as the Elizabethan and Jacobean are diversified. With Corneille, not wholly happy in the conventions which he obeyed, the theme of love and honor, more congenial to Fr. than Eng. psychology, took readily to couplets, which heightened the antitheses. The style culminates with Racine, although a criticism sometimes directed at his plays holds that the analyses of emotion grow too rarefied and overly refined. In comedy, on the other hand, Molière often serves as a paragon with his graceful emphasis on common sense, on types who violate social standards, on a genial wit, and on easily conversational movement in his verse. He may in instances skirt dangerously close to prosaic moralizing, but by its nature comedy inevitably runs this risk. How closely dramatists succeed in various modes may attend upon native patterns of language. For example, the Sp. theatre of Lope de Vega and Calderón, nearly contemporary with the Fr. and Eng., like the Elizabethan may mix emotions and employ varying styles. The comedia de capa y espada (q.v.) drew upon such mixed tendencies with a wider range of versification than contemporary plays elsewhere in Europe employed. After the general flowering of drama throughout Europe during the 17th c., the one following witnessed a decline into wholly stilted plays on classical themes or sentimental domestic pieces. In both cases the diction almost disintegrated into artificiality or cloying affectation.

With the approach of the 19th c., the triumphant romanticism which swept through every country brought along a reemphasis upon the theatre based chiefly on the new enthusiasm for Shakespeare, particularly in England and Germany. An anomalous aspect of the romantic temperament often trapped it between the lyric, the desire to express fresh, spontaneous feelings, and the dr., the compulsion to impose novel and generally self-conscious poses. Consequently, nearly every romantic poet sought—or expressed the wish—to write a play and failed in the effort. In plots, despite an earnestness, their plays often touch bathos, and the verse emphasizes more twists of speculation than the stage can contain while action itself languishes for long stretches. In England nearly every major poet of the century set his hand to plays, all of which, to 20th-c. tastes, look unstageworthy. With scarcely more memorable results, the Fr. poets, likewise, assaulted the theatre. Despite minor rebellions in style, exciting at the time, Hugo's plays, like most romantic drama, sound operatic, and, significantly, some, such as Hernani, have furnished the material for libretti. In Germany, as well, the romantic era encouraged a similar development, but philosophizing nearly predominates over psychology, as in Schiller and Goethe. These two directions, toward a lyric expression and toward a versified metaphysic, pulled in opposite directions and, for the period, reached a symbolic culmination with the interminable mythologies of Wagner's operas and Mallarmé's fragmentary prose-poem Igitur, admittedly closet drama. By and large the romantics did not admire intentional comedy, which disintegrated with popular playwrights into mere farce, and the serious theatre itself yielded to problem plays, well made in utilitarian prose.

In the 20th c., despite many attempts at revitalization, these two extremes survive to hamper dr. poetry: efforts to project a lyric slightness or to express transcendent generalizations. In Eng. Yeats favored enigmatic material influenced by what he made of the Japanese Nô (q.v.) plays. Hugo von Hofmannsthal in Germany experimented with a similar mode before, largely, turning to the books for Richard Strauss' operas. With both authors purely dr. poetry fell into abeyance. On the other hand, modifying Elizabethan approaches, T. S. Eliot through his own theatrical development almost repeated the historical growth of the drama, starting with a religious pageant, The Rock, its choruses using irregular meters, and subsequently working through plays which incorporate themes from Gr. tragedies in modern settings. His language has, similarly, modified blank verse and shuns any self-conscious artificiality. Christopher Fry, with The Lady's not for Burning, sporadically achieved the exuberance of an essentially comic verse. An instance of how tragedy demands tighter diction occurs in his The Dark Is Light Enough, which tries for greater pathos and fails to encompass the theme convincingly. Unfortunately, a promising departure for plays in verse, one based on the idioms of jazz, has not come into its own apart from musical comedies, where undistinguished prose holds together the songs and dances. The most interesting experiments along such lines, the collaborations between W. H. Auden and Christopher Isherwood, suffer from an excessive indulgence in wit. The two titles of an incomplete work in this vein by T. S. Eliot, originally published as "Wanna Go Home, Baby?" but changed to "Fragment of an Agon," exemplify the difficulties which this manner imposes. The colloquial sounds only trite, no matter how serious the puns, and the formal a bit too stiff and ironic for its subject. Furthermore, with the disappearance of the authentic sources for this speech, even as expressed in vaudeville and the music hall, the future will have no place from which to draw the raw materials.

Indeed, at present the entire concept of poetry in the theatre relies less and less upon language and increasingly on the special contributions from stagecraft. Here, again, the 20th-c. tendency to exploit the unique materials of the arts as expressive in themselves perhaps has had an influence. Thus, painting no longer favors a subject, music has abandoned programmatic notes, and sculpture concentrates upon mass and space. The emotions associated with the arts have, as a result, shifted. In many ways the short story provides the sudden insight once reserved for lyric poetry. On the other hand, the novel since James has taken to dramatizing subjects, and the major novelists in this century have annexed what remains of the epic, if not precisely the heroic. What the theatre can best trade upon remains problematic. If the term dr., as applied to poetry, now connotes praise, for the theatre itself it sounds almost pejorative, synonymous with commercial or, nearly, anti-poetic. Works belonging to the "Theatre of the Absurd" with their destructive tendencies drawn from early Dada and later existentialism have sought to destroy conventional language along with other middle-class clichés. Whatever originality such plays exhibit, their dialogue—or, frequently soliloquies even when involving two or more speakers—relies on prose whether sinewy as Beckett's or explosive as Genet's. The efforts of others to sustain a poetry sound puerile and not, unfortunately, by design. Dryden started "An Essay of Dramatic Poesy," "It was that memorable day, in the first summer of the late war," but removed his debaters from the conflict so they could discuss their points leisurely. At the moment, caught between the claims of disinterested art and engagement, the theatre has not yet hit upon any effective substitute for poetry. No one has recently succeeded in bringing forth any enduring verse for the stage, either. See also COMEDY and TRAGEDY.

GENERAL: critical prefaces and essays of Aristotle, Sidney, Jonson, Lope de Vega, Corneille, Molière, Racine, Dryden, Johnson, Lessing, Schiller, Goethe, Coleridge, and Hugo; A. Nicoll, Theory of Drama (1923); G. Baty and R. Chavance, l'ie de l'art théâtral des origines à nos jours (1932); E. A. Drew, Discovering Drama (1937); Wellek and Warren; M. E. Prior, The Language of Tragedy (1947); Understanding Drama, ed. C. Brooks and R. B. Heilman (1948); J. L. Barrault, Reflections on the Theatre (1951); S. H. Butcher, Aristotle's Theory of Poetry and Fine Art (4th ed., rev., 1951); M. McCarthy, Sights and Spectacles (1956); Frye; A. Artaud, The Theater and Its Double (1958).

SPECIALIZED STUDIES: N. Díaz de Escovar and F. de P. Lasso de la Vega, Historia del teatro español (2 v., 1924); W. B. Yeats, Essays (1924); H. C. Lancaster, A Hist. of Fr. Dramatic Lit. (1929-1942); E. E. Stoll, Poets and Playwrights (1930); C. V. Deane, Dramatic Theory and the Rhymed Heroic Play (1931); J. S. Kennard, The It. Theatre (2 v., 1932); T. S. Eliot, Elizabethan Essays (1943), Poetry and Drama (1951); H. Granville-Barker, On Poetry in Drama (1937); M. Bieber, The Hist. of the Gr. and Roman Theater (1939; 2d ed., 1961); U. Ellis-Fermor, Frontiers of Drama (1945); A. Nicoll, The Development of the Theatre (3d ed., rev., 1946); R. Peacock, Poet in the Theatre (1946); F. Fergusson, Idea of a Theater (1953); R. Langbaum, The Poetry of Experience (1957); R. Lattimore, The Poetry of Gr. Tragedy (1958); D. Donoghue, The Third Voice: Modern British and Am. Verse Drama (1959).

J.J.E.

DRAME (romantique). A dramatic form of the 19th c. often written in prose. As concerned with Fr. poetry, the term is used in the sense discussed by Victor Hugo in his Préface de Cromwell (1827). The d. breaks from the "cage of the unities," keeping only unity of action, is impregnated with local color, avoids classical recits and seeks to offer a great amount of action on the stage. It keeps verse as a barrier against the commonplace and is faithful to rhyme, "that slave-queen" (Boileau had called rhyme only "a slave"); but its verse is freer than that of classicism, with enjambement

(q.v.) encouraged and displacement of the caesural pause. On occasion it develops a notable lyricism. Among characteristic weaknesses of the genre (exemplified in such plays as Hugo's Hernani [1830], Le roi s'amuse [1832], and Ruy Blas [1838]) are its melodramatic plots, exaggerated emotionality, and superficial characterization. It has been said with some justice that the d.r. of this sort differs from melodrama primarily in that it is in verse, is more literary, and ends unhappily. In the last quarter of the century such authors as Henri de Bornier, François Coppée, and Jean Richepin wrote plays in verse that mark a brief return to the d.r. The last great success in the genre is Cyrano de Bergerac (Dec. 1897) by Edmond Rostand.—E. Sée, Le Théâtre français contemporain (1928).

A.G.E.

DRÁPA. An elaborate skaldic poem consisting of a number of stanzas in the same metrical pattern (often dróttkvætt, q.v.), with a refrain of 2 or more half-lines at regular intervals. Shorter court poems, without a refrain, were known as flokkr, and were regarded as inferior eulogistic offerings. With its resonant rhythmic effect the d. lent itself particularly well to impressive recitation in the presence of the king (or other chieftain) and his court. To this day Icelandic poets resort to the time-honored and sonorous d. form when they wish to write a eulogy of especially high order. A notable example from recent years is Einar Benediktsson's Drápa composed in honor of King Christian X of Iceland and Denmark and publicly recited in his presence during his visit to Iceland in 1921.—The Skalds, tr. and ed. L. M. Hollander (1945).

R.B.

DREAM-ALLEGORY is one variety of the vision literature popular in the Middle Ages. The allegory may vary widely in purpose and extent and is often fused with other, frequently more interesting, elements. The framework, however, shows little variety. Springtime commonly provides the season. The poet finds himself in a pleasant wood or garden; falls asleep to the music of birds and brook; dreams; and in the dream beholds either real people performing symbolic actions or, more commonly, certain abstractions personified and going through a set of motions which to the conscious mind will have other significance. The type apparently received a major impulse from Macrobius' commentary upon the Somnium Scipionis in Cicero's imperfectly preserved Republic. Probably its best known representative, vastly influential, was the Roman de la Rose. In Eng., the type is best represented by Langland's Piers Plowman; and, among many others, both the anonymous The Pearl and Chaucer's Parlement of Foules have been considered dream-allegories.—E. Langlois, Origines et sources du Roman de la Rose (1891); W. H. Schofield, "The Nature and Fabric of The Pearl," PMLA, 19 (1904); E. Rickert, "A New Interpretation of The Parlement . . .," MP, 18 (1920); C. S. Lewis, The Allegory of Love (1938); A. A. T. Macrobis, Commentary on the Dream of Scipio, tr. W. H. Stahl (1952); G. de Lorris and J. de Meun, The Romance of the Rose, tr. H. W. Robbins, ed. C. W. Dunn (1962). J.L.L.

DRÓTTKVÆTT (dróttkvæðr hátttr). The elaborate and most common measure of skaldic poetry. Each stanza consists of 8 lines of 6 syllables, 3 of which are accented and 3 unaccented, with each line regularly ending in a trochee. Every 2 lines are bound together by alliteration, which must fall on the first stressed syllable of the second line, with 2 alliterations in the first line as well. This measure is also characterized by internal rhyme, full rhyme in the even lines, half rhyme (assonance) in the odd lines. Besides the extravagant use of kennings (q.v.), and other specific poetic vocabulary, the arrangement of words and the sentence structure are highly intricate. The following lines will illustrate the basic metrical rules generally observed:

Brunnu beggja kinna
björt ljós á mik drósar.

The d. measure, in all its main features, is already found in the remaining stanzas of Ragnarsdrápa by Bragi the Old (first half of 9th c.), who may even have devised this verse form. It has survived in Icelandic poetry down to the present day.—The Skalds, tr. and ed. L. M. Hollander (1945). R.B.

DUMY. See UKRAINIAN POETRY.

DURATION. The length of time phonetic phenomena (particularly syllables) continue. One of the four characteristics of a spoken sound, the others being pitch (q.v.), loudness, and quality. Since poetry is constructed of spoken sounds, duration of syllables, as well as of feet, lines, and stanzas, is an important consideration in analyzing the phonetic construction of a poem. The shortness of many of the important vowels in Pope's line

Not so, when swift Camilla scours the plain (Essay on Criticism 2.372)

contributes to the effect of rapidity and delicacy which the line conveys. Some prosodists have attempted to explain accent (q.v.) in terms of d. P.F.

DUTCH POETRY. (Flemish poetry from the beginnings until 1600 is treated concurrently with D. poetry; for an account of FLEMISH POETRY from 1600 to the present, see the separate article on that subject.)

The earliest monuments of D. poetry are the works of Hendrik van Veldeke, a Fleming who lived during the latter part of the 12th c. The absence of any older vernacular literature may be attributed to the dominance of L. in both courtly and ecclesiastical circles, a dominance which is a recurrent complicating factor in the literary history of the Netherlands. Van Veldeke wrote a versified life of St. Servatius and a courtly romance epic, Eneïde, which shows a marked influence of Fr. courtly literature, as do his lyrics. The first great development of D. poetry occurred in the 13th c., reaching a climax in the religious verse of the Flemish nun and mystic Hadewych (fl. 1240). A creation of a very different sort is the beast-epic Van den Vos Reinaerde (Reynard the Fox), one of the finest of the genre, which may probably also be assigned to the early 13th c. It is an irreverent treatment of society, written with wit and charm, from a decidedly non-aristocratic point of view.

These works, the most important of the early period, typify the three main currents of medieval D. poetry—the courtly, the religious, and the bourgeois—related at once to different classes of society and to different ways of looking at experience. All three types of vision were to be of continuing importance in the intellectual and artistic history of Holland, and they were ultimately to give rise to a significant dichotomy which shaped that history. For D. poetry, in its later manifestations, was to tend toward extremes of bourgeois practicality and conformity and of individualistic aestheticism and revolt. The religious impulse itself was to find a double expression—in socially oriented didacticism and in unfettered mysticism.

Courtly, religious, and bourgeois elements were combined in the work of another Fleming, Jacob van Maerlant (ca. 1235–ca. 1288), who has sometimes been called "the father of D. poetry," a title he merits for productivity if for no other reason. In his early period he wrote courtly romances on the standard subjects of the aristocratic tradition—the quest for the Grail, the siege of Troy, and the legendary adventures of Alexander. Later, in his Rijmbibel, he treated religious themes, and in his compendious works of erudition—the Spiegel Historiael (Mirror of History) and Der Naturen Bloeme (Flowers of Nature)—he catered to the growing bourgeois taste for enlightenment and edification. Van Maerlant's importance is more cultural than artistic.

After the 14th c., a period of relatively little poetic activity in the Low Countries, a new poetic period began. It manifested itself first in the rederijerskamers, "Chambers of Rhetoric," (see REDERIJERS), bourgeois poetic associations organized in Flanders and, later, in Holland. The rederijers were interested primarily in the theater, and they carried the traditions of the morality play into the period of the Renaissance. Elckerlyc (ca. 1490), which was probably the source of the Eng. Everyman, was the most notable product of rederijker art. The members of the Chambers of Rhetoric also interested themselves in problems of language and metrics, and, though it is easy to be amused by their pedantry and their addiction to complex rules, one should not underestimate their role in laying a foundation for the great literary works of the 17th c. The practice of the rederijers, for example, firmly established the rimed alexandrine couplet as the major vehicle for dramatic and heroic verse in D., and it was to remain the most important form for the next three centuries.

The influence of the It. Renaissance entered D. poetry in the early 16th c. in the work of the Flemings van der Noot and van Mander and the Hollanders van Hout and Coornhert. A kind of fusion of rederijker tradition and Renaissance influence is evident in the poetry of the later rederijers Visscher and Spieghel, both residents of Amsterdam, which began to assume a position of cultural dominance after the fall of Antwerp in 1585. The 17th c., the greatest period in D. literature, was characterized by an emphasis on the drama and the lyric, and in both these forms one finds a typical mixture of native tradition with themes and techniques borrowed from the It. Renaissance. Pieter Corneliszoon Hooft (1581-1647) was the true founder of the poetic drama in Holland. Though he was a staunch Calvinist, his imagination was fired by the spirit of the southern Renaissance, which he experienced on a youthful trip to Italy. His plays, though written in the rimed alexandrines of his predecessors, follow the standard Renaissance models. Granida is a pastoral drama in the fashion of Guarini and Tasso, Gerard van Velsen is a Senecan tragedy, and Warenar, his best-known work, is based on the Aulularia of Plautus. Hooft's brilliant younger contemporary Gerbrand Adriaenszoon Bredero (1585-1618) worked more closely with the native tradition and was inspired primarily by his instinctive realism and his observing eye. De Spaansche Brabander (The Spanish Brabanter) is an excellent romantic comedy, but Bredero's distinctive art reaches its peak in his great kluchten, or farces, chief of which are De Klucht van de Koe (The Farce of the Cow) and Der Klucht van de Molenaar (The Farce of the Miller). In these works the standard alexandrine couplet is treated with freedom and virtuosity; the strictness of the form never seems to conflict with the raucous quality of the action or the detailed realism of the observation.

Joost van den Vondel (1587-1679), the greatest of D. poets, is also the greatest D. dramatist. Master of a poetic style which suggests Milton in its sublimity, Vondel was at the same time more clearly the heir of the writers of the morality plays than were Hooft and Bredero. For his dramatic art is always ultimately ethical and devotional in its impulse, and these qualities are noticeable both in the early Palamedes, a political allegory attacking the strict Calvinists, and in the towering works of his maturity—Lucifer (1634), Jephta (1659), and Adam in Ballingschap (Adam in Banishment, 1663). The dramas of the early and middle years are of many different types. Gijsbrecht van Aemstel, one of his finest works, is an historical and patriotic drama, which, through its sympathetic presentation of Catholic ritual (a symptom of Vondel's approaching conversion to that faith), aroused the ire of the more intransigent Amsterdam Protestants. Maagden (The Maidens), a work of the same period, is a dramatized saint's legend, and De Leeuwendalers is an idyllic pastoral drama. But Vondel's mature dramatic powers expressed themselves in a long series of remarkable biblical dramas in which the spirit of the old morality plays is given Sophoclean form and articulation. Particularly noteworthy are Lucifer, probably his masterpiece, and Jephta. The expansiveness and sublimity of Lucifer, in both conception and imagery, contrast with the restrained inevitability of Jephta, and the contrast suggests the range of the poet's powers. Most of Vondel's plays are written basically in alexandrine couplets. Jephta, however, utilizes a five-beat couplet which Vondel handles with equal skill. A noteworthy feature of all his dramas is the use of choruses, which are written in a variety of free and strikingly lyrical forms. The choruses of Gijsbrecht van Aemstel and Lucifer are among his finest achievements. Vondel's nondramatic production is immense—elegies, epithalamia, poems of description—expressed in a wide variety of forms, many of them utilizing internal rime and a skillful repetition of the diminutive endings in which the D. language abounds. One should also mention his political poems, his satires, his occasional pieces, and his epic, Johannes de Boetgezant (John the Baptist).

Vondel's fellow-Amsterdammers, Hooft and Bredero, are also noted for their lyric poetry, and in their lyrics we find an illuminating formal contrast. Hooft, the Italianate aristocrat, is a master of metrical variety. He is particularly fond of the contrapuntal interplay of rime and line length, as exhibited in the following passage:

Amaryl, de deken sacht
 Van de nacht,
 Met zijn blaewe wolken buijen,
 Maeckt de starren sluimerblind
 En de wind
 Soeckt de maen in slaep te suijen.
 Amaryl, the cover light
 Of the night,
 With its bluish clouds aheap,
 Makes the stars all slumber-blind,
 And the wind
 Seeks to lull the moon asleep.
 (tr. F. J. Warnke)

Noteworthy also is his tendency to substitute anapestic movement for the dominant D. iambics. Bredero, on the other hand, adheres more closely to the metrics of the folk song, and at his best he achieves the deceptive simplicity of that form.

In their imagery, the three great Amsterdammers show a common love for the pictorial and the detailed, a kind of imaginative observation of the visible world which allies them to the great D. painters and which serves to define one of the continuing characteristics of D. poetic tradition. If Vondel has a special kinship to a painter, it is to Rubens, in the lushly Baroque magnificence of his conceptions. Bredero, in contrast, has more affinity with the realistic genre painters, with Jan Steen and Frans Hals.

The great poetry of the D. Renaissance was not confined to the Amsterdam circle. To the west, in the vicinity of The Hague, two other poets of note were active—Jacob Cats and Constantijn Huygens. Cats is the bourgeois poet par excellence. His didactic verse, devoted to the ethics of practicality, codified homely advice on subjects ranging from home economics to sexual intercourse. He became the most widely quoted of D. poets, but his reputation has undergone an inevitable decline. His friend Huygens is a poet of a very different sort. An admirer of John Donne and of Rembrandt, he is one of the "metaphysical poets" of Holland. But his love for the conceit is noticeable primarily in his epigrams and in his translations of Donne's Songs and Sonets. His long descriptive pieces, Batava-Tempe and Hofwijck, have more in common with the poetry of Sir John Denham than with that of Donne. Jan Starter, a follower of Bredero, and the religious poets Revius, Camphuyzen, Stalpaert, and Dullaert should also be mentioned. The last great poet of the Golden Century was Jan Luyken, whose religious verse is among the finest written in Holland.

Toward the end of the 17th c., a decline in the quality of D. poetry initiated a period of relative barrenness which was to last for two centuries. The lyric tradition of Vondel declined in the hands of his last disciple, Antonides van de Goe, and the drama, already decadent in the sensation-seeking work of Jan Vos, was given its death-blow by the derivative neoclassicism preached by Nil Volentibus Arduum (q.v.), an Amsterdam poetic society which flourished between 1669 and 1681. D. poetry of the 18th c. is characterized by a consistent but futile striving to escape the double bondage of an imported neoclassicism and a moribund poetic diction. Hubert Corneliszoon Poot, a lyric poet from a peasant background, spoiled his gift for natural observation by imitating the mythological machinery of Hooft. Other poets of the period attempted to revivify their country's poetry by introducing ideas and models from England and Germany. But H. van Alphen, who was influenced by Lessing, Klopstock, and Riedel, was a better critic than poet, and Rhijnvis Feith, who at a later date imitated the graveyard poetry of Young and Blair in Het Graf (The Grave), was less talented than his models, and even more lugubrious.

The greatest poetic figure of Holland between 1700 and 1880 was Willem Bilderdijk (1756–1831), and he is, today as in his own time, a controversial figure. The paradox of his nature, at once rationalistic and romantic, Calvinistic and passionate, did not prevent him from being one of the most prolific of D. poets, though it did, in all probability, lead to internal conflicts which prevented him from ever achieving the coherent artistic expression which the poetry of his country needed. His production embraced lyrics, dramas, didactic pieces, long narrative poems (Elias, Urzijn en Valentijn), an unfinished epic entitled De Ondergang der Eerste Wereld (The Fall of the First World), and a series of ballads, imitated from Eng. and Scottish sources, which are among his best works.

But the deficiencies of Bilderdijk's art are manifest in the work of his disciples, Da Costa and Tollens, who are remembered as perhaps the most reputable poets of the most sterile age of Holland's poetry, the early 19th c. I. Da Costa's ponderous didacticism has not worn well, and H. Tollens' De Overwintering op Nova Zembla (The Winter on Nova Zembla), once praised as a high point in D. descriptive poetry, is now felt to be a futile set-piece composed of superficial rhetoric and facile sentimentality. The triumph of bourgeois sensibility was complete in the Holland of the post-Napoleonic period, and that sensibility no longer seemed to possess the moral courage of Bilderdijk, the eloquence of Vondel, or even the stalwart common sense of Jacob Cats. In such an atmosphere, the romanticism which dominated European letters could find no roots, and the two D. poets of the period who may be classified as "romantics"—van Lennep and Beets—are only the palest reflections of their respective models, Scott and Byron.

As the 19th c. progressed, bolder spirits in D. artistic and intellectual circles grew indignant at the low state to which their country's poetry had fallen. With his friend, the critic Coenrad Busken Huet, E. G. Potgieter founded De Gids (The Guide), a review dedicated to the revival of literary and intellectual vitality. As a poet, Potgieter was handicapped by a temperament which was too self-conscious and critical, a style which was too ponderously learned and allusive. But his example simplified the work of his great successors.

The decade of the 1880's was one of the most significant in the history of D. literature. For at that time a group of gifted, iconoclastic, and energetic young poets set to work to revive their country's poetry and to place it once more on the level of general European poetry. The great names of the Beweging van Tachtig (Movement of the Eighties) (see TACHTIGERS) are Willem Kloos (1859-1938), Frederick van Eeden (1860-1932), Albert Verwey (1865-1937), and Herman Gorter (1864-1927). The first three founded De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide), a review which, in its very name, aimed at following newer paths than even the more progressive elements of the immediate past. The work of the tachtigers was not entirely without forerunners. D. poetry in the 1870's had received tremendous impetus from the publication of the sonnet sequence Mathilde by the precocious and gifted Jacques Perk (1859-1881), who had reintroduced into D. poetry that important form which had been neglected since the days of Hooft. Perk's mastery of the sonnet form was only one manifestation of his metrical virtuosity. His Iris displays a flexibility of meter which had been sorely lacking in the poetry of the 18th and 19th c.:

Ik ben geboren uit zonne-gloren
En een zucht van de ziedende zee,
Die omhoog is gestegen, op wicken van regen,
Gezwollen van wanhoop en wee . . .

I was born of the streams of the morning's beams

And a sigh of the surging sea,
Ascending again on wings of the rain,
Swollen with tears and dismay.

(tr. F. J. Warnke)

The meter is immediately recognizable as that of Shelley's The Cloud, on which Iris is based, and the young poet's allegiance to the Eng. romantics was also prophetic of the direction to be given D. verse by Kloos and Gorter. Kloos was important both as poet and critic. The sonnets contained in his Verzen of 1894 and 1895 are among the finest in the language, and his motto, "De aller-individueelste expressie van de aller-individueelste emotie" (The most individual expression of the most individual emotion), summed up the estheticism, realism, and individualism which were the artistic goals of his group. Gorter's Mei (1889) is one of the most ambitious European poems of the century. Of novel-length, it is a narrative poem with epic overtones and passages of lyric beauty. It is clearly suggestive of Keats' Endymion, both in its mythopoetic power and in its metrical features—loosely enjambed pentameter couplets varied with lyric passages in more irregular meter. But it is essentially an original poem, in the course of which Nordic mythology becomes fused with meticulous observation of nature in its cyclic changes.

The group centering around De Nieuwe Gids had, in their exaltation of individualism and in their advocacy of passion and realism in both imagery and emotion, revived two of the constant elements of D. culture—respect for the individual and delight in accurate visual representation. Their doctrine of "art for art's sake," however, left out of account a third element of D. tradition—concern for the community, for the collective whole—which had given their nation's culture its distinctive bourgeois quality and which was expressing itself, politically and economically, in the great achievements of late 19th-c. D. liberalism. So it was on the issues of individualism and art for art's sake that the Nieuwe Gids group dissolved around 1890. Kloos, the intransigent individualist, remained loyal to his original ideals, but his influence steadily waned. Verwey, after a period of silence, produced in his Aarde (Earth) (1896) the product of his contemplation, a kind of poetry devoted more to the inner life than to the external realities which had consumed his interest in the days of tachtig. Van Eeden, novelist, poet, and dramatist, the most versatile member of the group, began the long spiritual pilgrimage which was to lead him through Utopian socialism to the Roman Catholic Church, a pilgrimage which he documented in his lengthy Het Lied van Schijn en Wezen (The Song of Appearance and Reality), a philosophical poem in skillful terza rima, which stands with his dramatic poem De Broeders (The Brothers) among the most important works of the tachtigers. Gorter, after the publication of Mei, devoted himself to the cause of the proletariat. His communism found expression in Klein Heldendicht (Little Epic) (1906), an unsuccessful attempt to write traditional heroic verse with a symbolic worker as hero. But Gorter's proletarianism was essentially an intellectual effort; basically he remained a bourgeois liberal whose individualism expressed itself in such experimental work as his Sensitieve Verzen. Eng. romanticism remained the strongest influence on the Beweging van Tachtig, but it was modified by Fr. and German influences, notably that of Stefan George on Verwey, who was his close friend.

In a short time the poets of tachtig had done their work, and on the foundation laid by them the poets of the 20th c. continued to build. Verwey had perhaps the greatest influence on the younger generation, through his important journal, De Beweging (The Movement) (founded 1905). But before passing to the more recent poets of Holland, one must consider the work of three important poets who stand between the generation of the 1880's and that of the first World War—J. H. Leopold (1865–1925), Henriette Roland-Holst (1869–1952), and Pieter Corneliszoon Boutens (1870–1943). Leopold, considered by many to be Holland's greatest lyric poet since Vondel, was influenced to some degree by the aestheticist and individualist doctrines of the tachtigers, but finely organized lyrics such as his famous O Nachten van Gedragene Extase (O Nights of Ecstasy's Duress) show the influence of his classical training. Boutens resembles Leopold both in his classicism and in his introspectiveness, but his Platonic inner vision is modified by a passionate sensitivity to external nature; he ranks with Gorter as modern Holland's supreme poet of nature, and none of his contemporaries has so well rendered the distinctive beauty of that flat, misty, and infinitely various land. Henriette van Roland Holst displayed in her work a movement from nature poetry to poetry of social protest, and in her proletarianism she has links both to Gorter and to the popular socialist poet Adama van Scheltema.

D. poetry of the 20th c. has partaken of the variety characteristic of modern poetry as a whole, and has shown an increasing tendency to share in international artistic and intellectual movements. Rilke, George, Verlaine, and Yeats have been important influences on such followers of Verwey as Martinus Nijhoff and Adriaan Roland Holst, and China has influenced the poetry of J. J. Slauerhoff as India influenced that of his older contemporary J. A. Der Mouw. A vigorous expressionist movement under the leadership of the gifted Hendrik Marsman (1899–1940) dominated the poetry of the 1920's, but called forth a reaction in the more socially oriented work of the group centering around the periodical Forum, the most important members of which were the critic Menno Ter Braak and the poet and novelist Simon Vestdijk, perhaps the most influential writer in contemporary Holland. More recently, D. poetry has received important impetus from the "moderate surrealists" Gerrit Achterberg and Ed. Hoornik, and the Catholic Bertus Aafjes. The current generation of D. poets, including such names as Lucebert, Gerrit Kouwenaar, and Remco Campert, shows energy and promise.

Despite a healthy diversity in both style and outlook, D. poetry of the 20th c. has developed organically from the romantic revival of the 1880's. It has, while ratifying its membership in the international world of art and thought, consistently adhered to those preoccupations which are the historical heritage of the D.—the honest and vivid representation of observed reality and the untiring exploration of the delicate relationship which exists between the individual and the community.

ANTHOLOGIES: Zeven Eeuwen, ed. K. H. de Raaf and J. J. Griss (4 v., 1932; a crit. anthol.); Coming After, ed. A. J. Barnouw (1948); Spiegel van de Nederlandse Poëzie door alle Eeuwen, ed. V. E. van Vriesland (3 v., 1953–55); Een Inleiding tot Vondel, ed. A. Verwey (n.d.; a generous sel. of Vondel's works, with crit. comments).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. Gosse, Studies in the Lit. of Northern Europe (1879); H. J. C. Grierson, The First Half of the 17th C. (1906; excellent chapters on D. poetry of that period); G. Kalf, Studiën over Nederlandsche Dichters der 17de Eeuw (1915); H. Robbers, De Nederl. Litt. na 1880 (1922); A. J. Barnouw, Vondel (1925; a biog. in Eng.); H. J. C. Grierson, Two D. Poets (1936; studies of Hooft and Boutens); J. A. Russell, D. Poetry and Eng. (1939); G. Knuvelde, Handboek tot de Geschiedenis der Nederl. Letterkunde (4 v., 2d ed., 1957); Th. Weevers, Poetry of the Netherlands in its European Context (1960); F. Baur et al., Geschiedenis van de Letterkunde der Nederlanden (7 v. to date, 1939– ; this ambitious work will be, when completed, the definitive hist. of D. lit.); P. Brachin, La Littérature néerlandaise (1963). F.J.W.

DYFALU. A poetic technique in Welsh poetry which reaches its highest excellence in the work of Dafydd ap Gwilym (14th c.), but which long remained current practice, and after its degeneration was ridiculed by Ellis Wynne in his Visions of the Sleeping Bard (1703). The term also means to guess and has affinities with the riddle poem. D., at its best, is an animated play of fancy, whereby the object on which the poet's mind dwells—it may be the stars, or mist, or a bird, a girl's yellow hair, or her white arms—is rapidly compared in a concatenation of metaphors of strong visual imagery, with other objects in nature. The stars are the sparks of a conflagration lit by the saints, berries belonging to the frozen moon, the reflection of hail on the sun's bright floor. This onrush of metaphors is well suited by its exuberance to convey Dafydd ap Gwilym's exciting vision of the ever renewed miracle of creation. Other poets, such as Dafydd Nanmor, in the 15th c., employ the same device with fine effect, but later it became mechanical and stereotyped.—Parry. D.M.L.

E

ECHO. Any recurrence of the same sound or combination of sounds at intervals near enough to be perceptible to the ear. Thus, alliteration, assonance, consonance, near-rhyme, rhyme, repetition, and refrain (qq.v.) all constitute kinds of echo. Used either internally or terminally, such repetitions are a means of "orchestrating" verse, may be used both for their musical appeal and as a means of structuring verse by linking words or lines related in meaning. Poe's line "The viol, the violet, and the vine" shows an obvious compact use of echoes, as does Bridges' "In secret sensuous innocence."—A. Oras, "Surrey's Technique of Phonetic Echoes: A Method and Its Background," JEGP, 50 (1951). L.P.

ECHO VERSE. A line (or, usually, a poem of such lines) of which the final syllables are repeated, as by an echo, so as to provide a reply or a comment, often a punning one. E.g., "Qu'est-ça du monde la chose la plus infame? Femmel!" (G. du Pont, 1539); "Echo! What shall I do to my Nymph when I go to behold her? Hold her!" (Barnabe Barnes, 1593). Echo verse goes back to the Gr. Anthology, the earliest known example being by Gauradas. It flourished in Western Europe in Fr., It., and Eng. verse of the 16th and 17th c. Found most often as a device of pastoral poetry or drama, it has unrequited love as its commonest subject, but has also been used for religious poetry, political satire, and society verse. Well-known examples are George Herbert's Heaven and Swift's A Gentle Echo on Woman.—E. Colby, The Echo-Device in Lit. (1920). L.P.

ECLOGUE. A short, conventional poem, usually a pastoral, in the form of a dialogue or soliloquy. Ordinarily it is without appreciable characterization or action; the setting, described either by the poet or by one of the characters, is objective; and the highly finished verse is smooth and melodious. Originally the word, derived from eklegein (to choose), meant "a choice poem." The spelling aeglogue (or eglog), popularized by Dante, was based on the false etymology which derived the word from aix (goat) and logos (speech) and was construed to signify, as "E. K." argued, "Goteheards tales." The term was first applied to Virgil's bucolic poems, and from this association became the designation of a formal pastoral poem following the traditional technique derived from the idylls of Theocritus. Though there are precedents in both classical and Renaissance literature of city and piscatory eclogues, most eclogues are pastorals. The term, however, signifies nothing more than structure. The Renaissance was the heyday of the eclogue. Negligible as a genre in the Middle Ages, it was revived by Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio and came to full flower under the culture of the humanists of the 15th and 16th c. Widely studied and of dominating influence (as evidenced by Shakespeare's well-known comment, "Ah, good old mantuan! . . . who understandeth thee not, loves thee not") were the eclogues of Baptista Mantuanus Spagnuoli. Still considered the best modern examples of the genre are those by Garcilaso de la Vega and Edmund Spenser. Pope's eclogues, though called Pastorals, epitomize the neoclassic eclogue and rococo art. In the 18th c. new matter was poured into the mold and a variety of eclogues—town, exotic, political, war, school, culinary, Quaker—was produced. The most celebrated of the nonpastoral eclogues is Swift's A Town Eclogue. 1710. Scene, The Royal Exchange. See PASTORAL, GEORGIC.—M. H. Shackford, "A Definition of the Pastoral Idyll," PMLA, 19 (1904); W. W. Greg, Pastoral Poetry and Pastoral Drama (1906); W. P. Mustard, "Introduction" to The Piscatory Eclogues of Jacopo Sannazaro (1914), and "Notes on The Shepheardes Calendar," MLN, 35 (1920); R. F. Jones, "E. Types in Eng. Poetry of the 18th C.," JEGP, 34 (1925); M. K. Bragg, The Formal E. in 18th C. England (1926); D. Lessig, Ursprung und Entwicklung der spanischen Ekloge . . . (1962). J.E.C.

EGO-FUTURISM. An ephemeral movement in early 20th-c. Rus. poetry. The term was coined by, and is mostly used with reference to, Igor Severyanin (1887-1942), whose tuneful, gaudy and blatantly egotistical verses enjoyed a brief vogue on the eve of World War I. Outside of its name, a distinct proclivity for neologism and a shrill rejection of the literary tradition, e.-f. had little in common with the more creative variety of Rus. futurist poetry, as represented by V. Khlebnikov and the early Mayakovsky. See CUBO-FUTURISM.—D. S. Mirsky, A Hist. of Rus. Lit. (1949); An Anthol. of Rus. Verse, ed. A. Yarmolinsky (1962). V.E.

EGYPTIAN POETRY. The prosody of ancient Eg. is not fully known to us. Since the writing does not take note of vowels, we are not able to judge the relations between long and short measures. But the facility with which one word can replace another of a different number of syllables suggests that Eg. prosody was based on a succession of fairly free rhythmic accents rather than on a system of quantities.

The scribes who copied the poems have at times separated verses by a red point. Most frequently, the form does not permit distinguishing poetry from prose. So we waver. For example, should the moral works known as Wisdom Texts be considered prose because of their plain tone and the rarity of images or rather as very simple poetry, whose rhythm attracted attention and made it easier to remember?

In the Old Kingdom, besides the Wisdom Texts, the largest collection is that from the pyramids. But these inscriptions—which comprise narrations, incantations, invocations intended to promote the passage of the soul of the king in the other world—have, despite certain poetic resonances, more interest to the student of religion than to the student of poetry.

One of the first works of true poetry, which admirably represents the noblest kind, is a sort of ode from the period of trouble which followed the Old Kingdom, inserted in The Dialogue of the Despairing Man with his Soul. Because of the violence of his time, the unhappy man wishes to die in order to find justice in the beyond: "Death is before me today / Like health for the invalid / Like going out after an illness. / Death is before me today / Like the odor of myrrh, / Like sitting under the sail on a windy day . . . / Death is before me today / Like the desire of a man to see his home again / After numberless years of captivity." The poetry is characterized here by an abundance of images, and the human profundity of emotion. The regularity of the refrain and the parallelism of ideas produce patterned stanzas. Official poetry has always preferred this lyricism of fixed composition, whose fault, when the sentiment weakens, is to fall into formalism.

At the beginning of the Middle Kingdom, about 2000 B.C., a celebrated writer, Khety, composed—besides The Instructions of King Amenemhet I to his Son, intended to reinforce the renaissance order—a spirited arraignment of the different professions, in order to proclaim as unrivaled that of scribe. He also composed a Hymn to the Nile in which inspiration causes the poet to abandon the formal framework of the traditional hymn. In this hymn, rich and poor, great and small fraternize in the joy of seeing the Nile, at the expected moment, fertilize Egypt with its inundation. To the end of the Middle Kingdom belongs the Song of the Harper, which celebrated, for a King Intef, the pleasure of living contrasted to the prospective annihilation of death. This is an anticipation of Horace's carpe diem theme.

In the New Kingdom, some poems reiterate in free stanzas the invitation to rejoice in life, but blend with it the hope that simple and pure joys are only an initial stage of the happiness reserved for the just in the other world. A second harpist, in the Theban tomb of Neferhotep, at the middle of the 14th c. B.C., replies to the first by a Song of Trust in Death, where all those who are loved and who love repose in peace in a mysterious union.

But one must not think that death was the most popular subject of Eg. poetry. The victories of the Pharaoh and the relief that he brings to the country menaced or struck by invasions, are brilliantly celebrated in several epic pieces, of which the best known is the recital of The Battle of Qadesh. In this poem Ramses II, before the Syrian town of Qadesh, unperturbed in the middle of the attacking wave of Asiatics, single-handedly saves the situation, thanks to his youthful courage and his unshakable confidence in his father, the great god Amon.

In the first half of the 14th c. B.C. another king, Amenophis IV, who had become the impassioned advocate of a monotheistic reform of the Eg. religion, addressed to his sole god, visible in this world under the aspect of the sun, personal hymns which are splendid effusions of the heart and spirit before the divinity who is glimpsed in nature:

"All who fly and flap (their) wings / Live again at your rising. / Ships emulously go up and down the river, / Every way is open because you appear; / The river fish jump before your face, / Your rays go to the heart of the sea. /

"You develop the germ in women / And of the seed make men, / Supporting the son at the breast of his mother / And soothing him so that he does not cry. . . . / The chick in the egg speaks while in the shell, / For you give it breath inside in order to make it live."

The hymns which have such a broad religious scope and which sacrifice mythological allusions and theological ideas to a spirituality strictly poetic are much influenced by profane poetry, which is above all a poetry of love.

The New Kingdom has left us a whole series of compilations of love poems. Small pieces are grouped together so as probably to constitute entire programs of entertainment (we would say "soirées"), designed to refresh the attention of the audience sometimes by the diversity of tone and sometimes, conversely, by the linking together of the poems into a kind of small novel or psychological dialogue. The form, apparently, is that of free verse in a composition itself often free. It is a poetry of feeling, grave or vivacious, humorous or tender, in which the impulses of the heart matter more than those of the senses. It is alive with appreciation of nature. Often the scene is a garden. The charm of the flowers and the birds envelops the charm of the maidens. Anxious lovers seek to console themselves before a beautiful landscape. Often these lovers are in quite humble circumstances. In a small house, the young man, in the midst of his own, watches for the passing-by of his sweetheart, who delights in awaiting his look:

"I passed near his house; / I found the door open, / My friend remained beside his mother, / All his brothers and sisters with him. / They are taken with sympathy for him, / All those who pass on the way. . . / He looked at me when I passed. . ."

The indications of place are seen to be exact and graphic, but fleeting, the ebb and flow of impressions counting infinitely more than external facts.

It is probably by this poetry, young and fresh under the sun, that Egypt touches us the most. In antiquity the Hebrews drew inspiration from it in the Song of Songs, less restrained and more passionate; and perhaps Theocritus in his dialogues, composed in part in Egypt, has enlarged the model of the alternating songs of Sicily after the example of the Eg. poems of love when he awakens our sympathy for modest and ingenuous lovers endowed with the most delicate sensibilities.

G. Maspero, "Les chants d'amour du papyrus de Turin et du papyrus Harris 500," Études égyptiennes, 1 (1886) and Causeries d'Égypte (1907); W. M. Müller, Die Liebespoesie der alten Ägypter (1889); Ägyptische Sonnenlieder, ed. and tr. A. Scharff (1922); Anthol. of Ancient Eg. Poems, ed. S. Elissa Sharpley (1923); H. Ranke and H. Gressmann, Altorientalische Texte zum alten Testament (1926); A. Erman, The Lit. of the Ancient Egyptians, tr. A. M. Blackman (1927); A. Moret, "Chants d'amour de la vieille Égypte," Revue de Paris (Feb. 1, 1930); A. H. Gardiner, The Library of A. Chester Beatty (1931); T. E. Peet, A Comparative Study of the Literatures of Egypt, Palestine and Mesopotamia (1931); A. and J. Baillet, "La chanson chez les Égyptiens," Mélanges Maspero, 1, Orient ancien 1934; P. Gilbert, La poésie égyptienne (1943, 2d ed., 1949); M. Lichtheim, "The Songs of the Harpers," Jour. of Near Eastern Studies, 4 (1945); M. Murray, Eg. Religious Poetry (1949); Altägyptische Liebeslieder, ed. and tr. S. Schott (1950); A. Hermann, "Zur ägyptischen Lit.," "Zur ägyptischen Stilistik," both in Orientalische Literatur Zeitung, 50 (1955) and Altägyptische Liebesdichtung (1959); B. de Rachewiltz, Liriche amorose degli antichi Egiziani (1955); I. Donadoni, Storia della letteratura egiziana antica (1957); G. Nolli, Canti d'amore dell' antico Egitto (1959).

P.G. (tr. R.A.P.)

EISTEDDFOD (bardic session or assembly). A main feature of Welsh literary activity which can be traced back with certainty to the 15th c. and perhaps to the bardic festival held by Lord Rhys in 1176 at Cardigan. The early e. was an assembly of the guild or order of bards, convened under the aegis of a distinguished patron, and in the 16th c. even under royal commission. The chief function was to regulate the affairs of the profession, such as the establishment of metrical rules, and the issue of licenses to those who had completed the prescribed stages of their apprenticeship. Awards were also granted for outstanding achievements in poetry and music. The most important of these eisteddfodau were Carmarthen (ca. 1450), and Caerwys (1523 and 1568). Decay then set in, and the institution degenerated to the tavern eisteddfodau of the 18th c. These were meetings of poetasters, announced in almanacks, and mere scenes of disputations in very indifferent verse. After a period of decline, the e. were revived during the 19th c. Today the National E. of Wales is a cultural festival of wide range and influence which provides for poetry, prose, drama, massed choirs and other vocal and instrumental music. It has given much needed patronage and publicity to poetry and has enabled several important literary critics to impose standards and to mold literary taste.
D.M.L.

ELEGIAC DISTICH. The Gr. elegeion (a word of uncertain derivation which first occurs in Critias frag. 4.31 Diehl) was a distich or couplet which was composed of a heroic or dactylic hexameter followed by a pentameter (q.v.). As is shown by Ovid's address to flebilis Elegeia (Amores 3.9.3), the word was connected in antiquity with the later meaning of elegos ("song of mourning" as in Euripides and Apollonius Rhodius 2.782), but its use for epitaphs and laments is probably not quite so ancient as its beginnings in the 8th or 7th c. B.C. with flute songs (Archilochus, Callinus, Mimnermus), war songs (Tyrtaeus), and dedications. It was used for many purposes in the classical age of Greece and, notably but by no means exclusively, for love poems in the Alexandrian, Roman, and Byzantine periods. In L. the Augustan elegiac poets (Tibullus, Propertius, and Ovid) tended to make the sense coincide with the couplet, whereas in Gr. poetry and Catullus it was often continuous for two or more distichs. Among the refinements which in time became regular in the Roman elegists and particularly in Ovid was the restriction of the final word in the pentameter to a dissyllable.

The classic description and imitation of the elegiac distich in the accentual verse of a modern language is Schiller's couplet:

Im Hexameter steigt des Springquells flüssige Säule,
Im Pentameter drauf fällt sie melodisch herab,

which Coleridge thus reproduced:

In the hexameter rises the fountain's silvery column,
In the pentameter aye falling in melody back.

The form has been imitated in Eng. by Spenser, Sidney, Clough, Kingsley, and Swinburne and, in German, by Klopstock and Goethe in addition to Schiller. (See also CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES).—Hardie; Hamer; D. L. Page, "The Elegiacs in Euripides' Andromache," Gr. Poetry and Life (1936); C. M. Bowra, Early Gr. Elegists (1938, repr. 1960); M. Platnauer, L. Elegiac Verse (1951); Koster; M. L. Clarke, "The Hexameter in Gr. Elegiacs," CR, n.s. 5 (1955); D. A. West, "The Metre of Catullus' Elegiacs," CQ, n.s. 7 (1957).

R.J.G.

ELEGIAIC STANZA (also known as elegiac quatrain, heroic quatrain, Hammond's meter). The iambic pentameter quatrain, rhymed abab, has apparently acquired the name of elegiac stanza through its use by Thomas Gray for Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard (1751). It is identical in form with the quatrain used in Shakespearean sonnets, where its use has no elegiac connotations, and it was frequently employed without elegiac feeling or intention by other poets, e.g., Dryden in his Annus Mirabilis. However, according to W. J. Bate (The Stylistic Development of Keats, 1945), the pentameter quatrain was "almost invariably employed for the writing of elegiac verse" from about the middle of the 18th c. until almost a century later, beginning with James Hammond's Love Elegies (1743). But even Gray's use of the form in his great poem failed to establish a quatrain tradition, both Shelley's Adonais and Arnold's Thyrsis being written in more complex stanzas. S.F.F.

ELEGIAMB(US). In Gr. and L. metric a dactylic (generally hemiepes, q.v.) followed by an iambic colon, e.g., Horace, Epodes 11.2:

scribēre | vēsīcu|ōs || āmō|rē pēr|cūssum | grāvī

(hemiepes and iambic dimeter acatalectic). See ARCHILOCHIAN and IAMBELEGUS. R.J.G.

ELEGY (from Gr. elegeia, "lament"). A lyric, usually formal in tone and diction, suggested either by the death of an actual person or by the poet's contemplation of the tragic aspects of life. In either case, the emotion, originally expressed as a lament, finds consolation in the contemplation of some permanent principle. Any discussion of the origin of the e. is complicated by a shifting of definitions. The term in Gr. literature referred both to a specific verse form (couplets consisting of a hexameter followed by a pentameter line) and to the emotions frequently conveyed by that verse form. Originally, any poem in this distich form (with the exception of the epigram) was known as an e., whether it concerned the dead, was a war song, a political satire, or dealt with love. The pastoral laments, such as those of Theocritus, which seem in subject matter to be prototypes of the modern elegy, were classed by the Greeks as idylls. The distich form of e. was employed by the Alexandrian Greeks chiefly for erotic and suggestive verse. The Latin e. itself was initially distinguished from other literary genres by the distich meter, the tone of complaint, and the theme of love, as in Gallus, Propertius, Tibullus, and their successors. In Ovid the distich and the tone of complaint are already extended to other subjects as in Tristia and Ex Ponto, although love remains his dominant theme.

In early 16th-c. Italy, when other experiments in the imitation of classic meters were being made, the content and subject matter of the e. were taken over into terza rima by such writers as Bernardo Tasso and Ariosto, whose Rime and Satire received the label of elegies only after his death. The elegiac strain of extended lyrics expressing melancholy and tender sentiments was represented in the baroque period by Filicaia and continued into 19th-c. It. letters by Leopardi and Carducci. In modern times there have even been metrical experiments with the classic distich by D'Annunzio.

In Spain, the e. began as imitations of It. models, as in Garcilaso de la Vega's First Eclogue (ca. 1535) on the death of his lady, in the tradition of the pastoral e. and in some of his other poems modeled upon the work of Bernardo Tasso. Lope de Vega (1562–1635) used octaves and other stanzaic measures in imitation of Tasso for his elegiac verse. In the present century, the prevailing tone of Juan Ramón Jiménez in his Arias Tristes and Elegías is melancholy and elegiac. The work of Federico García Lorca, in Elegía a Doña Juana La Loca and Llanto por Ignacio Sánchez Mejías shows a more direct obsession with the presentiments of death.

In France, the first attempt at copying the e. form from the ancients was by imitating the classic distich in alexandrine couplets, alternating masculine and feminine rhymes, later by alternating decasyllabic with octosyllabic lines, an experiment of Jean Doublet in his Élégies, 1559. Ronsard, in his Élégies, Mascarades, et Bergeries, 1565, abandoned the attempt to reproduce the classical meter and returned to the subject matter of the classical elegists. This treatment of the e. was also adopted by Louise Labé and Malherbe. In l'Art Poétique, Boileau insists on themes either of love or death for the e., and the genre comes to deal in the 18th c. with the tender and the melancholy rather than with deep grief. The climax of this tendency was reached with André Chenier, at the end of the century:

Mais la tendre élogie et sa grace touchante
M'ont séduit; l'élogie à la voix gémissante, Aux ris mêlés de pleurs, aux longs cheveux
épars,
Belle, levant au ciel ses humides regards.

After Lamartine's Méditations, 1820, the elegiac tendency in Fr. literature becomes confused with others, and whole poems in the genre appear only sporadically.

In Germany, the subject matter of the e. has been so little restricted that Sir Edmund Gosse could say that the e. as a poem of lamentation does not exist in Germany. There had been a number of attempts during the Renaissance to write elegies in L., but it remained for Opitz, in the early 17th c., to write elegies in the vernacular. His equivalent for the classic meter was alexandrines in couplets, with alternating masculine and feminine rhymes. Klopstock, with greater metrical freedom, turned to sentimental subjects, general sadness, the troubles of love, as well as the memorializing of actual death. The influence of the "graveyard school" of Eng. poets as well as of Young, Goldsmith, Gray, Ossian, and others was also felt heavily in Germany. The Römische Elegien of Goethe, although imitative of the L. elegiac meter, should probably be classed as idylls, his chief elegy being Metamorphosen der Pflanzen. Schiller, in his essay, "On Primitive and Sentimental Poetry," distinguishes the elegiac from the satiric and idyllic, by saying that the elegiac longs for the ideal, while the satiric rails against the present situation and the idyllic represents the ideal as actually existent. His notion of the elegiac is illustrated in his own Die Götter Griechenlands, Die Sehnsucht, and Der Pilgrim. Hölderlin's elegies also deal with the impossibility of attaining an ideal and the longing for the golden days of youth. Mörike and Geibel produced the only German elegies of note in the remainder of the 19th c. The ten Duino Elegies (1912–1922) of Rainer Maria Rilke constitute an important renewal of the genre in modern literature and have been widely influential outside of Germany as well as within.

In England, there were a few Renaissance attempts, as, for example, by Sidney, Spenser, and Harvey, to imitate the quantitative verse of the classical distich, but these, like other attempts to write quantitatively in an accentual language, failed. The term elegie was used in the 16th and early 17th c. for poems with a variety of content, including Petrarchan love poetry as well as laments, but the connection between death and e. was made more clear with the use of "funeral elegy" in the title of one section of Donne's An Anatomy of the World (1611). Milton's pastoral e., Lycidas, (1637) helped to establish the e., a lament for the dead, as a separate genre in Eng. literature has not lacked meditative and reflective verse, but a distinction has grown up between this as "elegiac" and the e. proper, although the boundary is by no means sharp. For examples of the former, see Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard (1750), Young's Night Thoughts, Samuel Johnson's Vanity of Human Wishes, and Whitman's When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloomed. In the e. tradition belong such poems as Pope's Elegy on the Death of an Unfortunate Lady and Tennyson's In Memoriam (1850). A notable example of the modern e., this one employing three very different metrical patterns, is W. H. Auden's In Memory of W. B. Yeats. The pastoral (q.v.) elegy, notably illustrated in Eng. by Adonais (1821), Shelley's poem on the death of Keats, and Thyrsis (1867), Arnold's monody on the death of Clough, derives from a different tradition, being thought of as a subdivision of the idyll or eclogue. In classical literature, the Lament for Bion (traditionally attributed to Moschus but probably by an unknown disciple of Bion) and Virgil's Fifth Eclogue, as well as the First Idyll of Theocritus and the Tenth Eclogue of Virgil, both of which combine the themes of love and death, were the chief models.

M. Lloyd, Elegies, Ancient and Modern

(1903); J. H. Hanford, "The Pastoral E. and Milton's Lycidas," PMLA, 25 (1910); Gayley and Kurtz, 50 (1935); H. Hatzfeld, Die französische Renaissance-lyrik (1924); J. W. Draper, The Funeral E. and the Rise of Romanticism (1929); F. W. Weitzmann, "Notes on the Elizabethan Elegie," PMLA, 50 (1935); C. M. Bowra, Early Gr. Elegists (1938); F. Beissner, Gesch. der deutschen Elegie (1941, 2d ed., 1961); G. Luck, The Latin Love E. (1960).
S.F.F.

ELISION (L. "striking out") a general (metrical) term for the omission or blurring of a final unstressed vowel (vowel sound) followed by a vowel or mute consonant; cf. Fr. l'épée, l'heure. The Gr. equivalents ecthipsis and synaloepha (q.v.) nowadays tend to have specialized meanings. In Gr., elision—which is variable in prose but more regular in poetry—is indicated by an apostrophe (') to mark the disappearance of the elided vowel (generally short alpha, epsilon, and omikron as well as the diphthong ai occasionally in Homer and in comedy); but, when e. occurs in Gr. compound words, the apostrophe is not used. In L. a final vowel or a vowel followed by m at the end of a word was not omitted from the written language, but as a rule it was ignored metrically when the next word in the same measure began with a vowel, diphthong, or the aspirate h. In Eng. syllable-counting measures, e. is a kind of fiction, two syllables being reckoned as one to make the line conform to the metrical scheme. Or, as S. E. Sprott (Milton's Art of Prosody, 1953, p. 63) has it: e. is the "process by which two syllables are reduced to the prosodical value of one." In accentual meters it gives the appearance or illusion of smoothness. A similar phenomenon, not properly to be called e., occurs in such forms as "we'll" for "we will." Cf. HIATUS, the opposite or avoidance of e. See also POETIC CONTRACTIONS; CLASSICAL PROSODY; ROMANCE PROSODY.
R.J.G.; P.F.B.

ELLIPSE (Gr. "leaving out," "defect"; L. de-tractio). A figure wherein a word, or several words, usually of little importance to the logical expression of thought but ordinarily called for by the construction, are omitted. Quintilian (Institutes of Oratory 9.3.58) exemplifies with Caelius' denunciation of Antony: "stupere gaudio Graecus," the Greek began to be astonished with joy, for 'coepit,' began, is readily understood." The device may be used for a number of psychological reasons, including, according to Quintilian, considerations of modesty: "Novimus et qui te, transversa tuentibus, hircis, / et quo, sed faciles Nymphae risere, sacello" (You—while the goats looked goatish—we know who, / And in what chapel—but the kind nymphs laughed) Virgil, Eclogues

3.8. Gr. rhetoricians permitted omission of substantives, pronouns, objects, finite verbs, main clauses, and (rarely) subordinate clauses; modern poets allow omission of almost any member so long as the meaning remains clear. Quintilian distinguishes e. from aposiopesis (q.v.) on the ground that in the latter it is uncertain what is suppressed. "Where wigs [strive] with wigs, [where] with sword-knots sword-knots strive" (Pope, The Rape of the Lock 1.101). In their eagerness not to be diffuse, 20th-c. poets (especially Pound, Eliot, Auden, William Carlos Williams, etc.) are particularly attracted to the device.
R.O.E.

EMBLEM. A didactic device consisting, normally, of three parts: a "word" (mot or motto), a woodcut or engraving symbolically expressing the "word," and a brief verse explicatio or application of the idea expressed in the combination. The e. exhibits varied and close affinities with proverb, fable, and epigram. Emblems were introduced into European literature by the Emblematum liber (1531) of Andrea Alciati, and for two centuries thereafter enjoyed an enormous vogue. The first Eng. e. book was Geoffrey Whitney's Choice of Emblems (1586), the most notable probably the Emblemes (1635) of Francis Quarles. In recent times the form receives amusing illustration in R. L. Stevenson's Moral Emblems. As the form developed it became customary to present the motto in one language, the explicatio in a different language; and many bilingual or multilingual e. books served incidentally as language manuals. Originally erudite productions, e. books became increasingly instruments of popular education, especially in Jesuit hands during the 17th c. Above all, they were a gold-mine of imagery for poets. Spenser, Shakespeare, Donne, Quarles, and Crashaw being notably thus indebted.—H. Green, Andrea Alciati and His Books of Emblems (1872); M. Praz, Studies in 17th-C. Imagery (2 v., 1939-47); E. James, "The Imagery of Francis Quarles' E.," UTSE (1943); R. J. Clements, "Cult of the Poet in Renaissance E. Lit.," PMLA, 59 (1944), "Condemnation of the Poetic Profession in Ren. E. Lit.," SP, 43 (1946), "Ars emblematica," Romanistisches Jahrbuch, 8 (1957) and Picta Poesis: Lit. and Humanistic Theory in Ren. E. Books (1960); J. Lederer, "John Donne and the Emblematic Practice," RES, 22 (1946); R. Freeman, Eng E. Books (1948).
J.L.L.

EMOTION. A poem involves two people, writer and reader; and a discussion of the place of e. in poetic theory can be divided accordingly. The division is chronological as well as logical: until the end of the 18th c., emphasis fell on the reader's e.; since the romantics, it has shifted to the poet's.

A good poem moves the reader: this has been a critical truism (perhaps even the critical truism) since literary criticism as we know it began, and hardly anyone disputes it, even today. The e. may be aroused for purely aesthetic purposes—for “delight”—or else as an indirect means of inciting to virtue. This latter is the Horatian view that poetry is both dulce et utile—that it “teaches delightfully”—and it is by far the more common in the Renaissance: it can be illustrated from almost any 16th-c. poet who discusses his craft: “O what an honor is it, to restraints / The lust of lawlesse youth with good advice . . . / Soone as thou gynst to sette thy notes in frame, / O, how the rurall routes to thee doe cleave! / Seemeth thou dost their soule of sence bereave . . .” (Spenser, The Shepheardes Calender).

Is the emotional effect normative—i.e., can we say that a good poem arouses strong emotions, and a bad poem doesn't? Aristotle probably thought not: he admits in the Poetics that terror and pity can be aroused by the spectacle (this is not of course an inferior poem, but an inferior element of poetry; but we can surely extend the argument by analogy), though it is preferable to raise them by the words, and he does not indicate that the less preferable method arouses a weaker or even a different e. The usual answer; however, was yes. When Sidney confesses “I never heard the olde song of Percy and Duglas, that I found not my heart mooved more then with a Trumpet,” he clearly assumes that this is a testimony to the poem's excellence. This normative view was carried much further in the 18th c., when it was claimed explicitly and at length (notably by Diderot) that the good poet must be judged by his power to arouse our emotions. Thus Pope: “Let me for once presume t' instruct the times, / To know the Poet from the Man of rhymes: / 'Tis he, who gives my breast a thousand pains, / Can make me feel each Passion that he feigns; / Inrage, compose, with more than magic Art, / With Pity, and with Terror, tear my heart” (To Augustus). This is an aspect of neoclassic doctrine that passed unchanged and naturally into romanticism.

One common objection to using one's emotional reaction as a touchstone is that it is too completely subjective: a poem has many readers, and they cannot compare their private emotions. The theoretical reply to this is contained in the doctrine of intersubjectivity (as formulated, for example, by Charles Morris): the use of language as a means of comparing purely private experiences. Nonetheless, the objection is useful if taken as a warning to the practical critic to talk about the words of the poem, rather than the e. it arouses in him:

for the latter will result either in vagueness, as in most impressionistic or rhapsodic criticism, or in such physiological descriptions as Housman's account of his skin bristling, or Emily Dickinson's “If I feel physically as if the top of my head were taken off, I know that is poetry.”

A poem, then, arouses in the reader an emotional response which is intersubjective: what is this e. like? The first question here is whether there is such a thing as a purely aesthetic e. The experience of reading, say, a satire of Pope is not the same as being angry; but critics are divided on whether the difference can profitably be described by postulating a specific poetry-reading or aesthetic emotion, which has no more to do with anger than with any other feeling.

The Horatian (dulce et utile) tradition would tend to answer yes. The e. of reading poetry was usually called, quite simply, pleasure; but it was clearly thought of as a special kind of pleasure, and there was some discussion in the 18th c. of its exact nature (e.g. by Hume in his essay on tragedy). Modern critics who believe in this emotion include Clive Bell (“The starting point for all systems of aesthetics must be the personal experience of a particular emotion . . . All sensitive people agree that there is a peculiar emotion provoked by works of art”) and T. E. Hulme (“You could define art as a passionate desire for accuracy, and the essentially aesthetic emotion as the excitement which is generated by direct communication”). One can also mention Freud, who believed that there was a “purely formal, that is, aesthetic pleasure” offered by poetry, and who also (not surprisingly) believed it was unimportant: an “increment,” a “bribe,” to release a greater pleasure arising from deeper sources in the mind. Freud held exactly the opposite view to Hume (and Wordsworth) on this point: for him, the aesthetic pleasure, or fore-pleasure, is a trigger that releases a discharge of e. that provides the true enjoyment of literature; whereas for Hume the aesthetic pleasure “softens,” for Wordsworth it “tempers” the passions.

Up till the 18th c., the two main views of the reader's e. were the Horatian (that it was a pleasure) and the Aristotelian (that it was a catharsis). There was a potential contradiction between these two, as we see by remarking that the catharsis-view would tend, implicitly, to deny the aesthetic e.: it was real pity and real terror that were to be felt. In modern times, it is denied by those anxious to repudiate an ivory tower or esoteric view of literature: by Marxists; by I. A. Richards (who says curtly that “psychology has no place for such an entity”); and, in effect, by John Dewey who, though he uses the term “aesthetic emotion," insists that it is "not cut off by a chasm from other and natural emotional experiences," and complains that those who believe in "an emotion that is aboriginally aesthetic . . . relegate fine art to a realm separated by a gulf from everyday experiences."

In talking of the reader's e., one must mention those critics who deny that e. has any place at all in his reaction. This denial can come from mainly theoretical motives, as in the case of Eliseo Vivas, who wishes to substitute "attention" as the key concept; or as part of a specific literary program, as in the case of T. S. Eliot. Eliot (who, however, is not always consistent) suggested that the emotions provoked by a work of art "are, when valid, perhaps not to be called emotions at all." This can be linked with his doctrine of impersonality (he tends to think of an e. as something personal, even self-regarding), and his emphasis on the physical ("the cerebral cortex, the nervous system, and the digestive tracts") that sometimes leads him to prefer the term "feeling." Thomas Mann has also expressed the view that "art is a cold sphere." The "calm" or "cold" that these writers find in the poetic response might by others be considered a kind of e., but there is a real cleavage here. What no one (presumably) denies is that even if the poem kills the e., it must deal with a situation that would have aroused e. in the first place.

Critics who try to describe the reader's e. are likely to apply to it some of the favorite modern conceptions for assessing a poem: especially particularity and complexity. It is generally agreed today that any good poem has an element of the specific and the individual: can we say that it arouses a particular, and even a unique e.? There are of course only a limited number of emotions, perhaps a dozen in common recognition; nonetheless, Collingwood maintains that beyond classifying "the anger which I feel here and now" as anger, one must add that "it is a peculiar anger, not quite like any anger that I ever felt before;" and to become fully conscious of it (which in his view is the first step towards its poetic expression) means "becoming conscious of it . . . as this quite peculiar anger." Dewey too (whose views on art and e. are often very like Collingwood's) maintained "save nominally, there is no such thing as the emotion of fear, hate, love. The unique, unduplicated character of experienced events and situations impregnates the emotion that is evoked." And the individuality of the work of art, he believes, comes from its faithfulness to this individual e. Eliot has also, on occasion, linked the precision of good poetry to the definiteness of its e.

As for complexity, I. A. Richards has frequently maintained that a response to poetry is highly complex, and reading a poem a matter of emotional accommodation and adjustment. He prefers however to direct attention away from e., and to speak of attitudes ("imaginal and incipient activities or tendencies to action") which poetry organizes in the reader "for freedom and fullness of life." This organization is the function of emotive language, sharply distinguished by Richards from referential language, which makes statements. William Empson, whose view of language is similar and influenced by Richards, goes even further in not wishing to discuss the emotions aroused by words: "Normally they are dependent on a Sense which is believed to deserve them," and the way to discuss the emotional impact of a poem is to analyze the structure of sense and implication in its key words.

Most of the remaining problems are best discussed under the heading of the poet's e. (Naturally, insofar as a poem is a successful act of communication, this division is artificial.) The first point to note, when considering the e. of the poet, is that it must be a descriptive and not a normative inquiry. A poem in itself can never offer conclusive evidence that the poet did not feel a certain e., nor (except on certain rather naive theories) that he did; this external, biographical fact can only be established separately, and has no critical relevance. Ruskin tried to classify forms of poetry as worse than others according to whether the poet was insincere or—worse still—deliberately, in hardness of heart, weaving intricate metaphors "with chill and studied fancy." Here we have left literary criticism for moralizing. As a reaction against this sort of thing, some modern writers on aesthetics (notably Beardsley and Osborne) have tried to make logical mincemeat of the very concept of artistic expression. It is much easier for them to do this when they are considering it as a normative concept than when treating it as part of literary psychology.

And as part of such a descriptive inquiry, there is a great deal to say about the poet's e. First of all, does he need to feel any? The view that he does not—that Shakespeare's sonnets, say, are literary exercises—repels most readers; but it is a view that seems to be supported by the pronouncements of some poets, very conscious of the hard work involved in composition. The Horatian-Renaissance critical tradition, with its manuals of instruction and its advice on decorum, has little to say on the poet's feelings, and a great deal on his craft. Even the famous line in the Ars Poetica, "si vis me flere, dolendum est primum ipsi tibi" (if you wish to make me weep, you must first feel grief yourself) is addressed to characters in a play, and refers simply to the need for good writing or good acting. It might be thought that the Platonic doctrine of inspiration ran counter to this tradition, but as expressed by Plato (and, generally, by everyone else) this has nothing to do with the poet's emotions: inspiration comes to him from without, and enables him, with the Muse's help, to solve problems in his craft that would be beyond his unaided wit; but they remain problems of craft. The doctrine that art is the expression of e. is one we owe to the romantic movement; earlier statements of it are very hard to find.

It is obviously a true doctrine, though there is room for great controversy within it. There is, first, the question whether the e. expressed in a poem is the same as that originally expressed by the poet. Most of the difficulties here vanish if we reject too naive a view of the temporal priority of this original e. What a poem expresses is clearly not the e. of the poet before he began writing it, but it may be his original e. insofar as the writing of the poem helped him to discover, even to feel it: "Expression is the clarification of turbid emotion," says Dewey. Samuel Alexander, however, prefers to postulate two emotions, the material passion ("the passions appropriate to the subject") and the formal passion (the "passion proper to the artist" which guides him "more surely than conscious ideas . . . unifying his choice of words . . . into an expressive whole"). This formal passion is clearly the equivalent for the poet of the aesthetic e. of the reader; Alexander suggests that the material passion need not be present, citing the example of dramatic poetry: "It is not necessary to suppose that Meredith or Shakespeare actually felt the emotions of his characters, but only that he understood them." It might however be truer to say that the material passion is not the e. of Macbeth himself, but Shakespeare's e. about the Macbeth-situation, which is contained, probably implicitly, in the play, and which Shakespeare presumably felt as well as understood. Unless we say this, Alexander's view can be turned into a craft-theory.

The central difficulty in any view of art as the expression of e. is to find a way of indicating that the poet, though in the grip of an e., is also in control of it: that he is possessed by his e., but also possesses it. A critic's way of resolving this paradox may often show the heart of his doctrine. A typical Victorian answer is that of Ruskin, for whom the second order poet is in the grip of his feelings (or chooses to write as if he was), whereas the first order poet has command over himself, and can look round calmly. When it comes to applying this distinction to poems, Ruskin shows a naïveté that is almost ludicrous: the great poet's "control of emotion" consists mainly in avoiding metaphor and factually untrue statements, even in preferring similes to metaphors. A glance at such a view makes it clear how greatly criticism has deepened its powers in the last century.

For it is not merely a question of the difference between first and second order poets, but between the control of e. necessary for its expression, and the inability to express oneself at all. Croce views expression as either aesthetic or naturalistic: "there is . . . an abyss . . . between the appearance, the cries and contortions of some one grieving at the loss of a dear one and the words or song with which the same individual portrays his suffering at another time." Dewey makes a distinction between giving way to, and expressing, an impulse: raging is not the same as expressing rage; and he links it with his more general theory that the arresting of the physiologically normal outlet of an impulse is the necessary precondition of its transformation into a higher level of experience. Perhaps the most valuable formulation of the difference is that of Collingwood, who distinguishes between expressing and betraying an e., linking this with his view of art as an enlarging and clarifying of consciousness.

These are philosophical formulations; to the poet and practical critic, what matters is the application of the distinction to the actual language of poetry. The classic instance of failure to draw this distinction is Johnson's attack on Lycidas on the grounds that "where there is leisure for fiction, there is little grief." The naturalistic discharge of grief may have no such leisure, but its expression has. This element of control in expression was no doubt one of the things Coleridge wished to indicate by attributing to imagination "a more than usual state of emotion, with more than usual order"; and that Eliot was thinking of when he described poetry as "an escape from emotion." Eliot's objections to Hamlet spring from a feeling that loose e., inadequately expressed, is betrayed in the play, though he shows some uncertainty whether the emotion is Shakespeare's, or also Hamlet's.

Wordsworth's account of poetry as originating in "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings" looks like a discharge-theory, but he goes on to add that as well as having "more than usual organic sensibility" the poet must be someone who has "thought long and deeply." Wordsworth was in fact usually aware (though he is inconsistent) that the e. as expressed is not the same as that originally felt: in his account of e. recollected in tranquillity, he remarks that the recollected e., that which issues in the poem, is "kindred" to the original one.

Of all modern theorists, the one who perhaps comes closest to a view of art as the mere discharge of e. is Freud. He happens to be talking of the reader's e., but his view (already mentioned) seems relevant here. He recognizes no element of control in the "release of tension" provided by literature, and sometimes indicates a view of art that equates it with indulgence in wish-fulfillment. (At other times he holds what amounts to a cognitive view.) Jung, though his interpretation is different, holds the same view of what the poetic e. is like, and describes it with the same metaphors: "the moment when the mythological situation appears is . . . as though forces were unloosed of the existence of which we had never even dreamed; . . . we feel suddenly aware of an extraordinary release."

There can be no doubt that this distinction between expressing and betraying is invaluable in the actual criticism of literature. Collingwood applies it, briefly but brilliantly, to Tess of the D'Urbervilles and to Beethoven; it provides the best terminology for sorting good from bad in writers like Shelley, Carlyle and Lawrence. Where Henry James censured the bad parts of Daniel Deronda as cold and intellectual, F. R. Leavis, in more modern terminology, can show that they are really too emotional.

How does e. work in the creative process? If writing a poem is like driving a car, the e. can be thought of as the destination or as the gasoline: the subject of literary creation, or the force that renders it possible. Eliot holds the first view: "What every poet starts from is his own emotions," he says, in contrasting Shakespeare with Dante, and suggests that Dante expresses not belief but certain emotions of believing. Alexander on the other hand holds the second view: "The artist aims to express the subject which occupies his mind in the means which he uses. His purpose may be dictated by passion but is still a passionate purpose." The resolution of this dispute (which may be partly terminological) lies outside literary theory; but the dangers and implications of each view are worth noting. If you believe that a poet's emotions are the subject of his poem, you are likely to emphasize, even overemphasize, the typicality of poems dealing explicitly with emotions, such as Shakespeare's sonnets, Coleridge's Dejection, and even perhaps (in the case of many romantic critics) lyric poetry in general. If on the other hand you regard emotion as merely the fuel, literature may become assimilated to philosophy.

However clearly we may perceive that the question of the poet's emotion is not normative, and therefore, strictly speaking, not relevant to criticism, there is no doubt that it will continue to be used, not only in literary psychology, but also by critics. For it is a useful short cut, a formulation that fits admirably into our habits of thinking. We persist in remembering that every poem had an author, who, as Eliot remarks in a similar context, meant what he said. To consider what drove him to write as he did may be the most convenient way of perceiving and evaluating what are really elements in our own reaction.

Plato, Ion (early 4th c. B.C.); Aristotle, Poetics (4th c. B.C.); Horace, Ars Poetica (ca. 12 B.C.); Sidney, Apology for Poetry (1595; typical Renaissance document); Boileau, L'Art Poétique (1674; typical neoclassic document); Diderot, Le Paradoxe du Comédien (written 1770-78, publ. 1830); Wordsworth, Preface to Lyrical Ballads (1800); Coleridge, Biographia Literaria (1817); Ruskin, "The Pathetic Fallacy," in Modern Painters, iii, 4 (1856); Croce, Aesthetic, tr. D. Ainslie (1909); T. S. Eliot, "The Perfect Critic," in The Sacred Wood (1920), "Tradition and the Individual Talent," "Shakespeare and the Stoicism of Seneca," "Dante," in Selected Essays (1932); I. A. Richards, Principles of Lit. Crit. (1924), Practical Crit. (1929); S. Freud, "The Relation of the Poet to Day-Dreaming," tr. G. Duff, in Collected Papers, iv (1925); C. G. Jung, "On the Relation of Analytical Psychology to Poetic Art," in Contributions to Analytical Psychology, tr. H. G. and C. F. Baynes (1928); W. Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930), The Structure of Complex Words (1951); S. Alexander, Beauty and Other Forms of Value (1933); J. Dewey, Art as Experience (1934); E. Vivas, "A Definition of the Aesthetic Experience," Jour. of Philos., 34 (1937); R. G. Collingwood, Principles of Art (1938); H. Osborne, Aesthetics and Crit. (1955; ch. 7 attacks the expression theory); Wimsatt. See also H. Osborne, "The Quality of Feeling in Art," Brit. Jour. of Aesthetics, 3 (1963).

L.D.L.

EMPATHY AND SYMPATHY. E. is the projection of ourselves into, or the identification of ourselves with objects either animate or inanimate. S. is a fellow-feeling with the ideas and emotions of other human beings, or with animals to whom we attribute human ideas and emotions. E. (Einfühlung) has been boldly conceived as the agent of our knowledge of nature, and in regard to poetics as the source of personification, or as the basis for all metaphor that endows the natural world with human life, thought, and feeling. In this aspect it is identical with what modern critics have termed the mythical view, and as such it is the essential attitude of poetry and art.

E. has, however, a more limited sense as a species of metaphor which conveys the meaning of an object by evoking a powerful physical response to it. In its projection into or identification with the object (the metaphysical crux of romantic nature poetry) it is distinguishable from s. by its element of sensation and its more intimate union with its object—s. runs parallel, while e. unites. S. may be intellectual only, or it may combine thought and feeling, and it need not deal with physical things, which along with the sensations evoked by them are indispensable to e. The importance of s. to poetics lies in its relation to extra-poetic issues. The sympathetic imagination, for example, makes possible organized social action by awakening us to the kinship of all things in unity. The Ancient Mariner's crime is a failure of s. toward a creature that has, significantly, already been associated to humanity: "As if it had been a Christian soul, / We hailed it in God's name." In his To a Young Ass Coleridge laid himself open to ridicule by sympathetically regarding the likenesses and defying the differences between himself and an underprivileged donkey: "Innocent foal! thou poor despis'd forlorn! / I hail thee Brother—spite of the fool's scorn! / And fain would take thee with me, in the Dell / Where high-soul'd Pantisocracy shall dwell!"

Empathic identification depends upon motor-imagery, allied with tactile and muscular impressions, with sensations of tension and release. E. is, then, relatively physical and instinctive, while s. is relatively intellectual and self-conscious. Keats's lines: "Crag jutting forth to crag, and rocks that seem'd / Ever as if just rising from a sleep, / Forehead to forehead held their monstrous horns . . ." aptly illustrate the empathic interpretation of objects by physical suggestion. E. is valuable to the critic as an instrument for focusing and organizing his perception of certain powerful poetic effects. It is especially helpful to romantic criticism, which tries to reconcile the poem, the reader, and the poet in a single critical act, since in this process both the reader's and the poet's emphatic response to the object can be regarded as relevant.—H. Lotze, Microcosmus, tr. E. Hamilton and E. E. Constance Jones (1886); V. Lee, The Beautiful (1913); H. S. Langfeld, The Aesthetic Attitude (1920); L. P. de Vries, The Nature of Poetic Lit. (1930); J. T. Shipley, The Quest for Lit. (1931); C. D. Thorpe, "E.," in Shipley, Dict.; W. J. Bate, From Cl. to Romantic (1946; chap. 5); N. F. Ford, "Keats, E., and 'The Poetical Character,'" SP, 45 (1948); R. H. Fogle, The Imagery of Keats and Shelley (1949; chap. 4); M. H. Abrams, "E. and S.," A Glossary of Lit. Terms (1957). R.H.F.

ENCOMIUM. A Gr. choral song in celebration not of a god but of a hero, sung at the komos, the jubilant or reveling procession which celebrated the victor in the games. While Simonides and Pindar wrote encomia, Aristotle says that both the e. and the myth are parts of all early poetry. In later times the term acquired the meaning of any laudatory composition in verse or prose but it applied more often to a rhetorical exercise in prose, exalting the virtues of some legendary figure or praising the extraordinary deeds of a human being. Aristotle considers it a subdivision of declamatory oratory (Rhetoric 1358 b 18ff.). The best examples of this type of e. in the classical period were written by Isocrates. It became very popular in the time of the New Sophistic and was widely imitated by Roman, Byzantine, and modern writers. Occasionally, however, the contents of this type of e. degenerated into the silliest and most trivial and extravagant of subjects. Erasmus' Praise of Folly is perhaps the best known example of the rhetorical kind of e. in modern literature. In the Hellenistic period many encomia were composed in the epic style. Theocritus wrote one in honor of Ptolemy Philadelphus (Idyll 17). In later times this type of composition was imitated by several Roman poets.—G. Fraustadt, Encomiorum in litteris graecis usque ad Romanam aetatem historia (1909); A. S. Pease, "Things Without Honor," CP, 21 (1926); H. K. Miller, "The Paradoxical E. with special Ref. to its Vogue in England, 1600–1800," MP, 53 (1956). r.s.c.

ENDECHA. The Sp. e. is a dirge or lament, usually written in 5-, 6-, or 7-syllable verse having assonance in the even-numbered lines, though any simple rhyme scheme in consonance and any type of verse may be used, since the name refers primarily to subject matter. The strophe employed in the e. real, however, introduced in the 16th c., is usually limited to 4 lines, generally 3 heptasyllables plus 1 hendecasyllable, the second and fourth lines assonating and the others left unrhymed. The position of the hendecasyllables may vary, or the strophe may alternate hendecasyllables with heptasyllables. Alternating rhyme (serventesio) in consonance may be used. The short-line forms, according to Le Gentil, are found as early as the 15th c., although the typical assonance of the learned poetry is a development of the 16th. The e. is sometimes called romancillo. A famous example is Lope de Vega's Pobre barquilla mia.—P. Le Gentil, La Poésie lyrique espagnole et portugaise à la fin du moyen âge. 2^e partie. Les formes (1953); Navarro. D.C.C.

ENDING. See LINE ENDINGS.

END RHYME. See RHYME.

END-STOPPED. A term applied to poetic lines in which both meaning and meter undergo a pause at the end of the line. End-stopped lines, like closed couplets (q.v.), are characteristic of the heroic couplets of Eng. 18th-c. poetry: "Hope springs eternal in the human breast; / Man never is, but always to be, blest" (Pope) and of the alexandrine verse of the Fr. neo-classicists. The term "end-stopped" is opposed to run-on, or enjambé (see ENJAMBEMENT), terms which are used to describe the free and uninterrupted carryover of the grammatical structure from one line to the other, as in most Eng. blank verse and most romantic poetry. The relative occurrence of end-stopped lines has been used as a means of determining the chronology of Shakespeare's plays and of other works.

ENGLISH POETICS. See MEDIEVAL, RENAISSANCE, BAROQUE, NEOCLASSICAL, MODERN POETICS.

ENGLISH POETRY. The early literature of England falls into two divisions: Old Eng. literature, the beginning to 1066; Middle Eng. literature, 1066 to 1500. The body of poetry we possess from the OE period is only a fragment of the poetry, oral or written, which existed in Anglo-Saxon times and it has survived the hazards of over a thousand years in four manuscripts: Cotton Vitellius AXV, the Exeter Book, the Vercelli MS, and the Junius MS. Despite the ravages of the centuries, we possess in OE poetry a vernacular literature by far the oldest in Western Europe.

The Germanic tribes who invaded Britain in the middle of the 5th c. after the evacuation of the Romans were an illiterate people who possessed, in common with all the Germanic peoples, a body of oral literature celebrating the legendary exploits of the heroic age of migrations. Within three centuries after landing in Britain, the Anglo-Saxons had achieved in the northern kingdom of Northumbria a degree of culture unsurpassed in Western Europe. Here, in the last half of the 7th c. and in the 8th c. the bulk of OE poetry was produced. The chief agent effecting this change was Christianity, for with conversion came literacy. But though Christianity provided the means and the stimulus for producing written literature and the theme for a good deal of OE poetry, it did not preclude the production of some poetry dealing with material from heroic times and reflecting both heroic ideals and pagan attitudes toward life.

OE poetry, then, has two major divisions: poetry in the Germanic heroic tradition and poetry dealing with Christian stories and themes. The heroic poem most suggestive of the rich knowledge the Anglo-Saxons had of continental history and legend is the Widsith, a mnemonic catalogue of the great figures of Germanic heroic poetry. Another poem containing allusions to such heroes is Deor, a poem unique in OE in its division into six short strophes of irregular length each followed by a refrain. The Waldere, of which only two very short fragments survive, is a telling, possibly on an epic scale, of the legend of Walter of Aquitaine. An older type of Germanic heroic poetry, the heroic lay, is represented by The Fight at Finnsburh (or the Finnsburh Fragment). It is one of only two surviving lays which represent the poetry of the migration period, the other being the Old Saxon Hildebrandslied.

The culmination of heroic poetry in OE and, indeed, the greatest Anglo-Saxon literary product is the Beowulf. The poem is an account of the fabulous adventures of Beowulf, a hero possessed of superhuman qualities, in overcoming two trolls and, at the cost of his life, a fire-breathing dragon. Beowulf is a folk epic not unworthy of comparison with the Iliad and the Odyssey. The epic effect is achieved by three means. First, the verse form (Germanic alliterative meter [q.v.]) has a powerful, skillfully varied rhythm and a strong melody which are particularly effective for the heroic subject matter of the poem. Second, the fabulous adventures are placed in an historical setting enriched by detailed allusions to 6th-c. costumes, customs, political institutions, and so forth. Third, the principal characters, particularly Beowulf, exemplify the high ideals of conduct of the Germanic comitatus: generosity in the king and undying loyalty in the retainer. The consensus of scholarly opinion is that the poem was composed in Northumbria between 675 and 750. Recent criticism views the poem as the work of one author and finds in the details and digressions a unity which shows an impressive artistic control of material.

Though Beowulf is the high-water mark of the heroic tradition in England, two late pieces testify that the tradition remained strong throughout the Anglo-Saxon period. The Battle of Brunanburh is a short panegyric which appears in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle for the year 937. A magnificent expression of the heroic spirit is the Battle of Maldon (after 991). The words of an aged retainer as he rallies his comrades for a fight to the death after their lord has been cut down are still a moving expression of courage:

Hige sceal þē heardra, heorte þē cēnre,
mōð sceal þē mare, þē ūre maegen lytlað.

The spirit must be hardier, the heart bolder, courage must be greater, the more our might lessens.

Although there is a marked cleavage between the themes of heroic poetry and those of Christian poetry, the two have much in common. Beowulf has a strong Christian element, and the heroic spirit informs the retelling of biblical and holy stories. The relationship between Christ and his apostles might be that between a chief and his followers. The Hebrew patriarchs of the Old Testament and the saints of medieval legend are made into Germanic heroes and their exploits are described as though they were warriors. Even the processes of nature are thought of in terms of heroic struggle—"time and frost, hoary warriors, fettered the land of heroes."

According to Bede, the first religious poet was Caedmon, a lay worker in the monastery of Whitby in Northumbria, upon whom the gift of song was miraculously bestowed. The only work which can be definitely ascribed to him is the short hymn which Bede records as having been divinely inspired. Bede tells us, however, that after having received his divine gift, Caedmon turned many biblical stories into poetry. Chiefly on the basis of Bede's account, the poems of the Junius MS—Genesis, Exodus, Daniel, Christ and Satan—were for a long time attributed to Caedmon and are still referred to as the Caedmonian poems though they were composed by different authors at different times.

The only other OE poet beside Caedmon whose name we know is Cynewulf. His name in runic letters is worked into the text of four poems—Christ II, Juliana, Elene, and the Fates of the Apostles—so that the reader may pray for him. Aside from a few autobiographical details in the signature passages, we know nothing about him. The poems of Cynewulf are more personal and lyrical than the Caedmonian poems and more artfully conscious and learned in the tradition of medieval rhetoric. In subject matter they consist of poetic versions of the L. prose lives of two saints, Juliana and Helena, of a L. prose homily of Gregory the Great on the Ascension, and a short recounting of the work and manner of death of the twelve apostles. But these poems are not mere translations; everywhere they are informed with the poetic spirit. This is particularly true of passages which treat of battle or the sea; the description of Helena's voyage is one of the finest sea pieces in OE poetry. The first 1,664 lines of the Exeter Book have been given the title Christ. These lines divide into three sections, which modern scholars number I, II, and III because each has a different subject matter. Christ II contains the runic signature of Cynewulf and, from a conservative point of view, is the only section which can be ascribed to Cynewulf. While Christ I and Christ III cannot be definitely attributed to Cynewulf, they can be assigned to a group of poems which are often referred to as Cynewulfian because in theme, style, and diction they resemble the signed poems. Among these are the Dream of the Rood, a lyric dream vision in which the Cross tells its story; Guthlac A and B, two different versions of a L. legend of St. Guthlac of Croyland; the Phoenix, a Christian allegory based on a L. poem and a fine piece of religious verse; and the Andreas, an account of the legendary exploits of St. Andrew with interesting parallels in style to the Beowulf.

Leaving aside some fragmentary and minor religious poems and such subliterary products as the Charms and the Gnomes, we can complete our brief survey of OE poetry by speaking of the Riddles and the lyrics or elegies. The seventy odd riddles contained in the Exeter Book cover a wide range of subjects from Old English daily life. Many are very ingenious, some are of high poetic merit, and some are wittily lewd. Also included in the Exeter Book are a group of five short lyrics which because of their mood are generally called elegies. Two of these are outstanding. The Wanderer is a superb expression of the grief felt by one who has lost his lord and companions and who broods on the transience of things. The Seafarer, which contains fine descriptions of the hardships and fascination of the sailor's life, is probably best interpreted as a Christian allegory of the renunciation of worldly pleasures and the endurance of the hardships of pilgrimage in order to win eternal life.

Practically all OE verse is composed in the Germanic alliterative meter (q.v.), which the Anglo-Saxons brought from the continent. It was intended for oral delivery and was recited to the accompaniment of the harp. The principal stylistic traits of OE poetry are the extensive use of compound words, its heaping up of words in apposition, and the use of the kenning (q.v.).

The OE poetry which we possess is practically all written in West Saxon but most of it was composed in Northumbrian. Northumbrian culture was brought to an end in the 9th c. by the Danish invasions and its poetic products which have survived were transported to Wessex where they were copied by West Saxon scribes.

With the Norman Conquest the tradition of OE literature comes to an end. OE alliterative verse with its 4-beat line continued in use throughout the ME period (1066-1500) and was the form of some outstanding poems. But the spirit, the themes, and the dominant verse forms derived chiefly from France. From 1066 to the last half of the 14th c., Eng. poets were apprentices learning to handle new verse forms and new types of poetry, and they did not become masters until the appearance of Chaucer and Gower. Nearly all poetry in this early period consists of translations and adaptations of foreign works, chiefly Fr., to provide the middle and lower classes with the entertainment and information which their social and intellectual superiors enjoyed in Fr. and L. While alliterative verse continued to be used, end rhyme became practically universal. The commonest verse forms were the octosyllabic couplet from the Fr., the fourteenner from medieval L., and, after Chaucer, the iambic pentameter couplet. But in the romances and particularly in the lyrics, many stanzaic forms, some of great complexity, were used.

New literary forms emerged in great multiplicity. There is a large body of religious poetry: moral didactic pieces such as the early Poema Morale (ca. 1170), exempla such as those contained in Handlyng Synne by Robert Mannyng of Brunne (begun 1303), many saints' lives, miracles of the Virgin, of which the best collection is the Vernon, lyrics and carols. Secular works cover a wide range: debates such as The Owl and the Nightingale (ca. 1225); fabliaux such as Dame Siriz (ca. 1275); chronicles such as the Cursor Mundi (ca. 1260); tales such as those in The Seven Sages of Rome (13th c.); a multitude of songs and lyrics, some of very high quality; Breton lais, short poems of romantic adventure often involving the fairy world, such as Sir Launfal (14th c.); and, two types which deserve more detailed comment—the ballad and the romance (qq.v.).

There are references to ballads from the 13th c. on, but the great age of the ballad was the 15th c. The ballad of this period was usually in a 4-line stanza rhyming abcb, the a and c lines in iambic tetrameter, and the b lines in iambic trimeter. Often a refrain was added and dramatic tension was increased by incremental repetition. The form was well adapted to musical accompaniment. Excluding variants, about 300 genuine Eng. and Scottish ballads survive. In subject they cover a wide range: domestic tragedy (Edward), border feud (The Battle of Otterburn), betrayed love (Lord Randal), outlaw life (Johnny Armstrong), riddles (Riddles Wisely Expounded), the supernatural (The Wife of Usher's Well), the fairy world (Thomas Rymer), and humor (The Farmer's Curs'd Wife). There is one outstanding ballad cycle, the Robin Hood sequence. During the preromantic period (ca. 1750-1800), there was a widespread revival of interest in ballads, and many were transcribed for the first time. The most notable early collection of ballads was that of Bishop Percy, Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765); the greatest that of F. J. Child, Eng. and Scottish Popular Ballads (1892-98).

The romances are conveniently classified by their subjects or "matters." The Matter of England consists of romances such as King Horn, the earliest Eng. romance (ca. 1225), and Havelok the Dane (ca. 1275) which celebrate the exploits of Eng. heroes. The Matter of France, which dealt with Charlemagne and the Twelve Peers, did not produce any romance of distinction in Eng., the best being The Taill of Rauf Coilyear (ca. 1475). The Matter of Rome includes the legends of Alexander and Troy, and in Eng. these legends are closer to metrical chronicles than romances.

Of all ME romances the most popular were those concerned with the Matter of Britain, the stories of Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table. About 1155 the Anglo-Norman poet Wace wrote the Roman de Brut, a poetic paraphrase of Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia Regum Britanniae. This work was translated by Layamon into a ME form of the earlier alliterative verse in his Brut (ca. 1200). The best handling of the full story of Arthur is the alliterative Morte Arthur (ca. 1375). Lancelot is the hero of only two Eng. romances, but one of these, the stanzaic Le Morte Arthur (ca. 1400), is a fine telling of the story of the Maid of Ascolot, the discovery of the love of Lancelot and Guinevere, and the destruction of Arthur and his court. The favorite Arthurian hero for the Eng. is Gawain, who is the subject of more metrical romances than any other knight of the Round Table and who, in nearly all, is portrayed as the exemplar of chivalry. The best of these romances are Yvain and Gawain (ca. 1325), The Weddyng of Sir Gawain and Dame Ragnell (15th c.), Golagrus and Gawain (ca. 1400), and, finest of all Eng. metrical romances, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. This last romance is one of four poems contained in a single manuscript generally ascribed to an unknown writer who is referred to as "the Pearl poet" after the title of one of his poems, The Pearl. The poems are all written in the West Midland dialect and were composed between 1360 and 1400. All are in alliterative verse: The Green Knight employs stanzas of irregular length, each stanza ending with 5 short rhymed lines; The Pearl employs a 12-line rhymed stanza with heavy, but irregular, alliteration; Patience and Purity are in long alliterative lines. The Pearl, an elegy in dream vision form on the death of a little girl, and The Green Knight are among the finest poems in ME.

Belonging to the same period as the Pearl poet are John Gower and the author of Piers Plowman. Gower is notable for competence and prolixity. His one long poem in Eng., the Confessio Amantis (1390), runs to 33,000 lines of proficiently handled octosyllabic couplets. The poem is a collection of stories illustrating the Seven Deadly Sins as applied to love. Poetry much more vigorous than Gower's is shown in The Vision Concerning Piers Plowman, a poem in three versions—A (ca. 1362-63), B (ca. 1376-77), C (ca. 1392-93 or 1398-99). It is the longest and most complex of a group of poems criticizing the social conditions of the period and is a series of dream visions which depict allegorically the state of society and the falling away from Christian ideals. The poem has much that is rude and formless, but impassioned reforming zeal animates the vivid picture of contemporary society.

The finest flower of ME poetry is the work of Geoffrey Chaucer (ca. 1343-1400). His early works—The Book of the Duchess (1369) and some short poems—are strongly marked by the influence of Fr. courtly poetry. Although not lacking in originality, they do not reach the level of his later pieces. Traditionally, the deepening of Chaucer's art has been attributed in part to the influence of the great It. authors, Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio. The House of Fame shows some influence of Dante and The Parliament of Fowls some of Boccaccio. Troilus and Criseyde (ca. 1382-1385), Chaucer's greatest complete work, is a retelling of Boccaccio's Il Filostrato which sees in Boccaccio's story of an unhappy love affair an illustration of the view of life given in Boethius' Consolation of Philosophy, a work Chaucer translated into prose. Apparently after a false start at a frame-story in the unfinished Legend of Good Women (the Prologue is one of Chaucer's most charming pieces), Chaucer hit upon the device of a pilgrimage to provide the framework of a series of tales and so produced the most celebrated of all his works, The Canterbury Tales. Some of the stories are slight or dull but most are brilliant. The range is great—courtly romance in the Knight's Tale, fabliaux such as the Miller's and the Reeve's tales, a miracle of the Virgin in the Prioress's Tale, folk tales in the Man of Law's and the Clerk's tales, a beast fable in the Nun's Priest's Tale, a Breton lai in the Franklin's Tale, a burlesque metrical romance in Sir Thopas, medieval "tragedies" in the Monk's Tale, an exemplum in the Pardoner's Tale. But the brilliance of the tales themselves is only part of the artistic merit of the work. There are two points of striking originality about the Canterbury Tales. First, the frame is not a mere mechanical or introductory device for a series of stories (as it is in the Legend of Good Women); links between the stories provide the sense of a continuing journey and of the presence of the pilgrims. Second, the tales are related to the characters of the tellers and to their reactions to other pilgrims or to problems in which other pilgrims are interested. The result is that sense of verisimilitude which has charmed readers from Chaucer's day to the present. He was also an innovator in verse form. His two chief innovations are rhyme royal (q.v.) and the iambic pentameter couplet.

Except for ballads, the 15th c. was a barren one in England. After Chaucer there was no poet worth naming in a survey as brief as this. The only poetry worthy of the name was written in Scotland by a group of poets who, though influenced by Chaucer, did not, as his Eng. followers did, slavishly imitate him. Though writing before the 15th c. John Barbour should be mentioned. His Bruce (ca. 1370), though not great poetry, is great in its reflection of the Scottish spirit. An offspring of the Bruce is the popular epic, Blind Harry's Wallace (ca. 1460). James I of Scotland wrote one poem, The Kingis Quair (ca. 1423), which is memorable because its conventional love allegory is informed by the spirit of the true love which inspired it. Robert Henryson (ca. 1430-ca. 1506) wrote some delightful animal fables and a short but effective sequel to Chaucer's Troilus, The Testament of Cresseid. The finest of the so-called Scottish Chaucerians (q.v.), though much of his work comes after 1500, may be mentioned here. William Dunbar (ca. 1465-ca. 1530) shows the least influence of Chaucer and the greatest vigor and originality. His works are those of a highly skilled, thoroughly professional poet who delights in high style, elaborate metaphor, and that coinage from L. which has given to the Scottish school the appellation aureate (q.v.).

Poetry, then, in the ME period reaches its culmination in the period of Chaucer. Except in Scotland, it did not again reach such a high level until the Renaissance.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: CBEL; A. H. Heusinkveld and E. J. Bashe, A Bibliog. Guide to OE (1931); W. L. Renwick and H. Orton, The Beginnings of Eng. Lit. to Skelton (1953).—J. E. Wells, A Manual of the Writings in ME, 1050-1400, with 9 supp. (1916-51); E. P. Hammond, Eng. Verse between Chaucer and Surrey (1920); L. L. Tucker and A. R. Benham, A Bibliog. of 15th C. Lit. (1928); C. Brown and R. H. Robbins, Index of ME Verse (1943).—W. Geddie, A Bibliog. of Middle Scot Poets (1912). See also the bibliog. in the lit. histories by E. K. Chambers and H. S. Bennett, below.

TEXTS: Consult the publications of the Early Eng. Text Society, the Scottish Text Society, and the Chaucer Society. The standard ed. of the corpus of OE poetry is the Anglo-Saxon Poetic Records, ed. G. P. Krapp and E.V.K. Dobbie (6 v., 1931-53). For ed. of specific poems, see the bibliog. in these vols. and those cited above. The most comprehensive 1-v. tr. of OE poetry into prose is that by R. K. Gordon, Anglo-Saxon Poetry (rev. ed., 1954); a convenient anthol. of translations into verse is that of C. W. Kennedy, An Anthol. of OE Poetry (1960). The best ed. in Eng. of Beowulf are those by Fr. Klaeber (3d ed. with 1st and 2d supp., 1950) and by A. J. Wyatt and R. W. Chambers (1921). The best introduction to the poem for the beginning student is W. K. Lawrence, Beowulf and Epic Tradition (1930); for the advanced student, R. W. Chambers, Beowulf: An Intro. . . . (3d ed., 1959). A. G. Brodeur's The Art of Beowulf (1959) is the best discussion of the artistic unity of the poem. The best ed. of Chaucer is that of F. N. Robinson (2d ed., 1956).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: C. W. Kennedy, The Earliest Eng. Poetry (1943; best study of OE poetry in Eng.); J. C. Pope, The Rhythm of Beowulf (1942) and A. J. Bliss, The Metre of Beowulf (1958) are studies of OE prosody.—CHEL I and II; W. H. Schofield, Eng. Lit. from the Norman Conquest to Chaucer (1906); Saintsbury, Prosody, I (1906; the best work in Eng. on ME metrics); E. K. Chambers, Eng. Lit. at the Close of the Middle Ages (1945); H. S. Bennett, Chaucer and the 15th C. (1947); A. C. Baugh et al., A Lit. Hist. of England (1948); G. Kane, ME Lit. (1951); R. M. Wilson, Early ME Lit. (1951).—Scottish Poetry: A Crit. Survey, ed. J. Kinsley (1955). R.P.APR.

SINCE 1500. Eng. poetry has generally dominated its accompanying poetics and criticism. It is empirical in its use of ideas and rules, and free of logical extremism. Fed by other literatures and cultures, like the Fr. and It., it has always possessed the creative power to absorb and transform them. In Eng. poetry after 1500 there are two periods of full expansion: the Elizabethan flowering, and the romantic movement. The metaphysical 17th c. is a gallant withdrawal to the conservative neoclassicism of the Augustans, who consolidated new positions at the rear. The second half of the 18th c. witnesses an irregular and straggling advance, which nevertheless culminates at the border of a new frontier in Eng. romanticism. The age of Victoria is a long and gradual breaking-up, which reaches with the Georgian poets into the 20th c., until the moderns reorganize and intervene with Yeats and Eliot. Those contemporary critics who have been able to desecrate a tradition in Eng. poetry have ordinarily found it in the metaphysicals of the early 17th c. The central tradition, however, cannot be located in any one period or group. It lies as it were in poetic creation itself, and it has been most evident at those times when the poets have believed that they had something to say, without too many obstacles in their road. Eng. poetry has always tried to assert the primacy of the spirit. It has best succeeded when it has been neither too defeatist nor too defiant.

THE RENAISSANCE. Tudor and Elizabethan poetry is at once conventional and spontaneous. In its vast body of lyrics individuals are little distinguishable, but all are remarkable for vigor and ease. Themes, imagery, and metrics owe something to native tradition, and in the late 16th c. something to the Fr. Pléiade, but most of all to It. Petrarch's sonnets especially, with their Renaissance version of courtly love, affected Eng. poetry. The pastoralism of Elizabethan lyrics is also primarily It. and conventional. In the Arcadianism of a typical anthology, England's Helicon (1600), the lover and his beloved are stock figures and Nature is Arcadia in eternal spring, but the verse is nevertheless charming and fresh.

John Skelton (1464?–1529) is a medieval, not a Renaissance figure. The Bouge of Court (1498 or 1499) is in the tradition of the dream allegory of Jean de Meung and many others, and his massive Magnificence (1515–16) is a morality play. Skelton is most esteemed today for the "Skeltonics" of Philip Sparrow, The Tunning of Elinor Rumming, Colin Clout, and Why Come Ye Not to Court, his most individual and characteristic poems. The Garland of Laurel (1523), in praise of the Countess of Surrey and other ladies, is like The Bouge of Court a dream allegory. Skeltonics (q.v.) are irregular and jagged short lines, with rhyme their only fixed principle. The number and positions of the stresses vary. Skeltonics owe something to medieval L. verse, but they are more irregular than their models. Skelton's decided interest for some modern poets probably lies, in fact, in his daring in wrenching earlier forms to the very limits of the formal.

Sir Thomas Wyatt (1503?–42) is the first Eng. poet of the Renaissance. The first considerable collection of his poems was published, with those of Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (1517?–47) and others, in Songs and Sonnets, usually known as Tottel's Miscellany (1557). Wyatt's lyrics, chiefly in native modes, are now highly thought of, but he is remembered historically as the introducer into Eng. of the sonnet, the classical epigram, and the semi-classical satire, as well as the stanza forms of ottava rima and terza rima. Surrey gave to the sonnet its distinctive Eng. movement and rhyme pattern (ababdcdefefgg), as opposed to the typical abbaabbacdecde of the It. sonnet. Surrey's most important innovation, however, was blank verse, which he invented in a partial translation of Virgil's Aeneid as an Eng. equivalent of Virgil's dactylic hexameters. His propagation of the rocking-horse "poulter's measure," widely used in 16th-c. drama and narrative verse, has occasioned less gratitude.

The great body of fine Elizabethan lyrics is preserved in such collections as A Hundreth Sundrie Flowres (1573), The Paradise of Dainty Devices (1576), A Gorgeous Gallery of Gallant Inventions (1578), and A Handful of Pleasant Delytes (1584?). The titles are publisher's come-ons, but not unfaithful to the contents. The harmonious relation of words and music in the Elizabethan song is exemplified in the work of poet-composers like Thomas Campion. Many of the finest songs came from drama and prose romance, such as the songs of Shakespeare's plays: "My true love hath my heart and I have his," from Sidney's Arcadia; and "Love in my bosom like a bee," from Thomas Lodge's Rosalind. The sonnet rose to new refinement in the sonnet-sequences of the 1590's. The vogue of these is usually attributed to Sir Philip Sidney's Astrophel and Stella (1591), which also marks the coming-of-age of Elizabethan prosody. Samuel Daniel, Lodge, Edmund Spenser, Michael Drayton, and particularly Shakespeare contributed to the sonnet, with other lesser poets. The next great practitioner, Milton, transferred his allegiance to a modified It. form, which Wordsworth also was later to use.

The main themes of Elizabethan lyricism are on the one hand pastoral love, on the other this world's illusion—also from the pastoral ideal of permanence and serenity. They are further developed in the Ovidian narrative and the long reflective poem. The reflective or philosophical poem came from the middle ages, through the medium of Sackville's Induction (1563) to the popular Mirror for Magistrates. Between 1590 and 1610 Sir John Davies, George Chapman, Samuel Daniel, and Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke, wrote largely of large issues, in such poems as Davies' Orchestra (1596) and Nosce Teipsum (1599), Daniel's Musophilus (1599), Chapman's Tears of Peace (1609), and Greville's Treatie of Humane Learning. These were didactic, as was the Elizabethan theory of poetry, but they were spacious and vital. The Ovidian narrative poem (Ovid's Metamorphoses had been translated into Eng. in 1567) is represented by Marlowe's Hero and Leander (1593?) and Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis (1593) and The Rape of Lucrece (1594). Glowingly pictorial, they illustrate the Renaissance version of Horace's ut pictura poesis doctrine that painting is silent poetry and poetry a speaking picture. Michael Drayton's Endymion and Phoebe (1595) anticipates Keats's Endymion in using sensuous love as a metaphor of spiritual exaltation. Chapman also uses sense-experience for allegory in Ovid's Banquet of Sense.

The Renaissance greatly respected the classical epic, although it did not always distinguish its qualities clearly. Chapman translated Homer's Iliad (1598-1611) into vigorous "fourteeners": "He took much ruth to see the Greeks by Troy sustain such ill, / And mightily incenst with Jove stooped straight from that steep hill . . ." and added in 1614 a translation of the Odyssey. Tasso and Ariosto were accepted as epic poets; Edward Fairfax's translation (1600) of Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata and Sir John Harington's translation of Ari-osto's Orlando Furioso (1591) were tributes to the heroic, although Harington's Orlando is not an epic hero.

Edmund Spenser (1552-99) writes his version of epic, undifferentiated from other narrative forms, in The Fairie Queene (1590). The Fairie Queene from its Arthurian antecedents is related to medieval romance; it looks back to Dante's famous letter to Can Grande in its multiple allegory; and it draws from the mixed narrative of Ariosto, which had set the It. critics at each other's throats. In the variety and scope of his achievement Spenser is the epitome of his time. He is successful in many of its characteristic forms: at the sonnet-sequence in Amoretti, and at the pastoral in the half-Eng., half-Virgilian Shepherd's Calendar (1579). In Prothalamion and Epithalamion Spenser fused the classical wedding ode, the Theocritan elegy, and the It. canzone, bequeathing an instrument to Milton for Lycidas. Spenser's influence upon Eng. poetry has been enormous from his own days until the 20th c. Dryden, Milton, Thomson, Collins, Gray, Wordsworth, Byron, Keats, Shelley, Tennyson, and Arnold were all in varying degrees his followers. Spenser's "grand style," heightened with archaisms and mythological allusions, led eventually through Milton to the artificial poetic diction which Wordsworth castigated in the 1800 Preface to the Lyrical Ballads.

Elizabethan and Jacobean poetic drama has a long medieval tradition behind it of miracle and morality plays, and also a classical background from the comedies of Plautus and Terence and Seneca's rhetorical tragedies. Nicholas Udall wrote a Plautine comedy with Eng. local color (Ralph Roister Doister, ca. 1553), about the same time as Gammer Gurton's Needle, a more Eng. comedy, was being performed at Cambridge. In 1562 Sackville and Norton produced Gorboduc, the first Eng. tragedy. Gorboduc is Senecan, declamatory, and vicariously and indiscriminately bloody (its murders are announced by messenger), but it is important as a tragedy in blank verse. Tragedy had to wait upon Marlowe and Kyd for real significance. Meanwhile the playwrights wrote in alexandrines, or fourteeners, or the combination of these called poulter's measure. Preston's sprawling and bombastic Cambyzes (ca. 1569) is an instance of the popular drama that Sidney scorned in his Defence of Poesy (1581), and that Falstaff and Ancient Pistol were to burlesque. Christopher Marlowe (1564-93) brought Elizabethan tragedy to maturity with Tamburlaine, Edward II, Doctor Faustus, and The Jew of Malta. He contributed a new command of blank verse ("Marlowe's mighty line"), a new insight into dramatic character, and a troubled but expansive humanism. Thomas Kyd (1557?-1595?) supplied in The Spanish Tragedy an unprecedented skill in plot.

William Shakespeare (1564-1616) is of course too large for the perspective of this essay, and the variety of his achievement makes it impossible to characterize. Shakespeare has been anomalous to the neoclassics, romantic to the romantics, and metaphysical to the moderns. He was capable of excelling in classical L. comedy (Comedy of Errors) and in the courtly comedy of manners and affectation (Love's Labour's Lost), as well as in the mixed romantic comedy of Midsummer Night's Dream, As You Like It, Much Ado About Nothing, and Twelfth Night. His history plays, Julius Caesar, Antony and Cleopatra, King John, Richard II and Richard III, Henry IV I and II, Henry V, and the Henry VI plays stem organically from the development of the 16th-c. stage, but so far transcend their origins as to constitute a new dramatic genre. The enigmatic "problem plays," Measure for Measure, All's Well That Ends Well, and Troilus and Cressida also rise above the ground that nourished them. Of the tragedies, Romeo and Juliet, Hamlet, King Lear, Macbeth, Othello, and Coriolanus, it is useless to speak here. They correspond with but go beyond our general characterization of Elizabethan drama, while The Winter's Tale and The Tempest defy classification. Perhaps the one form unattempted by Shakespeare is the classical "regular" tragedy, to which category Othello most closely approaches.

From our point of view Shakespeare and Shakespearean blank verse dominate the Elizabethan and the Jacobean stage, and the subsequent history of poetic drama. In actual fact the Eng. Renaissance theatre had dozens of gifted poets writing for it, at the only time in Eng. stage history when the poetic and the popular play have been identical. The roll of dramatists is too long to do more than mention names, and we cannot here, like the players in Hamlet, enumerate dramatic genres. Before 1600 came John Lyly (1554?-1606) with Euphuistic prose comedies, Robert Greene's (1558-1592) Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay, and George Peele's Arraignment of Paris. Ben Jonson (1573?-1637) moved toward another and a neoclassical age in his comedies of the "humours" and his learned tragedies, Sejanus and Catiline. Dryden was to praise Shakespeare eloquently in his Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1667-68), but he chose Jonson's Silent Woman to analyze as a model of dramatic structure. Francis Beaumont (1584-1616) and John Fletcher (1579-1625) point also toward the Restoration, lowering tragedy to pathos, and Aristotle's "terror" of tragic effect to "admiration."

The roster of playwrights is long—Thomas Heywood (1575?-1641), George Chapman (1559-1634) with his tragedies from recent Fr. history, John Marston (1575-1634), of whom it has been unkindly said that "the first part of his Antonio and Mellida was the worst tragedy in Eng. till the second part appeared," Thomas Middleton (1570?-1627), Philip Massinger (1583-1640), John Ford (1583-1640?), and James Shirley (1596-1666). John Webster (1580?-1625?), who "was much possessed by death," is inheritor of Shakespeare's tragedy in The White Devil and The Duchess of Malfi, but his poetry and subtle thought stand apart from his shapeless plots. Cyril Tourneur (1575?-1626) brings the Senecan tradition to a turbulent end in The Revenger's Tragedy.

The Elizabethan and Jacobean drama are expansive and energetic. They are spacious and profuse in metaphor and imagery, fluid, swift, and various in movement, by classical standards loose in structure, and extravagant in event. In energy and variety they are predominantly "romantic," and in their romanticism they are for good or ill the norms of the poetic drama in Eng.

To return to nondramatic poetry, the influence of Spenser continued in the 17th c. in George Wither, William Browne, Giles and Phineas Fletcher, and Michael Drayton. Of these Drayton is most notable, for his sonnets, his narrative Endymion and Phoebe, his patriotic odes, his pastoral The Muses' Elysium, and his massive Poly-Olbion, an historico-patriotic-geographic poem sui generis. The main lines of the 17th c. up to the Restoration, however, followed Ben Jonson and John Donne. It is convenient to label Jonson and his "sons of Ben" neoclassical, and to call Donne and his group metaphysical. Herrick and the cavalier poets, Carew, Lovelace, and Suckling are thus Jonsonian and classical, with Donne, Herbert, Crashaw, Vaughan, Marvell, Cowley, and Cleveland in the metaphysical line. The classification, however, must be cautiously used. Jonson sometimes wrote like Donne and Donne like Jonson, Carew is both metaphysical and classical in his famous "Ask me no more where Jove bestows," as is Marvell in To His Coy Mistress, and the Horatian Herrick is capable of metaphysical wit in "Julia's Clothes" and elsewhere. They were all poets of the 17th c., with the same Elizabethan heritage to profit from and to react against. In the main they wrote short lyrics; the long Spenserian narrative and the didactic poem of reflection had gone out of fashion. Under the hand of Jonson, who developed the heroic couplet and the classical epigram, the lyric ceased to sing and became a talking poem, elaborated and refined in technique, with less exuberance and more apparent art than its 16th-c. counterpart. The transition from singing to talking is even more evident in Donne, who perfected the logical, argumentative structure already available in the Elizabethan sonnet.

Metaphysical poetry was first labeled in mockery by the conservative Drummond of Hawthornden, who disliked its "scholastic quiddities." Dryden employed the term unfavorably in describing Donne's love poetry, and Dr. Johnson made it stick in his life of Cowley (1779), still the locus classicus of discussion. The adjective is apt in connoting both cosmic largeness of view and subtle logical distinction. Metaphysical poetry reacts against the expansive affirmations, the optimistic humanism, and the conventionality of the Elizabethans, much as modern poetry has reacted against the 19th-c. romantics. Its world derives from the hierarchical world of the 16th c., but instead of accepting the orderly layers of being and meaning which harmonize so well with the methods of Spenserian multiple allegory, metaphysical poetry drives these layers violently together. It takes special delight in unifying, discordia concors, widely disparate elements. John Donne (1572-1631) wrote of sacred and profane love, the hope of heaven and the fear of hell, and frequently all these themes in the same poem or even in the same metaphor. Donne wrote songs, sonnets, satires, and meditations, but one thinks of him first as the author of dramatic lyrics like The Canonization, which fuses sex with saintliness, or A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning, with its famous conceit of the compass. By his mingled levity and seriousness, his ironic egocentricity, his rhetoric of shock and outrage, his subtle ambiguities, and his mastery of dramatic development of theme, Donne has profoundly affected 20th- as well as 17th-c. poetry. His use of counterpoint, in opposition in metrical and rhetorical stress, has had marked consequences in later versification.

George Herbert (1593-1633) is a quieter poet. His poetry is a record of religious experience, dramatized by conflict of the individual with the divine will. Herbert is fond of the "emblem" (q.v.) fashion of allegorical interpretation, to the point of giving some poems an emblematic physical shape. Richard Crashaw (1612-13-49) in his Steps to the Temple (1646) and other work is the most flamboyant and "baroque" of the metaphysical poets, his conceits more Sp. and It. than Eng. Henry Vaughan (1622-95) in the two parts of his Silex Scintillans (1650 and 1655) is a Christian neoplatonist whose almost pantheistic view of nature distinguishes him from the other metaphysicals in imagery and in thought. Bishop Henry King is remembered for his wonderful Exequy. Thomas Traherne (1637?-1674) was unpublished till the 19th c. Traherne like Vaughan was a mystic, who saw God immediately in nature. John Cleveland, once a great name, has been little read since the 18th c., and Abraham Cowley (1618-67) has now a merely historical interest from his elaborate "Pindaric" odes and his epic the Davideis. Cowley alone among the metaphysical poets welcomed the rise of science, which had already dismayed Donne in the new astronomy—

And new philosophy puts all in doubt;
The element of fire is quite put out—and which was to have depressing effects upon the poetry of the future. A better poet than Cowley, the Horatian classicist Robert Herrick (1591-1674), is primarily a follower of Ben Jonson, but he is perhaps most enjoyed now for a latent metaphysical strain of tough-minded wit. Herrick's Corinna's Maying is like Lycidas in its harmonious fusion of pagan with native elements, though in Herrick's poem there is little of the Christian. Andrew Marvell's (1621-78) To his Coy Mistress, The Garden, and the Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland today seem flawless. Less scholastic and more classical than Donne, Marvell at his best suits all tastes.

John Milton (1608-74) is traditionally second to Shakespeare among the Eng. poets, though powerful 20th-c. iconoclasts, especially T. S. Eliot and F. R. Leavis, have tried to overthrow him. Milton is the last and belated product of the earlier Renaissance, and the fulfillment of its dearest aspirations. He excelled in all but comedy and satire; a comedy by Milton is inconceivable, and his satire is all-out vituperation. Until the Restoration, satire did not prosper in the 17th c. Donne and Marvell tried it, but their satirical impulses were given better expression in the irony of their complex lyrics. Milton began his career with an Italianate baroque ode, On the Morning of Christ's Nativity, proceeded to better Ben Jonson in the urbane and charming pastoralism of the twin L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, and again in the masque of Comus; and brought the pastoral elegy to its consummation in Lycidas. In its exquisite mastery of its convention Lycidas is a wonderful tour-de-force, but recent critics have been most interested in its mythical pattern of death and rebirth. Milton's fine sonnets, chiefly Italianate, transmit the sonnet-form to the 18th and 19th c. Paradise Lost is the only successful epic in Eng. literature, and Samson Agonistes the only successful attempt at classical tragedy. As with Shakespeare in the drama, Milton's blank verse and his poetic diction, in the tradition of Spenser, so mastered later poetry that no poet could avoid them. Their power prevailed from Dryden to Robert Bridges.

THE AUGUSTANS. The tone of poetry from the Restoration of Charles II to about 1750 was lowered by exhaustion from the religious ardors and domestic broils of the interregnum. There was a general distrust of "enthusiasm," which was associated with Puritanism, non-conformity, and extremism of all kinds. Further, the rise of physical science, with the prestige behind it of Bacon, Hobbes, and the Royal Society, tended to deprive poetry of its ground. The Royal Society's drive for denotative accuracy of language struck at the validity of poetic imagery and figure. The poets lost confidence in their calling; they retreated, and tried to consolidate and stabilize their new position. The age paradoxically combined humility with self-confidence. The Augustans, as the name indicates, thought their time comparable in refinement to the days of Virgil and Horace. They did not, however, suppose themselves to rival their forebears in genius; not merely the ancients but even their Eng. predecessors had stolen their best thoughts. Dryden looks back with awe to "the giants before the flood," and Pope pays tribute in the mock-heroic Rape of the Lock to an achievement beyond his reach. Retreating before science, poetry sought both refuge and reconciliation, on the one hand in the traditional authority of the great classics, on the other by limiting its subject matter to ethics, the manners of men in society, and the norm of human nature as attainable by reason—topics outside the interests of the physical sciences. Poetry tended, then, toward limitation and uniformity, and its ideals were "correctness," decorum, and consistency. The chief virtues of Augustan poetry are balance, restraint, control, and unillusioned realism, as in the sinewy verses of Swift, the arguments and satires of Dryden, and the ethical epistles of Pope. This poetry is an artifact, an object not large but consummately wrought.

The Augustans used many verse forms, but their characteristic measure is the heroic couplet, as in this famous passage from Sir John Denham's Cooper's Hill, which was held a model for the closed couplet structure in its "correctness" and its coherence of metrical with rhetorical accent: "O could I flow like thee, and make thy stream / My great example, as it is my theme! / Though deep yet clear; though gentle yet not dull; / Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full." The balanced parallels and antitheses of the heroic couplet embody the contradictions of the Augustan mind: its love of consistency and reason but also its perception of something ungraspable and beyond reason, whose presence the antithesis admits in paradox, but against which it is a weapon in mockery. The heroic couplet persists beyond the great Augustans in Dr. Johnson's Juvenalian London (1738) and The Vanity of Human Wishes (1749), and in Oliver Goldsmith's The Traveller (1764) and The Deserted Village (1770). It continues into the early 19th c. as a vehicle for ethical reflection and satire. Byron used it effectively in Eng. Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809), but it no longer expressed a real way of thought.

The chief genres of Augustan poetry are the satire and the reflective or argumentative poem. The mock-heroic narrative is a subtype and vehicle of satire, which after Samuel Butler's tetrameter Hudibras (1663) came fully of age in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel (1681) and Mac Flecknoe (1681-82). The poem of reflection was often purely argumentative or reflective, as in Dryden's Religio Laici (1682) and The Hind and the Panther (1687), or Pope's Essay on Criticism (1711), which enunciated the central critical dictum of the era in

True wit is nature to advantage dress'd, What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed.

There are also poems, however, which mingle reflection with natural and topographical description, such as Denham's Cooper's Hill (1642-55), Pope's Windsor Forest (1713), Thomson's Seasons (1726-30), Goldsmith's Traveller and Deserted Village, and William Cowper's The Task (1785). The mock-heroic narrative takes on its own individuality in Pope's Rape of the Lock (1711, 1714) and Dunciad (1728).

The Augustans also practiced the Pindaric ode, an elaborate form at the opposite pole from the heroic couplet. Dryden's ode to Mrs. Anne Killigrew (1685) and Alexander's Feast (1697) are brassy but impressive set-pieces. The form persisted, and was employed again by Thomas Gray (1716-71) and William Collins (1721-59). Gray's The Progress of Poesy is Augustan, but The Bard, like his later The Fatal Sisters and The Descent of Odin reflects the growing interest of the second half of the 18th c. in primitive and bardic poetry. Collins' Pity, Fear, Simplicity, The Poetical Character, Evening, The Passions, and Popular Superstitions of the Highlands show a new delicacy of feeling. To go beyond the 18th c., Coleridge's Dejection: an Ode (1802) and Wordsworth's Ode on Intimations of Immortality (1806) transformed the Pindaric into an instrument of individual emotion and philosophic speculation, and Tennyson revived its original public and formal function with amazing success in his official Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington.

To return to the Augustans, John Dryden (1631-1700), the most versatile and probably the most considerable poet of his era, excelled in all the characteristic genres, and was also critic, playwright, and translator. In 1672 he produced the best of the Heroic Plays in couplets, The Conquest of Granada, and did still better in All For Love (1678), a blank-verse imitation of Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra. Dryden's version is enormously lower in intelligence and vitality than Shakespeare's, but All For Love is nonetheless a thoroughly satisfying "regular" play, which challenges Otway's Venice Preserved for the title of the finest poetic tragedy of its time. In his later days Dryden translated L. and Gr. classics, notably the Eclogues, the Georgics, and especially the Aeneid of Virgil, and in his Fables (1700) imitated poems and tales from Chaucer and Boccaccio with great success and later consequences in Wordsworth and in Keats's Lamia. In connection with Dryden it is well for us to remember that Augustan neoclassicism, though it was largely imported from France, was much less doctrinaire and more flexible and tolerant than Fr. neoclassicism. The better Eng. poets and critics could never be induced to disavow Shakespeare, the irregular play, and in general their heritage of great native poetry. Dryden appreciated Chaucer and Spenser, and was influenced by Donne; Pope translated Homer, but he also edited Shakespeare with considerable insight; and the formidable Dr. Johnson himself administered the coup-de-grace to the neoclassic "three unities."

Throughout his entire career Alexander Pope (1688-1744) progressed steadily toward a limited and uniform perfection. With consummate self-knowledge, or "judgment" as his age would have said, he settled and fixed upon his forte. After some casual philandering with feeling and imagination in poems like Pastorals (1709), Windsor Forest (1713), and The Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady (1717), he turned decisively to satire and to didactic essays and epistles in the manner of Horace, the favorite poet of the Augustans. He would have it his praise, as he wrote in his Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, "That not in fancy's maze he wandered long, / But stooped to truth, and moralized his song." Pope wrote the finest neoclassical poem in Eng. in The Rape of the Lock. His translations of Homer's Iliad (1715-20), and of part of the Odyssey (1725-26) were influential as late as the 19th c., but they bore the reproach of corrupting taste by their vicious "poetic diction."

THE ROMANTICS. Eng. romanticism has been traced in a bewildering variety of tendencies and poets. Some critics have even found a foretaste of it in the Windsor Forest and the Elegy to . . . An Unfortunate Lady of the arch-Augustan Pope. As the "Return to Nature" it has been perceived in James Thomson's Seasons, Lady Winchilsea's Nocturnal Reverie (1714), and John Dyer's Grongar Hill (1726). As the "Awakening of Feeling" it is prepared for by Rousseau and the sentimentalists, and is connected with the bitter-sweet melancholy of Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard (1750), Edward Young's Night Thoughts (1742), and Robert Blair's Grave (1743). A revival of interest in the Middle Ages, and in native folk poetry and culture as against the prevailing classicism and internationalism of the Augustans, appears in the poetry and criticism of Joseph and Thomas Warton, and in Bishop Percy's ballad collection, the Reliques of Ancient Eng. Poetry (1765). The Wartons revived appreciation of Spenser, and Joseph Warton wrote a poem significantly entitled The Enthusiast, or The Lover of Nature. Burns made literature of the Scottish scene and song.

Eng. romanticism has also been variously identified with humanitarianism, democracy, and the doctrine of the perfectibility of man, and organicism in reaction against the Newtonian mechanical universe of science. It should not be confined to any single notion, however, without due caution. Like Eng. neoclassicism, Eng. romanticism is relatively loose, nontheoretical, and tolerant of self-contradictions. Unlike the German romantics, who established a definite critical program, the Eng. generally wrote the poetry first and decided afterward what it signified. Coleridge's account of the purposes of the Lyrical Ballads, which is the nearest to a definite romantic credo, was written long after the poetic facts that occasioned it. The poets were not conscious of forming a romantic school. Nevertheless, romanticism is an intelligible and a useful concept if we take care to make it broad enough. The sense of infinite potentiality, the organic view of the mind and nature, the respect for imagination and poetic truth, the shift from poetry as imitation to poetry as creation, are different aspects of the same object. The main current of romanticism runs in Blake, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley, and Keats, but Scott, Burns, and Byron are also romantics.

The romantic period brought about no absolute changes in versification and poetic genres. The traditional genres remained, although less rigidly distinguished from each other than they had been under the Augustans. The poets returned to the study of Chaucer and the great Elizabethans, and to Milton, whom they now saw in a new light. They reacted against the Augustans but nevertheless made use of them; for romanticism is not a rejection of reason but a resynthesis of reason and feeling, of the head and the heart. Compared to the Augustans they were daring and various in their versification, but they were seldom really radical. The reflective poem was continued, generally in blank verse, by Wordsworth and Coleridge, the sonnet was again practiced, especially by Wordsworth and Keats, the metrical romance was widely current and popular, Byron and Landor wrote classical epigrams, the Elizabethan song was reborn in Blake and Shelley, and the epic was attempted unsuccessfully by Southey in Madoc and Thalaba and inconclusively by Keats in his splendid, unfinished Hyperion (1818). Satire existed, but notably only in Byron's Vision of Judgment (1822) and Don Juan (1819-24). The Augustan interest in manners had generally lapsed, and it was not a satiric time. Perhaps epic was no longer possible, and Don Juan and Wordsworth's Prelude were in their different ways the 19th c. equivalents of epic. The elaborate pastoral elegy, neglected by the Augustans and condemned by Dr. Johnson, reappeared in Shelley's Adonais.

In the latter half of the 18th c. two forgers of literary antiquities achieved poetry in their forgeries: James Macpherson (1736-96), and the pathetic Thomas Chatterton (1752-70), whom later poets set up as the type of poetic genius. These men were more or less isolated from their society, as was Christopher Smart (1722-71), who wrote his astonishing Song to David in a madhouse. The theory has recently been advanced with some earnestness that in the state of literary culture of the late 18th c. insanity was the best equipment for a poet, and Smart, William Cowper, and William Blake have been proposed as instances of proof. Blake (1757-1827) was certainly not mad, but so unprecedented were his personality and art that many of his contemporaries found madness the simplest explanation for them. Blake is today accepted as both a great poet and a great painter, and his radical doctrine of poetic imagination is thoroughly congenial to the modern critic. In Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience Blake is an unsurpassed lyricist, but the poetic status of his gigantic Prophetic Books is still in doubt. There is no doubt about their intellectual energy, but it is not clear that their content is fittingly clothed in form. It is possible, however, that their very magnitude obscures their artistic outlines.

William Wordsworth (1770-1850) and Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772-1834) are the fullest and most characteristic exponents of Eng. romantic poetry. Unlike Blake, who on behalf of imagination denied external reality, Wordsworth and Coleridge believed in the essential unity of the mind and nature. Their joint Lyrical Ballads (1798) introduced a new kind of poetry, and in his 1800 Preface Wordsworth challenged neoclassicism with a daring attack upon poetic diction, demanding for poetry

"a language really spoken by men." Both Wordsworth and Coleridge, however, were well acquainted with the Augustans and their immediate successors, and Wordsworth in particular had many points of kinship with them.

Wordsworth is too prolific for satisfactory summary. In the posthumous Prelude (1850), an autobiography of his poetic development, he turned the action of the epic inward. The Prelude was to introduce a trilogy, The Recluse, which would have spanned the whole relationship of man to nature and society. The existing Recluse is only an introductory fragment. In The Prelude and The Excursion (1814) Wordsworth remade the 18th-c. reflective-topographical poem, transforming nature by his shaping imagination. Coleridge's greatest poetic achievements are The Ancient Mariner, Dejection: an Ode, and the unfinished Kubla Khan and Christabel. He was also happy, however, in the "conversation poem," a relaxed and intimate meditation in blank verse, which owed much to the 18th c. and something to the epistles of Horace. Of this group of poems Frost at Midnight is the most perfect and This Lime-tree Bower My Prison the richest. Lord Byron (1788-1824), arrogant, passionate, and wayward, was Augustan in theory although seldom in practice. Byron, once thought of as the crown and epitome of romanticism, has in the 20th c. sunk lower than his deserts because of his comparative lack of verbal distinction. Since his forte is quasi-oralatorical amplification, he is at his best in bulk. Byron was a hasty and voluminous writer who succeeded too easily and too soon, but his poetry steadily improved throughout his short and crowded career. Aside from Burns he is the only romantic with wit, and with that anticlimactic self-mockery which has been labeled "romantic irony." Chiefly with the aid of the It. tradition of Pulci and Ariosto, he developed the loose narrative romance from the early Childe Harold to his highest achievement in Don Juan.

Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792-1822) combined the pastoral tradition of Petrarch, Spenser, and the Sicilian Greeks with his own social idealism and Platonic thought. In Adonais and his lyrical drama Prometheus Unbound he revitalized myth for contemporary purposes. With Byron and Keats he is a romantic Hellenist. Shelley is a virtuoso of metrics and of language who during most of the 19th c. was considered like Spenser before him the ideal poet's poet, but his passionate idealism has repelled the metaphysical critics of our own time. Shelley, like Blake, conceived of the poet as prophet and law-giver; John Keats (1795-1821) thought of him primarily as an artist, though not in the limited Augustan sense of craftsman. Of all the romantics Keats, at least in his early poetry, attacked the Augustans most forthrightly, and in Endymion (1817) he followed Leigh Hunt's lead in giving narrative speed and variety to the heroic couplet. Later, however, he went to school to Dryden for the couplets of Lamia (1819). Like Shelley Keats revitalized Gr. myth, most fully in the unfinished epic Hyperion (1818-19), which makes use of the entire theogony of the ancients. With Shelley and Wordsworth he mastered Miltonic blank verse, and of all the romantics drew most extensively upon the Elizabethans. Keats aspired to Shakespearean dramatic objectivity, but he returned in The Fall of Hyperion to Spenserian allegory, which he might in time have significantly refashioned. In his six "great odes" Keats developed a new stanza form out of the sonnet and the Spenserian stanza.

Robert Burns (1759-96) is romantic in his democratic sympathies, his attachment to folk tradition, and his gift of imaginative realism, of discerning the unusual within the usual circumstances of ordinary life. Burns inherited a long and not unlearned Scottish tradition, and as his stanza forms often show, something of Fr. as well. Burns's songs are matchless, and his narrative Tam O'Shanter a comic masterpiece. His impressive The Jolly Beggars is an adaptation of the ballad-opera like Gay's famous work. Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832) shared Burns's devotion to Scottish songs and ballads in his Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border (1802-3). Scott's metrical romances of Scottish history, such as The Lay of the Last Minstrel, Marmion, and The Lady of the Lake, are superficial but graceful and stirring. Robert Southey, once a great name, is now read only by scholars, and not even scholars are generally conversant with Campbell and Samuel Rogers. In 1819 Byron challenged the position of the "Lakers," Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey, with "Scott, Rogers, Campbell, Moore, and Crabbe will try / 'Gainst you the question with posterity." Byron was speaking for orthodox and popular taste, but he was mistaken in betting against Wordsworth and Coleridge. Crabbe's genuine virtues lack glamour, and Moore's Oriental Lalla Rookh has gone the way of Southey. Leigh Hunt and John Clare must be neglected here, as also Walter Savage Landor, a considerable but not an influential poet.

Since Dryden there has been little vital relationship between Eng. poetry and the stage. The 18th c. admired Congreve's Mourning Bride (1697) and Addison's Cato, and among the romantics Coleridge's Remorse and Byron's revivals of Restoration heroics enjoyed some success. Shelley's The Cenci (1820) is the finest Eng. poetic drama of the 19th c., but because of its monstrous theme it has never been tested in genuinely public performances. Blake and Keats left fragments of Shakespearean blank-verse plays, and the young Wordsworth made a serious attempt in The Borderers. Among the Victorians Tennyson, Browning, and Swinburne all wrote ambitious plays, but they were essentially untheatrical, despite the efforts of Irving for Tennyson and Macready for Browning.

THE VICTORIANS. The Victorian period should be thought of as running from the 1830's to the eve of World War I, a boundary comparable to the civil wars of the 17th c. The number of competent poets whose work falls within these limits is too great to permit even summary justice in dealing with them. Tennyson stands at one end of the era, and Hardy, who lived till 1928, at the other. Victorian poetry is a continuation of romantic poetry in its feeling for nature, its idealism, its subjectivity, and its variety. Romanticism, however, got there first, and preempted broad territories which the Victorians could only divide and cultivate. The romantics were able, in Coleridge's words, "to bring the whole soul of man into activity" as the Victorians could not; among them the romantic synthesis of heart and head broke down. The new findings of science deprived the Victorians of the romantic creed of nature; Tennyson, Browning, Arnold, Hardy, Housman, and others possess the romantic sensibility without the romantic belief. There was a difference, too, in the poet's relation to his audience. The great mid-Victorians, whatever their private peculiarities, were more central to their society and closer to a general audience than the romantics were, and like the Victorian novelists they incurred special responsibilities and were bound by special conventions by their relation to their audience. The last third of the 19th c. reacted to earlier pieties in the neopaganism of Swinburne, of Edward Fitzgerald's Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, and later on of A. E. Housman; in the Pre-Raphaelites Rossetti and Morris; and in the art-for-art's sake impressionism of the poets of the 1890's, indicated by the shift in taste from Ruskin's art theories to Whistler's. Despite much fine poetry, the result is a derivative and decorative romanticism which brought down upon itself the antiromanticism of the 20th c.

Like the romantics, the Victorians worked in many genres and metrical forms. The long narrative or metrical romance is less prominent than it had been, though far from being completely neglected. Browning's dramatic lyrics and monologues are highly characteristic of his age, as well as being significant for the future. His massive Ring and the Book (1868-69) foreshadows modern prose-fictional experiments in pure point of view. Hardy's dramatically ironic lyrics also owe something to Browning. Tennyson took up the dramatic monologue effectively in Ulysses, and more elaborately in the psychological "monodrama" Maud (1855). Tennyson frequently employed what might be called the lyrical monologue, where a dominant theme is projected through a single character in feeling and pictorial description: Oenone and Tithonus are outstanding examples of the type. Lyrical drama, in the manner of Shelley's Hellas and Prometheus Unbound, is represented among the Victorians in Arnold's Empedocles upon Etna (1852) and Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon (1865), the latter of which led to Sir Gilbert Murray's later translations of Greek tragedy. Hardy's tremendous panorama of the Napoleonic Wars, The Dynasts (1903-8), is of the same general pattern.

The literary ballad of the romantics is refined and attenuated by Rossetti and by William Morris, who added the atmosphere of Keats's La Belle Dame sans Merci to the ballad-refrain and produced musically nostalgic poems like Morris's "Two red roses against the moon"—parodied by C. S. Calverley in "The auld wife sat by the ivied door— / Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese." Keats's influence, continued through Tennyson, was the chief direct contribution of the romantics to Victorianism. His modulations of Miltonic blank verse are evident in the heightened narrative, too densely pictorial and static for epic, of Tennyson's Idylls of the King. Pastoral, a little declined from Wordsworth's Michael, continues in Tennyson's Enoch Arden (1864), and in Arnold's more classical Scholar Gipsy (1853) and George Meredith's intoxicating Love in the Valley (1851, 1878). The sonnet tradition, lapsed after Wordsworth, revived in sonnet-sequences like Rossetti's House of Life (1848-81) and Meredith's Modern Love (1862). Matthew Arnold, with his respect for the classics, tried his hand at epic in the marmoreal Sohrab and Rustum (1853), and at the pastoral elegy in Thyrsis (1863). Tennyson's freer adaptation of the pastoral tradition in In Memoriam (1850) produced a more vital and representative poem, more central to its age.

The Victorians, who valued humor more than wit, were not notable satirists. They were more inclined to exercise their combative impulses in plain personal vituperation. Browning's Caliban upon Setebos and Mr. Sludge the Medium, however, demonstrate a genuine flair for satire, quite un-Augustan in its intricacy and its fondness for the grotesque and particular. Nonsense-verse and parody, not of course previously unknown, appeared as distinct genres in Edward Lear, Lewis Carroll (Charles Lutwidge Dodgson), C. S. Calverley, and W. S. Gilbert. The earlier didactic-reflective poem became a form of vers-de-société in Tennyson's Princess (1847) and Arthur Hugh Clough's The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich (1848); and a rhapsodic oration in Swinburne.

The Victorian giants are Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809-92), Robert Browning (1812-89), Matthew Arnold (1822-88), and Thomas Hardy (1840-1928). Of these Tennyson, though now least influential of the four, is doubtless greatest, in technique, sensibility, and concentrated moral power. Browning's force and originality would be more evident if he had written less. Arnold, with his wide range and keen intelligence, is not, like Tennyson, totally committed to his craft; if judged by the highest standards his poetry is tentative and experimental. Hardy is closest to us in spirit, with his tragic irony, his colloquial and technical vocabulary and his metrical harshness and indecorum, but he is Victorian in his old-fashioned scientific materialism on the one hand and on the other a now-vanished traditional virtus and ancestral piety. Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844-89), who was substantially unpublished till 1918, by his "inscape" and "sprung rhythm" (qq.v.) has influenced much modern poetry. Some critics have placed him in the highest company.

In our own century the Georgian poets included in Sir Edward Marsh's anthologies (1911-22) belong on the whole to the Victorian rather than the modern tradition. Two of them, however, Walter de la Mare (1873-1956) and Robert Graves (1895-) have won major reputations, and D. H. Lawrence must be mentioned. John Masefield's (1878-) merits are perhaps obscured by popularity and official honors, while poets like J. E. Flecker (d. 1915), J. C. Squire, and John Drinkwater for the present have little to say to us. Among the war poets Wilfred Owen is most important. In addition to his intrinsic worth, which goes beyond the humanitarian indignation that gave him impetus, his metrical experiments look toward the future. Rupert Brooke, Edward Thomas, and Isaac Rosenberg were killed like Owen in the war, and Siegfried Sassoon's best verse dated from the war years.

THE MODERNS. Modern poets have been oppressed both by science and society, and have felt a more than usual sense of crisis. The effects of two world wars, the breakdown of cultural tradition, loss of religious faith, the rise of media of mass-communication, and the declining importance of the individual have all conspired to drive the poets into self-conscious isolation. The language of modern poetry is difficult, obscure, and "pure"; the poets have sought to avoid the terms in which our society expresses itself, distrusting them as stereotypes of mass emotions. Rejecting also the poetic diction and rhetoric of the past, they have been forced to invent their own vocabulary, and, in the fragmentation of our culture, their own philosophy and myths as well.

In reaction on the one hand against the denotative language of science and on the other against the debased currency of popular feeling and decadent romanticism, most modern poets have rejected direct statement for indirection, and logical development of ideas for either a "metaphysical" exploration of the logic of metaphor or a "symbolist" development of the multiple associations of words. Both techniques are often to be found in the same modern poem. The result is ambiguity, complexity, and irony, dramatically organized in a structure of opposing tensions which it is the business of the poem to resolve. Modern poetry has had to cope with new doctrines and systems—Marxism, depth psychology, comparative anthropology, neo-Thomism—and has fought to assimilate their internal relationships to systems of poetic structure, and their contents to myths. Myth has assumed overwhelming importance, as a poetic truth independent of the privative truths of science.

The traditional genres still exist in modern poetry, but for the most part they have undergone radical changes. The dramatic lyric has become the norm of poetry, and the longer narrative and reflective poems have largely disappeared. True narrative now seems impossible, since the poet no longer finds significance in external action, but the reflective poem appears in a new guise in Eliot's Waste Land and Four Quartets. W. H. Auden and others have at times made use of the verse-epistle. In its habitual mingling of levity and seriousness, modern poetry continually verges upon satire and vers-de-société, both generally mordant. Eliot has practiced both, and his poetry of the inhuman modern city is descended not only from Baudelaire but from the informal mock-heroics of Swift. His famous comparison in Prufrock of the evening sky to "a patient etherized upon a table" resembles Swift's epic simile in A Description of a City Shower in spirit if not in form:

Meanwhile the South, rising with dabbled wings,

A sable cloud athwart the welkin flings,
That swilled more liquor than it could contain,
And, like a drunkard, gives it up again.

W. B. Yeats and W. H. Auden have written satire, and Auden's In Memory of W. B. Yeats is a carefully modern pastoral elegy.

Modern poetry began with imagism, a movement more notable for its manifestoes than its accomplishments. It aimed at distinctness and precision in imagery and an organic unity obtained by the use of free verse, in reaction to late-romantic haziness and conventionally regular meters. Pure imagism is difficult to adhere to, and few poets did. T. E. Hulme's scanty but provocative work exercised a disproportionately large influence, and D. H. Lawrence's (1885–1930) verse was partly imagist. In 1917 Eliot's Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock struck a new note, and his criticism, his startling and cryptic The Waste Land (1920), along with the publication of Sir Herbert Grierson's anthology of Metaphysical Lyrics and Poems of the Seventeenth Century (1921) ushered in a fully modern poetry, an antiromantic blend of the post-Versailles temperament, the metaphysical poets, and the Fr. symbolists, seasoned with a dash of Freud, Dante, and The Golden Bough. The chief poets of the 1930's were prevailingly post-Eliot, though Auden, C. Day Lewis, Louis MacNeice, and Stephen Spender were all more directly concerned than was Eliot with the contemporary scene and social problems. These were not only postwar but post-Depression poets. W. B. Yeats was active almost up to his death in 1939, but his influence is much less clearly marked than Eliot's.

Dylan Thomas (1914–54) was assisted in establishing his own utterance by the Celtic tradition of verbal splendor, by the poetry of Hopkins, and by Hart Crane's kaleidoscopic associational imagery. The publication of his collected poems shortly after his death was treated as a major literary event. George Barker (1913–) is like Thomas in intensity and violence. Modern poetry escapes the classifying eye as it nears the present, but Sir Herbert Read has fostered the neoromanticism of Henry Treece and others, perhaps closer to surrealism than to traditional romanticism.

The poetic drama has stayed alive, perhaps even gained a little. Early in the century Lascelles Abercrombie and Gordon Bottomley experimented both with diction and staging. Like them, Yeats turned from the photographic realism of the 19th c., until in his latter plays the drama became ritual, symbol, and dance. Eliot has tended in the other direction, from his earlier Family Reunion and Murder in the Cathedral to The Cocktail Party and The Confidential Clerk. He has striven to achieve colloquial dialogue without falling into prose, whereas Christopher Fry has frankly sought Elizabethan color and music in his efforts to restore the nobleness of life.

William Butler Yeats (1865–1939), Thomas Stearns Eliot (1888–), and Wystan Hugh Auden (1907–) are the chief figures of modern Eng. poetry. Some critics would admit Thomas to their company. Yeats is perhaps the greatest of these, Eliot the most influential, and Auden the most widely representative of modern ideas. Yeats, a fine Pre-Raphaelite and then a great modern poet, was able to move without a break from an older tradition, and without losing his singing voice in the process. He is distinctively modern in his absolute rejection of science in favor of myth; like Blake he is a radical of the imagination. Like the romantics, however, he maintains the gospel of the heart, and keeps up a connection with folk ballad and song. His transformation from Pre-Raphaelite to modern was most apparent in The Tower (1928).

An account of T. S. Eliot is an account of modern poetry itself, so marked is his originality, and so powerful his prestige. The prevalence of organization by mythical motif, ironical juxtaposition, and metrical cacophony are all due to his practice of them. Eliot's early theme of the hollow men gradually gave way to meditations upon the hope of Grace, but the manner of his faith is itself an indictment of our ordinary world. Exquisitely austere, his poetry gives the effect of a dramatic struggle for an impossible annunciation.

In W. H. Auden contemporary thought is most comprehensively if not most intensely presented. Dazzlingly versatile and agile, Auden has ranged from the canzone to the popular song, from OE accentual verse to Byronic ottava rima. He reclothes old pieties and values in modern, sometimes modish terms, as when in Petition God is requested to function as a power-and-light company, or as in September 3, 1939 romantic sympathy is indistinguishable from antiromantic Marxism. It grows increasingly unnatural to make absolute distinctions between Eng. and American poetry. It may be that the two will become one in the poetry of Auden, now for some years an American citizen.

ANTHOLOGIES: A Select Collection of Old Plays, ed. R. Dodsley (12 v., 1744, 1780, 1825; 16th- and 17th-c. poetic drama); The Works of the Eng. Poets, from Chaucer to Cowper, ed. A. Chalmers (1810; a famous coll., containing Johnson's Lives); The Eng. Poets, ed. T. H. Ward (5 v., 1880, 1918; from Chaucer to Rupert Brooke, with a famous introd. by Arnold); The Oxford Book of Eng. Verse, 1250-1900, ed. A. T. Quiller-Couch (1900); Georgian Poetry, ed. E. Marsh (6 v., 1912-22); Metaphysical Lyrics and Poems of the 17th C., ed. H. J. C. Grierson (1921; an epoch-making anthol.); Circumference, ed. G. Taggart (1929; a broad interpretation and selection of metaphysical poetry); Understanding Poetry, ed. C. Brooks and R. P. Warren (1938, 1950, 1960; the most influential modern textbook anthol.); Poets of the Eng. Language, ed. W. H. Auden and N. H. Pearson (5 v., 1950; an excellent sel. of poetry from Langland to Yeats); Six Centuries of Great Poetry, ed. R. P. Warren and A. Erskine (1955; concise, well-chosen, and inexpensive); New Poets of England and America, ed. D. Hall et al. (1958); Modern Verse in Eng., ed. D. Cecil and A. Tate (1958); Modern British Poetry, ed. L. Untermeyer (new and enl. ed., 1962); The Oxford Book of 19th-C. Eng. Verse, chosen by J. Hayward (1964).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: T. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry (1774-81; 4 v., 1871; the first comprehensive study); S. Johnson, Lives of the Eng. Poets, ed. G. B. Hill (3 v., 1905; the classic practical crit. of the Augustans, and in the life of Cowley the definition of metaphysical poetry); C. Lamb, Specimens of Eng. Dramatic Poets (1808) in The Works of Charles and Mary Lamb, ed. E. V. Lucas, iv (1904); S. T. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria (1817, ed. J. Shawcross, 2 v., 1907; see esp. chs. 14, 15, 16); W. Hazlitt, "Lectures on the Eng. Poets" (1818; The Complete Works, ed. P. P. Howe, v, 1932); "Lectures on the Dramatic Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth" (1820; Complete Works, vi; the romantic viewpoint); W. J. Courthope, A Hist. of Eng. Poetry (6 v., 1895-1910; the most extensive general hist., ending with the romantic movement); J. M. Berdan, Early Tudor Poetry, 1485-1547 (1920); R. D. Havens, The Influence of Milton on Eng. Poetry (1922); G. Hughes, Imagism and the Imagists (1931; the authoritative treatment); Wilson (an objective examination of symbolist influence upon modern poetry); D. Bush, Mythology and the Renaissance Tradition in Eng. Poetry (1932); Mythology and the Romantic Trad. in Eng. Poetry (1937); Science and Eng. Poetry (1950); Eng. Poetry (1952; an excellent brief survey from Chaucer to the 1950's); J. C. Ransom, The World's Body (1938; exposition of metaphysical poetics); C. Brooks, Modern Poetry and the Trad. (1939); The Well Wrought Urn (1947; Eng. poetry and the metaphysical trad.); D. Daiches, Poetry and the Modern World (1940); B. I. Evans, Trad. and Romanticism (1940; reconciliations of classic and romantic tendencies in Eng. poetry); G. N. Shuster, The Eng. Ode from Milton to Keats (1940); F. A. Pottle, The Idiom of Poetry (1941; periods of poetry treated as shifts of sensibility); R. P. Warren, "Pure and Impure Poetry," KR, 5 (1943); J. Miles, The Continuity of Poetic Language: Studies in Eng. Poetry from the 1540's to the 1940's (1951; close studies of the vocabulary of periods); D. Stauffer, The Nature of Poetry (1946; argues against a rigid "tradition" of Eng. poetry); H. J. C. Grierson and J. C. Smith, A Critical Hist. of Eng. Poetry (1947; a good l-v. hist.); Tuve (emphasizes contemp. rhetorical and philos. bases); A. Warren, Rage for Order (1948; techniques of various periods); T. S. Eliot, Selected Essays (new ed., 1950; influential discussions of the Elizabethans, the Jacobean, the metaphysicals, and the general trad. of Eng. poetry); C. S. Lewis, Eng. Lit. in the 16th C. Excluding Drama (1954); A. Alvarez, Stewards of Excellence. Studies in Modern Eng. and Am. Poetry (1958); D. Daiches, Crit. Hist. of Eng. Lit. (2 v., 1960); J. Press, Rule and Energy: Trends in British Poetry Since the 2d World War (1963). R.H.F.

Oft Scýld Scefing	sceaþena þreatum,
monegum mægþum	méodsetla ofteah,
egsode eorlas	syþþan árest wearþ
feascraft funden	he þaes frofre gebad . . .

ENGLISH PROSODY. It is more accurate to speak of Eng. prosodies than of Eng. prosody, for, historically considered, the phenomena of Eng. versification are too manifold and complex to be explained according to a single metrical system, although some scholars and critics have expended whole careers in unhappy attempts to show that all Eng. verse of whatever period manifests one prosodic principle. Only the following three feeble generalizations would seem to hold true for all Eng. verse: (1) Because Eng. is a more markedly accentual language than the Romance tongues, stress has generally played a more notable part in the structure of Eng. verse than it has in many continental poetries; (2) the Eng. language, when metered by whatever system (see METER), appears to flow most pleasingly and naturally in ascending rhythms (q.v.); and (3) most Eng. poetry seems naturally to seek a line-length neither short nor long: the most "natural" line-length in Eng. would appear to be one of 4 or 5 isochronous units, as in the O. Eng. 4-stress accentual line or the Shakespearean "iambic pentameter" (it is well to remember that about three-fourths of all Eng. poetry is in blank verse). Other than sharing these few common characteristics, the poetries of various periods manifest very few prosodic similarities, and their unique characteristics are best seen if we isolate them philologically.

OLD ENGLISH (ca. 500-ca. 1100). The powerful accents of the OE language supply a natural basis for a heavily accentual prosody (see METER) in which sense rhythm, at every point, provides the meter. The standard OE line consists of 4 strongly stressed syllables arranged, together with any number of unstressed syllables, in 2 hemistichs (or half lines) of 2 stresses each. Stressed syllables frequently alliterate, and stichic rather than strophic structure prevails. The 2 hemistichs are separated by an invariable medial caesura (q.v.). "Rests" and the occasional omission of stressed syllables (especially in the second hemistich) provide a sort of syncopation or counterpoint (q.v.) which keeps the prosodic structure varied and expressive (see Pope, The Rhythm of Beowulf). The following example from Beowulf (lines 4-7) shows the "normal" line structure (second line) and the possibilities of variation through rest and omission of stress (third and fourth lines):

Pope has conjectured that, in recitation, the "normal" position of stresses was signaled by a chord on a harp; this constant "beat" would provide a sort of metrical underpinning against which rhythmic variations dictated by rhetorical emphasis would be strikingly noticeable. Despite its apparent simplicity, OE prosody is an instrument of extremely subtle expressiveness: its variations from the "ideal" meter and its returns to it give the rhythm a constantly shifting surface of great sophistication. (See also ENG. POETRY; OLD GERMANIC PROSODY.)

MIDDLE ENGLISH (ca. 1100-ca. 1500): After the Norman Conquest, the rapid changes in the language (loss of inflection, Romance incursions into what had been primarily a Germanic vocabulary, the multiplication of dialects) quickly complicated the principles of Eng. prosody. Although it persisted for a time in the new language, the OE accentual line, with its varying number of unaccented syllables, is gradually abandoned in favor of a line in which syllabic numeration becomes, for the first time, one of the structural criteria. One can observe the phenomenon of the 2 hemistichs of the OE line transforming themselves into the alternating 4- and 3-stress lines of the ballad meter (q.v.). Strophic construction makes inroads on stichic, and elaborate "tail-rhyme" stanzas begin to appear. The strongly Germanic accentual quality of the language begins to weaken slightly, and instead of a prosody of powerful and emphatic pressures at equal times we find a prosody more conscious of the qualitative similarities between stressed and unstressed syllables. The linguistic complexities of the period created a situation in which many unique prosodies are actually to be found simultaneously. We find (1) a continuation of OE prosody adapted (often by the addition of assonance and rhyme) to an increasingly uninflected language; (2) accentual-syllabic rhyming verse in lines of 4 stresses, gradually lengthening to become the heroic couplet (q.v.) of Chaucer and Lydgate; (3) accentual verse in hexameter line-lengths with a strong pseudo-classical air; and (4) a sort of "sprung rhythm" (q.v.), especially in songs and other lyrical pieces set to music. Out of all this complication, and with the relative stabilization of language and dialects, the decasyllabic, 5-stress line of Chaucer gradually emerged, and this line provides the basis for Renaissance developments.

MODERN ENGLISH (ca. 1500-); 16th and 17th C.: Three circumstances are of great importance in Renaissance prosody: (1) The Eng. language attained a period of relative stability; (2) the widespread admiration of the classics of antiquity served to focus attention on the apparently unsystematic and occasionally rather coarse quality of earlier Eng. metric; and (3) rhetorical and metrical criticism, in the manner of the ancients, began to be written and to be read. These circumstances gave impetus to that stream of systematic and academic prosodic speculation and dogmatizing which has continued without break to our own times.

The Renaissance admiration for Gr. meters impelled one school to attempt to import into Eng. practice Gr. quantitative theory, and theorists, dilettantes, and poets like Cheke, Ascham, Sidney, Dyer, Drant, Spenser, Greene, Campion, Harvey, and Stanihurst labored, with varying degrees of seriousness and success, to imitate the classical heroic hexameter or the Gr. lyric measures. Since the poet was obliged, however, to remember constantly the predetermined "quantities" of the syllables he was using, composition was a laborious, academic-theoretical business, and little work of any natural virtue resulted (see METER).

Along with this impulse to "refine" Eng. poetry by making it mimic Gr. rhythms went the development of the Chaucerian accentual-syllabic pentameter line as a vehicle for dramatic expression. Both Marlowe and Shakespeare use it with consummate mastery, calmly inventing new tonalities when they have exhausted the old, and even the lesser dramatists of the period reveal, through their instinctive feeling of comfort within it, that this is going to be, for whatever reason, The Eng. Line. In lyric verse, the song writers, often obliged to fit words to preexisting airs, produce free accentual lines which foreshadow the sprung rhythm (q.v.) of Hopkins, and lyric practitioners like Donne, Crashaw, Herbert, and Marvell make of the iambic tetrameter or pentameter line a vehicle for wit, shock, and ecstasy by shifting or adding stresses boldly.

And yet, in the midst of all this freedom and inventiveness, signs of an impulse toward greater regulation and predictability are apparent: Daniel's Defense of Rhyme (?1603) is a conservative document which anticipates the practice of Denham and Waller, and 20th-c. students (Bridges, Sprott) have shown that Milton, in Paradise Lost, despite the expressive variation or omission of stresses, was adhering consciously to a fixed decasyllabic limitation. The end of the Renaissance thus sees a movement away from the metrical spontaneity of the Elizabethans; prosody, both in theory and practice, is now moving toward an ideal of strict syllabic limitation and relative predictability of stress placement.

18th C.: Post-Restoration prosody reveals strong Fr. syllabic influence: the number of syllables instead of the number of stresses becomes the essential criterion of the poetic line. Theorists like Edward Bysshe, Richard Bentley, and Henry Pemberton are to be found advocating rigid regularity in the heroic line, and poets like Richard Glover are to be seen composing strictly "ideal" (i.e., regular) accentual-syllabic verse. This lust for regularity and "smoothness" is clearly one expression of the orderly and rationalistic impulses of the age.

Soon after 1740, however, a reaction to metrical rigidity manifests itself in the prosodic writing of Samuel Say, John Mason, and Joshua Steele. These theorists point out that monotony results from iambic lines long continued without trisyllabic substitution, and that the shifting or omission of stresses is an expressive tool which the poet who wishes to tap all resources of poetry cannot do without. The writings of this "preromantic" school advocate a return to "sense rhythms" after the predominance of "metrical rhythms" earlier in the century, and the positions of this school issue from an early "romantic" aesthetic of impulse, spontaneity, and surprise rather than from an Augustan aesthetic of stability, reason, and quietude. By opposing the poetic contractions (q.v.) required by a syllabic prosody, the late 18th-c. theorists sought to create an "expandable" line which could swell or diminish expressively according to the rhetorical pressure within it.

Unlike the sparse prosodic speculation of the Renaissance, that of the 18th c. is copious; it is also relatively systematic, and, under the influence of Locke, remarkably "psychological." Throughout the period, the practice of the poets substantially corroborates the findings of the prosodists: although such masters as Pope and Johnson shift stresses freely and instinctively, even they never violate the strict syllabic limitation, and the lines of most of the lesser manufacturers of the heroic couplet will be found to be strikingly regular in the disposition of stressed and unstressed syllables.

19th C.: The major phenomenon in 19th c. Eng. prosody is a rejection of strict accentual-syllabism and a reaching toward accentualism. Coleridge, in Christabel, publicly practiced for a wide audience the principles of trisyllabic substitution advocated a half-century earlier by Say, Mason, and Steele. As a result of this new accentualism, the Eng. pentameter line tends to lose its formal, Augustan oratorical tone and to take on a tone of almost colloquial intimacy (The Prelude, Fra Lippo Lippi). In prosodic writing, accentualism soon expressed itself in musical theories and scansions (Lanier), and the rise to fashion of Germanic philology, which helped remind prosodists that Eng. was solidly a Germanic tongue, fanned the accentual fires. The development of "free" or "cadenced" (qq.v.) verse in the middle of the century was generally an expression of impatience with the metrical constraints of the previous century. Triple rhythms, in music as well as in poetry, are attempted more and more in "serious" works (Longfellow, Poe). But despite these new departures, many prominent poets (Tennyson, Arnold) continue to exercise themselves in what is fundamentally the line of the Augustans, with its syllabic limitation and conservative placement of stresses. W. J. Stone, with his On the Use of Classical Metres in English (1898), attempted to interest the more academic spirits in quantitative prosody once more, but the decay of classical learning and enthusiasm deterred all but Robert Bridges from experimenting seriously with quantitative poems. Gerard Manley Hopkins was moved to revive the medieval and Renaissance technique of over stressing called "sprung rhythm" (q.v.), and it is notable that this technique can be thought of only in a strongly accentual prosodic climate.

The numerous 19th-c. divagations from accentual-syllabic prosody and the general air of quest and experimentation during the period suggest widespread dissatisfaction with the sound of conventional Eng. verse, and this dissatisfaction may have some philological cause. For example, the gradual separation of the Am. from the British language may have had something to do with the new metrical tonalities which the 19th c. sometimes frenetically sought; so may the gradual replacement of classical by modern language studies in schools and universities. Whatever the causes of the dissatisfaction, it is clearly an expression of the age's lust for reform and its commitment to the idea of progress.

20th C.: Most of the prosodic mutations of interest in the 20th c. have been associated with the United States. During the twenties and thirties, the work of Pound and Williams tightened the freely cadenced line of Whitman and made of it a witty instrument in the short poem. Eliot's poetic dramas have used subtle accentual lines with great skill, and Auden has written accentual, accentual-syllabic, and syllabic poems with equal facility. But even after such bold experiments as the "spatial cadences" of E. E. Cummings, the incremental variation of Stein, and the cadenced syllabism of Marianne Moore, 20th-c. poetry still continues the 19th century's quest for new prosodies to express an alarmingly changed social, political, and intellectual order.

The failure of many of the experiments of the twenties and thirties to arrive at any very profoundly expressive mode of metric has impelled many post-World War II poets to return to stable lyric measures: Wilbur, Shapiro, Lowell, and others have had happy results with traditional accentual-syllabic lines, and a return to conservatism in metrical structure seems apparent in the pages of little magazines and literary reviews. How closely this return to conservatism in prosody is connected with the similar movement in contemporary politics and intellectual life it would be hazardous to say. It will be obvious, however, to those who have seen in history the intimate alliance between metrics and the general intellectual and emotional tendencies of an age, that no prosodic phenomenon is devoid of wider meaning if only we can learn to read it correctly.

The area of prosodic investigation has been entered in our own time by the so-called acoustic or linguistic prosodists, who, with elaborate machinery (for example, the kymograph and the oscillograph), are trying to discover what actually goes on in the oral delivery of verse. Although this characteristically technological 20th-c. approach to problems which have traditionally been investigated prescriptively or subjectively has yet to demonstrate its full usefulness to metrical study, it has undeniably laid the groundwork for much valuable future study. The very fact that even the machine has finally been called to the assistance of the prosodist helps indicate the continuing pressing interest in the elusive and mysterious prosodies which emerge from Eng. poetry.†

Saintsbury, Prosody; T. S. Omond, Eng. Metrists (1921); R. Bridges, Milton's Prosody (rev. ed., 1921); L. Abercrombie, Eng. Prosody (1923); G. R. Stewart, The Technique of Eng. Verse (1930); G. W. Allen, Am. Prosody (1934); E. Olson, General Prosody (1938); J. C. Ransom, The New Crit. (1941), pp. 254-69, 297-330; J. C. Pope, The Rhythm of Beowulf (1942); M. M. Holloway, Prosodic Theory of Hopkins (1947); K. Shapiro, A Bibliog. of Modern Prosody (1948); G. L. Hendrickson, "Elizabethan Quantitative Hexameters," rq, 28 (1949); G. L. Trager and H. L. Smith, Jr., An Outline of Eng. Structure (1951); P. F. Baum, "Eng. Versification," in Shipley; S. E. Sprott, Milton's Art of Prosody (1953); P. Fussell, Jr., Theory of Prosody in 18th-C. England (1954); "Eng. Verse and What It Sounds Like," kr, 18 (1956; articles by J. C. Ransom and others); R. Beum, "Syllabic Verse in Eng.," Prairie Schooner, 31 (1957); E. L. Epstein and T. Hawkes, Linguistics and Eng. Prosody (1959); J. Thompson, The Founding of Eng. Metre (1961).

P.F.

† In Supplement, see also AMERICAN POETIC SCHOOLS AND TECHNIQUES (CONTEMPORARY); PROJECTIVE VERSE.

ENGLYN. A group of Welsh meters. The englyn unodl union (direct monorhyme e.), which first appeared in the 12th c., has become the most popular of all the "strict" meters. This kind of e. has 30 syllables, the "shaft" having 16, and the "wings" 14. In the classical period there is always a pause after the 5th syllable. The main rhyme first occurs on the 7th, 8th or 9th, and then on the 16th, 23rd, and 30th. The gair cyrch ("reaching-out word," cf. Gerard Manley Hopkins's "out-riders") which extends from the 1st main rhyme to the 10th syllable need only be related to what follows by means of light alliteration, whereas strict cynganedd (q.v.) has been observed in all other parts since the 15th c. Uneven end stress, as in cywydd, is the rule in the "wings" since the 13th c.—Morris-Jones; Parry.

D.M.L.

ENJAMBEMENT or enjambment. The completion, in the following poetic line, of a clause or other grammatical unit begun in the preceding line; the employment of "run-on" lines which carry the sense of a statement from one line to another without rhetorical pause at the end of the line:

... Yet I know her for A spleeny Lutheran ...
(Shakespeare. Henry VIII, 3.2)

The term is also applied to the carrying over of meaning from one couplet or stanza to the next.

E., a device widely used by the Elizabethans and by Milton, fell into disrepute in 18th-c. poetry but was revived by the romantic poets, who saw in it a symbol of liberation from neo-classical rules. Keats's Endymion supplies some extreme examples of e.

The technique of e. has been a subject of controversy in Fr. poetry. Rarely found in OF poetry, e. was widely used in the 15th and especially 16th c. (Ronsard and the Pléiade). In the 17th c. it was frowned on by Malherbe and, later, by Boileau. These neoclassical authorities, however, allowed its use in certain circumstances—in decasyllabic poetry and in the less "noble" genres such as comedy and fable. Occasionally, e. occurs even in tragedy (e.g., Racine, Britannicus). Since André Chénier, e. has been accepted in all genres. The device was exploited to the full by Victor Hugo, whose famous e. at the beginning of Hernani ("Serait-ce déjà lui? C'est bien à l'escalier // Dérobé. . .") had all the force of a manifesto. E. is a freely used technique of modern poetry.—M. Grammont, Petit traité de versification française (5e éd. revue, 1924).

ENOPLIUS (Gr. "in arms," "martial"). In Gr. lyric, verse of the scheme

— — — — —

The catalectic form of the e. is the prosodiacus (see PROSODION).—Dale.

K.M.A.

ENSALADA. A Sp. poem consisting of lines and strophes of varying lengths and rhyme schemes, generally depending on the music to which the poem is sung. According to P. Henríquez Ureña (La versificación irregular en la poesía castellana, 2d ed., 1933), the earliest known e. is one by Fray Ambrosio Montesinos (d. ca. 1512) found in Barbieri's Cancionero musical de los siglos XV y XVI (no. 438). The e. apparently was never very popular.—Navarro.

D.C.C.

ENSENHAMEN. A didactic poem in Old Prov., ordinarily composed in a nonlyric meter, such as rhymed couplets, and designed to give advice or instruction to an individual or a class of persons. Some of these poems are like little books of etiquette. Others are addressed to the jongleurs (q.v.) who sang the poets' compositions, telling them the things they should know and how they should perform their task. The knowledge expected is doubtless exaggerated, but the poems have a certain interest for what they reveal about contemporary taste in literature and other matters.—J. Anglade, Hist. sommaire de la litt. méridionale (1921).

F.M.C.

ENVELOPE. The e. pattern is a special case of repetition (q.v.) A line or stanza will recur in the same or nearly the same form so as to enclose other material. A line or significant phrase may thus enclose a stanza or a whole poem; a complete stanza may be repeated to enclose a poem or a section of a larger poem. The effect of the e. pattern is to emphasize the unity of the enclosed portion, to indicate that elaborations or parallels of statement have not departed from the original focus. Also the repeated words carry an added richness and meaning from the intervening lines, sometimes acquiring an almost incantatory force. The e. pattern is distinguished from the refrain (q.v.) in that the repetitions here affect the enclosed material rather than the material preceding each occurrence. The single-line e., as it applies to a stanza, may be seen in both stanzas of James Joyce's I Would in That Sweet Bosom Be, as it applies to an entire poem, in the Eighth Psalm or Whitman's Joy, Shipmate, Joy. A stanza used as an e. for an entire poem may be seen in Blake's The Tyger and in Keats's The Mermaid Tavern.—R. B. Lewis, Creative Poetry (1931); G. W. Allen, Am. Prosody (1935). S.F.F.

ENVOI, envoy. (Prov. tornada; G. Geleit). A short concluding stanza found in certain Fr. poetic forms, such as the ballade and the chant royal. In the ballade it normally consists of 4 lines, in the chant royal of either 5 or 7, thus repeating the metrical pattern of the half-stanza which precedes it, as well as the rhyme scheme of that half-stanza. The e. also repeats the refrain which runs through the poem (e.g., Villon's "Mais ou sont les neiges d'antan?"). In its typical use of some form of address, such as "Prince," the e. shows a trace of its original function, which was to serve as a kind of postscript dedicating the poem to a patron or other important person. However, its true function during the great period of the OF forms was to serve as a pithy summing-up of the poem. For this reason the Prov. troubadours called their envoys tornadas (returns). Among the Eng. poets, Scott, Southey, and Swinburne employed envoys. Chaucer wrote a number of ballades (e.g., Lenvoy de Chaucer a Scogan), in which he departs from the customary form by closing with an e. which is equal in length to a regular stanza of the poem, usually his favorite rhyme royal (q.v.).

EPANADIPLOSIS. See ANADIPLOSIS.

EPANALEPSIS (Gr. "a taking up again"). 1. Anciently most often defined as the repetition of a word or words after an intervening word or words, whether (a) for emphasis (Rutilius Lupus, ?1st c. B.C., De figuris sententiarum et elocutionis 1.11, cited C. T. Ernesti, Lexicon technologiae Graecorum rhetoricae, 1795), e.g., ". . . Hell at last / Yawning received them whole, and on them closed, / Hell their fit habitation . . ." (Milton, Paradise Lost 6.874-76); or (b) for mere clarity, as to resume a construction after a lengthy parenthesis (Demetrius, 1st c. A.D.?, On Style 196), e.g., "Say first, for heaven hides nothing from thy view, / Nor the deep tract of hell, say first what cause / Moved our grand parents . . ." (Paradise Lost 1.27-29). 2. By modern authorities, most often and most usefully defined as the ending of a sentence with its own opening word or words; so Abraham Fraunce, The Arcadian Rhetorike, 1588 (D3^r) who quotes for illustration, "Multa super Priamo rogians, super Hectore multa" (Aeneid 1.750), and "They love indeed who quake to say they love" (Sir Philip Sidney, Astrophel and Stella, sonnet 54); so also Henry Peacham, The Garden of Eloquence, 1593, p. 46; and others. Various types have been distinguished in Walt Whitman; more than 40 per cent of the lines of the final version of Leaves of Grass employ

e. of one sort or another. Sometimes the device enters into the texture of an entire passage (or poem) affecting a high percentage of the words. (A. N. Wiley, "Reiterative Devices in Leaves of Grass," AL, 1 [1929]). R.O.E.; H.B.

EPANAPHORA. See ANAPHORA.

EPIC. HISTORY. See NARRATIVE POETRY.

EPIC. THEORY. Already in the Heroic Age of Greece the e. bard and his disciples and imitators were marked as men possessing peculiar qualities of memory and vision. In fact the purveyors and refurbishers of popular tradition concerning gods and heroes, they were credited with being able, by special inspiration, to transcend the limitations of sense (some are said to have been blind), and to rescue the past from oblivion, restoring it to life and moving their hearers to pity and fear. The early philosophers, e.g., Heraclitus, Empedocles, and even Democritus, agree that there is something more than natural about such faculties as respects their origin, their working, and its effect upon men.

There was no speculation on the proper nature of e. until its usefulness had been questioned. Socrates, though he steadily testified to the exemplary value of the old poems and offered no other explanation of Homer's felicitous expression and greatness of mind than divine prompting, began to find fault with the poets as thinkers and historians. He noted in them error in fact and warned against their more general ignorance. In the Republic Plato, his pupil, began an attack particularly on e. and drama. Tragedy and comedy Plato disapproved because they imitate and cause us to imitate—that is, they bring to life before us all kinds of men and women, encouraging us to identify ourselves with them indiscriminately. He allowed e. partial merit as a mixed kind, imitative but also narrative. He seems to have thought that as narrative it was more safely and clearly discernible as opinionative and interpretative; its audience was less likely to be taken in. Plato, however, decried the effect of the Homeric poems on the young; they reported scandal of the gods and suggested weakness in the heroes. At the end of his career, in the more tolerant vein of the Laws, he argued that his elder citizenry would find more pleasure in e. than in other forms of literature, perhaps because its leisurely pace and patent artifice would appeal more to them than the intensities and realism of tragedy.

Aristotle in the Poetics replied to Plato's strictures against imitative poetry. He claimed for e. and tragedy a convincingness beyond ordinary probability and verisimilitude and a moral purposefulness in the pleasure they could create; both imitate men as they are and as they ought to be; both are concerned with actions consequent upon good moral choices, but also with errors and frailties, with happiness and unhappiness; both characteristically present outstanding and noble people, for such are famous for their deeds and for their suffering. The actions treated have clearly defined beginnings and ends with middle parts amplified by appropriate episodes; more of the latter may feasibly be used in e. In e. simultaneous happenings may be consecutively developed. Although its imaginative length is unlimited, in reading or in recitation e. may conveniently approximate a dramatic trilogy; too often it is unduly prolonged and hence "diluted" in effect. Tragedy and e. normally center in one man, but it is a mistake to show the whole life from beginning to end; instead, an important segment should be chosen for emphasis. The movement may be either simple and straightforward, or (preferably) complicated by recognition scenes and reversals of direction. Stress may be on character or on suffering. E. more effectively stimulates amazement as a response; improbabilities may more plausibly be introduced in it since it is less obligated than tragedy to sustain the illusion of actuality. Finally, e., unlike tragedy, uses throughout a single meter (dactylic hexameter), which is suited to narrative for its dignity and to figurative language for its flexibility. Aristotle's remarks on e. show no recognition of it, in contrast with tragedy, as being peculiarly interpretative of life, nor does he conceive it to be the vehicle of propaganda for general ideas.

Fuller recognition of the achievement and potentialities of e. was not possible until a poet able to challenge the Homeric epics demonstrated his powers. Virgil's Aeneid is a creative imitation of the Iliad and the Odyssey, but its differences from its predecessors are as important as its similarities. It is deliberately conceived, as they had not been, to give meaning to the destiny of a people, asserting the implications of their history and recognizing the significance of contemporary events in relation to the past. Although Virgil left no theoretical writings, his purposes, which are common to his age, are voiced by other writers. Horace, for example, sensed Rome's civilizing role, understood her traditions as Virgil did; he repeatedly testifies also to his regard for Homer and the Greeks, believing their precedent in literature ought to be imitated. Distant echoes have been found in Horace's Ars Poetica (13 B.C.?) of Aristotle's admonitions on probability and on consistency in characterization. He adds little to e. (and dramatic) theory beyond the observation that action should begin in the midst of things (in medias res), an opinion which may echo distantly Aristotle's rejection of the tedious biographical poem. Many of these ideas appear in Cicero (De Oratore, 55 B.C.) and Quintilian (Institutio Oratoria, A.D. 93). The former, sketching the ideal character of oratory, no doubt encouraged reflection on the nature of the literary genres. The latter, comparing Virgil with Homer, scarcely acknowledged his countryman's inferiority, applauding his deliberate workmanship and preferring his steady excellence to the purple passages of the Iliad and the Odyssey.

In the 1st c. A.D. Lucan's Pharsalia broke with tradition by taking events of recent and actual history as its subject and dispensing with supernatural "machinery"—the manifest intervention of gods and goddesses in human affairs. Objection to this new direction was voiced by Petronius in a well-known definition of epic's proper content, as follows: "Things actually done are not to be put into verses, for historians treat them far better; instead, through enigmas, interventions of gods, and a fictional intertwining of purposes (fabulosum sententiarum tormentum), the free spirit is to rush; so there is evidenced rather the vaticination of a raging mind than the testimony of scrupulous statement by witnesses" (Satyricon 118). Lucan had no immediate followers, whereas a series of poets—Silius Italicus, Valerius Flaccus, and Statius—imitated Virgilian style and episode. In the 4th c., commentators like Servius Honoratus and Macrobius glorified Virgil.

In the Middle Ages occasional restatements of earlier opinions occur. Isidore of Seville (Etymologiae, 6th c.) defines heroic verse as being so named "because in it the affairs and deeds of brave men are narrated (for heroes are spoken of as men practically supernatural and worthy of Heaven on account of their wisdom and bravery); and this meter precedes others in status." In unconscious defiance of Aristotle, Suidas (10th c.) confuses e. with history on the ground that in the manner of history it narrates in verse the life of a man who deserves the name of hero. Classifications of the kinds of literature sometimes allow for e. as a mixed form combining drama and narrative (so Diomedes, Isidore, and Bede), but in the 12th c. Vincent of Beauvais and John of Garland know nothing of e. as a genre. The continuing veneration of Virgil as sage and poet, though sometimes degenerating into superstition, culminates in Dante's idealization of his character in the Divine Comedy (begun in 1307).

In the It. Renaissance, Vida celebrates Virgil rapturously in his Ars Poetica (1527). Though the subject of this work is heroic verse (carmen heroicum), it is not really theoretical; Vida's practical advice to poets largely derives from Horace and Quintilian. His Christiad (1535), in the breadth of its conception, is profoundly imitative of Virgil. Theoretical discussion of the e. did not begin until the rediscovery of Aristotle's Poetics. In the 13th c. Roger Bacon had warned that the Romans were unoriginal thinkers and had noted the desirability of study of their Gr. sources, including for literary theory the Poetics. There was no wide knowledge of the work until the Gr. text was printed (1508) and translations into L. (1498, 1536) and It. (1549) had appeared. Trissino's Poetica (1528-63), citing important passages from Aristotle as criteria, began a discussion of the achievement of It. literature to date. His Italia Liberata (1547) is modeled on Homer and written in It. in blank verse (versi sciolti).

There followed an intense controversy, engaging the suddenly numerous critics, over the success of such epic-like poems as those of Boiardo and Ariosto and the medieval chansons and romances from which they in part derived. Of this Aristotle was the acknowledged arbiter, though his preference of tragedy over e. was disregarded. A few representative names can be introduced here. Giraldo Cinthio (Discorsi intorno al comporre de i Romanzi, 1554) attempted to justify medieval and recent as well as ancient practice by distinguishing three heroic forms: e. (as defined by Aristotle), romance (many invented actions of many men), and biographical poem (the whole history of one man). Minturno (L'Arte Poetica, 1564) argued that all heroic poetry, in contrast with tragedy, should move men to the admiration of extraordinary virtue. He advocated that the subject matter of the romances, including their Christian marvels and machinery, should now become the materials of a regular classical e. He is responsible for the notion that the action of e. should be limited to one year; others stipulated one month or the length of a summer's military campaign. Castelvetro (Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata et sposta, 1576) broke with Aristotle in maintaining that e. may handle the various acts of a single person or many people, and even the action of a whole race. It is imaginative history. According to Torquato Tasso (Discorsi del Poema Epico, 1594) e. should concern itself with heroic acts of Christian knighthood performed in the medieval past. He would leave to tragedy the pity of human frailty and the disasters of fortune; it is also made responsible for the punishment of the wicked. As for the structure of e., he calls for unity in diversity; an e. may contain as much material (but only as much) as a man can retain in memory while reading.

Although in France by the middle of the 16th c. the writers of the Pléiade were calling for a national e. on a patriotic theme and in the vernacular, there was little contribution to the theoretical discussion of that subject for a hundred years. Then appeared the pronouncements of Mambrun (de Poemate Epico, 1652), Scudéry (Preface to Alaric, 1674), Rapin (Réflexions sur la Poétique, 1674), Boileau (Art Poétique, 1674), Le Bossu (Traité du poème épique, 1675), and the rest, inspired by the high-flown idealism of the age and aimed at the codification of rules. The consensus of their views was that e. is the most lofty undertaking of the human imagination; it demands in the poet both inspiration and deliberation. It must be based on a moral proposition (fable) to be illustrated allegorically in a unified action and didactically inculcated. Its delineation of character presents man in his perfection as understood in Christian conceptions of valor and virtue. And these qualities must be rewarded in the end, preferably by happiness. Decorum, i.e., truth to type in characterization and suitability in all things, is to be faithfully preserved. Nothing may violate verisimilitude or probability, although the marvelous shall be introduced to create awe and reverence. The whole is to constitute a pleasing imitation of Nature in her dignity and truth. It has been ironically observed that during the period (1650-70) when these principles were being most emphatically enunciated, the Fr. produced forty epics, all of them failures. Neoclassicism, however infeasible for poets, thus reached its theoretical apex.

Certain difficulties were discovered by the Fr. themselves. For example, Boileau could not stomach the use of Christian machinery and argued that pagan divinities and demons have an appropriateness for poetry which renders them inoffensive. And Le Bossu, faithful to Aristotle, argued that defects might be present even in virtuous heroes, his reason being that something is to be learned from the bad as well as from the good.

Fr. neoclassicism was imported into England with the Restoration, its dogmas on the e. being purveyed by such writers as Davenant (Preface to Gondibert, 1650), Hobbes (Answer to Davenant's Preface, 1650, and Preface to A Translation of Homer, 1675), Cowley, (Preface to Poems, 1656, and Preface to The Cutter of Coleman Street, 1663), Dryden (An Apology for Heroic Poetry, 1677), and Mulgrave (Essay upon Poetry, 1682). Most of the Eng. critics add something of their own. Davenant proposes that e. should approximate drama as closely as possible, even to the point of being divided into five books (acts) and several cantos (scenes). Cowley rejects "mad stories" of ancient gods and medieval knights in favor of biblical subjects. The reflections of Milton on e. themes and form show that he was generally more influenced by It. than by Fr. thought. He suggested a distinction between diffuse and brief e. (Reason of Church Government, 1642). Dryden defends the heroic play as resembling e. in loftiness of conception and nobility of characterization. On the e. Dryden mainly repeats Le Bossu, the chief authority of the time, but he diverges in advocating absolute perfection in the hero; he acknowledges, to be sure, that the public virtues of rulers and heroes are more appropriate than the private virtues of piety. For epic machinery he proposes that poets use "Guardian Angels." Dryden is perhaps the first to argue that e. should strive for that sublimity of expression which "Longinus" had found in Homer. Addison in his Spectator essays (1711-12) discovers this quality in Milton.

The 18th c. in England sees a general assault on the authority of Fr. neoclassicism, and the "rules" (q.v.) are subjected to a more analytical criticism. The attack on Le Bossu is led by Pope himself in his burlesque Art of Sinking (1727-28). Reverberations are heard in such writers as Joseph Warton (Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope, 1756), Murphy (Gray's Inn Journal, no. 92, 1756), Gibbon (Critical Observations on the Aeneid, 1770), Hayley (Essay on Epic Poetry, 1782)—but most impressively in Kames (Elements of Criticism, 1762) and Johnson (Life of Milton, 1779). Kames, indeed, questions whether the forms of poetry can be distinguished on a theoretical basis. In the main, nevertheless, the critics hope merely to broaden and clarify the definition of e. Fielding (Preface to Joseph Andrews, 1742) would extend the concept to include all narrative, whether tragic or comic in spirit, verse or prose. Presently the novel is asserted to be the modern e. (Beattie, Of Fable and Romance, 1783; Reeve, Progress of Romance, 1785; Millar, On the Epic, 1818). In support of such opinions, Pye (Commentary on Aristotle's Poetics, 1792) argues, on Aristotle's authority, that e. as a term covers both verse and prose. Le Bossu's emphasis upon the didactic purpose of e. is now repeatedly rejected; Johnson finds Milton the only poet who ever took it seriously. His dictionary (1755) definition of e., particularly in what it omits, sums up the semantic change in the meaning of the word: "Narrative; comprising narrations, not acted but rehearsed. It is usually supposed to be heroic, or to contain one great action achieved by a hero." Aikin (Letters, 1793) even ridicules the notion that e. exists to stimulate "admiration." At the same time there were changes in the reputation of e. poets. Homer, after Blackwell's Enquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer (1736) came to be exalted as an original and primitive genius who knew and needed no rules. Goldsmith (Art of Poetry on a New Plan, 1762) objected to all the poets who had tried to imitate him. Pinkerton (Letters, 1785) singled out Virgil for blame on that score. Hurd (Letters on Chivalry and Romance, 1762) praised the writers of romance, and notably Ariosto and Spenser, for their preference of poetic truth to realism, and for their freedom from restraint in respect to the marvelous. He roundly condemned Davenant and Hobbes for having introduced Fr. theories in England.

Meanwhile in France, although Mme Dacier (Preface to the Iliad, 1711) had given her allegiance to Le Bossu, a more severe rationalism, as epitomized by Voltaire (Essay on Epic Poetry, 1733, et passim) began to urge the relativity of taste among different peoples and in various ages. Definitions are dangerous, Voltaire asserts, because they discourage experimentalism and imagination; it is the nature of genius to attempt new ventures. For him, then, an e. is best defined in a noncommittal way, as "a narration in verse of heroic adventures." He ridicules, as do almost all 18th-c. critics, the idea of using Gr. and Roman mythological personages in modern literature. Judgment now is advocated as a check upon the marvelous, which must be handled with good taste as well as probability. Other critics attack the belief that literature should serve morality rather than pleasure. The imitation of antiquity is deplored. As in England, there is dispute whether Christian machinery is appropriate in e.; this leads to Chateaubriand's rhapsody (Le génie du christianisme, 1802) on the poetic qualities of the Christian marvelous.

With the development of romanticism in England, the concept of the e. as a genre falls apart. Not only is the uniqueness of every poetic expression emphasized; the critic is freed from rules and encouraged in impressionism. The nature of poetry intrigues the speculative mind rather than the definition of kinds. From Germany (see particularly Wolf's Prolegomena ad Homerum, 1795) come theories about the folk origins of the Iliad and the Odyssey, and the old views of their supposed author's profound wisdom and deliberate artistry have to be revised. Virgil is now little valued. Milton, for Coleridge (passim), seems to typify the modern subjective poet. Dante and Milton are contrasted with the simple and objective bards of primitive times. Long poems come under attack as straining patience; Coleridge (Biographia Literaria, 1817) and in America Edgar Allan Poe ("The Poetic Principle," 1845) deny their legitimacy altogether.

At the end of the 18th c., Germany was the chief source of theoretical speculation on the nature of e. Goethe and Schiller collaborated in an essay Über epische und dramatische Dichtung (1797). E., they assert, deals with public actions in the past, drama with inner suffering in the present; e. stirs to contemplation, drama requires complete involvement in the experience of the moment. Goethe generally opposes any confusion of these genres, but Schiller was led to the paradoxical conclusion that e. will make past events immediately concrete, whereas drama will make present events universal. For Schiller, violent action, stimulating strong emotional response, is inappropriate to e. And he also breaks with established tradition (from Aristotle onward) in contending that the marvelous is inappropriate to the clarity demanded of e. Jean Paul Richter (Vorschule der Ästhetik, 1804) modifies the ideas of Goethe and Schiller, maintaining that, although e. reflects and interprets the past, drama has implications for the future, and lyric centers wholly in the present. Following Wolf, Friedrich Schlegel (Prosaische Jugendschriften, 1794-1802) sees the e. as a series of loosely concatenated chance events, beginning and ending in medias res (q.v.); this he contrasts with the purposefully unified tragedy of fate and necessity. Schelling (Philosophie der Kunst, 1802) constructs a theory of the evolution of genres, the philosophical poem, as exemplified by the Divine Comedy, being seen as a stage of development beyond the impersonal e. Hegel (Vorlesungen, 1835) argues that drama marks the combination of the e. and the lyric, the objective and the subjective; also he remarks that e. is an expression of nationalism. The ideas of the Germans spread rapidly to England (Coleridge, passim; Dallas, Poetics, 1852), to France (Mme de Staël, de l'Allemagne, 1802; Hugo, Preface to Cromwell, 1825) and to Italy (Leopardi, Discorsi, 1818; Foscolo, Petrarcha, 1823).

The 20th c. has seen sober consideration of the accumulated facts, inspired by historical research and characterized by rigorously analytical procedures. Particularly notable are C. M. Bowra's studies of the contrast between "oral" and "written" e. (From Vergil to Milton, 1945; Heroic Poetry, 1952). He manifests little interest in theory, but regards e. as "a narrative of some length" which "deals with events which have a certain grandeur and importance and come from a life of action, especially of violent action such as war. It gives a special pleasure because its events and persons enhance our belief in the worth of human achievement and in the dignity and nobility of man." E.M.W. Tillyard (The English Epic and its Background, 1954) rejects merely nominal and formal criteria in an attempt to state what many poems and prose writings (even histories) which we call e. in spirit have in common. He remarks, first off, seriousness of tone and excellence in expression. Secondly, he notes scope and inclusiveness: e. gives us the whole truth as its author sees it, and what he says impresses us as normal and sane. Thirdly, his work manifests structural control throughout: inconsistencies and fragmentariness are disqualifications. There is an impression of deliberateness, and there is notable exercise of will in the conduct of the hero or in the poet's own accomplishment. Fourthly, the e. poet speaks for his own time, sometimes for a people, sometimes for a whole age; he does not speak for all time. Tillyard also observes that he is not necessarily limited to the use of established myth: he may create his own symbolic materials. A. B. Lord (The Singer of Tales, 1960) is concerned with "oral epic song," particularly as it is found in Yugoslavia today. Following the earlier studies of Antoine Meillet and Milman Parry, he establishes the thesis that it is the modern counterpart of the Homeric e., "composed in a manner evolved over many generations by singers of tales who did not know how to write; it consists of the building of metrical lines and half lines by means of formulas and formulaic expressions and of the building of songs by the use of themes." Lord points out that these formulas are not "ossified clichés" but capable of change and productive of other and new formulas.

PRIMARY SOURCES: Plato, Phaedrus, etc., tr. L. Cooper (1938); Lit. Crit.: Plato to Dryden, ed. A. H. Gilbert (1940); The Art of Poetry, The Poetical Treatises of Horace, Vida, and Boileau, ed. A. S. Cook (1926); Lit. Crit.: Pope to Croce, ed. G. W. Allen and H. H. Clark (1941); Idées et doctrines littéraires, ed. F. Vial and L. Denise (3 v., 1922-28); Crit. Essays of the 17th C., ed. J. E. Spingarn (3 v., 1908-9); Essays of John Dryden, ed. W. P. Ker (2 v., 1926); 18th C. Crit. Essays, ed. S. Elledge (2 v., 1961).

SECONDARY SOURCES: R. C. Williams, "It. Influence on Ronsard's Theory of E.," MLN, 35 (1920); "E. Unity (Vida to Castelvetro)," MP, 18 (1920); "It. Crit. Treatises of the 16th C.," MLN, 35 (1920); "Poetics and E.," RR, 12 (1921); "Some It. Critics of the 16th C.," RR, 12 (1921); "16th C. Critics on Metrical Form of E.," MLN, 36 (1921); and "Two Studies in E. Theory," MP, 22 (1924); C. S. Baldwin, Ancient Rhetoric and Poetic (1924); Medieval Rhetoric and Poetic (1928); and Renaissance Lit. Theory and Practice, ed. D. I. Clark (1939); C. E. Whitmore, "The Validity of Lit. Definitions," PMLA, 39 (1924); J. E. Spingarn, Hist. of Lit. Crit. in the Renaissance (1925); L. Abercrombie, Theory of Poetry (1926); J.W.H. Atkins, Lit. Crit. in Antiquity (2 v., 1934), Eng. Lit. Crit.: The Medieval Phase (1943); The Renaissance (1947); and 17th and 18th C. (1951); Behrens; H. T. Swedenberg, The Theory of the E. in England, 1650-1800 (1944); C. M. Bowra, From Vergil to Milton (1945) and Heroic Poetry (1952); A. H. Warren, Eng. Poetic Theory, 1825-65 (1950); D. M. Foerster, "The Crit. Attack upon the E. in the Eng. Romantic Movement," PMLA, 69 (1954); "Crit. Approval of E. Poetry in the Age of Wordsworth," PMLA, 70 (1955) and The Fortunes of E. Poetry (1962); E.M.W. Tillyard, The Eng. E. and its Background (1954); Wellek; A. Warren, "Lit. Genres," in Wellek and Warren; Wimsatt and Brooks; A. B. Lord, The Singer of Tales (1960); M. Di Cesare, Vida's "Christiad" and Vergilian E. (1964).

EPIGRAM

S.M.P.

EPIIC CAESURA. See CAESURA.

EPIIC SIMILE. See SIMILE.

EPICEDIUM (L. spelling of Gr. "funeral song"). A song of mourning in praise of the dead, sung in the presence of the corpse and distinguished from threnos, a dirge, which was not limited by time or place. The word does not occur before the Alexandrian period or in L. before Statius (1st c. A.D.), although the lamentations over the bodies of Hector and Achilles in Homer are, properly speaking, epicedia. It became very popular in the Hellenistic period and was widely imitated in L. literature. It was accompanied by a solemn dance with music provided by a flute in the Lydian mode. Written originally in a variety of meters it became, after the classical period, wholly elegiac or hexametral. Epicedia included lamentations in verse for pet animals and birds (e.g., Catullus 3, Ovid, Amores 2.6, Statius, Silvae 2.4 and 5).—Smyth; Schmid and Stählin; G. Herrlinger, Totenklage um Tiere in der antiken Dichtung (1930).
P.S.C.

EPIDEICTIC POETRY. Poetry following the rules of the epideictic category of oratory. From Aristotle on, rhetoric was divided into three parts, deliberative (political debate), judicial (legal argument), and epideictic (or demonstrative). The e. category was arbitrarily described as oratory in praise or blame of something, primarily for the pleasure and edification of the audience. During the classical decadence poetry became increasingly epideictic. Statius's Silvae is one of the finest, and perhaps the best, L. collections of poems on e. themes. Common e. types are encomium, epithalamium, epicede, ecphrasis (or descriptio), etc.—in short, the types which are usually classified today as occasional poetry. The continuity and importance of the e. tradition may be illustrated by the fact that the rules for the types given in Scaliger's Poetices Libri Septem (1561) are almost identical with those given in the 3d c. B.C. by Menander in his Peri Epideiktikon (On E. Oratory).—T. Burges, E. Lit. (1902); O. B. Hardison, Jr., The Enduring Monument (1962).
O.B.H.

EPIGRAM. A form of writing which makes a satiric, complimentary, or aphoristic observation with wit, extreme condensation, and, above all, brevity. As a poetic form, the e. generally takes the shape of a couplet or quatrain, but tone, which is usually either ironic or gnomic, defines it better than does verse form. An example from Matthew Prior, one of the best Eng. epigrammatists, displays the personal, specific quality which distinguishes the e. from the proverb (q.v.) or the apothegm:

Sir, I admit your general rule,
That every poet is a fool:
But you yourself may serve to show it,
That every fool is not a poet.

The etymology of the term (Gr. epigramma, "inscription") suggests the features of pithiness and economy of language which have always characterized the form; from an inscription carved on a monument or statue, the classical Gr. e. developed into a specific literary type, typified by the epigrams contained in the Gr. Anthology, which covered a wide range of subjects and attitudes.

The e., as cultivated in the earlier Renaissance in both L. and the vernacular languages, owed more to the coarse, harshly satirical examples of Martial and other Roman writers than to the more polished products of the Anthology, but the 17th and 18th c., the greatest periods of epigrammatic writing in England, saw a variety of epigrammatic types, ranging from the brutal thrusts of Donne to the delicate compliments of Herrick.

Epigrams have existed not only as independent poems but also as units in the composition of larger works; Pope's Essay on Criticism and Essay on Man, for example, are made up of epigrammatic couplets which are often quoted as self-contained observations:

We think our fathers fools, so wise we grow;
Our wiser sons, no doubt, will think us so.

(Essay on Criticism)

Although the satiric spirit dominated the 18th-c. e., the 19th c. produced some which, in their delicacy and gracefulness, recall the amatory epigrams of the Gr. Anthology:

Stand close around, ye Stygian set,
With Dirce in one boat conveyed!
Or Charon, seeing, may forget
That he is old and she a shade.
(Landor, Dirce)

The e. holds an important place in the poetic history of France and Germany as well. In France, where the vernacular e. was initiated by Marot and St.-Gelais in the early 16th c., the satiric and personal e. reached perfection in the hands of Boileau, Voltaire, and Lebrun:

Eglé, belle et poète, a deux petits travers:
Elle fait son visage, et ne fait pas ses vers.

(Lebrun).

Aegle, beauty and poet, has two little crimes;
She makes her own face, and does not make her rhymes.

(tr. Byron).

In Germany, on the other hand, the didactic e., or Sinngedicht, has occupied a position of special importance from the time of the Priameln (q.v.) of the 13th c. to the time of such masters as Logau, A. G. Kästner, Lessing, Goethe, and Schiller.

The e. is one of the most persistent types of literary expression, as it embodies certain permanent qualities of the human spirit. Such diverse modern epigrammatists as Ezra Pound and Edna St. Vincent Millay in Eng., Christian Morgenstern and Erich Kästner in German, have carried on the tradition, and W. B. Yeats's e. On Hearing that the Students of our New University Have Joined the Agitation against Immoral Literature is equal, in bite and precision, to the best of Prior or Voltaire.

COLLECTIONS: Select Epigrams from the Gr. Anthology, ed. J. W. Mackail (3d ed., 1911); The Soul of Wit (1924) and Wit's Looking-Glass (1934; Fr. epigrams tr.), both ed. G. R. Hamilton; The Hundred Best Epigrams, ed. E. B. Osborn (1928); Epigrammata, Gr. Inscriptions in Verse . . ., ed. P. Friedländer (1948).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: R. Reitzenstein, Epigramm und Skolion (1893); T. K. Whipple, Martial and the Eng. E. . . . (1925); P. Nixon, Martial and the Modern E. (1927); H. H. Hudson, The E. in the Eng. Renaissance (1947); O. Weinreich, Epigrammstudien (1948); W. Preisendanz, Die Spruchform in der Lyrik des alten Goethe und ihre Vorgeschichte seit Opitz (1952).

F.J.W.; A.P.

EPINICION. A triumphal song, an ode commemorating a victory at one of the four great Gr. national games. It was sung either on the victor's arrival at his native town or during the solemn procession to the temple or at the banquet especially held to celebrate his victory. The ordinary e. consisted of a number of groups of 3 stanzas each (strophe, antistrophe, epode) and contained an account of the victory of the hero, a myth, the most important part of the poem, relating the victor's deed to the glorious past of his family, and the conclusion which returned to the praise of the victor and ended with reflective admonitions or even a prayer. The most eminent representatives of this type of composition are Simonides, Pindar, and Bacchylides. One of the latest epinicia on record is that composed by Euripides for Alcibiades on the occasion of the latter's victory in three chariot races at Olympia (420 B.C.).—Smyth; Schmid and Stählin; G. Norwood, Pindar (1945). P.S.C.

EPIPHORA. See ANADIPLOSIS.

EPIPOLOE (Gr. "plaiting together"). Term applied by ancient metricians to alternative possibilities of regarding a metrical sequence. Thus, with redistribution of the syllables between the feet, an iambic or anapaestic series could be regarded as trochaic or dactylic respectively, for example, a trochaic trimeter catalectic (— — — | — — — | — — —) might be described as an acephalous iambic trimeter, i.e., an iambic trimeter minus its first syllable (— — — | — — — | — — —).

R.J.G.

EPIRRHEMA (Gr. "that said afterwards"). In the parabasis (q.v.) of Attic Old Comedy the speech delivered to the audience by the leader of one half of the chorus after an ode had been sung by that half of the chorus. Composed usually in trochaic tetrameters, its content was satire, advice, or exhortation. The structure in the parabasis of an ode sung by half of the chorus, an epirrHEMA, an antode (q.v.) sung by the other half of the chorus and an antepirrHEMA is called "epirrhematic syzygy." Such an arrangement of lyrics by the chorus and speech or dialogue by a character is found in Aeschylus' and Sophocles' plays.—F. M. Cornford, The Origin of Attic Comedy (1914); G. Norwood, Gr. Comedy (1931); Aeschylus, Agamemnon, ed. E. Fraenkel, III (1953).

R.A.H.

EPISTLE, verse. A poem addressed to a particular patron or friend, written in a familiar style. Two types of verse epistles exist: the one on moral and philosophical subjects which stems from Horace's Epistles and the other on romantic and sentimental subjects which stems from Ovid's Heroides. Though the verse e. may be found as early as 146 B.C. with Sp. Mummium's letters from Corinth and some of the satires of Lucullus, Horace perfected the form. Employing the hexameter, he used plain diction, personal details, questions, etc. to lend a familiarity to his theme which was usually some philosophical subject. Ovid used the same style for his Tristia and Ex Ponto, but developed the sentimental e. in his Heroides which are fictional letters from women to their lovers. Throughout the Middle Ages the latter seems to have been the more popular type, for it had an influence on the courtly love (q.v.) poets and subsequently inspired Samuel Daniel to introduce the form into Eng. literature, e.g., Letter from Octavia to Marcus Antonius. Such also was the source for Donne's copy of the Heroides and Pope's Eloisa to Abelard. But it was the Horatian e. which had the greater effect on the Renaissance and subsequent poetry. Petrarch, the first humanist to know Horace, wrote his influential Epistulae Metricae in L. Subsequently, Ariosto's Satires in terza rima employed the form in the vernacular It. In all these epistles Christian sentiment made itself felt. In Spain Garcilaso's Epístola a Boscán (1543), and the Epístola moral a Fabio in blank verse and terza rima introduced and perfected the form. The Fr. especially cultivated it for its "graceful precision and dignified familiarity." Although others wrote verse epistles, Boileau's twelve (1668-95) in neoclassic couplets are considered the finest examples in Fr. Ben Jonson began the Eng. use of the Horatian form (Forest, 1616) and was followed by others, e.g., Vaughan, Dryden, Congreve. But the finest examples in Eng. are Pope's Moral Essays and the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot in heroic couplets. The romantics did not especially use the e., though Shelley, Keats, and Landor on occasion wrote them. Recent examples are W. H. Auden's New Year Letter and Louis MacNeice's Letters from Iceland.—H. Peter, Der Brief in der römischen Lit. (1901); G. Curcio, Q. Orazio Flacco, studiati in Italia dal secolo xiii al xviii (1913); E. P. Morris, "The Form of the E. in Horace," ysc. 1931; J. Vianey, Les Épitres de Marot (1935); E. L. Rivers, "The Horatian E. and Its Introduction into Sp. Lit.," HR. 22 (1954); W. Grenzmann, "Briefgedicht," Reallexikon, 2d ed., 1; J. A. Levine, "The Status of the Verse E. before Pope," sf. 59 (1962).

R.A.H.

EPISTROPHE. See ANADIPLOSIS.

EPISYNTHETON (Gr. "compound" sc. meter). Meter composed of cola (see COLON) of different kinds. Archilochus (7th c. B.C.) is said to have been the first to use episyntheta.—Kolář.

K.M.A.

EPITAPH (Gr. "[writing] on a tomb"). A literary production suitable for placing on the grave of someone or something, though this need not actually be done or even intended. The e., which is a shortened form of the elegy (q.v.) and which may vary in tone from panegyric to ribald, indicates in brief compass the outline of a complete life. It attempts to arrest the passer-by, compelling him to read, to reflect on the life of the one commemorated and, by implication, on his own life. The earliest epitaphs are Egyptian, written on sarcophagi and coffins. They have generally the name, the person's descent, his office, and a prayer to some deity. Gr. and Roman epitaphs are often highly personal, sometimes epigrammatic. They may be written in verse (usually the elegiac distich) or in prose. Their details may include the name of the person, his family, the facts of his life, a prayer to the underworld (especially so in Roman epitaphs) and a warning or imprecation against defilement. Rarely are all these details found in a single e. On those from Greece and Rome are found varying concepts of Fortuna and Fate, literary figures such as the thread of life, the removal from light, the payment of a debt as well as various kinds of consolation and lamentation.

The major collection of classical epitaphs is Book 4 of the Gr. Anthology. The epitaphs in this collection are of high poetic quality and cover the whole range of the form from satiric and comic to intensely serious. They have influenced subsequent writers of epitaphs from Roman times (e.g., Martial, Ausonius) through the Renaissance (Pontanus, Erasmus, More, Jonson) and on into the present period (Pound, Yeats). Perhaps the single most famous e. from the Anthology is that on the dead at Thermopylae: "Go, tell the Lacedaemonians, passer-by, / That here obedient to their laws we lie."

The Middle Ages used the Latin e. both in prose and verse, often leonine verse. Following the themes and practices laid down by the Greeks and particularly the Romans, the Eng. used the form, developing it to an exceptionally high art in the 15th and 16th c., e.g., William Browne on the Dowager Countess of Pembroke, or Milton on Shakespeare. Both Dr. Johnson and William Wordsworth wrote essays on the e. as an art form.

The e. has not always been used to commemorate the dead. It has been put to satirical use against an enemy who is alive, and it has been aimed even at an institution, e.g., Piron's e. on his rejection by the Fr. Academy. As a literary form without a specific occasion it has continued in use into the 20th c., e.g., O. St. J. Gogarty, Per iter tenebricosum, W. Stevens, Death of a Soldier.—S. Tessington, Epitaphs (1857); H. W. Wells, New Poets from Old (1940); R. Lattimore, Themes in Gr. and L. Epitaphs (1942); Epigrammata, ed. P. Friedländer (1948); Frye; R. W. Ketton-Cremer, "Lapidary Verse," Proceedings of the British Academy, 45 (1959).

R.A.H.

EPITHALAMIUM (Gr. "at the bridal chamber"). Any song or poem sung outside the bridal chamber on the wedding night; perhaps the intention behind such a song is the encouragement of fertility. Sappho is apparently the first to use it as a distinct literary form, though such a song does appear in Homer's Iliad and in Hesiod's Shield of Herakles. Brief nuptial songs appear in Aristophanes' Peace and Birds, but Theocritus is the most significant Gr. poet to have used the form (Eclogue 18 on the marriage of Helen and Menelaus). Among L. writers who used it were Ovid, Statius, and Claudian, but the most important for literary history was Catullus (Carmina 61, 62, 64). Medieval literature has devotional poems entitled Epithalamia, but these have no connection with the classical genre. The Renaissance revived the form and used it to great advantage: Tasso and Marino in Italy; in France Ronsard, Belleau, Du Bellay; in England Spenser, Sidney, Donne, Jonson, Herrick, Crashaw, Marvell, Dryden. Perhaps the greatest Eng. e. is Spenser's on his own wedding.

The form of the poem as established by the Renaissance poets includes the following conventions: the context is of course a wedding; the characters are the husband and wife who, when not fictional, are upper class, and the poet who is the public celebrator of the couple's private experience; the events of the entire wedding day form the basis of the organization of the poem; and classical allusions and topoi are included.—R. H. Chase, Eng. Epithalamies (1896); A. L. Wheeler, Catullus and the Traditions of Ancient Poetry (1934); A. Gaertner, Die englische Epithalamienlit. im 17. Jh. und ihre Vorbilder (1936); T. M. Greene, "Spenser and the Epithalamic Convention," CL, 9 (1957); A. K. Hieatt, Short Time's Endless Monument (1960). R.J.G.

EPITHET. See POETIC DICTION.

EPITRITE (Gr. "one-third as much again," "one and one-third"). A foot containing 1 short and 3 long syllables, so described because the ratio of 2 longs to a long and a short is, in time-units or morae, 4: 3. The position of the short syllable determines the description of the epitrite as first, second, third, or fourth (respectively — — — — —, — — — — —, — — — — —, — — — — —). The first and fourth, however, were avoided by the Gr. poets as unrhythmical. See DACTYLOEPI-TRITE. R.J.G.

EPIZEUXIS. See ANADIPLOSIS.

EPODE (Gr. "sung after"). In the lyric odes of, for example, Pindar, Bacchylides, and the Gr. dramatists, the epode completed an epodic triad by following the strophe and antistrophe (qq.v.), from which it differed in metrical form. In this sense, the Gr. word epodos could be feminine in gender, whereas when masculine it also denoted the shorter verse of a couplet, notably an iambic dimeter following an iambic trimeter. (The alternating lines of poems composed in such couplets might, however, be in different meters; for example, a dactylic hexameter might be followed by an iambic dimeter or an iambic trimeter by a dactylic hemiepes.) Archilochus seems to have been the founder of this kind of composition which was used for invective and satire. Horace claims to have introduced the form into L. poetry in his "Tambi," which subsequent grammarians called epodes.—Hardie; Koster; B. Kirn, Zur literarischen Stellung von Horazens Jambenbuch (1935); E. Fraenkel, Horace (1957). R.J.G.

EPYLLION (Gr. "little epos," "versicle," "scrap of poetry"). Such was the classical meaning of a word which, in the sense of "little epic," is apparently an invention of the 19th c. to describe a short narrative poem in dactylic hexameters. This so-called genre embraced mythological subjects which often contained a love interest. It was characterized by elaborate and vivid description, learned allusion, lengthy digression, and an interest in psychology. It was especially cultivated in the Alexandrian period (e.g., by Callimachus and Theocritus), and such compositions were widely imitated and served as models in the late Republican and early Augustan periods of L. literature. Catullus, for example, in his 64th poem which dealt with the wedding of Peleus and Thetis and included a digression about the abandoned Ariadne on Naxos. The Byzantine period had its "epyllia" which were longer than these narrative poems of Alexandrian and Roman times and were in effect brief epics. The counterparts of the shorter narrative poems of classical times were in the Middle Ages and afterwards the troubadour songs, the Russian byliny, the Scandinavian sagas, the modern Gr. kleftic songs. Shakespeare's "Lucrece" and Tennyson's Oenone are perhaps the best examples of epyllia in Eng. poetry.—J. Heumann, De Epyllio Alexandrino (1904); M. M. Crump, The E. from Theocritus to Ovid (1931); L. Richardson, Jr., Poetical Theory in Republican Rome (1944); J. F. Reilly, "Origins of the Word 'E.,'" CJ, 49 (1953-54); V. d'Ago-stino, "Considerazioni sull' epyllio . . .," Rivista di studi classici, 4 (1956); W. Allen, Jr., "The E.," TAPA, 71 (1940) and "The Non-Existent Classical E.," SP, 55 (1958). R.J.G.

EROTIC POETRY. Poetry which deals with the sexual in more or less explicit detail. Erotic poetry is distinct on the one hand from love poetry which avoids specifically sexual details (such as Petrarch's Canzoniere) and on the other from mere pornographic (Gr. pornē, "harlot," and graphē, "writing") or obscene verse, which does not meet the aesthetic criteria understood in this article to be implied by the term poetry. In e. poetry the sexual is by some process of ordering (intellectual, emotional, stylistic—preferably all three) made to subserve an aesthetic effect, to submit to the artistic stylization of experience in the poem. However, although the imposition of stylistic and imaginative unity upon subject matter in poetry is analogous to moral integrity and self-control in practical matters, to demand control in poetry is not to require the poet to adhere to our own particular moral standards. Even thoroughly amoral works such as Ovid's Ars amatoria and Marlowe's Hero and Leander can have high aesthetic merit when the firm control of structure and style "diffuses a tone and spirit of unity" (Coleridge).

The erotic is not a genre but rather a recurrent theme of poetry, which may be treated in many genres. We shall be concerned with works a principal subject of which is sexual love, and only with the most important of those. The greatest e. literature of the East is that of India. Secular e. poetry appears early in the history of classical Sanskrit literature. Most important are perhaps Kalidasa's luxuriant Meghaduta (5th c.; tr. G. H. Rooke, 1936); Bharitrari's graceful century of quatrains, Sringasataka, the first of three centuries which lead from sexual love to worldly wisdom and finally to renunciation (7th or 8th c.; tr. J. W. Kennedy, 1914); and Bilhan's impressive Pançagaṇika (11th c.; tr. E. P. Mathers in Eastern Love Songs, 1953). Since perhaps the 4th c. A.D., Hinduism has recognized a passive or female principle (Sakti) in the universe, and the mythological sexual relations of the gods have traditionally been understood to represent the interaction of spirit (male) and matter (female). E. episodes in the ancient epics were early given mystical interpretation, especially the Prem Sagar, "The Ocean of Love," the tenth book of the Bhagavatapurana (before A.D. 900), which has formed the basic scripture of the Vaishnava cults. Vaishnava worship singles out for special attention the loves of Krishna (one of the ten incarnations of Vishnu) and Radha; perhaps the most significant of the richly ornamented, highly traditionalistic Indian e. poetry has been written in connection with this cult. Jayadeva's lyrical drama Gita Govinda (12th c.; tr. G. Keyt, 1947) and Vidyapati's Bangiya Padabali (15th c.; tr. A. Coomaraswamy, 1915) refer simultaneously to divine love and highly sensual earthly love.

Secular e. poetry, both heterosexual and homosexual, is much more common among the Arabs than is religious e. poetry. The pre-Islamic Arab poets set a standard of grace and restrained intensity which dominated Arabic poetry for centuries. There are two principal collections of their poems: the Hamasa, made by Abu Temmam in the 10th c. (selections in C. Lyall, Translations of Ancient Arabian Poetry, 1885; German tr. by Friedrich Rückert, 1846), and the Muallakat (the seven "golden odes," tr. in A. J. Arberry, The Seven Odes, 1957). These fairly extended "odes" (hasidas) of Imru-alqais and others regularly begin with nostalgic love episodes and proceed to the praises of chieftains or to set descriptions of desert life. Perhaps the most characteristic form of Islamic e. poetry is the ghazal, a short lyric, notably practiced by the cynical court poet of the Abassids, Abu Nuwās (756-810); by the authors of the Thousand and One Nights (before 990); by the Persian Hafiz (ca. 1320-1389; tr. John Payne, 2 v., 1901); and by such graceful Moorish poets as Ibn Hazm, the author of an important treatise on love (The Dove's Neck Ring, tr. A. J. Arberry, 1953), and Ibn Zaidun and Al-Mutamid (1003-71 and 1040-95 respectively; selections tr. in A. R. Nykl, Hispano-Arabic Poetry and its Relations with the Old Prov. Troubadours, 1946 and in A. J. Arberry, Moorish Poetry, 1953). Although Islamic e. poetry is usually secular, the Prophet promised sexual joys in heaven, and the Sufi mystics sometimes used sexual symbolism, for example Ibn Al-Farid (1182-1234; The Mystical Poems of Ibn Al-Farid, tr. A. J. Arberry, 1956) and Rumi (1207-73; Rumi, Poet and Mystic, tr. R. A. Nicholson, 1950; The Ruba'iyat of Jalal al-Din Rumi, tr. A. J. Arberry, 1950). The Persian Jami (d. 1492) wrote a brilliant version of the Talmudic tale of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, Yusuf and Zalaikha (incomplete tr. by R. T. H. Griffith, 1881; Fr. tr. by A. Bricteux, 1927), in which the richly e. tale has detailed mystical meaning. In Jami's Salaman and Absal (tr. E. FitzGerald, 1856; see A. J. Arberry, FitzGerald's Salaman and Absal. A Study, 1957), on the other hand, sexual love is made representative of all that binds the soul to earth. Religious sexual symbolism entered the Western heritage with the biblical Song of Songs, whose imagery bears a clear family resemblance to that of pre-Islamic Arabic poetry and of the remnants of Egyptian e. poetry (S. Schott, Altägyptische Liebeslieder, 1950). The Song of Songs is probably secular in origin; the most likely theory identifies it as a collection of wedding songs. It has traditionally been interpreted as an allegory, whether of God's love for Israel or of Christ's love for the church or for the soul.

The Greeks produced lyric e. poetry with their characteristic ease and delicacy, from the intensities of Sappho to the uncomplicated and cheerful libertinage of Anacreon and his followers and the e. epigrams of the Gr. Anthology (collected in the 10th c. by Constantinus Cephalus). Aside from mildly e. episodes in Homer and Apollonius of Rhodes, there is little Gr. narrative e. poetry. Musaeus' Hero and Leander (4th or 5th c. A.D.) might be mentioned because of its influence on Christopher Marlowe. The few e. Idylls of Theocritus

(most notably xxvii) were influential in the late 16th and the 17th c. The Gr. influence on later European e. poetry was, however, relatively slight, and that the most important influence was Roman, and especially Ovidian, is perhaps regrettable. A combination of factors, such as the tradition of the hetairai, the dominant classical conception of sexual passion as a form of madness, and the official puritanism of Augustan Rome, made it inevitable that Roman e. poetry should be produced in a spirit of libertinism. While the libertinism of Catullus and Propertius has its deeply serious side, in Ovid's Amores and Ars amatoria the deliberately outrageous is made a sophisticated amusement, and the epigrams of Martial and his imitators degenerate into obscene and cruel joking. Although the traditional mystical interpretation of the Song of Songs made possible such magnificent mystical poetry as that of St. John of the Cross (1542-91), there is little in Western poetry to compare with the simultaneous validation of earthly and mystical love in Indian and Persian poetry. Until the late 19th c., European e. poetry is, for the most part, wittily libertine or coarsely humorous, or else it descends out of the sphere of poetry into mere pornography.

While much love-making is described with gusto in such romances as Huon of Bordeaux, the medieval romance often treats sexual passion as tragic or impure even when, like Gottfried of Strassburg's Tristan (13th c.; tr. A. T. Hatto, 1960) and Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parzifal (tr. Mustard and Passage, 1961), they are outspoken on sexual matters. The doctrine of courtly love (q.v.) often included a final turning away from earthly passion to the love of God (cf. the influential treatise, De Arte honeste amandi, by Andreas Capellanus, 1174-86; tr. J. J. Parry, 1914). On his conversion, Peter Abelard destroyed all of his e. poems. Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde, based on Boccaccio's Filostrato (tr. N. E. Griffin and A. B. Myrick, 1930), is beyond compare the best Eng. treatment of the theme. Much of the e. poetry of the goliards in the Carmina Burana and the so-called Cambridge Songs (tr. H. Waddell, Medieval L. Lyrics, 5th ed., 1951), overtly rebellious against the prevailing social norms, is unusually fresh and graceful in its lyricism.

The coarsely humorous medieval poetry of sex is best exemplified in the octosyllabic couplet fabliaux (q.v.). These tales of low-life cuckoldings and gullings, which Douglas Bush has described as "broader than they are long," are illuminated by genius in Chaucer's "Miller's Tale" and "Reeve's Tale." Closely related to the fabliau, as well as to the Italian novella, is the 17th- and 18th-c. stanzaic conte, of which the best known writer is La Fontaine (Nouvelles en vers, 1665; Contes et nouvelles, 1666). Some of the verse collected in such volumes as the famous Cabinet satyrique (1618; critical ed., 1924), like the best broadside ballads of this and later periods, is on the level of the best bawdy jokes; most of it, however, is mere obscenity.

The writers of the so-called romantic epic adapted fabliaux and novelle, Boiardo in his Orlando innamorato (1483-95) and Ariosto in his Orlando furioso (1516-32); they added another element which was to have a considerable vogue later in the century: e. episodes based on such portions of Ovid's Metamorphoses as the myths of Salmacis and of Caenis. The episode of Paridell and Hellenore in Book III of Spenser's Faerie Queene (1590) is a particularly good specimen of the type. The myth of Circe was a favorite with the writers of romantic epic: Ariosto, Trissino (L'Italia liberata dai Goti, 1547), Tasso (Gerusalemme liberata, 1583), and Spenser all used it. The mythological e. poem, related to the ancient epyllion (q.v.) as practiced by Catullus (44), but owing most to the spirit of Ovid, was most notably practiced by Christopher Marlowe (Hero and Leander, 1598) and Shakespeare (Venus and Adonis, 1593) in England, where the vogue was most intense. In the hands of the It. mannerist G. B. Marino (L'Adone, 1624), it became an epic omnium gatherum and soon died out, although La Fontaine published an Adonis in 1669. A favorite type of e. poetry in the 17th c. was the pastoral, either narrative or lyrical, on whose development Theocritus, Longus, Tasso, Marino, and Ronsard were major influences.

Equally important with the influence of Ovid's Metamorphoses in the Renaissance was that of his Amores and Ars amatoria. Most of the 15th- and 16th-c. humanists wrote e. Latin poetry based on the Amores and Catullus. The best of them is beyond question Gioviano Pontano (1426-1503). The e. lyrics of Marino and his followers are also based primarily on Ovid's Amores and Ars. In France, the vogue of the Amores bore fruit in the cult of "l'amour simple"—uncomplicated sensual love, in part a reaction against Platonism—of which the best product is probably Ronsard's Les amours de Marie (1555). At some point in his career, Marlowe translated the Amores; the best example of the Eng. vogue is Donne's Songes and Sonnets and Elegies (1633).

Edmund Spenser's Epithalamion may well be the greatest e. poem in the literature of the world. Many epithalamia, of course, avoid mention of sexual detail. Those which do not tend to draw either upon folk songs or upon Pontano's adaptation of Ovidian instructions, as do Johannes Secundus (1511-36), Ben Jonson (Hymenaei, 1606), and Marino. Spenser united classical (Sappho, Catullus) and oriental (The Song of Songs) elements in a noble celebration of physical love sanctioned and ordered in a Christian and Platonic framework. Milton's Spenserian mode of celebrating married love (Paradise Lost, Book 4, 1667) is not the rule in the later 17th c., however. The Ovidian verse of Hoffmannswaldau, Colletet, Rochester, and others and the licentious songs popular on the Restoration stage in England (many are collected in Thomas D'Urfey's Pills to Purge Melancholy, 1684-1720) carry to new extremes the characteristic libertine paradox of slyly obscene content in elegant form.

The 18th c. saw the breakdown of these various traditions of e. poetry, as of the Renaissance tradition in general. The Ovidian elegy was revived in a lively and characteristically original manner by Goethe (Römische Elegien, 1795), the mythological e. poem by Keats (Endymion, 1818), and the comic-erotic epic by Byron (Don Juan, 1818-24), but with these and a few other exceptions (such as the songs of Béranger), little significant e. poetry was produced until the advent of the revolutionary Fr. symbolists, of whom an important precursor was Théophile Gautier (Albertus, 1833). Baudelaire (Les fleurs du mal, 1857), Mallarmé (Hérodiade, 1869; L'après-midi d'un faune, 1876), and Verlaine (Parallèlement, 1889; Chansons pour elle, 1891; Odes en son honneur, 1893) exploited various kinds of sexual abnormality, corruption, and diabolism and in general opened the way for serious poetic treatment of a wide range of sexual matters. The Victorian era in England saw a revival of interest in e. themes, of which the Pre-Raphaelite movement was a principal agent. Dante Gabriel Rossetti (Poems, 1870; The House of Life in Ballads and Sonnets, 1881) and Algernon Charles Swinburne (Poems and Ballads, 1866) evoked considerable controversy (e.g., Robert Buchanan, The Fleshly School of Poetry, 1872). In America, portions of Walt Whitman's Song of Myself, as well as his Children of Adam (first included in the 1860 edition of Leaves of Grass), brought a charge of immorality on the book which cost Whitman his position in the Indian Bureau. In the 20th c., e. poetry reflects the influence of Freudian and Jungian theories of the unconscious. Among the most important modern poets who have written serious e. poetry are: in Germany, Rainer Maria Rilke; in Spain, Federigo García Lorca; in France, Paul Valéry and Paul Eluard; in Great Britain, W. B. Yeats and D. H. Lawrence; in the United States, E. E. Cummings and Robinson Jeffers.

The standard lit. histories and bibliog. should be consulted. GENERAL: P. Englisch, Gesch. der erotischen Lit. (1927); C. von Bolen, Erotik des Orients (1955); F. Saba Sardi, Sesso e mito. Storia e testi della letteratura erotica (1960).—INDIA: P. N. Sinha, The Bhagavata-

Purana: a Study (1901); R. Schmidt, Beiträge zur indischen Erotik (2d ed., 1911); A. Coomaraswamy, The Dance of Śiva (1919); India Love Poems, ed. Tambimuttu (1954); W. G. Archer, The Loves of Krishna in Indian Painting and Poetry (1957).—ARABIA, PERSIA, MOSLEM SPAIN: Arabic-Andalusian Casidas, tr. H. Morland (1949); A. Kh. Kinany, The Development of Ghazal in Arabic Lit. (1951); A. J. Arberry, The Seven Odes: The First Chapter in Arabic Lit. (1957).—BIBLICAL: The Song of Songs: H. H. Rowley, "The Interpretation of the S. of S.," Jour. of Theological Studies, 38 (1937); R. Gordis, The S. of S. (1954).—EGYPT: W. M. Müller, Die Liebespoesie der alten Ägypter (1899).—CLASSICAL: A. L. Wheeler, Catullus and the Tradition of Cl. Poetry (1934); L. P. Wilkinson, Ovid Recalled (1955). MEDIEVAL: K. Breul, The Cambridge Songs (1915); J. Bédier, Les Fabliaux (4th ed., 1925); Jeanroy, Origines; F. J. E. Raby, A Hist. of Secular L. Poetry in the Middle Ages (2d ed., 2 v., 1957).—RENAISSANCE AND LATER: Eng. Epithalamies, ed. R. H. Case (1896); D. Bush, Mythology and the Ren. Tradition in Eng. Poetry (1932) and Mythology and the Romantic Trad. in Eng. Poetry (1937); J. H. Wilson, The Court Wits of the Restoration (1948); M. Praz, The Romantic Agony, tr. A. Davidson (2d ed., 1951). R.M.D.

ESKIMO POETRY. Esk. humanism, or spiritual culture, strikes many chords. We find no sentimentality, but a great deal of intimacy. There is a sufficiency of longing, with ensuing disappointments, and surprises; exaggerations, grotesque sorcery, and magic conjuring (qila) abound; there are even glimpses of sublime pathos—beside indignation and irony—in some arctic poems. According to Knud Rasmussen, Esk. poetry manifests a profuse and lofty imagination, a "fertile, creative fantasy [that] . . . lifts us . . . up . . . to the great spaces." But it can also exude a passionate earthiness, as in the cultic and dramatic games, which often surge with an abandoned eroticism. One can, however, hardly find a wooing ballad or a sentimental-frivolous love song. A national epic does not exist, and war songs are equally lacking.

The Eskimos have everywhere had a broad unwritten literature, including numerous legends and a nucleus of classical poems, mostly anonymous. The poems often consist of roughly uniform couplets which vary the same thought; often the poetic unit is a long, polysynthetic word which corresponds to two shorter words in the next line. A kind of rhyme easily arises by two lines varying two verbs having the same grammatical endings, as, for instance, in the hymn of the angakok:

ilēgiakka	I explored them,
kagersēwimakki	these wide fjords.
ajangēleqākka	I was repelled by them.
nawiangēleqākka	I started being afraid of them,
ākitte, annikitte	their small and big boats
etc.	of skin
	(kayaks, umiaks)

A poem is poetically called the "breath" of the author (anertsā < anér "to breathe") or his taigdlīā (from tai "to name, or mention, something"), actually "verbal art-work." The poem is considered the author's property (pia) as long as he is alive. Only after his death can it become common property; and the name of the author is forgotten at his death (cf. name-taboo). The great significance of poetry in Esk. culture was indicated by one of Knud Rasmussen's Esk. friends, Apákaq, who explained: "... festivity cannot be enjoyed with dance and song alone. The most festive thing of all is joy in beautiful smooth words. . . ." The poets observe the natural rhythms, cadences, and musical accents of the words. Most of the poems are intended to be sung, Esk. style; but petting songs for children and certain fairy tales are recited, in a peculiarly subtle manner. This is neither speech nor song, but an intermediate mode, with a fixed musical diction, crystallized from natural colloquial speech.

A. OCCULT AND INTIMATE POETRY. Genre I: Magic prayers. The Esk. magic prayers (serhrāt) are ancient formulas transmitted clandestinely from the forefathers, thus constituting an occult tradition. They are recited in solitude in a low voice, at a moderate pace, and with regular pauses. Every adult would make sure to learn from an older person a number of such charms, enlarging his collection in response to the needs of new situations until he knew some ten or twenty of them. The young people asked; the old ones offered, confidentially, adding the following advice: "Do not use it too often! Do not wear them out! Be sparing of them!" The charm was supposed to be paid for with a costly gift. Magic prayers operate against attacks of disease, the evil effects of shooting stars, the cunning of a foe, and envy. According to Esk. thinking, every human being has many souls, a little one in each joint, more vital ones in the nape of the neck, the throat, and the diaphragm; by seizing upon these souls, evil men or spirits can cause disease. The victim seeks a cure in an appropriate formula. When death occurs, strict mourning-taboo is observed, especially by women; when the taboo is lifted, the bereaved one charms, murmuring: "Once more I step out upon the thin skin of the ice; I have become as poor now as the new earth, the poor one here, ea, ea!"

Genre II: Intimate poetry. To the intimate genre belongs the mothers' lullaby, e-e-e-a, used as a means of soothing; it consists of the magic refrain, which has been lengthened to an adagio of two see-sawing tones. Besides, every baby receives as a christening gift its own individual petting song (aqaut), a short or long poem alluding to the child's name—surname and nickname—or behavior.

B. The following genres are largely public and generally accessible. Genre III: The epic-lyrical genre embraces a great quantity of poetry, principally in short poems rarely divided into stanzas; the verse consists of freely flowing, rhythmically composed lines. The genre falls into several subvarieties, with or without melody and refrain. In the kayak-songs, the hunter sings (ivnger-) while rowing his kayak so that he is heard on shore. Using the tones of the drum-song, he sings about his catch (to signal the kind of seal caught), about the voyage, the weather and the ice—and about his wife: "She shall receive a coat of the finest fur (crested seal)." More closely connected with ancient tradition are the short poems that occur in certain legends: In Ariagssuaq the dead drummer-boy rises, a skeleton, from his grave to sing his approaching opponent to death, using his shoulder blade for a drum. In an East Greenland variant of the legend about the geese—a legend which is of pan-Esk. tradition—the death-song of the drowning raven resounds as he sinks into the sea with a last shriek. This is a dramatic poem, very artistically executed.

Genre IV: The cultic-religious hymns are partly traditional songs attached to old rites (festivals in the qagssit's, or communal houses), partly occasional poems composed by fully educated shaman priests (angákut) at the performance of their office. For instance, when at seances, with the aid of the sorcerer's drum, they conjure up their assisting spirits and speak with them in the presence of the congregation, the choir cooperating.

Genre V: In the juridical verse lampoons (piseq, pl. pitsit; iver-, soqula-) two men or women, facing each other in a drumming contest, alternately sing and drum-dance; they sing a dueling-feud in the circle of visitors, which participates as choir and court. The songs are composed and rehearsed in the homes of the duellists before they depart for the place of the meeting; the contents are poetically executed accusations, most often in the form of ironical suggestions woven into long refrains.

Genre VI: The dramatic drum-dance roles are partly cultic, connected with religious festivals, or quite profane games played in the huts during the winter season. Some of them lack the melodic element; they are just recited, rhythmically and expressively—in jest.

C. THE POETRY OF MODERN GREENLAND. Since 1721, when missions from Denmark, Norway, and Germany established themselves on Greenland, the people have become Europeanized and are now strongly mixed. A Christian-ecclesiastical literature was fostered when the natives learned how to read and write. From ca. 1860 on, periodicals and newspapers in the West Greenland language, which is an Esk. dialect, have been published. At Godthåb there is a printing press. Modern authors like Henrik Lund (1875–1948), Pavia, and Jonatan Petersen have composed many fine hymns and secular poems, mostly in Danish romance style, but in the Greenland-Esk. language. Jonatan Petersen wrote a textbook on Greenland metrics. Other natives have composed novels and plays. Apart from a few transitional poems from the last century, the traces of the old-world heathen poetry are quite extinguished; this poetry is only faintly remembered in East Greenland.

TEXTS AND TRANSLATIONS: H. J. Rink, Eskimoiske Eventyr og Sagn (2 v., 1866–77); Tales and Traditions of the Esk. (1875–77) and (with F. Boas) "Esk. Tales and Songs," JAF, 2 (1889), 7 (1894), 10 (1897); W. Thalbitzer, "Old-fashioned Songs" (pp. 289–317) in Phonetical Study of the Esk. Language (Meddelelser om Grønland, 31, 1904), "Texts from East Greenland [Poetry]," The Ammassalik Esk., 2d pt., pp. 184–378, 496–543 (Medd. om Grønland, 40, 1923), Légendes et chants esquimaux du Groenland [Leroux] (1929), Esk.-Lieder van Oost-Groenland [Mees] (1933), Inuit Songs and Dances from Greenland [Munksgaard] (1939); K. J. V. Rasmussen, Snehyttens Sange (1930) and The Eagle's Gift, tr. I. Hutchison (1932); Beyond the High Hills: A Book of Esk. Poems, comp. and tr. K. J. V. Rasmussen (1961).

GENERAL: H. J. Rink, "Eskimoisk Digtekunst," For Idee og Virkelighed (1870); F. Boas, "The Central Eskimo," U.S. Bureau of Am. Ethnology, 6th Ann. Rep. (1888) and "The Folklore of the Esk.," JAF, 17 (1904); K. J. V. Rasmussen, The People of the Polar North (1908) and Report of the Fifth Thule Expedition 1921–24, vii–ix (1930–32); W. Thalbitzer, "Poetics. Language and Folklore," The Ammassalik Eskimo, 2d pt., pp. 160–80 (Medd. om Grønland, 40, 1923) and "Grønlandsk litteraturhistorie," in Grønlandsbogen, ed. Schultz, II (1950, pp. 255ff.); H. C. Glahn, ["On the Poetry of the Greenlanders in the Rev. Glahn's Relations"] Dagbøger (Diaries) written in Greenland 1763–68, ed. H. Ostermann in Det grønlandske Selskabs Skrifter, 4 (1921); C. W. Schultz-Lorentzen, "Intellectual Culture of the Greenlanders," in Greenland, ed. M. Vahl, II (1928);

S. Frederiksen, "Henrik Lund, A National Poet of Greenland," Am. Philos. Soc. Proceed., 96, no. 6 (1952) and Stylistic Forms in Greenland Esk. Lit. (Medd. om Grønland, 136, no. 7, 1954).
W.T. (arr. and tr. S.L.)

ESPINELA. An octosyllabic 10-line Sp. stanza form having the rhyme scheme abba:acddc. There is a pause after the fourth line as indicated by the colon. The strophe was supposedly invented by Vicente Espinel (1550–1624) and is named after him. The e. is occasionally augmented by 2 lines rhyming ed. Also called décima or décima espinela. It has been termed "the little sonnet," and justly so, since some of the most beautiful lines in Sp. poetry (e.g., in Calderón's La vida es sueño) have taken this form. Since its introduction in the late 16th c., the e. has been widely employed.—D. C. Clarke, "Sobre la e.," RFE, 23 (1936); J. Millé y Giménez, "Sobre la fecha de la invención de la décima o e.," HR, 5 (1937); J. M. de Cossío, "La décima antes de Espinel," RFE, 28 (1944); Navarro. D.C.C.

ESTONIAN POETRY. The Est. language, akin to Finnish, has the word-accent on the first syllable, is highly inflected, and tends toward polysyllabism. Its relatively small number of initial consonants favors alliteration, which, however, is unobtrusive because of the unemphatic articulation. Oral folk poetry, alive in some parts of Estonia until fairly recently, and recorded in hundreds of thousands of items, prefers an octosyllabic meter combining quantitative and accentual principles, as that of the Finnish Kalevala. The lines, trochaic when sung, permit initial short syllables of words to be stressed only at the beginning of the verse, e.g.:

Kõlise, kõlise, keeli,
Laja vastu, laasi, suuri.
Ring, ring, tongue,
Resound, great forest

The trochaic pattern is not followed when the verses are spoken. Parallelism and periphrastic formulae—not unlike kenningar (see KENNING) abound, creating a rich, ornamental style capable of strong lyrical and dramatic effects. Written poetry since the 17th c. almost entirely discarded this form, using instead either syllabo-accentual or purely accentual meters, largely owing to German influence. The numerous polysyllables, with only one clearly audible stress, often count as one long metrical foot; more frequently, however, the slight secondary stresses are exploited metrically, producing iambic or trochaic patterns. Dactylic, amphibrachic, and anapestic patterns are also frequent enough. There is considerable disinclination to use the weakly stressed inflections as rhymes. Near-rhymes, permitting a fuller use of the vocabulary and surprise effects, have become more common since the 1920's.

Foreign—Baltic-German and Rus.—social, economic, and political pressure slowed up the intellectual life of the Estonians until the early 19th c., when poetry, along with other cultural pursuits, began to flower. Stimulated by the romantic conception of a national genius, the leading poets of the Est. national Renaissance drew much of their inspiration from folklore, aided by their study of classical antiquity, Finnish, German, and partly British romantic and preromantic poetry. The first notable poet, the short-lived Kristjan Jaak Peterson (1802-22), wrote inspired Pindarics. F. R. Kreutzwald's epic Kalevipoeg (The Kalevid, 1857-61), based on runic folk ballads, whose meter it uses, and of decisive importance as a cultural stimulus, owed much to Lönnrot's Finnish Kalevala. The powerful patriotic lyrics of Lydia Koidula (1843-86) with great independence developed the romantic Lied genre. Later in the century, political and social changes led to a less public, more intimate and more individually differentiated poetry, most impressively exemplified in the profoundly personal, tragic symbolism of the seemingly simple lyrics of Juhan Liiv (1864-1913). Symbolism in its Western form, intellectually searching, with much emphasis on a highly individual, sophisticated style, characterizes the verse of the Noor-Eesti (Young Estonia) group, above all that of its leader, Gustav Suits (1883-1957), a revolutionary experimentalist and idealist, constantly torn between high flights of emotion and bitter, satirical skepticism. The poignancy, subtlety, formal richness, and exploratory boldness of his verse decisively affected the further course of Est. poetry. The quiet, introspective mysticism of Ernst Enno (1875-1934), the sensitive island landscapes of Villem Grünthal-Ridala (1885-1942), influenced by Carducci, and the archaic ballads of Jaan Lõo (1872-1939) all added new wealth of language, imagery, and versification to a rapidly expanding literature. A discordant but effective note was struck by the gloomy, visionary primitivism of Jaan Oks (1884-1918).

Toward the end of the First World War, shortly before the Est. declaration of independence in 1918, a new group, named after a mythological bird, "Siuru," inaugurated an era of lyrical exuberance and extreme individualism of both form and content. Its leaders, Marie Under (1883-) and Henrik Visnapuu (1889-1951), soon abandoned subjectivism for strenuous thought, more universal themes, and more firmly crystallized form. Marie Under, the greatest master of lyrical intensity, passed through psychological and metaphysical crises culminating in a poetry of extraordinary translucency and human insight. The eclectic but keen picturesque aestheticism of Johannes Semper (1892-), the intimate dialect verse of Artur Adson (1889-) and Hendrik Adamson (1891-1946), the principally Rus.-inspired experiments in melodic instrumentation of Valmar Adams (1899) preceded a temporary trend towards robust, nonphilosophic realism, which dominated the early thirties, but was followed by a strong idealistic reaction. The deeply rooted native tendency toward symbolism, in a new, disciplined form, reasserted itself in the verse of the "Arbujad" (Magicians) group, including Uku Masing (1909-), Bernard Kangro (1910-), and, above all, Heiti Talvik (1904-46) and Betti Alver (1906-), both intellectually among the subtlest, formally among the most brilliant of Est. verse writers. Keenly aware of the great tradition of European poetry and thought, these poets sought "to enclose in slim stanzas the blind rage of the elements" (H. Talvik), imposing the finality of perfect expression on the emotional turbulence of a world heading toward chaos. This is equally apparent in the extreme, explosive, but fully controlled condensation of Talvik and in the more many-sided output of Betti Alver, whose intense inner struggles are expressed with classical poignancy and clarity, her seriousness being tempered by self-irony, and sometimes also by warm humor. Bernard Kangro's sensitive application of legendary and country lore added a special touch to the verse of this group.

Since the Second World War, which led to the Sovietization of Estonia, only the refugees have been able to write freely and to produce real art. Some of them, especially Marie Under, Bernard Kangro in some of his work, and Gustav Suits in his last, extensive volume of verse, have grown in breadth and depth of outlook. New talents—Kalju Lepik, Ivar Grünthal, Harri Asi, Arno Vihaelemm, Raimond Kolk, Ilmar Laaban—vigorously voice the experiences of war and exile in a great variety of approaches, ranging from strict traditionalism to surrealism. Aleksis Rannit, though known before, has only recently developed his special style of delicate definition of impressions of art. Irony, rueful resignation, a delight in vivid, grotesque imagery characterize the strong rhythms of Arno Vihaelemm. Even greater irony, an aggressive, expansive temperament, and an insatiably probing intellect are prominent in the verse of Ivar Grünthal, whose metrical virtuosity can be dazzling. The dominant tone of Est. poetry—restless intellectual quest—remains strongly pronounced.

ANTHOLOGIES: Estonische Klänge, ed. A. Kallas (1911); Almanach estnischer Literatur und Kunst (1927); An Anthol. of Modern Est. Poetry, ed. W. K. Matthews (1953); Est. Lit. Reader, ed. A. Oras (1963).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: W. F. Kirby, The Hero of Estonia (2 v., 1895; on Kalevipoeg); M. Kampmaa, Eesti kirjandusloo peajooned (4 v., 1924-36; hist. of Est. lit.); F. R. Kreutzwald, Kalevipoeg (2 v., 1934-36); W. K. Matthews, "The Est. Sonnet," SEER, 25 (1946-47); E. H. Harris, Lit. in Estonia (2d enl. ed., 1953); H. Salu, Eesti vanem kirjandus (1953); G. Suits, Eesti kirjanduslugu, 1 (1953); A. Oras, "Est. Poetry," N.Y. Publ. Lib. Bull., 61 (1957) and "Storia della letteratura estone," in Storia delle letterature Baltiche, ed. G. Devoto (1957, 2d ed. in prep.); For A.O.: Studies in Est. Poetry and Language, ed. V. Kõressaar and A. Rannit (1964). A.O.

ESTRIBILLO. A refrain in Sp. lyrics and ballads which apparently originated in the zéjel (q.v.), of Arabic origin. The zéjel came through the Galician-Portuguese to the Sp. court lyric in the 14th c., where it developed into the cantiga, which in turn produced various types of poems during the pre-Renaissance period. In the early period the e. was the introductory stanza—stating the theme and often called cabeza or texto—of a poem and was repeated at the end of each stanza of the poem. Later it is sometimes found at the end of each stanza only.—Navarro. D.C.C.

ETHICAL CRITICISM. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF.

ETHIOPIAN POETRY may be divided into three classes: (1) verses written in Ge'ez (Ethiopic), a language which ceased to be spoken (except in the church) some four or five hundred years ago, though it remained the normal medium for literary expression until the end of the 18th c.; (2) popular verse composed in Amharic (now the official and most widely used language), Tigrinya, Tigré, Harari, or other local vernaculars; and (3) modern secular or semireligious poetry in Amharic.

In all types of Ge'ez poetry the principal formal characteristic is rhyme, which is constituted by consonant plus vowel (not vowel plus consonant): rhyming lines must end in the same combination of consonant and following vowel. When the last word in the line ends with what in ordinary speech is a consonant, in poetry a vowel (something between short e and short i) must be sounded after it. Vowels alone do not constitute a rhyme, though sometimes (notably in Tigré verse) a stanza may contain lines ending in, say, nu, ru, and lu, each occurring four or five times in no particular order. The general rule is for one full rhyme to persist for several lines, then for another to be started, differing in both consonant and vowel.

In most Ethiop. poetry meaning is more important than sound; the succession of images and metaphors aims at subtle allusion, not at beauty of words and rhythm. Thus in Ge'ez verse, which is almost exclusively religious in character, double meanings are ingeniously devised which often require, for their full understanding, a profound knowledge of the Bible, of sacred legends, and of dogma. A couplet will be admired for its concise allusiveness rather than for its musical sound. Ge'ez poems are normally intended to be sung to some traditional musical mode, which makes it less necessary to provide music in the words themselves.

In Ge'ez poetry there are several fixed types as regards number and length of lines, ranging from epigrammatic couplets through the 9-line mawaddes (praise) to long hymns—of which a favorite form is the malk'e (likeness) addressed usually to a saint; it consists of some fifty 5-line stanzas, each of which begins salām and is a salutation to a different physical or moral attribute of the subject. The earliest hymns are attributed to Yared, who lived in the 6th c., but the surviving poems mostly date from the 15th and succeeding c.; both in form and in content there has been little change of style, and in monastic schools, where the composition of Ge'ez verse continues to be taught, ancient models are faithfully followed. Ge'ez poems are also still written by and for learned ecclesiastics and laymen; their themes are sometimes secular, but they invariably contain allusions to sacred subjects.

Popular verse in Amharic and other vernaculars has for centuries been composed by professional minstrels, mostly at the courts of kings and princes, or at weddings, funerals, and other celebrations; the earliest known are 14th-c. songs in honor of the Emperor. Such verse is "occasional," and only a small proportion has more than a temporary vogue, when it relates to celebrated persons or events, or is exceptionally witty. There are also some love songs and patriotic ditties of recent date. Like Ge'ez poetry, popular verse aims at subtle allusion, through puns and plays on words, rather than at beauty of diction. For example:

Yimallisau inji iraññāu bāwwaqa—

Yammichilau yallam—yās lām ka-zallaqa.

A more or less literal translation is:

He will bring it back, indeed, will the herdsman, in (the way) he knows—
There is none (other) who can—that cow that has strayed.

A simple rustic situation is described in simple language. But it is possible to take yās lām not as "that cow" but as yā-(i)slām, "those Moslems." The couplet is now transformed: the "herdsman" stands for God; and zallaqa is to be taken in a secondary sense of "infiltrate," thus we have a pointed comment upon the infiltration into Christian Ethiopia of Moslems whom only God knows how to send away again.

It is only during the present c., and particularly since the restoration of independence in 1941, that Amharic has begun to be used for more individual poetic expression. Even so, the traditional rhyme system is followed, though with a tendency toward shorter series of rhymes. The usual line is a hexameter with a strong caesura in the middle. Poems are mostly lengthy and didactic, with morality and patriotism the commonest themes. Verse drama displays most variety and originality. The "elevated" style is characteristic of modern Ethiop. verse.

ANTHOLOGIES: Lieder der Tigrēstämme, ed. E. Littmann (Publications of the Princeton Expedition to Abyssinia, v. 3 [text], 4A, 4B [tr.], 1913); Matshafa qenē, ed. Heruy Walda-Sellāsī (1926; 1,100 Ge'ez poems); Inē-nnā wedājochē, ed. Heruy Walda-Sellāsī (1935; Ge'ez and Amharic poems); Yāddis zaman mazmur, ed. Yilmā Dērēsā (1941; 36 Amharic poems by young writers); Amāriññā qenē, ed. Māhtama-Sellāsī Walda-Masqal (1955; over 1,150 short Amharic poems, mostly anonymous); Malk'a qubā'ē, ed. Tesfā Gabra-Sellāsī (1955; coll. of Ge'ez hymns called malk'e).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: I. Guidi, Proverbi, strofe e racconti abissini (1896; with texts and tr.); M. Chaîne, "La poésie chez les Ethiopiens," Revue de l'Orient Chrétien, 3e sér., 2 (1920-21); M. Cohen, "Couplets amhariques du Choa," Jour. asiatique (Juillet-Sept. 1924); J. M. Harden, An Introd. to Ethiopic Christian Lit. (1926); I. Guidi, Storia della letteratura etiopica (1932); W. Leslau, "Chansons Harari," Rassegna di studi etiopici (1947); E. Cerulli, Storia della lett. etiopica (1956). s.w.

EUPHONY. The quality of having a pleasant and smooth-flowing sound, free from harshness; the opposite of cacophony. E. arises largely from ease of articulation. The vowel sounds, which demand no cessation of breath, are considered more euphonious than the consonants, with the longer vowels being preferred to the shorter. Of the consonant sounds the most euphonious are the liquids and semi-vowels: l, m, n, r, y, w. Poe, considering long o the most sonorous vowel and r the most reproducible consonant, chose "Nevermore" as refrain word for The Raven, a word combining three vowels, four liquids, and a soft v. Opinions differ as to the order in which the other consonants follow, but in general those most easily produced are felt to be most pleasing. E. results not only from choice of sounds but from their arrangement. Sounds may be arranged so that they flow easily into each other, or may be placed in difficult combinations, demanding more muscular effort. Meter also will play a role, sometimes clogging a line with heavy accents, sometimes spacing them out more agreeably.

The importance of e. to total poetic effect is a matter of dispute, some finding great pleasure in "linkèd sweetness long drawn out"; others insisting that "mere sound in itself can have no or little aesthetic effect" (Wellek and Warren). Since too much euphonioussness may give the effect of weakness, some poets (e.g., Browning) have reacted against it. In general, however, e. is a desired characteristic, and most poetry is more euphonious than ordinary speech. Nearly all would agree, however, that e. is to be desired chiefly as a means rather than as an end, and that the first test of its desirability is appropriateness. The lines "'Artillery' and 'armaments' and 'implements of war' / Are phrases too severe to please the gentle Muse" are much more euphonious than those written by Byron in Don Juan, but Byron's are much to be preferred as more consonant with their idea: "Bombs, drums, guns, bastions, batteries, bayonets, bullets,— / Hard words, which stick in the soft Muses' gullets." See also SOUND IN POETRY.—G. R. Stewart, The Technique of Eng. Verse (1930); A. Spire, Plaisir poétique et plaisir musculaire (1949).

L.P.

EUPHUISM describes the style and subject matter of John Lyly's two novels Euphues: the Anatomy of Wit (1578) and Euphues and His England (1580), as well as his comedies. There is every reason to confine the term to the twenty or thirty years of Lyly's vogue in England, and leave the term mannerism (q.v.) to cover all ornate styles.

It was long assumed that Lyly carried to extravagance certain stylistic traits of Humanist Ciceronianism, until M. Croll proposed what he considered more direct origins in rhetorical teachings of the Middle Ages. Whatever the ultimate origins, Lyly was strikingly anticipated by Antonio de Guevara (various of whose works went through twenty-four editions in Eng. before 1578) in the elaborate and persistent use of balance and antithesis both in sound and sense. Aside from style, there are other influences on Lyly, e.g., Renaissance treatises on the education of the courtier or prince. Not only did their conventional themes influence Lyly, but also their advocacy of elegance in manners and speech, and, in general, of the ideals of aristocratic refinement. Hence the significance of the name "Euphuus," meaning "well-grown."

All the characters in Euphuus discourse in the same polished manner, using a wealth of rhetorical devices, such as balance, antithesis, homocoteleuton, and paranomasia in numerous patterns. Moreover, learned allusions, elaborate comparisons and far-fetched metaphors occur without regard to any canon of verisimilitude. In general, e. is a highly analytical style which ceaselessly dissects, catalogues, compares, and contrasts; it aspires thereby to represent the polite discourse of urbane and elegant persons.

In determining the influence of e. on prose and poetry of the time, we must always consider the question of whether similarities come one from the other or whether they are merely parallel. One clear case of influence is found in the prose and even the verse of Shakespeare's early comedies, notably The Comedy of Errors, Two Gentlemen of Verona and Love's Labour's Lost. In these plays, and still more obviously in Henry IV, part 1 (2.4; direct parody of a passage from Euphuus), Shakespeare is satirizing affected euphuistic speech, but we must not assume that his satire is meant to be devastating; it was partly from Lyly that he learned to make his own style pointed, elegant, and witty.

While it is possible to trace the influence of e. on the drama, it is difficult to do the same in lyric poetry. Even Lyly's own lyrics hardly show the mark of e.; his one verse play is singularly free of it. In general, it can be said that e. had less of a chance in the lyric, because the exigencies of rhyme and stanza made such immediate demands that the additional formal requirements of e. could not easily be honored.—F. Landmann, Der Euphuismus, sein Wesen, seine Quelle, seine Geschichte (1881); C. G. Child, John Lyly and E. (1894); A. Feuillerat, John Lyly (1910); M. Croll, "Intro." to his and H. Clemons' ed. of Euphuus (1916); J. A. Barish, "The Prose Style of John Lyly," ELH, 23 (1956) and Ben Jonson and the Language of Prose Comedy (1960); G. K. Hunter, John Lyly (1962). L.N.

EVALUATION. The act of ascertaining or judging the value or worth (from L. valere, "to be strong," or "worthy") of a poem. Since the word may appear in relation to (1) a general theory of "value" (and, more specifically, aesthetic or poetic value), (2) the designation or analysis of specific "values" found in a poem (e.g., maturity, harmony, texture, irony), (3) the process of "evaluation" (sometimes "valuation"), or (4) the final result of this process—it has, in a sense, become almost synonymous in our day with "criticism" itself, as seen from a special point of view. Our concern here is to trace the development of that point of view and to discuss its achievements and the problems it presents.

HISTORY OF THE TERM. The critic or theorist who speaks of e. today is referring, mutatis mutandis, to the same general areas referred to by earlier critics who spoke of the problem, or the faculty, of taste (q.v.) and who pronounced judgment on poets and poems (see "Judicial criticism," under CRITICISM, TYPES OF). More or less rough equivalents of the modern notion of "value" were implicit in the Platonic Idea of the Good; in the Aristotelian "telos" (end), "entelechy," and final cause; and in the medieval and Renaissance concepts of "virtue." In the early stages of modern criticism, a "neo-classicist" might speak of a poet's "virtues" and "vices" (or "beauties" and "faults"); and, with the development of aesthetics, of Beauty in general (cf. Philosophies of Beauty, ed. E. Carritt, 1931).

The modern word was originally used in the sciences (referring especially to mathematical and physical "values"), but first gained more popular currency in economic theory (Adam Smith, in The Wealth of Nations, 1776). Thus, originally at least, it implied an attempt at technical precision.

In his three great Critiques, Kant attempted to justify the "validity" of the ancient trinity of values (Truth, Good, Beauty), in the face of the denial of their objective existence by the empirical science of his day; and the foundations of "value theory" were subsequently laid by post-Kantian philosophers, chiefly in Germany (R. H. Lotze and A. Ritschl, at Goettingen; C. von Ehrenfels, System der Werttheorie, 1897; A. Meinong, Zur Grundlegung der Allgemeinen Werttheorie, 1923). Nietzsche's "transvaluation of all values" (Zur Genealogie der Moral, 1887) and W. James's "pragmatism" (which considered values in relation to their practical consequences) were less technical explorations of the same problem. Out of an extensive and ever-growing literature in Eng., we may mention: W. M. Urban, Valuation: Its Nature and Laws, 1909; R. B. Perry, General Theory of Value, 1926; O. Pell, Value Theory and Criticism, 1930; J. Dewey, Theory of Valuation, 1939. As one practical consequence, these theories have led to new concepts and techniques of testing and grading students in educational situations (including literary composition), concerning which there is an extensive literature (A. Gates et al., Educational Psychology, 1942).

AXIOLOGY. We may well begin by asking what has been gained for poetics from the science of "axiology" (a word newly coined from a Gr. root to designate the general theory of value)—by speaking of e. rather than "judgment," of poetic "values" rather than "virtues" or "beauties"? In a sense, perhaps, comparatively little: a new fashion in terminology does not necessarily settle ancient issues, and we must beware of merely importing a specious "scientific" quality into discussions of the art of poetry. To cite one fairly typical example: W. Shumaker (Elements of Critical Theory, 1952) concludes an elaborate and sensitive exploration of e. with little more than the following (quoted from D. Daiches, New Literary Values, 1936): "The ideal criticism begins with a philosophic view of life as a whole, proceeds with the separating out of literary activity from human activity in general and the assessing of their mutual relations, deducing from this a norm of literary value, and concludes by the application of this standard to the individual instance." In such a sensible statement, however one may want to criticize it, certain classical conceptions of criticism may have been made a bit more precise, perhaps, but they hardly seem to have been superseded. The achievement we are attempting to summarize thus consists chiefly of: (1) the restatement and clarification (sometimes complication—whether useful or not, is a matter for debate in each instance) of certain fundamental distinctions and issues; and (2) an attempted reunification of realms which modern philosophy and practice (unlike that of the Greeks) have tended to keep separate.

Axiology seeks to establish a soundly based theory of value in general, and to distinguish the various forms or species of that genus. Theories of value tend naturally to be influenced by more general philosophical positions, particularly those that have to do with the objectivity and subjectivity of phenomena, and some of the issues that cluster around this polarity will be touched on in the section on the locus of aesthetic values. Furthermore, since controversy on fundamental principles is still very much alive, any single theory of value will probably fail to satisfy certain needs and, particularly when stated briefly and without development or qualification, be open to some objections. Nevertheless, we offer the following as a widely accepted definition of "value" useful for our purposes: A quality of an object or experience which arouses and/or satisfies our interest, appreciation, or desire. The latter are all psychological terms, and value theories often carry the implication (if not the explicit invocation) of a hedonistic psychology. This general quality may then be subdivided into classes: economic, ethical (including the social and political), aesthetic, logical (as when certain logicians speak of "truth-value"), religious—and perhaps others, which are probably subdivisions of one or another of these.

A primary distinction is that between instrumental and intrinsic (or terminal or immediate) values: e.g., the "exchange value" of gold, as against its color and hardness; the lamp originally created primarily as a means of illumination, as against the same lamp exhibited in an art museum as an object of beauty; and the use of literature for purposes of propaganda, as against the "purely poetic values of the poem, however these may be defined. Obviously, what originally had instrumental value only, or chiefly, may come to be cherished for their intrinsic values, as "goods in themselves." Most value theorists restrict the latter to the ethical, logical, aesthetic, and religious values (good, truth, beauty, holiness, in early philosophies). These major kinds of intrinsic value, though attempts may sometimes be made to reduce some of them to others, seem to be more or less clearly distinguishable. They are also, however, naturally related to one another, within our experiences (as Dante's Divine Comedy, Pope's Essay on Man, or any poem for that matter, may be read in terms of any one of these values, or of all four together), and also in the sense that one such value may be "weighed" against another (as a poem may be found to forego aesthetic subtlety of form in order to achieve clarity of statement; or as a reader may choose to overlook the theology of Milton's Paradise Lost the better to enjoy its "organ tones").

Most contemporary theories tend to treat values as relative to human situations and to the personal limitations of those who experience them. However, in the past there have often been attempts to relate them to one another in terms of some hierarchy or scale, leading up to Absolute Value, which has been seen as an ultimate Reality (sometimes God), or at least as the ultimate standard by which the others are "weighed." One recent theory sees values as more or less elaborate rationalizations (in the best sense of that much-abused word) of the primitive fact of choice or preference: "I like Keats" becomes "Keats is a good poet because. . ."; and, on a higher level of complexity, "I like Keats better than Shelley" becomes "Keats is a better poet than Shelley because. . ." On the false analogy of economics, where "price" (cf. the value-verb: "to prize") provides a neutral measure, various attempts have been made with limited success, to translate the conditions of these choices into quantitative terms—as with Bentham's "hedonistic calculus" of his utilitarian ethics, and grading scales in commerce and education (but see G. D. Birkhoff's persuasive Aesthetic Measure, 1933). As against the methods of comparison and measurement, there is a point of view which stresses the uniqueness of each individual person, experience, work of art, or value situation.

THE LOCUS OF AESTHETIC VALUES. It is sometimes held that poetry is most properly appreciated for its intrinsic (or internal) values, and that so-called nonpoetic elements (philosophic or religious ideas, political propaganda, etc.) are to be excluded from evaluation (Abbé Bremond, La poésie pure, 1926)—in opposition to the ancient tradition which held that poetry should teach as well as delight (Horace) and should move to right action (Minturno, Sidney). This scientific attitude—which is as old as Aristotle, though it has been given special emphases by modern critics—usually involves close attention to the internal relations of parts in the poem, to its formal values (hence the label “formalism”) considered more or less as ends in themselves: e.g., unity and variety, antithesis and contrast, structure and pattern, and so forth. The classical tradition, however, especially those aspects of it embodied in principles of rhetoric (for example, decorum), would urge us to relate the formal aspects of the poem or oration to the immediate and ultimate ends it is designed to serve and to the motives of the poet or orator, with inevitable consequences for our evaluations. Thus, a work of propaganda, or didactic poetry, may also be great literature—and in such a case it is artificial to separate its formal values from the values of the cause it is designed to serve, or the truths it seeks to teach.

In the total aesthetic situation, we encounter a complex interplay of (1) the poet, (2) the poem, and (3) the reader-critic, the first two involving the process of expression, and the poem acting eventually as a vehicle of communication between the poet and the reader. Thus, aesthetic values may be viewed in any of three ways, at least, depending on who is involved and where the critic may choose to place his primary emphasis: (1) as expressive of the poet's intention, to the extent that this can be ascertained; (2) in terms of the poem itself, not excluding its various contexts, past and present; or (3) in terms of the immediate experience of the critic as he reads the poem. Since the first alternative tends to lead away from immediate values into second-hand statements, which may or may not be relevant to the poem, or into problems of biographical or historical fact which are scientific and not aesthetic in essence, the last two would seem to bring us closest to the poetic values themselves; and the locus of critical reading would seem to lie in a constant interaction between the qualities of the poem as an aesthetic object and the subjective states of mind of the reader. The full exploration of this question would involve us, ultimately, in metaphysical issues (see ANALYSIS, especially the references to Pepper and Wellek). What concerns the less philosophical critic more immediately is the problem of the validity of his evaluations: Are these merely subjective, his own private preferences or hallucinations which might result in an attitude of extreme impressionism or relativism? Or are they objective facts, that should be shared by all or most men—resulting in an emphasis on tradition (the “common reader”) and attempts at scientific objectivity?

Since both extremes can easily be shown to be wrong in some respects (i.e., to have their limitations), the truth probably lies somewhere between. The most useful formulation is that which locates the values of the poem in the aesthetic experience of the poem, giving that term its fullest possible significance as representing the total “interaction of the organism with its environment”—in this case, of “the live creature” with “the expressive object” or poem, to use Dewey's language in Art as Experience (1934). In the aesthetic experience itself there occurs a fusion of the outer and the inner, an organization of energies such that “the object and pleasure are one and undivided in the experience.” E. Vivas, a critical follower of Dewey, has stated the case, briefly and well, for what he calls an “objective relativism,” according to which “we evince interest in [the work of art] because it actually possesses objective features that are capable of eliciting our [one's] interest” (art. on “Value,” Dictionary of World Literature, ed. J. Shipley, 1943). Only by some such formulation, we think, can justice be done both to the subjective variety of tastes, and the intimate nature of the aesthetic experience, on the one hand; and to the sense we have that our poetic values are not merely arbitrary, and to the objective social and educative functions of poetry, on the other.

THE PROCESS OF EVALUATION. Though metaphysical issues may, in one fashion or another, ultimately determine our judgments, philosophical training is no sure guarantee of sensibility or taste. For the study of poetry, then, broad generalities may be less useful than an examination of the actual process of e. as it may be observed in our own reading and in the practice of critics.

The first point to be made, perhaps, is the great variation—not incompatible with objectivity—not only of judgments, but also of methods and styles of criticism (“’Tis with our judgments as our watches, none / Go just alike, yet each believes his own”); some may depend more on intuition and aperçus—others, on rules and principles; some may prefer obiter dicta—others, to “damn with faint praise.” Also, since criticism is, after all, not a science, but an art, our evaluations (the end-results of the process), especially of poetry, can never be made mathematically exact, but change with time, within an individual's biography and in the development of a literary tradition, even in relation to the very greatest poems and poets. We can only venture a few tentative generalizations, then, about this most subtle and mercurial of processes.

The first set of problems encountered revolves around the element of "immediacy" in our evaluations. On first acquaintance, before the intellect has had much chance to meddle, we like or dislike a poem, or it leaves us indifferent: ". . . The reason why I cannot tell; But this alone I know full well, I do not love thee, Doctor Fell." Or we are gripped, rapt, thrilled, moved: "don't ask me why." The initial e. distinction is therefore: "This poem is worthy of my interest and attention—that one is not." The sources of such preferences may vary considerably: some are the products of training, of the conventions of one's age or circle (social or literary), of mere habit, and even of "irrelevant" prejudices; some may be the results of "chance," as when a poem finds an immediate response in a receptive public, or is "stillborn" because it fails to find readers (perhaps to be discovered by a later generation, as with Emily Dickinson and Gerard Manley Hopkins). At the stage of immediacy, the emphasis may be on partial values ("What a lovely line!" "The perfect word." "How unexpectedly true!"), rather than on a total evaluation: the appeal to the ear, the sense of texture (Edith Sitwell, John Crowe Ransom, R. P. Blackmur), and so forth. In relation to these it is difficult to distinguish instinctive elements of feeling from that high degree of training which may result in a kind of "immediate analysis."

The next set of problems has to do with the rationalization of such immediately sensed values, and this is the part of the process which is most usually called "critical." The two essential processes are those of (1) analysis—with its twin, synthesis; and (2) abstraction. The poem, as an historical entity, both has its unique inner form and is involved in an intricate web of organic relationships with its poet-creator and critic-reader. To put a very complex matter briefly, these various relationships, both those internal to the text and those external to it, may be explored and analyzed more or less thoroughly: some degree at least of such exploratory analysis seems to be necessary for a truly critical e. (See ANALYSIS).

But the relationships between these two elements are not easy to state clearly. Shumaker (op. cit., esp. ch. 8: "Moving from Analysis to Evaluation") considers the problem in some detail (using an article by A. Kaplan, "On the So-Called Crisis in Criticism," JAAC, Sept. 1948), only to come out with the negative conclusion that none of the theoretical explanations is wholly satisfactory: (1) logical consequence (for example: complexity is valuable; this poem has such-and-such complexities; therefore, it is a good poem—the Q.E.D. need not follow); (2) verification (the initial judgment is in the nature of an hypothesis—but the "evidence" for or against it presumably offered by textual analysis is not "scientific" since it assumes to begin with the very values to be verified; and (3) causal (analysis, by helping us to perceive values, causes appreciation—but the desired e. need not necessarily follow, as every teacher has had occasion to know!). As Shumaker puts it: "Only value facts have evaluative consequences. Facts-simple (analytic findings) have none." A similar distinction between the processes of description and judgment is made by M. C. Beardsley (Aesthetics, 1958).

However, in defiance of such reasonings, the practical (historical and educative) fact remains that the two have gone, and do go, hand in hand. Perhaps all we need keep in mind is the caution to "judge in detail and judge while analyzing, instead of making the judgment a pronouncement in the final paragraph" (Wellek and Warren, Theory of Literature, ch. 18, our italics; this entire chapter is a penetrating exploration of problems of e., from a formalist point of view. See also W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., "Explication as Criticism," The Verbal Icon).

Another problem much debated in recent criticism is that of abstraction. Obviously, any discourse about a poem necessarily involves some degree of both analysis and abstraction; what is meant by those who speak of "the heresy of paraphrase" (e.g., Cleanth Brooks, The Well Wrought Urn, ch. 11) is that the critic's abstraction should not be taken as an equivalent of, or substitute for, the poem itself. Each poem is indeed, in a trivial sense, unique; but the logical reductio ad absurdum of an emphasis on this fact would be that all the critic-evaluator could properly do is quote the entire poem, and let it speak for itself. No abstraction can ever be completely "true"; therefore, we make a distinction between false and true abstractions, and our effort (shared by the philosopher and scientist) is to make our abstractions as true as possible (S. J. Kahn, Science and Aesthetic Judgment, 1953, ch. 4). The first level of abstraction would be that involved in the initial analysis or paraphrase of the poem; a next would result from comparisons made among the poems by one writer, or among those of a number of writers; and thus we may proceed by stages to the highest level, in theories of poetics and aesthetics. On none of these levels is it possible to avoid making value judgments, and presumably the "truer" the abstraction, the sounder will be the judgment with which it is involved.

No single sketch of the process of e. could cover more than a fraction of the actual cases, since each critic's procedure is properly individual, but that analysis and abstraction must be involved at one stage or another seems indisputable. They are present, if only implicitly, even in the most impressionistic critical sketch.

TOTAL E. AND ITS CRITERIA. The highest stage of abstraction and synthesis is achieved by what T. S. Eliot, in "Tradition and the Individual Talent," called the "ordering" of the values found in, for example, a national literature, or the European tradition, and ultimately in "world literature." This raises the problem of greatness vs. mediocrity, the ranking of poems and poets according to hierarchies or scales of value, and of the criteria or standards by which we make such total evaluations.

The difficulties here encountered may spring from the changes in our feelings (of respect, reverence, or spontaneous affection) toward the great poetry of the past, and the desire to justify new values introduced by modern innovators. However, the fact remains that, despite constant demotions and promotions in the lower echelons, the top-generals of the poetic army seem to remain secure in their eminence down the ages: Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, at least, "have a permanent, though not a 'fixed' position" (Wellek and Warren). It is when we attempt to state philosophically the grounds for such rankings, in terms of specific criteria, that the value differences emerge most clearly.

To cite one example: T. M. Greene, in The Arts and the Art of Criticism (1947), invokes four general criteria which he discusses under the headings of "style, perfection, truth, and greatness." At first glance, there may seem to be a conflict between the first two and the last two of these criteria, especially in modern literature: thus, perfection of a limited sort seems most possible to the minor poet or poem ("In small proportions, we just beauty see; And in short measures, life may perfect be"); while the striving toward "truth" and "greatness" (which are extra-aesthetic criteria) may imply the penalty, or at least risk, of disproportion and occasional dullness or bathos (with perhaps two exceptions: Homer and Dante). A similar conflict of values seems to recur in a variety of forms: the beauty-sublimity distinction (Edmund Burke, Kant); the classical vs. the romantic styles of beauty; so-called easy vs. difficult beauty (Bosanquet, Three Lectures on Aesthetic, 1915)—though few things are more difficult to achieve than "easy beauty"; and the contrasting values of simplicity and complexity (see C. Lalo, "The Aesthetic Analysis of a Work of Art," JAAC, June, 1949).

G. Boas (A Primer for Critics, 1937) argues for the principle of "multivalence," a form of the complexity-principle which would account for the recurrent appeal of great works to various individuals and ages (a criterion found in Longinus and Dr. Johnson) by the multiplicity or richness of values they embody. S. C. Pepper (The Basis of Criticism in the Arts, 1945) expounds a systematic eclecticism, presenting the critic with four sets of more or less equally valid criteria (mechanistic, formistic, contextualistic, organistic). Cleanth Brooks may represent the dominant values of an influential and gifted group loosely referred to as the "New Critics" in his assumption of such criteria as "functional imagery, irony, and complexity of attitude" (op. cit., appendix 1, "Criticism, History, and Critical Relativism"). Greene, however, provides a more liberally conceived analysis of artistic perfection (different from the more limited one suggested above) in terms of Aristotle's doctrine of the mean, as the resolution of three "polar tensions": (1) simplicity and complexity, into organic unity; (2) order and novelty, into expressive originality; and (3) denial of the medium and overinsistence on the medium (in poetry: language), into expressive exploitation of the medium (op. cit., ch. 22). For the issues which have clustered around such concepts as "style," "greatness," and "artistic truth," the reader is referred to Greene's work, or to comparable discussions.

It seems to the present writer that the organic concept, adequately developed and applied can do justice (without relaxing into a lazy eclecticism) to the widest range of criteria and values, including those developed by Greene. In opposition to those critics who, in the name of "pure poetry," would reject criteria drawn from life (ethics, society, science, religion), we are committed to the acceptance of the latter, in one form or another, by our earlier position on "interaction" and on the relevance of both internal and external relationships to poetic analyses: aesthetic values are practically meaningless or empty without the context of other human values to which they give expression or are otherwise related.

CONCLUSIONS: Is it possible to make any large generalizations concerning the traits of an "evaluative" critic, as distinct from the earlier varieties? We think not. Perhaps the "science of value" is too young and unsettled as yet to permit us to do more than discern certain tendencies. To begin with, the extensive theoretical discussions have not been carried to the point where they can provide a substitute for "good taste"; as Wellek and Warren conclude: "A reasoned judgment, in matters of literature, cannot be formulated save on the basis of some sensibility, immediate or derivative" (our italics). Central, perhaps, to the "evaluators" has been a desire to create for poetry an autonomous realm, in terms of purely aesthetic principles; but, in actual practice, they have not been able to ignore (though they have often tried to restate) such extra-aesthetic issues as are presented by religious or political "beliefs," or to escape the truth of T. S. Eliot's remark: "The 'greatness' of literature cannot be determined solely by literary standards. . . ." The upshot of our exploration of the implications of axiology for poetry may be little more startling than a restatement of the need for a sense of proportions and a "sense of the whole" (the whole poem and the whole of life) for a proper assessment of values—a clearer, because more explicit, form of Arnold's injunction "to see life steadily and see it whole." If no final definition of "poetic value" has emerged, the complex possibilities may have been more fully explored and spread out to view in this recent literature, than in most earlier theories of criticism. And if no final set of criteria or standards has been provided for the practicing critic to override the age-old differences of schools of taste, value-theory has at least made the process of e. more mature, more aware, and thus more responsible, by clarifying some of the hidden assumptions upon which evaluations may actually be based.

ADDITIONAL BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. AND AESTHETICS: B. Croce, Aesthetic (best Eng. ed. 1922) and The Essence of Aesthetic (1921), both tr. D. Ainslie; L. A. Reid, A Study in Aesthetics (1931); B. C. Heyl, New Bearings in Esthetics and Art Crit.: A Study in Semantics and E. (1943); W. Empson, The Structure of Complex Words (1951; chs. on value theory); R. McKeon, "The Philos. Bases of Art and Crit.," Critics and Crit., ed. R. S. Crane (1952); Symbol and Values: An Initial Study, ed. L. Bryson et al. (1954; a symposium); Proceedings of the Third International Congress on Aesthetics (Torino, 1957; see under the headings: "Valore, Giudizio, Critica") and the Fourth International Congress on Aesthetics (Athens, 1961; see under the headings: "Aesthetic and Critical Judgment," "Functional Value and Artistic Value"); Rivista di Estetica, III (1958); M. C. Beardsley, Aesthetics (1958; ch. 10: "Crit. E." and ch. 11: "Aesthetic Value").

THEORY OF VALUE: H. Muensterberg, Eternal Values (1909); B. Bosanquet, The Principle of Individuality and Value (1912); D. W. Prall, A Study in the Theory of Value (1921); W. M. Urban, "Theory of Value," Ency. Britannica (14th ed., 1928, 1932); S. Alexander, Beauty and

Other Forms of Value (1933); J. R. Reid, A Theory of Value (1938); C. I. Lewis, An Analysis of Knowledge and Valuation (1946); De Witt H. Parker, The Philosophy of Value (1957); S. C. Pepper, The Sources of Value (1958); W. J. Oates, Aristotle and the Problem of Value (1963).
s.J.K.

EXEMPLUM. A short narrative used to illustrate a moral point. The term is applied chiefly to the stories used in medieval sermons, though the illustrative anecdote is still, perhaps, the commonest feature of public speaking. Chaucer's Pardoner's Tale furnishes an example; not only the main story but many lesser narratives are used as exempla of the Pardoner's text. The most famous source of such stories was the L. prose Gesta Romanorum (13th c.), but collections for the use of preachers were also made in poetic form, e.g., Handlyng Synne (begun 1303) by Robert Mannyng of Brunne, a treatise on the Seven Deadly Sins with illustrative stories. A secular use is shown in John Gower's poem, Confessio Amantis (ca. 1385), where the exempla illustrate sins against Venus.—G. R. Owst, Preaching in Medieval England (1927) and Lit. and Pulpit in Medieval England (1933); J.-Th. Welter, L'Exemplum dans la litt. religieuse et didactique du moyen âge (1927).
R.P.APR.

EXOTICISM. Any persistent incidence in poetry of nostalgia directed toward the distant and the strange for the sake of novelty is a manifestation of e. Poetry in the exotic mode is usually reflective upon objects and settings foreign to the culture of the artist. It may be clearly distinguished from primitivism (q.v.) by its superficial concerns. Primitivism implies a search for ideal states of human society, the artist turning from his own culture in recognition of its inherent evils. E. displays indifference to questions of cultural adequacy; it is marked by sensuous reverie upon the distant and the untried. A condition for its appearance in poetry would seem to be eclecticism in sophisticated taste. In the arts of design the exploration of foreign cultures creates a taste for objects of strange color or unaccustomed voluptuousness, as in, for example, an eclectic architectural style which imports Islamic motifs and superimposes these upon indigenous forms. E. in the arts, and particularly in poetry, often derives from the literature of travel. In poetry of the 19th and 20th c. e. is related to Orientalism in Western art. The interest of Théophile Gautier and his daughter Judith in the arts of China, Japan, and the Near East gave to Fr. poetry of the latter 19th c. a distinctive preoccupation with the imagined qualities of Asian cultures. Judith Gautier's Livre de Jade (1867) exerted a particularly strong influence upon a generation of exotic poets, among whom Hérédia, Cros, Bouilhet, and Renaud figure prominently. In Germany a comparable exotic Orientalism appeared some years later in such collections of verse as Die chinesische Flöte (1907) by Hans Bethge. The interests of the Fr. school are also reflected in the e. of the Am. imagist poets, particularly John Gould Fletcher and Amy Lowell. Fletcher's "Oriental" Symphonies, written during 1914 and 1915, are poetic reveries upon Chinese landscape. His influence is evident in Miss Lowell's "Japanese" poems in Pictures of the Floating World and Fir-Flower Tablets (1919).

In all critical discussions of e. in poetry a clear distinction should be made between pure e. in the work of the Fr. school and its derivatives, and exotic elements as in the work of poets not primarily exotic. The poetry of William Butler Yeats, for example, frequently exhibits exotic motifs (e.g., Lapis Lazuli). Yet it is quite apparent that Yeats is concerned with major issues of human existence rather than with exotic excursions of a vagrant fancy. —Poésies de l'époque des Thang, tr. D'Hervey-Saint-Denis (1862); H. Bethge, Die chinesische Flöte (1907); L. Cranmer-Byng, A Lute of Jade (1909); A. Lowell, Pictures of the Floating World (1919); W. L. Schwartz, The Imaginative Interpretation of the Far East in Modern Fr. Lit., 1800-1925 (1927); P. Jourda, L'Exotisme dans la litt. fr. depuis Chateaubriand (1938); J. G. Fletcher, Selected Poems (1938); M. D. Camacho, Judith Gautier (1939); J. Baird, Ishmael (1956). J.B.

EXPLICATION. Also called formal, structural, or textual analysis, e. examines poetry or any work of literature for a knowledge of each part and for the relation of these parts to the whole. For Eng. poetry it begins in the late 1920's with Laura Riding and Robert Graves's A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1928), I. A. Richards' Practical Criticism (1929), and William Empson's Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930). The relation of these critics to explication de texte as practiced in Fr. and British schools seems inescapable, though the educational use seldom went beyond paraphrase. They probably did not know the earlier Rus. formalism (q.v.); and while e. was implicit in Aristotle, had appeared once in Longinus, and occurred in neoclassical critics, Richards and his associates derived mostly from Coleridge's organic concept of poetry. Cleanth Brooks introduced e. into the United States and brought it a widespread following through Understanding Poetry (1939), written with Robert Penn Warren. All the New Critics have made e. the basis of their findings, and so have the Chicago Critics (but with some differences in theory). Such periodicals as Scrutiny (1932-1953), Southern Review (1935-1942), Kenyon Review (1939-), and Essays in Criticism (1951-) contain many explications; and The Explicator (1942-), which has popularized the term, has been devoted solely to them. Though today few critical essays or books fail to use e., the movement has had many detractors—principally in its early years among literary historians and more recently among proponents of a mythic approach to poetry.

Poetry, as seen by e., is characterized by three major qualities. Self-sufficiency, the first of these, affirms the poem as impersonal and autonomous. Biographical considerations are ignored or at most given slight regard, poetry is detached from its historical context, and the poem is judged for itself rather than for its effect upon a reader. In place of intentional, historical, and affective fallacies, the starting place becomes the point of view within the poem and the tone that develops from it. A second major characteristic, that of unity, is traditional. But e. has insisted upon a comprehensive organicism, has studied the relation of structure and materials, has usually urged the importance of theme, and has occupied itself with the contextuality of poetic truth. A final characteristic is complexity, which stands in antithesis to a simplicity of plainness but not to a simplicity of articulated function. Rather, it senses unity through a discordia concors that informs all good poetry and not merely that of the metaphysical school. In its zeal e. has at times attempted too much in revealing ironies, ambiguities, and paradoxes, but whether or not they are the central element of poetry as some have held, the pervasiveness of some kind of countersuggestion in the language and symbols of poetry and in their fusion has won recognition. In treating all these qualities various groups and individuals exhibit differences, and none urge the characteristics as absolute, since to make a poem unmitigatedly unique would not allow a reader to comprehend it in any degree.

E. does not claim to be an act of evaluation (q.v.), but rather to serve as the basis of literary criticism and history. As W. K. Wimsatt has shown ("Explication as Criticism"), there are serious problems in adjusting the polarities of part and whole, value and disvalue, and value and neutrality. Though he believes that "the extreme theory of explicative criticism cuts apart understanding and value," he also regards successful e. as rising "from neutrality gradually and convincingly to the point of total judgment." When the organic form has been established in its self-sufficiency and complexity, a judgment upon the relationship quite naturally follows. See also ANALYSIS; MODERN POETICS. 20TH C. FR.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: R. P. Basler, C. C. Walcutt, M. Greenhut, et al., "A Checklist of E.," Explicator, 3—(1945—), June issues; G. Arms and J. M. Kuntz, Poetry E.: A Checklist (1950; rev. ed. by Kuntz, 1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: Wellek and Warren, ch. 12; L. Fiedler et al., My "Credo," KR, 12-13 (1950-51); W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., "E. as Crit.," EIE 1951, and The Verbal Icon (1954); Crane; J. P. Kirby, "'The Last Verse . . . Is Not Sufficiently Explicated!'" Va. Librarian, 2 (1956); Daiches, ch. 15; Krieger; Wimsatt and Brooks, "Epilogue"; G. Arms, "Poetry," Contemporary Lit. Scholarship, ed. L. Leary (1958). See also E. as Crit., ed. Wimsatt (1963). G.A.

EXPOSITION (of a plot). See PLOT.

EXPRESSION, THEORY OF. Rhetoric has always been concerned with e. or elocutio. The perfectly achieved expression of a thought in words was always considered a poetic beauty. The complete adjustment of the words to the thought was seen to be an organic unity already by Cicero (De Oratore 3. 5-6). In the Renaissance a theory of poetry as e. emerges in G. Fracastoro's Naugerius (1555): "The poet has no other aim than to speak well, absolutely, about anything that suggests itself to him" (Kelso ed., p. 59). In the 17th c. aesthetics developed out of the rhetorical theory of elocution in contrast with the dialectical theory of logic. In the early 18th c. Pope said: "... true expression, like the unchanging sun, / Clears, and improves, whate'er it shines upon." (Essay on Criticism, 315-16). In the later 18th c. Romantic poetics (e.g., Herder) asserted that true e. is inseparable from thought. In 19th-c. England a theory of emotional e. was developed by several critics. Coleridge stressed the organic unity of thought and e.: e.g., Biographia Literaria (1817), ch. 1. In 1833 J. S. Mill argued that poetry is "the expression or uttering forth of feeling" and consequently lyrical poetry was "more eminently and peculiarly poetic than any other." At about the same time John Keble in his lectures (1832-41) developed the theory that poetry is the indirect e. of emotions too strong to be expressed directly. Both the substance of plot and the form of meter were considered by him indirect expressions of emotion. In 1857 George Eliot spoke of the poet as always "true to his own . . . inward vision" or "mental state"; this became "truth to the vision within" in Walter Pater's Essay on Style (1888), which contains the most advanced expressionist theory of the age: "all beauty is in the long run only fineness of truth, or what we call expression, the finer accommodation of speech to that vision within." In this aesthetic truth Pater found the absolute ("that absolute accordance of expression to idea") which he could not find elsewhere. An Eng. philosopher of the idealistic school, R. L. Nettleship, made the organic unity still tighter: "The feeling is not truly felt till it is expressed, and in being expressed it is still felt but in a different way . . . so that it is not strictly correct to call the word the expression of what we meant before we found it" (Remains, 1, 132). On the continent an expressionist aesthetic was formulated by Eugène Véron in the 1870's: "Art is the manifestation of emotion, obtaining external interpretation now by expressive arrangements of line, form or color, now by a series of gestures, sounds or words governed by particular rhythmical cadence" (tr., p. 89).

But the most comprehensive theory of poetry (and art in general) as e. was worked out by Benedetto Croce. He began in 1893 by turning Hegel's "Beauty is the sensuous manifestation of the Idea" into "Beauty is the expression of a content." In the Aesthetic of 1902 he argued that poetic e. is not the direct e. of emotion, but the e. of an intuition. An intuition for Croce is the fully fashioned mental picture of a particular object: a character, a place, an incident, a story. It is through the mental picture, or "image," that the emotion is expressed. The act of e. is defined as an a priori synthesis: the emotion does not exist until it is expressed, the image exists only as the e. of the emotion (cf. Nettleship above). Thus Hamlet is for Croce the expression of a mood of melancholy and disgust with life, a mood such as no one expressed before and which can be conveyed only by the pattern of words which the poet chose for it. The characters, the situations, the action and the catastrophe are all expressions of different shades and tones of the basic mood and in perfect work of art constitute an indissoluble unity. From the example given it will be clear that the theory considers that all kinds of poetry are basically expressive of emotion, whether they are narrative or dramatic in form, and that all genres are basically one, the lyrical. This provides the foundation for a theory of criticism which offers three objects to the critic: the image, the emotion, and the way the two are fitted together. The function of the critic is to characterize the image, to define the lyrical theme or emotion, and to evaluate their adjustment. In a defective poem there is either excess of emotion over the image (romantic poetry) or a deficiency of emotion, which is replaced by the repetition of images taken from other works (classicism).

According to Croce the modes of e. do not preexist to the act of e., so there is no fixed poetic vocabulary, no set pattern of style or laws of composition or structural principles other than those required by the particular subject of the individual poem, and these are not good for any other poem. However, every act of e. arises upon previous acts of e., and uses them as raw material: every image is a synthesis of previous images, integrated in a new manner to suit the new emotion. The converse of this, which may be called the principle of integration, is the principle of contextuality: single words exist only in context, isolated words are mere abstractions catalogued in dictionaries. The unit of e. is not the word but the sentence, understood not in the grammatical sense but as a complete unit of meaning, whether consisting of a single phrase or of a whole poem. Both these principles are reducible to one organic unity or, as Croce calls it, a priori synthesis.

Croce dealt with the theory of poetry most fully in his untranslated book, La Poesia (1936). Here he acknowledged that set forms and patterns, while not regulative, are useful to the poet as reminders of previous expressions: the poet should keep them in mind and allow them to operate upon his mind. Some of them will become part of a new e. in a way that is unpredictable in advance. Also, the structure of a long poem or drama is now seen as a device which is sometimes unpoetic but which the poet adopts to bring together different groups of images, and it cannot be eliminated without breaking up the whole poem. On the other hand it must not be evaluated as a form of art, for it is something external to poetry. Instances of such "structural parts" are the expository portions of poems and plays, the chorus in Gr. tragedy, and incidents or characters which are introduced to carry on the action. Indeed, plot is often a mere traditional framework "upon which a poet weaves his own poetry, sometimes covering up and concealing the warp completely, at other times allowing it to remain visible to a greater or smaller extent." Such are the plots of Shakespeare. Poetic e. must also be distinguished from other forms of e. which have practical or expository purposes, such as "oratory" which for Croce is any form of writing which is addressed to the emotions rather than to the imagination. See also POETRY, THEORIES OF (EXPRESSIVE THEORIES).

E. Véron, Aesthetics, tr. W. H. Armstrong (1879); R. L. Nettleship, Philos. Lectures and Remains (1897); B. Croce, The Essence of Aesthetic, tr. D. Ainslie (1921), Aesthetic as Science of E. and General Linguistics, tr. D. A. (2d ed., 1922), Conversazioni critiche, III (1932), 36-39 (for the rhetorical tradition), La poesia (1936); G. Collingwood, The Principles of Art (1938); C. La Dièrre, "E." in Shipley; Abrams; G. N. G. Orsini, B. Croce as Philosopher of Art and Lit. Critic (1961). G.N.G.O.

EXPRESSIONISM. A term coined, probably by L. Vauxcelles, after a series of paintings by Julien-Auguste Hervé exhibited in 1901 under the title Expressionismes. In Germany, where it was most frequently used, it was first applied to painting around 1911 and to literature around 1914. Mainly concerned with the forceful representation of emotions, the expressionist painters took recourse to ever more abstract configurations and, on the whole, preferred nonrealistic technique to the use of local color. Edvard Munch and van Gogh (in his final phase) are usually regarded as forerunners of pictorial e. In France, the movement came to the fore with the first exhibition of Les Fauves in 1905. In Germany, the Brücke group held its first exhibition in 1906, while Der Blaue Reiter followed approximately five years later. The chief theorists of e. in art are Wilhelm Worringer (Abstraktion und Einfühlung, 1908) and Wassily Kandinsky (Über das Geistige in der Kunst, 1912). In literature, Kasimir Edschmid (Über den Expressionismus in der Literatur und die neue Dichtung, 1919) became its principal spokesman.

While it is impossible to find a common denominator for all the qualities generally supposed to be typical of literary e., a few critical observations may elucidate the major tendencies of the movement. The expressionistic practice springs from a violent anti-realism and is based on the refusal to imitate, repeat, reproduce that which already exists ("Die Welt ist da. Es wäre sinnlos, sie zu wiederholen"—The world is there. It would make no sense to repeat it). Instead, turning toward the soul, the expressionists sought to capture its movements in their prearticulate purity. Hence their urge to abstract from reality, to give "Farbe ohne Bezeichnung, Zeichnung und kein Erklären, im Rhythmus festgesetztes Hauptwort ohne Attribut" (Däbeler—Color without name, drawing [or image] without explanation, rhythmically determined noun without attributes). As irrationalists and visionaries, they poured out their emotions ecstatically and with a pathos almost forgotten since the age of the Storm and Stress (see STURM UND DRANG). In the expressionistic plays and poems, expression always precedes, and thus determines, form—rhythm being far more important than harmony. This explains the disjointed syntax, the dynamic use of imagery and the discontinuity of thought and action. Repudiating the aesthetic world view of impressionism (q.v.), the expressionist is preoccupied with man and his fate in a world about to disintegrate. He is a humanist before, a pacifist during and a socialist after the war. He also considers his art to be merely the outward manifestation of a new ethos.

In Germany, as elsewhere, e. is most characteristically represented in poetry and the drama. Under the influence of Strindberg, German expressionist playwrights from Wedekind to Barlach have made significant contributions to world literature. In poetry, the era of e. extends from approximately 1910 to the mid-twenties, when it was supplanted by that of surrealism (q.v.) and of the new realism known as Neue Sachlichkeit and exemplified by the poems of Bertolt Brecht's Hauspostille (1927). Subdivisions were first introduced by H. E. Jakob in the preface to his anthology Verse der Lebenden (1924). Alfred Mombert and Theodor Däubler, whose epic Nordlicht appeared in 1910, may be regarded as direct ancestors of the movement. Its early phase is constituted by the poetry of Georg Heym (Der ewige Tag, Umbra Vitae), Ernst Stadler, and Georg Trakl. The latter's Gedichte (1913) and Sebastian im Traum (1914) display a peculiar Weltschmerz and are distinguished by a dreamlike quality that is hardly typical of expressionistic poetry as a whole. The main representatives of poetic e. can be divided into groups according to their artistic, metaphysical, and political attitude. Franz Werfel (Der Weltfreund) is a deeply religious humanist, J. R. Becher an activist fond of futuristic word cascades, Else Lasker-Schüler a poet dwelling in a decidedly exotic atmosphere. Gottfried Benn (1886-1956), whose Morgue offers a poignant example of poetic nihilism, lived to proclaim the beginning of a second phase of e. Perhaps the greatest German poet of his generation, he did not share the ethos of his fellow-expressionists and soon developed an esoteric cult of the word that seems to have its origin in Baudelaire's cult of beauty.

In his magazine Der Sturm—together with Die Aktion the most influential expressionistic periodical—Herwarth Walden published the work of August Stramm, the most radical of the expressionists. Stramm's poetry reflects an urge toward abstraction which compelled the poet to express himself by means of word formations to which no meaning is assigned in the dictionary. Serious though Stramm may have been in the pursuit of his goal, many of his poems clearly anticipate the anti-art of Dadaism (q.v.). The nature of poetic e. is nowhere better revealed than in the anthology Menschheitsdämmerung, which Kurt Pinthus edited in 1920.

Outside of Germany, e., until recently, has been poorly understood and little appreciated. In France, the movement failed to gain any foothold whatsoever, while in Anglo-Saxon literature—with the exception of Wyndham Lewis and the few other practitioners of vorticism (q.v.)—its influence has been restricted to the drama. O'Neill's Hairy Ape, Elmer Rice's Adding Machine, and Thornton Wilder's Skin of our Teeth clearly betray the influence of Strindberg and his German emulators. In the field of poetic drama, the plays Auden and Isherwood wrote for the Group Theatre manifest similar tendencies. Eliot's Sweeney Agonistes, where jazz rhythms are effectively used to heighten the irrational element, shows how often these affinities are of a purely formal nature.

In poetry proper, Edith Sitwell's Façade—which is the result of pseudo-expressionistic "inquiries into the effect on rhythm and on speech of the use of rhymes, assonances and dissonances"—shows a superficial resemblance to August Stramm's convulsive lyrical outbursts. The imagists, like the expressionists, wanted to grasp the essence of things rather than their outward appearance. The static brilliance of the images they fashioned, however, implies a betrayal of the dynamic principle which lies at the root of e.

A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit. Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus (1925); F. L. Schneider, Der expressive Mensch und die Lyrik der Gegenwart (1927); B. Fehr, "E. in der neuesten englischen Lyrik," in Britannica: Max Förster zum 60. Geburtstag (1929); W. Rose, "E. in German Lit." and "The Spirit of Revolt in G. Lit. from 1914-1930," in Men, Myths and Movements (1931); D. W. Schumann, "E. and Post-E. in G. Lyrics," GR, 9 (1934); L. V. Palmer, "The Language of G. E." (diss. Univ. of Illinois, 1938); S. Spender, "Poetry and E.," New Statesman and Nation, March 12, 1938; W. Stuyver, Deutsche expressionistische Dichtung im Lichte der Philosophie der Gegenwart (1939); R. Samuel and R. H. Thomas, E. in German Life, Lit. and the Theatre (1939); E. Sitwell, "On My Poetry," Orpheus, 2 (1949); M. Freedman, "T. S. Eliot and Jazz," SAQ, 51 (1952); U. Weisstein, "Gottfried Benn and E.," The Folio, 19 (1954); E.: Gestalten einer Bewegung, ed. H. Friedmann and O. Mann (1956); M. Hamburger, "1912" and "Georg Trakl" in Reason and Energy (1956; the first essay to be read with caution); C. Heselhaus, Die Lyrik des Expressionismus (1956); F. Martini, "Expressionismus," Reallexikon, 2d ed., 1 (contains a fine bibliog.); W. H. Sokel, The Writer in Extremis: E. in 20th-C. G. Lit. (1959; of limited value to students of poetry); R. Brinkmann, Expressionismus. Forschungs-Probleme, 1952-60 (1961). U.W.

EYE RHYME. A rhyme which gives to the eye (that is, in spelling) the impression of perfect rhyme but to the ear (that is, in pronunciation) the effect of, at best, an approximation, as in near rhyme (q.v.). In general, eye rhymes represent obsolete or merely regional pronunciations which are inexact in standard modern Eng. or Am. speech. Some prosodists refer to such eye rhymes as love-prove, flood-brood as historical rhymes because it is almost certain that these pairs once rhymed perfectly. Note, however, that historical rhymes are not always eye rhymes, e.g., Pope's tea-away, words which once echoed each other, "tea" being pronounced "tay" in the early 18th c.—H. C. Wyld, Studies in Eng. Rhymes from Surrey to Pope (1923). S.L.M.

F

FABLE IN VERSE. F. is supposed to have originated in the primitive allegory which presented animals and plants speaking like human beings. It has been suggested that the multiple stories in the Panchatantra are the fountainhead of the European f., but the genre probably arose spontaneously in ancient Greece. Hesiod's poem of the hawk and the nightingale (8th c. B.C.) is the oldest known Gr. f.: after that, Archilochus' fragments on the fox and the eagle. The first repertory of Gr. fables is attributed to Aesop (6th c. B.C.), but our knowledge of them is indirect. They were written down by Demetrius of Phalerum (4th c. B.C.); yet even this text is known only through the edition (14th c.) of Maximus Planudes. The Aesopic fables conveyed moral or satirical lessons in the briefest and driest of verses; there is no reason to suppose that Aesop was anything of a poet.

Phaedrus (1st c. A.D.) imitated Aesop in iambic trimeters, but also invented many new fables, recounted anecdotes of his contemporaries and introduced political allusions. Babrius, who wrote in Gr. (2d c. A.D.) went further. He invented racy epithets and picturesque expressions, and enlarged the formula of the genre in the direction of satire and the bucolic. His f. of the fox and the raven is scarcely inferior to La Fontaine's. He was the first of the fabulists who may be reckoned a real poet.

In the 10th c. a prose version was made of Phaedrus and Babrius, under the title of Romulus. This was retranslated into elegiac verse and enjoyed a celebrity lasting into the 17th c. The best of the medieval fabulists was Marie de France who, toward A.D. 1200, composed 102 fables in octosyllables (some in Anglo-Norman). Although she usually treated Gr. and Roman themes, she was an excellent observer of beasts and men, possessed the ironic and whimsical touch of her nation, and gives many glimpses of the feudal society of her times. The age was liberal, and she criticized high and low without favoritism. The Ysopets (13th and 14th c.) were Fr. verse translation of older L. apologues.

The Fables du très ancien Esope Phrygien (1542) were an adaptation, in which Gilles Corrozet used verses of different length and thus was to show La Fontaine the advantages of this freer form. Meanwhile, the Indian apologues which, deriving from the Panchatantra (2d c. A.D.?), were adapted in an Arabic edition of the 8th c. A.D. as the Kalila wa Dimna, had been taken up in Italy by Agnolo Firenzuola and Doni. They were later published in a Fr. translation of 1644 as Le Livre des Lumières and attributed to a mythical Pilpay.

Jean de la Fontaine (1621-95) raised the f. to the level of a great poetical genre. In his earlier fables he drew mainly from Aesop and Phaedrus: the Indian apologues supplied some inspiration for the last six books. He united naïveté and culture, the simple wonder of a child with wide reading and exquisite taste. Into traditional themes he breathed poetry, irony, and knowledge of life; he treated them dramatically and also made them a vehicle for lyric poetry and philosophical disquisition. He has been widely and brilliantly translated and ranks as the world's greatest fabulist.

Among La Fontaine's imitators or emulators, mention should be made of Eustache le Noble (1643-1711), John Gay (1685-1732), J.-P.-C. de Florian (1754-94), and Tomás de Iriarte (1750-91). Gay's fables, though racy and vigorous, lack the robust originality of his operas. Florian rehandled the fables of his predecessors, but gave them a political or sentimental turn. In Germany, C. F. Gellert (1715-69) modeled his fables after La Fontaine, but G. E. Lessing (1729-81) considered the simple f. of Aesop the ideal model.

The f. had now begun to play an important part in the development of Rus. literature, by training writers in the realistic manner. Of these the greatest was Ivan Andreyevich Krylov (1769-1844), who made his first translations from La Fontaine in 1805. The twenty-three fables published in 1809 won a success unprecedented in Rus. literary annals. Written mostly between 1810 and 1820 Krylov's fables appeared in nine books, and their popularity was due both to the substance and the style. His attitude was one of sound but prosaic common sense. He satirized the ineptitude and absurdity of officials, but his satire was general and his weapon ridicule. He used the language of the street and the tavern, although in a classical manner and with a mastery of the art of compression.

A. Loiseleur-Deslongchamps, Essais sur les fables indiennes . . . (1838); W. G. Rutherford, The Hist. of Gr. F. (1883); L. Hervieux, Les Fabulistes latins depuis le siècle d'Auguste jusqu'à la fin du moyen-âge (5 v., 1883-89); M. Marchianò, L'Origine della favola greca . . . (1900); H.-A. Taine, Essai sur les fables de la Fontaine (1853); Krylov's Fables, tr. B. Pares (1921); M. Stege, Die Gesch. der deutschen Fabeltheorie (1929); La Fontaine's Fables, tr. E. Marsh (2 v., 1931); C. Filosa, La favola e la letteratura esopiana in Italia . . . (1952). A.L.S.

FABLIAU. A short story in verse, usually in octosyllabic couplets, relating a comic or bawdy incident from middle-class life. The fabliaux, which originated in France, flourished there in the 12th and 13th c., but an 8th-c. warning against them, in Egbert's Poenitentiale, shows that they must have existed centuries before. Richeut (1159) is regarded by some authorities as the oldest surviving f., but other scholars feel that the Isopet of Marie de France is, in effect, an earlier example of the genre.

Opinion is sharply divided as to the origin of the f. and its themes: questions under controversy include whether the genre was bourgeois or courtly in origin, and whether or not its themes derive from oriental sources. It seems likely that all classes of society supplied writers of fabliaux, although the anonymous authorship of so many of them makes this difficult to establish. Writers who can be identified include Rutebeuf, Philippe de Beaumanoir, and Jean Bodel.

The typical f. is realistic in setting, coarse in treatment, and ribald in material. Its favorite theme is cuckoldry, usually achieved through the use of guile, and it frequently contains sharp anticlerical satire. Some critics have seen in its cynical attitude toward women a reaction against the deification of woman implicit in the code of courtly love (q.v.), which permeated the lais and romances of the time.

In the 14th c. the vogue of the f. spread to Italy and to England, where Chaucer imitated the form in his Miller's Tale and Reeve's Tale. F. tradition continued in the prose nouvelle, but the influence of the older form may be noted, centuries later, in the poetry of La Fontaine in France, C. F. Gellert in Germany, and I. A. Krylov in Russia.—J. Bédier, Les Fabliaux (5th ed., 1928); P. Nykrog, Les Fabli- aux (1957); J. Rychner, Contribution à l'étude des fabliaux (2 v., 1960).

FALLING ACTION. See PLOT.

FALLING RHYTHM. See DESCENDING RHYTHM.

FANCY is an abbreviation of fantasy (L. phantasia, itself a transliteration from the Gr., and later replaced in L. by imaginatio). Whether regarded as synonyms or differentiated in meaning, f. and imagination are closely related and cannot be explained without cross-reference. The number in parentheses refers to the relevant paragraph in the article on IMAGINATION (q.v.).

In medieval L. the terms are sometimes synonymous (e.g., in Aquinas), sometimes differentiated (e.g., in Albertus Magnus, with imagination the repository of images, and fantasy the active power operating upon them). In It. the term fantasia comes to be appropriated by the higher or creative artistic activity and immaginazione relegated to a lower (cf. 21). So also in German; Phantasie comes to occupy the higher place and Einbildungskraft, despite the influence of Kant (14), sinks to a lower: for Jean-Paul Phantasie is "the power of making all parts into a whole" while Einbildungskraft is merely a "highly coloured memory." In England (with the exceptions noted below) imagination and f. were generally treated as synonyms till the beginning of the 19th c. Dryden's assignment of a comprehensive role to imagination while limiting f. to language and the "variation" of a thought (12) allows the context to fix the two meanings, but in assigning the more limited function to f. points the way to future development. By Reynolds imagination is bracketed with genius, f. with taste (10); by Hume the legitimate and indeed necessary exercise of imagination is distinguished from "the loose reveries of fancy" (11); by Duff creative imagination is contrasted with a "sportive fancy" (11), and by Stewart f. (as in Dryden) is restricted to language while imagination creates action, character, and scene (11). Thus the restriction or depression of f. is plainly apparent before Coleridge elaborated his famous distinction.

If, as has been suggested, this distinction owes something to Jean-Paul, it is notable that Coleridge conforms to Eng. usage by naming the more general and also the higher activity imagination (Kant's Einbildungskraft), and the lower and restricted activity f. (Jean-Paul's Einbildungskraft as opposed to his Phantasie). For Coleridge (15) f. is a distinct faculty, dependent of course for its materials on the primary imagination, and up to a point analogous in its operations to the secondary imagination, but limited in its scope, confined to the phenomenal (having no access to the noumenal), with power more or less capriciously to manipulate its materials, but none to modify, reshape, and unify them. "The fancy is indeed no other than a mode of memory emancipated from the order of time and space"; and "equally with the ordinary memory the fancy must receive its materials ready-made from the law of association." These materials are fixed objects (natura naturata): f. cannot rise to an imitation of natura naturans. That imagination and f. may appear in the same work; that they may sometimes treat, each in its own mode, the same material; that imagination may even require f. "as its complement" since "the higher intellectual powers can only act through a corresponding energy of the lower," Coleridge does not deny. Such concessions, however, should raise no doubt of the reality or importance of the distinction for him. Though they had contributed greatly to each other's thinking, Wordsworth (16) diverged from Coleridge on the f. For Wordsworth f. differs less in the kind than in the degree and value of its operations. "To aggregate and associate, to evoke and combine" belong to both imagination and fancy; and "fancy, as she is an active, is also . . . a creative faculty." But she is content with materials which are susceptible of little if any modification at her touch, and with effects that are transient and of small value. In his own experience (to which Wordsworth referred every theory) f. developed with imagination, as the Prelude makes clear; and it was this copresence of the two, said Coleridge, that misled Wordsworth and prevented his accepting the distinction in its entirety.

It is natural that the higher or more comprehensive term (in Eng., imagination) should be dwelt upon, and the lower and more restricted (in Eng., fancy) be defined always in relation to it. Ruskin (19) will serve as illustration. And in the 20th c. (though with the traditional It. reversal of terms) Croce (21), after assigning to imagination (fantasia) a central role in aesthetic experience, dismisses as irrelevant images appearing either in accidental succession or forced combination, and declares this to be the real distinction underlying all efforts to discriminate between imagination (fantasia) and f. (immaginazione). A.S.P.W.

For bibliography see IMAGINATION.

FARCE. If, following the suggestion of Rambler no. 125, we confine ourselves to purpose and ignore the more accidental feature of means, we should have no difficulty in arriving at an acceptable definition of f. Its object is to provoke the spectator to laughter, not the reflective kind which comedy is intended to elicit but the uncomplicated response of simple enjoyment. Its means are often shared by other comic forms, such as burlesque (q.v.), thus giving rise to frequent confusion among them. Once purpose is established these means are not hard to visualize. F. exploits the surprise of sudden appearance or disclosure, the mechanism suggested by many physical actions, repetition, gross exaggeration of character, and so on. Since it does not share with higher comedy the responsibility of commentary on social conduct it may pursue its laughter into a world of fantasy where the unpredictable, even the impossible, is commonplace.

The origins of f. are doubtless hidden somewhere beyond the beginning of recorded literary history since the propensity to horseplay seems as natural to man as the trait of laughter, which is alleged to separate him from the other animals. The presence of f. in Aristophanes and the Roman comic writers and its popularity in the mimes and Atellan pieces of the Romans suggest an early origin. Something of the crude horseplay common to f. and such kindred forms as burlesque, mime, and satyr play may be observed in surviving vase paintings and statues. The first plays of record to bear the name were Fr., for the name was devised in France from the L. farcire, to stuff. The 15th c. reveals Fr. f. at an early peak as it was developed especially by the "joyous societies" who contrived numerous little pieces from the stuff of folklore and fabliau. Usually rendered in lively octosyllabic couplets, these medieval Fr. farces exploited themes of commercial trickery and sexual infidelity, to show a life both coarse and vibrant in which the conventions, particularly the conventional respect for women and the clergy, were flaunted. Two examples of many possible ones may be cited: Le meunier et le gentil-homme (ca. 1550), which treats a folk motif traceable back as far as the 7th c. and appearing on four continents, and Maître Pierre Pathelin (ca. 1465), most famous of all. F. never quite regained in France the level of popularity it had reached in the Middle Ages, yet it managed to survive and to enjoy a popular esteem, even in the classical period, when Molière as both actor and playwright helped restore it to theatrical recognition. It managed to survive the competition of drame bourgeois in the 18th c. and of mélodrame and romantic drama in the 19th though perhaps no name greater than that of Labiche came to its support. Italy, Spain, and Germany meanwhile had their f. writers, though writer is slightly misapplied in the case of Italy since the bulk of It. f. was supplied by the improvisations of the widely popular and influential commedia dell'arte troupes which flourished from the 16th to the 18th c.

The first Eng. f. writer of note—there are farce episodes in the earlier mystery plays—is the 16th-c. John Heywood, a somewhat isolated figure in that he chose to borrow from and imitate Fr. f. and also developed an independent genre. The common practice, following the triumph of classical models just as the professional Eng. theatre was beginning, was to mix farcical episodes in with more serious matter. In Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, for example, or Merry Wives, in Jonson's Silent Woman, even more in such popular anonymous plays as Mucedorus, we find f. scenes mingled with intrigue, romance, and the satirical portraiture of "humours" comedy. Only in the droll of the Commonwealth period was Eng. f. independent of other forms before the coming of the afterpiece at the beginning of the 18th c. With the establishment of the afterpiece and the consequent demand for short pieces in the Eng. repertory f. came into its own as a distinct genre. For much of the next two centuries it thrived vigorously. As taste declined, f. took its place, with sentimental comedy and melodrama, as one of the staples of theatrical fare. Of the hundreds of farces written in this period of its flourishing few worthy of preservation appeared. Only at the very end, with Wilde and Pinero, did f. aspire to be literary, an aspiration usually fatal to the genre. Though it still has its place in the popular theatre and always will have, it no longer enjoys quite the vogue it did a century ago. Even in the cinema, where with Chaplin and other producers of short pieces it had a renewal of life, the more traditional f. with human actors has been displaced by the animated film.

L. Petit de Julleville, Hist. du théâtre en France (1880-89); K. Holl, Gesch. des deutschen Lustspiels (1923); W. S. Jack, The Early Entremés in Spain (1923); K. Lea, It. Popular Comedy (1934); W. Klemm, Die englische F. im 19. Jh. (1946); I. Maxwell, Fr. F. and John Heywood (1946); Nicoll; G. Frank, The Medieval Fr. Drama (1954); L. Hughes, A Century of Eng. F. (1956); E. Bentley, "The Psychology of F.," New Republic, 138 (Jan. 6 and 13, 1958); M. Bieber, A Hist. of the Gr. and Roman Theater (2d ed., 1961); B. Cannings, "Toward a Definition of F. as a Lit. Genre," MLR, 56 (1961).

L.H.

FATRAS (also called fatrasie, fratrasie, res-verie). An irrational or obscure piece of verse, which originated in the Middle Ages. It is generally lively and joyous in style, full of plays on words, ridiculous associations of ideas, and deliberate nonsense. E. Langlois defines two forms of this genre: the f. possible, which offers a coherent text, and the f. impossible, which, like the later coq-à-l'âne (q.v.), seems to make no coherent sense at all. Qu a genre, however, it is not the incoherence of content that constitutes the f., but its very special form: a strophe of 11 lines, the first and last of which form a distich placed at the beginning as the theme of the composition. This is known as the f. simple. The f. double is formed from this by "restating the initial [distich] in reverse order, and adding a second strophe of ten lines ending with an eleventh, a restatement of line one of the [distich]." L. C. Porter distinguishes between the (13th-c.?) fratrasie and the f., a later (14th-c.?) development. The former invariably is composed of a single strophe of 11 lines, and its content always is irrational. In the f. the opening distich introduces the next 11 lines, serving as their first and last line and imparting a uniform rhythm to the whole poem.—E. Langlois, Recueil d'Arts de seconde rhétorique (1902; p. 192, n. 1); R. Bossuat, Le Moyen âge (1931); Patterson; P. Zumthor, Hist. litt. de la France médiévale (1954); L. C. Porter, La Fatrasie et le f. (1960).

I.S.

FEELING. See EMOTION.

FEIGNING. As far back as Plato, and probably much farther, fiction has been identified with poetic imitation (q.v.). Plato's Republic condemned the "lies" of poets like Homer and Hesiod and barred all imitative poetry from the ideal commonwealth since it was detrimental to the understanding of truth. Aristotle, in his Poetics, challenged the Platonic doctrine by arguing that imitative poetry is more philosophical and a higher thing than historical fact, that the poet imitates what ought to be rather than what is. According to Aristotle, Homer was a poet because he was an imitator or maker, Empedocles merely a physicist writing in verse, and Herodotus' history still history even if it were turned into verse.

Aristotle apparently regarded poetic imitation as idealized fiction based on probability rather than on literal truth. Certainly succeeding critics so interpreted poetic imitation. Horace's Ars Poetica praised the learned imitator (doctus imitator) as the ideal creative artist and condemned the servile copyist. (The leading commentators on Horace maintained that it is feigning (fingere) that distinguishes the true poet.) Plutarch's essay on How the Young Man Should Study Poetry called poetry an imitative art which brings pleasure when its fictions are created in the semblance of truth—i.e., verisimilitude.

Consequently it became a commonplace even before the full impact of the revival of learning in the early 16th c. to equate the Gr. mimesis with the L. factio or fabula or inventio or verisimilitudo. The 14th book of Boccaccio's

FIGURES OF SPEECH

Genealogy of the Gods (ca. 1360) described poetry as a "fervid and exquisite invention," a fiction which reveals a hidden or allegorical truth. The leading poets and critics of the 16th c., e.g., Torquato Tasso, Giraldo Cinthio, J. C. Scaliger, Castelvetro, Ronsard, Sir Philip Sidney, accepted imitating or feigning as indispensable to the poet. Scaliger went so far in his praise of the creative poet as to call him "almost a second deity," and Sidney echoed him. For Castelvetro, the essence of poetry was invention. Ronsard summed up Renaissance theory as well as any one in his famous Abrégé de l'art poétique français (1565): "As the aim of the orator is to persuade, so that of the poet is to imitate, to invent and represent things which are, or which may be, like the truth (vraisemblables)."

Very little has been added in later times to these ancient and Renaissance concepts of poetry as feigning. Although terminology may have changed somewhat, and the theory of art as an imitation or representation of nature is not accepted by every one, poetry is still regarded as something above and beyond the communication of literal truth. Croce's "instantaneous imaginative fusion" (Defence of Poetry, 1933) suggests the older factio or inventio. Wimsatt and Brooks, in their Literary Criticism (1957), are more specific; they equate (p. 751) the "art of fiction" with Aristotle's poiētikē and acknowledge (p. 686) that although fiction may be sharply differentiated from lyric poetry "the lyric shares with the novel a common fictionality."—See also L. Lerner, "The Truest Poetry Is the Most Feigning," The Truest Poetry (1960). M.T.H.

FÉLIBRIGE. A Fr. literary association, founded near Avignon in 1854, for the purpose of reviving the Prov. language, literature, and culture. Its most important member was Frédéric Mistral, and its membership included Joseph Roumanille, its first leader, and Théodore Aubanel. The accomplishments of the félibres included the reform of Prov. spelling and the standardization of the Prov. vocabulary. Perhaps their most lasting achievement consisted in the creation of such works as Mistral's Mirèio and Aubanel's collection of love poems, La miougrano entre duberto, and in the impetus which their example gave to dialect literature in France, not only among their Prov. followers, who included Félix Gras, but also among the speakers of Gascon, Béarnais, and Auvergnat. The official organ of the F. is the Armana (Almanach) prouvençau, which has existed since 1855.—E. Ripert, Le F. (3d ed., 1948); A. Gourdin, Langue et littérature d'oc (1949); A. V. Roche, Prov. Regionalism (1954); A. del Monte, Storia della letteratura provenzale moderna (1958).

FEMININE ENDING. See LINE ENDINGS; for FEMININE RHYME, see RHYME.

FESCENNINE VERSES. A form of L. poetry, of great antiquity, which originated as crude, ribald, or abusive songs sung at harvest and vintage festivals and also at weddings. They were roughly dramatic in structure, having the form of a dialogue between peasants, and were probably composed in the Saturnian (q.v.) meter at first. In antiquity the name "Fescennine" was derived either from fascinum, a phallic emblem worn as a charm, or, as is more likely, from the town of Fescennium in Etruria. In the period of the Empire, F. verses were used for personal invective to such an extent that a law was passed against their circulation. Livy (7.2) implies that the F. verses developed into Roman satire and comedy, but the question has been much controverted.—G. E. Duckworth, The Nature of Roman Comedy (1952); W. Beare, The Roman Stage (2d ed., 1955). R.J.G.

FIGURES OF SPEECH are traditionally considered to be words and expressions used in ways that are out of the ordinary, serving primarily as ornament and making their appeal through novelty. Although the distinction between f. of speech and f. of thought was standard in ancient rhetoric, there has never been agreement upon the differentiation. Quintilian, elaborating on Ciceronian rhetoric, provides the simplest and perhaps best test: f. of speech may be changed or removed without changing the sense of what contains them, but f. of thought cannot be so changed (Institutes 9.1.17). F. of speech are either grammatical or rhetorical (as aphaeresis, antithesis, isocolon, anaphora). F. of thought are words or expressions used in different senses from those which properly belong to them (as metaphor, metonymy, synecdoche, irony), and these are frequently classified as tropes when they approximate metaphors.

Study of the various f. was originally a branch of rhetoric but came to be included in poetics. Longinus considered that the f. of rhetoric were controlled by what was known to be true and thought to be probable, but the use of similar f. in poetry was to be governed by other considerations, and particularly by their effectiveness in achieving elevation and transport. During the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, partly through the continuing influence of Cicero, the distinction of Longinus was lost, and poetry was very generally thought of as versified rhetoric.

Quintilian divided f. of speech into three classes: those formed by the addition of elements (anaphora, polysyndeton, etc.); those formed by subtracting elements (asyndeton, zeugma, etc.); and those formed through the use of comparable or parallel constructions (antithesis, paranomasia, etc.). Bede, following Isidore of Seville, carried over the classification that had originated in ancient rhetoric in which the major classes were of schemes and tropes (see TROPE). Geoffrey of Vinsauf, the leader in the identification of rhetoric and poetics, listed 34 f. of speech (frequently in the Middle Ages called "colors"), 19 f. of thought, and 10 tropes. Innumerable refinements were developed in the Renaissance, and the classifications were multiplied. In the 16th c. Thomas Wilson listed 19 f. of speech, 27 f. of thought, and 13 tropes. Puttenham changed the basis of the initial classification. He devised three classes of f.: those that made their appeal to the ear (of which there were 21), those appealing to the mind (25), and those that appealed to both (62). In this as in other matters Puttenham was breaking away from the confusion of poetics and rhetoric. Ramus's reform of traditional rhetoric involved the idea that style was the whole of rhetoric, and that f. and tropes, which were the substance of style, should be distinguished from invention and arrangement, which Ramus considered parts of Logic.

That f. of speech are ornaments has been a dominant idea in the history of literary criticism. Through many centuries the mastery of f. was considered a sign of virtuosity, and much of the pleasure of reading was thought to depend on the pleasure of discriminating among the devices. Both Longinus and Quintilian argued against the use of f. according to fixed rules, and Thomas Wilson was returning to their position when in his Art of Rhetoric (1551) he proposed that they be used according to principles that would justify them in their context, what he called the principles of clearness and fitness and beauty. Puttenham in his Art of Poetry (1589) carried this reasoning further: for him poetry took feeling and nature as its guides, decency and decorum were proposed as laws of nature, and f. of speech, formed according to the demands of feeling and decorum, were employed in order to achieve "good grace." Such theories were an improvement on the medieval doctrine of rhetorical colors but continued to stress the ornamental aspect of the f. By the time of Dryden and Pope the doctrine of decorum (q.v.) and the prevailing rationalism caused the f. to be ever more closely bound to content and argument.

In the later 18th c. the development of psychology supported an emphasis on the criticism of particular poems and particular effects, and with Coleridge there was the beginning of a system in which it may be said that all f. aspired to the state of metaphor and indeed to metaphysical reference. The issues raised by this development have continued to be among the most significant ones for literary criticism in the 20th c. The New Critics and the Chicago Critics have been profoundly concerned with f., as with other phases of the relation of rhetoric to poetics. A paradoxical aspect of some of this interest is that f. of speech are often taken to be the quintessence of poetry when in the past they were primarily valued as ornaments to meaning or the substance of style. See also IMAGERY, RHETORIC AND POETICS, and articles on individual f. of speech, e.g., METAPHOR, SIMILE, ME-TONYMY, ASYNDETON.—G. Dzialas, Rhetorum antiquorum de figuris doctrina (Breslavia, 1896); E. Faral, Les Arts poétiques du X^e et du XIII^e s. (1923); A. K. Coomaraswamy, F. of Speech or F. of Thought? (1946); J. W. H. Atkins, Eng. Lit. Crit.: The Renaissance (1951); Crane; Wimsatt; W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England, 1500-1700 (1956); Lausberg. J.A.

FINE ARTS AND POETRY. No branch of aesthetic criticism has produced a more curious crop than the critical treatises, versified art theory, and biographical and personal chit-chat about the interrelations of poetry and the fine arts. In this article the fine arts will be defined as painting, sculpture, and architecture—for many aestheticians, the major arts. Even if opinions vary as to which arts are fine or major, and why they are so, these three arts long have been called sisters, and the relationship has often been extended to include poetry, an art of immaterial words and sounds. Indeed, Poesy seemed no ordinary sister but a rival of Mnemosyne in sponsoring a brood of arts, fine and unrefined. Now, it appears, poetry is a subdivision of literature, and poets, no longer star attractions, are pleased to find occasional service as attendants in the passages leading to the main theater of the arts.

The notion that the fine arts are similar to poetry in intention, means, possibilities, and achievements flourished under the aesthetic cover-all of Art as imitation (q.v.) or mimesis. But what poet ever held his mirror up to nature so effectively as Pygmalion, who was rewarded by having his handiwork come to life? With artistic activity regarded as imitation, and with artists described as skilled in using "the life-resembling pencil," the arts very easily approached each other, especially in the pseudo-Aristotelian theory of the Renaissance. Before the close of the 17th c., when the most praiseworthy imitation reflected the ability to apprehend and body forth the Neoplatonic ideal and composite beauties superior to the ordinary forms in nature, the arts moved even closer to poetry.

While its supremacy among the arts was challenged and sometimes denied by the painters, most conspicuously, Leonardo da Vinci, poetry generally carried the standard of art; and the poets, a numerous and very vocal group, discovered the merits of their own art in painting and sculpture and, somewhat later, architecture. All the arts appeared fine, liberal, "poetical": ut poesis artes. Artists often put on the badge of poetry, and few were those who did not believe, with the poets, that their activities were more "philosophical" than philosophy.

Personally and in groups or "schools," the poets played favorites among the arts, at various times lending encouragement and approval to one or more arts, borrowing a little extra glory from an individual art, or illustrating theories of poetry with principles from the sister-arts.

Majestic, nervous, bold and strong,
Let ANGELO and MILTON vie;
Oppos'd to WALLER'S amorous song,
His art let wanton TITIAN try.
(Anon, Mount Pleasant, 1777)

Painting, their first favorite, held that position into the 20th c. Without resorting to statistics, one may hazard the conjecture that poets have written more lines about paintings, painters, and painting than about buildings and statues, architects and sculptors, or architecture and sculpture, even though the latter arts have inspired several of the best poems, for example, works by Hölderlin, Rimbaud, Rilke, George, and others. In Eng., few, if any, poems about painting surpass Keats's Ode on a Grecian Urn and Wordsworth's Inside of King's College Chapel, Cambridge.

As a mode of epic, history-painting represented for the late Renaissance the highest reach of the pictorial art. Pastoral poets regarded themselves as painters of landscape and were pleased that the artists followed suit as "poets" of color and design or expressive line and contour. Claude Lorrain was celebrated as a painter of Theocritean and Virgilian scenes. According to Reynolds, Michelangelo carried "painting into the regions of poetry" and emulated "that art in its most adventurous flights" by Homer and Shakespeare (Discourse 15, 1790). In the 19th c. a band of Eng. poets looked back to the Pre-Raphaelite painters. Until recently there was an abundance, even overabundance, of pictorial poetry—"word-painting" or "painting" in sounds. Many prose-poems came into being as "pictures," and the highest praise went to a novelist's or essayist's picturesque or poetic prose. Poets and critics vied with one another and with aestheticians in adapting the terminology of painting to poetry. Poets have displayed interest in almost every phase of "modern" painting. Moreover, the painting of the East, especially China and Japan, has for decades attracted poets of the West.

Sculpture followed close upon painting in the esteem of poets, and the assumed simplicity, unity, and grandeur of free-standing figures and monumental works occasionally suggested imagery to poets. Thus, there were 12th-c. Thomas of Britain's description of Tristan's Hall of Images with the almost-living figure of Ysolt; the "counterfeits of nature" and the "life-resembling" colored statues and sepulchral effigies in many Renaissance dramas and poems; the posings of neoclassical and romantic heroines à la Venus de' Medici (most famous of all, James Thomson's Musidora in Seasons, 1730) and the comparisons of heroes to some Apollo, Bacchus, or marble Faun, the Elgin Theseus, or even the Torso Belvedere; the Praxitelean shapes by Shelley; and numerous "stationings" of Grecian, Egyptian, Gothic, and Druidic figures by 19th-c. poets. Blake, poet and artist, beheld the records of the Cosmic Memory as "the bright sculptures of Los's Halls"—some as linear and relief-like engravings and others as figures in the round, like his Originals of the Greek Statues (Jerusalem, I, part 16, 62, and Descriptive Catalogue, Works [Keynes], p. 781). Along with mythological, historical, and technical interests in the broken and unbroken marbles of classical antiquity, which "went for much" until recently, the poets envied most of all, very likely, the sculptor's reputed ability to represent or re-create human feeling, passion, emotion, and thought in materials more enduring than words or sounds. Sculpture, they felt, offered significant "moments" made eternal and ever-beautiful—"fair attitudes" in marble (often but not always Parian and white) or "masque-like figures on the dreamy urn."

Poets in many lands found analogies between poetry and the careful carving, clear design, outline, and relief—with or without suggestions of the third dimension—of the sculptors. Some became "carvers of verbal agates," writing their "sculptures" and cutting their "gems" after visiting studios and galleries or looking at illustrated volumes, or with their eyes on gems, intaglios, animated or reposeful busts, high or low reliefs, and storied or well-wrought urns. Even at the peak of the interest in "word-painting," the persistent attractiveness of Alexandrian "metrical carvings" was illustrated, for example, by E. C. Stedman and T. B. Aldrich's Cameos Selected from the Works of Walter Savage Landor (1874). Later, Yeats came to admire most of all the gold metal-work, ivories, and mosaics of Byzantine craftsmen in the age of Justinian, even wishing that he might become a work of perfect art which in turn might inspire other finely hammered, enduring artifacts of gold. Keats had wanted to participate in the perfect expression of emotional activity he imagined in the cold pastoral on a Grecian urn; but Yeats would be the work of art itself, with a dual role in the artifice of eternity as object of contemplation and contemplator of Being. Other modern poets have dreamed of producing—or becoming—works of art.

From the early 19th c. onward, poets and theorists often borrowed critical terms from the art of sculpture: statuesque, sculptural, sculpturesque. Individual works and sculptors as well as the technique and principles of the art influenced the Parnassians and, in the early 20th c., the "imagists," the "objectivists," and many poets without classification or program. In America and Europe a number of poets preferred to alter the Horatian comparison of painting and poetry into Ut sculptura poesis.

A popular revision, today, might be Ut architectura poesis; for the most generally admired artists or "poets" are now the architects—engineers and scientists—who plan and make stadiums, turnpikes, city-plans, skyscrapers, housing and industrial projects, and houses or rooms as "space" for gracious living. In short, architects create works which not only suggest what earlier generations called the sublime and the beautiful but which also serve useful functions. The bridge was an appropriate epical symbol for Hart Crane, however defective his own poetic design and achievement.

Architecture, moreover, surpasses both sculpture and painting in supplying terms which the critic-poet uses without embarrassment. Structure, frame of reference, design, architectonic(s)—in varying degrees connotative of architecture—may be applied to poetic activity and to individual poems. Critical reference may be either to "well-built," "unornamented," "clean," or "economical" poems or to the "organic," "dynamic," or "functional" principles according to which poems are designed and fabricated.

The many critics, artists, and poets, who, from the Renaissance through the 19th c., engaged in discussing the parallels between the fine arts and poetry would be surprised today not only by the multiplicity of artistic interests among poets and critics in their efforts to absorb the specialized knowledge of the arts ("style-concepts" and studies in iconology and iconography) but even more, perhaps, by the relatively humble status of poetry. With the demotion of poetry to a minor classification of literature has come a great advance in the standing of her sisters, especially "the modern art of music" and its "frozen" but now thawed-out relative, architecture. While a visiting critic from the 17th c., for example, might search long before tracking down a poet who turns out "word-paintings," he would find many craftsmen studying the lesser or decorative branches of several arts and occasionally displaying their careful workmanship in "poetic" medallions, cameos, icons, mosaics, metalworks, montages, collages, mobiles, and even immobles. The visitor might then observe that poetry has all but dropped its dramatic, epic, narrative, and didactic pinions, and that poets strive to be specialists in the technics of a special and exacting artistic medium while the practitioners of less rigorous arts, major and minor, move into the poets' former area of operation.

The critic from the past concludes, perhaps, that poetry survives, even in a zealously guarded preserve of diminished song. A poem may mean much or little, but it is made, first of all, to be itself a work of art: "a poem is a poem is a poem." Who seriously disagrees? Yet what becomes of the general critic's occupation if that is all we need to know?

S. Rocheblave, "L'Art français au XVII^e s. dans ses rapports avec la littérature," Hist. de la langue et de la litt. fr., ed. L. Petit de Julleville, v (1898); K. Borinski, Die Antike in Poetik und Kunsttheorie (2 v., 1914-24); L. Binyon, "Eng. Poetry in its Relation to Painting and the Other Arts," Proc. British Acad., 8 (1918); E. Panofsky, "Idea" . . . , Studien der Bibliothek Warburg, 5 (1924) and Studies in Iconology (1939); Bray; F. P. Chambers, Cycles of Taste (1928) and Hist. of Taste (1932); F. Maury, Arts et litt. comparés (1933); H. Read, "Parallels in Eng. Painting and Poetry," In Defence of Shelley and Other Essays (1936); A.H.R. Fairchild, Shakespeare and the Arts of Design (1937); S. A. Larrabee, "Crit. Terms from the Art of Sculpture," N&Q, April 3, 1937 and Eng. Bards and Grecian Marbles (1943); C. B. Tinker, Painter and Poet (1938); T. M. Greene, The Arts and the Arts of Crit. (1940); L. Hautecoeur, Litt. et peinture en France . . . (1942); E. Souriau, La Correspondance des arts (1947); T. Munro, The Arts and Their Interrelations (1949); K. Gilbert, Aesthetic Studies: Architecture and Poetry (1952); H. A. Hatzfeld, Lit. through Art (1952); Wellek and Warren, 2d ed., ch. 11 and bibliog.; J. H. Hagstrum, The Sister Arts (1958); W. Sypher, Rococo to Cubism in Art and Lit. (1960); R. G. Saisselin, "Ut Pictura Poesis: From Du Bos to Diderot," JAAC, 20 (1961). See also UT PICTURA POESIS.

S.A.L.

FINIDA. In 14th- to early 16th-c. Sp. poetry the f. is the approximate equivalent of the remate (q.v.) of the later canción petrarquista. Lang says: "Like the Provençal, tornada, the finida serves as a conclusion to a poem, and with the tornada and kindred forms, such as the envoi, the desfecha, the estribote and others, this stanza was originally, in all probability, a sequence to a musical composition. According to the Leys d'Amors, the tornada repeats in its rhyme-order the second part of the last stanza in case this has the same number of verses; otherwise it may have one verse more or less than the last half-stanza. In the Portuguese . . . the finida, which is regarded as essential to a perfect composition, may have from one to four verses, and must rhyme with the last stanza or, if the poem be a cantiga de refram, with the refrain. The practitioners of the Cancionero de Baena [ca. 1450] appear to have followed the example of the Provençals and Catalans."—H. R. Lang, "Las formas estróficas y términos métricos del Cancionero de Baena," Estudios eruditos "in memoriam" de Adolfo Bonilla y San Martín, 1 (1927); Navarro. D.C.C.

FINNISH POETRY. Historically, there are only two periods of Fin. poetry, the old and the new. For centuries the Fin. people remained at the very outskirts of European civilization largely owing to Finland's geography. With the advent of Christianity the isolation was broken; gradually, the new ideas became interwoven with the old nature myths and tribal heroic legends. The outcome of this fusion of the old and the new culture was a wealth of folklore. For many centuries it lived as an oral tradition, originating in the southwest and gradually receding into the less populated southeast, where it was collected by 19th-c. scholars.

More than a million lines of this anonymous poetry have been recorded. It consists of epic and lyric elements. A very good selection of it was published by Elias Lönnrot in 1835 and 1840, under the titles of the Kalevala and the Kanteletar. The former is an amalgam of ancient nature myths, heroic tales, and assimilated Christian legends, all woven together into an epic form. Its verse has 8 syllables with 4 stresses (Longfellow used this meter in Hiawatha). The Kanteletar is a collection of lyrics, ballads, and legends, like the Kalevala frequently based on historical events. They display an engaging directness and simplicity of manner: a maiden sings while waiting for her lover; a shepherd gives voice to his cares while tending his herd. In these poems nature, as if endowed with a soul, rejoices and mourns with the singer.

In keeping with the principles of the Lutheran Reformation, the Old and New Testaments were translated into Fin. in the 16th and 17th c. Despite this undertaking, the usage of Fin. was for a long time limited to the lower classes. The language of higher social levels was Swedish, which had prestige as the vehicle of the government and the civil administration. But the Swedo-Fin. authors could not found a national literature. Eminent poets like Jacob Frese (1691–1729), Gustaf Filip Creutz (1731–85), and Frans Michael Franzén (1772–1847), though credited with a Fin. sensibility, left their native country for Sweden, and their production was absorbed by the rikssvenska (national-Swedish) tradition. When the Swedish period (1155–1809) came to an end in consequence of the Napoleonic wars and Finland became annexed to Russia, the literary situation was fundamentally changed. The separation from Sweden, concurrent with the romantic movement in European literature, turned the eyes of the cultural leaders of Finland to the common people and the Fin. folk culture as the chief potential sources of strength in the struggle to save their country as a national entity.

The literary revival which ensued came about through the joint endeavors of Fin. and Swedo-Fin. writers. The slogan for the national movement was formulated by the pioneer agitator A. I. Arwidsson (1791–1858): "We are not Swedes, we will not become Russians, and so we must be Finns." A major event was the founding in 1831 of the Fin. Literary Society, still in existence. Most far-reaching in their consequences for Fin. poetry were the labors of Lönnrot (1802–84), who by collecting the Kalevala and the Kanteletar showed the people how rich their poetic heritage really was. It was, however, two Swedish-language poets, Johan Ludvig Runeberg (1804–77) and Zachris Topelius (1818–98), who first assimilated the spirit of this heritage. Runeberg's significance in Fin. poetry is twofold. First, in conformity with the program of National Romanticism, he gave his people a national-literary identity, principally through his heroic cycle Fänrik Ståls sägner (The Tales of Ensign Stål, 1848–1860). These poems, which are based on memories of the wars with Russia, articulate a fervent Fin. patriotism. Secondly, through his formal virtuosity Runeberg became the preceptor of the Fin.-language poets. When these poets began to develop the resources of their language in the 1860's, their main ambition was to transpose into Fin. the metrical and stanzaic forms that Runeberg had earlier worked out in Swedish. Topelius is important for his elusive idylls written in mellifluous verse. Beside Runeberg, however, he appears rather pale.

The emergence of art poetry in Fin. occurred between 1860 and 1880; but, with the exception of Aleksis Kivi (1834–72), the poets showed greater formal talent than creative power. Under the pseudonym Oksanen, A. Ahlqvist (1826-89) published Sparks (1860-68), the aim of which was to illustrate the use of various verse forms in Fin.; it established him as the lawgiver of Fin. poetry. Two poets who helped in accommodating Runeberg's and Topelius' formal patterns to Fin. were J. H. Erkkö (1849-1900) and Kaarlo Krammus (1855-95). Erkkö followed his masters also in spirit, by cultivating the idyll. Kivi, primarily a novelist and dramatist, was in his poetry more original. His poems, written in unrhymed verse of irregular rhythm, express deep and spontaneous feeling.

Toward the end of the century the results of the Fin. revival became evident in poetry. A number of young men educated in Fin. schools and dedicated to the idea of creating a truly native artistic culture appeared on the scene. They called themselves "Young Finland," and their circle embraced men working in all fields of art—the composer Sibelius, for example, was one of the group. Utilizing folklore motifs and following the examples of the best in world literature, three poets, Leino, Manninen, and Koskenniemi, became the agents of the poetic breakthrough. With Songs of March (1896) Leino (1878-1926), the most gifted of them, initiated a career notable for its variety and vigor. He was equally distinguished in narrative and lyric forms. Through his acquaintance with Scandinavian poetry and his deep penetration of the ancient Fin. heritage, Leino was able to relieve the close formal dependence on Runeberg and Topelius in Fin. poetry. Interesting is his use of Fin. myth, not in the spirit of National Romanticism, but as a means of articulating personal and universal experience. His verse is melodious, and much of it is transparent, as, for instance, his ballad Ylermi, which deals with a superman who violates all conventions.

Ylermi ylpeä isäntä
Ajoin temppelein ovesta, Lausui kirkon laivan alta:
"Täss' on mies tämän sukuinen, Kadu ei tehtyä tekoa,
Ei parane palkan eestä."

(Ylermi, the proud knight, dashed into the temple on his mount, and shouted from under the arch: "Here is a man of such kinship that he never regrets his deeds and will not change his ways for any price.") Otto Manninen (1872-1950) displayed in Stanzas (1905, 1910) and Calm of the Stream (1925) verses of the utmost perfection, distinguished by formal refinement, subtle symbolism, and ethical depth. He made notable translations into Fin. of Homer, Molière, Ibsen, and Runeberg. V. A. Kosken-

niemi (1885-1962) was Finland's first philosophical poet. Having the closest affinities with the classical and the French traditions, Koskenniemi is noteworthy for the noble sentiment and the pure artistry of his verse. Both he and Manninen show a precision of language unequalled by their predecessors.

In more recent years Fin. poetry has been well represented by gifted young writers participating in all the cultural and intellectual trends of our time. Foremost are a group of poets who in some ways parallel the Swedish-Finnish modernists (q.v.), Tulenkantajat (The Torchbearers, 1924-30); in its more extreme forms, their style is characterized by primitivism, surrealism, and free verse. Most talented were Uno Kailas (1901-33), a tormented poet tempering passionate reflection by Parnassian form, and Katri Vala (1901-44), a dithyrambic counterpart to Edith Södergran. The leaders of the later leftist group Kiila (The Wedge), Arvo Turtiainen (b. 1904) and the poetess Elvi Sinervo (b. 1912), wrote much of their poetry before and during the last war in prison. In laconic verse reminiscent of Manninen, Yrjö Jylhä (1903-56) immortalized the events and moods of that war. After 1945, two somewhat older poets who in the 1920's had been close to the Torchbearers, P. Mustapää (pseudonym for Martti Haavio, b. 1899) and, especially, Aaro Hellaakoski (1893-52), reinvigorated the Fin. lyric. A man of great emotional power and wide intellectual range—he was scientist, educator, painter—Hellaakoski forged from his passionate and divided experience poetry characterized by formal harmony, marvelously sensitive rhythm, and symbolic resonance. The young poets coming to maturity in the 1950's, like Lassi Heikkilä (b. 1925), Lassi Nummi (b. 1928), and Paavo Haavikko (b. 1931), assimilated the new style, which avoided both the subjective excesses of extreme modernism and the national pathos characteristic of much traditional lyricism.

Whereas from the 1860's on Fin.-language poetry was thriving, Swedish poetry in Finland languished. The last noteworthy achievement for some time was the still actable verse drama Daniel Hjort (1862) by J. J. Wecksell (1838-1907). In the 1880's Karl August Tavaststjerna (1860-98) introduced a more realistic note into lyric poetry, which had become monopolized by the Topelian idyll. When lyricism again began to flow more freely in the 1890's and after, it expressed the moods of pessimism natural to a minority group which foresaw its gradual severance from Fin. national life. The predominant themes were alienation and loneliness, compensated either by recourse to regionalism or exoticism, or by aristocratic idealism and internationalism. The existing situation of permanent entrenchment has tended to give Swedo-Fin. poetry a more severe form than that typical of Swedish poetry. This becomes evident in the work of Michael Lybeck (1864-1925) and Bertel Gripenberg (1878-1947). Best known for his flaming erotic poetry in incantatory verse, Gripenberg in later life adopted the sonnet form. His celebration of Fin. heroism during and after the Fin. Civil War is a proud testament to his aristocratic attitudes. Comparable in stature to Gripenberg is Arvid Mörne (1876-1946), whose early regionalism was followed by an intense poetic battle for the idea of a Swedish nationality in Finland. Other significant poets were Hjalmar Procopé (1868-1927), a philosophical ironist, Emil Zilliacus (1878-1961), a learned classicist, and the younger Jarl Hemmer (1893-1949), an extreme romantic.

With Dikter (Poems, 1916) by Edith Södergran (1892-1923) was inaugurated the movement of the Swedish-Finnish modernists (q.v.). This movement, the most original one in 20th-c. Swedish-language poetry, was a poetic response to the sense of crisis and apocalypse which attended the Rus. Revolution and the Fin. Civil War. However, no uniformity of inspiration existed. The poetry of Södergran herself and of Elmer Diktonius (1896-1961) approaches the prophetic mode, but the former's exaltation is cosmic, the latter's social-revolutionary. The inspiration of both Gunnar Björling (1887-1960) and Rabbe Enckell (b. 1903) is aesthetic, but Björling's verse is surrealist, Enckell's classical. And the style of Henry Parland (1908-30) has affinities with the futurism of Mayakovski. What held the group together was their novel and more profoundly social conception of poetry. Of more recent modernists may be mentioned Ralf Parland (b. 1914), Solveig von Schoultz (b. 1907), and Bo Carpelan (b. 1926). The conservative modernism of Enckell has been important to both von Schoultz and Carpelan, an indication of the formal discipline of Swedo-Fin. poets.

The early triumph of modernism in Swedish Finland was due largely to the international orientation and the aesthetic cast of mind fostered by social alienation. Recently, however, even those poets who stay close to their native habitat and to traditional form, the regionalists, have adopted modernistic techniques. One of them, Anders Cleve (b. 1937) applies surrealist imagery and free form to poetry about his native Helsingfors (Helsinki), which he envisions as a matrix of myths.

ANTHOLOGIES. FIN.: Voices from Finland, ed. E. Tompuri (1947); Lukemisto uudempa suomalaisista kirjallisuutta, ed. E. A. Saarimaa (1948); Nuori kiila runoantologia, ed. E. Si-nervo et al. (1948); Suomen Runotar, ed. J. V. Lehtonen and E. Cederberg (4th ed., 1951); M. Haavio, Kirjokansi, suomen kansan ker- tomarunoutta (1952); Tuhanten rantain parta-hilla, ed. A. Salmela (1954); Ny finsk lyrik, tr. E. Repo and N.-B. Stormbom (1960).—SWEDISH: Finländsk litt. utom Runeberg, ed. G. Castrén (1922); Finlandssvensk lyrik från Edith Södergran till nu, ed. P. E. Wahlund (1947); Ur Finlands svenska lyrik, ed. E. Kihlman and Th. Warburton (2v., 1949); 20th C. Scandinavian Poetry, ed. M. Allwood (1950); 40 år finlandssvensk lyrik, ed. S. Carlson (1955).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM. FIN.: D. Comparetti, Traditional Poetry of the Finns, tr. I. M. Anderton (1898); J. Bouchot, La Litt. finnoise (1914); F. A. Hästesko, Kalevalan kauneus (1927); A. Kallio, Uudempi suomalainen kirjallisuus (2v., 1928-29); H. Grellmamm, Finnische Lit. (1932); J. L. Perret, Panorama de la litt. contemporaine de Finlande (1936); R. Beck, "Fin. Lit.," in Hist. of the Scandinavian Literatures, ed. T. Blankner (1938); V. Tarkiainen, Finsk litteraturh. (1950) and, with E. Kauppinen, Suomalaisen kirjallisuuden historia (2d ed., 1961); A. Sakari, Litt. finlandaise (1952); E. R. G. Gummerus, Storia delle letterature della Finlandia (1957); I. Havu, Finlands litt., 1900-1950 (1958).—SWEDISH: R. Hedvall, Finlands svenska litt. (1917); J. Landquist, Modern svensk litt. i Finland (1929); E. N. Tigerstedt, Det religiösa problemet i modern finlands-svensk litt. (1939); B. Holmqvist, Modern finlandssvensk litt. (1951); Th. Warburton, Finsk diktning i svensk dräkt: En översikt (1960); G. C. Schoolfield, "The Recent Scandinavian Lyric," BA, 36 (1962). J.B.O.; S.L.

FLAMENCA. See SEGUIDILLA.

FLEMISH POETRY. (For Flemish poetry prior to 1600 see DUTCH POETRY.) After the division of the Netherlands (fall of Antwerp, 1585), the southern provinces (now known as Flanders, or Flemish Belgium) lost their economic, cultural, and literary predominance. Nevertheless, the movements of the modern period, such as the Reformation and the Renaissance, had taken their first flight in this region. Renaissance poetry of the Netherlands reached its high point in the northern provinces, specifically in the work of P. C. Hooft, but the renewal itself originated in the south. In the circles of the rederijkers (q.v.) one finds an interest in humanism, a gradually growing understanding of the spirit of antiquity, and a sensitivity to new moral and aesthetic ideas and to new forms. Transitional figures are Lucas de Heere (1534-84) and Carel van Mander (1548-1606), in whose work one encounters, side by side with conventional rederijker poems, new poetic forms, and a new handling of verse itself. De Heere, an admirer of Marot, introduced the sonnet into the poetry of the Netherlands, wrote odes and epigrams, and applied himself to the purification of verse, although his alexandrines still stand close to the twelve-syllable verse of the rederijkers. Van Mander wrote sonnets and alexandrines and translated the Bucolics and Georgics of Virgil into iambic verse (1597). But the spirit as well as the form of poetry was rejuvenated by Jan van der Noot (ca. 1540–1595/1600), nobleman, humanist, and man of letters. Self-satisfied and ambitious, exalting beauty and poetry, an admirer of Petrarch and the Pléiade (especially Ronsard), he wrote sonnets in alexandrines after the Fr. manner, odes, and an epic; he practiced by preference the iambic pentameter and the alexandrine, he purified the language—all this not in a narrowly formalistic manner but with the inspiration of a true poet (Het Theatre, 1568; Het Bosken, 1570(?); Cort Begrijp der XII Boeken Olympiados, 1579).

After the definite political separation of the northern and southern Netherlands, the poetic climate was principally determined by the Counter-Reformation. In the first half of the 17th c., however, the Renaissance found further echoes among the rederijkers and even, formally, in religious song books. The Renaissance was represented by J. D. Heemssen, J. Yermans, and the most prominent poet of the time, Justus de Harduyn (1582–1636), whose beautifully formed elegiac poetry is still alive. In his youth he celebrated the beauty and grace of his beloved in a cycle of songs, odes, elegies, and sonnets (De weerlicke liefden tot Roose-mond, ed. 1613). Later, as a priest, he wrote sacred love lyrics (Goddelicke lofsanghen, 1620)—more internally experienced, less “literary,” and in some songs connected with the religious lyrics of the Middle Ages. The triumphant Counter-Reformation made itself felt here, as also in the work of L. Makeblyde, B. van Haeften, Aeg. Hafacker, L. van Mechelen, and in the pious and serene lyrics of D. Bellemans. Under the influence of this powerful religious movement, secular poetry (love songs, epithalamia, drinking songs, amorous or edifying sonnets, odes, pastoral poems) was obliged more and more to yield to poetry of religious inspiration. This type of poetry was, in its most typical forms, moral-didactic and popular. Its most distinguished representative was the wise and humorous Jesuit Adriaan Poirters (1605–74), who created, in Het masker vande werelt afgetrocken (1645) (The World's Mask Removed), the successful genre of the spiritual emblem book: in form, an alternation of prints, long poems, and prose pieces (these latter in turn interspersed with short rhymes and verse narratives); in content, at the same time, narrative, didactic, satirical, and polemic; in spirit, religious and moralistic. In addition to being a popular poet, Poirters was a meditative and ascetic poet who had contact with interior piety as well as with the grandiose accents of the affective, emotional Baroque. Baroque elevation also appears in Michiel de Swaen (1654–1707), who closes the 17th c. His religious contemplative poetry suited the spiritual climate, but was distinguished from the popular-didactic poetasting of Poirters' disciples by its more individual experience and its exalted literary aims. Vondel, Cats, and the Fr. classicists were his models. These influences appear also in his literary treatise, Nederduytsche digtkonde of rijmkonst (ca. 1700), which displays a certain independence.

The 18th c. was a period of decadence. Poetry was devoid of personal accents, partly because poets of distinction were lacking, and partly because the now-dominant Fr. classical poetics (Boileau's Art Poétique, translated in 1721 and 1754) discouraged individual expression, though it promoted regularity, as may be noted in the recommendations of such theorists as J. P. van Male and J. B. Bouvaert, the latter of whom also defended blank verse. A poetically and spiritually monotonous expanse of moral observations, didactic verses, complimentary and occasional poems, secular and religious verses, fables, translations, and adaptations lies between the alexandrine didactic poem De gramschap (Anger, 1725) of Livinus de Meyer (1655–1730) and the Ode aan de vryheid (Ode to Freedom, 1790) of P. J. de Borchgrave (1758–1819), in whose predominantly classical poetry various shades of feeling, national pride, and devotion to nature are visible.

These very elements made themselves felt more and more at the beginning of the 19th c., and led to the breakthrough of romanticism, which occasioned the rebirth of Flem. literature. The harmonious Karel Lodewijk Ledeganck (1805–47) and the extraordinarily prolific Prudens van Duyse (1804–59), who practiced all genres and forms, directed poetry away from the classical style; poetry became free and spontaneous in the popular rimes of Th. van Rijswijck (1811–49), and found in J. A. de Laet (1815–91) an interpreter of Weltschmerz. Imagination, sentiment, national inspiration, and introspection broadened the range of poetry; verse narratives, legends, ballads, elegiac musings, songs in the manner of the old volkslied, and historical tableaux varied the pattern. But the assertion of an individual life was lacking: such an assertion had naturally no chance for existence in the climate of moderate realism which, since the 1850's, had expressed itself in pictures from the life of the people (J. van Beers), songs and airs dealing with the joys and sorrows of domestic life (G. Dodd, Fr. de Cort, G. Antheunis), political and social verses (J. Vuylsteke, J. de Geyter), cantatas and oratorios (E. Hiel), and epic tableaux (J. de Geyter, L. de Koninck). Strange but not very convincing are the formal-technical experiments undertaken by the so-called "taalvirtuozen" ("language-virtuosos")—J. M. Dautzenberg, Fr. de Cort, and J. van Droogenbroeck—on the model of Platen and Rückert (see GERMAN POETRY), although Dautzenberg achieved some results which, with the simple anecdotal poems of Rosalie and Virginie Loveling (Gedichten, 1870), belong to the best work brought forth by this period.

One of the most extraordinary assertions of individuality in the modern lyric is to be met in the poetry of Guido Gezelle (1830–99). A paradox of this work is that it was lived and written by a humble and learned priest. One had to wait for him in order to hear individual emotion sing out completely and sometimes passionately, and at the same time to see a wonder—that this individual life is rooted in the divine world-order, in which man, as well as the stars, the flowers, and the ants, stands in the sign of eternity. Gezelle's emotional life shows an astonishing variety of light and dark variegations. His sensuous empathy and his interpretation of nature are probably without equal in the lyrics of the world. His religious life, perhaps, brought him close to the mystical experience. But he does not speak; he sings: his lyric work is an original and highly perfected phenomenon of language, rhyme, and rhythm—plastic and musical, drawn from his own creative strength and distilled from the treasury of popular, dialectal forms of expression, at the same time refined and spontaneous. He draws from the mysterious well of poetry itself, and he liberates the word. Van Ostaijen in the 1920's and the experimental poets who appeared some fifty years after Gezelle's death recognized in him their great predecessor (Dichtoefeningen, 1858; Kleengedichtjes, 1860; Gedichten, gezangen en gebeden, 1862; Tijdkrans, 1893; Rijmsnoer, 1897).

Gezelle remained for a long time on the periphery of recognized poetry. The young titan Albrecht Rodenbach (1856–80) wrote, in traditional meters and with neoromantic inspiration, militant songs, epic verses, and reflective poetry which binds one with its deeply human content. Among a group of "intimate" poets, the impressionistic formalist Pol de Mont (1857–1931) fought for "art for art's sake," and Prosper van Langendonck (1862–1920) interpreted the incurable anguish of the poète maudit (q.v.). Both, especially the latter, anticipated the fin de siècle poetry of Karel van de Woestijne (1878–1929), a Flem. nuance in the individualistic symbolism of the era. He was a hypersensitive and hyperintellectual self-tormenter who explored, in his first life-weary and listless volumes—Het vader-huis (The Paternal House, 1903); De boom-gaard der vogelen en der vruchten (The Orchard of Birds and Fruits, 1905); De gulden schaduw (The Golden Shadow, 1910)—the furthest reaches of sensuous experience and of spiritual love between man and woman; he clothed his pride and fear in a superabundant baroque garment of sensations, images, symbols, word-garlands, and slow rhythms. In his later, more sober verses—De modderen man (The Muddy Man, 1920); God aan zee (God at the Sea, 1926); Het bergmeer (The Mountain Lake, 1928)—in which human insufficiency rises up once more in a supreme wave of impurity and loathesomeness, a great concern with God and eternity appears, and the poet reaches a state of renunciation and purification. Van de Woestijne is master of the poetic landscape of his day, in which the most striking features are the pithy, plastic verses of O. K. de Laey, the social and political lyrics of R. de Clercq, the "irrequietum" of the symphonies and musings of the visionary Cyriel Verschaeve (1874–1949), the mannered poems of Karel van den Oever (1879–1926), and the minor tone of the amiable stoic Jan van Nijlen (1884–).

In the early years of the 1920's, expressionism broke radically with the aesthetically oriented poetry of impressionism as well as with traditional verse construction in order, under the influence of Verhaeren, Whitman, Tagore, the Fr. unanimistes, and, above all, the German expressionists, to proclaim a coming world of goodness and brotherhood—in emotional free verse with spasmodic imagery (P. van Ostaijen, W. Moens, A. Mussche), or in moral anecdotes (M. Gijzen). Paul van Ostaijen (1896–1928), who stood at the beginning of this humanitarian expressionism with his volume Het sienjaar (The Signal, 1918), came rapidly under the spell of dadaism (Bezette stad, Occupied Town, 1921), Apollinaire, Cocteau, and, especially, Aug. Stramm's experiments with the "concentrated word." In acute essays (Gebruiksaanwijzing der lyriek—Directions for the Use of the Lyric) he formulated a theory of pure poetry, based on the isolated word and on association. He had just time enough to give reality to his insights in a few poems, now become classics, in his posthumous volume, Het eerste boek van Schmoll (The First Book of Schmoll, 1928).

Van Ostaijen's spiritual adventure is one of the great moments in the modern poetry of the Low Countries. His spiritual relatives V. J. Brunclair and G. Burssens took part in it, and it had a fertilizing effect on M. Gilliams and P. G. Buckinx, who, sounding the depths of pure essence, brought the word back into its syntactic context. Nevertheless, after the early death of Van Ostaijen, the dominant force for a couple of decades remained traditional: post-symbolist in U. van de Voorde and H. Hensen, tart and hoarse in R. Minne, thoughtful in R. Herreman, antipoetically sober in W. Elschot, vitalistic in R. Verbeeck, B. Decorte and B. Peleman, disenchanted in K. Jonckheere, pithily erotic in L. van Brabant, collectivist in F. Vercnocke and K. Vertommen, the last-mentioned of whom revert to old forms such as the ballad and the epic.

Around 1950 the experimental poets H. Claus, R. van de Kerckhove, A. Bontridder, B. Cami, M. Wauters, E. van Ruysbeek, A. de Roover, and P. de Vree sounded a new note. Their attempts participate in the process of the absolutizing of the word, a process initiated on an international level early in this century and as yet far from completed. Most of these new poets do not "write verses"; they construct poems with words, which are, first of all, magic signs of sound and rhythm, and with images, which, by means of intuitive associations and analogies, interpret emotion directly from the unconscious. The traditional conception of poetry as a statement or an avowal in the inherited language of forms retains, however, a strong attractive power, and is practiced by, among others, A. van Wilderode, H. van Herreweghen, J. de Haes, Reninca, and Chr. d'Haen.

ANTHOLOGIES: Onze dichters, ed. Th. Coopman & V. dela Montagne (1880); Vlaamsche oogst, ed. Ad. Herckenrath (1904); De Vlaamsche jongeren van gisteren en heden, 1910-1927, ed. Aug. van Cauwelaert (1927); Vlaamsche lyriek 1830-1890, ed. M. Gilliams (1937); De Vlaamsche poëzie sinds 1918 (v. 2, Bloemlezing), ed. A. Demedts (2d ed., 1945); Breviarium der Vlaamse lyriek, ed. Marnix Gijsen (4th ed., 1953); Vlaamse dichtkunst van deze tijd, ed. P. de Ryck (2 v., 2d ed., 1954); Waar is de eerste morgen?, ed. J. Walravens (2d ed., 1959).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: E. Rombauts, "Humanisme en Renaissance in de Zuidelijke Nederlanden" and "De letterkunde der XVIIe eeuw in Zuid-Nederland" in Fr. Baur and others, Geschiedenis van de letterkunde der Nederlanden, III (1945) and V (1952); A. Demedts, De Vlaamsche poëzie sinds 1918 (v. 1, Studie, 2d ed., 1945); M. Rutten, Nederlandse dichtkunst van Kloos tot Claus (1957); R. F. Lissens, De Vlaamse letterkunde van 1780 tot heden (3d ed., 1959); P. de Vree, Throw in (1959).

R.F.L. (tr. F.J.W.)

FLESHLY SCHOOL OF POETRY, THE. First part of the title of an article in the October 1871 issue of Contemporary Review, signed "Thomas Maitland" but actually by Robert Buchanan. Buchanan saw Rossetti, Swinburne, and Morris as poets united by perverse loyalties toward one another and against all that was normal and decent. His primary target was Rossetti, whose recently published Poems provided the occasion for the article. His chief objections to the "School" were that they were "fleshly" and that they were aesthetic: "The fleshly gentlemen have bound themselves by solemn league and covenant to extol fleshliness as the distinct and supreme end of poetic and pictorial art; to aver that poetic expression is greater than poetic thought. . . ."

In attacking "fleshliness" Buchanan was exploiting a general mid-Victorian prejudice against exposure of the body in life and art (and also betraying his own prurience). The graver charge, and the one more disturbing to the "School," was that their work was morally irresponsible, for, however much they may have contributed to the "aesthetic movement," none of these poets believed in the autonomy of art or exalted form over content.

Deeply hurt, Rossetti entered a dignified protest in "The Stealthy School of Criticism," Athenaeum, December 16, 1871. Swinburne, delighted at the opportunity to strike another blow in his private war with Buchanan which had begun with the latter's attack on Poems and Ballads (1866), published in 1872 a savage pamphlet entitled Under the Microscope. Virulent exchanges between Swinburne and Buchanan continued for the next four years, ending only with Buchanan's victory over Swinburne's publisher in a libel suit. While the "Fleshly School" controversy may have hastened Rossetti's death, it undoubtedly ensured the failure of Buchanan's literary career. —T. Maitland, "The Fleshly School of Poetry; Mr. D. G. Rossetti," Contemporary Rev., 28 (1871), expanded and publ. under Buchanan's own name in The F.S.o.P. and Other Phenomena of the Day (1872); D. G. Rossetti, "The Stealthy School of Crit.," Athenaeum, Dec. 16, 1871; A. C. Swinburne, "Under the Microscope" (1872); O. Doughty, "The F.S.o.P.: 1871-72," Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1949); J. H. Buckley, "The Fear of Art," The Victorian Temper (1951); J. A. Cassidy, "Robert Buchanan and the Fleshly Controversy," PMLA, 67 (1952); G. G. Storey, "Robert Buchanan's Critical Principles," PMLA, 68 (1953). J.K.R.

FLYTING, fliting. A poetical invective—often a kind of intellectual game—in which two poets assail each other alternately with scurrilous, abusive verse, e.g., The Flying of Dunbar & Kennedie. The form is especially typical of 16th-c. Scottish poets; despite the excess profanity, flytings have freshness, color, and a rich power, and are not infrequently superior in quality to Eng. poetry of the same period. Probably influenced Skelton.

While the f. tradition is at the heart of Scottish poetry and extends from William Dunbar (ca. 1460-ca. 1520) to Hugh MacDiarmid in the 20th c., cursing matches in verse are found in other literatures as well, e.g., Gr., Arabic, Celtic, It., and, of course, Prov. (see TENZONE).—A. Mure Mackenzie, A Historical Survey of Scottish Lit. to 1914 (1933); C. S. Lewis, Eng. Lit. in the 16th C., Excluding Drama (1954); K. Wittig, The Scottish Tradition in Lit. (1958).

R.O.E.

FOCUS. A photographer so aims and adjusts his camera that there will be one point in his picture to which all other elements are subordinated. This point is the center of interest or focus. In literature, also, f. is the organizational center of the work—that element which organizes and unifies all other elements. In Browning's My Last Duchess the f. is the characterization of the Duke. In Tennyson's Mariana it is a mood of melancholy and dejection. In Frost's The Death of the Hired Man it is the conflict of justice vs. mercy which finds expression in the two definitions of home.

L.P.

FOLÍA. A Sp. stanza form, popular 4-line variation of the seguidilla (q.v.), probably related to a Portuguese dance-song form and normally expressing a nonsensical or ridiculous thought. The lines may be octosyllabic or shorter; if the lines are not of equal length, the even-numbered are generally the shorter and very often—some think properly so—oxytonic. The origin is undatable, but folias dating before 1600 are known. The following example is from Cervantes' Rinconete y Cortadillo:

Por un sevillano
rufo a lo valón
tengo socarrado
todo el corazón.

D.C.C.

FOLK SONG, a body of song preserved and transmitted by oral tradition. A folk song is the expression not of any individual poet but of the whole singing community, and it is uninfluenced by contemporary literary conventions or sophisticated cultural norms. F.s. embraces work songs, folk lyrics, sea shanties, traditional ballads, religious songs, lullabies, play games, carols and dance songs. Although, taken altogether, f.s. is a distressingly amorphous mass, certain types have distinctive formal characteristics. The European traditional ballad, the narrative department of f.s., is the most important such type and will be separately treated. Here we shall discuss only nonnarrative f.s., song that does not pretend to tell a story.

Primitively, f.s. was poetry, music, and dance

all in one, but since the Middle Ages, the bulk of f.s. has ceased to be danced. Some folk songs have even lost their musical dimension; longer pieces, especially, began long ago to be recited instead of sung. But music remains an important part of f.s., though it is music of a simple kind. Harmony occurs rarely in f.s. and is suspect when it does. Polyphonic singing, however, sometimes implicating as many as four voice lines, is highly cultivated by Slavic singers, particularly the Russians. But it is in tonal organization that folk music differs most widely from art music. Some of the finest European folk tunes are based on the modal scales (Aeolian, Mixolydian, Dorian, etc.) of medieval church music rather than on the modern major and minor scales. Unfortunately, the early collectors did not understand the modal system and consequently tortured the tunes into the modern system—with deplorable results. Many of Thomas Moore's Irish Melodies are spoiled for just this reason. As to performance, modern concert singers usually accompany themselves; authentically the folk singer seldom does, but sings without instrumental accompaniment or is accompanied by someone else. Choral accompaniment by voice, by a chorus of whistlers or by hand-clapping and foot-stomping may also figure in a folk performance. In England the most elaborate type of f.s. musically is the round. Here the singers divide themselves into three or four groups, each of which begins the melody at staggered intervals, as in the nursery song Row, row, row your boat. Sumer is a cumen in, a round preserved in a 13th-c. manuscript, is considered the oldest extant Eng. f.s.

F.s. flourishes best in the backwaters of civilization, in illiterate communities where class distinctions are vague and where people are racially homogeneous. Illiteracy is the prime condition, for f.s. substitutes for literary expression among people without letters. A song may have been originally composed by an individual, but it does not become f.s. until it is adopted by the folk and re-created communally. Thus f.s. is never self-conscious, since it is a collective creation expressing representative feelings. The style reflects the way the song has come into being and is transmitted. The sophisticated poet's main research is to find the peculiar figure or the unique phrase that will project imaginatively what he sees and feels; the f.s. employs stock figures and formulaic phrases, and the arresting and magically poetic effects achieved in f.s. are the successes of the conventions and not the result of painstaking artistic calculations. Because f.s. is sung, the verses have a melodic fluency about them. Short meters are characteristic. And because folk poetry is carried in memory, the songs are free of unnecessary complication.

For the same reason, various kinds of repetition are employed for mnemonic purposes. Since the songs are the possession of the folk, they naturally reflect the naïveté and directness of those who have created and cherish them.

In the late Middle Ages, folk and literary poetry were less widely estranged than they have been since that period; nevertheless, folk songs were only sporadically recorded in manuscripts. The greater part of the national repositories were contributed by collectors who, beginning in the 1790's, scoured out-of-the-way rural districts for traces of traditional song. These basic field collections were usually published as the f.s. of a given principality (Germany), province (France), shire (Britain) state or region (America) since the sponsors were local antiquarian and folklore societies. The divisions thus established are largely artificial; folk songs do not observe political boundaries. Even the provincial grouping of Fr. songs, by far the least artificial, is not entirely satisfactory. Normandy and Brittany are, to be sure, integral f.s. regions, but a province like Guyenne contains the pays of Quercy, Périgord, and Rouerge whose folk songs are interestingly distinct. Still, for convenience, scholars accept the present parochial arrangements, though this concession does not inhibit them from making blanket statements about a whole nation's or language's f.s.

A broad survey of European f.s. reveals that as one moves south the lyrical element tends to dominate the narrative. Danish songs are mainly narrative, and narrative of a peculiarly stiff and heroic kind. Germany is rich in both veins; in France the lyric predominates, as it does even more decisively in Italy. Sicily, a seminal region for It. lyric forms, is exceptional in possessing a great number of historical narratives as well. And the Sp. story-songs, the world-renowned romances (q.v.), are of greater aesthetic value than the vastly more numerous coplas (q.v.) or the soleares and siguiriyos of cante jondo, q.v. (deep song; Gypsy style). In traversing Europe north to south, one notes also the progressive ascendancy of assonance over rhyme. Slavic collections are remarkable for their greater quantity of non-stanzaic songs and for a generally heavier and longer basic verse. The division of parts of the Slavic repertory into men's songs and women's songs introduces a principle rarely found elsewhere in Europe.

Among the more curious genres of continental f.s. are the following: the cloer, the complaint of a Breton seminarian whose love-sickness makes him uncertain of his priestly vocation; the pastourelle, q.v. (northern France) in which a shepherdess is accosted by a lecherous gallant; the Bavarian schnadahüpfli, an impromptu song of one or two couplets sung traditionally by reapers; the Czech kaleďy, a conjurer's chant; the Andalusian saeta, a fervent religious apostrophe addressed to an image carried in procession; the Sicilian ciuri (in Tuscany, stornelli, q.v.), short invocations to a loved one symbolized as a flower:

Flower of the palm!

In vain I fly, in vain I search for calm.

My life's gone stale since I have lost your charm; . . .

and the passionate Corsican voceri, keening songs at the wake of a person who has suffered a violent death. Impressive among group songs are the Hebridean waulking chants, which are shared by leader and Gaelic chorus as they knead and hand around a length of cloth that is being shrunk.

Scottish folk lyrics deal mainly with courtship and unrequited love (Waly, Waly) or, as in Auld Lang Syne, with convivial friendship. Some of Robert Burns's most esteemed lyrics—A Red, Red Rose, for example—are simply tidied versions of Scottish folk songs of this kind. Cryptic political ditties of Jacobite sympathies once bulked large in the Scotsman's repertory, but they are now forgotten. With the exception of the anti-Papist Lilliburlero, the same fate has overtaken the political songs of England. Amorous dalliance and love laments are the chief subjects of Eng. song; interspersed with them are drinking songs and humorous pieces, the latter concerned heavily with the malice and vices of incompatibly married couples. Marriage is the blissful goal of the love songs; love is seldom mentioned in songs about the married. I Wish I Were Single Again exists in versions for both sexes. Notable among Eng. love songs is the frequent chanson d'aventure opening which finds the narrator walking abroad on a May morning and over-hearing the lament of a disappointed lover. In Where Are You Going, My Pretty Young Maid? there is a trace of the brutally realistic Fr. pastourelles. But only a faint trace, for the song in England has sunk to the children's level.

Importations from Britain make up the core of Am. f.s. The Butcher Boy and The Cuckoo, both tales of disappointed love, can be traced to transatlantic origins, as can A Paper of Pins and most other Am. courting play games. Some Am. lyrics (for example, Who's Gonna Shoe Your Pretty Little Foot?) are excerpts from long British ballads. Definitely of native origin are Rye Whiskey, Old Rosin the Beau, and a host of other drinking songs and the "interminables" like Old Joe Clark and the cowboy favorite The Old Chisholm Trail, both of which have grown innumerable additional stanzas.

Marriage remains a butt of jokes in the New World; an equally common motive for humor is exploited in the frontier songs which complain with boisterous exaggeration about the hardship of life in the raw territories. In the spirituals, religious songs written in the rhythms of secular songs rather than in those of hymnody, the folk have expressed their naive faith. There is nothing in America that compares with the chants and festival songs that have grown up in European countries around each of the holy seasons.

The Negro spirituals, though they derive from revival songs sung in white camp-meetings, have taken on a radically different musical and poetic form in Negro throats. How much of this novel rhythmic system goes back to African sources has yet to be determined. The Negro has also a rich songbag of hollers, work songs, and prisoners' laments. Negro jingles in which companionable animals figure are fairly numerous, but this sort of thing is better done in the Negro folk tales. The "blues" (q.v.) is the characteristic Negro love complaint, the depressed cry of an abandoned lover. Hardly Negro at all are such dialectical pieces as Old Zip Coon and The Blue-Tail Fly. These are rather the products of the blackface minstrels and have only a vague connection with the songs of the plantation Negroes. See BALLAD.

There is no respectable compendium of European f.s. and no single work that surveys the field. Excellent and accessible collections are: F. R. Marin, Cantos populares españoles (1882-83); C. Nigra, Canti popolari del Piemonte (1888); G. Pitrè, Canti popolari siciliani (1891); L. Erk and F. Böhme, Deutscher Liederhort (3 v., 1893-94); C. J. Sharp, Folk Songs of England (1908-12); P. W. Joyce, Old Ir. Folk Music (1909); J. Canteloube, Anthologie des chants populaires français (1951). The best Am. collections are: C. J. Sharp, Eng. Folk Songs from the Southern Appalachians (1932); V. Randolph, Ozark Folksongs (1946-50); a commercial venture, J. and A. Lomax, Am. Ballads and Folk Songs (1934) and, recently, A. Lomax, The Folk Songs of North America in the Eng. Language (1960). For a critical history of f.s. study, see D. K. Wilgus, Anglo-Am. Folksong Scholarship since 1898 (1959).

A.B.F.

FOOT. A measurable, patterned unit of poetic rhythm. The concept of the f. has been imported into modern accentual-syllabic prosody (see METER) from classical quantitative practice, and disagreement over the nature (and even the "existence") of the f. has been traditional since the late Renaissance. The Eng. f. is customarily defined by the orthodox as a measure of rhythm consisting of 1 accented (stressed, "long") syllable (or 2, as in the spondee) and 1 or more unaccented (unstressed, "short," "slack") syllables. The poetic line in a more or less regular composition, say the traditional prosodists, consists of a number of feet from 1 to 8; conventionally, the feet are to be roughly of the same kind, although metrical variations (q.v.), produced by the occasional "substitution" of different feet, are permissible so long as these substitutions do not efface for long the repeated pattern of the prevailing f.

In traditional Eng. accentual or accentual-syllabic verse (see ENG. PROSODY), the following feet are the most common:

IAMB (iambus); iambic, \times , as in de^xstroy
 ANAPEST (anapaest); anapestic $\times \times$, inter^xvene
 TROCHEE; trochaic, \times top^xsy
 DACTYL; dactylic, $\times \times$ mer^xryly
 SPONDEE; spondaic, $\times \times$ amen
 PYRRHIC $\times \times$ the^x sea | son^x of | mist^xs

Iambic and anapestic feet are called ascending (q.v.) or rising feet; trochaic and dactylic, descending (q.v.) or falling. Feet of 2 syllables are called duple feet; feet of 3, triple. Spondaic (except in sprung rhythm, q.v.) and pyrrhic feet are generally "substitute" feet (see METRICAL VARIATIONS). Some prosodists recognize also a monosyllabic f. consisting of 1 stressed syllable. The exemplification of these feet by single words, above, of course distorts their nature: it is important to remember that f. divisions do not necessarily correspond to word divisions, and that the structure of a f. is determined contextually by the nature of the feet which surround it.

The f. bears a close resemblance to the musical bar: both are arbitrary and abstract units of measure which do not necessarily coincide with the phrasal units which they underlie. The major difference between them is that the bar always begins with a "stress."

It is perhaps unfortunate that the terminology of feet is borrowed from classical quantitative prosody, where practice is in general much more regular than in most Eng. verse and where "substitutions" are largely governed by rule rather than by whim or instinct. In addition to those listed above, the following feet are among those used in Gr. and L. poetry (where, of course, duration of syllables rather than stress determines "long" and "short"):

AMPHIBRACH $\sim \sim \sim$
 ANTISPAST $\sim \sim \sim$
 BACCHIUS $\sim \sim \sim$
 CHORIAMBUS $\sim \sim \sim \sim$

CRETIC (or amphimacer) ---

DOCHMIAC ----

EPITRITE ----- (called 1st, 2d, 3d, or 4th according to position of the short syllable)

IONIC

a majore ---- a minore ----

MOLOSSUS ----

PAEON ----- (called 1st, 2d, 3d, or 4th according to the position of the long syllable)

PROCELEUSMATIC -----

TRIBRACH ---

See PROSODY, SCANSION, METER, ENG. PROSODY, CLASSICAL PROSODY.

R. Bridges, "On the Use of Gr. Terminology in Eng. Prosody," Milton's Prosody (1921); Saintsbury, Prosody; Baum; Hamer; Koster.

P.F.

FORM in poetry, simply defined, is the manner in which a poem is composed as distinct from what the poem is about. The latter may be called the subject or the substance of the poem, its subject matter or content as distinct from its form or manner. "Form" being a term with a variety of denotations, some of them closely connected with particular systems of philosophy, poetic f. also admits of several meanings, some so divergent from each other that they are contradictory.

To take first one of the commonest meanings, the f. of a poem may be its meter, poetry being usually composed in verse. Modern alternatives to regular verse such as free verse and patterned prose would also constitute the formal element of the poem in this meaning of the term. Alternatively, the words used in the poem, its language and diction, may be considered the f., as distinct from the thought or subject matter of the poem. By extension, f. may be the style in which the composition is written. Most of these meanings are implied when one speaks of the "cult of form" or formalism in poetry, which is making art consist essentially in the skillful handling of words and phrases, verse and rhyme, style and diction. Formalists believe that the value of a poem depends exclusively on the quality of its f., in that sense. They tend to give poets advice such as Horace's to use unsparingly "the labor of the file," revising and polishing the f. until it is perfect, or the injunction from the Parnassian poet who proclaimed that "form is everything"; "Sculpte, lime, cisèle" (T. Gautier, preface to Mlle de Maupin, and L'art). Critics of a different persuasion are apt to object that in this meaning f. "is something superficial, general, diagrammatic. We speak of empty form, mere form, formal politeness; it is opposed to the heart and soul of anything, to what is essential, material, and so forth" (B. Bosanquet, Three Lectures on Aesthetic, 1916, p. 15).

W. P. Ker pointed out that "from another point of view, however, which is just as common, it is the scheme or argument that is the form, and the poet's very words are the matter with which it is filled. The form is not that with which you are immediately presented, or that which fills your ears when the poem is recited—it is the abstract original scheme from which the poet began. . . . If it is said that a poem is formless—Wordsworth's Excursion, for example—what is meant is generally that the argument is not well planned" (Form and Style in Poetry, p. 138). In this sense f. is the structure, tight or loose, supple or flaccid, of the whole composition, "this kind of form being in strictness neither prosaic nor poetical, but just as much the one as the other" (p. 139). This brings us to another widely accepted meaning of f., viz. genre or kind of composition. The epic, the lyric, the drama, with all their subdivisions, are said to be the forms of poetry (see GENRES). This meaning of f. as kind may derive from the ancient philosophical meaning of the term (as with Plato's eidos), which has been defined: "that which an object has in common with other objects is its form." Accordingly what a poem has in common with other poems—its presentation as dialogue or narrative or as personal effusion—is its f. or kind. The kind or genre is then conceived to determine the structure of the poem, which is the previous meaning of f.

On the other hand, a philosophical meaning which is practically opposite to the last may be defined as follows: "In a broad sense, whatever in the make-up of an object helps one to perceive it as a whole is its form" (V. M. Ames in V. Fern, ed., History of Philosophical Systems, 1950, p. 555). This makes f. the unifying factor in the poem. In this sense we find it applied also to the novel: "Form represents the final unity of a work of fiction, the successful combining of all parts into an artful whole" (R. B. West and R. Stallman, The Art of Modern Fiction, 1949, p. 647). It is therefore much more than the "abstract argument" or "original scheme": it is the actual welding of all parts into a whole, the individual organization of a work so that all its constituents, however defined—words, thoughts, diction, style, or meter—cohere and harmonize. In this sense f. is often called organic f. and sharply distinguished from abstract structure, especially as determined by genre. The external and preconceived structure depending on genre is correspondingly named mechanical or abstract f. in contrast with organic. This famous dichotomy of organic vs. mechanical f. found its classical formulation in A. W. Schlegel's

Lectures on Dramatic Literature (1809-11), where the free and supple f. of Shakespearean tragedy is defended as organic, in contradistinction of the mechanical regularity imposed by the rules and unities of neoclassicism. Thus Schlegel finally solved the problem of the artistic pattern of Shakespeare's plays, which had puzzled critics throughout the 18th c. In Coleridge's felicitous translation Schlegel's formula found its way into Eng. criticism and there fructified and proliferated, until it has now become almost a commonplace, and its original author and application often forgotten. In the 20th c. the organic unity of f. and content was the subject of another classic pronouncement by A. C. Bradley in his famous inaugural lecture of 1901, "Poetry for Poetry's Sake." He formulated a dichotomy of "form and substance" and argued: "If the substance means ideas, images, and the like taken alone, and the form means the measured language taken by itself, this is a possible distinction, but it is a distinction of things not in the poem, and the value lies in neither of them. If substance and form mean anything in the poem, then each is involved in the other, and the question in which of them the value lies has no sense. . . . The true critic in speaking of these apart does not really think of them apart; the whole, the poetic experience, of which they are but aspects, is always in his mind; and he is always aiming at a richer, truer, more intense repetition of that experience" (pp. 16-17). Bradley then used the phrase "significant form" for the unified whole (p. 19), a phrase which shortly afterwards became the key term in Clive Bell's theory of art (1913).

This concept of f. as the result of the operation of the plastic and unifying imagination was developed by romantic criticism and aesthetics, although the concept of f. as a dynamic unifying principle is as old as Aristotle. In Book 7 of the Metaphysics Aristotle applied to art his ontological concept of f. determining matter, such as the idea of the statue which is the form in the mind of the sculptor and which he then imposes upon some kind of material: the resultant work is thus a synthesis of f. and matter produced by human intelligence, while living beings are a synthesis of f. and matter produced by nature. This f. might therefore be said to be organic by analogy. But unfortunately in the Poetics Aristotle was diverted by the Gr. conception of poetry as mimetic (see IMITATION; POETRY, THEORIES OF; and POETICS, CONCEPTIONS OF) from applying this concept of organic f. to poetry. The recognition of the relationship of the quality of Beauty to the inner f. (endon eidos) was Plotinus' constructive contribution to aesthetics. From Kant onward f. assumes an epistemological significance as the active mental factor in the organization of experience from the manifold of sensations. Schiller then made poetic f. a force that controls and transforms blind impulse into the material of art: in that sense (and not in the sense of the superficial formalism mentioned above) he could say that "Art consists in the destruction of matter by form" (Letters on Aesthetic Education 22). On the other hand, in Hegel art is defined as the sensuous appearance of the Idea, which makes f. consist of the sensuous element and matter becomes the spiritual element or the Idea, thus showing again the polysemanticism of these terms.

The organic concept of f. and content has as its logical corollary that there is no such thing in art as the same f. with different content: alteration in one produces alteration in the other. Hence the rejection of the common concept of genre or kind as an empty form into which a separate matter is poured, as in a mold or vessel (cf. Schlegel). The ultimate consequence of this argument is the rejection, by Croce and others, of genres and kinds from the domain of criticism, f. being conceived as individual and as unique as matter, or as "the efficient equivalent" of a poem's unity (L. Abercrombie, p. 62).

The concept of Inner F. in German criticism is apparently a variant of organic f. It appears as early as 1776 in young Goethe's criticism of dramatic rules and of the unities (Jubiläum Ausgabe, 36.115). It has been traced back to Plotinus through Shaftesbury, and forward into romantic criticism as well as into W. von Humboldt's theory of language, which also makes use of the concept of Inner F. In the present century it has been used by the school of George in biographical studies in which the "Inner F." of a great mind has been investigated.

A. C. Bradley, Oxford Lectures on Poetry (1909); B. Croce, Aesthetic, tr. D. Ainslie (2d ed., 1922); E. Panofsky, Idea (1924); L. Abercrombie, The Theory of Poetry (1926); W. P. Ker, F. and Style in Poetry (1928); H. Read, F. in Modern Poetry (1932) and The True Voice of Feeling (1953); R. Schwingler, Innere F. (1935); O. Walzel, Grenzen von Poesie und Unpoesie (1937); G. McKenzie, Organic Unity in Coleridge (1939); H. Cherniss, "The Biographical Fashion in Lit. Crit.," Univ. of Calif. Publications in Cl. Phil., 12 (1943); J. Benziger, "Organic Unity: Leibniz to Coleridge," PMLA, 66 (1951); C. La Drière, "F.," in Dict. of World Lit., ed. J. T. Shipley (rev., 1953); V. M. Hamm, "The Problem of F. in Nature and the Arts," JAAC, 13 (1954); F. Schiller, The Aesthetic Education of Man, tr. R. Snell (1954); R. H. Fogle, "Organic F. in Am. Crit., 1840-1870," Development of Am. Lit. Crit., ed. F. Stovall (1955); Stil und Formprobleme in der Literatur, ed. P. Bockman (1959); P. Fussell, Jr., Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (1965). G.N.G.O.

FORNYRÐISLAG. An ON (Eddic) verse form consisting of a 4-line stanza, each line divided by a caesura into 2 half-lines, which in turn have 2 accented syllables and 2 (or 3) unaccented ones. The 2 half-lines are linked together by alliteration, which in case of the first-line could fall on one or the other of the stressed syllables, but in the second half-line had to fall on the first stressed syllable. The alliteration of the first half-line was called stuðlar (props), the one in the second half-line (höfuðstafr (head-stave). The alliteration, in reality an initial rhyme, consists of consonants alliterating with the same consonant, except sk, sp, and st, which could only alliterate with themselves, and of a vowel alliterating with any other vowel, as well as with j. The opening lines of the famous Völuspá (Sibyl's Vision) will serve as an example of the form, illustrating the metrical principles outlined above: "Hljóðs bið ek allar helgar kindir / meiri ok minni mögu Heimdallar." The great majority of the Eddic poems are composed in this measure, which Icelandic poets still use on occasion.—The Poetic Edda, tr. H. A. Bellows (1923) and tr. L. M. Hollander (1928, rev. ed. 1962). R.B.

FOUR AGES OF POETRY. Essay (1820) of about 5,500 words by Thomas Love Peacock, purporting to demonstrate the irrelevance of poetry in modern culture, and now known chiefly by title as having provoked Shelley's Defence of Poetry. In a witty conspectus, Peacock declares that classical Gr. and L. verse passed through ages of (1) iron, or crude primeval vigor, (2) gold, or Homeric mastery, (3) silver, or Virgilian refinement, and (4) brass, or "the second childhood of poetry." Then he forces postclassical poetry into the same cycle for the purpose of ridiculing, as exemplars of the new age of brass, "that egregious confraternity of rhymesters, . . . the Lake Poets." Wordsworth (whom he elsewhere treats with respect) is condemned not only as a silly poet, but because any new poetry is a silly pastime in the modern world, which has for its major concerns politics and philosophy and science, and for its amusement the treasures of classical poetry. The essay begins in clever gaiety and ends in jolly outrageousness; like one of the convivial parsons in his own puckish novels, Peacock pushes his argument into preposterous audacity for the sheer fun of it. Inflated praise of the contemporary giants of practical intellect, at the expense of the "drivellers and mountebanks" who still write poetry, may be taken as an ironical gibe at the idea of progress; but no serious purpose is evident. The solemn reply by his intimate friend Shelley takes a much higher tone. Richards' Science and Poetry, a century later, is a similarly earnest refutation of Peacock on different grounds.—See the essay in Peacock's works, ed. Brett-Smith and Jones (1934), vol. viii, or ed. R. Garnett (1891), vol. entitled Calidore and Miscellanea; Shelley, Defence of Poetry, many printings; I. A. Richards, Science and Poetry (1926). F.A.D.

FOURTEENER. An Eng. meter of 7 iambic feet. See HEPTAMETER and SEPTENARY.

FREE-METRE POETRY. All metrical forms known to Eng. poetry, however strict, would be included among the "free metres" of Welsh poetry. It is a generic term for all possible metrical forms not included among the "strict-metres" (q.v.) of the Welsh professional bards, i.e., the various kinds of awdl, cywydd, and englyn (qq.v.), which in their final forms were codified by the poet Dafydd ab Edmwnd in the Carmarthen Eisteddfod (ca. 1450) as the "twenty-four metres." Rapid growth of "free-metre" poetry in Welsh is largely a consequence of the breakdown of the bardic orders and the influx of foreign influences following the social changes of the Tudor period.—Morris-Jones; Parry. D.M.L.

FREE VERSE. A term popularly, but not accurately, used to describe the poems of Walt Whitman and others whose verse is based not on the recurrence of stress accent in a regular, strictly measurable pattern, but rather on the irregular rhythmic cadence of the recurrence, with variations, of significant phrases, image patterns, and the like. F.v. treats the device of rhyme with a similar freedom and irregularity. The following quotation, from Whitman's Song of Myself, is fairly typical:

I celebrate myself;
And what I assume you shall assume;
For every atom belonging to me, as good belongs to you

I loaf and invite my soul;
I lean and loaf at my ease, observing a blade of summer grass.

There are two opinions about the form and Whitman's use of it. Some say that his practice is no more than rhythmical prose. Others that it has distinctively "poetic" qualities. Both of these opinions are consistent with the following addition to the definition given above in paragraph one: whenever and however, either by the agency of the eye or ear, a persistent irregularity of the metrical pattern is established in a poem, it can justly be called f.v. The irregularity involves both the eye and the ear. Whether the measure be written down with a view to the appearance of the poem on the printed page or to the sound of the words as spoken or sung is of no consequence so long as the established irregularity is maintained.

Many antecedents have been cited in the attempt to discover the origins of f.v. Gr. and L. "art prose" (cf. Norden, Die Antike Kunstprosa) bears obvious resemblances to the modern form, as do the medieval tropes and sequences. Alliterative verse suggests the tendency of the Germanic languages to seek forms other than traditional quantitative or accentual verse. In England, the King James translation of the Psalms and the Song of Songs, based in part on the original Hebrew cadences, provided a powerful and inspiring model for nonmetrical verse, the influence of which is evident in the work of Whitman and most of his successors. Technically, Milton's verse is regular, but its effect in Lycidas, Paradise Lost, and Samson is that of extreme freedom, a fact evident in Milton's tendency to make the verse paragraph rather than the line his basic unit. And although Fr. neoclassicists prided themselves on their regularity, certain modern theorists (Robert de Souza, Georges Lote) have demonstrated that the Fr. alexandrine is extremely irregular if scansion is based on reading rather than syllable-counting.

The neoclassic movement hindered the tendency evident in the baroque Pindaric ode to move toward f.v. Interest revived, however, as the romantic movement gained momentum. Macpherson's Ossian Poems are in rhythmical prose, and Christopher Smart's Jubilate Agno is f.v. in the tradition of the King James Psalms. In Germany Klopstock (Messias), Goethe (Prometheus), and Novalis (Hymnen an die Nacht) show a similar tendency. Romantic experimenters in f.v. and related forms include Blake and Arnold (f.v.); Lamb, de Quincey, and Poe (prose tending to poetry); Hölderlin, Heine, and Nietzsche (poetic prose, prose poem); Bertrand, Hugo, Baudelaire (f.v., prose poem). Toward the end of the 19th c. the Fr. symbolists had gone far toward establishing the prestige and flexibility of f.v. on the continent; while Whitman (who had influenced the symbolists through Baudelaire) and Gerard Manley Hopkins, whose "sprung rhythm" (q.v.) is a kind of mid-point between f.v. and tradition, moved toward the form in England and America.

During the 20th c. f.v. has become so common as to have some claim to being the characteristic verse form of the age. Merely listing the significant poets who have used f.v. would be a tedious and futile task, but among typical practitioners may be mentioned Rilke, Apollinaire, St.-John Perse, Eliot, Ezra Pound, and William Carlos Williams. It may be noted that the most important Eng. and Am. f.v. poets of the first half of the century were either involved in or influenced by the imagist program formulated by T. E. Hulme and Ezra Pound between roughly 1905 and 1915.

In all modern literatures f.v. has been defended as more "natural" than regular meter, and it has often, though by no means always, been described as innately "democratic" or even revolutionary. In England and America it has been argued (especially by Pound and Williams) that conventional meters, being based on analogies to Gr. and L. quantitative forms, deform the natural speech pattern. This deformity is most marked in Milton—despite the fact that Milton in some ways anticipated the effects of f.v.—and his techniques, minus his talent, helped to create the artificial diction typical of much 18th- and 19th-c. poetry. On the other hand, the Gr. and L. contour of phrase which Milton and the Elizabethans learned in the schools was capable of effects unprecedented in the colloquial idiom. That, in essence, is still the stumbling block to an easy, not to say natural, poetry in Eng.

A language or practice of speaking or writing which will not conform to rigid prosodic rules is forced to break those rules if it is to be retained in its own character. More accurately, it must adopt a new set of rules which it can obey, find another way of speaking and writing. It is the refusal of Eng. (especially Am. Eng.) to conform to standard prosody which has given rise to "f.v." However, the term can be misleading. Being an art form, verse cannot be "free" in the sense of having no limitations or guiding principles.

The crux of the question is measure. In f.v. the measure has been loosened to give more play to vocabulary and syntax—hence, to the mind in its excursions. The bracket of the customary foot has been expanded so that more syllables, words, or phrases can be admitted into its confines. The new unit thus created may be called the "variable foot," a term and a concept already accepted widely as a means of bringing the warring elements of freedom and discipline together. It rejects the standard of the conventionally fixed foot and suggests that measure varies with the idiom by which it is employed and the tonality of the individual poem. Thus, as in speech, the prosodic pattern is evaluated by criteria of effectiveness and expressiveness rather than mechanical syllable counts. The verse of genuine poetry can never be "free," but f.v., interpreted in terms of the variable foot, removes many artificial obstacles between the poet and the fulfillment of the laws of his design. See also VERS LIBRE.

T. S. Eliot, "Reflections on Vers Libre," New

Statesman, 8 (1917); A. Lowell, "The Rhythms of F.V.," Dial, 64 (1918) and "Walt Whitman and the New Poetry," Yale Review, 16 (1927); H. Monroe, Poets and Their Art (1926); E. Pound, Make It New (1934); G. W. Allen, Am. Prosody (1935); A. Closs, Die freien Rhythmen in der deutschen Lyrik (1947); Y. Winters, In Defense of Reason (1947); C. A. Allen, "Cadenced F.V.," CE, 9 (1948); W. C. Williams, "An Approach to the Poem," EIE, 1947 (1948); L. Bogan, "Vers Libre and Avant-Garde," Achievement in Am. Poetry, 1900-1950 (1951); Discussions of Poetry, ed. G. Hemphill (1961). w.c.w.

FRENCH POETICS. See MEDIEVAL, RENAISSANCE, BAROQUE, NEOCLASSICAL, MODERN POETICS.

FRENCH POETRY. It has been frequently claimed, e.g., by A. E. Housman in a Cambridge conversation with André Gide (1917), that there is in Fr. poetry no tradition comparable to that of England or Germany or Italy. Housman stated that between Villon and Baudelaire—for 400 years—Fr. poetry was given over to rhymed discourse in which eloquence, wit, vituperation, and pathos were present, but not poetry. Even the romantics with their abundant lyricism have been denied a place among the legitimate poets.

Gide's first answer to this challenge was to acknowledge that perhaps the Fr. as a nation do have a deficiency in lyric sentiment, but that this very deficiency accounts for the elaborate system of Fr. prosody which developed in the course of those 400 years. Strict rules of versification, acting as constraints on the poet's spontaneity, caused poetry to be looked upon in France as a difficult art form, which had been more rigorously perfected there than in other countries. In answer to Housman's second question, "After all, what is poetry?" Gide turned to a definition of Baudelaire's in notes for a preface to the Fleurs du Mal. "Rhythm and rhyme," Baudelaire wrote, "answer man's immortal need for monotony, symmetry, and surprise, as opposed to the vanity and danger of inspiration." This theory, whereby poetry is related to music in that its prosody springs from the deepest, most primitive part of nature, illuminates not only the entire history of Fr. poetry, but also Baudelaire's significant revolution in that history with the publication of Les Fleurs du Mal.

I. The earliest Fr. lyric poems date from the first part of the 12th c. Called chansons de toile, they were short poems probably accompanying needle work and tapestry weaving. In Southern France, a rich school of Prov. poetry, that of the troubadours (q.v.), flourished during the 12th c. In the north, the poets who followed them chronologically and adopted many of their forms were known as trouvères (q.v.). The best of these was Rutebeuf, a 13th-c. contemporary of St. Louis. A forerunner of Villon, he spoke directly of himself, his moral and physical sufferings, the falseness of his friends, and his unhappy marriage.

During the 14th c. the forms of the various types of poems became fixed, the most important being the ballade and the rondeau (qq.v.). Guillaume de Machaut, a canon of Rheims, practically founded a school of poetry. Eustache Deschamps, of Champagne, was perhaps the century's most fecund poet; he composed 1,500 ballades in addition to poems in all the other known genres. Alain Chartier is today most famous for his Belle Dame sans Merci. Charles d'Orléans is the first Fr. poet a few of whose poems are well known today, his rondeau, for example, which begins:

Le temps a laissé son manteau
De vent, de froidure et de pluye . . .

The weather has left its mantle
Of wind and cold and rain . . .

Great poetry was first created in France by François Villon from the depths of his affliction, poverty, and suffering. In his two Testaments, Villon illustrates the principle of Christian metaphysics that man exists by some mystery—he is unable not to exist. For Villon, as for most medieval writers, the world is only an illusion, and the one reality is his own nature. Although Villon himself had no order in his life, his poetic imagination shows that he shared his time's passion for order. This order is the two natures of man, with the supremacy of spiritual nature over temporal nature. Villon was formed not only by the genius of his race, but by the faith of his mother, of his protector, and of his age.

Dame du ciel, régente terrienne,
Emperière des infernaux palus,
Recevez-moi, votre humble chrétienne,
Que comprise soye entre vos éleus.

Lady of heaven, queen of earth,
Empress of the infernal swamps,
Receive me, your humble Christian,
That I may have my place among your elect.

At the dawn of Fr. thought, the poet knew, above all, the night of the world: war, famine, poverty. He sees himself in many of his characters, especially in the role of poverty-stricken culprit. "Le pauvre Villon" betrays coquetry and narcissism. He appears neither heroic nor stoical. He is a poor lover, or, more simply, the poor man surrounded by all the legendary heroes. He is not alone, because he understands the greatness of the men who lived before him, who live again in him and in his memory, and who will continue living after his death. It is especially this feeling of union with what is above time that makes Villon a poet. All the themes of the 15th c. are in his work: the Virgin, death, fortune, the martyr-lover, "la Dame sans merci," the harlot, the shepherd, the malice of priests, the vanity of this world, the flight of time. And all of these themes find their purest expression in his art.

Formerly considered the wasteland of Fr. lyric poetry, the period of the grands rhétoriciens, lying roughly between Villon and Clément Marot, is now seen in its true perspective as a time of audacious formal innovations characterized by exuberance of vocabulary, syntax, prosody, and rhetoric. The rhétoriciens, especially the greatest of them, Jean Lemaire de Belges, were gifted humanists who created a pre-Renaissance of sorts and interpreted the events, customs, and ideals of their time in the light of ancient wisdom. Court poets, they were hardly refined, speaking out vehemently against contemporary abuses and endowing modern Fr. poetry with some of its earliest significant satire.

Long narrative epic poems, called chansons de geste (q.v.) and dating from the 11th and 12th c., marked the beginnings of Fr. literature. Most scholars today accept, at least in part, Joseph Bédier's thesis (Les Légendes Épiques) that these poems originated in churches and monasteries where the monks furnished the half-legendary, half-historical narratives glorifying their sanctuaries. The chansons de geste celebrating Charlemagne and the other great feudal lords form cycles of poems of which La Chanson de Roland is the acknowledged masterpiece. A single rear-guard action is sung of as an epic battle. Historical characters are converted into stylized types: Roland the rash young warrior, Charlemagne the emperor and patriarch, Olivier the wise friend and counselor, Turpin the priest-warrior. Christianity, chivalry, and patriotism are exalted. The other two cycles comparable to the chansons de geste deal with Celtic material or antiquity. Le Roman d'Alexandre used a 12-syllable line which became the standard Fr. line (the alexandrine, q.v.). The lais of Marie de France are short narrative poems by the first Fr. poetess, writing at the end of the 12th c.

The most fertile narrative poet of the 12th c. was Chrétien de Troyes. The principal author of courtly romances in Fr., he drew upon the Arthurian legends of the Round Table in his effort to reconcile the earlier warlike ideals of the chansons de geste with the new devotion to woman—whence such characters as Merlin, Lancelot, and Queen Guenivere. Those poets who continued Chrétien's work added poems on the Grail Legend and the story of Tristan, narrated principally by Béroul and Thomas. To the same courtly tradition may be added a charming "chante-fable," Aucassin et Nicolette, half prose and half poetry, alternately recited and sung, and describing the trials inflicted by destiny on two lovers before their final happiness.

The fabliaux (q.v.) were short comic narratives characterized by immorality and coarseness. Their humor and irony had been more fully developed in Le Roman de Renart, a long satirical poem written in several parts, or "branches," and probably by several poets of the 12th and 13th c. A society of animals stands for human society and presents a caricature of feudal aristocracy, clergy, and literary themes. Renart the fox symbolizes human intelligence using trickery and ruse in order to mock authority. The multiple sources of this work are to be found in fables of antiquity and European folklore.

The outstanding Fr. allegorical work of the Middle Ages is Le Roman de la Rose, in two separate parts, the first written by Guillaume de Lorris in the first half of the 13th c. and the second, by Jean de Meung, in the second half of the same century. Guillaume de Lorris' poem is a manual of courtly love. He was familiar with Ovid's Art of Love and the allegories used by the clercs to describe the phases of love. His work is essentially moralistic in its analysis of sentiments and shadings of sentiment. The longer part of the poem, by Jean de Meung, is composed in a far different style and spirit, the fictional element being a mere pretext for digressions on cosmology, life, religion, and morals. Encyclopedic and pedantic, this philosophical treatise is quite emancipated from theology. Nature is the key to man's rights and virtues; it is the principle of beauty, reason, and the good. This second part of Le Roman de la Rose is the genesis of a moral philosophy which was continued in varying degrees in the writings of Rabelais, Montaigne, Molière, and Voltaire.

The first form of dramatic poetry in France was the liturgical drama (dramas liturgiques), closely connected with church ceremonies. Originally acted within the church, the dramas were then performed outside on an improvised stage. Gradually, texts became secularized. Le Jeu de Saint Nicolas, by Jean Bodel, at the end of the 12th c., represents the definitive form of religious theatre: a combination of miracle and farce, with many themes and accessory plots. Miracle plays (miracles), dealing with the intercession of the Virgin, flourished especially in the 14th c. Morality plays, satires (satires), and mystery plays (mystères) flourished in the 15th c. These last, of excessive length and demanding several days for performance, constituted a popular treatment of religious history from the Creation to the time of Saint Louis. The more purely secular comic theatre comprised the pastoral play, such as Le Jeu de Robin et Marion, and a more complex type, half satiric, half comic, Le Jeu de la Feuillée, both by Adam de La Halle (13th c.), as well as farces (15th c.). The masterpiece of the medieval comic theatre dates from the middle of the 15th c., La Farce de Maître Pathelin. In character development and plot, it is a full-fledged comedy, a distant ancestor of Molière's art.

II. Clément Marot (1496-1544) was a Renaissance court poet whose gift for satire was stimulated by his contacts with the law students and lawyers of Paris (La Basoche), with Marguerite de Navarre, the King's sister, who encouraged him, with the It. court of Ferrara (where he was able to give free expression to his religious and satiric themes), and with the court of Francis I. His satirical tone is varied and subtle rather than vehement. Although he continued medieval forms—the farcical, rambling, and sometimes obscene coq-à-l'âne, the rondeaux and ballades—he also practiced with forms that were to be developed especially in the 17th c.: the épître, a long poem written in the form of a letter addressed to someone, and the épigramme, a short, concise poem, usually satiric and with a sting in its tail. Marot was probably the first sonnet writer in Fr.

Marguerite de Navarre (1492-1549) was the first important Fr. woman poet. She was not a profound theologian in her religious poetry, Les Prisons; but she drew abundantly on Plato and the fundamental doctrines of Christian theology. She participated in all the humanistic activities of the Renaissance, in philosophy, politics, and poetry; however, the sentiment which directed her life was her love of God and her quest and need for the Absolute.

Poetry flourished in Lyons, especially during the reign of Francis I. The one subject of the three elegies and the twenty-four sonnets of Louise Labé (1526-66) is love, carnal love. In the 500 lines comprising her poetic output, she expresses vibrantly the causes and symptoms of her suffering without psychological subtleties. She had obviously read Petrarch, but never plagiarized his text. She is far less complicated than Maurice Scève (1511-64), both in form and sentiment. Scève, too, wrote against a background of very conscious literary and philosophical enthusiasms. Platonism and Petrarchism had been the two current fashions in Lyons ever since their introduction by the Florentines in the 15th c. and by Marguerite de Navarre and her court in the early 16th c. Plato's influence is even more apparent in Marguerite's religious poetry than in Scève's Délie. Platonism, as taught in Italy in the 15th c., especially by Marsilio Ficino, had taken on in France the amplitude of a movement of ideas when, in Paris and in Lyons, Ficino became one of Marguerite's favorites. Scève was probably presented to her when she stopped in Lyons between April and July 1536. The title of Scève's work, Délie, is an anagram of the word, "l'idée," but it is also the fictitious name given to the lady whom Scève loved and with whom all the 449 dizains (or poems of 10 lines) are concerned. Since each of the dizains relates one aspect or moment of the same experience, the work possesses an organic composition. Many of the dizains follow the tradition of describing the particular beauties of Délie's countenance and body. But in the far more striking dizains where Scève analyzes the impossibility of being loved as he loves, he describes a progressive self-knowledge and self-torment which give the work its profoundest unity. The end of the long sequence of poems apostrophizes death, not as a union with the beloved, but as a liberation from amorous torment. The absence of any religious philosophy gives Scève's psychology a relentless terror and bareness, which is not at all characteristic of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, but rather annunciatory of the modern period.

The seven poets known as La Pléiade represent the most spectacular triumph of Fr. poetry in the Renaissance. Some of their poetry is of a springlike tenderness and hopefulness, despite their awareness of life's uncertainties and the destruction of sentiment and beauty that the passing of time brings. Their art is a union of mythology and nature—a combination of pedantic constructs and simple, heartfelt popular poetry. Rivers, woods, roses, dew, and nymphs are everywhere in their verses, forming the natural setting for the serious themes of happiness, love, and death. Pierre de Ronsard (1524-85), the greatest poet of the Pléiade, left a long and varied work. His sonnets, Les Amours, have immortalized three women: Cassandre, Marie, Hélène: "Quand vous serez bien vieille, au soir, à la chandelle, / Assise auprès du feu, dévidant et filant, / Direz chantant mes vers, en vous esmerveillant: / Ronsard me célébroit du temps que j'étois belle" (When you are old, in the evening, by candlelight, Seated near the fire, unwinding and spinning, You will say reciting my verses and marvelling at them: Ronsard sang of me when I was beautiful). His Odes and Hymnes made him the most celebrated poet in Europe. Ronsard demanded for the poet the highest position, that of vates, of a glory similar to the hero's. The earlier poets had had a sense of professional honor; Villon had been a conscientious writer, as was Scève, with a sense of higher worldly position. But Ronsard instituted the doctrine of poetic gloire, a gift which the poet can bequeath and sell. In 1549, Joachim du Bellay (1525-60), the second most important member of the Pléiade, drew up the new poets' program and beliefs in the Défense et Illustration de la langue française. Although Du Bellay treated the ancients with almost fanatical respect, his treatise's chief purpose was to prove that the Fr. language was equal in dignity to Gr. and L. He advised a complete break with medieval tradition and the imitation of classical genres: tragedies and comedies, for example, should supplant the mystères and miracles of the "Gothic" period. Du Bellay was to a certain extent responsible, in L'Olive (1549), for the love sonnet which was to have such success in the 16th and 17th c. and, in Les Antiquités de Rome and Les Regrets (1558-59), for the satiric sonnet.

Agrippa d'Aubigné (1550-1630) was a prophet-poet as well as a soldier and memorialist. His Tragiques are as strongly a satiric work as Hugo's Châtiments. They testify to his Calvinist faith and demonstrate a close application of Holy Scripture to the accidents of mortal existence, to the predestined significance of seeming chance happenings. The 7 books composing Les Tragiques describe France in a state of civil war. They denounce the Valois princes, the chambers of justice, and the holocausts of the century and reflect all the latter's styles and beliefs: something of Ronsard's sensitive lyricism; a humanistic understanding of man, to a stronger degree; a biblical and apocalyptic interpretation of the day, to an overwhelming degree.

III. The 20th c. has witnessed the rehabilitation of the baroque poets who, from Ronsard's decline to Boileau's rise, enriched Fr. poetry with themes and forms (largely of It. origin) running counter to the then-shaping classical tradition. Jean de Sponde and Aubigné in the 16th c. and Malherbe himself (in a youthful folly, Les Larmes de Saint-Pierre), Théophile de Viau, Saint-Amant, and Tristan L'Hermite in the 17th were the chief representatives of a movement that turned one current of Fr. poetry into a contest with the indefinable, strangely mingling religious and profane elements, building up tensions, piling up images, and torturing syntax. By the unfinished ("open") character of their poems, their deliberate striving for obscure, bizarre effects, and their stretching of one image over several stanzas or an entire poem, these solitary geniuses differed from the 17th-c. précieux poets, who wrote polished verse filled with discreet allusions, witty epigrams, and short metaphors for a well-defined, aristocratic audience.

The influence of François de Malherbe (1555-1628) dominated poetic matters in the first half of the 17th c. His work as grammarian, poet, and critic helped to define the precepts of a Fr. art which was to be called "classical" and which occupies the central place in the history of Fr. culture. In a celebrated passage of his Art Poétique, Boileau was later to hail the advent of Malherbe's authority in all things poetical: "Enfin Malherbe vint . . ." (At last Malherbe appeared). He was the first craftsman in the history of Fr. poetry who discussed analytically, even pontifically, the rules of his craft. He denounced erudition in poetry and the unrestrained outburst of lyricism. He purified the Fr. language by narrowing its range and making it capable of enunciating truths rather than personal passions. Ronsard and the other Pléiade poets had insisted on loftiness of theme and diction. Malherbe was the first to claim ordinary speech for poetry.

The tendencies toward bombast (emphase) and preciosity which had developed during the 16th and early 17th c., largely because of It. and Sp. models, were opposed by Boileau (1636-1711), whose authority was strong under the reign of Louis XIV. He was a bourgeois of Paris, like Molière and Voltaire, and thus interrupted the central tradition of Fr. literature, which before his day had been largely aristocratic. Boileau, Molière, and Pascal, in their critical attitudes, represented a strong reaction against the spirit and the précieux poetry of the salons and ruelles. Boileau attacked the pedantry of Chapelain and the Fr. imitation of It. models. He was backed by La Fontaine, Racine, and Molière, and eventually won over to his side the public and the King himself. Imitation of nature is the highest rule for Boileau: "Que la nature donc soit notre étude unique." (Let nature be our one study.) But this imitation must be carried on rationally, and only insofar as nature conforms to itself, only insofar as it is universal. Hence, the law of the three unities is applicable in tragedy because it is natural and reasonable. Preciosity, which in poetry emphasized overrefined sentiment and periphrastic ornamental language, should be condemned because it is unnatural to obscure willfully one's thought by language. An artist as well as a bourgeois, Boileau was also a craftsman and a painstaking theorist.

The critic Faguet claimed that a century of Fr. poetry came to a close with Jean de La Fontaine (1621-95). Eclectic in the choice of his masters (he owed allegiance to Villon, Marot, and Voiture, as well as to Boccaccio and Rabelais), he converted his imitations into an art that is very much his own. His care for technical perfection he owes as theory to Malherbe, but the works themselves, Adonis, for example, and Psyché, long narrative poems, and his Contes, are triumphs in poetic grace, melody, and sentiment. La Fontaine recreated the genre of the fable, writing what he himself called "the one hundred act comedy whose stage set is the universe." Scenes, characterizations, dialogues are all struck off with remarkable clarity and concentration. Each fable is a dramatization. The moral value of his teaching has been often questioned, but the poems themselves appear as original creations, thanks to La Fontaine's psychological penetration and his subtle, varied use of free verse. The final lines of Les Deux Pigeons illustrate this art of nuance and sentiment: "Amants, heureux amants, voulez-vous voyager? / Que ce soit aux rives prochaines. / Soyez-vous l'un à l'autre un monde toujours beau, / Toujours divers, toujours nouveau" (Lovers, happy lovers, do you want to travel? Do not go very far. Be for each other a world always beautiful, always different, always new).

Pierre Corneille (1606-84) was the first poet to apply with any lasting success the principle of the three unities to Fr. tragedy. He was a major pioneer in classical art. His poetry is vigorous but tends toward the bombastic. His language seems today somewhat archaic and oratorical, but he did master the alexandrine verse. His poetic style has clarity and precision and a strong sense of rhythm. The poetry of his best tragedies, Le Cid, Horace, Cinna, Polyeucte, is a poetry of action and an intellectual language describing the feelings and dilemmas of the characters.

Jean Racine (1639-99) holds a high place among the religious poets of France. His choruses from Athalie and Esther, as well as his four Cantiques Spirituels, testify to a remarkable lyric perfection. The achievement of Racine as dramatist is due in part to his theory of tragic action and to his penetration as psychologist, but in part also to his poetic gifts, the elegance of his expression, and the magic of his style. Racine's particular triumph is in the fusion of meaning and music, of tragic sentiment and the pure sound of his alexandrine line. The prestige of poetic language is fully present in such totally simple, yet meaningful, lines as

Retournez, retournez à la fille d'Hélène

(Andromaque)

La fille de Minos et de Pasiphaé

(Phèdre)

Que le jour recommence et que le jour finisse, Sans que jamais Titus puisse voir Bérénice.

(Bérénice)

Racine was trained in the school of the précieux; and there are elements of preciousity throughout his tragedies. But on the whole he rejected superfluous ornaments and excluded unusual words from his vocabulary. When the occasion calls for it, Racine can write lines as vibrantly eloquent as Corneille's. Fr. poetry was not to know again such human poignancy and such artistic simplicity and dramatic meaning until the publication of Baudelaire's poetry in the 19th c.

Several of the major comedies of Molière (1622-73) were written in verse: L'Ecole des Femmes, Le Tartuffe, Le Misanthrope, Amphitryon, Les Femmes Savantes, etc. As Racine did in the case of tragedy, Molière, in his treatment of comedy, fused language with situation and poetry with characterization. Molière's language is at all times vigorous, varied, and colorful. He knew the language of the people, the bourgeoisie, and the précieux. In the high comedies, composed in alexandrines, one has the impression of listening to conversation, and at the same time, to something more substantial, thanks to the skillful sentence organization, the lilt of the rhythm, and the resounding rhymes. Molière's style is purely theatrical—the dramatic suitability of the poetic expression was his guiding rule.

IV. The richest periods for lyric poetry in France were, first, the 16th c., when a renaissance of spring abundance had favored the delicate, witty songs of Marot, the sadder, more metaphysical verse of Labé and Scève, and the full maturity of the Pléiade poets; and, secondly, the 19th c., with its three so-called schools of poetry: romantic, Parnassian, and symbolist, which are but three aspects of a single development in modern art and sensitivity and which continued in the major poets of the 20th c.

In the two intervening centuries, lyric poetry had been subdued or lost in other forms of writing. During the 17th c., the lyric genius was always subordinated to the dramatic genius. The drama of Racine's poetry had been prepared by almost 200 years of lyric poetry from Villon at the end of the Hundred Years War to the advent of Louis XIV. The effusiveness and facility of lyric verse, which are its constant dangers, had been chastened and channelled in the tragedies of Andromaque and Phèdre, as, in the 19th c., the expansiveness of romantic verse would be chastised by the strict form of the Parnassians and by the severe experience of the symbol in Mallarmé's poetry. During the 18th c., the poetic genius was taken over by the philosophers, and the exploration of self gave way to the explorations of society and of the universe. In the wake of many versifiers, André Chénier (1762-94) appeared at the end of the 18th c. as its one legitimate poet. Before his execution by the guillotine, he wrote his prison poems, Les Iambes, a work which in satiric force and vituperation takes its place beside d'Aubigné's Tragiques and Victor Hugo's Châtiments.

The form of poetic tragedy perfected by Racine declined rapidly. In the 18th c., it became a conventional, weak genre. Voltaire alone showed some competence in his imitation of Racine. The style of Zaïre, for example, has a classical clarity but is lacking in strong characterization. Voltaire tried all forms of poetry. His epic La Henriade celebrates the religious wars and the advent of Henri IV. His philosophical poems, epistles, and satires were more successful, yet they are lacking in any real sensitivity. His short poems, pièces de circonstance, are perhaps his best in their elegance and wit.

The major poetic work of the 18th c. was, paradoxically, written in prose. Its author, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, was certainly concerned with ideas, but he felt them as a poet might, and he succeeded in transmitting them to the romantic poets of the 19th c. Passages from all Rousseau's writings, but especially his last book, Rêveries d'un Promeneur Solitaire, fixed the characteristics of the romantic temperament and gave the first fevers to a malady which was to deepen during the next hundred years. Jean-Jacques preached that man's oneness with nature was a state to be recaptured. The first stage of the new lyricism was one of "rêverie"; and it was largely narcissistic. With Chateaubriand's René (in poetic prose) at the turn of the century and during the first decade of romantic poetry (1820-30), Rousseauistic rêverie underwent an important modification. Nature continued to be the fountain of Narcissus for the romantic hero, but the traits he saw reflected in it were no longer peaceful. His dissatisfaction, vague nostalgia, tearfulness, and even sorrow had changed the visage of the self-seeking and self-reflected hero.

Lamartine (1790-1869) in his Méditations Poétiques of 1820, expressed this new sensibility in his constant wanderings through all the sites of nature and in his efforts to capture moments of the past when he had experienced happiness. For Lamartine, the resurrection of his memory was that of happiness and even ecstasy; his belief in the future, although indistinct, was formed in hope and optimism. It was only the terrible present for which he felt no genius. The state of disillusionment reached its most bitter expression in the verse of Alfred de Vigny (1797-1863). To the disappointment which Lamartine felt in the flux of time, Vigny added an attack on the infidelity of woman and nature herself and on the religions of the world as beneficent lies. The early romantic disillusionment thus culminated with him in undisguised pessimism. He was an uneven poet, but a forceful thinker. To his innate pessimism, Vigny opposed stoicism and a philosophy founded on work and intellection. Coldness and aloofness characterized his attitude, as well as a nobility of thought akin to that of the ancients. Although Vigny did not believe in the ultimate salvation of mankind, he did believe in the greatness of effort, the majesty of human suffering, and the achievements of philosophers and scientists: "J'aime la majesté des souffrances humaines" (I love the majesty of human suffering). The impertinence and facility of Alfred de Musset's (1810-57) early poems changed after tragic experience with George Sand. The "enfant terrible" of the early romantics became in his Nuits "un enfant du siècle," the type of the suffering poet and the victim of what has been called pélicanisme in accordance with the poet's own interpretation of the pelican symbol in La Nuit de Mai.

The position of Victor Hugo (1802-85) in the development of 19th-c. poetry is extraordinarily important. He played a preponderant part in the gradually increasing violence of the romantic malady by the very vigor of his character and his verse. His first volumes (Odes et Ballades and Les Orientales) were roughly contemporary with the first of Lamartine and Vigny, and his last volumes (La Légende des Siècles and La Fin de Satan) came at the time of Baudelaire and Mallarmé. During this long career, which encompassed the other more significantly brief careers of Nerval, Baudelaire, Lautréamont, Rimbaud, and Mallarmé, Hugo's philosophy or, more explicitly, his cosmology developed into a form of pantheism which is the source of his best poetry. After being a mirror for narcissistic Rousseau, a site for the anguished wanderings of Chateaubriand and Lamartine, and a distant, unconsoling splendor for Vigny, nature was sometimes raised by Victor Hugo to a level of religious significance: "J'étais seul près des flots, par une nuit d'étoiles. / Pas un nuage aux cieux, sur les mers pas de voiles; / Mes yeux plongeaient plus loin que le monde réel" (I was alone near the waves, during a starry night. Not a cloud in the heaven, on the sea no sail. My eyes saw farther than the real world). External nature, of which man is but one element, was for him a multiform manifestation of occult forces and divinity. A peculiar interpretation of the Old Testament and the Kabbala led Hugo to believe that the animation of nature, when it should be realized, would in turn animate man and solve his problems. Some of Hugo's dramas were written in verse: Hernani, Ruy Blas, Les Burgraves, etc. Their value is more in their lyricism than in their dramatic or psychological conceptions. There are many bravura passages, love dialogues, and meditations in which the dramatist is essentially a poet. (At the end of the century, in 1897, Cyrano de Bergerac by Edmond Rostand would represent a return to the early romantic drama. It had in its poetry many of the elements of Hugo's plays: heroism, grace, bombast, wit. The play had a tremendous success at a time when the naturalistic theatre was flourishing.)

Théophile Gautier (1811-72) defined in his poem L'Art some of the principal tenets of the parnassian school which grew up in opposition to the excessive subjectivity of romantic poetry. Art, he claims, finds its justification in its own intrinsic beauty and not in its relevance to morality or philosophy. Art alone has eternity, and especially that kind of art whose form is difficult to achieve. This doctrine of "art for art's sake" was believed in by Hérédia and Leconte de Lisle. Traces of the same convictions are visible in the poems of Baudelaire and Mallarmé.

Hugo's pantheism had represented a moment in the history of man's hope and religious illumination. The prose and poetry of Charles Baudelaire (1821-67) holds out the hope of magic in nature. Baudelaire was the greatest poet of the second half of the 19th c., in the sense that Les Fleurs du Mal (1857) was the richest source of creativeness, being both an achievement in art and a criticism for art. (Similarly, Rimbaud was to be the greatest poet for the first forty years of the 20th c., in the sense that Les Illuminations and Une Saison en Enfer are the two guiding psychological documents for the period and contain rhythms and images which have been preserved in some of the new European and Am. art.) Baudelaire's significance lies not solely in his conception of nature as the source of sensations and the key to the world of the spirit. It lies even more preeminently in his despair over inertia and acedia, in his despair over his lack of despair which prevented him from willing not to sin. Hope in nature, in the whole created universe as the reflection of some half-experienced sense of unity or Divine Love on the one hand, and on the other, the incapacity to feel deeply enough the infractions against the laws of man and God in order to cease perpetrating the infractions, are the two aspects of Baudelaire's art, which he calls the idéal and the spleen. This new definition of man's basic dualism and struggle with the forces of good and evil springs from the sensitivity of the 19th-c. artist. Baudelairean "idéal" was yet another expression of romantic exoticism and Hugo's hope in nature. It was the need to go to the most distant, and therefore the most purifying, parts of the world, to scenes different from the familiar, where the heart of man could be itself unashamedly in all of its fathomless innocence. Likewise, Baudelairean "spleen" was still another expression of romantic introspection and Vigny's pessimism: "Pluviôse, irrité contre la ville entière, / De son urne à grands flots verse un froid ténébreux / Aux pâles habitants du voisin cimetière / Et la mortalité sur les faubourgs brumeux" (November, angry with the whole city, from its urn pours out a dark cold over the pale inhabitants of the nearby cemetery and mortality over the foggy suburbs). Spleen was the poet's incapacity to move out from himself, to disengage his spirit from the center of his dilemma, from the center of his body which had been enslaved. It was the poet's velleity and ennui which, even if they are absences and negations, may grow to uncontrollable proportions. "Idéal" in Baudelaire is often translated by the image of a sea-voyage, by L'Invitation au Voyage; and "spleen" is often translated by the image of a closed room or cell, by a closed brain or a closed body. "Idéal" is the desire to move and to be free. "Spleen" is the horror of being unable to move and of being caught in bondage.

The poems of Arthur Rimbaud (1854-91) are the first representations of his life (Poètes de Sept Ans and Mémoire) and his first visions (Bateau Ivre). His prose work, Une Saison en Enfer, is fairly devoid of visions. It is almost a retraction, an effort to understand his past and his revolt against Christianity. It is his confession of failure. The prose poems, Les Illuminations, are best understood as coming after Une Saison in a new movement of hope and almost mystical belief in himself as poet and visionary. In the earlier works, the poet had learned his language of voyant and something concerning the failure of living as an artist. Les Illuminations have behind them an experience comparable to the mystic's initiation to failure. Rimbaud's example will remain that of the poet opposing his civilization, his historical moment, and yet at the same time revealing its instability and quaking torment. He is both against his age and of it. By refusing to take time to live, he lived a century in a few years, throughout its minute phases, rushing toward the only thing that mattered to him: the absolute, the certainty of truth. He came closest to finding this absolute in his poet's vision. That was "the place and the formula" he talked of and was impatient to find, the spiritual hunt that did not end with the prey seized. Rimbaud's is the drama of modern man, by reason of its particular frenzy and precipitation; but it is also the human drama of all time, the drama of the quest for what has been lost, the unsatisfied temporal existence burning for total satisfaction and total certitude.

As early as Gérard de Nerval (1808-55), who incorporated the speculations of the 18th-c. illuminés, poetry had tried to bé the means of intuitive communication between man and the powers beyond him. Nerval was the first to point out those regions of extreme temptation and extreme peril which have filled the vision of the major poets who have come after him.

Stéphane Mallarmé's (1842-98) lesson is the extraordinary penetration of his gaze at objects in the world and the attentive precision with which he created a world of forms and pure relationships between forms. The object in a Mallarmé poem is endowed with a force of radiation that is latent and explosive. The irises, for example, in Prose pour des Esseintes, have reached a "purity" from which every facile meaning has been eliminated. This purity is their power to provoke the multiple responses of the most exacting readers, those who insist that an image appear in its own beauty, isolated from the rest of the world and independent of all keys and obvious explanations. Mallarmé's celebrated sonnet on the swan caught in the ice of a lake illustrates this power of a metaphor to establish a subtle relationship between two seemingly opposed objects in the world: a swan and a poet. The relationship is not stated in logical, specific terms, but is implied or suggested or evoked by the metaphor.

Le vierge, le vivace et le bel aujourd'hui
Va-t-il nous déchirer avec un coup d'aile ivre
Ce lac dur oublié que hante sous le givre
Le transparent glacier des vols qui n'ont pas fuit!

Will the virginal, strong and handsome today
Tear for us with a drunken flap of his wing
This hard forgotten lake which the transparent glacier
Of flights unflown haunts under the frost!

For the role of magus and prophet for the poet, so histrionically played by Victor Hugo, was thus substituted the role of magician, incarnated not solely by Rimbaud (whose Lettre du Voyant of 1871 seems to be its principal manifesto), but also by Nerval and Baudelaire who preceded him, by his contemporary Mallarmé, and by his leading disciples, the 20th-c. surrealists, 30 years after his death. This concept of the poet as magician dominates most of the poetic transformations and achievements of the last century. The poet, in his subtle relationship with the mystic, rids himself of the traits of the Hugoesque prophet, as well as the vain ivory-tower attitude of a Vigny. Emphasis on the poet as a sorcerer in search of the unknown and the surreal part of his own being has also caused him to give up the poetry of love, especially the facile love poetry of a Musset.

Jules Laforgue (1860-87) has been gradually assuming a place of real importance in the history of symbolism. The first constituted group of symbolist poets were active during 1880-85. The word "decadent" has been associated with them. As opposed to the symbolists, the decadents allowed in their verse the direct transcription of emotion and phenomena. There is nothing in the later Laforgue of the grand style of romantic poetry. He is concerned with depicting the shifts and variations of feelings in scenes of the modern city. The dominant mood Laforgue expresses is one of emotional starvation and emotional inhibition. The parody of his own sensibility becomes, in Laforgue's Moralités Légendaires, the parody of some of the great myths of humanity. He recapitulates the stories of the masters: Shakespeare's Hamlet, Wagner's Lohengrin, Mallarmé's Pan, Flaubert's Salomé, and alters them in order to infuse new meanings. No such thing as a pure hero exists for this poet. He sees the so-called heroes as ordinary creatures and gives them the psychological characteristics of his Pierrots—nervousness, anxiety—and an ephemeral existence.

The first edition of Tristan Corbière's one book, Les Amours Jaunes, appeared in 1873, which was the year of Rimbaud's Une Saison en Enfer and Verlaine's Romances sans Paroles. No attention whatever was paid to these three books at that time. Corbière died two years later, at the age of thirty. Not until 1883, in Verlaine's series of essays on Les Poètes Maudits, was Corbière presented to the Paris public as a poet of importance. This first label of poète maudit (q.v.) has remained associated with his name. He refused to write poetry in accordance with traditional forms. He even refused to be a traditional bohemian. "An ocean bohemian," Laforgue once called him, since most of his life was spent in Brittany, in the towns of Morlaix and Roscoff, and since the themes of his personal suffering are mingled with the dominant theme of the sea. In many ways, Corbière was the spiritual descendent of Villon, especially in his self-disparagement. He looked upon himself as a failure, both as a man and as a poet, and he looked upon his life as a marriage with disaster. There are strong reminiscences of Baudelaire in Les Amours Jaunes and Baudelairean traits in Corbière's impenetrability. There are concelti and antitheses almost in Góngora's style and rhythmic innovations and patterns which Verlaine will develop. Corbière's control of his art is less strong than Baudelaire's or Rimbaud's; his revolt against order and convention is less metaphysical than Rimbaud's.

Mallarmé and Rimbaud are the greatest poets of the symbolist period, although, paradoxically, neither one is purely representative of the symbolist creed. To a far lesser degree, the example of Paul Verlaine (1844-96) counted also in the symbolist period. His was the poetry of the heart and pure sentiment, a tradition maintained, for example, by Francis Jammes (1868-1938), who belongs to the first generation of the 20th-c. poets. Even more isolated from the central evolution of Fr. poetry stands Charles Péguy (1873-1914), celebrated for his deeply religious poetry on Notre-Dame de Chartres and for his Mystère de la Charité de Jeanne d'Arc (1910).

V. Paul Valéry (1871-1945) had listened in his early twenties to Mallarmé's conversations on poetry. In his celebrated definition of symbolism, Valéry states that the new poetry is simply trying to recapture from music what belongs to it. But in the practice of so-called symbolist poetry, he revived, and adhered to, all the classical rules of prosody. If the music of language is to be rediscovered and recreated, a long process of "research" is necessary into the sounds of syllables, the meanings of words, and word phrases and their combinations. The symbol in poetry establishes a relationship between things and ourselves. It is a kind of bond uniting man with the universe. Valéry appropriates some of the oldest symbols (or myths) of the world, e.g. Narcissus and the Fates, which are the titles of two of his greatest poems. Most of the poems in Charmes derive their title from the leading symbol: L'Abeille (bee), Palme, Au Platane (planetree), La Ceinture (sash). Valéry is a singer of knowledge, of subterranean knowledge, where thought may be studied at its birth, in the intermediary stage between the subconscious and the conscious. His poems are metaphysical debates, as in the poems on Narcissus, where a veritable self-inquisition takes place: "Un grand calme m'écoute, où j'écoute l'espoir . . . / Jusque dans les secrets de la fontaine éteinte. / Jusque dans les secrets que je crains de savoir . . ." (A great calm heeds me in which I listen to hope. In the secrets of the extinguished fountain. In the secrets which I fear learning—[Extrait de Charmes de Paul Valéry. © Editions Gallimard 1922]). At the beginning of La Jeune Parque, we learn that some kind of metaphysical catastrophe has taken place; the poem develops the consequences of this catastrophe. Valéry's fame has been built upon fragments: poems, aphorisms, dialogues, brief essays. He is the supreme example of a writer indifferent to his public, detached from any need to please his public. The dialogue which he instituted with himself and with the few great writers he turned to appears with the passage of time increasingly dramatic. Eupalinos as well as Mon Faust are comparable to the form of the Socratic dialogue in which the resources and agility of man's conscience are explored.

Rimbaud's importance, especially the spiritual significance of his work, was first revealed by a poet who has recently died, Paul Claudel (1868-1955). Deep within a work which seems to be composed largely of revolt and blasphemy, Claudel discovered traces of a religious drama which spoke directly to him and to which he owed his return to Catholicism. The reading of Rimbaud and the religious experience he underwent at the age of eighteen changed the world for Claudel. These were revelations whereby he saw the world as the work of God and worthy of the poet's paean of praise. This was the genesis of his great theme of Joy, the one reality for Claudel, the one requirement for the making of an artistic work. By temperament, Claudel belongs to the race of revolutionaries and conquerors, poets like d'Aubigné and Rimbaud; but he is also like Mallarmé in his will to define poetry in its essence. From Mallarmé, Claudel learned especially about the metaphor, which is the essential element in his poetics. A metaphor is a relationship between two subjects; it may even be a relationship between God and the world. The poet's role is to apprehend the metaphors which exist in the world. This means naming each object and restoring it to its rightful place in a new ordering of the universe, in a new lexicon of the world. By naming an object, the poet gives it its meaning, as God had originally done in creating the world—by naming it. The total word, or the total poem, is, therefore, the universe. Each poet bears in himself a picture of the universe, a subjective maze of images which have relationships with one another. Mallarmé had followed an instinctive quest in naming various objects and seeking to understand their metaphorical meaning; Claudel goes farther in willing this quest as if it were a religious obligation. Symbolism, under the guidance of Mallarmé, had been a spiritual way of understanding and celebrating the universe; in the art of Paul Claudel, it became a more frankly religious way of discovering, in the midst of endless variety, a secret unity. In his Art Poétique (1903), Claudel states that the metaphor is the logic of the new poetry, comparable to the syllogism of the older logic. Things in the world are not only objects to be known; they are means by which man is being constantly reborn. Claudel's plays are the most important poetic dramas in 20th-c. Fr. literature. They are concerned with human passion (Partage de Midi) and religious themes (L'Annonce faite à Marie). Despite the difficult style and the highly metaphorical language, these plays reveal in production a grandeur and solemnity not found in the art of any other Fr. playwright.

It was quite appropriate that Guillaume Apollinaire (1880-1918), coming after the highly self-conscious symbolist school, would, in rebellion against such artifice, seek to return to the most primitive sources of lyricism. But by his lesson of freedom, gratuitousness, and individual morality, Apollinaire prolongs the lessons of Rimbaud and Mallarmé; like them, he considers poetic activity as a secret means of knowledge—self-knowledge and world knowledge. The miracle of his poetry is the number of word surprises it contains and the abrupt appearances and disappearances of emotions and images. In his verses the great myths crowd close upon purely personal inventions. He calls upon his immediate knowledge of cities and ports, of unscrupulous voyous and popular songs, but speaks in the tone of a prophet and discoverer. The contrast between Apollinaire's extraordinary erudition, nourished on pornography, magic, popular literature, and encyclopedias, and his total simplicity as a song writer explains the profound irony pervading most of his poetry. Apollinaire's appearance, at the beginning of the 20th c., coincided with many new aesthetic preoccupations to which he brought his own inventiveness and speculative inquiry. His work joined that of the poet Max Jacob and the painters Picasso, Braque, Derain, Matisse in a series of artistic fantasies that have gone far in shaping modern sensibility. A farcical, festive air presided over many of the modes of art of that time, which were given the names of cubism, fauvism, Negro art, cosmopolitanism, or erotology. Apollinaire himself was responsible for the term "surrealism." He literally became a prophet in his support of aesthetic innovations which were to become the accepted forms of the future.

Surrealism, thanks to the examples furnished by Rimbaud and Apollinaire, was to recognize that the real domain of the poet is just outside what is called the world of reason. Apollinaire had taught that the poetic act is the creative act in its fullest purity. Whatever the poet names possesses an ineffable quality; his function is precisely to explain that, to study what refuses to be cast into explicit language. In this way, poetry is able to restore to language something of its primitive origins and mystery. Poetry like Apollinaire's does not try to fathom the supernatural or the miraculous, but simply to state the incomprehensibility of the ordinary and the commonplace. Every human expression Apollinaire saw became sphinxlike for him, and every word he overheard resembled a sibyl's utterance. His language has a baptismal gravity.

Nascent language, it would seem to be, rediscovering its virginity, as the poet, performing his earliest role of demiurge, calls the world to be born again by naming it.

The surrealist poets, Breton, the early Aragon, Eluard, Tzara, and Soupault prolonged the tradition of the 19th-c. voyant. In the wake of Baudelaire, Rimbaud, and Mallarmé, poetry continued to be for them the effort to find a lost language. The image or the metaphor is the result of a certain kind of alchemy. In symbolism, the alchemy had tried to go beyond the elaborate consciousness of symbolism to the very source of poetic imagination, to the sleep in which the myths of man are preserved. Breton (1896-) and Eluard (1895-1952), especially, have discovered (or rediscovered) the pure love of woman and sung of this love as ecstatically and vibrantly as any Ronsard. Their very intoxication with liberty seems to find an outlet in their love of woman, in their joy over their love. The human spirit's secrets were revealed to the surrealists, one after the other, in spontaneous and involuntary fashion. Their concept of woman seems to spring from the deepest part of their subconscious and to rise up to their consciousness with a primitive, almost sacred insistence. The surrealists have contributed to a rehabilitation in literature of the role of woman as the bodily and spiritual partner of man. Love is the immediate. (Eluard has entitled one of his volumes La Vie Immédiate.) The mystery of passion is a dialectic in which man makes an extraordinary request, but one which is clearly articulated in the most serious part of the surrealist program. In asking for the experience of passion, he asks for the resolution, or the dissolving, of the antinomy between the subject and the object, between love and death, between man and woman.

The generation of poets writing in France at the turn of the mid-century is more dramatically allied with action, with the war and the Resistance, than the earlier poets of the century. Sartre defined the new literature as being "engaged" (la littérature engagée), and the term applies to the poetry of this generation so directly concerned with actual circumstances and events. The lesson taught by Mallarmé that there is no such thing as immediate poetry is, however, to such a degree the central legacy of modern poetry that the younger poets pass instinctively from the immediate toward the eternal myths which are just beyond the events, the first reactions, and the first sentiments.

The greatness of Jouve (1887-) brilliantly illustrates this use of the immediate event in poetry. René Char (1906-) is one of the best poets of the south. He was a maquis captain in Provence at the end of the war and has written movingly in his poetry of his war experience. Existentialism, as a literary movement, has not developed any poets, with the possible exception of Francis Ponge, on whose work Sartre himself has written a long essay. Although Ponge was born in 1899, his first important publication was in 1942, Le Parti Pris des Choses, a poetic work of great rigor and objectivity, and one completely lacking in any subjective lyricism.

In private life Saint-John Perse is Alexis St. Léger Léger, born in the Fr. West Indies in 1887 and, until 1940, a Fr. diplomat and Secretary-General of Foreign Affairs. He has taken his place beside the four or five major poets of modern France: Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Rimbaud, Valéry, Claudel. Like them, his work defies any facile nomenclature of romantic or classical. Perse and the other poets whose tradition he continues represent extremes in their role of demiurge and in their traits of passivity to the cosmic forces. They are extraordinary technicians drawing upon all the known resources of their art, upon the most modern beliefs in ancient poetic wisdom, and upon the most ancient tenets still visible in symbolism and surrealism. Saint-John Perse's Vents (first published in 1946), as well as Rimbaud's Illuminations and, to some extent, Baudelaire's Fleurs du Mal, are among those modern works of poetry reflecting the complex degree of sensibility which man reached in the 19th c. and continues to maintain in the 20th. The meaning of the winds which blow over the face of the earth and disturb all perishable things is the subject matter of his poem. The opening words speak of the winds in quest, of oracles and maxims, and of the narrator who seeks for his poem the favor of a god. Poetry, in such a work as Vents, reaffirms its power and its destiny to draw upon all forms of knowledge: psychoanalysis, history, phenomenology, autobiography. It is perhaps the one art of synthesis able to show at moments of intense illumination the once-complete form of our shattered world. The long work Amers (Seamarks) of 1957 is about the sea, about man submitting to the sea and forming with the sea an alliance. During the course of the poem the sea becomes a part of the inner life of the poet. Just as navigators take a steeple or a cliff on the mainland as a seamark (amer) in their navigation, so the reader of Amers learns to take the marine cosmos, which is the personal universe of the poet, as a guide to the understanding of man and his work. Chronique, a magnificent, but shorter, poem to the glory of humanity, is the fitting summation of the poet's evolution and was chiefly responsible for his being awarded the Nobel Prize in 1960.

ANTHOLOGIES: Poètes d'aujourd'hui, ed.

A. van Bever et P. Léautaud (3 v., 1929); Petite Anthologie poétique du surréalisme, ed. G. Hugnet (1934); Introd. à la poésie française, ed. T. Maulnier (1939); Anthol. de la poésie religieuse fr., ed. D. Aury (1943); Anthol. de la poésie fr. moderne, ed. V. Bastos (1945); Anthol. de la poésie fr., ed. A. Gide (1945); Anthol. de la poésie fr. depuis le surréalisme, ed. M. Béalu (1952); An Anthol. of Mod. Fr. Poetry, ed. C. A. Hackett (1952); The Poetry of France, ed. A. M. Boase (1952); Panorama critique de Rimbaud au surréalisme, ed. G.-E. Clancier (1953); Panorama critique des nouveaux poètes fr., ed. J. Rousselot (1953); Poètes du 16^e s., ed. A.-M. Schmidt (1953); Fr. Poetry of the Renaissance, ed. B. Weinberg (1954); Anthol. de la poésie fr., ed. M. Arland (nouv. éd., 1956); Mid-Century Fr. Poets, ed. W. Fowlie (1956); The Oxford Book of Fr. Verse. XIIIth C.-XXth C., chosen by St. John Lucas (2d ed., ed. P. Mansell Jones, 1957); The Harrap Anthol. of Fr. Poetry, ed. J. Chiari (1959); Séquences. Anthologie permanente de poésie française contemporaine, sous la direction littéraire de J. Nielloux, 1 (1959-); Anthol. de la poésie baroque fr., ed. J. Rousset (2 v., 1961); Three Centuries of Fr. Verse, 1511-1819, ed. A. J. Steele (rev. ed., 1961); Penguin Book of Fr. Verse (4 v., 1958-61); An Anthol. of Fr. Poetry from Nerval to Valéry in Eng. Tr., with Fr. Originals, ed. A. Flores (new, rev. ed., 1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: C. A. Sainte-Beuve, Tableau de la poésie fr. au 16^e s. (2d ed., 1838); G. Paris, La Poésie du moyen âge (2 v., 1885-95); F. Brunetière, L'Évolution de la poésie lyrique au 19^e s. (1894); H. Guy, Hist. de la poésie fr. au 16^e s. (v. 1, L'École des rhétoriciens, 1910); Jeanroy, Origines; E. Faguet, Hist. de la poésie fr. de la renaissance au romantisme (1929-30); R. Lalou, Vers une alchimie lyrique (1927); Raymond; A. Beguin, L'Ame romantique et le rêve (1946); R. Lebègue, La Poésie fr. de 1560 à 1630 (2 v., 1951); H. Peyre, Connaissance de Baudelaire (1951); J. Chiari, Contemp. Fr. Poetry (1952); W. Fowlie, Mallarmé (1953); J. Rousset, La Littérature de l'âge baroque en France (1953); R. Winegarten, Fr. Lyric Poetry in the Age of Malherbe (1954); G. Brereton, An Introd. to the Fr. Poets (1956); M. Gilman, The Idea of Poetry in France (1958); A. M. Schmidt, "Littérature de la Renaissance," Hist. des littératures, ed. R. Queneau, III (1958); J. Frappier, Poésic lyrique en France au 17^e et 18^e s. (1960); A. Bosquet, Verbe et vertige (1961). W.F.

FRENCH PROSODY. See ROMANCE PROSODY.

FRENZY. See POETIC MADNESS; INSPIRATION.

FRISIAN POETRY. Fris., the nearest continental relative of Eng., was once the speech of an independent and extensive maritime nation along the North Sea coast, but is today the language of a minority people living partly in the Netherlands and partly in Germany. It exists in three forms: East and North Fris., spoken in Germany; and West Fris., spoken in the Netherlands. Only West Fris., which now has legal status both in the schools and in the public life of Netherlands Friesland, has developed into a full-fledged literary language and Kultursprache.

As in the case of other Germanic peoples, literature among the Frisians began with the songs of bards celebrating the great deeds of kings and heroes. Of those early alliterative epics, none has come down to us. What has come down is a valuable body of Fris. law, and that in a form justly described as "more original and distinctive than that of any other Germanic people." This legal literature, the earliest of which dates from the 11th c., is reminiscent of the lost epics, for it not only employs such literary devices as alliteration and parallelism, but often it is also genuinely poetic in thought and feeling.

When about the year 1500 Friesland came under foreign control, Fris. lost its position as a language of law and public life. The loss of freedom ushered in a period of national passivity, and Fris. literature sank to a deplorably low level. No great poetic figure appeared on the scene until Gysbert Japicx (1603-66), an eminent Renaissance poet, who with his Rymlerije (Poetry), published posthumously in 1668, reestablished Fris. as a literary and cultural language. The book is divided into three parts: love lyrics, dialogues, and poetic versions of the Psalms. Japicx' love verse and dialogues are written with spontaneity and charm; his Psalms, composed later in life, testify to genuine religious emotion, but suffer somewhat from the heaviness of their baroque style.

The 18th c. saw the rise of many followers and imitators of Gysbert Japicx, as for instance Jan Althuysen (1715-63) and Dirk Lenige (1722-98). However, no outstanding poetic figure came to the fore. In the 19th c., Eeltsje Halbertsma dominated the scene. Much of his work is folk poetry inspired by German romanticism. Another outstanding figure at this time was Harmen Sytstra (1817-62), a romanticist inspired by his country's heroic past. In him there is something of a national prophet and seer. His work embodies patriotic, social, and satirical elements; it is characterized by a manly and epic quality, and reveals a desire to restore the old Germanic verse forms. The latter half of the 19th c. produced many folk poets, the most popular of whom were Waling Dykstra (1821-1914) and Tsjibbe Gearts van der Meulen (1824-1906). Their work is, on the whole, uninspired, rationalistic, and didactic. Piter Jelles Troelstra (1860-1930), with themes centering on love, nature, and the fatherland, ushered in a second romantic period.

The 20th c. began to bring a new spirit to Fris. poetry. It was perhaps first evident from the simple and pensive verse of J. B. Schepers, but even more clearly from the work of Simke Kloosterman (1876-1938), whose poetic art is both individualistic and aristocratic. In De wylde Fûgel (The Wild Bird, 1932) she gives intense and passionate utterance to the longings and disillusionments of love. Rixt, the pen name of Hendrika A. van Dorssen (b. 1887) also writes verse characterized by emotional intensity. A first-rate poet at the beginning of the century was Obe Postma (1868-1963). His quiet verse is simple and unrhymed, with no display of craftsmanship. However, it has vigor, penetration, and philosophic insight. Much of it is poetry of reminiscence; still more of it is a paean to life and the good earth. Postma was the first to use free verse in Fris. and to use it well.

The new spirit at the beginning of the century came to full expression in the Young Fris. movement, launched in 1915 and led by the young and daring nationalist Douwe Kalma (1896-1953). The movement ushered in a national resurgence and a literary renaissance. Kalma, himself a talented poet and critic, sharply denounced the mediocrity and provincialism into which Fris. letters had fallen during the 19th c. With him and his movement Friesland began to have an independent voice in European culture. Kalma's genius probably appears at its freshest in his classic Kening Aldgillis (King Aldgillis, 1920), an epic drama in verse. The play was later republished in abridged form in his important Keningen fan Fryslân (Kings of Friesland, 2 v., 1949 and 1951), a series of historical plays, in blank verse, featuring the Fris. kings and depicting the struggle between heathendom and Christianity. Kalma's lyric poetry, collected in Dage (Dawn, 1927) and Sangen (Songs, 1936) displays great technical skill and beauty of form, but its content is often unsubstantial and nebulous. His work—as well as that of his school—suffers somewhat from aestheticism and a poetic jargon leaning heavily on newly coined words and archaisms.

Among the poets of merit who had their start in the Young Fris. school are R. P. Sybesma, an excellent sonneteer; D. H. Kiestra, a poet of the soil with a vigorous talent; and J. H. Brouwer, a more conventional figure. For decades the most popular and widely read poet was Fedde Schurer (b. 1898), a ver-satire artist with preference for national and religious themes. His early poems show the influence of Young Fris. aestheticism; those written after 1946 are more direct, unadorned, and modern. His Simson (Samson, 1945), a biblical drama in verse, gained him the Gysbert Japicx Literature Prize. In 1946 he helped launch De Tsjerne (The Churn), a literary periodical with which most of the important names in contemporary Fris. letters are associated.

Around 1935 some of the younger poets showed signs of breaking away from the Young Fris. movement, both in spirit and in poetic diction. This was true of J. D. de Jong and Ype Poortinga but especially so of Douwe A. Tamminga (b. 1909). The latter in his Brandaris (Lighthouse, 1938) created his own poetic idiom, based largely on the language of the people, which he transfigured and sublimated into pure art.

Since the Second World War, poetry in Friesland has been less in the romantic and classical tradition. Much of it breathes the spirit of postwar disillusionment and cultural pessimism. Garmant N. Visser in his Jolm (Flotsam, 1948) gives expression to loneliness, bitterness, and emotional despair. Anne Wadman in his Op koart Front (On Short Front, 1946) and Fan Tsjen Wâllen (From Ten Shores, 1946) presents poetry that is proud and independent in spirit. Though original and arresting, it is largely negative in tone, revealing youthful contempt for tradition, convention, shallowness, and sham. Sjoerd Spanninga's poetry, rich in imagery and figures of speech, is exotic and almost oriental in spirit. The verse of Martin Sikkema, Freark Dam, and Klaes Dykstra is more traditional in theme, but nonetheless of definite merit. Reimer van Tuinen has proved an impressive writer of expressionistic free verse. Among the younger poets, perhaps two deserve separate mention. They are Jan Wybenga, who in 1953 made his debut with Amoeben (Amoebae), a volume in a very modern, experimentalist vein (though without the usual traces of pessimism); and Tsjits Peanstra, a poetess whose more traditional collection Underweis (On the Way, 1955) shows both dedication and promise. Of the youngest avant-garde, now publishing in the journal Quatrebras, little can as yet be said. In 1961 this group of experimentalists brought out a small anthology, called op fjouwer winen (On Four Winds). Its verse, obscure and esoteric at times, registers a complete break with the past. Of the work represented, perhaps that of Durk van der Ploeg, Jelle de Jong, and Tjitte Piebenga (who has published two meritorious collections of his own) stands the best chance of survival.

ANTHOLOGIES: Bloemlezing uit Oud-, Middel- en Nieuwfriesche Geschriften, ed. F. Buitenrust Hetteema (1887); It Sjongende Fryslân (1917; poetry since the 17th c.); De nije Moarn (1922; an anthol. of Young Fris. verse); De Fryske Skriftekennisse fen 1897-1925 (2 v., 1928-31) and De Fryske Skriftekennisse fen 1876-1897 (1939), all ed. D. Kalma; Fiif en tweintich Fryske Dichters, ed. F. Schurer (1942); Frieslands Dichters, ed. A. Wadman (1949; an excellent anthol. of poetry since 1880, with a valuable introd. and tr. in Dutch); op fjouwer winen, ed. A. R. Oostra et al. (1961; anthol. of young experimentalists).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: C. Borchling, Poesie und Humor im friesischen Recht (1908); T. Siebs, "Gesch. der fries. Lit." in Paul's Grundriss der germanischen Philologie (1909); D. Kalma, Gysbert Japiks (1939); J. Piebenga, Koarte Skiednis fen de Fryske Skriftekennisse (1939, 2d ed., 1957; a valuable hist.); A. Wadman, Kritysk Konfoai (1951; important essays on contemp. poetry); E. H. Harris, Lit. in Friesland (1956; fairly good survey, with tr. in situ, in Eng.).

B.J.F.

FROTTOLA. See BARZELLETTA.

FU. See CHINESE POETRY.

FUGITIVES, THE. A group of Southern poets and critics who met as teachers and students at Vanderbilt University, and published The Fugitive magazine (19 issues, from April 1922, to December 1925). Among the original members of the group were Allen Tate, John Crowe Ransom, and Donald Davidson. They were joined in 1923 by Robert Penn Warren. The Fugitives were Southern Agrarians, who stood for the South, traditionalism, and regionalism, and correspondingly in aesthetics for concreteness and particularity. They opposed the industrial big-city civilization of the North, with its liberal humanitarianism, its doctrine of progress, and its glorification of science. Allen Tate, the movement's most powerful proponent, significantly linked economic and social behavior to aesthetics and poetry. The effect of their repudiation of scientific abstractions and their preferences for concrete particularity can be interestingly traced in the poetics of John Crowe Ransom.—The Fugitive, ed. Walter Clyde Curry, Donald Davidson, Merrill Moore, J. C. Ransom, and others (1922-25); Fugitives, an Anthol. of Verse (1928); I'll Take My Stand, the South and the Agrarian Tradition by Twelve Southerners (1930; Ransom, Tate, et al.); J. M. Bradbury, The Fugitives: A Crit. Account (1958); D. Davidson, "The Thankless Muse and Her Fugitive Poets," SR, 66 (1958); L. S. Cowan, The Fugitive Group: A Lit. Hist. (1959).

R.H.F.

FUROR POETICUS ("poetic madness"). The phrase, which is not classical, is perhaps a translation of the Gr. mania or enthousiasmos, which were both used for poetic inspiration. In Ficino's translation of Plato (1482) the Ion is given the subtitle, De Furore Poetico, and thereafter the term is common in L. and vernacular critical works. See POETIC MADNESS and INSPIRATION. A.R.B.

FURY (L. furia, "rage" or "madness"). See FUROR POETICUS.

FUTURISM. The first futurist manifesto appeared in 1909, in the Figaro, written by the It. F. T. Marinetti who remained, until his death in 1944, the staunchest and, after the twenties, the lone member of the movement he had created. Between 1909 and 1930 the movement launched dozens of manifestoes intended to reform all the arts and most human activities, spreading from Italy to other European countries, like France, Germany, and Russia, where it enjoyed a limited success and often merged with other artistic movements of the time like cubism and dadaism.

As the name proclaims, f. was intended as a violent rebellion against the whole tradition of the 19th c., in all aspects of life, and as an attempt to express, through the arts, the dynamic life of the 20th c. In literature the main targets of f. were the lingering sentimental traces of romanticism together with the complicated psychology of the symbolists. It appealed to the pure instinct, to the elementary passions of violence, strife, and irresponsibility. Hence it encouraged a poetry of speed, movement, color, change, achieved through verbal formulas geometrically conceived and free from any reminiscence of traditional poetry. In style, it encouraged the use of free verse and of free association of words together with the suppression of capital letters, adjectives, adverbs, punctuation, and the conjugated forms of the verb (the infinitive was the only accepted form). The typographical composition of the page was also quite elaborate: not only did futurists use different characters to signify the distinct weight of each word in the sentence, but they also added mathematical signs to indicate the various connections of the parts to the whole.

Although f. was best known in the figurative arts and in architecture, some futurist poets achieved a momentary fame, in Italy, in 1925, when an anthology of their poems, I nuovi poeti futuristi, was published. It contained poems by Marinetti, Carli, Settimelli, Govoni, Buzzi, etc., some of whom had also achieved a certain literary fame outside the movement. For Papini, Soffici, and Prezolini, who had manifested an active interest in the movement at the time of Lacerba and La Voce, f. was only a short-lived experiment. A great number of artists, in all fields, who were not already settled in their ways in the first decade of this century went through the futurist experience and ended by finding their own personal way of expression. Some of the futurist experiments are reflected in the poetry of G. Apollinaire (1880-1918), Gerardo Diego, Antonio Espina, etc. In Russia the best known poet to have experimented in this direction was V. Mayakovsky (1894-1930).

F. proved to be a very profitable stimulus in the elimination of the less vital parts of literary tradition, even though its more ostentatious efforts to break with the past seem quite senseless—as, for example, the long poem by Marinetti entitled Zang-tumb-tuum, or the collection of short poems by Soffici called Biffz+18. If one disregards the products and the extravagant proposals of the various futurist manifestoes and considers instead the movement as a challenge offered to the young artist to revise his values, one cannot fail to understand why f. is more than a literary curiosity. See CUBO-FUTURISM; EGO-FUTURISM.

F. Flora, Dal romanticismo al futurismo (1925); A. Bobbio, Le riviste fiorentine del principio del secolo, 1903-1916 (1936); E. Falqui, Il futurismo e il novecentismo (1953); Piccola antologia di poeti futuristi, ed. V. Scheinwiller (1958); R. T. Clough, F.: The Story of a Modern Art Movement (1961); S. Pacifici, A Guide to Contemp. It. Lit.: From F. to Neo-realism (1962). R.MI.

FYRTIOTALISTERNA ("The Poets of the Forties"). A group of Swedish modernist poets of the 1940's whose work is characterized by ideological pessimism and complexity of form. The movement precipitated by the group—at its height between 1944 and 1947 when its main literary organ, 40-tal (The Forties), came out—was novel chiefly by its breadth. The number of talented new poets was remarkably high. The leaders were Erik Lindegren (b. 1910) and Karl Vennberg (b. 1910); of the disciples one may mention Sven Alfons (b. 1918), Stig Sjödin (b. 1917), and Ragnar Thoursie (b. 1919). Intellectually, the movement was a response to the ideological crisis brought about by the positivist Uppsala philosophy of Axel Hägerström; socially and culturally, it was conditioned by the catastrophe of World War II. These factors are evident particularly in the work of Vennberg, whose collection Halmfackla (Straw Torch, 1944) was diagnosed by Lindegren as a "vanmaktens katharsis" (catharsis of impotence). Vennberg's poetry has been greatly influenced by Franz Kafka; it is existentialist in the sense that it is a means of confirming Angst. Both because of his lack of a passionate sensuality and his analytic-objective method, Vennberg could more easily become the leader of the younger poets than Lindegren, whose work, like that of Stephen Spender, is centered on imaged feeling.

Technically, the poetry of the forties utilizes all the devices of free association, condensed imagery, ambiguity, literary allusion, and abstraction made available by psychoanalysis and the practice of poets like T. S. Eliot, Dylan Thomas, the Fr. surrealists, and preceding Swedish modernists. In many of the f. the semantic dimension of poetry is less significant than the poetic syntax, which is sui generis and cannot be rendered in terms of prose. The internal tensions of image, feeling, and idea create a self-subsistent structure; this structure demands to be experienced by the total personality rather than to be merely understood by the rational mind. From this point of view, the movement of the forties appears a parallel to 19th-c. Phosphorism, which claimed for the imagination an independent function, equal to that of reason. Reaffirming the autonomy of the creative imagination, the achievement of f. can be considered one of the most courageous and intelligent protests against a nonhuman universe and a dehumanized science and society.—40-talslyrik, ed. B. Holmqvist (1951); Svensk 40-talslyrik (1951); O. Sjöstrand, "Fire svenske lyrikere," Vinduet, 9 (1955). S.L.

G

GAI SABER (gaia sciensa). The art of composing love songs. These terms are most often used in connection with the Academy established at Toulouse in the 14th c. to instill a semblance of life into the dying Prov. lyric.—Jeanroy, I.

F.M.C.

GAITA GALLEGA. A 2-hemistich verse having marked ternary movement and a variable number of syllables, usually averaging about 10 or 11. It is primarily a Galician-Portuguese meter used in Sp. popular, rarely learned, verse. It is thought to be related to the muñeira, a song to be accompanied by the bagpipe. P. Henríquez Ureña (Versificación irregular en la poesía castellana, 2d ed., p. 239) says: "It seems hardly necessary to note that this meter, in spite of its relationship with the 15th-c. arte mayor, cannot be confused with it, because, even in the most regular forms, it employs the anapestic decasyllable; moreover, the latter becomes characteristic of the new regular form."

D.C.C.

GALICIAN (OR GALLEGAN) POETRY. Spreading from the pilgrimage center of Santiago de Compostela throughout Galicia and northern Portugal, Gal.-Portuguese cantigas (q.v.) were among the earliest lyric poetry in the Iberian peninsula and imposed their linguistic form as a sort of koiné or common dialect on troubadours from non-Gal. speaking regions of Spain. Most of the secular cantigas are preserved in the Cancioneiro (song book) da Ajuda (mid-14th c.), Cancioneiro da Vaticana (end of 15th c.), and the more extensive Cancioneiro Colocci-Brancuti

(now Cancioneiro da Biblioteca Nacional de Lisboa, 16th c.). King Alfonso X is responsible for the religious Cantigas de Santa Maria (13th c.). Some Galicians from the period of greatest brilliance, 1200-1350, are Martin Codax, Afonso Eanes de Cotón, Bernal de Bonaval, Joan (Garcia) de Guilhade, Joan Airas, Pai Gomes Charinho, Airas Nunes, Pero Garcia, and Pedro Amigo de Sevilla, plus poets from Portugal and other regions of the peninsula. The Gal.-Port. school, though employing the types of the Prov. troubadours, is most distinguished by the supposedly native cantiga de amigo. Possessing a metrical and verbal parallelism, these songs portray the melancholy nostalgia (saudade or soidade) of a simple maiden's lament for her absent lover. Realism in description of lowly occupations, a meeting with the lover, the mother's attitude, and the very language employed lend to this form a poignancy uncommon in Provençal songs.

After the death of Port. King Diniz (1325) the old lyric declines and after 1400 Castilian begins to replace Gal. in Peninsular poetry. The bilingual Cancionero de Baena (1445) still contains a few Gal. poems by Macías "o Namorado" (fl. 1360-90), el Arcediano de Toro (fl. 1379-90), and Alfonso Alvarez de Villasandino (1340?-1428). Perhaps the rhymed chronicle Poema de Alfonso Onceno (Poem of Alfonso XI) was originally Gal., but from this time until the end of the 18th c. little other than oral literature was produced in the vernacular dialects. Diego A. Cernadas de Castro (1698-1777), "el Cura de Fruime," captures the lyrical nature and rustic language of his parishioners in bilingual occasional verse and together with Manuel Freire Castrillón (1751-1820) represents an incipient literary "galeguidade" (Galicianism).

Romanticism inspired greater interest in and consciousness of the past of Galicia, its ancient literature, folklore and sociological characteristics. Antolín Faraldo (1823-53) defended the autonomy of Galicia and with Aurelio Aguirre (1833-58), the "Galician Espronceda," communicated youthful enthusiasm for literary regionalism. Although Nicomedes Pastor Díaz (1811-63) wrote little in Gal., he characterized the gentler, nostalgic romanticism of the "Celtic" northwest. José García Mosquera (1810-68) is remembered for his Horatian A vida do campo (Country Life), and Francisco Afonso y Paz (1812-78), "el Patriarca," for patriotic odes and humorous poems. Alberto Camino (1821-61) with his sentimental, folkloristic and elegiac compositions is an important precursor of the Renacemento (renaissance) which produced the triumvirate, Rosalía de Castro, Pondal, and Curros Enríquez. This renaissance was heralded by the "Juegos Florales" (Floral Games) held in La Coruña in 1861, the winning poems of which were published in the Album de Caridad (1862). In the following year Rosalía de Castro published her Cantares gallegos (Gal. Songs) and in 1880 Follas novas (New Leaves). Like most compatriots, she also wrote in Castilian, but it is in Gal. that her own melancholy life, saudade for home, sympathy for the suffering of her people, sincerity and simplicity have created such genuine "folk" songs as:

Doces galeguiños aires quitadoriños de penas, encantadores das augas,
amantes das arboredas, músicas das verdes canas
do millo das nosas veigas, alegres compañeiríños,
run-run de total-as festas;
leváime nas vosas alas
com' unha folliña seca.

Sweet Galician breezes,
dear banishers of sorrow,
charmers of the waters,
lovers of the groves,
music of the green stalks of maize in our meadows,
gay little companions,
chattering away at every festival, carry me on your wings
like a dry little leaf.

Eduardo Pondal y Abente (1835-1917) in Queixumes dos pinos (Complaints of the Pines) reveals himself as a pagan Celtic bard. The early anticlerical poems of Manuel Curros Enríquez (1851-1908) forced him to emigrate to Cuba where he shared in the morriña ("saudade") of his fellow emigrants. His Aires da miña terra (Airs of My Land, 1880) contains poetic legends, songs, and scenes from folk life. Valentín Lamas Carvajal (1849-1906) sang especially of the life of the peasantry with elegiac overtones in Espiñas, follas e frores (Thorns, Leaves and Flowers, 1875), Saudades gallegas (Longing for Galicia, 1880), and A musa das aldeas (Village Muse, 1890). Other poets active in the second half of the 19th c. are: José Pérez Ballesteros (1833-1918), most important for his 3-volume collection Cancionero popular gallego (1885-86); the humorous Enrique Labarta Pose (1863-1925); Manuel Leiras Pulpeiro (1854-1912) with his folkloristic Cantares gallegos (1911); and Manuel Lugo Freire (1863-1940), author of Soidades (Longing, 1894).

Among contemporary poets there are broader horizons. The language, still with many characteristics of a folk speech, has become a more sophisticated instrument. Troubadour traditions, saudade, and Galicianism are still present, but many foreign poetic movements have contributed new nuances. The foremost poets of the early 20th c. are Antonio Noriega Varela (1869-1947), Ramón Cabanillas Enríquez (1876-1959), Victoriano Taibo García (b. 1885), and Gonzalo López Abente (b. 1878). Noriega is close to the previous generation in his rural, folkloristic themes, but Cabanillas reflects Sp. (-American) modernismo (q.v.) in a varied and abundant production. Taibo with great richness of vocabulary, borrowed from various dialects, is perhaps the best craftsman. The most original poet of the vanguard was Manuel Antonio (Pérez Sánchez, 1900-1928) who collaborated in the iconoclastic manifesto "Mais Alá" (Beyond, 1922) and wrote a small volume of sea poetry De catro a catro or Follas sin data dun diario de bordo (Leaves without Date from a Ship's Diary, 1928). Luis Amado Carballo (1901-27), without abandoning Gal. forms and themes, created a modern sensual pantheistic verse full of original images. Fermín Bouza Brey (b. 1901) has imitated the style of the medieval cancioneiros, and Alvaro Cunqueiro (b. 1911) likewise has much from the troubadours but is very personal. Lack of opportunities for systematic instruction in the Gal. language, for publication, and even for wide critical attention has not prevented the appearance of many active and promising young poets. Even an outsider like García Lorca was so impressed with the language and its possibilities that he published Seis poemas gallegos (Six Gal. Poems, 1935).

ANTHOLOGIES: Cancionero popular gallego, ed. J. Pérez Ballesteros (2 v., 1942; first publ. in 1886); Escolma de poesía galega (v. I, Escola medieval galego-portuguesa, 1952; v. II, A poesía dos séculos XIV a XIX, 1959, both ed.

X. M. Alvarez Blázquez; v. III, O século XIX, 1957; v. IV, Os contemporâneos, 1955, both ed. F. Fernández del Riego. Contain biogr. and critical notes.) See also CANTIGA.

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. Couceiro Freijomil, Diccionario bio-bibliográfico de escritores (3 v., 1951-54; includes Galicians writing in Sp.); F. Fernández del Riego, Historia de la literatura gallega (1951); B. Varela Jacomé, Historia de la lit. gallega (1951); R. González Alegre, Poesía gallega contemporánea (1954); R. Carballo Calero, Sete poetas (1955; approx. same ground covered in Castilian in Aportaciones a la lit. gallega contemporánea, 1955); J. L. Varela, Poesía y restauración cultural de Galicia en el siglo XIX (1958). L.A.S.

GALLIAMB(US). This meter was associated in antiquity with the worship of Cybele, the Magna Mater or great mother-goddess. It derived its name from her priests, the Galli, and was adopted by Callimachus and his contemporaries in the Alexandrian period. In L. its most celebrated occurrence is in the Attis poem of Catullus (no. 63). Technically described as ionic tetrameter catalectic (4 ionic feet with suppression of the final syllable), it had diaeresis regularly after the second foot and was used by Catullus with anacalasis, resolutions (particularly of the penultimate long syllable in the theoretical scheme of pure minor ionics as the components of this meter: ~~~~|~~~~|~~~~|~~~), and contractions. Catullus' poem is full of such variations and verse 54 is unique in beginning with 2 pure minor ionics:

ēt ēar(um) ōmni(a) ādīrēm||fūrībūndā latībūlā

Verse 1 is more typical with anacalasis (q.v.) in its first and resolution (q.v.) in its second half:

šūper āltā vēctūs Ātīs||cēlēri rātē mārīā

J. P. Postgate, Prosodia Latina (1923); Kolář; Koster; Crusius. R.J.G.

GAUCHO POETRY. Taken literally, G. poetry is the name for poetic compositions, anonymous or otherwise, which deal with the life and adventures of the Argentinean cowboy. It would be a mistake to apply the same denomination to all popular poetry produced in Sp. America.

Popular poetry, which had its origin in the Sp. Romancero, flourished at the end of the 18th c. and reached its peak by the middle of the 19th c. In Uruguay and Argentina, learned writers invaded the field of folk poetry and produced a number of compositions imitating the style of early Payadores, or singers of popular poetry. The first of these poets, in chronological order, was the Uruguayan Bartolomé

Hidalgo (1788-1822), whose famous dialogues expressed the sentiments of the G. in regard to the war of independence against Spain. He was followed by the Argentine Hilario Ascasubi (1807-1875), who played an active role in the struggle against the dictatorship of Rosas and who published a number of G. ballads dealing with the siege of Montevideo (Paulino Lucero o los gauchos del Río de la Plata, cantando y combatiendo contra los tiranos de las repúblicas Argentina y Oriental del Uruguay, 1839-1851). Santos Vega, o los mellizos de la Flor (1851, 1872), his greatest achievement in this type of poetry, tells the story of two brothers, one of whom becomes an outlaw. The main value of the poem resides in its accurate and colorful description of country and city life in Argentina at the middle of the 19th c. Estanislao del Campo (1834-1880) followed the example of these writers and employed pure G. dialect in his Fausto (1866), a parody of Gounod's opera.

The greatest of the G. poems is Martín Fierro (1872, 1879) by the Argentine José Hernández (1834-86). A well-educated man and a writer deeply conscious of his social mission, Hernández set out to prove the moral fortitude of the G. and his right to gain a respectable position in the life of his country. Dealing with the problem of civilization and barbarism in the Am. continent he criticized the defenders of "civilization" for their irresponsibility in ruthlessly destroying the traditions of native populations, especially in the case of the nomad Gauchos. He praised the stoicism of the Sp.-Am. peasants, and with true romantic spirit he envisioned the birth of a new way of life from their epic fight in the midst of a wild continent. Encouraged by the success of his poem Hernández wrote a second part (1879) in which he told of Martín Fierro's return from the Indian country where he had sought refuge from persecution by the city authorities. The tone of this continuation is no longer rebellious but moderately didactic. Hernández' poem owes its immense popularity in Sp. America to its virile exaltation of freedom and courage, to its forceful display of nationalism, popular wisdom, and pride in the virtues of people who hold fast to the tradition of their fatherland. The critics of yesterday and today are unanimous in considering Martín Fierro the highest expression of popular poetry in Sp. America.

At the present time G. poetry is going through a period of stagnation. The same may be said about popular poetry in general throughout Sp. America. Scholars and students of the subject are busy organizing and editing the production of past years.

ANTHOLOGIES: The G. Martín Fierro, tr. W. Owen (1935); Poetas gauchescos: Hidalgo, Ascasubi, del Campo, ed. E. Tiscornia (1940); La poesía gauchesca en lengua culta [por] R. Obligado (1943); Poesía gauchesca, ed. J. L. Borges and A. Bioy Casares (2 v., 1955).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: M. W. Nichols, The G.: Cattle Hunter, Cavalryman, Ideal of Romance (1942); A. Torres-Rioseco, The Epic of Latin Am. Lit. (1946); E. Larocque Tinker, G. Lit. of Argentina and Uruguay (1961).

F.A.

GENIUS. See INSPIRATION.

GENRES. The theory of g. in Western poetics originates from a distinction made by Plato between two possible modes of reproducing an object, thing, or person: (1) by description (i.e., by portraying it by means of words) or (2) by mimicry (i.e., by imitating it). Since poetry according to the mimetic theory (see IMITATION; POETRY, THEORIES OF and POETICS, CONCEPTIONS OF) was conceived as such a reproduction of external objects, these two modes became the main divisions of poetry: dramatic poetry or the theatre was direct imitation or mimicry of persons, and narrative poetry or the epic was the portrayal or description of human actions. And as this crude division obviously left out too much, a third division was inserted between the two others (Republic 3.392 d): the so-called mixed mode, in which narrative alternates with dialogue, as is usually the case of epic poetry which is rarely pure, unadulterated narrative. But no new principle of classification was thereby introduced, so no room was left for the genre of self-expression or the lyric, in which the poet expresses directly his own thoughts and feelings. Such a subjective point of view was outside the purely extrinsic and objective scheme used for the nonce by Plato, and taken up later by Aristotle in the Poetics, ch. 3, where it becomes the foundation of his main classification of poetic g. No express recognition of the lyric genre is to be found there, much less in his statement that in the second of these g. the poet "speaks in his own person": that is merely Aristotle's way of saying that the narrative is the poet's own discourse and not a speech by a fictitious character of drama. So the traditional triple division of poetic g. or kinds into the epic, the drama, and the lyric, far from being a "natural" division first discovered by the Gr. genius, is, it appears, not to be found in the creative age that preceded Aristotle or in Aristotle himself. It was rather the result of a long and tedious process of compilation and adjustment, through the repetition with slight variations of certain traditional lists of poetic g., which did not reach the modern formula of the three divisions until the 16th c.

During the great Attic age we do not find a simple, clear-cut division, but a wide variety of terms for specific g.: the epic or recited poetry, the drama or acted poetry, the latter subdivided in tragedy and comedy; then iambic or satirical poetry (so called because written in iambic meter), and elegiac poetry also written in a distinctive meter, the elegiac couplet, with its offshoots, the epitaph and the epigram (all classed together because composed in the same meter). Then there was melic poetry (as it was called later), or poetry sung usually by a chorus to the accompaniment of a flute or of a stringed instrument. Melic poetry comes closest to our concept of the lyric, but still it excluded what we would consider the essentially lyrical genre of the elegy, and the epigram which was to develop into the beautiful lyrics of the later Gr. Anthology. In addition, there was the hymn, the dirge or threnos, and the dithyramb, the latter a composition in honor of the god Dionysus which could be anything from a hymn to a short narrative or a miniature play. Songs of triumph or of celebration, chorally recited, were paeans, encomia, epinikia, and epithalamia. There was certainly plenty of material in Gr. poetry to make up a concept of lyrical poetry, but the Greeks of the Attic age apparently never took that step and contented themselves with classifying these g. by such criteria as metrical form. Aristotle in the Poetics does not even attempt to enumerate all these g., but concentrates on tragedy, comedy, and the epic, with occasional passing references to some others.

After Aristotle, it was Alexandrian scholarship that undertook the first comprehensive stock-taking of Gr. poetry and began the process of grouping, grading, and classifying poems. Lists or "canons" of the best writers in each kind were made, which led to a sharper awareness of g. The first extant grammarian to mention the lyric as a genre was Dionysius Thrax of the 2d c. B.C., in a list which comprises, in all, the following: "Tragedy, Comedy, Elegy, Epos, Lyric, and Threnos," lyric meaning for him and other Greeks "primarily what the name implies—poetry sung to the accompaniment of the lyre" (Smyth). In Alexandrian literature other g. were added to the list, the idyll and the pastoral, not to speak of prose fiction. But the classification which prevailed and which was repeated afterwards for centuries was a mere return to the Platonic modes, found in the grammarian Diomedes of the 4th c. A.D.: the genus activum, enarrativum, and mixtum.

Gradually the exact meaning of the terms was forgotten, and the closing of the theatres in the Middle Ages obliterated all notion of drama and dramatic performance. "In Byzantine writing, drama means the novel; in the West, it means a philosophical dialogue" (Behrens, p. 38). By the time of Dante the notion of the theatre was lost: for him, the Aeneid was a tragedy and his own poem was a comedy. The latter is comic because it is a tale that ends with happiness (in Paradise) and because it is composed in the "middle" style, the other two styles being the "noble" and the "humble": the noble being reserved for "tragedy" or the epic, and the humble for "elegy"—a complete confusion of ancient classifications. Of course, the Middle Ages had g. of their own, but no Aristotle to attempt a classification of them. The It. Renaissance achieved a more exact notion of ancient literature, revived the theatre in its classical form, and rediscovered the Poetics, which had actually been translated in the 13th c. but completely neglected by medieval writers. The fresh resort to the original text of the Poetics early in the 16th c. came as a revelation to critics and produced a host of commentaries and adaptations, and eventually of criticism and rebuttal. The theory of g. was taken as the foundation of the critical system, and elaborate codes of rules were built up, supposedly out of Aristotle, for the epic and the drama. This led to critical controversies about great medieval poems like Dante's which could not be fitted into the classical schemes or the newly fashioned rules, and about Renaissance poems modeled upon the medieval romances, like Ariosto's and Spenser's (see RENAISSANCE POETICS). It was also impossible to ignore the lyric any longer as a major genre, since Petrarch's love poems had set a standard of poetry for the whole age. At first the Aristotelian critics tried to fit the lyric into the mimetic scheme by arguing that the lyrical poet was also an "imitator"—he "imitated himself." This rather clumsy device was rejected by the more rigorous theorists, some of whom inclined to exclude the lyric from poetry altogether, since it could not be made to fit into the scheme. But there was no lack of critics who came to the defense of the lyric, and in 1559 we find it listed by Minturno as one of the three great g. of poetry. But he still described the third genre, which he called "melic," as "imitating actions" and "now narrating and now introducing some other speaker," falling back into the traditional two modes of Plato. The lyric genre really did not come into its own until the romantic movement.

Even in the Renaissance some of the more independent thinkers rejected the classification of poetry by g., and Bruno roundly declared that "there are as many genres of poetry as there are poets." The greatest damage the g. system and its correlative rules was produced by the flourishing of irregular drama, such as the Elizabethan or Sp. theatre, composed outside such rules as those of the three unities, and which finally discredited both the rules and the genre system. Other controversies arose in the 17th and 18th c. about minor g. such as the pastoral and the burlesque or mock-epic. The romantic movement inspired a revolt against (first of all) rigid barriers between g., such as comedy and tragedy. Some romantic critics then favored the mingling or interpenetration of all g. into a single, comprehensive poetic form; others argued in favor of new g., such as the historical novel or historical drama or the Märchen. Others extolled the lyric, defining it as the essence and animating spirit of all poetry (Herder). Finally some envisaged the abolition of all definitions and classifications by genre, as F. Schlegel in his Dialogue on Poetry (1800) and in his essay on Goethe (1828). His brother August William hit upon the idea of fitting the three g., now fixed in the triad of lyric, epic, and drama, into the dialectical trinity of "Thesis, Antithesis and Synthesis: the Epic is objective, the Lyric is subjective, and the Drama is the interpenetration of both" (Lectures of 1801-2).

This neat parallel became very popular, and is still the foundation of many current classifications. It can be imagined to what a riot of dialectic it led in Hegel's Aesthetic, which should have been a warning, but acted instead as an incentive to the metaphysical aestheticians of the 19th c., each with his own system of the arts and of the g. Evolutionary thinking, claiming to be as scientific as Darwin, took over bodily the classification by g., as it did many other traditional ideas, and built up evolutions of g., a process culminating in the work of Brunetière. This led to viewing the masterpieces of literature as the result of something like "natural selection," proceeding by the gradual accretion of plots, devices, and conventions. G. were also found convenient devices for grouping large numbers of works in the histories of literature, and as such are still in current usage. Attempts are continually being made to invest these traditional formulas with some critical substance, and to achieve a final definition, e.g., of the "tragic spirit" or the "essence of comedy." But the field is littered with the ruins of past definitions which have convinced no one save their author, and the advance of modern writing is so vast and multifarious that all classifications crumble in front of it. The most radical rejection of g. in modern times was made by Croce, who considered them mere abstractions, useful in the construction of classifications for practical convenience, but of no value as aesthetic categories.

F. Brunetière, L'Evolution des g. (1892);

Saintsbury, II (1900); H. W. Smyth, Gr. Melic Poets (1900); R. K. Hack, "The Doctrine of Lit. Forms," HSCP, 27 (1916; against the genre theory); B. Croce, Aesthetic, tr. D. Ainslie (2d ed., 1922, pp. 87-93, 436-49), "Per una Poetica moderna," Vossler Festschrift (1922); La Poesia (1936, pp. 177-83, 333-36), Poeti e scrittori del pieno e del tardo rinascimento, II (1945), 109-18; N. H. Pearson, "Lit. Forms and Types; or, a Defense of Polonius," EIE 1940 (1941; for the genre theory); J. J. Donohue, The Theory of Lit. Kinds (2 v., 1943-49); Behrens (best historical account of the development of genre classification in Western lit.); I. Ehrenpreis, The "Types Approach" to Lit. (1945; gives an objective account of discussions pro and con the theory); M. Fubini, Critica e poesia (1956); Fry (reaffirms g.). G.N.G.O.

GEORGIAN POETRY. The people of Georgia had their own independent state from before the Christian era, although they suffered much from the Iranians and later from the Arabs and Turks. At times they were compelled to acknowledge the suzerainty of one or other of their neighbors, but in the early part of the 19th c. they were annexed by the Rus. Empire and despite frequent revolts they were unable to secure their independence until the Rus. Revolution in 1917. The independent Georg. Republic was short lived, for in 1921 it was seized by the Communists, forced into the Soviet Union, and Communist rule was ruthlessly enforced.

The Georgians have had a written literature with their own alphabet since the time of the Illuminatrix of Georgia, St. Nino, about A.D. 325. There are traces of even earlier folk poems, dating from the pagan period, but none of these have been preserved unless their remains are buried in later works. As the earliest literature was dominated by the church, secular poetry was slow in developing, and, when it did, it bore marked traces of Arab and Iranian influence.

The Golden Age of Georg. literature was from the reign of David II (the Builder) through the great Queen Tamar to the Mongol invasion, a period from 1089 to 1234. The most brilliant era was during the reign of Queen Tamar, when the court in Tiflis counted many distinguished poets, among them Chakhukhadze, secretary of Queen Tamar, whom he glorified in a series of odes. The outstanding poet of this period was Shot'ha Rust'haveli (1172-1216). Like the other poets of his day he was attached to the court and is said to have been in love with Tamar. His great poem was The Man in the Panther's Skin (Vep'khkhis Tqaosani), the national saga of Georgia. The theme is the friendship between Tariel and Avt'handil and the success of the two men in winning their beloveds, Nestan-Daredjan, and Thinat'hin. Although the former is called King of India and the latter King of Arabia, they are very obviously Georgians and show all the characteristic features of the traditional Georg. chivalry. The poem consists of 1,576 quatrains of 16 syllables each with tonic accent and 8 trochaic feet divided by a caesura. The style is heavily allusive, and many passages are very difficult to decipher. There is a marked religious tolerance in the poem, far greater than we would expect in a country that was constantly embattled against enemies of an alien faith. Despite Byzantine and Neoplatonic ideas, the poem, with its praise of friendship and womanhood, and its generally cheerful outlook on life, is typical of the Georg. character in all stages of its history.

The following centuries of national decline produced far less important poetical works, but the poetic art revived with King T'heimuraz (1588-1663) and heralded in the so-called Silver Age. Several of the Kings were poets themselves—for example, T'heimuraz and Archil III (1647-1712), who wrote the Archiliani, a verse encyclopedia of Georg. life in more than 12,000 verses. David Guramishvili (1705-86) also composed a verse history of Georgia as well as odes and other lyric poems, many in the Persian style. The reign of King Heraclius II continued the same tendencies with signs of a reaction against the Iranian style and a tendency to return to native Christian models; but other poets continued to follow the Iranian style of verse, as in the work of Bessarion Gabashvili (1749-90).

Throughout the 18th c., Georgia had sought for Christian help to protect it against Turkish and Iranian pressure and had drifted into a sort of dependence upon Russia. In 1800 Tsar Paul ordered the annexation of Georgia to the Russian Empire, and this was carried out by Alexander I, who seized the Georg. throne for himself. His successors continued the policy, and by 1864 all the Georg. dynasties in the different semi-independent provinces had been deposed and the whole of Georgia had been forcibly reorganized on the Russian pattern. This influenced the literature. The poets of the nobility who were accepted in their rank by the Russians speedily modeled their works on Russian poetry, but this was the period when Russian poetry itself was heavily under Fr. influence and so there arose a new Georg. poetry based on Russo-Fr. models and avoiding the old national patterns and themes. The first writer of this group was Alexander Chavchavadze (1786-1864), called the Anacreon of the Caucasus, because of his lyric poems imitating the Anacreontic odes of Derzhavin. The mood soon changed with the romantic movement in Rus. literature, and Nicholas Baratashvili (1815-45) and Gregory Orbeliani (1800-83) reflect the newer school of the lyrics of Pushkin and Lermontov, both of whom were strongly influenced by Byron. George Eristhavi (1811-64) pushed much further this adaptation of Georg. poetry and extended it by translating the poetic dramas of Racine, Schiller, Pushkin, and Mickiewicz. He was the leading author in the popular (not the classical) language of his day. Realism was not long in coming to Georgia and, again following the Rus. pattern, Ilya Chavchavadze (1837-1907) turned away from the romantic school which sang of the Georg. knightly figures and adopted a naturalistic and realistic type of writing which sought its heroes in the common people. His contemporary and friend Akaki Tsereteli (1840-1915) excelled in lyric, dramatic, and epic poetry. In his main work, the epic Thornike Eristavi, he evoked the grandeur of Georgia's past. Another important 19th c. poet Vazha Pshavela (1861-1915) revived the heroic epos of the Georgian mountaineers. His poems depict realistically their lives, customs, and characters.

In the 1880's a newer radical poetry began to develop. The Young Georgia movement was formed, which clustered around Michael Gurgenidze's literary review, Imedi (Hope), founded in 1881 to oppose the Iveria of Ilya Chavchavadze. Here belonged Gregory Volski, Dominika Mdivani, Gregory Abashidze, and others, most of whom had a pessimistic philosophy. In the 1890's Marxist doctrines penetrated Georg. literature, and there was a small but active group of writers trying to express Marxist philosophy.

The Western influence received a new impetus with the arrival of symbolism on the Georg. literary scene. The 1909 issue of the Georg. revue Phaskundji (Griffin) printed The Raven by Edgar Allan Poe. Soon other poems in the same vein followed. But it was not until the appearance of the magazine Tsispheri q'antsebi (Blue Horns, 1916) that the Georg. literary society became aware for the first time of the existence of a whole group of young and dynamic poets who publicly professed themselves admirers and followers of the Fr. symbolists Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Verlaine, and Rimbaud. The most remarkable members of this group were: P. Iashvili, T. Tabidse, K. Nadiradse, V. Gaprindashvili, Sh. Apchaïdse, C. Tsirekidse and, for a short time only, G. Tabidse. The well-known writer, critic, philosopher and poet G. Robakidse became the recognized leader of this boastful but extremely talented group.

In 1917 the Rus. Revolution and soon thereafter the establishment of the free Georg. Republic created favorable conditions for the development of Georg. poetry and literature. But the overthrow of the independent Georgia by Soviet Russia in 1921 changed the fate of the country and its writers. At first most poets persisted in their opposition to the Soviet regime, but when in 1934 the writers of all Soviet republics were compelled to join the Union of Soviet Writers and ordered to make communism the subject matter of literature the poets of Georgia had the choice of either joining the regime or perishing. The great majority joined.

Yet the true voice of poetry has not been stilled in Georgia. Aside from works cast in the mold of socialist realism, historical poems, nature and love poems are still being written. The older and well-known poets such as Grishashvili, Shanshiashvili, G. Tabidse, Leonidse, Chichinadse, P. Iashvili have not lost the mastery of their craft, and the younger generation (Mashashvili, Gomiashevili, K. Kaladse, I. and G. Abashidse, and many others) show remarkable poetic vigor, imagination, and technical skill.

Shot'ha Rust'haveli, The Man in the Panther's Skin, tr. M. S. Wardrop (1912); Visramiani (The Story of the Loves of Vis and Ramin, a Romance of Ancient Persia), tr. from the Georg. version by O. Wardrop (1914); Ch. Beridze, "Georg. Poetry," Asiatic Review (1930-31); R. P. Blake, "Georg. Secular Lit.: Epic, Romance and Lyric (1100-1800)," Harvard Studies and Notes on Phil. and Lit., 15 (1933); J. Karst, Litt. géorgienne chrétienne (1934); A. Shanidze, Dzveli kartuli ena da literatura (9th ed., 1947); D. Djaparidze, "Litt. géorgienne," Hist. des littératures, ed. R. Queneau, II (1956); K. Kekelidze, Kartuli literaturis istoria (new ed., 1961).

C.A.M.; G.N.

GEORGIANISM. A poetic movement of the early 20th c. in England, named by its founders for the reigning monarch (George V) and to suggest "that we are the beginning of another 'Georgian period' which may take rank in due time with several great poetic ages of the past." Thus Edward Marsh prefaced Georgian Poetry, 1911-1912 (1912), the first of five anthologies in which the work of poets associated with that movement was presented. Marsh himself edited these offerings, having been affected by the enthusiasm of Rupert Brooke in 1910 for the then-neglected younger poets. Important members of the Georgian group included Lascelles Abercrombie, Brooke, W. H. Davies, John Drinkwater, James Elroy Flecker, W. W. Gibson, Ralph Hodgson, Harold Munro, J. C. Squire, and W. J. Turner; others were occasionally published in Georgian Poetry but not directly associated with the Georgians, as, for instance, Robert Graves, D. H. Lawrence and James Stephens. Although members of the movement varied widely in talent and in style, "Georgian" poetry—the idiom common to their generation—was typically bucolic in mood, presenting delicate emotion in meters and forms for the most part traditional. Their poetry is often Wordsworthian but lacks the intensity of vision which transmuted Wordsworth's descriptions of nature into great art. Consequently, they are often accused of sentimental pastoralism or "week-end ruralism."

That Marsh intended no revolutionary manifesto may be inferred from the dedications of two of his anthologies to such respected elders as Robert Bridges and Hardy. His success in gaining public favor for the Georgians was so great that, as Frank Swinnerton observes in The Georgian Literary Scene, 1910-1935 (1950), "inclusion in his book gave a writer cachet," and those who were left out attacked Marsh for "trying to establish a canon." When, in the preface to his final anthology, Georgian Poetry, 1920-1922 (1922), Marsh rejoined, "Much admired modern work seems to me, in its lack of inspiration and its disregard of form, like gravy imitating lava," the opponents of Georgianism could regard the movement as conservative. A rival publication devoted to modernism was Wheels, established by Edith Osbert, and Sacheverell Sitwell.

The Georgian maintenance of traditional romantic realism was hardly touched by the upheavals of the First World War and failed to reflect contemporary sensibility. In consequence the influence of this movement rapidly waned in the early 1920's. D.H.

GEORGIC. A didactic poem primarily intended to give directions concerning some skill, art, or science. In his "Essay on the Georgic" (1697), which is the most important discussion of the genre, Addison specifically distinguished this kind of poetry from the pastoral and crystallized the definition of the g. by pointing out that this "class of Poetry . . . consists in giving plain and direct instructions." The central theme of the g. is the glorification of labor and praise of simple country life. Though this didactic intention is primary, the g. is often filled with descriptions of the phenomena of nature and likely to contain digressions concerning myths, lore, philosophical reflections, etc., which are somehow suggested by the subject matter. The g. begins as early as Hesiod's Works and Days (ca. 750 B.C.) and was used by many of the great ancients—Lucretius, Ovid, Oppian, Nemesianus, Columella. Some of the better known poems in the tradition are Tusser's Five Hundreth Points of Good Husbandry (1573), Poliziano's Rusticus (1483), Vida's De Bombyce (1527), Alamanni's La Coltivazione (1546), Rapin's Horti (1665), Jammes's Georgiques chrétiennes (1912). The finest specimens of the type are the Georgics of Virgil. Virgil's purpose is to pay tribute to Augustus for the new security he brought to the empire and to inspire the farmers to take up afresh the industry of the fields long wasted and neglected. Virgil's Georgics cast a long shadow over the poetry of the late 17th and 18th c. Dryden called the Georgics "the best poem of the best poet." James Thomson, because of his Seasons, was known as the "English Virgil," and William Cowper's Task resembles the g. in inspiration and execution. Thomson's far-reaching influence was strongly felt, even on the Continent. Though the term "g." does not appear in the title, scores of poems were written which imitate Virgil's georgics in form and content—poems on the art of hunting, fishing, dancing, laughing, preserving health, raising hops, shearing sheep, etc. Sometimes the serious imitation can hardly be separated from the burlesque, as in Gay's Trivia; or the Art of Walking the Streets of London (1716). Because Virgil was addressing his emperor and was intent on glorifying rural occupations, he raised the style of his Georgics. Attempting to elevate a lowly subject by elegant circumlocutions led many of his 18th-c. imitators to grotesqueries of style which are easy to ridicule.—M. L. Lilly, The G. (1919); D. L. Durling, G. Tradition in Eng. Poetry (1935). J.E.C.

GERMAN POETICS. See MEDIEVAL, RENAISSANCE (BIBLIOG.), BAROQUE, NEOCLASSICAL, MODERN POETICS.

GERMAN POETRY. In speaking of G. poetry it should be borne in mind that it was not until the second half of the 8th c. A.D., with the Christianization of Germany and the scribal activities carried on within the monasteries of the Carolingian Renaissance that G. poetry began to develop its individual character. Although the Old High G. dialects were beginning to break away from the other West Germanic dialects in the latter half of the 6th c., throughout the entire Heroic Age (the time of the Migration of Peoples, ca. A.D. 350-600) and up into the second half of the 8th c., Old High G. poetry still formed part of the oral tradition of pagan Germanic poetry, sharing both thought-content, verse forms, and spiritual attitude with that of other Germanic peoples such as the Anglo-Saxons and Scandinavians. The main poetic genres were the Heldenlied (heroic lay), the pagan religious poem, the Preislied (encomiastic poem) and the Zauberspruch (magic charm). The traditional alliterative verse form of Germanic poetry underwent no revolutionary change in Germany until the introduction of end rhyme and the longer alliterative line (8 main stresses) by the Alsatian monk, Otfrid of Weissenburg, in his Evangelienharmonie (Gospel Harmony) completed A.D. 863-71, a verse form which was also adopted in the Ludwigslied (Lay of Ludwig, A.D. 881-82).

The earliest Germanic verse is mentioned in very general terms by some L. historians, e.g., Tacitus in his Germania (A.D. 98), but no conclusions can be drawn about its nature from their remarks. The extant remains are all relatively late. The Anglo-Saxon Beowulf, composed about A.D. 750 (MS ca. A.D. 1000) probably exhibits the sustained narrative form at its best, but there is some influence of Christianity and perhaps even of classical verse. Some parts of the Elder or Poetic Edda, composed during the 9th, 10th, and 11th c. (MS 13th c.) and the Old High G. Hildebrandslied (Lay of Hildebrand) composed ca. A.D. 770-90 (MS around A.D. 800) represent the heroic lay. The lays are terse almost to the point of obscurity sometimes, but vigorous in portraying action and character. The longer heroic epics, such as Beowulf, although discursive, have a sense of structure and the vigor of the shorter poems. Germanic narrative poetry was written in alliterative verse (Stabreim) whose determining features are: 4 main stresses in each line; at least 2 initial sounds alliterating in syllables which bear the stress and an indefinite number of unstressed syllables. Even in its mutated and imperfect state, the Hildebrandslied affords a sufficiently clear idea of what the earlier heroic lay was like. Crisp and concise in style, the poem begins without preamble and proceeds with a minimum of commentary, developing the dramatic, increasingly tense situation in the dialog of the father and the son, who refuses to realize that he is about to fight to the death with his own father.

The alliterative verse form was employed exclusively in narrative poetry, and indeed it is not until the 12th c. that we have written evidence of lyric verse in G. in the so-called Tegernseerbriefe (Tegernsee letters) written by a young nun to her teacher, a cleric:

I am thine, thou art mine,
Take this as a certain sign.
Imprisoned thou art
Within my heart
And lost forever is the key:
So thou must abide in me.

This charming love lyric is in several respects typical of the G. spirit as it finds expression in lyrical (i.e., personal) poetry. Unforced, natural speech, simple and straightforward thought, and a marked irregularity of form are characteristics of G. folk song—and a considerable portion of G. lyric poetry—down to the present day. Lyrics are also found among the song collections composed by wandering scholars and clergy in the 12th and 13th c. such as the famous Carmina Burana, the main themes of which are wine, woman, and song. These lyrics are sometimes in L., sometimes in G., and sometimes a mixture of both. The love lyrics often contain simple descriptions of nature as a setting.

Within this tradition of the simple love song are the later 12th c. poets of the Danubian region such as the Kürenberger and Dietmar von Aist, although they are not uninfluenced by the lyrics of the troubadours at the courts of Provence. This native type of early G. love song is usually known as a trutliet as opposed to the more courtly love lyric or minneliet.

The latter part of the 12th c. produced in Germany, especially in the Rhineland and the south-west, a sudden flowering of the courtly love lyric (the period known as Minnesangsfrühling, see MINNESINGERS) which cannot be wholly accounted for by Fr. influence, although there is no doubt that Heinrich von Veldeke, Friedrich von Husen, Reinmar von Hagenau, and Heinrich von Morungen, the chief exponents of this art, were strongly influenced by Prov. models in their choice of poetic forms, style, and vocabulary in addition to basic themes. These themes were derived from the literary fiction of minnedienst (love homage) paid by the poet to the noble, and usually married, lady of his choice, to whom he addresses his poems and whose husband is his patron and benefactor. The most versatile and the most prolific of the minnesingers was Walther von der Vogelweide (ca. 1170-ca. 1230), a pupil of Reinmar von Hagenau at the Viennese court. Walther had the courage and power to break through the conventional rules of the day and to sing of love as poets have always sung of it, with simplicity and directness. His most successful poem in this vein has become a classic in Germany. The poem is reminiscent, in its setting, of the pastoral poems of the wandering scholars, although the mood is quite different, for the experience is retold in the more sensitive words of the girl:

Under the spreading
Linden in heather,
Where for our love a bed we found,
You may see us bedding
Fair together
Crushed flowers and grass upon the ground.
By the forest, in a vale,
Tandarady
Sweetly sang the nightingale.

Hand in hand with the development of the courtly love lyric in Germany goes that of the courtly epic of chivalry embodying a highly idealized conception of knighthood, which included the feudal virtues of loyalty, constancy, and generosity in relations between liege-lord and vassal, God and Man, knight and lady, and a number of other virtues, all of which should be in perfect balance and proportion. Some of the qualifications for knighthood were hereditary ones such as noble birth and riches, fair appearance etc., whereas others were to be acquired through knightly training. The precourtly epics of chivalry such as the Rolandslied (ca. 1170, a version of the Fr. Chanson de Roland) are based on the conception of the Christian knight, and the ennobling influence of courtly love is completely absent. This influence, however, is emphasized in the courtly epics such as those of Hartmann von Aue, Erec (ca. 1180-85) and Iwein (ca. 1200)—both of these based on epics by Chrétien de Troyes—Tristan und Isolde (ca. 1210) by Gottfried von Strassburg, and Parzival (ca. 1200-1210) by Wolfram von Eschenbach, who employs the story of Parzival's search for the Holy Grail in order to show the highest possible form of knighthood, which combines the attainment of worldly and spiritual happiness. The subject matter of the courtly epics of chivalry written during the so-called classical period of Middle High G. literature (ca. 1180-1250) is taken from the Celtic tales of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table through the intermediary of Fr. sources, and the verse form is that of the rhymed couplet.

Especially popular at the courts of south-eastern Germany and Austria was the heroic epic, a continuation of the heroic lay, in which the subject matter is derived from Germanic traditions which arose around the figures and events of the Heroic Age and in which the ancient virtues of courage and loyalty to one's blood relations are all-important. Since these epics were composed by anonymous wandering court poets for the delectation of a courtly audience, ancient heroic virtues are combined with Christian courtly ones, familiar to us from the courtly epics of chivalry, and the milieu is courtly-Christian, not heathen-Germanic. Yet the spirit of the Nibelungenlied (Lay of the Nibelungs, ca. 1200-1204) and the ethics of most of its protagonists belong to an earlier age when dark fate ruled over a world of deceit, murder, hatred, revenge, heroic courage, victory, and defeat. Conflicting loyalties produce the tragic and highly dramatic situation where Kriemhild kills her brothers in order to avenge the murder of her husband Siegfried. The heroic epics, unlike the courtly epics of chivalry, were written in 4-line strophes, rhyming aa bb, the so-called Nibelungenstrophe (q.v.).

The term Minnesang included in its widest sense all artistic lyrical poetry of the Middle High G. period, but there also existed at this time a body of poets whose poems were concerned mainly with didactic, religious or political themes, the so-called Spruchdichter. It was out of these uncourtly, speculative, partly pious, poems that that phenomenon developed, the Meistergesang. The Meistersinger (q.v.) are treated in a special article, and we will merely touch upon the most notable of them, the master cobbler Hans Sachs (1494-1576). A native of Nuremberg, he composed more than 6,000 works, using in most of them the Knittelvers (q.v.) which is now commonly traced back to him. A man of real talent and some originality, he achieved more than passing success in two forms: the Schwank, a comic narrative in verse, and the Fastnachtspiel (Shrove-tide play), a farce, written and performed as entertainment for the day or days immediately preceding Lent. In these two types, which resemble each other in both substance and form, Sachs displayed a delightful awareness of the foibles and frailties of the common people. His figure lives today primarily through Richard Wagner's Meistersinger von Nürnberg (1868).

Much of Hans Sachs's energy was devoted to the cause of the Protestant Reformation, inaugurated by Martin Luther (1517), and most of the poetry of the Reformation period and the period immediately following it was of a polemical, usually satirical, nature, either pro or anti-Reformation. One of the most important and effective poets of this period, who wrote in the cause of the Reformation, was the humanist knight Ulrich von Hutten (1488-1523).

Although it is true to say that the lyric on the whole reached a low ebb in the 16th c., in the field of the religious lyric this would not be true. In introducing congregational singing into the church service and through his own fine hymns, Luther gave the religious lyric enormous prestige. And while the 16th c. brought forth no great G. lyricist, it did experience, in common with the preceding 15th c., a rich flowering of the folk song, which had enjoyed a wider transmission since the invention of printing (mid-15th c.).

In 1624, six years after the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, the Silesian Martin Opitz, recognizing the need for a revival of the art of writing poetry in Germany, brought out his manual of poetics Das Buch von der Deutschen Poeterey. G. poetry at this time was inferior to that of other countries such as England and France, and although Germany had some promising poets such as Paul Fleming (1609-40), they were not writing in G. but in L. The principal precepts laid down by Opitz were the return to ancient classical (Gr.) literature as model and inspiration, the insistence on using natural word accent as the foundation for poetic rhythm, and the emulation of the Fr. alexandrine (q.v.) verse in place of the native G. Knittelvers, which had degenerated so far as to forfeit all the good qualities which had once made it so popular and were later to restore it to favor. Opitz' work has often been unfavorably criticized as providing rigid and mechanical rules for composing poetry, culled from foreign models such as Ronsard in France, but actually Opitz took care to stress the fact that he did not believe that a poet could write to order if he followed the instructions carefully, but that he must first find inspiration. Opitz also laid emphasis on the role played by the imagination in the creative process of writing poetry.

In view of the prevailing religious and political conditions during the first part of the baroque era in Germany, which corresponded roughly to the period of the 'Thirty Years' War, it is not surprising that the lyric of that time was pervaded by the following themes: a feeling that life was full of uncertainties and governed by fickle Fortune, an inconsistent and definitely hostile force, an ever-present awareness of the transitory nature of all earthly things and of the imminence of death, a conviction that nothing is as it seems (the interplay of "Sein" and "Schein"), and a preoccupation with the concept of Time.

In the G. lyric of the 17th c. great attention was paid to form and style, and in this sense the G. lyric enjoyed an artistic renaissance. The term "baroque" was borrowed from the field of architecture where the buildings of the new style which began in Spain and Italy as an artistic expression of the Counter-Reformation contrasted strongly with the symmetry of Renaissance architecture. Above all, the poetry of the 17th c. should appeal to the senses, although sensuous effects are somewhat less marked in the more contemplative poets such as Paul Fleming or Simon Dach. The baroque lyric therefore abounds in visual and sound effects, and much use is made of startling contrasts. In order to build up the tension and sense of eternal motion, which one feels in a baroque church, word is piled upon word or phrase upon phrase until the potentialities of the language are strained almost to the breaking point. All the elements of style just mentioned are to be discovered in the lyrics of Hofmann von Hofmannswaldau (1617-79), the supreme exponent of stylistic virtuosity, who wrote with extreme elegance and surprising facility.

Among the outstanding poets of the baroque era were the two admirers of Opitz, Paul Fleming (1609-40) and Simon Dach (1605-59), whose optimism derived from their unshakable religious faith and, in the case of Fleming, the conviction that man can become master of his fate if he first learns to master himself. No one at the time treated the themes of vanity, death, and destruction in more powerful language than Andreas Gryphius (1616-64), the most outstanding poet and one of the few effective dramatists of the period. His Sonnets (1639) and his Odes (1643) show a deeply religious mind of strong imagination. In startling contrast to the heartfelt poetry of these three men were the delightful but playful efforts of the Nuremberg circle led by Georg Philipp Harsdörffer, Johann Klaj, and Sigmund von Birken. Their poems reflected an idyllic world of nymphs and shepherds, with no deep problems and are characterized by the decorative element of their graceful style, reminiscent of the light and airy rococo, a further development of the baroque in the plastic arts. Two of the most gifted and popular poets were the rivals Johann Rist (1607-67) who produced sincere and simple hymns, yet at the same time some of the most ornate pastoral songs, and Philipp von Zesen (1619-89), a talented and versatile lyric poet and an enterprising pioneer in his attempts to improve the status of G. as a literary language, a fit vehicle for poetic thought. We have already mentioned the lyrics of Hofmann von Hofmannswaldau, who exploits every stylistic device of his predecessors, and it only remains to point to the fine body of hymns which were produced during this chaotic period by both Roman Catholics and Protestants. The hymns reflect the same basic preoccupations which supplied the themes for the contemporary secular lyric and often show a high degree of formal and stylistic artistry. Among the Catholics we should certainly mention the Jesuit Friedrich von Spee (1591-1635) and the convert Angelus Silesius (i.e., Johann Scheffler, 1624-77), author of Der cherubinische Wandersmann (1657). Foremost of the Protestants was Paul Gerhardt (1607-76) considered by many to be the greatest of the G. hymn writers. Many of these hymns have survived up to the 20th c., and the poetic quality of the hymns composed in the 17th c. has not been equalled since.

In a more didactic vein were the poems of the Silesian Friedrich von Logau (1604-55), whose Sinngedichte (1654) make him perhaps the greatest epigrammatist of all G. literature. Logau made it his business to criticize the foreign customs and the morals of contemporary society, and in this he was joined by Hans Michael Moscherosch (1601-19) and the preacher Abraham a Sancta Clara (1644-1709).

At the beginning of the 18th c., we find G. poetry at a very low ebb. The Hamburg citizen B. H. Brockes (1680-1747), however, freed poetry from the inflated style of Góngora and Marino and, impressed by Pope's Pastorals and Windsor Forest, published in 1721 the first part of Irdisches Vergnügen in Gott (Earthly Delight in God) which went through seven editions in the next twenty-three years. A much stronger talent, in his virtues as well as in his vices, was Johann Christian Günther (1695-1723). A lyricist of power and imagination, he has been considered by many a forerunner of the young Goethe. The so-called Anacreontic poets, especially Friedrich von Hagedorn (1708-54), gave to poetic language the ease and gracefulness needed after a long preponderance of didactic verse.

Just as Opitz felt called upon to do something (theoretically as well as practically) about the parlous state of G. poetry, and just as the Schlegels were to set forth the theoretical bases of the romantic school before there was, officially speaking, any writing called romantic (whereas elsewhere in Europe it was afterthought which identified the new style of writing as "romantic"), so the new and necessary revival of G. poetry in the 18th c. was consciously planned and announced in advance by a truly dedicated poet, F.G. Klopstock (1724-1803), the first modern G. not only to make his living as a poet, but also to exalt the position of the poet as the religious and national educator and prophet of his people. Klopstock's name and fame are bound up with two poetic fields which are not sharply distinguished in his case: the epic and the lyric. His portentous epic, Der Messias (The Messiah, 1748-73), did three important things for G. poetry: (1) for the first time since the Middle Ages, Germans were held spellbound by a poetic narrative of high seriousness and inspiring character; (2) the sincere religious feeling of the age was brought into active play as by no document other than the Bible; (3) with keen ear and true poetic instinct, Klopstock adapted for his poem the dactylic hexameters of the Homeric poems, thus paving the way for later masterly uses of that verse by Goethe and others. The dactylic hexameter is alive in Germany to this day. (See, for example, Gerhart Hauptmann's Till Eulenspiegel, 1927, and R.A. Schröder's translations of the Odyssey, 1910, and Iliad, 1943.) To us today, Der Messias is nearly unreadable, the presuppositions for its appreciation having disappeared with the age of its creation. It lacks outward action, but samples, especially from the earlier of its 20 cantos, still convey to us the uniquely moving quality of its language. Its eminence as a major literary document remains, and the development of G. poetry is unthinkable without it, just as it is unthinkable without Klopstock's lyrical poetry. It was he who, rejecting rhyme as a superficial decoration, focused attention on the poetic idea and introduced

"free rhythms" into modern G. and, indeed, into European poetry. Klopstock was not a "Lieder" poet. Intellectual tension, an elevated tone, and the intent to praise characterize his "Oden" and "Hymnen," which are written either in Gr. forms (alcaic, asclepiadean, sapphic, or in Klopstock's own variations of these) or in free rhythms which in turn were developed from Pindar's odes and which were later to be refined to supreme mastery by Goethe and Hölderlin. Klopstock also was among the first to sound a distinctly patriotic note, seeking to replace Gr. mythology by imaginative rather than historically accurate versions of Germanic myths. The impression made by Klopstock on his own age was probably greater than that of any other G. poet before or possibly even since his time.

ANTHOLOGIES: Deutsche Barocklyrik (1945) and Dt. Lyrik des Mittelalters (1955), both ed. M. Wehrli; Dt. Liederdichter des 13. Jahrhunderts, ed. C. v. Kraus and H. Kuhn (2 v., 1952-58); Althochdeutsches Lesebuch, ed. W. Braune (13th ed. by K. Helm, 1958); Des Minnesangs Frühling, ed. K. Lachmann (32d ed. by C. v. Kraus, 1959). See also anthol. at end of article.

HISTORY AND CRITICISM. GENERAL: G. Ehrismann, Gesch. der deutschen Literatur bis zum Ausgang des Mittelalters (2d ed., 4 v., 1932-35); A. Heusler, Die altgermanische Dichtung (1943); P. Hankamer, Dt. Gegenreformation und deutsches Barock (2d ed., 1947); J. K. Bostock, A Handbook on Old High G. Lit. (1955); R. Newald, Die dt. Lit. vom Späthumanismus zur Empfindsamkeit, 1570-1750 (2d ed., 1957); H. de Boor and R. Newald, Gesch. der deutschen Lit. (4th ed., 1960-); P. Wapnewski, Die dt. Lit. des Mittelalters (1960); H.J.T. Hettner, Gesch. der deutschen Lit. im 18. Jh. (2 v., repr. 1961); M. O'C. Walshe, Medieval G. Lit.: A Survey (1962).—SPECIAL: A. Heusler, Dt. Versgesch. (3 v., 1925-29); A. Moret, Le Lyrisme baroque en Allemagne (1936) and Les Débuts du lyrisme en Allemagne (1951); M. Ittenbach, Der frühe dt. Minnesang (1939); M. Thorp, The Study of the Nibelungenlied from 1755 to 1937 (1940); see also more recent studies, e.g., by F. Panzer, W. J. Schröder; M. F. Richey, Essays on the medieval G. Love Lyric (1943); H. Schneider, Helden-dichtung, Geistlichendichtung und Ritterdichtung (2d ed., 1943); H. Kuhn, Minnesangs Wende (1952); H. Kolb, Der Begriff der Minne und das Entstehen der höfischen Lyrik (1958); S. Beyschlag, Die Metrik der mittelhochdeutschen Blütezeit in Grundzügen (3d enl. ed., 1959); W. Kayser, Gesch. des deutschen Verses (1960); O. Paul and I. Glier, Dt. Metrik (4th ed., 1961); H. Schneider and W. Mohr, "Höfisches Epos," Reallexikon, 2d ed., 1.

S.C.H.; B.Q.M.

The history of G. poetry, in contrast to that of Eng. or Fr. poetry, shows neither an unbroken continuity nor a sustained level of quality. The fact that the great period of G. epic and lyric poetry in the 12th and early 13th c. was forgotten for more than half a millennium would appear to be a phenomenon restricted to G.-speaking nations. There were, to be sure, impoverished periods in France and England, too, but G. poetry seems to be sharply characterized by solitary literary peaks rising from qualitative lowlands.

Modern G. poetry did not find its voice until the age of Johann Wolfgang Goethe (1749-1832). Yet Goethe seems to have made up for the long delay; he spoke not only for his own time, but for much of the past and the future as well. His poetry, although unmistakably stamped by his own personality, runs the whole course from Anacreontic rococo to the mystic symbolism of old age. It employs all imaginable forms and genres: the song, the hymn, the ode, the rhapsody as well as the sonnet, the elegy, the epic and the philosophical poem. His artistic personality seems, like Proteus, to have changed: the Leipzig songs show 18th c. conventional sentiments and sentimentality, the Strassburg lyrics bring new motifs and a fresh language (e.g., Willkommen und Abschied—Welcome and Departure); to the Weimar period belongs the adagio mood of the two "Night Songs" and the "Moon Song" (Wanderers Nachtlied I & II; An den Mond). Twenty Römische Elegien (Roman Elegies) in distichs and forty-three Venetianische Epigramme (Venetian Epigrams) in the critical vein of Martial are among the fruits of Goethe's Italian journey, 1786-88. A happy fusion of the concreteness of the ancients and the fluid mood of the moderns marks the two elegies Alexis und Dora (1796) and Euphrosyne (1798), the latter perhaps the most perfect threnody in G. poetry. Der Erlkönig (The Erlking), famous above all through Schubert's musical setting, belongs to Goethe's early ballads (1782); the most accomplished ballad form was achieved in 1797 with Die Braut von Korinth and Der Gott und die Bajadere. The first dramatizes by the use of the vampire motif the clash between the pagan and the Christian faiths, "The God and the Bayadere" treats of sin and redemption in striking variations of 8-line trochees and 3-line dactyls. In the same year, 1797, the hexametric epic Hermann und Dorothea was published, "born of nature and carefully nurtured through art," as Goethe's friend Schiller put it. Goethe there transformed the everyday life of solid burghers from the ordinary and limited sphere to a grandiose and moving picture of the world against the sombre background of the Fr. Revolution, a time at which it seemed "as though the form of the world were to dissolve into chaos and night" ("Alles regt sich, als wollte die Welt die gestaltete, rückwärts/ Lösen in Chaos und Nacht sich auf und neu sich gestalten"). The feeling of being exposed to threats from the daemonic forces of life were answered by Goethe in a cycle of seventeen sonnets in 1807-08. The very restriction imposed by this form seemed the natural antidote to the topic of passionate love. As early as 1800 Goethe had announced his belief in an attitude of restraint and renunciation: the sonnet Natur und Kunst (Nature and Art) closes almost triumphantly with the words "Und das Gesetz nur kann uns Freiheit geben" (. . . only law can give us freedom). In 1814-15, Goethe added a new province to his poetic kingdom in West-Oestlicher Divan (West-Easterly Divan). Stimulated by F. von Hammer-Purgstall's translation of Hafis' Divan, Goethe went on a spiritual "hegira" similar to his own flight to Rome in 1786-88, this time to taste the air of the patriarchs in the "pure East." In twelve books of unequal length he ranges over the themes of poetry, love, wine, anger, contemplation, parables, and the ultimate union of the individual with divine love. The tone of these poems comprises the whole scale from the casual and even flippant to the most serious and to the deepest wisdom of old age: West and East intermingle, the waters of Euphrates and of the Main are united, Tamerlane may be Napoleon and Hatem is another name for Goethe himself. Playful irony and veiled wisdom, secret symbolism and sharp consciousness are expressed in frequently brief, easy-flowing, 4-line strophes. There seems to be no slackening of poetic strength until the very end of Goethe's life. At the age of seventy-five, he wrote the so-called Marienbader Elegie, later enlarged to Trilogie der Leidenschaft (Trilogy of Passion). To his eightieth year belongs Vermächtnis (Testament), in many ways the sum of Goethe's insights into the world of nature and of man, of history and moral conduct, and last not least into the "work of love" created by the poet. In Goethe's poetry the G. language became the idiom of world literature. The variety of his metrical forms equals his range of thematic content, especially if we add to the lyrics proper such dramatic pieces as Iphigenie auf Tauris (1787) or Torquato Tasso (1790) which many critics regard as dramatic failures precisely because of their lyrical excellence; or if we take note of the many occasional masques, or of Pandora (1806-8) with its "long-tailed trimeters"; or if we recall the wealth of rhythmic innovations in the second part of Faust. Goethe's own dictum that all his poems were "part of a great confession" has too frequently been used to stress the personal experience behind the poem. The same Goethe, however, said that poetry at its best was quite "external," i.e., pure form. Actually, Goethe would have held that poetry, like nature, had "neither kernel nor shell," but was both at once. G. literature, at any rate, possessed, at Goethe's death, a body of poetry which could nourish many generations, regardless of their "classic" or "romantic" inclinations.

Older and younger contemporaries of Goethe added their distinctive voices. Goethe's youth coincided with the literary movement called Sturm und Drang, q.v. (Storm and Stress) and with the general enthusiasm for "original genius." The hatred of the despotism of absolute princes and the love of freedom were primarily expressed through dramas, but two poets ought to be mentioned who at least chronologically belong to the period of revolutionary ferment. Both use the popular tone in keeping with the prevalent theories of "folk poetry." Gottfried August Bürger (1747-94) is famous for his ballads, especially Lenore (1773), but was also skilled in the sonnet An das Herz (To my Heart, 1792). Christian Friedrich Schubart (1739-91), for ten years imprisoned by the Duke of Württemberg, left unpretentious and lovely lyrics such as Schwäbisches Bauernlied (A Suabian Farmer's Song, 1786) as well as the heart-rending Kaplied (Song of the Cape of Good Hope, 1787) for those of his fellow-men the Duke had sold as soldiers to the East-India Company. Friedrich Schiller (1759-1805) had in his youth also paid tribute to the Storm and Stress motive of "In tyrannos" through tragedies such as Die Räuber (The Robbers, 1781) or Kabale und Liebe (Intrigue and Love, 1784). His classical dramas and his incisive aesthetic writings belong to the years of his close friendship with Goethe (1794-1805). Schiller is a master of the quotable line; his rhetorical power achieves its best effect in the philosophical and didactic genre (Das Ideal und das Leben—Ideal and Life, 1795), in the comprehensive view of human civilization (Der Spaziergang—The Ramble, 1795, in distichs) and in many ballads written in 1797. The antithesis of reality and ideality, the recognition that whatever wants to live on in song must first perish in life are among Schiller's cardinal tenets (cf. Nenie—Dirge). The Suabian Friedrich Hölderlin (1770-1843) followed in his early rhymed hymns to human ideals in the footsteps of his countryman Schiller. He found his own incomparable tone after 1796 in Alcaic and Asclepiadean measures, in the long hexametric elegies and in the free rhythms of Der Rhein, Der Einzige (The Only One), or Patmos. Der Archipelagus (The Aegean Sea, 1800) resurrects in 296 hexameters Ancient Greece and the Olympian gods, in order to give to the Germans, living in the darkness of Hades without an intimation of divine things, their Elis and their Olympia, a common spirit above their barbarous and sterile labors. Renewal and return not only of the gods, the last of whom is Christ, "Hercules' brother," but of all the forces of nature is Hölderlin's theme. The G. image of Greece, as it developed from Lessing through Winckelmann, Goethe and Schiller, achieved in Hölderlin's innate Hellenism its consummation; he understood something of "the language of the gods, change and becoming" ("die Göttersprache, das Wechseln und das Werden"). When insanity silenced him in 1806, his fate was fulfilled as he once had predicted: Apollo struck him as he had struck Achilles, Hölderlin's favorite among all heroes. His own time had neither ears nor eyes for the powerful beauty of the language or the great art of composition, nor did it understand the true prophetic tone or acknowledge the office of poets: "to stand with bared head in God's storms, to seize with their own hands the Father's bolt of lightning and to hand to the people the heavenly gift garbed in song" (Wie wenn am Feiertage—As on the Lord's day, 1800).

The so-called First G. Romantic School was strong in critical theory, but counted only one original creative poet among its members: Friedrich von Hardenberg (1772-1801), better known under his pseudonym of Novalis. His Hymnen an die Nacht (Hymns to Night, 1797) praise death as the true life and night as true being and deepest love. The fifth of the six hymns invents that modern mythology for which Friedrich Schlegel among others had been clamoring: the worlds of the pagan gods, of Christ and of the wisdom of India, fused into a vision of mankind in which the romantic aims of individuality and universality achieve a measure of realization. Some of Novalis' Geistliche Lieder (Spiritual Songs, ca. 1799) have become part of Protestant hymnals, e.g., Wenn alle untreu werden—If all to thee are faithless).

Of the "Younger Romantic School," Clemens Maria Brentano (1778-1842) and his brother-in-law, Achim von Arnim (1781-1831), are best known for their edition of Des Knaben Wunderhorn (The Boy's Magic Horn, 3 v., 1806-8), a collection of G. folk songs and art lyrics from the late Middle Ages to the present, a "German Percy" of considerable influence on subsequent G. lyric poetry. Brentano himself was one of the most musical of G. poets, playing with facile skill on the instrument of language. What A. F. Bernhardt, Ludwig Tieck's brother-in-law, had proclaimed in his Sprachlehre (1803) as "the idea of producing music through vowels" became actuality in the triple and quintuple rhymes of Brentano's Nachklänge Beethovenscher Musik (Echoes of Beethoven's Music). Brentano's most ambitious and abortive effort were twenty Romanzen vom Rosenkranz (Romances of the Rosary) in which he imitated and varied the Sp. versos redondillos; the fourth Romance uses in 113 four-line stanzas throughout an a-o assonance. Brentano's Catholicism cries often from the depth of misery (Frühlingsschrei eines Knechtes aus der Tiefe—Lamentation de profundis of a servant in spring time); the strong faith of Josef von Eichendorff (1788–1857), in contrast, bridges the chasm between his native woods and mountains of Silesia and his true homeland in heaven. Night as the time that binds anew what the day has separated, longing for peace after worldly battles, but also a feeling for the daemonic and uncanny characterize Eichendorff's melodious lyrics.

A catalogue of poets born in the 1780's would contain among other names those of Adalbert von Chamisso (1781–1838) and Ludwig Uhland (1787–1862); although some of their ballads and lyrics became and still are very popular, they cannot rank with the truly great European poets of the 19th c.

Heinrich Heine (1797–1856) continues by many to be considered the foremost representative of G. lyric poetry. Actually, most of the poems in his Buch der Lieder (1827) merely echo the 4-line stanza of the folk song and treat of sweetly sentimental moods. The "unfroked romantic" brought the romantic topic of the identity of Love and Death to the level easily grasped by the rising middle class. By adding exotic touches like lotus flowers dreaming of the moon and by immediate identification in the manner of "Du bist wie eine Blume" (Thou art like a flower), Heine gave his readers in the rising industrial age a golden glimmer of poesy in a life that grew increasingly prosaic and drab. His cycle Die Nordsee (The North Sea) added the poetry of the sea to the familiar woods and dales and domesticated the Olympian gods in the same way in which Daumier's lithographs reduced them to the bourgeois sphere of nightcaps and flannel drawers.

Heine's contemporary, Annette von Droste-Hülshoff (1797–1848), is the most original G. woman poet. The lowliest life in nature—insects and grasses, toads and polecats, titmice and foxes—moves through her poems. This is partly a sign of the new realism, but also of the romantic union with the blood of the earth. Her cyclical treatment of the church year (Das geistliche Jahr) is less an affirmation of her Catholic faith than the anguished probing of a modern soul "who loves God more than it does believe in Him." The poetry of Eduard Mörike (1804–75) is frequently relegated to the "Biedermeier" (q.v.), that peaceful world between 1820 and 1845 of harmless joys and not without a touch of Philistinism. Yet some of his poems equal those of Goethe in intensity. An einem Wintermorgen vor Sonnenaufgang (On a Winter's Morning before Sunrise), An eine Aeolsharfe (To an Aeolian Harp), Gesang zu zweien in der Nacht (Duet at Night) convey the energies of the elements as they press upward into the pure harmony of the airs. Wind and meadow, the darkness of night and the inner light of the soul, the "whirring" music of the stars and the gently passionate lament over a lost friend are woven into the firm texture of 5- or 6-foot iambs, of hexameters, or of intoxicating rhymes. And there is that rare reverence in the face of beauty: "Trägst du der Schönheit Götterstille nicht/So beuge dich! denn hier ist kein Entweichen" (If you cannot bear the godlike stillness of beauty, bow down! For here is no escape).

Heirs to a great tradition of thought and formal mastery have a hard time when aspiring to greatness without being of the highest rank. August Graf von Platen (1796–1835) mastered in his Gaselen (1821–23) the oriental form of the ever recurring identical rhyme, while his Sonette aus Venedig (1825) secured for him the first place among the G. writers of sonnets. Best known is his poem Tristan ("Wer die Schönheit angeschaut mit Augen, / ist dem Tode schon anheim gegeben"—Whoever has looked at beauty is already doomed to die) partly on account of Thomas Mann's appreciative essay on Platen (1930) and the story Tod in Venedig (Death in Venice, 1913). Friedrich Rückert's (1788–1866) prolific output contains some good poems such as Du bist die Ruh (Thou art rest) set to music by Franz Schubert, and many inferior ones such as the Kinder-totenlieder (1834) which furnished the text for Gustav Mahler's composition. There are many other poets whose names are as good as forgotten while their words are still being sung. One of them is Wilhelm Müller (1794–1827) whose Müllerlieder and Winterreise (1818) supplied the words for the most celebrated songs of Schubert. Friedrich Hebbel (1813–63) often allowed reflection to intrude upon the pure presentation of mood and atmosphere; yet some of his poems are unalloyed "symbolism" long before the term had been invented, e.g. "Sie sehn sich nicht wieder . . ." (They will not meet again). The recognized initiator of the symbolist manner in G. poetry is the Swiss Conrad Ferdinand Meyer (1825–98). A Stygian mood is evoked in his many references to the "nightly boat" (Spätboot, Abendboot); a hidden past frequently permeates the living present with regret; the symbol of the mirror, already used by Droste-Hülshoff, expresses self doubt. Meyer filed his poems with the utmost care and the greatest economy of language and published his Gedichte for the first time only at the age of sixty-five. At the same time, the romantic tradition of expressing feeling with immediacy was carried on by Theodor Storm (1817-88) whose lyrics had on Thomas Mann the immediate effect of "contracting his throat and seizing him with the inexorably sweet and sad feeling of life" (cf. Mann's essay on Storm in Leiden und Grösse der Meister—Sufferings and Greatness of the Masters, 1930).

By the last decade of the 19th c., G. poetry had again become provincial. Some literary historians claim that Detlev von Liliencron's (1844-1909) poetry of the "plein air" brought a fresh breeze into the stale atmosphere. However, there seem to be only three lyrical poets whose work transcends the national sphere during the last decade of the 19th c. and in the years before and after the First World War: Stefan George, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Rainer Maria Rilke. George's (1868-1933) congenial translations from Baudelaire, Verlaine, Mallarmé, Swinburne, Rossetti, Verwey and others established the connection with European movements, such as the Fr. symbolists, the Eng. Pre-Raphaelites, or the Dutch De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide). The founding of the Blätter für die Kunst (1892) and his own poetic production engendered a new attitude toward art. George wrote nothing but poetry with the exception of one slender volume of highly stylized prose. His earlier cycles breathe the air of the fin de siècle and its predilection for the choice and the rare, e.g., Algabal (1892). Der Teppich des Lebens (The Tapestry of Life, 1901) brings the return from the friendly West to the simple and strict lines of his native Rhenish lands. Der Siebente Ring (The Seventh Ring, 1907) announces the coming of the new god, while Der Stern des Bundes (The Star of the Covenant), published just before the outbreak of the First World War, established in the manner of the old Spruchdichtung (q.v.) the firmly centered realm of the spirit. George's beginnings appear on the surface to be pure l'art pour l'art; in his later works the prophet and warner speaks with authority words of praise and blame.

The Viennese Hofmannsthal (1874-1929), today best remembered as the librettist for many of Richard Strauss's finest operas (Elektra, 1903-08; Der Rosenkavalier, 1910; Ariadne auf Naxos, 1910-16), wrote poems and lyrical plays of matchless beauty while quite young. The Austrian critic Hermann Bahr characterized his poetry as early as 1892 as an example of modern symbolism. But Hofmannsthal was aware of the dangers of the purely aesthetic life, for instance in his verse play Der Tor und der Tod (The Fool and Death, 1893) or in a series of sophisticated reviews of the works of Walter Pater, D'Annunzio, and Oscar Wilde.

He abandoned the lyric at the end of his twenties for the sake of the drama and thus tried to resolve the conflict between what he called the "aesthetic" and the "social" spheres. The melodiousness of a seemingly effortless mastery of language frequently veils a soft melancholy: the poet "cannot wipe from his eyes the lassitudes of long forgotten nations nor keep from his terrified soul the silent fall of distant stars." Hofmannsthal's office was not revolutionary innovation but rather the living preservation of a European tradition from the Greeks (Idylle, 1893), the Renaissance (Der Tod des Tizian, 1892), the Middle Ages (Jedermann, Everyman, 1911) or the Sp. theatre of Calderón (Das Salzburger Grosse Welttheater, 1922).

Rilke (1875-1926), born in Prague, developed as a poet of truly international stature rather late in his life. His early poetry (Buch der Bilder—Book of Images, 1902; Das Stundenbuch—Book of Hours, 1905) is precious and sentimental, but shows a great facility for internal and end rhymes. Rilke knew of "the old curse of poets" who use language for the description of their hurts instead of "transforming themselves into hard words as the stone-mason of a cathedral obstinately translates himself into the equanimity of the stone." (Requiem für Wolf Graf von Kalkreuth, 1908). He achieved objective distance and strictness with his Neue Gedichte (New Poems, 1907-8) and crowned his oeuvre after almost ten years of "unproductivity" with the ten Duineser Elegien (Duino Elegies, 1912-22) and two books of Die Sonette an Orpheus (Sonnets to Orpheus, 1922). Cardinal problems for Rilke were "destructive time," death, and God. His ripe poetry attempted to overcome all three and to transform them into an indestructible inner world (Weltinnenraum, "a whole inner world as if an angel, comprehending all space, were blind and looking into himself"). This process of metamorphosis meant a violent struggle against the customary distinctions between here and beyond, present and past, creature and creator. Death is for Rilke only the "sore side" of life, the poet does not stand opposite God but looks with the gods in the same direction. There sometime rises from terrible doubt ("Who if I cried would hear me from the orders of angels?") a joyous affirmation of the Here and Now, and Orpheus is Rilke's symbol for the ultimate union of disparate things in song. But there is no certainty for the permanence of victory in the finally established Gestalt, as Rilke clearly indicated in Imaginärer Lebenslauf (An Imaginary Life, 1923); after the speaker's apparent achievement of freedom in "space, ease and coldness" God rushes forth from his ambush.

Concurrently with these three poets the generation born in the mid-1880's into comparative prosperity and peace was to profess a spirit of revolt against their fathers. The movement became later known as expressionism (q.v.). Titles of periodicals founded around 1910 are indicative of the activist tendency: Die Aktion, Der Sturm (The Tempest), Revolution, Die Flut (The Flood). Many of these poets, for instance Franz Werfel (1890-1945), Ernst Stadler (1883-1914), Ludwig Rubiner (1882-1920), were published in Kurt Wolff's series Der jüngste Tag, a title meaning both "Doomsday" and "The Newest Day." Destruction of the old, a last judgment, and the proclamation of the new brotherhood of Man were themes which found expression both in the old form of carefully rhymed stanzas and in ecstatic cries that disregarded the conventional syntax. By the mid-1920's the movement had run its course in G. A lone survivor was Gottfried Benn (1886-1956), a physician whose first collection Morgue (1912) shocked the public by its imagery of putrescence and cancerous flesh. Benn accepted the fact that his poetry was cerebrosplinal and yet begged to be "de-brained" (enthirnt). He was a nihilist singing of the late and lost "I," the rotten soul, the "moi haïssable"; yet in 1931 he wrote the words for Paul Hindemith's oratorio "Das Unaufhörliche" (Eternal Continuity) in which beyond all change and ruin ageless man will become part of creation. All but forgotten during the twelve years of Hitler's thousand-year Reich, Benn achieved fame once more after 1948. He seemed to speak for the young and disillusioned generation in poems such as Verlorenes Ich (Lost I, 1943) which took its title from a passage in Spengler's Decline of the West (1918-22) and neatly expressed the reduction of nature and man to mere "functions," "relations," and "processes." What remains for Benn in the dark void enveloping us is perhaps, cometlike, "A word, a phrase: from cyphers rise / Life recognized, a sudden sense" (Ein Wort—A Word, 1941). The dramatist Bertolt Brecht (1898-1956) never found even such fleeting sense in life. Criticism of bourgeois society and of its liking for the "soulful cheese" of the bourgeois theatre was the principal theme of his lyrics, which are scattered throughout his plays like street songs from Hogarth's time. Brecht is a moralist and rightly claimed that the Bible was the model for his language. His only collection of lyrics is appropriately entitled Hauspostille (Homilies for Home Use, 1927) and divided into "Lessons." Some critics have called it "the devil's prayer book" because they failed to see the compassion of the author for the downtrodden "who have always lived in hell." But not all poets spoke of despair; a "classical" tradition in the Goethean vein was carried on by such respectable writers as Hans Carossa (1878-1956) and Rudolf Alexander Schröder (1878-1962), while the "romantic" tone lived on in the poetry of Ricarda Huch (1864-1948) and Hermann Hesse (1877-1962), to name only a few. Serious poetry in the lighter vein is rare in G. literature. Although Christian Morgenstern (1871-1914) valued his melancholic, mystical poetry more, he became famous through his grotesque, fantastic, and humorous Galgenlieder (Gallows Songs, 1905), to which later were added the collections Palmström (1910), Palma Kunkel (1916) and Der Ginggaanz (1919). Morgenstern's playing with language might best be likened to Edward Lear and Lewis Carroll.

The most interesting phenomenon in recent G. poetry is the changed role which nature plays in poetic imagery. Industrialization and urbanization at first, and afterward the destruction of this very civilization, made an idyllic or pastoral view of nature an impossibility. Lilies and violets yielded to wolf's bane and cow-parsnip, the evil side of nature ranks with the beneficial. This is not Keats's "poetry of earth" nor is it analogous to G. pastoral poets of the 16th, 17th, or 18th c., as some critics have claimed. There is no gentle melancholy, but a sharp awareness of the inextricable fusion of suffering and joy: "the thorn and the flesh belong together." Oskar Loerke (1884-1941) thus called his poetry at one point "a bunch of flowers plucked at the Acheron." His poem Schöpfung (Creation) from the collection Der längste Tag (The Longest Day, 1926) describes in two stanzas the disintegration of nature and man, the merely nominal character of earth and seed rather than the awakening of the germ by the spirit. Loerke's friend Wilhelm Lehmann (1882-) joins the world of nature with that of mythology, the saga, and the fairy tale. While his poetry sometimes runs the danger of a facile mannerism it presents at its best (Der Grüne Gott—The Green God, 1942; Entzückter Staub—Delighted Dust, 1946) such convincing combinations as those of Oberon's golden harness and ripe oats or Daphne's young breasts and quinces. Lehmann's language and rhythm are less harsh than Loerke's so that even the deadly terror of 1944 or 1947 contains some "nourishing magic of song." Elisabeth Langgässer's (1899-1950) cyclical poems, with the exception of her first volume Der Wendekreis des Lammes (Tropic of the Lamb, 1925), condense the experience contained in her long novels. The experience might perhaps best be described as the transformation of nature gods and daemons of the Western Classical heritage into Christian-Paulinian energies and powers. Readers of Tierkreisgedichte (Poems of the Zodiac, 1935) may be reminded of esoteric allegories as practiced in 16th- and 17th-c. art; yet these poems are actually filled with the reality of earth and sky, plant and animal, birth and death; equally real, however, are the names of Virgo and Libra or Persephone and Ceres. Langgässer's method can well be seen in her tripartite poem Daphne an der Sonnenwende (Daphne at the Summer Solstice, 1948) in which the author herself believed that she had successfully "drawn the Christian cosmos into the world of nature of classical antiquity." It would be impossible, even if space were to allow it, to characterize the G. poets born in the 20th c. The impact of the Second World War struck different age groups differently. Those who had consciously experienced the First World War could often speak as warners or comforters. Those born during the second decade of the century reported on their experience, as for instance Hans Egon Holthusen (1913-) in Tabula Rasa (Clean Slate) or Karl Krolow (1915-) in Lied, um sein Vaterland zu vergessen (A song to forget one's country). Many of the youngest generation never returned from the war or remained anonymous. A look at an anthology such as De Profundis (1946) will show that Rilke's poetry exerted the strongest influence in imagery and in linguistic patterns. Critics who describe contemporary poetry and its variety of expression variously as "eclecticism," "surrealism," or "littérature engagée" are probably equally right according to the poems they have in mind. In thematic content we find acknowledgment of guilt, atonement, prayerful requests for the return of a whole world, realization of the loss of all guide posts. The poet exists at constantly shifting border lines, he moves from threshold to threshold and ends in silence. A widely used technical principle is that of montage, the putting together of anything at hand so that the poem becomes "a molecular model built of vowels, a church window made up of nouns, a spider web formed from memories, a prism made up of utopias, a starry configuration made from omissions." An obvious danger of such procedure is the likelihood of empty play instead of the precision of verbal mathematics. It would seem that the work of Ingeborg Bachmann (1926-) and Paul Celan (1920-) has enduring qualities. Bachmann's collection Die gestundete Zeit (Reprieve, 1953) symbolizes in its title the human situation, while Celan's latest book of poems Sprachgitter (Verbal Lattices, 1959) indicates an openness through which anything may enter as well as escape.

ANTHOLOGIES. GERMAN: numerous anthol. by F. Avenarius, R. Borchardt, A. Closs and T. P. Williams, T. Echtermeyer-B. v. Wiese, C. v. Faber du Faur and K. Wolff, H. G. Fiedler, B. v. Heiseler, L. Reiners, W. Vesper. Das Jahrhundert Goethes, ed. St. George and

K. Wolfskehl (2d ed., 1910); Menschheitsdämmerung, ed. K. Pinthus (1920; poetic expressionism); De Profundis, ed. G. Groll (1946; poems of the 12 years of Nazi control); Deutsche Gedichte der Gegenwart, ed. G. Abt (1954); Ergriffenes Dasein: deutsche Lyrik 1900-1950, ed. H. E. Holthusen and F. Kemp (1955); Transit, ed. W. Höllerer (1956); Junge Lyrik 1960, ed. H. Bender (1960); A Book of Modern G. Lyric Verse, 1890-1955, ed. W. Rose (1960). ENGLISH: consult B. Q. Morgan, A Crit. Bibliog. of G. Lit. in Eng. Tr., 1481-1935 (2d enl. ed., 1938) nos. C 109, C 44, C 373, C 41, C 17, C 244, C 372, C 311, C 28, C 531, C 423, C 95, C 129, and the unnumbered suppl. 20th-C. G. Verse, tr. H. Salinger (1952); An Anthol. of G. Poetry from Hölderlin to Rilke, ed. A. Flores (1960); The G. Lyric of the Baroque, tr. G. C. Schoofield (1961); Modern G. Poetry, 1910-1960: An Anthol. with Verse Tr., ed. M. Hamburger and C. Middleton (1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM. GENERAL: J. Lees, The G. Lyric (1914); P. Witkop, Die deutschen Lyriker von Luther bis Nietzsche (2 v., 3d ed., 1925); E. Ermatinger, Die deutsche Lyrik seit Herder (2d ed., 1925); N. MacLeod, G. Lyric Poetry (1936); J. Klein, Gesch. der deutschen Lyrik (1957); A. Closs, The Genius of the G. Lyric (2d ed., 1962).—PROSODY: A. Heusler, Deutsche Versgeschichte (3 v., 1925-29); W. Kayser, Gesch. des deutschen Verses (1960). GENRES: K. Viëtor, Gesch. der deutschen Ode (1923); G. Müller, Gesch. des deutschen Liedes (1925); W. Kayser, Gesch. der deutschen Ballade (1936); P. Böckmann, Formgesch. der deutschen Dichtung (only v. I, from the Middle Ages to Storm and Stress, 1949); W. Mönch, Das Sonett (1955); F. Beissner, Gesch. der deutschen Elegie (2d ed., 1961).—INTERPRETATIONS: S. S. Praver, G. Lyric Poetry (1952); Wege zum Gedicht, ed. R. Hirschenauer and A. Weber (1956); Die deutsche Lyrik, Form und Geschichte, ed. B. v. Wiese (2 v., 1957); W. Killy, Wandlungen des lyrischen Bildes (2d ed., 1958); C. Heselhaus, Deutsche Lyrik der Moderne, von Nietzsche bis Yvan Goll (1961, includes crit. interpretation). H.S.S.

GERMAN PROSODY. The Germanic type of verse (see OLD GERMANIC PROSODY) was succeeded by meters which used end rhyme, imitated from Church Latin but which still retained the basic 4-stress, 2 full beat form. The number of unstressed syllables was at first indeterminate, but during the 12th c. the line for all narrative verse gradually approached a standard pattern, although complete standardization was never attained. The lines had either 4 main stresses, the last of which fell on the last syllable of the line (voll) or 3 main stresses with a secondary stress on the last syllable (klingend). According to Heusler's theory—still widely accepted, but attacked by Kayser, Glier, and others—there are always 2 full beats of musical time, even though a quarter or even half beat may be represented by a pause. The Nibelungenstrophe (q.v.) thus would be basically a 2-beat, 4-stress form, but it combines 2 such lines into a long line and the last stress in each such long line is actually represented by a syllable only at the end of the strophe. Elsewhere it is represented by a pause. Earlier critics and some modern prosodists think that we may be certain only that the lines in the romances had 3 or 4 beats and that in the Nibelungenlied all half lines except the last had 3. Lyric verse forms were probably borrowed directly from the Romance languages and are closely bound up with music. By the end of the 12th c., in imitation of Romance songs with syllable-counting lines, regular alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables as well as regular dactylic rhythms (the so-called MHG dactyls) became accepted patterns. The length of the lines could vary according to the music, but the best poets observe meshing of the lines within each strophe to produce a specific number of beats of musical time for the strophe as a whole. The Meistersong observed only the number of syllables and ignored coincidence of word accent with verse stress. W.T.H.J.

In the 16th c. the dominant form in narrative and drama was the Knittelvers (q.v.), which derived from the rhymed couplet of medieval narrative and which, like the lyric Meistersong, in its so-called strict form noted only the number of syllables and took no account of the coincidence of word accent with metrical stress (a "free" form of the Knittelvers, followed by some poets, allowed for an unlimited number of unstressed syllables). The reform in versification effected by Martin Opitz in the early 17th c. restored natural accentuation to G. verse and established a strict alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables. For more than a century after Opitz the dominant line in serious verse was the rhymed Alexandrin, a 12-syllable iambic line modeled superficially after the Fr. alexandrine (q.v.), but quite different in effect because of the strongly accentual quality of the G. language.

Certain metrical conventions which have persisted in G. verse for the last two centuries were initiated in the mid-18th c. by F. G. Klopstock, who succeeded in adapting several Gr. and Roman meters to G. and in developing the so-called free rhythms. Searching for a suitable metrical form into which to cast his epic Der Messias, Klopstock hit upon the idea, then regarded as revolutionary, of utilizing the unrhymed classical dactylic hexameter.

For his odes he adapted the stanzaic forms of Sappho, Alcaeus, and Asclepiades. In each instance this adaptation took place through the substitution of stressed and unstressed syllables for the classical long and short syllables. Klopstock's free rhythms, employed in odes such as Die Frühlingsfeier, are essentially what we today mean by free verse; like his classical odes, they dispense with rhyme, yet they do not attempt to follow a consistent metrical or stanzaic scheme. Many major works in G. poetry derive ultimately from Klopstock's metrical forms, e.g., the classical meters of Goethe's Römische Elegien and Hermann und Dorothea and Hölderlin's odes and elegies; the free rhythms of Goethe's Prometheus, Hölderlin's late hymns, Heine's Nordsee and Rilke's Duineser Elegien.

The example of Lessing's Nathan der Weise (1779) established unrhymed iambic pentameter, modeled after Eng. blank verse, as the prevailing line of G. verse drama, but certain notable exceptions can be singled out, above all, Goethe's Faust, which revives the "free" form of Knittelvers and also employs most of the other metrical forms to be found in G. poetry. As a result of Herder's efforts to arouse interest in the national past around 1770, and through the influence, much later, of Arnim and Brentano's collection of folk songs, Des Knaben Wunderhorn (1806-8), G. poets came increasingly to imitate the tone, language, and metrical forms (especially quatrains with 3- and 4-stress lines) of G. folk poetry. Besides this folk strain, which characterizes many of Goethe's early lyrics, as well as the major work of such later poets as Brentano, Eichendorff and Heine, G. poetry during the age of Goethe assimilated an amazing number of foreign forms, among them the It. ottava rima and terza rima, Sp. assonantal forms, and the Persian ghazel (though certain importations, e.g., the It. madrigal and sonnet, were revivals of forms prevalent in the 17th c.). During the remainder of the 19th c., G. poets built upon and refined the metrical forms and traditions which they had inherited, but during the naturalist and expressionist periods and again since 1945, G. verse has displayed intense experimentation in free verse (e.g., A. Holz, E. Stadler, B. Brecht), influenced by foreign free-verse movements as well as by native traditions.

During the last two centuries—the period in which G. has achieved the stature of a major world literature—G. verse has probably been characterized by a greater degree of metrical theorizing and conscious metrical experimentation, plus a more systematic adaptation of foreign and earlier native forms, than have the other literatures of Western Europe during this same period. It is significant that the work of individual poets often displays major achievement within quite divergent metrical traditions—classical meters, free verse, and folk song in Goethe and Mörike, complex rhymed forms and free verse in Rilke. Moreover, one could describe the whole history of G. prosody as a continual veering between two central traditions—an “art” tradition based on strict syllable-counting (“strict” Knittelvers, classical meters, the various stanzas borrowed from the romance literatures) and a “native” tradition which does not regulate the number of unstressed syllables per line (“free” Knittelvers, free verse, the folk song and its romantic imitations).

Just as G. poets have tended to show a high degree of interest in prosodic matters, so G. literary scholarship has been particularly rich in systematic attempts to describe the history and nature of G. prosody. Among the most notable of these are H. Paul's Deutsche Metrik (1905), F. Saran's Dt. Verslehre (1907) and A. Heusler's Dt. Versgeschichte (3 v., 1925–29). Recent, more popular discussions of G. prosody include W. Kayser's Kleine dt. Versschule (1946) and Gesch. des deutschen Verses (1960) and O. Paul and I. Glier's Dt. Metrik (4th ed., 1961).

H.L.;B.Q.M.

GESELLSCHAFTSLIED. (As opposed to the folk song) a song for several voices, written, composed, and performed by and for, educated society, primarily in the baroque and rococo periods in Germany. It originated toward the end of the 16th c. The first, musical, impetus for the G. came with the adoption of It. song forms: the courtly, nonstrophic madrigal, the strophic Neapolitan villanella (street song), and the canzone (qq.v.). The pleasures and sorrows of love and convivial joys, such as drinking and dancing, are preferred subject matters.

There is a close affinity between the G. and the lyrical poem proper. Hence the high-flowering period of lyrical poetry (1620–1680; Simon Dach, Martin Opitz, G. R. Weckherlin) had an ennobling effect upon the G. Many of the composers wrote their own texts (H. L. Hassler, Adam Krieger). From 1680–1740 the G. was overshadowed by the artistic aria, although the production of Gesellschaftslieder did not stop. The second great vogue of the G. occurred between 1740 and 1780. Both the idea of “humanity” and the renewed interest in the folk song caused the artist to write in a more popular vein (J. A. Hiller, J. A. P. Schulz, J. André; J. F. Reichardt was the first to set Goethe's poems to music).

Due to the renewed interest of Herder and the romanticists in folk literature, the G. had to yield its place to the revived folk song after the turn of the 18th c., while compositions of high poetry (Kunstlieder) became monodic, required the art of the trained singer, and were reserved for the concert stage.

Hoffmann v. Fallersleben, Gesellschaftslieder des 16. und 17. Jhs. (1860); A. Reissmann, Das deutsche Lied in seiner historischen Entwicklung (1861); F. W. v. Dittfurth, Dt. Volks- und Gesellschaftslieder des 17. und 18. Jhs. (1872); M. Friedlaender, Das dt. Lied im 18. Jh. (2 v., 2d ed., 1908); R. Velten, Das ältere dt. G. unter dem Einfluss der italienischen Musik (1914); G. Müller, Gesch. des deutschen Liedes vom Barock zur Gegenwart (1925); H. Cysarz, Deutsches Barock in der Lyrik (1936); M. Platel, Vom Volkslied zum G. (1939); C. v. Faber du Faur, German Baroque Lit.: A Catalogue of the Coll. in the Yale Univ. Library (1958); W. Flemming, “G.,” Reallexikon, 2d ed., 1; W. Kayser, Gesch. des deutschen Verses (1960).

U.K.G.

GHASEL (ghazal). Name given to a lyric in eastern literature, especially Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Urdu, and Pashto, from the 8th c. onward. Such a poem, whose theme is generally love and wine, often mystically understood, varies in length from 5 to 12 couplets all upon the same rhyme. The poet signs his name in the final couplet. Hundreds of poets have used this form, most famous among them the Persians Sa'di (d. 1291) and Hāfiz (d. 1389). The g. was introduced to Western poetry by the romanticists mainly Fr. Schlegel, Rückert, and von Platen (Ghaselen, 1821) in Germany, and was made more widely known by Goethe, who in his West-östlicher Divan (1819) deliberately imitated Persian models. See also ARAB POETRY, PERSIAN POETRY.—J. H. S. V. Garcin de Tassy, Hist. de la litt. hindouie et hindoustanie (2 v., 1839–47); E. J. W. Gibb, Hist. of Ottoman Poetry (6 v., 1900–1909); E. G. Browne, Lit. Hist. of Persia (4 v., 1928).

A.J.A

GLOSA. A Sp. metric form, also called mote or retruécano, closely related to the cantiga, introduced in the late 14th or early 15th c. by the court poets. In strict form it is a poem consisting of a line or a short stanza, called cabeza (also mote, letra, or texto), stating the theme of the poem, and followed by 1 stanza for each line of the cabeza, explaining or glossing that line and incorporating it into this explanatory stanza, often at the end as a refrain. Strophes may be of any length and rhyme scheme. Loosely, the g. is any poem expanding on the theme presented in the opening stanza and usually repeating one or more lines of that stanza. A famous late 16th-c. g. is one by Vicente Espinel beginning “Mil veces voy a hablar / a mi zagala.”—H. Janner, “La g. española. Estudio histórico de su métrica y de sus temas,” RFE, 27 (1943); Navarro.

D.C.C.

GLYCONIC. Named after a poet Glycon whose date and place are unknown, this verse form was familiar in Gr. and L. lyric poetry. As used by the poets of the personal Gr. lyric and their Roman imitators, it was normally octosyllabic but choral lyric and drama admitted longer variants of this scheme with resolutions of the long syllables into 2 shorts. With one exception (Odes 1.15.36), Horace began his glyconics with 2 long syllables. The catalectic form of the glyconic was called the pherecratean after the Gr. comic poet Pherecrates (fl. ca. 430-410 B.C.).—Bowra; Koláf; Koster; B. Snell, Griechische Metrik (2d. ed., 1957). R.J.G.

(=|=---|~|=),

(=|=---|=|)

GNOMIC POETRY. Term applied to poetry which consists largely of gnomes or which has a strong gnomic content. A gnome is "a short pithy statement of a general truth; a proverb, maxim, aphorism, or apothegm" (OED). An example is provided by the first recorded Germanic gnome, given by Tacitus: "Women must weep and men remember." The name "gnomic" was first applied to a group of Gr. poets who flourished in the 6th c. B.C., Theognis, Solon, Phocylides, Simonides of Anorgos, and others. But ancient Egyptian literature, Chinese literature (the Shih and the Shü with pieces going back before the 2d millennium B.C.), and the Sanskrit Hitopadésa testify to the long-standing and widespread popularity of the gnome. The most familiar collection of gnomic utterance is the Book of Proverbs. Old Ir. provides an example in The Instructions of King Cormac Mac-Airt and ON a particularly interesting one in the Hávamál. The popularity of gnomes among the Germanic peoples is also shown by the two collections in OE, the Cotton and the Exeter gnomes. The term "gnomic" has, however, been extended beyond mere collections of gnomes to apply to any poetry which deals in sententious fashion with questions of ethics. Ancient literature abounds in gnomic passages, e.g., the Gr. tragedies, particularly the choruses, or many passages in the Beowulf. Gnomic poetry has been cultivated in more modern times, in England by Francis Quarles (Emblems, 1633) and in France by Gui de Pibras whose Quatrains (1574) were a direct imitation of the gnomic poets and enjoyed a great success.—B. C. Williams, Gnomic Poetry in Anglo-Saxon (1914); The Hávamál, ed. and tr. D.E.M. Clarke (1923); K. Jackson, Early Welsh Gnomic Poems (1935); R. MacGregor Dawson, "The Structure of OE Gnomic Poems," JEGP, 61 (1962). R.P.APR.

GOLIARDIC VERSE. A type of medieval poetry, traditionally attributed to the goliards, wandering "scholar-poets" who flourished especially in 12th- and 13th-c. England, France, and Germany. The origin of the term "goliards" is still not clear. There are references to their belonging to the "household of Golias," whose name, in turn, appears in the rubric of about twenty manuscripts. Yet, according to Hanford, Rozhdestvenskaia (Dobiash), Raby, and other scholars, there was no Golias; nor was there an ordo vagorum, an order or guild of goliards. It seems that the name was used as a term of reproach, perhaps by analogy with Goliath of Gath—the symbol of lawlessness—or by derivation from the L. gula (glutton)—the sin of gluttony—and was attached to poets who attacked the Papal curia and their ecclesiastical superiors.

That wandering clerks existed, Helen Waddell (The Wandering Scholars, 1927) has shown, but they were not organized, nor does it seem very likely that they had the thorough knowledge of classical and medieval L. poetry, the familiarity with vernacular poetry (learned and popular), and—last but not least—the technical skill to write the so-called goliardic verse. The real authors of some of these poems are known. They were accomplished and even famous poets, such as Hugh Primas, the Archpoet, and Walter of Châtillon.

Whatever its origin, "goliardic" verse constitutes one of the most vigorous poetic expressions of medieval Europe. Although the so-called goliards wrote a few authentic religious lyrics, their characteristic productions are (1) satiric, directed almost always against the church and the Pope and (2) profane, devoted to the pleasures of the bed and the tavern in a spirit of reckless hedonism. Their underlying theme is the Horatian carpe diem (q.v.). The most notable collection of L. lyrics which contains some "goliardic" poems is the Carmina Burana, published by Joseph Andrews Schmeller in Germany in 1847 and, in part, translated by John Addington Symonds in Wine, Women and Song in 1884.

The term "goliardic measure" refers to a stanza form much favored by these poets—a stanza of four monorhymed lines of 13 syllables each, sometimes ending with a hexameter, called an auctoritas, quoted from some classical source.

The only complete text of the Carmina Burana is still the one published by Schmeller, 4th ed., 1907. The best ed. is the one by A. Hilka and O. Schumann, but only v. i, pts. 1 and 2 and v. ii, pt. 1 were published in 1931-41. J. M. Manly, "Familia Goliae," MP, 5

GRAVEYARD POETRY

(1907-8); J. H. Hanford, "The Progenitors of Goliard," Speculum, 1 (1926); B. I. Jarcho, "Die Vorläufer des Goliard," Speculum, 3 (1928); O. Rozhdestvenskaia (Dobiash), Les Poésies des goliards (1931; includes some texts and a list of mss.); The Goliard Poets, ed. G. F. Whicher (1949; texts and Eng. verse tr.); Hymnen und Vagantenlieder, comp. and tr. K. Langosch (1954; contains texts of Hugh Primas and the Archpoet); F. J. E. Raby, Hist. of Secular L. Poetry in the Middle Ages, II (1957); The Penguin Book of L. Verse, comp. F. Brittain (1962; texts and tr.). A.P.

GONGORISM. See CULTISM.

GÖTTINGER DICHTERBUND, Göttinger Hain, Hainbund. An association of young German poets, students at the University of Göttingen. It was active from 1772, the year of its founding, until about 1776. Inspired by the dynamic subjective art of Klopstock and by a revived interest in the folk song, the poets of the Hain wrote fresh lyrics on the themes of nature, friendship, and patriotism. Their organ was the Musenalmanach. The members of the Hain included Ludwig Hölty (the most talented member of the group), Voss, the two cousins Miller, and the two brothers von Stolberg. The Hainbund had similar aims as the Strasburg Sturm und Drang (q.v.) movement in its protest against the enslavement of feeling and imagination by the rigid rationality of the enlightenment.—H. Grantzow, Gesch. des G. und des Vossischen Musenalmanachs (1909); R. Bäken, Die Dichter des G. Hains und die Bürgerlichkeit (1937); G. Fricke, "G. Hain und G. Ballade," Studien und Interpretationen (1956); W. Kohlschmidt, "G. Hain," Reallexikon, 2d ed., 1.

GRAMMAR AND POETRY. See LINGUISTICS AND POETICS.

GRAND STYLE. A phrase made famous by Matthew Arnold in his Oxford lectures On Translating Homer (publ. 1861) and On Translating Homer: Last Words (publ. 1862) but used by him as early as the Preface to Poems, 1853. Though, as he says in Last Words, "The grand style is the last matter in the world for verbal definition to deal with adequately," he gives examples from Homer, Pindar, Virgil, Dante, and Milton, and says it arises in poetry "when a noble nature, poetically gifted, treats with simplicity or with severity a serious subject." In the "grand style simple," of which Homer is the best model, "a noble nature and a poetical gift unite to utter a thing with the most limpid plainness and clearness." In the "grand style severe," of which Milton is perhaps the best model, a thing is said "with a kind of intense compression, or in an allusive, brief, almost haughty way, as if the poet's mind were charged with so many and such grave matters, that he would not deign to treat any one of them explicitly." The "severe" may seem grandest when we attend most to the noble nature of the author, the "simple" when we attend most to the poetical gift. Arnold prefers the "simple" because it is more magical, more disinterested. Unlike the "severe" it is not intellectual, and so does not encourage imitation by a poet in whom the poetical gift is either lacking or inferior.

The concept of the Grand Style affected Arnold's practice both as poet and critic. In his long poems, Sohrab and Rustum (1853) and Balder Dead (1855), he aimed, not altogether successfully, at the g.s., and in his essay, "The Study of Poetry" (1880), he declared that all his touchstone (q.v.) poets had the g.s. Since nine of the eleven touchstone passages in the essay are from poems of epic length, Arnold gives the impression that by the g.s. he means the epic style. Though Arnold made the term famous, he did not invent the concept. It had seriously engaged the attention of such predecessors as Longinus, Reynolds, and Ruskin. In many respects the g.s. is the "sublime" (q.v.) of Longinus, who gave as two sources of the sublime noble diction and elevated composition, and who saw in Homer the supreme example of sublimity. Sir Joshua Reynolds, after Burke the Englishman, most influenced by Longinus, discussed the g.s. in relation to "History-Painting" in the Idler, nos. 79 and 82, and in Discourses 3, 4, 5, and 15. Ruskin, in Modern Painters, v. III (1856), took the Longinian position that the distinction between "Great" and "Mean" art was primarily a matter of nobility in the creator. See also STYLE.—A. J. Boyd, Arnold and the G.S. (1934); L. Trilling, Matthew Arnold (1939); A. H. Warren, Jr., "John Ruskin," Eng. Poetic Theory: 1825-1865 (1950); Abrams, ch. 6.

J.K.R.

GRAVEYARD POETRY. A type of meditative poetry, having as its major themes the melancholy fact of mortality and the hope of a future life, g.p. is so called from its favorite setting. Fundamentally a preromantic phenomenon, it arose in 18th-c. England, largely as a reaction against Augustan fastidiousness and avoidance of enthusiasm. Although there are some earlier examples of g.p. (e.g., Andreas Gryphius, Kirch-hof Gedancken, in mid-17th-c. Germany), Thomas Parnell's Night-Piece on Death (1721) is the first full-blown flower of the school, which reached its mature growth in Edward Young's Night-Thoughts (1742) and Robert Blair's The Grave (1743).

Sometimes religious in its attitudes, g.p. is more significant as a new aesthetic movement. In the latter half of the 18th c. it became a general European phenomenon. Examples of Continental graveyard verse are: GERMAN: von Creutz, Die Gräber; von Cronegk, Einsamkeiten.—DUTCH: Rhijnvis Feith, Het Graf.—SWEDISH: Oxenstierna, Natten; Bellman, Aftonkväde; Lidner, Yttersta domen; Kellgren, Förtvivlan. ITALIAN: Pindemonte, dei Sepolcri. Ugo Foscolo's answer to Pindemonte, I Sepolcri, is perhaps too great a poem to be wholly typical of the fashion, and the same may be said for Thomas Gray's famous Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard (1751).—A. L. Reed, The Background of Gray's Elegy. A Study in the Taste for Melancholy Poetry, 1700-51 (1924); P. Van Tieghem, Le Préromantisme (3 v., 1924-47); J. W. Draper, The Funeral Elegy and the Rise of Eng. Romanticism (1929); E. M. Sickels, The Gloomy Egoist (1932); C. A. D. Fehrman, Kyrkogårdsromantik (1954). F.J.W.; A.P.

GREEK POETICS. See CLASSICAL POETICS.

GREEK POETRY. CLASSICAL. Poetry was uniquely important in ancient Greece, as a means not only of expression, but also of communication, commemoration, and instruction. As early as the 9th c. B.C., the bard was thought to possess keener than normal insights into the nature of man and gods; in later centuries, the poet of ability was regarded as the peer of the philosopher and statesman. In part, this unusual recognition of the value of poetry may be ascribed to the tendency, so marked in the Gr. tradition, to identify beauty, moral good, and truth; in part, to the Greek's inherited consciousness of the power, rhythms, and patterns of speech.

The history of Gr. poetry before the Hellenistic period falls into three major phases, each characterized by the predominance of a single poetic genre: the age of epic, in the 9th and 8th c.; lyric poetry, in the 7th and 6th; drama, in the 5th c. To a considerable extent, these phases accurately reflect the nature of their social contexts: the epic, as expressive of the values of an aristocratic, feudal society; the lyric, of a changing world in which traditional values were questioned and individualism thereby encouraged; the drama, of the solidarity of the city-state, its democratic values (in Athens), and the conflict of ideas engendered by the development of the new, open society.

The earliest extant Gr. poems are the Ionian epics of Homer, probably composed, but not set in writing, in the 8th c. Based on a long tradition of orally created and transmitted heroic poetry, the Iliad and Odyssey are artistically unified works which exhibit a highly developed stylistic virtuosity and remarkable poetic sensitivity. The verse, the standard meter of ancient epic, is the dactylic hexameter. The epics were composed for recitation, as court entertainment, by rhapsodes of singularly retentive memory. In consequence, the technique of composition is basically oral, and marked by frequently recurring formulae, especially at the end of the hexameters. Such stock motifs are, nonetheless, seldom embarrassing, for they are usually skillfully integrated into the texture of the verse.

Although they were composed for recitation before an aristocratic audience, and embody many of the values of a feudal society, the epics evidence a deep understanding of the comic and tragic dimensions of the human dilemma. Doubtless it was for this reason that the Homeric poems were considered throughout the history of ancient Greece as the richest source of moral and religious instruction. Homer's contribution to the tradition and development of Gr. poetry cannot be overestimated. While there were many heroic epics, which survive only in fragments, written in imitation of his works, apparently none of them equalled his artistry. Hesiod's didactic epics (probably of the 8th c.) have been preserved. They are directed to the peasant of Boeotia rather than the Ionian aristocrat, being concerned with the morality and beliefs of the small farmer toughly confronting a life of ceaseless labor and few rewards. While they cannot be compared to Homer's works in scope or genius, they often display much poetic power.

Lyric poetry as currently defined, and as a literary genre, was apparently a creation of the 7th c., although its roots may be traced to a much earlier period (there is good evidence for its existence as a folk form in pre-Homeric Greece). It should be noted, however, that the term "lyric" normally meant, to the ancient Gr., "sung to the lyre," and that poetry composed for accompaniment by other instruments or designed for unaccompanied recitation was regarded as belonging to other genres. Further, lyric poetry proper was distinguished into two categories; choral lyric, intended for delivery by a chorus of up to fifty voices, and monodic lyric, composed for recitation by one singer. Monodic lyric poetry flourished in the Aeolian islands, especially at Lesbos, the center of an old but rapidly changing civilization, torn by economic unrest and by dissonance between newly emerging political ideals and traditional oligarchic principles. It is primarily a poetry of personal feeling, with a range of subject matter extending from political diatribe to conviviality, friendship, and love. The most famous, and probably the most talented, of the Aeolian poets were Alcaeus, a skilled and ver-satire writer, and Sappho, whose craftsmanship is sometimes equaled by other Gr. poets, but whose simple charm and emotional intensity are seldom rivaled. Each composed in a wide variety of meters, all marked by a consistent avoidance of groups of three short syllables (a unique feature of Aeolic poetry), and typically cast in stanzaic form, as in these first lines of Sappho's Ode to Aphrodite poikilothron' athanat' Aphrodita, pai Dios doloploke, lissomai se, mē m' asaisi mēd' oniaisi damna, potnia, thymon.

Splendid throned, immortal, O Aphrodite, child of Zeus and weaver of charms, I beg you not with grief and anguishing pains to crush my spirit, O goddess

Although pitifully little Aeolic verse survives, enough is extant to assure us of the excellence of these two poets, and they must be regarded as the greatest of the monodic lyricists. The work of Anacreon of Teos, also a 6th c. poet, is in many ways similar to that of the Aeolian school, although he was an Ionian. His poetry, while finely wrought, is less ambitious than that of Alcaeus and Sappho.

Choral lyric poetry was in large measure a creation of the Dorian Greeks. It became an art form first at Sparta, where it was associated with the name of Terpander of Lesbos; he is a shadowy figure to us today. More is known of the Spartan Alcman (7th c.), especially through a long and lovely fragment of a maiden-song. Nonetheless, it is impossible to form now a reliable estimate of the merit of choral poetry before the 5th c., because of the scantiness of the literary evidence.

With Pindar (5th c.), however, we are on firm ground. A Boeotian aristocrat who inherited the then long tradition of Dorian poetry, he is deservedly the most famous of the choral poets whose works are extant. From his vast production only the epinicia, odes in honor of the victors at athletic festivals, have been preserved in better than fragmentary condition. Pindar's genius enables him to surmount the strictures imposed on him by the occasional nature of the epinician ode; his poems, although elaborately formal, evince a striking intensity of emotional content. Pindar, perhaps more than any other Gr. poet, seems to think perceptually rather than conceptually, to move from idea to idea by suggestion of image or mythic association rather than with the design of logic. In consequence, the odes are characterized by a dazzling sequence of images and mythological reference. This aspect of his work is illustrated in brief by the following passage, which concludes the third Nemean Ode. Here he addresses once more the victorious Aristocleides, winner in the pancratation:

Farewell, my friend. I send you this,
honey mixed with white milk, wreathed with the foam of stirring,
a poet's draught with breath of Aeolian flutes, late though it come. The eagle is swift among birds.

From afar he hovers and swoops, suddenly, and takes the bloody game with his claws.

The chattering daws range at humble height.
On you, by grace of Clio of the fair throne, and for your victor's temper,

From Nemea, and Epidaurus, also from Megara, the light has flashed.

The meters of the epinicia, and indeed, of all choral poetry, are highly complex and varied; Pindar writes in dactylo-epitritic, logaoedic, and paeonic. With a single exception, no two of the forty-five odes are metrically identical, a fact that may serve further to underline this poet's restless artistic individualism.

In much choral lyric, including the Pindaric epinician, a triadic structure is common, in contrast to the predominantly stanzaic form of monodic lyric. Two rhythmically identical series, the "strophe" and "antistrophe," are followed by an "epode," which is based on a different but related metrical pattern. A poem may contain any number of these triads, all of which are metrically alike. Like the occasions served by choral poetry, the subject matter was extremely diversified, ranging, for example, from the epinician to the hymn, the dirge, the maiden-song, and the dithyramb. In short, the choral poet is the voice of the community, expressing the attitudes of his fellow citizens toward events or achievements of moment; but in Pindar's case, at least, this public responsibility in no degree violates the poet's artistic integrity or binds his individuality. Of choral poets other than Pindar, Simonides and Bacchylides (both of the 5th c.) deserve mention. Lamentably little of the former's work in this genre is extant, and the latter's works, although they display much narrative grace, lack the imaginative fire of the Pindaric ode.

In addition to the lyric proper, two other related genres, elegiac and iambic poetry, achieved popularity in Greece. Elegiac poetry originated as a song accompanied by the flute. Its meter, the elegiac couplet, is a modification of the dactylic hexameter, and felt to be lighter than that epic verse form. The first verse is the normal hexameter, while the second member of the couplet is a dactylic pseudo-pentameter in the following form:

— — — | — — — | — | — — — | — — — | — .

Elegy was not primarily the vehicle of the lament, but was used for a number of purposes, including military exhortation, historical description, expression of love, and pronouncement of personal opinion on almost any kind of subject. Perhaps the most skilled of the elegiac poets was Mimnermus of Colophon (7th c.). Much of his work focused, it is said, on historical and geographical subject matter. He is better known to us, through the extant fragments, as a writer preoccupied with the despair of youth's fading, and the deeper horror of the ugliness of old age and the finality of death. Even from the little verse that has survived, we can sense his mastery of the illuminating symbol and the incisive image. Still more impressive is the degree to which he controls the flow of elegiac rhythms to support and inform ideas and attitudes. Tyrtaeus (7th c.) and Solon (fl. ca. 600) do not rise to Mimnermus' height, since they appear to lack the sophistication of his technique. They are, however, poets of stature: the former as the voice par excellence of Spartan military exhortation; the latter as the reflective and sensible spokesman of Athenian rationality and judicial wisdom. The Megarian Theognis (6th c.), an articulate aristocrat embittered by a society which was uprooting the values to which his class was committed, is a remarkably uneven poet, usually at his best (because most original) when his despair is fullest. An accretion of numerous elegies by other writers, but ascribed to Theognis, has come to us in our manuscripts; many of these can be distinguished from the genuine poems on stylistic or historical grounds, and are of similarly disparate merit.

The remaining major genre, iambic poetry, was principally reserved for the expression of satire and invective, and also for the fable. Simpler and less musical than the lyric or elegiac, it more closely approximated the rhythms of ordinary speech. Archilochus of Paros (7th c.) became and remained the undisputed master of this genre. His inventive, humorous, and often devastatingly vitriolic poems reveal a genius of the first order; they display an engagement not only with personal attack, but (especially in his elegiacs) with deep reflection and introspection. Semonides of Amorgos (7th or 6th c.) is a clever, but lesser, poet, while the Villonesque Hipponax of Ephesus (6th c.) is a precise craftsman within the narrow restraints he accepts with his subject matter. Viewed as a group, and with the exception of Archilochus, the iambic writers must be regarded among the minor poets of ancient Greece.

With the stabilization of the Gr. world in the later 6th and 5th c., the poetry of personal expression was eclipsed by the rise of the drama, especially tragedy. The seeds of tragedy are probably traceable to ritual observances, primarily choral in form, in honor of Dionysus. The decisive steps in the transformation from choral ritual to drama were said to have been taken by Thespiis, who added an actor, and Aeschylus, who made true dramatic conflict possible by the addition of a second. At the risk of some oversimplification, the following common characteristics may be observed in the works of the three great tragedians of the 5th c., Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides: a preoccupation with the problems of the city-state, man's relations to it, and to the gods; the use of themes from myths related by Homer and the other epic poets, rather than the creation of "original" plots; an elevated but by no means wholly artificial diction; and finally, an astoundingly dexterous use of imagery to support and illuminate dramatic movement.

The poetic form of the classic tragic drama owes much to the earlier traditions of the various genres. The meter of the dialogue is iambic, and that of the choral odes is as varied and complex as the meter of the earlier and contemporary choral lyrics. The triadic structure of the choral ode is often retained and put to effective dramatic use; indeed, it is singularly appropriate for drama, since the amoebic strophe and antistrophe can serve to set forth a miniature aesthetic parallel of the larger dramatic antagonisms, and the epode, or refrain, to suggest the tragic solution or synthesis.

The history of 5th-c. tragedy is a story of diversity within unity. Aeschylus, the true father of tragic drama, is not thereby, as some would have it, an "archaic" poet, but the master of his preferred dramatic techniques. Concerned as he was with the continuous evolution of God, man, and city-state out of the conflicts and sufferings of the historical cosmic process, he saw the tragic trilogy as the natural, comprehensive vehicle for his humanistic, monotheistic views. The grandeur of his characters and the somber, elemental atmosphere of the plays contribute integrally to the tragic power of his themes, as do the magniloquent diction and the extraordinary metaphors (the wheels of the war chariot "shriek fear"; Helen of Troy is "a thought of windless calm, a delicate jewel of wealth, the soft arrow of the eyes"). The seven tragedies which survive are the product of insight and conscious artistry, not of the tentative experiments of an inventive primitive.

The universe of Sophocles, unlike that of Aeschylus, is static; for this reason, he abandoned the trigonic form and focused the intense light of single dramas on crucial moments in the lives of heroic, epic figures. His is a mysterious cosmos, for these men seem to meet their doom less for what they have done than for what they are; yet there emerges the mystical conviction that their sufferings have transmuted evil into good for their fellows. The style of Sophocles, in his seven extant plays, is simpler and less elegant than his predecessor's, but no less subtle. The power of his key dramatic device, tragic irony, will be attested by anyone who has witnessed a performance of his masterpiece, Oedipus Tyrannus.

Euripidean tragedy is less easy to characterize. We possess nineteen of his plays, and he was a notable experimenter and innovator; we owe to him, for example, the invention of melodrama, and probably, in the Alcestis, true tragicomedy. The common judgment that much of his writing is "realistic" and prosaic is in large part insubstantial. It is true that his diction, settings, and circumstances of plot may often be drawn from the Athens of his day, but not in reportorial style; "realistic" detail seems to be introduced for the purpose of juxtaposing the shabbiness of contemporary life and the heroic motif, thereby criticizing, rather than reporting, the inversion he felt had taken place in Athenian values. There is much of the reformer, a little of Shaw, in Euripides. At the same time, one finds in most of the plays a lyricism of high order.

As Euripides compared the grandeur of the heroic tradition with the pettiness of his modern world, so his younger contemporary, Aristophanes, juxtaposed the beautiful and the grotesque, in his eleven extravagant, uninhibited comedies. Full of hearty earthiness and brilliant satire on the life of Athens, his plays epitomized the "Old Comedy," a genre which soon deserted the stage forever; the clouded political scene of later centuries could not tolerate the freedom of expression which Aristophanes adorned, but did not conceal, with his melodic fantasies.

Toward the close of the 5th c., Gr. poetry experienced the beginnings of a transformation which was to affect it radically. With the rise of science and philosophy, the faith of the Greeks in the value of poetry as a vehicle of truth began to decline, a trend underlined a little later by Plato's attacks on the poets as mere technicians who possess no real knowledge. The result of the new eagerness for conceptual knowledge was, for many writers, a turning away from the ambiguity of poetry to the clarity and precision of historical and philosophical prose. The artist who continued to choose verse as a medium of expression was faced, then, with a double dilemma: poetry could no longer be regarded as the best possible means of communication of significant ideas, and further, he seldom felt that he could seriously challenge the excellence of the older writers of epic, lyric, and dramatic poetry, forms which appeared to have run the full course of their development. Consequently, the Hellenistic period is notable for the emergence of poets who emphasized elegance of style and beauty and novelty of technique, sometimes at the expense of clarity and earnest communication. No longer did the poet feel that he was the voice of the community (which itself had begun to dissolve as a result of movements toward political and philosophical cosmopolitanism), or that he was bound by strict and important moral obligations to his society; instead, he tended, in his search for new and unexplored modes of expression, to limit his audience to a coterie of artists and intellectuals. Only the New Comedy remained a fully "public" form, and the one major genre through which the poet spoke to the society at large. But even the renowned Menander (342-291 B.C.), with his polite, rather prosy treatment of conventionally romantic plots, is not deeply concerned with enlarging the experience of his audience. More typical of Hellenistic attitudes is the "manifesto" of the Alexandrian Callimachus:

I hate the epic poem,
nor do I like the public highway.
I abhor the wandering lover,
I will not drink from the common spring, and despise everything popular.

Despite, however, the Hellenistic inclination to restrict the range and popular appeal of poetry, many of the experiments of the age—variously realistic, romantic, and baroque—bore valuable fruit. Especially remarkable was the school which developed at the new city of Alexandria, and, under the patronage of the Ptolemies, confirmed and defined the poetic trends already being shaped by changing tastes. The literary consequences of the foundation of the Museum and Library were those to be expected of any nationally sponsored academy; the many poets attracted to the Egyptian city gained a professional security they had not known at the cost of at least a portion of the freedom of expression which was their normal prerogative. Nonetheless, the Ptolemaic patronage assisted the talents of the three greatest Hellenistic poets, Callimachus, Apollonius, and Theocritus. The first of these was a precise formalist who composed in several genres, including the Hymns (artificial, in that they are court poems without religious content), and the Aitia, an etiological work which occasionally sparkles, but impresses mostly with its scholarly aridity. He is at his best (at least to modern taste) in the epigram. This traditional form, which is based on the elegiac couplet, and traces its origins to functional dedicatory and sepulchral inscriptions of the 7th c., received a rare polish from the terseness and wit of the Callimachean technique. Apollonius, against the tenor of the times, attempted to revitalize the epic in his Argonautica; although he is consciously indebted to Homer, the result is not heroic, but psychological and romantic, and foreshadowed the development of the ancient prose novel. Theocritus is probably the finest of these three poets. His Idylls (a term of uncertain meaning, but without bucolic reference), written primarily in hexameters, reflect a singular versatility of talent, with equal mastery of the highly musical and romantic pastoral, escapist but never totally divorced from reality, and the realistic mime which gently satirizes the life of his age. Theocritus is a crucial figure in the development of pastoral poetry, for his catalytic skills fused an energetic folk art with the rich inheritance of Gr. literature to create bucolic verse which, for its sureness of touch, its fluidity, and its crisp pictoriality, many feel is unequaled in the tradition of the genre.

With these three major writers of the 3d c. B.C., the great age of Gr. poetry came to an end. Only the collection of epigrams known as the Greek Anthology testifies to the continuance of some creativity. This amazing compilation, gathered in the 10th c. A.D., has given us about 4,000 poems, mostly in elegiacs, attributed to poets from the 7th c. B.C. to the high Byzantine era. Much of the later work included is tedious and imitative, but the Anthology is adorned by the rich love poetry of Meleager (fl. 100 B.C.) and the verses of a number of minor poets worthy of the older tradition. But by and large, the stage was vacated in favor of the L. writers who, through a synthesis of the Gr. heritage and the creative energy furnished by an expanding civilization, infused a new vitality into Western poetry.

It is not easy to summarize the major qualities of a poetic tradition as diversified and rich as that of the ancient Greeks. There are, however, certain recurrent characteristics, observable in varying measure in Gr. writing of every period: simplicity and directness (virtually bareness, by the standards of Eng. poetry) but with subtlety of suggestion, a tendency to understatement, avoidance of sentimentality, close and careful organization, architectonic balance of composition, and musicality. The last three of these qualities can be illustrated readily by reference to the odes of Sappho, the choral odes of tragedy, or the works of almost any important Gr. poet. The first three are fully demonstrated in the epigram written, in the 5th c., by the famous Simonides, when he was called on to compose an epitaph for the tomb of the 300 Spartans, under Leonidas, who died at Thermopylae and by their death preserved the armies defending Gr. freedom. The epitaph contains no resounding words of praise, no lengthy expression of grief. It states simply, but with reverberating connotations,

O xein', angellein Lakedaimoniois, hoti tēde keimetha tois keinōn rhēmasi peithomenoi.

Stranger, tell the men of Lacedaemon that here we lie, and obeyed their commands.

GR. TEXT: Anthologia Lyrica Graeca, ed. E. Diehl (6 fasc., Leipzig, 1925), rev. alii (3d ed.), fasc. 1 (1954), 3 (1952), 4-6 in prep. Theognis, ed. D. Young (1961) supplants fasc. 2.; Poetarum Lesbiorum Fragmenta, ed. E. Lobel and D. Page (1955); Poetae Melici Graeci, ed. D. Page (1962).

ANTHOLOGIES IN TR.: Lyra Graeca, ed. and tr. J. Edmonds (2d ed., 3 v., 1928; also contains Gr. text and a valuable historical survey); Elegy and Iambus, ed. and tr. J. Edmonds (2 v., 1931; also contains Gr. text); Oxford Book of Gr. Verse in Tr., ed. T. Higham and C. M. Bowra (1938); Gr. Poetry for Everyman, ed. and tr. F. Lucas (1951); Gr. Lyrics, ed. and tr. R. Lattimore (2d ed., 1960; brief, but the finest tr.).

METRICS: G. Thomson, Gr. Lyric Metre (1929, rev. ed., 1961); Dale; P. Maas, Gr. Metre (1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: A. and M. Croiset, Histoire de la litt. grecque (5 v., 1909-28; old, but critically dependable); J. Symonds, Studies of the Gr. Poets (3d ed., 1920); J. Mackail, Lectures on Gr. Poetry (2d ed., 1926); A. Koerte, Hellenistic Poetry (1929); Schmid and Stählin (esp. useful bibliog.); A. Couat, La Poésie alexandrine . . . (1882; Eng. tr. J. Loeb with suppl. ch. by E. Cahen, 1931); C. M. Bowra, Gr. Lyric Poetry from Alcman to Simonides (1938, 2d ed., 1961; controversial but perceptive) and Early Gr. Elegists (1938); G. Norwood, Pindar (1945; a thorough treatment of Pindaric technique); D. Page, Sappho and Alcaeus (1955; close analysis of the poems); R. Lattimore, The Poetry of Gr. Tragedy (1958).

R.D.M.

MEDIEVAL GREEK POETRY. See BYZANTINE POETRY.

MODERN. After the fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453, and until the Gr. War of Independence (1821-28), poetry flourished mainly in the Frankish-occupied Gr. lands. The island of Crete was the most important center. In the 16th and first half of the 17th c. it gave birth to a poetry that, though depending on It. models, has a force and character of its own. The masterpiece of Cretan literature is the Erotokritos, an epic-lyric poem of 10,052 rhyming 15-syllable political verses, composed by Vitzentzos Kornaros. The story—the chivalrous love of Erotokritos for Aretousa, and their union after long and arduous adventures—follows the Frankish romance Paris et Vienne, which the author of the Cretan epic probably knew through an It. translation. But at the same time the influence of Ariosto, and also of the Cretan folk song, is evident. Western influence is also felt in the Cretan drama, the most important examples of which are The Sacrifice of Abraham by an anonymous poet, and the tragedy Erophile by George Chortatzes. Comedy and the pastoral were also written there, and had the fall of Crete to the Turks in 1669 not put an end to the cultural life of the island, modern Gr. literature might well have followed a different course.

In the remainder of the Gr. world, then under Turkish rule, the only noteworthy poetry composed were the folk songs. Their heyday was the 18th c., and many love songs, songs of travel, lullabies, and dirges are of a remarkable beauty and freshness, superior to any poetry in Gr. since the close of the 9th c. In the 18th c. we also meet with the first influence of Fr. literature upon Gr. writing with the so-called Phanariots (the educated Greeks who had clustered round the Oecumenical Patriarch in Constantinople), an influence which also largely determined the writings of Athanasios Christopoulos and John Velaras, the two most important precursors of the poetry which followed the liberation of Greece.

The liberation, finally achieved in 1828 after a long and bitter struggle, made the capital of the country the center of all intellectual life. It was there that the Romantic School of Athens flourished, whose founder and leading spirit was Alexander Soutsos (1803-63). He was a fervent admirer of Victor Hugo and Byron, but his exuberant romantic and patriotic writings did not capture the spirit of their models. As a satirist, however, he is terse and vigorous. The influence he exercised upon Gr. poetry was for many years great, though not always beneficial. The other main representatives of the Romantic School of Athens, Panagiotis Soutsos, Alexander Rizos Rangavis, George Zalokostas, Theodore Orphanidis, Elias Tantalidis, and John Karasoutsos were all slaves of an exaggerated romanticism. On the whole, they use a stilted and archaic form of Gr. (the katharevousa), and are painstakingly patriotic. Achilles Paraschos (1838-95) is the leading figure in the last period of the school. Alfred de Musset, Victor Hugo, and Byron were his idols, but the rhetorical profuseness and mock-heroic patriotism of his verses kept him far below their level, though a spark of real poetry appears here and there. His contemporaries George Paraschos, Angelos Vlachos, Alexander Vyzantios, Demetrios Paparrhegopoulos, Spyridon Vasiladis, and George Vyzienos were all overshadowed by his reputation, in spite of the greater sincerity and more delicate technique of many of their writings. The Romantic School of Athens with its rhetorical profuseness, hackneyed patriotism, and stilted purist Gr. was superseded by the New School of Athens, which resulted from a fresh assessment of Gr. national values and the linguistic movement to introduce the spoken tongue (the Demotiki) into literature. The latter turned the attention of the nation to the School of the Ionian Islands, by which that form of language had already been successfully used. The founder and greatest representative of the School was Dionysios Solomos (1798-1857). Like other members of the Ionian aristocracy of his day, he was bilingual, and, having received his education in Italy, wrote his first poems in It. He soon, however, developed a preference for Gr. His early works in Gr. were short lyrics, but the War of Independence stirred him to more ambitious projects. As the years passed his philosophic approach to art and life deepened, and expressed itself in verses of unique delicacy and balance, unsurpassed to this day in modern Gr. He is a figure outstanding in the whole of European literature, because he finally succeeded in combining harmoniously the classical and the romantic spirit. From the Hymn to Liberty (the first stanzas of which became the Gr. national anthem) to the Free Besieged, which sing of the heroic resistance and sally of Missolonghi, we can trace the agony and artistic achievement of a highly spiritual nature. Unfortunately most of his mature work is known only from fragments. The instability of Solomos' disposition seems to have prevented him from finishing many of his major works. In the struggle that continued from Byzantine days between the Katharevousa and the Demotiki as the language of literature, Solomos marks a turning point. For by choosing the latter he pointed the way which all subsequent Gr. poetry worthy of the name was to follow. Moreover, he introduced a number of Western metrical forms (the sestina, the ottava, the terza rima) into Gr., which freed Gr. poetry from the monotony of the 15-syllable verse which had formerly characterized it. Of the other poets of the Ionian School (George Tertzetis, Julios Typaldos, Gerasimos Marcoras, Lorentzos Mavilis, Andreas Calvos, and Aristotile Valaoritis, the most important are Calvos (1792-1869) and Valaoritis (1824-39). Calvos drew his inspiration from the Gr. classics, and indulged in an austere and moralizing poetry which exercised no notable influence on subsequent literature. Valaoritis, though over-romantic and grandiloquent, was greatly admired, and is the link between the Ionian School, the "Demotic Movement," and the New School of Athens.

About 1880, a young group of poets, influenced by the violent criticism of E. Rhoides and by the feeling that Gr. poetry by employing the kat harevouse and its excessive romanticism was heading for sterility, formed the New School of Athens. They aspired to become the Gr. Parnassiens, masters of a restrained and objective art. Once again the influence of Fr. literature was making itself felt. The central figure of the new school was Kostis Palamas (1859-1943), a man of talent and wide reading. In his many and important works were blended the ancient and modern Gr. traditions, as well as the social and spiritual convulsions of the late 19th and early 20th c. The Dodecalogue of the Gipsy is perhaps his central achievement. Its hero the Gypsy musician, a symbol of freedom and art, gradually deepens into the patriot, the Greek, and finally the "Hellene"—citizen and teacher of the world. Together with this powerful epico-lyrical work, The King's Flute, a historical epic, and Life Immovable, the most important of his lyrical collections, have established his reputation not only in Gr. letters, but throughout Europe. The influence of Palamas on contemporary poets such as George Drosinis, John Polemis, and George Stratigis was profound, and was felt in more ways than one by most of his successors. John Gryparis, in his mastery of language, Constantine Hatzopoulos, in his excellent sense of rhythm, Miltiadis Malakasis and Lambros Porfyra in their sad and playful charm, and Costas Crystallis in his virile idyllic tone betray in more than one way their debt to the leader of the school. It is the poets of this generation who also introduced symbolism and free verse into Gr. poetry, which greatly enriched and enlivened it in the 20th c.

After Palamas the most important figure in Gr. poetry is undoubtedly Angelos Sikelianos (1884-1952). His powerful verse has its roots in the New School of Athens, but his thought followed a different and obscurer course. Gr. nature and history are seen in the light of a Dionysiac mysticism. This together with a rich, incisive diction that brings landscape, the human form, and abstract thought in clear-cut relief before the eyes, has produced some of the most striking lyrical poetry written in the 20th c. in the West. His tragedies, however, are theatrically imperfect. The one significant Gr. poet who remained untouched by the influence of Palamas and the New School of Athens is Constantine Kavafis (1868-1933). An Alexandrian both by birth and spiritual inclination, his main theme is the tragic glory of Hellenistic Greece and its decadence. But in his work historical memories and personal experiences are inextricably blended. In no other Gr. poet is the tragedy of life expressed more sensually, nor sensuality more tragically. Nikos Kazantzakis (1885-1957), well known as a novelist, is the author of a formidable 33,333-line poem called the Odyssey (translated into Eng. verse by Kimon Friar, 1958). Its hero, a modern Odysseus, wandering in the world of thought, is haunted by the idea of nihilism. The size and style of the work are overpowering, and there are many passages of great beauty. Of the many poets living and writing in Greece today at least two should be mentioned in a short survey of this nature. George Seferis (b. 1900), who was awarded the 1963 Nobel Prize for Literature, is a genuine symbolist who records in true poetic and lyrical manner the fate of modern man; and finally Elytis (b. 1912) writes verse full of the light and color of the Aegean islands.

The fact that in the last hundred years much greater poetry has been written in Gr. than in the fourteen centuries which preceded them, and that in the last fifty Gr. poetry by giving up its political or purely national aspirations has achieved universal validity and a European significance, augurs well for the future. It should be remembered that poetry written in Gr. has the longest and perhaps the noblest uninterrupted tradition in the Western world.

ANTHOLOGIES: Anthologia 1708-1933, ed. E. N. Apostolidis (n.d.); Poetry of Modern Greece, tr. F. McFerson (1884); Songs of Modern Greece, tr. G. F. Abbott (1900); Anthologie Populaire de la Grèce Moderne, tr. H. Pernot (1910); Modern Gr. Poems, tr. T. Stephanidis-G. Katsimbalis (1926); Anthol. des Poètes Néo-Grecs, 1886-1929, tr. J. Michel (1930); Eklogae apo ta tragoudia tou Hellenikou Laou, ed. N. Politis, 3d ed., (1932); Medieval and Modern Gr. Poetry, ed. C. A. Trypanis (1951; includes extensive bibliog. on all important modern Gr. poets); Six Poets of Modern Greece, tr. E. Keeley and Ph. Sherrard (1961).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: D. C. Hesseling, Hist. de la Litt. Grecque Moderne (1924); E. Voutieridis, Syntomi Historia tis Neohellenikis Logotechnias (1933); J. Panagiotopoulos, Ta Prosopa kai ta keimena (5 v., 1942-48); S. Baud-Bovy, Poésie de la Grèce Moderne (1946); A. Kambanis, Historia tis Neas Hellenikis Logotechnias (1948); C. M. Bowra, The Creative Experiment (1949); C. Demaras, Historia tis Neohellenikis Logotechnias (1955); Ph. Sherrard, The Marble Threshing Floor (1956); B. Knös, L'Histoire de la Litt. Néogrecque . . . (1962). C.A.T.

GREEK PROSODY. See CLASSICAL PROSODY.

GUJARATI POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

GYPSY POETRY (folk tales, folk poetry, folk songs). Romany is the spoken language of the Gypsies (originally, a neo-Indic dialect of the Northwestern area, based on Sanskrit and Prakrit, including additions from several Asiatic [no Arabic] and many European languages). Though noticeably fading away, it is still a living idiom in its many—in Europe at least 16—dialects. Attempts to trace its development to a literary language have failed up to now.

Fortunetelling is still a flourishing branch of family business with the majority of Gypsies. (The It. popular art of the 17th c. pleasantly immortalized it in the rhymes and tunes of the "Zingaresca" stanzas). The G. is a gifted narrator, talkative, with a retentive memory, a lively temperament, and a fertile imagination. An echo of the rich, impressive faith of his Indian ancestors binds him to his amulets, charms, dreams, omens, and mysterious forces, making the G. communities—whatever religion they may follow nominally—live in the state of animism. The repertoire of G. story tellers appears to conform naturally enough to that of the land of their sojourn. In essentials the Indo-European stockpot is common to all genuine folk tales. The recital of a G. tale is a most dramatic action in which the form of the oral transmission—with its definite openings, links, and tags as stereotyped as the familiar Eng. "once upon a time"—is regarded seriously.

G. folk poetry shows a primitive degree of natural development, with simple (mostly parallel) rhymes without any strophical construction. The not too numerous samples contained in the collections (by H. Wlislöck, A. Hermann, A. Colocci, J. Sampson and a few others) vigorously echo the sound reaction of the G. soul to all that may appeal to the primitive masses of nature-loving European peoples:

Phen ta mange čaje,
Kames man voj ni či?
Kamau tut, kamau tut,
Si nastig bristav tut

Tell me, my Sweetheart,
Do you love me or don't you?
I love you, I love you,
I cannot forget you.

(Collected by I. Csenki)

Their lyric vaguely mirrors some characteristics and the primitive verse-making technique of the surrounding folk poetry, showing naive sincerity in expression. The predominant themes remain nature and love with overtones ranging from manly and parental tenderness down to the merciless cruelty of the revengeful lover and more or less coarse love. Besides the primary devices of repetition and parallelism, metaphor, simile, and alliteration are not unknown in G. poetry. The few samples of epic verses in Romany (kalo) language hardly qualify as folk ballads, though the suggestive imagery in the descriptive tale reaches, at times, real dramatic depth. The kind of music-hall or highway poetry, mostly a creation of inspired aficionados of the rather romanticized figure of the 18th-19th c. G., thickened into a sui generis "gypsified literature" in a few European countries. It culminated, perhaps, in the performances of the suburban type of the flamenco caste in Andalusia, successors of a mixture of western and oriental minstrel tradition.

The genuine folk poetry of the G. has so far not been sufficiently studied for conclusions about its relationship to the field of genuine G. music, another topic over which the mystic fog of romantic conception is still hovering in most countries of the world. As it is, the world possesses comparatively little information about the genuine music of the Gypsies. The bulk of instrumental or vocal music, known and propagated as Hungarian, Russian, Rumanian, or Spanish G. music (from the tune material of the Hungarian Rhapsodies by F. Liszt down to the tunes sung by the Rus. choirs, and the flamenco music of Spain), is not G. music in the folkloristic sense of the term. F. Liszt's much discussed Des Bohémiens et de leur musique en Hongrie (1859) bears the leonine part of responsibility for the still persisting erroneous belief that the said art music (its melodic material and the instrumental style of its performance) is genuinely G. A remarkable stock of folk songs of the nonmusician Gypsies, collected recently by Hungarian folklorists in continuation of the fundamental work by B. Bartók and Z. Kodály on the Magyar peasant song, seems to support the possibility of some comprehensive conclusions as a result of extended further research in this direction among the Gypsies all over the world.

ANTHOLOGIES: Volksdichtungen der siebenbürgischen und südungarischen Zigeuner, ed. and tr. H. Wlislöck (1890); "Ciganyok" [Gypsies], Pallas Lexikon, ed. and tr. A. Hermann and H. Wlislöck (1893); G. Folk Tales, ed. and tr. F. H. Groome (1899); The Wind of the Heath, ed. and tr. J. Sampson (1930); A Book of G. Folk Tales, ed. and tr. E. D. Yates (1948); Bazsarozsa, 99 G. Folk Songs, ed. I. Csenki and M. Paszti (1955).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: G. F. Black, A G. Bibliog. (1914); Leeds Univ. Romany Catalogue (D. U. McGrigor Phillips Collection, 1962); Jour. of the G. Lore Society, 1-3 (1888-92); n.s. 1-9 (1907-1915/16); ser. 3, 1- ; 1922- ; A. Hermann, Ethnologische Mitteilungen aus Ungarn (1892-1907); all are indispensable sources for studies of G. lore.—H. M. Grellmann, Die Zigeuner (1787); G. Borrow, The Zincali (2 v., 1841); F. Miklosich, Über die Mundarten und Wanderung der Zigeuner Europas (1872-77); A. F. Pott, Die Zigeuner in Europa und Asien (1884); A. Colocci, Gli Zingari (1888); A. Thesleff, "Report on the G.

problem," JGLS, n.s. 5 (1911-12); I. Brown, Deep Song (1929); C. J. P. Serboianu, Les Tsiganes (1930); E. Pittard, Les Tsiganes ou Bohémiens (1932); M. Block, Zigeuner (1938); I. Csenki, "Collecting Folk Songs among the Gypsies of Hungary," Kodály Album (1943);

B. Bartók, "G. Music or Hungarian Music," Musical Quarterly, 33 (1947); E. De Spur "Liszt's and Brahms' so-called G. Music," JGLS, ser. 3, 28 (1949) and "Myth and Truth about G. Music," Almanaque da Gazeta Hungara (1957 and 1958; on the G. folk song). E.D.E.S.

H

HAIKU (also called haikai or hokku). This Japanese lyric form of 17 syllables in lines of 5, 7, 5 syllables emerged in the 16th c., flourished from the 17th-19th c., and has adherents today. Each h. must state or imply a season or New Year's Month and, except for modern innovations, is almost wholly restricted to natural images, whose symbolic force is based upon literary tradition and a cultural mingling of Buddhism, Taoism, and native animism.

H. became widely known in the West about the turn of the century. Its elliptical nature, its dependence on traditional associations for images, and the fact that Western poets interested in it knew no Japanese combined to produce results which often had little to do with h. Since Japanese prosody is syllabic, and since metrical and rhymed translations of such a short poetic form produce jingles, many early translators rendered h. into free forms or prose, leading some imitators to find h. an argument for vers libre in poetry on almost every subject and indispensable in imitations of haiku. Inspired by exoticism, the vogue for imitations of h. began in France ca. 1905. Marcel Revon's important Anthologie de la Littérature Japonaise (1910) demonstrated the real syllabic prosody and natural subject matter of h. and fostered a great popularity for imitations. The Nouvelle Revue Française published "haiku" by a dozen poets of note in 1920 and held something of a haiku competition in 1924, receiving a thousand entries. Interest waned about 1925, but h. had taken Orientalism from exoticism to serious imitation. Writers agreed that haiku's most important lessons were condensation, definite imagery, and freedom from didactic comment.

H. attracted the interest of the Anglo-Am. poets associated with T. E. Hulme and in the imagist movement about 1910 (and independently at Harvard University about 1912), an interest at first mirroring Fr. ideas, but soon assuming a life of its own. As in France, h. appealed first to exotic tastes but seemed increasingly relevant to experimental interests, vers libre, and imagery; but in England and the United States these concerns were carried farther and had greater effect upon poetic theory and practice. The most notable among the theorists were F. S. Flint, Ezra Pound, Amy Lowell, and John Gould Fletcher. On the model of h., Pound devised a "form of superposition," or use of a vivid image in combination with a more discursive or less vivid passage. This technique, begun with In a Station of the Metro, marks many shorter poems and, in somewhat altered form, is employed in Maunderly and the Cantos. The technique was widely imitated (occasionally to the point of parody), and can be found in the work of Flint, Aldington, Amy Lowell, Fletcher, and of such of the non-imagists as Frost, Aiken, Stevens, Yeats, MacLeish, and many others. Pound gave the technique a new form when, in the Cantos, he used Sino-Japanese characters rather than conventional images in super-pository fashion.

Many attempts have been made to imitate h. in Eng., Fr., German, Sp., It., and perhaps other European languages, but usually with exotic motives and almost always with trivial results. H. is too reduced a form and grows too complexly out of its cultural background to be adaptable as a whole into Western languages. Efforts by Amy Lowell and numerous translators to adapt h. prosody as a Western poetic or stanzaic form have been uniformly unsuccessful. The most haiku-like poems are those which, in addition to being written by poets, adapt the techniques for other purposes—e.g., Pound's Liu Ch'e (Japanese in technique, Chinese in materials) and Stevens' Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird. These show that h. has encouraged a style in which imagery, especially natural imagery, is the crucial vehicle of meaning; and in which imagistic techniques give order to poems, passages, and sequences. A few poets (e.g., Pound and Fletcher) have derived philosophies of poetry from h., and others (e.g., Edmund Blunden, William Plomer, and Sherard Vines) have used h. images or subjects in forms otherwise unrelated to Japan. See also JAPANESE POETRY.

Extensive bibliographies of primary materials can be found in the following studies. W. L. Schwartz, The Imaginative Interpretation of the Far East in Modern Fr. Lit., 1800-1925 (1927); G. Hughes, Imagism and the Imagists (1931); S. F. Damon, Amy Lowell (1935); E. V. Gatenby, "The Influence of Japan on Eng. Lang. and Lit.," Japan Society (London), Trans. and Proceed., 34 (1936-37); S. K. Coffman, Imagism (1951); D. Keene, Japanese Lit. (1953); E. Miner, The Japanese Tradition in British and Am. Lit. (1958).

E.M.

HAINBUND, GÖTTINGER HAIN. See GÖTTINGER DICHTERBUND.

HAITIAN POETRY. Poetic expression in Haiti was born of the patriotism accompanying the attainment of independence in 1804. The struggle with France had produced heroes of epic proportions—Toussaint, Dessalines, Christophe, Pétion—perennial sources of inspiration for the aspiring poet. Moreover, to weld the heterogeneous groups of former slaves into a nation, civic-minded intellectuals often resorted to poetic exhortation, exultation, and encomium. One of the first to recognize the effectiveness of this expedient was Antoine Dupré (?-1816), whose Hymne à la liberté rallied the new citizens to the defense of their country's freedom. Perhaps the finest example of this genre is the tribute A Henry Christophe by Luc Grimard (1886-1954).

France furnished models for the poetry as she had for all institutions of her former colony. With the indignities of slavery still fresh in their minds, Haitians could not view their ties with Africa objectively; the stigma of color prodded them to prove that black men could emulate Lamartine, Hugo, and Musset. Thus, Hait. verse became and, for the most part, remained throughout the 19th c. an imitation of Fr. romanticism. Oswald Durand (1840-1906) was one of the few who took notice of the special charm of his native land; he even pioneered by writing in Creole the poignant lyric Choucounne, which still stands as one of the landmarks of Hait. verse.

Early in the second quarter of the present century incidental forces kindled a revolt among Hait. youths, turning them to introspection and exploration of native life and society. Their country was suffering an embarrassing foreign intervention and military occupation brought on by corrupt and inept politicians. Dissatisfied with their elders and resentful of the invader, young writers sought escape within themselves and their traditions—places inaccessible to the ideas of the foreigners. In 1925 Emile Roumer (1903-) startled his Fr. and Hait. readers with the publication in Paris of his Poèmes d'Haiti et de France. He then returned home to become the leader of a group of young intellectuals determined to give their country a literature representative of its people. As a vehicle for their works and theories, they founded the Revue indigène. Impetus for the movement came from the ethnological studies of Dr. Price Mars which were later published as Ainsi parla l'oncle (1928). These essays stressed the importance of recognizing the lower classes and of finding in their abundant folklore and traditions the material needed to revitalize the arts in Haiti. Further encouragement stemmed from the works of Negro poets in the U.S.A. and from the renewed Fr. interest in African art. As a result, although agreeing that their poetry should be indigenous, these young intellectuals differed as to the nature and degree of this quality, for native inspiration meant unity of ideals, not similarity of method.

Accordingly, their verse, which covers the whole range of expression, reveals atavistic memories and treats sympathetically the beliefs and superstitions of the masses. It bemoans the unhappy lot of the peasants, pleading for improvement in their social and economic life. It seeks to approximate the verse of other peoples with similar backgrounds. Frequently it exemplifies a négritude closely related to that of the brilliant Senegalese poet, Léopold Sédar Senghor, or of the gifted Martinican, Aimé Césaire. Much of it is protest poetry, condemning injustice, oppression, and exploitation. In Vous, Carl Brouard (1902-) attests the importance of the hitherto neglected peasants:

Vous êtes les piliers de l'édifice;
ôtez-vous
et tout s'écroule, châteaux de cartes.

You are the pillars of the structure;
stand aside
and everything will crumble, like castles of cards.

Modern Hait. verse shows a strong influence of contemporary Fr. techniques, modified by original devices. Native Creole words, expressions, and constructions are fused with Fr. to express Hait. realities and concepts. Rich and colorful metaphors are selected from the tropical scene. Rhyme is often replaced by the rhythm of the Haitian's emotional life. While most of the poets prefer liberated meter to emphasize their break with the past, Jean F. Brierre (1909-) sometimes retains the rhymed alexandrine to voice his new thoughts as in his Me revoiçi Harlem, which manifests solidarity with U.S. Negroes: "Quand tu saignes, Harlem, s'empourpre mon mouchoir" (When you bleed, Harlem, my handkerchief turns crimson).

With the Revolution of 1946 Hait. poetry has tended to become more utilitarian. Characterized by rebellion and protest, it suggests action. Many of the younger writers believe that their art must be functional in order to exist. However, poets like Léon Laleau (1892-), Philippe Thoby-Marcelin (1904-), Félix Morisseau-Leroy (1912-), Roussan Camille (1915-60), and René Belance (1915-) represent the more desirable tendency of combining social purpose with a careful consideration of art. In the final analysis, Hait. poetry is still in the process of finding its way. Its progress is often handicapped by political and economic conditions; publication is difficult and expensive, for illiteracy and poverty restrict the potential market. Literary magazines are ephemeral and increasingly rare; current exceptions are Conjonction and Optique. Roumer and Brouard no longer write poetry; death has silenced Jacques Roumain and Luc Grimaud. On the other hand, poets remain numerous. One has only to view the incredibly beautiful Hait. landscape to understand the irresistible urge to write verse. From servile imitation of the Fr., this poetry has succeeded in rooting itself firmly in the native soil; it promises to become a reflection of the collective conscience.

ANTHOLOGIES: Anthologie d'un siècle de poésie hait. (1817-1925), ed. L. Morpeau (1926); Panorama de la poésie hait., ed. C. Saint-Louis and M. Lubin (1950); Poésies haitiennes, ed. M. Lubin (1956).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: J. Blanchet, Le Destin de la jeune littérature (1939); M. Cook, "Trends in Recent Hait. Lit., JNH, 32 (1947); J. Antoine, "Lit.—From Toussaint Louverture to Jacques Roumain," An Introd. to Haiti, ed. M. Cook (1951); Pages de la littérature hait., ed. P. Pompilus (1951); W. J. Smith, "Land of Poets," Américas, 5 (Nov. 1953); N. Garrett, The Renaissance of Hait. Poetry (diss., Col. Univ., 1954, Paris, 1963); A. Viatte, Histoire littéraire de l'Amérique française (1954); W. Fowlie, "The Poets on Haiti's Map," Port-folio, 1 (1959).

N.G.; M.C.

HALF RHYME. See NEAR RHYME.

HEAD RHYME. See ALLITERATION.

HEADLESS LINE. See ACEPHALOUS.

HEBRAISM-HELLENISM. Antinomy devised by Matthew Arnold in chapter 4 of Culture and Anarchy (1869). Hebraism denotes that facet of man's nature which demands strict obedience to a moral code; it is best exemplified by Old Testament Judaism. In Arnold's view, moreover, other spiritual movements in Western civilization, notably Pauline Christianity, medieval asceticism, and the Puritan Reformation show Hebraic "strictness of conscience." Hellenism is, by contrast, that combination of intellectual curiosity and joie de vivre of which classical Gr. civilization offers the best example. The European Renaissance is seen as a second Hellenic movement in which artistic productivity is combined with a strong expression of the urge "to see things as they are." Hebraism and Hellenism are, in essence, not contradictory since "the desire, native in man, for reason and the will of God, the feeling after the universal order" is their common goal. Yet a purely Hebraic civilization is doomed to fall by stagnation within its rigid code; a purely Hellenic one, by its valuation of intellect over morality and law. Arnold sees Hebraism and Hellenism as civilizing strains which should be combined judiciously to bring out the best forces in any Western culture. In terms of 19th-c. England, he feels that its essentially Hebraic Puritanism, inherited from the Reformation, should receive an admixture of Hellenic desire for truth and aesthetic "spontaneity of consciousness."

In relation to poetics, the Hebraic-Hellenic antinomy offers a division of world literature into two major categories: Judaeo-Christian documents, and works belonging to classical antiquity and to the Renaissance. Arnold's drawing together of Gr. and Renaissance sensibilities had a strong influence on the Hellenism of Walter Pater. It is easy, however, to overestimate the standing of Arnold's Hebraic-Hellenic antinomy in the intellectual perspective of the 19th c. Its basic distinction between Judaeo-Christian asceticism (Hebraism) and a Hellenism generally defined as a love of realities had been drawn by Henrich Heine in an essay "Ueber Ludwig Boerne" as early as 1840. In addition, Ernest Renan foreshadowed Arnold's historical development of Hebraic-Hellenic strains in Les Origines du Christianisme (1863) and later expanded this idea in a preface to his Hist. des peuples d'Israël (1887-93).—T. S. Eliot, "Arnold and Pater" in Selected Essays (1932); L. Trilling, Matthew Arnold (2d ed., 1949); F. Faverty, Matthew Arnold, The Ethnologist (1951); W. Robbins, The Ethical Idealism of Matthew Arnold (1959).

W.B.F.

HEBREW POETRY. I. BIBLICAL PERIOD. The poetic vein in Heb. literature runs rich and deep. Not only war and victory are celebrated in early biblical documents like The Song of Deborah and The Song of Moses but work and dance—these mother-forms of human activity—are accompanied by rhythmic verses (Numbers 21:17-18; Exodus 15:21). In unabated productivity of more than three millennia Heb. lit. shows a preponderance of poetic output. The ethical ideas which constitute its chief contribution to the humanization of the West made their abiding impact because they were couched in poetic language.

Some of the most ancient books of the Hebrews must have been pure poetry if the few fragments from The Book of Yashar (Joshua 10:12-13; 2 Samuel 1:18-27 and possibly 1 Kings 8:12-13) and the single quotation from the uncertain Book of the Wars of Yahweh (Numeri 21:14-15) which are preserved in the Bible are any indication. The Bible—not a book but a literary miscellany of a thousand years—is largely poetry in form. In content it is a tripartite history of an ancient people: the Pentateuch is the great epic of the nation's commencement, the Former Prophets continue the story to the first experience of political annihilation while the so-called Latter Prophets dramatize the high moments of inner and outer struggles, the Hagiographa which are lyric and philosophic in inspiration reiterate to a certain extent the nation's story and continue it beyond the period of Babylonian activity. But even the prose of the great histories in the Pentateuch, in Joshua and in Judges, in the two books of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles, in the memoirs of Ezra and Nehemiah, has a poetic rhythm. And Esther and Ruth, predecessors of the short story in modern literature, approximate poetry in their cadenced sentences.

Classical and Semitic scholars love to compare the relative merits of Gr. and Heb. poetry. Of greater importance is the fact that an epic tradition of the Mediterranean East, antedating the earliest histories of the Gr. and Heb. peoples, feeds the Homeric and biblical books. The musical variety of Gr. meters has no parallel in Heb. poetry. An infinite amount of ingenuity and labor, from the Church Fathers to the biblical scholars of our own time, has failed to establish in the Bible dactylic hexameter—the great metric scheme of the Gr. epic—or the iambic pentameter, the great metric scheme of Gr. tragedy. Scholarly emendations of the Bible for the sake of a non-existent metrical scheme have ended in a cul de sac. Only rudimentary meter exists in Heb. poetry just as rudimentary symmetry, of which the caesura is perhaps a remnant, graces Gr. poetry.

Instead of symmetry of feet which is the basic principle of Western poetry, the Egyptians and the Canaanites, including the Hebrews, developed in their poetry a symmetry of units. Though it was noticed by medieval Jewish commentators of the Bible, it was given its scientific name—parallelismus membrorum—more than 200 years ago by Robert Lowth, the celebrated scholar and Anglican bishop. Parallelism exhibits essentially three types: sameness, antithesis, and complement. The verse from Psalms 102:7 is a good example of sameness: "I am like a pelican of the wilderness; / I have become like an owl of the ruins." The desolate despair of the poet, symbolized by the loneliness of the pelican, is accentuated by another denizen of the ruins, the owl. And the symmetry of ideas and imagery is strengthened by repetition. In the original Heb. perfect symmetry is achieved by three words in each unit or line: "Damiti li-Ḳeat Midbar / Hayiti ke-Kos Ḥorobot." The internal rhyme "Damiti-Hayiti" in this beautiful verse is sheer accident: Heb. poetry knew no rhyme until the early development of liturgy in the Synagogue.

There is no better example of antithesis than this pithy epigram in Ecclesiastes 3:4:

A time to weep,
And a time to laugh.

It is based on the eternal contrast of two common feelings and is part of a series of opposites which has delighted lovers of poetry for more than twenty-five centuries. In the original Heb. two words in each unit suffice to express the thought:

‘Et li-Bekot
we-‘Et li-Sehok.

The verse from Proverbs 19:21 is a good example of complementary units: "A man may have many plans in his mind; / But the counsel of the Lord—that will stand." This idea, as is well known, has been incorporated in the Eng. proverb "Man proposes but God disposes." It was given its rhyming form by Thomas à Kempis in his Imitatio Christi: "Nam homo proponit, sed Deus disponit." In the original Heb. four words in each unit serve to express the simple thought: "Rabot Maḥshabot be-Leb Ish / wa-‘Azat Adonai Hi-Taḳum."

These examples indicate that the Heb. poet strove for symmetric perfection of form and content. And he achieved it in Psalms, in Proverbs and in Job, in the Song of Songs, in Lamentations, in Ecclesiastes, and even in some prosaic segments of the Old Testament. The most powerful poetic effects, however, were created by the Heb. prophets. They escaped monotony—an ever-present danger in the use of frugal form—by the powerful impact of their emotions. And they wrote or spoke inspired poetry—half-oracular and half-conscious—which contained timeless insight and wisdom.

Up to the beginning of this century Bible critics of Germany who set the tone for Bible critics all over the world delighted to denude biblical poetry of all originality. As the important archeological and epigraphic discoveries from former territories of the Arab and Egyptian, the Sumerian and Akkadian, Syrian, Hurrian, and Hittite peoples inundated the field of biblical criticism, scholars discovered that similarities to biblical poetry often bore the relationship of rough poetic material to the finished poem. The high antiquity of Heb. poetry and the unparalleled accuracy of biblical texts was securely established by the archaeological finds of Ras Shamra in northern Syria—ancient Ugarit—where hundreds of clay tablets and clay fragments in alphabetic cuneiform characters from the 14th c. B.C. were excavated by C. F. A. Schaeffer. The dean of American archeologists, William Foxwell Albright, could justly claim that “the flood of light now being shed on biblical Hebrew poetry of all periods by Ugaritic literature guarantees the relative antiquity of its composition as well as the astonishing accuracy of its transmission.” Prayers and rites, laws and myths abound in these texts. The protagonists in some fragmentary poems resemble well-known entities in the Bible: El, the supreme God in the Ugaritic mythology, is the generic name for God in the Bible; Ashirat, his consort, is the well-known Astarte; Baal, the god of rain and fertility and the virgin Anath, the war-goddess, are mentioned in the Bible; Yam, the god of the sea and Mot, the god of death, have lost their divine character in biblical Heb. and have come to denote “sea” and “death” respectively. An exquisite refinement of expression has been achieved in the Bible though numerous vocables and images and proverbs of Canaanite provenance found their way into the ancient lit. of Israel. By 586 B.C. [587?] when the Chaldeans conquered Judaea, the Hebrews attained a greatness in the domain of poetry which was not equaled anywhere in that remote period of history. The intelligent absorption and transformation of neighboring cultures was and still is the singular peculiarity of Heb. genius.

Heb. poetry is intimately linked with prophecy which has no parallel among Eastern or Western peoples. In spite of superficial resemblances to ecstatic practices in the ancient East, it is a unique phenomenon. According to Maimonides, the great medieval sage, “It is the greatest perfection man can attain.” According to the acute critic of prophecy, Sigmund Mowinkel, prophets—“the Nebiim . . . were filled by divine power to raving point.” Generations of scholars, Jewish sages and Church Fathers, philosophers and poets tried their intuitive and reasoning powers on the solution of the sphinxlike riddle of prophecy. But it has eluded their intellectual and spiritual grasp. At best it can be described and evaluated in subjective terms. Intensity of experience and intensity of expression are its dominant characteristics. But the great poetry of a Shakespeare and a Goethe may also boast such distinction. What makes prophets unique poets is a belief and a claim that their words are inspired by an all-seeing, all-knowing Power which transcends human wisdom: God. From that point of view prophets are poets of faith. The misnomer “prophet” which has the meaning “one who foretells” in Gr. and in the languages of the West, contributed to the misunderstanding of his function. For the Heb. equivalent of the term, nabi, probably means “one who is called.” But whatever the nature of that divine power or ecstatic experience of the prophets, be it supranormal or a heightened form of psychic tension, the timelessness of their utterance and the universalism of their message has been noted by their admirers and detractors. Yet they never lost sight of Israel, which they wished to elevate by sheer moral power above all its neighbors. Chauvinism and universalism were intertwined in their utterance.

Prophets were also builders of ideal dream-lands in verse, and they served as examples and prototypes to Sir Thomas More and Samuel Butler, Sebastian Mercier and Restif de la Bretonne, Bellamy and Orwell. They did not use the word “utopia” which in Gr. means “nowhere” and which More chose as the title for his book, but they said “the end of days.” It should be borne in mind, however, that ancient Israel, like its near neighbors in the Fertile Crescent and the more distant neighbors in Greece had also a dim recollection of a Golden Age in the beginning of days. Most of the prophets experienced the tension of their country's imminent doom. At least two of them—Jeremiah and Ezekiel—lived during the destruction of Jerusalem and the annihilation of the Jewish state, and only a few of them witnessed the rebirth of their puny country under adverse conditions. Since they opposed the surrounding cultures and their ethical laissez-faire with all the great eloquence at their command, they were driven to advance the Jews to the status of a chosen people. This idea, maligned through the ages and rejected by Jewish Reform and Reconstructionism in our own times, had nothing in common with the supercilious attitude of the Greeks to other nations. It was elevated by duty to humanity and service to mankind. In spite of the great diversity of prophetic writing, the idea of service and duty gives them their unity. This idea is no stranger to the philosophic lit. of the Greeks but it reached only highly cultured individuals. The prophets, who were poets and who couched their simple ideas in images and visions, had an abiding influence on their people and, through them, on the entire world. They may be said to have shaped a nation in their image—perhaps the only example of a people transformed by the magic touch of poetry.

Like the prophetic books, the collection of 150 Psalms is an anthology sui generis. The lyrics of a Sappho or an Archilochus cannot be compared with them. Some of the Orphic hymns, some Babylonian odes reach to their inspiration. But the Psalms are unique in their God-intoxicated expression. Nature or humanity do not exist as independent factors in the universe; they are the manifestations of a transcendental power.

When I see your heavens, the work of your fingers,

The moon and the stars, which you have formed;

What is man, that you remember him?

And the son of man, that you should care for him?

(Psalms 8:4-5)

Another feature of the Psalms is the blurred boundary between the individual and the nation. These merge so often that "I" in the Psalms is often an individual or a group or both. The reason for this peculiarity is, according to the theories of the greatest commentators of the Psalms in this century, Hermann Gunkel and Sigmund Mowinkel, that psalm poetry is mainly cultic poetry or liturgy which is associated with the worship in the Temple.

If the Psalms may be described as a collection of hymnal lyrics, addressed to God, then the Song of Songs is a collection of love lyrics addressed to a human being and the Book of Lamentations is a sheaf of elegiac lyrics on the ravaged city of Jerusalem. The influence of the Song of Songs loomed large in the history of world lit. The European love lyric has rarely equaled its naïveté and immediacy of expression. In Heb. lit. it was regarded with special reverence after the revered Rabbi Akiba interpreted it as an allegory of love between God and Israel and declared that "all the books in Scripture are holy but the Song of Songs is the holy of holies" (Mishnah, Yadayim 3:5).

When in more sophisticated ages the Hebrews aspired to philosophic expression, they also used poetry. The authors of Job and Ecclesiastes are poets first and philosophers last. Though the former stresses patience in suffering and the latter examines the vanity of all endeavor, both are poets of pessimism. Whether the author of Ecclesiastes was a resident of Phoenicia, employing Phoenician orthography and locutions—as Father M. J. Dahood argues in a recent study—or whether he wrote in Aramaic—as H. L. Ginsberg, one of the outstanding biblical scholars of our time —maintains, we must content ourselves with the extant Heb. text which, in spite of occasional corruptions, is one of the great classics of ancient literature. But the difficulties of exegesis have been such that Heinrich Heine described the book as "the quintessence of scepticism" and Franz Delitzsch, the celebrated German scholar, regarded it as "the quintessence of piety."

Like the author of Ecclesiastes, the author of Job may have been a foreigner or borrowed a foreign, possibly Edomite, tale for his book. But he transformed it into the dramatic query of the ages: why do the wicked prosper? Why do the righteous fail? Whether he meant to offer a solution is open to doubt. The finale, the dialogue between God and Job, is a climax of frustration. The inscrutable ways of Providence can neither be challenged nor changed by man:

Scatter abroad the rage of your wrath;

And look upon everyone that is proud and abase him.

Look upon everyone who is proud and bring him low;

And crush the wicked where they stand.

Bury them in the dust likewise:

Bind up their faces in the hidden place.

Then I indeed will praise you,

That your own right hand can deliver you.

I know that you can do all things;

And no plan is too difficult for you . . .

Therefore I retract and repent,

In dust and ashes.

(Job 40:11-14; 42:2, 6)

II. THE POSTBIBLICAL PERIOD is an intermediary period in Heb. poetry which lasted roughly from the final edition of the Bible in the 2d c. B.C. to the emergence of liturgical poets known as Paytanim in the 6th or 7th c. A.D. The bulk of Heb. lit. which succeeded the Bible may be regarded as a vast commentary on the Bible—a poetic, homiletic, mystic, or philosophic interpretation of that classic which was never surpassed. Through the L. translation, the so-called Vulgate version, the Bible also exerted a paramount influence on the Christian Middle Ages, and through vernacular translations, on the Renaissance and the post-Renaissance period. In the original text it never ceased to inspire a scholarly and intellectual élite in the West. And it shaped the character and destiny of the people which authored its contents.

Postbiblical lit. is dominated by the theme of Wisdom which has developed from simple proverbs offering sage advice on a worldly plane to elaborate tracts offering religious and moral norms of perfection. This love of wisdom which colors Job and Ecclesiastes, Proverbs and even the Psalms, amounts to an apotheosis in post-biblical lit. Didactic poetry, anemic and intellectual, largely supplants lyric poetry. The books which immediately follow the Bible and eventually become the extra-biblical canon of Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, teach rather than inspire. A favorite theme is good and evil and a favorite purpose is theodicy: God is right. This is true of Ecclesiasticus or The Wisdom of Ben Sira, The Wisdom of Solomon and The Psalms of Solomon which are merely exercises in "learned psalmography." But a great deal of theoretical and practical wisdom is often incorporated in these books.

The hoard of manuscripts known as the Dead Sea Scrolls has brought interesting additions to Heb. poetry from the philological and semantic point of view. From the literary point of view there is little of value in them in spite of the claims which were made for such pale imitations of the Psalms as the Hymns of Thanksgiving. It must be borne in mind, however, that sound appraisal of the Dead Sea Scrolls will be only possible when they are all unrolled and published in accessible form.

In the immediate postbiblical period poetry copied biblical prototypes. Even its mystical and apocalyptic aspect had its origin in the biblical Daniel. But the language of the Jews, Heb., slowly gave way to Aramaic. In the hellenistic age powerful centers of Jewish culture developed outside Palestine. In Alexandria where Jews spoke Gr., Philo created a new philosophy which, according to the monumental researches of Professor Harry Austryn Wolfson, shaped the course of philosophy for 1,500 years. The less-known Ezekiel of Alexandria wrote his play Exagoge (Exodus) in conformity with classical Gr. tragedies. In Palestine itself various cities were totally Hellenized. As the Jews spread all over the mediterranean countries and later penetrated into the heart of Europe, they developed their lit. in numerous languages and created immense and fascinating difficulties for the literary historian. For no lit. in the world was to exhibit such striking cross-pollinations as that of the Jews. Yet Heb. remained the preferential language. Even in the three centuries—the 11th, 12th and 13th—which are regarded as the Golden Age of Sp. Jewry poets wrote chiefly in Heb. Philosophers who were also poets, Halevi and Gabirol for instance, exhibited a strange dichotomy: they composed their philosophic works in Arabic and their poems in Heb.

III. MEDIEVAL PERIOD. Just as the Hellenic conquest of the Orient was to impress the peoples of the civilized world for a thousand years, so the Arabic conquests after the death of Mohammed created a new civilization in the Orient and in some European countries, notably in Spain, in Provence, and in parts of Italy. Together with the Jews, the Arabs ushered in the Eastern Renaissance in the beginning of the Middle Ages. It antedated the It. Renaissance by several centuries and it exhibited a similar breadth of intellectual interests. Its great men were predecessors of the uomo universale and cultivated poetry and philosophy, history and geography, natural science and law. Kinship in language and race was responsible for close cultural ties between Arabs and Jews. While Gr. models were sparsely used in Heb. poetry during the Hellenistic period, Arab models were slavishly imitated during the Arab period in Jewish history. New poetical techniques were borrowed to such an extent that Halevi rebelled against the imposition of alien shackles and complained that "Jews long for a prosody in imitation of other peoples, in order to force the Hebrew language into their metres." Parallelism was abandoned in favor of metrical systems which were difficult to master and difficult to adapt to Heb. prosody. Since Arabs delighted in convivial and even lax poetry, Jews also contented themselves with euphonious verses on wine and women, war and friendship, love and landscape. Thematic redundancy characterized their poetic effusions. Yet sea poetry, a rarity in Heb. lit., made its debut in the Middle Ages. Humorous verse, an even greater rarity, found an accomplished master in Abraham ibn Ezra, probable prototype of Robert Browning's "Rabbi Ben Ezra" and in Yehudah al-Harizi, the Heb. version of a wandering troubadour. By the 12th c., the poetaster superseded the poet, the art of versification smothered genuine inspiration. Even such impossible subjects as grammar, chess, and natural science were used as grist for the poetic mill.

Only one domain of poetry was safe from cumbersome or frivolous incursions: liturgy. Galut and Geulah, diaspora and redemption, were the magic themes which invigorated Heb. poetry. The humiliation of persecution which was characteristic of the Jewish Middle Ages, the promise of future happiness which was associated with redemption—these were the sources of spiritual strength in medieval Heb. poetry. It was in liturgical poetry that greatness has been achieved by Samuel the Prince and Solomon ibn Gabirol, Yehudah Halevi, and Moses ibn Ezra. Recent and improved editions of their works validated their fame in past centuries and won them new acclaim in our own time. In the case of Samuel the Prince a hoard of poems, forgotten for centuries, revealed a unique master of the abstruse and the obscure. The proud sorrows of Solomon ibn Gabirol, the musical charm of Yehudah Halevi, the penitential strength of Moses ibn Ezra deserve to be better known, by lovers of poetry throughout the civilized world.

It is common knowledge that the Semitic genius penetrated and transformed the West in the Middle Ages. Even It., Fr., and German Jewry did not escape the influence of Arabic exemplars. But they favored, in imitation of Fr. chansons de geste, epic poetry where legend and history mixed in happy innocence. Instead of jousts and tournaments they described the splendor and the awe of ancient ritual in the Temple. They also cultivated the sonnet and used it as a vehicle for roisterous badinage and high-spirited lechery not unworthy of a Boccaccio. An Immanuel of Rome shocked the sensibilities of Jews to such an extent that the authoritative code of religious practice, the Shulhan Aruk, prohibits the reading of "profane talk and erotic discourse such as the Book of Immanuel." It is not without interest that the church legislated against poets because of their alleged preoccupation with pornography. And had it not been for the nobleman who welcomed them to his castle and the commoner who encouraged them, they would have met with a worse fate than they actually had to contend with. Like their Christian brethren, Heb. poets in the Middle Ages depended on the patron. But the rich who had often vulgar tastes were not as generous as the poets expected them to be. Even when they were as cultured as Hasdai ibn Shaprut, they subjected their charges to humiliation. The poets who had a sense of humor laughed away their misery or took to the road and changed patronage with inordinate frequency.

IV. MODERN PERIOD. The banishment of Jews from Spain in 1492 was a cultural loss to the Iberian peninsula and a boon to its neighboring countries. The dispersal of Jewish poets and scholars brought a refinement of arts and sciences to their new homelands in Italy, North Africa, and Turkey. Like the classical poets and scholars who were compelled to leave their homes after the destruction of the Byzantine Empire in 1453, they had a considerable share in the development of the Renaissance. During the 455 years, between the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492 and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1947, Heb. lit. shifted its centers of activity to the far reaches of Eastern Europe, America, and Palestine. But only in the domain of legal lit. did Eastern Europe of the 16th and 17th c. equal the achievements of the Golden Age of Spain. In poetry there was a noticeable decline.

Modern Heb. lit. does not begin, as standard textbooks indicate, with Moses Hayyim Luzzatto or Moses Mendelssohn. No such terminus a quo can possibly be accepted for a multitude of writings which appear not in one country but in numerous lands. Modern Heb. lit. has its beginnings in various countries at different times: in Italy in the 16th, in Holland in the 17th, in Germany in the 18th, in Poland and in Russia in the 19th c. A convenient starting point for modern Heb. lit. is 1492; the date of the Jewish exile from Spain.

The revival of poetic drama—another indication of modernity in Heb. letters—was the great achievement of It. and Dutch Jewry. First there was imitation and adaptation of such trusted models as the Tragicomedia de Calisto y Melibea (The Celestina) which probably was written by the convert Fernando de Rojas. Later original plays appeared in increasing profusion. But the synagogue, unlike the church, had an ancient aversion to the theatre, which was a semireligious, idolatrous institution in Hellenistic times when the Jews became aware of its existence. Yet popular plays thrived in spite of religious frowns. Amateurish companies produced dramatizations of the story of Esther and Joseph. Leone de Sommi Portaleone is the author of a prose comedy on marriage—the first original play in Hebrew—and a handbook on theatrical art in It. Moses Zacuto of Sp. ancestry, Dutch birth, and It. sojourn, wrote two dramatic poems which resemble Christian morality plays. But they were written for libraries and readers rather than for the stage.

Moses Hayyim Luzzatto marks the culmination of a vast dramatic literature. His plays, reminiscent of Tasso and Guarini, have exercised a decisive influence on subsequent poets. And his style, modeled on the classical lines of the Bible, dominated the Heb. language for 150 years. In the hands of epigones it was to degenerate into a patchwork of biblical phrases and verses. Though Luzzatto's use of allegory was a retarding factor and his characterization verged on the naive, his fresh delight in the pastoral aspects of nature and his quest for mystic illumination are still potent forces in modern Heb. poetry. It was because of his influence that the idyll became the preferred vehicle of Heb. poets. Not only was the first original Heb. novel Ahabat Zion (The Love of Zion) by Abraham Mapu idyllic in tone and semipoetic in rhythm, but the poems of the Lebensohns, father and son, and some epics of J. L. Gordon vaunted rural bliss, while Tschernichowsky and Shimon, reaching for the source, adapted the hexametric molds of Theocritus to the Heb. idyll. Luzzatto's quest for mystical illumination and the religious fervor of Hasidism inspired a vast literary activity and left a mark on contemporary poets—on Shalom and Melzer, Lamdan and Gruenberg.

The so-called Heb. Renaissance of the 19th and 20th c.—a misnomer like the Celtic Renaissance—was imbued with nationalist aspirations which included the cult and cultivation of the Heb. language. As in 10th-c. Spain so in the first two decades of 20th-c. Russia and Poland, Galicia and Bessarabia, a fusion of Hebraic and non-Hebraic elements of culture among the outstanding representatives of Heb. lit. resulted in significant poetry. But history never repeats itself. In Spain Heb. poets had absorbed Heb. learning when it was in fullest bloom, and the sciences when they had a veritable rebirth in all their wide ramifications. In Eastern Europe where Heb. poets, with few exceptions, were obsessed with provincial interests, the fusion of Hebraic and non-Hebraic elements of culture occurred at lower tension. Bialik, the most popular representative of the Heb. Renaissance, had only a meager knowledge of contemporary trends in world poetry. In his ardent search for his own roots in childhood and for national roots in the childhood of Jewry, in his assiduous recreation of this twin motif, he is both the most personal and the most national of poets. Like his biblical predecessors he knew how to blend individual and communal traits. Translations in Eng. do not reflect the sweetness and the grandeur of his poetry. Many have attempted but few succeeded in mirroring his felicitous imagery which seems traditional but is, in reality, a bold departure from tradition. Like prophets and psalmists he castigated and comforted. But he also imposed an unprecedented lyricism on a people which, steeped in the study of impersonal legalism, eagerly accepted the subjective relief.

It was, perhaps, the misfortune of Tschernichowsky to have been a contemporary of Bialik. In another age he would have created a school: his knowledge and mastery of classical and postclassical meters and forms gave him an advantage over all his contemporaries. Epic in inspiration, he discovered for Heb. poetry the mythical past of Judaism—the worship of Tammuz, the Semitic Adonis, and Astarte, the Semitic Venus. What Yeats did for Ir. poetry in revivifying the Ir. myth, Tschernichowsky accomplished for Heb. poetry in recreating the Semitic pantheon. Another contemporary poet, Zalman Shneour, wove an interesting poetic tapestry out of ancient Heb. myths and legends. Together these three poets may be regarded as the progenitors of contemporary Heb. poetry in Israel and America—a phase which began with the aftermath of the First World War.

For more than a hundred years Heb. lit. had been concentrated in Eastern Europe. After the Rus. Revolution in 1917 a small center emerged in America, a few splinter centers thrived for a number of years in Poland and in Germany, and a larger center in Palestine, which had played a subsidiary role in Heb. lit. for the past thousand years, assumed increasing importance. The Am. center conquered new ground for modern Heb. poetry. The fate of the indigenous Indian and the imported Negro had a special fascination for Heb. poets in America. And the life of the Am. Jew was richly reflected in narrative poetry. The heavy orientation toward Israel was merely the perpetuation of an anomaly which had its roots in the political annihilation of Judea in the 1st c. A.D.

It was after the First World War, then, that the old home of Heb. poetry became its new home again. The reclamation of the land by the pioneer, the Halutz, and the desperate difficulties which attended the process—these were voiced in Isaac Lamdan's cycle of poems Massadah which had no rival in popularity in the 1920's and 1930's. Characteristically, after the Second World War, another book with a symbolic name, Rehobot ha-Nahar by Uri Zevi Gruenberg became the important poetic document of Israel. This biblical place name, mentioned in Genesis 36:37 and 1 Chronicles 1:48 in connection with the princes of Edom—a symbol of Christianity in medieval Heb. lit.—is an indictment of the civilized world which permitted the slaughter of millions of Jews. Different in its Whitmanesque technique from Massadah, the book shares its deep pessimism.

The older and the younger poets of Israel—Fichmann, Shimoni, and Cohen, Shalom, Alterman, and Shalev, Guri, 'Amihai, and Zak—have rediscovered the Palestinian landscape and reintroduced the living variety of animate and inanimate life into their works. Some of them brought back the indigenous inhabitant, the Arab and the Oriental Jew, after a millennial absence. The Ingathering of Exiles—a cornerstone of political policy in the young State of Israel—had become poetic policy, unconscious and unpremeditated, years before the establishment of the State of Israel. Not a few of the able younger poets were women who had been barred for centuries from the high roads of learning and literary expression and who had few opportunities to voice their luckless lot in verse.

The War of Independence, succeeding the establishment of the Jewish State, led to a certain vulgarization of the Heb. language in prose and poetry. Young soldiers and veterans, indigenous and immigrant, affected spoken Heb. with picturesque oddities and slang elements from Arabic, German, Yiddish, Polish, Rus., and Eng. But they also composed war poetry which had a fresh intensity and immediacy of experience. Together with earlier poets, especially the nimble master of the language, Abraham Shlonsky and his numerous followers, the soldier-poets gave a new elasticity to the Heb. language. Some of them have joined the extreme Canaanites who reject the entire period of Jewish dispersion as an inconsequential incident in Jewish history. All of them succeeded in modernizing the Heb. language and in widening its powers of expression.

SOURCEBOOKS AND ANTHOLOGIES IN ENG. TRANSLATIONS: The Bible: An Am. Tr., ed. J. M. Powis Smith (1935; modern version of the O.T.; quotations in the article, with slight modifications, from this Am. tr.); Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the O.T., ed. J. B. Pritchard (1950; largest coll. of text-tr. relating to the O.T.); Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the O.T., ed. R. H. Charles (2 v., 1913; standard Eng. ed.); An Anthol. of Medieval Heb. Lit., ed. A. E. Millgram (1961); A Treasury of Jewish Poetry, ed. N. and M. Ausubel (1957); Post-Biblical Heb. Lit., ed. B. Halper (2 v., 1921; sel. of medieval texts and tr.); A Golden Treasury of Jew. Lit., ed. L. W. Schwarz (1946; from the 12th c. B.C. until the present); Titans of Heb. Verse, ed. H. H. Fein (1936); Israel Argosy, ed. I. Halevy-Levin (7 v., 1952-60; contemp. Heb. prose and poetry in tr.).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: R. H. Pfeiffer, Introd. to the O.T. (1941; an appraisal of biblical lit. in the light of the present state of higher crit.); The O.T. and Modern Study, ed. H. H. Rowley (1951; excellent survey and crit. appreciation by 12 leading scholars); S. C. Yoder, Poetry of the O.T. (1948; useful introd. and repres. coll. of biblical poetry); C. C. Torrey, The Apocryphal Lit. (1945; concise handbook of Jew. postcanonical lit.); N. Slouschz, The Renaissance of Heb. Lit. (1909); J. Klausner, A Short Hist. of Modern Heb. Lit. (1932); S. Halkin, Modern Heb. Lit. (1950; record of historical and social forces which have motivated Heb. Lit. in modern times); M. Ribalow, The Flowering of Modern Heb. Lit. (1959); S. Spiegel, Hebrew Reborn (1930); E. Silberschlag, "Heb. Lit. in America: Record and Interpretation," Jew. Quarterly Rev., 45 (1955) and Heb. Lit.: An Evaluation (1959); M. Wallenrod, The Lit. of Modern Israel (1956); M. Waxman, A Hist. of Jew. Lit. (5 v., 1960).

SOME WELL-KNOWN ANTHOLOGIES IN HEB.: Be-Ron Ya'had, ed. A. M. Habermann (1945; ancient and modern liturgy); Mib'har ha-Shirah ha-ʿIbrit be-Italia (1934; Heb. poetry in Italy) and Ha-Shirah ha-ʿIbrit bi-Sefarad u-bi-Provence (2 v., 1954-56; in Spain and Provence), both ed. J. Schirmann; Mib'har ha-Shirah ha-ʿIbrit ha-Ḥadashah, ed. A. Barash (1938; modern); Anthologiyah Shel ha-Shirah ha-ʿIbrit ba-America, ed. M. Ribalow (1938); Ha-ʿAnaf ha-Gadu'a, ed. A. Kariv [new ed.?] (1954); Sifrutenu ha-Yafah, ed. H. Toren (3 v., 1953-54; contemp. Heb. lit.); Shiratenu, ed. J. Lichtenbaum (2 v., 1962; modern).

SOME WELL-KNOWN HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL STUDIES IN HEB.: Y. Keshet, Shirat ha-Mikra (1954; on the poetry of the Bible); A. Ben-Or (Orinovsky), Toldot ha-Shirah ha-ʿIbrit bi-Ymei ha-Benayim (2 v., 1934; hist. of medieval Heb. poetry); I. Zinberg, Toldot Sifrut Yisrael (6 v., 1955-60; Heb. lit. from A.D. 500 to the 1850's); F. Lachover, Toldot ha-Sifrut ha-ʿIbrit ha-Ḥadashah (4 v., 1936-48; modern); J. Klausner, Historiyah Shel ha-Sifrut ha-ʿIbrit ha-Ḥadashah (6 v., 1930-50; modern); A. Ben-Or, Toldot ha-Sifrut ha-ʿIbrit be-Dorenu (2 v. [v. 1: Poetry], 1954-55; contemp.); D. Miron, Arba' Panim be-Sifrut ha-ʿIbrit Bat Yamenu (1962; contemp.). E.S.

HELLENISTIC POETICS. See CLASSICAL POETICS.

HEMIEPES (Gr. "half-hexameter"). A dactylic trimeter catalectic ending in a long syllable (— — — — —) corresponding to the earlier part of a dactylic hexameter before the penultimate caesura. It occurs frequently and in various combinations with other cola in Gr. lyric verse. The second line of Horace's

Diffūgerē nīvēs, rēdēunt iām grāmīnā cāmpīs ārbōribūsqū cōmāe
 (Odes 4.7.1-2)

is an example of h. following a dactylic hexameter.—Dale; U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Griechische Verskunst (2d ed., 1958). R.J.G.

HEMISTICH (Gr. "half line"). A half line of verse divided at the caesura. It usually forms an independent colon. The device is used in drama where at least two characters exchange half lines of dialogue to create an effect of sharp argument. Such a series of half lines is called hemistichomythia. In other types of poetry a hemistich may create an effect of great emotional or physical disturbance, e.g., Virgil's isolated half lines in the Aeneid (1.534; 2.233). In Germanic verse the h. is the primary metrical structural unit as is shown in the poetry of OE, Old High German, Old Saxon, and ON. Often in modern poetry any metrically incomplete line is called a hemistich. W. H. Auden's Always in Trouble uses this device.—J. L. Hancock, Studies in Stichomythia (1917); J. C. Pope, The Rhythm of Beowulf (1942). R.A.H.

HENDECASYLLABIC (Gr. "11-syllable"), also called Phalaecean, after the Gr. poet Phalaikos (4th c. B.C.?). The scheme is — — (or — —; — —;

---) ---. It is used by Sophocles (Philoctetes 136, 151), Aristophanes (Ecclesiastusae 942ff.). The Alexandrian poets employed it as the meter for complete poems, e.g., Theokritos (Epode 20), Phalaikos (Anthologia Palatina 13.6). Catullus (84-54 B.C.?) perfected it in L., e.g.,

Ādēst (e, h) ēndēcāsylābī, quōt ēstis

Forty of his 113 extant poems are in h. verses, ranging in function from love lyricism to invective. The It. h. line is used in sonnets, terza rima, and ottava rima by e.g., Dante and Petrarca; unrhymed lines (endecasillabi sciolti) after the L. are prominent in the tragic and epic poetry of Giangiorgio Trissino (1478-1550), in the poetry of Gabriello Chiabrera (1552-1638), and in that of Giuseppe Parini (1729-99), Ugo Foscolo 1778-1827), Giacomo Leopardi (1798-1837), and Alessandro Manzoni (1785-1873). The Marquis de Santillana (Juan de Mena) adapted the h. to the Sp. sonnet form in 1444. In general, the development of the h. in Spain followed the same pattern as that in Italy. In Germany Heinse and Goethe imitated the It. h. Modern-language hendecasyllabics are "syllabic" rather than "accentual" (see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES); Tennyson, however, attempted the classical-accentual equivalent, e.g.

Āll cōmposēd īn ā mētr ōf Cātullūs, as did Swinburne. W. S. Landor wrote L. hendecasyllabics. For a recent (1957) rendering of this meter, see F. O. Copley's translation of Catullus' 28th poem (Catullus, The Complete Poetry).—For bibliog., see CLASSICAL METERS. . . . Also, W. Thomas, Le Décasyllable roman et sa fortune en Europe (Travaux et mémoires de l'Univ. de Lille, n.s., 1, fasc. 4, 1904); M. Serretta, Endecasillabi crescenti . . . (1938); E. Pound, Lit. Essays (1954). R.A.S.

HENDIADYS (Gr. "one through two"). The use of two substantives or sometimes a substantive and attributive genitive or adjective, connected by a conjunction to express a single, complex idea: "chrono kai poliorkia" (by length of time and siege; i.e., "by a long siege"—Demosthenes 19.123); "we drink from cups and gold" (Virgil, Georgics 2.192); "nice and warm" (in place of "nicely warm"—Fowler, Modern Eng. Usage). Sometimes h. is confused with simple parallelism, in which the substantives are equivalent: "might and main." Some grammarians argue the term is merely descriptive; others claim no such figure exists. E. A. Hahn contends the term "h." is a misnomer when applied to Virgil; that is, when Virgil chose to write as if he had two ideas,

"he really did have two." Hence a phrase, "membris et mole valens," really contains two intentionally distinct ideas, "membris valens" and "mole valens," though it is usually translated simply "strong limbs." H. is found at all periods, usually for purposes of increased emphasis:

The heaviness and guilt within my bosom
Takes off my manhood.

(Shakespeare, Cymbeline 5.2.1-2)

E. A. Hahn, "H.: Is there Such a Thing?" CW, 15 (1921-22). R.O.E.

HEPHTHEMIMERAL. See CAESURA.

HEPTAMETER. A line of 7 feet, metrically identical with the septenary (q.v.) and the fourteener. The meter exists in classical Gr. and L. prosody (chiefly in comic verse in the latter), and has great importance in Eng. prosody. It flourished in the narrative poetry of the Elizabethans, who coined for it the term fourteener, but later appearances of the heptameter line, printed as such, are infrequent. Wordsworth's The Norman Boy, E. B. Browning's Cowper's Grave, and Whittier's Massachusetts to Virginia are instances of post-Elizabethan h. On the whole, however, it has proved unsuitable for the long and elevated verse narrative because of its tendency toward monotony, but Chapman's translation of the Iliad, and Coleridge's Rime of the Ancient Mariner are notable exceptions. When divided into two parts, the h. becomes the familiar ballad meter (q.v.) or common measure (C.M. of the hymnbooks) of alternating 4- and 3-stress lines.—G. Stewart, The Technique of Eng. Verse (1930); J. Thompson, The Foundation of Eng. Metre (1961). A.P.

HEPTASTICH. A group or stanza of 7 lines.

HEPTASYLLABIC. A line or colon of 7 syllables.

HERESY OF PARAPHRASE. This term (or, occasionally, "periphrastic heresy") was introduced and its concept discussed, by Cleanth Brooks, in The Well Wrought Urn (1947), pp. 176-238. It means "the erroneous opinion that a poem is paraphrasable." If "paraphrase" means "say the same thing in other words," then a poem cannot, Brooks holds, be paraphrased. For it has a dramatic, not a logical structure; or, as he sometimes says, it is a structure of attitudes or (following R. P. Blackmur) of "gestures." It is not a statement, but (following Kenneth Burke) a symbolic action; and (following W. M. Urban) its form is inseparable from its content. It may contain statements among its elements; but they are not its essence, have no primacy over other elements, but are organically related to them. Though they can be paraphrased, the paraphrase "is not the real core of meaning which constitutes the essence of the poem" (p. 180); and they are to be judged not by their truth, but by their dramatic propriety. In other words, Brooks (following I. A. Richards) distinguishes between scientific discourse, which can be paraphrased, and poetic, which cannot. But unlike Richards he believes that, though what a poem says is otherwise ineffable, it does say something—that poetry is not emotive, or emotive alone, but cognitive. Poetry is didactic; it contains wisdom. But it does not state its wisdom; it enacts it. And "A poem . . . is to be judged, not by the truth or falsity as such, of the idea [the wisdom] which it incorporates, but rather by its character as drama—by its coherence, sensitivity, depth, richness, and toughmindedness" (p. 229).

In the communion of the faithful, Brooks counts (in addition to Blackmur, Burke, Urban, and Richards) René Wellek and Susanne K. Langer; among the heretics, Yvor Winters, Donald A. Stauffer, Herbert J. Muller, Frederick A. Pottle, and John Crowe Ransom. For a more recent use of the term, and a comprehensive discussion of the issues that are the context of the term, see M. Krieger, The New Apologists for Poetry (1956). M.S.

HERMETICISM. Derived from Hermes Trismegistus, reputed author of several works on symbolism and the occult. The term refers generally to poetry using occult symbolism (see PLATONISM AND POETRY), and in particular to a phase or "school" of early and mid-20th-c. poetry having a direct line of descent from the poetry and theories of Novalis and Poe as modified in the works of such Fr. symbolists as Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Rimbaud, and Valéry. Notwithstanding the international flavor of the term, which is often associated with the works of such seemingly divergent writers as Verhaeren, Jammes, Maeterlinck, Claudel, Apollinaire, Gide, Proust, Ibsen, Hauptmann, Strindberg, and Yeats, its denotation of a specific phase of recent poetry has peculiarly It. roots. It was first fully defined in 1936 by Francesco Flora in his study La poesia ermetica which traces its primary sources to Baudelaire, Mallarmé, and especially Valéry, and singles out Giuseppe Ungaretti as the chief It. exponent.

The generally recognized It. pioneer of such poetry was Arturo Onofri (1885–1928) who had been strongly influenced by the theosophy of Rudolph Steiner as well as by the works and theories of the Fr. decadents and their concept of "pure poetry." Following the clash between advanced guard ideas and reactionary tendencies that took place in It. literary and artistic circles in the second decade of this century Onofri emerged as the foremost exponent of a "new" poetic which has been alluded to as "a sort of literary asceticism" or "aesthetic mysticism." It was in part an attempt to arrive at "naked poetry" by concentrating all the lyrical potential in the individual word deprived of its decorative or logical elements. The new emphasis was to be on the musical suggestiveness and alliterative powers of the word rather than on its meaning. Similarly what was to matter most in the poem as a whole was the magical interplay between sound and silences, between moments of "illumination" and moments of "white blankness," rather than the balanced structure of verses and stanzas. Poetry was to be a sort of "intellectualized music" in which narrative and logical elements played no part. The poet's inspiration might encompass an instant (atomism) or longer periods of sustained intuition. This attempt to "render sensible the world of the supersensible" led quite naturally to the use of highly subjective language, experiences and complex devices (analogy), whence the sense of obscurity usually associated with the movement. The term "hermetic poetry" thus moved beyond Flora's definition of a poetry on the borderline of music (Hermes) to a poetry implying conscious obscurity and enigma. In time, however, the movement acquired a more sober perspective as a result of a return to such classical poets as Leopardi and Petrarch, and of the influence of such foreign poets as García Lorca, Paul Éluard, and T. S. Eliot. The outstanding poets of this latter phase have been Giuseppe Ungaretti (in his later works), Eugenio Montale, and Salvatore Quasimodo.—A. Onofri, Il nuovo Rinascimento e l'arte dell' Io (1925); A. Gargiulo, Letteratura italiana del novecento (1940); V. Rossi, Storia della lett. it. (1946); E. Williamson, "Contemp. It. Poetry," Poetry, 79 (1951–52); O. Ragusa, "Fr. Symbolism in Italy," RR, 46 (1955); V. Orsini, Ermetismo (1956). A.S.B.

HEROIC COUPLET (also riding rhyme, rhymed decasyllables, rhymed 5-beat lines, etc.). Iambic pentameter lines rhymed in pairs; one of the most important meters of Eng. syllabic verse; origin unknown. The Eng. form is often thought to have developed with Chaucer under influence from the Old Fr. decasyllable rhymed in couplets: e.g., "A toy, Henry, dous amis, me complain, / Pour ce que ne cueur ne mont ne plein . . ." (Machault, Complainte écrite après la bataille de Poitiers et avant le seige de Reims par les Anglais, 1356–58). Chaucer's Compleynte to Pitee was probably written before his It. journey, 1372-73; hence Fr. influence seems prior to It. However, ten Brink has shown that Chaucer's heroic verse, of which there are some 16,000 lines, differs from the Fr. in almost all respects in which the It. does, and Skeat and Lewis have also expressed some reservations about Fr. influence.

Moreover, it now seems Eng. syllabic verse developed naturally from a disintegration of the old alliterative meters (J. P. Oakden, Alliterative Poetry in Middle Eng., 1930), with doubtless some encouragement from Fr. forms. Accordingly couplets may have arisen as the natural result of a strong native tradition. In any case, couplet rhymes, showing little if any continental influence, appear very early in verses of uneven length: "Castelas he let wyrcean./ And earne men swithe swencean. // Se cyng waes swa swithe stearc,/ And be nam of his undertheoddan manig marc . . ." (Rime of King William in Anglo-Saxon Chronicle). For development of an octosyllabic couplet, such verses would need only slight regularization, and the decasyllabic couplet would seem to be a natural extension. Moreover, as Saintsbury points out, sporadic heroic couplets occur fairly frequently in pre-Chaucerian poetry, concealed in stanzas. But credit for development of the form as a medium for sustained expression belongs to Chaucer.

Although Neo-Chaucerians of the 15th c. did not abandon the h.c. (e.g. Henryson, Orpheus and Eurydice), they showed distinct preference for stanzaic verse. In the 16th c. there was a steady increase in its use for occasional, reflective, critical, complimentary, and topical verse, the form reaching a high state of development by 1557 (Nicholas Grimald in Tottel's Miscellany). Some scholars distinguish between two distinct varieties of h.c., though the differences may be essentially chronological. The first is the Chaucerian type used by Marlowe and Spenser, the latter making it a suitable medium for satire (Mother Hubbard's Tale). The other has come to be known as the classical variety, of which Jonson is the most important source: "To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name, / Am I thus ample to thy book and fame . . ." (To the memory of my beloved the author, Mr. William Shakespeare, and what he hath left us). Both types exhibited medial pause, balance, antithesis, crisp diction, parallel construction, contrasted clauses, inversions, etc., but the classical type is supposed to have differed somewhat from the Chaucerian in that thought tended to become more, and narrative less important. Sandys, Hall, Drayton, Fletcher, Beaumont, Fairfax, Donne, Waller, Denham, Oldham all made extensive use of the form before Dryden brought it to near perfection.

In the great dramatic verse of the Elizabethan period the h.c. is used sporadically. It is employed sparingly in Shakespeare, in pastoral drama (e.g. Peele's Arraignement of Paris), and it often appears as a device for metrical variation, a commonplace means of terminating blank-verse speeches, and, less frequently, as a link between speeches. D'Avenant and Etheredge made use of the form after the Restoration, and Dryden made it the principal medium for dramatic verse (Tyrannick Love, Aureng-Zebe, etc.). The critical controversy over rhyme during this period concerns mainly the use of the h.c. as opposed to blank verse, for tragedy: Dryden allows Lisideius to argue, in the Essay of Dramatic Poesy, that he prefers rhyme to the Eng. "way of writing in tragedies . . . in blank verse." To Dryden also belongs credit for making the h.c. the principal nondramatic, neoclassical meter; he became a master of the epigrammatic quality now especially associated with the period: "During his office, treason was no crime; / The sons of Belial had a glorious time . . ." (Absalom and Achitophel, 597-98). Pope brought this quality to an even higher state of perfection, paying special attention to the use of anticlimax: "Here thou great Anna! Whom three realms obey, / Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea. . . ." (Rape of the Lock 3.7-8). Johnson, Goldsmith, Crabbe, Cowper, Byron, Hunt, Keats, Shelley, Browning, Swinburne, and Morris all made notable use of the h.c., though the form began to decline in prominence early in the romantic period.

Many variations of the h.c. are possible, particularly as the caesura is shifted; indeed, excepting the rhyme requirement, the form is nearly as flexible as blank verse (e.g. Browning's My Last Duchess). The simplest, formal separation into types is into (1) closed couplets, those in which a semi- or full stop is employed at the end of the second rhyme, and (2) open couplets, in which the thought continues from the second rhyme into the following line. Similar couplets occur in most European languages, excepting Sp. which makes little use of the decasyllable, but the term h.c. is usually reserved for the Eng. meter.

C. M. Lewis, The Foreign Sources of Modern Eng. Versification (1898); F. E. Schelling, "Ben Jonson and the Cl. School," PMLA, 13 (1898); B. ten Brink, The Lang. and Metre of Chaucer (1901); R. M. Alden, Eng. Verse (1903); Saintsbury, Prosody; J. S. P. Tatlock, "The Origin of the Closed C. in Eng.," The Nation, 98 (April 9, 1914), 390; E. C. Knowlton, "The Origin of the Closed C. in Eng.," The Nation, 99 (July 30, 1914), 134; R. C. Wallerstein, "The Development of the Rhetoric and Metre of the H.C., esp. in 1625-1645," PMLA, 50 (1935); W. C. Brown, The Triumph of Form (1948).

R.O.E.

HEXAMETER

HEROIC PLAY. Modern critics have applied the term "h.p." to a Restoration fashion in tragedy. It was an exploitation of the epic mode of heightened admiration of heroism. It gave up blank verse for the rhymed couplet, which was suited to declamation on the stage. Its rhetoric was extravagant, and its concept of tragedy erroneous. We have Dryden's word for it that it was based on the work of Sir William Davenant, whose The Siege of Rhodes (1656) and The Cruelty of the Spaniards in Peru (1658) were much admired. With Davenant came magnificence in staging and the presence of an operatic element. Sir Robert Howard's The Indian Queen and its sequel by Dryden, The Indian Emperor, set the fashion, and Dryden's Conquest of Granada is perhaps the finest example. Two things perhaps served to bring this "highfalutin" drama down to earth. One was the famous burlesque, The Rehearsal, by the Duke of Buckingham and his collaborators, and the other was the superior tragic genius of Thomas Otway.—B. J. Pendlebury, Dryden's H. Plays (1923); A. Nicoll, A Hist. of Restoration Drama, 1660–1700 (1928); C. V. Deane, Dramatic Theory and the H.P. (1931); A. Hist. of Eng. Lit., ed. H. Craig (1950); T. J. Fujimura, "The Appeal of Dryden's H. Plays," PMLA, 75 (1960). H.C.

HEROIC POETRY. See EPIC; NARRATIVE POETRY. HEROIC METER or line. The meter characteristic of heroic poetry, e.g., the dactylic hexameter in Gr. and L.; the iambic pentameter (5-stress line, unrhymed as in blank verse or rhymed in pairs as in the heroic couplet) in Eng.; the alexandrine in Fr.; and the hendecasyllable in It. HEROIC QUATRAIN or stanza. The iambic pentameter quatrain, rhymed abab. HEROIC SIMILE. See SIMILE.

HEXAMETER (6-measure), refers to the classical 6-foot catalectic dactylic line whose scheme is

— 1 — 2 — 3 — 4 — 5 — 6 —

Foot 5 may be a spondee, in which case the line is called "spondaic." The last syllable in the line may be long or short and is called syllaba anceps. The caesura, or major pause, may occur within foot 3 (penthemimeral, i.e., after 5 half-feet), 4 (hephthemimeral), or 2 (trihemimeral); a line may have as many as 2 minor pauses. Diaeresis (coincidence of word and foot endings), e.g.

kūmātā lēipēi

is fairly common in foot 5. Homer tends to avoid it in foot 4 (bucolic diaeresis, q.v.) and more particularly in a foot-4 spondee or foot-3 dactyl. The L. h. is in general less flexible than the Gr.; it avoids the foot-3 "feminine" caesura (—|—), which is frequent in Homer. Coincidence of metrical and word accents is common in Lucretius, avoided in Virgil. The use of a foot-5 spondee became a feature of Alexandrian verse and was imitated by the Romans, often as a mere fashionable trick, e.g., Cicero's parody (Atticus 7.2.1):

fāuit āb Ēpīro lenissimū Onchesmītes.

The h. in antiquity is used in lyric, gnomic, elegiac, philosophical, and satirical poetry but is primarily the meter of epic, e.g., Iliad, Odyssey, Aeneid, Pharsalia. It is also the meter of the "epyllion," an epic-style short poem (ca. 300–500 lines), e.g., Ciris, Catullus 64. It is to classical poetry what the alexandrine is to Fr., the iambic pentameter to Eng. poetry. During the early Middle Ages (4th–6th c.) Christian epics were produced in dactylic h. by, e.g., Juvenus, Sedulius, Arator, and Avitus. The quantitative L. h. continued to be used during the Middle Ages (e.g., John of Salisbury's Entheticus), despite the growing preponderance of syllabic, stress-accentual (see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES), and rhymed verses (including especially the leonine), and during the Renaissance, despite the new vernacular-language verse forms.

In the certame coronario of 1441, L. B. Alberti and Leonardo Dati introduced experimental esametri italiani. In the next century Claudio Tolomei, followed by other poets, experimented with the re-creation of quantitative h. verse.

Richard Burgi, studying early Slavic literature, suggests on the basis of his observations that this literature "produced the first verse rendering of Homer in a non-classical language." Early in the 16th c. Maksim the Gr. made the first attempt in Rus. at a quantitative prosody based on an artificial and arbitrary classification of long and short vowels (Maksimovskaja prosodija). According to Burgi the year 1704 "marks the first appearance in print of the standard accentual prosody of classical Russian verse"—a pair of rhymed hexameters in syllabic verse. Accentual hexameters were revived in Russia toward the end of the 18th c. The translation of the Iliad into Rus. h. by N. Gnedič is considered one of the great achievements of Rus. literature; it was greatly admired by Pushkin, who himself wrote much h. verse. V. Brjusov, one of the Rus. symbolists, translated the Aeneid and I. Račinskij, a philologist, all of Lucretius in hexameters.

When Andreas Arvidi's Det Svenska Poeteri, the first Swedish Ars Poetica, was published in 1651, the knittelvers (doggerel) was being displaced in ballads and chronicles by both the h. and the alexandrine. George Stiernhielm's monumental Hercules (1658) was composed in hexameters. Other important h. poems in Swedish include Thomas Thorild's Passionerna (1781) and Johan Ludvig Runeberg's Julkvällen (1841). Eventually the alexandrine displaced the h. in Swedish poetry.

Notable hexameters in German literature include F. G. Klopstock's Der Messias (1748-73), J. H. Voss's Homer and Luise, and Goethe's Reineke Fuchs and Hermann und Dorothea (a "pastoral epic"—1798).

The h. is, at best, merely incidental to the traditions of Fr. and Sp. poetry (see CLASSICAL METERS . . .). Nicaragua's Rubén Darío (1867-1916) composed his Salutación del optimista in h. verses varying between 13 and 18 syllables, with most verses consisting of heptasyllabic and decasyllabic hemistichs; the verses are marked by many dactylic clausulae, common in Gr. lyric poetry but alien to epic.

Eng. poets since the 16th c. have been perennially ambitious in hexametrical endeavors, both accentual and syllabic, but particularly so in the 19th c. (see CLASSICAL METERS . . .). One of the earliest (16th c.) examples is Thomas Watson's "All travellers do gladly report great praise of Ulysses, / For that he knew many men's manners and saw many cities"—less wretched, perhaps, than Sidney's hexameters, e.g.

Oppress with ruinous conceits by the help of an outcry

Spenser had seen the root of the problem (viz., stress-accent vs. quantitative accent) when he suggested that we retain normal accents for speech but quantitative accents in prosody. This was the problem faced by Southey, Kingsley, Coleridge, Longfellow, Clough, Tennyson, and Swinburne. Robert Bridges' syllabic hexameter is trying, e.g. for

T̄bant obscuri sola sub noctē per umbrām

he has

They' wer' amid the shadows by night in loneliness obscure.

C. Day Lewis' translation of the Aeneid (1956) is a stress-accentual h. version with lines varying from 12 (alexandrine) to 17 (full Latin-h.) syllables.

Of Scandinavian languages Danish and Swedish are particularly apt for h. verse. In the former, Sophus Claussen's poem Atomernes Oprør (1925) is noteworthy; in the latter, Georg Stiernhielm's epic Hercules (publ. 1658) and, in the 19th c., Esaias Tegnér's Fritiof'tager arv . . . stand out. H. poetry became also somewhat popular in Icelandic literature during the 19th c., according to S. Einarsson, who notes that Steingrímur Torsteinsson's mock-heroic Redd-Hanne-sarríma (first ed. in 1925) marked the initial use of the h. for a reasonably long narrative poem. Torsteinsson was followed by his contemporaries, Benedikt Gröndal and Matthias Jochumsson, who wrote shorter mock-heroic h. poems.

For bibliography, see CLASSICAL METERS IN MODERN LANGUAGES. Also, R. Bridges, Ibant Obscuri (1916); H. G. Atkins, A Hist. of German Versification (1923); A. Izzo, "L'esametro neo-classico italiano," R. Accad. . . . dei Lincei. Rendiconti, 7 (1932), fasc. 6; J. S. Molina, Los hexámetros castellanos y en particular los de Rubén Darío (1935); G. L. Hendrickson, "Elizabethan Quantitative Hexameters," PQ, 28 (1949); G. Highet, The Cl. Tradition (1949); C. G. Cooper, An Introd. to the L. H. (1952); S. Einarsson, "H. in Icelandic Lit.," MLN, 68 (1953); Koster; R. Burgi, A Hist. of the Rus. H. (1954); Navarro; A. Gustafson, A Hist. of Swedish Lit. (1961).

R.A.S.

HEXASTICH. See SEXAIN.

HIATUS. (a) A gap which destroys the completeness of a sentence or verse: "A Dunce-Monk, being [about] to make his epitaph . . . left the Verse thus gaping, Hic sunt in fossa Bedae—ossa, till he had consulted with his Pillow to fill up the Hiatus" (Fuller, The Church—History of Britain, II, iii). (b) Grammar and prosody: a break between two vowels coming together without an intervening consonant in successive words or syllables to prevent vowel clash, where neither aphaeresis, crasis, nor elision (qq.v.) is operative. In Eng. the indefinite article may be altered by addition of a nasal to prevent hiatus: an action. Elision to avoid h. is permissible (R. Bridges, Milton's Prosody, 1921). In the classical languages (see CLASSICAL PROSODY) h. is common in Gr. epic poetry, rarer in L. In languages in which number of syllables is an important aspect of verse, like Fr., an understanding of h. is essential both for scansion and for writing verse. In Fr. h. was generally permissible until (at least) the 14th c.; there is no elision to prevent h. in Saint Alexis (about 1040), but in Froissart (ca. 1337-ca. 1410) there are 132 cases of elision against 5 of h. (G. Lote, Hist. du vers français, III, 87). The two phenomena may be observed, with the same words in Chanson de Roland: "Jo i ferai de Durendal m'espee" (v. 1462)—h.; "Jo i puis aler, mais n'i avrai guarant" (v. 329)—elision. In Sp., It., and Portuguese, h. is usually eliminated by contraction.

R.O.E.

HINDI POETRY. See INDIAN POETRY.

HISTORY AND POETRY. These two disciplines are usually distinguished in terms of poetry as fiction and hist. as fact. This distinction governs the crucial ch. 9 of the Poetics (see below), where Aristotle sees poetry tending toward fiction as its proper form: poetry refers to a possible and hist. to an actual order of things. In the scholia on Dionysius Thrax (ed. Hilgard, p. 449) hist. is contrasted with the fictitious but possible and the strange or impossible. This pattern of differentiation, the basis of differentiation among literary forms in Roman antiquity (Cicero, De inventione [rhetorica] 1.19.27, Quintilian 2.4.2), was preserved by L. grammarians (ed. Halm, pp. 202, 486, 552) and in standard reference works of the Middle Ages (Isidore's Etymologiae 1.44, Vincent of Beauvais' Speculum doctrinale 3.127). To Dante poetry is simply "fictio rethorica" (De vulgari eloquentia 2.4), and the sense of poetry as a structure of new things—utterly new, "inauditas inventiones," says Boccaccio, Genealogia deorum gentilium 14.7—is assimilated into Renaissance poetics (Sidney, Apology; Bacon, Advancement 2.4; Jonson, "What Is a Poet?" in Timber) and becomes a foundation of the modern conception of poets as "Creators, such as raise admirable Frames and Fabricks out of nothing" (W. Temple, Of Poetry; cf. Macrobius, Saturnalia 5.1-2). Truth was expected under the cover of fiction: Dante defines the Comedy as a treatise in moral philosophy (Epistle to Can Grande 9, 16); Sidney classifies the poet as "the right popular philosopher." But in medieval as in later criticism it is the fictional mode of treatment (fictivus) which produces the poetry, the fictional sometimes remaining the only distinguishing element, "the forme and Soule of any Poetical worke" (Jonson).

The contrast between hist. as fact and poetry as a discipline transcending fact, a contrast based on the Poetics 9, survived into the 19th c. (Wordsworth, 1800 Preface; Newman, Poetry). But it has been largely replaced by the contrast between science and poetry (I. A. Richards, Science and Poetry, ch. 6; cf. Coleridge, Biographia Literaria, ch. 14). In both types of contrast since the romantic period, and in recent definitions of poetry as pseudo-statement (Richards) or mythopoeic (H. Read, Collected Essays, p. 102), some traditional sense of poetry as fiction remains. But the term fiction has been increasingly applied to prose narrative, and in popular usage today fiction is synonymous with the novel, and poetry with some kind of knowledge beyond the reach of prose and in some special way involving a truthful rendering of emotion in a biographic or dramatic lyric—a sense anticipated by Wordsworth: "Poetry is passion: it is the history or science of feelings" (Note to The Thorn).

The association of poetry with hist. has been as persistent as the dissociation and occurs early and late in criticism. Ezra Pound's definition of his Cantos, "An epic is a poem including history" (Literary Essays, ed. Eliot, p. 86), is a rephrasing of an old conception that poetry is a record of useful and memorable things (Cicero, Pro Archia 10; Strabo 1.2), and has "something of the Historical in its Nature, and never shines more, than when it alludes to Characters and Things of past Times" (Welsted, Epistles, 1724, p. xlv). To Manzoni (Lettre à M. Chauvet) fiction is minimal and unessential: "tous les grands monumens de la poésie ont pour base des événemens donnés par l'histoire," the poet's function being to see data from the inside and give esthetic form to motives and emotions that hist. omits or reduces to an abstraction. Sometimes the fictional is radically undervalued: "an Irish peasant with a little whisky in his head will imagine and invent more than would furnish forth a modern poem" (Byron, Letters, ed. Prothero, v, 554), or opposed as falsehood to a positivistic sense of truth: "Who says that fictions onely and false hair Become a verse? Is there in truth no beautie?" (G. Herbert, Jordan). This serious conception of poetry as a representation of "cose veramente avvenute" (Muratori, Opere, 1769, ix, pt. 1, 78), which modern criticism developed against "the vulgar conceit of men, that Lying is Essential to good Poetry" (Cowley's Preface, Poems, 1656), is a refinement of an ancient conception of the poet as historian found in Lactantius (Divinae institutiones 1.11; repeated in Isidore's Etymologiae 8.7.10 and Vincent of Beauvais's Speculum doctrinale 3. 110). To invent everything, says Lactantius, "id est ineptum esse, et mendacem potius quam poetam." The conception of poetry as historical by nature and deriving value from historical reality (Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie 1.19, ranks it next to divine) is the corollary of a theory of poetic origins inherited from antiquity and summarized by Wordsworth: "The earliest poets of all nations generally wrote from passion excited by real events" (Appendix). Evanthius (ed. Kaibel, pp. 63-64) remarks that primitive poetry was historical, and Aristotle suggests as much in outlining the development of dramatic forms (Poetics 9.4-6). Early Christian apologists utilized the theory: poetic myths about the gods are distortions of human hist. (Lactantius, Divinae institutiones 1.15; Augustine, De civitate Dei 18.14), or corrupt versions of Old Testament hist. (Tertullian, Apologeticus 47.12-14; cf. Raleigh, Hist. of the World 1.6; T. Gale, Court of Gentiles, 1669, pt. 1, 275-398). The euhemeristic explanation was fully detailed by Vico in Della scoperta del vero Omero. He relies on Lactantius, and on the passage in Strabo 1.2.6 describing poetic discourse as anterior to prose, but develops his theory of the historical origins of poetry on two romantic assumptions: that the poetic process is by nature particularistic, distinct from the metaphysical; and that primitive man was naturally truthful, incapable of inventing, since he was controlled by a sensuous imagination and lacked the power of reflection. So Vico concludes that poetic myths at their birth were "narrazioni vere e severe" which later underwent many changes and descended to Homer in corrupt and incredible forms (Opere, ed. Nicolini, pp. 739-45, 749).

The association of poetry with hist. is sometimes complicated by the conception of poetry as philosophy in its origin and function—a conception which was already ancient in the time of Strabo (1.2.3), remembered in the Middle Ages ("Poetas philosophorum cunas esse, celebre est," John of Salisbury, Metalogicon 1.22), and a commonplace in modern criticism where it is often thought to have the support of the Poetics 9.3 (see below). Modern poetic theory has developed confusedly along two main lines marked out in antiquity—one toward conceiving the poem as a structure of particulars historical or invented (e.g., Vico; cf. Plato, Republic 10, who discredits poetry as phantasmal imitation of appearances), and the other toward the poem as a structure of true universals ("La Poesia non è altro che una prima filosofia," Giraldis Cinthio, in Lettere, ed. Poracchi, 1565; cf. Maximus Tyrius, Dissertationes 4, Teubner ed.). Attempts to reconcile the two directions—notably in Agnolo Segni (see Bibliog. below), Sidney, Butcher on the Poetics (4th ed., pp. 191-92)—have issued in the conception of poetry as an organization of concrete universals. To Sidney it is a perfect organization ethically informed, mediating between the particularistic and the abstract which in Plato stand in absolute opposition: hist. and philosophy, says Sidney, "do both halt," for one lacks a general principle of conduct and the other the example; but poetry "coupleth the general notion with the particular example" and so performs its ethical function perfectly. An important source of poetry conceived as a concrete universal is the celebrated passage in the Poetics 9.3: "poetry is something more philosophic and of graver import than history, since its statements are of the nature rather of universals, whereas those of history are singulars" (Bywater's tr.). This passage has often been read as an equation of poetry and philosophy, the poet sharing in "the philosopher's quest for ultimate truth" (Atkins, Literary Criticism in Antiquity, 1.80; cf. Butcher, pp. 164, 168, 184); or misread in favor of the preeminence of poetry as knowledge: "Aristotle, I have been told, has said, that Poetry is the most philosophic of all writing" (Wordsworth, 1800 Preface). But it is very doubtful that Aristotle means to say universals should be philosophically valid to satisfy the requisite of poetic art, which is giving a pleasure peculiar to it. His theory runs in a contrary direction, made clear at 24.18-19, 25.4-8, 26-31, that poetry is not restricted to true statements. From ch. 25 emerges the large proposition, empirically derived from the successful practice of poets, that what may enter poetry is not only the ideal (what ought to be) and the actual (and therefore the probable or possible), but also the impossible, the false, and matters of mere opinion. The passage at 9.3 is perhaps to be understood in terms of the general sense of the Poetics that poetry is essentially fiction: the philosophical bent of poetry—and the passage clearly indicates no more than this—is inside a fictional structure which derives no special value from it.

Gr. tragic poets had traditionally exploited material accepted as historical, and at 9.4-8 Aristotle raises the question of the relative value of fiction and hist. only to dismiss it: there are wholly fictitious tragedies, "e.g. Agathon's Antheus, in which both incidents and names are of the poet's invention; and it is no less delightful on that account." The definition of tragedy as hist. was current in Hellenistic times (perhaps it was current in Aristotle's time, see Tragedy and Hist., Bibliog. below), and as found in ancient grammarians (ed. Hilgard, p. 307; ed. Kaibel, pp. 17, 58, 66, 67, 72) the definition involves a stated or implied contrast with comedy: tragedy is a hist. of disasters which happened to heroic figures of a remote past, comedy is a fiction about private persons in everyday life. This distinction was preserved during the Middle Ages (Isidore, Etymologiae 8.7.6; Vincent of Beauvais, Speculum doctrinale 3.110) with, however, only a shadowy sense of its dramatic import, Dante, e.g., applying it to kinds of narrative (Epistle to Can Grande 10; but see Mussato below). It. Renaissance criticism inherited this distinction, sometimes expanding it to include the epic as hist., and made it an important issue in discussions of verisimilitude, catharsis, and ethical function (see Historical Realism, Bibliog. below). The question of the relative merit of fiction and hist. in serious poetry aroused a bitter controversy (Giraldis Cinthio, Castelvetro, Tasso, Piccolomini) the echoes of which are still heard in Lessing (Hamburgische Dramaturgie) and as late as Manzoni's essay (see above).

The controversy is reflected in Sidney: "and do they not know that a Tragedy is tied to the laws of Poesy, and not of History?" During the Eng. Renaissance the ethical and political value of hist. informs popular literature (Mirror for Magistrates, 1559), the drama (over 150 plays are based on Eng. hist.; Schelling, Eng. Chronicle Play), and apologies for the stage (Lodge, Nash, T. Heywood). The definition of tragedy as hist. was familiar enough to force Prynne into a particular attack on "reall tragicall Histories" (Histrion-Mastix, 1633, pp. 789, 940-41). But Eng. criticism generally followed Bacon (Advancement 2.4.2): poetry should correct hist., which is little else than a sorry record of man's injustices, and followed Dryden (Pref., Troilus and Cressida): the tragic plot need not be historical, but only probable, "probable being that which succeeds, or happens, oftner than it misses." The doctrine that poetry is generically fiction, and that epic or tragedy is no exception to it, did not seriously affect practice. Even Giraldis, who followed Aristotle and wrote the wholly fictitious Orbecche after the example of Agathon's Antheus, turned to hist. and legendary hist. in his other tragedies. Jonson summarizes the doctrine: "Poets never credit gain'd / By writing truths, but things, like truth, well feigned" (2nd Prol., Silent Woman); yet for his tragic plots he sought the authority of hist. Hist., in fact, is the source of the conception of the earliest regular and secular tragedies in the vernacular: Trissino's Sofonisba (ca. 1513) drawn from Livy, Jodelle's Cléopâtre (ca. 1552) from Plutarch, Ferreira's Inez de Castro (ca. 1558) from Portuguese chronicles, Sackville and Norton's Gorboduc (1562) from Geoffrey of Monmouth. But the conception runs back to Dante's contemporary Mussato, whose Eccerinis based on the career of the ferocious tyrant Ezzelino III, is the first indication of tragedy in the classical sense of hist. in dramatic structure (cf. Mussato's Epistola 1, and Dazzi's comments, Giornale storico della letteratura italiana, 1921). From Mussato to Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral there is a continuous tradition of secular hist. in drama serving ethical, political, social, or nationalistic ends. Hist. furnished material for a large body of narrative poetry—classical epic, romantic epic, chanson de geste, ballad—from Homer to Pound's Cantos. The epic in practice is often associated with authentic hist. as its primary base—a practice honored by Dante who places Lucan among the great poets of antiquity (Inferno 4.88-89), and an association which may have influenced Milton to abandon an Arthurian legend when he found the historical authenticity of Arthur in question (Brinkley, Arthurian Legend, ch. 4). The practice in treatment of hist. varies; but in general poets have "altered and transposed and invented incidents" to suit purpose and design (MacLeish, Note to Conquistador). The most significant innovation in treatment and material is in Pound's Cantos, which introduce economic and monetary hist. in poetry after the example of Dante and exploit the subject for educative ends, even to the extent of including precise bibliographical information: "mentions distributive justice, Dante does, in Convivio / Four, eleven" (Canto 93).

In every age poetry has gravitated toward hist., and historiography toward poetic fiction, as in a type of Hellenistic hist. imitating tragedy (a type castigated by Polybius, Plutarch, Lucian; see Hist. and Tragedy, Bibliog. below), medieval rhyming chronicles, and modern histories that read like fictions (e.g., C. Bowen's John Adams). The historian Duris, censured by Plutarch, defines this type in Aristotelian terms of mimesis and pleasure (Jacoby, Fragmente der Griechischen Historiker, pt. 2A, 138), though Aristotle nowhere suggests poetic norms for historiography. The question implicit in Duris, whether hist. is an art or a science, has often been discussed since the romantic period (see Poetry of Hist., Bibliog. below; Bury, G. M. Trevelyan, Croce) and sometimes resolved by conceiving hist. as meditating between art and science (T. M. Greene, Yale Review, 1944). In Aristotelian terms the question is not momentous: Aristotle's distinction, art is concerned with making and science with knowing by principle and system (Ethics 6.3-4) suggests that the discipline of hist. is under science, and that problems of historiography are only incidentally problems of art and essentially problems of cognition. It is extravagant to claim that hist. as science "cannot ever exist" because of difficulties in determining principles of causation and the like (Trevelyan, Clio, a Muse, 1931, p. 143). The difficulties, which are after all comparable to those in other sciences, merely indicate more subtle instruments for the systematic cognition of "dead documents," so called by the Crocean school.

Trevelyan (Clio, pp. 155-56) advises the literary scholar to soak himself in social and political hist. The wealth of historical poetry in every age, the relevance of topical information to the study of satire, the pervasive sense of hist. in modern poetry (e.g., Eliot's Waste Land) make the advice generally sound. The historical method (Morize, Problems and Methods in Literary Hist., 1922) has been attacked for raking up data irrelevant to literary value (see issues debated in Crane, "Hist. and Poetry," EJ, 1933; Cunningham, "Ancient Quarrel between Hist. and Poetry," Poetry, Sept. 1949; PMLA, Dec. and Feb., 1951; Bush et al., KR, 1950-1). But the method itself has obvious uses, among them "to divest ourselves of the limitations of our own age" (Eliot, On Poetry and Poets, p. 130); and needs no justification: it is a natural act of the understanding; and to justify it as an act of the evaluating intelligence (literary hist. has been renamed historical criticism) is to confuse its function, which is explanatory and preliminary to evaluation. In practice the historical method (which includes explication de texte closely connected with the New Criticism) is largely this, with evaluation merely implied or summary. See CRITICISM, TYPES OF; and La Drière, Bibliog. below.

B. Fioretti, Proginasmi poetici, v (1639), 10-60; W. Cloetta, Beiträge zur Literaturgesch. des Mittelalters und der Renaissance (1890-92); A. Benoist, "Théories dramatiques avant les discours de Corneille," Annales de la Faculté des Lettres de Bordeaux (1891), pp. 334-41; P. Scheller, De hellenistica historiae conscribendae arte (1911); A. Belloni, Il poema epico (1912), ch. 5, 6; R. C. Williams, "Purpose of Poetry," RR, 12 (1921) and "Two Studies in Epic Poetry," MP, 22 (1924); R. Bray, Tragedie cornélienne (1927), 34-55; A. P. McMahon, "Seven Questions on Aristotelian Definitions of Tragedy and Comedy," HSCP, 40 (1929); B. L. Ullman, "Hist. and Tragedy," Proc. of the Am. Philol. Assoc., 73 (1942); G. Giovannini, "Tragedy and Hist. in Ancient Crit.," PQ, 22 (1943), "Agnolo Segni and a Renaissance Definition of Poetry," MLQ, 6 (1945) and "Historical Realism and the Tragic Emotions in Ren. Crit.," PQ, 32 (1953); H. T. Swedenberg, Theory of the Epic in England (1944); E. Neff, Poetry of Hist. (1947), ch. 7, 8; J. V. Cunningham, Woe and Wonder (1951), ch. 3; C. M. Bowra, Heroic Poetry (1952), ch. 14; A. W. Gomme, Gr. Attitude to Poetry and Hist. (1954); J. C. La Drière, Directions in Contemp. Crit. (1955), 84-85, n.67; F. W. Walbank, "Hist. and Tragedy," Historia, 9 (1960); H. S. Hughes, Hist. as Art and Science (1964). c.g.

HISTORY PLAY. Any play based heavily on history may be termed "h.p." Since the distinction between myth, legend, and formal history is relatively late, Gr. tragedy and Christian mystery and miracle plays (qq.v.) could be called h.p. Usually, however, the term is applied to plays based on secular history and following it rather closely. The Persians by Aeschylus is the first h.p. in the formal sense and the only example of the genre surviving from Gr. drama. Roman critics had a formal term (fabula praetexta) for drama on historical subjects, but only one example, the Octavia, attributed to Seneca, has survived.

Renaissance dramatists frequently drew on both ancient and modern history, and several critics (e.g., Lodovico Castelvetro) argued that tragedy should always be based on historical events, if only to make the stage action more convincing. The achievements of Eng. dramatists in the form are so preeminent that frequently the terms h.p. and chronicle play are used to refer simply to Eng. works of the late 16th and early 17th c. H.p. is somewhat more inclusive than chronicle play, the latter term being usually reserved for plays based on Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1577-87). The earliest Eng. plays on historical subjects are loose, didactic, tinged with morality-play influences, and range from Eng. history (Bale's King John), through legend (Sackville and Norton, Gorboduc), to ancient and oriental history (the anonymous The Wars of Cyrus, Preston's Cambises, Marlowe's Tamburlaine). A high level of excellence is reached in Marlowe's Edward II and maintained in such 17th-c. plays as Fletcher's Bonduca and Ford's Perkin Warbeck. The greatest h.p. are those by Shakespeare, which form a cycle beginning with Richard II and extending through Henry VIII.

H.p., usually on Roman subjects, continued to be written in Italy, France, and England throughout the 18th c., but the only writer to achieve genuine greatness in the form was Schiller (Wallenstein trilogy; Maria Stuart), and with Schiller we have already entered the romantic period. During the 19th and early 20th c. Dumas, Hugo, Pushkin, and Strindberg produced significant h.p. More recently, Claudel, T. S. Eliot, Maxwell Anderson, Robert Sherwood, and Arthur Miller have dramatized historical materials. If cinema is considered a form of drama, a plethora of examples of h.p. may be adduced to demonstrate that the public is just as eager today for dramatic re-creations of historical events as it was during the age of Shakespeare, and no more critical.

F. E. Schelling, The Eng. Chronicle Play (1902); Marlowe's Edward II, ed. W. D. Briggs (1914; see long introd.); W. Farnham, The Medieval Heritage of Elizabethan Tragedy (1936); E.M.W. Tillyard, Shakespeare's H.P. (1946); L. B. Campbell, Shakespeare's "Histories" (1947); A. Nicoll, World Drama (1950); I. Ribner, The Eng. H.P. in the Age of Shakespeare (1957); T. F. Driver, The Sense of Hist. in Gr. and Shakespearean Drama (1960); M. M. Reese, The Cease of Majesty: A Study of Shakespeare's H.P. (1962).

HITTITE POETRY. The Hittites, who lived in Turkey in the second millennium B.C. and spoke an Indo-European language, have left a few poetical texts in the royal archives of their capital, Hattusa, modern Boghazkoy, 100 miles east of Ankara. The texts are written in cuneiform, a system of writing that the Hittites borrowed from Babylonia. It uses word signs and syllables; this causes the following difficulties for the reading of poetic texts: (1) clusters of two or more consonants at the beginning and end, and of three or more consonants in the interior of a word had to be broken up by the addition of mute vowels; (2) the Hittite reading of some word signs is still unknown (such words will be rendered by their Eng. equivalent in capitals).

The Indo-European Hittites superseded an earlier population who spoke an unrelated language, called Hattic by scholars and for the most part undeciphered. Among the Hattic texts used by the Hittites in the cult of the gods of the land, there are some that are written in stanzas of 3 to 5 verses which are separated by horizontal rules. In contrast to these Hattic poems, Hittite poetical texts are not written in separate verses but rather consecutively, like prose. The oldest example is a short song, contained in an historical text of the Old Kingdom (ca. 1700-1600 B.C.) and introduced by the words "Then he sings." Among texts of the New Kingdom (ca. 1400-1200 B.C.), some hymns and epics seem to be written in verse, e.g., a hymn to Istanu, the Sun God, which begins: "Istanui iskha-mi / handants hannesnas iskhas" (Oh Istanu, my lord! / Just lord of judgment).

From the epic literature of the New Kingdom we quote passages of The Song of Ulikummi. The first stanza of 4 verses, which was a prooemium of the type known from Homer, is mutilated; its last line reads: "dapiyas siunas attan Kumarbin iskhamihhi" (Of Kumarbi, father of all gods, I shall sing). The story itself begins in the fourth stanza:

11 man-tsa Kumarbis hattatar istantsani piran das nas-kan kiskhiyats sara hudak arais kessarats STAFF-an das padas-sas-ma-tsa SHOES liliwandus huwandus sarkwit

15 nas-kan Urkisats happirats arha iyannis nas ikunta luli-kan anda ar(a)s

11 When Kumarbi wisdom into (his) mind had taken,
from (his) chair he promptly rose,
into (his) hand a staff he took, upon his feet as shoes the swift winds he put;

15 from (his) town Urkis he set out,
and to a cool(?) pond(?) he came.

Although both the lines and the stanzas have different length, and although it is impossible to establish a meter, it is clear from the term "song" used in the original title of the epic as well as from the structure of the text that we are dealing with some sort of bound language. Occasional rhyme occurs (das in 11 and 13, perhaps aras in 16, if the a was pronounced; arais in 12 and iyannis in 15), but it is not systematically used throughout the text. The same is true of parallelism of the type known from the Bible: it is used occasionally, but is not an essential feature. Other devices of the epic style, like standing epithets, repetition of standard lines and of whole passages, are common.

H. Th. Bossert, "Gedicht und Reim im vorgriechischen Mittelmeergebiet," Geistige Arbeit, 5 (1938), no. 18, 7-10 (poetic texts in Hittite and other Mediterranean languages, with special emphasis on rhyme) and "Zur Entstehung des Reimes," Jahrbuch für Kleinasiatische Forschung, 2 (1951-53), 233f. (see also Mitteilungen des Instituts für Orientalforschung, 2 [Berlin Academy, 1954], 97f.).—TEXTS discussed here and by Bossert: H. G. Güterbock, Keilschrifturkunden aus Boghazköi, 28 (1935) nos. 10-49 (cuneiform Hattic text; p. iv on stanzas); B. Hrozný, Archiv Orientální, 1 (1929) 297 (Old Kingdom song); E. Tenner, "Zwei hethitische Sonnenlieder," Kleinasiatische Forschungen, 1 (1930), 387-92 (text and tr. of Sun hymns, analyzed by Bossert, loc. cit.); H. G. Güterbock, Jour. of the Am. Oriental Society, 78 (1958), 239 (text and tr. of Sun hymn quoted here) and "The Song of Ulikummi," Jour. of Cuneiform Studies, 5 (1951), 135-61, 6 (1952), 8-42 (text and tr., metrically arranged, of the epic; pp. 141-44 on form).—See also I. McNeill, "The Metre of the Hittite Epic," Anatolian Studies, 13 (1963), 237-42.—GENERAL: O. R. Gurney, The Hittites (2d ed., 1954).

H.G.G.

HOKKU. See HAIKU; JAPANESE POETRY.

HOMOEOMERAL (Gr. "having like parts"). In prosody the term means portions which are metrically the same, e.g., strophe and antistrophe (qq.v.), or the repetition of the same stanzaic form.—Kolář.

R.A.H.

HOMOEOTELEUTON (Gr. "similarity of endings"). This stylistic term, which first occurs in Aristotle, Rhetoric 3.9.9, is particularly apt with respect to inflected languages like Gr. and L. in that it describes similar case-endings in proximity, whether in prose or verse, e.g., in Naevius' Saturnian: "bicipores Gigantes || magnique Atlantes." When h. of more than one syllable occurs at the end of two or more lines in succession, it becomes rhyme, e.g., Cicero can end three consecutive hexameters with monebant, ferebant, and iuebant. Rhyme, because of the heavier case-endings of L., is more common in that language than in Gr. It is generally agreed that h. and rhyme in quantitative meters were intentional, whether the effect was similar or not to that achieved by their use in the accentual verse of later L. and of modern languages. See also RHYME, HISTORY OF.—J. Marouzeau, Traité de stylistique latine (2d ed., 1946); J. Cousin, Bibliographie de la langue latine, 1880-1948 (1951); N. I. Herescu, La poésie latine (1960).

R.J.G.

HORATIAN ODE. See ODE.

HOVERING ACCENT. A term suggestive of the effect of slowness and rhetorical weight produced by the spondaic foot (q.v.) or by a quasi-spondaic foot consisting of 1 primary stressed syllable and 1 secondary stressed syllable. In the iambic pentameter line

[×]Unfriend | [×]ly [×]lamp | [×]light [×]hid | [×]under | [×]its [×]shade, |
 (Yeats, After Long Silence 3)

the third foot may be described as consisting of a hovering accent.—Brooks and Warren. P.F.

HRYNHENT. A variety of skaldic meter consisting of an 8-line stanza, and otherwise similar to dróttkvætt (q.v.), except that each line was lengthened by the addition of trochee. Used in some notable court poems from the 11th to the 13th c., h. is the verse form of the much admired sacred poem Lilja of the 14th c., from which it became known as Liljulag, and has down to the present day been employed by Icelandic poets for poems specially elevated in theme and form.—The Skalds, tr. and ed. L. M. Hollander (1945). R.B.

HUDIBRASTIC VERSE. The distinctive octosyllabic verse, rhyme use, characteristic satirical tone, and frequently impious imagery—widely imitated but never equalled—employed by Samuel Butler (1612–80) in his Hudibras. The meter would appear joggingly monotonous were the reader not kept constantly engrossed in the wide-ranging, conversational, sparkling wit; and constantly alert for the unexpected rhymes, many of them feminine, which, as an anonymous writer has remarked, “seem to chuckle and sneer of themselves.” Butler speaks, for example, of “Dame Religion,”

Whose honesty they all durst swear for,
 Tho’ not a man of them knew wherefore;

of a time when

The oyster women picked their fish up And trudged away to cry No Bishop;

and of Hudibras:

He knew the seat of Paradise,
 Could tell in what degree it lies; . . .
 What Adam dreamt of, when his bride Came from the closet in his side; . . .
 If either of them had a navel;
 Who first made music malleable;
 Whether the Serpent, at the Fall,
 Had cloven feet, or none at all:
 All this, without a gloss or comment,
 He could unriddle in a moment. . . .

(Canto 1, Part 1)

Saintsbury, Prosody; I. Jack, “Low Satire: Hudibras,” Augustan Satire, 1660–1750 (1952); C. L. Kulisheck, “Swift’s Octosyllabics and the Hudibrastic Tradition,” JEGP, 53 (1954). L.J.Z.

HUITAIN. A form of the 8-line strophe with 8-syllable or 10-syllable lines, written on 3 rhymes with one of these appearing 4 times, and with the same rhyme for the fourth and fifth lines. The order is commonly ababbcb, sometimes abbaacac. The h. may be a complete poem in 8 lines or it may be employed as the structural unit for longer poems. In the 15th c., François Villon wrote his Lais and the body of Le grand testament and most of its ballades in huitains. The form was popular in France in the first half of the 16th c. (e.g., with Marot), and it was sometimes employed in 18th-c. epigrams. In his Petit traité de poésie française Banville regrets the abandonment of the h. by modern Fr. poets and calls it (with the dizain) “perhaps the most perfect thing our lyric art has produced.”—Kastner; M. Grammont, Petit traité de versification fr. (5e éd. revue, 1924). A.G.E.

HUMANISM, NEW. See NEO-HUMANISM.

HUNGARIAN POETRY. The Hung. word for poet, költő, was popularized in the 18th c., and the word for poetry, költészet, was coined in the fourth decade of the 19th c. In the Middle Ages and for a long time afterward the poet was called regős, dalos, énekes, igric, hegedős, kobzos; some of these terms having Hung. roots and others being of It., Slav, or Turkish origin. The heroic legends of the Huns and Magyars were, of course, in the Hung. language, as were romances, ceremonial verses, pastorals, warrior songs, chronicles, fairy and comic tales, parables and fables. Learned works, however, were written in Latin. Little of this poetic heritage survived (and what has is of rather dubious authenticity), although for about three centuries it was handed down orally from one generation to another. It is reasonable to assume that much crude poetry and perhaps many lovely songs and short and lengthy epic poems were lost. Converted to Christianity, the kings and feudal lords, assisted by the clergy, condemned them as undesirable pagan relics. The splendid Transylvanian-Hung. (Székeley) ballads—products of later centuries—and folk songs, striking examples of an animated imagination endowed with a sense of the concrete, confirm the supposition that early Hung. poetry must have had similar qualities.

In the Middle Ages and in the Renaissance and baroque periods much Hung. poetry was written in L.: it was primarily devotional poetry, in some instances not without literary merit. The Hung. Latin poet, János Csezmiczei, known as Janus Pannonius, expressed the spirit of the Renaissance. The translation of the Book of Psalms into Hung. by Albert Szenczi Molnár was an important contribution to the devotional poetry of the Hung. Protestants.

HUNGARIAN POETRY

The first important poet who wrote in Hung. was Bálint Balassa, a 16th-c. warrior. He lived a tempestuous life; his destiny as a man and as a lyric poet was bound up with that of his nation. Next to Balassa, Count Miklós Zrínyi, the 17th-c. epic poet must be mentioned. In the 18th c., when Hungary seemed on the verge of national death, poets—drawing strength from the historical past and from the beauty, pliability, and force of their native tongue—implanted confidence into the people. The craftsmanship and versifying resourcefulness of Mihály Csokonai Vitéz, the late 18th-c. poet, were such that even today his works, in which auditory and visual images mingle with pathos and humor, offer definite pleasure to the discerning reader.

Toward the end of the 18th c. and in the first half of the 19th c. an extraordinary revival of creative and critical intelligence characterized Hungary. Influenced by Gr., L., German, Fr., and Eng. poets and writers and by the mental climate of the Age of Reason, Hung. men of letters examined old texts, concentrated on the development of their agglutinative language, contemplated the intricacies of grammar and style, and devoted much time to a discussion of prosody in which Ferenc Kazinczy and Ferenc Kölcsey excelled. The metrical structure of traditional Hung. poetry, based on the rhythm of the language, was discussed, as was the question of how to apply the quantitative versification of the Greeks and Romans or the stress-accent of Western European poets to Hung. poetry. Romantic themes began to appear, and stylistic realism—the use of normal speech in poetry—was gradually accepted by some. The odes of Dániel Berzsenyi, the figurative language of Mihály Vörösmarty, the epic imagination of János Arany, the lyrical spontaneity of Sándor Petőfi, the elegiac tone of Mihály Tompa, the successful application of ancient and new meters and stanzaic forms, the variation of themes, the fresh treatment of folk subjects and individual experiences, the relationship of poetry to folklore, not only enriched national literature, but also created substantial contacts with world literature.

Mihály Vörösmarty (1800–55) voiced in his poetry the lofty ideas of Széchenyi's great Reform Era, while some of his works reveal the eternal search of romanticism for happiness. In his apocalyptic visions of the fate of his nation and mankind, born from the defeat of the War of Independence, he reached artistic heights which are still unsurpassed in Hung. poetry.

Sándor Petőfi (1823–49) started his meteoric career by revolutionizing poetry through the adaptation of the popular style. His poems, celebrating love and liberty, are of a great immediacy and freshness. The following short poem contains the credo of his art and his life—sacrificed later in a battle of the War of Independence.

Szabadság, szerelem!
E kettő kell nekem,
Szerelemért föláldozom
Az életet.
Szabadságért föláldozom Szerelemem.

Freedom, love!
These two I need.
For my love I sacrifice Life.
For freedom I sacrifice
My love.

János Arany (1817–82), though born a peasant, became the most erudite man of his generation. His poetry was firmly anchored in the deepest strata of his people's instincts—yet, he is considered the most classical of all Hung. poets.

In the second half of the 19th c. János Vajda, Gyula Reviczky, Jenő Komjáthy, and József Kiss, albeit conscious of their national obligations, turned to a kind of "cosmopolitan" philosophy. While industrially and commercially the country progressed and there was an extension of human rights, poets, like many of their confrères in Western Europe, felt alien to the growing materialism of their age. There were poets who received their impetus from national pride or anxiety: e.g., Pál Gyulai, József Lévy, Kálmán Thaly, Andor Kozma, Gyula Vargha. They believed that the true purpose of Hung. poetry was to give expression to their nation's instinct for self-preservation. Most of these poets used simple metrical forms, especially when they were motivated by warm, uncomplicated personal feelings about love, nature, God, family life, homestead. They conventionalized Hung. poetry and were still popular in the early 20th c. "Pure" poetry was unknown; however, in the first and second decades of the 20th c. poets appeared on the Hung. Parnassus, such as Endre Ady, Mihály Babits, Dezső Kosztolányi, and Árpád Tóth, whose sense of verbal music and color and at times unorthodox psychology fitted into the exquisite pattern and metaphorical uniqueness of the Parnassians and symbolists.

Endre Ady (1877–1919) is the most important Hung. poet of the 20th c. In a titanic rebellion against God, cosmic order, and human morality, he professed, as Anti-Christ, a new salvation for mankind—only to fall, after realizing the limitations of human existence, into the most profound humility, in which he sought and discovered the God of the Bible and expressed a glowing but anxious love for his perishing people. Under such pressure, the Hung. language melted and was cast by his art into a new and marvelous mold. His œuvre, consisting of almost 1,000 poems, is considered by many the Hungarian Divina Commedia.

Between the two World Wars formalistic devices in conflict with sophisticated or primitive impulses indicated confusion in taste and confusion concerning the function of poetry. The avant-garde movements, symptomatic of Western European poetry, had their exponents in Hungary. Among the poets, Gyula Juhász and Attila József harmonized respect for form with ethnic attachments and social conscience. There is creative authenticity, resolved and unresolved tension of varying degrees, in the works of Lajos Áprily, József Erdélyi, Gyula Illyés, Lajos Kassák, László Mécs, Miklós Radnóti, István Sinka, Lőrinc Szabó, Sándor Weöres, and others. Some are traditionalists, others vers-libristes; some emulators of centuries-old folk songs and soldier songs, others expressionistic or surrealist experimenters; some regionalists, others religiously, intellectually, morally, aesthetically, ironically, or hedonistically disposed, or revolutionary in ideas but—paradoxically—sometimes conservative or classical in technique. The most characteristic poet of this era is Lőrinc Szabó.

During and after World War II, the pressure of the rapidly succeeding periods of Nazi influence, the democratic era, Stalinism, the thaw, and the 1956 revolution stimulated a new flowering of Hung. poetry. In these two decades the poets completed the process of synthesis between the rich Eastern heritage of the people (hitherto submerged) and Western traditions—a synthesis initiated by Endre Ady and (in music) by Béla Bartók. Great poems were created out of the poets' protest against the inhumanities of both Nazism and Communism. Though the new regime made serious efforts to educate a new generation of poets in its own image, after Stalin's death the disillusioned Communist poets (László Benjámin, Zoltán Zelk, Lajos Kónya, Péter Kuczka) joined the heretofore silenced non-Communist poets in preparing, intellectually, for the revolution. The high point of these feverish years was marked by Gyula Illyés' visionary poems which also constitute a revolutionary breakthrough in form, compared with his earlier sober and repressed style.

In recent years, in an atmosphere of both relative freedom and hopelessness (the consequences of a first victorious, then crushed national uprising), most poets—among them Weöres, the visionary of cosmic scale; Illyés, now very mature and melancholy; the Catholic and pessimistic János Pilinszky; and Ferenc Juhász, the greatest young talent—continue to publish their works. In exile, many poets keep alive the spirit of freedom and humanity (László Cs. Szabó, Victor Határ, János Csokits, Alajos Kannás, Áron Kibédi Varga, etc.). The year 1962 saw the first full-scale appearance of Hung. poetry as a part of world literature: a 500-page anthology in Fr. translated by the best Fr. poets.

ANTHOLOGIES: Magyar népköltési gyűjtemény, ed. L. Arany and P. Gyulai (1872–82); Magyar Poetry (1899) and Modern Magyar Lyrics (1926), both ed. W. N. Loew; Neue ungarische Lyrik in Nachdichtungen, tr. H. Horvát (1918); Anthologie de la poésie hongroise, ed. I. Goll (1927); The Magyar Muse (1933) and A Little Treasury of Hung. Verse (1947), both ed. W. Kirkconnell; Modern Magyar Lyrics, ed. B. Balogh (1934); Magyar versek könyve, ed. J. Horváth (2d ed., 1942); Négy nemzedék: élő magyar költők, ed. I. Sőtér (1948); S. Petőfi, Sixty Poems, ed. E. B. Pierce and E. Delmar (1948); Hét évszázad magyar versei, ed. T. Klaniczay (1951); Magyar versek Aranytól napjainkig, ed. L. Cs. Szabó (1953); Magyar versek, 1953–1956, ed. N. Baudy (1958?); Anthol. de la poésie hongroise du XII^e s. à nos jours, ed. L. Gara (1962).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: F. Toldy, A magyar költészet története (1854); L. Négyesy, A magyar verselmélet kritikai története (1888) and A mértékes magyar verselés története (1892); F. Riedl, Poétika (1889) and A Hist. of Hung. Lit. (1906); J. Pintér, Magyar irodalomtörténet (8 v., 1930–42); A. Szerb, Magyar irodalom története (1935); A. Eckhardt and L. Molnos, André Ady, poète hongrois et européen (1947); J. Horváth, A magyar vers (1948) and Rendszerez magyar verstan (1951); J. Reményi, Sándor Petőfi, Hung. Poet (1953); L. Bóka and P. Pándi, A magyar irodalom története 1849–ig (1957); T. Klaniczay and others, Hist. of Hung. Lit. (Eng. ed., 1964); J. Reményi, Hung. Writers and Lit., ed. A. J. Molnar (1964). J.R.; I.C.-R.

HYMN. In its broadest sense a hymn is an ode composed in honor of gods and sung or recited in religious festivals or other celebrations of a public character. In the ancient world hymns were an important feature of such ceremonies, and many specimens of the lyric ode—certainly musical in origin—have been preserved in Gr. literature, though the Romans (with the notable exception of Horace) wrote little for public performance.

In defining the content of the h. it must be observed that in classical antiquity the word might also be used to signify a song composed in honor of a hero or other famous man. In the Christian church the Fathers accepted St. Augustine's definition which may be stated as "Praise of God in Song." By a later (11th c.) definition praise was extended to His saints. Despite the rise of vernacular verse after the 12th c. only Latin hymns were used in public worship, and the emphasis, in accord with Ambrosian tradition, was doctrinal. However, before Luther paraliturgical vernacular verses had been worked into services in some churches.

Hellenic hymns in general consist of a group of metrically related lines of varying length cast in the form of strophe and antistrophe. The so-called Homeric hymns are in hexameter verse as were also most of the hymns of Callimachus (ca. 305-ca. 240 B.C.) and the celebrated Stoic h. to Zeus composed by Cleanthes of Assos (331-232 B.C.). The theurgic hymns of the mythical Orpheus, in hexameter verse, chanted by initiates in the "mysteries" have been assigned to a period ca. 580 B.C. but may perhaps be products of the Alexandrian school in the early years of the Christian era.

The metrical pattern of the ancient Egyptian hymns to Ra and Amen and of the later New Kingdom hymns of Akhenaten is obscured by our ignorance of Egyptian phonetics, but a form of parallelism can be discerned, e.g., in the structure of a coronation ode of the XX Dynasty, 1168 B.C. Meanwhile, in India (ca. 1200 B.C.), the great collections of hymns of which the Rig Veda is the oldest were being written in archaic Sanskrit. More than 2,000 years later the Indian mystic Kabir (A.D. 1440-1518) used his gifts to compose songs in the old Hindi and Punjabi languages.

Parallelism, both "synonymous" and "antithetic" is a distinguishing feature of the Ugaritic poetry which the Hebrews encountered in Canaan. They adopted and developed the Ugaritic manner in their own poetry, and with them the h. first reached perfection as a devotional medium. In the psalter—a compilation from Davidic and Levitical sources—parallelism of the two halves of a couplet or line is most commonly combined with a balanced accentual pattern (3:3). The halting rhythm (3:2) called in the Hebrew qināh (employed to produce an emotional effect) is an exception to the general rule. The "Psalms of David" continued to be employed in the worship of the primitive Christian church. They retained their unique position until prejudice against the use of non-scriptural matter weakened and the way was opened—first in the Eastern church—for new compositions. 4th c. Gr. hymns made use of the hexameter and pentameter as well as Anacreontic, Ionic, iambic, and other lyrical measures. All these fell into disuse before compositions of a later date. Of the few primitive Gr. hymns which have survived the best known is probably Phōs hilaron hagian doxēs from the 3d c. or earlier.

Scriptural texts appointed to be said or sung at a very early date include the Angelic song at the nativity Gloria in excelsis and the three Gospel canticles: Magnificat, the song of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Nunc dimittis, the song of Simeon; and Benedictus, the song of Zacharias. The Tersanctus (the L. title of the triumphal h. in adoration of the Trinity which is found in all the early liturgies of the Eastern and Western churches) is probably the most ancient and universal of all Christian hymns of praise.

L. hymns were introduced into Western Christendom by St. Hilary of Poitiers as a means of combating the Arian heresy in the 4th c. He was closely followed by St. Ambrose of Milan. Up to the 6th c. the iambic dimeter employed by Ambrose was most favored. It may here be observed that many short Eng. religious lyrics have been made from centos of long L. poems, e.g., Jerusalem the golden and The World is very evil from Bernard of Morlas' De contemptu mundi. L. hymns continued to be written throughout the Middle Ages. The masterly h. O quanta qualia (dactylic) comes from Hymnus Paraclitensis, which Abelard (1079-1142) wrote for Heloise; but at the time of the Renaissance many of the old rugged and objective hymns were drastically revised to suit Humanist conceptions of classical Latinity.

In the 16th c. the twin influences of the Renaissance and the Reformation gave an impetus to the emergence of the vernacular in hymns and metrical versions of the psalms. Luther and his collaborators zealously extended congregational singing in vernacular, translating and adapting L. hymns as well as composing new hymns in the tradition of medieval fairs and camps. In the 16th c. German tunes retained a considerable degree of accentual freedom and the poet who wrote verses for singing was at liberty to follow a free rhythm. Paul Gerhardt (1607-76), author of the great Passion h. O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden, wrote exquisite lyrics of deep, tender feeling. The hymns of Franck (1618-77) and Scheffler (1624-77) and some of the works of the later Pietists are also meritorious.

But in Germany as in England and elsewhere post-Reformation religious lyrics which are first-rate as poetry are not common. Poetry in the h. is rare largely because few writers have succeeded in composing objective (not personal or metaphysical) verses capable of being sung by mixed congregations; moreover, because the h. is the ordinary man's theology and its stanzas must be married to tunes which can easily be memorized, rhythmic simplicity is essential.

Modern Eng. hymnody derives from the Metrical Version of the Psalms known as the "Old Version" of Sternhold and Hopkins which, in its turn, reflected the ideas of the Genevan reformers as expressed in the Fr. version of Marot and Beza. Neither the "Old" nor the "New" version has any poetic merit; we may dismiss them from consideration. It is remarkable that despite the glory of Elizabethan literature no indigenous congregational hymnody appeared before the 18th c. The literary poems of George Herbert (1593-1633) were not written for public performance. Many of them, like Let all the world in every corner sing (10.4. 6.6. 6.6. 10.4), are in peculiar meters. The work of his contemporary George Wither (1588-1667), few of whose many religious songs are in common use, illustrates the practice of composing verses to suit existing ballad tunes. Donne (1573-1631), the great poet of the metaphysical school, was not a h. writer. His intensely personal Wilt thou forgive that sin, which has found its way into a modern book, is not suitable for public singing.

Isaac Watts (1674-1748) was the creator of the modern Eng. h. in which singleness of theme is combined with brevity and songfulness. O God, our help in ages past, in C.M., with much use of metaphor and simile, is perhaps the greatest h. in the language, while When I survey the wondrous Cross may be the most moving. After Watts we enter upon the great age of evangelical hymnody—a century of divine songs. Cowper (1731-1800), one of the few great poets to write hymns, collaborated with Newton (1725-1807); his brilliant lyric Sometimes a light surprises is an illustration of the truth that good hymns begin well.

Charles Wesley (1707-88) is the greatest writer in the devotional sphere. His hymns are characterized by great fertility of metric invention. Wrestling Jacob, a lyric drama in 14 stanzas, is his finest poem and one at least of his hymns for children, Gentle Jesus, Meek and Mild, has something of the precision and penetrating power of Blake's winged thought.

During the 19th c. there was a great outpouring of religious verse on both sides of the Atlantic. The great bulk of it was weak and unsatisfactory, but in England Heber (1783-1826) "inaugurated the literary hymn aiming not merely at the expression of religious feeling but also at deliberately controlling that expression by the canons of the poetic art." (C. S. Phillips). Am. writers who enriched Eng. hymnals as well as their own include John Greenleaf Whittier (1807-92), Oliver Wendell Holmes (1809-94), Ray Palmer (1808-89), and Samuel Johnson (1822-82).

In the 20th c. many poor hymns which had found favor in the past were courageously dropped from new and revised hymnals. Authors tended to write "hymns" of a subjective and nonscriptural character with a special stress on the idea of "social service." A poem, however, if it is rightly to be interpolated into the Office must be in accord with the linguistic tone of scripture and liturgy. Secular poems with a human interest may fall short of this ideal, but where they are yoked to tunes suitable for congregational singing they may be suitable for use in public gatherings of an undenominational character.

SOURCES: Sequentiae ex Missalibus, ed. J. M. Neale (1852); Anthologia Graeca Carminum Christianorum, ed. H. A. Daniel (5 v., 1855-6); Analecta Hymnica Medii Aevi, ed. G. M. Dreves, C. Blume and H. M. Bannister (55 v., 1886-1922); Piae Cantiones, 1582, ed. G. R. Woodward (with pref., 1910).—COLLECTIONS: Hymns from the Yattendon Hymnal, ed. R. Bridges and H. Ellis Wooldridge (1899); Songs of Syon, ed. G. R. Woodward (1910); The Four-part Chorals of J. S. Bach (German text with Eng. tr.), ed. C. S. Terry (1929); Hymn Book of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America (1940).

GENERAL: Hymns A. and M. (with introd. by W. H. Frere, hist. ed., 1909); A Dictionary of Hymnology, ed. J. Julian (1925); J. M. Gibbon, Melody and the Lyric (1930); Homeric Hymns, ed. T. W. Allen et al. (2d ed., 1936); M. Britt, Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (rev. ed., 1936); C. S. Phillips, Hymnody Past and Present (1937); H. W. Foote, Three Centuries of Am. Hymnody (1940); B. L. Manning, The Hymns of Wesley and Watts (1942); T. H. Robinson, Poetry and the Poets of the Old Testament (1947); F. J. E. Raby, A Hist. of Christian L. Poetry (2d ed., 1953) and The Poetry of the Eucharist (1957); A. T. Shaw "Hymns and Anthems," Cassell's; E. Routley, The Music of Christian Hymnody (1957); L. F. Benson, The Eng. H. (1962). A.T.S.

HYPALLAGE (Gr. "exchange"). A change in the relation of words whereby a word, instead of agreeing with the word it logically qualifies, is made to agree grammatically with another word; h. is usually confined to poetry: "neikos andron xunaimon" (kindred strife of men for strife of kindred men; Sophocles, Antigone 794). Quintilian (Institutes of Oratory 8.6.23) does not distinguish clearly from metonymy (q.v.): "Cererem corruptam undis" (Ceres by water spoiled; Virgil, Aeneid 1.177). Characteristic of Virgil, Spenser, Shakespeare, Milton. Shakespeare not only depends heavily on the device but also uses it with a flavor of parody: "I see a voice. Now will I to the chink, / To spy and I can hear my Thisby's face" (Mid- summer Night's Dream 5.1.189-90). Cf. Sister Miriam Joseph, Shakespeare's Use of the Arts of Language (1947). Lausberg, discussing "die metonymischen Epitheta," distinguishes syntactical and other varieties.

R.O.E.

HYPERBATON. See ANASTROPHE.

HYPERBOLE. (Gr. "overshooting," "excess"). A figure or trope, common to all literatures, consisting of bold exaggeration, apparently first noted by Isocrates and Aristotle. Quintilian says, "an elegant straining of the truth, and may be employed indifferently for exaggeration or attenuation" (Institutes of Oratory 8.6.67): "Geminique minantur / In caelum scopuli" (Twin rocks that threaten heaven—Virgil, Aeneid 1.162).

Not all the waters in the rude rough sea
Can wash the balm from an annointed King.
(Shakespeare, Richard II 3.2.54)

Any extravagant statement used to express strong emotion, not intended to be understood literally. According to Puttenham, the figure is also used to "advance or . . . abase the reputation of any thing or person" (The Arte of Eng. Poesie, 1589). P. called it "over-reacher" or "loud liar" equating it with L. dementiens.

Grammarians and rhetoricians sometimes consider h. to be among the second order of figures of speech, along with amplification, examples, images, etc. Use of h. in Elizabethan drama, particularly Jonson, with special reference to the development of comic irony, is discussed by A. H. Sackton, Rhetoric as a Dramatic Language in Ben Jonson (1948). See also: R. Sherry, Treatise of the Figures of Grammer and Rhetorick (1555); H. Peacham, The Garden of Eloquence Conteyning the Figures of Grammer and Rhetorick (1577, enlarged 1593); W. S. Howells, Logic and Rhetoric in England, 1500-1700 (1956); Lausberg. R.O.E.

HYPERCATALECTIC. See TRUNCATION.

HYPERMETRIC (Gr. "beyond the measure"). In prosody a line which has an extra syllable or syllables at the end, or a syllable which is not expected in the regular metrical pattern, e.g., a hypercatalectic line (see TRUNCATION). In classical poetry a verse in which the vowel at the end of one line elides with the vowel beginning the following line: "sors exitura et nos in aeternum / exsilium impositura cumbae" (Horace, Odes 2.3.27-28). In Old Germanic poetry a verse expanded by means of an additional initial foot, or, according to the rhythmic theory, by means of doubling the time given to it.—E. Sievers, Altgermanische Metrik (1893); Hardie; J. C. Pope, The Rhythm of Beowulf (1942); Koster.

R.A.H.

HYPHAERESIS (Gr. "a taking away from beneath"). In Gr. the disappearance of short "e" before a vowel, e.g., noσσός for neσσός. Generally, the term is used to indicate the omission of a letter from the body of a word as in "o'er" for "over."

R.A.H.

HYPORCHEMA (Gr. "song accompanied by dancing"). This Gr. choral song accompanied by dancers who did not sing was supposed to have been invented by Thaletas of Gortyn in Crete (ca. 7th c. B.C.), but Athenaeus found its origins in Homer. It was, however, characterized by its use of Cretic measures. As a hymn in honor of Apollo, the h. was akin to the paeon (q.v.) as it was later to the dithyramb (q.v.) in praise of Dionysus. Pindar, for example, wrote both hyporchemata and paeans. In tragedy the term was applied by Eucleides, an authority cited by Tzetzes, to lyric passages where the chorus was evidently dancing. Consequently some modern scholars have unnecessarily imagined it as a kind of lively stasimon (q.v.), e.g. in several passages of Sophocles where jubilation of the chorus at the arrival of glad tidings is followed by the catastrophe of the play.—Smyth; Schmid and Stählin; Koster; A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, The Dramatic Festivals of Athens (1953).

R.J.G.

HYPORRHYTHMIC. See DIAERESIS.

HYSTERON PROTERON (Gr. "later earlier"). A figure in which the natural order of time in which events occur is reversed, usually because the later event is considered more important than the former: "trophe kai genesis" (in Shakespeare's phrase, "for I was bred and born"; Xenophon, Memorabilia 3.5.10); also found in Virgil: "Moriatur et in media arma ruamus" (Let us die and rush into battle; Aeneid 2.353). According to Puttenham, "We call it in English proverb, the cart before the horse, the Greeks call it Hysteron proteron, we name it the preposterous . . ." (The Arte of Eng. Poesie). "How wild a Hysteron Proteron's this, which Nature crosses, / And far above the top the bottom tosses" (Joseph Beaumont, Psyche 1.85). But in poetry especially the device may be highly effective without seeming preposterous.—S. E. Bassett, "Hysteron proteron Homerikos," Harvard Studies in Cl. Philology, 31 (1920); Lausberg.

R.O.E.

I

IAMB (Gr. iambos, a word of unknown etymology but certainly very ancient). A metrical unit, in quantitative verse, of a short syllable followed by a long:

—; āmāns

The iambic rhythm was thought in antiquity to be nearest to ordinary speech; it was in its 6-foot form (see TRIMETER; L. senarius) the standard meter for dialogue in drama and for invective. A clear distinction was made between the strong iambic rhythm and the lighter, more unstable trochaic rhythm (—). Catullus gains a special effect in two poems by using pure iambs, unvaried by spondees. Hipponax invented the scazon (q.v.), the "limping" iambic. For the longer iambic lines, see SEPTENARIUS (15-syllabler) and OCTONARIUS (16-syllabler). The iambic dimeter (quaternarius, 8-syllabler) sometimes occurs in Plautus; in Horace it sometimes alternates with the trimeter; it is found in a few inscriptions. It came into its glory in the 4th c. A.D., when Ambrose adopted it for his hymns:

āēternē rerū cōnditor

Hardy; Dale; Beare.

W.B.

The term has been adopted into Eng. for the accentual foot of an unstressed followed by a stressed syllable:

x' ; impose

This alternation, no doubt because it fits the natural patterns of Eng. words and phrases, has become overwhelmingly the commonest type in all Eng. verse. Its use is complemented by secondary accent:

x \ x x ' x
personification

and is varied by occasional substitution of the trochee:

Milton! thou shouldst be living at this hour or anapest:

Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free

By these and similar devices the iambic movement is spared monotony and made capable of almost every kind of metrical effect.—Baum.

IAMBELEGUS. In Gr. and L. metric an iambic followed by a dactylic colon (the latter being generally hemiepes [q.v.]), as in Horace, Epodes 13.2:

nīvēs | quē dē | dūcūnt | iōvēm; || nūnc mārē |
nūnc sīlū | aē

(iambic dimeter acatalectic and hemiepes). See ARCHILOCHIAN and ELEGIAMB(US). R.J.G.

IAMBES (LES). Fr. satiric poems of variable length in rimes croisées (abab, cdcd, etc.), in which a 12-syllable verse alternates throughout with one of 8 syllables. The term iambe, whose satiric sense is rooted in a very ancient tradition deriving from the notoriously bitter and supposedly lethal iambs of the Gr. poet Archilochus (8th or 7th c. B.C.), came into Fr. as a generic term with the posthumously published Iambes of André Chénier (1762–94) and Les iambes (1830–31) of Auguste Barbier. Violent contrasts in rhythm from line to line make the Fr. iambe a remarkably appropriate medium for satire: "Nul ne resterait donc . . . / Pour cracher sur leurs noms, pour chanter leur supplice? / Allons, étouffe tes clameurs; / Souffre, ô cœur gros de haine, affamé de justice. / Toi, Vertu, pleure si je meurs." (A. Chénier, Iambes 9).—M. Grammont, Le vers français (1913) and Petit traité de versification française (5^e éd. revue, 1924); A. Chénier, Oeuvres complètes (1940). A.G.E.

IBYCEAN. See LOGAOEDIC.

ICELANDIC POETRY. (For Icel. poetry prior to 1400 see OLD NORSE POETRY.) The basic fact in the history of Icel. literature is its unbroken continuity. Every age produced some writers of note; the ancient literature never lost its hold on the people, but remained a source of strength and inspiration. The vitality of the native poetic tradition is strikingly illustrated in Háttalykill (Key to Meters), a cycle of 90 love songs in as many meters, by Loftur Gut-tormsson (d. 1432), a prominent chieftain and the greatest Icel. poet of the day. With this remarkable work he proved himself a worthy heir of Snorri Sturluson, the author of the Prose Edda.

The most important poet of the first half of the 16th c. was the great patriot Jón Arason (1484–1550), the last Catholic bishop of Iceland, equally renowned for his sacred and secular poetry. A cultural leader of truly heroic mold, and deeply rooted in the national literary tradition, he brought to Iceland the first printing press about 1530. The leading Icel. poet of the Reformation, on the other hand, was the Reverend Einar Sigurðsson (1539-1626); many of whose poems reflect the spirit and style of the ballads and other folk poetry. Two poets of the 17th c., in whose works the national tradition is a prominent feature, tower above their contemporaries. The Reverend Hallgrímur Petursson (1614-74), whose inspired Passíusdálmar (Passion Hymns) have appeared in more than fifty editions, was one of the great Lutheran hymn writers of all time, and has profoundly influenced the life of the Icel. people. He also wrote secular poetry of great merit, although, in that respect, he was more than equaled by his fellow-clergyman, the Reverend Stefan Olafsson (1620-1688), noted in particular for his realistic, often satirical, portrayal of everyday life, and a master of fluent and varied form.

A notable literary and cultural figure of the 18th c. was Eggert Ólafsson (1726-68), who wrote edifying and inspirational poems in the spirit of the Enlightenment, but is of much greater importance as a fervent patriot, the leader of a nationalistic movement of far-reaching influence. The outstanding poet of the century, however, was the Reverend Jón Þorláksson (1744-1819). His extensive original production, noteworthy as it is many ways, is overshadowed by his translations, especially those of Milton's Paradise Lost and of Klopstock's Messias. With them he became the great pioneer in the realm of Icel. translations and a trail-breaker for the poets of the next generation. Effectively and often brilliantly rendered into the elevated fornyrðislag (q.v.) measure of Eddic fame, his translations eloquently attest the vigor and continuity of the Icel. poetical tradition.

That observation applies, in varying degrees, to the Icel. poets of the 19th c., whose works are strongly national in spirit, while they were at the same time stimulated by foreign influences, notably the romantic movement. During the latter part of the period realism and neo-romanticism were also influential. The pioneer romanticist in Iceland was Bjarni Thorarensen (1786-1841), whose best poems, frequently Eddic in spirit and form, are characterized by vigor, penetration and rich imagery. In the works of his younger contemporary, Jónas Hallgrímsson (1807-45), the romantic love of beauty and of homeland find an exquisite and delicate expression. While he employed Eddic and skaldic meters with great skill, he also enriched Icel. literature with foreign verse forms such as the sonnet, the terza rima, the strophe, and others. He has deeply influenced later Icel. poets.

During the second half of the century, a large number of uncommonly gifted poets carried on, more or less, the tradition of Thorarensen and Hallgrímsson. These successors of the great masters included Grímur Thomsen (1820-96), Benedikt Gröndal (1826-1907), Steingrímur Thorsteinsson (1831-1913), and Matthías Jochumsson (1835-1920), generally regarded the greatest Icel. poet of the day, whose versatile genius is revealed in inspiring historical and memorial poems, as well as in equally noble hymns, including the Icel. national anthem.

The native poetical traditions run particularly strong in the works of the gifted unschooled poets of the period: Hjalmar Jónsson (Bólu-Hjalmar, 1796-1875), Sigurður Breiðfjörð (1798-1846), and Páll Ólafsson (1827-1905). While the two first-named, and Breiðfjörð in particular, carried on with great success the tradition of the rimur-poetry, all three were masters of the time-honored Icel. quatrain (ferskeytla).

Among leading poets who were influenced by realism are Þorsteinn Erlingsson (1858-1914), Hannes Hafstein (1861-1922), and Guðmundur Friðjónsson (1869-1944). In their works nationalism is also prominent. The same is true of the greatest poets of that generation, Stephan G. Stephansson (1853-1927) and Einar Benediktsson (1864-1940). Despite many dissimilarities, these two poets share unusual creative genius, robust intellectual qualities, and a superb mastery of their native tongue. Other poets of note, whose works belong primarily to the 20th c., are: Jón Þorkelsson (1859-1924), Sigurjón Friðjónsson (1867-1950), Þorsteinn Gíslason (1867-1938), Guðmundur Guðmundsson (1874-1919), Sigurður Jónsson (1878-1949), and Sigurður Sigurðsson (1879-1939).

Icel. poetry since the turn of the century reflects various tendencies, ranging from realism through neo-romanticism to outright leftist revolutionary views. Generally speaking, however, the national note continues very strong, expressing itself in an interest in various phases of the native culture. Side by side with the traditional verse forms, new meters have been introduced, including free verse and other modern forms of poetic expression. The traditional verse forms, characterized by alliteration, are, however, still dominant.

Space permits only the mere mention of the most important of the large array of 20th-c. poets: Hulda (Unnur Benediktisdóttir 1881-1946), Örn Arnarson (Magnús Stefánsson, 1884-1942), Jakob Thorarensen (b. 1886), Stefán Sigurðsson (1887-1933), Jakob J. Smári (b. 1889), Davíð Stefánsson (b. 1895), Jón Magnússon (1896-1944), Sigurður Einarsson (b. 1898), Jóhannes Jónsson (Jóhannes úr Kötlum, b. 1899, Jón Helgason (b. 1899), Tómas Guðmundsson (b. 1901), Guðmundur Böðvarsson (b. 1904), Snorri Hjartarson (1906), and Steinn Steinnarr (Aðalsteinn Kristmundsson (1908–58), not to mention a number of gifted and very promising younger writers. There is also a large group of gifted Icel.-Am. poets, mostly of the older generation. Stephan G. Stephansson is the most important of these.

ANTHOLOGIES: Ny-Islandsk Lyrik (1901) and Udvalgte islandske Digte fra det nittende aarhundrede (1919), both tr. O. Hansen; The Oxford Book of Scandinavian Verse, ed. W. A. Craigie (1926); Icel. Lyrics (1930; 2d ed., 1956) and Icel. Poems and Stories (1943), both ed. R. Beck; The North Am. Book of Icel. Verse (1930) and Canadian Overtones (1935), both tr. W. Kirkconnell; "Iceland," ed. S. Einarsson in 20th C. Scandinavian Poetry, general ed. M. S. Allwood (1950); P. Bjarnason, Odes and Echoes (1954); Northern Lights, tr. J. Johnson (1959).

HISTORY AND CRITICISM: K. Küchler, Gesch. der isländischen Dichtung der Neuzeit (2 v., 1896–1902); J. C. Poestion, Isl. Dichter der Neuzeit (1897) and Eislandsblüten (1904); H. Hermannsson, Icel. Authors of Today (1913); The Passion-Hymns of Iceland, tr. C. V. Pilcher (1913); S. Nordal, Udsigt over Islands litt. i det 19. og 20. aarhundrede (1927); R. Beck, "Icel. Lit.," Ency. of Lit., ed. J. T. Shipley (2 v., 1946) and Hist. of Icel. Poets, 1800–1940 (1950); G. Finnbogason, "Lit.," Iceland, ed. T. Thorsteinsson (1946); K. E. Andrés-son, Íslenzkar nútímabókmenntir 1918–48 (1949); B. M. Gíslason, Íslands litt. eftir Sagatíðin (1949); S. Einarsson, A Hist. of Icel. Lit. (1957). R.B.

ICTUS (L. "beat"). Roman writers like Horace and Quintilian used this word to describe the movement of the foot or the hand in keeping time with the rhythm of a verse. Audible i. is more than dubious in Gr. verse where the accent was one of pitch, not stress, in the classical period and later. In L. the occurrence of i. has been generally assumed in modern times by those who also believe that words were pronounced with stress; but a recent writer (W. Beare, see bibliog.) thinks that such an assumption "may be due merely to our craving to impose on quantitative verse a rhythm which we can recognize." Whatever its nature was, this rhythmical i. is regarded as falling on the long syllable (i.e., the arsis [q.v.] in the currently accepted sense of that word) of a basic foot like the iambus (˘ ˊ) or anapaest (˘ ˘ ˊ) in rising, or the trochee (ˊ ˘) or dactyl (ˊ ˘ ˘) in falling measures; but, with resolution (q.v.), the i. is marked on the first of the two short syllables which replace the long. Thus Terence begins a senarius (q.v.) in rising rhythm with

hīnc īl|lāē lācrī|māē

and Horace a hexameter (q.v.) in falling rhythm with

hīnc īl|lāē lācrī|māē

See ARSIS AND THESIS and CLASSICAL PROSODY.—W. Beare, L. Verse and European Song (1957); P. W. Harsh, "Ictus and Accent," Lustrum, 3 (1958); A. Labhardt, "Le Problème de l'I.," Euphrosyne, 2 (1959); O. Seel and E. Pöhlmann, "Quantität und Wortakzent im horazischen Sapphiker. Ein Beitrag zum Iktus-Problem," Philologus, 103 (1959); H. Drexler, "Quantität und Wortakzent," Maia n.s., 12 (1960); R. G. Tanner, "The Arval Hymn and Early L. Verse," CQ n.s., 11 (1961). R.J.G.

IDYL(L). A short poem or prose composition which deals charmingly with rustic life; ordinarily it describes a picturesque rural scene of gentle beauty and innocent tranquillity and narrates a story of some simple sort of happiness. There are no requirements of form, such as are prescribed in the stricter types (limerick, sestina, and sonnet) or even in the looser types (ode and ballad). The earliest commentators used the term to designate a great variety of short poems of domestic life in which description of beautiful rural scenery was an essential element. But, because the scholiasts used the term in connection with the poems of Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus, it has often been considered a synonym for pastoral (q.v.); and Theocritus' ten pastoral poems, no doubt because of their superiority, became the prototype of the i. In the 16th and 17th c., especially in France, there was frequent insistence that pastorals in dialogue be called eclogues; those in narrative, idylls. Dictionary definitions from Edward Philip's New World of Words, 1678, to the New Eng. Dictionary, 1888–1929, have emphasized two restrictions; first, that the term derives from eidyllion, meaning "little picture" (which was construed to mean "framed picture"); second, the term is used to designate poems of rustic life, such as that in the pastoral poems of Theocritus. Critics and scholars also have tried to confine the subject matter of the i. within those limits. In 1555 Vauquelin de la Fresnaye, comparing the terms i. and pastoral, declared that the name "of idyl seemed to me to be more closely related to my purposes, especially as it signifies and represents only diverse small images resembling those engraved on stone or on chalcedony to serve sometimes as a seal." And as late as 1904 Martha Hale Shackford was contending that the i. is "a picture of life as the human spirit wishes it to be, a presentation of the chosen moments of earthly content." Two biblical selections are customarily referred to as idylls—Ruth and The Song of Songs. Among the major writers in Eng. literature, however, there is scarcely a poem to meet these specifications, unless such poems as Marlowe's pastoral The Passionate Shepherd to His Love or Burns's realistic narrative The Cotter's Saturday Night are included. Poems bearing this designation may be found in the works of minor poets, such as Salomon Gessner's Idyls or Anna Nicholas' Idyl of the Wabash. And among many major poems frequently there are episodes which may justly be called "idyllic," like the Nausicaa episode in the Odyssey, the Palemon and Lavinia episode in Thomson's Seasons, and the Juan and Haidée episode in Byron's Don Juan. Typical prose idylls are illustrated by Barrie's Auld Licht Idylls. It must be pointed out, however, that writers have often ignored the prescriptions. A notable instance occurred even as early as the 17th c. in Marc-Antoine de Gérard, sieur de Saint-Amant's Moyse sauvé, 1653, an "idylle héroïque" of 6,000 lines. In more recent times such use, or abuse, of this term has been made by Victor de Laprade, Idylles héroïques, 1858, and Tennyson, Idylls of the King, 1859. Perhaps Tennyson thought the use of the term was appropriate for his poem; each i. contains an incident in the matter of Arthur and his Knights which is separate (or framed) but at the same time is connected with the central theme; the contents treat the Christian virtues in an ideal manner and in a remote setting. Such freedom led to a wide imitation of the term by poets. For instance, there is little in the matter of Robert Browning's Dramatic Idylls, 1879, 1880, which deal for the most part with psychological crises, to place them in the tradition. Obviously, then, the i. cannot be called, either because of form or of content, a definite poetic type. Actually, after such uses of the term as those cited above, it would be rather difficult to say what might not be called an i. The signification of idyllic, however, has been more constant. Usually it is applied only to writings which present picturesque rural scenery and a life of innocence and tranquillity.—M. H. Shackford, "A Definition of the Pastoral I.," PMLA, 19 (1904); R. G. Moulton, "The Song of Songs," Modern Reader's Bible (1926); P. van Tieghem, "Les Idylles de Gessner et le rêve pastoral," Le Pré-romantisme, II (1930). J.E.C.

IMAGERY. An image is the reproduction in the mind of a sensation produced by a physical perception. Thus, if a man's eye perceives a certain color, he will register an image of that color in his mind—"image," because the subjective sensation he experiences will be an ostensible copy or replica of the objective color itself. The mind may also produce images when not reflecting direct physical perceptions, as in the attempt to remember something once perceived but no longer present, or in the undirected drifting of the mind over experience, or in the combinations wrought out of perception by the imagination, or in the hallucinations of dreams and fever, and so on.

More specifically in literary usage, imagery refers to images produced in the mind by language, whose words and statements may refer either to experiences which could produce physical perceptions were the reader actually to have those experiences, or to the sense-impressions themselves. When Archibald MacLeish says, in Ars Poetica, that a poem should be "Dumb / As old medallions to the thumb," he not only means that the language of poetry should make important use of i., he also exemplifies what he means by expressing it in terms of i.: a poem, he implies, should make its impact upon the imagination rather than upon the intellect, much as a person feels an old coin with his fingers (a physical perception). When, however, he says "A poem should not mean / But be," his meaning is the same but his language is not, for this statement is abstract rather than concrete and imagery-bearing, dealing as it does with an idea or concept rather than a perception or sensation. This combination of meaning and imagery may indicate the confusion which can result when "i." is applied to literary study, for it is used variously to refer to the meaning of a statement involving images, to the images themselves, or to the combination of meaning and images. Thus Miss Downey says, "The image must not be conceived as a material copy or thing but merely as the content of a thought in which attention is centred on sensory quality of some sort." Or Miss Spurgeon says, "I use the term 'image' here as the only available word to cover every kind of simile, as well as every kind of what is really compressed simile—metaphor." Or C. Day Lewis says, "It is a picture made out of words." Or Fogle refers to it as "the sensuous element in poetry."

For the purposes of the present discussion, the various definitions of imagery can be reduced essentially to three: (1) "mental i.," (2) i. as "figures of speech," and (3) i. and image patterns as the embodiment of "symbolic vision" or of "nondiscursive truth." Interest in the first is focused on what happens in the reader's mind (effect), while in the second and third it is focused on the imagery-bearing language itself and its significations (cause). None of these categories, of course, is entirely separate from any of the others, but such a breakdown is helpful in making a beginning.

The first definition emphasizes the relation of the statement on the page to the sensation it produces in the mind, and involves two parallel problems: first, to describe objectively and analytically the sensory capacities of the poet's mind; and second, to test, and perhaps improve, the reader's capacity to appreciate i. in poetry. The method is statistical; that is to say, the analyst reads a given poem and then reports numerically and by categories the different images the poem is capable of stimulating, or he asks a subject to read the poem and report similarly on his (the subject's) reactions. Interest in this field was apparently first provoked by the early experiments in the psychology of perception of Sir Francis Galton ("Statistics of Mental Imagery," Mind, 5 [1880], 301-18), who discovered that people differ in their image-making habits and capacities ("How much of this morning's breakfast-table can you recall to mind and describe now?" the questionnaires ran). While one person may reveal a predominating tendency to visualize his reading, memories, and ruminations (as indeed many people do), another may favor the mind's "ear," another the mind's "nose," or yet another may have no i. at all.

While this first definition makes no distinction between literal and figurative i.—sometimes centering on the one, sometimes the other, and sometimes both—the second concentrates on the nature of the relationship between a subject and an analogue, i.e., on metaphor. Although it is the analogue which is, strictly speaking, the image, the term is often used to refer to the entire subject-analogue relationship. Beginning with the work of Max Müller, whose "Lectures on the Science of Language" were delivered at the Royal Institution in 1861-64 (and were subsequently published under that title in two series), the nature of metaphor—hitherto almost categorized out of existence by the traditional rhetoricians—became once again an open question. Why does the poet liken his lady to a rose (how, and in what ways, are further questions to be discussed in due course)? Müller's answer, although its assumptions have been questioned, is still influential today: man, as he develops his conceptions of immaterial things, must perforce express them in terms of material things because his language lags behind his needs—the literal mode becomes ineffective, inexact, or incomplete. That is to say, figurative i. often makes for greater precision of expression; thus language, as it seeks exactitude, grows through metaphor.

Finally, the third definition is concerned basically with the function of image patterns, whether literal or figurative or both, as symbols by virtue of psychological association (cf. SYMBOL). The problems here are to ascertain how the poet's choice of i. reveals not merely the sensory capacities of his mind but also his interests, tastes, temperament, values, and vision; to determine the function of recurring images in the poem in which they occur as tone-setters, structural devices, and symbols; and to examine the relations between the poet's over-all image patterns and those of myths and rituals (cf. ARCHETYPE). Once again the method is statistical. It involves tabulating not merely the kinds of mental i. to be found in the work of any given poet but also the areas of subject matter from which they derive. Although Caroline Spurgeon's ideas were anticipated by Walter White (A Specimen of a Commentary [1794]) and William Spaulding (A Letter on Shakespeare's Authorship of "The Two Noble Kinsmen" [1876]), her work in 1935 on Shakespeare's i. was largely responsible for stimulating contemporary interest (both favorable and unfavorable) in this field.

Mental i., figurative i., and symbolic i. It may be now asked what is involved in each definition, how each is related to the others, and what the values of each are. Psychologists have identified a number of different kinds of mental images: visual (sight, which can be further subdivided for brightness, clarity, color, and motion), auditory (hearing), olfactory (smell), gustatory (taste), tactile (touch, which can be further subdivided for heat, cold, and texture), organic (awareness of heartbeat, pulse, breathing, and digestion), and kinesthetic (awareness of muscle tension and movement). Obviously these categories, although perhaps somewhat overelaborate for the purposes of literary criticism, are preliminary to the other approaches to i., for they define the very nature of the materials. And several valuable results have emerged from the application of these distinctions to literature (e.g., Downey). In the first place, the concept of mental i. has encouraged catholicity of taste, for once it has been realized that not all poets have the same sorts of sensory capacities, it is easier to appreciate different kinds of poetry. Much of Browning's i., for example, is tactile, and those who habitually visualize are unjust in laying the charge of obscurity at his door (see J. K. Bonnell, PMLA, 37 [1922], 574-98). Or again, the frequently voiced complaint that Shelley's poetry is less "concrete" than Keats's suffers from a basic misconception of the nature of i., for Shelley's poetry contains just as much i. as Keats's, although it is of a somewhat different kind (see Fogle [Bibliography]). In the second place, the concept of mental i. provides a valuable index to the type of imagination with which any given poet is gifted. To know that Keats's poetry is characterized by a predominance of tactile and organic i., for example, or that Shelley's is characterized by a predominance of the i., of motion, is valuable knowledge and provides important descriptive terms with which to define the achievement of each poet. Thirdly, the concept of mental i. is pedagogically useful, for a teacher or a critic may encourage better reading habits by stressing these aspects of poetry. Thus, because the reader is encouraged to make specific images in his mind as he reads, aesthetic appreciation can be improved in a very literal sense.

But the disadvantages of the mental i. approach almost outweigh its advantages. To begin with, it repeatedly runs into an insoluble methodological problem: if poets differ in their imagery-making capacities, so do readers, and therefore the attempt to characterize the imagination of any given poet is inextricably bound up with the imagination of the critic who analyzes it. An image which appears obviously tactile to one reader, for example, may seem clearly visual to another. Secondly, it tends to over-emphasize the role which mental i. plays in the understanding and appreciation of poetry, and an excessive concern of this nature can actually impede pleasure and comprehension—for poetry also operates through meaning, feeling, and sentiment (see G. H. Betts, The Distribution and Functions of Mental Imagery [1909]).

In the third place, and most important, in focusing upon the sensory qualities of images themselves, it diverts attention from the function of these images in the poetic context. It is crucial, for example, to distinguish between literal and figurative i., and to decide in the case of the latter just how the analogue should be taken. The functioning of T. S. Eliot's famous simile of the "patient etherized upon a table" (analogue, or figurative image) need depend very little upon the question of whether or not either Eliot or the reader has reproduced in his mind the various sensations which this image is potentially capable of stimulating—the sickly sweet smell of the anaesthetic, the feeling of numbness, the buzzing in the ears, the sense of lying prone, the white and silver gleam of the operating room, and so on. This sort of deliberate exploitation may or may not assist the reader in grasping the use of this image in the poem, but to understand that this image is one of half-life, half-death, of suspended animation which is the symbol of spiritual debility, and which is therefore highly appropriate not only to the setting of twilight (half-light, half-dark) but also, in terms of revealing Prufrock's state of mind, to the conceptual problem of death-in-life in the speaker's world around which the poem is built, need not of necessity require any such effort. One can therefore best discuss the functioning of a poem's i. without becoming overly involved in the question of the sensations in the reader's or the poet's mind.

And that is where the study of i. as a device of poetic language turned its attention, in the course of time; for i., whatever its sensory qualities may be, may function either literally, figuratively, symbolically, or in some combination. Thus, an investigation of figurative i. involves such problems as that of rhetorical types, that of the kinds of relationships which may obtain between subject and analogue, that of the nature of symbolic expression, and that of the use of figures in poetry, which the study of mental i. either confused or ignored.

Traditional rhetoricians developed elaborate systems of classification for figures of speech, but they were rarely as guilty of mere mechanical pigeon-holing as many modern critics have claimed. The common types distinguished now, however, have been reduced to about six: synecdoche, metonymy, simile, metaphor, personification, allegory, and—a related but different device—symbol. Each of these figures is a device of language by means of which one thing is said (analogue) while something else is meant (subject), and either the analogue, or the subject, or both, may involve i. Although merely identifying and analyzing types of figures is no guarantee of understanding their function in a particular poem, identification and analysis do involve issues which are germane to that end. Classification rests upon the kinds of relationships which may obtain between what is said and what is meant. Thus, in synecdoche and metonymy the relationship between thing said and thing meant is based largely upon some sort of contiguity regarding class and species, cause and effect, and so on, while in the remaining figures, on the other hand, the relationship is based largely upon similarity in difference. It was because of this that Aristotle could say of the power of making metaphors, that "it is the one thing that cannot be learnt from others; and it is also a sign of genius, since a good metaphor implies an intuitive perception of the similarity in dissimilars" (Poetics, 1459a 5-7).

The placing, then, of two different kinds of things in significant ratio is the central characteristic of these figures. Subject and analogue (or "tenor" and "vehicle" [q.v.] as I. A. Richards and other modern critics after him have come to designate them) may be related with respect to physical resemblance—as when Homer compares the charge of a warrior in battle to that of a lion on the sheepfold—in which case the study of mental i. provides useful distinctions. But many figures relate two different things in other ways: a lady's blush, her delicate skin, or her fragrance may find physical analogues in the color, texture, or odor of a rose, but her freshness, and beauty are qualities suggestively evoked by the rose rather than images tangibly displayed by it—what Burns's speaker is saying, after all, is that his lady is to him as June is to the world, in the sense of bringing joy. Or, as indicated above, a twilight sky and a patient etherized upon a table are related mainly in terms of attitude, emotion, and idea: sky is to light as patient is to life, in the sense of being half and half (there is also involved here, it may be supposed, a physical relationship between the patient's proneness and the clouds resting horizontally on the horizon during twilight). Furthermore, the two things related may each be images, or each may be feelings or concepts, or the subject may be an image and the analogue a feeling or concept, or the subject may be a feeling or concept and the analogue an image. Some critics have even claimed that the subject or tenor of a figure is in reality the relationship itself, and that therefore the analogy or vehicle includes the two things related. Thus, although the term "i." is commonly used to refer to all figures of speech, further distinctions are obviously necessary.

The kinds of things related and the nature and function of their relationship provide grounds upon which these distinctions may be made. It was once common to claim that proper practice precluded mixing one's analogues in any one figure (see Jennings), while critics today argue that no such rule is universally valid, especially in poetry (see Brooks). Or it was once considered good form to teach students to visualize all figures, but it has been repeatedly pointed out that not only are most metaphors constructed on other bases than mental i. but also that much mental i. is other than visual—in fact, persistent visualizing will break down the relationship entirely between subject and analogue in many figures (see Richards). Again, much attention has recently been focused upon that kind of figure in which the difference between subject and analogue is especially great, and which, since it is believed that such a figure was used mainly by Donne, Herbert, Marvell, Vaughan, Traherne, and so on, has been termed the "metaphysical image" (see Wells, Rugoff, Tuve)—although Miss Holmes has argued that it was derived from Elizabethan drama. Or again, much has been made of the function of the "central" or "unifying image" in a poem, according to which the poet develops a sustained analogy, which serves as the core of his poem.

When these distinctions serve as the basis for various speculations regarding the nature and development of poetic language, or the quality of the poetic imagination, "i." becomes one of the key terms of criticism. The New Critics (see NEW CRITICISM) generally hold that metaphor is not a rhetorical device but rather a mode of apprehension, a means of perceiving and expressing moral truths radically different from that of prose or scientific statement. If Max Müller thought that primitive man compared abstract ideas to concrete things because his conceptions outran his vocabulary, modern critics believe that the primitive identified the two in a rich and imaginative fashion (Buck and Barfield anticipated this view.) Thus "spirit," meaning "breath," was not borrowed as a concrete term to express the abstract concept of "soul," but rather "soul" was identified with "breath." Prescientific man (and that includes everyone up to around 1700), therefore, was supposed to be gifted with a "unified sensibility," and poets today are engaged in a mighty struggle to rectify the "dissociation of sensibility" created by science in the imaginations of men.

From these notions, a value-system has been constructed according to which a good poet "reconciles" abstract and concrete, thought and feeling, reason and imagination, and a bad poet, like the scientist, separates them. Thus the good poet aims at wholeness of experience by means of the poetic imagination or "mythic consciousness," whereby he sees facts in terms of values, and continually invents fresh metaphors (myths in little) and symbols (expanded metaphors). Richards, speaking of the artistic use of metaphor, claims "It is the supreme agent by which disparate and hitherto unconnected things are brought together in poetry for the sake of the effect upon attitude and impulse which spring from their collocation and from the combinations which the mind then establishes between them. . . . Metaphor is a semi-surreptitious method by which a greater variety of elements can be wrought into the fabric of the experience . . . what is needed for the wholeness of an experience is not always naturally present, and metaphor supplies an excuse by which what is needed may be smuggled in" (Principles). Modern critics accordingly prefer metaphor to simile, symbol to personification, and myth to allegory on the grounds of their superior unifying powers; and they prefer a poet who never explains but always implies what he means through i. (compare Archibald MacLeish's rather self-contradictory poem, Arx Poetica, cited above, for a well-known instance of this idea).

Modern criticism, then, has developed what it views as a radically "functional" theory of i. on the assumption that figures are the differentiae of poetic language and poetic language is the differentia of the poetic art. Its favorable terms are "rich," "complex," "concrete," "ambiguous," "ironic," "symbolic," "mythic," "sensuous," "unified," "wholeness," and so on, while its pejoratives are "sentimental," "prosaic," "didactic," "dissociated," and so on. This assumption, derived largely from Richards's reconstruction of Coleridge's theory of the imagination and from Eliot's reinterpretation of the Metaphysical Poets, has been placed against what the New Critics (J. C. Ransom, Cleanth Brooks, Allen Tate, R. P. Blackmur, W. K. Wimsatt, Jr., and so on) take to be the "decorative fallacy" of the traditional rhetoricians (who were supposed to have claimed that figures are pleasant but unnecessary adornments to plain sense) and the "heresy" of modern positivist semantics (which is supposed to claim that logic and the experimental method are the only avenues to truth and that poetry is either a harmless pastime or an actual waste of effort). Although certain other critics have questioned their emphases as well as their assumptions (see Tuve, Fogle, Muir, and Critics and Criticism, ed. R. S. Crane [1952]), the New Critics have defined an important if limited problem and their views have achieved a wide currency.

The study of figurative i. anticipates and overlaps the subsequently developed study of symbolic i. Here the essential question is how the patterns of i.—whether literal, figurative, or both—in a work reveal things about the author and/or his poem. The basic assumption is that repetition and recurrences (usually of images, but also on occasion of word patterns in general) are in themselves significant. Hence the method involves an amateur application (and, sometimes, distortion) of some elementary statistical principles. These patterns may either be within the work itself, or among literary works and myths in general (see ARCHETYPE), or both.

Assuming for the moment that repetitions are indeed significant, the nature of the significance must next be examined. What, exactly, will counting image clusters tell the critic? There are at least five distinguishable answers; they are, in increasing levels of complexity: (1) texts of doubtful authorship can be authenticated (see Smith); (2) inferences can be made about the poet's experiences, tastes, temperament, and so on (see Spurgeon, Banks); (3) the causes of tone, atmosphere, and mood in a poem or play can be analyzed and defined (Spurgeon); (4) some of the ways in which the structure of conflict in a play is supported can be examined (see Burke, Philosophy of Literary Form [1941], etc.); and (5) symbols can be traced out, either in terms of how image patterns relate to the author or of how they relate to archetypes, or some combination (Frye, Knight, Heilman).

The first two approaches relate to problems extrinsic to the work itself, although they seek internal evidence. The procedure involves counting all the images in a given work or in all the works of a given poet (and here the various problems of what an image is, what kind it is, and whether it is literal or figurative, must be resolved anew by each critic doing the counting) and then classifying them according to the areas of experience from which they derive: Nature—Animate and Inanimate, Daily Life, Learning, Commerce, and so on. Since these categories and their proportions represent aspects of the poet's imagination and perception, two inferences can be made on the basis of the resultant charts and figures: first, that these patterns are caused by the poet's personal experiences with life and that, therefore, they give a clue to the poet's personality and background; and second, that since they are unique, they offer a means of determining the authorship of doubtful works. Perhaps the second inference is sounder than the first, although both rest upon dubious assumptions, for frequently images appear in a work not because of the poet's personality or experience but rather because of literary and artistic conventions (see Hornstein, Hankins).

